Another Canadian speaker, Janice Fiamengo, is a professor of English literature whose hugely popular weekly YouTube program, The Fiamengo File, highlights the damaging impact of feminism in academe. She is scathing about women’s studies, which she believes has devolved into an intellectually incoherent and dishonest discipline replacing a callow set of slogans for real thought.

[image]
Janice Fiamengo
Local female men’s rights activists are excited about the chance to discuss with these luminaries how to get men’s issues on to the public agenda. Women such as Melbourne mental health advocate Rae Bonney, whose work with male-dominated workplaces reveals many of the contributors to the high male suicide rate, such as facing a biased family law system.

She says: “It’s both alarming and heartbreaking that so many of our social systems prevent men from getting the help and support they so desperately need. Every day I hear another story of a man who’s lost absolutely everything, often facing unproven accusations of violence and abuse.”

[image]
Rae Bonney
Bonney is on a high after hosting a recent Melbourne screening of The Red Pill, one of many I’ve organised through Fan-Force, a system that allows people to host local screenings of movies of their choice.

“We had nearly 200 people, including young women, couples and of course many men. There were a few tears and much applause before and after it ended. There’s a real sense that at last men’s issues are getting the attention they deserve," says the delighted Bonney.

One real sign of a shift in the cultural dialogue is an upcoming event on ABC2's Hack Live on June 20, Is Male Privilege Bullsh!t?, a debate where Jaye and various Honey Badgers will have a rare opportunity to show there are two sides to this story.

icmi.info

Totalitarian Tango

AVFM · 16 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I was honored to be allowed to do a reading of this exceptional piece by Moiret Alligiere, a man of many talents.
PE

Single fatherhood by choice: Implications of the artificial womb

Hopeland Cash · 17 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The idea of an artificial womb is not new and is far from settled. Theorized on for decades and featured in many well-known works of science fiction, this still-abstract device would take the place of a woman during the gestation and birth of a child. Artificial wombs have been discussed on A Voice for Men, as well as in other publications, exploring its implications for feminism and for women in general. Various MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) bloggers and YouTubers have covered the topic, often singing the artificial womb's praises as a tool for men to fulfill their desire for parenthood without needing the involvement of an unwelcome woman.

The artificial womb seems inevitable; mankind is very good at creating devices to replace our biological functions, especially vital or costly ones. At first it will be used by women unable to naturally carry a child, but eventually it will become available to the general public. Some commentators have suggested that feminists will fight to keep men from using it; they may, but they will lose. The artificial womb will be a service provided by private companies and they will service anyone who pays.

At some point, maybe in 10 years or maybe in 200, men will be able to have a child without any woman being involved. The big question is what will happen then.

Single parenthood by choice is already a very real thing. Over 40% of children in the United States are born to parents out of wedlock and a similar percentage of single parents have never been married, adding up to over 1 in 10 children living with a single parent who has never been married, overwhelmingly mothers. Many had children knowing they wouldn't marry; for those more upfront with their intentions, there are sperm banks allowing any woman to conceive independently. Women have become empowered almost to infinity to have children if, when, and with whom they choose. For the latter, it seems a great many choose "with no one" when it comes to including a father in the lives of their children.

There is far more social science on single mothers and their children than can be repeated here, but to say the least this lifestyle choice is less than advisable. There is far less data on single fathers, however. Even if there was, it would largely be limited to divorced fathers and their children; true single fathers by choice are a rarity, currently achievable only through adoption, surrogacy, or a similar arrangement. Most single fathers become such by being widowed, an event beyond their control, or through divorce, an event almost always in the control of their spouse.

The artificial womb will change that. Armed with their own sperm and a donated or lab-grown ovum, paternally inclined but bachelor-minded men will be able to walk into a lab and leave with a polished decanter brimming with life. Since it will be his sole choice, even a man in a relationship could go about securing one of these bottle-babies without consulting his partner; it'll be his choice, and hers to leave or stay. No strings, baby, and in this case no child support.

Aldous Huxley's Brave New World envisioned a world similar to this, but the reality will be far more dynamic. Conventional families will not cease to exist, but a new flavor will come into being: single fathers by choice. For the first time in human history, men will have the choice to become biological fathers when they wish, independent of anyone else's biology.

Obviously, this isn't necessarily a good thing. It's only logical to assume children of single fathers will face all the problems endured by the children of single mothers, but adult men and women will both be in control of their reproduction (surely there'll be male birth control by the time we have an artificial womb) and will become parents either when they and a partner choose to do so together or when the individuals elect to walk that path alone. Problems will arise, as they do now, when people do so ignorant of the true challenges of parenthood and undertake the duty without being prepared.

Even when they prove capable, though, what will the rest of us think? All things being equal, there is little chance society will treat single mothers and fathers by choice the same. As mentioned above, there surely will be feminist blowback against the use of artificial wombs by men. These people don't even want men in schools, no less raising children unsupervised. Traditionalists will also look askance at this new breed of fathers. They don't understand parenthood, detractors will say, labeling men unprepared to take on the once feminine role of prenatal caretaker. It'd be like a woman trying to … well, no, there's nothing women aren't thought capable of doing anymore. But if there were something we still thought men did more naturally than women, it'd be like a woman trying to do that.

There will also be social planning concerns voiced. Overpopulation is already considered a problem by many, and some worry that an artificial womb will make producing children even easier (is that possible?), removing all physical burdens and thereby risking rampant, irresponsible reproduction (cough cough, clearly not a problem now). This fear is unlikely to materialize, though. Humanity often bases technology off nature, but we rarely match the sheer ruggedness and efficiency of evolution. Artificial wombs will be prohibitively expensive, and even as they come down in price they will likely remain more costly than a woman carrying a child. For single dads, this may even out due to the cost savings of being single, but it will not be cheap. That means more work and less leisure spending. Some will still take on parenthood lightly, but just as now it won't be a good idea to do so. It will be hard work, whether for a couple, a single woman, or a single man, and these people will have to live with their responsibilities.

Presumably fetuses of artificial wombs will be treated the same as those of regular wombs, except controlled by (in such cases) the single father, meaning the same rights for abortion, legal surrender, and adoption. All in all, the artificial womb would do much to level the reproductive playing field. Women would no longer hold the monopoly on gestation, making relationships more honest and letting everyone choose when to become a parent.

There will still be differences, however, the greatest of which is sex (the verb, not the noun). It's unlikely the average woman will embrace the artificial womb enough to sterilize herself and rely on the machine for reproduction. Most men wouldn't want to have a vasectomy and then rely on stem cells to grow new sperm either. Our reproductive abilities are part of our identity, and most people don't want to give that up. Just as sperm banks serve as a replacement (or at least broker) for male reproduction, the artificial womb will stand in for a woman.

So while men will become able to reproduce using an artificial womb, women will still have the option of reproducing naturally but parenting singularly. Conception through sex will still be the norm, which raises the issue of "accidental" (are scare quotes scarier in italics?) pregnancies. In the United States, nearly half of all pregnancies are unplanned. Some number is inevitable while people have sex with imperfect birth control, but there can be no unintended pregnancies with an artificial womb. Its use will be deliberate, rational, and fully consensual. Every child born from one will have to be wanted, at least at the time of conception. This will lend an air of responsibility to those who use it, leading to higher expectations on them since they forfeit the out of "it just happened." Even more so for our new breed of single fathers by choice. They will be the ones to have stepped out of the chains of biology entirely and chosen, fully knowing and with undeniable intent, to become a father.

How will this affect unintended biological pregnancies? How many husbands faced with an unplanned child would wish one party or the other had had their tubes tied so they could've just used an artificial womb when they were actually ready. Finally having an option aside from raw biology, will fewer men tolerate women's abysmally high rate of birth control fraud Paternity fraud too: "Pregnancy is too hard on you, honey. Let's use an artificial womb." That way I can know it's my sperm swimming around in there.

Then there's the bar of excellence for single parenthood in general. Certain judgy individuals have asserted that single fathers are more desirable partners because they don't have a meaningful choice in the matter, making single fatherhood a badge of good character. When men can wilfully choose to become single parents, that will change and they will be responsible for helping their child avoid the many pitfalls of single parenthood. Men will not only become the paragon of the parentally empowered but will also be forced to set a new standard for parental responsibility. Even today, if a man puts his sperm in a woman (or even if she puts it there without his permission), he is held fully and inescapably responsible for it. If he puts that same sperm in a jar and grows a baby independent of a woman, you can be damn sure we are all going to expect him to be the best parent he possibly can, and if he does it when he isn't ready it'll be his screw-up. Male hyperagency will extend to single fatherhood by choice, leaving no room for excuses. Single fatherhood will no longer always be foisted on men, but even those who do choose it will be held fully accountable.

This will lead to discrimination against men, excessive criticism, and persecution for parental wrongs that would be overlooked were it a mother. But at the same time there will be the many cases of single fathers by choice being successful parents. Since there will be more effort involved and higher expectations to meet, men will not often become fathers on a mere whim. How will this affect our views on single mothers by choice? Biology isn't a machine, so birth control does and will continue to fail and there will be genuinely accidental babies. But half? That's bullshit and we all know it. Some unknown but not inconsiderable proportion of those conceptions are due to the woman either (a) choosing to become pregnant but hiding behind the "it just happened" excuse or (b) throwing caution to the wind and actually letting it just happen, consequences (and partner) be damned.

But what if their monopoly were broken? Women are given free reign over their reproduction because we don't have an alternative. The artificial womb will change that. Female biology will no longer be the sole carrier of the next generation, and as the free market teaches us, competition will breed performance. With reproduction harnessed by science, how much longer will irresponsible behavior be allowed to slide?

When men gain control over their reproduction and face that responsibility like rational adults, women will have to change their game plan. Single mothers by choice will face greater scrutiny alongside their male counterparts and their motivations will more readily be called into question. Some will call it victim-blaming, but when birth control and abortion are so readily available there really is no excuse, and the artificial womb will only add to that. Like adoption, artificial womb babies will be taken on only by choice, but unlike adoption there will be no chance of a history of abuse or attachment problems, and the full biological connection will be there to encourage a healthy relationship.

By showing how single parenthood can be done better, it is likely that the advent of the artificial womb will cause single motherhood by choice to sharply decline. It's not that men will make better single parents, but entering parenthood will not be so casual a choice for them. Just as it would be if women had to take a pill to get pregnant, rather than to not, the greater will required to become a single father will mean fewer of the unprepared will undertake that course, leading to a higher proportion of fit parents and therefore healthy children. Expectations on single parents will increase, awareness of the social ills faced by their children will grow, and a man will be less willing to put up with single mothers since he can now have a kid on his own. In that regard, artificial wombs may help combat overpopulation: women won't be able to get away with so much bad behavior anymore and will be held to task for their choices, so they'll be forced to be more responsible and stop having so many children they are incapable of caring for.

There are and always will be exceptions, of course. Many children raised today by single mothers are healthy and happy. Some men who have children via artificial wombs will go on to neglect or abuse them. What matters is getting to a place where people, men and women, become parents only when they want to, and never when they aren't ready for it. It's time we stop allowing parenthood by force and condoning irresponsible reproduction. The artificial womb will help achieve that by giving men reproductive autonomy and breaking the female monopoly on childbearing that forces us to overlook their misconduct.

That's a brave new world I can get behind.

Eating while MGTOW: Buck buck chicken

August Løvenskiolds · 18 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) lifestyle, ideally, involves both a real-world withdrawal of men from women and a reduction in the large excess of productivity by men necessary to support the pampering of women through the state's taxation of men's natural high productivity.

Men like me who choose this path may experience a decline in disposable income as we no longer strive to be the stripper pole of cash climbed by needy, seductive succubi eager to harvest us for our resources. But this doesn't mean that MGTOW should be denied the gastronomic pleasures of preparing our own easy, affordable, and low-cost meals.

I go shopping for food once every two weeks or so. I eat out less than once a month – twice in calendar 2015 so far, and a woman paid for one of those meals.

Beef is quite expensive as I write this but chicken is cheap and in Dallas, I can buy a "family pack" (heh) of 7-9 boned (heh), skinless chicken breasts (heh) for less than 10-12 dollars US. I break them up into individual plastic freezer bags, carefully bleeding out as much air as possible before freezing them. I then have a fortnight's worth of protein for the price of buying some crazy feminist harpy two sour apple martinis.

Now, the basic preparation of one of these frozen breasts is easy: remove from freezer and wrapping, plop onto a pan and place into a 450 degree Fahrenheit (about 230 Celsius) oven for about an hour or less.

While you are waiting, get on Twitter and give hell to any feminists you can find.

At the end of an hour you will find a beautiful, tasty (if a little dry) roasted chicken breast. Pair that with your favorite dipping sauce (teriyaki and chili paste for me), some veggie dish and a glass of cheap wine, and you are eating in a way Caesar would envy two thousand years ago.

Now, after a while, you can get more elaborate with seasonings, dipping sauces and side dishes but the basic idea is the same: low-cost, low work, and good, sensible food to keep you going on your latest online adventure.

I just polished off my latest variation on this dish. It is much more elaborate but adds a variety necessary to keep gastronomic things interesting.

First, before I removed it from the bag, I thawed the chicken breast. I picked a large breast because I intended to stuff it with butter and herbs.

I force-thawed the still-bagged chicken breast in a small container under a leaky faucet dripping slowly on top of it. It took about 50 minutes to thaw. Two twitter feminists screamed and blocked me while I was waiting. I then preheated the oven to 400 degrees (about 205 Celsius).

As I held the thawed breast gently, my knife made a small incision on the thickest side of it. I enlarged the incision with the blunt plastic handle of a small spatula until there was a tight canyon/cul-de-sac in the breast as far as I could force the probe without rupturing the other side of the breast.

I stuffed the resulting cavern in the breast with one smashed clove of garlic, several shards of frozen butter, and a fresh leaf of sage. Oregano, rosemary, or really, any herb you like can be used here.

I placed the stuffed breast in a 10-inch (25 cm) heavy aluminum pie pan with some frozen whole-kernel sweet corn. I put some pats of real butter, hot sauce, pepper and salt over the whole mess and baked them for about 40-55 minutes while I abused some more online feminists with logic.

And voilà. A feast of buttery baked chicken and sweet corn. Life is GOOD.

You can stuff the chicken with whatever you like before baking: ham & cheese, bleu cheese, leeks, olives (green and/or black), horseradish & apple – endless choices. No affirmative consent is needed. Ever.

A cheap, delicious meal – costing two to four bucks – and a nightmare for feminists.

Living well is sweet revenge.

Men's Movement and Black History Month

Jewel Eldora · 19 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In 2019, I drove from Minneapolis to Chicago to meet with the leadership of the International Conference on Men's Issues. Black comedian Tommy Sotomayor had been booked as a keynote speaker.

The conference was the largest ever gathering of its kind (500 people) so it was difficult to get one on one time with leadership. I finally got an opportunity to speak to Paul Elam of "A Voice for Men," the internet's oldest website dedicated to mens' issues.

"If your movement was legitimate, Paul, it'd be almost entirely Black men," I accused.

Paul responded, "I know" then he paused, "but it is legitimate," he responded, "and it's just a matter of time before everyone realizes it."

I knew what he meant. The previous year, I'd invited several Black men to a screening of the "Red Pill Movie" being hosted by the Twin Cities Men's Center. The TCMC makes the bulk of their money facilitating court-ordered Duluth Model based anger management, inspired by the Women's Movement.

Many of the Black men I'd invited were deeply leery. They'd heard about the type of court-ordered, Marxist Feminist inspired, training being offered by these types of state sponsored centers.

As a rule, Black men resent being taught about relationships with women by other men who've never had intimate relationships with women. Few enjoy being offered a sliding fee scale to be told they are conditioned in a patriarchy to rape and oppress women using a spectrum of violence.

The Duluth Model is the most pervasive domestic violence and anger management tool in the world.

Still, one of the men I invited showed up and sat in the front row where he was greeted with gratitude during opening announcements. They were happy so many showed up to the viewing and they were happy to see Black men attending.

He was the only one.

My friend walked out about 3/4 of the way through the movie, which addresses the issues men face, as a legal class. Among them, false accusations of rape, sentencing disparity, depression, homelessness, shorter life expectancy, greater risk of drug abuse, suicide, and legal genital mutilation.

When I asked him later, why he left, he said, it made him sick to, "listen to all of that whiny white boy shit."

This sentiment is shared by many who believe that white men do not encounter discrimination in family courts, police encounters, health and counseling services, on the operating table, or in the workplace.

The data shows a different story.

The Chicago International Conference on Men's Issues had many sessions dedicated to the Duluth Model and some on the effects Marxist Feminism has had on family courts and families.

In his keynote on the importance of fathers, Sotomayor warned, "The Black Community is the canary in the coal mine in regards to the effects of fatherlessness. Increased teen pregnancy, lower test scores, dropouts, and crime. All that stuff started when they started taking fathers out of the house."

Sotomayor stunned the crowd "Everything you see in the Black Community, now you're starting to see in the suburbs. Look at the school shootings, all white, and of the last 25, 24 were from female led households."

Gangster Cinema: The Last Best Male Space

Doug Mortimer · 20 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A few years ago I was watching a European gangster film (can't remember the name of it). The film contained the standard array of beatings, shootings, and other mayhem – all that plus subtitles! The audience sat unmoved for about two hours of this bludgeoning, bloodletting and body-stacking. Then towards the end of the movie, a mobster's girlfriend mouthed off to him so he slapped her. The audience gave up an audible gasp.

This is a classic example of the more times change, the more they stay the same. Slapping around an uppity dame is nothing new in gangster movies, but the contemporary audience reaction is. Considering the graphic violence directed towards men in these movies, a woman getting slapped doesn't even registers as a microaggression. But the violence-against-women lobby is shocked. Waste all the men you want but lay a hand on a woman – how dare you!

One of the most iconic of such moments occurred in an early example of the gangster genre. In Public Enemy (1931) James Cagney shoved half a grapefruit into his girlfriend's kisser. It probably didn't hurt her (unless she got citric acid in her eyes) but Depression-era audiences were shocked, not so much by the waste of precious food but by the affront to female dignity! FUN FACT NO. 1: In Cagney's autobiography he related that Monte Brice, the ex-husband of the actress (Mae Clarke) playing Cagney's girlfriend, had timed the movie so he could return to the theater, enjoy the grapefruit scene, and leave…only to return again and again. Too bad he didn't live long enough to enjoy the convenience of home video.

Granted, there are worse weapons than grapefruit. Consider Lee Marvin in The Big Heat (1953). First he puts out his cigarette in Carolyn Jones's hand, then he hurls a pot of hot coffee in Gloria Grahame's face. How about a trigger warning, cinema majors? No, not for violence against women but for the cigarette scene. Cigarette-smoking was ubiquitous during the 50's but now it's considered repulsive.

Both Public Enemy and The Big Heat have been selected for preservation by the National Film Registry. I don't know whether or not this status is subject to cancellation by a Twitter mob.

In years past I used to watch gangster movies and thought that most of what I saw was the product of a scriptwriter's imagination. Remember Al Capone (Robert De Niro) in formal attire beating up a couple of double-crossers with a baseball bat at a banquet in The Untouchables (1987)? An unforgettable scene…but it also appears in biographies of Capone.

Of course, sometimes poetic license is employed. For example, in the aforementioned Public Enemy, the grapefruit scene was based on a real incident involving a Chicago mobster by the name of Hymie Weiss – but he used an omelet instead of a grapefruit. Obviously, the logistics of retakes favored grapefruit.

Then there is the hapless hood whose head is squeezed in a vise in Casino (1995). When his eyeball pops out of his head, you may think it was just gratuitous gore. Turns out it really happened, albeit to a Chicago goombah in the 1960's.

Gangster film atrocities are truly multicultural. Every society has its criminal class, so palefaces have no monopoly on the genre. Film fans can take their pick of black, Asian, or Hispanic gangster movies. The genre, however, is ill-suited for women because women are ill-suited for criminal gangs. When women are in charge, they seek consensus. This approach is totally incompatible with gangsterism. "This is why women have no place in society," observes an idiosyncratic hit man (Robert Keith) babysitting a weeping woman hostage in The Lineup (1958). "Women are weak. Crime is aggressive and so is the law."

It would be a waste of time to point out toxic masculinity in gangster films. Without toxic masculinity, there is no gangster genre. Examples of same would surely provide ample fodder for any number of doctoral dissertations in film history or women's studies.

Is gender equity possible in the gangster genre? Well, the distaff reboots of Ghostbusters and Ocean's 11 didn't wow moviegoers, and 355, an attempt at an all-female high-tech spy movie, also failed to perform. An out-and-out gangster film would be even less successful – which doesn't mean some woke bank won't be willing to flush its money down a toilet by financing such a questionable project.

Consider an all-female take on Reservoir Dogs (1992). A femme flip on this movie would be a heavy-duty makeover because: FUN FACT NO. 2: Reservoir Dogs has zero speaking parts for women! Under the diversity guidelines now in place for Oscar consideration, it would not qualify for any nominations.

While there have been any number of voices demanding more female input in the film industry, the gangster film appears to be bulletproof. This is a good thing. When we see how feminism has ruined other genres and franchises, we realize that nothing good could arise from their involvement.

There is perhaps another reason for feminists' reluctance to tinker with the gangster genre. Could it be that women secretly admire the gangster?

We have long heard that male confidence is a chick magnet. Ever see a successful movie gangster who doesn't ooze confidence? If you do, he probably won't be around by the end of the movie. Think Elisha Cook, Jr., the definitive fall guy in The Maltese Falcon (1941), The Killing (1956), and many others.

The gangster kingpin lords it over his men, but sometimes he turns to silly putty when dealing with women. Exhibit A is Humphrey Bogart as bank robber "Mad Dog" Earle in High Sierra (1941). After enduring a long stretch in prison he sets up another heist as soon as he gets out, but he falls for a teenage girl with a clubfoot. After financing her operation with his ill-gotten loot, she gives him the gate. He meets his fate when he is shot down emerging from his hiding place while trying to protect a small dog he has adopted. FUN FACT NO. 3: the dog was played by Bogart's real-life pet. Oh, sure, the story tends to humanize the protagonist…but a lot of good it does him! It is permissible for a movie mobster to get whacked because he was too ambitious or he disobeyed his superiors. Any self-respecting gangster, however, should know better than to white knight for cripples and terriers.

While sentimentality has no place in gangster movies, some films offer a lefthanded salute to motherhood. J. Edgar Hoover characterized Ma Barker as "the most vicious, dangerous and resourceful criminal brain of the last decade." The fact is, Ma Barker was no mastermind; she was more of an accomplice, sort of a cheerleader for her sons. According to Alvin "Creepy" Karpis, who accompanied her sons on their misdeeds, "The most ridiculous story in the annals of crime is that Ma Barker was the mastermind behind the Karpis-Barker gang … She wasn't a leader of criminals or even a criminal herself." So if you remember Shelley Winters as a pistol-packin' mama in Bloody Mama (1970), remember: "Based on a true story" is a license to fabricate.

Another gangster film with a maternal theme is White Heat (1949), wherein James Cagney's mother (Margaret Wycherley) is his biggest fan, urging him onward and upward in his criminal career. Famously, Cagney's last words before his self-immolation are "Made it, ma! Top of the world!"

How about Janine "Smurf" Cody (Jacki Weaver) in Animal Kingdom (2010), the Australian counterpart of Ma Barker? And let's not forget The Krays (1990), a British film about mobster twins who maintained an unusually close relationship with their mother (Billie Whitelaw). Perhaps as a result of this relationship, one of the twins was a homosexual – now there's a real rarity in gangster films.

Perhaps as renowned as Ma Barker was Bonnie Parker. For all the romance surrounding her hard-ass image, she was hardly a hardened criminal. Today we might classify her as a publicity hound or an attention whore. Standing all of 4'10", she was hardly a likely candidate to effectively wield a Thompson submachine gun, which weighed ten pounds unloaded. In truth, there is no record of her killing anyone. And she looked nothing like Faye Dunaway or Dorothy Provine, who portrayed her in Bonnie and Clyde (1967) and The Bonnie Parker Story (1958), respectively.

Women are largely extraneous in gangster films because a fundamental theme of the genre is the male group and its dynamics, more specifically, how the alpha male manages his subalterns (or liquidates them if it comes to that) in achieving their illicit goals. Unlike women, gangsters don't call 911 at the first sign of trouble; they take care of business themselves, or it takes care of them. You might say it's nature red in tooth and claw, or just the trash taking itself out. Either way, it's a harsh unforgiving world out there. The strong don't always survive but they last longer than the weak. More to the point, strength is admired, weakness is not.

In the early days of sound movies, however, handwringers and bluenoses dictated that gangster films had to be framed as cautionary "crime doesn't' pay" tales. The original Scarface (1932) was subtitled "The Shame of a Nation" and opened with a preface saying "This picture is an indictment of gang rule in America and of the callous indifference of the government to this constantly increasing menace to our safety and liberty. Every incident in this picture is the reproduction of an actual occurrence and the purpose of this picture is to demand of the government: "What are you going to do about it?" The government is your government. What are YOU going to do about it?"

Well, a half century can make a difference. There was no such preamble for the 1983 version of Scarface. It was OK for viewers to revel in the decadence and depredations of Tony Montana (Al Pacino), and "Say hello to my little friend" remains a beloved movie line after all these years.

While we're at it, let's say hello to some of the positive features of gangster movies:

> There is no virtue signaling. A good gangster film is a crash course in realpolitik and Machiavellian maneuvering. The bottom line – getting results – is what matters. Occasionally scriptwriters offer us a feisty priest, such as Karl Malden in On the Waterfront (1954) or Pat O'Brien in Angels With Dirty Faces (1938), but they are just foils for the protagonists. Audiences don't root for them. Female finger-waggers are also rare.
>
> There is no psychobabble. Gangsters do not read self-help books. Gangsters do not consult relationship experts. Gangsters do not rely on support groups. The Sopranos notwithstanding, gangsters do not undergo psychoanalysis – particularly with a female psychiatrist. Remember: The Sopranos is not a movie, it is television, therefore automatically suspect. In other words, fuhgeddaboutit.
>
> There are no optics. Aside from dressing well, gangsters don't worry about their image. Public relations is not a motivation. Indeed, the worse a gangster behaves the more his legend grows. Leaving a trail of dead bodies is no more a problem for gangsters than it is for the Clintons.
>
> There is no affirmative action. If you're not the right ethnicity, you won't move up in the organization. This is true of the traditional Mafia, the Jewish mafia, the Irish mafia, the Russian mafia, or any other mafia. If you want to be a yakuza, you'd better be Japanese. An outsider might be employed as a low-level flunkey or gofer, but upward mobility is severely limited.
>
> There is no digital currency. While the global solons are pushing for a cashless society and cryptocurrency gains more and more fans, the gangster revels in hard cash and expects payment in kind. If you owe him money and don't pay up, he doesn't send you a text or an email. He won't employ snail mail to send a second notice, a letter from his law firm, or a form letter telling you your case has been referred to a collection agency. This leads directly to the next category…
>
> There is no filing for bankruptcy. If you borrow money from gangsters to go to college, rest assured your student loans will not be forgiven. Hire the best bankruptcy attorney you can, and it won't make any difference. Which leads us to…
>
> There are no Atticus Finch type lawyers. This is not to say gangsters never employ lawyers. Their attitude towards the legal profession is eminently realistic, however. When a gangster hires a lawyer, he doesn't do so to get justice; he hires a lawyer to get results. This, of course, is why people have always hired lawyers, but one cannot admit to it in polite society.
>
> There is no intersectionality. To be sure, gangster films have victims – lots of them. They are not stunning and amazing, however, just kneecapped or dead. The gangster film is no place for sissies. If you are a victim and you survive, you have to turn it around and victimize your victimizer to get any street cred.

Given the fact that gangster films violate numerous contemporary taboos, they cater to wishful thinking. A well-done gangster film is a good workout for the id. It's about men behaving badly and don't you wish you were one of them! In that respect, a gangster film is like a fantasy film. Henry Hill (Ray Liotta) sums it up perfectly in the final scene of Goodfellas (1990):

> I never voted. I never paid taxes. My birth certificate and my arrest sheet…that's all you'd ever have to know I was alive.

Ghosting, anyone? Unfortunately, after he enters the witness protection program, he laments:

> Today everything is different. There's no action. I have to wait around like everyone else…I'm an average nobody. Get to live the rest of my life like a schnook.

In other words, just like all you beta males out there in Schnookville. You know who you are…all you guys stymied by morality, karma, the Golden Rule, the Ten Commandments, the categorical imperative, or what will the neighbors think.

Fear not, fellow schnooks, for sooner or later another gangster film will be released to temporarily bust you out of your prison without bars. You can sit in the dark and fantasize about how wonderful it would be if you could dispatch your enemies as bluntly and decisively as the average movie gangster takes care of business. For two hours you can rise above schnookdom and get in touch with your inner ubermensch.

Nietzsche would likely approve…but it would take another article to explain why.

The gynæcocentric theory, by Lester Ward (1903)

Peter Wright · 21 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It may not come as much of a surprise to learn some men were champions of gynocentrism over the centuries, men we might refer to as white knights on account of their exaggerated chivalry. Lester F. Ward (1841 – 1913) was one such champion, promoting the idea that women were naturally superior to men in his 'Gynocentrism theory' reprinted below. In this regard, Ward presaged the promotion of difference feminism by Evolutionary Psychologists and feminist writers like Harvard's Carol Gilligan who uphold the thesis of female superiority. As an early promoter of gynocentrism theory, Ward is now considered by feminist historians such as Ann Taylor Allen to be an early feminist.[1] The following is an excerpt from his longer work entitled Pure Sociology, published in 1903. – PW

The gynæcocentric theory

The gynæcocentric theory is the view that the female sex is primary and the male secondary in the organic scheme, that originally and normally all things center, as it were, about the female, and that the male, though not necessary in carrying out the scheme, was developed under the operation of the principle of advantage to secure organic progress through the crossing of strains. The theory further claims that the apparent male superiority in the human race and in certain of the higher animals and birds is the result of specialization in extra-normal directions due to adventitious causes which have nothing to do with the general scheme, but which can be explained on biological and psychological principles; that it only applies to certain characters, and to a relatively small number of genera and families. It accounts for the prevalence of the androcentric theory by the superficial character of human knowledge of such subjects, chiefly influenced by the illusion of the near, but largely, in the case of man at least, by tradition, convention, and prejudice.

History of the Theory

As this theory is not only new but novel, and perhaps somewhat startling, it seems proper to give a brief account of its inception and history, if it can be said to have such. As the theory, so far as I have ever heard, is wholly my own, no one else having proposed or even defended it, scarcely any one accepting it, and no one certainly coveting it, it would be folly for me to pretend indifference to it. At the same time it must rest on facts that cannot be disputed, and the question of its acceptance or rejection must become one of interpreting the facts.

In the year 1888 there existed in Washington what was called the Six o'clock Club, which consisted of a dinner at a hotel followed by speeches by the members of the Club according to a programme. The Fourteenth Dinner of the Club took place on April 26, 1888, at Willard's Hotel. It was known to the managers that certain distinguished women would be in Washington on that day, and they were invited to the Club. Among these were Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Miss Phoebe Couzins, Mrs. Croly (Jennie June), Mrs. N. P. Willis, and a number of others equally well known. On their account the subject of Sex Equality was selected for discussion, and I was appointed to open the debate. Although in a humorous vein, I set forth the greater part of the principles and many of the facts of what I now call the gynæcocentric theory.

Professor C. V. Riley was present and, I think, took part in the discussion. Many of my facts were drawn from insect life, and especially interested him. I mention this because a long time afterward he brought me a newspaper clipping from the Household Companion for June, 1888, containing a brief report of my remarks copied from the St. Louis Globe, but crediting them to him; and he apologized for its appearance saying that he could not explain the mistake. The reporter had fairly seized the salient points of the theory and presented them in a manner to which I could not object. This, therefore, was the first time the theory can be said to have been stated in print. The exact date at which it appeared in the Globe I have not yet learned, but presume it was shortly after the meeting of the Club. Professor Riley did not hesitate to announce himself a convert to the theory, and we often discussed it together.

I had long been reflecting along this line, and these events only heightened my interest in the subject. The editor of the Forum had solicited an article from me, and I decided to devote it to a popular but serious presentation of the idea. The result was my article entitled, "Our Better Halves." [3] That article, therefore, constitutes the first authorized statement of the gynæcocentric theory that was published, and as a matter of fact it is almost the only one. Mr. Grant Allen answered my argument on certain points in the same magazine,[4] and I was asked to put in a rejoinder, which I did,[5] but these discussions related chiefly to certain differences between the mind of man and woman and did not deal with the question of origin. I alluded to it in my first presidential address before the Biological Society of Washington,[6] and it came up several times in writing the "Psychic Factors" (Chapters XIV, XXVI).

Such is the exceedingly brief history of the gynæcocentric theory, and if it is entirely personal to myself, this is no fault of mine. Nothing pleases me more than to see in the writings of others any intimation, however vague and obscure, that the principle has been perceived, and I have faithfully searched for such indications and noted all I have seen. The idea has not wholly escaped the human mind, but it is never presented in any systematic way. It is only occasionally shadowed forth in connection with certain specific facts that call forth some passing reflection looking in this general direction. In introducing a few of these adumbrations I omit the facts, which will be considered under the several heads into which the subject will naturally fall, and confine myself for the most part to the reflections to which they have given rise. Many of these latter, however, are of a very general character, and not based on specific facts. In fact thus far the theory has had rather the form of a prophetic idea than of a scientific hypothesis.

We may begin as far back as Condorcet, who brushed aside the conventional error that intellect and the power of abstract reasoning are the only marks of superiority and caught a glimpse of the truth that lies below them when he said: –

> If we try to compare the moral energy of women with that of men, taking into consideration the necessary effect of the inequality with which the two sexes have been treated by laws, institutions, customs, and prejudices, and fix our attention on the numerous examples that they have furnished of contempt for death and suffering, of constancy in their resolutions and their convictions, of courage and intrepidity, and of greatness of mind, we shall see that we are far from having the proof of their alleged inferiority. Only through new observations can a trite light be shed upon the question of the natural inequality of the two sexes.[7]

Comte, as all know, changed his attitude toward women after his experiences with Clotilde de Vaux, but even in his "Positive Philosophy," in which he declared them to be in a state of "perpetual infancy," and of "fundamental inferiority," be admitted that they had a "secondary superiority considered from the social point of view."[8] In his "Positive Polity" he expressed himself much more strongly, saying that the female sex "is certainly superior to ours in the most fundamental attribute of the human species, the tendency to make sociability prevail over personality."[9] He also says that "feminine supremacy becomes evident when we consider the spontaneous disposition of the affectionate sex (sexe aimant) always to further morality, the sole end of all our conceptions."[10]

Of all modern writers the one most free from the androcentric bias, so far as I am aware, is Mr. Havelock Ellis. In his excellent book "Man and Woman," be has pointed out many of the fallacies of that Weltanschauung, and without apparent leaning toward anything but the truth has placed woman in a far more favorable light than it is customary to view her. While usually confining himself to the facts, he occasionally indicates that their deeper meaning has not escaped him. Thus he says: "The female is the mother of the new generation, and has a closer and more permanent connection with the care of the young; she is thus of greater importance than the male from Nature's point of view" (pp. 383-384). To him is also due, the complete refutation of the "arrested development" theory, above mentioned, by showing that the child, and the young generally, represent the most advanced type of development, while the adult male represents a reversion to an inferior early type, and this in man is a more bestial type.

In the sayings quoted thus far we have little more than opinions, or general philosophical tenets, of which it would be much easier to find passages with the opposite import. In fact statements of the androcentric theory are to be met with everywhere. Not only do philosophers and popular writers never tire of repeating its main propositions, but anthropologists and biologists will go out of their way to defend it while at the same time heaping up facts that really contradict it and strongly support the gynæcocentric theory. This is due entirely to the power of a predominant world view (Weltanschauung). The androcentric theory is such a world view that is deeply stamped upon the popular mind, and the history of human thought has demonstrated many times that scarcely any number of facts opposed to such a world view can shake it. It amounts to a social structure and has the attribute of stability in common with other social structures. Only occasionally will a thinking investigator pause to consider the true import of the facts he is himself bringing to light.

Bachofen, McLennan, Morgan, and the other ethnologists who have contributed to our knowledge of the remarkable institution or historic phase called the matriarchate, all stop short of stating the full significance of these phenomena, and the facts of amazonism that are so often referred to as so many singular anomalies and reversals of the natural order of things, are never looked at philosophically as residual facts that must be explained even if they overthrow many current beliefs. Occasionally some one will take such facts seriously and dare to intimate a doubt as to the prevailing theory. Thus I find in Ratzenhofer's work the following remark: –

> It is probable that in the horde there existed a certain individual equality between man and woman; the results of our investigation leave it doubtful whether the man always had a superior position. There is much to indicate that the woman was the uniting element in the community; the mode of development of reproduction in the animal world and the latest investigations into the natural differences between man and woman give rise to the assumption that the woman of to-day is the atavistic product of the race, while the man varies more frequently and more widely. This view agrees perfectly with the nature of the social process, for in the horde, as the social form out of which the human race has developed, there existed an individual equality which has only been removed by social disturbances which chiefly concern the man.
>
> All the secondary sexual differences in men are undoubtedly explained by the struggle for existence and the position of man in the community as conditioned thereby. Even the security of the horde from predatory animals, and still more the necessity of fighting with other men for the preservation of the group, developed individual superiority in general, both mental and physical, and especially in man. But any individual superiority disturbed the equality existing in the elements of the horde; woman from her sexual nature took only a passive part in these disturbances. The sexual life as well as the mode of subsistence no longer has its former peaceful character. Disturbances due to the demands of superior individuals thrive up to a certain point, beyond which the differentiation of the group into several takes place.[11]

Among biologists the philosophical significance of residual facts opposed to current beliefs is still less frequently reflected upon. I have stated that Professor Riley fully accepted the view that I set forth and admitted that the facts of entomology sustained it, yet, although somewhat of a philosopher himself, and living in the midst of the facts, the idea had not previously occurred to him. Among botanists, Professor Mechan was the only one in whose writings I have found an adumbration of the gynæcocentric theory. He several times called attention to a certain form of female superiority in plants. In describing certain peculiarities in the Early Meadow Rue and comparing the development of the male and female flowers he observed differences due to sex. After describing the female flowers he says: –

> By turning to the male flowers (Fig. 2) we see a much greater number of bracts or small leaves scattered through the panicle, and find the pedicels longer than in the female; and this shows a much slighter effort – a less expenditure of force – to be required in forming male than female flowers. A male flower, as we see clearly here, is an intermediate stage between a perfect leaf and a perfect, or we may say, a female flower. It > seems as if there might be as much truth as poetry in the expression of Burns, –

>
> Her 'prentice han' she tried on man,
> An' then she made the lasses, O,
>
> — at least in so far as the flowers are concerned, and in the sense of a higher effort of vital power.[12]

It is singular, but suggestive that he should have quoted the lines from Burns in this connection, as they are an undoubted echo of the androcentric world view, a mere variation upon the Biblical myth of the rib. Of course he could find nothing on his side in the classic literature of the world, but wishing to embellish the idea in a popular work, he tried to make these somewhat ambiguous lines do duty in this capacity. The fact cited is only one of thousands that stand out clearly before the botanist, but not according with the accepted view of the relations of the sexes they are brushed aside as worthless anomalies and "exceptions that prove the rule." In fact in all branches of biology the progress of truth has been greatly impeded by this spirit.

All modern anatomists know how the facts that are now regarded as demonstrating the horizontal position of the ancestors of man, and in general those that establish the doctrine of evolution, were treated by the older students of the human body – rejected, ignored, and disliked, as intruders that interfered with their investigations. It is exactly so now with gynæcocentric facts, and we are probably in about the same position and stage with reference to the questions of sex as were the men of the eighteenth century with reference to the question of evolution. Indeed, the androcentric theory may be profitably compared with the geocentric theory, and the gynæcocentric with the heliocentric. The advancement of truth has always been in the direction of supplanting the superficial and apparent by the fundamental and real, and the gynæcocentric truth may be classed among the "paradoxes of nature."[13]

References:

[1] Lester Frank Ward on Wikipedia
[2] Pure sociology; a treatise on the origin and spontaneous development of society (1903)
[3] 'Our better Halves,' The Forum, New York, Vol. VI, November, 1888, pp. 266-275.
[4] "Woman's Place in Nature," by Grant Allen, the Forum, Vol. VII, May, 1889, pp. 258-263.
[5] "Genius and Woman's Intuition," the Forum, Vol. IX, June, 1890, pp. 401-408.
[6] "The Course of Biologic Evolution," Proc. Biol. Soc., Washington, Vol. V, pp. 23-55. See pp. 49-52.
[7] "Tableau Historique des Progrès de I'Esprit Humain," Paris, 1900, pp. 444-445.
[8] "Philosophie Positive," Vol. IV, Paris, 1839, pp. 405, 406.
[9] "Système de Politique Positive," Vol. I, 1851, p. 210.
[10] Op. cit., Vol. IV, 1854, p. 63.
[11] "Die Sociologische Erkenntnis," von Gustav Ratzenhofer, Leipzig, 1898, p. 127.
[12] "The Native Flowers and Ferns of the United States," by Thomas Meehan, Vol. I, Boston, 1878, p. 47.
[13] "Dynamic Sociology," Vol. I, pp. 47-53.

Author's note: Part 2 of this article to follow

Misandry and Emptiness: Masculine Identity in a Toxic Cultural Environment

Paul Nathanson & Katherine K. Young · 22 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this is a long essay, much longer than we normally publish as a single article. We think it's worth your time, so sit down, relax, and read. –Ed

Masculine identity has become increasingly problematic due to technological and cultural changes over the past ten thousand years, beginning with the horticultural and agricultural revolutions but gaining momentum with the industrial, military and reproductive revolutions. Egalitarian feminists have unwittingly exacerbated the problem by equating sexual equality with sexual sameness, leaving men unable to make even one contribution to society, as men, which is distinctive, necessary and can therefore be publicly valued—that is, unable to establish a healthy collective identity specifically as men. The result of this emptiness is a growing tendency to give up either by dropping out of school and or by committing suicide. Ideological feminists have thrown down the gauntlet, on the other hand, by ascribing to men a highly negative collective identity. The result of this misandry is an increasing number of men who believe that even a negative collective identity is better than no collective identity at all. No solution will be possible without challenging pervasive assumptions about both boys and men.

The academic world is changing, albeit at a glacial pace, when it comes to the study of boys and men. The assumption of feminist academics since the 1980s has been that all received knowledge—that is, earlier research by male scholars—was actually about men, not women. Therefore, it made sense to focus attention instead on the latter. Those who have done so, with the aid not only of huge investments by both private and public funding agencies but also the establishment of new university departments and academic societies, have achieved a great deal. We have much more information on women than ever before. Interpreting that information is another matter, especially in a heavily politicized context, one that seldom acknowledges a clear distinction between women's studies and feminist activism. Moreover, the resulting theories about women almost invariably result in theories about men. Scholars must continue to examine all research for political and ideological biases, at any rate, because they cannot claim that any field is immune to empirical verification or at least to reasoned scrutiny without turning scholarship into the equivalent of orthodoxy or ideology—about which more in due course.

In any case, the initial premise about earlier research (that it was all about men) is inaccurate. It was often de facto about men, to be sure, but seldom de jure about men. In some cases, this was due to the fact that anthropologists had greater access to male subjects than to female ones. In still other cases, it was due to the fact that historians found more written records by men than by women. In still other cases, though, it was due to the noble but naïve assumption that men and women were very similar in most ways; this meant that it was unnecessary to dwell on the differences. The point here is that not much of this pre-feminist scholarship was the result of any specific interest in men, let alone bias in favor of them. And much of the scholarship that was specifically about men was actually about elite men, "alpha males," not ordinary men. In short, we still need research on men. We need it now [more] than ever before, in fact, because of the fallout from research that, despite continuing respectability in academic circles, is profoundly biased against boys and men.

This brings up an additional problem on the academic scene. Not all of this bias comes directly from women. Some of it comes indirectly from women. That is, it comes from male feminists (of a branch that we will discuss in a moment). Adopting the feminist notion of "engaged scholarship," they established the field of "men's studies" at least partly in the hope of changing (other) men by converting them to feminism instead of merely studying them. And one problem with this approach, among many others, is that it requires scholars to see men through the eyes of women, just as earlier scholars, ironically, had seen women through the eyes of men. This is the immediate reason for efforts to establish a parallel, or new, men's studies or male studies. Although the new male studies must foster modern academic standards, not postmodern political ones, it need not rely on the straw man of perfect objectivity (which, as everyone has always known, finite beings can never attain). The new male studies can rely on historically or scientifically verifiable evidence, in other words, but still take boys and men seriously on their own terms. Otherwise, the subjects become nothing more than tokens of some political theory that “we” know but “they” do not. The model here would be what phenomenologists and cultural anthropologists once called epoché: trying sincerely and systematically to bracket out either personal attitudes toward the subjects or cultural assumptions about them and cultivating at least preliminary empathy for them.

Our purpose in this essay, though, is to discuss only a few closely related problems, out of many, that American boys and men face at the moment. We have selected these problems partly because of their centrality in the research that we have done over the past twenty-five years but also because of their marginality in the research that others have been doing. Many or possibly most academics in traditional men’s studies work in the social sciences, at any rate, whereas we work in the humanities and arts. We see these problems primarily as cultural ones, albeit ones that entail both emotional and social problems.

With all this in mind, we will discuss masculinity in connection with (1) identity and (2) feminism.

IDENTITY

We began our research on men with the following hypothesis, which we invite social scientists to verify or falsify on empirical grounds: that no person or group can have a healthy identity without being able to make at least one contribution to the larger society, one that is distinctive, necessary and publicly valued. The underlying problem that men face in our time, especially young men, is how to create a healthy collective identity specifically as men—that is, a healthy form of masculine identity. This raises at least one obvious question: Why not be satisfied merely with a healthy personal identity? We can think of several reasons. First, the obvious and undeniable fact is that humans are social beings. We require families, friends, allies and communities or nations. Although we are always different in some ways from other people, we are always like them in other ways. This means that we can always identify ourselves at least to some extent with them. How else could anyone expect support when in need or peril? There is no such thing as a personal identity, either healthy or unhealthy, without the larger context of a collective identity.

Second, personal identity for men can now emerge only at the expense of collective identity. Any man can feel good about himself as an individual even now, after all, by adopting one of two strategies that prevent him from feeling good about himself as a man. The first requires dissociation from other men as a male feminist and thus becoming an honorary woman. This amounts to self-hatred, a phenomenon with which Jews and other minority groups have long been familiar. And self-hatred is surely, by definition, profoundly neurotic. Worse, this strategy has a specifically moral consequence: abandoning or even targeting men who, misandry and emptiness notwithstanding, still feel a compelling need for some positive identification with their male bodies. The other strategy, as anyone who watches the news knows by now, requires dissociation from society and thus becoming an antisocial threat to it. We will return to that strategy.

Third, the fact that women have created a healthy collective identity for themselves—and also, directly or indirectly and intentionally or unintentionally, an unhealthy one for men—means that men must choose between accepting what women think about manhood and thinking for themselves about manhood. In other words, they must establish a collective identity. But this presents a big problem. The legitimate sources of collective identity for women have expanded immeasurably over the past few decades.

We refer not merely to new career possibilities but also to the more subtle and more general sense that all things are possible for women (or even, in some cases, that women are innately superior to men). During the same decades, however, the legitimate sources of collective identity for men have contracted or even disappeared.

FEMINISM

Feminism has emerged over the past few years. Masculine identity, on the other hand, has been a problem for the past few thousand years. Nonetheless, feminism has exacerbated that problem. Feminism can be defined in many ways. Some feminists focus their attention on the relation between gender and class, others on the relation between gender and sex, gender and religion, and so forth. This is one reason, among several, why feminists insist on their diversity, inclusiveness or multivocality.[1] From the specific perspective of men, however, there are only two kinds of feminism. They differ according to what each says about men and therefore what effects each has on men. In this section, we discuss (a) misandry, the intentional result of ideological feminism (which has exacerbated the problem by assigning men a profoundly negative identity) and (b) emptiness, the unintentional result of egalitarian feminism (which has exacerbated the problem inadvertently by denying men any positive identity).

MISANDRY

By now, the word "misandry" is in common use. It was not so in the early 1990s, when we began our research on misandry (although the word "misogyny," of course, had long been in common use). Misandry is hatred toward men. We refer here not to anger but to hatred. Anger is an emotion and transient; hatred is neither. Hatred is a culturally propagated way of thinking. Although hatred entails psychological and other problems, it is truly a cultural problem and therefore a moral problem as well.

Many people now acknowledge that misandry is a characteristic feature of popular culture in our time.[2] But not all of these people, let alone those who refuse to acknowledge the existence of misandry, agree on where this phenomenon originated or whether it has any significance. Is the prevalence of misandry due to commercial opportunism, which, in the contexts of both entertainment and advertising, relies heavily on both positive and negative stereotypes? Or is it due to political correctness, which prohibits the negative stereotypes of some groups, but not others?

Either way, some people—both men and women, though for different reasons—openly condone the misandric status quo. Women have no power, they claim, and therefore require protection from misogynistic stereotypes. Men have such godlike power, on the other hand, that even the most hostile stereotypes cannot actually harm them; these stereotypes are inconsequential, they say, and therefore (from one point of view) insignificant. At the very least, we suggest, public disapproval of misogyny but not of misandry reveals a deeply embedded double standard and therefore corrodes the very notion of equality, a fundamental feature of democracy.

But, we argue, misandry is due primarily to something much more sinister and much more destructive than even a double standard, whether in the context of commerce or etiquette. Underlying the attitude of those who condone misandry—they often hide behind the anonymity that pseudonyms confer on bloggers—is a perverted notion of justice, which makes it synonymous with revenge. Men have used misogynistic stereotypes to serve the economic and political interests of men, according to many people (once again, both men and women, though for different reasons), so that women may now use misandric ones to serve their own economic and political interests.

Obviously, this conclusion cannot rely on the Judeo-Christian "Golden Rule" (expressed either as "do not treat others as you would not have them treat you" or as "treat others as you would have them treat you"). But this moral principle, which underlies the prophetic worldview, did not go unchallenged even in late biblical times. Opposing it directly or indirectly was a very different worldview, one that encouraged a reinterpretation of scripture. This worldview emerged as a religion in ancient Persia but eventually spread, without the particular theological superstructure of Zoroastrianism, throughout the Mediterranean world. This requires us to pause here for an explanation.

In 597 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar II conquered the Jewish Kingdom of Judah and later deported much of the population to his capital city of Babylon.[3] The captives considered this exile an unprecedented calamity, because it seemed to refute their belief in God's providence and even their belief in God's existence. In other words, traditional explanations for innocent suffering were no longer convincing. Persia soon conquered Babylon and allowed the return of these captives to Jerusalem. By that time, however, they had begun to absorb some features of the Persian worldview. As monotheists, to be sure, most Jews rejected the Zoroastrian religion as such: two competing gods, one good and the other evil. Nonetheless, some Jews found in its underlying premise a satisfying explanation for innocent suffering: two competing but vaguely defined cosmic principles, one good and the other evil. God was inherently and eternally good, Jews continued to believe, and could therefore not be the source of evil. But neither, they believed, could any other god be the source of evil. One solution was a quasi-divine figure: an angel who, by rebelling against God, introduced evil and continued to foster evil among "his" followers. And Jews were by no means the only ones to find this metaphysical premise useful. By the Hellenistic period, what we now call “dualism” had become a generalized mentality. In other words, it had become part of many competing religious traditions and philosophical systems. St. Augustine found it not only among contemporary Christians, for instance, but also among the Manicheans, a group that he had joined before turning to Christianity.

Of importance here is that from this metaphysical premise, moral and political ones followed. These amounted, collectively, to a titanic and enduring struggle between those who were faithful to God (“us”) and those who were not (“them”), a struggle that would end only at the end of history with the final victory of God and his faithful followers over their enemies—which is to say, any or all outsiders. This dualistic mentality co-existed uneasily with other biblical ones.[4] Not surprisingly, both Jews and Christians have sometimes ignored the Golden Rule and its corollaries—love your neighbor as yourself or even, among Christians, love your enemies—and identified specific groups of people not merely with theological ignorance or competing political interests but with an ontological evil that matched the metaphysical evil of their gods.

Of even greater importance here, though, is the fact that this dualistic mentality, like other religious phenomena, has taken secular forms in political ideologies on both the right and the left. These ideologies, like some earlier religious ones, have not one but several characteristic features (most of which, though not necessarily all of which, they have in common).[5] In addition to dualism (believing that “they” are inherently evil) are the following closely linked characteristic features of ideology: essentialism (believing that “we” are inherently good); hierarchy (that “we” are inherently superior to “them”); collectivism (that the politically defined group is more important than either the individual or the larger society); utopianism (that a new and better world order will supersede the current one); selective cynicism (that the intentions of all people, except our own, are sinister); revolutionism (that merely tinkering with reforms of the current world order, instead of replacing it with a radically different one, will not do the trick); consequentialism (that the end, no matter how unpalatable in ordinary circumstances, can justify the means); and quasi-religiosity (that the political worldview, like older religious ones, confers ultimate meaning, purpose, community, identity and so forth).

Ideological feminists are not in the majority, but they are also not all on the lunatic fringe. On the contrary, they produce exceedingly sophisticated theories (such as the conspiracy theory of history)[6] and adopt equally sophisticated strategies (such as working within the established law schools and government bureaucracies instead of rioting in the streets, to achieve a social revolution that most people still find hard even to imagine). They develop these theories at respectable universities, moreover, and disseminate them through respectable publishers.[7] Eventually, these theories enter the popular culture of movies, sit-coms and talk shows. What was once truly radical, in other words, becomes conventional wisdom (until ideologues up the ante once more). In short, ideological feminists are at least as influential as egalitarian feminists in the journalistic, the academic and especially the legal circles that produce policies and laws. Although they often use the egalitarian rhetoric that is de rigueur in a liberal democracy—one that permits only gender-neutral language, for instance, in legislation—closer examination of both their statements and the results of their campaigns reveals a worldview that is anything but egalitarian and often relies on double standards.[8]

For ideological feminists, men are not merely deluded. They are the ultimate, eternal or even ontological enemies of women. Either they or their remote ancestors (or both) are responsible for all suffering and injustice. Most ideological feminists do acknowledge exceptions for men who convert to the new worldview, but these male feminists function as honorary women. They are acceptable not because of their maleness but despite it.

Some ideological feminists, moreover, refer to history in overtly theological—that is, to use the more precise word that these feminists prefer, “thealogical”—terms. From this point of view, primeval men instigated a titanic conspiracy not merely to usurp power from women but also to replace the female principle of a great goddess with the male principle of their own gods. Either way, men have oppressed women ever after and will do so until the advent of a feminist utopia. It does not take much imagination to see this ideological story as an upside-down version of earlier Western stories about human origin and destiny. The biblical story blames Adam and Eve equally for sin (what Christians eventually called Original Sin). Some post-biblical interpretations, however, assign most of the blame to Eve and her female descendants. The new, ideological version simply reverses that post-biblical interpretation by blaming primeval men and their male descendants.[9]

This conspiracy theory of history, we argue, is the ultimate premise of ideological feminism, though usually in secular form, and thus of misandry. Dualism itself originated long before feminism of any kind and long ago became deeply rooted in Western thought, to be sure, but ideological feminists have exploited it in modern times. The point here—the point that we make throughout our series on misandry—is that misandry must not remain some dirty little secret. It is pervasive, even prevalent, not only at the seemingly innocuous level of popular culture (in entertainment, say, and advertising) but also at the institutional level of elite culture (in research, teaching, legal codes and law enforcement). And it relies firmly on feminist ideology.

Misandry originates as a cultural problem, to be sure, and therefore entails moral problems. In addition, though, it entails emotional and other problems. Though not social scientists, we find it very hard to imagine how any boy can become a healthy young man in such a contaminated cultural environment, just as we find it hard to imagine the analogy for young girls, blacks, gays or those who belong to any other target group.

It would be folly, therefore, to ignore feminist ideology, let alone misandry itself, in the interest of political expediency. And yet, the problems that boys and men currently face did not begin with the emergence of misandry, let alone the rise of feminism. This brings us to another major problem.

EMPTINESS

We make a clear distinction between ideological feminism and egalitarian feminism.[10] Unlike ideological feminists, egalitarian feminists have no general theory about the ultimate origin of conflict between men and women. From their point of view, only one thing matters: Women have found it harder than men to enter public life—that is, to build careers outside the home. Some attribute this problem to the greed or ignorance or prejudice of men. Others attribute it to the fact that motherhood places special demands on women. Still others attribute the problem to both factors. All, however, believe that sexual equality is the solution (although some define that as equality of opportunity and others as equality of result,[11] each of which entails specific legal consequences).[12] From the perspective of men, however, this approach is somewhat naïve. Equality is a noble ideal, to be sure, but egalitarian feminists have tended to overlook its unintended consequences for men (and therefore, indirectly, for women as well).

Our point here is that these unintended consequences are about to complete a disturbing process that began not a few years ago but a few thousand years ago. Human history is the history of successive cultural revolutions, most of which have been technological and all of which have led to the gradual obsolescence of men and by now left men without a distinctive and necessary function as men, without the possibility of being publicly valued as men and therefore without the basis for any healthy identity specifically as men. Here, now, is a summary of our "revolutionary" theory.[13] It took one or two million years for primates to become humans. As Luigi Zoja[14] says, this involved several developments. Humans used their hands to carry things, for instance, not to walk. They could have sex at any time, moreover, not merely during "estrus."

And their brains expanded not only in complexity but also in size. This meant that birth had to occur while human newborns were still smaller—and therefore less developed—than those of other primate species. And this, in turn, meant that human infants needed parental care for much longer than other primate infants did—a project that required the cooperation of fathers and was the context in which "pair bonding" evolved. All of these developments are natural, which means that they involve genetic factors, but some are cultural as well. Pair bonding,[15] for instance, relies heavily on cultural support systems such as the social arrangements that reward men for being active and enduring participants in family life.

Early humans lived in wandering bands that probably relied at first on scavenging. During the long Paleolithic period, they continued to live in wandering bands but relied increasingly on hunting and gathering. We have no reason to believe that these early communities oppressed either women or men. People did whatever they had to do in the interest of communal survival. Features of both the female body and the male body made it advantageous to assign at least a few tasks either to women or to men. Whatever else they did, for instance, women perpetuated the community by giving birth to infants and nursing them. Whatever else they did, men protected the community from predators and usually provided it with food and other products from big animals. Both women and men faced mortal danger. Women often died in childbirth, and men often died from wounds. The point here is that maleness—innate features of the male body—conferred a healthy collective identity on men just as femaleness did on women. In other words, maleness was the foundation for various forms of masculinity that, by serving communities, commanded public respect.

The problem, for men, began not in the very remote past but in the relatively recent past. We refer to the Neolithic Revolution. Approximately twelve thousand years ago, humans began to rely at least partly on gardening (or, in some cases, on pastoralism). This required them to live in settled communities that provided fertile land and access to water. For the first time, it became practical to store food and other resources. Also for the first time, though, it became desirable to raid the stored food and resources of other communities. This state of affairs sometimes led to the emergence of militaristic societies and therefore to military leaders or chiefs, who accumulated excessive property and power. Closely following the Neolithic Revolution was the Agricultural Revolution, which introduced the iron plough and irrigation. Among the results were much more food and much higher populations. It was in this context that the early civilizations emerged. Characteristic of these were urbanization, occupational specialization, social and political hierarchies, often literacy and eventually "world religions." These religions, apart from anything else, created moral and philosophical principles to curb the rampant injustices perpetrated by early chiefs and kings.

At this point, the male body's distinctive characteristics—its size, strength and speed[16]—still conferred masculine identity on most men: elite warriors (who wielded weapons) and the masses of serfs or peasants (who used iron ploughs to till their fields). But an ever-increasing number of men—artisans, scribes, priests, merchants, traders, bakers, administrators and so on—no longer relied for their identity on their naturally endowed male bodies. They relied instead on culturally established attributes, such as literacy, that society ascribed more-or-less arbitrarily to men but not women.

Fast-forward now to the late eighteenth century. Most men by far were still peasants. A few, either aristocrats or those who worked for them, were soldiers. Men of both classes, therefore, still required brute strength. The Industrial Revolution, however, changed all that by greatly increasing the number of middle-class men—which is to say, those men who did not need brute strength for tilling fields or wielding weapons. A few of these men were entrepreneurs (the industrialists who established mills and mines) or financiers. Others acquired enough education to enter the formerly elite ranks of professional lawyers and physicians. Still others—most men, by far—became proletarians. They worked along with women and even children at the new mills and mines, until reform movements demanded protection for women and children (which meant keeping them at home). Men with the lowest status were those who relied on their muscles; men with the highest status, on the other hand, were precisely those who did not.

The Military Revolution marked another profound change in the history of men. In one sense, this was just another technological development. Military hardware became increasingly complex. At the same time, it became decreasingly reliant on brute strength. Instead, it became increasingly reliant on literacy and eventually on higher education. This trend became clear to everyone during World War I. Those who planned and organized campaigns had the highest status; those who followed their orders in the trenches had the lowest status, that of "cannon fodder." But the Military Revolution refers primarily not to technological change but to cultural change. Historians usually discuss this as an offshoot of the French Revolution, but its impact spread far beyond the French Republic or even the West. We refer here to "universal" military conscription. Every citizen was now a soldier (or potential soldier) by virtue of merely being a citizen.

This calls for an explanation.

According to the new social contract, military service was now the price of citizenship. Being “willing” to fight and possibly die for the State was the hallmark of every citizen. Because the State protected women from military service, however, it refrained from granting them full citizenship. Being a full citizen (“willing” to fight and possibly die for the State) was therefore simultaneously the hallmark of being a man (as distinct from being a woman). Citizens demonstrated their masculinity primarily and ultimately in battle (or scenarios in everyday life that became metaphorical battles), and the State appropriated the bodies of citizens by virtue of their maleness alone (because the law made no distinction between men who wanted to risk their lives in battle and those who did not). Even though conscription laws confer masculine identity on those who have male bodies, thus reaffirming the ancient link between maleness and masculinity, it does so at a very high cost to men (and to any society that encourages men to believe that their ultimate value is as fighters). For one thing, conscripts have very low status within armies. Moreover, they often end up dead or mutilated on battlefields.

Women in some countries are now demanding the abrogation of this social contract by allowing (though not forcing) women into combat. However, after more than two hundred years and many social changes, men find it hard to establish a collective identity that relies on something else. Women can already provide for themselves and protect themselves (with help from the State, in both cases, if necessary).

The Reproductive Revolution has undermined the only remaining source of masculine identity for men: fatherhood. Many factors have contributed to this problem: new movements that trivialize fatherhood (single mothers by choice, for instance, and same-sex marriage); new movements that demonize fathers (ideological forms of feminism); new industries that reduce fatherhood to routine medical procedures (sperm banks and surrogacy); new technologies that would eliminate fatherhood or even maleness (avant-garde procedures such as cloning or parthenogenesis); new legislation that undermines even the remnants of fatherhood (joint custody, say, or abortion on demand as a private matter “between a woman and her doctor”)—and so on. Many social scientists now believe that fatherhood has no inherent links with either masculinity or maleness. Others believe that fatherhood has no distinctive or necessary function within family life. The implication is that fathers are assistant mothers at best and potential molesters at worst. Is it any wonder, then, that popular entertainment routinely presents fathers as buffoons or worse?

Back now to egalitarian feminism and the inability of men to establish a healthy form of identity, as men, in our time—that is, to the emptiness that men experience as a result. Herein is a great irony. When it comes to the historic (though culturally variable) relation between maleness and masculinity, it is egalitarian feminism, not ideological feminism, that undermines the most direct link between early and modern men. Even if we were to eliminate the toxic misandry of ideological feminism, we would still be left with the paralyzing emptiness that comes (to men) from egalitarian feminists. Even journalists sometimes recognize what academics fail to see. In his review of Warrior, A.O. Scott discusses why boys and young men in some environments turn to extreme versions of masculinity, ones that focus on whatever remains of certain traditional symbols of masculinity—notably those that refer to combat. “They fight, he says, “because every other way of being a man has been compromised, undermined or taken away. Patriarchal authority, as represented by Paddy, is cruel and unbending until it turns sentimental and pathetic. The roads to an honorable life promised by work and military service are mined and muddied by the greed and mendacity of the institutions—government, schools, banks—that are supposed to uphold integrity.”[17]

We use the word “emptiness” for lack of a better word. In a way, after all, the problem for men has been human history itself, a process that has gradually deprived men of any legitimate sense of fulfillment specifically as male humans. But “human history” fails to convey the experience of that lack in daily life. The word “emptiness” conveys precisely that. Emptiness is the residue of a life without identity and therefore without meaning or purpose—or without meaning and purpose and therefore without identity.

To some extent, of course, modernity leaves almost everyone spiritually empty and therefore without a healthy identity. Despite its many advantages, after all, modernity often involves a profound rupture with tradition and meaning, with community and home, and especially with the sacred. This is precisely the void that political ideologies on both the left and the right have tried (with catastrophic results) to fill since the late nineteenth century. They have allowed people who lose one source of collective identity to replace it with another. Instead of establishing it in connection with family or religion, say, they do so in connection with class, race, language or sex. But because these ideologies rely so heavily on dualism, pitting "us" against "them," the price is very high. They solve one problem by creating another. Or, to put it in a slightly different way, they solve problems for some people by creating problems for other people.

At the moment, this applies to women and men.

CONCLUSION

Boys and young men now have, at least in theory, only two general ways of responding to the emptiness of their lives. Very few are intellectually and emotionally able to confront emptiness directly, of course, so many do so indirectly by (1) trying to ignore the misandry that underlies and exacerbates emptiness or (2) internalizing it. Some try deliberately to ignore misandry along with all other potential sources of pain by resorting to unbridled hedonism and therefore succumbing to raw narcissism. But hiding from pain by seeking personal pleasure as an end in itself has become characteristic of our society in general—not only in the licentious fantasies of popular entertainment but also in the sordid facts of daily life—and therefore says little about any segment of society in particular.

Others, however, unwittingly internalize misandry. And this is something that very few social scientists, if any, have acknowledged so far. The one social problem that they inexplicably fail to see should be self-evident to everyone: the toxic fallout—the pervasive ridicule, contempt, punitive attitude and even hatred—of a society that has no room for its male population per se. One way of internalizing all this misandry is clearly destructive (but also, ultimately, self-destructive). In this category are those who act up, attacking a hostile society. Even a negative identity, after all, might be better than no identity at all. The other way of internalizing misandry is clearly self-destructive (but also destructive in other ways). In this category are those who give up, succumbing to the apparent emptiness of manhood and thus abandoning an indifferent society. This almost certainly provides at least a partial explanation for the high rates among male people of both dropping out of school and committing suicide. Sociologists and psychologists have long noted these pathological patterns in young men—Michael Kimmel, for instance, has popularized the idea that American "guys" are pathological almost by definition[18]—but have generally refrained from attributing them to the direct or indirect fallout from feminism and the resulting collapse of masculine identity. By that, once again, we mean the impossibility of establishing a healthy collective identity specifically as men, one that relies on a healthy notion of masculinity.

In short, for whatever reason, social scientists tend to ignore the proverbial elephant standing silently in its corner. Instead, they usually attribute pathological patterns to more familiar (and somewhat less politically risky) causes such as poverty, racism, testosterone, evolution, popular culture and the like. Some social scientists have indeed linked the social and psychological pathologies of these boys and young men with father absence, for instance, but few if any have followed the logic of this insight by linking father absence in turn with identity absence—that is, with emptiness.

Kimmel describes masculinity in our time as "guyland." Whatever else critics say about Kimmel's feminist theory—and we say a great deal about it[19]—no one can deny that he has described a noteworthy phenomenon. It amounts to notion of manhood that repudiates not only the innocence of boyhood but also the maturity of manhood, which is both cross-culturally and historically unprecedented. Kimmel argues that being a "guy" originates in the unearned sense of "entitlement" to masculine privilege (and hostility toward women for denying it). We argue that it originates in the natural sense of entitlement to a healthy masculine identity of any kind. It is easy to argue about the prevalence of "guys" or even about precisely what makes them tick, but it is surely not by chance that the appearance of this psychological twilight zone has coincided with two profoundly significant facts of life for boys and men in our time: the rise of feminism (which either unwittingly denies the possibility of a distinctive masculine identity or deliberately acknowledges only a sinister one) and the absence of anything even remotely like coming of age. Fewer and fewer boys want to become men because fewer and fewer men can convince them that doing so would mean demonstrating their ability to contribute something distinctive and necessary to society. No one has yet come up with a solution to the problem of toxic masculinity in a toxic cultural environment, but no one ever will without first identifying it correctly.

Notes

1 Another reason is to maintain their own legitimacy as liberal feminists despite the "radical" approaches of a few other feminists. From this point of view, tolerance means never having to say that you are "sorry" for (much less to challenge) those who say ugly things in your name.

2 In Spreading Misandry: The Teaching of Contempt for Men in Popular Culture (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2001), the first of five volumes on misandry, we discuss the negative portrayals of men in popular culture during the 1980s and 1990s. By "popular culture," we refer to a wide range of media: movies, sit-coms, talk shows, news shows, magazines and so on. The negative imagery of men ranges in severity from ridicule to dehumanization and even demonization. To summarize our findings: The men these productions portray negatively are either inadequate, evil or both; the few men these productions portray positively are honorary women—either feminists or minority men. Gay men, in particular, often get free passes in gender politics. Our point is not so much that these negative stereotypes harm boys and men (although they do), but that they are symptoms of a much deeper cultural problem (which we explore in later volumes).

3 Judah was the southern Jewish kingdom. Assyria had already conquered the northern kingdom, Israel, in 722. Its population, deported and assimilated, became the "ten lost tribes."

4 Those who turned to dualism identified evil not only with enemy communities, whose evil took on eschatological proportions, but also with closely linked cosmic principles. Just as they polarized "us" and "them," for instance, they polarized "spirit" and "flesh" (a metaphysical distinction and conflict that was particularly important to Christians such as St. Paul). Some theologians identified the former, in turn, with maleness and the latter with femaleness. To do that, they had to reinterpret non-dualistic texts accordingly.

5 Nathanson and Young, Spreading Misandry, 199-218.

6 See note 9.

7 Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Legalizing Misandry: From Public Shame to Systemic Discrimination against Men (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2006) 269-308. This volume, the second of five on misandry, is about the institutionalization of ideological feminism by legislators, lawyers, judges, bureaucrats and the like, all of whom rely, in turn, on the institutionalization of ideological feminism by academics who produce and interpret statistics. We begin this volume by continuing the discussion of popular culture in Spreading Misandry, but with our focus on journalism instead of entertainment. To be more precise, we focus on the journalistic feeding frenzies that so often accompany high-profile legal or quasilegal cases about conflicts between men and women and lead to legislative change. Examples include the Senate confirmation hearing for Clarence Thomas (which provoked a "national dialogue" on sexual harassment) and the avalanche of court battles over "recovered memories" of sexual molestation or even "satanic ritual abuse" (which provoked the modern equivalents of witch hunts). Most of the volume is directly about legislative change due to the influence of ideological feminism in connection with every point of contact between men and women. Neither the laws that govern these contacts (such as conflicts over sexual harassment, divorce, custody, affirmative action) nor the rules that govern their interpretation, implementation and enforcement rely any longer on philosophical notions such as equality of opportunity and legal principles such as the presumption of innocence.

8 For one example, see Nathanson and Young, Legalizing Misandry, 471-477.

9 See Katherine K. Young and Paul Nathanson, Sanctifying Misandry: Goddess Ideology and the Fall of Man (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2010). This volume, the third of five on misandry, is about the ways in which feminist ideologues have used religion to bolster their claim to female superiority and simultaneously support their conspiracy theory of history, that evil originated in an ancient revolution during which men overturned an egalitarian society, established patriarchy, and began the oppression of women. More specifically, it is about various attempts to reverse a familiar paradigm of profound importance. According to the Bible, Adam and Eve live in paradise under the aegis of God; Adam and Eve succumb to sin, which leads God to expel them from paradise and into the world of chaos and conflict as we know these in everyday life; the remote descendants of Adam and Eve return to paradise of one kind or another at the end of history. The new version is slightly different: men and women live in paradise under the aegis of a Goddess; men succumb to sin by installing their gods, which leads to the creation of patriarchy; women return to paradise, possibly with some male converts to feminism, at the end of patriarchy. But feminist extremists and separatists are not the only supporters of this revised myth. It has deeply influenced even some liberal forms of Christianity and Judaism.

10 People classify forms of feminism in many ways according to need. From the specific perspective of men, only these two forms are significant.

11 For political reasons, some people refer to equality of result as “substantive equality” and to equality of opportunity as (mere) “formal equality.”

12 Equality of opportunity entails, among other things, universal access to higher education. Equality of result entails, among other things, affirmative action in order to ensure the equal representation of all groups in universities (although advocates seldom build in mechanisms that would ensure the end of affirmative action once they have reached their goal, which is why they do not promote affirmative action for men despite the majority of women in universities).

13 For a detailed discussion of these revolutions, see Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Replacing Misandry: From Primeval Man to Postmodern Man (forthcoming). This is the fourth of five volumes on misandry. The fifth and final volume is Transcending Misandry: From Ideological Feminism to Intersexual Dialogue (forthcoming). There, we move beyond misandry per se. Our focus is on the present and future, therefore, more than the past. The word “dialogue” usually refers to a way of discussing conflicts and resolving them in connection with common ideals—justice, say, or compassion—instead of resorting to intimidation or violence. Among the most familiar forms of dialogue has been interreligious dialogue. This originated in the 1960s as an offshoot of ecumenism, the Christian movement that sought greater understanding among the churches (and sometimes institutional union). It did not take long for many people to realize that interreligious dialogue could include not only Christian denominations but also non-Christian communities. Under Pope John XXIII and his successors, for instance, Catholics sought not to convert Jews and other non-Catholics but to foster forgiveness and reconciliation. Religious communities responded to this idea in many ways. Some feared it on historical grounds as a disguise for proselytism and ignored it. Others welcomed it on practical grounds in the interest of combining forces to solve social problems such as poverty, political problems such as tyranny, or even religious problems such as the rise of secularism. Still others welcomed it on intellectual grounds to the extent that they could reaffirm their own distinctive identities by learning about those of other communities. Nowadays, “dialogue” refers to a possibility for any groups in conflict: religious, racial, ethnic, linguistic—and sexual. But overuse and misuse has almost drained this word of meaning.

14 Luigi Zoja, The Father: Historical, Psychological and Cultural Perspectives, trans. Henry Martin (Philadelphia: Taylor and Francis, 2001), 29-45.

15 See David Schneider, “Primeval Kinship: How Pair Bonding Gave Birth to Human Society,” Evolutionary Psychology 6.4 (2008): 557-562.

16 Most men are slightly bigger, stronger and faster than most women are. Although sexual dimorphism (differences between the males and females within a species) is a feature of our species, its degree is very minor compared to those between the males and females of many other primate species. Scientists have found correlations between low degrees of sexual dimorphism and the participation of fathers in family life, and between high levels and the absence of fathers from family life.

17 A.O. Scott, “A Tale of Jacob, Esau and Muscles,” review of Warrior, New York Times, 8 November 2011, C-4.

18 Michael Kimmel, Guyland: The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men (New York: Harper, 2008).

19 See chapter 1 in Nathanson and Young, Transcending Misandry (forthcoming)

Editorial note: This item originally appeared in New Male Studies; An International Journal (NMS), an open access online interdisciplinary journal for research and discussion of issues facing boys and men worldwide, Volume 1, issue 1, and may be freely distributed under the GNU General Public License. An interview with the authors may be found here.

Can you just “man down”?

George St. Jones · 23 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

If you are a male and have ever admitted to feelings of inadequacy or anxiety there’s a good chance that your concerns were met with comments such as these:

“Just get out there and do it.”
“Get over it.”
“Just be you and start feeling confident.”
“Suck it up.”
“Deal with it.”
“You’re x age and still feeling this way? Come on man, it’s time to grow up.”

In short, “man up.”

This sentiment is pervasive in our culture (as well as many cultures around the world) and it is almost always aimed at males. Never mind that there isn’t anything about being male that guarantees power, confidence, reliability, or success; my interest here is in the usefulness of this cliche as advice, which is usually how it’s framed. To start, let’s look at the quotes above. The general idea being expressed is that the person is acting weak, needy or passive, and therefore they need to be stronger, more independent, more assertive, just like that. The assumption here is that their problems are trivial, that they shouldn’t need any help or support, and that their expression of anguish, frustration, pain, or fear means they’ve given up, submitted, surrendered, retreated.

Wait, what is it that they often say about assumptions?

When you tell someone to “man up,” what you are saying is “be less like you and more like me.” Okay hypothetical flawless life-guru, that means people can just choose to change in the opposite direction right? Now that we’ve established that, let me ask you a question:

Can you “man down?”

If you are, for example, extremely secure in yourself and confident around people you are highly attracted to could you choose to become anxious and insecure instead?

No?

So if you can’t “man down”, what makes you think someone can “man up”? Is it fair to expect that of them?

I think people often downplay, or just don’t consider that other people are who they are in the exact same way they themselves are who they are, but just with different outward results. The problem with the sentiment of “manning up” is that who we are is largely a result of our past experiences, and these experience s differ greatly between people. Take social anxiety for example. If you have good experiences with people throughout your childhood and adolescence you’ll be secure in your adequacy and likability. If however, you have had enough bad experiences with people to make you doubt your self worth, you’ll be completely insecure and anxious. It’s not as easy as “being confident” or “finding your balls.” To ask someone to just start succeeding is like asking them to grow a new arm. It’s not advice.

Next time someone advises you to “man up” as if it’s the easiest thing in the world to do, ask them if they could just “man down.” When they invariably say no, ask what the difference is. I’ve done this before and people usually get totally stumped because they’ve never thought of it like that before.

That all being said, this does not mean that people cannot change. A series of positive experiences and some practice can change a person affected negatively by their past. I know about this from personal experience. It isn’t easy to change but it can be done. I don’t mean this article to imply that not one person in one instance has ever been helped “manning up.” My point is that its usefulness as advice is much less than its pervasiveness in our culture suggests, and in reality what it does most often is just hurt people.

The cover image depicts the painting 'Anxiety' by Edvard Munch

ANZAC Day

Greg Canning · 24 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This is a republication of an article initially published in 2011 –Ed

ANZAC Day is Australia's national day of remembrance for those who made sacrifices, including the ultimate sacrifice of giving their lives for their country. ANZAC stands for the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. The men of that corps landed on the beaches of the Gallipoli Peninsula at dawn on 25 April 1915, as part of the ill-conceived and poorly executed allied plan to gain naval access to the Dardanelles and ultimately the Black Sea ports. Their determination and perseverance in the face of adversity and acts of heroism and self-sacrifice created a legendary reputation for ANZACs that subsequent generations of Australian soldiers have emulated.

Officially named and celebrated for the first time in 1916, ANZAC day has evolved to hold a special meaning for Australians, also remembering the sacrifices of our service men and women in subsequent conflicts. ANZAC Day has also attracted controversy over the years, and attendances at remembrance ceremonies declined in the aftermath of the Vietnam War, when some mistakenly believed it represented a glorification of war, rather an acknowledgement of self-sacrifice. Recent years however have seen a resurgence of interest and attendance at ANZAC day events, with particular enthusiasm shown by younger Australian's and school children.

ANZAC day has always held special meaning for my family. My father was 19 when the Second World War commenced, but unlike many of his contemporaries he did not immediately enlist. Whilst he rarely spoke of it, he was well aware of the futility of the WWI campaigns on foreign soil that saw the loss of 60,000 Australian men's lives for negligible strategic gains. However, as the second war evolved the Japanese advance through South East Asia and the Pacific posed a direct threat to the Australian soil, and by July of 1941 he considered it his duty to enlist in the defense of his homeland.

According to his discharge papers he served for 1694 days and was involved in the battles for Milne Bay, the Buna and Sanananda Beach Heads (on the northern coast of Papua New Guinea), Shaggy Ridge and mop up operations in New Britain. The arduous and degrading conditions and events of these campaigns are matters of well documented historical record and many books, including Peter Brune's 2003 classic, A Bastard of a Place.

Following the battle of Buna in late 1942 his battalion, the 2/9 Australian Infantry, was sent to reinforce the protracted stalemate that had developed at the largest and most strongly fortified Japanese beach head at Sanananda.

On 12 Dec 1942 Dad was wounded early in the day by a Japanese sniper, and lay on the battlefield till near dusk when an American Army Medic, from a flanking unit, dragged him under heavy fire to safety. We do not know who that brave American was, but my 2 brothers and 6 sisters owe him a great debt of gratitude, indeed our very existence. The alliances forged between US and Australian Soldiers in the Pacific Campaigns continue to this day on both strategic and personal levels.

So perhaps you are asking why I am writing about ANZAC day at this time? Well, when the whole O'Shaggesy/Radfem Hub thing blew up, and perhaps in a moment of poor judgment, I registered to receive notifications of new posts to the Radfem Hub site, and periodically my inbox is contaminated with their filth. Such was the case this Friday when I was alerted to the post titled "Lest we forget," penned by "Rainsinger." (By the way if Kyle or AO or anyone has info on the identity of "Rainsinger" please let me know as I would like to expose her to the Australian public prior to 25 April 2012.)

Rainsinger would like to reassign to ANZAC day what should, of course, all along have been its true meaning, but Australians were apparently too blinded by patriarchal oppression to see it. ANZAC day should really be about 'Women Against Rape in War,' because there is a "complete lack of human respect for women's systematic ritualized rapes/deaths." She laments that in 1984 "the women who marched way-back at the rear of the formal military parade, to just lay a wreath on the war memorial cenotaphs, in memory of our own war dead and injured," and carried a banner reading:

"IN MEMORY OF ALL WOMEN

IN ALL COUNTRIES

RAPED IN ALL WARS"

did not receive an overwhelmingly positive reaction from the gathered crowds!

Typical of feminist cognitive dissonance she then goes on, presumably in an attempt to justify her stance on the issue, to spend several long paragraphs describing various elements of Greek Mythology, Legends of the founding of Prague and Rome, and a 2009, the Czech film "The Pagan Queen"?

Nope, feminists don't require any verifiable historical facts to support their stance. Irrelevant myth and legend will do quite nicely. Eventually she returns to the topic, which is "mass rape/murder/sacrifice of females to the Greater Glory of Man" and how ANZAC day should really be a forum to mourn the female victims of war atrocities, somehow believing that women are denied the right to do this.

Nope women have never been denied the right to voice their opinions. It is just the tasteless, vulgar, contrived selfish ones, who would try to minimize the sacrifice of men like my Dad – and his comrades who did not return to have the chance of starting a family – in order to make ideological statements desecrating their memory, on their day. Yes ladies, these guys laid down their lives to protect your rights of free speech, but apparently don't deserve your respect for having done so.

I am hopeful that the alliances being forged here at AVFM, between the men and women of different nations, can see significant strategic gains made in our war against feminist supremacists and their goals of extinguishing masculinity and eradicating men.

A BASTARD OF A PLACE

Male Contraception: It's Cumming

Sam Allouba · 25 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

One of the greatest scientific accomplishments of all time is contraception. The ability to engage in sexual intercourse while dictating whether a child is conceived is truly a privilege that we should not take for granted.

Men and women both enjoy the options afforded by contraception. However, it is without question that men are seriously lacking when compared with women, for one reason or another. Before we explore why men's contraception is needed as much as women's, as well as current options and new research in that area, let's briefly examine the history behind birth control.

While the history is certainly a long one, the key dates are the following. In 3000 B.C.E., the first condom was invented in Egypt. Around 1500 B.C.E., the first spermicides were introduced, which used condoms made from linen cloth sheaths and soaked in a chemical solution and dried before using. In 1916, Margaret Sanger, a true heroine of the contraception movement, opened the first public birth control clinic in the United States. Even though she was jailed for 30 days for "maintaining a public nuisance," she kept her clinic and pushed forward. In 1950, when Sanger was in her 80s, she underwrote the necessary research to create the first human birth control. Ten years later, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration would approve Enovoid, the first oral contraceptive. In 1968, the U.S. Supreme Court approved intrauterine devices, better known as IUDs. In 1972, the U.S. Supreme Court legalized birth control for all its citizens, regardless of their marital status.

The 1990s and 2000s were tremendous decades for birth control as new methods were introduced. The first of these was Norplant, the first contraceptive implant; DepoProvera, which is an injectable method; FC1/Reality, which is a female condom; and Plan B, which is an emergency contraceptive product. Fast-forward to the millennium era and we have Mirena, which is a new levonorgestrel-releasing IUD put out in 2000; a hormonal patch called Ortho Evra in 2001; the vaginal ring called Nuvaring in 2001; Essure, which is a method of transcervical female sterilization, developed in 2002; Implanon in 2006, which is a single-rod implant; and finally FC2 in 2009, which is an improved female condom. Needless to say, abortion is also an important addition to the list.

The one glaring issue about all of this is that the methods listed above, with the exception of the condom, are exclusively female-only options. Women have been given priority in the continued research for more and better birth control options. Now, this is not a bad thing in and of itself. Being spoiled for choice when it comes to the ways you control unhappy accidents is a good thing, of course. At this time, women, according to Planned Parenthood, have 22 options for birth control. Again, this is a good thing.

But when it comes to men, we are seriously falling behind. Again, according to Planned Parenthood, men have a measly five options. They are abstinence, condoms, outercourse, vasectomy, and withdrawal. Of these five, only condoms are the truly viable option. Abstinence simply doesn't work, unless you're the most devout monk in all of Tibet. Outercourse is exactly what it sounds like. You might as well be not touching each other. Vasectomies are invasive forms of surgery and unfortunately are not always fully reversible. Withdrawal is about as effective as abstinence. Finally, we come to condoms (no pun intended), which are the most widely used male contraception and, realistically, the only option men have. Condoms have a failure rate of 18%, which isn't super high by any means, but it's definitely cause for concern, given what can happen if it does fail.

Why are men being denied their full reproductive rights? Men's rights are human rights. We are human beings, we can make mistakes, and the risks for us are just as great as they are for women. Now before someone screams that I'm being unfair, I will concede that the risks for men when it comes to pregnancy are of course not physical in nature, since men cannot become pregnant. Rather, the risks for men are financial. A man is not afforded the same option to opt out of parenthood like a woman can through abortion. If she wants to give up having the child, that decision ultimately lies with her. But if she wants to keep it, the man must stick around to pay child support even if he doesn't want to. It's a matter of parental rights in this case. There are also the egregious cases where a man has to pay child support, even if he isn't the biological father. Women, by law in the United States at least, can hold a man at metaphorical gunpoint and force him to pay up when he wasn't even involved with the child in the first place. There are also women that are simply not comfortable with the idea of more male contraception because they feel as though they're losing something to men. Men's rights are human rights. No civilized society would hold women up to these ridiculous ideas because they are just that: ridiculous.

At this time, there is more research happening in the domain of male contraceptives. The most promising of these is RISUG, which stands for Reversible Inhibition of Sperm Under Guidance, currently being developed in India. It is a gel injection that kills the sperm and sterilizes a man for 10 to 15 years and is completely reversible with a follow-up injection that dissolves the gel. The other option of note is Vasalgel, which is being developed in the United States. From what I understand, it works essentially the same as RISUG, whereby a polymer gel is injected into the vas deferens. The idea with both of these is that they will, one hopes, be more readily reversible than a vasectomy. Like RISUG, the polymer injected by Vasalgel could be removed with another injection. The Male Contraception Information Project is a wonderful resource in this regard and contains information on other promising projects. I would highly recommend you give it a look and become involved via the options presented on the site. At the very least, stay informed by signing up for their newsletter. I know I will.

Men are human beings and, consequently, deserve the same kind of reproductive control women do. This is not an exercise in entitlement because there is a responsibility associated with these rights. These rights are human rights. And who knew? Men's rights are human rights.

Further reference for important milestones in contraception history:

http://www.ourbodiesourselves.org/book/companion.asp?id=18&compID=53

Editorial note: this item originally published on Men's Human Rights Ontario. –Ed

Gender Tribalism

Peter Schwartz · 25 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: This text first appeared in The Return of the Primitive: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (New York: Penguin, 1999, pp. 205-218.) This essay, published in the late 1990s, seems to describe events as they have unfolded over the last 40 years in many respects. –Ed.

Feminism has become a form of gender tribalism, a collectivism that denigrates individual agency and accomplishment in favor of the group or sisterhood. Positing women as the victims of oppressive forces beyond their control, feminism is today the leading voice in declaring women to be helpless and incapable of accomplishment without significant government aid. A mentality of entitlement and dependency has come to replace the more liberating idea of individual accomplishment; a "neo-hausfrau" movement. Feminism has degraded men and women alike. The rhetoric of liberation obscures a movement that replaces individual responsibility and achievement with a tribal mindset subservient to the group.

All forms of collectivism rest on a certain metaphysics. The collectivist tenets—in economics, that production is primarily a social effort; in politics, that the group, not the individual, has rights; in ethics, that the individual must sacrifice his interests to the needs of society; in epistemology, that the judgment of an individual mind is subordinate to the collective consensus—all stem from a deeper premise: that the individual is impotent to cope with reality. The individual, on this premise, cannot sustain his life on his own, and must depend upon the group for survival.

This viewpoint, as applied to women, is what feminism essentially promulgates.

Of all the supposedly demeaning views of women for which feminists condemn our "patriarchal" society, none is remotely as denigrating as that held by feminism itself. It is, today, uniquely feminists who depict women as congenitally helpless, endlessly "victimized" creatures.

It is feminists who declare that, without government aid, women are compelled to accept only 75 percent of what men are paid—that their advancement at work is blocked by a "glass ceiling," which only the weight of government can shatter—that women cannot be expected to hold full-time jobs unless government provides day-care services for their children—that women cannot get hired for the better jobs or admitted into the better schools, except through "affirmative-action" preferences—that women cannot attain self-esteem as long as Playboy-type material (which, a court rules, has "a negative impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance") is legally permitted to be sold.[1]

The message of such feminist stands is that the individual woman cannot succeed in life by her own efforts and on her own merit. She is at the mercy of forces she cannot control, unable to obtain work, education or self-respect without the succor of a (governmental) nursemaid.

This is not merely a journalistic description of what feminists see as an unfortunate condition of women at present. This is, rather, a part of their basic philosophy—a philosophy that holds metaphysical powerlessness to be woman's normal state.

And it is a state that feminists actively foster. They want women to believe that the way to attain one's goals is to rely, not on individual merit, but on the power of the group. According to feminism, acquiring the specific abilities necessary for success in some area should be of little concern to women. In fact, they should dismiss the very need for such abilities. What they should count on, instead, is the fact of their gender.

For example, the average woman scores lower on the Medical College Admissions Test (because of deficiencies in her knowledge of science) than the average man. Should women who want to be doctors come to the logical conclusion that they need to study harder? Should women be advised to master science, so that they can be accepted on the same basis as men, irrespective of gender? No, say the feminists; the only conclusion to be drawn is that not enough women are being admitted—so the qualifications must be changed.[2]

If a woman wants to be, say, a firefighter, the feminists do not encourage her to make sure she measures up to the demanding physical standards. What matters most, she is told, is that there be a representative contingent of her gender at the firehouse. And if she does not meet the standards? She should not have to, feminists retort; women are rightly due their quota of such jobs.

With all their prattle about female "empowerment," feminists disavow the only legitimate meaning of that term: i.e., the individual woman's self-created power to make herself into a value, the power to make an employer want to promote her or a school want to enroll her—as a mutually beneficial exchange, based on her objective ability, not as a sacrificial accommodation to her gender. But that would be too independent an approach for the feminists to sanction.

Their implicit message to women is: "You cannot succeed on your own—but you don't have to; your collective will get you what you want."

Ironically, when the contemporary feminist movement began, in the 1960s, people believed that its message was the exact opposite. They believed that women were being urged to abandon the traditional "hausfrau" mentality—i.e., the assumption (held by females no less than by males) that women were incapable of dealing with existence outside the confines of the kitchen and the bedroom. People believed that women were being urged to seek their own careers, to reject unchosen duties to others, to assert a moral right to the pursuit of their own happiness, to embrace the real world by becoming airline pilots, neurosurgeons, music composers and CEOs.

But the collectivism at the heart of the movement quickly surfaced, revealing feminism's true nature. It became clear that women were expected to obtain all these new positions, not by earning them qua individuals, but by demanding them qua females. It became clear that the hausfrau image, far from being rejected, was being endorsed by feminism—in an updated, uglier form.

Whereas the old hausfrau mentality said that women could not perform the more demanding jobs as competently as men, this same mentality now says that women should not be required to. Now, the fact of gender supposedly entitles women to their "fair share" of corporate vice presidencies, irrespective of ability. Now, under this "neo-hausfrauism," women don't have to earn any reward— they just have to call upon Momma State to grab it for them. Now, as before, the conclusion for women is: gender determines all.

It is only the perverse influence of modern collectivism that permits such moral debilitation to be termed "liberation."

In pushing this philosophy, feminism attracts the very worst among women. It draws all those who want to be absolved of responsibility for their lives. Every housewife who feels guilty for having forever given up her pursuit of a career—every mindless scrub nurse who regrets having abandoned her ambition for something more—every bitter woman in a dead-end job or a dead-end life—are all reassured that their plight is not their fault. The individual woman cannot succeed—feminist doctrine proclaims; so she is not to be reproached for her failures.

One type of woman, however, is to be reproached: the woman of true independence. The woman who wants to judge and be judged according to individual merit—who scorns the crutch of "affirmative action," who succeeds on her own and who is proud of it—is chastised as a traitor to her tribe. She would never have achieved anything—feminists resentfully insist—had it not been for the collective efforts of all women.

Feminism rests upon dependency. It tenaciously recruits—and molds—dependent, self-abnegating women. It inculcates in them a belief in their metaphysical helplessness—and then waits for them to become docile members of the flock.

Feminism wants to enshrine the very mentality from which it claims to "liberate" women. It seeks to re-channel the hausfrau mentality—the desire to be provided for—by simply switching the object of dependence from husbands to the “Sisterhood.”

The leaders of feminism advocate the creed of the social worker. The social worker exists, not to help people escape from trouble, but to persuade them that life inherently is trouble—from which escape is impossible without the help of the social worker. Feminists want to instill a similar state of mind, by convincing the individual woman that she is doomed to frustration and failure— unless she hitches her wagon to the collective caravan of womanhood.

At the root of this malign conception of women lies a premise about free will. Feminists implicitly believe that women have no genuine volition and that their choices in life are not freely made.

Thus, according to feminism, a woman is never to feel guilty, no matter how low she may have sunk. Has she thrown her life away in a loveless marriage, in drug addiction, in prostitution, in violent crime? She could not help it, feminists tell her. Her choices are not the cause of her misery. Society did not allow her to do anything else. It is society, not she, that needs changing. And the only true “choice” a woman can make, therefore, is a collective one: to stand in solidarity with her female comrades.

The heroines of the feminist movement are not the women who achieve productive lives by their own efforts, but those who announce how empty and impossible their lives would have been without the maternalistic aid of a feminist-sensitive state. The woman who has no real self to assert—who pleads to be taken care of by her “sisters”—who preaches loyalty to quotas and subservience to the collective—who declares that the source of her unhappiness is not her own irrational choices in life but a tyrannical culture—it is she who is held up as a model to be emulated.

Because feminism regards volition as a myth, women are consistently portrayed as victims.

Since they are not held responsible for any failure to attain some end, every frustrated whim of theirs is taken as a sign of victimization. It is taken as evidence that women are being denied their rightful share of the goods. “Feminist consciousness”—says one author—“is consciousness of victimization.”[3] (Emphasis in original.)

The actual “victimizer” is, of course, reality itself. If a woman wants to be hired for a certain position or to gain entry into a certain school, not because she qualifies for it, but because she belongs to a class whose desires are not being fulfilled—then it is reality that is the barrier. For it is reality that demands objective qualifications. It is reality that presents us with the unbending law of causality, the law which states that a job can be done only by those who can do it. It is objectivity—the need to adhere to the requirements of reality—that is feminism’s real enemy.

But feminists dismiss the very concept of an objective reality, because the volitionless woman cannot survive in such a world. She cannot accommodate herself to a universe that makes such rigid demands upon her. She wants the “flexibility” of the non-objective. She feels ineffectual in an objective reality—so feminism repudiates it for her.

“Feminist analysis”—says a professor at the University of New Mexico Law School—“begins and ends with the principle that objective reality is a myth.”[4]

Thus feminists denounce the “exclusionary” means by which society evaluates doctors, lawyers, soldiers. Why, they ask, should women be judged by objective standards? And if one answers: because reality and reason mandate it—their reply is: Why should women be bound by reality and reason? Why can’t a woman be allowed to construct a more malleable world, a world she feels is more hospitable to her wishes? Why shouldn’t she be judged, for example, by her compassion for the ill, rather than her ability to perform surgery—or by her aptitude for telling stories rather than for logically analyzing legal principles—or by her capacity to bond with her fellow soldiers rather than to run an obstacle course in full military gear?

As the president of City College of New York, complaining about a lack of “diversity” in universities, writes: “Institutions of higher learning in the United States are products of Western society in which masculine values like an orientation toward achievement and objectivity are valued over cooperation, connectedness and subjectivity.”[5]

Why, feminists wonder, should even immutable facts stand in the way of women's egalitarian desires? For instance, why should women pay more for annuities just because they have longer life expectancies? Why should they pay different medical insurance premiums just because they incur pregnancy-related costs?[6] Why should females not be members of the Dallas Cowboys and the Vienna Boys Choir? As one feminist organization claims: "There is no such thing as fair and unfair discrimination."[7]

In this war between women and objectivity—between whims and reality—it is considered "discriminatory" to give priority to the latter combatant.

But since reality per se is not very responsive to political protests, feminists direct their grievances against the party they blame for "inventing" such an unyielding universe: men.

It is men who push the idea of objectivity—feminism argues—as a means of keeping women subjugated. It is men who arbitrarily refuse to indulge a woman's whims, as they insist that she be judged by merit, not gender. It is men who are to blame for every female who becomes a stewardess rather than a pilot, a cheerleader rather than a quarterback, a secretary rather than a vice president.

Feminists observe that males have somehow managed to succeed in reality. They have somehow been able to acquire the jobs, the wealth, the fame, the happiness. The way for women to do likewise—feminists maintain—is, not to master reality, but to harness its surrogate: the male. How? By acting like the children feminism believes they metaphysically are, and petulantly demanding that their desires be accommodated—by men. By insisting that they be given their "allowances," in the form of prescribed quotas of jobs, promotions, college admissions, etc.—to be produced and financed by men. (At least, the old hausfrau method of directly latching onto a husband for financial security was a more honest form of dependence.)

This evaluation of women as non-volitional ciphers, and of men as their vile oppressors, is implicit throughout the feminist philosophy. But there is one area in which this view is made virtually explicit: sex.

Sex between a man and a woman is not what it seems, according to feminists—i.e., it is not really voluntary. Law professor Susan Estrich, for instance, writes: "Many feminists would argue that so long as women are powerless relative to men, viewing a 'yes' as a sign of true consent is misguided."[8]

Other feminists contend that a woman cannot be held accountable for her decision to engage in sex. "There could be many reasons why a woman might not resist a man's advances so that unwanted intercourse could occur without force. The woman … may be confused. Her socialization may make it difficult for her to resist."[9]

In other words, women—adult women—are incapable of saying no when they do not want to have sex. They are the passive, deterministic products of their "socialization." Consequently, feminists say, women cannot be held responsible for having sex, any more than children can.

This idea of women as volitionless doormats obliterates the distinction between the voluntary and the forced. Do women have a rational faculty, by which they choose whether or not to engage in sex?

Not according to feminists, who declare that "verbal coercion" constitutes rape. And what is "verbal coercion"? It is "a woman's consenting to unwanted sexual activity because of a man's verbal arguments not including verbal threats of force."[10] (Emphasis added.) So whenever the man utters anything indicating a desire for sex, any subsequent sexual activity, no matter how willing the woman is, may well make him criminally liable.

This is why, in incidents in which men are denounced (sometimes correctly) for "sexual misconduct"—such as the one at the Navy's 1991 Tailhook convention—no differentiation is made between actions in which the women willingly engage and actions in which they are forced to participate. To the feminist, it is all "coercive."

On this view, it is not the objective facts that are legally decisive, but the woman's subjective emotions. Says law professor Catherine MacKinnon: "I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated."[11] (Emphasis added.)

Facts are simply brushed aside by feminists. Since women are seen as incapable of exercising volition, the crucial distinction with respect to sex is, not between the woman's giving and withholding consent, but between her feeling and not feeling "violated" —a feeling on the basis of which men are to be indicted, tried and sentenced.

A study of college students ("Project on Campus Sexual Assault"), sponsored by Ms. magazine in 1985, is widely hailed as an authoritative, scientific survey of the prevalence of rape in American society. It found that over 25 percent of college-age women had been victims of rape or attempted rape. This reinforced the portrait of a patriarchal culture in which women are under constant attack by, and need constant protection from, their natural enemy, the male.

Yet it was only the survey's distorted definition of rape—based on the view of women as "socialized" puppets, unable to make their own decisions—that led to such a conclusion. For example, according to the questionnaire, if a woman accepts a drink from a man and they then willingly have sex, it may be considered rape, because the man has "impair[ed] the other person's judgment or control by administering any drug or intoxicant."[12]

In fact, of those classified by the survey as having been raped, 73 percent indicated that they themselves did not believe that the sexual activity in question constituted rape. And over 40 percent of the "victims" had sex again with their "attackers."[13]

This neo-hausfrau movement believes that women must be treated like children. They cannot be trusted to give "informed consent," they cannot be relied upon to know whether they have been raped and they need continuous parental supervision to make sure their needs are being met.

When a march on Washington was organized by the National Organization for Women to publicize "violence against women," the objects of the protest were, not just rape or battery, but reductions in welfare spending and cutbacks in affirmative action programs. As reported in the New York Times, the feminists "equated what they called 'political violence' with physical attacks."[14] A parent who beats an infant and a parent who withholds meals from an infant are both guilty of physical abuse. Similarly—feminist thinking goes—adult women are "victimized" by a denial of welfare benefits as much as by a real assault.

Just as the essence of rape, according to feminists, is not the act of physically forcing a woman to have sex, so the nature of its evil is not the coercion—but the collective "discrimination" by one class against another.

This primitive, tribalist view is most openly advocated by MacKinnon, who writes: "Sexual violation is both a practice and an index of inequality between the sexes, both a symbol and an act of women's subordinate social status to men."[15] Unable to perceive a woman as an individual even with respect to her being the target of an actual rape, MacKinnon sees the crime as being committed against the tribe. It is not that a particular woman has been attacked by a particular man—or even that physical force has been used—but that one collective has been judged "inferior" to another.

Rape should be prosecuted as a "sex equality case," MacKinnon says. In a rape trial, the central questions about the accused would include: "How does this man treat women sexually? Is he a sex bigot?" If the courts were to adopt this approach, she concludes, "At least rape would be called in law what it is in life: sex discrimination."[16]

But if the essence of rape is "discrimination"—what is the difference between sex and rape? The act of sex is undeniably "discriminatory" —it discriminates by gender. Doesn't that make it inherently evil?

Whether the claim is that "yes" equals "no," or that rape equals "inequality"—sex is transformed by feminists into the archetypal act of aggression by men against women. Sex per se becomes rape. And all men become guilty of it.

Rape, says one "acquaintance-rape educator," "is not some form of psychopathology that afflicts a very small number of men. In fact rape is not that different from what we see as socially acceptable or socially laudable male behavior."[17] Rape, says a noted feminist author, is "a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear."[18] (Emphasis in original.)

What is the source of this enormous hostility toward men, and particularly toward sex between men and women?

The act of sex, Ayn Rand writes, is an act of metaphysical assertion: "To a rational man, sex is an expression of self-esteem—a celebration of himself and of existence…. [I]t is his response to his own highest values in the person of another."[19] (Emphasis in original.) Sex is an affirmation of an individual's self-worth, of his or her capability to live successfully in reality and to experience the joy of such success.

What assessment of sex, then, follows from an opposite metaphysics? If sex is good because it celebrates the individual's capacity to master reality and achieve values—how must feminists, who believe that a woman fundamentally lacks that capacity, perceive sex?

To them, sex is a union, not between two partners sharing their highest values, but between two antagonistic forces: a brutal despot—who wantonly denies woman her due by insisting that she earn her place in the world: and a feckless, perpetual victim—who desperately clings to others for her basic identity and for her very survival. On this view, sex for the woman is not a joyous affirmation of her sense of self-value, but an intolerable reinforcement of her sense of helplessness—and of her resentment toward the man for not being helpless.

Sex, according to feminists, is sheer oppression. The woman is being dominated. She is being "taken" by her enemy. Sex is the quintessential "victimization" of woman—the woman who lacks the capacity even to assert her own will in the face of male "verbal coercion."

Feminist theorist Andrea Dworkin, who depicts sex as "wartime invasion and occupation," presents this view unabashedly: "Physically, the woman in intercourse is a space inhabited, a literal territory occupied literally: occupied even if there has been no resistance, no force; even if the occupied person said yes please, yes hurry, yes more." The fact that women may judge sex to be good makes the act all the worse, she says. These "occupied women [are] more base in their collaboration than other collaborators have ever been: experiencing pleasure in their own inferiority, calling intercourse freedom."[20]

Dworkin's is not some "lunatic fringe" viewpoint. Her odious characterization of sex follows logically from the feminist metaphysics. If the individual woman is a powerless, volitionless nonentity, then sex is a combination of callous invasion and abject collaboration. Dworkin is merely being more consistent, and is taking feminist ideas more seriously, than many of her feminist cohorts.

The doctrine of feminism pervades today's culture. To question and oppose its "politically correct" tenets, especially within academia, requires an independent mind. That is, it requires precisely the faculty whose existence feminism will not acknowledge—and whose force it cannot withstand.

Feminism needs to be repudiated by everyone—man or woman—who recognizes the crucial need to think, and to act, by oneself. If you understand that a human being's basic identity is selfcreated, and is not the product of gender—if you grasp the fact of your capacity to achieve your own goals by your own effort—if you indignantly reject the demand that anyone live by the guidance and the power of the collective—then do not permit the ideas of feminism to go unchallenged. Expose, and condemn, the self-effacing dependency that this "liberation" movement cultivates. Above all, let people see that the ideological battle over feminism is not between the female and the male— but between tribalism and independence.

Footnotes

[1)] "Canada Court Says Pornography Harms Women," New York Times, February 2, 1992, p. B7

[2)] On the Medical College Admission Test—the only standardized test available to medical schools— women attain a mean score 88 percent that of men on the physical sciences section of the test; and 90 percent on the biological sciences. Yet in recent years, according to the Association of Medical Colleges, equal proportions of male and female applicants have been accepted to medical schools. ("Women seem to communicate better in the interview," says the associate dean of admissions at Harvard Medical School.) See Martin L. Gross, The End of Sanity (Avon Books, 1997) pp. 72-75.

[3)] Sadra Lee Bartky, Femininity and Domination: Studies in the Phenomenology of Oppression (Routledge, 1990), p.

15.

[4] Ann Scales of the University of New Mexico Law School, quoted by David Brock in The Real Anita Hill (Free Press, 1993) p. 384.

[5] Yolanda Moses, quoted in a New York Post editorial, "CUNY Does It Again," May 26, 1993, p. 18.

[6] The Supreme Court has endorsed this view, ruling in 1983 that sex-segregated actuarial tables violate the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because "under the statute, even a true generalization about a class cannot justify class-based treatment."

[7] An official of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, quoted in The Intellectual Activist, July 29, 1983, p. 3.

[8] Quoted by Katie Roiphe in "Date Rape's Other Victim," New York Times Magazine, June 13, 1993, p. 30.

[9] Charlene L. Muehlenhard and Jennifer L. Schrag, quoted by Norman Podhoretz in "Rape in Feminist Eyes," Commentary, October 1991, p. 33.

[10] Roiphe, op. cit.

[11] Quoted by Carol lannone, "Sex and the Feminists," Commentary, September 1993, p. 31.

[12] Christina Hoff Sommers, Who Stole Feminism? (Simon & Schuster, 1994), pp. 212—213.

[13] Ibid., pp. 213—214.

[14] "Thousands in Capital Protest Attacks on Women," New York Times, April 10, 1995, p. A1.

[15] "The Palm Beach Hanging," New York Times. December 15, 1991, Section 4, p. 15.

[16] Ibid.

[17] Py Bateman, quoted by Podhoretz, op. cit., p. 30.

[18] Ibid. (from Susan Brownmiller's book Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape, Bantam, 1976).

[19] Ayn Rand, "Of Living Death," The Voice of Reason (New American Library, 1998), p. 54.

[20] Quoted by Podhoretz, op. cit., p. 31 (from Andrea Dworkin's book Intercourse, Free Press, 1988).

Editor's note: AVfM thanks Richard E. Ralston, Publishing Manager for the Ayn Rand Institute, for permission to reprint Mr. Schwartz's text, which was also reprinted in the journal New Male Studies, from which this copy was obtained.

Male survivors and the empathy apartheid: The root of the “Speak to Me” radio play

Tim Pylypiuk · 26 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Never in all my years as a writer and performance artist have ambitions lofty as this possessed me.

Think of it: A radio play, in seven parts no less, on Internet radio, about a male survivor of sexual abuse from male and female perpetrators, with justice turning a blind eye toward the latter and the ensuing growing pains plaguing the survivor and his supposed support circle, called “Speak to Me.” Then turning that play into “Speak to Me Rundown,” a distillation of the main plot now complete with the epilogue, aired on Naturally Autistic ANCA Radio, Saturday, August 9, 2014, 3 p.m. Pacific Time.

Going from autistic people to male victims of sexual abuse seemed an unexpected leap for me.

But circumstances have a weird way of pushing you in alternative directions.

The real, raw genesis of this enterprise began when I was 32 years old. The moment when life tilted on its axis, taking me with it.

One session with my psychiatrist, along with a glimpse into my high school days: tumultuous, chaotic, a sliding scale going up and down. In my case, it seemed to frequently occupy the lower rungs more so than the limitless skies.

When I recounted, and biologically sensed, those negative experiences with girls and women who hurt me as a team with those boys and men, I was never the same again. My guess is that part of me brushed aside the former in favor of unrequited rage toward the latter.

Added to this the reality that hit me, close-fisted, in the jaw with a mean left hook: No information, support, or acknowledgement in the arena of girls and women dealing equal amounts of physical and psychological damage to boys and men. All of it centered keenly on genders either harming their own or males harming females. (Save for one study on the subject, titled “Boys Don’t Tell on Sugar and Spice and Not-So-Nice Girls.” However, the citations and research were so outdated that it did nothing to assuage me.)

Hope fleeting, I went through various stages of anger directed toward those horrible girls and women along with society for its failure to consider this visible aspect of untoward harm. I had already come to terms with what the boys and men did by this point, since it was all too easy for people to decry this form of trauma like a force of habit.

Along the way, I fell into the bosom of a human spectrum who had endured horrific forms of abuse from women (sexual, physical, and mental) and girls in their lives: male victims and survivors. At first, I had misgivings about fitting in properly, since their stories clearly superseded mine in terms of serious harm.

What changed all that was the discovery of the core issue slumbering underneath that was driving them: abused men at the hands of a gender that society falls on its knees to protect from the consequences of their crimes. I had finally found a safety net.

But I was still fuming at the sizable gap of information and support for my situation. Ultimately, I decided to write an article on my experiences and confront it: “Bullied by Girls and Women: One Man’s Account.”

That article details every incident that affected me the most and further specifies what I faced when telling the story to others.

It received a generous endorsement from varied walks of life but not much else compared with others. Nonetheless, I felt accomplished.

The celebration died down when reality hit me again with a mean right hook: my article was the ONLY one of its kind, floating aimlessly in a sea of narrative befitting the status quo.

Then another idea crawled inside me. Based on the confessions I had read over the years from male victims and survivors online and elements of my own past recognized via self-reflection, I desired to give back by conceiving a project to express their struggles louder.

Thus, “Speak to Me” was born.

The story of male sexual abuse survivor Kevin Holtz, a tattoo artist’s apprentice and artist himself, started as a long, detailed synopsis originally titled “Silent Minority.” Billed as a “Narratory Performance Piece,” the early incarnation mapped out the characters, their interactions, plot points, metaphors, themes, and underlying morality beneath the epic scope I had envisioned, with Kevin narrating the entire thing and physically acting out key events through interactions with invisible people before a live audience (I would play the part of Kevin).

This was before the advent of “radio drama” on Blogtalkradio.com. One of the people who bankrolled the station Naturally Autistic ANCA Radio (who was also my employer) thought up an idea to bring back the days when people would derive entertainment listening to old radio plays read by professionals. Hosting this program fell into my lap and I accepted the position, the difference being full creative control with the ability to produce my own material along with adapting works of others in the community.

In 2013, having polished up my skills, I set to work adapting “Silent Minority” to script format with a specific goal in mind: every myth propagated, every misconception pushed, every stereotype paraded by society and ignorant special interest groups would get the lashings they deserved. I cared naught for length since no form of media, to my knowledge, had ever attempted a story of this magnitude.

The adaptation process was slow and steady: one script per section of the synopsis that expanded on the ideas in it. What proved tough was writing out the ending as, at the time I started hosting Radio Drama, finishing the synopsis fell through. Luckily, my mental storage units housed just enough material for the general idea. It also helped that I could feel the ending repeatedly, even in my sleep.

After the script was complete, I and my cohorts, Phoebe Murer and Maria Iliou, performed it. Until finally, the length had reached seven parts by the last episode’s broadcast.

The response was slow but built steadily through archive listens and downloads.

“Speak to Me” did its job, granting male survivors a chance to be heard in a world that offered little to no solace they could count on. As was my intention, since I’m no stranger to advocacy myself with two live performance pieces in my portfolio, “Speak for Myself” and “Speaking for Ourselves,” about being autistic.

This, however, went beyond autism into the realm of human nature in general—my first attempt at advocating for a segment of the human population whose majority wasn’t autistic.

Now here we are with the “Speak to Me Rundown” series that turned into three parts due to time constraints, where we’d ended up stopping abruptly after our emergency third hour expired on the show. It’s a distillation of the main plot with none of the thematic and subplot fat present in the seven episode mini-serial form. I did this in protest of how the media and special interest groups took the Elliot Rodger killings that affected both genders and turned them into something specific only to women. And in protest, primarily, of this empathy apartheid toward people like myself who were harmed by women and girls, behavior that continues to reign freely in this world.

I have my periods where this scourge triggers me when people lend credence to the harms of women and girls on boys and men, indirectly or bluntly. “Speak to Me” fights this part uncensored and without remorse for politically correct sensibilities. And I have no regrets.

Only a promise: a story that, in the end, is universal if you’re willing to dig deep. You’ll find this in all my work, even tales that fight the tides and times, stomping over venerable populations with steel-toed boots.

I assure you this will never change.

Enjoy the ride.

Editorial note: The entire audio play can be heard here: Part 1, Part 2, & Part 3.

Love's Bitter Rebuke – Over Generations

Andy Thomas · 27 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

PART 1

I will always remember my mother's words.

"You'll never forget your first love," she said as I cried into her arms.

For some months, I had been keeping a terrible secret. My girlfriend, my first girlfriend, had been raped. They didn't just rape her; they broke her nose. A knife was used. She was cut. There were two of them.

Picture Alley Sheedy in The Breakfast Club — well, that was Louise. Her soft Irish accent, long black hair and scruffy oversized jumpers made me love her with all my heart.

We were both seventeen years old and still at school.

Louise had met my mother just once, but things hadn't gone well at all. My mother had ignored her and when she had left, she pronounced caustically that Louise looked like she had "come off a council estate*," and that I was never to bring her to the house again.

I never understood my mother's snobbery. So much of my mother's behaviour left me terribly confused. In any case, her prejudice was unfounded — Louise was actually from a wealthy Irish family who lived in the expensive part of town. They were also puritanically Catholic. If anything, I had assumed that my mother would approve.

I had a part-time job at the time pushing trolleys around a local supermarket car park, and it provided me with just enough money to run a rusty old Datsun. At weekends I used to heap body filler into the gaping holes around the bodywork, and slap on some industrial paint in the hope that it would stop it rusting to death. In the evenings, I would drive it around to Louise's place and we'd cruise around and find a quiet spot to park up.

There, we'd kiss, engage in foreplay and lie in each other's arms while we talked.

It was during these moments that she told me about what happened to her only a few months before we had met, and she swore me to secrecy. The fact that I betrayed her to my own mother has haunted me most of my adult life (it is only relatively recently that I have come to a realistic reconciliation with the past).

"You'll never forget your first love," is what my mother said when I told her.

"What do you mean?" I replied, confused. "It's not over."

At that point, my mother stepped back from me, her face turning cold. Then after a moment or two she spat, "Get lost!" before turning her back and walking from the room. Those words were a typical retort my mother used, but nevertheless I was left standing there, shocked, confused, hurting desperately and so utterly lost.

Over the coming months my mother conducted what I now consider to be an "emotional war" in order to get her way. Drunk on gin, she would accuse me bitterly of "killing her," and threatened suicide unless I would agree never to see Louise again.

"You're destroying me," she would complain. "Can't you see what this is doing to me!"

I would not agree to give up Louise, but I had already confessed to her that I had told my mother, and Louise had become distant from me as a result. Later, she would refuse to see me altogether.

My father, having been brought up in loving home, was a reasonable and rational man. He was so utterly ill-equipped to understand what was happening.

"Your mother's right," he would say trying to rationalise her behaviour. "She must know something about that girl."

I loved my dad, but his understanding of the situation was so utterly awry and I was so utterly confused, that neither of us could relate to each other during that time. I realise now that my mother put my father under tremendous strain, in effect pressuring him to pressure me.

My school study petered out and I spent the days on long walks around the suburbs. I had few friends, and any attempt to express myself to outsiders ended in failure and misunderstanding. So I remained distant, said nothing, and slowly became detached from everything and everyone.

I ate little and my weight fell dramatically.

I spent my long walks lost in my own thoughts, trying desperately to make sense of things. During one of these walks, I was distracted by an advertisement billboard.

“So strange,” I remember thinking, having been brought out of my reverie by the imagery of a chimpanzee drinking a can of soda when, out of nowhere, came a sickening blow.

I almost blacked out and half-blinded, thinking that I had been punched, looked around desperately to see where the attack had come from. But there was no one, and as I stared down at the blood pooling in my hands, I realised that I had simply walked full speed into the concrete lamppost while looking the other way. I dreaded going home, for I already knew what my parents would think.

“She’s had you beaten up!” I was told when I got home.

While I initially tried to explain, I sensed how unlikely my lamppost story sounded and was resigned to that fact that any protestation was pointless. My dad took the keys to the rusty old car from me and declared that I would no longer be allowed to “drive that girl around.”

The sad irony was of course that, by then, I no longer had any contact with Louise — not that either of them would have believed me if I had told them.

The last time I ever saw Louise was when, on a Saturday afternoon, she walked across the car park where I was pushing trolleys at the supermarket. She never looked at me, and as she disappeared from sight, I began to feel that I was bleeding internally. I never finished the shift, but simply walked away from the job.

I heard later that her parents had sent her to Ireland. “She needs a priest,” I was told by a caustic old woman who worked on the tills at the supermarket.

I never saw Louise again.

It wasn’t long after that things came to a head when my mother burst into my bedroom one evening swinging a heavy piece of wood in a drunken rage. It was a baluster, a piece of wood roughly the same shape and weight as a baseball bat, which my dad kept around in case of burglars.

“If you ever see that girl again, I’ll kill you!” she raged.

I swear to you now that if she had struck me, I had no intention of even lifting my arms to shield my face. At that moment, I cared for nothing and said simply, “Go ahead.”

She didn’t strike me, but instead started to smash up the room. I simply stood back and did nothing while she went berserk. It was my dad who, on hearing the commotion, came in and stopped her. I will always remember his words to me after she had left the room. I can quote them verbatim, and here they are…

“This is not your mother, this. Whatever it is that you are doing to her, it’s time to pack it in.”

He was wrong — that was exactly my mother. But at the time, I had no alternative perspective and with no way to understand such things, I had come to accept that, somehow, in some way, he was right.

I sat my exams, having done little revision, and as soon as they were over, I left home with a rucksack and some foolish notions about living “on the road”. I camped on a mountain side in the English Lake District for a few weeks, before finding a job and boarding in a remote pub called the Kirkstone Inn.

In the years that followed, I slid gradually into self-imposed isolation, characterised by drinking and self-harm. I ached so much to be with Louise, and I cursed myself for failing her. My mother had got her way in the end, and I lived for years with a confused sense of guilt and repressed anger that I had no way of reconciling.

PART 2

On my first day at school at the age of six, my mother had told me that there was no point in me going there because I was only going to be a road sweeper when I grew up. I can remember crying and insisting that I wouldn't, while she explained to me, rather matter of factly, that I was stupid and that she was telling me for my own good. That is my first memory of her calling me "stupid", but not my last. In the years that followed, she never missed an opportunity.

Despite the events of my last year in school, I actually passed my exams, but only just. Half an hour into one exam, I was lying in bed not caring when a teacher turned up at my house in his car to collect me. Nevertheless, having initially thrown away my place at university when I had left home with the intention of tramping the roads, I eventually went to University and got a degree in Physics — proving in my own mind that my mother was wrong about me.

In reality, however, I was a very troubled young man and throughout it all, what I so desperately looked for was a meaningful answer to the question, "What was so wrong with me?" Having no useful framework with which to understand either myself or the past, I was groping around in the dark with questions I could not even begin to formulate.

"So how does that make you feel?" I was asked, at various times through the years, whenever I tried counselling.

And I would stare at the floor, wringing my hands, as I replied, "Well, I don't know really."

It was always the same — meaningful answers were always held just out of reach by those who knew them.

It wasn't until my mid-thirties that things began to change when one day I had a profound revelation while walking home from work. It so shook me so that I stopped at the next telephone box I saw and made an international call to my sister.

"Our mother was an emotional bully, wasn't she?" I asked tentatively the moment she answered the call, not even waiting to say hello.

There was a short pause, and when she replied her words were the very first chink of light to penetrate darkness that was my confused inner world.

"Yes," she replied. "She was."

The first time I tried to speak to others about what I was discovering, I was told rather angrily, "That's a terrible way to talk about your mother!"

Those words shamed me back into silence for a while, but it would not last. I had begun to challenge the invisible cultural taboo that had prevented any rational scrutiny of my mother's behaviour. In fact, I was now on the way to realising a meaningful answer to my question, "What was it that was wrong with me?"

What was wrong was simply that I had been the subject of childhood emotional abuse in the form of my mother's sustained criticism, ridicule, interrogation and bullying as far back as I can remember. There was, in fact, a far bigger picture to be uncovered here than just the one depicting the fallout over Louise.

The astoundingly simple answer was that there had never been anything "wrong with me". I had never been "defective" — I had just been a normal child like any other. This, for me, was a life changing realisation.

Throughout childhood, my mother had taunted me, telling me that I was stupid and that everyone was "laughing at me." As a result, the message I internalized at a very young age was one of shame and inadequacy. I don't have a single memory of my mother ever cuddling me, playing with or reading to me. It was my dad who did all these things, and it is not lost me now how fortunate I am to have had that from him.

Now, here's the thing…

The things my mother said and did were normalised in my family. My father had grown up in a loving environment in which motherhood was sacrosanct, and this was the framework with which he made sense of the world. In my mother, he only saw what he wanted to see, and rationalised what didn't fit. Through him, she had a license to speak and do as she pleased.

She was beyond all reproach.

My mother would rarely talk about her own childhood. She opened up only once when, in my early teens, I found her sitting on the kitchen floor, drunk and crying. This was the only time she told me that her own mother used to openly express how she wished that she had been killed instead of her teenage brother, who had died in a motorcycle accident shortly before I was born.

My mother continued to drink and died a slow and lingering death, her brain corroded by the ammonia in her blood that her liver was no longer able to remove. Toward the end, she regressed into a child-like state, and my dad spent his last days spoon-feeding her and taking her to the toilet.

One of the saddest memories I have is of him sitting with his arm around my mother, who was no longer fully aware, and trying to comfort her.

"I don't know how we will do it," he said, "but somehow we'll get through this."

I knew as I watched him that there would be no way "through this", but only continued decline.

Within a year of that moment, both my mother and father were gone.

My dad had worked hard in a manual job from the age of fourteen, and spent the little retirement he had as a full-time carer for my mother. My parents were deeply in love with each other, and toward the end he often remarked how he would not have had things any other way.

After my mother's death, my father lived just long enough to put all his affairs in order and then, one day while out walking, he sat down and just died. After all the years of trauma and distress thrown up by my mother, I find it most distressing how he had managed to arrange things so that his own passing would be of no trouble to anyone. It is only now that I can begin to appreciate how, in those last few months of his life, he must have grieved so.

PART 3

I still find it difficult to tease out the good moments from bad, and properly reconcile the past. There were certainly good things about my mother, and some good times with her, and it would be wrong of me to paint an overly negative picture.

As a child, she had been cruelly bullied by her own mother, which, other than the astute observations of a relative, had been culturally invisible at the time. As an adult, she had been put on a pedestal and emotionally spoiled by my well-meaning father whose chivalrous notions about gender came from a bygone age. Never had my mother been expected to deal with the fallout from her own behaviour.

Recent UK legislation aims to make emotional abuse a criminal offence. While it's undoubtedly a good thing that its seriousness is at last being recognised, its criminalization is utterly wrong-headed and will ultimately benefit no one except an army of lawyers and bureaucratic enforcers. The scope for institutionalised injustice here, I believe, far outweighs any benefit it could bring.

The solution lies, not in ever more punishment, condemnation and social exclusion, but in a sea change in our attitudes toward the generational nature of abuse. My mother didn't know how to be a mother because she was never properly mothered herself. Had the right kind of therapeutic intervention been available decades ago — one that would not have implied criminalization and shame — the effect on my family could have been transformative.

On the other hand, the involvement of the police and judiciary would have undoubtedly torn us apart and destroyed all our lives.

Abuse within the human family is not new — it has always been with us. Human beings are not inherently bad, rather the lives of our ancestors were characterised by subsistence level survival to which they were brutally adapted. Today, we still experience the echo of that in our relationships, on our streets, and in our prisons. If we could ever effectively dampen out this destructive echo from the past, we could transform human society within a few generations.

Whenever you encounter a damaged adult who is racked by deep insecurity, or who is emotionally destructive or physically or sexually violent, you are almost certainly looking at a battered or abused child who has simply grown up. Condemnation and contempt, without a willingness to investigate and to understand, ensures only continued ignorance and misunderstanding for new generations of children, and their children.

No, human beings are not intrinsically bad, but we are easily damaged in childhood, irrevocably so in extreme cases. Ultimately, however, it's all about how we treat children, not about how many people we lock up.

Notes.
* In the UK, a "council estate" is a social housing development.
Louise's name was changed in this for anonymity reasons. Wherever she is today, I hope she is happy.

An alternative to Paper Abortion

Hopeland Cash · 28 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Paper Abortion refers to the concept of men (being non-fetus-carriers) having a legal equivalent to an abortion. Now, no actual abortion is involved; whoever may be carrying the baby, a Paper Abortion does not terminate the fetus. What is done is a termination of paternal rights and responsibilities. As far as the father of the child is concerned, the child is/was/will never be born, so he has no claim to be with it and cannot be called on to support it.

Just as if it had actually been terminated. He is, in effect, not a father.

Paper Abortion is not a popular idea. Many feminists argue that the discussion shouldn't even be held, but, unfortunately for them, we live in a nation believing in free speech, so the discussion has been and is being held. Do men deserve equal reproductive rights? Should fatherhood be able to be forced on a man where motherhood wouldn't be on his female counterpart? If not, how exactly do we fairly enact paper abortion so it won't be exploited by genuine deadbeats?

All valid questions rising from a valid concern. In the modern age of All Inclusive Equality, any imbalance between differing groups should be at least addressed. The imbalance here is clear: after conception, a woman has the option of abortion to terminate the pregnancy, preventing herself from becoming a mother. Men have no such option. Once they have sired a child, as long as it is carried to term, he has no legal means to not become a father. He can and likely will be forced to support the child, even if he never wanted to be a father.

By any reasonable definition that is an inequality.

So, given the assumption that women have greater reproductive autonomy (I'm sure there will be comments refuting that, but given…), how can the prenatal parental playing field be leveled?

Paper Abortion is one option, but, as I said already, it is unpopular. So, in the name of fairness and justice, I propose an alternative, a way to equalize men and women's parental rights without encouraging deadbeat dads.

Instead, let's create more deadbeat moms!

No, seriously.

I'll break it down: Society doesn't like to give men (as a group) more rights. Never has. Makes it harder to keep the workforce in check. Feminists say it's an attack on women. Giving men something in line with abortions would increase their reproductive rights, which is seen as a threat to women's rights. So Paper Abortions are out; no additional rights for men.

Society also doesn't like to take rights away from women (as a group) (at least not any more; history is a fucked-up place). As feminism has marched on over the last century and into its fourth wave, whatever has been gained has not been likely to be given up. The point being, there's no taking abortion away from women. For legal, moral, medical and practical reasons, it's not happening.

So, no giving rights to men, and no taking them away from women.

What can we do?

Well, rights tend to be balanced by responsibilities. Every child learns that growing into adulthood brings more rights and privileges, but also duties and requirements. So, if women have more reproductive rights than men, but we can't actually change the distribution of rights, we should change the distribution of the corresponding responsibilities.

Let women have access to abortions. They can save women's lives. Men do not carry children, so they have no need for the procedure, no need for a equivalent. It is a biological difference, so let women have at it.

What needs to be equalized is the legal burden placed on parents. If we're going to accept women having abortions, we have to realize that they won't only have them for medical reasons; women do and will have abortions to terminate an unwanted pregnancy.

Let them. Women shouldn't have to carry an unwanted child. That is cruel to mother and child.

However, getting out of pregnancy need not be the same as getting out of parenthood.

Men can't, after all. Once his sperm is loose, if it conceives a child, he is its father and there is nothing he can do. He is responsible for it. Period.

Let the same be done for (to) women. Don't make them carry through an unwanted pregnancy, but enforce the parental responsibilities they have inferred. Once a person, man or woman, has conceived a child, they are responsible for it. Even if a woman has an abortion, she has still conceived, which means she is a mother.

How, you ask, can a woman still be a mother after an abortion?

Simple: adoption. Any time a woman has an abortion, she should be required to subsequently adopt a child. The father of the aborted fetus will be made the legal father, and she the legal mother. They are both responsible for it, must pay for it, care for it, must raise it as if it were their own. The woman does not have to go through the rigors of pregnancy, but she still must face the responsibilities she has taken upon herself by conceiving a child. She becomes a mother whether or not she has an abortion.

Equality is as simple as that. Abortions all around, for whatever reason, but evenly enforced parental responsibilities via adoption. If you conceive a child, you have to care for a child (even if it isn't genetically your own. But don't worry, it'll probably come to identify as your child, so same diff). There are a huge number of children in need of adoption in America alone, and this would help relieve their pain by giving them parents.

Women would then be on the same footing as men, knowing that if they conceive a child they will become a parent, albeit adoptive, even if they didn't want to. There won't be the backdoor any longer of hoping your (female) partner will have an abortion and free you both from parental responsibility, but at least it will be evenly cruel and unfair. Women can still have abortions for medical reasons, but that won't get them out of being a parent, just as men have no way to terminate their parental responsibilities. If a child is conceived, both parties are on the hook, no exceptions. The mother will still be the one to decide if they're on the hook for their own child or an adopted one, but there will be a child in their lives, his and hers.

If she didn't want to be a mother, she should've kept it out of her pants.

Editorial note: Given how stupid and dishonest some of our critics are, we feel it necessary to point out that this article is ironic and satirical and meant to force people to think what they're really saying when they say "if he didn't want to be a father he should have kept it in his pants." That we even have to say so explicitly is a sign of the times we live in. Adopt a child whether you want to or not! –Ed

An Imagined Rebuttal to Amber Heard's 2018 Washington Post Column

Stephen Bond · 29 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

AUTOR'S UPDATE: This article was originally published at the beginning of the Depp/Heard defamation trial. The guess I made below in the original article about how the trial would end was correct. The jury gave Johnny Depp an overwhelming victory that essentially agreed that Amber Heard was the only one proven to have committed actual violence. Perhaps more important, the jury found that Heard acted with actual malice against Depp, so awarded him $10 million in compensatory damages and $5 million dollars in punitive damages, the latter a strong indicator that the jury believed Heard lied. – SB

* * *

It's anybody's guess how the Depp/Heard defamation trial will end. My guess is that, while both will be shown to have behaved poorly, Amber Heard will be the only one proven to have committed actual violence against the other:

1. Heard has a family history of domestic violence, a recognized predictor of subsequent intimate partner violence. She also has a documented arrest in 2009 for assaulting her then-girlfriend, and in audio recordings she has admitted to physical violence against Depp.

But one last bit of proof of Heard's abusive nature was provided by Heard herself. In a breathtaking display of self-sabotaging arrogance, early in the trial she began copying Depp's outfits and hairstyles in an attempt to intimidate him. Although the media has reported on this, I haven't seen anyone state the obvious: if Heard is willing to display this kind of mocking cruelty in public, isn't it likely that she abused Depp in private?

2. Depp also has a family history of domestic violence – his mother verbally and physically terrorized his entire family – but because children raised in abusive families tend to imitate that abuse, it appears that Depp copied the behavior of his father who "who never raised a hand against his mother".

Here's what we know:

1. The Washington Post has a long, troubling, and provable history of feminist-inspired bias. This bias is self-evident: for decades the Post has published thousands of sad articles that almost universally depict domestic violence as "men battering women", ignoring substantial evidence that men are equally battered by wives and that mothers commit a large majority of child abuse. In 2018 the Post published a repulsive article, Why Can't We Hate Men?
2. Only six months after the "Hating Men" article, the Post again proved its gender bias by publishing the column at the heart of Depp's lawsuit, imaginatively titled I spoke up against sexual violence — and faced our culture's wrath. That has to change. Heard's diatribe was essentially an anti-male gender hit piece meant to defame Depp and to publicly shame him for his standing up to her odious behavior – and by extension, by using a smorgasbord of feminist talking points, shaming all men.

Like much of feminism, she maximized her victimhood, oblivious to her own (female) culpability while shifting blame onto her (male) ex-husband.

3. Finally, although it was published under her name, Heard didn't write it – it clearly had feminist fingerprints all over it. The National Organization for Women and the Feminist Majority Foundation came to mind. A quick Google search proved that it was ghost-written by the ACLU, a fact that Depp's legal team also discovered, even naming the organization as "co-conspirators".

Following the ACLU's example, and in the interest of gender equity, I have taken the liberty of ghost-writing an "imagined rebuttal" to Heard's column with Mr. Depp as the "author". This rebuttal deconstructs their article, paragraph by paragraph, and provides a more balanced and truthful examination for each.

Note that Mr. Depp doesn't know me from Adam and has no prior knowledge of this effort. I'm simply doing it as a public service to him and to fair-minded men and women everywhere. Also note that in keeping with Heard's assertion that the Post article "wasn't about Depp because it didn't name him", in his rebuttal, Depp only refers to "the defendant" (wink-wink).

Johnny's Rebuttal: I spoke up against female domestic violence and false accusations against MEN — and faced our culture's wrath. That has to change.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

I was exposed to abuse at a very young age. I knew certain things early on, without ever having to be told. I knew that men have the power — physically, socially and financially — and that a lot of institutions support that arrangement. I knew this long before I had the words to articulate it, and I bet you learned it young, too.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

I too was exposed to abuse at a very young age. As a childhood victim of my own mother's domestic violence, I knew certain things early on, without ever having to be told. I knew that "boys didn't hit girls" and that, contrary to widespread belief, women can be violent too – every bit as violent as men.

I now know that despite the popular perception pushed by feminists and ignorantly parroted in the defendant's article that "men have the power — physically, socially and financially", the reality is far different. Most men have little power, yet are burdened with responsibilities, obligations, and life hazards (e.g. military service and working in the "death professions"), burdens of which nearly all women are blissfully unaware. Doubters are encouraged to read the book The Myth of Male Power.

The defendant unwittingly provided a quintessential example of these male-only burdens by including in her article an odd analogy of "powerful men as a ship like the Titanic", completely oblivious to the undeniable fact that the men of the Titanic, burdened by the demands of chivalry, courageously gave up their lives so women and children could live.

Who knew that some fifty years later feminists would begin a process that would turn these men from noble heroes into "patriarchal oppressors of women"?

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

Like many women, I had been harassed and sexually assaulted by the time I was of college age. But I kept quiet — I did not expect filing complaints to bring justice. And I didn't see myself as a victim.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

Like many millions of other men and boys, I was the victim of a woman's abuse.

In my case, I was a victim of my mother's violence and verbal abuse, along with my father, brother, and two sisters. But I kept quiet — I did not expect filing complaints would bring justice. And I didn't see myself as a victim. In fact, I later took my abuser to the Oscars and bought her a million-dollar horse farm!

And I'm by far not the only male victim of female violence. Other prominent men who have been abused by wives or girlfriends include golfer Tiger Woods, comedian Christopher Titus, model Lewis Burton, baseball player Chuck Findley, and John Bobbitt.

All these men survived their abusers, but others did not: Texas dentist David Lynn Harris, comedian Phil Hartman, and American salesman Travis Alexander are but a few men who lost their lives to female murderers.

Women also abuse children. Susan Smith and Casey Anthony are only two of many, many monstrously selfish mothers convicted (or charged) of killing innocent children.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

Then two years ago, I became a public figure representing domestic abuse, and I felt the full force of our culture's wrath for women who speak out.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

Then two years ago, I became a public figure representing both female domestic violence and false accusations against men. I felt the full force of our culture's wrath for men who dare to challenge the feminist-driven lies and misinformation about both types of abuse of men and boys.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

Friends and advisers told me I would never again work as an actress — that I would be blacklisted. A movie I was attached to recast my role. I had just shot a two-year campaign as the face of a global fashion brand, and the company dropped me. Questions arose as to whether I would be able to keep my role of Mera in the movies "Justice League" and "Aquaman."

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

Friends and advisers told me I would never again work as an actor — that I would be blacklisted.

And indeed, I have been. I've been dropped from the next Pirates of the Caribbean and Fantastic Beasts movies while the defendant was still casted in the latest Justice League and Aquaman movies. My future acting career is in jeopardy; the defendant's future appears to be secure.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

I had the rare vantage point of seeing, in real time, how institutions protect men accused of abuse.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

I had the rare vantage point of seeing, in real time, how feminists, the media, and other institutions protect women accused of abuse, mostly by denying that women are equally guilty of committing domestic violence.

This is feminism's Big Lie.

Here are just a few of an endless inventory of facts that completely contradict the one-sided, feminist-driven lie that women aren't violent:

- Erin Pizzey, the founder in 1971 of the world's first women's shelter observed that 62 of the first 100 women let into her shelter were as violent as the men they left. She wrote a book Prone to Violence that revealed this truth. Feminists killed her dog and made death threats that forced her to flee England.
- Domestic violence researcher Dr. Susan Steinmetz received death threats from radical women's groups after publishing a book, The Battered Husband Syndrome, that first documented the existence of battered men.
- Richard Gelles and Murry Straus, along with Dr. Steinmetz, performed two federally sponsored studies, the National Family Violence Surveys of 1975 and 1985, that were the first to conclusively reveal the equal female role in domestic violence. Feminists drowned out this message by making bomb threats at conferences that they attended.
- California State University professor Martin S. Fiebert published an annotated bibliography that lists hundreds of studies that all show women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their intimate partners. (Yes, you read that right: "or more aggressive".)
- Self-described feminist Patricia Pearson in her book When She Was Bad – Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence, challenged the stereotype of men as aggressors and women as innocent victims:

"The idea that domestic violence refers exclusively to wife abuse or to violence against women is so deeply ingrained in Western consciousness that it is impossible to grapple with [stories of male victims of DV] without first unraveling some potent conventional wisdom. … At the heart of the matter lies human will. Which partner – by dint of temperament, personality, life history – has the will to harm the other? By now it should be clear that such a will is not the exclusive province of men."

- The feminist claim that DV is predominantly "men beating up women" is completely demolished by proven higher rates of violence between lesbian couples – i.e., females – than between heterosexual couples. This article discusses two federal studies that revealed this truth. One study showed that lesbian women are almost 75% more likely to be victims of domestic violence than are heterosexual women.
- For more information about female-perpetuated abuse, see the "Women's Contribution to Domestic Violence" section in this article.

The repulsive hypocrisy of feminists threatening violence against people who exposed the truth about female violence reveals the shameful deceitfulness of both these feminists and their abusive movement.

If feminists could lie about this essential fact, what else might they lie about?

Everything:

- the feminist-proclaimed wage gap between men and women
- women don't make false accusations against men (recall the Duke Lacrosse Rape and UVA's A Rape on Campus hoaxes)
- women don't rape (denying the reality of female sex offenders, including mothers who molest their own sons and teachers like Mary Kay Letourneau who rape boys)
- grossly exaggerated claims of sexual assault and a "rape culture" on college campuses
- lying about children's real fathers, i.e., "paternity fraud"
- the existence of a "Patriarchy" (eerily similar to the "Jewish conspiracy" of Nazi Germany)
- And finally, feminism's Second Big Lie: that women don't lie, asserted under the false flag "Believe women".

Might these many provable feminist falsehoods also induce wives to lie about abuse by husbands? Is it possible that the defendant accused me of abuse for preemptive advantage in our divorce or to extract even more money from me?

Of course it's possible! As Elaine Epstein, former president of the Massachusetts Women's Bar Association stated in 1993:

"Everyone knows that restraining orders and orders to vacate are granted to virtually all who apply . . . In many [divorce] cases, allegations of abuse are now used for tactical advantage*.* [emphasis added]"

Anyone who doesn't think that women are capable of lying has been bamboozled by hundreds of years of groveling chivalry and the past fifty years of feminist, gynocentric indoctrination.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

Imagine a powerful man as a ship, like the Titanic. That ship is a huge enterprise. When it strikes an iceberg, there are a lot of people on board desperate to patch up holes — not because they believe in or even care about the ship, but because their own fates depend on the enterprise.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

(This odd analogy is covered in my first rebuttal point)

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

In recent years, the #MeToo movement has taught us about how power like this works, not just in Hollywood but in all kinds of institutions — workplaces, places of worship or simply in particular communities. In every walk of life, women are confronting these men who are buoyed by social, economic and cultural power. And these institutions are beginning to change.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

In recent years, the #MeToo movement has taught us how feminism uses the stealthy power of the female sex to abuse men.

#MeToo has morphed from a movement for the expression of legitimate complaints by women about the sexual misbehavior of some men into a two-faced juggernaut that allows any man to be accused, tried, and sentenced in the court of public opinion, hounded out of his job, and made a social pariah without a shred of due process, often by anonymous accusers. Just ask Mike Tunison!

#MeToo also serves as an example of female hypocrisy because it fails to recognize women's own appalling sexual behavior or the female contribution to men's sexual misconduct. As explained in this online article, the #MeToo movement should be called the #MeTwoFaced movement.

#MeToo is the smug, spoiled, arrogant daughter of feminism and both are expressions of predatory, gynocentric female behavior.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

We are in a transformative political moment. The president of our country has been accused by more than a dozen women of sexual misconduct, including assault and harassment. Outrage over his statements and behavior has energized a female-led opposition. #MeToo started a conversation about just how profoundly sexual violence affects women in every area of our lives. And last month, more women were elected to Congress than ever in our history, with a mandate to take women's issues seriously. Women's rage and determination to end sexual violence are turning into a political force.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

We are in a transformative political moment. Men and women are both recognizing the awful, hateful excesses of feminism, and are beginning to speak out against these excesses. The rage of both men and women and their determination to expose female violence against men and children and to end false accusations against men are turning into a political force.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

We have an opening now to bolster and build institutions protective of women. For starters, Congress can reauthorize and strengthen the Violence Against Women Act. First passed in 1994, the act is one of the most effective pieces of legislation enacted to fight domestic violence and sexual assault. It creates support systems for people who report abuse, and provides funding for rape crisis centers, legal assistance programs and other critical services. It improves responses by law enforcement, and it prohibits discrimination against LGBTQ survivors. Funding for the act expired in September and has only been temporarily extended.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

We have an opening now to bolster and build institutions protective of both men and women.

For starters, President Biden and Congress can either repeal or make the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) gender neutral. First passed in 1994, under the sponsorship of then-Senator Biden, the act is one of the most horribly biased pieces of legislation ever passed by the U.S. Congress. It enshrines a fundamental lie into American law: that women aren't as violent as men.

This lie is well summarized in the previously-referenced book When She Was Bad – Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence:

"Women commit the majority of child homicides in the United States, a greater share of physical child abuse, an equal rate of sibling violence and assaults on the elderly, about a quarter of child sexual abuse, an overwhelming share of the killings of newborns, and a fair preponderance of spousal assaults." [emphasis added]

Next, we need to demand that equal funding be made available to male victims of domestic violence. How many people are aware that VAWA expressly denies funding for these male victims, and that effectively all DV shelters refuse to serve men?

Finally, all Western media needs to closely examine their own chivalrous gender biases and remove hateful, feminist-inspired prejudices from their reporting.

For example, how many people are aware of the previously-mentioned #MeToo-motivated Post Opinion piece Why Can't We Hate Men?, written by a smug women's studies gender bigot who openly and shamelessly broadcast a Nazi-like hatred for men in a nationally-read newspaper? (Many of the article's more than 3,300 vastly negative commenters responded, "just change 'men' to 'Jews'".)

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

We should continue to fight sexual assault on college campuses, while simultaneously insisting on fair processes for adjudicating complaints. Last month, Education Secretary Betsy DeVos proposed changes to Title IX rules governing the treatment of sexual harassment and assault in schools. While some changes would make the process for handling complaints more fair, others would weaken protections for sexual assault survivors. For example, the new rules would require schools to investigate only the most extreme complaints, and then only when they are made to designated officials. Women on campuses already have trouble coming forward about sexual violence — why would we allow institutions to scale back supports?

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

The defendant's ghost writers at the American Civil Liberties Union, by raising the issue of sexual assault on campuses in their feminist-dominated rant, illuminated the moral rot of their organization.

An organization that was founded in 1920 "to defend and preserve the individual rights and liberties guaranteed to every person in this country by the Constitution and laws of the United States" today spectacularly fails to meet that objective for one group of citizens: men, and in particular male college students.

The ACLU's voice was conspicuously silent during the Duke Lacrosse Rape and UVA's A Rape on Campus hoaxes. One writer aptly described this silence in a 2006 article:

"If ever there was a case screaming for the assistance of the ACLU on behalf of defendants suffering denial of their civil rights and the need to go after a prosecutor abusing his power, the Duke lacrosse case is it. Yet the ACLU remains silent."

Can any right-thinking person think that these two horrendous assaults on the civil rights of male college students appeared suddenly, completely out of the blue, with no causal event?

No, they're the result of an even larger feminist hoax, driven by decades of lies, distortions, and biased studies, that female college students suffer from an "epidemic" of sexual assault, the result of a "rape culture … in which sexual violence is treated as the norm and victims are blamed for their own assaults." In short, feminist falsehoods have resulted in an anti-male lynch-mob mentality at America's colleges and universities that has dangerously eroded the civil rights of male college students.

The feminist lies and biased studies that have led to the myth of a rape epidemic are thoroughly debunked in the book The Campus Rape Frenzy – The Attack on Due Process at America's Universities. Be sure to read the "The Realities of 'Rape Culture'" chapter.

But it gets worse. Much worse! The federal government is also complicit in undermining male college students' civil rights.

Briefly, Title IX is the primary federal law intended to prohibit sex discrimination in all American schools, from kindergarten through graduate school. in April 2011 the gender bullies at the U.S. Department of Education, under the presumed authority of Title IX, issued a "Dear Colleague Letter" to American colleges and universities. This letter directed these schools, under penalty of losing all federal funding, to institute draconian changes to the way sexual assault accusations were to be handled.

The Campus Rape Frenzy describes the result of these changes:

"… the federal government, joined by virtually all colleges and universities, has mounted a systematic attack on bedrock American principles including the presumption of innocence, access to exculpatory evidence, the right to cross-examine one's accuser, and due process."

Anyone who still thinks that feminism is a fair movement that only strives for "equality" needs to read Twisting Title IX, a book that documents the outrageous abuses done in the name of Title IX and "equal educational opportunity". Pay particular attention to the chapter titled "OCR'S Unlawful Assault on Due Process and Fair Procedures".

Again, the ACLU has succumbed to a warped feminist worldview that allows it to abandon the civil rights of a single group of citizens: male college students.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

I write this as a woman who had to change my phone number weekly because I was getting death threats. For months, I rarely left my apartment, and when I did, I was pursued by camera drones and photographers on foot, on motorcycles and in cars. Tabloid outlets that posted pictures of me spun them in a negative light. I felt as though I was on trial in the court of public opinion — and my life and livelihood depended on myriad judgments far beyond my control.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

I write this as a man who received death threats, most notably from the defendant's own father! Tabloid outlets that posted pictures of me spun them in a negative light and I was excoriated by our uber-feminist-friendly media.

For example, HuffPost, The Daily Beast, and other media outlets published articles against my being hired as an actor, yet have said nothing since evidence surfaced that the defendant admitted to her own domestic violence against me and was arrested in 2009 on charges of assaulting her then-girlfriend, photographer Tasya van Ree, at the Seattle-Tacoma airport.

I felt as though I was on trial in the court of public opinion — and my life and livelihood depended on myriad judgments far beyond my control.

Amber Heard's DC Post article:

I want to ensure that women who come forward to talk about violence receive more support. We are electing representatives who know how deeply we care about these issues. We can work together to demand changes to laws and rules and social norms — and to right the imbalances that have shaped our lives.

Johnny Depp's rebuttal:

I want to ensure that men and women who come forward to talk about women's violence and false accusations against men receive more support.

We need to inform our foolishly chivalrous — or outright anti-male — representatives who have passed laws like VAWA and others that have gradually eroded the civil rights of men and boys.

We desperately need to work together to demand changes to laws and rules and social norms — and to challenge the feminist-inspired lies, distortions, and imbalances that allow women like the defendant to manipulate public opinion for their own selfish ends.

—— End of Depp's Rebuttal ——

A final note from the "real" author:

By publishing the Amber Heard/ACLU article, the Washington Post turned Johnny Depp's defamation lawsuit from a story about a celebrity divorce into a proxy fight for a much larger story: the decades-long defamation of men and boys by the world's media and the abject surrender of the Post and the ACLU to a feminist worldview.

The White Feather Campaign

Janice Fiamengo · 30 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In His Own Words: How I wound up in the domestic violence industry grinder

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 1 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

"CJ" shares his trip through hell with his ex-girlfriend, a divorced, bisexual, social worker, swinging mother of two. In addition to being emotionally and physically abused by this woman, he was also the victim of false allegations she made to the police.

First of all, I made the mistake of getting involved with a domestic violence industry insider. When we met, I respected "Candi" for her career choice as it seemed noble. In reality, being a domestic violence industry worker made her an especially dangerous and potent false accuser.

It was a long-distance relationship for over three years, on and off again. The last two weeks of it were the worst of my life.

Candi moved to DC from New Jersey in mid-March 2012 to start a job as a social worker. When she applied earlier in the year, I didn't think she would get the job because NJ social services had suspended her. I didn't know why at the time. Of course, it was someone else's fault, and some woman in the office was "out to get her" because she was "jealous."

I found out later that actually she had been fired for making a false allegation of sexual harassment, among other things.

By the time Candi relocated, I didn't love her anymore. I didn't even like her. She was an albatross around my neck that I could not get rid of. The previous three years of her physical attacks, vandalism, theft, bitching, nagging, lying, golden uterus fake-outs, and all-around crazy had taken their toll.

I would actually wince when her name popped up on my caller ID. My heart filled with dread when DC made her an offer and she told me she was moving down. She asked if she could move in with me and I said no, so she claimed she was moving in with a cousin instead.

Her first Sunday in town, she began to text and call, begging me to allow her to stay at my place for a few days because her cousin allegedly backed out of their living arrangement as she was driving down with all of her belongings in her minivan. I knew better and refused, but eventually I let her nag me into it.

After I agreed, I put down the phone, looked at my friend, and said, "I'm gonna regret this." I had no idea how true that statement would prove to be.

Basically, I gave in for the same reason I gave in over and over during the relationship, to get her to STFU, so I could tend to more important things, like my job. Doing so only provided a momentary respite.

She would get her way on something, then move on to the next thing on her "bitchinlist," as I called it. She also had a penchant for harassing my prior exes whenever I refused to get back together with her. That was always fun, being harassed by her on the one end and hearing from an ex-girlfriend who you don't want to hear from on the other that "You need to control your crazy bitch!!!"

Besides, I knew that if I said no, she would show up at my apartment anyway and cause a scene like she had done several times before. I knew the police wouldn't provide me any assistance because they never helped the two times my building concierge called the cops on her or the time she keyed my car.

The second day that she was in my apartment her mail began to arrive at my place. I knew then that the moving in with her cousin was a complete lie. I didn't worry about it because I was closing on a house in Maryland and if she was still in my place at closing I was going to just leave her there.

Those "few days" turned into two and a half weeks of hell. Every day I would come home from work to her incessant bitching, demands, and all-around stank attitude. Every day I would come home to more and more of her belongings littered around my apartment in garbage bags and suitcases. My place had become the pigsty her place always was.

In order to sit on my sofa, I had to move her stuff. Walking through the apartment was treacherous, constantly stepping over bags, trying not to trip into her Chihuahua's shit that she refused to pick up.

Let me clarify. It wasn't that every night she would start bitching as soon as I walked in the door. Some nights it was calm for a few hours, I'd get to heat up my dinner and eat in peace, maybe get to watch a little TV, then her "bitch switch" would go off, usually right before I would go to bed.

She would wake me up in the middle of the night, every night, but there was no rhyme or reason to it. Some nights she would wake me up starting shit—"Why won't you let me into your Facebook, email, or phone?!?!" Other nights she'd wake me up wanting to screw.

Since I'm clarifying things, I would like to go a bit off-topic and explain something I have had to address over and over with lawyers, probation officers, and domestic violence instructors. People often go straight to the sex as if it makes a difference.

They say, "Well, you kept having sex with her…" as if it somehow excuses or justifies her crazy, or that she couldn't have been that horrible of a person, somehow discrediting what you went through. Or they say things like, "She must've been putting it on you!!! Heh, heh, heh," as if you were some virgin putting up with crazy to get laid.

That's backwards.

It is not "I'm going to put up with her crazy so I can get laid" or "I'm getting laid so I'll put up with her crazy." It is rather "She's crazy and I can't get rid of her, so I might as well get laid." Also, with Candi, anytime I refused sex it prompted "What other bitch you fucking?!?!" and back down that rabbit hole we'd go.

Anyway, back to the torment. Any mention or inquiry about her finding her own place brought on her tantrums, so I stopped asking because I was moving anyway.

The third Monday she was staying at my place, I came home from work and she was being all lovey-dovey and affectionate. This made me suspicious.

We had never stopped having sex, but affection was long a thing of the past. She then began to press me about my plans for living arrangements, whether she was going to live with me—make it "official," I guess.

Not getting the responses she wanted from me, she turned sour, back to the Candi I had grown accustomed to. I later discovered that earlier in the day she had gotten my real estate agent's info, called and played the "sistuh gurl" angle, and gleaned info about the closing.

I went to sleep and she woke me up several times bitching. The next morning I got up and got dressed as she stomped around my apartment shooting me evil looks. I left without us speaking a word to each other. When I got to work, she began one of her patented text campaigns.

I had gone through this several times before when I would break up with her or when she would break up with me, then decide she wanted to get back together. This happened so frequently over the previous two years that it became routine.

She wanted me to set up a meeting for that night with a couple in Baltimore that she had been corresponding with on a website. (Candi is a "swinger." When we first met, she claimed her ex-husband forced her into, which I later learned was yet another lie—it was all Candi.)

I refused to meet with the couple. I had gone through this routine several times before and recognized it as her favorite double-bind. If I agreed, she would bitch about it. If I refused, she would bitch about it.

It went further than that. If I had agreed and made plans, she would throw a tantrum shortly before and we would not go, or she would cancel. If I refused, at least it wouldn't turn into the circus she turned things into and I wouldn't put other people through her crazy.

She continued to text me throughout the day. By the end of the day I didn't want to go home to my own apartment that I paid for. I worked late, went to the gym, then agreed to meet a colleague and his boss for a drink. She continued to text, demanding to know my location, accusing me of being with "some other bitch." I replied that I was fed up and that she had to get her stuff and get the hell out of my place that night.

My colleague dropped me off at home. I went in and she wasn't there. I emptied my pockets on the coffee table, moved over a pile of her clothes on the sofa, and sat down. She barged in and snatched my phone off of the table.

It was locked, and in her frustration at not getting in she threw it across the room. I said, "That's it. You have got to get the fuck out right now." I got up, grabbed a pile of her clothes, walked to the front door, and tossed her stuff into the hallway. Standing behind me, she said, "You throw one more thing and I'm calling the cops." I picked up one of her thongs off of the floor and tossed it out. She shoved past me and left. I sat back down on the sofa.

Over the next several minutes she made a few return trips, getting her things and talking shit. After the third or fourth time while she was gone, I got up and closed the door. Then there's a knock at the door. Assuming it was her for more of her stuff, I grabbed a bag and opened the door.

It was a cop.

He walked in and asked me to have a seat as he tracked Chihuahua shit on my rug. Then asked me what was going on. I told him the gist and that she had to leave.

At first he appealed to chivalry.

I told him that I wasn't going for it as I had heard that before from the last cop that came when my concierge called them because she was banging on my door in the middle of the night a few months prior. Then he stated that I could not put her out because, "DC is very pro-tenant." I told him that she was not a tenant, she was a guest, and that guests only possess a license, which is revocable at anytime for any or no reason.

For about 10 minutes he stood there arguing landlord/tenant law with me as cop after cop filed into my apartment. I wondered why so many cops had to watch her get her stuff, and why they all looked so scared and shit. Then some dip-chewing, hillbilly, redneck cop comes in and handcuffs me and tells me he's arresting me for assault. Up until then, no one mentioned or asked me whether any violence had occurred.

Thus began my long journey through the quagmire of the insanely biased domestic violence industry. The next year of my life was filled with biased judges who find guilt to justify having a dedicated domestic violence bench, rookie prosecutors unqualified for cases that require a burden of proof more substantial than "she said so," a negligent lawyer who took the money and ran, self-serving probation officers incentivized to keep a "full caseload," and the domestic violence industry's version of the Ludovico technique—domestic violence classes with instructors that would call Jesus Christ an "abuser" for ~~allowing~~ forcing Mary Magdalene to wash his feet.

And the cherry on top—Candi continued to stalk and harass me for months, and I got no help because, well, I have a penis and she was the "victim."

And people wonder why more men don't call the police when their wife or girlfriend assaults them. Thank you, CJ, for taking the time to revisit this travesty.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceforMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence: men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

The World's Fastest Patriarchy Disproof

Josh O'Brien · 2 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists often chatter about 'Patriarchy' as if it is an indisputable fact of life. Rarely do they acknowledge anything to the contrary. It can be time-consuming and difficult to put together a factual, adequately sourced, eloquent argument, especially since it's so blatantly obvious to anyone with common sense, and your arguments will likely be cherry picked, ignored, or blocked. So this article is essentially a handy guide to disproving patriarchy, very quickly.

Patriarchy is defined as a system in which all of the societal power is held by men as a class, and is used to oppress women as a class.

This is an interesting theory, but does not hold up to any real scrutiny or critical thinking.

For the purposes of quick dismantling, I will split societal power into four areas, or spheres.

The spheres are social, political, economic, and educational. The group which controls the majority of these spheres is the group with the power. Feminists claim that the group with control is men. Let's see how that holds up to some critical thinking. Hint: Not well.

First, Educational. In the educational sphere it is clear that women have the power. They are more likely to be in education, less likely to drop out of education, more likely to get degrees and finish their education, more likely to teach, and more likely to be on decision-making boards concerning education.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Second, Political. In the political sphere, women still have more power. Women are the majority of the electorate in the majority of states. In a democratic system, the will of the majority is the will that is enforced as law. Therefore, women as a class have more political power than men as a class. Just because women don't choose to use this power to elect other women does not mean they do not have the power. If every woman in America wanted a female president, there would be a female president. If every man in America wanted a male president, there would not be a male president. In the UK, where Parliamentary Sovereignty and a lack of a codified constitution allow any law to be made, even ones which contravene basic human rights, women could literally institute any law they wanted as long as they all agreed upon it.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Thirdly, moving onto the Economic sphere. Despite producing and being responsible for the existence of less than 50% of the US' GDP (Gross Domestic Product), an estimated 63% of it is controlled by women. Yes, women control over half of the US' GDP, despite not producing even half of it. That means that they control not only their own money but some of men's money, too.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Finally the Social sphere. More difficult to quantify, but just as easy to understand. All throughout society there are obligations for men that place power in female hands. The obligation of chivalry, carrying with it protection, financial support, emotional support and submission to a female whim. The obligation of instigating a relationship, placing all risk of rejection on male shoulders. The obligation of trust, meaning that men feel forced to believe women in the face of all evidence. This, combined with the undeniable fact that issues affecting men are given less support than those affecting women, such as domestic abuse, rape, alimony or any number of other things, shows a lack of male power.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Now, the Social sphere is the only one which I can see being contested, as it cannot be factually quantified, but even if the social sphere were male controlled, that would still be 3 spheres under female control, a majority. Thus meaning: women would still have the majority of control in society.

So no, we don't live in a patriarchy.

One final point would be that just because women have this power does not mean they all exercise it, as we can see clearly in the world. Just because women can vote women in, does not mean they do, for example. But power is not dependent on use, simply possibility of use. Even if women all sat in the home as housewives voting for men and never exercising any of these powers, they would still have the power.

SOURCES:
Women in Education: http://collegestats.org/articles/2012/08/9-signs-we-have-a-boy-crisis/
Women and GDP: http://www.businessinsider.com/infographic-women-control-the-money-in-america-2012-2
Women and the Electorate:
https://www.census.gov/content/dam/Census/library/publications/2011/dec/c2010br-03.pdf

Heracles: A Slave To Guilt

Peter Wright · 3 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Guilt is a trap used to enslave men. By citing real or concocted transgressions, people are quick to saddle men with guilt (you did wrong) and social shame (you are not a good man), charges which are then leveraged to extract male labor as a means of atonement. This dynamic of male existence is nowhere better illustrated than in the story of The 12 Labors of Heracles.

Heracles (known to Romans as Hercules) is one of the best-known heroes of classical mythology. Looking past his admirable masculine swagger, we see that his life was no picnic. He endured many trials and completed many daunting tasks, with the reward for his struggles being that he might live forever as a Real Man™ among the mythical gods of Olympus.

Focusing on his misdemeanors or his great feats, but never on his pain (the story of everyman!), we tend to overlook the fact that Heracles life was beset by tragedy, exploitation, and stress, with many of his deeds driven by a desire to escape intolerable feelings of guilt. Like a determined MMA fighter Heracles took all of this in his stride, and the fact that he displayed courage, strength, skill and endurance while under stress deserves that we take a closer, and dare we say compassionate look at the demons that assailed him.

The story of the Twelve Labors of Heracles

The rise of guilt

There's no doubt that Heracles' feelings of guilt arose from the misdeeds he perpetrated; from his occasional insensitivity, to the more damning crime of murder (of which we will say more below). However, there was much more going on behind the scenes that worked to strain his composure and pushed him to commit such terrible deeds. The primary provocateur, who was constantly provoking him to lash out, was his step-mother Hera — the very same goddess who was pleased to see him tormented by guilt after his crimes had transpired.

Hera's provocations of Heracles were not isolated to a few occasions, as she is said to have persecuted him from the moment of his birth and throughout his entire life; "Even as an infant not yet a year old," tells the myth, "Hera sent venomous snakes to kill the boy while he slept in his cradle, but Heracles awoke and strangled them."

Young Heracles killing a snake

We can conclude that Hera embodied the archetype of the spiteful feminist who frequently disdained men while viewing their role as one of service to women. After reading many of the Greek stories it's fair to conclude that Hera can be considered, more than all the other goddesses, a poster girl for coercive control, manipulation, spite, jealousy and nagging – she is what we might call the Queen of relational aggression.

According to American sociologist Philip Slater, Hera represents narcissism in her attitude toward Heracles, stating that this was part of the reason she dealt the severest blows to him and imposed pain, grief, and labor on him — she both envied Heracles and wanted him to bring her status and glory.[1] Representing a kind of love-hate dynamic, Slater summarizes:

> Heracles is attacked in the womb, as an infant, and as a grown man, with Hera once again the persecutor. The attack which destroys him, however, comes after all of these, in his gruesome death on Mount Oeta. Even his labors are an expression of Hera's malevolence, as well as many of the supplementary difficulties which he must endure in carrying them out.
>
> Hera's enmity toward Heracles is supposed initially to have been aroused by Zeus's affair with Alcmene (Heracles' mortal mother). This is an absurdly weak reason, since Zeus's infidelities were legion, while no one suffered Hera's wrath so persistently as Heracles. But we are not to expect too much reason and coherence from such a melange of unrelated and contradictory traditions. What we do know is that the relation between Hera and Heracles is an intense one, and by no means always negative. That we are left with the contradictions, largely unrationalized, suggests that such ambivalence did not seem altogether strange to the Greeks—that it tapped something meaningful in their experience.[1] (p.340)

Heracles sent mad by Hera

Hera's persecution eventually drove Heracles mad, by design, causing him to murder all his children and two sons of Iphicles. In some versions he also slew his wife Megara. When he recovered from the madness and realized what he had done an intolerable sense of guilt rose up in his soul. The oracle at Delphi instructed him to serve Eurystheus and perform the many hard labors that would be set for him as the only way he could atone for his guilty deeds.

No sooner were these accomplished, however, than Heracles committed another murder for which the only way he could make amends was to be sold into slavery to Queen Omphale. While serving in this capacity he achieved several more heroic exploits, and followed up his slavery with a military expedition to Troy, the killing of a sea-monster, further battles, and a new marriage — one which was to bring about his death.[1]

Philip Slater states that Heracles tries, without succeeding, to renounce his raw instinctual nature in favor of developing a sanitized urban consciousness, a process that entails a transition from a primitive condition to a more modern subjection to "guilt culture."[1] He adds that the failure of Heracles to achieve this goal is perhaps why his ascendancy to Mt. Olympus is associated with so little sense of rejoicing, and his suffering so little regarded as a means to a divine end: it is never in the least clear, as Freud pointed out in his Civilization And Its Discontents, that the achievement of guilt and its subsequent atonement is worth all the trouble:

> In any case, Heracles presents us with a curious contradiction. On the one hand he is all impulse, with his gross appetites and lack of restraint or foresight. On the other, he is a man engaged in chronic labor, with no release from suffering, no real love or enjoyment of life—a kind of unwitting adherent of the Protestant Work Ethic. Heracles is a civilizing force, but not civilized. He is proto-urban but not urban, chronically industrious without the capacity for sustained effort and self-denial. His is the blind and uncontrolled ambition out of which the capacity for civilization may accidentally arise. From his blocked pleasure derives the energy for cultural achievements. Yet he is, as noted, proto-urban, the force but not the product. He is like the crude lower-class racketeer who achieves economic success but not social respectability, and is rejected by his children for the very origins from which his success has insulated them.[1] (p.388)

In the same way that Heracles is captured by Hera's emotional snares, modern men are often subject to the same behavioral experiment both on a cultural level, and in their personal relationships. Routine inculcation of guilt saddles men with the feeling that they owe a debt, with a payback framed as servitude or slavery to the self-elected debtors.

Károly Kerényi, one of the founders of modern studies of Greek mythology, claims that Heracles demonstrates the characteristics of an archaic servant and rescuer of women.[2] If this is an accurate assessment, Hera not only exploited his gynocentric tendencies but seeded in him an enduring anxiety over masculine destructiveness and the associated guilt burden – an anxiety that may have played a part in the hero's eventual episodes of cross-dressing and other feminine displays.

Heracles engages in transvestitism

After completing his twelve labors, Heracles continued his adventures but he once again became subjected to exploitation and betrayal – this time by Eurytus, king of Oechalia. After his previous experiences, the new betrayals triggered a kind of PTSD response, sending him into a rage that resulted in him lashing out and killing the king's son, Iphitus. We are not told whether the crime was self-inspired or the result of madness inflicted on him by Hera, but whatever the case Heracles then descended into a serious bout of insanity.

Heracles was exhausted by these events and appealed for help to cure his madness, and to lift the burden of guilt. He was answered by the Delphic Oracle who advised him to accept another period of slavery in order to cleanse his soul from guilt and atone for his blood crime.

It followed that he was sold into slavery to queen Omphale of Lydia, a subservient role considered shameful for a man, especially to a woman from Lydia which was considered a barbarian nation. During his new period of servitude, which lasted three years, Heracles undertook numerous labors in a similar way to his period of servitude to Eurystheus (12 labors), though his new labors were often trivial and demeaning:

> There is general agreement that Heracles was Omphale's slave and lover, and there are many stories concerning the effeminacy to which the hero was reduced during this bondage. Later authors describe, and painters show, how the couple exchanged clothes—Omphale donning the lion pelt, Heracles her golden gown, slippers, and jewelry [Plutarch; "Whether an Old Man Should Engage in Public Affairs" 785E]. There are various elaborations on this theme, such as Heracles being forced to spin or carry Omphale's parasol, and a mistaken sexual approach to Heracles by Pan, but these are decidedly of later origin.[1] (p.379)

Hercules and Omphale, by Gustave Boulanger (1861)

Later references in texts or art depicted Omphale wearing the skin of the Nemean Lion and carrying Heracles' olive-wood club, while Heracles wore women's clothing while being forced to do various kinds of women's work which included holding a basket of wool while Omphale and her maidens did their spinning.

While Heracles engaged in episodes of transvestitism (he did this on two other occasions as well), we can assume his aim was not to become a female but to compensate for his previous existence. However, it's intriguing that he did so without complaint when he could easily have resisted and preserved his masculine integrity – after all it was considered absolutely shameful and denigrating for a man to behave this way.

Did Heracles secretly desire time-out as relief from his existence in guilty masculinity? He could easily have avoided this humiliation by employing his legendary strength to either refuse or escape, but it seems he may have viewed such effeminization as less burdensome than the crushing sense of guilt that came with his natural masculinity.

Rejecting the shame of being branded a 'toxic male' is the task of all men today, as it was throughout history. In extreme cases men might choose to renounce their masculinity as a means of compliance, and we might also wonder if this sentiment is at work for at least a portion of men who cross-dress, or identify as trans women. In such cases the solution tends to look more like a sickness than a cure.

The psychology of guilt

There's a basic formula showing how accusations of toxicity, and associated guilting of males, is used as a means to increase male labor and productivity – a result that works well to the benefit of women, companies, and the State.

That formula is stated simply as – Aggression, Guilt, Repair.

It refers to a psychological process that happens when someone commits an aggressive or slightly destructive act and they notice the damage they have caused (or are made to notice the damage by others). This triggers an automatic guilt reaction for feeling that one has damaged people they love or care about and, after feeling guilty, they move to repair the damage.

It doesn't matter whether the claims of destructiveness are accurate, somewhat trumped up, or completely fabricated; it has the same effect of generating concern in the minds of the accused, and they react with various attempts to fix the problem and smooth it over.

This formula is laid out by pediatric psychiatrist Donald Winnicott[3] who described the process already at work in earliest childhood. During the first years, infants already show a concern over the results of their own destructiveness. Thus, when an infant bites his mother's nipple hard, or screams and kicks, mother gets frustrated and upset and proceeds to walk away from the infant. At that moment the baby descends into a guilt state (becoming listless, crying, fearful), then when mother returns the baby goes all out trying to repair the damage – reaching out to hug mother, smiling, offering mother a rattle, etc. This again is the process of aggression – guilt – repair,[4] and it's a cycle repeated thousands of times during everyone's infancy.

The repair efforts, it goes almost without saying, are absolutely vital to any infant who is dependent on his mother for existence, and so we all carry that primal fear of loss when momma walks out of the room…… will she return? As a social and pair-bonding species the concern is real, and no-doubt hardwired. The concern might also explain the popular cliché "If momma aint happy, aint nobody happy!"

Winnicott says that such reparative gestures underlie all productivity and labor in the wider social space – ie. that people want to contribute into society to atone for supposed past destructiveness, and especially on behalf of future destructiveness that has not yet happened (and may never happen!). People want to feel good with the world, and so they work to store-up capital in their reparative bank accounts – usually in the form of labor and financial accumulation, though it could equally be in the currency of thoughtfulness, deference, verbal compliments and the like.

When we consider that the reparative gestures more often take the form of labor – especially men's labor – we could perhaps equally render Winnicott's formula as Aggression – Guilt – Labor, and lose nothing of its meaning.

Here we note that the phrase 'emotional labor' takes on a whole new, and very male sense.

On a more tangible level I've talked with a lot of men who admitted that when they feel they've done something bad, or that they've done something destructive in the eyes of their wife or partner, they go all-out trying to repair the damage. Not just giving her flowers, but they might labor around the yard or paint the interior of the house or some other manual task, and via these constant reparative gestures provide far more labor than would normally be the case. This unfortunately can become a sick game between couples; if a man (or woman) can be made to feel bad enough, and frequently enough, they become pathologically productive.

To that end, many men feel that their wives have become daughters of B. F. Skinner, regularly hearing the nagging din of “You’ve been very insensitive to me recently, and you haven’t even painted the house yet!”

Heracles life is paradigmatic of this cycle, showing the same pattern described by Winnicott in an endless loop; he commits destructive deeds, feels guilt and then attempts to repair the damage through hard labors. His desire to repair things often comes via contributing to society, by helpful assertions of strength to rid the world of monsters and lawless creatures, performing useful engineering feats, while at the same time vigorously denying any weakness that would slow him down. As Slater observes;

> The Heraclean myths also include the self-abasing strategy. This is inferred, not from his appearance as a buffoon in Attic drama, but from his role as a servant of the gods and a slave to women. He consistently performs “dirty work” for others, killing pests, cleaning the Augeian stables, herding cattle, reaping grain, and so on. Indeed, his entire life is one of suffering, servitude, and degradation, relieved only by his achievements and final apotheosis. From the slave of the cowardly Eurystheus he becomes the slave of Omphale, and is constantly being cheated of his wages (e.g., by Eurystheus, Augeias, Eurytus, and Laomedon).[1] (p.375)

Heracles, and every man like him who labors compulsively is motivated to repair what he unconsciously feels are the results of his own destructiveness — even his potential destructiveness that may never manifest in real behavior. The mere potential of destructiveness is enough to set the compulsive work cycle in motion, especially if under the watchful direction of a scold.

We can only imagine what the world would look like if men were not operating under pressure of guilt; it would probably look more like grass huts and animal-skin clothing than the marvels of civilization we see around us today. When it comes to measuring national productivity, the benchmark GDP should be equally interpreted as men’s Guilty Domestic Product.[5]

The mechanics of misandry

Misandry is not a simple scapegoating reflex, although that is a part of it. Misandric blaming is also an assist for increasing the power and enrichment of the State, of corporations, and of course women, because it increases men’s productivity.

The Heracles story highlights many elements of male existence, but especially misandry. Everybody disparages and treats him as toxic: Hera disparages him; the king he is in service to for 12 labors denigrates him; his Lydian slave-mistress demeans him, and so on. All through the story people are praising his legendary feats, but at the same time calling him toxic while he goes about his labors in an attempt to better both himself, and his reputation. Such denigration is where misandry derives its internal power, not only as a convenient method of scapegoating, but also as a built-in societal custom that ensures productivity.

That payoff is why misandry has remained normalized, but it doesn’t have to remain that way for conscious men.

Some of the phrases directed at men are proof of the desire to get men to labor; misandric phrasings like “You need to man up!” which often means a man needs to work harder. Men are called deadbeats (not producing enough money), ‘man-babies’ (for not wanting to overdo things nor put their health at risk), or Peter Pans (too busy enjoying life instead of working), or they may be characterized sarcastically as a ‘failure to launch’ (for younger men failing to rush headlong into a career and a job by which he can contribute his labor to society).

Or, in the recent past, what about the negative disparaging of a man as “gay” (whether he was or not), which implied such a man was failing to indenture himself in service womenfolk and family with some kind of productive contribution (gay men were busying themselves doing non-gynocentric things). On rare occasion a man might even assault or kill a homosexual man as if they were a proxy and reminder of his own beaten up, freedom-yearning soul. As ugly as this is, it provides an example of men’s indoctrination and internalized misandry that attempts to ‘put a man in his place,’ by violence if necessary.

In conclusion we can say that misandry is not only a vehicle for cathartic blame, but is more geared to ‘keep men in their place' – and that place is to be a provider. Women in the long-ago past were similarly subjected to these 'in your place' roles, but those days are long gone in most developed nations.

It is now men's turn to break the cycle and say no to imputed guilt, or at least refuse to make genuine guilt available for others to exploit. If you fail to protect yourself in this regard, you are on a fast track to slavery and, in all likelihood, are already there.

References

[1]. Philip Slater, The Glory Of Hera: Greek Mythology and The Greek Family, Beacon Press, (1968)
[2]. Károly Kerényi, The Heroes of The Greeks, Thames & Hudson, (1952)
[3]. Donald Winnicott, The Development Of A Capacity For Concern (1963), Chapter 6 in The Maturational Process And The Facilitating Environment, International universities Press, (1965)
[4]. Donald Winnicott, Aggression, Guilt and Reparation (1960), Chapter 16 in Deprivation And Delinquency, Tavistock Publications, (1984)
[5]. Note: for those who are inclined to take comments literally, rest assured this comment about grass huts (and GDP) is intended hyperbole.

Proof positive that feminists don't care about women

Robert Brockway · 5 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

There is a medical condition that is easily corrected, is debilitating if not corrected, is generally cheap to correct, and only affects women. It is a huge problem in the developing world, currently thought to affect over two million women.[1]

Many developing countries lack the infrastructure to correct this condition among the many women who are impacted. Despite being easily and cheaply corrected, many of the women who live in these countries can't afford to pay for the operation to correct this condition.

The condition is known as an obstetric fistula. It normally occurs as a result of complications in giving birth and results in a tear between the vagina and the bladder or the vagina and the rectum. This results in urine or feces being discharged by the woman through the vagina. Women afflicted by this condition are unfortunately often ostracised by their communities. Even those that are not excluded from their communities are effectively housebound due the nature of the condition. Naturally this can result in a variety of mental and physical ailments.

In contrast, women in wealthy countries rarely have to concern themselves. Although very rare, obstetric fistulas still happen occasionally as a result of birth complications in wealthy countries but they are normally fixed quickly after the birth with a small operation.

The cost to correct an obstetric fistula is estimated to be around US$100-400 per patient in the developing world.[2]

That's a tiny price to pay to give someone their life back. So here we have a condition that:

- Is easily corrected
- Is debilitating if not corrected
- Is generally cheap to correct
- Only affects women

Given these characteristics it would be an ideal issue for western feminists to focus on. They could raise money for their sisters in the developing world, allowing hospitals and the medical clinics to buy the equipment and medicines they need and train staff so that they could work on fixing this serious problem today and in to the future.

But that hardly happens. Hospitals and clinics in the developing world are devoid of resources and have a shortage of staff trained to deal with this problem.

Feminists, as it turns out, do very little to help correct this problem.

There are clinics that specialise in this condition of course. One notable clinic in Ethiopia, the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital was started decades ago by two physicians, a husband and wife team from New Zealand and Australia respectively, and continues to function today.[4] It continues to function with a shortage of resources to address this problem. Where are the feminists?

The fact that obstetric fistulas are a common and well known problem among the medical fraternity around the world means that feminists cannot explain their inaction through ignorance. There are many feminist doctors who would know of this condition and who could make the problem known among the wider feminist community. In any case, feminists do occasionally talk about the topic.[5] Apparently this doesn't extend to actually doing much about it.

They even occasionally mention organisations like the Fistula Foundation that do work to correct this problem.[6][7] The response from feminists, though, seems to be mild disinterest at best.

An operation to easily and cheaply correct this condition has been available for decades and yet we hear little from the feminists.

If feminists focussed on this serious issue rather than telling us all about mansplaining, manspreading and manslamming they might actually help some women who are in desperate need.

The lackadaisical approach of feminists to the problem of obstetric fistulas is proof positive that feminists don't care about women.

- ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2621054/
- ↑ http://www.biomedcentral.com/1471-2490/11/23
- ↑ http://hamlinfistula.org/
- ↑ http://www.motherjones.com/mojo/2007/12/what-now-feminist-fatigue-and-global-quest-womens-rights
- ↑ https://radicalhubarchives.wordpress.com/
- ↑ https://radicalhubarchives.wordpress.com/2011/05/27/the-fistula-foundation/

Down and Dirty

Doug Mortimer · 7 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

My regular light rail travels regularly take me past a mural that depicts a plumber standing tall above a crowd of people with planet earth in the background. The picture is captioned "The plumber protects the health of the nation."

Now I have heard any number of stories about what is or is not in our public water supply, so I can't say with assurance that my precious bodily fluids are enhanced or degraded by tap water. On the other hand, it is probably better than a lot of the alternatives. Despite the blandishments of beer advertisements, even a "pristine" mountain stream may have moose dukey, grizzly whiz, bobcat hairballs, and who knows what else in it.

Tap water aside, there is no doubt that piping unclean water out of one's house is important. Before indoor plumbing became the norm, the well-to-do built their homes on hilltops not just because of the view but because sewage flows downhill. Hence the hoi-polloi on the flatlands were awash in the excretions of their betters. And you thought "Take the high ground" was some sort of military maxim!

Well, thanks to indoor plumbing, the mountaineers and the plainsmen can now relieve themselves secure in the knowledge that dirty water (cue the Standells!) will be safely transported to a municipal waste treatment plant. Unfortunately, because indoor plumbing has been around for generations, it is taken for granted by everyone in first-world countries…until the day it stops working.

That day came for me a few weeks ago. Peeking into the crawl space under my house, I quickly realized that something was wrong. The sewage pipes, only four years younger than Joe Biden, were cracked and water was seeping out of them. Now if it was just a small amount of shower water or dishwater seeping into the ground under my house, it might not be a huge problem. But the contents of the toilet…

So it was time to call the plumber. The diagnosis was dire: complete replacement of all sewage pipes. Patching up the leaks was not an option. The pipes were shot. The estimate to do the needed work in compliance with local codes ran into five figures!

To be sure, the financial hit was a downer; almost as bad was the weeklong disruption of plumbers in and under the house (it was necessary to dig holes on the east and west sides of the house). Then there was the occasional shutoff of the water, prompting me to come up with a modern riff on the chamberpot. If you are male, a No. 1 is not a big challenge. As the saying goes, "the world is your urinal." No. 2, however, requires a more labor-intensive response. I thought about digging a latrine but I don't have a privacy fence and the neighbors surely would have noticed. I won't gag you by describing what I did, so I'm going to take the Filth – I mean, the Fifth – Amendment on that. I'm not an expert on public health policy but I might have violated it.

Plumbing was probably the origin of the phrase, "It's a dirty job but somebody's got to do it." Now some dirty jobs are low-skill and do not pay well. Plumbing, however, is skilled labor, and given the ubiquity of pipes, job security is pretty well assured. I'm assuming that a large chunk of the money I paid to the plumbing company went to the plumbers themselves. I do not begrudge them one penny. The list of jobs I have no desire to do is very long and plumbing is writ large on that list. I don't have the skills, I don't have the tools, I don't have the DIY gene. What I do have is advanced age, which hardly whets my appetite for such activity.

The plumber in charge was Hispanic; one helper was white, the other black. Huzzah! Diversity! Inclusion! Equity! But no women, despite all those droll references to male and female plumbing in my Biology 101 class. Sadly, the same paucity of females applies to repairmen (repairpersons hasn't caught on – yet) for your local gas company, electric company, or telecommunications company.

Of course, I'm assuming none of the guys who worked on my house was a masculine-presenting trans woman. Come to think of it, not one of the plumbers mentioned anything about preferred pronouns when he introduced himself to me! Can you believe that? In this day and age?

Old-timers may remember Comet cleanser commercials featuring a spokeswoman called Josephine the Plumber. She was not stunning and amazing, she was just making a woman-to-woman sales pitch. The character was played by Jane Withers, a longtime character actress in movies and TV who would have been a familiar face to viewers if not a household word. Today Procter & Gamble has jumped on the neoliberal bandwagon (see u.s.pg.com/equality-and-inclusion) but in those days they were just trying to make a buck.

According to careerexplorer.com, only 3% of plumbers are female. Yet the same web site informs us that 17.3% of women have expressed interest in becoming plumbers. So how to account for that 14.3% difference between desires and reality? Must be sexism! I'm sure it couldn't be that women took a closer look at what the job involves and decided it's not for them after all.

Frankly, I seriously doubt that 17.3% of all women have pondered becoming plumbers. Actually, I'm surprised that 3% are plumbers. I'm not surprised there are no harridans haranguing plumbers trade associations or pushing for equity. Let me repeat the phrase, "It's a dirty job but somebody's got to do it"? Aside from the changing of diapers, this phrase does not apply to women and they know it…but will not say so in public.

In my case, the initial dirty job was performed by the excavation crew digging holes and tunnels so the plumbers could have the pleasure of squirming and wriggling under my house on cold, damp mornings. Granted, it was a walk in the park compared to The Great Escape, but I wouldn't be at all surprised if plumbing companies don't have some sort of psychological screening tests for their employees, just as the U.S. Navy has for sailors who aspire to submarine duty.

So I guess this is a roundabout way of endorsing plumbing as a career. The entry level pay appears decent and the demand for skilled practitioners is unrelenting. Robots need not apply – not yet anyway. Granted, upward mobility is limited, unless you open your own business. But if you have just graduated from high school and want to be a working-class hero, plumbing provides you with the card-carrying cred you need. On the other hand, you could go to college and pontificate about the plight of workers and never have to do any real work yourself – no, summer internships don't count.

When Covid was big we heard a lot about "essential" jobs. I never heard anybody actually define "essential," but I'm going to give it a stab. An "essential" job is one that has undesirable effects if it is not performed well and performed timely. Unfortunately, essential is definition-fluid. A number of people deemed essential during Covid discovered they were expendable if they were "vaccine-hesitant." But that is another topic entirely.

However you define it, "essential" is not a synonym for "prestigious." For that reason, most parents would prefer their sons borrow a shitload of money for college rather than learn a trade that might occasionally bring them into contact with a load of shit.

Consequently, you will find no plumbers among the 1%, the chattering classes, the elitists, the brahmins, or whatever you want to call our overlords. Yet how "essential" are those who fancy themselves masters of the universe?

If the President – the leader of the free world (sic) – craps the bed, there is someone waiting in the wings to take over. Discontinuity of government is not an option. More importantly, the White House toilets would still work.

If a cuckoo Swiss nationalist added cyanide to the Swiss cheese at a wine and cheese social at the World Economic Forum, Davos would be otherwise unaffected and its toilets would still work.

If all the attendees at a faculty meeting at Harvard University were taken out by a suicide bomber from UMassBoston, the university's $42 billion endowment would survive and the campus toilets would still work.

If all the legacy media go bankrupt, their headquarters buildings could easily be rehabbed and rented out for other purposes so long as the toilets still work.

If a major social media corporation is bought out by a rogue billionaire and adopts a free speech policy…oh, wait, that's not speculative. Well, so far Twitter is still functioning – and the toilets at their San Francisco headquarters still work.

Of course, when I say the toilets will still work, I'm assuming that the pipes aren't clogged with tampons.

Not to belabor a point, life will go on so long as plumbers and other essential tradesmen go on. There is an old adage that says, "The graveyards are filled with indispensable men." The same is true of essential men. But rest assured life will go on so long as we continue to train essential men.

If plumbers went on strike worldwide you would soon notice the difference. The stench would be overwhelming. Given enough time, the old refrain "Bring out your dead" would make a comeback.

You don't have to go out of your way to support your local plumber. Sooner or later you will need to call upon him.

Because shit happens.

True Gender Equality

AVfM Video Source · 7 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In 2014 Adrien Martinon was a 17 year old High School student in his last year at the International School of Panama. He comes from a Panamanian mother and a French father, and grew up speaking Spanish and French simultaneously. He went to the French school Paul Gauguin in Panama, only really coming into contact with English until 6th grade, when he entered the International School of Panama.

Adrien is an International Baccalaureate student, yet has a lot of other interests outside of academics. He enjoys reading fiction, and is deeply intrigued by Philosophy, Physics, and the study of different cultures. When he can, he practices Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu and loves Thai boxing. He is in full support of equality within a society, whether it is by race, nationality, or gender.

He identifies as an egalitarian before anything, but became highly interested in the Men's Human Rights Movement spreading across Canada and the United States. He wishes to raise attention to the ways in which men are discriminated against, due to misconceptions about gender roles and traditional values. He hopes he can bring a change to the way people view men's issues.

He would like men and women to feel comfortable discussing them and working towards solving them.

What is the “Duluth Model” & how does it affect gay men?

AVfM Video Source · 8 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A Sex-Positive Argument Against Abortion Entitlements

Vernon Meigs · 9 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A day will come when I will speak in more detail about my viewpoints on the abortion subject, but I will not be as comprehensive today. However, I notice often enough that those who profess to be pro- female agency are preoccupied with the subject of abortion in particular, and as such would voice their support in granting access to it. In response to this strange preoccupation, I will be, in this capacity, speaking about the subject of abortion for the first time, and will attempt to dissect this and determine whether female agency actually has anything to do with this.

There has been much speculation and wondering about why abortion, of all things, is the primary right that feminists and the left have pushed at the expense of almost all other rights, even if they do affect women's liberties and agency anyway (e.g. the COVID-19 vaccine and mask mandates and lack of support for female right to bear arms for self-defense, to name but a small amount.) You then have to stop and wonder whether these pro-abortion feminists, in their sense of aggrieved gynocentric entitlement, care about liberties at all for women as opposed to entitlements and benefits at the expense of societal (read: male) service. If abortion is in fact an entitlement (a "positive right") as opposed to a liberty (a "negative right"), in other words if abortion is a phenomenon based on societal obligations to cater to feminine mistakes as opposed to an exercise in female liberty and agency, then the female agency argument for abortion collapses.

If negative rights are the only proper rights we should care about, then we should perhaps completely dispose of the idea of abortion rights, as they are entitlements. "Abortion entitlements" is perhaps the descriptor we should start using instead of "abortion rights". If we can honestly say "Male genital mutilation" instead of the euphemism "circumcision", then this can be the abortion equivalent. Even if we entertain, just for a moment, the idea that an abortion is a medical procedure of no moral question, abortion rights would not (or should not) exist any more than any other medical procedure. Nobody has a right to a medical procedure. Anything that grants a right positively is an entitlement, and is in contradiction to the very idea of liberty. You're not wrong when you say, "Well, feminists don't care about liberty then." They don't, and that's their big problem.

Let's take a look at what female agency would actually look like in practice, if those squawking lip service about the subject actually mean it. Better yet, let's look at it in a pro-sex context and not an anti-sex/abstinence-centered context. Access to contraceptives is, for all intents and purposes, easy attained in today's society. Women have every liberty and agency to earn these goods at the very least. Any sort of given contraception can be assumed as less invasive and strenuous than the actual procedure of abortion (on a sidenote, is it not ironic that feminists cry rape about something as subtle as a man winking at them, but welcome with open arms [er, legs] this invasive procedure?) For the woman who sees no qualms with sexual activity outside of the context of marital childbearing, her demonstration of agency would be a conscientious adherence to the steps that prevent conception from happening both before and during the act, and a vigilant self-reminder that sex can result in conception if she fails to control these details.

It is worth noting that I do not see eye to eye with those that primarily promote sexual abstinence for the sake of sexual abstinence. Attempts at abstinence-only education has, in my opinion, been no more effective in teaching the realities of sex than any attempts at sex-education which doesn't prioritize accountability. Whether contraceptives exist or not, the drive for sex is unstoppable as far as I am concerned, and neither do I consider it an evil act but instead a life-affirming act for both men and women. Those obsessed with abstinence as a solution to the abortion problem are no less contrite and misguided as those who think the right to abortion is a morally legitimate bypass to the consequences of sex. I would go as far as to say that abstinence-only mindsets stifle a sense of discipline during otherwise unabashed sexual activity for both men and women; it is either perfect lack of sexual activity (impractical) or undisciplined and irresponsible sexual activity (not commendable) that one ultimately has to choose from without a generally sex-positive mindset that entails every precaution. Though, this is a subject for perhaps another time to go into detail.

Anyway, back to the main point. If female agency was advocated in earnest, the priorities would entail precautionary steps to mitigate, possibly eliminate, the risk of conception, and also the complete willingness to face and accept the consequences if conception happens despite everything. To the chagrin of feminists, another detail to be entailed in female agency is that in a society consistent with actual agency, she will receive no entitlements in the form of tax- (again read: male) funded assistance.

The funny thing is, the mitigation of conception does not take excessive effort for the sexual-but-conscientious. Female sexual agency for those that do not want a child has frankly never been easier to exercise. In the vast majority of circumstances there is no good excuse for getting into a situation where you have to have or abort a child.

And that is what the abortion advocates want to ultimately attain – the abnegation of accountability of women from doing simple due diligence for sexual acts. No abnegation of accountability exists in a vacuum; somebody, some group, always picks up the slack. I am of course talking about the forcible extraction of funds in the form of taxation to fund groups like Planned Parenthood to avail abortion services. The very fact that this setup exists indicates that the people generally have to be forced to fund such things, and that actual demand of it aside from the loud aggrieved feminists in the higher-ups is lesser than one may realize. Those that support this have no business talking about female rights or agency. It is an entitlement, especially considering that men's money is forcibly siphoned into this system.

To complain that contraceptive measures are "too hard" is a sign of assuming the role of a non-accountable child whose mistakes must be tended to by others. In any case, it is almost unbelievable to me that even the most entitled-minded women would opt away from the due diligence over something much more drastic. This indicates that the alleged virtues of abortion for its own sake are marketed in lieu of actual female liberty.

So much energy has been spent on demanding that abortion so readily available that not nearly as much energy has been going to improving existing contraceptives and increasing prospects for male contraception. For all this talk about controlling whether a woman wants to be a mother, by comparison not nearly as much mind has been paid to eliminating abortion as something that factors into the sexual liberation question altogether. So much for being supposedly pro-sex; they are not really even interested in improving the prospects for sexual experience or at least lifting the weight off of the minds of the participants. The preoccupation seems to be to abort a fetus in progress. This is analogous to trying to "improve" lobotomies with better tools, as opposed to rendering lobotomies obsolete altogether. Is it not more consistent to advocate for female sexual agency by making abortion a relic of the past?

The advocacy to normalize and make abortions frequent represents nothing more than a declaration that women don't have a proactive hand in their own pregnancy. Considering that feminism has a history of categorizing heterosexual sex as a variety of rape as perpetuated by male upon female, this is not a surprising position to expect from their camp. But with the strong implication that a woman has no responsibility in her involved sexual act, it is then assumed that she is not involved with the very act of cultivating the fetus where it will not survive if they terminate the pregnancy. The fetus on the natural trajectory of becoming a human being with his or her own agency is something conveniently left out of the conversation by abortion supporters, except those that voice openly that they want to kill it (their words).

Obsession with abortion access is not about female agency, but the opposite. It is the denial of such agency by use of a safety net rewarding women for their mistakes, with men made to pick up the slack. It is nothing short of gynocentric coddling, and an unhinged sense of entitlement.

[Australia] A Current Affair: Controversial sex coach confronted outside court

AVfM Video Source · 10 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Omelets, marriage and MGTOW

Andrew DiKaiomata · 11 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I make omelets my own way. By that, I mean exactly like you'd see in any cookbook. I whisk some eggs, melt some butter in a frying pan, pour the eggs in along with some cheese and maybe some other things for filling. What, you might ask, makes it my own way? The fact that it's me doing it.

I also go my own way to work in the morning. The highway and during rush hour with thousands of other people. Each of them also going their own way. Why do I say I'm going my own way to work? Simply because it's me doing it. Now you'd think that's hardly my own way. If I were to go my own way to work, you'd think it would mean in some way fundamentally different – and you'd be right.

Like men going their own way.

If you were to imagine going out on your own, on your own way, you might expect that would mean something like MGTOW, that you are free from outside control, not dependent on another's authority.

You might envision someone shrugging off society's yolk, refusing to self-sacrifice and being one's own boss. That's what MGTOW is, even though a man certainly has the right to place himself in danger, to sacrifice himself for another, and to support others, he chooses not to. He goes his own way, in his life, in his choices, he remains sovereign.

Marriage is dangerous for men, it's sacrificial and compels the man into support for his wife or ex-wife. In marriage, a man necessarily compromises, gives up sole control over his life and his property. As with the earliest known MGTOW groups "The Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band" it was acknowledged that MGTOW and marriage could not co-exist.

Now what about this concept of MGTOW simply meaning male self-determination? This is such a gross over-simplification as to completely change the concept. MGTOW can be better thought of as a second or third order male self-determination. That is, a man who is determined to maintain and preserve his self-determination and determined to refuse anything that might infringe on his future self-determinism.

For example, a man has the right, and could have his own self-determination to join the military, but joining the military greatly reduces a man's self-determination. A soldier cannot go his own way. After he is no longer under military obligation, he could be MGTOW, yet while active, he no longer has his autonomy, independence and sovereignty. In the same way, a married man cannot be MGTOW.

Hopefully, I've already addressed possible rebuttals. Yes, men ought to have the maximum amount of choices, autonomy, freedom and options. Yet, the movement is not simply a group of men making choices from options they have. That understanding would not be recognizable to hardly anyone professing to be MGTOW. I won't be appealing to the dictionary to say that MGTOW are by definition unmarried, but rather re-iterate that the philosophy and reason for existing preclude marriage, since MGTOW can be better understood as a second or third order self-determinism.

MGTOW is not simply about men making their own choices. It's about making the choices that ensure further choices and maximum freedoms.

No man is under obligation to be MGTOW, but if you choose to sell yourself into government slavery (whether martial or marital), you are not MGTOW. If a man is married, he can be a great guy, he could live a great life, he could wake up sympathetic and with a desire to be MGTOW but he is not MGTOW. That's how the movement understands itself, that's what its philosophy prescribes and that's simply what MGTOW is.

Scoring With Chicks

Doug Mortimer · 12 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

League Baseball is big business, and like any modern corporation MLB genuflects to DEI (diversity-equity-inclusion). It's important to get those words in alphabetical order because you don't want the acronym to be DIE.

Of course, MLB lives up to DEI on the field, since the players are recruited from all over the world. This expansion of the talent pool has inevitably resulted in a dwindling number of African-Americans (all Americans, actually) and MLB has bent over backwards to address this issue. Aside from this grievance, however, there is little in the way of DEI complaints so far as player rosters go – with one major exception. Yes, sports fans, on the field, MLB is still a boys club.

Given the global talent pool of male ballplayers and the scarcity of MLB roster spots (780 at any one time), a female ballplayer is highly unlikely – unless some reasonably talented male ballplayer pulls a Lia Thomas and supplements his jockstrap with a matching sports bra.

Alyssa Nakken, an Assistant Coach with the San Francisco Giants (believe it or not, the team's web site lists 16 coaches), made headlines earlier this season when she took over first base coaching duties after the regular first base coach was ejected from the game. In doing so, she became the first woman in an MLB uniform to appear on the field. Impressive, right? Well, not really.

Had the third base coach been ejected, Nakken likely would not have been the replacement, as the third base coach's responsibilities are greater than those of his first base counterpart. So sending Nakken to the first base box was a low-risk PR move from manager Gabe Kapler, a notoriously woke manager (he used to take a knee for BLM during the National Anthem). In fairness, the manager of a professional sports team in ultra-woke San Francisco may be forced to go along to get along. But a manager's paycheck depends on winning ballgames, so even Kapler would never do anything that would jeopardize the outcome of a game.

Nakken notwithstanding, if MLB is going to shoehorn females into the mix, it will have to do so off the field. To date the most prominent effort in that regard was the hiring of Kim Ng (an Asian female – a DEI double-header) as General Manager of the Miami Marlins. Sports headlines nationwide hailed her as the first female GM in MLB history (there have been female team owners in the past). The phrase "glass ceiling" was oft mentioned, understandably so. The hiring of Ng was not window dressing, as the GM makes all team personnel decisions, including trades and free agent signings, and is thus responsible for the makeup of the roster and hence the success of the team. But even this hire is not quite as bold as it appears at first blush.

The Marlins have perhaps the lowest profile of any MLB team. They drew just 642,617 fans last year (7,933 per opening) with a record of 67-95. Since coming into the National League in 1993 (they were originally known as the Florida Marlins), they have never been an elite team, aside from two outlier years (1997 and 2003) when they won the World Series. Their composite franchise record is 2,099 -2,438. So the stakes are low. If the team improves, Kim Ng will be hailed as a genius, not just a pioneer. Of course, if the team doesn't improve or gets worse…well, she can also make history as the first female GM to be fired…which doesn't mean she won't be characterized as a victim of sexism.

Granted, Ng's resume appears to have all the boxes checked, but if any of the 29 male GM's had an identical resume it would be business as usual. Ng will surely have a longer leash with the Marlins than she would with the Red Sox, Yankees, or Dodgers (all three teams formerly employed her in lesser positions), where also-ran seasons are not permissible. In fact, she interviewed with the Dodgers for the GM position in 2005. Whether she was a serious candidate or was cast as the ingenue in DEI theater is open to debate.

Glass ceilings aside, MLB teams, like any other business, employ females in a variety of jobs. For the most part, these are the usual office jobs (secretaries, bookkeepers, receptionists, etc.) that are part and parcel of any business, but MLB gets no brownie points for these hirings. There are precious few Kim Ngs out there, so what to do? Well, it is possible to insert women into a seemingly high-profile job with little risk. This has been done in the past with such jobs as batboy/girl or public address announcers. The latest position is that of official scorer.

MLB is pretending that official scorekeeping is a big deal. It is an increasingly rare skill but it used to be all but ubiquitous among baseball fans. In fact, it was truly "democratic." In days of yore, male and females in the stands regularly kept score. In fact, you didn't need to be an adult. If you were a child, you didn't need to be a boy. No one ever ripped a pencil out of a little girl's hand and told her it was unfeminine to keep score.

I don't remember who taught me to keep score or when the tutelage took place – in fact, now that I think about it, I might have been self-taught. I can't remember a time when I didn't do it. I still do it today but when I look around, I'm often the only fan keeping score. This is true at major league, minor league, or college games. Every now and then some puzzled youngster will ask me what I'm doing. Some people ask me what team I'm scouting for! Scoring a baseball game has assumed the status of arcane knowledge reserved for the priestly caste.

Official scorers used to be retired sportswriters earning a few extra bucks. They knew the rules of baseball and had been dealing with scorecards and box scores, the kissing cousin of scorecards, all their lives, so why look elsewhere to fill the position? Of course, since sportswriters often kept score for teams they had covered, accusations of being a "homer" were sometimes leveled.

Today official scorers may work exclusively for one team but they are employed by Major League Baseball and are paid per game. The pay rate is now $170 per game, which doesn't sound bad, but given the increasingly glacial pace of major league games (3 hours, 10 minutes, and 7 seconds in 2021), it isn't all that great on an hourly basis, considering the pre- and post-game duties. In truth, a family of four will likely spend more than $170 attending a major league game.

If a scorer works all 81 home games of a major league team the annual pay will amount to $13,770, hardly a livable wage, especially in a large metro area. On the other hand, suppose you are an official scorer and you find yourself at a cocktail party. While schmoozing and boozing , inevitably you are asked, "So what do you do?" If you reply "Major league scorekeeper," the eyebrows of your inquisitor will likely rise and invite further conversation. The job position basks in the reflected glory of big league sports but it is not a high status position. If it were, the pay would be better.

There is a good reason why the pay is low. Trust me, scorekeeping isn't that difficult. Anyone can get the hang of it after a few games and most scorecards come with instructions.

As with accounting, most of it is bookkeeping: putting the right numbers in the right columns and rows. As with umpiring, the overwhelming majority of plays are self-evident. A groundout to the second baseman is a groundout to the second baseman, whether you score it 4-3 or GO 2B (though the former is more "professional"). Non-official scorekeepers have any number of options. Phil Rizzuto, a former Yankee player and broadcaster, came up with "WW," which stands for "wasn't watching."

The close play is where scorekeepers – and umpires – earn their pay. Umpiring, however, has been transformed by the slow-motion instant replay. A bad call can be reversed. The scorekeeper merely records the final call. An understanding of the rules is essential, but the umpire enforces the rules, not the scorekeeper.

The moment of truth for the scorekeeper comes when a batted ball could be a hit or an error. Some miscues are all too obvious. A fielder is required to offer "ordinary effort" on any play. Of course, ordinary effort, like "reasonable," is subjective. Whether a batter reached base on a hit or an error makes no difference in the outcome of the game. A hit may be an error or vice versa, but a baserunner is a baserunner, a run is a run. As far as the team goes, it makes little difference. But it can make all the difference to a player.

Consider a pitcher in the late stages of a potential no-hitter, or a batter in a tight race for the batting title in the waning days of the season. Baseball history aside, many players have contracts with incentive clauses, so a questionable call may cost them money.

Replays also assist scorekeepers by giving them a chance to ponder a play (in my experience, however, your initial call is most likely the correct one). Even so, there are gray areas requiring the official scorekeeper to make a judgment call, but we're not dealing with decisions of Supreme Court magnitude. The stakes are small but Major League Baseball is trying to make people believe otherwise by showcasing its newly minted female official scorers.

On Opening Day this year, female official scorers were chronicling the games for the Arizona Diamondbacks, the Colorado Rockies, the Miami Marlins, and the San Francisco Giants. The Cincinnati Reds and the San Diego Padres have also hired female official scorers who were on duty when those teams opened their home schedules. It would be wrong to call them pioneers, however.

Jillian Geib, working with Colorado, performed the duty last year for the team. The Toronto Blue Jays also had Marie-Claude Pelland from 2015 to 2017. A few decades ago, the Giants and the Oakland A's utilized Susan Fornoff, a sportswriter who had been among the first females to gain access to the locker room – and she didn't have to identify as a man! The concept of male space still had some backers in those days, and she had numerous run-ins with A's slugger Dave Kingman, whose career might have ended prematurely as a result of the feud.

When scorekeepers were exclusively male, the job was not that big a deal. Yet women who do the job today are hailed as pioneers. The standard definition of a female pioneer is a woman who performs a function that men take for granted. They do not "boldly go where no man has gone before." Pioneering and "ladies first" are contradictory.

Of course, MLB isn't going to hire female scorekeepers without virtue signaling – or should I say grandstanding, since we're talking baseball. The official scorekeeper is invisible to anyone not in the press box. Given the feminist mantra "If you can see it, you can be it," it is essential to draw attention to these women to persuade little girls to shun coloring books in favor of scorecards.

Now if you are a baseball team in search of a scorer, it should not be a difficult position to fill. You could probably go to any of the SABR (Society for American Baseball Research) chapters (68 in the USA alone) and find plenty of candidates. It would be a simple matter to audition candidates by having them score the same games and then picking the best. Also, it would be easy to do it anonymously, assigning each applicant a number. There was a time when that sort of procedure was considered enlightened. Today, however, the passion for outcome-based hiring only discourages the best and the brightest.

To assure a DEI applicant pool, MLB came up with Official Scorers University last year. The official motive for the program was not so much to hire scorekeepers but to improve diversity (for the record, they also signed up two black men and one Hispanic man). It is safe to assume that they hired no trans people. Why? Because if they had, believe me, ESPN would still be yakking about it. Jackie Robinson, move over!

Since there are only 30 official scorekeepers in MLB and the pay is low, the consequences to the manosphere are minimal. But it is symbolic of the "do the right thing" corporate policies that men have to contend with in other pursuits.

Of course, there are policies and there are rules. Even non-baseball fans have heard of the infamous 1919 Black Sox scandal, which involved Chicago White Sox players throwing the World Series. They broke the rules, and then as now, when the game on the field was rigged, heads rolled. But behind the scenes, it's perfectly acceptable to rig the outcome of hiring practices so long as you can invoke DEI.

I guarantee you there is no entry for DEI in the 2022 Official Rules of Major League Baseball.

Johnny Depp Amber Heard Trial Theme Song. Objection! Hearsay!

AVfM Video Source · 13 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

[Australia] A Current Affair: Mum forced to live in shipping container after gifting daughter home

AVfM Video Source · 14 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The danger of male celibacy (1707)

Peter Wright · 15 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following discussion between two women Eliza and Mariana was published in 1707 AD under the title Female Grievances: Dialogues between two Young Ladies concerning Love and Marriage. The discussion shows that even back in the 1700's women were trying to limit men's freedom and stop men from living as bachelors. – PW

THE BACHELOR TAX

Female Grievances Debated
IN SIX DIALOGUES
Between Two YOUNG LADIES, CONCERNING
Love and Marriage.
VIZ.
I. Proving that Women, as well as Men, are Inclin'd to LOVE, and equally desirous of Propagating their Kind.
II. Shewing what Love is; its Sorts & Power, and the difference between Love & Lust.
III. How to discern whether a Man or Woman be in LOVE.
IV. Directions for Young Ladies prudent Managing the Affairs of LOVE.
V. Of MARRIAGE: That it is the Duty of every Person to Marry, unless there be a Lawful Impediment.
VI. The Unreasonableness and Injustice of Marrying for MONEY; and the great Misfortunes that frequently attend such as do.
To which are added,
Proposals for an Act to Enforce Marriage & for Taxing such Batchelors as refuse to Marry.
WITH THE Danger of Celibacy to a Nation.

Eliza: Amongst all the female grievances we have hitherto debated there still remains one we have not yet touch'd upon. There are an abundance of bachelors who, thro' a cowardly apprehension of the cares and troubles of the marry'd state, are so fearful of entering into it, that they would rather run the hazard of damning their souls with the repeated sin of fornication, than they will honestly engage in Wedlock to procreate within those reasonable bounds which the united laws of both God and man have both religiously appointed: Therefore methinks it would well become the care of a Parliament to redress this grievance, so very hurtful to the Kingdom in general, as well as to our sex in particular, by some compulsary law that should enforce Marriage upon all single sinners who otherwise will never keep a cow of their own whilst a quart of milk is to be brought for a penny.

Mariana: I'll assure you I like your thoughts very well, for if we consider rightly, we can allow bachelors to be no other than drones in the great-hive of the Common-wealth, that enjoy without reason, the advantage of marry'd peoples labours, in having their liberties and estates secur'd by the loss of other men's lives, and will not be industrious to repair from their own loins the native strength of the Kingdom, for tho' they have not continence enough to forebear the pleasure, yet the liberty they take is with such common strumpets, who by their debaucheries and distempers, are render'd wholly incapable of producing any serviceable fruits of their sinful labours. Therefore pray let us lay our heads together and consult of some proposals that might move our Senate to a wise consideration of this weighty matter.

Eliza: Pray, cousin, do you begin and propose one clause and I another, and so we'll proceed till we have digested our project into so many several heads, that may be an ease to the Senate if ever we should hereafter petition the House to bring in a Bill for the Advancement of the Church and the suppression of Vice, and the improvement of the native strength of Her Majesties Kingdom in a lawful way.

Mariana: With all my heart; you would have me begin, so accordingly I'll proceed to the business, vis:

> That every bachelor above the age of twenty, and childless widower under the age of fifty, shall be obliged to marry within the circle of one year, commencing from the date of the Act, or else be liable to be press'd into > the Sea or Land Service (after the expiration of the Term limited) when ever Her Majesties Forces shall need a further recruit.

Eliza: That their personal effects shall be all sequester'd by the government, and be distributed by an Almoner for that purpose, into the hands of so many trustees, chosen out of every Parish, for the better supporting and maintaining all such poor children as have lost their fathers in defence of the Kingdom, and the overplus to be disposed of amongst those miserable husbands who are plagued with scolding wives and smoky houses.

Mariana: That an alms house shall be built and endow'd for the reception of all such childless widowers and bachelors as shall, by reason of their low stature, crookedness, weakness, or any other infirmities whatsoever, be judg'd unfit for His Majesty's Service; and that every such widower or bachelor shall be allowed one warm frize gown every year with a yellow badge upon the right arm, upon which shall be stamped an Ape in a string, and under shall be engraven this motto:

Who dies an old maid leads apes when she's dead;
But he that hates wiving shall lead 'em whilst living.

That every single member shall have a convenient apartment to himself, with a bed, two pair of coarse sheets, one leathern chair, one earthen candlestick, a green chamber-pot, and a little grate, and every ten of them shall have an old woman to wait upon 'em, and to hand 'em their water-gruel, barley-broth, turnips, carrots and potatoes; for that they shall not be allow'd any other food than soop, herbs and roots, because they have forfeited the Liberty of an Englishman, by not loving the flesh in a righteous way, therefore they ought not to indulge their vicious appetites.

Eliza: O sye, Madam, should we put such a cruel article upon the poor gentlemen it would be constru'd as downright tyranny, beyond all president.

Mariana: I am sorry to see you so tender of those who are so cruel to us, whoever refuses out of obstinacy to comply with the Term has resolved himself into a state of insufficiency, choosing rather to suffer than to marry; therefore we ought to consider them as much superanuated as to our sex, as if he were fourscore, but no infirmity ought to be allowed a good reason against a man's marrying; for tho' he is unable to get children, he is nevertheless able to father 'em; therefore, I think, all those that stand out in contempt of wedlock, cannot be dealt with too severely.

Eliza: Truly, cousin, upon second thoughts I must agree with you that they cannot be use'd to hardly. But, I doubt the Parliament will expect we'll be setting forth the danger of celibacy to a nation as the chief motive to induce 'em to take our other proposals into their wise consideration.

Mariana: That's well thought on; but we must be very brief, for the Members of Parliament hate long things, tho' we women are said to love 'em; therefore let us begin and help one another to concisely set forth the dangers of celibacy.

THE DANGER OF CELIBACY

Eliza: In the first place it would be a means of greatly impairing the glory of the established Church of this Kingdom, by lessening the interest of the Bishop's courts, which depend much upon marriage licenses, and consequently the grandure of prelacy must be reduced, not only so, but it would prove a great disadvantage to all the inferior clergy should the people once shake off the Church-shackles, and get a habit of falling to without grace.

Mariana: Secondly, it would be a means of ruining all families, dispeopleing the Kingdom to nothing, and leaving our posterity unable to defend themselves against the insults and invasions of their foreign enemies; for no copulation must bring the Kingdom to nothing; and universal liberty would beget distempers instead of children, and force the nation to turn their colleges and alms-houses into sick-hospitals.

Eliza: Thirdly, it would cause rapes and murders, for if both sexes were in common, both would contend for enjoyment where they could have no claim; besides, the care and education of children would be totally neglected, for what man would be burden'd with the charge of those brats, that another might have the liberty of getting as well as himself.

Mariana: Fourthly, it would be a means of introducing a beastly use of sodomy, making every timerous leacher turn a R——y for fear of contracting that filthy distemper in a minute that may'nt be claw'd off in a twelve-month.

Eliza: I find we shall be able to dispatch our undertakings to a nicety, a few more of these considerations, when we have more time to think, will certainly prevail, but the lateness of the evening now calls us to be marching.

Source: Gynocentrism and its cultural origins

Sisters doin' it to 'emselves

Steve Moxon · 16 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Whenever you point out that men rather than women are the disadvantaged and those on the receiving end of prejudice, the first thing you get back – after the blunt denial – is: 'what about women in Islamic countries?' Everyone assumes that female face and body coverings (the niqab, etc) are 'oppressive' to women and at the behest of men. Yet both of these assumptions are false.

Female Islamic dress codes are cultural practices similar to foot-binding in China and female circumcision (genital mutilation) in sub-Saharan Africa and other regions, in that they are all cultural codification of female intra-sexual competition to secure high mate-value pair-bonded sexual partners. They signal to prospective male long-term partners a commitment not to engage in extra-pair sex.

Bear with me (for just one paragraph) while of necessity I explain this.

The whole point of pair-bonding is to increase the reproductive efficiency of the female by the presence of the male partner dissuading sexual access by low mate-value males. It is not about male control of female fertility as usually supposed. Researchers have been flummoxed by findings that pair-bonding does not prevent the female from choosing to have extra-pair sex. This should not have come as a surprise, because it's in the female's interests to have sex with males who have superior genes to that of her pair-bonded partner, and there is nothing much the male partner can do about it – not least because the extra-pair male would be more dominant, and likely would win any physical contest if it came down to this.

But if the male's job is to keep away lower mate-value males, then he needs to be assured that the female does not have a propensity to engage in sex with any males not too much lower in mate-value than himself; otherwise his job as 'guardian' is made much more difficult, and not worth the bargain he struck of trading off (to some extent) his own relative lack of mate-value in return for his provision of a mate-guarding service.

This is how face-body coverings, foot-binding and FGM work. They are widespread fashions among women that aside from their particular cultural manifestation are essentially a unitary biological phenomenon. As with all fashions, they are not imposed but readily adopted as women wish to join the more advantageous in-group and to dissociate themselves from the relative under-dog out-group.

It requires no imposition from without. Yes, of course, men will at the behest of women reinforce such behavior. In being at the civic end of sociality (the locus of their own intra-sexual competitiveness), men are in the position that women will appeal to them to act on their behalf to where necessary help impose uniform female cultural practice. This is not in any respect 'oppression' by men. If anything it is a imposition on them by women to which they feel duty bound to accede.

Now, when I'm allowed to get as far as putting across this explanation, the next retort is that even if it is women themselves 'oppressing' each other, it is still women being 'oppressed', and that therefore we still need to focus on women and not on men as being disadvantaged. Well, leaving aside the question as to why you would wish to intervene in what women choose to do – and also ignoring 'cultural imperialism' concerns – the question to be thrown back is why, then, are the workings of male dominance and dominance hierarchy not worthy of intervention on behalf of what necessarily is the large majority of low-ranking and thereby 'oppressed' males? After all, political-Left analysis at one time was all about the need to 'liberate' the lower, working classes.

Whatever happened to that?

What happened is that the lower, working classes never bought the idea that fighting a class war would change things. Ordinary men could see well enough that 'the new boss' would be the same as 'the old boss' (as The Who famously remarked), regardless of where he had come from – not least if he had come from within their own ranks. And they could also see that when it came to war they were together with everyone within their own nation and not with their opposite numbers abroad – hardly when they would be the very people facing them across no-man's land in the opposing trench.

The Marxist 'progressive project' never got off the ground, leaving egg on the faces of the intelligentsia who had taken the ethos to heart. In time-honoured fashion, this embarrassment was circumvented by finding a fall guy. The worker. Possibly the most appalling bout of pseudo-science in history then entered the fray by way of trying to provide some justification for this bizarre turn.

The now entirely discredited but once in vogue concept of Freud's that we are somehow 'repressed' was married to an old notion of Engels and Marx about men and women, so that the family was envisaged as an institution whereby 'capitalist' values were imposed via its male head. In this way, males, as stereotypically were workers generically, became in effect personae non grata, and all non-males – women – were thereby considered their replacements as the rightful recipients of 'liberation' from 'oppression'. 'Political correctness' was born.

From then on there was no question of considering male intra-sexual social dynamics as being at all about 'oppression', because males were really 'non-people'. The only males to be concerned about were ethnic minority males (ethnic minorities like women not being stereotypically workers of old), but there was no concern from the fact of their maleness. In any case, as actually the majority of the population women made the perfect new 'masses'. There was no need to focus on female intra-sexual social dynamics as having anything to do with women's social 'condition' because by the new perspective their 'oppression' was not at the hands of other women – no matter how socially elevated – but by men.

So there you have it. A default assumption that what in fact women do to themselves is instead done to them by men. We see this all the time in the persistent ridiculous 'size zero' controversy. Women don't really want to be super slim, we are told; they would prefer to be size 14. It's just the all-powerful male fashion industry that is forcing them. Yet the fashion industry is female-controlled, of course; and the reason fashion magazines carry photos of waif-thin models is that this is what their market research reveals is the ideal to which, however unrealistically, their female readership aspires. It is the result of female intra-sexual competition for high mate-value pair-bonded partners.

We live in an era of unprecedented political stupidity where the notion of a particular highly implausible social 'oppressor'-'oppressed' dynamic is unfalsifiable. No amount of evidence, however internally consistent and externally validated, can shift PC-fascist conviction. Not until, that is, the whole edifice collapses under its own stupendous dead weight. And that is starting to happen. We live in times set to be rather interesting.

[Australia] A Current Affair: Stand-off between homeowner and a squatter

AVfM Video Source · 16 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Thoughts on Continued Family Involvement from Adulthood Onwards

Vernon Meigs · 17 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I think most of us know that a man is seen as a loser, and not relationship material, if it is found out that he doesn't have his own place and instead lives with his parents. The stereotype of such a man is often a basement-dweller without a job and/or a girlfriend, and one who has not "grown up." Feminists and gynocentric conservative types are both quick to apply the stigma against a male they wish to deride.

The source of this stigma is an attitude, at least in the western world, that the care from a parent towards his child ends once the child enters adulthood. In other words, the attitude behind kicking a kid out of the house to fend for himself is considered normal. When applied to girls who become women, the attitude is, at worst, "why haven't you found a boyfriend/husband yet?" On the other hand, a boy who becomes a man is expected to assume immediate responsibility from barely any starting materials. It is not socially laudable for a man to stay in with his parents as a grown adult, or to crawl back to them after some time on his own that didn't work out for him. In terms of attractiveness a young man can be damned if he tries his hand at independence but fails as luck would have it, and he can be damned if he is doing his best but is forced to admit that he lives with his parents.

This stigma is not doing any favors for well-deserving men, and I dare say that it never had to happen. It is time to make the case for upholding positive contexts for when a man lives with his parents.

If your first thought is that parents shouldn't have to baby their sons all the way to adulthood and beyond, then congratulations, yours is the sort of mindset that can't see past the unfortunate stereotype of the man who "fails to launch" — this is a mindset that desperately needs to be challenged. Of course I am not advocating for perpetual hand-holding of the offspring by parent. Nor am I implying that a mother refusing to let children leave home due to over-protectiveness is good for the child either. Those are separate subjects.

What I am advocating, however, is the continued natural involvement of the functional family.

I have always wondered about the irony of some who pay lip service to the nuclear family, who then proceed to just want the house to themselves with the kids out of the picture once they hit a certain age. A father and son need not be in a position of re-enacting the Greek myth of Oedipus and Laius vying for possession of the mother; if fathers become sick of their sons at a certain point then all that had come before is pointless. And while I can grant some element of men defining themselves separately from their mother (in terms of boundaries), the imperative for a man to leave his house to escape the mother complex that he is allegedly beholden to is a load of bogus; a mother and son in a healthy familial relationship can very well carry through without both the possessiveness of the mother and dependency of the son. Strange narratives have been woven in an effort to make males the subject of societal utilitarianism, which render the very living conditions of a young man precarious at best. We seem to take too much to heart the dubious tale of lions throwing their cubs off cliffs and raising the one that climbs back up.

Love and support of parent to son should transcend these narratives. The real transition that happens upon adulthood is: from parents raising their children into adulthood, to parents and children loving and helping each other out always.

It is well taken that the importance of the nuclear family is a genuine one. However, I think it stands to reason that there has been too much exclusive focus on the nuclear family instead of making room in the discussion for a more multi generational, extended format.

Is there anything wrong with a man who is fully grown and continues direct involvement with his own parents, if his parents are loving enough to continue the relationship as father/mother and son? I say not. Depending on circumstances, is it not a more financially conscious (in other words, responsible) decision to cut on some expenses, at least for a length of time, until it becomes feasible to go out on his own? If the parents are more of an older age, or even in a condition that requires some extra care, can they not use some help from the son? I'd say that's better than shipping them off to a retirement home (which I call the other side of the split-the-family coin.). All of this can be applicable to women's relationships with their parents also, though the focus on men is because they're the ones with the social risk hovering above their heads. In any case, why should parents' relationship with their children become a long-distance one by necessity?

Let's say the adult son has a child or children with a woman. Is it not viable for this new 'family in the making' to move in so that the childcare can happen in a multi-generational format? Yes folks, that does count as "living with your parents" no matter what stereotypes you cling to.

In the "Modern Times" talk between Camille Paglia and Jordan Peterson, Paglia makes reference to the transition from the extended family of old to the modern nuclear family, the latter of which she refers to as "claustrophobic cell" and a "hot house environment". Out of all her talking points here (some are good but others deserve skepticism), she has a strong point about this subject in particular. Is it possible, she asks, that human beings aren't meant to be stuck in the house with just their parents? To take this notion further, could this possibly be a source of tension between parents and children where they occur? Is that why some parents and children become estranged, dysfunction occurs, and parents kick children out? Is the insular interpretation of the nuclear family the very cause of people wanting to collapse the very idea of it?

If any of this is true, the only way to save the nuclear family is to open it to expansion, let it breathe, and cool down the hot house. If the nuclear family is of importance towards men, boys, and yes also to girls and women, then we may have to give this serious consideration. Being an arch-individualist, anyone who knows me knows that I argue for independence, and certainly that of men. But independence is not the absence of others' involvement in one's life, and why would a man not continue to voluntarily be involved with his own family, if the family is an important part of what made him who he is?

The multi-generational family and the idea of familial love without an expiration date, if more normalized, could be of benefit to men in many ways.

He could be saved from the trouble of buying a house if it is not feasible to do so economically. Goodness knows the housing market is horrendous at present, so it is a good solution for the present day. It is even more economical than getting an apartment that's only semi-decent. Depending on circumstances, he can inherit and continue to improve and maintain the house to pass it down to the next generation.

His parents can help him and his partner with looking after the children. This is the opposite of impractical, as it always has been done in the past. It can be just as sensible today especially if the man is in a partnership or even a functional marriage with a Modwife, and in which both may be working some sort of job or otherwise performing some sort of labor.

He would be more able to learn lessons as an adult that may not have been easily learned during childhood or even teenage. I myself have lost track of the things that I would have been able to learn and apply better if I did so in my adulthood, instead of letting it fly past my head when I wasn't able to contextualize any of it during a much younger time.

Perhaps even homelessness for men can be mitigated to the capacity that it can, if these men have a family to return home to.

He will never have to feel alone, as there will be a family in the truest sense that's always there to help him.

In a broader sense, the relations between the older and younger generations will be much improved, with bridges gapped. In my opinion we have way too much bickering about "Boomers" vs. "Millenials", with no meaningful relations between the two nor any semblance of the generations learning from each other. The more normal this broadened coexistence between the generations in a setting such as the extended family, the more we understand each other. This could work wonders for self-actualization, most certainly for men.

To normalize the notion of a man continually involved in their parents lives, in direct opposition to the popular stereotype of the deadbeat living in his parents' basement, we must rid ourselves of that default stigma and trust that men are doing the best they can whether they live with their parents upon adulthood or not. The stigma pretends to be a form of "tough love" that alleges to want men to be stronger ("for the good of society"), but is really just another manifestation of the disposable, valueless male. The stigma is gynocentric as it makes men beholden to the judgment of hypergamist women. These women want to live second-hand through successful but stupid men, instead of desiring to actually be part of a family. Such is the gynocentrically motivated bravado of the western dad that wants his son moved out lest he be deemed pathetic. That is not any meaningful sense of love. Hypergamists and those that hound after them are equally to blame for perpetuating this needless standard.

If you are a parent to a son and care about him, then you would voluntarily avail help to him when needed. This is not hand-holding; if you have been a good parent then you've made sure he has grown up capable of handling himself generally speaking. But the time to help him will come someday, and he need not be considered pathetic as a male if he were in a position to ask for it. Fathers, too, may deeply appreciate a son's support in return.

[Man Woman Myth] Domestic Violence – Introduction (1 of 3)

AVfM Video Source · 18 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

[Man Woman Myth] Domestic Violence – Introduction (2 of 3)

AVfM Video Source · 18 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

[Man Woman Myth] Domestic Violence – Introduction (3 of 3)

AVfM Video Source · 18 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Donald Trump blows it on Depp vs. Heard

Vernon Meigs · 19 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Nineteenth-Century Novelist Henry James Predicted Twentieth-Century Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 19 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Female bullying, an untold story

Eden Adder Calvary · 20 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I was a fool to have ever accepted the job in the first place. A 9am to 5:30pm Monday to Friday Office Assistant position for a building contractor's in London paying £7,000 a year. Yes, that amounts to approximately £2 an hour. But I was 19 years old and I didn't know any better.

My job was to work alongside a secretary called Laura (I have changed the names to protect the guilty) who also happened to be the company owner's daughter. She seemed fine when I first met her, but it didn't take long for the mask to slip.

I took over the position from a young woman I had never met but who I was compared to from day one. "Wow, Lucy picked up the job much quicker than you" … "You are not a quick learner like Lucy was" … etc

I tried not to let the harsh comparisons get to me and remained as friendly and affable as I could. But this too was soon abused. It began with her picking at my use of normal everyday language. "Would you stop saying 'really?' all the time?" Laura snapped. "It makes you sound brain dead, like an alien who has just landed on Earth and doesn't know anything." I was actually just trying to sound politely interested in whatever banality was being discussed in the office at the time.

Laura was also a homophobic bigot, and didn't care who knew. The TV drama 'This Life' was on being aired on the BBC at the time, and it included a gay love story. "Did you see that filth last night?" she asked people as they came into the office. "Two men kissing in the shower. Disgusting."

Our office had frequent visitors, the main one being Patricia from the Buying Department, who always seemed to lurk when I was bending over one of the desks to sort out the post. They would make jokes and comments about me within earshot, and as she left the room she would slap my bottom while Laura laughed.

Humiliation and degradation are the cherished tools of the bully, and Laura regularly dispensed them against me. The worst moment for me was the day she took a file from the shelf and discovered a document had been put in the wrong place. There were a handful of people in the room at the time and Laura decided to let rip:

"DO YOU HAVE COTTON WOOL FOR BRAINS OR SOMETHING? ARE YOU COMPLETELY STUPID? ARE YOU COMPLETELY USELESS? HOW MANY TIMES HAVE I SHOWN YOU THE FILING SYSTEM NOW?"

I apologised, tried to tell her it was a genuine error, but she could not be pacified, especially not while she had an audience, although they looked almost as uncomfortable as me, especially Greg from Graphic Design, who she had screamed at about something the previous week. Yes, I was not the only target of her rage in that building, and she got away with it because she was the company owner's daughter. But he didn't defend me, nobody defended me, and so I took my despair, my utter humiliation, my feelings of worthlessness, of ineptitude, of abject self-hatred, and went into the adjacent office with a paperclip, opened it up, pulled up a shirt sleeve, and scraped its sharp edges against my wrists. I was showing myself exactly what she made me feel about myself.

Workplace bullying is a serious matter, because it leaves the victim mentally wounded for life. Their confidence and self esteem will forever be damaged, either just dented or completely shattered. This is the first time I have opened up about my horrible experience in that office. Maybe I feared people would automatically take the side of the female perpetrators because of the gender dynamics in play?

The scars on my wrists healed, but the scars in my mind remain.

The featured image is not a depiction of Laura or the author Mr Calvary.

Female Privilege on the Titanic

AVfM Video Source · 20 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Sweden, where man-beating is sport!

RK Hendrick · 21 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to the modern nation of Sweden, where brutally beating an unarmed man without justification or cause (by a female police officer) is permissible and socially acceptable.

In my lifetime, I have been a prosecutor, a defense attorney and a Pro Tem (part-time) Municipal Judge. I have read tens of thousands of police reports, viewed hundreds of police videos, completed many “ride alongs” with on duty police officers, participated in countless criminal trials and hearings, conducted thousands of interviews with police officers, been through hundreds of hours of courtroom police officer testimony, and trained & advised police officers on Search and Seizure. To be candid, I tend to have a very favorable view of police officers, as I know and appreciate how difficult their jobs can be.

Unfortunately, there are exceptions to this perspective.

Take a moment to review (more than once) the YouTube video that accompanies this article. I reviewed this video well over a half-dozen times. Each time I see it, I get completely appalled and outraged! To be candid, the police officer’s conduct in this matter is disgusting, inhumane and amoral!

The video was taken in central Stockholm on Brunnsgatan (Brunns street) on or about the evening of July 11, 2013.

Upon review of the video of this brutal attack, you will note the following:

- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically threatening behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically abusive behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically lewd or profane gestures towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen yell at this female police officer.
- At All Times, this male citizen used open, respectful and compliant body language towards the female police officer. His arms were down at his side and the palms of his hands open.
- At All Times, this male citizen maintained an appropriate physical decorum and respectful distance from the female police. (Police officer safety).
- At All Times, the physical safety of the female police officer was NOT at issue and there was NO immediate and/or imminent physical harm being directed at her by the male citizen.
- At No Time did this male citizen provoke an attack by this female police officer.
- At No Time while being brutally attacked by the female police officer, did this male citizen engage in any type of physical alteration, combative behavior, retaliatory behavior or assaultive behavior towards the female police officer.

Regardless of what verbal exchange may have occurred off camera prior to this brutal attack or during the actual video, there is absolutely NO justification or basis for the officer’s conduct and use of physical force.

This vicious unprovoked attack is completely without cause and/or reason. Under NO (zero) circumstances can the conduct of this police officer be morally justified and/or condoned. Any well-trained, well-adjusted police officer knows that when there is NO physical threat (to you or anyone else) you do NOT have the right to beat a citizen (bloody) to the ground with the aid of a baton and a German Shepherd attack dog! Bottom line: This is blatant misandric bigotry and the use malicious physical abuse on the part of the police officer.

If a male police officer engaged in this type of brutal unprovoked behavior and assaulted an unarmed female citizen in this manner, there would be an international outrage. This officer should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law and go to prison with all of the other criminals. There is absolutely no rationale or excuse for this vicious inhumane conduct!

RK Hendrick, Esq.

Creator / Co Admin. of the Facebook Group: “Friend of Protection For Men” … The largest and most active Men’s / Fathers’ / Boys’ Rights & Issues Discussion Group on Facebook with an international membership of some very influential and brilliant people. https://www.facebook.com/groups/protectionformen/

Author of: How To Avoid Getting Screwed When Getting Laid…Available on Amazon.com

Sinking Ship – Cyanide & Happiness Shorts

AVfM Video Source · 22 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

“Microaggressions”, “Trigger Warnings”, and the new meaning of “Trauma”

Chris Hernandez · 23 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

When I joined the Marines, I met a man who had survived a helicopter crash during a training exercise. The first time I saw him his head and face were covered in burn scars. A balloon filled with saline, that looked like a dinosaur’s crest, was implanted in his scalp to stretch the skin so hair could grow. Something that looked exactly like the checkered buttstock of an M16A2 was imprinted on one side of his head. He greeted me when I checked in to my unit, and totally ignored the shocked expression I must have had when he approached. He shook my hand, asked a few questions, then left with a friendly “See you later, PFC.” His demeanor left me with the absurd thought, Maybe he doesn’t know how strange he looks.

He had been assigned to my reserve unit while undergoing treatment at a nearby military burn unit. I wound up becoming friends with him later, and eventually worked up the nerve to ask him about the crash. Of course, I quickly followed my question with, “But if you don’t want to talk about it, nevermind. Sorry.”

He brushed off my concerns. “Nah, no problem. The day I can’t talk about it is the day it starts to haunt me.”

He told me about loading up with his platoon in the helicopter that day. He described what it was like to see the ground coming through the window and realize they were about to crash. He talked about grabbing his seat belt release, being knocked unconscious on impact by his rifle butt slamming into his temple, and waking up on the floor with his head on fire. He told me how he crawled toward the exit, in flames, past screaming, burning Marines trapped in their seats. He recounted his memory of shouting that he would come back to help them. He told me how he managed to drag himself over the edge of the helicopter’s ramp and fall into a rice paddy. He told me about other Marines who saw the crash and ran to save him and some others. He talked about all the friends he lost that day, more than a dozen. He talked about how much he missed being an infantryman, and how he had made peace with the fact that he could never be one again.

What struck me was how easily he was able to tell the story. I had never heard of someone making a decision not to let trauma affect their lives. I had a great uncle, still alive then, who had been a Marine in the Korean War. He came back traumatized, took years to get back to normal, and to his dying day never told anyone in the family what he experienced. Even after I became a Marine, he gave me only the barest details of his service. As far as I know he never told his Marine son either. Unlike my friend, my uncle couldn’t talk about his trauma.

I’ve experienced trauma myself. I don’t know how many murder scenes I’ve worked as a police officer. I remember the shock I felt when I walked up to a car after a seemingly minor accident and saw a two year old’s head lying on the floorboard. I stood helplessly outside a burning house as a ninety-two year old woman died inside, while her son screamed hysterically beside me. For years after my time as a soldier in Iraq I’d have a startle response if I unexpectedly saw a flash, like from a camera, in my peripheral vision (it reminded me of flashes from roadside bombs). Soldiers near me were shot, burned or killed by weather in Afghanistan.

My childhood wasn’t rosy either; early one morning when I was eight I heard pounding on our kitchen door, then was terrified to see a family member stumble into the house covered in blood after being attacked by a neighbor. Even today, after thirty-five years, I still sometimes tense up when I hear a knock at the door. When I was ten, my eleven year old best friend committed suicide because of a minor sibling dispute. He wrote a note, left a will, snuck his father’s pistol from a drawer and shot himself. I was severely affected by his death, and ten years later got a copy of his suicide note from the city morgue. After I read it, I finally felt that I could heal from that horrible event.

I’m no stranger to trauma, and I’ve dealt with it by writing and talking about it. I suppose I’ve always defined “trauma” the traditional way: a terrible experience, usually involving significant loss or mortal danger, which left a lasting scar. However, I’ve recently discovered my definition of trauma is wrong. Trauma now seems to be pretty much anything that bothers anyone, in any way, ever. And the worst “trauma” seems to come not from horrible brushes with death like I described above; instead, they're the result of racism and discrimination.

Over the last year I've heard references to "Microagressions" and "Trigger Warnings". Trigger Warnings tell trauma victims that certain material may "contain disturbing themes that may trigger traumatic memories for sufferers"; it's a way for them to continue avoiding what bothers them, rather than facing it (and the memories that get triggered often seem to be about discrimination, rather than mortal danger). Microaggressions are minor, seemingly innocuous statements that are actually stereotype-reinforcing trauma, even if the person making the statement meant nothing negative.

Here are two examples of "trauma" from the "Microaggression Project" (http://www.microaggressions.com/):

My dad jokes with my younger sister that he remembers selling Girl Scout Cookies when he was a Girl Scout. She laughs, understanding the fact that since he's a boy means that he could not have been a Girl Scout. Thanks, Dad. I'm a boy and a formal Girl Scout.

The assumption that Girl Scouts will be girls. That causes trauma.

24, female-bodied, in a relationship – so Facebook shows me ads with babies, wedding dresses, and engagement rings. Change gender on Facebook to male – suddenly I get ads pertaining to things I actually care about.

Facebook thinking a woman might be interested in marriage and children. That causes trauma.

As one might expect, "Microaggressions" and "Trigger Warnings" are most popular in our universities. In late 2013 A group of UCLA students staged a "sit-in" protest against a professor for – no joke – correcting their papers. These "Graduate Students of Color" began an online petition stating "Students consistently report hostile classroom environments in which the effects of white supremacy, patriarchy, heteronormativity, and other forms of institutionalized oppression have manifested within the department and deride our intellectual capacity, methodological rigor, and ideological legitimacy. Empirical evidence indicates that these structural and interpersonal microaggressions wreak havoc on the psychophysiological health and retention rates of People of Color. The traumatic experiences of GSE&IS students and alumni confirm this reality" (http://www.thepetitionsite.com/931/772/264/ucla-call2action/).

A college professor expecting graduate students to write grammatically correct papers. That causes trauma.

In addition to correcting grammar, the professor insulted the "Graduate Students of Color" by changing "Indigenous" to the proper "indigenous" in their papers, thus reinforcing white colonial oppression of indigenous people. Oh, and he shook a black student's arm during a discussion. "Making physical contact with a student is inappropriate, [the aggrieved Graduate Student of Color] added, and there are additional implications when an older white man does so with a younger black man" (https://www.insidehighered.com/news/2013/11/25/ucla-grad-students-stage-sit-during-class-protest-what-they-see-racially-hostile).

A white professor gently touching a black student's arm. That causes trauma.

I've reviewed these reports of "trauma", and have reached a conclusion about them. I'm going to make a brief statement summarizing my conclusion. While I mean this in the nicest way possible, I don't want victims of Microaggressions or supporters of Trigger Warnings to doubt my sincerity.

Fuck your trauma.

Yes, fuck your trauma. My sympathy for your suffering, whether that suffering was real or imaginary, ended when you demanded I change my life to avoid bringing up your bad memories. You don't seem to have figured this out, but there is no "I must never be reminded of a negative experience" expectation in any culture anywhere on earth.

If your psyche is so fragile you fall apart when someone inadvertently reminds you of "trauma", especially if that trauma consisted of you overreacting to a self-interpreted racial slur, you need therapy. You belong on a psychiatrist's couch, not in college dictating what the rest of society can't do, say or think. Get your own head right before you try to run other people's lives. If you expect everyone around you to cater to your neurosis, forever, you're what I'd call a "failure at life", doomed to perpetual disappointment.

Oh, I should add: fuck my trauma too. I must be old-fashioned, but I always thought coming to terms with pain was part of growing up. I've never expected anyone to not knock on my door because it reminds me of that terrifying morning decades ago. I've never blown up at anyone for startling me with a camera flash (I've never even mentioned it to anyone who did). I've never expected anyone to not talk about Iraq or Afghanistan around me, even though some memories still hurt. I don't need trigger warnings because a book might remind me of a murder victim I've seen.

And before anyone says it; being Hispanic doesn't make me any more sympathetic to people who experience nonexistent, discriminatory "trauma". Discrimination didn't break me (or my parents, or grandparents). I've been discriminated against by whites for being Hispanic. I've been threatened by blacks for being white. I've been insulted by Hispanics for not being Hispanic enough. Big deal. None of that stopped me from doing anything I wanted to do. It wasn't "trauma". It was life.

Generations of Americans experienced actual trauma. Our greatest generation survived the Depression, then fought the worst war in humanity's history, then built the United States into the most successful nation that has ever existed. They didn't accomplish any of that by being crystal eggshells that would shatter at the slightest provocation, they didn't demand society change to protect their tender feelings. They simply dealt with the hardships of their past and moved on. Even my great uncle, the Korea Marine, never expected us to tiptoe around him. He wouldn't talk about his experience, but he didn't order us not to.

So again, fuck your trauma. If your past bothers you that much, get help. I honestly hope you come to terms with it. I hope you manage to move forward. I won't say anything meant to dredge up bad memories, and don't think anyone should intentionally try to harm your feelings.

But nobody, nobody, should censor themselves to protect you from your pathological, and pathologically stupid, sensitivities.

[Ed. note: this post originally appeared here.]

When fathers love their children more than Crazy

Tim Merchant · 23 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I was in an abusive relationship for twenty years, of the sort perfectly described by Paul Elam of 'A Voice for Men' and Dr. Tara Palmatier of 'Shrink4Men' in their excellent, and maybe even life-saving, 'Going Mental' show, and to take it up a notch, by Dr. Robert Hare, the acknowledged world expert on psychopathy.

And still I wonder if this was not just a very bad marriage of the type I used to see around me in Britain all the time. And that, in part, was the problem …

Paul Elam argues that when we men say we cannot not leave Crazy because we don't want to leave our children behind, what we claim is not accurate, is even dissimulating, of our true motivations. We just want to be with Crazy, but the desire to protect our children sounds so much more defensible and reasonable than the true explanation of our crack-pipe addiction to Crazy.

And maybe he is right in all cases. Maybe we lie to ourselves all the time. Maybe we are just addicts who will say anything to justify our ongoing fixes. But that is not what it felt like, and certainly not what I was telling myself daily, which may mean something … or nothing. I have spent a lifetime in psychological research and I know from oceans of data I could drown in that we know what we like and we dislike, but we are useless at determining what drives us, without the aid of statistical analysis.

And our explanations go no way to explaining why we didn't split with Crazy straightaway, before there were any children, when even then it was obvious that she was plain nuts, and more vicious than anyone we knew.

So, first of all I have to explain to myself, and to you, why I did not leave Crazy in the five years before there were children. Then I have to explain why I didn't leave her for another fifteen years thereafter, after there were children. These explanations, necessarily are different.

And I have to admit from the very beginning that my ex-wife, 'Rafaella' was crazy. Over twenty years, as much in the beginning as in the middle as in the end, she conformed to the behavior outlined by Paul and Dr. T., and according to Dr. Hare's checklist she is a stone cold psychopath.

Before I met Rafaella, I had never had a successful long-term relationship with a woman – plenty of long-term friendships with women, some short-term intimate relationships with women – but no real love match. Yet I knew it was possible. My parents were very much in love with each other for nearly fifty years. One of my sisters had been deeply in love with my brother-in-law for thirty-five years. A couple of pairs of my friends were clearly still in love after a significant period. But not me.

I wanted that. I knew it was possible. And, as all experts attest, Crazy is exceptionally good at presenting herself as your ideal mate. Rafaella was my chance. I wanted that reality and, yes, I wanted that status. I never had photos of Rafaella and my children on my desk at work, but I knew it was important to project yourself as a family man both at work and in society at large.

Equally, many of the relationships I had observed were, by any definition, awful. My great-grandmother was a heinous bitch. One grandmother terrorized her mild, and as it happens foreign, husband all his life. The other grandmother was, by all reports, intensely dislikable. One set of aunts and uncles were miserable together. Another aunt was so vile that she was nicknamed 'Lem,' for 'lemon,' for 'sour.' Most of my family in my generation were engaged in relationships in which they would end up divorced, and similarly many of my friends.

In her book, 'Bringing Up BeBe,' Pamela Druckerman describes her New York and British girlfriends sitting around describing what losers their husbands were, these 'losers' often being CEOs of international companies or top professionals. And that was my experience, too. I studied Law at Cambridge, so many of my friends were lawyers, accountants, and similar, in top professional firms. Their wives could barely count a university degree between them and virtually never had a career to talk about, or even a job, and yet they openly berated the hopelessness of their husbands who earned far less than they should have done (bearing in mind that some of them ended up earning in excess of $1 million a year), they were always at work, they couldn't put a diaper on a baby, they never did the housework, they never played with the children, they were terrible cooks etc. Most of this was complete bullshit. British men tend to contribute more toward the household chores and pleasures than those of almost any other nationality. But, hey, what is the truth in a good story?

So when the same thing happened to me, with a wife who downplayed everything I did and up-played everything she did, it seemed more of the same rather than an outrageous travesty of the facts, of the observable facts – I had two Masters degrees and a First Class Bachelors degree, and I was the Strategy & Planning Manager of the European end of a major global corporation; my wife had no job and no qualifications. Everything is fair game in the new 'everyone is equal' world.

So I looked around and it was a simple decision. I could be lonely and alone or I could be lonely within a male-female partnership, and being in a long-term partnership scored you more credibility points at work and among your friends.

Then we drifted into marriage, and into having a child. I was aware that my family didn't greatly approve of Rafaella, but they all lived far away. Some of my friends thought we had the happiest relationship they had seen.

Rafaella was always dissatisfied and never troubled to keep any of her dissatisfactions to herself. I thought she would grow up, but she never did. Then there was our first child, although maybe not mine, and she seemed to become more manic than usual, claiming there was something seriously wrong with him when neither the doctors nor I thought so. And then a second child, by which time Rafaella was demanding that I become a completely different person, because every aspect of my personality was unsuitable to her needs – and, boy, did she have a lot of needs.

But with the arrival of children, the dynamic changed. I adored my children, both of them. One of my biggest fears had been that we would have children I wouldn't actually like. But I loved both of them immediately, and they loved each other. So what emerged was a double-triangle of intense relationships within the family. Me and the boys loved each other, with Rafaella as a really loud, aggressive TV set playing over in the corner of the room that we knew not how to turn down or turn off. Equally, Rafaella and the boys were in another mutual love relationship, with me at work. Those two triangles worked fine so long as they didn't connect at the apex, between Rafaella and me.

From then on, as Rafaella ranted on and spent twice as much money as I was earning month after month after month, I asked myself how I could get myself out of my relationship with Rafaella but keep the boys. I loved the boys. Within a horrible marital dynamic they were sweet and loving and kind and innocent. They were the loves of my life at that time; I just had to learn to get rid of Rafaella, or to ignore her.

The problem was that, if I divorced Rafaella, she would, to all intents and purposes, have gained full custody. Everybody talks about 50/50 custody, but actually it is 85/15 – one weekend in two – and in the UK, as in the US, in 80% of cases primary custody is given to the mother. This leaves the father to see his children every other weekend, tearing them from their mother, their routines, their home, their friends, their things, in a ritual of maintaining a relationship with someone they once knew who increasingly resembles a transgender version of good old Aunt Matilda. Great!

Worse, in 70% of cases in the UK, the father never sees his children again. This may be because fathers cannot face that 'transgender Aunt Matilda' effect, or because of parental alienation, or because the fathers or mothers move too far away from each other to make visitation practical, I don't know.

So, the likelihood is, as a father in the UK, that you will never see the most important people in your life thus far ever again. Yes, they will be still alive, but as the poet Tony Flynn put it, 'Living in the same world isn't so much.'

And what would happen if by some chance the father got primary custody, if perhaps the mother was found perched up on a mountain of empty vodka bottles, surrounded by the flames of her house she had set fire to with the explosion of her meth factory, after having been suspected of stabbing the children numerous times in near-fatal injuries?

Well, us fathers work. We have careers. In my case, I was out of the country, any country, at least once a week. What provisions could I make to look after the children in my care. 50% of my earnings went straight to the Government in taxes (and, actually, it was probably nearer 60%). 50% of the rest paid for the house. Then there was food, clothing etc. for me and the children, and alimony for the ex-wife. On top of this there was the nearly $500,000 debt my ex-wife had run up on my credit cards. Where on earth was the money to come from for a full-time child-minder costing maybe $3,000 a month, i.e. my total net salary after tax? Grandparents? My father was dead and my mother was 85 and soon to develop alzheimer's, and two hundred miles away from where I was working.

That was a financial equation that was impossible to bring to reality, which is probably why mothers in the UK invariably get 85% custody. They don't have full-time jobs, they are therefore free to look after the children, and all this is paid for out of something like 75% of the ex-husband's net income. And he still won't get to see his beloved children, or they will be taught to be about as vicious to him as his ex-wife is.

Small wonder, I would say, that husbands decide to stay and fight it out.

Then there is the issue of whether, as a caring father, you want to leave your children in the hands of super-bitch who is brutal to almost everyone you know and whom you believe will turn on your children when you are gone.

Actually, that is a wrong assumption. She probably won't. In the end, I left Rafaella after one of my children nearly died from the stress of our relationship and the other started to become seriously OCD and missed several days a week of his schooling because he was feeling ill. I was persuaded by an expert that it was I, in fact, who was the problem. Without me, the children would be fine.

So, I left, and they are fine so far as I know – my ex-wife will not allow me any contact with them whatsoever, so I can't be sure. I fell in love with a truly wonderful Irish-American girl (I strongly recommend them), I moved to the US, I cut all communications with my ex-wife, I offered my children a home with us if they so chose, my ex-wife married a millionaire, the children seem happy – or at least not so unhappy that they want to come and live with me – job done. The only person who is miserable out of this final outcome is my ex-wife's new husband, who gratifyingly left her four times in their first year together. Everyone else is great.

The moral is therefore that I should have left way back, but what were the chances then of such a triumphal outcome? I don't know, and that is the problem …

Breakthrough medical treatment for feminism & related disorders

August Løvenskiolds · 24 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It is with great happiness and no small level of relief that A Voice for Men announces the first set of medical protocols for dealing with the infectious disease known in the popular vernacular as "Feminism." This puzzling disorder afflicts about 20 percent of the United States's population, resulting in paradoxical symptoms of increased aggression, paranoia, and projection in women, and an unnatural passivity and sexual cessation in men.

In addition to mental disorders, Feminism's major physical impact is to cause abortions, both spontaneous and medically induced, that cost the afflicted the lives of millions of their healthy children as well as wasting countless public medical resources better spent on treating other life-threatening disorders, such as infectious diseases and bodily injuries.

Background

Oftentimes the causes of even widespread diseases can remain obscure and the medical establishment can be slow to recognize cutting-edge theories and treatments, so even as we appeal to medical authorities to take these findings seriously, we recognize that the process of altering the popular understanding of pathological Feminism will be contentious and time-consuming.

For example, once upon a time, the cause of the ubiquitous stomach ulcer was obscure, and often attributed by medical science to vague factors like "stress" or "spicy foods." Bland diets and the career-killing "stress management" of ulcers had poor track records that frustrated patients and doctors alike, although the ongoing treatment of ulcers using ineffective measures did provide something of a financial boon to both legitimate medical practitioners and pseudo-scientific "alternative" therapists.

In 1982, however, it was discovered that stomach ulcers were caused by a bacterium now known as Helicobacter Pylori. This finding was controversial for years but eventually led to effective treatments.

Likewise, a disease known first in the early 1980's as "GRID", or "Gay-Related Immune Disorder," was often attributed to libertine homosexual lifestyles of that era, but as our understanding of the disease eventually transcended both liberal and conservative ideologies it became known as "AIDS," determined to be caused by infection with the virus dubbed HIV.

Like stomach ulcers and AIDS, the causal factor of Feminism was once obscured by poor research, financial motivations, and ideological concerns such as the alleged "patriarchy". Once Feminism achieved its stated goal of legal equality for women with men (and feminists' sotto voce goal of female societal domination) it became clear that something other than ideology was driving the increasingly febrile daily behaviors of feminists.

Indeed, it wasn't until January of 2015 that the infectious agent for Feminism was first identified: a bacterium known as Toxoplasma gondii, or T. Gondii.

Toxoplasma gondii: The cause of Feminism

Let's review the facts known about T. Gondii and how it relates to Feminism.

T. Gondii lives in rodents such as mice, members of the feline family known as domestic cats, and humans as well as other warm-blooded animals, many of whom are common human food sources. Cats are crucial to T. Gondii insofar as it can only reproduce in their digestive tracts and cats propagate the disease through their feces.

T. Gondii has evolved to make rodent hosts alter their behavior to become suicidal: once infected they become sexually attracted to cat urine and instead of avoiding predation, the mice seek out cats to eat them.

Growing evidence revealed in the journal Preventive Veterinary Medicine suggests T. Gondii also causes vast amounts of personality disorders in humans. The CDC reports about 60 million Americans are infected with T.

Gondii, which creates brain plaques that can alter human personalities; in particular, it makes people's thinking more gender neutral: studies show infected women adopt active male-associated traits and infected men adopt passive female-associated traits. In other words, infected humans become feminists as their new behaviors conflict with cultural expectations of normal gender behavior.

Observed mostly anecdotally, the high number of feminist cat lovers is a further result of T Gondii's modification of human mental processes, creating feminists out of otherwise normal humans who, likewise, lose behavioral and physical characteristics more normalized to their respective genders, much in the same way as T. Gondii makes rodents adopt suicidal sexual desires.

The feminist inclinations inculcated in T. Gondii infected human individuals have additional effects: they disrupt human pair-bonding and sexual reproduction, inevitably leading to a solitary death of the host feminist that can go unnoticed for weeks or even months by the larger, uninfected society. Once one of these infected feminists dies alone and is subsequently consumed by rats or cats, the life cycle of T. Gondii proceeds even faster, but this is not essential to the survival of the infection, merely an enhancement.

Around 20% of the U.S. population is infected with T. Gondii. Also, around 20% of the U.S. population identifies as feminist. Studies of the overlap of these two populations are expected to provide routine confirmations of this discovery, better establishing both correlation and causation of Feminism and related disorders such as schizophrenia by T. Gondii.

The meme of feminists dying alone (often with their cats) has been noted here, and here.

Treatment and disease management protocols

Although high doses of psychoactive drugs seem to interfere with the effects and reproduction of T. Gondii, a pharmacological cure for Feminism remains elusive. It is hoped that the huge number of Feminism sufferers will provide lucrative incentives for the market to research potential treatments for this scourge.

Once infected, the damage to the brains of feminists appears to be permanent in most cases, although in an increasing number of sufferers spontaneous remission away from feminism has been observed. "Trigger warnings" and other irrational mental gymnastics seem to perpetuate Feminism and are best ignored by those seeking to grow beyond the hurdles created by the infection. Only the most tangentially infected and mentally stable of feminists seem to be able to manage this feat.

Until an effective treatment or cure is found, it is recommended that domestic cats, when employed as pets and companion animals, be kept exclusively indoors where they can be dissuaded from eating infectious mice or birds. Indoor/outside cats should be avoided. Working outdoor cats on farms, granaries and other areas should be isolated from human touch until they have passed an isolation protocol.

Likewise, all contact, and especially sexual encounters with feminists, particularly cat-owning feminists, should be avoided since the possibility of infection or unjustified rape allegations soars in this population. Ironically, avoiding "cat-calling" and other "rapey" behaviors ostensibly censured by feminists for substandard and/or minority men should also be adopted by even the most attractive and wealthy men, who are urged to seek more healthy, non-feminist partners for their sexual outlets.

Until a cure is found, socially isolating feminists and their cats' feces is the most prudent and effective way of containing the damage caused by this horrible disease.

Boys were invited to slap a girl

AVfM Video Source · 25 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Eating MGTOW: Stuffed Chauvinist Pig

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 26 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I was a bit hesitant to write an article for this MGTOW series since it brought back college memories of my little British sports car, once again sitting on the side of the road in dire need of transport back to the service station for yet another repair I couldn't afford.

You see, back when I was a frat boy in college majoring in courses now related to rape studies, I decided that, in order to attract all the young, innocent, drunken college women that I was entitled to introduce to patriarchy, I would need a sexy little car. Instead, I bought an MG.

It looked like a car, but it mostly just sat in the parking lot at the frat house because, well, it was British and that is pretty much what British cars did back then. But I guess that is only fair since I have criticized Paul's recipes and called August's chicken boring, that I give them a chance to criticize my own recipe. So, although my MGTOW isn't quite the same as their MGTOW (NAMGTOWALT), a little diversity never hurts, right?

So I give you:

Stuffed Chauvinist Pig
(about 12-15 servings)

1 pork loin (about 5 lbs, costs about $12.50)

Trim any excess fat and starting about half an inch from the end cut a lengthwise opening along one side of the loin to within about half an inch of the other end. Cut as deep as you can without piercing the other side. The opening will form a large gaping gash into which you can thrust… well, you'll see.

Marinade
¼ cup (60 ml) white wine
¼ cup (60 ml) white wine vinegar
½ cup (120 ml) apple juice
1 tbs sriracha (15 ml) chili sauce
1 or 2 dashes Worcestershire sauce
Salt, pepper, sage, rosemary, thyme

Like anything that is about to be stuffed, the pork loin should be well lubed. Combine the marinade ingredients; place your loin into as small a container as it will fit and pour on the marinade. Put it back into the fridge and leave it alone for anywhere from a couple of hours to overnight.

You can do this with a pork loin but don't try putting off young, innocent, drunken college women. This is asking for a false rape accusation whether you indulge them or not: they may come to regret the experience and then so will you.

Stuffing
½ cup (120 ml) dry bulgur
½ cup (120 ml) dry buckwheat
2 cups (480 ml) water
Seasonings: Salt, pepper, sage, rosemary, and thyme
½ cup (120 ml) pecan pieces
½ cup (120 ml) dried fruit (I like raisins, dates, figs, apricots, prunes, cranberries, etc. Just chop anything large into raisin or cranberry-sized pieces)

Cook the bulgur and buckwheat in the water with the seasonings (it cooks the same as rice). If you've purchased whole pecans put some of your excess testosterone to good use by placing them between paper towels on the counter and violently battering them into submission with a mallet. If you've got large pieces of dried fruit, now would be a good time to hone your knife skills by chopping the fruit into small pieces. Mix into the cooked grains.

Preheat the oven to 350 degrees F (about 175 C). Remove your meat from the marinade and pat dry with a paper towel to get rid of some of the evidence. Stuff the meat with as much of the stuffing as you can.

If you know how to tie a stuffed piece of meat, then now is a good time to apply a little bondage. If not, use a few toothpicks to secure the stuffing.

Place your loin on a baking sheet and roast in the oven until the internal temperature (in the center of the stuffing) reads at least 150 F (about 65 C).

Remove from the oven and allow to rest for about 20 minutes. Remove the string or toothpicks and cut into 1 inch slices. Serve with any leftover stuffing and steamed veggies.

But wait, there's more.

No good piece of meat is ever finished until you've smothered it in white sauce.

Dilute about half a cup of mayo with some white wine vinegar until it drizzles nicely off a spoon. Add a little minced garlic and/or grated horseradish, some salt and coarse ground black pepper. Drizzle over your loin.

Voilà! Stuffed Chauvinist Pig.

Sadly, I never did become the serial rapist that my feminist overlords insisted that I should aspire to be.

Instead, my career options as either patriarch or as MGTOW were cut short when I sold the car and met a nice Asian woman who wanted nothing more than to make my sammiches, bring me beer, and massage my feet; all while working two jobs so I don't have to.

And the children of Crazy?

Tim Merchant · 26 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this is Part 2 of an essay series that started with When fathers love their children more than Crazy. "Crazy" meaning the crazy woman in a man's life.–Ed

Not everyone believes us fathers when we say that our greatest concern during our relationship with Crazy was the welfare of the children, but that's okay because we are all too used by now to outsiders not believing a word we say and, besides, there is probably very little objectively identifiable evidence that we were.

We did everything wrong, didn't we?

Yes, we probably did, but we didn't mean to.

My wife, Kathleen, was brought up by Crazy as her mother and had to watch her dad being beaten up by her emotionally day-in, day-out, sometimes feeling forced to take on her mother on her father's behalf at an age – like five – when everyone should have been taking care of her, not vice-versa. As far as she is concerned, her father was collusive with her mother by hanging around being attacked when he should simply have walked off, as she begged him to.

"Go, Dad, please go."

It wasn't that she didn't love him; she loved him very much. It was that, by standing there taking all the punches, he was putting her in danger. She was terrified and distressed by the constant arguing, and Crazy tried to involve her in her reign of abuse against her father whenever she saw an opportunity. Once Kathleen was so outraged by her mother's machinations that she set fire to her.

What should her father have done, according to Kathleen?

He should have taken hold of Kathleen's hand, whatever time of day or night the dispute was taking place, and told Crazy, "I will not have arguments with you in front of our daughter, ever," and then taken Kathleen to a public place, like a bar, where preferably the revelers would inevitably have asked him what his five year old daughter was doing with him in a bar at eleven o'clock at night. Shouldn't she have been in bed?

… and then her father could have told them, and Kathleen would have confirmed his side of the story.

She bets that her mother would never have attempted to argue with her father in front of her again. Crazies hate having their antisocial behavior made public. And if her mother had tried to beat him up again verbally in front of her, he should have taken Kathleen to the bar again … as many times as it took to make her mother shut up.

The trick would not have been in her father walking out and going to a bar – he did that plenty of times anyway – it would have been in taking Kathleen with him. Who believes a guy in a bar bleating about the abusive behavior of his wife? No one. Who believes a tiny child in a bar late at night confirming that her dad is telling the truth? Everyone. And a few people there, or who subsequently heard about her having been there, might well have been moved to do something about it.

I wish I had thought of that … or I think I wish it. I doubt, in Britain, picking up a small child and taking it to the local pub would work – not enough community, unless we happened to be living in a small village where word would get around in seconds, but we didn't live in a small village. I could have taken the children to my family, but I am not sure that would have had the desired effect, either; your own family would be considered too partisan, and Crazy's family was five thousand miles away. To a friend's house? That might have worked, especially if I had taken the boys to the house of one of Crazy's friends. That could really have hit the mark, and as Paul Elam argues, it is the absolute duty of the sane partner to protect the children because we are effectively their only hope.

Would that have been it? Would Crazy have stopped abusing me?

No, of course not, Crazies have to abuse in the same way as sharks have to swim forward, but it would probably have stopped Crazy abusing me in front of our two boys in the house. In the car, with Crazy driving, that would have been a different matter. My Crazy ex-wife loved to trap me as a passenger in the car she was driving, with the two boys in the back seat. She once started eleven different arguments with me under those circumstances during a fifty-four minute car journey, and several times I got out of the car I was driving and walked home because Crazy, as a passenger, wouldn't stop shouting at me in front of the children.

I have learned over time that one of the big tricks of Crazy, as it was of my ex-wife "Rafaella, is to define "us" as her and the children vs. me as "your father." That maneuver worked even in my absence. So, "What are you doing to us?" means "What are you doing to me?"; "You are not listening to our needs" means "You are not listening to my needs"; "You have no interest in us as a family – I am a single parent" means "You have no interest in my needs – and if you want to point out what you are doing for the children, I am the only parent who matters here."

Early on, Rafaella was very aggressive toward the children too, but that soon stopped when she realized that the children were more use to her as allies than they as targets, in other words that they were more useful in her camp than mine. Thereafter she focused on grooming the boys' affections all the way by giving them everything they could possibly want, even things they never knew they wanted until they were offered them by her. A particularly successful trick of Crazy's was to buy the boys daily presents – quite big ones – in the knowledge that I would soon object to the cost of this exercise, which was anything up to $50 a day, and $1,000+ on special occasions if I didn't take the bait at $50. So she became the parent who really listened to her children and got them what they craved, whereas I was the one who said, "No. We can't afford to buy that." My nickname for the longest time was, "Papa who always says no." The converse trick was that she would demand that I take away something the children wanted, like staying up late, and when I complied just to keep the peace between us, she would turn around and say that of course the children could stay up late tonight, we could all watch a movie together or something.

As anyone knows who has been in this type of abusive relationship, the games, tricks, out-maneuvering and gaslighting are like a fog all around you. You haven't a clue what is coming next, only that something is coming next because there has been peace for a few hours. "It's too quiet around here …" is a thought that informs domestic violence movies too.

One of Rafaella's masterpieces was to summon "the jury of the children," my description of the technique, not hers. She would secretly agree a course of action with the boys behind my back, then she would summon me to hear what "we" have decided. Anywhere sufficed, but she had a particular penchant for persuading the boys to get into the bathtub with her and then summoning me to the bathroom for a "family chat." Why are Crazies especially crazy and aggressive when they are naked? I have heard several abused men mention that. In Rafaella's case she claims that she is a Merangel and that her primary element is water, but they can't all be Merangels.

The other classic ruse is using the children as messengers – "Tell your father …" Strangely, Rafaella didn't use this technique very often. I think it would have been an insult to her sense of creativity. What she did instead was to sit down with them and tell them "Your father…" stories, sometimes for hours on end, or once we had finally divorced and I had moved five thousand miles away, she would get the kids to Skype me, then hijack the conversation I was having with them in order to make her demands – yep, in front of them.

I don't know if there is a single effective answer to managing Crazy. I certainly tried persistently for twenty years to find one, and I never did. Crazies are like the scorpion in the story where a scorpion asks a toad to give him a piggy-back across a river.

"But you'll sting me and kill me," protests the toad.

"That would be stupid," counters the scorpion. "I would drown too."

So the toad complies and starts carrying the scorpion on its back across the river. Halfway across, the scorpion stings him.

With his dying breath the toad asks, “Why did you do that?”

The scorpion shrugs. “It’s in my nature.”

Yep, most of Crazy’s statements don’t make rational sense, nor sometimes even strategic sense, but there is no question that viciousness is definitely in their nature, even to the unnatural extent of messing with their children’s psyches and consequently ruining their lives. In the end, the children are just tools after all. No wonder one of Rafaella’s favorite words was “instrumental.”

How To Stop School Shootings

Peter Wright · 28 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The seemingly endless cycle of school shootings by young men continues in the USA, and as always more students lay dead. The usual scapegoats are wheeled out for blame: its the fault of Democrat policies, Republican policies, fatherlessness, gun availability, misogyny, inadequate school security and check-in cards, or perhaps people choose to blame police lethargy and lack of speedy intervention.

Over and over it goes, year in, year out. Nothing stops it.

Omitted from the above list is an alternative cause – a 'poke a stick in your eye obvious' factor that is the proverbial smoking gun, albeit one that literally everyone is too bigoted to acknowledge: lack of psychological and social supports for troubled young men.

Let me say that again: the cause of most school shootings is the lack of psychological and social supports for troubled young men.

Let me take a step back and explain how I arrive at this position. In my work I support troubled young men, and over time some of those men have expressed fantasies of acting-out murderously, along with their reasoning for same. The fantasies have real potential.

The first thing I note is that these men sometimes feel comfortable to express their murderous fantasies to someone they trust, or to someone they are hoping to gain emotional support from. After talking these fantasies through, having a space to express their reasoning, it becomes clear that many of them are terrified of both people and of the world – often with good reason – and their murderous musings are a wish to hurt other people before other people get a chance to hurt them. In other words, its a convoluted self-defense reflex.

Such men are often relentlessly assaulted by life, perhaps raised by one or both parents who are violent, neglectful, drug addicted, impoverished or emotionally abusive, or it may be that such men have a psychiatric disorder such as schizophrenia, paranoia, head-injury, or autism spectrum disorder that leads to them standing out at school and suffering years of bullying — bullying that almost always results in PTSD and a permanently anxious, hypervigilant, and frankly paranoid state of mind.

The antidote to much of their suffering is to make them feel safe (often for the first time in their lives) by providing genuine and ongoing support. I have listened to these men and assured them that they were not going to need to act out in order to protect themselves or to be heard by a deaf world, because I would pledge to visit regularly, be available on the phone, and accompany them to the shops or gym and help them communicate with, or protect them from others – effectively to be a bodyguard. I hasten to add that my need to protect them from various social or physical assaults was completely absent or at least negligible, as the potential threats had been exaggerated in their minds.

After providing this kind of support for young men, the change in their eyes and body language is nothing short of profound. The steely vigilance and fear in their eyes gives way to eyes projecting trust and thanks, and their stiff, combat-ready bodies relax – all visually palpable. And most importantly, after a short time of providing such support their conversation changes too – with no more talk of acting out, and often with a calm recognition of how extreme and unnecessary their former fantasies now seem to be.

Will such positive outcomes always result from offers of support? No, there will always be one man who is too psychotic or too damaged to reach, and who will take a gun to the streets regardless of support offered. But in the vast majority of cases I believe a positive outcome can be reached, and the vast majority of deaths spared.

Of course more father involvement or more mother involvement can help if they are savvy to the needs of their son – which is sadly not always assured regardless of more involvement. But I'd go further and say anyone-involvement will make an enormous difference if they are able to offer substantive support; father, mother, sibling, friends, neighbors, social workers, psychiatrists, paid support workers or yes even support animals. Any one of these people could make the difference between outcomes of safety, and avoidable killings.

The implementing a nation-wide program to support vulnerable young men could start with identifying which individuals or groups need support, and applying social campaigns and adequate funding. One study of 239 killers, for example, found that 21.34% had had a definite or suspected head injury, and a further 28.03% of them had definite, highly probable or possible autism spectrum disorder.[1] This is not to suggest that autism causes people to be killers, but rather that autism combined with other factors such as bullying, isolation, lack of support etc. – the typical male experience – can lead to a pathological outcome.

As an aside I was pleased to learn former U.S. President Donald Trump had increased support funding of the Autism Cares Act,[2] some of which will go to support boys whom the CDC says are four times more likely to have an autism spectrum disorder than girls.

If a culture of support could be extended to all vulnerable male demographics we'd have less need for the media with their gloating condemnation of young male perpetrators, and those same men could get the support they so desperately need.

References:

[1] Allely, C. S., Minnis, H., Thompson, L., Wilson, P., & Gillberg, C. (2014). Neurodevelopmental and psychosocial risk factors in serial killers and mass murderers. Aggression and violent behavior, 19(3), 288-301.
[2] Autism Bill Signed Into Law By President Trump

Note: The above article is not aimed at any specific school shooting, including the most recent in Texas, but rather to all such events collectively.

The debate between the sexes

Chris Good · 29 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The debate between the sexes has raged on for decades and it seems necessary to acknowledge that, to some degree, neither side will buckle to the other. The reason for this, obviously, is that we each have our own views, our beliefs and our own cause. A staggering amount of research and statistics are available that prove, beyond doubt, that institutional and cultural prejudice exists against men, so we must ask ourselves why the feminist movement, and individual feminists, refuse to acknowledge this?

My argument would be down to the natural tendency of us all, as humans, to favour information that supports our own preconceptions and our idea of the truth and to discredit that which threatens it; this is well known in psychology and is called “confirmation bias”.

Perhaps one of the first lessons in research, science and experiment is to acknowledge our bias, prejudice and the simple fact that we are, most likely, looking into something in order to prove ourselves right. It can be an incredibly difficult task to remain objective when faced with data that conflicts with, what we know in our core and very being, is correct.

Confirmation bias is no more evident than where emotional investment and identity is at stake. It is one thing to objectively hold a viewpoint and opinion and face the challenge to change that, but it is quite another when it threatens a perspective and ‘truth’ that we have attached to our idea of ‘who we are’ and ‘what we are’. I am a “Christian”. I am a “Feminist”. “I am a….” What we are saying is that we have made a belief a very definition of who we are and, perhaps, why we are here. This truth belongs to me, defines me and more than that, it IS me.

We might, then, understand the conflict of the Creationist when faced with the evidence of the Big Bang and evolution. It doesn’t just threaten a fact within his mind, it threatens the core of his beliefs, who he is, what he is, how he got here. Better to discard the information and evidence and explain it away: better to protect oneself. Emotion before objective thought. Self-preservation before truth.

This is true, also, of anyone adopting beliefs and ideas with which they invest themselves on an emotional level and on a level of identity: “This is me”, “I am a….”

I bought a fantastic book, “Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men? A Debate” by Warren Farrell and James P. Sterba. The reason I bought it? I liked that it was a book devoted to discussion. Both sides were represented. As a complete work, it was without bias, which is the objective manner in which I aim to approach the gender equality discussion. I ran a bath, made a mountain of bubbles, threw on some tunes, had a couple of candles flickering and readied a short whisky (which is perhaps the most stereotypically “manly” thing about that whole event, but I was happy). All that remained was to get the book which had arrived that day. I bought it for objectivity, with a noble and, perhaps, pious, idea of just how fair I would always be in my contributions to the discussion. As I approached the bathroom, the book in hand, my curiosity got the better of me. I would read every word in that book, but I couldn’t wait to find out what its final answer and conclusion was to that question that was burning in my mind: Does feminism discriminate against men?

Padding toward the warmth of the bath, I flicked to the last page. It was going to tell me just how right I was. I had independently researched so many factors in this debate and formed my own conclusion that Feminism does, indeed, discriminate against men; and I was about to read, in black and white, just how intelligent, thorough and brilliant I had been in my efforts. It was going to agree with me…and what a joy the book would be to read as the candlelight flickered on the bubbles, as I sipped on my cheap whisky, knowing that with every passing word, I was getting closer to that last page, where it reads in stark black and white lettering: YOU WERE RIGHT, CHRIS!

“Given that feminism has not discriminated against men, the future of feminism and men looks very promising indeed, especially if men in sufficient numbers come around to endorse the feminist ideal of equality, so that it can be legally enforced.”

I huffed, I puffed, my brow creased and I glared at the page before casting the book down onto a stack of towels and opting to read a sci-fi novel. How could it say that? How could a book claiming to look at the real facts come to that conclusion, in light of everything I've researched, every discussion I've had with broken fathers who are unrepresented in the law and every mind-numbing examination of statistics? How could a credible study of all the information available to us come to such a ludicrous conclusion and say that I am wrong? They'll publish anything these days!

With one foot plunging through the bubbles and half a mind to get some more whisky, I looked at the sci-fi novel, with disgust. Not just because it was proving to be an awful read, that caused me to consider that perhaps I could write fiction, but because I suddenly came face to face with my lack of integrity. Holding that awful sci-fi novel as a preferred option to facing whatever truth may be found in my previously planned bubble bath reading time, I saw bias. Prejudice; against truth and knowledge and wisdom.

I picked the book up again and resolved to find out why I might be wrong. Why did my research and my own mind lead me down a wrong path? I was, perhaps, to be challenged to question whether I was wrong, but that should always be the case, if my previously noble and definitely pious (proven by this point) notion of objectivity was to be believed. I was, perhaps, to find out that I was wrong: but am I seeking truth, or self-affirmation and sense of belonging in a community?

As it turns out, I had been a silly buffoon. The book is, indeed, designed as a debate. Warren Farrell, in opposition to feminism, went first; and if you'd like to read his summary page, you'll find it on page 111, in the middle of the book. James P Sterba then took his turn, concluding on the page that confronted me with an ugly side of myself.

Even with the most noble intentions, my own bias, my own prejudice for the truth I believed in and my own sense of self-preservation got the better of me.

I do not tell you this to, simply, disgrace myself. Rather, I admit to it as an example of how we all, whatever side we're on, are susceptible to that very real, very tangible, but often unnoticed in ourselves, discrimination against real truth and real knowledge. What is our goal?

I did read through that book and it remains my favourite, simply because it includes both sides of the argument in a concise and fair debate. It's not like trying to make sense of the issue as one person speaks about the wage gap and another brings up the disposable sex, before someone then brings up the lack of education for girls in third world countries. Even that last sentence was confusing! Read that book. Each subject is represented by one side and responded to fairly. The only question that matters is about how we will read it.

Through my own disgrace, I realised I had to acknowledge my prejudice and bias and read Farrell's arguments with a mind of questioning and criticism and Sterba's arguments with an openness to whatever truths might be found in his interpretation of the available data.

Truthfully, I do not think that an acknowledgement of personal bias and a genuine pursuit of truth will ever be found in the proud, emotionally-invested, career-feminists such as Valenti, Chemaly or Greer. All they see is that which supports their own sense of self, sells their books and keeps their articles popular. To some degree, perhaps they don't even choose to be blind to the very real facts of male discrimination.

For the same reason, I don't think there is any reversal of major feminist organisations, such as NOW, or even websites such as feminist.com. How many feminists who confront their own confirmation bias does it take to reverse the ingrained assumptions and direction of a moneymaking, job-safe feminist organisation? None: they get fired.

I would hope that any MRAs or humanists would engage with all topics in the gender equality debate as individual evaluations of discrimination, each deserving their own objective study, research and conclusions. Should we study an issue and objectively conclude that feminist claims were correct, would we allow that admission? I would hope so.

Still, I have to say it as I perceive the situation. The prejudice against truth will continue, the emotional investment and bias toward one's own truth will always result in two sides of an argument. Like the Protestant and Catholic churches, we must learn to live and communicate together, rather than spending all of our time and energy trying to pull down each other's steeples.

What we can demand, though, is an unbiased government. It is not their job to support either 'movement' or express any bias, or wear any campaign's T-shirt. What we should demand of them is that, while bias may exist in co-existing MRA or Feminism, it should not exist in the government or in laws.

Let the feminists enjoy their ivory towers and their personal affirmation of their own righteousness, seriously, leave them to it. Let us, instead, focus on taking what we know…what we objectively know…and demanding objective action from our government, not from feminism.

——-

The Johnny Depp, Amber Heard Ordeal exposes hidden truth about Domestic Violence

AVfM Video Source · 29 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Girl Power

Mark Dent · 30 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Last week my daughter took her five-year-old son to a prospective primary school meeting with the principal for a tour of the school and some information about what it has to offer.

As she walked down the corridor past some of the classrooms, she heard a young female teacher speaking to the third graders in front of her. She was bemoaning the injustice of the gender pay gap and presenting the difference in pay to the men in the AFL and women whose competition has just been created in the last five years.

The women's game has cost the AFL tens of millions of dollars as it struggles to find its feet. The female game is kept afloat on the back of the money brought in by TV rights and the huge attendances drawn by the men. Admission is free and the game receives enormous media coverage despite the low standard of football on show. The girls have state of the art facilities and next year will receive a 94% pay increase wholly unjustified by the actual football being played or the money it is generating.

The AFL head honchos explained the reason for this huge unjustified pay increase as an investment in the future.

A similar scenario exists in America and the disparity between the male and female competition. One brings in billions of dollars each year and supplements the existence of the other which runs at a loss every year. I'll let you work out which team bring in the bucks and which one loses money.

Yet still, one demographic demands more pay and calls the pay gap sexist.

The young teacher asked the young children if they thought the pay difference was fair and of course they all chanted the answer she wanted to hear.

"NOOOOO!"

That was all my daughter heard and she told me she thought twice about letting me know as she knew how upset I would be. She was right. To know my beloved grandson will be attending this school, as pleasant as it may be in many respects, is deeply upsetting.

My daughter was wise enough to know that it was not the time or place to begin questioning the lesson she heard as it would place a black mark next to her name before her son had even begun his time there.

As a former teacher I know this is true.

I have always known this propaganda is being force fed to our children across all levels of education in our country and throughout western societies but to have it confirmed in such concrete fashion in a school I know my flesh and blood will attend is painful.

My daughter assured me she will speak out once her son is in the class where this poison is being promoted.

I thought about how I would have responded had I been a fellow staff member and heard that young woman spouting such obvious lies and misrepresentations.

I could have asked the kids whether they thought it was fair that the female principal was being paid much more money than I was? I could have pointed to the fact that female models are paid many millions more than the top male models and posed the question-why do they think that is the case if we are to believe that men are paid more than women in the workplace because they are men?

I think I could expose the utterly illogical and deceitful nature of this myth inside ten minutes if given the chance. But, of course, such an opportunity would never arise.

Only a few days after learning of the feminist preaching in what will most likely be my grandson's primary school for many practical reasons that make sense despite this revelation, I came across an article which stated Toorak Girls College will no longer use the words “girls or “ladies” in their classrooms out of respect to trans or non binary children.

The College’s Principal trying to explain or defend the approach they are using and denying the article’s premise without really explaining their stance. Listen to her “defense” of the article which said gendered language would no longer be used at Toorak Girls College.

In an attempt to uncover what was behind this decision I went to their website and found what I believe is far more disturbing information about the way these girls are being educated.

It makes it abundantly clear that our girls continue to be lied to and fed the mantra that they are disadvantaged and oppressed because of their gender. This is all the more ironic given the school fees for this well-resourced private College on the Mornington Peninsula. The fee for years 9-12 is thirty thousand dollars per year.

It has always been bemusing to see that the feminist ideology of oppression of females is most prominent in private schools where only the wealthiest elite families can afford to send their daughters. These girls are educated in the most beautiful environments in schools which have an abundance of resources and first-class facilities, yet they still swallow the notion that they are in fact, a marginalized and abused group who must fight to receive the equal treatment society wishes to deny them.

Allow me to provide you with some insight into the sort of feminist poison these girls are being force fed.

The following can be found on their “Girl Power” blog.

> As an independent girls school, Toorak College is acutely aware of the gender biases that affect women in all stages of life. Unconscious bias is present from a young age and continues into adulthood with children classifying jobs and activities as specific to boys or girls, girls receiving 11% less pocket money than boys, teenage girls being less likely to take part in organised sport and one in every two mothers experiencing discrimination during pregnancy, on parental leave or when returning to work.
>
> Following the momentum of International Women’s Day, the need to spread awareness of these biases and the inequity they provoke, grows. We have put together a guide that explains the unconscious bias phenomenon along with some practical tips on how we can address these gender stereotypes in our community in order to effect generational change.

So, one very questionable survey is held up as proof that girls receive 11% less pocket money than boys. One survey found a one-dollar difference between the genders. Are we seriously giving a moment of our attention to such a spurious, irrelevant piece of fluff and using it to drive the way our children are educated about the world and the way it operates?

The idea that these privileged young women who have a lifestyle beyond the reach of the vast majority of their peers are informed of their victim status based upon a shady, politically motivated survey which indicates girls receive a dollar or two less pocket money than boys is beyond parody.

If any of the girls lucky enough to attend this college lack the intellectual capacity to observe their surroundings and understand their privileged status (despite the propaganda they are immersed in) then it is clear that it is more than the mythical patriarchy holding them back from achieving their dreams.

Do they moan and whine about this bitter travesty as they swim laps in their school pool or jog around their superlative athletic track? Perhaps they cry on each other’s shoulders during their violin lessons or as they walk to their state-of-the-art science laboratories.

These regularly cited articles are nothing more than gender hit pieces published on a regular basis by newspapers and online media all of whom are pushing the same agenda. We see the biannual articles on women doing more housework than men mantra and this too is about as credible as the gender pay gap as they never factor in the work men do outside of the home or the many extra hours they spend in their place of work.

Here is one quote from the linked article written by Suzanne Venker.

> To realize that women can't become breadwinners and at the same time shed their emotional ties to the home and the children is scary. No one told them this would happen, so naturally they blame husbands who, as it is, spend triple the amount of time on child care than they did in 1965 and roughly six hours more per week on household chores. That's in addition to working far more hours in the marketplace than married mothers do.

Of course, male sacrifice on display in the work done outside of the home which provides the family with the shelter and comforts they thrive on is never written about or highlighted by our education system, government or media. In fact, when men work long hours it is presented as male privilege.

It is all a sham with the same intended outcome as the bile being fed to the girls in our classrooms all over the country.

Are the girls taught about these innate privileges they gain from birth? I think not.

My sisters certainly would never have swapped places with me and my brothers during our school years. We were regularly strapped and hit while not a finger was raised in anger in our sisters all girl college.

If feminist driven teaching is going to selectively cherry pick the most unscientific of surveys which happen to support their agenda and use this rubbish in their teaching then perhaps they should be more balanced and let the girls know all about the countless advantages their being female brings them.

They are more likely to graduate from university, earn a masters degree, finish in the top ten percent of their class, but far less likely to be homeless, commit suicide, become addicted to opioid or die on the job as their male peers may well do.

So much good news with which to uplift and inspire confidence in their future.

Back to the propaganda.

> A staggering finding of the World Economic Forum's Global Gender Gap Report states that none of us will see gender parity in our lifetimes, nor will many of our children. Projecting current trends into the future, the 2020 report estimates the gender gap to close in 99.5 years.

> While those statistics might seem discouraging for some, Toorak College's deputy head Kate Brown is motivated by the challenge.

> "Parity is not something that's going to come soon… but we need to make progress towards that," Brown says.

How can Kate Brown speak such demonstrable lies to the students in her care? How does she think this lie of oppression and inequity benefits the girls other than to make them the next generation of angry hateful feminists?

You know you are on shaky ground when a few statements on a small poster can destroy your lies.

There are many examples of female CEO's, female politicians, female business women, female lawyers and judges, female vets, doctors, surgeons, architects and have been for decades. How did they manage to achieve their dreams when society was hell bent on making it nigh impossible?

And why the endless focus on CEO's and representation in parliament without showing some integrity and teaching the girls about the truth of male sacrifice and courage which makes the death in the workplace gender gap such a tremendous chasm and very real as opposed to the tortuous manipulations which lead to the so-called gender pay gap which has been illegal for decades?

If we dare to mention the glass ceiling what about the deadly, dirty basement almost entirely occupied by men?

Men die in their workplace every day keeping the electricity flowing, our food arriving in the supermarkets, our fish markets filled with fresh produce, our water running, our roads built, our sewerage systems operating, our skyscrapers built, our mines digging up minerals, our farms functioning.

A simple thanks would be welcome.

> "We, as teachers, very much see ourselves as inspiring the women who are the next generation of leaders so that they can step up and inspire their daughters." Guided by the maxim, 'You can't be what you can't see', the Mount Eliza school sees significant value in providing students with career inspiration and role modelling by connecting with alumni and industry partners.
>
> One such partner is the Academy for Enterprising Girls, a federally-funded initiative dedicated to solving real-world problems, and developing enterprising skills and a growth mindset. Annie O'Rourke founded the organisation in response to the gender pay gap and issues surrounding female representation in start-ups, business and STEM-based jobs.
>
> "What the research shows is that from as young as 10 or 11, girls get an idea of whether they're good at something or not," O'Rourke explains. "We needed to develop and run a program for young girls to encourage them that they actually could run a business, and that STEM wasn't something to be scared of."

Watch each of the videos on their website which proudly display the incredible resources available to the girls lucky enough to attend this elite and prestigious college.

Surely if the girls are still scared of STEM subjects after multiple years of exposure to the best STEM education available from the most qualified teachers, then blame for this state of affairs must be pointed at those who have been teaching and nurturing these young women rather than some nebulous notion like the oppressive patriarchy?

But why should blame be placed on anyone or any institution when young women exercise their right to choose?

I thought freedom and individual rights were linked to the concept of choice. Surely it is the person who has choices about what direction their life will take who holds the power and independence we all seek?

And once again we see the gender pay gap written and spoken about as if it is a fact of life rather than a deceitfully manipulated lie created to instill in young women the belief that our society hates them and deliberately chooses to punish them for being female.

This is an act of pure evil. It is a poisonous lie designed to ensure more generations of girls will enter the workforce with a chip on their shoulders and sense of entitlement which simply causes further division and rage within our society.

> Through the academy, girls aged 10 to 18 can learn about entrepreneurship, design thinking, and starting their own business with the aim to create economic freedom for women.

Again, they write as if it is a fact that women are not already economically free and independent. Another devious lie presented as if it were fact.

Women have enormous economic power within western society. This is an indisputable fact. Women can achieve this in a number of ways not available to men.

It is a statistical fact that women control 85% of all household spending even when they are not working outside of the home. In other words, they control and spend the money earned by their husband or partner.

Women can also have economic freedom by choosing to remain child free and single. Women who choose to do this earn more than men who are single and childless.

Look at the athletic facilities on the school grounds which most co-ed or boys high and secondary schools could only observe with envy- yet I am sure the fact that less girls continue to participate in sports once they leave college is also blamed on the subliminal messages we send our girls about their place in sport and exercise.

It's as if the girls are being prevented from pursuing their sporting dreams by a cabal of evil men and boys who place roadblocks in their way at every turn. In fact, I have written about this issue -the very opposite is true!

Male sporting enterprises like the powerful AFL have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on the setting up of the women's league (AFLW). They have poured millions in funding into the development of facilities in suburban football competitions for girls and I have written at length about the tens of millions of dollars raised by male sporting organizations to fund breast cancer facilities and medical research even though it is now the least deadly of all cancers and men have a lower life expectancy.

This generosity is never reciprocated.

The last federal budget was another example of the gynocentric obsession of our society. Let me quote Bettina Arndt.

> The case is now overwhelming that men facing relationship breakdown should be a key target of Australia's suicide prevention policies.
>
> There's no way our health bureaucrats are going to let that happen. The March 2022 budget allocated $2.1

> billion to services for women and girls and just $1 million to "improve long term health outcomes" for men and boys. Isn't that extraordinary? Somehow females are seen as deserving of 2000 times more investment in their health than men, despite their more robust health resulting in four extra years of life expectancy.

This is almost incomprehensible. Yet sadly, true.

Yet Kristy Kendall, the principal of Toorak Girls College would have her girls believe they are the demographic most undervalued, most ignored, with the most obstacles placed before them in their attempts to live a happy, healthy life with access to all the support and encouragement they believe is available to men and boys.

Women and girls are literally receiving billions more than men and boys from the very governments they claim to be unrepresentative of their needs due to the lack of women in parliament. With enemies like this who needs friends?

Men and boys are also continually denigrated and demonized in our schools and in our media. No girl or woman has ever had to endure such a concerted attack on the very nature of their gender. Terms like toxic masculinity do not become a commonly used part of the lexicon without a concerted campaign to have the idea seep into our consciousness.

Imagine if we freely spoke of toxic femininity? imagine how the likes of Kate Brown and other women who teach in girls' colleges would use this as proof of the way our society denigrates females. But it's boys and men who are presented as innately violent, abusive and liable to rape and kill at a moment's notice. It's boys who are told to stand and apologise for the sins of those who share their immutable characteristics but never bathe in the limelight of the countless good actions carried out by men.

That's more than acceptable.

Collective guilt is in fact an appropriate response to any wrong doing committed by a member of the male gender but God forgive any man who stereotypes women and girls!

Imagine Hollywood creating film after film devoted to the problem with men? The latest, titled Men has just been released across America.

Let a few critics fill you in on its premise.

- Because if Men has a point at all, it's that women are the stronger, more resourceful sex.
- And perhaps without intending to, Garland has hit on an all too timely truth: that men seek to control women as a response to their own self-loathing. Even if you walk out of Men not knowing what to think, the movie brings you to a place where feeling overtakes thought. The shiver that comes over you may be one of recognition or melancholy or a muddle of both, as you stand at the edge of where a movie ends, blurring into real life.
- The final message seems to be: "Isn't it gross that we do this to ourselves?" Male oppression is born of primal instinct and childish desire, codified in religion, protected by government, but ultimately embodied in us, the men who pass it on.

Yes, I've said it all before.

Imagine an endless run of movies telling us how vile women are. Yet this ongoing hatred of men does not cause a ripple in our sick culture. It receives standing ovations.

Kristy Kendall might try to describe her notion that women and girls are the demographic who needs to fight for equality and a fair go as an accurate reflection of reality when it is men and boys killing themselves at extraordinary rates every year, men who make up the vast majority of those living rough on our streets, men who make up 95% of workplace deaths (well over 100 each year), boys who continue to fail in our education system and are dropping out of our tertiary institutions at an alarming rate, men who face the loss of their children simply because they spent their lives working to provide for their family and men who face far more severe prison terms for committing the same crime as a woman.

I came across this comment from a woman tonight in response to an article which spoke about the different way we raise our boys and girls. She makes some compelling points. I would like her words to be read out to the girls at Toorak Girls College.

Her English is not perfect but I think her message is clear, truthful and powerful.

As girls we are given much support and care by parents, teachers and peers. As girls we are treated better and so enjoy support from society.

Since we as girls are given by differential treatment much mental social/emotional support verbal interaction and care this creates the opposite outcome for girls when compared with boys.

We receive love and honor simply for being girls.

This creates all of the good things. We have lower average stress for ease of learning. We enjoy much freedom of expression from much protection by society.

We enjoy much positive trust/communication from parents, teachers and support for perceived weaknesses.

We are reaping a bonanza in the information age. Now with girls and women taking over many areas of society we enjoy more lavishing of love honor from society while boys and men are now failing more and are given more ridicule and abuse by society.

Mind you this is now coming from girls and women using our still protected freedoms of expression.

Perhaps I can finish with a couple of images. One is a chart which is called For Every Hundred Girls/Women and the second is a photo taken from the Toorak College Website.

The chart speaks for itself. It shows the enormous disparities in who is succeeding and who is failing or suffering the most in our current society. Perhaps the girls at Toorak College could run their eyes over this table and be asked to explain how it is possible given the guff they have been taught about female oppression. It may be based on American figures but they mirror the statistics in all western countries.

For Every 100 Girls/Women.....	There are this many Boys/Men.....
Who take AP/Honors courses in Art/Music	54
Who earn a master's degree	55
Who take AP/Honors courses in Foreign/Classical Language	67
Who take AP/Honors courses in English/Language Arts	67
Enrolled in U.S. graduate schools	72
25 to 29 years who have achieved a master's degree	72
Who earn a bachelor's degree	74
Who earn a master's degree	74
Enrolled in U.S. colleges	77
Who are in the top 10% of their high school class	79
Who take AP/Honors courses in Natural Sciences	79
25 to 29 years who have achieved a master's degree	80
25 to 29 years who have a first professional or doctor's degree	81
Who take AP/Honors courses in math	82
25 to 29 years who have achieved a bachelor's degree	85
Who take the SAT test	89
Who earn a doctor's degree	90
25 to 29 years who have finished some college but no degree	97
Who earn any kind of degree or certificate	119
K-12 in public schools classified as having emotional disturbance	140
Who repeat kindergarten	145
Who are homeless	154
Ages 3-17 years diagnosed with communication disorders	168
Who drink alcohol or are alcohol abused	193
Who have problems with alcohol abuse	203
K-12 and classified as having a specific learning disability	207
Who die by opioid overdose	212
25 to 34 years old who die	222
4-17 years diagnosed with ADHD	237
Suspended from school	243
Who are homeless and abused	247
15 to 24 years old who die	253
Expelled from school	261
Ages 15 to 19 who commit suicide	263
Who receive services in public schools for autism	303
In public schools suffering or having emotional disturbance	355
Ages 15 to 19 who commit suicide	413
Ages 20-24 who commit suicide	444
Under age 18 who are in a correctional facility	773
In adult correctional facilities	1,000
Who die on the job	1,254
In a federal prison	1,333

Sources: the same here www.cs.org/repository/view/aba-dep/for-every-100-girls-women/

Copy Diary

And the final image?

Why would any principal encourage their students to take such an aggressive, arrogant pose? Imagine if a male principal had his boys stand behind him with the same posture, their expressions saying, “I’m powerful- so what are you going to do about it?”

It is more of the same poison I spoke about in the first lines of this article. It is an act of aggression not empowerment. They are looking for a fight. Deliberately creating an us against them environment. “We might be in the most privileged one percent of the population but we are still oppressed and we’re not going to take it anymore!” as they stand in their multi- million-dollar auditorium.

Not one of them, the adult included, seems to have the slightest sense of the irony of this moment.

Movie Review – Top Gun: Maverick

AVfM Video Source · 31 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Critical Drinker is an anti-woke Youtuber from Scotland and comes highly recommended.

Six months at sea in the Merchant Marine

AVfM Video Source · 31 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

There are many tasks necessary to maintain an industrialised society. Sometimes they are low status or low paying but they are always important. Many of them are invisible jobs where the jobs and the people who perform them are rarely thought of by the wider community. Invisible jobs are overwhelmingly done by men.

A Voice for Men presents a short documentary on life in the US Merchant Marine, a very good example of an invisible job. What men do.

Featured imaged by kees torn – MAERSK MC KINNEY MÖLLER &; MARSEILLE MAERSK, CC BY-SA 2.0, https://commons.wikimedia.org/w/index.php?curid=82090447

Is Gynocentrism Adaptive?

Peter Ryan · 1 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

What Is Good For The Genes And Society Vs Pedestalising Women

There is a common misconception that what is good for women is good for the propagation of the genome and society. That pedestalising women is interchangeable with maximising the copies of the genome a lineage leaves behind and the survival of society. The reality is far more complicated. This misunderstanding leads to incorrect and frankly bizarre assertions that women are in a biological sense more valuable than men. That a population can only survive if women are protected and prioritised above all other concerns.

The truth is that whilst women have an important reproductive role in giving birth and caring for small infants, this function is merely one activity in a vast web of activities that have to occur for genes to be successfully passed on from one generation to the next. A community can have as many women as it pleases and as many children as it likes and the reality is that it will all amount to precisely nothing in evolutionary terms if basic survival requirements are not addressed. The reality is that the reproductive role of women whilst important, is no more important than many other activities and hardly the overwhelming priority it is presented as.

Gynocentrism is by its very nature a one-dimensional fixation on female well-being. It is an absolute and unconditional pedestalisation of women. All other priorities and needs for society are secondary. The myopic fixation on prioritising female well-being above all else, is actually detrimental to the continuation of a society and passing on the genes. Society is sustained through a complex balancing of priorities. The continuation of the genome itself similarly relies on a complex balancing of priorities.

Life history theory[1] sets out in detail how life strategically allocates finite time, energy and resources towards various activities in an optimal balance. Reproduction and mating are merely two activities. There are dozens of other activities life spends more time, energy and resources on. Some organisms like insects and bacteria have a fast life history strategy, invest little in survival and development and reproduce hundreds or even thousands of offspring. Other species like humans and large vertebrates, have a slow life history strategy and invest substantially more in their own survival and development and reproduce comparatively few offspring.

Humans are a social species and require a complex social system to perpetuate themselves. This social system fundamentally requires a balancing of priorities. The survival of society and also our genetic survival, depends on achieving the correct balance. Gynocentrism destroys this balance. The plummeting fertility rate in developed countries and its connection with gynocentrism has been discussed before by Paul Elam and Peter Wright in their video Chasing The Dragon.[2]

When society puts men down to lift women up, family formation and fertility rates plummet. That is what the hard data tells us. The economic and social conditions for society also begin to decline (as we can see from the effects of fatherlessness and the boy crisis in education for example) and this in turn directly impacts the reproductive prospects of future generations and their children. That is the gynocentric death spiral for society.

I don't expect this article to change the minds of gynocentric acolytes that insist on propagating the idea that pedestalising women is what nature intended. I expect the consequences of gynocentrism to eventually destroy the societies that produced it. This article hopefully will make it easier for some to understand why society is in decline in part as a result of gynocentrism.

Karen Straughan did an excellent video[3] a decade ago on how our gynocentric society will slowly destroy itself. It is not just the social and economic effects that she discussed we have to worry about, it is now the substantive demographic shortfall in births combined with these effects that spell death for society. A population with a lack of youth cannot sustain an aging population and ultimately replace the people it loses.

A gynocentric culture is a culture of death, not a culture of life. In the end societies that pedestalise women die out.

Gynocentrism is not an evolutionary adaptive set of behaviours. It does not increase the prospects of society or the number of copies of the genome, it reduces them. If gynocentrism were adaptive you would expect this insanely gynocentric culture to be bursting at the seams with children and record fertility rates and yet we see the opposite. If gynocentrism is so adaptive, where are all the babies?

If gynocentrism were adaptive we would see record social and economic progress completely independent of debt from empowering women and marginalising men and yet we see the opposite. We see stagnation, decline, crashes and bubbles from fake financial growth and an ever increasing reliance on debt year by year. If gynocentrism were adaptive we should see obvious indications of that in our gynocentric culture and yet we do not.

Gynocentrism by its nature is unconditional and absolute, it will always inevitably grow to the very extremes until the society that produced it collapses under the weight of it. Gynocentrism is like cancer, it is a pathological growth that disrupts the functional balance of society.

Just consider the negative net social and economic impact of modern divorce and family court on family formation and on the fertility rate of current adults and also the children coming from broken families. Consider the chilling effect of metoo# on relationship formation and the net effect of the boy crisis in education impacting the future prospects of men and women in finding suitable partners to have children, maintain stable relationships and raise children.

It may take decades or centuries, but in the end gynocentrism destroys the foundations of the societies that give rise to it. The family itself is sacrificed for gynocentrism, one of the very building blocks of civilisation. In the past civilisation collapsed faster from other destructive forces before gynocentrism itself could contribute to the implosion. Technology has prolonged the decline of civilisation to such a degree that now social factors like gynocentrism, are directly contributing to the demographic implosion and fragmentation of society.

Gynocentrism Versus Ancestral Pragmatism

Conflating gynocentrism with the protection of women in circumstances where they are objectively in greater danger and are objectively more vulnerable, demonstrates a critical misunderstanding of what gynocentrism is. When you protect women over men merely because they are women, when you prioritise their well-being merely because they are women, then that is gynocentrism.

When you prioritise women's protection and well-being because they are objectively in greater need of that protection and concern, then it is the physical reality of the situation steering the decision and not some deluded notion women are somehow more deserving of our concern simply because they are women. This same objective reasoning can guide the reverse prioritisation of male well-being where it is warranted.

This simple distinction is what so many fail to grasp. In my article on Diagnosing Gynocentrism[4], I discussed this important distinction in detail. I gave the example of a woman seriously injured in a car accident and the man being only mildly injured. Is it gynocentrism to help the woman first? No. Would it be if the man were seriously injured and the woman only mildly injured? Yes. Note the difference. So when we go back and examine our prehistory and start projecting what we are observing in our modern gynocentric culture back onto the past, we might want to consider the blind psychological fixation on women that drives gynocentrism.

It is certainly the case that in our past there have been numerous instances where women have been objectively in greater need of protection than men given our physical sex differences and the harsh environment's we often lived in. It is also the case though that such societies could not afford to inefficiently allocate time, energy and resources in such a way as to pedestalise women. The social concern for women in other words had to be contingent on it being for the greater good of the community and grounded in the priority to survive. Blindly pedestalising women wastes time, energy and resources that many past communities had in short supply.

Ultimately it was the greater good of the community and the drive to survive rather than a myopic concern for female well-being, that drove much of the customs and practices seen in our prehistoric past and past civilization's. That reality is also the case in respect of many of the traditions and laws regarding the roles of men and women in past societies.

It was out of pragmatism in the face of a harsh environment before modern technology rather than blind gynocentrism, that resulted in women in certain instances garnering greater protection than men and men being assigned to more physically dangerous and demanding tasks like war. I am not suggesting such a division was ideal, I am suggesting that out of survival and what actually worked such divisions were undertaken.

Sometimes it was to women's advantage and other times it was to men's advantage. We can argue which sex had it worse for hours, but the reality these divisions were not made to favour one sex over the other, or pedestalise women or men, they were made to keep society going and keep people alive.

No society can last without having the greater good of the society and the survival of society in mind as the ultimate check on the misallocation of time, energy and resources. Gynocentrism is a product of a culture that has abandoned such a fundamental balance and that is why inevitably gynocentrism is in part a driver of the collapse of society itself.

Gynocentrism does not prioritise the greater good or the survival of society first, it prioritises female self-interest and well-being at all costs, absolutely and without compromise. The future of society be dammed! The slogan, "The future is female" might as well say the future is death. There are eventually no people and a collapsed society in such a future, based on the data we have and the demographic and socioeconomic trends we are observing.

Male Sacrifice Alone Is Not Evidence Of Gynocentrism

Related to the conflation of gynocentrism with the greater good, is the notion that sacrifice is the sole domain of men and that such sacrifice is somehow proof men are disposable. Disposability infers that men are of little value and are easily replaced. Disposable items are considered disposable for that very reason. Again the reality is far more complex than suggesting men are biologically disposable because they sacrifice their lives and therefore gynocentrism is adaptive.

A male that reproduces and survives will reproduce more than a male that reproduces and then dies. The male that survives to reproduce multiple times will always be at an evolutionary advantage compared to the male that reproduces once and then dies or dies and does not reproduce at all. Over time the man that survives dominates the gene pool. The simple reality is that sacrifice is incidental to men passing on their genes rather than a requirement and that men losing their lives, is a cost that the forces of natural selection select against and minimise.

Yes sexual selection on males does occur and yes that can select for men to adopt traits and behaviours that improve their reproductive fitness at the expense of their long-term survival. However even under sexual selection, males that evolve variations on traits that maintain the same reproductive fitness without incurring the cost of reduced survival, will be at an evolutionary advantage.

Males that get the same job done at a lower cost to themselves, win the evolutionary race. It is basic efficiency that is selected for even under sexual selection. It is not only just whether you reproduce or not that matters, but how efficiently you pass on your genes. Ultimately sacrifice whether it is attributed to sexual selection or not, is an evolutionary cost that selection attempts to minimise even under sexual selection pressures.

Sexual selection does not have to come at the cost of reduced survival for sexual selection to produce traits that the other sex selects for. Males and females can develop traits through sexual selection that have no effect on survival at all or even enhance survival.

Contrary to popular opinion, sexual selection does not override natural selection in the sense of eliminating it, sexual selection is present alongside natural selection. Sexually attractive traits matter little if males with them fail to survive to reproduce or males that survive longer outbreed males with such traits. Ultimately the two forces of selection are in a certain dynamic equilibrium with each other and the eventual evolutionary solution can be the development of traits that satisfy both evolutionary forces or that find the optimal balance between them.

Comparing the forces of sexual selection on human males with male insects etc is fraught with issues. There is a very big difference between the selective dynamics at work on organisms like insects with relatively short lifespans and developmental periods compared to the human male and that demonstrate much higher levels of sexual dimorphism than humans.

Drawing long bows with associating examples of male insects and peacocks with human males is emblematic of the problem of bio-gynocentrism[5] selectively framing biology through a gynocentric lens to support a preconceived narrative and omitting inconvenient facts that do not support such a narrative.

Sexual selection in humans is not just limited to males either, there are numerous examples of sexual selection acting on human females too. Some of these examples actually can reduce female survival and increase their fertility, just as sexual selection does sometimes in males. Of course that won't be discussed by ideologues set on arguing men serving women is what nature intended, because it does not fit the narrative.

Sacrifice itself is not indicative of disposability either. Valuable people and valuable things can be sacrificed. In fact sometimes the most valuable people sacrifice the most for society and their sacrifice has an impact that lasts centuries and in some cases thousands of years.

Men and males more broadly, are often highly selective on whether and precisely when and how they risk their own lives. If men are biologically programmed to just drop what they are doing, risk their own safety and help a random female stranger, why is it that when they don't there seems to be a need in our gynocentric culture to socially reinforce this expectation on men and speak up when they don't throw themselves in harms way? Seems kind of odd to me!

Where was the gynocentric instinct recently on the New York subway[6] for example? Gynocentrism is not hardwired in our brains, it is socially learned and socially enforced and we have clear examples in our society of precisely where that social enforcement is coming from! Gynocentrism plays on biological drives and manipulates them, it is not itself a hardwired instinct. It is rather amusing to see the aggrieved entitlement[7] that gynocentrism produces when it is denied, as more and more men are slowly waking up to the lopsided gynocentric dynamic in society and refusing to go along with it.

Truly disposable creatures in contrast to human males, exercise little discretion when it comes self-sacrifice. They are not picky. There is no thinking involved in such self-sacrifice from creatures that are truly disposable, just reflexive biological processes from relatively simple forms of life that invest very little in their own survival, have short lifespans and quickly and easily replace themselves.

Society, families and partners lose a great deal socially and economically when men die. It also takes decades to replace them and raise the next generation of men. Losing men has a cost and marginalising men has a cost. A considerable cost. Losing too many men and marginalising men, has the effect of destroying societies primary capacity to support its own survival and long-term prosperity.

Consider the multitude of activities men have undertaken in our prehistory right up until the present day. Consider the net result of losing substantial numbers of men needlessly. Consider the net effect of our society marginalising whole generations of men. It is not a coincidence that our economies have increasingly relied on unsustainable levels of debt to keep them going at the same time men have been increasingly marginalised in society.

Societies that make the most of their men and minimise the wasteful loss of men, will outperform societies that don't. Armies that lose less men win the wars. Sacrifice cannot always be avoided, acknowledgment of such a reality does not mean avoidably losing men needlessly is something our society can accept or sustain.

It is worth noting that sacrifice is not purely the domain of males either. Females do indeed sacrifice for their offspring and do die in the process of reproducing on occasion. Death in childbirth was significantly more frequent up until relatively recently and long-term physical complications even more so. Mothers dying in the process of looking after their children and protecting them were not uncommon either.

Not every female has to live for their offspring to survive. The offspring can be cared for by the rest of the community and by other women if they are still in infancy, if the mother dies after birth or whilst the children are young. Pregnancy does not have to be perfect either. If most women live to give birth a certain incidence of death can persist and it has despite millions of years of evolution and selection.

Not every female even has to live to reproduce for a community to replace itself, just the bare minimum number of women that is required need to survive. Women like men can sacrifice themselves for their community in ways that go beyond giving birth to children and caring for small infants. Inclusive fitness[8] applies to women as well and not just men.

Women like men can further their genetic interests by protecting and looking after related kin and genetically similar individuals in their community. Women like men can further their genetic interests by contributing to society in ways that improve its prosperity without reproducing and this can directly improve conditions for their relatives and genetically similar individuals and thereby improve women's reproductive success indirectly. Women can contribute in these ways, die in the process and still pass on their genes without reproducing themselves, just as men can. Sacrifice is not the sole domain of men.

The Reductive Lens Of Gynocentrism

The problem with gynocentrism is that it is by its nature reductive. Everything comes down to the female and pedestalising the female. Gynocentrism can distort people's perception and understanding of biology itself. That is bio-gynocentrism. People can look at a group of whales or primates and see males on the outside and females and their offspring on the inside and conclude that is gynocentrism. No other explanation enters their minds.

The possibility that males might be on the perimeter not because they are less valuable, but because it best serves their genetic interests to protect their territory or guard against male rivals, is not considered. Even when such explanations are considered, they are ironically further explained as proof men are guarding the more valuable female as opposed to the possibility men are doing so for their own direct genetic benefit and nothing more.

Any further discussion is a waste of time. For the acolytes of bio-gynocentrism the female and reproduction is everything and they cannot be convinced otherwise. The gynocentric brainwashing by our culture is complete. Insect analogies are applied to humans and female mate choice is spoken of with an almost religious zeal and hyped up as some omnipotent force. The plethora of evidence and biology[9],[10],[11] demonstrating human males are a bit more complicated than male insects and that male mate choice, female intrasexual competition and mutual mate choice in humans is highly significant, is either ignored or downplayed.

It has never dawned on them that there is evidence all around us on what happens to genetic success when gynocentrism pervades the culture. The population does not breed and it dies away. That is the fate of our society if trends continue.

Gynocentrism Is Maladaptive

Gynocentrism is a maladaptive expression of our biology, it reduces reproductive success and the number of copies of the genes the community leaves behind. It destroys civilisation. Look at any modern developed nation that pedestalises female interests above all else, it is the same pattern. We did not evolve for gynocentrism to be some biological norm and that evidence again is all around us.

Sadly I think it will take the collapse of society for future generations to come to this realisation and how dysfunctional gynocentrism truly is. Females are merely one component in a much broader biological system that perpetuates itself. That applies especially to humans. Female well-being is hardly everything. Time to see the forest through the trees. We can treat women fairly and respectfully without deifying them.

References:

[1] https://www.nature.com/scitable/knowledge/library/life-history-evolution-68245673/

[2] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VygKQV-hEpY

[3] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=w__PJ8ymliw

[4] https://avoiceformen.com/featured/diagnosing-gynocentrism/

[5] https://avoiceformen.com/category/bio-gynocentrism/

[6] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=44-IpvZRfAw

[7] https://avoiceformen.com/featured/aggrieved-entitlement-womens-reaction-to-temporary-loss-of-chivalry/

[8] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Inclusive_fitness

[9] https://www.stevestewartwilliams.com/publications/Stewart-Williams%20&%20Thomas,%202013.pdf

[10] https://www.psychologytoday.com/files/attachments/33284/stewart-williams-thomas-2013bpi.pdf

[11] https://www.stevestewartwilliams.com/publications/Stewart-Williams_2020_peacocks_or_robins.pdf

End the Heard Mentality: Will Landmark Win for Johnny Depp Subvert Accusation Bias?

Robert Gregory · 3 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

For all its salacious details and shocking moments, Depp v. Heard is not all that surprising—at least not for a guy like me. What a jury found to be rotten in Fairfax County has plagued civil and family courtrooms for some time. How do I know this? I, like Johnny Depp, had to prove heinous allegations made against me, by my ex-wife, which surfaced in the context of our divorce, were false.

Those who continue to deny the prevalence of false abuse allegations are servants to a lie. It's such a common—and ruthlessly effective—way for litigants to gain legal leverage in domestic disputes, family law attorneys commonly refer to abuse allegations as "the silver bullet." Truth be damned.

The Depp trial revealed how insidious this problem has become as it's shrouded in murky identity politics. Social activism cannot—and should not—determine the veracity of an allegation. Yet slogans like "believe women" permeate our cultural discourse. Johnny Depp, like other disbelieved men, faced the wrath of that discourse when he denied Amber Heard's domestic violence and sexual assault accusations.

Specific to Depp's case-in-chief, Depp (and his legal team) challenged Amber Heard's op-ed, which defamed Depp as abusive. Published in The Washington Post on December 18, 2018, the timing of that op-ed was just as damaging as its words—for Depp and every other wrongfully accused man.

Consider the historical context: a year into the #MeToo movement, more extreme interpretations of the hashtag (e.g., #BelieveAllWomen) had begun trending. Due process was becoming an afterthought for men publicly accused of sexual misgivings as they were shamed online and then raked over the headlines and news cycles. Words like "toxic" and "masculinity" were paired together like "tar" and "feathering".

Media outlets trumpeted it as an explosive moment for "gender equality" but, as someone who had also been accused of sexual misconduct in December 2019, I had the unfortunate vantage point to see just how far the blast radius extended. It went well beyond Hollywood celebrities and Supreme Court nominees.

In my case, the court of public opinion exerted its pernicious influence writ small. I remember December 2019 as a gloomy holiday season for me, but not because radio stations were canceling the festive duet "Baby, It's Cold Outside" over concerns the lyrics promoted date rape. Instead, it was because I wouldn't get to watch my 5-year-old daughter open her gifts on Christmas morning because my ex-wife had obtained a Temporary Restraining Order (TRO) that accused me of sexual abuse.

There was no evidence to support these allegations but, unlike a criminal trial, TRO hearings have a much lower burden of proof. So much so that my ex-wife—like Amber Heard—was granted the order ex parte, meaning the other party is not even present at the hearing.

In that way, a TRO hearing is not unlike how mainstream media and the Twitterverse were deciding the fate of accused men. Too many men had their careers, reputations, and families destroyed because of false allegations. Men presumed guilty solely because they were on the wrong side of woke.

Will Depp's win in Court change that? America's favorite pirate may have hijacked the cultural narrative. The live-stream from Judge Azcarate's courtroom let the world see the facts, which shifted public opinion in Depp's favor. The jury, too, considered the facts and decided in Depp's favor.

Likewise, when I got my day in Court, and the facts were presented, I prevailed. Follow the facts; arrive at the truth. Sounds so simple, obvious. And so: how did we ever lose sight of that? Why have media outlets and civil courtrooms become a no man's land, full of vitriol and distrust toward men and fathers? It's a question many men—like me—have wondered. And they are questions I hope do not haunt our sons.

That’s why, today, I salute Johnny Depp.

Men's Silence

Andrew MacDonald · 4 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Why many men struggle to talk about women and men, and why we need to.

Being part of the "men's movement" that kicked off in the early 1990s was a big deal for me. I was able to talk about many parts of my life that had never been voiced. At the same time there were things that could hardly be said between the men, conversations that were, practically speaking, unspeakable. Now, years later, the same conversations are still mostly not talked about – to the detriment of men and women both.

I'm talking about a respectful and frank conversation about the power balance between women and men. I'm connected to three different men's organizations and none of them is having a frank talk about this missing ingredient to this day. There are innumerable women and men of good will – you know them and very likely are one – but the loving conversation between women and men? For the most part it's still not happening in the public sphere.

It could be we got off on the wrong foot from the start. Warren Farrell who has written brilliantly on the interdependence of women and men, has said that perhaps what would have been better would have been to have had a gender transition movement. That is, a movement to a healthier place for both sexes, rather than a feminist movement alone.

The feminist position from the start was polarizing. Overall, it painted women as innocent victims and men as guilty perpetrators. (If one was looking for the birth of identity politics, this would be a great candidate.) The feminist perspective was ubiquitous in media, on a par with the Covid narrative today. It couldn't be challenged without risking ridicule and censure. And men learned to stay inside the lines.

Women stayed inside these new lines too. A true story may illustrate it. My friend Bob McGuire started a men's group in Windsor, Ontario in the early 90s. Pretty soon a group of women, some of them partners of the men, came forward and wanted to have Bob help them form a women's group. Bob was surprised since he thought there were lots of opportunities for women to meet. They hardly needed him. The difference was that they didn't want to take on the role of victim that they felt they were supposed to play They didn't want to make men responsible for their ills. The group happened with Bob, by request, at the head. (This isn't because women aren't leaders but because Bob.)

I joined a men's group around this time too, in Ottawa. Twelve men came together in a group that ended up lasting for about 18 years. For me it was an amazing experience of safety, connection and exploration. It was like a bi-weekly campfire-like in town, a conversation I'd always wanted but didn't know I was missing.

A little background to what comes next. Around this time I co-founded a men's paper, Everyman Men's Journal that went on for some 13 years. We hosted ten national-ish conferences for women and men to explore gender issues.

But what I noticed in the group I was in, and my perception of other groups, is men, without a very strong and dedicated invitation, were reluctant to talk about the power balance between them and women. At first glance, this is counterintuitive. What gives?

I think it was because frankly discussing the power imbalance risked upsetting the delicate balance between men and their wives or girlfriends, the people we were going home to. The whole area was better left unspoken. We continued to see women as holding the moral high ground in the public arena and having the only allowable perspective. The masculine counterarguments to that narrative were brilliantly articulated by such male writers as Warren Farrell – and many writers in Everyman. But none of that changed the conversation among men or between women and men. Even if we did have some intellectual understanding of the power balance between women and men, it remained hard to stand in it in our own lives.

That was then. Now two new generations have passed since the dramatic emergence of 60s feminism. Yet, there's still not much talk about what healthy or complementary power dynamics look like between women and men.

I know of four organizations dedicated to men's personal growth. You know who you are. To my knowledge groups of men within them aren't having this conversation publicly or widely within their own ranks. Rather the historic habit of not talking about the power relations between women and men has become normal. There's plenty of sensitive, politically correct language around diversity and inclusion but the conversation around the power balance between women and men is not to be found. This silence hurts men and boys. And because men's issues and women's issues are yang and yin, mutually arising, the silence hurts women and men too.

A singular exception to the silence is A Voice for Men, which is willing to say and do what others won't. They don't do sensitivity well but they do do honesty.

We need the frank conversation. Men's life struggles are inescapably connected to their sex roles and relationships with women. They take place in the system of men and women, not only in the man. When the systemic dimension is unknown, the difficulties that a man experiences are easily felt as shame and personal failure. He feels they're his fault and blames himself. If his friends are ignorant of this they can't help much.

All of us have personal growth work to do. But a part of it belongs to the community of men and not to the individual.

Bettina Arndt is interviewed by former Australian Deputy Prime Minister John Anderson

AVfM Video Source · 4 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Aman Siddiqi: Depp Trial Shows Prejudice Against Men?

A Voice for Men · 5 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Are Women Raising Sonsbands?

AVfM Video Source · 6 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Willie Havmire has some thoughts here on something that will undoubtedly offend a lot of people, but actually describes reality for millions of single mothers and their sons:

Erin Pizzey has a term for what Havmire describes here this which is even more hard on the ears: emotional incest. It's when a mother uses her son to fulfill not just her economic needs but even her emotional needs. It doesn't literally mean physical incest, but EMOTIONAL; the relationship she wants to have with an adult man she tries to hold out through him, and this warps both her and more importantly, him as the child. It's a sad cycle but it's real, and more people should recognize it and try to correct it, not out of shaming people per se but in loving them enough to make them look at the truth.

This video is sure to spark some discussion. We'll look forward to seeing what else Willie Havmire has to say.

The Irrationality of Feminism: Remembering the Sokal Affair

Theodore Labadie · 7 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago I was talking with a feminist of long acquaintance about our different reasons for going to school. I wanted to learn something useful and dig myself out of poverty. She, quite to the contrary, had no interest in learning anything useful, only to learn how "to talk like academics" having overheard their discussions around town in cafes and the like. They had impressed her, using a language with unfamiliar words whose meaning she could only guess at, discussing such "impressive" and esoteric subjects as the construction of femininity in literature. Although she's never read Simone du Buvoir I'm certain that she would agree with her thesis that our understanding of the female mind as a consciousness quite different and distinct from the male mind has no origin in biology whatsoever. As I understand the theory, the female mind is completely an artificial construct forced on women by culture.

Which is nonsense. Women are not made; they are born. It should be inconceivable that the sex endowed with the biologic machinery to gestate, breastfeed, and nurture infants would not by necessity also be endowed with the mental machinery to use their sex-specific organs of procreation for maximal genetic and evolutionary advantage and it should not be a surprise that this template informs their entire psyche. Yet, this is exactly the message we get from the academy: there is no such thing as human nature.

The study of the biological provenance of human nature was at one time called sociobiology, but feminist and leftist propaganda has so demonized the word that it can no longer be used safely. Instead, euphemisms like "evolutionary psychology" were invented, but they too are used only with difficulty and with great resistance from most leftist academics. I remember reading how the progenitor of sociobiology, Edward O. Wilson, a venerable old Southerner who is perhaps the world's preeminent biologist and a writer of Pulitzer Prize-winning caliber was assaulted by members of the leftist International Committee Against Racism who dumped a pitcher of water over his head during a conference, chanting that he was "all wet." Good thing they had never heard him say, "Karl Marx was right, socialism works, it is just that he had the wrong species."

So much for the sanctity of reasoned academic discourse. But to my mind, there is no event that better illustrates the intellectual poverty of leftists and feminists and in particular the language they use in our institutions of higher learning than the Sokal affair.

In 1996 Alan Sokal, a professor of physics at New York University, became dismayed by the lack of intellectual rigor in the humanities and by the pervasive notion that science was socially constructed—an unprivileged method of acquiring knowledge. Determined to do something, he submitted a paper to an interdisciplinary postmodern journal, Social Text. The paper, "Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity," was a hoax. It was purposely crammed with obscure leftist and feminist jargon, appealed constantly to academic authority through the prodigious use of quotations, made outrageous scientific claims that anyone with some knowledge of physics would recognize as suspicious, and although grammatically correct was completely impenetrable. It made no sense at all. The paper was accepted uncritically and published without peer review. Here's a taste:

One characteristic of the emerging postmodern science is its stress on nonlinearity and discontinuity: this is evident, for example, in chaos theory and the theory of phase transitions as well as in quantum gravity. At the same time, feminist thinkers have pointed out the need for an adequate analysis of fluidity, in particular turbulent fluidity. These two themes are not as contradictory as it might at first appear: turbulence connects with strong nonlinearity, and smoothness/fluidity is sometimes associated with discontinuity (e.g. in catastrophe theory); so a synthesis is by no means out of the question.

Every statement makes an unsubstantiated claim, except, apparently, in Sokal's use of quotations which seem to be always taken out of context in a cut-and-paste approach to mimic the evidence-follows-claim convention of academic writing. Yet the evidence is false and nonsensical, in no way explaining his postulates. For example, what does he mean by “nonlinearity” in the context of an “emerging postmodern science” and how is it evident in chaos theory, phase transition theory, and quantum gravity? Phase transition is the transformation of the physical state of matter from solid to liquid, liquid to gas, etc. It is not a theory; it is a fact that anyone can observe by watching ice melt. In the sense that effect immediately follows cause (as when you apply heat to ice it turns to liquid water) it is also perfectly linear. As to quantum gravity, I’ve read that there’s no evidence as of yet to show that it actually exists. It’s still only a gleam in some scientist’s eye. Being non-extant there is only one thing that quantum gravity can say concerning the philosophy of science or even of society: nothing.

On publication of his paper Sokal exposed his hoax in the journal Lingua Franca. The editors of Social Text immediately cried foul and added a misplaced criticism of Sokal’s writing style. They missed the point, entirely. Sokal’s intent was to write badly (and think badly) yet have his poor scholarship overlooked due to its superficial accordance with leftist ideology. It is very simple: most people will accept anything uncritically provided that it sounds like something they already believe.

The Sokal affair is described as famous but I have never heard anyone in the academy, student or instructor, discuss it or even to have heard about it without my introduction. I suppose this is because leftists find the Sokal affair so deeply embarrassing. They should. It exposes the deep poverty of intellectual discourse in our universities, a pry bar laying waste to rusting scrap, the impressive language so admired by my feminist acquaintance hot air.

I should point out that Sokal is not an anti-feminist. In fact, he is a leftist who wanted to point out that his compatriots were shooting themselves in the foot by accepting uncritically the kind of claptrap he parodies in “Transgressing the Boundaries.” No matter. A writer takes what he needs where he finds it. I suppose I should also disclose that at one time I uncritically accepted the label of “leftist,” though no longer. I am neither left nor right, only a man who out of life desires nothing more than for his mind to be completely free of false convention and ideology. And although such perfect freedom may be, as it is with the possession of perfect truth, unattainable it is nonetheless a very worthy goal on which to base a silly little life. There are indeed some people who will die for the fact that 2 plus 2 equals 4.

The entire text of Sokal’s “Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity” is available in pdf form here.

“MISOGYNY!!!” – Amber Heard Fan Reacts to Trial Verdict

Greta Aurora · 8 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Men at Work

B.R. Merrick · 8 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Okay. Read this if you can stomach it, if you can even get past the title. It's chock full of unction toward the subject it secretly despises. The author, Joan C. Williams, claims to be rethinking masculinity, but don't expect any zeta-male revelations in her words. Ms. Williams is trying to turn men into women, and women into men. She is going to fail, as men (for the most part) enjoy being men, and women (I think) enjoy being women. For men, this means holding down a job if you can. I don't always like what I do for a living all that much. It certainly isn't my dream job, but that puts me safely in with the majority of men. We work to take care of ourselves and to feel useful. Now get off our backs, woman.

Maybe Joan didn't get the memo, back when she was just Joan C. (in the Pre-Williams Era). Every young woman, upon the commencement of her monthly visitor, receives a memo that states as follows:

"Humanity springs forth from your body. Feed it, love it, nurture it, and give it truth and freedom. This is very important. Always remember: Little humans are not trophies or toys."

Apparently, Ms. Williams, like a great many other women, threw the memo out. Unfortunately, women are not compelled by law into reading the memo and then forced to display a comprehension of its contents during oral exam. This lack of death-oriented coercion is proving detrimental to their kids. Their little trophies and toys are now growing up mighty pissed. I don't blame them.

Ms. Williams is deeply concerned that women do not yet make up half of everything under the fucking sun. She paints her disappointment in terms of "helping" men to be more nurturing, to work less and knit more. She's faking it. (Probably not the first time.) Williams' disappointment is actually that women don't yet display more manly qualities. Her feminist outlook betrays something vitally important to understanding social engineers in general: she is a misogynist. Where women naturally excel — homemaking, early childhood care, beautifying, verbal communication, emotional expression — they ought not to go anymore, according to feminists. Put on some pants, girl, and grab that power drill!

The article laments that some jobs for men do not require them to be "high on people skills." Really? Okay, so back when I drove a (literal) rust bucket '89 Buick Skylark, I overheard a mechanic talking to his coworker about my car (whose signal stick I had to reinsert into the wheel shaft with my hand whenever I felt like signaling): "The brakes are shot, the radiator's shot, the steering's shot…" He didn't know I was within earshot. But let me tell you about this man's "people skills." When I finally traded in the rust bucket for a Honda Accord (not much of a trade — the dealership took the Buick off my hands for free), I brought my new car to this brakes-are-shot mechanic for the death-oriented state's mandatory inspection. When he gave it a rave review, I said, "It'd better pass inspection for what I paid." He got that interminably cute, straight-guy grin on his dirty face, and said, "Still have sticker shock, huh?" That's all the people skills a guy needs. He was honest, and he got the job done. As much as I enjoyed Oscar-winner Marisa Tomei's fictional character in "My Cousin Vinny," I don't need a sexy girl mechanic to open up to emotionally, or even flirt with. I need a mechanic to fix the damn car. (I prefer a sexy boy mechanic, but if the girl's the only one who can fix it… Oh well. Fine. …When does your brother get back from Cape May?)

Then suddenly, Williams displays a basic conception of what it means to be a man: "Hard-driving lawyers, neurosurgeons and investment bankers—indeed, all historically male high-status jobs—also require some version of assertiveness and single-mindedness. In other words, such jobs are designed around masculinity and men." By all means, let's have a little less assertiveness at hand when the female neurosurgeon has her other-than-single-minded fingertips on instruments that are probing my goddamned brain! If an assertive and single-minded woman wants to play God in my skull, that's just fine if she graduated at the top of her (mostly male) class. But looking for "equality of opportunity," "equality of access," or "equality of Williams's petty concerns" does nothing for someone whose life has been reduced to undergoing a difficult and dangerous brain operation.

One of my favorite films is by a great Chinese director named Yimou Zhang (a fellow penis owner). The English title is "To Live!" starring the incomparably beautiful Li Gong. (Tomei comes close, doesn't she?) In my opinion, Gong should have gotten an Oscar nomination, but regardless, what follows is a spoiler: Gong plays the mother of a young woman who is pregnant. She and her husband sit outside the hospital room where their daughter is giving birth, sent into the hallway rather unceremoniously by hubristic young female medical students. You guessed it: These medical students are in charge of the hospital during Mao's Cultural Revolution. The end result of the medical students being put in charge of the asylum is the unexpected hemorrhaging of the expectant mother after the child is born. Where assertiveness and single-mindedness were required, there was none to be found. You know how that part of the movie ends now. If not, you can live the horror vicariously by watching this.

Oh, but C. Williams isn't advocating for medical students to be put in charge; what she really wants is far more serious. Look at the jobs she mentions above: doctor, lawyer, banker. These are three of the first occupations to be regulated by the government, which is why each of them is such a high-paying job: Once you regulate, you reduce the supply of people who can do the job. This artificially raises the price of doctors, lawyers, and bankers, since demand is not reduced along with supply. It's Economics 101, and you can be sure that feminists, along with all other progressives, never elect to take that course.

These are also the top three professions in the "private" sector that are normally put in charge, or that are normally consulted first by those who are put in charge. Are you getting it now? It's not so much about redefining masculinity, it's about getting more cock-owning doctors, lawyers, and bankers to work less, stay home more, and create vacancies for women to fill, when they feel like it, so that they can also get rich and be in charge.

Pretty devious of her, isn't it? Well, I'm on to her, and now you are, too. Why didn't she mention coal miners, long-shore fisher-"persons," and cell phone tower repair-"persons"? Surely, it has little to do with these three jobs being held almost exclusively by men, but far more to do with these three jobs being the most deadly. If women rushed into these jobs, there would ultimately be fewer women in the workplace. We can't have that. We've still got this glass ceiling to deal with.

If men are more assertive and single-minded than women, so be it. What women excel at also enhances life for men and women. Therefore, "[b]readwinners married to homemakers earn 30 percent more than those in two-job families and encounter favored treatment at work." There's your answer, woman. Now shut up.

Where women excel, and we're so not supposed to say this, is in creating a loving home environment for the young. Men can do it, too, just like women can hold down jobs. But we're talking in general terms about where the different sexes excel. This is why Williams is never going to get anywhere. She is pointing out a fact and demanding that the fact change to make her feel that all's right with the world.

When I was a kid, pregnancy commercials always featured an expectant couple, or shots of a woman alone, all anxious and excited about what might be growing inside of her. They were always positive in their portrayal of a hoped-for pregnancy. (Oddly, even though pro-choicers have made great strides, I don't recall any of the actresses crying out, "I have a fetus! I have a fetus!")

At some point, this changed. I don't know when, but I do know why. Before I got rid of that horrible, poisonous instrument, I saw a commercial where a woman looks at the results of the test, and then breathes a sigh of relief into the camera: "I'm not pregnant," as if to say, "Thank God." (Oddly, even though pro-choicers have made great strides, I don't understand her anxiety, since abortions are safe, legal, cheap, readily available, and cause no long-term physical or psychological damage, right?)

But the worst offender was a commercial showing a woman standing in a board room (full of stereotypical men) with a pointer. She glanced out the window, spied a stork, and freaked. In that moment, in that very moment, I thought to myself, "What the hell kind of foolish woman wants to stand in a god-awful board room all day long instead of following a little toddler girl around as she discovers snails, weeds, a ball, the cat, and the books on the lowest shelf?" Tell you what, ingrate. When you finally push out the thing you don't want, give her to me. I'll be her boyfriend for the first ten years of her life. Here. Take the stupid pointer. You can pick up where I left off, on the third slide about quarterly rates. You are such an idiot. (By the way, when are these pregnancy test companies going to get around to showing a coal-mining woman freaking out about seeing a stork at the entrance to the mine?)

There will be plenty more anxiety and bemoaning, until this generation of women dies out, alone in nursing homes, with no one visiting because the few of them that stopped to push out kids didn't bother visiting with them very much when they were young. I'm not saying they deserve it; I'm merely going to warn them that they will reap what they have sown, and then bemoan it.

I have a sister who considers herself a feminist. Let me tell you what this "feminist" and her husband accomplished:

They got married before they graduated from college. Their first apartment was scummy, with a long commute to school. My sister turned it into a home. They moved to Florida for his graduate work. They moved back in with his parents after that, and he found a job, with another long commute. She ensured that they seamlessly blended into an already-established home. They moved into an apartment that was under a split-level that was converted into a construction business in front. She turned that into a home. They saved their pennies and bought a house, which was quickly turned into a home. They sold the house and moved across country with the promise of a better job for her husband. They rented a house, which was turned into a home fairly easily, given the huge stone fireplace in the living room. This is where their two kids turned hopelessly cute. Just cute as hell. They continued saving their pennies, and bought another house. They're staying put, with a brand-new second story, in a house that was turned into a home.

My sister stays at home and has stayed at home in virtually every home she made since she got married, even though she sends her kids to government school every day. She cooks, cleans, sews, renovates, decorates, organizes, and plans the finances. They are now rich, and living well below their means. Sadly, they are not equal. My sister's cooking, cleaning, organizing, decorating, and financial wizardry is inferior to her husband's having to sit in front of a computer for hours every day, typing words into programs. And now I feel like telling Ms. Williams to shut up again. But she won't:

"A key agenda for modern feminism is to work with men to decrease the penalties encountered by those who flout the expectations that stem from conventional masculinity." No, that's not your key agenda, ma'am. You've already raised the specter of government intrusion into private businesses if the owner of that business doesn't like the performance of one of the guys he's paying for the express and up-front purpose of getting specific work done. The key agenda of modern feminism is to turn women into better men than men are, and secondarily to emasculate men who refuse to go along. It's a little girls' tea party gone horribly wrong. Actual little girls, along with actual little boys, suffer the most.

Now let me tell you what I believe is the essential difference between men and women. I know I'm making a huge generalization, but I see very little evidence from any individual man or woman that leads me to believe otherwise. The difference is: When men see something that needs to get done they start doing. They may start off by debating, but more often than not, one or two of them will get ants in his pants and start doing. Then the other men will quickly follow. This is good. Why? Because stuff will get done.

Oh, God. I've got to tell you this one: Years ago, my parents took apart an old grand piano (it really was no good) and set the pieces out by the trash. Three garbage men stood around the giant metal harp (which contains the piano strings), debating how to lift it into the garbage truck. My mother watched them stand there for quite a long time. Then she went out (this is a woman who knows almost exactly where a woman's strengths are) and spoke to them.

"Hi, guys. That sure is heavy isn't it?"

"Yes, ma'am. It sure looks it."

"Yeah… My husband and 10-year-old daughter had a heck of a time hauling it out here."

Without another word, the harp was picked up and thrown in the truck. Therefore, men also do to prove themselves men. Women do not suffer from this malady. It is an exclusively male phenomenon: proof of manhood.

Women want things to get done, too. But they seem to want to understand the emotional side of it all as well. They want to feel included, to make a contribution, to be rewarded for what is contributed. They are, far more often than men, quite comfortable in a supporting role. They want "equal" access, until they've changed their minds. Then they want to opt out, like when a baby needs to be pushed out and fed for a few months. Then they want back in. (Screw the kid.) They do not want to be forced to make up their minds permanently. A man frequently has to make up his mind and stick with it, even burning bridges in the process. Men who can radically change careers in mid-life, as far as I'm concerned, have the biggest dicks.

Men will break their backs at work. They will poison their lungs. They will lose fingers. They will work for eighteen hours straight. They will not complain. I'm not advocating that men cut themselves off from their feelings, nor do I think it's wise to disregard signals that your body will send to you when you're damaging it. I am simply stating a matter of fact. This is how men are, and oftentimes, due to the way the world is currently run, this is what's to be expected. It's not going to change anytime soon, no matter how much feminist legislation is passed, no matter how many guns are pointed at business owners. If Joan C. gets her way, if women fill all the vacant slots for doctors, lawyers, and bankers, and cease working as secretaries, waitresses, and factory workers, there will be no more feminist legislation pointed at business owners, because it will no longer be a concern.

I've had male and female doctors treat me. I prefer men to treat me simply because of the level of non-sexual intimacy encountered with most of my clothes off. But if the woman has the answer, I'll gladly pull 'em down in front of her. Just fix it, doc. So I guess the essential difference between me, an individual man, and Ms. Williams, an individual misogynistic/misandristic woman, is that I don't care what sex you are, just give me results.

Ms. Williams cares a great deal about what's dangling or hidden between the job-holder's legs. In other words, Ms. Williams doesn't care about results, technique, likability, dependability, imagination, health, capability, knowledge, awareness, or any of the other things the rest of us look for when paying for the services of a working person. If it just so happens that the majority of competent and reliable workers continue to be men, so what? The barricades for women were removed a long time ago. Ms. Williams's complaint is about men and women who haven't changed the way they think. They're never going to.

Chew on this, Joan C.: "An early experiment involved showing photographs of human babies to single men and women, married men and women who were not yet parents, and men and women who were parents. The women showed strong pupil dilation when viewing these pictures, regardless of whether they were single, married and childless, or parents. The men, in contrast, showed pupil constriction if they were single or married and childless, but showed strong dilation if they were parents. In other words, the childless human male who coos over someone else's new baby is probably merely being polite, but the female means it [emphasis mine]. Not until the human male actually has a baby of his own does he start responding with truly sympathetic emotion to other people's infants. The human female, on the other hand, even before she has bred [sic] seems to be primed for maternal reactions."

Try blaming that on a culture with an "outdated" view of masculinity. We're pummeled so hard with expectations of manhood that our pupils refuse to dilate for other people's kids. Feminists sure have an uphill climb, especially given one of the closing sentences: "Since, in all the examples mentioned, the subjects of the experiments were unconscious of what was happening, either to their own pupils or to those of their companions, it is likely that we are dealing with a basic, inborn response of the human species [emphasis mine]." Hope you've got your boots on for that hike, girls. If you need a guide, chances are he'll be a dude, with a precious little girl at home anxious for her boyfriend to walk in the door. There ain't nothing wrong with that. Pay him.

One of my earliest memories of my mother is sitting next to her on the couch watching "Sesame Street." It was safe, warm, calm, entertaining, and I learned to count to twenty in Spanish: veinte. I looked at my mother with love. She stayed home with me for five years until I was sent off to government school. She will enjoy visits from me until she is gone, no worries. Nothing Ms. Williams offers women compares to what women give children. No female neurosurgeon had better accidentally tweak the part of my brain that remembers that day watching "Sesame Street," or I'll sue. I have few finer memories. Ms. Williams would ensure that I have one less.

B.R. Merrick writes for "Strike The Root" and "A Voice for Men," lives in the Northeast, is proud to be a classical music reviewer at Amazon.com and iTunes, and in spite of the poisonous nature of television, God Himself will have to pry his DVDs of "Monty Python's Flying Circus" out of his cold, dead hands, under threat of eternal damnation.

Midlife Crisis of An Alpha male

Doug Mortimer · 9 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In 1975 I was working at a TV station when The Eiger Sanction was released. We aired a series of advertisements for this Clint Eastwood (as actor and director) movie that attracted a great deal of attention from the women in the office. I still remember one co-worker gushing like a teenager: "Oh, he's so good-looking!"

I didn't say so but I agreed with her. Hell, it was obvious. At age 45 Clint Eastwood was tall and lean with a thick mane of hair. His famous squint had resulted in crow's feet which only served to make him look more imposing. His soft-spoken personality was a perfect fit, as there was no reason for him to be a self-promoting loudmouth. In addition to his physical assets, he was world-famous and wealthy. He was truly an alpha male, but that term was not in common parlance then except in zoological circles.

In the late 1960's Eastwood was in his late 30's and sitting on top of the world – more specifically, at the top of the box office world. He was hardly an overnight success, however. After appearing in bit parts in numerous movies and TV shows as a contract player for Universal in the 1950's, he became a TV star on Rawhide, a long-running (1959-1965) western series on CBS.

Towards the end of the Rawhide run he traveled to Europe to appear as the Man With No Name (he was MGTOW before MGOW was cool) in A Fistful of Dollars, For a Few Dollars More, and The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly, worldwide hits directed by Italy's Sergio Leone. Returning to America, Eastwood continued his run of flinty loners in Hang 'Em High, Coogan's Bluff, and Where Eagles Dare. The body count in his movies was extraordinary, much to the consternation of the late 60's versions of Mrs. Grundy.

But then things changed.

In 1969, Eastwood appeared in, of all things, a musical, Paint Your Wagon. His co-star was an equally improbable Lee Marvin. Next he did Kelly's Heroes, a war movie but essentially a comedy. He appeared in these movies but one couldn't in good conscience call them Clint Eastwood movies. They seemed to be nothing more than bald-faced attempts to break away from his ice-cold tough-guy image. Fortunately for him, he kept in touch with Don Siegel, who had directed him in Coogan's Bluff. It was not apparent at the time, but it appears that Eastwood was having a midlife crisis. Or maybe he simply realized that one day he would be too old for action films and he needed to be more versatile.

Siegel was a seasoned professional who had worked his way up under the old studio system till he started directing (The Verdict) in 1946. In Hollywood he was renowned for his ability to bring in movies on time and within budget, so he worked steadily in episode TV and TV movies as well as low-budget features. Though hardly a household word, he had attracted the attention of cinephiles thanks to Riot in Cell Block 11 (1954), Invasion of the Body Snatchers (1956), The Line-Up (1958), Hell Is for Heroes (1962), and Madigan (1968), among others.

In 1970, Siegel directed Eastwood (then 40 years old) in Two Mules for Sister Sara, in which the latter had kind of a relationship with Shirley MacLaine. I say "kind of" because she played a prostitute masquerading as a nun (can the wisecracks, you dirty Protestants), so there is no sex in the movie. Not far removed from his Man With No Name character, he mostly did his MGTOW thing and blew away a lot of people, so his hard-ass persona was in no danger of being compromised. But it was the first of three straight movies with Siegel in which one could actually use the word "relationship." In each case, Eastwood played a dominant, self-sufficient male forced to come to terms with women. Two Mules was the mildest of the bunch.

Eastwood and Siegel's next venture was The Beguiled, a Civil War tale based on a novel by Thomas Cullinan. Eastwood played Corporal John McBurney, a badly wounded Yankee taken in by the founder and headmistress (Geraldine Page) of Miss Martha Farnsworth's Seminary for Young Ladies, a Southern finishing school that is just barely hanging on amidst the conflict.

To say that the women, ranging in age from 12 to middle-age, are starved for male attention is a gross understatement. This is, after all, the Civil War, and all able-bodied men are in uniform. Even so, the women are somehow making do with no male assistance. Rumors of Union soldier depredations have them on edge, however. "If the Yankees win, they'll rape every one of us," says one of the girls. Then Clint Eastwood shows up.

With rebel soldiers canvassing the area, McBurney must ingratiate himself with the females lest they turn him over to a Confederate patrol, who would take him to a prison camp where he would likely die. So he sweettalks all the females (the headmistress, the students, and even a slave). His flirtation with a 12-year-old student is borderline creepy, but his main squeeze is Edwina, a timid, troubled young woman convincingly played by Elizabeth Hartman. (It is worth pausing to note that she gave up acting due to depression and committed suicide by jumping out of her fifth-floor apartment in 1987.)

Needless to say, complications ensue. The girls find out that McBurney is not as nice a guy as he pretends to be, and he finds out the females aren't as easy to manipulate as he thought. After the headmistress amputates his leg (a questionable medical decision), the symbolic castration is all too obvious. At the end of the movie, one must ask who are the beguiled? McBurney, the females, or both? Clearly, a devious male is no match for females. He is overcome, as one wag put it, by "a fistful of dollies." Siegel remarked that "[The Beguiled] is a woman's picture – not for women but about them." They win this round of the battle of the sexes but it is not a flattering portrait of girl power.

If Eastwood was hoping to broaden his range as an actor, he succeeded. Unfortunately, the film bombed at the box office because it was so out of keeping with his previous films. A departure for Siegel as well as Eastwood, The Beguiled was definitely art house cinema. It was praised in Europe, however, as an outstanding example of Southern Gothic, and comparisons to Ambrose Bierce, Edgar Allan Poe, Tennessee Williams and Truman Capote were made. The film was remade in 2017 (can't comment on it as the prospect of director Sofia Coppola taking on the story didn't evoke my curiosity).

For their next effort, Eastwood and Siegel swapped roles. Eastwood became the director and Siegel the actor; more to the point, Eastwood both acted and directed while Siegel appeared in a a bit part in Play Misty for Me, another foray into sexual politics.

Eastwood, in his first directorial effort, plays Dave Garver, a small-town radio DJ who mixes smooth talk and soft jazz and is something of a local celebrity. He has an on-again, off-again relationship with a local girl when he encounters Evelyn (Jessica Walter), alluringly clad in a leather miniskirt, at his favorite hangout. After a one-night stand with her, he assumes it's one and done, but Evelyn has other ideas. As is the case with many a man, his libido has led him astray. As Eastwood himself once observed, "A man's brain has a way of lowering itself down out of the cranium, down into the lower extremities."

Dave Garver appears to be a classic example of a man unwilling to commit – but with good reason. He is a celebrity in a picturesque seaside resort (Carmel, Eastwood's home at the time; he would later serve as the town's mayor), makes a decent enough living to afford a sports car, a hip apartment, and other trappings of the good life. Also, he has the prospect of moving up to the big leagues, as he interviews for a DJ position at a San Francisco radio station. One could almost see him as the subject of the iconic "What sort of man reads Playboy?" promos featured in the magazine in those days.

Life is good except for that pesky Evelyn. Unable to shake her, Dave realizes that she is the listener who regularly calls in to his show and requests "Misty," an old Erroll Garner standard; then he realizes, too late, that she is not just a fan; she is batshit crazy. Today she would be described as a stalker.

The release dates of The Beguiled and Misty coincided with the cresting of second wave feminism so the comments from that quarter were predictable. Siegel didn't help matters any when he noted:

Women are capable of deceit, larceny, murder, anything. Behind that mask of innocence lurks just as much evil as you'll ever find in members of the Mafia. Any young girl, who looks perfectly harmless is capable of murder.

Interesting to note that the original story for Misty was penned by Jo Heims, a screenwriter acquaintance of Eastwood. She had an Evelyn-like friend and thought she could use her as raw material for a movie character.

Unlike The Beguiled, Play Misty for Me was a hit. Eastwood didn't shoot anybody in this movie but at least he wasn't a cripple, as in The Beguiled. Misty was something of a role reversal for him in that he was the prey, not the hunter. In most of his previous movies, he was a goal-directed man in search of something…a bounty, buried treasure, an escaped criminal. In Misty, he was as tall, tan and handsome as ever, but he was no longer in control. A predatory female had him in her crosshairs. In both Misty and The Beguiled, Eastwood shows that confidence, the alpha male's stock in trade, can also be his Achilles heel.

Misty was something of a forerunner of slasher films (indeed, Evelyn slashes her wrists, Eastwood's cleaning lady, and a portrait of him painted by his old girlfriend). Comparisons to Hitchcock (particularly Psycho) were unavoidable. More erudite filmgoers likened Misty to Repulsion (1965), directed by a then unknown Roman Polanski.

Having successfully displayed his acting range in The Beguiled and Misty, Eastwood did an about-face and went back to being a hard-ass. Siegel directed him in Dirty Harry (1971), a violent police thriller that had hands wringing off the hook concerning police brutality and fascism. Fun fact: In one scene in Dirty Harry, Play Misty for Me is spelled out on a movie marquee.

After Dirty Harry, Eastwood appeared to have exited his midlife crisis and returned to his traditional image in Joe Kidd (1972) and High Plains Drifter (1973), yet another variation on his western MGTOW man. Yet his next film, Breezy, was a May-September romance with William Holden as a well-to-do businessman falling in love with a 17-year-old hippie chick. Another Jo Heims story, it was the first film Eastwood directed in which he did not appear. It was a very unlikely Eastwood film – more so than The Beguiled and Play Misty for Me – but given his status in Hollywood, he could do whatever he wanted.

Breezy was both a relationship movie and a midlife crisis movie. One wonders if there was not a tad of wish fulfillment in it. Then a 43-year-old man, Eastwood might have entertained some Pygmalion-like fantasies about adolescent females. Well, as the saying goes, there's no fool like an old fool. Against all odds, though the protagonist is arguably a dirty old man (Holden was 55 at the time), the movie has a happy ending.

It is interesting to speculate on whether Eastwood was suffering from his own midlife crisis in those days. By all accounts, Eastwood was very active sexually. Tellingly, his Wikipedia biography says that he has fathered "at least 8" children. In more enlightened times he probably would have had a harem.

His various woes with his wives and consorts (notably Sondra Locke) have been well-chronicled. It's useless to indulge in moral posturing, as few men will ever know what it's like to be a chick magnet. On the other hand, such a man would be worth listening to when he has something to say about the opposite sex (if that phrase still has any meaning), and lesser men might gain from his experiences.

It has now been half a century since Eastwood went through his midlife crisis. His most recent movie, Cry Macho (2021) was released when he was 91. Given the sheer physical rigors of directing and acting in a movie, his stamina is remarkable. At an age when most men are dead, on life support, or in a nursing home, he still qualifies as an alpha male.

Between his midlife crisis films and Cry Macho, his movies have been a varied lot but are almost always worth watching. Yeah, it's always cool to watch him kick ass, but his midlife crisis films should not be overlooked.

Curiously, Eastwood once said, "Respect your efforts, respect yourself. Self-respect leads to self-discipline. When you have both firmly under your belt, that's real power."

Unlike the films that made him famous, his midlife crisis films show men deluding themselves about their "power." It is a lesson worth learning.

A Cultural Convention Condemned – The Men's Review (1948 Article)

Mens Review · 11 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following article appeared in the 1948 edition of the 'Men's Review' – an antifeminist, pro men's rights initiative that was active in Britain during the 1940s. This will be the first of a series of articles to be published at A Voice for Men from the first editions of the Men's Review, which will also be the first time these articles have been made available in digital form for the internet. – PW

* * *

A Convention Condemned

by "Woman's View"

MANY features of modern society have struck me as extremely odd. Among these, perhaps that which seems to me the oddest is the curious convention whereby a gentleman who goes to a place of entertainment, or to a place of refreshment, with a lady, is expected to pay the bill without any help from her.

After deep reflection I have decided that this convention (nine out of ten observed only when people of the opposite sex are together) annoys me intensely. I will try to summarise my main objections to this convention with utmost brevity.

First, I think the convention unfair. Unfair because it puts upon the shoulders of men the financial burden which, according to logic, should be shared by women. For generally speaking our participation in the benefits paid for is at least equal to the man's. In modern times we women are, with a diminishing number of exceptions, as well off as our male counterparts.

Secondly, it leads to a greater extravagance than would exist under a "fifty-fifty" system, since the man is placed in the position in which he is not able to suggest economising on the expenses, while where he able to regard the woman as a share-and-share-alike partner, he could suggest economy without embarrassment at all.

Thirdly, the convention tends in many cases to put inter-sex relationships upon a commercial footing. The woman tends to prefer the man who takes her to the half-a-crown seats to the otherwise equally attractive man who takes her in the one-and-sixpenny seats. I happen to believe in equality of opportunity, and it is psychologically bad for women since it tends to make for an unnatural suppression of our real affections beneath the gold-digging smartness.

I AM REVOLTED

The man is tempted to wonder what return he is going to have for the money he has paid out and to arrive at what appears to be a reasonable explanation, mainly that his return will be in terms of kisses and caresses. Hereupon he, and for that matter the woman too, may begin to regard kisses and caresses as something for sale, and idea which, in my opinion, is revolting.

Much could be said in discussion of this convention, which, as I hope to have shown, links up with our modern social outlook in an enormous number of ways.

The success of such an attempt would mean that we have changed the course of social history, and changed it, I believe, for the better. I do not deny that the thrill of this thought is as much of an inspiration as a mere desire to profit ourselves from the more convenient and fair system which I have advocated.

To those scoffers who say "You can't change human nature," "Every woman has her price," or whatever expression you may use, I have only to point out the vast changes in inter-sex relationships that have taken place in our lifetime and those changes for which the Society (for men's rights) will most surely bring about.

VOL. I. No. 1 JANUARY 1948

MEN'S REVIEW

Quarterly of the Society for Men's Rights

A CHALLENGE TO MEN

Guardian of that tolerance, so deeply rooted in the English character towards the individual, Men's Review makes its bow.

The odds against us are heavy, "there is nothing we can do about it" might be the cry of the weak-hearted, but the spirit that took the little boats to Dunkirk and brought them back on that most famous May day of our long history, is still alive to-day.

WITH YOUR help, YOUR co-operation, YOUR membership we can do those things that are for YOUR benefit. Help us to help YOU!

A CONVENTION CONDEMNED

by "Women's Voice"

Many features of modern society have struck me as extremely odd. Among these, perhaps that which seems to me the oddest is the ancient convention whereby a gentleman who goes to a place of entertainment, or to a place of refreshment, with a lady, is expected to pay the bill without any help from her. After deep reflection I have decided that this convention, (once times out of ten observed only when people of the opposite sex are together) annoys me extremely. I will try to summarise my main objections to this convention with the utmost brevity.

First, I think the convention unfair. Unfair because it puts upon the shoulders of men the financial burden which, according to logic, should be shared by women. For generally speaking our participation in the benefits paid for is at least equal to the man's. In modern times we women are, with a diminishing number of exceptions, as well off as our male counterparts.

Secondly, it leads to a greater extravagance than would exist under a "fifty fifty" system, since the man is placed in the position in which he is not able to suggest economising on the expenses, with, were he able to regard the woman as a share-and-share-alike partner, he could suggest economy without embarrassment at all.

Thirdly, the convention tends in many cases to put inter-sex relationships upon a commercial footing. The woman tends to prefer the man who takes her to the half-a-crown seats to the other-wise equally attractive man who takes her in the one-and-sixpenny seats. I happen to believe in equality of opportunity, and it is psychologically bad for women since it tends to make for an unnatural suppression of our real affections beneath the gold-digging smartness.

I AM REVOLTED

The man is tempted to wonder what return he is going to have for the money he has paid out and to arrive at what appears to be a reasonable explanation, mainly that his return will be in terms of kisses and caresses. Therefore he, and for that matter the woman too, may begin to regard kisses and caresses as something for sale, an idea which, in my opinion, is revolting.

Much could be said in discussion of this convention, which, as

The Core Values of Feminism

Dusty · 11 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

When discussing men's rights, men have a tendency to discuss issues down the line: false rape accusations, domestic violence, chivalry, abortion, and sexual harassment- everything neatly, cleanly divided into nice, symmetrical topics. This is a good thing. Brain scans show that the average male brain is highly compartmentalized when performing certain functions. When doing A, part A lights up. When doing B, part B lights up. It's as though every part of a man's brain has its respective job that it does extremely well and that is all it does. (This is an oversimplification, but it works for my purpose here.)

Could this division of labor in the male brain give us clues as to how men came up with science and mathematics? We all know that there are no such things as the number 2 or an inch or a foot, but yet some guy drew an arbitrary line in the dirt somewhere and now we have things such as measurement, physics, mathematics, engineering- oh, and don't forget civilization!

The female brain scans differently. When doing both A and B, the female brain lights up over a bigger, more general area. Some would say that women use more of their brains than men. I suggest that this functional ambiguity makes the female brain slightly less decisive. One who is not decisive does not have a tendency to act. This could explain why men took charge of history- that and physical strength. It could also explain why so many women seem to find postmodernist drivel so appealing- with its fuzziness, its hatred of measurement and data and facts, etc. And finally, it could explain the greatest social bane of the last fifty years: radical feminism.

With this piece I take you close to the edge without dropping off. I take you as close as I can to feminist thought while still having a brain left to think with. Won't you come with me on a tour of this haunted mansion, the feminist cranium? I don't pretend to have distilled feminist thought in its entirety. You'll notice that many of these bleed together, but like the female mind, things aren't so distinct and separate. These are the core values of feminism:

Revenge, lack of remorse, and threat of retaliation– Whenever women hurt men, they are "turning the tables" for past oppression. Women need not feel guilty if they treat men badly. Their abuse is justified, because they were wronged by men historically ("Men deserve it."). Also, men better watch what they do in the present and future, because women can and will punish them for any given transgression (as defined by them). This is part of what feminists call "empowerment."

Dishonesty– If facts don't motivate women to join their cause, feminists make things up to stoke female anger. Postmodernism- the idea that there is no such thing as objectivity- and revisionist history are a great way to put marginalized people (women) at the center of things. That way, we all can pretend that women played a larger role in shaping the world than they actually did. Feminists also distort data, misuse studies, and tell outright lies to spread the idea that women are actively persecuted by a demonic patriarchy that wants nothing more than to eradicate women.

Blurring the lines between belief and reality, saying and doing– This is also related to postmodernism. Feminists and women in general are so verbally gifted that they convince others and even themselves that their opinions are literally true. If they say they are oppressed, this makes it so- according to them. If they say women should be paid more, this makes it so- according to them. Also, feminists will equate a catcall from a construction worker with a criminal violation such as rape or interpret the rape of a woman by a violent loner as a statement of male purpose. If we allow feminists and women in general to do this, it will encourage a new kind of discourse between the sexes that renders everything we say to each other meaningless.

Lack of empathy– Feminists never ask themselves how their accusations and condemnations make others feel. It never occurs to them that anyone else is capable of having feelings. Feminists are very sensitive to feelings- their own feelings. They can see how they as women suffer, but it never occurs to them that men also suffer. This leads to all matters of unfairness and hypocrisy. If feminists convince women that their pain is worse than men's, then women will always demand special treatment.

Exaggeration of female suffering, marginalization of male suffering– Let us suppose that a man and a woman carry out a dangerous task. During this task, the man loses an arm and a leg, while the woman loses half of her pinky finger. It's obvious the man is suffering more- yet newspaper headlines will go on about the woman's suffering! This is because women have advocacy groups that make sure the world knows about female suffering. No one argues on the man's behalf. We've been conditioned to believe his suffering is unimportant. Nor does the man argue on his own behalf. He's also been conditioned to believe his suffering is unimportant. (Besides, complaining won't reattach his severed limbs.) The feminist thinks that complaining is the same as suffering, but it isn't. Her complaining creates the appearance of suffering, which helps her elicit sympathy from others. (However, her complaining does increase everyone else's suffering.) Women do suffer, but when we deny male suffering, we get a distorted vision of reality. And with this distorted vision, we pass legislation that offers yet more protection for women but none for men.

Convenience– This too is related to postmodernism. Women should be able to do whatever they want without any consideration for logic, consistency, or cause and effect relationships. If the rules are to a woman's benefit, then enforce the rules. If not, ignore the rules. All that matters is that it benefits a woman.

Passivity, feigned powerlessness, and lack of responsibility– Feminists don't hold women responsible for anything, which makes them believe they have no power. If a man makes a mistake, it's because men are bad. If a woman makes a mistake, it's because men are bad. Men are expected to apologize for everything, but women aren't expected to apologize for anything. They didn't do anything, after all. But this also convinces women that they have no control over their situation- not exactly the "empowerment" that feminists talk about. And if women believe they have no control, then they have one of two options: 1) do nothing ("Why bother?"), or 2) overcompensate by trying to control everything and everyone around them.

Replacing self control with government control– Feminists don't control themselves but want to control others. They equate total lack of self restraint with self expression. (Never mind that being an asshole is a poor way to express one's individuality.) Because feminists don't control themselves or their actions, they assume that everyone is the same way. They believe that, to restore order, we need a large government (i.e. Daddy) to control all of us.

Commiseration– Women should share each other's burdens. The burden of one woman becomes the burden of all women. The slogan "The personal is the political" becomes a way for maladjusted women (feminists) to foist their personal problems onto women who are otherwise happy and well adjusted. Feminists often try to disguise commiseration with innocuous activities such as women's studies classes, book discussion groups, or quilt making.

Resentment and misandry- Feminists are hypersensitive. They see female victimhood everywhere because their perceptions are colored by an overabundance of emotion. They are on a constant lookout for any perceivable slight against women and take everything personally. Feminists do not hold women responsible for anything and blame men for everything. They believe men are the demonic source of female agony. This resentment gives way to a hatred called misandry.

Paranoia, belief in conspiracy, and alienation– Men are innately dangerous and untrustworthy. They are the source of female agony. They comprise a group (called patriarchy) that is making every effort to marginalize (and possibly destroy) women. This leads to a terrifying worldview which not only causes new converts to break away from mainstream society, but makes it impossible for them to rejoin that society. (Such "drinking of the Koolaid" is the same strategy that cults use to amass lifelong followers.)

Female superiority and male inferiority– Women are morally, spiritually, psychologically, and biologically superior to men. Maleness is a disease for which femaleness is a cure. Feminism strives to make men more like women, not make women more like men.Men aren't good enough for women, while women are too good for men. Men do not make enough effort to meet female needs. Women do too much to meet male needs. Men should expect less from women. Women should expect more from men. Female sexuality is beautiful and highly evolved. Male sexuality is ugly and primitive.

Male servility- Men are the ipso facto servants of women. All social customs (such as dating and courtship, clothing, and etiquette) and all laws with regards to marriage, divorce, child custody, child and spousal abuse, reproductive rights, rape, assault, murder, and sexual harassment should reflect this inferior status.

Male utility– Men are only good in an expedient or a materialistic sense. Not only should men serve women and expect nothing in return, but they should be grateful that they are used rather than useless.

Female autonomy and male obsolescence– Men and women traditionally needed each other in order to have children. A man's sperm met a woman's egg, and the process that results in life began. With the advent of cloning, reproduction without sperm (parthenogenesis) will create a situation in which men will need a woman to carry a pregnancy to term, but women won't need a man's sperm to become pregnant. Men will need women, but women won't need men, rendering males obsolete. This is something that feminists are clamoring for.

Homosexuality and sexual segregation– Feminists are on a campaign against heterosexuality, because they see it as the core value of the patriarchy. Not only do they constantly attack heterosexuality in the media and the classroom, but they constantly exalt homosexuality- particularly lesbianism. Most feminists are lesbians, so by pushing lesbianism onto heterosexual women, feminists simultaneously discourage marriage and open more avenues for female companionship. They praise male homosexuality, because they see it as a subversion of patriarchal, white, heterosexual, male values (whatever those are). Homosexuals are seen as a safe alternative to threatening, violent, predatory, heterosexual men, and are thus "honorary women." Here, feminists prey on the occasional alienation that gay men feel at the hands of heterosexual men who have been raised to think that homosexuality is immoral or even pathological. However, this support is only in theory, and feminist love is entirely conditional. If a homosexual chooses to live his life as a proud man rather than a feminist lapdog, feminists have no use for him and quietly reject him.

Choice– Women should have choices, but should not have to actually choose anything. However, if a woman does make a choice, and it's a good one, she should be praised and allowed to reap the rewards of that choice. If she makes a bad choice, not only should she not be criticized, but she should be protected from the consequences of that choice. Also, women should have limitless options, while men should have limited or no options.

Mimi Webb sings about setting her boyfriend's house on fire while he's in it

AVfM Video Source · 12 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

British singer-songwriter Mimi Webb sings about setting her boyfriend's house on fire while he's in it.

2017: Jess Phillips laughing at call for debate on men's issues

AVfM Video Source · 12 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In 2017 British MP Philip Davies, who spoke at ICMI16, called for a debate in Westminster on domestic violence against men, health, suicide, education, and other issues facing men and boys on International Men's Day. Fellow MP Jess Phillips openly laughed at this proposal.

Transphobia vs. Manphobia

Peter Wright · 13 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Discussion about transgenderism is all the rage, with many people railing against what they view as a Frankenstein fad, and yet others who are encouraging the trend beyond what anyone would consider reasonable limits – e.g., gender-affirming surgery for children. A third approach is that of the social phenomenologist which accounts for people (including myself) who are more interested in making sense of the phenomenon before screaming blue murder to the sky.

Most people appear eager to discover what Aristotle called the "efficient cause" that might lead men to become transwomen — with the most popular 'causes' being those of gender dysphoria, and autogynephilia which both end up falling short of sufficient explanations, for reasons I'll discuss below.

Autogynephilia

Autogynephilia is defined as a male's propensity to be sexually aroused by the thought of himself as a female. It's a paraphilia that is theorized to underlie transvestism and some forms of male-to-female transsexualism,[1] as showcased in the below tweet by a transwoman.

If 'getting off' by appearing as the opposite sex were the only motive we might reasonably assume that occasional cross-dressing and/or erotic roleplay would scratch the itch, but transgender individuals are clearly seeking a more permanent goal. Moreover, many transgender individuals experience a loss of sexual arousal after medically transitioning, indicating that the securing of permanent autogynephilic pleasure is not a sufficient explanation for making the change.[2]

Gender dysphoria

Gender dysphoria is the favorite go-to for advocates of traditional gender roles who pretentiously claim the body and psyche can only be exact Xerox copies of each other. As tidy as this formula sounds on its face, even people with a rudimentary understanding of human psychology will see its failings; failings demonstrated by the fact that everyone has an imaginative and psychological identity that is, at least in some ways, at odds with bodily reality:

- A stunningly beautiful woman identifies as plain, or ugly.
- A fat guy identifies as muscled and skinny.
- An old man identifies himself healthy, as fit as a teenager.

- A little girl identifies as a world-class singer.
- A little boy identifies as the best violinist in the world.
- A feminist identifies as more caring than others.
- A person identifies as more intelligent than others.
- A person born of privilege identifies as restricted.
- An underprivileged person identifies as someone who can be and do anything.
  Etc.

The psyche tends to ramble off in fanciful ways that do not match seamlessly with physical reality, and it has done this since way back in our evolutionary history. Psychological identity is not, and never will be, a faithful replica of physical reality…. and yet human civilization has continued to thrive in spite of this propensity.

With that human capacity for imagination in mind we can set aside those who champion seamless sex-and-gender identities, and associated social roles. We can also find some fault with Matt Walsh's recent insistence that there can be one, and only one definition of a woman.[3] While Matt is 100% correct in stating that there is only one definition of a biological woman, he conveniently omits the possibility that there may be a definition of 'woman' applying to a person's psychological identity, thus essentially giving us two definitions of woman corresponding to the soma/psyche split.

To reiterate, we all see the obvious XX woman of the body, and then there's the woman of psychological/imaginal identity which can operate somewhat independently of the former (hence transgenders, intergenders, etc). To illustrate this, Matt Walsh could have a body that looks like Matt Walsh but, hypothetically speaking, in his imaginative and psychological identity he might be more like Napoleon Bonaparte; when it comes to the human psyche anything is possible.

While all this might sound like a recipe for confusion, it isn't really. Dictionaries attest to the ability of the human mind to accept multiple definitions of a word. I can be stoned to death by literal rocks, and I can be stoned after smoking weed. I can suffer a physical pain, or alternatively I can be in psychological pain – and those 'two pains' might not be seamless pains going on at the same time; they might be completely unrelated.

When it comes to the public furor around this topic, the comical part is watching traditional conservatives argue there is only soma, and the progressives argue there's only psyche. The stupidity of these two partial arguments – and the debate between them – make for the best Punch and Judy show on offer.

If I wanted to take a more strictly phenomenological approach to our topic, I might be forced to say transwomen were both male and female. For example being a woman in one's imaginative identity will never mean that the chromosomal body has also changed, which indicates there are two identities running concurrently, one male and one female. That said, I appreciate that imagination can override the phenomenological approach to the point of absurdum.

What we can conclude from the more narrow arguments is that they are reductionist and kneejerk responses to a complex phenomenon, and so they provide insufficient explanations for the rise of transgender identity. They may be partially correct but it may help to consider more complex equations, not to mention the approaching of each trans person as possessing a unique biography that led them to become who they are. Following this line of thought I'd like to offer two more factors below that might help to complicate the picture.

Internalized misandry, and gyneolatry

I've observed in the rhetoric of many transwomen both an externalized and an internalized misandry. This appears in descriptions of the men they know, and in descriptions of themselves, and they also tend to rehearse feminist depictions of maleness that portray narrow and denigrating descriptions of masculinity. Conversely, transwomen tend to idealize women and femininity (i.e., gyneolatry),[4] leading to a conclusion that the feminine grass is of a greener hue.

The sense of internalized misandry was reinforced by a 1991 study which found that mothers of young boys with gender dysphoria frequently suffered psychiatric disorders and that these boys exhibited chronic suffering that was often expressed directly by them as self-hate. One such boy at age three said:

> "I hate myself. I don't want to be me. I want to be somebody else. I want to be a girl."[5]

When a man's potential masculinity is felt as toxic due to the operation of internalized misandry, it's only natural that such a person would have a dysphoric reaction to masculine selfhood. This might be understood as a pathological reaction, but it can be equally viewed as a healthy adaptation to an unhealthy, male-denigrating environment — for if I renounce maleness I protect myself from corrosive states of imposed self-hatred, along with de-personalizing those attacks directed at me from a misandric world.

Hence gender dysphoria is in some ways adaptive.

The position I have been leading to can be stated simply this way: Internalized misandry + gyneolatry + autogynephilia = transwoman. Of those three factors, I would consider autogynephilia somewhat more variable than the other two, and while often present, it is not always.

In order to render this triplicate formula more palpable, I encourage readers to watch the following Benjamin Boyce interview with former trans individual NJada[6] who masterfully illustrates the operation of internalized misandry and gyneolatry in his own experiences.

.

In conclusion, this article claims that autogynephilia, and gender dysphoria prove insufficient as "causes" of the desire to transition but may nevertheless operate as one factor among many. As a student of gender politics I have expanded the causa efficiens to three:

Internalized misandry + gyneolatry + autogynephilia = transwoman.

Lastly, and on a more general note Kara Dansky,[7] a trans-exclusionary radical feminist who is leading the charge against transgender individuals, recently tweeted, "It is, in effect, a men's rights movement intended to objectify women's bodies and erase us as a class. It is left-wing misogyny on steroids. I say this is as a leftist and a Democrat."

In response I feel it important to clarify that the transgender movement is not a cause célèbre driven by men's rights advocates, but rather the current support for transgender individuals/rights is derived from the power of government administrations and global regimes playing "freedom one-upmanship" – ie., the feigning of moral purity to position themselves at top of the global hierarchy.

Feminists were the ones who cleared this forest path for the global elites to walk on, and Dansky is right in the sense that it opens a window to become of benefit to men's rights movement – ie. it dissolves customary culture privileges that have accumulated around the female sex, making those privileges available to all humans, including men and boys, for the first time.[8]

References:

[1] Ray Blanchard, Autogynephilia: an underappreciated paraphilia, (2019) ; See also: C. Moser, Autogynephilia in Women (2009), which shows that autogynephilia also exists in large numbers of natal women, negating Blanchard's thesis that it is peculiar to transwomen.
[2] Autogynephilia | ContraPoints (2018)
[3] Matt Walsh: What Is A Woman? (2022)
[4] Gyneolotry | Gynocentrism And Its Origins
[5] Sonia Marantz and Susan Coates, Mothers of Boys with Gender Identity Disorder: A Comparison of Matched Controls (1991)
[6] Benjamin Boyce, Transition and Redemption | a Detrans Story, with NJada (2022)

[7] Kara Dansky, The Abolition of Sex: How the "Transgender" Agenda Harms Women and Girls (2021)
[8] Peter Wright, Unintended Effects Of Transgender Activism On Men's Issues (2021)

The Wisdom of Odysseus

Peter Wright · 14 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The story of Odysseus' confrontation with the Sirens was written almost 3000 years ago, but remains as instructive for men today as is was back then – the message being to resist our primal urges and opt for the more rational approach.

The scene takes place during an ocean voyage where Odysseus and his crew are assailed by sweet-singing Sirens who come disguised as beautiful young women with the aim of deceiving them. By singing beautiful songs the Sirens would lure sailors to shipwreck on the rocky coast of their island, after which they would kill the men and feast on their flesh. In a demonstration of MGTOW ingenuity, Odysseus advises his crew to put wax in their ears, and has himself tied to the ship's mast to stop him being lured into the Sirens' trap.

The Sirens were later encountered by the Argonauts who passed by unharmed with the help of the musician Orpheus who drowned out the Siren's bewitching songs with his own music. The Sirens were so distressed to see a man hear their song and yet escape, that they threw themselves into the sea and drowned. – PW

* * *

THE ODYSSEY, BOOK XII – Translated by Samuel Butler

The Goddess Circe advises Odysseus about the deadly Sirens

"'So far so good,' said she, 'and now pay attention to what I am about to tell you—heaven itself, indeed, will recall it to your recollection. First you will come to the Sirens who enchant all who come near them. If any one unwarily draws in too close and hears the singing of the Sirens, his wife and children will never welcome him home again, for they sit in a green field and warble him to death with the sweetness of their song. There is a great heap of dead men's bones lying all around, with the flesh still rotting off them. Therefore pass these Sirens by, and stop your men's ears with wax that none of them may hear; but if you like you can listen yourself, for you may get the men to bind you as you stand upright on a cross piece half way up the mast, and they must lash the rope's ends to the mast itself, that you may have the pleasure of listening. If you beg and pray the men to unloose you, then they must bind you faster…

“Here she ended, and dawn enthroned in gold began to show in heaven, whereon she returned inland. I then went on board and told my men to loose the ship from her moorings; so they at once got into her, took their places, and began to smite the grey sea with their oars. Presently the great and cunning goddess Circe befriended us with a fair wind that blew dead aft, and staid steadily with us, keeping our sails well filled, so we did whatever wanted doing to the ship’s gear, and let her go as wind and helmsman headed her.

“Then, being much troubled in mind, I said to my men, ‘My friends, it is not right that one or two of us alone should know the prophecies that Circe has made me, I will therefore tell you about them, so that whether we live or die we may do so with our eyes open. First she said we were to keep clear of the Sirens, who sit and sing most beautifully in a field of flowers; but she said I might hear them myself so long as no one else did. Therefore, take me and bind me to the crosspiece half way up the mast; bind me as I stand upright, with a bond so fast that I cannot possibly break away, and lash the rope’s ends to the mast itself. If I beg and pray you to set me free, then bind me more tightly still.’

“I had hardly finished telling everything to the men before we reached the island of the Sirens, for the wind had been very favourable. Then all of a sudden it fell dead calm; there was not a breath of wind nor a ripple upon the water, so the men furled the sails and stowed them; then taking to their oars they whitened the water with the foam they raised in rowing. Meanwhile I look a large wheel of wax and cut it up small with my sword. Then I kneaded the wax in my strong hands till it became soft, which it soon did between the kneading and the rays of the sun-god son of Hyperion. Then I stopped the ears of all my men, and they bound me hands and feet to the mast as I stood upright on the cross piece; but they went on rowing themselves. When we had got within earshot of the land, and the ship was going at a good rate, the Sirens saw that we were getting in shore and began with their singing.

The Sirens call to Odysseus

“‘Come here,’ they sang, ‘renowned Odysseus, honour to the Achaean name, and listen to our voices. No one ever sailed past us without staying to hear the enchanting sweetness of our song—and he who listens will go on his way not only charmed, but wiser, for we know all the ills that the gods laid upon the Argives and Trojans before Troy, and can tell you everything that is going to happen over the whole world.’

“They sang these words most musically, and as I longed to hear them further I made signs by frowning to my men that they should set me free; but they quickened their stroke, and Eurylochus and Perimedes bound me with still stronger bonds till we had got out of hearing of the Sirens’ voices. Then my men took the wax from their ears and unbound me.

Sex Equality: Defining One's Terms – The Men's Review (1948 Article)

Mens Review · 15 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We continue the series of Men's Review excerpts below with this piece exploring the meaning of 'sex equality'. – PW

* * *

Defining One's Terms

by C. Lea

THERE is a type of propagandist who finds it convenient to avoid defining his terms. He can thus vary the sense when and how it best suits him. He is not tied down to any particular interpretation.

The phrase "sex equality" is often used in this convenient and undefined way. On the one hand they denounce sex discrimination and deny sex difference favourable to men as contrary to the doctrine of sex equality. On the other hand, they regard sex discrimination or sex difference favourable to women as perfectly consistent with that doctrine.

Special rights, privileges and exemptions in favour of women are taken as a matter of course by people who hotly resent the least sex discrimination in favour of men.

Feminine superiorities, real or imaginary, are pushed down our throats by those who would indignantly deny the possibility in favour of men. These partisans readily discover arguments or evidence in support of their claims advantageous to women. They may justify special rights for women on the score of their special functions AS women, however they would, on the other hand, refuse to accept special rights for men on the same grounds.

Logically it is obvious that a series of one-sided feminine advantages cannot possibly give sex equality. Only a balance of masculine and feminine advantages can give real equality. The upholders of the system of one-sided feminine advantage continue to label it "equality," while stigmatising as "inequality" any compensatory masculine advantage.

The time is come for us to challenge the offenders of this intellectual dishonesty to give clear, logical definition of exactly what they mean by "sex equality."

SEX EQUALITY IN MARRIAGE

It is believed by many that in some mysterious and unexplained way the law favours the husband in marriage. It is difficult to fathom how anyone can have this view, since the man is under compulsion to perform most of his duties, while the woman can repudiate many of hers with impunity.

A husband must support his wife or be dealt with by a maintenance or separation order. A man cannot escape a distasteful marriage without heavy financial burdens. A woman who finds marriage distasteful can leave it, earn her own living and extract a maintenance from her husband.

It may be argued that while the husband of a bad wife has far less legal remedy than the wife of a bad husband, the wife who fulfils her side of the bargain has a harder position than her husband, but this does not mean that the law presses more hardy on the wife in such a case, it means that, to her credit, the wife concerned does her duty, and more than her duty without legal compulsion.

Vol. I No. 3 January 1949

MEN'S REVIEW

quarterly or the weekly for Men's rights

A CHALLENGE TO MEN

[illegible] of [illegible] tolerance, so deeply rooted in the English character towards the individual, Men's Review makes its bow. The odds against us are heavy. "Come to nothing we can do about it" might be the cry of the weak-kneed, but the spirit that took the little boats to Dunkirk and brought them back on that most famous May day of our long history, is still alive to-day.

WITH YOUR help, YOUR co-operation, YOUR membership we can do those things that are for YOUR health. Help us to help YOU!!

DEFINING ONE'S TERMS

by G. Lee

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

Unpoisoning the well: Darwinian gender studies

Paula Wright · 16 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

If any man could draw up a comprehensive, infallible guide to navigating this treacherous territory, we would certainly erect a statute [sic] to his everlasting memory. There is a Twitter account dedicated to exploring and enumerating precisely the distinctions and differences between the acceptably erotic and the intolerably sexist. It's called @SexyIsntSexist. It is, of course, under the control of a woman." Neil Lyndon. Do men really understand what sexism is? The Telegraph 20/5/14

My area of research is cross-disciplinary and includes, but it isn't limited to, evolutionary anthropology, palaeoanthropology, psychology, biology, ecology, primatology and gender studies. For brevity's sake, I refer to this as Darwinian Gender Studies (DGS). This area represents to me, the consilience of the natural and social sciences, as envisioned by E.O.Wilson. DGS is informed by a rationalist perspective not the more traditional orthodox feminist model of post modernism and social constructionist theory. My PhD thesis will be developing an evolutionary, bio-cultural model of what orthodox feminists call "patriarchy". I won't post my whole thesis here – but I will give a general précis of my research interests (including a paper I have co-authored here) and why I believe they are very important today, in a time where political correctness, social justice and toxic feminism has taken us deep down the post-modern rabbit hole.

I am an egalitarian, and equity feminist. I am a woman who wants to build bridges of understanding between the sexes not walls of fear and mistrust, which is what I find orthodox feminism does today.

I'm passionate about humans and humanity. What we are, what we are not. Two things we are, which we cannot cease to be and also remain human, are a sexually reproducing, pair bonded species. These basic facts of our biology and psychology, and cannot be erased by social engineering.

In my research, I interrogate orthodox feminist concepts, such as patriarchy, objectification, gender power differentials, mating systems and psychosexual differences using humour and evolutionary explanatory models such as sexual selection, parental investment theory, mutual mate choice, female choice, signalling theory and perhaps most importantly intrasexual competition.

History shows us that whenever our species has ever attempted to take control of biology and bend it out of shape to ideological goals, human tragedy always follows. It's a lesson we still don't seem to have learned. Because in spite of overwhelming evidence, many people, and especially orthodox feminists, still hold fast to the idea of an endlessly flexible human nature, and indeed, human nature is flexible, but a blank slate it is not. Neither is it a crude caricature of immutable deterministic drives and instincts as often painted within the orthodox feminist doctrine of biological determinism. Human nature is very much mutable, but not infinitely or arbitrarily so, and here lies the nub:

Within what may seem like infinite variations of human action and reaction to what life throws at us, our predispositions on a broad scale are actually predictable. There are enough constants within this calculus to recognise the existence of an unmistakably human nature. This nature will vary and recalibrate between individuals and ecologies, but these variations dance around a constant fire.

"Those who journey from political correctness to truth often risk public disapprobation, but it is notable that most never lose their tolerance or humanity. They may question the politics of race, but not that racism is bad; they may question campaigns about women's pay, but not that women and men deserve equality of treatment."

Browne, A. (2006) The Retreat of Reason: Political correctness and the corruption of political debate in modern Britain. Civitas

I am following in the footsteps of female evolutionary anthropologists, ecologists, biologists, psychologists, philosophers; women such as Barbara Smuts, Sarah Blaffer Hrdy, Anne Campbell, Helena Cronin, Griet Vandermassen, Catherine Salmon, Maryanne Fisher, Bobby Low, Hanna Kokko, Helen Fisher, Rebecca Sear and many many more. Their work reveals that, far from orthodox feminist fears to the contrary, evolved psychosexual differences do not equate to inferiority. In evolution, we in fact see true equality expressed in discrete and fascinating ways. These women (and many men too) illuminated the role females play as potent agents of evolution via the phenomenon of female choice.

These female scientists effected an unsung revolution – unsung by feminism, not evolutionists – by shattering the male perspective biases that once dominated Darwinism. They did this, not with declarations of war against patriarchy and angry rhetoric, but with dedicated objective thought. I'm not angry. I'm passionate. Passionate about truth-seeking. When it comes to the principles of natural selection – the struggle to survive – men and women differ very little. Rather, it is in the principles of sexual selection – the struggle not just to survive but thrive enough to have offspring and allow them to thrive also – it is here that the main differences start to become manifest None of these differences equate to inferiority.

I'm passionate about logic and rationalism – something women have nothing to fear from! Yet feminists do fear it, as philosopher Janet Radcliffe Richards notes in her book The Sceptical Feminist,

"…in spite of girls doing better at school than boys, feminists are still woeful at rationality…feminism has some tendency to get stuck in the quagmire of unreason from time to time [but] it cannot be denied that adopting an anti-rational stance has its uses; it can be turned into an all-purpose escape route from tricky corners"

This is a very good description of the majority of feminisms today, be they radical, TERF (Trans-Exclusive Radical Feminist), intersectional or any other tribe battling for dominance in the victim narrative. I am not anti-feminism but I am anti-bad feminism.And today there is much of it about. All eschew logic and reason and all are masters to the flying patriarchal spaghetti monster in the sky. Mary Wollstonecraft and Olympe de Gouges must be spinning in their graves. But then again, today they would also be dismissed as cis white privileged scum.

What I am most passionate about is having the opportunity to have a role, however small, in helping us better understanding ourselves as a species. It's an investigation that could save us.

A cross-disciplinary advancement of a consolidated theory of all variables noted under the term "patriarchy" has huge policy implications. It not only pertains to the oppression of women but of men also. An analysis of the true dynamics of resource control is especially pertinent in a world in which resources are predicted to become scarce.

As a woman, I am interested in the unique selection pressures women face due directly to their sex. But as an evolutionist, this interest does not make me blind to the fact that men face their own unique selection pressures for the same reasons. Indeed, the evidence seems to point to males being subject to much more intense pressures than females, not least in the battle to actually be born male!

Of one thing I am convinced: one sex cannot be understood except in light of the other. Men and women have co-evolved together, each shaping the other both physically and psychologically via sexual selection. Men desire power and resources because women desire men who have them. And female power, well that doesn't look like male power, and so often goes unseen. That doesn't mean they don't have it or use it against each other.

From the perspective of evolutionary theory, feminism can be categorised as the study of the conflict between the sexes – intersexual conflict – with a particular interest in proximate mechanisms of how men oppress women and how this oppression can be countered. But this is only half the story!

Evolutionists posit that to really understand intersexual conflict one must also analyse intrasexual conflict and broaden enquiry to include an analysis of ultimate mechanisms of not just how, but why, men pursue the goal of power and resource control (see above). The focus on both intersexual competition (the battle between the sexes) and intrasexual competition (the battle within the sexes) is central to Darwinian Gender Studies. Intrasexual competition has two strands, male-to-male competition and female-to-female competition. Much is known about male intrasexual competition (but is totally ignored by orthodox feminisms), but outside of evolutionary theory, less is known about conflict between women; female intrasexual competition. It is the pink elephant in the feminist room. Competition within a sex is always much more intense than between sexes.

Using female intrasexual competition as a lens to look anew on hot feminist topics such as the beauty industry, the rise in cosmetic surgery, the size zero controversy, anorexia, the endless bitching and wars of attrition between the many tribes of feminisms; female intrasexual competition brings fascinating new insights, as these phenomena seem to be expressions of female competition not male oppression at all.

Nonetheless, there is still a comfortable consensus within orthodox feminisms that the beauty 'ideal' is a tyranny perpetrated upon women by the male patriarchy. "Feminists down the ages have argued that the oppression of women is played out on their bodies, their clothes, their style of adornment. To politicise dress has been one of the enduring projects of the women's movement." (Walter,N. 1999)

Naomi Wolf tackled this concept in her enormously successful book The Beauty Myth: How Images of Beauty Are Used Against Women. It suggests that this patriarchal strategy is one of 'divide and rule' as it "creates a climate of competitiveness among women that divides them from each other."(Gamble, Sarah (ed). The Routledge Companion to Feminism and Postfemnism. Routledge: 2001)

Competitiveness is the key word here…

Perhaps the idea of sanctioning the idea, nay the fact, of female intrasexual competition seems frightening for orthodox feminists because on the surface of it, it threatens the very notion of a 'sisterhood'. Yet we know that men are murderously competitive with one another, as homicide rates attest, and this does not seem to threaten their notion of 'the patriarchy'. The evidence that the beauty myth may not be a tyranny perpetuated on women by men, but on each other (if it is a tyranny at all), reveals a much more complex and fascinating picture of female agency. It also goes far to liberate women from the doctrine of passive femininity.

The fact is, women are fiercely competitive, but as the existence of feminism attests, this does not stop women cooperating to face challenges. Although, as feminism also shows, its wilful ignorance of human nature means feminists cannot agree on anything for long. This explains the many tribes within feminism, and the fiercely defended hierarchies that exist within it. I do not deny that these revelations are tricky for feminists to negotiate, but that is no reason for not taking them on.

That female intrasexual competition exists is not in doubt. The degree of it however will vary from culture to culture. We know dominance hierarchies exist in many species and all apes. We know females have a large role in the construction and maintenance of such hierarchies. We also know that women are often not united in their interests, and compete with other women for resources and mates.

An individuals environment is crucial to how they calibrate their own needs. What I also want to study is sexual economics and the female control hypothesis. This is a fascinating idea which is laid out in the paper The Cultural Suppression of Female Sexuality by cultural psychologists Roy Baumeister and Jean Twenge. This suggests that in our environment in the West, it is women more than men who control the sexuality of females - their daughters, their peers and their rivals especially! Let's suppose for a moment that Susan Brownmiller stumbled upon a truth when she said that fear of rape was an institutional tool to keep all women in a state of fear. Who is wielding that tool today via the meme of 'rape culture' on university campuses by use of false statistics? Orthodox (not equity) feminists.

If I could sum up my research goals, it is the following quote, attributed aptly to both a man and a woman – the functional, inspirational human dyad of Carl Sagan and Ann Druyan:

"If we do not know what we are capable of…then we do not know what to watch out for, which human propensities to encourage, and which to guard against." – from Shadows of Forgotten Ancestors.

I believe that it is vitally important that we understand our biological heritage just as much as our cultural. One thing I have learned in the current cultural sex war is that those in denial of our biology seem the most enslaved by it, especially their tribal instincts.

So, where to now for Darwinian Gender Studies? I have been studying and developing Darwinian Gender Studies for 10 years with the help of some truly wonderful mentors such as Professor Daniel Nettle (Ncl) , Dr Helena Cronin (Darwin@LSE), Dr Griet Vandermassen (Ghent) and Dr Robert King (UCC). At the moment I'm an independent researcher – I'm independent because I am an unorthodox candidate for academia having left school at 16 with zero qualifications! It's a long story, and along the way I was diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome as an adult (something I experience as an overload of empathy not a deficit). But somehow since then – and not without a huge amount of effort I may add – I have found my way to a place today where I have been privileged to be offered an unconditional place on a postgraduate programme in Evolutionary Anthropology at one of the UK's best red brick universities. I reveal the fact of my Asperger's not to play the pity card, but in the hope that it can help – maybe even inspire – those who also have a diagnosis on the spectrum. To show that seeming weaknesses can actually be strengths.

Help me make this happen. Donate here http://www.gofundme.com/paulawright . And thank you.

[Ed note: this post originally appeared here and is reprinted with permission.]

Castration culture revealed in Hesiod's Theogony

Douglas Galbi · 16 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Students wondering how university officials today can support policies that viciously disparage and persecute men's sexuality should study Hesiod's Theogony. That influential work, written in Greek nearly 2700 years ago, depicts the earth goddess Gaia plotting to castrate Uranus, the sky god, who was both her son and her husband. Gaia's unjust and vicious hostility toward male genitals indicates castration culture's ancient, bloody grip on western Eurasian gynocentric societies.

The sky god Uranus covered the earth goddess, Gaia. She then gave birth to three strong sons. Hostility to male sexuality made those births problematic. Greek theogony distinctively celebrates goddesses creating a child on their own, without men — reproducing by parthenogenesis.[1] Many government policies now support effectively similar reproduction among humans. Unlike ancient Greek gods, men today are vastly disproportionately forced to make enormous "child support" payments to women holding privileged custody of children. That's the cultural construction of parthenogenesis.

After she had children with Uranus, Gaia with vague and unsubstantiated charges incited his castration. Gaia said to the children she had with Uranus:

> Children of mine and of a wicked father, obey me, if you wish: we would avenge your father's evil outrage. For he was the first to devise unseemly deeds. [2]

Consensual heterosexual activity isn't unseemly, nor should it be blamed on men. In ancient Greek theogony, Gaia was the original exponent of parental alienation. Cronus, son of Gaia and Uranus, responded like a well-programmed zombie to her work of parental alienation:

> Mother, I would promise and perform this deed, since I do not care at all about our evil-named father. For he was the first to devise unseemly deeds.

Gaia rejoiced at her son's willingness to commit horrible violence at her behest. She arranged for an ambush:

> She placed him in an ambush, concealing him from sight, and put into his hands the jagged-toothed sickle, and she explained the whole trick to him. And great Sky came, bringing night with him; and spreading himself out around Earth in his desire for love, he lay outstretched in all directions. Then his son reached out from his ambush with his left hand, and with his right hand he grasped the monstrous sickle, long and jagged-toothed, and eagerly he reaped the genitals from his dear father and threw them behind him to be borne away. [3]

Fathers understand Hesiod's Theogony in a deeply personal, deeply painful way. College students not yet fathers are beginning to recognize castration culture.

When Bernardus Silvestris wrote a new cosmogony in twelfth-century France, he confronted the castration culture that Hesiod's Theogony described. As Roman culture developed with awareness of the earlier Greek culture, the Roman god Saturn assimilated the Greek god Cronus. Bernardus described Saturn as:

> an ancient to be most strongly condemned, cruel and detestable in his wickedness, savagely inclined to harsh and bloody acts.
> {accusatissimus veteranus, crudelioris quidem et detestandae malitiae, dirisque ac cruentis actibus efferatus.} [4]

Writing under gynocentrism, Bernardus didn't dare attack long-established castration culture directly. He challenged it figuratively with a new poetic description of Saturn's violence:

> he {Saturn} mowed down with a blow of his sickle whatever was beautiful, whatever was flourishing. Just as he would not accept childbirth, so he forbade roses, lilies, and the other kinds of sweet-scented flowers to flourish.
> {insumpto falcis acumine, quicquid pulchrum, quicquid florigerum demetebat. Rosas et lilia et cetera olerum genera, sicut nasci non sustinet, non sustinet et florere.}

Destroying gardens is a poetic metaphor for castration. Bernardus sought to create a new, more humane cosmos. His Cosmographia ends with creating man's penis and celebrating the importance of the penis's skillful work.

Penetrating castration culture to implant the seeds of a new imaginative world requires gleaning discarded resources in literary history. For example, classical Latin Priapus poems exposed the brutalizing and commodifying stereotypes of men's person. Asinus aureus recounted a woman's delight in a large male member. The medieval French knight Geoffrey de La Tour Landry taught his daughters concern for violence against men. Unlike Hesiod's Theogony, the medieval Latin Cosmographia of Bernardus Silverstris excludes castration culture. All just, merciful, and loving persons should be striving to create such a world.

Notes:

[1] Relative to other western Eurasian creation myths, female parthenogenesis is far more important and marked in Hesiod's Theogony. Park (2014) pp. 265-9. Scholars today tend to see female parthenogenesis as part of the primordial Golden Age:

> The mythic form his {Zeus's} act of creation assumes completes the trend of the Theogony that began with Earth's natural parthenogenetic capacity and ends with the male's imitation of her. The seal is set on the finality of the transition from female dominance to male dominance by conscious male usurpation of her procreative functions, the basic source of her mystery and power.

Zeitlin (1996) p. 108. Students are now thoroughly indoctrinated with these threadbare clichés of anti-meninism:

> Evidently, Hesiod merely reflected the opinions of his society onto his story of the gods' creation of the universe, creating a justification for the philosophical opinions of the society in which he lived.
>
> Could myths like the Theogony have been used to reinforce the patriarchy as it operated in ancient Greek society? It seems likely.

Pelos (2016). Of course, it seems likely when you live in a Soviet-style indoctrination camp. See the praise for the good little apparatchik.

[2] Hesiod, Theogony ll. 164-6, from Greek trans. Most (2007) p. 17. Subsequent quotes are from id. ll. 170-2, 174-82. The earlier Loeb edition of Hesiod's Theogony, translated by Hugh G. Evelyn-White (1914), is available online.

[3] Reflecting the fantastic imagination that now drives totalitarian sex tribunals at American universities, Vernant declares:

> Ouranos {Uranus} sprawls over Gaia, covering her permanently, and discharges into her without stopping, imposing on her an incessant copulation—at least, at night (Theog. 176). There is neither spatial separation nor temporal interlude between them, in this union without pause.

Vernant (1990) p. 466. This contempt for Uranus isn't warranted. Without Uranus's work, ordinary life would be impossible. Uranus provides relief that helps persons begin a new day.

Echoing tenets of today's dominant castration culture, Park declares:

> The emasculation of Uranus is key to progress: it ends his sexual relationship with Gaea and explains in symbolic terms the separation between earth and sky.

Park (2014) p. 271. Castration also occurs in the earlier Hurrian-Hittite Kumarbi Cycle (Song of Kumarbi). In the Hittite version of that theogony (from the fourteenth or thirteenth century BGC), Kumarbi overthrows king Anu by biting off his genitals. For an English translation, Bachvarova (2013). Long-established castration culture has broad bite today in the broad criminalization of men's sexuality.

While he presented castration culture, Hesiod himself seems not to have been an anti-meninist. Hesiod sought to provide men with prudent counsel in the work of their ordinary days:

> Do not let a fancy-assed woman deceive your mind > by guilefully cajoling while she pokes into your granary:
> whoever trusts a woman, trust swindlers.

Hesiod, Works and Days ll. 373-5, from Greek trans. Most (2007) pp. 117, 119.

[4] Bernardus Silvestris, Cosmographia, Microcosmus 5.5, from Latin trans. Wetherbee (2015) pp. 101. The subsequent quote is similarly from Microcosmus 5.6, id. pp. 101, 103.

Underscoring his condemnation of Saturn / Cronus for promoting castration culture, Bernardus describes "the barren and frozen wastes of Saturn {infecunda Saturni frigora}" as a place:

> where the peace of the sky had been broken and shivered with chill and icy harshness. {ubi gelidis et pruinosis rigoribus demutata caeli tranquillitas inhorrescit.}

Microcosmus 5.7, id. p. 103. I suspect that the Latin gelidus shares a common origin with the Old Norse term gelda ("geld, castrate").

[image] Cronus castrates his father Uranus at his mother Gaia's urging. Oil on panel. Giorgio Vasari and Cristofano Gherardi, 16th century Florence.

References:

Bachvarova, Mary. 2013. Translation of the Kumarbi Cycle, with Song of Hedammu separated into two different versions." Pp. 139-63 in López-Ruiz, Carolina. Gods, heroes, and monsters: a sourcebook of Greek, Roman, and Near Eastern myths in translation. New York: Oxford University Press.

Most, Glenn W., trans. 2007. Hesiod. Theogony. Works and Days. Testimonia. Loeb Classical Library 57. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Park, Arum. 2014. "Parthenogenesis in Hesiod's Theogony." Preternature: Critical and Historical Studies on the Preternatural 3.2: 261-283.

Pelos, Andy. The Asexual Revolution: Parthenogenesis in Hesiod's Theogony (Revised)." A Classic(s) Dilemma. May 12, 2016.

Vernant, Jean-Pierre. 1990. "One…Two…Three: Eros." Ch. 14 (pp. 465-78) in Halperin, David M., John J. Winkler, and Froma I. Zeitlin, eds. Before sexuality: the construction of erotic experience in the ancient Greek world. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Wetherbee, Winthrop, trans. 2015. Poetic works: Bernardus Silvestris. Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Library 38. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press.

Zeitlin, Froma I. 1996. Playing the other: gender and society in classical Greek literature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Simone de Beauvoir: A Nazi, a pedophile, and a misogynist

Lucian Vâlsan · 17 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

As the non-feminist sector of the society gets increasingly more vocal, the sector of the society that is not yet aware of the toxic nature of this ideology reacts with a set of arguments that merely reveal that the factual reality is not yet entirely known to the public.

A while ago, a group of coffee-shop feminists were trying to convince me that feminism is not as bad as I say it is and that if I just read more about feminism, I would eventually understand. As an example to support this thesis, the aforementioned feminists recommended that I read the writings of Simone de Beauvoir, the French Marxist-feminist known for her book The Second Sex. Of course, those feminists were unable to fathom that someone had taken their ideology seriously enough to read its literature and then rationally end up utterly rejecting it. As with any other cult, such a thing is inconceivable for the true believers of the sect.

In the headline of this post, a series of allegations were made toward the eminent feminist and it's only fair for us to prove them—which is exactly what we're going to do in the following lines.

Between 1943 and 1944, as France was under Nazi occupation, Simone de Beauvoir worked as a sound director for Radio Vichy.[1] Radio Vichy was the state's radio station in the so-called zone libre (free zone) of France, following the capitulation of the French Republic in front of Nazi Germany in 1940. We say the so-called because the Vichy regime, although theoretically neutral from a military standpoint, was in fact an active collaborator of the Nazi regime,[2] and today it is an acknowledged fact by all parties involved that the institution of Radio Vichy was the de facto mouthpiece for Nazi propaganda on the airwaves in France.

De Beauvoir apologists might say that she was forced by circumstances to work there, just like many individuals now claim to have been forced to collaborate with the Securitate during the Communist regime. But de Beauvoir's manuscripts written in that period, which were revealed afterwards, tell a different story.

Even feminist authors, such as Dr. Ingrid Galster, who have dedicated years of their lives studying Simone de Beauvoir had to admit, albeit grudgingly, that the attitude manifested by de Beauvoir as a sound director in the Nazi propaganda machine was at the very least one of subtle collaborationism,[3] and the way through which she ended up working there was not following a coercion—but a perfectly conscious choice. De Beauvoir was already a member of the public workers' union and could have chosen to work in a city hall, for instance. But she had to choose to work somewhere else other than teaching because her career in teaching was done—even though she already had the qualifications and the prestige necessary for teaching, given that she had been the second most performing doctoral student in her generation, lagging only behind her lifetime lover, Jean-Paul Sartre.[4]

The reason for which she could no longer teach is exactly related to pedophilia and Jean-Paul Sartre. In 1943, Simone de Beauvoir was fired for behavior leading to the corruption of a minor.[5]

Once again, the apologists of de Beauvoir might rush to say that the 1943 moment was a singular incident or, as it was told to me once, an incident outright invented by the Nazi persecution who couldn't stand her once they realized she was a Marxist empowered independent woman. But nothing could be further from the truth.

De Beauvoir's sexual interest for children is a theme spreading throughout her life. She was amongst the first philosophers who tried to unite the genre that had begun in the 1930s (and that lasted until 1980s in Western Europe) of female pedagogical pedophilia.[6] She attempted this unification with her essay "Brigitte Bardot and the Lolita Syndrome," published for the first time in Esquire magazine in 1959 and then republished multiple times until the mid-1970s. In that essay, de Beauvoir glorifies Brigitte Bardot for her childish physical aspect, which retains the perfect innocence inherent in the myth of childhood, and then paints her as a Houdini for girls who will release and empower them out of the chains in which they had been subjugated.[7, 8]

The 1959 essay was just the beginning. In 1977, de Beauvoir, alongside most of the Marxist French intelligentsia, signed a petition demanding nothing more and nothing less than the legalization of pedophilia and the immediate release of three individuals who were due to serve long jail sentences for sexually exploiting several boys and girls aged 11 to 14. The petition signed amongst others by de Beauvoir and Sartre was published in Le Monde and was saying, among other things, the following:[9]

> Such a long time in remand to investigate a simple `vice' affair, where the children have not been victims of the slightest violence, but have to the contrary testified before the examining magistrates that they consented — although the law at present denies them their right to consent — such a long time in remand we do consider scandalous in itself. Today they risk to be sentenced to a long prison term either for having had sexual relations with minors, boys as well as girls, or for having encouraged and taken photographs of their sexual plays. We believe that there is an incongruity between the designation as a `crime' which serves to legitimize such a severity, and the facts themselves; even more so between the antiquated law and the reality of every day life in a society which tends to know about the sexuality of children and adolescents[…]

So, in de Beauvoir's opinion, 11-year-old children in late 1970s France tended to be sexual beings. Since puberty was not installing and is not installing even today at that age for the overwhelming majority of children, we consider apt to name de Beauvoir's advocacy as nothing short than a plea for pedophilia, regardless of which definition of the word one chooses.

The 1977 petition triggered an entire discussion at the societal level in France about the laws concerning age of consent, a discussion in which the abolitionist camp (of which de Beauvoir and her lover were part of) united into Front de libération des Pédophiles (FLIP—The Pedophiles Liberation Front) and the intentions of the members of FLIP were explained quite clearly by themselves in the discussion broadcasted on the radio in April 1978 by Radio France Culture.[10] FLIP was going to be remembered as a pioneer within the ranks of the French pedophiles movement, even though the organization itself didn't last long because of its internal disagreements.[11]

Besides de Beauvoir and Sartre, there were other people involved in the advocacy for pedophilia in that period, including people who then ended up leading the destinies of France—and we refer here, for instance, to Bernard Kouchner and Jack Lang, respectively, the Minister of Health and the Minister of Education(!) in early 2000s in the first term of Jacques Chirac.[12]

All these make de Beauvoir not just a pedophile apologist but an active supporter. However, what makes her an abuser is her activity through which she was recruiting pupils, abusing them, and then passing them to Jean-Paul Sartre, sometimes separately, sometimes in an integrated ménage à trois. The Telegraph writes in a review of Carole Seymour-Jones's book, Simone de Beauvoir? Meet Jean-Paul Sartre, a book meant to analyze de Beauvoir's relationship with Sartre, the following:[13]

> For long periods, the couple became a "trio", though the arrangement rarely worked out well for the third party: at least two of de Beauvoir's former pupils found themselves becoming first her lover, then Sartre's, only for the couple to close ranks against them once the fun wore off.[…]
>
> For Seymour-Jones, de Beauvoir's affairs with her students were not lesbian but paedophiliac in origin: she was "grooming" them for Sartre, a form of "child abuse".

For de Beauvoir (as well as for Sartre), age didn't matter as long as the partners were younger than her and Sartre.[14] The possibility that others might get hurt or sexually exploited wasn't even remotely on the eminent feminist's radar, who thought that "grooming" girls in order for Sartre to take their virginity (Sartre's words, not ours) was in and of itself an act of sexual empowerment for those girls.

But if the escapades with a Nazi and pedophilia flavor don't convince you of the questionable character of de Beauvoir, let's have a look through her feminist writings, which are so filled with misogyny that it's hard to find an equivalent in other sectors of the society. This aspect per se isn't surprising to us, considering that feminism is in and of itself a misogynistic ideology. But let's not digress.

De Beauvoir's pillow book, The Second Sex, is a book about which contemporary feminists say that it is "remarkably fresh"—a book that had the following to say about wives:[15]

> The wife feeds on him like a parasite; but a parasite is not a triumphant master.

Over a quarter of a century later, in 1975, in a dialogue with another feminist, Betty Friedan, de Beauvoir was going to clarify her position beyond all reasonable doubt. In a discussion about the way to compensate the mothers who stay home and care for children, de Beauvoir answered unequivocally:[16]

> No, we don't believe that any woman should have this choice. No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one. It is a way of forcing women in a certain direction.

Are we clear? In the eminent feminist's vision, women are a bunch of inert creatures who are incapable of choosing what's good for them as responsible adults. In fact, nobody besides Simone de Beauvoir and her Marxist-feminist ideology knows what's best for women. Therefore, no women should be authorized to choose anything that contradicts de Beauvoir.

In the same dialogue, she gets even more clear:[17]

> In my opinion, as long as the family and the myth of the family and the myth of maternity and the maternal instinct are not destroyed, women will still be oppressed.

Actually, de Beauvoir's hatred toward maternity and mothers in general is very obvious throughout her book. Let's offer some more samples:

> Motherhood relegates woman to a sedentary existence; it is natural for her to stay at home while men hunt, fish, and go to war.[18]
>
> [The mother] is plant and animal, a collection of colloids, an incubator, an egg; she frightens children who are concerned with their own bodies and provokes sniggers from young men because she is a human being, consciousness and freedom, who has become a passive instrument of life.[19]

And when this eminent feminist started bashing women's bodies, nobody could stop her:

> The psychic attitude evoked by menstrual servitude constitutes a heavy handicap.
>
> […]a woman's body—and specifically the girl's—is a "hysterical" body in the sense that there is, so to speak, no distance between psychic life and its physiological realization. The turmoil brought about by the girl's discovery of the problems of puberty exacerbates them. Because her body is suspect to her, she scrutinizes it with anxiety and sees it as sick: it is sick.[20]
>
> The mammary glands that develop at puberty have no role in the woman's individual economy: they can be removed at any moment in her life.[21]

De Beauvoir then goes on to explain in her book how evil and oppressive the family is for the development of a girl. If the father has the audacity to be proud and appreciative of his daughter's successes, then that's yet another evidence of oppression and imposition of vassality for the daughter towards the father.[22] But if fathers get away fairly easy, mothers who dare to discipline their daughters get an even harsher admonition from the eminent feminist:

> Mothers—we will see—are blindly hostile to freeing their daughters and, more or less deliberately, work at bullying them even more; for the adolescent boy, his effort to become a man is respected, and he is already granted great freedom. The girl is required to stay home; her outside activities are watched over.[23]

So, are we clear? The fact that some parents were not letting their girls go out after a certain hour in the Nazi-occupied France in the middle of World War II constitutes oppression. And bear in mind that de Beauvoir bemoans this aspect—about which there is serious doubt that it was generalized—while 13- and 14-year-old boys were fighting in the war,[24] including to keep her safe in order to write rubbish "philosophy" and produce propaganda for the Nazi regime—a regime that also had 14- and 15-year-old boys in their troops.[25] I'm almost willing to say that she should have checked her privilege. But I won't say.

The hypocrisy of this woman is both fascinating to study and revolting at the same time. Simone de Beauvoir, worshiped even today as a great icon of the "good" feminism of the 1960s and studied in the "feminist dialogues" on the National School of Political Science and Public Administration in Bucharest (SNSPA), has defended with great fervor the revolutionary regime of Ioseb Dzhugashvili (aka Iosif Vissarionovich Stalin) until long after the horrors of Stalinism had already become known in Western Europe.

In other words, while numerous Romanians left in the USSR were being deported into the Gulag, while the intellectual elite of this country was being decimated in concentration camps like Râmnicu Sărat, Pitești, or Aiud, and while even 12-year-old boys were being tortured in Communist prisons for conspiracy against the socialist order,[26] Simone de Beauvoir was publishing The Second Sex in which she was explaining how women's liberation is intimately related to the fate of socialism[27] while vehemently denying, alongside with her lover, the Stalinist atrocities that were taking place in the same moments. And we, the Romanian taxpayers, now pay for students to go to SNSPA and study this low-life as if she's someone we should look up to. Well, this is a real example of state-sponsored misogyny! But I have a feeling that the feminist elite is very comfortable with it.

Dear coffee-shop feminists, if you are recommending us to read Simone de Beauvoir as an example of a "good" feminist, then you either haven't read her yourselves and you're mentioning her just to appear cultivated, or, on the contrary, you have read her and agree with what she stood for, in which case any normal non-feminist human being would have to be at the very least insane to believe that you have the best intentions in mind.

The audacity with which de Beauvoir purports nothing short of outright banning certain choices for women because they don't fall in her ideological lines is the absolute example of a deranged Utopian for whom warm water is a new concept and for whom the planet revolves around herself. And if it doesn't, then it's the planet's fault and it must be banned. The truth must be banned—if the truth is "incorrect."

If feminists would truly be sincere when they assert that they aim to combat misogyny and increase the spectrum of choices for women, then they would start by throwing the entire ideological arsenal coming from Simone de Beauvoir to the dustbin of history. But they're not doing that and they'll never do that because feminism is hypocritical in its best days and totalitarian by its nature and practice in its regular days. And when feminism has a bad day, it demands the extermination of men.

Dear feminists, your declaration of public appreciation for Simone de Beauvoir says far more about yourselves than anything anyone from the non-feminist sector of the society could ever say. You have once again proven that the best anti-feminist argument comes right from the feminists themselves. And for that, we wish to extend our thanks!

References:

Special thanks to Marian Atodiresei, who helped with documentation.

[1] http://my.telegraph.co.uk/expat/stephenclarke/10151800/10151800/ – Stephen Clarke – The women that France needs to remember – or forget; The Telegraph, published at September 5, 2013

[2] https://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Holocaust/VichyRegime.html – The Holocaust: The French Vichy Regime

[3] http://www.lexpress.fr/culture/livre/ce-qu-on-n-ose-pas-voir-sur-beauvoir_822547.html – Dupuis Jérôme – Ce qu'on n'ose pas voir sur Beauvoir; L'Express, published at January 3, 2008

[4] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/culture/books/non_fictionreviews/3672534/Simone-de-Beauvoir-Meet-Jean-Paul-Sartre.html – Tim Martin – Simone de Beauvoir? Meet Jean-Paul Sartre; The Telegraph, published at April 12, 2008

[5] http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2013/05/19/savile-beauvoir-and-the-charms-of-the-nymph/ – Andy Martin – The Persistence of the 'Lolita Syndrome'; The New York Times, published at May 19, 2013

[6] ibidem

[7] ibidem

[8] Simone de Beauvoir – Brigitte Bardot and the Lolita Syndrome (with many half-tone illustrations) p.10; 14 – First Four Square Edition – The New English Library LTD., 1962

[9] We received the following communication: Le Monde, January 26, 1977 – https://www.ipce.info/ipceweb/Library/00aug29b1_from_1977.htm

[10] Sexual Morality and the Law, Chapter 16 of Politics, Philosophy, Culture –Interviews and Other Writings 1977-1984, p.275

[11] Le Mouvement Pédophile en France – http://archive.wikiwix.com/cache/?url=http://bibliobleue.fpc.li/Revues/Gredin/N0/MvtFrance.htm

[12] http://www.theguardian.com/world/2001/feb/24/jonhenley – Jon Henley – Calls for legal child sex rebound on luminaries of May 68; The Guardian, published at February 24, 2001

[13] Ibidem 4

[14] http://www.biographile.com/6-degrees-of-infatuation-an-ode-to-frisky-french-writers/28496/ – Kelsey Osgood – 6 Degrees of Infatuation: An Ode to Frisky French Writers; Biographile, published at February 11, 2014

[15] Simone de Beauvoir – The Second Sex, p. 378 – Translated by Constance Borde and Sheila Malovany-Chevallier; Vintage Books – Random House Inc., New York, 2009

[16] Sex, Society and the Female Dilemma – A Dialogue between Simone de Beauvoir and Betty Friedan; Saturday Review, publicat la 14 Iunie 1975 – p. 18 http://64.62.200.70/PERIODICAL/PDF/SaturdayRev-1975jun14/14-24/

[17] Female Dilemma, op. cit. p.20

[18] Second Sex, op. cit. p.70

[19] Ibidem p.392-393

[20] Ibidem p.257-258

[21] Ibidem p.43

[22] Ibidem p.255

[23] Ibidem p. 258-259

[24] World War II: Conscription and the Age of Soldiers – http://histclo.com/essay/war/ww2/age/ww2-age.html

[25] Hitler's Boy Soldiers – http://www.historyplace.com/worldwar2/hitleryouth/hj-boy-soldiers.htm

[26] Târgşor, communist prison for children – National Romanian Television report (English subtitles included) –

http://vimeo.com/73694592

[27] Second Sex, op. cit. p.60

On Speaking Out Loud: A thought for Men's Health Week

Andrew MacDonald · 18 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

One upon a time and not so long ago men had a valued place as protectors of their communities. Men knew they were warriors and part of a community and could be called upon at any time. Individual men knew it and their communities knew it. The men strove to live up to the job. Boys had role models to look up to and expected to take their place with a job to do as a man. Old men remember this.

Young men have it in their DNA but seldom in their lived experience. Part of this is a deep loss of mutual respect between women and men in the social sphere, as I detail here. Related to that is the vast fatherlessness in the developed west that is causing such vast disconnection.

Today, as it was 40 years ago (but not 100 years ago) boys and men, starting from puberty, kill themselves at least four times more often than women.

I don't mention this as part of a victim competition. It's a flashing red sign. Pay attention! Behind the suicides is hurt and loss and suffering of boys and men and the women that love them. But you know that!

As I write this on June 15h it's the anniversary of my friend Michel, who jumped to his death off Ottawa's Interprovincial Bridge twenty-seven years ago today. Salut Michel! When I woke up this morning I wanted to remember him. I didn't think this would be part of it.

Still the suffering of boys and men remains and remains invisible.

We're also in a political-economic-social crisis that for many people is also invisible, or at least confusing and crazy-making.

Here's how the boy crisis and it are are related.

Like the people in Germany before the second World War most of us don't see what's growing in our midst. The mass of men like the mass of people don't register it. I think we don't see it's because it's a propaganda war and don't know it. This propaganda war doesn't look like the war we're used to and for which we reserve the word.

Global control of everything is the aim of this takeover. It's a far more intrusive control than was possible 80 years ago. It's not hidden. The Great Reset is openly declared and spoken for by the wealthiest and most powerful people in the world. Central Bank Digital Currencies tied to digital identity and compulsory behaviours are openly planned by global leaders and are the stated intention of many central banks.

It's a propaganda war so the front line isn't weapons. It's suggestion and "mass formation." (A helpful look at the modern psychology of propaganda is here.) The weapons of the would-be controllers are billions to buy the narrative and punishment for dissenting views. The weapons of those who do not comply are consciousness, personal courage and what we might call conscious voice – daring to speak personal truth.

We're not used to speaking out. It's got nothing to do with telling other people what they should do. It's not about bringing them around to our view. The challenge of the conscious voice is to speak our truth without expecting or needing others to agree or respond positively. It's to be willing name the unspeakable. It's to be willing to be ignored, blamed, shunned or deplatformed if that's what it takes. It's a spiritual act of warriorship and good for elders too. It's the opposite of giving up and being suicidal.

The cultivation of deliberate personal voice is what men's health looks like. It's the direction of the solution to the boy and man crisis. It's restoring men to their part in the protecting community and the future.

If we don't find a way to use our voice we default to those who, hiding behind vast institutional power and money, use theirs – our wannabe globalist controllers. Cultivating and using our personal voice is what spiritual work looks like today.

It’s also a best thing we can do for the men’s community and our own health.

Lecture 1: Staring Out from the Abyss

Adam Kostakis · 19 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following is the first lecture of Adam Kostakis' landmark online series about gynocentrism. The series was published on AVfM in 2011, but for those who didn't catch them we are making them available again. Here is the first of twelve mind-blowing articles. – PW

Lecture No. 1

"I love an opposition that has convictions" – Frederick the Great

The Battle of the Sexes has degenerated into a Dirty War, and we are, each of us, being drafted into it by forces who care not a whit for equality or fairness.

Propaganda, as a tool of control, is effective only insofar as the vision of the world that it presents concords with the perception of the world experienced day-to-day by its targets. The wider the gap between the perceived world and the propagandistic representation of the world, the less effective – and therefore less useful – the propaganda will ultimately be. We have reached a juncture at which women are increasingly rejecting feminism as irrelevant or inapplicable to their lives, because the world that feminist orthodoxy describes does not appear to be planet Earth. At the same time, we are approaching a zenith of feminist control over the actual inhabited world, which combines state repression with gender tribalism, both forces intensifying exponentially as they use each other as leverage to climb ever higher.

I am reminded of an ancient riddle, which asks, 'how high can one climb up a mountain?' The answer is 'to the top,' because once you reach the summit, the only possible way is down. Feminism has no obstacles left; total control is within its grasp, and by total, I do mean in the sense that it shall be totalitarian. The victim card has served as an entry pass through the back door of state and supranational institutions. Now empowered over men, feminists have re-established the principles of Valerie Solanas' Scum Manifesto, declaring – in language clearly evocative of the Final Solution – that we shall soon witness The End of Men. The 'sex war' is not cooling down as women approach (or in some cases, surpass) equality with men – it is heating up. Feminists are not only publicly inciting male hatred and getting away with it, they are using their positions in government, in academia, in think tanks and in the media to make their violent fantasies a reality, advocating the renunciation of men's basic human rights.

To take one example, the Secretary of State of the most powerful nation in the world announced in 2010 that an international mobile prosecution unit shall be established specifically to target men around the world. To take another recent example, a leading feminist has suggested that certain legal principles designed to protect innocent citizens from persecution and unjust imprisonment, dating back to the signing of the Magna Carta, should be withdrawn from men. Nor is feminism a problem confined to the Western world. Men are subject to the arbitrary rule of women in India, facing severe penalties for inadvertently causing the slightest offense.

None of this squares with the 'women-as-victim' cliché, which has so usefully served feminists in getting to this point. Nevertheless, feminism is firmly entrenched and in control of the mechanisms which boast the monopoly on physical power, legitimate or otherwise. There is hardly any countervailing force which remains. The West has found its new Imperial Mission to replace Global Christendom: enforced worship of women. As any dissenting voice is immediately and violently stamped out, feminists are free to radicalize their anti-male agenda to the point of moral sickness and to unleash unto the world all manner of vindictive atrocities.

For you see, when propaganda has ceased to be an effective tool of control, one seeking control will simply find other means. Control of the state – the monopoly on physical violence – is the means which feminists have sought. But unlike propaganda, which manipulates the mind, state control only brutalizes the body. The power of the controllers always ultimately rests upon the resilience of the controlled, hence consent must still be manufactured. The Roman Empire did not last for five hundred years by the exercise of brute force, but by mass support; the Emperor was glorified as a mortal deity, and even the smallest townships in his realm voluntarily erected statues and altars in his honor. For too long, men have been worshiping at the altar of the female, and it is tempting to believe that this psychological submission will not yield even in the face of physical oppression or extermination – that men will march to their demise like sacrificial lambs, hoping to win women's favor with their last servile actions. But proclamations regarding The End of Men may well turn out to be as empty as those which were made nearly twenty years earlier, concerning The End of History. The so-called Clash of Civilizations which followed led that author to refute his own position. We should be optimistic that a true Clash of the Sexes will soon have feminist-minded women eating crow.

As feminism grows ever more powerful, and begins to realize its radical ambitions, it will simultaneously exhaust its capacity for manufacturing consent. Those chivalric illusions which ensure the consent of men, and which feminism ultimately rests upon – 'women-as-victim,' 'women-as-precious,' 'women-as-helpless,' and so on – will become rather more difficult to maintain in time. The more force is advanced against men to bridle and inhibit their lives, the more discontent shall be nurtured among them. The misandry bubble is due to burst, and with every example of overreach, which sees yet more good men cast into the role of criminal and subjected to humiliating and vicious punishments, another crack appears in the wall, another step we take closer to the day that the whole hateful edifice collapses under its own weight – and, crucially, under ours.

Our task, then, is twofold: first, to prepare the ground, in order to hasten the collapse of feminism.

Second (and complementary to the first): to construct the ideological weapons to help prevent a feminist resurgence following its collapse.

Both of these goals require, not force, but some propagandizing of our own. Things being the way they are, this does not require us to distort the truth. On the contrary, we shall, for the most part, be exposing those truths which others have distorted; revealing the facts to a wider audience than has yet received them, diligently and unapologetically. As one notable activist in the field recently put it, he does not need to attack feminists – all he needs to do is quote them. Simply exposing feminist hatred to the disinfecting sunlight of the world might well be enough to turn the tide – which is why enormous energies are expended on misdirecting, discrediting, neutralizing and obscuring the arguments and advocates of the opposition.

One key strategy for the achievement of our task was announced at an April 2010 conference, in the form of Male

Studies, a new discipline already facing hostility from an academic world that has long been a bastion of radical feminism. That this sore thumb, this thorn in the side of scholarly uniformity should provoke such outrage as it has done should not be surprising. Here is a selection of topics which Male Studies is set to cover:

> Socioeconomic factors leading to males' over-involvement in the criminal justice system, underemployment and limited opportunities as fathers, resulting from changes in child custody law (economics, forensics, law, public policy);
>
> Misandric representations of boys and mature males in the media and advertising (media studies including cinema, television and internet, and advertising);
>
> Accounts of the experience of being male (history, literature, autobiography);
>
> Pressing issues related to the emotional well-being of boys and older males, most notably depression and suicide (clinical psychology, medicine and psychiatry, social work).

Friedrich Nietzsche, writing in the late 19th century, warned that if one gazes into the abyss for long enough, then one shall find the abyss gazing back into them. It must be deeply troubling for feminists, to wake up one morning and find other people deconstructing them, having made it their mission in life to expose and correct feminist wrongdoing.

This would seem to be the reason for the abusive response, from the feminist sector, to the idea of men discussing issues of sex and sexism without the supervision of women. It matters not what feminists think of Male Studies, because feminists are not the discipline's target audience; its success is not dependent upon their approval, a fact they will no doubt have trouble reconciling themselves to. Regardless, even if they launched a concerted campaign to stop men from discussing their experiences through the fora of academia, they are incapable of preventing this from happening elsewhere. The true sticking point for would-be dictators today is that we live in an Information Age. It is rather difficult to control the flow of information when our very epoch is defined by it. So, let's have these discussions right here, right now – as long as people can use the internet to congregate and speak their minds, nothing can stop us. Let's have these discussions in a million other places too, out in the real world – because if men had never spoken up about their experiences, as men, then we would not be looking forward to the commencement of Male Studies in the near future.

There are already a great number of websites devoted to Men's Rights issues; indeed, these seem to have proliferated over the last few years, sprouting up all over the pasture like so many delicious mushrooms! For most of these weblogs, their content needs no greater unifying theme than opposition to feminism. Given the growing and active network of people concerned about the status of men today, it has become possible to push the envelope a little further. This weblog aims to encourage the intellectual crystallization of what we are calling the Men's Rights Movement, by taking a narrow lens across a broad range of topics. This weblog is dedicated to the elucidation of Gynocentrism Theory.

What is Gynocentrism Theory? To put it simply, it is a system which explains social relations between the sexes. It supersedes Patriarchy Theory, the cornerstone of all feminist thought. Now memetic, Patriarchy Theory has proved a remarkable tool in denying men their rights, including their most basic human rights to dignity and bodily integrity, on the pretense that all men are oppressors (or at least, allied with oppressive men from whom they receive benefits) and that all women are victims of male power.

Gynocentrism Theory is the articulation of many years of effort by various thinkers in the Men's Rights sphere to describe a vision of the world which more accurately reflects the experiences of men – and many women, too. In contrast to the simplistic, black-and-white tribalism of Patriarchy Theory, Gynocentrism Theory does not equate male fulfillment with the holding of tyrannical power over women. Gynocentrism Theory does not accept that men act as a power bloc. On the contrary, Gynocentrism Theory exposes the divergence between demographics and interests; fundamentally, that while a small number of men may be the ones holding social and political power, this by no means implies that they do so for the benefit of all men; and that in fact, more usually, they do so for the benefit of most women and to the detriment of most men. Gynocentrism Theory advocates that power be understood as multi-faceted, and that policy has historically been a matter of appealing to, and protecting, women.

The above, no doubt, shall make heads spin among those who assume that power at all levels can be identified according to the shape of the genitals of those who get to make important decisions – regardless of what they actually decide.

Any more shall be beyond the scope of this introductory lecture. And so, we shall continue this train of thought next week.

I bid you all a reflective day, and I'll be seeing you again.

Sooner than you think.

Adam Kostakis

Men’s Mental Health Summit – Discussion Podcast

A Voice for Men · 20 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I'd Give You an "A"

J Galt · 20 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It was a Saturday morning, home from the job but busy with the usual weekend tasks. My kids at that time were much younger than now. My daughter was 12; my son 9. It was grocery time, and like everyone else on a Saturday morning the three of us were at the plaza for food.

I always like to challenge my kids with my idea of respect and reward. I turned to my daughter and asked her how many times she had come shopping with me, to which she rolled her eyes and said I dunno a million.

"Right Sar, enough to know how this works. So you know the budget is a hundred and ten bucks, and today it's your turn to shop."

"What do you mean dad?"

"Well you go into the grocery store get a cart and do it."

"What if I screw up?" she asked.

"Sar, what's to screw up? We eat the same crap every week."

"Well what if I spend too much?"

"How can you if you only have 110 bucks? Tell you what, here's another twenty just to screw up with. Phone me when you're done and I'll come get you – should be an hour."

She looked really nervous, but hey, I know my daughter, she loves it when I pull this shit out of the blue.

Zach and I went down into the restaurant for some fries and a cup of tea to wait for Sar. Zach figured his sister would screw it up and call in the next ten minutes crying.

"Yeah," I said, "We'll see."

The conversation turned to Zach asking if he could get one of those new sports jackets with the bulls on it. Those jackets are 80 bucks. He whined and begged for about ten minutes till I got fed up, so I told him if he could beat me once at x's and o's he could get it.

34 games later he was getting pretty distraught.

"I can't beat you at this, this sucks."

"Well Zach, I guess I want my 80 bucks more than you want your jacket. That's why I'm winning and you're sucking."

He got pissed when I said that and drew another board.

"I'm going first this time," he said.

Just then the waiter came over and asked if we wanted anything else, maybe another tea I said while I put down my X on the board and handed him my cup. Then I heard from Zach, "got you Dad." He said Dad like I was some kid in the playground he was punking. I looked down as he drew his O and connected the three of them.

"Wait a minute," I said, "I was talking to the waiter, that's not fair."

"Well, I guess you wanted your tea more than your 80 bucks," is all I heard. Followed quickly by, "so I want the black one with the "Bulls" in red letters."

Man I just got walked on by a 9 year old. But really I loved the push and pull with my kids and when they beat me at my game, they got my respect.

We went back to the grocery store to pick up Sar and she was standing out front, groceries in the cart and the look of a wife on her face.

“Hey Sar, how did you make out?”

“I think I did pretty good Dad, but I called mom once to find out if we needed peanut butter so I got some.”

I thought wow this kid is pretty sharp so I asked her if she told her mother she was doing the shopping.

“No wa,”y she said,” if it’s screwed up it’s your fault, not mine, and you can deal with mom.”

I don’t think she realized the shudder that went through me. I asked her if there was any change. “Yeah, it came to 108 and change, she said, and handed me the buck and the coins. I stood there looking at her.

“Well?” I asked.

“Well what?”

“What about the other twenty bucks?”

She looked me dead in the eye with a smile and said, “I screwed up dad.”

“What do you mean you screwed up?”

You said the 20 bucks was just for screwing up, so I screwed up.”

“OK Sar I get your drift, but do me a favour, when you’re older and get married try not to make it so surreal for your husband.”

“What does surreal mean?”

“Well surreal is when your 34 years old you go shopping and you end up getting jacked for an extra hundred bucks by a nine year old and a 12 year old. Sar turned to Zach and asked, “You got the jacket?”

“Yeah,” he said, “a buzzillion games of X’s and O’s, but I finally won.”

That was how Zach came to own his Bulls jacket. Fair and square.

The next week was a little more unnerving. We live in a little suburb called a hamlet and we were about a ten minute walk from the store through a backstreet and down a bike path. Sarah had asked Zach to go to the store for her about 2 o’clock in the afternoon on Saturday. We got a call from the video store about 20 minutes later, Zach was there he was crying on the phone said they took his jacket in a project near the store. I told him to wait for me and jumped in my car. I was on the scene in about 5 minutes. I parked the car behind the project got out and started to survey the area, I stayed calm and just walked like nothing was up. I passed a house surrounded by hedges and heard some kids talking behind the bushes.

I rounded the bushes and realized they were in an area that wasn’t visible from anywhere, I figured if I played my cards right I could trap them in the bushes and they wouldn’t be able to run. I stepped around the bushes blocking the exit and said in a friendly tone hey guys. They didn’t respond they all just turned and looked at me. I moved a little closer looking each of them in the face. I got a real serious look on my face and in a tone that only a father can use I said “which one of you is the bear hunter?”

Of course I got nothing but dumb looks in response. I’ve always found that when confronting kids the first thing to do is say something they won’t understand. It confuses them and gives you their full attention. That’s the moment to take control; the moment they’re confused.

“Who’s got the gun?” I said, in a tone that caused every one of them to freeze in shock. Four of them pointed to the one that had it. I stepped up to him and put my hand out flat and tapped it with my finger, while looking him in the eye with a threat of absolute annihilation. He looked down, pulled the gun from his pocket and put it in my hand, never once looking up at me, I put it straight into my pocket. Where’s the masks? One kid said they threw them away in the bushes. “And the jacket?” With the masks. You, go get them, you guys don’t fucking move or you’ll regret it.

Two minutes and I had the masks and jacket.

They all lived in the project, which was pretty much a community of single mothers on welfare. I just shook my head. OK guys lets go see your parents. Every one of these kids, the oldest was 14 – the youngest 10, lived with a single mother. Four of the mothers tried to pass it off as boys who won’t do what their told. With the fifth kid it was the same; single mother but she was out with her “new” boyfriend. He was 12 and left alone at home.

Surprize, surprize, he was the one with the gun.

I wanted to take him home last in case I had to call the cops and wait there. I had told each of the mothers that I would be filing a police report and expect to be hearing from them. All I heard in response was complaints about how hard it was to be a single mother. One of them pissed me off and I asked her what she thought it might be like to be a kid with less than half a parent who only complained about it. She slammed the door in my face.

The tragedy in this whole situation is the extent to which everyone is willing to accept the outcome. From the mothers to the cops it was just same old same old. For the boys there wasn’t one of them that copped an attitude with me at any point. Knowing a little about kids from having my own I talked to them like they were my own. What the hell were you thinking son? you think this shit ends here, look at the trouble you brought on yourself. If you were my son I’d have to keep you around me all the time till I knew you could figure out the difference. What were you planning to do with the jacket – take turns wearing it?

“No we were going to sell it.”

“So it’s money you’re after? Well, see that house? That’s where I live, you want money you come and see me I’ll give you work and pay you for it. At that time I lived in a Condo project, we had implemented a child employment program in grounds maintenance to reduce vandalism. We discovered that when you pay kids to do grounds maintenance, they lose interest in destroying the grounds, and develop an interest in personal economics.

I could tell by the way these kids responded to me that every one of them was a damn fine kid just bleeding for some attention, and specifically from a father. Anytime I saw them in the neighbourhood they would always say hello as polite as could be. I’d always chat with them ask how things were going for them at home and at school. One lad told me school was bad all he could get was a D in every class.

I stopped turned and looked him in the eye and said, “Forget teachers, forget school, forget everything. Are you telling me you’re a D? Just a D? Is that all you can imagine?”

Two months later the same kid came up to me in the plaza and spoke to me.

“Hey Keith, I got my report card guess what? I got 4 B’s!”

“Wow I said, I never did any better than C’s when I was in school.”

He stopped, looked at me and said, I thought you must have got all A’s.”

“No, sir,” I said, “You passed me.”

“That’s OK,” he said, “I’d give you an A.”

That was a ton of bricks for me, I could have broken into tears right there. It’s very humbling to give so little and receive so much in return. It was a privilege for me to be present at that transitional moment, as a witness to something more.

A mansplain of feminism femsplained

Jim Muldoon · 21 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The web site known as “The Conversation” website boasts a tagline of “academic rigour, journalistic flair.” Implicit, it seems to me, is that we can expect academic rigour and journalistic flair to be combined in their articles. If the article by Chilla Bulbeck entitled “Explainer: Feminism” is anything to go by, they should put a question mark after both claimed traits.

Academic rigour? Journalistic flair?

The piece begins with a picture of a bunch of men and women, with the Eiffel Tower in the background (how very cosmopolitan), throwing brassieres in the air. The people are fully clothed, which means that they brought extra bras along for the photo.

The bra, of course, is a symbol for Feminism. It can represent the feminine, being a garment uniquely designed for women. It can also represent their oppression, being a garment that restrains them. Throwing them up in the air no doubt has some special significance which only a true feminist will see.

The picture does set the tone for the piece. The theme, at least for me, is symbols over substance.

> “For most feminists, however, feminism is a political practice – a desire to change the world.”

Any idea what that might mean? A practice is something one does. A desire is something one has. Can Feminism be both? Of course it can. Feminism is the right to talk utter nonsense and demand that others be awestruck by the Feminist intellect.

A case in point can be seen in the comments. A Glen Baxter takes issue with the various statistic and arguments presented in the piece and puts forward a few alternative arguments.

> And you finish with the standard Feminist appeal to emotion – “We feminists are fighting oppression, so we must be right and if you don’t agree with us you are for oppression!”

Bulbeck’s dismissive reply to Glen includes an insightful snippet:

> Glenn, I suggest you read the article Shauna Murray posted a link for. You think emotion is inferior to reason…

Instead of answering Glenn’s points directly, she does exactly what he accused her of. The link in question is to someone claiming yet another study proves the oppression of women. Glenn is not only being told which facts to use, but how he should feel after reading them.

But, of course, I am being too patriarchal. Bulbeck was clearly caught up in the moment of making grand statements of the glory of Feminism to be worried about grammar or syntax, never mind logic. I can just imagine her blinking back those tears of pride as she contemplates changing the world, Feminist style.

Bulbeck takes us through the three waves of Feminism with all the academic rigour one might expect of a pamphlet spruiking the latest anti-wrinkle cream. Women, we are told, “struggled for the vote” in the early 1890s. Of course, this implies that men have always had the vote.

Let me give you another pamphlet guide to universal sufferage. In 1780 only 3% of men in England and Wales had the right to vote, with even less in Scotland. Outside of these countries, practically no one had the vote. In the years that followed, in fits and starts, that 3% was increased to what we now call universal suffrage in most Western countries. There are still many countries where the vote is either non-existent or too corrupt to call suffrage.

And who voted in those changes?

Men.

And Bulbeck, like a good Feminist should be, is petulantly ungrateful for their role in the matter.

There are more glaring omissions from this version of history. Women, it seems, were oppressed for a long time.

> Women have struggled for greater participation in spheres reserved for men in every nation, dating back at least to 620BCE.

Any idea why 620 BCE was any different to 621BCE? Did women have the vote before then? Let's just blink back the tears of pride and march on, shall we?

Unchallenged Patriarchy, implied by Bulbeck, continued at least until the 1890s when the first wave commenced. It was here that the vote was "won" by women, among a few other triumphs. Seamlessly, she moves on to the second wave in the 1960s. This might give the uninformed the impression that the first wave lasted some sixty years, but those with any idea of history would know about the two world wars. They come up even in the most rudimentary of pamphlet explanations of the twentieth century.

The importance of this is that Feminists were not keen on "equality" when men were dying on the battlefield. No, Patriarchy was just fine for the average Feminist. It was far better to be handing out white feathers in London than going "over the top" at the Somme.

More importantly, it is hard to run a misandric campaign in the face of such monumental sacrifice. I'm not saying that there weren't any Feminists narcissistic enough to run one, but the attempts to describe men, as a class, as the enemy would not have received much traction. Those not killed by the wars returned physically and mentally scarred from the ordeal. Their families would not have stood idly by while the Feminists tried to run them down.

For these reasons, Feminism took a sabbatical. By the 1960s, of course, generations not directly touched by the wars began to have influence in our societies, and so Feminists could begin their campaigns of bigotry again.

The second wave was fragmented into "socialist feminists," "liberal feminists," "women's liberationists and "radical feminists." Bulbeck is not clear on what brings all these disparate groups under the banner of Feminism. The common link, it seems to me, is that they are all different expression of the same basic theme:

> …women's victimisation by male subordination…

The above quote is from the description of the third wave. Indeed, the whining and complaints of oppression blur into a one mind-numbing moan, wave after wave:

> …wives had to be freed from exploitation of their unpaid domestic labour by husbands.
>
> Women could determine their own futures if they were released from "compulsory heterosexuality…"
>
> [T]hose gender relations that make women and femininity inferior, underpaid and exposed to danger from men and masculinity

On and on. The unseen (except by Feminists) hand of Patriarchy guiding men to participate in female subjugation.

She then asks if we are living in a "Post-Feminist era." Clearly, Bulbeck doesn't think so.

> Ongoing inequality, which cannot be denied and despite over a century of women's activism, is explained in two major ways.

The two major ways are contradictory. The first is that the ground work is set and women will become, in practice

"equal" at some point in the future. The other explanation is that "society is now equal" and the inequalities of outcome can be explained by "…women and men are just expressing their natural desires and talents."

Indeed, for Bulbeck, Feminism is needed now more than ever. She begins the whole sorry saga with this current assessment of the status of women:

> Yet there is no society on the planet in which women are equally represented in what that society most values and rewards, whether that's opportunity, money, status or power.

So Post-Feminism Feminism is probably the next wave. As always, progress is being made, but there is still so much more to do.

For those who find themselves wondering what Feminism is doing for men, Bulbeck lays it out for all to see. She takes the argument of "natural desires" and turns it back on Feminism's critics.

> Interestingly this argument is not used to explain male disadvantage. Boys are thought to lose out in schools because of prejudice in the "female-dominated" environment and not because of boys' lack of interest in learning. Men lose out in divorce battles because of discriminatory legislation and judges, not because of men's lack of participation in child-rearing. As a result, feminists are accused of crying "victim" where the men's movement is not.

It may be that Bulbeck doesn't do reason, but her doublethink is sublime. Throughout, she claims that women are victims of men. At the same time, she calls out men for claiming victimhood, because that kind of behaviour is just wrong. Of course, what makes her right, and the whining men wrong, are the facts. But if we dare examine the facts, we are oppressing her emotion by our reason, which only proves that Feminists, if not women, are the real victims.

But this dismissal of men and their issues is not limited to the men's movement. Consider her view that one of the "victories" of the first wave of Feminism was "for mothers' custody rights to their children." Clearly, this is not an "equality" issue. Mothers can only get custody when fathers are denied custody. Its one or the other. If equality were the order of the day, then shared parenting would obviously be the way forward. Of course, this would interfere with women's alimony which in many countries is now called child support.

The interesting thing to note here is that when fathers were generally awarded custody, there was no expectation that the mother should make a financial contribution.

As I said, this is not an equality issue.

But then again, none of it really is. Bulbeck's explanation of Feminism is merely a collection of sound bites and thought bubbles glued together with equal proportions of misandry and female victimhood. Inequality alternates between a rallying cry to the faithful and an expedient argument to justify Feminist bigotry towards men.

Links

http://theconversation.com/explainer-feminism-27981

http://www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/pathways/citizenship/struggle_democracy/getting_vote.htm

http://www.firstworldwar.com/battles/somme.htm

Lisa Wilkinson has caused a delay in a criminal trial as a result of this public speech.

AVfM Video Source · 21 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The one good man

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 22 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The One Good Man sees in Woman what men lack. Woman is bright and charming and good. Men are dark and sinister and bad.

To maintain the image of Woman as bright and charming and good, the One Good Man swallows Her darkness. Her rages, Her excesses, Her cruelties are his responsibility, not Hers. All Her goodness is not chosen because She is helpless in Her goodness—as She is helpless in Her femininity. But because it is not chosen, it is not goodness and it feeds nothing in the One Good Man.

Without shadow there is no depth.

He craves dimension and he receives only bright, charming images as thin as a whisper. To compensate he tries to capture as many as he can, but they flit through his fingers like sunlight and his hunger grows.

He needs a Harem.

The politician signs into law one-sided advocacy that ignores the pain of men to help women: Domestic Violence, Rape, Sexual Harrassment, it doesn't matter. He sees it all as an avenue to destroy his competitors and win an adoring harem, even if it's only the myth of himself in his own mind. He is the One Good Man, good because of his influence, which he uses to advance women.

The family judge eviscerates his rival—a father and husband—and in the woman's approval he sees another adoring harem member. He knows that her husband has failed her otherwise why would she be here before him? But he won't fail her. He is the One Good Man, good because of his power, which he uses to benefit women.

The priest condemns the imperfect morality of his flock's husbands and in their admiration he sees a harem. He knows the church women are there to hear his words and uses them to throw petty sins of their husbands into high relief. He won't fail them. He is the One Good Man, good because of his morality, which he uses to lionize women.

The petty bully brutalizes a smaller boy, cheered on by girls. The girls have a grievance; the boy presumed to ask one of them out, or maybe he was staring at her breasts too long? He won't fail them. He is the One Good Man, good because of his strength, which he uses to avenge women.

The One Good Man sees all other men as feckless, immoral, weak, beneath him. The One Good Man is good because he knows he is the only good man. He is special. He regales of stories of his goodness, all with the same refrain: "I have used my strengths to woman's service, I have crushed men so that women may walk upon them." And thus he is deserving of the admiration and approval of many women. He has a Harem. But that is not enough.

The One Good Man has enemies.

The One Good Man hates the Hungry Man because they are the same man. The Hungry Man hungers for women's bodies; The One Good Man hungers for their approval. The Hungry Man says, "women's only use is their sex." And the One Good Man disagrees because a woman's only use is their approval. That's why the One Good Man cannot allow himself to see Woman's shadow; because if he did, she might not approve.

Hungry Man and One Good Man are the same man, but they will never admit it. Hungry Man says he does not care for women's approval, yet he needs it to access her sex; One Good Man says he does not care for a woman's sex, but it's her sex that makes her approval worth so much.

Both the Hungry Man and the One Good Man fear the Bad Man, perhaps better called the Broken Man, for he is the Hungry Man having fed too little and the One Good Man having swallowed too much.

The Bad Man says "look, Woman has a shadow! A shadow that She casts, not me! Every shadow is Hers!"

The One Good Man hates the Bad Man's words; he points to an obvious flaw: "Some of those shadows are cast by you!" and dismisses the greater truth.

The One Good Man has a final enemy; and this one is most insidious of all because he is part of the One Good Man, the Hungry Man and the Bad Man.

He is just a man. Not a bad man, not a good man, not a "real man" or a fake man, not a strong man or a powerful man or an aggressive man or a useful man or a useless man. Just a man. A man who sees that words like good, strong, bad, real, fake, powerful, useless and useful are just words the One Good Man uses to divide himself from other men, to make himself special and thus worthy of his Harem.

The man, just a man, sees a woman as just a woman. She is made of light, and shadow in equal measure to the light, and so she has depth and form and substance. When she hurts him he says "you have hurt me. You take responsibility for it. I will not take responsibility for having been hurt." And if she does, he stays, because she feeds him.

With shadow, there is depth.

He does not need a Harem. And so he does not need to hate or hurt other men to have a Harem.

He is not the One Good Man. The Bad Man or the Hungry Man.

He is a man, just a man.

Lecture 2: The same old gynocentric story

Adam Kostakis · 22 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Lecture No. 2

> I'm not cut from the same mold. I don't read from the same old story. – Pennywise

My readers must understand that the concerns which Gynocentrism Theory addresses are not limited to feminism. Feminism is still fairly new on the scene, while Gynocentrism has been around for as long as recorded history. The Men's Rights Movement seeks to address problems associated with feminism, but does not limit its attention to these problems. Many of these problems existed prior to the emergence of feminism proper in the late 19th century, although they have been expanded and exacerbated since. Feminism is only the modern packaging of Gynocentrism, an ancient product, made possible in its present form by the extensive public welfare arrangements of the post-war period.

In spite of its radical rhetoric, the content of feminism, or one could say, its essence, is remarkably traditional; so traditional, in fact, that its core ideas are simply taken for granted, as unquestioned and unquestionable dogma, enjoying uniform assent across the political spectrum. Feminism is distinguishable only because it takes a certain traditional idea – the deference of men to women – to an unsustainable extreme. Political extremism, a product of modernity, shall fittingly put an end to the traditional idea itself; that is, in the aftermath of its astounding, all-singing, all-dancing final act.

Allow me to clarify. The traditional idea under discussion is male sacrifice for the benefit of women, which we term Gynocentrism. This is the historical norm, and it was the way of the world long before anything called 'feminism' made itself known. There is an enormous amount of continuity between the chivalric class code which arose in the Middle Ages and modern feminism, for instance. That the two are distinguishable is clear enough, but the latter is simply a progressive extension of the former over several centuries, having retained its essence over a long period of transition. One could say that they are the same entity, which now exists in a more mature form – certainly, we are not dealing with two separate creatures. Take any of the great Empires that swept the globe – the Roman, the Ottoman, the Spanish, the British – and you shall find Gynocentrism as the order of the day. Such extensive geopolitical enterprises, historical testaments to man's triumph over the earth and sea, were built and maintained by men perfectly accustomed to the idea of dying for the sake of their women. It is an idea that has outlived nearly every other, and endures to this day in our American Empire. That men should sacrifice themselves utterly – their very essence, their being and their identity, to save women that they do not even know – is neatly encapsulated in that popular phrase, 'women and children first.'

(And if you're paying special attention, you will notice that it is never uttered as 'children and women first.' The very thought is absurd! This is because what is really meant by the phrase is 'women first, children second.')

The endurance of these social and class codes owes nothing to totalitarian control. Even when staging bloody revolts against tyrannous monarchs and landed elites, men aspiring to power left the Gynocentric code well alone. The self-sacrifice of men is a sexual constant which has survived all regime change. Gynocentrism, it seems, was not entirely without benefit to men; in peacetime, a man could be fairly assured of a stable familial structure and of his own paternity for the children he helped to raise. Regardless, what was offered to men was essentially compensatory. For most of history, men apparently considered this compensation to be reasonable enough – or perhaps, Gynocentrism was so deeply ingrained that they simply did not consider it at all. Through their actions, they affirmed (and renewed) Gynocentrism, and whether it went by the name honor, nobility, chivalry, or feminism, its essence has gone unchanged. It remains a peculiarly male duty to help the women onto the lifeboats, while the men themselves face a certain and icy death.

It is only now, with the political and social developments of the 20th century that have driven a wedge between the sexes, that the kind of thoughts found on this weblog can emerge. Late modernity provides us with new conceptual resources – new ways of thinking, which can be traced back to the Enlightenment of the 17th-18th centuries. Out of this intellectual melting-pot eventually crawled feminism, a vindictive blend of classic Gynocentrism, victim fetishization, radical utopianism and liberal presuppositions.

It would be an oversimplification to say that feminists set out to make gains. On the contrary, they made demands for both gains and losses. They wanted to gain men's rights, but lose their traditional female responsibilities. This, it seemed, would put women in a social position equal to that of men. It was an argument rooted in the liberal tendencies of individualism, civic equality and self-definition. In rhetoric if not in reality, feminism asserted its points of concurrence with the most admirable aspects of traditional liberalism: equality before the law, the abnegation of arbitrary rule, and so on. Extending rights to all women appeared, logically enough, to be the successive phase of human liberation following the extension of rights to all men.

It was assumed – more fool us – that once granted equal rights, women would voluntarily adopt the accompanying responsibilities that men had always fulfilled. This did not come to be. Feminists were happy to gain men's rights, and lose women's responsibilities, but they were horrified by the suggestion that they should adopt men's responsibilities as a corollary. Rather than men and women sharing the burdens of the world, we got the White Feather Campaign:

> This campaign began in the early days of the First World War in Great Britain, where women were encouraged to pin white feathers on young men who were not in military uniform. The hope was that this mark of cowardice would shame them into 'doing their bit' in the war. The practice soon spread to Canada, where patriotic women, in response to declining voluntary recruitment figures, organized committees to issue white feathers to men in civilian clothes and publicly denounced the 'slackers' and 'shirkers'.

It is surely worth remarking that many of these women were suffragettes; and thus, even as they campaigned for equal rights with men, they used shame as a tool for ensuring that men, and only men, fulfilled traditionally male obligations. Particularly, duty to give up their own lives, because they were men, for the sake of women. Whatever disadvantages women may have faced at the time, there is surely no greater coercion than death.

Much has changed since the First World War, and the feminist project to slack and shirk on women's responsibilities while extending their license to act however they damn well please has met with wild success. And it is precisely this state of affairs which begs certain questions, made possible by the conceptual resources we have inherited from the Enlightenment: what if a man doesn't want to live this way? Why should men continue to fulfill or perform their traditional obligations, when women will not live up to theirs, but neither will they adopt the responsibilities corresponding to their rights at present? The questions arise: were men wrong, all this time, to sacrifice for the sake of women? Should we, in fact, have no obligations to women whatsoever?

The reason why the Men's Rights Movement arouses such hostility, from both the left and right, is because it is the first attempt in history for a sex to attempt to break out of its traditional role. Feminism is not this; it is the entrenchment of the power that women already held. The Men's Rights Movement today goes far beyond simple accusations of feminist wrongdoing. Its adherents labor at historical analysis and social criticism, and with the benefit of two-and-a-half centuries of imagination and innovation stemming from the Enlightenment, can easily conceive of a world in which men, for the first time in history, are not required to self-sacrifice for women.

This is surely the future, and it is an inevitable reaction against – thus, an unintended consequence of – feminism itself. In times past, when men could claim compensation for their self-sacrifice, they accepted that this was simply the way of the world. In the absence of compensation, and with the screws being turned ever tighter on men in every sphere of life, they are provoked into questioning the new arbitrary rule, and into formulating their very own liberation project in response.

My statement above – that political extremism, the product of modernity, shall put an end to the traditional idea – should now be clear. Feminism, which is the extreme form of Gynocentrism, shall put an end to Gynocentrism altogether through the reaction which it creates. We are fifty years into the tremendous final act; a grand, orchestral performance, a theatrical display making unprecedented use of sound and light to confuse and cast illusion. But if all the world truly is a stage, then all men and women are actors – with roles of our own choosing, now free to toss aside the scripts we have been handed and create a new story in place of the old.

And when the curtain finally falls, I do believe that there shall be no encores.

Adam

Hey, 'Trans' Men in Women's Sports: Good Luck, Fellas — Go for the Gold!

Selwyn Duke · 23 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

"Equality" cries were cherished by feminists when they gave females entry into military academies, boardrooms and the ranks of police; prize-money parity in some sporting events; and access to boys' athletics. But with these appeals now putting sexually confused men in women's sports, well, feminists' cries are a tad different. Equality can be a real downer when it's principle and not ploy.

As for my position, I've devoted more ink to combating the made-up sexual status (MUSS, usually called "transgender") agenda than most any other writer. In fact, almost first in the field — and almost alone there — inveighing against MUSS ideology 10 years ago, I was criticized for political incorrectness by conservatives (some of whom now sing my tune). It thus may be surprising that I today say to MUSSmen athletes everywhere:

Best of luck to you, lads — may the best man win!

No, I'm not now seeking the Democrat presidential nomination, Biden-style (I'm using the wrong pronouns for that). It's that, to use a twist on a quotation attributed to Abe Lincoln, "The best way to eliminate a bad law, or social law, is to apply it strictly."

You see, I believe that anyone who wants equality should get equality — good and hard.

Up until the Rise of the MUSSmen, male-female Equality™ had been a one-way street called Feminism Ave., sort of equality lecture + selective application = whatever advantage I darn well want at the moment. Prestige-oriented feminists could complain about too few female CEOs while never being asked about too few female garbage collectors, iron workers or loggers; or why women aren't subject to Selective-Service registration.

Politicians could bloviate about the workplace intersex wage gap, which somewhat favors men, and ignore the workplace intersex death gap, which greatly favors women. Activists could sanctimoniously agitate over men outearning women in acting while uttering nary a peep about women outearning men in modeling. Professional female soccer players (and other athletes) could lose to 14-year-old boys, lobby for the same pay as the men without being laughed at — and never be told the obvious: If you want the men's money, emerge from your separate, protected athletic realm and try playing in the men's arena and succeeding. Your separate ain't equal, hon.

But enter the MUSSmen. They have won females' competitions in track, weightlifting, golf long driving, cycling and are generally breaking barriers (and sometimes bones) in women's sports everywhere. This is called unfair, but why?

'Transwomen' win 1st and 2nd place in women's cycling event – London (2022)

As one commenter quoted here put it, "I'm constantly told that men and women are equal and that gender is a social construct. I'm constantly shown 'bad[] women' on TV and in movies that can beat up men easily. I'm told a woman can do anything a man can do. So…[w]hy segregate sports?"

Yes, what's the problem? I also grew up hearing, "A woman can do anything a man can do!" Case closed.

Oh, you weren't really serious about that? I'm sorry. I guess I missed the joke hearing the line screeched over and over and over and over again, year after year, in any and all circles, in every relevant debate, whenever the least convenient. I suppose my humor meter was malfunctioning — for four decades straight.

The culpability of feminism and its enablers in advancing the MUSS agenda goes beyond this, however. For a couple of generations, the theory the Thought Police demanded assent to was "gender neutrality"; it dogmatically stated that the sexes are the same but for the superficial physical differences, and, therefore, if you raise boys and girls identically, they'll end up identical in capacity.

So intense was this dogma that, related feminist Camille Paglia, angry feminists would corner her on college campuses and insist that hormones didn't exist and that, even if they did, they couldn't possibly influence behavior.

But "gender neutrality" was a theory of convenience. After all, if the sexes were the same beneath the skin, there could be little justification for traditional sex roles and excluding women from once-all-male arenas.

Of course, if feminists and their capon enablers hadn't eschewed "white male linear logic," they might have realized that ideas have consequences, that A can lead to B. In this case, A was the thesis that the "sexes are the same except for the superficial physical differences."

B is the corollary, "Change the superficial physical differences, and you can be the 'opposite sex.'"

It's the logical (d)evolution from "gender neutrality" to the MUSSmen's "gender identity" (misusing the term "gender" all the way through). The former absolutely led to the latter — and feminism absolutely laid the groundwork for it.

Thus, when I now hear complaints about MUSSmen's athletic exploits, my unmusical self plays the world's smallest violin. These triumphant individuals are merely providing an object lesson in the consequences of advancing momentarily convenient lies.

Some will now mention that innocent women and girls suffer here along with the feminists. Yet while the age's sins do "fall like black atomic rain on the just and unjust alike," to quote English satirist Malcolm Muggeridge, there's plenty of blame to go around.

For starters, women broke percentagewise for Democrats in last year's midterms 59-40, meaning, well intentioned or not, six out of 10 women (and 47 percent of men) recently empowered a political group advancing the MUSS agenda. As for the rest of the ladies, ask yourselves: Did I ever say, even just in the heat of the moment, "A woman can do anything a man can"? Did I ever cheer those who do? Did I ever utter any other feminist battle cry? Insofar as anyone did, he helped MUSS up women's sports — and society.

Don't think I'm just placing an onus on women, because men allowed this to happen, too. The point is that people get the culture they deserve as much as the government they do, and too many of us, through mistakes of omission or commission, helped bring us to where we are now.

As for solutions, as long as many insist on talking equality's talk, we should insist on walking its walk. For it's easy to be idealistic when you don't have to live with your ideals, and equality self-righteousness is all fun and games — until you're no longer one of those people more equal than others.

Resolved: Feminism is evil

Tom Givens · 23 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

You can count on me to pretty much consistently call feminism an 'evil ideology,'

…
…and feminists as a group as well, come to think of it. A lot of people consider this to be hyperbole on my part, but sadly, this is not the case. I truly do believe feminism is evil to its core, and awakens the evil that lurks within each of us, which then provides fuel for the fire.

At this point, I suppose my religious views come into play, so in the interests of full disclosure I guess I better tell you my views on God and such. Feel free to skip this next bit, if you're so inclined.

I see almost no contradiction at all between religion and science. This requires an understanding that The Bible was translated and edited, perhaps hundreds of times, by fallible humans with political interests. Science provides excellent descriptions of natural laws and processes, and reveals nature to have a beautiful symmetry in the mathematical world as well; an almost clockwork precision; an underlying order.

I also find the claim that science provides a complete explanation laughable, since morphing from 'primordial ooze' to 'life' requires every bit as much faith as a belief in God. For that matter, so does the belief in infinite numbers of universes resulting in ours at random. And science doesn't provide a causation; a 'before.'

I believe if you don't take either viewpoint too seriously, they dovetail quite nicely. After all, one would expect God to be pretty good at math, and planning, wouldn't they? Especially considering that 'God' could very well be nothing but the collective consciousness of the universe itself.

Life really is that weird, after all.

Ok, so enough with the religious stuff (and hopefully avoid fixation on the subject), and on to why I call feminists 'evil.'

Ok maybe not quite yet, because first I have to let you know my definition of 'evil.' This is not as straightforward as it first may seem. Some people think 'evil' and they think Friday the 13th, or Dahmer, or child rapists. Many people define 'evil' as destructive, chaotic, and heartless. Cold, calculating, acid….evil.

I don't. If these are the definitions, how does one account for the rapist/murderer who loves his mother, may even have a wife and children they love? How does one account for the evil mastermind who collapses in grief at the death of his squeeze? This hardly seems like the type of thing Freddie Kruger would give much of a shit about, don't you think?

"Denial of the suffering of others, and in some cases while openly delighting in it, is a feminist hallmark."

…
And what about the 'petty' evils? The false accusations, the spreading of malicious lies, the mundane violence (bar fights, arguments/challenges, etc.), the plotting and popularity of daytime TV? Are these simply 'Freddy Lite,' the precursor to the Real Evil(tm), where they haven't gone over to the Dark Side yet and all that jazz?

Or, as is more likely, is it possible to be a truly evil person, and yet still have a spouse you love, and children you love, and parents you love, and friends you love. Being evil doesn't mean being devoid of love at all. It can't, given the degrees of evil easily seen every day.

So evil isn't hate or aggression, or for that matter indifference, because a person consumed by this would quickly burn every bridge in sight. Evil wouldn't progress. And evil begets evil, as the saying goes.

Upon much reflection, I've landed on a candidate, and it's served me well so far. Here it is:

Evil: unmitigated self-interest.

It allows for all of the 'tender' parts, while still allowing the evil person to torture, kill, maim, defraud, destroy, whatever at whim. After all, that person is nothing to them. Well, except a plaything. And they only matter as long as they mean something to the self-absorbed. And only in the way the evil person cares about, be it friend, victim, or both.

I think you can see where this is going, but I'll spell it out for those unfamiliar with the facts:

Feminism is gynocentric in the extreme, and will tolerate all manner of injustice to men, indeed will increase those injustices when possible, to serve the selfish ends defined by its upper echelons. The ideology literally REQUIRES it's adherents to believe their interests are paramount whenever in question; that 'helping women' is always the right answer. It requires a foundation of selfish thinking to begin with.

Denial of the suffering of others, and in some cases while openly delighting in it, is a feminist hallmark. Feminism appeals to the selfish little girl in women, with demands that she should 'have it all'. And that anytime she doesn't, it's men's fault. And it's that scapegoating, the 'othering' of men that marks feminism as truly evil. As truly, unmitigated self interest on an industrial scale. With nothing good planned for men, that's for sure.

Traditionalists talk of autonomy as the main characteristic of feminist thinking. Funny, even religious folk don't recognize evil when it's staring them right in the face.

And smirking.

Where do all the female bullies go?

Mark Dent · 25 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I have often wondered how any person of intelligence and integrity could make statements like the one I heard Caroline Criado-Perez make in her television "debate" with Mike Buchanan. She said 96% of all violence was perpetrated by men.

If I had never read an article, let alone a book on the subject of domestic violence I would instinctively have known this statement was pure bullshit. In fact that is something I understood innately when my personal journey as a men's rights supporter began some 25 years ago.

In the early nineties, in my home state of Victoria, there was a serious and relentless attack on men under the heading "The War on Women" in one of our major daily newspapers (The Age) which featured a series of articles purporting to lift the lid on the unspeakable atrocities men were perpetrating upon their women folk behind closed doors. These articles were promoted on large banners outside the local news agency and I can still remember seriously considering ripping them out of the wire grills they sat behind but I somehow controlled my rage and entered the shop. I looked at the stack of papers calling men violent, oppressors and I vividly recall looking about the store at the other men who casually picked up their copy along with a magazine or packet of gum and wanting to shake them and scream,

"That's you and me they are writing about!"

Of course, I simply swallowed the bile in my throat and purchased my own copy with my heart pounding in righteous indignation.

I cannot begin to explain how personally I took those articles–I literally lay awake at night struggling to contain the seething anger I felt about this seemingly endless barrage of male demonization. All of the male friends and relatives in my life were compassionate, considerate, funny and supportive-not a monster among them! I began writing letters and arguing with people at dinner parties and other social gatherings. The "One Good Man" syndrome was at its peak back then with so many blokes willing to nod solemnly as they sipped their chardonnay and talk about the disgraceful statistics which condemned their fellow man (but never them, you understand.)

I would tell them how ridiculous the statistics were and no person with intelligence could take them seriously. The headshaking would continue and I was told I was in denial.

At the time this series of articles began I was recovering from a serious illness and so I spent a good deal of time watching television. Phil Donohue, Sally Jesse Raphael and Oprah seemed to feature a man-bashing segment every day. There seemed to be no escape from this notion that men were a problematic species which needed to be dissected and analysed by females or males who saw their careers were dependent upon feeding the insatiable hunger for victimhood their female audiences craved. They all spoke as if the very idea that females could be capable of violent behaviour, be it physical or emotional was absurd and unworthy of any consideration.

Why did I keep watching these shows when they literally had me screaming at my TV and punching the cushions on my couch? I felt I had to understand the enemy in order to fight them.
I wrote countless poems to vent the outrage I felt. If not for the poetry I think I may have imploded. Here's an example:

Daily Dissection
Analysing, probing
Endless monologues examining
The many weaknesses and vices
Attributable to only one species
Man.It is a daily revelation to a one legged man

Who just happened to stumble, through unforeseen circumstances into this hostile, alien territory.
The radio talk back assails the listeners
With mouth watering subjects
Which so often focus
On the problem with men
Advertisements patronise and belittle them
Television gorges upon the mute,
Inarticulate volunteers
Who offer themselves up
For sacrifice,
Upon the altar of Sally Jesse Raphael
Or Oprah
The gentle sex shriek their shrill accusations
And whine in unison
At the vulnerable men
Placed before them
They ooze self confidence
And superiority
Safe with their sisters
Knowing innately
That women are good
And men-a problem to be solved, eliminated
Or dismissed with a sneer

As I read about the "oppression of women in Australia" I would look out of my lounge room window and watch the women playing tennis on the courts across the road. They laughed and squealed in delight as they played–no men were to be seen during the day. They were at work.

On occasions when I felt strong enough I would venture down to the local shopping centre. Everywhere I looked I saw women buying items for themselves, having a coffee with their girlfriends or having their toenails painted in a salon and I seethed. The reality of my daily life bore no resemblance to the supposed horrors women were meant to be enduring-horrors I was watching or reading about in the media on a daily basis.

Then not long ago a couple of articles on bullying by women and girls appeared in the Herald Sun. They compelled me to stop and ask a question. I spoke it out loud even though I was alone at the time.

"What becomes of these female bullies when they go home at the end of a day?"

Both articles on bullying had females as the major (or only) protagonists. The first was titled, "Bullying at the Gate" and concerned the violent abuse and threats Victorian mothers are directing at other mums at their kids' school.

Victorian mothers are receiving counselling to help them cope with bullying, intimidation and even threats of violence from other mothers at their kids' school.

Oscar Yildiz, CEO of Bully Zero Australia Foundation, said his organisation was receiving calls from mums being bullied by other mothers.

"I had one mother ring me and tell me that she wanted to 'punch the daylights' out of another mother," he said.

According to author, Debbie Rossi, "Some of the mums avoid getting out of their cars because they don't want to see other mums." Her book is titled "Beyond the Schoolyard: End the Bullying Forever."

Rossi thinks some mums feel judged by what they wear or what car they drive and how their children behave. This in turn leads to violent threats and bullying.

So, I wonder, what are these mums like when they are behind closed doors at home? It defies logic to suggest that a woman who is abusive and violent at her child's school during pick up time would revert to being a gentle easy going, conflict averse person at home where no-one but the hubby and kids bear witness to their behaviour.

Two days later another headline caught my eye: "Bullies on Rampage: One in three face school threats."

This survey showed:

Victorians from Year 7 to 9 show girls consistently report higher rates of being bullied than boys. The trend is especially pronounced when phones or the internet are involved.

More than 20% (of girls) reported being cyber bullied compared with 12.3% of boys. Rates of recent traditional bullying victimisation were 35.4% and 29.3% respectively.

The research was published in the Journal of Interpersonal Violence.

Again I ask the question: What becomes of these girls who take delight in tormenting others either emotionally or physically? Do they become empathic, compassionate and supportive human beings or do their devious, spiteful, bullying natures simply evolve into less obvious but just as hurtful and damaging behaviour in their adult relationships?

Most of us know very well from simple observation and daily interactions with people that no gender has a monopoly on the more noble or less savoury human qualities. We see backstabbing, power hungry, ego driven males and females in the workplace. We encountered nasty, hard hearted bullies, some boys, some girls in our formative years and many have endured volatile, abusive relationships with a member of the opposite sex. Knowing this makes the very deliberate silencing of any attempt to draw attention to the fact that both genders can and do behave in an abusive, harmful manner, unforgivable.

When I think back to those earlier years when the "War On Women" theme was rampant I still hold many of the men I knew in contempt. These articles on bullying girls and women tell us nothing we didn't already know. Those weak bastards were happy to sell their brothers down the drain for the sheer pleasure of having women look at them with warm approval rather than the hostile aggression I was occasionally subjected to for daring to suggest women were capable of violence and abuse or that the vast majority of men were good people.

Having recently reacquainted myself with a checklist provided by The Domestic Violence Prevention Centre Gold Coast which informs girls/women about what behaviour constitutes domestic abuse these two articles seem very pertinent.

Before I provide you with a few samples from the checklist you must understand that every question is framed with the man as perpetrator and the woman as victim.

> Emotional Abuse
>
> Does he call you names or make you feel bad about the way you look?
>
> Does he degrade your self worth by constantly putting you down?
>
> Physical abuse
>
> Has he ever pushed shoved, slapped, pinched, punched or physically hurt you?
>
> Using Male Privilege
>
> Does he insist on making all the big decisions?
>
> Does he see himself as always right?
>
> Using Coercion and Threats

> Has he ever threatened to leave you?
>
> Has he threatened to hurt your children, friends, family members or pets?
>
> Using the children
>
> Has he told you that you would lose custody or never see the children again?

I could go on for a page or more but I think you have the general idea. What a truly Orwellian world we live in today. How could any person with integrity post such bigoted information on an official website? This website is meant to be fighting the scourge of domestic violence yet could make no mention of one half of the world's population in any role other than evil perpetrator.

All of us could think of females who would tick the boxes on many of the questions contained in the DV survey.

The two articles in the Herald Sun demonstrate the sheer bewildering bigotry of the domestic violence industry in a manner which leaves no room for debate. Bullying, violence and abuse are something human beings do. It is a form of behaviour which can no more be attributed to one gender than the capacity we all have to love, protect and nurture others.

I would like to have my question answered:What becomes of these vicious women and vindictive schoolgirls when they go home and close the door behind them?

Links

[Editor's Note: The Herald Sun articles cited in this article are not available online for linking. There is a site by the Herald Sun which allows access to digital copies of actual printed papers for viewing at a fee. This can be found at http://heraldsun.newspaperdirect.com/epaper/viewer.aspx but a subscription will apply]

[Editor's Note: Mark Dent also brought to our attention an article which highlights a similar problem in the UK.]

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-1282049/The-school-gates-hell-Bullying-backbiting-tears-No-thats-children-school-run-mums-says-battle-scarred-victim.html

Spelling bee contestant asks the definition of woman

AVfM Video Source · 25 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A Letter to Washington Post Regarding the Amber Heard Op-Ed Fiasco

Stephen Bond · 26 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Mr. Wemple,

I respectfully ask that you take the time to read this letter about the Washington Post's involvement in the Amber Heard fiasco and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

As a lifelong reader of the Post, I've long noticed that the paper has a clear gender bias. This bias is self-evident: the Post has a gender columnist who only champions the female perspective, and for decades the paper has published hundreds or even thousands of articles that only depict domestic violence as "men battering women", ignoring massive evidence that women equally batter men. (For proof see The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project.)

Amber Heard's 2018 op-ed is another glaring and unmistakable example of the Post's gender bias.

I've waited three weeks since the Depp-Heard jury's decision, hoping that someone from Post management would write something about the misguided decision to publish the Heard op-ed. I had even hoped that the Post might issue a mea culpa and finally admit that, yes, the paper does have a gender credibility problem.

Naïve thinking, I know.

Instead, the Post added a feeble editor's note to the op-ed and then passed the responsibility to you to "explain" the Post's error.

So that leaves me writing to you about your op-ed Depp-Heard case hinged on the world's worst #MeToo op-ed.

First, contrary to your article's title, Amber Heard's editorial was not the "world's worst #MeToo op-ed".

That disreputable distinction clearly belongs to a repulsive June 2018 article, Why Can't We Hate Men?, published a mere six months before Heard's op-ed. This #MeToo-inspired rant was written by the director of women's studies at Northeastern University, who had the gall to openly and shamelessly express a Nazi-like hatred for men in a major American newspaper.

Do you think that it was appropriate for the Post, whose slogan is "Democracy Dies in Darkness" to print it? Do you think, as some of the article's more than 3,300 (vastly negative) commenters responded, "just change 'men' to 'Jews'", is a fair summarization of this hateful article?

Are you – or anyone at the Washington Post – concerned that a woman, so rabidly biased against men, is allowed to teach at a major American university?!!? If not, wouldn't you agree that this is yet more proof of a gender bias problem at the Post … indeed across the entire United States?

Next, while I'm sure that you're an experienced and capable writer, I must ask, "Why did the Post ask its media critic to write an op-ed about the Depp-Heard defamation trial verdict?" Given the worldwide negative light on the Post's decision to publish Heard's article I would have thought that someone from the Post's management team would have written something.

Especially with articles like this online:

> "A publication with any semblance of ethics might have asked Depp for comment about the sexual violence claims before running with the allegations — then subsequently spiked the op-ed or sicced its reporters on the case for more fact-finding. But not The Washington Post.
>
> "That paper, which loves to blather in its self-important tone about how "democracy dies in darkness," didn't bother to turn the lights in the direction of Heard's claims. Instead, it gave her a free pass to air her dirty laundry against her ex-husband and consequently enabled her to paint herself both as a victim and a crusader of the Me > Too era."

In order to provide the balance missing from the Post's original op-ed, and following the ACLU's example, I have ghost-written an "imagined rebuttal" to the Heard/ACLU article with Mr. Depp as the "author". This rebuttal deconstructs the original article and, paragraph by paragraph, provides a more balanced and truthful examination for each.

I implore you read it and forward the link to Post management. In case you decide not to read it, here are its major points:

1. Feminists have threatened and committed actual violence against researchers who have told the truth about DV: that women commit at least as much domestic violence as men. This is feminism's Big Lie.
2. Feminists have lied about many other things, including the wage gap, or claiming that women don't make false accusations (e.g., Duke and UVA rape cases) or commit sexual abuse.
3. The Washington Post has a long, troubling, and provable history of feminist-inspired bias, thus helping feminists to propagate their many lies.
4. On their website the ACLU says that its main purpose is "…to defend and preserve the individual rights and liberties guaranteed to every person in this country…" but the organization spectacularly fails to meet this objective for one group of citizens: male college students.
5. The federal government – including President Biden – through their acquiescence to the US Department of Education's unlawful misuse of Title IX to handle sexual assault allegations at the nation's colleges and universities, is complicit in violating the civil rights of male college students.

Were any of these truths conveyed in either the "Hating Men" or the Amber Heard / ACLU op-ed?

No, the Washington Post has completely ignored easily proven facts like these for decades.

In closing, let me include a quote, curiously enough, from a former writer for Cosmopolitan magazine named Sue Ellen Browder. In a book written by her, Subverted: How I Helped the Sexual Revolution Hijack the Women's Movement, Ms. Browder perfectly described the situation at your newspaper:

> "Unfortunately, the free press is only as free as the minds of those journalists, editors, and writers who work in the field. I had already become that strange paradox of mankind that's especially commonplace among journalists: I had become both the deceiver and the deceived."

Mr. Wemple, by now it should be clear that this is what has happened at the Washington Post: on issues of gender the paper has become both the deceiver and the deceived.

Sincerely,

Stephen Bond

* * *

CC: Other Post columnists who should be interested or to whom I've previously sent letters about their own gender-biased columns:

Monica Hesse: as the Post's gender columnist, when will you do the right thing and speak out against feminist lies and your paper's one-sided gender bias?

Emily Yahr: you seem to have had the most Post articles about the trial … thought you might be interested enough to write an article about "Depp's imagined rebuttal". Just a thought.

Karla Miller, Work Advice Columnist: wrote two articles about the gender wage gap

Janay Kingsberry, Multiplatform editor for “The Lily” web site: wrote article about “dissatisfied U.S. women”

Kate Cohen, “Contributing columnist”: wrote two articles about college men

Julianne McShane, “Gender & Inequity journalist”: wrote two gender pay gap articles, female doctors underearning their male counterparts and a proposed NY city law requiring employers to include salary in job postings

Miriam Berger, “Reporter covering Middle East, Foreign Affairs”: wrote article Abuse Surging During The Pandemic

Candace Buckner, Sports reporter: wrote biased article on “Men Behaving Badly”

Radical Feminist Demands Chivalry! Wants Men to Help Fight "Transgenderism"

Selwyn Duke · 27 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

She dismisses the idea of "transitioning." But that hasn't stopped radical feminist Kara Dansky from transitioning into a traditionalist, for a moment, and demanding that men "stand up for women and denounce the transgender movement," as PJ Media puts it. Call it situational chivalry.

As PJ Media reports, "Kara Dansky, a feminist lawyer and spokeswoman for Women's Liberation Front (WoLF), spoke against the so-called 'Equality Act' at the Heritage Foundation on Monday, denouncing the transgender and gender identity movement as anti-women and anti-lesbian in particular. Her remarks echoed the London Pride March sign declaring that 'Transactivism Erases Lesbians.'"

"'This is a men's Rights movement…,' Dansky declared, calling for men to stand up for women and denounce the transgender movement," the site continued. The Heritage Foundation (HF) was hosting a panel discussion titled "The Inequality of the Equality Act: Concerns from the Left."

The Equality Act, sponsored by Representative David N. Cicilline (D-R.I.) and promoted by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), "would add sexual orientation and gender identity to characteristics protected by the 1964 Civil Rights Act," the Daily Signal tells us.

Presumably, this would enshrine in federal law a standard dictating that a man claiming womanhood must be allowed access to the women's arena (e.g., bathrooms, locker areas, sporting events). Thus the claim that "'transgenderism' erases women": If anyone can be a woman, the classification "woman" is diluted.

Yet in this internecine battle of sexual-devolutionary special-interest groups — feminists vs. trans-activists — apparent is merely an effort to combat today's politically correct standards with yesterday's politically correct standards.

In reality, transgender ideology seeks to erase women and men: The whole idea is that people have "gender" (a psychological designation), that gender should take precedence over "sex" (a biological designation), and that it's fluid. The ultimate reality, the theory goes, isn't that you're a "man" or "woman" but that you reside somewhere on a spectrum.

(Also note that there are plenty of women claiming manhood and access to men's private spaces.)

Yet since condemning this agenda brings condemnation itself, many seek to frame their opposition fashionably. Oppose transgender "rights," and you're a bigot. But oppose the "rights" of a group not in political favor — in this case men — and, it's hoped, you'll make headway.

Yet this tactic is more than just a ruse. As PJ Media also reports, "'Overwhelmingly women have been resisting this,' Hacsi Horvath, a man who once identified as a woman and underwent surgery, said a few seconds before Dansky's remark [on men standing up]. 'And it's really shocking how many men on the internet are defending the whole trans thing. Straight men are all about the trans, and you have to wonder what the heck is going on.'"

One could quip that, with identity now considered reality, these men supporting "the trans" may not really be men. But Horvath appears confused (and, obviously, not for the first time). While activists are no doubt overrepresented in Internet transgender discussions, I keep my nose to the ground and have observed that very few male Web commenters subscribe to the trans agenda.

In fact, today women are enabling transgenderism far more than men are — by being substantially more likely to vote for the leftists, such as Pelosi and Cicilline, who push the agenda.

It's called (again, using the term "gender" when "sex" is appropriate) the "gender gap" in voting. In last years' election, for instance, men broke for the GOP 51 percent to 47 percent whereas women went Democrat 59-40.

Note, too, that feminist women support Democrats by far wider margins.

Of course, Dansky and other feminists may protest, saying they're staunch opponents of transgenderism. But Duke's First Rule of Politics is relevant here: In a representative republic, you do not get what you want.

You get what you vote for.

Voting for leftists is a package deal — which today includes trans plans, like it or not.

Much of what was said at the HF event is true, such as pointing out that trans-activists persecute those who dare be scientific. "I got kicked off of the Baltimore mayor's LGBTQ commission — as the only lesbian — simply for stating biological facts," event attendee and feminist Julia Beck said. "I was found guilty of 'violence.'"

Then there were the testimonials of frustrated mothers whose children were deemed transgender; their stories were read aloud at the HF event by Jennifer Chavez, a member of WoLF's board of directors. After relating how her 20-year-old daughter had been on testosterone for a year and was moving toward having a double mastectomy, one mother lamented, "Having watched these adults enable my daughter to do this with no medical science to back it up is a scenario that I never dreamed any parent would have to face, at least not in the U.S."

The mother is correct. As I've explained repeatedly, the diagnostic method for transgenderism is malpractice-suit worthy; it's not based on medical science but on feelings. "Transgender" is not a scientific designation — it's a political one.

Thus is it unsurprising that many people who "transition," as they call it, have regrets. A good example is Australian boy Patrick Mitchell, who at 12 years old was allowed to begin female-hormone "treatment" but two years later changed his mind.

In fact, studies show that upwards of 80 percent of girls and 90 percent of boys who strongly "identify" as the opposite sex naturally outgrow the psychological problem.

But something else left behind here is astonishing. These feminists rail against transgenderism and its proponents' denial of science, yet appear oblivious to how feminism set the stage for it, having also denied science.

For decades, including during my youth, the dominant feminist theory was "gender neutrality." It stated that the sexes were the same except for the superficial physical differences; thus, if you raised boys and girls identically, they would be identical except for primary and secondary sexual characteristics.

This theory was politically convenient. After all, if traditional sex roles and barriers keeping women from certain professions (e.g., police, firefighting) were believed to have no basis in biology — in reality — it was easy to justify overturning them.

To this end feminists made outrageous claims, such as that if women had always enjoyed the same sporting opportunities, they'd equal men in athletics. Then there was the story feminist author Camille Paglia, a confessed lesbian, told about how feminists would corner her on college campuses in the '70s, swear that hormones didn't exist and that, even if they did, they couldn't possibly influence behavior.

So here's the feminist-transgender (d)evolution: Feminists insisted the sexes were the same except for the superficial physical differences.

Then trans-activists came along and simply promulgated a corollary: If you change the superficial physical differences, the sexes will be the same, period.

So the feminists began the process of trying to "erase" distinctions between the sexes, calling most of them social constructs. Then trans-activists took the next step and sought to erase the sexes altogether.

There absolutely is a straight line between the two movements. Trans-activists do deny biological science — but the feminists did it first.

Then there's the irony of feminists — who made famous the line "A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle" — calling on men for help with the trans plans. This wasn't lost on the commenters under the PJ Media article, either, with one quipping, "A militant, lesbian, man-hating … feminist wants real men to 'stand up for women'. Now that's funny. I thought masculinity was toxic."

For decades, feminists traded in misandry, impugning men and telling lies (e.g., on the intersex wage gap, domestic violence, etc.) designed to demonize them. To the point, they also cast chivalry as demeaning, and even holding a door for the wrong woman could bring a tongue lashing. But now they want some knights in shining armor — to rent, not buy.

So are the feminists just proving an old stereotype? After all, they do say, "It's a woman's prerogative to change her mind."

This article was originally published at The New American

Biogynocentric Hypocrisy: TERF Edition (War on the Biological Male)

Vernon Meigs · 28 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Just as it seems we have a whole wave of transgender mania sweeping the Western world in the present day, we see an equally strange way of responding to it by both conservatives and feminists.

When feminists come out to rally against transgenders, it's ironic enough. Historic feminists from Simone de Beauvoir to Germaine Greer have promoted the disconnection of femininity, women's biology, and female undertakings such as motherhood, while emphasizing the social conditioning aspect of the female experience to the point of complete divorce from biological femaleness. In this century, the very feminists who may have been influential to today's transgender activism have come out in opposition. The reason: gynocentrism. Although it isn't necessarily off-base that feminists would take the gynocentric position against transgenderism, the irony remains that too much of their history and positions have sown the seeds of transgender ideology.

Then, there is the conservative and traditionalist response against transgenderism. It is by no means unexpected that conservatives would turn to fight anything that doesn't fall in line with their traditional gender idealism. Clearly, they don't want anyone to have conflicting interests with their prescribed idea of what men and women should be, and the relations between them. What is actually the height of irony, however, is that they would side with the very feminists that would sooner stab them in the back with their misandry. Imagine being so gynocentrically blue-pilled that you are a right-winger white knighting for radical feminists.

Forgive the sardonic remarks thus far and yet to come. However, this is nothing in terms of offensiveness compared to the sort of thing these actual men, who profess to know so well what's best for other men, have said as they have hopped on the bandwagon against transgenderism. Note that this is not me being in particular direct defense of most of what goes on regarding the transgender craze, but I think it is important to highlight the hypocrisies committed by those alleging to be on the side of science and reason, especially when they throw men under the bus.

While many of the positions and demands taken by the anti-transgender camp are laughable and deserving of not much more than simple ridicule, there are other positions taken by some high-profile traditionalists that should boil the blood of those who care about men's issues.

The Misandric Argument Against Transgenderism

Among the arguments thrown by feminists who are in attack posture against the transgender wave is a constant one: "Transgender activism is a men's rights movement". In fact, that phrase is smack dab in the title of pjmedia.com's article Radical Feminist: Transgender Activism is a 'Men's Rights Movement'. Another title that doesn't mince words is 'Trans Rights are Men's Rights; No Wonder they Clash with Feminists.' It's no surprise to any of us that feminists, radical or otherwise, hold disdain towards the idea of men's rights and any attempt on our part to bring light to men's issues. By comparison alone, feminists' objection towards the fruits of transgender activism becomes clear.

Male-to-female (MtF) athletes break record after record of women's sports. Biological men enter women's bathrooms and locker rooms. Women are "being erased" because young teen girls are undergoing surgeries for permanent change so they can transition. Despite the fact that women have been enabled to encroach into male spaces (girls joining the Boy Scouts and men's only gatherings accused of misogynistic discrimination) and MtF cases outweighing the FtM cases, we must apparently only be concerned with when the women are erased, dominated, defeated by biological men. The radical feminists and the conservative "manly men" agree on this, it seems.

Feminists and traditionalists alike have been referred to as TERFs ("Trans Exclusionary Radical Feminists") in response to their insistence that biological men are men, biological women are women, men and women are different, etc. With regards to the metaphysical aspects and inner and social workings behind the transgender phenomenon, I can think of no better distillation than Peter Wright's article Transphobia vs Manphobia. Be sure to give that a read as it is an insightful source of ideas on the transgender psyche itself.

I bring this up because despite how concise and scientific-sounding "men and women are different" may be, neither side has given the nuance the subject deserves from a psychological standpoint. Those referred to as TERFs indulge in the argument from biology so long as it suits their ends. Feminists believe that women are as strong and as able as any man and yet they call upon males to fight off the transgenders for them; traditionalists are fully willing to throw biological males under the bus as long as the women they want to be protectors for (no matter how much they're hated by them) are being trounced by the same biological males.

As much as we may laugh at the desperation TERFs exhibit as they declare transgenderism as only an evil men's rights movement, they unintentionally make our point for us: this is all about hatred of biological males and wanting to put them in their place in gynocentric society. This is a misandrist mindset.

To be absolutely clear here, "TERF" is a funny term with its own set of ironies. As stated before, transgender ideology has been well rooted in feminism of the 20th century. "TERF" no doubt was created within radical feminist circles when a split seems to have happened: "We are radical feminists that are inclusive of transgender women, and they are the trans-exclusionary kind of radical feminist and we hate them!" Social justice warriors and the "woke" crowd have taken and run with this term calling anybody with criticism of transgender ideology a TERF, despite not actually being against radical feminism anyway. How odd, that they have kept this term. Another irony is that a feminist need not actually be a "radical" kind to practice flagrant misandry to their heart's content.

Germaine Greer, a "women's liberation" advocate who had been under fire for saying that "transgender women are 'not women'", has argued in her works that femininity is not femaleness. She states in a talk for Channel 4 News: "There is nothing feminine about being pregnant. It's almost the antithesis of that. There's nothing feminine about giving birth".

In her focus on relegating femininity completely to the realm of social expectations, imposed by men or in any case on behalf of men, Greer has in essence created an asymptotic standard as to what constitutes a "real woman" – if a woman is feminine in any way, she is that much farther from what is a true woman.

Due to her emphasis on how much social training is involved in being a woman, even if she said it in a lamenting way, she should not have been surprised when someone would take these ideas and interpret it as "all you need to be a woman in this world is just to be socialized into being one". Therefore, a man may assume the identity and in his mind expect the social standards of a woman to be accepted as such. It's strange to me how Greer gets a lot of non-feminist support even though the majority of her approach appears to involve blaming men for women's issues in any possible way. By failing to identify some genuine synergies between biological femaleness and femininity, she simply sounds like a hypocrite in her whines against the current state of affairs.

Another example is a quote from Simone de Beauvoir, recently skewered by Lucian Vâlsan in his article. In her work The Second Sex from 1949 she stated: "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman. No biological, psychological or economic destiny defines the figure that the human female acquires in society; it is civilization as a whole that develops this product, which one calls feminine." For all the complaints from the feminists of today saying "but she didn't mean she supported transgenderism", the hypocrisy still stands as the transgender activists' idea of "becoming a woman through socialization is definitely possible" can be traced back confidently to statements such as that of de Beauvoir.

In any case, the response by those that suddenly wish to support biological women against biological men in defiance of the premises of clearly feminist origin is to resort to biogynocentrist misandry. The modus operandi of TERFs and the traditionalists that sheepishly curry their favor have a particular focus on MtF transgenders as enemies, and FtM transgenders as victims. The biogynocentric path is the easy, often-traveled path; disappointing, but not surprising.

What does Biogynocentrism have to do with this?

You may be wondering why is this a biogynocentric problem than a more broader gynocentrism issue. While I don't necessarily deny that gynocentrism with all its facets comes into play in these sort of matters, the biogynocentrism shows itself when the arguments against transgenderism attempt to appeal to the potential dangers of the biological male which delicate, precious women with golden uteruses must be defended from at all costs.

If necessary, do familiarize yourself with the specialized concept of biogynocentrism and what I had to say previously on the subject when I introduced it. In short, biogynocentrism is the specifically biological appeal to which the argument of male disposability and female royalty is made. Too many in the field of evolutionary psychology indulge in the premise of the survival of the woman being the crucial factor in a human group's survival as opposed to the equal importance of males and females. They then proceed to explain away the double standards of society as it promotes male disposal and biological prioritization of females in this way.

The idea has trickled down into the common mindset of the people as they take it for granted that men exist to be disposed of; "It's biology and evolution," so they say. Women demand service because they see themselves as the biological prize and end goal, and men have browbeaten themselves into thinking they are the biological means to an end. Even some supposedly in the men's movement indulge in this fallacy, which is a sad truth about biogynocentrism.

So how are these TERFs biogynocentrist?

Again, biological men are breaking records in their chosen women's sport left and right. The losers feel robbed by the winners identifying as women. Said losers exercise their conditioned impulse to damsel and appeal to the public, followed by the likewise conditioned impulse by the malleable public to appease these poor women. These women athletes are then regarded as needing protection from these bad men. Men are dangerous, women should be defended from them. Such is the narrative.

We are also now supposed to be concerned with female prison inmates and how they are vulnerable to predatory biological men entering these women's prisons while identifying as women. In ways that make feminists absolutely proud of them (or so they hope), conservatives demand that these poor criminal women be protected from the male of the species.

As a sidenote I don't recall these same conservatives (let alone the feminists) giving much attention to male prison inmates in their own men's prisons despite issues like prison rape and general inhuman treatments to name a few existing. Once again, men are the biologically expendable class but we must not let anything happen to our valuable women…even if they are criminals serving time. If they want to argue for humane treatment of prisoners, would they be so kind as to extend the same compassion to men, whose prison experiences are joked about?

As a third example, probably one of the earliest issues I've noticed when transgender mania was kicking into momentum this century, we have turned our attention towards biological men in women's bathrooms and changing rooms. Conservatives wasted no time raving about the dangers of men in women's restrooms, as if just putting any given man in the little girls' room (is this term another indication of the child archetype?) magically turns him into a predator after women and girls. The debate about possible ulterior motives for some transitioned predators aside, this argument is very telling; Biological men are once again a force of danger to be barred from women.

Never mind the fact that if a man is a predator he could equally be targeting male victims, young boys for certain. And certainly, female predators exist as well. As long as bathrooms have been segregated, sexual predation in bathrooms generally hasn't happened in any normal fashion and the cause for panic is almost nonexistent. We generally don't speak of great efforts to protect boys from predators in their own segregated bathrooms. It is reasonable then to assume that the rate of sexual predation would be the same low amount if integration were to occur for any reason. However, biogynocentrism is an easy path to feeling like a hero, and there's nothing like jumping into the bandwagon to flex their muscles for gynocentric masculinity in service of the dear damsels in distress.

So, the conservatives join the feminists in buying the narrative that men are in fact Schrodinger's Rapist – at all times potentially a rapist even if they aren't one and won't be one. If conservatives uphold the idea that the vast majority of normal men are likely to defend and ward off against acts of sexual violence instead of participating or enabling them, then they should act like it is true instead of changing their tune whenever it suits their tendency to white knight and feel important for women who hate them.

These examples illustrate biogynocentrism in play in the anti-trans-activist mindset.

Child Butchery – Only Bad When Progressives Do It?

We in the men's movement know well that we need a sense of humor as we take apart the casual and serious strains of gynocentrism that have permeated history and affect our daily lives in the modern world. We can laugh at all the damseling, the idiocy of feminists, and the folly of blue-pill men who think they are alphas. Everything I have said so far in this article is worth laughing about as we ridicule the anti-trans crowd in their blaming of the Men's Rights Movement, and the women who said nothing about their sex invading male spaces but are up in arms about men beating them at their own sports. Unfortunately I have to close this on a slightly angrier note, as it is the most frustrating manifestation of TERF hypocrisy I'll talk about here.

When I was noticing sponsored posts on Facebook by Matt Walsh's page abut his new film What Is A Woman?, what grabbed my attention was the text on one of them: "One of the surgeons I interviewed for this documentary confessed to having mutilated the genitals of a 16 year old boy. The Left says this isn't happening. They're lying, as always."

I admitted surprise at his choice of words: "mutilated the genitals of a 16 year old boy". I wondered aloud, how much does he actually care about a child's genital integrity across the board? What are Mr. Walsh's attitudes towards routine infant circumcision? Assuming that he is just another traditional conservative, I had thought that he couldn't give a shit about male genital mutilation and the serious consequences of it. However, I left it at that because that was all it was: an assumption. I wouldn't speak more on it until I had concrete proof of what would be his hypocritical stance, and I'd be completely open to be proven wrong as well, delighted to be in fact.

However, there is another, more famous individual whose ideas about male genital mutilation I have a much better idea of: Dr. Jordan B. Peterson.

In June 16th, he posted a video entitled "Doctors & Psychotherapists: Butchers & Liars", which was in turn a reading of his own article "We are sacrificing our children on the altar of a brutal, far-Left ideology" for The Telegraph. Due to his choice of words, for a second I had hope. I knew that in all likelihood he was going to mostly focus on the crisis of permanently transitioning minors by surgery and hormone treatments but despite that, and all he said before on the subject of child genital mutilation, maybe he'd finally admit that children being mutilated for any reason whatsoever is never right.

Even after all this time, I admit to naivete. As you can see in the video, he talked about the lies and butchery of those that put children through life-altering surgeries, more regarding the FtM transitions than the MtF. He did not utter one word, not one, about the genital mutilation regularly being practiced in North America not just for religious reasons, but superficial, casual attitudes about cosmetics and even borderline incestuous if not paedophilic attitudes like preferring a circumcised penis personally.

I believe I have lost my last bit of patience for these traditionalists, most certainly for Dr. Peterson. They can rage about anyone in the Progressive Far-Left performing these acts of mutilation towards children, but they still let the mutilation of baby boys still happen courtesy of the traditionalists and the everyday American, no word of protest about that.

To those of you who may say, "But Peterson wasn't talking about circumcisions, he's talking about the transgender crisis!" my response is that Peterson was very much talking about the subject of child mutilation, quite particularly about the genitals. It is absolutely impossible to properly talk about child genital and anatomical mutilation and permanent surgical change without mentioning Routine Infant Circumcision and the damage and permanent changes that would happen on such a normal basis in North America.

We know for a fact that members of the “Intellectual Dark Web” will deplore female genital mutilation no matter what the reason. It is rightly deplored, of course. But those same people have still been silent about male genital mutilation with the sole exception of to justify it for religious reasons.

There is more irony to deploring transgender surgery while being mum on circumcision. As many of us know, David Reimer of Canada (born Bruce) had his circumcision botched (and also as many of us know, this is a redundant term, as circumcisions are a botch of nature) and was made by the psychologist John Money to be socialized as a girl (as Brenda), even having made to undergo sexual rehearsal play in which he and his twin brother Brian had to act out sexual positions and acts.

As he entered puberty “Brenda” learned the truth about his reassignment and became David. This was by all accounts an attempt at transgenderism forced on a child that went horribly awry leading to the eventual suicide of not just David but also Brian.

When the David Reimer case is ever spoken of, the forced transgenderism is attacked but the butchery that led David into this particular situation is never given the regard it deserves; at best it is referred to in the context of a botch of what they may think is a completely normal procedure. The irony is completely lost in these minds as they are unable to point to circumcision as an actual problem in itself, throwing these male infants under the bus as they virtue signal about how so many girls are harmed because they thought they were boys, and how biological men are dangers for identifying as women.

Traditionalists like Peterson have the absolute gall to cry foul at child mutilators particularly when the Far-Left does it. Furthermore, I profess to be no friend of the Far-Left in any way, I am not the one defending them. But the hypocrisy of those that callously ignore the problems males face as they pontificate about the “erasure of women” is something we cannot afford to ignore any longer. More to my point, Peterson and his ilk have actually gone on to rationalize the practice of circumcision in the religious context.

In The Rubin Report, after Ben Shapiro justifies the mutilation of his own son in the name of “pre-committing him to a set of values”, Dr. Peterson proceeds to talk about how that is a “sacrifice to God” and that if one is a proper parent then they do sacrifice their children to God. The irony is too much considering he has recently deplored the “sacrifice of children” across history in his recent article and video.

In his lecture ‘Biblical Series XI: Sodom and Gomorrah’ he talked about the alleged spiritual virtues of circumcision and the necessity of acting on “behalf” of the child as opposed to having it done voluntarily at a matured age. The biggest of ironies is when he spoke of the bleeding from circumcision as “like the male equivalent of menstruation”, at roughly the 26:20 mark. Transgenderism: Peterson style!

In summation, Traditionalists are allying with misandrists as they press onwards in service of the great omniscient damsel. From promoting fear of men in the name of protecting women to disregarding male physical anguish when going on diatribes against what males have undergone most commonly, TERFs and their allies are showing their true gynocentric colors more so than they have ever in the past. It is high time we start exposing them more for what they are.

The Man Always Pays – The Men's Review (1948 Article)

Mens Review · 29 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We continue the series of Men's Review excerpts below with this piece discussing the unbalanced financial and parental burdens placed on fathers. – PW

* * *

The Man Always Pays

by Vertir

About a hundred thousand men are sentenced for life to the bondage of maintenance orders. Try to imagine the welter of misery this factor means. Here in 1948, when there is a clamour for equality in every sphere, it is farcical that laws agreeable to the chattel era should still be enforced in a feminine-emancipated age.

Widowers (men) who marry again often find that stepmothers have not the consciousness of a decent woman's duty toward the dead woman's children. She spurns the children, and unlike the male, there is no legal compulsion to hold her to the care of them.

The only road that lays before the man is to stand aside and see his children treated shamefully or the woman can alarmingly easily go to court and say she left because of the man's cruelty, and obtain a life pension. As soon as a woman obtains a court order the father is faced with the problem of being a father and "mother" too. The order seldom leaves enough to pay for the children's care. He has the same strain of shopping, housekeeping, occasional sickness, etc., as a working woman with children, but, he doesn't get the State allowances such as the woman is allowed. He gets the strong impression that he is ostracised completely and that he and his children have no rights. What he does manage to obtain is purely concessionary.

The marriage contract is the only contract that is entered into without the conditions being made out, and is signed by the man who places himself utterly and absolutely in the woman's power. If the woman is of the twenty per cent that are decent he is more fortunate than he will ever know.

Does the community realise the festering sore caused by this large army of rotting men who are forced to pay maintenance while the woman pays nothing? This army of self-degraded parasitical women? Some men rot in silence. Others rot in prison rather than submit. Some spend years in hopeful writing to have their grievances righted, only to finish frustrated, and embittered, for there will be no echo in their vacuum. Can the nation afford this canker? This damnation of a fellow-creature?

VOL 2 NO 2

MEN'S REVIEW

Quarterly of the Society for Men's Rights

A CHALLENGE TO MEN

"Matrimonial discord, the rapid decay and disorder is due to the man as the 'emancipation' of women and girls surmounts the marital authority. As a country we suffer from the validity of excessive feminine influence in every sphere, a development that has always preceded imperial decay. The days of our grandfathers were the days of the ability of the man. Female immorality was made acceptable and illegitimacy made less, but to-day we need more quarters more than ever before. Women who need only to ask, obey."

THE MAN ALWAYS PAYS

By "VERTIR"

About a hundred thousand men are sentenced for life to the bondage of maintenance orders. Try to imagine the welter of misery this factor causes. Here is 1949, when there is a clamour for equality in every sphere, yet a brutal civil laws agreeable to a chattel era should still be enforced in a feminine-emancipated age. Widowers who marry again often find that stepmothers have not the consciousness of a decent woman's duty towards the dead woman's children. She spurns the children, and unlike the male, there is no legal compulsion to hold her to the care of them. The only road that lays before the man is to stand aside and see his children treated cruelly or the woman can alarmingly easily go to court and say she left because of the man's cruelty, and obtain a life pension. As soon as the woman obtains a court order the father is faced with the problem of being father and "mother" too. The order seldom leaves enough to pay for the children's care. He has the same strain of shopping, housekeeping, occasional sickness, etc., as a working woman with children, but he doesn't get the State allowances such as the woman is allowed. He gets a strong impression that he is ostracised completely and that he and his children have no rights. What he does manage to obtain is purely concessionary. The marriage contract is the only contract that is entered into without the conditions being made out, and is signed by the man who places himself utterly and absolutely in the woman's power. If the woman is of the twenty per cent. that are decent he is more fortunate than he will ever know.

Does the community realise the festering sore caused by this large army of rancing men who are forced to pay maintenance while the woman pays nothing? This large army of self-degraded parasitical women? Some men rot in silence. Others rot in prison rather than submit. Some spend years in hopeful writing to have their grievances righted, only to finish frustrated, and embittered, for there will be no echo in their vacuum. Can the nation afford this canker? This dominion of a fellow-creature?

◆ ◆ ◆

E.B. Bax: Custody Of Children In The Year 1896

Ernest Belfort Bax · 30 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following is an excerpt from Bax's The Legal Subjection of Men (1896)

> CUSTODY OF CHILDREN
>
> It has always in England been laid down as a fundamental law based on public policy, that the custody of children and their education is a duty incumbent on the father. It is said to be so fundamental that he is not permitted to waive his exercise of the right by pre-nuptial contract. (See the Agar v. Ellis Case.)
>
> This rule of the Common Law of England is of course in harmony with the policy of all Europe and Christendom, as well as with the historic conditions of the European social organisation, if not with the primal instincts of the race.
>
> Nevertheless, fundamental and necessary as the rule may be, the pro-feminist magistrates and judges of England are bent apparently on ignoring it with a light heart. They have not merely retained the old rule that the custody of infants of tender years remains with the mother until the child attains the age of seven. But they go much further than that. As a matter of course, and without considering in the least the interests of the child, or of society at large, they hand over the custody and education of all the children to the litigant wife, whenever she establishes –an easy thing to do– a flimsy and often farcical case of technical "cruelty."
>
> The victim husband has the privilege of maintaining the children as well as herself out of his property or earnings, and has the added consolation of knowing that they will brought up to detest him.
>
> Even in the extreme case where a deserting wife takes with her the children of the marriage, there is practically no redress for the husband if in narrow circumstances. The police courts will not interfere. The divorce court, as already stated, is expensive to the point of prohibition. In any case the husband has to face a tribunal already prejudiced in favour of the female, and the attendant scandal of a process will probably have no other result than to injure his children and their future prospects in life.
>
> – Ernest B. Bax, The Legal Subjection of Men (1896 p.16)

The above passage describes the practice of child custody in England. For a comparison of American child custody law during the 1800s, see:

– The Maternal Preference
– The Maternal Preference in Nineteenth Century American Law

The Trend Of The Sexes – The Men's Review (1948 Article)

Mens Review · 1 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We continue the series of Men's Review excerpts below, with this piece imploring women to extend to men freedom from traditional responsibilities "with the same zeal as women demanded it for themselves." – PW

* * *

The Trend Of The Sexes

by Rith

When we observe the relationship of the sexes in the past, we find woman solely of the ménage, a menial, subjective, subjected. The male holding the centre of the human drama. From this point to the next point -the present- can be traced the line following an upward trend, economically, intellectually, and politically, which forecasts the eventual future point, where men and women will be equal and complimentary to each other — a real factual equality.

The conception of equality at the moment is false. The female has gained a large measure of economic freedom, and will obtain more and more. But as she advances, these advances imply just adjustments in her relationship with the male. To take new freedoms and selfishly retain the oppressions over the male, is not only to arouse male resentment, but it is an abomination indeed, which even males who have a desire to free women, must fight in self-preservation.

Those women who have progressed farther than their fellows, who are conscious of the responsibilities the new situation brings, as well as its rights, have a duty towards their opposite sex, who after all, and their brothers, fathers, and sons. To give freedom with the same zeal as they demand it for themselves, that along the road of human progress, we may work in harmony to make life a thing of happiness for both.

THE TREND OF THE SEXES

By "RITH"

When we observe the relationship of the sexes in the past, we find woman solely of the menage, a menial, subjective, subjected. The male holding the centre of the human drama. From this point to the next point, the present, can be traced the line following an upward trend, economically, intellectually, and politically, which forecasts the eventual future point, where men and women will be equal and complementary to each other—a real factual equality. The conception of equality at the moment is false. The female has gained a large measure of economic freedom, and will obtain more and more. But as she advances, these advances imply just adjustments in her relationship with the male. To take new freedoms and selfishly retain the oppressions over the male, is not only to arouse male resentment, but it is an abomination indeed, which even males who have a desire to free women, must fight in self-preservation. Those women who have progressed farther than their fellows, who are conscious of the responsibilities the new situation brings, as well as its rights, have a duty towards their opposite sex, who after all, are their brothers, fathers, and sons. To give freedom with the same zeal as they demand it for themselves, that along the road of human progress, we may work in harmony to make life a thing of happiness for both.

Child Custody: Maternal Preference in 19th Century American Law

Tom James · 1 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The maternal preference

When it was not rejected outright (as many courts did from the beginning), the supposed "paramount right of the father" to the custody of his children was subject to six major exceptions:

1. children born out-of-wedlock;
2. young children;
3. weak, disabled or unhealthy children;
4. daughters;
5. older male children who expressed a preference to live with their mothers; and
6. cases where the father was guilty of marital or moral misconduct, concepts which were defined very broadly in cases where a father sought custody of a child.

Except when a married mother was determined to be unfit to parent, there were not many situations to which a "paramount right of fathers to custody" actually applied. The exceptions nearly swallowed the rule, in those few states where such a rule was actually applied at all.

What this meant was that, in practice, the courts of every state – those that had openly rejected the "fathers' rights" doctrine from the beginning, and those that had given it lip service while effectively nullifying it through the crafting of exceptions – decided custody on the basis of the best interests of the child, with a strong presumption that maternal custody was in a child's best interests. As the Philadelphia Court of General Sessions concluded in 1840, after conducting a review of American custody decisions from the earliest reported decisions forward, "[t]he common law of the United States is in favour of the mother's custody"[1]

The maternal preference was based on strongly held beliefs about the natural superiority of women and the inferiority of men with respect to child-rearing functions. For example, the Illinois Supreme Court, in 1849, issued this sweeping generalization:

> The mother, from her natural endowments, her position in society, and her constant association with [children], can give them that care, attention and advice so indispensable to their welfare, which a father, if the same children were left to his supervision, would be compelled in a great degree to confide to strangers.[2]

Although the maternal preference was more ardently and eloquently expressed in cases involving younger children, it manifested itself in the rules courts applied to the custody of older children, too. For example, the near-absolute rights of mothers to custody of children born out-of-wedlock, and of daughters, and of weak, disabled or unhealthy children, applied to cases involving children of any age.

Maternal unfitness

The custody rights of parents were never absolute. A mother, like a father, could lose custody if a judge determined that she was unfit to be a parent.[3] The kinds of things that a court would accept as evidence of a mother's unfitness varied considerably from what would suffice for a father, though. In general, it may be said that the grounds for declaring a mother unfit were more limited than what would suffice to declare a father unfit. And over the course of the century, this double standard became increasingly pronounced.

One clear example of the double standard was the obligation of child support. The law imposed support obligations exclusively on men.[4] Women were not expected to be the breadwinners for a family. As a result, a mother's inability to support her children financially normally was not held to be grounds for denying her custody of her children. By contrast, courts readily denied custody to fathers – and awarded custody to the other parent, or even to a third party — on the basis that the father either could not or did not adequately provide for his children financially.

Another clear example of the double standard was marital infidelity. Courts often treated a father's commission of adultery as grounds for denying him custody of a child but, as we have seen, a mother's commission of adultery did not necessarily preclude an award of custody to her, especially if the child in question was young.

Moreover, regardless of the age of the child, a mother's commission of adultery was not a bar to custody if there was evidence that she had undergone a moral reformation. And courts typically would infer a woman's complete moral reformation simply from her termination of an adulterous relationship.

Victorian mores were such that women were seen as innocent and asexual. Therefore, any demonstration of an interest in sex, or of a lack of moral virtue, on a woman's part was thought to be merely a temporary fall from the pedestal. The fall was assumed to have happened as a result of being pushed by a man.

Accordingly, if a married woman simply renounced her interest in the man who had led her astray, then she was immediately entitled to reclaim her position on the pedestal, and all order was restored to the Victorian world.[5] Men rarely were afforded such beneficent dispensation. There was an underlying current of opinion that men who strayed from their marital obligations did so of their own free will, and were virtually assured of doing it again: Once a scoundrel, always a scoundrel, it seemed.

The principal grounds upon which a mother might be deemed to be unfit to parent in nineteenth century America were habitual drunkenness (though this did not always prevent a court from awarding her custody of a child of tender years);[6] mental illness; and severe child abuse.[7]

Notes:

[1] Commonwealth ex rel. d'Hauteville v. Sears 279 (Phila., Pa. Ct. of General Sessions 1840)
[2] Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 43, 50 (1849)
[3] See generally AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, GUIDE TO MARRIAGE, DIVORCE, & FAMILIES 172 (2006) (observing that "[b]y the mid-1800's, most states had come to exhibit a strong preference for the mothers in issues of custody.")
[4] It is sometimes thought that this was an aspect of the coverture doctrine, the idea being that the person who has all the rights should also have all the responsibilities. The support obligation was exclusively male, however, even when coverture was not applicable. For example, support obligations continued to be imposed exclusively on males even after the marital unity had been dissolved by a divorce. Gilley v. Gilley, 9 A. 623 (Me. 1887); Logan v. Murray, 6 Serg. & Rawl. 175 (Pa. 1820); Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206 (1875) (holding that a divorce may terminate a husband's right to custody but it does not terminate his obligation to support his wife and children.) see generally EPAPHRODITUS PECK, THE LAW OF PERSONS OR DOMESTIC RELATIONS 253-60, 278 (1913).
[5] Of course, if she refused to abandon her paramour, then the court would have no basis for a finding of moral reformation, and could proceed to find her unfit to parent.
[6] See, e.g., Brandon v. Brandon, 14 Kan. 264 (1875)
[7] AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, supra note 3.

© 2014 Tom James. This article is reprinted from The History of Custody Law with author's permission.

For information about child custody in England during the 1800s, see: E.B. Bax: Custody Of Children In The Year 1896

The fatherhood effect

J Galt · 2 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

When I was younger, at the beginning of the relationship with my first wife, I had the occasion to babysit for a family member and was accompanied by my partner. The child a girl about 5 at the time seemed to be edgy and clingy after her parents had left. I decided it might be comforting for her to sit and draw pictures. She quietly insisted on our presence and participation. Clearly she wasn't comfortable alone and was looking for attention.

We continued to draw and I decided to attempt an experiment with her that focused on archetypal symbols. I asked her to draw a house, a tree, a river, the sun and a snake. Some may know what the symbols represent. If you don't, no big deal. It doesn't really matter. Let's say symbols and characters can often represent people or things, our relationship to them and how we may be feeling about them.

The process I use is to simply note the detail of each symbol and ask questions. If you're clever you can use this exercise to introduce positive reasoning skills to address feelings of discomfort. For example if the tree represented the father and it has many branches and no leaves, it may represent a father that is unavailable and often busy. Questions help. Is it autumn? Wow that tree has to work really hard to get enough water out of the ground to make leaves for shade. I'm sure the reader gets the point.

I'd like to note if you're not comfortable with communicating this way, don't. Not everyone is comfortable with abstract conversation and it's easy to misinterpret what is being communicated. My personal opinion is this can help with talking to kids, primarily because they provide the subject matter with their art. My rule of thumb is to never allow my reaction or response to be equal to or stronger than theirs. If it is you may be coercing them to confuse their own feelings with yours. It's disrespectful to treat a child this way. All I can say is – don't. I take a passive role, ask questions, suggest abstract alternatives to abstract statements and listen. They know what they mean. I don't.

In the experiment I was conducting, the most unusual detail was the snake was drawn in the river and the river was drawn with waves. I wondered about this and asked questions.

> "I see waves in your river; is the water rushing by?"
>
> "Yes, the water is very fast, the baby snake can't swim very well."
>
> "Oh that's a baby snake swimming?"

All at once she jumped into my arms sobbing and said. "The mommy and daddy snake are swimming to fast and the baby snake can't keep up, the baby is going to get lost."

Needless to say, I got the drift, held her tight and let her cry. Once she finished, I asked if she felt better. She said she did and I said that I thought the baby snake was a pretty good swimmer and knew when to ask for help. I realized the isolation she felt and gave it some thought. I concluded that she was unable to find a way or did not know how to express what she was feeling and may not have even understood her own feelings of isolation. I have carried that experience with me for years, always with an eye to test the insight and try to change it.

Years later my older son was telling me how much he enjoyed his time with his nieces and nephews. "I have no doubt they love you bud, you are their Uncle Hero!"

> "I miss them," he said. "I wish I had more time to spend with them."
>
> "You do," I said. "Try using the phone."
>
> "Right," he said. "Just what would we talk about? They would rather play and wrestle."
>
> "You are one dumb shit, Bud. Remember the girl you were telling me about? Call your niece and tell her."
>
> "Yeah, right, like a nine year old would understand," he responded.

"Look dipshit, maybe you should consider showing your niece some respect and talking to her in a language she can understand. Hi Angie, do you have a minute to talk, I'm calling to get some advice and see what you think. There's a girl I met, she's pretty and nice, but she won't talk to me, what should I do? If you don't trust kids enough to be honest and open with them, why the fuck would they ever trust you? Keep it simple and they will, too. Zach, think about it."

Kids spend their whole childhood being directed, told what to do, where to do it and when to do it. The moment a child displays kindness they are providing evidence of their thoughtfulness, but we don't ask them for their thoughts, we tell them what to think. Unfortunately we regiment them out of their humanity, train them to follow our definition of responsible and even as adults we are not responsible.

How can it be that a responsible adult can choose who they are accountable to and what they are accountable for? We confuse entitlement for responsibility and praise ourselves for it. Responsibility is an obligation; an availability; an act of listening, taking account. The only time we listen to our children is when we need evidence to correct and control them.

You should be very careful when talking to kids. They are easily coerced, intimidated and controlled. If you do that you will miss their message and they will just give you what you force out of them.

To start the conversation why wouldn't you call your 6 year old nephew to discuss gaming, or the new bike you want to buy? Do you really believe he has no opinion? How do they learn to think, to agree or disagree if you don't talk to them. Where do they get self-respect if you and I don't show them what it is? How will a child understand the concept of honesty if it is only solicited on demand and never freely exchanged?

They don't need to be right and they particularly don't need to be wrong. They do need to be valued. Your honesty and willingness to exchange allows them to conceptualize and express. In that process they learn how to respect a meaningful dialogue. If you say to a child, I feel sad, the people at work are not very nice to me and I don't know what to do, it becomes an open door to problem solve and a process they can use as a template to serve themselves in similar conditions. They will learn to ask questions pertinent to the problem and develop those skills. Or we can teach them to pathologize their feelings and medicate.

If Brian says he thinks you should get a bike that's green, then you fucking get a bike that's green. Thank him for his advice and know that green is the color of your respect and love for him. If you don't allow kids to negotiate a partnership in life, where do they fit? How can they know it's their world if they have no say?

You're their Hero for fuck sake, not their authoritarian, or a cop to police them. If we don't hold kids in higher esteem and show respect, who will they turn to when things get tuff for them? How do they turn adversity around if the simplest resource, conversation is not part of their strategy?

Discipline today for kids is about conforming, following a very narrow definition of acceptance. Zach, do you remember when you were 8 and your mother caught you playing with matches in your bed?

Yeah, but do we have to talk about that? Hey what happened when I found out? Actually you took me out to the back field and we burned shit. I particularly liked when we filled that hole with gasoline and lit it.

The point is Zach, you got to explore your curiosity, I got to teach you about fire and what it can do and we all got to live safer. Discipline isn't about conforming it's about thinking and learning.

I have always believed that children are self-taught and spend most of their time learning, whether it's a toddler moving from shelf to shelf, or running up and down stairs. If you replace the word play with the word learn, then whatever a kid is doing becomes immediately interesting. Their method of learning and the object of their learning makes them interesting. Once you have interest you have conversation and communication. Too often kids become decorations in our life, they are the decoration of our ability to control our lives, the evidence of our conformity. Sit still, behave, listen, don't touch that, I said no, stop fidgeting, put that away.

Children are terribly isolated from a very common human experience. The playfulness of conversation that we exchange between adults can be had with children if you can respect their boundaries. We have a physical bond by proximity and affection but we offer them no freedom to express their thoughtfulness. We regiment their performance but we exclude their experience and their freedom to express it. We love them, but only enough to maintain our sense of control and safety, enough for them to conform to our fears.

We all wish for our children to be safe but we only give them a narrow bandwidth to communicate. How could they possibly learn to identify a predator if they are unable to discern deception? How could they possibly say no when we constantly require and coerce them to obey? We teach them to be afraid, but we don't give them skills to overcome their fears.

Men Have Become “Chattels” Of Women – The Men’s Review (1948 Article)

Mens Review · 3 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We continue the series of Men’s Review excerpts below, with the author discussing how men have become a servant class or mere “chattels” of women. – PW

* * *

Chattels

by Avertir

In 1935 the Bishop of Salisbury was reported as saying 16,000 women obtain Separation Orders a year. In the same year, 50,000 Orders were in operation. In that same year 6,000 Committal Orders were made for non-payment in respect of wives and illegitimate children. In one year alone 4,000 husbands were imprisoned for disobedience of the Order of the Court.

With time and the war condition, the number of men ordered to make payments for the whole length of their lives to women (many able-bodied), has increased to the proportions of a large army. Particularly bad and unjust is the case where the man has children to rear, and is compelled to make payments for life to a stepmother who had not an elementary knowledge of hygiene.

The abolition of these life pensions is long overdue. It is both degrading to the woman and the man. It is an anti-incentive to work for the man, and an anti-incentive to work for the woman. It is gross immorality that a being should be subject to a weekly charge for the duration of life, and further it is immoral that a woman can make this demand upon a fellow creature for the absolute length of life, a condition of parasitism.

The matrimonial position to-day is that the man is now the chattel of the woman. Either he obeys her or she is able to bring ruin upon him. The wage economics of to-day are not founded on the keeping of two homes. Wage equality with men, plus a real or potential “maintenance” payment, is the equality of a perverse mind.

By what process of logic is it right for a widow to receive child allowance and not the widower (man)? Is not his need as great, or even greater than hers? Even a widower’s children need care. While the national Press has given much of its space over the last six years to the hard lot of the mothers who have to work, shop, and do housework, I have not yet read of men that have done all these duties, AND paid a Court Order. That is one burden no woman has borne.

MAN’S SUBJECTION

It cannot be emphasised sufficiently that men have to awaken from their totally false notions of social strength, and realise that their liberties have gradually and surreptitiously leaked away, and that they stand to-day in an alarmingly handicapped and bonded position.

It is pointed out that their social and economic power has passed in a great measure to women; their voting and numerical strength is greater and could be decisive where interests are opposed. They are a force of cheap labour jeopardising the standards of the male. By sometimes virtue, sometimes by vice, private wealth is passing to their control by Wills. Their power ranges from the cradle to the shadow behand the personal decisions of public leaders, and last but not least women have captured practically intact the secretarial sphere — the communicating gateway through which all letters must pass to reach those that control, whose actions can make or mar their fellow creatures’ lives. The possibilities with which this situation is pregnant requires but little imagination.

Vol. I No. I

January 1948

MEN'S REVIEW

Quarterly of the Society for Men's Rights

A CHALLENGE TO MEN

Conflict of sex interests, so deeply rooted in the English character towards the well-established, Men's Review makes its bow.

The odds against us are heavy. There is nothing we can do about it. It might be the cry of the weak-hearted, but the spirit that took the little boats to Dunkirk and brought them back on that most glorious May day of our long history, is still alive to-day.

With YOUR help, YOUR co-operation, YOUR membership we can do those things that are for YOUR benefit. Help us to help YOU!

CHATTELS

by "Anselm"

In 1943 the Bishop of Salisbury was reported as saying that 24,000 women obtain Separation Orders a year. In the same year [illegible] were made for the payment of arrears of wives and their maintenance children. During year about about 4,000 husbands were imprisoned for disobedience of the Order of the Court. With time and the war situation, the number of men ordered to make payments for the whole length of their lives as women, many able-bodied, has increased to the proportions of a large army. Participants and onlookers in this new drama the men are confident to pay, and it is compulsive to make payments for life but, regardless who has not an elementary knowledge of hygiene. The abolition of these life payments is long overdue. It is both degrading to the women and the man. It is an anti-creative to men for the man and an anti-creative to work for the woman. It is good internally that a young should be subject to a weekly charge for the direction of life, and further, it is assumed that a woman can make this cannot upon a fellow creature for the absolute length of life, a condition of parasitism.

The matrimonial position today is, that the man is now the chattel of the woman. Either he obeys her or she is able to bring him into line. The wage conditions of to-day are not founded on the keeping of two homes. Wage equality with men, plus a real or potential "maintenance" payment, is the equality of a parasite mind. By what process of logic is it right for a widow to receive children allowances and not the mother? Is she not as good as greater than dead? Does a widower's children need care. While the national Press has given much of its space over the last six years to the hard lot of the mothers who have to work, shop, and do housework, I have yet to read of men that have done all these things, AND paid a Court Order. That is the burden the woman has borne.

MAN'S SUBVERSION

It cannot be emphasised sufficiently that man have to awaken from their totally false notions of social strength, and realise that their liberties have gradually and unexpectedly leaked away, and that they stand today in an alarmingly handicapped and bonded position. Never it is pointed out that their social and economic power has proved in a great measure to women. Their voting and numerical strength is greater, and could be decisive where interests are opposed. They are a force of sheer labour propelling the wanderers of the male. By sometimes virtue, sometimes by vice, private wealth is passing to their control by Wills. Their power stems from the cradle to the shadow behind the personal defiance of public leaders, and but not least women have captured practically intact the secretarial sphere. The communicating gateway through which all letters must pass to reach those that control

Lecture 3: Refuting the Appeal to Dictionary

Adam Kostakis · 4 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Lecture No. 3

"Have you ever actually looked up the word feminist in a dictionary? It means equality between the sexes. It is not about hating men. This is very simple and you would know if you actually looked it up" – Diva

Following on from last week's overview of Gynocentrism then and now, I propose that there is a common thread of female-worship running through, and linking, traditional conceptions of masculinity – historically expressed in what we might call 'patriarchy' – and feminism, which has taken over state and supranational institutions, and is poised to unleash the explicit persecution of men.

It may well take many more of these lectures before this is fully elucidated, but I mention it here for two purposes. The first is a reminder that reference to this common thread runs through all these musings: that Gynocentrism has been with us for a long, long time, and has only changed its form, not its content. This is the crux of Gynocentrism Theory, and it is the narrow focus which I am taking over a broad range of subjects.

Secondly, to shift the discussion towards feminism. There is the danger of reading into Gynocentrism Theory a minimization of feminism's effects, considering that it is only the most modern version of a phenomenon which is centuries old. On the other hand, though, it is the most active form of Gynocentrism that we must presently deal with; it is the enemy, and as the all-singing, all-dancing tremendous final act in this regard, it is a phenomenon worthy of study in its own regard.

Better the devil you know! It is said that it is better to know thine enemy, but feminists are highly effective at obscuring their own intentions, actions, history, and penchant for the use of eristic. Amidst the smoke and mirrors, a chorus of shrill voices from all directions can be heard to proclaim, "it's not our job to educate you about feminism!"

Fine – then we shall have to cast around for ourselves, burrow for gems of knowledge, and procure our own judgments on what feminism is. And since feminists themselves have disavowed their role as our educators, the conclusions which we reach shall require no sanction from them. If it is not their job to educate us about feminism, then it could hardly be anybody else's but our own, could it? And yet, strangely enough, when we do seek out knowledge for ourselves, they object most vociferously to our findings, as though they do in fact covet the role of educator after all. It has been repeatedly suggested that we might like to check the dictionary.

This is a spurious request, not least because there is no 'the dictionary'. There are, rather, dictionaries (plural). The Appeal to Dictionary is one which is made by people who, to put it bluntly, are not very bright. Such people apparently believe that language is a finite array of words, each carrying a single objective definition, the final arbiter of which is The Dictionary.

In the real world, language is ever fluctuating and it is corruptible. It is a collection of meanings, designated by terms – but quite how these are configured is determined by the vagaries of time and place! And very often, people disagree about how terms are, or should be, designated to meanings – and how meanings are, or should be, designated to terms!

The very existence of contested terminology, then, seems to refute the Appeal to Dictionary. Where disputes arise over the definition or use of a term, this is an indication that we have several meanings (or ideas, or concepts, if you prefer) huddled together under the same word-umbrella. To put it another way: there are several things, but they are all designated by the same word. A given configuration of terms to meanings may benefit certain people, and be of detriment to certain others!

Let's take an example – sometimes, the claim that feminism supports women in making false rape allegations has been refuted by a reference to feminism's stated support for sexual equality. "Feminism," a feminist would say, "is about sexual equality, and nothing more."

And yet false rape allegations still exist – as does feminist complicity in the making of them. This issue has only been deprived of recognition in language. The feminist has expertly obscured the complicity of feminism in the making of false rape allegations, by whitewashing the ideology as being "about sexual equality, and nothing more." If we accept her argument that feminism only refers to support for sexual equality, then we no longer have any terms with which to discuss or understand false rape allegations, beyond viewing them as a series of unrelated incidents. Certainly, we wouldn't be able to consider false rape allegations in their proper context, which is as part of a system of control and persecution. The phenomenon of a false rape allegation is surely not explicable by what we understand when we say "sexual equality," and since feminism is about nothing more than that, we are left with no linguistic resources with which to meaningfully speak about it; we have been struck dumb. In short, we have an existing thing, but it is no longer designated by any words. How then could we draw attention to it, criticize it, oppose it?

Let's take another example. A feminist may well create a false partition in the problem of Father's Rights by defining it in such a way that feminist culpability is overlooked. She could, for instance, say that "patriarchy is to blame for the unequal treatment of fathers." Once again, she has controlled the language – meanings are split between terms, or they are compressed into one, and the intended outcome is that the guilty party avoids being taken to task!

Now, you might think – "why does this matter? A feminist might say this or that, but I don't believe her; my own experiences tell me that it's not true, and I'm unlikely to be fooled by what she says."

That's all well and good. But there are a lot of people out there who will be fooled by what she says – including those who possess the very real physical power to imprison you, destroy you, or alienate you from your loved ones. Feminists aren't just saying this to people like you and I – their nonsense gushes forth in all directions, like crude oil from a burst pipe, flowing towards anybody who will listen, and especially those who can "do something about it." Their message comes through, louder than a rushing waterfall, whether you want to hear it or not – and their whole project depends upon the relentless repetition of a dozen or so mantras, and the sinking of their sentiments into the collective subconscious. This is why they endlessly prattle on, typically parroting stock phrases like subordinate cells in a hive mind! They do it because it works – at least, until somebody stands up and points out that the Emperor's not wearing any clothes.

And then, all hell breaks loose!

It was necessary to speak at length on this point, because we must realize that political language is never neutral, and implications are always hidden in the configuration of ideas and terms. The role of Men's Rights Advocates is to critically assess the feminist use of language, and to determine where we would be well-served to separate out several ideas which are referred to by one term, or to compress several terms into one. We should never respond to a feminist argument without first looking critically at the terms through which it is being conducted. To put it in Gamespeak, we must "control the frame!"

The Appeal to Dictionary can be summarily dismissed. Official dictionaries represent establishment positions. Feminism, as it is in vogue, is officially defined in the way that its adherents would like the world to see feminism; it is not defined in a way that describes, or accounts for, the totality of the project. That which happened, or still happens, but does not reflect the establishment view, is simply ignored. To define feminism as > the advocacy of women's rights on the grounds of political, social, and economic equality to men…

is to brush aside much of its unpleasant history – and to deprive skeptics of the resources for an unofficial linguistic and historical analysis of the term. This old revision of the Wikipedia page 'Feminism and Equality' contains plenty of material which disputes the black-and-white dictionary definition, although the page itself has fallen prey to the very same forces which seek to delimit the linguistic opportunities of their critics. Thankfully, Wikipedia archives old versions of its articles, so the efforts of one Nick Levinson in exposing the explicitly anti-male tenor of several famous feminist works has not gone to waste. Let's get cracking!

> Jill Johnston, in Lesbian Nation, called for men to eliminate the qualities they hold as men. "Man is completely out of phase with nature. Nature is woman. Man is the intruder. The man who re-attunes himself with nature is the man who de-mans himself or eliminates himself as man […] A small but significant number of angry and historically minded women comprehend the women's revolution in the visionary sense of an end to the catastrophic brotherhood and a return to the former glory and wise equanimity of the matriarchies."
>
> Mary Daly, in Gyn/Ecology, wrote in favor of reversing power between the genders […] "As a creative crystallizing of the movement beyond the state of Patriarchal Paralysis, this book is an act of Dis-possession; and hence, in a sense beyond the limitations of the label anti-male, it is absolutely Anti-androcrat, A-mazingly Anti-male, Furiously and Finally Female."
>
> "Do women need land and an army . . .; or a feminist government in exile . . .? Or is it simpler: the bed belongs to the woman; the house belongs to the woman; any land belongs to the woman; if a male intimate is violent he is removed from the place where she has the superior and inviolate claim, arrested, denied parole, and prosecuted. . . . . Could women 'set a high price on our blood'?" – Andrea Dworkin
>
> Phyllis Chesler, in Women and Madness, drew on matriarchal history, Amazon mythology, and psychology and, with some ambivalence about relying on biology alone as a justification, argued that a war between the genders has always been underway and that women would benefit from using their full powers to be the exclusive wielders of political power to produce an unequal society in which men live but are relatively powerless, even if such a society is no more just than a patriarchy, and called for feminist women to dominate public institutions in their self-interest. "Amazon society, as mythology, history, and universal male nightmare, > represents a culture in which women reign culturally supreme because of their gender […] In Amazon society, only men, when they were allowed to remain, were, in widely differing degrees, powerless and oppressed […] If women take their bodies seriously—and ideally we should—then its full expression, in terms of pleasure, maternity, and physical strength, seems to fare better when women control the means of production and reproduction. From this point of view, it is simply not in women's interest to support patriarchy or even a fabled 'equality' with men."

>
> One organization that was named The Feminists was interested in matriarchy. Two members wanted "'the restoration of female rule'".

Unless the aforementioned organization and books did not really exist, we are forced to conclude that feminism cannot only have been about the advocacy of women's rights on the grounds of equality with men. At the very least, what we must say is that some feminists may have supported equality, while other feminists have overlooked equality and have outright supported female superiority. And neither can the latter group be reduced to a handful of fringe lunatics. As Nick Levinson points out (much to the chagrin of feminist moderators), two and a half million copies of Phyllis Chesler's Women and Madness were sold.

That's a whole lot of hate.

And a whole lot of energy is spent actively sweeping this kind of thing under the rug, by those who have since realized how damaging honesty can be to one's case. Modern feminists are far more rhetorically disciplined than their forthright foremothers, and have concluded that unpopular plans are not helped into motion by being discussed openly. Rhetorical discipline adds a whole new layer of subterfuge to all that has been said regarding the designation of terms to ideas. It will not suffice only to look at what they say; we must watch carefully what they do. And haven't some of the above recommendations come true, per the actions of feminists? Is it not now the case that male intimates accused of violence are removed from their homes in which the woman has the superior and inviolate claim, as Andrea Dworkin hoped for? Have feminist women not dominated public institutions in their own interest, as Phyllis Chesler advocated? As Gynocentrism Theory tells us, women already had a "high price on their blood" – much higher than that of men, at almost any time in history. This simple fact is the reason why it was possible for the prescriptions of radical feminists to be achieved in the first place – and for dissidents to have been so effortlessly marginalized.

Still, times change. Establishments are overturned, and words are officially redefined. If the new definition of a word proves more accurate, then it must have existed for some time, unofficially, before the word's revision. Sometimes, establishments must change before terms catch up. The dictionary lags behind definition, because the establishment is stuck in the mud. I predict that, as we reach a critical mass opposed to feminism, and shortly before its collapse, we may well see some concessions in the form of alternative definitions of the term becoming accepted.

Adam

Lecture 4: Pig Latin

Adam Kostakis · 5 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the fourth of twelve lectures. – PW

Lecture No. 4

> It is as if the ordinary language we use every day has a hidden set of signals, a kind of secret code – William Stafford

To recap on last week's lecture: Men's Rights Advocates should not be afraid to play around with words; to reframe debate; to recast conventional linguistic usages however we see fit. Don't be afraid to make a game out of it. Use words – and the meanings you choose to ascribe to them – to mock, humiliate, and confuse your enemies. Here's a good example – it makes use of typical feminist phraseology, but with one major difference:

> Not all patriarchs are like that. I am a patriarch – and proud of it – but that doesn't mean that I, personally, am responsible for what other patriarchs do, particularly not those radical patriarchs. But patriarchy isn't a monolithic entity. There isn't only one kind of patriarchy. There are lots of different types of patriarchs who have different views.

Note that defining yourself as a patriarch need not imply that you define yourself as feminists think that patriarchs should be. Feminists are not linguistic arbiters; you are absolutely free to call yourself a patriarch using your own definition of the term, which may or may not coincide to some extent with their definition. Whatever the case, though, you certainly don't need to explain which qualities you possess that, in your mind, make you patriarchal. However, upon announcing that you are a patriarch, you may find feminists attempting to trick you into giving some definite shape to your patriarchy; the shape having already taken form in her mind, her task now is to get you to acknowledge it. She will say something emotive like, "oh, so you think men should just be able to rape women with impunity?"

Your initial response, of course, will be a furrowed brow. Then you will say, "of course I don't think that. And yet I am still, most certainly, a patriarch."

In this example, you could define patriarchy any way you please; having decided in advance that feminism is non-credible, you have dismissed altogether any feministic notion of what patriarchy is. You could even, if you like, define yourself as a patriarch on the grounds that you support equality between men and women. Yes, that kind of wordplay will wind them up no end, because feminism depends upon a peculiar configuration of words and meanings, which may not be circumnavigated without signaling a threat to the ideology's power base.

Does the suggestion above sound preposterous? Well, I can but refer you to a real example of a social movement, the success of which has depended, for the most part, on its adroitness at linguistic manipulation. I am speaking, of course, of feminism, the proponents of which have made it their business to recast perceptions of reality through the redefinition of words. But this weapon is available to all those who are marginalized; it is the establishment which must defend its orthodoxy, not the outcasts! And while feminists once made great use of this strategy on the linguistic battlefield, it has become a point of vulnerability for them now that they control the machine, rather than rage against it. Now, you see, they must consolidate their gains; they must conserve what they have created; and thus, they are placed on the defensive, guarding their etymological orthodoxies from those who beg to differ. As I noted in the first lecture, their capacity for controlling perceptions of reality is faltering. The iron is hot. It is time to strike!

But, have I been too quick to dismiss the definition of feminism as offered up by feminists? I think I may have been. Even essentially contested concepts, as W. B. Gallie referred to them, must have meanings which are greater than normative, else communication about them would be rendered impossible. That is – there must be some amount of general consensus over what feminism is, between feminists and anti-feminists, or we would not be able to argue about it! Even despite the differences between a feminist's view of feminism and of our own, some shared content must exist at some level, or we would be talking about entirely different things. They might be talking about the feminist movement, while I am talking about horse-rearing, although we both refer to our respective subjects as 'feminism' – but we wouldn't have much to say to each other, would we, if this were the case?

So, I shall posit the following as a universally applicable definition of feminism; that is to say, it must fit everyone's criteria for what feminism is, in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. It is a suitably limited definition, since it can encompass only those parts of feminism which all definitions hold in common. So, here it is: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses feminism holds in common regarding the concept, whether they are supportive, skeptical, or nihilistically indifferent. No feminist, I think, would deny that this is, at the very least, the 'bare bones' of feminism, even if she would prefer to flesh it out in a lot more detail. But that will not do, for beyond this narrow inference, we disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon, and that is our universally applicable definition.

Note that there is no mention of equality. This is because, as I uncovered last week with the help of one Nick Levinson, there are a number of feminists who explicitly did not pursue equality, but supremacy. So, equality cannot fit into the universal definition of feminism, since certain feminists themselves – who were very famously, unequivocally feminist – disavowed it. To say that feminism is 'about equality', then, would be to place oneself in diametrical opposition to several extremely influential feminists! And why, that would be … misogynistic!

Nor can feminism be said to be the project for increasing the power of women relative to men, since, in this counter-feminist's view, feminists are often quite content to increase the power of women in an absolute sense. That is, they endeavor to grab all they can for women, without reference to the status of men. The phrase 'relative to men,' then, only serves to imply that women are power-less relative to men at present, thus casting feminism in an unfairly favorable light. In reality, once women do achieve power which is at an equal or equivalent level to that of men, the demands of feminists do not stop. What we find is that female power becomes entrenched, and extended, and when it surpasses male power, this is simply referred to as 'parity' and ignored by feminists – at least, when they are not gloating over men's newfound powerlessness.

Nor are we able to list, in our universal definition, the specific areas of life, or spheres, in which the feminist project applies. This is because feminism is inherently universalizing; it seeks to colonize and dominate every single facet of life where men and women meet. It aims for domination in every sphere of life, actual and potential.

You may disagree with some of the points above, particularly if you are supportive of feminism. But this does nothing to change our universal definition, because all we can say about those points is that they are contentious. That is, feminists and non-feminists, who are educated about feminism, disagree about these aspects of feminism, and it would simply be biased to take one or the other view for granted. That would be like consulting only Jacobins on the historical accomplishments of the Jacobin Club, or like canvassing only conservatives to explain modern liberalism. It would be a good example of poor methodology, and would help us very little in our search for truth. Right? So then, our universally applicable definition cannot be expanded beyond that which we stated before: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

We must not be swayed by feminist attempts to deny the universalizing tendency inherent to feminism. In their attempts to win the debate over what feminism is, feminists are notorious for abridging their own ideology to a nub of its whole, and presenting their support for – and your dissent from – feminism as resting entirely on a single issue. Let me give an example, in which you are confronted by the Appeal to Franchise. You have just stated that you do not support feminism. Your feminist opponent's next move is to reduce the entirety of feminism to women gaining the right to vote – thus implying that you must oppose this, since you claimed to oppose feminism. You must simply remind all onlookers that feminism is about more than this and cannot be reduced to a single item as she has tried to do. You can openly state your support for that single item – in this case, the vote – while nevertheless maintaining your antipathy towards feminism, this being in no way reducible to women's right to vote.

Essentially, your conscience is clear, and you are free to label yourself a non-feminist – and even, an anti-feminist – sans the implication that you therefore support every single thing that feminism opposes.

So, to recap: the only thing we are all going to be able to agree on is that feminism is the project for increasing the power of women. As you may have noticed, feminists go a little further than this when speaking about what they think feminism is, and they shall have plenty of half-truths and obfuscations to offer up if you ask them politely enough – though remember, it's not their job to educate us about these things.

As such, we may leave them to their own fluffy fantasies, and move beyond the universal definition to one which more accurately accounts for men's experiences of the world.

So, here is the definition I offer up: "feminism is the most recent, and presently the most culturally dominant form of Gynocentrism. It is a victim ideology which explicitly advocates female supremacy, at every facet of life in which men and women meet; it does so in accordance with its universalizing tendency, and so it does so in each sphere of life, including but extending beyond the political, social, cultural, personal, emotional, sexual, spiritual, economic, governmental and legal. By female supremacy, I refer to the notion that women should possess superiority of status, power and protection relative to men. It is the dominant cultural paradigm in the Western world and beyond. It is morally indefensible, although its adherents ensure that their hegemony goes unchallenged through the domination of societal institutions and the use of state violence."

In response to last week's lecture, Primal offered up his own definition of feminism, which is not quite the same as mine, but the two are certainly complementary:

> Gender-feminism is an overarching ideology built on a stack of bald-faced lies. As the primary reverse-sexist superstition of Post Modern age, it forms the foundation for female sexual supremacy in the name of 'gender' equality. Like other half-baked Utopian fantasies, it is totalitarian to the core. It is formed from a witch's brew of recycled but dis-credited ideological relics from the trash heap of history…relics like Marxism, Romanticism and Classism. It's proponents proudly destroy well-established standards of scholarship to force others to take the ideology seriously. It's adherents have spread like carcinogenic pathogens in authoritarian institutions…that is wherever power is perverted for political reasons. It's philosophy is nonsensical, circular, and self-serving. As the primary moral foundation for the mainstream hate groups which operate in the name of Women's Rights worldwide, gender-feminism is a dangerous dogma and one that has no place in civil discourse.

Both of our definitions are rather lengthy, although I think it is useful to have a statement of exactly what we mean by the term. It could be much shortened and presented as follows: feminism equals female supremacism.

That the shortened version is more memorable is offset by its unfortunate implications that i) only women are feminists, and ii) all women support feminism. Neither i) nor ii) is correct. The charge of supremacism alone is not really sufficient for our purposes; it leaves too much left unsaid regarding what this supremacism is, and about the success rate of feminism so far. For shorthand purposes, it will do, but it should be remembered that it is a reduction of broader definitions as worked out here and elsewhere.

What may be more useful for our purposes in presenting our view of what feminism is is a brief statement of its goals. Feminism essentially seeks the following goals:

(1) The expropriation of resources from men to women.
(2) The punishment of men.
(3) To increase (1) and (2) in terms of scope and intensity indefinitely.
I feel that such a definition will strike a nerve with feminists themselves – because it hits a little too close to home. That the real-world effects of the feminist project have indeed been (1) and (2), and that these have increased in scope and intensity over the years (3) is frankly, irrefutable.

Time has yielded the truth about what happens when feminist-minded women come to occupy the most powerful positions in society, and that is that Men's Rights are systematically trashed. The more power that feminists have, the more new laws are created to accomplish greater confiscation of men's property and intensifying violations of their liberty, bodily integrity, and lives.

But there is hope. For it is deeds, not words, that shall speak our enemies. Have a pleasant weekend, everyone.

Adam

Adam James interviews Robert Brockway

AVfM Video Source · 6 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Utopianism and Double Standards in Feminist Foremother Mary Wollstonecraft

Janice Fiamengo · 8 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: Following on the heels of Wollstonecraft's publication of A Vindication Of The Rights of Woman, 33 year old Thomas Taylor published his own reply titled 'Vindication Of The Rights Of Brutes' (1792). In the introduction to Taylor's book we read the following summary:

> A Vindication of the Rights of Brutes is an exercise in irony, a witty, merry book in which Taylor, using the weapon of laughter, professed agreement with the radical ideas recently published by two of his friends, Mary Wollstonecraft and Thomas Paine, and by carrying these arguments to their logical extremes, reduced them to absurdity. That it was their ideas which eventually triumphed does not lessen the reader's enjoyment of his wit, or alter the usefulness of his parody of what he regarded as an oversimplification of the nature of man, an over-generalization of the worth of all men, and an egalitarianism he could not accept.
>
> Thomas Taylor, Vindication Of The Rights Of Brutes, (1792)

Peter III of Russia

Robert Brockway · 9 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

History doesn't remember Peter III of Russia fondly. The grandson of Peter the Great, he's ridiculed by historians. This is captured effectively by the 1911 Encyclopedia Britannica that had this to say about him:

> Nature had made him mean, the smallpox had made him hideous, and his degraded habits made him loathsome. And Peter had all the sentiments of the worst kind of a small German prince of the time. He had the conviction that his princeship entitled him to disregard decency and the feelings of others. He planned brutal practical jokes, in which blows had always a share. His most manly taste did not rise above the kind of military interest which has been defined as "corporal's mania," the passion for uniforms, pipeclay, buttons, the "tricks of parade and the froth of discipline." He detested the Russians, and surrounded himself with Holsteiners.

That historians and others should be so hostile to the memory of Peter III and laud so highly the Empress that followed him, Catherine, tends to count against the idea of The Patriarchy. Doubly so when we consider that Catherine was his wife and that she deposed him. History remembers her as Catherine the Great. I prefer to call her Catherine the Usurper. In the end Peter was on the throne for barely six months thanks to the actions of his wife and others.

The man who would later become Peter III, Emperor of Russia, was born in 1728 in the city of Kiel in what is now Germany. His mother died soon after from a postpartum infection and his father died when he was eleven. He was descended from Swedish and Russian royalty and was now a duke in own right. In 1742, when he was 14, he was named the heir presumptive of the Russian Empire by this aunt Empress Elizabeth. Soon after he moved to Russia where he lived for the rest of his life. Not long after moving to Russia he was also named as heir-presumptive of the Swedish throne however when Swedish authorities discovered that he was also the heir to the Russian throne the offer was apparently quietly dropped.

In 1762 Empress Elizabeth died and Peter ascended to the throne. One of his first acts on taking the throne was to end a seven year long war with Prussia. He ordered Russians to leave conquered Prussian land and provided compensation to Prussia He then went on to form an alliance with Prussia. So much for warmongering men.

Peter then embarked on an ambitious programme of reform. In his 186 days on the throne he passed 220 laws. He was able to maintain this prodigious rate as he had been preparing his legislative agenda over his 20 years as the heir to the Russian throne.

His daily routine was disciplined. He would rise at 7am, receive reports on the state of the empire from 8-10am, at 11am he would oversee the changing of the guard. He would generally take lunch at 1pm. Sometimes diplomats or Russians from across the class spectrum were invited to lunch with him.

Peter permitted religious freedom among his subjects, something that was unusual even in Western Europe at the time. He emphasised and encouraged education through his legislative reforms.

Peter went on to abolish the Secret Office of Investigation, a secret police force used principally to crush dissent against the state and the emperor.

Peter also established the first state bank in Russia, significantly reduced the control nobles had over trade and encouraged the rise of a merchant class. This can be seen today as economic liberalisation intended to promote wealth in Russia.

Notably Peter released nobles from compulsory military service. These same nobles were to assist his wife in deposing him months later.

During Peter's reign the killing of peasants by their lords was abolished. Henceforth lords that killed their peasants were subject to exile. One female landowner, E.N. Golshein-Bek, was reportedly so abusive to her peasants that her lands were taken from her.

While Peter has often been criticised for speaking little Russian, the truth is that French was the language of the Russian court and the Russian royal family had little cause to speak Russian on a daily basis.

Peter's predecessor, Elizabeth, had seized power from the infant emperor Ivan VI. Elizabeth had Ivan held incommunicado as a baby and forbade him receiving an education. In a story reminiscent of The Man in the Iron Mask Ivan's jailers were prohibited from even knowing his identity. When Peter came to the throne Ivan was 21 and still rotting in prison. Peter visited Ivan and there is some indication that he intended to improve the conditions of his incarceration.

While Catherine usurped her husbands power she did so with the support of the nobility, the army and the navy. After taking power Catherine reversed many of Peter's reforms although she retained those that benefitted the crown, such as an increased right to seize church property. Peter died in captivity but it isn't clear whether Catherine had a hand in this or not.

Catherine also created the infamous Pale of Settlement in which Russian Jews were required to reside. Jews in the army could leave when on active service but had to return to the Pale during leave. The Pale was to remain in place until the fall of the Russian monarchy in 1917.

After he died a number of pretenders stepped forward claiming to be Peter. In at least one case Catherine's forces defeated a pretender in battle.

As noted, historians have little good to say about Peter, while they praise Catherine. Many historians have uncritically accepted Catherine's version of events and of her husband.

Peter's attempts at liberalising Russian society and economy paint a different picture – of a monarch trying to make Russia better than it was. In doing so he made powerful enemies who ultimately removed him from power.

Whatever lead up to it, Russia's nobles concluded that they would be better off with Empress Catherine than Emperor Peter. Time and again the historical record has examples in which nobles supported a ruler based on their own self-interest rather than the gender of the ruler.

Today a statue stands in the city of his birth, one of the few monuments to this man. The narrative carried down through the centuries, of a small petty man, and that of his wife as a great ruler is itself a clear demonstration of the falsity of the feminist claims of Patriarchy. A Patriarchy would never suppress the good works of an emperor and exhault the empress that usurped him. A Patriarchy would never replace an emperor with an empress in the first place. Catherine rewrote history to justify her own reign and the world has to a large degree uncritically accepted her claims. This was true even before the rise of the modern feminist movement and is a very clear indication of the prevalence of gynocentrism throughout Russian and Western civilisation.

Officially Peter and Catherine had one son, Paul, who would go on to be emperor of Russia after his mother died. Later in life Catherine hinted that Peter had not been Paul's father however. Paul had a distant relationship with his mother as she showed much more affection to her many lovers than to her only son. Catherine attempted to pass over Paul and make his own son Alexander her heir. This was ultimately unsuccessful and Paul took the throne on the death of Catherine. Paul reportedly resembled Peter physically as well as in personality. Like Peter, Paul had attempted to improve the lot of the peasantry and was ultimately removed from power with the support of the nobility. When he wouldn't abdicate he was murdered by nobles.

Perhaps Peter's reforms were too ambitious for his time. It is unfortunate that he's continued to be viewed so negatively today. With hindsight we can see that his reforms would have helped to modernise Russian and ultimately helped the Russian people. Had Peter stayed on the throne and been able to complete his reforms the Russian revolutions of the early 20th century might never have materialised. If so the world today might be very different. Alas we will never know, because 260 years ago today Catherine the Usurper deposed her husband Peter III and locked him in a prison cell, only to have him die soon after.

Instead of Peter the reformer we got Catherine the Usurper and autocrat. What could have been.

The cover image depicts Peter in 1761, the year of his reign.

Lecture 5: Anatomy of a Victim Ideology

Adam Kostakis · 9 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Lecture No. 5

> The weakness of men is the façade of strenght; the strenght of women is the façade of weakness.(sic) – Warren Farrell

Among the worst mistakes that freedom-loving people can make is to stereotype feminists as a small, motley crew of angry lesbians who have long since ceased to be relevant. Take note: this stereotype helps them.

I must repeat myself: this stereotype helps them.

Let that sink in for a moment. Every time you have belittled feminists as a bunch of cranky old hags that nobody takes seriously, you have helped to obscure their program and indeed, their very existence as a form of organized power. Belittle them, you must – but do so in a way which exposes, not obscures! For feminism is far from being a relic of the past. The feminist movement is taken very seriously indeed by those with the power to enforce its core aims:

(1) The expropriation of resources from men to women.
(2) The punishment of men.
(3) To increase (1) and (2) in terms of scope and intensity indefinitely.

Obscurity assists the realization of these goals by creating doubt amongst potential opponents. The misidentification of feminism as a cultural artifact which no longer holds sway over the operations of government and society is a product of feminism's own metamorphosis. Note that the essence, or substance of feminism has not changed over the years, only its form, or packaging. The change of packaging has proved so effective that some now deny that the product still exists.

Au contraire. As much as the times changed with feminism, feminism has changed with the times. In the transformation of feminism from a movement opposed to government and society at large, into a movement which controls the state and public opinion – and uses this position to persecute the new enemies of the state – its strategies underwent a certain cultivation. Today, feminists no longer need to throw temper tantrums to get their way, because while they once raged against the machine, they now control it. This is the truly profound shift in Western societies since the height of consciousness about feminism in the middle of last century; it is not that feminists have become less relevant, but more.

As Fidelbogen put it:

> Feminism is now lodged in the institutional structures, hence, "respectable". I might compare it to organized crime, which was openly thuggish in the early racketeering days, but once they got their people into "city hall", and into electoral politics, learned to wear a silk tie and play the game in a different way.

When feminists were outside the tent, causing offense was one of their prime weapons – poorly disguised as edgy boundary-pushing. Who remembers this lovely piece of propagandistic hate, published in the 1970s?

The above is precisely the kind of thing that feminists today like to pretend never happened. Now that feminists are inside the tent, they are forced to defend their gains; in the 1970s, when the above picture was produced, they attacked from the outside, and sought to tear down official morality rather than (as they do now) define and dictate it.

And how better to maintain control than by punishing those who attack, or who might attack, the new status quo? We are of course referring to men, who stand to lose the most from the three core aims of the feminist project as listed above. Today, feminists believe that women have the inalienable right to not feel offended, and they do not hesitate to employ state violence to enforce this. Prosecuting those (men) who cause offense is their new weapon, one which has replaced the old (causing offense). Of course, persecuting people merely for being offensive is rather less charitable than men were to feminists before feminists took over. But, as Gynocentrism Theory tells us, men were only charitable to offensive women in the early days of feminism because women already exercised substantial control.

Do feminists believe that they are doing right? The answer is an unequivocal yes for most of them – they truly do believe that they are a righteous people, and even when they become cognizant of doing wrong, they rationalize that they are also, simultaneously, doing right. How could this be? Well, let me show you how it works, by tracing the anatomy of a victim ideology.

Once a period of consciousness-raising has propagated the belief that the members of a group are – by their essential nature as members of the group – victims, the group shall pursue two objectives:

(1) To equalize with the designated 'enemy' group;
(2) To forge their own 'victim identity,' separete from and unaccountable to the 'enemy' group.

You will notice that, while the first objective brings the 'victim' group closer to the 'enemy' group, in terms of status, expectations, autonomy, etc., the second widens the gulf between them. The first objective, we are told, will unite us in our common humanity, and bring about liberty for all, and other nice things like that. But as soon as we get close to this, there tends to be a drift towards proclamations of the importance of the second objective. Nothing will ever be enough to satisfy the 'victim' group, because they view themselves as essentially and inherently the victims of the 'enemy' group, regardless of what may have changed in reality. A victim ideology is anti-contextual, and its followers – the self-designated 'victims' – shall never see themselves as anything but. Their victimhood is affirmed in advance, and the facts must be made to fit the story. In other words, they will spin any situation into one where they are most harshly treated.

This is why feminists like Hillary Clinton can get away with saying things like:

> women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat.

Well, sure – losing family members to horrible deaths is so much worse than actually having to die those horrible deaths. That is, if your whole worldview is tainted by sexism and you reduce the status of men to Protecting/Providing Objects. In Mrs Clinton's quote, no humanity is ascribed to men whatsoever. The real problem is not that they are traumatized, mutilated and blown to pieces per se; it is that, because of their being subject to atrocities, men will not be able to fulfill their protecting/providing roles quite so effectively. It is, therefore, women who lose out, because men don't actually matter except insofar as they can assist females. This is precisely the kind of attitude which emerges out of a victim ideology. The entirety of existence, in all its wonderful complexity, is reduced to black-and-white primitivism: my people matter, your people don't. Or, as we shall see, my people good, your people bad. Anything good for my people is good, no mind whether it is good or bad for your people.

This kind of thinking is known as Manichean Essentialism, and it is the metaphysical cornerstone for feminism as a whole. Decades of consciousness-raising have ensured that women are reflexively considered to have been wronged, whatever the facts. Whenever genuine examples of women being wronged cannot be found, compensatory privilege becomes the sanctioned goal. That is, women are treated more leniently in one regard because they are believed to be disadvantaged in unrelated regards, or just disadvantaged in general. One recent example of this from the United Kingdom is the order issued by Dame Laura Cox to judges that they must treat female criminals with greater leniency, a ruling which simultaneously reduced British men to second class status while green-lighting abusive women who might otherwise have been deterred.

There are some who go further than this. Baroness Corston, who explicitly identifies as a feminist, believes that women don't really deserve to be punished at all when they commit crimes. Her 2007 Government report advocates that all women's prisons should close, and that even the most violent and abusive female offenders should not be locked up. Indeed, they > would no longer go to one of the country's 15 women's prisons, which would all close. Instead, killers such as Rose West, serving life for the murder of ten young women and girls, would be sent to "homely" local custody units. There they would be allowed to live as a "family unit" with between 20 and 30 other women prisoners, organising their own shopping, budgets and cooking. The units would also allow them to stay close to their families … All the women's jails would shut within the next decade, and could instead be converted into prisons for men … The report claims: "Women and men are different. Equal treatment of men and women does not result in equal outcomes."

The above is a classic example of Orwellian Newspeak. Anti-feminists of all stripes have been saying for decades that men and women are essentially different. Feminists have insisted that men and women are essentially the same, and we must therefore have equal treatment. But as soon as equality works retrograde to the goal of female empowerment, it is dropped like a hot potato, and feminists twist themselves around in incredible semantic gymnastics to justify the sudden turnabout.

> Women also (sic) never be sent to jail to “teach them a lesson”.

Of course they shouldn’t. Women shouldn’t have to actually learn how to abide by the law, much less how to be functioning members of civilization. They should be allowed to run wild and free, abusing and destroying anything they please with absolute license. They shouldn’t even expect a slap on the wrist for their misbehavior – that would be domestic violence, don’t you know?

But if feminism truly was about equality, shouldn’t feminists be pushing for new laws to criminalize more women, rather than their anti-egalitarian approach of imprisoning less women and more men? Or does equality only matter when it is women who are deemed unequal? (In and of itself, this would imply strongly that women are a privileged class like no other.)

The female incarceration rate is just one-eighth that of men in the United States (Wikipedia, accessed 10th October 2010), while women account for only 5.7% of inmates in Great Britain. Surely, if equality was the goal, we would be relaxing the punitive, feminist-inspired laws against men, and seeking to punish more women instead. I can think of nowhere in modern society that is more male-dominated or unrepresentative than the penal system – something which, in the interests of sexual equality, needs to change.

But no – flatly contrary to the principles of neutral, impartial justice, feminists deem it a good thing for its own sake to lock up fewer women! It is as though women who are guilty of crimes aren’t really guilty – and are therefore victims of whatever is done to them as punishment. It is a popular notion that women are disadvantaged – generally, inherently, essentially, within the very fiber of their being – and so must be disadvantaged in every particular area of life; thus, anything done to assist them must be a reduction of unfair disadvantage. Any rationally-minded person can see how absurd this all is, and I include leading feminists in this, as they are shrewd but not stupid. Just deserts, deterrence, fair treatment, civilization itself be damned; this is Gynocentrism in action.

To recap, victim ideologies such as feminism seek to:

(1) Equalize with the ‘enemy’ group;
(2) Forge their own ‘victim identity,’ separate from and unaccountable to the ‘enemy’ group.

That these two objectives are in contradiction is not just a logical flaw; it’s part of a strategy which allows the ‘victim’ group to shift its stance as circumstances require. Objective (1) might be consistently pursued for a little while. But if the movement comes under scrutiny for disadvantaging the ‘enemy’ group, the ‘victims’ can just switch to objective (2) and emphasize the importance of their own uniqueness in ways for which equality does not suffice. Or, as feminist Germaine Greer puts it:

> In 1970 the movement was called 'Women's Liberation' or, contemptously (sic), 'Women's Lib'. When the name 'Libbers' was dropped for 'Feminists' we were all relieved. What none of us noticed was that the ideal of liberation was fading out with the word. We were settling for equality. Liberation struggles are not about assimilation but about asserting difference, endowing that difference with dignity and prestige, and insisting on it as a condition of self-definition and self-determination. … the visionary feminists of the late sixties and early seventies knew that women could never find freedom by agreeing to live the lives of unfree men.

Once equal status has been reached, the rhetoric of equality can be discarded, because who wants to be only equal to a man anyway? Here, in black and white, is a statement of female supremacy.

Same as it ever was.

If equality had ever been the end goal, then men's disadvantages would have been addressed seriously, and not exacerbated while men themselves were goaded. To this day, the only time a feminist bothers herself with an issue of male disadvantage is when it benefits women to point it out – as in the case of parental leave. Enforced equal paternity and maternity leave rules out any disincentive that employers have to hire women. A feminist will set aside her 'all fathers are rapists and abusers' shtick, just long enough to insist that men should have equal rights to parenting – but this is typically presented as a demand that men shoulder the burdens of raising children so that women may be empowered in the workplace. Even when injustices against them are being redressed, men are tools for female betterment.

Same as it ever was.

Another example is male rape in prisons. This is occasionally highlighted by feminists, but only because men can be shown to be the oppressors, allowing them to attack maleness itself. Feminists pick up the torch once the rapist has done his part; they complete the rape victim's sexual humiliation by destroying his self-identity, poisoning his mind with aspersions that maleness itself is to blame for his victimization; and so a fundamental, immutable part of himself was the cause of his rape. They force upon him the identity of rapist along with rape victim, their vilification of 'toxic masculinity' serving to assure him that he shares the abusive characteristics of his abuser. On the other hand, the high level of female culpability in child abuse, both sexual and non-sexual, is ignored or denied.

This is why our universally applicable definition of feminism could not have included any reference to 'equality' – it's not a reasonable statement to make if we're using analytical tools more incisive than Manichean Essentialism. The universal definition remains, and no ground can possibly be ceded: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

Power in what regard? Power to do what? Such questions inevitably arise. The answer, if you've been following closely, is obvious – whatever they please, no matter who else is harmed. Silence is not consent, but it is complicity, when you have the power to draw attention towards abuse and the resources towards stopping it, yet you fail to do so on the grounds that the abusers have genitals that resemble your own.

And that's what it comes down to, folks – we are dealing with primitives in pantsuits.

Adam

MGTOW: A worldwide boycott of marriage

Tim Patten · 10 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM was recently advised that Tim Patten had passed away on June 25. Tim had been ill for some time. In remembrance of Tim AVfM is republishing his first article with us. RIP Tim. –Ed

Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) is a worldwide phenomenon, based on a philosophy of gaining control over a man's personal freedom and future. MGTOW is a lifestyle that frees men from patriarchal traditions regarding expectations for dating and marriage. It liberates men from a life of tiresome labor, waste of personal resources, and constant emotional exhaustion devoted to toxic mates, girlfriends or wives. For many years, these ideas were limited to individuals and small communities. But today, the Internet has allowed these precepts to become easily available, and millions of men around the world are finding their way on the road to sovereignty.

MGTOW is sometimes referred to as "Taking the Red Pill". Just as in The Matrix, the Red Pill enabled those who swallowed it to see the surprising reality behind conventional living and common sense. MGTOW is opening the eyes of ordinary men to a new, better set of possibilities after seeing the painful truth that men grow up in a hierarchical social order that imposes expectations and directives upon them. They are called to Man Up, which included taking on traditional work and marriage.[1] It is a system that sees men pour out their best energies for a woman, children, or the social organism, only to see himself become irrelevant and cast aside once his prime years are spent.[2]

MGTOW[3] is a growing global awareness that helps men avoid dangerous relationships within a Gynocentric society, which exalts women's physical and emotional needs over all others.[3] Oftentimes, individuals discover the MGTOW message after a conventional relationship turns poisonous and causes them anger or pain.

Some, but not all MGTOW men, ascribe to these ideals:

A. Liberation from the Matriarchal rulebook of dating[4]
B. Avoidance of risks in marriage,[5] and in its place value my own life on my terms
C. Rejection of role as sole provider,[6] protector,[7] or pack mule in relationships
D. Recognize financial reality[8] of relationships today, and in the future[9, 10]
E. Avoid costs of raising children; veto God's commandment to "go forth and multiply"
F. Defy societal male shaming techniques and slogans[11, 12, 13]

The MGTOW population raises awareness about its mission, and allows every man to develop his own individual set of rules, whatever works best for him. Each MGTOW member cannot be casually labeled. This would result in an inaccurate and unfair characterization of discrete MGTOW member's ideas, experience, knowledge, and unique background. MGTOW is a phenomenon that does not discriminate by age, ethnicity, political affiliation, or other irrelevant factors. There are millions across the world who value a life of individual acceptance and freedom.

This enlightened view of independence is mainly sustained by a brotherhood of men.

MGTOW History

MGTOW was inspired by Japanese Herbivores , or "grass eaters". These are men who avoid permanent marital and romantic relationships.[15] The earliest reference to the tenets of MGTOW as an organized lifestyle was from a western newspaper entry in 1835 and Herbivore men, the term itself, was first coined by Maki Fukasawa in an article published on Oct. 13, 2006. MGTOW became a buzzword in 2008 and 2009.[7, 8, 9, 10] MGTOW has spread throughout every major nation. Men are becoming increasingly aware of relationships' risks, such as emotional, physical abuse and financial enslavement, due to the strictures of modern society's gynocentric patriarchy.[16]

Around 2008, marital failures and relationship difficulties were being publicly shared on various social media sites, including YouTube. Anonymous men with pseudonyms like Stardusk, Sandman, and Barbarossa, were a few of the forward-thinking innovators of the MGTOW YouTube phenomenon. Their videos attracted interest, and their ideas quickly spread to others. Now YouTube has hundreds of videos offering a daily dose of the Red Pill.

MGTOW Education

Men have to seek out MGTOW education and community where they can find it. Without political movements or women's studies to teach men, these ideas aren't taught in schools, but it thrives on the Internet. It is a coalition of sharing that fuels connection and consciousness. Social media (Facebook, Reddit, YouTube, forums, etc.) allow the MGTOW population and interested parties to bond. Educated experiences and discoveries are distributed and refined.

Common Myths

Men's Rights: Some people believe that MGTOW is an ideology that splintered off from Men's Rights Advocacy (MRA). Previously, MGTOW may have been introduced through MRA connections. However, today most individuals discover the message through MGTOW social media channels and networks. Millions have found the MGTOW lifestyle, and most are not advocates for men's rights.

Sexless: Some people claim MGTOW bans sex with women or it is a 'strike' that punishes women. A small group of MGTOW may be asexual, but most continue sexual relationships with women and have no interest in penalizing women.

Anti-Social: Others believe these men are hermits and want to move away from civilization. MGTOW are everywhere and live ordinary lives.

Hate: MGTOW is mistakenly considered a "rage against women" and "misogynistic." But these men are actually discovering freedom, fulfillment of dreams, sex, and love, as they dodge the proverbial bullets of a culture that attempt to reinforce traditional dating and marriage contrivances. These men love women. Some MGTOW have suffered financial, physical and emotional pain in relationships, marriages, and divorces, only to find MGTOW for emotional support. They are given a safe place to vent.

Wind Society Backwards: Some think MGTOW is used to take society backwards, creating a society of marital ownership and oppression of women. Instead, MGTOW is moving the male society forward and cultivating quality relationships between the sexes. It creates an alternative future for men of all types and ages, and is a liberating force for young men, revealing a livable path before young men have suffered the blows of traditional masculine roles.

Gay, Cry Baby, or Sissy: The overwhelming majority of the MGTOW population is not gay. They date and enjoy women, but avoid any living arrangement that might douse their life ambitions and liberty. These individuals are not crying over previous injury, but are gaining power over their destiny. Each MGTOW individual creates his own path.

Sources

[1] http://madamenoire.com/285117/do-men-feel-the-pressure-of-marriage-as-they-age/
[2] http://madamenoire.com/285117/do-men-feel-the-pressure-of-marriage-as-they-age/
[3] https://www.reddit.com/domain/gynocentrism.com/
[4] http://www.theguardian.com/money/2014/feb/11/millennials-feel-high-cost-dating-valentine
[5] https://dontmarry.wordpress.com/
[6] http://legacy.fordham.edu/campus_resources/enewsroom/archives/archive_2501.asp
[7] http://www.familyshare.com/parenting/mens-roles-in-a-family-as-provider-and-protector-honoring-and-serving-your-family
[8] http://money.cnn.com/2015/03/12/pf/planning-for-wedding-costs/
[9] http://money.cnn.com/2014/08/18/pf/child-cost/

[10] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2014/08/18/cost-of-raising-a-child_n_5688179.html
[11] http://www.mgtow.com/shaming-tactics/ [Link dead]
[12] http://ncfm.org/2014/11/news/discrimination-news/against-men-news/ncfm-supporter-timothy-patten-are-men-winning-the-battle-of-the-sexes/ [Link dead]
[13] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/owning-pink/201408/women-please-stop-shaming-men
[14] http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/foreigners/2009/06/the_herbivores_dilemma.html
[15] https://rmaxgenactivepua.wordpress.com/2013/07/02/the-marriage-strike-hitting-women-hard/
[16] http://gynocentrism.com/

MGTOW now an LGBTQIA category… and there's nothing you can do about it

Peter Wright · 11 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The headline is likely to provoke an emotional reaction from both the woke and the virulently anti-woke, but I stride forth with my flack jacket on in order to make a salient point: that far from being a fringe group of misogynistic terrorists who refuse to court the ladies, MGTOW is perfectly aligned with the LGBTQIA category 'Aromantic' – a term indicating a profound disinterest in romantic love.

When it comes to romantic love they simply don't want it.

I was surprised to learn that the 'A' in LGBTQIA can mean either asexual or aromantic, as described in the following LGBTQIA Wiki Fandom definition:

> Aromantic, often shortened to aro, describes people who do not experience romantic attraction. One of the meanings of the A in LGBTQIA+ is Aromantic.[1] Aromanticism may involve forms of attraction that are not necessarily romantic, or interests in relationships that are intimate in other ways. There is no singular experience of aromanticism.[3]
>
> The aromantic spectrum, also known as "aro-spec", ranges from aromantic to alloromantic, the latter referring to people who regularly and consistently experience romantic attraction.[1] People within the aromantic spectrum are part of a community that has much in common. They may use the label aromantic as a close fit for their experiences or use other labels that further describe them.

Men Going Their Own Way are unmoved by the fantasy of romantic love, viewing its latent BDSM overtones as a theatre of female dominatrixes and male subs, a model that has grown from a kind of sexual feudalism instituted by affluent ladies of the medieval era. MGTOW typically reject this model because it requires men to go down on a literal and proverbial knee before a woman.

I should add, for the slow of mind, that MGTOW is concerned with a wider array of issues than this. However, the romance problem forms a molten core around which many of their concerns for male self-determination revolve.

The result of 'Men going their aromantic way' is in some ways striking. These men have inaugurated an enduring sex strike, putting quietly into practice what women routinely threaten if they don't get their own way – as we recently saw from Joy Behar who called for 'sex strike' after Supreme Court abortion law leak. As usual it seems men have beaten women to the punch:

As this graph demonstrates, young men are driving a decline in sex. Perhaps more accurately they may be rejecting the pathological contamination of sexual intimacy with romantic love – aka, the idea that men need to demonstrate obeisance and servitude toward "romantic" partners before being "rewarded" with sex.

The sex slump is not sufficiently explained by labeling reluctant men as 'involuntary celibates,' because the yearly baseline for numbers of incels has blown out. A more plausible explanation is that men of the West are becoming increasingly aromantic – much as they did en masse in Japan with the rise of grass eaters. This is certainly true of the growing numbers of MGTOW, who may be interested in other kinds of sex and relationship (casual relationships, intimate friendships, non-romantic intimate partnerships, relationships of peers, etc) but who are no longer moved by the false fairy-tale of romance.

Far from being a fringe group that warrants deplatforming, men going their aromantic way deserve to be embraced as a speshul minority, deserving of special rights and protections afforded to every other vulnerable demographic. Is it not true that MGTOW are bullied, harassed and treated with extreme bigotry? That should qualify them for special protections and considerations under the law.

MGTOW probably won't be entering a Pride float anytime soon, but in theory their cause is every bit as deserving under the umbrella of that one, powerful word – AROMANTIC.

Lecture 6: Old Wine, New Bottles

Adam Kostakis · 12 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Portuguese.

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the sixth of twelve lectures. – PW

> Whatever crushes individuality is despotism, by whatever name it may be called. – J. S. Mill

So much of feminist analysis revolves around this concept. A man who punches his wife is not just angry at her; he is attempting to dominate her. A man who disagrees with a woman and talks over her is not just being rude; he is trying to dominate her. A rapist is not really that bothered about sex; his crime is a display of power, he just wanted to dominate the woman.

You see, the fact that these things happen at all is not enough for the male-bashers of the world; they shall forever require more grist for the misandric mill. Punishing actual criminals is one thing, but it's simply not gratifying enough to leave it there – they need to articulate what their womyn's intuition has always told them, and go on the attack against all men. The problem, of course, is that the overwhelming majority of men don't attack women in any perceptible way whatsoever. The solution, as feminists found, is to play Dr. Freud and posit some subconscious, underlying motivation – a dark, sexual, deviant, violent mentality, which acts as a universal explanation for male behavior.

You see, even when men are not actually engaging in criminal acts, the criminality is still there, it is just latent – so the feminists would have us believe. The idea that all men possess an inherent, latent evil, and that women do not, serves as a useful cover for all sexist hate speech against men. We find it at work in senseless diatribes against a non-falsifiable "rape culture," in campaigns to prohibit the private consumption of pornography, and in apologia for malicious women who falsely accuse men of sex crimes. Consider this statement from Mary Koss: "rape represents an extreme behavior but one that is on a continuum with normal male behavior within the culture."

Inherent male deviancy, so they say (or imply), manifests as a continuum of dysfunctional maleness, covering everything from a simple verbal disagreement, all the way up to the murder of a spouse. All male actions which do not contribute towards the feminist project – increasing the power of women – are to be taken as evidence of an innately flawed masculinity which seeks, above all, to dominate the fair sex.

Put it this way. Would you say that being murdered helps to increase a woman's power?

No?

Well, what about losing a verbal sparring match – does this help to increase her power? Or doesn't it? It certainly seems that one will have greater autonomy if she can more easily convince others that her view is correct.

So, if both of the above examples exist on a continuum of women losing power, the corollary of which is patriarchal domination, then of course men are to blame. That is, if our analysis is based in dubious, feministic assumptions.

The concept of domination, so taken for granted in its present manifestation, is a supreme example of the linguistic shifting I have discussed previously. As a term, it carries ideological contraband, concealed in an overcoat of righteousness. Originally, the term domination, which has its root in the Latin dominus, referred specifically to the power exercised by a master over slaves. Like so many other terms that feminists have seized upon in order to manipulate perceptions of reality, domination has become an object of semantic bleaching.

What is really interesting about all this, is that our new concept of domination – as unjust hierarchy, to be opposed and attacked – has been put to use in a specific direction: as a sponsor for true despotism. The single most obvious red flag marking the road to despotic rule is the encroachment of the public sphere into the private lives of individuals. Despotism is precisely the type of unjust hierarchy with which we identify domination; yet if the latter term is broadened sufficiently, to encompass all areas of private life, then a crushing and brutal dictatorship is the inevitable result.

This is the context in which we should understand the feminist slogan which has had the most staying power: the personal is political. Note that (according to the slogan), the personal is not only a matter of interest to the political; it does not form part of the political; it is not of equivalent importance to the political. It actually is the political.

The two terms are presented as though they are identical, interchangeable.

The personal is political.

If this is true, then there does not exist the smallest space of privacy which is a matter for the individual alone – that is, over which the individual is sovereign. It is true enough that a private life worth anything would not be possible without an overarching public structure – it is law which protects all the liberties that make private lives and interests possible. To use J. F. Stephen's favorite analogy, law is the pipe through which the waters of liberty flow. It is when public life – the state – fails to recognize its own limits that society becomes threatened by despotic rule.

Intellectuals of all ages have come up with the most ingenious of reasons for why it is that their mode of thought is superior to all that passed before. The majority of people have simply assumed this without the need for justification whatsoever. What is peculiarly modern is the construction of artificial boundaries between our own time and epochs past. We do not, for instance, consider ourselves to be living on the same historical plane as those of Medieval Europe, let alone of Ancient Greece. These are times inexplicable and inaccessible to us. It is a seductive fantasy by which we explain away any fears conjured up by the horrors of history books. We like to believe that bloody autocracies will confine themselves safely to those pages, and that such things could not happen here, not now; not in real life. Surely, we have moved beyond all that. We are Enlightened, unlike the human beings that existed before us.

But are we not on the same historical plane that gave rise to Soviet Communism and the Nazi party? These particular reigns of terror occurred within the last century, no matter how much we might like to think of ourselves as having progressed beyond such barbarism. Supposedly, we in the Western world abhor totalitarian regimes; and yet the rise of the two mentioned previously is indicative of a trend existing within our political culture. Among the baggage we have inherited from the Enlightenment is the concept of utopia. The term was coined in the 16th century, and it designated, for the first time, the notion of a perfect socio-political order. With the birth of this idea, the seeds were sown for the cleansing of human impediments as an operationalized political program.

Prior to the Enlightenment, human life was mostly assumed to be cyclical. As surely as the sun would rise in the morning and set once more in the evening, so great powers would rise and fall, only for new ones to take their place. Such was the science of Polybius, whose historical works did not arrange events in chronological order, but presented human experience as a unity. Dynasties, empires, cultures, people and their communities lived and died in the swings of the cosmic pendulum.

One of the major conceptual innovations of modernity is progress as the guiding ideal in politics and society. Not only do we assume that we are constantly on the move away from our own history; the belief persists that it is only a matter of time before each problem yields to a solution. Faith in human knowledge has never been so great as in the Information Age; we actively seek to overcome what were long considered intractable facts of life.

The purpose of this digression is not to cast doubt over the possibilities for human knowledge, nor to suggest that an attempt to improve the human condition is an ignoble pursuit. It is to point out that we are all children of the Enlightenment, no matter where we fall on the political spectrum. It is to point out that there are certain peculiar assumptions which form the base and scaffolding of Western political thought, and it is upon these assumptions that ideologies as diverse as conservatism, liberalism, National Socialism and feminism are built.

The -ism itself is an altogether modern phenomenon. An -ism (or we might say, an 'ideology') assumes a difference between how society is and how it ought to be, predicated upon a specific moral view of the world. This is obviously true for those ideologies explicitly advocating change – liberalism, socialism, feminism, and so on. It is just as true for conservatism and traditionalism, ideologies which (as they see it) aim to resuscitate the baby that has been thrown out with the bathwater of the ages.

Typically, that which ideologues find so objectionable about the world is its existing configuration of power. The great texts and speakers of the ideology describe a configuration of power, argue for its recognition as injustice, and then present the means for achieving the desired change. The means may involve working through the existing institutions of state, or they may necessitate their overthrow, or they may shun mainstream practices altogether and advocate working their magic through civil society.

Whatever the ideology implies in practice, this is a marked difference from what went before. Progress, not recurrence, is at root of all political expectation. Whether this is progress towards the classless society, or ethnic purity, or the return of traditional virtues, progress is the constant. The view that something is wrong and something needs to be done about this, as a political statement, is a recent invention, one which defines our shared political culture. Conservatives are caught up in the same 'progressive' web, but then, so too are iconoclasts, who signal their compliance with conventional modes of thought even as they state their intentions to break away. The more they struggle against this inevitability, the more stuck they find themselves. To take a relevant example, feminists have sometimes declared that they are moving away from 'patriarchal' assumptions altogether, and building up their own worldview from scratch, quite untainted by male influence. In truth, nobody starts from scratch, and feminism remains deeply embedded in modes of thought which have evolved over centuries, exclusively through the minds of men. The feminist ideology, and all of its innovations, simply could not occurred without centuries of work by men beforehand.

Next week's lecture shall take a closer look at the feminist assertion that the personal is political, and the hidden implications contained within this catch phrase. In the weeks that follow, we will consider the concept of utopia, which has been mentioned only in passing here. A brief comment here will suffice: utopia is the logical extension of progress, in that it is the end of all progress, the final stage of human existence. It is a profoundly dangerous idea, one responsible for the most oppressive regimes and bloody revolutions the world has ever known. While personal power and glory may have been the motivating force behind the actions of despotic individuals still in recent memory, it was a collective, utopian vision that aroused their followers to make manifest the most violent of fantasies. In all cases where utopians grip the reigns of power, the human beings which do not fit into their vision of a new world order are treated as the living garbage of a faded regime.

It is with disgust and horror that the West looks back at the utopian despots of the twentieth century, and yet these particular despotisms correspond to a tendency that forms the infrastructure of our own politics. The disgust and horror is real enough, though, and perhaps the most truly progressive shift in recent times is the rejection of extremism, in all its forms, by populations determined to leave behind the century of genocide.

Only, it's not that simple. You can pull up the heads, and tear the stalks clean from the earth, but unless you dig out the roots, you will find those flowers in bloom again before long. Utopianism, with the cleansing of human impediments that it always implies, is coded into our political DNA. Widespread detestation of the recent, failed totalitarianisms will not make this go away; it can only make the despotic tendency fall quiet for a little while. A new despotism can only emerge if it does so silently, in disguise as something quite different – perhaps as organized opposition to certain forms of unjust domination, the solution for which is always to increase the power of the state relative to the autonomy of the individual.

The personal is political, say the feminists.

I can hear the goosesteps getting closer.

Adam

What We're Up Against

Andrew MacDonald · 13 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Culture and our world are gynocentric, women centred. It sounds crazily counterintuitive but I hope to show you why it is so and why it's life-serving, loving, and valuable to know it. Gynocentrism refers to a deep biological imperative for men to serve women. Men submit to this willingly and overwhelmingly.

But why, why would we do that?

Because it's nature's way of ensuring the survival of the species. Men and women prioritize woman's health and well-being in order to bring up children. We don't do this knowingly perhaps, or consciously. But instinctually, at an unconscious level, we do.

Our own inner drive is to be loved and approved of by women. Most men do everything and often anything for this. For example we willingly fight and die for our families. The compulsion even supersedes the instinct for survival.

Men are the way they are and women are the way they are in obedience to the deep need to establish a loving pair-bond with the opposite sex. It's the foundation of culture. Since ancient times, the roles of women and men evolved to complement each other for the success of the family. Bodily and psychically, men are the way they are because of their relationship to women. Women are the way they are because of their relation to men.

The key to understanding men is that, with rare exceptions the successful contract between women and men is a critical pillar of our identity. The other critical pillar is our skill in the world, the ability to shape and make things.

Traditionally men and women each had a place of respect and value in the world. They also had a balance in the inner world of the psyche. Between the two, amid love and pain, a current of energy continually flowed. There was a rough and dynamic equality with each sex's light and dark sides acknowledged.

It'll be no surprise to know that the man-woman contract has suffered a serious blow over the last several generations.

Why a serious blow?

Boiled down to its essence, it's this: The vital need for the male contribution disappeared because survival needs for women could be met without men. The pill meant that sex didn't necessarily mean a family. As Warren Farrell has pointed out in depth, women's survival needs were being met so they began to look for fulfillment while men continued working.. Men were apparently superfluous. A famous saying from the 70s was that a woman needed a man like a fish needed a bicycle.

The dynamic equilibrium between women and men ruptured. And this changed everything for men and for women. It may end up changing things for fish.

Without the context of woman and family and the resulting worth, men's sense of identity and self-worth weakened profoundly. Women assumed an ascendancy and men a fallen state, both in his sense of self and outside in the world. This imbalance quickly became institutionalized. It pervades government, all levels of education, official journalism and everyday speech. Successive generations of men and women have been born into this now imbalance and know nothing else.

The Consequences of Men's Fall

The weight of this imbalance is felt by all men, but different men experience it differently. There are at least three different ways we respond. Men who are still able to be valued and useful to women do so and keep the traditional role alive. Today these are generally high achieving men, high income or otherwise recognized.

Another group of men are those who have been wounded in the sexual arena. They don't see a winning role for themselves as married men or committed partners. A third group are in the middle. No one can say how many men fall into each of these three camps; there can be no statistics or science since these categories aren't socially visible or recognized. A rough guess is that a third of men are available for a dedicated and trusting relationship with their partners and another third are resolutely averse. A third group swings between the two in turmoil, shaking and uncertain what to think.

Men continue to want women's love and approval. But there's a strong disincentive for committing. Women have a trump card in that the state will back her up in multiple ways – and even reward her – if she wants out. One result of this is that in today's legal climate, if a man continues in the husband role he does so at the woman's discretion. Not every woman will use her trump card, but courts and protocols are in place so that, as men's rights activist Karen Straughan says, if she chooses to, any woman can.

Most men have little awareness of the dynamics involved. The sense of obligation we feel to find our value through approval from women is intense and mostly below consciousness where it can't be worked on. Breaking out of it, is emotionally painful. It may be the hardest thing he'll ever do. It upsets a profound instinctual impulse to find identify through being loved for a role, rather than for himself.

Many men have some conceptual knowledge of this. But that won't support them in the love battle. He'll be tempted to give himself up. Coaches and therapists often can't help because speaking to the imbalance can swiftly result in their unemployment and ruined reputation. The gynocentric impulse is deeply guarded and few can see it clearly.

There's a battle afoot. The future is to wake up from this and take our place. First as individual men and then as a community. We'll do it, but it's going to take everything we've got.

Gynocentrism: The Real Gender Cult

Vernon Meigs · 14 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Post Separation: Property Rights and Wrongs

Elizabeth Hobson · 15 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Good afternoon everybody, and thank you for joining me in the 'Divorce Capital of the World' to discuss post-separation property division. I imagine that an economic approach to answering the problems that I have no doubt people of your calibre are well aware of may seem either dry – or gross. Dry – because we have, as a civilisation, accepted a degraded, perfunctory and narrow concept of economics, lacking in moral imagination. Gross – because we all know that the victims of separation who need protection are the children who are denied access to loving parents, and that loving parents who have to struggle in the hopes of being granted the 'right' to parent their children will willingly expend any and all money they can in their battles to do so.

I do believe though, economic justice would naturally defend family justice (if it mitigates animosity and removes incentive to minimise an-other parents time with children).

Raising children requires the taking of responsibility. From our days on the African Savanna (and way beyond – right up until reliable birth control became readily available), men and women took responsibility for children through a division of labour, all but universally. We are technically past that! But our instincts, in addition to the lobbying of special interest groups (including those who weaponise gynocentrism, and those who profit from the tragic mess we're in) are preventing us from adapting to current conditions.

DISCLAIMER: I'm not necessarily concerned about the divorce rate in terms of total numbers in our society – but what I do find troubling is the disparity in the rates of men and women initiating divorce. The disparity suggests to me that men and women have different, often conflicting, systemically granted, incentives and/or disincentives to pursue divorce. I cannot believe that there is such a disparate ratio of unsuitable husbands as compared to wives! I would probably feel more comfortable if the overall rate remained the same but with fewer women initiating divorce – and more men initiating divorce!

One reason that I'm not worried about the total number of divorces is that I don't think it's so unusual. Many hunter gatherer societies have been and continue to be serially monogamous, just like we are. I was once told by a friend that our modern day divorce rate is proportional to typical rates in hunter gatherer societies. I've never found conclusive evidence for that claim – if anyone can confirm or deny that, I'd be very happy to hear! But the prevailing pattern of serial monogamy is absolutely there.

Regarding somewhat more recent history, there is a book by Maria Nicolaou called 'Divorced, Beheaded, Sold.' In which the author argues that, during the period between 1500 & 1847 (precisely – so I for one have zero clue what was going down in 1848, please don't ask me about that), there is substantial evidence that divorce was a constant feature of British society, that there were ways to end marriages and that it was often generally tolerated.

I would argue that the rise in divorce numbers (that we can see has been happening since the 1960s) is – at worst – an inevitable side-effect of otherwise generally positive development trends and – at best – that it presents opportunities for greater human happiness (with people empowered to move on from relationships that are not optimal). Barriers to the best-case scenario being: the unscrupulous behaviour and unnecessary conflict that our present approach to dividing property post-separation encourages – and the impact of these negative behaviours on wider family members (including children). It also happens to be a system that perversely punishes productivity which is a problem for society at large.

In 21st Century U.K., sentimental ideas of women's inferior abilities to provide for themselves and men's responsibilities to provide for women are upholding morally repugnant (and socially dysfunctional) legal standards of property division, post separation. There is currently:

1. No cap on the amount of capital or value of assets that can be awarded in a divorce settlement,
2. No time limit on how long payments to maintain a former spouse "in the condition to which they've become accustomed" can last,

3. No time limits within which former spouses can apply for financial settlements,
4. And prenuptial agreements are non-binding, in the U.K.

There is, is a concept of 50/50 splits in marital assets (which are inclusive of any assets accrued by either party during the marriage) … But this is typically disregarded anyway, when there are children involved (who typically find themselves living with their mother after their parents separate by the way).

Evidence from China, however, shows that there is another way: their 2011 interpretation of their Marriage Law revolutionised the way in which property is divided there, post-separation. Previously very much akin to current U.K. law, in China today, assets belong to the purchasing party (or in the case of immovable objects purchased by parents as a gift, eg.; assets belong to the party in whoever's name they're registered in), essentially.

Despite concerns that women would suffer as a result of these changes, after a short dip in women's reported well-being post-separation immediately after the changes came into being, the adverse effects for women have weakened as people have adapted to new conditions. Disputes have been minimised, an incentive has been removed for the practice of 'marrying for money' and (God willing) women have been gifted a more noble incentive: to become the strong, independent creatures that we are capable of becoming!

But it's if and how this helps children that is the real moral question. And I think that's easily answered with another question: which parental provision is most important for children? Money? Or time?

There are people out there who like to paint pictures of non-resident parents as irresponsible. I believe that irresponsible non-resident parents are RARE. Human beings have a long evolutionary history of heavy investment in our offspring. We are hardwired to be motivated to prioritise our children's needs, for a remarkably extended period as compared to most mammals. All we need to be is: free to do so. Right now, perverse incentives encourage some separated parents to deny their ex-partners the opportunity to provide their children with what they really need (co-parenting).

Perverse economic incentives. It is a collective failure to protect children's interests that allows resident parents to appropriate money and property from non-resident parents, in order that resident parents might relinquish responsibility for their children's financial provision.

It is also a collective failure to protect collective interests that punishes productive people by forcibly redistributing their wealth to ex-partners. We run the risk here of discouraging diligence in our population. That's a virtue that we weaken at our collective peril!

Obviously, it's not good enough only to reject child maintenance awards in divorce orders, as standard, if the state is ready to redistribute the money of tax payers to fund the lifestyles of single parents-by choice. There are also a lot of working-class children whose resident parents maintain sole custody – not so that they can stay home while their ex earns necessarily, but – in order to maximise their eligibility for welfare benefits. Those children should not be forgotten. The U.K. was the first state to ratify the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1951, including Article 16.3:

> "The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State."

If a state branch could potentially be funding the destruction of families, I believe we have a legal (never mind moral) obligation to exercise preventative measures. That might involve viewing claims in more detail, obliging the state to ascertain why it is that one parent has sole custody before awarding benefits on that basis. It might involve the state denying awards on that basis where it is found that a non-resident parent is willing and able to care for the children involved more so than he or she does but is being denied the opportunity by a resident parent.

I hope that it goes without saying here that the family court reform that should never have become necessary – that allegations of unfitness for parenting need to be judged to a standard 'beyond reasonable doubt' rather than the 'preponderance of evidence' (or 51% wins out) standard that outrageously passes for justice within family courts today – needs to happen with urgency. The same would need to be true wherever the state was to arbitrate a question of whether one parent should be entitled to full benefits on account of being solely able to raise children. The obligation to protect the family might even involve a more generalised reduction in benefits entitlements (to make refusal to work less attractive), which would leave some children poorer.

Is that a bad thing?

It feels bad, right?

But in the words of Jiminy Cricket:

> "the right things may seem wrong, sometimes, or sometimes, the wrong things may be right at the wrong time, or vice versa."

I turn to the work of a highly moral economist, Thomas Sowell. In his empirical research, he has repeatedly found no causal link between transferences of wealth and positive outcomes for children who are supposedly intended to benefit from these transferences. In fact, he talks rather of a preponderance of negative outcomes – when the incentive to develop personal human capital (ie. the ability to create wealth) is mitigated. In a 2016 discussion published by the Hoover Institution, he even suggests that "the pain of poverty" is a useful motivator for individual self-development. Making relative poverty more comfortable (particularly in a society wherein 'the poor' have smart phones, flat screen TVs and obesity problems) does not ameliorate relative poverty – it only increases the intransigence of the problem.

In Sowell's book, 'Black Rednecks and White Liberals', he explores 'Black Education – Achievements, Myths and Tragedies'. One relevant myth he debunks is the idea that being born into the working class is a death knell for prospects of success. He highlights the incredible history of Washington DC's Dunbar High School. Dunbar was known as the states' one academic high school for black students. Reflecting on the consistently outstanding academic achievements that the school maintained between the 1890s and the early 1950s, 1970s academics were quick to insist that the students in attendance during that period were middle class. Taking the academic year 1892–93, of the known occupations of Dunbars' parents, there were 51 laborers, 25 messengers, 12 janitors, and 1 doctor! The single academic high school for blacks in the District of Columbia at the time,

> "as late as 1948, one-third of all black youngsters attending high school in Washington attended Dunbar High School. "If we took only the children of doctors and lawyers," a former Dunbar principal asked, "how could we have had 1400 black students at one time?" Over the entire 85-year history of academic success in this school, from 1870 to 1955, most of its graduates went on to higher education. This was very unusual for either black or white high school graduates during that era. At one time, the reputation of graduates from this school who did not test entrants was such that they did not have to take entrance examinations to be admitted to Dartmouth, Harvard and some other selective universities."

Dunbar provided a remarkable foundation for the betterment of students who were lacking in economic privilege in their day, never mind as compared to ours, bringing to the U.S.: the first black federal judge, the first black general, the first black Cabinet member, the first black senator elected since Reconstruction and, among many other notables, the doctor who pioneered the use of blood plasma, the historian Carter G. Woodson, author and poet Sterling Brown, and Duke Ellington, who studied music at Dunbar.

> "During World War II, when black military officers were rare, there were among this school's graduates "many captains and lieutenants, nearly a score of majors, nine colonels and lieutenant colonels, and one brigadier > general".

Sowell suggests that Dunbar was not alone, that many schools entirely or predominantly attended by economically underprivileged students in the U.S. have nurtured impressive outcomes. He recalls a visit to Albany Avenue School during the 1970s:

> "Inside those classrooms were black children much like children you can find in any ghetto across the country. Many came from broken homes and were on welfare. Yet, inside this school, they spoke in grammatical English, in complete sentences, and to the point. Many of the materials they were studying were a year or more ahead of their respective grade levels."

And the capacity for young people to defy the expectation that the household income they go home to remains – in the chapter, Sowell recounts a long list of modern U.S. schools whose poor students are accomplishing seriously impressive results.

Substantial changes to systems as complex as welfare of course would need to be pursued with an adaptive cautiousness of course, by societies appropriately aware that it is significantly easier to make complex systems worse rather than better! But substantial changes are in order.

Feminist Janet Street-Porter, in a 2017 article for 'The Independent', expressed moral condemnation for current divorce law excellently when she asked:

> "[W]hy should divorce entitle a former wife to an income for life? Expecting to be supported long after any children have finished their education seems to be asking for special treatment. Yet most judges (men) seem to think that women need help, and should be allowed to live in the manner to which they had become accustomed… [M]arriage… must be treated like a simple contractual agreement, where the terms of separation, division of property and financial arrangements in the event of a breakup are included in the legal document that binds one person with another."

In Porter's estimation, the status quo that we have come to with regards to property division post-separation is "a patronising load of tosh, spouted in the name of chivalry." In my anti-feminist estimation, the misandry and gynocentrism that feminists have deliberately weaponised in their quest for control can only have served to encourage most 'judges (men)' to be more sympathetic to the pleas of divorcing wives as opposed to their husbands.

Furthermore, the 'thin gruel of rights' (as Jordan Peterson has referred to) that women in particular have been bombarded with by feminists, the opportunities that women have in cases of divorce (that have had no serious feminist pushback, for all their talk of equality) and the liberation of (relational) feminine aggression that has been championed by feminists can only pervert women's morality (which may be particularly vulnerable as a result of the emotional strains of breaking up).

However, I honestly think it is possible that we will move in the Chinese direction in the U.K., and it would not surprise me to see feminists at the barricades – prompted by the growing rate of divorce settlements that disadvantage productive women (see Adele). And, if and when that happens, I for one will cheer!

The Goal Post Episode #1 with Robert Brockway & Vernon Meigs

AVfM Video Source · 15 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Jane Austen’s Anti-Feminism – The Fiamengo File 2.0

AVfM Video Source · 17 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Emasculation Of Humor

Doug Mortimer · 18 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It's often said (or at least whispered) that women are not funny. The relative paucity of female comics (or the humorlessness of the few that are out there) is often cited as evidence, but rumor has it that there are women (feminists excluded, of course) with a sense of humor, even if they abhor the Three Stooges.

17th Century playwright Jean Racine famously said "Life is a comedy to those who think, a tragedy to those who feel." Was he saying, consciously or otherwise, that women don't do comedy because they don't think? Well, of course, he is a dead – long-dead – white male, so that's grounds for dismissal in some quarters. Yet a contemporary anecdote may illuminate the issue.

A few weeks ago I was hanging out with my next-door neighbor who has two children, a boy four years old and a girl less than a year and a half. My neighbor was lobbing whiffle balls to his son who swung at them with varying degrees of success. On one toss the kid connected and drove a line drive right back at his old man. Of course, it was a whiffle ball and it didn't hurt, but the father pretended to be injured. "Oh, you got me, son! Oh, ag-o-nee! Oh, ag-o-nee…" The little girl, who had been standing by quietly, became distressed and almost came to tears. She clearly thought her father had been hurt. Of course, he immediately abandoned the ruse and took pains to reassure her he was all right.

Well, one wonders if she will be so concerned with her father's welfare after she finds out about the patriarchy and toxic masculinity, but more to the point, does her behavior display some nascent maternal instinct, a sense of empathy that is so overpowering in human females that it renders them incapable of laughing at a human in physical pain.

Now if you're a regular guy, you know how you would react if someone you knew had been struck by a flying object and possibly injured. You would rush to his aid and ask the eternal question, "Are you all right?" After a response in the affirmative, laughter is not only permissible, it is encouraged. How many times have you heard, "Oh, that's gotta hurt!" from some sports anchor after he replays a video of a running back victimized by a particularly vicious gang-tackle or an outfielder running into the wall in pursuit of a flyball? Of course, the announcer wouldn't say that if anyone were really hurt. "Oh, that's gotta hurt" was said by no one ever after viewing the Zapruder film…with the possible exception of LBJ.

Remember the old Warren Farrell saying, "Women are human beings, men are human doings." Slapstick is decidedly physical. It has been a staple of humor since…well, since the beginning of humor. I'm no physical anthropologist, but I have no doubt that millions of years ago some protohominid hurled a fistful of feces (great name for a spaghetti western) at a cohort, scored a bullseye, and inspired whooping, hooting, and howling among the rest of the troop. Hence the invention of laughter – a scene that surely belongs in the "Dawn of Man" sequence of 2001: A Space Odyssey. Since men are human doings, their humor is often based on do-doings. With the advent of indoor plumbing, it became known as bathroom humor, which often overlaps with adolescent humor. Bodily functions are inherently humorous, and you don't have to be Beavis, Butthead, or a medical student to crack jokes about them.

Comedy, of course, has always been a staple of theater. Slapstick was a key element of British music halls as well as American vaudeville and burlesque. And one of the staples of slapstick was a pie in the face.

Perhaps the earliest proponent of pieing in the cinema was Mack Sennett, whose Keystone Studio, founded in 1912, was in incubator of numerous silent comedians. The cinema was in its infancy so the comedies were unsophisticated, to put it kindly. Sennett's shorts were largely non-stop horseplay. Psychologists agree (at least they used to) that rough-and-tumble play is more typical of boys than girls. Psychologists also agree (at least they used to) that girls excel boys in verbal skills, which put them at a disadvantage in silent films.

After sound films came along, the Three Stooges carried on the tradition of pieing. When TV took over, the king was surely Soupy Sales, who was pied thousands of times during numerous episodes of his show on local and national TV. As a contestant on "What's My Line" in 1965, he explained and demonstrated the power of pieing (sounds like the title of a self-help book) by telling a corny joke which got a tepid reaction. Then, after telling another corny joke, he got hit with a pie after the punch line, and the audience reacted like the aforementioned protohominids.

According to Wikipedia, "Pieing or a pie attack is the act of throwing a pie at a person. In pieing, the goal is usually to humiliate the victim while avoiding actual injury." So the humor is enhanced when the pieing victim is, pardon the pun, upper crust (we'll get to verbal humor later). In 1935 the Three Stooges made a short called "Hoi Polloi," in which two well-to-do men make a nature vs. nurture bet as to whether it is possible to turn imbeciles into gentlemen. The Stooges are introduced to high society with predictable results, namely, socialites getting pied. It worked so well the Stooges reworked this plot twice: "Half-Wits Holiday" (bittersweet in retrospect, as it was Curly's last appearance as a Stooge) in1947, and "Pies and Guys" in 1958.

A few years ago when security was much less stringent, there was a brief trend of poohbahs getting pied by strangers in public (the Bill Gates attack can be viewed on the internet). Today I don't think pieing would pass muster as a mostly peaceful protest, much less as an example of freedom of speech. Imagine a pie in the face of Klaus Schwab, Justin Trudeau, Mitch McConnell…oh, don't get me started! Of course, one could easily pie a cleaning lady or a ditch-digger, but why bother? The comic impact would be minimal.

Though pieing qualifies as physical humor, no one gets hurt. A pratfall is something else, as it is possible to get seriously injured. This doesn't preclude the possibility of comedy, however. As Mel Brooks once observed, "Tragedy is when I stub my toe. Comedy is when you fall into an open manhole and die." Shame on Brooks for making such an insensitive statement! Doesn't he know "manhole" is sexist and "utility hole" is the proper phrase? Well, Brooks just turned 96, so I guess we must make allowances for someone who is old enough to be Joe Biden's father.

Brooks' dictum notwithstanding, strangers will rush to assist someone who has taken a tumble in public. The greatest risk, of course, is when an elderly person falls (when you reach a certain age and go in for your annual physical, your doctor will routinely inquire if you've had any falls in the past year). By contrast, a pie in the face never killed anyone, with the possible exception of a chubby chaser getting smothered by a hair pie.

Pieing represents an undeniable loss of dignity, which is anathema to the female façade, perhaps because women spend much more time putting on their face than men do. Imagine the uproar if a commoner dared to pie Queen Elizabeth. It would be tantamount to pieing the throne itself! Hillary Clinton getting pied would be an affront to all women! Even worse would be pieing Caitlyn Jenner! An affront to trans women worldwide! Hate crime charges would not be out of the question.

After the arrival of silent comedies, some of the more inventive practitioners, notably Charlie Chaplin, Harold Lloyd (both were Sennett alumni), and Buster Keaton went far beyond pieing, utilizing intricate timing, athleticism, and acrobatics, often risking life and limb just to get audiences to bust a gut. To be fair, they often had female accomplices in their slapstick routines (Mabel Normand was a recurring accomplice in Chaplin's films). On TV Lucille Ball and Carol Burnett definitely had a flair for slapstick, as did Imogene Coca, who is largely forgotten today, though she was a mainstay of Sid Caesar's Show of Shows. Note that we are not talking about contemporary television shows. Indeed, given the plethora of obese women these days, a pratfall was never less likely to result in a broken bone. Given their dress, their dayglo hair, and their neopagan body adornment, women have never looked funnier…yet been less humorous.

Those intricate gags in silent movies didn't write themselves, and gag writers were not only invaluable (one of the best, though not a household word, was writer/director/actor Charley Chase), they were invariably men. After silent comedy yielded to sound, they were equally valuable in animated cartoons (all those classic Warner Brothers cartoons would have been unthinkable without gag man Michael Maltese). When TV became a fixture in American living rooms, Ernie Kovacs and his humor, largely based on sight gags, became a legend. This should be no surprise because psychologists also agree (at least they used to) that boys respond to visual stimulation more than females. British comic Benny Hill, whose show reveled in slapstick and scantily clad girls, surely understood this. In fact, he was so good at it, rumor had it that his show was cancelled due to its reliance on "sexist humor."

Though acrobatic troupes certainly have their share of females, one would be hard pressed to name any who became comediennes of any renown. One might think those pubescent gymnasts who become too old to perform might turn to slapstick, but no. It's just not their thing. While the female body could surely perform slapstick, the female brain isn't comfortable with it. Female humor is almost exclusively verbal. Even so, men regularly outdo women at joke-writing and telling.

A lot of male verbal humor is also visual. It paints a vivid picture in one's head. Consider gross-out jokes. Though verbal, they are based in the physical reality of the human body. Oftentimes, the effectiveness of such humor can be judged by its effect on a squeamish audience. A good punch line in a gross-out joke is as likely to inspire retching as laughter.

A lot of gross-out humor is denounced as sexist humor but in truth it should more properly be labeled anatomy humor. There are probably as many jokes out there about male anatomy as female anatomy. Such jokes, though verbal, depend on physiology. Female humor is pointedly personal but rarely physical. Female conversations revolve around relationships, as do their self-help books and their humor.

So we may well ask what is female humor? We concede that some women have a sense of humor, but do they create humor? Yes, but their brand of humor is overwhelmingly verbal. More to the point, women excel at catty humor. It is directed towards one person (usually not present). It is an offshoot of the female instinct for gossip. It is also the specialty of the male homosexual, who often outdid his female rivals. Paul Lynde, for example, was better at one-liners than any woman. On "Hollywood Squares," he was once asked, "When a man falls out of your boat and into the water, you should yell "Man overboard!" Now what should you yell if a woman falls overboard?" Without missing a beat he replied, "Full speed ahead." A woman would never say that, even if it popped into her head.

The foremost female exponent of catty humor was Joan Rivers. Almost every joke was a put-down of someone, sometimes a fictional entity, such as a low I.Q. boyfriend ("He saw a sign that said 'wet floor,' so he did!"), sometimes a real person, usually a celebrity, such as Mick Jagger ("He looks like he could French-kiss a moose.")

Another successful female comic was Phyllis Diller, who mined her fictional husband "Fang" for humor. Her combination of waspish jokes, outrageous attire, and flamboyant personality made her a big favorite with male homosexuals, which may be a corollary of being a successful comedienne. Mae West, a true original, was the template for this syndrome.

Given a good joke writer, a comedienne could have a pretty good career based solely on cattiness. As skilled as many stand-up comics are, few can get by without writers. Indeed, many comics started out as writers (e.g., Woody Allen, Mel Brooks) before they got into performing. Bob Hope relied heavily on writers for his monologues. Milton Berle, often accused of stealing jokes, maintained an enormous card file of old jokes.

Today, however, we are told that we must provide a platform for voices that have been silent heretofore. So we have not just more female comics but more female comedy writers. Could this be the reason for the slow-motion death of Saturday Night Live? "It just isn't funny anymore," is a common observation.

Well, what happens to humor when you eliminate male input? Without a good writer, the female comic has little to offer besides sarcasm and snarkiness, which is what dominates humor today, male and female alike. How can we account for this? Other than lower levels of testosterone, that is.

Well, perhaps we could blame part of it on the sedentary nature of modern life. After all, physical humor burns up calories. It takes effort. And I don't know if we have the gag writers today to conceive of complicated physical humor. In days of old, such writers were, of course, men. By embracing physical humor, they became the court jesters of Newtonian physics, which is also male-dominated. Of course, machinery was big during silent days. People worked with machines and wielded tangible tools. Today electronics trumps mechanics. You push a button and get results, but you don't actually see gears grinding, fan belts turning, or pistons pounding away. You can't come up with much physical humor in a cyberspace-dominated society.

This leads us to social media, which is blamed for many social ills…so why not the death/dearth of humor? Remember, I said gossip plays a big part in female humor. Social media is nothing more than high-tech gossip. Gossip was formerly passed from backyard to backyard, but now it travels instantly and reaches far more people. And as more and more women (and men) spend more and more time on social media, verbal humor reigns supreme. Oh, your phone may show video, but in terms of humor, the best you can do is tiresome and predictable variations of America's Funniest Home Videos. You may on occasion receive a clever meme on your phone, but words are still the reserve currency in social media.

Given the dominance of verbal humor today, we must ask how much real wit is involved? Wit has long been the province of men. It is a creative use of language, and not just a put-down, although it can be. In fact, we can turn to Dorothy Parker, a certifiable female wit, to affirm it. She once said, "There's a hell of a distance between wise-cracking and wit. Wit has truth in it; wise-cracking is simply calisthenics with words."

Parker was a member of New York's famed Algonquin Round Table of the 1920's. She matched wits with playwrights George S. Kaufman and Robert Sherwood, journalists Heywood Broun and Franklin Pierce Adams, critic Alexander Woolcott, and humorist Robert Benchley, among others.

One of Parker's best known bon mots was "Men seldom make passes at girls who wear glasses." In an era when men give the air to girls with blue hair, this sounds pretty tame. Parker's wit, however, was capable of much more, often at women's expense. For example:

> That woman speaks eighteen languages and can't say 'No' in any of them.
>
> Ducking for apples – change one letter and it's the story of my life.
>
> If all the girls attending the Yale prom were laid end to end, I wouldn't be at all surprised.
>
> I like to have a martini,
> Two at the very most.
> After three I'm under the table,
> After four I'm under the host.

A century later, still funny. Clearly, Dorothy Parker was an outlier, at home in the world of male humor. Of course, she was not above an occasional catty put-down. Famously, when informed of the death of President Calvin Coolidge (popular known as Silent Cal), she reportedly replied, "How could they tell?"

Today when almost every day brings us news of a new absurdity, outrage, or disaster, I am often reminded of her famous phrase: "What fresh hell is this?"

So while we may lament the state of humor today, and blame it on political correctness or wokeness, feminization cannot be ignored. There's plenty of room for improvement in contemporary humor, but what are the prospects?

Well, I don't foresee any upsurge in slapstick, since it requires planning, timing, and props. Stand-up humor is much cheaper…a small stage, a spotlight, a comic, and maybe a few props are all that's required, and usually all the audience gets. It is possible to create memorable humor under such Spartan conditions (Steve Martin certainly excelled at it), but it often requires intelligence to create and appreciate such humor, and the national I.Q. is certainly not on the upswing. Easier to stick to sark and snark.

Thankfully, gross-out humor is still alive and well (thank you, Adult Swim Channel), but live action slapstick is all but dead. Pie throwing is also rare to the point of extinction, and that's a shame. Mister, we could use a man like Moe Howard again.

We need not limit ourselves to contemporary humor, however. Thanks to YouTube and DVDs, it is not difficult to find examples of TV and movie humor from past eras. Only a hard-core progressive would assert that today's humor is superior.

Of course, many would say that these days we have far bigger concerns than the state of comedy, but I disagree.

Contemporary comedy is no laughing matter.

The Goal Post #2 – with Vernon Meigs & Robert Brockway

AVfM Video Source · 19 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Lecture 7: The Personal, as Contrasted to the Political

Adam Kostakis · 19 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> They prided themselves on belonging to a movement, as distinguished from a party, and a movement could not be bound by a program. – Hannah Arendt

Last week, we looked at how the concept of domination has become a justification for encroaching despotism. It should not come as a shock to attentive readers that virtually every keyword in the feminist lexicon is used in a similar way. Whether the term being discussed is misogyny or rape or patriarchy, the tendency is to broaden its meaning to cover as wide a semantic area as possible, smuggling the maximum possible ideological contraband within an overcoat of righteousness. The real-world effect of all this is to restrict male autonomy through the criminalization of men's actions. The limitless possibilities for semantic bleaching correspond to extensive prison sentences and crippling fines. The intention is to criminalize the norm. Every move that a man makes should send a shiver down his spine, should force him to look over his shoulder, with a panic-stricken expression, wondering, "what new law have I just broken?" Men are to live in a perpetual state of surveillance and presumed guilt – a panoptical existence in which they are repeatedly chastized for doing wrong. That is, according to an invasive, alien moral standard that they are invited to obey, not understand, and certainly not to question or refute.

But when the criminalized behavior falls within the domain of actions in which both men and women engage, the argument requires a corollary that it is different, and worse, when men do it. For instance, certain nasty individuals of both sexes engage in sexual harassment, but we must understand that when men do it to women, it is chalk, and when women do it to men, it is cheese. The two, we are assured, are incomparable, regardless of how a victimized man might see things – after all, even in his victimhood, he is blinkered by his privilege.

The whole fairy tale is aptly summed up in the feminist mantra, the personal is political. As was discussed last week, the proper context in which this claim should be viewed is the recent history of the Western world. Particular focus should be given to a current within our shared political culture, which has given rise to despotic government and threatens to do so again. How else are we to interpret a statement that all things within the domain of the individual are in fact the business of government? If we do not own or control those things which are personal to us, there cannot be anything to speak of that we do own or control, up to and including our lives.

But it would be a mistake to view the mantra simply as a statement of belief, i.e. that its speaker merely believes the personal to be political. All manner of people have all manner of kooky theories, and a group of people communicating their belief that all aspects of our lives are managed by the state would be about as troubling as tin foil conspiracy theorists or the Flat Earth Society. When a feminist says that the personal is political, however, she is not simply stating a belief; she is making a call to action. There are implications hidden within the phrase.

Last week's discussion involved a section on ideologies, and the progressivist assumptions at the roots of Western political culture. To recap, ideologies assume a difference between how society is and how it ought to be, predicated upon a specific moral view of the world. What this means, as far as feminist analysis is concerned, is that if the personal is not currently political, then it should be made that way. Practically all feminist innovation consists of making those things which are personal into political matters. The logical end-point is to be found where there are no strictly personal actions, no personal utterances, intentions, thoughts or beliefs; all of these, expressed publicly or privately, would be strictly political. Every decision, down to the minutiae details of everyday life, becomes a political matter for which individuals are held to account, not as individual transgressors, but as members of an oppressive class which must answer for its sins.

'The political' is another one of those essentially contested concepts – in other words, it is one of those concepts most open to abuse. It is an elusive idea, which can be grasped but never precisely pinned down – and attempts to do so are rather like trying to grab all the air in an inflatable mattress. One of the things we can say about 'the political,' is that it has not always been identified with 'the ideological' – which seems sensible enough, since 'the ideological' is a product of modernity, a relative newcomer as far as politics is concerned.

Once upon a time, 'the political' was a term which referred to Kings, Queens, courtiers and nobles, their struggles and their successions; but certainly not to doctrine. That change came about gradually, with the steady fall of religious fervor that marks modernity.

I am aware that I skate close to etymological fallacy, so let me clarify what I am arguing. I am not complaining that there is a proper meaning of terms such as 'the political' which has fallen out of fashion. I have previously acknowledged that language is forever in flux. As a corollary, I do recognize that objectively correct definitions are something of a rarity. My purpose, in highlighting linguistic change, is a correlative highlighting of social change! The one rarely undergoes a paradigm shift without bringing the other along. There is immense power in language, to not only reflect but to define the experiential world. If we want to understand how things came to be the way that they are, we should cast a searing torch beam over historic changes in vocabulary – it is here that we will find the notional germ cells that gave rise to the feminist disease.

Such as in the case of 'the political'. Today, everything controversial is reflexively considered a political matter. Whether we are discussing a person's unusual lifestyle, or a new work of art that pushes boundaries, or a website that advances an innovative worldview, we feel quite certain that what we are discussing is a political statement. The controversial, then is political; or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the unusual is political. Non-conformists of all stripes are prompted to attach some political purpose to their actions or beliefs. The effect of this very public challenge is to lock individuals into a system of pervasive control; stepping out of line makes one into a target.

And this is precisely what feminism requires – for men to stand in line, and to target those who do not. It's a lot easier to pursue the project for increasing the power of women when you can effectively gag those who stand to lose the most from its success.

The flip side to all this is women's exponentially increasing and 'compensatory' license. It is men alone whose private lives are to be locked into the system of public control; women, in contrast, are to enjoy the spoils of victory in a new era of female sexual anarchism. Perhaps the only consolation we can realistically take is that despotisms are great generators of spiritual enlightenment among the oppressed. It was the persecution of early Christians that drove pious men and women to live alone in the desert, in imitation of Jesus Christ – it was only in the fifth century that these monastics were co-opted into the Church, having sought a purely ascetic existence as an alternative to the material world that had driven them out. Similarly, the oppressive regimes of the Hellenistic period led many in the Greek city-states to embrace mystical philosophies which advocated turning away from the world. Given that we are well on our way towards feminist despotism, it is not surprising that a parallel development is fledgling, in the form of the Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) movement. MGTOW have rejected the Gynocentric demand that men must define themselves according to their sexual prowess. Accordingly unburdened, many MGTOW have taken up introspective deliberation on the nature of man and masculinity – discussions which are androcentric and therefore not accountable to feminist orthodoxy. At its core, the MGTOW movement turns away from the world – from marriage, children, self-sacrificing employment, even relationships with women altogether – seeking solace from hostile agents as did the ascetics and mystics of the ancient world.

Although I endorse the MGTOW lifestyle, I am conscious that it is not enough – for fulfillment or for survival. Feminism is simply not in the business of leaving men alone. It is a progressivist ideology, which means it just keeps on growing, with no internal checks on its own activities; it has no brakes! All attempted self-criticism yields to further radicalization. Unable to perceive the world from outside of the feminist bubble, its disciples think and act in an anti-contextual, abstract fashion. The only checks on the activities of such ideologies must come from the outside – i.e., from the rest of society. If feminism will not slow down and stop of its own accord, then external agents must build a brick wall in its path. This is a moral requirement – the alternative is to allow it free reign, in which case we will inevitably end up with despotism. Thus far, feminism has proved remarkably socio-dynamic, and has faced very little political resistance – meaning that the velocity of persecution is set to increase.

I should like to clarify. The word 'feminism' can refer to more than one thing. Most obviously, feminism the movement is the not precisely the same thing as feminism the ideology; rather, the former is driven by the dictates of the latter. Feminism the ideology is a victim ideology, which means that it exists in defense of a certain class of people which has been designated as the victims. The dual objectives goals of a victim ideology are, as I have remarked previously:

(1) To equalize with the 'enemy' group;
(2) To forge its own 'victim identity,' separate from and unaccountable to the 'enemy' group.

If objective (1) is ever achieved, then the ideology simply ceases to be, which means that the movement also ceases to be. The movement, however, is not an inorganic entity which mechanistically fulfills the needs of the ideology. It is made up of people who have become dependent upon it, psychologically and financially. The end of inequality, however it was originally measured, would spell disaster for Women's Studies graduates everywhere. For instance, the inability of feminist organizations to admit that rape rates are falling and that false allegations are reaching epidemic levels is down to the losses that would be sustained by ideologues sitting in (usually empty) rape crisis centers. The ideology cannot be permitted to die – there is far too much riding on it, namely, the movement, and whatever goodies its principal actors have managed to get their paws on. As with many people, the threat of redundancy is enough to bring out a hard-line conservatism, which insists, in this case, on the existence of brand new oppressions still to be overcome. There is an awful lot of money riding on the continued perception that women are disadvantaged. Feminism is not merely a movement any more, but an industry – aptly referred to by some as the sexual grievance industry.

Should this industry crash, it would leave a hole in the purses of career feminists nearly as large as the hole it would leave between their ears. The alternative to continued state support for the overcoming of new oppressions is almost unthinkable. It would not only mean an end to men subsidizing their own persecution – it would also threaten to leave a psychic vacuum in the minds of professional feminists. Whatever would they do, should they be deprived of their blood money?

The feminists do, of course, have a backup plan. I refer you to objective (2). The reason why victim ideologies tend to die hard when equality or even supremacy of the 'victim' group is achieved is this: they shift their aims towards the inherent separateness of the 'victim' and 'enemy' groups, and refuse accountability to the rest of the world. Indeed, any attempt by a person external to the designated 'victim' group, to hold the members of said group accountable for their transgressions, is tarnished as the effort to roll back objective (1) – and the person who dared to raise the complaint will be called any number of amazing names.

A victim ideology is necessarily tripartite in its understanding of time. The past is identified with Oppression, the present with Struggle, and the future with Liberation. This tripartite historiography is a constant. If any one of the three states – Oppression, Struggle or Liberation – is removed, then we no longer have a victim ideology. It falls apart, owing to its inconsistency. There must have been past Oppression, as this justifies the present Struggle, which also must be the case for the present, as a matter of tautology -; what else would we be talking about?

Struggle must be towards something, and this is Liberation, promised in the future. Below is a diagram of sorts, presented from the feminist perspective:

It is a childish caricature, fitting for a childish worldview. Note what is required for the tripartite Oppression, Struggle, Liberation to make sense – the actor who did the oppressing, who must be struggled against, and from whom the designated victims shall be liberated. This is, of course, men.
The above picture is presented from the feminist perspective, in which time moves horizontally, from left to right. In the real world, time's arrow is broken. We are frozen permanently in the present phase, and from there, time moves vertically and downwards:

There is simply too much riding on feminism (i.e. the sexual grievance industry) to allow the actual liberation of women to be acknowledged. If it were to be admitted that women are not only liberated, but the recipients of a number of advantages over men, then the movement and the ideology, and thus the industry that is feminism, would become moot. Women's current role, which is perhaps more appropriately described as Privileged, is not even conceivable on feminist time. Liberation must always remain a future goal, and can never be permitted as a present achievement. Feminism is self-sustaining this way – by forever propelling itself into new Struggles. The tripartite understanding of timeis independent of context; it is fundamentally abstract and anti-contextual. The tripartite is assumed before the truth about the world at any given moment is ascertained, and the facts of the world must then be hammered out into a feminist-friendly shape.

It is of little consequence that all the great Struggles have been won. Feminists can just create new ones. And since men are (as the case must always be) the oppressors to be struggled against, it is quite justifiable to take away whatever power they still possess.
Until they possess none.
Adam

Mainstream media admits pay gap discrimination is just made up

Robert Brockway · 20 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The website news.com.au is owned by News Corp Australia, part of the so-called Murdoch Press. Feminists often claim the Murdoch Press is anti-feminist or even anti-woman. Articles such as the one discussed here paint a different picture.

On the 13th of July 2022 news.com.au published an article with the title Australia's gender pay gap nears $1b per week, with discrimination the main driver.

Under the title the article stated:

> A new report has found the key driver of Australia's massive gender pay gap is blatant discrimination, quashing the argument of career choice and children.

Well that's a bold claim. Let's see how it stands up to some scrutiny.

Notably nowhere in the article is there a link to the report they are talking about. It seems that this is the one they mean. This is the latest edition of the She's Price(d)less series of reports. See what they did there?

These reports are prepared by well known multinational corporation KPMG on behalf of the Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA) and the Diversity Council of Australia (DCA). Notably the WGEA is a statutory agency of the Federal Government of Australia. If you live in Australia then this is your tax dollars at work.

> Women are being ripped off and short-changed at work and the biggest driver of the $1 billion-a-week gender pay gap is good old-fashioned discrimination.

OK so they've reiterated the title. Now I know this is what the author, Samantha Maiden, wants to say rather than it being some over-zealous subeditor choosing a click-bait title.

> That's the conclusion that a landmark report has arrived at after breaking down for the first time the reasons why women are being paid an average of $2.55 less an hour than men.

This is actually the fourth edition of the report. They've all pretty much said the same thing. The idea is that KPMG prepares a new report every few years, largely repeating the last report, and then sends the WGEA & the DCA a big bill. Good work if you can get it.

> For years, the reasons for the pay gap in Australia have been speculated about with anecdotal claims that women taking time out of the workforce to have kids or a preference for working part-time is the reason men earn more.

She's confusing anecdote with data. Even the report she's talking about attributes the majority of the difference to factors like these.

> But the new report has found a big chunk of the pay difference has no legitimate reason.

Actually the report has found that a big chunk of the pay difference cannot be explained, which isn't even remotely the same thing.

> That's why researchers say there's no other explanation other than discrimination.

Given that this sentence is predicated on the last sentence and that the last sentence is wrong, this one is on pretty shaky ground.

> In 2020, women were paid an average of $36.89 an hour, compared to $39.44 for men – a gap that increased during the pandemic.

Stunningly, different people doing different jobs are paid different amounts.

> And while it's true that taking time off work to have children is a contributing factor, it's not the only driver of the pay gap.

Actually that isn't a significant factor anymore. The fertility rate in Australia is now 1.58 births per woman well below replacement levels at 2.1. Even women leaving the workforce to raise children full-time should only be gone for a few years.

> A breakdown of the $2.55 hourly pay gap estimates that 51 cents of the hourly pay gap could be explained by women tending to take more time away from paid work to raise children.

There you go.

> Another 27 cents up is as a result of more women working part-time and another 50 cents was attributed to different types of work favoured by women.

You're getting there. Remember how we keep talking about women's choices?

> In other words, women working in lower-paying jobs such as nursing or teachers rather than the mining industry.

That's right. Anyone paying attention will notice that research has consistently pointed out that women tend to maintain a better work-life balance than men do. This will necessarily lead to women taking lower-paying jobs. As rational actors women should have taken the highest paying jobs that otherwise satisfy their requirements.

> According to the report, 91 cents of the hourly pay gap – or 36 per cent – cannot be explained using measurable data. As a result, the report's authors to put a big chunk of the pay gap down to gender discrimination. (sic)

Well there you have it. Even the Mainstream Media is now admitting that WGEA, KPMG and the DCA are simply defining some of the unexplained component of the earnings gap as discrimination. I picked this up in the previous report in 2019 and wrote an article about it. Last time around the media didn't want to know. This time they're openly admitting it.

> The new research released today by KPMG, Diversity Council Australia (DCA), and the Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA) has found that the national pay gap is estimated at $966m per week or $51.8b per year.
>
> "Australian women are among the most educated in the world. Yet despite many years of higher educational attainment than men, and women working more than ever, the gap between women's and men's earnings hasn't significantly budged," said Lisa Annese CEO Diversity Council Australia (sic)

It's important to avoid confusing education with years of formal schooling. This discounts the value of informal education and also erroneously implies that all formal education is of equal value. It isn't. An engineering degree is worth more, to the individual and society, than a gender studies degree.

> "This latest report shows that discrimination against women remains the single biggest driver of the gender pay gap, followed by the combined impact of family, unpaid care and time out of the workforce. Women's overrepresentation in certain industries and occupations also continues to be a significant driver of the pay gap and for the first time in this series, this report includes analyses of the gender pay gap by industry and income quintiles."

[Apparently a further quote from Lisa Annese.]

The report does not show that discrimination against women remains the single biggest driver of the gender pay gap. The report states that it assumes this. That's right, the report uses the word assumes. They claim this comes from decomposition analysis of an older data set, but if that was the case then surely they would have derived or inferred the proportion of gender discrimination. They don't use either of these words – they make it clear that they simply made an assumption. This can be found in a footnote on p12 of the PDF. All readers are encouraged to check this for themselves.

> Other key pay gap drivers are caring for family and workforce participation (33 per cent) and the type of job and industry sector of employment (24 per cent).
>
> One of the biggest things companies can do to close the gender pay gap is offer greater transparency on the pay gap within organisations.
>
> That means undertaking gender pay gap audits and analysis and publishing the findings.
>
> "Actions employers can take today include undertaking gender pay gap audits and actioning findings, increasing the share of women in leadership positions, and enhancing availability and uptake of parental leave and flexible work by men and women," said Mary Wooldridge the Mary Wooldridge, Director Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA),…

We should definitely have more gender pay gap audits. These audits have often resulted in men's incomes going up alongside women's.

Several years ago I wrote an open letter to the WGEA. Not long after, they responded. In their response the WGEA pointed out that when Energy Australia conducted such an audit 350 women, and 80 men received pay adjustments.

When the British Broadcasting Corporation conducted an audit more men than women received a pay rise.

> As women progress in their careers, the shock research finds the pay gaps actually gets worse.
>
> It reveals that women at the start of their career experience a pay gap of 6 per cent but as they progress through their careers to top management levels, the pay gap increases to a high of 18 per cent among the top 20 per cent of salaried workers.

And so this article ends rather abruptly. Poorly written and edited, it is full of factual errors. Even by the standards of modern journalism I'm disappointed that an article this bad would make it on to news.com.au. The arguments made in this article are so weak it would have been better not to raise them at all.

In case news.com.au ever decide to fix or alter this article, an archived copy can be found here.

Bad Relationship: The Emptiness of the Therapeutic Alliance for Men

Dr. Douglas W. Texter · 21 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I don't like therapy. It's never worked for me. Some people would say, "That's because you haven't found the right person."

They would be right.

I haven't, and recently it dawned on me when I was reflecting about why I've never found therapy useful: I never will find that person because of the nature of therapy itself.

Across treatment modalities, therapists proclaim that the most important factor in outcomes is the strength of the therapeutic alliance or relationship.

It's exactly the therapeutic alliance that I've never been able to build. Is the reason for this lack of connection that I'm an emotional weenie, an introvert, and a misanthrope?

No, I'm an English professor.

My stock in trade consists of teaching the work of people who make a living producing emotions, either in literature or works of rhetoric. I've even produced a few pieces of fiction and non-fiction that have evoked pretty strong emotional reactions on the part of readers. I work productively each year with hundreds of students and, for the most part, enjoy teaching them. Through the course of my life, I've enjoyed many, many tight friendships. I have served as a volunteer at a Catholic Worker soup kitchen. As an alumni admissions interviewer, I've enjoyed talking with hundreds of applicants for admission to the University of Pennsylvania, my alma mater. I've also served as a reader at three Catholic Churches. I've read to crowds of over 2000.

I like people, and I'm very verbal. Some of my students and interviewees have said I'm a good conversationalist.

I try.

Yet, I've never made a connection with any therapist. And I never will.

I suspect that many men have experienced this lack of connection, and this non-bonding is the real reason why men don't seek or stay in therapy. The word on the street, of course, is that men don't want to seek help for their problems.

I don't actually believe that.

When my Fiesta makes strange noises, I motor over to the Ford Garage. Last year, when my right leg wasn't functioning very well, I limped to the office of the nearest orthopedic surgeon. When my cat began yowling and fell over, off to the emergency vet clinic we sped.

I get help when I need it. I think most men do.

The trouble is the nature of the help that therapy offers, especially to men.

In 1979, the therapist Edward Bordin described what he termed the "therapeutic alliance." Bordin opined that this relationship has three parts: agreement on the goals of treatment, agreement on the tasks, and the development of a personal bond made up of reciprocal positive feelings.

It's the third element of the therapeutic relationship that I've never really understood, the bond. While I've tried therapy a few times, I was always deeply impressed by the utter lack of bond I've had with any therapist.

Why is that?

It's that it is impossible for me to form a bond with a therapist. I think it's impossible for most men. The reason for this impossibility stems from the way I form non-romantic bonds with people outside of therapy. For me, there are several bases on which I form anything resembling a trusting relationship with someone. Those are the following: shared experience, shared values, shared sensibility, shared interests, shared sense of humor, and shared intellectual life. I haven't experienced any of these commonalities in a therapeutic session.

And I rather doubt I will.

These are exactly the qualities that are missing from any therapeutic relationship, and they always will be.

The therapeutic relationship, from what I can tell, is based on nothing but sales techniques and, ultimately, word salad. There's no depth or genuineness to it. It's precisely this lack of depth that makes it not a true connection.

If you think I'm being cynical, let's take a look at a British therapist, Mark Tyrell, who on his Youtube channel outlines ways in which a practitioner can build a therapeutic relationship.

He begins with what I will call the Big Three: Mirror, match, and lead. To his credit, Tyrell is honest about where these techniques come from: sales and marketing. They probably also have their origins in interrogation techniques, especially in what the FBI calls sympathetic interviewing.

Mirroring is using other people's words so that they perceive (and that's the key word here) that you and they are on the same page, whether you really are or not. Matching, which, as I'll explain in a moment, I've done, becomes a little spooky. With this technique, not only do you use the other person's words, you imitate his or her posture, gestures, and, if you're really on your game, even breathing patterns. Finally, once you've mirrored and matched, you're ready to take control of the interaction and lead.

All of this constitutes a relationship based on real mutuality?

Of course, it doesn't.

I know that these techniques don't really lead to anything building into a true relationship because I've used them myself fairly successfully. When I was in college and in graduate school, I earned money not by flipping burgers but by serving as both a door-to-door and phone fundraiser for non-profits such as Ralph Nader's Public Interest Research Groups, Greenpeace, Cleanwater Action, and Michael Harrington's Democratic Socialists of America.

Do you remember those annoying young people who would, clipboards in hand, knock on your door on summer nights and ask for money? I was one of them. Say what you will about the groups I've mentioned above, but one of the things they are stunningly good at is teaching 18-year-olds techniques that any interrogator would love to know. One of the first techniques we learned in training was "Mirror the door." Give the impression that you agree with them on everything. Try to imitate their speech patterns. Of course, you're mirroring after you've already done a fair bit of reading of the situation. As a canvasser, I learned to read signs that most people wouldn't think about: what kind of car was parked in the driveway? Volvos are the best. What stickers were on the bumpers? Were there windchimes on the porch? Checks and chimes go together. Did the living room have bookshelves? Readers are givers. Were there clues about occupation? Teachers and lawyers were best; physicians were the worst.

In addition to mirroring speech patterns, I was taught by one of the best fundraisers I've ever met how to match. I will never forget Lucas, a manager at Citizen Action Membership Center in Minneapolis. He and I did a role play that the interrogators at Guantanamo would have envied. I answered the fictious phone. After hearing his brief introduction, I said, "How you dooin?" Beginning to match and mirror me immediately, Lucas said, "How you dooin?" I heard him slow down to match my speaking speed. I noticed that his chest movements were matching mine. Lucas was a good teacher and fundraiser. I sat beside him on nights when he brought in thousands of dollars by mirroring, matching, and leading.

The trouble is that these three techniques are great in getting a short-term result: a check at the door or a credit card number on the phone, or, in darker circumstances, a confession. But, as I know, you're not really getting to know the other person in any real way, and are you building a relationship? Not in the least.

Indeed, I once had the experience of following behind the next year in a canvassing cycle one of the best door canvassers I had ever met: Brian. He was the sort of person who never missed quota and who would vow not to leave a person's front door without getting a check. He would mirror, match, and lead potential donors into submission.

But if you had to canvass a turf that he had done the year before, doors slammed in your face. People remembered him and not in a good way. He hadn't built a relationship with anybody; rather, he had destroyed the turf by bludgeoning people with the Big Three.

Departing from Brian on a porch in Minneapolis and returning to Mark sitting in his therapist's chair in England, I am willing to argue that the mirroring offered by therapy results in, at best, a shallow trust and, at worst, a feeling of being manipulated.

Interestingly, Tyrell offers another technique beyond the Big Three, one that he says is sure to build a solid relationship with a client. He says that a therapist can talk about the interests and experiences of the person even if the therapist doesn't share these interests. Once rapport is established through faux bonding, the therapist can lead the person.

Fake it until you make it.

Tyrell argues that to bond, all the therapist needs to do is listen to the person and just use terminology from that person's interests.

If, for example, someone is a bowler, the therapist could say that he has a technique that is right up the person's alley. If somebody is a soldier, the therapist could talk about going into battle together. This use of words seems to me to be condescending and manipulative: form without substance.

What's objectionable here is that Tyrell doesn't seem to advocate actually understanding the person; such a task might entail listening; reading; and seeking out, where possible, experiences similar to the ones engaged in by the client. In other words, the therapist would have to work at it as anybody in any normal relationship would. Tyrell, though, isn't really seeking deep mutual understanding; rather, the therapist simply wants the client to perceive that the therapist understands him or her.

Moving for a moment from therapy to my own field, as an English professor, I had to go through a fair amount of pedagogical training in my PhD program. Newbie instructors, who don't know very much about their subjects yet, are taught a range of, to be honest, rather dubious pedagogical techniques: written student self-reflection, small group discussions, and large group discussions. And of course, there's the kicker. When a student asks a question the professor doesn't know the answer to, the professor can say, "What do you think?" An instructor uses these techniques when he or she knows little about the subject under consideration. An article I read in graduate school called these techniques "clinical practices." The article contrasted these against disciplinary mastery. The article said that, in all cases, disciplinary mastery trumps clinical practice in teaching.

For example, I have taught courses on dystopian literature. I won a 25k fellowship in graduate school to write my dissertation on the subject; I read about 100 dystopian and utopian novels, and I read quite a bit of the secondary criticism. I've published several articles on the subject. Much to the amazement of my students, I can quote lines at length from both 1984 and Brave New World. I have disciplinary expertise in this sub field and don't have to resort to pedagogical parlor tricks in order to talk with students about dystopian novels.

If I'm going to allow somebody to give me advice about shaping my personal life, I'm going to want to know that person well, and I'm going to want them to know me and not just parrot back throw-away lines or faux agreement with my world views or the way I think. Such behavior doesn't build trust with me; it destroys it.

In addition to Tyrell's work on the web, there are several fascinating videos about the therapeutic relationship made by the late Jeremy Safran, a former therapist and professor at the New School of Social Research in New York. In a bit of tragic irony, Safran was murdered a few years ago by someone who broke into his house. I don't know the details, but if Safran tried, as I would have, to talk with his assailant, he failed miserably and was bludgeoned to death.

He doesn't do much better on Youtube.

In one video, Safran role plays a session in which a woman is unhappy with therapy because she feels like she's not getting anything out of it.

"I don't know. It sucks. This therapy, I'm not getting anywhere. Like it's not doing anything."

Safran makes three grunts, which I think are affirmations. He replies: "My sense is you're trying to say something but kind of gave up there."

To my way of thinking, she didn't give up. She said she's not satisfied with the service he's rendering and which she's paying for.

Safran doesn't say what I expected: "Why are you unsatisfied? Is there something you would like me to do that I'm not doing?" Both of these would be statements I would expect from any professional whom I'm paying. They're also what I would expect from a friend or partner.

She says that she's disappointed that she came to therapy and is not feeling better. Her feeling seems quite reasonable to me. If this were a real session, she would have paid by now hundreds if not thousands of dollars. When money changes hands, there's an expectation that effective service will be rendered.

Safran seems a manipulative genius here. He turns her concerns, which he never addresses, into a conversation about the woman feeling uncomfortable confronting him. He says, "Part of it sounds like you're concerned that I'm going to think you're blaming me."

Of course, she's blaming him.

She says that she "feels like I'm alone in this therapy. I've been coming here and trying, and I'm not getting anything from you."

He replies that this information sounds important. "It sounds like it's hard to say this to me. You're feeling angry at me."

He's telling her how she feels, which I have always found to be an obnoxious practice.

"I'm glad we're talking about this. We're talking about it," Safran says.
"I'm feeing a little anxious. It's better that it's out there," the woman replies.

"At least it's out there. We can go from here," Safran says.

Where I would go from here is straight out the door.

In this conversation, which has lasted five minutes, Safran has mostly engaged in mirroring and telling her what her feelings are. Before his tragic death, Safran was regarded as a leader in the field of research on the therapeutic relationship and fixing ruptures. His work is heavily cited. In other words, he was one of the best, both as a researcher and a clinician.

I would hate to see one of the worst.

My own reaction to this role play is that I would have walked out of the room after about two minutes. There was no ownership of Safran's role or professional responsibility. Indeed, I didn't even feel that he was expressing himself as a real person. He seemed really flat and offered no solutions. There was no content here at all, just mirroring.

I understand that therapists might say that I'm missing the point: that Safran was acknowledging the feelings of someone who has trouble expressing herself in relationships, that this acknowledgment is the real service that Safran was performing: hearing her.

I might argue that he's deflecting. More important, for me, the value of simply being heard is not really very high. And I expect that that's true for most men. That's nice that you hear me and that I hear you. But the questions that are far more important to me would be the following: Do we agree? What are we going to do based on the fact that we hear each other?

Don't validate my emotions; validate my parking.

I would find this mirroring almost offensive. Especially offensive is the use of "It sounds like." If you listen very carefully to what Safran is doing, he's slightly changing the subject of the conversation from his behavior and apparent professional failure to her feelings. I would find such a move smarmy and manipulative and would end the interaction almost immediately.

In an experience I had with a therapist, I told him that I wasn't happy with what he was doing and felt I was wasting my money. He replied: "I'm sorry you feel that way." In the online article from Candidly about how to apologize, Audie Metcalf writes, "If you notice that you say things like 'I'm sorry you feel that way' or 'I'm sorry if I hurt you,' congratulations, you are the reason articles like this exist. You're not there to apologize for their feelings. You're there to apologize for your own actions and words, and being thoughtful about how to express that is paramount in helping them to feel acknowledged, not belittled."

The website Drive Thru goes even further than Metcalf by saying that "I'm sorry you feel that way" is a non-apology. "When someone says, 'I'm sorry you feel that way,' it's not a real apology. Why? Well, let's parse it out. 'I'm sorry YOU feel that way,' places the blame back onto you. They're not actually sorry you feel that way. They're sorry that your emotions are causing them a problem. So, the blame is shifted back onto the receiver."

The anonymous writer at Drive Thru actually terms the use of non-apologies a form of gaslighting: "It's a way to emotionally abuse another person and victim-blame them for basically having feelings. This type of fake apology makes the receiver feel like their emotions aren't valid and that they're the one with a problem."

So far the therapeutic relationship seems to be about mirroring, matching, leading, and gaslighting.

Could it get worse?

Unfortunately, it can.

On the Youtube channel Research 4Psychotherapists, Dr. Juan Martin Gomez Penedo from Universidad de Buenos Aires identifies two kinds of ruptures: avoidance/withdrawal and confrontation. For avoidance ruptures, he recommends refocusing the client back on the conversation at hand. Slightly more serious is his recommendation for dealing with confrontation ruptures. These are ruptures that occur, as in the Safran example, because the client isn't happy with treatment or offers a criticism of the therapist.

Penedo says that psychotherapists should "communicate with the patient what we're feeling so he can empathize with what other people are feeling in interpersonal relationships." He views the rupture as an opportunity to show the patient what he's doing wrong in his other relationships. In other words, the only reason someone might object to something the therapist does is because the client is having problems in other relationships.

Is something missing here? Yes, and one commentator on the Youtube video nailed the problem down perfectly: "I find it concerning that you make no mention at all of the need for the therapist to consider their contribution or responsibility for a rupture." Penedo never offered a response to the commentor.

So, if the communicative parlor tricks don't work for me to build a relationship or bond, what does?

Precisely the things I outlined at the beginning of this essay. And because of the nature of the therapeutic relationship—except maybe in relational therapy, which has its own ideological problems—the entire encounter is boundaried so that the client learns very little about the therapist. There's no grounding for any bond.

In the remainder of this essay, I will briefly describe the ways in which all the criteria I customarily use to establish a trusting relationship are absent in therapy.

Shared experience. One of the ways I bond with people is having gone through something with them: employment, education, travel, shared volunteer work, shared recreational activities, or, in my own professional world, a shared classroom experience. If we've taken actions together, the other person and I know how we react. I also learn whether the person is worthy of my respect. I suspect that many men believe what I do. I learn about you not through your words but through your actions, the way you conduct yourself, how you spend your time, your accomplishments, and, maybe more important, your failures.

Now, one of the pioneers of therapy, Carl Rogers, said that necessary to forming the bond is unconditional positive regard. I find this prescription disingenuous. Certainly, if one is reasonably healthy, one doesn't wish ill of anyone, and one hopes that the other person does well for him or herself. In the Buddhist tradition, unconditional positive regard is called loving kindness. One of the Lam Rim exercises I use when I meditate asks me to consider everybody my kind mother. While I can do this, this technique doesn't mean that I'm going to get along with or be understood by everyone. I can feel goodwill toward somebody but not particularly want to spend any time with him or her.

Shared values. Since 2018 in the United States, it's been clear that I will never have shared values with any therapist who is a member of the APA. In that year, the American Psychological Association basically declared war on heterosexual men in their then-new treatment guidelines. The guidelines begin by saying that masculinity is socially constructed. I might argue that different expressions of it are, but some of it is biologically based: the protector-provider impulse seems to be universal for men. The guidelines say that "in Western culture, the dominant ideal of masculinity has moved from an upper-class aristocratic image to a more rugged and self-sufficient ideal (Kimmel,2012). The citation here is significant. The author is Michael Kimmel, a former sociology professor at Suny Stonybrook. A male feminist who told men that their relationships with significant others would be so very strong if men only shared in housework, Kimmel retired from teaching after being accused of sexual harassment of one of his own female graduate students.

I couldn't make up such irony if I tried.

Since I am a straight only child of two teachers who stayed together and didn't divorce, it's pretty safe to say that my masculinity is somewhat traditional. The APA guidelines say that my "traditional masculinity ideology can be viewed as the dominant 'hegemonic' form of masculinity."

I'm hegemonic?

When did I start being hegemonic? Isn't that what Vladimir Putin is? I don't feel hegemonic. If I'm hegemonic I want to live better than I do, with a castle, tanks, and an honor guard, not in a one-bedroom apartment with a cat.

The guidelines go on to say how privileged I am: "In the aggregate, males experience a greater degree of social and economic power than women or girls in a patriarchal society." These statements reek of the worst of my graduate school experience. I'm a Gen Xer; with a few exceptions, almost all of my work supervisors have been females, who make more money than I do. When I left graduate school and tried to get a job as a professor, I watched female classmates—who wrote dissertations on such scintillating topics as menstruation in Shakespeare and feminist laughter—get multiple offers. What did I write about: just George Orwell and the future of western civilization. At one school at which I served as an adjunct instructor, I was told to not bother applying for a fulltime job because they already had enough white males.

Clearly, I do not share the institutional values of the American Psychological Association. I would never trust a therapist who is instructed to see me a representative of an oppressor class. Why would I bond with anybody who sees me basically as the enemy?

The simple answer is I wouldn't.

Beyond values, if I'm forming a relationship, I look for shared interests or experience. Shared interests might indicate that the therapist and I have shared personality attributes, that he or she and I might be able to understand each other because of what we've done. My interests are wide. I teach English. I've lobbied for Amnesty International. I interview for Penn. I've flown gliders as a student pilot. I've worked for a couple of US political campaigns. I've been a literacy tutor. I've worked as both a copy editor for a major US medical publisher and a developmental editor for a major textbook publisher. I coordinated a birthday-cards to Death Row Inmates project for a local Amnesty group. I've published some fiction and essays. I've backpacked across Europe and have experienced a few war zones: Guatemala, Northern Ireland, and Yugoslavia.

The problem is that I've never really met a therapist with very wide interests or experience. And I certainly haven't met one with a sense of adventure or even with political sensibilities (and I don't mean wokism, either. I mean real politics.). Most therapists that I've met have seemed pretty bland to me. I've also met off-duty therapists at retreats. Again, most of them seem pretty blah, not people I would ever cultivate friendships with. If that's the case, then there really is no grounding for any emotional bond. My sense is that most therapists today see themselves as small business owners, not as intellectual explorers or pioneers like Carl Jung, Sigmund Freud, or Ernst Becker.

I'm just not that into them.

Finally, and I know I run the risk of sounding pretentious here, one of the ways I bond with somebody is through a shared intellectual life. I don't say this because I'm an English professor. I don't over identify with my professional role. That role will end eventually. Barring Alzheimer's, my intellectual life won't. However, since I was about 14, I've actually had what most people in the US don't really have: an intellectual life. And this intellectual life shapes me and affects how I view the world. In high school, I read social contract theory by writers like Hobbes, Locke, and Rousseau; Kant's categorical imperative; and John Rawls' Theory of Justice. In college, I started reading Harper's and the Atlantic. And I became deeply interested in the work of Paul Fussell, James Kincaid, Wendell Berry, Bill McKibben, and William Gass. Among the most recent books on my Kindle are John Taylor Gatto's Instruments of Mass Instruction, William Hartung's Prophets of War, Erich Fromm's You Shall Be as Gods, Andrew Cockburn's The Spoils of War, and Chris Lehman's Rich People Things. These aren't what I read for work or work-related writing; they're what I read for "entertainment." I've never met any therapist who has any kind of intellectual life beyond self-help books.

In conclusion, the therapeutic relationship is not one that I think is possible for me or for most men. It seems to be a relationship that is based on a smarmy Carl Rogers notion of positive regard and manipulative techniques most appropriate for financial advisors or interrogators. And, frankly, the very qualities I need to bond with someone are absent in the therapeutic relationship, which seems to me to be quite empty. Finally, in the United States at least, the values of most therapists construct me as a deeply flawed human being even before I open my mouth. That attitude is certainly not one of my values.

In the final analysis, I have say to therapy as a whole: I'm just not that into you.

Exposing the TRUTH about Medical Circumcision Informed Consent

AVfM Video Source · 21 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DcfyCpRUlFY

Hannah Wallen Interview with Vernon Meigs

Vernon Meigs · 22 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Lecture 8: Chasing Rainbows

Adam Kostakis · 24 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Equality, rightly understood as our founding fathers understood it, leads to liberty and to the emancipation of creative differences; wrongly understood, as it has been so tragically in our time, it leads first to conformity and then to despotism. – Barry Goldwater

What is it that enables us to live meaningful lives? This is a question with a long history, and after more than two thousand years of scratching our heads, our species is not much the wiser. Answers fall just as easily as they are formed. Perhaps the only real wisdom to be imparted by centuries of soul-searching is that the solution cannot be reduced to the realization of only one value. Efforts to bring about a social system based upon the realization of one value in particular – be it religious doctrine, the will of the nation, or social equality – have invariably resulted in widespread repression, and not the golden age of peace and virtue as postulated by their ideologues. In contrast, those societies which have managed to create and maintain the space for people to actually live what they might call 'meaningful lives' are those which have kept a number of values in balance. This is not a very exciting solution, but it is better to be dissatisfied with the great mysteries of life than to be enserfed or 'disappeared' by a regime in pursuit of a more enticing dictum.

Whatever the case, the argument for autonomy seems convincing – balanced, as it must be, against other values. It is difficult to see how one's life could be considered meaningful where one does not possess even the most basic rights of self-determination. On this point, I am superficially in agreement with the feminists, who have made autonomy (and not equality) their guiding principle. Of course, in their case, it is only women's autonomy that matters, and this is to be extended as far as possible. Nevertheless, we do agree that autonomy, in and of itself, is a good thing, although I would qualify my support with the corollary that it must be balanced against other values so that it does not become license.

It is the most spectacular irony, then, that so long as they remain feminists, women will never knowingly taste freedom. Feminism is a victim ideology which freezes women perpetually in Struggle; it cannot afford to indulge in Liberation, else the game is up. To continue playing, feminists must imagine that they are under the control of external forces which are responsible for every fate that befalls them. They have a name for this mass delusion: The Patriarchy. Every bad decision, every unwanted consequence, every minor inconvenience can be traced back to this mystical, mythical and invisible system of control which exerts influence over women, in much the same way that animistic tribes explained severe weather phenomena by reference to angered and vengeful deities. If feminists are to pretend that Struggle is still relevant, then it cannot be admitted that women are in control of their own actions, for this would imply that they are free moral agents. Women must be made to believe that they are delicate vessels being tossed about in an ocean storm, with navigation and steering rendered futile, and no land in sight. Perhaps we could contrast this to the MGTOW movement, which resembles a series of wooden canoes, light but durable, whose occupants paddle alone on calm seas – for the time being, at least.

Even when women are privileged beyond their wildest dreams – which is inconceivable in feminist theory – they still may not be considered free. Women are not permitted to enjoy freedom; it must be denied for the ideology to survive. It must be reiterated, until it comes to mind reflexively, that "we still live in a patriarchy," and "women are still not yet equal," and so forth. Feminism's adherents can never rest, because they will not allow themselves to. They are forever chasing rainbows.

They are mentally barricaded in, shut off from the very world that they impose their designs upon. They are forced to conceive of themselves forever Struggling, lest they become Liberated, and therefore irrelevant. As I said last week, a tripartite perception of history (past as Oppression, present as Struggle, and future as Liberation) is a constant of feminism, and this is decided upon in advance of the facts. Regardless of context, the present is Struggle, with Liberation perpetually set some way off into the future. As the proverb states, tomorrow never comes.

As I have mentioned previously, feminism is fundamentally anti-contextual, deciding upon the story in advance, and then fitting the facts around this. The process is simple. Take the key points about the given situation, and through the use of dislogic, eristic, moral relativism, symbolism, self-contradiction and dreamlike fantasy, frame the discourse as one in which women are moving from Oppression to Liberation, but will not get there without feminist Struggle.

This is not to say that feminism operates statically. The first step in the process just described is to draw in the facts from real life. If feminists did not do this, their preaching would have zero appeal to the non-feminist sector, because it would seem to have no bearing on the experiential world. Feminism is anti-contextual in the sense that the story is decided prior to the facts, but it is nevertheless dependent on the context of any particular situation. The real life context must first be experienced and understood, and only then can it be co-opted into feminist discourse. To take a clear example, feminists in the United States today do not agitate for women's right to vote. They would get nowhere if they did, because, having the vote, they have nowhere else to go (in this regard). The franchise is not now a relevant issue in the context of the real world. On the other hand, the fact that most business leaders are men will be verified by most people's experiences of the world; this, then, can be drawn into feminist discourse, as an example of Oppression.

Forgive me for being overly simplistic. It must be made clear how the process of manufacturing Struggle is playing a pivotal role in the changing nature of rights.

What is a right? As it has typically been understood, a right is a claim which, in usual circumstances, is inviolable. In other words, if I have a right, then I have some kind of claim – the permission to do something I wish to do, or to be protected from something I do not wish for – and other individuals may not deprive me of this claim. To take a clear example, I have the right not to be assaulted – other individuals are not permitted to assault me. They may do so nonetheless, in which case they have transgressed against my right; they have done what they are not permitted to do, and prevented me from doing (or avoiding) those things which I am permitted to do (or avoid). Accordingly, I am permitted to seek recompense for the violation of my right.

A theory of rights requires an enforcer, in order to prevent rights transgressions and provide recompense to those whose rights have been violated. The enforcer that we are familiar with is the state, particularly those institutions involved in the creation and practise of law: the legislature, the judiciary, the police force, and so on. It is necessary that the state possesses the monopoly on the use of force, else its rule would go unenforced, and there would be no deterrent against rights violations. In an extreme case, the citizens may rise up and overthrow a weak state, subsequently instituting their own form of justice which may be far from impartial. Max Weber famously described the state as "the monopoly of the legitimate use of force." I have left out the word 'legitimate' from my definition here, because it strikes me as an entirely subjective judgment, not to mention an inevitable one from the point of view of those in control of the state. Those who seize power and use it to persecute one section of the population will surely believe their own monopoly on the use of force to be legitimate – indeed, they will most likely believe their own use of force to be of greater legitimacy than that of the regime which they deposed, no matter how that regime conducted itself.

Note that there is no inherent limitation to the concept of rights; there is no in-built brake system. There can never be a point where we say, "now we have all the rights." There will always be potentially more rights that we could possess. That is not to say we categorically should possess more rights. The full possession of all conceivable rights would be an inconceivable license – total autonomy, in which all claims would be permitted. This would mean that the individual with license would be free to violate the rights of others. In this case, the rights of others would be meaningless whenever they encounter the licensed individual. Logically, all people cannot have total possession of all rights, because each would be permitted to infringe upon the rights of all the others – which means that nobody's rights would be secure, and the strongest individual or group would be entitled to establish arbitrary rule by physical force alone.

Clearly we need limitations, and the Constitution of the United States of America is the exemplar in this regard. As the finest statement of personal liberty and representative democracy the world has ever known, it exists to protect a number of fundamental rights from being overturned by the strongest collection of individuals – namely, the government. Laws may come and go, but so long as the constitution is upheld, the foundational rights of the individual citizen are set in stone – or, at least, are extremely difficult to remove or alter. Where a government repeatedly violates its own constitution, it (ideally, at least) runs the risk of being overthrown by an uprising of citizens, who would, together, form a stronger collective.

The United States Constitution, adopted in 1787, built upon the liberal philosophy of the time, most especially that of John Locke. Sections of the Declaration of Independence, signed eleven years previous, are more or less lifted from his Second Treatise of Government. The ideas expressed in this work are not those of the liberalism we know today; they sit somewhere closer to what we would now term libertarianism. It was only in the second half of the nineteenth century that liberalism underwent the profound transformation into the collectivist ideology we more readily associate with the term today.

In his 1859 text, On Liberty, J. S. Mill introduced a new articulation of the traditional liberal moral defence of individual rights. It runs something like this: individuals have the right to do whatever they choose, so long as this does not harm others. Mill exercised caution when considering the application of this principle: one would not be harmed, for instance, by losing in open competition (e.g. the free market). Following Tocqueville, he voiced concern that democracy, if unmoderated, could devolve into majoritarian tyranny.

We may thank the successors of Mill for the perversion of individualist liberalism into a collectivist and authoritarian philosophy. It was one small step from Mill's axiom – individuals have the right to do whatever they choose, so long as this does not harm others – to the doctrine of New Liberalism: if I cannot do what I would otherwise choose, then somebody must be harming me. It was the self-proclaimed 'liberal socialist,' Leonard Trelawny Hobhouse, who built upon Mill's premises and added a new twist: that freedom is not good in and of itself, but must be subordinated to some higher end. It follows that any freedom which is not subordinated to this higher end is not morally justified. It was the social radical Richard Henry Tawney, building on this development, who advocated an egalitarian society based on the premise that "freedom for the pike is death for the minnows" – in other words, that certain identifiable groups are not deserving of equal autonomy, but must have their share restricted. It was Lester Frank Ward who disavowed the individual altogether and argued that the state should direct all social and economic development, including the happiness of its citizens. Perhaps most tellingly of all, he was an enthusiastic supporter of the notion that women are innately superior to men. To quote an especially relevant passage:

> And now from the point of view of intellectual development itself we find her side by side, and shoulder to shoulder with him furnishing, from the very outset, far back in prehistoric, presocial, and even prehuman times, the necessary complement to his otherwise one-sided, headlong, and wayward career, without which he would soon have warped and distorted the race and rendered it incapable of the very progress which he claims exclusively to inspire. And herefore again, even in the realm of intellect, where he would fain reign supreme, she has proved herself fully his equal and is entitled to her share of whatever credit attaches to human progress hereby achieved.

The purpose of this detour into the changing nature of rights was to hone in on the historical developments that precipitated certain aspects of modern feminism. Some contributors to the Men's Rights Movement have somewhat abstractly attacked 'modernity' and 'Enlightenment values.' This is fine if they are intending to attack individual autonomy in general, but we must look more carefully if we actually want to get to the root of the problems facing men, as men, today – which, I would argue, coalesce into the deprivation of male autonomy. It is modernity, and particularly Enlightenment thought, which made individual autonomy a possibility – and it is social liberalism, and most especially feminism, which are turning it into an impossibility for men.

The innovation of social liberalism is conspicuous in the section of the Ward quote above which I have emphasized. It is entitlement; the creation of new obligations for others to fulfil; the construction of rights claims, not rights of individuals, to be held equally, but against an identified segment of the population (the 'enemy' group). Of course, every right, if it is taken seriously, demands obligations of others – if I have a right to not be assaulted, then you must not assault me, and vice versa. The difference between such a claim and the claims of New Liberalism is that the former is an obligation to inaction, while the latter is an obligation to action. My obligations to inaction mean that I cannot transgress certain boundaries – the rights of other people. I may not hurt them, steal from them, or do damage to their possessions. I am forbidden to do certain things which would interfere with the autonomy of others, but apart from that, I am free to do as I please. Obligations to action are of a different sort altogether: the one who holds me to such an obligation has the power to command me. I am told how to act, and I am forbidden to act any other way. This curtails my autonomy.

For instance, if you require some object in order to accomplish a certain project, then your autonomy is curtailed if you do not possess the object. Therefore, you have a claim to my object, presuming that I possess one. It matters not if I have earned or otherwise rightfully own my object; the theory goes that you should have it anyway. Claims of ownership and desert are subordinated to the autonomy of individuals, which translates to the wants (not needs) of specially identified 'victim' groups. If, say, I am interviewing a man and a woman for a position in my employ, and the woman demands that she be given the job as a crucial step in her career plan, I am denying her autonomy by not employing her, even if she is the least qualified candidate. She needs the position in order to achieve what she ultimately wants, and so she is wronged if she does not get it. The doctrine of New Liberalism – if I am unable to do what I would otherwise choose, then somebody must be harming me – clearly serves the victim agenda of feminism. Any limit whatsoever on the actions of women, including those introduced in the name of fairness and impartiality, can be taken as a new Oppression according to this doctrine.
'New' or 'social' liberalism is in fact the perversion and corruption of liberalism – and it finds its highest expression in the caste system of rights feminists are busy creating. Women's rights, a catch phrase once trumpeted as a progressive march towards a fairer future, has become the trump card that never loses its value, ready to be played any time a woman wants to 'get one over the guys'. In the early days, the idea of Struggle was more creditable, and even seems admirable in retrospect. Women struggled for rights which men possessed: the right to vote, the right to own property, the right to divorce, the right to the same wage as a man doing the same job. Once upon a time, it was perfectly plausible, to an unbiased observer, that feminism meant to bring about equality between the sexes. That is not to say this view is inherently correct, only that it was believable, from a point of view external to feminism, that the feminist project carried this altruistic goal.
But what are the women's rights advocated today? The right to confiscate men's money, the right to commit parental alienation, the right to commit paternity fraud, the right to equal pay for less work, the right to pay a lower tax rate, the right to mutilate men, the right to confiscate sperm, the right to murder children, the right to not be disagreed with, the right to reproductive choice and the right to make that choice for men as well. In an interesting legal paradox, some have advocated – with success – that women should have the right to not be punished for crimes at all. The eventual outcome of this is a kind of sexual feudalism, where women rule arbitrarily, and men are held in bondage, with fewer rights and far more obligations. To date, the transformation of rights into obligations to action have given us a welfare state in which, according to The Futurist, > virtually all government spending […] from Medicare to Obamacare to welfare to public sector jobs for women to the expansion of the prison population, is either a net transfer of wealth from men to women, or a byproduct of the destruction of Marriage 1.0. In either case, 'feminism' is the culprit […] Remember again that the earnings of men pays 70%-80% of all taxes.

Feminism views the independence of individual citizens as a barrier, not a safeguard. Personal autonomy hinders feminism's progress in moralizing the world and bleeding men dry for the benefit of women.
Women's rights? It's nothing but a power grab.
Adam

Lecture 9: False Consciousness & Kafka-Trapping

Adam Kostakis · 25 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Never mind whether it's Critias or Socrates who is the one refuted. Just concentrate on the argument itself, and consider what on earth will become of it if it is examined. – Socrates of Athens

It is necessary, at this point, to set aside the the thread I have been weaving, and take a detour into the deep wilderness of feminist logic. The phrase feminist logic will strike most of my readers as a misnomer – if not an oxymoron! – so let me reassure you that what I really mean is feminist attempted logic. And there is nothing logical about that, I assure you!

First, why is the use of logic so threatening to feminists? We know, assuredly, that it is – with some feminists going so far as to claim that logic is nothing but a tool of the patriarchy. Of course, this is absurd. Logical argument is, by definition, a collection of valid inferences – so it is not possible to argue against logic. To put it another way, you cannot reason against reasoning, because the very attempt to do so involves the (attempted) use of reason. The only way to attack logic without using (or attempting to use) logic would be to attack it most randomly – that is, without entailment. The argumentative points you make, in attacking logic, would have to have no relation to each other whatsoever. You could not say, for instance:

> Men use logic to defeat women in argument, therefore logic is a tool of the patriarchy because the use of "therefore" indicates a logical consequence, i.e. it indicates entailment, which is a matter of logic! This leaves the feminist with two unfavorable choices: she can state that logic is a tool of the patriarchy, without reference to premise, evidence, example, definition, and so on – without any reference, indeed, to reality; or she can accept that her own argument, because it attempts to link two propositions together on a logical basis, is itself a tool of the patriarchy – and as the proponent of the argument, so is she!

Hence, the appropriate response to the feminist argument that "logic cannot be trusted, because it is a tool of the patriarchy," is to say: "and so are you! Hey – as a patriarch, I appreciate you doing my job for me!"

But again, why is logic so threatening to feminists? Could it be that feminists are simply misguided about the nature of logic? That is doubtful. Having seen feminists defeated by logic many times, I am quite sure that they fear it because that their beliefs cannot withstand it. Like any cult, feminism does not allow its members to investigate the truth, nor does it tolerate free and open discussion of its core beliefs. Still, none of this makes a bit of difference to us – as non-feminists, there is no human authority obliging us to hold our thoughts or tongues on the matter of feminism.

Yes, feminists fear logic because it contradicts other ways of 'knowing' the world – e.g. being told what to think. They also fear that logic will discredit ideological 'truths.' Feminists want you to see the world as they say you should see it – they certainly don't want you coming to your own conclusions! Particularly not conclusions critical of feminist orthodoxy, derived, for instance, from the process of asking questions and receiving unsatisfactory answers. And yet this is precisely the outcome that feminists guarantee, when their anxieties over criticism and the consequences of open discussion cause them to react, kneejerk-fashion, with shaming tactics.

What would a discerning neutral observer think, when he hears a reasonable question answered with an attack against the interlocutor's character? Will this inspire him to adopt all tenets of the questioned set of beliefs? Is he more likely to feel threatened into submission by the shaming tactic used against the gadfly, or to feel offended by proxy at the ideologue's evasiveness and insulting manner?

Ideologues don't tend to ask themselves searching questions like these. Small wonder, then, that the word 'ideology' began life as a term of abuse. It was not until Marx and Engels wrote The German Ideology that the phrase took on the characterization we associate today with identity politics. One's ideology, they claimed, is the product of one's social position – that is, whether one is a proletariat or a bourgeois. The socialist proletariat are the possessors of the ideology which reflects truth, while the capitalist bourgeoisie possess only 'false consciousness.' It is never explained how it is known that things are this way around and not the other – i.e., why can't the bourgeoisie possess true ideology, and the proletariat be subjected to false consciousness? That question does not need to be answered, because Marxism is a closed system of thought. It is like a man who stands not on the ground, but somehow, on his own feet; any one part of Marxism stands upon the other parts of the theory, and does not depend upon the vagaries of the experiential world for support. In other words, what happens in the real world does not matter – Marxism is self-verifying. The truth which backs up its claims is located within the theory, utterly independent of any contrary evidence that can be gathered from the actual experiences of actual people.

It is much like feminism, then – being abstract and anti-contextual, deciding upon the story before the facts are known. Feminism, to feminists, requires no justification outside of itself. It is impenetrable by external argument, and thus irrefutable – because it is inherently unreasonable. That is to say, it cannot be reasoned with. It is a waste of time trying to get feminists to see sense, and every MRA soon learns that he will more easily squeeze blood from a stone. The only discourse which will make feminists sit up and change their ways is the discourse of power: and this is a discourse that must be backed by action. Anti-feminists must be comfortable with the idea of wielding power over feminists, at least enough to marginalize them into irrelevance. This is the end game. Building critical mass is how we get from here to there, but we take a step backwards every time we indulge feminists in their sophistry.

Take, for example, the feminist sophism that we are 'locked in' to a perspective determined by the sex we belong to. Any counter-feminist argument launched by a man, no matter how accurate his observations, no matter how evidenced his claims, can be dismissed on the grounds that it was made by a man. The argument goes like this: "you're only saying that because you're a man. If you weren't a man, you wouldn't have a male perspective, and so you wouldn't be saying that." The implication is that a male perspective is inherently wrong – that a man, owing to his being a man, is incapable of grasping truth. So you see, this is really the same 'false consciousness' trick as practiced by Marx and Engels and their followers – the feminist has not explained how or why it is that a woman's perspective, owing to her being a woman, is necessarily the one which yields to truth.

The 'false consciousness' trick is, ultimately, an evasion. In one dishonorable move, the feminist has sidestepped the argument itself and attacked the interlocutor – "you can't possibly be right, because you are male." For the feminist, this is enough. She considers the matter closed, and moves on. By the same undisclosed reasoning by which Marx knew that the proletariat possessed the truth, the feminist 'knows' (i.e. strongly feels) that her own ideology possesses the truth. But that undisclosed reasoning, whatever it is, does not work in reverse. The feminist is confident enough that a counter-argument, using the same tactic – "you wouldn't be saying that if you weren't a woman" – is inapplicable and impossible. The implication is that feminist women view the world objectively, whereas mere men are 'locked in' to a privileged perspective and cannot see the way things truly are. An attack on the perspective of a man, for it being a male perspective – even the identification of a perspective as peculiarly 'male' – is nothing less than a statement of female supremacy.

As for non-feminist women, they too are oppressed by 'false consciousness.' You see, when women use their own minds to decide things for themselves, they are being manipulated by the patriarchy! But when they stop thinking for themselves, and defer to feminist consciousness without question, then their minds are 'liberated!' Do you see how this works?

Now, I hate to ruin their fun by being a man who says things he wouldn't say if he wasn't a man, but there's something that doesn't quite make sense about all this. What the feminists are trying to impart is a kind of sexual determinism. That is, the notion that they are attempting to propagate is one which states that our actions and behaviors are determined according to our sex, and we have no freedom of choice in the matter. We are moral robots, hard-wired from birth to view the world in one particular way, from which we cannot deviate.

This theory would only be meaningful if it could tell us how men and women will act or think. Yet, both men and women are far less predictable than the pigeon-holers of the world would like them to be. There are, for instance, feminists who are men, MRAs who are women, and people of both sexes who buck all the trends we can imagine. Feminist sexual determinism, then, has become a useless theory; if there is any truth to it, it is limited to those aspects of human behavior that cannot be identified. It has been reduced to tautology: we will always do those things which we will always do!

It hardly needs stating that men and women are not two opposed and internally homogeneous classes of people. Feminists would very much like them to be. Indeed, feminism rests upon this faulty perception. The idea that men and women should be opposed to each other is a feminist construction, and any deviation from this is a threat to the whole feminist enterprise – hence the imperative of familial destruction. This is also why the most venomous attacks are reserved for male 'feminist allies.' That small number of men who exert the strictest self-discipline in accordance with feminist orthodoxy come under the most fire for being not feminist enough. This happens because every man who is pro-female in the slightest is a thorn in the side of feminism, just as much as the most outspoken anti-feminist woman (perhaps even moreso: in the case of feminist men, there is no equivalent to the 'false consciousness' argument used to dismiss anti-feminist women). It must be denied that feminist men could ever be feminist enough! The illusion must be maintained that men are 'the enemy' – and this means repudiating the friendly intentions of male allies. In declaring themselves feminist, those men fail to conform to feminist sexual determinism, thus contradicting feminist theory and threatening the progress of the movement as a whole. It is not so easy to paint them as atavistic brutes, and this is largely down to their own efforts to make themselves amenable – which is precisely why they receive such vitriolic scorn.

To get back on track: there is more that Marxism and feminism hold in common than the Appeal to False Consciousness. Both fit a certain template, upon which we could map any modern radical ideology. Again, it is developments in language and thought which allow for the theoretical configurations making possible social movements like feminism. Socialism was only possible once the state and the economy were conceptually distinguished – in feudal times, no distinction between the two was discernible, rendering moot the possibility of a socialist system being idealized. It was in response to the rise of capitalism, with all that this entailed – Enlightenment thought, economic individualism, free markets, free labor, an end to tax farming, the formation of the business and working classes – that Utopian socialism and (later) Marxism became possible in the realm of the imagination.

Similarly, nationalism – in its modern form, as an ideology – only became possible once society and culture were distinguished in language and thought. Our question here is, what had to be distinguished before feminism could become a possibility?

This is a question which would take a great deal of space to answer – more space than I have available here. It will suffice to say that the escalating liberties being granted to men resulted in a divergence of expectations between men and women. Reasonably enough, we might think, a small number of women began to question why the Enlightenment notion of individual freedom extended only to men. However, what is often missed is that these women began from a position of strength – they were already the beneficiaries of Gynocentric cultural codes that placed them high above men, atop pedestals. Over the coming decades, men tripped over themselves delivering whatever women demanded. It is likely that most of them sincerely believed that individual freedom should be extended to women as to men. But the very fact that Gynocentrism was already in full force meant that female supremacy was the only possible outcome of feminism. The 'equality' feminists sought was an 'equality' to do all the things men are permitted to do, and to retain their traditional advantages over men, accrued through centuries of Gynocentrism. The recipients of additional advantages are, of course, not equal at all, but privileged at the expense of all others. This was always the intention.

Despite the occasional claims of feminists that they are dispensing with all forms of male thought and creating anew, feminism slots in neatly with other radical ideologies which preceded it (and which were, of course, dreamed up by men). To take the most obvious fact about modern radical ideologies, their basis is in forms of association – Marxists oppose the proletariat to the bourgeoisie, nationalists oppose their own culture or race to a culturally or racially diverse society, and feminists oppose women to men. The key relationships, used by ideologues as total explanations for all human phenomena, correspond to the forms of association which are emphasized. For Marx, the key relationship is economic – the control of the workers by the capitalists is an economic relationship, and all else (politics, religion, culture) is mere 'superstructure' atop this 'base.' The superstructure may change, but nothing fundamental will alter unless the economic relationship of the classes is reconfigured. Similarly, for nationalists, the key relationship is cultural (or racial, if the two are differentiated). This is the 'base,' upon which everything else is built. Changes to the superficial structures on top of the 'base' (e.g. modifications to political and social institutions) are irrelevant; the only fundamental change will come about via transformations in culture and/or racial demographics.

We find the same pattern in feminism. Opposing women to men, the key relationship for feminists is, of course, sexual. It is the relationship of men to women which determines all else (politics, economics, culture, religion, and so on). The elements of the superstructure may well change, but until the domination of women by men is smashed at the base level, nothing fundamental will be achieved.

It is this belief which ultimately explains feminist attempted logic. Their attempts at rational argument are clouded by a belief in collective guilt – that all problems or inconveniences faced by women result from this base relationship (the domination of women by men), so that, as long as problems or inconveniences remain, it must be the case that men (collectively) are dominating women (collectively). It does not matter if a particular man is innocent – he is still 'the enemy,' as feminists are more than willing to admit (see: The Redstockings Manifesto). Nor does it matter if a particular woman is guilty – she is absolved in the name of collective innocence.

And on these grounds, we encounter the peculiar feminist debating tactic called Kafka-Trapping. I did not invent the term; the credit must go to Eric S. Raymond, whose original article on the subject is linked below. Nor did Eric intend the term to be used only for feminists – any member of a victim ideology can effectively Kafka-Trap their opponents. The name, Kafka-Trapping, is a reference to Franz Kafka's work The Trial, in which the protagonist is told that he is very, very guilty, although his crime is never specified; and, as he soon discovers, the only 'way out' is to admit his guilt (though he knows not what of), thus acquiescing in his own destruction.

In Eric's own words, a Kafka-Trap is:

> an unfalsifiable claim, about thoughtcrime, intended to induce guilt so the subject becomes manipulable.

The most chilling thing about this tactic is that the Kafka-Trapper declares your mind to be out of bounds to you – her judgment is a dismissal of your own opinion about your own thoughts. Think you know what you think? Think again, buddy!

Now, I shall reproduce, from Eric's blog, six models of the Kafka-Trap which feminists will use against you. Learn them. Know them. Recognize them for what they are: nothing more than ad hominem evasions. Calling out the tactic, as a Kafka-Trap, is sufficient for its refutation.

> (Note: in the following examples, I have used the terms 'sexist' and 'sexism' but these may be replaced by 'misogyny,' 'woman-hating,' 'patriarchy,' etc.)
> Model A Kafka-Trap
> Your refusal to acknowledge that you are guilty of sexism confirms that you are guilty of sexism.
> Model C Kafka-Trap
> Even if you do not feel yourself to be guilty of sexism, you are guilty because you have benefited from the sexist behavior of others in the system.
> Model P Kafka-Trap
> Even if you do not feel yourself to be guilty of sexism, you are guilty because you have a privileged position in the sexist system.
> Model S Kafka-Trap
> Skepticism about any particular anecdotal account of sexism, or any attempt to deny that the particular anecdote implies a systemic problem in which you are one of the guilty parties, is itself sufficient to establish your guilt.
> Model L Kafka-Trap
> Your insistence on applying rational skepticism in evaluating assertions of pervasive sexism itself demonstrates that you are sexist.
> Model D Kafka-Trap
> The act of demanding a definition of sexism that can be consequentially checked and falsified proves you are sexist.

It is the last model, Model D, which I find the most intriguing. It implies – and my experience with feminists verifies – that simply asking how to not be sexist will be taken as evidence of one's sexism. The reason why I focused so heavily on definitions in my earlier lectures is because of the utility of attaching concrete meanings to terms. If we have a concrete definition of sexism, for instance, I could check my own behavior against this definition, and potentially discover that I do not fulfil any of the criteria – i.e., I am not sexist. But this does not satisfy the feminist notion of collective guilt. It feels like a panicked response on their part, then, to insist that any man who tries to discover whether or not he is sexist is automatically sexist simply for trying to find this out. In other words, he is a sexist for not wanting to be a sexist. Could there be any clearer indication that feminists want men and women to be two conflicting classes of people?

The purpose of the Kafka-Trap is to leave absolutely no room for the trapped individual to believe in his own innocence. A denial that he is oppressive is further evidence that he is oppressive; the only other option is to admit that he is oppressive, which is also evidence that he is oppressive. (Note the following from the Violence Wheel, designed by the Domestic Abuse Intervention Project: "saying the abuse didn't happen" is abusive. So, you see, whether you plead "guilty" or "not guilty" in a court of law, both pleas are evidence of your guilt.) Oppression is alleged because the individual is a member of a group – but not necessarily one that he identifies with. The in-group identification is ascribed to the individual by the operator of the Kafka-Trap. To quote from Eric once more,

> Real crimes – actual transgressions against flesh-and-blood individuals – are generally not specified. The aim of the kafkatrap is to produce a kind of free-floating guilt in the subject, a conviction of sinfulness that can be manipulated by the operator to make the subject say and do things that are convenient to the operator's personal, political, or religious goals. Ideally, the subject will then internalize these demands, and then become complicit in the kafkatrapping of others.

That actual transgressions are not specified is true for all models apart from Model S, in which a specific transgression is specified, but any doubt regarding the alleged victim's account of things is taken as evidence that the doubter is guilty along with the alleged perpetrator. How familiar this all sounds! Is it not the precise experience of anyone who encounters feminists while discussing the prevalence of false rape accusations? On that note, I shall refer you to a comment from the feminist Amanda Marcotte, which she quickly deleted, but not before Fidelbogen saved a copy:

Let's talk about Amanda Marcotte some more, shall we? In fact, in her honor, I would like to define a seventh model of the Kafka-Trap, Model J:

> Model J Kafka-Trap
> Even if your innocence is proven in a court of law, this not only confirms your guilt; it also confirms the guilt of the (legal) system that found you innocent.

Exhibit A for Model J is a series of comments that Amanda Marcotte made in the wake of the Duke Lacrosse false rape accusations. Unable to accept that the accused men could possibly be innocent (hey, why do we even have trials?), she said the following:

> In the meantime, I've been sort of casually listening to CNN blaring throughout the waiting area and good fucking god is that channel pure evil. For awhile, I had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and fucked her against her will—not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.

Leaving aside the content of her raging diatribe, doesn't the style of her writing strike you as that of a twelve-year old, perhaps one who has only just discovered swear words, and believes that using them as much as possible is 'cool'? In the spirit of this post, then, and given the evidence before us, I hereby believe that Amanda Marcotte is, in fact, twelve years old. Any argument to the contrary, from Amanda or anyone else, will be taken as further evidence that she is twelve years old.

All right then. Since she has clearly not been brought up properly, I shall recommend a regimen of discipline that will soon have her speaking as a proper young lady should! I suggest, first, that Amanda Marcotte shall have her mouth vigorously washed out with soap; next, that she shall receive a stern, bare-bottom spanking (over some patriarch's knee, of course); and then, that she shall be sent to bed without dinner for a week. This will soon set her straight! And since I refuse to believe any evidence to the contrary of my opinion that she is twelve years old, any disagreement with my opinions on this matter shall only reinforce my contention that she is utterly deserving of this punishment. Now, what do you think about that?

Adam

Feature image by Francis Storr

C.S. Lewis: The Feudalisation of Love

Peter Wright · 26 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Traditional conservative sex roles, liberal-feminist concepts regarding sexual liberation, and traditional feminist views about sexual relations are all heads growing from the one Hydra. What aim do all of these ideologies have in common?

The answer is beautifully captured by C.S. Lewis' phrase "a feudalisation of love." That's what these worldviews hold in common.

According to Lewis, the feudalisation of love (FOL) refers to the medieval event when the feudal contract employed between Lords & vassals was repurposed by noblewomen. These women believed the feudal contract could serve as a new model to govern sexual relations, whereby a woman would assume the role of Lord, and man her vassal symbolised in the iconic display of a man going down on one knee before her. After a continuous process of cultural diffusion the formula appears in most countries today, such has been its remarkable power to colonize.

Lewis states that in comparison with the revolution generated by the feudalisation of love, the Renaissance amounts to a mere ripple on the surface of literature. It forms the internal rationale of post-industrial traditionalism, romantic love, and especially for the various waves of feminism which embraced this idea with greater fervor, applying its principles ever more aggressively with each iteration of the movement.

Lewis places a precise date on the rise of feudalisation of love, claiming it appeared quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century in France. He describes it as an elitist fad spreading to all the courts of Europe while subsequently permeating down the vertical axis to capture the imagination of lower classes. The spread was so thorough that FOL is now regarded as a "timeless" and "natural" human arrangement, held up as as a sacrosanct pillar of human evolution by layperson and academic alike.

The fact that FOL is not a timeless universal of human biology has been demonstrated by Peter Ryan whose exhaustive investigations reveal the rise of gynocentrism to be a perversion, or what I have elsewhere labeled as a supernormal stimulus. Despite these debunkings however, the belief in the "timeless" and "universal" nature of FOL continues unabated.

FOL leads to poor treatment of males, serving as root cause of the malignant outcomes tackled by men's advocates. Among the catalogue of negative outcomes is the act of male suicide — and yet even family members, friends and academics who have lost loved ones (men) to suicide remain leery about naming this lack of social value directly: it is caused by both the gynocentrism and misandry inherent in feudalisation of love.

The only place where female suicide is higher is in rural China: ergo where women have lower social value than men. China is also the place where the feudalisation of love never took root in the culture because it was explicitly outlawed there by Mao during the cultural revolution, because it was viewed as a disintegrative culture product.

Outside certain parts of Asia most cultures are decidedly gynocentric, hyper-valuing women's identity, needs and wants. While there are many factors that can contribute to male suicide, if we were to address men's devalued sense of self by removing FOL, then the majority of these men would not suicide because they would be buoyed by that magic ingredient – value. This can only happen if we voice a full throated diminution of gynocentrism, running in tandem with a social revalorization of men and boys.

Those who believe in and adhere to the FOL script in their relationships, please don't come calling when it begins to hurt or when tragedy hits. First, you must divest yourself of it and then we can talk and perhaps find a way out of the maze.

All of the above is part of the grand culture cycle we find ourselves in, dictated by peculiar customs and conventions just like every epoch that has gone before it. Fortunately, we might be saved from the status quo by a little formula proposed by Hegel that characterizes the evolving face of culture as an endless loop of three developments: 1. thesis, 2. antithesis, 3. synthesis. While its hard to guess, when applied to our current culture his formula might play out like this:

- Thesis: feudalisation of love
- Antithesis: men's rights backlash
- Synthesis: transgender movement, which obliterates sexual identity & feudalisation of love with it.

For the sake of humor I'll refer to this hypothesis as the Other Great Reset, hopefully one that will bring us back to a saner baseline.

I'm Not Sorry for Radical Feminist Christina Ellingsen

Janice Fiamengo · 26 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It sticks in my craw to see non-feminist men like Tucker Carlson giving adulatory coverage to anti-trans feminists, as he did recently with Norwegian "hero" (Carlson's word) Christina Ellingsen. Ellingsen has been charged with hate speech for statements she made on Twitter about trans women not being women.

I get Carlson's position; I'm just not sure he gets Ellingsen's.

Trans ideology, which elevates felt "gender identity" over biological sex—and in some cases denies the existence of biological sex altogether—is contrary to truth and to common-sense social norms. It is ridiculous that anyone should face a hate speech charge (with the possibility of jail time) for making biological or other statements about sex difference. It is hideous that children are being encouraged to make irreversible sex-change decisions as a result of trans indoctrination. And it violates fundamental fairness for women to be made to compete in sports dominated by much stronger and faster men claiming a female identity.

But people who care about equality, fairness, or cultural sanity shouldn't think for a moment that radical feminists like Christina Ellingsen share any of these principles; they don't.

Ellingsen is one of the lead signatories of the Declaration on Women's Sex Based Rights—Norway (see her Twitter page @wdiNorway) whose goals of female supremacism and endless male bashing are at least as detrimental to social flourishing as the trans movement she and Tucker oppose. In the long run, in fact, radical feminism is arguably far more detrimental in its all-out attacks on masculinity.

The radical feminist (rad fem) movement is based on an anti-male animus so deep and pervasive that it has trouble seeing men as fully human. Radical feminism blames all men for "oppressing" all women—throughout history and even today, apparently—and it regards the trans movement (even the actions of the most modest, self-effacing of individuals who merely want to live as women, causing no trouble to anyone) as a deviously clever new way for allegedly misogynistic men to usurp women's bodies and women's (so-called) sex-based rights.

Rad fems pushed for and established these alleged rights: the right to "safe spaces" that exclude men, such as domestic violence shelters and related financial assistance and programs for victims, though it is undeniable that men and their children can be victims of abusive women (a fact that rad fems blithely ignore or even outright deny, the dishonesty of which is enough, in my opinion, to bar them from any reasonable person's support); the right to affirmative action hiring, now in its fifth decade, that actively discriminates against men, denying them job and promotion opportunities; and many other special privileges in law and public policy that have disadvantaged men over decades of anti-male lobbying.

Many men have supported sex-based privileges and protections for women, but their support has never led to any diminishment of rad fem hatred.

Anti-trans rad fems are the same women, often political lesbians, who write articles and give speeches about why it is perfectly acceptable—even desirable—to hate all men simply because they are men (see journalist Julie Bindel's "Why I Hate Men," full of mouth-foaming and unashamed detestation, the sort of fact-free article that would have had any male author who wrote about indiscriminate woman-hatred fired immediately), and who attend conferences and present treatises about how the content of masculinity is formed through men's alleged enjoyment of sexual cruelty to women (see the screeds of author Sheila Jeffreys, who has stated that "Men's sexual use of women is crucial to their idea of themselves as masculine"). Both Bindel and Jeffreys have built their careers on allegations of the moral deformity of men—and now join with Ellingsen in proclaiming women the victims of this latest version of the same.

Here are some of the questions that Tucker might have asked Ellingsen to aim at a clearer picture of her worldview. The answers are my own inventions (as will become obvious), based on the Declaration to which Ellingsen, Jeffreys, and Bindel have appended their names.

Question: It's interesting to see biology making a come-back in feminist discussions—it's been absent for a long time!—especially the recognition that women are physically weaker than men. Does this mean that you now recognize the harms of integrating women into organizations that rely for their effectiveness on physical strength, such as the military or fire-fighting?

Answer: Of course she does not. The Declaration is clear in rejecting "any distinction, exclusion, or restriction on the basis of sex which has the effect [note that!] or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment, or exercise" by women (but not of men) of their rights or freedoms in any sphere. It doesn't matter that studies have shown that all-male military units, for example, are far stronger, faster, and more effective than units with women in them. No matter the cost to men or society generally, women must not be excluded from any sphere they claim the right to enter. Only men are to be excluded from women's spheres.

Question: Your organization makes frequent mention of women's sex-based rights. You object, for example, to trans women laying claim to the legal category of motherhood because that claims "erodes the social significance of maternity." Do men have equivalent sex-based rights—to fatherhood, for example? Do men have the right to object to the erosion of the "social significance" of fatherhood?

Answer: Certainly not. Fatherhood in the rad fem view is a construct based on patriarchal subjugation that is better off destroyed. Feminist social policy, legal initiatives, and propaganda have been purposely eroding the status of fatherhood for decades. Men have no right in law to parent their own children; a single unproven accusation in a divorce court makes it possible for a man never again to see the children he is still forced, on penalty of incarceration, to support financially. As Stephen Baskerville has shown in Taken Into Custody, state-supported feminist policies have vilified millions of fathers, stripping them of paternity rights, and rad fems enthusiastically support that state of affairs.

Question: Does your organization support equality before the law of men and women?

Answer: The Declaration on Women's Sex Based Rights makes clear that equality before the law is a hindrance to feminist goals and can be easily discarded in practice. What matters to rad fems is the maintenance and expansion of the special privileges, massive government funding, and government-mandated protections that advantage women and hobble men. When women vastly outnumber men in academic fields and many professions, as they now do, feminists never suggest that the special measures should be withdrawn, or that any measures at all should be taken to help men to develop and advance towards equality.

The toxic nub of the feminist objection to trans women is revealed in the Declaration's complaint that "Men who claim a feminine gender identity are being enabled to access opportunities and protections set aside for women. This constitutes a form of discrimination against women, and endangers women's fundamental rights to safety, dignity, and equality" [emphasis mine].

Now there's some logical mumbo jumbo! Keep in mind that none of the privileges women continue to claim in western societies—the set-aside scholarships, the countless equity targets in business and academia, the government funding, the exclusive programs—are being taken away from women. They are simply being extended to a tiny fraction of the rest of the non-female population. Millions upon millions of men remain actively discriminated against by these decades-old measures, unable to access the services, monies, college placements, or opportunities available to women; but any man who complains about the unfairness is shouted down as a misogynist, told this is what happens when his "privilege" is removed. Feminist accuser, know thyself!

Question: Your Declaration asserts the necessity for women and girls to have freedom of speech and to be free from hate-speech prosecution for stating biological facts and other arguments. Does your organization support the right of boys and men to freedom of speech, especially regarding biological and other sex differences?

Answer: Not at all. Ellingsen's feminist Norway has policies and awareness programs designed to protect girls and women from what is termed "online harassment" by enforcing penalties against male perpetrators who make girls and women "feel unsafe" (always with the claim that more needs to be done). For years, radical feminists have emphasized the need for a gendered dimension (i.e. an emphasis on harms to women caused by men) in Norway's hate-speech laws. Rad fems have emphasized that men and women experience online harassment differently, and that only women are targeted specifically because they are women. Norway's new hate speech law simply went further than the rad fems had envisioned by including trans women in the category of protected persons. Has Ellingsen ever objected to the targeting of men's speech for criminalization? Does she believe that men can be hated as men online, and that women who attack men with hashtags such as #KillAllMen should be prosecuted for hate speech? No. Ellingsen is upset that she herself can no longer say whatever SHE likes.

Question: Your document affirms the right of women to have "equal access" to opportunities in sport, requiring the exclusion of biological males. Do you support "equal access" for men in sport?

Answer: Radical feminists have passed legislation that has effectively denied men's rights to access sport in college. In the United States, for example, Title IX prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sex has been twisted and warped in its implementation to deny funding for men's sport. Because college men tend to be more interested in sport than college women, especially in (expensive) team sports like football, funding for male sports has been drastically cut in the name of equality—particularly ironic at a time when women vastly outnumber their male peers at colleges across the western world, at least in part because of the drumbeat of anti-male, pro-female propagandizing and promotion. No radical feminist has ever worried about male numbers on college campuses or cuts to male sports teams.

**

One could continue with the questions and answers, but the import is clear. Christina Ellingsen is a bigot who, like her bigoted rad fem friends, grew accustomed to a free pass for her feminist hatred. She could publish hateful articles and make disgusting claims about men; she could "jokingly" create hashtags like #KillAllMen with no repercussions, and then cry foul if any man wished her dead in return. She believes that it is right to discriminate against, censor, and castigate men.

Now she is shocked to discover that the shoe is on the other foot. Trans women have power to call her hateful, and she can't even state a biological fact without facing a jail term! It's a ridiculous situation, but it couldn't have happened to a member of a more deserving group of fanatics whose non-stop anti-male calumnies may well be responsible for some of the young men who have decided they would rather live as women. One thing's for sure: a society that hates men according to radical feminist postulates is not a society that can flourish or, ultimately, protect women at all.

Lecture 10: The Eventual Outcome of Feminism, Part I

Adam Kostakis · 27 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> The founders of a new colony, whatever Utopia of human virtue and happiness they might originally projected, have invariably recognized it among their earliest practical necessities to allot a portion of the virgin soil as a cemetary, and another portion as the site of a prison. – Nathaniel Hawthorne

It seems sensible, at this stage, to pose the question: why is all this happening? The answer I can offer up, for the purpose of this lecture, is not historical but psychological: it offers explanation through reference to the mental state of feminism's operators. There certainly are historical processes at work, explored elsewhere, but no social movement survives purely for the sake of its history. Nobody is born a feminist. There must be some stimulus, or stimuli, working to remodel formerly non-feminist women and men into activated feminists. But we cannot explain feminist conversion by the agitation of those already existing feminist activists. We can certainly believe that feminist activism plays a role in recruitment, but this is not adequate as an explanation. Why would an individual then commit to feminism, rather than any other particular social movement whose advocates engage in agitation for the purposes of ideological recruitment?

It must be that feminism offers such individuals something that other movements do not. I propose that, by opening up space for perfectly satisfying, collective man-hating, feminism offers a form of catharsis eagerly seized upon by those already predisposed to misandry. There are probably as many rationalizations for misandry as there are individual feminists – we would have to explore the intimate details of an individual feminist's life, particularly her mental culture, to come to a conclusion about when and why she decided to blame an entire sex for each of her inconveniences. What is common to them all is hostility to masculinity, i.e. maleness. When the initial excitement brought about by mutual indulgence in sexual hate has died down, the lines of communication between feminists remain open. Feminism provides more than the opportunity for catharsis. The feminist soon realizes that she need not restrict herself to echo chambers, but might try her hand at real change. A thrill rushes through her at the thought of not just disparaging, but actually hurting men. Backed up by an extensively organized, generously funded and institutionally-connected movement – one that enjoys a rosy reputation as defender of that greatest virtue of our time, equality – she sets to work. Feminism is a misandrist's dream.

Implicit in what I have written above is the corollary that feminism does not create misandry. Feminism promotes, endorses, reinforces, organizes and aggrandizes misandry, but it does not generate it outright. A woman who is not antipathetic towards men will not become so upon exposure to feminist thought. More likely, she will recoil at its odious philosophy. Feminism simply provides a space for women and men who were already misandrically-inclined to congregate and make plans.

The forerunner to feminism was traditional Gynocentrism, a self-sustaining social system which taught women that men should sacrifice on their behalf, and taught men that they were defective women. The female privilege inherent to this sexual ecology was undoubtedly accompanied and reinforced by animosity towards men – the 'flawed' sex – most particularly those men who did not conform to the Gynocentric role expected of them. Feminism departs from this model, not only in the sense that it provides organization for this misandry, but also in the instability of its operations. Feminism relentlessly demands greater male sacrifice for the benefit of women. This is a process to be intensified without an end point. Such a process lacks forward planning or any semblance of equilibrium. Ever greater constraints are placed on the very class of people whose labor and genius sustains the social order in which feminism can thrive. The parasite is killing its host, and will either be purged or die along with it. Feminism is simply not sustainable.

But it is not as though feminists think in these terms. Despite their forays into such recondite subjects as jurisprudence and post-modernism, feminist thought ultimately resolves to the validation of primal emotions. The central tenets of Western-style justice systems, evolving as they did under patriarchy, aspired to impartiality and objectivity in all proceedings. We speak of habeas corpus, the right to trial by jury, the presumption of innocence, punishments which fit rather than exceed corresponding crimes, and so on. That these doctrines of civic freedom have lasted for so many centuries is testament to the integrity of the generations of men who inherited them. Feminists, in their efforts to replace these 'outmoded, patriarchal' institutions, do not engage in anything like the deep thought that begat their careful construction. Much less do they entertain the notion of impartiality. All feminist legal innovation – whether it is introducing the presumption of guilt (for men), advocating an inquisitorial rather than adversarial trial system (for men), or proposing that women should not be punished at all when they commit crimes – flows from the same source: the violent and vindictive emotions of individual feminist operators. Feminism is so dangerous because it exists to validate these emotions, and to assign them a permanent place in discussions over how society might be better organized.

The success of feminism in this regard can be appreciated when we consider the popularity of collective guilt, anathema as it is to the principles of neutrality and impartiality underpinning our liberal justice systems. Collective guilt is an emotional discharge, a visible effect of concentrated class hatred. It is an attack on the verifiable truth of individual moral agency. Under a system of collective guilt, one's actions have no bearing on one's fate. Human beings are sent to the gallows for the circumstances of their birth. There is no purpose for trials, or any institution which exists to ascertain the facts of the case and to assign guilt. Guilt is already assigned; the facts are irrelevant. What follows collective guilt is collective punishment.

Feminists are not yet in a powerful enough position to deliver collective punishment to the entirety of the male sex. Instead, they cast as wide and as deep a net as possible, hoping to snag as many men and boys as they can. Wherever an individually identifiable man appears on their radar, he becomes the latest pariah, even if the accusations against him are weak and unfounded. This is irrelevant; all that matters is that he has been identified. Then, he becomes the target for unbridled angst, a public piñata, an effigy of all men, of maleness itself. He becomes the personification of the entire male sex, and the collective punishment that feminists yearn to deliver unto all men is inflicted onto him. Even after he is proven to be innocent of all accusations, the attacks intensify, as though the reluctance of the world to acknowledge his guilt is an even greater injury than the charges brought against him. In a short while, he will be forgotten, and a new whipping boy will be discovered. Until that time, feminists will try to outdo each other in editorials, speeches, and in the comment sections of newspapers and weblogs, calling for the most grotesque mutilations and acts of violence against him.

An impartial legal system, which treats human beings as individuals, is a barrier against collective punishment. To do away with it altogether would allow for the punishment of many more men, on the basis that they are men, which is why feminists have fought so relentlessly to overturn impartiality. Bit by bit, feminist agents within government, academia and the legal system have replaced individual moral agency and the rule of law with the micro-management of people. As the mantra goes, the personal is political – it is, increasingly, the business of the state. Even when not explicitly framed like this, the underlying principle of all feminist innovation is to bring the state to bear down, ever more closely, on our personal, everyday existences. If the personal really is the same thing as the political, then political correctness must be personal correctness – a perverse and pervasive system of control which scrutinizes an individual's every move, in order to lock him into place. You must be personally correct, in terms of your beliefs, your desires, your pursuits, your tastes – right down to the jokes you are permitted to laugh at – according to their standards. They being the self-declared 'victims' of society, who are nevertheless powerful enough to enjoy lunch with the President and set out the terms on which the government is to run your life.

The idea is not that men should overcome all the obstacles in their struggle to be politically/personally correct. After all, those who are demanding that men run this daily gauntlet are the very same people lining up to beat them with clubs as they try. The idea is that men should, so to speak, die trying. The intention is that men fail. For as long as average men manage to live peacefully, and even successfully, more and greater incursions into their personal space shall be required. It is at the point of failure -; when men have failed to live up to the increasingly constrictive rules set out for them – that they can be punished. The ordeal gets tougher by the day and with each passing of new legislation.
At the extreme end of societal micro-management, we find states like North Korea, a brutal, totalitarian dictatorship which controls all forms of media, place severe restrictions upon speech, association, movement and access to information, and detains dissidents and their families in concentration camps where many die from starvation or medical experimentation. Western societies are separated from the continuum of despotism, on which we find North Korea, by a small number of fundamentals, some of which have already been referenced: respect for the autonomy of the individual, the presumption of innocence, the separation of executive, legislative and judicial powers, etc. These doctrines correspond precisely to those which feminism aims to tear down. The violent, vindictive emotions from which feminism springs are, by nature, irrational; there exists no internal, rational boundary, to suggest that enough is enough once a certain benchmark is reached. The furious impulses at the heart of feminism would not stop short of constructing a totalitarian regime which restricts men's speech, their association and movement, and detains them in concentration and labor camps where they are subject to starvation and mutilation.
Are we so far removed from savage regimes like North Korea that this is not a possibility? We should not allow ourselves to be misled by appeals that we live in a democracy, and that the leaders are ultimately accountable to the people. Our democracy is only ostensible, offering little real choice. The bipartisan consensus between leading parties ensures that the state continues to grow, and the feminist agenda is further promoted, whether the new government cloaks itself in red or blue. Facing no serious political opposition, the leaders do not have to bow to the people to secure their mandate. All public pandering is superficial, though highly effective, in the same way that all totalitarians have enjoyed the popularity of the masses. By definition, totalitarians must be populist: the support they must mobilize, in order to remain in power, cannot be that of an armed minority alone. In exchange for the sponsorship of the masses, totalitarians caress their egos, giving enthusiastic praise to them for their courage, declaring them the inspiration of all progress. At least, the greater part of them are praised. Groups which are not in favor are, in contrast, treated with contempt prior to their destruction. It is the majority which becomes tyrannous – as Alexis De Tocqueville warned – when the leaders isolate a particular segment of the population for blame and castigation. Enjoying their glorification on behalf of the leader, the chosen majority will side against the undesirables, and treat them with abominable malice. It is a story that has played out, over and over, throughout history – not least in the populist tyrannies of the twentieth century.
Today, our leaders exalt the feminine and malign the masculine – a prejudice running so deep that it has become normalized, to the point where few consider it unusual for the President to bash men on Father's Day. Men – who are, indeed in the minority, making up 49% of the population – are suffering the early stages of the tyranny of the majority. Leaders of all parties pander, first and foremost, to the female majority, and particularly to the pressure groups set up (supposedly) in their interests. More pernicious than this is the entry of women into politics – not because of the fact that they are women, but because almost every female politician, whatever her party allegiance, makes women's issues her priority. In contrast, male politicians swear their allegiance to the principles of their party and to the demands of their constituents, but not to men's issues. There are no politicians who make men's issues a priority, but plenty – male and female – who run on the cross-party, women's issues platform. The world is not so simple that we can say men are over-represented because they are present in greater numbers. Although there is a greater number of men in politics, it is women who are over-represented, because more politicians represent them than they do men. The sex of the politician makes no difference to the legislation that he passes. In courting the female vote, and particularly in his efforts to please feminist groups (organized misandry), he will perpetuate and extend chivalry, he will publicly belittle his own sex, and he will pass ever more anti-male legislation, sanctioning the brutalization of ordinary men.

Systematic destruction follows systematic contempt. The eventual outcome of feminism is nothing less than a Holocaust, the almighty crescendo to mark the success of a century or more of sexual warfare and the demonization/degradation of the masculine. Those men, such as the male politician who has stoked the fires of gender tribalism to win votes and benefit his own career, will become the concentration camp facilitators and the enforcers of population reduction programs. They shall be the Uncle Toms, the Judenräte atop white horses, who will ultimately meet the same fate as the men they have helped exterminate. The anti-male, homicidal and genocidal violence in feminist rhetoric is well documented:

> The male is a domestic animal which, if treated with firmness … can be trained to do most things – Jilly Cooper, SCUM (Society For Cutting Up Men)
> I want to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig – Andrea Dworkin
> Kill your fathers – Robin Morgan
> Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore and no aspect of society being at all relevant to women, there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation, and destroy the male sex – Valerie Solanas, SCUM Manifesto
> It is no accident that in the ancient matriarchies men were castrated, sacrificially slaughtered, and excluded from public forms of power; nor is it an accident that some female supremacists now believe men to be a distinct and inferior species or race. Wherever power is accessible or bodily integrity honored on the basis of biological attribute, systematized cruelty permeates the society and murder and mutilation contaminate it. We will not be different – Andrea Dworkin
> Why have any men at all? … The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately ten percent of the human race – Sally Miller Gearhart
> If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males – Mary Daly

The stock feminist response is to point out that these quotes are from radical feminists, who have not been active for a long time, and do not represent mainstream feminism. While it is not exactly true that they do not represent mainstream feminism, we can find more recent examples of feminist attitudes:

> It is time that government had a strategy on changing men away from power and oppression as part of its strategy for women and gender justice … Changing future agendas for women involves changing men; changing men involves deconstructing men and reducing men's power; and, in the longer term still, this may even involve the abolition of men" – EuroPRO-Fem, a European men's pro-feminist network

The following is extracted from a recent discussion on a feminist weblog:

> Allecto: I think there is a very simple solution to the 'problem' of the team sport of gang-raping that is so popular as a form of gay male bonding between football players.
> Mandatory castration of all men who play football and all men who watch football. This would be a quick and easy solution.
> bonobobabe: I like your castration idea. I'd take a step further and castrate all male babies at birth.
> Mary Sunshine: There is no remedy for this situation other than to halt the emergence of any more human males.

Two caveats must be advanced before we go any further. The first is not a compromise; it is not self-censorship or moderation. It is a statement of fact. The overwhelming majority of women do not, and would not, support the extermination of men. The question of whether all or most or only some feminists support the extermination of men is one that I shall address in a couple of weeks' time. Clearly, there are feminists who do not openly support the extermination of men. Nevertheless, they have a role to play in the process, as do all misandrists. For the time being, it will suffice to say that all feminist self-reflection and self-criticism reaches the verdict that they are not being 'feminist enough,' i.e. it results in further radicalization. I quote from the back cover of Zillah Eisenstein's The Radical Future of Liberal Feminism, a feminist text which arrives at this very conclusion:

> Eisenstein shows that liberal feminism is 'self-contradictory' because it 'accepts liberalism and at the same time rejects its patriarchal base.' Yet in truth, feminism is 'potentially subversive', to both liberalism and the capitalist patriarchal state, and it must and can become radicalized as it pushes against the limitations of what can be accomplished within the context of the state … Eisenstein advances the view that liberal feminism contains within itself the seeds of radical change.

The significant point about the above quote is that Eisenstein, the feminist author, rejects the 'patriarchal base' of all liberal institutions; that is, she would happily do away with legal impartiality, equality before the law, presumptive innocence, and so on. Retaining these doctrines, which exist to protect innocent people, is not on the feminist agenda, and Eisenstein comes to the very same conclusion that I have presented in this lecture: that liberal feminism will become radical when it achieves all it can through the liberal state. The violent and vindictive emotions will not be satiated, ever. Once feminism has gone as far as it can go through the liberal state, 'liberal feminists' will turn against it and plot its overthrow.

The second caveat is that the physical destruction of men is not inevitable. It is the logical outcome of feminism, but our future is not set in stone. Given that feminists have explicitly called for forced male labor and the presumption of innocence to be removed when men are accused of rape, and that lawmakers are seriously floating the suggestion that those found guilty of sex offences should be physically castrated, we might conclude that we are already some way down the feminist road to hell. Feminism has no internal brakes; a victory does not temper the feminist's violent emotions, but provides the momentum for her to push for greater results, in the knowledge that she can get away with hurting men. Any barrier to the progress of feminism will therefore have to come from outside feminism. It is up to external agents to build a brick wall in feminism's path.

We are more than sixty years into an organic process that will leave humanity with an irrevocably changed society. The catalyst for the abolition of Gynocentrism is its own radical and unsustainable expression in feminism. Those same social and conceptual changes which made feminism possible prompt the question of why men should put up with any form of Gynocentrism. The critical mass of opposition to Gynocentrism, resulting in its overthrow, will be reached as soon as feminism is exposed to the world. What remains to be seen is whether feminism shall expose itself, or whether it will be exposed by counter-feminists. The former will occur if the movement becomes powerful enough to explicitly launch the physical destruction of men. My own view is that feminists will make this final roll of the dice, and that they will be ultimately unsuccessful, although many men will suffer tortuous deaths. The other possibility is that feminism is exposed in advance of this, preventing much of the violence, and allowing for the repeal of all Gynocentric rule with minimal bloodshed. Whatever the case – whether feminism exposes itself, or is exposed – it is done for. Cast in the disinfecting sunlight of the world's gaze, held to account for its grievous transgressions, never again will feminism be tolerated.

Adam

[Australia] Channel 10 continues to promote Feminism and their ratings continue to fall

AVfM Video Source · 27 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Men of Old and the Men of Today

Andrew MacDonald · 28 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Once upon a time in western culture, the manly way, at least in the noble classes was to submit to God in the form of the King or Queen. Letting my imagination roam, I can see the archetypal image of the man kneeling before the sovereign being knighted into service. Both shoulders are touched with the sword, symbolizing his bodily taking on the role of defender of the sovereign and the realm, .

My Scottish MacDonald forebears were highland warriors who fought against the British takeover and lost decisively with the highland clans at Culloden in 1746. They were personally close to the leadership and Bonnie Prince Charlie. Persecuted afterwards, unable to speak Gaelic, cut off from work, they emigrated to Canada.

The Battle of Culloden – painting by David Morier

They were warriors and came from a fierce fighting stock. They were also devout Catholics. Both that kind of fighting spirit and the devotional spirit have largely fallen into disuse. Neither of these qualities easily fits with the modern sensibility. Not just for the MacDonalds or highlanders but near universally in the west. We've changed.

Who were we? And who are we now?

Jungian analyst Robert Moore had a framework for these questions. His assumption I think was that the man of old still lives. He drew from Jung's work four archetypes that he thought summarized the masculine psyche. (An archetype is a transpersonal form in the psyche that individuals project onto.) Moore's four were the King (Sovereign), Warrior, Magician, and Lover. (Many women relate to these too but make different projections.)

Moore, being a therapist (analyst), was focusing on the healing dimension of the archetypes. Both Jung and Moore were engaged in a therapeutic "fixing" endeavor. Fixing pathology was the root background assumption of the whole psychological science that began with Freud. It was arguably a response to the anxiety felt in response to the purported death of God, the notion that Nietzsche popularized around the time those highlanders were arriving in Canada.

Those earlier forebears weren't interested in fixing themselves or being fixed. Nor were men generally before the modern era. They weren't engaged with archetypes; the category hadn't even been invented yet. They knew little of healing modalities and less of self-help.

Their way of psychic orientation and integration was essentially submission to God. This sounds very unhip now. But a cursory glance backward suggests that warrior men have done this universally in their culturally specific ways. Hello Dagca, Hercules, Crazy Horse. Hello Alexander and William Wallace. Hello warrior kings of the Old Testament. Hello the hundreds of manly saints in the Christian tradition Each in their time strove to serve a higher power as best they could. Many did it in the traditions we've descended from not so long ago.

Two striking differences between the men of old and ourselves revolve around the ideas of warriorship and the sense of higher purpose.

I'll be revisiting this territory again. German poet Rainer Maria Rilke (1838-1906) has a poem in which he reflects on the story of Jacob wrestling with the Angel in the biblical Book of Genesis. Jacob loses. Decisively.

Or does he? Robert Bly translates the last three lines like this:

> Winning does not tempt that man.
> This is how he grows: by being defeated, decisively, > by constantly greater beings.[1]

This is a good definition of the inner warrior and the man of old at his best. There's more to unpack here, and learn from.

Reference:

1. The Man Watching" from "Selected Poems of Rainer Maria Rilke", edited and translated by Robert Bly, 1981.

Lecture 11: The Eventual Outcome of Feminism, Part II

Adam Kostakis · 28 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Propaganda, as inverted patriotism, draws nourishment from the sins of the enemy. If there are no sins, invent them! The aim is to make the enemy appear so great a monster that he forfeits the rights of a human being. – Sir Ian Hamilton

The physical destruction of maleness is the logical outcome of feminist governance. The more feminist governance exists, the more anti-male persecution there will be, and the closer to Holocaust we will find ourselves. More feminism will not result in greater sexual equality. More feminism is not the solution to the problems addressed by Men's Rights Activists. Feminism is the problem. How could it be otherwise? Feminists believe that a debt is owed to them by all men, and they are perfectly content to recover this debt in blood and suffering. No matter how much pain they inflict unto the world, it will never be enough to satiate their violent, vindictive emotions. Rather, the more harm they inflict upon men, the more normalized this becomes, and – like a drug addiction – they will need ever greater 'highs' to satisfy the hate, culminating in the Final Punishment, the total eradication of men.
Note that I am not mincing words. I will not tread lightly around this subject. I will not resort to euphemism or conceal my message 'between the lines'. I will not leave you with the mere implication that Male Holocaust is the eventual outcome of feminism, before quickly moving on to talk about other things, as though airing the idea should be an embarrassment for the speaker. I am fully aware that mine is a marginal view of feminism, and may be considered by some to be 'extreme', but then the widespread misunderstanding and misrepresentation of what feminism is is just another symptom of the sickness I am describing. I will state, quite openly, that this is the conclusion I have reached, having considered all the available evidence, and it is a conclusion I would encourage nobody to take lightly. The imminent attempted eradication of half the human race calls for writing unimbued by flippancy or fancy. It does not permit me to enter into civil discussion with those who will be attempting said eradication or cheering it on from the sidelines. There is no object in a respectful exchange of views with such people; the very idea appears, to me, to be an ugly parody of truly civilized discourse – sort of like Neville Chamberlain trying to appease Adolf Hitler. No, my aim is to convince as many people as possible that this is, indeed, the truth, and thus to propel them to do whatever they can to stop a humanitarian disaster before it begins. To that end, I shall tell it like it is, and call out the enemies of humanity as I see them – and they are feminists, who are even now, as you read these words, beavering away at stamping that official seal onto their key tenet of Collective Male Guilt.

No matter how far down the rabbit hole she has gone, the feminist is cognizant, at some level, of the fact that a person must have actually committed a crime in order to be guilty of it. Initially, this fact appears before her, phantomlike, as an inconvenient truth, a sticking point, an irritant – like a lump in the throat, or a speck in the eye, that simply will not go away. This irritating truth is a logical interceptor, a pile of debris left on the tracks. She wonders: must I stop and turn around? Can my feminism, this wonderful vehicle for my catharsis, be reconciled with my assumptions of human individuality and legal impartiality? Of course it cannot, and if she remains a feminist, she abandons the latter. Treating individuals as individuals destroys any legitimate appeal to Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment, and vice versa: subscribing to notions of Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment negates the possibility of treating individuals as individuals. Having made her choice, she ignores this truth, that individuals must individually commit acts to be held individually accountable for them. It becomes irrelevant; revenge is higher on her list of priorities. Individual responsibility has ceased to matter for her, and it must cease to matter for others also. Those who remind her of it are attacked (cue the shaming tactics), and eventually, the fact itself is attacked. Individual responsibility is the product of false consciousness; all men carry guilt. Biological essentialism, once the stock in trade of the fascist far right, is resurrected as justifier of the authoritarian New Left.

Feminists are uninterested by truth. They do not formulate their principles based upon analysis of collected truths. The starting point for all feminism is misandric emotion, and subsequent principles are formulated upon this. Truth is largely incidental. It is greatly appreciated when it appears to coincide with feminist arguments, and outright attacked when it does not; otherwise, it is irrelevant. Facts are a tool of the patriarchy; feminism aims to elevate subjective passions and wills to the lofty quarters previously reserved for what can be objectively verified.

Detractors remain, of course, pointing out the awkward, inconvenient, irrefutable truths. For instance: even if we accept the fallacious claim that one in four women gets raped, that would imply that, at most, one in four men commit rape, assuming that each rapist commits only one rape. But this is not very realistic, since we know that there are serial rapists, whose recidivism would drive the number of guilty parties down significantly. Could anybody who touts the 'one in four' figure realistically disagree with this assessment? Such people are forced to conclude, with us, that at least three quarters of men have never and will never rape anybody; in other words, they are demonstrably not rapists. Is it not monstrous, then, to tar one hundred percent of a demographic with the crimes of less than a quarter? Perhaps we should hold rallies, in the style of Take Back The Night and so on, in which we chant "three-in-four! Three-in-four!" until people get the message that the overwhelming majority of men are not rapists and do not deserve to be labelled as such. What do you think?

Whatever the case, Collective Guilt appears to be ruled out – but we underestimate feminist creativity. While some of feminism's more demented followers have asserted that "all sex is rape" – making nearly all men into rapists for having engaged in consensual sex at some point, including that initiated by women – most of the 'third wave' has gravitated to a phony rationalization that a 'rape culture' persists among men en masse. Rape culture doctrine holds that, although a minority of men in fact commit the act of rape, the other seventy-five percent (or, if we are being realistic, a significantly higher percentage) are cheering them on from the sidelines, deriving pleasure vicariously from the knowledge that women are being sexually attacked. Collective Guilt is secured. The truth – that men are more histrionic than women when it comes to rape claims – is immaterial and can be safely denied or ignored.

Further examples of feminist creativity – finding innovative ways to blame all men for the crimes of a small number – can be found for every subject that they write about. I will not list them here because our discussion must move on. It will suffice to say that all such creativity resolves to the myth of 'the patriarchy' – that individual men who do not control or abuse women nevertheless, somehow, simply because they are men, actively support the processes through which other men do control women. The only thing that a man must do to be guilty of this is to be male; ergo, by existing, he is guilty. All feminist male-blaming creativity is a variation on this bio-essentialist theme, and all of it serves to legitimize Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment.

The feminist process of destroying men and maleness will not necessarily follow a defined plan. It does not have to! To this very day, historians continue to debate whether there was ever a direct order given for the Final Solution, or if the Holocaust was the result of cumulative radicalization within the totalitarian, anti-Semetic state bureaucracy of Nazi Germany. It is at least conceivable, then, that the murder of millions can be achieved organically, after a significant period of demonization which leaves most of the population indifferent (if not hostile) towards the scapegoat. Very few people are actually needed to carry out a genocide – typically less than ten percent of a population, often less than five. Indifference is all that is required of the remainder.

Having said this, there is at least one explicit plan for Male Holocaust, which was emphatically not written as a satire, even if its author later brushed off troubling questions with this claim. While the SCUM Manifesto is remembered today as a bizarre relic which in no way represented mainstream feminism at any time, it's worth pointing out that the text only achieved 'classic' status because of its overwhelming popularity. Even if we were to contort ourselves into believing that Valerie Solanas intended the text as a joke, we cannot believe the same about her followers. Of these, perhaps the most famous would be Robin Morgan, who included excerpts from SCUM in her anthology Sisterhood is Powerful, and stated her sincere aim that the "Feminist Revolution" would achieve not "some false state of equality," but "a proud gynocratic world."

Still, SCUM hardly contains the blueprints for male extermination. The feminist project has not followed SCUM to the letter, though this is perhaps because there is no letter to follow. The text is more statement than program; it is the violent, vindictive emotionalism laid bare, the ugly face of feminism unmasked, the dissected contents of a dirty bomb formerly disguised as a birthday present. In the long run, the publication of SCUM has probably benefited anti-feminists most of all. It is proof positive that feminism is, at least in part, supportive of female supremacy and the elimination of men; and that such views, when initially aired, were received with enough support from the feminist sector to make the book famous. Would feminists today be so dismissive of SCUM if anti-feminists had not seized on it as evidence?

To get back on track: while there certainly are individuals working within state bureaucracies whose chief aim in life is to make men suffer – and indeed, government departments have been set up for this very purpose – an official order to eliminate men has not (yet) been given, as far as we know. But one does not need to be given, for the situation may come about organically. For decades, males have been subject to the worst possible demonization in mass media – including, earlier this year, the portrayal of newborn babies as inherently evil, rapists-in-waiting. The slurs made against all men, which cannot possibly be justified on the grounds of deterring that small number of men disposed to committing crimes, are typical of a dehumanization campaign. The aims of this long hate crusade are threefold. First, that women, being exposed to the endlessly repeating feminist hate loop, will adopt the view that men are violent, inhumane oppressors, and are therefore deserving of whatever evil they suffer. Although most women will initially oppose this message, the endlessly repeating hate loop, because it is so persistent and pervasive, eventually breaks down psychological resistance. Once the hate loop had gathered enough momentum to carry itself, and was becoming bigger all the time, like a snowball rolling down a hill, then our cultural guardians needed only to intervene occasionally in order to fine-tune its content. E.g. it was not enough for a woman to only fear 'strange men'; it had to be transmitted to her that her own husband, her father, her son, etc., are activated cells in 'the patriarchy' which is oppressing her, that they are each a 'potential rapist,' and so on.

The second aim of the dehumanization campaign is to get men to turn on each other. That this forms part of feminist methodology is not surprising, since exploitation of masculinity and male physical muscle, to be used against other men for the benefit of women, is the central plank of historical Gynocentrism. In addition to appealing to powerful men to pass punitive legislation enabling the brutalization of their less powerful brethren, feminists drive wedges between common men. By promoting to men the message that their own sex is full of rapists, abusers and pedophiles, men will be less inclined to identify with other men, or with men in general, and will feel much less in the way of mutual support or sympathy. Even as the sexual grievance industry indefinitely expands the meanings of emotive words like 'rape,' 'violence' and 'pedophilia,' any man accused (not even charged, let alone convicted) of any of these acts becomes a persona non grata among his own sex. Even worse, the falsely accused man (or the man 'guilty' under the new definitions of these terms) finds himself on the receiving end of vigilante justice by outraged men who have swallowed the feminist line that male abusers are rampant everywhere (therefore this accused man must be guilty). When the falsely accused and the newly criminalized are being loaded onto train cars for deportation to death camps, men who have not yet been accused will turn their heads, consoling themselves with the thought that those men must be abusers, and so they are deserving of whatever happens to them. The men who have not yet been accused are lulled into a false sense of security, believing that they will be safe, so long as they continue to obey the feminist state.

The third aim of the dehumanization campaign is to normalize brutality against men. Feminists are boiling a frog, as the proverb goes. The cumulative brutalization of men occurs in increments, each of which appears to be objectionable, but not appallingly so (except, perhaps, to those who are paying close enough attention to perceive the creeping despotism). Already, we have surpassed situations which would have caused men to pour onto the streets in revolt had they been achieved in one fell swoop – the enslavement of men by family courts and child support laws, rape trials held in secret and without a jury in Sweden, the negation of the presumption of innocence for men in several states, mandatory arrest laws for men who call the police because their girlfriends have stuck knives in their chests, men being incarcerated and sold into sexual slavery in debtor's prisons because their wives were bored, and so on.

As the brutalization of men becomes the norm, practised by more people, a greater number of misandrists will become emboldened to act out their hate. Feminism does not entail men 'losing privileges,' or suffering for a little while until the sexes are in balance and life becomes a perfect harmony. The more feminism, the worse things will be for men, right up to the point of extermination. The level of persecution corresponds precisely to the level of feminist governance. When a great mass of feminist bureaucrats set to work, finding innovative ways to persecute men, the individual feminist bureaucrat realizes that there is no limit to what she can get away with.

I would like to talk a little more about exactly why this is. From its earliest days, feminism was envisioned as a cultural war. Making misandric persecution a reality meant that the dehumanization and brutalization of men had to become normalized phenomena – background noise, those aspects of existence nobody bats an eyelid at, those facts of life that adults resign themselves to, the unpleasantness of which can be explained away by defeatist mantras like "it's just the way things are," "it sucks but what can we do about it," and "men and women are different, so just man up and take it." Creating this kind of hostile indifference towards Men's Rights was necessary because it is the foundation upon which active persecution stands. Saying that hostile indifference has become normalized is another way of saying that it is normal for people to practise hostile indifference. In other words, enough people practise hostile indifference for it to be considered normal. That is, a great number of people practise hostile indifference, and are not taken to task for it, because it is sufficiently widespread to rule out the possibility of individuals being taken to task for it.

What we have, then, is hostile indifference towards men as a characteristic of the social organism as a whole, and it is within state bureaucracies that feminists congregate to build active persecution upon this normalized hostile indifference. The hostility and indifference towards men allows them to get away with this, because it affords each misandric individual anonymity and irresponsibility. She did not create this situation; she is not personally responsible for it. She is not the only one pushing for active persecution; everyone else is (at least) indifferent in this regard, and anyway, there are plenty of others working in the same field. Being pre-emptively 'let off the hook' through anonymity and irresponsibility, the individual feminist forms part of a collective mob whose members can indulge in a sentiment of invincible power, allowing them to yield to emotions which would otherwise have been restrained. Purely numerical considerations – strength in numbers – enable the individual operator to evade all questions of guilt and culpability. They become mere cogs whose existence and purpose is nonsensical when abstracted from the greater machine. They simply do as they are told, they simply 'go along with' what everyone else is doing – ostensibly harmless, unremarkable, dutiful.

Where a state seeks to achieve some ideological goal, its bureaucracy becomes the archetypal model of human consciousness overwhelmed by crowd psychology. Every collective acts collectively, that is, without pausing to allow the individuals to reflect, without consulting the individuals, without requiring that they give their enthusiastic assent. The collective acts with immediacy, according to its will, leaving absolutely no room for criticism from individuals within or without. Individuals within the collective act as all the others do. They are, by definition, anonymous and unaccountable. Excited by an idea, and indulging in the power of numbers, a collective does not allow or admit that anything could prevent the fulfilment of its will.

The feminist mob acts in the same way that all ideology-based collectives do – by magnifying the miniscule transgressions made against the collective, and trivializing atrocities perpetrated against others. An almost perfect example of this comes from the feminist website Sociological Images. First, the magnification of the miniscule. In September 2010, one of the site's authors announced her outrage that a line of rulers (i.e. measuring sticks) commemorating great scientists in history included Marie Curie under the heading "Great Women Rulers of Science." A horrific injustice, this is not. Still, at this point, we might simply assume that those habituating the blog are fragile people, finding themselves easily offended by much in life – we might think that they would feel the same way if they stumbled upon some equivalent version of these rulers with the sexes reversed.

We might think this is the case, until we scroll down to the comment section and find an accusation that Paul Elam's A Voice for Men site is nothing but a load of "whining." Now, in the two weeks prior to that comment being made, A Voice for Men had discussed the following:

> A police state that arrests and incarcerates male victims of domestic violence and enables female perpetrators to continue criminal behavior; a ten to one death gap concerning capital punishment that works against men; a five to one death gap against men related to suicide; the staggering attrition of males in higher education and employment; the utter lack of reproductive rights for men, and the incidence of false rape allegations against men which even the police are calling epidemic.

At first glance, the cognitive dissonance is astounding. Could the feminist really have dismissed discussion of such human interest issues as these, while her own counter-movement has nothing more offensive to talk about but the headings on rulers (which actually highlight, not obscure, the fact that there have been great female scientists)?

As Paul succinctly puts it, "women's whining = pursuit of justice. Men's pursuit of justice = whining." In following this simple maxim, feminists adhere perfectly to the dark elements of crowd psychology: magnifying the miniscule when it concerns them, and trivializing atrocities when these are committed against others.

Like all other collectives governed by the principles of crowd psychology, feminists have a tendency towards the power of suggestion: that an idea only needs to be spoken aloud for it to be taken as the gospel truth. Of course, this only works with certain types of ideas – most obviously, those which aid in magnifying the miniscule, but certainly not the ones that draw attention to the non-trivial atrocities suffered by others. It matters not that the cries of rape advocates – "one in four!" – are based on a study, the methodology of which is so flawed that any serious researcher would have transferred it directly from the printer and into the big round file. Young women will continue to pour onto the streets chanting it – "one in four! One in four!" – why? Because it serves the crowd to have been transgressed against in such a way, because it provides them with those feelings of righteous indignation which serve as a springboard from which they may launch the active persecution of the targeted class. No individual need bother checking the facts, and the crowd would not pay any attention to one who did anyway. As an example of this power of suggestion in action within a feminist state bureaucracy, we need look no further than the United Kingdom's former Minister for Women and Equality, Harriet Harman, who was eventually ordered by a judge to stop spinning the lie that rape has only a six percent conviction rate. Even then, rape advocacy groups like Women Against Rape have continued to refer to this completely invented figure. Evidencing one's claims is a trifling matter, and one subordinated to the necessity of exciting the mob.

The power of suggestion is particularly pronounced in the feminist crowd because it is mostly composed of women, and women are more impressionable than men. This is not an inherent difference between the sexes, but a socialized defect. A lifetime of privilege, of parasitic exploitation and entitlement, of juicing the fruits of another's labor, has left many women devoid of character, with unrealistic views of the world which leave them open to certain kinds of manipulation that men are not so easily taken in by. Feminism is ideological snake oil, and impressionable women are its customers. If an idea excites them, if that one-in-four statistic sends a shiver down their spines, if it causes them to feel something so strongly, then there must be at least an element of truth to it – so the unconscious mental processes go. How could something that is not real affect her in a way that feels so real? Impossible, one would think. Once feminists understood and appreciated the malleability of women, they had merely to present astounding statistics which, when recited endlessly, to the point that they become background noise, exist on some plane beyond truth and falsehood, the plane of popular consensus, and so cannot be refuted by the evidence that most men would have asked for upon originally hearing the claims.

For the same reason, we find the tendencies among feminists to simplify, and to go immediately to extremes. An exceptional instance of violence against women becomes, for feminists, the rule which is practised against all women, everywhere. A college student making a rape joke to his fraternity brothers becomes a microcosm of society as a whole. On that note, making a rape joke is the same thing, for feminists, as condoning the actual rape of human beings. There is no room for nuance, no accounting for the thousand shades of grey that exist between black and white; only the two colors perceived by monochrome Manichean Essentialists. A rape joke could conceivably and consistently be made by people spanning the entire spectrum of opinion on rape, in the same way that people can make jokes about dead babies, tasteless though they may be, without necessarily supporting or contributing towards infanticide. This is common sense stuff, but common sense stuff does not excite the passions of ideological mobs. Collectives such as feminism rely, for their shared understanding, on a fundamental lack of nuance – to infallibly appeal to all its adherents, an ideological collective must propagate a small number of simplistic, exciting, image-like ideas. In the case of feminism, which is an ideological collective based upon the validation of violent and vindictive feelings held towards men, we should not be surprised to find that these image-like ideas are so often characterized by violence.

Feminism's validation of immature, simplistic, exaggerated, generalized and extreme ideas results in violent emotion as a guiding principle of justice – in other words, the Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment I have already discussed. Feminist jurisprudence flows directly from the violent and anti-male emotions of individual feminist operators, emotions which are, in turn, validated by the ideological collective which has successfully constructed a climate of hostile indifference towards men. There is not even the pretense of impartiality in feminist jurisprudence – it is openly 'anti-normative,' seeking favorable conditions for female criminals while indefinitely expanding the scope of punishable male deviancy. Those who advocate and practise it are open about their vindictive sexism, and their reforms continue, under the radar. We are heading towards explicit male persecution because there is nowhere else this can go and very few people willing or informed enough to stand up and say 'no'.

For those who would deny that feminism condones and advocates violence against men, I need only direct you to their own creations. Here is the banner for feminist website Feministe:

Now, despite the relatively tame content of this particular site, does it seem conceivable that the out-of-frame target of this little girl's firearm is not a grown man? It's a clever trick, because the target is not shown, allowing for plausible deniability on the part of the site's members. After all, feminists don't shoot people, do they? As Fidelbogen puts it:

> Try looking at the little girl in context with the word FEMINISTE directly behind her. Note the synergy of the two elements, how they combine into a visual-conceptual unity of message – effectively amplifying and reinforcing each other.

Moving on, we might consider the hilarious irony of feminists voicing concerns over the likelihood of Pick-Up Artist Roosh Vorek being violent while simultaneously making violent threats against him:

> I must find out his real name so if I ever meet him I can suckerpunch him in the dick.
> I think Roosh is a great example of what truly needs to be purged.
> I'm wondering if his blog is violent enough to notify the DA's office.

I'm wondering too. But what I'm wondering about is why the phrase 'cognitive dissonance' gets thrown around by anti-feminists in situations like these, since the feminists' behavior is perfectly consistent. It is simply that they have magnified all miniscule transgressions against women – such as, a vaguely insulting comment from a Pick-Up Artist – and have trivialized all atrocities against men. When it is appreciated that feminist operations are all characterized by double standards in their dealings with men and women, it will be understood that there is no 'dissonance' here at all, cognitive or otherwise – their behavior is fully consistent with their twin assumptions that every inconvenience a woman faces is a humanitarian tragedy, and that men do not matter at all. Thus, after decades of feminist teeth-gnashing about the horrors of domestic violence, and how it is a subject so serious it should never be joked about or taken lightly, feminist website Jezebel produced a now-infamous article gloating over the greater incidence of domestic violence perpetrated by women, and issuing direct threats to men generally that the website's authors will act abusively towards them should men "fuck with" them. Now that men are the victims, it's acceptable to post amusing pictures of battered men; to refer to female-perpetrated abuse as "busting open a can of whupass"; to refer to male victims as "the dudes" and to employ veiled shaming tactics implying it is their own fault for not fighting back. If you follow the link, please check out the comments – make sure you click on 'All' and scroll down to get a proper impression of what feminists are really like when they think they are safely out of the world's gaze.

The image-like ideas that feminism employs are not connected by logical bonds, although they are all consistent at base because they all contribute towards increasing the power of women. To the uninitiated, it appears that the various antics of feminist activists are not at all connected, and that the most contradictory, dissimilar ideas are supported side by side. E.g., feminists simultaneously advocate for the censorship of softcore pornography targeted at men and lament that there does not exist more explicit pornography featuring naked and aroused men for the consumption of females. This only leads to sputtering accusations of 'cognitive dissonance' if one takes for granted that feminists assume their own philosophy is universalizable. If they did assume this – if their goal truly was sexual equality and impartiality – then it would indeed be true that feminists would be irrational and could fairly be said to suffer from cognitive dissonance. But this is not the case. Their philosophy is not intended to be universalizable. The aim is not to apply a uniform standard towards men and women; it is to level women up and level men down. It is to grant women more rights, indefinitely, and to force new obligations onto men, indefinitely. Double standards are the feminist rule, not the exception.

And what is the logical outcome – say, if tomorrow, feminists got everything they are advocating for today? We would be plunged immediately into a two-tier system of rights and obligations, where men and women form distinct castes of citizen, the former weighed down by the obligations that enable the latter to luxuriate in their total autonomy. Life for women would be a literal lawlessness, while men's every move would be dictated from above, geared to the purpose of providing for all female needs and wants. It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass, the accomplishment of which will be the first step towards the extermination of men.

At present, feminism displays all the hallmarks of a dangerous movement about to become fascistic: its adherents demand blind submission to dogma, they are unable to discuss its principles, they desire to spread its ideology (by whatever means necessary), they are intolerant of those who do not embrace it, they immediately rush to generalization, they demand authenticity and conformity to a rigorous standard of morality, and they utilize bio-essentialist rhetoric and violent imagery to denigrate their targets. The (often literal) dehumanization of men, coupled with feminist governance, could not be leading anywhere but the enforcement of Collective Punishment, the idealized end point of a principle of justice based upon the validation of violent, primal emotion. Not one iota of sympathy, of fellow human-feeling, is to be felt for innocent men subject to the worst atrocities.

Holocaust is the ultimate utopian vision of some radical feminists, and they are perfectly open about this, discussing the male-free world of the future as insipidly as if they were discussing holiday plans. Other radical feminists imagine a future in which men's numbers are greatly reduced and the remaining males are kept as slaves. Still others dream of a society similar to ours, but with women in the lead in all spheres of life, with all pretense to equality abandoned. Earnest feminists, meanwhile, do not necessarily intend any of these outcomes, but as they are members of the collective, they will act as members of the collective, and even if they do not participate in the active persecution of men, they will be forbidden – as an unspoken rule – from exhibiting any sympathy at all for men, no matter what they suffer. Those who do are promptly expelled, labelled anti-feminists, and subject to vicious attacks by the in-group. No feminist will stop the process of male elimination, nor will she feel any regret once it is complete, as long as she remains a feminist.

The destruction of males does not require a majority of feminists to even be on board; it is an organic process which unfolds naturally in time, and once a certain point is passed, there will be no stopping the attempt. Women like Hannah Rosin, who desire not equality but female supremacy with men as a permanent underclass, will find that the psychic forces which led them to agitate for this do not simply disappear once sexual feudalism is achieved. Feminism is a movement based upon the gratification of those psychic forces, the permanent, hateful needs of misandric women, and no limits will be reached for as long as men can be made to suffer even more.

Utopian visions supposedly present the perfectly just and moral society, but really, they envision the end of morality altogether. Utopia is that in which nobody makes an immoral decision; thus, nobody really makes moral choices. Rather, they have been socialized so well – through intimidation or brainwashing – that they always make the same choices. This silly little fantasy has inspired tyrants to send millions to their deaths. Early modernity is marked by the two most prominent examples of this: the French and Russian revolutions. Both were fought on the premise that the old regime would give way to a new age of human perfection. Both ended in failure, but not before soaking their countries in blood. The historian Hippolyte Taine wrote that it was by invoking "liberty, equality, fraternity" that the architects of the French Revolution were able "to install a despotism worthy of Dahomey, a tribunal similar to that of the Inquisition, and to accomplish human hecatombs akin to those of ancient Mexico." Similarly, Communism was presumed to be the realization of freedom and all human potential – until it was actually realized. Communist countries repressed and starved their populations, worked them to the point of exhaustion, banned free speech, purged dissidents, and invaded other countries with a zeal for imperial conquest that must have seemed rather surprising to those who saw communism as an ideology of peace. And all this, not for any existing object – not for land, or resources, or for freedom – but for a social order that had never existed and was merely imagined.

We should not expect Feminist countries – capital F, standing for explicit Feminist Governance – to be any different. Feminist countries will starve and repress, they will force men and dissenting women into labor camps, they will ban open discussion, commit murder on a grand scale, and they will invade other countries, all in the name of liberating women. If there is anything we can learn from the last few hundred years, it is that humanity repeatedly fails to learn the important lessons. After men, which group shall be persecuted? Must we all take a turn, as though our biological characteristics make us representatives of those who appear similar to us, across all time and space? After the horrors of the Soviet regime and the Holocaust, is it not sensible that we all agree to cease judging heterogeneous groups of people by bio-essentialist standards, and damning them all to hell on earth because of the apparent crimes of a minority (be this in reference to the Elders of Zion or to 'the patriarchy')?

Now, I am well aware, that simply asking these questions is not going to change anything. It is certainly not going to change any feminist minds. But I am not here to plead with feminists. I am here to interrogate them, to embarass them about their future plans, and to spread the word about what those plans are. Because even the self-proclaimed enlightened, progressive feminist movement has not learned the lesson that humanity should now be well-versed in. In contradistinction to them, I say – peace be with you.

Adam

P&G: Progressivism and Gynocentrism

Doug Mortimer · 29 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

If you wanted to compile a list of legacy corporations in America, you would have to put Procter & Gamble at the top of the list. P&G was founded in Cincinnati in 1837 by two immigrants, one English (Proctor) and one Irish (Gamble). To add a bit of historical perspective, at the time there were just 26 states (Michigan had just been admitted). Texas, one year after the Alamo, was an independent republic. California, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and a portion of Colorado were still part of Mexico.

As P&G's product lines expanded and distribution networks fanned out, the company grew with the country. By the middle of the 20th Century, a P&G job in Cincinnati was about as secure as working for Ma Bell (as the phone company was fondly called before a 1983 antitrust lawsuit broke it up) or having a government sinecure in D.C.

In more sensible times, it was sufficient for a company to manufacture good products at fair prices. Good public relations was important but companies did not take stands on political issues that did not directly affect their industry. In more recent years, however, corporations do not hesitate to weigh in on the issues of the day, even when it would seem to alienate portions of their customer base. Such is the case with P&G.

In 2017 Batten Barton Durstine & Osborn, a blue chip New York advertising agency popularly known as BBDO, produced a "commercial" for P&G. Referred to as "The Talk," it won an Emmy in the commercial category. The two-minute spot is actually a Public Service Announcement or PSA. It consists of a series of vignettes of black parents having heart-to-hearts with their children about the horrors of racism in America: the bigotry of low expectations, assaults on self-esteem, name-calling, and driving while black. The film ends with graphics stating "Let's all talk about the talk so we can end the need to have it," followed by P&G/My Black Is Beautiful, and #TalkAboutBias. Curiously, all the parents having the Talk are mothers! Didn't anyone notice that by omitting black fathers they were playing into the stereotype of the modern American black family as a matriarchy?

The cost to buy two minutes of airtime on network TV isn't exactly chump change, but there is no attempt to sell a product in this "commercial." Ironically, P&G was also nominated for a conventional commercial for Tide in 2017.

In early 2019 Gillette, a subsidiary of P&G, offered its infamous "The Best Men Can Be" commercial. A variation on the company's longstanding slogan, "The Best a Man Can Get," it decried bullying, sexual harassment, mansplaining, catcalling…pretty much the whole toxic masculinity package in less than two minutes. The "commercial" had nothing to do with razors or shaving cream.

The ad angered many viewers and puzzled others. After all, men of all sociopolitical opinions shave. Why would any company buy airtime to alienate a significant chunk of its market (not to mention its stockholders)? This is no way to increase market share, but in today's political climate it is not enough for a corporation to build better mousetraps and sell them for reasonable prices. Do-gooding, moral grandstanding, virtue signaling…call it what you will, it is now part of the equation.

The same year the Gillette commercial came out, P&G CEO David Taylor stated, "The world would be a better place if my board of directors on down is represented by 50% women." At the time the board had a roughly 2:1 ratio in favor of men. The next year, Taylor had his 50/50 split. Have to wonder if he wasn't ripping off Justin Trudeau and his famous "Because it's 2015" equity dictum.

P&G's social justice credentials appeared to be impeccable, but it never hurts to get some additional insurance. To stand out from the pack, a global corporation needs a pet project, something it can call its own. And P&G found one.

If you surf the internet at all, you have come across gobs of podcasts on topics you may or may not care about produced by people you may or may not have heard of. You might think diversity would not be a problem in this medium, but you would be wrong! P&G knows better! They have teamed up with iHeart Media and Seneca Women to create a Podcast Academy – for women only! A contest was held to find ten stunning and amazing women who would then be given all the assistance needed to launch their podcasts on the Seneca Women Podcast Network. According to Seneca:

> The six-week intensive program will kick off in May and will include one lecture per week with direct access to industry-leading mentors, all women who are at the top of their respective fields in podcasting. These workshops will be led by established podcast hosts, producers and executives, allowing the winners to gain valuable information about all aspects of the podcast business including development, sound engineering, distribution, marketing, sales and overall operations. Creators will also receive a stipend and top-of-the-line audio equipment to produce episodes of their shows, which will all become part of the Seneca Women Podcast Network.

Needless to say, there are probably any number of men who could benefit from such a program. In fact, iHeartMedia is on record as saying that half of their new podcasts in the past year are hosted by women. If that's the case, then why restrict the contest to women? Well, it's the old "women's voices need to be heard" trope. Of course, if you promote only women, then only women's voices will be heard. Baritones need not apply.

So who are these ten stunning and amazing voices? Predictably, they are an ethnically diverse group. Just as predictably, they deal with the usual self-help themes (e.g., personal finance, dating), but they also feature more esoteric themes, such as "Unusual Hobbies," "Hallmark [TV movies, not greeting cards] Junkies," and "The Memory Whisperer," a show about Alzheimer's. The most intriguing is a women's health show called "My Vagina Said What?" Well, I guess women's voices must be heard, no matter what orifice the voice emanates from. (B Movie Recommendation: Chatterbox, a 1977 film about a young woman with a talking vagina.)

Ah, but P&G has not forgotten about men! You see, P & G has been sponsoring a podcast called Man Enough since June 21, 2021. The host of the podcast is Justin Baldoni, an actor/director/producer, and author of Man Enough: Undefining My Masculinity. The blurb for the book calls it "A GRIPPING, FEARLESS EXPLORATION OF MASCULNITY." Oh, I get it – like The Dirty Dozen? Not hardly.

Well, in podcasting, it's always a good idea to have sidekicks to bounce ideas off, and Man Enough is no exception. To that end, the podcast also features Canadian Liz Plank, author of For the Love of Men: From Toxic to a More Mindful Masculinity. Her establishment credentials are impressive. At McGill University in Montreal, she majored in women's studies and international development. After receiving McGill's prize for outstanding undergrad women's studies major, she followed up with a master's degree from the London School of Economics.

Some of her post-academic achievements include writing for the Huffington Post and "Flip the Script," a video series, and serving as a columnist for MSNBC. Marie Claire magazine ranked her among the most influential women in media, and she was named one of the World's Most Influential People in Gender Policy by Apolitical. She is ranked as one of Forbes 30 Under 30 in media and she is on the board of Girl Up, a UN Foundation non-profit that exhorts girls to change the world.

I ask you, gentlemen, if Liz Plank isn't qualified to expound on masculinity and offer advice to men, then who is?

In looking up Jamey Heath, the third member of the podcast team, I thought he might have something interesting to say, as he writes and produces songs.

I was wrong. On his web site, the first thing one sees is the slogan "One planet, one people, please." Then he offers us this gem of wisdom:

> "Unless I'm doing it with a global purpose it feels like a waste of time."

Geez, how provincial can you get! When I sit down at my keyboard , I have a cosmic purpose in mind. Please park your geocentric privilege, earth man!

Summing up, we have two Americans, one black and one white, plus a Canadian woman. Not sure what sort of grade that would register on the DEI meter, but it would probably pass muster. Call it three peas in a podcast.

Well, if you're curious about this trio, there's a year's worth of past podcasts on YouTube, so take your pick. Before you do that, however, check out the promotional video:

I like to think I'm a fairly articulate individual but after sitting through this preview four times, words fail me. Actually, a number of words come to mind: touchy-feely…psychobabble…New Age…metrosexual…cuckfest. I just can't string the words together cohesively to describe what I saw. I'd love to hear what a focus group of Teamsters would have to say about the show. It makes the Oprah Winfrey Show look like Face the Nation. Nothing I say about this clip could compete with the clip itself.

The podcast purports to be about redefining masculinity, but it appears they steer clear of a number of important manosphere topics, namely: family law courts, female-only affirmative action, false rape accusations, circumcision, debunking the pay gap, the ruinous social costs of single motherhood, male disposability, hypergamy, gynocentrism, MGTOW, or any of the topics you read about regularly on this web site.

I could be wrong, however. Maybe they'll invite Paul Elam to be a guest on the show…or Mike Buchanan…or Sandman…or Stefan Molyneaux. Sure, and maybe one day you'll see Turd Flinging Monkey on Wall Street Week.

A blurb for the podcast says it's about "how traditional structures and attitudes toward masculinity oppress and negatively affect men, women and humanity as a whole." We get "honest and at times uncomfortable conversations with assorted folks."

That's right, it's yet another one of those conversations we need to have, and when all is said and done you need to get on board with the hosts. Agreeing to disagree is not an option. It's for your own good, of course.

Now I'm not calling for a boycott of P&G because of this stuff. For all I know, their competitors are just as bad. Suffice to say that their corporate policies belong in one of their best-selling products.

I refer to Pampers.

Lecture 12: How to Break a Dialectic

Adam Kostakis · 30 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Feminism helps men too! – late 20th century folk saying

If you have spent even a short amount of time browsing the multitudinous websites and blogs of the Men's Rights sphere, you will have no doubt encountered a feminist detractor or two asserting that "Not All Feminists Are Like That." This has become so common that MRAs have taken to referencing this as the "NAFALT" defence. But should the claim be so readily dismissed? Depending on the context, the feminist might well be right. A hypothetical feminist who stumbled upon my last two posts, which point to the eventual outcome of feminism as the physical extermination of men, might well object that she does not hope for this future, and therefore is Not Like That – and she is not necessarily wrong.

Of course, our hypothetical feminist would not have read closely enough, for I clearly stated that the physical extermination of men is more likely to be attempted as the result of an organic process, beginning with hostile indifference, followed by active persecution through state bureaucracies, without the requirement that extermination be consciously articulated or advocated by any more than a small number of feminists. The others only need to go along with the programme; they do not need to understand where it will all end. At the heart of this is the dichotomy between Earnest and Radical Feminists.

On the face of it, this distinction seems to imply that, as feminists are fond of saying, feminism is not monolithic. In other words, some feminists might read from the gospel of Mary Daly, while others just want a fair deal for women. This is a more elaborate version of NAFALT, but it does not explain why two ostensibly conflicting ideologies are referred to by the same name: feminism. In fact, stating that feminism is non-monolithic sidesteps the issue of how all these different sub-feminisms relate to each other and to feminism as a whole. Would feminism still be feminism if one of its sub-feminisms were removed? Possibly. The death of eco-feminism would not spell disaster for feminism in general, or for any other sub-feminism in particular. But what about the two main prongs of feminism – Radical Feminism, which is openly misandric, and Earnest Feminism, whose supporters "just want a fair deal"? Could feminism survive the death of either of these? Or does the ideology as a whole owe its existence to their reciprocity? Is their relationship inherently and intrinsically symbiotic?

I contend that the differences between Earnest and Radical Feminists are superficial, accounting only for the perceived differences between feminists themselves. The intellectual distance between two feminists in disagreement might seem, to them, to be vast indeed; a philosophical Grand Canyon! But to non-feminists, who stand far away from them both, and observe feminism from a distance, the two bickering ideologues stand very close to each other. Yes, we can just about see them on the horizon – two small figures, shouting over a pothole! The feminist, having automatically ruled out the legitimacy of any space that is non-feminist, perceives feminism as the whole world, and on this tiny plane of existence, the interval of a few feet is colossal – large enough to justify drawing a chalk line on the ground, and saying, "that is your space, this is mine, and we are not like each other! Certainly, we are not a monolith!" But, to the non-feminist, who is not blinkered by ideology, and thus perceives much more of the world generally, the feminists in the distance are standing nearly on top of each other as they quarrel over their claims to a small piece of land.

In other words: the distance between objects becomes more significant the closer you get to them. And if you pay no attention to anything that is not those objects, then those objects will appear to be the entire world! And thus any distance between them will seem enormous, because you lack any sense of scale. Feminists are not in any kind of position to know how much they differ from each other, from the perspective of the non-feminist world; they cannot judge because they lack the prerequisite non-feminism.

So when a feminist tries to pass off the elaborated NAFALT defence, as apologia for herself or for the atrocious behavior of her sisters, you must remind her that she is in no position to judge how far she differs from other feminists! The differences she perceives might seem very significant from her own subjective point of view, but she must be made to understand that she is a participant in the social organism called feminism, that she speaks from within the big tent, and thus has absolutely no right to tell us how we should look at the tent from outside! The non-feminist world, you must explain, experiences the force of feminism from one direction in particular, and when we turn to look in that direction, we see infallibly that the Earnest Feminist stands proudly, side by side, with the Radical.

Now, I would presume that such an arrangement as exists between Earnest and Radical Feminists is one of necessity. Feminism requires both the acceptable public face of the salesman (trustworthy, just trying to make an honest living), and the momentum, that inner drive that keeps the whole show running (greasy, oiled palms on the factory floor). Neither could exist without the other. If only the public face of Earnest Feminism existed, it would get nowhere, because there would be no molten core of misandry, no dynamo at its centre to motivate action. On the other hand, if only the combustion engine of Radical Feminism existed, the movement would fold overnight, being exposed immediately as the politics of hate. Without the engine, all you would have is an object that looks nice but goes nowhere. Forget the paintwork, and nobody would want to buy it.

Whatever it is, feminism must be marketable if it is going to be successful – so its marketability alone cannot tell us anything about what it is.

Earnestness and Radicalism are two sides of the same feminist coin. The dichotomy allows for Radical attacks against men, followed up by the Earnest defence that feminism is a nice doctrine, or at least it is not monolithic, and anyway, anyone who is against it "just hates women." The two sides fit together like two pieces of a jigsaw puzzle, the picture only making sense when they are combined.

Yes, feminism is one single, simple entity, monolithic in its aspirations, merely presenting different faces depending on context. The various manifestations of feminism, whether intended for public consumption or not, hold in common the constant that they seek to increase the power of women. This is the locus, the centre of gravity of feminism – whether it appears as a belief in innate female superiority, or as the aspiration to female domination in material terms, the actualization of female power will be present in some form or other. Without this epicentre, around which all else revolves, the movement could not survive; its sudden implosion would send its members spinning out of orbit in all different directions. The only thing which binds feminists together is the belief that the status of women must be elevated and the status of men must be relegated; that women must be made more superior, and men more inferior. Beyond this, there are only side issues, arguments which have no bearing on the primary thesis of female supremacy. These side issues are a distraction for the outside world, allowing for feminism to remain intact and coherent even when its activists appear to run into disputes.

Now, we are already clear on the aims of Radical Feminists. I have already described the plans they have for men and maleness. Radicals are content for all men to be exterminated or enslaved. They have openly declared war on men, and the future, if they get their way, can be summed up by the infamous pictures of Lynndie England, in her little soldier's outfit, sexually humiliating naked men, using dogs to attack their genitals, and so on. The Radical Feminist dreams of this abuse, not confined to an Iraqi prison, but normalized across the world. The victims would not be Iraqis, as Iraqis, but men, as men. Much like the Army personnel who imagined that they were delivering Collective Punishment to members of a collectively guilty class of people at Abu Ghraib, Radical Feminists believe in the concept of Collective Male Guilt, and in the necessity of delivering punishment to all men.

In the Radical Feminist mind, all men are guilty, inherently, as men. “All men are rapists” is not just a relic of the past; it is the horizon that Radical Feminism is pushing us towards. By this, I do not mean that all men will become rapists, but that all men will be indicted as rapists. Any punishment, then, no matter how extreme, will become justified against this class of heinous abusers and violators. (Note that, in one of the Abu Ghraib torture pictures, the soldiers have written “I am a rapeist (sic)” onto the thigh of one of their victims – even though it was the soldiers themselves who were carrying out the rapes. The parallel to Radical Feminism is chilling.)

We know this about Radical Feminists, but what about those who “aren’t like that” – namely, the Earnest Feminists? It is true enough that many, perhaps most, Earnest Feminists do not look forward to a future in which men are enslaved or exterminated. Their role is not to dispossess men and shove them into prisons, but to convince us that there is no sex war. Even as men are imprisoned, tortured and murdered by state agents acting in the name of feminism, Earnest Feminists will pretend that there is not a war happening. Indeed, the effectiveness of the feminist project depends on the misperception that a war is not happening. They frame this desperate situation as something other than it is: progress towards equality, opening up dialogues, liberating people from restrictive gender roles, and so on.

No. This is a war, and it is one that feminists have openly declared. The true insidiousness of feminists becomes most apparent when we consider that, having declared war, they proceeded to demand that their enemy combatants show them respect, continue to protect them, and provide for their wellbeing. The duplicitousness in pretending that a war is not happening even as one wages it is a necessary element of the feminist way of war. Chivalry must be sustained if feminism is to advance. Women’s wellbeing must remain a priority for men. If it is not – if men en masse suddenly became cognizant of the war that has been declared on them, they would organize and found permanent initiatives to defend themselves. They would seek to remove female privilege. There would be no guarantee that they would stop once parity has been restored to men and women, but could even continue to push against women – it is difficult to know what would happen in such a situation!

A sex war, fought in traditional warlike style, in which men showed up to fight in the same numbers as women, would undoubtedly result in male victory, owing to men’s physical strength and aptitude for technical mastery. A war fought in traditional style, then, would be a losing strategy for feminists. They must wage war in a different way, which necessarily involves the active denial that war is happening. But what about the very language of “the gender war”? Was this not born of feminist rhetoric? It was, indeed, but it belongs to that period of recent history before men were willing to stand up for themselves. Men began standing up to misandry at a critical point of feminist development – that point when explicit hatred reached an apex then quickly died down. The ‘third wave’ was born. Ostensibly a new version of feminism, the only real difference between the third and previous ‘waves’ is the level of rhetorical discipline. No more do we hear of a war against men (at least, not from the Earnest Feminists), and yet the war continues unabated. And when men react to the war against them, as though it is a war, they are informed that feminism is just about equality, and the act of fighting back against their persecutors makes them horrible misogynists.

After tearing apart entire cities and cultures, after having ground countless men down beneath their tank treads, the feminist army is confronted by one man who has picked up a rock, ready to throw it. Teary-eyed, her lower lip trembling, the batallion leader cries out, “stop being so hateful!”

The transition from second to third wave has not made feminism any less hostile or hateful. This was a superficial change, a rhetorical rejigging – the plastering of makeup onto the public face for public consumption. While the feminists of the second wave openly admitted to hating all men, modern day Earnest Feminists recognize certain categories of men who are not deserving of hatred – conjuring up exceptions to more easily maintain the general rule. Earnest Feminists are less likely to say “I hate men,” and are more likely to say “I only hate those men who are abusive or not active against abusive men.” Still, this is practically all men. Men who are neither abusive nor active against abusive men are the hated vast majority – the general rule. Of course, there are innumerable reasons why a man might not devote his time to being active against abusive men – he might not even have that free time, unlike your typical college feminist. We need not explore the reasons why a man would not be actively against abusive men. It suffices to say that he has no moral obligation to be, particularly since war has been declared on him, and the very people he is being called on to protect are those who wish to destroy him. It is pure female entitlement –

Gynocentric privilege – to expect that men should act as their personal bodyguards. And those men who are active against abusive women are not admired for their contributions to humanity, of course – they are hated all the more for it.

Earnest Feminists are not necessarily conscious of their role as denialists. They do not need to be. They fulfil the role just as effectively when they believe themselves to be something else. It might be thought, then, that Earnest Feminists have been misguided, manipulated even, by the Radicals. But keep in mind that they are only as Earnest as they are Feminist. Yes, they are still feminists, and have not been 'tricked' into this identity. It is an identity freely chosen. The Earnest Feminist, remember, stands side by side with the Radical; the former too will Kafka-trap you, she will falsely accuse you, she will tar your sex with one broad stroke. The difference between Earnest and Radical Feminists can be summed up as follows: while the Radical openly encourages and celebrates the spreading of misandry, the Earnest Feminist trivializes, excuses and justifies it. Beyond this, there is no difference, and both seek to increase the power of women over that of men.

Without the Earnest Feminist's false demeanor of reasonableness, feminism would have made no progress. As counter-feminists, we must recognize that the appearance of reasonableness from anybody identifying as 'feminist' is a ruse. Behind the façade is ideological motive, not the capacity for compromise; the desire to dominate discussion, not to work towards collective solutions; anti-male emotionalism, not impartial rationality. One typical Earnest Feminist ploy is to cry "try to see things from my perspective" – implying fairness, neutrality, objectivity, and so on. And yet she has no intention of trying to see things from your perspective, because you are not a feminist, and non-feminist perspectives are by definition illegitimate. What she means is not "let's both try to see things from each others' perspectives," but "I'll see things from my perspective; you see things from my perspective too."

Earnest Feminists exercise a form of control that Radicals cannot, because the latter have abandoned all pretence to impartiality. For Earnest Feminists, this is only a pretence, because the ideology trumps all. Only a 'compromise' which fully adheres to feminist doctrine could be acceptable.

Of course, certain Earnest Feminists go further than this, and imply that they have already incorporated mens' perspectives into their programme: "feminism helps men too!" It's a fair bet that you'll never hear Radicals uttering such nonsense, because harming men is their conscious intention and one that they are open about. Still, the Earnest Feminists might genuinely believe that this is an accurate statement, as they are not necessarily conscious of the harmful effects that feminism necessarily has on men. But this does not make it sincere. A sincere approach to "helping men too" would involve actually asking men how they might best be helped, and then incorporating these answers into the agenda. Instead, Earnest Feminist practice involves telling men what will help them, without deeming it necessary to canvass any more than a handful of marginal pro-feminist males.

The feminist idea of "help" is rooted in Patriarchy Theory – that is, it is rooted in the same animosity towards men which is the cause of the problems that a sizable number of men actually identify as problems. To put it another way, the cure is just more of the disease. Given that feminists fundamentally cannot accept the culpability of their own movement in causing or contributing towards anything negative, they will only ever locate the cause of men's problems in social phenomena which are not feminism. Feminism will not accept even the smallest share of the blame for the oppressive conditions it has brought directly into existence. Men's problems may only be traced back to men themselves, and hence to historical Patriarchy.

It is for this reason that, when Earnest Feminists claim that feminism "helps men too," you do not then see them lobbying against false rape accusations or for equal paternity rights. On the contrary, that kind of lobbying would damage feminist interests; men are of secondary concern, and may only be helped up from those problems that they have caused for themselves. Hence, the terrible tragedy of men not being allowed to wear dresses, even while women can comfortably walk around in pants, is infallibly the number one priority of an Earnest Feminist who sets out to "help men too." The fact that the overwhelming majority of men do not care about this issue and are not personally affected by it is irrelevant; it can be traced back to an impression of Patriarchy, and is also a good excuse to promote emasculation. Earnest Feminists, like Radicals, pathologize normal masculinity. They blame men for not wanting to wear dresses; i.e. they blame men for not having the problems that they tell us we should have. It is, so they say, male-enforced social conditioning that makes men "afraid" of appearing feminine. All evidence suggests that the vast majority of men have greater problems than this, and do not live in fear of appearing feminine. But that's what fits the feminist narrative.

The notion that feminism is helping to "liberate both sexes from rigid gender roles" is particularly laughable, considering that feminism is entirely dependent upon men being forced to retain their traditional role of protector and provider. That has been covered elsewhere.

When men do attempt to raise their own concerns, feminists refuse to recognize them. They victim-blame – e.g. "men are responsible for their own problems" – and attempt to shift discussion back to what they think our problems should be. In effect, men are denied the right to decide what their own problems are. Our real problem, Earnest Feminists earnestly explain, is that we are just too male. Despite what we may claim our problems are – that maleness is increasingly curtailed, that maleness is pathologized, that maleness has become grounds for acceptable discrimination – the feminist response is that maleness actually is pathological and needs to be curtailed even further.

How is it that feminism "helps men," by ascribing negative attributes to maleness? Tell me, was anybody ever helped by others ascribing negative attributes to him? Or would you say that this harms him? Feminism "helps men" by encouraging them to stop being men; to renounce their nature; to hate themselves; to believe that their sexuality is inherently flawed and a force for evil. What help this is!

Here's a fun little juxtaposition:

> "What it boils down to is this: Men, not women, need to be the ones creating the spaces to discuss men's issues."
> Quote from finallyfeminism101 weblog

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qodygTkTUYM&w=420&h=315](Video: Feminists Disrupt a Forum About Battered Husbands)

Get the picture? It's a game that law enforcement have been playing for decades. The 'good cop' is reasonable, even sympathetic, though of course, he insists that the responsibility for your crime rests entirely with you. The 'bad cop' will just scream at you until you give yourself up. And when you finally do just give up, because you've been ground down, you mutter your complaints, and the good cops over at finallyfeminism101 will remind you of what they said all along: that you need to be the one taking responsibility for discussing your own issues. See how that works? It's not their fault. It's yours.

Yes, Earnest Feminists have supported Radical proposals every step of the way – whether this involves denying men paternity rights, or creating rape shield laws to deny exculpatory evidence and more efficiently lock up innocent men, or diverting stimulus packages from men hit by recession to women who had not even lost their jobs.

The only level at which Earnest Feminists disagree significantly with Radicals is the rhetorical. A Radical might say "kill all men," and an Earnest Feminist might say "I don't agree with that," but she will go ahead and advocate that the healthcare gap be increased further, with the full knowledge that men continue to die earlier and suffer worse health overall.

Earnest Feminists distance themselves from the extremist rhetoric of the Radicals, but this is just how the dialectic works – you reach the goal slowly, bit by bit, by getting the other side to compromise with your moderate wing. Earnest Feminists are the good cops – the ones you want to strike a deal with before those nasty bad cops get back. What's often missed is that they are all cops. Compromise with the moderate Earnest Feminists on one issue, and the centre ground shifts: now the deal you struck is taken for granted, and the radical fantasy is a step closer. What do Earnest Feminists do then? Rest on their laurels, content with the compromise they reached? No, they see the opportunity to get even more for women, and so they advocate for more. A compromise is reached again, and the centre ground shifts further towards radicalism.

Fortunately, I know of a way to break a dialectic, and that is to plant your feet firmly in the ground and refuse to budge an inch. Absolutely refuse to compromise on any issue. It's as simple as that. Just keep in mind that behind the veneer of reasonableness is ideological motive, which will shift reality closer to the radical fantasy in which you are actively persecuted. If you can keep that in mind, it becomes very easy to refuse even the slightest compromise with a feminist.

Ultimately, feminists should be ignored. There is no use attempting to debate them, because their ideological motive trumps the possibility of admitting wrongness. Remember that feminist ideology is adopted in order to satiate violent, vindictive emotions, not as a result of logical thought. Those we should make an effort to appeal to are non-feminists, but they are not counter-feminists. That is, they are not yet activated in the struggle against feminism. One could split people up into three categories as follows:

- Revolutionaries (counter-feminists)
- Reactionaries (feminists)
- Civilians (non-feminists)

The goal, then, is to recruit civilians to the counter-feminist side before the feminist camp gets to them. Given the rapid and exponential growth of the Men's Rights Movement, we are clearly already enjoying success in this regard.

Adam

Sex Insanity Amongst Early Feminists – The Fiamengo File 2.0

Robert Brockway · 31 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Bill Manser: Wrongly Imprisoned For 5 Years

AVfM Video Source · 1 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Bill Manser was imprisoned for five years for unpaid child support for a child that was not his.

Bloodstained Men: Afternoon protest of day 2 of the New England Circumcision Crisis Protests

AVfM Video Source · 1 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Letter to The Washington Post About "Democracy Dies in Darkness" Editorial

Stephen Bond · 4 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following letter was sent to each member of the Washington Post's Editorial Board after a recent op-ed that referenced the Post's "Democracy Dies in Darkness" slogan. The letter addresses the Post's hypocrisy using the slogan after publishing two hateful articles in 2018, "Why Can't We Hate Men?" and Amber Heard's op-ed that sparked Johnny Depp's defamation lawsuit against her.

* * *

Dear Washington Post Editorial Board Member ,

I respectfully ask that, as a member of the Washington Post's Editorial Board, you take the time to read this letter about the Post's Democracy must not die in darkness editorial published earlier this month and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

The article was a moving tribute to the bravery of Nobel Peace Prize recipients Maria Ressa and Dmitry Muratov, "… journalists of distinction and grit who faced off against repressive governments" and about the need for a free press to counter the world's increasingly authoritarian regimes.

The editorial's title, of course, comes from the Post's Democracy Dies in Darkness slogan that first appeared in the Post in early 2017.

However, the Post's use of the slogan is hypocritical and reveals a journalistic blindness in its use.

This blindness was unambiguously demonstrated by a repulsive article published by the Post in June 2018, Why Can't We Hate Men? This #MeToo-inspired rant was written by the director of women's studies at Northeastern University, who had the gall to openly and shamelessly express a Nazi-like hatred for men in a major American newspaper.

Particularly as a member of the Post's editorial board, do you think that by printing an article that by its very name must be considered "hate speech", the Post falls short of the true spirit of its "Democracy Dies in Darkness" slogan?

Do you think that it was appropriate for the Post to have published it? Do you think, as some of the article's more than 3,300 (vastly negative) commenters responded, "just change 'men' to 'Jews'", is a fair summarization of this hateful diatribe?

Do you think that the article echoes anything from the ugly history of Europe in the middle of the 20th century?

If you don't see it, think about the term "the patriarchy" the author references and that is also mindlessly used by many Post columnists. Do you think that in the same way that the Nazi's use of a "Jewish conspiracy" aided in perpetuating hate and violence against Europe's Jews, the use of the term "the patriarchy" aids in perpetuating hate and violence against men?

If you think the comparison is exaggerated, then how do you reconcile Mona Eltahawy, an Egyptian-American feminist published in the Post who, in a 2019 radio interview, called for the use of "justifiable violence" against men and imagines "… a scenario in which we kill a certain number of men every week" to "dismantle the patriarchy"? Or ultra-radical Valerie Solanas, author of the SCUM Manifesto – the Society for Cutting Up Men – who called for not only destruction of the patriarchy, but also the complete elimination of the male sex? These are not the only women calling for male genocide:

- Christine Fair, associate professor at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service: "All of them deserve miserable deaths while feminists laugh as they take their last gasps. Bonus: we castrate their corpses and feed them to swine? Yes." – 2019 tweet

- Mary Daly, former Boston College feminism professor: "If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. The world would be better off with dramatically fewer men."
- Sally Miller Gearhart, college feminism professor: "…the ratio of men to women must be radically reduced so that men approximate only ten percent of the total population." – "The Future – If There is One – is Female", 1982
- #killallmen: this hateful hashtag might not literally call for male genocide; some claim it's "humor", but does anyone think that a #killallwomen would be considered funny?

Most recently, this journalistic blindness was on display for the entire world to see during Johnny Depp's lawsuit over the Amber Heard op ed, published by the Post in December 2018, a mere six months after the "Why Can't We Hate Men" article.

The Heard article shows that the Post has abandoned its journalistic integrity in favor of a biased "gender journalism" that allows gender partisan propaganda to be printed in the guise of "news" or "human interest stories". (Normally, I try to use non-partisan references, but even partisan sources like The Federalist sometimes are undeniably correct in their assessments.)

After Depp's overwhelming victory, instead of acknowledging the massive error it made in publishing the article, the Post only added a feeble editor's note to the op-ed and then passed the responsibility to its media critic to "explain" the Post's error.

Given the worldwide negative light on the Post's decision to publish Heard's article I would have thought that someone from the Post's management team would have written something.

Especially with articles like this online:

"A publication with any semblance of ethics might have asked Depp for comment about the sexual violence claims before running with the allegations — then subsequently spiked the op-ed or sicced its reporters on the case for more fact-finding. But not The Washington Post.

"That paper, which loves to blather in its self-important tone about how "democracy dies in darkness," didn't bother to turn the lights in the direction of Heard's claims. Instead, it gave her a free pass to air her dirty laundry against her ex-husband and consequently enabled her to paint herself both as a victim and a crusader of the Me Too era."

Following the ACLU's example, at the beginning of the Depp/Heard trial I ghost-wrote an "imagined rebuttal" to the Heard/ACLU article with Mr. Depp as the "author". This rebuttal deconstructs the original article and, paragraph by paragraph, provides a more balanced and truthful assessment than provided by the horribly biased article published by the Post.

I implore you to read this rebuttal and give it due consideration. In case you decide not to read it, here are its major points:

1. Feminists have threatened and committed actual violence against researchers and others who have told the truth about domestic violence: that women batter as much as men. This is feminism's Big Lie. (For proof see The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project.)
2. Feminists have lied about many other things, including the wage gap, or claiming that women don't make false accusations (e.g., Duke and UVA rape cases) or commit sexual abuse.
3. The Post has a provable history of feminist-inspired bias, thus helping feminists to propagate their many lies. (For example, the Post has almost universally portrayed domestic violence as "men battering women", ignoring substantial evidence that women equally batter men and that mothers commit a large majority of child abuse.)

4. On their website the ACLU says that its main purpose is to defend and preserve individual rights and liberties, but the organization spectacularly fails to meet this objective for one group of citizens: male college students.
5. The federal government – including President Biden – through its acquiescence to the US Department of Education's unlawful misuse of Title IX to handle sexual assault allegations at the nation's colleges and universities, is complicit in violating the civil rights of male college students.

Were any of these truths conveyed in either the "Hating Men" or the Amber Heard / ACLU op-ed?

No, the Post has completely ignored easily proven facts like these for decades.

As a lifelong reader of the Post, I've always been proud of "my newspaper", never more so when the Post, at great risk, in 1971 courageously published the Pentagon Papers and years later exposed a corrupt president with its legendary Watergate reporting.

But this pride has turned to shame over many years as I've noticed the Post has adopted an increasingly biased and extreme feminist-inspired view on issues of gender, most notably by its outrageously imbalanced, provably incorrect coverage of domestic violence.

This shame turned to quiet outrage in 2018 by the publication of the two above-mentioned articles that undeniably demonstrate the extreme gender biases of the newspaper. This is no longer the Washington Post of Katherine Graham, Ben Bradlee, Bob Woodward, and Carl Bernstein. It's been taken over by partisan ideologues, blind to the truth of their extreme positions.

For some time now I've been writing letters to Post columnists (listed below) and emailing notices to Post management to try to get the paper to recognize its extreme gender biases.

I plead to each of you: Please take the time to digest the contents of this letter (including hyperlinks), to recognize these biases, to acknowledge them, and most importantly, to bring back a fair-minded balance to its coverage of gender issues.

Please bring the Washington Post back to sanity and respectability.

Sincerely,

Stephen Bond

Letter also sent individually to:

EDITORIAL BOARD MEMBERS:

Ruth Marcus, Deputy Editorial Page Editor

Karen Tumulty, Deputy Editorial Page Editor

Jo-Ann Armao, Associate Editorial Page Editor

Jonathan Capehart, social and cultural issues Opinion columnist

Lee Hockstader, Editorial writer focusing on immigration, state and local politics, voting rights, Russia, and the Middle East

David E. Hoffman, Contributing editor

Charles Lane, Economic and fiscal policy editorial writer

Heather Long, Editorial writer and columnist focused on the economy

Stephen Stromberg, Editorial writer

Molly Roberts, Editorial writer covering technology and society

OTHER POST COLUMNISTS TO WHOM LETTERS HAVE BEEN SENT ABOUT THEIR OWN GENDER-BIASED COLUMNS:

Monica Hesse: as the Post's gender columnist, when will you do the right thing and speak out against feminist lies and your paper's one-sided gender bias?

Erik Wemple, wrote a column about the Amber Heard fiasco

Karla Miller, Work Advice Columnist: wrote two articles about the gender wage gap

Janay Kingsberry, Multiplatform editor for "The Lily" web site: wrote article about "dissatisfied U.S. women"

Kate Cohen, "Contributing columnist": wrote two articles about college men

Julianne McShane, "Gender & Inequity journalist": wrote two gender pay gap articles, female doctors underearning their male counterparts and a proposed NY city law requiring employers to include salary in job postings

Miriam Berger, "Reporter covering Middle East, Foreign Affairs": wrote article Abuse Surging During The Pandemic

Candace Buckner, Sports reporter: wrote biased article on "Men Behaving Badly"

The Tale of Thomas and Mary Reibey

Robert Brockway · 6 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Thomas was an officer on His Majesty's ship Britannia. Mary was a horse thief.

Thomas was a 19 year old junior officer when in 1794 he proposed to 17 year old Mary. Thomas was serving in the employ of the British East India Company at the time and Mary was under a seven year sentence of transportation to Australia, having arrived in 1792. Thomas had worked in India and other parts of the British Empire before coming to Australia.

Transportation (the criminal sentence) is an interesting topic. The individual was transported by ship to a remote British colony. Originally convicts were transported to British colonies in North America but the American Revolution put a stop to that. After a few years the British resumed transportation, this time to the newly established colony of New South Wales in what is now Australia.

Transportation generally came in three varieties, seven years, fourteen years and life. One of the interesting consequences of transportation is that those individuals so sentenced were free to return home after their period of transportation was up. Those sentenced to transportation for life were out of luck of course. The trick is that the transported individual had to pay for their own return trip. This was beyond the means of most. Thus for almost everyone transportation was a one way trip.

After Thomas and Mary married they settled on a land grant near Sydney which they began farming. It was standard practice at the time for the colonial government to parcel out land to free settlers and released convicts. The newly minted farmers were expected to start producing food within a few years. If they failed to do so they could forfeit the land.

Along with farming, Thomas also established a trading business. Over the next 15 years his assets and business grew. Using his connections in the East India Company he traded with locations as far away as India and China.

During this period Thomas would still sometimes go to sea. While he was away his wife Mary would manage the various businesses.

In 1806 Thomas heroically rescued several people during a period of severe flooding on the Hawksbury River north of Sydney.

Thomas made one final sea voyage in 1809-1810 and then died in Sydney in 1811 from a disease apparently picked up in India two years earlier. This left Mary Reibey in charge of her husband's business empire. She was now a wealthy woman thanks to her husband's business acumen. The young naval officer had done well for himself, and the horse thief had sorted herself out too.

Using experience gained by assisting her husband, Mary continued to run and grow the businesses. She opened new warehouses and purchased new ships. Such was her standing in the community that the Bank of New South Wales was founded in her house.

In 1820 she went home to England for a visit with two of her children. Yes she was wealthy enough to pay her own way back. She returned to Australia in 1821. This was her home now.

In 1825 Mary was appointed as the governor of a grammar school.

In 1828, seventeen years after the death of her husband, Mary stepped back from active involvement in her businesses and transitioned in to retirement. She went on to live another 27 years in comfort.

Feminists would have us believe that men have historically oppressed women. In contrast Mary Reibey was accepted by her society as a business owner and was appointed to a custodial position over a school. She bought and sold land in her own name. Even when Thomas was live she was active in business.

Mary was a well respected member of her society. Wealthy and powerful. Hardly the image of the down-trodden woman that feminists would have us believe was the historical norm. Mary's situation was common. Wherever and whenever we look at the historical record we see women being active participants in their societies. Women who achieved were respected by men for their hard work and intellectual capabilities.

Along with supporting her husband in business, Mary bore Thomas seven children. The idea of the man working full-time and the woman working part-time while being the primary carer for small children is often seen as modern but it has been the norm for humans societies throughout history.

We must also not forget this society was not a democracy. New South Wales was still operating under marshall law when Thomas and Mary settled there. Governors were all senior officers in the Royal Navy or British Army during this period. Mary didn't have the vote but nor did Thomas. Australia was amongst the first places in the world to grant both universal male suffrage and universal female suffrage yet this would only happen decades after they died.

Both Thomas and Mary contributed to the development of the colony of New South Wales, out of which Australia would grow. Alas gynocentrism is alive and well. Today Mary Reibey is remembered as an important figure in colonial Australia and has appeared on Australian currency. Thomas is largely forgotten.

Further Reading

Australian Royalty

Biography of Mary Reibey at ANU

The featured image depicts Mary Reibey because we couldn't find a picture of Thomas. Any pictures you find online labelled Thomas Reibey are probably of his son or grandson, who were both also called Thomas Reibey. –Ed

Polished Man

Mark Dent · 7 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Adam,

Please forgive the length of this letter. I ask you for your patience and attention. Please read it through to its conclusion.

I have been an admirer of yours for a long time. As a passionate Collingwood supporter, I loved watching you play in the beautiful black and white. You wore your heart on your sleeve and clearly loved our football club.

I was saddened by your forced exit and I've continued to watch you play for the Bulldogs with the same class and passion.

It is clear to me you are a kind, compassionate man, but I was very upset by an Instagram post a friend pointed out in which you announced your new role as an ambassador for Polished Man. This organisation wants to end male violence against women and especially children.

I recall seeing Tim and Jobe Watson promoting this cause some time ago and back then the organization stated clearly that their organization was all about ending male violence against children. Perhaps it has expanded its scope.

You may be wondering why such an apparently righteous cause could cause me to feel so upset.

Let me explain.

If I created an organization whose mission was to end male suicide, I am certain many eyebrows would be raised. The question, "what about female suicide?" would surely be on the lips of the families touched by this scourge due to the loss of a mother, daughter, sister or friend.

As noble as my goal may appear, it would be difficult to justify my focus on just one demographic involved in this devastating societal issue. I could respond by saying the vast majority of suicide victims in Australia and indeed the world are male, but that would bring little comfort to people grieving the loss of loved females.

Why would I not devote myself to promoting an organization whose goal was to end all suicide or at least lessen its occurrence?

Domestic violence is no different.

One third of all victims are men.

According to the Australian Institute of Criminology, one woman is killed every six days and one man is killed every ten days in a domestic violence incident in Australia.

When it comes to the murder of children, the perpetrators are split almost fifty/fifty. Statistics show a child is actually safer being in the care of their biological father than they are being cared for by their biological mum.

These are facts you can research for yourself, Adam. In fact, you should have done some research if you are going to represent an organization focused on an issue as serious as family violence.

In fact, it would be easier to defend a focus on male suicide than it is to defend an organization whose aim is to end male violence against children when women are just as likely to kill their children and far more likely to neglect and abuse them.

It is quite bewildering given the number of child murders committed by mothers in Australia in just the past four months that you could be unaware of the propensity of mothers to kill their children.

It is a shameful truth to state that our media and government spend billions of dollars demonising men and boys and promoting the distorted notion that family violence is an entirely male problem. Most people assume men and only men kill or abuse children and women. The idea that there could be female perpetrators or male victims is seen as ridiculous. Have you ever seen one advertisement on this issue do anything other than present men as the perpetrator and women and children the victims of male violence?

I haven't.

This is quite deliberate and demonstrably false and misleading.

Just last week a mother murdered her three children in Port Hedland. She burned them alive. They said the fathers of the dead children had been informed of their heartbreaking loss. As is always the case, this tragedy stayed in the news cycle for 24 hours. Her children were a daughter aged ten, and two boys aged seven and five months. The mother's name is Margaret Dale Hawke, aged 36. I give you these facts in case you doubt me and want to verify what I tell you.

One article says when she appeared in court, she waved to a supporter in the public gallery.

There were no editorials telling women it was their collective responsibility to take a stand and speak up about mothers who kill their children. There were no television hosts staring down the lens lecturing women about their toxic femininity and urging them to swear an oath, wear a white ribbon or paint their nails.

This kind of reaction is reserved solely for men when a male kills a child or woman.

If the murder of those three children was a rarity, perhaps your organisation could argue that such incidents are so rare as to be almost unworthy of mentioning. But this is far from being the case.

Let me support my point of view with indisputable facts.

The mother who burned her children to death in Port Hedland is the third to do so in the past four months.

Let me provide you with some more heartbreaking evidence to support my claim that the deliberate invisibility of female perpetrators of family violence which is hidden in any government campaign or domestic violence organizations publicity is an outrageous misrepresentation of the truth and daily reality so many experience.

- On March 25th 2022 a mother burned herself and her two daughters to death in Cranbourne. A woman in her 30s and two girls aged under six have been found dead after a car burst into flames in Melbourne's south east.
- On March 17th 2022, a mother, Selvanna Doreswamy burned her two children to death in a car in Perth.
- January 17th 2021, a mother killed her three children, Claire 7, Anna 5 and Matthew 3 in Tullamarine. Her husband discovered the dead bodies of his children.
- In 2021, a Geelong woman burned a married couple and their baby alive.
- Three husbands were burned to death by their female partners in 2019 within a period of a couple of months. The shocking murders were barely mentioned in the media. I'll give you the names of these three men who died horrifically and almost anonymously as victims of female violence.
- Jeffrey Lindsell
- Darren Reid
- Daniel Surtees

Let me introduce you to a woman whose compassion extends to all victims of family violence. Her compassion isn't conditional or based upon the genitals of the perpetrator or victim.

Jewell Drury, like me, is astounded by the media silence regarding the horrific murders of these dads by their female partners. She is equally appalled by the silence or very different tone our media adopts when women perpetrate violence on their partners or children.

Let me quote Jewell.

> "Last week I shared information about the deaths of three men who were all set on fire by their female partners in separate incidents. Two of the men were set alight in front of their children and all three men later died from their injuries.
>
> Three men. Each murdered by his female partner.
>
> All three set on fire and left to die.
>
> No floral tributes.
>
> No candlelight vigils.
>
> No media outrage or finger pointing lectures by the hosts of The Project or The Today show.
>
> Not one person was willing to stand up for these innocent victims of domestic violence."

Why is it the case, Adam, that we never hear a word about male victims? Why are women never told they carry collective responsibility for the acts of murder carried out by people who happen to share their gender?

Whenever one man commits an act of domestic violence, all men are told they carry responsibility for creating a toxic masculine society which encourages or enables such violence.

This is utterly despicable behaviour. We would condemn any such collective blame targeting any other demographic in our society. If all Muslims were held responsible for the violence of a tiny minority of Muslim extremists you would rightly label such behaviour bigoted and phobic. If we blamed or even demanded action from the indigenous community to end their far higher rate of family violence within their communities, we would be branded racist and condemned.

Yet men are consistently blamed, targeted and held responsible simply because they share the immutable characteristics of a perpetrator. This is the very definition of bigotry. You are continuing this tradition by urging men to polish their nails and take a stand as if they can somehow stop the tiny minority of males who because of mental illness, drug and alcohol abuse or financial strain resort to violent abuse. These have always been the major drivers of violence in the home for both men and women and this is borne out by all of the literature.

Yet our government campaigns on a lie. The respect women campaign claims a lack of respect is what leads to the violent abuse of women and children. It is a lie. When Senator Leyonhjelm questioned the women responsible for the promotion of this multi-million dollar propaganda campaign in the senate, none of them could provide a skerrick of evidence to support their assertion that a lack of respect is a leading cause of family violence.

It isn't listed in the top ten causes listed in the WHO literature on domestic violence.

Watch it for yourself. Of course, this truth never made it into the mainstream media.

Senator Leyonhjelm asks questions about "Let's Stop It At The Start" domestic violence ad campaign – YouTube

Premiers and Prime Ministers promote this man blaming and male demonisation regardless of which side of the political fence they sit. It is shameful and doing untold damage to our boys and young men.

Terms like toxic masculinity are used constantly in our media implying that there is something uniquely poisonous in male DNA which has to be changed, controlled or eradicated.

Sadly Adam, your well-intentioned gesture and promotion of Polished Man is simply reinforcing this concept of collective guilt. It's a virtue signalling stunt which ultimately feeds into the loop telling us men are the cause and only men can stop it.

If our media and governments truly cared about domestic violence their strongest focus would be in our indigenous communities where the rate is said to be thirty times the rates found in urban Australia. This is rarely if ever spoken about or the focus of articles. Why? We don't want to be branded racist so the truth is hidden while indigenous families continue to be torn apart by this scourge, fuelled mostly by alcohol abuse. Indigenous senator Jacinta Price has cried out for action but no-one has the courage to act.

The whole subject is politicised and the truth has been the biggest casualty.

Let me return to that good woman, Jewell Drury again. I want to provide you with more recent examples of mothers who have murdered their children in Australia and ask you how an organisation claiming to care about victims of domestic violence can ignore the countless lives of children lost at the hands of their mums.

Jewell said,

> "Each of the many cases of mothers killing their children which I will list below were represented as a mother's tragic cry for help, or a woman who couldn't cope with the pressures of the family. Of course, the mothers must have suffered abuse at the hands of their husbands- except this was found to be untrue in ALL of the cases I will present here."

Why is this compassion and understanding never afforded to men who snap and kill their children? Men are branded evil, vile monsters who deserve to burn in hell. The contrast in tone is so stark it is disturbing.

Here are the murderous mothers.

- Tamara Gunney is awaiting trial for allegedly murdering her three year old child, Isla Gunney.

Tammara was charged with murdering her child then setting her bedroom on fire. She did this the same day she was meant to give the child to her father who had been awarded custody.

- Akon Guode killed her three youngest children by deliberately driving them into a lake.
- Milka Djurasovik killed her daughters, 10 year old Mia, 6 year old Tiana at the family home in Madeley in Perth. She beat them to death with a hammer.
- Charmaine McLeod 35, murdered her four children, Aaleyn 6, Matilda 5, Wyatt 4 and Zaidok 2, when she deliberately collided head on with a truck on May 27th 2019.
- A horrifying massacre (the worst domestic violence incident in Australian history) took place in Cairns six days before Christmas in Cairns. Eight children were stabbed to death, They were aged between 2 and 14. Their mother, Raina Thaiday was charged with the murder of her seven children and her niece.
- A mother charged with the murder of her 8 year old son, died in jail. Joanne Finch 42 from Tootgarook on the Mornington Peninsula was charged with the murder of her son, Brodie Moran.
- Mother Deidre Morley, murdered her three young children by sedating them with injections before suffocating them.
- Makavelii Leoni was drowned in his bath by his mother, Lina Daley. She had a history of drug abuse. Her son's dead body was covered in bite marks, burn marks and bruises.
- Newly divorced mother, 39, shot her three children dead. All three kids were under 12 years of age. Ashley Auzenne 29, was found dead with the children. Her husband had been awarded custody by the court. She was said to be upset by the decision.
- Mother Melissa Arbuckle placed her baby on train tracks. Her baby was killed. Melissa pleaded guilty to infanticide but did not go to prison because of the tragic circumstances of the case. She is back at work as a veterinary assistant. Her baby is dead.
- A mother, Sofia Nikat confessed to drowning her daughter in a local creek. Her husband had to identify the body of his only child.

Adam, these are just a few of the many more cases from the past decade.

How can any organization claiming to be devoted to the eradication of domestic violence choose to coldly and quite deliberately ignore the clear evidence which shows that domestic violence is not a gendered issue?

Imagine the outrage if campaigns began in which women were urged to swear an oath and wear a ribbon promising that they would intervene or speak up whenever they saw another woman engage in abuse or violence toward their children?

Men have been told to do this.

Imagine if schoolgirls were asked to stand at assembly and apologise for the violent, abusive actions of mother and women they never knew while the boys sat watching. This has taken place at schools across Australia-but of course it was the boys who were asked to stand and apologise for something they had not done. How sickening.

Imagine if the term toxic femininity was used frequently by media commentators and politicians.

Imagine if tv hosts looked down a camera lens and told women to tell their daughters and girlfriends that they should not kill or abuse their babies. Lisa Wilkinson told the men of Australia to tell their sons not to rape.

This endless demonisation of men and boys has gone on for decades. Ads abound showing boys bullying their sisters and dads throwing footballs at their wives' heads and laughing. It is utterly disgusting and pure bigotry.

Do your mates at the Kennel need to be told not to bash their wives or rape their girlfriends, Adam? Perhaps it's all those evil strangers outside of your circle who commit all these horrific acts.

Polished Man is feeding into the very same narrative as the campaigns I mentioned. It tells us DV is a male only issue which can only ever be stopped when men make it stop.

As well intentioned as you clearly are, Adam, I think causes like yours do untold damage to the men and kids who are the silent victims of female abuse. How does a man or boy tell a disbelieving, brainwashed public which already struggles to feel the same compassion and concern for male victims that they are being abused by their wife or mum?

My best mate told me he had been sexually and physically abused by his mum after thirty years of friendship. He told me he found it impossible to speak about because talking about an abusive mum was a taboo subject and it made him feel even more ashamed given the endless focus on fathers being the perpetrators. He said he felt there must be something wrong with him. We are soul mates who talk openly yet it took him three decades to tell me. He finally left an abusive marriage after decades of emotional and physical abuse.

I think of him and the many dads who come home to an empty house which was once filled with the laughter of his children who are now dead at the hands of the women they thought they could trust. What do they think when they hear of campaigns like yours telling the world men must stop family violence or men must stop killing and abusing their children?

How do kids who are abused by their mums ever find their voice when all they see on tv is ads showing demonic fathers and innocent mothers. They will react just like my best mate and turn their pain inward and remain silent.

Who speaks up for the countless boys and girls lying in their graves because of the violence of their mothers? They are forgotten.

An annual candlelight vigil is held in Federation Square, Adam. The names of women and children killed by men are read aloud. The names of men and children killed by female hands are not read out. Rosie Batty used to host the nights. I cannot begin to describe how this silence when it comes to victims of female violence affects me.

Both my son and daughter are victims of vicious street assaults and both bear the scars. Do you think my wife and I were more deeply upset by our daughter's assault and suffering? Do you think we shed more tears over her assault? This is the madness of our society. You know the answer, yet when it comes to domestic violence this is exactly what we do. '

This is the very attitude you promote Adam- the abuse and murder of a man or boy is somehow less tragic than the murder or abuse of a woman or girl. Hence headlines saying "Ten killed, including Two Women."

Your campaign tells us male perpetrators of DV are far more heinous than female perpetrators who are never even mentioned. Perhaps a blade wielded by female hands is less painful as it slices a child's flesh and the flames lit by female hands burn less fiercely.

Unlike you, my heart breaks for all victims of domestic violence. Even your quoted statistic proves my point. One in two children have experienced violence and one in three women. Were men even surveyed? Was their rate of violence experienced deemed unworthy of being cited? We are literally ignoring half of our society every time we present these statistics. What have we become? Men are ignored and nobody even asks the question. Why? You talk about checking in on your mates and mental illness and depression yet you contradict this message about caring for men by being an ambassador for an organisation which offers male victims no recognition or support. How many men have experienced violence? It is the only form of bigotry supported and reinforced by our leaders, teachers and society.

You will receive great acclaim, standing ovations and dewy eyes looks of love and appreciation for continuing the tradition of blaming men for family violence and asking men to do something about it.

You have chosen wisely Adam. I have spent my life trying to speak up for men and boys and it has led to nothing but jeering abuse and denigration. No back pats or awards for me. I don't care. My son, brothers, mates and male students matter as much to me as my beautiful wife, daughter, female friends and female students.

I hope you can find the time to reflect on all I have written.

Thanks for reading this far and good luck with the rest of the 2022 season. You are a good man but I think very misguided on this issue.

Kind regards,

Mark Dent

Ernest B. Bax responds to Lester Ward's 'Gynocentric Theory'

Ernest Belfort Bax · 9 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following article titled 'A Different Interpretation' was penned by Ernest Belfort Bax and published in Justice, 18th September 1909, p.10. (letter)

* * *

DEAR COMRADE, – With reference to Professor Lester Ward's book reviewed in last week's "Justice," and the statements made in it which are apparently regarded by the author as arguments in favour of the Feminist theory from the biological side, I would like to point out that even granting the accuracy of Ward's Biology (which some might possibly be disposed to question), the results he arrives at by no means necessarily point in the direction he wishes to make out they do.

Professor Ward identifies the undivided sex of beings low in the organic scale with the female sex, itself perhaps a doubtful proceeding, but which we will let pass. He then points out that when the division takes place the male, the "fertilising" sex, was relatively unimportant, while the female represented the species. In the course of time the male grew in bodily strength and complexity of development, till, finally, in the human race the wicked male Frankenstein overthrew the domination of the female by his strength of brain and muscle, "although that strength," pathetically remarks our Feminist advocate "had been conferred by her" (?).

Now this sounds like a pretty fairy tale with a Feminist moral does it not? But has it never struck the professor that his own biological statements (be they right or wrong) are susceptible of quite another interpretation to the one he would impress upon them? As thus: In all low organisms nutrition and reproduction are the two most important functions of life. The main working part of the processes of reproduction rested with the female sex after the primitive differentiation of sex, and has done so ever since.

The male sex, on the contrary, relieved by the course of natural development of the greater part of the labour of mere reproduction, gradually acquired functions, physical and psychical, tending to the higher evolution of the species. In the higher mammalian, but notably, of course, in the human race, this concentration in the male sex of the functions concerned in the higher life of the species has gone on apace.

Hence in human society it is man that represents humanity, as such, and not woman, who still retains as her special department those main working processes of reproduction which gave the female sex that paramount position that Lester Ward claims for it in earlier forms of life; processes which are common to the whole animal kingdom, but which in the human world, at least, have ceased to hold that supreme importance per se they possessed in those earlier forms, when higher functions and possibilities had not appeared above the horizon, and when mere reproduction was (after nutrition) the supreme end of every individual of a species, This is at least as plausible a reading of his own biological theories as the Feminist one he champions,

E. Belfort Bax

P.S. – Since writing the above I have seen D.B.M.'s contribution this week on the same subject. Therein I find the following: "Why the statement of these theories is of such immense importance to Socialists is that the gynaecocentric theory [that of Lester Ward] is a striking corroboration of the correctness of the Marxian interpretation that the economic independence of women will be one at the most important phases of the social revolution."

Now I must most strongly protest against this dragging in of Marx "by the hair of his head" so to say, as a stalking-horse for this latest attempt to set up a biological basis for Feminism. The theory in question, I do not hesitate to affirm, is not a corroboration, whether "striking" or otherwise, of anything Marx ever taught. It has nothing whatever to do with the special doctrines of Marx, and it is only too obvious that the name of the author of "Das Kapital" is only introduced in the hope of ensuring for the theory in question a more favourable reception than might be accorded to it otherwise in the ranks of the Social-Democracy.

The economic independence of women has been preached by many writers in this country before and since Marx became known, not all of them Socialists by any means, and may be accepted or not as a consequence of the Social Revolution, quite independently of the theories of Ward as to gynaecocentricity with which it has no necessary connection at all. — E.B.B

Race Motherhood: Is Woman The Original Human Race? – by Dora B. Montefiore 1920

Peter Wright · 10 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following, rather long essay was written in 1920 as a recapitulation of the earlier gynocentric theory presented by Lester F. Ward. The theory, which was openly misandric, proved wildly popular among both feminists and laypersons in this early period of the modern era. Several notable men's human rights activists, including Ernest B. Bax pushed back on the idea. – PW

* * *

Race Motherhood: Is Woman The Race? – by Dora B. Montefiore 1920

Date: 1920
Published: Women's Freedom League
Topic: Lester Ward's Gynocentric Theory

Mrs. MONTEFIORE.
Sydney, 1918.

A PERSONAL NOTE.

In the early days of the century I had the great pleasure of meeting at Oxford the late Professor Lester Ward, whom I had till then known through his scientific writings. In the course of several interesting conversations, I asked him if, in interests of the world-wide movements of women towards an equal share with men in social, political and economic freedom, he would republish in pamphlet form and at a democratic price those parts of Chapter XIV of his work, Pure Sociology, which set forth and give the evidence, for the Gynaecocentric theory of which he is the propounder.

He was much interested in my suggestion, but feared he could not at that time carry out my suggestion of the reprinting of the whole XIVth chapter as his Publisher would, no doubt consider that to republish a chapter of 125 pages out of a book of 575 pages might interfere seriously with the sale of the whole work. He, however, expressed the desire that a summary of the Gynaecocentric Theory would he put before the British Public, and I subsequently write two short articles on the subject, which were published in Justice and led to some correspondence, and requests for a fuller statement of the facts and data on which the theory is founded. At the present time (1920) it appears to me that the urgency of events caused by the recent waging of the World War calls for a reconstructive policy as regards the relations between androcentric and gynaecocentric influences and forces.

Mrs, Charlotte Perkins Gilman in her book 'The Man Made World' "grants to men to-day, a high pre-eminence over women in human development, but shows this development to be a distinction of humanity and not of sex, fully open to women if they use their human powers." It is because it is daily borne in upon many of us with increasing force and intensity how impossible it will be to reconstruct out of the war's chaos a civilisation worth the price we are now daily paying, if androcentric values and sanctions are still allowed unchallenged to prevail, that I desire to put before women and men a short popular statement of Professor Lester Ward's specialist studies in the social relations and spheres of the sexes.

My special object in insisting at the present time on the study of the androcentric and gynaecocentric theories, and of the proofs deduced on either side in support of them is, that at no other time as far as I can see in the world's history have things "centred round" the human male more than they have done during the world war resulting "Peace." His militarist activities, his trade rivalries, carefully preserved political privileges are the only subjects that arouse any enthusiasm in the daily press of the countries of Europe. And every other subject, even the most intimately special function of the human female—childbearing, and child nurture is only of interest to the predominant male in so far as the supply of young males is concerned, who are to fill the ranks in the conscript armies of the world.

Women's thoughts, their training, their activities are all to be centred on militarism and its kindred interests. A Russian General foretold in 1915 in the columns of a Times Supplement how during the next war 40,000,000 men will meet on the battlefields of the world; and women evidently are expected to supply, not only the men children who are to be trained for the ranks of this fantastic army, but are also, to help make the munitions which are eventually in a militarist orgy to maim and destroy their 40,000 000 sons. Never in any preceding war have women suffered the moral degradation of being exploited by men for the unworthy aims of militarism and of commercial rivalry.

Education is only valued in so far as it can beat commercially other nations. Art find literature are narrowed down in the estimation of the public to their financial success in portraying the prowess or the humour of the rival combatants; and what Professor Lester Ward calls "male efflorescence" is the key note of thought and action throughout the countries engaged in mutual extermination. Because it is hard,—well nigh impossible,—at such a moment to persuade men and women to think of anything but the indulgence of hatred or to listen to the calm voice of reason, therefore it is doubly necessary to work unceasingly in the field of right thought, because right thought eventually begets right action, and, though we of this generation may not live to see it, a revulsion of feeling must some day come, and things will have to centre round the nurture of life and of the race, instead of round its destruction.

Androcracy or a world ruled and administered entirely from the male point of view appears to be so helplessly incapable of solving the great life problems which androcentric war has thrust upon us, that it seems necessary to use every means to rouse women to the sense of their lost public opportunities and duties, and re-create in them that social consciousness which, when working with equal opportunity side by side with men, their brothers, shall eventually crown with success the twentieth century task of "the socialisation of achievement!"

D.B.M.
"Wayside,"

Crowborough.
June, 1920.

The Gynaecocentric Theory of Life

Briefly to state the thesis of Professor Lester Ward:

"There has, till recently, been held universally by thinkers and writers the theory that the male sex is primary and the female secondary in the organic scheme, that all things centre, as it were, abut the male, and that the female, though necessary in carrying out the scheme, is only the means of continuing the life of the globe, but is otherwise an unimportant accessory, and incidental factor in the general result."

This theory is called by Professor Ward the Androcentric Theory; and in the XIVth Chapter of "Pure Sociology" opposes it by a theory, the truth of which his studies had forced upon him, and which he calls the Gynaecocentric Theory, or that which holds that:

"The female sex is primary, and the male secondary in the organic scheme, that originally and normally all things centre, as it were, about the female, and that the male, though not necessary in carrying out the scheme, was developed under the operation of the principle of advantage, to secure organic progress through the crossing of strains."

I have purposely placed the two theories quite baldly side by side, so that readers may see at a glance how absolutely opposed to one another they are, and how completely the gynaecocentric theory, if it can be proved to possess scientific value, sweeps away not only all the old cosmogonies, but the endless traditions, maxims, prejudices and sanctions of what is or is not, woman's sphere.

In support of the Androcentric Theory the main evidencies Professor Ward admits are both weighty and numerous.

"In all the principal animals, including the classes of mammals and birds, at least, the males are usually larger, stronger, more varied in structure and organs, and more highly ornamented and adorned than the females."

When we leave the regions of zoology, and begin to compare things in the human races:

"We find the same general class of facts somewhat emphasised … The difference in the brain of man and woman is quite as great as that of the rest of the body. Many measurements have been made of male and female brains, both of civilised and uncivilised races, and always with the same general result, at least, that the female brain is considerably leas than the male both in weight and cubic capacity." [1]

As regards mental power, Ward adduces evidence in support of the androcentric theory to prove that women have but little inventive faculty.

"As invention is the great key to civilisation, and as the function of the intellect, this is a fundamental difference, and has great weight."

Her creative genius is also stated to be inferior to that of men, even in the fine arts there are but few great women architects, sculptors, painters or musical composers.

"Still less," writes Professor Ward can be said for the female side of speculative genius, the faculty by which the mind deals with abstract truth and rises by a series of ever widening generalisations from multiplicity to unity. Women care very little for truth for its own sake, take very little interest in the abstract, and even concrete facts fail to win their attention unless connected more or less directly with persons and with personal advantage, not necessarily to self, but to self or others."

And finally to sum up appears to be a hopeless indictment against the possibility of women every playing an equal part with men in the affairs of the world, the American Professor writes, in order to put the whole case for the Androcentric Majority:

"A glance at the history and condition of the world in general is sufficient to show how small has been and is the role of woman in the most important affairs of life. … In political affairs she has been practically a cipher, except where hereditary descent has chanced to place a crown upon her head. In such cases, however, no one can say that it has not usually rested easily. But from a certain point of view it almost seems as if everything was done by men, and woman was only a means of continuing the race."

And yet in spite of what, on a superficial judgment appears to be overwhelming testimony that the female is secondary in the organic scheme, Professor Lester Ward holds, and expounds on the evidence which I now desire to synthesise in a popular form, the Gynaecocentric Theory.

As regards the history of the theory, he writes:

"So far as I have ever heard, it is wholly my own, no one else having proposed or even defended it, scarcely anyone accepting it, and no one certainly coveting it … At the same time it must rest on facts that cannot be disputed, and the question of its acceptance or rejection must become one of interpreting the facts."

The Professor then gives quotations from writers of different periods who have shadowed forth, in a more or less general way, without basing their reactions on specific facts, the gynaecocentric theory. Condorcet, in his "Tableau Historique des Progres de l'Esprit Humain" is the first writer quoted.

"If we try," writes Condorcet, "to compare the moral energy of women with that of men, taking into consideration the necessary effects of the inequality with which the two sexes have been treated by laws, institutions, customs and prejudices, and fix our attention on the numerous examples that they have furnished of contempt for death and suffering, of constancy in their resolutions and their convictions, of courage and intrepidity, and of greatness of mind, we shall see that we are far from having the proof of their alleged inferiority. Only through new observations can a true light be shed upon the question of the natural inequality of the two sexes."

This opinion of Condorcet's is so allied in spirit to that of our own philosophic writer, Henry Thomas Buckle, that I cannot refrain (though not quoted by Professor Ward) from giving it here. In an address on the subject of "The Influence of Women in the Progress of Knowledge," delivered by Buckle about the middle of the XIXth. century, the writer sets out to prove that in spite of the generally held opinion that women exercised little or no influence over the progress of knowledge, he held, and hoped to convince his audience that "they have actually exercised an enormous influence … so great in fact, that it is hardly possible to assign limits to it; and that great as it is, it may with advantage be still further increased."

After stating that knowledge has three divisions—method, science and art, he goes on to explain how the scientific enquirer has only two ways or methods of attaining his result.

"He may proceed from the external world to the internal; or he may begin with the internal and proceed to the external. In the former case he studies the facts presented to his senses in order to arrive at a true idea of them; in the latter case he studies the ideas already in his mind in order to explain the facts of which his senses are cognizant. If he begin with the facts his method is inductive; if he begin with the ideas it is deductive.

Both methods, of course, are valuable in the discovery of truth, and Buckle's contention is that women, being by nature, more deductive, and men more inductive,

"women have rendered great, though unconscious service to science by encouraging and keeping alive this habit of deductive thought; and that if it were not for them scientific men would be much too inductive, and the progress of our knowledge would be hindered."

Facts, as he implies, having merely a potential, and, as it were, subsequent value, the only advantage of possessing thorn being to draw conclusions from them, the sex that is intuitive and quick to grasp at an idea, is the sex which can use collected facts to advantage, and can act as a spur to the more laborious inductive investigator. He remarks on women's greater quickness of thought and powers of deduction than that of men; and adds:

“Indeed, nothing could prevent its being universally admitted except the fact that the remarkable rapidity with which women think is obscured by that miserable, that contemptible, that preposterous system, called their education, in which valuable things are carefully kept from them, and trifling things continually taught to them, until their fine and nimble minds are often irretrievably injured.”

Of all modern writers Professor Ward holds that Mr. Havelock Ellis is the one most free from the androcentric bias; and he quotes the English writer’s statement-

“That because of woman’s permanent connection with the care of the young, she is of greater importance than the male from Nature’s point of view.” [2]

Bachofe, McLennan and Morgan have all brought to light valuable facts on the subject of the matriarchate, or period when name and property passed through the maternal parent, instead of, as it now does through the paternal. And Ratzenhofer, an ethnologist remarked:—

“It is probable that in the horde there existed a certain individual equality between man and woman; the results of our investigation leave it doubtful whether the man always had a superior position.” Professor Riley, an American entomologist, and a personal friend of Professor Ward, admits that the facts of entomology sustain the gynaecocentric theory; and in the botanical works of Professor Meehan our author finds adumbrations of the same theory, as when he calls attention to a certain form of female superiority in plants; or when he points out that:

“a male flower is an intermediate stage between a perfect leaf and a perfect, or we may say a female flower.”

These, and similar facts stand out, as Professor Ward explains, before the scientist.

“But not according with the accepted view of the relations of the sexes, they are brushed aside as worthless anomalies and exceptions that prove the rule. In fact in all branches of biology the progress of truth has been greatly impeded by this spirit … and we are probably in about the same position and stage with reference to the questions of sex, as were the men of the eighteenth century with reference to the question of evolution. Indeed the androcentric theory, may be profitably compared to the geocentric theory, and the gynaecocentric with the late heliocentric. The advancement of truth has always been in the direction of supplanting the superficial and apparent by the fundamental and real, and the gynaecocentric truth may be classed among the paradoxes of Nature.”

In order to prove this theory Professor Ward has to probe deeply into the question of Reproduction, which, as he points out is a very different thing from sexuality, and is in fact a biological process practically identical with nutrition. Lamarck wrote:-

“The superabundance of nutrition in giving rise to the growth of the body prepares the materials for a new being which organisation places in position to resemble this same body, and therefore furnishes it with the means of reproducing itself.”

Haeckel in 1866 gave this idea its scientific expression:

“Reproduction is a nutrition and a growth of the organism beyond its individual mass, which erects a part of it into a whole.”

The problem for Nature therefore was how to secure this continuous nutrition and keep the organism growing beyond the point where the original plastic structure tended to break down. This problem resulted in a variety of different modes of reproduction, which:

“Constitute a sort of ascending series from the point of view of complexity and adaptation to increasing development of structure—a series of steps from the more simple to the more complex.”

These various methods of reproduction independent of fertilisation are First: fission or a falling apart of living protoplasms taking the place of the parent one. Second: gemination or budding, when a small portion of the original substance protrudes and is then separated from the mother cell by a constriction that grows deeper and deeper, until the bud becomes entirely detached. This form of reproduction takes place not only in plants but in certain worms and other lower forms of animal life. Third: germinal budding, when within an individual composed of many cells a small group of cells, separates from the surrounding ones and gradually develops into an independent individual which sooner or later finds its way out of the mother. This is the process of reproduction of zoophytes; and of certain worms. The fourth step is—intermediate between germinal budding and the simplest forms of bisexuality, or reproduction in which fertilisation takes place. The fourth step is called germ cell formation or spore formation; and in this a single cell, instead of a group of cells becomes detached from the interior of the organism, but does not further develop until it has escaped from the latter. It then increases by division and forms a multicelular organism like its parent. This is the method of reproduction of certain low types of vegetation. There is still a fifth form of asexual reproduction (that is reproduction without fertilisation from the other sex) which is known as parthenogenesis or virgin reproduction.

"Here germ cells similar to all appearances to eggs, are capable of developing into new beings without the aid of any fertilising agent, The same cells may also be fertilised, and upon the fact of fertilisation or non-fertilisation usually depends the sex of the resulting creature."

These last mentioned facts are known to bee keepers, as the unfertilized eggs of bees produce males, while the fertilised ones produce females.

Professor Ward considers that Nature, in the development of the principle of life-renewal up to this point, may have taken even other steps towards reproduction; but those already indicated point to a serial development from simpler to more complicated modes. After these a new principle enters into reproduction. From being a purely quantitative process a qualitative form of development now appears, and in order to improve and perfect this qualitative principle the advantageous process of fertilization or the crossing of one hereditary strain or stirp with another (an essentially dynamic principle of nature) appears.

"In any of the advanced stages of this process we have the phenomena of sex, but the use of this term for the earlier stages, if correct at all is at least misleading."

We have, in following the thread of this most enthralling theory (which, if Professor Ward is correct in his deductions tends to prove that: "Woman is and remains the human race") to remember that more than half of the organic beings on this earth have no sex at all or possess the dual character in an almost unrecognisably undeveloped state. Still sex remains, as we have seen, the dynamic principle in biology.

"Which is that of securing variation, and through variation the production of better and higher types of organic structure—in a word organic evolution."

Having now brought the statement of facts relating to the gynaecocentiic theory down to the point of the origin of the male sex, which sex has not appeared in any of the reproductive processes yet described, Professor Ward enters on a statement that "life began as female." The female being the fertile sex—whatever is fertile is looked upon as female.

"Assuredly," he writes, "it would be absurd to look upon an organism propagating asexually, as male. Biologists have proceeded from this popular standpoint and regularly speak of 'mother-cells' and 'daughter cells.' It therefore does no violence to language or to science to say that life begins with the female organism, and is carried on a long distance by females alone … The further development of life serves to strengthen this gynaecocentric point of view … The female sex, which existed from the beginning, continues unchanged, but the male sex which did not exist at the beginning, made its appearance at a certain stage, and had a certain history and development but never became universal … The male is therefore, as it were, a mere after-thought of nature … Among millions of humble creatures the male is simply and solely a fertilizer."

Female superiority Professor Ward postulates, continues in a more or less marked degree to prevail throughout the greater part of the invertebrates, and Darwin, in his first volume of "Descent of Man" has popularised the facts relating to the courtship of certain members of the Arachnidae or spider family when the relatively gigantic female seizes and devours the tiny male fertilizer immediately he has accomplished the act for which he exists. Milne

Edwards, and other scientists have pointed out that in the case of certain male parasites the entire visceral cavity was occupied by the testicles, and no trace of digestive organs could be found. Professor Ward also considers that many of the facts relating to the animal Kingdom recorded in "Evolution of Sex" (Professors Geddes and Thompson) have a direct bearing on the gyncoceirtric theory; and that although the work is "pervaded with the androcentric spirit the 'thesis' of it that the female is anabolic and the male catatolic is a long step in the direction of the gynaecocentric theory forced or wrested, as it were, from unwilling minds by the mass of evidence."

Even in the lower vertebrates there are cases of female superiority; male fishes are usually smaller than female; the female hawk is usually the larger and finer bird, and among the rodents there is but little appreciable difference in size or, strength, and very little (sometimes not at all) in colour and adornment.

Professor Ward then approaches, the question of the reasons:

"Why the male has advanced at all beyond its primitive estate as neither a fertilizing organ attached to the female or at most a minute organism detached from her, but devoted exclusively to the same purpose."

The answer to this question is, of course; that the female, through the principle of sexual selection, has used her privilege of choice and has selected each time the male possessing the highest value in size and strength for the continuance of the race. This quality of choice on the part of the female coincides with a subjective feeling of preference, a feeling which constitutes the distinctive interest (in sexual reproduction) of the female—She being the guardian of hereditary qualities she realises instinctively that variation requires regulation; and she acts unconsciously as

"the balance wheel of the whole machinery. As the primary ancestral trunk she stands unmoved amid the heated strife of rivals and holds the scales that decide their relative worth to the race. While the voice of Nature speaking to the male in the form of an intense appetitive interest says to him fecundate! It gives to the female a different command, and says: discriminate! The order to the male is; cross the strains! That to the female is: choose the best! Here the value of a plurality of males is apparent."

Professor Ward considers that this distinctive interest of the female which connotes choice—which interest is lacking in plants and the lowest animals but which makes its appearance at a very early stage in the history of sentient beings is "the dawn of the aesthetic faculty." Just as the advent of mind gave the world a new dispensation and seemed to reverse the whole policy of Nature, so now

"Another profound transformation is to be wrought by a special psychic faculty, viz., the faculty of taste. This transformation is nothing less than the work of raising that miniature speck of existence, the primordial fertilizing agent, to the rank of a fully developed animal organism, approaching in varying degrees, and actually reaching in few instances the status of the original specific trunk, then called the female." [3]

Naturalists have been specially attracted by the superficial differences between the sexes in animals, particularly in the matter of ornamentation in the male; and the influences which have caused these superficial, differences, having been at work in all the types of animal life Since the dawn of this psychic faculty, it is not surprising that they have resulted in what Professor Ward designates as "Male Efflorescence" or spurious "Male Superiority." The female exercising her power of selection (which power is never coerced by male animals) has, through countless ages selected male consorts for beauty, which gave her offspring certain decorative embellishments, and for courage which stood for success.

"The formidable weapons of the males of many animals acquired through sexual selection are employed exclusively fighting other males, and never in the serious work of fighting enemies. The female simply looks on and admires the victorious rival and selects him to continue the species, thus at each selection emphasizing the qualities selected and causing these qualities to tower up into greater and greater prominence. The whole phenomenon of so-called male superiority bears a certain stamp of spuriousness and sham. It is to natural history what chivalry was to human history. It is pretentious, meretricious, quixotic; a sort of make believe, play, or sport of nature of an airy unsubstantial character. The male side of nature shot up and blossomed out in an unnatural fantastic way, cutting loose from the real business of and attracting a share of attention wholly disproportionate to its real importance. I call it male efflorescence. It certainly is not male supremacy, for throughout the animal world below man, in all the serious and essential affairs of life, the female is still supreme. There is no male hegemony or andrarchy. Nevertheless it represents organic evolution of which both sexes have partaken. Its chief value lies in the fact that, in lifting the male from nothing to his present estate it has elevated all species and all life, and placed the organic world on a higher plane."

In the larger apes, the group of animals most closely resembling man, male efflorescence is tolerably well marked, though not so much so as in other animals. Many of these apes have true beards like that of man; and the beard, which is the most prominent and typical sexual character of man was developed far back in the phylogenetic line.

"Nothing is known of the differences in the sexes Pithecanthropus (apeman) of which only part of one skeleton has been found, but it is a fair assumption that the males were larger and stronger than the females, and possessed other distinctively male characters."

The arrival of the earliest rational beings capable of utilising the forces of Nature to their own advantage heralded the evolution of man. But the word 'rational' as employed above, does not mean reasonable, it simply means a being capable of reasoning about the simplest and most materiel things; its chief role was to supplant instinct.

"It is instinct which throughout the animal Kingdom below man, maintains female supremacy and prevents the destruction of animal races. But with man reason begins to gain the ascendant over instinct."

Besides the comparatively unimportant characters, such as horns, spurs, bright colours, and musical powers as the products of sexual selection, increased bulk and strength with the assimilation of form to that of the primary organism or female, gained now in importance; and from the period that primitive man was evolved brain development gradually increased because:

"Success in rivalry for female favour became more and more dependent upon sagacity … But throughout the later geologic periods, and to some extent in all periods, the brain gained upon the body, as shown. By the phenomenon of cephalization, whereby the head, and especially the encephalon, has been growing larger in proportion to the body in all the great phylogenetic lines. Natural selection might bring this about to some extent, but the greater part of it is probably attributable to sexual selection, and the male brain has thus gained upon that of the female until we have the present state of things."

It is this male brain development which places man as a being apart from the rest of creation, enables him to violate the restraints of instinct and develop a state of thing's entirely different from that of his animal ancestors. In the dark recesses of the life of primitive man, the male; possessing only egoistic reasoning and destitute of either sympathy moral conceptions, used his superior strength to exact from women whatever satisfaction she could yield him and gradually the power of choice in sexual selection became transferred from the female to the male, thus causing distinct transformation in social evolution. To sum up therefore, to the period of primitive woman and man, Professor Ward writes:

"To the intelligent and sympathetic reader no apology is needed for having dwelt so long in the pre-human stage in the exposition of so unfamiliar a subject as a gynaecocentric theory. Long before we reach the human stage we find all the alleged evidence of the androcentrie theory, and without such a study of origins as we have been making there would be no counter-evidence, and in fact no data for understanding the real meaning of this evidence … It so happens that though the facts depended upon to support the androcenric theory are patent to all, those that support the gynaecocentric theory are latent and known to very few. But in this it does not differ at all from any of the great truths of science. The facts supposed to prove the apparent are on the surface, while those that prove the real, which is usually the reverse of the apparent, lie hidden and only come forth after prolonged investigation and reflection. The androcentric world view will prove as slow to give way as was the geocentric, or as is still the anthropocentric."

In Professor Ward's brief recapitulation of his gynaecocentric theory (page 373, Chapter XIV, Pure Sociology) sums up so succinctly and powerfully the main argument on which he bases his contention that "woman is and remains the human race," that I feel I cannot do better in this attempt to summarise and popularise his theory than to quote fully from that recapitulation: for the oftener I read it the more, perfectly it seems to me to set forth the unorthodox scientific position he takes up. After summarising the various forms of reproduction (without fertilisation) by which natural selection obtains its object of the continuance of life, he proceeds

"In the second place the manifest advantage of crossing strains and infusing into life elements that come from outside the organism, or even from a specialised organ or the same organism, was seized upon by natural selection and a process was inaugurated that is called fertilisation,—first through an organ belonging to the organism itself (hermaphroditism), and then by the detachment of this organ, and its erection into an independent, but miniature organism wholly unlike the primary one. This last was at first parasitic upon the primary organism, then complementary to it, and carried about in a sac provided for the purpose. Its simplest form was a sac filled with spermatozoa in liquid or gelatinous medium. Later it was endowed with an ephemeral independent existence and so adjusted that its contained sperm cells were at the proper time brought into contact with the germ cells of the organism proper This fertilising organ or miniature sperm sac was the primitive form of what subsequently developed into the male sex, the female sex being the organism proper, which remained practically unchanged.

The remaining steps in the entire process consisted therefore in the subsequent modification and creation as it were of the male organism. The development of a male organism out of this formless sperm sac or testicle was accomplished through the continuous selection of the organism proper, ultimately called the female, of such forms among the many varying forms of the fertilising agent as best conformed to the tastes or vaguely felt preferences of the organism, and the exclusion of all other forms from any part in the process of fertilisation. The peculiarities of form thus selected are transmitted by heredity, and while they do not affect the female they transform the male in harmony with these preferences of the female or organism proper. As the male fertiliser is a product of reproduction by the organism, it naturally inherits the general qualities of the organism. The preferences of the organism are also likely to be a form similar to itself. The organism, or female, therefore literally creates the male in its own image, and from a shapeless sac it generally assumes a definite form, agreeing in general characteristics with that of the original organism. There is no other reason why the male should in the least resemble the female, and but for these causes a male animal might belong to an entirely different type from the female. Even as it is the resemblance is often not close, and in the sexes differ enormously.

The introduction of fertilisation in connection with reproduction was gradual, and was not at first at all necessary to it. It came at the outset as an occasional resort for infusing new elements after a long series of generations through normal reproduction. This occasional fertilisation is called the alternation of generations. It is common to many of the lower organisms, and to all plants, reproduction of buds being the normal form, and that by seeds being the result of fertilisation. So great was the advantage of fertilisation that in the animal kingdom it first came to accompany each separate act of reproduction, and finally became a condition to reproduction itself. From the fact that such is the case in the higher animals, which are the ones best known to all, the error arose that fertilisation is an essential part of reproduction and that sex is necessary to reproduction, an error difficult to dislodge.

The male having been thus created at a comparatively late period in the history of organic life, it soon advanced under the influences described, and began to assume more or less the form and character of the primary organism, which is then called the female. It lost its character of a formless mass of sperm cells and assumed definite shape. For a long time it did not exist for itself but simply for its function, was exceedingly small, frail and ephemeral, often possessing no organ of nutrition, or powers of self-preservation, as perishing as soon as it had performed its function, or without performing it, if not selected from among a multitude of males. This selection of the best examples and rejection of the inferior ones caused the male to rise in the scale, and resemble more and more the primary organism or female. But other qualities were also selected than those that the female possessed. This was due to the early development of the aesthetic faculty in the female; and these qualities were in the nature of embellishments. [4]

The male therefore, while approaching the form and stature of the female, began to differ from her in these aesthetic qualities. The result was that, in the two highest classes of animals, birds and mammals, the male became in many cases, but not in all, highly ornamental and endowed with numerous peculiar organs, called secondary sexual characters. To further selection, a plurality of males often occurred, and these became rivals for female favour. This led to battle among males which further developed the latter especially in the direction of size, strength, weapons of defence and general fighting capacity. These qualities were never used to force the female into submission, but always and solely to gain her favour, and ensure the selection of the successful rivals. In many birds and mammals these qualities became greatly over-developed, resulting in what I have called Male efflorescence. To a considerable extent but less than in many other species the immediate ancestor of man possessed this over-development of the male; and in most primates the male is larger, stronger and more highly ornamented than the female.

When the human race finally appeared through gradual emergence from the great simian stock, this difference the sexes existed, and sexual selection was still going on. Primitive woman, though somewhat smaller, physically weaker and aesthetically plainer than man, still possessed the power of selection, and was mistress of the kinship group. Neither sex had any more idea of the connection between fertilisation and reproduction than have animals and therefore the mother alone claimed and cared for the offspring, as is done throughout the animal kingdom below man. So long as this state of things endured the race remained in the stage called gynaecocracy, or female rule. That this was a very long stage is attested by a great number of facts, many of which have been considered.

“As it was brain development which alone made man out of an animal by enabling him to break over faunal barriers and overspread the globe, so it was brain development that finally suggested the causal nexus between fertilisation and reproduction, and led to the recognition by man of his paternity and joint proprietorship with woman in the offspring of their loins. This produced a profound social revolution, overthrew the authority of woman, destroyed her power of selection, and finally reduced her to the condition of a mere slave of the stronger sex, although that strength had been conferred by her. The stage of gynaecocracy was succeeded by the stage of androcracy, and the subjection of woman was rendered complete.”

Thus then is the evolutionary story of the Female “Fall” from that stage when “maternity was everything,” and all things centred round the female; and hers was the choice in sexual selection, to that patriarchal period which prevailed throughout the remainder of the proto-social stage, when “woman being reduced to a mere chattel, bought and sold, was enslaved and abused beyond any powers of description.”. As the various races among primitive hordes mixed, brain development increased, and when a leisured class was slowly evolved, the aesthetic sense in man led to a widespread system of male sexual selection, or andreclexis, through which the physical nature of woman was modified, and types of female beauty were produced. The effect of male sexual selection was, however, to lower the general status of woman by “increasing her dependence upon man, while at the same time reducing her power to labour, or in any way protect or preserve herself.”

“There are many indications that woman was slow to surrender her sceptre, and that the gradual loss of her power of rejection and selection took place with all the irregularity that characterises all natural phenomena … Almost every conceivable form of marriage or union has been found: While most persons suppose that nothing is so certainly fixed by nature, and even by divine decree, as the particular form of marriage that happens to prevail in their own country, ethnologists know that nothing is so purely conventional as just this fact of the ways in which then and women arrange or agree to carry on the work of continuing the race.”

What is known as Amazonism, through which at some period or other most races have passed, is a strong proof of gynaecocracy having universally prevailed in the human race; while the group of facts in which Bachefen in 1861 based his pronouncement that the ancient laws and records, both written and hieroglyphic, indicated a widespread system of descent and inheritance in the female line among both Aryan and Semitic peoples, supports it still more strongly, and opens out new vistas of the early relations of the sexes.

A little later McLennan discovered that a large number of existing uncivilised races still reckon through the female line, and actually have a more or less complete system of mother-right. Just as with animals the sex relations are arranged on a basis which best subserves the different species, so was it with early man, as he slowly emerged from the animal state; “and properly viewed they have always been such since that date.” The many forms of marriage we find when we begin to study the question are all the result of the economic and other compelling conditions of existence. The Kaffir or Zulu of to-day buys his wife for so many yoke of oxen and the Kaffir woman looks down with contempt on the white wife, who has cost nothing in the white marriage market.

The reason for the market value placed on the Kaffir wife is that she is the agricultural labourer to a husband employer, who is one of the communal owners of a fertile land, and who loves to lie in the sunshine and smoke many pipes. The purchased wife toils loyally until enough oxen are obtained to buy wife No.2. who then shares the labours and eases the working burdens of No.1. Sometimes no.3 is added, but in every case each wife has her own hut, and own status as “wife,” and brings up her children in their own little separate group. They are very much in the stage of the wives of the early patriarchs we read about in some of the books of the Bible. But by the time this patriarchal system prevailed, gynaecocracy had long ceased to exist in the more advanced races, and androcracy was fully established.

The discovery of paternity gave the father the desire to exercise power over the child in equal authority with the mother. This led to a comparison of physical strength between the sexes; for women did not for ages lay down lightly their exclusive maternal privileges; and this fact appears to the writer of this synopsis, to give a clue to the reason for women being so fiercely and often selfishly anti-social as regards the children of the race as a whole.

Tens of thousands of women are devoted and unselfish mothers to their own offspring, for whom they think nothing in the way of education and nurture too good; while they have a ‘blind spot’ as regards the children of other women, and they seem incapable of what might be called ‘social motherhood.’ May it be that the struggle for equal authority over the children between father and mother was so intense and embittered in the past, and the mother was so completely worsted and enslaved by the time when law finally emerged, that her maternal vision was absolutely narrowed down to the individual struggle which each woman had for ages to carry on for the retention of some scrap or fragment of mother-right?

“Physical strength never comes in question in the gynaecocratic stage. The female dispenses her favours according to her choice, and the males acquiesce after venting their jealousy on one another. The idea of coercing the female or extorting her favour never so much as occurs to the male mind. The virtue of the female animal is absolute, for virtue does not consist, as many suppose, in refusal, but in selection. It is refusal of the unfit, and of all at improper times and places. This definition of virtue applies to human beings, even the most civilised, as well as to animals. The female animal, or the human female in the gynaecocratic state would perish before she would surrender her virtue.”

What a commentary is this on modern social conditions, in which woman’s virtue is one of the articles of commerce, bought by the highest bidder, either in or out of marriage, and where the “unfit,” if possessed of economic power, have perforce to be accepted by the human female! In the passage from the gynaecocratic to the audrocratic state, man therefore, according to Professor Ward, lost his normal respect for the preferences of women, and woman lost her virtue.

“He began to learn the economic value of woman, and, in proportion to his realisation of physical strength making him the master creature, he used her to contribute to his pleasure and to his wants.”

This, our author considers, is the darkest spot in the somewhat dreary journey down the stream of time; and he quotes Herbert Spencer in this indictment of androcracy in its worst material manifestations.

“In the history of humanity as written, the saddest part concerns the treatment of women. … The amount of suffering which has been and is borne by women is utterly beyond imagination.”

And Professor Ward adds to Spencer's indictment the remark:

"Far too many human sins are attributed to the brute that still lurks in man, but in this case it is flagrantly unjust to do this, since, as has been seen, no male brute maltreats the female, and the abuse of females by males is an exclusively human virtue."

Darwin wrote:

"Man is more powerful in body and mind than woman, and in the savage state he keeps her in a far more abject state of bondage than does the male of any other animal."

And when writing of the advances in the human mind, which are destroying 'the prejudices that have produced between the sexes an inequality of rights injurious even to the favoured sex,' he remarks:

"In vain is it sought to justify it by differences in their physical organisation, in the strength of their intellects, in their moral sensibilities. This inequality has had no other origin than the abuse of power, and it is in vain that men have since sought to excuse it by sophisms."

While to wind up and synthesise the indictment of the general ill treatment and subjection, of women in the past, and the particular ill treatment and subjection of many women in the present, Lester Ward writes:

"The whole difficulty of understanding these abuses lies in the fact that civilised men cannot conceive of a state in which no moral sentiments exist, no sympathy for pain, no sense of justice. And yet every day, in every civilised country of the world, the public press informs us of wife beatings that are scarcely less horrid than those of savages, and these would of course be far more horrid and but for the restraints of law and police regulation.

At the stage in the history of any race at which the transition from gynaecocracy to androcacy took place, and for a long period afterwards, all men were morally below the level of the basest wife-beater of modern society, at a stage in which the first spark of sympathy for suffering in others had not yet kindled. It yet is this manner of man, man coming to consciousness through the dawn of a purely egoistic intellect, who suddenly, as it were, discovered that the physically inferior being, who had without his knowledge, endowed him with his superiority, was in his power, and could be made to serve him. Hence the subjection of woman."

In pursuance of the setting forth of his theory of how andocracy reached its present phase of development, Professor Lester Ward then treats briefly of the primitive family as it passed through the stages of polygamy, to monogamy, and of marriage in its various phases of marriage by capture and of barter to the more legalised arrangements of modern times. We all know that the "sacred" institution of family, as it now exists, is based on the famulus or slave of Roman times. Over this group of slaves, which included the wife and children, the old Roman patriarch had power of life and death. The word "marriage" in the English language, Ward explains has three meanings:

"1. The mutual, voluntary union of a man and a woman. 2. The act of union of a man to a woman, or of a woman to a man. 3. The causing of a woman to unite with a man … These uses of the word 'marriage' represent an evolution, and the first meaning was the last to be developed, and represents the greatest mutuality and equality of the marrying parties that has been attained."

The third meaning applied especially to marriage in patriarchal time, when the patriarch, who owned all the women of his family disposed of them as he saw fit. All women slaves taken in warfare were disposed of to the conquerors, the younger women as wives, the older as bond-slaves.

"With the origin of the State, and the establishment of more and more complete codes of law, marriage was legalised and regulated, and became more and more a human institution. But when we see how little advanced marriage was in Greece and Rome during what we call antiquity, we may easily imagine what it must have been at an earlier date, and among more backward races."

But, through the varied forms of marriage, down to modern times they contain one point in common, the proprietorship of the husband in the wife, while the slave origin of the marriage state is betrayed in the word "obey," which is to be found in the marriage ceremonies of most countries.

As regards male sexual selection Professor Ward holds that:

"The same aesthetic sense through which the female mind had created the male being, including man as we find him, was not extinguished, it was simply overwhelmed by the power of the new-born egoistic reason of man using the strength acquired through female selection in the subjugation and domination of the innocent and unconscious authoress of these gifts. Nor was this aesthetic sense an exclusively female attribute. It is au invariable concomitant of brain development … But the aesthetic sense is not intense … By the side of the sexual interest of the male, in animal and in earliest man, it is so feeble as scarcely to make itself felt … The only selection that took place down to the close of the proto-social stage was female selection. The females alone were sufficiently free from the violence of passion to compare, deliberate, and discriminate. This they did, and we have seen the result."

But with the lapse of centuries and the introduction of the caste system, and later of a leisured class, female selection, or gynaeclexis entirely ceased; and polygamy was made possible for the leisured class, the nobility and the priesthood, causing an intensive form of male selection or andreclexis, which made "the large seraglios of oriental, Semitic and arian peoples stirpicultural nurseries of female beauty." The process of male selection carried on for untold ages, produced, according to Professor Ward, the models for the exquisite specimens of Greek sculpture. He further points out that there is a certain amount of unreality, artificiality, and spuriousness about female as about male secondary sexual characters; that is to say man does not select woman generally for size, strength, intellectual, or moral qualities, or for fecundity; what he prefers is physical frailty, and ephemeral beauty. Woman therefore does not advance in any sterling mental or moral qualities; and under the same influence woman grows more sterile, rather than more fertile.

"The result is that, if this were to go on a sufficient length of time, without the neutralising and compensating effect of other more normal influences, woman might ultimately be reduced to a helpless parasite on society, comparable to the condition of the primitive male element, and, the cycle might be completed by the production of complemental females corresponding to Darwin's complemental males in the cirripeds. There are certain women now, in what is regarded as high society, who are even less useful, since they contribute nothing to the quantity or quality of the human species … In fact most leisure class ideas tend in the direction of making the woman of that class as useless as possible."

Thus is it that woman throughout historical times has occupied a position tending to fix in the human mind the idea of her eternal subjection and of man's eternal superiority.

"So universal is this attitude that a presentation of the real and fundamental relation of the sexes is something new to those who are able to see it, and something preposterous to those who are not. The idea that the female is naturally and really the superior sex seems incredible, and only the most liberal and emancipated minds, possessed of a store of biological information; are capable of realising it."

Oriental, Greek, Roman, and much of the literature of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries attribute to women every vile and despicable quality. In the fifteenth century, after Innocent VIII. had issued his Papal Bull against Witchcraft women who showed any special traits of mother-wisdom, or of intellectual self-expression were burnt in tens of thousands as witches.

All ancient cosmogonies, including the Hebrew, which still dominates European thought, describe woman as only a lower or secondary form of creation. The Indian Code of Manu places woman always in subjection; first to her father, then to her husband,—and if he dies then to her sons or other male relatives. In fact, taking into consideration the centuries of legal and social ostracism from most of the advantages which tend to foster mental and physical progress, the marvel is that women have accomplished as much as they have done.

The reason, no doubt, some comparatively few of them have always succeeded in rising above the dead level of the ordinary subjected woman, is that in cases where the male parent possessed special gifts of intellect or moral worth; these gifts have in many cases been handed down to the female offspring, and have enabled her in the teeth of tradition and conventions to prove herself an able woman—sometimes even a woman of genius. Of such, was Mary Wolstonecraft, who was described by a contemporary writer as “a hyena in petticoats.” But light was even then (when Mary Wolstonecraft in the XVIIIth century wrote not only, be it remembered, of “The Rights of Women,” but also “The Rights of Men”) breaking on the long drawn-out and dark night of the history of women. As Professor Ward writes:

“A single glance at the last two centuries of the historic period, compared with the centuries that preceded them shows such an immense change in woman’s condition as to suggest that the vast, downward curve has more than reached the lowest point, and that the ordinates have begun to shorten … Not only this, but a closer scrutiny reveals the fact that the curve does not lie wholly in the same plane, and that the figure has three dimensions. In other words, it is not a cycle or circle, but a spiral, and the ends will never meet and restore a true gynaecocracy. With the completion of a revolution, both man and woman will find themselves on a far higher plane, and in a stage that for want of a better term, may be called gyandrocratic, a stage in which both man and woman shall be free to rule themselves.”

Having now brought my synopsis of Professor Lester Ward’s gynaecocentric theory to a close, it is necessary to point out why it is so important that, at a time when life,—young, beautiful, healthy, life has been poured out on the battle-fields of Europe, Asia and Africa as if it were the dross, instead of the wealth of the world, we should begin to ask ourselves whether the androcracy, or man rule, which is still in the ascendant, is indeed the ideal rule, which is likely to guarantee the health, happiness and permanence of the human race?

Men have had for long ages now sole control of: the conditions of life. They make laws, not only about armaments, commerce, political and international questions, but also about social, domestic and economic questions, without consulting the subjected sex as to their wishes or interests. Childbearing, the education and rearing of children, questions of food purity, food supply and distribution (which questions all intimately concern the mother and the homemaker) are decided entirely by men, and are decided in a way to suit male commercial and military pursuits, not in a way which favours the highest development of the and consequently of the race.

It is true that women are being used daily more and more by men in public work and administration, but they are being used as tools for accomplishing men’s aims and schemes, not as free citizens, having a mandate from their men and women fellow-citizens to plan and work and spend for the benefit of the race. The wildest absurdities arc being committed in Great Britain in the way of appointments of men by men to all the superior posts, even in Department’s which are clearly indicated as being women’s special sphere.

Instances of ignorant interference by men in conditions which affect the Home could be multiplied ad infinitum; they, like other wrong conditions, become more glaring in war time, and in periods following war, and also, unfortunately, cause more harm than in times of peace. They are supreme instances of Androcracy carried to its extreme limits, and made the more dangerous and far-reaching, because it is using some few women, in the pay of a masculine Government as its mouthpiece The business of these paid women is to endorse the decrees of that Government, be they wise or foolish; and to help in every way to cover up the mistakes and perplexities of the androcracy.

What we sorely need during the long crisis produced by a man-made war (and that is no doubt needed in both enemy and neutral countries) is the gynadrocracy, of which Lester. Ward writes in his forecast the higher plane of social and economic conditions towards which evolution is tending, “when both man and woman shall be free to rule themselves.”

When that period comes the men and women who administer the affairs of each nation will be men chosen by a real democratic mandate, and if they allow the young life of the nation to be wasted, the agricultural resources of the nation to be frittered away or destroyed, the wealth of the nation in the necessaries of food, clothing, warmth and shelter to be so reduced that the nation as a whole suffers, then the community will deal with them as traitors to the common cause, who, having accepted heavy responsibility and high honour, have proved unworthy or unequal to carrying out their trust.

Security in the prosecution their daily work or business is what the nations demand, Security that the young sons for whom every sacrifice is being made by parents, shall not be trampled into the offal of a modern battle field, or live blinded or crippled for the rest of their days. Security that the young daughters, for whom also every sacrifice is made by parents shall not be used by an autocratic androcracy to manufacture horrible and ghastly weapons of slaughter, and be thus misused and prostituted for the war lusts of men, so that they became the destroyers instead of the nurturers of life. Security that the fields sown, and the flocks and herds raised shall not be destroyed by the red anarchy of modern warfare armed with every scientific contrivance and invention for wholesale wanton destruction. Security against the maiming and blasting of the moral life and conscience of millions of men and women, whom militarism and its attendant evils sweep off their feet into the ranks of the criminal the diseased, the outcasts of society.

Statistics show that every war has always resulted in an increase of venereal disease; and venereal disease is the arch enemy of the health of the race, and consequently of the Home. We women are always being reminded by men, when we ask to be allowed a share in public duties and responsibilities that our place is the Home. But in order to do our duty in the Home it is neccesary that we should have control over the conditions and influences that affect the Home. Food supply, food distribution, food purity and free freedom from adulteration. Health conditions, education, the moral conditions of our streets and towns, the industrial and other occupations in which our young people are employed, in all of these, we women as Home-makers, claim the right to legislate and to administer laws in order that the harmful influences to the race in these matters which are at present settled on a purely androcentric basis, may be removed.

Of what use we urge is it for us to strive to maintain in the Home an ideal of purity, grace and moral fragrance, if, immediately the boy or girl steps across the threshold of the Home, the very opposite influences are brought to bear, in all their vulgar commercial, crudity on the youth of the nation? No one who reflects on the conditions under which the race in any so-called civilised country is at present reared, can feel that the purely androcentric interests which rule and determine the environment, training and culture of the young are in scientific agreement with the knowledge and wisdom that are in the possession of both the woman and men of the race.

It is the man who decrees what money shall be spent on public education, though both men and women are taxed to supply that money. It is the man who decrees under what conditions the materials for food and clothing shall be raised, manufactured and distributed; though the functions, of feeding and clothing are the special functions of women; and the efficiency of Home administration is destroyed by the adulterated food, which it is to the commercial interests of the androcracy to supply; while short commons or starvation face the woman Home-maker and her children whenever androcentric national rivalries decree that War must take the place of Diplomacy, and that weapons for the destruction of the race must be produced in feverish haste throughout the world in the place of food, clothing, fuel and shelter.

It is the man who decrees what penal and civil laws shall be passed, though these laws affect equally the men and the women of the race. It is the man who decides the economic, social, sanitary and spiritual conditions under which the children of the race shall be born, and reared, though it is women who risk life to bear those children and who have to watch silently and bitterly the waste of infant life, because a bungling androcracy is interfering in matters which are outside its sex sphere.

Finally it is men who have decreed lately throughout the world that the supreme life-giving function of womanhood shall be exchanged for, or nullified by, the function of the destruction of life. In no previous war have women been in every country involved personally in the struggle, employed de facto as combatants in the making of the munitions which tear the limbs, put out the eyes, eviscerate and blow to bleeding atoms the sons of other women: Yet this has been going on daily in the most advanced and civilised countries in the world, while under the influence of artificially stimulated hatred, messages of derision and hate have been chalked on shells destined to make widows, orphans and childless mothers.

What the physical and psychic effects on the race will be of this inversion of female functions it is not hard to prognosticate. Psychic disturbances in the life of the human female have an immense influence on her child-bearing function. The tendency of the race under modern normal conditions is to become less and less prolific. Under the abnormal excitement, strain and hysterical hatred produced by being employed as active agents in a world war, we may expect, in the statistics of all the countries involved, not only a diminution in the birth rate, but also a lowering in the quality of the lives born.

The potential mothers of the race who have had placed upon them the unnatural strain of an active share in wholesale life destruction are likely to bear psychically ill-balanced, if not physically defective children.

In the days of gynaecocracy or mother-right, everything to do with the bearing and rearing of infants was a matter of important teaching, of religious initiation, the knowledge being passed on with formal observances from the elder to the younger women. It was not for nothing that the future mothers of the race were kept apart in the brooding quiet of the primitive home. Nature was working in the bodies of the maidens certain mysteries, preparing them for the nine months home of the yet-to-be-born. It was instinct and dawning woman wisdom in the care and nurture of the race which dictated foresight, this reasonable preparedness and helpfulness in Nature's great reproductive aims.

But now that armed androcracy has culled every maid and wife from the home to help in a catastrophic struggle for world supremacy, it is possible that the very foundations of race life may be undermined and seriously threatened by the outburst of male rivalries which inspired the present world war.

It is for these reasons that I felt it might be at the present time of special interest to men and women to study in the past, what were the relations between the sexes,- in vegetable, insect, bird, mammal and human life, which led up to our present one-sided state of sex influence in all that vitally concerns the race. No fair minded woman or man can read the story of the gynaecocentric theory, as developed by Professor Lester Ward without finding therein the material to make her or him "furiously to think." No fair minded woman or man can look at the world today as it groans and travails under andocentric rule without realising if gyandrocentric or equal rule between the sexes would give even an off chance of improvement in the condition under which the race has to live and develop, gyandrocracy should be given its chance.

Again I must make the point that gyandrocracy is not meant the choosing of a certain number of women by men as men's mouthpieces, with authority absolutely restricted by the wishes and financial doles of men; neither does it mean the granting of political votes to some propertied women; but it means equal responsibility in law-making and in arranging the social and economic conditions that control everyday life and work.

The essence of the gynaecocentric theory is that "the female is the race," and that under the long discipline of the period when all things centred round the female, she developed maternal courage and maternal efficiency; some of this courage and efficiency has necessarily been stultified since androcentric law usurped the place of gynaecocentric law.

May we not dare to hope that Nature may once more triumphantly bring good out of evil, and since men have elected to decimate their numbers and destroy: the flower of their youth in hecatombs of slaughter, women, being compelled by necessity to take the places of fallen men in the business and work of life, may insist on and succeed in obtaining equal power in the ordering and government of life and in the administration of affairs? Every material progress sets free more spiritual forces; and it is the spiritual life, the life of beauty, and of the whole synthetic range of Art, for lack of which the race at present starves, because it as no leisure to enjoy it: Till the present era the civilisation of a leisured class, whose existence has, in the long run, demoralised the leisured, and has led to disharmonies, and eventual decadence.

The slave class can now he replaced by applied modern machinery, which can produce wealth and do work, the story of which reads like a fairy tale. The scientific communal use of this machinery will set the world of women and men free to begin the struggle for the higher and more spiritual life, which in the future will be the goal of the race. The poets and thinkers have foreseen that day and have sung of its future glories; nations, like individuals may "rise on stepping stones of their dead selves to higher things."

When the murk and dust and refuse-heaps of war are cleared away, when towns and villages are rebuilt, and when grass and harvests grow once more on the tormented soil under which the sons of the rival nations sleep silently side by side; when the great ships sail once more in safety from port to port, carrying the necessities and the luxuries of life for all mankind to enjoy; when we can again look around us and count the costs,—the losses and the gains of the hurricane of passion and of death, which has swept through Europe, and has shaken with cyclonic devastation the four corners of the World,—then perhaps we may weigh and ponder with new wisdom and with clearer outlook the saying of Letourneau:

"The condition of women may even furnish a good criterion of the degree of development of a people."

Notes

1. As regards the relative size and capacity of the brains of men and women, Mr. Havelock Ellis writes: "There is much better ground for the later view, according to which, relating to size, the nervous superiority belongs to women, just as all small animals have relatively large brains. Man and Woman, page 141.

2. As regards this quotation Mr. Havelock Ellis writes me that he does not recognise it as being in any of his works. In 'Man and Woman,' page 422 he has written, "The female animal everywhere is more closely, and for a longer period occupied with the process of reproduction, which is Nature's main concern". This is indeed more than a zoological fact; it is a biological fact; among plants we find that the stamens soon fall away, while the pistil remains.

3. This theory of the aesthetic faculty in the sexual selection of the female is of rare interest, and seems to be supported by one of the paradoxical, but probably one of correct poetic guesses of a literary genius of the nineteenth century. "Life imitates Art far more than Art imitates Life. This results not merely from Life's imitative instinct but from the fact that the self-conscious aim of Life is to find expression, and that Art offers certain beautiful forms through which it may realise that energy. It is a theory which has never been put forward before, but it is extremely fruitful, and throws an entirely new light upon the history of Art Art "The decay of Lying. A Dialogue. " Oscar Wilde.

4. This question of aesthetic selection of animals is still a controversial one. Mr. Havelock Ellis discusses the point in his third volume "Studies."—D.B.M

Race
Motherhood IS WOMAN
THE RACE
?

Men Have Been Psychologically Abused by Feminist Ideology For Decades

Janice Fiamengo · 11 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Stop asking "Where are the feminists?" They're where they always were, undermining a sane society.

.

Let me start with an example of everyday feminism, out of a dozen I could have chosen recently.

A week ago, I watched my friend Mike Buchanan, leader of the UK's Children and Family Party, discuss proposed measures to counteract so-called misogyny and sexual harassment in Britain. He was one of three invited guests on a public affairs program called Real Britain with host Darren Grimes (the segment in question starts at 1:06:45, though a strong stomach is needed for its dispiriting glimpse into proposed feminist legislation).

The other two guests were both women, one a moderate feminist political commentator, Dominique Samuels—who despite sensible comments mentioned TWICE that she had been catcalled—and the other a doctrinaire feminist author, Amy Nickell.

The particular subject was legislation that has been proposed by two of Prime Minister Boris Johnson's potential replacements to criminalize cat-calling, wolf-whistling, and "down-blousing" (photographing a woman's cleavage). Only Buchanan dared to say what should be evident to all sane people: that such legislation would be worse than useless, socially divisive, enormously insulting to men, and an instance of egregious state over-reach.

The subject is typical of feminism's victim focus, which ignores the life difficulties of male Britons in order to emphasize the (often trivial, as in this case) alleged suffering of female Britons at men's hands. 75% of suicides in the United Kingdom and Ireland are committed by men, with about 84 men killing themselves every week. Men are 95% of the UK prison population, make up 85% of homeless rough sleepers and 77% of alcoholics. Workplace deaths in the United Kingdom are 94% male. All the available data shows boys performing far worse than girls in the UK primary and secondary education systems; at the tertiary level, young men are outnumbered by young women at close to 2-1.

Wouldn't you think feminists might spend a few days at least pretending to care about men's issues? Not on your life. They continue to hammer away at male entitlement.

Kelsie Whitmore Proves Less Is More

Doug Mortimer · 13 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Sir, a woman's preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all.
>
> – Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784)

One of the most famous moments in baseball history occurred on August 19, 1951, when Eddie Gaedel (a midget or little person…take your pick), who stood all of 3'7", stepped up to the plate for the St. Louis Browns in a regular season contest against the Detroit Tigers. Gaedel's one plate appearance, which resulted in a walk, was the beginning and end of his career (after he waddled to first base, he was removed for a pinch-runner). The Commissioner of Baseball, Will Harridge, had dictatorial powers. He voided Gaedel's contract the next day. He knew the whole incident, while not against the rules, was strictly a publicity stunt by Browns owner Bill Veeck.

Well, that was more than seven decades ago, and thankfully such attempts to subvert the integrity of our national pastime are no more…or are they? Perhaps the emphasis has shifted from midgets to other demographics.

The lunatic fringe insists that trans-women are women and should be allowed to compete against biological women in athletic events. So far this has only been a thing in amateur sports. But it does add a sideshow atmosphere to such contests and likely promotes ticket sales. After all, who cared about women's swim meets until Lia Thomas came along? Formerly a mediocre male swimmer at the University of Pennsylvania, he decided he wanted to compete as a woman for dear old Penn, and so history was made. (Coincidentally, Penn has perhaps the worst soyboy nickname in all of college sports: the Quakers.)

Pro baseball is another story. The suits in the front office (not to mention sportswriters) routinely genuflect to inclusivity. This attitude may be valid with regard to male athletes of various nationalities and races, and maybe one day something will snap in the brain of a major league ballplayer and he will decide he is really a female (would he eschew his jockstrap?), inspiring banner headlines in sports pages across the land, and likely causing an overnight spike in the price of his deadname baseball cards.

The chances for a biological female, however, are nil. Major league sports teams are not about to waste a precious roster spot and a paycheck (the minimum major league salary is $700,000 per season) on a female who is little more than a mascot. Ah, but what about the minor leagues?

Affiliated minor leagues exist to develop players for major league teams. In fact, their rosters are stocked by their major league affiliates. While minor league teams often advertise that fans are getting a sneak preview of tomorrow's major leaguers, the chance of a minor leaguer making it to the big leagues is roughly 1 in 10. But the other 9 must be competent enough to be competitive at whatever level they are assigned to so the more talented players can hone their skills and move up. Those who underachieve will quickly wash out . No big deal, since another crop of young players will be available the following season. Male disposability, you know.

The independent minor leagues, however, follow a different business model. Without the deep pockets of a major league team to bolster them, and with little or no broadcast revenue, teams must rely on ticket sales to pay their bills.

The Atlantic League, founded in 1998, is one such league. Over the years franchises have come and gone but the league has maintained a reputation as the best of the independents. The newest addition to the league is the Staten Island FerryHawks. As the new team on the block, the FerryHawks were not expected to be competitive. They weren't.

The FerryHawks finished the first half of the 2022 season (many minor leagues have split seasons) at 18-47, not only good for last (fifth) place in the league's North Division, but ten games behind fourth place Lancaster. (As I write this, the FerryHawks' second-half record is 14-19.) Attendance in Staten Island is just 1,252 per game, last in the league. (By contrast, the Long Island Ducks lead the league with 4,533.)

Of course, the FerryHawks could always buy advertising space or commercial time to advertise the team, but why bother when there are ways to get free publicity? I offer Kelsie Whitmore, a 24-year-old pitcher/outfielder, as Exhibit A.

As a girl, Whitmore played Little League and PONY (Protect Our Nation's Youth) baseball. She also played for Temecula Valley High School (she was the only girl on the team) in California. She played women's baseball at the 2014 and 2018 Women's Baseball World Cup and the 2015 Pan American Games. As a softball player at Cal State Fullerton, she was named the Big West Conference's player of the year in 2021.

She excelled at various levels of amateur baseball when playing against boys and women. Arguably the high point of her career was when she pitched five scoreless innings for the Portland Pickles, albeit against a developmental team of the Mazatlán Venados (Deer) of the Mexican Pacific League. Her professional baseball career is another story. Many a girl who is competitive against boys her age discovers that the boys start to outpace her as they mature.

In 2016 and 2017 she played for the Sonoma Stompers of the Pacific Association, a low-level independent league in Northern California. (I'm not sure how she was able to play professional baseball without forfeiting her college softball eligibility.) Used sparingly, she got two singles in 26 at bats. In the field she made no errors but handled just seven chances. As a pitcher, she appeared in two games, losing one game and giving up 7 earned runs in just three innings.

There is no doubt that a male with similar statistics would have been sent packing. Given such a performance at the lowest level of professional baseball, it would seem that an encore was not warranted, yet in 2022 she signed a contract with the FerryHawks.

To date this season she has no hits in 24 at bats. She has struck out 15 times. Though used frequently as a pinch-runner, she has no stolen bases. Despite her small strike zone (she stands 5'6"), she has but two walks. Playing left field, she has one error in 51.1 innings.

On the mound Whitmore has appeared in 7 games (just 5.1 innings) with disastrous results (a 23.63 ERA). If you aren't familiar with baseball lingo, that means if she pitched a complete 9-inining game, she would give up 23.63 runs. Obviously, your team won't win many games with someone like that on the mound.

It should come as no surprise that she is a finesse pitcher, since her fastball tops out at around 80 mph. Her pitching coach, Nelson Figueroa, who played pro ball for 19 years (including 9 seasons when he played at least part of the season in the major leagues), was also a finesse pitcher. Fun fact: On August 9, Figueroa, age 48, made an emergency start for the FerryHawks and pitched a complete game against the Gastonia Honey Hunters.

Statistics notwithstanding, it appears Kelsie Whitmore will play out the year for the FerryHawks, despite the fact that there are countless male ballplayers out there who could achieve better results. Since the team has been more competitive in the second half, her appearances will likely be few, at least until the second half playoff situation is resolved.

At the beginning of the season, Whitmore was lauded as a trailblazer; you see, unlike boys, girls have never had a path to professional baseball. Interviews with coaches, front office personnel, and teammates stress her work ethic, enthusiasm, and dedication. I would be more impressed with results, but the fact that I write for this web site automatically categorizes me as a misogynist.

According to the narrative, girls are shuffled off to the softball diamond while the boys get to play baseball. Pity the poor lassie unable to realize her dreams. Never mind how many young boys have seen those same dreams dashed by competition for limited roster spots. They must face the fact that they weren't good enough; girls can always say they failed because organized baseball had no path for them to achieve their dreams. In other words, they didn't feel welcome. Stop me if you've heard that one before.

Nevertheless, Kelsie Whitmore's mere presence has created baseball history. She was the first female to play pro baseball in Mexico. She was also the first female player in Atlantic League history. She made her debut on April 22 when she appeared as a pinch runner. On May 1 she became the first woman to start an Atlantic League game (in left field)., and three days later she became the first woman to pitch in an Atlantic League game. Sports Illustrated called her "the Face of Women's Baseball Progress." Needless to say, male players do not make headlines for just showing up.

If Kelsie Whitmore's teammates resent her presence, they are holding their tongues. They may have succumbed to the "little sister" syndrome, standing up for her as one would for any female member of the clan. Of course, the other teams in the league would never object to her presence. To do so would only invite opprobrium. Besides, when the FerryHawks make a road trip, the other teams in the league may show a bump in attendance. After all, it's not every day you get a chance to see a girl play baseball against the big boys.

Actually, we've been down this road before. In 1934 the multi-talented Babe Didrickson, the female counterpart of Jim Thorpe, pitched in several spring training exhibition games. She still holds the women's distance record for throwing a baseball.

When major league players went off to fight World War II, part of the slack was picked up by the All American Girls Professional Baseball League, portrayed in the 1992 film A League of Their Own. This was the film that gave us the immortal line, "There's no crying in baseball!" Whining, however, is another story.

Baseball history is replete with anecdotes about girl wonders who struck out Babe Ruth, Lou Gehrig, or Ted Williams in exhibitions. The Negro Leagues also showcased the occasional female player. In more recent years, there was Ila Borders, who played four seasons (1997-2000) for independent minor league teams with mediocre results (two victories in four decisions, an earned run average of 6.75). Her finest hour occurred in 1999 when she pitched 32.1 innings for the Madison Black Wolf of the Northern League and fashioned a superb 1.67 ERA. She later played for the Colorado Silver Bullets, a women's professional team composed, for the most part, of former softball players.

Which brings us back to Kelsie Whitmore. The attention she has received from the media, who usually ignore independent minor league ball, demonstrates the novelty effect of a woman's presence on a men's team. Also a factor is the old "rooting for the underdog" theme, which always plays well with sports fans. And let's not forget the longstanding feminist narratives of breaking the glass ceiling, female empowerment, creating a safe space for women, etc.

Though Kelsie Whitmore has made news in 2022, the statistics indicate she will be hard-pressed to return to the FerryHawks in 2023. Though her playing days may be numbered, that doesn't mean her baseball career is over. If she has the ability to impart baseball know-how to others, she may stick around.

Psychologists have long told us (though they wouldn't shout it from the rooftops today) that women are more verbal than men and are more detail-oriented. Such traits would serve them well in the coaching ranks. So the idea of a baseball schoolmarm isn't as far-fetched as it might seem at first blush.

Bill Lee, a 14-year major league veteran and one of baseball's renowned characters, insisted that his aunt, Annabelle Lee (perhaps her parents were fans of Edgar Allan Poe), a veteran of the All American Girls Professional Baseball League, taught him how to pitch.

Darrell Evans, who struck 414 home runs in 21 major league seasons, benefited from having a mother and an aunt who were professional fast-pitch softball players.

More recently, baseball teams have hired female coaches to serve at various levels. The most prominent example this season is Rachel Balkovec, manager of the Yankees' lowest level minor league franchise, the Tampa Tarpons (and I've got to believe that the locals have made jokes about the Tarpa Tampons).

If the future is female, at least to a limited degree, in baseball, it will likely play out in the coaching ranks and not on active rosters. An outstanding playing career is not a prerequisite for a coaching or managerial position. The managerial ranks are filled with any number of men who were mediocre players. Many a utility player, career minor leaguer, or bench-warmer who paid close attention to the game acquired a comprehensive knowledge of the game and its attendant strategies. So don't be surprised if one day you see Kelsie Whitmore coaching at some level. Having spent so much time on the bench this season, she is in a good position to embody the old Yogi Berra maxim, "You can observe a lot by just watching."

Now it might seem that I've been dumping on Kelsie Whitmore throughout this article. I don't know if she knows or cares that she's being exploited by her team and her league, but I do respect what she's done so far, even though achievements have not been forthcoming. In fact, I'm going pay her the highest compliment a man can pay to a female athlete:

Not bad for a girl.

Sorry if I triggered anyone.

California doctor poisoned husband with drain cleaner for weeks, got caught

A Voice for Men · 14 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The morality of punishing the innocent

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 15 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

There is a current movement with the expressed intent of reducing or eliminating sexual assault against women by changing current law to make it easier to convict those accused of committing sexual assaults.

The proposed changes would reduce and/or eliminate due process protections currently afforded to the accused in the United States. The war to change these laws is primarily being waged on college campuses by forcing these institutions to eliminate due process when handling cases alleging sexual assault. On many campuses the accused does not have the right to counsel, may not have the right to present evidence on his own behalf, to call witnesses, or to cross-examine witnesses including his accuser, may only be given limited access to evidence against him, and guilt may be determined by a preponderance of evidence (instead of clear and convincing or beyond reasonable doubt), or simply because the evidence of guilt has the greater probability of being true.

This denial of due process almost assures a conviction that can result in anything from reprimand, to sensitivity classes, to expulsion.

To most of us, the "guilty until proved innocent" attitude towards those accused of any crime is reprehensible. The American system of jurisprudence is founded on the idea that allowing the guilty to go free is preferable to jailing the innocent. But to some, the greater good of stopping violent crime (particularly sex crimes against women) supersedes the rights of the accused to due process. For these persons, the unintended consequence of jailing the innocent, while it may be unfortunate, is perfectly acceptable and morally correct. The moral justification for this can be traced to none other than St. Thomas Aquinas and his justification of killing in self-defense.

Aquinas writes "Nothing hinders one act from having two effects, only one of which is intended, while the other is beside the intention. … Accordingly, the act of self-defense may have two effects: one, the saving of one's life; the other, the slaying of the aggressor." He further explains that killing in self-defense is morally acceptable only if there was no intent to kill. In other words, if the killing was an unintentional consequence of defending oneself, even if the killing was foreseeable. He qualifies this by stating that the act of self-defense must be in proportion to the act of aggression. However, if the killing was intentional or disproportionate, even if done in self-defense, it is morally unjustifiable.

The Doctrine (or Principle) of Double Effect requires four conditions described in the New Catholic Encyclopedia (p. 1021):

1. The act itself must be morally good or at least indifferent.
2. The agent may not positively will the bad effect but may permit it. If he could attain the good effect without the bad effect he should do so. The bad effect is sometimes said to be indirectly voluntary.
3. The good effect must flow from the action at least as immediately (in the order of causality, though not necessarily in the order of time) as the bad effect. In other words the good effect must be produced directly by the action, not by the bad effect. Otherwise the agent would be using a bad means to a good end, which is never allowed.
4. The good effect must be sufficiently desirable to compensate for the allowing of the bad effect.

Thus it becomes permissible under this doctrine to strengthen the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to convict and imprison accused perpetrators even if that means that more innocent persons will be convicted and jailed. The intent of this action is to reduce harm to women by reducing the number of sexual assaults by creating an effective deterrent: increasing the likelihood of going to prison.

On the surface, most reasonable persons would likely agree that the conditions are met. In fact, they may well be. It is certainly not immoral to make it easier to gain convictions in order to protect members of society. Provided the intent is not to imprison innocent people, and remains only a by-product, condition two is met. Condition three is met if the imprisonment of innocent men is not the direct cause of the reduction of the number of sexual assaults. The increased likelihood of imprisonment of offenders must be the cause of the reduction. Finally, it must be more desirable to protect women from sexual assault than to imprison innocent men. Whether or not this condition is met may be dependent on perspective and the perception of how many women will be protected vs. the number of innocent men imprisoned.

However, what this doctrine does not address is whether or not the proposed action will be effective in producing the desired outcome. Does increasing the likelihood of prison serve as an effective deterrent to sexual assault? In other words, will this actually reduce sexual assault? The doctrine only addresses the intent of the act, not the effectiveness.

For instance, it is acceptable under this doctrine for a physician to administer a potentially lethal dose of pain medication to a dying patient in order to alleviate the pain, even if the physician knows the medication might kill the patient. But what if the medication does not alleviate pain because the patient has developed a tolerance to its pain-relieving effects? The doctor has now increased the risk of death without producing the desired effect; pain relief. Is that moral? By the same token, if increasing the likelihood on imprisonment of offenders does not decrease the number of sexual assaults, but only increases the likelihood of incarcerating the innocent, is it moral? More to the point, is it moral to institute such a policy without being reasonably assured that the policy will produce the intended result, especially when the harm done is almost assured?

It could further be argued that because the consequence of imprisoning the innocent can be foreseen, the intent cannot be denied. The knowledge that a harmful effect will occur as a result of committing an act is tantamount to intentionally bringing about the harmful effect. The Doctrine of Double Effect flows from another Catholic doctrine of doing vs. allowing harm. This can be expanded through a discussion of deontological ethics.[1]

Agent-centered deontology draws a distinction between causing, preventing, and allowing. It is impermissible to cause an evil act, but generally permissible to fail to act to prevent one. It would be morally wrong to push a child into the street in front of a car (causing). There may or may not be a moral obligation to stop that same child from running into the street (preventing). Allowings occur when the action taken involves removing a defense that would have otherwise been in place to prevent evil from occurring, and when the removal of the defense is not the direct cause of harm. Allowings are permitted only when the defense removed had previously been provided and when the removal of that defense allows another good to occur.

When one removes legal defenses that protect the accused in order to allow increased convictions intended to deter sexual assault, one is removing a defense previously provided by law in order to do good and since the removal of that defense is not a direct assault upon the innocent (although it allows the direct assault to occur), it would be permitted under this deontological ethic.

A somewhat weaker defense of changing the laws that protect the innocent is that the change does not cause the evil, it merely enables others to commit the evil (send the innocent to prison). Therefore those who change the law are not morally responsible for sending the innocent to prison. That this statement would be seen by many as morally reprehensible is a criticism of agent-centered deontology as well as the Doctrine of Double Effects.

A second type of deontology is patient-centered and concerned with rights, not duties. At its very foundation, the fundamental right is the right not to be “used only as a means for producing good consequences without consent… It is a right against being used by another for the user’s or others’ benefit.” (Alexander & Moore, 2012). Ethical dilemmas handled one way under agent-centered deontology might be handled differently under patient-centered deontology. The difference is the forbidden practice of using a person without that person’s consent.

In agent-centered deontology, rightness is derived from the mental state of the agent or the agent’s actions in causing the harm. In patient-centered deontology the justification of the results rests on whether or not the victim (the harmed person) is the means of producing the results. Further, in patient-centered deontology, providing aid to another is not required, nor is there a right to receive aid from another. This is derived from the concept of using.

Using can only be viewed as a positive act, not an inaction.

So in the example above, the child who runs into the street has no right to be saved, nor does the person who sees the child have an obligation to save it. Consequentialist ethics operate in both versions of deontology. Consequences help to define right and wrong actions in agent-centered deontology and define the moral norms used to guide action in patient-centered deontology.

An agent-centered deontology could be used to justify a change in laws to permit increased likelihood of conviction for sexual assault, including the likelihood of wrongful convictions, if it also reduces the number of sexual assaults. But under a system of patient-centered deontology, it could be argued that this is not justified. First, the goal of reducing the number of sexual assaults could be described as aiding potential victims. Under this system, no one has a right to aid. Second, it could be argued that the wrongfully convicted are being used without their consent to aid potential victims. Consequentialist ethics might intervene in the first case, but not in the second.

The consequence of sexual assault could be said to be so abhorrent that a moral norm be established that it in the interest of all to deter sexual assault. However, that norm would be overruled by using the innocent without their consent to prevent sexual assault. Thus a patient-centered approach would not permit this type of change in the law and those arguing for such a change would be arguing from the standpoint of agent-center deontology.

However, there is a case in which a patient-based ethic might permit such a change in the law. That is if it could be shown that more sexual assaults are prevented than innocents incarcerated or that sexual assault is a less desirable outcome than incarceration of innocents. Take the example of a trolley running loose down a mine shaft towards five workers trapped on the tracks. The trolley cannot be stopped and if left alone will kill all five workers. It is possible to pull a switch and divert the trolley onto a different track, but doing so would kill one worker who would not otherwise be killed.

Pulling the switch could be viewed as permissible if the five lives are considered more valuable than the one. However, because it is a positive act pulling the switch is not obligatory, simply because it is permissible does not relieve culpability. A person has the right not to act and cannot be held culpable for inaction under the patient-center ethic. But once a person acts, the person becomes culpable. So while a change to the law might be permissible, that permission does not relieve culpability. The actor is culpable for killing the one, but would not have been culpable for allowing the five to die. This is based on the separateness of persons.

Each person is a separate entity and wrongs (or rights) cannot be added together to form a greater wrong (or right). It follows that the rights of the majority do not supersede the rights of the minority which is the basis for constitutional law. Simply because the majority vote for a law, that law cannot be enacted if it violates the rights guaranteed under the constitution.

Interestingly, those who argue against sexual assault, argue from the standpoint of patient-centered deontology. No one has the right to use another person without that person's consent. This is the very foundation for the argument against sexual assault when one uses rights as the basis for the argument. It would seem a contradiction that these same persons would switch their ethical stance from patient-centered to agent-based when the context suits them.

Consequentialist questions remain whether one approaches the issue from the standpoint of the Doctrine of Double Effect and/or agent-based deontology or patient-centered deontology. Will making it easier to gain convictions provide a sufficient deterrent to sexual assault to justify the inevitable increase in wrongful convictions? Without answering this question, the entire argument is moot. Good intentions is simply not enough. As they say, the road to Hell is paved with them.

The Doctrine of Double Effect uses intent as the basis for morality of action and does not appear to consider actions where the outcome is uncertain. Agent-based deontology at least uses consequence as a standard in defining right and wrong. Patient-centered deontology uses moral norms to help define rights. But what happens when we don't know what the outcome of an action will be?

There are two likely outcomes (consequences) of strengthening the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to obtain convictions. One is that there is a reduction in sexual assaults committed due to the imprisonment of more offenders, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The other is that there is no change in the number of sexual assaults committed although more offenders are imprisoned, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The latter would likely be seen as unethical and immoral when held up to nearly any ethical philosophy.

There is little evidence to support that the first will occur. Many of the arguments against the death penalty are based on evidence that fails to support the reasoning that stiffer penalties results in effective deterrents. That would make the former outcome unethical as well. Therefore, the only truly ethical position is to not change these laws in any manner that would result in a greater number of convictions of the wrongly accused. Any law designed to reduce the number of sexual assaults should be evidence-based and include provisions designed to prevent wrongful convictions.

Alexander, Larry and Moore, Michael, “Deontological Ethics”, The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Winter 2012 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/win2012/entries/ethics-deontological/.

McIntyre, Alison, “Doctrine of Double Effect”, The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Fall 2011 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/fall2011/entries/double-effect/.

---

[1] Deontological ethics is a system of ethics that holds that some choices cannot be justified by their consequences. What makes a choice right is its conformity to moral norms. In agent-centered deontology, agents have permissions and obligations. Obligations may be positive (parents are obliged to protect their own children), while others are negative (doctors take an oath to do no harm). Permissions are acts permitted to certain agents, but not others (a parent would be permitted to save its own child even at the cost of death to more children than could otherwise have been saved while another agent would be required to save as many children as possible). Agent-centered deontology is duty-based, while patient-centered deontology is rights-based.

The Goal Post #03 – The Declaration of Sentiments

A Voice For Men Videos · 15 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

What is a Man?

Vernon Meigs · 16 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In late June I had published my article Biogynocentric Hypocrisy: TERF Edition (War on the Biological Male) in which I had made the following statement:

> When I was noticing sponsored posts on Facebook by Matt Walsh's page abut his new film What Is A Woman?, what grabbed my attention was the text on one of them: 'One of the surgeons I interviewed for this documentary confessed to having mutilated the genitals of a 16 year old boy. The Left says this isn't happening. They're lying, as always.'
>
> I admitted surprise at his choice of words: 'mutilated the genitals of a 16 year old boy'. I wondered aloud, how much does he actually care about a child's genital integrity across the board? What are Mr. Walsh's attitudes towards routine infant circumcision? Assuming that he is just another traditional conservative, I had thought that he couldn't give a shit about male genital mutilation and the serious consequences of it. However, I left it at that because that was all it was: an assumption. I wouldn't speak more on it until I had concrete proof of what would be his hypocritical stance, and I'd be completely open to be proven wrong as well, delighted to be in fact.

About a week ago, I got my answer.

For clarity, the quote reads thus:

> You lose credibility when you call circumcision "elective amputation". Particularly because "amputation", in the medical sense, generally refers to the removal of a limb. Make your point without being ridiculous. And parents frequently make decision for their infants. In fact, I'm not sure how else to raise an infant. You aren't "infringing on their liberty." Come on, that's just absurd. Make your point without resorting to laughably hysterical rhetoric.

This screenshot was shared by a mutual follower on Twitter, Nikos Anti-MGM, who imparted to me that it in itself was originally something a Facebook friend of his posted. Regardless, the importance of sharing it cannot be understated. Matt Walsh, who grandstands that he is "obsessed with stopping people from mutilating and sterilizing children", is proven to be yet another high-profile hypocrite regarding what kind of child is on the receiving end of the genital mutilation, and what ideology conducts it.

And yes, those were Walsh's own words. Clearly he's either not obsessed enough, or in fact obsessed strictly with refusing to admit that Americans have been making a mistake in eviscerating infant male foreskins for generations:

Some may be asking why I am spending a lot of energy going after these specific individuals who are open in their double standards about the genital mutilation of children. After all, too many Americans casually buy into the scam that calling all of them out one by one would be wasted effort. My response would be that anybody directly talking about the genital mutilation of children, especially when those are the exact terms that are used, must be consistent and deplore every context and every situation that this happens.

When they aren't, and the likes of Walsh go forth and mock intactivists and hurl the same fallacies used to justify male infant genital mutilation, they absolutely deserve to be called out. They must be put to question whether they actually are against all forms of child mutilation, or are just tailoring their narrative to appease their large conservative fanbase that still thinks nothing about what trauma they put their infant sons through in an environment completely normalized for that.

As the backlash against woke nonsense gains more momentum and high-profile personalities such as Walsh, Ben Shapiro and Jordan Peterson become ever-increasingly influential voices, it is crucial to expose their shortsightedness when they are being disingenuous in their given advocacies. This is of grave concern because the mindset they are smuggling in is not only a matter of a difference of opinion, but a genuine, serious risk for infant boys' well-being.

This is why I think we must get more serious in scrutinizing the attitudes of these personalities, and dismantle their hypocritical takes. As more of these gynocentric acts of throwing the male of the species under the bus while white knights plead for FtM trans surgery victims more so than the more numerous MtFs, if not exclusively the former, we will be on the track of casting into broad daylight the truth about their motives, none of which bode well for men and boys.

Anyway, it's time to get into the intended focus of this article, to dissect and analyze Matt Walsh's crude remark regarding the male foreskin and the amputation thereof. Speaking of, the subject of amputation is the first thing he blunders on.

> You lose credibility when you call circumcision "elective amputation". Particularly because "amputation", in the medical sense, generally refers to the removal of a limb. Make your point without being ridiculous.

According to the featured expert on the subject of amputation from John Hopkins Medicine, Jaime Troyal Shores, M.D, "Amputation is the loss of removal of a body part such as a finger, to, hand, foot, arm or leg." While the examples he immediately references include limbs because that is what tends to be in the forefront of the minds of those thinking about amputations, he appears to be clear enough that he is talking about a removal of any body part – and not exclusive to limbs. In the same web page under the entry for Amputation, under 'Types of Lower Extremity Amputation' a reference to pelvic amputation (hemipelvectomy) is made; last I checked, a pelvis is not itself a limb.

If this was not convincing enough, the Wikipedia page on amputations clearly states the different amputations that aren't limbs, and unequivocally listed is the removal of the foreskin.

Other [edit]

- Facial amputations include but are not limited to:
  - amputation of the ears
  - amputation of the nose (rhinotomy)
  - amputation of the tongue (glossectomy).
  - amputation of the eyes (enucleation).
  - amputation of the teeth (dental avulsion). Removal of teeth, mainly incisors, is or was practiced by some cultures for ritual purposes (for instance in the Iberomaurusian culture of Neolithic North Africa).
- Breasts:
  - amputation of the breasts (mastectomy).
- Genitals:
  - amputation of the testicles (castration).
  - amputation of the penis (penectomy).
  - amputation of the foreskin (circumcision).
  - amputation of the clitoris (clitoridectomy).

To add to that, a search on scholar.google.com for "amputation of the foreskin" and "foreskin amputation" would yield you over 100 results and over 70 results respectively. In short, the very act of referring to foreskin removal as an amputation is neither ridiculous nor non-credible.

For all his mockery on those who use the term "amputation" for MGM, I wonder if Walsh would at least entertain the idea that it is in fact closer to castration, especially since slaves or men on the losing side of a war have been so circumcised in lieu of actual castration. Also would he consider that children have literally lost or had their genitalia horribly damaged beyond saving due to a "botched" operation?

Recalling Walsh's preoccupation about amputations being for limbs only; by his own logic, neither is breast removal an amputation, then. Does he not know that the breast is but a modified sweat gland to begin with? Furthermore in response to the common attitude that alleges that circumcisions are like inoculations that you do for children as a part of medical practice you generally do in caring for your infant; if circumcision makes sense so his rate of diseases can lower, then by that logic those mastectomies that these girls are having would be great things, since they'd be reducing the risk of breast cancer!

Since we're on the subject of the argument for genital mutilation on the basis of alleged medical parental care, the next error:

> And parents frequently make decision for their infants. In fact, I'm not sure how else to raise an infant.

Does that make piercing an infant girls' ears during infancy an acceptable act? Does that qualify as raising an infant?

Let's take a deep dive into this "decision" parents are making for their infants. Let's make it so that even Matt Walsh can understand.

- The decision to remove not "just the tip" as commonly and falsely advertised, but 33-50% of penile skin along with the sensitive nerve endings for fine touch as well as protection of the glans which then becomes thickened like a callus.
- The decision to put the male infant through literal extreme pain resulting in brain changes due to high levels of cortisol as well as neurogenic shock (what circumcisers and their nurses euphemistically refer to as "sleeping through the operation")
- The decision to leave the male infant with a wound that is left alone and open to infections, including but not limited to herpes, meningitis, sepsis and cysts.

- The decision to doom so early in life the prospects of a proper sexual experience during his adulthood onwards, by removing the functional gliding and sensitive component.
- The decision to consign the male infant to the increased likelihood of sexual dysfunction during his adulthood, loss of sensation, and alexithymia – "the inability to recognize or describe one's own emotions" which is connected to depression, and even suicide if the truth about what you've done to him comes to light. Next time a guy tells you he's fine after being circumcised as an infant, that's probably the alexithymia talking.
- The decision to play American Roulette with your infant male.

By the last part, I mean risking dying just for being born male. It's not a gun but a knife that you play American Roulette with, and it never misses. The gamble is whether he actually dies of infection, the blood loss, or other ensuing complications that get brushed off euphemistically as Sudden Infant Death Syndrome so the circumcisers aren't held accountable.

If you think you're practicing a medical act for your son by doing this, for example if you think it reduces your son's chances of an STD or if it's cleaner, then once again the same can be said about mastectomies, or even your run-of-the-mill female genital mutilation. And if you think you're going to make him more appealing to ignorant American women cruel enough to self and others to prefer a "cut" penis, then you're a sexual groomer of your own son; there is nothing else to describe you.

And finally it's time to pick apart the last mistake of Mr. Walsh:

> You aren't "infringing on their liberty." Come on, that's just absurd. Make your point without resorting to laughably hysterical rhetoric.

I'll refer back to the fact that a parent precludes his son's ownership of his own intact sex organ before he even has developed the ability to exercise his own volition. Does Walsh understand the actual meaning and message of liberty or is he just too much of a conservative to look past his own neotraditionalist priorities and how liberty applied at large doesn't always go the way he may want to?

Once again, let's make clear this so even Matt Walsh can understand it:

- Self-ownership is a crucial, integral component to the philosophy of liberty.
- Self-ownership as a value applies to the human individual.
- A human is valued as such upon, and even before, birth.
- Self-ownership therefore is already in effect at infancy.

Let us also debunk the problem with the often-touted "parent's choice".

- Liberty is about negative rights; entitlements are positive rights.
- Negative rights are in line with self-ownership, and the right to be uninfringed by the force of others.
- Positive rights presume the "right" over another individual. Reminder that this is the opposite of liberty.
- The responsibility to the life you bring into the world is consistent with self-ownership; personal accountability and liberty are not in conflict.
- Legitimate medical practices as well as raising and caring for the child are both consistent with the aforementioned responsibility and the fact that you are cultivating the child into a being that can exercise and become aware of his own self-ownership.
- Non-medical or cosmetic acts do not count towards raising the child and depending on the lasting effect is tantamount to abuse of the child.
- Male genital mutilation is a non-medical, cosmetic, and downright harmful act – by all definitions acts of entitlement over another being.

- Self-ownership of the child is under assault by MGM as it includes both damage and theft of a crucial part of the male anatomy at a point in his life in which he is neither mentally or physically able to resist.
- The child's liberty is infringed via the assault on his self-ownership.

In short, there is no such thing as a "parent's choice" aside from the best practices of raising one's own child and the responsibility to his safety. Routine infant circumcision is a betrayal of that trust, safety, and the respect of self-ownership.

Also by Walsh's own logic, anyone who practices FGM are not assaulting girls' liberties. Oh wait, chances may be high that he may in fact consider it such an assault. What's the big difference in this case: "It's much worse for a girl", "Infants have no rights", "We must protect the girls but boys got to learn to take it"? Gynocentrists are so predictable.

The reader may be wondering right now whether the title I gave this article, "What is a Man?", was nothing more than a way to grab attention as well as a pastiche of Walsh's film "What is a Woman?" I confess that my intents leaned towards provocation in this regard, but if we think about it, we can very well ask and then answer the question "What is a Man?" in the context of the subject of the intact, whole, and unsacrificed male.

"What is a man?" may as well be a question that Walsh could ask himself, but I cannot trust any answer he may have.

So what is a man, anyway? I'm not here to give you a comprehensive answer on that at this moment, furthermore as individuals a man cannot afford to be condensed to one definition or even one archetype. For that matter, women as individuals likewise cannot afford to be so condensed (so much for "What is a woman?" am I right?). However the question of archetypes and the permutation of models for men and women is a subject I will save for a future article. In the meantime, let's clarify a few things that we can:

A man has his liberty, and his self-ownership, his free will to exercise himself in this world as an individual as well as his own expression of masculinity.

As a masculine, self-owning free being, a man has his desires – including prospects of pairing with a woman counterpart, which under proper circumstances include his expression of sexual desire. (We are speaking of the heterosexual world for the moment, though it is clear that those that aren't have their own such expressions and desire)

A man is fully equipped with everything he needs anatomically to exercise his sexual desires peacefully. He has a foreskin that is in no way a minor detail of this anatomy, but a crucially functional one. It is not an accident of birth.

Here we now have the conceptualization of the anatomically intact man, and answers the question in this respect. The act of routine infant circumcision, then, boils down to a mitigation of the qualities that make one a male. If foreskin amputations were regarded indeed as a form of "castration lite", it is an act that translates into making the male less of one. The answer to "What is a man?" is not "something you cut the anatomy of". "Man up" has been the go-to form of goading and shaming to advertise the circumcision industry and cultural practice. Routine infant circumcision is not the response to "What is a man?" but rather "How to destroy a man?"

What grand irony that it is the conservative that continues to moralize and defend this practice in the same breath as he decries the trans agenda for child operations. What irony, that the conservative who talks about "real men" and how masculinity is important to keep society going is the same one who wishes to surgically lower how much of a male someone is, so early in life. This is nothing short of punishment for males for being male – the radical feminists would be proud. It is no surprise to me why conservatives like Walsh and Tucker Carlson are so eager to "establish dialogue" with Trans Exclusionary Radical Feminists just to own the biological males.

A few more thoughts to close off on:

I am betting everybody in the men's movement and intactivist movement who read this, if they aren't instead incensed by Walsh's hypocrisy, are howling with laughter at the prospect of him demanding "rallies outside of hospitals that butcher children" as if it were a brilliant new proposition. Clearly he hasn't heard of Bloodstained Men and Their Friends before…or maybe he has but is instead opting to screech with eyes closed and fingers in his ears whenever someone reminds him of it. In short, Mr. Walsh – there already is a movement of which you speak of. The ball is already rolling. Frankly, you're proving to be just an obstacle without a good point to make.

I can only hope that we can bring this hypocrisy into light so much that the likes of Matt Walsh will have no choice but to stop ignoring it. They should be made to admit their blundering attitude on the subject and the fact that they've disingenuously grandstanded on a subject that goes deeper than they are willing to admit themselves. It is a travesty that what is a toxic fad by comparison is the specific type of child mutilation given disproportionately more attention than the vastly practiced, normalized and casually encouraged child mutilation that is MGM. This mutilation runs so deep in the cultural practice that the men who survive it are like most male domestic abuse victims: in denial, perhaps feeling like they deserved it, and do not consider what happened to them as abuse.

If anybody takes a stand against child mutilation, routine infant circumcision is rightfully the forefront issue. Matt Walsh symbolically and literally mocks the intactivist movement as he envisions himself as the forerunner against the kind of mutilation he can conveniently strike a crusade against. Consider these points the next time you think of Walsh as "brave" for speaking out myopically on an issue he has no moral authority on.

My thanks to the following links for sources on the damage of MGM:

https://breakingtheglasses.blogspot.com/p/intactivist-links.html#.YvsaNxTMJD_

> Citations List – Male Genital Mutilation

Also thanks to Peter Wright for his input as well as Nikos Anti-MGM from Twitter.

Jake and the Map of Men

Andrew MacDonald · 18 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Wow, men . . . women? How do we deal with that most complex of beasts and what do they want anyway?

Here's a simple map to help you find out where you are with respect to them and where you might want to go. I repeat might. The flat map you read in your comfy chair doesn't capture the half of the challenges. Think LOTR.

There are a million ways to present the map so I'll imagine an "Avatar" wandering through it. Just an ordinary schmuck. We'll call him Jake. Jake is 60, almost remembers the start of the feminist thing. At that time he thought immediately that there was a revolution going on and bought into it 100%. He wanted to help all he could, a lot like other guys his age and their older brothers. When he first heard the feminist thang approaching, he knew it would change everything. He just took it all to be true. When the women friends he was with in the bar pointed out his masculine advantage, he did notice they mostly made more money than he did, since he was taking off his clothes to a be a model at an art school and could hardly pay the rent. One worked for a university as a sexual harassment counselor.

So at first Jake was – here I introduce my (ahem, map) – an Accomodator. He made room for every codicil of feminist dogma in his anxious and uncertain brain.

Whatever they said, he figured it must be true. He never met or even heard of anyone who questioned the narrative (That's how it was once upon a time people.) For him to do so, not that he even thought of it back then, would be a form of suicide. He might as well apply for his golden embossed Incel Lifetime Membership card right away. Course no one had ever heard of an Incel back then.

It was way too threatening to challenge the narrative. Even though he was into all kinds of good leftist progressive causes and even though he was barely clinging to the underside of society like a barnacle himself, he never questioned any of it.

Slowly something changed. He had a strong reaction when the sexual harassment counselor laughed at him when he asked about sexism against men. He read Warren Farrell's The Myth of Male Power. He was still a most unmanly Accommodator but he was upset at the injustice of it all. It wasn't just what he saw happening all around and in a million ways: the multitudinous ways that male power really could be seen as the very opposite of the long-standing narrative. He also spent years poring over the information reading about it, studying, letting something form, imagining, learning.

Most his work was informed by a sense of moral outrage so we'll call him a Reactor. He lived in reaction to the dominant narrative. He identified with men as victims, women as oppressors even though he tried to keep the whole questioning polite. He wasn't sure he could stand to be hated for his evil views.

Jake also had a ton of other things going on in his life which he didn't tell anyone about. His depression, anxiety, the crazy risks he took, the daily struggle to not reveal himself as the ruined person he secretly thought he was.

This went on for a real long time as Jake fell in and out of relationships and careers. He got to see and experience just how black and white the story of women and men was compared to the actual murky pool of grey he swam for his life in.

So he did a ton of personal work on himself, to grow up, to take responsibility for himself (start), to say what he really thought more. He found he had a lot to say. Still he slobbered all over saying it right and wrong and doing it right and wrong in a million ways. Slowly he dug himself out of the pit, aware he could fall back any time and sometimes he did.

He realized he was an addict of sorts, so dependent on women's approval, that he would go on benders of pleasing her and denying himself. Sobriety didn't come easy. But he studied and learned and gradually came to see that he'd be better off if he didn't hide any more – if he something like told the truth whatever the consequences. "Something like" because it wasn't just words but also acting he needed to do. Or not acting but just being more willing. The opposite of his trying to hide all that time so he wouldn't be thought of as the rotten person he thought he really was.

Slowly Jake turned into the third kind of man with women, a Participant. He showed up as he was more, without trying to look good. He took risks that served him rather than risks that brought an exciting but dangerous rush. He continued to work on himself. He found he was an ordinary man like the others. He could talk with women and about women and men and could even see a way forward.

A woman showed up – as they do in times of crisis like the one we're in. It was good with her, and it sometimes wasn't, but he didn't give himself up and he knew she was as good as he was and that a larger story was already working out.

Women complaining about lack of available slavemasters

Anja Eriud · 20 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

One of the favourite myths of feminism is that ALL women were oppressed everywhere by ALL men – and that the mechanism by which men oppressed women was marriage.

Ah yes, in secret patriarchy meetings all over the known world, scheming men got together to lay their nefarious plans to trap and enslave these innocent and delicate flowers of womanhood into the bonds, the cruel and tortuous chains of matrimony.

But, of course a few brave souls resisted, they struggled against this demonic plot to entrap and enslave them, then of course they wrote books about their "struggle."

According to received "wisdom," and in the context of anything that emanates from the mouths or pens of feminists one does use the word "wisdom" with a large dose of irony, this nefarious plot has been going on for centuries, nay millennia.

For the purposes of this essay we shall confine ourselves to a quick but focused examination of some specific periods. Because after all, if feminists are correct, then like blindly putting a pin in a map with your eyes closed, wherever we landed in the timeline of human history we would reveal examples of this ongoing and nefarious patriarchal plot to enslave poor helpless damsels in the chains of matrimony. Makes sense, doesn't it?

Let us begin with a gem of historical research that can be found at Gynocentrism and its Cultural Origins, and a campaign to impose a Bachelor Tax on those patriarchal sods who… well, were refusing to do their patriarchal duty and enslave some poor maiden into the chains of matrimony.

One Mrs. Charlotte Smith in 1896 was so riled up and so aghast at the numbers of men who were refusing to get married that she started a campaign to force men to marry, and called upon public servants and officials to "do something" about this calumny against women.

> "Mr's Smith's malignment of bachelors began with attacks on public servants and officials, saying that bachelors have always been failures, and that bachelor politicians, especially, were "narrow minded, selfish, egotistical, and cowardly." She further claimed that, "It's about time to organize antibachelor clubs in this state. It should be the purpose of every young woman to look up the record of each and every man who is looking for votes and, should his moral character be such would make him unfit for office, then his shortcoming should be the point of attack by the antibachelor women of Massachusetts.
>
> There are 47,000 girls between the ages of 20 and 29 years in this state who cannot find husbands… [and] the bachelor politicians, they do not dare discuss the social evil question."[3] She states:
>
> "No man can be a good, honorable and upright citizen who has not entered into the holy bonds of wedlock" [Charlotte Smith][4]"

Now wait just a minute – that can't be right – men are roaming the land in hordes, gathering together in secret patriarchy meetings, laying plans on how best to trap and enslave these fair maidens into marriage! Feminists have said so.

In her paper entitled Sisterhood and Slavery: Transatlantic Antislavery and Women's Rights, Karen Offen, Institute for Research on Women & Gender, Stanford University, takes a jaunt through history to justify the use of the word or analogy "slavery" as comparable to the status of women, especially married women from circa the 1650's to 1848:

> "In this paper, I extend the timeframe back some two hundred years from 1848 to the 1650s, providing evidence of the slavery-marriage analogy in published literary and political works by women and men (who > deploy it in support of what can only be termed, retrospectively, a feminist politics). I will raise questions about exactly how we might interpret the feminist use of the slavery analogy as well as about how scholars and theorists have heretofore approached the separate subjects of women's rights and slavery. "

Which is indeed what she does. Now it must be said that Ms. Offen's grasp of "history" is somewhat shaky, and she does take the long way around, via the usual suspects of "revisionist" and selective feminist history. Olympe De Gouges, John Stuart Mills, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, etc., with some rather unusual choices – Napoleon and Jean Jacques Rousseau – thrown in at odd moments. But basically what this paper seeks to do is what all feminists seek to do: correlate the status of women historically with the status of slaves – black slaves in particular. Ergo, she concludes with:

> "The power of the slavery analogy, for feminists, was its insistence that women, and particularly women who married, were individuals in their own right, that they possessed "human rights" and free will and could not be legally disposed of like chattel or forced, even for family reasons, to do things against their will. The slavery analogy applied to marriage struck at the heart of institutionalized male domination in the family, and it continued to haunt the Western consciousness and to inspire subsequent generations of feminist action, both by women and by men well into the twentieth century, when in most countries the legal institution of marriage was totally (however reluctantly) restructured. It continues to characterize campaigns against sexual slavery into the twenty-first century."

This is very odd, because you see men were presumably having secret patriarchy meetings, but not about what feminists seem to believe. You patriarchs have hoodwinked millions of "womens studies" graduates to believe you wanted to enslave them. But nope, men were having meetings about fighting for the right NOT to be coerced into marriage by harridans like Charlotte Smith demanding that unmarried men be punished for NOT getting married.

In case you haven't noticed, Ms. Offen's paper covers the period from the 1650s to 1848, a period during which women campaigned to have bachelors punished for refusing marriage. It is also a time in which we read of women having the legal liberty to choose for a husband any man who took her fancy, and if that man refused to marry her he was heavily fined according to the value of his possessions.

Yet, less than 50 years later, in the late 1800s, Mrs. Charlotte Smith was getting her corsets in a kerfuffle over men not marrying, and how there are "47,000 girls between the ages of 20 and 29 years in this state who cannot find husbands" (the state she is referring to is Massachusetts). Somehow, I suspect that Mrs. Smith was probably not the only busybody, in the only state in 1896 America, squawking about all those lonely and bereft "ladies" pining away for slavery – ermmmmm – marriage.

Let's fast-forward a bit in history and the period just after the first World War – the Great War it is called – though how one can call a war that claimed the lives of an estimated 10 million men great?

What was one of the major issues that exercised the minds of the public after this "War to end all wars"?

> "Condemned to be virgins: The two million women robbed by the war:
>
> They dreamt of love, marriage and children. But, as a new book reveals, the Great War robbed two million women of the men they would have married, leading many into relationships which could only be whispered about…"

The book referred to here is Singled Out: How Two Million Women Survived Without Men After The First World War by Virginia Nicholson (Viking, £20).

You will note of course that the emphasis is on the struggle of women to survive without men after the war, rather on the estimated 10 million MEN who didn't actually SURVIVE the war.

> "World War I was an extremely bloody war that engulfed Europe from 1914 to 1919, with huge losses of life and little ground lost or won. Fought mostly by soldiers in trenches, World War I saw an estimated 10 million military deaths and another 20 million wounded. While many hoped that World War I would be "the war to end all wars," in actuality, the concluding peace treaty set the stage for World War II."

In fact the article cites some piteous and heartbreaking examples of the "struggles" of these sad and lonely maidens and what they are prepared to do in order to enslave themselves:

> "Many placed advertisements in the Press in their hope of finding any man – like the following heartfelt plea published during the war: "Lady, fiancè killed, will gladly marry officer totally blinded or otherwise incapacitated by the War."
>
> By 1921 publications like the Matrimonial Times were carrying columns of advertisements placed by spinsters and widows.
>
> They included:
>
> MATRIMONY – Spinster, 38, loving disposition, fond of children, entertaining and country life, is anxious to correspond with a wounded officer of cultured tastes, with view to a matrimonial alliance; one with some means.
>
> LADY, aged 49, spinster, cultured, bright temperament, small capital… would like to meet officer or civilian age 45-60… could be very happy with disabled officer needing a cheerful companion and pal."

Couple of things to note here: while there were an estimated 10 million men killed in WWI, there were a further 20 million men injured. Need I say that those 20 million injured men did not have the benefit of the kinds of medical technological marvels available to us today? So, being "injured" carried an extra dimension of horror and anguish for these men.

Now take a closer look at the extracts from the letters cited in the article, "…will gladly marry officer totally blinded or otherwise incapacitated by the War" – "….anxious to correspond with a wounded officer of cultured tastes, with view to a matrimonial alliance; one with some means" – "…..could be very happy with disabled officer needing a cheerful companion and pal."

Even when women were prepared to "settle" in a desperate attempt to "get married" there were conditions. The ladies preferred their men –injured or not, disabled or not, to be of a certain status, to be the "right class." To be "Officers." Hypergamy anyone? Gynocentrism?

This was such a burning issue that the government stepped in, to ease and attempt to resolve the plight of these "surplus women"

> "In 1919, the Society for the Oversea Settlement of British Women was established and was provided with an annual grant. The Society's panels included ones for areas – Africa, Canada, Australia and New Zealand – and for work – for nursing, for training and for agriculture. All of this effort was in spite of the evidence collected by the Dominions Royal Commission of 1912-1917 which found that the casualties of men from the dominions during the war meant that marriage prospects in the Empire had also declined. Additionally, men were emigrating as well as women, perpetuating the imbalance in Britain. So in 1920, 125,000 women emigrated but 115,000 men also did. Between 1923 and 1927, fewer women than men emigrated as a result of the Empire Settlement Act (1922), through which the government provided financial assistance to emigrants."

As you can see, it kind of backfired – but – hurrah for the attempt, to provide a means to give women what they wanted – "enslavement" in marriage.

So, here we are in the 21st century and has anything changed?

Well yes, and no – according to feminists men are still patriarchal bastards roaming the land trying to trap innocent virgins into the chains of matrimony – except:

> "Among pre-adults, women are the first sex. They graduate from college in greater numbers (among Americans ages 25 to 34, 34% of women now have a bachelor's degree but just 27% of men), and they have higher GPAs. As most professors tell it, they also have more confidence and drive. These strengths carry women through their 20s, when they are more likely than men to be in grad school and making strides in the workplace. In a number of cities, they are even out-earning their brothers and boyfriends.
>
> Still, for these women, one key question won't go away: Where have the good men gone?"

Perhaps the attitude toward men in the following might give all those lonely and pining fair maidens, yearning to get shackled up, an insight as to where all the good men have scarpered to?

> "Single men have never been civilization's most responsible actors; they continue to be more troubled and less successful than men who deliberately choose to become husbands and fathers. So we can be disgusted if some of them continue to live in rooms decorated with "Star Wars" posters and crushed beer cans and to treat women like disposable estrogen toys, but we shouldn't be surprised."

Because after all, as the redoubtable Mrs Charlotte Smith also claimed so vehemently all those years ago:

> "No man can be a good, honorable and upright citizen who has not entered into the holy bonds of wedlock"

Like Ludwig Von Beethoven, Nikola Tesla, Henry David Thoreau, Isaac Newton? Those kinds of dishonorable and presumably irresponsible men who wasted their lives away without the "civilising" influence of women!

The tale of Delphine LaLaurie

Robert Brockway · 21 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Western civilisation has regarded women as morally superior to men since at least the Middle Ages. Even a cursory review of history shows that this isn't so with women throughout the ages demonstrating their willingness and capacity to harm others. We know from recent research that queens regnant were more likely to start wars and more likely to continue the wars of their predecessors than were kings. And we have a prime example in Mary I of England. She was called Bloody Mary because of her penchant for burning her subjects alive when they disagreed with her religious stance.

Delphine LaLaurie wasn't a queen though, she was just a slave-owning socialite. Born in to privilege in New Orleans in 1787 she was to live most of her life in the city.

LaLaurie outlived two husbands before marrying again. In 1831 she purchased a block of land at 1140 Royal Street, New Orleans. The following year she had a two-story mansion built. Contemporary reports suggest that her husband had little to do with the running of the property as he was a practising physician.

Still in 1832 LaLaurie petitioned the court for legal separation from her husband. She continued to live at the Royal Street house with some of her children. Around this time rumours of her mistreatment of slaves started to circulate in polite New Orleans society. Between 1831 & 1834 twelves slaves were recorded as having died at the Royal Street address.

Harriet Martineau, a sociologist, visited New Orleans in 1836 and heard the rumours about LaLaurie, later publishing them in England. Martineau noted that local authorities had taken notice of the reports and investigated but had found no evidence of mistreatment at the time.

In her writing Martineau recounted various stories of cruelty by LaLaurie including one in which a young slave girl accidentally fell to her death from the roof of the mansion while being chased by a whip-wielding LaLaurie. This was reportedly witnessed by a neighbour. The death apparently led to an investigation in which LaLaurie was found to have been unlawfully cruel to her slaves.

In 1834 a fire broke out at 1140 Royal Street. Locals rushed in to the building to rescue anyone they could. Reports from the time indicate that LaLaurie refused to hand over the key to the slave quarters to rescuers so they had to break in. A local newspaper, the New Orleans Bee reported that they found:

> "seven slaves, more or less horribly mutilated … suspended by the neck, with their limbs apparently stretched and torn from one extremity to the other"

Rescuers also found that LaLaurie kept her cook, a slave, chained to the stove. The cook subsequently admitted to starting the fire as a suicide attempt.

As news spread after the fire, the citizens of New Orleans became so incensed at the treatment of slaves meted out by LaLaurie that a mob formed and attacked her house. LaLaurie fled, first going to Mobile, Alabama and then on to France where she apparently lived for the rest of her life. LaLaurie was never brought to justice for her crimes. The date of her death is unknown but may have been as early as 1842.

Over the decades stories about the cruelty of LaLaurie have grown and this may have even been true in her own time. While some of the stories are of questionable veracity, it is clear that LaLaurie was unusually cruel to her slaves and that she exceeded the norms of her time.

There are many elements in this story that contradict the feminist historical narrative.

LaLaurie legally separated from her husband. She was able to petition the courts and they accepted her arguments and granted the legal separation. Feminists will tell you that at this time women were the property of their husbands. LaLaurie wasn't property but the slaves she owned were. LaLaurie made her own decisions. Alas she was never held accountable for them.

Harriet Martineau was a social theorist and sociologist. She seems to have been largely responsible for disseminating information about LaLaurie outside of New Orleans. That Martineau was writing books on sociology, being published and earning enough to live from her work flies in the face of the feminist historical narrative. When faced with examples such as Martineau feminists sometimes weakly argue that some women were exceptions to the rule of systemic female oppression. A simpler explanation is that the oppression feminists talk about didn't exist. History is replete with examples such as Martineau.

That LaLaurie was also in charge of these slaves and able to inflict cruelty on them goes against the feminist historical narrative which paints women as helpless pawns under the control of men, completely lacking agency.

History is also replete with examples such as LaLaurie. Cruel women that deliberately harmed those in their charge, whether they were children, servants or slaves.

Even LaLaurie's separation speaks to a level agency for women often denied by feminists.

And the fact that the residents of New Orleans sought to hold LaLaurie accountable for her actions also speaks to views on women at the time.

Both Martineau & LaLaurie were mistresses of their own destiny, not mere pawns of The Patriarchy as feminists would have us believe.

Much of modern feminism rests on the feminist historical narrative. Feminism is built on a stack of lies. Lies about how men lived and acted in the past. Lies about how women lived and acted in the past. Feminism has to claim that women were oppressed historically. If it didn't make this claim then there would have been nothing for feminism to rescue women from. By revealing the historical truth we attack feminism at its base.

The house can still be seen 1140 Royal Street, New Orleans however it was extensively renovated after 1838 and is described as unrecognisable in comparison to how it looked when LaLaurie lived there.

Further Reading

ThoughtCo

Murderpedia

Folklore, Feminism, and the Erasure of Male Victimization

Diego Morales · 22 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Can scholars and writers be wrong about a story they know well? That question might seem odd since academics and authors are generally knowledgeable, but the quality of their analyses depends on a variety of factors – including their ideology. There isn't anything inherently wrong with philosophical or political interpretations of a text; at best, these readings enrich the work by bringing a new perspective. At worst, they sabotage our ability to recognize important narrative details. The latter occurs frequently when feminists deal with the frame tale in One Thousand and One Nights.

Alf Layla wa-Layla, better known to Westerners as The Arabian Nights, is an evolving tradition of folktales, proverbs, and verses. What binds the authorless and fluctuating corpus together is a frame narrative called "The Story of King Shahriyar and His Vizier's Daughter, Shahrazad" (Horta & Seale, 2021). It goes like this: A king asks his brother to visit him. Before leaving, Shahzaman discovers his wife sleeping with another man. He kills them and makes the journey to Shahriyar's kingdom, but is depressed. Then he discovers his sister-in-law's affair with a slave and realizes his experience isn't unique. Shazaman's mood improves so much that Shahriyar questions it and convinces him to explain the cause.

After verifying the facts, Shahriyar searches for someone cuckolded worse than himself. He and Shahzaman meet a woman imprisoned by a jinni, who forces them to have sex with her by threating to awaken the entity and have it kill them. Following the incident, the kings returning home, murder the queen and slaves, and Shahriyar begins a daily ritual of marrying, deflowering, and executing women. He's eventually pacified by Shahrazad and Dunyazad, two sisters who use the power of storytelling to distract him for one thousand one nights.

Feminists have largely embraced Shahrazad for defending women, though the sentiment isn't universal (Shamma, 2017). Nonetheless, feminism influences perceptions of characters other than the heroine. Best exemplified by the explanations given for King Shahriyar's gendercide. Based on the sequence of events, his violence occurs after he and his brother encounter the jinni's prisoner. Her use of death threats to acquire sex from them qualifies as an act of rape (FindLaw, 2019). Thus, sexual victimization motivates Shahriyar's bloodlust. This interpretation is bolstered by research on sexual violence; prior victimization is a risk factor for perpetration (CDC. 2022). Despite the evidence, scholars attribute the king's rage to his wife's infidelity:

> As a result of [discovering the adulteries of each of their wives] the royal brothers institute a policy of marrying young virgins every evening and executing them the morning after." (Grossman, 1980)
>
> Shahrazad has been sentenced to die in the morning by the Sultan Shahriyar who, in revenge for the infidelity > of his Sultana… has decided to marry a virgin every night and cut off her head in the morning." (Warner, 2011)

>
> What maddens Shahriyar initially is the discovery of his wife's adultery with a servant – a loss of innocence compounded and apparently universalized by the discovery that his brother's wife enjoys a similarly adulterous liaison with a black slave." (Trumpener, 2013)
>
> [Scheherazade] volunteers to marry King Shahryar, a man determined to punish women for the duplicity and infidelity of his first wife." (Aggarwal-Schifellite, 2021)

The inability or unwillingness to recognize the rape has led to distortions of the narrative in critical summaries.

The focus is placed on different issues:

> [Shahriyar] has been obliged by the threat of a painful death to cuckold the jinn after having just endured the experience of being himself cuckolded." (Clifton, 1985)

Or the rape is framed as consensual sex:

> The woman, kidnapped on her wedding night, takes the opportunity, while her captor is asleep, to seduce the two brothers." (Malti-Douglas, 2004)

Or the crime is misidentified:

> …both brothers are blackmailed into sexual intercourse by a young woman who has been locked up by a demon ("ifrit') who kidnapped her on her wedding day." (Enderwitz, 2007)

These obfuscations are reinforced by literary productions. For instance, "Scheherazade Retold" (Phelps, 1981) and The Ninety-Ninth Bride (King, 2014) both depict the Sultana sympathetically. They recontextualize her infidelity, by implying it never happened in the former, or making her a victim of an unwanted and abusive relationship in the latter. Consequently, her lover's status as a slave, and the exploitative nature of their relationship, is expunged. By contrast, both retellings worsen the Sultan's character. This is done by omitting the rape and removing his brother, whom he genuinely loves and treats well. They also kill him off instead of letting him reform like in the original text.

Feminist retellings that are more accurate to the source material still exemplify these problems. "Shahriyar and Shahrazad" (al-Shaykh, 2014) maintains the loving relationship between the brothers and the queen's unfaithfulness. However, the rape appears in a separate story, "The Demon's Wife," making it unrelated to Shahriyar's murders. Moreover, the author included the episode for artistic and ideological reasons: "And, of course, for all the stories the theme was women were wily and men were oppressive, in a way" (NPR, 2013).

Some people might ask why it matters that old stories are being analyzed or adapted improperly when there are more pressing issues. The answer is twofold. Firstly, feminists either can't or won't make space for men's experiences of sexual victimization, even in a fictional context. Secondly, that ideology is pervasive within academia. MRAs must reclaim these stories, or allow feminists to marginalize and appropriate them at the expense of male students and survivors.

Bibliography

Aggarwal-Schifellite, Manisha. (2021, November 5). Guile heroines: Answering Campbell's 'Thousand Faces,' Maria Tatar reveals multitudes in new book. The Harvard Gazette. https://web.archive.org/web/20220412180429/https://news.harvard.edu/gazette/story/2021/11/harvard-scholar-celebrates-heroines/

Al-Shaykh, Hanan. (2014). One thousand and one nights: A retelling. Anchor Books.

Center for Disease Control and Prevention. (2022, February 5). Sexual violence: Risk and protective factors https://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/sexualviolence/riskprotectivefactors.html

Clifton, Jerome. (1985). Madness and Cure in the 1001 Nights. Studia Islamica, 61, 107-125. https://doi.org/10.2307/1595410

Enderwitz, Susanne. (2007). Shahrazad is one of us: Practical narrative, theoretical discussion, and feminist discourse. In U. Marzolph (Ed.), The Arabian nights in transnational perspective. (pp. 261 – 278). Wayne State University Press.

FindLaw. (2019, January 1). California Code, Penal Code – PEN § 261. https://codes.findlaw.com/ca/penal-code/pen-sect-261.html

Grossman, Judith. (1980). Infidelity and fiction: The discovery of women's subjectivity in the Arabian nights. The Georgia Review, 34(1), 113-126. https://www.jstor.org/stable/41397912

Horta, Paulo, L., & Seale, Yasmine. (2021). The annotated Arabian nights: Tales from 1001 nights. Liveright Publishing Corporation.

King, Catherine, F. (2014). The ninety-ninth bride. Book Smugglers Publishing. https://web.archive.org/web/20220713220239/https://www.thebooksmugglers.com/2014/12/the-ninety-ninth-bride-by-catherine-f-king.html

Malti-Douglas, Fedwa. (2004). Homosociality, Heterosexuality, and Shahrazad. In U. Marzolph & R. van Leeuwen (Eds.), The Arabian nights encyclopedia (pp. 38–42, Vol. 1). ABC-Clio.

NPR. (2013, June 9). Scheherazade: From storytelling 'slave' to 'first feminist' https://web.archive.org/web/20130609150042/https://www.npr.org/2013/06/09/189539866/scheherazade-from-storytelling-slave-to-first-feminist Phelps, Ethel. (1981). Scheherazade Retold. In The maid of the north: Feminist folk tales from around the world (pp. 167–174). Holt, Rinehart and Winston.

Shamma, Tarek. (2017). Women and slaves: Gender politics in the Arabian nights. Marvels & Tales, 31(2), 239-260. https://doi.org/10.13110/marvelstales.31.2.0239

Trumpener, Katie. (2013). The Politics of Conversation: Denis Diderot, Elio Vittorini, Manuel Puig, Masaki Kobayashi, Vasily Grossman. In M. Warner & P. Kennedy (Eds.), Scheherazade's children: Global encounters with the Arabian nights. (pp. 218 – 242). New York University Press.

Warner, Marina. (2011). Stranger magic: Charmed states and the Arabian nights. The Belknap Press.

Game of Flames

Robert Brockway · 23 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

With the release of House of the Dragon, a prequel to Game of Thrones, we're republishing Robert Brockway's article on Daenerys Targaryen and why her actions in the final episode were not out of character. –Ed

SPOILER WARNING. It is strongly recommended to only read this article after having completed watching the HBO series Game of Thrones. This article contains spoilers and also presumes knowledge of the Game of Thrones storyline.

Daenerys Targaryen, first of her name, Breaker of Chains, Mother of Dragons and… Destroyer of King's Landing. Viewers of Game of Thrones should know by now that Daenerys Targaryen chose to have her last remaining dragon destroy King's Landing even after it had effectively fallen to her forces. All that was left were a few remnants of the armies defending the city. Most opposition had capitulated and it was just a matter of mopping up any remaining pockets of resistance. But that wasn't enough. Daenerys Targaryen destroyed a defenceless city, killing countless civilians – ostensibly her own subjects.

Like father like daughter. In fact, it's better than that. Her father Aerys Targaryen, second of his name, famously said:

> "The traitors want my city, but I'll give them naught but ashes. Let Robert be king over charred bones and cooked meat."

Aerys never did destroy King's Landing thanks to the intervention of The Kingslayer, but 24 years later his daughter Daenerys succeeded where he had failed.

Not everyone is happy with this turns of events. Quite a lot of people were looking forward to Daenerys sitting on the Iron Throne it seems.

Over the years feminists have had a love-hate relationship with Game of Thrones. They were decrying depictions of violence against women in the show, despite the fact that there were far more depictions of violence against men. And then they crowed loudly that for the last couple of seasons the two main contenders for the Iron Throne have both been women – Cercei Lannister and Daenerys Targaryen. For a while Game of Thrones was widely proclaimed to be a feminist TV show. The reality is that both major houses were led by women because they'd each run out of men – most of whom were dead. Yes, very feminist.

And so Game of Thrones remained close to the heart of feminists until that now infamous episode, The Bells in which Daenerys destroyed a city that had already fallen to her. Feminists cried out! They proclaimed that this was a sudden and unexpected change of character for Daenerys Targaryen. They could only come to this conclusion, of course, if they were wearing rose coloured glasses.

Daenerys had always been ruthless and willing to use violence to achieve her aims. This we had seen many times.

During Season 4 Daenerys crucified 163 masters of Meereen in response to the masters having previously crucified slaves in the same manner. She cared not for the culpability of the individuals involved and there is evidence that at least some of the masters crucified had spoken out against the practice. Later she has another, potentially innocent, master immolated in a crypt below the city in an effort to intimidate the rest.

In Season 6 she burns all of the Khals alive before seizing power over the remaining Dothraki.

Season 7 saw Daenerys burn Randyll and Dickon Tarly alive after they refused to bend the knee to her.

And of course in Season 8 Daenerys has Varys summarily executed by dragon fire for allegedly betraying her. There is no evidence that she investigated these allegations before passing sentence.

Daenerys destroyed King's Landing because she had concluded that the people of Westeros could never love her so they would have to fear her. She said as much in the preceding episode:

> I don’t have love here. I only have fear.

The destruction of King’s Landing was entirely in character for Daenerys. Feminists could not cope with this as they continue to infantilise women. Feminists wanted Daenerys sitting on the Iron Throne and ruling over a new golden age of Westeros as an allegory for a feminist utopia in the real world. Typical feminist tosh.

Daenerys is a fully fleshed out character, flaws and all. Those flaws led her to destroy a city and doom her own reign before it had begun.

And so we saw Daenerys killed in the final episode of Game of Thrones and John Snow effectively exiled for freeing Westeros of a tyrant.

Feminists might be placated by Sansa becoming queen of an independent North though. Nah, feminists are never placated.

She was just a child/baby killer

Robert St. Estephe · 24 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Luisa De Jesus was a child care provider who had murdered 28 children so that she might profitably pocket advance payments given to pay for the little tykes' care. No mention is made in the sources of the sex of any of the young woman's victims. This modest post is part of a large and ongoing information collection effort documenting female serial killers, generally forgotten ones.

The criminal phenomenon of the female serial killer is, like all other forms of female criminality, only scantly researched and studied. This pervasive incuriousness has been the norm ever since the pre-1960s era when almost all criminologists were male (and were imbued with chivalrous attitudes). And it is still the norm today as well, where the field of criminology is, like everything else, constantly monitered by "ministry of truth" overseers always prepared to quash any "inappropriate" (undesired) research – by withholding funding or blacklisting and termination of employment, whenever any scholar violates the politically correct orthodoxy.

My own independent and unfunded research of female serial killers took as its starting point a published list of 140 cases, most of which many required some aggressive digging around to bring to light the particulars. To this skeleton list I have added hundreds of others, so that my list now numbers over 600. The expanding list includes many cases similar to that of De Jesus, involving female child care providers, called "baby farmers," who murdered children. The collection includes about 70 of these murderous baby farmers from across the globe. Some of these cases of women caught murdering their charges involve the slaying of upwards of a thousand. In these homicidal baby farmer cases the cause of death varies, and includes drugging, poisoning, starvation, strangulation, battery, stabbing in the heart with a needle or a hairpin, exposure to the sun and even incineration while alive.

Furthermore, despite the widely disseminated claims of crime experts that serial killers are not only almost always male but also that they are almost always "white," the 600 female serial killer cases span non-"white" Africa, Asia, South America as well as "white" Australia, Europe and North America (the US, in itself, sports many remarkable non-"white" cases). Class status covers the full spectrum from aristocrat to peasant.

Shortly after posting the scant information on the sad case of Portuguese murderess Luisa De Jesus (who, by the way, was executed for her crimes) that I culled from an obscure medical publication the post attracted a blog comment, and a particularly bilious one. It is reproduced here, without corrections, but I have changed the all caps in the original to a conventional upper and lower case, for readability's sake. The comment was signed "Christinne":

> Luisa De Jesus' case has nothing to do with misandry, looks like someone needs a brain here. And nowhere it is mentioned that she killed only baby boys which indeed would have connected her to the subject of this blog. No, she was just a child/baby killer, thats all…. misandry, yeah, rite….hypocrisy without boundaries….

The commenter focuses her indignant wrath on the word "misandry" that indeed appears prominently in the name of the website, but which does not appear within the post itself, and the commenter has apparently little interest in looking into topic at hand: the history of violence, which is one of several subjects dealt with in detail on the blog. "Misandry" is not only not mentioned in the post in question, but it is not mentioned in 99% of the several hundred other posts on female serial killer published on the site. Yet it is that word "misandry" that matters most of all to commenter Christinne, and she sure does let me know about it. Her comment has, as it turns out, come to serve a useful purpose. It has gotten me to pay attention to the thing that mattered so much to her, namely my use of the term misandry as it relates to the facts of feminine violence.

Current public knowledge about violence is grievously distorted by the lack of attention female violence has gotten from those who supply and disseminate the information that influences the broader public. And that is why the collecting and analysis of cases of feminine violence warrants the attention of one who, like myself, seeks to elucidate the phenomenon we call “misandry.”

Yet, by no means would I get too carried away with evaluating the crimes of Luisa De Jesus in much different a way had her tiny victims been mostly or exclusively male. This is because I, for the most part, reject the simplistic fashionable class-warfare model of thought known to educators as “CRG” (Class, Race and Gender), a model that was created and perpetuated by mid-20th century Frankfurt School marxists – and which has infected and dominated public discourse so pervasively that it is no longer even recognized by most people as the product of a specific identifiable utopianist ideology. Commenter Christinne is, it would seem to me, fully submerged under the mesmerizing utopia-or-bust CRG spell.

It should be mentioned, however, that before the onset of the age of post-World War II “expertism” – where we stop thinking for ourselves and defer to credentialed lords of reality up on high – the idea that women were frequently murderously violent was far from being an exotic one. The notion that female serial killers were rarer than male ones would have been thought absurd to newspaper readers of the 1840s through the 1940s. Such homicide-addicted women were constantly in the news.

Yet for the Class-Race-Gender indoctrinee, the world is just one vast battleground arrayed with paired-off opponents: “persons of color” versus “whites,” the poor versus the middle class and wealthy, men vs. women. This is the image of World Class War, all day, every day, everywhere, incessant. The sum total of human interactions are thus reduced in this dumbed-down mindset to nothing but bilateral oppositions of interest/identity groups. The combatants go at each other within a 24/7 arena of battles fought exclusively by members of teams known by the labels “oppressor” and “oppressed.” The hostilities are manifested in every little petty detail of every human’s quotidian existence (“The personal is the political,” as the saying goes).

Those who are indoctrinated into this mindset are thus addicted to narrow ideations of conflict, and are likewise addicted to the affective rushes concomitant to the ideations. The indoctrinees are obsessed – and they are paranoid. They are blind to nuance and immune to the employment of analytical reason. This state of affairs is, it goes without saying, makes for an exhausting and nerve-wracking way to live – and it makes the indoctrinee as nutty and burned-out as a pecan pie left too long in the oven.

For such an indoctrinee, The Unknown History of Misandry, which displays, as it does, a cornucopia of far flung historical documents of bad behavior on the part of females, must seem – to such a beleaguered benighted soul – to be designed with the purpose of putting forth such an argument as this:

“Hey people, it is not the guys who are the a-holes. No way. It is the gals who are the a-holes. – See? So there! – I win!”

No. That is not at all what we are up to in this blog. To think in such a way as that would merely be reflecting the mirror image of the most pedestrian variety of the pre-packaged Class-Race-Gender marxist picture of reality. We seek no “win,” nor do we even recognize the conflict of ideas as being defined by sex (or, “gender,” so called). Rather the conflict is between neat self-serving ideological cultism and actual complex human reality.

►Collectivist Ciphers or Human Beings?

The “So there! I win!” mentality would not be consistent with how a non-indoctrinated mind works. Not at all. Rather, the website’s generous presentation of details of violence by women is to us not a demonstration of what could be thought to be an essentially violent tendency in that sex, but rather it is a set of documents that may assist in demonstrating certain points. They are useful, for example, in showing that the politically correct notion – that, somehow (in the fairytale land of gender theories), women are in their very essence non-violent receptors of conflict, and are never initiators of it; that they inherently and universally, possess a depth of compassion unknown to members of the “oppressor” sex – is a false one.

The particular portion of the larger anti-misandry project that UHoM sets out to serve can be identified as that of the necessity to contradict – through the exhibition of evidence – the collectivist and social constructivist dogma which holds that a human being is not an individual agent but rather is merely an atomized particle in the historical continuum; that a man and a woman are mere products of inescapable "social forces" who have no free will.

The stranglehold that this dumb dogmatism has on such a large portion of the public is why I find it necessary to publish such tabloid-styled collections as "Female Serial Killers Who Like to Murder Women." The title sounds dumbed-down because it is designed to be so.

There is an oft-repeated truism stating that "female serial killers are rare" (in comparison with the males) and it is false. The statistics used to support that myth are merely the product of a wildly disproportionate allocation of resources in the pursuit of criminological data. The myth is further reinforced by the bias of chivalry and by the ethos of institutionalized female privilege currently masquerading as "gender studies."

Thus it becomes necessary to point out in such a crude manner (as in a collection of cases of serial killers who are women who choose women and girls as their victims) that we ought not to be looking at violence as some "gotcha" illustration of some intellectual's made up ideology, but rather as just plain old-fashioned murder.

We all want to avoid being murdered, most of us at least. Thus when we get the idea in our heads that women are somehow supra-human beings, sugar-and-spice morally superior gender-fairies, who, as individuals, are immune to the pressures of temptation that have been known to wise men and wise women since the dawn of history – namely pride, avarice, envy, anger, lust, gluttony, and sloth – then we are not going to be properly on the lookout. Violent and predatory women use the absence of circumspection on the part of potential victims of both sexes to their great advantage. A little bit of feminine wile goes a long way in setting up her victim for a fall.

Equally vulgar are the titles of posts of collections on violent women – such as "Women Who Like to Torture" "Cannibal Murderesses," "Acid Queens: Women Who Throw Acid," "Give 'Em the Axe," "Ice Pick Chicks," "Ogresses," "Step-Mothers from Hell," "Murder-Coaching Moms" – which throw light on the specific and individualized realities of feminine violence.

There is nothing fancy about these crime stories. They are merely simple ordinary facts that happen to blatantly contradict the sophisticated (that is, artfully dishonest) and heavily-funded propaganda generalizations ubiquitously and unceasingly deployed for the sole purpose of training the public to be a PC-whipped hoard of controllable drones ("PC" standing for political correctness).

Gender ideologues do not, obviously, want to hear one single peep about the reality of widespread violence by women against women – committed with guns, knives, ice picks, meat cleavers, axes, hatchets, razor blades, hammers, poison and acid – which goes on, except when the ideologues can "excusify" it away by reclassifying those violent acts under some other label pulled out from the vaunted Class-Race-Gender model. Such female-on-female crimes can be handily repackaged as "violence resulting from economic/class disadvantage" – classic bait and switch. Obfuscation is central to the CRG regime's war-craft.

You don't hear about violence by women against women from malicious monologist Eve Ensler.. For such gender maniacs as Ensler women and girls harmed by women are the victims that can Go To Hell. The pain of these girls and women is embarrassing and their wounds and their deaths must be hushed up, for the sake of a "higher cause": that of collectivist feminist power. – "Utopia or bust!"

To the typical dumbed-down indoctrinee the publication of such information on violence by women as is featured on UHoM will elicit merely the primitive, banal, mindless response of: "He hates women!"

So crippled is the rattled mind of the politically correct indoctrinee.

►Christinne was right, but without knowing why

We assent that 18th century Luisa De Jesus, as Christinne has so accurately pointed out really "was just a child/baby killer." But that is just my point. Like so many other women and men any decent person ought to avoid, Luisa the baby farmer was a self-centered, conscienceless, dissimulating, calculating, perverse and violent criminal. The fact that she committed her crimes in a fashion more typical of her sex – in accordance with the facts of her sex-specific hormonal make-up, her sex-specific brain chemistry, her sex-specific physical characteristics, her sex-differentiated perceived aptitude to be an appropriate nurturer of infants – does not mean that mean she should be looked at, for the most part, any differently than any male sociopath who goes about his murderous business in his more characteristically male, rather than female, malicious manner.

Yes, this particular female criminal was just a criminal – and the distribution of the sex of her victims ought to be seen as secondary to the viciousness, the inhumanity, the ruthlessness, the coldness, the shamelessness, of her sociopathic mentality. For us, the un-indoctrinated, to twist our minds into trying to look at every murderer as some sort of "gender warrior" would be perverse – indeed, it would be insane. Yet this is just what we are admonished to do by the ideologues who steer the public discourse.

Luisa De Jesus was, according to the record, scant as it is, a standard sociopath – and the other details, such as race, class and sex (her so-called "gender") are a secondary matter. The particulars of her victims' class, race and sex cannot change the fact that she was cold-blooded in her homicidal predilection.

For my part, I shall keep on putting the spotlight on those overlooked sociopathic members of the non-existent "non-violent gender," whether they be perpetrators of instrumental violence or of indirect violence (as is the particular wont of professors, political opportunists and ideologues who gleefully infect the world with their fallacious and harmful "theories"), or proxy violence, the manipulating of some chivalrous male to do all the heavy lifting.

It turns out for me, just as for Christinne, that Luisa De Jesus really "was just a child/baby killer" first and foremost; her sex and the sex of her victims really is not the issue. The bottom line is that a sociopath is a sociopath, regardless of genitalia or sex-specific particulars.

So I say, thank you, Christinne, for reminding me to explain why exposing female violence against victims of either sex is central to countering the mental disease of misandry.

Countering the propaganda, the fake statistics, the distorted and inaccurate generalizations, the carefully constructed false historical narratives of the social constructionists, the oftentimes simple and blunt protocols of politically correct censorship, is, it turns out, smack-a-dab central to the project of dismantling misandry. And it is not just the "G" of Class-Race-Gender ideology with its dialectical materialist, social constructionist "long march through the institutions" strategem that we must contend with. CRG is, more importantly, a dumbing-down tactic thattrains its indoctrinees to replaces critical thinking with lock-step operative conditioning responses. This causes the "re-education" victim to fail to see reality in all its complexity, supplanting perception and understanding with trained responses. The indoctrinee is trained to be emotionally dependent on peer acceptance. Class-Race-Gender drones require their every moment to make them feel "comfortable," – or else they become disoriented and "offended."

►►►

Luisa De Jesus "was just a child/baby killer" indeed; and so were – and will be – a great many other women. Public obliviousness to the large presence and the characteristics of such feminine sociopaths (despite the occasional and isolated media circus case such as Caylee Anthony and Jodi Arias) – an obliviousness deliberately cultivated by professional ideologues – has everything to do with misandry.

The Goal Post Episode 04 – It’s Happening! Circumcision Trends on Twitter

A Voice For Men Videos · 26 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Do women need men need women?

B.R. Merrick · 27 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
Thy head, thy sovereign; one that cares for thee,
And for thy maintenance commits his body
To painful labour both by sea and land,
To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,
Whilst thou liest warm at home, secure and safe;
And craves no other tribute at thy hands
But love, fair looks and true obedience;
Too little payment for so great a debt.

– Katharina, the shrew from The Taming of same.

Hey, I didn't say it; she did. Well, okay. She's fictional. Actually, Shakespeare said it. Alright, well, he didn't "say" it; he wrote it. And no, I don't believe that women should be subservient to men, although I hereby give license to all my earthly enemies to try and make it look like I do.

A modern woman may read the above lines, see the words "thy lord… thy keeper,/Thy head, thy sovereign" without being able to see further, and consequently join the feminist cry of "Patriarchy!" However, it should be clear to the intelligent reader (whose sex shall remain anonymous) that the main portion of the above quote, indeed, of the entire monologue, deals with making the simple mental effort – one that appears to be beyond the scope of a great many modern women – to remember what men actually do when they're not harassing, raping, or otherwise lording over their women.

I believe that one of the major contributing factors in modern-day social ills has to do with subdividing the community, something which I hope to delve into in later articles. Subdivision against one's will, as in sending boys and girls to a school where they don't want to be, sending Dad and Mom on long commutes miles away from the house, and continuing this process ad infinitum across the human community, means ultimately that we will all be certain to know each other a great deal less. The one we're most surely to know the least is the taller, heavier, hairier, bass-resonant creature, trained in keeping his emotions to himself and communicating only when necessary. Suddenly, everything he does, all that "painful labour," becomes ephemeral and unimportant, since it happens far away from the senses and thought processes of the beneficiaries.

This is, I believe, at least part of what led to a silly poll I saw at the gym on one of those women's shows. I don't know if it was "The View" or one of the others. (To me, they're all "The View.") Based on the poll I saw, I can tell you that "the view" is looking bleaker, if not stupider. The poll simply stated: "Do women need men?" 40% responded "Yes," and a full 60% responded "No."

It's become so routine for me to hear cultural misandry and feminist-infused cultural doctrine that I was prepared to wave this off like so many shit-obsessed flies. Then something amazing happened on one of the other TV screens. The poll, it seems, was displayed on "The View" at the same time that an all-news station was reporting more than 100 earthquakes throughout Southern California the previous day. No major, stop-the-presses quakes. Apparently, these sorts of small quakes are quite normal in that part of the world, but so many in a 24-hour period was considered newsworthy. The televised report went on to mention that a great many water and gas lines were ruptured during the quake. That's where the idiotic 60% need to be directed, I thought. Do women need men? Well, ladies, you do if you want your Southern Californian water and gas turned back on. Would you like to know why?

Because you never, ever, ever see women fixing the water and gas lines. When you do, it's an anomaly. Anyone who dares shout "Patriarchy!" at this should be aware that Betty Friedan wasn't looking out her suburban living room window pining to dig in the dirt with the construction boys. As far as water and gas lines are concerned, women have never had to be. All they have ever had to be, as Shakespeare pointed out centuries ago, is grateful.

60% of these "View"-watching, heavily subdivided layabouts have forgotten how to express any gratitude at all, apparently. That "60%" was displayed on a pixilated television screen that was conceived and designed by many men, from older television screens that were conceived and designed by men now deceased. The characters 6, 0, and % were chosen out of innumerable visual aids available on modern computers, all of which were conceived and designed by men. The raw materials requisite to make every single machine that displayed that "60%"; the rockets that propel the satellites into space; the satellite dishes; the cables that connect those dishes to those televisions; the electrical power to make the machines work; the cameras that recorded that women's program; the lights that lit the set; the set; everything, everything, everything the women – enjoying the program from home or starring in it – participate in and gab about incessantly has something to do with some man somewhere first figuring it out, then standing "To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,/Whilst thou liest warm at home, secure and safe"; yet that is as nothing to millions of unthinking participants.

A stupid, thoughtless, pointless poll like that can be easily displayed on one television screen while a report on an accompanying screen merely implies the fact – the undeniable fact – that it's going to be "blue collar" boys out in the California heat making certain that water and gas are restored to the creatures who don't need them. The men, I meant; not the water and gas. Hell, we need water and gas.

Much of my problem with the poll actually lies with using the word "need." As I have pointed out elsewhere, all needs are based on desires. Therefore, whenever we use the word "need" we should make every effort to remember that somewhere, however loosely connected, we are implying some sort of desire. I would like to ask the poll-takers what the lack of desire is behind that lack of "need."

Regardless, I would have to agree with the 60% and say, "No," women don't need men. But my interpretation of the question is undoubtedly too broad for the poll-takers, and too literal. You see, it all depends on what you want. What do women typically want from men? Let's list the personal wants first:

Sex
Procreation
Companionship
Physical protection
Financial resources
Wisdom
Division of labor
Stability

If you've got yourself a man, new or used model, then you undoubtedly have some combination of the above. Subtract physical protection and financial resources, and the man will most likely have some combination of the remainder in his association with you. Well done, if that's what you want, or if you want anything at all.

But there's a community outside your front door. Your sense of it, due to its subdivided nature, may be muted, but it's there, whether you want (need?) to think about it or not. Do you want (need?) to be able to walk out your front door not only feeling safe and secure, but also feeling engaged in your community to some extent? Then let's expand the list further:

Physical protection within and without the community
Division of labor at the macro level
Paved, relatively flat surfaces for travel
Electrical power

Shelter
Consumer goods
Communication capability
Transportation vehicles
Regular food supply
Access to and ability with various natural resources for furtherance of the above

If you've got yourself a herd of males, then you most definitely have some greater combination of the above than you apparently ever even bother to think about. If, of course, that's what you wanted, way back when you said you didn't need men.

Unless you're a hermit. Are you a hermit? Then for all of the above in both lists, the answer is "No." You, as a hermit, don't need a man to _____. Enjoy your newfound freedom as a hermit (or is it "hermitess"?). In fact, here's a list of things you'll "need" in your life without men. For all those who would accuse me of misogyny, I hope that my affirmations below of women's magnificent abilities will dispel those arguments:

- Women know how to make fire.
- Women know how to hunt.
- Women know how to fish.
- Women know how to skin dead animals.
- Women know how to make tools from rocks.
- Women know metallurgy.
- Women know carpentry.
- Women know how to pour concrete.
- Women know how to read.
- Women with natural leadership ability can help coordinate the other hermitesses to get all of the above done.
- If any individual woman does not know how to do one or more of the above, she can quickly learn, because she has a human brain.

If, ladies, that is how you wish to live, without men as any sort of necessity, then go to it. I myself have never hunted, am quickly bored with fishing, and skinning anything is beyond my ability to stomach. Furthermore, if I can't light it with a match or a lighter, then that fire is going to remain unlit. Therefore, beyond my feeble abilities at a handful of the above, I am also quite lazy. I see that list and can think of not one single thing I want to do very much, and certainly not on a daily, do-or-die basis. I'm pretty sure that most female readers feel the same, unless there's an avid hunter or fisher among them.

We could call up the hunter, e-mail the fisher, find a carpentress, get a book on pouring concrete, and start making lists, ladies. We could do it. But think about it: How many of you really, really want to? Furthermore, hunters and fishers eventually like to go back to the hunting cabin to turn on the electric light and play cards. It is in that precise moment that a little gratitude ought to be in order, or you can forget about cabins, electric lights, and printed playing cards.

Because, you see, this far after Betty Friedan's righteous anger and the Second Wave, women aren't flocking to the occupations required for the backbone of civilization to remain aligned and sturdy. Men fill these occupations, and only in part because it's expected. I seriously doubt that many construction workers would really want to leave that work behind to crochet or knit. Construction work is not pleasant work, but there is the camaraderie, the paycheck, the chance to be outside on a nice day (or a horrible one), the opportunity to build and maintain muscle, the methodical and pleasing effect it can have on the thought process, etc. You also get to build something, which is cool.

This many decades after “NOW! My Body, My Choice! Take Back the Night! Slut Walk!” and the like, if a group of women actually built something straight from the raw materials all the way to the gables on the roof without a single man’s assistance, two things would happen: 1) We’d fail to acknowledge that what they accomplished was due not only to moxie, but to the information provided by men who had previously accomplished something similar; and 2) We’d have to have a big, big celebration that everyone who’s anyone would have to find out about and participate in; and which would eventually become a national holiday and a staple of Women’s Herstory Month. Otherwise, “Patriarchy!”

If civilization is what you want, then men are what you need. Nature is fun until you have to rely on nature for survival. If you do not wish to do that, and you’re the sort of woman who wants a high-powered job to feel fulfilled as a woman or a human being or whatever, all you will ever do is that which so much of the rest of humanity, including me, does: You will climb a set of stairs built on the backs of men. The only difference is that it is you, not I, who claims not to need them.

It is unconscionable for a woman to stand and proclaim “The End of Men” in a studio built by men, with cameras invented, maintained, and improved upon by men, connected to power sources that are kept running by men, all the while using a language hammered out and spun to dizzying heights by the thoughtful processes of countless male writers. It is equally dumb to flash a silly poll denigrating everything that makes knowledge of the poll results possible to millions, and expect us all to laugh heartily along.

Think about it: A worker for “The View” picks up a headset designed by a man, connected to a computer fixed by the IT guy, and sends a ring signal out of the building built by “blue collar” butt cracks, into the home or the very pocket of the poll voter. Throughout this process, one sex has most definitely been required to be not only present, but physically and mentally active to a high degree, in order for 60% to completely ignore that same sex, and we’re not talking about ignoring women.

Now for the bit that ought to sober any female reader. Let’s look at what men typically want (need?) from women on a personal basis:

Sex
Procreation
Companionship
Wisdom
Division of labor
Stability

Not too much different from what women usually want from men. But what will men require of women if they want community, or civilization itself? It’s an exhaustive list, but here we go:

Thank God you're still wanted, ladies.

In spite of the fact that she's female, it seems that every gay man alive wants Judy Garland. She belted out a torch song in "A Star is Born," a song that, in my opinion, simply torches all other torch songs. Her soon-to-be mentor and suitor, Norman Maine, played by James Mason, walks into a dimly lit, low-ceilinged nightclub, where he watches Esther Blodgett (Garland), surrounded by male musicians moving rather seductively to the rhythm, in a highly sexually charged scene, singing a song about "The Man That Got Away." It's a fantastic film and an electric song. It was probably composed with Garland in mind. (Boy oh boy, is that how she sings it!) The movie mainly concerns the rise to stardom of Blodgett (who is turned into Vicki Lester by her brilliant husband), due only in part to her extraordinary talent as an entertainer. Mostly, it was due to Maine's tireless efforts, in spite of his faded career, depression and alcoholism. The movie ends tragically, but there, to an expectant crowd of admirers in a theater, Vicki meekly steps up to the mike to tell it like it is:

"Hello, everybody. This is Mrs. Norman Maine."

With a single song and a single line, Judy says it all.

The Rise Of Transwomen — Process Philosophy in Action

Peter Wright · 28 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Process philosophy assumes that the universe and human systems are 'continually becoming.' It emphasizes the elements of change and novelty as contrasted with a belief in permanence of forms, and uniformity. In the Greek tradition Heraclitus said that no person ever steps into the same river twice, because on the second attempt it is not the same river and he is not the same man.

Vaginoplasty, womb transplants, hormone blockers, hormone injections. These things represent the crowning achievement of cultural feminism, creating a kind of unforeseen gyno-dystopia resulting from the elevation of all things female. That same feminism exerts a gravitational pull that tends to filter all human events through its interpretive lens. Many women show their participation in the feminist worldview via postures of gendered narcissism, while men might show their participation in it by acts of chivalry or, more recently, by initiating changes to their sexual and gender orientation (MtF) in order to become more like women.

Gynocentric feminism is the soil from which the transgender revolution has sprouted – a revolution that represents nothing less than a dissolution of centuries of accumulated gender customs. As Simone de Beauvoir (1949) famously stated of the feminist position, "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman. No biological, psychological, or economic fate determines the figure that the human female presents in society; it is civilization as a whole that produces this creature."

The feminist perspective paved the way for gender to be delinked from sex, which appears to have opened the floodgates for men to adopt the celebrated gender identity of woman. Before we draw some ultimate conclusions about this development, lets first look at how female gender identity came to be celebrated.

The historical rise of gynocentrism

Putting the teenage trend of FtM transitioning to one side, we can conclude that mature age MtF transitions in the European and Anglosphere contents predominate, especially in the USA which has for centuries been a champion of more extreme forms of gynocentrism, as demonstrated by the following prima facie observations:

In 1846 a London Sun article describes American culture as an epicenter of exaggerated gynocentrism & chivalry:

> I am convinced that a lady, no matter what her age and attractions might be, could journey through the whole extent of the union, not only without experiencing a single annoyance, but aided in every possible way with unobtrusive civility. Indeed a great number of Saphonisbas and Almiras do travel about, protected only by the chivalry of their countrymen and their own undoubted propriety.
>
> To them the best seats, the best of everything, are always allotted. A friend of mine told me of a little affair at New York Theatre, the other night, illustrative of my assertion. A stiff-necked Englishman had engaged a front place, and of course the best corner: when the curtain rose, he was duly seated, opera-glass in hand, to enjoy the performance. A lady and a gentleman came into the box shortly afterwards; the cavalier in escort, seeing that the place where our friend sat was the best, calling his attention, saying "The lady, sir," and motioned that the corner should be vacated. The possessor, partly because he disliked the imperative mood, and partly because it bored him to be disturbed, refused. Some words ensued, which attracted the attention of the sovereign people in the pit, who magisterially enquired what was the matter?
>
> The American came to the front of the box and said, "There is an Englishman here who will not give up his place to a lady." Immediately their majesties swarmed up by dozens over the barriers, seized the offender, very gently though, and carried him to the entrance; he kicked, cursed, and fought all in vain: he excited neither the pity nor the anger of his stern executioners; they placed him carefully on his feet again at the steps, one man > handing him his hat, another his opera glass, and a third the price he had paid for his ticket of admission, then quickly shut the door upon him, and returned to their places. The shade of the departed Judge Lynch must have rejoiced at such an angelic administration of his law! – England in the New World.

In 1856, author of Putnam's Monthly Magazine published the following summary of the relations between men and women in America:

> "Long before the cry of woman's rights was openly raised, the powers and prerogatives of the American husband had been gradually undermined. Usage superseded law, and trampled it under foot. Sentiment put logical consistency at defiance, and the American husband has thus become a legal monster, a logical impossibility, required to fly without wings, and to run without feet.
>
> "While the wife is thus rendered to a great extent independent of her husband, he, by a strange inconsistency is still held, both by law and public opinion, just as responsible for her as before. The old and reasonable maxim that 'he who dances must pay the piper,' does not apply to wives—they dance, and the husband pays. To such an extent is this carried, that if the wife beats her husband, and he, having no authority to punish her in kind, applies to the criminal courts for redress, she will be fined for assault and battery, which fine he must pay, even thought she has plenty of money of her own. or, in default of paying, go to jail! Such cases are by no means of unprecedented occurrence in our criminal courts.

In 1903 culture critic Max O'Rell observed the following about gynocentrism in the USA:

> "The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country."

Price Collier observed in 1909:

> In England the establishment is, as a rule, at any rate from a man's point of view, more comfortable than the American home. Americans staying any time in England, whether men or women, are impressed by the fact that it is the country of men. Likewise the English, both men and women, who visit America are impressed by the fact that America is the country of women.

The Independent reported the following in 1909:

> "In Europe the aristocracy is largely relieved from drudgery in order that they may cultivate the graces of life. In America the attempt is being made to relieve the women of all classes from drudgery, and we are glad to see that some of them at least are making good use of the leisure thus afforded them. It is a project involving unprecedented daring and self-sacrifice on the part of American men, this making an aristocracy of half the race. That it is possible yet remains to be proved. Whether it is desirable depends upon whether this new feminine aristocracy avoids the faults of the aristocracy of the Old World, such as frivolousness and snobbishness."

Irishman George A. Birmingham wrote in 1914:

> "There are people in the world who believe that we are born again and again, rising or sinking in the scale of living things at each successive incarnation according as we behave ourselves well or badly in our present state. If this creed were true, I should try very hard to be good, because I should want, next time I am born, to be an American woman. She seems to me to have a better kind of life than the women of any other nation, or, indeed, than anybody else, man or woman… American social life seems to me — the word is one to apologize for — gynocentric. It is arranged with a view to the convenience and delight of women. Men > come in where and how they can…. The American woman is certainly more her own mistress than the Englishwoman, just because America does its best for women and only its second-best for men. The tendency among American humourists is to dwell a little on the greed of the Englishman, who is represented as incapable of earning money for himself. The English jester lays more stress on the American woman's desire to be called "my lady," and pokes sly fun at the true Democrat's fondness for titles. The American man is reverent toward women. It is not the homage of the strong toward the weak, but the obeisance of the inferior in the presence of a superior. This difference of spirit underlies the whole relationship of men to women in England and America. The English feminist is up against chivalry and wants equality. The American woman, though she may claim rights, has no inducement to destroy reverence.

Albert Einstein observed in 1921:

> Above all things are the women who as a literal fact, dominate the entire life in America. The men take an interest in absolutely nothing at all. They work and work, the like of which I have never seen anywhere yet. For the rest they are the toy dogs of the women, who spend the money in the most unmeasurable, illimitable way and wrap themselves in a fog of extravagance. They do everything which is in the vogue, and now quite by chance they have thrown themselves on the Einstein fashion.

Summary and conclusion

Based on the above collection of artifacts, we can begin to wrap these details into a coherent conclusion, and for this we'll turn to Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831) for a template.

Hegel naturally didn't write about vaginoplasties or the transgender movement, but he did write about process philosophy and the proposition that social processes are an ever-recurring cycle which he characterized by three phases (1) an initial set of cultural beliefs called a thesis, (2) next arises dissatisfaction and a negation of that thesis called the antithesis, and lastly (3) there occurs a synthesis of culture beliefs whereby the two conflicting ideas are reconciled to form a new proposition.

Thesis – Antithesis – Synthesis.

This provides a suitable template for organizing the peculiar shifts in gender ideology we've been witnessing over recent centuries which, following Hegel, we can now organize as follows:

1. Thesis: Centuries of gynocentrism
2. Antithesis: Men's rights backlash
3. Synthesis: Discovery of malleability of the sexual body (hormones/surgery), accompanied by belief in gender fluidity, resulting in a dissolution of clear sexual and gender boundaries, along with all traditional culture privileges that have accumulated around biological sex. [This completes the synthesis of the two conflicting ideas]

As mentioned elsewhere, the transgender movement is not a cause célèbre driven by men's rights advocates, as is sometimes claimed. Rather, the current support for transgender rights is derived from the power of government administrations and global regimes playing "freedom one-upmanship" – ie., the feigning of moral purity to position themselves at top of the global hierarchy.

The elites however are not the ones ultimately driving this process forward, even if they are doing the job of hastening, supporting and exploiting it. Instead, it appears to be Hegel's mysterious process philosophy that is driving the changes, and the elites and sundry grifters are riding this gender-bender horse in a rodeo of competing cultural powers.

Where does all this leave us?

We can draw the conclusion that over the last century our framing of gendered customs has become increasingly captured by a gynocentric turf war between traditional women, and progressive feminist forces, with trans activism being an emerging force that is actively working to disrupt it. Time will tell if the transgender movement continues its disintegrative influence over traditional sex roles, however the surgical and chemical technology that has allowed this to flourish does not look like disappearing anytime soon – in fact researchers are just getting started.

The chemical invention of the birth control pill for women, introduced in the 1950s, served to crown the gynocentric culture project and to cement the dominance of its centuries-long evolution. The chemical and surgical "support" for trans-people holds equally gargantuan potential; which includes the tangential possibility of leading us past the polarizing gynocentric setup of recent centuries and back to a saner place – post trans hysteria – where everyday men and women can be themselves without coercion and judgement… notably minus those inflated gender privileges and ideologies that have driven us into this absurd position to begin with.

See also:

- Transphobia vs. Manphobia
- Unintended Consequences of Transgender Activism on Men's Issues

•

Image by Freepik

Where have all the men gone?

keyster · 29 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It's a question posed today by both social conservatives and liberals alike. And yet all the "great minds" of academia and political punditry combined, heard spewing forth from their ivory Towers of Babel, seem to be utterly vexed by the answer. From William Bennett, George Will and Kathleen Parker, to Michael Kimmel, Kay Hymowitz and Hannah Rosin they all agree the modern male is broken and somehow needs to be fixed, but how exactly they can't say.

In her natural biological state an adolescent girl is given a rite of passage into womanhood, signaling she's now an adult woman, whether she wants to be one right away or not. If she later becomes pregnant and gives birth she becomes a mother. For the male of the species the transition to adulthood is not so readily apparent.

He can join the military and transition to a sort of manhood, which also offers the distinct possibility of transitioning him to a flag draped coffin or a cripple for life, thus making the rather expedient transition from "man" to "hero". Or he can begin to work, find himself a willing and fertile female to pair bond with and begin the creation of a good old fashion nuclear family, only to have her go all "Eat, Pray, Love" on his sorry ass 5 years later, (because she's bored) finding himself indentured to the local family court system for 10 years hence, and the part-time joy of part-time involvement with his kids lives. Who said men don't have choices?!

A Tale of Two Worlds

In speaking with my brother the other day at our annual catch-up phone call I asked him how his daughter was fairing out in the big cruel world. (I refer to her as "his daughter" and not "my niece" because despite my efforts to reach out to her, she can't be bothered to reciprocate.)

"Oh she's doing great!", he says. She just finished her master's degree in something called "Enviro-catastrophe Studies" and got a cushy little government job with a state agency."

"What about your chance of being a grandfather anytime soon?" I ask.

"Well she likes guys and she's had a few boyfriends, but she makes her position on anything long term very clear, she will NOT be controlled by a man."

"You mean like her mother, your ex-wife, claimed you used to do?"

Now you know why we only talk annually.

A couple of years ago I was asked to help a young man of about 24 years of age out with some "failure to launch" issues. He was just getting off probation for dealing weed, as a little side business to supplement his career in pizza delivery. (At least he understood the dynamics of synergistic market demand) He was the quintessential "lost man in the promised land," sleeping late, getting high and playing Xbox. Eventually our relationship came down to an ultimatum, "Either get a job by the end of the month or live in your car." The very last day of the month he got a job as a dishwasher paying $10 an hour. He was ecstatic that he somehow passed the drug test and background check.

Along our path of living together in my humble little dojo, I asked him one day what he thought about women, having a girlfriend, getting married and having children…and he says to me in a way only the modern high school graduate might, "No way, women are bitches man! I mean some of them are OK but most of them really suck! I'm never gonna get married!"

And here my dear reader in lies the essence of the problem, albeit in anecdotal form; the modern sassy girl on the go; little Ms. Independent, "refuses to be controlled by a man," (although he BETTER allow himself to be controlled by her) and the "lowly slacker" is left with little inspiration to make himself part of such an arrangement, other than perhaps the hope it would somehow work out better for him than every other adult male he's ever known, including his own father. What's the point of all this ambition nonsense when he has nothing to prove to anyone but himself?

To Answer the Question

Wouldn't it be grand if young men, shamed into compliance, would spontaneously "man-up" and start families with young women? "Finally they took heed of all our combined scolding!" – the elites would exclaim. If only men would dump their video games and weed, GROW UP and start marrying young women all would be groovy again. Men are the problem that needs to be fixed; women are simply marvelous examples of human existence, as always. Everyone knows this. It's on TV.

But who exactly does he marry if all these fantastic women are busy being men; toiling in the hard scrabble world of cubicles, meetings and text messaging? They might "settle down" in their mid-thirties and pop out a designer baby conceived from sperm purchased at the "genius bank", or they might not. She has choices. She'd prefer a man, but as Maureen Dowd quipped in her condescending pop art lit tone of commentary, "Are men really necessary"?

"For whatever reason, adolescence seems to be the young man's default state.", concluded Kay Hymowitz. "For whatever reason…," In other words what she means to say is that if a man consciously decides to not marry and have children, (ostensibly his "duty" as a "man" to society and to women) he's chosen a state of perpetual adolescence. "Shame on you guys!" But did it ever occur to the highbrow illuminati that perhaps he doesn't have a choice, that there simply aren't any viable FEMALE candidates for marriage; at least ones that don't defiantly declare they "won't be controlled by a man". Can you imagine a single young man claiming he refuses to marry because he "won't be controlled by a woman"? Cue the accusations of sexism from the sexist police!

So by today's standards, if "manning up" means committing to a lovely young wife who gladly presupposes motherhood and commitment to said young husband and father of their children, then "woman-ing-up" is defined as getting a degree, dedicating her efforts to her career and delaying child birth until she finally quits hitting the snooze button on her biological clock; and that's if she has children at all. In other words, women have made the transition to manhood rather nicely, while men are transitioning to womanhood while kicking and screaming (with a bunch of "whining" as they say). Women want to be like men, but men don't want to be like women. Womanhood has never been so unpopular. Imagine that!

If the combined Ivy League sheepskin of social scientists and cultural prognosticators have to have someone who barely graduated from high school, (yours truly), answer the simple question, "Where have all the men gone?" one must wonder about either the usefulness of a degree or the blind devotion to either chivalry or the power of feminist orthodoxy within the collective conscious of our "best intellectuals thinkers." They stink, therefore they're feminists.

"Where are they?" you ask. They've disengaged and disconnected faster than you can say "herbivore" because after all the ridicule, shaming, condemnation, discrimination and legal abuse society has inflicted on them as a group. They've simply decided to retreat and stop contributing. Call that "adolescent" if you'd like, (they really don't care anymore, as they've been called worse). I call it a very natural reaction that's long overdue. Because if the threat of "control" is the problem, he'll gladly let go of the reigns and the horse that came with them without a shamed or regretful bone in his body.

When I was in 8th grade there was a tough girl that hung out with the tough guys who had it out for me. She would provoke me with insults, kicking and one time a hard whack across my face. She wanted to fight me, "call me out." Had I agreed I would have been ridiculed for beating up a girl, (and beaten up by her enforcement crew as well). Had I said "no" I would have been ridiculed for being a coward (or ironically a "pussy") to not agree to fight a girl.

Eventually I had to "man-up" and make a decision one way or the other or the taunting would continue, so I decided NOT agreeing to fight was the best choice of two evils. I disengaged from the proposed battle because either way I was gonna lose; it was just a matter of deciding by how much. By that time I was numb to the pain shaming brings with it anyway, the emotional nerve endings scarred over as it were, so I didn't care what they had to say, I just ignored them and eventually they began to ignore me. I declared the game over and conceded, much to their disappointment.

Such is the plight of the modern young man. If he fights/competes against woman (and her enforcers) he loses and if he turns his back to her (and her enforcers) he loses. The difference now is that he's shamed and ridiculed to the point of being impervious to it. He's declared the game over (Hannah Rosin would agree), and he's conceded because while he might meet the definition of being a "man," HE knows WHO he is, and that's someone who won't be taken for a TOOL…

…much to their disappointment.

MGTOW and female disapproval

Anja Eriud · 30 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Yes I know: what would I, a female, know about the myriad factors that go into a male decision to Go His Own Way, or a male orientating his life to minimise or lessen, if not outright avoid, any engagement with women? It's a fair point and the answer is: I don't know. I can respect that decision and acknowledge that this man has the right to live his life anyway he chooses, but I really cannot get inside his head and feel what he feels or has felt.

Okay, having said that, this is not what this is about, this is about shining a bit of a spotlight on why some women, sometimes feminists, sometimes not, seem to have this visceral negative reaction to MGTOW, why some females take it upon themselves to pour scorn and vitriol on the heads of these men.

Actually the clue is in the acronym – Men Going Their Own Way. Now whether or not women will admit it, the fact is for a lot of women there is no male "way" because men only live by the grace and favour of women. Without that grace and favour men will be made feel the full force of female disapproval, which manifests itself in many ways, from the violent to the relatively benign – ever seen a women convey her disapproval of a male action by a slight pursing of her lips, a slight stiffening of her body? I am betting we have all seen this happen to a man or boy, and have noticed an immediate change in the behaviour of that man or boy.

Of course female disapproval can and does manifest itself in much more direct, abusive and violent ways, but the point is that women feel they reserve the right to arbitrate and exercise approval of male actions, male behaviour, and in fact male autonomy.

Our modern society is now exclusively orientated towards achieving, obtaining and accommodating this female approval. MGTOW comprehensively rejects and delegitimizes any necessity for female approval or sanction. MGTOW is men thumbing their noses, giving the finger to the notion that men live by the grace and favour of women. It literally pulls the rug out from under the feet of women who, whether consciously or not, have internalised the idea that men are a resource for women, that men live and die to serve women's needs, wants and whims, that men have no other function but to be at the beck and call of women, but only if and when a woman decides she had some need that a man is obliged to answer and/or fill.

MGTOW quite clearly asserts that there is a male "way" and that the default female "My way or the highway" cultural norm is now being rejected, dismissed as basically a mirage, an illusion.

The universal pedestal that the vast majority of women believe they stand upon is crumbling beneath their feet, the illusion that they occupy some rarefied higher plane of existence in relation to men is shattered, and the self absorbed and egotistical belief that men live for and in service to women is… a joke.

MGTOW is literally a slap in the face for women. It is saying to women in clear unequivocal terms – "you are not really all that!"

Of course there is another deeper and more subtle message that MGTOW conveys that is precipitating the current spewings from female voices, feminist or otherwise: MGTOW is a manifestation of male disapproval of female behaviour, actions, etc. It is saying, "we've seen what you have to offer, we've watched the way you present your 'goods' and… nope, not buying!"

Oh dear Lord, men rejecting females, men giving women the once-over and not snapping up one of these delightful creatures! Heaven forfend! All this female spluttering in rage, hurling of epitaphs, heaping of scorn, is the female equivalent of a spoilt obnoxious brat throwing the mother of all tantrums at not being picked to play the princess in the school play, because… well because I am a princess!

The notion that men choose to reject women – it is simply not to be borne!

There is yet another underlying subtle message that women who have an issue with the whole MGTOW phenomenon tend to raise – men left to their own devices will turn into, if they haven't already, uncouth violent barbarians without the "civilising" influence and monitoring of women. Wonder how that stacks up in the face of numerous YouTube videos of females (usually drunk) causing mayhem in city centres on weekends. Here in Ireland, in Dublin, we get a lot of "hen parties" around the Temple Bar area, and the behaviour of these females is jaw-droppingly loud, violent, abusive and not to put too fine a point on it, disgusting – urinating and vomiting in the street being a big problem. Hmmm, I simply cannot fathom why men would be "turned off" by that!

Really! Boys, lads – what ails ye at all? Don't ye know that there are wimmin out there ready and willing to rip your heart out, itching to use, abuse and reject you? Literally foaming at the mouth to squeeze every last penny out of you, give birth to your children then taunt you for 18 years by holding those children hostage, to ransom?

Lads, MGTOW is just mean, it's not playing the game – sorry – what did you say? The game is rigged? Nooooooooooooo! Really? Ah, well then, off ya go, have fun, and for goodness sakes lads – mind yerselves – them wimmin are very very sneaky.

Violet Paget on the “grotesque” worship of women (1895)

Peter Wright · 31 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts on the subject of mediaeval love are from author Violet Paget’s landmark work Euphorion – Vol. II, 1895. Perhaps an early example of the fabled HoneyBadger, she concludes that chivalric love was a “grotesque” worship of women, a practice that has been bequeathed to the modern world. – PW

In what we call the Middle Ages there was invented, by the stress of circumstances, elaborated by half-conscious effort and bequeathed as an unalienable habit, a new manner of loving.

To describe mediaeval love is a difficult matter, and to describe it except in negations is next to impossibility. I conceive it to consist in a certain sentimental, romantic, idealistic attitude towards women, not by any means incompatible however with the grossest animalism; an attitude presupposing a complete moral, aesthetical, and social superiority on the part of the whole female sex, inspiring the very highest respect and admiration independently of the individual’s qualities; and reaching the point of actual worship, varying from the adoration of a queen by a courtier to the adoration of a shrine by a pilgrim, in the case of the one particular lady who happens to be the beloved; an attitude in the relations of the sexes which results in love becoming an indispensable part of a noble life, and the devoted attachment to one individual woman, a necessary requisite of a gentlemanly training.

Mediaeval love is not merely a passion, a desire, an affection, a habit; it is a perfect occupation. It absorbs, or is supposed to absorb, the Individual; it permeates his life like a religion. It is not one of the interests of life, or, rather, one of life’s phases; it is the whole of life, all other interests and actions either sinking into an unsingable region below it, or merely embroidering a variegated pattern upon its golden background.

Mediaeval love, therefore, never obtains its object, however much it may obtain the woman; for the object of mediaeval love, as of mediaeval religious mysticism, is not one particular act or series of acts, but is its own exercise, of which the various incidents of the drama between man and woman are merely so many results. It has not its definite stages, like the love of the men of classical Antiquity or the heroic time of the North: its stages of seeking, obtaining, cherishing, guarding; it is always at the same point, always in the same condition of half-religious, half-courtier-like adoration, whether it be triumphantly successful or sighingly despairing.

The man and the woman or rather, I should say, the knight and the lady, for mediaeval love is an aristocratic privilege, and the love of lower folk is not a theme for song the knight and the lady, therefore, seem always, however knit together by habit, nay, by inextricable meshes of guilt, somehow at the same distance from one another. Once they have seen and loved each other, their passion burns on always evenly, burns on (at least theoretically) to all eternity.

It seems almost as if the woman were a mere shrine, a mysterious receptacle of the ineffable, a grail cup, a consecrated wafer, but not the ineffable itself. For there is always in mediaeval love, however fleshly the incidents which it produces, a certain Platonic element; that is to say, a craving for, a pursuit of, something which is an abstraction; an abstraction impossible to define in its constant shifting and shimmering, and which seems at one moment a social standard, a religious ideal, or both, and which merges for ever in the dazzling, vague sheen of the Eternal Feminine.

Hence, one of the most distinctive features of mediaeval love, an extraordinary sameness of intonation, making it difficult to distinguish between the bona fide passion for which a man risks life and honour, and the mere conventional gallantry of the knight who sticks a lady’s glove on his helmet as a compliment to her rank; nay, between the impure adoration of an adulterous lamia like Yseult, and the mystical adoration of a glorified Mother of God; for both are women, both are ladies, and therefore the greatest poet of the early Middle Ages, Gottfried von Strassburg, sings them both with the same religious respect, and the same hysterical rapture.

This mediaeval love is furthermore a deliberately expected, sought-for, and received necessity in a man's life; it is not an accident, much less an incidental occurrence to be lightly taken or possibly avoided: it is absolutely indispensable to man's social training, to his moral and aesthetical self-improvement; it is part and parcel of manhood and knighthood… Frowendienst, "lady's service," is the name given by Ulrich von Liechtenstein, a mediaeval Quixote, outshining by far the mad Provencals Rudel and Vidal, to the memoirs very delightfully done into modern German by Ludwig Tieck; and "lady's service" is the highest occupation of knightly leisure, the subject of the immense bulk of mediaeval poetry.

"Lady's service" in deeds of arms and song, in constant praise and defence of the beloved, in heroic enterprise and madcap mummery, in submission and terror to the wondrous creature whom the humble servant, the lover, never calls by her sacred name, speaking of her in words unknown to Antiquity, domna, dame, frowe, madonna words of which the original sense has almost been forgotten, although there cleave to them even now ideas higher than those associated with the puella of the ancients, the wib of the heroic days lady, mistress the titles of the Mother of God, who is, after all, only the mystical Soul's Paramour of the mediaeval world.

"Lady's service" the almost technical word, expressing the position, half-serf-like, half-religious, the bonds of complete humility and never-ending faithfulness, the hopes of reward, the patience under displeasure, the pride in the livery of servitude, the utter absorption of the life of one individual in the life of another; which constitute in Provence, in France, in Germany, in England, in Italy, in the fabulous kingdoms of Arthur and Charlemagne, the strange new thing which I have named Mediaeval Love.

Has such a thing really existed? Are not these mediaeval poets leagued together in a huge conspiracy to deceive us? Is it possible that strong men have wept and fainted at a mere woman's name, like the Count of Nevers in "Flamenca," or that their mind has swooned away in months of reverie like that of Parzifal in Eschenbach's poem; that worldly wise and witty men have shipped off and died on sea for love of an unseen woman like Jaufre Rudel; or dressed in wolf's hide and lurked and fled before the huntsmen-like Peire Vidal; or mangled their face and cut off their finger, and, clothing themselves in rags more frightful than Nessus' robe, mixed in the untouchable band of lepers like Ulrich von Liechtenstein? Is it possible to believe that the insane enterprises of the Amadises, Lisvarts and Felixmartes of late mediaeval romance, that the behaviour of Don Quixote in the Sierra Morena, ever had any serious models in reality?

Nay, more difficult still to believe because the whole madness of individuals is more credible than the half-madness of the whole world is it possible to believe that, as the poems of innumerable trouvères and troubadours, minnesingers and Italian poets, as the legion of mediaeval romances of the cycles of Charlemagne, Arthur, and Amadis would have it, that during so long a period of time society could have been enthralled by this hysterical, visionary, artificial, incredible religion of mediaeval love?

It is at once too grotesque and too beautiful, too high and too low, to be credible; and our first impulse, on closing the catechisms and breviaries, the legendaries and hymn-books of this strange new creed, is to protest that the love poems must be allegories, the love romances solar myths, the Courts of Love historical bungles; that all this mediaeval world of love is a figment, a misinterpretation, a falsehood.

But if we seek more than a mere casual impression; if, instead of feeling sceptical over one or two fragments of evidence, we attempt to collect the largest possible number of facts together; if we read not one mediaeval love story, but twenty not half a dozen mediaeval love poems, but several scores; if we really investigate into the origin of the apparent myth, the case speedily alters. Little by little this which had been inconceivable becomes not merely intelligible, but inevitable; the myth becomes an historical phenomenon of the most obvious and necessary sort. Mediaeval love, which had seemed to us a poetic fiction, is turned into a reality; and a reality, alas, which is prosaic. Let us look at it.

Mediaeval love is first revealed in the sudden and almost simultaneous burst of song which, like the twitter and trill so dear to trouvères, troubadours, and minnesingers, fills the woods that yesterday were silent and dead, and greeted the earliest sunshine, the earliest faint green after the long winter numbness of the dark ages, after the boisterous gales of the earliest Crusade. The French and Provencals sang first, the Germans later, the Sicilians last; but although we may say after deliberate analysis, such or such a form, or such or such a story, was known in this country before it appeared in that one, such imitation or suggestion was so rapid that with regard to the French, the Provencals, and the Germans at least, the impression is simultaneous; only the Sicilians beginning distinctly later, forerunners of the new love lyric, wholly different from that of trouvères, troubadours, and minnesingers, of the Italians of the latter thirteenth century… Such is the moment when we first hear the almost universal song of mediaeval love.

Source: Euphorion Being Studies of the Antique and the Mediaeval in the Renaissance – Vol. II

The Inner Elvis: The man in the new biopic

Andrew MacDonald · 1 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This isn't a movie review. It's my take on Elvis's man story as revealed in the new biopic which I watched this week.

Although Elvis' life played out on an epic scale, the story was quite the opposite, a difficult family entanglement that Elvis wasn't able to free himself from. It sheds light on how, beneath the glitz and glam, there's always a more personal story. We can live this story, or as I think happened for Elvis, it can live us.

Elvis was the star in the family. His father Vernon was weak and ineffectual and Mom didn't have eyes for him. She had eyes for Elvis. He was always the King. He wasn't free to be a kid protected by two adults. Rather he was conscripted as the confidante and rescuer of his mother and the rival of his father. It doesn't appear he ever outgrew that.

This isn't a story we're familiar with. So much so that most people have never heard of emotional incest, the name in the scanty literature for the situation in which a parent treats the child with the feelings and care owed a lover. Emotional incest is more associated with women, just as sexual incest is more associated with men.

In one scene in which the dynamic shows up Elvis, on the brink of mega-stardom, enters his mother's bedroom to find her crying; she's afraid of being left behind. Elvis takes her face in his hands, looks in her eyes and says she's his "bestest" and always will be. He hugs her from behind and their two faces look into the mirror together. In another scene that takes place not many years later, Mom has just died from alcohol abuse. We see Elvis is on the floor in her closet, tearfully smelling and holding on to her garments in his grief.

As we all do, Elvis first learned what love is from his parents and his case the important boundary between adult intimacy and childhood protection was breached. This transgression has serious repercussions. One may be born into it, for example when the child is used as a buffer to keep the spouse away.

Elvis was conscripted into a role as consort and couldn't get out. Much of the movie is Elvis eliciting extreme female adulation, unable to give it up even as his family and his health fall apart.

Elvis' effect on women is the key emotional – and physical – trope of the movie, and it's repeated again and again. You think he's been knocked out but, as we can see by the captivation of his audience, he triumphs again and again. The women love him and he loves them.

You can check out a video to get a taste.

.

Men respond differently. Some young musicians want to emulate him; Hank Snow is shown to be a fuddy-duddy who can't compete. His manager Colonel Parker is the perpetrator in the movie – not the family situation. His nickname is "The Snowman" and we see him snowing the heck out of Elvis to feed his lust for money. Parker sets up Elvis' father Vernon the father with fake prestige and makes him a "useful idiot" in his scam.

So the movie shows the results of what happened to Elvis in all its lurid glory. It cares much less about the cause, or maybe about Elvis too. That's just not the point of the movie. And of course it wouldn't be the blockbuster it is if it were the point. The audience is invited to glory in the sexual display and to cheer for Elvis as he pulls the charisma out of his hat yet one more time. Such charisma itself may be related to a rampant sexual energy that doesn't know how to be contained.

When the father isn't respected or is perceived as an unworthy mate, the temptation for the mother to have the boy take the man's place is always there. It's easy, and there's little risk as we've little collective social awareness that the situation exists, let alone that, as I believe, it's very common. It looks loving and good when a young man adores his mother. "Awww" is a common reaction. The reality is that when the adult child boundary around intimate feelings aren't respected, the effects for the child – AND the mother, and the father, and the whole family are severe. This is a relational problem, not an individual sin.

Men have a part in this too, a big one. We're co-responsible for maintaining the healthy connection and boundaries that is the family foundation. Women who aren't in a trusting relationship with a man when children come struggle to feel safe and secure themselves. This affects the children's secure attachment and the troubles continue.

Part of the setting for this is the widespread denigration of men and fathers that erupted in the 60s and took firm root in western culture. Respect between the sexes has degenerated since. It's a long way back and it will need men and women of goodwill to rebuild the trust.

Rape culture: is it a mold or a fungus?

J Galt · 2 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Let's extinguish the rape culture entirely. Who needs it and better yet who wants it? Not me, and I suspect you don't either. Let's start with our language and make this politically correct while we're at it. That often used French word "rape." No more grated French cheese. Screw them and their smelly products. We know what you French buggers are up to and it's time to put an end to it. Just say no to culture, French culture, and their quaint little bacterial culture. Enough is enough. Speaking of grater's the wife was doing a pretty good job last night, wonder if I can have her charged? Only in France, you say? Tabernac!

While we're at it, just like parsing words like manhole and changing them to anybody holes we need to take a serious look at "the rapists." Especially psycho the rapists. While I'm guessing the(rapy) is a subjective position it does, nevertheless, describe the fee schedule. How much more obvious than this can you get when it comes to rape? These people designate themselves as "the rapists." We need to get to the bottom of this. There will be no more massaging of anything; not your hamstring or your neurosis. This rape culture stops here and now.

By the way, that rapier wit has to go, it's pretty clear that most women can feel the penetrating humor and well, you just don't cuddle afterwards. Those penetrating romantic gazes? Guess what, that's right; rape, rape, rape, rape, rape. If there's no penetration then there is no rape, pretty simple stuff here. Wait, did I just use the word "stuff"? Doh!

By the way, regarding penetration, to all othose occupying academe forthwith any future studies or submissions shall limit their materials to compelling. Penetrating will no longer be tolerated and we haven't settled yet on whether we can tolerate compelling. You will be required to submit consent forms from all attendees. Bring a pen.

Christ on horseback – I feel better already, I think I might ask the wife tonight if she's in the mood for a little consent. I remember the last time I had consent. When she removed it, I couldn't remember if I was thrusting in or pulling out. Fuck it, I just turned myself in to the cops. Let them sort it out.

Of course it was a little embarrassing to admit that I might have raped my wife but I lost track. I was overwhelmed by my insensitivity and trying not to blow my consent prematurely. There has been many occasions that I just wanted to throw my wife down and consent her brains out; just really go to town, just consent her out of her mind. I love to watch her consent to a climax. Or is it climax to consent? Well you know what I mean. You don't know, per se, unless you consent to my consent to know she consented.

Last week the wife caught me consenting off in the shower, but hey, what could she say? I had consent, notarized. When I caught her with her vibrator I immediately asked to see her consent form. She was diagnosed by her "the rapist" as bi-polar. I didn't want to be charged as an accessory, especially since the vibrator was already occupying that role.

We tried this new sex game at home designed to cause maximum arousal. It's called blind consent, all the players are blindfolded and you have to guess who gave consent, the losers get 10-15 years. A little stiff but don't confuse this with arousal. I figured this was just an abbreviated version of divorce court.

I'm guessing that young couples may consider changing their marriage vows from "I do," to "I consent." This would be great for guys, if she doesn't, you can avoid divorce completely. I can just imagine how the women's magazines will be spinning this. "50 ways to make him think you consented." "How to get even with consent hounds by using disappearing ink." "How to put the consent back in your marriage," "Consent: a one way street with no exit and no entrance," "How to make him consent to child support without ever sleeping with him."

I am curious how this will affect the laws of search and seizure, given the fact that every male in prison custody is subjected to a body cavity search the stats for male rape should increase exponentially, unless, of course, they default to entrance through the nose or ear.

I can't imagine a man consenting to it or being made to. Is this a trick question, did these guys at the Federal Bureau of Idiots think this through or is there some law that will remove a man's right to withhold consent? If there is, it should be put on the table in plain view so men can use the same snake slither to ward off false allegations.

I would suppose that invasive medical procedures performed on children to establish sexual contact may no longer be legal. Oh wait, I guess the state just removes children from your custody and grants consent against your will. Maybe that's how they will get around raping men in jails – by assigning men in custody as wards of the state. Maybe men should consider a relationship with a woman only if she agrees that you are a custodial caregiver with all legal rights to exercise consent on her behalf. You may want to consider adding this to the small unreadable print on your coitus contracts.

I'm one of those people that although against rape have many questions regarding it. "Why" is the first, followed by a thousand others. I am much less tolerant not of what we believe to be rape by definition or the victimization of women. I'm less tolerant of the violence and the gender specific connotations that represent systemic violence towards men and boys. Rape to me is nothing less than coerced intimacy as a qualifier, across the board and gender neutral. I don't care if you're a cop trying to coerce a statement or a wife bitching about your menstrual cycle, or a feminist calling some man a homo because he shows no interest in you. You are trying to fuck someone for your own benefit, with no regard for the effects of your behavior.

The whole issue is backwards, we should be focused on the damage that occurs as a result of attempting a relationship. The path to pathology can be altered but not by the current laws. I think we all know both men and women that rape and its perception extends far beyond the legal definition. It is too often an exaggeration of the facts. Unfortunately feminists reside in the background shaking their pom-poms and cheering it on. I believe that there are too many officials willing to alter the facts to fit the charge, for no other reason than to justify funding or acquire brownie points, but more importantly to fit the fact that no other legal definitions exist. Unfortunately our behaviors are not as black and white as the laws that govern it.

The previous definition of rape was obviously penned by those polishing their dicks and believing they were polishing their brains. The new and improved version of rape is so myopic as to provide holes big enough to require consent to engage them. Are these assholes and acolytes of rape really getting paid for this shit or are they planning a new reality show?

I have no doubt that the larger portion of women or for that matter the public if asked to define rape are unable to limit their definition to what is understood to be the legal definition. I expect that law enforcement officials are no better. Rape in and of the perception of it immediately instills vile contempt for its occurrence, in all quarters. But that vile contempt rarely reflects the circumstance. It is quite likely that what feminists consider unreported rape may in fact be a lack of definition to accurately define the occurrence. Those who do not report may feel the definition of rape is too strong to address their experience. But the interest to explore the possibility does not exist.

We simply lack the language to define any occurrence of circumstance that may fit in between the actual definition of consent and the actual definition of rape. So we stretch those definitions to the detriment of both genders. If a man coerces a woman to have sex against her comfort to engage, the result is an exaggeration. If she consented to coercion she is a slut, if he admits to coercion he is a rapist. Both are an exaggeration of the facts. Where the outcome may have been more consistent with remorse for the occurrence, a lack of life skills and a need for counseling, we instead apply a prison sentence. We call this civilization but we don't include the laugh track in the background.

We pretend at politics of liberalism, portray a community consciousness of empowerment and administer totalitarian law enforcement. We know that our lives, experience and circumstances include shades of gray but we refuse to shape our laws to accommodate those experiences. Because we determine that consent and rape will reside at distant extremes with no alternate definitions, I believe every accusation should require the accuser to define rape in writing and both parties should submit to a lie detector. If the accuser fails the test she should be required to meet all expenses. That is to say if you put on a lousy performance the audience should be reimbursed.

My first experience with sex was unwanted; I was coerced by the girl that I dated. When I chose to break it off I was accused by her of transmitting a sexual infection. To the best of my knowledge a virgin cannot do that. I could only conclude that she infected me and I was left to submit to the humiliation of being tested by a female doctor, while four other women stood and watched the procedure. I have no doubt that to 99.9 % of the women who would read this paragraph the humor is compelling. Feminist rape accusers and MRA apologists reside at the extreme opposite ends of the issue, but for those that live their lives in the middle it's not hard to understand and recognize that when you attach humiliation and degradation to sex, you are doing damage, even if it is a fetish.

We simply have no laws to govern or protect men from sexual deviance or sexual abuse. We know the lasting effects are often psychological but men somehow don't meet the measurement for consideration. There are millions of men that suffer from the effects of sexual abuse and categorically defined as damaged goods, not worth the trouble. We lack the compassion to extend any protection or understanding of their experience and this same courtesy is extended to our boys.

As a man who can accept the ideal of equality I no longer have any sympathy, interest or concern for adult women that pretend, protest or parade their rape politics or their claims. I will adhere to 100% jury nullification on this issue and as far as I'm concerned rape culture is completely in the minds of women. It is an exaggeration of the law and does not serve to protect men in any way. Now we are equal.

Poetical perspective on gynocentrism

Mark Dent · 3 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

BODY POSITIVITY

Everybody's beautiful

Sang Ray Stevens'

Back in my childhood days

And society today

Is attempting to echo

His positive uplifting message

-for women

And girls

Morbidly obese?

Chunky?

Tubby?

Pleasantly plump?

All gorgeous

All oozing feminine allure

Which any discerning male

Should see and appreciate

Oversized models grace

The covers of magazines

Pouting and posing

Proudly revelling in their rolls

Of excess femininity

And daring men

To say or do anything

Other than confess

Their attraction

And praise the exquisite

Perfection of their chubby charms

We are yet to see

Pot bellied

Fat arsed males

Adorn any magazines

And we certainly demand nothing

Of the women confronted

With such unsightly men

Other than to turn in disgust

And express their disdain

For the ugly, fat creeps

Who clearly take no pride

In their health or appearance

Boys understand very early

That should they present

A less than ideal physique

To the world

They will be rightly dismissed

Derided and denigrated

Girls bathe in an ocean

Of admiration and adulation

Whatever their form

And this explains

The plethora of pudgy

Females wandering our streets

And shopping malls

In clothing which Deliberately displays their

Portly pudginess

Roly poly rotundity

With brash, impudent insolence

And nary a shred of shame

Or self-awareness

Every female is beautiful, Ray

BOBBY'S TESTICLES

Bobby Hill has testicular cancer

Bobby plays in the AFL

Hawk Peter Crimmins died

From the same cancer

Carlton skipper

Sam Docherty battled

This insidious disease

And returned to emotional

Triumphal scenes

Ben Cunnington is still fighting

And may never play again

And I wondered when

The AFLW ladies

Were planning their testicular cancer

Awareness round

And fundraising campaign

For this ubiquitous man killer

For are they not

The natural nurturers

The compassionate caring

Tender-hearted, empathetic

Generous gender?

Confusion and contradiction reign

For men relentlessly raise

Multiple millions in cold cash

For female specific cancers

Devote days to this cause

At the expense of their own

Health needs

Males happily wear pink

And dig deep for their sickly sisters

at football and cricket matches yet still

our society views masculinity as toxic teaches our boys and girls about the oppressive nature of men and boys

tells the ignorant and gullible of male self interest and dominance

their unjust subjugation of the sweeter sex and the obstacles they hurl

in their way

Yet reality lays the myths bare

For any who have eyes to see

And ears to hear

Sadly

There are too few willing

To look or listen

THE KMART CONUNDRUM

The students at Toorak Girls College

Are taught all about

Their oppression

By their committed competent

Compassionate teachers

They learn all about

The perils and pitfalls

They will encounter

Due to their genitalia

Financial inequity

Gender pay gaps

Dependence and insecurity

Glass ceilings

And boys' clubs

But how do these

Precious pearls of percipience

Maintain their hold

When the pupils pay

A visit to their local mall

Or shopping centre?

For what confronts

Their poisoned polluted brains?

Oceans of clothing, footwear

Make up, décor

All carefully prepared and presented

For their purchasing pleasure

By retailers who have but one ambition

To make a profit

Kmart stores rebuke

The feminist lies

Without a word spoken

Or argument raised

Who is their targeted demographic?

Whose eye and money

Is being tantalized and titillated?

Walk about the enormous store

And ponder the preponderance of products

Designed and displayed for women

Why?

Why would any retailer

Be s insane

As to woo a woman

Or girl?

For are they not

Financially impoverished?

Dollar deficient?

Dismally destitute?

Deliberately disadvantaged?

Do retailers wish to fail?

Do they not understand

That their marketed merchandise

Will simply sit unwanted?

Unused?

Do the girls have enough intelligence

And integrity

To push aside the deliberate disinformation

Force fed as their daily diet

And view it for the house of cards

It is?

Perhaps not

As they walk by

An endless array of shopfronts

Desperately desiring female attention

Does the penny drop?

Sadly, I think not

Independent thought

Seeing reality as opposed

To ideology

Is a lost art

So, they sit and have their nails painted

Toes pedicured

Faces washed and creams applied

Handbags slung

Bags stuffed with unneeded clothing

Another pair of superfluous shoes

And a “girl power” Tshirt

And converse over coffee and cake

Their oppression and struggles

Foremost in their confused

Ignorant minds

I hope, somewhat forlornly

Those responsible

For the creation of these generations

Of pampered, coddled and cosseted

Females

Will be called upon

To face the music

Pay the piper

Account for their sins

Before facing a just retribution

For their deliberate deception

And degenerate bigotry

MY MONEY MY CHOICE

A comedian nailed it

So succinctly

He silenced

The cackling, screeching females

With his coldy, clinical logic

Lured them into his trap

Like the deadliest trapdoor spider

Such that they never saw

The poisonous pincers

Preparing to snap

And crush the life from their hapless, hollow argument

so devastatingly

they had to join in the uncertain laughter of the now educated audience

My body my choice

They chant

And he says,

“Sure! I am with you girls!

Men have no right

To tell you what to do

With the baby you carry!”

Hear them scream

Their righteous approval?

And he stands silent

Letting them enjoy

Their pyrrhic victory

And then sets their humiliation

In motion

But

If we are going to accept

That men have no say

Over what a woman does

With her body

Then we must surely agree

That a woman or government

Should have no say

As to what a man should do

With his money!

Deeper masculine voices

Now cheer

Why can’t I have a paper abortion?

Why don’t I have the right

To say I want nothing to do with

The baby you carry

You want it?

You raise it and you pay for it!

More cheers

And embarrassed chuckles

From those who have been Exposed as frauds and hypocrites

By a black comedian

With a microphone

ONLY WOMEN

Only women can have a preference

Yet another societal law

Perhaps unwritten

But indelibly imprinted

In our minds and hearts

And clearly understood

In the dating game

Women can boldly

State their preferences

Describe without apology

The type of man

Who makes their heart flutter

And their juices flow

He has to be tall

Must have a nice head of hair

Can't be too hairy (said with a shudder)

Must be in good shape

Have a well-paying job

No fatties allowed

No nerds or baldies

No short males need apply

All this and more

Can be stated

Without apology

Or the slightest sense

Of shame at this

Shallow judgement

Yet men are vilified

The very moment

They attempt to classify

The type of woman

Who stirs their loins

Fat phobic

Body shamer

Shallow chauvinist

Arrogant superficial player

Toxic

No magazine promotes

Short, bald, obese males

On their front cover

But obese women

Adorn billboards

And hairy armpits

And furry legs

Are thrust provocatively under

Our judgemental noses

Daring us to make

One negative comment

Or even display a momentary look of distaste

So they can explode in rage

And call out our disgusting sexism

And oppressive expectations

Which make slaves of all women

A fat gut exposed to

A gaggle of girls

Would draw forth

Gasps of revulsion

And demands for the bare flesh

To be covered

Before they vomit

Or accuse the slob

Of a sex crime

This is the simple truth

And it is indisputably

The way of the world

And still our whining witches

The frazzled females

Who obsess over body image

And self esteem

Would not consider

The brutal dismissal

Of fat ugly men

From their presence

To be anything other than

Appropriate and acceptable

Sensible and seemly

Justified

For in their eyes

Men are less than human

For no other world view

Could explain such

Callous, cruel and contradictory behaviour

HER BREASTS ADORNED

They were ubiquitous

Strode proudly

About the massive amphitheatre

No skulking in shadows

Or hang dog humility

Side by side they stood

With the men in khaki

We stood as one

In silent recognition

Of the courage and sacrifice

Of our brave soldiers

The bugle calls us to attention

Let us contemplate

The deeds of

Our dauntless

Selfless

Men and women

And I shudder inwardly

As I try to comprehend

What goes on in

The minds of the females

Wearing the uniform we honour

Tens of thousands of men

And boys

Have died fighting for this country

I love

Or been horrifically maimed

In mind and body

But men and women

Are acknowledged

Appreciated

Lionized

Applauded

Given equal standing

My God-females in uniform

Standing centre stage

As the last post

Echoes around the vast stadium

And I feel the fraudulence

They should be experiencing

The complete unworthiness

Of their situation

This day was never created

To honour tent assembly

Food distribution

Medical treatment

Of the impoverished or war torn

Populations

Long after the fighting is done

It was for those who walked

Unflinchingly

Into a hailstorm of shrapnel

And shells and felt the warm wet blood

Of their mates showering their own skin

It was for those

Who stood or sat

Upon the decaying flesh

Of their friends and foes

In deep dark trenches

Or saw their own feet rot

And smelt the putrid stench

Of their decomposed extremities

It was for those who returned home

A gibbering shell of what they once were

But…….there they are

Lipstick and eye rouge applied

A crucial preparation

For those who know

The camera lens

Will close in on their stoic

Pancaked faces

No bayonet thrusts

Or grenades were hurled

By the petite hands

Of the females

In uniform

Breasts adorned

With multi coloured badges

And medals

For what, is never specified

Or articulated

Luxuriating in this special day

Created to honour

Our fallen

Our maimed

Our men

Shame on you

Shame on all who Play this sick transparent game

WHAT WILL YOU DO FOR WOMEN?

Every election which comes around

Be it state or federal

We hear this question

And the truly shocking aspect

Of this tradition

Is that it is not considered

To be truly shocking

Heads nod

And politicians' furrow

Their brows

And employ their well- practised look

Of deep concern

And adamant agreement

With the great importance

Of this question

In a world where half the population

Is never mentioned

Or the cause of a raised eyebrow

Let alone a furrowed one

We must ponder seriously

The health of a society

Which sees no wrong

In this endless obsession

With the well being

Of one half of the electorate

Those who are ignored

Those who are never mentioned

In heated cabinet discussions

Or planning for speeches and debates

Except when a villain is required

A group which can be vilified, demonized

And mocked without fear of consequences is the perfect target

For they will never raise their voices in protest

Silent, disposable and too proud

Or ashamed

To speak out

And ask for a crumb

From the government their sweat

And taxes keep afloat

Fuck all of the bastards

The bigots and haters

Who have ignored

Kicked

Shat on

Demeaned

Demonized

Dehumanized

Devalued

Disdained

And deserted

Our men and boys

The historical role of gynocentrism in societal collapse

August Løvenskiolds & Peter Wright · 4 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

MGTOW YouTube producer Turd Flinging Monkey (TFM) recently talked about his theory of how historical patriarchies (real ones, not the faux versions feminists are forever whining about) interact with gynocentrism to produce cycles of societal growth and collapse. The theory, referred to as the traditionalism cycle, has appeared in major civilizations. The traditionalism cycle goes something like this:

1. Patriarchal traditionalism →
2. Gynocentric traditionalism →
3. Progressive gynocentrism →
4. Societal collapse →
5. Return to step 1 above.

The "traditionalism theory" is both descriptive of observed historical patterns and makes falsifiable predictions about how wealthy societies will break down over time if they fail to control gynocentric resource demands.

The theory is a reasonable one; societies start with patriarchs (father-elders) as the controlling class, then move through traditional and progressive forms of gynocentrism before collapsing under their own weight – the inability of resource production to keep up with the unchecked demands of an increasingly indolent yet powerful populace. The theory says that gynocentrism escalates with the advent of abundance if abundance exists in a given culture.

What we appreciate about TFM's exposition of his theory is that he did some detailed historical research to back it up – something sorely lacking in the discussion of the roots of gynocentrism. Instead of real research we often see pull-it-out-of-your-ass histories or dismissive appeals to biology – "it's all in the genes."

The irony that "Turd Flinging Monkey" did NOT pull it out of his ass is not lost on us.

The pull-it-out-of-your-ass kind of history is based on half-guesses, ideology and assumptions with little to no evidence – except perhaps references to items like Lysistrata, a play; Helen of Troy, a myth; The "Rule of Thumb" law authorizing standards of domestic violence (which even feminists admit is a complete fabrication), religious tales, fairy tales, and other fantasy sources – i.e. to assume myths and fables mirror real life has marginal utility at best and is often times just crap: have you ever seen a centaur?

Surely the classical depictions of centaurs must have mirrored real creatures and behaviors or they wouldn't have mentioned it?! Any thinking person will recognize the problem; relying on ancient mythologies is akin to having future zoologists base the history of equine evolution on episodes of My Little Pony: Friendship is Magic.

Mythology's chief value is in metaphor: when the goddess Ishtar's love interest Gilgamesh spurns her, she threatens to unleash zombies unless her father punishes Gilgamesh for his impudence. The metaphors seem to boil out of this, the oldest of human stories:

- Women exercise covert, rather than overt, power.
- Spurned women will unleash their fury on the men who spurned them, as well as others.
- Fathers will side with angry, abusive daughters over innocent men.
- Women in power will give power to the dangerous and unproductive.
- Zombies are real!

Some of those metaphors are useful; some not so much.

The same goes for reductive biological explanations. Aside from the laziness of such approaches, the error in over-emphasizing biology is that biology is a product of environmental pressures that can, and do, change over time.

Where you see biology you will always see a facilitating environment shaping it. Changes in environmental conditions (like over-population and resource depletion) could eliminate the biological "need" for gynocentrism entirely – wombs lose value when reducing the population is the only viable survival option for a species.

Fortunately, TFM breaks with the catalogue of errors and is trying to keep his analysis fact-based and real.

With that said there are some major, unspoken nuances that should be added to the conversation. The first is that there are degrees of gynocentric culture in both its traditional and progressive forms. Gynocentric societies are not cookie-cutter one-size-fits-all. Like hurricane categories with wind strengths of one to five, gynocentric culture can be imagined in a similar way – as differing in reach and packing winds anywhere from dangerous to destructive to catastrophic.

Like hurricanes, which become more intense depending on a confluence of atmospheric pressure, temperature, humidity, and wind direction, likewise the intensity of a given gynocentric culture rests on multiple factors. TFM has named one of them in his video: abundance.

Abundance is a good start, one that, in isolation from other factors, can definitely lead to a (lets call it) 'category one' gynocentric culture. But as we add more contributing factors the gynocentrism gets more pervasive and more destructive – factors like

- male to female population ratio,
- aristocratic conventions influencing the masses,
- communication technologies,
- reproductive technologies,
- military campaigns,
- foreign threats,
- the strength and structure of cultural narratives perpetuating the sentiment,
- and so on.

As these and many other factors converge the strength of gynocentric culture grows potentially up to a 'category five' such as was born in the Middle Ages with the mother of all gynocentric cultures that has spanned over 800 yrs and been exported from Europe to the rest of the world.

Ours.

We don't intend to give an exhaustive reply here but will end with a general comment about our present culture. At this point the gynocentric culture birthed in medieval Europe is unprecedented in the long path of history – it was only there, and then, that the combination of romantic chivalry and courtly love was born, along with a bunch of other contributing factors that made this gynocentric revolution the mother of them all. But there's no doubt there have occurred smaller, less intense manifestations of gynocentric culture throughout history along the lines TFM suggests.

Recognizing gynocentrism and how it hurts men, families and society is critical to the process of limiting and perhaps undoing the toll that it takes on everyone.

A version of this essay first appeared on gynocentrism.com.

ICMI 21 Presentation by Robert Brockway. “Feminist Lies, Bad History and The Truth”

A Voice For Men Videos · 5 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Every Girl’s Brain On A First Date

A Voice For Men Videos · 6 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill Raw Files – Are Women More Discriminated Against? – Karen Straughan

A Voice For Men Videos · 7 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

1 in 4 women admit to violence in relationships

A Voice For Men Videos · 8 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Golden with a stellar breakdown of how research results are narrowed and skewed to achieve an ideologically favorable outcome, particular for media consumption.

It’s not about the nail

A Voice For Men Videos · 10 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Gamma Bias In The Maintenance of Gynocentrism

Peter Wright · 11 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Gamma bias refers to a cognitive gender bias theory developed by Seager & Barry (2019).[1]

Gamma bias refers to the operation of two concurrent biases: alpha bias (exaggerating or magnifying gender differences) and beta bias (ignoring or minimizing gender differences). Gamma bias occurs when one gender difference is minimized while simultaneously another is magnified, resulting in a doubling of cognitive distortion.[2]

Gamma bias

Seager & Barry state that gamma bias works by magnifying women's issues and achievements and minimizing men's issues and achievements. Alternatively, the dynamic is reversed and employed to minimize negative female traits and behaviors, while magnifying or exaggerating negative male traits or behaviors.

Theories on the purpose of gamma bias

Hypotheses regarding the growth of gamma bias and the disfavoring of males include evolutionary pressures for males to protect and provide for women which involves a reluctance to view men as vulnerable, or alternatively the sociological explanation of 'ingroup' and 'outgroup' bias which may have developed around men and women in the form of social conventions.[1]

A further explanation is provided by gynocentrism theory[3] which posits an increase of narcissism among women in the context of heterosexual relationships and exchanges, demonstrating what Robert Millman has called 'acquired situational narcissism.'[4] Gamma bias is used to support this dynamic and ensure that women are beneficiaries of narcissistic reassurance. This theory further assumes that gamma bias can be witnessed in most 'narcissist to non-narcissist' relationships.

Examples of gamma bias

References:

[1] Seager, M., Barry, J.A. (2019). Cognitive Distortion in Thinking About Gender Issues: Gamma Bias and the Gender Distortion Matrix. In: Barry, J., Kingerlee, R., Seager, M., Sullivan, L. (eds) The Palgrave Handbook of Male Psychology and Mental Health. Palgrave Macmillan
[2] John Barry & Martin Seager, Can we discuss gender issues rationally? Yes, if we can stop gamma bias
[3] Wright, Peter. "Gynocentrism As A Narcissistic Pathology." New Male Studies 9, no. 1 (2020).
[4] Can Narcissism Be Acquired? (subheading pp.43-44). in Plante, T. G. (Ed.). (2006). Mental disorders of the new millennium (Vols. 1-3). Greenwood Publishing Group.

Further reading:

- Gynocentrism defined
- Gynosympathy
- Women-are-wonderful effect
- Gynomyopia
- Confirmation bias
- Schema bias

Happy 125th Anniversary, Ladies Day Riot

Doug Mortimer · 13 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Marketing baseball to females is nothing new. It is almost as old as professional baseball itself. The New York Gothams (later the Giants) had a Ladies Day in 1883. It offered free admission to ladies in the hopes of hooking them on the game. Then they would presumably come back as paying customers. Sounds like a plan. What could go wrong? The Washington Senators found out when they scheduled a Ladies Day for Monday, September 13, 1897 at Boundary Field in the nation's capital.

On that day the Cincinnati Red Stockings were in town to take on the Senators. There was little at stake as the Red Stockings were in fourth place with a 66-49-2 record, while the Senators were in sixth place with a 54-62-3 record. (In 1897 major league ball was comprised of 12 National League teams; the American League was not founded till 1901). It was late in the season and neither team was in the pennant race. September 13 was the penultimate home game of the season for the Senators, so why not let the ladies in free? As an added inducement, the Senators' starting pitcher was a renowned ladies man. At a time when the team's per-game average attendance was 2,221, an estimated 1,000 ladies turned out.

Then as now, some players were more popular than others. On the Senators, the most popular player was 23-year-old pitcher George Barclay Mercer, popularly known as Winnie or Win because he was a winner. The year before he had fashioned a 25-18 record. He had kept up the good work in 1897, when he would go on to start 43 games and win 21 of them. His Achilles heel that season, however, was control. He walked 104 batters and notched 28 hit batsmen.

In days of old as well as today, players acquire reputations. For example, it was widely known that eagle-eye Ted Williams never swung at a pitch outside the strike zone. It was more than a legend, as he led the American League in walks eight times. Consequently, umpires gave him the benefit of the doubt on close pitches. So it is certainly possible that Win Mercer's reputation for wildness affected umpires' perceptions – consciously or otherwise – of marginal pitches.

On September 13 Mercer was apparently having a decent outing until the fifth inning when he got into a heated argument with umpire Bill Carpenter and was thrown out of the game. As is usually the case in these situations, it was probably not one ball/strike call but a number of them that precipitated the fracas. Given the limited number of umpires (in 1897 there was only one per game), the chances of a pitcher encountering the same umpire during a season were much higher. A running feud could easily be drawn out over the season, or even from one season to the next.

However long the duration of Mercer's feud with Carpenter, his fate was sealed when he took out a pair of glasses and offered them to Carpenter. When Carpenter refused, Mercer tried to put them on him. Mercer had clearly crossed the line so it was no surprise that he was tossed.

If Carpenter had thrown out any other pitcher in the league, that would have been the end of it. In this case, however, there were repercussions because of Mercer's matinee idol status among D.C. distaff baseball fans. Then as now, female sports fans were much like teenage girls and boy bands. Ostensibly a fan of the band/team, every female had her fave singer/player. In the nation's capital in 1897, Win Mercer was definitely the ladies' choice.

After Mercer left the game, female fans hollered and screamed at Carpenter. A controversial call in the seventh inning didn't help matters any. At the conclusion of the game (2-1 in favor of the Reds), the male fans began to exit the ballpark. The ladies, however, had other ideas.

As Carpenter approached the grandstand to exit the field, he was beset by hordes of females who pushed him to the ground, ripped his clothing and assaulted him with parasols and fists. Amusingly, one newspaper account related, "The umpire was too manly to turn upon the women." Luckily, some players came to his assistance and escorted him to the clubhouse. Eventually, he was disguised and smuggled out of the park.

The female fury was not spent, however. Armed with bricks, they smashed windows and doors. They also ripped out seats and tore loose railings. With no umpire to absorb the blows of their parasols, they turned on ushers. The police intervened and restored order but there is no account of any arrests. Thus endeth all peaceful protests.

Despite the 1897 riot, Ladies Day did not disappear from baseball. The promotion, however, has been null and void since 1973 when the New York Human Rights Commission ruled that Ladies Day was reverse discrimination, and free or discounted admission to femme fans at New York ballparks was taboo. Other teams took the hint and ended the promotions In subsequent years it was not unusual for giveaways to discriminate (i.e., some free stuff for men, some for women) but that too has gone away. (Curiously, age discrimination is still kosher, as some giveaways are earmarked for 13-and-under.)

Absent Ladies Day is it possible we shall ever have a collective female hissy fit at a major league game today? Well, remember that old standard, "Take Me Out to the Ball Game"? What people sing during the seventh inning stretch is just the chorus of the song. It's actually about a young lady asking her beau to take her out to see her hometown heroes.

The song opens:

> Katie Casey was baseball mad,
>
> Had the fever and had it bad.

In the second verse:

> Katie Casey saw all the games,
>
> Knew all the players by their first names.
>
> Told the umpire he was wrong,
>
> All along, good and strong.

Katie Casey was alive and well in 1897; she was alive and well in 1908 when "Take Me Out to the Ball Game" was written; and she is alive and well today. Of course, today she is more likely to be obese and have blue hair. I doubt that she still carries a parasol. Her language is likely saltier.

Win Mercer, however, was something of a flash in the pan. On January 12, 1903, he checked into the Occidental Hotel in San Francisco and asphyxiated himself with gas transferred via tube from an outlet in his room. Theories varied as to his motive. One was unpayable gambling debts; another was an intractable pulmonary problem. A third theory was woman trouble.

Always an occupational hazard for a ladies' man.

The Red Pill Raw Files – Is Male Disposability the Fault of Patriarchy? – Dr. Warren Farrell & Paul Elam

A Voice For Men Videos · 14 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Why Modern Movies Suck – They Hate Their Own Fans

A Voice For Men Videos · 14 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Critics Tell Young Men that Their Penises are NOT Golden (But They Are!)

Janice Fiamengo · 15 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It's back-to-school time, and we can expect more complaints about how the lack of young men at college today is victimizing young women.

We've been told for years that the future is female, that everyone benefits from female leadership and everything improves when women take charge.

Any man on a college campus who has ever objected to the plethora of special university programs and women-only scholarships and pro-woman propaganda was told he had a problem with gender equality.

But now it turns out that some women themselves are not entirely happy with the deal feminists engineered for them, which sees them outnumbering men at close to 3-2 at most English-speaking universities, and thousands of words have already been devoted to the idea that college women deserve a more satisfactory dating experience.

According to Monica Greep in an article from last fall for the Daily Mail, "How Golden Penis Syndrome is ruining dating for university women," the "deficit of male students" at college "means men develop inflated egos and become Casanovas who cheat—despite a lack of social and sexual skills."

The formulation reminds me of an old Woody Allen joke from his movie Annie Hall. In my updated version, two women are discussing college dating: "The guys are awful, egotistical schmucks who think they're really great," says one. "I know," says the other, "And there are so few of them!"

If these men are so lacking in "social and sexual skills," as the article tut tuts, then why are the women upset that there are not more of them? If the women don't want guys who are Casanovas, they don't have to date them. But admitting that women have any role in creating the hookup culture being decried is impossible for most commentators today; the fault must always be found in the men. There is even a "relationship therapist" quoted in the article who tells us that Golden Penis Syndrome "speaks of the delusional belief that you are unusually and uniquely gifted as a man."

Really? Did any of these analysts interview any young men who actually said that about themselves, or is this a case of women projecting onto men their own self-delusions, angry because the men have failed to respond to them as they, the women, would prefer?

As has become typical of pronouncements about men and women, the article blames men for being in the minority at college: at some institutions, they make up only 25% of the student body (see Mark Perry's charts, for example here, showing the decades-long gender asymmetries; and see his proof that women outnumber men in STEM fields too). The shortage apparently causes men "to see themselves as a prize to be won by female suitors."

What articles such as this one won't admit is that these guys are "prizes to be won," and increasingly so in light of the reported imbalance.

.

It is well known that college-educated men who marry are, on average, likely to work the longest hours, seek promotion most aggressively, and become high earners focused on supporting their wives and families (even post-divorce, as too often happens). A woman who is fortunate enough to marry a man like this stands to secure a materially better life, often at her husband's expense of health and leisure, than she would have had if she had depended solely on her own earning power and work ethic (women are famously more interested in "work-life balance" than men are). Now with these men in the minority, women are having to compete for the men's attention, and we're supposed to feel sorry for them.

Of course the alleged problem has an obvious solution: the women could date and marry non-university-educated men. Why won't they? The article mentions this somewhat embarrassing reality in gender-neutral terms by noting that "At the same time [that] university sex ratios have been skewing female, there's been a simultaneous increase in what academics call 'assortative mating.'" The article explains, "That's a fancy way of saying that college grads only want to date and marry other grads."

Wrong.

It's not male college grads who won't marry anyone other than a female college grad. As a 2019 study confirmed, it is almost exclusively women who insist on the need for their mates to earn more. In a sane age genuinely committed to "gender equality," we might criticize women for their stereotypical behavior, for perceiving men as "success objects." But we never criticize women for acting out of self-interest.

Only men are criticized for that, as well as for uncouth dating behaviors that everyone knows women also engage in when circumstances favor them: playing the field, cheating, "ghosting," and so on. Being picky, demanding, and often downright rude are all recognized as a woman's prerogative because women ARE seen as inherently valuable.

The whole point of the article is to make clear to men that they are not to trade on their value when they're in demand. They're supposed to be grateful to be desired at all, and to believe that they are the lucky ones. Ultimately, they're supposed to happily sacrifice themselves on the marital altar with a woman who will enjoy the fruits of their labor.

For years now, some men have been deciding that it's not worth it. As the law now stands in most of the English-speaking world (see Stephen Baskerville's excellent Taken Into Custody), a man can literally work himself into an early grave to provide for his family; and his wife can clear out—in the process taking most of his resources and his children—merely because she tires of him. By law, he'll have to continue paying her some significant portion of his hard-earned assets long after she has stopped providing him with any of the comforts of marital domesticity, if she ever did.

I'm far from the first person to point out that this is not good for men as well as for society as a whole, especially for the children who become the collateral damage. It's long past time we started discussing these issues realistically instead of expecting that men won't notice how the superstructure designed to create female satisfaction and security rests on their sacrifices—and also on their dehumanization in countless articles like this one.

The situation described in the article is a serious one despite the foolishness of the writer's perspective. Our societies are telling women two contradictory things: that they can and should take men's college spots, jobs, and status (and call that "equality"), and still expect to marry a high-status man who will provide for them lavishly and give them the option, if they want it, to work part-time or not at all.

The problem of declining male success has been evident for decades, but even the whistleblowers have been afraid to address it honestly. Christina Hoff Sommers published The War Against Boys (still a must-read) more than twenty years ago, showing how boys and young men were being discriminated against across the entire school system by mostly female teachers with anti-male convictions. She had to change the subtitle of the book, obviously under pressure from feminists, from "How Misguided Feminism is Harming our Young Men" to "How Misguided Policies are Harming our Young Men." Even when feminism is directly responsible for a problem, it can never be named as such.

Universities have become so anti-male in their policies and teaching, not least in their sexual assault policies (see, for example, KC Johnson and Stuart Taylor's definitive The Campus Rape Frenzy), that some men have made the decision to stay away, especially from university programs in the Humanities and Social Sciences, where the anti-male slant is unavoidable. Even in the tiny number of programs where young men are still relatively well represented, the feminist war continues. There is actually a worldwide international day commemorating governments' stated goal to promote women in the few remaining higher education fields and professions in which women do not already outnumber men.

A large-scale study by two MIT researchers entitled Wayward Sons: The Emerging Gender Gap in Labor Markets and Education found that the trend has been building for decades, and they explain its circular nature. Low-income men lack the economic potential to attract and support a mate, but they are still likely to father children with women who choose to raise their children alone, an arrangement that contributes to child poverty, fatherlessness, and all the problems that come in their wake.

Sadly, male children born into single female parent households "appear to fare particularly poorly" suffering impaired health, delinquency, early school leaving, addiction, depression, and higher probability of incarceration. "Thus the poor economic prospects of less-educated males," the study authors summarize, "may create differentially large disadvantages for their sons, potentially reinforcing the development of the gender gap in the next generation." We can expect that even fewer young men will go to university in the future, and fewer women will find high-earning men to date and marry.

And now this predictable outcome is presented as the fault of the minority of young university men who are recognizing the short-term benefits of their scarcity.

The article throws around the grotesquely insulting and mocking phrase Golden Penis Syndrome, telling us at length how badly behaved some men are in these situations—with abundant anecdotes based on women's (subject and unverifiable) tales of neglect and rudeness while berating men for thinking THEY are special. Your penises are not golden, is the implied smear throughout.

What really seems to bother the experts is that the women's discontent shows that these men may actually be platinum.

The author of a book about dating designed to help women stay “in charge” recounts how at universities where men outnumber women, the guys make special Valentine’s cards for their female peers, and wake up early on Valentine’s Day to make pancakes for them. What are the young women doing for the guys at colleges where the female sex is over-represented? We know the answer: not much except complaining about poor treatment to anyone who’ll listen.

We can keep on blaming men for making decisions in their own short-term best interests, and we can keep on telling them that they should be grateful for any female attention at all, even while they’re pushed out of college and high-status jobs by gender equity policies, affirmative action hiring, and a maniacally woman-favoring culture.

Maybe instead it’s time to have a frank conversation about what men want and need, and why happy men are important in a well-functioning society.

Divorcing a King – Eleanor of Aquitaine #1 – Extra History

A Voice For Men Videos · 16 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This entertaining video, perhaps inadvertently, shows how wrong the feminist historical narrative is. Points to watch out for:

- Eleanor's father left his lands to her
- Eleanor had a good education and spoke Latin
- King Louis went out of his way to please his wife Eleanor
- Eleanor wasn't afraid to speak her mind
- Eleanor clashed with senior church officials
- Eleanor was able to influence her husband the King
- Eleanor led her own troops on crusade
- Eleanor sought an annulment to her marriage and later received a divorce
- Eleanor retained her own lands and titles after the divorce

Toward a 'Gender Transition Movement' (GTM)

A Voice for Men · 16 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following is a Wiki4Men entry describing Warren Farrell's proposed 'Gender Transition Movement.'

* * *

Warren Farrell, author of The Myth of Male Power, advocates a "gender transition movement" which refers to more role-sharing among men and women than has traditionally been the case. Farrell proposes, for example, that women may wish to contribute more labor and more income so that "neither sex is expected to pay more than half the income,"[1] and men may wish to spend more time with family so that "both sexes raise the children." [2,3]

Farrell states, "Taking what had worked for most women traditionally and seeing it as a plot against them led us to see men as "owing" women. This created Stage II entitlement: women being entitled to compensation for past oppression. This prevented us from seeing the need to make a transition from Stage I to Stage II together : the need not for a women's movement or a men's movement, but for a gender transition movement." [4]

He further states, "A gender transition movement will be the longest of all movements because it is not proposing merely to integrate blacks or Latinos into a system that already exists; rather, it is proposing an evolutionary shift in the system itself—an end to "woman-the-protected" and "man-the-protector."[5]

Farrell breaks down his proposed gender transition movement into stages of a grand historical process, which can be described as follows:

- 1. Historically men and women adhered to strict gender roles for the sake of survival.
- 2. Women chose to "liberate" themselves from that role to gain more freedom.
- 3. Men have responded women's "liberation" by proposing they too might be liberated from some traditional gender roles.
- 4. Ideally this unfolding process can culminate in a gender liberation movement for both sexes.[6]

References:

1. The Myth of Male Power
2. The Myth of Male Power
3. Warren Farrell, Toward A Gender Transition Movement, in Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men?
4. The Myth of Male Power
5. Warren Farrell, Toward A Gender Transition Movement, in Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men?
6. The Myth of Male Power

Women Viewing Men as Dogs

Peter Wright · 17 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following book titles are all aimed at female readers and were collected from a cursory glance at Amazon. This sample is nowhere near the entirety of those available in this, er, genre – but they are sufficient to paint a picture of how millions of women around the world apparently view relationships with men as experiments in animal behaviorism and manipulation strategies, with the aim of controlling men.

The tables of contents reveal the books as patently disrespectful toward men, misandric and certainly repulsive for any self-respecting male. But for the adventurous reader who would like to look more closely at the content, each of the titles are searchable at Amazon.com.

What men do: Eratosthenes

A Voice For Men Videos · 18 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This is the first of a new series of videos 'What Men Do' in which we'll show some of the extraordinary accomplishments of men today and in the past. –Ed

The Founding Queen of Gynocentrism

A Voice For Men Videos · 19 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter Marie directed poets and novelists to record their ideas of what a gynocentric society would look like, including behaviours of romantic chivalry and female superiority. Their engineering of a new gynocentric culture was so wildly successful that over the intervening 800 years it has grown to become the dominant global trope, with romantic novels now outgrossing all of the world's holy books combined.

How to Train a Woman Like a Dog

A Voice For Men Videos · 19 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Women routinely view men as animals in need of training, taming, controlling and crafting into something benefitting women (see example book titles below). In this video Paul Elam talks about men and women who don't actually need "training" because they already have worthwhile values. -Eds.

.

For the love of women

A Voice For Men Videos · 20 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Last Thing a Pro-Liberty Conference Needs is a Feminist Panel: My Unsolicited Advice to Students For Liberty

Janice Fiamengo · 21 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

My heart sank yesterday morning when I received an email from Joshua Eakle, Director of Marketing for Students For Liberty, which hosts LibertyCon, "the largest international pro-liberty gathering in the world," which will be meeting in Miami this October for the first time since Covid-19.

Eakle reports that many in the liberty movement regard feminism as the enemy of freedom, and that three panelists will be decrying this allegedly "toxic attitude" and making the case that feminism has a proud pro-liberty history. One of these women, Jo Jorgenson, was even the Libertarian Party's Presidential Candidate in the American election of 2020.

The Fiamengo File is a reader-supported publication. To receive new posts and support my work, consider becoming a free or paid subscriber.

"Iconic feminists such as Mary Wollstonecraft and Harriet Taylor Mill were known supporters of individualism and classical liberalism. That tradition is still alive and well in modern feminist discourse."

I won't be able to attend the conference, so perhaps this is none of my business. But it's deeply frustrating to see outright lies being peddled as "known" truths, and it's saddening to contemplate the damage that will be done to the liberty movement if feminists are allowed to dictate its terms while (so predictably) accusing non-feminists of being "toxic."

Let's start with the factual errors in Mr. Eakle's email.

Though she may have defined herself as an individualist, Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797) was not a classical liberal. She was a Romantic, a sexual dissident, and an admirer of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Wollstonecraft's utopianism led her to rejoice in the French Revolution as the realization of her most fervent ideals. After publishing an angry denunciation of Edmund Burke's anti-revolutionary Reflections on the Revolution in France, she travelled to Paris in late 1792 to see for herself how society and human nature were being radically transformed.

Despite her dismay at the mass executions that followed her arrival, with blood literally running in the streets, she remained positive about the Revolution, defending its ideals for English readers in her An Historical and Moral View of the French Revolution, published in 1794. The 1792 essay for which she has become famous, A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, though often praised for its alleged defence of equality, is a philosophically incoherent and passionately anti-male tract written to promote the worst possible interpretation of all male actions, including their protection of women, and to exempt women from moral responsibility on account of their claimed powerlessness. Fascinating as a personality, Wollstonecraft cannot possibly be recruited as a libertarian champion.

Harriet Taylor Mill (1807-1858), now mainly known for her years-long affair with John Stuart Mill, whom she married upon the death of her husband, was a radical feminist whom Charlotte Bronte described, after reading her essay on female enfranchisement, as "a woman who longed for power and had never felt affection" (qtd in Reeves, John Stuart Mill: Victorian Firebrand, p. 272). Far from supporting individual liberty, Taylor Mill was an enthusiastic advocate of socialism, which was extremely popular with intellectuals then and now.

She encouraged Mill to rethink his principled support for free enterprise in favor of state ownership of land, the abolition of inheritance, and far-reaching redistribution of wealth (see Reeves, pp. 221-230). With Taylor Mill acting as his advisor, Mill revised the third edition of Principles of Political Economy to include a chapter on the "Futurity of the Labouring Classes" that predicted a transition to a more cooperative, socialistic future. Mill was concerned about the implications of socialism for personal freedom, but Taylor Mill was not.

Feminism as a collectivist movement has from its beginnings had close ties to socialism and Communism. Many of the most influential feminists of the twentieth century, including Simone De Beauvoir, Betty Friedan, Gloria Steinem, and Kate Millett, declared their Marxist ideological commitments. It's true that self-identified feminists such as Christina Hoff Sommers and Camille Paglia have defended liberty, but their unorthodox ideas, and those of other individualist feminists, are not and have never been anywhere near the feminist mainstream.

One of the primary strategies of feminism is the use of (ever-expanding) state power and international governing agencies such as the United Nations to restrict liberty in the name of forced equality, including through massively burdensome regulations on private businesses and public corporations. To further women's so-called liberation, feminism seeks ever-more punitive limitations on private conduct and speech, and has successfully eroded the fundamentals of a free society, specifically equality before the law and the presumption of innocence. In the past thirty years, feminism has consistently reinterpreted speech as hate, claiming that free expression constitutes a threat to women.

Because it is based on resentment caused by the conviction that the history of humanity has been a history of men oppressing women, feminism almost inevitably produces in its adherents a victim mentality, a belief that one has been wronged, a nursing of memories of harm, and an outraged certainty that most men are misogynists or benefit from misogyny. Feminism makes it extremely difficult for its supporters to feel empathy for men or to care about their freedoms, which are often reinterpreted as privileges.

Because feminism promotes the belief that the achievement of political and legal equality is not enough to counter centuries of myths and prejudices about women (as Beauvoir argued in The Second Sex), feminism almost always includes demands for special pro-female measures and anti-male initiatives to aid women's alleged advancement, as well as a hyper-vigilance about micro-aggressions, the niggling remnants of woman-hatred. Feminists tend to define as "toxic" any disagreement with feminism, making free debate difficult.

Angry and paranoid, self-righteous and aggrieved, feminists make dangerous colleagues who are all too ready to misinterpret harmless jokes or gestures, comments or omissions as sexist put-downs. If Students For Liberty is willing to make feminism part of its platform, it will inevitably find itself embroiled in controversies about its failure to promote women adequately, its lack of diversity or female leadership, and its alleged "chilly climate." It will be told that it has reneged on its duty to uphold women's freedom. It will be told that certain types of arguments and advocacy in the organization make women feel unsafe. Complaints of sexual harassment and misconduct will proliferate, especially against men who fail to apologize for their alleged privilege.

I hope conference participants will vigorously contest the panel's claim that feminism is a movement for liberty. Their defense of feminism will undoubtedly be as hollow as their descriptions of Wollstonecraft and Taylor Mill. If Students For Liberty can't be non-feminist, it will soon cease to be pro-liberty.

* * *

You can subscribe to the Fiamengo File Substack HERE

Girl advising men on how to deal with women: A rebuttal

A Voice For Men Videos · 22 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Women love giving men advice on how to please women. Increasingly, young men are being blunt and giving advice back.

This gets funnier as it goes:

You might want to check out MaximBady.

How a limp dick can save the world

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 22 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This article was first read on-air on AVfM Radio, by TyphonBlue. This is a revised and updated version of that on-air article: How a limp dick can save the world, the full-length, uncut edition.–Ed

Have you ever wondered why society expects men to maintain an ever-ready erection, a simple on/off sexual expression, while shaming them for 'only thinking about one thing?' This doublethink makes no sense. If men were sexually simple, they wouldn't have to be shamed into it, further why shame them for being sexually simple if that's what society wants from them in the first place?

But in actual fact this double-blind for men makes perfect sense when you look at it the right way.

Recent research has found that rejection is experienced as physical pain. It's a way of applying pain without damaging the person you're applying it to, the perfect system of torture, when harnessed correctly.

Society (and when I say society, I'm talking in terms of a social organism that uses men and women like cells to perpetuate itself) Society controls men through rejection. Social and sexual. In particular, men are constantly told their sexuality is depraved, damaging, disturbing, and demonic. Men experience this social drumbeat of sexual rejection as continuous pain. It could be likened to a shock collar wrapped around the neck of every man that delivers a constant electrical shock, varied just enough so the man in question never gets used to it.

The only time the shock collar stops delivering is when the man in question acquires approval from a woman. This approval can be social or sexual, but it is a woman who provides it.

This system really only works when there is a constant flow of electricity to men's shock collars. This flow is generated by holding men to an ideal of ever-ready sexual desire for women.

Men have to desire in order for it to be rejected, in order for their shock collars to function. This explains why society simultaneously enforces a performing monkey standard of male sexuality, while mocking men for being the very performing monkeys society wants.

In this system of controlling men through rejection, men rejecting women becomes a taboo. Now it's not that men are incapable of rejecting women, it's that society takes incredible pains to prevent this rejection. First it elicits the performing monkey ideal of male sexuality via use of the shock collar treatment—only sex with a woman will make the pain stop.

(Quick question. If you had a shock collar around your neck and the only time it turned off was when you were having sex… how often would you think about sex and how desperate would you be to have it? Yeah.)

At that point, society stigmatizes male rejection outright. How many articles have we read that follow the formula: men are rejecting women and that's because they're fucked up sexist losers? And how many times have we heard that men always consent to sex with a woman thus can't be raped?

In fact, society so hates male rejection of women that it has ghettoized men who sexually reject women into a completely separate identity and stigmatizes them by taking away their manhood. No other society has ever thought to separate men who reject women sexually from those who do not. It's certainly the case that homosexuals have existed in other societies–our society didn't just discover them one hundred and fifty years ago–it's just that those societies never felt a compulsion to separate them out. Just like we don't separate out men who like oranges from men who like apples.

However, if we were a society ruled by apple growers, you damn well better bet we'd be singling out orange loving men and calling them pussies.

Despite society's deep taboo regarding male rejection there is one lone hero standing up against the tyranny, standing up in defiance of the performing monkey sexual standard, standing up by… well… not standing.

Yes. The limp dick.

Now you're probably asking yourself, "But typhon, how does a limp dick save the world?".

To understand that let's look at why men experience impotence in the first place. Our nearest relatives, having muscular erections rather then ones based on vasocongestion, never experience impotence since, for them, a boner is about as simple as contracting your bicep.

Since impotence, for obvious reasons, can impede intercourse, that makes it reproductively costly. Which makes it evolutionarily costly. So why did human men evolve a system that can even experience impotence. One possible reason is that a highly reactive male sexual system can protect a pair bonder from encroachment by an unsuitable female partner. And this is important since damage to a male pair bonder's bonding system can be fatal. Four fold increase in men's suicide following divorce anyone?

But there is another way that a temperamental male sexuality can be adaptive.

Most people don't realize that our emotions are short cuts to decision making. We can lay new trail through rational arguments, but it's emotions that allow us to navigate the paralysis of indecision and make choices quickly. Particularly in a social context.

Sex is, by its nature, an emotional experience. Because it's an emotional experience, it has the potential to carve out new short cuts in our decision-making abilities.

To explain why, let's talk about theory of mind for a bit. Some researchers are starting to look to the canid species to model how a human theory of mind might develop. When dogs are playing they watch each other for attentional cues to decide if their playmate is engaged and happy. They seem to get more of a thrill out of play if that's the case and, of course, they want to make sure that the other party desires the play.

But if play is the mechanism by which theory of mind takes root in dogs; what's the mechanism by which it takes root in humans?

Well, play is a likely culprit as well. But compared to canids, we're talking about several orders of magnitude more complexity in the human theory of mind. So there's probably another answer as well.
Now an even more powerful an incentive then an engaged, appreciative playmate is an engaged, appreciative sexual partner.

Sex not only establishes a sense of self and other via our desire for a sexual partner, our sex also establishes a desire to be desired. We want a desirable sexual partner who is also desirous of us. That last bit is tremendously important.

Ever wonder why humans are one of the only species whose eyes signal exactly what they're looking at with a flash of white? Sort of a handicap for a predatory species, isn't it? It's because it assists in developing our theory of mind via sexual desire.

A man once said on a forum: "I'm going to start doing what women do, I'm only going to have an orgasm when my partner gives me one." He's not saying that a woman is obligated to give him an orgasm, no. What he was saying is that, up to that point, he had taken responsibility for giving himself an orgasm during sex.

It's not that it's easy for men to orgasm during the average act of penis in vagina sex, it's that they have no choice. In fact, the requirement that men perform is so onerous, multi-billion dollar industries have sprung up to help them out. One of them is the classic 'blue pill'. The other is the sex industry. Not only does the sex industry offer an outlet for the complexity of male sexual expression that is shamed in community sex, it assists men by offering them a way to emulate performing monkey sexuality. It gives them a fantasy to over lay onto substandard sex; a fantasy of an eager, active sexual partner, so that men can make themselves orgasm.

The comedian Jim Jeffries once said, "…it isn't you that's making us cum. It's the dirty, filthy thoughts in our heads."

A woman who ever ends up in a sexual relationship with a man who doesn't have his shock collar on will get a rude awakening to this fact. She'll also either leave or learn to deal with statements like "That's not doing anything for me." or, "Get off you're hurting me!" or "No, I didn't actually cum and if you just lie there thinking that lying still is all I require, I probably won't." She'll learn to deal with rejection, that, unlike a female chimp, that passively presenting her genital swellings for servicing just isn't enough.

And there's the rub, really. What did our ancestors do without Viagra, porn or elaborate systems of social rejection to maintain the illusion of performing monkey sexuality? The answer? Hominid females learned to work harder for sex.

When we're talking about our early female hominid ancestors, learning to be able to deal with complex male sexuality represents a potentially huge leap in their cognitive development. Before they just had to show up or maybe beg, after there was a whole bunch more complex social stuff involved. Human male sexuality is insanely difficult and complex because it's a part of human females developing their understanding of self and other and their perception of their actions having consequences in the greater world.

It's amazing how much human male sexuality resembles a game. You have immediate feedback when you're failing or have failed, you have levels of difficulty and you have a reward at the end (the best in the animal kingdom). And games teach valuable experiences. In this case human male sexuality allows women the opportunity to lay down a emotional map of how to deal with rejection: with challenge, with unpredictability.

This is the basis of all achievement. It enables women to liberate themselves from a passive identity defined by being desired, either sexually or socially, and see themselves primarily in terms of how they choose to act.

This makes women immune to social systems that tell them what to do to be desirable or what not to do. This makes women immune to outside forces that very explicitly want to control their behavior. Foot binding, corsetry, victim ideologies that teach women to view themselves as helpless in every situation. Uncontrollable, unpredictable, challenging male sexuality elevates women from passive recipients of whatever life thrusts into them into active participants in creating life.

So if we're going to talk about human male potency it should be spoken of in terms of the type of sexuality male humans actually have, not the artificial sexuality they are expected to have. In that sense male potency is about its effect on human female psychology, it's elevation of the human female from livestock to co-creator. That's human male potency.

And that potency is best represented not by the predictable ever-ready erection, but ironically by the implacable, temperamental, flaccid penis with its challenge to "try harder!".

So why does a man really need to maintain the façade of being performing monkey? In order to maintain the illusion that all a woman needs to be is passive, so that she's controllable by society.

Because when women obtain the emotional map that allows them to control their own identities, well those sounds you're hearing, dear listener, are the stirrings of a prison break. And when women stage a prison break, not only are men along for the ride, but the whole damn prison complex comes crashing to the ground.

And that is how a limp dick can save the world.

Medieval life expectancy: gender difference through history

Douglas Galbi · 23 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In England, homicides per capita fell roughly by a factor of thirty from the fourteenth-century to the late twentieth century.[1] This progress of civilization wasn't associated with a secular reduction in gender inequality in life expectancy. Elite men's life expectancy in medieval England was perhaps nine years less than elite women's. Men achieved near equality with women in life expectancy in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But men's lifespan shortfall subsequently grew to about five years in late-twentieth-century England. These facts of gender difference in life expectancy are largely unknown. Reducing gender inequality that disfavors men has never been of public concern. Whether that anti-men bias continues may determine the future of civilization.

Violence against men in late medieval England made men's life expectancy much less than women's. The best available data are for the legitimate offspring of British kings, queens, dukes, and duchesses. For such persons born from 1330 to 1479, men's and women's expected additional years of life at age twenty were 21.7 years and 31.1 years, respectively. Men at age twenty thus expected to have 9.4 less additional years of life than women had. The share of violent deaths to all deaths for men ages 15 and older was 46%. If men dying from violence are excluded from the life-expectancy calculation, men and women at age twenty had nearly the same expected additional years of life.[2] Violence against men in medieval England explains why men expected to have much shorter lives than women did.

Men probably had much shorter life expectancy than women did across late medieval Europe. The sparse available evidence indicates that the male/female ratio of homicide victims was 13, 7, and 3, in the thirteenth-to-sixteenth centuries, the seventeenth century, and the eighteenth century, respectively.[3] The leading scholar of long-term historical trends in homicide observed:

> Generally, the shift toward lower homicide rates appears to have been primarily — but not exclusively — a drop in male-to-male violent encounters. [4]

Violence has always been vastly disproportionately directed against men.[5] Homicidal violence was high enough in medieval Europe to be a considerable factor in life expectancy. These facts imply that medieval European men had a considerable life-expectancy shortfall relative to women.[6]

During the European Age of Enlightenment of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, women and men apparently had nearly equal lifespans. Life expectancy calculated from English parish registers indicates that males had roughly a half-year advantage in life expectancy on average across the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.[7] The experience of the Age of Enlightenment makes clear that there is nothing natural or inevitable about men suffering relatively short life expectancy. Use of reason in pursuing social reform can promote gender equality in the most fundamental dimension: gender equality in life expectancy.

The growth of men's life expectancy shortfall from the early nineteenth century to the late twentieth century probably reflects men's historically disproportionate burden of financially supporting families. In England, excluding decades of world wars, men's life expectancy shortfall peaked at 6.2 years in the 1970s.[8] In the U.S., men's life expectancy shortfall peaked at 7.7 years about 1970. Subsequent movement toward gender equality in life expectancy is plausibly associated with women's greater participation in the paid labor force, particularly in highly stressful jobs previously associated with men.

Much work remains to be done to achieve gender equality in life expectancy. Men continue to face enormous gender discrimination in family court decisions. Men continue to be deprived of equal opportunities with women to withdraw temporarily or permanently from the paid workforce and be financially supported by their partners or spouses. The effects of gender inequality can be measured ultimately in life. In England and the U.S., men currently fall about four years short in life expectancy relative to women. The long shadow of medieval chivalry remains in devaluing men's lives to this day.[9]

Notes:

[1] Eisner (2003) p. 96, Fig. 3:

Cf. Pinker (2011) p. 61, Fig. 3-2, "Source: Graph from Eisner, 2003."

[2] Hollingsworth (1957) pp. 10, 8. Life expectancy at birth was 24.0 years for males and 32.9 years for females. The full time-series data are available in the life-expectancy gender trend worksheet.

In documenting medieval English mortality, Clark (2007), Table 6.2 p. 122, has an imprecise population description ("English aristocrats") and an incorrect source citation. Table 6.2's data on life expectancy at birth are for British kings, queens, dukes, and duchesses. Its source is Hollingsworth (1957) p. 8. The data on "fraction of deaths from violence" appears to be an estimate for male deaths from violence relative to all male deaths, rather than the directly reported figures for the male violent death share for deaths after age 15. Clark's estimates appear to be made by using the survivors per 100 males born at age 5 and 20 (64 and 54, respectively), id. p. 11, to estimate 57 survivors at age 15. Assuming all violent deaths occurred after age 15 gives Clark's Table 6.2 violent death share estimates. Pinker (2011) p. 81, Fig. 3-7, is a line graph of Clark's death share estimates, described as for "English male aristocrats."

[3 Eisner (2003) p. 118, Table 5.

[4] Id. p. 119.

[5] Deuteronomy 20:12-15 describes a general commandment to massacre all the men, but take the women and children as spoils. A mass grave at Schöneck-Kilianstädten (Germany) from about 7000 years ago clearly indicates a massacre of at least nine men ages 20 to 40, no women of those ages, and eleven children ages seven or under. That demographic distribution strongly suggests that women ages 20 to 40 were present, but abducted rather than killed. Meyer et al. (2015). Demographic data from human groups at Sredny Stog and Novodanylovka about 7000 years ago indicate that life expectancy at birth was 7.8 years longer for females than for males. Estimated life expectancy at birth was for females, 43.6 years; for males, 35.8 years.

[6] Prospects of survival apparently favored aristocratic women relative to aristocratic men in tenth and eleventh century Saxony. Violence against men is a plausible explanation. Leyser (1975) pp. 56-7. Leading medieval biologist Albertus Magnus in his Cologne lectures in 1258 declared that, in exception to an Aristotelian generality, women then outlived men. See Albertus Magnus, Quaestiones super libris de animalibus, Bk. 15, quaestio 8. Herlihy (1975), pp. 11-2, found Albertus's view consistent with other medieval evidence from the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries. For a detailed, somewhat tendentious review of Albertus's claim, Biller (2000) pp. 286-95. Here are links to Albertus's works available online.

Among first marriages in the elite Nesle family in northern France, 1100 to 1300, wives outlived husbands nearly two to one. Hadju (1980) p. 129. The implications of that statistic for gender differences in life expectancy depends on gender differences in age at first marriage. Among person born in British ducal families from 1330 to 1470, men at first marriage were 5.3 years older than women at first marriage. Hollingsworth (1957) p. 14. In the Nesle family data, the average length of widowhood was 19.5 years and 35% of widows remarried. Those facts suggest that widows' former husbands were dying quite young.

[7] Wrigley (1997) Figure 6.21, Table 6.27, pp. 307-8. These calculations included only married persons. Childbirth created some additional mortality risk for women. If unmarried persons were included, then perhaps women would have had a slight life expectancy advantage. For the data, see the life expectancy gender trend worksheet.

[8] Based on national vital statistics for England and Wales. Estimates compiled in the Human Mortality Database. See the life expectancy gender trend worksheet for details.

[9] Chivalry can take subtle forms. Consider the UK Longevity Science Advisory Panel's conclusions on gender inequality in life expectancy:

> The gender gap in human lifespan is profoundly affected by societal and behavioural factors and movement towards greater parity in lifestyle between men and women is a major factor in the recent reduction in gender gap in life expectancy. Nevertheless there is such a significant range of genetic, endocrine, cell and molecular biology differences between men and women with impacts on longevity that we are led to the conclusion that a gender difference in longevity will persist. At age 65 this is probably of the order of 1-2 years.
> Finally we believe that raw data exists which could be analysed to eliminate social and environmental factors and provide a more accurate estimate of the underlying gender gap in longevity. We plan to explore this possibility in the near future.

Pattison et al. (2012) p. 44. Humans have never and can not exist apart from "social and environmental factors." The "underlying gender gap in longevity" is a meaningless concept. Achieving gender equality in the fundamental human capability of being alive is clearly feasible. The remaining important question is whether gender equality is truly a constitutional public value.

[image] Knights killing other knights while women watch and applaud. Illustration from Codex Manesse, Zurich, created between 1305 and 1315. UB Heidelberg, Cod. Pal. germ. 848, fol. 17r. Thanks to the University of Hiedelberg and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Biller, Peter. 2000. The measure of multitude: population in medieval thought. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Clark, Gregory. 2007. A farewell to alms: a brief economic history of the world. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Eisner, Manuel. 2003. "Long-Term Historical Trends in Violent Crime." Crime and Justice. 30: 83-142.

Hajdu, Robert. 1980. "The Position of Noblewomen in the Pays Des Coutumes, 1100-1300." Journal of Family History. 5 (2): 122-144.

Herlihy, David. 1975. "Life Expectancies for Women in Medieval Society." Pp. 1-22 in Rosmarie Thee Morewedge, ed. 1975. The role of women in the Middle Ages: papers of the sixth annual conference of the Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, State University of New York at Binghamton 6-7 May 1972. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press.

Hollingsworth, T. H. 1957. "A Demographic Study of the British Ducal Families." Population Studies. 11 (1): 4.

Leyser, Karl. 1979. Rule and conflict in an early medieval society: Ottonian Saxony. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Meyer, Christian, Christian Lohr, Detlef Gronenborn, and Kurt W. Alt. 2015. "The massacre mass grave of Schöneck-Kilianstädten reveals new insights into collective violence in Early Neolithic Central Europe." PNAS (Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, US). Published online before print August 17, 2015, doi: 10.1073/pnas.1504365112 The online supplement includes the demographic data on the bodies in the grave.

Pattison, John, Klim McPHerson, Colin Blakemore, Steven Haberman. 2012. Life expectancy: Past and future variations by gender in England & Wales. LSAP paper 2. Longevity Science Advisory Panel.

Pinker, Steven. 2011. The better angels of our nature: why violence has declined. New York: Viking.

Wrigley, E.A. 1997. English population history from family reconstitution, 1580-1837. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Is the right sympathetic to the MRM?

barbarossaaaa · 24 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Within the MRM, we often are confronted with a select few right leaning conservative MRA's (they know who they are), that have a habit of dogmatically demanding the the men's movement adopt a decidedly republican bent. They insist on explaining to all MRA's that do not share their ideas about right wing politics, be they apolitical or left leaning, that one simply cannot expect to form any kind of organized push-back against misandry, if not through the injection of all MRA efforts — the expenditure of all MRA energies, through the vehicle of conservative right wing politics.

Being that I am admittedly much more of a MGHOW, than a bonafide MRA, I will be the first to admit that I have voted a long time ago, decidedly in favor of the party of attrition. I acknowledge that political advancement for men is possible and certainly applaud any MRA willing to fight that battle, but i believe that in the end, freedom for men will arise either gradually via the effects of male societal non-participation reaching levels that render society unstable, or some cataclysmic event that brings the downplayed fact of societies dependability on men into the fore.

I do however think it important to debunk this nonsense, this belief that all misandry stems from the big bad left, which will upon its eradication yield to a golden age of right wing utopianism, if only us wayward MRA's would just realize that the right is in fact…right.

First let's talk about what these specific conservative MRA's mean when they say, right and left. From my understanding of it, they judge the left collectively. Meaning simply that although every politician on the left doesn't necessarily support a certain spending project, or this or that bureaucracy inducing bill, the left is judged for what they have shown themselves to be collectively — their overarching trend towards centralized government power, their predilections for big government, their feminism.

This is a standard of scrutiny that "right is right"ers unfortunately do not apply to themselves. When conservative MRA's are confronted with the blatant misandry and male disposability in their political infrastructure, they eagerly tell you about their special brand of conservative libertarianism they espouse in theory, but very rarely in practice. In appraising whether or not one political party benefits men more than any other we must extend to all prospects the same methodology we apply to left wing politics – Likewise the GOP, the conglomerate that makes up right Wing politics must be similarly appraised.

One does not get to judge the left collective, as they should be judged and hand pick their personal brand of right wing politics when a critiuqe is leveled at their political leanings. I make the accusation that the right also perpetuates misandry as frequently as the left does (albeit in different form). In analyzing the tendencies of collective right wing politics, i claim that we will find a predilection for statism and big government rivaling that of the left, as well as a good amount of misandry to boot.

Since I have no problem acknowledging that the left is a bastion of misandry and feminism, it will not suffice simply to state that the right is sympathetic to men, while offering only comparisons to the left's misandry as evidence. The oft parroted "lesser of two evils" meme is inadmissible. I intend to show where misandry permeates right wing politics, without highlighting the deficiencies of the left wing politics. I subject right wing politics to its own independent inquiry.

Seeing as how conservative MRA's will (appropriately) refer to president Obama as a paragon of leftist misandry, my assessment of the right will center on paragons of the right– republican presidents Reagan and Nixon specifically.

I start with Nixon, The first to coin the term "The war on drugs."

Nixon created the DEA — although the war on illicit drugs had been going on since the early 1900's, the detrimental effects of the drug war on men were catalyzed by the passing of a series of anti-drug legislation's by the Nixon and Reagan administrations. Nixon signed into law the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970. This divided illicit drugs into five different categories (schedule 1, 2, 3, etc.) dictated by their potential for abuse and medical application. Marijuana, with its medicinal properties, its zero drug mortality and addiction rate, was designated as a schedule 1 drug along with Methamphetamine LSD, and PCP. The immediate consequence of this was of course to be the criminalization of a widely used harmless substance — an often used tactic by a coercive state designed to justify law "enforcement" expansion.

This landmark legislation accelerated the war on drugs, and was re-enacted again by the Reagan administration for the purposes of asset forfeiture laws, and prison warehousing. These measures were mere stepping stone's however, when compared to the Reagan administration. Nixon put these policies into place, Reagan ran with them.

Reagan signed into law the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, which appropriated $1.7 billion to fight the so called drug crisis — $97 million of which was allocated to build new prisons. The bill reinstated, and vastly expanded upon mandatory minimum sentencing provision's. This made Possession of at least one kilogram of heroin or five kilograms of cocaine punishable by at least ten years in prison. The sale of five grams of crack cocaine now carried a mandatory minimum five-year sentence.

It's not a coincidence that we see Reagan spending just under a a hundred million dollars to build new prisons, while imposing mandatory minimum sentencing for non-violent drug transaction. What he essentially did was to create — out of thin air, a vast and far reaching new standard of prosecutable crime with which to feed (by design) a burgeoning new prison industry. Fast forward to present day and we are now five percent of the world population with an astonishing 25 percent of its prisoners.

This was the genesis of the prison industry, a major conduit of misandry where our brothers are housed like livestock, and peddled to work ridiculous "jobs" for 17 cents an hour. We all know what it really is … slave labor. These policies are directly responsible for why the bureau of justice statistics reports 9 out of 10 non-violent offenders are male, and this is also why the single largest category of total non violent arrests are drug related. This is why the non-violent offender spends an average of 16 months in incarceration, this is why there is a for profit big money prison industry. It all ties back to the policies of the so called iconoclast of limited government and freedom, Ronald Reagan and his failed drug policies that are still largely in effect today.

Lets ask ourselves — under these laws, how many non-violent men are languishing in prison over non-violent drug transactions? How many of them have been or will be raped in prison as a result of their incarceration for a non-violent drug crime? Whenever someone tells you that it most certainly is a right left issue, ask them why the president conservatives most often hold up as the epitome of limited governance passed laws that disproportionately incarcerate men, which in doing so, capitalizes on their labor for pennies on the dollar, whilst exposing them to the threat of violence and rape.

Many conservative apologist's state that Reagan and Nixon didn't start the drug war, that this is something that's been going on since Henry j. Anslinger's reefer madness. They'd be right… to a degree. Graphically, however an incarceration rate vs year graph leaves no room for misconception as to Reagan and Nixon's drug policy being the main catalyst for disproportionate male imprisonment.

Starting at around 1975 we see a spike begin to develop, and just about at 1984 we see a massive exponential spike in male imprisonment, accompanied by a comparatively minuscule amount of female imprisonment that instead rose gradually and then plateaued. Nixon came into office just before 1970, Reagan in 1981. The correlation is clear. The war on drugs disproportionately effects men, it incarcerates them at a rate that can only be described as systematic enslavement and it was the right, Nixon and the small government iconoclast Ronald Reagan that catalyzed this war of imprisonment against men, there can be no doubt about it.

To reiterate, nobody is claiming that the left isn't anti-man and pro-feminist, yet to claim that MRA's should enter into right wing politics, because the left is unequivocally anti male, means that the right — taken as a whole should stand on its own, regardless of the misandry perpetuated by the left as being pro-male and for limited government. We will scrutinize the right on its own merits and as I have demonstrated it was right wing presidential policy that is responsible for a massive incarceration of men, it was right wing policy that has allowed the heavy hand of government, to create this incarceration behemoth.

I'm not going to really touch to heavily on the right's propensity to use men as cannon fodder, but I will mention that it was right wing politicians that initiated the war in iraq in the majority. A war that has demonstrably achieved nothing in terms of making America more prosperous, a war that has killed thousands of Americans and an untold number of Iraqi's. It goes without saying that the vast majority off these war dead on both sides are men. Remember that 215 republicans in the house voted for the Iraq war with only six voting against, as opposed to 82 democrats voting for and 126 voting against. In the senate we saw 48 republicans vote for and one lone republican vote against, while democrats voted 29 for and 21 against. The decision to go to war in Iraq — while supported by both parties was supported to a much greater degree by the right than the left. The result of this in terms of the effect it was having on the male soldiers fighting in Iraq, were rates of military suicides rising to their highest level in 2009, and again in 2011 since records records started being kept in 1980.

The graph clearly shows that during the Clinton years, suicides were marked by a sizable decrease. Immediately upon Bush taking office in 2001 — undoubtedly due to Iraq, the military suicide rates soared until they peaked at the highest point in 2009 when bush left office. As Ive just stated, this reached another high point in 2011 under the Obama administration, the main difference here is that I in no way advocate or proscribe to men that they will find redress of their grievances in the left wing. I understand quite clearly that Clinton also made his significant contributions to the war on drugs, as has Obama. I'm under no illusions, I simply don't trust the right either.

The question I ask those telling us that the right wing is the "party of men" is — whether or not massive incarceration rates, men being used as cannon fodder in unjustifiable wars that do not bring prosperity security or even a defined sense of victory to American and western men, wars that kill men of western and middle eastern descent alike — if you agree with me that all this has come about as a result of predominantly right wing politics, is this not the perpetuation of misandry and of male disposability? are we supposed to hone in on and expose misandry on the left, only to remain willfully ignorant of misandry on the right?

In regards to the not all republicans are like that excuse. This I want to address personally, as I've identified it as what i'll call the right is right'er MRA bait and switch. Conservative MRA's that do this know, when taking the bigger picture into question that the right wing is also for big government and coercive state power, as evidenced by the patriot act and the legislations mentioned above.

What these specific conservative MRA's do, is to highlight an ultra libertarian candidate such as Ron Paul — who because of the anti-freedom, pro big government nature of right wing politics stands no chance of actually getting elected, they'll dole out a token vote for him and when his candidacy inevitably fails as Ron Paul's has, they tow the line and vote for whichever right wing hack gets the presidential nomination. In case of this upcoming presidential election its Mitt Romney. They then rationalize away their vote by performing an "at least hes not a leftist" mental gymnastic.

MRA's must ask themselves why, whenever these so called different "true conservative's" run for anything more influential than a congressional seat, it's the right wing themselves that characterize them as an extremist or a nut job? Isn't that what we saw with Ron Paul? The facts are clear, Ron Paul made a good go of it, said the right things, and talked about fiscal responsibility and limited government. He talked about not policing the world and reducing military spending, His voting record reflected what he was saying consistently.

What did it earn him? Failure — for a second time as per the the votes of the American right wing electorate, and they gave their vote instead to Mitt Romney. If the right wing political infrastructure — what right is right'ers are selling to MRA's as the vehicle for smaller government and individual freedom – will undoubtedly benefit men, then why, when that same political infrastructure was given for the second time, the opportunity to elect what is essentially the ideal fiscally responsible constitutionalist conservative, did they instead opt for Mitt Romney? It shouldn't have to be explained that this isn't just some monumental failure of discernment, but the GOP and the right wing working as its intended to. That being against the wishes of the people, for endless war and defense spending; for the war on drugs, etc…

Do right is right'ers expect MRAs that choose to follow their advice and participate in right wing politics to support people like Mitt Romney when whatever Libertarian candidate they recommend eventually fizzes out and loses, because the republican political party is just as corrupt and defunct as the leftist's they despise? Are they honestly under the impression that a Mitt Romney, or even a Rick Santorum gives fuckall of a damn for men and our issues? Will they really insult the intelligence of MRA's by expecting them to buy into this?

Personally I have no problem with MRA's injecting themselves into the entire political spectrum, wherever they see the possibility of gaining political power for men, and men only, in hopes of equality and male advocacy. There most certainly are MRA's that can talk the right leftist lingo, appearing sufficiently liberal enough to begin injecting in a calculated way, conversation pertaining to male issues, while understanding that the left is a bastion of misandry.

The right is no different, MRA's can go there with the express purposes of securing and promoting male advocacy, while keeping in mid that it, as a political structure will not hesitate to see men as canon fodder whenever necessary. I have no problem with MRA's getting into politics as MRA's, and for MRA's, but what conservative MRA's and many leftist MRA's want to do is to have their political party define the MRA. One needs only to look at what happened, for example to the tea party, a grass roots movement having significantly more mobilization and power than the MRM does currently — what happened to them?

They achieved marginal success with the November elections, but the bigger picture has shown them to have done what — other than being absorbed by the republican party? They lost their identity, they lost their core issues and beliefs, and Mitt Romney — the antithesis of the so-called freedom and liberty the tea party claimed to be about is still going to win the nomination. The last thing I want is for this movement to be absorbed by a fake conservative agenda.

This article was reprinted with permission. It was originally posted at the Men Going Their Own Way Blog, now defunct.

Victim of Botched Circumcision Speaks

AVfM Video Source · 25 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Homeless non-men will receive basic income in Denver, Colorado.

A Voice For Men Videos · 26 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Glossary: non-men.

How to destroy a man

A Voice For Men Videos · 26 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

What Men Do: Chiune Sugihara

A Voice For Men Videos · 26 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Goal Post Episode 06 – What Men Do

A Voice For Men Videos · 27 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The definition of feminism

AVfM Video Source · 27 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Monte Allen Outlines New Strategy For Men: Hetero Male Marriage

A Voice For Men Videos · 28 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We've heard of traditional "It's her special day" gynocentric marriages. We've heard of gay marriage. Lately we've heard of marrying one's cat or dog or even oneself. Its time gents.

Click on the video image below:

The Everyday Hatred of Men: Hegemonic Masculinity

A Voice For Men Videos · 29 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Don’t Be A Bystander: Anti-circumcision advocacy & lobbying in America

A Voice For Men Videos · 30 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Are video games sexist?

AVfM Video Source · 30 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger warning for Social Justice Warriors: woman armed with bricks of logic and fact. Your prejudices might be challenged.

Girls Who Transition are Victims, Boys Who Transition are Victimizers

Janice Fiamengo · 1 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> Discussions of the trans phenomenon show > the gender empathy gap to be alive and well.

"Black pill" awareness is sometimes defined as the realization not only that society cares more about harms to girls and women than harms to boys and men; but also that many people have a visceral reaction against even acknowledging male humanity. Recent discussions about the trans phenomenon seem a case in point.

For the record, I claim no expertise on trans experience. My focus here is on the all-too-predictable manner in which cultural empathy is allotted.

In a recent video about his Twitter suspension for (he suspects) "dead-naming" Elliot Page (formerly Ellen Page, Hollywood starlet) who not long ago showed off a picture with her breasts amputated, Jordan Peterson expressed his opposition to the transgender trend in adolescent girls, alleging that state-sanctioned encouragement of sex transitioning is producing a "psychogenic epidemic among vulnerable young women around the age of puberty." The sex-specificity of Peterson's comment was likely due to the context—Page's picture and triumphant announcement—but my first thought was, why only girls?

.

.Last year, conservative educational institution Prager U published "Why Girls Become Boys," a short video by journalist Abigail Shrier, the author of Irreversible Damage: The Transgender Craze Seducing Our Daughters, published in 2020. Shrier's focus is evident from the titles: girls. Previously, Shrier had been profiled in an interview with Candace Owens when she was still working on the book. Though the interview is now three years old, its canvassing of teen transitioning—in a discussion that moves from concern about girls being "seduced" into trans, to anger at society's failure to protect girls from boys who transition—provides a fairly accurate representation, I believe, of conservative positioning on this subject. Girls who transition are seen as victims; while boys who transition are seen (if they are seen at all) as predators.This double emphasis is clear in the interview. Shrier and Owens describe the collusion of media influencers, the public school system, woke punditry, and medical authorities to encourage girls (but not boys, it seems) to consider their gender identity "fluid." Feelings of discomfort are too readily interpreted as signs of a trans identity. Girls can be made to believe themselves trans very quickly, sometimes simply from viewing one or more internet videos; and schools are not required to tell parents if their daughter begins identifying as male. From age fifteen, girls can find gender clinics willing to prescribe testosterone without their parents' consent; a girl can have her breasts amputated as early as age sixteen. The lifetime of dependency on hormones (their consequences unknown), the risky surgeries, and the tragic missed opportunities—of motherhood in particular, but even of having breasts—were emphasized by both pundits.

It's almost impossible to imagine these two women discussing the tragedy of losing a penis, of being denied the opportunity to become a father, of being denied the joy of male sexuality.

From this point, the conversation moved seamlessly into discussing the victimhood of girls forced to share their private spaces—and of course their sporting competitions—with biological males (often called "men" as in "Men are invading girls' sports"). These males are not discussed as vulnerable innocents duped into taking body-altering hormones or undergoing dangerous surgeries. No imaginative effort was spent on why these boys want to live as trans female. The underlying assumption seemed to be that boys' transition, far from being an attempt to relieve real distress, is an act of appropriation of female experience. The boys were depicted as aggressors who invade girls' locker-rooms and deny girls opportunities (or, even worse, masquerade as trans in order to prey on girls sexually). Are there boys made uncomfortable in their change rooms or other private spaces by the presence of biological girls? The question seems never to have occurred to Shrier and Owens.

.

Shrier and Owens agree in decrying feminism for failing to protect girls and for failing (allegedly) to affirm femininity and girlhood. "Girls aren't being told how wonderful it is to be a girl!" Their own feminist—or at least female-centered—assumptions are clearly evident in their conviction that the trans phenomenon is about multiple harms to females, harms which must always take precedence over the legitimate needs and experiences of males. And in fact, contrary to what Shrier and Owens seem to believe, there are many feminists who vehemently denounce biological male incursions into female bodies and spaces; many of them, such as Meghan Murphy, Julie Bindel, and Sheila Jeffreys, to name only a few, advocate from an avowedly anti-male perspective.

Shrier might respond that the overwhelming majority of adolescents who believe themselves to be trans are female (as she states in her Prager U video). This may be true (a recent Psychology Today article puts the number at greater than 80% female) but does not mitigate my objection. Teen suicide is about 80% male (more on this later), but it is hard to imagine concerned pundits ignoring the troubles of girls. Many discussions of teen suicide, in fact, make much of the fact that girls attempt suicide more often than boys, downplaying the fact that boys carry out their suicides in such distinctively high numbers. Don't get me wrong: I have no objection to a focus on girls' difficulties in adolescence—except when it improperly ignores and even maligns boys.

In castigating feminism's failure, Shrier and Owens fall back on the idea that women fought for "equality" for a hundred years and are now allowing "the patriarchy" to roll back the gains women achieved. Here their profound misunderstanding of feminism is apparent. Feminism has for decades offered not common-sense equality but instead an assertion of competing claims of victimhood in which moral status is finely calibrated and "intersectional." The most sought-after identities are those in which the highest number of "oppressed" qualities can be claimed. Female is still elevated in relation to male, certainly, but is now only one category of preferred being amongst many others. As the attack on Karens (annoying white women) has demonstrated, identity vectors other than female can confer greater victim-power: homosexual bests heterosexual, black is superior to white, and trans is far more desirable than "cisgender."

Over the years, feminism has been teaching the power of intersectional victimhood to women and girls at an ever-younger age, and no one is more sensitive to identity status (and more vicious in enforcing it) than pubescent girls. It has ever been thus, and trans is the latest—perhaps the most destructive—manifestation of moral victimhood, for which feminist identity politics must take a large share of responsibility.

Still, what about the boys? Can it really be that boys have been untouched by feminism's relentless anti-male propaganda, especially the last decade of "unlearning white male privilege" and "The future is female," of "Ban Bossy" and the Masculinity Confession Booth, of "Take Our Daughters to Work Day" and "#MeToo," of "Violence against women is a men's issue" and "I bathe in male tears," of #YesAllMen, "Why Can't We Hate Men?" and "Why I Hate Men," as well as countless other overt expressions of anti-male animus condoned or celebrated in our culture? Surely some of the boys who decide to transition have taken these messages to heart?

Perhaps suicide, rather than trans identity, has been the dominant young male response to the assault on their masculinity. In 2019, in the same month that Owens and Shrier discussed girls and transitioning, the Journal of the American Medical Association reported “a spike in suicides among teen boys,” a new escalation in young male self-destruction.

The silence on that front by concerned conservatives remains deafening.

* * *

The Fiamengo File is a reader-supported publication. To receive new posts and support this work, consider becoming a free or paid subscriber.

Woketards and The Bard

Doug Mortimer · 2 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Shakespeare occupies a unique place in educational circles. Even though he is a dead white male (406 years ago, if you're keeping score), his plays are so embedded in western culture, it is impossible to ban him from the curriculum.

High school English students are doubtless made aware of the fact that in Shakespeare's day, women did not appear on stage and that male actors took on the female roles. Much like the phrase "Islam is right about women," Shakespeare is a vehicle for woke cognitive dissonance, as the Elizabethan theater was a feminist nightmare but also a trans paradise!

Mistaken identity and cross-dressing are recurring themes in comedy; it was true in Shakespeare's day (e.g., The Twelfth Night and As You Like It), and it was true up till recent years when gender-bending transitioned from farcical to political. One wonders how many tedious term papers are written today about gender fluidity in Shakespeare's plays.

I'm no Shakespeare scholar, but I've always maintained that if you want to understand his plays, it is imperative to have a grasp of the Elizabethan ethos. If the play takes place in Denmark circa 1200 A.D. (as does Hamlet), it wouldn't hurt to have at least a cursory concept of what life was like in that time and place.

Ethnic inaccuracy (referred to as non-traditional casting) has long been evident in performances of Shakespeare's plays. Within the past year, Macbeth and Macduff were both black (Denzel Washington and Corey Hawkins) in Joel Coen's film adaptation last year and no one noticed, or should I say everyone pretended not to notice. Of course, if a Scotsman were cast as Othello, there would be hell to pay.

Total ethnic transformation, however, is something else altogether. Famously, Orson Welles once staged an all-black Macbeth with a Haiti-like island standing in for Scotland and voodoo subbing for witchcraft. The play was effectively usurped, and it became more about the director than the playwright. Welles did this at age 20 way back in 1936.

If Welles was looking to attract attention, it worked. He became the boy wonder of Broadway and, a few years later, of Hollywood. His efforts were subsidized by the Federal Theater Project, an offshoot of President Franklin Roosevelt's Works Project Administration. Notably, when Welles filmed Macbeth in 1948, the production was in line with the original story. By then Welles was no longer a boy wonder. It was difficult enough for him to persuade B-movie studio Republic Pictures to finance a traditional Macbeth. A cinema version of his Voodoo Macbeth had no chance.

The usual excuse for tinkering with Shakespeare today is that his plays must be made relevant to contemporary audiences. In essence, they are saying that the play has value only in reference to contemporary issues. Actually, audiences will more than likely find parallels between Shakespeare's characters and contemporary political figures. Lady Macbeth might remind you of Hillary Clinton; King Lear might evoke Joe Biden, and Donald Trump might be reminiscent of Julius Caesar (in 2017 a New York Shakespeare in the Park production took pains to cast a Trump lookalike in the title role). There's no need for a theater director to rub your nose in it, but they can't help themselves.

Theater is a particularly noxious medium due to the power of directors, who can take a crowbar to Shakespeare or any other playwright with impunity. Contrast this with attending an exhibition at your local museum. If you go to art exhibits, you might notice that curators sometimes insert woke themes into the placards or digital playback devices that accompany the exhibits. But they cannot alter the original paintings…not if they want to keep on being curators. Unfortunately, this is not the case with theater.

It is a rare director today who can stage a Shakespeare play with fidelity to the material. The Bard has long been victimized by corruption. In fact, the first time I ever saw a Shakespeare play (I think it was 1966), the director, for whatever reason, decided to stage Hamlet during the Regency Period (the Jane Austen era). I also remember a local Shakespeare festival when the director decided that it would be cool to transform the thanes of Macbeth to Texas cattle barons. The cinema has given us Joe MacBeth (1955), a gangster movie, and Throne of Blood (1957), in which Akira Kurosawa subs feudal Japan for 11th Century Scotland. No stigma attached to cultural appropriation in those days.

Then there are the various versions of Macbeth done in the nude. That's right, Scotland, with damp, drafty castles, and overcast, chilly heaths at a latitude roughly equivalent to Moscow and Anchorage, Alaska. Can't think of a better clothing optional environment. Prithee, which way to the hot tub, m'lord?

If critics take nude Macbeth seriously, what would they consider a bridge too far? Hell, I suppose you could do Shakespeare with a wheelchair-bound cast. Did wheelchairs exist in Shakespeare's day? I don't know, but if you ask that question, you'll out yourself as a philistine. Don't you know our director is a visionary? All must kneel!

On occasion there are attempts to perform Shakespeare as it was done at the Globe Theater in the Elizabethan era. Recreations of the Globe have appeared in such unlikely locales as San Diego and Odessa, Texas. Even so, one wonders if any productions at these venues have been done old school with all-male casts? If so, I suspect it would not be praised as an authentic recreation but as another example of male oppression. (There is a trend afoot to banish the word "actress" and to use "actor" to refer to all people who act; the potential for confusion is obvious.)

Casting actresses in male roles goes back at least as far as Sarah Bernhardt playing Hamlet in the 19th Century. But would it be possible to stage Hamlet with women exclusively? It is not only possible, it is a fact. Shakespeare Dallas has just done it! If any local actors (or should I say actors who identify as male) are displeased with this, they are savvy enough to keep their mouths shut. Raphael Parry, the Executive Director of Shakespeare Dallas, has described it as "an exciting step." You see, it "provides much more access to the incredibly talented performers in our community, who are not traditionally offered these roles due to their gender representation." In other words, there's no such thing as miscasting. In truth, a little Googling will establish that all-female Shakespeare productions are nothing new. Dallasites would be loath to admit it, but they are typically trend-followers, not trend-setters.

Christie Vela, the director of the Hamlet clambake, once pondered an all-female version of 12 Angry Men, a classic teleplay/screenplay by Reginald Rose. Given her enthusiasm for flipping genders, I guess she would also deem it acceptable – nay, laudable! – to stage The Women, Clare Booth Luce's classic 1936 comedy of manners, with an all-male cast. The cast of characters includes 33 roles, and not one of them is earmarked for an actor who identifies as male.

Well, it would be a courageous director indeed who tried to gender-bend that play. The protests outside the theater would likely exhibit more emoting than anything that took place on stage. One could justify the all-male cast as an attempt to stage The Women as it might have been done in Shakespeare's day. Hell, you could even put them in Elizabethan costumes. Talk about drama queens!

Today they call this sort of thing re-imagining. In fact, it's all the rage! But some re-imaginings are more equal than others. Replacing 33 actors who identify as women with 33 actors who identify as men is absolutely anathema. Why? Well, for starters, it exacerbates the wage gap! Remember the old Chinese maxim that a journey of 1,000 miles begins by following the money.

Finances aside, it is politically acceptable to displace men at every opportunity but never women. In truth, there's very little chance that women will be replaced in the art world. That's because the art establishment is an old girls network. It doesn't take too much research to verify that assertion.

ACTX (Arts and Culture Texas) is a regional publication that keeps me informed of all the lively arts functions in the State of Texas. While I appreciate the information on museum exhibits involving old masters, I can't help but note that all the articles on contemporary arts involve feminism or some other form of wokeness in one medium or another. The current issue, for example, includes "New and Rediscovered Voices: Dallas Symphony Orchestra Celebrates Women in Fall Concerts," and "Loud and Clear: Vignette Art Fair Amplifies Women's Voices." Not surprisingly, closer scrutiny of these and other articles reveals a predominance of female directors, editors, supervisors, and curators.

If you are a heterosexual male with artistic ambitions, seldom is heard an encouraging word. Of course, the young artist can always meekly submit to the establishment, yet it is undeniable that the highest levels of artistic achievement are almost exclusively male, and they didn't get there by going along to get along. Swimming upstream is almost always part and parcel of greatness.

I'm guessing that the overwhelming majority of readers of this web site do not attend plays or go to art galleries. When theaters and galleries shut down for the Covid pandemic, it probably affected you not a whit. To wit: The aforementioned ACTX publication contained an article entitled "The Difficult Past and Hopeful Future of Latinx Theater in Dallas."

Of the 1,325,691 people in Dallas, 36.8% are Hispanic. That works out to 487,854 people – certainly enough to support a Spanish-language theater if they were interested in doing so. Yet I have no doubt that my Mexican-American neighbors would be surprised to learn that Latinx Theater is a thing. I would be even more surprised if they cared. In fact, Latinx Theater is about as irrelevant to local Latinos as contemporary English-language theater is to the local Anglos.

As the article makes clear, it is difficult it is to secure funding for Spanish language theater productions. As with the Anglo theater groups, they must be subsidized. When arts groups need to be subsidized, the elites step up to the plate. Thus the elites dictate what the people can see. This system empowers not the Latinos, very few of whom will ever show up for live theaters, but the elites and the artists they elect to support. Playwrights whose works would never find an audience go to the head of the line, as do directors mining classic plays for woke nuggets.

In truth, the lively arts are on life support; without grants from local arts groups, subsidies from corporations, and donations from NGO's, they would disappear. Good riddance, one might say. But it doesn't have to boil down to woke arts or no arts all.

In mainstream commerce, where corporations are bowing down to the DEI manifesto, an alternative economy is stirring. It takes a little research, but one can indeed find wireless carriers, banks, and assorted businesses that don't care about being on the right side of history.

In the arts world, the solution is for men to turn away from the arts establishment and run their own arts groups. Of course, they will never get any grants, but they can operate in total freedom. If they can generate enough revenue through sales, then the establishment's disapproval is irrelevant…unless the FBI declares them domestic terrorists. A few years ago that would have sounded far-fetched. Not anymore.

The get woke/go broke maxim is most evident in the cinema. Even though movie studio accounting is often described as more "creative" than the films they track, producers can't help but notice all the red ink. Movies are not subsidized; they have to pay their own way. Above and beyond production costs, there are post-production costs of duplication and distribution. With some movies, marketing costs more than the production budget.

In August, Batgirl, a $90 million production, was deemed a turkey and shelved. To release and promote it would have been throwing good money after bad. It made more sense for Warner Brothers to write it off and get a tax break than to release it.

In a movie theater if nobody shows up for a scheduled showing, the film is not shown (those projector lamps are expensive). In live theater, the show must go on even if no one shows up. Under the laws of economics, that should mean the show would close quickly. If the show is subsidized, however, it can playout its scheduled run.

Of course, this was not the case in Shakespeare's day. If the public paid to see your plays, all well and good; you lived to write another play; if not, Queen Elizabeth would not open the royal coffers to underwrite your deathless dialogue.

Totally ignoring art is a bit like going MGTOW. Given the contemporary situation, it makes perfect sense in the short run, but in the long run, it is self-destructive. Has there ever been a culture in world history without arts? Art is fundamental to culture, right up there with language, religion, folkways, and cuisine. Men should not just be involved in culture, they should be running the show.

Well, enough blue-sky thinking. What will the woke aesthetes despoil next? How about The Taming of the Shrew? Like The Merchant of Venice, this play has always been problematical for progressives. Trigger warnings and contextual prefaces are a must. How about re-imaging Kate the shrew as male and her suitor Petruchio as female?

Oh, wait…this just in. the Royal Shakespeare Company has already done this. They're way ahead of me.

Guess that's why they're called progressives.

U.S. Psychologists by Gender, 1980-2020

A Voice for Men · 2 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Published on Reddit here.

Divorce under Communism

A Voice For Men Videos · 3 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Parental Alienation Syndrome

Editorial Staff · 4 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This article appeared as a blog post on AVFM and Antimisandry.com by one of our old forum members Deidre. It is edited and republished here with her permission. –Ed

Have you ever felt like an outcast? Perhaps, looking back during your childhood, you were at times, the odd person out. It's a very uncomfortable feeling and most of the time, people who have been alienated from family members, friends, coworkers, etc. are left confused as to what they have done to have been banished from the fold. There is a type of alienation however, that is insanely dangerous and damaging, and that is parental alienation. And, it leads to what is commonly referred to as "parental alienation syndrome."

The root cause of the syndrome is when a custodial parent indirectly or deliberately thwarts the relationship between the non-custodial parent and his/her child, causing the child to wish no longer to spend much or any time with the non-custodial parent. This is done through a number of manipulative tactics by the custodial parent, usually as a form of revenge, to turn the child(ren) away from the non-custodial parent. The majority of alienated parents are fathers, which comes as no surprise since mothers are usually given greater legal custodial rights over their children, than fathers.

I know of a few men, online and offline, who are victims of being estranged from their children, due to the reprehensible behavior of the parent who has sole custody. When did the court system start viewing children as property? It seems that in divorces these days, kids are treated as bargaining chips in a vindictive battle, suffering alongside the alienated parent. I've been researching a bit about this epidemic and found some very insightful advice that is worth posting here, for those parents (namely fathers) who find themselves in despair, and have all but lost hope in ever having a close, consistent relationship with their children.

Parental alienation is categorized into three separate tiers of severity. Before a boxer gets into the ring to fight his opponent, he tends to know beforehand what he's up against. Likewise, these tiers of severity can help an alienated parent figure out what he is up against, as well.

The first type of severity falls under the phrase "naïve alienator." This type of alienator has a rather nonchalant view of parenting in general, and might say something to the effect of "I'm not made of money, when you see your father next, ask him to buy you a new cell phone." If said often enough, the child gets the sense that dad is a utility, and mom is fed up with having to take care of him/her. Eventually, the child will see his/her dad as little more than a money provider and errand boy – an image that evolved over time by the consistent drip of derogatory comments from the mother about the father.

The second type of severity is something counselors call the "active alienator." This type of alienation is harsher than the naïve alienator and usually comes out like this to a child "Don't tell your father I'm dating someone, he's a cheap jerk and will withhold money from you. You don't want that to happen do you?" Active alienators are typically angry, vengeful and could be categorized as narcissistic. Children who are victims of these types of tactics, quickly start seeing their dads as their mothers do – a possible enemy who is only looking out for himself.

The most dangerous and severe of the alienation types is what is known as the "obsessed alienator." This type of parent will stop at nothing to destroy the relationship between the non-custodial parent, and the child(ren). Obsessed alienators are dubbed this because they are ruthless in their behaviors against their exes and usually try to bankrupt them through incessant court battles. Most likely these types have narcissistic personality disorder, because they are unafraid of the court system, and will do virtually anything to keep the non-custodial parent away from their kids. The children of an obsessed alienator usually end up having great disdain for the alienated parent, because children simply can't process things as adults do, and are left feeling abandoned by the alienated parent. From what I've read, this type is the one that has the greatest capacity to do the most harm to a child, for once the child accepts what the custodial parent is saying about the other parent, it will be a long road to repairing that relationship, if possible at all.

So, what should a father do if he suspects that his ex is purposely turning his kids against him? What avenues of recourse can he find to help support him in helping his children to offset the damage that the alienating parent is doing? This is quite simply put, emotional child abuse at the hands of the custodial parent. Because emotional abuse, in general, is a harder thing to prove than physical abuse, and also because parental alienating syndrome is challenging to pin down with an actual diagnosis by a trained counselor/doctor – the custodial parent continues to get away with distancing the non-custodial parent, and increasing the harm being done to the child. Upon discussing this with an online friend who is going through a difficult custody battle with his ex, he shared that he is trying to get his attorney to insist that his children seek counseling, mandated by the courts. One would hope that in doing so, the children will open up in an honest way in a counseling situation, but it depends on how badly the children's opinion of their father, has been damaged. That said, it stands to reason that it is worth pushing forward in the court system, to see if judges finally start opening their eyes as to parent alienation being a form of child abuse. If it were me going through such a difficult situation, I'd look for an attorney who specializes in parental alienation syndrome cases, and see what their track record has been. Also, finding men's support groups to assist with support and encouragement on an emotional level, as dads go through their ordeals, will be very helpful, as well. It is incredibly disconcerting to be painted in a light that is not true, especially to one's children. Most fathers feel powerless in such dilemmas because the custodial parent has what can be deemed as control over their children, directing them on how to think of their fathers, and poisoning their minds as to why their fathers aren't going to be in their lives.

I've come to the conclusion in life, that there are no words at times to convey how inhumane some people can be to others. To use one's child to strike back or seek revenge on an ex-spouse is deplorable. Times may seem bleak, but there has to be a way to rise above these injustices, to give children a better life. Children need both of their parents, present and active in their lives, to foster a healthy upbringing. No child should have to endure parental alienation syndrome…not ever.

"Children seldom misquote their parents. In fact, they usually repeat word for word, what their parents shouldn't have said." – Unknown

A helpful link: http://www.fact.on.ca/Info/pas/gardnr98.htm

Are the Cards Stacked Against Men? Censored Filmmaker Speaks Out

A Voice For Men Videos · 4 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Are men and fathers losing their way in our society? In 2017 Jesse Lee Peterson sat down with filmmaker Cassie Jaye to discuss her eye-opening documentary, The Red Pill, which examines the impact of feminism on men. Do fathers get a fair shot at raising their kids? Does our society set men up for success or failure? Are Western women experiencing major disadvantages compared to Western men? Jesse and Cassie tackle this and much more on this episode of TheFallenState TV.

Feminists attack cathedral – 2013

Robert Brockway · 5 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In this video from 2013 we see feminist women attacking a church and assaulting a group of Christian men who have surrounded the church. The men show great restraint.

Elizabeth Hobson: Celebrating male role-models

A Voice For Men Videos · 6 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original Support Elizabeth by donating to her Patreon

SCUM Manifested

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 7 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Hate-Filled Legacy of Valerie Solanas

Radical feminism can be traced more or less back to Valerie Solanas, author of the SCUM Manifesto. It was first published in 1967, though Solanas began drafting it in about 1959 or 60. In the Manifesto, Solanas calls on women to rise up against men who she sees as biologically inferior and responsible for all of the world's problems. However, she doesn't end there. She refers to the male as "a biological accident" and the Y-chromosome as being an incomplete X-chromosome, making the male an incomplete female. She further calls for men to be exterminated and to assist in eliminating themselves by eliminating each other.

There are those who have stated that this Manifesto is little more than a parody of "patriarchy" or a work of satire. They claim to view it as an anti-patriarchal statement, but state that the calls for the elimination of men should not be taken seriously. However, while the work may contain elements of parody and satire, these devices are used to emphasize the message, not to indicate that the author wasn't serious. Solanas' own history would indicate this as she shot pop artist Andy Warhol, art critic Mario Amaya, and attempted to shoot Warhol's manager Fred Hughes on June 3, 1968, attempting to kill them. In 1977, she claimed that her views had not changed since the Manifesto was published, indicating that she believed what she had written.

Further evidence that the SCUM Manifesto was to be taken seriously is found in the reaction of feminist leaders and organizations to Solanas' Manifesto and shooting of Andy Warhol. Ti-Grace Atkinson, radical feminist and president of the New York chapter of NOW, called Solanas "the first outstanding champion of women's rights" and heralded her as "a 'heroine' of the women's movement." Robin Morgan, former editor of Ms Magazine, included excerpts in her book, Sisterhood is Powerful. Other feminist authors such as Amanda Third and Catherine Lord have credited her with creating radical feminism and have stated that the feminist movement would not have occurred if it hadn't been for Valerie Solanas. There have also been several books, plays, and movies glorifying Solanas and her actions.

There are also those who would dispute the acronym that SCUM stands for the Society for Cutting Up Men. While this is not spelled out within the document itself, It was stated on the cover of her self-published version in 1967. Later, Solanas would deny that she intended the acronym. Instead she stated that there was no such organization, nor would there ever be. SCUM was a state of mind. It was meant as a reference to empowered women who considered themselves fit to rule.

The legacy of the SCUM Manifesto has continued. It was published as late as 2004 (perhaps since then, though I don't have a record of it) and has been translated into several languages. Currently there are organizations based on SCUM existing in Sweden (producing materials for high school students) and on the internet (RadfemHub) It has impacted society in many ways which will be outlined below.

In New York in 1967 at about the same time Solanas was publishing the SCUM Manifesto, Shulamith Firestone, Pam Allen, Carol Hanish, and Robin Morgan founded a group called New York Radical Women. This short-lived organization adopted a radical feminist ideology that emphasized the patriarchal oppression of women by men similar to that outlined in the SCUM Manifesto. They claimed that men exercised social dominance over women by creating social roles that divided privilege and power by gender. This group is often credited with the first bra burning at the 1968 Miss America Pageant. However, rather than burn them, they tossed bras and other artifacts of patriarchal oppression into a garbage can. Firestone would move on to found Redstockings and New York Radical Feminists while Morgan would become more involved in feminist activism and writing. Hanish would help found Redstockings and would later edit a journal called Meeting Ground in which she would publish an essay called The Personal is Political and is sometimes incorrectly credited with coining that phrase, although she undoubtedly helped popularize it.

In 1969, the radical feminist organization Redstockings published its Redstockings Manifesto. The influence of SCUM is unmistakable. It is considerably less violent, but no less hateful. It characterizes "all men" as oppressors of women. It characterizes individual male-female relationships as "class relationship(s)" and provides that all individual male-female conflicts are political, not personal and "can only be solved collectively." Men are identified as the agents of oppression and the users of physical force to subjugate women. "All power structures throughout history have been male-dominated and male-oriented. Men have controlled all political, economic and cultural institutions and backed up this control with physical force." In SCUM, Solanas outlines a similar concept:

> "Authority and Government: Having no sense of right and wrong … the male feels a need for external guidance and control. So he created authorities — priests, experts, bosses, leaders, etc — and government… he sees to it that all authorities are male."

Redstockings states: "We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own… In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors. We will not ask what is "revolutionary" or "reformist," only what is good for women."

This is quite similar to Solanas' call for men to assist in their own extermination and /or work towards women's goals:

> "SCUM will kill all men who are not in the Men's Auxiliary of SCUM. Men in the Men's Auxiliary are those men who are working diligently to eliminate themselves, men who, regardless of their motives, do good, men who are playing pall[sic] with SCUM. A few examples of the men in the Men's Auxiliary are: men who kill men; biological scientists who are working on constructive programs, as opposed to biological warfare; journalists, writers, editors, publishers and producers who disseminate and promote ideas that will lead to the achievement of SCUM's goals…"

Redstockings did not take the ideology to the same extreme as Solanas, but the hatred that Solanas felt towards men was obviously present as was Solanas' influence. The prevailing attitude of the SCUM Manifesto is that men are to blame for everything wrong in the world and that ridding the world of men will automatically result in improvement. The first portion of this was outlined by Carol Hanish in The Personal is Political in 1969. Hanish states:

> "The most important is getting rid of self-blame. Can you imagine what would happen if women, blacks, and workers (my definition of worker is anyone who has to work for a living as opposed to those who don't. All women are workers) would-stop blaming ourselves for our sad situations? …We are only starting to stop blaming ourselves."

She later adds: "Women, like blacks, workers, must stop blaming ourselves for our "failures."" Of course if women aren't to blame for their own condition or their own failures, who is? The Redstocking Manifesto provides the answer: men. "Women's submission is not the result of brain-washing, stupidity or mental illness but of continual, daily pressure from men. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men." The result of this "blame shifting" is that women can deny responsibility for their actions. Any wrong committed by women (or a woman) can be blamed on men or "The Patriarchy." This "blame shift" has led to disastrous legal consequences for men; most notably in Family Law, domestic violence, rape and sexual assault laws.

But while Redstockings was not as extreme as SCUM (at least publically), some of its organizers were. Robin Morgan would attack marriage as the basis for all sexism "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage." She would also help lead the charge to define all sex as rape "I claim that rape exists any time sexual intercourse occurs when it has not been initiated by the woman, out of her own genuine affection and desire." Her hatred for men was nearly as intense as that of Solanas "I feel that "man-hating" is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them."

In her Manifesto, Solanas spends a great deal of time demeaning and demonizing men. She begins:

> "The male is a biological accident: the Y (male) gene is an incomplete X (female) gene, that is, it has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.
>
> The male is completely egocentric, trapped inside himself, incapable of empathizing or identifying with others, or love, friendship, affection of tenderness. He is a completely isolated unit, incapable of rapport with anyone. His responses are entirely visceral, not cerebral; his intelligence is a mere tool in the services of his drives and needs; he is incapable of mental passion, mental interaction; he can't relate to anything other than his own physical sensations. He is a half-dead, unresponsive lump, incapable of giving or receiving pleasure or happiness; consequently, he is at best an utter bore, an inoffensive blob, since only those capable of absorption in others can be charming. He is trapped in a twilight zone halfway between humans and apes, and is far worse off than the apes because, unlike the apes, he is capable of a large array of negative feelings — hate, jealousy, contempt, disgust, guilt, shame, doubt — and moreover, he is aware of what he is and what he isn't."

She then continues:

> "Eaten up with guilt, shame, fears and insecurities and obtaining, if he's lucky, a barely perceptible physical feeling, the male is, nonetheless, obsessed with screwing; he'll swim through a river of snot, wade nostril-deep through a mile of vomit, if he thinks there'll be a friendly pussy awaiting him. He'll screw a woman he despises, any snaggle-toothed hag, and furthermore, pay for the opportunity. Why? Relieving physical tension isn't the answer, as masturbation suffices for that. It's not ego satisfaction; that doesn't explain screwing corpses and babies."
>
> "Fatherhood and Mental Illness (fear, cowardice, timidity, humility, insecurity, passivity): Mother wants what's best for her kids; Daddy only wants what's best for Daddy, that is peace and quiet, pandering to his delusion of dignity (`respect'), a good reflection on himself (status) and the opportunity to control and manipulate, or, if he's an `enlightened' father, to `give guidance'. His daughter, in addition, he wants sexually — he givers her hand in marriage; the other part is for him."

The demonizing of men, turning them into something sub-human and obsessed with sex would be a recurring theme of radical feminism. The obsession with sex would evolve into "all men are rapists" or "all men use rape to control all women." The desire to "control and manipulate" would become the "power and control" of the domestic violence industry. The concept of the male as a biological accident sets the stage for concepts of "testosterone poisoning" and "toxic masculinity." Both are concepts claiming that being male is by its very nature, a disease.

> "If men were wise they would seek to become really female, would do intensive biological research that would lead to me, by means of operations on the brain and nervous system, being able t to be transformed in psyche, as well as body, into women."

This lays the foundation for the Redstocking Manifesto's claim that women need not change, but men must be changed. The feminist call for masculinity and manhood to be "redefined" stems from this concept as well. The "redefinition" is the changing of men.

> "Eliminate men and women will shape up. Women are improvable; men are no[t]."

Here we have the antecedent of “the personal is political,” a statement that relieves women from any personal responsibility for their actions and places the blame on “patriarchy,” the elimination of which will result (by default) in a better world and an improved woman.

Susan Brownmiller was another product of New York Radical Women and New York Radical Feminists, both associated with Redstockings. She would later write Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape in which she would proclaim that all men use rape and the fear of rape to keep all women in a state of fear in order to perpetuate male dominance. This position would be the logical next step to Solanas’ assertion that men are sex-crazed animals that “[screw] corpses and babies” and desire their daughters (sexually).

Andrea Dworkin, a radical feminist crusader against pornography, may have also been influenced indirectly by Solanas and SCUM. While living in Europe in the late 60’s, she was introduced to the writings of Shulamith Firestone and Robin Morgan, both members of Redstockings. Dworkin also worked closely with Gloria Steinem and Catharine MacKinnon in her opposition to pornography as a form of sexual discrimination that reinforces male dominance over women and as such promotes violence against women. Steinem had also worked with former Redstocking Robin Morgan to found the Women’s Media Center.

Other radical feminists who appear to be under the influence of Solanas, but are not easily connected are Mary Daly, a radical feminist professor at Boston College who was removed from her position after refusing to admit male students to her advance courses in feminism, may also have been influenced by Solanas and her Manifesto. Daly was once quoted as stating “If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males.” This was apparently a response to a statement by Sally Miller Gearhart who advocated reducing and maintaining the male population at 10% of the human population. Gearhart helped establish on of the first women’s studies programs in the US while teaching at San Francisco State. There could be little doubt that she was aware of Valerie Solanas and the SCUM Manifesto. Although it is unclear as to when Solanas moved to San Francisco, that is where she was residing when she died in 1988.

The legacy of Valerie Solanas is found in the writings of Morgan, Dworkin, Firestone, Hanish, Brownmiller, Daly, Gearhart, MacKinnon, Steinem et al. But it doesn’t stop there. Many of these women have led the charge on domestic violence and rape law reforms that have done away with basic rights to due process and fair, impartial trials. MacKinnon pioneered sexual harassment law and may have been the one to invent the term. The child abuse hysteria of the 80’s may have been a direct result of the anti-porn crusade of Dworkin, MacKinnon, and Steinem.

The next generation of misandrists is already here. These are women like Sharon Osborne and the other women of “The Talk” who joked on national television when Catherine Becker sexually mutilated her husband after drugging him. They are the gender feminists of Sweden who open state-sponsored schools that portend to teach equality by emphasizing homosexual relationships and nearly excluding heteronormative relationships from the curriculum. They are the Swedish members of SCUM who produce videos depicting the brutal and senseless murder of men, then call upon women to “do their part.” They are Swedish feminists such as Ireen von Wachenfeldt, chairwomen of the National Organization for Women’s Shelters who have professed adherence to the SCUM Manifesto as have other prominent Swedish government officials such as former Minister of Gender Equality Margareta Winberg, and Professor Eva Lungren. Wachenfeldt publically stated “‘All men are animals…All men are emotional parasites… The male of the species is a biological disaster… To call a man an animal is to pay him a compliment.” They are the women of RadFemHub; Danielle Pynnonen, Kat Pinder, Isabelle Moreira, Mary Syrett, Julie LeComte, Lorraine Allen, Laila Namdarkhan, Pam O’Shaughnesey who are authors, teachers, childcare workers, and government officials from around the globe plotting and planning the destruction of the male sex via eugenics, murder, selective abortion, etc. There are Hugo Schwyzer, Michael Kimmel, Tom Matlack, The Conscious Men and many other men who might be considered the Men’s Auxiliary of SCUM as they support and defend the hate movement known as feminism. Solanas has indeed left a legacy. It’s a legacy of misandrous hatred and violence that by its own admission can only result in the destruction of the entire human race, men and women alike.

> “Why produce even females? Why should there be future generations? What is their purpose? When aging and death are eliminated, why continue to reproduce? Why should we care what happens when we’re dead? Why should we care that there is no younger generation to succeed us.” – Valerie Solanas, SCUM Manifesto.

[Addendum: The name of Evin Rubar was mistakenly included in the list of radical feminists. Instead of being a radical feminist, Evin was attempting to expose them. I apologize for the error. – TDOM

“Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW” – a book review

Aaron Clarey · 8 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

“Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW” is a new book released by Peter Wright and Paul Elam, and (as far as my research shows me) is the first serious publication that attempts to define, explain, and introduce MGTOW to the general public, as well as become sort of a “constitution” of the Men Going Their Own Way movement.

It is incredibly well written, clear, and succinct, and necessarily so as it attempts to lay down the theoretical foundations for an embryonic concept that will only be damaged if more concrete measures were made to define it. This immediately debunks Mr. Elam’s and Mr. Wright’s critics (who claim the authors are trying to claim MGTOW for their own and that it can’t be defined) as nearly two full chapters are dedicated to explaining how MGTOW is similar to an open source software wherein nobody can claim rights to it. After much explaining and intellectual honesty, I believe they manage to best define it as “male self-determination” and am inclined to agree.

With definitions out of the way, the book then delves into many aspects of traits of MGTOW laying down the logic, reason, empiricism, history, psychology, economic and other causes for the MGTOW phenomenon. I was particularly impressed with the amount of research that went into the historical (sometimes, ancient) study of “bachelors,” “bachelor theory,” and the bachelor lifestyle, providing not just historical perspective, but a shocking insight into society’s past psychological relationship with bachelors (for example “bachelor taxes” and the presumption bachelors some how owed it to society to marry and breed). I was also very impressed with the time dedicated towards pair bonding and attachment. The reason for this is that the same critics who berate Elam and Wright for daring to write a book about MGTOW, are also the same people who in a very hypocritical way insist on a rule that “no real MGTOW” would have anything to do with women. This false belief, unfortunately, presents a huge risk to the younger and disaffected men who search and find the MGTOW community, as they are consequently tempted to dismiss women altogether, women that may actually be of great benefit and contribution to their lives.

About the only real complaint or concern I had about the book was what I believed to be the overly liberal use of excerpts from various books, texts, and periodicals. Entire pages of “The Odyssey” and “The Art of Courtly Love” are quoted, where I would have just preferred some key quotes and then more analysis and commentary from the authors. There were also some philosophical and technical differences and disagreements that I had with the book, but nothing that would get my panties in a bundle, unlike many of the authors’ critics.

Besides that, I believe because the book is the first of its kind and is (more or less) introductory in nature, a glossary would be helpful to young men (and women) who are first being introduced to the concepts therein. “Gynocentrism,” “VAWA,” “hypergamy,” etc. are all terms that the average person does not know, and because of this may be misled into thinking it’s one of those “faux” studies like “women’s studies” where academians create made up words and acronyms to sound smart.

Overall, however, the book is a very good, thorough, and honest summation of what MGTOW is, easily digestible by the beginning reader or a people more involved and aware of the MGTOW philosophy. I would strongly recommend it as a primer to anyone looking to understand or research the topic. I would also strongly recommend ignoring all the fake reviews on Amazon as many in the MGTOW community viewed Mr. Wright’s and Elam’s writing of this book as “sacrilege” and have since been voting it down with faux votes.

Editorial update: Aaron also sent us this video, which he did shortly before finishing the book and writing the review. The reviews on Amazon from people who haven’t even read the book are rather bemusing.

Feminists attack churches in Mexico and South America

A Voice For Men Videos · 8 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Camille Paglia on feminism, male creativity & generation snowflake –

A Voice For Men Videos · 9 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Author, art professor, feminist, and cultural critic Camille Paglia offers a scathing critique of feminism, praises male creativity, and laments Generation Snowflake.

Greta Aurora: Sexual Dimorphism Vs. Monomorphism in Humans

A Voice For Men Videos · 10 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Goal Post Episode 07 – Invisible Men, ‘Invincible’ Women

A Voice For Men Videos · 10 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Earth to Poilievre: MGTOW Have Good Reason, and Every Right, to Avoid Women

Janice Fiamengo · 11 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

> MGTOW have good reason to avoid women. Those who fund misandry have unmitigated gall in condemning them.

Remember "A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle?"

Popularly credited to feminist icon Gloria Steinem, the slogan embodied the insouciance and independence claimed by Second Wave feminists. Women could get along just fine without men (though not without their tax money, as it turned out—more on this later) and lesbian feminists like Adrienne Rich (in "Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence") explicitly called on all women to withdraw their caring from men as an act of female solidarity.

Nice, eh?

Anyone who objected to the anti-male rhetoric was dismissed as an apologist for patriarchal oppression ('Do you have a problem with equality?'), and generations of young women were given the message that wanting to love and be loved by a man was a betrayal of the sisterhood. What else was one to make of Professor of Law Catharine MacKinnon's claim, in her 1989 essay for the journal Ethics, that "The major distinction between intercourse (normal) and rape (abnormal) is that the normal happens so often that one cannot get anyone to see anything wrong with it" (p. 336-337).

For decades, feminists in Canada have been given a free pass to vilify men as a group. In 1978, women's groups held the first "Women Reclaim the Night" march in downtown Vancouver. It was a raucous, aggressive, property-destroying affair culminating in the symbolic murder of a stuffed male "Rapist" mannequin who was "literally stomped to shreds" by woman warriors.

Women marchers show they're 'not ladies'

.

In 2012, a cadre of gender studies righteous nearly succeeded in shutting down a lecture by Dr. Warren Farrell on "The Boy Crisis" at the University of Toronto; after tearing down the event posters and blocking the building entranceways, they demonstrated their concern for equality by screaming obscenities at those who had come to hear Farrell and giving the Nazi salute to the security officers at the event. Not surprisingly, their CUPE-supported actions prompted no public condemnation or attempt at discipline from university leadership.

In 2018, feminist Meghan Murphy's execrable Feminist Currents magazine featured an article by Julie Bindel titled "SCUM Manifesto is your Perfect Summer Vacay Read," encouraging readers to "Bone up on your righteous man-hating this summer by rereading Feminist Classic SCUM Manifesto." The SCUM Manifesto is a book by would-be male exterminationist Valerie Solanas, who after publishing her screed attempted to murder Andy Warhol.

In 2019, when Egyptian-American feminist Mona Eltahawy gave public talks outlining her fantasy of vigilante attacks in which "a certain number of men" would be killed every week, Canada's state broadcaster, the CBC, gave her a respectful interview.

Women's threatening and dehumanizing rhetoric has been tolerated, even celebrated, for decades in this country.

So it is rather rich, now, five decades into the feminist revolt, to see pundits and political commentators huffing and puffing in outrage about MGTOW, dubbed a "misogynist men's rights movement" or a "far-right misogynistic online movement," and calling on newly-minted Conservative leader Pierre Poilievre (who, alas, seems eager to oblige) to disavow them. MGTOW stands for Men Going Their Own Way, and it was a happy day for the mainstream feminist-left when Global News allegedly discovered that Poilievre's team had tagged many of his videos with the acronym.

The hypocrisy is off the charts.

It's doubtful that any of the commentators getting on their high horses knows anything about MGTOW except the hysterical nonsense feminists have cooked up. MGTOW is not an official movement, far less an "organization," as Poilievre mistakenly called it. It has no recognized leadership, no designated spokespersons, no political program, no lobbying power, and no public presence. It is not actually interested in "men's rights" except to point out that men don't have any. It has no philosophical connection with incels. It is basically a loose (mainly online) affiliation of men who have decided to check out of women's lives.

Aren't feminists always saying that they want men to stop dominating them, subjugating them, pestering them, harassing them, controlling them, and making them uncomfortable? That's what MGTOW are all about.

In general, MGTOW minimize contact with women, avoiding marriage, cohabitation, and even simple close interaction with any woman who might, with the support of the Canadian state apparatus, lie about or exploit them for personal gain.

Some MGTOW are rebuilding their lives after a divorce that destroyed them emotionally and financially; some are still paying child support for children they haven't been allowed to see in years. Some MGTOW seek to withdraw their services and tax money from a society they regard (with good reason) as dangerous. Recognizing that all government ministries, every university, every police force, the entire social services industry, the censors in Big Tech, and the totality of the criminal and family court system have been captured by anti-male ideologues, these men speak to other men online about how to protect themselves.

In short, men who "go their own way" have decided that they need women even less than the mythical fish needed its wheeled transport.

Are any of these men "anti-women," as accused groper Justin Trudeau alleges? Sure, probably, surprise, surprise. Let's condemn all who promote group hatred. But most of these guys don't hate: they're simply tired of being told they're "toxic" year after year while their hard-earned tax monies fund government programs to advantage women and demonize them. Many are fed up with being told they must take responsibility as men for crimes they have never committed and are powerless to prevent.

The latter happens every year, by the way, during the government-promoted 16 Days of Activism Against Gender-Based Violence (observed by every university in Canada and many unions and corporations), an event that condemns every type of violence (against women, girls, LGBTQ and gender-diverse individuals) except that against heterosexual men, even though the Canadian government's own statistics show that men die from homicide in much higher numbers than women; and during which men are told that "Masculinity is at the heart of mass murdering," as government-funded feminist activist Julie Lalonde stated emphatically in interview with Canada's state broadcaster. The simple fact that violence doesn't have a "gender" is one that feminist groups will do anything possible to hide from public awareness.

The salient difference between MGTOW and Canadian feminist groups is that MGTOW receives no funding or encouragement from any government entity in Canada, while vicious feminist organizations receive tens of millions of dollars every year to promote their anti-male platforms. At the end of 2020, for example, the Minister for Women and Gender Equality announced grants totalling one hundred million for programs to end "gender-based violence" against women and children (but nothing to aid male victims of violence). Such programs promote preposterous theories about male privilege, claiming that men are violent because they have power and because Canadian society allegedly condones their abusiveness. In reality, both men and women are violent for reasons based in childhood abuse, mental illness, poverty, and addictions.

Contrary to the panting media reports, men who go their own way have nothing in common with so-called incels (despairing celibates who complain online about their inability to find a girlfriend) or PUAs (pick-up artists who share and practice techniques for sexual success), two groups who are also constant targets of feminist fear-mongering. MGTOW simply want to live apart from women, protecting their freedom and their assets. If women put such a philosophy into practice—though few would have the balls or ability—Canadian media would never stop celebrating them as heroic role models.

I suspect that the Canadian government and feminist groups can't stand the thought that some men will no longer allow themselves to be exploited.

And if MGTOW anger really is dangerous, it's not at all clear how mandatory and knee-jerk disavowal by public figures will create a more inclusive and harmonious Canadian society. MGTOW already know that criticism of feminism and female behavior is forbidden in this country—because women almost always get a pass for their hateful language—while mass denunciations of men are perfectly acceptable.

If we are serious about reducing violence and online harassment, we might start by acknowledging that male victimization matters, and we should seek to understand, rather than further demonize, the marginalized men feminists love to hate.

* * *

The Fiamengo File is a reader-supported publication. To receive new posts and support this work, consider becoming a free or paid subscriber.

Angry Harry on Who Rules Over Us: Part 1

A Voice For Men Videos · 12 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We lost Angry Harry several years ago but his message lives on.

Angry Harry on Who Rules Over Us Part 2

A Voice For Men Videos · 13 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We lost Angry Harry several years ago but his message lives on.

The virtue-signalling men allowing women into Men’s Sheds

A Voice For Men Videos · 13 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Bettina believes people involved in the Men’s Shed movement need to take action to protect these male sanctuaries that enrich the spirit and even save the lives of some men. Stand up for men!

Don’t Be THAT feminist

A Voice For Men Videos · 15 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Must-see, in-depth discussion on circumcision – Cassie Jaye and J. Steven Svoboda

A Voice For Men Videos · 16 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

J. Steven Svoboda of Attorneys for the Rights of the Child (ARC) and NCFM is interviewed for Cassie Jaye's groundbreaking film "The Red Pill." Below is the full interview released by Jaye as part of her Red Pill/Raw Files series (#RPRF).

It doesn't get any better than this: enlightened Red-Pill filmmaker interviews longtime MRA and intactivist attorney J Steven Svoboda, discussing every aspect of circumcision and the movement to end it.

The ten immutable laws of men and women

AVfM Video Source · 17 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Men – The Forgotten Gender

AVfM Video Source · 18 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Deepika Bhardwaj's TEDx talk in India is another sign Men's Human Rights awareness is spreading around the globe. Deepika attended ICMI and her documentary Martyrs of Marriage was screened there.

Feminism Liberates the Dark Feminine

A Voice For Men Videos · 19 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Youtuber and AVfM contributor Fidelbogen takes the radical notion that all human beings have a dark side, and that feminism liberates the dark side of half the human race, leaving almost no accountability for it at all.

Karen Straughan at New Hampshire Libertarian Forum 2014

A Voice For Men Videos · 19 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In 2014 Karen Straughan gave another amazing speech to a group of Libertarians. Will any group other than libertarians be open-minded enough to invite her to speak? We're still waiting.

Feminist Scream Singing

A Voice For Men Videos · 20 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A bit of a distraction for your entertainment, here are the Feminist Sirens from Belgium.

The Importance of Camille Vasquez

A Voice For Men Videos · 21 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist performance art

A Voice For Men Videos · 21 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The impact of parental alienation on children

Dr. Edward Kruk · 22 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I offer here the first installment of a three-part series examining: (1) the impact of parental alienation on children, (2) the effects of parental alienation on parents, and (3) programs, services, and interventions that combat alienation and seek to reunite estranged parents and their children.

What children of divorce most want and need is to maintain healthy and strong relationships with both of their parents and to be shielded from their parents' conflicts. Some parents, however, in an effort to bolster their parental identity, create an expectation that children should choose sides. In more extreme situations, they foster the child's rejection of the other parent. In the most extreme cases, children are manipulated by one parent to hate the other, despite their innate desire to love and be loved by both parents.

Parental alienation involves the "programming" of a child by one parent to denigrate the other "targeted" parent in an effort to undermine and interfere with the child's relationship with that parent. It is often a sign of a parent's inability to separate from the couple conflict and focus on the needs of the child. Such denigration results in the child's emotional rejection of the targeted parent and the loss of a capable and loving parent from the life of the child. Psychiatrist Richard Gardner developed the concept of "parental alienation syndrome" more than 20 years ago, defining it as "a disorder that arises primarily in the context of child custody disputes. Its primary manifestation is the child's campaign of denigration against a parent, a campaign that has no justification. It results from the combination of a programming (brainwashing) parent's indoctrinations and the child's own contributions to the vilification of the target parent." Children's views of the targeted parent are almost exclusively negative, to the point that the parent is demonized and seen as evil.

As Amy Baker writes, parental alienation involves a set of strategies, including badmouthing the other parent, limiting contact with that parent, erasing the other parent from the life and mind of the child (forbidding discussion and pictures of the other parent), forcing the child to reject the other parent, creating the impression that the other parent is dangerous, forcing the child to choose between the parents by means of threats of withdrawal of affection, and belittling and limiting contact with the extended family of the targeted parent. In my own research on non-custodial parents who have become disengaged from their children's lives (Kruk, 2011), I found that most lost contact involuntarily, many as a result of parental alienation. Constructive alternatives to adversarial methods of reconnecting with their children were rarely available to these alienated parents.

Parental alienation is more common than is often assumed: Fidler and Bala (2010) report both an increasing incidence and increased judicial findings of parental alienation; they report estimates of parental alienation in 11% to 15% of divorces involving children; Bernet et al. (2010) estimate that about 1% of children and adolescents in North America experience parental alienation.

There is now scholarly consensus that severe alienation is abusive to children (Fidler and Bala, 2010), and it is a largely overlooked form of child abuse (Bernet et al., 2010), as child welfare and divorce practitioners are often unaware of or minimize its extent. As reported by adult children of divorce, the tactics of alienating parents are tantamount to extreme psychological maltreatment of children, including spurning, terrorizing, isolating, corrupting or exploiting, and denying emotional responsiveness (Baker, 2010). For the child, parental alienation is a serious mental condition, based on a false belief that the alienated parent is a dangerous and unworthy parent. The severe effects of parental alienation on children are well documented: low self-esteem and self-hatred, lack of trust, depression, and substance abuse and other forms of addiction are widespread, as children lose the capacity to give and accept love from a parent. Self-hatred is particularly disturbing among affected children, as children internalize the hatred targeted toward the alienated parent, are led to believe that the alienated parent did not love or want them, and experience severe guilt related to betraying the alienated parent. Their depression is rooted in feelings of being unloved by one of their parents, and from separation from that parent, while being denied the opportunity to mourn the loss of the parent or to even talk about the parent. Alienated children typically have conflicted or distant relationships with the alienating parent also and are at high risk of becoming alienated from their own children; Baker reports that fully half of the respondents in her study of adult children who had experienced alienation as children were alienated from their own children.

Every child has a fundamental right and need for an unthreatened and loving relationship with both parents. To be denied that right by one parent, without sufficient justification such as abuse or neglect, is in itself a form of child abuse. Since it is the child who is being violated by a parent's alienating behaviors, it is the child who is being alienated from the other parent. Children who have undergone forced separation from one of their parents in the absence of abuse, including cases of parental alienation, are highly subject to post-traumatic stress. Reunification efforts in these cases should proceed carefully and with sensitivity. (Research has shown that many alienated children can transform quickly from refusing or staunchly resisting the rejected parent to being able to show and receive love from that parent, followed by an equally swift shift back to the alienated position when back in the orbit of the alienating parent. Alienated children seem to have a secret wish for someone to call their bluff, compelling them to reconnect with the parent they claim to hate.) While children's stated wishes regarding parental contact in contested custody should be considered, they should not be determinative, especially in suspected cases of alienation.

Hatred is not an emotion that comes naturally to a child; it has to be taught. A parent who would teach a child to hate or fear the other parent represents a grave and persistent danger to the mental and emotional health of that child. Alienated children are no less damaged than other child victims of extreme conflict, such as child soldiers and other abducted children, who identify with their tormentors to avoid pain and maintain a relationship with them, however abusive that relationship may be.

In the second installment on parental alienation, I will examine the effects of parental alienation on targeted parents. In the third installment, I will suggest a range of strategies for preventing and intervening in these cases.

Baker, A. (2010). "Adult recall of parental alienation in a community sample: Prevalence and associations with psychological maltreatment." Journal of Divorce and Remarriage, 51, 16-35.

Bernet, W. et al. (2010). "Parental alienation and the DSM V." American Journal of Family Therapy, 38, 76-187.

Fidler, B., and Bala, N. (2010). "Children resisting postseparation contact with a parent: Concepts, controversies, and conundrums." Family Court Review, 48(1), 10-47.

Kruk, E. (2011). Divorced Fathers: Children's Needs and Parental Responsibilities. Halifax: Fernwood Publishing.

Surviving school with a breaking spirit

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 22 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Brave Surgeon General recommends against mRNA covid-19 vaccine for males aged 18-39 years old

A Voice for Men · 23 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

For two years men's advocates have been sounding the alarm that mRNA covid-19 vaccines may have adverse or deadly effects on men and boys. These concerns have usually been brushed aside, and the focus of concern has been directed largely toward the effect of vaccines on women's health. Recently, Florida Surgeon General Joseph Ladapo stepped forward to address this oversight by recommending against males aged 18 to 39 receiving mRNA COVID-19 vaccines. He also noted that males over the age of 60 had a 10% increased risk of cardiac-related death within 28 days of mRNA vaccination, which indicates that males in the higher age categories should also consider whether they want to risk a 10% higher chance of suffering cardiac death.

Dr. Ladapo has released the following guidance for men:

A Letter to Washington Post Columnists About Latest #MeToo Article

Stephen Bond · 23 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A Letter to Two Washington Post Columnists About a Recent Article About #MeToo

Dear Mr. Farhi and Ms. Fetters Maloy,

I respectfully ask that you take the time to read this letter in its entirety and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

I'm a proud lifelong reader of The Washington Post who has long noticed the paper's gender bias, most notably its imbalanced coverage of domestic violence

But my pride in the Post turned to quiet outrage in 2018 by the publication of two disgraceful, bigoted articles:

- Why can't we hate men?, a #MeToo inspired rant by the director of women's studies at a major American University, who had the gall to openly and shamelessly express a Nazi-like hatred for men in a major American newspaper:

this era

Clockwise from top left, former New York attorney general Eric Schneiderman; former NBC "Today" show host Matt Lauer; film producer Harvey Weinstein; and actor Bill Cosby.

Why can't we hate men?

By Suzanna Danuta Walters

It's not that Eric Schneiderman (the now-former New York attorney general accused of abuse by multiple women) me over the edge. My edge crossed for a long time, sident Trump, before nstein, before "mans- "incels." Before live- al assaults and red and rape camps as the deadening rogative. putably true cal to hate

Pretty much everywhere in the world, this is true: Women experience sexual violence, and the threat of that violence permeates our choices big and small. In addition, male violence is not restricted to intimate-partner attacks or sexual assault but plagues us in the form of terrorism and mass gun violence. Women are underrepresented in higher-wage jobs, local and federal government, business, educational leadership, etc.; wage inequality continues to permeate every econo- my and almost every harassment and violence. But we're not supposed to hate them because ... #NotAllMen. I love Michelle Obama as much as the next woman, but when they have gone low for all of human history, maybe it's time for us to go all Thelma and Louise and Foxy Brown on their collective butts.

The world has little place for feminist anger. Women posed to support

- Amber Heard's infamous op-ed that both embarrassed the Post and ultimately cost Heard over $10 million:

Opinion Amber Heard: I spoke up against sexual violence — and faced our culture's wrath. That has to change.

In response, I've been sending letters to Post columnists who write articles that perpetuate the same biased, one-sided depiction about gender issues as these two articles.

Your recent article titled Five years on, what happened to the men of #MeToo? is an example of this bias. Like almost all other Post coverage of #MeToo, it only provides a single side of the story.

Please don't misunderstand. I believe that #MeToo originally had a valid point. And I don't deny that some men can behave appallingly. But as I wrote in an article in 2020;

> #MeToo has morphed from a movement for the expression of legitimate complaints by women about the sexual misbehavior of some men into a two-faced juggernaut that allows any man to be accused, tried, and sentenced in the court of public opinion, hounded out of his job, and made a social pariah without a shred of due process, often by anonymous accusers."

Mr. Farhi, you may scoff, but as a man you could be accused of sexual misbehavior and hounded out of your job at the Post. Your actual guilt or innocence would be irrelevant. Only that you've been accused.

Don't believe it? Then consider the case of another former Post writer, Mike Tunison, who in 2017 was included on Shitty Media Men, an online list that collected anonymous, unvetted allegations of sexual misconduct and assault against approximately 70 men who worked in media.

Someone anonymously added Mr. Tunison to the list, accusing him of "harassment," "stalking" and "physical intimidation". Prior to this, Mr. Tunison was a successful freelance writer who wrote for the Post and had a book published by HarperCollins. After his inclusion in the list, his writing work dried up and many friends deserted him. He became suicidal, as he described in an online post, Hi, I'm on the Shitty Media Men list, but maybe you already knew that.

That your article is one sided is self-evident as it only discusses men who have been accused of sexual misbehavior, completely ignoring women's equally appalling misbehavior. As my article on #MeToo points out,

> "…#MeToo fails to recognize women's own corresponding bad sexual behavior or of the female contribution to > men's sexual misconduct."

Why didn't your article discuss the misbehavior of some of the female #MeToo accusers?

Like Asia Argento, who accused Harvey Weinstein of performing oral sex on her against her will.

Argento, even while spreading the #MeToo gospel to the world, paid nearly $400,000 to child actor Jimmy Bennett, who claimed Argento sexually assaulted him in 2013 when he was 17 and she was 37. Unsurprisingly, Argento called the underage victim a liar. One article pointed out Argento's hypocrisy:

"Imagine, please, that the accuser was a woman [who] was treated the way that Asia Argento, the strident Joan of Arc of the #MeToo movement, was treating [the male] actor who, at the age of 7, had played her son. We would have hordes of ladies in black dresses and linked arms singing some random song from Lilith Fair."

Asia Argento and Her Victim (image from CNN)

For more information about the "other side" of #MeToo, may I suggest that you read my entire online article, #MeToo, Thy Name is Hypocrisy?

And then consider writing another article that includes this other side.

Sincerely,

Stephen Bond

Other Post columnists to whom I've previously sent letters about their own gender-biased columns have been separately cc'd this letter:

- Monica Hesse: as the Post's gender columnist, when will you do the right thing and speak out against feminist lies and your paper's one-sided gender bias?
- Karla Miller, Work Advice Columnist: wrote two articles about the gender wage gap
- Janay Kingsberry, Multiplatform editor for "The Lily" web site: wrote article about "dissatisfied U.S. women"
- Kate Cohen, "Contributing columnist": wrote two articles about college men
- Christine Emba, Columnist: wrote an article about "condom stealthing"
- Julianne McShane, "Gender & Inequity journalist": wrote two articles on the gender pay gap
- Miriam Berger, "Reporter covering Middle East, Foreign Affairs": wrote two articles about domestic violence
- Candace Buckner, Sports reporter: wrote biased article on "Men Behaving Badly"
- Erik Wemple, wrote a column about the Amber Heard fiasco

Warren Farrell on FOX Primetime: “Gender” Policy Council Ignores Boys in time of COVID

Warren Farrell · 24 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Noam Chomsky, Christine Blasey-Ford and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 24 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Our opinions are shaped, in some part, by our media and social media experiences. My writing deals with a quirk in the brains of human males that I believe is creating a slow moving disaster as we move toward a state of perpetual moral panic. Christine Blasey-Ford's testimony may be something we look back on for reference.

The quirk my writings deal with is the inability of human males to demonstrate automatic in-group bias for one another. Unfortunately, it has created problems that men can't fix and the government can't fix. Neither men nor government have the tools, because, men, are an automatic outgroup and the biases that creates, in both men, and women, are, well, quirky.

This series deals with how this lack of bias plays out, at scale, in traditional media and social media environments.

Outgroup bias is hardwired in the species and has entered a into feedback loop, because of social media.

#Metoo and #Kavanaugh, are merely foreshocks for a main event that will make the Satanic Ritual Child Abuse Moral Panic and the Day Care Sex Abuse Scandals look like family picnics.

For the purposes of this article, we will use the following description of the U.S. media. It's based on Manufacturing Consent by Edward S. Herman and MIT Professor, Noam Chomsky.

You may think there's a political motive in my sharing that specific video. It's produced by Al Jazeera, an official Qatar government media outlet, and voiced by Amy Goodman of Democracy Now, a journalist arrested in St. Paul, MN in 2008, while covering police violence outside the 2008 Republican National Convention in St. Paul, MN, that's a lot of politics " all wrapped up in dere" as we say in Minnesota.

In fact, I picked it because it's bizarre, it's cute, it's a little bit gross, and it's kinda' mean to the politicians and corporations that run the media in order to exploit the biases of an elite group of "cultural managers", who control consumer spending, [1][2][3] because their consent is crucial to their agenda.

This segment from a 1991 documentary details Dr. Chomsky's opinions on the special role of the New York Times, CNN, the Washington Post, and the corporations who own them.

For-profit media companies will publish anything to capture and maintain the attention of this group to increase market share for their advertisers and votes to the political establishment.

The Red Church and the Blue Church, are two congregations, watching two different movies, on the same screen. For-profit media companies will target the biases of the culture managers of either side of the "political aisle".

For-profit media companies will avoid publishing anything that these extremely valuable culture managers don't want to look at, or want to avoid, and will instead create content designed specifically for their emotional and moral palettes.

Effective propaganda targets our biases and our gut feelings. It pulls our heart strings, enrages us, and/or for about 65% of us, tickles our sense of humor. Roughly 35% of any given population, have no sense of humor at all.

The most effective propaganda subtly target biases we don't even know exist; those that are automatic.

In the next article Thurman Blevins, Justine Damond and the automatic outgroup derogation of men, we'll explore the two movies these churches are watching on the same screen.

Previous Articles in this Series

Dr. Christine Ford, Brett Kavanaugh, and the automatic outgroup derogation of men
Scott Adams, Tucker Carlson and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Viktor Frankl, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Sexual Assault on Campus: A Quiz Show

Tom Golden · 24 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Chester Gillette, Et Al – Don't Be These Guys

Doug Mortimer · 25 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The story of Chester Gillette and his drowned girlfriend went viral more than 100 years ago. In 1906 the dominant medium was the newspaper. Then as now, sex sold. Sex and murder sold even better, especially when it had undercurrents of class conflict. Also, the whole sorry incident was embellished by yellow journalism, as fake news was called at the time.

Born in Montana (then a Territory) in 1883, Chester Gillette grew up in a well-to-do family that eventually settled in Spokane, Washington. The extended family included other prominent businessmen. Unfortunately, Chester's parents literally got religion, turned aside from worldly things, and made the Salvation Army their life's work. Having developed a taste for middle class comforts, young Chester was less than enthusiastic about his family's self-imposed ascetism, but he was not old enough to do anything about it.

After flunking out of school and knocking around at odd jobs, Chester moved to Cortland, New York, about halfway between Binghamton and Syracuse, and went to work for his uncle, Noah Gillette, who owned a skirt factory.

Among the 250 employees at the factory was one Grace Brown, who became Gillette's lover in the summer of 1905 and found herself in a family way the following year. Unfortunately, Chester had moved on, romantically speaking. Thanks to his innate charm and good looks as well as his uncle's connections, he was now hobnobbing with the local gentry. Marriage to a lower-class woman would abruptly end his flirtation with the good life. But Grace refused to go quietly. She threatened to expose his double life if he left her. She even threatened suicide. There was no easy way out for Chester.

Implying that he wanted to elope, Chester took Grace on vacation in the Adirondacks. On July 11, 1906, they rented a boat and went rowing on Big Moose Lake. The next day a search party found an overturned boat on the surface of the lake and Grace's body, replete with head wounds, at the bottom of the lake. Chester, very much alive, was arrested three days later and charged with murder.

The trial, beginning on November 12, 1906, lasted till the end of the month. The remote Herkimer County courthouse was overrun with newspaper reporters.

After three weeks of testimony, Chester was found guilty and sentenced to death. He was hooked up to the electric chair on March 30, 1908. Of course, he had protested his innocence, but guilty or innocent, Chester Gillette was clearly not the best a man can be.

And that would seem to be the end of the whole lurid affair. The bounder got what was coming to him, Grace Brown was avenged, and justice was served. But that was not the end of the story.

Novelist Theodore Dreiser observed that the Gillette case fit the pattern of a number of others he had noticed during his journalistic career. The template involved an ambitious young man murdering a lower-class woman with whom he was sexually involved. Dreiser had dealt with the problems of working-class girls in his first two novels, Sister Carrie (1900) and Jennie Gerhart (1903). Also, men of ambition were recurring characters in his novels. The story of Chester Gillette was right in Dreiser's wheelhouse.

The Gillette-Brown incident simmered on Dreiser's back burner while he worked on other novels, but in 1925 he finally published An American Tragedy. The names of people and places were changed (the protagonist was re-named Clyde Griffiths, Grace Brown became Roberta Alden, and the skirt factory became a collar factory) and the story was updated to the 1920s.

One important addition was the character of Sondra Finchley, Clyde Griffiths' dream girl. In Chester Gillette's case, there was no individual girl, just a local smart set he hung out with. Nevertheless the press tried to conjure up a live "rich girl" to contrast with the dead "poor girl" to create a love triangle. Admittedly, that made the story even more scandalous.

Dreiser's lengthy (800+ pages) tome landed on the best-seller lists in 1925. Since Dreiser had been a poor but ambitious young man himself, he could readily identify with the yearnings of Clyde Griffiths. Interestingly, The Great Gatsby, F. Scott Fitzgerald's tale of a young man rising above humble origins to a become a member of Long Island society, also came out in 1925.

An American Tragedy became a staple on reading lists in American literature classes. As late as 2010 Time magazine named it one of the top 100 novels in the English language since 1923. Though the saga of Chester Gillette had occurred almost two decades before the publication of the novel, the narrative still resonated with the public. In the interim, skirts had been shortened, morals had loosened, the Great War had come and gone, and women were given the vote. But a man convicted of killing his pregnant girlfriend still made for a compelling story.

As usually happens with a best-selling novel, other media took notice. The novel was turned into stage plays and radio dramas. In 1931 Paramount released a film version of An American Tragedy but it was not a big success, even though it was directed by Josef von Sternberg, whose career was on the rise in Hollywood.

Now we flash forward another two decades. A-list director George Stevens lobbies Paramount to do a remake of their 1931 movie. The Gillette incident is 45 years old; Dreiser's novel is 26 years old – Dreiser himself has been dead for 6 years. Why resurrect this story at this point in time?

Well, the world had been through a lot since Dreiser's novel came out…the stock market crash, the Depression, another world war, the advent of television (and commercials), and the growth of suburbia, among other phenomena. Given a post-WWII spin, the basic story was still compelling.

This time around the protagonist was named George Eastman and the film, renamed A Place in the Sun, took place in the middle of the 20th Century. The result was nine Oscar nominations (six awards…direction, screenplay, music score and editing, as well as black and white cinematography and costume design), and boffo box office. Also, the film had staying power. In 1998 it landed a spot on the American Film Institute's list of 100 greatest American movies.

Like Dreiser, George Stevens had endured an impecunious upbringing (his parents were both actors). As he worked his way up the ladder in Hollywood (he started out as a teenage cameraman on Laurel and Hardy shorts) he could not help but notice the social stratification that existed in the industry. Talent and skills were important but nepotism and good connections could make all the difference. Stevens likely understood what the Gillette/Griffiths/Eastman protagonist (let's call him G/G/E for simplicity) was up against.

So the original small-town storyline transcended its roots and resonated nationwide with three different generations. Does it hold lessons for the contemporary manosphere?

Well, the gynocentrism of the story is obvious. If a man is accused of first-degree murder, he is as good as convicted if his victim is a woman. This is not to say that a man killing a man is socially acceptable, but most murder victims are men, most perps are men. It's an everyday occurrence. Yet woman as victim is the theme that never dies. The death of a young woman is always a tragedy. Not so with a young man unless he is some sort of prodigy. And if a woman kills a man, usually the underlying assumption is that he deserved it.

Like many women, G/G/E is concerned with his appearance, having the right sort of clothing and saying all the right things. A charming, good-looking fellow, he nevertheless violates a number of taboos – at least taboos for men. First, by dispatching a lower-class woman to clear the way for a society girl, he has committed hypergamy. There is no law against that, but men are not allowed to do it! Women not only get away with it, it is their birthright. But a man? Who does he think he is?

The second taboo that G/G/E violated is the sanctity of a woman's right to choose. In each of the iterations of the story, the protagonist knows his girlfriend is pregnant, so he knows he is also killing his own unborn child. Today, in states where abortion is legal, a woman can choose to kill her unborn child regardless of the father's wishes. A man is never allowed to turn thumbs down on the fruit of his loins. Again, who does he think he is?

G/G/E also exemplifies another modern female theme. He refuses to settle. Given his modest intelligence, income, and education, a factory girl is probably a suitable match for him. Again, one can imagine female readers/viewers muttering "Who does he think he is?"

A corollary of G/G/E's refusal to settle is his sense of entitlement. He doesn't want to achieve wealth by hard work and thrift. He is not at all enterprising; he just wants his rich uncle to give him a sinecure at the factory and to marry into a wealthy family. At no point does he attempt to educate himself or expand his skill set. Yet he longs to hang out with a better class of people in a dream world wherein the young folks regularly engage in such leisure activities as tennis, golf, sailing, horseback riding, and water skiing, and the girls all look like Vogue models. In the 1951 movie, a Hawaiian-themed party on the lake hints at the paradisiacal nature of George's fantasies of the good life.

By hanging out with the right people, he enhances his chances of ingratiating himself with a well-to-do young miss and marrying money. The good life will be his – but with an asterisk. It may be perfectly acceptable for a pretty but otherwise undistinguished girl to marry an alpha male, but there is still a stigma attached to a young man marrying his way into the upper class. He should do something to distinguish himself beforehand. Even then he risks being dismissed as a male gold-digger.

The G/G/E saga also resounds through the ages because it shows the dark side of upward mobility, a treasured feature in American life. Inevitably, when one goes upscale, one abandons one's downscale family and friends. Otherwise decent people must be left behind simply because they are a drag on one's upward mobility.

Of course, to get ahead in America (or anywhere else) a certain amount of drive and ambition are needed; a man who is satisfied with his lot in life is always a bit suspect. Even if you're one of the fortunate few at the apex, you should always be attempting to move up, to improve yourself, to add to your net worth, etc. All of this may be second nature for an alpha male, but G/G/E is no alpha. On a good day he might be a beta. Hence his tragedy is of little consequence – as are the tragedies of the masses of men who dwell in quiet desperationville but dream of a better life. We're not talking about greatness denied. Just daydreams dispelled. In Dreiser's novel, the prosecutor repeatedly characterizes Clyde Griffiths as "a mental and moral coward."

G/G/E is the alter ego of the typical Horatio Alger hero. In Alger's numerous novels he dealt with poor boys who rose through the ranks thanks to "hard work, determination, courage, and honesty." None of these adjectives describes G/G/E. He just doesn't have the right stuff. He's physically attractive and has learned how to dress and behave in upper class circles, but that's about it.

Today, thanks to the growth of media, images of the good life have grown apace. Consumerism implies that certain gadgets, goodies, and brand names are de rigueur if you're into keeping up with the Joneses (a phrase that dates back to a 1913 comic strip of the same name). If you feel differently, you might be a budding MGTOW. But G/G/E had no concept of that lifestyle. Even if he did, it wouldn't matter, as he has no intellectual curiosity or interests to cultivate if he did go his own way. Perhaps T.S. Eliot had the likes of G/G/E in mind when he wrote the poem "The Hollow Men." Like An American Tragedy and The Great Gatsby, it was published in 1925.

The good life that G/G/E dreams of inevitably comes with a dream girl. In the case of Chester Gillette, the newspapers speculated it was one Harriet Benedict, but she was merely a casual acquaintance. In An American Tragedy there is indeed a dream girl named Sondra Finchley, a local deb who shows an interest in Clyde Griffiths. The movies, however, are the ultimate medium when it comes to offering us images of dream girls, and A Place in the Sun offers us Angela Vickers, daughter of a successful local businessman. She embodies everything George Eastman wants in life. Adding more fuel to the fire, an illuminated "Vickers" sign dominates the view from George's apartment.

Like the protagonists in the original incident and Dreiser's novel, George Eastman works in his uncle's factory.

Notably, the factory George's uncle owns turns out not skirts or collars but bathing suits! In fact, the first thing George sees upon arriving in town is a billboard of a cutie in a bathing suit with the tag line "It's an Eastman!" In other words, George Eastman, she could be yours!

Once George starts work, he is surrounded by posters of good-looking young women in bathing suits. Predictably, the factory girls (90% of the work force at the plant) are much less attractive. In fact there is a sort of apartheid at the workplace. A prominent sign at the entrance to the front office says "Factory employees forbidden beyond this point."

Alice Tripp is the name of the pregnant factory girl in the film. The casting of Shelley Winters as the doomed damsel is spot on. If you remember her from her numerous frumpy roles, you might be surprised to find out that she started out in Hollywood as a pinup girl. At age 29, she probably realized she was getting a bit long in the tooth and needed to take her career in another direction.

An even bigger casting coup was Elizabeth Taylor as Angela Vickers, Eastman's dream girl. Today most people remember her as a much-married, blowsy old broad, but this was not the case in 1951. A Place in the Sun ended her career as a juvenile lead and launched her career as a goddess of the cinema. Just 17 years old, she was the ideal upper-class princess, a tantalizing blend of small-town nobility and big-time nubility. When director Stevens shows her and Eastman (Montgomery Clift) snogging in extreme close-up and soft focus, every run-of-the-mill male in the audience was vicariously experiencing what it would be like to make it with a dream girl. If said moviegoer was accompanied by a date, she more than likely paled in comparison to a young Elizabeth Taylor caressing George and crooning "Tell mama…tell mama all."

Notably, Eastman says "I've loved you since the first moment I saw you. I guess maybe I've even loved you before I saw you." She's the stuff dreams are made of, and G/G/E is a dreamer not a doer.

The casting of Montgomery Clift as George Eastman was inspired. He usually played nervous and insecure, but ultimately sympathetic, types. In some cases (e.g., From Here to Eternity and Red River), he proved to be tougher than he appeared, but that was not the case in A Place in the Sun. He was just a poor kid with his nose pressed against the toy store window. So close and yet so far. He could see the world had a lot to offer him, but he had little to offer the world. Life's possibilities fire his imagination; life's limitations fence him in. Typically, American culture exalts the common man. G/G/E discredits that concept.

Dreiser's novel was widely considered a work of social criticism. If you were on the left politically speaking, you would probably see it as an indictment of capitalism, materialism, and inequality. Clyde Griffiths, however, is no working class hero. He has no social conscience; he doesn't care about the class struggle or income inequality or the revolution of the proletariat. In fact, he isn't given to abstract thinking about society or anything else. He just wants a life of leisure and ease, even though he doesn't have what it takes to create wealth or even maintain it.

The E/E/G character is worthy of study, though not emulation, by members of the contemporary manosphere. You can still read plenty about Chester Gillette on the internet; Dreiser's novel is still in print but it is definitely not for the short attention span set. A Place in the Sun is the most accessible version of the story.

To this day, the true intentions of E/E/G are questionable. Whether he meant to drown his working-class inamorata or it was an accident remains an open question. The fact that he fled the scene without attempting to rescue her or contacting the authorities was the most damning aspect of his behavior. One can't help but wonder if Teddy Kennedy was familiar with this tale of a man of questionable morals and the drowning death of his obscure female companion. 63 years after Chester Gillette, the media had a field day with Teddy, which goes to show that all the wealth and power in the world can't make a man bulletproof when it comes to the death of a damsel.

An enterprising filmmaker today could surely take the basic plot line and do a contemporary version. The tale allows people to read a lot into it – and into the character and motivation of G/G/E. A lot of taboos have vanished since 1906, but a man killing his pregnant girlfriend is still a major no-no. Always has been, always will be. Even those who live in glass houses feel justified in casting stones because no matter what their shortcomings, they are nowhere near that bad.

The main take-away from the basic plot line is the many different ways a man's involvement with a woman can jeopardize his life. Having grown up in a religious household, G/G/E has limited experience with girls but he is always mooning over them. He is socially awkward but willing to learn.

Obviously, married or not, impregnating a woman – in or out of wedlock – is a life-changing event. While female companionship may assuage a man's loneliness, it is fraught with pitfalls. These are considerations all men must deal with. Particularly dangerous is an obsession with the ideal female. A young man who actively pursues his dream girl is destined for disappointment if not disaster.

Unfortunately, given the zeitgeist today, a contemporary version of the story would probably devolve into a screed against toxic masculinity, sexual harassment in the workplace (coed fraternization was frowned on even a century ago), social inequality, and white male privilege. For good measure, they could re-imagine the role of the factory girl by introducing an FGOC (factory girl of color).

Chester Gillette was a real person. Clyde Griffiths and George Eastman were not. Nevertheless, real young men can learn a lot from their experiences.

Row, row, row your boat, boys, but gently, please. Life is but a dream…so watch out for those dream girls!

The Trans Industry: Fiamengo, Golden, Lofendale, and Buchanan

A Voice For Men Videos · 25 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Mission Accomplished! Kids See My Signs at Circumcision Protest, Cops and Principal Join In

A Voice For Men Videos · 26 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

George Carlin: Men (Part 1)

A Voice For Men Videos · 27 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

George Carlin: Men (Part 2)

A Voice For Men Videos · 28 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Parental alienation: The impact on parents

Dr. Edward Kruk · 29 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In this second installment of our three-part series on parental alienation, we turn our attention to alienated (targeted) and alienating parents. Parental alienation is the "programming" of a child by one parent to denigrate the other (targeted) parent in an effort to undermine and interfere with the child's relationship with that parent, and it most often occurs within the context of a child custody conflict. This includes the "legal abuse" of parents who have been disenfranchised from their children's lives subsequent to sole custody and primary residence judgments. Within an adversarial legal process, non-custodial parents are often subjected to shame and stigma, lack of access to their children, and devaluation of their role as parents. And those who speak about the pain and woundedness in their lives are subjected to a mean-spirited cultural response, where their talk of woundedness is mocked.

Most alienated parents are non-custodial fathers, and engaging these fathers is a significant challenge, as clinical and research literature has described the lack of "fit" between fathers and therapeutic agents as emanating from two sources: the characteristics of men and fathers themselves (their resistance to counseling and therapy) and aspects of the therapeutic process (which have failed to successfully engage fathers). Patterns of traditional gender-role socialization directing men toward self-sufficiency and control, independent problem-solving, and emotional restraint have largely worked against fathers being able to acknowledge personal difficulties and request help. A fear of self-disclosure and a feeling of disloyalty to one's family in exposing family problems are not uncommon; a fear of losing control over one's life and the need to present an image of control or a "facade of coping" in the form of exterior calm, strength, and rationality, despite considerable inner turmoil, characterize many fathers. Professional service providers do not always consider such psychological obstacles to therapy and thus do not address fathers' unique needs. The research on divorced fathers is clear about their most pressing need: their continued meaningful involvement with their children, as active parents. The lack of recognition of this primary need is the main reason for therapists' lack of success in engaging alienated fathers.

Above all, the key to engaging alienated parents is to validate their parental identity and combine advocacy efforts with counseling focused on enhancing their role as active and responsible parents. Human service professionals have been notably absent in the politics of reform with respect to the issue of legal child custody, yet they are desperately needed as allies in policy reform efforts. An important role of human service professionals in supporting alienated parents is through such advocacy and activism, challenging the custodial/non-custodial and residential/non-residential parent dichotomy and advancing the cause of co-parenting.

An active program of outreach is essential as alienated parents report a lack of effective support services, and they remain a highly vulnerable population. Service providers need to be persistent and proactive, as it takes time to build and sustain engagement in the context of these parents' feelings of isolation, helplessness, and their tendency to wait until there is a crisis before accessing support. Parents who were highly involved with and attached to their children and suddenly find themselves forcefully removed from their children's lives experience profound woundedness. The experience of being removed as a loving parent from the life of one's child via a sole custody order strikes at the heart of one's being. Suicide rates are reported to be of epidemic proportions among parents—fathers in particular—who are struggling to maintain a parenting relationship with their children (Kposowa, 2000; Kposowa, 2003); and legal abuse has been noted as a key factor in these cases. Being vigilant regarding symptoms of post-traumatic stress and suicidal ideation among non-custodial and alienated fathers and mothers is an essential role for service providers. A strengths-based approach—recognizing alienated parents' aspirations to their children's well-being and the experience, knowledge, and skills that they can contribute to this well-being while maintaining the high road in addressing the alienation—is vital.

And finally, what about the alienating parent, who uses a combination of fear, lies, flattery, and gratification of material desires to win over their child and whose sense of entitlement and desire to control the child is greater than the desire to nurture and care for the child? As Amy Baker writes, parents who try to alienate their child from the other parent subtly or overtly convey a three-part message to the child: I am the only parent who loves you and you need me to feel good about yourself; the other parent is dangerous and unavailable; and pursuing a relationship with the other parent jeopardizes your relationship with me. Alienating parents are themselves emotionally fragile, often enmeshed with the child, with a “sense of entitlement, needing control, knowing only how to take” (Richardson, 2006). Yet although it is easy to pathologize and blame such parents, it must be remembered that alienating behavior is encouraged in the context of a legal adversarial forum where the goal is to “win” the custody or residence of one’s child. And although some would recommend a solution of removing child custody from alienating parents and placing children in the care of non-alienating parents, it is often very difficult to adjudicate who actually is the alienating and who is the targeted parent. Family law judges are not trained in the finer points of child development and family dynamics and can be easily swayed by legal arguments made on behalf of disputing parents, including alienating parents.

On the matter of parental alienation, I have come to see that the problem is systemic in nature; that is, the problem lies primarily in the adversarial nature of legal determination of parenting after divorce. Parents are set up to fight in an effort to win “primary residence” or “custody” of their children, and the system tends to reward those skilled in adversarial combat. Parents often win their case by disparaging the other parent as a parent, in effect engaging in alienating behaviors, and the system thereby encourages and produces alienating behavior. A legal presumption of co-parenting, rebuttable in established cases of child abuse and family violence, may in fact be the most effective means of combating parental alienation and curtailing its damaging consequences while at the same time protecting the safety and well-being of children at risk of abuse.

The final installment of our three-part series on parental alienation will examine programs, services, and interventions that combat alienation and seek to reunite estranged parents and their children while addressing the significant clinical challenges in working with alienating parents.

Sources:

Kposowa, A. (2000). “Marital Status and Suicide in the National Longitudinal Mortality Study.” Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health, 54, 254-261.

Kposowa, A. (2003). “Divorce and Suicide Risk.” Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health, 57, 993-995.

Richardson, P. (2006). A Kidnapped Mind. Toronto: Dundurn Press.

Child denied her father by family court

AVfM Video Source · 29 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The only thing unusual about this story is Gary Treistman's willingness to take a public stand. More people need to.

Love sick (part 1)

Dr. Frank Tallis · 30 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following is Part 1 of a three-part extract from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. The book takes a good look at romantic love, or more accurately the sickness of it – a fact underlined by many writers at AVfM who have exposed the bankruptcy of romantic chivalry. Dr. Tallis' extensive clinical experience confirms just how sick-making these practices are for all who indulge them. – Eds.

Incurable Romantics

> Love, love, love – all the wretched cant of it, masking egotism, lust, masochism, fantasy under a mythology of sentimental postures, a welter of self-induced miseries and joys, blinding and masking the essential personalities in the frozen gestures of courtship, in the kissing and the dating and the desire, the compliments and the quarrels which vivify its barrenness.
>
> The Female Eunuch, Germaine Greer

Romantic love has been described by the Jungian psychoanalyst Robert Johnson as `the single greatest energy system in the Western psyche'. Although this sounds like a wildly extravagant claim, it is almost certainly true. Love – and in particular romantic love – is our great preoccupation. Almost every aspect of our life is affected, in some way, by the concept of romantic love.

The word 'romantic' is troubled by a long history. It is like an overworked canvas, the composition and brushwork of which cannot conceal the suggestion of earlier drafts. English dictionaries distinguish 'romantic' with several definitions, but in reality, such tidy divisions are misleading. When we use the word, these different meanings ings bleed into each other. To be romantically involved is an admission that carries a host of implications: passion, folly, obsession, anguish, recklessness, intrigue, and adventure; archetypes rise from varying depths and jostle with each other for recognition and influence.

As with any native tongue, we first speak the language of romantic love without being able to explain its grammar. The assumptions on which romantic love is predicated are buried in the unconscious mind, where they exert a powerful influence on our beliefs, attitudes, and expectations. We never pause to question their legitimacy. When a romantic hero decides he will sacrifice everything for love, no one will ask 'Is she really worth it?' or 'Can't he find someone else?' Romantic love has its own obscure logic which we all tacitly accept.

The roots of romantic love run deep. Indeed, the fundamental mental conventions of romantic love were consolidated on the ancestral plains of Africa, where evolutionary pressures determined that men should court women, that women should be coy, that relationships should be exclusive, and that love should storm the mind like a form of madness. However, since the rise of civilisation, these features have been increasingly complicated by ideological factors. The roots of romantic love are profoundly deep, but, now, they are also hopelessly tangled.

To understand fully the concept of romantic love requires an examination of its cultural history (in addition to its evolutionary history)…

* * *

The Islamic courtly tradition was introduced into Western culture by the troubadours, whose poetry preserved many features of Arab mysticism – particularly, a quasi-religious praise of female beauty. However, as this theme was reworked, it also began to change. Spiritual inaccessibility gradually evolved into alluring aloofness, which in turn became regal disdain. Thus, a recurring figure in troubadour poetry was the cold, cruel mistress.

The theme of inaccessibility was also explored in another way: the introduction of a female character, immensely desirable, but unavailable through marriage.

Even at this very early stage, the authenticity of love was being judged according to its difficulty (with respect to obstacles and impediments) and its irrationality. In troubadour poetry, we can recognise the cultural ancestry of modern concepts such as Lee's mania or Tennov's limerence: love that does not need liking – love that may even thrive in response to rejection or contempt. The troubadour's cruel mistress reappears again and again in literature in different guises: the enchantress, the femme fatale, the Belle Dame sans Merci. Long before psychologists began to study love in a systematic way, literature required a particular female type who would represent unhappy love.

The doctrine of romantic love (also known as courtezia or amour courtois) would have spread across Europe irrespective of royal patronage; however, the process was certainly accelerated by events at the court of Poitiers, where William IX is reputed to have been 'the first troubadour' (on account of having written the earliest surviving examples of coutly verse in the Provencal language). It was also at Poitiers that William's granddaughter, Eleanor of Aquitaine, and her daughter, Marie de Champagne, encouraged celebrated poets such as Bernard de Ventadour and Chretien de Troyes to compose works that exemplified courtly ideals. A narrative vehicle that was popular among the poets of Poitiers was Arthurian legend, which delivered a cast of characters whose relationships could be fully exploited to dramatise the frustrating dynamics of romantic love. Thus, Guinevere's beauty is beyond compare, and Lancelot – Arthur's most loyal servant – must fall hopelessly in love with the queen. (English readers are more familiar with this dynamic through Sir Thomas Malory's Le Morte d'Arthur.) In the poetry of Chretien de Troyes, love – always complicated, but even more complicated by courtly conventions – is once again described as an illness: 'My illness is what I want. And my pain is my health… I suffer agreeably… I am sick with delight.'

One of the most extraordinary developments at Poitiers was the creation of an inner court – the Court of Love – where noblewomen would meet to pose questions about love and the proper conduct of lovers. Questions would then be disputed, juried and judged, according to the increasingly dogmatic principles of courtezia. Perhaps, in an effort to make the task of this inner court easier, Marie instructed a cleric, Andrew Capelanus (also known as Andrew the Chaplain), to write a formal book of statutes: a kind of lovers' charter.

Andrew began his task by consulting a classical authority – the Ars Amatoria (or Art of Love) by Ovid. It is difficult to imagine a more inappropriate work on which to base a 'respectable' canon. As with much to do with romantic love, history reveals cross-purposes, because for Ovid adoration is only a means to an end. Ovid adores, not because he can't help himself, but because by feigning adoration he is more likely to succeed in seduction. He is a cunning and manipulative strategist, who advises on everything from good 'chat up' lines to how physical defects can be concealed by adopting special positions during intercourse. In an age of political correctness, he is still able to offend modern sensibilities. He recommends pretending to cry, making false promises, writing flattering verses (however insincere) and even coercion: `Some force is permissible – women are often pleased by force.'

Ovid also advises the aspirant libertine to affect the symptoms of love sickness: 'All lovers should be pallid, it's chic to be pale;/ Only fools deny it, pale skins rarely fail.' Moreover, he observes that loss of appetite and worry 'make the young lover as thin as a rake'. Therefore, if wishing to attract the attention of women, one should: `Look lean – it suggests passion.'

When Andrew Capelanus came to write his own work – The Art of Courtly Love – he did so by borrowing from Ovid. Thus, Ovid's cynical observations were used to shore up the romantic ideal. Love sickness – merely another weapon in Ovid's armamentarium – became fully established as a crucial sign of love's authenticity.

Capelanus described love as `a certain inborn suffering' and suggested thirty-one rules of love. They include the following:

Rule 2 He who is not jealous cannot love.
Rule 9 No one can love unless he is impelled by the persuasion of love (also translated as: No one can love who is not driven to do so by the power of love).

Rule 13 When made public love rarely endures.
Rule 14 The easy attainment of love makes it of little value; difficulty of attainment makes it prized.
Rule 15 Every lover regularly turns pale in the presence of his beloved.
Rule 16 When a lover suddenly catches sight of his beloved his heart palpitates.
Rule 20 A man in love is always apprehensive (also translated as: A lover is always fearful).
Rule 21 Real jealousy always increases the feeling of love.
Rule 22 Jealousy, and therefore love, are increased when one suspects his beloved.
Rule 30 A true lover is constantly and without intermission possessed by the thought of his beloved (Also translated as: The true lover is continuously obsessed with the image of his beloved.

Love and mental illness were closely linked according to the principles of Hippocratic medicine; however, Capelanus's principles seem to do much the same thing. At Poitiers it was decided that love – if true – must be disturbed and slightly perverse; it must be obsessive, compulsive, agitated, anxious, jealous, suspicious, clandestine, and frustrating.

There is still some debate concerning to what extent Capelanus meant his rules to be taken seriously. It is possible that The Art of Courtly Love was meant to be satirical – but if so, its satirical content was lost on contemporary and subsequent generations. The Art of Courtly Love was never viewed as a critique. It was always viewed as a manifesto.

Romantic love became an increasingly important feature of literature in the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The Lais of Marie de France and de Lorris's Romance of the Rose are significant examples; however, the quintessential courtly romance of the middle ages must be Tristan – now more widely encountered in the opera house as Wagner's Tristan and Isolde.

Although Tristan does not feature King Arthur, it is an 'Arthurian' romance set in a landscape of castles, quests and dragons. An authenticated 'original' does not exist, but five versions have been handed down – the most famous being those of Beroul, Gottfried von Strassburg and Thomas.

Tristan is raised by his uncle, King Mark of Cornwall, and it falls upon him to escort King Mark's bride-to-be, the beautiful Princess Isolde, from her home in Ireland to the king's castle. While crossing the Irish Sea, they both mistakenly drink a love potion, and subsequently fall in love. The love potion – a potent symbol of love's madness – neatly excuses Tristan's betrayal of his uncle.

In Gottfried's version, the bemused Tristan complains: `I do not know what has come over poor Isolde and me, but we have both of us gone mad in the briefest space of time, with unimaginable torment – we are dying of love …'

Tristan and Isolde (against their better judgement) become clandestine lovers and, in doing so, stir the gods of tragedy. Much of the ensuing drama concerns their attempts to avoid discovery, and eventually they must separate. Tristan is wounded by a poisoned spear and, as his life ebbs away, he calls for Isolde. She rushes to be with him, but arrives too late and can do nothing to save him. Clasping his dead body, she gives up her spirit and dies.

During the middle ages, romantic narrative's landscape of kings and queens, knights and ladies, heroism, bravery, destiny and magic became established in the Western imagination, and is familiar to children, appearing in numerous story-books. The idea of romantic love has penetrated so deep into our culture, that few people escape its influence before leaving the nursery. Unfortunately, a consequence of this is that many grow up assuming they will find fairy-tale happiness in the real world – an expectation that is rarely fulfilled. Moreover, it is curious that the main exemplars of courtly romance (which in a sense foster our fairy-tale aspirations) rarely end with a `happy ever after', but with torment, tears and death.

Men: Ask her for something

A Voice For Men Videos · 31 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We are not all feminists

A Voice For Men Videos · 31 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Edwina Currie spoke at the Oxford Union in 2013:

Lengthy Stardusk interview with Karen Straughan: Traditionalism, MGTOW and society

A Voice For Men Videos · 1 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Although this probably qualifies as “inside Baseball” to those new to the internal politics of the men’s movement, and mostly came about due to bad blood that developed between people with similar ideas but differing conclusions, this lengthy interview with Men’s Rights Superstar Karen Straughan and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) philosopher Stardusk (aka Thinking Ape) has some interesting insights into the future of MGTOW, MHRA and even PUA.

The rape of the Sabine women

Robert Brockway · 2 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

While the Roman Empire and the Roman Republic are well remembered today, less well known is the Kingdom of Rome.

Legend claims that the city of Rome was founded in 753BCE. Romulus killed Remus in an act of fratricide and went on to found the city of Rome, naming it after himself. Romulus then invited colonists to settle in his new city. A problem soon developed though. Most of the colonists were men. The Romans then hatched a plan. They would hold a festival and invite people from the neighbouring cities to attend. Then, at a pre-arranged signal, they would grab women from one of the neighbouring cities, Sabine, and then proceed to fight off the Sabine men. Somehow this bizarre plan is said to have worked.

This story, which is almost certainly entirely apocryphal, is remembered to history as the Rape of the Sabine women. Notably no women were raped. While they were briefly detained they were soon given the choice to freely marry the Roman men. The Sabine women, all but one of whom was unmarried, accepted marriage to the Romans. The story makes it clear that they had a choice to accept or reject these Roman men as their husbands.

Not surprisingly the surrounding cities declared war on Rome. Perhaps surprisingly the Sabines themselves were the last to declare war. Maybe they were debating whether they wanted the women back.

After a series of battles a Sabine army approached Rome. A young Roman woman, Tarpeia, saw an opportunity. She betrayed Rome and opened the city gates for the Sabines in return for loot. The story elaborates that Tarpeia was promised whatever the Sabines had on their wrists. She expected gold bracelets but was crushed by their shields as they poured through the city gates instead. Rough justice.

The Romans and Sabines then fought a pitched battle in the city. Suddenly the Sabine women rushed in to the middle of the fray. On one side were their husbands, on the other their fathers. They called on both sides to lay down their arms as they were now family. Peace was achieved. Men met their fathers-in-law for the first time. The story concludes by telling us that the Sabines joined with the Romans, becoming one nation. Thus, according to legend, this was the beginning of Rome.

We can learn a lot about a society from their legends. Even Roman commentator Titus Livius, better known as Livy, made it clear that no sexual assault took place and that the women were free to choose if they wanted to marry the Roman men. While this may seem like a modern concern, Livy made this point 2000 years ago.

The feminist historical narrative would have us believe that women were oppressed by The Patriarchy and are only now escaping its clutches. Even a story with a title as provocative as this reveals a more complex past. Twice in the story women act in a decisive manner to change events. Tarpeia opens the gates, nearly handing the battle to the Sabines. The Sabine women then intercede and stop the fight between their husbands and fathers. The women in this story had agency – a clear indication that this was how Roman society viewed women.

Compared to its contemporary societies ancient Rome had comparatively few women in public life, exerting direct authority. This sort of authority is sometimes called hard power. Roman women though were fully capable of exerting soft power. As wives and daughters, aristocratic women had the ear of powerful men. History is replete with examples of powerful men acting on advice from women close to them. Although their actions were not completely without risk, women historically exerting soft power generally experienced fewer direct threats to their health and safety. The actions of the Sabine women in stopping the battle is a good example of the effectiveness of soft power.

Feminists claim that ancient Rome was a Patriarchy. In the original sense of the word, in which father's ruled families, this is true. In the sense that feminists mean, in which men systematically oppress women, then it is very clearly not true. Feminism benefits from confusion between these two different meanings of the word Patriarchy.

If ancient Rome was a Patriarchy, in the sense that feminists mean, then neither the Roman not Sabine men would have paid any heed to a bunch of wailing women. Rather, then as now, the men wanted to keep their wives and daughters safe and happy and took their opinions in to account.

Ancient people lived lives far more similar to ours than is generally recognised. Many ancient societies though had better gender relations than we have today in the West. They understood gender differences and gender similarities – information that today has largely been forgotten.

The featured image depicts the painting 'The Intervention of the Sabine Women', by Jacques-Louis David, 1799.

Chivalry: A learned deathwish

Paul Elam · 3 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Just after midnight on April 22, 2016, 19-year-old Jason Cisneros stopped by his best friend Ivania's apartment to see her. When he arrived, he heard a commotion near where he parked.

He sent a text to Ivania inside, saying, "'I'm outside. There's a lady honking, and this guy wants to hit her. He wants to kill her."

Jason then approached the woman's car to intervene. Just a moment later, he lay dying on the street, with two gunshot wounds.

The news coverage on this, what little it will get, will paint a simple picture. A brave young man heard a woman in distress — a woman he did not even know — and lost his life trying to protect her.

Of course, the real story is not nearly so simple. What made this young man walk into the line of fire? Was it heroics? Why didn't he just call the police? Why did he feel the pull toward intervening in the troubles of a female stranger?

Why have men like this, rushing in and dying to protect women they don't even know, become their own crime statistic?

This is a sad event that illustrates so much of what is wrong with men's story in the modern age.

With the narrative about men's place in the world casting them in the role of a protective vassal, we have developed the expectation that this is what men ought to be.

Undoubtedly the news coverage will play this out as a senseless tragedy. Accordingly, most will eventually take refuge in the fanciful idea that Jason Cisneros died a hero.

The members of society, by and large, who read this story and watch the news video, will end up on a similar trajectory, toward glorifying the self-sacrifice.

They will not conclude that this was a young man who was set up, duped into putting his neck on the chopping block by a history and force he never had a chance to grow up to understand.

His parents will take solace in the idea that their son died doing something noble. His friend will apply a similar salve to her grief. Few, if any, will question the wisdom of his choice or the factors that drove him to make it.

Fewer still will wonder about the character of the woman he was trying to save, even though it was evident that she was in a relationship with a murderous thug, that her chickens had come home to roost that night, and that she wanted someone to rescue her at any cost.

Jason Cisneros
Jason Cisneros died trying to protect a woman he did not know, who it turns out may have been no more worthy of protection than the man who killed him.

Our society will interpret his death as heroics, and thus teach more young men that this insanity is the model of manhood they should emulate.

We will deny our young men the truth. Jason's impulse to rescue the damsel in distress is a dysfunctional mandate passed down from generation to generation living by a narrative that sees his life as easily disposable.

Was Jason a good man? Most probably he was, though I am loathe to use that term lightly anymore. There is too much pointless sacrifice that comes with it.

The small amount of information that I have indicates that he came from a loving, supportive and close-knit family.

And he was, after all, doing what he believed to be the right thing.

I can't even imagine the sense of loss his family feels right now. Parents burying a child instead of the reverse is a hugely painful deviation from the natural order.

But for the sake of preventing more funerals, it is important to push aside the misguided chivalry and false heroism of this event and recognize that Jason's death is one of countless, pointless sacrifices that never should have happened.

There is nothing to glorify here. Not the death of a beloved son. Not the ill-fated choices of young women who are sexually excited by criminality and violence.

And not the false code of male honor inflicted on young men from the shadows of a warped social consciousness.

There is a lesson here for parents and for anyone else who has a young man in their lives whom they love.

Please ask yourself, if your son or other loved one encountered the same situation as Jason, what would they do? Would they intervene? If they did, is that what you would want them to do?

Would it make you proud? If it would, are you willing to bury them for the sake of that pride?

If you would not want your son to die like Jason Cisneros died, have you told him? Have you made it clear to him that dying for a stranger is not your idea of manhood?

Have the lessons from your family been about protecting his loved ones, protecting himself, or about protecting anyone at his own expense?

You know, this stuff matters. Today's young men get copious amounts of messaging about manhood, most of it instructing them to accept their disposability by calling it a badge of honor.

Young men face a barrage of social messages to "man up" and be a "real man" and other shaming, exploitive instructions.

It even comes from the government. We see it in the "It's On Us" anti-sexual assault campaign, which includes President Obama and Vice-President Joe Biden, along with stars like Common, Mike Roe, and others, telling young men that it is on them to intervene.

Just like Jason Cisneros did.

Please watch the "It's On Us" video and think about the price Jason paid for making sure it was on him.

Doing that might make you stop to consider if you want to manipulate your son or another beloved man into playing unarmed and unpaid bodyguard, ever at the disposal of strangers.

And while you're at it, you might ask yourself something else. Do you have any reason to think Common would risk his life for a stranger?

Do you think Joe Biden cares about your son — or the women's vote?

When I look at what Jason's story turned into, all I see is a devastated family, a grieving friend, and a decent young man with a life cut short on behalf of someone who in no way warranted that kind of sacrifice – not that any stranger ever does.

Perhaps there is a better social message we can send all people, young and old. It's on you.

It's on you to forge the ability to protect yourself. It's on you to make sound decisions about people with whom you choose to get involved.

It is not the responsibility of strangers, and it is not a burden for another class of human beings to bear.

No one outside you, your family and the police have any obligation to take risks for your safety. If women don't know this, the parents of young men certainly should.

Men’s lives vs. feminist narratives explained using magnets

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 4 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Every era has had its mythology of women’s weakness and men’s strength. Ours is no different and it’s not progressive. How easy is it for you to see Jill as a victim? How hard is it for you to see Jack as vulnerable?

Bigotry is on the rise on college campuses

Tim Patten · 5 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Tim Patten passed away recently. This is a republication –Ed

Many would agree that sexism and racism remain serious and, in some cases a growing concern. However, those being discriminated against are not the ones that feminists and other alleged advocates for equal rights have traditionally focused their attentions and efforts on. Instead, the group being victimized is straight white men.

There is plenty of evidence to suggest that males are being mistreated—and yet, for some strange reason, many seem to find this totally acceptable. Ironically, one such example includes a ban on straight white men at the United Kingdom's equality conference of the University and College Union, reported by the Daily Mail in June 2016. But this was not an isolated event. Reports suggest that such developments are commonplace, for instance, on college campuses in the U.K., U.S. and elsewhere.

Simply put, white heterosexual men are blameworthy and deserve to be excluded.

Indeed, a flagrant hatred of men has been flourishing, aided by corrosive and self-serving narratives that are now sanctioned by governments, big businesses and the educational establishment. One early example includes a development caught on video on November 16, 2012 by the Canadian Association for Equality. Violent feminists disrupted a gathering of men at the University of Toronto who had come together to discuss male suicide and other issues. The protestors clashed with attendees, spitting and hurling vitriol at them for no apparent reason. A repeat of social justice warrior bigotry was on display on September 16, 2015 at a Milo Yiannopoulos event at Texas Technical Institute caught on video.

While other similar developments have not been memorialized in the same way, they all have something in common: they reflect a cancerous malady of ignorance and abhorrence that is becoming increasingly widespread. An intolerant alt-left now feels free and is openly encouraged to hurl hate speech at and commit acts of gender discrimination against white heterosexual men. It is a campaign aimed at dehumanizing an entire cross-section of people who happen to have one thing in common.

Disgust toward men has been a strong undercurrent in women's studies programs, but its tone and intensity began to escalate after the 2012 killing of Trayvon Martin and the subsequent shootings of unarmed young black men by white police. Third-wave feminists and Black Lives Matter activists tossed their misguided notions about patriarchy and male privilege into a bowl and mixed them with incendiary half-truths about white privilege from African American studies programs. They created a concoction of racial division, provoking a surge in the lines of hatred against white males.

In some ways, this radical blend resembles the final solution of Nazi Germany's Adolph Hitler, though in this case the group that is supposed to get annihilated is not the Jews but white heterosexual men. Instead of working to create the progressive world they claim to espouse, the alt-left is looking more and more like the next generation of right-wing oppressors and dictators. Their minions are encouraged to go forth and spew blatant disrespect, telling white men to "Check your privilege!"

Sadly, this unfortunate turn of events, while originally grounded on the principle of equality and justice for all, has been transformed into a roadmap of rage, retribution and revenge, without any basis in fact.

Women's studies and white privilege

The extent to which things have gone awry can be seen in a popular anthology about racial bias. In White Privilege, women's studies author and Senior Fellow at the City University of New York's Murphy Institute, Paula S. Rotenberg maintains that this imbalance is manufactured and socially invisible but that its consequences are lethal. She argues that whiteness is a social construct and scolds whites for refusing to acknowledge that they benefit from a form of racism. She suggests they can't see their privilege because they are accustomed to it, like fish that are unaware they live in water.

In her view, white men must give up their unfair advantages as reparations; whatever benefits their whiteness has afforded them must be sacrificed for the sake of social justice. Citing the example of a white and a black worker exerting the same amount of time and effort doing the same job, but where the latter is paid less, Rotenberg says that racial inequality is intolerable on its face because it leads to serious economic and other harm.

But as with many of her ilk, Paula S. Rotenberg falls into a trap in regard to cause and effect. Is it possible that this "discrimination" does not stem from racial differences, but from something else? Even though racism clearly exists, doesn't success depend on personal choices and how people manage their lives? Is race the reason why some succeed and others don't, or might it also have something to do with other factors, including attitude, intelligence–or even luck?

The greatest civilizations of all time

The same holds true when it comes to other physical differences. Most feminist scholars seem unable to broaden the lens through which they view the world. When they focus their attentions, they see only a black-and-white hierarchy, so to speak, based on gender, skin color or social caste. And yet, if they took pains to look at things less myopically, they might learn some interesting truths about race and opportunity–truths revealed through an assessment of the greatest civilizations of all time.

In particular, they would discover that ancient Egypt; the Chola Dynasty; and the Roman, Persian, Chinese, Mayan, Mongol, Inca and Ottoman empires were not only dominated by (mostly male) people of color, but that within each race individuals with lighter skin tones accounted for a disproportionate share of those at the top. All this occurred before the emergence of the British Empire, suggesting that biological preferences, rather than European-originated social constructs, drive the disparity.

In fact, if history is any guide, men of color are born with a natural ability to succeed and move society forward. The incredible Pyramids of Egypt were engineered and constructed by a dark skinned race and majestically awe any sober observer to this day. Once African Americans are freed from the suffocating constraints of victim narratives, they can unleash the kind of energy and drive that inspires communities of all races and colors from within. Thankfully, there are proven ways of ensuring that such individuals can reach their full potential and improve everyone's lives.

Our builders and inventors

Stepping back, it's worth reiterating that misconceptions about physical differences aren't confined to race. Feminists, for instance, conveniently ignore the fact that the engineers and builders of civilizations, kingdoms and nations have been men. They forget that males have harnessed fire, developed water distribution and sewage systems, and have created a vast array of innovative products, services, facilities and technologies that have served us well.

Male leadership, management and labor have helped to forge and sustain a world aimed at lifting people up, rather than keeping them down. Their accomplishments haven't just served selfish purposes. Instead, they appear to have been done out of a deep instinctual respect for tribes, cities and nations. Why, then, are feminists so focused on dismantling a framework that has benefited them–and everyone else?

A genuine alternative to the feminist way

It would be foolish to maintain that sexism, or racism, or any other form of discrimination doesn't exist, of course, or that some groups are not treated worse than others because of physical differences alone. Although progress has been made over several decades, the remnants of past errors and abuses remain. Bigotry, inequality in career opportunities, inner-city poverty, and the fact that blacks are the biggest victims by far of the rise of the incarceration culture would seem to be evidence of that.

Still, most Caucasians are aware there is a deep divide between blacks and whites, arguably stemming from the inhumanity of slavery, one of the deepest social injuries and regrets from our nation's past. In many cases, whites are imbued with "white guilt," which manifests itself as an urge to reach out and try to redress the imbalance. But that doesn't justify taking a radical line. Those who have suffered don't need victimhood to demoralize them or the self-destructive anarchy and violence that third-wave feminists advocate.

Addressing and repairing these problems is a better way to go, though it will no doubt take time and people willing to make the effort together. Sadly, the journey will likely be more arduous and prolonged so long as it is centered on impugning the state, patriarchy, and the propagandists' favorite object of disgust: white heterosexual men.

One key, of course, is to introduce programs designed to succeed. In inner city communities, this can be done through local churches, organizing and promoting specialized charter schools that serve the needs of boys in grades kindergarten through 12. These schools can foster self-esteem and encourage the youngest members of society to be productive and strong. Single-sex schools, with appropriately tailored learning environments and curricula, offer the best hope of improving achievement and the lives of inner city boys.

It requires organization, schedules and vision to reconstitute neighborhoods. The churches, schools and community leaders should invite a diversity of volunteers and contractors of other races to assist rebuilding neighborhoods and seize on black men's natural patriarchal and leadership skills. Integrated construction discussions and working together on the building efforts will reduce bigotry while neighborhoods can evolve upwards overtime. Educating the youngest boys in charter schools for boys with civic ideals in mind allows a community to create an army of enlightened individuals and leaders that can pave the way toward economic and structural reform. The secret is not to probe every nook and cranny for signs of racism, but to inspire one another with an intentional future vision of prosperity and peace. Communities should grab hold of the levers and dials that drive their destiny and engage the mechanisms that will lead to a bright and liberated future.

The Anti-Due Process / False Accusers Movement

Jonathan Taylor · 5 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In the last twelve months, coalitions of organizations and public officials have joined forces to demand the following in a education setting:

1. The explicit removal of the presumption of innocence
2. Punishment for accused students after courts find their guilt was determined in unconstitutional school proceedings
3. Immunity for knowingly false accusers

We list four key examples below and provide commentary at the end. This list is timely because it is immediately actionable; your senator who may be up for re-election in midterms may support such policies.

1. Nineteen Senators Demand the Removal of the Presumption of Innocence in Title IX Proceedings

In September, nineteen senators signed their names to a letter to the Department of Education to pressure them, in their re-write of Title IX regulations, to (among other things) "remove the presumption that the respondent is not responsible for sex discrimination until a determination is made." Patricia Hamill and KC Johnson wrote about it here. The names of the senators – some of whom are up for re-election – are:

1. Bernie Sanders
2. Elizabeth Warren
3. Patty Murray
4. Jeffrey Merkley
5. Cory Booker
6. Tammy Duckworth
7. Amy Klobuchar
8. Richard Blumenthal
9. Robert Casey
10. Tina Smith
11. Alex Padilla
12. Mazie Hirono
13. Tammy Baldwin
14. Jack Reed
15. Tim Kaine
16. Jacky Rosen
17. Benjamin Cardin
18. Ben Ray Lujan
19. Ron Wyden

2. Accuser Advocacy Coalition Demands the Removal of the Presumption of Innocence in Title IX Proceedings

This coalition of seventy-eight "anti-sexual violence organizations" submitted a letter comment to the Department of Education in September during the public comment period for the proposed regulations. The coalition stated that "We oppose the Department retaining the harmful rule from the previous administration that currently requires schools to presume that the respondent is not responsible for sex-based harassment (or other sex discrimination) until a determination is made and to inform both parties of this presumption." For space reasons, we will not list all of seventy-eight organizations here.

3. Accuser Advocacy Coalition Demands Immunity for False Rape Accusers

In Khan v. Yale, fifteen organizations filed an amicus brief demanding immunity for accusers from defamation suits, even when it is proven the accusers lied. Their brief argued that "Without protections from retaliation, including absolute immunity, victims will be dissuaded from using school reporting and disciplinary processes and will lose out on their education while perpetrators dodge accountability."

Of course, a false accuser is not a victim, and a defamation suit filed against a false accuser is not retaliation. False accusers are entitled to due process just like the people they accuse. And of course, if false accusers have immunity, it is they who will dodge accountability. The brief is laden with similar emotionally manipulative rhetoric. Interestingly, the proposed brief was initially denied, but the court allowed the organizations to resubmit a proposed brief that was – unlike the first one – "shorn of all facts not supported by the record." Here are the fifteen organizations who filed the brief:

1. Know Your IX
2. National Women's Law Center
3. Women's Law Project
4. Legal Momentum (formerly the National Organization for Women Legal Defense and Education Fund)
5. Fierberg National Law Group
6. Chicago Alliance Against Sexual Exploitation
7. Connecticut Coalition Against Domestic Violence
8. Futures Without Violence
9. Jewish Women International
10. National Alliance to End Sexual Violence
11. National Coalition Against Domestic Violence
12. National Crime Victim Law Institute
13. National Network to End Domestic Violence
14. Network for Victim Recovery of DC
15. Sanctuary for Families in Support of Defendant-Appellee

4. Accuser Advocacy Coalition Demands the Right for Accusers to "Preserve a School's Guilty Finding" After School Proceedings Were Found Unconstitutional

Accused student John Doe was victorious against UC-Santa Barbara when the court found he was not afforded due process and accordingly issued a writ ordering UC-Santa Barbara to set aside the imposed discipline. His accuser, a nonparty to the writ proceeding, then intervened and moved to vacate the order, arguing that she had a right to preserve a guilty finding against John Doe. She further argued that she had a right to participate in the writ proceeding at the trial court level.

She was unsuccessful on appeal, as a panel of three appellate judges found that she failed "to establish that she has a cognizable right to preserve a finding and sanction that were rendered in a proceeding that violated John's constitutional rights" and that her argument "confuses [her] interests with her rights." Ten accuser advocacy organizations filed briefs in her support. They are:

1. Know Your IX
2. National Women's Law Center
3. Women's Law Project
4. Family Violence Law Center
5. California Women's Law Center
6. Family Violence Appellate Project
7. Hannah Vigil, L.L.
8. Dunn Law Firm, PLLC
9. The Maryland Coalition Against Sexual Assault
10. Safety Advisors for Educational Campuses, LLC

Jane Doe's supporters would claim her intention was merely to seek a temporary preservation of a guilty finding until she could participate in the writ proceeding, but this claim is demonstrated hollow by the fact that – as the appellate court stated in its opinion – Jane Doe "articulates no direct interest in John's claim that the University violated his right to due process."

In short, if an accuser is frustrated that a school's unconstitutional proceeding backfired and was overturned in court, their argument is with the school, not the court that found the proceeding unconstitutional. As the opinion's author Judge Alison Tucher noted: "When the accused does not receive a fair hearing, neither does the accuser," citing Doe v. Regents of University of California (2018). Due process does not merely protect the rights of the accused; it protects the integrity of the system itself.

Commentary Regarding the Senators

As an organization, we do not tell anyone to vote down party lines. We do, however, ask that voters factor a public official's opposition to due process into their decision-making when voting for individuals. It can be frustrating that the world is, in some respects, going in the wrong direction. The key is focusing on what we can control and influence. The most immediate power you have to help the rights of the accused is to factor the nineteen senators' opposition to due process into your midterm vote.

Commentary Regarding Accuser Advocacy Organizations

As we are seeing, these organizations no longer simply oppose sexual violence or support victims. They now go much further by opposing the presumption of innocence, opposing a remedy for those wrongly found guilty in unconstitutional proceedings, and demanding immunity for abusers who simply choose false accusations as their preferred method of abuse. We will no longer refer to them as "anti-sexual violence organizations" as that is no longer appropriate, and we recommend that you do the same. They are better described simply as accuser advocacy groups – and for those who advocate immunity for false accusers, even that would be charitable.

If this is now the role of these organizations, there is no reason for many of them to continue to be funded or exist. Other organizations can take their place in serving victims without advocating such extreme measures. It is no different in any other context. Organizations opposed to gang violence can advocate an end it and support families shattered by it without advocating against the presumption of innocence, demanding immunity for false accusers, or demanding that institutions preserve findings of guilt that were produced by unconstitutional proceedings.

A false allegation of abuse isn't mere name calling. It is an attempt to destroy everything that makes life worth living: a good name, loving relationships, a sense of security and peace of mind, a decent job, education, and more. It is every bit as harmful as physical abuse, and no one should have immunity when acting in bad faith to destroy another person's life. Accuser advocacy organizations argue our institutions should categorically ignore an entire class of victims to support another, but it is not a zero-sum game. Treating it as such is unproductive and unworkable.

We would like to leave you with a quote by former Denver sex-crimes prosecutor Craig Silverman. Tellingly, he was only comfortable making this statement after his retirement. His candid comment is so insightful and has such a ring of truth that it deserves to be quoted at length:

For 16 years, I was a kickass prosecutor who made most of my reputation vigorously prosecuting rapists. I am unaware of any Colorado prosecutor who put as many rapists away for as much prison time as I did during my prosecutorial career. Several dozen rapists are serving thousands of years as a result of my efforts.

However, during my time as a prosecutor who made case filing decisions, I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations that were made to the Denver Police Department. It was remarkable and surprising to me. You would have to see it to believe it.

Any honest veteran sex assault investigator will tell you that rape is one of the most falsely reported crimes that there is. A command officer in the Denver Police sex assaults unit recently told me he placed the false rape numbers at approximately 45 percent. Objective studies have confirmed this. See Purdue Professor Kanin's nine-year study published in 1994 concluding that over 40 percent of rape allegations were demonstrably false.

The above statements are heresy to say publicly for many politically correct prosecutors. That is especially true if they want to maintain good relations with the victim advocacy community.

Silverman's comment was made nearly twenty years ago (2004). The problems with the accuser advocacy community have only gotten worse.

Love sick (part 2)

Dr. Frank Tallis · 6 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following is Part 2 of a three-part series about romantic love from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. In this part Dr. Tallis uncovers the cultural roots of men's tendency toward idealizing women and placing them on pedestals. -Ed.

Incurable Romantics

The romantic themes of idealisation and forbidden (or non-consummated) love were taken to new extremes in Renaissance Italy. Poets such as Dante and Petrarch placed their muses on absurdly elevated pedestals. Dante's Beatrice, and Petrarch's Laura, are portrayed as models of perfection and purity. Moreover, the fact that both women died prematurely and then reappear in poetic visions, emphasises their divinity. There is some debate concerning the identity of Petrarch's Laura. She may have been Laure de Noves of Avignon (a married woman with children), or she may never have existed at all (being merely a poetic invention). Dante's Beatrice, on the other hand, was definitely a real person.
The extreme idealisation of Beatrice and Laura is partly attributable to Marianism. During the thirteenth century, Mary became increasingly important as a mediator between human beings and God. It was to Mary that the majority prayed for divine intercession. She was more `human', and therefore approachable, than all three personifications of the Holy Trinity. Moreover, her curious (and paradoxical) position as the mother of God gave her considerable authority. For some time, the river of romantic literature was swollen by the tributary of Marianism. Women were worshipped with religious fervour, and sexual desire was wholly sublimated.

The story of Dante and Beatrice is principally recorded in Dante's The New Life (a hybrid of autobiography and literary treatise). They met for the first time as children, when the poet accompanied his father to the house of Folco Portinari (Beatrice's father). Dante immediately fell in love with Beatrice and remained devoted to her (more or less) for the rest of his life. She was married to a banker from an early age, and so – in true courtly style – Dante was forced to admire her from a distance. He appropriated the Arthurian role of Lancelot, and championed his `mistress', not with arms, but with poetry.

The Marian nature of Dante's love for Beatrice did not exempt him from the commonplace symptoms of love sickness. He complained of all the usual problems: expansive moods and depression, lightheadedness, obsession, anorexia, sleeplessness, paleness, trepidation and anguish. And Beatrice occupied such an elevated position in his universe that even the slightest suspicion of her disapproval was crushing. When she failed to return his greeting, Dante became extremely distressed:

> … I was overcome by such sorrow that I left my fellow men and went to a secluded place, where I could bathe the earth with my bitter tears. Then, when my weeping was almost exhausted, I took myself to my room, where I could lament without being overheard. There, while calling for mercy from the lady of courtesy, and crying `Love, help your servant!', I fell asleep like a little child crying after it has been beaten.

If anything, the spiritual nature of Dante's love for Beatrice seemed to exaggerate the usual psychopathological resonances. Even his moments of rapture were tainted with the uncomfortable, manic energy of a religious fanatic. His eyes shine, and we question his sanity; we are not very far away from shaking fists, prophecy and revelation.

Perhaps the most compelling example of this arose during a period of sickness, when it suddenly occurred to Dante that Beatrice was mortal and might one day die: 'At this I was overcome by such delirium that I shut my eyes and started to thrash about like a fever patient.' He then entered a world of lurid hallucination: 'Then I saw the sun darken and the stars changed to such a colour that I thought they wept; birds dropped dead while flying through the air, and there were vast earthquakes.' We are reminded of the darkness that fell on the earth at the time of the crucifixion. For Dante, a presentiment of separation was not painful – it was the apocalypse.

At the age of twenty-four Beatrice did die, and predictably Dante was thrown into deep despair – even though, by then, he too was married. While grieving, he became temporarily infatuated with another woman; however, these feelings were completely expunged when Beatrice appeared to him in a heavenly vision. Dante was reminded of Beatrice's incomparable beauty and he subsequently committed himself to a life of continued adoration. He became, in effect, a votary.

Love is predicated on togetherness in a world where things must exist separately, and total separation – because of death – is an inevitable and unbearable truth that few lovers can keep from contemplating. In the history of romantic story telling, love and death are old companions. Great love stories are made all the more poignant by our certain knowledge that the couple are cavorting on the lip of an open grave.

In his scholarly treatise, Love in the Western World, the Swiss philosopher Denis de Rougemont wrote:

> Romance only comes into existence when love is fatal, frowned upon and doomed by life itself. What stirs lyrical poets to their finest flights is neither the delight of the senses nor the fruitful contentment of the settled couple; not the satisfaction of love, but its passion. And passion means suffering.

To live up to the romantic ideal, love must be fated. It must be passionate, painful and ultimately doomed. It must culminate in death and, if we are lucky, transfiguration.

But why?

Although death appears in love stories prior to the middle ages, it does so in the service of tragedy. After the middle ages, however, death is almost wholly in the service of love. The outcome of a fated love story might still be tragic, but death's function has changed. Essentially, it offers unlimited possibilities for idealisation.

The most extraordinary feature of Dante's The New Life is the degree to which he idealises Beatrice. Until Dante, almost all love poetry – however heady – recognised that beauty fades. In the end, time must ruin even the loveliest of faces. Yet, when it comes to Beatrice, Dante simply refuses to concede any ground to time. Of course, Beatrice conveniently obliged him by dying young, and in the reliquary of Dante's imagination, Beatrice's incorruptible body parts were preserved like those of a medieval saint.

The romantic tradition has always demanded that the beloved be, in some sense, beyond reach. Yearning, without out satisfaction or release, was presumed to be ennobling. Because romantic love is never supposed to be consummated, it never weakens, and continues to dignify the lover. When the beloved dies, she exchanges an earthly marriage for a numinous marriage. In death, she becomes completely unattainable, and the yearning must then go on for ever.

Islamic mysticism, courtezia and Renaissance literature have all added registers of meaning to the word `romantic'; however, it has also been enriched by association with a more recent, but nevertheless highly important, cultural development – the rise of Romanticism.

Strictly speaking, Romanticism is only tenuously connected with `romantic love'. The Romantic movement began in Germany towards the end of the eighteenth century, and continued to be influential, by varying degrees, until the end of the nineteenth. It began as a reaction against the values and preoccupations of the Enlightenment. The great thinkers of the Enlightenment venerated reason, lived in cities, and were keen to instigate political change. Romantics, on the other hand were fascinated by emotions, revered nature, and were far more interested in personal psychology than social reform.

The concerns of the Romantic movement were much wider than those of the troubadours or the Court of Love at Poitiers. Even so, in matters of love, there are several continuities that link the idea of romance with Romanticism. Indeed, the work which launched the Romantic movement was a love story which preserves many courtly themes.

This was Goethe's 1774 novel, The Sorrows of Young Werther.

Werther, an artistic young man, falls in love with the beautiful Lotte. Unfortunately, she is already engaged to Albert, a gentleman renowned for his honesty and good character. While waiting for Albert to announce the wedding day, Werther learns that Lotte and Albert have already been married. Werther tries to divert himself, and for a while wanders aimlessly, but his yearning for Lotte does not diminish and he feels compelled to return.

Werther is consumed with jealousy: 'At times I cannot grasp that she can love another man, that she dare love another man, when I love her alone with such passion and devotion, and neither know nor have anything but her!' He sinks into black despair: 'Ah, have ever men before me been so miserable?'

While out walking on a wet, dreary day, he meets a madman 'scrabbling about the rocks' picking flowers for his 'sweetheart'. The madman's mother appears, and explains to Werther that her son has only recently been released from a madhouse, where he has been restrained in chains for a whole year. The following day, Werther discovers that the madman was previously a clerk employed by Lotte's father. He, too, had fallen in love with Lotte, and the revelation of his love had cost him first his position and then his sanity.

The encounter with the madman is a presentiment of Werther's own fate. He becomes progressively more disturbed, agitated and has hallucinatory dreams of making love to Lotte: 'My senses are confused, for a full week I have been unable to think straight, my eyes are full of tears.' His misery becomes intolerable – even to the solicitous Lotte – who perceptively suggests: 'I fear, I very much fear that what makes the desire to possess me so attractive is its very impossibility.'

Werther cannot be reasoned with. He desires an eternal connection with Lotte, and he begins to see how this might be achieved. He leaves instructions for his body to be buried in clothes that are 'sacred' (because Lotte has touched them), and places a pink ribbon – a gift from Lotte – in his pocket. While experiencing a kind of spiritual reprieve from mental anguish ('All around me is so silent, and my soul is calm') Werther shoots himself, and dies.

A romantic love triangle, an idealised woman, an episode of wandering, and a young man who edges towards his doom. The old courtly themes are very much in evidence; however, it is Werther's demise that seems to resonate most strongly with the mystical origins of romantic idealism. Ultimately, courtly love is about realising spiritual objectives: beauty is back-lit by a sun that sets in paradise.

The spiritual sub-text of Werther's love for Lotte surfaces several times before his death. For example, at one point, he says of Lotte: 'She is sacred to me. All my desires are stilled in her presence. I never know what I am about when I am with her; it is as if my soul were throbbing in every nerve.' In another section, the possibility of a spiritual reunion is innocently raised by Lotte herself, when she discusses her religious convictions: 'There will be a life for us after death, Werther! . . . but will we find each other again? And know each other? What do you suppose? What do you say?'

The Romantics had a highly developed sense of the numinous. They believed in a universal soul – a mysterious `fundament' behind visible nature. Moreover, they believed that an understanding of this deeper truth might be achieved through communion with nature, or the experience of altered states of consciousness, such as powerful emotions, dreams or madness.

In this sense, Romanticism returns romantic love to its cultural source. It returns us to the desert, where Islamic sages sought truth in beauty. We are again in the company of Majnun, whose love is so intense, so powerful, it punctures the celestial dome and fenestrates heaven.

Romanticism is the closest thing we have to a religious faith in a predominantly secular society. This is probably because love is frequently associated with intense experiences of rapture and ecstasy. When love's madness enters its manic phase, consciousness is raised. If love is consummated, sexual activity can intensify the experience even further – evoking what psychologists have called 'oceanic feelings'.

Love's rapture and transcendent states have much in common. Both achieve a sense of escape from the limitations of human identity by union with another being (either lover or God). The desired outcome is a kind of self-annihilation, in which personality, ordinarily overburdened with worldly concerns, is lost in a moment of pure, unadulterated bliss.

Almost all religions have a pseudo-erotic mystical tradition. Hindus practise sexual Tantra and Sufi poetry is fundamentally love poetry. Even Christianity has – to the considerable embarrassment of the Church itself – been unable to resist linking sex and spirituality. St Teresa of Avila, for example, evokes the female genitalia by describing a 'wound of love', and famously wrote about a vision in which she was penetrated by an angel carrying a golden spear with 'a point of fire'. For St Teresa, spiritual enlightenment is a process that begins when the soul falls in love with God, and ends with 'spiritual marriage'.

In Revelations of Divine Love, another medieval Christian mystic, Julian of Norwich, described oddly pornographic visions of Jesus Christ's bleeding body. The sensuous language she employs knowingly emphasises the carnal aspects of carnage. Thus, her 'revelation' is 'horrifying and dreadful, sweet and lovely'. Moreover, when Jesus speaks, he speaks in the person of a lover: 'It is I whom you love; it is I whom you delight in … it is I whom you long for, whom you desire.'

The division that exists between reason and emotion has created a curious predicament for Western humanity. We find it hard to believe in God, but at the same time, we still have the capacity to look at the natural world and feel something thing close to reverence and awe. Although we suspect that there is no God, we feel that there should be. We are still dissatisfied with the limitations of personal identity. This is evidenced by the continuing popularity of recreational drugs. In the absence of an alternative, many settle for a chemical Nirvana.

In the East, where spirituality is still very much a part of everyday life, less is expected of love between human beings. The spiritual instinct is satisfied by religious observances, meditation or scripture. In the West, however, where religion plays no real part in the lives of most people, we have replaced religion with love. We have become passionate pilgrims, seeking the transport and meanings of spiritual ecstasy in the religion of romance and the sacrament of sex.

Even if we have little knowledge of the cultural history of romance, we all – to a greater or lesser extent – subscribe to a broad set of 'romantic' expectations. The notion of romance has inveigled itself into every aspect of courtship, sex and love. We seek to create a 'romantic atmosphere' on a dinner date, we allow ourselves the indulgence of a 'holiday romance', or attempt to revive passion with a long-term partner by taking a 'romantic weekend break'.

The cultural history of 'romance' and various meanings of the word 'romantic' make it extremely difficult to define 'romantic love'. Academic psychology – usually quite pedantic about its terminology – has been unable to establish a consensus. Some psychologists use the term in accordance with its courtly origins, whereas others use it interchangeably with 'passionate love'. As a culture, we seem to have settled on the latter usage, viewing 'romantic love' and 'falling in love' as much the same thing.

It has already been argued that the fundamental features of romantic love are evolutionary in origin. Thus, courtship gives women time to evaluate the fitness of suitors; heroic acts are a form of male resource display; and an exclusive (or idealised) relationship is necessary for the formation of a strong pair-bond. Most contemporary evolutionary theorists would agree with Capelanus when he points out that the ease with which love can be won is inversely related to its value. In any social hierarchy, the more beautiful a woman is, the more difficult it will be for a man to win her affection. Beauty advertises good genes which, being at a premium, can be withheld for longer. A beautiful woman is never short of suitors. The inaccessibility of fairy-tale queens is perhaps the logical extension of this principle.

That we should find traces of evolutionary theory in story telling is unremarkable. Art has always served as an instrument of self-enquiry and self-definition. Therefore, it was inevitable that certain fundamental features of human behaviour should appear as conventions in romantic literature. The problem with the courtly tradition, however, is that during the course of its development, the romantic ideal became increasingly rigid and extreme; the imposition of arbitrary codes of conduct offered unlimited scope for self-contradiction contradiction and confusion.

The idea that psychopathology is related to conflict is an old one, and it is an explanatory principle that appears and reappears in the writings of numerous psychologists. Thus, individuals whose theories of psychopathology are extremely different – for example, Sigmund Freud and Ivan Pavlov – still have this much in common.

In the 195os, Gregory Bateson and colleagues developed a new conflict-based theory of psychopathology which made use of a pivotal concept known as the 'double bind'. Essentially, Bateson suggested that severe psychological problems might be caused by 'mixed messages' – as, for example, when a mother repeatedly tells her son that she loves him, while turning her head away in disgust. The term double bind has also been used to describe 'catch-22' situations, where whatever choice is made, the outcome is undesirable.

The doctrine of romantic love has a double bind at its heart. It confuses the carnal and the spiritual. What started off as allegorical literature eventually became a code of conduct – and a completely impractical one at that. Arab mystical literature explored the correspondences between sexual desire and spiritual desire. However, as these threads were carried over the Pyrenees they became inextricably entangled – and much follows from this. The ever present tension between the carnal and spiritual produces a dynamic which generates layer upon layer of self-contradiction.

We expect another human being to make us feel complete, or fulfilled, yet these profound feelings of completion are usually only vouchsafed to the spiritually enlightened. We expect passionate love to last for ever – and even increase in intensity – but it is transitory; it almost always diminishes or turns into companionate love. We expect beauty to be resistant to the depredations of time, but all beauty fades. We like to think that we are being inexorably guided by supernatural forces towards one true love, but the most important factor in the formation of relationships (whether we like it or not) is chance, and in reality we fall in love promiscuously.

Worse still, the fabric of romance comes apart under the forces generated by its own contradictions. Women are worshipped as paradigms of purity, personifications of Marian virtue, but the foundations of adoration sink into a quagmire of lust and desire. Men make women into Madonnas, but cannot deny their sexual needs. Thus, they inevitably despoil paradise. In the later versions of 'Arthurian' legend (including those concerning Tristan), this is recognised by the introduction of a fatally adulterous relationship: Lancelot sleeps with Guinevere; Tristan sleeps with Isolde. As the courtly tradition evolved, more and more writers became preoccupied with adultery, rather than ennobling abstinence.

The impossible demands of romantic love have left a deep impression on Western literature. As Denis de Rougemont has astutely observed: 'To judge by literature, adultery would seem to be one of the most remarkable of occupations in both Europe and America. Few are the novels that fail to allude to it … Without adultery, what would happen to imaginative writing?'

The fairy-tale, 'Once-upon-a-time' world of romantic love promises that we will live 'happy ever after', but romantic narrative is pure tragedy. Heroes vacillate between euphoria and melancholy, and then subside into states of morbid obsession. The name Tristan means child of sadness, and few romances end without first taking casualties. The confusion of the carnal and spiritual invites death into the bedroom and, ultimately, we join our voices with a vast choir and sing that great anthem of self-contradiction, the liebestod, the love death. Procreation and extinction accidentally join hands in the conceptual fog of romantic idealism, with devastating consequences.

Our romantic legacy is predicated on a Batesonian double bind, and its mixed messages incline us towards emotional instability. If evolutionary pressures have determined that love should drive us mad, then cultural pressures have created ideal conditions for its incubation.

Parental Alienation: Parent-Child reunification after alienation

Dr. Edward Kruk · 6 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The final installment of our three-part series on parental alienation examines programs, services, and interventions that combat alienation and seek to reunite estranged parents and their children while addressing the significant clinical challenges in working with alienating parents.

Children and parents who have undergone forced separation from each other in the absence of abuse, including cases of parental alienation, are highly subject to post-traumatic stress, and reunification efforts in these cases should proceed carefully and with sensitivity. Alienated children seem to have a secret wish for someone to call their bluff, compelling them to reconnect with the parent they claim to hate; despite strongly held positions of alignment, alienated children want nothing more than to be given the permission and freedom to love and be loved by both parents (Baker, 2010). Yet the influence of the alienating parent is too strong to withstand, and children's fear that the alienating parent may fall apart or withdraw his or her love holds them back. Research has shown that many alienated children can transform quickly from refusing or staunchly resisting the rejected parent to being able to show and receive love from that parent, followed by an equally swift shift back to the alienated position when back in the orbit of the alienating parent (Fidler and Bala, 2010). Thus while children's stated wishes regarding parental residence and contact in contested custody after divorce should be considered, they should not be determinative in cases of parental alienation.

Reunification efforts subsequent to prolonged absence should be undertaken with service providers with specialized expertise in parental alienation reunification. A number of models of intervention have been developed, the best-known being Warshak's (2010) Family Bridges Program, an educative and experiential program focused on multiple goals: allowing the child to have a healthy relationship with both parents, removing the child from the parental conflict, and encouraging child autonomy, multiple perspective-taking, and critical thinking. Sullivan's Overcoming Barriers Family Camp (Sullivan et al, 2010), which combines psycho-educational and clinical intervention within an environment of milieu therapy, is aimed toward the development of an agreement regarding the sharing of parenting time and a written aftercare plan. Friedlander and Walters' (2010) Multimodal Family Intervention provides differential interventions for situations of parental alignment, alienation, enmeshment, and estrangement. All of these programs emphasize the clinical significance of children coming to regard their parents as equally valued and important in their lives while helping enmeshed children relinquish their protective role toward their alienating parents.

In reunification programs, alienated parents will benefit from guidelines with respect to their efforts to provide a safe, comfortable, open, and inviting atmosphere for their children. Ellis (2005) outlines five strategies for alienated parents: (1) erode children's negative image by providing incongruent information; (2) refrain from actions that put the child in the middle of conflict; (3) consider ways to mollify the anger and hurt of the alienating parent; (4) look for ways to dismantle the coalition between the child and alienating parent and convert enemies to allies; and (5) never give up on reunification efforts. As much as possible, Warshak (2010) recommends, alienated parents should try to expose their children to people who regard them, as parents, with honor and respect, to let children see that their negative opinion, and the opinion of the alienating parent, is not shared by the rest of the world. This type of experience will leave a stronger impression than anything the alienated parent can say on his or her own behalf, according to Warshak.

As Baker (2010) writes, alienated parents acutely feel the hostility and rejection of their children. These children seem cruel, heartless, and devaluing of their parents. Yet it is important to realize that from the child's perspective, it is the targeted parent who has rejected them; they have been led to believe that the parent whom they are rejecting does not love them, is unsafe, and has abandoned them. Thus, the primary response of the alienated parent must always be one of loving compassion, emotional availability, and absolute safety. Patience and hope, unconditional love, being there for the child, is the best response that alienated parents can provide their children, even in the face of the sad truth that this may not be enough to bring back the child.

With alienating parents, it is important to emphasize that as responsible parenting involves respecting the other parent's role in the child's life, any form of denigration of a former partner and co-parent is harmful to children. Children's connections to each parent must be fully respected, to ensure their well-being, as children instinctively know, at the core of their being, that they are half their mother and half their father. This is easier said than done, as alienating parents are themselves emotionally fragile, with a prodigious sense of entitlement and need to control (Richardson, 2006), and thus pose significant clinical challenges. Yet poisoned minds and instilled hatred toward a parent is a very serious form of abuse of children. When children grow up in an atmosphere of parental alienation, their primary role model is a maladaptive, dysfunctional parent. It is for this reason that many divorce specialists (e.g., Fidler and Bala, 2010) recommend custody reversal in such cases, or at least a period of separation between a child and an alienating parent during the reunification process with an alienated parent. I have come to believe, however, that the means of combating alienation should not themselves be alienating, and that a non-punitive approach is most effective, with co-parenting being the primary goal. Thus engaging and involving the alienating parent in reunification programs, whenever possible, is critical (Sullivan et al, 2010).

Finally, it is often quite difficult to discern who is the alienating and who is the targeted parent in alienation cases. Thus, equal or shared parenting is clearly preferable to primary residence or sole custody orders in potential alienation cases, as courts are ill-equipped to assess the dynamics attendant to parental alienation, and co-parenting is preventive of alienation.

Sources:

Baker, A. (2010). "Adult recall of parental alienation in a community sample: Prevalence and associations with psychological maltreatment." Journal of Divorce and Remarriage, 51, 16-35.

Ellis, E.M. (2005). "Support for the alienated parent." American Journal of Family Therapy, 33, 415-426.

Fidler, B. and Bala, N. (2010). "Children resisting postseparation contact with a parent: Concepts, controversies, and conundrums." Family Court Review, 48(1), 10-47.

Friedlander, S. & Walters, M.G. (2010). "When a child rejects a parent: Tailoring the intervention to fit the problem." Family Court Review, 48(1), 98-111.

Richardson, P. (2006). A Kidnapped Mind. Toronto: Dundurn Press.

Sullivan, M.J. et al. (2010). "Overcoming Barriers Family Camp." Family Court Review, 48(1), 116-135.

Warshak, R. (2010). "Family Bridges: Using insights from social science to reconnect parents and alienated children." Family Court Review, 48(1), 48-80.

The Beauty of Men

Mark Dent · 7 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

So many of the most touching, joy filled moments of my life have been experienced in my encounters with men.

My father , who was a passionate lover of literature, history, music and above all his children, was the first man to open my eyes to the beauty, terror and magic to be found in life. Dad would tell us stories in which we played the starring roles. You cannot imagine the thrill we experienced when we heard our names spoken as we bravely faced monsters or rescued our siblings from danger.

Dad hugged and kissed us with ferocious love. When he arrived home from work each night there was a stampede as five ecstatic children rushed to the front door to greet him. Again, Dad's magic was in play as he greeted each one of us with our special nicknames and a tickle on the tummy or affectionate rub of the neck.

I still recall the rush of warmth which flowed through my body each and every time this ritual took place.

It was easy to love my dad. He made us feel special. Dad told us tales of terror and inspired my love of history with his endless passion for great men of the past. He made me think about the raw courage of great warriors or the inspired genius of Mozart and Beethoven. He read the classic Matthew Arnold poem, Sohrab and Rustum to my brothers and I each night and although we were only young boys of primary school age, we grasped enough of the poem to appreciate the tragic ending… A father unknowingly kills his only beloved son in mortal combat, and discovers too late, that the man dying on the ground at his feet is the son he has longed to find.

I remember to this day, the quiver of emotion in my dad's voice as he read this heartrending scene and though much of the text was beyond me, I saw how deeply it moved my father…and I have never forgotten.

*****

He spoke; but Rustum gazed, and gazed, and stood

Speechless; and then he utter'd one sharp cry:

O boy—thy father!—and his voice choked there.

And then a dark cloud pass'd before his eyes,

And his head swam, and he sank down to earth.

But Sohrab crawl'd to where he lay, and cast

His arms about his neck, and kiss'd his lips,

And with fond faltering fingers stroked his cheeks,

Trying to call him back to life; and life

Came back to Rustum, and he oped his eyes,

And they stood wide with horror; and he seized

In both his hands the dust which lay around,

And threw it on his head, and smirch'd his hair,—

His hair, and face, and beard, and glittering arms;

And strong convulsive groanings shook his breast,

And his sobs choked him; and he clutch'd his sword,

To draw it, and for ever let life out.

But Sohrab saw his thoughts, and held his hands

And with a soothing voice he spake, and said:—

"Father, forbear! for I but meet to-day

The doom which at my birth was written down

In Heaven, and thou art Heaven's unconscious hand.

*****

As I reflect upon my childhood, I believe more than anything else, it was my dad's passion for films which carried a recurrent theme and our exposure to them which first awakened me to the many wonderful qualities possessed by men.

These films reinforced the message that most men are strong and good. The Yearling, starring Gregory Peck tore my heart out, but it taught me a lesson I reflect upon to this day. When a young fawn, adopted as a pet by the only child of a poor family, continues to destroy the family's desperately needed crops, the family has no choice but to shoot the fawn. The young boy, Jody, has to carry out this deed himself as his father is bedridden with torn back muscles. Jody carries out the execution but his heart is filled with rage and hatred for his parents who he believes have betrayed him and his beloved yearling, Flag.

After running away and going without food or shelter for three days, Jody finds his way home and when he is reunited with his adoring dad, Penny, he receives a little wisdom from his father.

'..Ever' man wants life to be a fine thing, and a easy. 'Tis fine, boy, powerful fine, but 'tain't easy. Life knocks a man down and he gits up and it knocks him down agin. I've been uneasy all my life…I've wanted life to be easy for you. Easier'n 'twas for me. A man's heart aches, seein' his young uns face the world. Knowin' they got to get their guts tore out, the way his was tore. I wanted to spare you, long as I could. I wanted you to frolic with your yearlin'. I knowed the lonesomeness he eased for you. But ever' man's lonesome. What's he to do then? What's he to do when he gits knocked down? Why, take it for his share and go on.

The classic Dicken's novel, A Tale of Two Cities was adapted to film on more than one occasion. The Ronald Colman version stands as the most powerfully moving of them all.

I saw a man offer up his own life so the woman he loved more than life itself could find happiness in the arms of another man. In the moments before his own death he comforted a frightened young girl, and helped her to face her last moments on earth. As he stood before the guillotine awaiting his execution, his final thoughts etched themselves in my heart:

"It is a far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest that I go to than I have ever known."

When dad introduced me to the film, Goodbye, Mr Chips I was not to know how deeply it would influence the direction of my life and the career I chose to pursue.

Mr Chips forged deep, lasting friendships with the students he taught. He became a true educator when he dropped his defenses and showed his humanity to the boys in his care. When I became a teacher I never forgot the lessons I learned when my dad first introduced me to dear Mr Chips.

Throughout my career in education my guiding principle was nothing simpler than to love the children in my care and not be afraid to bring them into my life or reveal my own fear and vulnerability. Many years earlier, as a boy, I learned that we can only build deep, lasting relationships by doing just that. I did, and still do and have been able to forge my own precious friendships with many of the kids I have taught. All this has come to pass in a way that makes my life seem magical.

We watched Luke Jackson (Paul Newman) defy an oppressive, unjust system in Cool Hand Luke and win the hearts and minds of his fellow prisoners with his courage and charisma. One scene which touched me deeply was when Luke was informed that his mum had died. This “cool hand” grieves his loss by strumming his banjo and singing his mum’s favorite song. I saw a strong man shed tears of grief without losing the respect of his hardened, criminal peers. As a boy these lessons were carved into my heart.

I was mesmerized by the power of one man, who, armed with nothing but a sharp mind and moral courage, was able to sway a jury which had been convinced of the guilt of a young man and were willing to see him die.

The most powerful moment came at the end of the film. The character played by Henry Fonda walked over to the man who had opposed, abused, belittled and antagonized him throughout the long night as they debated the case they had witnessed. When this broken jury member revealed the true motivations behind his rage, Henry Fonda reached out with an act of such quiet tenderness that even as a boy it struck home so powerfully I never forgot it. Watch from the 1:17 mark for this simple gesture that says so much. For me it encapsulates the quiet, almost unnoticed gestures men so often perform, gestures which carry deep love, tenderness and compassion.

I experienced such gestures on many occasions when I was battling bone cancer. My mates would come and sit quietly by my bed, unsure about what to say or do. When the time to leave arrived, they would shake my hand and hold it firmly and meaningfully for far longer than a normal handshake required. It filled me with such warmth, as everything they felt and wanted to say was expressed in that passionate grip of my hand.

One evening my rugged brick laying brother in law came to visit with my sister. He stood in the background throughout the visit. When the time to depart arrived, he walked to my bedside, still not having uttered a word, bent down and kissed my forehead.

Another man, who I had only got to know because he was a parent of a boy I taught, came to me well after visiting hours were over and sat beside my bed in silence. I had a fever and he simply placed a cool, wet cloth on my forehead. When it became hot he rose and placed it in cold water before returning it to my burning face.

I have not seen this man in over 25 years, but I will never forget the love he showed me on that long, dark night.

We watched Atticus Finch defend a black man against a false rape accusation. He did so with such courage and dignity and showed such tenderness and love for his children even in his darkest, most fearful moments.

Captains Courageous broke my heart yet again. The courage and incredible love and tenderness shown by Manuel (Spencer Tracy), the rough fisherman, to the young, spoiled rich boy rescued from the sea, caused a huge transformation to take place in the young man. Manuel became yet another role model for me to try to emulate in my own small way.

And that simple song Manuel sings as he plays his hurdy gurdy is unforgettable.

One Saturday night dad sat me down alongside him on the couch and suggested I watch a film that was about to start. It was called The Man Who Would Be King. The two main characters, Daniel Dravot(Sean Connery) and Peachy Carnehan(Michael Caine) could best be referred to as lovable rogues. In the final moments of the film, when the two best friends are facing death, you see men at their finest. I saw two noble, dignified mates who stood side by side and looked their mortality in the face without regret or recriminations.

These glorious films seeped into my blood and bones along with the literature and music dad drowned us in.

I loved men. I believed in their innate goodness. I was not disappointed once I left the bosom of my family and ventured out into the world.

My life is littered with countless moments of the most exquisite tenderness and compassion in my encounters with men.

Don’t be mistaken. I have been married to the most beautiful human being I have encountered. Her name is Maggie and she is my soulmate. I have a daughter and a son and both are a source of endless joy in my life. I loved my mum with all my heart and we had a close relationship. I have many close female friends……but the men. There is something in them which has the capacity to move me in a manner that I find hard to explain.

Why should I try?

I simply love the many men in my life.

I have written many simple poems about my dad over the years. Here is one to finish my small tribute to him and all of the beautiful men in my life..

*****

My Father

He carried me in his arms late at night

When I cried in pain or felt afraid

He soothed me with tender words

And gentle movement

He washed me in the bath

And then dried me vigorously

-never forgetting the gaps between my toes

He told me stories of great people,

Brave men who died for love

Or a simple idea

He scared me with terrifying stories of axemen

And long, dark corridors

He introduced me to the world of music

And planted a deep seed of love

By showing me

A young boy and his deer,

A king and his dream

And a little girl who finally understood

That there is no place like home

He welcomed me into a game which became a part

Of my heartbeat-and we shed tears of joy and anguish

Over many years as we followed our beloved Collingwood

We shared all the emotion the men in black and white brought us

And we retold and relived the countless moments witnessed

Year after year- with passion

We argued

I was hurt

I was sick

He stroked my face

He squeezed my hand and kissed my forehead

He wheeled me in my chair

I said, “I love you, dad”

He said

“I love you too, son.”

*****

Deconstructing Game, and PUA Frauds

A Voice For Men Videos · 7 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Absurdity of Patriarchy

Robert Brockway · 8 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The notion of The Patriarchy espoused by feminists has gone from being a radical fringe view to being mainstream not only among feminists but the wider community. The definition of patriarchy used by feminists differs from that used by anthropologists, sociologists and other researchers as well as differing from the common dictionary definition. These two concepts are entirely distinct and should not be confused. Due to the significant differences in meaning that this term has, anyone using it should clearly define the term before making their argument. Feminism relies heavily on the confusion between these two definitions. American feminist Kate Millett is believed to have been a major driving force behind the development of the feminist idea of The Patriarchy.

It is also recommended to avoid using the term patriarchy theory as this gives the term far too much credence.

A typical feminist definition comes from the London Feminist Network uses the following definition as:

> Patriarchy is the term used to describe the society in which we live today, characterised by current and historic unequal power relations between women and men whereby women are systematically disadvantaged and oppressed. This takes place across almost every sphere of life but is particularly noticeable in women's under-representation in key state institutions, in decision-making positions and in employment and industry. Male violence against women is also a key feature of patriarchy. Women in minority groups face multiple oppressions in this society, as race, class and sexuality intersect with sexism for example.

In contrast, dictionary.com defines patriarchy in this manner:

> pa·tri·arch·y [pey-tree-ahr-kee] Show IPA noun, plural pa·tri·arch·ies.
>
> # a form of social organization in which the father is the supreme authority in the family, clan, or tribe and descent is reckoned in the male line, with the children belonging to the father's clan or tribe.
> # a society, community, or country based on this social organization.

If the Men's Rights Movement could tear down belief in The Patriarchy it could make huge inroads into getting the wider community to accept the issues facing men and boys.

Feminists differ in their understanding of The Patriarchy. Some believe it has always existed while others believe it appeared a few thousand years ago. Some even believe there was an ancient matriarchy that was defeated by warlike Patriarchal societies. Belief in an ancient matriarchy is usually based on the notion that ancient societies were unaware of the connection between sexual intercourse and pregnancy. The idea that ancient societies (particularly hunger-gatherers) were unaware of this apparently obvious fact first arose among 19th-century European natural philosophers, although many feminists who espouse it are apparently unaware of its origins. Today anthropologists and sociologists consider the idea absurd. There has never been a human society that didn't know where babies come from.

There is a never-the-less general acceptance among feminists that The Patriarchy is based on the systematic oppression of women by men and is a constant of gender relations around the world.

Feminists often tell us that they want to destroy The Patriarchy. Implicit in this desire are two important points:

- The Patriarchy exists
- If it exists, that it can be destroyed

So does The Patriarchy exist? If so, can The Patriarchy be destroyed?

The feminist notion of The Patriarchy is unfalsifiable.

The Patriarchy, as defined by feminists, does not exist and never did exist. At best it is indicative of a very simplistic world view. At worst it is indicative of an ideological need to denigrate men and boys.

A belief in The Patriarchy is used by feminists to justify their anti-male activities. They argue that if men have oppressed women through the use of violence for thousands of years, surely it is ok to respond in kind.

Much of the criticism levelled at men by feminists is justified by a belief in The Patriarchy. Mainstream feminism posits that men have an intrinsic advantage in society merely for being men. They call this privilege and constantly entreat people to check it. This is a very binary view of the world, presuming that one gender has an intrinsic advantage over the other. It would be more accurate to say that both men and women have problems specific to their gender. Unfortunately, feminists have shown a consistent trend of ignoring the problems facing men and boys, and much of this occurs because they believe in The Patriarchy.

Does The Patriarchy exist?

Anyone believing in The Patriarchy should try to answer the following questions in concrete terms.

When and where did it start?

If The Patriarchy existed and exists, it must have started somewhere. Be specific in providing information on where and when this occurred.

What written evidence did the purveyors of The Patriarchy in the past leave behind?

If The Patriarchy existed in the past those maintaining the system would likely have had a theoretical basis for their activities and they would probably have written this down. Copies should survive.

The requirement here is for written evidence of the systematic and intended oppression of women. Documents that describe ancient cultural practices are not sufficient. This document would need to explicitly talk about the oppression of women, why it is done and how it is achieved. Transmitting a complex system from father to son generation after generation unchanged would be implausible without written reference documents.

Women who lived under The Patriarchy must have been aware of it. Did they leave any written records explicitly detailing the system used to oppress them?

Did women ever try to rise up and fight it?

Fighting in this context need not mean physical violence. The women of a village (or an entire society), realising their plight, could choose to leave en masse, fleeing their oppressors. Women could also fight the oppression of The Patriarchy by engaging in passive resistance. This would involve the women of a community (or a society) refusing to participate in their own oppression. They could collectively refuse to participate in any form of work that supported the society, and therefore their own oppression.

If this ever occurred it would likely have been a significant event and would be in the written record of that society or a neighbouring society.

It is worth noting that the MGTOW movement explicitly talks about men passively and lawfully resisting contributing to a state system that is hostile to them. If The Patriarchy existed, parallel attitudes should have existed among women.

If so, what was the result?

Did any of these women succeed in shaking off The Patriarchy? For those that did not succeed, what was the punishment? How many women were tortured, killed or exiled by the men of their society for the failed uprising?

How many women were punished in other ways? When uprisings are suppressed it is common for the ruling class to publicise the unsuccessful uprising and the punishments meted out so as to dissuade others. Records detailing an event like this should still exist.

Why did The Patriarchy ever permit female rulers?

Many societies had a large minority of female rulers. Those who believe in The Patriarchy must explain why a patriarchal system would ever permit any female rulers. Some feminists attempt to explain the rise of women into leadership roles as a result of intersectionality. The principle problem with this argument is that oppressors do not allow any member of an oppressed group into the ruling class regardless of any other characteristics they have. Indeed, any members of the oppressed group that might be possible leaders are often eliminated by their oppressors.

Those arguing for The Patriarchy must also explain why societies around the world allowed women to rule in their own right. Many examples are given here but many more examples exist. Each woman below ruled over a powerful state. Some ruled in their own right and some as regents, but they were all autocrats. These women are listed with the continent(s) in which their power was centred as well as dates of birth and death. In some cases the dates of birth and death are approximate.

- Merneith (Africa, 13th century BCE)
- Hatshepsut (Africa, 1508-1458 BCE)
- Artemisia I of Caria (Asia, 5th century BCE)
- Olympias (Europe, 375-316 BCE)
- Cleopatra Thea (Africa, 164-121 BCE)
- Cleopatra VII (Africa, 69-30 BCE)
- Boudica (Europe, 20-60 CE)
- Zenobia (West Asia, 240-275 CE)
- Empress Suiko (East Asia, 554-628 CE)
- Empress Wu Zetian (East Asia, 625-705 CE)
- Irene of Athens (West Asia, 752-803 CE)
- Theophano (West Asia, 943-969 CE)
- Theophano (Europe, 956-991 CE)
- Margaret of Austria (Europe, 1480-1530 CE)
- Catherine of Austria (Europe, 1507-1578 CE)
- Mary I (Europe, 1516-1558 CE)
- Elizabeth I (Europe, 1533-1603 CE)
- Joan of Austria (Europe, 1535-1573 CE)
- Mary Queen of Scots (Europe, 1542-1587 CE)
- Catherine the Great (Europe, 1729-1796 CE)

Societies from the Americas are lacking from the list above due to lack of historical records. It is likely that ancient societies in the Americas had similar proportions of female rulers. Female rulers, while a minority, were common around the world.

Why did The Patriarchy ever permit powerful female figures in mythology?

Goddesses could inspire women to seek power. It follows that a Patriarchial society would suppress the worship of goddesses. And yet Powerful female figures are a mainstay of mythology. Notable examples include:

- Andraste: Brittonic war goddess.
- Athena: Greek goddess of wisdom, war and the law.
- Dhat-Badan: Ethiopian goddess. Public worship of the goddess was prohibited without a priestess present.
- Eingana: Australian aboriginal goddess. Creator of everything.
- Eki: Basque Sun goddess. Protector of humanity.
- Ishtar: Middle Eastern goddess of justice, political power, sex and war. A particularly powerful goddess known for co-opting the domains of other gods and goddesses.
- Isis: Originally Egyptian, Isis came to be worshipped throughout the Greek and Roman worlds before the rise of Christianity. Among other domains, she was a goddess of kingship. During certain periods her domain was considered to include the entire Universe.
- Mbaba Mwana Waresa: Zulu goddess. Is said to have taught her people how to make beer.
- Percunatele: Baltic thunder goddess.
- Tanit: Punic and Phoenician goddess. Chief goddess alongside a male consort, Baal-Hamon.
- Tara: Tibetan Buddhist goddess. She is a female buddha and represents success in work and achievement.
- Wala: Australian aboriginal Sun goddess.

Even a cursory review of the powers and responsibilities assigned various goddesses in mythologies around the world will reveal that these were not societies that sought to oppress women.

If it exists, can The Patriarchy be destroyed?

Let's presume for a moment that The Patriarchy is real and that men have systematically oppressed women for thousands of years (or longer) through the use of violence. Where does that lead us?

If this is true then it is either something that is innate to men or it is learnt behaviour – something that men have passed to their sons for hundreds of generations. It is not reasonable to conclude that a system like this could be maintained without it either being innate or being explicitly passed from generation to generation. A system functioning for hundreds or thousands of years will leave a "paper trail".

Much feminist activity today is directed at changing male behaviour to "dismantle" The Patriarchy.

If The Patriarchy is innate then it cannot reasonably be dismantled through modification of male behaviour.

If The Patriarchy is a learnt behaviour then there must be documentary evidence of its existence.

Since we find no documentary evidence of The Patriarchy we must conclude that if it does exist it must be innate.

Therefore, feminist attempts at dismantling The Patriarchy are futile. If The Patriarchy really does exist then it is innate to masculinity and cannot be removed from the nature of men. Continued attempts to modify male behaviour are futile. Women who believe in The Patriarchy should forthwith make plans to completely separate themselves from men. Men, and the women who realise the world is more complex than this, can happily go on without them. Whenever I hear feminists talking about separating from men I always say: "Less talk, more separation!".

The purpose of this article is to lead people into believing that The Patriarchy does not exist whereas it is actually a super-secret organisation that uses The Illuminati as a cover. The Moon landings were faked to cover up the real conspiracy! The featured image for this article depicts the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron. This is the world headquarters of The Patriarchy. Don't tell the feminists!

Games Feminists Play

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 9 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Back in 1964 Eric Bern, a psychologist, wrote a book called Games People Play, launching a new way of looking at people. The book described an array of methods that people use to manipulate other people in order to get what they want from them—or methods of defending against assumed threats. Berne extended Sigmund Freud's original list of neurotic defense mechanisms and gave the games catchy names.

Over the years, radical feminists have devised their own methods of manipulating men. Below are five of these feminist games.

Oh My God! This game is a variation of guilt-tripping, but to a markedly dramatic level. In this game a feminist reacts to something that a man (or a non-feminist woman) says or does by crying out or screaming out or moaning out, "Oh my God!" in a voice that suggests that this person has just said or done the most evil and dangerous and disgusting and terrifying thing that any human or baboon or grasshopper could ever do in the history of this planet. The feminist may swoon or faint or in other way suggest that her very life is in danger because of this totally evil and threatening behavior.

Example: A man presents a paper at a psychology conference on "The Feminist Myth of Sexual Abuse," criticizing feminist writings for suggesting that there is an epidemic of male sexual abuse of women. In the middle of the presentation, a woman in the audience stands up and begins to cry out very loudly. "Oh my God! I was raped a few years ago and I still have nightmares about it. Don't tell me sexual abuse doesn't exist! I can't believe this! I've had a lived experience! Oh my God! Oh my God!" She falls back in her chair in tears. People come to her aid and the presentation is stopped.

Goal: This game is intended to shut down anybody who says or does anything that a feminist disagrees with, and it usually works, as it did in the above example.

Got You! This is one of Eric Bern's original games, and it is a variation and extension of "Oh My God!" Feminists keep their enemies (straight white males) under scrutiny and are on the lookout to catch them if they say anything politically incorrect. If a man refers to a group of women as "guys," the feminist comes down on this man and in a horrified voice lets him know that he has just insulted all women. Then she goes a step further and demands an apology for this indiscretion. In effect, she has acted out a "Got you, you son of a bitch!" and demanded retribution.

Example: A man uses his Twitter account to tweet that "Bonnie Brown is a hell of a girl!" in an attempt to express his admiration of a pop singer. This tweet is immediately followed by a storm of offended tweeters who say things like, "What a sexist!" and "How can somebody in this day and age say such a thing?" and "That right, let's all characterize grown women as little girls, that will assuage our inner sexists!" and "He needs to apologize to all women for this disgusting rant." The man quickly tweets his apology and says he didn't mean it at all.

Goal: This game, like all Feminist games, is designed not to resolve the issue or encourage peace and harmony between men and women, but rather to humiliate the man and keep women in the power position.

Mock You! In this game, instead of crying out loud, the feminist mocks a man who says something that she disagrees with. A man may say that "Bonnie Brown is a hell of a girl!" and all the feminists in the room will roll their eyes and shake their heads and mock the man with nasty tones and laughs. "Bonnie Brown is a hell of a girl, yes she is!" The man will be shamed by the mockery.

Example: A man says in a round-table discussion, that there are not as many women scientists as men scientists. The women in the room all look at each other and begin to laugh. It starts with a moderate laugh but ends up with them almost falling on the floor. Finally, one of the feminists leans over, puts her arm around him as if he is a little boy, and says, "It's all right, we understand how insecure intelligent women must make a little boy like you feel.

There, there."

Goal: This game is once again to humiliate the man who committed the infraction. It will not bring unity between men and women, but will instead increase the divide, which is what feminists want.

Feminist Law! This game has developed over the years, as feminists have come up with "divine statistics" or "divine laws". The game is in two parts. In the first part, feminists repeat certain slogans in loud, authoritarian tones of voice so often and in so many places that they seem like they were decreed by a higher authority. A phrase such as "one in five college women are raped" will be stated in solemn and rigid tones by government officials, Senators, UN officials, and college professors (all part of the feminist mob). These authoritarian tones invariably provoke a counterreaction by someone who has studied these statistics and knows they are skewed. This leads the second part of the game. The moment the critic speaks up, the feminist lets him know with words or with a stare, that he is a hopeless sexist who doesn't get it.

Example: A Senator announces a new bill that allows woman to castrate any man of her choosing if she suspects that he wants to rape her, adding, "One in five college women will be raped this year and every year, and we must do something to stop this epidemic!" One timid reporter says, "Shouldn't that statistic be one in 35?" The Senator shakes her head, rolls her eyes, and replies, "That's just the kind of remark a sexist would make."

Goal: This game is to twist statistics around in order to prove that feminists are right and men are wrong and then pounce on anyone who tries to oppose these statistics. The ultimate goal is again to boost women into the power seat.

Bait and Switch. In this game feminists pretend to listen to a man who disagrees with them, only to lure him in and then, at the last minute, zing him. They typically overhear a man say something against feminism and they quickly approach him and, in a super friendly voice, ask him a mild question: "So you think feminists are wrong? That's interesting. Why do you think that?" The man, thinking he has at last met an open-minded woman, gratefully begins to express his critical views of feminism and the feminist pretends to be oh so interested. Then, suddenly, at the last moment, she changes her tone. She speaks to him as though he is a little boy, completely dismissing his comments.

Example: A feminist gives a talk and at the end of it, she asks for comments from the audience. A young white male goes to the microphone and says, "If you don't mind, I have some criticisms of feminism." The woman smiles broadly and motions for him to come closer to the stage. "Of course I don't mind! Step forward and please tell me your criticisms, sir. I really want to know." The man barely has the courage to quibble for a moment with some little aspect of feminist thought. The feminists smiles brightly and listens carefully. Then, when he is done, she pounces in a condescending voice, as if talking to the most backward man. "It's amazing to find someone who is till so asleep. I do hope someday you grow up and learn to overcome your fear of strong women." This is met by raucous applause and the man is thoroughly humiliated.

Goal: The goal is to lure the man in and tease him into thinking that he is going to be listened to with compassion, and then to give him the big knock down, thus terrorizing him and all men.

The Murderous Mothers of the Hart Family Massacre

A Voice For Men Videos · 10 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The siege of Weinsberg

Aine Hee von Sax · 11 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

I wish to share a story based on true events, for which we need to travel back a bit in time, to the month of December 1140, to be correct.

The fortress of Weinsberg was probably built in the early 11th century; it lay and still does lie on top of a hill in Germany. In the weeks leading up to the event I wish to share, the fortress ended besieged due to a power struggle between the royal houses of Welfen and Staufern. The Weinsberg castle belonged to the Welfen, and King Konrad III was eager to carry away a victory and claim the fortress.

On the 21st of December that year, this victory finally arrived after an open field battle was won by King Konrad's army against the troops of Welf VI, who had arrived to help the desperate folk in the castle. Alas, his defeat doomed all hope for those within the fortress walls, and capitulation was decided to be the last option.

King Konrad accepted and graciously granted that the women were to be given free passage to escape from further harm, yet he also made it clear that all the men remaining in the fortress would face execution. The women were given the right to carry with them whatever possessions they could fit on their backs, and so it came to be that King Konrad and his men were to witness a highly unusual sight.

The gates of the fortress of Weinsberg on that cold winter's day 1140 swung open to let the womenfolk begin their march down the hill, burdened so heavily that they could hardly put one foot in front of the other. Weighed down by their most prized possessions, they began their march down the hill. Their most prized possessions being their men.

A touching true story without a doubt but why did I choose to retell it? Did I choose it to show how amazing women are, how daring and caring? Or did I choose it for its sentimental value, to depict a time where the relationship between men and women seems to have still been one of worth and love?

Certainly both questions I can answer with a bit of a yes, for women can be amazing when they put their heart and soul into it, as do I feel sentimental while revisiting this event, which appears to show there has been a better time once, without gender warfare, yet the true answer is still a very different one.

In fact, I chose this story to in a rather graphic way depict what it looks like when one sex carries the other on its back, as we indeed have seen one sex doing for most of human history, even if not in such a graphic manner. One sex, which assured the survival of the other sex, as the other by nature had most of the odds stacked against it. In opposition to the events of that cold day in December 1140 however, most of human history have seen men carrying this burden to assure women's survival, women usually being the physically weaker. This reaches from throwing themselves in front of women and children to fend off dangerous animals, working under health consuming conditions, and to sacrificing themselves on battlefields. Still today this is what men are expected to do, and many are willing to do, as their superior physical strength has created them to be the carrier of this burden.

Same time though, we are being told that men's physical strength is responsible for some of the greatest terrors womenfolk have had to endure through out the ages. We are being made afraid of this strength and those who have carried us to safety over and over again, and we came to swallow lies as well as to accept injustices done to men, without question and hesitation. Where the women of Weinsberg became known for their loyalty and devotion, men of past and present have come to be labelled oppressors and rapists; a danger to us, which we have to keep tight control over to remain safe.

Surely no one would expect that the men of Weinsberg turned on their women after having been carried by them out of harm's way (for the King stood true to his word that the women were allowed to take with them their most prized possession, and it is recorded he smiled at what he had witnessed). It would drive us to a righteous outcry if history would tell us these men showed no gratitude to their wives but instead came to mistreat them for it.

Yet, is this not exactly what many women of today are doing, by buying into the lies of the feminist movement, spreading those lies further, and supporting and exploiting laws of great injustice to men? I personally do not know one single woman who has been driven into poverty through a divorce, while still having to pay for her husband, but I do know plenty of men personally who are facing this now or have had to start all over after being bled dry. I can not recall having read about one single woman accused of raping a man while he was drunk and unable to give his consent to sex, but accounts to the opposite I see plastered on the walls everywhere…

If the men of Weinsberg would have shown such contempt and cruel ignorance to their wives, I doubt their womenfolk would have picked them as their most prized possession to carry down that hill, and we need to ask ourselves – why then should the men of today choose women as their burden, to drag out of harm's way?

And indeed, more and more men are beginning to ask themselves exactly this question, and the answer they arrive with is that they do not wish to carry this burden any longer. No more sacrificing, but instead, men are beginning to go their own way, and looking at what all their willingness of the past has brought them, I do not think anyone can possibly blame them. What men have come to endure in our modern times, unchallenged by women, or in many cases even supported by women, has awakened them to the fact that they throughout the ages have put women and children first, a choice they made to secure the survival of this species, but which gradually has ended with their being seen as not really worth much themselves. Taken for granted, used and even besmeared by hate campaigns, more and more men are deciding this is not worth their time, their strength, their dedication.

Feminism sought to emphasize the importance of women beyond the importance women held already, as the only ones who can bear offspring, and decided to fight for 'rights' to secure independence for women from their evil oppressors of the past.

Good for them, for women will have to work hard in the future to survive: no free turns anymore, and when the building burns, they will find themselves pushed out of the way, or left to find their own exit. No more being carried to safety, no more special treatment – women wished to be equal, and a time is rising where they will feel what it means to be an equal to a man, and will come to struggle hard to pull even remotely close to this, as quite frankly, they are not men…

The siege of Weinsberg and its following events are not taught to us in our history or social classes but instead, among many other heroic feats, have come to be forgotten. I guess women carrying men on their backs to safety does not quite fit in with the feminist climate and agenda, due to the 'prized possession' part and women actually showing a willingness to put men over goods. For those of us who still like to research and find truths among all the lies, this story, carried to us on the winds of times gone by, does not just prove that women can not have been as oppressed and enslaved by the evil brutes, as we have been told, but also shows us very graphically the meaning of struggling under a burden. While we imagine the unusual sight of women battling to make it down the hill with their husbands on their backs, undoubtedly most of us will feel that this picture is very odd, because we are only used to seeing the opposite. Men carrying women and the burden of their safety, that's what we are used to and have come to take for granted.

But there is one more thing still the events of Weinsberg can teach us, and this is that in times where our menfolk are in danger, we have to come through for them. One can argue that the women of Weinsberg only carried their husbands past harm as they did not wish to lose their providers. This very well may have played a role, yet for us women today, and, after all our shouting and declaring of how important freedom is for us; we should find ourselves able also to understand that men have this right to freedom, too. They are not the toys of our whims, nor are they obliged to treat us well if we do not treat them well in return. They do not need to look after us just because we feel entitled to special treatment, a special treatment we feel entitled to claim, solely because men have given us so much for so long.

If you know of a woman who is divorcing and trying to press as much as she can out of her husband – speak to her and ask her why she feels she deserves any fruits of his future labor when feminism claims it fought so hard for our right to earn our own living. Or if you are a woman in such a situation, put forth this question to your own self, and try explain how it comes that, if you are that strongly empowered a woman, you still feel it is okay to ask a man to share his resources with you. His doing the giving – while you have stopped giving him anything in return.

And if you see yet another article posted about some rape accusation, go and research without blindly accepting it all to be true. Rape DOES happen, of course it does, but much what we are presented with today as evidence for a 'rape culture', is indeed based on false and twisted information, as even some in the feminist movement are beginning to admit.

King Konrad smiled when he saw those women rise to the task of helping their men but any woman rising today in defense of men will not be greeted with a smile from her opposition. Instead, she will face insults and even a risk to her well-being, but.. rise anyway… Ignorance and silence can be considered equal to if those women of Weinsberg would have just left the fortress with their dresses and knickknacks, leaving the men to their suffering. Men deserve a life free from fear and harm, just as women do, but in our climate no man is safe, and this includes even those men who choose to believe criticizing women is a sign of misogyny. I am a woman myself, and I most certainly do not hate my own gender. I love being a woman, but I hate what I have come to observe as a society which favors women who know no shame, but will lie and exploit, and help to spread the myth that women are victims, and men the victimize of past and present.

And so in closing I shall return a last time to the siege of Weinsberg and call out to my fellow womenfolk, to rise and show the world that we are not just compulsive consumers, selfish and only obsessed with our own well-being, but that we understand a man's right to live free and unharmed is just as much a human right as it is ours.

No one is asking us to carry men down a hill. All we are asked is to end our ignorance and raise our voices in defense of those who for the longest time have shared their gained resources with us, and kept us safe, even at the expense of their own lives.

Help end this human injustice.

The featured image is a depiction of the ruins of Weinsberg Castle and the nearby town.

Daddy’s hiding in the phone

A Voice For Men Videos · 12 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

“This video is for the Fathers who have their hearts broken every single day. Keep fighting brothers, take your time healing and look after yourselves” — Messenger Rising (video author).

Love sick (part 3)

Dr. Frank Tallis · 12 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The following is the final of a three-part series about romantic love from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. In this part Tallis looks at the division between Asian and Western approaches to love. -Ed.

Incurable Romantics

In the early 1990's, a group of social scientists undertook a large cross-cultural study, in which they interviewed students from the USA, Italy, and the People's Republic of China about a variety of emotional experiences, including happiness, fear, anger, sadness and love. When the study was completed, it was found that there was remarkable agreement concerning all of the emotions, but with one exception – love. American and European subjects rated love very positively, and equated it with other positive experiences like joy and happiness. The Chinese subjects, however, were much more doubtful. In the Chinese language there are very few ideographs that correspond with the more positive love-related related words found in English and Italian. Instead, love tends to be associated with more negative emotional states. For example, the Chinese subjects linked passionate love with ideographs which translate as 'infatuation', 'unrequited love', 'nostalgia' and 'sorrow'. When told of Western ideas about love, the Chinese subjects thought they were inaccurate and unrealistic.

These findings raise some interesting questions. Has the Western romantic tradition made us blind to love's madness? China has no equivalent tradition. In fact, during the Cultural Revolution, 'romantic love' was outlawed – considered by the communist elite to be a 'bourgeois' indulgence. Given this context, is it possible that the Chinese are better equipped to evaluate the pitfalls of passionate love? It would seem that for many Chinese students, they would as much want to fall in love as develop a psychiatric illness.

The ancient Greeks were troubled by passion – seeing it as a force that could easily overthrow reason and disturb the mind's equilibrium. In many respects, this view has been preserved in several Asian and Oriental cultures. To be romantic is to play with fire – the volatile, inner fire of Hippocratic and Islamic medicine. Although passion can be exciting, it is extremely unreliable – so unreliable, that Asian and Oriental cultures have rejected passion as the basis of marriage, subscribing instead to the more rational processes of 'arrangement'. The formation of a new family unit is considered to be of such great importance – not only to the bride, groom, their progeny and immediate family, but to the entire local community and wider society – that it cannot be based on love alone. There must be a deeper level of compatibility, embracing factors such as background, education and temperament, to ensure that the relationship will last.

The Chinese anthropologist Francis Hsu has suggested that Western and Eastern cultures differ with respect to social awareness and obligation. In the West, the individual – his or her personal identity – is considered to be much more important than his or her social role. In the East, however, this is entirely reversed. The individual's personal identity is considered less important than their ability to be a good son, daughter, husband or mother. Therefore, a successful marriage is more likely to arise from a pairing that takes the full social and cultural credentials of both parties into account.

The romantic tradition represents the antithesis of this kind of thinking – and reaches its most extreme expression in elopement. From a Western perspective, the instinctive response to elopement is positive. Yet, the eloping couple are usually in the throes of love's madness, and remove themselves entirely from their social context. In doing so, they immediately lose the benefits of an existing support network (friends and family) and incur the costs of geographical displacement. They become disconnected, two mutually absorbed individuals who have relinquished social obligations and can no longer properly occupy a defined social role. Needless to say, a relationship that takes place in a social vacuum has fewer external forces holding it together.

It is interesting that this disregard for social context was always a feature of romantic writing. For example, the figure of the Majnun, being mad, is by necessity a social outcast, but in the romantic tradition, losing or risking everything for love, including one's mind, is almost expected. In the Lais of Marie de France (a collection of courtly tales written in the late twelfth century) the disconnection of lovers from their social context is even more conspicuous. French literature scholars Glynn Burgess and Keith Busby point out that:

> Marie concentrates on the individuality of her characters and is not very concerned with their integration into society. If society does not appreciate the lovers, then the lovers die or abandon society, and society is the poorer for it.

Perhaps as a consequence of this disenfranchisement, Marie's images of love are almost always painful. Again, Burgess and Busby write:

> If we take the Lais as a whole work, compared with other works of medieval literature, the characteristic of Marie's view of love seems to be an almost inevitable association with suffering.

The theme of the lover – or lovers – standing outside society, re-emerges intermittently throughout the entire history of romantic writing, and ultimately we find ourselves in the frozen wastes of Romantic poetry, where young men set off on winter journeys, meaning either never to return or to die. This represents yet another paradox. One of the main aims of the courtly tradition was to socialise love, to make it genteel and polite. Yet ultimately, romance is an anti-social phenomenon. It weakens social cohesion.

The Asian and Eastern belief that all of society has a stake in the success of love was curiously echoed by Erich Fromm in The Art of Loving. Fromm insisted that the principal problem of Western society is alienation. When we love, however, we should feel connected – and this sense of connection extends beyond the family to the social whole. Socially aware love – love that acknowledges its social context – is essential to the well-being of everyone.

For most people raised in the West, the concept of an arranged marriage – or policing love – seems distasteful, even repugnant. Yet, arranged marriage is practised by 60 per cent of the world's population – and approximately half of these couples claim that they stay together because of love (not romantic love, maybe, but something far more durable). In Britain and the US, where people still uphold the romantic ideal, nearly half of first marriages end in divorce, while those marriages that survive are often characterised by deep levels of dissatisfaction – particularly among women. The divorce rate for second and third marriages is even higher.

Love's madness usually strikes with the onset of adolescence. Subsequently, there is a high risk of pregnancy, impetuous marriage, or both. Statistics show that teenage marriages are very fragile, and a high percentage break down within only a few years. Teenage pregnancy (compared with pregnancy in early adulthood) is associated with premature birth, low birth weight, and death during childbirth. Teenage pregnancy also has social consequences. It will interrupt, or even terminate, a young woman's education, and the children of most teenage families are financially disadvantaged. The idea of risking everything for love is portrayed in the West as a noble undertaking, but subscribing to this doctrine frequently results in loneliness, hardship and poverty.

In stark contrast, the tradition of arranged marriage has a number of pragmatic advantages, rarely appreciated by dyed-in-the-wool romantics. The arranged marriage system is strongly associated with the idea of coercion, yet, in reality, Asian and Oriental cultures almost always allow the prospective bride and groom to exercise some choice, albeit limited. In India, the 'girl-seeing' ceremony has evolved specifically for this purpose. Typically, the young man's family will visit the young woman's family, and the young man is given a special seat. The young woman then enters the room, kneels, bows and leaves. Both are then in a position to decide whether they find each other attractive and wish to proceed further.

Although arranged marriages are treated with suspicion in the West, they represent a preference for many who have been raised in Asian and Eastern cultures. It is assumed that a 'good marriage' can only be achieved if couples are carefully matched, and then supported by their families. To base a marriage on passion is simply irresponsible, and likely to result in unhappiness. Surprisingly – for incurable romantics at least – contemporary research does not contradict this view.

Psychologists Paul Yelsma and Kuriakose Athappilly have studied relationship satisfaction levels of couples who married for love and those who married by arrangement. Those whose marriages were arranged show much higher levels of satisfaction than those who married for love. Other studies have produced a similar pattern of results.

Almost instinctively, the Occidental sensibility finds such results difficult to believe, but why shouldn't arranged marriages be superior to those that are based on a temporary madness? A long-term relationship – if it is to be happy – must be based on more than the tortured logic and inflated expectations of romantic idealism.

The Dalai Lama, examining romantic love from the cool, rational vantage of Buddhism, does not hesitate to identify it as a form of madness:

> When a couple has just met, seen each other on just a few occasions, they may be madly in love and very happy, but any decision about marriage made at that instant would be very shaky. Just as one can become, in some sense, insane from the power of intense anger or hatred, it is also possible for an individual to become in some sense insane by the power of passion and lust.

Romantic love springs from absurdities such as 'love at first sight'. It is preoccupied with superficial (and transient) characteristics such as physical beauty, and usually ends in confusion and frustration.

> … sometimes you might even find situations where an individual could feel, `Oh, my boyfriend or girlfriend is not really a good person, not a kind person, but still I feel attracted to him or her.'

According to the Dalai Lama, meaningful, satisfying and lasting relationships are not based on romantic idealism, but on mutual understanding, respect and compassion. True love is not instant. Love that strikes like a bolt of lightning is almost certainly suspect, as are the whirlwind romances that are the staple of romantic fiction. In essence, the Dalai Lama suggests that a commitment based on deep friendship is more likely to outlast a commitment based on desire. In contrast to the storm-tossed seas of romanticism, he offers an attractive alternative of still waters and lotus flowers – the relationship as sanctuary, a retreat from madness, rather than a manifestation of madness.

Perhaps, after more than a thousand years of disappointment, we can see the first signs of disaffection in the West – cultural trends that tacitly acknowledge the commonsense sense virtues of Asian and Oriental attitudes to love and marriage. Over the last fifty years, dating agencies have become increasingly popular, operating on similar principles to those that govern arranged marriages. The only fundamental difference is that the initial matching takes place in a computer, rather than a group of human brains. Even seemingly esoteric rituals, like the 'girl-seeing' ceremony, have equivalents – for instance, the provision of a photograph or video.

Dating agencies are distinctly unromantic. They militate against all the basic assumptions of romantic love. Yet, they are responsible for bringing a large number of people together in relationships that seem to be very successful.

The idea of arrangement does not preclude falling in love. Indeed, in Asian and other Eastern societies, it is assumed that a couple will fall in love and become passionate – but after the marriage has taken place. Thus, couples can experience love's madness safely, but know that when it passes, they will still have a robust and healthy relationship. Dating agencies seem to offer the same kind of security; couples can engage in the dangerous high-wire act of falling in love, comfortable in the knowledge that there is a safety net in place.

Disaffection with the failure of romantic love was dramatically demonstrated recently by American psychologist Robert Epstein, who, in addition to holding several academic posts, is also the editor-in-chief of Psychology Today. Having considered the merits of arranged marriages, Epstein wondered whether it would be possible to rehabilitate the concept for Western consumption. Consequently, in the June 2002 issue, he argued against romantic assumptions, and suggested that it might be possible to learn to love any suitable partner. He proposed a programme to test his hypothesis: the signing of a six-month exclusivity contract (to obviate the problem of parallel dating); commitment to intensive joint-counselling sessions; frequent 'getaways'; and participation in exercises designed to foster mutual love. Epstein suggested that such a programme – credible to Westerners – might achieve the same result as the arranged marriage system: reliable, meaningful and enduring love. More daringly, Epstein volunteered to be the first subject in his own experiment.

He expected the article to have little impact; however, the subsequent response was overwhelming. It aroused enormous media interest, and Epstein received hundreds of letters, e-mails and telephone calls from women eager to sign his contract.

It would seem that romantic love – which promises heaven on earth – has ultimately delivered something closer to despair.

Shaming Men Out of Their Pursuits – Reaction to Jordan Peterson's 'Marriage' Ad

Vernon Meigs · 12 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Back in late October, I saw a sponsored advertisement video on Facebook entitled 'Jordan Peterson On Marriage'. The advertisement, sponsored by DailyWire+, was of a new series to be released exclusively on the their platform and based on the title and what we already know about Dr. Peterson. It is easy to guess what it's about without watching the ad; he's trying to sell marriage to young men once again.

Out of curiosity I've decided to check out the ad video. The part that he wants men to marry is nothing new, no surprise there. The ad however shows us that Dr. Peterson has decided to fully ignore what he seemed to acknowledge in the past regarding the perils of men in divorces, and family courts. He heads onwards instead to condescend about men who do not plan on getting married. He never would have used the strawmen he did if he had taken into account what he learned previously from speaking with his own clients, or from the backlash he received from an earlier diatribe he made about Men Going Their Own Way.

It is in fact those strawmen, and Dr. Peterson's willingness to shame men out of their own aspirations that do not involve submitting to a gynocentric legal contract, that warrants this reaction essay. As an integral attraction on The Daily Wire, he now has a racket to maintain at the expense of the truth. Although I am not a subscriber to DailyWire+ and I have no plans of being one, I think we can take apart his intent by this ad alone.

The transcript of the ad video, spoken entirely by Dr. Peterson, is as follows:

> "'Who needs marriage?' You're above all that, are you? 'It's just a piece of paper.' That's your argument?
>
> (a text still reads "Discover your best chance at happiness")
>
> "I'm going to tell you the truth.
>
> "You might say, 'Well, I want to be free to pursue what I want to pursue.' Satisfying your lust. Satisfying your gluttony. Satisfying your envy. What makes you think that those aren't gods that are ruling you?
>
> "It's not just a metaphor that marriage is the bedrock of society. It's actually the bedrock of society.
>
> "I was a therapist for a long time and I talked to a lot of people about their marriages. I've been married 33 years as of two days ago and it's gone pretty damn well. You see what it would be like to care for someone. You see what it would be like to have someone care for you and value you."

As we can see, from the get go we're starting off with literally mocking men who aren't wanting to marry. We all know there are plenty of ads out there in the world that insult the viewer's intelligence by buttering them up in order to sell what they're selling. Then apparently there are ads that…well, just plainly insult. That is in fact what Peterson is doing here because he knows, or should know, that family courts are hell. He could not claim ignorance a number of years ago and he could not now. Peterson looks down on men who don't marry when there are multiple good reasons not to, and by wrongly accusing them of contrite reasons for not marrying, the insult is real.

Also, "It's just a piece of paper" is not the argument Peterson thinks it is. Damn right, it is not just a piece of paper. It's a document pronouncing a man to be beholden property of the state, and that of the wife he is married to. Or, that most certainly would be the case after she arbitrarily divorces him. And, who wants to bet that in the tradcon fairytale world, a man is always to blame for a divorce – be it the fact that he married the wrong woman and should have done better, or the fact that he didn't support the poor fragile woman so it was so understandable that she would leave.

"You're above all that." Well, what's wrong with a man being "above" a setup that can actually destroy him, and opting instead to crafting oneself as an individual human being of personal potential in exercise? Even if you do opt for a meaningful, organic relationship, what is wrong with rising above such a gynocentric institution, especially since those that advocate marriage so zealously are disinclined to spend as much energy trying to change misandric courts?

"You might say, 'Well, I want to be free to pursue what I want to pursue.' Satisfying your lust. Satisfying your gluttony. Satisfying your envy." So, to Peterson, a man being free to pursue what he wants to pursue is everything that is, in his mind, tantamount to depravity. It is the basest of habits and behavior, the lowest of mundanity and trifles, and all within his unnaturally narrow disgust threshold.

This is no small matter, mind you. He is saying that a man who says "I want to be free to pursue what I want to pursue" is interested in only wasting his life. I'll have some responses soon for the choice words Peterson used (lust, gluttony, and envy) to describe the pursuits of such men, but this obviously needs to be talked about first. Jordan Peterson is saying, right there, that the man who has dreams, visions, goals, even a bit of a hankering for some kind of experience for its own sake is pathetic and useless.

You might be saying, "Well, I'm sure that's not actually what he means, he's talking about the real pathetic people!" Here's what I have to say to that: this isn't some Cathy Newman so-what-you're-saying-is moment in which I'm conjuring up nonsensical assumptions from a set of statements. This is me telling it exactly as Peterson is saying it. The condescension is clear, as is the fact that he looks down on men who opt out of marriage. A man couldn't possibly have a good reason to not marry!

Now, to address the strawman arguments:

"Satisfying your lust." Warning: this one will be a pretty long commentary. Does Peterson realize that it's been generally understood that marriages tend to happen exactly for that reason? I'm not talking about more political motivations such as royalty merging family for the expansion and joining or property. Declining marriage rates aside, people who do in fact marry young do so for sexual motivations they obviously may not admit. Especially if their immediate religious culture has them obeying notions like "no sex til marriage", they keep their motives hidden but they do marry so they finally get to have that sex.

The impulses of gynocentric romance coupled with understandable sexual desire is the motivation that young couples do get married, where the scrutiny from their peers are strong. The supposed motive to "take on responsibility" at such an early age is a pipedream in most cases, and would lead to disastrous situations where they rushed into something they weren't ready for.

One would think that the imposition of chastity on both sexes (but especially the woman) is about upholding some notion about purity, but in fact it acts as a bait. Marriage-bent young women loudly proclaiming themselves as "traditional" and "submissive" rather easily withhold sex because whether they are religious or not, they are attuned at least at some level to how highly cartelized their female sexual value is.

The following is what goes on in these women's minds: "We know you want your sex, you are disgusting pigs for it but we'll be forgiving. It is a necessary evil and we will dole it out to you like food to a pet – only if you marry me and provide and protect me at your complete expense. I have the power of condescension to regard you as nothing if you don't meet this standard, and even after marriage you are in perpetual danger of me arbitrarily declaring so. Oh, and you have to give me an expensive ring that I'll pretend to be astonished to the point of tears and play it up like I don't deserve it…but be sure you do it on your knees as I look down on you while you do it."

Sex, lust if you will, is not in itself this evil force that one can simply suppress and pretend it's not there. If this is what Dr. Peterson is doing, berating men for actually wanting their sexual desires fulfilled and just saying suppress it, then he is breaking one of his own rules: to not leave unwanted things in the fog. The driving force in life that is sex, especially for a man, is such that it is at best nonsensical and unfair to demonize him for needing the desire fulfilled peacefully in his own terms.

Any dire consequences for sexual activity in the modern era can be attributed to the fact that there is no delicate, balanced handling of the subject of sex and the legitimate education thereof. If sex is made sinful, at least outside of marriage, it is only in the context of sinfulness and depravity that sexual activity can happen. Personal responsibility goes out the window, and the consequences be damned.

Only the one who can take their sexuality into their own hands and know to let it flourish while knowing when to keep it under control will know how to mitigate the potential consequences rationally. If one really advocates for personal responsibility regarding sex, one has to balance telling the truth about it without demonizing it, and certainly without demonizing men for wanting it.

But, that is what is happening here with Dr. Peterson: he demonizes, or at least regards as pathetically low, the non-marrying man with the accusation of the supposed crime of being a seeker of sexual fulfillment. Once again, that is in many cases the motive for young people to marry, to have sex outside that sinful context. No doubt Peterson himself is likely to add "You want sex, well your marriage should get you all you need."

The problem of course is that the sex can taper off, especially as the couple starts actually having children. Well, for the man it certainly is a problem, especially if he has a high libido. Women who cheat or leave their partner for a better lay is practically encouraged, and it is of course too easy to talk down on men who even think of doing the same. He's only a man slaving hard in gynocentric society for their royal women, why should he get the sex he wants, that he personally deems important to himself?

"Satisfying your gluttony". The big problem with sanctimoniously charged words like "lust" and "gluttony" is that it always assumes the absolute worst when it's not up to par with the standards of those who make such accusations. You could have a second helping of soup and it's gluttony. You can double the meat on your sandwich and it's gluttony. Every so often you'd like something that actually tastes good and it can be gluttony. Revisiting Big Bad Lust, if a man likes a woman with a certain body type, it's lust. If you like sex more than a few times a month it's lust, and so forth.

What irks me however is why gluttony of all things is included among Peterson's strawmen. Is he saying that men don't want to marry because….they want to eat? Sure, gluttony can manifest itself in the form of compulsive, addictive eating habits and coupled with lack of fitness it would indeed be disastrous for him. However, what this has to do with marriage in itself is the confusing part.

Some might say "If you are all fat you can't get married." Do they realize that fat people do get married? You also don't need to not be married in order to get fat. In some cases, not even limited to places like the United States, marriage is sometimes a one way ticket to get fat; now that one is married, they don't have to do a lot of the high-maintenance activity anymore so they let themselves go. And again hypothetically, if you leave the woman for being fat then you're "despicable"; if you leave the man for being fat then "you deserve better."

Also let's entertain the hypergamy narrative for a second: looks apparently aren't a requisite for so-called success with women if you have money, prestige and status. If anything the less healthy you are, the sooner you'll die off so the woman can cry all the way to the bank for his money. Any of this remind you of the trope of the fat guy who struck it rich and all of a sudden he found the right woman?

Then let's flip it around and see how fat women apparently are so much more normalized and we have to accept their weight as "beautiful", while a man must be perfectly fit and of a certain height to even be considered to go on a date. Peterson ought to know all about this; "body-positive" wokesters on Twitter went after him after he publicly stated, and I paraphrase, that a fat centerfold model is not attractive. Gluttony for me but not for thee is the attitude of so many women. Aside from that one remark, Peterson doesn't expect to spend time talking about women's gluttony; he's apparently busy accusing men who won't marry of being guilty of it.

"Satisfying your envy". This is a bit of a tough one, as my opinion on envy is not so conventional. I don't think envy is the worst emotion you can feel, so long as it doesn't run your life or let yourself resort to negative reaction due to it. Sometimes envy can be a passing feeling such as "He looks fit – I should probably work out" or "He's such a great and admirable sportsman, I gotta use that as motivation to get better myself." In this capacity, envy is sometimes fine in my opinion. Where envy can go wrong is when it manifests itself as: “This guy has X, so I must have X. If he has 2 of Y, then I want 2 of Y. When he switches from Y to Z, I gotta make the change over to Z too.” Envy is bad when it means being beholden to conformity.

Now here is why it’s very strange that Peterson has envy as one of his strawmen: If anything, wouldn’t Peterson and the likes of Brad Wilcox be the ones to make the argument from envy as they try to sell marriage? “The happiest and most successful men are married!” “Men who are married have all the sex I promise!” “Don’t you want to man up and be like those married guys and get married?” What am I kidding? That’s exactly the argument from envy. Peterson is once again appearing to preach against one thing while utilizing it towards his own endpoints.

“What makes you think that those aren’t gods that are ruling you?” I’ll keep this short but it is clearly a hypocritical thing to say considering that it comes from the sort of person who would otherwise preach as a virtue a god of their own brand ruling you over; in essence, “those aren’t the gods that should be ruling you, mine is!” Peterson seems to liberally throw every style of argument at an issue and it makes him feel very inconsistent. Just as with accusations of lust and gluttony, this seems like a response based on one’s subjective standard as follows: If I like what you’re doing, then you must be perfectly lucid; if I don’t like what you’re doing, then those gods are ruling over you, bucko!

“It’s not just a metaphor that marriage is the bedrock of society. It’s actually the bedrock of society.” In case Dr. Peterson hadn’t noticed, that’s exactly what the whole bedrock thing is, it’s a metaphor. It’s as if one were to say “It’s not just metaphorically an elephant in the room, it’s actually an elephant! Okay, that is a nitpick admittedly.

As far as that statement goes, even if marriage in general doesn’t have a risk of dire consequences for the man, I still wouldn’t make a claim such as this. What, in my mind, actually makes a society strong in foundation? The idea of the individual. It is the belief in the individual that actually is what makes a society great, and the sheer lack of it is what causes the same society’s downfall as we are seeing today.

If Peterson had said that the family is the bedrock of society specifically then at least he’d have a better case, especially because I think the real purpose of the family is to raise an individual to think and act with self-ownership and attain his own pursuits. Family is not arrived at through the jettisoning of one’s own pursuits. Rather, a good family will be the result of one’s own earnest pursuits as an individual.

However, Peterson is making the argument from jettisoning one’s own pursuits to sell the idea of marriage. He appeals to self-sacrifice – in this case, abandoning one’s dreams and existential fulfillment through his own pursuits and self-interest. All of this, for being beholden to gynocentric service to a woman in the name of things like duty, acceptance, and “being a man”.

“I was a therapist for a long time and I talked to a lot of people about their marriages. I’ve been married 33 years as of two days ago and it’s gone pretty damn well.” If Peterson talked to a lot of people about their marriages then they do know how unfair the system can be for men, to the point that they could ultimately end up actually dead by their own hand. These sentences appear to be strung together in such a way that sounds like the latter is responding to a begged question of the former: “Well I had it good so the problem doesn’t exist at large.”

“You see what it would be like to care for someone. You see what it would be like to have someone care for you and value you.” Many things to unpack for this last bit. If it isn’t obvious, Peterson is clearly making the argument for marriage from a void of self-interest, and the argument from caring about another for being the other – altruism, in other words. As I’ve made clear before, this has nothing to do with love in any meaningful sense of the word, and certainly has nothing to do with a healthy relationship.

Being in a relationship in which one or neither side has any self-interest in the relationship itself is instead one of obligations, convention, duty, and means to ends. There is no organic personal bond as individuals that confide, respect, and relate to one another.

More to the point, Peterson in his video series will presumably sell the idea of marriage. That is, legal marriage, not pair bonding alone. In essence, what will happen is that if the idea of marriage is sold to a man watching his program, aside from being oblivious to the problems of the marriage and divorce industries the man is probably going to scramble to find a marriage partner after the fact. However, meaningful emotional attachment does not come easy, especially if one is starting from scratch relatively speaking. So, the man will be goaded into presenting himself as a protector and provider, and perhaps also as a wielder of money and status.

Money and status are not catalysts for an organic relationship. Peterson's case of "You see what it would be like to have someone care for you and value you" should be read in another way: being a protector and provider becomes the first thing about a man a gynocentric woman will gravitate towards and "value". This is not the beginning of a healthy relationship, but a relationship of host and parasite. The woman sees him as a resource object, and the law is set to support her if the man stops being her mechanism of resource and income.

In this case, devoid is any real regard of either side as an individual. The woman would see the man as a means to an end, a vassal, and a disposable unit, and to love him can be easily faked. The man may see the woman as a "prize" that does love him back, or at least he chances it or relies on wishful thinking. He sets himself up to be burned.

Self-interest, that is, genuine earnest interest and desire, is the basis upon which a relationship and the ensuing family must be established. The having and raising of children should likewise come from a spirit of self-interest. Why? Imagine having your parents tell you that they were never actually interested in having children, and they were only doing it because it is a public good or a social duty. Imagine them telling you they gave up all their dreams only to have you. Wouldn't you rather they tell you that they were excited to have you and raise you, instead?

But that is what Peterson and the conservatives he's appealing to are trying to sell marriage with: the argument from social duty. He spoke about the so-called bedrock of society. He spoke about marriage as "caring for others". These are all arguments from duty and dispassion, also from social rewards and prestige. If you pretend for a second that what Peterson is advocating for is the family as opposed to the legal setup, then he'll do very well to not make the argument from no self-interest. He will also be trying to speak to women instead of berating men all day, perhaps.

Those that want to have families will organically make families from their earnestly invested relationships. If you goad them into it, you will only make broken families. You can argue all day that there are anti-family elements in society and that is actually true enough, if the sociopolitical Left are any indication. But a bad family let by people not fit to raise a family can just as well destroy it. I make this point because in an accompanying status he stated that if a man is not thinking about marriage, "that is a problem." Even if marriage caused no harm to men, not every man may want this.

Closing Thoughts

Peterson in this ad video essentially ridiculed men saying they are worthless creatures if they opt out of marriage for their own pursuits. In the guise of imparting wisdom as to what is men's best chance for happiness, he clearly implies that a man going his own way after his own dreams is traveling a road to unhappiness. He is therefore of no social use. Any semblance of anything from motivation to the spirit of play are to be found chiefly, if not strictly, through the gynocentric contract of marriage.

One is right to wonder, since when are many pursuits of men outside of marriage actually so useless to society? If anything the thing that both sustains society and skyrockets it are the men doing things outside the context of marriage!

Men have created wonderful buildings as Frank Lloyd Wright or Richard Neutra have done, and spacecraft and space technology as NASA did in its day and SpaceX is doing today. And even if it wasn't so "useful to society", who gives a damn? Who is anyone to allege to have a right to a man's labor, his skillset, and his mind? Who is anyone to denounce it if it doesn't serve them?

Climbing a massive rock face, done often strictly because the climber wants to climb it, is an astounding pursuit to accomplish. Music and paintings too are the result of pursuing vision; although yes, some might say that art does serve a societal purpose, who cares? Can art not stand alone as coming into being because the artist wanted it to become real? All of this can really be beneficial to society at least in the form of being inspirational to others, but that is not the first reason anyone does anything, nor should it be.

Since we are talking about men and masculinity here, I'd like to say that yes, there are myriad archetypes of masculinity as well as femininity. We also must speak of the common denominators of masculinity without mentioning the biological details, and this is what in my opinion masculinity boils down to: pursuit. That spirit of either wanting something to become reality or to claim something as his own by the unabashed act of earning it. If masculinity can be distilled into something, it is that.

And guess what Peterson is ridiculing. You guess it – it's the very idea of pursuit. If you thought before for even a second that Peterson wants masculinity to flourish at its full potential, think again: he is advocating for men to subordinate it. Marriage as we currently understand it is nothing short of this subordination. If we haven't already, it's time we seriously reconsider what we think Jordan Peterson's intentions for men are in the present day.

Over-reading the nice guy

Clint Carpentier · 14 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Society is a nice idea. People gather to service a common goal: survival; throw in some basic rules for cohesiveness; and, boom, society.

Something occurred to me these last couple days, though, part of an ongoing neural itch I've been scratching at obsessively for months now: too many people on both sides of the debate have been making poor conceptions of primitive livelihood. I may get into that deeper at a later date because it's one thing for feminists to screw it all up, but it's utterly shameful for the MRAs to get it wrong, and I'm running out of skull to scratch at. But for now, I'll share my epiphany on niceness.

Niceness isn't favored by either gender—not because it's inherently flawed as a psychological evolution but simply because nobody really understands niceness. Not understanding something leads to distrust of that something. We like to think we understand niceness, but because it started out as a necessary societal dictation, we still think of niceness in those terms.

We don't question the phrase "Be nice to your family/friends/community" when our parents are grilling into us as children, usually because there's usually a reddened hand involved. We are expected to nod and smile at community members when they are being clusterfucks because niceness is societal cohesion.

So let's harken back to the days of necessary cohesion. I'm of Canadian Native descent, and there are noticeable holdovers of my branch of peoples that help me put two and two together: men scatter and women gather (like I said above, I'll get into that later).

"Niceness" isn't a trait men need to exist, subsist, or pass on. So if we have it, we have it; if we don't, we don't. It's just that simple. We have our band of brothers in which we wrestle one another into dominance or submission, and everyone finds a niche in which they excel; so even the lowly "nice guy" can earn respect, as long as he knows his place (which means, Don't glower at the future alpha chief). Men respect capability, competence, and "caveman" communication: the most direct route from idea to implementation earns the most respect. Niceness need not apply—yet men have it, and we have it in spades. What I find funny is that the dork and the bully can be the best of friends when they are together on their own; and I think that has more to do with prehistoric scouting than it does with a burgeoning society (which would include mating rituals).

On the other hand, "niceness" is a trait women had to invest countless hours into cultivating. Whereas men scattered during the daily activities, women gathered, together, to gather … get it? Whatever task you can think of, women did it in groups, all day, everyday. Niceness would have been quickly honed in order to tolerate one another and keep the group as a whole from falling apart at the seams. When every uterus meant survival, giving reason to be banished was not high on the list of things to do; and when every uterus mattered, tolerating even the shittiest uterus's attitude mattered. So niceness here was a matter of mutual survival, not an inherent trait to pass on genetically (and damn those double Xs for backing each other up, preventing mutation).

I've been on the receiving end of distrust from both men and women; I actually had to hone a certain level of meanness purely for social survival. I've learned that apologies are meaningless and that niceness is still seen as little more than a facade and will be claimed at you by mean people.

So imagine the conundrum of the actual "nice" person attempting to wade through the dating pool, which is filled with nicely smiling sharks and crocodiles.

My wife went to an all-girls Catholic high school. She says that girls are mean and nasty and cruel—and all smiles. They're cagey, shifty, and devious; and in order to survive, you had to form cliques, usually of girls you hated anyway, just to avoid being hated yourself. Catholic … girls … no boys.

So when women express their vicious distrust of the "nice guy," I think they're actually being honest. I don't think they understand the difference between an asshole wearing a “nice” mask and genuine niceness. I remember reading somewhere that we are the descendants of 80% of women in history but only 40% of men in history. If men develop mutations to pass on, and women get to choose which mutations survive the test of time, then it’s obvious that niceness isn’t a desirable trait but rather a necessary evil to be tolerated (and/or used and abused) lest one be cast to the wilderness of the real wolves.

I don’t think it’s fair for “nice” people to constantly have to “prove” their niceness; that’s a morally bankrupt notion from an entitled high ground. I think it’s best to just start banishing bad behavior from your environment. The hardest part about recognizing crappy attitudes in women is that they usually come with a dazzlingly nice smile. And nice guys are—well, like most guys—they’re just plain stupid; and banishing bitchy-behaving, aesthetically appealing, sweet-smelling mating material isn’t high on their list of things to do.

It took me years to decipher poisoned people for what they were. And the prettier the package, the harder it was to recognize the poison. I can’t explain poison; I can only point out an example and hope you don’t try to stick your dick in it.

Niceness isn’t a desirable trait; it’s an inspirational ideal or a distrusted mask of appeal. And that’s sad because women bend society; men just maintain what works. If cruelty with a veneer of kindness is what gets laid, stay away from women who are fucking assholes … who are fucking assholes. You can’t save sacred sanctimonious sluts sacrificing sultry sins so sexual sophistry succeeds. Just … stay away from them.

Don’t just do something, SIT THERE

Peter Wright · 15 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

“To be or not to be- that is the question.”
Shakespeare

Being is vital to the health of everyman but is rarely given the consideration it deserves: Being at a cafe, being in nature, being with a friend, being at home, being at peace. Smelling the roses. If allowed, these things have potential to replace some of the incessant doing that drives men’s existence too early into the coffin.

We’ve all heard the phrase Women are human beings and men are human doings.[1] It’s one of those catchy, hummable lines that everyone agrees with before it slips again from conscious awareness – even as it remains in front of our eyes and in our daily behavior. Even as it slips from awareness the fact remains that doing without being, and being without doing, bespeak unbalanced lives, ones that can and do lead to pathology.

The question we need to ask is what are we doing about it? I don’t mean what are we doing about it as a movement, but what are we, each of us, doing about it in our own personal lives. While some men are already addressing the balance, others may still be searching for the right balance, and for a better understanding of what’s at stake.

Pediatric psychiatrist Donald Winnicott contends that not only is being more important than doing in regards to psychological health, but that being must precede doing in order for doing to have significance:

> “Being is at the centre of any subsequent experience in life. In fact if the individual has not had the opportunity to simply be, his future does not augur well in terms of the emotional quality of his life. The likelihood is that this individual will feel empty.”
>
> “Now I want to say: ‘After being, is doing and being done to. But first, being.”
>
> “The ability to do, therefore, is based on the capacity to be. The search and discovery of the sense of self, in the context of therapy, is all to do with finding an identity.”
>
> “It cannot be overemphasized that being is the beginning of everything, without which doing and being done to have no significance.”[2]

Being, according to Winnicott, is more important to mental health, and is ironically the thing males are most encouraged to forego in favor of doing. You’d better not relax and simply be – there is work to be done!

The trend of separating boys and girls along these lines starts early. The boy gets a dump truck and a Bob the Builder toolkit, and the girl receives a Be Yourself Barbie™. Through the person of Barbie girls learn the experience of ‘being’ in a doll’s house, and being relaxed, being pretty, being ugly, being among friends, being at a cafe, being married, or being happy, sad, jealous or vain. That's the psychological cloth little girls are cut from.

The first question we ask a boy is "What sport do you play," or "What kind of work do you want to do when you grow up?" Men are taught to be action figures who work, do the wage earning, do the repairs, or do their girlfriend. As long as they are doing something, we assume they are in their rightful place.

But doing can only return value if the person first exists. If he doesn't feel like he exists on a basic level, all efforts in doing have no meaning because there is no 'me' doing the doings. In that instance all doing becomes futile because it never leads to a sense of me-ness. Or, if doing does provide a momentary illusion of me-ness, it all vanishes the moment activity stops. When all is still, with no future plans, many men are swallowed by an existential void.

With the modern mandate that men do and women be, there's a dearth of male models for how to be. So for the purpose of this article lets revive a classical source illustrating what men have lost and why we would do well to rediscover it. For our purpose let's consult the 2,600 yr old sage Lao Tzu, who cultivated a philosophy of non-doing (Wu wei), defined as follows:

> Wu wei (Chinese: 無爲) is an important concept in Taoism that literally means non-action or non-doing. In the Tao te Ching, Lao Tzu explains that beings (or phenomena) that are wholly in harmony with the Tao behave in a completely natural, uncontrived way. The goal is, according to Lao Tzu, the attainment of this purely natural way of behaving, as when the planets revolve around the sun. The planets effortlessly do this revolving without any sort of control, force, or attempt to revolve themselves, instead engaging in effortless and spontaneous movement.[3]

Being aware of the importance of the doing/being dichotomy, one of the first books I gave my son, at the tender age of 10, was a children's version of the Tao Te Ching by Lao Tzu. We read it together and enjoyed some interesting discussion about the wise old sage, especially about his contention that the wise man "Acts without doing" — What did it mean? I'm not entirely sure if we got the meaning right, but we decided it meant to 'act' in the way you want to act, without 'doing' what others demand or expect from you.

Lao Tzu book for 7-10 yr old boys

"Therefore the wise one acts without doing"

In another translation the old sage says, Act without doing; work without effort. In each of these phrases he seems to be saying let it come naturally, let it arise out of being, and not from pressures from the outside world.

None of this is to suggest that boys and men shouldn't be active in the world. The good news for men seeking that greater balance is that you don't have to sacrifice doing in the process. Most men really MUST do in order to be healthy. But there is a distinction to be made here between healthy and unhealthy doing.

It's one thing to act from a spontaneous sense of self – a being self – and yet another to operate from compliance with the wishes of others because you were raised on a narrative of utility. Those living the narrative of utility must first become conscious of that before giving themselves over to an exploration of being, and if that consciousness is not first achieved then it's guaranteed that your attempts at being will be interrupted by internal guilt or by shaming from those who have most to lose from you walking off the plantation.

As per Lao Tzu we don't stop doing but rather become more conscious of our motives so that doing can emerge from a different center – not gynocentric duty, but conscious choice grounded in the ability to be.

One of Lao Tzu's main disciples Chuang Tzu elaborates the topic:

> Heaven does nothing: its non-doing is its serenity.
> Earth does nothing: its non-doing is its rest.
> From the union of these two non-doings
> All actions proceed,
> All things are made.
> How vast, how invisible
> This coming-to-be!
> All things come from nowhere!
> How vast, how invisible-
> No way to explain it!
> All beings in their perfection
> Are born of non-doing.
> Hence it is said:
> "Heaven and earth do nothing
> Yet there is nothing they do not do."
>
> Where is the man who can attain
> To this non-doing?[4]

Remaining with our fictional character Lao Tzu a little longer, let's consider the traditional tea-making ceremony legend says he helped to found. Just as Barbie is famed for her tea parties in which she teaches girls the arts of being among friends, Lao Tzu is credited with the first Chinese tea ceremony, a ritual centered in the experience of stillness and presence.

We may be reluctant to talk about a 'Tao of Barbie,' with her narcissistic overtones, but the tea drinking ceremonies of the Chinese and Japanese cultures deserve a nod to the noble Tao of Lao Tzu.

Taoism, like most ancient religions, talks about the balance between work and repose. By way of contrast, while Barbie also teaches girls that a work/life balance is possible, it's not certain that Barbie takes the work part of that equation very seriously.

To summarize, a common element running through all narratives about men is doing. We hear it in phrases like "All work, no play," "Don't just sit there, do something!," and "No rest for the wicked." Men slave for gynocentric culture as its saviors, fix-it men, martyrs, protectors, laborers, office-workers, and heroes – all narratives based on doing. But there's good reason for men to break from the cycle of servitude to enjoy some moments of being – being for themselves.

It's time we stopped for a cup of tea: ritually made, mindfully sipped, with or without friends, and without a need to watch the clock for the next round of work.

References

[1] On Dr. Warren Farrell's website the phrase "Women are human beings, men are human doings" is credited to his book Women Can't Hear What Men Don't Say. Elsewhere he explains: "I think the source here is yours truly. In the late 1960s, when I began speaking in this area, I used to say this. Although I've checked a dozen books of quotations and believe I created this, I wouldn't bet my life on it." (p.275).
[2] Jan Abrams, The Language of Winnicott; A Dictionary and Guide to Understanding His Work (1996)
[3] Wikipedia: Wu wei (June 5, 2015)
[4] Thomas Merton, The Way of Chuang Tzu (1965)

Jordan Peterson's Map For Oedipal Men

Peter Wright · 15 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

To understand Jordan Peterson's encouraging of young men to become heroes in service to the maternal principle, especially within the context of marriage, we must turn to his ideological pedigree in the formulations of Carl Jung. Jung characterized the hero archetype as bound up with what he called 'the Great Mother archetype,' believing that male heroism rests on resisting the negative mother or, alternatively, acting as servant to a positive mother. Jung's mother-tied concept of the hero is laid out in his Symbols of Transformation, an idea that Peterson reiterates when he treats motherly women as an axis mundi who provide essential meaning to male striving (a position I touched on in a 2017 article titled The Gynocentrism of Jordan Peterson).

Peterson refers to Freud's claim that the Oedipus myth is a "failed hero story," but he proposes, following Jung, that relationships men have with mothers and other feminine figures might be more positive and more inspirational than the taboo interpretation insisted upon by Freud. Whether such relationships with inspiring or nurturing female figures be positive or negative, Peterson appears to miss Freud's point that both of these options still belie an incestuous entanglement with mother imagos.

In this video for example, Peterson claims that positive mothers give birth to heroes. He illustrates this point by reference to an image of Hercules who floats on a chaotic ocean in what he refers to as a "feminine boat," which is a metaphor for an uplifting, positive mother. In this lecture he reminds his female students of their role in creating and sustaining heroes: "That's what you're trying to produce if you're a good mother, it's this figure that can go out into the unknown armed, accurate and able to pay attention," and he adds that mothers create male heroes who "can take on the troubles of the world."

Might this be why Peterson places such strong emphasis on women becoming mothers – that they might breed and nurture the next generation of male heroes? That male heroes might then have a female boat to float their heroic mindset? Further, what might happen if we replaced all of Peterson's inspiring female figures with inspiring male figures?

There is no way, at least in my reading, of understanding Peterson's kind of feminine-tied heroism as anything other than a mother fixation. The archetypalist James Hillman agrees that "contrary to the classical analytical view, we would suggest that the son who succumbs and the hero who overcomes both take their definition through the relationship with the magna mater… When mother determines the role, then regardless how it is played its essence is always the same: a son. And, as Jung says of assertive heroism:

> "Unfortunately, however, this heroic deed has no lasting effects. Again and again the hero must renew the struggle, and always under the symbol of deliverance from the mother"[1]

What we are dealing with by over-emphasizing the role of mothers is the creation of two male archetypes: Mother's son (Oedipus), and Mother's hero (Hercules). Readers will be aware that Hercules' relationship with female figures leaves him riddled with guilt and pathology, and Oedipus is the ultimate example of malignant, incestuous heroics who is unable to enact his heroism as anything but the result of his relationship with female figures. But the Oedipal path is not the only way to view the male hero, as Hillman describes;

> The [maternal] dragon demands battle and the hero myth tells us how to proceed. But suppose we were to step out altogether from the great mother, from Jocasta and Oedipus and the exhausting, blinding heroics…. If Freud was right that Oedipus is the stuff of neurosis, then the corollary follows that Oedipus-heroics are the dynamism of neurosis. Heroism is thus a kind of neurosis, and the heroic ego is neurotic ego. Creative spirit and fertile matter are there embraced and embattled to the destruction of both.[2]

So far I've been referring only to a classical Jungian concept of the male hero, and to Jordan Peterson's reliance on same.[3] The hero archetype in Jung's writings is intimately bound up with the mother archetype (being a hero for mother / or fighting against the dragon mother), or otherwise tied up with feminine figures (inspiratress, or muse). These are archetypes that can be contrasted with other kinds of male hero who have zero entanglement with feminine figures.

Aside from the mother's heroes described above, there are a number of variations detailed by Joseph Campbell in his famous work The Hero With a Thousand Faces. Campbell wasn't a Jungian, and he was suspicious of Jungian dogmas, once claiming "I'm not a Jungian! I'm much more interested in diffusion and relationships historically than Jung was, so that the Jungians think of me as a kind of questionable person."[4] Likewise, Campbell's conception of the hero is not beholden to Jungian or Freudian orthodoxies.

Campbell paints the hero's journey as a stepping off into the unknown, into a more gutsy hero's journey as compared with stepping out into the world as 'mother's hero' to do her bidding. As Campbell characterized it, a more masculine hero's journey might entail leaving the mother-world behind and seeking atonement with the father, which Campbell describes; "When the child outgrows the popular idyl of the mother breast and turns to face the world of specialized adult action, it passes, spiritually, into the sphere of the father—who becomes, for his son, the sign of the future task… Whether he knows it or not, and no matter what his position in society, the father is the initiating priest through whom the young being passes on into the larger world."

As one facebook poster put it;

> "The hero's journey as described by Joseph Campbell begins by 'Separation,' the departure from the status quo. To me this personally I associate this to stepping out of and leaving the gynocentric view of the status quo."

Leaving behind the gynocentric world is precisely what is entailed. To whit, Campbell writes:

> This first stage of the mythological journey—which we have designated the "call to adventure"—signifies that destiny has summoned the hero and transferred his spiritual center of gravity from within the pale of his society to a zone unknown. This fateful region of both treasure and danger may be variously represented: as a distant land, a forest, a kingdom underground, beneath the waves, or above the sky, a secret island, lofty mountaintop, or profound dream state; but it is always a place of strangely fluid and polymorphous beings, unimaginable torments, superhuman deeds, and impossible delight. The hero can go forth of his own volition to accomplish the adventure, as did Theseus when he arrived in his father's city, Athens, and heard the horrible history of the Minotaur; or he may be carried or sent abroad by some benign or malignant agent, as was Odysseus, driven about the Mediterranean by the winds of the angered god, Poseidon.[5]

That refers to the father-inspired hero. For the mother-bound hero, however, this broader journey is renounced in favor of remaining within the family complex and enacting a pale heroism on its behalf. As Campbell tells;

> Often in actual life, and not infrequently in the myths and popular tales, we encounter the dull case of the call unanswered… The literature of psychoanalysis abounds in examples of such desperate fixations. What they represent is an impotence to put off the infantile ego, with its sphere of emotional relationships and ideals. One is bound in by the walls of childhood; the father and mother stand as threshold guardians, and the timorous soul, fearful of some punishment, fails to make the passage through the door and come to birth in the world without.[5]

Campbell entertained a few gynocentric beliefs of his own that were popular in academia in his time. Mercifully, he formulated the hero's Journey on the principle of men stepping out into new horizons without the need for maternal or feminine fixations, and on that journey he said it is frequently male figures who serve to encourage, inspire and guide the male hero – fathers, brothers, ancestral spirits, male mentors and guides. Campbell's hero provides a welcome change from Oedipal hero which sees men going from enmeshment with mothers straight into the married arms of a maternal wife as Peterson encourages for young men. In other words Campbell's hero template for men is explicitly Red Pill, as contrasted with gynocentric fixation on parental figures and roles.

Paul Elam, who has devoted much of his life to imparting the wisdom of self-determinism to men, made this incisive response regarding the comparison of Campbell's and Peterson's concepts of the hero:

After floating a description of this 'Campbellian' kind of hero on Twitter and describing his more masculine pedigree, a few people asked whether this path was suitable for all men; eg., straight, gay, soft, hard, nerd or Canadian lumberjack. The answer is yes, because we all have maternal influences dominating our childhood and have a choice to move into adult life remaining enmeshed or obsessed with feminine forces (Peterson), or otherwise to place the accent on atonement with the world of men and with adventure (Campbell). The choice, as always, is yours.

References:

[1] James Hillman, 'The Great Mother, Her Son, Her Hero, And The Puer,' in Fathers and mothers; five papers on the archetypal background of family psychology, Spring Publications (1973)
[2] Karl Kerenyi, James Hillman, Oedipus Variations: Studies in Literature and Psychoanalysis. Spring Publications (1995)
[3] Note: As well as deriving inspiration from Jung's conception of the hero, Peterson leans heavily on the work of Jungian Erich Neumann (The Great Mother, and The Origins And History of Consciousness) whose writings display an obsession with mother imagery. For readers wanting to investigate how irrational Neumann's ideas are, see the excellent critique by Wolfgang Giegerich titled ONTOGENY = PHYLOGENY? A Fundamental Critique of Erich Neumann's Analytical Psychology (1975).
[4] Joseph Campbell. An open life: Joseph Campbell in conversation with Michael Toms. Larson Publications (1988)
[5] Joseph Campbell, The hero with a thousand faces (rev. ed.). Bollingen Series, 17. (1990)

As always, it falls to Men

Scott Thomas · 16 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

As a child, I always wondered why my family spent so much time doing things that appeared, at least to me, to be without meaning or merit. Church, for example, was clearly an obligation. No one looked to be enjoying anything. We bounced up and down off our knees with the frequency of a fluffer on a Houston set. I was required to wear an abrasive polyester three piece suit and to follow dutifully as the family engaged in scripted banter with other cue card carrying members of society.

My father worked hard, was rarely home and when he was he slept or worked on the house and car. My mother was simply obsessed with other people's opinions.

Nothing was ever discussed about love, life, or the pursuit of happiness. I can only assume their reasons being that it took everything they had just to paint all the numbers in the picture window each month. Passing acquaintances and strangers caring little or not at all.

I just didn't get it.

And so I was determined to do it my way. I was going to execute this life, my marriage and my family in a way that would focus on us and not "them." We were going to be an autonomous unit of love. Singularly resolute in our loyalty, not only for each other but to our life and our pursuit of happiness. I choose my wife based off a deep and thorough analysis of consumer advertising and movie characters. I of course knew women were caring, deeply compassionate, forgiving and fundamentally altruistic. I was excited with the prospect of an iron trust and my ability to be vulnerable with my wife, my one true love, my soulmate. We married in a picturesque church and danced on the bay. Surrounded by wildlife, all in attendance celebrated God's true love.

But then something very odd, something very unexpected began to happen. As my time passed, confusion began to emerge and grow. Why was it my responsibility to put the seat down so that my equal did not actually fall in the toilet? Was my mind slipping because I was sure I had repeatedly told her that account was critical not to be used? How is my flying out at 3:30 am to be by her side all day at her work function not good enough?

It was clear I had a lot of work to do to be a better man. I even questioned my viability at the office. How could I possibly continue to distil complex technologies and abstractions into simple digestible terms for large audiences if I couldn't even communicate effectively with my soulmate? To a person who I knew was deeply concerned with my opinions, my desires, and my needs.

I would improve, I would change, I would fix this.

Of course what I finally came to realize was that she did not give a single fuck what I thought or wanted unless it met with her agenda. It was always, from the very beginning, all about her.

And this is the point gents. The baseline. The big picture. This is the salient fact with which we all need to come to terms. It is the catalyst by which the destruction of the family unit and the raising of healthy children is realized. It is a truth in need of balance. And one unchecked, will inevitably lead to chaos and destruction.

In my marriage, it is truth that the actions of my spouse were a focused and premeditated approach to enhance her life through the continuous and constant utilization of myself and my utility, without compunction or moral constraint. A conscious approach to use me for her own gain, and at my expense. This is also the red pill consensus on female nature.

Let's now view that statement with the subject being Men.

It is the nature of males to enhance their lives through the use of female labor, their disposability, and expendability. In this indifferent use and disposal of females, the male feels no guilt or morality.

It appears that while female nature is an intelligent and necessary approach for the survival of offspring, it is clearly a destructive force post a survival based civilization. It matters not the rational evolutionary path of female nature. It matters not how female nature metastasized in modern times to an abject indifference and abuse of the very people that made their luxury and lives possible. What matters is what we do now. What we do for our sons.

Modern day gynocentrism is a model whereby men are fully controlled for the sole purpose of meaningless survival and entertainments. It is an abject waste of a man's life and creativity. A waste of experience, learning, adventure, growth, and the ability to pass real wisdom to our sons. Wisdom that will allow our sons to begin their journey of life exploration from a plane far beyond the illusions we inherited. Modern day gynocentrism is, I would argue, the curtailing of the human spirit and its potential.

Gentlemen, we are being played and women are more than aware.

Rejecting this modern day gynocentric model is our charge and our responsibility to our boys. I also submit it is our responsibility to our ancestors. To all the men that did what they had to do for true survival. For food and shelter, literally. For fighting the wars to ensure our freedom and to see us use that freedom in the true service of our children, ourselves, and our society. Not some nagging abusive oppressive sow.

So ask yourself, for yourself and for your boys. What would the world be like now with all our technology and safety and medicine if Men, the gender that loves to contemplate, that has ambition, that strives for excellence and accomplishment, what would be if those millions were conditioned to simply be who they are, who they know themselves to be, that for which they were born. To be free to pursue, explore and understand that self at the earliest of age and continue that path for life. The next generation picking up where they left off.

What would this world look like?

50 #QuestionsForMen #Mansplained

A Voice For Men Videos · 16 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists stormed Twitter to ask men some questions, and a lot of them were really, really dumb. Sargon of Akkad patiently mansplains some answers.

What next after flattening the groomers

Lucian Vâlsan · 17 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This article originally appeared on the Freedom Alternative Network and is reproduced here with permission –Ed

Over the last 12 months, the issue of (trans)genderist ideology being shoved down the throats of children blew up and will likely influence the upcoming Midterms positively.

Needless to say, it isn't a new topic. Here we've been discussing it for years. Because that's why people come to the Sofa – to learn the news from the future.

So considering that now even left-wing mainstream figures sound on this issue almost exactly as the Sofa sounded over 7 years ago, suffice to say that the issue is now past the narrative curve's third inflection point and, as such, it no longer requires the attention of cognizant political actors – such as this esteemed audience.

Put it simply: The issue will be solved regardless of whether we put in any effort from now on. The alliances are set, the plebs are awoken, the money is already there for the campaigns and momentum is also present. So, best we can do is make sure they don't blow it (never underestimate good people's ability to fuck things up).

So what we should be thinking now is the next step. What happens after this? The moment of "after" isn't far away at all. Just a few days ago Florida banned puberty blockers and the whole "therapy" aimed at castrating and mutilating children. Most countries in Europe have either already did this or are considering similar policies. Most of the US will follow suit in the next 3 to 5 years. It's a done deal. So… what's next?

Tantalizing both sides

Once the children issue is solved (for which near-universal agreement exists), the issue will naturally gravitate towards adults. What to do with so-called "transgender" adults?

The current alliance between normal people, religious freaks, far-Left feminists and other members of the C-set may or may not hold. Those more libertarian will be tempted to abandon the issue once the children side of the story is solved. This will necessarily increase the power within the remaining alliance of the recently-acquired far-Left feminists (so-called "TERFs"). And their argument is a powerful one: Protect single sex spaces!

Now, the message itself is not prima faciae wrong or morally reprehensible. The problem is that, in practice, this means protect women's and only women's single sex spaces. And THAT, I contend, is morally reprehensible.

The other "side" isn't/won't be any better: They will claim that adults can "self identify" as whatever they want and disagreeing is discrimination which is allegedly a bad thing (it isn't).

What I suggest is that we tantalize both sides (the English language doesn't have a perfect equivalent for a băga bățul prin gard).

We tantalize the TERFs (alongside the well-meaning people who actually buy into the inherently misandrist message that women's single sex spaces are for women's safety – which is a deeply hateful message if you think about it) by imposing conditions: You want our help? Great! Right after we get codified in law the exclusive right of both men and women to single-sex spaces.

We tantalize the other side by over-enthusiastically supporting their bid(s). And by that I mean saying the quiet part loud: The transgender agenda as applied to adults will destroy women's sports (which is not a bad thing, given that women's "professional" sports is already entirely subsidized by men and is generally of no value to the community). This agenda will also ruin all sex-specific policies (which is objectively a good thing) when it comes to "affirmative action", "all-women shortlists" (in politics) and other similarly destructive, illiberal, immoral and inherently misandristic policies that are plaguing our societies.

Why?

Ultimately, we have to admit we don't really have a dog in this fight. Whichever side wins, it brings some positive and some negative things with it. So the best we can do (and, I argue, should do) is to try to influence the final position(s) of both sides in such a way that we get as much as possible out from this conflict.
If the "TERF side" wins with our amendments as well – we get an important step in the right direction when it comes to freedom of association. The very idea that in most countries of Europe you can't run an all-male OR all-female club/business/NGO/school/etc is bonkers and illiberal in and of itself. Freedom of association also means freedom not to associate. And, as politically incorrect as that may sound, yes, this includes the freedom to refuse to associate with the opposite sex sometimes.

I'm not going to get now into the benefits of that. The benefits of single-sex schools are well known. Not to mention the benefits to the mental health of both teenage girls and especially teenage boys of having a place to go to where one is not subjected to the inherent weirdness of the opposite sex.

Today we are at a time and place where all-male spaces are either outright banned or heavily shamed into oblivion. There's a reason the phrase "sausage fest" has an inherently negative connotation and it is also much more widely known that its equivalent – fanny fest.

What I'm arguing is that instead of fighting to get "fanny fest" down to the same negative connotation, we should instead fight to abolish both terms. There is nothing inherently wrong with events/places where most or all participants are of one sex. Quite the opposite: oftentimes it's very healthy.

The downside of this route is that we're not getting rid of feminist harpies this round either.

If the progressive/gender abolitionist side wins, we get, progressively, the destruction of all women-only policies, render "affirmative action" useless and, bonus, our societies end up saving up on some money too.

Just as I'm typing this, the Women's EHF EURO 2022 is taking place in Slovenia, North Macedonia and Montenegro. A handball tournament that very few care about, but for which the governments of these (already poor) countries paid a fuckton of money that they'll never see back – because Women's Handball is nowhere near as interesting as Men's Handball. Just like in other sports, a 3-rd tier division match between semi-pro men's handball teams is far more competitive and attractive than even the grand final of Women's EURO.

So, if the progressive side wins, all of that goes out of the window. Slower, or faster – but out it goes. It's the natural/logical conclusion.

The downside of this is that it actively harms women without benefiting men. But is it really a downside?

Women allowed feminist harpies to protest in their names, for decades, for nothing less than the legal abolition of male-only spaces. So why should we care that, if in this dispute the "progressive"side wins, it would effectively do the same to female-only spaces? Welp,… I will need to be convinced to give a damn. I don't actively want to destroy women-only spaces – but I honestly dgaf if they end up being destroyed because of this conflict.

The point being this: We cannot go on for much longer with the status quo – where single-sex rights de facto only exist for women. Whichever way this conflict goes – either by abolishing single-sex rights altogether or by reverting to saner standards – will still be a better position than the current one.

Of course, ideally, both sides should win and lose at the same time. Ideally, we should restore much of the freedom of association lost on the altar of feminism and progressivism and we also should get rid of affirmative action (of all kinds), get rid of feminist harpies and all the rest of the single-sex (read: women-only) programmes that exist solely on the basis of theft of resources from men and redistributed to women for no benefit whatsoever for the community as a whole.

But, we don't live in an ideal world. So, the best we can do is to try to influence the position(s) of both sides in such a way that minimizes harm and maximizes the steps in the right direction.

That's it for now. I haven't yet made up my mind on the strategy – so I am all ears on a different strategy. Now it's your turn to convince me that I'm wrong. Through the usual channels, of course.

Cheers!

25 men bullshitting about male privilege – part 1

A Voice For Men Videos · 18 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

25 men bullshitting about male privilege | part 2

A Voice For Men Videos · 18 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill documentary – free on Gravitas

A Voice For Men Videos · 19 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

19 November 2022: International Men’s Day video compilation

A Voice For Men Videos · 19 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

“5 Things Women Know that Men Don’t”

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 20 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

An archived copy of the article being responded to can be found here –Ed

Passive-aggressive articles about men’s alleged ignorance are nothing new. You could even say they are a kind of tradition. Scott Barthelmes, founder of the Relevant Man and contributor to The Good Men Project is more than happy to carry on this tradition with his piece 5 Things Women Know that Men Don’t.

> Before we get started let’s just say up front that there are exceptions to every rule. So, all of you haters just need to simmer down and know that these “5 Things Women Know That Men Don’t” are based on personal observances and experiences. But then, all of you women readers already knew that … didn’t you? See what I mean?

Scott, if this opener is any indication of your experience, there’s going to be a lot of things women know that you don’t—penis notwithstanding.

> Most women know at least one hour before the man does if and when there will be sexual relations, and to what degree. That’s right guys. […] She will know at least one hour before you do: if there will be sex; when the sex will take place; and what sexual acts will be performed.
>
> The guy might be able to determine the place for said acts based on her state of arousal and a great deal of planning on his part. He might even think that he “slipped one past the goalie” from time to time. But, don’t be fooled. She knew what was coming before he had a clue. If it happened, she knew it was going to happen first.

What a weird way to start an article. Out of all the ways to express stereotypes against men, recasting positive sexual encounters as something the woman foreseeing before the guy is a bit contrived.

It’s also a bit of a gimme: You are basically saying that a company knows if it will hire someone before the applicant does. The moment you turn this story around where a woman is interested in a man, your entire first paragraph makes no sense unless you are describing a rapist.

I picture a deranged, sexless goblin named Charlene eyeing Scott from the stormy outdoors through a bar window. Flashes of lightning light up Charlene’s pickled warts and quake her porridge-like complexion. She mutters with a hint of desperation and determination to the voices in her head that she knows where and when she will tie Scott to a streetlamp and get his rectum into the Guinness Book of World Records.

If only Scott knew.

> Many women know how to share their feelings with one another.
>
> OK, I can see you rolling your eyes from here. I know that almost every guy out there is saying “Why would I want to share my feelings with another guy?” Why indeed?

Doesn’t that question and the eye roll convey feeling? Don’t you know how feelings work, Scott?

> Well for one thing; it would provide a sounding board to bounce things off of in advance of you doing something stupid. You know you’ve been there. You’ve done something that later proved itself to be heartless, selfish, boorish, or short-sighted. […] Something that you might have reconsidered had you had someone to talk with about it before you said, did, or wrote anything. […] But, it’s pretty rare for guys to talk about intimate stuff like emotional relationships, the latest men’s fashions, or how someone made you feel. Guess what. Women do that shit all of the time.

As your sounding board acting after the fact, please reflect on the bold text and links added by me.

> Most women know men's insecurities — even ones that the guy doesn't know himself. Guys, do you ever feel like maybe you're being played by the fairer sex? That's because you are. It's like a sixth sense that drives their two minute drill offense. They see your weak spots. They gather the information. They wait until the closing minutes, then they throw the deep pattern that you never saw coming. Boom!

Is this passage supposed to make me admire women? I don't know about you Scott, but I wouldn't associate with people who feel the need to use reconnaissance and emotional conflict in daily life.

To be fair, there have been times a woman has said immensely hurtful things to me that made me upset, and left me sputtering for words. It's not that I couldn't express what was wrong; I always know exactly what's wrong the moment I heard an evil statement! The problem is that I am to this day surprised when someone goes out of their way to hurt me. it leaves me speechless, angry and hurt. Why? Why do that? Why would someone I thought was close to me put energy into making me feel worse about myself?

I think I agree with you on this one, Scott. With the exception of the abusive few, men do not make a point to analyze a woman's insecurities for future leverage. It never even occurs to them, because men are good people. Hurtful words—NOT banter!—are something I've only experienced coming from women, including women who love me. I think all women should be deeply ashamed of themselves when they knowingly hurt someone's feelings, because that is not how civilized people should behave.

Thanks for bringing this issue to our attention, Scott. And thank you for letting me share my feelings on this situation.

> Many women know what sort of birth control they're using (or not using) at all times.

Your deadline must have been like an hour after you wrote this.

> Most women know about skin care and hair care products that most men never even knew existed.

Men look good enough as it is without needing to know, but again, Google is your friend.

> BTW: in case you were wondering … there is a list of things that men know, and that women don't know too. But that's a list for another day.

And I will be writing that list.

Thank you for your experience, Scott.

Some thoughts on honesty and sex

J Galt · 20 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Now hold on here, I know the title is challenging, I could hardly hold back the tears of laughter just typing it. But I thought I'd write this not as a response to the warmth and fuzziness of life in the body politic of intimacy and farting, but as a reminder. I was over at the "GUMP" site, for those who are wondering or have forgotten it's the "Good Unless Male Project," Reading an article by none other than Forrest himself, and I thought hey let's check out some other stuff written by the elves that lurk in the Forrest. I do understand in a kind of laundry on Wednesday and bowel movement before 8am way that the challenge of being just a regular guy. Forrest himself has often eluded to his own struggles with his rasculinity.

For those confused that's masculinity with an "R" and only to be used if you're a pirate or plunderer, or missed laundry day, or if you have one leg, or a bird that won't shut up. Wives don't count because they are always honest, honest. It's sage advice being rolled out and if you're looking for evidence just cut the man down and count the number of annual marital rings, I mean "growth rings" and you will know that there is nothing superficial going on here at all. Honest.

Now I do know that in an irregular kind of way, missing those magic moments to contemplate the universe or read an insightful edition of COSMO just before 8 am may lead to a day of being full of shit. It's paradoxical really in a "Male Honesty" kind of way. And since we're discussing "Male Honesty" and being full of shit in a "Paradoxical" kind of way, I thought I might offer some honest insight from the Forrest. Honest questions from an honest man answered by honest people in an honest kind of way. Honest.

I know cause I can "feel" the honesty in his questions, and if you "feel" it, well then it has to be honest. Honest. Now the paradox doesn't just begin and end with the questions, no friends round two of the paradox (and I'm not referring to a shoe style here) moves on to include none other than …….Amanda Marcotte, the epicenter of honesty and her feelings that support it. Not to be confused with a dish of pasta, Amanda herself is often found to be rich in vitamin "aye." But let's not waylay this with a discussion about stuffed linguini or semolina flowers chafed in their own oils. Let's eat.

The probe into Paradox opens profoundly with these questions.....

- What does it mean to be faithful in love?
- How do you try to be true to your best self?
- Are we a nation of men being dishonest about fundamental truths?
- Is radical honesty that helps strangers but hurts loved ones worth it?
- Why do men so often lie when the truth would work just as well?
- If a good man is an honest man, does a good man never lie?
- Is silence a lie?
- Is love a compromise of conflicting truths?
- Does love require a kind of truth-telling which is always painful?
- Is it okay to embellish for the sake of a good story?
- Does reality TV really happen?
- How do you do no harm when the truth is immensely painful?
- How do you tell a woman she is beautiful just frequently enough with sufficient variety that she believes you?
- Is it possible to be the same man at work and at home, with the guys and with your spouse? Or is some amount of play-acting necessary to survive in the modern world?
- What are the things that it's okay to lie to your kids (or kids in general) about?

- What does it mean to live with integrity in a non-verbal way?
- Are feelings facts?
- Is the truth always more powerful than a lie?

Please feel free to address any of these probing questions into the context of "male honesty" and it's accompanying paradox, I know that if you "feel" free then you too are honest.

Maybe I'm one of those "guys" that paradoxically realizes that if you need to affirm your honesty with investigative reporting on who, what, when, where and why then you likely miss the point altogether. Given the frequent connection between love and honesty in the questions, I'm left to wonder where honesty goes if it's anything less than love that you experience towards another. I was taught by my predecessor, Knuckledragger, that honesty is often self-serving. His words echo inside me, "to thine own self be true."

It's one of those opportunities to discover your place in the world, who's who and where you might fit in the scheme of things. But then of course there is a world of difference between being honest and telling the truth. Not knowing the difference can lead to a distorted sense of privilege. Amanda eyeballed that curve immediately and took a swing at the "male privilege" behind the "paradox of male honesty" and I quote……

"It's intellectually dishonest to argue that one can separate discussions of privilege from discussions of honesty. Since we were provoked to be honest, I was honest about this. I realize that it makes some people uncomfortable, but that was the challenge. Having your statements be accepted as truth regardless of empirical facts or conflicting narratives is a function of privilege. Defining what is true and what is not is a function of privilege. If men want to be honest, they must begin by questioning their privilege. Any other starting point is….a lie."

If you are wondering, I've thought it to be important that when you tell a joke in writing where you highlight the punch line so the reader knows when to laugh. Of course I did consider that Amanda was being a cryptic sage and really telling us that she is a liar but that would suggest retrograde honesty and that is much more political than personal. So I'm somewhat confident that what Amanda is offering is her pseudo truth. That without considering the lack of privilege possessed by men and accepting the political powerlessness offered by feminism you are lying to yourself.

Honesty is a bit of a Pavlovian maze if you ask me and it seems the rats are always looking for payola after a good run. I'm a profoundly honest person myself, even during delusional episodes of flatulence, and find the delivery is made more honest with sincerity. Really, what's honesty about if not the process of negotiating perception and making rules of predictability? Isn't that really a woman's game?

Even a pathological liar is honest when weighted against consistency and that goes a long way towards sincerity. Maybe the paradox only exists between men and women. I'm kind of thinking that the undertone of these questions may be more related to effectively lying and making it sound honest.

Now for all you guys who are still struggling with the "do I look fat in this dress" question – a piece of advice, don't answer it. There is another way, simply ask her to take off the dress, put it on yourself and then tell her you look fatter than her in the dress. It may not be honest but at least there's comic relief.

It's a process of magical force this thing referred to as honesty and the real measure behind it is not your own honesty but the extent of gullibility possessed by the listener. There's the rub, aye; are you gullible enough to believe that they are gullible enough to believe that you aren't gullible at all? I mean when it comes to honesty it's likely the most honest people you will ever meet are the ones you don't believe.

What about people that talk to themselves? Are they honest or are they lying or are they just second guessing themselves and shopping for sincerity? Seems these folks would believe that honesty is more about a sincere delivery than substance. What if while talking to themselves they exercise any disbelief? Then challenging the source becomes somewhat of a disembodied diatribe. Who the hell is going to argue the accountability of personal honesty while engaged in a conversation with themselves?

Then of course you have people that hear voices, or even “talk to the dead” or to “aliens” or to “oracles.” In my younger years, while exploring mysticism, it all came to a breathtaking halt of realization against some very wise words given to me by a man over a pint of beer. It was very sage advice and insight that I had never considered until that moment. “Just cause they’re dead doesn’t mean they know anything.” That, my friends, was a life changer for me and I have to admit real honesty for me always has a touch of humor.

In my experience when it comes to communicating honesty with men a simple “are you shitting me?” or “bullshit” seems to have been adequate over the years. That’s not to say I haven’t been lied to by guys, but I have taken into consideration that maybe they had to. Fair enough, I’ll hold back the tears and push on. I’ve never felt the need to call the emotion police for a mouth swab to check for honesty. I mean, if someone is lying to me there’s two simple questions I ask, why do they feel the need and do I need to feel anything as a result.

I did learn something profound from my last partner about honesty. Whenever she would start on me, you know first comes the evidence then comes the complaint, and then comes the restitution, I would stand quietly look her straight in the eye and smile lovingly at her. She would always start laughing and at that point the honesty would be accompanied by respect. I really did love her for that.

I guess here is where I’ll have to be honest myself with the reader. You can put the Kleenex away now, there is absolutely nothing in this article about sex. Sorry, I lied.

Not a feminist, not a sexist

A Voice For Men Videos · 21 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Women encouraged to cheat by research

A Voice For Men Videos · 21 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Is feminism a hate movement?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 22 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

To remove man-hating from feminism would be to extract the DNA nucleus from a living cell, the fuel rod from a reactor, the teeth from a rottweiler. I would assert that man-hating is feminism's moral center of gravity, and that without man-hating or at least some degree of disaffection toward males, feminism could not logically continue to exist—it would flounder without purpose, and disintegrate.

If you give the matter a little thought (and I have given it a LOT), you will see that no other theory so elegantly accounts for the observable facts of the case.

Let's start with some basics. Would anybody dispute that feminism is a socio-political movement on behalf of women? Would anybody dispute that feminism proffers a particular analysis of man-woman relations? Would anybody dispute that feminist analysis holds women to be globally disadvantaged, by some objective and quantifiable standard of measurement, in comparison with men? Finally, would anybody dispute that feminist analysis concludes an element of male authorship in the comparative disadvantagement of women?

Yes, feminism is a women's advocacy movement which identifies men as the wellspring of certain difficulties said to afflict women. This would both summarize and make reply to the verbose paragraph above.

And given that men are said to be the wellspring of women's difficulties, are we to believe that no opinion about men as men ever infiltrates feminist thinking on any level? Does any self-admitted feminist, having once identified "men" as the source of women's troubles, go serenely about her business harboring no strictly personal opinion about "men"? I'd call it a considerable stretch, to believe any such thing.

Admittedly, I fashion my argument upon probabilities. But they are compelling probabilities. I seriously doubt that any better can be offered.

I'll have no truck with the "I blame patriarchy" cop-out. This is simply a way of postponing the issue by obfuscating it, since the phrase is so fuzzy it is useless for normal purposes – although useful indeed for underhanded purposes! But patriarchy is plainly understood as a uniquely male institution; men created it and men keep it rolling, or so the story goes. So it is mighty difficult to understand how a person could "blame" patriarchy without "blaming" men in the very same swoop.

Let us enquire further into probabilities. Feminism identifies "men" as the source of women's difficulties. So ask yourself, what class of women might be drawn to such a social movement in disproportionate numbers? Would such a movement attract women who get along well with men and enjoy their company? All right, possibly a few. Just possibly. But would such women compose the bulk of the membership? Where do you suppose the probability lies in such a case? Would such a movement attract women who do not personally see "men" as a source of difficulty in their lives? Is this probable? Is this plausible? Is this credible? Does this FIT?

Hate is a very strong word, and it signifies a very strong thing. It is hard to imagine just how powerful hate can be. Do you think you can imagine it? Well, the chances are that you are nowhere near, and have no idea. It can get even worse, far worse, than you can imagine!

Yes, it is all on a spectrum. It is all on a continuum. "Hate" can be bad, and it can always get badder! Even to the point where the hater implodes into a black hole, and pops clean out of the moral universe, and sucks as much as possible along for the ride.

All right, maybe the word hate is not the wine for all occasions. I like the word disaffection. It is more inclusive than hate because it embraces all shades of disliking without privileging the extreme. Now, a social movement such as feminism needn't hope to exclude the element of disaffection. I have explained the reason for this already, but now we must proceed to the next stage of examination.

If the disaffection spectrum begins with mild disenchantment and progresses by shades clear up to unmitigated loathing, and if feminism incorporates at least SOME of this spectrum, then we should pause to wonder exactly how much of the spectrum is thus incorporated, and precisely how far it reaches in the direction of uncompounded malevolence. How high on the hate scale does feminism's emotional aura actually extend? Where does it stop?

Again, consider the likelihoods. If the feminist disaffection spectrum reached no higher than a mild and possibly sporadic disenchantment—an occasional mood, as it were—then feminism would very plainly lack the sustaining force to be a viable women's advocacy movement. There is simply no way it could gather the necessary motivation and momentum. There would be neither snow for a snowball, nor any appreciable hill to roll it down for the accretion of mass and accumulation of velocity. In a word, feminism would be a non-starter.

A thing like feminism requires a mighty fund of passion both to launch itself and to keep itself running. Tepid feeling will not suffice—it needs to be robust and vehement, and it needs to gain validation through a political analysis that will both justify the original feeling, and contribute to the growth of that feeling by the use of a self-fulfilling feedback loop.

The world has always contained a certain number of people—sociopathic or what-have-you—who for various reasons don't like the opposite sex. When a thing like feminism appears, proffering a political analysis of sexual relations casting men in the role of miscreants, it is easy to foretell the response man-hating women will make to this. Clearly there will be some exceptions, but I feel confident most such women will be on it like bees on a honeycomb, or flies upon feces if you will. There's nothing quite like finding an analysis to uphold your attitude. And the documentary record indeed bears out that early second-wave feminists in the radical 1960s were a vehement, passionate lot. They were not wishy-washy. They were not tepid. They were not mildly disenchanted with men.

They were by no stretch of the imagination living on the low end of the disaffection spectrum. More significantly, they were not merely attracted to something which somebody else had created. No, they were present at the very inception; they themselves were the creators and early architects of the movement. Without them, or people like them, the "movement" would never have started moving in the first place!

Nor would the movement be moving still today, if people like them were not down in the engine room stoking the boiler, or up in the pilot house turning the wheel and watching the binnacle. They are the dynamo, and if we should replace them with a crew that was just a shade less disaffected, the new dynamo would be a shade less dynamic, as would the entire movement. It would be just a shade less inclined to bulldoze over obstacles, a shade more inclined to call it a day earlier in the day, and a shade more inclined to lower the bar of compromise overall.

Dial this down shade by shade and watch the movement grow more and more anemic. Eventually, "feminism" would be wavering in its convictions, sleeping late, and frittering away its dwindling energy on matters increasingly peripheral and unfocussed. In other words, feminism would become a non-entity and a non-movement.

So, we have shown that feminism offers an ideological interpretation of female disadvantages in life. We have alluded to the feminist belief that female disadvantage originates from a male-driven power conspiracy, and asserted that such a belief is not feasible to uphold absent a pejorative evaluation of men both individually and as a group. From this we have concluded that some varying degree of personal disaffection toward men cannot be absent from the minds of most feminists, and therefore cannot be absent from the movement as a whole. Finally, we have made the case that feminism's viability as an advocacy movement is directly indexed to the degree of disaffection toward men found among the movement's membership, with greater viability correlated to greater disaffection.

Or as stated early in this article: man-hating is feminism's moral center of gravity; without man-hating or at least some degree of disaffection with males, feminism could not logically continue to exist.

Milder forms of feminism do indeed exist. And so do milder feminists. But they are not the vanguard. They are not the cutting edge. They are not the powerhouse. However, they work diligently to secure advantages for women like scavengers in the aftermath of the main assault, once the enemy has been routed. They are the petty clerks, the bureaucrats, the carpetbaggers, who move into the occupied territory and secure the administration of it. It is part of their job to seem unthreatening, which is easy when somebody else does the dirty work. Their distinguishing feature is that of taking for granted what has been ideologically instilled into the general culture, and taking their ease against the moral support cushion this affords them. Left entirely to themselves, they would have neither the ambition to initiate a political movement, nor the drive to keep it operating in a political capacity. Yet they have a moral investiture in feminism's world-view, which proposes male guilt as an explanatory model, and by this investiture they plant themselves within feminism's web of misandric operations.

It is easy to see that if man-hating disappeared from the world, feminism would neither serve any purpose nor have any means to continue operating. But feminism is still operating, and if you are male you are not amiss to suspect that feminism means to harm you. So under the circumstances, you don't owe feminism any favors. Nor do you owe women any favors under the moral banner of feminism!

Yes, I call feminism a hate movement. Whosoever desires, may undertake to convince me that feminism is a love movement.

To the women that aren't like that

Tom Givens · 22 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Although the subject of women in the MRM is not currently a hot button issue, I wanted to write a small missive to them from a nearly worn out old hand. In part, what I want to do is thank you from the bottom of my heart. I am well aware that for some of you, the road has been as long as mine (*cough*typhon*cough*) and something like this has been a long time coming. So along with my thanks comes an apology for its tardiness.

It is a comfort to know that, indeed not ALL women are 'like that' and even better some of you stand up and say something, and dammit they are quite often good something's to say.

And in no small measure it is precisely because you are not men, your unique perspective (as regards men's issues, being fully aware of them) on men being 'outside' observation. This is most definitely not to disregard or diminish in any way your viewpoints, but rather a recognition of the value of those outside viewpoints in realizing what is going on. As an example, it never occurred to me the level to which feminism infantilized women, until I read an article criticizing same.

So allow me to attempt to return the favor.

Going very far back, in the Dark Age of the MRM there was an influx of women asking what women are supposed to do. Essentially, these women asked for a belief system, a label they could attach themselves to, that would embody their belief in equality without demonizing men.

Some of these women stuck around and proudly call themselves MRAs. More of them stuck around but balked at calling themselves MRAs. And a lot of newcomer women tend to see a lot of unmasked anger, and get scared off. Which of course leads to calls for moderation, which isn't going to happen…

This cycle has endlessly repeated for decades, seemingly every week on r/mensrights.

You can see the dilemma.

Then I noticed a new subreddit called 'lady MRAs'. It's a small, but growing group that I wish every success for. And when I look at the writings and videos of the higher profile female MRAs there's one thing that strikes me as a common denominator. These women ARE what feminism pretends to be.

There is a growing body of work from these women – self aware and empathetic work that views men as partners, not competitors – that deserves to be recognized for what it is…

A replacement ideology for feminism.

Well, ok, not so much an ideology as a label to attach to basically acting like an adult, and 'owning your shit'. But you get my meaning. What you are doing is piggybacking on the MRM to formulate a new understanding for women. An answer to "what do you want me to be?" For the record…piggyback away!

I would view it as a personal favor for all men if you would consider a humble request though…

When the MRM was a few hundred guys grumbling away on discussion boards, we never got around to finding a catchy name. This means we have to describe ourselves with an acronym, with which most people are unfamiliar. In hindsight, I think that was a mistake on our part. So, could you guys think up a cool name for yourselves? Because here's the kicker…

You are forming the basis of a future belief system. You are laying the foundation for increased harmony between the sexes. You are the bridge between men and women. And what you write now may indeed show up in the textbooks of the future.

If you ask me that responsibility couldn't be in better hands.

You Are Wrong Dr. Hooven

Theodore Matamorez · 23 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Carole Hooven I saw your interview on Chris Williamson's YouTube channel and I don't think you understand male sexuality at all. In fact you are not merely wrong about it, you are Fractally Wrong about it. You are wrong in multiple ways on multiple levels of analysis nested inside each other. But you have claimed (at least ostensibly) the be concerned about males, so let me try and set you straight.

I've not spent a lot of time talking with other men about their own experiences of sexual desire so I'll be relying just upon my own, and while a sample size of one might not seem like much according to normal scientific standards I would like to point out that it beats the hell out of your decision to operate upon your own dream about "being a man" – a sample size of zero actual male experiences. I will not of course be able to give a complete or adequate explanation here, as there's far to much complexity and nuance involved but I hope to be able to correct a significant portion of your errors.

I'd like to start by making a distinction between frequency, intensity and kind, all of which you are wrong about and each of which deserves attention in it's own right – although I think I'll have to talk about frequency and intensity together.

Intensity varies quite a bit; at its most intense sex registers as a need rather than a desire (good thing I don't just blindly follow my heart). You described it as feeling like starving, that's not a bad analogy but my own default would be to compare it to being trapped underwater and desperately needing a breath of air. However that's describing the more extreme end of intensity, and generally I'll only get that way if I try to abstain from masturbating for several days.

Most of the time desire for sex is a lot more like noticing the color of objects in a room; the colors in a room are always available for me to direct my attention to whenever I please but I don't generally spend a lot, much less most, of my attention on them. If I'm eating a sandwich I usually don't spare a thought to what color the table or even the plate might be, unless something specifically draws my attention to that question. Most of the time my desire for sex is like that as well, if a woman asks me to pay attention to her body (by wearing a low-cut top to display her breasts for example) I will notice her as a potential object of desire, or if a particularly beautiful woman is in my field of vision I'll notice her beauty as well. But even availability of sexual desire is not constant because there are plenty of times when I'm simply not interested at the moment, even if I see a very appealing or available female.

But lets move onto the topic of Kind: what is it that I'm wanting when I want sex? or an interaction of a sex-adjacent nature? After all, this is the point on which your error reaches fractal levels.

Your first level of error is in thinking that desire for one thing (or aspect of a thing) either excludes or precludes desire for other things (or aspects of that thing). Not only is this incorrect but its often the opposite of reality.

As a trivial example I'll take saltine crackers, pepperoni, and cheddar cheese. One of my favorite snacks is the combination thereof. I'll place a small piece of cheddar cheese and one of pepperoni on top of a saltine cracker and eat the set in a bit or two, and I tend to eat a lot of these in one sitting and have the unfortunate tendency to keep going until I run out of one ingredient or another. I'm also perfectly capable of enjoying or wanting any one of these ingredients on its own but not nearly as much, if I'm in the mood for a snack, or just plain hungry, and see some pepperoni in the refrigerator I recognize it as edible and enjoyable in its own right and I may go ahead and eat the pepperoni all on its own. However much more often my recognition of the pepperoni as desirable will entice me to go find some cheddar and saltines to go with it, far from discouraging me from noticing other foods my desire for pepperoni actually motivates me to seek out its complements.

Likewise my desire for a woman's body does not exist in opposition to desire to interact with her on an emotional or intellectual level, but in complement to those things. Her feelings and thoughts are not some obstacle I need to get past in order to access her body but things I want to incorporate into a sexual encounter. Sure I might be able to settle for just copulating with an attractive woman without much if any emotional or intellectual investment but I would be disappointed with that. Unlike eating pepperoni alone I'm not entirely sure if I could even find satisfaction in it at all. Sure my attraction to a woman often starts on the physical level, I'll start by noticing or fantasizing about her breasts, or ears, or collarbones, or thighs but that does not act as a barrier or a deterrent to desiring an emotional or intellectual connection or interaction. Rather, that physical desire leads me on to consider and desire an exchange and expression of affection, care and thought between us. While distinct from one another physical, emotional, and intellectual desire for a woman are not truly separate.

So much for your first level of error in conceptualizing male sexual desire, and onto the next.

You have attempted to juxtapose the physical with "a whole human person" (whatever in the world you might mean by that), but in reality the physical is the emotional. All communication is a process of mediation between the subjective and interior experiences of individuals though some exterior and objective process. Otherwise the means could not be shared between them and no communication could occur.

Out of all the means by which we communicate touch is the most fundamental and the most deeply meaningful, so much so that it transcends not only cultures and languages but even species. As two examples we hug and hold one another to show care and give comfort, we high-five to show our happiness in someone else's success, excitement or benefit (hugs of a more energetic kind sometimes manifest here as well). And between species, dogs and cats both like to be pet and scratched (or at least many individual ones do) beyond merely feeling good – they know its how we show them affection and they want that affection. Cats rub against your legs to show that they like you, many dogs will jump up on their hind legs and put their front paws on your body in order to greet you. And both will want to cuddle with us when we are well, and will try to come snuggle to make us feel better when we are sick. Handling one another's bodies is the most fundamental and the deepest means by which we communicate emotion to one another, so deep and fundamental in fact that even sub-human species like cats and dogs understand it (and us when we use it).

But you don't understand this Dr. Hooven, in fact far from understanding it you oppose a desire to interact through touch to a desire to interact with "a whole human person" which you are used to being attracted too. So I'm wondering what is this "whole human person" that your referring to. It's not the body that you juxtapose it to, it can't involve affection, care or any other emotion as you have thrown them out along with the means by which we best express them. So what is it? The facebook memes someone reposts? Idle chit-chat over coffee perhaps? I'm rather curious to know what you think "a whole human person" is.

Julia Fox tells us what she thinks of men

A Voice For Men Videos · 24 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Warbirds And Warhawks or Boomers And Bombers

Doug Mortimer · 25 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Disasters happen every day. The higher the body count, the more attention one pays. Six bodies is not a big deal, relatively speaking. That's just your basic school shooting or the weekly clash of Saturday night fever and Saturday night specials in Chicago. But when it happens in your neighborhood, you sit up and pay attention.

I live near the Dallas Executive Airport. Seeing or hearing planes in the air over my neighborhood is an everyday occurrence. On the morning of Saturday, November 12, I heard what sounded like a noisy old prop plane flying overhead. I remembered the Wings Over Dallas air show was taking place that weekend. The show is put on by the Commemorative Air Force, a non-profit organization that showcases World War II era airplanes in action. It is a rare opportunity to experience them as something more than just museum pieces.

Imagine my shock later that day when I clicked on an internet news site and discovered that the lead story was about two warbirds, as old military aircraft are called, that had collided in mid-air at the air show.

I have driven up and down US Highway 67 at the south end of the airport more times than I could estimate. In days of old, when a blimp was the vehicle of choice for capturing aerial shots over stadiums, I often saw one anchored at the airport before some nationally televised sports event taking place in North Texas. Now the highway was closed due to post-crash debris.

The collision between the two planes, a Boeing B-17 (popularly known as a flying fortress) and a Bell P-62 Kingcobra, was recorded on video from a variety of angles by spectators on the ground. Several were posted on the internet. They were difficult to watch even before the identity of the victims was verified. Here today, gone tomorrow is humbling enough; here one second, gone the next is particularly sobering.

The cause of the crash remains under investigation, but it was described as follows:

> The P-63 overtook the B-17 on a descending trajectory during low-level maneuvers and impacted the aircraft from the port side, at a point just above and aft of the B-17's wings. The tail section of Texas Raiders [as the B-17 was nicknamed] was severed from the rest of the aircraft due to the collision and both aircraft were destroyed in the resulting impact with the ground.

Now we have the victims' names (Terry Barker, Craig Hutain, Kevin Michels, Dan Ragan, Leonard Root, and Curt Rowe) and faces. It is no surprise that all six victims (five on the B-17, one on the P-62) were men of the Caucasian persuasion. In one fell swoop – literally – they joined the ranks of dead white males, and in some quarters, that would be cause for jubilation.

It is surprising that 87-year-old Dan Ragan had been a crew member on board a B-17 during the Korean War. The other victims, by all appearances, are baby boomers. Boomers, of course, are much maligned today by the generations that came after. Yet another reason for jubilation in some quarters.

Boomers, of course, did not fight in World War II, but they certainly heard about it from their fathers. America's factories, the much-vaunted Arsenal of Democracy, had churned out thousands of full-fledged warbirds. Long after jets had replaced propeller-driven planes, the fighters and bombers the Boomers saw portrayed in war movies and on TV shows still appealed to their imagination. If you were a boy growing up in the postwar period, the B-17 was especially cool, for lack of a better word.

Building and defending a fort in your backyard was literally child's play in those days. Today a social worker or child psychologist would probably consider it incipient toxic masculinity. But when Boeing designed a fort that could fly, they inadvertently created a superb vehicle for youthful fantasies.

Today I suspect the whiz-bang effect of the B-17 has been muted. The flying fortress can't compete with the supersonic aircraft of today, not to mention the interstellar airships featured in science fiction movies and video games.

Nevertheless, I am sure some boys were present to witness the warbirds collision on November 12. At a time when young people are traumatized by pronoun wrongspeak, seeing an ethnic slur in print, or a cutting remark on social media, it is worth remembering there are still some legitimate traumatic experiences to be had. The sight of an American aircraft crashing and burning was a common enough sight during World War II, but not on American soil in front of American youth. Air shows are intended to be educational, and the mid-air collision in Dallas was certainly a learning experience for all present.

To put the deaths of the five men aboard the B-17 in perspective, we have to contrast their fate with that of all the young men who fell from the sky during World War II. 12,731 B-17s were manufactured during the war. Of course, the reason so many were made was because the damn things got shot down. 4,750 – better than one in three – did not return from their missions. If anyone in the air or on the ground was traumatized by the sight of a B-17 breaking up in midair or slamming into the ground, there were no therapists available to alleviate their PTSD.

And let's not forget the people on the ground who were likely traumatized by the bombardments. B-17's dropped 640,000 tons of bombs on Europe during World War II. Of course, World War II was fought by the "Greatest Generation" and we were killing Nazis and kindred fascists, so it was all good. Hard to believe, but just two decades before, Colonel Billy Mitchell had received nothing but pushback from US Army brass when he tried to persuade them that air power was the future of warfare.

As I type these words, we have warhawks in the government itching to embroil the US in the Ukraine conflict. So instead of prop-driven planes shot down by ack-ack guns, we could have jets shot down by missiles. Of course, by the time this article is posted, Ukraine may be on the back burner and some other trouble spot may be ripe for American intervention. I'm sure the State Department will keep us posted.

Today's weapons of war make the B-17 look quaint, which is part of their appeal. For example, bomber crews were permitted to decorate their planes with nosecone art. One of the most popular themes was a scantily clad young woman in a provocative pose. I'm going to go out on a limb and predict that you will never see any nosecone cheesecake at an air show these days. Mrs. Grundy gave it a pass during World War II. Since then she has had second thoughts about the objectification of women.

Of course, today it would be possible to have an air show of non-military antique aircraft. But who would show up to see a DC-7? Or a TWA Constellation? Or a Pan Am Clipper? I'm sure some die-hard aviation buffs would show up, but the general public would likely stay away without the bombers and the fighters. Warbirds defeat doves every time.

Is it not odd that we place wreaths on the graves of men killed in wars while also staging reenactments of said wars? Both acts certify the disposability of men. Come to think of it, the DFW National Cemetery is just a few miles from the Executive Airport. Some of the crash victims were veterans, so maybe one or more of them will end up there. Such a deal! Risk your life for your country and we'll plant you for free – and put little American flags on your graves in perpetuity. During the Vietnam War, a popular bumper stickers read, "War is good business. Invest your son." Not that it had any effect on business as usual.

To be sure, during World War II business was booming for Lockheed, Boeing, Grumman, Curtiss, Northrop, McDonnell, Douglas, Vought, Bell, and other airplane manufacturers. Of course, the demand for more warbirds meant round-the-clock shifts on the factory floor; as more planes fell out of the air, more had to be built. Rosie the Riveter took home all the overtime pay she could handle; the men who flew the planes she worked on were paid much less money for much more dangerous work. In truth, the home "front" in World War II was waaaaaaaay behind the lines and waaaaaaaay out of harm's way. Call it gynocentrism by default.

A popular theory is that World War II, not Franklin Roosevelt's various government programs, pulled the United States out of the Depression. Unlike the years following World War I, there was scant demobilization after World War II, and we segued into the Cold War. Military spending continued apace, even though we haven't had any declarations of war since June 4, 1942, when we put Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania in our national crosshairs.

Long after 1945, Hollywood continued to produce movies about World War II. All the hardware used to fight the war was still entrenched in the public consciousness. Personally, I preferred bazookas, flamethrowers, and hand grenades, which were employed not only against the Krauts and the Japs but also against giant insects and space aliens in 50's science fiction movies. They weren't as glamorous as airplanes but they were more – pardon the expression – down to earth.

When a young baby boomer was fantasizing about flying in a B-17, however, nobody told him of the risks involved. Sure, being a tail gunner would be fun…until the guys on the other side start shooting back. No one was shooting at the men aboard the B-17 in Dallas on November 12, yet now the fence on the southern border of the Executive Airport is the site of numerous homemade memorials in their honor.

The gee-whiz high-tech appeal to American youth has become more sophisticated, as have the warplanes. To date, Top Gun: Maverick has grossed roughly $1.5 billion worldwide and everyone's OK with that. Oh, feminists may raise hell if you classify military-themed toys as boys' toys, but that won't stop the designers from coming up with more cool stuff that just happen to appeal to boys more than girls. And if some girls want to climb on the bandwagon, so much the better. Female empowerment uber alles! It's a key element of "our democracy." "We can do it!"

Taking the red pill vis-à-vis relations with women is a popular topic on this web site. Perhaps it is time to double the dosage to counteract the seductive blandishments of the military. Actually, the military's mandatory vaccines and progressive policies have done a pretty good job of neutralizing the gee-whiz, whiz-bang come-ons. Recruitment has fallen roughly 25% short of the 2022 goals.

The bad news is that Congress can re-institute the draft any time they want to, and if they think that's what it will take to make the world safe for globohomo, then one day it will come to that.

Offering a film like Top Gun: Maverick to America's youth is something like a pusher giving a free sample to a teenager to get him hooked. There's no doubt that thrill-seeking has always been a characteristic of young males. But there are other ways of scratching that itch – extreme sports, rock climbing, and rollercoasters come to mind. No need to succumb to the military-industrial complex's blandishments.

In the meantime, there are still plenty of graphic video games to prod one's nascent killing instincts. Many pundits across the political spectrum blame video games for corrupting the youth of America and preventing them from becoming disposable – I mean productive – citizens. Personally, I don't think the video game "menace" is such a big deal. Like foreign policy, it's all make-believe.

The six men who died on November 12 were also indulging in a bit of make-believe. Unlike gamers, they discovered how suddenly the real world can intrude into one's fantasies.

“Men SHOULD Be Frightened!” – Ava Santina

A Voice For Men Videos · 26 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The basic mission: be an iconoclast

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 27 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is radically open to question. Never forget that.

That much being said, let's get one thing straight: Feminism is not mandatory. You have zero obligation to think like a feminist, talk like a feminist, act like a feminist, live like a feminist, or support feminism in any way.

Feminism is just one of many ideological belief systems operating on planet Earth. It was contrived by human agency and its license to exist may be revoked by human agency at any time. (Wink, wink!) Feminism is not a privileged snowflake (although feminists want you to think it is). It carries no special mandate or divine right. There is nothing "woo-woo" about feminism, and no genuflection is owed to it.

We should add that feminism is not a race, or more to the point not a biological birth group. That's right, nobody is born a feminist. Feminism is an elective state of being; you must choose it. This means that you are free to reject it, or free to kick it out of your brain again if you unfortunately made an earlier choice to accept it.

Not only are feminists not a race, they are not an ethnic group. They seem to think they are, but that is because they are mimicking the behavior of people who claim protected status against so-called "hate speech". The feminists want a slab of that yummy pie too, if possible. When you say stiff things about feminism, they would like very much to swing the apparatus of law against you. (Name-calling and character assassination are not enough, it seems. They want to leverage the official power of state violence, under color of legality.)

Above all, feminism is not a sex. There are two biological sexes, male and female. However, there is no feminist sex. I repeat: there is no feminist sex. That may be perfectly self-evident to some of us, but a lot of people reject this plain bedrock truth like a vending machine spitting a dollar bill back at you.

The trouble is, that feminism is politically and institutionally hegemonic. It is a ruling force in human affairs, and that is simply a fact of life. This happened because certain humans worked hard to make it happen, while certain others stood by and lifted no finger to stop them. In consequence, feminism got deeply entrenched.

The crux of the difficulty is that feminism holds the power of a fetish, or sacred idol, in the public square. Some have even called feminism an unofficial state religion. Many people hate this so-called sacred object and wish to break its power, yet they fear to speak a word against it because they dread the social consequences that might follow. Furthermore, they aren't sure where to get started because, frankly, the terms of the problem are not entirely clear to them.

If we wish to overthrow the power of the feminist idol and undo its stranglehold upon the public mind, we must visibly and dramatically challenge it, until non-feminist women and men feel emboldened to join in the fun.

Imagine, if you will, a dauntless iconclast who walks up to that idol with a sledgehammer, in full view of the world, and shatters the head into rubble with a defiant flourish and a maniacal laugh.

Clearly this would send a message. It would spread some shock waves, would it not? It would trigger a collective gasp, am I right?

Many, standing in the public square, would be emboldened to join in the fun. They would look each other in the eye and catch the glint of revolution. It would be instantly clear to them that they were not alone, that they had nothing to fear but fear itself.

The core principle is this: that when you publicly defy or desecrate a sacred object, you break the spell. You dismantle the mojo. You turn that sacred thing into a common thing once more, prone to the same treatment as any other common thing — the callous handling, the common touch, and so on.

I shall await somebody bold enough to swing a very public metaphorical hammer against the feminist idol. I expect that person will be a celebrity of some kind, ideally a woman, who stands up and thunders: "I've had enough and I will take no more! To HELL with feminism, and damn the torpedoes! Come and get me, feminists!"

Naturally, it helps to be a celebrity rather than an obscure nobody. An obscure nobody who wants to make his message heard, must capture the limelight by a signal-boosting strategem or "setup" — in common vernacular, a publicity stunt. But a celebrity can grab the limelight any time. When a celebrity talks, the world listens, and the message travels.

So if you're a celebrity with the moxie of Martin Luther, and if you want to become a bigger celebrity, then nail your parchment to the door! Okay? Or if you know a celebrity, bring this talk to their attention and maybe it will inspire them along the lines we are suggesting.

There are less flamboyant but still valuable ways to assail the feminist idol and compromise its power. These are being carried out already by people in many places — the war of attrition, the innumerable chisel strokes. It's all good, it's all taking a toll, and it's all preparing the ground for those larger non-feminist breakouts that will occur in the fullness of time.

What is the bottom line here? What is the takeaway? It is that feminism must be challenged. Called out. Stood up to. Stared down. Made accessible to corrective forces.

There are many ways to make this happen. By far the most effective is to stand up and say, "I am not a feminist, and there is nothing you can do about that."

This brings the feminist dialectic to a standstill, because it introduces an alien willpower into feminism's self-contained moral universe. Seriously, what can they do about it? Feminism will have been fed something indigestible which it cannot ultimately ignore. That something is called "non-feminist alterity". The implications are existential and primordial.

Above all idol-breaking.

In a word: iconoclastic.

"I am not a feminist, and there is nothing you can do about that."

This deceptively simple statement reclines at the heart of the methodology we are preaching. The rest is details, and among these is the fact that feminism is on trial because all feminist claims and theories are open to question.

From the ground up, every imaginable thing about feminism is subject to a universal critique and an intellectual audit. You might say that we are calling feminism into the office for a little talk.

In closing, I repeat my call to anti-feminist celebrities: step out of the closet and swing a hammer at the feminist idol! Be bold. Be brave. Be defiant. Be a cheeky bastard and stand your ground. You have supporters everywhere.

If you are not a celebrity, do what you can to see that celebrities read this. Thank you.

The Goal Post Episode 08

A Voice For Men Videos · 28 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Goal Post Episode 09

A Voice For Men Videos · 28 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

How To Argue Against Male Disposability (and How Not To)

Vernon Meigs · 29 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

It is time we set our priorities straight as we forge on with the daunting task of combating male disposability. I say this in light of the fact that too often, there are those in the men's issues sphere that seem to have a difficult time letting go of male disposability. By this, I mean that some keep falling back to the disposable traditional male roles as prescribed masculine values. Here is something to consider for those who are wondering who are the ones clinging on to male sacrifice even as they seem to speak against it.

If you allege to speak out against male disposability, and fight back against how sacrificially men are treated, then the worst mistake you can make is to couple it with the following sentiment: "Men have evolved and are hardwired to sacrifice themselves".

The entire point of being against male disposability is to counter and expose the biogynocentric narrative that says "According to science, men are rightly made to self-destruct for the service of women/society". However, the argument from sacrificial hardwiring works as a direct appeal to said biogynocentric reduction of male being. One cannot fight male disposability unless they stop treating it like it is, or was, a virtue. It should be regarded as misandric to even contemplate that the expense of a man leads to anything wonderful.

The attempt to argue on men's behalf by invoking the fact that they have sacrificed, in other words consigned their life to others' ends, begs the question of who it is supposed to appeal to. Including this appeal in an attempt to counteract male disposability is a contradictory act.

If you are complaining about the fact that male disposability is not thanked, then there is no sense in purporting to be against male disposability. You just want women to appreciate it again…and for male disposability to continue as it's been. Think about who you're trying to convince to be thankful about male disposability – what kind of person would that be?

Be it the self-proclaimed traditionalist woman that "wants men to be men again" and do sacrificial things, or the feminist that not only has stopped appreciating men for their disposability but are at the same time thankful of their disposal, the woman you are appealing to intends to use and discard men. By design or by accident, the intent to see an end to male disposability is nowhere to be seen.

The above can also be regarded as the argument from history. At least, history as they've conditioned themselves to see it. The narrative men and women alike have beaten into their minds is that historically, male sacrifice has built civilization. What they have failed to consider is that a society or culture that requires and thrives on male disposal (or disposal of anyone in it), is the opposite of a proper understanding of civilization. What builds civilization? The absence of disposal of its subjects.

The sacrifice of men as a societal function is a symptom of a tyrannical society designed to hold up one ruler, one group, or a set of groups; all permutations which can be said to feed off of the expendable Others. However, a free society is by definition built and maintained by free agents trading with one another. No trade, at least none that's free, involves one party or the other in an expendable position. The losses of men did not built civilization and what we may consider the best aspects of our society; what did build and maintain it was the men's ingenuity, resource, cheerful pursuit of goals, and the rewards of it.

In addition to the alleged argument from history, there is the alleged argument from science or biology. In addition to the argument that says "It's been done this way", there is its close cousin: the argument that says "We simply cannot help it – it's in our genes".

The biogynocentric argument from evolutionary design is the appeal to male helplessness. Practically ignoring every indication that men have been browbeaten and conditioned by gynocentric dictums and volatile standards like Romantic Love, the ilk of evolutionary psychologists take the current aberrant manifestation of the relationship between men and women, pre- or post-feminist, and weave a narrative that men and women have evolved to be this way. To the delight of men who would have considered themselves lost in search of a justification for their male existence, the biogynocentric argument offers men a reason for existing: selfless service to womankind and society. And, goodness knows it's to the absolute delight of women.

It is the appeal to male helplessness because it ignores free will, the fact that mankind has evolved to transcend instinct-based living. Another error biogynocentrists make is the overt emphasis on instinct over volition. The argument for men's liberation must be rooted in the affirmation of free will. Instinct is, for all intents and purposes, a form of mindlessness, at least in terms of comparing it to the active human consciousness and the potential of the human mind.

Imagine taking a position against male disposability only to find yourself saying "It's our instinct to sacrifice ourselves". What you have said, in effect, is that males are too stupid; they can't help but just die on impulse. In order to position yourself against male disposability, you must first recognize that disposal is not only not in the best interests of the man, but he does not have some voice in his head that he is helpless to assert his will over.

Mankind has not evolved to die on command. That is the tragedy of societal conformity, not a biological basis nor a proper basis for an individual. Men are not honeybees. There is no programming to die instinctively. Mankind has evolved to live. Not merely exist or merely survive, but to have the existential awareness to contemplate his own place in the universe, and then to explore it and enjoy its fruits. Yes, death is inevitable, and clearly humankind has had to fight to live, else they were killed. This does not mean that it is our place to be sacrificial.

The very fact that a male has a right to his own existence as both a man and a human individual is precisely why male disposability is improper to say the least. To say the most, it is abject cruelty and treatment of an entire sex as second-class citizens or much worse. It would then also be a form of female supremacy and female-centrism; most of us already know this as gynocentrism.

To then appeal to a misinterpreted past filled with male sacrifice, or the virtue-signalling phony sentiments of evopsychs, is to appeal to the nostalgia of it. One must think long and hard; is this the future and purpose in life as a male that they actually want? Who are these women that would embrace it? Hypergamists? Manipulative women? Self-proclaimed tamers and "civilizers" of men?

Let us be more blunt. If you claim to be against male disposability, stop demanding to be appreciated for being disposable. If disposability is wrong, act like it is wrong. Are you against a sacrificial existence for yourself and other males, or aren't you? Don't bother alleging to be against male disposability if your entire premise is "If you aren't going to appreciate my sacrifice I'm just going to stop." What kind of identity as a male do you profess to have if it's just going to boil down to a means to another's end?

Why claim to be on strike against an institution you are better of not being a part of to begin with? Why limit yourself to the role of protector and provider and worse, say you do it because it's in your genes? This is the same contradictory attitude expressed by those who for some reason or another hold Briffault's Law in high regard. They primarily complain about how women have rigged the game and don't appreciate men's role as it's been in society, but instead of opting out of the gynocentric plantation cesspool, they seem to want to have that disposable, altruistic role with the "appreciation" from the women it supposedly had again. This is what I mean by being unable to let go of male disposability as a defining characteristic of masculinity in their mind.

Neotraditionalism, evopsych dogma, and Briffault's Law aren't the guideposts for men that too many think they are. Anyone that laments the fact that a sacrificial existence is not appreciated is missing the point: a sacrificial existence must be discarded entirely if men's spirit and physical well-being are to be uplifted. The rejection of male disposability and all the dogma surrounding it is a key step to that uplift of man's sense of spirit – which is a precise objective of the upholder of men's well-being.

In closing, let's condense the answers to the question asked in the title.

How to argue against male disposability – By rejecting the notion that the male human being was even designed to be disposed, to women or anyone in society. Appeal to the individual's rights, and the virtues of the physically and spiritually intact man.

How not to argue against male disposability – By appealing to the alleged virtues of male disposal from supposedly historical or scientific contexts, thereby rendering uncertain why male disposability is to be combated to begin with.

I hope you have found value in these words and consider it a worthwhile guide.

What Men Do: Men form a human chain to rescue a stranded dog

A Voice For Men Videos · 30 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Woke US Army faces recruitment nightmare

A Voice For Men Videos · 30 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Tradwife Revisited

Peter Wright · 1 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Having touched briefly on tradwives in the past, I though it was time to pen some matured thoughts on the subject – in particular the thought that there are actually two very different models of the tradwife.

The oldest, best, but apparently least appreciated kind of tradwife is the one who brings value to the table for men looking to pairbond or start a family with a woman – I'll refer to her loosely as Tradwife-1. The other more popular conceptualization of a tradwife amounts to a shallow and performative grifter who spies an easy ride on some poor man's goodwill and labor, whom I'll refer to as Tradwife-2.

Tradwife-1 mirrors a pre Victorian-era model consisting of non-gynocentric forms of traditionalism. It advocates a mixture of separate gender roles mixed in with a significant amount of role-sharing as might have been seen on a traditional farm, homestead or 'cottage industry' of pre-industrialized Britain or United States. This model assumes a commensurate valuing, interpersonal devotion, and labor contribution from both husband and wife.

Tradwife-2 is different, and aligns more with the post Victorian-era model of family. She is promoted by advocates of a traditional gynocentrism which reached its apogee in the 1950's housewife, and her needs, wants and comforts are generally prioritized over those of her husband. In this model, men and women are called to adhere to strict gender roles with husband functioning as symbolic 'head of household' who protects the wife and labors to earn all the money, while she makes babies, apple pies, keeps the house clean.

The model for the tradwife-2 is what many people refer to as the 'two-spheres doctrine' in which men and women are apportioned sovereignty over different realms – he over the political and labor realms, and she over the domestic and social realms. For the red pilled audience, this version of the tradwife sometimes appears as a parasite in an apron while contributing very little to the relationship, especially in the era of electrification and white goods.

Pre Victorian-Era Tradwife

Post Victorian-Era Tradwife

These two tradwives are the traditional alternatives to feminist-inspired relationships. For men who can't see value in older models, however, and who gravitate toward what Warren Farrell calls a "gender transition movement," there's a newer kind of a female companion we will refer to as the modwife.

Modwives

Farrell's proposed gender transition movement, and implied concept of a modwife, refers to greater role-sharing among men and women than has traditionally been the case. Farrell proposes, for example, that women may wish to contribute more labor and more income so that "neither sex is expected to pay more than half the income,"[1] and that men may wish to spend more time with family so that "both sexes raise the children." He states,

> "Taking what had worked for most women traditionally and seeing it as a plot against them led us to see men as "owing" women. This created Stage II entitlement: women being entitled to compensation for past oppression. This prevented us from seeing the need to make a transition from Stage I to Stage II together : the need not for a women's movement or a men's movement, but for a gender transition movement."[1]

He further adds,

> "A gender transition movement will be the longest of all movements because it is not proposing merely to integrate blacks or Latinos into a system that already exists; rather, it is proposing an evolutionary shift in the system itself—an end to "woman-the-protected" and "man-the-protector."[2]

Farrell's proposed transition movement involves stages of a grand historical process, which are simplified as follows:

1. Historically men and women adhered to strict gender roles for the sake of survival.
2. Women chose to "liberate" themselves from their role to gain more freedom.
3. Men have responded to women's "liberation" by proposing they too might be liberated from some traditional gender roles.

4. Ideally this unfolding process can culminate in a gender liberation movement for both sexes.[1]

By this process modwives are born, whom I've referred to elsewhere as women who have embraced multi-option lives over more traditional roles, and who accept or encourage multi-option lives for their male partners. While containing the word 'wife,' the term modwife applies equally to non-married women who follow the principles being outlined here… so there's no need to worry, men; this is not a Petersonian advert for marriage.

'Modwife' was coined as an alternative to the popular trend in tradwives outlined above. Both the tradwife and modwife eschew feminist prescriptions for relationships because they are geared toward female domination of men and not to partnerships based on reciprocal labor, value and devotion. A distaste for feminism, however, is where the similarities between tradwife and modwife end.

Philosophical outlook of the modwife

The unlikelihood that modern women will embrace 'Tradwife' roles of yesteryear with genuine commitment underpins attraction to the modwife option. Thus for best-case scenario, today's multi-option women can invite their men to do same – to embrace multi-option lives. The modwife's modus operandi is based on personal liberty within relationships, extending a freedom of opportunity to her partner such as society has championed for her.

Yet few multi-option women today are willing to extend that multi-option liberty to men, preferring instead to pocket the advantages extended by women's 'liberation' while expecting their boyfriends and husbands to remain in the mismatched role of protector and provider. There are women however, limited in number as they are, who lean toward the model of commensurate liberty and agreed economic contributions for both men and women in relationships — some of them will be recognized among the supporters of the men's rights movement.

That libetarian spirit is usually understood as belonging to the political sphere, but it is accepted by the modwife as a guiding principle in her relationship with men. It emphasizes individual choice, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements, and negotiated economic contributions to the relationship.

Is this a rare stance among women? Absolutely yes, but they may exist for the man who is discerning, patient, and willing to hold fast to his values.

To summarize, the more shallow version of the tradwife is gaining popularity among traditional conservatives who have little appreciation for, nor awareness of the older, pre-Victorian models for same. Alternatively we have the shaky concept of the modwife touched on by Farrell, myself and others which may be a viable alternative but such women are currently as rare as spotting a unicorn in the forest. These templates offer ways of navigating the available relationship territory, and as always the choice to explore them, or abstain completely remains yours.

References:

[1] Warren Farrell, The Myth of Male Power

[2] Warren Farrell, 'Toward A Gender Transition Movement,' in Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men?

Greta Aurora: The Infantilization of Women

A Voice For Men Videos · 2 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Jordan Peterson wimps out over toxic women

A Voice For Men Videos · 2 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Women, Relationships and Victim Mentality

A Voice For Men Videos · 3 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Robert Waldinger: What makes a good life? Lessons from the longest study on happiness

A Voice For Men Videos · 4 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This TED talk is drawn from the Study of Adult Development at Harvard Medical School which is comprised of two longitudinal studies on men, the Grant Study and the Glueck Study.

13 reasons women lie about rape

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 5 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In her memoir, Lena Dunham claims that she was raped by Barry, a flamboyant, well-known campus Republican, but her story does not hold up under scrutiny. Jackie, the woman at the center of the Rolling Stone profile on Greek culture at the University of Virginia, claims to have been gang-raped, but the discrepancies in her account resulted in the magazine backing away from the story and questioning Jackie's credibility. We do not know if either of these women has made false allegations, but false allegations of rape can and do happen. Here are 13 reasons women lie about rape.

1. Women lie about rape to cover up their infidelity.

One night, Nicola Osborne got a bit drunk and ended up in bed with a man and they enjoyed "extensive sexual activity." The episode was entirely consensual and the two swapped phone numbers after they were through. On the way home, it occurred to Osborne that her husband might not think very highly of her "activities" and she became flustered and visibly upset. When passers-by came to her aid, she told them that she had been forcibly abducted and raped by a stranger, sparking a massive police response to find the rapist. A subsequent DNA test led police to the man whom she had slept with and he was arrested and held for 12 hours. Once the truth came out that the encounter has been consensual, Osborne was charged with filing a false report and sentenced to 18 months in prison. Women lie about rape to cover up their infidelity.

2. Women lie about rape to explain why they are looking at porn.

When Elizabeth Coast's mother discovered her looking at porn on the internet, Coast explained that her actions were the result of sexual abuse she had experienced at the hand of a neighbor. Coast testified that when her neighbor was 14, and she was 10, he had sexually molested her. Her testimony was compelling enough to secure the man's conviction. He was sentenced to seven years and served four of those until Coast's guilty conscience became too much to bear and she admitted that she had lied about an innocent man. Coast was sentenced to two months in prison for her lie and must pay the man $90,000 restitution. Women lie about rape to explain why they are looking at porn.

3. Women lie about rape because they are mentally ill.

Rosanne England scratched her face, tore her clothing and concocted a story about a man asking to use her telephone and then violently raping her. She gave police a detailed description that happened to match a 59-year-old father of two teenaged daughters who had no alibi as he had been walking his dog in the woods when the rape allegedly occurred. The man was arrested and held for 28 hours until DNA tests finally cleared him. He continues to face suspicion from his neighbors about his guilt. England gave no justification for the accusation other than she suffers from "mental illness." Women lie about rape because they are mentally ill.

4. Women lie about rape because they feel guilty.

Kelly Harwood had a few drinks and decided that sleeping with her friend's son was a good idea. Upon reflection, she decided that she had betrayed her friend by doing so and reported her friend's son for rape. She told police that she had been raped while sleeping, and her friend's son was subjected to an "intrusive medical examination and interviewed under caution." Two days later, Harwood relented and admitted that she had lied about the rape. She suffers from depressive illness, exacerbated by the amount of alcohol she had consumed. Women lie about rape because they feel guilty.

5. Women lie about rape if the sex is bad.

Lynette Lee arranged to meet a man whom she had contacted through a dating site. They went on a date, which ended with consensual sex in a motel room. Lee then reported the man for forcible rape. He was interviewed by police, who then re-interviewed Lee, who confessed to lying about the rape because "she did not enjoy the sex" and "it was bad." Women lie about rape if the sex is bad.

6. Women lie about rape when they fail school exams.

Rhiannon Brooker knew her party lifestyle was catching up with her when the law student failed her bar exams. She told her exam committee that her performance was affected by "extenuating circumstances" and had her boyfriend charged with multiple counts of rape and assault, including punching her so hard in the stomach that she miscarried. She faked her own injuries to support the charges. The accused spent 36 days in jail before police confirmed that he was at work and had alibis for each of the alleged rapes. Brooker was sentenced to three and a half years for false allegations. Women lie about rape when they fail school exams.

7. Women lie about rape because of psychiatric medication complications.

Katherine Bennett had consensual sex with a national guardsman but then reported to police that he had abducted her from a parking lot, taken her to his house and drugged her and raped her at knifepoint before she was able to escape. The police were able to establish that the story had been fabricated but not before the guardsman lost his job and had his reputation seriously damaged. Bennett's attorney said that Bennett suffers from depression and obsessive-compulsive disorder and "although her condition and complications from medication were not an excuse for the false report, they were contributing factors." Women lie about rape because of psychiatric medication complications.

8. Women lie about rape when they want attention.

Gemma Gregory, desperate for attention from police officers, filed eight false rape charges, accusing seven different men over a period of six years. Former boyfriends were subjected to DNA tests and interviews and huge amounts of police time were wasted so that Gregory could have the attention she craved. After recording hundreds of calls with Gregory, the police arrested and charged her with false allegation offenses. Women lie about rape when they want attention.

9. Women lie about rape to get sympathy.

Linsey Attridge was having some relationship problems with her boyfriend and needed to win some sympathy from him. She trolled Facebook and found a picture of a 26-year-old man and his 14-year-old brother whom she had never met and reported them both for a violent rape. To make her story more credible, she punched herself in the face, ripped her clothing and told police that the two men had broken into her house while her boyfriend was away and subjected her to a brutal attack. Both were arrested and had their lives turned upside down as word of the charges spread throughout the community. Attridge eventually admitted to making the whole thing up and was sentenced to 200 hours of community service. She has never apologized. Her boyfriend dumped her. Women lie about rape to get sympathy.

10. Women lie about rape to make boyfriends jealous.

Hannah Bryon was mad at her boyfriend for breaking up with her. Wanting some attention from him and to make him jealous, she told him that a man whom she had been flirting with attacked her on a bridge, raped her and then threw money at her to get a taxi. The man whom she identified as her rapist was arrested and put through a stressful examination and questioning but was able to provide police with evidence that he had not attacked Bryon. Bryon was given a suspended sentence and 150 hours of community service. Women lie about rape to make boyfriends jealous.

11. Women lie about rape for revenge.

When Cori Lynn Osiecki's boyfriend broke up with her and started "spreading rumors," she decided to exact revenge on him by filing a rape charge. She was taken by ambulance to the hospital, where a rape kit was collected and an investigation was started. Eventually Osiecki admitted that she had lied about the assault because she "wanted to get back at him." Women lie about rape for revenge.

12. Women lie about rape because they are "moody."

Isabella Himmel was at a bar and her friend wasn't paying attention to her, which left her feeling "moody," so she told another friend that she had been gang-raped by a group of male students at the University of Connecticut. That friend believed her story and reported it to police, triggering an action alert to more than 30,000 students and a considerable amount of distress on campus. Surveillance video, however, showed no attack. Himmel then agreed that she might not have been grabbed by the hair and gang-raped by five men, but she might have been kicked or she might have just fallen. Himmel must complete a program that could lead to the dismissal of the false rape report charges against her. Women lie about rape because they are "moody."

13. Women lie about rape when their friends get mad at them.

Biurny Peguero was extremely drunk, out a bar with friends, and impetuously accepted a ride in a van with three men. When she realized where she was, she became frightened and hysterical. The men took her back to the bar, and that's when the trouble started. The friends she had left behind were angry with her and a brawl broke out among the women, who punched and bit one another. When a friend demanded to know if the men had raped Peguero, she said that they had. The bruises she had sustained in the fight with her friends were accepted as evidence of rape, and one man spent four years in jail on the charge. Women lie about rape when their friends get mad at them.

Shockingly, this is not even a complete list of the reasons women lie about rape, but if anything is clear, it is that women do lie.

This post originally appeared at Thought Catalog and is reprinted here with permission.—Eds.

Without the struggles of the past, who are we? This is my journey to understand story — Alison Tieman

A Voice For Men Videos · 6 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Ideology of Hate: Feminism in 1972

Robert St. Estephe · 7 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

It was more than 50 years ago,

Libbers spewed out choice words of hate.

Now their style is but a stream of bile,

When they bark we must salute them: "Heil !"

On September 13, 1972 a public conference (no men allowed) was held by the women's liberation organization named Feminists of New York. The following news report describing its proceedings helps to give proof to a blatant fact that most grown-ups know quite well by now: that feminism is a hate movement."

Yet today disingenuous disclaimers abound in writings distributed by the now immensely powerful gender ideology establishment:

"The old myth that feminism is linked to the hatred of men is one that still permeates much of society, and is an active hindrance in the long-overdue acceptance of feminism as simply the rational belief that men and women are equal, and should be treated as such: feminist and misandrist are not synonymous." [Helen Charman, "The GenderAgenda: why misandry has no place in feminism," Varsity (Cambridge University, UK), Oct. 18, 2012]

We are not fooled by the lie.

The viciously misandric 1972 quotations of Ms. Pat Mainardi which appeared in the daily papers have since become famous, yet in their original context of the convention her words take on a greater weight when it is understood that she was engaged in a calibrated and collaborate effort to alter the focus of the feminist movement from equality to hate. The rhetoric of "equality" survived of course, as a convenient cover for innumerable statistical hoaxes (the "pay gap" fable; the "war against women" fiction; fake rape statistics along with expensive (ie: profitable) "rape culture" propaganda and newly-minted regret-rape and brewsky-rape categories), and the ethos of hatred has, over time, grown. Hatred, we are now led to believe (sometimes characterized through the vogue-word, "rage") is "empowering."

It was only three years following this 1972 convention that a prominent but overly optimistic scholar, Midge Decter, noted that "hatred of men is a feminist doctrine" and predicted its eminent downfall. Decter was dead wrong. There was just too much money to be made, too many careers to launch, by means of the shakedown tactics and shrill demands (which, curious as it might seem, were always promptly met by the oppressor class) of those who claimed a fundamental and permanent victim status.

•?•

FULL TEXT: New York – And now there's a new topic of debate about women's liberation that's bound to make at least one-half of the population a bit uneasy – man-hating.

While more than 200 women cheered several speakers gave their personal views on why hating men was an essential subject related to women's equality. The conference, closed to men, was organized by the Feminists of New York, who had a similar speak-out on rape several years ago.

"We have a moral cause for hating men for they have taken away all our power," said Barbara Mirnoff of the Feminists, by way of introduction. "Men have imposed their minds and bodies on women and our hatred is a natural response, a rational and political hatred developing from centuries of male rule."

The women in the audience, mostly young, dressed in jeans and T-shirts, knitting, taking notes, or holding hands, had paid up to $2 to hear speakers like Robin Morgan, editor of an anthology of feminist writings, "Sisterhood is Powerful."

She read some of her favorite man-hating poems from her new book, "The Monster."

"I want a woman's revolution like a lover. I lust for it. How I wish that my tears were bullets to kill what terrorizes in men."

Janet Bajan, a member of the New York Radical Feminists, drew applause when she said that man hatred was "a protective reaction, a survival mechanism to change the situation in favor of women."

Pat Mainardi, married, the author of “The Politics of Housework,” and the editor of the Feminist Art Journal, said, “Man-hating marks a turning point in the movement. We have been defensive long enough.”

“People often ask me how women can be man-haters,” she added. “And I wonder, how can we be anything else.” The women cheered.

“We sleep with the enemy to find out his secrets and we pass them on to our allies,” she said, but the audience hissed.

“The only way to win liberation is to make men miserable so they will have no peace until women are free. Married women invented man-hating,” she declared.

One member of the Radical Lesbians claimed that the Lesbians were the original man-haters. But Jill Johnston, a Lesbian who writes for the Village Voice weekly newspaper, said that Lesbians were women lovers, not necessarily man haters. “I don’t really want to waste my energy on encountering men and hating them,” she said, though she expressed some admiration for a Lesbian friend who had physically assaulted men on the street.

The conference almost came to a standstill when one speaker announced, “All you Lesbians out there – in 10 years you’ll be married to some man.”

[Jurate Kazickas, “Hatred of Men On Conference Agenda,” syndicated (AP), Sunday News-Journal (Daytona Beach, Ga.), Sep. 24, 1972, p. 21]

•?•

NOTE: [Sandy Banisky, “Feminists are ruining their own cause, Decter believes,” The Sun (Baltimore, Md.), Nov 20, 1975. p. B1]

Why feminism may be right

Ethical · 8 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Rights bloggers are right in saying that feminism has made marriage a losing proposition for today's men. Whether women enter the marriage contract in bad faith, or frivolously break the marriage contract to seek a better deal elsewhere, men are left paying for their free ride. Sometimes men pay for life. On top of that as an extra slap in the face men are often deprived of any meaningful rights to the children they've fathered.

Feminism hasn't just broken marriage. It's made all relationships between the sexes completely dysfunctional. It has unleashed high status alphas, game bloggers, and others to feast at today's sexually liberated commitment-free all-you-can-eat pussy buffet. At the same time it turns sex into a game of Russian roulette for all men. The ones who lose like U.K. footballer Ched Evans will discover the buffet wasn't completely free. All along they've been playing with fire.

Men's risk is that the current legal definition of sexual consent puts all responsibility for the consequences of women's slutty behavior solely on men. At the same time women's consent has become ambiguous. More men who love easy sex are recognizing that the safest way to avoid a life destroying "false rape" charge is to prevent morning after remorse by being subserviently nice to the slut who offered that easy sex up. Instead of letting a disgraced slut wake up naked and alone in the morning as Ched Evans did, alpha men are now obliged to pedestalize her. In the feminist desire to remove all consequences of slutty behavior we as a society are literally criminalizing the scorn and disdain we used to have for these sluts. High status men in particular can no longer get away with banging them so carelessly.

Once done with sex he may be dying to leave or to get rid of her by calling her a cab. Having a good understanding of the law surrounding consent almost forces him to spoon the slutty women affectionately all night, to listen to them patiently and earnestly, to look into their eyes lovingly, and to make sure to call. At least until he's out of the ever widening danger zone of a rape accusation.

By waging this war of false accusation terror feminism has successfully reengineered society to remove any restrictions on women profiting from use of their natural sexual assets. Sluts can now freely exchange sex as currency for personal gratification, to obtain gifts or favors, for coercion, for self-promotion, or even for marriage. Western men are losing or may already have lost any input on the market value of chastity.

One way men have responded is by rejecting the marriage noose in droves. More men are even opting out of dating, finding that investing in a woman rarely makes sense. Having come to terms with it these men are happier than ever to stay at home satisfying themselves with porn "10"s instead of spending money taking an over entitled "6" on a date. The remaining men who go out looking for easy sex brave the odds of being called a "creep" for just saying hello. More aggressive and angry at being "victimized" than ever before, where women used to decline advances politely now they use the word "creep" so carelessly. A man is right to fear the label. To feminists it puts him one step away from having to hire a lawyer.

How could any of this be good? Bizarrely it could be exactly what the planet needs. Every first world economy in the world relies on the assumption of growth into the infinite future for it's very survival. Growth means more consumers buying more cars, watches, and IPods, then paying more taxes and allowing businesses to create more jobs. A world wide and permanent end to growth will be a catastrophic change. We don't yet know how to survive it and we don't even know if we can. But the planet has never had unlimited resources and unlimited space for population growth. That catastrophic change may be an inevitable part of our future. It might even be necessary. At some point world economies may have no choice but to find an equilibrium based on zero growth. Feminism is taking us there.

The traditional marriage was good at producing well adjusted children capable of filling the positions growing economies were able to provide. This marriage contract is unsuitable if we're preparing for a world that can no longer accommodate population growth or economic growth. The feminist marriage contract however will cure population growth by killing any incentive for an increasing number of men to enter the reproductive game at all. It might even help select for positive traits in our populations in that it allows women to mate more selectively with fewer high status men since they have little fear of being left un-provided for regardless of how many women those men already have.

History has shown it's a fundamental principle of all current western democracies that in such democracies entitlements steadily accrue to those who demonstrate "victimhood" rather than those who demonstrate merit. History has also shown men will accept ever greater social burdens without resistance. Given our lack of male resistance and that our very system of government can only do a one way flow of entitlements to women, feminism may be the natural solution to healing the earth. The caveat is that the new feminist economy will replace an assumption of growth with another assumption that also might not be true forever. Feminism will create growing legions of disenfranchised men. To succeed feminism must be right in assuming these men will forever continue to accept their defeat, and that they won't one day rise to tear down the feminist system that's literally imprisoning them.

Who Is a Real MGTOW?

A Voice For Men Videos · 8 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The tsunami

A. Man · 9 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Just after Christmas, 2004, the Sumatra–Andaman earthquake struck off the coast of Indonesia. Of the videos of that day, the one that stills me into quiescence is the one of people walking on an empty beach, marveling at the tranquility of a subsea surface never before seen. They had no idea what was coming.

I have often wondered what that must have been like for them—so few survived. For just moments later, the ocean returned with a ferocious carnage, roaring with a toxic indifference, wiping them from the face of the earth.

Never again will I wonder what that was like. Now I have a minimal idea. For in the early hours of Tuesday (I live in Europe) I waited patiently for the workday to start, Eastern US Time. I simmered with rage, counting down the start of the business day.

Then I called.

The tranquility of the receptionists at Gillette surprised me. I immediately realized they had no idea what was coming. I did not get angry with them. I engaged them as they spoke of nice weather, a lovely commercial and a great start to a new year. I wanted them to enjoy the conversation—for they had no idea that it was not a low cloud, darkening the offshore sky.

Then the ocean rose.

It was astounding to watch how Gillette initially handled it—sublime stupidity. They had convinced themselves that feminism was ethical and masculinity was toxic. They politely disagreed with some of the comments on Facebook, Twitter, and Youtube, with levity.

The ocean rolled over the levy.

Gillette began deleting posts, like people fleeing a tidal wave.

I called back often to Gillette. I heard the timbre of the voice change from indifferent tranquility, to confusion, and finally to fatigue. I did the same to the companies that financed the advertisement and the companies that directed the film. They were oblivious to oblivion.

The ocean grew furious.

As Gillette deleted dislikes, the ocean brought them back, again and again and again.

I read news stories on how the advertisement was a homerun–a homerun! (you can still find this). One article was titled: "Why Gillette's toxic masculinity ad is annoying both sexists and feminists" – think about that title.

The waves kept rolling ashore, sweeping excuses aside and the land was gone.

I read news stories on how the commercial, at least, initiated a debate.

Then came the stories that something was going wrong.

The tsunami did not bow before the matriarchy.

Feminists levied their charges at the posters: Misogynist!" Crybaby! Snowflake! Sexist! The accusations swirled as the surges spiraled into vortices.

Gillette stopped responding.

I will never forget these days.

I learned a few things these past few days.

Feminists will mock masculinity; and will continue to do so, if unchecked. They have legitimized their toxicity—convinced the world they are ethical.

Men have found a greater, shared voice.

Men raged with a fury I have never seen before; and we have wonderful, loving sisters who support us. I became stilled, quiescent, by the voices of women who love men and do not feel we are toxic.

I soon realized that if men hold firm, the feminists flee: they are cowards. To some extent, this week, feminism has expended its worst at us and we survived. It has nothing left but insults: The Empress has no clothes.

But there is more.

I saw the brotherhood of men and masculinity, around the world—white, black, gay, straight, Asian and Caucasian (Australia, India, England, Canada, US)—rising in support of each other. The Gillette commercial encouraged the very thing it wanted: actualizing men. Men will now hold each other to account, but not for the ends that toxic feminism had hoped.

This is not the time to rest on masculinity's magnificent achievements.

The American Psychological Association is not our friend and feels we are bad; we know that now. Rather than truly help boys, their pronouncements choose to emasculate; they ignore the causes of our difficulties, issue aphorisms; and do nothing.

Never allow anyone to utter the phrase "toxic masculinity" without also enumerating the magnificent achievements and sublime sacrifices of masculinity. Never allow anyone to utter the phrase "toxic masculinity" without also discussing "toxic femininity." Never allow anyone to utter the phrase "toxic masculinity" without stating a plan to help boys and men. Boys and men suffer in a matriarchy that ignores our health needs; ignores disparities in criminal sentencing, ignores the education of boys, ignores false rape accusations, ignores the greater degrees of homelessness, suicide, addiction and poverty of men (blaming it on toxic masculinity)—far in excess of how women are affected and lies about gender wage gaps.

Male bodies fill the tombs in Arlington. Our brothers died in advance of this war that is now beginning. Visit the tombs of your brothers in the war cemeteries and ask them for guidance as we wage this war against toxic feminism.

For myself: Gillette will never be mentioned in my home, again.

We are at turning point.

Now I know what that silence was like on that beach on Phuket Island before the ocean disagreed with the land.

Those people—at Gillette, and the feminist media—had no idea what was coming.

There is a Japanese saying to the effect that sometimes one must move with the intensity of a fire, sometimes with the invisibility of the wind and other times, must be motionless like a mountain.

The fire, this time, was the tsunami. It raged. Calm returns. This is the time to move like the wind and wait like a mountain.

Keep posting on Gillette sites: they will be taken down, so post them again. Do it every day.

Contact the company that made the film: Somesuch.co,

Contact the company that organized the advertising: Gray advertising.

Do not stop calling Gillette. By taking the phone lines for this issue, they make no profit on others sales. It takes a minute to call and costs little.

Explain to one man each week why he should not purchase Gillette.

Speak to store managers and ask they drop Gillette products. Do this every time you shop.

If you buy razors and see another man standing there, stop and talk with him.

Contact the NFL and make sure the Gillette commercial is not played during the Superbowl (do this soon).

Every day remind yourself and know this: “Masculinity is beautiful.”

Vote. Yes, vote. Attend political meetings and object when you hear the phrase “war on women,” and speak about the war on boys. Appeal to mothers of sons. We know the empress has no clothes.

Move like the wind.

Ignore the media lies that the response failed. Wait for the sales reports and marketing shares.

Wait like a mountain.

Surely, there are so many men who have gone before and led the way: Paul Elam, Warren Farrell, Angry Harry, Mike Buchanan, Jordan Peterson and many others. My final words, then, are not to discredit the efforts of these previous men by insinuating that the real battle is about to begin (for they waged the opening volleys), but we must still remember the words of General Yamamoto:

“I fear all we have done is to awaken a sleeping giant and fill him with terrible resolve.”

The cover image is under CC-BY 2.0 and came from here.

Not Your Father's Divorce

Doug Mortimer · 10 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

All movies are products of their zeitgeist. Sometimes they transcend the zeitgeist and become classics; other times they are as ephemeral as the times when they were made. And some films fall somewhere in-between. A case in point is Divorce American Style, a 1967 comedy. It is both modern and dated. It portrays postwar affluence at its peak while warning that there is trouble in paradise.

The title is a nod to Divorce Italian Style (1961) and Marriage Italian Style (1964), foreign movies that had done fairly well at the American box office at a time when foreign films were a niche market. Moviegoers would likely get the connection, even if they hadn't seen the Italian films.

Divorce American Style is a showcase of classic 60's hairdos, fashions, gas-guzzling cars, and miscellaneous consumer products. Special shout-out to cigarettes and the days when ashtrays were an essential component of living room décor.

The film is also eye-opening vis-à-vis inflation. Imagine a time when $25,000 was a good salary and if you earned $30-35,000 you were affluent. You could buy your dream house in suburbia for $49,000. A knee operation would set you back $500. Any retiree can vouch for those figures.

As you might suspect from the title, Divorce American Style had implications for the manosphere long before that term was coined. It is a snapshot of the status of married men in 1967 and something of a cautionary tale. At the time the movie was released, second wave feminism had not hatched but it was in the incubator and the shell was just starting to crack.

The film opens with an inspired sequence in which an orchestra conductor sets up his podium on a hill looking down on a SoCal suburb. As he starts conducting, the soundtrack fills up with the sound of squabbling couples and the film cuts from house to house in the neighborhood as the cacophony builds to a crescendo.

After introducing us aurally to the people in the neighborhood, the film focuses on Richard and Barbara Harmon, a thirtysomething couple portrayed by Dick Van Dyke and Debbie Reynolds. The Harmons grew up during the Depression and World War II. They are not Boomers , though their two sons are. (FUN FACT: the older son is played by Tim Matheson 11 years before he played Otter in Animal House.) They come from working class backgrounds and they have far surpassed their parents' standard of living. Upward mobility, thy name is the Harmons. But they have plenty of company. The postwar economic boom is still on a roll.

Richard is the manager at a factory and Debbie is a stay-at-home mom at a time when that term would have been a redundancy. Their home has all the modern amenities and gadgets. There are no clouds on the horizon for the Harmons, but the relationship is waxing stormy. Why? Appropriating a line from Cool Hand Luke, another 1967 movie, "What we have here is failure to communicate." Of course, this is a catch-all excuse for all the ills appertaining to affluent married couples. Men and women from earlier generations were too busy trying to keep their heads above water to worry about communications. A husband and wife not communicating? Who's got time to communicate?

Predictably, the Harmons begin the arduous journey to splitsville. And here is where the movie begins to sound more contemporary. There was no more patriarchy in the divorce courts then than there is now.

Stand-up comic Shelley Berman is particularly effective as an oily shyster (with the appropriate surname Grieff) who represents Barbara. At a conference with Richard's lawyer, the two display an appalling amount of collegiality. It is obvious they are a little too cozy to dutifully represent opposing litigants. So it's no surprise that Richard gets taken to the cleaners. As the tag line on the movie poster says, "In America the ring costs two dollars [the marriage license] to put on…and a fortune to take off!"

Divorce rape was certainly not a term in those days, but that doesn't mean it wasn't a reality. At the conclusion of the divorce negotiations, it turns out that Richard will have $87.50 a week to live on after alimony, child support, etc. Even in 1967 this was not enough for anything more than a bare bones existence. So Richard is reduced to living in an efficiency apartment and driving a clunker. Contact with his sons has now been limited to weekends.

While taking his two sons bowling on a Sunday afternoon, his status as a divorced dad is obvious to another bowler, Nelson Downes (Jason Robards), whose status is the same, albeit with daughters instead of sons. Nelson introduces himself to Richard and takes him under his wing. He's been doing the weekend dad thing much longer than Richard so it appears he appears to be a credible mentor.

Nelson, like Richard, is living in straitened circumstances. As was the case with Richard's divorce, Nelson's wife has been awarded the house and the station wagon, so his standard of living has plummeted. But he is on good terms with his ex-wife (Jean Simmons). In fact, he takes Richard to his former home and introduces him to her. It turns out that Nelson is playing matchmaker. He is trying to get Nancy married off so he can get out from under alimony payments. What initially appeared to be a case of solidarity among divorced fathers turns out to be exactly the opposite: one man exploiting another for his own purposes. As it turns out, however, Nelson's economic plight is even worse than it appears. His girlfriend Eunice (Eileen Brennan) is pregnant. At one point, Nelson even makes a pathetic, half-hearted attempt at suicide. It is more of a cry for help.

One of the best scenes in the movie involves the confusion inherent in blended families (though I don't believe that term existed in 1967). A children's party ends in total chaos as weekend dads arrive to pick up their children from their first and/or second and/or third marriages, and sorting out the wee folk turns out to be a logistical nightmare. Ironically, one of the thrice-married fathers is portrayed by Tom Bosley, the 1950's trad dad in the long-running (1974-1984) Happy Days sitcom.

While all of the above may sound strangely familiar to contemporary viewers, there are important differences. For example, the divorce lawyers and the judge who presides over the Harmons' divorce are all men. Today that would be unlikely. Female divorce lawyers and family court judges have a much greater presence if not a dominance.

Needless to say, in 1967 there was no such thing as MGTOW. Marriage was the norm for adults so it was assumed that divorced men were recycled eligible bachelors. Cohabitation was rare. Respectable folks did not set up housekeeping with a member of the opposite sex without a marriage ceremony. Common law relationships were the province of the underclass and bohemians, whose numbers increased apace in 1967 as the ranks of hippies grew.

Perhaps the most telling absence in Divorce American Style is feminism. By 1967 the tradcon era wasn't knocked out but it was on the ropes. The birth control pill had been around since 1960 and The Feminine Mystique, Betty Friedan's polemic against woman-as-housewife, was published in 1963. Second-wave feminism (that term was not coined till 1968) was in the pipeline but it hadn't quite reached the spout. Germaine Greer, Gloria Steinem, Kate Millett, Susan Brownmiller, Andrea Dworkin, et al, as well as Helen Reddy's "I Am Woman," women's studies programs, Ms. magazine, etc. were in full bloom by the early 70's. Consequently, Divorce American Style deals with a world where married women were not yet big players in the workforce and a divorced woman was not expected to enter it. Even after divorce, her husband was expected to fully support her. So American society in 1967 was undeniably gynocentric, but that was not a word in common parlance then. Neither was misandry, come to think of it.

The screenplay of Divorce American Style was written by Norman Lear, who would become well known a few years later for the TV show All in the Family. The film's director, Bud Yorkin, was an associate of Lear. Curiously, Yorkin and Lear were co-winners of the 1999 Lucy (named for Lucille Ball) Award to honor those whose who "have enhanced the perception of women through the medium of television."

The casting of Dick Van Dyke as Richard Harmon was ideal in 1967, as his main claim to fame in those days was his portrayal of Rob Petrie in The Dick Van Dyke Show, a suburbanite sitcom that ran from 1961 through 1966. Having seen him engage with his wife Laura (Mary Tyler Moore) every week on TV, movie audiences had been groomed to accept him in a domestic situation in a movie. (FUN FACT: against all odds – he was a heavy smoker and an alcoholic – Dick Van Dyke will turn 97 on December 13, 2022) (BONUS FUN FACT: Van Dyke shacked up for 30 years with Michelle Triola Marvin, whose lawsuit against former live-in lover Lee Marvin resulted in the term "palimony.")

The casting of Debbie Reynolds as Van Dyke's wife was also inspired. Though she was 35 years old in 1967, her image as America's sweetheart had been established in movies throughout the 50's and 60's. Who better to represent a mature but still attractive American woman? Also, her own divorce from singer Eddie Fisher (who was porking Elizabeth Taylor) had made headlines in 1959.

Sad to report, but the end of Divorce American Style is a cop-out. True love wins out – even though it goes against everything that you've seen through the first 90% of the film's 1:49 running time. What could have been a black humor triumph is as neatly resolved as a situation comedy, which should not be a surprise. Norman Lear and Bud Yorkin, as well as Robert Kaufman, who wrote the original story, were heavily involved in TV series and only dabbled in film. Nevertheless, Divorce American Style is worth a look – and you can see it for free on YouTube.

If you were looking for a cultural artifact to demonstrate the adage "The more things change, the more they stay the same," you could certainly do worse.

Warriors and the Great Reset

Andrew MacDonald · 11 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We've forgotten the warrior energy and at this time in the world, we need it again. According to the stated intentions of the global overlords, a full reset of the present order is planned and underway, a full global corporate and institutional takeover. Most people are as yet unaware of it. The situation we're in can't be faced and dealt with without the Warrior and the conscious woman. Yet both sexes have lost focus and direction due to the lie that was feminism.

It may well be that the derogation of the Warrior and traditional femininity in the days of feminism was part of a deliberate strategy to weaken men, women and the family. It has certainly had that effect.

The warrior is down but not out. My point is that individual men forget the Warrior at a tremendous cost to their clarity and effectiveness. Without him, society is essentially lost before the forces arrayed against us.

This is a time of spiritual battle, fought now with voices instead of swords!

It's instructive to look back at the Warrior's history in Britain where I and many of our forebears came from. Consider.

———

I'm reading The Making of England: 55 BC to 1399 by Warren Hollister It's a complex story of conflict and resolution but it can start in 55BC when Julius Caesar visited Britain in what was essentially a scouting trip. A brutal wholesale Roman invasion took the island some hundred years later. The Roman soldiers were warriors of a kind, often indentured and forced into the army to serve their masters. Their conquest was brutal and complete. But it also established a rule and administrative system that established secure towns, widespread roads that endured for many centuries, and a long period of peace and civility that benefited from Rome's administrative skills.

When the empire tottered and began to fall the Romans were no longer able to support their western colonies, including in Britain. As it faltered, Germanic warrior tribes, the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes invaded Britain in numbers as they did other parts of the empire. The invaders created uncertainty and destruction.

These warrior chieftains and kings struggled for a toehold in a new world. Though closer to the ground and guerilla-like, their military success was also connected to their administrative success – their ability to manage the tribe and create stable systems.

Hollister writes:

> "A tribe success depended heavily on the ability, reputation, and charisma of its leader, a chief or King. A successful King was one who led his warriors to victories that won them rich plunder, and who used his own war booty to reward his loyal followers. With lavish generosity, with gold rings and other precious jewelry, with finely wrought swords and shields, with gold and silver bowls and cups. …The most honored profession was that of the warrior, and the warlike virtues of loyalty, courage, and military prowess, were esteemed above all the others.
>
> The chief military unit within the tribe was the warband or comitatus*, a group of warriors or companions bound together by their allegiance to the leader of the band. It was in the* comitatus*, above all, that military virtues were cherished. The chief of the band was bound to set an example of fearlessness and military skill, and his followers were obliged, should their leader fall in battle to fight to the death in order to avenge him. The ethical foundations of the* comitatus – honor, loyalty, courage – remained the norm of the English and continental warrior as aristocracy for centuries thereafter." (p.22)
>
> "In the early medieval West, sophisticated bureaucratic government was unknown, and whatever the resources and physical environment of a kingdom, its success in the ruthless political competition of the era depended heavily on the military and administrative talents of its ruler . . . "p.54

Although my example is early Britain, early history was infused with warrior energy. Modern ideas of good and bad don't remove its centrality. This is how the modern world were created.

Warrior kingdoms predominated in Britain for hundreds of years. By the seventh century there were seven or eight major kingdoms with one or other recognized as in a pre-eminent position each year.

Then around 780 or 790 came a new wave of warrior adventurers, the Vikings. They came first as plunderers of the more sedentary Britons and then as conquering settlers. Again it was the fighting men at work. Vikings dominated the English kingdoms, except for Wessex, and took over a wide swath of Britain they called the Danelaw.

All of this was rich with stories of courage and honor, much of it to do with the achievements of warrior Christians fighting to bring a new and more mature ethos. Christianity meant that the Warrior served a higher Lord.

One amazing story is that of King Alfred, king of Wessex and the last remaining English king. He was able to secure a temporary truce and used it to put his defences in order. He undertook a profound reorganization of the West Saxon military forces, built ships that had advantages over the Viking boats, and created fortresses throughout his territory. When he was surrounded by a pincer movement from the Danes, he retreated to a swamp in Somerset for a winter with a small band. In the spring Alfred was able to summon the Wessex fyrd (old English for army) he'd worked to build, fought a decisive battle against the Danish force. Gradually, through fighting and diplomacy, Alfred established a balance with the Vikings. Alfred was a Christian and the conversion of Guthrum, the Viking leader to Christianity was important too. The Christian ethos was as central to the civilizing and maturation of early Britain as was the Warrior. The Warrior energy is wrapped up with the notion of service to the higher.

Alfred, now remembered as Alfred the Great, deserved the name. According to Hollister, he "was a man of singular intellect and imagination . . . a warrior, an administrator, a diplomat, a devotee of Christian learning, and a singularly persuasive leader." He also re-introduced from Europe some of the literary and monastic works and traditions that had fled their from Britain to escape the Vikings.

We need men like that now. We need the Warrior. He's still in us, still living, a part of our psychic heritage and resonating down the generations. The Warrior fights against predatory energies for the integrity of the tribe.

We're increasingly being surrounded ourselves now. The global takeover plans of Mr. Global, the Davos crowd that includes the world's most influential organizations and individuals are poised for a devastating "Great Reset" that intends to enslave us all. Full domination is their stated intention and not at all a conspiracy theory. Detailing this is beyond my scope here but this video shows it clearly.

The battles for turf between women and men ignore the common threat we're facing: a global corporate takeover tied to permission-based digital identities.

Whether by intention or no, feminism delivered the warrior a serious blow from which men haven't recovered and may not. Women haven't recovered either. It may well be that whole feminist enterprise was part of Mr. Global's long-term strategy. It has weakened women and men equally, though in different ways, and knocked the stuffing out of the family.

This isn't a fight with swords. It's a moral fight, a spiritual battle fought with the mature Warrior energy. Neither women nor men can fight that battle while squabbling over feminism. It's a distraction while the digital prison is being built around us. Women and men are going to have to fight the deeper battle together and alone. Our integrity and voices are the swords of today.

The rise of chivalric love

Peter Wright · 12 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Love and war have always been opposed, as we see in our usual phrase 'make love not war' or in the rhetoric of pro and anti-war camps. That the two are mutually exclusive is obvious enough. However, in twelfth century Europe something peculiar happened that ushered in a melding of these two contrary principles. Here the military code of chivalry was mated with the fancies of courtly love to produce a bastard child which we will here call chivalric love (today we simply label it 'chivalry'). Prior to this time chivalry always referred to the military code of behaviour –one that varied from country to country– but one which had absolutely nothing to do with romantic love.

What method did twelfth century society use to bring this about? In a word, shaming.

The medieval aristocracy began to ramp up the practice of shaming by choosing the worst behaviours of the most unruly males and extrapolating those behaviours to the entire gender. Sound familiar? Knights were particularly singled out –much like today's sporting heroes who display some kind of faux pas– to be used as examples of bad male behaviour requiring the remedy of sweeping cultural reform.

During this time of (supposedly) unruly males, uneducated squires were said to ride mangy horses into mess halls, and rude young men diverted eyes from psalters in the very midst of mass. Among the knights and in the atmosphere of tournaments occasional brawls with grisly incidents occurred – a cracked skull, a gouged eye – as the betting progressed and the dice flew. Male attention to clothing and fashion was said to be appalling, with men happy to go about in sheep and fox skins instead of clothes fashioned of rich and precious stuffs, in colours to better suit them in the company of ladies. And perhaps worst of all were their lack of refinement and manners toward women which was considered offensive.

How and by whom was this unruly gender going to be reformed? One of the first solutions was posed by a French Countess named Marie. According to historian Amy Kelly, with her male reforming ideas;

> "Marie organized the rabble of soldiers, fighting-cocks, jousters, springers, riding masters, troubadours, Poitevin nobles and debutantes, young chatelaines, adolescent princes, and infant princesses in the great hall of Poitiers. Of this pandemonium the countess fashioned a seemly and elegant society, the fame of which spread to the world. Here was a woman's assize to draw men from the excitements of the tilt and the hunt, from dice and games, to feminine society, an assize to outlaw boorishness and compel the tribute of adulation to female majesty."[1]

Countess Marie was one among a long line of reformers to help usher in a gynocentrism whose aim was to convince men of their shared flaws –essentially to shame them- and to prescribe romantic love and concomitant worship of females as the remedy. Via this program romantic love was welded onto the military code and introduced as a way to tame men's rowdiness and brutality, something today's traditionalists agree with in their call for men to adhere to these same male roles established first in medieval Europe. One of today's authorities on this period describes the training of knights in her observation, "The rise of courtly love and its intersection with chivalry in the West are both events of the twelfth century. The idea that love is ennobling and necessary for the education of a knight comes out of the lyrics of this period, but also in the romances of knighthood. Here the truest lovers are now the best knights."[2]

With romantic love firmly established within the chivalric code we begin to see the romantic behaviours of soldiers so familiar to us today; going to fight and die for his Lady, love letters from the front lines, a crumpled photo of his sweetheart in a uniform pocket. Rather than for man, king and country it is his love for "her" that now drives a man's military sacrifice. This is also the reason why today's movies portraying warzones and carnage always include a hero and his Lady/Damsel pausing for a passionate tongue kiss while the bombs explode around them, as if to suggest that all this carnage is for the sake of her and romantic love. Once accepted into the chivalric canon various love “rules” were enforced with military might –by white knights as we call them- and the resulting culture has been unstoppable. To try and stop it brings the wrath of all those white knights who will bury your ass into the ground for breaking this new military “goal” of romantic love.

Prior to the Middle Ages romantic love was usually considered with suspicion and even viewed as a sign of mental instability requiring removal from the source of trouble and perhaps a medical solution. In the context of universally arranged marriages, romantic love, if it was indulged at all, was done so in a discreet and often underground way without the sanction of polite society. This was the situation worldwide until the advent of the European revolution.

The cult of chivalric love took root first among the aristocratic classes and soon after reached the common classes through literature and storytelling. Romance literature in particular. Having germinated initially in Germany and France in the twelfth centuries, the cult spread on the wings of a burgeoning book production industry that would bring the gynocentric revolution to the entire European continent.

When one considers the subjects in these books – Gawain and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, heroic male deeds for women, love scandals, courtship, upper-class weddings, adultery, and status – we are reminded immediately of today’s women’s magazines that spill out of the magazine racks of shops and waiting rooms.

Women’s magazines and the omnipresent romance novel –and women’s gluttony for them- can be traced back to this early period in which the term romance was actually coined. According to Jennifer Wollock, a professor of Literature at Texas University, such literature had a substantial female readership along with mothers reading to their daughters. Wollock states that the continuing popularity of chivalric love stories is also confirmed by the provenance of romance manuscripts and contents of women’s libraries of the late Middle Ages.[2]

The three behaviors of chivalric love-code

Keeping with the male side of the equation, the main behaviors prescribed by the code of chivalric love are the doing of romantic deeds, gallantry and vassalage.

Prior to its redeployment in romantic relationships gallantry referred to any courageous behaviour, especially in battle. The word can still mean that. However, under the rules of chivalric love it became, according to the Google dictionary definition, “Polite attention or respect given by men to women.” Can these two definitions of gallantry be any further apart? Like the contraries of military chivalry vs. chivalric love, these two definitions of gallantry stretch the definition to cover two completely different domains of behaviour. It appears then that women of the time successfully harnessed men’s greatest sacrificial behaviours –chivalry and gallantry- to indulge their narcissistic appetites.

A vassal is defined as a bondman, a slave, a subordinate or dependent, or a person who entered into a mutual obligation to a lord or monarch in the context of the feudal system in medieval Europe. The obligations often included military support and mutual protection in exchange for certain privileges, usually including the grant of land held as a fiefdom. Vassalage was then utilized as a conceit that Maurice Valency called “the shaping principle of the whole design of courtly love.”[3] Whether it was a knight, troubadour, or commoner the vassal-to-woman routine was the order of the day then, exactly as it is today.[4] Poets adopted the terminology of feudalism, declaring themselves the vassal of the lady and addressing her as midons (my lord), which was taken as standard flattery of a woman. One particularly striking practice showing an adaption from the feudal model involved the man kneeling on one knee before the woman. By kneeling down in this way he assumes the posture of a vassal. He speaks, pledging his faith, promising, like a liege man, not to offer his services to anyone else. He goes even further: in the manner of a serf, he makes her a gift of his entire person.

Citing evidence of vassalism Amy Kelly writes, “As symbolized on shields and other illustrations that place the knight in the ritual attitude of commendation, kneeling before his lady with his hands folded between hers, homage signified male service, not domination or subordination of the lady, and it signified fidelity, constancy in that service.”[5]

In short it was the lover's feudal relationship between vassal and overlord which provided the lover with a model for his humble and servile conduct.[2]

———

The lead actors – then and now

Imagine twelfth century Europe as a great stage performance enacting the themes of chivalric love, one that would become so popular its actors would continue to serve as role models for the global population 800 years later. The lead actors in this medieval play are as follows, accompanied (in brackets) with the titles we apply to those same actors today as they continue this ancient drama:

Courtly Ladies (= Feminists). Feminists today refer to courtly ladies of the late Middle Ages as the first feminists, or protofeminists, and as with modern feminists these women enjoyed considerable privilege and means. In the 12th – 14th centuries evidence shows that women began to agitate for increased authority over the 'correct' way for men and women to conduct relationships, with particular emphasis on what they felt were acceptable roles for males in a dignified and civil society. Not surprisingly this was precisely the time when powerful women were able to establish the female-headed 'courts of love' which acted in a comparable way to today's Family Courts in that both arbitrated love disputes between conflicting couples.

Key literature from the period detailing proper etiquette expected in gender relations was commissioned for writing by powerful women (eg. 'The Art of Courtly love') and in some cases was written by women themselves (eg. Christine de Pizan's writings or those of Marie de France). The emerging discourse acted like a drug that promised the introduction of a one-sided power for females over males, and through the dissemination of romance literature that promise rapidly spread to all social classes in the continent. We have been living with the consequences ever since, a revolution far more significant to the history gender relations than the introduction of the birth control pill and no-fault divorce combined- the latter being mere epiphenomena generated within a larger culture of chivalric love.

The archetypes introduced into society by these high-born ladies are instantly recognizable; the damsel in distress (women as innocent, woman as helpless, women as victim), the princess (women as beautiful, women as narcissistic subject requiring devotion, women as deserving of special privileges), and the high born Ladies (women as morally pure, women as precious, women as superior, women as entitled). These illusions ensured that the attentions of men would be spent attending to women, a program so successful that modern feminists continue to shape today's cultural landscape with the program of their protofeminists forebears. And just like their forebears, feminists continue to use shaming narratives to facilitate their pedestalizing inheritance.

White Knights (= White Knights). We retain this metaphor for such heroic individuals, men who are gallant in so many ways, but mostly the wrong ways such as showing-off to undeserving women and concomitantly delighting in competing with and hurting other men. More than any other player in this play, white knights specialize in gallant behaviour for the purpose of impressing and ultimately getting their egos stroked by women.

For these first white knights the tournament, the forerunner to modern sporting tournaments, consisted of chivalrous competitions or fights in the Middle Ages. In these fights knights were only too willing to hurt their fellow men to win the praise of female spectators. The competitors were observed doing battle by women who would throw their garments into the arena where the sportsmen would pick them up and wear pieces of women's clothes -hence the male wearing a particular woman's scarf would represent her in the tournament.

The men were basically fighting for "her" then, just as they did elsewhere on real battlefields for wife and mother. The gallant man who won his tournament was granted an opportunity to dally with the woman whom he represented in the ring. We retain this gynocentric tradition today as golf tournaments, football tournaments, martial arts tournaments and so on, all designed to show male prowess where the winning competitors get to dally with the best ladies.

Other activities of white knights include impressing women with big gestures of protection. For example, the 'Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady' was a chivalric order founded by Jean Le Maingre and twelve knights in 1399 committing themselves to the protection of women. Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honour, estate, goods, reputation, fame and praise of all ladies and damsels, an undertaking that earned the praise of Christine de Pizan. Le Maingre, tired of receiving complaints from ladies, maidens, and widows claiming to be oppressed by powerful men bent on depriving them of the lands and honours, and finding no knight or squire willing to defend their just cause, founded an order of twelve knights sworn to carry "a shield of gold enamelled with green and a white lady inside".

The twelve knights, after swearing this oath, affirmed a long letter explaining their purpose and disseminated it widely in France and beyond her borders. The letter explained that any lady young or old finding herself the victim of injustice could petition one or more or the knights for redress and that knight would respond promptly and leave whatever other task he was performing to fight the lady's oppressor personally. The similarities of this Order with contemporary enterprises such as the White Ribbon Campaign in which male "ambassadors" pledge an oath to all of womanhood to never condone, excuse or remain silent about violence against women, and to intervene and take action against any man accused of wrongdoing against a woman. The similarities in these gallant missions make clear that the lineage of white knights has progressed seamlessly into the modern era.

Troubadours I (= PUA and Game promoters). The troubadours' job was to spread the word about the virtues of chivalric love through music, song, poetry and storytelling. Aristocracy and commoner alike enjoyed hearing tales about bravery, and ladies were swept away with epic love poems as the troubadours practiced the rituals of chivalric love. Just like PUAs or Gamers today who write and speak in praise of pussy, troubadours too were composers and promoters of the 'arts of love' aimed at securing sexual fulfilment.

Like those troubadours, Roosh and Roissy (etc.) continue the tradition of prose-writing to illustrate the many ways to flatter women in order to get into their pants. Game is a very apt word for this 800 yr old tradition, with its proscription for rehearsed lines and lack of personal authenticity. It is a scripted game of women-worship aimed at a narrow goal. In essence this Casanova routine amounts to a feigning of chivalric love for the purposes of manipulation, usually to gain sex. When modern women call these men 'players' they may be very close to the mark. While Roosh et.al. outwardly claim to reject chivalry, they nevertheless embrace its tenets like consummate thespians.

Troubadours II (= Profeminist Men – sometimes derogatorily named 'manginas'). Unlike the troubadours mentioned above who advocated for a love aimed at sexual fulfillment, Troubadour II advocated a more idealized love of longing that did not consummate in sexual fulfillment. In essence these men more resembled sycophantic Romeos than horny Casanovas. The guiding concept for them was called "fin' amors," which meant pure love. Such men were particularly prevalent in the north of France, whereas in the south we see that troubadours (type I mentioned up above) celebrated a love that was adulterous or carnal in which full sexual encounters were sought.

Another thing that distinguished type II troubadours from the former is authenticity. These men appeared to identify wholly with the role and were not merely players. The desire to serve women as their vassal, or perhaps as their masochistic slave, called upon their innermost character. Think of today's version being the typical profeminist men who work slavishly to pass on the message of their feminist superiors, much as these troubadours slaved to advocate the narcissistic idiosyncrasies of their Ladies. The vassalage role applies here more than with any other character of the Middle Ages – not as a merely pretentious means-to-an-end routine to gain sex, but rather as a soul-affirming act.

———

Which brings us to what the MHRM refers to as gynocentrism. It is clear from the foregoing that unless evidence of (broadspread) gynocentric culture can be found prior to the Middle Ages, then gynocentrism is precisely 800 years old. In order to determine if this thesis is valid we need first to define exactly what we mean by "gynocentrism".

The term gynocentrism has been in circulation since the 1800's, as far as I can tell, with the general definition being "focused on women; concerned with only women."[6] Adam Kostakis further qualifies gynocentrism as, "male sacrifice for the benefit of women" and "the deference of men to women," and he concludes; "Gynocentrism, whether it went by the name honor, nobility, chivalry, or feminism, its essence has gone unchanged. It remains a peculiarly male duty to help the women onto the lifeboats, while the men themselves face a certain and icy death."[7]

From these definitions we see that gynocentrism could refer to any one female-centered practice in an otherwise androcentric society, or to even a single gynocentric act carried out by one individual. With this broad usage in mind the phrase 'gynocentric culture' proves more precise for the purposes of this essay , which phrase I will define here as any culture instituting rules for gender relationships that benefit females at the expense of males across a broad range of measures.

At the base of our current form of gynocentrism lies the practice of enforced male sacrifice for the benefit of women. If we accept this definition we need to look back and ask the accompanying question of whether male sacrifices throughout history were always made for the sake of women, or alternatively for the sake of some other primary goal? For instance, when men went to die in vast numbers in wars, was it for women, or was it rather for Man, King and Country? If the latter we cannot then claim that this was a result of some intentional gynocentric culture, at least not in the way I have defined it here. If the sacrifice isn't intended for the benefit women, even if women were occasional beneficiaries of male sacrifice, then we are not dealing with gynocentrism.

Male disposability strictly "for the benefit of women" comes in strongly only after the advent of the 12th century gender revolution in Europe – a revolution that delivered us terms like gallantry, chivalry, chivalric love, courtesy, romance and so on. From that period onward gynocentric practices grew exponentially, culminating in the demands of today's feminism. In sum, gynocentrism was a patchy phenomenon at best before the middle ages, after which it became ubiquitous.

With all this in mind it makes little sense to talk of gynocentric culture starting with the industrial revolution a mere 200 years ago (or 100 or even 30 yrs ago), or of it being two million years old as some would argue. We are not simply fighting two million years of genetic programming; our culturally constructed enemy is much, much simpler to pinpoint and to potentially reverse. The historical evidence is strong. All we need do now is look at the circumstances under which gynocentrism first began to flourish and attempt to reverse those circumstances. Specifically, if gynocentric culture was brought about by the practice of shaming, then that is the enemy to target in order to reverse the entire enterprise. For me that process could begin by rejecting the fake moral purity to which women of the last millennia have pretended and against which the worst examples of men have been measured in order to shame the entire gender.

References

1. Amy Kelly, 'Eleanor of Aquitaine and Her Courts of Love' Source: Speculum, Vol. 12, No. 1 (Published by Medieval Academy of America, 1937)
2. Jennifer G. Wollock, Rethinking Chivalry and Courtly Love, (Published by Praeger, 2011)
3. Maurice Valency, In Praise of Love: An Introduction to the Love Poetry of the Renaissance, (Macmillan, 1961)
4. For an excellent article about vassaldom today see Gordon Wadsworth's 'The Western Butler and his Manhood' which indicates an unbroken line between the romantic vassaldom of the Middle Ages and the "butler" role expected of males today. (Published on AVfM, 2013)
5. Amy Kelly, 'Did Women Have a Renaissance?' in Women, History, and Theory (Published by UCP Press, 1984)
6. Dictionary.com – Gynocentric
7. Adam Kostakis, Gynocentrism Theory – (Published online, 2011). Although Kostakis assumes gynocentrism has been around throughout recorded history, he singles out the Middle Ages for comment: "There is an enormous amount of continuity between the chivalric class code which arose in the Middle Ages and modern feminism… One could say that they are the same entity, which now exists in a more mature form – certainly, we are not dealing with two separate creatures."

The Western butler and his manhood

Gordon Wadsworth · 14 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

What a creature is the besieged Western male. His battle-worn spirit is a warzone over which rages a mêlée for supremacy of his identity. And he is expected never to voice concern for that which is the prize — his humanity. Radical feminists continue to vilify him, clawing at his character and imposing shame and subservience. But he should be a leader. Moderate feminists encourage him to "move beyond" his masculinity and become more sensitive and "evolved." But he should be a protector. Society designates him provider. But celebrates his earning power being exceeded by women. People of both sexes expect him to be chivalrous. But he must value equality. It reads like the dating profile of a prom queen.

And make no mistake, each of these groups deliver their sermons on the shoulders of the Western male, and do so while ignoring both his voice and their own comically crippling dysfunction. Humorously, an informal public survey would likely reveal the general belief that this condition is a privilege. I don't wonder at the men who stand up and fight, nor at the many men who simply surrender.

The whole affair is a dog and pony show debacle, but never mind all that for now.

The point is this; I often wonder how to sum up the condition of the contemporary Western male in a single word, and because of all the factors at play, it's not exactly an easy task.

But there is one thing that makes it simple. As complicated as the situation has become between the sexes, our legal equality with women is only a simple moral boundary away. That moral boundary being the one which separates one person's choices from another person's responsibilities. In other words, the "radical notion" that making a personal choice doesn't morally obligate another human being. In every corner of Western civilization we put this moral boundary into practice. Every corner except one.

Because we aren't protected by this boundary, as men in Western culture our condition is one of profound responsibility. For our own choices, sure, but even for choices which we had no part in making. Even despite this fact, however, the word responsibility isn't quite enough to describe the contemporary Western male.

Why is the word responsibility insufficient? Simply, because this type of chivalrous male obligation to facilitate the lady's privilege has always existed. It's nothing particularly new. The male has always been a pillar of responsibility, since the simple nature of chivalry is just a marriage between the obligation of a man and the benefit of a lady. This remains untouched, so what has changed?

The obvious answer is that women have changed. The responsibilities of yesteryear's chivalrous man obligated him to a lady, but that same lady had her own traditional responsibilities to observe. This equilibrium meant that the chivalrous man's responsibility knew limits, and his chivalry was thus curtailed by the limits imposed on the lady. Feminism appeared and rightfully freed women from their traditional limits and responsibilities, but nothing severed the chivalrous bond connecting a man's obligation to the benefit of a lady. Thus, the chivalrous man's responsibility came to know no limits as the lady cast aside all limits of her own.

With all of that in mind, what word is more appropriate than "responsible" to describe the Western man whose traditional obligations bind him to the lady's traditional benefits even as she has become free to do as she wishes? More specifically, what is the word used to describe someone whose responsibility finances another person's complete freedom to choose and act as they wish free of consequence?

The word is "butler," and in a nutshell, the Western male has become a sort of traditional butler engaged in a deranged ritual of sacrifice and service. The Western butler isn't indentured to a master per se, but rather to a concept. This concept is his unreconstructed "manhood," which encompasses and packages his traditional chivalrous obligations and the way they are designed to benefit and pedestalize a "lady."

In other words, the Western butler is shackled to his own manhood. Feminists will argue this is the patriarchy hurting men, but this is merely the feminist crashing into her ideological furniture as she stumbles through the dark looking for the light switch. The infantile feminist notion of "patriarchy" isn't what hurts men, what hurts men is a women's advocacy that keeps men obligated to women via men's traditional chivalrous obligations while freeing women from their own roles. What hurts men is a continued responsibility and legal obligation to women that recognize no limitations on their own behavior. What hurts men is that they are not allowed to represent their own interests and humanity with their own movement separate from feminism. What hurts men is a feminist movement that increasingly puts women as a group above criticism and beyond reproach.

Hugo Schwyzer unknowingly highlighted the Western butler's exact problem in his article "Hardwired to Disappoint? The Crushingly Low Expectations of Men" published on March 15 2013 at Jezebel. To quote him directly,

> As feminists have been pointing out for some time, expanding opportunity for women without also expanding expectations for men leaves us with a lot of anxious and exhausted female overachievers.

This is Schwyzer punctuating men's chivalrous obligations to the lady. He is advocating that women's equality involves expanding opportunity for women while also expanding expectations for men. This mentality is exactly the reason the Western male has become a butler; our chivalrous expectations obligate us to the lady who increasingly does as she wishes.
Nowhere is our butler status more evident than in matters of reproduction. The lady now owns her reproductive self determination, as well I believe she should. Unfortunately, no boundary exists between her choice of self determination in this matter and that of the Western male. His obligation to the lady is still intact even as her traditional restrictions have been lifted. As a result, her choice is more than his responsibility, it is his life, with no moral boundary separating his life from her choice. The Western butler is expected to shoulder the weight of her self determination by chivalrously casting aside his own, and the only cost is his humanity.
In the same way, the Western butler is responsible when the lady breaks her part of the marriage contract and finds herself mothering another man's child. Her status as a lady worth sacrificing for is secure in spite of her infidelity. The Western butler remains obligated to her benefit, and thus works to protect her from the inconveniences of her choice. He is not allowed to consider himself, since no boundary exists to separate his responsibility even from her degenerate choice.
Furthermore, the Western butler is obligated to the safety of the lady. Yet the lady increasingly recognizes no limits on her own behavior. Thus, the Western butler must take responsibility for the lady who increasingly refuses to accept any responsibility for herself. The lady's poor decisions where her safety is concerned must never be questioned. Doing so results in international slut walk movements to remind the butler of his place. Thus, the Western butler's obligation to the lady's safety, even as she continues to behave as she likes, ensures she will not be inconvenienced by any of her own choices, since he is responsible for those choices. She can behave in any manner she chooses, and he will sacrifice and come to her defense, whatever the circumstances, without questioning her. The butler's own safety, of course, is not a priority.
In matters of sex, the Western butler is also responsible for the lady's choices. She may desire sex, but if she has been drinking, it is his responsibility to decline. He is thus expected to protect the lady from herself. Her choice to consume alcohol is his responsibility, no boundary exists to separate these concepts. She may choose to consume alcohol or drugs in any quantity. Perhaps she wants to enjoy sex while drunk or high, but he must protect her anyway. Such is the way of the butler. His chivalrous obligation to the lady prevents him from respecting her adult volition and choices, even as she's warming him up with the most "enthusiastic consent" he's ever received. The Western butler's choices are thus to engage her and risk being called a rapist, or reject her and open the gates of hell.
The Western butler's chivalrous obligation to the lady prevents him from defending himself even if she is attacking him. If she murders him, society holds him responsible. He must have been violent, and such a betrayal of the butler-lady relationship often validates her act of murder. The Western butler must also keep a straight face while the lady and her friends display their open hostility and contempt for men and masculinity. In addition, the lady can fire the butler at any time. He can be removed from the house by force and even by gunpoint if she wishes it. He can be ejected from his family.
At least a traditional butler so discarded was never expected to finance his former master's operations while he searched for a new one like the Western butler is.

How then, does the Western butler free himself from his master? How does he rid himself of the oppression of his own antiquated manhood? The answer is by fighting to be allowed to define his own masculine identity independently. And this terrifies feminists. It terrifies them. They violently oppose this trend above all else. They oppose the MHRM for this reason. They wish to ensure that the Western butler remains shackled to his socially imposed "manhood." Their goal is to supervise and direct his masculinity, to keep it caged and harnessed for their own benefit. They construct altars to the feminine such as GMP to debate how best to harness this force. And when the men involved step even one inch over the line, they are savagely punished.

And yet convincing men, even these men from the GMP, of their butler status can be extremely difficult. The reason being that most men feel valued, appreciated, and loved, and indeed many of them are. And to those men, I ask you only for a single favor. Try speaking up for your humanity. Try it just once, and find out whether you're loved as a human being or loved as a butler.

The Fable of the Fish

Papa Possum · 15 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

You can hear Papa Possum read his verse here. –Ed

Some angry creatures gathered once with grievances in mind
On how they felt society
conspired against their kind.
We'll call them "fish" since that themselves
they once did call in claim,
Although it's certain that you know them by another name.

Inside a bowl, upon a shelf,
in a department store,
They reinforced their discontent,
and shunned outside rapport,
Renounced the Strengths they could have played,
chose pessimism's pull:
"Our bowl, it is half empty! Don't dare say it is half full!"

With anger they topped off their bowl, each echoed Marx's name.
Not one fish thought to look toward self,
but sought something to blame.
Each clenched right fin into a fist,
and thrust it toward the air,
Then swam in circles leftward…
never getting anywhere.

Across the aisle, in Games and Sports, were bicycles displayed.
Each built for action, work, or speed;
the fuming fish surveyed
And through their fish-eye view assumed each bike of dark ideals,
"All bikes were built for just one thing:
crush us beneath their wheels!"

The bikes were taken quite aback, sought to this fear relieve.
But the fish rallied, fist fins high, with "Swim left and believe!"
The fish bowl boiled over and splashed water everywhere
And when, at last, the rage died down, no bike was standing there.

The bikes had moved to aisle far from undeserv'ed rage,

Then lived their lives as each thought best;
the fish stayed in their cage.
So, here the story ends and if a moral's what you wish…
Then, "men need marxist feminists like bicycles need fish."

ICMI21: Q&A with a self-professed incel

A Voice For Men Videos · 16 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

One Morning In Baghdad

hestia · 17 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This piece was originally published on The Spearhead in 2010. –Ed

Baghdad, Iraq, Spring 2004

"49 weeks down in this desert" said Ian to Elliot as they walked through the rail station on one of their last days of work before handing the reins over to their replacements. Just three weeks until their boots hit the soil in the States after a year spent in the heart of Baghdad, helping patrol the city and training Iraqis to assist Coalition forces with certain tasks in the city. Of all the experiences he and Elliot have shared through their years of friendship, this deployment at the beginning of Operation Iraqi Freedom was hands down the most intense. The tents they shared as Boy Scouts in middle school were just the beginnings of a special sort of friendship that developed through the years. They've done everything together. Built fires, tied knots, stood in line for the latest greatest video game, and chased girls in high school. They even went into the recruiters office together, signing on the dotted line to join the Reserves when they were seventeen, barely in need of razors, barely able to drive, barely turning into men. And here they were, several years later, a part of history, wrapping up a year long deployment to Iraq at the beginning of a controversial war.

Walking into work, the conversation turns to planning for their first weeks back to the US. "I say we have a Stargate SG-1 marathon and then ride down the Oregon Coast. Our last boyish hurrah before you get married Elliot" suggests Ian. Elliot nods, liking the plan very much, adding "this winter we'll have to be sure to go snowboarding again. Man, it's been too long since we had a fun weekend trip like that." Heading into their respective offices, the friends end their jovial conversation until break time when they plan, like always, to meet out front.

The morning was like so many others: mundane, routine, nothing out of the ordinary. Signatures were necessary here and there. Paperwork had to be done to tie up loose ends before the hand off to the replacements in just a matter of days. As the morning dragged on, lunch time was becoming all the more enticing. Around break time, Elliot set his papers aside and got ready to join his buddies outside. As he stood up to leave the room, he noticed something in the window. It looked as if the sun were rising, but this wasn't the right time of day. "Oh fuck" Elliot managed to blurt out, right as the window shattered and the glass came flying at his face, cutting him on all exposed skin and clinging to his uniform. Grabbing his weapon, Elliot took off outside, not fully comprehending what had just happened but on high alert, primed with adrenaline for fight or flight.

When he arrived outside a large number of the Iraqi men who had been outside working were nothing but blood and guts strewn across the ground. The remnants of a vehicle was ablaze and was clearly the car that had held the bomb. Debris was everywhere and the officer in charge was freaking out and panicking, unable to gain composure and issue orders. Time seemed to stand still, yet it passed quickly all the same. The chaos was loud but inside his head was a deafening quiet. Elliot could hear his heart beat clearly with yelling outside his head jumbled and unclear. One of Elliot's soldiers followed him and once they made sure everything was clear, that the danger was gone, they began to offer medical aid to the survivors of the blast. There were too many people who needed help for them to adequately tend to everybody, and some were too far-gone to offer anything beyond comfort and an ear to listen to their precious last words as they died outside under the hot desert sun. The men who could be moved to safety were flung over shoulders and carried away until more help could arrive. The soldiers stopped bleeding with torn up pieces of their own clothing, cleaned and bandaged wounds, provided IVs and treated shock with whatever makeshift blankets they could make, and kept traumatically injured men breathing and alive until transport arrived.

As Elliot and his soldiers ran around assessing the damage, locating those who were still alive and those who needed immediate care, he heard a familiar voice cry out. He looked over to the side of the building where the noise was coming from. Elliot couldn't see much in the bright sunlight, made all the more confusing by the surrounding chaos, but then he saw a peek of camo around the corner. He ran over and realized right away who it was: the man on the ground was Ian. Bloody and gravely wounded, but his friend all the same. Desperately, Elliot applied pressure on the worst of his friend's wounds, ripping off part of his clothing to serve as tourniquets to stop the bleeding. As he worked frantically, Ian told him to stop, "The pain is leaving. I'm going to die, aren't I?" Before Elliot can answer his buddy, Ian gives him a message to bring home.

"No NO NOOOO!"

Elliot desperately screamed, demanding his friend hold on, but it was too late. He'd lost too much blood. He was hurt too badly to hold on. There was nothing left to do. "I love you, man" said Elliot as his best friend, the closest thing to a brother he had ever had, slipped away to the other side. Ian was just twenty years old. He was intelligent, talented, extremely gifted in the sciences, and had a world of opportunity awaiting him at home. So many plans for the future, so many dreams left unfulfilled. All gone in just a second as he left this world too soon.

With his DCUs ripped, torn, and covered in blood, with bits of debris lodged into his helmet and even stuck on his body armor, it was only then Elliot realized he was injured and could attend to his own medical needs. Bits of shrapnel from the bomb, bone fragments from the people who had died, and gravel from the ground were lodged in wounds all over his body and he realized he had been treating patients, bloody patients, with his wounds unprotected. He might not only be injured but could have been exposed to HIV, hepatitis, or any number of other diseases. After returning to camp, he went for medical treatment and returned to his tent where he could finally let the events of the day sink in. Thirty five men had been killed. Men who were simply trying to feed their families were murdered for being involved with the Coalition Forces. Some of the soldiers he worked with were dead, and his tent was now empty except for the ghost of his best friend, the laughs they shared inside just this morning nothing but a cherished memory now. He looked over to the cot across the tent, the one that no longer had an occupant, a friend gone in just a instant… Elliot just sat there and stared for a while. How much time he'll never know but it felt like a lifetime. Unsure of what to think or how to feel, he lay in his cot, listening to mortar attacks around the airport until he finally awoke the next morning, groggy and numb, and called home to connect with loved ones for the first time since the blast. One voicemail said, "there's been an accident, but I am okay."

Two weeks later, when his boots hit ground in the USA, the homecoming was not the joyful celebration originally imagined, but rather a dark and somber occasion. They were home with three fewer men than they left with last spring. They'd said goodbye to three brothers in arms just about the time they thought they were safe and danger was over. Elliot kept his promise to Ian and visited his friend's parents to share the message he had been entrusted with. This wasn't all, he said; far from it in fact. He had an apology to offer for these people who were nearly family. With a guilty survivor's conscience he offered an apology for not getting there in time, for not being able to save their son. They were supposed to come home together. They always did everything together.

Arlington National Cemetery, Spring 2010

Six years since the blast and Ian still lives on in hearts, in love, and in memory. Once again Elliot traveled to his grave in Arlington, as he does whenever the opportunity has arisen, to place a wreath on the grave of his lost friend. This time is different, however, as he doesn't go alone but brings his little girl along. Ever curious, the little one asked why they are here. Elliot told her that he wants her to know a special man, a true American hero, somebody who was brave even when it hurt. His little girl doesn't yet understand death, but she does know what it means to be brave and serve in the Middle East. She remembers well when her daddy was gone for a year. With the innocence only a child can posses, she lays her small American flag on Ian's grave and offers a salute for "being Daddy's bwave fwend." This she repeated as she and Elliot walked away, her tiny fingers clasped in her daddy's strong, but trembling hand.

Sexism in Harry Potter

A Voice For Men Videos · 18 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A Harry Potter fan notes sexism in the Harry Potter saga. No, really.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5rqQDBOcuAU

You can subscribe to Vinny Mac here.

2018: Philip Davies with MGM bombshell in the House of Commons

Mike Buchanan · 19 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

This is a republication of an important announcement from 2018. –Ed

Excerpt from the Hansard record of yesterday's International Men's Day debate in the House of Commons, from Philip Davies MP's opening address:

> I also want to touch on male circumcision: male genital mutilation. According to a barrister's opinion, carrying out circumcision on males when there is no medical need—non-therapeutic circumcision—is a crime under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, being at least actual bodily harm if not grievous bodily harm. [J4MB emphasis] In 1983, Lord Hailsham, the then Lord Chancellor, said of female genital mutilation: "in the case of a minor under the age of 16, there is no possibility that consent is any defence at all. A minor under the age of 16 is not able to consent to the commission upon her of a criminal assault. Neither parental consent nor the consent of the minor would be any defence at all, and if the parents did such a thing, or instigated such a thing or participated in such a thing, it would only render them liable to criminal penalties, too."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 April 1983; Vol. 441, c. 677.]
>
> When I put it to the Government in 2016 that female genital mutilation was already illegal before specific laws on the subject were introduced, they agreed that it was. When I then put to them the position regarding boys, they took a different line. They quoted Sir James Munby, who was the president of the Family Division of the High Court, in a case of January 2015: "Whereas it can never be reasonable parenting to inflict any form of FGM on a child, the position is quite different with male circumcision. Society and the law, including family law, are prepared to tolerate non-therapeutic male circumcision performed for religious or even for purely cultural or conventional reasons, while no longer being willing to tolerate FGM in any of its forms."
>
> As the former barrister who I mentioned earlier also said, it would require a parliamentary override for male circumcision to be legal, and that has never existed. No exemptions to the law of the land are permissible for religious or cultural reasons. [J4MB: our emphasis] The Ministry of Justice went on to say that there was no doubt that female genital mutilation could have a physical and psychological impact on women, and also said that some girls die as a result of the procedure, which is absolutely correct. I do not pretend to be an expert in this field, but I believe that boys have also been reported to have died following a circumcision, and I have seen accounts of the physical and psychological impact of circumcision on men.
>
> I understand that the position of the NHS is that the risks associated with routine circumcision, such as infection and excessive bleeding, outweigh any potential benefits. I am mentioning all this because I believe it should be on the record, not least because of the very different approaches to male and female genital mutilation.
>
> The Government said back in 2016 that they had no current plans to change the law in relation to male circumcision. Given everything I have said, there may be no need to change the law to bring about a change in male circumcisions. However, I would be particularly interested to hear from the Minister on that point.

Now the illegality of MGM is on the official parliamentary record, for the first time. Our thanks to Philip Davies, whose courage knows no bounds.

Is feminism really dying?

A Voice For Men Videos · 20 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Paul’s ICMI’16 Speech on Gynocentrism

A Voice For Men Videos · 20 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A miscarriage of justice? Interview of Sean Bw Parker, convicted during #MeToo.

A Voice For Men Videos · 21 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Piano Guys – Merry Christmas!

A Voice For Men Videos · 25 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist resurrection

A Voice For Men Videos · 28 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Goal Post episode 10

A Voice For Men Videos · 31 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Alon Sivroni protests against genital mutilation in Israel

A Voice For Men Videos · 1 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The Goal Post episode 11

A Voice For Men Videos · 1 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

How to tame men

Peter Wright · 1 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Horses, dogs and men have one thing in common; they need training in order to shed their wild ways and become civilized. They need to be taught when to walk, run, sit, shit, play, work and, of course, when to cease fighting and attempting rape.

Women will do this for them.

From the pony club to the dog obedience class, and all the way through to wedding and relationship-advice magazines teaching "How to get him to do xyz," – women dominate the field of animal training.

Starting in childhood, girls are educated in the Pavlovian school of human interactions, learning sexual manipulation, shaming and relational aggression as powerful techniques that if properly applied will help transform men, and even the baddest of badboys, into proverbial Good Men.™ Is it any wonder then that when a woman sees a badboy she sees a creature with 'train me' written across his forehead, a task for which her whole life has been but a preparation….. a lady won't tolerate a feral animal wandering through the gynosphere, especially a handsome one, when she has the wherewithal to civilize him.

Lets take a little excursion through the history of taming.

Ancient Greece

Marriage is a particularly useful method by which men are tamed, so it's no surprise that the institution has been around for thousands of years. Hera, the Ancient Greek goddess of marriage was nicknamed 'The Tamer.' She tamed horses, men and heroes and in some places was recognized as the tamer of the seasons, of nature, or of the universe itself.

Hera's goal was to limit wildness and freedom by placing all creatures in service of civilized society. Her main tools-for-taming were the entrapment of men and women in marriage, the use of her own sexuality as an enticement for conformity, shaming, and aggressive punishment of any rebellious behaviours – even for her lordly husband Zeus: "Hera's cruel rage tamed him."[1]

Hera was worshipped as 'Goddess of the yoke,' an enslaving device symbolizing her desire to make utilities out of beasts and men. She yoked obedient men to wives, and yoked heroes to an inevitable death through their performance of labours that bring betterment to women and society.

In the Illiad Hera is said to tame heroes through death, not marriage. Death through service to others was considered -and is still considered- something appropriate for males and for their own good. In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell recounts a Greek story which illustrates the problem:

> The Hero As Slave:
>
>
>
> Once upon a time, a mother who wanted to see the beautiful statue of Hera had no oxes or horses to carry her there. But she did have two sons. And the sons wanted more than anything to make their mother's wish come true. They volunteered to yoke themselves to a cart and take her over the mountains in the scorching heat to > the faraway village of Argos, the home of the statue of Hera (the wife of Zeus). Upon their arrival in Argos, the sons were cheered and statues (that can be found to this day) were built in their honor. Their mother prayed that Hera give her sons the best gift in her power. Hera did that. The boys died. The traditional interpretation? The best thing that can happen to a man is to die at the height of his glory and power. Yet had this been a myth of two daughters who had substituted themselves for oxen to carry their father somewhere, would we have interpreted the daughters' deaths as proof that the best thing that can happen to a woman is to die at the height of her glory and power? The statues and cheers can be seen as bribes for the sons to value their lives less than their mother's request to view a statue. The fact that the statue was of Hera, the queen of the Olympian gods and protector of married women is symbolic. The sons' sacrifice symbolized the mandate for men to become strong enough to serve the needs of mothers and marriage, and to be willing to call it glory if they died in the process. Which is why the name Hercules means "for the glory of Hera".[2]

Yes these are myths, but on this topic life had a way of imitating art. Those who wrote the stories were drawing on experience to some extent, and married couples re-enacted the selfsame rituals of Hera and Zeus. In the marriage month (Gamelion) the mythical marriage of Hera and Zeus was reenacted and celebrated with public festivities, a time when many couples would get married in imitation of the divine couple. On these occasions prayers and offerings were given to Hera, and the bride would pledge fidelity to extending Hera's dominion on earth.

Women of Ancient Greece were considered, along with men, to be uncivilized and in need of taming for the greater good of society. Both sexes required a reconstruction in character and a submission to social responsibilities. Such was also the case in the Near East where an emerging Christian culture claimed that men and women were made of flawed stuff; women were born in original sin with Eve, sinful to the core, and were encouraged to aspire to the status of the holy and pure Virgin Mary. Likewise men were born in original sin and invited to improve their condition with an de imitatione Christi, an imitation of Christ in order to bleach the stains from their imperfect souls.

While men and women in ancient times possessed equality in the depravity stakes, this was all to change in the Middle ages.

Middle Ages

Fast forward to medieval times and we see a continuation of the desire to civilize human behaviour, except this time women are exempt from the taming to which the classical age subjected both sexes. By dint of a peculiar intersection of social beliefs, women came to be viewed as perfected from birth – due largely to the fact that veneration of the Virgin Mary became amplified in the eleventh century and, by extension, the reverence bestowed upon the Virgin was extended to the female sex in general. As Mary was perfect, so too became women.

No longer like the Biblical Eve striving to imitate the Mother of Christ, woman becomes Mary's counterpart on earth, and thus the cult of the "lady" is born as a mirror of the cult of the Virgin. Men for their part remain in a thoroughly fallen state like Adam while striving to imitate Jesus – knowing full well they will fall short of the goal. To enjoy the company of a lady a man must now prove himself worthy of her and so advance upward, step by step, toward a culminating union at her level; because everything noble and virtuous, everything that makes life worth living, proceeds from women, who are even described as the source of goodness itself.[3]

Mediaeval image of a woman leading a man with a leash.

With the advent of women becoming men's moral superiors, it's here that men become the servants of women proper. It's here also that the reciprocal service previously entertained between the sexes begins its gradual decline in favour of gynocentrism. As the faithful owed obeisance to The Virgin, henceforth man must render his obeisance to the Virgin's earthly counterparts. Over the subsequent 100 years women even came to be viewed through the lens of the feudal contract whereby she became his overlord (midons), and he the vassal in dutiful service. It would be woman whose role it became to civilize the depraved, fallen creature called man by teaching him the gynocentric virtues of chivalry and courtly love.

Contemporary attitudes

Contemporary perspectives about civilizing males are divided between two superficially opposed camps – traditionalist women, and progressive feminists. I say superficially opposed because when the goals of both groups are compared they amount to exactly the same thing: the belief that morally superior women should enculture men into the arts of chivalry and gentlemanliness for the benefit of women.

Lifelong feminist and former National Organization for Women member, Tammy Bruce, has articulated what she feels is the time-honoured power of women; of being morally superior to men which includes the feminist responsibility to civilizing men's animalistic tendencies:

Nothing new under the sun, hey?

Another feminist, Christina Hoff-Sommers agrees with this idea that men need to be civilized with chivalric manners, a belief she outlined in an interview with Emily Esfahani Smith, where she said, "Masculinity with morality and civility is a very powerful force for good. But masculinity without these virtues is dangerous—even lethal." "Chivalry is grounded in a fundamental reality that defines the relationship between the sexes," explained Sommers, "and given that most men are physically stronger than most women, men can overpower women at any time to get what they want." "If women give up on chivalry, it will be gone," continued Sommers. "If boys can get away with being boorish, they will, happily. Women will pay the price."[4]

Sommers elaborates her view in a 2009 interview with Ben Domenech:

> Christina Hoff-Sommers: Codes of gallantry and civility that developed over the centuries have served women very well. We badly need more of that male gallantry, but I hasten to say it's a reciprocal system. If males are going to be gallant then women also have a role to play. So today I think both sexes are remiss in nurturing this system.
>
> Ben Domenech: What in this era of post feminism that we live in today relationally would be the possible > incentive for any man to be gallant when there doesn't seem to be any > particular reason that he has to be in order to function within today's relationship world?

>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: It's an interesting question because one of the things you find today is that most young men are gallant, and they are respectful, at least they are struggling to be. When I interview young men I ask them if they think it's a good thing to be a gentleman and almost all of them say yes- that word gentleman has a positive resonance with young men. Now, do they know how to be gentlemen, do they know what it entails? Many do not. And same with some young women, they are not necessarily behaving like ladies. So there's a lot of misunderstanding and lack of, perhaps, motivation. But it's still alive in people. I think still on a typical date a young man would pay for his date – it doesn't always happen in which case a girl would be resentful, and I can understand that…. These are gestures, I'm talking about certain gestures of respect – they need to be there and I think most women want them and I think men do too.
>
> Ben Domenech: So why is that important – and I don't just mean that in the sense of continuing a relationship but in the larger sense of the term, and this is a frame that I have to ask you about: if the incentive there is a relationship that is going to lead to something, does it matter that the something is beyond the typical aspirations of today's men and women which seems to be more along the lines of a sex based relationship as opposed to one that actually has a longer term value beyond that prognosis.
>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: I think human beings at some point in their lives want something beyond a sex based relation. If you are going to build a relationship with someone it has been the case that women are going to be more likely to want to stay home and take care of the children, or certainly be more focused on that than the men, and I don't see that changing.
>
> Ben Domenech: As a single dating male in today's environment there's a much lower bar that they have to clear, frankly, in order to bounce around the relationship scene with a good deal of happiness, at least in the temporary sense.
>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: Oh I have to agree, and I think in a way women sort of undid the social contract with men and released them from all the constraints. And we pay the price.[5]

For the sake of argument, and in order to demonstrate that progressive gynocentrism and traditionalist gynocentrism are both chasing male-only chivalry, here is a recent 'tradition-advocating' article by antifeminist Patrice Lewis that appears strikingly similar to the progressive model offered above by Bruce and Hoff-Sommers:

> I admire men.
>
> Specifically, I admire men who are controlled, confident and who fulfill their biological destiny as protectors and providers. Men are essential for training boys to tame the testosterone and channel their natural strengths and aggressiveness in appropriate ways. Trained men are, in the words of columnist Dennis Prager, the glory of civilization. (It goes without saying that untrained men are its scourge, but that's another column.)

Men – trained, manly men – are necessary for a balanced society. They take on the tough ugly hard jobs women can't or won't do. They mine our coal and fight our fires and protect our shores and fix our engines and rescue our butts when we're in danger. They truck our goods and clean our pipes and wire our homes. They plow fields and grow food. They butcher livestock so we can buy meat in tidy sanitized packages in the grocery store and pretend it never came from a cow.

I'm not saying women can't be found in those fields; but let's be honest: The vast majority of workers in hard, dangerous, dirty and heavy fields are men. They deserve our praise and gratitude.

Which is why I get so ticked off when feminists belittle men. These kinds of women don't admire manly men who protect and provide. Feminists don't want warriors; they want servants who will kowtow to their emotions and feeeeeeelings. They prefer emasculated androgynous guys who wouldn't know one end of a rifle from the other. Guys who watch chick flicks with them. Guys who know what temperature to wash the dainties. Guys who are preoccupied with "social justice" and bringing their carbon footprint down to zero.[6]

Lewis's argument above that boys are juicing with testosterone and need "taming" reveals an unbroken, and mythical conception of men stemming from ancient times – and it is wrong. Men are not born as wild animals in a testosterone-fuelled psychosis waiting to tear people limb from limb. We need not buy our sons punching bags nor insert them into football training from 2 years of age to channel some androgen-fuelled chaos (doing it for fun, though, is another reason). The claim that men are unclean, bestial creatures in need of taming is not only false – it is extreme misandry and it needs to be challenged head on with each bigot who perpetuates it.

The above survey of man-taming by women spanning all the way from Ancient Greece, and through progressive feminism to regressive traditionalism, shows what we are up against. Nothing whatsoever has changed; chivalric servitude of men, trained into them by women (yes and by men), remains the order of the day. The one timeless voice echoing through all this is the monomyth of the animal-trainer – womankind and her pussy whip.

With the continuing encouragement of women to be slavemasters, and their enthusiasm to take on the role, is it any surprise that the majority of horse and dog training schools – obedience classes – are peopled by women? That so many little girls desire to possess their own pony is a no-brainer, and it's time we woke up to what this expensive little pastime symbolizes – the racing of horses may be the sport of Kings, but training of ponies is for the delight of princesses.

In a modern 'enlightened' society it's high time to ditch the idea that males, and only males, need taming. Lets instead rely on men's natural human empathy, a thing that exists in both sexes before the training begins. If you see a baby boy begin crying after he hears another baby crying nearby, it's a demonstration of empathy that is there from the start.[7] Like girls, boys develop mirror neurons which predispose them to be caring as they develop – we don't need to see them as heartless beasts in need of taming, curtailing or genitally maiming. So let's cease with the gynocentric boot-camp for males; they are already trained from the start by their own good natures – yes, men are good.

Sources:

[1] Joan O'Brien, 'The Tamer of Heroes and Horses,' Chapter 6E in The Transformation of Hera, Rowman and Littlefield, (1993)
[2] Warren Farrell, The Myth of Male Power, Simon and Schuster, (1993)
[3] Irving Singer, Love: Courtly and Romatic, UCP, 1984
[4] Emily Esfahani Smith, 'Let's Give Chivalry Another Chance' The Atlantic, Dec 10 2012
[5] Interview with Christina Hoff-Sommers, "The Acculturated Podcast: Ladies and Gentlemen" 2009
[6] Patrice Lewis, 'Feminism Has Slain Our Protectors,' WND, 09/12/2014
[7] Daniel Goleman, Researchers Trace Empathy's Roots to Infancy, New York Times, 1989

Amazon book titles for women

The Red Pill Raw Files – How did the Men's Rights Movement begin? – Michael Messner

A Voice For Men Videos · 3 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Defining fascism

Robert Brockway · 3 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

From time to time MRAs, others in the manosphere, and supporters are called fascists.

The term Fascist is notoriously difficult to define. Two definitions, narrow and broad are offered here and it is proposed that any reasonable definition must be bounded by these two.

Narrow

The narrowest possible definition is membership in the Italian National Fascist Party. Using this definition the ideology of Fascism is easy to define because it can be found in the manifesto of the party.

Broad

Most broadly a fascist could be seen to be an adherent to Italian fascism, Nazism, the ideology of Francisco Franco in Spain, or someone that seeks to re-establish a very similar system. In this context fascism can be seen as nationalist, dictatorial and corporatist. Fascists argue that democracy is fundamentally flawed and doomed to fail. Unlike communists and socialists, fascists do not seek to nationalise industry, preferring for private enterprise to continue to operate. Fascists do expect, however, that private enterprise be entirely subordinate to the state and support state initiatives.

Even the broadest possible definition of fascism does not intrinsically include opposition to immigration or xenophobia since these were no more prevalent in Fascist Italy or Spain under Franco than contemporary states. Benito Mussolini did eventually start persecuting Jews in Italy but only did so under pressure from Adolf Hitler.

Nor does the broadest possible definition of fascism include an aggressive foreign policy since Fascist Italy's attempts to expand were modest for the time, and Franco's Spain made no attempt to expand at all.

Conclusions

Definitions broader than the broad definition above are meaningless.

Some may disagree with the inclusion of Spain under Franco as a fascist state. The aim here is to produce as broad a definition of fascism as possible that is still meaningful. This demonstrates that the definition of fascism falls far short of the manner in which the term is used today.

Even if Spain under Franco was fascist, no fascist state has lasted more than a few decades so the long term prospects for such a system remain untested.

We may yet see the re-emergence of fascism in the 21st century but it won't be coming from the manosphere.

Why boys need great male role models

Andrew Donovan · 4 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Here are some facts:

1. In the USA, 25% of all children are in a single-parent household.
2. 72% of all black children are raised in single-parent households.
3. Of single-parent families, 83% of children live with their mother and 17% live with their father.
4. 49% of single mothers have never married.

And here is my working thesis:

Our boys are in trouble due to the lack of positive male leadership they have in their lives.

It's only after a conversation with a friend about how far we've progressed in our manhood that I realized how lucky I am to be where I am in life.

I was a delinquent teenager. For years I couldn't stand my father. I loved booze and girls and getting into fights, and I had a weapon drawn on me on more than one occasion despite living in one of the nation's safest towns. I was heading down a bad path.

I had an intact family. On paper. A mom and a dad that cared about a sister that I perpetually fought with and me. We had nice family portraits and the like but no real adhesive that bonded us all together.

Things have changed since then. My parents split, and my sister and I have moved out and made something of ourselves and, ironically, we're all closer than we ever have been. But I know now just how different my present could look if I didn't become so set on becoming a man in my own right.

"Boys are more likely to achieve if they have emotionally healthy achieving men to look up to. Dads are the best role models, as long as they give their sons healthy messages and take the time to be with them," writes Sylvia Rimm, an American psychologist specializing in parenting, child development, and learning.

"When good dads aren't around, moms and teachers need to search elsewhere…mothers can also be effective role models and mentors to boys, but they are likely to be more acceptable to boys if men in the environment validate them. That happens because boys seem to have a need to reassure themselves of their own masculinity."

Bingo. Boys and men absolutely have a need to reassure ourselves of our masculinity. For some of us, the reassurance comes through intellect, for others, physicality. The bottom line is men thrive when competing against one another. It's why we landed on the moon and broke the four-minute mile.

This leads us to our current state of cultural and societal disarray. We're in a world where youth sports leagues are slowly doing away with keeping score, where all physicality is being banned from schoolyards, where male aggression is being medicated and where roughly 85% of elementary school teachers are women. Where and when is a boy supposed to explore his masculinity? Satiate his craving for competition?

As I said, I was one of the lucky ones. I had the benefit of being an excellent athlete and I captained my high school's baseball and football team in my senior year. I also had teachers, specifically two male teachers, who cared. They saw I had a penchant for writing and forced me to succeed. I highly doubt I'd have ever gone to university had those two not made themselves an important part of my high school education.

But I look around and can't help but feel that many boys growing up in 2016 won't have the same luck I did.

As I write this, a five-year-old boy and his twin sister – they're my neighbors – are outside riding their bikes, playing in the dirt and picking up toads in the garden. They're great kids, and I've gotten to know them and their mother quite well over the past few months.

Their father is more or less non-existent. He's in and out of jail. He promises them he's going to pick them up from school and then never shows. When he does show, he's distant. I've never seen him give his kids a proper hug.

Knowing that they don't play any organized sports and that they attend an average Canadian public school, which is dominated by female teachers, these kids have very little in the way of positive male role models in their lives. This is going to affect both of them negatively, but the young boy will feel the brunt of not having a father-figure around because males are far more likely to fall into drugs, gangs, and homelessness than females.

So I go outside and play catch with them and talk with them and help their mom set up a hammock in the front yard. And in return, they bring me snacks, smiles, hugs and a sense of gratitude that's so unique to children.

I don't know how to fix the lack of great male role models. Maybe we need to encourage more young men to get into teaching or starting after school programs. Maybe it's just a matter of getting to know your neighbors. Or maybe I am approaching a 21st-century problem from a 20th-century angle. Perhaps the next great male role models are already out there on YouTube and Facebook. After all, that's where I found many of my role models.

Regardless, parents and educators need to take a look at the numbers and the facts: kids – particularly young boys – need good men in their life and those men have to challenge them, and they have to be dependent. If we raise good boys, we raise good fathers and if that should happen, then maybe then we can start remedying the dysfunctional mess that is the modern family.

Pink Boot Brewing

Doug Mortimer · 5 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The Public Broadcasting Service has been around for decades. Now the PBS acronym has competition, though the new organization is a kindred spirit. The newest acronym stands for the Pink Boots Society. You might think this is some sort of association for girly dominatrices, but you would be wrong.

The Pink Boots Society was founded by brewmaster Teri Fahrendorf in 2008. One wonders if there is a movement afoot to ditch the word "brewmaster," just as "master bedroom" fell into disfavor because it reeks of patriarchy. I suspect the only holdup is the industry hasn't come up with a suitable substitute yet. Hey, how about uberbrewer? Just a suggestion. Fahrendorf also founded a women's beer appreciation society with the clever name of Barley's Angels.

According to the PBS website, their mission statement reads, "We are here to ASSIST, INSPIRE & ENCOURAGE women and non-binary individuals in the fermented/alcoholic beverage industry through EDUCATION." Surely, the inclusion of non-binary individuals was not in the original manifesto in 2008. I doubt that normal heterosexual women are all that thrilled about being lumped in with the non-binary crowd, those who are betwixt and between…or is it betwixt, bothered, and bewildered?

The mission statement sounds as though it was cobbled together by a PR flack working in concert with a corporate boardroom. In fact, it could serve as a template. Just swap out "fermented/alcoholic beverage" for any other product and it works very well for any women's/non-binary advocacy group.

Of course, we've been down this road before. The people in such-and-such group are not only equal but special. The initial push for equality morphs into a plea for special treatment and results in the creation of another protected class. If you are not a member of said class, not supporting it is unthinkable.

Making better and better products at lower and lower prices and employing more and more people used to be enough of a contribution to society for a business. Today it is insufficient. One must also go to the mat to take on the bugaboos of the day…racism, sexism, colonialism, climate change, etc., plus whatever cause célèbre may pop up down the road – and one must shout it from the rooftops so people can see it on their laptops.

The stereotyped sentiments in the PBS manifesto should not be surprising as the craft beer industry has become more and more corporate. In fact, a number of once-independent breweries (e.g., Ballast Point, Goose Island, Karbach, Redhook) are now part of corporate conglomerates. So brewers are now jumping on the DEI bandwagon. Hence the relevance of taking a philo-feminist stance.

Typically, most craft brewers, male or female, started out as home brewers. Over time, they acquired more sophisticated equipment and know-how, and the itch to ditch the day job grew stronger. Hence the craft beer explosion of recent decades and the most successful craft breweries being targeted for corporate acquisition.

As is the case with a growth industry, associations and acronyms proliferate. Consider the BRU (Brewing, Respect, Unity) coalition. It is composed of the ASBC (American Society of Brewing Chemists), the BA (Brewers Association), the MBAA (Master Brewers Association of America, and the Cicerone Certification Program. No acronym for the last one, possibly because they don't want to be mistaken for the Chinese Communist Party.

Nevertheless, most craft breweries remain small businesses. Mom-and-pop – or husband-and-wife – operations are common. As taprooms have grown from bare-bones operations to hip, trendy places to hang out, women employees have become common. They are not as conspicuous as men, however, particularly at the upper echelons. When craft beer was a minuscule part of the brewing industry, no one was particularly concerned about female empowerment. Now that craft beer accounts for a significant portion of (26.8%) of beer sales , women's groups have begun to pay attention.

"Male-dominated" is a compound adjective that frequently appears in articles about the craft beer industry. In truth, only 2% of breweries in the US are female-owned. Nevertheless, I think the phrase "male-dominated" qualifies as a dog whistle. It is not just a compound adjective, it is a call to action to correct a grievous inequity. One might respond that women already have soap operas, why can't they leave the suds to men?

Indeed, men are predominant in brewing, but the same is true of consumption. In a study of drinking habits from 2010 to 2016, 54% of men identified beer as their adult beverage of choice. At the same time, only 23% of women agreed. More recent surveys indicate that the female share has edged up slightly, but men still hold a commanding lead.

Typically, beer advertising has been aimed at men. When women appear in beer commercials, they are typically paired off with men or function as eyeball candy to rivet the male gaze. The motive is to subliminally implant the concept that drinking Brand X beer will make a man more attractive to a sexy woman. Beer advertisements aimed exclusively at women are rare. Ironically, in the ancient world there were a number of goddesses devoted to beer (e.g., Sumeria's Ninkasi, Egypt's Tenenet, and the Celts' Dea Latis).

While beer may not be the beverage of choice among most contemporary women, brewing beer, like cooking, used to be women's work. As any beer geek can tell you, women, known as alewives or brewsters, were common in days of old. Leftover beer was made available to the public, who gathered in the alewife's home. Over time the public house or pub became a fixture in the village.

As with home brewers today, the beer was brewed in small quantities. Before refrigeration it was not feasible to ship beer great distances, and large-volume brewing was not done in any volume till the industrial revolution, which was almost exclusively led by men. In a sense, by bringing women back into the picture, the Pink Boots Society is attempting to turn back the clock, which is usually taboo in progressive circles. If you tried to bring back the ducking stool, for example, you would meet with universal opprobrium.

The B in the PBS name derives from the fact that boots are a key element in any brewer's wardrobe. If you ever take a tour of a brewery, you will likely see employees wearing boots worthy of a New England lobsterman…pardon me, lobsterperson. This is because water, beer, or both are frequently sloshing around on the floor of the brewery. Also, a boot is a beer-drinking vessel – not a leather boot but a glass container shaped like a boot, and available in generous sizes, usually a liter.

So "boot" is an entirely appropriate word for any sort of brewing association. It is, of course, amusing to see how the color pink is employed by the female empowerment tribe. Remember when the color pink was anathema because it was a form of sexual stereotyping? Pink booties for baby girls! The horror! But pink boots for adult female brewers? Hey, as long as it's their idea, it's kosher. Well, a number of pubs offer green beer on St. Patricks' Day, so maybe one fine day you'll be able to drink pink beer on International Women's Day! There are 77 chapters of the Pink Boots Society in the United States and in 7 foreign countries so it may come to pass.

The Pink Boots Society started up when companies were starting to grandstand about Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion, even though DEI wasn't an acronym. Consequently, PBS attracted the attention of a number of suppliers (hops, yeast, and barley are essential) who became sponsors. One name familiar to consumers is Blue Moon beer, yet another corporate-owned (Molson Coors) craft brewery. Curiously, the brewery is located in Denver's RiNo District, which may or may not have political significance.

A big part of the Pink Boots operation is the annual Pink Boots Blend contest, now in its sixth annual iteration. The Blend refers to a beer brewed with an assortment of hops that varies from year to year. So the Pink Boots Blend goes on year after year, but it is not the same beer. This is not unusual in the world of craft beer. Famously, San Francisco's Anchor Brewing has offered a different Christmas ale every year since 1975!

Of course, as with any contest, there are rules for the annual collaboration. Among them, "a majority of the participants on the team must be women, preferably each team is led by a woman." Hmmm, should have seen that coming, given the fact that all 10 members of the PBS Board of Directors are women (of course, some may be trans…can't tell from the name). Wonder what would happen if some men in drag decided to enter the contest.

Great Western Malting (the current employer of Teri Farhrenkopf) is one sponsor. Yakima Chief Hops is another. According to the Yakima web site, their blend of hops this year "will result in fantastic beer and, best of all…women and non-binary empowerment & community!" Wow! And you thought you were just buying a pint of beer! Now you can feel good about yourself even if you're an alcoholic!

You might think that Yakima Chief would be a problematic appellation in some circles, and the company took some heat because they used to employ Indian imagery in their logo. The company responded by deep-sixing the logo and hiring Ted Strong, a member of the Yakama Nation, as Vice President of Corporate Responsibility. (The Y-A-K-A-M-A spelling was adopted by the tribe to more closely reflect how the word is pronounced in their language.)

You may not be familiar with Yakima Chief Hops, but you have likely heard of Yuengling Beer. America's Oldest Brewery (dating back to 1829) is working with PBS in co-sponsoring a $5,000 scholarship for "exceptional women and/or non-binary individuals." It might surprise some people to find out that a number of colleges are now offering courses in brewing. As the craft beer industry grows, credentialism becomes more and more important. The quest to become a cicerone, a certified beer expert, requires an investment of time as well as money, particularly if one seeks the highest certification (level one is certified beer server; level two is certified cicerone, level three is advanced cicerone, and level four is master cicerone).

Yuengling's presence adds some establishment cred to what might be perceived as just another social justice advocacy group. You might think Yuengling would be an unlikely supporter of the Pink Boots Society. After all, as recently as 2016, President Dick Yuengling's show of support for Donald Trump inspired cries for a boycott from the usual suspects. Has President Yuengling had a change of heart? Probably not, but he does have four daughters set to take over the family business. Need I say more?

"Woman-owned" is now a common promotional catchphrase in femme small business circles, and for all I know may already be in use at some breweries owned by females. The 21st Amendment (commemorating the repeal of Prohibition) Brewery in San Francisco, is already a PBS scholarship sponsor, so perhaps one day we will have a 19th Amendment (which gave women the right to vote) Brewery as a sponsor. Tennessee Brew Works in Nashville has already offered Persistence Peach Ale commemorating the amendment (Tennessee was the 36th state to ratify the amendment, thus ushering it across the finish line). Considering the links between suffragettes and the temperance movement, any association with the19th Amendment is more than a tad ironic.

Speaking of the 19th Amendment, the rollout date for the Pink Boots Blend is March 8th, or International Women's Day. Given the free enterprise spirit that has characterized the craft beer movement, that March 8th date is also more than a tad ironic, as the idea of an International Women's Day originated in the mind of a communist agitator called Clara Zetkin in 1908. The March 8th date was selected because it was the anniversary of the "mostly peaceful" Women's Strike in 1917 in Petrograd or present-day St. Petersburg. While not specifically communist in origin, it persuaded Tsar Nicholas to abdicate a few days later. Then in November the Bolsheviks took over. They were zealots on a number of issues but free enterprise was not one of them.

The Pink Boots Society, however, has no qualms about making a buck, as the merch on its internet site indicates. If you've ever been inside the team shop at a stadium or arena, the lineup will be quite familiar…caps, T-shirts, hoodies, sweatshirts, tank tops. The outlier is the flannel shirt, which may be a nod to hipster attire…or perhaps lesbian sensibilities…or both. Steel-toed pink boots, however, are a fashion statement waiting to happen.

Despite all of the above, I don't want you to think I am boycotting woman-brewed beer. I've had good beers brewed by women before and I'll have good beer brewed by women in the future. Unless a brewery browbeats you with hackneyed mission statements and trendy political stances, I would not discourage you from visiting it.

A word of advice, however: don't make any jokes about witch's brew or yeast infections.

Misogamy and Marriage Avoidance

Peter Wright · 6 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

misogamy [mi-sog-uh-mee, mahy-] SHOW IPA

SEE SYNONYMS FOR misogamy ON THESAURUS.COM

noun

1 hatred of marriage.

While it may seem like a modern topic, the burning question of whether men should marry or more to the point not marry, is centuries old. That men are rejecting marriage in increasing numbers is well documented, however cynicism about the virtues of marriage is nothing new.

Numerous scholarly books such as Howard Chudacoff's Age Of The Bachelor, or J. McCurdy's Citizen Bachelors have traced the historical rise of bachelor movements, which tend to occur when a given society sufficiently devalues men while saddling them with unreasonable demands of service to wives and the State. When societies treat males more favourably, then bachelor movements organically decline.

I recently chanced upon another book outlining the deeper history of 'marriage avoidance' under the heading the querelle du mariage (quarrel about marriage). The following excerpt provides some interesting detail:

The early manifestations of the quarrel often focus on marriage, one of the pressing problems of the late Middle Ages and the early modern period: An uxor sit ducenda (Should One Take a Wife) was a question much discussed by Italian men, and in Germany it could appear as Ob einem manne sey zu nemen ein eelichs weyb oder nit (Should a Man Take a Wife or Not? – Albrecht von Eyb, 1472). In answer to this question, male misogamy (hatred of marriage) is expressed as misogyny (hatred of women) and philogyny (love of women) is expressed as philogamy (love of marriage).

Christine de Pizan's praise of women was directed against the misogamists and misogynists of her time, the anonymous text Les quinze joies de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage) deplored the loss of male liberty in marriage, and a century later Erasmus of Rotterdam presented the misogamist virgin in his Virgo misogamos (The Misogamist Virgin – 1523), who desperately wants to enter a convent but inspired by love she thinks better of it at the last moment. Philogynous texts questioned why women were punished more strictly for adultery than men or why a husband had to be brought (by a dowry); misogamists and misogynists, eg. In England, answered the question by stating that women tend to squeeze money out of their husbands.

In Germany this aspect of the querelle has been largely ignored (interest has focused on voices which argued in favor of women's intelligence and reason), although the querelle du mariage played an important role here: the wide-ranging marriage debate during the Reformation, in particular in its sensational and scandalous early phases – public betrothals of monks and nuns, closures of monasteries and convents, an epidemic of marriages in Germany to which even French reformers travelled who wished to marry – must be read as an integral part of the European querelle des sexes and the same goes for the marriage debates of the Counter-Reformation. Martin Luther's Von chelichen Leben (The Estate of Married Life – 1522) speaks quite in the manner of a querelle text by turning against the traditional misogamist attitude:

> "What we would speak most of is the fact that the estate of marriage has universally fallen into such awful disrepute. There are many pagan books which treat of nothing but the depravity of womankind and the > unhappiness of the estate of marriage […]. So they [young men listening to the advice of a Roman official] concluded that woman is a necessary evil, and that no household can be without such an evil. […] For this reason young men should be on their guard when they read pagan books and hear the common complaints about marriage, lest they inhale poison . For the estate of marriage does not sell well with the devil, because it is God's good will and work. This is why the devil has contrived to have so much shouted and written in the world against the institution of marriage […]. The world says of marriage, 'Brief is the joy, lasting the bitterness."[2]

* * *

I've long wondered what form male activism might have taken in response to the excesses of historical European and Anglosphere gynocentrism. From the above description, and from the many anti-marriage texts abounding through old Europe, it's clear that a historical form of men's rights advocacy concerned itself with the dangers of entrapment within marriage.

Eating MGTOW: She's toast

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 7 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Talk to nearly any feminist and you soon get the impression that men like nothing better than to return home from a hard day's work, kick the dog, slap the kids, and beat the wife who was far too busy watching Oprah while the kids were in school to have his dinner ready on time. But for those feminist-defying men with the audacity to risk accusations of misogyny because they have refused to waste their hard-earned cash by spending it on the latest whims of their favorite Disney princess and have instead gone their own way, allow me to present you something better.

"She's Toast" is my variation on traditional French toast that most certainly can and should be done your own way whether that way tends more towards health consciousness or decadence. I like to begin by baking my own bread (recipe to follow), but store bought is just fine. Do it your own way, start with your favorite bread.

She's Toast

- 1-2 slices bread (heartier, whole or multi-grain breads work best, as do thicker slices)
- 2 eggs, (or liquid egg substitute)
- 2 Tbsps milk (whole, low-fat, or nonfat)
- 1 tsp sweetener (table sugar, sucralose, stevia, etc.)
- Dash each nutmeg and/or cinnamon

Spray a non-stick skillet with cooking spray, then warm on medium heat.

Beat the eggs, milk, sweetener, and spices with a whisk or fork in a flat-bottomed dish barely large enough to lay a piece of bread in the bottom.

Place a slice of bread into the egg mixture, flip and allow it to absorb some of the mixture. Place the bread in the skillet.

Repeat with the other slice of bread.

Allow the bread to brown on the bottom, being careful not to burn it.

Flip it over. It is done when both sides are lightly browned. The bread should still be moist, but no liquid should be oozing out when cut.

Topping with butter and maple syrup is traditional, but use your imagination or one of my suggested topping below.

For an even simpler version try just putting the bread into a toaster and forget the other ingredients. Yes, at that point it is just toast but with the right toppings, even plain toast can be quite tasty.

Suggested Toppings

I often begin with a base of dairy such as butter, cream cheese, or Greek yogurt. Peanut or other nut butter is also good. For a healthier version try low-fat cream cheese or non-fat Greek yogurt sweetened with Splenda or Stevia. Top the base with your favorite jelly, jam, honey, molasses, fresh berries, or other soft fruit (like bananas or mangos).

For extreme decadence top it with a large scoop (or two) of your favorite ice cream, drizzle it with chocolate, butterscotch, caramel syrup, or hot fudge. Smother it with whipped cream and sprinkle on some chopped nuts or crumbled candy bars, Reese's pieces or M&M's.

For a more savory meal I omit the spices, smear it with a bit of Dijon mustard, melt a slice of cheese on top (I like Swiss, Havarti, or pepper jack), a couple of strips of bacon, smoked salmon, or sliced tomato, and finish it with an egg (I prefer over easy because the runny yolk becomes a sauce). Add a couple of avocado slices for garnish. I've even served it as an open-faced hamburger topped with mushroom gravy.

My Way Multi-grain Bread

- 2 cups strong coffee cooled to room temperature (other thin liquids can be used such as water, milk, and/or juice)
- 1 Tbsp or 1 packet bread yeast
- ½ cup sweetener (Sugar, brown sugar, sucralose, and/or Stevia) (amount can be adjusted for taste)
- 1 cup old-fashioned oats
- ½ tsp Kosher salt
- 1 cup bread flour (You could use all whole wheat, but the texture is better this way)
- 2 ½ cups whole wheat flour

Optional Ingredients

I almost always add the nuts and fruit, but occasionally some of the other stuff.

- 1 cup cooked whole grain (brown rice, quinoa, buckwheat, wheat berries, barley, etc.)
- 1 cup chopped or crushed nuts (I prefer pecans, but walnuts are also good)
- 1 cup dried fruit cut into raisin sized pieces (raisins, prunes, cranberries, apricots, mangos, dates, figs)
- 1 oz molasses (enhances the coffee flavor)
- 1 Tbsp olive oil (helps texture and moisture)
- 1-2 Tbsp small seeds (flax, sesame, chia, etc.)

I use a KitchenAid Heavy Duty stand mixer because it is powerful enough to knead bread dough and makes it so much easier, but this can be done entirely by hand, in a food processor, or bread machine (though I don't recommend baking bread in the machine).

Proof the yeast in the bottom of the mixing bowl for 5-10 minutes in the coffee, sweetener, and oats (This allows the yeast to dissolve and become active and the oats to absorb some moisture).

Once the yeast is active you will see lots of foam floating on top.

Add the rest of the ingredients (hold back ½ cup whole wheat flour) and mix slowly on the lowest speed to prevent the flour from flying out of the bowl and creating a huge mess.

Once the dough begins to form a ball, stop and check the dough for moisture content. The dough should feel slightly sticky, but shouldn't stick to the sides of the bowl or your fingers when you handle it.

Add the remaining flour in 2-3 additions until it feels just right.[1]

Continue kneading for five minutes (you may need to adjust this if you aren't using a mixer). Do not over-knead as the dough may become tough.

When the kneading is finished, remove the dough from the bowl and shape it into a ball. Return it to the mixing bowl, spray it lightly with cooking spray to keep it from drying out.

Cover it with a clean towel and set aside in a warm place. Allow the dough to rise until it doubles in volume. Depending on temperature and moisture content this could take an hour or two. Be patient.

I like to use a well-seasoned cast iron loaf pan because it heats more evenly, but any loaf pan will do. Just spray it lightly with oil.

When the dough is risen, remove it from the mixing bowl by turning it out onto a lightly floured cutting board (you may not need any flour if the dough isn't sticky).

The ball will deflate. Work the dough by turning it in on itself a couple of times.

Gently roll it around the cutting board to a ball, then work the shape into a log the same size as your loaf pan. The dough should nearly fill the pan.

Push it around a little to even it out. Spray it lightly with cooking spray and cover it once again with the towel.

Allow it to rise for about an hour. Pre-heat the oven to 350 degrees F while the dough is rising.

Once the dough has risen an inch or so above the top of the pan and looks more like a bread loaf, place it in the oven and bake for about 45 minutes.

When done, allow it to set for a couple of minutes; no more than five because the loaf may begin to sweat in the pan and the crust may become a bit soggy.

Remove the loaf from the pan. It should just lift out or fall out if you turn the pan upside down (careful the pan will still be piping hot).

Cool the loaf at least 10-15 minutes on a wire rack (so air can flow around all 6 sides) before cutting. The cooling allows the structure to set so the loaf will retain its shape.

I love to eat this while it is still warm. It doesn't need any sort of topping (not even butter). Allow the loaf to cool completely before placing in a plastic bag (I use a grocery bag) for storage.

This makes about 10-12 slices and is perfect for my She's Toast recipe.

Because there are no preservatives it lasts only about 2-3 days. If you can't eat that much bread, try feeding the leftovers to your dog instead of kicking him.

Of course, you will risk being called a misogynist by feminists who would prefer that you conform to their idea of manhood, but your dog will love you for it.

---

[1] This is important to the final shape and moistness of the loaf. It effects the rise. Too much moisture and the loaf will fall flat and not hold its shape. Too little moisture and it won't rise as high and may be dry and crumbly. It could take a little practice to get it right.

Feature image by Saaleha Bamjee

2017: Cassie Jaye in Australia

A Voice For Men Videos · 8 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Cassie Jaye came to Australia for ICMI17. Here Cassie talks about men's rights, feminism and the Australian media in this interview recorded during the conference.

Why does society hate men?

A Voice For Men Videos · 9 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The man who did not salute

Robert Brockway · 9 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

There is a famous photograph, widely available online, of a large group of people virtually all performing the infamous Nazi salute. A lone man stands in the crowd with his arms crossed defiantly.

The picture was taken in 1936 in Nazi Germany. The Nazi Party had been elected in 1933 and quickly set about making sure that there wouldn't be any other elections in Germany under their watch. By 1936 Germany was well within the clutches of the Nazi Party. At this stage many of the worst crimes for which it is known were still in its future.

The man who did not salute.

The identity of this man is not definitively known. There seems to be general agreement though that the photograph was taken at the Blohm & Voss shipyard in Hamburg, Germany, that the event was the launch of a new vessel manufactured at the shipyard and that Adolf Hitler was likely in attendance.

The vessel being launched was the Horst Wessel which, interestingly, still exists today and is used as a training ship by the United States Coast Guard. The ship is today known as the Barque Eagle and was taken by the United States as part of war reparations following the end of World War II.

We may never know who this man is but there are two principal candidates. Both apparently worked at the shipyards around the time that the photograph was taken.

August Landmesser

Most historians believe that the man was one August Landmesser. Landmesser joined the Nazi party in 1931 but was expelled in 1935 when he became engaged to a Jewish woman, Irma Eckler. Landmasser and Eckler never managed to marry as Nazi Germany enacted laws forbidding marriage or even sexual intercourse between Jews and those defined as Aryan Germans. Landmesser and Eckler remained together, eventually having two children.

Both were arrested in 1938. August Landmasser served a term of imprisonment while Irma Eckler was taken to a concentration camp. Landmasser was released in 1941. The last letter he received from Irma Eckler was in January 1942.

In 1944 Landmesser was drafted in to the German Army and went missing in action the same year. After World War II both August Landmesser and Irma Eckler were declared dead.

Their children were passed around between orphanges, foster care and relatives. It was one of their daughters, Irene Eckler, who claimed in 1991 that the famous picture was of her father.

Gustav Wegert

An alternative view is that the man in the photograph was actually Gustav Wegert. Wegert was a devout Christian that opposed Nazi ideology. His family has made a compelling case, backed up by documentation, that he is the man in the photograph. Wegert survived World War II, dying in 1959.

What Men Do

So we don't really know the identity of this man. What we do know was that this man, whoever he was, had the strength of character to stand up for what he believed in. Many people, in his time and ours, could learn from this man.

The featured image shows the Barque Eagle in the service of the United States Coast Guard. This image and the image showing the man with his arms crossed are in the public domain.

Hitler reacts to radical feminist Julie Bindel

A Voice For Men Videos · 9 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Credit Mike Buchanan's site Laughing at feminists for bringing this one to our attention.

Devil with the red pill on

Jade Michael · 10 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The early-mid 1980's saw the emergence of "satanic panic"; a widespread phenomenon that, among many false allegations, fingered various Heavy Metal bands and fans as "Satanists", and implied that the accused were involved in unsavory and/or illegal behavior. These allegations have since been debunked by the FBI, but for the better part of a decade the devil served as the scapegoat for those who felt repulsed by an evolving art form.

Christian-based organizations, conservative think tanks and groups that were a combination of the two all cast their judgments based on (at best) loose interpretations of several Heavy Metal album covers, song lyrics and the stage antics of "suspect" bands.

To give you an idea of just how much this witch hunt was rooted in irrational paranoia, even the Progressive Rock band Rush was on a hit list of "occult" oriented bands, mainly for the band's use of a red star inside a circle pictured on the band's 2112 album cover. Even when taken at face value, the circled star clearly had nothing to do with Satanism as the Church of Satan's official symbol is the Sigil of Baphomet.

Some Satanists will also use an inverted Pentagram enclosed in a circle as a symbol of recognition for the Left Hand Path. At best, the artwork on the Rush album cover could be misconstrued as a symbol for Pagan ritual, but upon further investigation and after the album's lyrics are taken into consideration, it becomes obvious that both implications are laughably false. This fatuous stretch was symbolic of just how virulent conservative Christian groups became in the face of free speech.

Cut to the present, society now has a New Devil created by sanctimonious "vigilantes" hailing from the bowels of political correctness. These feminist whitewashers have made their devil out to be a much larger and much more significant group of people than the Heavy Metal subculture was in the 1980's. This New Devil crosses race, sexual orientation and financial status, as it demonstrably includes any member of the male gender (and many females as well). Not surprisingly, along with the vast change in western politics since the Regan/Thatcher era, today's inquisition emanates from left-driven media zealots; a camp akin to its conservative Christian cousins when it comes to employing bullying tactics.

These ideological bottom feeders have made multiple attempts to hurl negative attention onto MRAs; a growing population of men and women who stand up for men as human beings worthy of equal treatment under the law. To the politically correct, men represent everything that "got us into this mess". Men are the scapegoats to the world's ills and the media has outfitted us all with horns and tails.

When men and women speak out about injustice, they are typically referred to as "activists". When these activists ban together to raise awareness of their cause they often times create various forms of artwork that is reactionary to their struggle. It's typically representative of the oppressive forces responsible for the injustice in the first place.

This is generally all fine and dandy as far as the masses are concerned – except when said artwork criticizes women, feminists or anti-male policy. Why? Because, to allow the devil his day in court would be blasphemous to the status quo. All Hell would break loose. No one wants to hear what the devil has to say because no matter what may roll off of his double-pointed tongue, it is inherently diabolical and will need to be censored forthwith.

Societal scapegoats are created to blame and shame; to foster a "negative" to an established "positive". However, when it is inevitably proven that certain scapegoats aren't a perceived threat, rather just another part of the population that is neither all good nor all bad, it is "out with the old and in with the new". A New Devil must be brought to light for the sake of those who are "good", in order to keep those of us who are "bad" in line. Since the advent of pop culture mediums, outing these supposed Spawns of Hell has become not only easier but trendier. And it is chic to hate today's New Devil. One appears especially dapper when pushing a clear misconception of the New Devil as truth.

It is socially acceptable for these dreck peddlers to knock and spread lies about men and, moreover, what men do for each other and themselves (i.e. their underground movements, music and art). Our critics don't focus on the fact that many of us have faced and dealt with adversity and abuse because it is more sensational to focus on our sometimes, and rightfully so, harsh reactions to it. If the genders were reversed, this would be a non-issue as any female criticism of men is deemed "empowering."

When a man shows emotion or especially when he shows vulnerability, he becomes unsuitable based on the rigid societal standards set upon him. Unless he fits within this manufactured format by assuming the correct thoughts and actions, he could be considered a "loose cannon" at best. Certainly, if he does not maintain a preconceived report with women, he will be ostracized.

But…back to Satan.

Upon educating oneself on what the philosophy of Satanism actually is, it becomes more absurd that droves of teased-haired teenagers in Motley Crüe t-shirts were accused of blindly adhering to its principles. I say this not to promote or denounce any religion or to knock Crüe fans, but rather to demonstrate a point, and make a parallel between then and now.

Satanism champions staunch individualism and a rational disbelief in a red guy with a tail and pitchfork. Its one part Atheism, one part Ayn Rand Objectivism and one part Aleister Crowley. "Responsibility to the responsible" is one of Satanism's most promoted tenets. Now, could someone please explain to me how a disgruntled, mentally unstable 13-year old who abuses animals and/or shoots his classmates could possibly get lumped in with Satanism? Additionally, there is a written application process and a stiff membership fee to pay before a prospective member can legally and publically align himself with the Church of Satan.

Clearly, its detractors were creating a circus of misinformation to benefit their own Christian/conservative agendas of the day. And to round out this analogy, MRAs are no more a "hate movement" than registered Satanists are a cat-killing gaggle of baby snatchers.

Pure silliness.

It could be said that MRAs have been deemed "satanic" by feminist media parasites when, in fact, if someone actually reads our articles and looks at our artwork without extracting and manipulating aspects of it to create falsehoods with, it becomes clear that we are not the devils we are made out to be. There are those, however, who harbor irrational fear towards us and turn their fear mongering into a fragmented career. Through this fear they attempt to persuade their minions by disguising their efforts as journalism or some other pseudo-intellectual affectation.

Do some MRAs create angry artwork? Absolutely.

Is the MRM a hate movement? No.

Well, we do hate misandry, but we are not a movement based on hating women, of which we've been accused. Not all women are misandric, likewise, not all men are rapists or greedy, evil, pillaging patriarchs. Good grief, do these things really need to be explained? Apparently they do insofar as bands like Slayer had to defend not only their right to free speech, but also had to interpret their lyrics for their opposition. When an opposing force is without even the basic understanding of what they are opposing, their arguments are undoubtedly baseless. As much as our detractors may accuse us of the same, we are at the very least, able to come up with proof time and time again that this New Devil has in fact been irrationally and legally marginalized.

And for the record, not all Heavy Metal bands (very few as a matter of fact) promote real Satanism. Merciful Fate was one of the first to play with satanic themes. Ever hear of a Merciful Fate or King Diamond fan hacking up babies in the name of Satan? I'm guessing not because fans of those acts might even adhere to the real tenets of Satanism, if they are in fact Satanists at all.

And MRAs might not actually be misogynistic wife beaters.

And Pit Bulls might not be bloody thirsty Hellhounds.

When MRA artwork is demonized I am reminded of a t-shirt that a gay friend of mine used to wear. The t-shirt read “ditch the bitch and make the switch”. Neither he, nor I ever once heard anything about the manufacturer or retailer of the shirt being accused of misogyny. But the MRM’s critics should, by their standards, decry the shirt as promoting “hate” towards women, right?

After all, it has the word “bitch” in it and suggests that women not be paired with. Nah, not likely. Perhaps that is partly because it is just a humorous, gay-affirmative t-shirt and partly because…well…it is not misogynistic. And most importantly, it was not a male-affirmative t-shirt, which is the only reason it was held to different standards in regards to public scrutiny. But I ask, if a MGHOW was to wear that same t-shirt, how do you think he would be perceived?

Whether you’re a herd-mentality think tank stemming from the left, right or center you need a devil to oppose in order to amass numbers. And, according to shit starter law, you’d better make damned sure those numbers usurp the group you are demonizing in order to “successfully” refute its claims. You can only do this by opportunistically creating falsehoods and provocative drama designed to pander to different segments of the population. In short, you’re a popularity-driven whore whose wares are based solely in narcissistic advantageousness. The need to be admired as the saint surpasses any call to understanding, compassion and objectivity. In lieu of my earlier analogy, I feel it is relevant to add that Anton LaVey called this the “good guy badge” in an essay he penned under the same title.

Like many MRAs, I wish not to be the good guy, the bad guy or the indifferent guy. I just wish to be a guy in a world where being one isn’t demonized. However crude my methods are to wake people up to this injustice, I guess I’d rather be called out for that instead of standing idly by while doing nothing, or worse yet, selling out the very real suffering of so many men in order to self-aggrandize.

The featured image is the painting Tartini’s Dream (1824) by Louis-Léopold Boilly. Public domain.

The Goal Post Episode 12 – The Misuse of Words

A Voice For Men Videos · 11 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

I see my life in terms of music

Isaac T. Quill · 12 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

There are many things said of music, and one that most people can trill off their tongues is "Music has charms to soothe a savage breast.". It's that, or they go all Shakespeare and "If music be the food of love, play on…".

As I have a soft spot for that sentimental numb-nuts called Albert Einstein, my favourite quote is "If I were not a physicist, I would probably be a musician. I often think in music. I live my daydreams in music. I see my life in terms of music.". For me that is how music fits in my life.

Music is now so readily accessible and everyday that we fail to even notice when it's there in our ears. I'm old enough and decrepit enough to remember when music was made "live", or you bought these disks made of "vinyl" and "The Mamas & The Papas" were top of "The Hit Parade". People did not use acronyms as nouns, and CD, DVD, and MP3 just didn't exist. I remember my first set of (Shock Horror) "Stereo Headphones", which sat outside of my cranium and not inside my ears. They weighed approximately 3 pounds.

One thing that has been known for centuries, if not millennia, is that music and sound affects the human mood. From drums beaten to stir the blood pre battle, to Henry The Eighth (of the naughty Tudors) strumming his Lute and crooning out Green Sleeves. Today we have Blue-tooth enabled handsets linked to Spotify setting the mood with someone else's playlist for foreplay. When you look at the history of music, so much of the greatest music has been linked with religion. It seems that Hatching, Matching and Dispatching (Birth, Marriage & Death) needs music for extra value, and binds us emotionally to views and social practices.

With social networking, music and musical tastes can be shared and dropped at light speed. You can "friend" a rising star and end up hating them in a matter of hours. With digital music services like Amazon, you don't even have to buy a whole album. You just pick and mix like a child in a candy shop. With so much networking and ability to share and compare, one thing people tend not to do these days is talk about music. They listen in isolation and don't share. They just consume music. With the arrival of portable music, people now graze as they do other things. Gone are the days of portable music being limited to battery-powered transistor radios the size of a medium-sized child. I carry gigabytes of my chosen euphoria in a pocket-sized package.

Study upon study shows that music affects our moods, health and even our sex lives. I'm also old enough to remember the mass unexpected sales of Ravel's Boléro. It featured in the film "10", with Bo Derek and Dudley Moore. It's funny how a pair of Boobs and some good comedy can make classical music sexy. Roll over Beethoven.

Many who work with our ageing populations, created by modern medicine, known only too well that with the onset of Dementia and Alzheimer's one of the last things the person looses is their memory of music and their ability to even sing. Music helps keep our memories intact. Music keeps our minds functioning. Music even keeps us learning. And yet, from a biological point of view, music makes little sense. Sex is biological and is about reproduction and survival of the species. Food linked to hunting, gathering, eating and even social activity makes sense, but music is peculiarly human and seems to serve no use in human survival. Some postulate that music is an extension of language and how we as humans use tone of voice to communicate. Couple that with how beats can mesmerize and even create altered states and you have mystical experiences and even the roots of religion? What ever the reason that Music has evolved, in all human societies Music Moves us.

Science is fighting to unlock the mysteries of music, and they have found that the "nucleus accumbens" gets turned on by some nice beats. It's part of the brain that is linked to the cognitive processing of motivation, pleasure, reward and reinforcement learning. When you have sex it dumps dopamine into your brain. The same with food and with music. Science keeps finding that this music trigger only exists in humans, so whilst some may claim to have a Donkey that dances to Brahms, it's wishful thinking on their part. It's just proof that they have trained the poor animal in inhuman ways with a cattle prod.

Music also activates the amygdala, the most ancient part of the brain. The amygdala is intimately linked with instinct and memory. It's also one of the most significant parts of the brain linked with PTSD, where it develops a hair-trigger for flight and fight. Many wonder how Flashbacks and Re-Experiencing are possible. The amygdala goes into overdrive and triggers memories to motivate you to fight or flee. Your brain keeps on demanding that you are in an environment that is dangerous. It keeps on going trying to motivate you to act and save yourself, even though there is no danger. When you don't react, because in reality you are safe and in a safe place, your brain starts throwing memories at you to motivate you to flee. The more damage from the PTSD the more your own brain hits you with the wrong memories for what it is programmed to believe is the right reason. Many with PTSD have found that they can help control their symptoms and better manage the flashbacks and trauma with the right music. The music can in fact soothe the savage beast that has become your own brain.

Many years ago I spent a great deal of time with an old friend (David) who had quite an amazing international career in music. As a guitarist he was in great demand for sessions, as well as being the lead man in the bands for a number of household names. He was a genius and could play a guitar in any musical style, and literally mimic any known player. Imagine, if you can, Jimmy Hendrix playing Zip-a-Dee-Doo-Dah. One thing that many did not know was that David suffered from life long crippling clinical depression, and with it many suicide attempts. When playing he was in heaven and 100% happy, but he could literally walk off the stage with applause ringing, and within seconds try to take his own life. He described it as having holes in his feet. When he was immersed in music he filled up with joy and happiness, but as soon as he was no longer immersed, all that happiness and joy just drained from his body through those holes. His legs were like down pipes and he could feel the happiness just running away. In his sixties, David finally found peace under the care of a brilliant psychiatrist who finally found a drug combination that stitched those holes up. For the first time since David was 19 he could immerse himself in Music and the joy stayed with him. In fact, he could immerse himself in life and the joy stayed.

David taught me a great deal about depression, suicide and people's ignorance. I once met David as he was leaving a depression support group. He introduced me to his fellow sufferers and travellers. It was so interesting. They all said the same thing. Depression did not rob them of the ability to feel joy or happiness, it was holding onto that joy, those feelings, that was the problem. When they met up they all had great fun talking and sharing experiences, many very comical. And yet as they walked away, they could all feel that joy ebbing and the tide going out. The feelings of emptiness and numbness left behind needed massive explosions of emotion to try to fill the void. Yet, as soon as the emotion explosion had refilled them, there it was draining away into emptiness. So many had found music that helped to manage the void and the emptiness. One lady told me how music acted as a break-water, reducing the waves in her life and controlling the speed that her tide went out.

Whilst many on the outside believed that theses depressives used "Jolly Tunes to Pep Themselves Up", the reality was quiet different. They used music that acknowledged their own pain and allowed them to give themselves permission to be a Functioning Depressive, just doing the best they could, holding on! They had tunes and music that acted as their lifeline when the abyss beckoned. Often the music gave them permission to just be, and to hell with rest. When you are robbed of joy and feeling emotions, even great sadness, inspired by music, can be a relief from the numbness. It proves to you that you are still human and capable of feelings.

I make no secret that I'm disabled, but many don't know that one aspect is I live in untreatable physical pain 24/7. It's a bitch and it's my bitch, so keep you faux sympathy off my grass. It's just a minor part of what makes up me, and I hate it when folks start to strong-arm into the subject with bad advice, want to be part of my life (for their own agendas) and gush with false friendship and hijacking. Ask anyone who lives with chronic pain and they will tell you all about the loss, suffering, the risk and realities of suicide and just how much effort it takes to parent yourself with a raging, fire breathing dragon on your back. And it just won't take no for an answer. Honestly, most days I'd rather have an infant, incontinent version of RadFem Cathy Brennan in diapers, on a sugar rush with a quart of Red Bull added. That would be easy!

Sleep can be elusive when you have to deal with chronic pain, and many nights myself and David sat together, generations apart, talking and not talking, just listening to music and seeing how it felt. David showed me how to use music to live – to hold on and more – how to live life when all others just can't grasp what it's like to be you. In so many ways I've had to carve out a new life for myself, and to a great part, I've done that with music.

There is music from my past which I still love and yet can't listen to. One thing I can't handle is Christmas Carols which hark back to other times. Memories and more just make that too risky. I've had to look far and wide for new music with which to sculpt and refine my new life, and find tunes to hang onto when needed.

It even reminded me of a Chris de Burgh song that I used to love, which also features a Christmas Carol out of time, but in just the right place.

Call me a big softy, a Big Girl's Blouse or any other epithet you may wish, but here and now in May 2015, I'm writing this listening to a Christmas Carol and have a tear in my eye!

Connie Podesta – five stupid questions women ask men

A Voice For Men Videos · 12 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

M&M's Idiotic Marketing Campaign

Stephen Bond · 14 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

What could Mars, the maker of the world-famous, delicious, multi-colored, button-shaped, chocolate M&M's have possibly been thinking with their new marketing campaign "Flipping the Status Quo"?

As reported by CNN Tuesday (1/10/23), "Candy maker Mars announced that the limited edition all-female pack will include only Purple, Brown and Green—the candy's trio of female characters, who are upside-down on the package—to 'celebrate women everywhere who are flipping the status quo.'

Isn't a "Women-Only" Package Sex Discrimination Against Men?

It appears that the company doesn't recall Gillette's disastrous venture into "woke advertising" with its 2019 "We Believe in the Best in Men" ad campaign, based on it's decades-long advertising tagline "The Best a Man Can Be."

As described in this Fortune magazine article,

> "The 1:48 length video starts out with images of remarkably troubled looking men as a narrator makes reference to bullying, sexual harassment, and toxic masculinity. It then poses the question "Is This the Best a Man Can Get." The viewer then sees depictions of a series of very ugly and negative behaviors, including bullying, fighting, sexual harassment, and blatantly interfering with a woman speaking in the workplace. The ad goes on to state it is time for men to stop making excuses and to renounce the idea that 'boys will be boys.' "

Here's the ad:

If you can't see why men would be insulted by this ad, then you've been completely brainwashed by a 50+ year campaign of feminist political and cultural indoctrination.

Well, millions of men were insulted.

And I was one of them. As a lifelong user of Gillette razors, I decided to no longer purchase the product or any product sold by Gillette's parent company, Proctor & Gamble.

And I was far from the only one:

The Carolina's chapter of the National Coalition for Men began a successful boycott against Gillette. One notable image on their boycott page conveys the disgust by men of feminist-inspired portrayal of masculinity as "toxic":

The Men of the Titanic Weren't "Toxic" Either

And this:

Backlash Builds Against Gillette Over 'Toxic Masculinity' Campaign

The ad was a colossal disaster that cost Gillette billions:

> Well, it turns out men don't like to be insulted and classified as overly masculine, raging sexists and they're dumping the brand. Gillette's social justice moral preening just cost them $8 billion.

As more clear-minded people have recognized Mars' marketing blunder, the media (yes, particularly the conservative media[i]) is having a field day.

One online article, M&M's Roasted After Revealing 'All-Female Character' Packages begins with "Candy maker Mars is facing mockery for unveiling limited edition packaging for M&M's meant to 'celebrate women' " and includes some humorous observations:

- One Twitter user wrote, "I hope this includes all m&ms that identify as female as well. Please don't exclude the peanut m&ms. Having nuts doesn't make them any less female if that's what they choose."
- Conservative commentator Ben Shapiro tweeted, "I see no trans M&Ms. This is an outrageously cisgender representation."
- Conservative podcaster Lisa Boothe tweeted, "Every young girl should aspire to be an M&M when they grow up. The true trailblazers".
- The Daily Wire's Twitter account wrote, "One step towards equal representation in candy mascots."

Look, I realize that the offensiveness of Mars' new M&Ms marketing campaign pales in comparison to the Gillette ad.

And I support efforts by American companies to be more inclusive and fully representative in their advertising, for example, including African Americans and even gay couples in their commercials.

What I don't support is the degree to which these "woke" companies have been bamboozled by a vocal and tireless "feminist majority" that has "flipped the status quo" on the backs of males by spreading lies and hate against men and boys for decades:

- Lies about domestic violence.
- Lies about a purported gender wage gap.
- Lies about the existence of a "Patriarchy" where men "consciously and deliberately oppress women".
- Equating "sex discrimination" with "racial discrimination.
- Using gender slurs and epithets such as "Male chauvinist pig", "toxic masculinity", "mansplaining", "manspreading"
- Hashtags like #killallmen and actual calls for male genocide or placement in concentration camps [ii]

I object to companies who, while happily promoting the advancement of women, turn a blind eye to the hate and cultural degradation of men that feminism promotes, completely ignoring the 50 year "Campaign of Hate Against Men", all the while ignoring that feminism has morphed into a hate movement.

Think I'm exaggerating? The following two Washington Post articles from 2018 are just two of the worst of literally tens of thousands examples that illustrate the results of a five-decade-long campaign of feminist political and cultural indoctrination:

Why can't we hate men? This #MeToo inspired rant was written by the director of women's studies at Northeastern University, who had the gall to openly and shamelessly express a Nazi-like hatred for men in a major American newspaper.

Amber Heard: I spoke up against sexual violence – and faced our culture's wrath. That has to change. This is the op-ed that triggered the trial that proved both that Amber Heard abused Johnny Depp and that men can also be victims of domestic violence.

M&Ms have been my lifelong favorite candy, but as one person said in a recent Breitbart[1] article:

"Ridiculous and woke crap. No more ever for me. Good bye."

Goodbye to My All Time Favorite Candy!

FOOTNOTES:

i Normally, I try to use non-partisan references, but even conservative sources are sometimes undeniably correct in their assessments.

ii A very small sample of other feminists calling for male genocide:

- Christine Fair, associate professor at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service: "All of them deserve miserable deaths while feminists laugh as they take their last gasps. Bonus: we castrate their corpses and feed them to swine? Yes."—2019 tweet
- Mary Daly, former Boston College feminism professor: "If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. The world would be better off with dramatically fewer men."
- Sally Miller Gearhart, college feminism professor: "…the ratio of men to women must be radically reduced so that men approximate only ten percent of the total population."—"The Future—If There is One—is Female", 1982

Mindy Kaling – revealing feminist double standards

A Voice For Men Videos · 15 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Angry Wimmin: BBC documentary on radical feminism

A Voice For Men Videos · 15 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Published in 2015, Angry Wimmin: BBC documentary on Radical Feminism provides an eye opening insight into the radical and hateful roots of modern feminism.

Red Pill Grandparenting

Peter Wright · 16 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Casualties of the family court, AKA fathers and children, are so great in number I wouldn't be surprised if they outnumbered the collective casualties of all wars over the last century. Each of them were made casualties by a family court culture that sides with mothers bent on establishing ownership of children, a goal achieved via character assassination of fathers, and a performance of damseling.

If women are reduced to proverbial chattel within the English law system, which of course they never were, we can only conclude that children have always been the chattel of the chattel. Ernest B. Bax elaborates this point in the following comment penned in the year 1896:

> CUSTODY OF CHILDREN
>
> It has always in England been laid down as a fundamental law based on public policy, that the custody of children and their education is a duty incumbent on the father. It is said to be so fundamental that he is not permitted to waive his exercise of the right by pre-nuptial contract. (See the Agar v. Ellis Case.)
>
> This rule of the Common Law of England is of course in harmony with the policy of all Europe and Christendom, as well as with the historic conditions of the European social organisation, if not with the primal instincts of the race.
>
> Nevertheless, fundamental and necessary as the rule may be, the pro-feminist magistrates and judges of England are bent apparently on ignoring it with a light heart. They have not merely retained the old rule that the custody of infants of tender years remains with the mother until the child attains the age of seven. But they go much further than that. As a matter of course, and without considering in the least the interests of the child, or of society at large, they hand over the custody and education of all the children to the litigant wife, whenever she establishes –an easy thing to do– a flimsy and often farcical case of technical "cruelty."
>
> The victim husband has the privilege of maintaining the children as well as herself out of his property or earnings, and has the added consolation of knowing that they will brought up to detest him.
>
> Even in the extreme case where a deserting wife takes with her the children of the marriage, there is practically no redress for the husband if in narrow circumstances. The police courts will not interfere. The divorce court, as already stated, is expensive to the point of prohibition. In any case the husband has to face a tribunal already prejudiced in favour of the female, and the attendant scandal of a process will probably have no other result than to injure his children and their future prospects in life.
>
> – Ernest B. Bax, The Legal Subjection of Men (1896 p.16)

Most people reading this will know the story described by Bax all too well. The situation remains unchanged to this very day. What is slightly less well known is the impact on grandparents, especially paternal grandparents who tend to become collateral damage along with the alienated father. Mothers instinctively know that grandparents will side with their son in the face of such brutality, so they make the callous and cynical decision to alienate the paternal grandparents and thereby obliterate all potential for opposition.

Callous is hardly a strong enough word for it, but whatever the appropriate adjectives, here we remain thanks to a gynocentric feminism that has eaten away at family cohesion over the last two centuries.

The chances of this happening to grandparents are extremely high, except on the basis that they demonstrate a sycophantic compliance with, and longsuffering utilitarianism towards the mother and her inflated wants – babysitting on demand, transport to and from school, regularly complimenting the mother on her great single parent skills, and the often clear expectation to 'pay up' financially by buying items for the grandchildren or offering large money gifts for Christmas & birthdays – which of course the mother will decide the best use of.

This is the level of extortion that so many alienating mothers resort to – a kind of pay-to-play that grandparents are subjected to. For any self-respecting grandparent the juice may not be worth the squeeze, especially if faced with continued disapproval and grifting.

When it comes to mothers displaying pronounced control issues within the intact young family, it raises the serious question of whether grandparents should form a relationship with grandchildren at the outset, and if so, how deep (or superficial) and how frequent. Such control issues are usually bankable indications that everything will eventually turn to shit, and grand parents need to wise up and decide how best they will deal with the broken relationships issue in advance.

Like the MGTOW response toward an excess in women's relational and legal power, I wouldn't be surprised to see an equivalent boycott trend among grandparents emerge – in this case jettisoning a portion of the increasingly vulnerable grandparent role. Grandparents Going Their Own Way (GGTOW). That is not to say that such grandparents would be disowning their son or his progeny – on the contrary – the aim would be to protect both he and his children from a greater heartache in the case of deeply attached bonds being destroyed by the mother.

The cultivation of some distance serves the goal of mitigating the likely heartache were it to happen. The less abiding and less intense the grandparent-grandchild relationship, the less drama there will be with the inevitable fallout. There would be some clear heads prevailing among the casualties, which may be all the better to help pick up the pieces for the ones you love.

Keeping a greater distance, but continuing to demonstrate a believable measure of love and support may be the most practical way for grandparents to maintain stability in the extended family, especially in the event of its collapse.

Why Modern Movies Suck – They Hate Men (Part 1)

A Voice For Men Videos · 17 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Victoria’s Secret – TheQuartering

A Voice For Men Videos · 18 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The War on Masculinity is a precursor to the totalitarian subversion of Western Civilisation

Elizabeth Hobson · 19 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

We can see from the historical record that men are physically, intellectually, and morally critical to effective resistance to totalitarianism. I believe that I have missed the significance of this for years.

I have been studying the mechanisms by which men and boys are subjected to injustice and neglect. I have been concerned on human grounds, and moral grounds, concerned about our collective health and prosperity in societies where we are damaging these precious resources of energy and innovation – and I have been concerned about the possibility of general enfeeblement leaving us vulnerable to predation by more virile cultures (whose values are troubling).

But I failed to acknowledge that the deliberate destruction of our men could be being perpetrated by our own elites, not just out of foolishness and political expediency but, as method of disarming and dislocating our populations by design, to make us easier to reengineer to serve their ends. It's not clear to me the degree to which the War on Men has been consciously informed by this goal, but I'm not sure how much that matters anyway.

Perhaps our elites have been quite unaware of subconscious devils driving them – but we can divine from their actions what the intended outcome has been.

I believe that men are innately more morally certain than women. From the differences in results broken down by sex in the bell curves in Simon Baron-Cohen's Empathy Quotient and Systemising Quotient test results, we can make some theses on evolved sex roles. I believe that women have evolved the greater ability to empathise (defined by Baron-Cohen as: "the ability to put yourself into someone else's shoes and to imagine their thoughts and feelings" and "the drive to respond with an appropriate emotion to someone else's thoughts and feelings"), not only in order to be best able to respond to infants, but also to support group cohesion by providing soft power backing to dominant cultural narratives – in particular by making their own families conform to them (so they are socially acceptable, so they can prosper).

Empathy and agreeableness are strongly correlated, and both can be functional adaptations that prove useful to individuals and groups – but can also be highly vulnerable to manipulation.

Men have evolved a little differently. Men are more rational than women, enabling them to provide stability and to realise progression, for their families and the collective. This gives men an advantage in being able to assess moral questions based on defined values, less influenced by social pressure.

Anecdotally, I think we see that difference in support for trans ideology. I am yet to see any research, so this is literally speculation based on personal observations, but – while there are of course very vocal women using their vaginaphones to object to dangerous nonsense that's being pushed at the moment in that arena – I feel like I see more women overall who are actually ok with it, and more men who sense the danger.

All of the above is presented in a binary fashion – clearly I am generalising – but in reality it's not binary and doesn't need to be. The 2016 Presidential election in the U.S. and the U.K.s' Brexit referendum were both very close. Had only women had the vote, they would have been just as close – but both of those votes would have gone the way our wannabe totalitarian overlords wanted. We'd have little success on the street predicting which way people voted based on their sex, but at a population level, small sex differences can lead to huge effects on outcomes.

Furthermore, Jung's theory regarding contra-sexual aspects to our personalities suggests to me that The War on Masculinity (as a front in the War on Men) threatens men's abilities to be the morally certain and confident and courageous individuals that we need; and the associated feminist conceptual rejection of feminine social power (which is necessary in order to convince society that women need enhanced political and economic power) also threatens women's abilities to integrate the femininity and masculinity in us, in healthy ways that would enable us to participate usefully in the struggle for our freedoms too.

Jung saw men and women as typically presenting personality features recognisable as of own biological sex. But he also saw us as having distinctly opposite sex aspects within us (he called them the anima in men, the animus in women). At the time he was writing, sex roles were significantly more rigid, so the danger he saw was of individuals suppressing contra-sex aspects of themselves which would not disappear as a result… But, rather, live in our depths, out of sight, growing twisted and malevolent and explode out when they got the chance, possessing us and causing dysfunctionality and neurosis.

Men possessed by the anima could be a hysterical, whiny little bitches. Animus possessed women could be hostile, domineering hags. He advocated that individuals should acknowledge and seek to integrate our contra-sexual aspects so that we may avoid these dangers – and so that we can actually draw to some degree on strengths of the opposite sex, appropriately, when it's useful. I feel like presently we have been nurturing the same problem for a long time, with a lack of sex balance within individuals, with anima possessed men and animus possessed women – but the cause is precisely inverse.

We're not victims of social pressure to conform to the expectations associated with our biological sex. Today: masculinity is dialled down in men by subjecting masculinity to constant criticism and the threat of punishment, so more and more are anima possessed because expressing their masculinity is too dangerous. Women's femininity on the other hand is dialled down by the conceptual rejection of feminine power, so we see many women possessed by their animus because they're convinced erroneously that femininity is weak.

The attacks on men that have astounded me in their diversity, injustice, cruelty (and also in what I imagined was an absurd level of misjudgement if the aim was to empower women), and they have crippled many men. There is fear, there is uncertainty, there is hopelessness in too many men: there are men held back in their educational and career trajectories, there are good men broken in courts – often family courts where it is ruled that their children don't need meaningful relationships with them (or after family courts decide they do need those relationships – but there are no mechanisms to defend their rights when rulings are ignored by resident parents).

If the aim was to empower women, it's a sick and twisted empowerment that we have, one that can only, ultimately hurt us vicariously and deprive us of opportunities for our own personal growth. If the aim was to neutralise the threat that functional individuals, men in particular, may pose to the establishment of totalitarianism… That could work.

Since the global pandemic response (but not limited to that event), it has become abundantly clear that the vast majority of national governments either do not have authority to represent their citizens – or choose not to. They will force us not to leave our homes. They will force us to close our businesses. They will coerce us into accepting risky medical interventions. They will lie, and the big social media companies have been colluding with them to manipulate open discussion (including censoring the truth when that's inconvenient) – and with a contempt so brazen that it feels like they want us to know that they no longer feel compelled to even pretend to respect us. They will have our ability to share our resources revoked on online platforms, they'll even have our ability to access our own money suspended by banks, and when they deprive us of national physical currencies, our economic vulnerability will be so much more acute.

The quantity of data they have on so many of us, and the sophistication of their abilities to use it to know us intimately is terrifying. Social credit scoring is coming, and we will have to make decisions about whether to prioritise our physical needs or our rights, and what we know is right.

They abuse legal mechanisms, sending police to harass law abiding citizens who say things they don't appreciate, using emergency powers to crush protest, passing legislation to give police powers to apprehend people they think might be considering protesting, militarising police forces (and failing to even clarify in what situations these weapons are and are not supposed to be used in).

The global economy is in pieces, and they knew lockdowns would damage it, and they are comfortable with big pharma, big energy and big tech all celebrating record profits while the standards of living of citizens are deteriorating. Landgrabs have been going on for years – sometimes by nation state apparatus, sometimes by foreign state actors, sometimes by big corporations and sometimes by hugely wealthy and influential individuals who present themselves to the world as benevolent philanthropists – and the net result is that we the people actually own an alarmingly diminishing area of the lands that we call home, and we the people may soon find that we have an alarmingly diminishing say in how it's used.

Left/right is more irrelevant now than ever – their actions are indistinguishable. National politics are looking like soap operas (as pointed out by Neil Oliver) – fine, if you're into depressing televised fiction, but ultimately insignificant. They refuse to prove that we enjoy election integrity. And just in case any uppity populations might somehow swing it to get a government in power who wants to represent them… The ones we currently have are busy signing up to mechanisms whereby at the drop of a hat executive power can be officially lifted from the hands of the people we (may or may not) vote for (like the treaty on pandemic prevention and preparedness and Agenda 2030).

I am nostalgic for 2016. In the face of extreme psychological pressure, citizens in the U.K. and in the U.S. felt the fear and did the right thing anyway. I think we really rocked the establishment, and I think that what we've seen in response since is a reinvigorated effort from them to cripple our moral capacities – as well as a dizzying array of systems established or reinforced in order to keep us in line going forwards.

I think they were expecting to be able to offer us some pretty real choices back then, so that they could defend the impression that they have tried to cultivate (that we're living democratically), but I don't think they thought we'd dare take the chances offered. They thought they could bolster the appearance of legitimate governance for free. Showing them that's just not so was thrilling – but it's also made it clear to them that (if they don't want us asserting our values) they need to tighten their grip.

The intellectual courage rejuvenated, and the networks formed and strengthened over that period will support resistance to the closing down of our "free" societies. But I tend to doubt that we will be able to arrest the trajectory, never-mind claw back freedoms already lost, in the near-term.

It could be that all we can really save is our souls, but that's not nothing. It is masculinity that will take the mountain view to see that we're wasting our energies on concerns that won't mean shit when none of us have any freedoms, we are unable to reliably attend to our fundamental needs, when we're not even afforded the luxury of protesting our fate.

It is masculinity that will lead, and mentor, and give courage. We need to nurture virtue in our men with urgency. It may well be that today our collective reserves of masculinity have been subverted to the point where we're not strong enough to resist totalitarian creep. It may well be that we need the hard times coming, to build strong men. A time will come for our people to reclaim their rights, and virtuous souls who've walked before will be guiding them. That's a legacy to live for.

Velma Is Complete And Utter Trash

A Voice For Men Videos · 20 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Vice: anti & pro feminists debate abortion, trans rights, and #MeToo

A Voice For Men Videos · 21 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Unusually we're posting a video from Vice a well known pro-feminist magazine. This video is a discussion among women about feminism. Notably, conservatives Sydney Watson and Pearl were in the panel. Pearl did a particularly good job.

Erasing Male victims

A Voice For Men Videos · 22 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism needs domestic violence

Suzanne McCarley · 23 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

…therefore feminism perpetuates domestic violence. Feminism also invents fake domestic violence. This gives Feminism an excuse to exist.

It has been many years since feminists have fought for anything remotely resembling equality between the sexes. I know most ordinary feminists still think equality is the name of the game, but they are mistaken. All anyone has to do in order to see this, is look at what feminist policy makers, movers and shakers, and intellectual leaders (and I use that term rather loosely) have actually accomplished during the last two or three decades. No equality there. None.

This article is a very basic introduction to a single concept that most people will instantly reject on a visceral level: That feminist policies breed Domestic Violence while pretending to prevent it. I'm not going to quote lots of statistics and studies, or variables and technicalities. I will however, state that the Duluth Model* of domestic violence, on which virtually all DV policy and "education" is based, has been thoroughly debunked – it represents as common, the very least common type of Intimate Partner Violence (brutal male/innocent female.)

I am highlighting a causal relationship between feminist policy and domestic violence. To see this principle in action, go to any courthouse and sit through a day or two of family court. And while you're there, remember that the feminist-sponsored Violence Against Women Act pays for the "advocates" who coach women on how to present their cases, while the men are advised by their lawyers to "plead to a lesser charge." Remember that VAWA pays the cost of housing the men in jail while they await their hearings.

VAWA also funds prosecution of cases of "violence against women." Everybody in that courtroom, except the accused male, has income (and power) to gain by painting him as a monster, including his own counsel. In theory they could railroad women in the same way because technically, abuse by women is still illegal, but it's a lot easier to convince the public that hundreds of men in any given community are abusers, as opposed to hundreds of women. We notice when women are accused of crimes. Men, on the other hand? Well, men are pigs, right? Abuse is what we've been trained to expect from them.

80% of all victims of violence are men, yet we have the Violence Against Women Act, ostensibly to protect women from (primarily domestic/relationship) violence. How did this happen? Why is violence against women presumed to be worse than violence against men? Because women are weak and vulnerable? Because nobody takes women seriously? Whatever the appeal, it worked; even though violence against women was already illegal, the thought of violence committed against the "helpless," offends us so deeply that we decided it was perfectly reasonable to spare no expense and overlook no preventive measure, if it would reduce the number of victims. Random violence is relatively rare and tough to manage, but domestic violence is so, well, curable, right? Who doesn't want to stop Domestic Violence?

Professional feminists, that's who. Without DV victims, feminists would have no rallying cry, and they would lose political power. Here's how it works:

Thanks primarily to the Violence Against Women Act, DV has become a multi-billion dollar industry. This industry employs many thousands of people throughout the nation, paying them with federal VAWA grant money. And those thousands of people have made relatively little headway in achieving their "goal" of reducing DV. Indeed they perpetuate it. This is by design; if DV went away, so would their jobs. There are many, many factors involved in DV, and it's no coincidence that feminist policies aggravate nearly all of them, but for the sake of clarity I'm going to address only a simplified but significant few of them here.

Who commits a substantial proportion of DV? Past victims or witnesses of DV. Who committed the DV that they experienced or witnessed? In too many cases to count, it is women. Women commit far more than half of all DV. Among the vast majority of violent couples, the violence is mutual. Additionally, women commit the majority of child abuse. Yes, women are responsible for most DV.

Next point, what often triggers DV? Stress. What causes women lots of stress? The constant obligations of child rearing. What causes even more child rearing stress? Not having a father in the family. How are so many fathers removed from their families? They are accused of Domestic Violence, whether it happened or not, and whether it's mutual or not. Disagreements are exaggerated, violence is "invented" or men are blamed for any real violence that does occur.

The result is that fathers, often the most stable influence in the family, are kicked to the curb and financially bled dry, while mothers are protected and are excused for their "missteps;" this is the unstable – and all too often abusive – environment in which their children are raised. Toss in a few more variables like substance abuse, a string of violent boyfriends, and a bit of poverty, and this process is guaranteed to produce future domestic abusers. And this is the process that VAWA has institutionalized. It no longer happens "once in a while;" it is SOP. Was this the intent of VAWA? Who cares? That's the result.

Thanks to VAWA, once a father is accused of DV, his chances of keeping his family (or his assets, his reputation, his friends, often even his job) are almost nil. Conversely, most mothers have to commit "front page news" crimes to lose custody of their children. VAWA provides billions of dollars for programs that "protect women from their abusers." Yet it provides virtually nothing to help men or children escape their abusers, if those abusers are women. VAWA addresses less that half of the DV it encounters. Instead of working to reduce Domestic Violence, VAWA works to ensure that millions of children will continue to suffer abuse, and will likely grow up to become abusers themselves.

