By inviting Ms Sulkowicz to accompany her, Senator Gillibrand undoubtedly wanted to send Congress the message that passage of her proposed Campus Accountability and Safety Act is necessary to protect students in their college environments. However, in her effort to push through the bill, Senator Gillibrand not only is willing to use a dubious victim, Gillibrand is also willing to use discredited and out of date statistics and unsubstantiated data.'

California Senate Candidate Kamala Harris cites debunked '1 in 5' statistic

Mastodon · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As a prosecutor, I know the threat of sexual assault is real and pervasive, particularly for women ages 18 to 24. Studies suggest that 1 in 5 undergraduate students have experienced sexual assault or attempted sexual assault, and that young women who do not attend college suffer even higher rates of violence. These numbers are chilling and only begin to capture the emotional trauma that sexual assault victims — who include men — will suffer for the rest of their lives. Yet, according to the National Crime Victimization Survey, sexual assault is the most under-reported crime of all.

To help address this under-reporting, my office released a bulletin Tuesday to California's law enforcement agencies and university leaders; it announces changes in the law that create reporting requirements and standards for campus disciplinary procedures, and it encourages increased collaboration between law enforcement and campus authorities.'

Wikipedia on Kamala Harris.

Calif. Attorney General Kamala D. Harris Issues Alert on Campus Safety

Mastodon · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

http://californianewswire.com/2015/01/27/CNW23206_103501.php/calif-attorney-general-kamala-d-harris-issues-alert-on-campus-safety/

“The laws we pursue in the California legislature set an example for the rest of the country,” Senate pro Tempore de León stated. “With 1 in 5 women on college campuses experiencing sexual assault, it’s our responsibility to secure a safe learning environment for our students.”

Q&A With Filmmaker Jennifer Siebel Newsom

Mastodon · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Jennifer Siebel Newsom — director, producer, screenwriter, actress, speaker, mother of three, and wife to Lt. Governor Gavin Newsom — was at 2015 Sundance Film Festival to promote The Mask You Live In, the follow up to Miss Representation. The filmmaker talks to us about her latest documentary, redefining society's definition of masculinity, and how we as individuals can set in motion a more responsible way to determine a man's "manliness."

EI: As a tireless advocate for women and girls and the oldest of five sisters, what intrinsically motivated you to make a film about the challenges faced by men?

I've always been curious, wondering "Why are men that way?" After Miss Representation, I knew that challenging gender injustices that limit girls and women was only half the story. I knew that real cultural change was only going to occur if we expose the damaging masculinity narrative that is fed to our boys and men.
...
EI: When it comes to challenging harmful definitions of masculinity, how do you suggest we even begin to address such a multidimensional problem?

JSN: It starts with introspection — we have to self-reflect. We must challenge definitions of masculinity, model the change we want to see, then seek it in mentors and teachers who will help our boys stay true to themselves. The Mask You Live In is not just a film — it's a movement. This is just the beginning. We're all coming together in a beautiful way, and the time is now. Our boys don't need to suffer, and they don't need to live in pain.'

Mother Jones posts response letter from Warren Farrell

Mastodon · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Warren Farrell submitted a letter to Mother Jones which the moderator published in the comment section. Its has received 364 up-votes which is impressive consider Mother Jones is very much pro-feminist. Excerpt:

'However, as I am sure you know, I am sad that you chose to frame the article with the men's issues movement's participants portrayed as "haters and trolls" who inspire misogynist-motivated real-life killings of women.

An example of an alternative framework is how the Men's Issues conference you attended in Detroit incorporated as keynote speakers a half dozen women--almost half of the keynote speakers. Can you name a single national feminist conference with a half dozen of their keynote speakers being men?

Moreover, many of the women were internationally-respected--women such as Canadian Senator Anne Cools; England's founder of women's shelters, Erin Pizzey; psychologist Helen Smith…. Senator Cools, the leading keynote speaker, aside from being a senior Canadian Senator, is also black. Since when are Senator Cools, Helen Smith, and Erin Pizzey “haters” or “trolls”? Why did you not mention even one of these three women?'

Campus rape hysteria is nothing new

Matt · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As this article from 1993 shows, rape hysteria on college campuses is nothing new. What is new is our elected officials buying into and fostering it. Excerpt:

'One in four college women has been the victim of rape or attempted rape. One in four. I remember standing outside the dining hall in college, looking at a purple poster with this statistic written in bold letters. It didn't seem right. If sexual assault was really so pervasive, it seemed strange that the intricate gossip networks hadn't picked up more than one or two shadowy instances of rape. If I was really standing in the middle of an "epidemic," a "crisis" -- if 25 percent of my women friends were really being raped -- wouldn't I know it?

These posters were not presenting facts. They were advertising a mood. Preoccupied with issues like date rape and sexual harassment, campus feminists produce endless images of women as victims -- women offended by a professor's dirty joke, women pressured into sex by peers, women trying to say no but not managing to get it across.

This portrait of the delicate female bears a striking resemblance to that 50's ideal my mother and other women of her generation fought so hard to leave behind. They didn't like her passivity, her wide-eyed innocence. They didn't like the fact that she was perpetually offended by sexual innuendo. They didn't like her excessive need for protection. She represented personal, social and intellectual possibilities collapsed, and they worked and marched, shouted and wrote to make her irrelevant for their daughters. But here she is again, with her pure intentions and her wide eyes. Only this time it is the feminists themselves who are breathing new life into her.'

Christina Hoff Sommers: Sexual assault myths: Part 2

Matt · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'The United States is not a rape culture, but it is a gender propaganda culture. We are overwhelmed by false information about men and women, and nowhere is this more true than in the area of sexual violence. A new Bureau of Justice Statistics study has the latest numbers, and the Factual Feminist does some fact checking.'

University students cleared in campus rape case

Mastodon · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Sexual assault charges against five William Paterson University students have been dismissed, but the students' status at the school remained unclear on Thursday as defense attorneys criticized the school's internal investigation and statements made by its president.

A grand jury declined to indict the students, all of whom are 18 years old, after hearing the case on Monday, according to court officials and a defense attorney. The five men, who had been accused of taking part in the sexual assault of a woman in the Overlook South residence hall on Nov. 25, have not been allowed back to the school since shortly after the alleged incident. The woman's identity has never been made public and her role in the investigation is unknown.
...
Defense attorneys criticized the William Paterson University police investigation, saying it wasn't thorough enough and did not include interviews with key witnesses. Ricci also was critical of what he said were "damaging statements" made by administrators that he said made it seem the defendants were guilty.

University President Kathleen Waldron said shortly after the incident that she was "angry and dismayed that this crime was committed on our campus and allegedly by students." She went on to refer to the incident as a "criminal act".

"It was outrageous that these young men had to go through the publicity they had to go through," Ricci said.'

How do men prove consent?

Mastodon · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It used to be that women who made stupid mistakes with men, who had non-violent sexual encounters in dodgy circumstances — while drunk or otherwise intoxicated, in the heat of the moment or for a million other reasons — did not wake up the next morning and decide they had been raped.
...
That, at least, would seem to be the view of Alison Saunders, Director of Public Prosecutions, who yesterday said the time has come to move beyond the idea of 'no means no'.

In other words, date-rape suspects will have to prove they obtained explicit consent.
...
But, more worryingly, won't men in rape cases automatically be presumed guilty until they can prove they have obtained consent? However appalling a crime rape may be, this cannot be right.

What makes this still more shocking is that it seems to be part of a political attempt to push up rape conviction rates and meet targets.

Because although reports of rape have risen sharply in recent years, actual convictions are lagging behind. And that doesn't suit the so-called 'vagenda': the all-men-are-rapists brigade, top feministas like Harriet Harman and the femi-fascist Twitter mob who, increasingly, seem to hold sway in public policy.'

UK: The New Rape Rules Which Will Infantilise Women And Criminalise Innocent Men

Mastodon · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It turns out that Yes sometimes means No too, particularly when a woman is judged to be too inebriated to be capable of making a conscious decision. If she's three sheets to the wind, then the new rule is that she is not capable of consenting to get between the sheets.

Even if she has said Yes and has even undressed herself or initiated the sexual advances. Even if she at no point suggested she had changed her mind or asked the man to stop. Even if she blatantly enjoyed herself at the time.

This is patently absurd. And yet this is precisely what the DPP has announced.

Unlike any other offence, where the onus is on the prosecution to prove that the accused is guilty of a crime, this puts the responsibility squarely (if not fairly) on the shoulders of the accused to prove that he is innocent. In one fell swoop, Mrs Saunders has turned a fundamental principle of our justice system – the presumption of innocence – on its head.

Instead of requiring evidence of non-consensual sex, the CPS will now look only for the absence of evidence that there was consent. As the DPP said, she wants the police to ask suspects HOW they knew the alleged victim was saying yes, and was doing so "freely and knowingly".'

Maryland considers affirmative consent bill

Mastodon · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In an effort to prevent rape on college campuses, Maryland state lawmakers are considering an affirmative consent bill.

The legislation would require colleges to develop a policy in which students mutually agree to sex in advance.

"Yes means yes" legislation requires Maryland colleges and universities to come up with a policy that defines how students engage in sexual activities.

"The basic idea is that no one is taken advantage of," said Delegate Frank Conaway, D-Baltimore City.

Affirmative consent is aimed at changing the culture of "no means no." Right now, sexual consent is widely defined as the absence of "no." Some female college students believe that, if passed, the law will go a long way toward reducing campus sexual assaults and rapes.

"You never know if someone is going to put something in your drink, which happens often. People don't learn about it because they are too scared to admit they were in the wrong," said college student Sarah Knoll.

California adopted a "yes means yes" law, and New York recently introduced a similar measure in its General Assembly.'

January Jones Is a Misandrist

Mastodon · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'Uncreative journalists have asked January Jones [link added] if she's a feminist one too many times, and now she's gone full female supremacist. Last night, Jones Instagrammed a theory of matriarchy ("stolen from" Zoë Kravitz) that is celestial, self-loathing, and all caps. "MEN SHOULD ACT LIKE THE SUN, SHINE STRONG 247/365 AND SERVE WOMEN INSTEAD OF ACTING LIKE LITTLE BITCHES WITH VAGINAS," it says. "#truth," Jones added. Put it on the list of reasons she's a secret DGAF hero.'

"Girls Outperform Boys Academically Around the Globe, Study Says"

Minuteman · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Girls tend to get better grades in reading, math and science than boys, according to a new study that challenges the widely held belief that boys do better in these subjects than girls.

"Even in countries where women's liberties are severely restricted, we found that girls are outperforming boys in reading, mathematics and science literacy by age 15, regardless of political, economic, social or gender equality issues and policies found in those countries," study author David Geary, professor of psychological sciences at the University of Missouri, said in a university news release.

The researchers analyzed the grades of 1.5 million 15-year-old students around the world between 2000 and 2010.
...
"The data will influence how policymakers think about the options available," Geary said.

"For example, to increase levels of equal opportunities in education. We believe that policymakers and educators should not expect that broad progress in social equality will necessarily result in educational equality. In fact, we found that with the exception of high achievers, boys have poorer educational outcomes than girls around the world, independent of social equality indicators," he said.'

"Men's rights activists have missed the point of feminism entirely"

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Let's take a look at some of the key points men's rights activists (MRAs) make. These include how it's overwhelmingly men who are sent off to fight in wars, men who die younger, men who fill our prisons, men who are denied custody of children in divorce settlements, and – increasingly – men who earn less than the women who leach off their God-given rights as overlords of all they survey.

You don't need to be Andrea Dworkin to assert that war-making and violent crime both tally more with a testosterone-dominated body than one fed with oestrogen. The list of wars started by women is a very, very short one – unless Helen of Troy is more offensive to modern online commenters than you may realise. (Knowing these people, she probably is.)

Regarding divorce, reliable stats are tricky to pin down. Women certainly win more custody battles than men – though whether their 'hit rate' is as high as 93pc, as has been suggested in the press before, seems dubious. It's a stretch to imagine that the male-dominated judiciary is embarked on a campaign to deny their gender brethren access to their children.

Most importantly, the old chestnut of the pay gap – one of the central targets of feminism – still persists. Sure, in 2012 the Office for National Statistics found that women aged 22 to 29 in full-time employment earned a colossal 2.9pc more than their male counterparts, but that's a sledgehammer applied to a delicate issue. For one, the figure fails to account for the fact that many, many more women than men are in part-time employment. It fades even more when you factor in the ongoing disparity in lifetime earnings, or in compensation packages in the professions (women earn on average £8,000 less than a man in law, £14,000 less as a chief executive and £9,000 less as a doctor).

These are all political and economic realities; areas where the arguments of MRAs can be refuted with hard facts. It's when they move on to the topic of sexual consent, however, that you know you're wasting your effort fighting people who are beyond reason.'

Virginia lawmakers kill bills meant to protect rights of accused students

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Legislators shot down a trio of bills this week meant to give students who are accused of sexual assault more rights during the internal campus inquiries that can lead to expulsion.

The bills were tabled at a small House subcommittee meeting, and as the Virginia General Assembly grapples with how to handle the suddenly high-profile issue of on-campus sexual assault.

Legislation that would require campuses to put notations on transcripts when a student leaves during or because of a sexual assault inquiry is also advancing. Amid this, there is quiet concern that Virginia's response to the attention on college sexual assaults may trample on the rights of the accused.
...
"No one's paying attention to them," said Del. Dave Albo, who chairs the House Courts of Justice Committee.
...
Del. Rick Morris, R-Carrollton, has been trying to reform the internal discipline process for two years now. One of his bills, killed this week in a small and crowded subcommittee room, would have allowed students to be represented by an attorney at these proceedings.

Another made the same change for student organizations. The third would have allowed students to essentially appeal a student judiciary decision to the local circuit court.'

Campus sex assault research under fire

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Rolling Stone magazine's graphic account in December in of a brutal gang rape at the University of Virginia capped a year in which sexual assault on campus gained real traction as a national issue.
...
So what's the true prevalence of sexual assault among college students? It may be less than one in five college women, but it's also likely to be higher than what's captured in the NCVS.

Krebs at RTI is working with the Bureau of Justice Statistics to launch a survey at 10 to 15 universities this spring, with the idea of testing a method that could be replicated at any college or university.

And the Bureau of Justice Statistics is considering including more behavioral cues, especially for sexual assault and rape, in a redesigned version of the NCVS, according to Michael Planty, who heads the victimization statistics unit.
...
109 rape allegations made to the police department of a small Midwestern city from 1978 to 1987. Kanin found that 41 percent of the cases were false, based on the determinations of police officials. In all those cases, he said, the accusers recanted their allegations.

Kanin's study has also been blasted by other researchers. David Lisak, a former psychology professor at the University of Massachusetts Boston, has written that the study "violates a cardinal rule of science" by failing to describe Kanin's efforts to evaluate the criteria of the police department.'

Lawyers criticize William Paterson's handling of rape allegation after charges dismissed

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Artocle here. Excerpt:

'The future of five William Paterson University students remained unclear Friday, days after a grand jury declined to indict the freshmen on charges brought by campus police accusing them of participating in a dorm room gang rape.

All charges were dismissed against the five 18-year-olds — Darius Singleton, of Jersey City, Termaine Scott, of Vineland, Garrett Collick, of Paterson, Jahmel Latimer, of Hoboken, and Noah Williams, of Camden — but it was unclear if they would be allowed back at school after officials previously said they were barred from campus.

Lawyers for some of the students were critical of William Paterson University for not turning the case over to experienced sex-crime investigators with the county prosecutor's office before filing charges and for public statements made by school President Kathleen Waldron.

The University on Friday declined to answer a series of questions about the campus police force's handling of the case or say if the students would be allowed to resume classes. In a statement Thursday night, the school said its own "student conduct process" was continuing, but would not elaborate.'

Boulder firm takes on high-profile Title IX sex assault cases

el cid · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. This Boulder law firm is the epicenter of female students suing universities under Title IX. Their clients include the woman who accused Jameis Winston of sexual assault. Excerpt:

'The Boulder-based team has represented victims of sexual assault at colleges and universities around the country.

Together, Clune and Kerr have made Boulder the de facto Title IX litigation center of the country by advocating for victims and taking on powerful universities and big-time athletic programs.

...

"David Cornwell, attorney for Jameis Winston in Florida, has long tried to discredit the attorneys and the woman who accused Winston of sexual assault. In a December radio interview, he said Clune and Kerr took cases only for their potential payouts.

"They're not lawyers; they're investors," he said on NBC Sports Radio's The Erik Kuselias Show.'

U. of Tennessee-Chattanooga wants accused rapist expelled

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. (Background here.) Excerpt:

'Corey Mock, the former University of Tennessee at Chattanooga wrestler expelled after he was accused of sexually assaulting a fellow student last spring, won't graduate this semester. And now the school wants him gone for good.

Mock returned to campus two weeks ago after a Davidson County, Tenn., chancellor granted a stay so he could complete his studies. But his father, C.D. Mock, said Corey found out after returning that two classes he needs for graduation won't be offered until the summer session.

After a bench ruling like the chancellor's, it's normal for the winning party, in this case Mock's attorney, to file a proposed order, and for the university to file either an objection or another proposed order. In this case, the university's response seems to be particularly aggressive.
...
After finding out that Mock won't graduate, a university attorney Tuesday filed an objection to Mock's motion for an injunction, saying he believed the spring 2015 graduation date was a "deciding factor" in Chancellor Carol McCoy's decision to stay Mock's expulsion pending his appeal.
...
C.D. Mock said he doesn't understand why the university is seeking to remove his son from the school altogether. He pointed to the fact that the young woman who says Mock raped her is no longer on campus.

"They have absolutely nothing to gain and nothing to lose, that I can fathom," Mock said.'

Due process duly needed at universities

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This bill was introduced by Republican Ray Holmberg and Democrat Lois Delmore partially as a response to the case of Caleb Warner.

Caleb Warner, a UND student, was accused of sexual assault in 2010 and was banned from campus for three years. Here's the problem though: He was never actually charged with a crime, but his accuser was for filing a false report.

Even then the university refused to lift the ban until FIRE (Foundation for Individual Rights in Education) got involved.

Bruce Gjovig, CEO & Entrepreneur Coach at the UND Center for Innovation Foundation stated the following in his testimony supporting SB 2150:

"I am an advisor for several UND students and student groups, and innocent students are punished every month, under the guise of controlling students' behavior.
...
Right now, people are fighting in the senate to ensure that you have the basic rights as every other American citizen. And right now, there are people fighting to make sure you don't get those rights. I think it's pretty clear which side you should be on.'

Misandry Island: this is what a feminist utopia would look like

Mastodon · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As a shrieking feminist harpy, it's been a long held wish of mine to sail away on an ocean of male tears and live on an island that recognises the inherent humanity of women. Women of all shapes, sizes, creeds, colours, bodies and backgrounds would live together in harmony and under a system of collaborative leadership. In the evenings, we'd come together to watch the sunset. Over cold cocktails, where the twizzle sticks are actually dehydrated penises, we'd marvel at how much better it is to live in a society that doesn't see us as peripheral to the real experience of what it means to be human, and doesn't expect us to meekly accept the reality of our own supposed weaknesses. We'd make jokes, because women are very funny. And there would be no MRAs and no mosquitos, because the annoying buzz of tiny, obnoxious pests would be banned.
...
When society has reestablished itself as a deeply entrenched matriarchy that rewards women for simply existing, treats our ideas and actions as more inherently valuable than those of men and allows us to dominate every position of leadership in order to shape a global society's values and goals, we'll be able to point to men's lack of protest and agitation as a sign that they're happy with the way things are. Sure, the grumblings of a small and angry minority make it sound like something's wrong, but this is just the way the world is now. It's biological. We're all different but equal, and men's role in that would just be being equal in a way that is actually grossly unequal. But still equal.

And the ones who kept making a rowdy fuss about it or getting on our nerves? Well, we'd just kill them.'

Australia - Position Vacant: Men's Healthy Worker Chief Project Officer, SA Health

Minuteman · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Department for Health & Ageing, Adelaide CBD
Indicative Total Remuneration: $91,940 - $97,525 (pro rata) – Temp P/T (22.5 hrs p/wk, contract appointment up to 30/06/2018) – ASO6

This role presents a unique opportunity to shape the development, implementation and evaluation of the Men's Healthy Workers initiative. This State government funded initiative promotes healthy lifestyle behaviours in and through male dominated workplaces by addressing the chronic disease risk factors of smoking, poor nutrition, harmful alcohol consumption and physical inactivity (SNAP) of workers. The initiative builds on the learning and approach used through the Healthy Workers – Healthy Futures initiative funded by the Commonwealth (2011-2014).

Working closely with officers throughout the Department for Health and Ageing, Regional Health Services, you will provide strategic advice, analysis and evaluation of policies and initiatives related to the use of workplace settings to enhance men's health and wellbeing by addressing modifiable risk factors.
...
Applications close: 13 Feb 2015 11:55 PM Cen. Australia Standard Time'

The revolt on sorority row

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Interview here. Description:

'Is the answer to the threat of sexual assault that young women on a college campus should just stay inside? UVA student and Representative Body Chair Abraham Axler talks with Melissa Harris-Perry about the sorority and fraternity controversy at UVA.'

UVA President Admits Rolling Stone Gang Rape Article Is ‘Discredited’

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Nearly two months after it became clear that a Rolling Stone article about a gang rape at the University of Virginia was mostly fabricated, school president Teresa Sullivan finally admitted on Friday that the story is “discredited.”
...
This is the first time that Sullivan has directly criticized the article, which told the story of a student named Jackie who claimed that seven members of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity brutally gang-raped her at a party in 2012.
...
... And even after the Charlottesville Police Department said that there was no basis to support Jackie’s claims against Phi Kappa Psi, Sullivan and the university required all fraternities to sign a contract full of new demands before they could resume social activities.

In her speech, Sullivan appeared to try to distance herself from those sanctions.

“Our decision to pause Greek social activities extended the pause that the Inter-Fraternity Council had already initiated,” Sullivan said. “The Phi Kappa Psi fraternity voluntarily surrendered its Fraternal Organization Agreement, or FOA. And an unaffiliated fraternity and unaffiliated sorority voluntarily suspended their own social activities.”
...
Sullivan did not apologize directly to Phi Kappa Psi or its members in her speech.'

Male students suing under Title IX 'worrisome' for Boulder lawyers

el cid · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Turns out the lawyers who sue on behalf of women don't like it much when men do the same thing. Excerpt:

'Boulder attorneys who represent victims of gender violence say they feel the recent string of male students suing under Title IX, the federal gender equity law, are distracting from decades of discrimination against women.

A number of schools, including the University of Colorado, are facing lawsuits from male students under Title IX, a law that has historically been used to protect the rights of women.

"John Doe," who is described in court documents as a CU junior, claims he was discriminated against when he was wrongfully accused and suspended for three semesters after a night of consensual sex.

"CU-Boulder has created an environment where an accused male student is fundamentally denied due process by being prosecuted through the conduct process under a presumption of guilt," according to the lawsuit. "Such a one-sided process deprived John Doe, as a male student, of educational opportunities at CU-Boulder on the basis of his sex."
...
Clune and Kerr said it's definitely possible that some of the male students' claims are valid and that they were discriminated against on the basis of sex. The two attorneys say they want to get to a place where all students, male and female, are treated the same.

But at the same time, the attorneys said they worry that these new lawsuits are drawing attention away from the more pervasive issue on college campuses and in society: discrimination against women.

"There can be meritorious claims," Kerr said. "A charged student can be treated unfairly, not given a fair hearing and that can have huge consequences that can follow that student for the rest of his life. They're not to be lightly dismissed, but it's worrisome."'

Current system throws students into lion's den

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I write to you today to voice FIRE's strong support of [North Dakota] SB 2150 [see MANN item here]. This legislation provides university students facing serious, nonacademic disciplinary charges the right to be represented by an attorney or other advocate of the student's choosing in a campus hearing.

This legislation is sorely needed because today's colleges and universities operate what amounts to their own parallel justice system while failing to provide the meaningful due process protections guaranteed in our nation's courts.

Universities throughout the commonwealth hold hearings for a wide range of serious offenses including theft, harassment, assault, drug and weapons possession, stalking and rape. Until SB 2150 is passed, students in North Dakota's public universities accused of such serious misconduct will continue to be forced to represent themselves — alone — against experienced and professionally trained deans, administrators and university attorneys in proceedings that fail to guarantee core components of the right to due process.

The status quo is fundamentally unfair, and legislative action is required to rectify it.

The stakes are very, very high; the results of these hearings dramatically change the course of students' lives. An expulsion for criminal activity will have lifelong consequences for a student's education and professional career. Such a finding impedes a student's ability to secure jobs — even jobs that do not require a college degree.

After all, why should an employer take a chance on a "proven" rapist or thief?

Complicating matters further, nothing prevents criminal prosecutors from using statements made in college courts against the accused in criminal proceedings. Without a lawyer during these campus hearings, students may unknowingly waive Fifth Amendment rights.

If college tribunals were adequately protecting students' rights, this bill might not be necessary. But that is not the case. FIRE learns of shocking due process abuses from college students across the nation every year.'

Facts ignored in moral panic

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'T. Rees Shapiro, The Washington Post reporter who has done an amazing job covering the debacle of Rolling Stone's story about an alleged rape at the University of Virginia, has gotten an interview with members of Phi Kappa Psi. This is the fraternity that was accused in the article of staging some sort of gang-rape initiation ritual. And the story its members tell is more than a little worrying.

The fraternity brothers say they knew within 24 hours that the Rolling Stone story was false — provably false, because their internal records and bank statements showed no party on the weekend in question, and no brothers matched the description of the alleged rapist. Yet the brothers kept quiet because they thought that fighting the story in the news media "would only make things more difficult."

Think about that. They had evidence they could have shown to a reporter to demonstrate the problems with a story, and they decided not to because that might only get them into deeper trouble.
...
When people are in the grip of a moral panic, going up against them to question the extent of a threat, even by doubting so much as a single case, can become dangerous. Questioning any expression of the panic is not seen as a logical debate over statistics or the details of a particular instance, but as somehow defending the threatening behavior.

Note how careful many people who wrote skeptically about the UVA case were to say that they believe campus rape happens, and it is terrible.

People who write that they think an accused murderer may be innocent rarely feel compelled to affirm that yes, they sure do believe that murder happens, and boy, are they against that. This ought to go without saying, and unless we are in the middle of a moral panic, it usually does.

Yet once moral panic sets in, an accusation can also become sufficient evidence unto itself to trigger a severe response: no need to see what the brothers might have to say, or to wait for a police investigation, before you write that op-ed article about rape culture — or start throwing bricks.'

Princeton snubs university lobbyists by developing its own sexual-assault survey

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Princeton University has rejected a survey developed by the Association of American Universities to gauge the prevalence of sexual assault on its campus, opting to develop a survey modeled off one at Rutgers University instead.

Both surveys, however, are based on White House recommendations that seem to prejudge accused students.

According to The Daily Princetonian, Princeton is developing the survey to comply with its Title IX settlement with the Department of Education concerning sexual-assault investigations. It's not the first to reject the AAU survey, whose secrecy has troubled researchers.

Princeton was forced by the government last fall to abandon its longstanding use of the "clear and persuasive" standard for assessing guilt, now using the "more likely than not" standard to decide whether accused students are guilty of sexual assault, as The College Fix reported.

The Rutgers survey on which the Princeton survey will be modeled hasn't been fully vetted, by Rutgers' own admission.

"While it is based on the survey published by the White House Task Force, the survey, as presented in this document, should be seen as an untested pilot tool," the Rutgers School of Social Work warns in the survey description. "Therefore, other institutions wishing to use this survey should be aware that the validity of the instrument as a whole has not yet been determined."'

The “campus rape culture” media narrative faces deflation

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The ongoing media onslaught against the college fraternity system in specific and young men in general has been dismaying to say that least. (To the point where I’ve mostly given up writing about it entirely.) The dizzying array of “facts” and figures being tossed about on every cable news channel which describe the campus rape culture have provided a convenient platform for new age feminists who are ready to go to war. But how much truth is to be found underneath this pile of coverage? At College Insurrection, we are treated to the latest in a series of videos from The Factual Feminist, in which Professor Christina Hoff Sommers of the American Enterprise Institute takes on two common themes.

The first is the oft reported figure claiming that 1 in 5 young women attending college will be raped. Sommers locates the origin of this figure and reveals (yet again) that it was not a source to be taken seriously, but new, more accurate figures are available.

"The one in five claim is based on a 2007 internet study with vaguely worded questions, a low response rate and a non-representative sample. The real number, according to the Bureau of Justice statistics, is one in 53. That’s too many, but it’s a long way from one in five."

That works out to slightly more than two out of one hundred. Obviously that’s two too many, and actual criminals need to be captured and prosecuted. Further, women should be empowered and encouraged to defend themselves against violent criminals, whether that be by arming themselves or simply using good judgement in how and where they travel. But if these Justice Bureau statistics are correct, the “rape culture” isn’t much of a culture at all.'

Editor: "In South Carolina, we breed men who kill women"

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'IN SOUTH Carolina, we breed men who kill women. There's something wicked in our culture that says it's OK to hit, abuse and, yes, kill our wives, girlfriends and ex-lovers.

It's sinful. Reprehensible. Intolerable. Yet for years we've failed to do enough to purge this evil element from among us.

Which is why it's been encouraging to see so many people — from politicians to law enforcement officers to prosecutors and oodles of others — join victims' advocates over the past couple years to demand change.

The effort reached a fever pitch on the first day of this year's legislative session, when Attorney General Alan Wilson stood in the second-floor State House lobby between the House and Senate chambers with lawmakers, law enforcement officers, victims' advocates, prosecutors and others to call for a law aimed at increasing penalties for domestic violence. State Law Enforcement Division chief Mark Keel and S.C. Coalition Against Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault executive director Sara Barber were there. So were House Speaker Jay Lucas, Lt. Gov. Henry McMaster and Senate Judiciary Chairman Larry Martin.

Law enforcement officers joined citizens in holding silhouettes representing South Carolinians killed in domestic violence. A blow-up of a letter signed by Mr. Wilson, prosecutors and others urging lawmakers to act was displayed on an easel.'

Top 10 Reasons Why No One Should Be a Feminist

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Language is important. What would a movement under a gender biased name like masculism be about? Let's say that somewhere it is "officially" stated it is about gender equality, and that the main purpose of this movement is to deal with the grave problem of male disposability. How long would it take for this movement to grow additional masculist "theories", hyperboles, and engage in protracted struggle to skew the system into one direction? How long would it take before being anti-masculist was taken as being anti-male?

The truth is, both sexes were disposable. In this excellent bestseller, The Myth of Male Power: Why Men are the Disposable Sex, psychologist Warren Farrell makes a compelling case that, like with all other species, survival was the framework that drove the gender positioning: women risked death in childbirth; men risked death in conflicts with other tribes and the environment. However, there is a critical difference: women's disposability stemmed from biology; men's disposability required socialization.

When you have a movement called feminism, it becomes very difficult to engage in an objective dialog about the true nature of things. As you try to have it, any criticism all too easily becomes conflated with attack on the female gender itself.

Furthermore, we have perfectly fine words like humanitarian or egalitarian. No extra baggage necessary.'

English court upholds circumcision double-standard

Mastodon · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'...

> Mr Hayes points to the recognition, both by Wall J, as he then was, and by the Court of Appeal in Re J (Specific Issue Orders: Muslim Upbringing and Circumcision) [1999] 2 FLR 678, 693, on appeal Re J (Specific Issue Orders: Child's Religious Upbringing and Circumcision) [2000] 1 FLR 571, 573, 576, that male circumcision does involve harm, or the risk of harm. Given the comparison between what is involved in male circumcision and FGM WHO Type IV, to dispute that the more invasive procedure involves the significant harm involved in the less invasive procedure would seem almost irrational. In my judgment, if FGM Type IV amounts to significant harm, as in my judgment it does, then the same must be so of male circumcision...
>
> Moving on to the second limb of the statutory test, Mr Hayes submits that in assessing whether the infliction of any form of FGM can ever be an aspect of "reasonable" parenting, it is vital to bear in mind that FGM involves physical harm which, it is common ground, has (except in the very narrow circumstances defined in section 1(2)(a) of the Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003, not relevant in a case such as this) no medical justification and confers no health benefits.
>
> The fact that it may be a "cultural" practice does not make FGM reasonable; indeed, the proposition is specifically negatived by section 1(5) of the 2003 Act. And, as I have already pointed out, FGM has no religious justification. So, he submits, it can never be reasonable parenting to inflict any form of FGM on a child. I agree.
>
> It is at this point in the analysis, as it seems to me, that the clear distinction between FGM and male circumcision appears. Whereas it can never be reasonable parenting to inflict any form of FGM on a child, the position is quite different with male circumcision. Society and the law, including family law, are prepared to tolerate non-therapeutic male circumcision performed for religious or even for purely cultural or conventional reasons, while no longer being willing to tolerate FGM in any of its forms.

It's not completely clear to me exactly what the judge means by stating that female genital mutilation "has no basis in any religion." As I understand it, some forms of female genital mutilation are indeed endorsed as religiously necessary or at least advisable by some Muslim religious scholars. I take it the judge must be concluding that either majority Islamic belief doesn't support female genital mutilation, or "true" or "proper" Islamic belief doesn't support it — not a conclusion that American judges would be free to draw, I think, given the First Amendment, but presumably one that English judges are allowed to draw. (Under American law, it's not for courts to decide whether a religious claim represents the majority view of a religious group, or the proper understanding of its scriptures, though courts can of course reject religious exemption claims on other grounds, such as that the exemption would unavoidably inflict substantial harm on third parties.)

In any event, an interesting decision that I thought I'd pass along — read the whole thing if you want more than just these excerpts. Thanks to professor Howard Friedman (Religion Clause).

British Court Denies Compensation to Girl Poisoned Before Birth

fathers4fairness · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A mother who inflicted lifelong damage on her child after drinking heavily during her pregnancy did not commit a criminal offence, the court of appeal has ruled.

The unanimous decision sets clear limits on the legal rights of the unborn child and dispels fears that women could become liable to prosecution for their lifestyles during pregnancy.

The claim was brought by a local authority in the north-west of England which now cares for the young girl, now seven, who is suffering from foetal alcohol spectrum disorder. She was not identified.

The council argued that the girl, known as CP, was entitled to payments from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority. The authority declined to compensate on the grounds that there had been no crime of violence.

The case revolved around section 23 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, which created the offence of poisoning and requires the victim to be “another person”. The three judges – Lord Justice Dyson, Lord Justice Treacy and Lady Justice King – agreed for the purposes of the law the unborn baby was a “unique organism” but not a person.

Treacy explained that the main reason for dismissing the application was that the damage caused to the unborn baby by heavy drinking was caused while the child did not have a separate existence in law.'

"Pope Francis Scolds Deadbeat Dads"

Matt · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. The title of the article is at least misleading and at most deliberately false and sensationalist. Mostly, it seems to me, Pope Francis is decrying the lack of paternal presence in children's lives. But it seems he's putting it all on dads and generally accusing men of selfishness or self pre-occupation. He never mentions the effects of easy divorce, feminism, misandry, and biased anti-male court systems on the distancing of men from their children in so many ways. And he's smart enough to know better. In short, he's doing the same thing his predecessors have done: playing up to the majority members of his church, who are female. Excerpt:

'"Particularly in Western culture," he said, the father figure is "symbolically absent, missing and removed."

At first, Francis explained, the absence of fathers "was perceived as a liberation: liberation from the father-master, from the father as a representative of the law that is imposed from the outside, from the father as a censor of the happiness of children and obstacle to the emancipation and autonomy of young people."

In his weekly audience, the Pope recognized that in the past especially there were cases of authoritarian, overbearing fathers who didn't respect the personal needs of their children. Now, however, "we have gone from one extreme to the other," he said.

The real problem of our day, Francis said, "does not seem to be the intrusive presence of fathers anymore, but rather their absence and their inaction. Fathers are often so focused on themselves and on their work and sometimes on their individual accomplishments, that they can forget even the family, neglecting their children."

As bishop of Buenos Aires, Francis reflected, "I felt the sense of orphanhood that many young people live today. And I would often ask dads whether they were playing with their children, if they had the courage and love to spend time with their children. And in most cases the answer wasn't pretty: 'I really can't, because I have so much work.' And the father was absent from that child who was growing up, not playing with him, and not spending time with him," he said.

The Pope urged Christian communities to be more attentive to the presence of fathers. "The absence of the father figure in the lives of children and young people leaves gaps and scars that can be very serious," he said. He also suggested that many times "the transgressions of children and adolescents can be attributed to this neglect, to missing examples and authoritative guides in their daily life, the lack of closeness and love on the part of fathers."'

NPO: Next Step: Force Public Hearings

Matt · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We have been informed by the federal Office of Child Support Enforcement that they have been inundated with far more comments on child support guidelines than they ever expected. This is evidence that as a movement, we are stepping up the pressure more than ever, making our voices heard more broadly and more effectively. Each of you who took the trouble to submit our child-support comments deserves a pat on the back. There is power in numbers, and when we pull together with unity, we can move mountains.

Remember that our latest push is to force the OCSE to hold public hearings on child support guidelines in each of the federal regions around the country. This will be your chance to tell them directly what you think of the guidelines.

If you have not already done so, please copy and paste the following brief message and send it to: barbara.addison@acf.hhs.gov

Copy The Following

Dear Ms. Addison:

Please convey the following request to the Commissioner and to the Director, Policy Division: I request that the OCSE hold public hearings on its proposed rulemaking in each of the federal regions with adequate notice to the public. If you have any questions concerning this request, please contact Ned Holstein, Acting Executive Director, National Parents Organization at parents@nationalparentsorganization.org

Sincerely,

Your Name
City and State

Stop Copying Here

Many thanks.'

Harvard Law Pushes Back

Matt · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Virginia held a two-day conference last February on “Sexual Misconduct Among College Students.” One of the speakers was the Education Department’s Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights, Catherine Lhamon, who touted her office’s efforts to compel colleges and universities, under pain of losing federal funds, to adopt draconian policies on sexual harassment and assault.

These policies have raised serious concerns about due process and basic fairness for the accused, and an audience member asked Ms. Lhamon how she planned to deal with such “push-back.” Her reply: “We’ve received a lot of push-back, and we need to push forward notwithstanding.” The recent experience of Harvard Law School demonstrates the value of pushing back.
...
Most institutions yield to OCR’s pressure without significant dissent. But at Harvard, 28 law professors—including liberal luminaries Elizabeth Bartholet, Alan Dershowitz, Nancy Gertner, Janet Halley, Duncan Kennedy and Charles Ogletree —signed an open letter, published in the Boston Globe, in which they described the new policies and procedures as “inconsistent with many of the most basic principles we teach.”

Among their complaints: “the absence of any adequate opportunity to discover the facts charged and to confront witnesses and present a defense”; the designation of a Title IX compliance officer, “rather than an entity that could be considered structurally impartial,” as investigator, prosecutor and judge; “the failure to ensure adequate representation for the accused,” especially for lower-income students.

The professors also faulted the university for having “apparently decided simply to defer to the demands of certain federal administrative officials,” and law-school administrators listened. They adopted new procedures, independent of the university’s and far friendlier to due process.'

Sorority leaders baffled at U-Va. response to frat party ban

Matt · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'National sorority leaders said Friday they have been very surprised by the reaction to a letter sent to University of Virginia chapters warning them to avoid fraternity parties on campus Saturday night.

The letter from 16 national sorority presidents — members of the National Panhellenic Conference — sparked an outcry on campus from students who said it was sexist and didactic to order women to stay home for their own safety.

“I believe people are missing the point here,” said Jean Mrasek, chairman of the NPC. The national leaders were merely enforcing an existing rule, she said. “We are upholding our policy and yet we’re being criticized for doing so. That’s the irony of this.”

After a now-discredited Rolling Stone article about a gang rape on campus, fraternities and sororities were suspended and the NPC began talking with university officials, Mrasek said. That’s when they learned that Boys’ Bid Night, when fraternities celebrate their new members, is a high-risk night and that sorority sisters traditionally went to those parties, she said.

University officials and students have said the night — which this year coincides with the undefeated men’s basketball team’s biggest home game on Saturday — is one known for excessive drinking.

“I’ve been very surprised,” said Julie Johnson, Panhellenics chairman for NPC. “This is one night – one night – of historically risky activity.

“The response has been about all this – infringement on their rights, infringement to do what they want, how we’re setting women back. I think we’re providing a safer environment for women, the opportunity for them to be together in sisterhood.”'

Not A Very P.C. Thing To Say

Matt · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here, by Johnathan Chait. For those of you who don't know, Chait is a veteran of classic liberal causes and circles. (By "classic", I don't mean "leftist"; he does a pretty good job of describing the difference in the article.) For him to come out so openly against the resurgence of P.C.-ness on today's campuses is a big deal. (David Frum reviews Chait's article here.) Excerpt:

'But it would be a mistake to categorize today's p.c. culture as only an academic phenomenon. Political correctness is a style of politics in which the more radical members of the left attempt to regulate political discourse by defining opposing views as bigoted and illegitimate. Two decades ago, the only communities where the left could exert such hegemonic control lay within academia, which gave it an influence on intellectual life far out of proportion to its numeric size. Today's political correctness flourishes most consequentially on social media, where it enjoys a frisson of cool and vast new cultural reach. And since social media is also now the milieu that hosts most political debate, the new p.c. has attained an influence over mainstream journalism and commentary beyond that of the old.

It also makes money. Every media company knows that stories about race and gender bias draw huge audiences, making identity politics a reliable profit center in a media industry beset by insecurity. ...

In a short period of time, the p.c. movement has assumed a towering presence in the psychic space of politically active people in general and the left in particular. "All over social media, there dwell armies of unpaid but widely read commentators, ready to launch hashtag campaigns and circulate Change.org petitions in response to the slightest of identity-politics missteps," Rebecca Traister wrote recently in The New Republic.

Two and a half years ago, Hanna Rosin, a liberal journalist and longtime friend, wrote a book called The End of Men, which argued that a confluence of social and economic changes left women in a better position going forward than men, who were struggling to adapt to a new postindustrial order. Rosin, a self-identified feminist, has found herself unexpectedly assailed by feminist critics, who found her message of long-term female empowerment complacent and insufficiently concerned with the continuing reality of sexism. ...
...
Political correctness is a term whose meaning has been gradually diluted since it became a flashpoint 25 years ago. People use the phrase to describe politeness (perhaps to excess), or evasion of hard truths, or (as a term of abuse by conservatives) liberalism in general. The confusion has made it more attractive to liberals, who share the goal of combating race and gender bias.

But political correctness is not a rigorous commitment to social equality so much as a system of left-wing ideological repression. Not only is it not a form of liberalism; it is antithetical to liberalism. Indeed, its most frequent victims turn out to be liberals themselves.'

Super Bowl ads generate criticisms from anti-misandrists

Mastodon · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As a mother of a son, who is a 100% all-boy alpha male that I have been delighted to raise as such, I was appalled by the crass anti-maleness of the statement. Let's play a game of substitution, shall we?

Pan right, and have Silverman's character whisper, "I'm sorry, it's a girl."

The blow-back from NOW and all the other elite feminist groups would have been of Category 5 Hurricane proportions, with the T-Mobile executives dutifully making the rounds to all the talk shows on their apology tour. After a vitriolic social media campaign in which the participants would be likened to Boko Haram rapists, the company would have been compelled to donate millions to girls' educational programs and the feminist organizations leading the charge. Finally, the feminist activists would not have been satisfied until all parties involved in that commercial were brought to tears, like Dr. Matt Taylor (the comet scientist in the iconic shirt).

But, insult our boys (and half the future market for T-Mobile products) and what do we hear?
...
Leaders of feminist groups behave as if they speak for all women. Well, today, I am usurping the "All Women" Speaker's role, and I formally apologize, #LikeAGirl, to all Super Bowl fans who were subjected to these vapid excuses for female empowerment.

Personally, I will never buy T-Mobile or Always products again. In fact, I assert that one of the animals featured in the Sprint commercial (my favorite), is probably the creative genius behind both these pieces….I am sure my Legal Insurrection friends will readily guess which one, too!

Another helpful hint that I will offer, free of charge, to next year's Super Bowl ad creators: You do not build up one client base by tearing down another. That's a plan that is full of fail.'

Billboard: Super Bowl 2015: 10 Best & 5 Worst Commercials

Mastodon · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Best:

10. T-Mobile

The commercial wasn't as funny as you'd expect from a spot that features both Sarah Silverman and Chelsea Handler, but Silverman handing a newborn baby to her mother and saying, "Sorry, it's a boy" was priceless.'

"Men Should Avoid Progressive Women For Their Own Safety"

Mastodon · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In that spirit, I'm also taking every precaution to protect people I care about from the constant danger posed by Differently-Gendered Americans. So I've sent out to my young male friends a similar mandate: avoid progressive women for your own safety. Seriously. The risks are real.
...
The facts don't seem to matter anymore. If anyone questions an accuser's credibility, the media accuses them of "victim-blaming." As said feminist writer Amanda Marcotte, "Rape is really, really common. I think understanding that is why I believe rape victims. They're usually telling the truth."

Feminists, in coordination with their allies in the media, have discovered a powerful weapon, and they're guarding it with blind, fervent activist group-think. In a post-Sandra Fluke age of overnight social media stars and victimization-as-currency, any college girl with an ax to grind can be guaranteed immediate national celebrity so long as she accuses the right kind of men — be they fraternity brothers or campus Republicans. She'll be shielded from any personal criticism of her background or her motives, and if her story comes apart the folks promoting her lies will still go on to political prominence and MSNBC split-screens. It's an entire industry.
...
Someday, all the young women of America will wear hoods over their faces — hijabs if you will — so men can't even look at them and so they, too, can't see anything except occasional shapes and light objects. Until that day comes, we need to stay the Hell away from each other.

Take it from me in high school, men of America: the less females you interact with, the more episodes of "The Outer Limits" you can watch back-to-back in one sitting. As you embark on this journey, I salute you. Pat yourselves on the back, lonely men. Or, rather… Give yourselves a hand.'

UK: Feminist Comedian Kate Smurthwaite Forced To Cancel Uni Show - Because Student Feminists Didn't Like Her Feminism

Mastodon · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A comedian who was due to perform at a London university and had offered free tickets to student feminists has had her gig pulled, because students feminists said they didn't like her feminism.

Kate Smurthwaite had been intending to talk to Goldsmith University's student comedy society about, ironically, free speech, and a Saudi prisoner of conscience who has been nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize.

But Smurthwaite was informed her gig had been cancelled over security issues, as students had threatened to picket the event.
...
"The picket line appears to have been threatened on the grounds of my views on prostitution. But later when I asked for an explanation of why the gig had been pulled I was told I was Islamophobic because of remarks I made several years ago against compulsory veiling (which they had misinterpreted to conclude I was against anyone wearing a burqa).
...
"In a massively ironic coincidence my show is about free speech, it’s power and uses and abuses," Smurthwaite added.'

The feminist society, meanwhile, has denied claims it organised a picket, and was responsible for the cancellation of the show.'

Harvard Law Fights Awful Ed Department Rules: Bravo, But No School Should Have To

Mastodon · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the salient features of the Obama administration has been its willingness to toss aside the rule of law whenever getting a result that its zealous officials and supporting interest groups want collides with fundamental fairness. Over the last couple of years, that impulse has manifested itself in the brazen demands by the Department of Education that colleges and universities abide by its regulations concerning sexual harassment and assault.

The notion that America's campuses are gripped by an epidemic of sexual assault and tolerate a "rape culture" has never had any basis in fact. It is, however, a meme popular with the feminist left – a hobgoblin they find useful. Efforts at boosting it, such as the infamous Rolling Stone article about an evidently fictitious rape at the University of Virginia have flopped disastrously.

Nevertheless, the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights (OCR) has been on a national blitzkrieg to compel colleges and universities to follow its blatantly one-sided rules for the adjudication of sexual harassment and assault complaints.

...

There is no constitutional authority for the federal government to give or lend money to students, but once it began doing so nobody stopped it. Now federal bureaucrats have the leverage to force schools to obey them. If they don't, the flow of money will stop.

A very small number of institutions, wishing to keep their independence from federal bureaucrats, have done what they had to;they've rejected federal money completely.

Hillsdale College in Michigan is one of them. The school runs its own student loan system, described here by president Larry Arnn, thereby remaining free of the busybodies in Washington. (Running your own system for helping students finance their education has two other big advantages: it reminds administrators to minimize costs and also helps deter non-serious students.)'

Women-only, tuition-free computer programming school opens

Mastodon · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Excerpt here. Excerpt:

'Ada Developers Academy today announced that it will spin out of the Technology Alliance and become its own non-profit organization.

The Seattle-based, tuition-free coding school for women, which we featured last week on GeekWire, will end its formal incubation period with the Tech Alliance and begin transitioning to a standalone non-profit.

“One of the Tech Alliance’s greatest strengths is identifying a need, developing a solution, and finding the right people to make it work,” Susannah Malarkey, Executive Director of the Tech Alliance and co-founder of Ada Developers Academy, said in a statement. “We’re proud that Ada has met with such success, and are looking forward to its next chapter.”

Founded in 2013, Ada offers a year-long software development program that includes six months of intense classroom instruction followed by six months at an internship. Tuition is free thanks to corporate sponsors like Expedia and Zillow that help shape the program’s curriculum, provide mentorship, and offer internships to the students that provide a bridge between the classroom and the real world.'

ACLU, military women's group sue Defense Department for Naval Academy records on female midshipmen

Mastodon · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Advocates for military women are suing the Department of Defense for information about how the Naval Academy and the other military service academies recruit female students — part of a campaign, they say, to expose ongoing gender bias at the elite training grounds for the nation's officer corps.
...
A spokesman for the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs — where the superintendent is a woman — said cadets are selected without reference to gender, and they gain opportunities by earning them.

"In the military, we are rewarded for performance," Lt. Col. Brus Vidal said. "The airplane doesn't care if you're male or female."

Kirsten Gillibrand's Cruel Assault on Justice

Mastodon · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

The media's atrocious coverage of campus sexual assault myths–from uncritically broadcasting fake stories of rape to promulgating false and debunked statistics pushed by the Obama administration to further its "war on women"–has created an interesting phenomenon in response. Good reporters are seeking to "re-report" the stories, in the hopes of setting the record straight and minimizing some of the incredible damage the accusations have done. Cathy Young is one such reporter, and she has a disturbing story at the Daily Beast today that is about more than just flimsy accusations; it's a chilling example of a United States senator's abuse of power.
...
By any remotely reasonable standard, Gillibrand's actions should horrify those who care about basic rights. Unfortunately, the most likely outcome is that this kind of mob mentality will only help her career, since the left has fully embraced turning its declared enemies into "former people," whether they are philanthropic libertarian business leaders or male college students.

It's important to note that these stories should not lessen anyone's sympathy for victims of sexual assault. And one irony of this particular case is that Nungesser agrees: "My mother raised me to be a feminist," he had previously told the New York Times. Young's report makes it easy to believe that. It's also easy to see why Nungesser was cleared. I recommend reading the whole article, which lays out the timeline quite clearly.'

University Men's Lacrosse Team Signs Anti-Sexual Violence Pledge

Mastodon · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Signing a pledge is nothing new for college lacrosse teams. Teams often sign pledges in regards to abstaining from alcohol during the season, but the Brown University men's lacrosse team may have broken new ground by signing a pledge related to preventing sexual violence.

Brown's lacrosse team voluntarily held two programming events this fall with the university's men's health coordinator, Marc Peters, related to sexual assault prevention. Alum and former captain Alex Buckley was inspired and sent the team a sample pledge to sign prior to the season. The team worked with Peters to refine Buckley's pledge and all 39 players signed it in December.

The "Team Up" pledge reads:

I have been made aware of systemic problems of sexual violence on college campuses and elsewhere. These problems include behaviors that are unwanted, not mutually agreed to, lack conscious consent, involve coercion or manipulation by men against women. I realize that there are situations where I can assist those who are at a disadvantage against an aggressor.

Accordingly, I PLEDGE:

- To never use physical force or coercion against women.
- To not joke about situations involving non-consensual physical contact.
- To advocate for the respectful treatment of women.
- To never be complicit in the acts of others that violate this pledge.
- To be on the lookout for warning signs that a non-consensual act is taking place or going to take place.'

Alleged Rapist in Columbia Case Offers His Version of Events, Produces Message Transcripts

Mastodon · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Paul Nungesser, the Columbia University student whom classmate Emma Sulkowicz claims raped her, has come forward with a more factually detailed denial of the allegations against him. In addition to offering his version of events on the night of the alleged rape, he provided a reporter for the Daily Beast with Facebook message transcripts that show warm interactions with Sulkowicz in the weeks and months after the incident.
...
Nungesser says that on the night of the alleged assault, in August 2012, he was not drunk — just buzzed — and he and Sulkowicz engaged in consensual anal sex (among other acts). In a message sent two days after the incident, Sulkowicz accepts Nungesser's invitation to a party, adding: "Also I feel like we need to have some real time where we can talk about life and thingz" and "because we still haven't really had a paul-emma chill sesh since summmmerrrr."

In early October, Sulkowicz responds to a birthday greeting with, "I love you Paul. Where are you?!?!?!?!" — all part of a pattern of friendly behavior, according to Nungesser, who also says that when he was initially contacted by university administrators about a rape allegation, he thought it was as a witness in another sexual-assault case. The transcripts suggest that it wasn't until early 2013 that Sulkowicz stopped responding to Nungesser's messages. (Young's story also casts doubt on allegations of sexual assault against Nungesser by two other Columbia women — both of which he denies.)'

Obama Budget Includes More Money for Agency Policing Campus Sex

Mastodon · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'President Obama's proposed budget includes a $30 million increase for the Education Department's Office for Civil Rights—the federal agency charged with investigating university's sexual assault and anti-harassment policies.

OCR had a budget of about $100 million last year and will get a 31 percent increase under the new budget, according to the Chronicle of Higher Education. The additional funding will allow the agency to hire 200 new employees.

That's bad news for civil libertarians. OCR has been accused of vastly exceeding the scope of federal law in its effort to force universities to adjudicate sexual assault more aggressively. The result has been a wave of new policies imposed on college campuses that limit the due process rights of accused students. Some legal experts—including several members of Harvard University's law faculty—have criticized the agency for pushing a "flawed" interpretation of Title IX of the Higher Education Act, which mandates gender equity. I have gone as far as to call OCR "A Rogue Agency That Must Be Stopped."

OCR's theatrics have badly damaged the rights of students and professors. As an example, the City University of New York recently instructed faculty members not to use the gender-specific salutations "Mr." and "Ms." Why? Because CUNY administrators wrongly believe Title IX requires them to police gender-related speech—and OCR's army of overzealous bureaucrats is to blame for the confusion.'

Also see: How Affirmative Consent Threatens Liberty.

Exonerated of rape, Brian Banks now realizing NFL dream – in different capacity

Mastodon · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's been nearly half a lifetime since Pete Carroll walked up to Brian Banks at Long Beach Poly High and said, "Hey, you can do something. You can be something."

Banks was 15 years old at the time, and to him, that message seemed clear: he had a future playing football.

But two years later, Banks became ensnared in an ordeal of injustice, anger and heartbreak that lasted a decade. On his way to possibly playing for Carroll at USC, Banks was wrongly accused of raping a girl at his high school. Rather than facing 41 years to life in prison if he fought the charges and lost, he pleaded guilty and was sent to prison for five years.

"I screamed and yelled and begged for people to help," Banks said Sunday by phone. "And even then no one listened."

Banks, now 29, was cleared and freed in May 2012 after serving five years of probation (in addition to the five years in prison) when his accuser recanted her story. He got a tryout from Carroll and the Seahawks, and then another from the Falcons. But it was too late for his original dream to come true.

It was not, however, too late for Carroll to be right in his prediction. This year, Banks has found a place where important people are listening: he is working for the NFL in New York City. And even though he just started his first real job, the league might need him even more than he ever needed the league.'

Tim Kaine, Claire McCaskill Bill Would Require Sexual Assault Education In Public High Schools

Mastodon · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As universities and colleges face heightened scrutiny over their handling of campus rape, two Democratic senators want to expand public school health education to require high schoolers to learn about sexual assault.

The Teach Safe Relationships Act of 2015, introduced on Tuesday by Sens. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) and Tim Kaine (D-Va.), would require that health education in public secondary schools include learning on "safe relationship behavior" aimed at preventing sexual assault, domestic violence and dating violence. Under current federal law, health and sex education classes needn't include sexual assault prevention.

The legislation came out of a meeting between Kaine and members of One Less, an education group that advocates for survivors of rape and sexual assault, at the University of Virginia. The school drew national attention in November, when Rolling Stone published a bombshell article recounting the brutal gang rape of a young woman at a fraternity house. Although the story has since been partially discredited, UVA has been accused of failing to address sexual assault and violence.'

Another feminist physically assaults a man

Mastodon · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTube video here. Description:

'Feminist PHYSICALLY assaults a man while chanting "sexual assault is not ok" after raiding and stopping a men's event on dating and pickup'

Rape-Accuser Who Carries Mattress Around Campus Suddenly Begs for Privacy

Mastodon · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Read the whole thing, which concludes with Jazz noting that the Daily Beast “seems to have done their due diligence and contacted Sulkowicz about the social media exchanges. She responded saying that she “confirmed that these records were authentic and not redacted in any way.” She also claimed that she would be sending them ‘annotations’ explaining the context but then decided not to do so.” Additionally, as New York magazine noted yesterday, Sulkowicz pouted that it’s like totally unfair of the Daily Beast to interview both sides of the story, and send someone like Cathy Young (who’s also a frequent contributor to libertarian-themed Reason magazine) who’s like not totally super-serial about radical feminism and stuff:

“Normally I don’t respond to people who use my rapist as collateral in order to make me talk to them,” she told Mic. Then, last Tuesday night, Young emailed again, this time saying she had about six pages of Facebook conversations between Sulkowicz and Nungesser and wanted to confirm their accuracy before publishing.

“It’s an awful feeling where this reporter is digging through my personal life. At this point I didn’t realize that she’s extremely anti-feminist and would do this in order to shame me,” Sulkowicz said, noting that she feels Young has “written other articles supporting the rapists and making survivors look unreliable.”

As Jim Treacher quips, “Why are reporters digging into my personal life? Can’t they see I’m carrying a MATTRESS?”

Heh. Actually, Sulkowicz’s whine seems very reminiscent of the young protestors last month who blocked a major Boston thoroughfare, disrupting traffic and potential endangering lives, and were then suddenly angry and screamed invasion of privacy when a reporter shows up at their doorstep:'

Columbia Student Paper: Our Coverage Of Rape Was One-Sided, Ignored Due Process

Mastodon · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Well, here's something you don't see every day; in an op-ed for the Columbia University student paper, the paper's former editor openly admits their coverage of a prominent campus rape accusation was skewed, because he feared being accused of opposing rape victims if he questioned the victim's story. ...

Columbia student Emma Sulkowicz garnered national attention for carrying her mattress around campus in protest of the university's refusal to punish and expel her rapist. Sulkowicz made the rounds on national media, attended the State of the Union with New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand, and inspired nationwide protests.

But the conversation shifted suddenly yesterday after The Daily Beast published an interview with the student she accused, rebutting many of her claims. In particular, he produced Facebook message records showing that Sukowicz was openly flirtatious and friendly with him months after he supposedly brutally raped her. "I love you Paul," reads one such message, "Where are you?!?!?!?!"'

Are gender roles a marker of true equality?

Matt · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTube video here. Description:

'Men and women, taken as groups, are different in important respects. The differences appear to be based on some combination of biological and cultural forces. But is gender role differentiation a sign of well-being and freedom? Christina Hoff Sommers explains how prosperity and equality may bring greater opportunities for self-actualization.'

TV Star Caught Perjuring Herself To Harm Ex-Husband

Matt · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'GotNews.com has the evidence Pauley Perrette [link added] doesn't want NCIS fans to see, and that RadarOnline was afraid to print: Pauley Perrette's signature under penalty of perjury, falsely declaring "I called it Star Crazy. There was no treatment and no script."

Perrette's signed Declaration is directly impeached by her videotaped testimony that RadarOnline published earlier today, in which Pauley admits numerous times to the existence of a script called Star Crazy.

GotNews also has evidence indicating Perrette's attorney Larry Stein bullied RadarOnline into suppressing the evidence of Perrette's false declaration. RadarOnline was originally going to publish the damning evidence, and sent an email stating so, asking for a comment.

But instead of commenting, Perrette has attorney Larry Stein trying to cover it all up. They introduced the RadarOnline letter into Los Angeles Superior Criminal Court. Subsequently, RadarOnline went ahead and released the video as planned, but suddenly backed off from publishing Perrette's declaration signed under penalty of perjury.'

Congress Should Reject Obama Budget Increase for Education Department Office for Civil Rights

Matt · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Obama administration perversely rewards agencies that overstep their authority by giving them budget increases to handle the increased workload that results.

A classic example is the Education Department's Office for Civil Rights (OCR), where I used to work. President Obama wants a 31%budget increase for OCR for Fiscal Year 2016. That is a very bad idea.

OCR's budget should be cut, not increased. Cutting its budget would make it harder for it to punish school districts and colleges for perfectly lawful and reasonable policies. People who write about educational issues, such as Reasonmagazine's Robby Soave, and theNational Review's George Leef, rightly oppose the proposed budget increase for OCR.

OCR has twisted virtually every statute it is charged with enforcing, such as Title VI, Title IX, the Rehabilitation Act, and the Americans with Disabilities Act. Citing Title VI, which bans racial discrimination, OCR has demanded that school districts adopt what are effectively illegal racial quotas in school discipline, even though that violates the Constitution, the Seventh Circuit's decision in People Who Care v. Rockford Board of Education (1997), and the plain language of the Title VI statute.'

Women’s only hours at the rec center is a discriminatory policy

Mastodon · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Necessary seems like a strong word doesn’t it? Some people might not consider the “women’s only hours” at our university rec center discrimination, but is there a better word to use for denying service to a certain group of people based on their sex? This kind of blatant sexism demonizes masculinity while further marginalizing women. All students pay the same rec center price (through tuition), but are receiving a different level of service because of this policy.

“People are different in many brilliant ways. If we strive to make everything as fair as possible, we forget the fundamental lesson that life is not fair.” wrote Jessica Foster in her most recent opinion piece where she praises the gender segregation encouraged by this policy. Of course, her statement seems silly. “Women’s only hours” should be justified by more than just a “life isn’t fair”argument, right? I just watched Selma, a fantastic film about Martin Luther King Jr and the Civil Rights Movement. Imagine someone trying to tell the civil rights activists that the racial inequalities our nation faced were actually appropriate because they reminded us of “the fundamental lesson that life is not fair.”

I recently had the chance to sit down with the rec center staff and the people who design the operating policies for the facility to discuss the history and reasons behind the “women’s only” policies. Of course, the reasoning and intentions are not malicious by any means. The policy is a solution to a set of problems regarding women feeling uncomfortable or intimidated while working out and specific religious constraints that don’t allow women to workout or swim with males around. I’m not dismissing these issues, but I wonder if the solution our university has chosen is appropriate. Isn’t abolishing gender role expectations and stereotypes part of what third wave feminism is all about? As a university community, don’t we have a responsibility to ensure that our policies promote gender equality instead of furthering the divide?'

Ginsburg: Will Be Enough Women on SCOTUS When They're All Women

Mastodon · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Wednesday at Georgetown University Law Center, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said there will be enough women on the Supreme Court when it is all women.

Ginsburg said, "People ask me sometimes, when do you think it will be enough? When will there be enough women on the court? And my answer is, when there are nine. Some people are taken aback, until they remember that for most of our country's history, there were only men on the high court bench.'

Prostate Cancer Advocacy Alert

Matt · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From a Malecare.org alert I received today:

The national men's cancer survivor support and advocacy nonprofit organization, Malecare, protests against the proposed elimination of funding for prostate cancer at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Prostate cancer is one of the most common cancers in America. Almost 30,000 American men die from prostate cancer every year. And, twice as many African American men die from prostate cancer as do white men. Incredibly, the 2016 President's Budget request would eliminate prostate cancer funding at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The FY 2016 budget request eliminates the entire $13,200,000 budget for prostate cancer activities. While the evidence on prostate cancer screening remains unclear, CDC has conducted extensive research on and developed materials to help doctors and other health providers better communicate with their patients about informed decision making related to prostate cancer screening and treatment. The proposed elimination will not impact CDC's ability to collect data on national prostate cancer incidence through the National Program of Cancer Registries, nor hinder the ability to share resources and lessons learned.

Malecare will pursue this advocacy issue with appropriate vigor. We hope to engage our counterpart prostate cancer organizations in a collaborative effort to prevent the elimination of the CDC prostate cancer program.

Please send your name and location (city, state, zip code) to darryl@malecare.org if you want to help.

Please email any questions to: darryl@malecare.org

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare

Men fighting cancer, together.

Senate Armed Services Committee Hearing

Mastodon · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Women in the Military

50. Do you believe that the services are conducting appropriate and objective evaluations to inform decisions on the integration of women into previously closed units and military occupations?

It is my understanding that the Services and U.S. Special Operations Command have been conducting evaluations in accordance with their respective implementation plans. If confirmed, I will closely monitor their progress and ensure they stay on track and meet the Department's timelines. If I receive requests for exception to policy, I will carefully consider them when the time comes.

51. In your view, should the Military Selective Service Act be amended to require females to register for possible military service?

I understand a recent law requires the Department to provide an analysis of the constitutionality of continued application of the Military Selective Service Act to only men.

52. In your view, and if the Military Selective Service Act is so revised, in a future exigency in which the Nation may need to implement a draft, are there any reasons why qualified males and females should not be subject to the draft?

Given that the Armed Forces have waged the longest continuous conflict in our history with an All-Volunteer Force, and the fact that most military career fields are now open to women, a review of the military selective service act would be prudent. This is not solely a Defense issue, but rather part of a much broader national discussion.'

The testatur was Ashton Carter, the nominee for the SecDef position. Related: Secretary Of Defense Nominee Appears Headed For Easy Confirmation

The Patriarchy's Perfect Weapon: 'But What If She's Lying?'

Mastodon · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Stop me if you've heard this one before: But what if she's lying?

That's the gist of yet another take on yet another high-profile rape case, this time in the Daily Beast, whose writer Cathy Young trotted it out as the least counterintuitive of all possible premises when it comes to sexual violence.
...
But there is patriarchy. A perfect, many-armed monster, which lives and thrives in this perfect universe of its own design. And it wields the perfect weapon: rape culture.
...
The monster is smart, and it knows where and when to hide and when to strike. Of course it does. The world is its playground, its lair, a welcoming cavern outfitted with comforting amenities like the phrase, But what if she's lying.'

Fathers claim N.J. family court judges violated their constitutional rights

Mastodon · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A group of fathers have filed a lawsuit in federal court claiming that their constitutional rights were violated when New Jersey family court judges denied them custody of their children.

Six fathers are suing the state and five family court judges in U.S. District Court in Trenton, saying they lost custody shortly after being accused of domestic violence or being incompetent parents.

They claim they should have been given an immediate full hearing allowed to them under the U.S. Constitution.

"Parents in New Jersey are losing custody of children without due process," said Paul Clark, the fathers' attorney.'

City residents plead for Family Court reform during legislative 'coffee'

Mastodon · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Several attendees talked about divorces that had dragged through what seemed like endless issues in the state's family court system and seemed to have a heavier impact on women than men.

Sandra Eagle, a psychotherapist and marriage counselor in Greenwich, said "parental alienation," where a child is "alienated" against a parent through false allegations of abuse, is used by courts to give custody to unfit parents despite valid claims of abuse. The definition has been discredited by the mental health and domestic abuse professionals, she said.

Eagle charged that courts are "undoing" good work by these professionals and putting kids at risk by grabbing onto this theory.

Andrew Willis, CEO of Stop Abuse Campaign, urged the legislators to sign onto the proposed national Safe Child Act, designed to make for a safer environment for children during a divorce hearing.
...
"What they're doing in divorce and to children is unconscionable," Edwards said. "We have mothers who are trying to get divorces against men with means who don't do anything to support their children and they're forced to go through this chase that goes on and on. Mothers are forced to go on food stamps because of this and I can't understand why this system doesn't respond."'

Columbia, the New UVA

Matt · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Uh--oh: Emma Sulkowicz, the Columbia senior who's been lugging a mattress around campus for months to protest her supposed rape by a classmate during their freshman year, is fast turning into another "Jackie," the University of Virginia student whose claimed gang rape in a fraternity-house basement turned out to be a tall tale concocted by Jackie to get the romantic attention of a young man she had a crush on.

Paul Nungesser, now a Columbia senior like Sulkowicz, she says conducted a brutal anal assault on her in her dorm room following a session of consensual sex—and whom she made a public campus pariah despite the fact that he had been cleared by a Columbia tribunal—finally told his side of the story, to libertarian journalist Cathy Young, writing for the Daily Beast.

In Nungesser's telling, not only was the entire sexual episode between him and Sulkowicz on Aug. 27, 2012 entirely consensual—the two had an off-and-on "friends with benefits" relationship that grew out of their joint participation in a freshmen-orientation program at Columbia—but Nungesser had the Facebook messages between the two to prove it. For two full months after the supposed assault, Sulkowicz was sending Nungesser friendly texts and Facebook postings expressing hope that the two of them could get together again. Nungesser provided screenshots of the since-deleted messages to Young and the Daily Beast.'

Lawyer announces intent to sue university over handling of rape allegation

Mastodon · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A lawyer for two of the William Paterson University students accused of a campus gang rape announced Friday morning they intended to sue the school, its president and other officials after all charges against the men were dismissed.

...

Michael J. Esptein, lawyer representing Collick, his mother, Nancy Williams, and Noah Williams, filed a "notice of tort claim," this week, which is required when someone plans to sue a public agency.

William Paterson University officials failed to conduct a proper investigation of the rape allegations and were not properly trained to investigate such crimes, the claim said. The students were deprived of their rights to due process when they were arrested without probable cause, leading to violations of the state and U.S. Constitution, the claim further alleged.'

For families choosing not to circumcise, a sea change

Matt · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sue Bojdak, Temple Sinai's director of education, said she sometimes needs to quell the concerns of new parents about whether their noncircumcised sons will feel welcome. "It's nice to be able to tell these parents, we not only welcome you but we welcome you openly," Bojdak said.

But why would parents call attention to a boy's circumcision status? Isn't that a private matter? Well, yes — but that doesn't mean they should need to be secretive or apologetic about their choice. For example, noncircumcising parents may feel some trepidation about diaper changes or toilet supervision in Jewish preschool. Some may decide to forgo Jewish programming and affiliation instead of having to explain themselves.

"Families shouldn't feel they have to hide, or take the don't-ask-don't-tell route," said Anat Shenker, the mother of two sons who are not circumcised. "It's not nice to feel like you've done something wrong or cagey — like you're trying to pull a fast one."

Shenker added, "Circumcision is the last holdout in terms of [synagogues'] walking the diversity talk." She said she and her husband joined Temple Sinai largely because of its unreserved welcome of her family.

Billie Mandel, a newcomer to Temple Sinai, also appreciates the inclusive attitude there. "It has been a comfort and a relief for me and my family to feel welcomed at Temple Sinai," she said, "because of, and not in spite of, our alternative choices — including the decision not to circumcise our little son."'

Men Break Down Watching Footage Of Female Genital Mutilation, Vow To Speak Out Against Practice

Mastodon · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sometimes it takes a glimpse into a dark reality in order to spark positive change.

In a video produced by advocacy group Safe Hands for Mothers, young men were asked if they knew what female genital mutilation, or FGM, is, and none of them did. The men then watched clips from a documentary that showed the abusive practice -- which partially or entirely removes the female genitals for non-medical reasons (the clips were recreations and did not show actual victims, according to Safe Hands for Mothers).

Many of the young men cringed, squirmed in their seats and cried as the disturbing footage played.

"This is just barbaric," one of them said.

"I felt powerless," another man noted. "I felt like I couldn't do anything to help."

The video concludes with the men saying, "Now that I know, I say 'no' to FGM.'

YouTube video of a circumcision of a baby boy here.

Columbia: Attend Rape Workshops Or No Diploma

Mastodon · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Columbia University may be compelling students in the next month to complete a sexual assault education program or else lose the ability to register for classes or even receive their diploma, according to the Columbia Spectator.
...
Students will have a host of options for how to complete the requirement, including attending an hour-long workshop, watching and discussing a series of short films on the matter or even crafting works of art and poetry to engage with the topic. They will be expected to have complied with the school's demand by March 13, just one month following its announcement.
...
Notably, while participation is expected of all students in Columbia's undergraduate and graduate programs, students at Barnard College, Columbia's all-women affiliate, will not be required to take part, suggesting the target of the initiative is actually Columbia's men.'

Paying attention to the overcorrections

Mastodon · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Shortly after the credibility of Rolling Stone's article "A Rape on Campus" began unraveling, Slate Magazine published a similar long-form investigative piece. Emily Yoffe's "The College Rape Overcorrection," however, went generally unnoticed, particularly on this campus. Yoffe's piece also concerned rape accusations dating back to 2012, but her piece focused on a male undergraduate student named Drew Sterrett at the University of Michigan.
...
Given the compelling support Sterrett had responsibly compiled, it would seem unfounded for the University to take drastic measures. Nonetheless, despite his evidence, Sterrett was suspended from the University until July 2016 — after the accuser graduated — and in order for the University to consider reinstating him, he would have to agree that he engaged in sexual misconduct. Regardless of whether or not he returned, the finding would stay on his permanent record. Sterrett has since filed a lawsuit again the University alleging that he had been deprived of his constitutional right to due process.
...
While we need to adopt an effective system through which to properly represent the victims of sexual assault, it cannot be one that ignores the rights of the accused. The issue at hand has a long-standing history of imbalance, rife with injustice for victims of rape, but the solution is not to tip the scales in the opposite direction. Consideration and reevaluation should go into all pertinent university policies, as well as legislation and federal laws.'

How would you feel if your husband said this about you?

Mastodon · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I was with a group of friends the other day when the discussion turned to our husbands. I held my breath and waited for someone to say my least favorite saying in the entire world.

Yep, someone said, "Oh, I have four kids — my three girls and my husband." Ugh. It supposed to sound cute, but it doesn't. It sounds condescending.

Women need their friends in a very real but very different way than men need their friends. We use girl time to talk through our problems and make sense of what's going on in our lives, but too often conversations dissolve into "man bashing." We see it as harmless joking at our husbands' expense. No big deal, right?

Let's turn the tables for a second and imagine this scenario. Picture your husband sitting around talking with his friends. This is what they say.
...
Husband: "We went on a picnic as a family. It was crazy, though. I had to get everyone ready because my wife was primping in the bathroom forever. She's so scattered sometimes. I wish she'd help out more. I feel like everything is my responsibility the second I get home from work. I mean, come on, the house is a wreck, and... "

I could go on, but I think you can fill in the blanks. Now, imagine you knew your husband said this about you. You'd probably kill him. I mean, how dare he talk about you like that to someone else? That's completely unacceptable.

Except, ladies, we do this all the time. I think we let ourselves off the hook because we're more social. We like to talk, and we can look cute and jokey without coming off like jerks. That doesn't make it OK, however.
...
I love my husband so much! He's an amazing father, and I appreciate the effort he puts into providing for our family. I'm not afraid of sending that message out into the world. After all, I chose him. His good nature reflects my good taste. Think about that the next time you're chatting with your girlfriends.'

Cathy Young ambushed on TV by feminists

Mastodon · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This is seriously one of the worst segments I've seen that demonstrates just how rabid and foaming at the mouth liberal feminists can get about accusations of rape and how how men simply should not be allowed to defend themselves against sexual assault allegations.

Daily Beast writer Cathy Young is invited to talk about her piece showing how a rape accusation case becomes "murky," but they didn't bring her on for honest intellectual discussion, they just wanted to skin her alive.
...
It's really an amazing clip because Perry and Irin Carmon go on the attack despite Young being very reasonable. I would think that a woman making rape accusations and then contacting the person she's accusing to hang out just might help the guy if he is denying the allegations, but in Perry and Carmon's world, just the accusation is enough for a condemnation.

Take a deep look, America, these are your gyno-fascist feminists. Incredible and frightening.'

Feminist Decides to Abort Her Son Solely Because He is Male

Mastodon · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A revelatory posting *[link added] by a hate-filled, radical feminist calling herself “Lana” recently appeared on the extremist website called “Injustice Stories.” The story ostensibly tells the tale of how “Lana” aborted her baby because she found out that the child was a boy. “Lana” says she killed her baby because she didn’t want to bring another male “monster” into the world. And she is proud of her decision.

The posting detailing Lana’s story on what led her to abort her baby is disgusting, certainly, but it does nicely describe the logical end game of feminism: the genocide of the male of the species.

The story appears on a site where “hatred is not allowed” but this is obviously a convenient lie because “Lana’s” post is entirely based on abject hate for men. Of course, we know why the story was allowed. It’s because “Lana” claims to be an oppressed female who is fighting “injustice” when in reality all she is, is a proto Nazi advocating a form of eugenics.'

Also see:

- Feminist: I Stand By My Decision To Abort My Baby Because It Was Male
- WOW: 'I Aborted My Baby Because It Was A Boy'
- Feminist Aborts Son because he was a Boy; “I Couldn’t Bring Another Monster into the World”

---
* To avoid the extortionate 'Click "Like" button' barrier, you can read the entire article here without that problem.

High school teachers arrested for sexual misconduct, styled as being in "hot water"

Matt · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. The title says they're in "hot water"? Imagine if male teachers had done the same to female students what the report title would be!

'It began a few months ago, when in November, Melody Lippert, a teacher with the South Hills High School, allegedly met with a group of male students, gave them alcohol, and then “engaged in a sexual relationship with one of them” according to the Orange County Sheriff’s Department.

Two weeks ago, Lippert supposedly set up another overnight beach trip, this time, inviting Michelle Ghirelli who used to teach at South Hills High School before being transferred to work in the district’s offices. It’s suspected that the two women engaged in an inappropriate sexual relationship during that trip. The school had no idea the pair had set up a beach trip.

The 38-year-old Lippert was arrested on suspicion of conspiracy and contributing to the delinquency of a minor. Ghirelli (who is 30) faces charges of oral copulation and unlawful sex with a minor.

The Orange County Sheriff’s department has refused to release any more details on the nature of the relationship between the teachers and students, or what may or may not have happened on that overnight beach trip.

For now, both women have been put on Administrative leave and removed from the classroom as of Sunday morning.'

Childhood Criminalized: Suspended In Elementary School

Mastodon · 9 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A nine-year-old Texas schoolboy was suspended from his elementary school for posession of a “magic ring.” Remember the poptart gun? The Nerf gun? The Lego gun? The pointed finger gun? In another time, these typical childrens’ toys would have gotten as little notice as the old fashioned cap gun but in a world where the list of childhood offenses also includes possession of a novelty pen or a Hello Kitty bubble gun, it comes as little surprise that a Lord of the Rings “magic ring” would land Aiden Steward in suspension from his elementary school in Kermit, Texas.

The story spread like wildfire from Yahoo News! to FOX News, originating with the Odessa American’s original report on the budding fourth grade magician who was accused of “terrorizing” his classmates because he said that he would make them “disappear” with his Hobbit prop. Unfortunately, in the 21st Century classroom, displays of “make-believe” are not taken with a grain of salt. Instead, they are perceived through a wary eye, often warranting the kind of macabre school sanctioned remediation that transforms kiddies into criminals.

Welcome to public school, a place where the US Department of Education’s Office of Civil Rights March 2014 snapshot of the 2011-12 school year showed that boys, as a demographic group regardless of race and/or socioeconomic strata, represented 79% of preschool children suspended once and 82% of preschool children suspended multiple times, although boys only represented 54% of preschool enrollment.

Even a Yale University study revealed that boys are nearly five times more likely to be expelled from preschool than girls.'

In Grammy video, Obama says of rape, ‘It’s not okay – and it has to stop’

Mastodon · 9 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The public service announcement represents the latest installment in the White House's ongoing "It's On Us," campaign, which aims to end sexual assaults on college campuses. The administration began the effort in September, with the support of major college sports leagues and prominent celebrities.

Obama asked the artists featured at the Grammys to ask their fans to make the same pledge that these prominent figures have made, along with students from more than 200 colleges and universities, several collegiate sports organizations, and some private firms. He notes that nearly 1 in 5 women in the U.S. has experienced rape or attempted rape, and that more than 1 in 4 has suffered some form of domestic violence.'

"Competent women are getting bypassed by overconfident men"

Mastodon · 9 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Ezra Klein: There are a couple parts of the book in drawing out the implications of those findings that are really depressing. When you read some of these studies, I think you might step back and say, "You know what, that's great. If men are overconfident fools, and women correctly have more humility about what we as fallible human beings know about the world, that's going to be a huge advantage for women."

Then you run the numbers, and you find that people projecting overconfidence in the workplace ends up being a huge advantage for them.'

The Illiberal Ezra Klein: '...in Klein's words, that it will "create a world where men are afraid" enough of the authorities that they "feel a cold spike of fear when they begin a sexual encounter." All in all, Klein adduces, "The Yes Means Yes law could also be called the You Better Be Pretty Damn Sure law."'

The Best Way to Address Campus Rape

Matt · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What explains the nearly universal lack of confidence in these proceedings? Universities share some of the blame, but there's another culprit too: the United States government. People often wonder why college administrators try to adjudicate these fiendishly difficult cases, rather than putting them in the hands of the criminal justice system.

The reason is that the Department of Education has very forcefully told schools to handle sexual grievances themselves and given them very detailed instructions about how to do so. A report last year from a White House task force on campus sexual assault underscored the importance to a university of following that advice. Even though the D.O.E.'s instructions are presented as recommendations rather than law, its Office for Civil Rights can put any school that fails to follow them on the list of colleges under investigation and even take away its federal funding.

...

What should universities do to convince the world that they're fit to deal with campus rape? First, they should band together and demand that the government rethink its guidelines, especially those that flout the key tenets of due process. Second, they should ask the Office for Civil Rights to clarify its notion of sexual misconduct, now left to each school to define. Is it rape if a man fails to get affirmative consent at every stage of a sexual interaction, or only if he ignores a spoken objection? If a man and a woman are equally drunk, should he be found guilty of assaulting her because she was too intoxicated to agree to sex, even though he himself may have been too drunk to know that? (Right now, at most schools, he would be considered guilty.)

...

It is widely believed that the police are insensitive to rape victims. Universities, on the whole, have a great deal of clout in their communities; they also possess considerable intellectual resources. They could be helping policemen and prosecutors do a better job with sexual violence cases instead of squandering money and good will on their own all-too-easily second-guessed shadow justice systems.'

Columbia/Sulkowicz timeline

Matt · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Mattress-toting, alleged rape victim and performance artist Emma Sulkowicz is a feminist icon because progressive pundits have treated her rape accusation against Paul Nungesser as tantamount to a conviction. Daniel Garisto, former editorial page editor of the Columbia Spectator (the Spectator is one of Sulkowicz's biggest cheerleaders), has now admitted that the campus news media didn't cover Sulkowicz's story impartially, critically, or thoroughly: "Personally, I felt that if I covered the existence of a different perspective—say, that due process should be respected—not only would I have been excoriated, but many would have said that I was harming survivors and the fight against sexual assault," he wrote. ... Yesterday, the New York Post said Mr. Nungesser deserves an apology "from the media and the cabal of feminists ... who have supported his accuser unquestioningly."

Does Sulkowicz's story add up? Is she a rape victim? Or a woman who manufactured victimhood with a story that's a moving target? Consider the following timeline of pertinent events:'

SAVE Denounces President Obama's Misleading Portrayal of Domestic Violence

Matt · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release from SAVE:

WASHINGTON / February 10, 2015 – A leading domestic violence organization is criticizing President Obama for use of highly misleading claims on domestic violence. In a taped message to viewers of the Grammy awards Sunday night, President Obama called for an end to "violence against women and girls." The President did not mention the problem of domestic violence against men and boys, even though males are equally likely to be victims of female-perpetrated abuse.

The problem of female-perpetrated violence has been documented in hundreds of studies. A research summary by Jennifer Langhinrichsen-Rohling, PhD of the University of South Alabama reported that females were more likely than males to be the perpetrators of unidirectional violence, by a two-to-one margin.

One compilation of 286 scholarly investigations concludes, "women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners:" http://www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm

SAVE has previously requested the Obama Administration to rely on accurate information in its domestic violence efforts: http://www.saveservices.org/camp/biased-briefing/biden-the-view/

‘Rape Culture’ and Feminism’s Sexual Exploitation of Women

Mastodon · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Cathy Young simply allows the accused man in this case, long since outed as Paul Nungesser, to tell the story from his own perspective, with Young verifying his facts—a novel approach to journalism, I know. The results look pretty bad. A university hearing already thoroughly examined the case using a relatively low standard, looking for a “preponderance of evidence” rather than seeking to establish Nungesser’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Yet they found Sulkowicz’s testimony not to be credible and cleared Nungesser of the charges. ...

The safe route for journalists is to say that maybe something really did happen and nobody can really know. But given that Nungesser was officially cleared by Columbia in a hearing that was pretty much primed to find him guilty, I think we’re entitled to say that Sulkowicz’s claim didn’t hold up.

The giveaway, really, is that she decided it would be “too draining” to pursue the case with the police—and then she literally carried a mattress around with her for more than a year and made a public spectacle of her victimhood. I suspect that the only burden she really feared was the burden of proof.
...
But you can see the standard at work here: the only people qualified to report on the issue of rape are those with the right ideological commitments who agree never to report the accused man’s side of the story. I can see why Sulkowicz might want to establish such a standard. I just can’t see why the rest of us would agree to go along with it.

As Caroline Williamson concluded in an op-ed for the Columbia student newspaper, “The mistake we’ve all made has been substituting belief in an ideal with certainty about a specific case. There was never enough evidence presented to the public to expel Nungesser from school or convict him in court, so there should not have been enough to convict him in the media.”'

Male sex assault victim files Title IX lawsuit against local school system

Mastodon · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former Traverse City Area Public Schools student who was sexually assaulted by a teacher has filed a Title IX lawsuit against the district.

The federal lawsuit claims the teenage boy was harassed, ostracized and excluded by the district's "retaliatory treatment," which ultimately led him to drop out of high school.

The former Traverse City West Senior High School student was 15 years old when Lisa Gaye Placek, who was later convicted, sent him lewd text messages and performed oral sex on him in her car during the 2011-2012 school year.
...
She pleaded guilty to assault with intent to commit sexual penetration and was sentenced in March 2012 to 23 months to 10 years in prison. Michigan Department of Corrections records show she was paroled to Grand Traverse County in January 2014.

The lawsuit filed Monday, Feb. 9, in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids claims a violation of Title IX, the federal legislation that prohibits gender discrimination on the basis of sex in education programs and activities. The lawsuit also claims the student's rights were violated under the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th amendment and Michigan's Elliot-Larsen Civil Rights Act, which prohibits discrimination based on a variety of factors.'

Obama now claiming 1 in 5 women in America have experienced rape or attempted rape

Mastodon · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Right now, nearly 1 in 5 women in America has been a victim of rape or attempted rape," President Obama said Sunday night in a message played during the Grammys. "And more than 1 in 4 women has experienced some form of domestic violence."

Wow, just wow.

Gone are the days that the president makes false claims that 1 in 5 women will be sexually assaulted while in college. Now 20 percent of all women in America have been raped or nearly raped. And 25 percent of American women — not just college women — have experienced domestic violence.

Let's just think about that for a minute. The current population of the U.S. is 316.1 million, with women comprising about half. That means there are about 158 million women and girls in the U.S. If 20 percent of American women have been raped or almost raped, that's a total of 31.6 million women, which is somewhere between the populations of Texas and California."'

Are men natural born criminals? The prison numbers don't lie

Mastodon · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The factors most commonly thought to contribute to crime - a lack of education (half of prisoners have no qualifications, compared with 15 per cent of the general population); experiences of violence or abuse as a child (41 per cent of prisoners witnessed domestic violence as a child and almost a third experienced abuse); financial difficulties, and so on—affect men and women alike. Yet from pickpocketing to white collar crime to assault, men are more likely to offend than women.

For a long time, this phenomenon was overlooked. Criminological research and theory focused almost exclusively on men, without explicitly questioning why the gap existed. But as feminist theorists started demanding a closer look at such differences the crime gap rose to light, and from the 1970s onwards various explanations were presented. Today, although there is still no universally-accepted explanation, most criminologists point to socialised gender roles and the different expectations of male and female behaviour.
...
Some people have of course argued that it is biological rather than sociological: that men are naturally more violent, for example, or that they're stronger and therefore more capable of committing some crimes. These assumptions might explain why it took so long for anyone to question the different levels of crime among men and women. But as Heidensohn points out, most crimes are not violent in nature and can't be put down to physical differences: the most common crimes in the UK are motoring offences. Men do tend to take more risks, according to many studies, which could be relevant, although whether that's an innate or socialised difference is difficult to tell; more on that later.

Could it be that women commit more crime than it appears but are simply better at getting away with it? One idea - the so-called "chivalry theory" - holds that paternalistic judges and authority figures are more lenient on female offenders, explaining the lower number of women behind bars. The evidence on this is complex and contradictory: there is a competing view that judges are sometimes harsher on women because criminal behaviour deviates further from what is expected of them.'

Male victims of domestic violence don't always report abuse

Mastodon · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Domestic violence advocates say last week's murder-suicide at the University of South Carolina is a chilling reminder that men are also the victims of domestic abuse.

Advocates say that statistically more men are abusers than women, but they do help men who are victims themselves, and advocates believe many cases of domestic violence against men may go unreported.

“There are women who are perpetrators of domestic violence and it can be deadly,” Safe Harbor Executive Director Becky Callaham told WYFF News 4’s Ashley Swann.

“There are men who are being abused and being abused right now. And I think the stigma attached to it is so much worse for a man that men are reluctant to ask for help."'

Professor was killed by ex-wife in University of South Carolina murder-suicide, coroner says

Mastodon · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A professor who taught anatomy and physiology and was highly regarded by both his students and fellow faculty members was shot and killed by his ex-wife in an apparent murder-suicide at the University of South Carolina, a coroner said Friday.

Sunghee Kwon shot Raja Fayad several times in the upper body Thursday afternoon in a fourth-floor office at the university's Public Health building, Richland County Coroner Gary Watts said in a news release.

Kwan then committed suicide with a gunshot to her stomach, the coroner said. A 9 mm pistol with an empty magazine was found near the bodies, State Law Enforcement Division spokesman Thom Berry said.'

Women’s College Exempts Itself From Sex Assault Lessons

Mastodon · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Barnard College, the all-women companion school to Columbia University, has announced that its students will be exempted from mandatory sexual assault education at the school on the grounds that its female student body “[doesn't] need it as much as much as Columbia students do.”
...
“It seemed premature to require something that took a hold on registration or a hold on a diploma, because we didn’t feel we had enough information,” Zavadil told a meeting of Columbia’s student government.

This non-involvement comes despite the fact that Barnard students have helped to craft Columbia’s new sexual assault policies. In addition, Barnard is under a federal investigation for potential Title IX violations based on the mishandling of sexual assault, so it is hardly exempt from any problems pertaining to sexual assault at Columbia. Its decision to opt out is unlikely to quiet critics who worry that campus crusades against sexual assault are simply turning into the vilification of men.'

"Stop Manspreading on Planes"

Mastodon · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The manspreading scourge is real. Men Taking Up Too Much Space on the Train offers a robust body of evidence. And some city transit departments are even fighting back. The Metropolitan Transportation Authority in New York is running a campaign encouraging men to limit their legs to a single seat. The campaign features a list of "do's" and "no's," including "Dude… Stop the Spread, Please" in the no column with a little picture of a man who appears to be in goddess pose.
...
I'd love to lean over and politely ask my V-shaped seatmate to move his legs, but cooperation is hardly guaranteed. Some men think they're endowed by their creator to manspread. When Gothamist rode the New York City subway and confronted manspreading passengers, one rider said, "We have no choice to have our legs like that. You know what I mean? It's different for a woman."

Guys, maybe you don't always realize it, but sometimes you're giving your man parts more space than my entire body. One ticket, one seat. Let's remember to stop the spread.'

Local Lawmakers Introduce Sexual Assault Bills in California

Mastodon · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Continuing her work to address student sexual assault, Senator Hannah-Beth Jackson (D-Santa Barbara) has just introduced a bill that would permit community colleges to extend their jurisdiction beyond their campus borders for sexual assault and other serious student conduct violations.

Senate Bill 186 will allow community college districts to use their disciplinary process to expel or suspend students for off-campus behavior that is determined to be "egregious," such as sexual assault, physical abuse, threats of violence, arson-related offenses, sexual harassment, stalking and hazing. UC and CSU campuses already have such extended jurisdictions in place. But as a result of current law, community colleges have had no recourse when inappropriate student behavior occurs outside campus boundaries.

"I have heard from community college leaders that this is a tool they would like to have in place so they can keep their students and communities safe. This is particularly important in a place such as Isla Vista, where we have UC students and community colleges students living next to each other, but being held to different standards, " said Jackson. "This will level the playing field for all students - regardless of where they are enrolled - so that they know that whether they are in the classroom or a few miles from it, they must behave appropriately."'

What pay gap? Young women in New York earn more than male peers: study

Mastodon · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'You go, girls!

Young women in New York have closed the pay gap and actually earn more money than their male peers, a new study shows.

Female millennials bring in $1.02 for every $1 earned by young men in New York, according to new number-crunching by the Institute for Women's Policy Research.

The shattered glass ceiling is likely connected to New York women's high education rate, with 47% of 25- to 34-year-old women in the state holding a bachelor's degree or better, compared to just 38% of men.

"Things are changing," says study director Ariane Hegewisch. "You can see the impact of young women going to college and developing themselves. They are being given opportunities."'

Snopes.com determines "Lana story" is likely false

Matt · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On 17 January 2015, the website Injustice Stories published an article purportedly penned by a woman named Lana who claimed to have terminated her pregnancy at the five-month mark because she learned the fetus was male.

...

Missing from the account were any identifying details about the timeframe in which the purported abortion occurred, the general locality, or any other details or information regarding the procedure. In fact, the process of terminating a pregnancy after the twenty-week mark is far more complex and risky than a first-trimester abortion, and women who have experienced it are unlikely to describe it as "without a hitch."

Inconsistencies aside, the site Injustice Stories was virtually unknown before the implausible story of Lana's abortion was published. That's probably because a domain lookup revealed the domain was registered on the same day Lana's story was posted. Furthermore, in order to read the entirety of the article, site visitors were forced to share the page on social media (which in turn boosted its visibility incrementally before it caught the eye of larger news sources). The tale's lack of plausibility, combined with the use of a brand-new site to publish it, indicated that the account was likely a troll for pageviews, not a real-life account representing the sordid state of feminism. While many skeptical readers believed the hoax was aimed at promoting an anti-abortion agenda, it's also possible the site's purveyor fabricated the tale primarily to generate outrage-based clicks.'

Youth Sport - Biggest victims girls?

fathers4fairness · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Another "the real victim is girls" article points out the obvious: because women are not as strong/smart as men, they suffer greater percentages of injury per player, but it doesn't say what the total numbers are. Excerpt:

'Recent studies of high school and collegiate athletes have shown that girls and women suffer from concussions at higher rates than boys and men in similar sports — often significantly higher. For instance, in a recent analysis of college athletic injuries, female softball players experienced concussions at double the rate of male baseball players. Women also experienced higher rates of concussions than men in basketball and soccer. Across all sports in the study, the highest rate of concussions was reported not by male football players, but by female ice hockey players. In that sport, a woman experienced a concussion once every 1,100 games or practices — nearly three times the rate experienced in football. The gender disparity exists in high school sports, too. One study, analyzing concussion data for athletes in 25 high schools, found that in soccer, girls experienced concussions at twice the rate of boys.
...
We also need more and better science on the gender differences in concussions. There is painfully little research on why female athletes are so susceptible to athletic brain injuries and how to better protect them. For instance, helmets are mandated in boys' lacrosse, but not in girls'. Without better science, debate rages over whether helmets would make girls less susceptible to concussions, or simply encourage them to be more aggressive on the field, making them more susceptible. And in ice hockey, it's hard to explain why girls are suffering a higher rate of concussions than boys even though intentional body checking is prohibited in the girls' game.'

Australian Macquarie Dictionary votes "mansplain" Word of the Year 2015

rabel111 · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The Macquarie Dictionary has voted the gendered, derogatory word “mansplain” Word of the Year for 2015.

https://www.macquariedictionary.com.au/resources/view/word/of/the/year/

'verb (t) Colloquial (humorous) (of a man) to explain (something) to a woman, in a way that is patronising because it assumes that a woman will be ignorant of the subject matter.
[MAN + (EX)PLAIN with s inserted to create a pronunciation link with explain]
–mansplaining, noun'

Mansplain is a portmanteau, a new word made by blending the beginning of one word with the ending of another, while including the original meaning of both words (i.e. “brunch”, including the “br” from breakfast and the “unch” from lunch). The word “explain” is simple and clearly by itself not patronising. So the patronising part of the meaning here must be related to the word “man”. If there was any doubt about the word “man” meaning patronising, the definition of “mansplain” published by the Macquarie Dictionary makes it clear that only men do the "splaining" and the patronising.

The specially convened Macquarie Dictionary Word of the Year Committee commented that mansplain was a “much needed word and it was a clever coinage which captured neatly the concept of the patronising explanation offered only too frequently by some men to women”. However, when used in this general context, “man” refers to all men generally. So while the Committee appears to be watering down the sexist nature of mansplain by suggesting it's just “some men”, the derogatory meaning refers to a patronising act commited by all men, as a result of their gender, whenever explaining.

According to the Committee members and the editors of the Macquarie Dictionary, no word exists to describe this kind of activity when the gender of the explainer is reversed, as there is obviously no need for such as word. The assumption that women never “splain” things either to men or women appears to be a given to the Macquarie Dictionary, but a given based on a deeply entrenched and celebrated sexist culture.

It might be expected that the Australian media would comment on the potential that some members of the community may be offended by this celebration of sexism. Andrew Bolt might think so. In fact The Conversation, an online publication of academic views, did offer an analysis of the gendered nature of mansplain. Unfortunately, the article written by Howard Manns, a lecturer in Linguistics at Monash University, celebrated the choice of mansplain as Word of the Year because it is sexist (https://www.theconversation.com/mansplaining-the-word-of-the-year-and-why-it-matters-37091). Manns suggests that mansplain may be “a powerful tool in the anti-sexism arsenal” because it provides a balance for the many gendered derogatory terms like “woman”, “women”, “chairman” and so on.

Anyone who would like to respond to this celebration of sexist editorial practice by Australia’s national dictionary, the Macquarie Dictionary, should email a formal complaint to the editor, care of support@macquariedictionary.com.au.

"Finally dealing with campus rape means that some men will have it tougher"

Mastodon · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The epidemic levels of rape on university campuses has a lot of people really worried. Unfortunately, they're worried that campuses are going "too far" in their effort to punish rapists; that young men will be wrongly accused; that campus sex policies will criminalize consensual sex; that the rape epidemic is more ideological rhetoric than actual lived experience.

...

The concern over due process in campus adjudication procedures are also misplaced. In The New York Times, Judith Shulevitz bemoans the Department of Education guidelines that instruct schools to use a "preponderance of evidence" standard in rape cases, as if such a thing is unheard of. But this is the same standard of evidence that's required when a rape victim sues her attacker in civil court. Shulevitz also warns that schools risk losing federal funds if they don't adhere to the DOE's rules, but no school has ever had their funding taken away because of a Title IX violation.

Too many of us are more comfortable taking on imaginary problems rather than real ones - but reflexive thought experiments don't stop rape or address the real underlying problems. They only do a disservice to the victims.'

In case you didn't know: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jessica_Valenti

How Drunk Is Too Drunk to Have Sex?

Mastodon · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Occidental College disagreed. The morning after the incident, both Jane and John said they didn't remember what happened the night before and set about recreating the evening's events by speaking with friends who witnessed them having sex, reviewing text messages they had sent to each other, and piecing together the physical clues. John awoke to find a used condom and Jane's earrings in his room; Jane learned that after having sex with John, she had ventured out again to find another man to cuddle with. The facts of what happened that evening are not in dispute. But, a week after the incident, Jane filed a complaint against John with the school. John was ultimately found in violation of Occidental's sexual misconduct policy, which forbids students from having sexual contact with anyone who is "incapacitated" by drugs or alcohol. John was expelled, the harshest possible punishment for students found responsible for sexual assault on campus. Then, he filed suit against Occidental, alleging that the school unfairly applied its sexual misconduct policy based on gender. (The suit refers to the students as just John Doe and Jane Doe, to preserve their anonymity.) As the lawsuit puts it: "John is being expelled because he is male; Jane Doe is not because she is female."

...

Last year, my colleague Emily Yoffe recounted the Occidental case in a piece arguing that college sexual assault disciplinary processes infringe on the civil rights of men. Yoffe recommended that campus rape cases ought to be handled by police and prosecutors, and that schools could do their part by attempting to reduce binge drinking. I don't view the issue exactly the same way, but I do think that certain university policies around drinking and sex do a disservice to students by redefining the sexual assault of women to include "sex while drunk," and creating a double standard for men.'

'Scared' Stockholm woman in sexism stir

Mastodon · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'He documented what happened next on his Facebook page: "I saw a girl walking on the path I was heading towards. The moment she saw me she ran. She didn't say anything, she just ran. I was stunned and just wanted to run after her and shout that she didn't have to be afraid of me. But I know it wouldn't have helped. There was nothing I could do."

The rest of the post read: "I first felt really stupid that I made a girl so scared and shocked that she ran as soon as she saw me. But now I just feel sad. I feel so bloody sad that we have reached the point where girls run as soon as they see a man walking towards them. It's completely fking insane. Don't get me wrong, I understand that she ran, I would probably have done the same had I been in her situation. But THAT she should have to run, there are no words to explain how sad that makes me. Together we have to make sure future generations of girls don't have to run. You're done running now. Us men need to take our bloody responsibility to make sure that no one has to run any more. I hope that all you other men who read this are with me and will help make this a reality."
...
Despite the national stir, figures suggest that men are still far more likely to be attacked in Sweden than women.

Figures from the Swedish Prime Prevention Council show that 2.6 percent of men in Sweden reported being assaulted in 2012, compared to 1.3 percent of women.'

'Universities Are Right—and Within Their Rights—to Crack Down on Speech and Behavior'

Mastodon · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'That's why the contretemps about a recent incident at Marquette University is far less alarming than libertarians think. An inexperienced instructor was teaching a class on the philosophy of John Rawls, and a student in the class argued that same-sex marriage was consistent with Rawls' philosophy. When another student told the teacher outside of class that he disagreed, the teacher responded that she would not permit a student to oppose same-sex marriage in class because that might offend gay students.

While I believe that the teacher mishandled the student's complaint, she was justified in dismissing it. The purpose of the class was to teach Rawls' theory of justice, not to debate the merits of same-sex marriage. The fact that a student injected same-sex marriage into the discussion does not mean that the class was required to discuss it. The professor might reasonably have believed that the students would gain a better understanding of Rawls' theory if they thought about how it applied to issues less divisive and hence less likely to distract students from the academic merits of the theory.

Teaching is tricky. Everyone understands that a class is a failure if students refuse to learn because they feel bullied or intimidated, or if ideological arguments break out that have nothing to do with understanding an idea. It is the responsibility of the professor to conduct the class in such a way that maximal learning occurs, not maximal speech. That's why no teacher would permit students to launch into anti-Semitic diatribes in a class about the Holocaust, however sincerely the speaker might think that Jews were responsible for the Holocaust or the Holocaust did not take place. And even a teacher less scrupulous about avoiding offense to gay people would draw a line if a student in the Rawls class wanted to argue that Jim Crow or legalization of pedophilia is entailed by the principles of justice. While advocates of freedom of speech like to claim that falsehoods get squeezed out in the "marketplace of ideas," in classrooms they just receive an F.'

Columbia mattress rape case is not justice — it's shaming without proof

Mastodon · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's time to put down the mattress.

Columbia student Emma Sulkowicz, who claims her close friend and former sexual partner Paul Nungesser raped her, has been carrying a mattress around campus for months to symbolize her status as a victim and remind everyone her alleged attacker remains on campus. (The mattress was also earning her course credit for performance art, but never mind that.)

Sulkowicz, who has been pictured in newspapers across the country, was even a guest of Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand at the State of the Union address last month. The New York Times referred to Sulkowicz as "a woman with a mattress, refusing to keep her violation private, carrying with her a stark reminder of where it took place."

Way to reserve judgment, folks.

Turns out there's another side of the story. Writing in The Daily Beast, the intrepid Cathy Young notes that Nungesser has been cleared by a campus court. And since Sulkowicz declined to press criminal charges, that's about as close as he's going to get to an official vindication.

But what he should really get is an apology from the media and the cabal of feminists, including Gillibrand, who have supported his accuser unquestioningly.'

Trading the Megaphone for the Gavel in Title IX Enforcement

Matt · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When feminist advocates on campus sexual assault “speak truth to power,” they speak for (and often as) victims and survivors. In that position, it’s perfectly fair for them to pick and choose the constituencies to which they give voice. They can and should specialize. But as feminists issue a series of commands from within the federal government about what the problem of campus sexual violence is and how it must be handled, and as they build new institutions that give life to those commands, they become part of governmental power. Now that they have the power to adjudicate cases and determine sanctions, they are facing the full range of cases. For those feminists — and I would argue they should include, by now, the advocacy branch — the days of specialization should be over. It is time to govern. The current moment is a classic opportunity to observe how advocates turn their rhetorical tools and social-movement protest into institutional government.

...

One of the most dangerous effects of the U.S. Department of Education Office for Civil Rights (OCR) campaign to force institutions of higher education to take sexual harassment and sexual assault on campus more seriously is the idea — vividly manifested in the institutional reforms adopted at Harvard University last summer — that a single-purpose Title IX office, specializing exclusively in sexual and gender-based harassment, is the right institutional response. Title IX, after all, is dedicated solely to sex discrimination; the Harvard Title IX Office, dedicated exclusively to enforcing the University’s new rules on sexual and gender-based harassment, has no mandate to ensure racial equality. Case after Harvard case that has come to my attention, including several in which I have played some advocacy or adjudication role, has involved black male respondents, but the institution cannot “know” this because it has not been thought important enough to monitor for racial bias.'

The increasingly sensitive issue of circumcision

Mastodon · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A couple of weeks ago, I found myself wandering through a fascinating exhibition called Snip It! Stances on Ritual Circumcision in the Jewish Museum in Berlin.

In addition to displaying a lot of terrifying-looking ceremonial scalpels and some rather gruesome wax penises, the exhibition invited attendees to weigh the moral pros and cons of this ancient ritual – something I've trained myself not to do as the mother of an uncut son.

...

Circumcision isn't something I'd ever really thought about until after I had my son. I remember being asked by an acquaintance, when James was just a few weeks old, whether I'd taken him in for the snip yet. "Of course not," I answered without hesitation. "Why would I? It's barbaric." And then I watched as the woman's face folded itself into a pursed little smile and she muttered something about her two boys being circumcised "for cultural reasons," before turning away from me altogether.

...

As "personal choices" go, circumcision is becoming an increasingly sensitive issue. A controversial Danish study released last month concluded that boys who are circumcised as babies are twice as likely to develop autism spectrum disorder before the age of five. Researchers at the respected Statens Serum Institut in Copenhagen studied more than 340,000 boys born in Denmark between 1994 and 2003. The results are startling – though as critics of the study point out, the link is speculative, not established.'

Coworking Space for Women-Only Opens in Dallas

Mastodon · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Last Friday, an incubator and coworking space for women only launched in downtown Dallas called The Kaleidoscope for Her.

The space will host events and courses for women, including one-month, two-month, and four-month programs to help them test their business ideas, get them off the ground, and grow. Depending on which option you select, membership is $150-350 per month.

According to founder Tilde Guajardo, the main difference from a traditional coworking space for both genders is that The Kaleidoscope for Her is built to be more collaborative.

“Studies have shown women are often more collaborative than men and more likely to share their voice when men are not part of the conversation,” she says. “We are not anti-men by any means, but creating a ‘safe’ and ‘non-competitive’ space for women to feel free to share is essential to maintaining an open and honest dialogue between our members.”
...
As far as I know, no one has yet created a similar space for men.'

Advocates call for bill to revoke parental rights of fathers who conceived children during an alleged sexual assault

Mastodon · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A state Senate committee heard testimony Thursday for and against a bill that would prevent accused rapists from claiming parental rights over children conceived during an alleged sexual assault.

Under the Rape Survivor Family Protection Act, sponsored by state Senator Jamie Raskin, D-Montgomery, a court could declare that a man is not the legal father of a child he conceived from an alleged rape.

Maryland law currently allows a man accused of fathering a child through rape to weigh in on custody and adoption decisions, including potentially preventing the mother from putting that child up for adoption, proponents of the bill said.
...
The bill outlines a “clear and convincing evidence” standard, common in state family law, for finding that the alleged rape occurred.

The state public defender’s office opposes the proposed law because it does not require a criminal rape conviction, which carries higher standards to prove guilt.

“Both the standard of proof and the standard of evidence that’s being proposed by this bill is less than what is required in our criminal justice system,” said Ricardo Flores, government relations director for the public defender’s office. “It basically codifies hearsay.”

Flores said prior statements made by the child’s mother regarding the circumstances of conception wouldn’t be allowed as evidence in criminal proceedings.'

Woman sentenced to two years for crushing ex-bf's testicles

Matt · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Breaking up is hard to do. Especially if you're trying to break up with Christina Lorena Reber.

The Indiana woman was sentenced two years in prison for tearing off her ex-boyfriend's balls as payback for breaking up with her.

The 46-year-old was charged with felony battery after she attacked the 60-year-old victim in March 2012.

According to a police report, Reber flew into a rage after the man broke up with her a few days earlier, which prompted her to break into his house and start punching him in the head. (The big head, not the little one…at least, not yet.)'

Canada: man sues accuser over false rape claim, says rumour mill forced him into 'hiding'

Mastodon · 14 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A young British Columbia man who claims his life was ruined by gossip about a false rape claim has won the right to sue his accuser for defamation, in a rare case of a sexual-assault complainant being held legally liable for her statement to police.

Simon Caron, who works in the oil patch as a leasehand, was cleared of the rape claim when he showed he was hundreds of kilometres away at the time, and could prove it with receipts and other records. No charges were laid. But as he describes it in his defamation claim against the complainant, who is a minor represented by a litigation guardian, the rumour mill “is still circulating.”

The gossip was merciless and long-lasting, he claims, escalating into vandalism of his vehicle and threats of violence against himself and his friends. It became so bad Caron fled his home in Vanderhoof, B.C., to go into “hiding” in Prince George. He claims he required treatment for depression and missed employment opportunities. Several months after the complaint, he filed a lawsuit for defamation and malicious prosecution.
...
The complainant in this case “circulated horrible rumours about a rape that never occurred, and even claimed that SHE had dropped the criminal charges,” Caron’s statement of claim reads. “At that point my life was in danger … My vehicle was sabotaged, a friend of mine was threatened to be hurt if he was to be seen in my presence. … The rumour including names is still circulating, so that my brother Adam heard of it in his welding class in Fort St. James in December 2013.”

This decision, which restrains the use of absolute privilege as a defamation defence, follows a similar ruling in Ontario that statements made by municipal councillors in a council meeting are likewise protected by a privilege that is qualified, not absolute.'

Men pledge to stop domestic violence

Mastodon · 14 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A man hitting a woman is wrong and so is knowing it's going on and doing nothing about it .

This is the message the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence is stressing in their Take The Pledge campaign, where men choose "to be a stand-up guy, not a stand-by guy."

On Wednesday, a local community group called Men Of Action took the pledge along with donating food to the Haven House Family Shelter.

"I am beyond elated with this," said Wendy Mahoney, executive director for the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence.

Mahoney was in attendance and was also one of the keynote speakers at the program that was held at Fred's Barber and Beauty Salon on Drummond Street —where the idea of Men Of Action began.'

NPO: Happenings This Week Around the Country

Matt · 15 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Arizona

Check out this great picture of Tom Brady and his kids on the field in Glendale, Arizona after winning the Super Bowl.

OK, OK, I'm from Boston and I love the Patriots and everyone else hates Brady and the Patriots, but seriously, as these photos and story make clear, Brady and his ex-girlfriend Bridget Moynahan have put aside their differences and are a great model of shared parenting. Speaking of models, Brady's wife, Gisele Bundchen, is a supermodel. She and Bridget have done a great job of cooperating to help make shared parenting possible for Brady and Moynahan's son, John.

Alright, full disclosure, I guess it's a lot easier to get shared parenting, and to do it, when you make something like $16 million and your wife earns three times that!'

Freed by Innocence Project, former Oklahoma State star Darrell Williams this year's least-known comeback story

Mastodon · 15 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'He went from convicted rapist to Innocence Project exoneree. He went 33 months between games, departing as an Oklahoma State starter and reemerging in NCAA Division II anonymity. He's come from hopelessness to this new beginning.

"Going from being behind bars to being here, just being in a locker room, humbles me and makes me appreciate everything," he says.

...

With the help of the Chicago Innocence Project, Williams' attorney had submitted seven grounds of appeal. The court only ruled on the first one — that at least two jurors had visited the scene of the party and discussed what they saw with other jurors — grounds for a mistrial.

Now the question was whether prosecutors would retry the case. On June 16, D.A. Lee released a statement saying he was dropping charges because the victims did not want to endure the trauma of retestifying.

Oklahoma media outlets attempted to interview Lee after the announcement, but he declined to comment. Tontz resigned in February 2013 and went into private practice. Lee retired last December. His successor, Laura Austin Thomas, did not respond to an interview request from The News.

"Before you destroy a young person's life, you've got to be sure you've got all the facts right," Protess says. "And Tom Lee and his very ambitious assistant D.A., who's now left under a cloud, did not have the facts right.

"Not only did they go ahead anyway and prosecute the case, but they're failing to do the honorable thing by admitting they were wrong."'

UK: Woman's group blasts plan for Men's Rights Society at Staffordshire University

Mastodon · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Plans by Staffordshire University students to launch a "Men's Rights Society" are being blocked – by its rival "Woman's Network" group!

Student Vajra Dhatu made the suggestion for the new society when he posted his idea on the Student Union "better Staffs forum" page.

But now members of the Woman's Network group at the university in Stoke-on-Trent have taken action against the proposal.
...
She told StaffsLive: "If the Men's Society is about 'fathers for justice' and issues treating men more fairly in court then that is fine.

"The statement written in the forum for the Men's Rights Society was very male-centric and there was no mention of women.

"He was trying to raise the rights of men and lower the rights of females.

"It also talked about 'the myth of the rape culture', which is a very dangerous area to talk about.'

KC Johnson to give presentation on campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'KC Johnson [link added], co-author of Until Proven Innocent: Political Correctness and the Shameful Injustice of the Duke Lacrosse Rape Case, will give a presentation titled “Abandoning Due Process: Campus Sexual Assault and Presumptions of Guilt” on Monday.

Johnson’s presentation, which is part of the George Washington Forum, will likely center around his core view that those accused of sexual assault on college campuses are not given the same rights of due process as those accused of other crimes.

It’s our understanding that Johnson, also a history professor at Brooklyn College and the City University of New York Graduate Center, thinks many are too quick in rushing to the judgment that those who are accused of sexual assault are guilty, such as members of the Duke lacrosse team who were accused in 2006 of raping a stripper at a house party. Those accusations, which were later proven to be false, led to the resignation of the team’s head coach and the cancellation or forfeiture of each of the team’s games during the 2006 season.'

U Penn procedure on sexual assault concerns some law faculty

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Nearly one-third of the faculty at the University of Pennsylvania Law School have criticized a new university procedure for handling sexual assault cases that they say undermines traditional safeguards for the accused and could lead to wrongful disciplinary actions against Penn students.

The procedure, adopted under pressure from the Obama Administration, establishes a new position at Penn - the Sexual Violence Investigative Officer - and became effective Feb. 1. The policy weakens standards for finding that a sexual assault has occurred while offering the accused only limited rights to a defense, the law school critics say.

Given examples of high-profile sexual assault charges that have unraveled under close scrutiny, notably the gang rape allegation at the University of Virginia reported by Rolling Stone magazine, the university must take steps to ensure its procedure for adjudicating sexual assault cases is fair, the faculty members say.'

The (New) Big Chill: More on Erosion of Rights of the Accused from a Harvard Law Prof

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Harvard Law School to the rape-hysteria rescue!

Or, more specifically, Harvard Law School professor Janet Halley, who's been a leading protestor against the university's new sexual harassment policy, which—like that of all too many colleges and universities these days—not only tilts the on-campus legal procedure against the accused but defines as harassment a range of classroom and out-of-classroom speech, from jokes to mere generalized references to sex, which means that anyone can be a victim who feels like a victim.

...

Paradoxically, Halley herself specializes in teaching gender and sex-related issues at the Harvard Law School. As a professor who knows whereof she writes, she probably has serious doubts about whether her fellow feminists in charge of enforcing Title IX will pay attention to her warnings. So far, they haven't.'

KC Johnson’s campus talk on due process in sexual assault draws protesters

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Johnson is best known for his book analyzing the Duke lacrosse rape case with National Journal‘s Stuart Taylor, but you’d think he was Joe Pesci going up against a cartoonish Southern prosecutor to defend “two yoots” against Dixieland justice.

Two of the university’s student publications, The Post and The New Political, live-tweeted the circus around Johnson’s talk, including the heavy security presence.
...
"As Johnson approached the podium, members of Student Union and F*ckrapeculture stood from their seats and turned to the crowd of around 70 people in the Baker Center. They wore hand-made shirts saying “RAPE IS REAL, THIS IS BULLSH*T”, and some members held signs saying “SEX WITHOUT CONSENT IS ALWAYS RAPE” and “1 in 5 women will be SEXUALLY ASSAULTED during college”.

The protesters sat down after some members of the audience audibly complained that they could not see Johnson and after a warning of their removal by the police."
...
Johnson took it all in stride, telling The New Political after the lecture:

“People have a First Amendment right to protest. My general sense is that if you’re confident in your opinion, you’re able to engage critically rather than in protest, but everyone has the right to handle protests as they see fit.”

His antagonists did what you’d expect:

"F*ckrapeculture live-tweeted the event on their Twitter page, mocking the lecture with comments ranging from using profanity toward Johnson to criticizing the format of his PowerPoint."'

Also see here and here.

New Hampshire: House Committee Hears Circumcision Bill

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Today a house committee considered a bill that would prohibit Medicaid from funding circumcisions of newborn baby boys.

Bedford Republican Keith Murphy sponsored this bill. He firmly believes circumcision is dangerous – potentially, very dangerous.

"One hundred and seventeen children a year, on average, die from circumcision complications. In fact it's one of the leading causes of neonatal male deaths," says Murphy.
...
Ronald Goldman, Director of the Boston-based Circumcision Resource Center, painted a dark picture of circumcision's impact on the male psyche.

"Anger, a sense of loss, sadness, and sexual anxieties....A recent study found a connection between circumcision and the risk of autism," said Goldman.
...
If passed, it's worth noting this bill could impact a lot of people. The latest data from 2010 found Medicaid paid for nearly 30 percent of the babies born in New Hampshire.'

What Are We Teaching Our Girls? Men Are Not The Problem With The World

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I have three sons. One is in college, and one will be there in a few years. I worry about them.

I worry because it seems obvious that our universities have become a cesspool of leftist, feminist culture that is harmful and even possibly dangerous to young men.

Let me also say that rape is a heinous crime and should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. However, what happens when a girl decides she was raped after she said yes?
...
What are we teaching our young girls?

That it's okay to lie when you feel guilty and wish you hadn't done something? That men are the problem and young women have no personal responsibility? That women are inherently society's victims and that lying about men is okay?

Personally, I think campuses (and parents) should spend a lot more time teaching women how to navigate personal relationships with men and how to not get into problems with guys in the first place. They should be taught that actions such as inviting a boy to sleep in your bed carry risk and responsibility.'

Biden, again

Matt · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. If he weren't VAWA Joe giving lip service to feminism left and right, does anyone suppose Mr. Nuzzly-Paws would get a pass from feminist critics? One certainly need not be a feminist to find such behavior from one of our elected officials objectionable, on top of his apparent inability to avoid offending any number of people because of their ethnicity. But this isn't Biden's first time he's pawed up some woman in front of a camera, apparently believing being VPOTUS gives him license. Grow up, Joe. Excerpt:

'As Carter began speaking in the Roosevelt Room, Biden beckoned Stephanie Carter from across the room, then put both hands on her shoulders as her husband thanked Biden for presiding over the ceremony. Biden's hands lingered for roughly 20 seconds until he leaned in and whispered in her ear.

What, pray tell, was the vice president confiding in Carter's wife? It's anybody's guess, but within seconds Carter reached back and put his own hand on his wife's shoulder as he thanked his "perfect wife Stephanie" for her support along his professional path.

Both incidents sparked prompt and voluminous reactions on social media, as viewers who caught the events on TV or heard about them later pondered: Just what was Biden thinking?

No stranger to improvisation, Biden over decades has built a brand on his tendency to speak his mind, endearing him to those who crave authenticity from political leaders. Biden's supporters brush off his more jarring moments as "just Biden being Biden."

Biden, who has run for president twice before, has said he's considering running again in 2016.'

College blocks man from housing access for reminding student of her rapist

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'... She discovered a essay recently authored by Professor Janet Halley in the Harvard Law Review that should boil the blood of anyone concerned with quaint notions like justice and due process.

"I recently assisted a young man who was subjected by administrators at his small liberal arts university in Oregon to a month-long investigation into all his campus relationships, seeking information about his possible sexual misconduct in them (an immense invasion of his and his friends' privacy), and who was ordered to stay away from a fellow student (cutting him off from his housing, his campus job, and educational opportunity) — all because he reminded her of the man who had raped her months before and thousands of miles away. He was found to be completely innocent of any sexual misconduct and was informed of the basis of the complaint against him only by accident and off-hand. But the stay-away order remained in place, and was so broadly drawn up that he was at constant risk of violating it and coming under discipline for that."

"When the duty to prevent a 'sexually hostile environment' is interpreted this expansively, it is affirmatively indifferent to the restrained person's complete and total innocence of any misconduct whatsoever," Halley noted.'

University releases statement on falsely reported assault

Mastodon · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'An aggravated assault of a woman on campus has been determined to be false according to a university statement released today.

The female student reported the incident Wednesday and in follow up interviews with police, she said that she had not been on campus that day and the confrontation did not occur, according to the statement.

Capt. Mike McCord said police are currently investigating the information they have gathered.

According to the Texas Penal Code, making a false report is a class B misdemeanor punishable by up to a $2,000 fine, confinement in jail for up to 180 days, or both.

The Shorthorn attempted to contact the female student, but received no response.

The aggravated assault was reported Wednesday after she made a Facebook post describing an encounter with a man. She reported the man followed her to a UTA parking lot and threatened her while pointing a gun at her.'

NPO: Colorado state Senate passes bill for parental rights protection

Matt · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'National Parents Organization continues to make strides in the State of Colorado. Our Gilbert Tso once again testified before the Senate Education Committee in support of Senate Bill 15-077, also known as the Parents Bill of Rights. The bill was approved by the committee by a 5-4 party-line vote and has now passed the full Senate 18-16.

Here's how Tso describes the bill:

"This bill was introduced and first read in the Senate Education Committee; its sponsors in both the Colorado Senate and House sought to remedy the growing intrusions by state agencies and schools into parents' fundamental right to raise their children according to their beliefs and principles, to opt-out of certain state-directed education, mental health-care and medical practices involving their children.

Establishing a Parent's Bill of Rights in Colorado or any state is significant. Why? A Parent's Bill of Rights in conjunction with the relevant articles and amendments existing in the Colorado State Constitution and the Constitution of the United States of America, places the burden of proof squarely on the state to show a legitimate cause before the state may intervene in a custody dispute and substantively reduce or revoke a parent's right to equal shared custody when equality, as in 50/50 shared parenting, is the point of contention."'

Three Myths of Rape That Need Sunlight

Matt · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A pivot point occurred within feminism on the issue of rape in 1975 when the book Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape by Susan Brownmiller appeared. In its pages, Brownmiller attempted to chart the history of rape from the Neanderthal through to modern man, placing great emphasis on periods of war and crisis. Against Our Will reportedly gave rape its history. It became a founding document of the "rape culture," which further propelled the feminist movement from liberalism to political correctness, which has also been called gender or radical feminism.

In her book, Brownmiller maintained that rape is the primary mechanism through which men subjugate women. "Man's discovery that his genitalia could serve as a weapon to generate fear must rank as one of the most important discoveries of prehistoric times, along with the use of fire, and the first crude stone ax. From prehistoric times to the present, I believe, rape has played a critical function. It is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear." ...

Some of today's most prevalent myths about rape were cemented into the culture by Brownmiller. In particular, Brownmiller presented three interrelated myths:

1. rape is a part of patriarchy;

2. men have created a 'mass psychology' of rape; and,

3. rape is a part of 'normal' life.

I dispute each one of them.'

Men's rights movement: why it is so controversial?

Mastodon · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The men's rights movement, a loose coalition of activists who largely gather online, is growing in size and support.

They advocate fathers' rights and speak out for male victims of abuse and domestic violence – so why have they been branded a "toxic" hate movement?

...

Men's rights activists (MRAs) argue that society is inherently "sexist" towards men and that they face daily discrimination from the government, the media and the justice system. They fight against custody laws they say overwhelmingly favour women, false rape allegations, violence against men, conscription and disproportionate male prison sentences.

"When women are underrepresented as CEOs of companies that is deemed discrimination," David Benatar, head of philosophy at the University of Cape Town told the BBC. "But when boys are falling behind at school, when 90 per cent of people in prison are male, there's never any thought given to whether men are discriminated against."'

A Bid for Guns on Campuses to Deter Rape

Matt · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. "Weapons are an instrument of ill omen, and not the instruments of the superior man, until he has no choice but to employ them." - Lao Tzu.

So packs of rapist men are running wild all over college campuses, justifying a movement supporting female students keeping loaded guns in their rooms or maybe start packin' to keep the gangs of rabid drunken men that predate campuses openly looking for victims to catch off-guard from raping them in broad daylight? Bizarre. Excerpt:

'As gun rights advocates push to legalize firearms on college campuses, an argument is taking shape: Arming female students will help reduce sexual assaults.

Support for so-called campus carry laws had been hard to muster despite efforts by proponents to argue that armed students and faculty members could prevent mass shootings like the one at Virginia Tech in 2007. The carrying of concealed firearms on college campuses is banned in 41 states by law or by university policy. Carrying guns openly is generally not permitted.

But this year, lawmakers in 10 states who are pushing bills that would permit the carrying of firearms on campus are hoping that the national spotlight on sexual assault will help them win passage of their measures.

“If you’ve got a person that’s raped because you wouldn’t let them carry a firearm to defend themselves, I think you’re responsible,” State RepresentativeDennis K. Baxley of Florida said during debate in a House subcommittee last month. The bill passed.'

Number of suicides in UK increases, with male rate highest since 2001

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The number of suicides in the UK increased in 2013, with the male rate its highest since 2001 and middle-aged men most at risk, according to the latest data.

Figures released by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) show 6,233 people over the age of 15 killed themselves in 2013, 252 more than in 2012, which represents a 4% increase.

The UK suicide rate was 11.9 deaths per 100,000 people. The north-east had the highest rate in England at 13.8 deaths per 100,000, while London had the lowest with 7.9.

The male suicide rate has increased significantly since 2007, the ONS said, while female rates have stayed relatively constant and were consistently lower than those for men.

In 1981, 63% of UK suicides were male, but in 2013 the figure was 78%. The proportion of male to female deaths by suicide has increased steadily since 1981.'

"Men rape infants, toddlers, elderly women and occasionally cadavers"

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. I think we're overdue for an organization called the Men's Anti-Defamation League", or "MADL", for short, as in: "MAD as helL from all the blanket insults and hateful generalizations." Excerpt:

'In a gender-equal world, there would be no prostitution, no rapes, no forced marriages, no forced childbirths, no sex slaves, no vulgar gender disparagements, no glass ceilings. In an equal world, men would not view male qualities as the norm and portray females as “other” or secondary.

The idea that men are helpless to women’s lures should not lead to men sticking cameras under women’s skirts. Women turn men on without even trying. If a woman sits stone-like, there is surely something she will do to arouse, even if it is only to take a breath. Men are programmed to find allure even when it is not intentioned.

Men rape infants, toddlers, elderly women and occasionally cadavers. A blow-up doll doesn’t issue a siren call. Female bodies are uncomfortably aligned with sexuality, while instead it is the framework that supports one’s life, and sex is only a portion of a body’s purpose. The licentiousness of unbridled men is constantly a threat to women’s lives and well-being.'

The Other Side Speaks: Defending the Accused at Campus Rape Trials

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"It is hard to overstate the importance of hiring a lawyer as soon as you find out that you are charged," said Justin Dillon, a partner at the law firm of Kaiser, LeGrand & Dillon PLLC, who represented the male student. "The creative ways that the colleges will think up to screw the student will blow your hair back."
...
Kaiser and Dillon spoke with Reason about some of the cases they have handled, trends in college sex disputes, and the desperate tactics some administrators have pulled to score convictions. Their perspective represents just one side of the story, of course—but it's a perspective deserving more attention than it has received in these days of heightened interest in the campus rape crisis. What's clear from talking to them is that the raging debate over the proper way for universities to deal with rape won't ever be settled until someone ill-treated by the bizarre process takes the issue to federal court.'

Mom never gave up hope on son wrongly accused in child rape and murder

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Christopher Abernathy's mom never believed her son raped and killed a 15-year-old girl back in 1984.

After he was convicted of Kristina Hickey's murder, Abernathy's mother, Ann Kolus, even bought a mobile home so she could stay close to him in prison. She visited her son almost every week until a few years ago — when financial problems forced her to sell the mobile home and move to southern Illinois.
...
Alvarez said laboratory tests cleared Abernathy.

"There is no DNA match that would link Mr. Abernathy to any piece of evidence in this case, and in our opinion today, the DNA evidence tends to exonerate him of this crime," she said, adding that her office will now try to find the real killer.'

US national university administrators' ass'n lobbies against mandatory reporting of sexual assault complaints

Matt · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. No conflict of interest here. Nope. Excerpt:

'As elected state leaders deliberate on proposed legislation that would change how professionals work to address sexual assault and gender-based violence at our colleges and universities, it is critical for higher education professionals and victim advocates to raise our voices and ensure the safety and well-being of our students and campus communities. In an open letter to elected leaders across the United States, NASPA and its joining associations and organizations share deep concern with bills pending before at least nine state legislatures: Iowa, Virginia, Texas, Maryland, New Jersey, Rhode Island, California, South Carolina, and North Dakota.

In some states, proposed legislation would require colleges and universities to refer all reports of sexual assault the institution receives from victims to local law enforcement, essentially turning all reports of sexual assault to the university into a report to law enforcement. If enacted, state lawmakers would place campuses in conflict with certain provisions of federal laws, including Title IX, the Clery Act, and the Violence Against Women Act. Mandatory referral requirements would obstruct a victims' right to an equal educational environment by increasing the likelihood that victims who do not want to report to law enforcement will not report to anyone and thereby be unable to access their federally protected rights. These bills would make it more difficult for victims to access the full range of reporting options guaranteed under federal law by restricting confidentiality in the reporting process, as well as perpetuating stereotypical and discriminatory attitudes towards victims.'

Also see First, Do No Harm.

"Women do it better"

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For one thing, because " Women Do It Better Than Men." This is the title of a leadership study published in 2012 by the Harvard Business Review. It scrutinized performance evaluations of 7,280 leaders and concluded that women outscored men in 12 of 16 competencies that are crucial to "outstanding leadership."

And, while the study confirmed the long-held view that female leaders are, on average, more nurturing, it also found that women especially outscored men in "taking initiative," "practicing selfdevelopment," and "driving for results." These aren't characteristics usually ascribed to women.

More women should also be in charge, I believe, because it changes the way others think when they see a powerful woman chairing a Senate hearing or holding a press conference at a crime scene or leading a boardroom discussion.

Children, particularly, need to see women in charge so girls can aspire to these positions, and boys think it's okay—and natural —for women to do so.'

UK: Hotel launches service to teach newly-married men on how to satisfy their wives

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A revamped hotel has launched a new service aimed at transforming "clueless men" into the "perfect husbands-to-be".

The new Groom Academy at the Best Western Plus in Oak Hill, Woodford Green, teaches men "essential housekeeping" and cocktail-making skills as well as a crash course in cooking.

Practice tutorials are taught by the hotel's skilled staff, including experienced chefs, who will teach men a step-by-step guide on how to cook for special occasions.

Grooms married at the hotel, which is formally known as The County Hotel, will also be sent an annual reminder of their anniversary and the package deal also includes a three-course meal, overnight stay and breakfast.'

Circumcised men may soon be able to regrow their foreskin

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Until now, circumcision has been an irreversible operation, often conducted on boys who are too young to consent to the removal of their foreskin.

But as the practice - which dates back thousands of years - has become more controversial over recent decades, a US organisation is developing procedures which could undo the operation in men who are unhappy with its results.

Foregen, a not for profit group which was founded to “research and implement regenerative medical therapies for circumcised males”, recently announced a Kickstarter campaign to fund further studies of foreskin regrowth.

“In the short term, we hope to fully regenerate human foreskins,” reads a statement on Foregen's website, a goal it claims will require $3m worth of funding over three years. “Once we have accomplished that, our goal is to advance onto human clinical trials as soon as it is safe to do so.”'

Jezebel: Finally, Men Will Be Able to Regrow Foreskin Like a Lizard With a Tail

UK: Universal credit changes 'raise domestic abuse fears'

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The committee said it shared fears raised by women's groups that the system would "reduce the financial autonomy of women" and could leave domestic violence victims vulnerable to further abuse.

A new domestic abuse offence of "coercive and controlling behaviour"', which can include the abuser preventing their victim from having access to money, was announced by the Home Office last year.

In its report, the cross-party group of MPs and peers recommended the government reviewed the payment of universal credit to couples.

They suggested that the government should test different payment methods, "such as automatic split payment to each partner in varying proportions - so as to assess which best protects the financial autonomy of women in couples - thereby strengthening their position should domestic violence occur".'

Women’s rights prof arrested for beating up boyfriend on Valentine’s Day

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Columbia University professor—who is an ardent supporter of women’s rights and advocate against domestic violence—was arrested and charged with a misdemeanor assault after beating up her boyfriend on Valentine’s Day.

According to her faculty bio on Columbia’s website, Joann Baney, 54, is the faculty director of the FDNY Officers Management Institute and also serves as faculty on the NYPD’s Police Management Institute. Both schools are part of Columbia’s Executive Education program under the business school.

The NY Daily News, which originally broke the story, reported that Baney trains New York City’s police officers and firefighters peacekeeping skills and “how to control heated situations.”

According to public court documents, Baney was arrested at 11:22 p.m., on Saturday. She is charged with multiple accounts, including assault, intent to cause physical injuries, and harassment.

Baney allegedly attacked Walter Frey, 46, as he slept inside her Upper West Side apartment, according to the NY Daily News.

“I hit him because he cheated on me,” Baney told a police officer, according to the newspaper, which also linked to her Twitter account to showcase her outspokenness on domestic violence against women."

The Twitter account, @jobaney, appears to have been deleted.'

Fraternity sues college over sex discrimination

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Members and alumni of Wesleyan University's Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity have filed a sex discrimination lawsuit against the university over its policy that forced them to go coed.

The lawsuit was prompted by the university's recent decision to revoke the fraternity's status as a housing program because, it contends, the fraternity has not taken "any meaningful steps" toward admitting women as residents.

The fraternity maintains that it was moving toward coeducation and has accused the university of discrimination, misrepresentation and deceptive practices.

"I think discrimination is wrong no matter what form it takes," said Wesleyan junior and DKE chapter President Terence Durkin. "They are willing to allow other diverse groups to live with the same sex. They are singling us out as a fraternity on campus."

...

In its 21-page complaint, the chapter says it was making progress toward that coeducation goal, coming up with a plan to partner with a sorority on campus, and had filed a preliminary plan in early January. But shortly after that, the suit says, the university demanded that the chapter file a more detailed plan by Feb. 6 regarding the conversion of rooms for women and an agreement between DKE and its sorority partner.

Durkin said that the fraternity was unable to do that because conversations were still in the preliminary stages with the sorority.

...

Kathleen Eldergill, the attorney for DKE, said, "You are left with the impression that no matter what [the fraternity] did, the plan was not going to be good enough."

...

Scott Karsten, a member of the Wesleyan DKE chapter's alumni group, the Kent Literary Club, which has owned the DKE house since 1888 and filed suit with the students, said he sees Wesleyan's action as part of a movement among "some of the elite schools in the Northeast to eliminate fraternities. … Some select number of schools have moved in that direction, and President Roth has chosen to be among them."'

The new panic: campus sex assaults

Mastodon · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The campus sexual assault panic — one of many runaway social epidemics in our nation's history that have ruined innocent lives and corrupted justice — has now reached its peak. A return to sanity is called for before more wreckage occurs.

My own first memory of a similar panic is the hunt for Communists in America in the period following World War II. There was the infamous "Red Channels," an anti-communist pamphlet financed primarily by Alfred Kohlberg, a textile magnate with business interests in China and an ally of Chiang Kai-shek. The publication served as a blacklist for the entertainment industry, ending the careers of anyone reportedly linked to organizations remotely identifiable as "progressive." There was also the House Un-American Activities Committee, and the never-to-be-forgotten Senator Joseph McCarthy. Together, these men helped create a national climate of suspicion that ferreted out very few actual security threats, but ended up punishing many innocents. Remnants of the hunt persisted, but the "scare" essentially died with the senator himself in 1957.
...
The latest national hysteria over campus sexual assault combines aspects of its predecessors: the salacious outrage that characterized the daycare sex panic and the dubious federal stamp of approval that made McCarthyism's excesses so dangerous. Spectacular — but widely disputed — statistics are touted: 1 in 5 women is sexually assaulted in college, 1 in 3 male students is a potential rapist. The rhetoric popularized by mattress protests and awareness documentaries is a simple one: "Believe the accuser!"'

Boys Will Not Be Boys If Feminists Have Their Way

Mastodon · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The National Press Club daily newsletter is a rich with nuggets that end up comprising the biased agenda of the MSM. This week I came across an announcement inviting members to attend the Washington premiere of the film The Mask You Live In, " that examines the harm that is caused to boys and men by American culture and the media's narrow definition of masculinity and what it means To Be A Man" (caps not mine).
...
The underground river flowing through the feminist attack is to make the case that women should hold important offices in the land due to their sweet reasonableness and penchant to compromise. Feminists believe if all judges were women, the jails would be less crowded. If a woman won the presidency, warfare would disappear. If more women were CEOs of large companies the pay gap between men and women would vanish. If women ran the education complex, boys would be cleansed of their masculinity amid a discipline-free learning environment.

The recent campaign to force colleges to set up kangaroo courts to hold show trials for male students accused of sexual assault and the National Press Club extending its imprimatur to the boys-are-bad myth by hosting The Mask You Wear is not a coincidence. Could it be the Hillary Clinton campaign for the presidency is part of this, helping to build the anti-male framework to condition the country for a female commander-in-chief?'

President of Ireland to become UN 'champion' for women's rights

Mastodon · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'President Michael D Higgins [link added] has accepted a United Nations invitation to be a global champion for the rights of women and girls.

Addressing a conference in Dublin today to mark the 20th anniversary of the UN Beijing Platform for Action on women's rights, the President said he was to be one of ten world leaders involved in the UN HeforShe campaign, which seeks to engage men in the campaign for gender equality.

...

"We should all be feminists. A feminist is a person who believes in the social, political and economic equality of the sexes. A feminist is a man or woman who says, 'Yes, there's a problem with gender as it is today and we must fix it and we must do better'."

Mr Higgins said the suppression of the realisation by women of their full potential - whether in education or employment, whether due to violence or sexist thinking - was bad, not only for women, but for men and the whole of society too.'

Study: Blame men for political gridlock; women may be better at compromise

Mastodon · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'During the political gridlock that led to the 2013 federal government shutdown, the leading voices for compromise were the handful of female U.S. senators — only 20 percent of the overall legislative body.

"I don't think it's a coincidence that women were so heavily involved in trying to end this stalemate," U.S. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said in The New York Times. "Although we span the ideological spectrum, we are used to working together in a collaborative way."

Was Collins correct? Would Congress be less dysfunctional if it consisted of 80 percent women instead of men?

It's likely, according to a new study co-authored by a University of Kansas researcher.'

Why are so many middle-aged men committing suicide?

Mastodon · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

“Most men today don’t have a life.”

That’s the first line of Australian psychologist Steve Biddulph’s book Manhood. I thought about that line and that book again yesterday when I read about the latest statistics relating to male suicides in the UK.

Those statistics made for grim reading. In 2013, 78 per cent of the 6,233 suicides registered in the UK were men. That’s a rate of 19 deaths per 100,000 population.

That more men take their own lives than women is not new. But in 1981 the men’s total was only about double, or just under, the women’s. Now it’s nearly four times as many.
...
Do I have a life? I often think it’s not much of one. As a husband, and father of four, I ought to feel in charge, the dominant and capable head of my family. I don’t. Most often I feel inadequate, like I’m not really on top of anything, rather lurching from one situation to the next, making do, getting by. I can’t really fix anything, I don’t carry out routine maintenance, the car probably needs something doing to it, the garden’s a mess. I don’t go out much, don’t have much time to myself, don’t go and sit in a shed.
...
Biddulph’s second sentence in Manhood is: “What they have instead is an act.” And I certainly identified with that. Coming home from work and being Dad did feel like an act, like I was playing at being a dad and husband, because I didn’t really know enough about my children’s lives, or even my wife’s.'

CU-Boulder paying 'John Doe' $15K to settle Title IX lawsuit stemming from sexual assault case

Mastodon · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The University of Colorado has agreed to pay a suspended male student $15,000 and will not disclose without a waiver the details of his disciplinary record — which includes convictions under the campus judicial process in a 2013 sexual assault case.

The agreement was made with the CU junior known only as "John Doe," as he identified himself — with a judge's permission — when he sued the university last year under Title IX, the federal gender-equity law.

The university will not reveal his identity to the public and agreed to provide John Doe with a positive reference.

John Doe agreed to withdraw from the university.

"In response to any question about whether Mr. Doe would be welcome back to the university, the university will respond in the affirmative," CU officials write in the settlement agreement. "In response to any question about Mr. Doe's academic standing at the university during his tenure there, the university will respond, 'Prior to his withdrawal, Mr. Doe was a student in good academic standing.'"'

Ireland: New Family Bill will do nothing for the rights of fathers

Mastodon · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. Excerpt:

'The fact the Bill proposes extending guardianship to non-marital fathers who have lived with the mother of the child for at least 12 months - including at least three months after the child's birth - is being heralded as a major improvement in the legal position of fathers.

However, looked at in the context of the Bill as a whole, fathers could be even more marginalised by this legislation. What about fathers who don't meet, or cannot prove they meet, the co-habitation requirement? Such fathers will be faced with the possibility (probability?) of a variety of individuals, some of whom have no biological link to the child, taking their place as joint guardians with the mothers.

In this regard it should be noted that a child can only have two guardians, hence such fathers will be denied guardianship forever if another person is appointed in their stead.

This Bill is an abominable deceit being perpetrated on a group of people who continue to be treated as less than human by the laws of this State.'

Malecare.org: Please tell Congress to Save the CDC Prostate Cancer Program

Matt · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama's fiscal year 2016 budget eliminates all funding for the Centers for Disease Control prostate cancer program. Congress has the power to protect the CDC Prostate Cancer program. We ask for your advocacy to protect this life saving program.

Letters, e-mails are effective ways to tell your representative that funding for Prostate Cancer programs matters to you.

Please go to http://malecare.org/cdc

There you will find a sample letter, which you are welcome to copy. Representatives hear from very few prostate cancer survivors and family members so your letter will be surprisingly powerful.

The national men's cancer survivor support and advocacy nonprofit organization, Malecare, protests against the proposed elimination of funding for prostate cancer at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Prostate cancer is one of the most common cancers in America. Almost 30,000 American men die from prostate cancer every year. And, twice as many African American men die from prostate cancer as do white men. Incredibly, the 2016 President's Budget request would eliminate prostate cancer funding at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The FY 2016 budget request eliminates the entire $13,200,000 budget for prostate cancer activities. While the evidence on prostate cancer screening remains unclear, CDC has conducted extensive research on and developed materials to help doctors and other health providers better communicate with their patients about informed decision making related to prostate cancer screening and treatment. The proposed elimination will not impact CDC's ability to collect data on national prostate cancer incidence through the National Program of Cancer Registries, nor hinder the ability to share resources and lessons learned.

Please go to Malecare CDC Advocacy now.

Email any questions to:

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare
Men fighting cancer, together.
darryl@malecare.org

SAVE Applauds Penn Law Professors for Principled Civil Rights Stance

Matt · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'SAVE, a national sexual assault organization, is highlighting the courageous action of 16 University of Pennsylvania law professors for protesting a new campus sexual assault policy. The Open Letter charges the new university policy lacks “fundamental fairness” in avoiding wrongful decisions of wrongful conduct: http://media.philly.com/documents/OpenLetter.pdf

The faculty letter denounces the university’s policy for concentrating power to investigate claims of sexual assault in the hands of an Investigating Officer, turning the campus disciplinary hearing into little more than a rubber-stamp exercise.

The letter also reveals the perverse pressures being brought to bear by the U.S. Department of Education’s Office for Civil Rights. “The threat of loss of federal funding risks coloring the proceedings,” the law professors wrote.

An ever-growing number of successful lawsuits brought by expelled students against their former universities points to a worrisome problem of false allegations of sexual assault, SAVE notes. One study reported 41% of campus rape claims were found to be false: http://sf-criminaldefense.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/03/KaninFalseRapeAllegations.pdf

Dozens of boys abducted from South Sudan displacement camp, UNICEF says

ThomasI · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Just wondering if the White House will create a hashtag as they did for the girls, like #BringBackOurBoys. Excerpt:

'Dozens of South Sudanese boys, some as young as 13, were recently abducted by an armed group in South Sudan as they prepared for school exams, UNICEF reported Saturday..

UNICEF did not say what group had seized the boys from a displacement camp, but the abductions reportedly took place in an area controlled by government forces and allied militias. Several days ago, the rights group Human Rights Watch accused government forces of recruiting child soldiers in the same area.

War broke out in South Sudan in December 2013 after the governing Sudan People's Liberation Movement and the army split, triggering ethnic killings and fighting in many parts of the country. The two sides recently signed a peace agreement designed to establish a power-sharing government.

The agreement set a March 5 deadline to reach a comprehensive peace deal. The government recently postponed elections that were due in June for two years.'

The progressive ideas behind the lack of free speech on campus

Matt · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Is an academic discussion of free speech potentially traumatic? A recent panel for Smith College alumnae aimed at “challenging the ideological echo chamber” elicited this ominous “trigger/content warning” when a transcript appeared in the campus newspaper: “Racism/racial slurs, ableist slurs, antisemitic language, anti-Muslim/Islamophobic language, anti-immigrant language, sexist/misogynistic slurs, references to race-based violence, references to antisemitic violence.”

No one on this panel, in which I participated, trafficked in slurs. So what prompted the warning?
...
... These days, when students talk about threats to their safety and demand access to “safe spaces,” they’re often talking about the threat of unwelcome speech and demanding protection from the emotional disturbances sparked by unsettling ideas. It’s not just rape that some women on campus fear: It’s discussions of rape. At Brown University, a scheduled debate between two feminists about rape culture was criticized for, as the Brown Daily Herald put it, undermining “the University’s mission to create a safe and supportive environment for survivors.” In a school-wide e-mail, Brown President Christina Paxon emphasized her belief in the existence of rape culture and invited students to an alternative lecture, to be given at the same time as the debate. And the Daily Herald reported that students who feared being “attacked by the viewpoints” offered at the debate could instead “find a safe space” among “sexual assault peer educators, women peer counselors and staff” during the same time slot. Presumably they all shared the same viewpoints and could be trusted not to “attack” anyone with their ideas.
...
You can credit — or blame — progressives for this enthusiastic embrace of censorship. It reflects, in part, the influence of three popular movements dating back decades: the feminist anti-porn crusades, the pop-psychology recovery movement and the emergence of multiculturalism on college campuses.

In the 1980s, law professor Catharine MacKinnon and writer Andrea Dworkin showed the way, popularizing a view of free speech as a barrier to equality. These two impassioned feminists framed pornography — its production, distribution and consumption — as an assault on women. They devised a novel definition of pornography as a violation of women’s civil rights, and championed a model anti-porn ordinance that would authorize civil actions by any woman “aggrieved” by pornography. In 1984, the city of Indianapolis adopted the measure, defining pornography as a “discriminatory practice,” but it was quickly struck down in federal court as unconstitutional. “Indianapolis justifies the ordinance on the ground that pornography affects thoughts,” the court noted. “This is thought control.”'

How Obama Bureaucrats Are Aiming To Deny Students Constitutional Due Process

Matt · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Under the Obama administration, the Office for Civil Rights “has sacrificed the basic safeguards of the lawmaking process,” wrote 16 University of Pennsylvania Law School professors, according to The Washington Post.

Take, for example, the Sixth Amendment of the Constitution, which guarantees everyone in America the right to a “public trial,” the right “to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation” and the right “to be confronted with the witnesses.”

The letter from the Obama administration’s Office for Civil Rights guarantees exactly none of these things and, in fact, directs school officials to avoid providing these basic rights to students accused of sexual violence.

The letter instructs school officials to allow students to make sex-crime allegations while keeping the student against whom the allegations are made totally in the dark about who has made the charge.

Moreover, charges must be kept secret.

“[I]nformation should only be shared with individuals who are responsible for handling the school’s response to incidents of sexual violence,” the letter instructs.

“In instances affecting many students, an alleged perpetrator can be put on notice of allegations of harassing behavior and be counseled appropriately without revealing, even indirectly, the identity of the student complainant.”

The Office for Civil Rights also clearly and explicitly states that a person charged with a sex crime on an American college campus is not entitled to any hearing.'

Canada: Prostitution and "The Nordic Model" in effect

fathers4fairness · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Criminalizing johns for purchasing sex will make it more difficult for prostitutes to verify their client's identity, which is a key safety measure in prostitution. The john bears all the legal risk in purchasing sex making it more likely that they will take steps to conceal their identity. Furthermore, it means that any street transactions for purchasing sex will likely be conducted in secluded spots where the prostitute is at greater risk.

The new prostitution laws are somewhat reminiscent of the early 1900s when women were not persons and could be convicted of vagrancy for being out in public without a legitimate reason. There was little regard for the social reasons then as to why women engaged in prostitution and no regard for women's right to choose what to do with their own bodies.

Today, women are considered victims of prostitution without any regard to the social reasons for why women engage in prostitution and in complete disregard for the women, who freely choose prostitution, to choose to do what they want with their own bodies.'

New Zealand: 'Gender gap' - Principal says education system isn't boy-friendly

Mastodon · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Primary school boys are struggling to keep up with the girls and we need to act, according to Belmont Primary School principal, Bruce Cunningham.

Last year, Mr Cunningham decided to start a boys-only class at his Auckland coeducational school.

"This is about boys being allowed to be boys," says Mr Cunningham.

He says there's a "gender gap", and that normal boys are failing in the education system at unprecedented levels because the education system isn't boy-friendly.

"Boys were passive learners. Girls were answering the questions and boys were probably thinking which tree will I climb.

"We've got some excellent teachers in New Zealand but a lot of the writing and reading programmes are designed around girls."

Mr Cunningham advocates class time where there's plenty of exercise, and doing schoolwork around themes that interest boys - like robots, war stories and sport.

Twenty families signed up for Belmont School's bold educational experiment, among them eight-year old Jack's parents, Charmayne and Craig Gerken.'

Why schools are failing our boys

Mastodon · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'My 8-year-old son has been struggling in school. Again.

Re-entry after winter break has not been easy for him. The rules and restrictions of school – Sit Still. Be Quiet. Do What You Are Told, Nothing More, Nothing Less. – have been grating on him, and it shows. His teacher recently emailed me; she'd noticed a change in his behavior (more belligerent, less likely to cooperate) and wanted to know if there was anything going on at home.

My guess, I said, was that he was upset about having to be back in school after break. I was right.

The lack of movement and rigid restrictions associated with modern schooling are killing my son's soul.

Does that sound dramatic to you? Perhaps. After all, most of us go through school and somehow survive more or less intact. But if you really think about it, you might remember what you hated about school. You might remember that it took you years after school to rediscover your own soul and passions, and the courage to pursue them.

The stress of school, of trying to fit into an environment that asks him to suppress the best parts of himself, recently had my son in tears. Again.'

Why are girls flocking to ISIS?

Matt · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An alarming number of young Western women are defying their families — and all logic — to join the ISIS barbarians.

As many as 550 of the estimated 3,000 Westerners who have traveled to Syria and Iraq to join the Islamic terrorists are female, according to the Institute for Strategic Dialogue, a London think tank.

It's the sick siren song of the caliphate that appears to have taken hold of three British schoolgirls, who lied to their East London families last week and casually slipped out of the country on a flight bound for Turkey, believed to be a stopover for those heading to Syria, and ISIS.
...
Some are coerced — but not all, says law professor Jayne Huckerby, head of Duke University's International Human Rights Clinic.

"Why do they go? In many cases it's the same reason as men," Huckerby told The Post.

Some are alienated by harassment or discrimination against Muslims at home, and want to join what they see as a pro-Muslim movement. Some, according to the ISD, enjoy the shocking violence.
...
The ISD study, which examined the social-media postings of Western women who joined ISIS, found the women "celebrate the violence of ISIS, unequivocally."

One woman called the beheading video of US Army vet and aid worker Peter Kassig "gut-wrenchingly awesome," while others called the beheadings "beautiful."

The women get a sanitized view of life under ISIS via social media, and can be sparked by what Huckerby calls "a sense of adventure."'

'Slenderman' attempted murder interrogation videos released

Matt · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Caption: "CNN's Randi Kaye reports on newly released interrogation tapes of the two Wisconsin girls who are on trial for allegedly trying to kill their classmate." Obviously, the defense will argue either insanity or move to dismiss due to incompetence/mental defect. The question is: if two boys were in the same place, how would things go for them? This is one to watch.

UK report: Imprisoning children may lead to sexual offences in adulthood

fathers4fairness · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the UK, the Howard League for Prison Reform recently released a report entitled "Imprisoning children may lead to sexual offences in adulthood" - raising justifiable concerns about the treatment of incarcerated UK youth. An article on www.OpenDemocracy.net suggests this may be creating a future cohort of sexual offenders. The Howard League for Prison Reform will be holding a Conference on these and related Penal Reform issues in London on Tues March 17, 2015. Excerpt from first cited source link above:

'Sending children to prison may make them more likely to commit sexual offences in adulthood, Britain's first-ever independent review of sex behind bars has found.

The Commission on Sex in Prison reached its conclusion after hearing evidence that the single-sex prison environment, with its high levels of violence and use of force, could lead to the development of sexual aggression.

The Commission found that the needs of vulnerable children could not be met in large prisons with low staff-to-child ratios. All prisons for boys in England hold at least 130 children, and the government plans to build an even larger institution – a secure college with a capacity of 320.

Evidence from the Bureau of Justice Statistics in the US suggests that placing children in prisons holding 100 or more puts them at risk of sexual abuse from other children and staff.'

Research on Prevalence of Rape in UK Prisons needed

fathers4fairness · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sex happens in prison. Some prisoners will have consensual sexual relationships with others whilst they serve their time. Others may be sexually assaulted by prisoners or by prison staff. Some may report the abuse to staff but others will stay silent.
...
The Howard League for Penal Reform established the Commission on Sex in Prison in 2013 and conducted the first ever review of consensual and coercive sex inside prison in England and Wales. Over the past two years the Commission heard evidence from the Chief Inspector of Prisons, the Prisons and Probation Ombudsman, prison governors, researchers, health professionals, prisoners and their partners.
...
Identifying and combating sexual abuse inside prison should be a priority. A study of former prisoners in 2004 found 1 per cent had been raped and 5 per cent had been victims of coerced sex. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of prisons found that 1 per cent of prisoners who completed an anonymous survey during inspections reported they had been sexually assaulted. The small percentages mask the true extent of the problem. There are on average 85,000 people in prison in England and Wales. More than 165,000 people are received into prison annually. It is possible that between 850 and 1650 prisoners could be victims of sexual assault while inside. The number of sexual assaults could be higher as evidence indicates that some victims are assaulted several or many times.'

Single UK Mom enjoys Round-the-World trip courtesy Welfare

fathers4fairness · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Jobless mum Kay Bird has enjoyed a £3,000 round-the-world holiday with her 10-month-old baby funded entirely by welfare benefits.

Kay, 28, who lives comfortably at home with her middle-class parents, has just returned with daughter Chloe from a month-long trip to Australia, Bali, Indonesia, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, Dubai, Turkey, Greece and the Netherlands.

And the single mum, who gets more than £8,500 a year in child benefit, income support and tax credit, is already planning another luxury trip to New Zealand.

Kay confesses she could work but chooses not to because she wants to wait until Chloe is older, reports the Sunday People.

And she says she doesn't really need the benefits – equivalent to over £700 a month – because her mum Jill, a shop manageress, and stepdad Bob, a lawyer, pay for everything.
...
"I know there are people worse off than me but that doesn't have anything to do with what I spend my allowances on.

"If someone's offering you free money and telling you to take it, you'd have to be a fool not to – that's all I did.

"Once it's in my bank account it's up to me how I use it and I decided to spend it on taking the trip of a lifetime.

"I don't feel guilty and I don't regret it."

Kay's attitude will outrage millions who work and pay taxes – and nearly half a million more lone parents who struggle to survive on benefits on council estates with no help from well-to-do parents.

Woman arrested for maiming after man claims she tried to bite his penis off

Matt · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'A night out drinking and an argument with his girlfriend nearly cost a Tulsa man his penis.

Officers responded to a Tulsa hospital early Thursday morning where a man claimed his girlfriend attacked him while he slept.

Amber Ellis was arrested for maiming and assault with a dangerous weapon.

According to the police report, the victim said he and his girlfriend were out drinking and began arguing while walking home "about how needy she had become." The couple verbally fought in the apartment until the victim told police Ellis stormed off, slamming the bedroom door.

Police say the victim fell asleep on the couch only to wake up to find Ellis "biting his (penis) off."

The victim told police he fought Ellis off but she hit him in the head with a laptop computer.

Once hospitalized, the victim received several stitches to the base of his penis and was treated for injuries to his head, face, neck, fingers and knee.

Ellis was taken into custody for an interview and ultimately booked into the Tulsa County Jail.'

Labor Dept all over Patricia Arquette's demand for 'wage equality'

Mastodon · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"At the Academy Awards last night, actress Patricia Arquette [link added] won a round of applause from many in attendance after calling for "wage equality" and "equal rights" for women.

The U.S. Department of Labor was ready to pounce on wage equality:
...
Did somebody at the Labor Department know that was coming, or was it a spontaneous reaction?
...
The Labor Secretary should first walk over to the White House to have a chat with them.
...
Related:

FLOTUS pushes debunked wage gap myth on 'Equal Pay Day' [pic]'

Also see: 9 statistics Patricia Arquette needs to read on gender wage gap myth

UK: Woman who made false rape claim caught after victim recorded sex encounter

Mastodon · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A CARE worker was caught falsely accusing a man of rape because he recorded their sexual encounter.

But Pauline Muir's lies still led to the man being arrested and held in custody for more than two hours. He was on bail for seven weeks and said later: "She could have ruined my life."

Single mother Muir even contacted the man's 16-year-old son via Facebook to tell him of the allegation, Derby Crown Court heard.

She was jailed for 14 months after admitting perverting the course of justice by making an allegation of rape on September 1.

Judge Hilary Watson told her: "This is a serious perversion of the course of justice. It was a pre-planned, pre-meditated and wicked allegation to make.

"The audio on the recording shows it was entirely consensual and enjoyed by both parties.

"It is unacceptable to say you were emotionally confused at the time," the judge told Muir, 43, of Maple Avenue, Littleover.'

UK: Mum is jailed after her false rape claim resulted in the arrest of an innocent man

Mastodon · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A MUM-of-four has been jailed for almost two years after lying that she was raped.

Lisa-Jayne Samuels told police that she was sexually assaulted and had her drink spiked in October 2012.

A court heard how the 29-year-old's claims led to the arrest of innocent Terry Brown who endured more than a year of suspicion before Samuels finally admitted she had lied.

During that time, it was reported that Mr Brown was attacked by a gang and his pregnant partner lost her baby.
...
When interviewed, she gave a detailed description of the non-existent rapist, claiming she had been drinking with friends at a pub where she met a man she knew from a night shelter who spiked her drink and attacked her.

An e-fit was drawn up and Mr Brown, from Essex, was later arrested.

But he was later released without charge after police uncovered inconsistencies in Samuels' story.

CCTV showed no sign of Samuels at the time and place she was supposed to have been at the pub, and the friends she had spoken of did not to exist.'

UK: The crisis of masculinity won't be solved with antidepressants

Mastodon · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There was much discussion recently about the rise in male suicide rates, after official figures published last week showed they were at their highest level since 2001. But one aspect of this has attracted little attention: the lack of support for men abused by their partners. In a poll of 130 Citizens Advice Bureaux [link added] workers, 63 per cent said it was easy to get help for women reporting domestic abuse, compared to 13 per cent for men.

It's bad enough that men struggle to find help once they pluck up the courage to ask for it. But they are also less likely than women to look for support in the first place – and more likely to be disbelieved.

One example cited by bureaux staff involved a man suffering physical and emotional abuse, who was arrested and lost access to his children as a result. With so little specialist support around, many men are instead treated by their GPs with the only option available: antidepressants. It's a recipe for fermenting a crisis of any kind, masculinity included: treat the symptoms, not the cause.

...

Citizens Advice, in a report titled Victims of Domestic Abuse: Struggling for Support, concludes with the following point: abused men deserve the same right to investigation, support and legal aid as abused women.

Until this is addressed, many men will find the only support they are offered is medicinal. Symptoms will be treated but the root cause won't be. As a result, this particular crisis of masculinity will continue.'

Analysis of Hillary Clinton's staff salaries proves embarrassing -- for her

Matt · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton portrays herself as a champion of women in the workforce, but women working for her in the U.S. Senate were paid 72 cents for each dollar paid to men, according to a Washington Free Beacon analysis of her Senate years' salary data.

During those years, the median annual salary for a woman working in Clinton's office was $15,708.38 less than the median salary for a man, according to the analysis of data compiled from official Senate expenditure reports.
...
Mark Perry, an economic scholar at the American Enterprise Institute who has written extensively on the White House hypocrisy related to gender pay equality, said that the data on Clinton shows that she is guilty of the same hypocrisy.

"Politicians like Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama can't have it both ways," Perry said. "They use raw, aggregate, unadjusted gender differences in pay and then claim that those pay gaps are the result of gender discrimination, like the 23 percent national gender pay gap in aggregate median income."

"They would then have to admit that they themselves are guilty of gender discrimination and have their own glass ceilings to explain, because they have gender pay gaps that are much greater than the average gender pay gap in Washington, D.C."

Perry said Clinton needs to either put an end to her rhetoric on the issue or admit that she too is guilty of gender discrimination.

"Either Clinton is guilty of gender discrimination and pays her female staffers significantly less than men, or she is guilty of statistical fraud for spreading misinformation about the alleged gender pay gap at the national level," he said.

Signs indicate there will also be large gender pay gap on Clinton's 2016 campaign staff. The Washington Post reported last week that Clinton will rely on "President Obama's heavily male campaign apparatus" to run her upcoming presidential campaign.'

The ‘Rape Culture’ Lie

Matt · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In September Barack Obama launched the “It’s on Us” campaign, designed to fight what he called the “nightmare” of campus sexual assault. “An estimated one in five women has been sexually assaulted during her college years,” Obama announced, pausing for emphasis. “One in five.” America, the president went on to argue, suffers from a “quiet tolerance of sexual assault,” all too often blaming victims, making excuses, or looking the other way. To combat sexual violence, he said, we need a “fundamental shift in our culture.”

With these words, the president of the United States went all in on the idea that America’s academic institutions have been taken over by a “rape culture” —a culture that normalizes, trivializes, and quietly condones male sexual assault against women, blaming female victims while subtly celebrating male predators.

Once rather obscure and confined to sociology and women’s studies departments, the term “rape culture” has slowly invaded the national consciousness. According to Google search analytics, the topic generated almost no traffic in 2005 or before. After 2011, its popularity slowly began to rise—as we’ll later see, this is no accident—and then, beginning in 2013, it spiked, the graph forming a hockey stick that would make global-warming doomsayer Michael Mann proud.

The idea that one in five college women has or will be sexually assaulted is mind-boggling and horrifying. It’s also not true. As Slate’s Emily Yoffe pointed out in December, the statistic—together with two other dubious studies that, just for the heck of it, upped the ante to one in four—would “mean that young American college women are raped at a rate similar to women in Congo, where rape has been used as a weapon of war.”

Both the “one in five” and “one in four” sexual-assault numbers, it turns out, have been repeatedly and resoundingly discredited. The former statistic comes from the 2007 Campus Sexual Assault Study, an online survey of students at two college campuses that reportedly compensated respondents and categorized actions such as “kissing” and “rubbing up against” someone as sexual assault. (Even the author of the study, Christopher Krebs, told Yoffe that “one in five” is not “a nationally representative statistic.”)'

Response to 'Open Letter from members of the Penn Law School Faculty'

Mastodon · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. Excerpt:

'No, “due process of law is not window dressing,” and you have misstated the law of due process in the university setting. It is generally established that public universities owe students minimal due process rights, and private universities owe them none. While you critique the U.S. Department of Education Office of Civil Rights’ guidance that the evidentiary standard used should be a “preponderance of the evidence” standard instead of “clear and convincing” evidence, as a legal matter, private universities can discipline students with no process whatsoever. They must only adhere to the contract set forth by their own policies. Thus, the “Open Letter” must be seen for what it is: a disagreement with Title IX’s mandate that sexual assault survivors not be made to struggle through grievance procedures that specially insulate those accused of sexual assault. This policy, and the OCR’s guidance, was designed to fight the pernicious effects of sexism — including sexual harassment and assault — on our campus. Title IX, a civil rights law, mandates this policy for the purpose of ensuring that people are not denied the ability to pursue and enjoy their education on the basis of sex. The proceedings required are not criminal-light proceedings, despite your attempts to portray them as such. Although Penn’s data on discipline is sadly lacking, grievance proceedings are generally remarkable for the lack of consequences for those found to have committed a sexual assault. Few students found responsible for sexual assault in university adjudications are even expelled — between 13 percent and 30 percent by a recent count.

Furthermore, perhaps because you know full well that Penn students have no claim to due process in this setting, you failed to explore what your arguments mean in the context of actual due process at state universities. If you had, you would know that it is well established that due process allows state schools to expel students for any misconduct using an even lower evidentiary standard than that at issue here, that of “substantial evidence.” Why do you think it should be legally harder to expel someone for rape than for moving newspapers, or cheating or assaulting a police officer? The answer again is that your “fairness” standard has a basis — it’s just not in the law. And when 16 esteemed professors of law opine in a public forum, the general public will take your policy rhetoric as law, especially if it is cloaked in false appeals to the Constitution. Do you also think that people facing criminal rape charges should get special protections not afforded to other criminal defendants? Or is your concern only for Ivy League men accused of rape? One thing is certain: Your concern in this “Open Letter” is not for those of us who have been and will be sexually assaulted.'

Feminists Criticizing Campus Sexual Assault Rules

Mastodon · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, 16 University of Pennsylvania law professors signed a letter protesting the lack of due process in the school's sexual assault adjudication procedures. This follows a similar letter, signed by 28 Harvard Law faculty. It comes, as well, on the heels of a series of important articles by prominent feminists that individually, and even more so in combination, mount a powerful critique from a liberal feminist perspective.
...
But note also the steep asymmetry between the consequences of drinking and drug use for the complainant and for the respondent: for the former, intoxication is, to one degree or another, the basis for a per se finding of unwantedness even when assent — even when consent — has been given; but for the latter, it has no mitigating effect on his conduct. And now let us say that two Harvard students — one male, one female — have sex after drinking, using drugs, or both, that each of them feels intense remorse and moral horror about it afterward, and that they both rush the next morning to the Title IX Office with complaints. Let's say they drop their complaints on the receptionist's desk simultaneously. Which of them gets the benefit of the per se imputation of unwelcomeness, and which of them carries the heavy handicap of no mitigation? The woman and not the man? Both of them? Neither?
...
There's no agreement in these essays as to exactly what sorts of policies should be put in place of what currently exists. But it is hard to read them all and maintain the belief that the miscarriages of justice remain a rare or marginal problem in campus sexual assault adjudication. It is likewise hard to believe that these kinds of abuses can persist indefinitely without doing real damage to the systems they represent.

Klein has argued that even higher levels of stringency are necessary, because "It's those cases — particularly the ones that feel genuinely unclear and maybe even unfair, the ones that become lore in frats and cautionary tales that fathers e-mail to their sons — that will convince men that they better Be Pretty Damn Sure." I think it's hard for that view to survive close contact with the actual workings of the system.'

UK: False rape claim victim lost unborn child, left for dead by mob, forced to flee home

Mastodon · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

"A man was stabbed and attacked by a mob when he was wrongly accused of rape, and claims his partner suffered a miscarriage after a gang hounded the couple over the false allegations.

Terry Brown, 33, was forced to flee his home town of Basildon in Essex after Lisa-Jayne Samuels falsely claimed he had drugged and raped her, and even picked him out of an ID parade.

Samuels - who had made up the lies to get attention from her mother - was jailed for 20 months after she admitted perverting the course of justice but Mr Brown claims he was made a prisoner in his own home while he spent a year on bail for the false allegations.

In one incident Mr Brown and his partner, Tracey Choularton, 25, were surrounded by a gang as they left their home and as Ms Choularton tried to flee she tripped and fell. She later suffered a miscarriage.

Mr Brown was frequently targeted by angry mobs and the home he shared with his partner was daubed with graffiti on a daily basis, branding him 'scum' and a 'rapist.'"

Also see: False rape allegations ruin lives of innocent

UK: It's society, not biology, that is making men more suicidal

Mastodon · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Around thirteen men in the UK will kill themselves today, and the male suicide rate is at a 14-year high. Is it time to accept that society has become dangerously hostile to men, asks Mike Snelle.

'It's all in your head' has the same appeal as 'It's all in the genes'", wrote Louis Menand in the New Yorker a few years ago. "An explanation for the way things are that does not threaten the way things are. Why should someone feel unhappy or engage in anti-social behaviour when that person is living in the freest and most prosperous nation on earth? It can't be the system! There must be a flaw in the wiring somewhere.
...
To say something is genetic in this context is to say that there is a genetic contribution to the way a person responds to their environment. At most it suggests a predisposition to certain behaviours. There is no inevitability about it. There are no behaviours regardless of environment, only behaviours given a particular environment. All this got me thinking.

Our culture treats people with depression is as if there is something wrong with them; a biological imbalance best treated with medication. But if it's impossible to understand biology outside the context of environment, and there is a frightening increase in male suicide and depression, perhaps we need to take a closer look at the other variable - our environment. An increase in mental health problems, and in particular suicide rates amongst men, suggests that the environment we live in has become more hostile to men.

If depression is the mind's way of telling us there is something wrong in our environment, then the broader increase in male suicides is telling us that there is something wrong in our society.'

New York City mayor to end metzitzah consent forms

Mastodon · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'The de Blasio administration will do away with the policy that required a mohel to obtain a written consent form from parents before performing Metzitzah B'Peh, the circumcision ritual that involves the mohel sucking blood from the wounded penis.

The city's health department has for years linked the practice to neonatal herpes, citing four cases in 2014.

But the consent forms, which were put in place in 2012, offended members of certain Orthodox Jewish sects who rejected the link and found the forms to be an impingement on their religious freedom.

During the campaign, Mayor Bill de Blasio promised to address the consent form and find a new way that respected religious freedom.'

Hillary Clinton: Patricia Arquette Is Right

Mastodon · 26 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton voiced support for Oscar winning actress Patricia Arquette's speech demanding equal pay for equal work in the United States.

"I think we all cheered at Patricia Arquette's speech at the Oscars because she's right — it's time to have wage equality once and for all," Clinton said in a speech at the Watermark Silicon Valley Conference for Women.

During an interview portion of the event, Clinton explained to Re/Code's Kara Swisher that the tech industry is a "Wild West" atmosphere that favors men.

"I think a lot of women find that distasteful, unappealing to be in a situation sort of resembling a locker room in some ways where you just feel like it's hard to get your voice in, it's hard to be heard," she explained.

Clinton claimed that often, women speak their ideas and are ignored until a man comes up with the same idea 20 minutes later and is recognized.

"I've had that experience a lot of times," she said, pointing out that politics has many of the same problems.

She encouraged women to "gird up" for support systems in their workplace calling for both men and women to speak up about the inequality in the industry.

"Men have to be more sensitive to, more interested in creating this environment," she declared.'

Soldiers speak out as 20-YO admits making false rape allegation against them

Mastodon · 26 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A BOURNEMOUTH woman has admitted making a false allegation of attempted rape against two soldiers.

Nicole Richess, 20, was due to stand trial at Bournemouth Crown Court yesterday on one count of perverting the course of justice, but changed her plea to guilty that afternoon.

The court heard Richess had met the two soldiers, now aged 23 and 24, on a night out in November 2012. At the time she was 18 years old.

She alleged the pair attempted to rape her, but when questioned by police the soldiers said they had gone to her home and had consensual sexual intercourse.

Representing Richess, Isabelle Gillard said rumours had circulated after the incident and her client's then-boyfriend of three years had asked her about what happened. She told him the false tale and he advised her to report it to the police.'

Governor of New York tells campus sexual assault victims to go to police, not college, for help

Matt · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Gov. Andrew Cuomo is turning up the pressure on private colleges and universities -- and urging victims to seek off-campus help from law enforcement officials to investigate rapes and assaults -- as he tries to force education leaders to adopt a set of state policies on handling sex crimes.

"If someone gets shot on a campus, that is not an academic matter," Cuomo said today during a cabinet meeting in Albany. "You would call the police." The same should be done when someone claims he or she is raped, he said.

Colleges, Cuomo said, have incentives to investigate serious crimes within campus to keep the prevalence of assaults from the public eye. Using campus police and faculty panels to adjudicate sex crimes can quickly become a "he-said, she-said," situation, the former attorney general said.

"It is not a campus matter," Cuomo said as he announced his "Enough is Enough" campaign. "It is not an academic matter....You have a right to go to law enforcement."'

NY governor unveils campaign to combat sexual assault on college campuses

Mastodon · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The "Enough is Enough" tour is coming to a college campus near you.

Gov. Andrew Cuomo launched the campaign Wednesday to build support for his proposal that would establish a uniform policy for addressing sexual assaults on college campuses.

The policy is now in place for all schools in the State University of New York system. But Cuomo wants to make it a state law that applies to all colleges and universities, including private institutions.

"We're protecting women on SUNY campuses," Cuomo said at a press conference in Albany. "We should protect women on every campus in the state of New York."

The plan backed by Cuomo would implement a statewide definition of affirmative consent — "yes means yes" — and establish an amnesty policy to ensure that students who report sexual assaults are granted immunity for some campus policy violations, namely alcohol and drug use.'

University Students Protest That Due Process In Sex Assault Cases Is ‘Insensitive’

Mastodon · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A group of students at the University of California, Berkeley participated in a silent demonstration on Tuesday to protest parts of a national campus sexual assault conference that they didn’t like.

Among the things the angry students did not appreciate is “fair process” for people accused of committing sexual assaults. The students, who placed duct tape over their mouths and held signs, charged that due process for such defendants is “insensitive,” reports The Daily Californian, the UC Berkeley campus newspaper.'

Student sues university alleging unfounded expulsion over consensual sexual activities

Mastodon · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'George Mason University expelled a student after his ex-girlfriend complained of their consensual BDSM relationship, the student claims in court.

John Doe sued the university and two of its student deans, on Feb. 18, in Federal Court.

Doe claims that his girlfriend, who did not attend George Mason, initiated the BDSM practices (bondage and discipline, dominance and submission, sadism and masochism).

He says they dated November 2012 until January 2014, and that she requested, and received, acts such as "choking, biting, slapping, spanking, whipping, and restraining her.

They used the safe word "red" to prevent injuries, but doe claims that she told him "that if she said 'stop' during sex, he was not to stop because that was part of the game. However, if she used the safe word, their agreement was that John Doe should stop the sexual activity."'

Washington, DC public schools wants to focus on boys of color, but some say that's unfair and illegal

Mastodon · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As part of its Empowering Males of Color initiative, DCPS plans to recruit 500 volunteer tutors for black and Latino males. It will also award grants to schools that devise their own programs to help those students. And, in its flashiest move, in the fall of 2016 it will open a new boys-only high school east of the Anacostia River.

As part of its Empowering Males of Color initiative, DCPS plans to recruit 500 volunteer tutors for black and Latino males. It will also award grants to schools that devise their own programs to help those students. And, in its flashiest move, in the fall of 2016 it will open a new boys-only high school east of the Anacostia River.

After DCPS unveiled its plans with great fanfare a few weeks ago, Councilmember Mary Cheh sent a letter to DC Attorney General Karl Racine, asking for an opinion on whether the planned $20 million initiative would violate DC or federal anti-discrimination laws. And this week the ACLU of the National Capital Area wrote to Mayor Muriel Bowser raising the same question.

Three other councilmembers are defending EMOC, citing statistics showing that black and Latino boys lag behind white students on many academic measures. Bowser and DCPS Chancellor Kaya Henderson have chimed in to defend the initiative as well.'

Invitation to a Dialogue: Helping Boys Succeed

Mastodon · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. Excerpt:

To the Editor:

Women outperform and outnumber men in postsecondary education, in part because the K-12 system does not provide boys with the same educational experience. It is geared for girls. Our academic system must bolster the experience for girls, but not at the expense of boys.

As we encourage girls to consider STEM (science, technology, engineering and math), we must work equally hard to encourage boys to consider literature, journalism and communications. Boys are often pushed toward math and science, and receive inadequate social support. We need to recognize boys' differences, and their social and developmental needs.

Gender inequality in postsecondary education is partly the product of a K-12 educational system that presses academic and social skills at an age when girls are typically more socially and physiologically ready than boys.
...
When K-12 systems and our culture defer to the boys-will-be-boys notion, we facilitate and accept the willful blindness to a disturbing trend: Women outnumber men by more than 2.8 million in postsecondary education. The gender ratios have essentially flipped from the mid-1970s to today, with boys falling behind in postsecondary success. Disciplinary procedures, physiological differences and teaching practices create greater challenges for boys.
...
Editors' Note: We invite readers to respond briefly by Thursday for the Sunday Dialogue. We plan to publish responses and a rejoinder in the Sunday Review. Email: letters@nytimes.com

Get Ready: Liberals Bringing Back "War on Women" Theme For 2016 Presidential Election

Mastodon · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"With the help of EMILY's List, Democrats are already laying down markers on GOP candidates. This week, the group that supports pro-choice female Democratic candidates launched a new campaign that will document each time a Republican candidate "ignores, insults, or offends" American women. The "Insult & Injury" initiative, first shared with RealClearPolitics, includes digital advertising and graphics that can be shared via social media.

EMILY's List argues it already has a good amount of material to work with, pointing to Rand Paul's "shushing" of CNBC host Kelly Evans during a recent interview, and Mike Huckabee's description of women who curse in the workplace as "trashy."

But beyond those headlines, the group is focusing on the GOP candidates' records on a variety of issues, including abortion, contraception access and pay equity. EMILY's List is targeting Republican presidential candidates' opposition to Planned Parenthood and/or their efforts to defund it, as well as their opposition to raising the federal minimum wage, which the group argues disproportionately affects women.

"Women and families need leaders who understand the challenges they face and take them seriously. They deserve better than the disrespectful words and harmful actions of the current Republican 2016 field," said Communications Director Jess McIntosh in a statement."

Get ready for another round of advertisements and statements from liberal politicians defining women by body parts and by the pills they take. Further, as the left has cried racism toward anyone who disagrees with Barack Obama, they'll be crying sexism as we begin to harshly and honestly criticize Hillary Clinton.

In the meantime, don't forget the left often publicly claims to treat and stand up for women in one way, but the reality of their behavior is very different. Will Ted Kennedy, who left a young woman to die in his car, be glorified again at the 2016 DNC convention as he was in 2012? Will Bill Clinton give a keynote speech? Will Hillary Clinton come clean about her time at the State Department when the sexual abuse of young girls overseas was covered up? Will Democrats admit that they were against a woman's right to vote before hijacking the movement when it became politically convenient? Will progressives justify their decades long battle to get women enslaved to government, leading them into a life of less opportunity and prosperity?'

UK: Hidden male carers find it harder to reach out

Minuteman · 28 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Given conventional ideas of male roles, we often tend to imagine carers as being women. But more men take on this “unpaid work” than you might think, and particularly in older groups. Research we’ve carried out shows just how difficult some find it.

Around 6m men and women in England and Wales provide care for ill or disabled relatives according to 2013 figures from the Office for National Statistics. Men play a significant part in this. While more women than men under 65 are carers, men aged in the 50-64 age group provide a higher percentage of unpaid care than women aged 25-49. Among the over 65s, more men provide care (15%) than women (13%).

But because older men often believe it is their role to look after their families and cope with changing circumstances, older men who care for spouses, partners or family can become isolated and unwilling to ask for help, or even ignored by GPs who focus on the person needing care.'

Teen drug treatment center starts accepting only girls

Mastodon · 28 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'A Spokane treatment center for teen drug addicts is now accepting only girls at its inpatient facility. It had been coed.

The executive director of Daybreak Youth Services, Annette Klinefelter, said the gender-specific program aims to balance an inequity that favored boys.

The paper says Washington has 246 beds for treating teens for drug and alcohol addiction and only one-third of those have been for girls.

Daybreak is a private, nonprofit founded by the Whitworth Community Presbyterian Church. It has 40 beds. Boys are still served through a daytime drug treatment program.'

Changes to pending US Senate collegiate sex assault bill announced

Mastodon · 28 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The bipartisan group of U.S. senators that has been pushing legislation to curb campus sexual assaults is making some changes to their proposal as they look to advance the measure in the new Congress.

The sponsors of the legislation, who now include five Democrats and five Republicans, on Thursday unveiled a new version of their bill aimed at holding colleges more accountable for addressing sexual violence.
...
A new provision in the bill would require colleges to notify both the victim and accused student within 24 hours of a college's decision to move ahead with a disciplinary hearing for an allegation of sexual misconduct. The legislation also now describes students accused of sexual assault as "accused students" instead of "assailants."

Joe Cohn, the legislative policy director at the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, called some of those changes "an incremental step in the right direction."

But, he said, the proposal "still doesn't come anywhere close to striking a balance" between the rights of the complainant and the rights of the accused.'

Sexual Paranoia Strikes Academe

Mastodon · 28 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'You have to feel a little sorry these days for professors married to their former students. They used to be respectable citizens—leaders in their fields, department chairs, maybe even a dean or two—and now they're abusers of power avant la lettre. I suspect you can barely throw a stone on most campuses around the country without hitting a few of these neo-miscreants. Who knows what coercions they deployed back in the day to corral those students into submission; at least that's the fear evinced by today's new campus dating policies. And think how their kids must feel! A friend of mine is the offspring of such a coupling—does she look at her father a little differently now, I wonder.

It's been barely a year since the Great Prohibition took effect in my own workplace. Before that, students and professors could date whomever we wanted; the next day we were off-limits to one another—verboten, traife, dangerous (and perhaps, therefore, all the more alluring).

Of course, the residues of the wild old days are everywhere. On my campus, several such "mixed" couples leap to mind, including female professors wed to former students. Not to mention the legions who've dated a graduate student or two in their day—plenty of female professors in that category, too—in fact, I'm one of them. Don't ask for details. It's one of those things it now behooves one to be reticent about, lest you be branded a predator.

Forgive my slightly mocking tone. I suppose I'm out of step with the new realities because I came of age in a different time, and under a different version of feminism, minus the layers of prohibition and sexual terror surrounding the unequal-power dilemmas of today.
...
For the record, I strongly believe that bona fide harassers should be chemically castrated, stripped of their property, and hung up by their thumbs in the nearest public square. Let no one think I'm soft on harassment. But I also believe that the myths and fantasies about power perpetuated in these new codes are leaving our students disabled when it comes to the ordinary interpersonal tangles and erotic confusions that pretty much everyone has to deal with at some point in life, because that's simply part of the human condition.'

TEDx Talk: Men: The Forgotten Gender

Matt · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video on YouTube here. The talk was given in India by Deepika Bhardwaj (documentary film-maker and journalist, director of "Martyrs of Marriage", about the abuse and mis-use of Article 498 A of the Indian Penal Code). She reviews the abuse and mis-use by women of laws passed for their protection that curbs or vacates the rights of men and their relatives to be presumed innocent.

SAVE at the National Press Club

Matt · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

SAVE invites you to our press conference on Friday, March 13th, where we will have panelists discuss campus sexual assault and wrongful accusations at this level. Panelists include writer Cathy Young, attorney Susan Kaplan, and wrongfully accused student Joshua Strange.

The event will be held in the Zenger Room of the National Press Club, with breakfast provided at 9 a.m. and the briefing to start at 10 a.m.

Following, those interested are invited to lunch at Old Ebbitt Grill for further discussion on this issue (entrees $12-30, self-pay).

Please RSVP to Allie Plihal at aplihal-at-prosecutorintegrity.org if you plan on attending.

I hope to see you there!

Have a great weekend,

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

NY governor suggests college sexual assault victims actually call the police

Matt · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Well, how about that! What a novel idea! If you think you've been the victim of a crime, call the police. Wow. Who'da thunk it? Excerpt:

'New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo has advised female college students who claim to have been sexually assaulted to contact real, actual police.

“If someone gets shot on a campus, that is not an academic matter,” Cuomo said on Wednesday, according to The Syracuse Post-Standard. “You would call the police.”

The Democratic governor said rapes and other sexual assaults are similarly serious criminal matters and should be handled by police.

“It is not a campus matter,” Cuomo explained. Students “have a right to go to law enforcement.”

The governor observed that campus police officers and university bureaucrats are very poorly equipped to handle rape and sexual assault complaints compared to real police with a full complement of arrest and investigative powers.

Cuomo made his profoundly matter-of-fact and commonsensical statements in Albany on Wednesday during a cabinet meeting. He was promoting an “Enough is Enough” campaign, which seeks to reduce incidences of rape and sexual assault on college campuses.'

NPO: At Least 17 States Have Introduced Shared Parenting Legislation

Matt · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There are now at least 17 states that have introduced shared parenting legislation. This is a sure sign that shared parenting is now a mainstream issue. The bills are quite different from each other.

YOU are the most effective person to get your state Legislators to act. If you push them, we will win.

Here are the states, and how you can get involved.'

US Commission on Civil Rights members ask Congress not to increase Office of Civil Rights budget due to overreach

Matt · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. Excerpt (starts on pp. 6-7 of the .pdf file):

'3. OCR misstates applicable law on sexual assault and harassment on campus, encourages unfair treatment for some accused students, and gives colleges and universities a green light to trammel students' First Amendment rights.

We hate to pile on here. But when members of the law faculties of both Harvard University and the University of Pennsylvania—hardly bastions of conservative thought—express deep misgivings over the sexual harassment policies adopted under pressure from OCR by their respective institutions, it is clear that something is wrong.

OCR has pushed past the limits of its legal authority in addressing sexual assault and harassment on college and university campuses. This letter has already addressed the expansive and problematic definition of harassment found in OCR's October 26, 2010 Dear Colleague letter on harassment and bullying, which discusses harassment/bullying in both K-12 public schools and on college and university campuses. In addition to that letter, OCR has released an important Dear Colleague Letter on Sexual Violence on April 4, 2011. In addition, it published documents titled "Questions and Answers on Title IX and Sexual Violence" (April 29, 2014) and "Know Your Rights: Title IX Requires Your School to Address Sexual Violence" (April 29, 2014.) OCR also published a highly burdensome settlement agreement with the University of Montana ("Montana Agreement") that it labelled as a "blueprint for colleges and universities throughout the country to protect students from sexual harassment and assault." OCR has since sometimes backed away from its characterization of this document as a national model, although its signals to regulated universities about the Montana Agreement's intended effect have been mixed.

To be crystal clear: we think sexual violence is deplorable. The question is not whether it should be tolerated on campus. There is no question that it should not be. The only public policy question relevant here is "What does (or should) federal law require colleges and universities to do to prevent it?" Much of the task of keeping women (and men) safe on campus must be done by local police and prosecutors. If OCR has a role, it is merely to supplement that important work.

To study all this, the Commission convened a nearly daylong briefing on July 25, 2014 that featured testimony from 11 different expert witnesses from government, academia, and non-profits. The testimony that we heard and our own study of the matter has led us to be concerned that OCR has unfortunately over-stepped its authority again.'

Signatories: Gail Heriot and Peter Kirsanow

Once again brainwashed world leaders affirm that only girls are worth saving

Alphamale · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Submitter's comments appear as first comment to this item. Excerpt:

'The U.N. children's agency said on Saturday that hundreds of children were abducted two weeks ago by an armed group in South Sudan that is suspected to have ties with the country's military.

UNICEF had previously said about 89 boys, some as young as 13, were forcibly recruited by an armed group near the town of Malakal, the capital of Upper Nile state, in mid-February. The agency said *the boys were taken while doing their exams, in a recruitment operation that appeared to target mostly adults in the area known as Wau Shilluk.

UNICEF said in a statement Saturday that it is now "confident that the armed group which took the children ... is aligned with" South Sudan's military. It said the group is led by Johnson Oloni, a general who once fought against the government but joined the national army in 2013.'

Former college student helps documentary combat false rape claims

Mastodon · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Joshua Strange, of Spartanburg, SC, couldn't wait to receive a college education from Auburn University. However, his dream was cut short when he was accused of assaulting and raping a former girlfriend.
...
After a lengthy legal battle, Strange was cleared of his charges. A grand jury handed up a "no bill" for the sodomy charge and when the assault charge went to trial, the accuser did not show up.

"Josh never got to prove she was liar," says Strange's mother, Allison, "He didn't get to tell his story in court."

However, Strange was punished for the unproven crimes by being expelled from AU and he can never step foot on campus again.
...
Strange's experience comes in contrast to those being followed in a documentary, The Hunting Ground. The film follows survivors as they pursue their education while fighting for justice. Strange's story is not featured in the documentary.

"We just want people to understand there is another side to every story," explains Allison.

The Strange family has joined forces with other survivors and formed the national nonprofit group, Families Advocating for Campus Equality, or FACE. They support parents and students fighting the same battle Josh did just four years ago. '

False domestic violence claims recounted

Mastodon · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Yusuf Derios' nightmare started in January 2014.

“It was pure hell, to be honest with you,” Derios said of the four months in which he was arrested 10 times -- sometimes within several days -- on warrants signed by his ex-girlfriend, despite his contention that he never assaulted or threatened her.

Each time when he went to court, prosecutors agreed and dismissed the charges, but not before the damage was done.

“I lost my job. It's hard to find work now. It's horrible,” Derios said.

Finally, after he spent a total of about 30 days in jail, Derios sought a court order that would stop his ex from taking out warrants. In September, Chief District Court Judge Regan Miller granted the order against Lechez Little on the grounds that she had misused the warrant process.

Finally, after he spent a total of about 30 days in jail, Derios sought a court order that would stop his ex from taking out warrants. In September, Chief District Court Judge Regan Miller granted the order against Lechez Little on the grounds that she had misused the warrant process.'

Out of Trouble, but Criminal Records Keep Men Out of Work

Matt · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The share of American men with criminal records — particularly black men — grew rapidly in recent decades as the government pursued aggressive law enforcement strategies, especially against drug crimes. In the aftermath of the Great Recession, those men are having particular trouble finding work. Men with criminal records account for about 34 percent of all nonworking men ages 25 to 54, according to a recent New York Times/CBS News/Kaiser Family Foundation poll.

The reluctance of employers to hire people with criminal records, combined with laws that place broad categories of jobs off-limits, is not just a frustration for men like Mr. Mirsky; it is also taking a toll on the broader economy. It is preventing millions of American men from becoming, in that old phrase, productive members of society.
...
He also fell behind on child support payments, and under New Jersey law a warrant was automatically issued for his arrest. He says he knew nothing about it until police came to his home in June 2014. According to the police report, Mr. Mirksy struggled, and the officers knocked him down, handcuffed him and charged him with resisting arrest.

It was the first time that Mr. Mirsky had ever been arrested. A few months later, he pleaded guilty to a single felony. The immediate penalty was just $411 in court costs. The enduring problem is that he has a criminal record.

The Pipefitters Union had arranged a series of job interviews for him in May, June and August 2014. He also submitted about 30 applications to other employers last year, and received a couple of interviews, but no offers.

He is convinced nothing has panned out because of his legal troubles — the warrant, the arrest and the conviction.'

India: Court acquits man, spares woman for filing false rape case

Mastodon · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A woman, found guilty of lodging a false rape case against a man with whom she later on tied the knot, has been spared of perjury proceedings by a Delhi court which hoped that as they were legally married they would start living happily without any bitterness.

Additional Sessions Judge Virender Bhat, while sparing the woman from prosecution, observed that the present case was "another classic illustration of the misuse of rape laws."

"The prosecutrix (woman) deserves to be prosecuted for having set the police machinery in motion on false information and for giving false evidence before this court but I refrain from doing so for the reason that prosecutrix and accused are legally married couple and in the hope that they would forget their bitterness....And would start living together as husband and wife peacefully," the judge said.
...
It said that the woman had used the police machinery to create pressure upon the accused to marry her at the earliest.

Taking into account the photographs and certificate of marriage of the accused with the woman, the court said these leads credence to the fact that he never intended to cheat or deceive her and has fulfilled his promise.'

Feminist journalists wrongly report governor sought to hide campus rape stats

Mastodon · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Several left-leaning news sites recently reported that Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker wants universities to stop reporting instances of sexual assault to the feds – a factually incorrect assumption that spread across the Internet like wildfire before the stories were retracted.

It began with an inflammatory article published by Jezebel on Friday that falsely claimed Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker "wants colleges to stop reporting sexual assault." It came after the Wisconsin Legislative Fiscal Bureau released an analysis of Walker's 2015-17 budget proposal on Thursday, which showed the deletion of a requirement that forces campuses to report incidences of sexual assault to the Department of Justice.
...
It soon became apparent, however, that these reports were all based on inaccurate information.
...
According to UW system spokesman Alex Hummel, the university asked the governor to remove the language from the budget because federal law already mandates campuses to provide the information. Universities are also required to post this information on their website.

Hummel told The Associated Press "student education and mandatory reporting are important practices also built in, and those practices are going to continue on our campuses...We are not lessening our commitment here or at our institutions one iota."
...
Walker's office confirmed that the deletion of the language on sexual assault in the UW campus budget proposal in no way changes the laws regarding how these crimes are reported. The Clery Act and Title IX and one state stature will continue to require universities to report acts of sexual assault on their campuses, regardless of language used in the budget.'

How Jobs and Awkward White Men Are Destroying a City

Mastodon · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What would happen if someone posted an article about how a particular ethnic group was poised to destroy a city? Imagine for a moment the outcry and outrage that would flow in the blogosphere if a columnist claimed, for example, that Chinese immigrants were ruining a city's culture or that a particular company, dominated by women, was consigning a large American city to "doom" by causing housing prices to skyrocket.

Well, that's exactly what Geek Wire posted this last week in an article titled, 'Amageddon': How Amazon's culture is taking a toll on Seattle's future, except the target of criticism was awkward white males who work for Amazon. Somehow the discussion about housing and affordability in Seattle has taken a turn toward a kind of passive progressive bigotry that vilifies job growth and stereotypes an entire company. Amazon is certainly a big employer, but are all the jobs being created really going to spell the doom of the city? Here's the hyperbolic characterization of Amazon employees in the post:

"The type of person who is attracted to these jobs and thus to the Seattle area seems to be a socially awkward, emotionally stunted, sheltered, strangely entitled, and/or a misogynistic individual."

Wow. The article cites various statistics about the number of jobs being created as a bad thing(45,000 according to the article) and dwells on other statistics that apparently should outrage the reader.'

Canada: Mother faces sentencing in child abuse-murder case

fathers4fairness · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Bykewich said every once in a while there is a case that is so horrific, a person with any kind of empathy simply cannot fathom it.

Bykewich asked for a sentence of 23 to 25 years, saying the only mitigating factor is the guilty plea, which came late and only after the woman's husband pleaded guilty and accused her of inflicting all of the children's physical injuries.

Earlier in Monday's hearing, an Alberta Children and Youth Services social worker testified she and her colleagues "could never have prepared for such a horrendous case" of child abuse as that of child "M" and her twin sister.
...
The two-year-old girl, who can only be identified as “M” under Alberta child welfare legislation, died after being removed from life-support following a lengthy court battle between the parents and doctors.

The twins had been beaten and starved.

The mother, who cannot be named in order to protect the identity of her surviving children, has pleaded guilty to manslaughter, aggravated assault and failing to provide the necessaries of life.'

SAVE: ‘Fundamentally Dishonest': Hunting Ground Movie Distorts the Truth and Shortchanges Victims

Matt · 3 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'WASHINGTON / March 3, 2015 – SAVE, a national organization working to end sexual assault, is criticizing the recently released movie The Hunting Ground for presenting false statistics, offering a one-side portrayal of the problem, and failing to call for greater police involvement in campus sex cases.

Produced by CNN Films, The Hunting Ground purports to be a documentary. In fact, the movie contains numerous factual errors and omits essential perspectives. The film does not attempt to verify the accuracy or completeness of persons’ accounts.

The film makes the claim that 20% of college women are sexually assaulted, even though the U.S. Department of Justice reports a woman’s risk is under one percent each year: http://www.bjs.gov/index.cfm?ty=pbdetail&iid=5176

The movie misleadingly states that “more than 35 other schools all declined to be interviewed for this film,” when in fact two college presidents agreed to conduct interviews: https://www.insidehighered.com/news/2015/01/29/new-documentary-suggests-incorrectly-no-college-leaders-would-sit-camera-interviews

Improvement on prime working age male employment, nut not much

mens_issues · 3 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Nationally, the percentage of men ages 25 to 54 who are not working has fallen over the past year, but it isn't back to prerecession levels and remains far above where it was for past generations. As of January, 15.6% of men in that age group weren't working. That's a percentage point lower than a year ago, but above the less than 13% seen in late 2007 before the recession hit and not close to the 6% seen in the early 1970s.
...
Related reading:

More Men in Prime Working Ages Don't Have Jobs*'

*To jump the login wall, Google the first paragraph text on the linked page and click the first search result link.

Students accused of rape have too many rights, say some at campus rape panel

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A “Confronting Campus Rape” discussion at the University of Wisconsin-Madison on Monday night delved into the rights of the accused versus the rights of the accuser, a panel discussion during which participants suggested campus rape victims are largely mistreated and dismissed.

Some in the audience even suggested that the accused should not be innocent until proven guilty, and the emotionally charged talk included suggestions by UW-Madison professor Anne McClintock that “men on campus … are at greater risk of being assaulted on campus than they are of being falsely accused of a rape” and that “this university does expel students for plagiarism, but not for rape.”

A UW-Madison student on the panel who described herself as a rape survivor said she had, however, successfully gotten the first male student ever expelled from UW-Madison for rape.

Monday’s “Confronting Campus Rape” panel aimed to tackle the controversial topic of sexual assault on campus and “reframe the debate, discussing university culture and policy, pedagogy, and student experience through the lens of feminist philosophy, legal theory, and studies of sexuality and power,” according to the event’s official description.

McClintock is an English and women’s and gender studies professor at the university who has given many keynote lectures on the intersections of sexuality, race, gender, nationalism and imperialism, according to her online faculty profile. Additional panelists included philosophy professor Claudia Card and law professor Cecelia Klingele.'

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand joins filmmakers of ‘The Hunting Ground’ to fight college campus rape

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand is teaming up with the makers of a new documentary to help pass her bill combating sex attacks on college campuses.

The New York Democrat and a bipartisan group of 11 other senators are rolling out legislation to coincide with the release of “The Hunting Ground,” which opens around the country later this month.

A day before the movie’s premiere in New York and Los Angeles, Gillibrand, who appears in the film, took in a Washington screening. The director and producer attended a press conference last week where the senators outlined their bill.

Lawmakers hope to use the reaction to the documentary 'The Hunting Ground' to push universities to step up action against sex assault.
...
The film has earned positive reviews but also has been slammed for its use of disputed statistics on the prevalence of college assaults and for condemning colleges across the board for failing to help victims.

Other critics say the lawmakers, Gillibrand in particular, are overlooking due process for men accused of sexual assault.

“Some members are taking a one-sided approach,” said Joseph Cohn of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, which often defends accused students. Cohn said both accusers and accused suffer from bad university processes for handling assault allegations.

Gillibrand rejects such criticism.

“Right now, the process that is going on at college campuses serves no one,” she said. “It doesn’t serve the survivor. It doesn’t serve the accused.”'

New campus sex assault bill: At least it doesn't call the accused 'assailants'

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There's not much to get excited about in the new version of the Campus Accountability and Safety Act, introduced last year in the Senate, according to the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education.

The group praises small improvements in the new version, like removing the word "assailants" to refer to students accused of sexual assault, and notes that at least it doesn't codify the "more likely than not" legal standard for guilt or "affirmative consent" regime.

But it's thin on due-process protections, doing nothing to protect students whose schools have "inadequate" or "biased" institutional policies for adjudicating assault claims.

It gives "substantial resources" only to students who make accusations, including a "confidential advisor," which "potentially" violates regulations implementing the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act and even Department of Education guidance, FIRE says.

The revised version would require employees handling assault complaints to get training on the "neurobiology of trauma," which FIRE says "potentially undermines the impartiality of the process."

The new bill removes the Office for Civil Rights' financial incentive to fine schools for violations, but would still let the agency drain a school's operating budget if it finds 100 violations, under the 1 percent fine provision.

Absurdly, it says schools can only cooperate with law enforcement on "alleged criminal offenses" if that aligns with the "victim's wishes"'

UK: Ex-Banker Wins £67k Over False Rape Link

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Anthony Crook's photo was on the front page of a local newspaper after being made public by Essex Police - but no charges were ever brought against him.

The publicity resulted in the 37-year-old losing his job and - in his words - becoming "unemployable".

He became depressed and began drinking heavily.

Judge Deborah Taylor ruled that police breached both data protection rules and Mr Crook's right to privacy.'

U.S. State Dept.: "Deputy Secretary Higginbottom to Honor 10 International Women of Courage"

Minuteman · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Deputy Secretary Higginbottom will present 10 extraordinary women from 10 countries with the 2015 Secretary of State's International Women of Courage Award on March 5 at 1:00 p.m. EST. First Lady Michelle Obama will join Deputy Secretary Higginbottom and the awardees as a special guest at the afternoon ceremony at the U.S. Department of State.

The Secretary of State's International Women of Courage Award annually recognizes women around the globe who have demonstrated exceptional courage and leadership in advocating for peace, justice, human rights, gender equality and women's empowerment, often at great personal risk. This year's recipients reflect women's roles as agents of change and leaders in many of the crises and challenges facing the world today, from countering violent extremism to promoting security and recovery from the Ebola Virus Disease. Since the inception of this award in 2007, the Department of State has honored 86 women from more than 50 different countries.
...
Following the award ceremony and meetings with U.S. government officials and non-governmental organization counterparts in Washington, D.C., the honorees will travel individually to cities across the United States to participate in professional meetings and events, and engage with the American people through an International Visitor Leadership Program. They will visit Atlanta, Chicago, Des Moines, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Pensacola, Pittsburgh, and San Diego. The women will reconvene in New York to participate in the United Nations' Commission on the Status of Women, reflect on their visit, and discuss ways to work together to improve the lives of women and girls around the world.'

The ‘intactivists': Opposition to circumcision is getting organized

Matt · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Podcast page here.

'In recent years we’ve seen more and more people opposing circumcision around the world, but especially in America. Collectively they have become known as ‘intactivists.’ These people are the target audience of Foregen, an organization that not only lobbies against circumcision but also, as stated on its website, “promotes genital integrity through regenerative medicine.”

Eric Clopper, a spokesperson for Foregen, tells host Gilad Halpern that his organization refrains from politics, and its sole purpose is to help circumcised men enjoy sex as they should.'

Law Review: Campus sex-assault trials bypass rights to pass judgment

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Justin Dillon, former federal prosecutor and now a white collar defense lawyer, knows all too well the ways campus sexual abuse investigations can go wrong.

His litany of bizarrely skewed hearings is fraught with the potential for harm and tragic outcomes.

The college student brought up on charges of giving his girlfriend an unwanted kiss, more than a year after the relationship ended; an alleged rape victim who said friends had information the accused had raped others, but then declined to identify the friends; the hearing panel, composed of a librarian, a student dance major, and a professor of romance languages, whose job was to decide whether a sexual assault had occurred.

"It feels oftentimes that every new case I get is more absurd than the last. Sometimes you get people who are not old enough to drink, but are old enough to decide whether someone is a rapist," says the Harvard-trained lawyer, based in Washington.

Due process is a venerated constitutional right, but apparently not on many U.S. college campuses. For nearly four years, the Office for Civil Rights at the federal Department of Education has been bluntly threatening colleges and universities with the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars in federal funding unless they crack down on what the feds say is a wave of sexual violence. No matter that the data on this problem are in dispute.'

"A plan to curb sexual violence on campuses"

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Columnist George Will wrote about the “supposed campus epidemic of rape,” accusing schools of making “victimhood a coveted status that confers privileges,” while others chimed in to claim sexual violence on campus is a “false epidemic” and accused survivors of fabricating their assaults.

Rape is the most underreported crime in America, not a crime in which we see rampant false reporting or embellishment. An attack of this nature is often the most personally painful moment in a victim’s life. What’s truly harmful is not the voices of survivors coming out of the shadows — but rather disparaging rhetoric that makes reporting even more difficult. We can’t let that rhetoric distract from our work to combat these crimes.'

"Raping Culture"

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new documentary calls colleges like Harvard and Notre Dame "The Hunting Ground," where rapists prey on women. A bipartisan group of senators demand new rules to "curb campus sexual assaults."

Apparently, new laws are needed because at colleges, sexual assault is "epidemic." Rape is so common that there is a "rape culture."

I hear that a lot.

It is utter exaggeration. Fortunately, AEI scholar Christina Hoff Sommers is around to reveal the truth.

"This idea of a rape culture was built on false statistics and twisted theories about toxic masculinity," she says.

No one denies that some men, especially when drunk, get violent and abusive. I saw nasty behavior when I was in college, and I assume there are places worse than Princeton.

Sommers says, "I always make clear, rape is a very serious problem, (but) if you look at the best data ... it is not an epidemic. And we do not have a rape culture."

The difference is not just numbers, she says. "Rape culture means everything in society is reinforcing (rape) and making it seem a legitimate thing to do. Of course that's not true."

The media love crisis, and hyping sexual assault is a good way to get attention.'

Air Force Seeks More Female Pilots, Aims to Retain, Promote Women and Minorities

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The U.S. Air Force on Wednesday announced a series of initiatives aimed at increasing the number of female pilots and improving retention and promotion of female and minority airmen.

The initiatives include a push to give more waivers to people who don't meet Air Force height requirements to increase the pool of officers who are eligible to become pilots. While the waiver program currently exists, many cadets aren't reviewed to see if they are eligible, Air Force officials said.

Air Force officials estimate that over the next five years, approximately 900 female airmen could be granted waivers, allowing them to enter pilot training.
...
Ms. James said women aren't as well represented in the pilot career field, and the service must do what it can to try to increase the pool of potential female pilots.

"The Air Force is broad; it is not all about pilots. But the Air Force being the Air Force, pilots have career advancement opportunities," she said. "We have been trying to ask ourselves why women and minorities are not going into pilot fields, and we have to ask ourselves if we can do better."'

Writer of False Story About Scott Walker Slashing Funding for Rape Reporting is ‘Sorry, Not Sorry.’

Mastodon · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Daily Beast has retracted an article claiming that Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker cut all provisions requiring the state’s universities to report sexual assaults. Before finally admitting she “screwed up,” the source of the post tried to defend herself on Twitter.

...

Then she refused to apologize, blaming both the Wisconsin budget and Walker himself for her mistake:

“And I’m not gonna apologize for what was in the budget. Because that was in the budget. Ask your gov. to apologize for bad optix.” — Natasha VC (@natashavc) February 28, 2015"

...

In a related story, a New York Times columnist wrote two weeks ago that Walker was responsible for 2010 cuts to education, resulting in teacher layoffs. The problem being, Walker didn’t take office until 2011.

Generally, the candidate most feared by the opposition receives the most slings and arrows. Before Scott Walker has even announced whether he will seek the nomination, the majority of those slings and arrows seem to be coming his way.'

#LeanInTogether Wants Men To Support Women In The Fight For Gender Equality

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The initiative hopes to motivate men to work towards equality in all areas of their lives, including at home with housework, with their children, in their marriages and at work. The campaign includes tips that men can implement in their daily lives at work and at home.

Some of the tips include being an active father by participating in caregiving and being a 50/50 partner by doing half of the childcare and housework. Tips for men at work include actively giving women credit when it's due and sharing "office house work" such as organizing events and training new hires.

"When men lean in for equality, they win -- and so does everyone else," Lean In's website reads.'

UK: "Clever girls, stupid boys?"

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The gap is so great that the UK's university admissions authority has warned that being male could soon be seen as a new form of social disadvantage.

In the UK, the gender gap between men and women entering university has never been wider. In a remarkable statistic from the Ucas admissions service, the gap is more than 50% in a quarter of parliamentary constituencies. And no doubt this disparity will play out over future generations.

But hold that bandwagon there.

Because a global study from the OECD, based on more than 60 countries, has thrown up some very interesting challenges to generalisations about girls always doing better than boys.
...
First of all, it suggests that school systems give greater rewards to girls rather than boys, even when pupils are of similar ability.

Teachers are more likely to "mark up" girls' work, says the study. It suggests that this leniency in marking is an unacknowledged reward for girls being more school-friendly.

Girls are more likely to be better behaved, more likely to get homework finished, less negative about going to school. And even when boys' work is just as good, the higher grade is more likely to go to a girl.
...
The study also shows that in science and maths, boys are likely to be at either extreme on the ability spectrum.

Among the lowest achievers, boys predominate. It's an international pattern, with boys much more likely to be among those who get the worst results, drop out and leave education unskilled and poorly qualified.

But boys are also right at the top of the scale too, occupying more of the places among the very highest achievers.'

Tennessee GOP On Economic Council For Women: But What About The Men?

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Republican-led Tennessee legislative committee failed to extend funding Wednesday for the state's Economic Council on Women, with some of the lawmakers asking why there isn't a similar council for men.
...
"Other than generating reports, what benefit does the state have by having this council?" he asked. "My second question is, with women making up 51 percent of the population of the state, why don't we have a men's economic council, why don't we have a Hispanic economic council, why don't we have an African-American economic council, why don't we have this group and that group? Why do we have a women's economic council, and why is it needed?"

Qualls-Brooks replied that "men basically are running everything, anyway."

"When you focus and deal with issues that relate to women, then it ripples over and deals with children and families as a whole," she went on. "So when you focus on what women do, you're enveloping and embracing everyone."

State Sen. Mae Beavers (R) proposed that the legislature create an economic council for "everybody," rather than just for women.

"My concern is balkanizing. If we divide and subdivide our population, is that beneficial in the final analysis?" said Beavers. "I always have a concern that we create the balkanization of our population. We've become, almost by implication, a victim group, and I don't perceive women as victims at all."
...
State Senate Minority Leader Lee Harris (D) accused his Republican colleagues of perpetuating a "war on women," a term used by Democrats in the wake of the 2010 midterm elections to describe conservative attacks on reproductive rights and women's rights in general."
...
"These aren't just women's issues -- they affect entire families," he said. "Men have to recognize the advantages we have and be willing to zero in on issues that uniquely affect women. Finding solutions to these problems benefits us all."'

Cisco CEO: To achieve gender diversity in business, 'men have to consciously lean in'

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In March 2013, Cisco CEO John Chambers sent out a memo to all 400 of his most senior employees, vice president and above.

“We can no longer pretend that biases don’t exist, nor can we talk around them,” he wrote, quoting Facebook COO Sheryl Sandberg in her book Lean In. “The result of creating a more equal environment will not just be better performance for our organizations, but quite likely greater happiness for all.”

Earlier that year, at a conference, Chambers heard Sandberg talk about the shortage of women in leadership positions throughout the corporate world. He realized that if he didn’t start taking the gender divide in the technology industry seriously, Cisco would fall behind its competitors. Chambers implored Cisco executives to not only read Sandberg’s book, but also identify specific changes they could implement to make Cisco’s culture more inclusive. (Sandberg most recently co-wrote with Adam Grant an op-ed in the New York Times on the subject.)

Two years after sending out his company-wide rally cry, Chambers caught up with Fortune to discuss the state of gender diversity at Cisco and the tech industry. The interview has been edited and condensed for clarity.'

Stony Brook University: Jane Fonda, Sheryl Sandberg, Gloria Steinen to Headline the International Conference on Mansculinities

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'WHAT:
The Center for the Study of Men and Masculinities (CSMM) at Stony Brook University will host the International Conference on Masculinities: Engaging Men and Boys for Gender Equality, a four-day symposium to encourage men's activism in support of gender justice and increase cooperation between feminist activists and academic researchers who address these issues.

The conference, the most comprehensive ever held in the United States dedicated to engaging men and boys for gender equality, features an international roster of renowned leaders on gender issues. Sheryl Sandberg and Gloria Steinem will make presentations on opening night along with Phumzile Mlambo-Ngcuka, executive director of UN Women, Stony Brook University President Samuel L. Stanley Jr., M.D., CSMM Director Michael Kimmel and, via video, playwright Eve Ensler. Jane Fonda will address the conference on Saturday evening.'

Why Is ‘The Hunting Ground’ Driving a Campus Rape Activism Backlash?

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Even as new documentary The Hunting Ground gets activists fired up to combat the problem of rape on campuses, there’s a backlash brewing. Emily Yoffe has published a long piece excoriating what she sees the film’s one-sidedness at Slate, in line with her longstanding efforts to brand anti-rape activists as hysterics. “Sexual assault is a serious problem on campus, and activists are to be applauded for bringing attention and resources to it,” she writes. “But the atmosphere of alarm that pervades The Hunting Ground does not serve accusers, the accused, or their classmates, young people who are still learning how to think about sex.”

And today, essayist and op-ed writer Meghan Daum praised the film, but qualified her praise with concern that there’s a growing “grievance culture” on campus that obscures the real issue with rape.

"In grievance culture, sexual assault and victimhood exist as absolutes, independent of context or gray areas. The woman who gets drunk at a party and has sex she neither exactly consented to nor exactly resisted is just as much a victim as the clearly brutalized woman. The undergraduate at an elite college who continues to hang out with her alleged rapist long after the deed supposedly occurred is said to be suffering the same syndrome as the woman who lacks the resources flee a domestic batterer on whom she may be psychologically or financially dependent."

This latter example seems like a veiled dig at Emma Sulkowicz, who remained friendly with the student she later accused of rape after the alleged assault occurred. I find it a strange declaration that men don’t have the social capital in elite Ivy League circles that they do elsewhere. There’s nowhere men are more powerful.'

Senator to NFL teams: Watch documentary with Jameis Winston accuser

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As NFL teams do their due diligence on former Florida State quarterback Jameis Winston, a U.S. Senator suggested Thursday that front office personnel consider viewing a documentary in which a rape allegation against Winston is included.

At a press conference Thursday to re-introduce the Campus Accountability & Safety Act, Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., was asked what it says about the NFL and our culture that Winston will likely be the first overall pick in the NFL draft in April.

"I think it's very important that any team that is thinking about drafting Jameis Winston watch this movie before they draft him," she replied.

In "The Hunting Ground", Erica Kinsman, a former FSU student who accused Winston of raping her in December 2012, spoke publicly for the first time. The film was screened at the White House on Wednesday.'

Jameis Winston cleared in FSU Code of Conduct case

Jameis Winston Cleared, So He Must be GUILTY, GUILTY, GUILTY!!!

Canada: University gym women-only hours proposal causes uproar

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A proposal by two McGill law faculty students to have women-only hours at the downtown campus gym is causing an uproar at the Montreal university.

When student Soumia Allalou, 23, decided to get back into shape, she contacted the university's gym and asked when women-only hours were. She was surprised to find that there was no such thing.

"Personally I prefer to work out in a women-only environment. I just kind of assumed they would have women-only hours. I asked them if there was a project for that in the works and they said that they didn't think so," said Allalou, who wears a hair covering and cites religious reasons for her preference. She took to Facebook to voice her concerns.

"I feel like there are many women who have a variety of reasons for preferring to work out in a women-only environment. Whether it's how comfortable they are, whether they have had bad experiences at the gym in the past, whether they have less access to the machines. A lot of women tell me they feel intimidated in the weights section," said Allalou.

...

"All McGill students should be treated equally. Exclusive rights to the gym should not be granted to specific demographic groups. Women who refuse to use the gym when men are present make a choice that they alone are responsible for," reads the petition.

Several of the people who have signed the petition voice similar concerns. One comment by an individual identified as S.B reads: "This is incredibly regressive and paints in dangerously broad strokes of dangerously black and white paint. I don't deserve to be treated as a potential sexual predator wherever I go – neither do you."

Another comment from Phoebe Y reads: "This is absolutely not the solution to a greater issue of inclusivity, body positivity and respect for other religions and identities."'

"Study shows men are more narcissistic than women. This surprises no one."

Mastodon · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Depressing news from the world of psychology: Nearly every stereotype about the gender gap with regards to narcissism, ambition and leadership is right.

That's according to a study in the March issue of the Psychological Bulletin, the journal of the American Psychological Association. In a review of three decades of survey data from nearly half a million participants, researchers found that men are more likely to demonstrate narcissistic behavior than women, regardless of generation or age.

With what must have been a tremendous tolerance for inflated egos, the researchers examined some of humanity's least-attractive characteristics — manipulativeness, self-absorption, aggression and arrogance among them — and looked at how people responded to statements that included "If I ruled the world, it would be a much better place" and "I know that I am good because everyone keeps telling me so." Lucky them.

They then qualified "narcissism" according to three facets: entitlement, leadership/authority and grandiose/exhibitionism. Men scored measurably higher than women in the first two categories and were more likely to agree with phrases like "I like having authority over people" and "I insist upon getting the respect that is due to me." They were also more likely to exploit others and to believe that they were entitled to special privileges. But there was hardly any deviation between the two genders in the grandiose/exhibitionism category, which includes qualities like vanity and self-absorption.

Higher levels of narcissism have been a helpful adaptation for men, the study said, boosting their self-esteem and emotional stability and making them more likely to take on leadership roles. But it has its drawbacks.'

NPO: Florida National Parents Organization Backs Shared Parenting, Alimony Reform

Matt · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Congratulations to the National Parents Organization's Troy Matson. His op-ed here strikes a blow not only in favor of shared parenting in his home state of Florida, but promotes SB 1248 that's backed by NPO (Florida Times-Union, 2/27/15).

As followers of the National Parents Organization know, last year we graded every state's laws regarding shared parenting. Each state received a grade of A — F reflecting the extent to which its laws encourage parents to equally share custody post-divorce. The results were not good, as Matson details in his fine editorial. Florida, that received a grade of C, did better than most.

Meanwhile, SB 1248 seeks reform of alimony laws in the state. Two years ago, the Sunshine State's legislature passed significant alimony reform only to see the bill vetoed by Governor Rick Scott. So pro-reform forces are back this year with a bill they hope to see enacted into law. Matson, of course, has been instrumental in lobbying for its passage.'

Florida State University president issues statement about 'The Hunting Ground'

Matt · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Statement here. Excerpt:

'We want to make you aware that "The Hunting Ground," a film about campus sexual assaults that debuted in Los Angeles and New York City Thursday, is seriously lacking in credibility and presents a one-sided view of Florida State's actions in the Jameis Winston case.

The filmmakers interviewed Erica Kinsman, but no one representing Florida State. This provides the viewing public with an incomplete and erroneous view of what the University did to investigate Ms. Kinsman's allegations. This distorted presentation is all the more egregious in light of the fact Ms. Kinsman has filed a lawsuit against the University over the case.

The first time the University was contacted by the filmmakers was December 18 - nearly three months after they had submitted the film to the Sundance Film Festival and it was scheduled for its artistic premiere. They sent a generic email asking for comment about sexual assault but failed to disclose that FSU would be a target of criticism and withheld the fact that Ms. Kinsman would be going public with her version of the story.

Had FSU been given the opportunity to reply, we would have made it clear the University went to extraordinary lengths to support Ms. Kinsman and to initiate an impartial, independent Title IX investigation of her allegations against Mr. Winston. Our efforts included arranging an independent investigation by a former Florida Supreme Court justice. He reviewed more than 1,000 pages of documents and took testimony from Mr. Winston, Ms. Kinsman and 10 witnesses before ruling there was not a preponderance of evidence to support her allegations. This was not mentioned in the film, although it received ample press coverage.'

SAVE: Joshua Strange, Falsely-Accused of Campus Rape, and His Mother Tell Their Story

Matt · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'In a compelling video testimonial, former Auburn University student Joshua Strange and his mother Allison recount their ordeal arising from false accusations of rape and physical assault.

The video reveals that when the criminal justice system weighed in on the rape allegation, a grand jury handed up a “no bill,” indicating an absence of probable cause.

Despite that finding, Joshua Strange was expelled by Auburn University on November 7, 2011 and is barred from ever returning. His college transcript reflects these allegations and the subsequent student disciplinary committee ruling of expulsion.

The video can be viewed here: http://youtu.be/ewEwnliupZ8

The numerous contradictions and inconsistencies from Joshua Strange’s accuser have never been questioned, nor has she been held accountable for the false accusations, SAVE notes.'

The Children of the Prison Boom

Matt · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The United States imprisons more people than any other country. This is true whether you measure by percentage of the population or by sheer, raw numbers. If the phrase mass incarceration applies anywhere, it applies in the good ol' U. S. of A.

It wasn't always this way. Rates of incarceration began rising as a result of President Reagan's "war on drugs" in the 1980s (marijuana, for example), whereby the number of people imprisoned for non-violent crimes began climbing at an alarming rate. Today, about one-in-31 adults are in prison. his is a human rights crisis for the people that are incarcerated, but its impact also echoes through the job sector, communities, families, and the hearts of children. One-in-28 school-age children—2.7 million—have a parent in prison.

In a new book, Children of the Prison Boom, sociologists Christopher Wildeman and Sara Wakefield describe the impact of parental imprisonment on children: an increase in poverty, homelessness, depression, anxiety, learning disorders, behavioral problems, and interpersonal aggression. Some argue that taking parents who have committed a crime out of the family might be good for children, but the data is in. It's not.'

The other side of the campus sexual assault equation

Matt · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A recent documentary (I use the term liberally) called the "Hunting Ground" purports to be a "startling expose of sexual assault on U.S. campuses, institutional cover-ups and the brutal social toll on victims and their families."

But the film, with the help of depressing and dramatic music, exposes only a one-sided view of the issue designed to tug at the heartstrings and make all sexual assault accusations look credible when not all are.

The center of the film revolves around the accusation by Erica Kinsman that Florida State University quarterback Jameis Winston raped her in 2012 and that the school covered it up. Stuart Taylor, co-author of the book about the Duke Lacrosse rape hoax, wrote a detailed article for Real Clear Sports about the evidence that at the very least casts doubt on Kinsman's story.
...
The ability for schools to adjudicate sexual assault just as they would plagiarism comes from an interpretation of Title IX, which requires students be treated equally regardless of gender. It was originally used to ensure women had access to sports on campus.

"Title IX is not just for women. Title IX applies to all students in this country, and all students should be protected equally," Allison argues.

"You don't forfeit your rights to constitutional protection when you pay your tuition or when you get a dorm room assignment or when you join a fraternity or a sorority," she added. "You have constitutional protections throughout your life if you are a U.S. citizen — particularly if you are a U.S. citizen."'

NASCAR explains why Kurt Busch is still suspended

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

A NASCAR spokesman further clarified why Kurt Busch remains indefinitely suspended during an appearance Friday on SiriusXM NASCAR Radio.

The Delaware Attorney General's office declined to charge Busch Thursday morning for domestic assault citing "insufficient" evidence. Patricia Driscoll, Busch's ex-girlfriend, alleges Busch grabbed her and slammed her head against the wall three times in an incident last September in his motor home at Dover International Speedway.

However, despite Busch not facing criminal charges, NASCAR stated Thursday afternoon and reiterated Friday that the 2004 Cup champion is still banned and must complete the terms and conditions the sanctioning body outlined in his suspension. Busch twice appealed the suspension, but lost both times.
...
Higdon did say NASCAR officials have spoken with Busch since Thursday's ruling and Busch plans to follow the guidelines NASCAR set forth to gain reinstatement. There is no timetable for when Busch's suspension will be lifted and Higdon did not elaborate on the conditions Busch must meet.

In a statement released Thursday, Busch said he "looks forward to being back in racing as soon as possible and moving on with my life."'

Female UFC fighter refuses to fight a man, not wanting to help show a man hitting a woman

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Even though Ronda Rousey says she could beat a man in her own weight class under the right circumstances, she will never be involved in a coed fight.

"It's not a reality," Rousey said to Doug Gottlieb when asked about fighting a man. "They're not gonna do anything like that. Fights are chaotic. Anything can happen. And there's no setting in which we should condone a man hitting a woman."

After Rousey defeated Cat Zingano in 14 seconds, many voiced their curiosity to see how well the bantamweight champion would do against a male. UFC president Dana White even made a joke about Rousey fighting a man after Zingano's beatdown. However, Rousey will have no part of it.

"I really just don't think that any athletic commission on earth would ever condone something like that," Rousey said. "Fights are going to go both ways. You're going to see both people hitting each other. I don't think we should celebrate a man hitting a woman in any kind of setting."'

Public School Teaches Only White Men Capable Of Racism, Sexism

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'An image reportedly taken from a school textbook is making its rounds through social media this week for its declaration that minorities cannot be racist, and that women are incapable of sexism. The book in question is being identified as Is Everyone Equal, one of a series of books designed to expose kids to multiculturalism. Scroll down for an image of the offending page.

The passage at the center of this brewing controversy takes an inflexible position regarding which individuals are not allowed to be defined as sexists or racists. As it turns out, the textbook's authors apparently believe anyone outside of white males are automatically innocent.

According to the book:

"There is no such thing as reverse racism or reverse sexism (or the reverse of any form of oppression). While women can be just as prejudiced as men, women cannot be "just as sexist as men" because they do not hold political, economic, and institutional power."'

'Hunting Ground' Updated

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The filmmakers behind “The Hunting Ground” -- a searing new documentary about how colleges mishandle cases of campus sexual assault -- have removed a statement featured in an earlier print of the film that claimed leaders at 35 institutions declined to be interviewed.

When the documentary premiered to rave reviews at the Sundance film festival in January, it concluded with the claim that the "presidents or chancellors of UNC, Harvard, Notre Dame, Florida State, Berkeley, Occidental and more than 35 other schools all declined to be interviewed for this film." Some critics,including at The New York Times, interpreted the phrase to mean that no senior college officials agreed to appear in the documentary.

As college leaders are often criticized for not speaking out about sexual assault, the statement served as a final damning detail in a documentary that is filled with them. But that particular detail -- or at least how it has been interpreted -- is not entirely accurate.'

Is Campus Rape Really An Epidemic?

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"The Hunting Ground" presents one side of this fraught debate, and a very powerful and disturbing one at that. It features interviews with dozens of young women, and a few men, who recount horrifying details of their sexual assaults and subsequent lack of concern from school and law enforcement authorities.

It does not feature testimony or representation from the victims' alleged attackers, or any voice dissenting from the narrative focus that campus rape has become something of an epidemic, which is either being overlooked or appallingly dealt with by authorities.
...
But there's another side to these stories that "The Hunting Ground" consistently neglects: that of the alleged perpetrators. Instead, the film interviews activists, professors, and psychologists who reinforce the idea that women are prey for serial student rapists.

Diane Rosenfeld, a professor at Harvard Law School, makes the crude analogy that if young men had a "1 in 4 or 5 chance" of being killed in a drive-by shooting at college, their parents likely wouldn't send them.

The movie also presents alarmist statistics without noting that many of them, like the 1 in 5 number cited by the Obama administration and analogized by Rosenfeld, have been widely disputed. Even New York Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, who is pushing legislation to fine schools for underreporting rape, recently removed the statistic from her website.

In "The Hunting Ground," students don't even benefit from bringing lawyers into university disciplinary proceedings. "The message is clear: It's 'Don't proceed through these disciplinary hearings,'" says lawyer and activist Colby Bruno, who represented a female student at Harvard in the film. "No matter what you do, you're not going to win."

Indeed, the movie never strays from its colleges-are-corrupt script.

"Schools are actively and aggressively not wanting to tell the truth about what is going on their campuses," says Danielle Dirks, an activist and assistant professor of sociology at Occidental College who appears in the film. "Because the first campuses to do so will be known as the rape campuses."'

Tom Hanks tells the Internet to "back off" with the manspreading flack

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Tom Hanks is defending himself against "the Internet" after he took some heat for "manspreading," or taking up multiple seats on the subway.

Hanks got a lot of flak for a January photo that caught him casually taking up two seats on a No. 1 train right in the midst of the MTA's awareness campaign to combat the manspreading trend.

"I have an argument with the Internet because there I am on the subway and someone says, 'Oh, Hanks is doing the manspread. He's taking up too much space on the subway,'" the 58-year-old actor told Jill Martin Tuesday during a halftime interview at the Knicks game on MSG Network. "I want to say, 'Hey Internet, that subway car was half empty.' I'm not a guy who's going to take up space. There were like 14 seats that were free. So all I was, was relaxing on the train ride uptown. So hey Internet: back off."'

State board of education upholds boy's suspension in pastry gun case

Mastodon · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Maryland State Board of Education upheld the suspension of a boy who chewed his breakfast pastry into the shape of a gun, saying the punishment was warranted because of the disruption and other previous misconduct.

The decision, which a lawyer for the family said he would appeal to a circuit court, is the latest development in what has been called "the Pop-Tart case," which gained national attention in 2013 at a time of widespread rethinking of discipline practices in public schools. Other states have since cited the Maryland case in proposing Pop-Tart gun bills that limit student suspensions for imaginary weapons.

The eight-page state opinion, dated Feb. 24, recounts the child's string of troubles at Park Elementary School in Anne Arundel County, Md.

"The student in this case had a long history of behavioral problems that were the subject of progressive intervention by the school," the state board concluded. "He created a classroom disruption on March 1, 2013, which resulted in a suspension that was justified based on the incident in question and the student's history."'

"A Better World, Run by Women"

Mastodon · 7 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Research has found that women are superior to men in most ways that will count in the future, and it isn't just a matter of culture or upbringing—although both play their roles. It is also biology and the aspects of thought and feeling shaped by biology. It is because of chromosomes, genes, hormones and brain circuits.

And no, by this I don't mean what was meant by patronizing men who proclaimed the superiority of women in the benighted past—that women are lofty, spiritual creatures who must be left out of the bustle and fray of competitive life, business, politics and war, so that they can instill character in the next generation. I mean something like the opposite of that.

All wars are boyish. People point to Margaret Thatcher, Indira Gandhi and Golda Meir as evidence that women, too, can be warlike. But these women were perched atop all-male hierarchies confronting other hypermasculine political pyramids, and they were masculinized as they fought their way to the top.

There is every reason to think that a future national hierarchy staffed and led by women who no longer have to imitate men, dealing with other nations similarly transformed, would be less likely to go to war. But that's not all. Sex scandals, financial corruption and violence are all overwhelmingly male.
...
As women come to hold more power and public authority, will they become just like men? I don't think so. Show me a male brain, and I will show you a bulging amygdala—the brain's center of fear and violence—densely dotted with testosterone receptors. Women lack the biological tripwires that lead men to react to small threats with exaggerated violence and to sexual temptation with recklessness.
...
Women won't make a perfect world, but it will be less flawed than the one that men have made and ruled these thousands of years. My grandson, I think, will be happy in the new world. It will be better for him because women will contribute so much more to running it.'

"Don’t reward law-breaking office"

Matt · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here.

'Civil-rights commissioners rightly objected to President Obama’s proposed budget increase for the lawbreakers at the Department of Education’s Office for Civil Rights, where I used to work (“Civil rights commissioners: Rein in education admin. on ‘unlawful’ bullying, sexual assault policies,” Web, March 4).

As the commissioners note, the Office for Civil Rights has “made up” violations “out of thin air.” It has issued a flood of new rules that drive up schools’ expenses. It has done so without even codifying those rules, and without complying with the Administrative Procedure Act, which requires agencies to give notice of proposed rules and invite the public to comment on them before issuing them.

In its January 2014 Title VI “guidance,” the Department of Education demanded that schools change colorblind disciplinary rules just because more blacks than whites are suspended. But the Supreme Court ruled in Alexander v. Sandoval (2001) that the Title VI statute doesn’t require the elimination of such “disparate impact.” And a 2014 study in the Journal of Criminal Justice by criminologists such as John Paul Wright found that higher suspension rates for blacks just reflect higher rates of misconduct among black students, not racism. Ordering schools to eliminate all racial disparities in suspension rates violates a court ruling, People Who Care v. Rockford Bd. of Educ. (1997).

HANS BADER

Senior attorney, Competitive Enterprise Institute
Washington

Court Denies Civil Rights of a Parent

Matt · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A woman in Florida will be incarcerated unless she signs a consent form to have her four-year-old son circumcised. Although Heather Hironimus originally agreed with the boy's father, Dennis Nebus, to have the boy's foreskin removed, she has changed her mind. Her decision resulted in a court battle with the father.

Hironimus subsequently fled with her son; Nebus has not seen the boy since February 20th. Judge Jeffrey Gillen labeled the mother as 'reprehensible' for placing the boy in the public spotlight. Gillen has placed Hironimus in contempt of court. If she does not surrender the boy by Tuesday, she will become the object of a police search. He has ordered her to sign the consent form or face time in jail.

The boy is in no physical danger if the circumcision is not performed; the surgery is not necessary. However, the judge has made his decision in favor of the father. He blames the mother for placing the case and the little boy before excessive scrutiny.

The Sun Sentinel has been covering the story. The newspaper became more involved and actually filed a motion to declare Judge Gillen's order unconstitutional. The court declined saying the case did not fit within the parameters of a life or death situation or irreparable harm.'

Even less-than-preponderance seems good enough for some

Matt · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'In late 2013 and early 2014, according to the Chronicle's story, two women told classmates in group discussions at student retreats that Sulaimon had sexually assaulted them. Neither woman filed a complaint with law enforcement or Duke's Office of Student Conduct, which investigates allegations of sexual misconduct on campus. And neither spoke to Chronicle reporters, whose story is based, in part, on the recollections of other students at those retreats and an "anonymous affiliate" of Duke basketball.

The "affiliate," the Chronicle reported, heard about the allegations and brought them to Krzyzewski and several other administrators in spring 2014. This January, a second person — a Duke student who worked as a secretary in the basketball office — also told administrators about the rumors. On Jan. 29, Krzyzewski kicked Sulaimon off the team and released a statement saying the junior guard had been "unable to consistently live up to the standards required to be a member of our program."

Federal law mandates university employees such as Krzyzewski report allegations of sexual violence and requires schools to investigate. But because the women wouldn't agree to talk to school officials about their allegations, it would have been difficult for Duke to investigate. In statements this week, Duke administrators pledged they responded properly. On Thursday, Sulaimon's attorney, who has refuted the accusations, told media outlets the university investigated last year and closed the case because the claims could not be substantiated.
...
The Chronicle reporters — Emma Baccellieri and Nick Martin — declined interview requests this week and referred questions to Chronicle Editor Carleigh Stiehm. Stiehm declined to answer questions.
...
Unless the alleged victims decide to pursue legal charges, or file complaints with the school, the story likely will dissipate with no firm conclusion of guilt or exoneration for Sulaimon.'

India: Accused rapist lynched by mob, accusation later shown to be false

Matt · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video report on YouTube here. Articles here and here. Excerpts:

From first article:
'In a shocking twist to the Nagaland lynching case, Assam Chief Minister Tarun Gogoi on Saturday said that 'unconfirmed medical reports' show that the complainant in the case was not raped.

Speaking to NDTV, Gogoi said, "it is up to the Nagaland government to come out with the facts. We have received an unofficial report of no rape." The chief minister further said that the accused Syed Khan was not an illegal immigrant and was a citizen of India.

Moreover, the brother of the accused, Jamal Uddin Khan, corroborated Gogoi's remarks, saying his brother had been made a scapegoat in the case and that the police was hand-in-glove with certain Naga groups.

"Is the Nagaland government running a jungle raj? The girl who filed the rape complaint was my brother's wife's cousin. Nagaland police have said that the medical reports say she was not raped," Jamal Khan told NDTV, adding that several of his family members were working in the country's armed forces and they were all Indian.

The victim, however, said she was given money by the accused after the assault to remain silent. "Rumours that I did this for money are false. The police arrested him the very same day. I did not think he would be attacked like this," she said.'

India: On Women's Day, read the suicide note of a man

Matt · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'While the entire country is rejoicing and celebrating Women's Day, an old mother is crying inconsolably in Jhansi. Her son, Avadhesh Yadav committed suicide on February 25, 2015 because of a "woman". This day has no meaning for her as she is confused of the word that means "Women Empowerment". Laws that have been made to protect women, abuse of same became the reason for her son's death.

Here are excerpts from suicide note left by Avadhesh Yadav:

My name is Avadhesh Yadav and I work in a private bank. I got married to Unnati Yadav on December 7, 2012. Within a week of marriage, she started pestering my family by asking divorce for no reason. We ignored. She never allowed me to come close to her for 2-3 months after the marriage. My father advised that with time everything will be fine. But it got only worse. She started misbehaving with my parents, hurling abuses at them. When we complained about this to her family, they gave excuses of some "external influence" on her and they would get her treated. She now started going almost every day at her home and threatened us of a dowry case if we said anything.
...
On advice of lawyers, we filed a case of restitution of conjugal rights, requesting her to come back. Three months after that in September, she filed a false dowry and domestic violence case (498A) on me, my mother, father, elder brother and his wife. We got bail. Her brother told me she wants to come back.

I refused saying now this was not possible and suggested that we get separated amicably. He refused and threatened me of false cases of molestation, rape on my father and brother and, acid attack on me and getting me killed. Unnati eventually filed a case of molestation in January on my father and brother and they were arrested. I don't know what will this step of mine lead to but I want to save my family from all this humiliation. After I go, they would probably be in peace. I also wish to ask our law makers, how they can make laws that give so much credence to mere words of a woman that whatever the other person is saying has no relevance. Shouldn't the other side be heard too? My father and brother were picked up by police on her statement alone without any evidence.
...
As a woman, this women's day I beg to ask my fellow women - Is this why we demanded stringent laws? Is this what we mean by women empowerment that a woman can ruin anyone's life if she wants? Isn't a mother-in-law tortured by her daughter-in-law a woman? Would we ever get rid of crime against women if women start using laws as weapons and our courts get choked with false cases? Is it empowerment that a woman plays gender card and settle scores with whosoever she wants? False cases of crime against women should concern women rights activists because it hurts their cause the most. False cases are no less a crime against actual victims of these crimes. "If cry of wolf is made too often, assistance might not come when actual wolf appears."

As a woman, this women's day, I also request media to at least make an effort to know the other side of the story, know the truth before reporting it. First a false case and then your name splashed all over media in that case does irreparable damage to a person. Report acquittal with as much fervour as you report an accusation! '

Malecare: Keep the momentum going to save the CDC prostate cancer program

Matt · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama's fiscal year 2016 budget eliminates all funding for the Centers for Disease Control prostate cancer program. Congress has the power to protect the CDC Prostate Cancer program. We ask for your advocacy to protect this life saving program.

Please tell Congress to SAVE THE CDC PROSTATE CANCER PROGRAM

Click to send your message to Congress: Malecare CDC Advocacy Page

Our advocacy campaign is off to a good start. As of March 4, 2015, hundreds of letters have been received by the Senate and House Budget committee Chairpeople. The CDC Director and one of the Budget Committee Legislative Directors have contacted Malecare. And, at least two of our counterpart organizations, ZeroCancer and Men's Health Network, are joining us in protest.

We need to keep our momentum. We need EVERYONE to write. If Congress does not hear from our prostate cancer survivor community, then they will correctly see that there is no political price to pay for reducing research funding.

Representatives hear from very few prostate cancer survivors and family members so your letter will be surprisingly powerful.

Cut and paste the sample letter, below, into all four of the Senate leaders' online comments pages, the House committee online comment box and then one email to your local Congressperson and Senators. Add in a sentence or two about who you are: a survivor, caregiver, relative, etc.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairperson:
http://www.cochran.senate.gov/public/index.cfm/email-me

Senate Appropriations Committee Vice Chairperson:
http://www.mikulski.senate.gov/contact

Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Health Chairperson:
http://www.blunt.senate.gov/public/index.cfm/contact-form?p=contact-roy

Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Health Ranking Member:
http://www.murray.senate.gov/public/index.cfm/contactme

House Appropriations Committee:
https://appropriations.house.gov/forms/writeyourrep/

Use the Contact Your Congress link below to locate your local representatives and send them the letter as well:
http://www.contactingthecongress.org/

We know that this can be tedious, but patient advocacy takes a bit of work. It's our lives, and it should take only 20-30 minutes to send your message.

Silence Gives Consent, so please make your voice heard.

SAMPLE LETTER

Save the CDC Prostate Cancer Program

Please ensure funding for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) prostate cancer program.

Prostate cancer is one of the most common cancers in America. Almost 30,000 American men die from prostate cancer every year. And, African American men die from prostate cancer at a rate that is more than twice the rate for white men. Incredibly, President Obama's FY 2016 Budget request eliminates funding for prostate cancer activities at the CDC.

In each of the past two fiscal years, Congress approved approximately $13 million for the CDC to conduct prostate cancer research, public awareness and surveillance. With this modest amount, the CDC researched and developed live saving materials to improve informed decision making about prostate cancer screening and treatment.

Critically, the CDC supports research on underserved communities and prostate cancer. For example, in FY 2014, the CDC funded research on prostate cancer screening practices for African American men and funded another study on patterns of clinical response to the prostate specific antigen in American Indian and Alaska Native men. The science gained from both of these studies will help save the lives of countless American men.

The CDC prostate cancer program improves the health of all Americans by leveraging strong partnerships with state and local agencies. The link between the CDC and local healthcare providers supports economically efficient federal, state and community partnerships. The cancelation of prostate cancer activities will lead to the termination of state and local prostate cancer control programs, harming men throughout the United States.

According to Malecare Cancer Support, the President's FY2016 budget request will particularly imperil the lives of African American men. Prostate cancer treatment is most effective when coupled with early diagnosis. Elimination of the CDC prostate cancer program funding will reduce early health care provider contact and consultations. Defunding the CDC program will cause increased African American deaths from prostate cancer due to late stage diagnosis.

I am also concerned that silence on the elimination funding for the CDC prostate cancer program will lead to reduced funding for prostate cancer research in all federal departments and agencies.

Please restore the CDC's prostate cancer program's annual budget of $13 million. By doing so, you will help to save the lives of the 220,000 American men who are diagnosed with prostate cancer every year, and notably, those men who may be diagnosed too late for beneficial treatment.

Signed,

Your name, address

If you want, include your phone number and email for authenticity and possible reply from the Representative.

Please email any questions regarding this campaign to:
darryl@malecare.org

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare - Men fighting cancer, together

UK: Rape classes from 11 for British schoolchildren

Mastodon · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Pupils are to learn the differences between rape and consensual sex from the age of 11 as part of a drive to equip pupils with the necessary skills for "life in modern Britain".

The age-appropriate "consent classes", which could be introduced as soon as after the Easter holidays, are to be added to the personal, social, health and economic syllabus after concerns were raised that teenagers were being pressured to have sex.

Nicky Morgan, the Education Secretary, publicised the move on International Women's Day.

“We have to face the fact that many pressures girls face today were unimaginable to my generation and it's our duty to ensure that our daughters leave school able to navigate the challenges and choices they'll face in adulthood,” she wrote in the Sunday Times.

“We have to ensure that the education girls receive not only allows them to reach their academic potential, but also prepares them for life in modern Britain,” she added.'

"Is Feminism Destroying Women?"

Mastodon · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'According to a New York-based psychiatrist, at least one of every four women in America is now on psychiatric medication, as opposed to one of every seven men. Dr. Julie Holland says this is nothing less than “insane.”

Holland’s recent op-ed in the New York Times titled “Medicating Women’s Feelings” was the most emailed article on the Times’ website over the last weekend of February. It began with the statement below:

"Women are moody. By evolutionary design, we are hard-wired to be sensitive to our environments, empathic to our children’s needs and intuitive of our partners’ intentions. This is basic to our survival and that of our offspring."

Holland warns that while these feminine qualities are “rooted in biology” and “not intended to mesh with any kind of pro- or anti-feminist ideology,” they nevertheless have “social implications:”

"Women’s emotionality is a sign of health, not disease; it is a source of power. But we are under constant pressure to restrain our emotional lives. We have been taught to apologize for our tears, to suppress our anger and to fear being called hysterical."

...

Though she wants to avoid getting political about the causes of this “insanity,” Holland nevertheless spells out that psychiatric medications are biochemically causing women to be cut off from their emotional sensitivities, leading to what appears to be a preferred “more masculine, static hormonal balance.”

“This emotional blunting encourages women to take on behaviors that are typically approved by men: appearing to be invulnerable, for instance, a stance that might help women move up in male-dominated businesses,” Holland writes.

Women have learned that their normal feelings of sadness and anxiety – while they may be uncomfortable – are symptoms of pathology.'

Tanzania: NIMR campaigns for male child circumcision

Minuteman · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Circumcision of male newborns will be included in the current national health system in a bid to fight HIV/Aids transmission, a National Institute for Medical Research (NIMR) official, Dr Edward Maswanya said.

Dr Maswanya who is NIMR researcher was addressing a workshop on Gender Assessment: National HIV epidemic and response in Tanzania Mainland Thursday.

He said at the workshop hosted by the Tanzania Commission for AIDS (TACAIDS, research findings reveal that circumcision prevents HIV/Aids transmissions by 60 percent.

According to Dr Maswanya the exercise has proved successful in Iringa Region. “After Iringa, NIMR will create a national strategic plan to include newborns’ circumcision in the current national health system.”

Also the national strategic plan will be stating that parents should ensure that their sons are circumcised before the age of 14 in case they fail to undergo the exercise at very early age.
...
For her part, the TACAIDS Executive Chairman Dr Fatma Mrisho said stakeholders were discussing Gender-Based Violence (GBV) issues because they were greatly contributing to HIV/Aids prevalence.

She said her commission was planning to include GBV fight in the coming five-year HIV/Aids prevention strategy to be launched before June this year.
...
For her part, Shamila Guttali from Kinondoni Police Gender Desk called for the community to collaborate in ending GBV.'

Canada: #WhoWillYouHelp PSA portrays men as sexual predators

Mastodon · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Premier Kathleen Wynne is changing the way Ontario treats sexual violence and harassment.

Part of that plan involves a multimedia campaign including a powerful anti-sexual harassment and violence video that was posted on Youtube Friday morning with the hashtag #WhoWillYouHelp.

The Ontario premier wants to reform the way institutions like universities deal with it, what she calls the "culture of misogyny" and what is done to prevent these acts from transpiring.

"Today I'm challenging everyone in this province to step up and help end sexual harassment," she said in a speech in Toronto Friday.'

The #WhoWillYouHelp PSA is on YouTube here.

Hurt twice: Society questions validity of male sex assault, domestic violence victims

Mastodon · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What made the Abigail Simon case stand out was not only the teen-tutor relationship, or that the victim was a boy, but how people reacted to it.

It was online wildfire. Social media was abuzz with locker-room banter about the boy. Some said the relationship should have been the teen's biggest fantasy. Others suggested it wasn't a real crime. The teen wanted it, they insisted.

"He's a boy. Why would you open up this can of worms?" people asked the teen's mother, who brought the allegations to the school and police.

Simon in January was sentenced to eight to 25 years in prison for three counts of first-degree criminal sexual conduct. Sixteen is the age of sexual consent and Michigan law prohibits school employees from engaging in sexual activity with students under age 18.

Now that the trial is behind them, the teen's mother says if the case had involved a female victim, it would have elicited a different response from the community.'

The zombie statistic about women's share of income and property

Matt · 9 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Women provide 66% of the work, produce 50% of the food, but earn only 10% of the income and own 1% of the property. We can change this."
...
The Fact Checker encourages readers to submit fact checks via Twitter using #FactCheckThis, and this widely circulated Oxfam tweet ended up in our mailbox. It certainly offers a striking set of statistics.

But as is often the case, the statistics are too good to be true. Oddly, these statistics have circulated for decades, persistently, despite the efforts of researchers to debunk them as ridiculously inaccurate. One reason is because the statistics have been promoted by supposedly reputable organizations, such as Oxfam and UNDP. But people also often want to believe facts that appear to confirm their own biases.

With International Women's Day on the horizon, let's try to unravel this once and for all.
...
Yet, Doss noted, "when I presented the paper on how much of the world's food do women produce at FAO [Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations] — they were quite upset with me. They kept saying that they needed this statistic!"
...
It's good that for the first time Oxfam and UNDP have acknowledged that they have peddled false information. But they need to take a proactive role in setting the record straight. Any papers or Web sites that had previously used these figures need to be prominently corrected. It's not enough to simply kill a link. The message should be clear: This is a bogus, Four-Pinocchio statistic unworthy of citation.'

Men’s issues group unveils billboard in reaction to Ontario’s ‘sexist’ campaign against domestic violence

mens_issues · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Calling the Ontario government’s campaign against sexual violence “sexist,” a men’s issues group unveiled a new billboard in downtown Toronto Monday in an attempt to draw attention to male victims of domestic abuse.

“HALF of domestic violence victims are men,” reads the billboard, paid for by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE). “NO domestic violence shelters are dedicated to us.”

The billboard comes after Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne released a three-year, $41-million plan to combat sexual violence last week. The campaign, spurred in part by the high-profile sex assault allegations against Jian Ghomeshi, includes a video ad with staggering scenes of women being sexually assaulted and harassed.

In a news release Monday, CAFE accused Premier Wynne of forgetting “half the victims of violence.”

Premier Kathleen Wynne’s violence against women initiative reinforces sexist stereotypes that ignore violence against men, gays and lesbians, and endanger children with abusive mothers,” the statement reads.
...
But those figures are based on police reports, CAFE spokesman Justin Trottier said, noting the Centre for Justice Statistics report itself finds female victims are “three times more likely than males to state that they had reported the incident to police.”

“In other words, there is an important scholarly debate about the rates of victimization, severity and reporting,” Mr. Trottier said in an email, “but the idea that male victimization is non-existent and can be safely ignored, is to neglect to support a huge group of people in need.”'

College gym asks to have 'women's only' hours

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video interview here. Description:

'Lawyer in Blue Jeans Jeff Isaac explains how a college gym asked for "women's only" hours at a public facility. Does it fall under Title IX?'

The Huffington Post UK imposed a 24-hour ban on men

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On Sunday, The Huffington Post UK imposed a 24-hour ban. On men. We decided to only use pictures of women on the front page - except for Richard Branson, who we'll get onto later.

You may well be thinking this is censorship. This is prejudice against men. Yes, it is.

I didn't actually think it was a good idea - more of an interesting experiment. To remove pictures of men from our home page, just because they are men, is obviously unfair. Yet it served a purpose.

When we report the news, we pick what we consider to be the biggest stories for our readers. Sometimes they are about men, sometimes they are about women (and sometimes about dresses, or dogs, or weasels riding birds).'

Women-only police stations an effective way to target domestic violence, law professor says

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The head of the school of justice at Queensland University of Technology, Professor Kerry Carrington, said such police stations had been shown to encourage more women to report domestic violence, and resulted in more women being satisfied with the outcome.

But the innovation is not among the recommendations handed down last month in the Queensland Government's Not now, not ever report into domestic violence.

Professor Carrington told 612 ABC Brisbane that Brazil has been operating women-only police stations since 1985 and had gradually increased their presence to 485 locations.'

Only women get help for spousal violence, while men are ignored

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A condition called hemispacial neglect, also known as hemiagnosia, is a rare phenomenon in the neurological world, characterized by the inability of those afflicted to process and perceive stimuli on one side of their environment. The most striking feature of the condition is that the victim not only fails to see what is in (usually) her left field of vision, but is also unaware of the fact that the other side of his environment even exists.

There is a cultural correlative to this condition that is remarkably common, affecting almost all academics in our university humanities and social science departments, most politicians and most media commentators. Cultural hemiagnosia presents as a failure to see, or even be aware of, the fact that half the population – the male half – are ever victims of violence by women.

...

The result is that a great deal of social, educational and legislative concern focuses on female victims of domestic violence, with lavish sums of money devoted to counseling, shelters and public service campaigns aimed at sensitizing the public to this shameful social scourge, but virtually zero funds are spent on the same services for male sufferers of the same scourge – without guilt, since male suffering is both visually and cognitively invisible to the hemiagnosiacs creating the policies.

...

Krowitz is correct that the most extreme form of spousal violence is male-on-female, but hard-core batterers and outright killers are rare (about 45 women are killed by male intimate partners in Canada annually, and about 25 men are killed by female partners, although the latter figure does not include proxy killings by boyfriends or others). In violence of the mild to moderately severe variety that constitutes most domestic violence – shoving, slapping, hitting, punching, throwing objects, even stabbing and burning – both sexes initiate and cause harm in equal measure. That includes gays and lesbians, where rates are higher than the general population.'

Sorry Patricia Arquette, Women Are Doing Better Than You Think

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I had two emotions when I heard Patricia Arquette's acceptance speech last week for her well-deserved Oscar for Boyhood. First: good for her to want to spend her speech trying to improve the world by calling for pay equity between genders instead of reveling in her own fame.

Second, however: what a shame that she believes the same old pseudo-facts instead of thinking for a second about what the statistics really mean. Why can't people learn to be critical about statistics?

One day after the annual observance of International Women's Day, here's the real scoop. The average of 77 cents on the dollar that women receive compares the median annual income for full-time, full-year 25-to-69-year-old women and men. That average is much better than it was as recently as 1980 (when women made less than 60 percent). But that's not a fair measure. If you compare women and men doing the jobs with the same kind of job history and for the same time devoted to their current job, you get numbers closer to 92 cents on the dollar. While that's not 100 cents, it leaves a very different taste in your mouth than 77.'

"Sexism often comes with a smile, study finds"

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Benevolent sexism makes men more smiley when they interact with women, and that's bad news. Men who put women on a pedestal may be the wolves in sheep clothing hindering gender equality.

A new study examining the nonverbal cues thrown out during interactions between men and women finds that men who have high ratings of "benevolent sexism" — attitudes towards women that are well-intentioned but perpetuate inequality — finds that smiling and other positive cues increase when this kind of sexism is prevalent.
...
"Basically, the argument is that these two properties — hostile sexism and benevolent sexism — work together to maintain inequality," said lead author Jin Goh, a graduate student at Northeastern University. Most people think of sexist men as being dominant aggressors who believe that women should be put down in society. But other men believe that women should be treated with kindness and love, but still don't see them as being capable of achieving the same things as men.'

Email scandal raises questions about Hillary's feminist motives

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'That being said, coincidence is rarely ever the result of unrelated events. It is possible that Clinton is in fact hiding behind feminist campaigns in order to protect her own self-interests. If this is the case, it is a deplorable stunt. But even if this isn't true, the aforementioned scandal proves Clinton's shady character and unlawful activity. It exposes her as a hypocrite and a criminal, and I do not believe that someone with these traits should be one of the main leaders of the feminist cause. The fight for equality deserves better.

But as 2016 approaches, Clinton will continue to rally feminists in the hopes of garnering more votes. In recent speeches she has excited crowds by shouting things such as "Don't you someday want to see a woman president?" to which she receives an abundance of applause. Of course, I too want to see a woman president. But I know when a politician is using that sentiment and manipulating it for personal causes.

Feminists cannot allow the desire for a woman leader to taint their analysis of Clinton's character. And we cannot allow Clinton to misuse feminism as a means of reaching the Oval Office. Feminists need a leader, but they deserve a just one. My advice is that we don't support just any proponent of a good cause but rather one who has proven his or her validity, leadership and true belief in the movement.'

"Why it’s time for men to face up to a violent reality"

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We all give lip service to the problem of male-on-female violence, but I think its true horror is rarely felt, at least not by men like me.

On Sunday, which was International Women’s Day, I watched with disgust as a host of male trolls made noise about ‘Meninism’ and male rights.

Like petulant children, they asked why there is no day for men (there is) and why issues like male suicide and rape are ignored (they aren’t).

...

To my fellow blokes, I say you punch like men. You rape like men. You drink like men. You fight wars like men. You hurt children like men.

Woman up.'

Australia: Q&A domestic violence program ignored male victims

Mastodon · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As for Monday night's Q&A [link added] programme, it was a highly scripted version of the domestic violence morality play. Every questioner and every question was chosen in the advance by the producers. The message the producers wanted to give was that domestic violence is all about violence by men against women and little else, a message both simple and incorrect in equal measures.

It was only at the close of the programme that a man was allowed to ask a question about the domestic violence he had suffered at the hands of his wife, and then it was quickly dismissed.

The humiliation of the victim was completed by Natasha Stott Despoja talking about violence against men in heterosexual relationships and proclaiming domestic violence was still "a gender issue".
...
400 years ago, Shakespeare wrote of another form of prejudice in The Merchant of Venice: "If you prick us, do we not bleed?… If you poison us, do we not die?"

Surely this should guide our concern for all victims of domestic violence, not just some.'

Episode excerpt on YouTube here.

Canada: A Perfect Marriage - Assisted Death and Divorce

fathers4fairness · 11 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'In financial desperation and longing to live with her gigolo in the Dominican Republic, Nancy Lane, a Brockville nurse and former Prescott town councillor, killed her husband in 2009 by administering a lethal cocktail to cash in on a $200,000 life insurance policy, an Ottawa court heard Monday.

Lane, 55, is accused of killing Art Lane, 61, on Oct. 8, 2009, at their home.

...

The Crown's theory is that Art Lane, a well-known union negotiator in Brockville, was better dead than alive to his wife. Morrison told court that Nancy Lane, on trial for first-degree murder, wanted to cash in on her husband's life insurance policy to preserve her obsessive dreams of living with her gigolo in the Dominican Republic.

And, as the jury heard, Lane has presented her husband's death as a mercy killing.'

"No Fault" Divorce has been available in Canada since 1968 but the country just recently considered legalizing "Euthanasia" - Nancy Lane saw the potential of combining both.'

Feminists: Domestic Violence By Women Against Men Isn't Bad Enough

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'How many times have you brought up sexual violence against women in the Middle East when arguing with a feminist, only to be told, "Just because someone else has it worse, that doesn't mean we should ignore injustice here at home?" Never mind that said "injustice" will usually be confined to nonsensical "microaggressions" like breathing too loudly on the subway (#manhaling, trend it), but don't you often wonder if they'd hold the same standard when talking about real forms of injustice?

Like, for instance, let's say a nontrivial amount of domestic abuse happened to men. Would it be okay to complain about that, even if someone else has it worse?

Well, according to Canadian feminists, the answer is — surprise, surprise — NOPE:

> The text on the billboard claims half of all domestic abuse victims are men and also claims there are no domestic shelters for male victims of domestic abuse.
> ...
> But that stat is based on self-reported violence. And the same study found women were more than twice as likely to report injuries, and that women report more serious violence — being sexually assaulted, beaten, choked or threatened with a gun or knife.
> ...
> "Women are more likely to experience more severe and, in fact, far more likely to experience fatal violence," Minerson said.

Yup, suddenly when the victims of the injustice involved aren't women, now we can talk about whether the injustice is bad enough to warrant attention. Funny how that works, huh?

Look, if you want to oppose domestic violence, that's great, more power to you, but if you don't want others to delegitimize your suffering by pointing out someone has it worse, here's a simple trick: Don't pull that argumentative tactic on someone else. And if you want to make the case that, given limited time and resources, you want to focus on the biggest instances where your help is needed, don't be upset when someone calls you out for being excessively myopic. This isn't about ideology, it's about consistency.'

Facebook's Sandberg: Men are inferior to women

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's always fun being a man in a world where the media feels free to insult the intentions and capabilities of men but that doing the same for women is forbidden. There are always excited announcements of new studies showing how women excel over men in this field or that field.

Not the latest to jump on this bandwagon is the brazen COO of Facebook, Sheryl Sandberg, who wrote the non-bestselling book Lean In, which, for the male audience, should be retitled Bend Over. Sandberg, who must have an awful lot of free time, penned an op-ed in the NY Times asserting that women are superior to men in a number of ways.

"Studies reveal that women bring new knowledge, skills and networks to the table, take fewer unnecessary risks, and are more inclined to contribute in ways that make their teams and organizations better. Successful venture-backed start-ups have more than double the median proportion of female executives of failed ones. And an analysis of the 1,500 Standard & Poor's companies over 15 years demonstrated that, when firms pursued innovation, the more women they had in top management, the more market value they generated."

Who seriously believes that women as a whole take fewer unnecessary risks than men, or are better-skilled then men? It's ridiculous on the face of it. What's next, a "double-blind scientific study" showing that women are nicer than men?

In the past women have been held back and have been discriminated against by evil men, but it's increasingly rare in today's world. But instead of promoting the idea that everyone is equal, and to judge everyone as individuals, feminists are going overboard and promoting themselves as the superior race, like girl Nazis.'

Woman recants rape story hours later

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A 20-year-old woman told police that a masked black man raped her in a Brooklyn park Saturday — but recanted her story hours later, saying it never happened, cops said.

The woman, who is white, showed up at the Woodhull Hospital Emergency Room at about 2:15 a.m. claiming she was raped.

She said her fictitious attacker cut her blouse and bra with a knife before forcing himself on her at Rodney Park North in Williamsburg about 12:15 a.m.

...

Yet hours after searching, the woman admitted she lied about the whole thing, police said.

It was not immediately clear why she made the story up.

No criminal charges are expected to be filed against her, police said.'

The Cinematic Railroading of Jameis Winston

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A movement is afoot to destroy the career of a young black man whom a young white woman with overwhelming, well-documented credibility problems has accused of raping her. Three separate investigations, including a Florida State Code of Conduct hearing, have found former Florida State quarterback and Heisman Trophy winner Jameis Winston not to be a rapist. But now The Hunting Ground, a much-touted documentary on campus sexual assault, features his previously anonymous accuser presenting her case publicly for the first time. Senator Claire McCaskill (D., Mo.) has warned that NFL teams had better “watch this movie before they draft him.”

The movie, co-produced by CNN and created by Emmy-winning director Kirby Dick and Oscar-nominated producer Amy Ziering, has already aired at the White House, the Sundance Festival, many campuses, and in New York and Los Angeles. It will air on March 13 in other major cities, including Washington, D.C.

The film’s longest segment — 15 full minutes — is designed to prove that Winston raped former classmate Erica Kinsman and got away with it because of bad police work and college administrators’ greed and favoritism toward football stars. The film “throws down a challenge of a sort for the National Football League with a not-so-subtle suggestion that teams should think twice about drafting one of the top college prospects, Jameis Winston,” as the New York Times enthused.'

Two expelled from college over sex assault allegations police couldn't substantiate

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The University of Maryland-Baltimore County has expelled two students following an investigation into allegations that a female student was raped by four men on campus.

University spokeswoman Dinah Winnick confirmed the expulsions Thursday. The university said two students were expelled for code of conduct violations. Local police, meanwhile, reported they were unable to confirm a crime had been committed.

...

The investigation was prompted by a complaint from a female student who told authorities she was raped by four male students in a dorm room but that she was so drunk she couldn't remember what happened.

Baltimore County Police Department spokeswoman Elise Armacost said investigators determined that there was not enough evidence to file criminal charges against the accused students.'

Sexual Assault Case False According To University Alert System

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'According to a Razalert sent to students Wednesday (March 11), a sexual assault case reported Monday (March 9) to University of Arkansas Police is false.

In a follow-up interview, the student recanted her previous statements and admitted there was no attack, according to police.

UAPD called it an unfortunate occurrence and stated they are in contact with the Student Affairs Office and the Washington County Prosecutor's Office to decide on appropriate course of action regarding the false report.
...
The student told police the assault happened around 6:30 p.m. after a man approached the student at the parking garage and asked for help jump starting his car, then asked for help getting home to his sick dog, according to police. The student said the man grabbed her arm with one hand and put the other underneath her clothes before she got away and into her vehicle, the report states. The student also gave police a description of the suspect.

Anne Shelley with the Northwest Arkansas Women's Rape Crisis Center said falsely reporting sexual assaults impacts actual victims.'

"It's extreme masculinity – not love or despair – that drives a father to kill his children"

Mastodon · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The messages that emerge from such narratives are double-edged, adding fuel to the fire they seek to douse. A similar problem arises with broader discussions of fathers' rights and masculinity; no one dares to say "what you have lost was never yours to begin with". If men grow up expecting to acquire ownership of people in the same way one might acquire wealth – as easy as sticking pink and blue pegs in one's car in The Game of Life – then they are destined to end up feeling robbed. The "masculinity in crisis" narrative already tells them they are being deprived of something essential, something to which all men who lived before them had access but to which they, inexplicably, do not.
...
Masculinity is not some fragile butterfly on a wheel. It depends on reducing other people to objects. The solution is not to recreate an imaginary golden age in which said objects were – so we tell ourselves – more pliable and less likely to disrupt the narrative. A world in which not only jobs were stable and not going anywhere, but neither were women and children. That world dehumanised over half the human raceand we should temper our sympathy for those men who would openly mourn its passing. As the feminist Kathy Miriam argues, "the problem of 'masculinity' has displaced a systemic, structural analysis of male power. And has displaced . . . the problem of men possessing women". Our obsession with masculinity's supposedly never-ending crises merely bolsters the myth that if women and children are people, men cannot be.

Confronted with violence and cruelty, we need to speak plainly. Family annihilators are not loving fathers. This is not love or despair, nor is it "masculinity in crisis." It is masculinity at its most raw and extreme; an absolute statement of ownership over bodies and lives. If you can't have them, no one can. We cannot reduce the acts of men such as Sykes and Fuller to self-harm plus two or three.'

Australian mother charged with murder in deaths of 8 children

Canada: Military apologizes for errors in probe into soldier's suicide

fathers4fairness · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The head of Canada's military police is apologizing for his force's incompetence after an inquiry found investigations into the suicide of an Afghanistan veteran were conducted by inexperienced personnel who made unacceptable errors.

Colonel Rob Delaney, the Canadian Forces Provost Marshal, said Tuesday that a highly critical report by the Canadian Military Police Complaints Commission into investigations of the 2008 death of Corporal Stuart Langridge underlines the fact that mistakes were made and he will take steps to correct them.

But Glenn Stannard, the chair of the complaints commission, said the military's written response to his 1,008-page report was dismissive and most of the 46 recommendations were rejected or ignored.

On the heels of a spate of soldiers' suicides, the commission's findings released Tuesday raise questions about how well those deaths are being investigated by the people assigned to determine whether the military could have done anything to prevent them.'

Also see: Secret military report into soldier's 2008 suicide blames victim and parents

Brazil passes a new law specifically oulawing female homicide — femicide

Mastodon · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The new law provides a legal definition for femicide — the killing of a woman by a man because of her gender — and proscribes mandatory jail sentences of 12 to 30 years. In addition, the law increases the jail time for crimes against pregnant women, girls under 14, women over 60 and people with disabilities.

"For many years, the so-called passion crimes — homicides of woman by their husbands, lovers — [the perpetrators] would use the argument that 'under stress and deep emotion, this honorable man has killed his wife because she was having an affair and thus dishonouring him and his family and his children,'" Pitanguy says.

Many, many men were let off, or subject to symbolic penalty for murder.

“It in a sense reflected values that women were the property or appendix of the man,” Pitanguy says.

This new law combats that patriarchal notion.

“Laws, they give a standard from where you walk. I think that with the femicide law there will be difficulties in implementing the legislation," she adds. "In the end, this law, its effect will not really be post mortem but be while women are alive. Men know now that if they commit a crime, the penalty will be much higher.”'

Feminists don't hate men but it wouldn't matter if we did

Mastodon · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the most common derisive taunts thrown at feminists – and one of the oldest – is “manhater”. It’s been around since the days of suffrage, and still gets used today, though its a pretty anodyne insult. Most feminists, like me, shun the label and work to convince people that despite the stereotypes feminists absolutely, without a doubt, do not hate men.

But so what if we did?

... if the worst thing that happens to a man is that a woman doesn’t like him ...well, he has it pretty damn good. It’s not as if we’re living in some sort of Wicker Man-inspired dystopia, after all.

Besides, when women hate men, we hurt their feelings. When men hate women, they kill us: mass shootings have been attributed to misogyny, and sexual and domestic violence against women is often fuelled by a hatred for women.
...
... if feminists really hated men we’d probably come up with a better way to hurt them than funny t-shirts that insist that their tears are delicious. (Men may have some very sensitive parts, but even the manhating-est among us doesn’t go around kicking them willy-nilly.)

Despite all the fun-loving, internet-in-joke misandry, the vast majority of women and feminists do not hate men. Many of us might hate bad men: the sexists, misogynists and all-around jerks. But our hatred is just a feeling, and not something that can impact men in any meaningful or oppressive way.

Men who claim to be genuinely worried about man-hating or “misandry” are grasping at straws, and searching for a victim status that simply doesn’t exist. Guys are still doing pretty well, so let us have our “man-hating” fun while you go on ruling the world.

But keep one eye open. (Just kidding ... sort of.)'

"How men’s rights groups are distorting the debate about equality"

Mastodon · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It’s difficult to deny this simple observation, if only because it is the empirical, statistical, plain-to-see truth. But a small and vocal minority do insist upon it.

In Canada, this group has a name: the deceptively huggable-sounding Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE). But their agenda is less pro-equality than pro-redressing what they see as a gender imbalance in the current debate about equality, namely the obvious: That women are more often the victims of sexism and abuse.

In CAFE’s topsy-turvy world view, men are the unsung victims while women are the covert oppressors. Their message is not about equality so much as it is a grandly deluded turning of the tables. And while their carefully written mandate claims to support “the status, health and well-being of boys and men,” in fact their actions do the opposite – by stoking anger and self-pity in the minds of a small and troubled minority. And that anger and self-pity – guess what it leads to? More hating on women. Which is exactly what we don’t need when it comes to the fight for equality.
...
We know this stuff. Ask any cop or social worker and they will tell you the same thing: Female-perpetrated spousal and sexual abuse is relatively rare. As a result, it’s far from top of the list of Canada’s social problems (though obviously when it does happen it should be taken as seriously as any other form of domestic abuse).

Violence against women, on the other hand? A quick glance at the latest crime statistics will show you it is sadly endemic in our society.'

Male domestic violence victim: 'I never imagined something like this would happen to me'

Mastodon · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The male victim of horrendous domestic abuse has come forward to show his scars, telling men: “Being attacked by a woman is nothing to be ashamed of.”

Ken Gregory, 65, suffered first and second degree burns to 14 per cent of his body last March after his now ex-wife Teresa Gilbertson, 60, tipped a kettle of boiling water over the back of his head.
...
It was then that Gilbertson, who is now awaiting sentencing for a conviction of serious bodily harm, went to make a cup of tea but instead returned with a jug of boiling water – which she poured over her husband’s head.
...
The attack was the culmination in weeks of verbal abuse, Mr Gregory said. Earlier he had gone to hospital after his then-wife poured scalding tea over him as he slept.

"As a man who is a bit older and who isn't exactly small, there is a perception that you can't be a victim of domestic violence,” he said.

Mr Gregory wants to address the stigma surrounding men who are abused by their wives and partners. He added, “it should be the same message that they put out for women – don’t be frightened, you don’t have to put up with it.”'

Graduate sues college, alleging mishandled sex-assault case

Mastodon · 14 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Boston College graduate accused of sexual assault has filed a lawsuit alleging that the university violated federal anti-discrimination laws and its own policies governing sexual-assault allegations.

The suit, filed Wednesday in federal court, says BC rushed to find the student responsible for sexual assault and deprived him of a fair hearing. The process branded the student as a sexual predator without giving him a chance to tell his side of the story, the complaint alleges.

...

The male student was also charged in Suffolk County District Court. Those charges were dismissed in May 2014 after physical evidence and video footage exonerated him, according to the suit.

In the separate, internal inquiry at BC three weeks after the alleged 2012 incident, an administrative hearing board made up of three administrators, one professor, and one student found him responsible for indecent assault and battery and suspended him for three semesters, court documents say.

The student's family is seeking $3 million in damages and asking for their son's record to be expunged. The family is also seeking a permanent injunction against the school, ordering it to comply with Title IX, the federal law that mandates gender equity on campus.'

Woman pleads guilty to pushing man onto subway track because of his religion

ErikaLancastor · 14 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. I wonder how much (if any) time she'll spend in prison? Excerpt:

'A man waiting for a train was pushed off the subway platform into the path of an arriving train on December 27, 2012. He died instantly.

Erika Menendez of Queens, was charged with second-degree murder as a hate crime. Menendez told authorities she "pushed a Muslim off the train tracks" because she'd hated Hindus and Muslims ever since the 9/11 terrorist attacks, according to Queens District Attorney Richard Brown.

Menendez, 33, was allowed Friday to plead guilty to first-degree manslaughter, Brown said in a statement.

The judge indicated he would sentence her to 22 to 25 years in prison on April 29. Conviction on the original charge would have resulted in a tougher sentence -- 25 years to life imprisonment, Meris Campbell, spokeswoman for the district attorney's office, said Saturday.'

"Teacher Reminds 9yr-old Boy Writing Is For Girls"

Minuteman · 14 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Photo description:

'Meredith Kleykamp tweeted us a photo of a comment written on her 3rd grade son's cursive homework. The teacher wrote: "beautifully written! for a boy!"

So what's the message here?'

UK: Labour opts for women-only shortlist in district

Mastodon · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Labour has announced it will pick its general election candidate in the key West Yorkshire marginal seat of Halifax from an all-women shortlist.

MP Linda Riordan said last month she was stepping down after 10 years due to ill health.

Candidates must apply by Monday and a shortlist will be drawn up early next week by the party's national executive.

The move comes after Ms Riordan warned Labour was in danger of losing the seat unless a candidate was selected soon.

At a meeting it was decided there should be an all-women shortlist for the constituency.'

Woman arrested for domestic violence after stabbing boyfriend

Mastodon · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Selma Police Department arrested a woman on Friday and charged her with domestic violence after she allegedly stabbed her boyfriend twice.

Police responded to the 1100 block of Fifth Avenue at 7:36 p.m., where the victim told officers that he had gotten into an argument with 38-year-old Brenda Jean Burns over the phone. Burns then came over to the residence where the argument continued in the front yard. It was at that point that the suspect went into the house, grabbed a kitchen knife, came back outside and stabbed the victim with the knife.

The victim was able to take the knife away from the suspect, but the suspect went back inside the house and grabbed another knife and stabbed the victim again.'

Time to rethink ‘girls-only’ approach to HPV vaccine?

Mastodon · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Encouraging parents to have their sons get the human papillomavirus (HPV) vaccine—rather than just trying to get more girls vaccinated—could ultimately protect more people for the same price, according to a study by a mathematician.

Whether vaccinating boys against HPV in addition to girls would only divert scarce resources from a campaign originally designed to help prevent cervical cancer has been a matter of debate.

But with HPV-related cancers in men on the rise, and HPV vaccine coverage for girls in the United States stagnating well below the critical levels needed to ensure that most people are protected, researchers have been re-examining the case for a girls-only approach.
...
Although the virus is most frequently associated with cervical cancer, women aren’t the only ones at risk. The Centers for Disease Control estimates that a third of the 27,000 cases of cancer HPV causes in the US each year occur in men, where it can cause cancers of the throat, tongue, tonsils, penis, and anus.'

State's colleges struggle to deal with issue of rape

Mastodon · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Legislators and universities in New Jersey are changing the way rapes are dealt with on campus following two explosive incidents at local colleges and several high-profile cases that have brought national attention to the epidemic of sexual assault among students.

The allegations of rape at William Paterson University in Wayne and Ramapo College in Mahwah late last year came on the heels of incidents in New York, Florida and Virginia, scandals that prompted the federal government to push schools to be more aggressive in the handling of sexual assault cases.

But universities have struggled to investigate claims that are often difficult to prove — consent sometimes comes down to a matter of perspective, especially in young adults, and in most incidents there are no witnesses and memory is impaired by trauma, alcohol or drug use.

The task is all the more complicated by the need to preserve the rights of the accused. And increasingly, more young men are suing their schools — three have filed notice of intent to sue William Paterson — saying their lives have forever been altered by accusations that are unfounded and cases that were mishandled.
...
Lawmakers in New Jersey and other states are trying to legislate the very nature of consent and take rape investigations out of the hands of campus police, putting outside law enforcement in charge. Students are marching at more than 100 universities in solidarity with rape victims. Administrators at Ramapo and other schools are banning boozy gatherings in the hopes of preventing the kind of activities that lead to trouble. Ten states are even considering permitting students to carry guns to prevent rape.'

'No Boys Allowed' day teaches girls about science, math

Mastodon · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Classrooms at Seattle University had a new rule on Saturday: No Boys Allowed.

That's because it's the annual Expanding Your Horizons program, bringing together 500 middle school girls from Washington State to learn about science, math and engineering.

The girls rotated through workshops focusing on veterinary medicine, infectious diseases and robotics, to name a few.

"We're not trying to exclude boys," said Jen Sorensen, the program's organizer and chemistry professor at Seattle University. "We're trying to provide an opportunity for girls who might not even realize these career opportunities are available to them."'

Sheryl Sandberg Nags Husbands to Do the Laundry--But "Forgets" to Nag Wives to Shovel the Snow and Fix the Faucet

Mastodon · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'First, why is "housework" consistently defined by Sandberg and Grant as washing the dishes and doing the laundry? What about shoveling the snow off the driveway, changing a tire on the car, assembling the Ikea furniture or repairing that leaky faucet and the cabinet door that came off the hinges? In other words, the tough outdoor and mechanical work that husbands regularly do for their wives and families? That doesn't seem to count as far as Sandberg and Grant are concerned. They're perfectly happy to hector husbands to take over the "women's work" around the house, but they don't even suggest to wives that they take over the "men's work."

Second, that Gager-Scott study cited by Sandberg and Grant doesn't actually seem to say that husbands who fold the clean clothes fresh out of the drier get more sex than husbands who just open a beer. Its conclusions seem to go more toward dispelling the myth that people who work hard don't have time for sex.

In fact, what scientific studies do confirm is that women find men who pitch in with household chores sexy, all right--but only if those chores are the "manly" Mr.-Fixit style chores that Sandberg and Grant completely ignore...'

Student presents lecture on rethinking male circumcision in the United States

Matt · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Although parenthood isn't in the immediate horizon of most traditional students, junior philosophy major Dave Jonathan is has been confronting issues of ethics, terminology and choice, taking words right from the mouth's of babes.

"(Male) circumcision is just not something that is really talked about," Jonathan said.

According to Jonathan, several contradictory viewpoints frame the common knowledge surrounding male circumcision, creating a social environment where parents often decide whether or not to circumcise depending on outdated scientific studies or cultural biases.'

Neither Could Legally Consent, Only the Boy Gets a Felony Charge

Matt · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If two people are equally unable to give consent, but have sex anyway, should either be charged with a crime? It's a question that many college administrators wrestle with when drugs and alcohol are factors in sexual assault disputes. The verdict often seems to be that male students are uniquely responsible for ascertaining that their sexual partners are in a state of mind to consent, even when the female is the initiator and both are intoxicated.

This double-standard for men seems to apply to underage teenagers as well. Take, for example, this recent story in The Courier-Journal: the Kentucky Supreme Court has agreed to hear the case of "B.H.," who was 15-years-old when he was charged with sexual misconduct and possessing pornographic material featuring a minor (the latter is a felony charge). B.H. was in trouble for having sex with his 13-year-old girlfriend and exchanging nude pictures with her. The acts were voluntary, though neither teen could legally consent to sexual activities since they were both underage at the time.

The girl's parents went to the cops when they found out, and B.H. was prosecuted. (Even though his parents could technically have done the same thing to his girlfriend, they opted against that course of action.) He plead guilty, had to register as a sex offender, and was remanded to a youth treatment center for almost a year. He is now challenging that outcome after the fact.

Assistant Attorney General Gregory Fuchs maintains that B.H. pressured the girl and had been involved in one other incident—a prank of a sexual nature—that justified his punishment...'

Factual Feminist reviews human rights group's "gamer" report

Matt · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTube video here. Description:

'A major humanitarian group has just come out with a lesson plan for high school students on sexism in video games. It is full of propaganda, vilifies gaming and gamers, and is likely to discourage young women from playing. Does this matter, or is it all just a game? AEI resident scholar Christina Hoff Sommers explains.'

College Brass to be Sued Personally Over Date Rapes $100 Million Estimated Legal Cost So Far Could Skyrocket, Predicts Expert

Matt · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'The costs to schools of dealing with allegations of date rapes and other campus sexual assaults, which may have already topped 100 million dollars, could skyrocket under plans announced this morning to sue nor only colleges, but also key academic administrators, for violating the constitutional rights of accused students.

The plans – and an explanation about how and why conducting expulsion hearings which do not permit accused students to cross examine accusers and others violates their right to Due Process under the U.S. Constitution – were revealed by public interest law professor John Banzhaf.

The controversial professor, “The Man Behind the Ban on Cigarette Commercials,” and “a Driving Force Behind the Lawsuits That Have Cost Tobacco Companies Billions of Dollars,” has also been called an “Entrepreneur of Litigation, [and] a Trial Lawyer’s Trial Lawyer.”

That’s because he helped develop and popularize many novel legal theories in addition of those related to tobacco. These include victories against food companies over the issue of fat (“The Man Big Tobacco and Now Fast Food Love to Hate,” and the lawyer “Who’s Leading the Battle Against Big Fat”), a leading Supreme Court decision protecting the environment, several novel law suits attacking governmental corruption, and over 100 successful legal actions protecting women from sex discrimination.'

Campus activist: Sometimes people need to 'reflect' before realizing they are victims

Matt · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Alexandra Brodsky, a Yale Law Student and well-known campus activist who also edits the feminist website Feministing.com, said during a panel Thursday that some who are raped don't immediately realize it.

Brodsky claimed that just because a woman didn't immediately report a sexual assault doesn't mean she's lying.

"Often schools have time limits because there's this idea that if you were raped you would know it immediately, even though survivors' experiences make clear that that's not true," she said. "That often people need some time to reflect and feel comfortable speaking out."

She also suggested that campus sexual assault cases should not be turned over to the police.'

Five harsh realities of campus sexual assault from a feminist former judge

Matt · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Nancy Gertner's feminist bona fides can hardly be questioned. A college friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton, Gertner is well known for her staunch defense of women in court.

She has won prestigious awards for her women's advocacy, and called her memoirs In Defense of Women: Memoirs of an Unrepentant Advocate. A liberal in good standing, she was appointed to the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts by President Clinton at the recommendation of Sens. Ted Kennedy and John Kerry.

So what made such a staunch feminist advocate think twice about the current climate revolving around sexual assault on college campuses? It happened when her law firm took the case of a young man Gertner believed to be wrongly accused of rape even though a grand jury indicted him. In the case Gertner described, the man was accused 10 months after the encounter by a woman whose story constantly changed and was contradicted by witnesses.

Gertner was one of the 28 current and former Harvard Law professors who signed a letter against the school's new sexual assault policy.

During a panel Thursday discussing campus sexual assault and Gertner's recent article in the American Prospect, the former federal judge discussed some sensitive topics that, had a man such as Washington Post author George Will said them, would have been excoriated.'

Georgetown University lawyer details the burden placed on colleges by campus sexual assault policies

Matt · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'At a panel Thursday discussing campus sexual assault and due process, the general counsel for Georgetown University lamented the constantly changing rules being forced on colleges and universities by Congress and the Obama administration.

"Part of what is hard, honestly, as an institution, is the playing field changes with every OCR resolution," Lisa Brown, who is also the university's vice president, said at a panel put together by the American Constitution Society. "You implement the 'Dear Colleague' letter, then you have the [Violence Against Women Act] reauthorization, then you have [Office for Civil Rights'] Q&A and then you have the White House task force report and you have all these resolution agreements."

The onslaught of government regulations started in 2011 with the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights' "Dear Colleague" letter, which reinterpreted Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 to classify sexual misconduct as a form of discrimination.

In 2013, after a lengthy battle in Congress, President Obama signed a reauthorization of VAWA, which also added new rules for colleges and universities in regards to Title IX.'

ACTA Calls for Due Process: Learning from the UVA Scandal

Matt · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt starts on p. 3:

'ACTA has consistently warned that when a college must deal with grave and emotionally charged issues— and surely sexual assault is such an is- sue—it is due process and the principle of innocence until guilt is established that alone can ensure justice. Many on cam- pus and in political leadership feel better by crying for swift, stern punishments, but rapid, bungled investigations often mean that the guilty walk free and the innocent are punished. Unless we want to see vigilante-style justice, we need to rely on the legal system to deal with crime. The recent events at University of Virginia offer a case in point.

Shortly after Rolling Stone magazine published “A Rape on Campus: A Bru- tal Assault and Struggle for Justice at UVA,” ACTA issued the statement, “Col- leges have the responsibility of providing a safe atmosphere, but the investigation and prosecution of grave criminal activity can only be done effectively by the police and the courts.” UVA’s ill-considered re- sponse, however, stands as an example of what happens when a university chooses a different path.

As is now notorious, the story told in Rolling Stone quickly came apart and the article became emblematic of something else: the incontrovertible reality of false accusations, the intellectual and moral bankruptcy of trial by the media, and the failure of college leadership.'

Anti-circumcision protest held in Fort Worth, Texas

Matt · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A group of men in white suits with fake blood on their crotch areas gathered in Fort Worth to protest male circumcision Sunday.

About 30 members and supporters of Bloodstained Men, a nonprofit group based in California that travels the country in protest of male circumcision, held signs that read, “Foreskin is not a birth defect.” They were at Hulen Street and Interstate 30.

The group was founded in 2012 by a man who legally changed his name to Brother K in 1986 to protest his own circumcision at birth.

“Our founding fathers were not circumcised,” Brother K said Sunday.'

Finally, a TV ad showing a dad's depth of dedication and love for his child

Matt · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This is a MetLife ad aired in Hong Kong. It may well be the most touching filmed sequence (nevermind ad) involving a dad and his child ever made. Trigger warning: Some of you may start crying while watching it, so if you're at work, you might want to wait 'til you're home. Yes, it's that good. And to place it in context, the HK economy is unusually stable and resilient, but not miraculous. Its unemployment rate at the end of 2010 was 4% with underemployment at 1.8%. The dad in this ad appears to fall into that 1.8%. Face to the figure changes things a bit, yes? If you want to express appreciation or anything else to ML-HK, the contact form is here.

Anything Boys Can Rank, Girls Can Rank Better: Why Women Should Consider A Career in SEO or SEM

Mastodon · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Any technical industry is bound to be at least somewhat male-dominated. Our society has unfortunately not yet fully embraced the fact that men and women can be equally talented when it comes to technical careers. SEO (search engine optimization) and SEM (search engine marketing, a.k.a. pay-per-click advertising on search engines) are certainly no exception. In fact, it seems as if these are some of the more intensely male-dominated sectors of the digital marketing industry to work in.

As a woman who has created a very successful career in the search industry, I find this particularly disappointing. I truly believe that women have every every bit of likelihood to be just as good at, if not better than, any given male counterpart in the same line of work, especially when it comes to SEO and SEM. Some reasons why they may be even better in this line of work include:

- Ability to multitask. Women are very accustomed to juggling several different types of responsibilities. Being able to keep many different types of tasks moving forward concurrently is a huge asset to an SEO team.
- Patience. Many women have raised or are raising children, and we're all biologically programmed to be able to do so. There is no greater need for patience than that! And many aspects of search, especially organic optimization, require patience. SEO is a long term marketing strategy that does not provide instant results, and making changes to test theories does not yield immediate feedback. Being a patient strategist and being able to foster patience in clients and stakeholders is an absolute necessity in this field.
- Analytical thinking. Many women (especially yours truly) have a tendency to overthink things. The nice way of saying that is that we can be very analytical. Being able to think and rethink (and rethink some more) your way through a challenging data discrepancy or unusual change in traffic patterns is a great problem-solving strength and is crucial to the long term success of search campaigns.

...

Obviously it's not appropriate to make completely generalized assumptions based on gender alone, as each individual is completely unique. And even though I truly believe that women have a propensity to excel at SEO and SEM, I deeply respect all of my male colleagues in the industry, and I don't want in any way to infer that we are superior to them just because we are female. That is most certainly not true.

However, it is a statistically sound fact that women operate differently than men in some aspects, and many of those unique characteristics can lend themselves very nicely to being an effective search engine knowledge worker. It's an extremely rewarding line of work to be in, and is often conducive to working from home, making it easier for women to effectively balance a career and a family.'

Man puts 'crazy' case behind him; rape charges dropped after he spent 7 months in jail

Mastodon · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Bradshaw met the woman at Hair of the Dog, where he was working as a server, in late July. The Russian-sounding woman was flirtatious, he said. When his shift ended at 5 p.m., they shot a few games of pool at The Honest Pint and she had one drink.

Two days later, the woman told police that Bradshaw took her back to his apartment the night they met, pretended to be a Marine and brutally raped her.

He says that's not what happened.

"I think she just has lots of issues and I just happened to be the scapegoat that was there," Bradshaw said.

Nonetheless, Bradshaw was arrested and charged with rape, kidnapping, assault and aggravated assault.
...
Bradshaw eventually made bond and got out of jail. But when word of his arrest got back to Idaho, where he was on parole from a grand theft conviction, he ended up back in the Hamilton County Jail for violating his parole.

It was February before DNA results in the rape case against him came back from the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation crime lab.

"The tests can definitely keep them in longer than what we would think would be fair, especially given the results," said Joy Radice, a defense attorney and associate professor at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville's College of Law.

At the March 2 hearing, Assistant District Attorney General Leslie Longshore said there was DNA in the rape kit, but it excluded Bradshaw.

"It did not corroborate the victim's story," Longshore said.
...
"If everyone knew the whole story, they could make a movie out of it," he said. "It's something you couldn't write. It's too crazy."'

When the liberals blew it

Kaka81k · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Fifty years ago this month, Democrats made a historic mistake.

Daniel Patrick Moynihan, at the time a federal official, wrote a famous report in March 1965 on family breakdown among African-Americans. He argued presciently and powerfully that the rise of single-parent households would make poverty more intractable.

“The fundamental problem,” Moynihan wrote, is family breakdown. In a follow-up, he explained: “From the wild Irish slums of the 19th-century Eastern seaboard, to the riot-torn suburbs of Los Angeles, there is one unmistakable lesson in American history: a community that allows large numbers of young men to grow up in broken families … never acquiring any stable relationship to male authority, never acquiring any set of rational expectations about the future — that community asks for and gets chaos.”

Liberals brutally denounced Moynihan as a racist. He himself had grown up in a single-mother household and worked as a shoeshine boy at the corner of Broadway and 43rd Street in Manhattan, yet he was accused of being aloof and patronizing, and of “blaming the victim.”
...
The liberal denunciations of Moynihan were terribly unfair. In fact, Moynihan emphasized that slavery, discrimination and “three centuries of injustice” had devastated the black family. He favored job and education programs to help buttress the family.

But the scathing commentary led President Lyndon Johnson to distance himself from the Moynihan report. Scholars, fearful of being accused of racism, mostly avoided studying family structure and poverty.
...
Causation is difficult to tease from correlation. But efforts to do that suggest that growing up with just one biological parent reduces the chance that a child will graduate from high school by 40%, according to an essay by Sara McLanahan of Princeton and Christopher Jencks of Harvard. They point to the likely mechanism: “A father’s absence increases antisocial behavior, such as aggression, rule-breaking, delinquency and illegal drug use.” These effects are greater on boys than on girls.

Conservatives shouldn’t chortle at the evidence that liberals blew it, for they did as well. Conservatives say all the right things about honoring families, but they led the disastrous American experiment in mass incarceration; incarceration rates have quintupled since the 1970s. That devastated families, leading countless boys to grow up without dads.'

Wikipedia on Nicholas Kristof.

#Guys Only: Why She May Get Away With A False Rape Allegation Against You

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Rape has become a common occurrence in the world with with as much as 250,000 reported cases of rape and attempted rape every year according to a United Nations statistical report compiled by the governments of about 65 different countries.

However, there is a level of flaw given that certain countries only reported male to female rape and the fact that there is an increasing number of falsified rape claims being reported. This has become a serious threat to the male folk given the fact that the society tends to pass judgement on an “alleged” offender before getting to the crux of the matter.

For these reasons, we believe every man should be aware of false rape allegations and how they can do them harm while also learning the ways in which compromising situations that may lead to you being accused can be avoided.
...
Whether we like to admit it or not, rape in itself is subjective. Previously, everyone saw rape as a situation in which a man forcefully has sex with a non consenting woman but this has changed overtime. Nowadays, the meaning of rape is quite different from what we know as even a weak yes can be termed as a no. Added with the fact that feminists are making as much attempts as possible to ensure that the meaning of consent can be manipulated and open to interpretation as possible. A “No” these days could mean a woman saying “Any discomfort I feel from the previous night means I’m feeling a No.”
...
It is necessary to bear in mind that data and statistics released as regards false accusations on rape are wholly unreliable and cannot be trusted. This is mainly because rape cases have been politicized with government enacting laws protecting the accuser (mainly females) why doing nothing if the accusation is found out to be false. More so, even when it is discovered that the accusations are false, law enforcement agencies simply send both parties home with a little more than a slap on the wrist for the accuser.

Recently however, several studies are being conducted on the frequency of rape accusations that were falsely made. An analysis conducted by Rumney puts false rape claims at about 10-50% of all rape allegations made. Also, Kanin’s research using a more reliable methodology puts false claims at about 40% of the total cases reported.'

US football player to sue woman who accused him of rape

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Ray McDonald was accused of rape in December, and the 49ers cut him immediately after news broke that police were investigating. But McDonald has not been charged, and now he plans to sue his accuser, saying she made a false claim and that it has put his football career in jeopardy.

McDonald's lawyer told the San Jose Mercury News that video from McDonald's home-surveillance system show the woman having "clearly consensual" sex with McDonald, and that the rape allegation was false. Yet the allegation led the 49ers to release McDonald, and no other team has shown interest in signing him. McDonald and his lawyer released a statement saying they hope the lawsuit can vindicate him and get his NFL career back on track.'

"Women-only hours are not discriminatory, the reaction is"

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The McGill campus has recently been in uproar over a proposal to create women-only hours at the gym, submitted by law students Soumia Allalou and Raymond Grafton. The initiative gained support from a number of women who felt uncomfortable with the fitness centre's male-dominated atmosphere, whether because of intimidation, religious reasons, or otherwise. The request has drawn significant media attention both on and off campus, in part due to massive online backlash. This violently reactionary response should disgust any student reading it, and in fact proves how much this safer space is needed.
...
... Women are a systemically disadvantaged group, and like other marginalized groups, deserve safer spaces. Women-only gym hours help to overcome a history of male domination in athletic pursuits like weightlifting.

Contestation of women-only hours by a majority does not mean the hours should not be implemented. The safer space that would be created is not for this majority's use; it would serve the needs of a minority of students who feel marginalized in a space that they, as students, have every right to use and feel comfortable in. The Daily strongly supports creating these kinds of spaces when a need for them is made known. ...'

Mayor of Dallas, Texas: Misogynistic Gene Built In Men

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Dallas Mayor Mike Rawlings said he realized he wanted to make domestic violence a “signature issue” for him because men tend to brush off the issue as a women’s issue, but men represent the bulk of abusers. About one-fourth of women are victims of abuse, which likely means one-fourth of men are abusers, he said.

Rawlings said he makes an effort to speak out to young men to try to combat cultural problems wrought by the “misogynistic gene that’s built in us guys that we haven’t dealt with yet.”

“Half our population is preyed upon by the other half,” Rawlings said. “We are all mad about terrorism all the time and the greatest terrorism takes place right in our backyard, right in our kitchen, right in our bedroom.”'

Campaign encouraging men to speak out against domestic violence

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'On Monday the effort to fight domestic violence in Central New York kicked off with a breakfast for Vera House's White Ribbon Campaign, followed by an annual walk Friday.

The annual campaign raises awareness about domestic and sexual violence and is led by men -- to send the message they will not tolerate violence against women.

"Men for the most part are the perpetrators, or have been, and it shows we, as a group, are taking a stand together to making that pledge not to commit or condone," said Ted Long, the campaign's chairman.'

When women turn on women: My response to Miranda Devine

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Devine complained that International Women's Day descended into a festival of man bashing. Poor men. In Australia one woman every week is murdered by a man. Seventy per cent of the world's poorest are women. Women and girls are trafficked shamelessly. Women get paid less for the same work. Women should be furious and should demand better action for themselves and their children.

Why is it unacceptable to complain about men on International Women's Day? Men are the problem. The solution involves women having equal representation at the highest levels of all of our institutions and how we achieve that is the issue that started this debate.'

Hey, Ladies: Stop Nagging and Complaining About Men

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Indeed, some men these days are pathetic, shiftless, effeminate, video game obsessed couch potatoes. No doubt about it. I've known several myself. They're out there. Well, not out there, more like in there, in the living room, playing with toys and trolling Tinder for cheap hook-ups. They're not always unemployed or unproductive, mind you. They might have a job, a girlfriend (which won't necessarily stop them from trolling Tinder), their own apartment, and their very own student loan debt.
...
In fact, they might be married (which, again, still Tinder). They're the husbands who sit at home on Sundays and play Call of Duty while their wives take the kids to church. The husbands who lock themselves in their bedrooms and browse internet smut while their wives clean the kitchen and put the kids to bed. The husbands who don't lead, who don't contribute anything to the family other than money, and sometimes not even that. Talk about crying, I know there are many married women who cry themselves to sleep every night because they thought they married a man, only to find out they actually married a vaguely sentient beanbag chair.
...
Yes, the landscape is littered with men of this sort. Boys, as you call them.

It's a difficult situation, that's the truth. These are all truths. Important truths. So here's the good news: virtually everyone understands these problems and discusses them ad nauseum. Men are lectured about their all around suckiness so much that it's practically become a national pastime — one that I've certainly participated in. You want me to write something about loafing, deadbeat men? Already have. Everyone has. It's all been said and said again and said again and said again and said again in sign language and French and Spanish and Greek and Pig Latin. The nagging has moved out of the home and now it's pumped into the loudspeakers of society, and men cannot escape it anywhere.

It's one thing to hold men accountable, but it's quite another to berate them with a relentless, toxic barrage of generalized insults; to scapegoat them; to give them absolutely no credit for their positive contributions, and to pretend women are faultless in all of this.'

Common Core High School Class Calls Video Games ‘Sexist’

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Libertarian feminist Dr. Christina Hoff Sommers is no friend to liberal academics, as the latest planned boycott of an upcoming UCLA appearance still demonstrates, but one cannot deny her influence and public recognition on the issues of feminism and political correctness in the current political sphere. She makes no apologies regarding her opinion, which is very similar to my own that leftist political correctness has hijacked the feminist cause and turned it into something akin to political and societal napalm. I love her for it.

Dr. Sommers’ crosshairs have most recently caught sight of a truly baffling case, indeed – a high school class built for the express purpose of satisfying a particular requirement of the Common Core class model, titled “Is Gaming A Boy’s Club,” is perpetuating that completely-original-no-kidding myth that video games are the devil and are the reason for [insert current negative headline of the time]. This, of course, is ludicrous, and Dr. Sommers in her own words says as much (albeit much more eloquently) during a video segment she recorded for the American Enterprise Institute, “The War on Gamers Continues:”'

‘Women can’t be sexist': Another contender in Student Op-Ed Hall of Fame

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'At first I thought this column titled “Women can’t be sexist” was a parody, like the hilarious condemnation of microaggressions against left-handed people by the University of Michigan’s Omar Mahmood, which got him fired by the Puritan scolds at the Michigan Daily.

Nope, it’s sincere!

In a guest column for The Post at Ohio University, one of its own reporters shares her experience manning a table for the school’s Women’s Center on International Women’s Day last week.

Erin Davoran said she was confronted by a man who claimed the Women’s Center was “sexist against men” and who complained that he was treated unfairly in a job interview, because his female interviewer claimed that “all white men created poverty”:

"I apologized for his experience and explained that one woman does not represent all women or the entirety of feminism, which works toward the equality of both sexes and all genders — not women over men — socially and economically."

It could have ended there, but the guy came back to ask how it wasn’t sexist that the school has a “Women of Appalachia” group but not a parallel group for men. This is where Davoran goes off the rails:

"I started to explain that women can’t be sexist..."

Wait, what? That’s even less credible than claiming men can’t be pregnant. Back to Davoran and her airtight explanation:

"...that reverse racism doesn’t exist, but he cut me off before I could finish. He started yelling, “That’s bullshit! That is complete bullshit!” and walked away. I tried calling after him, asking him to hear me out, but he just kept walking.

So, sir, if you are reading this, please listen. Women cannot be sexist; the same way people of color cannot be racist. In the 2014 film Dear White People, the main character says, “Black people can’t be racist. Prejudice, yes, but not racist. Racism describes a system of disadvantage based on race. Black people can’t be racist since we don’t stand to benefit from such a system.” Replace “black people” with “women” and “racist/racism/race” with “sexist/sexism/sex” and that is the point I was trying to convey."'

"Paternity leave: why we should stop romanticising fatherhood"

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'And yet I am, tentatively, pleased that Labour is proposing an increase in paternity leave and paternity pay. It could have done without the “father’s month” branding, which makes me think of a big, macho version of Woman’s Hour, but it is a step in the right direction (which is the kind of things mums always say, whether it’s to do with politicians mentioning parenting at all, or children getting halfway round Sainsbury’s without the first tantrum). I find myself cringing slightly at the notion that “more fathers want to play a hands-on role in childcare particularly in those first crucial weeks of a child’s life” (what, you mean while it’s still a novelty?).

Four weeks is nothing, a heartbeat. If it matters for anything, it’s more for the support that a partner – male or female – can offer a new mother during those initial dark nights and zombie days. Indeed, part of me wonders why can’t it be framed as “partner” or “co-parent leave.” What, after all, is fatherhood? Is it some unique, mystical role, involving a special kinship with the fruit of one’s loins? Or is it something both more magical and more mundane, a chosen self-sacrifice that might sometimes make you less of yourself, not more? You know, a bit like motherhood?

In What Should We Tell Our Daughters? Melissa Benn asks whether today’s young men “are being brought up to see that the work of the home is work, a form of labour they should recognise, value and share”. I’d count parenting and caring work as part of that, but the answer to Benn’s question is, I think, no. If anything, I doubt young men really think about it at all. Perhaps I underestimate them, but simply failing to anticipate the need to perform a role can be much the same as expecting someone else (a mother, a woman, not you) to do it. And when such unspoken assumptions and expectations have embedded themselves, it can be hard to challenge them without seeming to be asking far too much. Even so, we can’t offer up fatherhood as a glittering prize when it is something else; it is what it is – love, care and work – and that should be enough. And perhaps four weeks is a start.'

How Feminism Becomes a Religion on College Campuses

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article and video here.

'Melissa McGrath, an undergraduate student at Ohio State University, was invited to participate in her college's TEDx Talk, because, although not in possession of a doctorate, McGrath has "a valid story to tell, and (she thinks) that will shine through." Her thesis: Feminism proffers salvation.

Her "valid story" plays like a tent-revival testimonial about how feminist theory, reinforced by college professors, informed her that it was not her fault that she was sexually assaulted on campus. Avoiding the details of her assault, McGrath instead focuses on feminist liturgy as a method for teaching "intersectionality" that is, how the human race is tied together in a Marxist state of oppressor and oppressed.

Pulling all the approved contemporary feminist buzzwords from "white privilege" to "rape culture" McGrath weaves the kind of soap box narrative trademarked by the best faith-based snake oil salesmen (and women) of the 20th century. Her's is a speech proving that feminism isn't just ideology, but idolatry; a religion whose places of worship are in university classrooms, whose holy texts are available at your nearest bookstore, and whose icons live on "Pinterest boards" and social media outlets.'

Florida lawmakers seek to pass alimony changes

Mastodon · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lawmakers are seeking again to pass alimony changes that would put an end to permanent payments. Opponents said it would seriously harm women.

...

Sponsor Colleen Burton said her bill is designed to reduce messy court fights.

"The overall (goal) is to reduce litigation that inflicts both economic and emotional tolls on spouses and their families who are going through a divorce and seeking alimony," Burton said.

The bill would eliminate permanent alimony. Instead of lifelong payments, an ex-spouse could be ordered to pay anywhere from 25 to 75 percent of the length of the marriage.

...

"The alimony payer often is ordered to pay unaffordable amounts of alimony," said Frisher. "It puts the alimony payer sometimes in bankruptcy, in contempt and sometimes in jail. (For) the alimony receiver, on the other hand, the current law perpetuates an entitlement attitude."

...

Women's groups that were against the proposal said that if wedding bells turn into a divorce, what happens to the women who had to stay at home rather than focus on their careers?

"Their husbands wanted them to stay home, have children, raise the children while he's out at work," said Barbara DeVane, of the National Organization for Women. "He's advancing in his career, she has no career."'

Does rape culture exist?

Mastodon · 18 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'"RAPE CULTURE DOES NOT EXIST" reads a sign hanging up all over campus. A triggering exclamation of an opinion or fact?

On March 13, ZenMen held an event to emphatically state that it was absolutely a fact. The event was split into two parts: one part presentation and one part "open discussion." The presentation, given by ZenMen president Sage Gerard, was a short presentation wherein Gerard hoped that if his audience walked away taking nothing else, that they could walk away accepting that rape culture did not exist.

Gerard recognizes that rape is a crime that is committed, but believes that the idea of a culture built around rape is a product of hysteria and confirmation bias.

Gerard believes that buying into rape culture is not beneficial for anyone by making all men criminals and all women victims.

Gerard believes falsely that feminists only recognize (cisgender) men as perpetrators of rape and sexual assault and only (cisgender) women as victims of rape and sexual assault.

Feminists and activists here at Kennesaw State University have gone through great pains to emphasize the ways that rape affects and is perpetrated by all kinds of people. This culminated in last fall's YESBody! display on the campus green.'

Court reverses DV restraining order based partly on "'scary' clown" picture, etc.

Mastodon · 18 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Kyle Rainer and Brandy Buchanon had a 6-year-old child, B.L.G.R. The child "lived with Mother, but visited with Father on Sundays." In early 2014, though, mother filed a petition in court alleging domestic violence on father's part. Part of the allegations were that he had angrily yelled at her, scaring her and the daughter. Part was that he had "head-butted" the daughter. But the mother also introduced evidence about

"certain images that were posted on his Facebook page. Among the images were a picture of a "scary" clown, a photograph of Father's living room where a Walking Dead doll can be seen, and a picture of a head of hair with horns projecting from it."

...

The family court had earlier entered a stay-away domestic violence order, and "prior to allowing introduction of the Facebook images, the family court indicated that it was going to partially grant Father's motion and amend the DVO down from 'no contact' to 'no violent contact.'" But "[a]fter considering the Facebook posts," the court changed its mind on the amendment, and kept the order as it was.

The court of appeals disagreed, and reversed the restraining order altogether (Rainer v. Buchanon (Ky. Ct. App. Mar. 13, 2015), or go here and search for "clown"):

...

The court also concluded that the yelling incident wasn't enough to justify the order: "At most, Mother alleged that Father evoked fear in her when he 'yelled' outside her home and that he seemed 'angry' and 'mean.' Certainly, yelling during the course of a disagreement is not to be condoned nor is repeatedly initiating unwanted contact. Without some implicit or explicit threat of harm, however, we do not believe that such conduct, at least as it transpired in this case, constitutes an act of domestic violence." And the court concluded that the headbutting was just "an inappropriate, physically rough game," but there was no "evidence in the record to suggest that the headbutting actually caused a physical injury to Child or was undertaken with the intent to do so" (plus one that was unlikely to happen again).'

College athlete still suspened for DV though woman told ESPN she lied to the police

Mastodon · 18 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The woman who accused Arizona State linebacker Davon Durant of assault and domestic violence told ESPN that she lied about the incident to police.

Durant remains suspended indefinitely by the school after he was arrested on March 7, according to AZCentral.

Tempe, Ariz., police said Durant was arrested on March 7 on allegations of domestic violence and aggravated assault. As of now, Durant has a preliminary hearing on March 18 and faces charges of disorderly conduct and aggravated assault.
...
"When I lied to the police, it was out of spite," Arizona State student Kelsi Langley, who is Durant's girlfriend, said to ESPN.com. "I wasn't thinking. It was a very vengeful and spiteful thing to do."

According to AZCentral, Durant told authorities that he was having an argument with Langley in the vehicle. Langley told police that Durant hit her in the face and grabbed her neck. The officer that responded to the scene reported that Durant's girlfriend had visible injuries, including a bruise below her left eye and bruising around her neck that was consistent with finger marks.'

Canada: MP ‘astounded’ to learn from media that PM is booting him over sexual misconduct allegations

fathers4fairness · 18 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Newfoundland MP Scott Andrews says he was “astounded” to learn through the media that he and fellow Liberal MP Massimo Pacetti are about to be turfed permanently from the Liberal fold over allegations of sexual misconduct.

Liberal insiders say the fate of Andrews and Pacetti has been decided by Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau after receiving the results of an independent investigation he ordered into complaints levelled against them.

Andrews said he co-operated fully with the investigation into the allegations, levelled by two female New Democrat MPs.

The investigation was conducted by Toronto lawyer Cynthia Petersen, a human rights specialist who has investigated sexual harassment complaints in the private sector.
...
Andrews said he was promised a copy of Petersen’s executive summary before her conclusions were made public.
...
He said he was “disappointed to learn that unscrupulous, unnamed sources have chosen to communicate through the media rather than respect the process and those affected by it.”
...
One of the alleged victims spoke on condition of anonymity to various media outlets, including The Canadian Press, late last November.
...
... The woman, who said she had previously been the victim of a violent sexual assault, said she froze and blocked out the situation. She alleged it was sex without her explicit consent.

During the confidential meeting with Foote, sources have told The Canadian Press that the woman acknowledged she did not explicitly say no to Pacetti and that she provided a condom. In the interview, she refused to comment on those details.'

Custody Bill has Lawyers Crying Sexism

Mastodon · 19 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A bill in the legislature has the Nebraska State Bar crying sexism. LB 358*, introduced by Sen. Tommy Garrett, addresses custodial rights to a child in cases of sexual assault. It offers several amendments to current Nebraska laws.

"(It) only further perpetuates this myth that only men abuse, only women are victims and that's just not the case. So the way that it's written is unconstitutional because it's not gender neutral," attorney Chris Johnson said.

The first amendment states the father of a child conceived after a sexual assault shall have his parental rights terminated. Exceptions would be made if the child's mother objects to the termination or if the state deems it's not in the best interest of the child.
...
The Nebraska State Bar says the bill, as written, is sexist.
"The bill would be supported if it was amended to be gender neutral, such the law would equally apply to male and female perpetrators of sexual assault.
If amended as such it would withstand a constitutional scrutiny," the Family Law Legislative Committee decided unanimously.

Lawyers are also concerned about parental obligations of male rape victims.
"She (the mother) can even receive child support from the victim of sexual assault. There's nothing in LB 358 that says a woman will be treated in the same manner (as a male offender)," Johnson said.'

---
*Bill here, Sec. 2 (starts on p. 3)

Canada: Father claims RCMP negligent in parental abduction

fathers4fairness · 19 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The father of a baby girl whose mother took her out of Canada against his wishes last year is suing the RCMP for negligence, alleging the force helped her to commit a criminal offence.

"I'm just so angry. I just can't imagine anyone would ever do this to somebody else," said Craig Johnstone, 28, an electrician from North Vancouver.

Richmond RCMP let the mother leave, even though they had removed her from a flight the previous night for suspected parental abduction. She was trying to move to Australia with their Canadian-born daughter, who was six months old at the time.

...

The now worthless court order had ordered the RCMP to seize her passport, along with the baby's.

He and his family are devastated over losing the little girl. He said he's only seen her three times in 10 months – short, awkward visits in Australia.

"It hurts me — but it hurts my daughter much more," he said. "I had a lot of faith in the court system and the judicial system but now I have none. None whatsoever."

He also lost a court bid there to have the baby brought back to Canada, because the court ruled Australia is now her home. He now fears she will grow up without a father.

...

Johnstone said Bride also made false claims of abuse to the Australian consulate in Vancouver, so she could get the baby a passport without his knowledge or permission.

Her abuse allegations have since been discredited by the Australian court, which concluded Bride's actions in the couple's relationship "fly in the face of a person who has grave fears for her safety.'

Student Barred From Class For Disputing Rape Statistics

Mastodon · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A student at Reed College has been banned from class for denying the existence of “rape culture” in the United States and arguing that the oft-repeated statistic that one in five women are raped at college is bogus.

Jeremiah True, 19, received an email from professor Pancho Savery on March 14 telling him he was making his classmates so uncomfortable that he was no longer welcome to participate in the “conference” sections of his Humanities 110 class, a course which focuses on the art and literature of classical Greece, according to BuzzFeed News.

True says he sparred with his classmates on a variety of issues, but says it was his criticism of the 1-in-5 rape statistic that ended up being the tipping point.

“There are several survivors of sexual assault in our conference, and you have made them extremely uncomfortable with what they see as not only your undermining incidents of rape, but of also placing too much emphasis on men being unfairly charged with rape,” said Savery in an email True posted online. “[Other students] have said that things you have said in our conference have made them so upset that they have difficulty concentrating in other classes. I, as conference leader, have to do what is best for the well-being of the entire class, and I am therefore banning you from conference for the remainder of the semester.”'

Change.org petition supporting True is here.

More Men Fight College Allegations of Sexual Assault

Mastodon · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former undergraduate student sued Cornell University, alleging the Ivy League school wrongly accused him of forcing himself on a female student.

The lawsuit, filed Thursday by a man referred to as John Doe, is the latest to be brought against a school amid a crackdown on campus sexual assaults. It contends Cornell violated his due-process rights when the school concluded he raped a fellow student after a party in December 2013 and then withheld his diploma.

The suit says the Ithaca, N.Y., university “cherry-picked witness statements,” “ignored important…statements” and judged the credibility of witnesses “without any ascertainable rationale or logic.”

A spokesman for Cornell declined to comment.

Since the start of last year, more than two dozen men have sued colleges and universities over such cases, largely alleging that the schools’ disciplinary processes are stacked against them. The number is a dramatic jump from just a few years ago.

Last week, a Boston College graduate sued the school, saying it failed to give him a fair hearing after accusing him of sexual assault.

...

According to the lawsuit filed Thursday, Cornell decided to withhold the accused man’s diploma for two years after he finished his coursework. The punishment has made it difficult for the former student to find a job, said his lawyer, Andrew Miltenberg.

“The false allegations made against him and the resulting failures by an institution that he trusted continue to wreak havoc on his life,” said Mr. Miltenberg.'

Feminist Reporter: Take Away White Men's Guns

Mastodon · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Still think liberal feminist journalists aren't racist man-haters? (RELATED: Men Should Avoid Progressive Women For Their Own Safety).

Andrea Grimes, senior political reporter at the lefty women's site RH Reality Check, sank to a disgusting new low Thursday by saying that guns should be confiscated only from white men.

"Suggestion: we don't have to vaporize all the guns. Let's just vaporize white men's guns," Grimes tweeted, linking to an article about Arizona shooter Ryan Giroux.

"White guys cannot be trusted to use guns responsibly. It is time to stop giving guns to white guys," Grimes added. "I mean, it's time to stop giving guns to everybody, but we can start with the white guys."

Grimes then echoed a popular feminist slogan about bathing in male tears, which top feminist Jessica Valenti wears on a sweatshirt.

"As a bonus, we can collect their tears for research and resource purposes while they line up to surrender their weapons," Grimes said.'

Police: Ex-girlfriend attacks Indianapolis Colts linebacker, new girlfriend

Mastodon · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'An Indianapolis Colts linebacker is recovering after police say his ex-girlfriend attacked him and his girlfriend.

Erica Palmer was arrested after the attack at Walden's home in Georgia, according to WSB-TV. She's accused of breaking Walden's girlfriend's arm and cutting the football player.

Police found her hiding at a nearby hotel. Charges against her include aggravated assault, theft and battery.

Police told WSB-TV that Palmer had access to a gun, knife and bat when she confronted the couple Saturday. Palmer and Walden have two children together.

This isn't the first domestic violence incident involving the couple, police said. Walden and Palmer were involved in another domestic dispute in Wisconsin in 2011.'

Australia: Police Commissioner Admits Only Safe Place For Women Is A Man-Proof Vault

Mastodon · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Victoria's chief of homicide has admitted that the only place where women are not vulnerable to acts of violence is inside a man-proof vault. In the wake of another random stabbing, this time in a Melbourne park, he has recommended that each woman be issued a vault by the government.

"We've tried everything to tackle the problem of male violence. Telling women not to go out, telling them not to dress too sexy, telling them to use the buddy system," said the Inspector. "I can't see any other way except telling women to live inside tiny reinforced vaults."

Feminist groups have reacted to the proposal with fatigue. "Well, at least he didn't tell us to scream constantly at the top of our lungs again," said a women's sector spokesperson. "And it's not as bad as the time he told us to piss ourselves. That's really uncomfortable and it only works on bears."'

CNN’s New Rape Documentary Relies On Myths, Not Facts

Mastodon · 21 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'“The Hunting Ground,” a newly released documentary about sexual assault on college campuses, is earning rave reviews, drawing the attention of D.C. lawmakers and could even have an effect on the upcoming NFL draft. Though currently showing in just a few theaters, it will reach reach a huge audience by the end of the year when it is shown on CNN. But the way the film handles sexual assault statistics and individual allegations of rape raises three crucial questions about whether the film warrants the effusive response it has garnered.

As its title suggests, “The Hunting Ground” presents America’s college campuses as hotbeds of sexual assault where predatory rapists can act with impunity because schools are unwilling to do anything to address the problem. The film’s strength is built on an almost overwhelming deluge of personal accounts by women (and a few men) who recount suffering violent rapes and then struggling to obtain justice.

Annie Clark, one of the central figures of the documentary, says she was told by an administrator that “rape is like a football game,” where she should think back on what she could have done differently to avoid the rape. Another girl, Lizzy Seeberg, is said to have killed herself after Notre Dame police moved too slowly in investigating her alleged rape at the hands of a football player.

A close watching of the film, however, shows that it relies on several questionable facts to make its case, and sometimes misleads the viewer in a way that calls the entire film’s legitimacy and reliability into question.'

Check Your ‘Privilege Theory’

Mastodon · 22 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Since 1979, the report says, the number of women going to college has accelerated relative to male enrollments. By 2012, there were 2.8 million more women than men in college, and by 2020 this “enrollment gap” is projected to grow to 4.4 million as women account for 74 percent of enrollment growth.

In 2000, the adult populations of college-educated men and women were approximately equal. By 2013, there were 4.9 million more women 25 or older with college degrees than men in that age group. This means a shortage of suitable male partners for a growing cohort of young women, who are postponing family formation. The report says millions of female-led households are being established by women who, being focused on their careers, are delaying motherhood, partly because of a shortage of suitable partners. More about suitability anon.
...
... Susan Patton, a Princeton graduate ... in a letter to the Daily Princetonian, she told “the young women of Princeton” what “you really need to know that nobody is telling you.” Which is that their future happiness will be “inextricably linked” to the men they marry, so they should “find a husband on campus” because “you will never again have this concentration of men who are worthy of you.” She explains:

"Men regularly marry women who are younger, less intelligent, less educated. It’s amazing how forgiving men can be about a woman’s lack of erudition, if she is exceptionally pretty. Smart women can’t (shouldn’t) marry men who aren’t at least their intellectual equal. As Princeton women, we have almost priced ourselves out of the market. Simply put, there is a very limited population of men who are as smart or smarter than we are . . . It will frustrate you to be with a man who just isn’t as smart as you."'

Utah Students Charge Men More for Cookies to Demonstrate Pay Gap

Mastodon · 22 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'This might be the one time pay inequality worked out well for the women.

A group of Utah high school students hosted a bake sale earlier this week selling cookies to men for $1, while the same cookies were sold to women for 77 cents.

"Because in America, for every dollar a man makes, a woman only makes 77 cents," Kari Schott, a member of the Young Democrats Club at Jordan High School in Sandy, Utah, told Good4Utah.com. "So we're raising awareness for this. So boys will pay a dollar and girls only pay 77 cents."

Not everyone at the school appreciated the price difference, with some calling into question the accuracy of the statistic.

"On social media, on Facebook people got really mad, like they came up and talked to me," Schott said.

"They didn't think it was fair and I said yeah, it's not fair. That's why we're doing it," she concluded.'

"College Presidents Appear To Be Delusional About Sexual Assault On Their Campuses"

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'About a third of U.S. college presidents believe sexual assault is a problem on American college campuses, but only 6 percent believe it's a problem on their own campuses. That's according to Inside Higher Ed's fifth annual Survey of College and University Presidents, which was released Friday. The survey covered a range of topics, including the Obama administration's college ratings proposal and the sustainability of college financial models, but the most significant (and alarming) finding was about the presidents' thoughts on the prevalence of sexual assault on campus.

College presidents appear to be out of touch.

The U.S. Department of Education in May released a list of 55 institutions with open investigations into Title IX sexual violence violations. Since then, that list has been periodically updated; as of January, it named 94 schools, including large public institutions such as Arizona State University and small liberal arts colleges like Sarah Lawrence. Some lawmakers have made campus sexual assault a priority, most notably with California's recently passed affirmative consent standard and with the pending federal Campus Accountability and Safety Act.'

Arraignment set for mother charged with killing two children

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Florida mother waived her right to attend a first court hearing on Sunday to face charges of murdering two of her young children and attempting to murder her five-month-old baby, an official at Brevard County Detention Center said.

Jessica Lacey McCarty, 33, of Palm Bay was represented by a public defender, with a judge setting arraignment for April 21, the official said.

It was unclear how she intended to plead.

McCarty was ordered held without bond and remains under medical watch at Brevard County Detention Center, the official said.

The medical examiner's office on Sunday will perform autopsies on McCarty's two older children, ages 7 and 6, to determine how they died.

Police have not said how they believe the children were killed except to say they were not stabbed, sliced or shot.

McCarty's five-month-old baby remains in critical condition in an Orlando hospital, officials said.

Officers went to McCarty's home Friday after receiving two emergency calls, one from a woman who claimed to have killed her children, police said in a news release on Saturday.'

Manhattan Institute's March 10 panel discussion of "The Truth About Campus Sexual Assault"

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Edited transcript here. Excerpt:

'HOWARD HUSOCK: We have been told that a crisis of sexual violence grips college and university life. By some accounts, including that of President Obama himself, one in five female undergraduates is said to be likely to experience a sexual assault over the course of their college years. Prominent feminist and Guardian columnist, Jessica Valenti, has referred to the epidemic levels of rape on university campuses. Others, however, see the cry of crisis as exaggerated, and point to the debunking of such stories as that which appeared in Rolling Stone alleging that the University of Virginia had failed to act on a woman student's charges of fraternity gang rape.

I'm going to turn first to Heather Mac Donald. Put this in context for us, Heather.

HEATHER MAC DONALD: Let's look at these numbers, Howard. The most common statistic thrown out these days by President Obama, Vice President Biden, on down is that one in five women will be the victims of sexual assault during their college careers.

Detroit is America's most violent city. Its violent crime rate for all four violent felonies—that's rape, murder, aggravated assault, and robbery—is 2%. Its rape rate is 0.05%. A 20% crime rate for any crime, much less one as serious as rape, is virtually unheard of. Not even in Africa's most brutal civil wars has anything been experienced in human history like a 20% crime rate. And yet despite a rape rate that is allegedly 400 times that of Detroit's, sophisticated, highly educated baby boomer mothers are beating down the doors of campuses to try to get their daughters in.

The frenzy of college admissions begins earlier and earlier each year. Here in Manhattan, parents are paying $200 an hour for tutoring for prekindergarten, all in the hope of getting their little darlings into Harvard 14 years later.'

Campus Sexual Assault: Bringing an End to Second-Class Justice

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTube video here. Held at the National Press Club, Washington, DC on 3/13/15. Panelists: Cathy Young, John Banzhaf, Susan Kaplan, Hans Bader, Cynthia Garrett and Joshua Strange

Deadbeat Fathers and Return of Imprisonment for Debt

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here.

'Regarding Robert Doar's "Making It Easier to Skip Paying Child Support" (op-ed, March 10): The most consequential problem with child support isn't the back-end collection of child support but rather the front-end calculation of child support. As calculated in most states today, mothers are enriched, fathers are impoverished and there is no accountability mechanism to be sure that the money is being spent on the children of divorce.

Mr. Doar keeps referring to "absent parents" as if all fathers are fleeing from their children in unprecedented droves. Fathers are absent visitors because the family courts order them to be absent. Involved fathers are much more likely to remain current even on absurdly calculated child-support awards if they are deeply involved in their children's lives.

Most important for any man contemplating marriage and fatherhood, the draconian enforcement types like Mr. Doar love "debtors prison laws." In the U.S. today, the only citizens who can be imprisoned for debt are fathers in arrears for child support. The parent-to-prison pathway generally goes something like this: Fall behind in child support, and the state takes away all professional and drivers' licenses. This makes it impossible for fathers to generate income, and so the arrears increase, the father goes to debtors prison, and with a prison record it becomes exceedingly difficult to impossible to ever get a job in the aboveground economy. The future prospects of the children of imprisoned fathers are uniformly bleak, especially when compounded with the well-established findings that children from single-mother families have the worst developmental outcomes of all family forms.

Em. Prof. Gordon E. Finley
Florida Intl. University
Miami'

Florida State Motion To Dismiss Erica Kinsman Title IX Lawsuit

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Announcement:

'"Florida State University has no tolerance for sexual harassment of any kind, so being adverse to a former student and alleged sexual assault victim is an unwelcome position for the university. Yet, we have no choice but to respond to her allegations of deliberate indifference in the strongest terms because the facts in the case do not support her account. If the court does not dismiss this complaint, FSU will look forward to setting the record straight by establishing the extensive assistance Erica Kinsman received from the university. The public must have full confidence in our commitment to protect and care for all our students." -- Florida State president John Thrasher'

Motion here. Kinsman is the star (if it can be called that) of "The Hunting Ground".

BC graduate says school mishandled sex-assault case

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Boston College graduate accused of sexual assault has filed a lawsuit alleging that the university violated federal anti-discrimination laws and its own policies governing sexual-assault allegations.

The suit, filed Wednesday in federal court, says BC rushed to find the student responsible for sexual assault and deprived him of a fair hearing. The process branded the student as a sexual predator without giving him a chance to tell his side of the story, the complaint alleges.

The suit was filed against the college trustees and five top administrators by Washington, D.C., attorney Charles B. Wayne and Boston attorney Matthew J. Iverson.

BC spokesman Jack Dunn said the suit is baseless and the college intends to fight it vigorously in federal court. The student's attorneys declined to comment.

College officials in 2012 charged the student, referred to in the lawsuit as John Doe, with sexually assaulting a female student on a student cruise in Boston Harbor.'

The Factual Feminist: Criminal sentencing: Do women get off easy?

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTube video here. Description:

'If you are a criminal defendant, it is far better to be a woman than a man. For the same crime, and with a similar criminal history, men in the U.S. are imprisoned much more frequently and for much longer sentences. This is one gender gap that we hear very little about. AEI resident scholar Christina Hoff Sommers explains the very real consequences of being a man vs. a woman on trial for the same crime.'

Israel: Jewish Grandfather Avraham Burg Makes an Intactivist Case in Ha'aretz

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Excerpt from Is this the generation that rejects circumcision? by Avraham Burg [link added]. Published in Ha'aretz (Israel), Aug. 29, 2014.

“I approached the topic with a great deal of curiosity, and conducted a kind of man-in-the-street poll for several weeks. I asked my questions with care and got detailed responses. The many answers I received all pointed in a single direction: that the institution of circumcision is coming to an end. Or, to be more precise, the institution of circumcision has no real hold among the segment of the Israeli population that is not conservative and religiously observant… My innocent question, “Is any one of these answers sufficient reason to maim a child?” was met with silence. I asked, “Would you take out a child’s appendix soon after birth? Or implant a pacemaker in his body in order to play it safe?” The answer, with an embarrassed smile, was, “Oh, I never thought about it that way.” Nobody, but nobody, cited religious obligation as justification for the act… Here are the facts: there is no Jewish death penalty. We do not put out eyes or cut off hands. There are no rabbinic executioners, or people who amputate limbs for violations of Jewish law. All that are left are the mohalim – those who are specially trained to perform circumcisions.

Ritual circumcision is the only act of physical harm that remains. For how much longer?

The acts of physical harm I enumerated above, and many others, fell into disuse as the social and cultural conditions in which the Jews lived changed. Is our generation the one that is ripe for the abolition of ritual circumcision?'

American courts should follow Israel's lead in case of boy facing circumcision

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This past June Israel's highest court ruled that it isn't appropriate to link a child's circumcision to a divorce proceeding. It appears the American legal system has no such concerns.

In Palm Beach County, Florida, family court judge Jeffrey Gillen has ordered a young mother arrested and jailed for failing to hand over her healthy four-year-old son so he can be circumcised according to his dad's wishes.

The situation looks bleak – for Heather Hironomous and for her son's foreskin – as the initial circumcision order has already been appealed and affirmed. The family is not Jewish or Muslim, so religious concerns are not at issue here.

The cases in Israel and Florida are strikingly similar. Both involve mothers who have serious objections to childhood circumcision absent true medical necessity. Fearful of the pain their boys would inevitably endure, of the potential for surgical complications and of possible diminished sensation in adulthood, both mothers consider themselves to be "intactivists" – a burgeoning human rights group that believes women and men alike should make their own decisions, as consenting adults, when it comes to elective genital surgery.'

When Regulations Undermine Justice and Due Process

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In the attached handouts, I have explained how the Office for Civil Rights, where I used to work, has made punishment of innocent students more likely, and in some cases, inevitable, through its rules on how colleges must handle sexual harassment allegations, which apply both to verbal harassment and sexual assault.

For example, in recent investigations, OCR has required that colleges impose “interim measures” against accused students before they ever receive a hearing on the charge against them, measures that can include expulsion from a dorm and classes shared with the accuser. In its April 2011 Dear Colleague letter to the nation’s colleges, OCR instructed to colleges to restrict cross-examination, even though the Supreme Court has declared that cross-examination is the “greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth.” It also ordered colleges to abolish the clear-and-convincing standard of evidence that was once the norm in college discipline.'

Job Hunting With a Criminal Record

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There is no dispute that far too many Americans carry the burden of a criminal record — at least 70 million, by recent estimates — or that the easy accessibility of these records in the information age imposes debilitating obstacles, especially when it comes to finding a job.

The harder question is what to do about it.

Employment is, after all, an important factor in keeping people out of the criminal justice system, yet, in a struggling job market, employers are often tempted to turn away anyone who appears to pose even the slightest risk. Thanks to the proliferation of companies offering instant online background checks, a vast majority of employers now run such checks on all job applicants. They can, and do, refuse to hire people on the grounds of an arrest itself — let alone a conviction.

People with criminal records often face all manner of entrenched and unjustified prejudice. Studies have found that job applicants who reported having a criminal record were 50 percent less likely to receive a callback or job offer. And, as with virtually every part of the criminal justice system, the effect was more pronounced when the job candidate was black.

Over the last five years, according to a recent report by the Vera Institute for Justice, 23 states have passed more than three dozen laws aimed at sealing or expunging criminal records for certain offenses so that low-level offenders do not continue to suffer for relatively minor transgressions. The convictions that may be sealed commonly include misdemeanors like disorderly conduct, shoplifting, or, in some cases, low-level drug possession.'

Why Shared-Parenting Legislation Makes Sense

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Being a single parent is a tough gig. Hustle the barely conscious kids off to preschool, fret whether your afterschool program is meeting the needs of your children, fidget in rush hour lines at the grocery store -- or feel guilty about getting them a Big Mac and fries. That's why we have National Single Parent Appreciation Day on March 21, courtesy of President Reagan in 1984.

That's also the reason National Parents Organization wants to make single parenting a thing of the past. To help, we have a killer app: shared parenting by divorced or never-married parents. Instead of one frenetic single parent and one non-parent called a "visitor" (and relegated to every other weekend), both parents divvy up the work. The other reason for shared parenting is the emerging consensus among child development researchers that children want shared parenting and do much, much better in life if they have it.

In this age of gender role convergence, people are often surprised to learn just how often courts currently favor one parent over the other. In fact, sole custody is awarded to one parent in about 83 percent of cases, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, thus creating a single parent and a "visitor." Thrusting parents into a winner-take-all gladiatorial arena helps create bitter custody battles with attendant and corrosive effects that last for years. National Parents Organization recently published a Shared Parenting Report Card that graded each state's child custody statutes A through F. The results show no state is heading for acceptance into the Ivy League.'

In College and Hiding From Scary Ideas

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'KATHERINE BYRON, a senior at Brown University and a member of its Sexual Assault Task Force, considers it her duty to make Brown a safe place for rape victims, free from anything that might prompt memories of trauma.
...
Ms. Byron and some fellow task force members secured a meeting with administrators. Not long after, Brown's president, Christina H. Paxson, announced that the university would hold a simultaneous, competing talk to provide "research and facts" about "the role of culture in sexual assault." Meanwhile, student volunteers put up posters advertising that a "safe space" would be available for anyone who found the debate too upsetting.

The safe space, Ms. Byron explained, was intended to give people who might find comments "troubling" or "triggering," a place to recuperate. The room was equipped with cookies, coloring books, bubbles, Play-Doh, calming music, pillows, blankets and a video of frolicking puppies, as well as students and staff members trained to deal with trauma. Emma Hall, a junior, rape survivor and "sexual assault peer educator" who helped set up the room and worked in it during the debate, estimates that a couple of dozen people used it. At one point she went to the lecture hall — it was packed — but after a while, she had to return to the safe space. "I was feeling bombarded by a lot of viewpoints that really go against my dearly and closely held beliefs," Ms. Hall said.

Safe spaces are an expression of the conviction, increasingly prevalent among college students, that their schools should keep them from being "bombarded" by discomfiting or distressing viewpoints. Think of the safe space as the live-action version of the better-known trigger warning, a notice put on top of a syllabus or an assigned reading to alert students to the presence of potentially disturbing material.'

Injustice report from Indian reader

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From a reader in India. Many items on men being harassed and assaulted due to presumed guilt/false accusations, sometimes murdered or driven to suicide as a consequence.

Man trashed for bumping into a group of girls in the dark

Mob Justice: Penis chopped off

Husband burnt alive by mother-in-law
(If a wife is burnt alive, or dies of any unnatural death or road accident within 7 yrs of marriage, the Indian police immediately bound to file case under 304B. But here wife isn't touched at all.)

One honest officer in Indian civil services allegedly committed suicide. Reason initially is that the mafia had a hand in the murder. Now news is unfolding: Allegedly, his wife had affair and he was threatened with 498a. There have been good number of protest to investigate the case in Bangalore but it's taking new turn.

Another husband committed suicide due to 498a terror

A doctor commits suicide after wife threatens him with 498a

Man commits suicide after a woman blackmailed him of false rape case

Man beaten after a woman alleges that he held her hand

Man lynched by a mob of 10,000 that included school and college girls. He was in judicial custody under charges of rape. The mob took him out of jail and beat him to death. A few days later, the medical report of woman came that said: "No Rape"

Mob killed another alleged rapist

Australian Salvation Army 'exposed boys to sexual abuse'

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Australian Salvation Army failed to protect young boys in its care from sexual abuse, a report has found.

The report, by Australia's Royal Commission, examined four homes run by the charity in New South Wales and Queensland.

It detailed brutal sexual and psychological abuse of young boys put in the care of the state at the four homes between 1965 and 1977.

Boys who attempted to report abuse were punished or accused of lying, it said.

"The commissioners found that the Salvation Army did not protect the boys from sexual abuse in each of the four homes," the report said.'

Rolling Stone to Publish Review of Disputed Rape Article

Matt · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Rolling Stone magazine plans to publish an external review of a widely disputed article about a gang rape at the University of Virginia “in the next couple of weeks,” its managing editor, Will Dana, said on Sunday.

The 9,000-word article, which was published in November, was based on the account of a female student who described being sexually assaulted by seven men in a dark room during a fraternity house party.

The article quickly became part of a national debate over sexual assault on college campuses, and the university suspended the fraternity’s operations. But in early December, substantial portions of the article were called into question. Rolling Stone acknowledged that it had not sought to independently corroborate the woman’s account, and that it had doubts about the veracity of the story. Shortly afterward, it announced a review of the article would be led by Steve Coll, dean of the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism.'

Police Find No Evidence To Support Alleged UVA Gang Rape

Mastodon · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Charlottesville Police announced Monday that its investigation into an alleged gang rape at the University of Virginia's Phi Kappa Psi fraternity did not find enough evidence to support the account described in a Rolling Stone magazine article published last year.

Charlottesville Chief of Police Tim Longo said during a press conference the case would not be closed, however, because he cannot say conclusively that no assault took place. The alleged victim, a female undergraduate identified only as Jackie, did not provide a statement or any testimony to Charlottesville police during its investigation, Longo said.

"It's a disservice to Jackie and to the university to close this" case without leaving open the possibility that additional information will come to light, Longo said.'

UVA Fraternity Exploring Legal Options to Address 'Extensive Damage Caused by Rolling Stone'

Mastodon · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Phi Kappa Psi at the University of Virginia told ABC News today that the fraternity feels vindicated after Charlottesville, Virginia, police said their investigation found "no evidence" of an alleged rape at the fraternity house.

Stephen Scipione, president of the Virginia Alpha Chapter of Phi Kappa Psi, said in a statement, "These false accusations have been extremely damaging to our entire organization, but we can only begin to imagine the setback this must have dealt to survivors of sexual assault."

He continued, "We hope that Rolling Stone's actions do not discourage any survivors from coming forward to seek the justice they deserve."
...
Phi Psi said it is "exploring its legal options to address the extensive damage caused by Rolling Stone."
...
Police also found no evidence that a party or event took place at Phi Psi on Sept. 28, 2012, noting that a time-stamped photo from that night shows the house practically empty, Longo said.

In January, a police investigation cleared Phi Psi of any involvement in the alleged rape and the fraternity was reinstated on campus.

Longo noted today that the case is not closed, but is suspended until they are able to gather more information.'

"What Everyone Needs to Know About the Police Findings in the UVA Gang Rape Case"

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We still must believe survivors: This sentiment is one survivors and activists have been championing since the story was first called into question. While some have stated that this case may be read as a "setback" for the movement and that it "wrecked an incredible year of progress," the incident has also launched an important conversation about the complex experience of survivors and why they should be believed.

Regardless of the particulars of Jackie's case, the fact remains that just about 2% to 8% of rape claims are determined to be false, and rape remains a highly underreported crime. Furthermore, it's not uncommon for survivors to misremember the facts of their assault or to manage the experience in a variety of ways. It makes sense, then, to believe survivors. As activist Zerlina Maxwell wrote in the Washington Post, "the costs of wrongly disbelieving a survivor far outweigh the costs of calling someone a rapist."
...
Ultimately, this controversy is about much more than the validity of a single case of sexual assault on one campus. It is about the way in which we approach survivors' stories. Rather than focusing on the discrepancies of a single case, this investigation, and the treatment of Jackie, underscore that surviving assault is a complex experience about which the public needs to continue to be educated.'

UK: Man sues police over malicious prosecution in false rape accusation

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A businessman who spent three weeks in jail after falsely being accused of rape by a woman he met on the internet is suing the police for malicious prosecution and wrongful imprisonment.

Kayode Modupe-Ojo, a former boyfriend of David Beckham's sister Joanne, said his reputation has been destroyed and he lost his business because police failed to investigate properly the woman's fictitious allegations – including that he possessed firearms – or the glaring inconsistencies in her story.

The 28-year-old former spa owner was arrested at his home in Cheshire shortly after spending two days with the woman.

His accuser gave a harrowing but entirely false account of being tied up and moved around the north-east of England against her will, after a sexual encounter turned terrifyingly violent.'

New controversy about circumcision raising eyebrows

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When you go into a hospital, do you expect the hospital and biotech industries to make a profit from your surgical specimens? Well in the case of circumcision, your child's foreskin could be making thousands of dollars for the biotech industry.

A baby's foreskin is full of cells, called fibroblasts, that produce structural proteins like collagen. When fibroblasts are extracted, multiple products can be developed, such as artificial skin for plastic surgery, injectable wrinkle treatments and even skin creams that sell for hundreds of dollars per jar.

The ethical question is: Should you be informed that your child's foreskin is going to become a profitable commodity? Circumcision continues to be a controversial topic, but the majority of people don't realize that many of the byproducts from human bodies translate to big bucks for biotech companies.

The question that I have is: Who does that foreskin belong to? Right now, this industry is not very well regulated. Yes, the FDA keeps tabs on tissue banks nationally, but many of them also have affiliations and partnerships outside the U.S. where the FDA has no regulatory control.

I don't see a lot of disclosure or transparency by medical centers in their contractual agreements they may have with biotech companies in regards to selling human byproducts. It's important to note this is not the same as patients donating tissue like bone marrow or organs that are very regulated, and in my opinion, doing God's work. But when the tissue that is up for grabs is being sold off without the patient's knowledge, is that ethical? I don't think it is, and I want to hear from you about what you think about this topic.'

Misandry is a way for girls to unite and feel powerful, even if it's [mostly] a joke

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It also helps, Horowitz says, that misandry jokes don't really cater to men, as the joke really succeeds as an inside joke between members of the same in-group (feminist women). Being in on the joke can help foster a connection and a sense of solidarity between women with common feminist goals, and for those who need it, it can serve as a coping mechanism for living in a world that wasn't build for you.

More to the point, joking about misandry with your friends is a way to vent, while at the same time imagining a world where women are respected, and perhaps even in charge.

"I don't want to say it's empowering necessarily," Horowitz says. "But it gives a lot of young women a sense of power while being in on this joke, and that power is attractive."'

Girls, boys, and reading

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The analysis below focuses on where the gender gap in reading stands today, not its causes. Nevertheless, readers should keep in mind the three most prominent explanations for the gap. They will be used to frame the concluding discussion.

Biological/Developmental: Even before attending school, young boys evidence more problems in learning how to read than girls. This explanation believes the sexes are hard-wired differently for literacy.

School Practices: Boys are inferior to girls on several school measures—behavioral, social, and academic—and those discrepancies extend all the way through college. This explanation believes that even if schools do not create the gap, they certainly don't do what they could to ameliorate it.

Cultural Influences: Cultural influences steer boys toward non-literary activities (sports, music) and define literacy as a feminine characteristic. This explanation believes cultural cues and strong role models could help close the gap by portraying reading as a masculine activity.'

'Mansplaining' the return of political correctness

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I've never seen the Vagina Monologues. Perhaps I'm incurious, but I just never had any interest in sitting through segments with titles like The little coochie snorcher that could.
...
Anyway, the point is that the Vagina Monologues, so shocking when Eve Ensler wrote it in 1996, has become an entertaining relic. And its cancellation at Holyoke just seems like an attempt to find something new to protest.

Sorry, I know that sounds like old-man talk, but that's what it looks like.
...
Political correctness, apparently, is making a comeback, like a sharp-tongued schoolmarm coming out of retirement. (Yes, that was a deliberate speech violation, but PC always seemed sort of schoolmarmish to me.)

New York magazine ran a long article on the subject recently, describing groupthink and ideological bullying by students (and faculty) at American universities.
...
Eventually, the PC of the early '90s faded, partly because it annoyed audiences, and partly because university students do have to, well, grow up.

Cultural concerns yielded to economic concerns, first a rather serious recession, then the great big excessive party that followed.

Now, though, PC is back, but with new terminology.

Modern students are on the lookout for heteronormativity (for the unenlightened, that means the view that there are natural male-female roles); for anyone who might deny rape culture; and for micro-aggressions, which are little slights that belie racism or sexism in someone who tries to appear liberal and tolerant.
...
My grandchildren will no doubt someday stare agape at their parents for using the term "people of colour," and inform them that any reference to colour is divisive and ugly.

Or that "transgender" implies that there was ever any validity to "gender" in the first place.

The urge to control other people's speech is atavistic. It will never lessen, and my guess is the technology to enforce it will only grow more sophisticated.'

Deal with the reality of domestic violence

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When I started this gig, I was a crime reporter. For the better part of 12 years, I covered everything from organized crime to petty theft to homicide.

Generally speaking, the murders I covered fell into two broad categories.

By far the most common were criminals killing other criminals, usually over drugs or money. The others were domestic murders.

Any experienced crime reporter will tell you the same thing: In the overwhelming number of cases, victims in domestic murders are women.

They were killed by their husbands or boyfriends, sometimes in one-time act of rage but usually as the final act of violence in a long history of domestic abuse.

The number of times I reported on a case of a domestic murder that involved a woman killing her husband or boyfriend was zero.
...
To be clear, we know there are men who suffer domestically, who are abused physically and emotionally. They are smaller in number, but they exist. And there is a stigma about a man coming forward to say he was abused by his female partner.

However, if "mens rights" supporters were serious about addressing the issue, they would not frame it as an attack on shelters like Gillian's Place, or demand these organizations operate on the basis of gender "equality." That they focus their bile at organizations protecting female victims of crime bespeaks the agenda behind MRA rhetoric.

If they wanted to actually do something useful, they would start their own campaigns designed to provide those men who do suffer the resources they need.

And until they do so, without the demands for gender "equality", no one is going to take them seriously.'

Kirsten Gillibrand: Don’t Blame The Victim Of A Rape That Never Happened For Reporting A Rape That Never Happened

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Senator Kirsten Gillibrand has a history of calling people rapists without any proof. If she hears a rape accusation, she assumes it’s true. She skips niceties like “allegedly.” The way she sees it: If the accused isn’t guilty, why does he stand accused? Due process is for ladies only.

...

"Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, who is pushing for stronger laws against rapes on college campuses, today warned against people criticizing the woman at the center of a University of Virginia sexual assault case…

“Victim blaming or shining the spotlight on her for coming forward is not the right approach,” Gillibrand said on “The Capitol Pressroom,” a public radio show in Albany. “In fact, what we have to focus on is how do we keep these campuses safe? How do we have better trained personnel on campuses so they can tell a survivor what her options are and so they can have all the facts?”

Gillibrand said it would be wrong for some to call on the female student in the UVA scandal to face criminal charges.

“I think it’s inappropriate,” she said."

Punishing false accusations of rape would only discourage actual rape victims from stepping forward, you see. We must protect women, even if they’re lying. They’re victims because they say so, and we must not be swayed by mere evidence to the contrary.

Those frat bros probably had it coming anyway. If you think those guys are innocent until proven guilty, you hate women. Go ahead, deny it. That just serves as further proof of your misogyny, misogynist.'

Gillibrand promotes federal sexual assault legislation

U.S. fraternities lobby for reduced powers for universities to investigate and punish rape allegations

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'College fraternities and sororities, concerned that students accused of sexual assault are treated unfairly, are pushing Congress to make it harder for universities to investigate rape allegations.

The groups' political arm plans to bring scores of students to Capitol Hill on April 29 to lobby for a requirement that the criminal justice system resolve cases before universities look into them or hand down punishments, according to an agenda reviewed by Bloomberg News.

"If people commit criminal acts, they should be prosecuted and they should go to jail," said Michael Greenberg, leader of 241-chapter Sigma Chi, one of many fraternities participating in the legislative push.

The Fraternity & Sorority Political Action Committee, or "FratPAC," and two other groups will ask Congress to block colleges from suspending all fraternities on a campus because of a serious incident at a single house. In addition, the Greek representatives want a rule against "any mandate" for chapters to go co-ed.
...
Dozens of men have filed lawsuits claiming they have been unfairly treated in campus hearings. Fraternity groups also point to cases of what they call a rush to judgment against Greek houses. University of Virginia suspended activity at all houses after Rolling Stone magazine published a since-discredited article in November claiming fraternity members had gang-raped a student. On Monday, police in Charlottesville, UVA's home, said they found no evidence supporting the Rolling Stone account and were suspending their investigation.

Beginning April 27 in Washington, the fraternity groups will provide two days of training to the student lobbyists, who will then split into small groups for visits with lawmakers and their aides. Members of congress, including recipients of FratPAC donations, will speak at its April 29 dinner.

In her summary of the Greeks' positions, Jennifer Kilian, director of member services for the interfraternity conference, said the student lobbyists will also call for more data and education about sexual assault and new prevention programs.

"Students and alumni participating in the Greek Hill visits will be lobbying on the unified position fraternities and sororities have adapted [sic] on Title IX issues," Kilian said, referring to the federal law that bans discrimination on the basis of gender, in an email to those selected to lobby.'

"I'm going to speak slowly' so feminists learn rape reports are a 'war on boys'"

Mastodon · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"And I'm going to speak slowly here so all the feminist blogs can get this one because I'm sure they'll clip it," she continued. "There is a war happening on boys on these college campuses."

According to Tantaros, President Barack Obama's administration was "scrutinizing these college campuses to come down hard on cases of rape."

"This is a real problem," she insisted. "They say there's no opportunity to discover the facts, there's no opportunity to confront witnesses and to present a defense. This also hurts lower income students because they can't retain legal representation. They cannot fight back."

"And so you have Lena Dunham, Rolling Stone — it is a theme in this country to go after boys in this rape culture," Tantaros said. "What happens after they assassinate their character? What happens to Lena Dunham? What happens to these fraternity boys? Absolutely nothing! And it hurts the women and the victims at the end of the day the most."

Watch the video below.'

Wikipedia on Andrea Tantaros

Woman Throws Molotov Cocktail At Pro-Life Activists

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A woman threw a Molotov cocktail at three pro-life volunteers who were praying in front of a Planned Parenthood facility in Austin, Texas, Monday night.

One of the three women saw the flaming cocktail coming directly at her, and was able to dodge it and stamp it out. Another woman got the woman's license plate number, and police later arrested her.

The women were volunteering for the Central Texas Coalition for Life, whose executive director, Heather Gardner, recounted the details to The Daily Caller News Foundation. "People will throw eggs or styrofoam cups or get verbally aggressive, but nothing violent like this happen before," Gardner said.'

Police Report On University Of Virginia “Rape” May Blunt Prevention Efforts

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A very thorough police investigation has found no evidence whatsoever to support the allegations of rape at the University of Virginia as sensationally reported in Rolling Stone magazine which provided such a boost to efforts to reduce rapes at colleges and universities.

This Rolling Stone debacle, coupled with the recent memory of phony allegations of rape at Duke University, and a Justice Department study showing that widely cited estimates of the rate of rapes and other sexual assaults on college campuses has been grossly exaggerated, may blunt so-far successful efforts by the federal government and anti-rape groups to force colleges to not only crack down but to also convict more male students, says public interest law professor John Banzhaf.

Rather than the very widely cited statistic that 1 in 5 female students are victims, the study shows that the rate of rape and sexual assault among college women is about 1 in 160; even lower than the rate among non-college women of the same age of about 1 in 140. These rates are also on the decline, says Banzhaf, suggesting that these figures may further knock the wind out of efforts to win support for a major crackdown, and more findings of guilty.
...
Yes, rapes, on campus or off, are very serious and must be fought.

But it doesn’t help when the number of incidents are greatly exaggerated, parents are made very fearful of sending their daughters to major universities like Duke and UVA, and males are found guilty to satisfy the government’s pressures for more convictions without much regard for Due Process procedures to protect the innocent, says Banzhaf.'

The Real ‘Everyday Sexism’ Is Against Men

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. [Warning: NSFW image at top of article] Excerpt:

'On Friday, the pettiness of modern, online protest feminism versus the stark truth that Britain is becoming increasingly hostile toward men was brought cruelly into view, when two seemingly unconnected news stories collided on the same day. To add a typically British undercurrent of black humour, both stories centred around the human bottom.

...

Only now, 26 years later – in the world of freely-available online porn, no less – the sclerotic eye of online protest feminism has seen something altogether more sinister in it. Of course, Tennis Girl is sexist – and regular observers of modern feminism like myself only half-sobbed: “How did it take you so long?”

...

The choice of target image felt totemic. Cruelly outing the Athena Tennis Girl as in some way misogynistic felt like a sort of historical abuse allegation against all men. It exhumed and shamed long-forgotten masculine desires felt by millions of us as we set off on our paths of sexual awakenings.

It was almost like Everyday Sexism were claiming most British men have been inexorably sexist from age seven, when most of us first saw it on a bedroom wall of an older sibling or school pal. Now the image was “disappointing,” as Everyday Sexism called it, in the favoured, terse language of the purse-lipped, disapproving matron.

...

By the time I clocked in to Twitter at 4 a.m. on Friday morning, Tennis Girl’s detractors were calling for it to be “eradicated from history” – sharing poisonous lexicon with history’s most heinous despots and totalitarian censors.

Seething with finger-curling indignation, I made my way to the Sky News studios for my weekly newspaper review, where I chose to cover the second big story that was affecting men that day, a shocking Prostate Cancer UK report in the Daily Mail.

The report shows that prostate cancer, which affects only men, receives just £417 worth of research funding per case. The “female” cancers – ovarian, cervical and breast – receive £1912, £1142 and £853 respectively. Of the 40,000 men who contract prostate cancer annually, some 10,000 die.

...

Furthermore, last week the Cancer Drugs Fund in England axed the new drug Jevtana – even though it was said to give patients at least three extra months of life. On top of all this, Owen Sharp, of Prostate Cancer UK, also warned that half of specialist prostate cancer nurses are set to retire in the next ten years. There are no plans for a new workforce.

The story gave me the perfect opportunity to launch into a depressingly recurring topic of debate, namely: “Is health care provision in the UK sexist against men?”'

Study Finds Men Focus Charitable Efforts on Children

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Men cited helping children as their top cause for volunteering and donating to charity, a new study has found.

The findings suggest that family dynamics might play a larger role in motivating men to give and volunteer than fundraisers, communications staff, and others working on behalf of charities have realized, says Brittany Hill, the study's lead researcher.

...

Ms. Hill said that she and her colleagues were motivated to do the study, which they titled "The Forgotten Man," after noticing a growing emphasis on women. "In recent years," she wrote, "we've noticed an industrywide shift in focus towards women as the target audience for cause efforts."'

Mary Portas: 'Motherhood is better without men'

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'TV presenter Mary Portas [link added], who has been married to both a man and a woman, claims that bringing up children is better with a lesbian.

‘I have to say that sharing motherhood with a female makes it doubly wonderful,’ gushes Portas, 54, whose wife, 41-year-old fashion journalist Melanie Rickey, gave birth to their son Horatio in 2012.

‘Women are so capable — they are able to do an awful lot of things.’

Portas disclosed last month that Horatio was conceived artificially using sperm donated by her brother Lawrence Newton.

‘Melanie and I don’t even have to sit and talk about how we want to bring Horatio up,’ she adds. ‘We just agree."

YWCA says more men report being victims of domestic violence

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A man shot by his girlfriend is still in critical condition.

Police say she shot him during a domestic dispute.

It happened at the Park Estates Apartment Homes on Estate Drive between Poplar and Park in East Memphis.

The YWCA says an increasing number of men are becoming victims of domestic violence.

Men are calling the crisis helpline more and more.

Jacquelyn Williams with the YWCA says they want to know how to get out of their situation.

“They’re curious because they’re experiencing some aggression from either their wives or girlfriends and they’re wanting information,” she said.'

Our view: What police didn't say in the UVa rape report

Mastodon · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The bottom line: There's no evidence the assailant "Jackie" named to friends actually exists, no evidence a party was held at the fraternity that night and, of course, no evidence the alleged gang rape happened.

Furthermore, "Jackie's" veracity was called into a question on an unrelated matter. In April 2014, "Jackie" told university officials she had been attacked on a Charlottesville street, struck in the face with a glass bottle and that her roommate picked out the shards. However, that roommate told police she did no such thing. "Jackie" also said she called her mother that night. Police say phone records show no such call.

There's one sure conclusion to be drawn from this: Rolling Stone got snookered by a story that seemed too good to be true for its purposes. If the pop culture magazine had bothered to do some of the serious reporting that The Washington Post, in particular, did, this whole ugly situation could have been avoided.

Instead, the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity feels it's been defamed, as does, to some extent, all of the University of Virginia. The real victims here, though, are all the future sexual assault victims who will have to carry the burden of having to prove they're not another "Jackie" making things up just to get attention.'

"You can’t ban douchebaggery: Kill the frats, sure, but you can’t stop entitled white bros"

Mastodon · 26 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. *[Warning: Using Firefox but not IE, a "slide show" opens in the lower part of the page as an overlay that contains NSFW images. Salon has really sunk even for it; some of these images are pornographic. Only reason I don't not post it is because when using IE, the "slideshow" does not seem to come up. But regardless of what browser you use, navigate to it while at work at your own risk.]*

Excerpt:

'So let’s ban frats, right? Let’s empty their houses and pressure the national organizations to donate the space to be turned into something else. (Repurposed dorms open to all students or maybe, you know, the headquarters for a chapter of Men Can Stop Rape.) Let’s push the thousands of former Greeks to join other public service groups if they really want to help their communities. Let’s open the doors and let sunlight disinfect the whole mess.

Racism and misogyny on campus won’t suddenly disappear if this happens, but shuttering the Greek system could be seen as an institutional commitment to lowering the number of dead drunk kids, women assaulted or otherwise dehumanized and racist parties defended as harmless fun.

This is the side I ultimately come down on, but here’s where I get stuck: You can ban frats, but you can’t ban large groups of entitled white men from living together. You also can’t simply ban toxic masculinity and white supremacy. These are frat problems, of course. But they are also our problems.
...
There’s no denying that frats and sororities are often a particularly grotesque expression of the problems that plague the rest of the country, but they’re not uniquely awful. (There’s plenty of awful to go around, of course.) When you look at the actual issues behind our “frat problem,” you’re left with white supremacy, institutional misogyny and the everyday violence of inequality, for starters. Break it down in those terms, and it’s pretty clear that banning frats would be the easy part.'

What it's like to be falsely accused of rape

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I've been very interested in the last few days to read about Kayode Modupe-Ojo, who has spoken to the press about being falsely accused of rape.

Even though Mr. Modupe-Ojo's experience is a lot more painful than mine – he was jailed for a short time, named publicly, and saw his business tainted by association, while I avoided all three mainly due to the ineptitude of my accuser – I still have a first-hand insight into what it's like to be falsely accused of sexually assaulting somebody.
...
Firstly, what was interesting, even unique, about my false accusation is that I knew it was going to happen. To explain, my accuser was a one-night stand who had taken to harassing me after I denied her a second date, turning up drunk at my flat and sending me abusive texts and voicemails. In the early summer of 2010 she stepped up the frequency of her visits. When I found her stood outside my home one evening in the pouring rain, intently watching my bedroom window, I told her that I was going to have to go to the police if the behaviour continued. She responded by telling me that if I did go to the police, she would tell them that I had drugged her and sexually assaulted her.

Unsurprisingly, I didn't go to the police straight away, but eventually the persistence of her harassment gave me little choice. It's a faintly surreal experience telling a police officer that, by the way, when you arrest her, she's probably going to tell you that I raped her, but I figured that my warning them at least would slightly discredit her if she went through with it.

Which she did. Two days later I had a phone call to tell me that Louise* had made certain allegations towards me, sexual in nature, that would have to be investigated separately to my own case, and that officers would be in touch. I'd like to have the words to describe the full-body wash of absolute dread and nausea I felt at the moment, but I simply don't. In that moment, your entire sexual history comes into sharp focus and you are forced to analyse it.'

Hillary ‘Super Volunteers’ Warn Reporter Against Using ‘Sexist’ Words

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A team of Hillary Clinton “super volunteers” warned a New York Times reporter on Wednesday against using words about Clinton that they deem to be “sexist.”

The group, “HRC Super volunteers,” wrote Times reporter Amy Chozick, the paper’s Hillary Clinton reporter, and put her on notice regarding “coded sexism.”

Sexist words, according to the group, include: “polarizing,” “calculating,” “disingenuous,” “insincere,” “ambitious,” “inevitable,” “entitled,” “over confident,” “secretive,” will do anything to win,” “represents the past,” and “out of touch.”

“You are on notice that we will be watching, reading, listening and protesting coded sexism,” the group reportedly wrote her.'

Tweets in question:
https://twitter.com/amychozick/status/580822762647875584
https://twitter.com/amychozick/status/580822978331561985
https://twitter.com/amychozick/status/580823323677978624
https://twitter.com/amychozick/status/580823990090014720

Congresswoman Claims Climate Change Will Turn Women Into Prostitutes (and demands pre-emptive "gender-sensitive" solutions)

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'On Wednesday, California Democrat Barbara Lee proposed a resolution in the House of Representatives that claims women will eventually be forced into prostitution in order to obtain life-sustaining food and water for their families.

Lee introduced House Concurrent Resolution 29, warning that women will be forced into “transactional sex” to get enough food and clean water — all because global warming will create “conflict and instability” in the world.
...
Lee’s document goes on to urge Congress to agree on the “disparate impacts of climate change on women,” and goes on to demand that Congress use “gender-sensitive frameworks in developing policies to address climate change.”

Lee also charges that women, who are “often underrepresented in the development and formulation of policy regarding adaptation to climate change,” are doubtless in the best position to offer policy ideas.'

Actress criticised for comparing her Jewish boyfriend to her dog

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

Girls actor Lena Dunham [link added] has been criticised for comparing her Jewish boyfriend to her dog.

Published in The New Yorker, her article, Dog or Jewish Boyfriend? A Quiz, offers a list of 35 things comparing the two.

"Do the following statements refer to (a) my dog or (b) my Jewish boyfriend?" she asks.

"1. The first thing I noticed about him was his eyes."

"2. We love to spend hours in bed together on Sunday mornings."

Moving on to question eight , Dunham writes about "him" feeling judgemental about the food she serves him.

"When I make something from scratch, he doesn't want to eat it, but he also rejects most store-bought dinners.

"This is because he comes from a culture in which mothers focus every ounce of their attention on their offspring and don't acknowledge their own need for independence as women. They are sucked dry by their children, who ultimately leave them as soon as they find suitable mates," Dunham says.

Is she referring to her dog or her Jewish boyfriend?'

Governor: "...you never, ever, ever hit a woman"

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Gov. Greg Abbott said Thursday that he and other elected officials can't fight domestic violence alone — ordinary residents must join the battle, too.

Abbott stopped here Thursday morning for the grand opening of The Gatehouse, a 96-unit apartment community for abused women and children.

...

"No woman should be trapped in an abusive relationship," he said. "No woman should feel unsafe in her own home. No woman should feel helpless with no place and no one to turn to."

...

...

"This is not a women's issue," he said. "This is a man's issue … and we need to draw a line in the sand and say you never, ever, ever hit a woman."

Canada: Are men becoming collateral damage in the battle for gender equity?

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'But in the need to ensure there are safe places for women to be educated – which is crucial – isn't it worth asking if there can be safe places for men to gather without suspicion of being a cabal of misogynist terrorism? In the heated discussion about rape culture, the feminist voice is loudest at the moment, which makes many young men feel that their every move, every thought, is policed. Some might even suggest they're victims of misandry, if they weren't sure their complaints would fall on deaf ears.

A witch hunt, you say? Well, I won't use that loaded term, because it only serves to ratchet-up the gender wars when what we need is a little calm.

That said, some of the research about fraternity culture is not kind. A 2007 study by professors at the College of William and Mary – the place, ironically, where the first Greek-letter fraternity, Phi Beta Kappa, was founded in 1776 with the motto "Philosophy is the guide to life" – found that men in fraternities were three times more likely to rape than those who weren't.

A culture of male peer support for violence against women coupled with excessive drinking practices contribute to a higher risk for sexual assault, the study found, leading some scholars to suggest fraternities should be banned. Other research has added to the alarm. Elizabeth Armstrong and other professors at Indiana University studied the social life at a large Midwestern university for five years, producing a book in 2013, Paying for the Party, How College Maintains Inequality, and a paper on sexual assault that described how fraternities contribute to the reproduction of gender inequality.

But the assumption that all fraternities are bad has led to a rush to judgment – sometimes with embarrassing results. The most noteworthy was last year's Rolling Stone article, "A Rape on Campus," about a brutal gang rape in a room at Phi Kappa Psi house on the University of Virginia campus in 2012. After significant discrepancies in the story were revealed in subsequent reports, the magazine issued apologies. Earlier this week, after a five-month investigation, police in Charlottesville, Va., announced that they found "no evidence" that the alleged rape at the fraternity happened. In a statement that sounded attuned to the fervent anti-frat mood and the possibility of victim shaming, they said they're not suggesting that something horrible didn't happen, only that they couldn't corroborate the woman's story.'

Female chauvinist pigs on men behaving badly

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There are man-haters everywhere, it seems, from children's telly to high culture. Charges of sexism have been levelled against the creators of the Daddy Pig character in Peppa Pig — daddy is portrayed as a hopeless bumbling idiot while Mummy Pig is the embodiment of good sense — and the literary critic Harold Bloom argues that there is 'a strong element' of misandry in Shakespeare (whereas misogyny, he says, is hard to find).
The latest challenge invited you to climb aboard the bandwagon and compose an extract from an imaginary novel written from the perspective of a female chauvinist author. In a small but accomplished entry, Sergio Michael Petro, Frank Upton and Sandra McGregor deserve an honourable mention, the winners take £30 each and Adrian Fry pockets the extra fiver.

"Adrian Fry
Looking down at the dead girl, Detective Inspector Malmsey vowed to find her killer, the catch in his voice signifying both his self-importance at the apex of a phallocentric hierarchy and the arousal of his flaccid libido by a woman whose passivity and unreadable blankness rendered her sufficiently undemanding for sentimental objectification. The case would demand total concentration; a diet of vindaloo and whisky, total dereliction of familial responsibilities and the maintenance of a temper shorter than a list of famous female classical composers. Male hegemony excused such eccentricities; even his unironed shirts proved badges of dedication, not cause for disciplinary action. Whether aggressively harrying suspects or hypocritically reprimanding subordinates for misogynistic canteen banter, Malmsey would take complete responsibility for the case, monotasking his way to an insecure conviction, testosterone pumping too hard to permit his glancing into the victim's diary where the perpetrators identity had been astutely anticipated. Typical!"'

Hillary Gets Special Protection On Wikipedia

Mastodon · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Despite the steady wave of scandals that have begun to erode even the New York Times' portrayal of Hillary Clinton, her image remains unblemished on Wikipedia. Since he first started editing her page in June 2005, Hillary's "Wikipedia watchdog" has been guarding against slanders, accusations, unfair assumptions, and distortions on the high-traffic, heavily footnoted, highly policed Hillary Rodham Clinton Wikipedia page.

Unlike most Wikipedia editors, who prefer to remain anonymous, "Wasted Time R" has no problem giving his real name: Jonathan Schilling. Leading up to Hillary's failed bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, Schilling's significant role in the shaping of the image of the former first lady was the subject of several interviews and articles, including pieces by NPR, BBC, Canadian Radio, and New Republic.

"I figure if you're going to be doing this ... you might as well own up to who you are," Schilling said.

In a piece on the wiki pages of Hillary and Obama, New Republic's Eve Fairbanks described Schilling as "the man who protects Hillary's online self from the public's hatred." His dedication to the unofficial job is stunning: he estimated in 2008 that he spent 15 hours a week editing, with most of that, as Fairbanks says, "standing watch over Hillary's page."'

Men aren't stupid and women aren't crazy - A good article, for once

GaryB · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article was great to read, for once. Heather Gray writes in News.com.au with a heap of good sense. Excerpt:

'YOU know the moment. You're at a backyard barbecue when one of the wives starts telling silly tales of her husband's misdeeds. She tells them with a smile and may even be hugging her husband when she does it. Still, though, there's this cord of tension that you can just feel. She's mocking him in front of his friends and is doing it in such a way that he will seem "sensitive" if he gets upset about it.

It might be called "passive-aggressive".

Instead of saying what's really bothering her, she lets him know through "a joke."

Others may call it "emotional manipulation."

She's being mean and then making him feel like he's overreacting if he brings it up or gets offended because she was "just joking."

Maybe as an isolated incident, we can look at this as simple, emotional manipulation. However, this isn't just one incident.

It's part of a larger pattern where women are seeking control by implying that men are stupid. It's a move for power in an area where they are feeling a loss of control.
...
Men are showing themselves to be exceedingly adept in areas that we have been socialised to see as "feminine" or something that women just do better.

This is the same reason men began engaging in gaslighting … because women were beginning to excel in areas where traditionally men succeeded.

This gender warfare is the unfortunate side effect of the fight both men and women are having for gender equality.

While women want to be seen and recognised for things outside of home and family, men want to be seen as capable of being present for all that is involved with home, family, and relationships.

Just as we have seen women shut down in the workforce, we're seeing men shut down on the home front.'

Connecticut bill requiring "affirmative consent" on campuses voted to joint committee

Mastodon · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Bill status page here. Bill as referred here. Excerpt:

'Section 1. Section 10a-55m of the general statutes is repealed and the following is substituted in lieu thereof (Effective July 1, 2015):

(a) For purposes of this section and sections 10a-55n to 10a-55q, inclusive:

(1) "Affirmative consent" means an active, informed, unambiguous and voluntary agreement by a person to engage in sexual activity with another person that is sustained throughout the sexual activity and may be revoked at any time by any person;

...

(b) Each institution of higher education shall adopt and disclose in such institution's annual uniform campus crime report one or more policies regarding sexual assault, stalking and intimate partner violence. Such policy or policies shall include provisions for: [(1) detailing]

(1) Informing students and employees that (A) affirmative consent is the standard used in determining whether consent to engage in sexual activity was given by all persons who engaged in the sexual activity, (B) it is the responsibility of each person to ensure that he or she has the affirmative consent of all persons to engage in the sexual activity, (C) the existence of a dating relationship or past sexual relationship between persons shall not constitute consent to engage in the sexual activity, and (D) it shall not be a valid excuse to an alleged lack of affirmative consent that the accused believed that the victim consented to the sexual activity (i) because the accused was intoxicated or reckless or failed to take reasonable steps to ascertain whether the victim affirmatively consented, or (ii) if the accused knew or should have known that the victim was unable to consent because the victim was unconscious, asleep, unable to communicate due to a mental or physical condition, or incapacitated due to the influence of drugs, alcohol or medication and, as a result, was unable to understand the fact, nature or extent of the sexual activity.

...

Statement of Purpose:

To establish affirmative consent as the threshold in sexual assault and intimate partner violence cases.'

Create Hysteria, Then Profit from It

Mastodon · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In case you missed it, there is a documentary film that purports to expose the “campus rape culture.” Premiering at the 2015 Sundance Film Festival, “The Hunting Ground” takes full advantage of the belief that college campuses are extraordinarily dangerous places for women because sexual assault is so common and tolerated. Canadian writer Wendy McElroy’s Daily Bell piece about this film is excellent.

“The film is best understood as a volley in the campus consent wars now raging across North America,” she writes. “It is part of a manufactured and coordinated hysteria about campus rape that imposes a politically-correct agenda and strips accused male students of due process rights.”

Exactly. This is another of those hobgoblins H.L Mencken observed were so vital to crusaders, who constantly need “issues” that keep people looking to them for salvation.

The movie has brought in a mere $95,000 in three weeks, but it is certain, McElroy writes, to get many campus screenings “sponsored by Women’s Studies Departments and other ‘progressive’ voices.”

And that’s where the profit will be made. At the end of the film, viewers are encouraged to “Take Action!” by clicking a button. That button brings up the NEO Philanthropy site, which assures the eager-to-do-something viewer that donations are tax-deductible and will support “student-led campaigns, public education, policy reform, and prevention approaches.”'

Fallout from committee meeting on sexual assault bill yields more complaints

Mastodon · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'State Sen. Mae Flexer, D-Killingly, said there is bipartisan confusion within the Higher Education and Employment Committee about a bill she introduced to help shift the way society thinks about sexual assault.

While state Rep. Mike Bocchino, R-Greenwich, was openly criticized by the Connecticut Democratic Party for comments he made during discussion of the bill at a recent meeting, Flexer said he was just one of several people from both parties to make “unfortunate comments.”

The proposed legislation, which was forwarded to the Senate by a 14-3 vote, would move the burden of proof in sexual assault cases on college campuses from the victim to the alleged perpetrator, Flexer said. Currently, the victim must convince investigators that she said “no,” while this bill would put the onus on the accused to prove she said “yes.”

Bocchino’s remark was made in the context of his concerns about ambiguity in the bill’s definition of “affirmative consent.”

“We have an obligation to make certain that this bill, this legislation that we will finally pass, is true and just and cannot be interpreted in any other way,” Bocchino said at the committee meeting, voicing concern for those who might be wrongfully accused while demonstrating less sensitivity toward the victims of sexual assault: “Because at the end of the day, there are no witnesses — at least if there are, it’s a really great party.”'

Boys' campus trap: The danger of false accusations

Mastodon · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a piece on these pages this week, Naomi Schaefer Riley contemplates the warnings she will give her future college-bound daughter about the dangers to women on college campuses and the wisdom of not trusting anyone.

It was excellent advice — but it's not just women who have to be careful at college.

As the mother of a young son, I, too, am starting to plan some advice — about the dangers to guys of false accusations of sexual abuse. It's a real issue, and a scary one.

My message to my future college-bound son would be: Don't expect anyone to give you the benefit of the doubt. The tale of the Rolling Stone piece about a gang-rape-that-wasn't at a University of Virginia Phi Kappa Psi fraternity party is a case in point.
...
As in the case of the Duke lacrosse team years ago, everyone simply accepted — with zero evidence — that the brothers of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity were rapists. They were guilty merely because of the accuser's word. Never mind the boys' claims of innocence.

My son will spend his life hearing from me that women are — or should be — equal to men, that "she can do anything you can do." But when he gets to college, he'll find out that's not always the case.

In fact, men are held to higher standards than women — most notably, by the very women and "feminists" who demand equal treatment between the sexes.

Consider: If a man and woman are both drunk at college, the onus is almost certainly on him to head off any possible sexual interaction between them.

That they are both intoxicated does not matter: If he wakes up the next morning with regrets, her feelings may be hurt — but if she wakes up with regrets, he may soon find himself facing expulsion or maybe even jail.

It's not right, and it's not fair. The feminist in me hates that women are treated as less capable — less responsible for their actions — than men. As a mother who has a daughter as well as a son, I worry about what this says to each of them.'

Another Ugly Story of ‘Progressive’ Vigilantism

Mastodon · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The campus rape panic that dominated western media for well over two years suffered a severe blow in late 2014 thanks to the credulous reporting of hoax allegations in Rolling Stone. Those who had long harboured doubts about the panic, such as Glenn Reynolds and Emily Yoffe began to lend aid to long-time sceptics like Christina Hoff Sommers and Cathy Young. Today, Bloomberg columnists casually refer to this chapter of history as a moral panic. Meanwhile, colleges that embraced the panic by abandoning due process are facing a wave of lawsuits from aggrieved students.

This is all good news. But the focus on college campuses is limiting. It blinds us to the bigger picture. In truth, the “rape culture” panic spread far beyond the walls of universities, injecting an atmosphere of vigilantism into almost every community where both genders happened to mix. In all of these arenas, opportunists seized on the opportunity to ruin the reputation of innocent people on little more than hearsay. One of the most egregious examples, in fact, did not occur on a college campus but in the community of professional librarians.

The librarian, Joe Murphy, was publicly accused of being a ‘sexual predator’ by two colleagues on social media. This was followed up by blog posts urging his professional community to ban him from conferences, despite the fact that none of the allegations had been proven true.

In a blog post entitled “Time to Talk about Community Accountability” (translation: time to talk about vigilantism), librarian Nina de Jesus made a series of public allegations against Murphy, a “ubiquitous presence” on the library conference circuit. This followed a tweet by fellow librarian Lisa M. Rabey, who alleged that Murphy was a “known sexual predator”. Rabey’s followers on Twitter then joked about ruining Murphy’s career.'

"There Is ‘Sexist, Coded Language’ Against Hillary"

Mastodon · 29 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Introduction:

'MSNBC host Toure argued that there is “sexist, coded language” sometimes used to describe Hillary Clinton on Saturday’s “Up with Steve Kornacki.”

Toure, in a discussion about a list of sexist code words put out by a pro-Hillary Clinton group said that “there is this sort of sexist, coded language that we’ve talked about. We had somebody on ‘the Cycle,’ I think when you were on, where somebody referred to Hillary as ‘shrill,’ right? And we all understood that as one of these code words that people use against women that they’d never use against men…we do have to be careful about the way we talk about female politicians and not sort [use] those code words to say ‘hey, remember she’s a woman,’” although he did argue that the words on the list in question weren’t sexist code words.'

UK: This “No More White Men” in Universities Article Disappeared Pretty Damn Quick

Mastodon · 29 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'“White men should never hold elected positions in British universities again,” proclaims a bold headline in yesterday’s edition of Britain’s the Independent.

The article, so substandard, boorish, and offensive it was scrubbed from the website within 24 hours, asserts that student gripes such as government, fees, and lack of activism are the result of white men being elected to positions of authority within student unions.

The solution, states the author, is:

“...to ban white men and their activism dilettantism from student unions. We need powerful women and minority ethnic people to bring their passion back to the heart of student politics. Being a student union president should no longer be a place for privileged whiteboys to swing their dicks around before graduating into a world that is in no way affected by what they claim to fight for.”"

Nothing screams credibility like publishing “privileged whiteboys … swing their dicks around before graduating” on a serious news website, but fortunately our author, hiding behind the gutless, cowardly veil of anonymity, will be safe from backlash. Unfortunately, the editor who cleared this piece for publication may not be so lucky.'

'Enough is enough' goes way too far

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I applaud Gov. Andrew Cuomo for seeking to change the culture surrounding sexual assault on New York's college campuses. His "Enough is Enough" campaign is raising much-needed awareness about the dangers of complacency with regard to campus sexual assault and rightly highlights the shameful way many sexual assault survivors have been treated by the institutions of higher education that they — and their parents — trusted to keep them safe.

But as much as there is to celebrate in Cuomo's plan, his proposal to change New York law so that college students must proactively say "yes" to every step of a romantic encounter, every single time, goes too far.

Ever kiss your partner without getting verbal permission first? Even if he or she kisses you back, if you don't ask your partner and your partner doesn't say "yes," under this new proposal, if you are a college student, you will have committed sexual assault.

The consequences of being accused of sexual assault can be severe and life-changing. Touching a boyfriend or girlfriend's behind on a college campus in the midst of a heated make-out session that began with a verbal "yes" — but without express, verbal consent for that touch — would be grounds for expulsion, no matter how many times it's happened before.'

Civil rights complaints to U.S. Department of Education reach a record high

Matt · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Straining under a record number of civil rights complaints, the U.S. Department of Education wants to hire 200 more investigators to expand its civil rights division by 30 percent.

...

“Some of this is about the community believing that we’re here and we’re in business and we’re prepared to do the work,” said Catherine E. Lhamon, the department’s secretary for civil rights. Some of the increase, she said, was due to guidance her agency has issued, reminding the public as well as schools and universities of various protections under federal law and how to report illegalities.

Complaints of discrimination to the department have soared from 6,364 in fiscal 2009 to a record of 9,989 in the most recent fiscal year. Lhamon expects another record to be set when the current fiscal year ends in September. It is a sign that “we have the trust of the national community bringing to us their deepest hurts and asking for resolution,” she said.

...

Sex discrimination comprised 24 percent of total complaints. Lhamon said two individuals were responsible for filing more than 1,700 of those allegations of sex discrimination. She declined to identify them, citing confidentiality requirements. [Bold added; also see article here]

...

Agency officials and outside observers point to a key action by the Obama administration that probably triggered the increase in sex discrimination complaints. In 2011, the Office for Civil Rights issued guidance to that said sexual harassment of students, including acts of sexual violence, is a form of sex discrimination prohibited by Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. Up until that point, Title IX was commonly understood to ensure equal opportunity for girls and women in athletics and other educational programs and activities.

The guidance was part of an effort to make colleges and universities take campus sexual assault more seriously, Lhamon said. And after it was issued, complaints under Title IX soared.

Critics say the federal guidance was confusing, and that’s one factor behind the rise in complaints.'

Ex-Chicago State Admin: I Was Pressured to File False Harassment Claim Against Faculty Critic

Matt · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former high-level administrator at Chicago State University alleged in a statement filed yesterday in federal court that Chicago State President Wayne Watson pressured her to file a false sexual harassment complaint against Professor Philip Beverly, an outspoken faculty critic of Watson's administration.

According to the declaration of former Chicago State Vice President for Enrollment Management LaShondra Peebles, Watson was determined to silence Beverly by shutting down the blog, CSU Faculty Voice, which Beverly had founded. Contributors routinely posted documents that supported their allegations of mismanagement by the administration.

After pretextual accusations of trademark infringement failed to intimidate the professors into shutting down their blog, Chicago State hastily adopted a far-reaching cyberbullying policy on May 9, 2014. Ms. Peebles's declaration alleges that the policy was expressly designed to silence CSU Faculty Voice. In fact, shortly after the Board of Trustees passed the new policy, administrators used it to investigate Professor Robert Bionaz, another blog contributor, for harassment. The investigation was based, inexplicably, on a face-to-face conversation he had with Chicago State's spokesman.

Watson's series of actions eventually prompted Beverly and Bionaz to file a First Amendment lawsuit against Watson and others in July 2014. The suit was filed with support from the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) as part of its Stand Up For Speech Litigation Project.'

NPO: Nearly 50 Media Placements in Last Four Months

Matt · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'National Parents Organization's efforts to reform our family courts by bringing about shared parenting and parental equality are catching the attention of media across the nation.

For instance, since the release of our inaugural Shared Parenting Report Card, National Parents Organization has appeared in media across more than 20 different states with nearly 50 unique media reports, editorials and op-eds.

This unprecedented coverage includes newspaper, radio and television stories, opinion pieces on issues ranging from the Shared Parenting Report Card and Single Parents Appreciation Day to the fact that shared parenting legislation is now active in more than 17 different states across the nation. Please join us in celebrating these successful media outcomes!'

Pioneering gender-bias-in-courts studies on-line

Matt · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Two sources of information sent to me by a reader:

https://genderbiasstudy.wordpress.com/
and
BC COURT OF APPEAL CITATION

Thanks to the reader!

SAVE: Lesson from the UVA Gang-Rape ‘Disaster:’ Due Process Must be Restored for Campus Sex Cases

Matt · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'WASHINGTON / March 26, 2015 – In the aftermath of the recent Charlottesville, Virginia police report of “no evidence” of an alleged gang-rape of “Jackie” during a University of Virginia fraternity party, commentators on all points of the political spectrum are deploring the harmful effects arising from the incident.

SAVE, a national organization working to end sexual assault, has compiled a listing of over 50 commentaries on the Rolling Stone allegations. These editorials abhor how the Rolling Stone story has exacerbated rape-hysteria on college campuses, contributed to the wrongful expulsion of innocent college men, injured the reputation of the University of Virginia, wasted scarce law enforcement resources, undermined basic notions of journalistic integrity, and damaged the credibility of women claiming to be victims of rape.'

Scottish National Party vote in all-women and 'balanced' shortlists for next Holyrood election

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Scottish National party has voted heavily in favour of introducing all women shortlists and “balanced” regional lists, reversing decades-long opposition to positive action.

SNP officials refused to disclose the voting numbers and would not allow media into the debate – fearing it would be heated, but in a closed session of the party’s pre-election conference at the SECC in Glasgow delegates gave the party’s national executive three new powers to push women candidates forward.

The vote, which saw two amendments against the motion defeated, has empowered the NEC to:

- introduce an all-women shortlist for a Holyrood seat where the sitting MP stands down
- ensure that any open shortlist for a constituency seat has at least one women [sic] candidate
- introduce “balanced lists” on the regional list, where the list has to have an equal number of male and female candidates.

As this blog reported last week, some of these powers are conditional. The new constitution says the NEC “may” introduce balanced regional lists and “may” require all women shortlists, and it only – at this stage – effects the 2016 Holyrood [link added] election.'

#ThankYouEllenPao? Only if You Like Bullying, Vexatious Opportunists

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Ellen Pao, interim chief executive of Reddit, has lost her “landmark” gender discrimination case against venture capital firm Kleiner Perkins. Pao had alleged that the firm denied her a promotion and eventually fired her on account of her gender. But after deliberating for more than two days, a jury of six men and six women dismissed all charges brought by Pao against the firm.
...
Despite the verdict, feminist activists and their sympathizers in the tech media have sought to spin Pao’s defeat as a ‘win’ for women in Silicon Valley. They argue that Pao’s case has, somehow, shone a light on gender discrimination in tech, despite the fact that the jury found that Pao experienced none. It’s a contortion of which Houdini would be proud.

Let me give these over-eager gender activists some advice: you may want to think twice before adopting Pao as your victim du jour. Because evidence given during the trial reveals that she is anything but a victim. Work emails reveal her to be a callous and resentful employee who bullied colleagues and held grudges.'

The UVA Case and Rape-Hoax Denial

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Four months after Rolling Stone magazine published a shocking—and soon discredited—account of a fraternity gang rape at the University of Virginia, the Charlottesville police department has released the results of its investigation into the alleged assault. It comes as no surprise that “no substantive basis” was found for the claim by a student known as “Jackie” that she was raped by seven men at a fraternity party as a UVA freshman in September 2012. What’s striking is to what lengths both the police and many in the news media have gone to tiptoe around the obvious fact that the tale was a hoax by a serial liar. This dance of denial suggests that in the current ideological climate, it is nearly impossible to declare any allegation of rape to be definitely false.
...
Evading the facts does a disservice to Jackie, too. In a sane environment, she would face disciplinary charges and perhaps mandatory counseling. In a climate where saying that a woman is lying about rape is tantamount to “victim-blaming” and “rape culture”—and where some of Jackie’s fellow students say that even if her story “wasn’t completely true,” it helped bring attention to important issues—she is likely to remain mired in self-destructive false victimhood.

For the rest of us, this episode shows how extreme and irrational “rape culture” dogma has become, and how urgent it is to break its hold on public discourse. The current moral panic may be an overreaction to real problems of failure to support victims of sexual violence. But when truth becomes heresy, the pendulum has swung too far, with disastrous consequences for civil rights and basic justice.'

How Affirmative Consent Laws Criminalize Everyone

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This year, nearly all college students in New York and California started their spring semesters under a new state-mandated regime of sexual policing called affirmative consent ("yes means yes"). Under these policies, any student who cannot prove that he obtained active, ongoing, unambiguous consent to any sexual activity will automatically be guilty of violating campus sexual assault policies. These draconian new rules are binding only on college students. They do not apply to college faculties and administrators, and they certainly don't apply to the legislators who passed these laws.

Affirmative consent laws trivialize sexual assault by turning nearly everyone who has ever dated into a sexual offender. For example, if a student throws her arms around her boyfriend and kisses him without his permission, even if she has done this dozens of times before, she has violated affirmative consent policies. She can, at some later date, be hauled before a campus judiciary on charges of sexual assault. Victims of sexual assault should fear this new regime, because it will inevitably confuse rightful cases of abuse with capricious accusations.'

Australia: New Women-Only Tech Business Center Opens in Sydney

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'When entrepreneur Dr. Catriona Wallace wanted to grow her tech start-up and saw there were no shared workspaces specifically catering to women, she came up with a whole new business idea.

That business is The Ventura, Australia's first co-working space designed specifically for the needs of female entrepreneurs in the early stages of their careers in business.

The first such co-working space is located on Sussex Street in Sydney, with hopes to expand to other spaces across Sydney and Australia. It aims to provide an opportunity for entrepreneurs to enjoy a shared workspace without the heavily male-dominated culture that so many co-working spaces currently feature.
"I currently own three businesses and one of them, Flamingo, is a tech startup.
Last year we reached a stage where we needed our own space, but because rental prices in Sydney are very hard to manage in the early stages of a business I thought I would do what other startups do and investigate co-working spaces," Wallace told Women's Agenda.

"But when I started investigating our options, I just found them all to be very masculine – the majority of the people working in them were men and the culture felt very male-dominated. So I thought to myself, if I'm not comfortable here, where can the girls go?"

Wallace believes women entrepreneurs face unique challenges in the startup world, and need spaces that specifically cater to such needs.'

"The End of Male Supremacy"

Mastodon · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Women are not equal to men; they are superior in many ways, and in most ways that will count in the future. It is not just a matter of culture or upbringing. It is a matter of chromosomes, genes, hormones, and nerve circuits. It is not mainly because of how experience shapes women, but because of intrinsic differences in the body and the brain.

Do these differences account for all the ways women and men differ? No. Are all men one way and all women another? Also no. But none of those considerations seriously impede my argument or deflect its key conclusion: Women are superior in most ways that matter now.

And no, I do not mean what was meant by patronizing men who said this in the past — that women are lofty, tender, spiritual creatures. I mean something like the opposite of that. I mean that women are fundamentally pragmatic as well as caring, cooperative as well as competitive, skilled in getting their own egos out of the way, deft in managing people without putting them on the defensive, builders not destroyers. Above all, I mean that women can carry on the business of a complex world in ways that are more focused, efficient, deliberate, and constructive than men's because women are not frequently distracted by impulses and moods that, sometimes indirectly, lead to sex and violence. Women are more reluctant participants in both. And if they are drawn into wars, these will be wars of necessity, not of choice, founded on rational considerations, not on a clash of egos escalating out of control.'

Read about him here.

Canada: Memorial draws attention to PTSD risk among firefighters

fathers4fairness · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Memorial Serice today for 20 years of service firefighter vet - Kevin Hegarty's - who took his own life on March 1, focused attention on PTSD risk among firefighters and other Emergency Responders was held in Surrey B.C.

Hegarty, 53, was an acting captain and had been with the Surrey Fire Service for nearly 20 years.
...
Firefighters, police, military and other first-responders in emergency situations are among those who can suffer from job-related post-traumatic stress.'

He is among a number of suicides that have recently been reported across the country including that of Greg Turner, an Edmonton paramedic.

Good example of what feminists ought to be doing

Matt · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Instead of carrying on about the evils of peeing standing up, perhaps Swedish and indeed many other feminists can take a lesson from the example set here. When feminists start taking their (supposed) mission seriously, then maybe, just maybe, others will to. Until Ms. Wallström's example becomes typical of feminists instead of atypical, they will continue to remain exactly what they have been for years: the butt of jokes, but one that must be addressed head-on. After all, some jokes or butts thereof are no laughing matter. Excerpt:

'A few weeks ago Margot Wallström [link added], the Swedish foreign minister, denounced the subjugation of women in Saudi Arabia. As the theocratic kingdom prevents women from travelling, conducting official business or marrying without the permission of male guardians, and as girls can be forced into child marriages where they are effectively raped by old men, she was telling no more than the truth. Wallström went on to condemn the Saudi courts for ordering that Raif Badawi receive ten years in prison and 1,000 lashes for setting up a website that championed secularism and free speech. These were ‘mediaeval methods’, she said, and a ‘cruel attempt to silence modern forms of expression’. And once again, who can argue with that?

The backlash followed the pattern set by Rushdie, the Danish cartoons and Hebdo. Saudi Arabia withdrew its ambassador and stopped issuing visas to Swedish businessmen. The United Arab Emirates joined it. The Organisation of Islamic Co-operation, which represents 56 Muslim-majority states, accused Sweden of failing to respect the world’s ‘rich and varied ethical standards’ — standards so rich and varied, apparently, they include the flogging of bloggers and encouragement of paedophiles. Meanwhile, the Gulf Co-operation Council condemned her ‘unaccept-able interference in the internal affairs of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia’, and I wouldn’t bet against anti-Swedish riots following soon.

Yet there is no ‘Wallström affair’. Outside Sweden, the western media has barely covered the story, and Sweden’s EU allies have shown no inclination whatsoever to support her. A small Scandinavian nation faces sanctions, accusations of Islamophobia and maybe worse to come, and everyone stays silent. As so often, the scandal is that there isn’t a scandal.

It is a sign of how upside-down modern politics has become that one assumes that a politician who defends freedom of speech and women’s rights in the Arab world must be some kind of muscular liberal, or neocon, or perhaps a supporter of one of Scandinavia’s new populist right-wing parties whose commitment to human rights is merely a cover for anti-Muslim hatred. But Margot Wallström is that modern rarity: a left-wing politician who goes where her principles take her.

She is foreign minister in Sweden’s weak coalition of Social Democrats and Greens, and took office promising a feminist foreign policy. She recognised Palestine in October last year — and, no, the Arab League and Organisation of Islamic Co-operation and Gulf Co-operation Council did not condemn her ‘unacceptable interference in the internal affairs of Israel’. I confess that her gesture struck me as counterproductive at the time. But after Benjamin Netanyahu ruled out a Palestinian state as he used every dirty trick he could think of to secure his re-election, she can claim with justice that history has vindicated her.'

Artist Launches Anti-Circumcision Kickstarter with Hyperrealistic Foreskin Sculptures

Matt · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Italian artist Vincenzo Aiello is celebrating the foreskin—and protesting male circumcision with the aid of a Kickstarter campaign.

His project, titled "HUFO: The Missing Link" [link added] (shorthand for "HUman FOreskin") is dedicated to raising awareness about circumcision and the negative impact that circumcision can have on a man's emotional health and sex life.

Aiello creates hyperrealistic foreskin sculptures using silicon resin and is selling them, displayed in frames inspired by Leonardo da Vinci's Vitruvian Man, for $1,000 a pop as part of an "intactivist" Kickstarter campaign. ...

Smaller pledges will earn you a print or T-shirt showing the piece, which Aiello created after carefully studying circumcision surgeries to determine how the foreskin, dubbed "America's censored body part," is removed. For $10,000, the artist will build one of his signature mosaics in which the sculpture will be displayed.

The HUFO projects questions whether it's "ethical for parents to remove functional tissue from their children's bodies to conform to social or cultural norms," and compares the American propensity for male circumcision to widely decried African traditions of female circumcision. Aiello claims that the foreskin is important erogenous tissue, and that the surgery to remove it is painful and potentially traumatizing to infants.

"Circumcision has become so commonplace in the US that parents often forget that circumcision is a surgery," Aiello states on the Kickstarter page. "Every other surgery in Western medicine requires both compelling and urgent medical reasons to perform without consent."

Aiello, who was circumcised as an adult for undisclosed medical reasons, has also founded a research company called Foregen, dedicated to developing medical techniques that will successfully regenerate the foreskin.

With 42 days remaining, HUFO has already raised nearly $13,000 towards its $40,000 goal.'

Also see this page for this project covered in Israeli radio.

Film ‘The Hunting Ground’ Misrepresents Harvard Sexual Assault Statistics

Matt · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The project aimed to draw attention to the issue and create “activity for change,” according to Kirby Dick, the film’s writer and director whose previous work has been nominated for an Academy Award. Since its premiere at the Sundance Film Festival in January, the film has drawn national attention and received a number of favorable reviews. A New York Times review called the film a “must-watch work of cine-activism, one that should be seen by anyone headed to college and by those already on campus.” The Boston Globe gave it three and a half stars.

The film, however, presents at least some information about Harvard inaccurately.

In one sequence, a series of slides lists various schools and the number of sexual assaults reported there in a given time period compared to the number that led to expulsion. The film lists that from 2009-2013, Harvard College saw 135 cases of reported sexual assault, but only 10 expulsions.

Those numbers are misleading. According to Dick, filmmakers arrived at the 135 number through criminal statistics made public by Harvard as required by the Clery Act, but, contrary to what the film states, those numbers do not necessarily represent only incidents at Harvard College. The Clery Act statistics available specify on which campus at Harvard various crimes occurred, and whether they happened in a campus, residential, off-campus, or public setting, but they do not break down offenses by individual school.

Harvard College has roughly 6,400 students, while Harvard University as a whole includes about 20,000.'

The "University Diversity Scam" and its financial incentives

Matt · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The truth is hard to face sometimes, but at other times, not so hard. It's especially easy when you already had figured out what was going on. But I'll let the speaker in the video here do the talking.

College Men Litigate for Due Process

Mastodon · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Jump the log-in requirement by Googling the first paragraph and click on the first search result. Excerpt:

'The string of higher-education lawsuits over alleged violations of due process in sexual-assault cases is no surprise (“More Men Fight College Allegations of Sexual Assault,” U.S. News, March 20). College professors and deans lack the training and experience to investigate and fairly determine guilt and innocence. Charges of such major crimes are properly the domain of police and the courts.

The federal government has placed colleges in an impossible position. Title IX enforcers threaten schools for not aggressively prosecuting cases independent of the criminal-justice system. But bungled cases mean that the guilty walk and the innocent suffer, and that colleges will pay the price in civil lawsuits. The heavy burden—and responsibility—of playing detective, judge and jury in these serious matters is not one colleges could ever competently undertake.

In the important campaign to end sexual assault on campus, due-process rights remain the bulwark of a just and lawful society. It is ironic that the courts may have to teach that lesson to the federal government.'

McGill U student council demands reopening of women-only hours negotiations

Mastodon · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Legislative Council of the Students' Society of McGill University (SSMU) convened on March 26 for a meeting that lasted more than six hours. Some of the issues addressed included ongoing research into McGill's equitable hiring practices, SSMU's stance on the debate over women-only gym hours, anti-austerity mobilization, and opposition to the development of harmful military technology. Council also discussed the results of the recent online referendum on sustainability, and the motion on accessible education that failed to pass at the last General Assembly (GA) due to lack of quorum.

...

Also on the table was a motion brought forward by VP University Affairs Claire Stewart-Kanigan concerning the recent proposal to institute women-only hours at the university fitness centre. The motion asked McGill to reopen negotiations on this highly contentious issue, and work toward a compromise.

Arts and Science Senator Chloe Rourke expressed repeated concern that the portion recommending a compromise would alienate the hundreds of students who had strongly opposed the idea of women-only hours. Her concern was echoed by Rioux and a number of other councillors. Eventually, a motion to divide the question passed, and each part was voted on separately. The first clause for re-opening negotiations passed almost unanimously, while the second clause on working toward a compromise passed with four for, three against, and eight abstentions.'

"Rape, lies and political correctness"

Mastodon · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Does the cause of combating rape on college campuses require a willful blindness to false allegations?

That's the question raised by some reactions to last week's police report on the inquiry into shocking -- and discredited -- claims of a fraternity gang rape at the University of Virginia. Despite strong evidence of fabrication by the alleged victim, a student identified as "Jackie," victim advocates and many journalists have balked at calling this a hoax. In a particularly startling comment, Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, the New York Democrat leading the charge against campus sexual assault, has referred to criticism of Jackie as "victim-blaming."
...
Granted, Gillibrand's remarks partly reflect the failure of both the media and the Charlottesville police to call the story a fabrication rather than an unresolved case plagued by discrepancies. The police chief has stressed that the report, which is devastating to Jackie's claims, does not prove that she wasn't attacked; many media accounts have made no mention of the fake "Haven Monahan" messages. This reluctance to call Jackie's story a false allegation is rooted in political correctness, not fact.

Yet, as a national politician in the forefront of initiatives on this issue, Gillibrand has a special responsibility to get the facts straight. Otherwise, the message to victims of false accusations is that justice is not possible.'

Factual Feminist: Are men inferior to women? Let's check the data

Matt · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTube video here. Description: "Are women good, and men bad? How many times have you heard that women are wiser, kinder, more efficient, and just all around superior human beings? A never ending succession of books and news stories suggests they are. AEI scholar Christina Hoff Sommers looks at the evidence."

Yu v. Vassar College Case Summarily Dismissed

Matt · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Wow, I have read some really, really BAD judicial decisions in my life, but this one makes me feel like I'm getting ready to crash and bleed out. Seriously, read it and weep. Short version: Yu is male, therefore, he's guilty. It matters not one iota the exculpatory evidence or the double-standards being applied. I challenge anyone to locate a case wherein a female accused another female under the same conditions and the accussee was expelled, or a case of a male doing likewise to a male or a male to a female. It's only she-accuses-him cases that generate these kinds of embarrassingly ludicrous travesties of justice. Be sure to take some airsick meds before reading this one but keep a bucket handy nearby in case they don't kick in in time.

Oh yes, and about the ruling judge, Ronnie Abrams: she got her appointment upon recommendation from none other than Kirsten Gillibrand. Surprise, surprise! Not.

Woman jailed for false kidnapping and rape claim

Mastodon · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Leshia Ashmore, 51, of Ovett said that she was at a convenient store in Ellisville when she was taken at gunpoint and driven to an unknown location and forcibly raped.

Jones County officials launched an extensive investigation and found that Ashmore's allegations were not true.

Sheriff Alex Hodge said making false claims is a waste of resources and money for the sheriff's department and the Ellisville Police Department.

“Make no mistake, it is against the law to falsely report a crime, but not only does it waste our professional team's time and the tax payers' money, it also is a slap in the face to actual victims who muster up the last bit of strength he or she has to report an offense.” Hodge said, “The Jones County Sheriff's Department will pursue charges against Ashmore, because these were serious charges and investigated fully, taking valuable time away from legitimate cases.”'

Week-long Washington D.C. Event Protests Circumcision

Mastodon · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Passersby eyed an anatomically correct male doll fastened to a plastic contraption Thursday on the West Lawn of the Capitol. Christina Love, founder of Genital Autonomy of Western New York, explained to people that it's a circumstraint newborn immobolizer used to circumcise male newborns.

Washington, DC - infoZine - Scripps Howard Foundation Wire - Love and other genital rights activists or "intactivists," from the words intact and activist, protested against newborn male circumcision, the surgical removal of the foreskin from the penis, as part of Genital Integrity Awareness Week.

They marched Saturday from the Capitol to the White House where protesters chanted "not the family penis." The week concluded Monday with a White House sidewalk demonstration.'

"Silicon Valley: Where Men Are Wrong and Women Are Wronged"

Mastodon · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What I do doubt is that, with a few exceptions, women will beat men at their own game. They should be hell-bent on changing the playground, not worried about competing on the same over-trodden ground. The best woman VCs and entrepreneurs are listeners, collaborators and puzzle solvers. They bring an aesthetic and authenticity to their work. And now that the digital world is inextricably intertwined with the worlds of art, fashion, medicine, athletics, retail and more, they'll bring a holistic sensibility and a new discourse.

I'm sighing as I watch history repeating itself. Despite me joining leaning-in circles, writing for publications about women in technology, being a member of Women in CE, and taking on the personae of the woman's voice in a high tech world, not much has changed since I ran a male-dominated magazine in a male-dominated world. Men still swagger to the top; women fill the ranks of marketing and PR. It's the 2015 version of Mad Men. As digital projects become more collaborative and interdisciplinary with less of the "guy in the garage" mentality, women will bring their own stamp to technology.'

Due process denied: Judge finds against Vassar student accused of sexual assault

Matt · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On Tuesday, a summary judgment was issued in favor of Vassar. The judge in the case, Ronnie Abrams, was recommended to the federal bench by Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, D-N.Y., who has no problem labeling young men as rapists without any due process.

Abrams' dismissal of Yu's charges are based on the fact that Title IX does not require adequate due process rights to students accused of sexual assault. Thus, a school following Title IX cannot, in theory, violate a student's due process rights. In the alternative, because Vassar is a private college, due process rights do not apply.

Basically, schools can get away with branding young men as rapists (and avoiding problems from the Obama administration) for what reasonable people would not see as rape because of a flawed law.'

Teaching scandal reporting shows MSM bias

ThomasI · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Eleven educators sentenced and over 100 still under investigation. Nearly all were female. The head of the operation, also a woman, died a month ago. Yet if you Google this story, many of the pictures show images of the very few men who were involved. Excerpt:

'In a dramatic conclusion to what has been described as the largest cheating scandal in the nation's history, a jury here on Wednesday convicted 11 educators for their roles in a standardized test cheating scandal that tarnished a major school district's reputation and raised broader questions about the role of high-stakes testing in American schools.

On their eighth day of deliberations, the jurors convicted 11 of the 12 defendants of racketeering, a felony that carries up to 20 years in prison. Many of the defendants — a mixture of Atlanta public school teachers, testing coordinators and administrators — were also convicted of other charges, such as making false statements, that could add years to their sentences.'

Campus sex assault crash course: New York must not turn colleges into overseers of student sex lives

Mastodon · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'None of it was real. Not the fraternity party at the University of Virginia one September night in 2012. Not the mysterious student named “Haven” who led a freshman named Jackie into a trap. Not the gang rape in an upstairs room.

...

Swept away with the fictions should be the federal law that bars school officials from calling the cops without a student’s permission when the student reports a sexual assault.

Similarly, New York’s Legislature should stop Gov. Cuomo’s drive to enact an overreaching and unenforceable “yes means yes” policy that would turn every college in the state into an overseer of student sex lives.

Federal law makes trouble enough — including through a prohibition written into the so-called Clery Act that played out absurdly at UVA.'

A school that actually observed due process in a rape case gets flayed

Mastodon · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

Vassar, that quintessential liberal arts college – its homepage today features “a pivotal figure from Vassar’s LGBTQ history.”

Also, it’s a haven for rapists.

That’s the takeaway from a confused columnist – not even at Vassar, but the University of North Carolina’s Daily Tar Heel – who scolds the school for following due process.
...
She claims the panel that heard her case judged the accused student not guilty because “there was [not] enough evidence to prove that my perpetrator was aware that I was incapable of consent.” (This is noteworthy because Vassar was actually sued by an accused student for how he was treated during the school’s rape investigation.)

Whatever happened – these investigations generally aren’t made public unless they are subject to outside litigation, and Amicucci hasn’t outed her alleged rapist so he can give his side – the panel appears to have followed due process. But that’s not the point for social justice warriors like the Daily Tar Heel‘s Wilder:

"Whether the school in question is eight miles away or 570, it’s every student’s responsibility to keep putting pressure on schools to do whatever it takes to end assault on campus."

Even browbeat them for giving accused students some semblance of due process.'

SAVE E-lert: Tell THG: Cut the Lies

Matt · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

On April Fools' Day, SAVE is concerned with only one lie in particular--the one embedded multiple times in"The Hunting Ground" that one in five women are sexually assaulted on campus.

Such false statistics help justify slapshod and overreaching new laws that make campus sexual assault cases worse for all students involved.

Help us tell the film distributor, Jason Janego at Radius TWC, to cut the false rape number out of the film. The Hunting Ground needs to cut the lies!

Call (212) 845-8600 or email radius.info@weinsteinco.com

Because we refuse to be taken for fools.

Truly yours,

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Princeton professor opposes new policy for handling sexual misconduct allegations

Mastodon · 3 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Princeton University's new policy for handling allegations of sexual misconduct is bad for students, a university professor said Tuesday night.

Stanley Katz of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs said the policy, which creates a unique protocol for addressing sexual misconduct, is a departure from the way justice is typically administered in the U.S. legal system, as well as at universities.

"There are ordinarily generic norms and generic penalties," he said during a public discussion at a meeting of Princeton's literary and debating society.

In September, Princeton faculty voted overwhelmingly to overhaul university policy for handling allegations of sexual misconduct. The changes, recommended by a University committee, included a relaxation of the standard of evidence in such cases from "clear and persuasive," or highly probable, to "preponderance," meaning the allegation is more likely true than not.'

Doctors Re-Attach Part Of Baby’s Penis After Israeli Circumcision Accident

Mastodon · 3 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Urologists at Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem re-attached part of a baby's penis following a botched ritual circumcision, Israel Hayom reported today.

Five months ago, the mohel (ritual circumciser) cut part of the baby’s urethra during the circumcision and after the parents noticed profuse bleeding,the baby was rushed to Hadassah.

"The baby was admitted with severe bleeding, and we immediately proceeded to suture the affected area, under local anesthesia of course. The parents were understandably much more concerned than we were, and they had little hope. They have had a tormenting few months," Dr. Guy Hidas, a pediatric urologist, reportedly said, adding that 80% of the reattached tissue was successfully accepted by the baby’s body. "The baby will need at least one more surgery in the coming year, but it is unlikely that this will have long-term impact on his reproductive system," he said.'

Uganda: NGO urged to promote circumcising men to combat cervical cancer

Mastodon · 3 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Uganda Catholic Medical Bureau (UCMB), the health arm of the Uganda Episcopal Conference, has been urged to promote safe male circumcision as a weapon to fight the spread of cervical cancer in women.

Safe male circumcision (SMC) is the surgical removal of the foreskin (prepuce), the fold of skin that covers the head of the penis, done by qualified health workers using clean (sterile) equipment in a clean environment.

The call was made last week by Dr. Patrick Tusiime, District Health Officer (DHO) of Kabale at the closure of the two-day annual general meeting of UCMB held at Sharing Youth Centre, in Nsambya, a Kampala suburb.
...
"Circumcision will make our women safe. Although there is vaccination that can administered against HPV among girls at an early age, it is important for men to be circumcised," said Tusiime.'

Campus misandry

Mastodon · 3 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Imagine yourself in an academic setting where somebody makes an offhand remark that male writers tend to be self-centered. With no evidence or argument, this statement is biased and uninformed, but people are entitled to their opinions.

Now further imagine that the same person then says that the first person singular “I” in the writing of male authors is like an erect penis directed at us from every page.

This incident happened the week before spring break in a discussion at the University of Hawai‘i at Mānoa.

For most in higher education today, an event like this would hardly be surprising. However, what made the scene difficult to believe is that nobody challenged it: We let it pass as though nothing had happened while a few heads nodded in polite approval.

This is a problem because complacency perpetuates and legitimizes injustice. For the sake of harmony, we should speak against bigotry in all forms. Disparaging men is just as wrong as degrading women or any other demographic. Crossing this line is where freedom ends and hate-speech begins.
...
Much of academia’s “man problem” carries over from times when it was warranted to speak against patriarchy. Scholars made careers by discussing legitimate issues of male privilege and asymmetric gender relations. Social conservatism and chauvinism were acknowledged. As the movement gained momentum, however, people became comfortable with below-the-belt qualitative statements, like the one above.'

Canada: Woman arrested for allegedly making false rape claim

Mastodon · 3 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Close to two months ago, Carole Thomas went public with a claim she had been raped in Longueuil back in October 2014.

She told Global News, and other media outlets in Montreal, she was attacked in the back seat of a luxury car on Parc Industriel Street.

What was particular about Thomas' story is that she said the assault happened about 48 hours before the murder of Jenique Dalcourt, and relatively close to the bike path where the young woman was killed.

In a one-on-one interview with reporter Domenic Fazioli, Thomas also said detectives "ignored" her case.'

University Football Player's DV Accuser Recants Accusations, Arrested

Mastodon · 3 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

A woman who accused a football player recruited by the Alabama Crimson Tide of assaulting her has now recanted and was subsequently charged with filing a false report.

According to AL.com, the accusation led to the arrest Saturday night of Jonathan Taylor, a defensive tackle on charges of domestic violence and assault. She called police Monday to recant her accusation and confirmed she filed a complaint under false pretenses the next day.

She was sent to county jail, but has since posted bond.

When police arrested Taylor, a six-foot-four, 335-pound defensive tackle, they found damage done to the 24-year-old woman's belongings as well as minor injuries on her neck, AL.com reported. At the time she said Taylor was responsible for both.
...
Kip Hart, Tuscaloosa County Metro Homicide Unit assistant commander, told ESPN the physical evidence supported Taylor's arrest, though the woman's recanting has not closed the investigation. An expert on domestic violence cases, he said it is common for victims to recant and in this one investigators are "just scratching the surface of what's going on."'

A university student's take on how to improve adjudication of sexual misconduct

Matt · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I was arrested on Oct. 3, 2013 after 3:30 p.m. in the parking lot by Wilson Hall. According to the charges, I was accused of felony abduction with intent to defile and felony rape of my ex-girlfriend sometime between March 1 and June 1, 2012 in Fairfax County. At that moment, I faced the harrowing possibility of two life sentences for a crime I did not commit. Once in jail, I received a letter from Dean of Students Allen Groves, from which I learned that, in conjunction with the criminal charges, I was also put on an interim suspension and faced charges through the University Judiciary Committee, even though the University had contact neither with the complainant — who has never been enrolled at U.Va. — nor the Fairfax County police. I also apparently had 48 hours to appeal the interim suspension upon notification of my status, which seemed impossible to do from my jail cell and especially since my bail was not guaranteed.

...

How can the University fairly evaluate a case in any circumstance if a complaining witness is not even part of the University community? Universities, as educational institutions, do not have the ability to subpoena witnesses, nor do they have the human or material resources to meticulously investigate these kinds of issues. Having an external complainant further complicates that. Title IX and universities have important obligations to protect students, which is why the abolishment of these university disciplinary systems is unlikely, but if universities currently have the right to adjudicate cases that involve external complainants, then anyone at any university should have the right to file a complaint at any school despite the offense, regardless of that person's affiliation with that school. There is no consistency in schools' policies since it is evident that someone outside of U.Va. can make a complaint on a student within the University community and not be held accountable for showing up to trial or cooperating with University investigators. Yet, this does not seem to be true at every University in the United States. There is also no recourse for me against this bad faith accusation, since my complainant's university makes it very challenging for me to bring forth a complaint. Title IX and university disciplinary systems are intended to support the right to an education for all their students, but in my case they did just the opposite, undermining my rights by ruling against me before my case had come to court and denying my right to a place in our community and an education.'

SAVE Calls for Removal of Bogus ‘One-in-Five’ Rape Statistic from The Hunting Ground

Matt · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, a national organization working to end campus sexual assault, is calling on producers of The Hunting Ground to remove a rape statistic featured in the movie that is known to be false. The Hunting Ground makes the claim that 20% of college women are sexually assaulted.

Numerous authoritative sources have refuted the 20% number:

1. The U.S. Department of Justice reports a college woman’s risk of sexual assault is under 1% each year.

2. The Washington Post Fact Checker assigned a single Pinocchio to the one-in-five claim.

3. The New York Times Editorial Board described the source of the statistic as “a flawed 2007 study based on undergraduates at just two unnamed public universities.”

4. Writing in Time magazine, Christopher Krebs, lead researcher of the cited 2007 study, explained:
“First and foremost, the 1-in-5 statistic is not a nationally representative estimate of the prevalence of sexual assault, and we have never presented it as being representative.”'

Why aren't we taking rape seriously?

Matt · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There was a time when rape and sexual assault were considered some of the most abhorrent crimes imaginable. No more.

Now, at least on college campuses, rape and sexual assault are considered mere disciplinary matters, no different than plagiarism or theft from a dorm. To non-college students, they are considered crimes.

You would think the issue was being taken seriously, given the mattress-carrying demonstrations and numerous marches with hand-made signs spouting catchy slogans like "non-consensual sex is rape." But according to the activists, the solution to this problem — this so-called rape culture — is not to send serious crimes to the police, but to campus courts where the worst an accused student can face is expulsion.

The "seriousness" of the issue is addressed not by prosecuting and punishing offenses appropriately, but by removing due process rights from accused students. The preferred method is to take the word of all accusers as gospel, lower the burden of proof, and presume guilt on the part of the accused. This all makes it much easier to brand young men as "rapists" without having to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt.'

Circumcision is genital mutilation

Matt · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The practice of circumcision has been so normalized in our society that we forget that the above statement is factually sound: we are allowing the systematic mutilation of the genitals of almost half of our population. If this is true, then why does America circumcise over 80% of its penis-slinging population while other developed countries, including those in western Europe and East Asia only circumcise approximately 20% of males?

America's high circumcision rate is generally attributed to hysteria surrounding the practice. John Harvey Kellogg (maker of Kellogg's cornflakes), who believed it would prevent boys from masturbating, succeeded in popularizing it in the early 20th century. Doctors in this era also believed it helped prevent syphilis, which has since been disproven, according to the National Institutes of Health. Because of this misinformed belief, circumcision became compulsory in the military during both world wars. Once such a high proportion of the population was circumcised, fathers would generally have their infants circumcised simply because they had been circumcised as well, causing a steady circumcision rate throughout the 1900s.

Today, the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) recommends snipping every infant that has a penis to snip; their claim is that it helps mitigate the transmission certain STDs. They claim that HPV — which has already been vaccinated against — is among the diseases in which transmission is slightly decreased among circumcised people. Genital herpes is another disease purported to be affected, but it's already infecting an estimated 1 in 6 Americans, meaning a mild decrease in transmission rate wouldn't have much of a demonstrable benefit for the American population. Lastly, human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) is the most harmful disease with a transmission rate that is slightly reduced by circumcision. However, this only applies to vaginal intercourse — so, even according to the CDC, this doesn't even remotely affect the 78% of new HIV cases in America attributed to men who have sex with men. Ultimately, the claim that circumcising the entirety of the penis-having population will have a significant reduction in STD transmission doesn't appear to be very plausible.'

Slate's "Dear Prudie" rationalizes to give ethical pass to women who got pregnant "on the sly"

Matt · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. The response is typical of most people's to the matter. It's this kind of reaction that allows so many women to feel it's all well and good to engage in fraud and subterfuge around this topic. Letting "Dear Prudie" know how you feel about her response at prudence@slate.com may do some good. Excerpt:

'...But your act doesn't make you a monster, nor do I think there's any benefit to enlightening everyone now. Both you and Ben rose to the occasion and neither of you would express regret that you're parents to Holly. Ben has been Holly's father for 13 years; even were he to find out about your trickery I can't imagine he would now look upon his daughter as the demon seed. It would just be one more confirmation that you and he never belonged together. At this late date, however, your coming clean would only cast a shadow over your character. You are deeply remorseful for what sounds like a singular act of substantial deceit. There's nothing to be gained by telling your husband and making him uneasy about your essential honesty...You and your friend are also hardly the only women to deliberately get pregnant without letting the man in on your plan, as objectionable as that behavior is. As for your friend, since there are other, straightforward ways to find a sperm donor, how sad that she preferred to make an unwitting stranger the father of her child.'

Canada: John Furlong case shows how easily sexual abuse accusations can ruin lives

fathers4fairness · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Beverly Mary Abraham, Grace Jessie West and Daniel Morice: let their names stand as stark evidence of the kid-glove treatment so often given the modern accuser.

In 2013, these three aboriginal people filed civil lawsuits against the former Vancouver Olympics boss John Furlong, alleging, in the most lurid detail, how he had sexually and physically abused them while they were students at Immaculata Elementary school in Burns Lake, B.C., and he was a young volunteer teacher.

This week, the last of the suits — Mr. Morice's — was dismissed by B.C. Supreme Court Justice Elliott Myers. As it turns out, Mr. Morice received $120,822 from Ottawa in compensation for similar abuse allegedly committed by another man at a residential school in a different town during the same time period he claimed in the civil suit that Mr. Furlong had been abusing him.
...
Ms. West's case was tossed in February by Supreme Court Justice Miriam Gropper, who concluded that on the evidence, Ms. West "did not ever attend Immaculata."
...
Yet the vaunted fourth estate, mostly adheres to the conventions of assuming to believe accusers, especially if they are female or native or from an otherwise marginalized group.
...
This is the growing evidence that the mere levelling of an allegation of any sort of sexual impropriety is enough to destroy a career, and a life.'

Advice For College Students Seeking To Stop Campus Misandry

Matt · 5 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

New page added under the "Main Menu" entitled Advice For College Students Seeking To Stop Campus Misandry. I thought after fielding an inquiry about this topic recently via email that creating a "Main Menu" entry on it was a good idea.

Only fighting feminists on campus is going to get on-campus feminism to start contracting. Eventually it takes boots on the ground to secure victory. As long as no one even tries on a pair of boots on our college campuses, sooner rather than later they will become the sort of "man-free zones" so many feminists happily dream of every night.

Encouraging male college students to get busy against campus feminism is nothing but good and necessary to stopping it.

"Hillary Clinton hit Bill in the head with a book after Monica affair"

Mastodon · 5 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'During the height of President Clinton's Monica Lewinsky scandal, a White House maid entered the bedroom to clean and was shocked to find the president and first lady's bed covered in blood.

The blood belonged to the president, who said publicly that he "hurt himself running into the bathroom door in the middle of the night."

But the White House resident staff believed differently. As one worker told author Kate Anderson Brower, "We're pretty sure [Hillary Clinton] clocked him with a book."

...

"The couple sometimes got into pitched battles, shocking the staff with their vicious cursing, and sometimes they went through periods of stoney silence," writes Brower.

Florist Ronn Payne recalls seeing two butlers listening through the door at a "vicious" argument in the West Sitting Hall.

"All of a sudden, he heard the first lady bellow, 'goddamn bastard!' at the president — and then he heard someone throw a heavy object across the room. The rumor among the staff was that she threw a lamp."'

Rolling Stone Article on Rape at University of Virginia Failed All Basics, Report Says -- Magazine retracts story

Mastodon · 5 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Rolling Stone magazine retracted its article about a brutal gang rape at a University of Virginia fraternity after the release of a report on Sunday that concluded the widely discredited piece was the result of failures at every stage of the process.

The report, published by the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism and commissioned by Rolling Stone, said the magazine failed to engage in “basic, even routine journalistic practice” to verify details of the ordeal that the magazine’s source, identified only as Jackie, described to the article’s author, Sabrina Rubin Erdely.

On Sunday, Ms. Erdely, in her first extensive comments since the article was cast into doubt, apologized to Rolling Stone’s readers, her colleagues and “any victims of sexual assault who may feel fearful as a result of my article.”'

"Religious Freedom Cafe" and its parallel to the women-only spaces trend

Matt · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This video was created to show the analogous situation between discriminating against people due to skin color and doing likewise based on sexual orientation when deciding whether or not to sell services to them. It struck me, upon seeing it, that the trend in women-only spaces creation and scheduling of otherwise public services and/or spaces also seems to fit. Watch this video, first imagining that the discriminated-against man in the video is a man known instead to be gay and he is being told to leave for that reason. Next, imagine the cafe to be owned and occupied exclusively by women and the owner telling the man he has to leave because men are not served therein due to deeply-held feminist beliefs, or that other customers paid for the females-only space, or whatever. Still don't think the occasional women-only hotel floor or restaurant or subway car is "so bad"?

On Reuniting With My Daughter

el cid · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This is a personal story that I wanted to share with the readers on this forum.

I'll start with the bad news: In February, my dad passed away. In March, my mom passed away. I have to be frank: those were both tough losses for me. I loved them both and am still grieving their loss.

After my father's death, I received an e-mail from one of my daughters from whom I had been estranged for twenty-plus years. The background: I have three daughters from my first marriage which ended in a bitter divorce. My ex made false allegations of sexual abuse against me, which my daughters eventually came to believe were true. They were not true, but as a result of those accusations my daughters would no longer speak with me. Two of my daughters still will not speak with me, but the one daughter and I were reunited in late February. It was a tearful, joyful reunion, with the past being left in the past. It was truly like a scene out of a movie: we cried, we hugged, we talked, we spent the day together. We are now in contact on a regular basis. We talk regularly (she lives 3 hours away) and she was very supportive when my mom passed. She was even able to speak over the phone to "grandma" before she passed.

Another wonderful aspect to this story: I found out I have two grandsons. I have not yet been able to spend a lot of time with them, but hope to in the near future.

This has truly been a miracle for me. I share this story because I know there are fathers on this forum who may have become estranged from their children. I want them to know there is hope. After more than 20 years, I thought I would never see any of my daughters again. If this can happen to me after 20 years, it can happen to you. It is difficult to express the joy I felt the day I reunited with my daughter. And I still have hope that perhaps I can reunite someday with my other two daughters.

Keep the faith, guys. Miracles do happen.

el cid

U-Va. fraternity announces lawsuit against Rolling Stone

Mastodon · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The University of Virginia chapter of Phi Kappa Psi announced Monday that the fraternity house will file a lawsuit against Rolling Stone, calling the magazine's reporting that described an alleged gang-rape by some of its members "reckless."

The lawsuit comes a day after Rolling Stone editors retracted a Nov. 19 story "A Rape on Campus," that portrayed the chilling account of brutal sexual assault allegedly occurring in the Phi Kappa Psi house at U-Va. in 2012. A Columbia University report issued Sunday described significant lapses by the magazine's staff while reporting the gang-rape allegations and the story's writer, Sabrina Rubin Erdely, and the publication's managing editor, Will Dana, apologized for the deeply flawed account. But the fraternity noted that Erdely did not apologize directly to the Phi Psi chapter at U-Va.'

"The Media Is Stunned By Aftermath Of UVA Rape Story Investigation"

Mastodon · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'MSNBC's Joe Scarborough said early Monday morning that because of the magazine's strong reputation, the incident has actually pushed the conversation around rape on college campuses "to the forefront."

What seemed to really stun some readers and media critics was that no staff members were fired as a result of the disaster.

NBC's Willie Geist said on "Morning Joe" that it was "jaw-dropping" that writer Erdely is keeping her job.

CNN's Brian Stelter touched on that very point in a post on Monday headlined "No one fired at Rolling Stone. Really?"'

"The report certainly is embarrassing," he wrote. "But what some might call ineptitude on the part of Rolling Stone, others might call a show of loyalty and a second chance for the staff."

Fallout from Rolling Stone feared by advocates for sex assault victims

Mastodon · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The attention the Rolling Stone article generated has caused some concern among victim advocates.

"Going to the media is not at all easy for victims.... It's not at all something to take lightly," said Sharmili Majmudar, executive director of Rape Victim Advocates, a Chicago-based nonprofit that assists sex assault victims. "There can be fallout when speaking out and this incident has magnified just that."

Majmudar said she is concerned about Jackie -- whose identity was not in the Columbia report -- and women who are in similar situations down the road.

"Sexual violence is something that's real and happens often on college campuses. Survivors must be protected and feel that they can speak out," Majmudar said. "I just, again, fear that the fallout from this could affect future survivors from telling their stories."

Sheila Coronel, a dean of academic affairs at Columbia University, emphasized in comments Monday that the alleged victim is not at all to be blamed.'

"Rolling Stone Officially Withdraws UVA Story, Blames Rape Victims"

Mastodon · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The editors at Rolling Stone have largely laid the blame at the feet of “Jackie,” the UVA student whose allegations of a brutal gang rape at a fraternity house formed the central narrative of Erdely’s story.

Back in December, in the magazine’s first public statement distancing itself from Erdely’s reporting, managing editor Will Dana wrote that “we have come to the conclusion that our trust in her was misplaced.” Sean Woods, who personally edited the story, takes a similar tact in the magazine’s report of its decision to retract Erdely’s article. “Ultimately, we were too deferential to our rape victim. We honored too many of her requests in our reporting. We should have been much tougher,” Woods said.'

‘Hitler Made a Difference’: The Liberal Gang Rape of Journalism

Mastodon · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We therefore know that (a) Jackie is a liar, (b) feminist claims of a campus “rape epidemic” are false, and (c) Rolling Stone was willing to publish a libelous article based on Jackie’s lies in order to “prove” that there is what the Associated Press called “a hidden culture of sexual violence” at one of our nation’s leading public universities.

Lies, lies, all lies, a baseless fiction from start to finish.

What has actually been exposed is an “epidemic” that few members of the media are willing to acknowledge, namely the pervasive liberal bias that has crippled and discredited the profession of journalism in America, turning reporters and editors into political hacks who are willing to publish fiction if this is what is necessary to advance the agenda of the Democratic Party. It is certainly no secret that claims of a Republican “war on women” helped Barack Obama win re-election in 2012, nor is it a secret that Hillary Clinton is likely to be the Democratic presidential nominee in 2016.

What better way to exploit the political “gender gap” than to claim that college girls are being raped en masse, and then to suggest that the solution to this problem could be summarized in two words: “VOTE DEMOCRAT!”'

Misleading allegations lead to displaced blame

Mastodon · 6 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Does the cause of combating rape on college campuses require a willful blindness to false allegations?

That's the question raised by some reactions to last week's police report on the inquiry into shocking — and discredited — claims of a fraternity gang rape at the University of Virginia. Despite strong evidence of fabrication by the alleged victim, a student identified as "Jackie," victim advocates and many journalists have balked at calling this a hoax. In a particularly startling comment, Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, the New York Democrat leading the charge against campus sexual assault, has referred to criticism of Jackie as "victim-blaming."
...
Appearing on WCNY radio's "Capitol Pressroom" show on March 24, Gillibrand correctly noted that the collapse of this case should not undermine efforts to ensure student safety on campus. But she also deplored the negative attitudes expressed toward Jackie, saying that "victim-blaming, or shining the spotlight on her for coming forward, is not the right approach." (Who is the "victim" here, other than the fraternity smeared as a haven for rapists?)

She also warned that calling for sanctions against the young woman was "inappropriate" and would send the wrong message: "One of the challenges with survivors of sexual trauma and rape is that they often don't want to actually participate with law enforcement because they don't think justice is possible. They don't think they will be believed; they think they'll be blamed."

Later, Gillibrand admitted some rape charges are false and that it's important to protect the accused. But how can such protections be effective if refusing to believe a self-proclaimed survivor is depicted as an injustice and if blaming a proven serial liar is inappropriate?

Granted, Gillibrand's remarks partly reflect the failure of both the media and the Charlottesville police to call the story a fabrication rather than an unresolved case plagued by discrepancies. The police chief has stressed that the report, which is devastating to Jackie's claims, does not prove that she wasn't attacked; many media accounts have made no mention of the fake "Haven Monahan" messages. This reluctance to call Jackie's story a false allegation is rooted in political correctness, not fact.'

How to deal with false rape allegations

Mastodon · 7 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In some studies, “A case can be classified as ‘baseless’ if, for example, a victim reports an incident that, while truthfully recounted, does not meet, in the eyes of investigators, the legal definition of a sexual assault,” Lisak and his colleagues write. “This classification is clearly distinct from a case in which a victim deliberately fabricates an account of being raped, yet the ‘unfounded’ category is very often equated with the category of ‘false allegation.’” A 1992 study of 302 rape reports made to law enforcement conducted by the British Home Office drew a distinction between cases that were “no-crimed” — or neither investigated further nor prosecuted — from reports that were determined to be false allegations. A 2005 study by the same organization dealt with alleged assaults that were classified as false reports that were deemed not credible because the alleged victim was mentally ill, intoxicated, or told inconsistent stories, which can be a sign of trauma.

...

As Drs. Kimberly Lonsway and Lisak, in collaboration with retired police Sgt. Joanne Archambault, wrote in a 2009 briefing for the National Center for the Prosecution of Violence Against Women, “many ‘real’ false reports involve only a vaguely described stranger, so the victim can receive the caring attention of law enforcement officials and social service providers without the fear that someone will be arrested. Clearly, these cases can be extremely frustrating for criminal justice professionals, but they are probably best handled with appropriate referrals for social services rather than prosecution for filing a false report.”

It would be irresponsible to speculate which category the subject of “A Rape on Campus” falls into without further hard evidence. But the people who are concerned about the harm she may have done to the reputations of a group of young men shouldn’t compound the damage she’s caused by invoking her to discredit other people who may be in desperate need of help.'

"Boys are sinking. Let's throw them a doll"

Mastodon · 7 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminism has been good for girls, and that's something to celebrate. We take it for granted now that a girl can grow up to be just about anything her abilities and drive allow, including corporate titan, combat troop, or even president of the United States. In fact, in some circles, opting to stay home and raise children is now a countercultural choice, much as wearing pants and going to the office was 70 years ago.

Boys are doing fine, for the most part. But they're falling behind, at least in school, according a whole body of research and most recently a major report on 15-year-old students and gender by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a club of wealthier nations. In particular, more boys are failing spectacularly than girls are.
...
Today, Legos is selling pink boxes of Legos "Friends" for girls alongside blue boxes of (increasingly co-branded) Legos for boys — as my colleague Elissa Strauss noted recently. Boys play construction and ninjas and pirates and superheroes; girls build relationships. Strauss makes a strong case for why "girl" play is good for boys' development — but it's largely an aspirational case at this point. Nobody would think twice if a girl still decided she wanted to play with Lego spaceships — they would probably, and rightly, applaud. But imagine the looks if a boy wanted to buy some Lego Disney Princesses.

So what? Let's return to the OECD report. "Whether because of socialization or innate differences, boys are more likely than girls, on average, to be disruptive, test boundaries, and be physically active — in other words, to have less self-regulation," the study's authors write, citing previous research. "As boys and girls mature, gender differences grow even wider.... As teenagers, boys tend to be less self-disciplined than girls: They are less likely than girls to be able to delay gratification, plan ahead, set goals, and persist in the face of frustrations and setbacks."'

Owing Child Support Can Be Lethal

el cid · 8 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. This is another big story about a black man shot by a white cop. The cop now faces murder charges:

"Dramatic video that shows a white South Carolina police officer shooting a fleeing black man after a traffic stop has led authorities to file a murder charge against the officer amid public outrage over a series of deaths of unarmed black men at the hands of law enforcement agents."

So why did the man run?

"Walter Scott Sr. told the NBC "Today Show" that his son may have run because he owed child support and didn't want to go back to jail."

You may not want to watch the video. They say it's brutal.

Did Girls Conspire To Put 'Player' In Jail With False Rape Charges?

Mastodon · 8 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Lawyers for Tyler Kost say that 13 girls conspired against the high school teen with false rape allegations because they wanted to "teach him a lesson" for being "a player." The defense claims that the girls referred to the movie John Tucker Must Die, where ex-girlfriends take revenge against their ex-boyfriend, in reference to Tyler and note that the girls say "Tyler needs to be taught a lesson." The defense says there is vast evidence that suggests the rape allegations are false, including over 98,000 pages of social media evidence are proof.

...

The defense lawyers claim that the girls conspired to "teach Tyler a lesson" for being a known "player" at the school. The defense claims the girls were inspired by the teen movie John Tucker Must Die to seek revenge. The defense has entered into evidence over 98,000 pages of social media interactions including group chats between three of the alleged rape victims and three witnesses. The chats indicate that the girls were working together to build a case against Tyler with one girl exclaiming, "This is going to be so much fun!" when discussing taking down the teen boy.

...

KSAZ reports that in the group chat message the girls planned to have a movie date together to watch John Tucker Must Die and "plan." The girls indicate that they will "f with his mind and car" with other girls noting it was going to "be fun."'

Domestic violence a men’s issue: CBRM police chief

Mastodon · 8 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A new poster campaign targeting men’s attitudes and behaviours toward domestic violence, called Don’t Be That Guy, is aimed squarely at stopping the problem at its root cause, says Cape Breton Regional Police Chief Peter McIsaac.

“Domestic violence is something that we need to address on the front end, before it even starts,” McIsaac said Wednesday at a campaign launch sponsored by Men Against Domestic Violence.

“And it’s there that men, in particular, have a very big role to play. Traditionally, domestic violence and sexual violence, the conversation has all been about women. It’s been made a women’s issue.

“But research tells us it’s really a man’s issue. Over 90 per cent of perpetrators in domestic violence situations are men.”'

Women have won the gender revolution

Mastodon · 8 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Summary: This post on our series about the gender roles revolution looks at the result of the social and tech trends — women have won. They now have a competitive superiority in a wide range of factors, which is bringing them to dominance in US society. Changes take time to upset existing hierarchies, but the trend is unquestionable.
...
The sole domains still dominated by men are paternity and war. Artificial insemination replaces men in the former, supported by women's growing economic strength and government aid for single mothers.

As for war, other than infantry and a few similar physically demanding specialties, women can do just as well. Men supremacists advocating male-only wars are reduced to saying that women in war just will not work — just as Blacks couldn't fight, and letting homosexuals into the military (openly) would be The End of the US Armed Forces. Good luck with that. This also requires ignoring the long role of woman fighting on the front lines of so many 4GWs during the past century.

The evidence can no longer be disputed imo. The pushback nicely illustrates that, as in this rebuttal at The Atlantic by Chloe Angyal (editor at Feministing). First she gives some really weak evidence, citing one TV show. If you take TV that literally, the US is overflowing with serial murders and jihadist terrorists.'

Mom convicted of poisoning son gets break on murder sentence

Mastodon · 8 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A woman convicted of fatally poisoning her 5-year-old son with salt in his hospital feeding tube got a break on her murder sentence Wednesday because she suffers from a mental illness she has refused to acknowledge, the judge said.

Lacey Spears, 27, of Scottsville, Kentucky, was sentenced to 20 years to life in prison for the 2014 death of Garnett-Paul Spears at a suburban New York hospital.

...

Acting state Supreme Court Justice Robert Neary said Spears' crime was "unfathomable in its cruelty" and brought her son "five years of torment and pain." But he said he was not imposing the maximum 25 years to life because "one does not have to be a psychiatrist to realize you suffer from Munchausen by proxy."

He said he was offering "something you did not exhibit toward your son -- mercy."

Munchausen by proxy, now known clinically as factitious disorder imposed on another, is a disorder in which, in some cases, caretakers purposely but secretly harm children and then enjoy the attention and sympathy they receive.'

SAVE E-lert: Let's Make Rolling Stone Apologize

Matt · 9 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Columbia Journalism School, hired by Rolling Stone, just issued a "damning" report of the magazine's coverage of the UVA "Jackie" story. And Rolling Stone just retracted the story.

But while the story is now declaratively false, the journalist, Sabrina Erdely, apologized to the readers and victims of sexual assault, but NOT to the falsely accused.

As UVA President Theresa Sullivan has noted, "Rolling Stone falsely accused some University of Virginia students of heinous, criminal acts."

Contact the Rolling Stone editors and demand a real apology on behalf of the young men whose reputations were torn to shreds.

Email: rseditors@rollingstone.com now.

Let's get a real apology.

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Save our boys without being anti-girl

Mastodon · 9 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I just finished reading “Boys Adrift: The Five Factors Driving the Growing Epidemic of Unmotivated Boys and Underachieving Young Men,” written by Dr. Leonard Sax after years of seeing sullen boys in his medical practice fail to thrive.

“From kindergarten to college, (boys are) less resilient and less ambitious than they were a mere 20 years ago. In fact, a third of men ages 22-34 are still living at home with their parents — about a 100 percent increase in the past 20 years,” Sax wrote. His book came out in 2007, when my own two sons were far from adolescence and hadn’t yet developed a visceral hatred of school. The numbers are even higher today.

In “Boys Adrift,” Sax identified several factors creating a toxic environment for boys that is driving their decline: a misguided overemphasis on reading and math as early as kindergarten, too much time playing hyper-real video games, an overreliance on medication for attention deficit disorders and a popular-culture devaluation of masculinity.'

Long-term study finds no link between videogames and sexism

Mastodon · 9 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Breitbart readers are no doubt sceptical of hasty claims to scientific authority, so allow me to explain why this study is worth paying attention to. Firstly, it was a long-term study, taking place over the course of three years. Much of the confusion around whether games cause violence is due to the confusion of short-term effects with long-term ones. It was once erroneously argued that short-term increases in aggression following certain video games proved they cause violence. Later studies found that these effects did not persist over time. The fact that this study took place over three years allowed the researchers to separate long-term effects from short-term ones.

The study also involved a very substantial sample size. This is important, as small samples are more likely to be skewed by outlier effects. Attempting to generalize the results of small studies to the wider population can lead to whopping great errors, such as the notorious “1-in-5″ statistic that spread panic about sexual assault on US campuses. The smaller your sample, the less reliable your results.

But enough about methodology. If you want a full analysis of the strengths of the study, this post from a statistician and #gamergate supporter provides an excellent explanation of why this study is so significant. Let’s turn to what it means for the wider debate.'

"In praise of women only spaces"

Mastodon · 9 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Over the Easter weekend, I travelled to Sydney with a group of girlfriends. We stayed in a small apartment, went to the beach and took turns cooking breakfast for each other every morning. On a typically sunny Sydney day, we strapped on our rollerskates and navigated the hilly terrain towards Coogee and its lovely women's baths. When we arrived, sweaty and hot, we stripped down to our bathing suit bottoms and splashed about in the saltwater. Afterwards, we lay topless on the rocks, drifting between silence and conversation like the clouds passing by above. I felt carefree in my half nudity, content in the presence of women and the act of just being that seemed to be made possible by the dual absence of men.

As I lay there beneath the sun, the salt drying on my skin, I thought to myself, chicks are the bomb diggety.

It wasn't always like this. As an older teenager, I took great pleasure in proclaiming to anyone who'd listen that I wasn't really what you'd call a girly kind of girl. I talked about how I didn't even really like girls all that much, because they were bitchy and shallow and just not as well rounded as boys. Boys were easier and funnier - they were just more chill, you know?'

Last IOC in Marine infantry experiment drops female officers

Mastodon · 9 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The two-and-a-half year period in which the Marine Corps' Infantry Officer Course became gender-integrated for research will end without a single female graduate.

The final iteration of IOC to accept female Marines on a volunteer basis began April 2 with two female participants. One was a volunteer and one was a member of the newly integrated ground intelligence track.

Both were dropped that same day during the grueling initial Combat Endurance Test, said Capt. Maureen Krebs, a spokeswoman for Headquarters Marine Corps. Nine of the 90 men who began the course were also cut.

IOC, held quarterly at Marine Corps Base Quantico, Virginia, began accepting female officers fresh out of training in September 2012 as part of a larger research effort into the feasibility of opening ground combat jobs to women. Lieutenants who made it through the legendarily tough 86-day course would not receive an infantry military occupational specialty or career advancement; they did it only for the challenge and the hope of being part of a historical Marine Corps achievement.'

SAVE: Lawmakers Need to Restore Presumption of Innocence in Campus Sex Cases to Avoid ‘Frightening Consequences'

Matt · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'Following release of a report detailing the many mistakes of a Rolling Stone article that had alleged a gang-rape at a University of Virginia fraternity, SAVE is now calling on legislators and campus administrators to engage in reasoned debate on the campus sexual assault issue to restore due process and the presumption of innocence.

Commentators have noted how Rolling Stone reporter Sabrina Erdley approached the topic with a pre-conceived narrative. By her own admission, Erdley set out to locate a case that would reveal “what it’s like to be on campus now…where not only is rape so prevalent but also that there’s this pervasive culture of sexual harassment/rape culture.”

These pre-conceptions may have lulled Erdley into accepting the uncorroborated claims of self-identified rape victim “Jackie” as truthful. Erdley envisioned her article would pressure campus administrators to institute policies to curb campus rape that serve to reduce due process protections.

Commentators on all points of the political spectrum have voiced concerns about the loss of the presumption of innocence for students accused of sexual assault: http://www.saveservices.org/sexual-assault/editorials/2015-2/

How Deep Is This Education Official's Involvement In The Rolling Stone Hoax?

Matt · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A top-ranking official at the U.S. Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights has emerged as a potentially key figure in Rolling Stone's false article, "A Rape on Campus."

Catherine Lhamon, who heads the Department's civil rights wing, was identified in a letter sent last month by University of Virginia Dean of Students Allen Groves to Steve Coll and Sheila Coronel, the two Columbia Journalism School deans who conducted a review of the Nov. 19 article, written by disgraced reporter Sabrina Rubin Erdely.

Groves' letter was included as a footnote to the Columbia deans' report, which was released on Sunday and cataloged the failures and lies that led to the article's publication.

In the letter, Groves wrote that he has suffered "personal and professional" damage as a result of Erdely's reporting and comments Lhamon made about him which were included in the article.

As the Rolling Stone article fell apart, Lhamon's involvement has gone virtually unmentioned. But a deeper look reveals her ties to Emily Renda, a University of Virginia employee and activist who put Erdely in touch with Jackie, the student whose claim that she was brutally gang-raped by seven members of a fraternity on Sept. 28, 2012, served as the linchpin for the 9,000-word Rolling Stone article.'

Can the left come up with one true story?

Matt · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'From the Duke lacrosse team, the Columbia mattress girl and the University of Virginia, the left has not been able to produce one actual rape on a college campus. It's beginning to look as if the rape of the Sabine women never happened, either. Someone's going to have to go back and investigate.

The big finale to the latest college rape fable, Rolling Stone's whimsical "A Rape on Campus," about a fraternity gang rape at the University of Virginia that never happened, is the Columbia Journalism Review's "investigation" of the story, released Sunday night. It's more of a house of mirrors than a finale, inasmuch as CJR's report is so preposterous that it demands its own investigation.

The CJR treats "reporting" as if it is some sort of learned craft, requiring years of study, as opposed to basic common sense. For example, if someone has an incredible story that he's dying for you to publicize, but loses interest every time you try to confirm any of the facts, a normal person would say: Oh, that's because it's probably a lie.

Without even knowing that the rape accuser, "Jackie," had refused to let Rolling Stone check the most basic elements of her narrative, every human being who read Sabrina Rubin Erdely's piece knew it was nonsense by around the second paragraph. It was like a Lifetime TV version of a fraternity rape.'

Dershowitz wins round one

Matt · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Good for him. He's moving on to sue the bejeesus out of the Jane Does, too. Excerpt:

'Congratulations to Professor Dershowitz and Kendall Coffey on the good news. As noted Miami defense lawyer and former Dershowitz student David O. Markus told the AP, “Judge Marra saw through all the noise and correctly found that this is a court of law, not a tabloid which prints first and looks for evidence later. These absurd allegations have no place in our legal system.”

This isn’t the end of all Epstein-related litigation for Professor Dershowitz. He’s still a defendant in that libel action filed against him by Paul Cassell and Bradley Edwards, counsel to Jane Doe #3 aka Virginia Roberts. But Professor Dershowitz might actually welcome the continuation of that case. With his involvement in the Jane Doe case now over, the defamation case may be the best avenue for completely disproving the allegations against him.'

Hugs are now ‘sexual assault’ at UVA

Matt · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If you hug your boyfriend and as a result your clothed body (including your breasts) touches him, you could be accused of “sexual assault” through “sexual contact” under the University of Virginia’s broad new “sexual assault” policy adopted to appease the Office for Civil Rights, where I used to work (assuming you do it without explicitly agreeing on the details of the hug). Because U.Va. lumps together touching, “however slight,” and intercourse when it comes to sexual assault, requiring “affirmative” consent for both. (“Affirmative consent” is a misleading term, and does not include many forms of consent that occur in the real world, and are recognized by the courts, as I explain at this link. The new policy further warns that “Relying solely on non-verbal communication before or during sexual activity can lead to misunderstanding and may result in a violation of this Policy.” Portions of U.Va.’s policy are reprinted below.).

This is an outrageous violation of students’ privacy rights.

Moreover, making out is now effectively forbidden at the University of Virginia, which has rewritten its Interim Sexual Assault Policy under the impetus of the Education Department’s Title IX investigation. U.Va.’s new policy requires “affirmative consent” (rather than “effective consent,” as before) not just to sex, but also sexual contact, which encompasses touching. Of course, no one ever says things like “may I touch your breast” before doing so. These things are welcomed after they begin, not authorized in advance, but the policy effectively forbids step-by-step ratification after the fact (i.e., making out) by banning any touching “however slight” without such authorization, so if you touch your partner an instant before they welcome it, you’ve presumably violated the policy. ...'

Teacher Accused Of Sex With Student And Fellow Instructor Takes Plea Deal

Mastodon · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'One of two former high school teachers accused of having sex with a 16-year-old student has agreed to a plea deal that will allow her to avoid prison time or having to register as a sex offender.

The deal was announced in Hahnville at a Thursday hearing in the case of 32-year-old Shelley Dufresne (doo-FRAIN'). The deal avoids a May 20 trial.

The New Orleans Advocate reports that Dufresne pleaded guilty to one felony count of obscenity. She received a $1,000 fine, but a three-year prison sentence was deferred on the condition that she complete 90 days of mental health treatment.'

She and another former teacher at the school have been arrested, but not yet formally charged, in a Jefferson Parish case involving the same student.'

WSJ Opinion Journal: Rolling Stone’s Retraction

Matt · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Right on target. Description:

'Manhattan Institute Fellow Heather MacDonald on the magazine's errant reporting on an alleged rape, elite opinion and statistics.'

Now it’s sexist to call Hillary only by her first name

Mastodon · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Forget Madonna, Marilyn, Liz and Oprah. While it may be a testament to those icons’ power and fame that they can be recognized simply by their first names, it’s apparently a sexist degradation to Hillary (does she still use “Rodham”?) Clinton to presume the same standard should apply to the former first lady.

Don’t let the fact fool you that there’s literally a “Ready for Hillary” PAC, either. The pros get to call this their way; the antis, not so much. If you don’t have anything nice to say about Hillary … Clinton … don’t say you weren’t warned if her supporters start calling out your overt sexism the next time you forget to use her full name.

“[S]ome Americans, mostly women, don’t think the former secretary of state, U.S. senator from New York and first lady should be called by just her first name,” McClatchy reported Tuesday in a story that made liberal use of the “some people say” journalistic device.'

Persons Injured During Acute Chemical Incidents — Hazardous Substances Emergency Events Surveillance, Nine States, 1999–2008

Minuteman · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Chemicals that can cause adverse health effects are used in many settings, including manufacturing industries, water treatment facilities, food processing plants, schools, and homes. Because of this, chemicals are involved in tens of thousands of emergency incidents each year and lead to thousands of personal injuries and hundreds of deaths. In addition to physical injuries, persons exposed to chemical releases can experience long-lasting mental health effects (1–3), and communities where incidents occur can be strained (4).

...

The sex of 12,611 injured persons was known; 8,096 (64%) were male and 4,515 (36%) were female. The majority of responders (91%) and employees (70%) of the responsible party were male. More members of the general public who were injured in chemical incidents were male (54%), whereas more students injured at school were female (58%). The mean age was similar for employees (37 years), responders (36 years), and the general public (34 years). Students exposed at school were an average age of 13 years.'

In Campus Rape Tribunals, Some Men See Injustice

Mastodon · 10 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Mr. McLeod, 24 years old, is suing Duke for his diploma, arguing the university unjustly made him an example to show a get-tough approach. “I believe that I’m wrongfully accused,” he says. “I believe that it was an unfair process and I believe I had something I earned taken away from me.”

His case is part of a broad and rapid change in how U.S. colleges and universities deal with sexual-assault allegations. Campuses have rewritten policies to lower the burden of proof for finding a student culpable of assault, increasing penalties—sometimes recommending expulsion. In the process, schools find themselves in legal minefields as they try to balance the rights of accuser and accused.

Mr. McLeod’s suit is one of more than 30 that men have brought against U.S. campuses since January 2014 alleging due-process violations in sexual-assault cases, says A Voice for Male Students, an advocacy group.'

John Doe v. Regents of State of California

Matt · 11 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Pleading here. Excerpt:

'1. This case arises out of the actions taken and procedures employed by Defendant the Regents of the University of California, also known as the University of California at Santa Barbara ("Defendant" or "UCSB" or "UC Santa Barbara") concerning allegations made against Plaintiff John Doe ("John Doe"), a male senior student at UCSB as a result of false allegations of nonconsensual sexual activity with fellow UCSB freshman student Jane Doe.
...
59. UCSB performed an unfair and biased investigation in favor of Jane Doe's allegations of sexual misconduct, in violation of its own stated policies requiring that disciplinary proceedings be "prompt, fair and impartial."
...
61. Yet, the one futile attempt at Early Resolution of this matter prior to commencement of a formal investigation was the sole inquiry by Ms. Perkin as to whether John Doe was, "ready to take responsibility?" As Ms. Perkin failed to explain that such an inquiry was an attempt to resolve the matter at the outset, John Doe simply responded that he did not believe he engaged in any wrongful conduct. Thereafter, UCSB did not engage in any further attempts at early resolution.'

Three new book reviews from J. Steven Svoboda

Matt · 11 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Three new book reviews from the executive director of Attorneys for the Rights of the Child, J. Steven Svoboda. I look forward to his book reviews. These cover the following:

- Stand by Your Manhood: A Game-Changer for Modern_Men, Peter Lloyd
- Southern Man: Legacy of Fortitude, A Southern Heroes Novel, Connie Chastain
- Sexual Impolitics: Heresies on Sex, Gender and Feminism, Neil Lyndon

Re "Southern Man...": if you have any immediate prejudices about the book because of its title, I ask you to reserve judgment. The phrase "southern man" has unfortunately come to be used in a pejorative way in certain circles due to the influence both of US history as well as Neil Young's song by the same name, when in fact it simply refers to a man from the southern part of the US. Projecting one's own prejudices or presumptions around men from the US south (i.e., white men from the south) is as bigoted a behavior as doing likewise to any other class of person based on ethnicity, creed, sex, other place of origin, etc. Bigotry is bigotry, period. Anyway, if you need more third party commentary, try out this review.

Former Offc of Civil Rights employee pens letter suggesting reduced funding due to unlawful activity

Matt · 11 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here.

'Congress should cut the budget of the Education Department's Office for Civil Rights, where I used to work. Contrary to Howard Kallem's argument, it needs no budget increase (Letter to the Editor, "Office for Civil Rights Needs More Resources," April 2).

Kallem cited the fact that more complaints have been filed at OCR recently. But that includes many copycat complaints that cost little to investigate. On March 18, The Washington Post quoted OCR's head admitting that just "two individuals were responsible for filing more than 1,700 of those allegations."

Many other complaints at OCR result from its own overreaching, not discrimination that needs to be investigated, as two members of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights noted in a February 26 letter to Congress. As they noted, OCR "has all-too-often been willing to define perfectly legal conduct as unlawful. Though OCR may claim to be under-funded, its resources are stretched thin largely because it has so often chosen to address violations it has made up out of thin air. Increasing OCR's budget would in effect reward the agency for frequently over-stepping the law."'

South Carolina child support policy and the Walter Scott connection

el cid · 12 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. A good review of the South Carolina child support system. Excerpt:

'But Scott, who was killed on Saturday by police officer Michael Slager in North Charleston, South Carolina, had also long struggled to pay child support. In 2008, he went to jail for a full six months after falling behind by $6,800 in child support payments, according to The Associated Press. Scott spent one night in jail in both 2011 and 2012, again because he owed thousands in child support. At the time of Scott's death, there was a warrant out for his arrest due to failure to make child support payments. (Scott also had a history of convictions and arrests for other offenses, according to The Post And Courier, a Charleston paper.)

The knowledge of the arrest warrant for failed payments is likely what spurred Scott to run from Slager on Saturday during a traffic stop over a broken taillight.

...

In 2009, Patterson conducted a survey of 33 county jails in South Carolina, which found that one out of every eight inmates -- or 13.2 percent of the inmate population -- was behind bars for contempt of civil court after falling behind on child support payments. In Charleston County, where Walter owed his back payments on child support, Patterson's survey found that over 15 percent of inmates had been imprisoned for not paying child support. In a handful of the other counties studied, the figure was as high as 20 percent.

Patterson told The Huffington Post in an interview that most states are more forgiving than South Carolina when it comes to child support payments. In general, there is no set number of days after which the debtor automatically goes to a contempt hearing.

"There's a more flexible process [in other states]," she said. "It's less likely you'll go the contempt route. You may enter a payment agreement, or may determine there's no money. The person may pay up without going through the judicial process."

The professor said she has found only one other jurisdiction in the country -- the 9th Judicial District of New Mexico -- whose rules are as stringent as South Carolina's.'

College Newspaper: False Rape Accusation Shows ‘False Accusations Are Extremely Unlikely’

Mastodon · 12 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On the main campus of Pennsylvania State University, the editors of The Daily Collegian published a 433-word editorial arguing that Rolling Stone’s fabricated, completely retracted article, “A Rape on Campus” demonstrates that “false accusations” of rape “are extremely unlikely.”

In the bizarre, unsigned Thursday op-ed, The Daily Collegian laments the fact that the Phi Kappa Psi chapter at the University of Virginia is now suing over damages caused by the Nov. 19 article by disgraced journalist Sabrina Rubin Erdely.

...

"The most important thing to come out of this failed journalism is the concept that sexual assault is a huge problem on college campuses, and false accusations are extremely unlikely,” the editors of The Daily Collegian declare. “We cannot let this situation hurt and set back sexual assault reporting and investigating.”

...

“While we understand the fraternity may have a right to legal action, we don’t support its decision to pursue a case,” they lecture.

“With all of the media covering of this case, it has become general knowledge the fraternity’s name has been cleared and the article has been retracted.”

...

Notably, Erdely did not apologize to Phi Kappa Psi.

Rape and sexual assault have been in the campus spotlight in recent years, ever since the Obama administration’s Department of Education created a complex new policy dictating how American colleges and universities must respond to allegation of sexual violence. The policy depends very heavily — at times exclusively — on Title IX, a comprehensive 1972 federal law that prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex. (RELATED: How Obama Bureaucrats Are Aiming To Deny Students Constitutional Due Process)'

Canada: Fired Teacher Sues After Student's False Rape Accusations

Mastodon · 12 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Vancouver Island teacher who was falsely accused of raping and torturing a student is seeking compensation after the girl's claims were found to be based on a popular TV crime show.
...
Barber was arrested, then suspended. But charges were never laid due to a lack of evidence.

The Qualicum school district hired lawyer Marli Rusen to look into the case. Her 2013 investigation supported the student's allegations, and recommended that Barber be banned from the school district altogether. Soon after, Barber was fired.

The longtime teacher with a spotless record fought for his job. Ultimately, an arbitration hearing uncovered that all of the student's claims were lifted from the TV show "Law & Order: Special Victims Unit." The girl testified that she had watched every episode of the drama at least three times, and some as many as 10 times.
...
The student responded that the similarities between her stories and the show was just a coincidence.

In the end, arbitrator Joan McEwan noted that the "unbelievable" claims came from "a very troubled young person" against a "decent, hard-working man."

"The Internet and media provided the student with everything she needed to construct a case that resulted in two years of unimaginable hardship to the teacher," wrote arbitrator Joan McEwan in her final report. "The evidence overwhelmingly demonstrates that the teacher is the victim of false allegations."

Barber is now seeking damages from Rusen, saying the lawyer was negligent in her "maliciously published" report. In a civil lawsuit filed in February, he says her defamatory work resulted in this humiliation and damaged reputation.'

Also see: Law & Order: SVU fake sex allegations lead to teacher lawsuit

Hillary Clinton announces candidacy for 2016 Democrat nomination for POTUS

Matt · 13 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In case you missed it, article here. Well, I have to admit, I called it wrong. I had her for sure not running. Maybe she will for a time and then drop out after more cash flows into the Clinton Coffers, I dunno. Under normal conditions I might say, "Just sit back and watch the fun," but the stakes are too high. Resistance is far from futile. We're stuck, for all practical purposes, with one of two candidates now: The Hildebeast and whoever gets the GOP nod since the Demo party result is a foregone conclusion. If ever there was a time to be politically active during an election year, 2015-2016 is it. Excerpt:

'Ending two years of speculation and coy denials, Hillary Rodham Clinton announced on Sunday that she would seek the presidency for a second time, immediately establishing herself as the likely 2016 Democratic nominee.

“I’m running for president,” she said with a smile near the end of a two-minute video released just after 3 p.m.

“Everyday Americans need a champion. And I want to be that champion,” Mrs. Clinton said. “So I’m hitting the road to earn your vote — because it’s your time. And I hope you’ll join me on this journey.”

The announcement came minutes after emails from John D. Podesta, Mrs. Clinton’s campaign chairman, alerting donors and longtime Clinton associates to her candidacy.

Mr. Podesta said that Mrs. Clinton would meet soon with voters in Iowa and host a formal kickoff event some time next month.

The announcement effectively began what could be one of the least contested races, without an incumbent, for the Democratic presidential nomination in recent history — a stark contrast to the 2008 primaries, when Mrs. Clinton, the early front-runner, ended up in a long and expensive battle won by Barack Obama. It could also be the first time a woman captures a major party’s nomination.'

Pay Discrimination Myths from the AAUW

Matt · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Equal Pay Day is coming up on April 14. That means it's time for false statistics and legal claims from groups pushing for more rules and red tape governing employee pay, such as the proposed Paycheck Fairness Act.

On April 10, Linda D. Hallman, Executive Director of the American Association of University Women (AAUW), sent a mass email containing two false claims. The first alleged that "women have to work almost four months longer than men do to earn the same amount of money for doing the same job." This is a fundamental misinterpretation of a statistic that itself is obsolete and years out of date.

It is based on a much-repeated and much-debunked statistic that women make 77 percent as much as men do. That statistic was obsolete in 2013, when former Chief Labor Department economist Diana Furchtgott-Roth noted:

"The 77 percent figure is bogus because it averages all full-time women, no matter what education and profession, with all full-time men. Even with such averaging, the latest Labor Department figures show that women working full-time make 81 percent of full-time men's wages. For men and women who work 40 hours weekly, the ratio is 88 percent."

Another reason women earn less than men on average is that women work fewer hours on average than men even when they work full-time.'

Meet the feminist who is sticking up for men

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For a lot of men, there are two dirty f-words in the English language: the four-letter one we hear at football matches and, at the risk of having faecal matter posted through my letterbox, the term ‘feminist’.

I don’t say this because men oppose equality – not at all. But, rather, because feminism often goes hand-in-hand with toxic and misleading anti-men sentiments.

American writer Andrea Dworkin once said she wanted ‘to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig’, while author Sally Miller Gearhart suggested (in all seriousness) that ‘the proportion of men be reduced to, and maintained at, 10 per cent of the human race’.

Even Jilly Cooper, queen of the bonkbuster, famously asserted that ‘the male is a domestic animal which, if treated with fairness, can be trained to do most things.’

Sadly, these cheery soundbytes can’t simply be written-off as historic gaffes. Only last month Jessica Valenti wrote an article for The Guardian entitled ‘Feminists don’t hate men… but it wouldn’t matter even if we did’.

Hence why, as far as I’m concerned, men who support feminism are like turkeys voting for Christmas.'

Hillary plays the gender card

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Of course, with her deep connections to Saudi sheiks and Silicon Valley squillionaires, you might mistake her for the kind of person the deck is stacked in favour of. But never mind. It's the image that counts!

Ms. Clinton's only claim to underdog status is that she's a woman. The last time she ran for president, she played this down because she thought it was a liability. This time, she's going to milk it for all it's worth. So don't expect to hear a lot about foreign policy for now. (All things considered, that may be just as well.) Instead, you will be hearing a lot about the joys of being a grandmother.
...
... In the interview, Chelsea explains there are two reasons why her mom deserves to be president. First, because it would be a major breakthrough for women everywhere. Second, because the world would be a better place if women were in charge. Women, she says, have been able "to build more consensus so that decisions have longer-term effects, whether in economic investments or in building social capital."

The idea that women lead differently than men – and also better – is much in vogue these days. They're more caring and compassionate. They believe in compromise and consensus, not conflict and power struggles. These skills are said to be crucial in a world that's becoming networked, not hierarchical. Women are supposed to be naturally better at soft power (diplomacy, negotiation, relationship-building), when soft power is what our age needs most. In other words: Hillary would make sure those old boys get along!

Are women innately better at this stuff than men? Personally, I have yet to see it. What's amusing is that after decades of denying that there are any innate differences at all between the sexes, modern feminists are now asserting the same type of gender essentialism that they used to deplore when men did it. We've come full circle!'

Mika Brzezinski Refers to Marco Rubio as a ‘a Little Boy’

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'BRZEZINSKI: No, like Hillary Clinton and Marco Rubio. There is no comparison. Maybe this is my ideology, but I’m sorry, but that’s a little boy and that’s an experienced accomplished woman who’s been elected to the Senate twice, who served First Lady, who served as Secretary of State.'

Wikipedia on Mika Brzezinski here.

New Study Undermines Supposed Sexism In STEM Hiring

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new study by two Cornell professors suggests faculty in several different STEM fields actually favor women by a more than 2-to-1 margin over identically-qualified men.

The belief that women face substantial discrimination when trying to enter scientific fields is an article of faith for the American left.

Professors Wendy Williams and Stephen Cici published their study on Monday as part of their work for the Cornell Institute for Women in Science. The pair created a lengthy set of fictional job-seekers in four fields: Biology, economics, psychology and engineering. Many of the fictional profiles were pairs, with identical resumes differing only in being either male or female. They sent slates of job candidates to more than 800 faculty members at 371 colleges in all 50 states, asking them to rank them in order of hiring preference.

“What we found shocked us,” the two wrote for CNN in a piece accompanying the study’s publication. “Women had an overall 2-to-1 advantage in being ranked first for the job in all fields studied. This preference for women was expressed equally by male and female faculty members, with the single exception of male economists, who were gender neutral in their preferences.”'

UK: Woman sentenced to community service for false rape claim

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A married woman who falsely claimed she had been raped by a taxi driver in Midlothian has been sentenced to 200 hours of community service.

A major inquiry was launched after Chantal Clark, 36, from Dalkeith, claimed she had been sexually assaulted by the driver in May 2014.

Clark later pleaded guilty to a charge of falsely making a rape claim.

She had engaged in consensual sex with the driver, who cannot be named for legal reasons.

Edinburgh Sheriff Court heard how the investigation resulted in the man appearing in court on a rape charge.'

UK: Woman falsely accused couple of rape

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Hannah McWhirter, 21, engaged in the midnight ménage-a-trois with a friend and her husband.

She even exchanged texts with the couple after their threesome telling them how much she enjoyed herself.

But she soon changed her tune when the husband told her boyfriend about their steamy hook-up and claimed she had been raped.

McWhirter appeared at Aberdeen Sheriff Court today where she admitted wasting police time with false rape claims.'

Student accused in sex assault sues university

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A student on suspension from San Diego State University has sued the school over the way it is handling an investigation against him for sexual misconduct.

Attorney Domenic Lombardo, who is representing student Francisco Sousa, said his clients has been denied due process and is not even sure about the specifics of the accusations against him.

Sousa, an international transfer student from Portugal, was arrested Dec. 9 and charged with false imprisonment and forcible oral copulation of a female SDSU student. The charges were later dropped, but he remains suspended and has since enrolled in another school.

Lombardo filed a writ of mandate in San Diego County Superior Court on April 2 to get access to specific accusations he said led to Sousa's suspension. The evidence could be used later in a hearing to determine whether Sousa should be expelled from the school for violations of Title IX, the federal law prohibiting sexual discrimination on college campuses.'

"An Arc of Outrage"

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The statistics defining the problem became a source of debate. The "one in five" researcher called that finding, from two campuses, not nationally representative, and its definition of "sexual assault" turned out to include offenses some people might not have put in that category, like "forced kissing" and rubbing up against someone over clothes. Reliable evidence was hard to find. "Researchers have been unable to determine the precise incidence of sexual assault on American campuses," a report by the National Institute of Justice had concluded several years earlier, because results depend on "how the questions are worded and the context of the survey." The U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics found a rate of six in 1,000, although underreporting, widely recognized as a problem, seemed substantial there.
...
The conversation about campus sexual assault is dominated by two poles: One declares it a crisis, the other dismisses it as a panic. In fact, it has become both. And as long as candor and nuance remain elusive, so will progress.
...
While there are no more chaperones, expectations for moral guidance and institutional control have emerged in "affirmative consent" standards in students' sexual encounters. The old norm was "no means no," but on a growing number of campuses, it's now "no unless yes." Colleges are interceding in students' private lives to set stricter rules than exist in the wider world, and some students are clamoring for it.
...
When it comes to sex, college women expect both freedom and safety, and why shouldn't they? But tensions arise between erotic agency and vulnerability, Michelle Goldberg writes for The Nation. "The politics of liberation are an uneasy fit with the politics of protection."

That's a subtle balance to strike, or even discuss. And it's hard to negotiate in a tinderbox.'

Opinion: Feminists overreach with Equal Pay Day

Mastodon · 14 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'April 14 is feminists' misconceived Equal Pay Day.

That's the day of the year, they say, when all women's wages, allegedly only 78% of all men's, "catch up" to what men have earned the year before. The fairy tale is that women have to work those extra months to get their fair share.

...

American women are winners, although it's hard to believe from the Equal Pay Day rhetoric. Department of Education data show that in 2012, the latest available, they earned 57% of bachelor's degrees, 60% of master's degrees and 51% of doctorates, as well as almost half of doctor of medicine and law degrees. The unemployment rate for adult women, at 4.9%, is now lower than that for adult men, at 5.1%.

The latest figures show that comparing men and women who work 40 hours weekly yields a wage ratio of 90%, even before accounting for different education, jobs or experience, which brings the wage ratio closer to 95%. Many studies, such as those by Professor June O'Neill of Baruch College and Professor Marianne Bertrand of the University of Chicago, show that when women work at the same jobs as men, with the same accumulated lifetime work experience, they earn essentially the same salary.'

This Store Lets Women Pay 76 Cents To Every Man’s Dollar

Mastodon · 15 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Elana Schlenker is starting a pop-up shop called 76<100 in Pittsburgh, where she charges women 76% of the retail price of any item, while men are charged the full ticket price. (In Pennsylvania, women earn 76 cents on the dollar.) Says Schlenker, "It's incredible how deeply unconscious biases still permeate the ways in which we perceive (and value) women versus men. I hope the shop's pricing helps to underscore this inherent unfairness and to create space for people to consider why the wage gap still exists."
...
Elana Schlenker is starting a pop-up shop called 76<100 in Pittsburgh, where she charges women 76% of the retail price of any item, while men are charged the full ticket price. (In Pennsylvania, women earn 76 cents on the dollar.) Says Schlenker, "It's incredible how deeply unconscious biases still permeate the ways in which we perceive (and value) women versus men. I hope the shop's pricing helps to underscore this inherent unfairness and to create space for people to consider why the wage gap still exists."

As for its offerings, 76<100 sells products made by independent women artists who are all on board with Schlenker's mission. "Most of them feel the way that I do — something needs to be done about this. I just keep reading article after article about the wage gap, about how undervalued women are in the workplace, about the underrepresentation of women in company board of directors, executive positions, and government, and it just blows my mind. This is a small way that I can do something about it, and I think many of the artists involved are coming from a similar place."'

Sarah Silverman Admits She Made Up a Wage-Gap Story, Then Calls Critics ‘Maniacs’

Mastodon · 15 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Comedian Sarah Silverman admitted that a story she told about wage discrimination (in which she even went so far as to call out a specific employer by name) was a lie — and then said people who might consider her lie a reason to question the movement she was supporting were “maniacs.”
...
Notice that the only thing she explicitly said she regrets is not trying harder to not get caught. In fact, she didn’t even acknowledge that she did a “disservice” to the movement by telling a false story — only that it would be a disservice “if [she] were trying” to make the story an example of the wage gap when it wasn’t one. (For the record, specifically citing something as an example of the wage gap seems like a pretty clear instance of trying to make it an example of the wage gap.)

Silverman ended her statement by saying that people who might see an advocate having lied about a movement as a reason to question that movement’s message — something I’d consider a normal response — were “maniacs.”

“To the maniacs who want to use this as a chit against women’s issues, I ask that you please don’t,” she said. “Because that would be super s*y.”

I guess calling people “maniacs” for criticizing a cause could be one way to show you support it, but I can think of some better ones — like, you know, not going out and doing something that undermines it.'

TSA officers fired after plotting to grope attractive men, police say

Mastodon · 16 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Two Transportation Security Administration screeners have been fired after conspiring to grope attractive men at Denver International Airport, Denver police said.

Here's how police say the scheme worked: When the male TSA officer noticed a man he found attractive, he would alert a female TSA officer.

The female officer would then tell the screening machine that a female passenger -- not a male -- was walking through. And that information would trigger a machine to register an anomaly in the groin area, prompting the male TSA officer to pat down the passenger, police said, citing a TSA investigation.
...
Both of the TSA officers investigated have been fired, TSA special agent Charles Stone told police. Authorities did not release their names.
...
But it's unlikely criminal charges will be filed because there is no identifiable victim. The TSA said it has been trying to identify the passenger in the February incident but to no avail.

The TSA said no passengers have come forward with similar cases so far at the Denver airport.'

This Prof Dared to Challenge Her Students' Views on Sex

Mastodon · 16 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'No one expects the Spanish Inquisition, but everyone who lives or works at a college probably should. A Northwestern University professor recently lamented the “intellectually embarrassing” atmosphere of moral panic concerning sex and rape on campus in a column for The Chronicle of Higher Education. Several students who didn’t appreciate her opinion—perhaps it triggered them—responded by filing formal complaints against her with the university’s Title IX coordinator.

Has it truly come to this? Will academics be subjected to heresy trials for daring to challenge their students’ immature, unhealthy, and increasingly dictatorial views about sex and consent?

That seems to be the case for Laura Kipnis, an author and professor of media studies at NU. Her column for The Chronicle documented the cultural and administrative changes made at NU in recent years, ostensibly for the purpose of combatting sexism. Kipnis is not a fan of the changes, which she claims are anti-feminist, infantilizing, and contributing to a culture of fear: ...

...

“Begging for anonymity” was apparently the wise course of action, because Kipnis’s article caused quite a stir on campus. Students marched in protest and started a petition demanding that the administration condemn the professor’s “toxic ideas… because they have no place here.”'

Middle School Provides Glimpse of Vision for New All Girls Public Schools

Mastodon · 16 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Seeking to encourage more girls to pursue math and science at top caliber levels, the public school system in Los Angeles will try something that has long been the province of private education: the all-girls school.

The envisioned Girls Academic Leadership academy, already dubbed "GALA," will span grades 6-12 and be located on the campus of LA High, which will continue to operate as a traditional co-education school. GALA will offer a curriculum stressing Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math, known by the acronym "STEM," and also stress developing leadership qualities.
...
Advocates cite academic research that has found that girls in single-sex secondary schools, on average, do better academically. In elementary school, girls often outperform boys. It's theorized that in later years, girls fall behind because they are intimidated from competing in the classroom with more aggressive boys.
...
But what about the boys who YOKA Principal Colacion sees benefitting from same sex classrooms?

"It's a good question," responded Colacion. "Maybe we'll have to look at the possibility of a single gender boys academy as well."'

France: Study Reveals Math Teachers Give Girls Higher Grades Over Boys For Same Answers

Mastodon · 16 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'According to a study, girls in French secondary schools are benefiting from a marking bias by math teachers and the author of the study sees this as a positive approach.

Math teachers gave girls grades that were 6% higher than what was given to boys for the same work, says the study by London School of Economics and Paris School of Economics.

The study claims to have analyzed the records of almost 4,500 11-year-olds at 35 secondary school also lead researchers to conclude that the inflated grades encouraged girls to take science subjects later in their school careers.

Students in France at age 11 are to take standardized tests at the beginning of the school year.

The test is graded externally and the examiner did not have information on the student's name, gender or socio-economic background, so the results of this study were free from any bias.

In those anonymous tests, the boys outperformed the girls in math.'

UK: Rape probe dropped amid false claim

Mastodon · 16 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A rape investigation has been discontinued after the complainant admitted making a false allegation.

Police appealed for information amid claims the 33-year-old was raped in Salford, Greater Manchester, on the towpath of the Bridgewater Canal.

She had earlier accepted a lift from a man in the early hours of Sunday, Greater Manchester Police said.

However, the force said the matter was now closed after the "vulnerable" woman admitted the rape never happened.

Det Insp Benjamin Hart said: "We take all reports of rape and sexual assault very seriously and we will fully investigate each one until we find who is responsible.'

Mother files federal civil rights complaint over circumcision

Matt · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Florida woman who fled with her 4-year-old son to keep his circumcision from going forward has filed a civil rights lawsuit on behalf of the boy.

Heather Hironimus, who filed the complaint late Monday, is hoping a federal judge might intervene where state judges haven't.

The complaint is repeating her claims that surgery on her 4-year-old son isn't necessary, that the boy doesn't want it, and that his constitutional rights are being violated.

Aside from seeking to stop the procedure, Hironimus is trying to avoid her own arrest.

Her arrest was ordered after she fled in February and ignored a judge's demand that she appear in court and allow the circumcision to go forward.'

SAVE E-lert: UVA Must Rescind Policy That Outlaws Unconsented Hugging

Matt · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In light of the recent Rolling Stone debacle, the University of Virginia has reworked its sexual assault policy. In a horrific way.

Now, two clothed persons who hug without agreeing to the contact beforehand can be found guilty of sexual assault. Or take a kiss from a boyfriend to a girlfriend before parting ways, but without prior affirmative consent--now assault.

This broadened definition of sexual assault is out-of-context with how our country defines 'sexual assault' in the law.

Tell UVA to rework its policy to get back to legal norms, or else out-of-control accusations can easily lead to expulsions.

Email Darlene Scott-Scurry, UVA's Title IX Coordinator, at scottscurryd@virginia.edu or call her at (434) 924-3200 and ask for immediate review.

Yours in truth,

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

NPO: State Supreme Judicial Court Backtracks on Alimony Reform Act

Matt · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has issued three decisions in alimony cases that substantially alter the apparent intention of the Alimony Reform Act. Steve Hitner, now of the National Parents Organization, was a prime mover behind passage of the Act. The Alimony Reform Act passed the state legislature unanimously.

Prior to the ARA's passage, Bay State courts routinely ordered permanent alimony that was difficult to modify even if the payer retired or underwent some other change in circumstances. Additional problems arose when the payee's financial circumstances improved as when she began cohabitating with another partner. That system was an artifact of a time in which fewer women worked for a living, so the law protected their well-being post-divorce. By passing the ARA, the legislature recognized that the circumstances that gave rise to the previous law mostly no longer obtain.

The plain intention of the legislature was to limit alimony payments in duration and to make downward modifications easier and in some cases, mandatory. Despite that plain intent, courts in the state have struggled to apply the new law.'

UK: ‘Kill All Men': Lib Dem Activist in Hate Speech Scandal

Mastodon · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Liberal Democrat activist who sits on two national party committees has been suspended from her regional party after a string of sexist comments on social media. The activist in question, Sarah Noble, made multiple tweets of a disturbingly hateful nature, including “kill all men”, “fuck men”, and “die cis[gendered] scum”.

The comments were brought to light by HEqual, a gender egalitarian campaigning group. After being made aware of them, former Lib Dem Equalities Minister Jo Swinson was quick to condemn Noble’s comments. Writing on Facebook, Swinson said the comments were “completely unacceptable” and “in no way represent the views of Liberal Democrats”. The former Minister also said that Noble has been asked to delete her tweets and apologise. No apology has yet been forthcoming.

Noble sits on the national committees of the LGBT Liberal Democrats and the Secular & Humanist Liberal Democrats. She has also been elected to the executive committee of the National Union of Students’ LGBT wing, which, like the LGBT Lib Dems, has a zero-tolerance attitude towards hate speech.'

Big Shift Pushed in Custody Disputes

Mastodon · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Jump the paywall by Googling the first paragraph and clicking the first search result entry. Excerpt:

'Some of the biggest battles over child custody are playing out not in courtrooms, but in statehouses.

Prompted partly by fathers concerned that men for too long have gotten short shrift in custody decisions, about 20 states are considering measures that would change the laws governing which parent gets legal and physical control of a child after a divorce or separation.

The proposals generally encourage judges to adopt custody schedules that maximize time for each parent. Some of the measures, such as those proposed in New York and Washington state, take an additional step by requiring judges to award equal time to each parent unless there is proof that such an arrangement wouldn't be in a child's best interests.

Critics of the bills contend that they threaten to take discretion away from judges and risk giving leverage to abusive men. They also say the laws are poorly targeted because typically the only custody cases that end up in court are ones in which former spouses are too hostile toward each other to effectively practice shared parenting anyway.

Supporters maintain that the opponents, which include many family lawyers and bar associations, are trying to keep alive an adversarial culture that leads to lengthy—and often lucrative—court battles. They say the law should better reflect recent studies that show children are better off when both parents play a meaningful role in their lives.'

New York State Senator Introduces Bill To Require Diaper Changing Tables In Men's Restrooms

Mastodon · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'New York state Sen. Brad Hoylman (D-Manhattan) wants to bring the call for potty parity into the political sphere. On April 17, Hoylman is introducing a new bill in the state Senate that would mandate equal access to diaper changing tables for both men and women.

The proposed bill is calls for the amendment to the New York State Civil Rights Law with the addition of a new section 79-o. If the bill passes, any public building or "place of public accommodation, resort, or amusement" that is constructed or undergoing "substantial renovation" after the passage must provide changing stations in men's bathrooms if it includes them in women's restrooms.

“It’s time for men to pick up the slack in raising our kids, and this is part of that responsibility," Hoylman told The Huffington Post."

The senator said his own personal experience as a gay dad inspired him to draft this bill. Hoylman and his husband David Sigal have a 4-year-old daughter named Silvia, and "on numerous occasions" when she was an infant, the parents were forced to change her diaper on bathroom floors, in hallways, and outside in parking lots due to the lack of changing tables in men's rooms.

Hoylman believes that this shortage of diaper stations in men's bathrooms is "an anachronism that reflects the bias toward women being the caregiver," he said, adding, "That’s simply not the case today. In addition to same sex couples of men and men in heterosexual couples, there are also a lot of single male parents out there too."'

"Soon enough, women will run the world — and it will be a better place"

Mastodon · 17 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Y chromosome produces a person who is likely to be taller, more aggressive and more disease-prone than his XX counterpart, who can gestate and nourish children and has a good chance of seeing her 80th birthday. Maleness could therefore accurately be classified as a syndrome that kills off its members in droves, either directly through disease or indirectly as a result of that violent streak. In every society across the globe and at every point in history, the overwhelming majority of homicides are committed by men; women usually kill because they're defending themselves or their children against men. Why, then, does the human species continue to cripple half its young with this defective chromosome?
...
In the feminine future, these traits should theoretically dwindle out of the gene pool as they no longer yield reproductive results — with the power to choose, women will select caring, committed partners over feckless brutes. But that power must first come from society and the law: Contrary to what some Republican lawmakers have claimed, women's reproductive systems don't shut down during rape. It remains a brutally effective and appallingly common weapon of war in the 21st century.'

The denigration of men: It's time the chaps fought back

Mastodon · 18 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Men are brilliant. Seriously, we are. We invented philosophy, medicine, architecture, cars, trains, helicopters, submarines and the internet. Not to mention the jet engine, IVF, electricity and modern medicine.

We've led all the industrial revolutions and sent rockets into Space. We've fought wars with tin hats and bayonets and won them. The world we live in would be nothing without Alexander Graham Bell, Sigmund Freud, Horatio Nelson, Winston Churchill, William Shakespeare and Albert Einstein. The geniuses Leonardo da Vinci, Stephen Hawking, Michelangelo, Beethoven, Charles Darwin and Michael Faraday have all contributed immeasurably to our modern lives.

So why is it that, today, there has there never been a worse time to be a man? Rubbishing the male of the species and everything he stands for is a disturbing — and growing — 21st century phenomenon. It is the fashionable fascism of millions of women — and many, many men, too. Instead of feeling proud of our achievements, we men are forced to spend our time apologising for them. When people chide us for not being able to multi-task or use a washing machine we join in the mocking laughter — even though we invented the damned thing in the first place.'

Kate Major arrested again for a 'drunken attack' on husband Michael Lohan after a heated argument

Mastodon · 18 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Kate Major Lohan has been arrested for a 'drunken attack' on her husband Michael Lohan [link added], TMZ report.

Kate - who was ordered to rehab by Michael last year - is said to have had an alcohol relapse before getting physical with the father of Lindsay Lohan.

TMZ report that Michael made a 911 call around 7:02pm on Thursday claiming his wife had struck him after coming home inebriated.

Their argument then turned physical, with Kate began scratching Michael's back.

The site also reports that when police arrived Kate was visibly intoxicated, had slurred speech and blood shot eyes.

Kate reportedly admitted she had been drinking, claimed Michael grabbed her by the throat and that the argument was caused by him accusing her of cheating.'

Book On Alternative to Brit Malah to be Published

Matt · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'On May 15, 2015, novelist Lisa Braver Moss and Beyond the Bris founder Rebecca Wald will publish a book on alternative bris for Jewish families opting out of circumcision and for the rabbis who serve them. Titled Celebrating Brit Shalom, the book includes a choice of three complete services, all of which feature the cutting of a pomegranate as a new ritual act that replaces circumcision. The book also includes the sheet music to four original songs which are thematically tied to the ceremonies (recorded album available separately).

Moss and Wald teamed up for Celebrating Brit Shalom after identifying a growing population of young families that are seeking information on alternative bris and, more specifically, finished ceremonies that can be either family-led or clergy-led. With parts for a leader, the parents, and traditionally bestowed honors such as “sandek,” Celebrating Brit Shalom is intended to be used as a prayer book and guide during the service. Guests can each have their own copy so they can follow along and participate in responsive readings. There is a place at the front of the book where parents can personalize guest copies with baby’s photo and details, making Celebrating Brit Shalom a memento that attendees can take home.'

After UVA fiasco, some colleges consider providing lawyers to students accused of sex assault

Matt · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Dozens of state legislatures are rushing this year to crack down on college sexual assault, but only a few of them are also moving to protect the rights of the accused.

This includes Arkansas, where students now have the right to bring an attorney when appealing a nonacademic suspension or expulsion, thanks to legislation that became law last week. The North Dakota legislature is expected to follow shortly with its own bill allowing students the right to retain lawyers in disciplinary hearings.

“It really is a good, refreshing change of direction,” said Joseph Cohn, legislative and policy director of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education. “I think it acknowledges that legislators are coming around to the point that we can’t continue to expel students under charges of felony conduct without providing them a right to a lawyer first.”

Concerns about due process on campus have soared as universities come under pressure from the Obama administration to prove they’re clamping down on sexual assault. The discredited Rolling Stone story about a University of Virginia fraternity rape has done little to slow the push for tougher disciplinary measures to combat what activists call the “rape culture on campus.”

That includes this year’s legislative push in a half-dozen states for affirmative consent laws, which require the accused in college sex-assault cases to prove that the accuser consented to the sexual activity.
...
An additional bill now under consideration requires a minimum two-year suspension for any student found responsible for such assaults.'

Double-standards around female-on-male DV exposed via experiment

Matt · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. From 2006, but still worth bringing up now or any time. Alas, the video is no longer available, but the article is. Excerpt:

'Fortunately, the troubling scene isn't real. The abusive woman and her boyfriend are actors, hired by "Primetime" for a hidden camera experiment.

On previous shows, "Primetime" has staged scenes of abuse in which the man is the aggressor, and the woman is the victim. And in these situations, passersby -- men and women -- often stepped up and intervened. So producers were curious. What would happen if the tables were turned, and the man was suddenly the victim? Would people be just as willing to come to his defense?

This staged scenario happens more often in real life than you may think. According to Colgate University psychology professor Carrie Keating, women abusing, even assaulting their male partners "is a big problem in this country."

"There are some data that suggest that women actually hit more than men do," says Keating. "Men create more damage, but women hit more than men do."

A report prepared for the Centers for Disease Control estimates that each year there are over 800,000 serious cases of men being physically abused by women. But the actual figures are believed to be much higher, since many men are often too embarrassed to admit being the victim of abuse by a woman.'

Why Hillary Can't Be in the Moment

Matt · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When one observes married couples who have been together for a long time it is often possible to recognize a complementary-compensatory dynamic wherein the partners automatically cover for the limitations of the other. As a benign example, if the wife is naturally shy, the husband may become increasingly outgoing and voluble over time to compensate for his wife and prevent the isolation which shyness might cause. There is a degree of filling in for each other that redistributes responsibilities in a practical way and is healthy. But this compensatory dynamic can become destructive by enabling weaknesses as the couple patches each other's problems rather than confront themselves and grow as individuals.
...
In driving the Clinton franchise to the highest levels of power on earth, Hillary has wretchedly compensated for her husband's porous boundaries by constructing impenetrable walls around herself. As he became more reckless, she must have become more wary. Many years ago Hillary accepted the job of being Bills' after-party cleanup crew. In the service of their upward march, she had no choice. Many people think Hillary Clinton is a psychopath without a conscience who cares nothing about her husband's betrayals on a personal level. That formulation does not seem supported by what has leaked out about the Clinton's relationship. It is more likely that she is a wellspring of anger hiding behind a smile you can hang laundry on.

What is certain is she spent years mopping up and deodorizing Bill's messes. Bill's affairs with and attacks on women have been more destructive to Hillary's psychological integrity and self-worth than some miraculous hundred grand showing up in the Clinton cookie jar have been to him. His sexist violence strikes at the heart of who she claims to be, and continues to damage her basic sense of security and candidacy. For forty years, a room full of strangers is where the party starts for Bill, and where the messes are made for Hillary. For forty years every time Hillary entered a room full of strangers she had her bucket and mop. A bimbo splatter might be found anywhere. For forty years a room full of strangers, interacting in an unscripted moment, has been Hillary's worst nightmare.

Hillary was also Obama's international cleaning lady as his policies weakened the American position around the world. The Benghazi outpost was under Madame Secretary's authority and she is to blame for the outrages which were committed there against Americans. But it is hard to imagine such Muslim-pandering, puerile trash as the video cover story originating with the Clintons. Maybe the scheme was Hillary's idea, we may never know. In this case the video cover story was so ridiculous when it fell apart, it made the righteous outrage of the American people far worse. But there is no doubt Hillary had the most to lose of the cleanup crew, and has been the most sullied by Benghazi. She has the most filth still clinging to her bright green jacket.

That a president gets to pass the office to his brother, wife or kid runs counter to the Constitution and American ideals. That Hillary -- who has done so much dirty work for an impeached president, and one who should have been -- should claim that inheritance is particularly repulsive. She has become the Dorian Gray of politics, a terrible visage nobody can bear to behold. Nor does she, hiding at the bottom of her own slop bucket, wish to be seen.'

No. Ireland: Woman made false rape claim to get ‘free lift home with police’

Mastodon · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A YOUNG woman falsely claimed she was raped in the Castlederg area in order to get a lift home with police, a court heard.

Judge Melody McReynolds told Dungannon Crown Court on Tuesday that Emma Louise Gallagher, Ardnalee Park, Strabane, had made a “gratuitous and lightly made allegation to secure a free police lift home”.

The 23-year-old had made a false report to police on September 16 2013 that she had been raped by a male who had been in her company earlier on the date in question. She had made the report shortly after coming into a house in the Castlederg area, a place she was not familiar with.

A man, whose identity can’t be revealed for legal reasons, was subsequently questioned for four hours by police.

The defendant pleaded guilty to the charge of perverting the course of justice and was given a nine months jail sentence suspended for two years.'

Female Group Ejected From Comic Expo For Criticizing Feminism

Mastodon · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The claims of harassment came following a panel discussion, “Women Into Comics,” which took place on Thursday night. During the panel Q&A, HBB [link added] founding member Alison Tieman answered a question from the floor in which she identified herself as an MRA and criticized feminism. “The reason why I don’t like feminism is because you promote this idea that women are defined by being victims. If you look at the content of all of your issues men also face considerable problems... and they need to be brought into the story and not just for men’s sake, but also for the sake of challenging the notion that women are defined as victims.”

On Friday morning, as HBB were setting up its booth, it was approached by security and asked to leave the venue. “When we went in this morning, security came over straight away and told us we had to shut down,” said HBB member Hannah Wallen.
...
HBB’s expulsion from the event created a firestorm of criticism on social media with many accusing CalEx of censorship.'

Also see: Calgary Expo faces consumer backlash after expelling female critics of feminism

Christina Hoff Summers, trigger warnings, and the trauma of free speech

Mastodon · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'According to a Saturday post at Legal Insurrection, Christina Hoff Summers, the critic of feminism and author of such books as “Who Stole Feminism” and “The War against Boys” ventured to Georgetown University to give the students the benefit of her wisdom. Apparently what she had to say was such heady stuff that some of the students took it upon themselves to post “trigger warnings,” the purpose being to warn students that what they might hear may cause trauma.

According to New Republic, “trigger warnings” are the latest craze in academia and applies not only to outside speakers, but lectures by tenured faculty. What constitutes things that might prove triggering?

“Oberlin College has published an official document on triggers, advising faculty members to be ‘aware of racism, classism, sexism, heterosexism, cissexism, ableism, and other issues of privilege and oppression,’ to remove triggering material when it doesn't ‘directly’ contribute to learning goals and ‘strongly consider’ developing a policy to make ‘triggering material’ optional.”

Things have certainly changed since I was at school. Back when I was studying journalism and history, with a minor in carousing and deviltry, the student-run speaker’s bureau brought a member of the Nazi Party on campus to impart his views on politics, social issues, and race. Oddly enough, there was no need for fainting couches or even much security. Back in the day, we knew how to deal with wannabe brown shirts, which was to sit back, enjoy the show, and jeer at them. The climax of the event occurred when a blond haired, blue eyed specimen of Aryan manhood from what was then West Germany stood up during the question and answer session to lay into the goose stepper as a silly, anachronistic buffoon who would never be tolerated in the Fatherland. Lots of fun was had by all.'

"I Was Sexually Assaulted At UVA. I Don't Accept the Reporter's Apology."

Matt · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I don't remember what I was wearing when I got sexually assaulted my freshman year, but I do remember what I wore when I figured out what had happened. It was the autumn of 2008, and I had just left a sorority house, where I had given a lecture on consent, safe sex, and best practices for helping friends who have been raped. Jacob,* a handsome, popular guy I had avoided for years, strode up to me. I was wearing a teal T-shirt emblazoned with the logo of the University of Virginia's sexual assault crisis center.

"Isn't this funny that this is who you are now?" Jacob said, his grin widening as he tapped the insignia on my breast. "Robert* and I still talk about that night." The next thing I remember, I was shaking and crying on my bed, awash with a feeling I've never been able to name. Everything I had explained away for the last two years came rushing back: being held down, Jacob's whisper of "No one is going to believe you" before mercifully being interrupted, the mental calculus I did that somehow equated the whole thing with a gigantic misunderstanding.

When I read Sabrina Rubin Erdely's "A Rape on Campus" in Rolling Stone last year—before her reporting came into question, before the Columbia report—I wrote on Facebook that as a sexual assault survivor from UVA, "I can tell you this is absolutely accurate from start to finish."
...
*not their real names'

Say No to the 'C'

Matt · 19 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. This is primarily an article against routine use of the Caesarian section as an expedited method of birth vs. an emergency procedure done only when necessary, which is why it was devised in the first place. But the interviewee also address circumcision. Excerpt:

'Are you pro or con circumcision?

There's a huge movement now called Beyond the Bris. It's Jewish people choosing not to circumcise. What we used to think was a small, benign thing to do is really removing a lot of skin. Rebecca Wald, a Jewish lawyer in Florida, has written a book with a colleague about a ceremony called Brit Shalom. Instead of having a bris, you have a naming ceremony but leave the baby's penis intact. Many Jews in America and Israel are choosing not to circumcise because they're convinced that the harms outweigh the benefits.

The harm being the pain?

Babies feel pain, yet some hospitals give them no anesthesia. When the baby's penis skin is cut, he loses erogenous tissue, taking away nerve endings that heighten sexuality and lessening the width and length of the penis. There are complications. The American Academy of Pediatrics came out with a task force analysis and issued a bogus and unscientific statement in 2012 that the benefits of circumcision outweigh the harms. They recommended that insurance companies pay for it, but the AAP never actually recommended the procedure.

As a journalist and researcher on this topic for over 10 years, it's clear, based on scientific studies and doctors, the harms grossly outweigh the benefits, but the AAP disagrees with me. Many Jewish men are now saying, "The decision should've been ours." What I told my son is, "You can make the choice to be circumcised once you're 13."

Remarks by the President At Working Families Champions of Change Event

Mastodon · 20 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'So when a baby arrives or an aging parent gets sick, too often workers have to make gut-wrenching choices about whether they can afford to be there when their families need them most. Too many women face unnecessary difficulties on the job, like the difficulty of being paid less than a man for doing the same work. That's a difficulty. (Applause.) Or being reprimanded or fired for taking too many bathroom breaks when you're pregnant. (Laughter.) Clearly that's a man making that decision because they don't have five pounds of kicks pressing down on their bladder. (Laughter.) Or being forced to take leave when they're still perfectly capable of doing their work.'

"Yes, Men Have Problems — But The Men's Rights Movement Doesn't Come Close To Dealing With Them"

Mastodon · 20 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When I first heard about the Men's Rights Movement, I was naturally extremely interested. After all, I am a man, and I quite like having rights. In fact, I'm in favour of rights for all men, so any movement which supported that, I thought, would be right up my alley.

Imagine my disappointment when I discovered the Men's Rights Movement is not so much a group of men making a serious attempt to address issues of importance to men, or trying to help male fellows everywhere become the best men they can be in the modern world, as it is a sort of United Federation of Crybabies: a semi-coordinated international network of drooling paranoiacs who think women are their enemy and take every advance made by a group that doesn't include them as a direct attack on their basic human rights. To many men's right activists, the only possible response to anyone suggesting a little nudge of the balance away from the male side is rabid, fang-baring aggression, savage attacks – that manage to be simultaneously noisily brutish and pathetically childish – on the people they think are their enemies, which run the gamut from women, to men who like women.

These sad, strange creatures exist in a state of cat-like readiness, a permanent pose of spittle-flecked defence against what they are certain are real and deadly threats to their way of life. They will, to be sure, stand up for their rights: wherever there is a man feeling sad about his place in the world, there the men's rights movement will be, defending to the death his right to blame a woman for it.'

Due process on campus needs a congressional champion

Mastodon · 20 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's a sad day in America when due process rights granted in the Constitution need protection, but here we are.

On college campuses across the country, students — particularly male students — are learning the hard way that they have little if any due process rights should they ever be accused of sexual assault. Indeed, an accusation is all that's needed to destroy or severely alter their future.

The reason for this comes from the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights, which has reinterpreted Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 to view sexual assault as a form of gender discrimination instead of a crime. It therefore must be treated as a disciplinary matter, more closely aligned with plagiarism than the felony crime it actually is.

...

It is politically dangerous these days to even suggest that schools provide due process to those accused of sexual assault. Especially since these days all that is needed to brand someone a rapist is an uncorroborated accusation. But there must be someone in Congress brave enough to take up the issue and offer a bill that either amends existing law or requires colleges to provide due process to students who are accused.'

Can Hillary Clinton win over men?

Mastodon · 20 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's clear from Hillary Clinton's campaign rollout -- a video announcement/campaign ad/short film that debuted Sunday afternoon -- that she will make women and being a woman central to her outreach.

In case you're skeptical, Vox has posted a handy "by the numbers" for her campaign video, and there are 38 people besides Clinton in the two-minute ad. Twenty of them are women. There are three separate mentions of motherhood.

This is all fine and good (and predictable) if you acknowledge that the proportion of women who vote has exceeded the proportion of men who vote in every presidential election since 1980. And let's not overlook the fact that Clinton is in fact a woman, and that's a fine thing to celebrate.

But in reality, she doesn't have to wonder if a woman-centered campaign is the best strategy. She can simply look back to the most recent elections to see that overplaying to one half of the eligible-voting population failed spectacularly all over the country, in red and blue states, when that strategy was employed by both male and female candidates.'

Protests occur over Christina Hoff Sommers college speech

Mastodon · 21 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, feminists at Georgetown melted down over a visit by AEI resident scholar Christina H. Sommers claiming she makes them feel “unsafe” and demanded the talk carry a “trigger warning.”

But don’t think for a second that it’s just Georgetown that’s a problem.

Yesterday Ms. Sommers appeared at the very liberal Oberlin college in Ohio and was met by some of the same nonsense. ...'

'An Easy Way to Help Tell How Sexist a Man Is'

Mastodon · 21 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Well now, this is revealing! A new study finds you can determine how sexist a man is -- whether the more hostile and malignant form, or the more benign and patronizing -- by how they smile towards women when they interact with them in social interactions -- and by the manner in which they speak to them in those situations.
...
"Benevolent sexism is like a wolf in sheep's clothing that perpetuates support for gender inequality among women at an interpersonal level," Hall adds. "These supposed gestures of good faith may entice women to accept the status quo in society because sexism literally looks welcoming, appealing, and harmless."

And that more insidious form of sexism, as well as the more blatant, is something against which both men and women should be aligned.'

Study: 30% of Millennial men don't have a job

Mastodon · 21 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'While the Millennial generation, born from 1981 to 1996, is more highly educated than preceding generations, their education is not necessarily leading to higher-paying jobs — or even to any job at all. According to a study recently released by the Pew Research Center, 30% of Millennial men between the ages of 18 and 33 have no job. Approximately 8% are unemployed and 22% are not engaged in the workforce at all.

Those are staggering numbers compared to previous generations at the same point in their lives. Men from those generations maintained an almost constant 20% jobless rate. Generation X men (born from 1965 to 1980), Baby Boomer men (born from 1946 to 1964) and men of the Silent Generation (born from 1928 to 1945) all had a 78% employment rate between the ages 18 and 33, while Millennial men dropped to a 68% employment rate.

Those in the Armed Forces are not shown in the data (thus the percentages do not add up to 100%), but there does not seem to be an obvious effect from the transition from the military draft to today's volunteer Armed Forces.'

State court: Dad has rights after turkey-baster pregnancy

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A woman who used a turkey baster to impregnate herself is on the losing side of a legal battle over parental rights.

The Virginia Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday that the child's biological father is more than a sperm donor and is entitled to be a part of his son's life.

The case hinged on an informal agreement between two longtime friends: a woman who wanted to get pregnant and a man willing to supply the sperm to make it happen. According to court filings, Joyce Rosemary Bruce impregnated herself with a turkey baster, believing that Robert Preston Boardwine would not have any parental rights — including a say in the boy's education and other decisions — because they did not have intercourse.

The appeals court said she was wrong.

"The path to fatherhood may have been unconventional," the court said, but it doesn't remove Boardwine's parental rights.'

U.S. cracks down on female teachers who sexually abuse students

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A "Saturday Night Live" skit about a male student having sex with his female high school teacher painted the relationship as every teen boy's dream, but drew a firestorm of criticism on social media.

The reaction to the comedy sketch reflected a growing view among law enforcement and victims' advocacy groups that it is no laughing matter when a woman educator preys on her male students.

In U.S. schools last year, almost 800 school employees were prosecuted for sexual assault, nearly a third of them women. The proportion of women facing charges seems to be higher than in years past, when female teachers often got a pass, said Terry Abbott, a former chief of staff at the U.S. Department of Education, who tracked the cases.

This year's numbers are already slightly ahead of last year with 26 cases of female school employees accused of inappropriate relationships with male students in January compared to 19 cases the previous January.

Female educators who sexually abuse their students are facing tougher prosecution in part because there are more women police officers. There is also a greater awareness among prosecutors, judges and the general public that students who are victimized by an authority figure, regardless of gender, experience trauma with life-long consequences.'

Attorney: Former athlete plans to sue accuser

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The attorney for Rodney Austin said the now former Detroit Lions offensive guard is considering filing a civil suit against his accuser in a domestic violence case for malicious prosecution, defamation of character and slander.

Austin turned himself in Friday on four misdemeanor counts of assault on a female, child abuse, larceny and interfering with emergency communication after his former girlfriend, Yvonne Gill-Sadler, obtained warrants for his arrest a day earlier from the Mecklenburg County (N.C.) Magistrate's Office.

Gill-Sadler called Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police around 2:20 a.m. April 5 to report a domestic incident. According to a police department press release, Gill-Sadler said Austin, who was listed at 6-feet-4 and 330 pounds in booking records, pushed her to the floor while she was holding their infant child then prevented her from calling 911 by damaging and taking her phone.

There were no signs of injury to the victim or child, according to the press release, and Austin was not taken into custody at the time.'

The Footwear Cadets Were Allegedly Forced to Wear During Political Event March Has Sparked an Uproar

Matt · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Making the general public aware about tough issues that need addressing is obviously a good thing. But there's a right way and a wrong way to go about doing it.
...
In the "Walk a Mile in Her Shoes" event, cadets were required to wear high heels and march to "raise awareness of sexual assault against women."
...
"Its a Cadet Command wide thing, pretty much every battalion in Cadet Command has had to, or will have to do it. GEN Combs has picked it up as a CC initiative."

"This is sadly legit. Did it at my school this semester, along with something called "Take Back the Night," both of which made me uncomfortable just being a man and being there, let alone in uniform. This is supposed to be Cadet Command's directive, that ROTC is to be involved in sexual harassment prevention on campus as part of SHARP stuff, but really none of these events are relevant or even well thought out. The "speeches" people give are either geared towards women or poorly constructed, and we are all sitting in uniform (men and women, both) listening and wondering how it is at all relevant.

I'm all for equality, but it is really poorly thought out to have us involved in this."'

Pressure grows on Marines to consider lowering combat standards for women

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Traditionalists see the 0-29 performance as a call to arms by those inside the Pentagon who are determined to have significant numbers of women in the infantry. They are on the lookout for standards they believe are no longer relevant in today's battlefield.

"The pressure is on the services from the White House's politically correct crowd vis-a-vis Obama's Pentagon appointees, who will force the services to accept degraded standards," said Robert Maginnis, a retired Army officer and author of the book "Deadly Consequences: How Cowards Are Pushing Women Into Combat."
...
Gen. Dempsey laid down the law this way: "If we do decide that a particular standard is so high that a woman couldn't make it, the burden is now on the service to come back and explain to the secretary, why is it that high? Does it really have to be that high?"'

Student accused of false sexual assault report booked and released from jail

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The University of Arkansas student who falsely reported sexual assault on campus was booked into the Washington County Jail and released shortly after Friday morning.

Fayetteville police issued an arrest warrant for the student, Lindsey Sweetin, on Thursday.
...
After an initial investigation that included interviewing potential witnesses and checking surveillance video, Sweetin admitted that she made up the assault. She did not specify why.

Police had been debating whether to charge her for a couple of weeks.

The Washington County prosecutor said she did not have to bond out because she does not pose a flight risk. She was released one hour after being booked.'

We disagree with you, [insert insult here]

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We've reached the point where simply disagreeing with someone is not enough. One must both disagree and name-call to really get the point across.

One of the best examples of this kind of reaction comes from those who really, really want to believe that American colleges are the worst places for women on earth, despite evidence that not only are rapes and sexual assaults not the norm on college campuses, but also that they are more likely to occur off-campus.
...
"A rape denialist is someone who denies the prevalence of rape and denies known causes of it," the students wrote. "Christina Hoff Sommers believes that rape occurs less often than statistics (those which actually leave out a plethora of unreported rapes) suggest. She also believes that false rape accusations are a rampant issue and that intoxication and coercion cannot rightly be considered barriers to consent."
...
But because Hoff Sommers has looked into the information behind the scary headlines, she's a "rape denialist." She also hasn't shied away from the causes of rape: Mostly alcohol. It's just that the Oberlin students think the causes are misogyny.

As for false rapes being rampant, one can read any one of the nearly 70 lawsuits against universities by students accused of sexual assault to see the issue isn't one of cut-and-dried violent rape, but more of a he said/she said, alcohol-infused event for which the truth is often subjective. (By contrast, over 100 schools are being investigated by the Department of Education for failing to address the concerns of the accuser. Both lists are growing rapidly.)'

Will Any Presidential Candidate Support a White House Council on Boys and Men?

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There used to be a stigma in recent years toward forming male-only organizations, due to the perception they were sexist; excluding women for the benefit of men. But as boys and men are increasingly failing in so many areas - crime, violence, and education to name a few - that perception is changing. There is a real need for organizations that can reverse this trend and prevent men from turning to destructive lifestyles. The purpose of men's interest groups is evolving; it isn't to help men excel over women, it's merely to stop the spiraling path downward so many are now taking, to the detriment of everyone in society.

...

I asked Dr. Farrell if the left's interest in transgender, fluid gender, etc., might dissuade Clinton and Democrats from accepting a council for males. He didn't think so, explaining that it doesn't matter what kind of boy or man - every color, every class, every point in history and every place in geography - we're talking about, there is something that has happened to them in recent years that has hurt them. Throughout all of history, girls became women who raised children, and boys became men who raised money or killed animals and enemies. In every culture that survived, boys became heroes by being disposable. After World War II ended in industrialized countries, survival was no longer such a dominant force, and divorces became an option. The women's movement gave women a sense of purpose beyond just raising children; they could also raise money and have careers.

But no one gave men a purpose beyond raising money. Today, males have lost their purpose, because fewer are needed to die in wars and being the sole breadwinner no longer constitutes the definition of masculinity.

Forming a council for boys and men would also help women - the mothers, grandmothers, sisters, spouses and children of men and boys. It is not a zero-sum game. Women, wouldn't it be nice to have a pool of men to select from who have manners, good values and are trustworthy, rather than neglected and raised by TV?'

MANN regular creates new site

ErikaLancastor · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Well, I did a lot of thinking. Despite the fact I know I am going to be attacked, slandered and "investigated" by feminists and like minded types, I decided to create a new Men's Rights Activist website.

It's just getting started, (just created it last night) and there isn't much there yet, but you are all welcome to come. The discussions forum is open and ready, so come vent, shout, and converse, if you like. Contributions (stories, articles, etc.) will be appreciated.

Here is the link: http://menshaven.wikifoundry.com/

It's gonna be rough, but I REALLY wanted to do this.

Thanks, guys. I LOVE YOU!

Erika

"Female academics combat bias in STEM fields"

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'While the gender gap in academia is often most salient at the student level, equally apparent disparities among graduate students and faculty members are often overlooked. These members of the academic community are further along the “leaky pipeline” — a term that describes the incrementally rising attrition rate of women at each rungup the academic ladder. Only 33 percent of University faculty members are female, an imbalance even more stark in the physical sciences, where women make up 15 percent of faculty.

This trend holds true nationwide. In the geosciences, women make up 42 percent of University bachelor’s degree recipients, 45 percent of master of science recipients and 39 percent of PhD recipients. But only 26 percent of assistant professors, 14 percent of tenured assistant professors and 8 percent of full professors are women.

One study found that nearly half of women in science, technology, engineering and mathematics disciplines seriously considered leaving the geosciences during their careers, while only one-third of men did. Reasons for leaving were also divided along gender lines. Women cited family issues and problems with advisers as their top reasons for leaving, while men considered leaving because of an uncertain job market or difficult classes.'

New Study Undermines Supposed Sexism In STEM Hiring

“Kill all men” Lib Dem “proud” of hating men, abuses block-bot position to silence critics

Mastodon · 22 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'By now I expect most readers have seen the superb Breitbart coverage of our investigation into sexist hate speech at the Liberal Democrats. The article has received a great deal of attention worldwide, with over 1,000 comments which were almost unanimous in their condemnation of the Liberal Democrat party’s gender hatred.

Following the publication of the article, Noble resigned her position on the executive committee of Secular and Humanist Lib Dems. However, as far as we know, Noble remains on the executive Committee of the LGBT Lib Dems and on the Liberal Youth policy committee too. Furthermore, she has now tweeted a claim that her resignation from the Secular and Humanist Lib Dem Exec is “only temporary”

Despite belated calls from Lib Dem Member of Parliament Jo Swinson for Noble to apologise for her behaviour and to deleted the tweets, no such action has been forthcoming. In fact, Noble has continued down exactly the same path as before, and her response to the scandal was to emphasise she is “proud” of her hatred of half the electorate and that the hatred of men is “real cool”:

[Tweet image caps]

Such tweets are perhaps Noble’s most blatant admission of gender hatred so far, yet she still sits on the LGBT Lib Dem committee. Therefore, the Lib Dems are in a situation whereby a least one of those formulating policies relating to gay and bisexual men openly admits she hates all said men simply becasue of their gender. One wonders if Lib Dems who deal with health issues perhaps openly hate on cancer and HIV patients too?'

Men face high bar to claim discrimination by campus sex assault tribunals

Mastodon · 23 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'On Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Jesse Furman of Manhattan dismissed an anonymous male student's gender discrimination case against Columbia University and its board of trustees. The student, who was suspended for three semesters after a campus tribunal determined he had engaged in non-consensual sex with an anonymous female student, had contended that Columbia's investigation and prosecution of the incident violated Title IX, which prohibits universities from gender discrimination. The John Doe student, who said his accuser consented to their encounter in her dorm room bathroom and even provided the condom they used, alleged he was treated unfairly because of Columbia's atmosphere of heightened sensitivity to women complaining of sexual assault by men.

Judge Furman determined, however, that even if Columbia's tribunal reached the wrong conclusion in John Doe's case and even if Doe is right that Columbia's sexual misconduct disciplinary proceedings have a different impact on men than women, the student didn't provide enough plausible allegations that Columbia discriminated against him because he is a man. So under the tough pleading standards the U.S. Supreme Court established in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly in 2007 and Ashcroft v. Iqbal in 2009, Furman said, John Doe's case has to be dismissed.'

Court: Gun Permit Can Be Denied for Domestic Violence Accusation

Mastodon · 23 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'On April 22, a three-judge appellate panel from the New Jersey Superior Court ruled that a domestic violence accusation–that did not result in a conviction–is sufficient grounds for denying a resident a gun permit.

Z.I. was acquitted of those charges in 1998, yet upon applying for a gun permit, the police chief handling Z.I.'s application suggested his "past history of domestic violence" may be enough to "indicate a public safety concern."

Z.I. appealed the rejection and told the court he had, indeed, "struck his wife in the 1998 incident but stressed that it was accidental." He then pointed to the court documents showing he was acquitted of the charges.'

VP Touchy-Feely lies to and idiot-monishes male students to stand up against "sexual violence"

Mastodon · 23 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Vice President Joe Biden stood in front of a roomful of University of Illinois students Thursday and talked candidly about a subject that has long been taboo on college campuses.

His message was clear: It is up to them, particularly young men, to reject the quiet tolerance of sexual assault and stand up against the victimization of women.

“Gentlemen, silence is a form of approval,” he said. “You all know the difference between right and wrong. … We measure the decency of a nation by whether it condemns or condones this kind of behavior.
...
Meanwhile, the numbers have escalated.

According to a White House task force on sexual assault, 1 in 5 women are sexually assaulted in college, most often by someone they know. Only 12 percent of those assaults are reported, and in those cases, only a fraction of the perpetrators are brought to justice.'

Columbia student accused of rape by 'mattress girl' sues university

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Columbia University student sued the school Thursday, saying it failed to protect him against harassment when a female student went public with claims he raped her after school and law enforcement authorities rejected her case.

The lawsuit was filed in Manhattan federal court by Paul Nungesser, a German citizen who said onetime friend Emma Sulkowicz has repeatedly and publicly called him a “serial rapist,” resulting in national and international media attention.

Defendants include the school, its board of trustees, President Lee C. Bollinger and Professor Jon Kessler. The lawsuit sought unspecified damages.

“Columbia University’s effective sponsorship of the gender-based harassment and defamation of Paul resulted in an intimidating, hostile, demeaning... learning and living environment,” the lawsuit said.'

Hillary Clinton delivers fiery feminist message in first campaign speech

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton gave a glimpse of a presidential campaign focused on feminist issues in her first speech since announcing her bid for the White House.

Mrs Clinton, vying to become the first-ever female US president, delivered on Thursday an impassioned speech at the Women in the World conference in New York, saying she aimed to champion women's rights - from mandatory maternity leave to equal pay.

The frontrunner for the Democrat nomination high-fived the summit's host, journalist and talk-show host Tina Brown, and was greeted with wild applause and a standing ovation when she took to the stage.

"The advancement of the full participation of women and girls is the great unfinished business of the 21st century," the former secretary of state told the crowd at the Lincoln Centre in Manhattan.

Pitching to progressive primary voters, she said women had been let down by previous administrations: "We have to have leaders who recognise that the time has come. When women are held back, our country is held back ... When women get ahead, everyone gets ahead."
...
When Mrs Clinton first ran for president in 2008, she played down the prospect that she would be the first woman to run the country. She focused instead on her experience and grit.

Her advisers have long said they regret downplaying the history-making potential of her candidacy during the failed White House bid and have vowed to not make the same mistake this time around.'

"Is Baby Foreskin The Key To Youthful Skin?"

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There's a reason anti-aging products and services is a multi-billion dollar industry. Many women and men are willing to try just about anything in order to achieve a more youthful appearance, even if that involves unconventional methods.

The latest? HydraFacial, a facial treatment that uses baby foreskin to fight acne, treat hyper-pigmentation and reduce wrinkles. Sounds out there, but The Cut's associate beauty editor Ashley Weatherford decided to give it a try.

"I didn't really know exactly what I was walking into. I had this sort of vision of maybe like chunks of skin floating around in a solution, which is totally gross. But it was really nothing like that," she told HuffPost Live host Caroline Modarressy-Tehrani.'

Title IX unintended effects

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A review of sports programs offered at universities across the country shows that nearly twice as many women's sports are available in comparison to men's sports – a continuing ripple effect of Title IX.

That's not quite the case at Murray State. Beyond the coed rifle team, there are five men's sports that are scholarship-funded compared to eight for women's sports.

Because of the complex way that scholarships are calculated – taking into consideration in-state versus out-of-state tuition – Murray State had more scholarships available for men's sports in 2014-15.

The original purpose of the 47-year-old federal law was to create equality between genders in the academic and athletic areas of universities.'

Oberlin Activists Posted Creepy Messages Accusing Specific Students of Perpetuating Rape Culture

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Left-leaning student activists at Oberlin College hung posters at the Christina Hoff Sommers event earlier this week that identified the students involved in bringing the individualist-feminist and AEI scholar to campus.

Each poster gave the name of a specific student-member of the Oberlin College Republicans and Libertarians and accused that person of perpetuating rape culture.

Images of the posters were sent to Reason via a source who asked not to be named for fear of retaliation. The last names of the students identified by the posters were blurred before Reason received them.
...
They have the right to denounce their fellow students as perpetuators of rape culture, I suppose, though the fact that some students would smear others with this charge for merely bringing a speaker to campus is disappointing. Do students no longer recognize that the entire point of challenge is to grapple with new and different ways of thinking about the world?'

UK: Anger as all men and white people are banned from "equality" event

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Bahar Mustafa, of Goldsmiths University, organised an event for students to protest against inequality and celebrate racial unity.

But the gathering soon sparked outrage after she appeared to banish all men and white people from attending.

She posted on the Facebook event page: "If you've been invited and you're a man and/or white PLEASE DON'T COME just cos (sic) i invited a bunch of people and hope you will be responsible enough to respect this is a BME Women and non-binary event only."

Instead, people were asked to invite "loads of BME women and non-binary people".

BME is a politically correct tag meaning Black and Minority Ethnic, while the term 'non-binary' is said to be used by those who do not associate themselves with exclusively being a male of female.'

"Shriver Report Reveals The Truth About Men"

Mastodon · 24 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Woman's Nation, an organization founded by former First Lady of California Maria Shriver, released the results of a survey of men on the state of manhood. The results show that the way we define success (and masculinity) are evolving in some ways, but not others.

...

Generally speaking, the way we define success has changed. To the modern man, the new "American Dream" has a lot less to do with money than it does with being happy at home: 60% defined personal success as being a good son, husband and father, while only 24% related it to professional and financial gains. In fact, 76% of men said they have a healthy work/life balance, which I found shocking. As for why the shift occurred, my guess is that the economy played a big part: When the jobs (and money) dried up in the late aughts and early 10s, it makes sense to assume that men would focus their efforts on the one place where they still had an impact, i.e. the home. Supporting that? 68% of those surveyed defined strength as having "personal character and integrity," rather than physical or financial dominance.

...

"From our poll to the conversations I have almost daily with real men, I think what men are lacking is a clear guidebook on how they fit into the new framework of American society. Men have told us they are working to be the entrepreneurs of their own lives but don't see themselves reflected in modern media. Instead they see headlines and plotlines depicting men as the bumbling idiot or the woman-hater. Today's man knows who is he NOT but is still evolving to discover who he IS," she said.'

Olivia Wilde: Being natural multitaskers makes women better filmmakers

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I think that certainly was the biggest challenge in terms of being women, but in terms of how it really helped us is that I think women are natural multitaskers, and we handle crisis in a natural way. This was not an easy project to pull off but it felt like a very smooth set, like a very calm set, a very positive environment, and I credit that to our team. I think that has something to do with how women handle problems. That's why women make great directors and great producers.'

Wikipedia on Olivia Wilde

SecDef: Women in Combat Could Be More Vulnerable to Sexual Predators

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Allowing women to serve in ground combat positions could make them more vulnerable to sexual predators, Secretary of Defense Ash Carter told Reserve Officers' Training Corps cadets Wednesday.

At least 18,900 service members experienced unwanted sexual contact last year, according to Defense Department estimates. As DoD takes steps to address the epidemic, the services are also studying the implications of opening ground combat positions to female service members.
...
"Obviously, as we get women into more unaccustomed positions, maybe dangerous isolated positions, maybe positions where they are fewer in relation to the number of men, it opens up opportunities for predators," Carter said.'

Wiki on US Sec'y of Defense Ashton Carter

US senator: Women ‘More Patient,’ Less Inclined to War Than Men

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'Senator Harry Reid [link added] (D-NV) stated that “women appear to me to be more patient” and not as inclined to go to war as men in an interview broadcast on Thursday’s “Rachel Maddow Show” on MSNBC.

Reid said, “the Senate is a better place because of women. Men and women are different. I’m so impressed with how women appear to me to be more patient. They are less — inclined to do things like war…I wish I could articulate the way I really feel about how much better the Senate is because of women.”

Reid added that the country “ready” for a woman Senate Majority Leader and a woman president.'

Australia: Principal suspended after autistic boy locked inside cage by teachers

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The principal of a school in Canberra has been suspended after it was revealed that an autistic boy was locked in a metal cage.

It was announced yesterday an investigation was underway after it emerged a 10-year-old autistic bot was put in a 2m by 2m structure by his teachers at a Canberra school.

The cage was specifically designed for him to as a 'withdrawal space' while in class.

The principal has been removed from the school and two teachers with expertise in disability education have been assigned to the school.

The structure was in place from March 10 to March 27, according to ACT Education Minister Joy Burch.

Shadow Education Minister Kate Ellis said the mistreatment of students with a disability was 'shocking and deeply disturbing'.'

Circumciscion Clamp Caused Amputation, Family Says

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A defective penile-circumcision clamp caused the tip of a 7-day-old infant's penis to be amputated, his mother claims in court.

Though the mother identifies herself and her son in the complaint filed on April 22 in the Philadelphia County Court of Common Pleas, Courthouse News has redacted their last names because of the sensitive nature of the claims.

The March 2010 "horrific injury" occurred in Oxnard, Calif., while baby Benjamin's doctor "performed what was supposed to be a routine circumcision procedure," according to the complaint.

For the procedure, Benjamin's doctor allegedly used a "Mogen Clamp," manufactured by Misdom-Frank Corp., Medco Group and Sklar Instruments, all of West Chester, Pa.

Unlike other circumcision instruments, the lawsuit says, the Mogen Clamp lacks a protective shield or bell to safeguard the head of the penis.

Its design is also such that the doctor performing the procedure is unable to see the head of the penis while applying the scalpel to the foreskin, according to the complaint.'

This Is a Baby's Brain on Pain

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a first, researchers at Oxford University have watched infants as young as a day old as their brains process a light prodding of their feet. The results confirm that yes, babies do indeed feel pain, and that they process it similarly to adults. Until as recently as the 1980s, researchers assumed newborns did not have fully developed pain receptors, and believed that any responses babies had to pokes or pricks were merely muscular reactions. But new research published Tuesday morning changes that.

Taking advantage of the fact that newborns less than a week old tend to sleep through anything, Rebeccah Slater, an associate professor of pediatric neuroimaging at Oxford, and her colleagues placed 10 infants who were 1-6 days old in an fMRI machine. The researchers, who reported their findings in eLife, observed which areas of the infants' brains became more active, or consumed more oxygen, as the scientists lightly poked their feet. They did the same for adults and compared the brain images.

...

But the fact that they are experiencing pain in almost the same ways as adults do is very revealing. Now that there's evidence that the brains of babies do indeed process pain, that may change the way doctors treat newborns, especially those who are premature or need extra medical attention in the neonatal intensive care unit. In a recent study, scientists tallied an average of a dozen procedures including needle sticks that babies experienced every day; more than 60% of those infants did not receive any pain medication, either in the form of a topical numbing cream or other pain relief. Having these experiences may make these babies more sensitive to pain later in life, says Slater. A study of circumcised baby boys, for example, found that those who received pain relief felt less pain when getting vaccinations three months later than those who didn't receive any pain medication.'

News Host To Feminists: ‘Toughen Up, Buttercups!’

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Megyn Kelly has a message for feminists: Toughen up, Buttercups.

Kelly, host of Fox News’ The Kelly File, invited Christina Hoff Sommers onto her show Wednesday night in order to discuss the demands made by students at the University of North Texas, who decided they wanted a commencement speaker who “better aligned with their values” than Texas Governor Greg Abbott.

Although Sommers is known as the “Factual Feminist,” many scholars and feminists view her title as misleading and claim she is a critic of feminism rather than an actual feminist. Sommers coined the term “equity feminist” to describe her views, and argues that modern feminism contains “irrational hostility to men” as well as an “inability to take seriously the possibility that the sexes are equal but different.”'

The real victim of ‘rape culture’? Free speech

Mastodon · 25 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In November last year, anti-rape activists at Brown University in Providence, Rhode Island, erupted in outrage when it was announced that libertarian feminist Wendy McElroy had been invited to take part in a debate about sexual violence. McElroy, as it happens, was herself the victim of a rape so violent it left her with permanently impaired vision. But she has since incurred the wrath of those who claim to speak for rape victims by vehemently disputing the existence of what radical feminists call ‘rape culture’. Rape culture, McElroy has written, is ‘a lie [which] has been successful in spite of reality’ and is now being used to justify an illiberal and sinister attack on due process. Whether one agrees with this view or not, it ought to be obvious that transparent debate of this issue is not only legitimate, but vital. McElroy’s activist opponents disagreed. The very expression of opinions like hers, they insisted, constitutes an intolerable threat to student safety.

This dismal scenario is now being re-run following an invitation extended by Oberlin College Republicans and Libertarians (OCRL) to feminist writer Christina Hoff Sommers. Sommers – a resident scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute and author of the 1994 polemic Who Stole Feminism? – also considers ‘rape culture’ to be a dangerous moral panic. And, like McElroy, she believes it must be discredited with the careful marshalling of evidence and argument. Her opponents, on the other hand, while maintaining the truth of their own claims to be self-evident, have preferred to marshal only disgust and invective, the most recent manifestation of which has been an open letter published in the Oberlin Review beneath the maudlin headline ‘A Love Letter To Ourselves’.'

Meryl Streep: Men lack imagination to write women's roles

Mastodon · 26 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Why is it so hard to get movies made about women? According to Meryl Streep, it might be because many male viewers lack the imagination needed to appreciate them.

Then again, they've never needed it.

Streep elaborated on this idea on April 22 in a conversation with "Selma" director Ava DuVernay and Pakistani documentary filmmaker Sharmeen Obaid-Chinoy, moderated by Jon Stewart. The impressive panel, called "Story Power: Three Great Women In Film," was part of the sixth annual Women In The World Summit, presented by Tina Brown Live Media.'

Hillary Clinton: Religious Beliefs Must Change for Abortion Acceptance

Mastodon · 26 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton believes that “religious beliefs and structural biases have to be changed” to expand access to abortion.

Clinton said today that it’s not enough to legalize the procedure. “Far too many women are denied access to reproductive health care and safe childbirth, and laws don’t count for much if they’re not enforced,” she said Thursday, per the Daily Caller. “And deep-seated cultural codes, religious beliefs and structural biases have to be changed.”'

Ad for draft board points up ironic inequity

Mastodon · 26 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Announcement here. Excerpt:

'The Selective Service System wants to hear from men and women in the community who might be willing to serve as members of local draft boards.
...
If a military draft becomes necessary, approximately 2,000 local and appeal boards throughout America would decide which young men in each community receive deferments, postponements or exemptions from military service, based on federal guidelines.'

"Inside Amy Schumer's Season Premiere Burned So Many Idiot Men Perfectly"

Mastodon · 26 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Do the dolts who think that women aren't funny finally feel stupid? If they watched last night's Season 3 premiere of Inside Amy Schumer [link added], they sure should have. Every single sketch examined gender relations in ways that were playful, unexpected, and hilarious. Exposing the stupidity of men and the bullshit they get away with has long been an m.o. of Schumer's, but there was a consistency throughout last night's episode that I hadn't yet witnessed on Inside. The show felt pointedly political and was better for it.
...
Then there was "Football Town Nights," aFriday Night Lights parody featuring Schumer as the white wine-guzzling wife of a high-school football coach who comes to town with a revolutionary message: don't rape.
...
In it, Schumer encounters heroes of hers dining in a meadow to celebrate Dreyfus's "Last Fuckable Day." "In every actress's life, the media decides when you finally reach the point where you're not believably fuckable anymore," chirps the actress who's about to be put out to pasture. Specific examples follow (like Sally Field going from playing Tom Hanks's love interest inPunchline to his mom in Forrest Gump). And then the revelation that barely needs to be spoken but lands like a bomb nonetheless: "Men don't have that day!"'

Ex-Teacher Admits To Sex With Three Teen Boys in Plea Deal

Matt · 26 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former high school teacher accused of having sexual relationships with three of her students took a plea deal Wednesday, crying as she accepted the agreement in court.

One of the boys was 16 and two were 17 when they were having sex with Brianne Altice, 35. One testified that he considered her to be his girlfriend during their yearlong sexual relationship.

But the boys were all minors, and Utah law also says a person cannot consent to sex if the other person is in a position of special trust. Altice, who taught high school English, pleaded guilty to three counts of forcible sexual abuse in exchange for prosecutors dropping 11 other counts, including several first-degree felonies.

School officials knew about Altice's inappropriate behavior and didn't do enough to protect the students, the boys and their parents say. In a lawsuit against the Davis School District, they say the running joke at the high school was, "Who is Ms. Altice sleeping with now?"
...
Altice is scheduled to be sentenced on May 28. Each count carries a possible sentence of 1 to 15 years in prison.'

Malecare.org: Black men suffer prostate cancer at twice the rate as whites

Matt · 26 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From malecare.org:

The African American experience of Prostate Cancer is a rarely told story.

African American men suffer from Prostate Cancer more than anyone, anywhere. If we want better treatments, then we've got to tell folks what it means to be a African American man diagnosed with Prostate Cancer. Please go to http://twiceasmany.org/prostate_cancer_story/ and write a few paragraphs about your experience with prostate cancer OR email twiceasmany@malecare.org and we'll set up a time for a telephone interview.

The stories we collect will be used for support, advocacy and promotion of research into why Prostate Cancer kills African American men at more than twice the rate as white men.

What we don't know is staggering. We don't know if the hospital, clinic and doctors office experience is culpable. We don't know if African American men are screened and diagnosed in the same manner and with similar quality that white men are. We only know that, when we count the corpses, African American men are dying at twice the rate as white men.

That is why we want to hear your stories. We want to know what you as a Black man, or you, as a caregiver or family member, are experiencing regarding prostate cancer diagnosis and treatment.

Malecare has been working on this disparity issue since 2001, along with many other external prostate cancer advocacy and research programs.

2002 - Malecare, starts an online database of African American's and Prostate Cancer research.
2006 - Father Dad African American Health Program
2011 - Black Dad Connection health and parenting network
2014 - Financed African American research project at Johns Hopkins
2015 - Twice As Many African American Prostate Cancer Advocacy Program

Please go to http://twiceasmany.org/prostate_cancer_story/ and write a few paragraphs about your experience with prostate cancer OR email twiceasmany@malecare.org and we'll set up a time for a telephone interview.

Twice As Many will make sure that every American man and women knows that prostate cancer kills African American men at a rate that is twice as many as for white men.

Twice As Many will also promote the opportunity of understanding that research on this extraordinary disparity presents. Malecare will work in collaboration with partners throughout the United States to meet the Twice As Many twin goals of eliminating the disparity issue as well as reducing death and agony from prostate cancer.

Visit http://twiceasmany.org/ for more information.

Email darryl@malecare.org if you have any comments or questions.

Very best regards,

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare
Men fighting cancer, together

The Plague of Campus Rape

Matt · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"Missoula: Rape and the Justice System in a College Town" is the empathetic account of five sexual-assault cases at the University of Montana (UM) between 2010 and 2012. Jon Krakauer, the acclaimed author of "Into the Wild" and "Into Thin Air," was moved to write this very different book when he discovered "that many of my acquaintances, and even several women in my own family, had been sexually assaulted by men they trusted," and he offers sharp insight into "what deters so many rape victims from going to the police."

...

Mr. Krakauer devotes more than 100 pages to this complex encounter, which went to trial in February 2013. The football player says it was consensual, and his lawyers suggested that Ms. Washburn had lied to spite him for his uncaring post-coital demeanor. A jury unanimously found him not guilty in less than three hours. Mr. Krakauer argues that in the campus disciplinary proceeding, with a lower burden of proof, Mr. Johnson should have been expelled and probably would have been had he not been a football hero in a football-crazed town. Nobody except Ms. Washburn and Mr. Johnson really knows what happened—though Mr. Krakauer does show compellingly that she has been deeply traumatized by whatever Mr. Johnson did.

To its great credit, "Missoula" tells both sides of these disturbing stories faithfully enough to let readers draw their own conclusions. Yet Mr. Krakauer is convinced that a great many men get away with rape (which is true) because the authorities don't try hard enough to punish them (which was true once but is much less so now). He urges universities to not let "legalistic quibbling" impede expulsion of alleged rapists.

This is troubling, especially as Mr. Krakauer's passionate convictions rely heavily on the contested claim by psychologist David Lisak that only 2%-10% of sexual-assault reports are false. This statistic is misleading. Mr. Lisak's 2010 study (like others often cited by anti-rape activists) treat as presumptively true all sexual-assault complaints that authorities have not formally labeled either true or false (the vast majority), including most of those dropped for insufficient evidence. Older studies suggest the possibility that up to 40%-50% of accused men may be innocent.

...

In the end, "Missoula" echoes the Obama administration's demand for draconian disciplinary procedures in campus sex cases. When Harvard implemented such procedures last year, 28 of its own law professors, including prominent feminists and liberals, assailed the university for abandoning "the most basic elements of fairness and due process" in a system "overwhelmingly stacked against the accused." Jon Krakauer writes eloquently of the "deep and intractable pain" suffered by sex-crime victims. But the remedies that he embraces are creating a new class of victims.'

Free-Range Parents And The Law

Matt · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There's a good chance you've heard about the Meitiv kids (especially if you have children of your own or friends with children). The kids, ages 10 and 6, were walking home from a park a mile from their house in Maryland when they were spotted by a zealous citizen-protector, reported to the police, picked up 3 blocks from home, and detained for over five hours. In the end, they were handed over to their parents, but only after plenty of panic on both the kids' and parents' parts. And, as it turns out, that wasn't really the end. The parents found themselves under investigation for neglect.
...
But the reality facing most parents in court is that that "presumption" isn't actually a thing. Take the experience documented in a well-publicized essay on Salon last year: the author left her four-year-old unattended in a car for a few minutes on a mild day, the police were called, she found herself charged with a crime along the lines of the ones excerpted from the Iowa criminal code above. She told her lawyer: "It doesn't sound to me like I committed the crime I'm being charged with. I didn't render him in need of services. He was fine. Maybe I should plead 'not guilty,' go to trial." He warned her that "juvenile courts are notorious for erring on the side of protecting the child" and suggested that fighting the case might lead her to lose her child. Faced with that possibility she, of course, folded. Anyone would.

And that's been my experience as an advocate too. When I worked for a legal aid organization, one of my tasks was to represent parents in child welfare proceedings. No one in those sad, sequestered courtrooms cited Supreme Court cases; everyone just argued over what was in the best interest of the child. That was how to get results. Indeed, the very notion that parental choice is "perhaps the oldest of the fundamental liberty interests" (Justice O'Connor in Troxel, again) would have rung hollow in a courtroom that regularly held proceedings to terminate people's parental rights.

So parents, be cautious: yes, there's Supreme Court precedent on your side, but if you find yourself in court then the system's conception of the "best interests of the child" will likely overrule yours.'

NPO: White House Council on Boys and Men

Matt · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In this issue of the newsletter, we are honored to have a piece by Warren Farrell. Warren describes the efforts he has led to create a White House Council on Boys and Men. Warren is the noted author of numerous influential books, including Father and Child Reunion. This is one of the best exposes of the problems we are fighting in the family courts. If you have not read it, now is the time.

Warren is advocating that President Obama create such a Council to address five main issues affecting males: family court practices that cause fatherlessness, emotional health of boys, physical health of boys, education of boys, and work lives of boys and men. I am honored to be a member of Warren's Council. To see the terrific job the Council has done in presenting the unmet needs of boys and men, see http://whitehouseboysmen.org/blog/the-proposal

In this newsletter, Warren describes how you can help bring these issues to the attention of Presidential candidates in Iowa.'

Attack of the Leftist Snowflakes

Matt · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"History assures us that civilizations decay quite leisurely," Will and Ariel Durant wrote in 1968's "The Lessons of History." Even as ancient Greece and Rome faced serious "moral weakening" and societal decay, for instance, both continued to produce "masterpieces of literature and art" and a steady flow of "great statesmen, philosophers, poets, and artists" for hundreds of years.
...
If the couple were alive today, one wonders if they could have retained their trademark pluck. On college campuses across America, an army of leftist snowflakes — a generation long told they're special, fragile, and never, ever wrong — is on the march, aiming to squelch any threatening idea that "triggers" uncomfortable thoughts. On the downside, these marauding bands have sparked an epidemic of protests, hysteria, and Nathaniel Hawthorne-style banishings. On the upside, they're doing a heck of a job alerting the nation that a significant portion of the "leaders of tomorrow" might be one tick short of a working cuckoo clock.

Witness Christina Hoff Sommers, a well-known author, former philosophy professor, and, most recently, a YouTube star. Sommers, who describes her approach as "equity feminism," is a refreshing change from mainstream modern feminism, which long ago click-clacked aboard the crazy train, ripped up all return tickets, and then hit the bar in the club car hard — not in a fun way, alas, but rather to weep and mutter various bad words over low-grade apple martini knockoffs garnished with mascara smears. Partnering with the American Enterprise Institute, Sommers has made a splash with her "Factual Feminist" video series, in which she calmly challenges and debunks oft-accepted and frequently absurd feminist talking points.'

The UVA Dean Who Was Smeared by Rolling Stone Has Broken Her Silence

Matt · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Nicole Eramo is the associate dean of students who heads the sexual misconduct board at the University of Virginia. She was also the villain of the now-infamous and recently retracted Rolling Stone story about the gang rape of a freshman named Jackie that never happened at a UVA fraternity.

In Rolling Stone's piece, Eramo was painted as the frontline responder who never really responded. She was the one who, when she heard Jackie's story, tried to steer her away from reporting it, supposedly to protect the university's reputation. Reporter Sabrina Rubin Erdely never spoke to Eramo, but she did put words in her mouth, presumably told to her by Jackie.

"If Dean Eramo was surprised at Jackie's story of gang rape, it didn't show," Rubin Erdely wrote, and then topped it off with an all-too-perfect quote. When Jackie asked the dean why UVA doesn't publish statistics on sexual violence, "she says Eramo answered wryly, 'Because nobody wants to send their daughter to the rape school.'"

Eramo has been silent since the story came out. Today, she issued "An Open Letter to Rolling Stone," in which Eramo condemns "the article's false and grossly misleading portrayal of the counseling and support that I provided to Jackie, including encouraging her to report" and arranging for Jackie to meet with detectives. She also accuses Erdely of having "purposefully omitting information that she received during interviews" with UVA's president and students that did not fit "her preconceived narrative" about the university's callous response to a horrific crime.

Most viscerally, Eramo details how the debacle impacted her personally:

"Using me as the personification of a heartless administration, the Rolling Stone article attacked my life's work. I saw my name dragged through the mud in the national press ... protestors showed up at my office, demanding I be fired. Perhaps most egregious and shocking were the emails I received expressing hope that I be killed or raped, and commenting that they hoped I had a daughter so that she could be raped. Equally distressing ... is the fact that while the false allegations in the magazine were being investigated, the University had no choice but to remove me from working with the students with whom I had spent so much time building a relationship, forcing them to "start over" with someone else."'

"Buy A Lady A Drink" -- Because men don't need clean water

Matt · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Beer producer Stella Artois has a campaign currently in high gear called Buy A Lady A Drink. They are advertising it heavily here in the US during sports broadcasts. The idea is if you buy certain of their products, they will donate some amount of money to a particular charity (http://www.water.org/) that works to bring modern water delivery technology to less-developed countries' rural areas. I am presuming, based on the ads' content and name of the campaign, that there is a hitch: The assistance must be rendered to homes where at least one woman resides.

I guess men don't need clean water. Now, I get this much: in traditional cultures in places in rural sub-Saharan Africa, rural India, etc., the task of fetching the day's water typically falls to one or more women in a household. This can require hours of walking to and from water sources that are miles away and expose them to dangers from animals, the elements, and criminals (i.e., criminal men). So, I get it. And, I can't say the cause is unjust. What I can say is it's sexist in its priorities and presentation. What's wrong with a "Buy Them A Drink" campaign instead, and aim the focus of largesse to the needy at large, not deciding that because a given home is absent women, that it need not receive this kind of charitable attention? Tell me, would a charity decide that the victims of the recent earthquake disaster in Nepal should be singled out by sex and then only those of a particular sex receive medical aid, food, water, etc.? No, that'd be outrageous. So why is Stella Artois doing that kind of thing here?

We here in the "first world" sure can afford to buy the ladies a drink. We can also afford to buy the gentlemen drinks, too. Why leave them out, though, merely because they are male?

If you care to, Stella Artois can be contacted here. Remember, they are doing good, charitable work, so no need to be nasty. Just ask them why are they directing their efforts toward women when people of both sexes not only need clean water, but that it isn't just women who need to go get water on a daily basis in these impoverished places? The need to find and retrieve water in lands where it is scarce is a there for everyone, not just women.

Columbia student says Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand smeared him by standing with alleged rape victim

Mastodon · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Columbia University student suing the Ivy League college for failing to protect him against a fellow student's accusations of rape also blames Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand for helping destroy his reputation.

Paul Nungesser's lawsuit, filed last week in Manhattan Federal Court, argues that Columbia violated his rights by allowing Emma Sulkowicz to earn course credit for a project in which she carried a mattress around campus to highlight her claim that he raped her in 2012.

Sulkowicz, 22, first spoke out publicly at a news conference with Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) and was the senator's guest at President Obama's State of the Union address this year.

Nungesser's lawyer, Andrew Miltenberg, said Gillibrand, who is not named in the suit, failed to investigate Sulkowicz's account before appearing with her to publicize legislation to curb campus sexual assault.'

Gillibrand On Rape Hoaxes: 'I Hope It’s Just Putting More Of A Spotlight On The Problem'

Mastodon · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

Democratic Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand said Friday she hopes recent rape hoaxes will put “more of a spotlight on the problem [of rape].”

She was asked if the recent highly publicized hoaxes are “helping or hurting” her advocacy relating to stopping sexual assault on university campuses.

“Well, I hope it’s just putting more of a spotlight on the problem. My hope is that it’s not undermining our advocacy, because this is important,” Gillibrand said. “These lives of these women and men–young lives that are being destroyed and ruined, because there is no justice if you are a survivor of rape whether it’s the criminal justice system or whether it’s the campus adjudication process.”'

"Mattress Girl" spoke at a university, yielding some priceless gems

Mastodon · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Tweet caps here. Just a couple:

"If we use proof in rape cases, we fall in a pattern of rape deniers."

"If we keep trying to 'prove that it exists', we will never get anywhere."

ABC report on women abusing men

ErikaLancastor · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I know some were asking about the ABC PRIMETIME LIVE report about women's violence against men. Well, I found it!

It's on my website, go have a look-see. This is back when such stories were able to get through the feminist stranglehold on the media. Sadly, those days are gone, I think, but it is an interesting report on the subject.

Georgetown demands edits to Christina Hoff Sommers video

Mastodon · 27 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When I wrote my previous LI piece about Christina Hoff Sommers lecture at Georgetown, I hoped that the “trigger warnings” and “safe spaces” were the end to the attempted censorship of Dr. Sommers’ speech.

The Clare Boothe Luce Policy Institute, for which I am the lecture director, sponsored the speech, and recorded it so that others could both hear Dr. Sommers and the people who questioned her.

Unfortunately, I was wrong about the controversy being over.

Now, Georgetown University itself is putting pressure on the Georgetown College Republicans to make CBLPI edit its video of the lecture.

In an email, the assistant director for Georgetown’s Center for Student Engagement told the lecture student organizers that if CBLPI is “unwilling or unresponsive to the request, Georgetown will need to step in.”

The University claims that we must edit the video because students who asked questions did not agree to have their faces shown/voices heard:

"What was the response from Clare Boothe Luce about the video? I see that is still up online. Please let me know asap as an edited version needs to be released without students who did not give permission to be taped.

If they are unwilling or unresponsive to the request, Georgetown will need to step in. Let me know!"'

SAVE: New UVA Sex Policy Is ‘Illogical and Hysterical,’ Will Do Nothing to Stop Rape, SAVE Charges

Matt · 28 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Gina Lauterio
Telephone: 301-801-0608
Email: info@saveservices.org

WASHINGTON / April 27, 2015 – The University of Virginia (UVA) has adopted a new Interim Policy on sexual misconduct that dramatically expands the definition of sexual misconduct to include any type of sexual contact. The policy also imposes an “affirmative consent” requirement, warning that “Relying solely on non-verbal communication before or during sexual activity… may result in a violation of this Policy.” SAVE believes the policy will do nothing to deter forcible rape, and is likely to serve to trivialize the problem.

According to the new policy, any intentional touching of intimate body areas, whether clothed or unclothed, must be preceded by specific words or actions indicating consent. Under this definition, a simple hug or close dancing could be construed as sexual assault punishable by expulsion, SAVE notes.

Constitutional scholar Hans Bader has criticized the new UVA policy as “an outrageous violation of students’ privacy rights.” http://libertyunyielding.com/2015/04/09/hugs-are-now-sexual-assault-at-the-university-of-virginia/

SAVE highlights the fact that the new policy likely would not have helped to prevent the recent rape of Hannah Graham. The former UVA student was abducted on September 13, 2014. One month later, human remains believed to have come from her body were found at a rural location.

The murder suspect, Jesse Matthew, had been accused of sexual assault at two separate Virginia colleges he had attended as a student. But a criminal case was not brought against the man in either incident.

“The new UVA policy represents a response to the so-called campus ‘rape-culture,’ that is illogical and hysterical,” notes SAVE spokesperson Sheryl Hutter. “University of Virginia administrators should be working to involve local law enforcement in these cases, not mandating an illusory affirmative consent standard.”

Relevant excerpts of the UVA policy can be seen in the attachment to this press release. The entire policy can be viewed here:

http://vpsa.virginia.edu/sites/vpsa.virginia.edu/files/Title%20IX%20VAWA%20Umbrella%20Policy.pdf

---

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is working to promote effective solutions to campus sexual assault: http://www.saveservices.org/

College Sexual Assault Discipline Bill Passes California State Senate

Mastodon · 28 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Senator Hannah-Beth Jackson's Senate Bill 186 (SB 186 [link added]) cleared the senate floor Monday, extending California community colleges' jurisdiction beyond their campuses, allowing them to discipline students who commit sexual assault and sexual exploitation off-campus with suspension or expulsion from the college.

The senate passed the bipartisan bill unanimously, 35-0, and will now send it to the California State Assembly. The original bill language allowed community colleges to discipline students for any off-campus crimes deemed "egregious," but an amendment limited the authority to sexual assault cases.

Jackson said the amendment was intended to clarify the bill's purpose to create a mechanism for accountability as part of the greater effort to prevent sexual violence on college campuses.
...
"There was no opposition — only concerns that there is due process," Jackson said. "As a lawyer and as the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I'm a firm and strong believer in the due process requirements and need to ensure the hearing process is a fair one for all parties involved."'

After Falsely Accusing an Innocent Man, Lena Dunham Is Celebrated as a Rape Role Model

Mastodon · 28 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lena Dunham isn't the only victim of her sexual assault, and yet despite the fact that her unconscionable behavior resulted in an innocent family man being accused of her rape, the "Girls" creator is still being celebrated and honored as a sexual assault role model at events like this weekend's Variety's Power of Women New York Luncheon, and throughout the mainstream media.

Here are the facts:

The tip of the spear of Dunham's massive public relations campaign around the release of her auto-biography, was the news that she had been raped by a campus Republican.

In the autobiography, which was labeled as non-fiction, Dunham described her rapist using seven completely unnecessary details that immediately identified him — to anyone with five spare minutes and access to Google — as a high-profile and outspoken Republican she attended Oberlin College with during the mid-2000s — a real human being who now has a family, a career, and a Facebook page.'

Walk-A-Mile In Her Shoes raises domestic violence awareness

Mastodon · 28 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'The streets of downtown Roseburg were filled with men walking in high heels Friday afternoon.

It was an unusual scene but it was all for a good cause and a few good laughs.

The Walk-A-Mile In Her Shoes campaign provides men a chance to help raise awareness about violence against women.

"It’s important to take some of the stigma away from that topic,” said Battered Persons’ Advocacy sexual assault services director Cheryl Newell. “If we can talk about violence in our community without shame, without being embarrassed, then we can start talking about solutions."

The money raised stays in Douglas County and benefits the Battered Persons’ Advocacy.'

Harvard Business School Launches New Effort To Attract Women

Mastodon · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'It's been more than 50 years since Harvard Business School started admitting women, yet the elite institution is still figuring out how to best attract and support them. Its latest effort: a recruiting program targeting women's colleges -- places that are not traditional feeding grounds for the male-majority business school.
...
Women make up 41 percent of Harvard Business School's class of 2016 -- the most the school has ever had. In 1985, women made up only one-quarter of the graduating class. Harvard is not alone when it comes to struggling with a gender gap. At Wharton, the class of 2016 is 40 percent women; at Stanford Business school, it's 42 percent. No top business school has gotten to 50 percent yet.
...
For years, female students at Harvard Business School lagged behind men. There was a little-talked-about gender gap when it came to grades, and women received fewer academic honors than men. Women privately lamented the school's "frat house" vibe, according to reports. Blatant sexual harassment wasn't limited to students. Female professors were also subject to hassling from male students, according to a 2013 report in The New York Times. The attrition rate for female professors was high, and women graduates ranked behind their male peers in pay, the Times reported. Even years later, female graduates from Harvard Business School report less satisfaction with their career trajectory, a new study from 2014 found.'

Pseudo feminism: It is not a battle between the sexes

Mastodon · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Every human deserves equal treatment, irrespective of race, caste, creed, nationality or gender. Of course, this rule has been violated many times.

Racist attacks, war crimes, riots and killings in the name of religion and genocides serve as example. When the belief for common good is dishonored in any way, it breeds a dysfunctional society.

In feminism's case, male-bashing has replaced candid conversations about the warped roles that women have taken in society — roles that men can't relate to. Originated from the French language, feminism is the support of equal rights of the sexes. You can be a feminist while fighting for a man's rights.
...
No movement can do any good by slandering another group of society. If that is the motive behind a revolution, then that movement is headed for downfall.

An eye-for-an-eye approach to win equal rights is misleading. IHateMen.org has more than 300,000 members, but it hasn't brought down the rate of sexual harassment cases or saved women from violence.'

Army to review decision to have male cadets wear high heels

Mastodon · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'After receiving some comments about uniforms, we are currently reviewing how local universities implemented their participation in these events designed to raise awareness on the issue of sexual assault," Haverstick said in an e-mail.

...

The professor of military science at Arizona State, Maj. Michelle Bravo, said in the video that the cadets "planned and decided that they would do" the high-heel event. That's far different than the version of events presented on Reddit.'

UK: Is anyone sticking up for men's interests in this election?

Mastodon · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Notice anything missing from the coming general election?

Could any national drama more starkly reveal how completely men's interests are a non-issue in British politics? We are not even in the wings.

While the manifestos of all major parties teem with cooing blandishments to women, none of them has a word to say about the glaring disadvantages of boys and young men in education and employment. None of them demonstrates a smidgen of concern that the routine separation of tens of thousands of children from their fathers every year by force of law in the Family Court is this country's most indefensible abuse of human rights.

None discusses the sickening figures forsuicide among men. You could scan the parties' policies with ultrasound but you wouldn't detect any trace of interest in a male contraceptive pill – 50 years after the pill for women went into mass circulation - still less a commitment to that essential development. Any party that promised a national effort to make a pill available to men within 10 years – like President Kennedy's 1961 inauguration promise that the USA would send humans to on the moon and back within a decade – would get my vote almost without further question.'

Why the STEM gender gap is overblown

Mastodon · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There are two universally accepted “truths” about women and STEM careers (science, technology, engineering, and mathematics). The first is that men outnumber women in in these fields, and the second is that women are socialized to avoid STEM as career choices, because society considers them “unfeminine.”
...
On closer inspection, it turns out that these “truths” are nothing more than assumptions, and that these assumptions are inconsistent with the facts. Here are the facts:

1. Men do not outnumber women in all STEM fields
...
2. Women and men are equally capable of doing STEM work
...
3. Sex-linked interest preferences are not mere artifacts of socialization
...
4. Different preferences don’t mean women’s are less important
...
5. Men earn more because they believe they are worth more—and women agree'

False rape accusation stains Phi Kappa Psi’s legacy

Mastodon · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Rolling Stone magazine published an article Nov. 19, 2014 titled “A Rape on Campus: A Brutal Assault and Struggle for Justice at UVA.” This article, which Rolling Stone later retracted due to false accusations, claimed members of the fraternity Phi Kappa Psi at the University of Virginia had gang raped a freshman named Jackie at their fraternity house the night of Sept. 28, 2012.

Since society and the American media often negatively portray fraternities and sororities, this didn’t come as a big shock to many people. Studies have shown 1 in 5 females will experience sexual assault at some point in their four years of college and that fraternity men are 300 percent more likely to be involved in sexual assault.

However, you will never see a viral article about a fraternity raising a lot of money for charity, which happens constantly. Rest assured though, you will always see the negatives of fraternity life in mainstream media. The journalist who wrote the story, Sabrina Erdely, took the word of Jackie and went on with the story without any evidence.'

Man Paying Child Support for Son Who Cannot be His

StayingFit · 29 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video report here on Randall Smith, a North Carolina man who is paying child support for a son who is not his. In fact, he's in trouble because he is behind in this support, even though he can prove that he is not the father. The comments are actually rather encouraging, for a change. Report summary:

'What was news to a courtroom in North Carolina was well known to Randall Smith. That he is in court over child support payments the county says he owes is not unusual.'

Students protest university's presumption of innocence prior to hearing

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'"We are very angry because a staff member was assaulted by a grad student and that student is still allowed on campus," says Marie Reimers.

Frustrated students protested at Central Michigan University today. It's all over a recent sexual assault case. They want the university to suspend the student charged with the crime.

Pradeep Gujjula is charged with criminal sexual conduct in the fourth degree. A CMU staff member told campus police that he asked to take a photo with her and then touched her chest.

He's since been banned from academic buildings, except for the buildings his classes are in. Students say that's not enough.

"According to CMU's own sexual misconduct policy the university can take temporary interim measures between the time an assault happened and the time the assailant has their hearing. One of those measures is temporary suspension. CMU has not done that which we find very appalling," says Reimers.'

Ex-college basketball player cleared on rape charge

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Two months after his arrest on allegations of sexually assaulting two women at an off-campus apartment party, former Louisville basketball player Chris Jones and two other men were cleared Wednesday of rape and sodomy charges by a grand jury.

Jones was facing two counts of rape and two counts of sodomy. The two other men, 21-year-old Jalen Tilford and 19-year-old Tyvon Walker, were charged with sexually assaulting one of the women. Those two men also were cleared of rape and sodomy charges.

Scott Drabenstadt, an attorney for Tilford, said Wednesday that surveillance video seen by the grand jury showed the two women, ages19 and 20, "frolicking in the stairs and in the hallway" after the alleged incidents. The video from the apartment complex, near campus, shows the women arriving, leaving the party, returning and leaving again.

"And this is after they were supposedly, one of them raped by three men and the other raped by Chris Jones. Just ridiculous. Thank God that video existed," Drabenstadt said.
...
Dina Bartlett, an attorney for the women, said she was disappointed in grand jury's decision. She said the women were "heinously assaulted." Bartlett has maintained that Jones was given special treatment because he was a basketball player.'

College says due process for accused students would ‘chill’ assault reports

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Texas Tech University doesn’t want anything to get in the way of students reporting their alleged sexual assaults. Not even a fair hearing for those they accuse.

The Daily Toreador reports that the administration wants students to see the disciplinary process as a “learning experience,” so giving them the common trappings of a courtroom would be harmful.

According to Dean of Students Amy Murphy:

`Also a part of this model, she said, is the decision that students are not able to cross-examine witnesses, nor are the students’ advisers, during the hearing.

If cross-examination were to be allowed, she said, it would create a chilling effect for future possible reports.

“We want responding and reporting parties to talk to that investigator about the questions that they have for witnesses,” Murphy said, “the information that they want to see in that investigation report.”`

That “investigator,” by the way, is “neutral,” according to Murphy.

Student Andy Johnson evidently has more intelligence than his dean:

`“I can’t speak for other people and I’m only thinking about if I were accused,” he said, “but if it were me I’d be mad that no one could represent me. I’m a student. How am I supposed to know what to say and what not to say?”

He said if he could change the system, he would make it more like a court system because college is his real world right now, so it should resemble the real world.`'

Teen to be charged with making false rape report, state police say

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'State police said Wednesday that they intend to charge a Washington County teenager with making false accusations of sexual assault.

The head of the Specialized Victim Investigation and Prosecution Unit in the district attorney's office, however, said she doesn't want such an unusual case to dissuade rape victims from reporting crimes.

“We don't have people making false reports all the time,” said Deputy District Attorney Traci McDonald Kemp. “It's absolutely a rare thing.”

Capping a three-week investigation, troopers at the Washington barracks said they soon will charge a 17-year-old Avella girl with providing unsworn falsification to authorities and making false reports to law enforcement. The girl has not been identified.'

Ireland: Woman is accused of two false rape claims

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A WOMAN has been accused of falsely reporting to gardai that a man raped her at a pub in Temple Bar.

Sarah Eastwood (33) made the allegation against a named man, but gardai subsequently viewed CCTV footage and "disproved" the claim, a court was told.

She is facing jury trial on two charges after Judge Michael Walsh said the case was too serious to be dealt with at Dublin District Court.

The case against Ms Eastwood was adjourned for the preparation of a book of evidence.

The accused, with an address at Ballyfermot Parade, Ballyfermot, is charged with knowingly making a false statement at Store Street Garda Station on June 4, 2013.'

Rape culture still does not exist

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, Jillian Santos responded to my column about rape culture, as she did with one of my earliest columns against feminism late last year. As expected, she proceeded to straw-man what I said. I've no intention of changing her mind, either, but to attack the toxic misandry spewed frequently under the guise of a perverted form of "justice." My column wasn't meant to pander to political correctness, and everyone has a right to be upset by it, but straw-manning me leads nowhere.

...

In my closing paragraph, I will reiterate and clarify the points I previously made: Nobody is under any moral requirement to automatically believe the victim of any crime, but this is not evidence of societal hostility. I have never denied that rape happens or that victims are entitled to aid, but I am not going to condone what happened at the University of Virginia either. People can and will lie about rape, as they also do about other crimes. Could it be that Jackie was gang-raped at a frat party? Certainly, but evidence examined in a recognized court of law would prove it. Feel free to find any excuse to undermine the rights of the accused, but do not be surprised when people retaliate and point out how sickening that is.'

World disarmament? Start by disarming masculinity

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

Unsurprisingly, world disarmament has featured prominently in the WILPF events in The Hague this week. It is, after all, the key goal in WILPF's long struggle with national governments and the international system since the Armistice of 11 November 1918. On WILPF's birthday, 28 April, we mounted a symbolic action outside the World Forum. Thousands of red plastic discs, symbolizing the world's $1776 billion global military expenditure, were piled in a heap. Women, with shovels and with their hands, scooped up the coins and transferred them to accounts of their choice - 'health', 'education' or 'human rights'.
g is driven by the profit motive of the arms industry and politicians' weaponized notion of 'security'. But women peace activists also hold militarized masculinity to account.

Another persistent theme in the Centenary Congress and Conference has been gender relations. One of the commitments in the Manifesto adopted by Congress is to 'transform gender from a power relation to one of partnership'. And the first plenary of the Conference addressed the male-dominant gender order as one of the 'root causes' of militarization and war. Speakers contributed 'critical perspectives on the construction of violent masculinities, patriarchy, and engaging men'.

On the face of it, the two preoccupations, one with gender relations and the other with global military spending, may seem to have little connection. The first speaks of the human, intimate, individual and personal; the other of the machinery of war, missiles and military commands. And indeed the mainstream peace movements, comprising both men and women, tend not make the mental leap that is needed to bring them into a common analytic frame. On the other hand, it's characteristic of the women's peace movements, such as theWomen's International League for Peace and Freedom, the international network of Women in Black against War, and hundreds of smaller, more local women's peace initiatives, that they do so. And the particular feature of gender relations they point to is the persistence of male dominance, accompanied (and indeed achieved) by the insistent shaping of masculinity, the ideal, preferred, form of manhood, as mentally competitive and combative; psychologically ready to use coercion; and physically equipped to prevail through force.'

Brooks Brothers, Maria Shriver kick off a conversation about masculinity

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'America is in the throes of a masculinity crisis.

That was the takeaway from an hour-long panel discussion moderated by Maria Shriver at the Paley Center for the Media in Beverly Hills on Thursday, which followed the local premiere screening of Jennifer Siebel Newsom's documentary on masculinity, "The Mask You Live In."

...

The documentary starts with a George Orwell quote: "He wears a mask, and his face grows to fit it." It goes on to present a sobering -- if at times simplistic -- look at the chaos caused by the narrow definition of masculinity in America today (which emphasizes athletic ability, sexual prowess, economic success and emotional detachment), some of its root causes and the myriad problems flowing from it, including drug abuse, violence, sexual assault and depression. The film includes interviews with dozens of professionals and turns the camera on many, many males of the species, from those barely past toddlerhood to white-haired retirees.'

Shocking footage of 'feminists' publicly humiliating man wrapped in bin bag in middle of street

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

story here. Excerpt:

'This shocking video shows a degraded man wrapped in bin bags being pelted by eggs and yogurt by a group of revenge-seeking 'feminists'.

In the clip, posted to YouTube, the supposed victim is seen standing next to a sign that reads: "Please humiliate and abuse me."

When the man filming confronts the group of giggling girls, they refuse to reveal their reasons behind the stunt, claiming: "It says it on there."

The sign next to the man reads in full: "I lied to my partner, I broke commitments, I am a hypocrite!!

"If you have ever been hurt by a man... please humiliate & abuse me."
...
The footage then cuts out, but underneath the video, Sneaky TV wrote: "This is not feminism. Every woman (all of whom identify as feminist) I've shown this to view it as misandry.

"It's the type of thing that dude-bros and anti-feminists use to illustrate their misguided definition of what feminism actually is.
...
"Male or female, this is messed up.

"Maybe everyone should just watch it and tell me what they think..."

Several viewers suggested the video might be fake, while user Billy Anthony wrote: "Feminism would be taken seriously by men if it were about equality more so than revenge."

Jess Kazen wrote: "This has nothing to do with feminism."'

Canadian School Fights Pay Gap By Giving Only Women A Raise

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'In an effort to eliminate what it says is an unjustified gap in the pay of male and female professors, Canada's McMaster University has hit upon a novel solution: Giving an across-the-board raise exclusively to women, without raising pay for men.

The $3,515 ($2,900 in U.S. dollars) raise will be the same for every woman at the school, regardless of what their salary was beforehand.

"This signals to the world, to Canada and to Hamilton, that McMaster is truly committed to equality. It sends a very clear signal that we are interested in recruiting the best faculty, including women," dean of Social Sciences Charlotte Yates said, according to the National Post.'

Law allows for legal reps for college students

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'North Dakota Governor Jack Dalrymple has signed SB 2150 into law, providing students the right to be represented at hearings at their own expense. Joe Cohn of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) says his group worked with a bipartisan legislative group to get the bill passed.

"We think it's really important that states are starting to recognize that without lawyers able to actively represent students in these campus disciplinary hearings, students are being railroaded out of school," he explains.'

The problem at American universities

Mastodon · 30 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Claims by certain sensationalist politicians are often repeated by adoring and equally sensationalist news media. That was certainly the case when a study by RTI International claimed one in five female college students in America is a victim of sexual assault.

“This is not your fight alone,” said President Obama in a public service announcement heralding his “It’s On Us” national campaign. “This is not your fight alone. This is on all of us, every one of us, to fight campus sexual assault. You are not alone. And we have your back and we are going to organize campus by campus, city by city, state by state. The entire country is going to make sure that we understand what this is about and that we’re going to put a stop to it.”

...

And many a college campus enacted sweeping, totalitarian sex codes to deal with the fictitious “crisis.” As with any law, the violation(s) prohibited must be defined. The University of Michigan, for instance, partially defines sexual violence as “discounting the partner’s feelings regarding sex; criticizing the partner sexually… withholding sex and affection; always demanding sex.”

K. C. Johnson, a history professor at Brooklyn College and City University of New York Graduate Center, said a male student accused of a sex crime may have an “advocate” at his college hearing, provided he or she is not a lawyer. And they “cannot speak in any way during the disciplinary hearing,” wrote Johnson in the journal Minding the Campus.

...

Under new federal guidelines handed down by the Department of Education, campuses are required to presume the accuser is telling the truth and that the accused is guilty until proven innocent.

The modern university campus is not so much an institution of higher learning as it is a testing laboratory of totalitarian control. Draconian codes governing sex or speech are designed to protect students and faculty from feeling “hurt” or “unsafe” by challenges to their politically correct lunacy. And, more important, to criminalize all activity, from expressions in the bedroom to those in the public square, that do not conform to the utopian dreams of the dreamers.'

Favorable shared parenting article in MSM

Matt · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Regarding the wellbeing of kids with divorced parents, the debate over what kind of custody arrangement is best rages on. But a new study, published Monday in the Journal of Epidemiology & Community Health, suggests that children fare better when they spend time living with both of their parents.

That goes against some current thinking that kids in shared-custody situations are exposed to more stress due to constantly moving around and the social upheaval that can come along with that. “Child experts and people in general assumed that these children should be more stressed,” says study author Malin Bergström, PhD, researcher at the Centre for Health Equity Studies in Stockholm, Sweden. “But this study opposes a major concern that this should not be good for children.”'

SAVE E-lert: Sen. Gillibrand Doubles Down on Columbia U. Rape Hoaxer

Matt · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Senator Gillibrand is in the news again. This time, when asked about rape hoaxes, she responded that the real focus should be on the problem of rape. Her ideal case, however, is Columbia student Emma Sulkowicz, who has never been found to be raped or sexually assaulted.

In fact, in this case she's spotlighting, the accused student is suing Columbia University for false allegations. It's clear that the Senator needs to look at cases objectively, but instead she is decrying the case as yet another example of 'rape culture'.

Call Senator Gillibrand's office today and tell her to start telling the truth about campus sexual assault!

Best always,

Gina Lauterio, Esq.
Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

NPO: National Parents Organization’s Pennsylvania Affiliate Rallies Against Parental Alienation

Matt · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, Parental Alienation Awareness Day was observed and NPO’s Pennsylvania affiliate convened parents from across the state on the steps of the state capitol in Harrisburg to help raise consciousness of the problem. NPO’s Pennsylvania leader Stephen Meehan is to be congratulated for organizing the rally that was widely reported by state and local news media. FOX43 TV in Harrisburg reported on the rally here and NewsRadio 1020 KDKA, the CBS radio affiliate in Pittsburgh interviewed Meehan'

The Foreskin: Why Is It Such A Secret In North America?

Matt · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sure, I had heard of circumcision as a Jewish religious practice, but thought myself unlikely to ever see its results. Little did I know, all the male genitalia I had seen both in real life and as depicted in American anatomy books, had been edited in exactly the same way. The shock from this revelation overwhelmed me for weeks, especially since I considered myself to be fairly knowledgeable about anatomy. (My interests included biology and drawing biological structures).

Why would anyone selectively remove foreskins, not just from real people but from scientific anatomical texts, which I had thought were meant to represent the natural human form? And why did no one ever tell me about this? It was as though a basic feature that males (of all mammals) are normally born with was not to be understood or even acknowledged.

I spent the next few weeks at the local library, immersing myself in primary and secondary source materials on the relevant anatomy, medicine and history, before I was satisfied that I had an accurate understanding of what was going on. To summarize what I had found:

- The foreskin (or prepuce) is a man's most sensitive erogenous zone, more well-developed in humans than in other species of mammal. It has unique sexual functions (more on that later), which circumcision effectively destroys -- and this is intentional
- Although foreskin-chopping was once a purely religious or cultural practice, it was introduced to American medicine in the late 1800s, as a 'cure-all', thanks to the trend of pathologizing (treating as illness) normal human sexuality and healthy genitalia.

Top Dem money man departs because Clinton hasn’t answered ethics questions

Matt · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A top Democratic moneyman recruited by Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential campaign has put fundraising activities on hold, saying he can’t do it with a clear conscience because the former secretary of state has too many unanswered questions swirling around her.

New York businessman Jon Cooper, who Team Clinton enlisted for its elite corps of early fundraisers known as “HillStarters,” said that he decided not to tap his donor network for Mrs. Clinton because she hasn’t provided enough answers about foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation while she ran the State Department, her exclusive use of private email for official business as America’s top diplomat and her commitment to liberal priorities.

“I’m officially on the fence,” said Mr. Cooper, a bundler for President Obama’s campaigns who is active in Democratic politics in New York, which Mrs. Clinton represented in the U.S. Senate and where she has set up her campaign headquarters.'

Large GamerGate meetup disrupted by ‘feminist bomb threat’

Mastodon · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A 250-strong meetup of GamerGate supporters, which included game developers, journalists and think-tank scholars were evacuated from a bar in Washington D.C on Friday after an anonymous bomb threat was made against the gathering.

This followed an unsuccessful social media campaign spearheaded by anti-GamerGate Salon columnist Arthur Chu to convince the bar’s proprietors to voluntarily eject GamerGate supporters from their establishment.

The event was the largest GamerGate gathering so far, with somewhere between 200 and 300 attendees. It follows a trend toward offline organising by its supporters, who up until recently have tended to congregate on social media and image boards.'

Disagree With Your Political Opponents? Just Call In A Bomb Threat At Their Meetup

Mastodon · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What I missed was not only an event with Breitbart London's Milo Yiannopoulos, AEI fellow Christina Hoff Summers, and journalist Cathy Young in the same room; but also a bomb threat from the "tolerant" crowd. Yiannopoulos, Summers, and Young are among the conservative and libertarian journalists that have been promoting the #GamerGate movement, which claims to support ethics in gaming journalism and says that gaming development and journalism has been hijacked by the social justice warrior crowd.

"Police arrived on the scene at approximately 12:15am, just over three hours after the meetup had kicked off. The evacuation began immediately, causing particular difficulty for the event's two disabled attendees, who had to be carried down from the second floor. The other floors of the bar, which were occupied by regular customers, was also evacuated.

Attendees were initially told by the bar's staff that there was a fire drill, but the presence of dozens of police officers including a K-9 bomb squad van suggest that the call had more to do with bomb threats that had been made against the event earlier. Police at the scene would not comment on the reason for their investigation, although more details will become publicly available in due course."

The bomb threat came after Salon columnist and #GamerGate opponent Arthur Chu tried to get the venue, Local 16, to cancel the meetup.'

Police charge woman with domestic violence after she stabbed her boyfriend

Mastodon · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Richland County sheriff's deputies charged a woman after she allegedly stabbed her live-in boyfriend multiple times early Sunday morning.

Sgt. Kevin Lawrence, a department spokesman, said 32-year-old Donte Fielding was charged with criminal domestic violence of a high and aggravated nature in connection with the incident.

Lawrence said deputies were dispatched to a residence in the 3900 block of Pearl Street off River Drive in reference to a domestic violence call at 1 a.m. When deputies arrived, they met with the victim who said he was involved in a verbal altercation with his girlfriend when it became physical. That was when Fielding allegedly stabbed the victim multiple times in the upper body.'

Woman to become firefighter despite failing crucial fitness test

Mastodon · 3 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The FDNY for the first time in its history will allow someone who failed its crucial physical-fitness test to join the Bravest, The Post has learned.

Rebecca Wax, 33, is set to graduate Tuesday from the Fire Academy without passing the Functional Skills Training test, a grueling obstacle course of job-related tasks performed in full gear with a limited air supply, an insider has revealed.

“They’re going to allow the first person to graduate without passing because this administration has lowered the standard,” said the insider, who is familiar with the training.

Upon graduation, Wax would be assigned to a firehouse and tasked with the full duties of a firefighter.
...
“We’re being asked to go into a fire with someone who isn’t 100 percent qualified,” the source said. “Our job is a team effort. If there’s a weak link in the chain, either civilians or our members can die.”

Wax’s graduation comes as the city celebrates the FDNY’s 150th anniversary and as the department is under pressure by the de Blasio administration to hire more women.

Only 44 of the FDNY’s 10,500 firefighters are female.'

Meet the Vagina Voters

Mastodon · 4 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"I intend to vote with my vagina."

Have you ever read a more squirm-inducing sentence than that? It appeared in a pro-Hillary piece in Dame magazine, written by a person with a vagina who intends to vote for Clinton because she also has a vagina.

Let's leave aside the unfortunate image conjured up by that sentence ("You can hold a pencil with that thing?!") The bigger problem with such unabashed declarations of "vagina voting" is that they confirm the descent of feminism into the cesspool of identity politics, even biologism, and its abandonment of the idea that women should be valued more for their minds than their anatomy.

Kate Harding, the vagina voter in question, isn't only going to vote with her vag—she's also going to tell everyone about it. "I intend to vote with my vagina. Unapologetically. Enthusiastically... And I intend to talk about it," she wrote in Dame.

She thinks Hillary would be a great president because she "knows what it's like to menstruate, be pregnant, [and] give birth."
...
This embrace of the gender card by Clinton and her cronies, this move from thinking with their heads to voting with their vaginas, is being celebrated as a great leap forward. It's nothing of the sort. It merely confirms the speedy and terrifying shrinking of the political sphere in recent years, with the abstract being elbowed aside by the emotional, and the old focus on ideas and values now playing a very quiet second fiddle to an obsession with identity.'

11 people have paid $1,000 each for a hyper-realistic sculpture of a human foreskin

Matt · 4 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'At least 11 people have stumped up $1,000 (£684) each to buy a hyper-realistic sculpture of a human foreskin - designed to raise awareness about the "true cost" of male circumcision.

The artwork - called HUFO (Human Foreskin) has been created by Vincenzo Aiello, who believes that circumcision is an unnecessary mutilation that diminishes sexual pleasure later in life.

Whe he's not making art, Aiello is also the founder of Foregen, an organisation that plans to use stem cell technology to regrow foreskins lost through circumcision.

HUFO is being sold through crowdfunding platform Kickstarter to raise money for Foregen research. And so far, 11 people have forked out for the silicone sculpture. But who are they?
...
More than 130 people have supported the crowd funding campaign, with others pledging anywhere between $10 and $10,000 to the cause. Aiello is hoping to raise at least $40,000, and has already raised more than $35,000.'

Students accused of sexual assault also turning to TItle IX

Mastodon · 4 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

- 'Many young men accused of sexual assault on their college campuses are turning to the same law as their alleged victims to defend themselves — Title IX.
- Inside Higher Ed reports this tactic allows the men to argue their campus arbitration was biased against them because of their gender, and while several have won settlements from their colleges, no judge in civil courts has ruled in their favor yet.
- In perhaps the only case an accused student won, his lawyer argued negligence and breach of contract because the university didn't follow its own policies in notifying him of the allegations and the hearing, according to the article.'

Feminism: Challenging inequality or pernicious social engineering?

Mastodon · 4 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Oxford dictionary defines Feminism as the following: “The advocacy of women’s rights on the grounds of equality of the sexes.” I define Feminism as the following: “The advocacy of a vitriolic rodomontade on men, blaming societal maladies on the artificially constructed and nonsensical patriarchy.” Which of these two definitions is correct?

Well, one of them in coruscating fashion alludes to the notion that equality of the sexes is not going to be achieved by focusing on the rights of one sex over the other; to capriciously assign blame to the other sex whilst simultaneously claiming to be an all-encompassing movement is not being an all-encompassing movement. I am here to argue that Feminism is a dated, obsolete movement that needs urgent renovation to hold credibility, or to forever lose itself to societal critique as an extremist movement.
...
To conclude, it is clear to see that feminism is wholly right in highlighting the inequality that women suffer, the issue of contention lies in its subversive blaming mechanism which fails to appreciate the extent to which society pressures both of the sexes. Thus, I would argue for a movement away from feminism, and assigning blame to society’s matrix as a whole, rather than attributing it to a certain sex within the matrix.

There is a term for this, known as the Kyriarchy. It was coined by Elisabeth Fiorenza, a feminist, in 1992 to enunciate her theory of interconnected systems within society: it stands as a social system or connecting social systems built around domination, oppression and submission. It goes beyond gender when addressing the issue of subordination of one person or group to another, and therefore in my eyes is a far more suitable starting point when addressing the issue of inequality.'

Film Director Deletes Twitter Account After Feminist ‘Avengers’ Backlash

Mastodon · 5 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

Director Joss Whedon deleted his Twitter account Monday after a stream of hateful messages directed at him by feminists upset with story elements of Avengers: Age of Ultron, the weekend’s big box-office smash.

Tech Times reports that Whedon’s final tweet was an implicit goodbye. He wrote, “Thank you to all the people who’ve been so kind and funny and inspiring up in here.”

...

The most surprising part of the Black Widow backlash is that Whedon has long considered himself a feminist for his portrayal of strong women, starting with his film/television show Buffy the Vampire Slayer. Whedon also created Firefly and Dollhouse, two shows which featured strong female characters in leading roles.'

Canada: Supreme Court rules man has right to sue government for wrongful rape convictions fathers4fairness · 5 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Supreme Court of Canada ruling empowering a British Columbia man who was wrongly imprisoned for 27 years to sue the Crown may be the trigger for an out-of-court settlement, say observers.

The high court decision on Friday ruled that Ivan Henry can use the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to pursue a lawsuit after his life was upended by convictions for 10 sex crimes he did not commit.

The landmark ruling clarifies the circumstances under which criminal prosecutors may be sued if they fail to disclose evidence to accused persons.

“It is a great win for Ivan,” said Vancouver author Joan McEwen, who spent hundreds of hours over three years with Henry to write a book on his case.

She predicted Henry is entitled to at least $10 million, but said the 68-year-old man’s ailing health may put pressure on him to accept less.'

SAVE: The Hunting Ground: Anatomy of a Cinematic Flop

Matt · 6 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Produced by Academy award nominee Kirby Dick and billed as a “piercing, monumental exposé of rape culture on campuses,” The Hunting Ground was screened at the Sundance Film Festival in late January, 2015 to enthusiastic critical acclaim. The movie’s public release date was February 27.

Senator Barbara Boxer (D-CA) predicted, “Believe me, there will be fallout.” The New York Times ballyhooed, “Judging by viewer reaction at the film’s premiere and the comments of two United States senators afterward, festival programmers might have undersold it.” (http://www.nytimes.com/2015/01/26/movies/the-hunting-ground-a-film-about-rape-culture-at-colleges.html?_r=0)

To its credit, The Hunting Ground did highlight how universities are doing a poor job in handling sexual assault allegations. But the self-proclaimed “documentary” was found to contain serious inaccuracies (http://www.saveservices.org/sexual-assault/hunting-ground/):'

"College rapists should not be able to transfer schools to skip consequences"

Mastodon · 6 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A bit of good news for college rapists: if you've been accused of sexual assault and don't feel like sticking around to deal with the consequences on campus, you can simply transfer schools and no one will be the wiser. Thanks to a privacy law for students, young men accused of rape don't even have to disclose the complaint to their new school.

Since we know that college rapists commit an average of six rapes during their time at school, these colleges – and this policy – are making it easier for sexual offenders to move on without consequence. And onto new victims.
...
But here's the thing: We shouldn't have to write in code what colleges need to know about incoming students. And while I'm mindful of students' privacy, I'm more concerned about students' safety. Schools already handle sexual assault cases poorly and rapists continue to attack with impunity – do we really want to make it that much easier for them? Packing up your bags and starting over elsewhere shouldn't be an option for rapists – especially when "starting over" often just means new victims in a new place.'

Bad news for Hillary: Women CEOs make more than men

Mastodon · 6 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What happens when two cherished Democratic wedge issues, the War on Women and income inequality, collide? Hillary Clinton is about to find out.

Just prior to her campaign unveiling, Clinton attempted to demonstrate her progressive bona fides by paying lip service to the left's cause de jour; the scourge of "income inequality," otherwise known as the disparity of outcomes that has been a feature of human existence since our ancestors climbed down from the canopy.
...
But Clinton's attempt to offer the left a panacea in the form of good, old-fashioned Marxism has encountered an unexpected obstacle: Victory. It seems as though the liberal crusade to secure equal pay, or even better pay, for women has borne fruit. At least, it has for the very highest income brackets.
...
"So far, 21 of the 22 current female CEOs in the Standard & Poor's 500 have reported their latest compensation, including Yahoo (YHOO) CEO Marissa Mayer, defense contractor Lockheed Martin's (LMT) Marillyn Hewson and CEO Carol Meyrowitz of retailer TJX (TJX), and they were paid an average of $18.8 million during their latest fiscal years, according to a USA TODAY analysis of data from S&P Capital IQ and Bespoke Investment Group. That far exceeds the average $12.7 million paid to the 455 current male CEOs in the S&P 500 that have reported compensation data for the same time period.
..."'

There Is No Wage Gap: Feminists Want Equal Pay for Unequal Work

Mastodon · 6 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The feminist addiction to lies, damned lies, and statistics shows no signs of abating anytime soon. Perhaps the most brazen example is the thoroughly deceptive assertion that one in five college coeds will be raped before graduation—a false statistic that is still being wielded against due process in academia, even in the face of all the recent hoaxes. I remember it being one in four (and occasionally even one in three) back when I was an undergrad, so conditions have apparently been improving even in feminist dreamland. Nevertheless, even one in five is enough to motivate absurdities such as the University of Virginia's recent war on hugs.

...

Nevertheless, a shallow comparison doesn't reveal much when one's income is rather heavily influenced by factors such as the hours one works and the job one has trained for—factors that are mostly a matter of personal volition in modern society. When it comes to education, for example, women tend to choose less lucrative courses of study. They dominate fields that specialize in quasi-familial types of personal care (e.g., early childhood education, social work, counseling, etc.) as well as those that aspire to elevate artistic creativity into what are usually financially uncertain professions (e.g. studio arts, visual and performing arts, etc.) At the same time, men dominate more lucrative engineering fields that tend to be abstracted away from these kinds of social engagement.

There are a host of other factors, as well: Women are more likely to take time off from a career for the sake of starting a family. Men also tend to put in more hours at the office than women do. This is particularly pronounced among married women—most of whom prefer to trade potential salary for the flexibility to be more personally involved with their families.'

Domestic Violence Awareness Comes To Tinder

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new series of public service announcements on Tinder hopes to remind women that even a seemingly perfect man can turn violent at the drop of a hat.

Relationship abuse is alarmingly common in the United States. Every minute, 20 people experience intimate partner violence, and three women are murdered every day by a current or former male partner.

Women in Distress, a domestic violence center based in Florida, collaborated with the ad agency Bravo/Y&R for the Tinder Beaters campaign, which aims to raise awareness about relationship abuse.'

YouTube: Tinder Beater Nice guys turn ugly in domestic violence PSA

School to create National Center for the Development of Boys

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Boys aren't doing as well in school -- and often in life -- as girls are, says Lee Burns, the headmaster of McCallie School, a private, 110-year-old, all-boys college prep school in Chattanooga.

Boys have lower grade-point averages than girls, national figures show, and boys are more likely to drop out, to have disciplinary problems and to repeat grades. More women attend college than men do, and women graduate at a higher rate. Women go on to earn more advanced degrees than men.

"Across the board, boys are having a tougher time," Burns said. "That's a great thing that girls are doing well. But in the last couple of decades, it's the boys who have trended down in some pretty significant ways."

That's why McCallie will establish the National Center for the Development of Boys at its campus on the slopes of Missionary Ridge.'

To End Violence Against Women, End Violence Against Boys

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"The fates of the two genders are intertwined; for women to thrive, men and boys must be part of the gender equality agenda," said Gary Barker, co-founder of MenEngage, in a column for New America.

Often in global conversations, abuse is oversimplified into an us-versus-them issue. But as the ICRW study illustrates, such a depiction doesn't accurately capture the whole story. By dichotomizing one party as good and the other as bad – male or female – it can prevent further exploration into the deeper roots of gender issues that could help make the world more humane for all.

The ICRW study notes men who abused their partners were often abused as children, it doesn't take into account women are more likely to be child abusers. According to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' 2013 Child Maltreatment Report published in January 2015, 53.9 percent of perpetrators were women while 45 percent were men.'

Queens residents unsettled by FDNY probie who failed vital fitness test

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Residents of the Queens neighborhoods served by the new FDNY probie who made the grade despite failing a key fitness test said Wednesday they feel as if they're in the line of fire.

"Fires happen very often in this area," said Jay Charriez, 44, who has lived near Engine Co. 259 on Greenpoint Avenue for 15 years. "It's an industrial area, so it's really dangerous."

Other Sunnyside and Long Island City residents also were wary of Rebecca Wax, 33, who graduated Tuesday from the city's Fire Academy, despite flunking the Functional Skills Training test, a grueling obstacle course of tasks performed in full gear with limited air.

Wax was allowed to graduate after FDNY Commissioner Daniel Nigro announced rule changes giving less weight to the test.

"She shouldn't be a firefighter if she can't meet the standards," said another neighbor, Asjad Butt, 21. "There are other things she could do."'

Gillibrand's Vendetta

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Much like Rolling Stone, Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-NY) refuses to the let the facts — or lack thereof — get in the way of her preferred feminist narrative. In her case, it's the claim that the military has it in for women. Instead of university administrators and fraternity members, she accuses Department of Defense officials of lies and cover-ups and implies that any female living near a base is at risk from sexual predators in uniform.
...
Sexual assault offenders should indeed be punished. That said, not everyone accused is actually guilty, though it appears the only way to make Gillibrand happy is for every male accused of any type of sexual assault to be convicted, regardless of what the evidence says.'

"Mother's Day reminder: Women are braver and smarter"

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Mother's Day is a reminder to fellas that the women in our lives are smarter and braver than us.

My mom, for instance, went back to school in her 60s and got a PhD at Berkeley. Her expertise is in artificial intelligence. At least I think it is. I can never understand what the hell she's talking about.

My sister has a masters degree, my girlfriend is an MBA. Me, I've got high school, a cup of coffee at Carleton University, and the Sun's work-safety course.

History is adorned with examples of the superiority of women, mothers in particular, from the Blessed Virgin Mary to Laura Secord to Jackie Kennedy to Angelina Jolie.

If women ran the world, we'd be a much happier, more peaceful planet.'

Study: "Men are lazy to their core"

Mastodon · 7 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This Mother's Day we've got some good news and some bad news on the domestic gender equality front.
...
Now, this isn't entirely because men are oppressive brutish beasts wishing to perpetuate domestic inequality. Sayer points to this finding: even when there's nobody around to pick up after them, men still don't spend a lot of time on housework. "In 2012 single women with no children reported doing almost twice as much cooking, cleaning, and laundry as single men with no children," she writes. In other words, men are simply more slovenly than women, and less averse to filth.'

No Rape After All, but Woman Still Treated Like a Victim

charlie · 8 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. False rape report at the University, but woman is still a victim-survivor. Excerpt:

'University of Minnesota police say they are no longer investigating a reported weekend rape and now consider the incident a "student crisis intervention case."

The U issued a crime alert Tuesday saying a student told campus police she had been sexually assaulted about 1 a.m. Sunday by two men she did not know after they walked her to her Sanford Hall dorm room and then threatened her with a knife.

The next day the U updated its alert, saying the case was no longer being investigated as an assault by a stranger, but that police still were investigating the sexual assault report.

On Thursday, university officials said police were "no longer investigating the reported incident of an armed sexual assault by strangers."

The case had the university community on edge because the student reported that she encountered the men in what should have been a secure dormitory hallway. The U said Thursday there is no immediate or ongoing threat to public safety related to the case.

"At this time, the University's primary concern is to support the student who reported the incident and to protect her right to privacy," the statement said.'

Also see: University of Minnesota police no longer believe student was raped at knifepoint

University prof flunks 'white masculinity' in controversial tweets

Mastodon · 8 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Critics say a newly-hired Boston University professor has crossed the line with recent tweets bashing whites, but the school says it's simply free speech.

"White masculinity isn't a problem for america's colleges, white masculinity is THE problem for america's colleges," Saida Grundy [link added], an incoming assistant professor of sociology and African-American studies at Boston University, tweeted in March.

...
In another, she called white males a "problem population."

"Why is white America so reluctant to identify white college males as a problem population?" she asked.

The tweets were first noticed by student Nick Pappas, who posted them on his website "SoCawlege.com" and questioned how Grundy could be able to teach a diverse classroom given the racial hostility in her tweets.

"You have to teach college aged white males eventually, no?... this seems like you are unqualified to grade their work as you clearly demonstrate some kind of special bias against them," he wrote.'

First Group of Female Soldiers Fail to Pass Phase One of Army Ranger School

Mastodon · 8 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'All eight female soldiers participating in the first co-ed class of U.S. Army Ranger School failed to advance to the second phase of the grueling infantry course.

On the male side, 115 male students met the requirement to begin the Mountain Phase of Ranger School in Dahlonega, Ga., on Saturday, May 9, according to a Fort Benning press release.

The eight female candidates, along with 101 male candidates, will be recycled to repeat the Darby Phase of Ranger School.

Approximately 35 male Ranger students failed to meet the standards of Ranger School and will not be recycled, the press release said.

"They will return to their units having learned a great deal about themselves and small unit tactics, patrolling, leadership, and team work," according to the release.

No changes have been made to the deliberate evaluation process used to determine which students are dropped, recycled or allowed to move forward to the next phase, the release states.'

Feminists Worry About White Guys Ruining Mars

Mastodon · 8 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminists have extended their fight against sexism and racism into the final frontier: space.

Martin Robbins, inspired by another feminist thought piece in Scientific American, wrote a piece for The Guardian on Wednesday called “How can our future Mars colonies be free of sexism and racism?”

In the column, the “Berkshire-based researcher and science writer” who “writes about science, pseudoscience and evidence-based politics” argued visions of future space programs are dominated by white men.”

`To paraphrase Douglas Adams: “Space is white. You just won’t believe how vastly, hugely, mind-bogglingly white it is.” It’s also very male and European. Women in space-colony fiction have generally been presented as sexy walking vaginas, whose main purpose is to provide the male astronauts with a place to dock their penis at night. This being necessary in order to “ensure the survival of the species”.
...`
...
However, National Review’s Katherine Timpf did not find the argument persuasive and said we should focus on getting to Mar before worrying about potential microaggressions that might arise once we arrive.

"I just cannot help but think that maybe we should keep our focus on actually getting to Mars before freaking out about its hypothetical colony’s hypothetical microaggressions."'

7 Legal Rights And Privileges Afforded Only To Women

Mastodon · 8 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'#1. Women have the right to vote without agreeing to die
...
#2. Women Have Genital Integrity Rights
...
#3. Women Have The Right To Choose Parenthood
...
#4. Women Have The Right To Be Assumed Caregivers
...
#6. Women have domestic violence shelters and government housing benefits
...
#7. Women have the right to exclusive benefits for being a business owner
...
The Small Business Administration aggressively polices male owned businesses that try to pass themselves off as female owned.

From the SBA:

"If you are a male-owned business and you make your wife or another woman 51 percent owner of the stock in order to qualify for 8(a) benefits, you are spinning your wheels. The SBA auditor will know what you are doing: 51 percent ownership is a red flag. Similarly, if the auditor comes to your office and sees that the male's office is bigger than the female's, you are not going to be certified. You must be able to show that the business is managed and controlled on a daily basis by a woman, and that the woman is the person who makes the day-to-day decisions of the company."

So tell us more about this patriarchy you speak of?'

Student Op-Ed: ‘Yes Means Yes’ Is Not Enough Because Sometimes ‘Yes Means No’

Mastodon · 9 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"When it comes to consent, it’s not enough to teach that “no means no” or even that only “yes means yes” — because sometimes “yes” can actually mean “no.”

At least that’s the point of view expressed in an op-ed written by Jordan Bosiljevac for Claremont McKenna College’s student newspaper, the Forum.

In the piece, Bosiljevac explains that she and her friends even came up with a phrase to describe someone having sex with you who you didn’t want to have sex with even though you told him that you did, which they apparently consider a form of rape:

“We coined the term ‘raped by rape culture’ to describe what it was like to say yes, coerced by the culture that had raised us and the systems of power that worked on us, and to still want ‘no,’” she writes in the April 30 article, titled “Why Yes Can Mean No.”'

NFL draft pick files counterclaim, denies he raped woman

Mastodon · 9 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Attorneys for top NFL draft pick Jameis Winston contend a woman seeking civil damages from the quarterback after accusing him of rape is trying to tarnish his reputation and tap into the Heisman Trophy winner's newfound wealth.

The former Florida State star practiced again Saturday, the final day of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' rookie minicamp, and was not made available to comment on a counterclaim filed on his behalf one week after signing a four-year, $23.35 million contract.

"Nothing is surprising us," Bucs coach Lovie Smith said, when asked if Winston notified the team in advance of Friday's filing in federal court in Orlando.

In it, the quarterback's lawyers alleged that Erica Kinsman created a "media circus," then initiated settlement discussions in which her attorneys demanded $7 million from Winston.'

"Men Are Complaining To The MTA About Its "Sexist" Manspreading Campaign"

Mastodon · 9 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We receive a lot of emails about manspreading over here, and we're not the only ones. Through a public records request, a writer for Bitch Magazine got ahold of emails sent to the MTA regarding "manspreading," which is part of their "Courtesy Counts" etiquette campaign. She received 18 emails that were sent to the MTA over the course of one month, and reports back that 9 called the campaign sexist, or "anti-male." One simply read: "Drop dead, you morons!"'

UK: University mandates rugby players to anti-sexism classes

Mastodon · 9 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Students at Oxford University are only being allowed to compete in the biggest rugby tournaments of the season if they agree to attend anti-misogyny workshops, under a new scheme.

The attempt to combat sexism on campus is the first time that the classes have been made a condition to participation on the sports field.

Campaigners said they hope to introduce similar conditions for involvements in other sports, such as football, rowing, hockey and cricket, and organisers are in talks with other universities about introducing the scheme nationally.

Every Oxford college rugby team had to sign up the hour-long workshops in order to enter this year's Cupper knockout tournament.

The "good lad" courses are an attempt to combat the "lad culture" prevalent on campus, and include discussions about sexual harassment, consent, "lad banter" and team initiation ceremonies.

The idea came from Dave Llewellyn, 27, an Oxford graduate and sportsman who said he got fed up with the levels of boorishness in the locker room.'

Porn and video game addiction are leading to 'masculinity crisis', says Stanford prison experiment psychologist

Matt · 10 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A leading psychologist has warned that young men are facing a crisis of masculinity due to excessive use of video games and pornography.

Psychologist and professor emeritus at Stanford University Phillip Zimbardo has made the warnings, which form a major part of his latest book, Man (Dis)Connected.

In an interview on the BBC World Service's Weekend programme, Zimbardo spoke about the results of his study, an in-depth look into the lives of 20,000 young men and their relationships with video games and pornography.

He said: "Our focus is on young men who play video games to excess, and do it in social isolation - they are alone in their room."

"Now, with freely available pornography, which is unique in history, they are combining playing video games, and as a break, watching on average, two hours of pornography a week."

Zimbardo says there is a "crisis" amongst young men, a high number of whom are experiencing a "new form of addiction" to excessive use of pornography and video games.

Zimbardo gave a TED talk in 2011 outlining the problems facing young men's social development and academic achievement, which he puts down to excessive use of porn, video games and the internet.'

NPO: Utah Passes Shared Parenting Legislation

Matt · 10 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In March, National Parents Organization of Utah, successfully spearheaded passage of the state's first shared parenting legislation! HB35 wasn't the only success NPO Utah had, but it was the most significant. Headed by Dave Daniels and Janet Robins, NPO Utah is on a roll!

NPO Utah wants to thank Representative V. Lowry Snow for sponsoring HB35 and working so closely with NPO to help ensure its passage. He is an excellent legislator who practiced family law and saw up close many of the challenges parents and their children face when custody is considered. He understands these issues very well, and we appreciate his hard work on the bill. NPO also wants to acknowledge the Utah State Bar's Family Law section that endorsed HB35.

Under current Utah law, a noncustodial parent is entitled to a minimum schedule of every other weekend (Friday evening to Sunday evening) and one week night per week for three hours. Additionally, noncustodial parents are entitled to one-half of the annual holidays and four weeks during the summer.'

Sperm grown in a lab for the first time

Matt · 10 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Sperm cells have been grown in the laboratory for the first time, scientists have claimed, raising the prospect of a treatment for infertile men.

A company in France claims to have successfully turned scraps of genetic material into complete fully-functioning sperm - a world-first.

If the breakthrough can be verified, it may prove life-changing for the tens of thousands of men around the world who cannot produce their own sperm.

The Kallistem laboratory, a private research facility based in Lyon, claimed it would be able to carry out human clinical trials within two years.

If commercialised, the firm hopes to treat 50,000 patients a year, a market it that could be worth £1.7 billion.

But the findings have not been published, peer reviewed or independently verified - and British experts last night were treating the claims with scepticism.

Kallistem said it had managed to transform basic male fertility cells, called spermatogonia, into mature sperm in test tubes.'

Recent false rape accusations/male suicide reports/related from India

Matt · 10 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sent in by a MANN reader in India:

Man attempts suicide due to wife's complaint against him

Police inspector shoots himself after wife charged him with 498a

Treated cruelly by wife, techie ends life

Man kills himself over 'harsh laws' in the name of protecting women

27-year-old husband committed suicide after in-laws and wife beat him. (Police didn't file case and finally they threatened him with filing an 498a charge.)

Man commits suicide after neighbour alleged him in a rape case of their daughter

Man jailed for 7 years for not marrying a woman he slept with

Top student from Indian's best university implicated in false 498a case, represented himself in court: lost job and career, but finally won the case.

Two- and four-year-olds charged in DV complaint

7-YO faces 498a charges

Fake rape case and forced abortion case file by a girl on her father

12-year-old filed rape complaint on cousin because he called her "insane"

Woman who filed 52 rape complaints

Woman files rape case against landlord after establishing consensual relationship with him

Men's helpline gets 25,000 calls over four months in one city alone

Bernie Sanders, über-feminist: Making America more Scandinavian would mark a gender equality breakthrough

Matt · 11 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Bernie Sanders wants America to look a lot more like Scandinavia, the land of lingonberries, herring, tasteful minimalism, paid family leave and living wages for fast food workers. The newly declared presidential contender told George Stephanopoulos over the weekend that he wants to lead a “political revolution” and make the United States more like Sweden or Denmark when it comes to healthcare, education and the social safety net.
...
"In those [Scandinavian] countries, health care is the right of all people,” Sanders said on “This Week.” “College education and graduate school is free. Retirement benefits [and] child care are stronger than the United States of America. In those countries, by and large, government works for ordinary people and the middle class, rather than, as is the case right now in our country, for the billionaire class.”
...
But Scandinavia has more going for it than just paid family leave and universal preschool. Beyond having supports in place to give families options when it comes to balancing work and home life, there has been a whole lot of experimentation in these countries to find how to make those programs really work.'

City Council Adopts Paid Paternity Leave Policy

Matt · 11 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. 'bout bloody time someone did. Excerpt:

'The Minneapolis City Council approved a new paid parental leave policy on Thursday. It was a unanimous vote to approve the policy that will allow employees to receive up to 120 hours of paid leave following childbirth or adoption.

“There are many reasons why paid parental leave makes sense,” Council President Barbara Johnson said in a news release. “Yes, it helps make employees better and more productive, and it also helps the City keep those skilled workers. But in the end, it’s what all employers should be offering their employees. Adding a member to a family is a big change, and parents need time to adjust for that.”'

Ex-Student Accused Of Sexual Misconduct Sues Over Disciplinary Warning

Mastodon · 11 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former Brandeis student is suing the university after it gave him a disciplinary warning for violating its code of sexual misconduct. He's claiming the investigation into the alleged misconduct deprived him of due process and the disciplinary warning jeopardizes his goal of attending law school and pursuing a career in public service and politics.

In his lawsuit, the student claims that by using a special examiner — a growing trend on college campuses — Brandeis deprived him of the most basic elements of fairness and due process. He says in the suit he never had an opportunity to confront his accuser, question witnesses or present a defense. He says he never knew what his accuser had said about him or what the factual basis for the charges against him were, and that he was never allowed to read the examiner's report. He says it was only after the examiner found him responsible of the charges against him that he learned of the specific conduct he was alleged to have engaged in.'

"The End of Feminism"

Mastodon · 11 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'After writing my last blog, How We and Protein World Confuses Beauty with Fitness, I was contacted by a number of women saying how much they agreed. A number of them said to me "it's good to see a man who is a feminist". I told them all "I'm not a feminist, the post isn't about feminism and I don't agree with feminism". In my view, we are approaching the end of feminism.

I'll get straight to the point. The reason why I believe this is simple; feminism has managed to achieve a lot for women but the last final push to full equity between the sexes requires greater engagement from men and feminism is utterly unequipped to do this. This is because feminists require men to change according to how they believe men should be, rather than men looking over their weaknesses and developing a strategy to change themselves. If anything, men have been going in the wrong direction over the last 10 years in response to hardline feminism, which vilifies masculinity and blames failure to achieve equity on men's inability to feminise.
...
Men, we have to stop this ladification, this mistreatment of women, this jealousy of their success. And women, you need to ditch feminism, this exclusive club created only for the betterment of women. If we all don't work hard to improve the masculine aspect of our society, we will be cursed with an ever increasing number of badly educated young men, angry at the world, taking it out on women, who are unable to find their place in society. We are destined for more divorces, more fatherless families and more men in prison.

So what do you truly want ladies? Feminism or a society in which men and women can achieve?'

Boyhood Under Attack: Why Boys Can't Just Be Boys Anymore

Matt · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video report here. Summary:

'Part one of a special six-part series.

Boys can no longer act like boys. The days of them exploring, experimenting and acting like young adventurers have been repleaced by more feminine activities. Young boys are also being medicated more when they don't actually need it. In fact, the majority of children being treated for ADHD are predominantly boys. So why is boyhood being drugged? Why are there so many gender disparities in education? What needs to be done to restore masculinity in boyhood? PJ Media's Dr. Helen Smith joins PJTV contributors Stephen Green, Scott Ott and Stephen Kruiser in this part one of this six part series hosted by Bill Whittle.'

Kickstarter Judaism: A Book Review of Celebrating Brit Shalom

Matt · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Review here. Excerpt:

'Reading Lisa Braver Moss and Rebecca Wald's new book, Celebrating Brit Shalom, feels a little like stepping into the future. Depending on how you feel about ritual Jewish circumcision, this future will either come across as utopian or dystopian. I certainly fall into the former category and in the interests of full disclosure, I both contributed to the Kickstarter campaign that made this publication possible and consulted on an early draft of the book. Nevertheless, I had a number of lingering questions when the finished product arrived at my doorstep. What is this book? Who is it meant for? And most importantly, did they pull it off?

Celebrating Brit Shalom is a work that glides effortlessly from how-to guide to new liturgy, to political statement and back again. It is written with a light touch that hides a profound and deliberate engagement with the Jewish tradition. Braver Moss and Wald offer three possible ceremonies for parents who oppose infant circumcision, but still wish to conduct a Jewish welcoming ritual for their newborn.'

Also see: Oakland author pushes ceremonies minus circumcision

How Taking Paternity Leave Can Strengthen Your Marriage

Matt · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Just over two weeks ago, a law went into effect in Massachusetts that got little national press but will have potentially significant consequences for families: Businesses must now extend fathers eight weeks of unpaid paternity leave. Yes, the Family Medical Leave Act already does as much (it allows up to 12, in fact), but only if the father's organization has 50 employees or more; with this new law, Massachusetts dads who work for companies with as few as six employees will be guaranteed eight weeks at home with their newborns.

Whenever this species of legislation is proposed at a national level, conservatives line up to oppose it, insisting it would penalize small businesses. There is, however, a conservative case to be made in favor of generous paternity-leave policies, and I'd like to make it now: They strengthen marriages.
...
Yet today in the United States, men take precious little paternity leave. According tothe Department of Labor, 70 percent of the new fathers who make use of the Family Medical Leave take just ten days or less. (Meaning that if dad takes his leave on the day his baby is born, odds are he'll be returning to work before his child can smile, coo, or tilt his or her head).

Ten days clearly isn't a lot of time. But one senses that fathers pine for more of it. Indeed, most studies suggest that fathers experience as much work-life conflict as mothers, if not more. One of the reasons, I suspect, is that they feel reluctant to ask for time away from the office — whether it's to spend time with a newborn or to duck out for a ballet recital — because it simply isn't custom.'

Also see: The valuable work benefit dads are missing out on

"Ham-handed" universiy sued by former student

Mastodon · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former San Diego State University student who was accused — charges were later dismissed — of sexual assault on a student in December of last year plans to take legal action against San Diego State University over the university's handling of the complaint.

Francisco Paiva Sousa filed a claim with California State University's risk management department on April 30. The claim is the first step in a lawsuit. Sousa, a foreign student from Portugal, was arrested on suspicion of forced copulation and false imprisonment of a fellow student on December 9 of last year. Days later, the district attorney's office dismissed the charges.

But the damage, says Sousa, was already done. In the days after the female student made the allegations, San Diego State's Center for Student Rights and Responsibilities had refused to meet with Sousa and declined to see text messages and other evidence, which Sousa says would have proved his innocence.

Most damaging for Sousa was the Community Safety Alert that the university sent via email days after the complaint notifying the students of the assault and naming Sousa as the alleged suspect.'

For those unfamiliar with it: ham-handed defined.

Governor of New York Calls for Strict Affirmative Consent Laws

Mastodon · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Gov. Andrew M. Cuomo, appearing at a Manhattan college with RepresentativeNancy Pelosi, on Monday called for the passage of “the toughest law in the nation” on campus sexual assault, a message aimed at state lawmakers who have expressed some reservations about his proposals.

Mr. Cuomo’s proposed policies, which are already in place at New York’s public colleges, would require private colleges to adopt “affirmative consent” as the standard of behavior, putting the burden on an accused student to show that the other person had agreed to the sexual activity, rather than making accusers prove that they had said no; silence or lack of resistance would not be considered consent.

Mr. Cuomo, a Democrat, has also proposed that students reporting sexual assaults must not be punished if they were violating a campus policy on drinking or drugs, with the goal of removing the fear that by coming forward, those reporting might be reprimanded, administration officials say. The proposed policies would also require strict penalties for anyone found guilty of sexual assault, with either suspension or expulsion the only available options.'

Title IX Expansion, Coming Soon To An Elementary School Near You

Mastodon · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Conflict, consternation, and litigation has spread across college campuses ever since a 2011 “Dear Colleague” letter from the Obama administration’s Office of Civil Rights launched a vast expansion of the Title IX bureaucracy. This Nixon-era law originally focused on banning relics of the past, such as male-only vocational education, but later was expanded by federal bureaucrats to enforce gender equity in college athletics, leading to de facto quotas. Since then, it has accrued new powers not because new powers were conferred by an act of Congress, but because executive branch administrators decided to reinterpret this 43-year-old statute to advance their political agenda.

The result? A flurry of lawsuits, breakdown of due process, and hastily established campus tribunals to adjudicate allegations of sexual assault and other crimes traditionally handled by the criminal justice system. Undeterred by this unfolding disaster in higher education, the Department of Education, via a new “Dear Colleague” letter, is now warning K-12 public school administrators that their federal funding will be at risk if they don’t embark on a similar course.'

A.C.L.U., Citing Bias Against Women, Wants Inquiry Into Hollywood's Hiring Practices

Mastodon · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Grumblings that Hollywood is a man's world have percolated for decades and are borne out in grim figures: Women directed only 4 percent of top-grossing films over the last dozen years. Now this apparent truism is being challenged as a violation of civil rights.

On Tuesday the American Civil Liberties Union asked state and federal agencies to investigate the hiring practices of major Hollywood studios, networks and talent agencies for what the organization described as rampant and intentional gender discrimination in recruiting and hiring female directors.

"Women directors aren't working on an even playing field and aren't getting a fair opportunity to succeed," said Melissa Goodman, director of the L.G.B.T., Gender and Reproductive Justice Project at the A.C.L.U. of Southern California. "Gender discrimination is illegal. And, really, Hollywood doesn't get this free pass when it comes to civil rights and gender discrimination."'

Illiberal Feminism Is Running Amok

Mastodon · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When men disagree with illiberal feminists, a favored silencing tactic is to accuse them of “mansplaining.” The term grew out of a fairly brilliant 2008 essay by feminist writer Rebecca Solnit, who described the exquisitely annoying feeling of having a certain type of man condescendingly lecture a woman on a topic about which he knows very little—in this case Solnit’s own book. This is certainly a phenomenon I and millions of other women have experienced, and it can be maddening. But the illiberal feminists have forged the notion of “mansplaining” into a weapon to silence any man who expresses an opinion at odds with feminist orthodoxy.
...
Illiberal feminists turn simple ideological disagreements, whether about the federal budget or the Second Amendment or anything else, into excuses to engage in character assassination, dismissing their opponents as sexists. Conservatives are their favorite targets, but any dissident can land in their crosshairs.'

'False rape report could have "chilling effect" on victims coming forward'

Mastodon · 12 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Two Salisbury men accused of rape and assault are now free after being cleared of those charges.

The woman that initially came forward claiming to have been raped apparently admitted to making up those allegations. She is facing a potential charge of “making a false statement to police” and could receive up to a $500 and/or prison time.

But the fear, is that the damage is already done.

“It’s hard enough for them to come in,” says Lieutenant Brian Swafford with the Fruitland Police Department. “They feel like they're going to be judged or not going to be believed or it's going to be their fault. Sometimes there will be a third party that lets us know and we reach out and try to get their end of the story a lot of times they're reluctant to tell us everything.”
...
“This is also a person crying out for help,” he says. “There’s a reason why a person does this, so another interest to the state is trying to get that person some assistance as well.”'

What causes Militant feminism?

ErikaLancastor · 13 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Androphobia

This is, in reality, what causes militant feminism. Androphobia, like its counter-illness, gynophobia, is a very real mental illness.

With militant feminism, we have a mental illness that is sanctioned by the federal government, perpetuated and exacerbated by the media and has its own organizations and even its own civil rights standards!

THIS is what militant feminism is, and that is ALL it is.

So now that we have identified the problem, what is the solution?

http://menshaven.wikifoundry.com/

Boys' baseball storage shed sparks bizarre Title IX complaint

Mastodon · 13 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'You'd best get out your hip waders, folks – we're about to wade through a steaming pile of government balderdash.

The controversy surrounds a storage shed built by the baseball booster club at Arbor View High School in Las Vegas. The youngsters needed a place to store their bats and balls and bases.

The boosters had wanted to build a clubhouse for the teenage ball players, but after months of delay they came up with an alternative plan.

One of the parents knew the owner of a company that made precast one-story buildings. The company offered to donate the manpower and materials to build the boys a shed.

Carl Pastrone, whose son is a pitcher and outfielder for the Arbor View Aggies, told me they pitched their plan to school administrators and were promptly given a green light. That was in 2014.

The storage shed was erected last September. Boosters installed doors and gave the shed a coat of paint – nothing elaborate.

"It cost the booster club zero," Carl told me.

And that was that – until a few months ago.

That's when officials with the Clark County School District showed up at the school and demanded that the storage shed be torn down. They said it violated Title IX.

Title IX states: "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."'

Student Who Banned Whites, Men From Diversity Event Insists: “I Can’t Be Racist Because I’m Not White”

Mastodon · 13 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A student who banned white people and men from a students’ union equality event has insisted that she can’t be racist because she is an “ethnic minority woman”.

Publicity for event claimed that it aimed to be all about “challenge the white-centric culture of occupations”, “diversifying our curriculum” and building a “cross-campus campaign that puts liberation at the heart of the movement”.

But when Bahar Mustafa, Goldsmith University’s Students Union Welfare and Diversity officer, took to Facebook to invite people to the event, she insisted that it was for “BME Women and non-binary people” only, adding “if you’ve been invited and you’re a man and/or white PLEASE DON’T COME”.

Breitbart London reported at the time that Miss Mustafa had repeatedly confirmed that the event was segregated.

Her remarks quickly drew criticism from Goldsmiths students, who branded her comments “patronising” and “laughable”.

A senior member of the Students Union who wished to remain anonymous told The Tab “For Bahar to have the nerve to write this is patronising beyond belief.

“She (if that is her preferred gender pronoun) has made it very difficult for white cis males on campus who feel like they can’t say anything for fear of retribution. The irony that she (or they) think that they are diversifying the student community in the name of feminism and multiculturalism is laughable.”'

"Girls With Autism Fare Worse Than Boys, Study Finds"

Minuteman · 13 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

More feminisation of a men's and boy's health concern. Link here. Excerpt:

'While girls are far less likely than boys to be diagnosed with autism, girls with the developmental disorder show more impairments compared to their healthy female peers than comparable sets of boys do, new research suggests.

Scientists from the University of California Davis MIND Institute contend that girls with autism may suffer from greater social deficits than boys with the condition, which is characterized by problems with emotional and communication skills.

"Many of the studies looking for behavioral differences in autism have only compared boys and girls with autism and not to their typically developing counterparts," said study author Christine Wu Nordahl, an assistant professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences.
...
About one in 68 American children is diagnosed with autism, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, but boys are more than four times as likely to be affected.'

Parody: "The Oberlin College choir responds to the Christina Sommers controversy"

Matt · 14 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Parody song here. Because if you don't laugh, you'll cry.

The Horror: Jessica Valenti Terrorized on Subway by ‘Passively Sexist’ Twitter Feed

Mastodon · 14 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'If you take public transportation and use social media on a mobile device, beware of rubbernecking feminists.

Specifically, beware Guardian columnist Jessica Valenti. Some poor guy had the misfortune to be sitting next to her while checking his Twitter feed on the subway in New York yesterday. And just like that, average straphanger became “passive sexist.”

Valenti saw something, but she didn’t say something. At least not directly. She took to Twitter instead, like the truly courageous activists do.

The tweet brought her well-deserved Twitter scorn, with users calling it the “dumbest tweet of the year” and some recalling an earlier Valenti tweet in which she whined about “women on the subway” having no right to “privacy.”'

UK: TV Host Calls Out Audience for Laughing at Male Domestic Violence Victim

Mastodon · 14 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'During a recent episode of The Jeremy Kyle Show (essentially a British analogue to The Maury Show), the eponymous host had a guest on named Geoff to discuss his relationship with his violent pregnant ex-girlfriend, and to see whether he was the father of the baby. (We told you it was kind of like Maury.)

Geoff described in great detail an episode where he'd been locked in his apartment by the ex, and the only way to escape was to jump off a third-story balcony, prompting the audience to burst into giggles.

"It's not funny though is it?" Kyle said quickly, hushing the audience. "I don't want to upset anyone in the audience, because I completely appreciate the fact that you're here, but I'll tell you why I don't think you should laugh: if a woman was sat here and a bloke had locked her in a flat and she'd been forced to jump out, you lot would not be laughing. You would be saying 'He is a total nightmare, he should be locked up and this is disgraceful.' But somehow it's happened to a bloke — it is not funny."

The chastised audience quickly reversed course and applauded Kyle's statement.

Brit Shalom ceremonies – resources

Matt · 14 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Listing here. Excerpt:

'This page includes a huge array of information about Jewish circumcision (brit milah), and its modern alternative, brit shalom.

It is a vast subject, and tends to provoke strong emotional reactions on both sides of the argument. While I am a deeply committed Jew, and active in the Jewish community as a prayer leader, teacher, cantor and celebrant, I oppose circumcision on anything other than urgent medical grounds, whether for an infant or an adult. I oppose brit milah as a practice, as well as circumcision of an adult male at the time of conversion to Judaism. Neither is necessary according to even the most stringent halachah (Jewish law), even though many Jews insist upon it. I profoundly support the practice of brit shalom – naming and welcoming infants into their Jewish life and people through a ceremony that does not include cutting anything or drawing any blood.'

Three Recent Lawsuits Challenge the ‘Rape Crisis’ Storyline

Mastodon · 14 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Yes, there are victims of America’s alleged college “rape crisis.” There are the women who are actually raped — who experience among the worst of crimes and live with the psychological and sometimes physical consequences for the rest of their lives. But there are also other victims, people whose lives are ruined by false accusations, with reputations destroyed in the quest to prove a larger narrative — that America’s college campuses are uniquely dangerous places for American women.

Three recently filed lawsuits show the other side of the “rape crisis,” how the media glosses over ambiguity to advance an agenda, creating heroes out of potential liars and villains out of the possibly innocent. I say “potential” and “possible” because in the real world, ambiguity is common and clarity is rare. But its difficult to create a crisis out of confusion, so agenda-driven “journalists” manufacture clarity, no matter the cost.

The three most prominent campus rape stories of the past year — Columbia University’s “mattress” protest, the Rolling Stone hoax, and former Florida State University quarterback Jameis Winston’s alleged assault — are now the subject of three unusual lawsuits. Each lawsuit directly challenges rape narratives that the plaintiffs claim were deeply harmful to their reputations, finances, and emotional well-being.'

Councilwoman’s ‘white men’ comment offends some followers

Mastodon · 15 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A public Facebook post from Leesburg Town Council member Kelly Burk implying white men shouldn't serve on the town's new Diversity Commission is stirring both anger and debate on social media.

Town Council on Tuesday night appointed seven members to the newly created Diversity Commission, this despite council member's Tom Dunn abstention from the vote to finalize the membership.

On Wednesday, Burk, the nonpartisan council's vice chair, wrote: “Last Night at the Leesburg Town Council meeting, the council nominated their appointees for the newly formed Diversity Commission. I have no doubt that each nominee will be an important member of the commission but I did find it somewhat ironic that two Republicans council members appointed white men to the diversity council.”

Ex-boyfriend, stabbed 13 times, urges others to seek domestic violence help

Mastodon · 15 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Like many domestic violence victims, Keith Peterson put off getting help, over and over again.

That all changed after he found himself lying in a Fargo hospital bed last July, covered in gashes and stitches from 13 stab wounds suffered in a knife attack at the hands of his then-girlfriend Carly Ann Lacey at a Minnesota campsite.

The 10-month road to help hasn't been easy.

"I lost everything," said Peterson, including his health, his job, his home and his relationship with Lacey, whom he almost married several months before the slashing. "But I've gained so much more. I got everything back."

Why Some Male Members of Congress Won’t Be Alone with Female Staffers

Mastodon · 15 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's no secret that Congress is dominated by men, but as women work to make inroads in the congressional boys club, some female staffers face a huge impediment to moving up: They're not allowed to spend one-on-one time with their male bosses.

In an anonymous survey of female staffers conducted by National Journal in order to gather information on the difficulties they face in a male-dominated industry, several female aides reported that they have been barred from staffing their male bosses at evening events, driving alone with their congressman or senator, or even sitting down one-on-one in his office for fear that others would get the wrong impression.

...

Male staffers said they'd also seen some female aides barred from solo meetings with the boss, and that they benefited in some instances from the exclusion of their female colleagues in high-level meetings, at receptions with major Washington powerbrokers, and just in earning a little more face time with their bosses.

For these women, the lack of access has meant an additional hurdle in their attempts to do their jobs, much less further their own careers. And in many instances, it forced them to seek employment in other congressional offices.'

University: more ‘secure’ men will eradicate campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 16 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What can men at Troy University do to help stop sexual violence? According to a university pamphlet, simply be secure in themselves.

A pamphlet on sexual violence at Troy—obtained by Campus Reform—lists seven things students can do to “stop sexual violence,” including, “be secure.”

“Secure men are sensitive to others,” the pamphlet reads. “Explore your own insecurities & live your life in a way that is non-threatening to women.”
...
“The pamphlet insinuates that because men have insecurities, they are more at risk to be sexual predators,” Courtney Brown, a junior global business major at Troy, told Campus Reform. “A lot of people have insecurities—it doesn’t mean they’re going to be a rapist.”
...
Samantha Harris, director of policy research at FIRE, called Troy’s harassment policy “pretty clearly unconstitutional” as “it essentially says that if you are discussing any number of controversial issues related to race, religion, etc., you have committed harassment under this policy if another person subjectively finds your speech offensive.”'

Police: Wife Kills Man Hours After He Gets Restraining Order Against Her

Mastodon · 17 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Police say a Pennsylvania woman fatally shot her husband hours after he got a restraining order from her.

Allegheny County police say 55-year-old Patricia Katchur shot her husband after returning to their home Wednesday evening. They say she had been living with her sister since the couple fought Saturday, and she had returned to get some belongings earlier Wednesday.

McKeesport police allowed her into the home after 52-year-old Christopher Katchur refused. After she left with her belongings, police advised him to get a protection-from-abuse order.

Police say Patricia Katchur returned to the home by removing a window air conditioner and fell asleep there. Police say her husband returned and woke her up, and she shot him as they walked onto the front porch.'

‘Transgender’ Director on Hollywood Sexism: ‘Sue the Motherf*ckers’

Mastodon · 17 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"I remember three or four years ago being interviewed and saying, ‘Men aren’t doing this on purpose. It’s not their fault. Nobody’s trying to keep women down.’ But something I’ve recognized over the past few years is, I’ve really begun to listen to conversations about implicit bias and privilege.

It very simply makes the world easier for white cis [cisgender, a non-Trans individual] males to have entertainment written by white cis males, where white cis males are the protagonists and the world revolves around them. That’s privilege. Writing is propaganda for the self."
...
“Let’s sue Hollywood! Sue the motherf*ckers. Sue all of them! It’s been a big week–women speaking up and holding hands,” she said in reference to an announcement that the ACLU has launched an investigation to target gender discrimination in Hollywood.

“Yes...things are changing,” she added.

Furthermore, Soloway believes in affirmative action, a formula is very simple to her:

"That white cis male gaze, they’re like a lifeguard chair, they’re in like a watch tower, way up high naming things and they’re not gonna give up those look-out spots easily. In fact, most of the time they won’t even cop to the fact that they have that privilege.

Instead of waiting for the industry to change or waiting for the guys to change, let’s storm the gates, grab hands with each other, run like Red Rover to those lifeguard chairs, snarl at the bases of those watch towers like starving beast-dogs, boost each other up those f*cking things and tear those motherf*ckers down, like vile lady-dogs."'

University looking to change student judicial process

Mastodon · 17 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Students at the University of Tennessee could soon see a new kind of punishment.

In 2013, a team of people from UT and other institutions reviewed the Office of Student Judicial Affairs and the punishment process.
...
The team made 39 recommendations at the conclusion of the review, and 35 of those are up for approval for the 2015-2016 school year.

"I think that when, decades ago, when student codes of conduct were developed, they were really modeled after the legalistic or the criminal process that's used," Carilli said. "Clearly, from an educational perspective, that's not the way to involve education or infuse education into the process."

Moving forward, Carilli said the university is looking to adopt an educational or developmental judicial process so students can better learn from their mistakes, as opposed to simply receiving a punitive punishment.

"Our goal is to make sure that students learn from the process, and if they learn from the process, that they won't make the same mistakes twice," he said.'

UK's Prince Harry calls for return of national service

Minuteman · 18 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Harry, 30, fifth in line to the throne, told The Sunday Times that his 10-year career in the British Army had done "amazing things" for him.

"Bring back national service," Harry said.

"I dread to think where I'd be without the army...And more importantly to me, what I've seen the army do to other young guys."
...
Harry is due to quit the army next month, having said earlier in the year that he is at a crossroads in life and explaining that taking on more royal duties he would not have the time to focus on his army job.
...
He was speaking to the newspaper in New Zealand, where he has spent the last week on a tour, after previously completing a month-long secondment to the Australian Defence Force.
...
Under Britain's unwritten constitution, the royal family is supposed to remain above politics, and Queen Elizabeth has kept her opinions to herself during her 63-year reign.

Harry is planning to spend three months this summer in southern Africa, pursuing his interests in wildlife and conservation.'

UK: School bans girls from wearing skirts to stop male teachers from 'feeling uncomfortable'

Minuteman · 18 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Headteacher Sarah Pashley says all pupils will now be expected to wear approved trousers bearing the school logo bought from designated suppliers.

...

Ms Pashley said: “We have a very simple school uniform, which we enforce strictly.

“On one occasion when a male member of staff challenged a female student on her skirt length, she retorted, ‘You shouldn’t be looking at my legs’.

“The male member of staff was understandably uncomfortable with this and reported it to me immediately. Male staff asked me to share this incident with the governing body when uniform was reviewed.”

...

Another parent claimed that female staff at the school fail to set a good example. She said: “Some female staff wear high heels, short skirts and low-cut blouses.

Are they going to be wearing trousers?”

...

Some parents even claim that preventing girls wearing skirts is a breach of their human rights.

...

Campaign for Real Education chairman Chris McGovern backed the parents saying: “This is a daft and unfair decision that discriminates against girls.'

Jane Crow To 1940 Movies

Robber748 · 18 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Essays here. Excerpt from the third installment:

'A great deal of women's self-indulgence is based on their victimization. Women gain much power by being victims. Feminism insists that women are always victims, in every endeavor, and that men are always the victimizers and are never victims themselves.

The fear of black men raping white women has long been an impetus for the subjugation of blacks in America. For example, feminist Rebecca Felton said in 1897, "If it requires lynching to protect woman's dearest possession from ravening, drunken human beasts, then I say lynch a thousand negroes a week...." This fear was instrumental in leading to riots, the take-over of governments by whites after Reconstruction, and Jim Crow. There seems to be a similar rape crisis in America today, in which feminists are greatly exaggerating the danger of rape and sexual assault to all women by all men. This rape fear-mongering and other exaggerations and outright lies, just like Jim Crow, are also leading to unjust legislation and practices today. For example, people scoffed when Oberlin College initiated oppressive dating rules for men a few years ago, but those "affirmative consent" rules are now the law in California universities. The Department of Education has demanded that colleges end much due process for male students accused of sexual misconduct, or the colleges risk losing federal funding. Denial of the large number of false rape accusations leads to punishment of innocent men. Many women are demanding that all fraternities close. Sexual harassment rules have made traditional male sexual behavior in the workplace very risky. The Nordic Model makes prostitution illegal, but only for the buyer, i.e., men. The Tender Years Doctrine almost always gives custody of children to mothers. The Duluth Model and policies that demand that police arrest the bigger, stronger person in a domestic dispute, almost always make men guilty of domestic violence. These all point to feminists using an exaggerated fear of rape and other exaggerations to initiate a system of "Jane Crow" against American men. Of course, it is not likely to be anywhere as serious and oppressive as Jim Crow, but it certainly deserves our attention and condemnation.'

Woman pleads guilty to raping man while he slept, gets 9 months in jail

Mastodon · 18 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

"Chantae Marie Gilman a West Seattle, Washington mother of three has pled guilty to breaking into a man's apartment and raping him whilst he slept.

As part of her plea deal, Chantae Gilman will be required to serve nine months jail, serve a two year probation as well as register as a sex offender.

Originally charged with second degree rape, charges against the woman for reasons not necessarily understood were amended leading to a reduced criminal count.

At the time of the June 2013 rape, her victim a 31 year old man testified that he 'recognized Gilman as a drug user in the area' and had woken up to find her on top of him, pinning his hands down over his hands.

According to court papers the victim demanded his attacker get off him but she refused telling him 'to be quiet.'"

Samantha Power and the analogy from hell

Mastodon · 18 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Samantha Power, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations has tweeted the following:

"From a wmn carrying a mattress on her campus to Afghanistan's Wmn's Nat Cycling Team, reaching true equality req showing change is possible."

The woman with a mattress is, as Katie Pavlich explains, a reference to Emma Sulkowicz. She is the Columbia University student who carried a mattress around the campus as part of her "carry that weight campaign." Her goal was to show how heavy the burden of rape is on a woman. Sulkowicz said she had been raped and would follow her rapist with the mattress until he was brought to justice.

But from all that appears, Sulkowicz wasn't raped:

"Paul Nungesser, the Columbia University student accused of raping fellow student Emma Sulkowicz, is now suing the university for doing nothing to stop Sulkowicz's harassment campaign against him, which he claims "effectively destroyed" his college experience, reputation, and future career prospects.

His lawsuit contains a wealth of new information about the contested sexual assault, including dozens of messages establishing Sulkowicz's sexual "yearning" for Nungesser, which she sent to him both before and after the alleged incident."

Power's analogy is therefore completely out of line. ...'

Japan: Bar Coasters Drawing the Connection Between Drinking and Domestic Violence

Mastodon · 18 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'As the video above shows, images on these “Violent Coasters” were created with a special thermochemical ink. When patrons set their ice-filled drinks down on one of the squares, the cold temperature of the glass causes the picture of a woman to transform, with cuts and bruises appearing on her face.

Accompanying the image are the words, “Don’t let excessive drinking end in domestic violence.” That will be a welcome message to the roughly 33 percent of women and 17 percent of men in Japan who have experienced some kind of domestic violence, according to a 2006 survey from Japan’s Gender Equality Bureau.

Whether drink coasters in a bar are effective in addressing such a serious and significant problem remains to be seen. But the guys in the video certainly seem shocked by the coasters’ change, so let’s hope these coasters spark conversations that raise awareness and change behavior.'

Student Graduates While Carrying Mattress

Mastodon · 19 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Emma Sulkowicz, the Columbia University student who carried a mattress around the school all year to raise awareness of campus sexual assault, attended her college graduation ceremony on Tuesday while carrying the mattress.

Ms. Sulkowicz, who graduated magna cum laude, brought her mattress with her as she walked across the stage in the processional, to cheers from audience members. Multiple friends helped her carry the mattress as she walked across the stage.

On Tuesday, she brought it with her to her graduation ceremony, and walked with it during the processional. Four fellow female graduates helped her carry the mattress as she walked across the stage to cheers from the audience.'

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand And 'House Of Cards' Creator Beau Willimon Debunk The Biggest Myths About Rape

Mastodon · 20 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Descriptive excerpt:

'The important conversation about the realities of sexual assault in America hit the stage this year with "SLUT: The Play," which follows the tale of a 16-year-old girl who is raped by three friends. The play lands in Washington, D.C., on May 19, and two of its biggest supporters -- Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) and "House of Cards" creator Beau Willimon -- talked with HuffPost Live on Monday about the necessity of tackling the rape taboo.

During a conversation with host Caroline Modarressy-Tehrani, Gillibrand and Willimon responded to a viewer question about society's biggest misconceptions about sexual assault and how to shift the paradigm that often mischaracterizes rape as "a college prank or boys being boys."

Campus Sexual Assault: More Awareness Hasn't Solved Root Issues

Mastodon · 20 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Accused parties, too, have begun fighting back. Several students who had been accused of sexual assault this year have filed lawsuits against their colleges and universities over what they say are flawed investigations and a failure of the schools to protect their rights. Paul Nungesser, who was accused of raping fellow Columbia University student Emma Sulkowicz and later found not responsible, last month filed a federal discrimination lawsuit against the university, claiming his Title IX rights were violated. Drew Sterrett, a former University of Michigan student, last May also sued his school, saying he was denied due process during the sexual assault investigation. And Kevin Parisi, a student at Drew University, filed a lawsuit against the university in which he alleges that the school's investigation hurt his academic career, although he was not found responsible for the alleged assault.

A group of Harvard professors also came to the defense of those accused of committing sexual assault when the university changed its policies last July to create an office dedicated to processing sexual assault complaints and to change the definition of sexual harassment, among other things. More than two dozen law professors said in a letter that, while they support protecting students, the policy "will do more harm than good" and is "overwhelmingly stacked against the accused."'

Meet the mothers who think they deserve a 'wife bonus'

Mastodon · 20 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Women are notoriously bad at asking for bonuses. Which is why I did my homework and created - as BusinessInsider.com suggested - a "master plan".

I waited "the appropriate amount of time" (in my case, five years), made sure the big boss was in a good mood and took him out to lunch ("somewhere intimate, where there will be no interruptions"). I eschewed any usage of the word "need" (stinking, as it does, of desperation) in my pitch - which was "backed up with reports, charts and documentation of my positive performance" - and I tried to "remain respectful" as he stared slack-jawed back at me, before throwing his head back and roaring with laughter.

Asking my own husband for a bonus simply for being his wife was never going to be anything less than preposterous. Yet according to the author of Primates of Park Avenue, this is what a glittering tribe of crispy-haired Upper East Side Manhattan wives do every year - depending, of course, on how well they have managed the domestic budget, socialised, upheld a variety-filled performance in the bedroom and succeeded in getting the kids into a "Big Ten" university.'

UK: Pensioner cleared of 'false memory' farm rape claims

Mastodon · 20 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A pensioner has been cleared of raping a girl on a farm 40 years after a jury were told the alleged victim may have been affected by false memory syndrome.

Roger Mennell, aged 67, has never been in trouble in his life but has spent two years fighting the allegations which the woman made during psychotherapy sessions.

She alleged he had raped and sexually assaulted her while visiting her family at a farm near Tiverton in the 1970s when she was seven or eight.

She told Exeter Crown Court how Mennell had used a knife to stab, cut open and kill a farm cat as a means of terrifying her into silence. She allegedly he said he would do the same to her family if she revealed his abuse.

If You're Tired Of Rape Hoaxes, These Posters Are For You

Mastodon · 20 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Emma Sulkowicz. Lena Dunham. UVA's "Jackie." These days you can't turn around without running into somebody who's making a false claim of rape to get attention. And our moral, ethical, and intellectual betters applaud them. The truth doesn't matter. The lives of the falsely accused don't matter. Only the agenda matters.

If you're as sick of these liars as I am, this will be a welcome sight:'

Also see: 'Mattress Girl' Is a Perfect Icon for the Feminist Left

Statement from family of Columbia student accused by mattress girl

Mastodon · 21 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The family of Paul Nungesser, the student who was accused of rape by mattress-toting Columbia University student Emma Sulkowicz, have released a statement about their son's graduation, calling their experience with the university "deeply humiliating."

"Our son's graduation should have been a joyous moment for our whole family. We are extremely proud of Paul for graduating, even more so because of the harassment campaign he was subjected to. For over two years, he had to fight false accusations and a public witch-hunt, even though Columbia and the NYPD exonerated him," Karin Nungesser and Andreas Probosch wrote in a statement provided to the Washington Examiner.

Nungesser's parents blasted Columbia for continuing to allow Sulkowicz to harass their son, as evidenced by her graduation stunt of carrying the mattress across stage and displaying drawings of their son at a public art exhibit the week before.'

Prosecutors reject charges in high school sexual assault case

ThomasI · 21 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Police and prosecutors declined to provide details about the case because it involved both juveniles and allegations of sex crimes. Legal experts acknowledged the difficulty in prosecuting those types of cases, but said the LAPD may have moved too quickly.

“This is a very embarrassing episode for the investigators,” said Dmitry Gorin, a defense attorney who once prosecuted sex crimes. “In high-profile cases like this, it is best for the police to coordinate with prosecutors and get them to review the allegations before making any arrests.”

LAPD Cmdr. Andrew Smith said the department “stands by our decision to make arrests based on the information we had and circumstances at that time.”'

“Rape Culture” and the Implications for Liberty on College Campuses

Mastodon · 21 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'College campuses are placing a stronger emphasis on reducing sexual assault. Unfortunately, universities and colleges often adopt heavy-handed policies to punish alleged offenders based on abstractions or simplistic understandings of college student attitudes and behavior. One of the more problematic over generalizations is the concept of the “rape culture” and the pervasive use of the term interferes with our understanding of the nature of campus sexual assault and identifying practical solutions that are more consistent with individual liberty.

“Rape culture” posits that our colleges and universities are dens for sexual predators that promote violence against women and, more importantly, is institutionally supported. Since the problem is cultural, rather than individual, the solution is institutional–categorical policies that provide little room for context or individual circumstance. Also, because the problem is systemic, extraordinary means can be justified to bring it under control, including abrogating due process, tilting adjudication in favor of the accuser rather than the accused, and implementing draconian measures despite a lack of evidence to support the allegations. Emily Yoffe at Slate.com does a nice job of laying out these dangers as does Christina Hoff Sommers of the American Enterprise Institute.

But what if a rape culture doesn’t exist?'

NPO: OCSE Commissioner to Report Sexism Concerns to Massachusetts Child Support Agency

Matt · 22 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Two years ago, the National Parents Organization's Ned Holstein reported the shocking news that, in Massachusetts, non-custodial fathers who are behind on their child support payments are eight times as likely to be sent to jail as non-custodial mothers in arrears. That information came to NPO courtesy of the yeoman work of Terry Brennan who dogged the sheriff's departments of all Bay State counties for their data on child support enforcement. The results were astonishing: between 95% and 98.5% of those incarcerated in every county were fathers.

U.S. Census Bureau figures on child support payment demonstrate that mothers with child support arrears are incarcerated at approximately one-eighth of the rate that would be justified by their numbers if fathers and mothers in arrears were treated equally. Mothers in arrears are incarcerated at lower rates even though they have higher rates of incomplete payment, pay a smaller percentage of their child support order, and have larger arrears than fathers. In the absence of other explanations, these data suggest that gender bias against fathers plays a large role in family court-ordered incarcerations.'

"Celebrating Brit Shalom" released

Matt · 22 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'Notim Press is pleased to announce the publication of Celebrating Brit Shalom, the first book written specifically for Jewish families opting out of circumcision. The book includes a choice of three bris-without-circumcision ceremonies, designed to be either family-led or rabbi-led. It also features sheet music to four original songs written to accompany the ceremonies (recorded versions available separately). The volume is already receiving praise from rabbis and other Jewish thinkers.

"Without asking anyone's permission, [Lisa] Braver Moss and [Rebecca] Wald have crafted a beautiful series of alternative welcoming ceremonies that are in deep conversation with the Jewish tradition. The fact that Celebrating Brit Shalom exists is a testament to both the ingenuity of its creators and the vitality of the Jewish tradition," says Tikkun Magazine.

Rabbi Irwin Kula, President of the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, has endorsed the book and says, "Celebrating Brit Shalom will help thousands of people and no doubt open up new conversations of heart, mind and spirit."'

SAVE: High-Profile Lawsuits Reveal Problem of False Allegations of Sexual Assault

Matt · 22 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'Recent lawsuits arising from alleged incidents of campus sexual assault are renewing long-standing concerns about the problem of false accusations. In recent weeks, three high-profile lawsuits have been filed involving students or administrators at major universities.

In late April, student Paul Nungesser charged in a lawsuit that Columbia University collaborated in a campaign of harassment against him when accuser Emma Sulkowicz launched her nationally publicized “mattress” campaign, even though the Columbia U. disciplinary committee found no wrong-doing and local police declined to pursue the case.

On May 8, former Florida State University student Jameis Winston filed a lawsuit against accuser Erica Kinsman, saying her allegations of sexual assault were “false, defamatory … and have maliciously and impermissibly interfered with Mr. Winston’s business and personal relationships.” Winston had been cleared of the assault charges in three separate investigations.'

As Another Accusation Bites the Dust, Columbia Rape Saga Takes New Turn

Matt · 22 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This week's graduation at Columbia University caps the bizarre, often sordid saga involving the two most famous members of the Class of 2015: Emma Sulkowicz, the activist who protested the school's alleged mishandling of her alleged rape by carrying a mattress around campus, and Jean-Paul Nungesser, the German scholarship student she accuses of raping her. On Tuesday, Sulkowicz carried her mattress across the stage at Class Day, despite half-hearted attempts by Columbia officials to enforce a regulation against bringing "large objects" into the ceremonial area—and despite the fact that the "mattress performance" was for a senior visual arts thesis she had already completed. Her activism was also lauded (with no mention of her name) by two commencement speakers, Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti and United Nations Ambassador Samantha Power.

This isn't quite the end of the story: Nungesser is suingColumbia, university president Lee Bollinger, and Sulkowicz's thesis supervisor for allowing him to be subjected to "gender-based harassment" which severely damaged his educational experience and future prospects, even though a campus panel found him not culpable on the sexual assault charge. Meanwhile, there is new information related to one of this story's many strange twists: another sexual assault complaint brought against Nungesser late last year by a male classmate. The charge was made public in February, on the heels of my article in The Daily Beast questioning the pro-Sulkowicz narrative.

Now, I have learned that after a hearing in late April, Nungesser was found "not responsible" in this latest case—altogether, the fourth time he has been cleared of a sexual assault charge at Columbia. When Sulkowicz first went public a year ago, the fact that her alleged attacker was still on campus and had never been subjected to any formal sanctions despite being accused of sexual assault by three different women helped fuel the outrage. Yet the latest investigation strongly supports Nungesser's claim, made in media interviews and in his lawsuit, that the multiple complaints were not independent of each other and may have been part of a vendetta stemming from the original charge by Sulkowicz.'

Ohio NPO Volunteers: Get Ready for Battle

Matt · 22 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There's a storm forming on the Ohio horizon. Two pieces of legislation will be introduced soon that directly affect child support. You will need to help us kill the bad parts of these bills. Both will be recycled versions of earlier bills that National Parents Organization helped kill in previous years. We were kindly notified of these bills by the Ohio Child Support Directors Association because they are aware of our record of activism.

The first bill will almost certainly be passed in some form, because federal law requires parts of it. So we must unite to eliminate other parts of the bill that are not mandated. It would shorten the time period for the alleged father to object to an administrative determination of paternity from 30 days to 14 days. Worse, it would start the clock with the issuance of the order, not the receipt of it, or even the date of mailing.

There have been cases in which an order of paternity was issued, the clerk didn't get around to mailing it for several days, the post office was slowed down by Christmas mail, and "dad" happened to be away for a few days when it did arrive. If this bill would pass, even if a DNA test would show that "dad" is not the real dad, he would be too late to contest the order by the time he even saw it for the first time, and would be on the hook for child support for at least 18 years.'

University defends policies on sexual assault allegations, seeks lawsuit's dismissal

Mastodon · 23 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Washington and Lee University urged a federal judge in Lynchburg on Friday to toss out a lawsuit filed by a student who was expelled last year on grounds of sexual misconduct.

The student, referred to only as John Doe in court, is claiming the school's disciplinary process violated federal law by discriminating against him because he's male.

His lawsuit also argues he was deprived of due process and claims the decision against him was influenced by the now-discredited Rolling Stone article on an alleged assault at the University of Virginia. The article came out one day before the student's hearing at W&L.

W&L maintained its process was reasonable. The process is sensitive to students who file complaints of sexual assault, it argued, but that alone is not gender bias.

"It's not a question of gender," said W&L attorney R. Craig Wood, adding federal guidelines direct colleges to show sensitivity to victims and that would hold true regardless of their gender.

"The complainant's real disagreement here is with federal policy," he said.

"The best way to eliminate the gender pay gap? Ban salary negotiations"

Mastodon · 23 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Ellen Pao, interim chief executive of Reddit, announced last month a ban on salary negotiations at the social media company. Her stated goal: to eliminate the persistent disadvantage that women have at the bargaining table.

Her pronouncement came just days after Pao lost a high-profile sex-discrimination lawsuit against one of Silicon Valley's biggest venture-capital firms. Since then, she has insisted that companies "can't just hide" from sexism in their workplaces and must be proactive in counteracting discrimination. Still, while it is true thatwomen earn about 78 cents, on average, for every dollar a man makes for comparable work, Pao's no-negotiating policy has struck many as absurd.'

"I'll only invest in startups with female founders"

Mastodon · 23 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'No women, no deal.

That's the vow that angel investor and entrepreneur Jonathan Sposato has taken.

Sposato, who is based in Seattle, made a bold claim: He will only back businesses that have at least one woman on the founding team.

"I am no longer going to invest unless you have at least one female founder," Sposato told CNNMoney. "I won't say yes."
...
Spasato sees nearly 100 startups per year looking for funding -- and the vast majority don't have any female founders.

"There is a marked difference in the traction companies get depending on the gender of its founders," Sposato said.

Male entrepreneurs can help change that.

"We have to change the balance of how people think about starting companies," he said.'

"When men behave badly"

Mastodon · 23 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Men are idiots. They have a much higher idiot factor than women do, especially when young. This fundamental difference between the sexes will never be eradicated no matter how hard we try. (Although try we must.)
...
From an evolutionary standpoint, this makes sense. Men are far more dispensable than women. What does it matter if some of them get trampled by mastodons, race their cars off cliffs or club each other to death when they feel their manhood is insulted? The gene pool is better off without them.

The same thing is true today. What's changed is the wider set of skills and aptitudes – such as self-control, a high degree of socialization, rule-following and respect for women – that men now need for survival in the modern world. No man today could possibly be stupid enough to believe that he can actually get away with harassing women at work – or with shouting obscenities to female TV reporters on the street as the camera is rolling – or with crude sexual comments at a mixed company event. These poor saps might as well hurl their careers down an elevator shaft.'

Girls beating boys in academics: Guy thing or failing system?

Mastodon · 23 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Several theories attempt to explain why boys and girls have markedly different educational outcomes:

• Because the academic gap exists across ages, societies and races, researchers suggest intellectual maturity and normal child development favor females. The gap is widest at the middle-school level.

• Physiology plays a role. Adolescence can disrupt education as boys and girls develop. The age of puberty is when teachers begin to see the differences.

• Behavior is big. Boys are 2½ times more likely to be suspended and nearly three times more likely to be expelled, according to Ohio Department of Education data. They also drop out of school more often.

• Girls might think differently. Educators say they are less oppositional and deeper thinkers.

• Society could be to blame. Boys are encouraged to be aggressive, which would explain the defiant behavior and the dominance in high-paying corporate positions. Stereotypical gender roles drive boys to competitive sports and girls to reading and writing — two subjects in which they dominate boys.

• The last reason is more nuanced. Is it possible that test results aren't a reflection of academic potential, but instead suggest that the education system is failing boys?'

"White men are the problem" prof still has job even after confession of criminal impersonation on dating site

Matt · 23 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Think a man would still have a job by now if the sexes/ethnicities were reversed? Not a chance. Excerpt:

"The controversial Boston University professor who said white men were 'the problem' for America's colleges and told a rape victim to 'go cry somewhere' also set up a fake account on an adult dating site depicting another woman, it has been revealed.

Saida Grundy, who has been under intense scrutiny following a string of controversial comments on social media, set up the profile on Fling.com, which is used for casual sex, because she was 'jealous' of the victim.

The black sociology professor, who will start her role at the university on July 1, set up the page pretending to be a woman who was dating one of her ex-boyfriends.

In December 2007, while studying at the University of Michigan, she stole photos of the woman from the man's email account and then posted them online.

The victim from Charlotte, North Carolina, discovered the account in June, 2008, and called police in Ann Arbor, Boston.com reported.

As a result, Grundy was charged with felony counts of identity theft and using computers to commit a crime.

She was also charged with a misdemeanor count of malicious use of a telecommunications service.

In the end she struck a deal with prosecutors and pleaded guilty to the misdemeanor in exchange for the felony charges being dropped.

In a statement to the site, she said: 'When this incident occurred I was 24, and exercised the poor judgment of a heartbroken 24 year old.

'I took accountability then as I do now. I hold true to the lessons learned, and my life has since moved on.'"

"Ironic Misandry Claims Its First Victim"

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last month student union leaders at Goldsmiths, University of London, organized a meeting for minority students to chat about their stake in the student protests being staged at schools across London over the high cost of tuition. Bahar Mustafa had just been re-elected to her post as welfare and diversity officer for Goldsmiths' student union, and she eagerly recruited her Facebook friends to help spread the word. Oh, and "if you're a man and/or white PLEASE DON'T COME," she wrote in a note. "Don't worry lads we will give you and allies things to do."

Instead, one Goldsmiths lad screengrabbed the post and published it on a student news site. Mustafa has "made it very difficult for cis white males on campus," an anonymous member of the demo complained to the paper. Soon, local tabloids had scooped up the story,delighted by the irony of a "diversity officer" banning students by race. While some members of the Goldsmiths student union pledged their support of Mustafa, an anonymous faction of students filed a petition with the union early this month calling for a vote of "no confidence" in her.
They alleged that Mustafa had repeatedly posted hashtags like #Misandry and #KillAllWhiteMen to her personal Twitter account. This constituted "hate speech based on race and gender," they argued. Some students felt "intimidated" and "silenced" by her tone.'

Lawyer: Campus rape 'hell' for all

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Nacht has seen how the system can seriously harm the reputation and future of some students—especially male students. When universities investigate reported sexual misconduct, due process is often thrown out for the accused. That's leading a lot of male students and their families to seek legal help when a complaint is filed. While Nacht also represents women in campus incidents, he says at any given time, he's got six male clients.

When relationships go south, those disagreements are now starting to include lawyers and even police.

Nacht related a recent case that illustrates the problem. A couple at UM had been together for three years, and in the course of one weekend, they had consensual sex three times. But after they attended a party, the woman decided she wanted to break up with him. She didn't inform him of this and went back with him to his dorm room that night, where some sexual activity took place. They both had been drinking.

The young woman later contended this last sexual encounter was rape. In addition to being investigated by the university, the young man faced criminal charges. In the end, he was cleared of any wrongdoing, but he needed the expensive help of a lawyer.

"That is, in my mind, the most extreme example I have seen of the system going out of control in terms of pursuing cases," Nacht says.'

State representative aims to investigate how campus rape is handled

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'State Rep. Earl Ehrhart (R-Powder Springs) is the chairman of the subcommittee that oversees appropriations for public universities. Ehrhart said he read a report in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that described a “secret process for judging sexual misconduct allegations,” which troubled him because it outlined what he considers a violation of the right to due process as its laid out by the Fifth Amendment.

“If somebody commits a crime, that’s the purview of trained professional jurists, district attorneys (and) law enforcement. The universities absolutely don’t need to be in that business, so I want to make sure that they’re not,” Ehrhart said. “They don’t need a secondary system of justice on university campuses. That’s the issue.”

He said even if a person is accused of a heinous crime, they should still be considered “innocent until proven guilty” and be granted their right to due process.

“It might be convenient to lock up everybody accused of murder really quickly without any due process, but can you imagine the screams and cries if we did?” Ehrhart said. “We have a system of juris prudence in this country for a reason, and universities don’t need to be involved in star chamber proceedings without due process on a criminal offense.”

A Star Chamber is typically a legal proceeding done in secret or otherwise out of the public eye, according to Tom Charron, administrator for the Cobb Superior Court.'

Woman who helped launch the current uproar over sexism in tech is sorry

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In 2013, Elissa Shevinsky wrote an article titled "That's it, I'm finished defending sexism in tech." The article was based on her concerns that a major tech expo would open with a presentation with an app called "Titstare," which, as the name implied, allowed users to take photos of themselves staring at women's breasts.
...
Because of the movement she helped create, Shevinsky has been described as a "social justice warrior" — a usually derogatory term applied to those who engage in hostile arguments in the name of righting a perceived social injustice.

Shevinsky is now sorry for whatever role she played in creating all of this outrage and silliness. She's sorry, she writes in her new book, Lean Out, and she adds that her initial position was "flawed."

"I'm glad to come out in 'Lean Out' and say that my original essay — the one that has been the foundation for people assuming that I am [a social justice warrior] — was deeply flawed," Shevinsky told the Washington Examiner. "I do see sexism and gender issues, a culture war, in Silicon Valley, but the knee-jerk responses (recruit more women! attack the men!) are not the answer."'

Feminist Enemy Number One

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lately, there's a lot of talk among feminists about the need to keep women safe. The rape culture is allegedly inescapable, and trigger warnings are appended to college syllabi to protect sensitive souls from reminders of any past cause of pain, from "neuro-atypical shaming" to mention of "how much a person weighs." But it turns out that if you dare to debunk feminist myths, you're the one that really needs protection.

For years now, Christina Hoff Sommers, author of Who Stole Feminism? and The War Against Boys, has been promoting what she calls, in the title of her latest book, Freedom Feminism. This view, she writes, "stands for the moral, social, and legal equality of the sexes," but also for women's freedom—including the freedom to embrace traditional femininity. "Efforts to obliterate gender roles can be just as intolerant as the efforts to maintain them," she writes, and "theories of universal patriarchal oppression or the inherent evils of capitalism are not in [freedom feminism's] founding tablets." Above all, Sommers's approach is moored in reality, not utopian notions of social justice.

Sommers's efforts to spread her gospel have annoyed many academic feminists for years, but recently the response to her has gone from confrontational to hostile. "I have never stopped going to campuses, and I've been going to law schools. But I have rarely faced protests," she tells The Weekly Standard. "I used to face vigorous debate, and the young women would come ready to argue—and that was fine, that's what I was there for. But this is different, and it only started happening this year."'

'The Silencing' author interviewed

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Interview here. Excerpt:

'A self-described liberal, Powers writes that the “illiberal left” is trying to dominate the discussion on campus, online and in the media through intimidation. In our discussion, Powers suggests there is an authoritarian impulse at play, one that has been gaining steam in the broader culture.
...
BN: One of the things I noticed in the book is there seem to be two sides to this. There are the people who are for “safe spaces” and trigger warnings who seem to be taking a defensive posture. They don’t want to be hurt or offended by something. And then on the other hand you have a group of people who are very aggressive who attack anyone who challenges them. For instance, the feminists who call anyone who disagrees with them a “rape apologist.” One is very aggressive and one is defensive… I’m just wondering how you see them working together.

KP: I actually see them both being aggressive. I see the trigger warnings as being extremely aggressive. I think people have laughed them off frequently and the safe spaces and sort of say ‘Oh, these poor…they’re so frail.’ And that may be true. They are very intellectually frail. They’re unable to deal with different ideas but there’s a real intimidation factor to it. So when you’re Christina Hoff Summers showing up at Oberlin, as happened in April, and you have people portraying you as if you’re creating an unsafe environment for them, to the point that the university has to give you security. And you show up and there’s a sign outside saying, “Warning: You may hear discussions of sexual assault or a person denying your experience,” which is of course nothing she’s ever…she’s never denied anybody’s experience of being raped. And then a safe room in this room. That’s an intimidation tactic. If you’re Christina Hoff Summers, first of all, it’s lying about who you are and it’s meant to delegitimize you and to make it seem like you’re a person who is expressing views that are dangerous. They’re so dangerous that you have to go to a “safe space.”'

Is Chivalry Dead? Viral Picture Sparks Online Debate

Mastodon · 24 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Do you see something wrong in the picture above? [link added]

The photo, which is making the rounds on social media, is drawing people's ire because it shows the man walking on the inside of the sidewalk while the woman walks on the outside, closer to the gutter and street.

The photo has ignited a debate as to if chivalry is dead.

Relationship expert and dating coach Rachel DeAlto appeared on "Fox and Friends Weekend" to share some tips for the modern man to be more chivalrous.

These include, as we learned above, walk on the outside of the sidewalk, open any door and let the lady go first and be the one to call and make plans.

"I always say women want to feel safe, sexy and secure, so if you can do those three things and that's all [that] chivalry does," DeAlto said.'

More on Sarah (ig)Noble

ErikaLancastor · 25 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link to the article here. Excerpt:

'At HEqual we're delighted to bring readers news of positive and very interesting developments concerning the Twitter hate speech of Liberal Democrat Executive Committe member Sarah Noble. Also known on Twitter as "sarahlicity", Noble made a number of vile comments over several years, including wanting to "remove men from society" and advocating genocide of men by repeatedly tweeting "kill all men". Noble also advocated for this removal of men from society at the infamous NUS Women 2015 conference. Outside of her Lib Dem work, Noble is a coordinator for Leeds University Union feminist society and also works on the hugely controversial Twitter blockbot.'

What an uber-wanker... 'all I have to say.

UK: Harman: Labour's leader or deputy leader must be a woman

Mastodon · 25 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'It would be unacceptable if the both deputy leader and leader of the Labour party turned out to be men, Harriet Harman said today.

Harman, who is acting as caretaker leader of the party during its leadership contest, told the Andrew Marr programme the party needed a "balanced leadership".

She added:

"I don't think there's a place for all-male leadership teams. A balanced leadership is better."'

UK: Campus Nags Want to Change How Male Students Think

Mastodon · 25 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'None of the rugby clubs at Oxford has been implicated in any crimes. But the university administration has nonetheless decided to make all of them sit through one-hour "anti-misogyny classes" in an attempt to "combat sexism on campus." Any rugby-playing student who refuses to be lectured about the rottenness of sexist thinking will be forbidden from playing in this year's Cuppers Final, an annual clash of Oxford's various college rugby teams. That is, they're being strong-armed to submit themselves to a moral clear-out of their minds.
...
As part of their re-education programme, the students gather on public streets near the L.S.E. holding placards saying "A good lad...", and then they fill in the blank. "A good lad frees himself of gender stereotypes"; "A good lad understands that feminism isn't a dirty word"; and so on. To see these students holding up self-critical placards in public is extraordinary, and sad. It's like something out of Mao's China, when disobedient professors and artists were likewise paraded in public with insulting placards, usually hung around their necks, identifying them as intellectual reprobates. Fast forward 50 years, and students at L.S.E. are being publicly identified as moral reprobates, sinners against the new orthodoxy of P.C. speech and feministic censure.'

Were the female guards indicted in Baltimore prison scheme predators or prey?

Matt · 25 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. From 2013, but still relevant. Excerpt:

'Here's something you might not know. In Baltimore's jails, which are run by the state, more than 60 percent of the guards are women, Maryland corrections officials estimate. And nationwide, their numbers are rapidly approaching parity with male guards. Women made up about 37 percent of the corrections force in 2007, according to the American Correctional Association.

...

Now get ready for my next bombshell. According to a frequently quoted report by the Justice Department on sex in prisons and jails, most of the guards having sex with their charges are women. "Among the 39,121 male prison inmates who had been victims of staff sexual misconduct, 69% reported sexual activity with female staff," according to the 2008-09 Bureau of Justice Statistics study.

It's even higher in juvenile detention facilities, where 90 percent of the boys who said they were victims of sexual advances by officers said they were approached — and frequently raped — by women.

Sometimes we can make our pedestals a little too high. When women assume positions of power over the lives of others, they can become predators just like men can.

"There's an assumption that women won't do this, can't do this, that it's not in our nature," said Brenda Smith, a law professor at American University who has written extensively about sexual assault in jails and prisons. "But it is in our nature."'

What College Applications Shouldn’t Ask

Matt · 25 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'During the 1990s, schools began as a matter of course to criminalize adolescent misbehavior — reclassifying mere shoving matches as acts of “extreme” violence and throwing students out for cursing. The notion of penalizing college applicants for minor misbehavior when they were 14 or 15, when a child’s impulse control is notoriously weak, is unfair on its face. It is even less defensible when you consider that suspension policies are applied arbitrarily and in a racially discriminatory way. “Disruptive behavior” often means talking back to a teacher. And in some places, weapons possession is seen as “not at all violent” while shoving matches are viewed as “extremely violent.” Depending on where a student lives, firecrackers or toy guns can get the student suspended for “weapons possession.”

Colleges that use the disciplinary information in admissions often make matters worse by doing so haphazardly. According to the study, only about a quarter of the 408 colleges that responded to the survey have formal written policies on how the data should be interpreted — and only about a third have trained their admissions staff in how to interpret disciplinary violations. These shortcomings mean that at least some students can be unnecessarily rejected for innocuous violations. And those who are admitted despite violations can be barred from living on campus, placed on probation and so on.

Disciplinary data is junk information that can hurt students while doing nothing to meaningfully distinguish them from other applicants. Clearly, many schools realize that. About half the 1,360 high schools that answered the survey had chosen not to disclose the information. Of course, this means applicants from districts that do share the information can be penalized merely because of where they live.

Given the inherent unfairness of this system, school districts should adopt a policy of withholding disciplinary information, and colleges should refrain from using any such information in admissions decisions.'

Bahar Mustafa's supporters defend minority-specific events, ironic misandry, fight against female oppression

Mastodon · 26 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Support has been growing for Bahar Mustafa, the Welfare and Diversity officer at the centre of a racism and sexism row.

They defend Mustafa for organizing minority-specific events and say her tweeting of hashtags such as #killallwhitemen has been misunderstood.

The president of Goldsmiths' Student Union, Howard Littler, and the co-convenor of the MA in Gender, Media and Culture, Sara Ahmed, are among those who have publicly supported Mustafa.

Amanda Hess, staff writer at Slate, says in her article: "Mustafa is not the first to have her reputation raked across the Web on account of some lousy tweets. But she may be the first to crumble over a case of ironic misandry, a tongue-in-cheek form of discourse favored by the young feminist Internet natives. You may have spied them on Twitter or Tumblr, working on their "KILL ALL MEN" cross-stitch or sipping from a mug labelled "MALE TEARS." Ironic misandrists say they're poking fun at long-standing stereotypes about militant feminist man-haters.'

Fashion model revealed as false accuser after DNA test

Mastodon · 26 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

"A model ex-girlfriend of Gerard Butler who accused a photographer of getting her pregnant during a rape saw the case collapse because she got pregnant and DNA confirmed he was not the father, it has been reported.

Alesia Riabenkova, 22, who has appeared on the covers of Glamour and Elle magazines, claims she was raped when she went to his condo to talk about her struggling career, The New York Post reported.

The pair allegedly discussed a photo shoot over champagne, but 45 minutes later, the Latvian native told the doorman she had been attacked and asked him to call 911.

Police arrested the photographer and he spent a night in custody. However supposed holes in her story and an inconclusive rape kit means the charges were reduced to sexual misconduct, and the entire case was eventually dropped.

...

Mr Kenniff also told The Daily Mail Online: 'The conventional wisdom is that there's a sexual assault epidemic in this country, I don't know if that's true or not. what is certain, though, is that there is an epidemic of false accusations of sexual assault taking place everyday.

'In case after case we see the names of otherwise upstanding individuals forever tarnished by the stain of false rape allegations.

'Rarely are unscrupulous accusers who perpetrate these lies ever called to account for their actions by public prosecutors.'

Video surveillance purportedly shows the model standing in the lobby of the building after the alleged incident without a 'care in the world'.

Riabenkova, however, will not be facing false-report charges."

It's time for us to outgrow diapers

Mastodon · 26 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Trigger warning: This column will include discussion of ideas that may conflict with your own.

Those accustomed to reading or listening only to liberal commentators may not be aware of "trigger warnings" and "safe zones" on college campuses.

It seems that mostly conservative sites and writers are concerned with the increasingly draconian suppression of free speech on college campuses. But then, it is mostly conservative writers and speakers who are treated as though they're bringing the Ebola virus rather than contrarian ideas to the sensitive ears of what we may as well name the "Swaddled Generation."

A trigger warning is usually conveyed on a sign carried or posted near the auditorium where a speech is to be given, alerting students to the possibility that the speaker may express an idea that could trigger an emotional response. A discussion about campus rape statistics, for example, might cause a rape victim to suffer.
...
Praising Chicago's example, Purdue President Mitch Daniels laid out the stakes in a telephone interview: "If universities want to embarrass themselves with their behavior, allowing people to be shouted down or disinvited, that's their problem. But if they're spawning a bunch of little authoritarians with an inverted view of our basic freedoms, that's everybody's problem."

Let's hope other colleges and universities follow suit -- and soon. Otherwise, someone will be forced to write the obvious next book, "Dictators in Diapers." Would that it were instead: "The Unswaddling: How Universities Fought Back to Restore Free Speech."'

Failure is Impossible: The significance of the Hironimus vs. Nebus circumcision case for America

Matt · 27 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It took over 70 years of determined, dogged and dedicated effort to gain the right for women to vote in the United States. Seventy years. The women and men who initially campaigned for universal suffrage didn't live to see the passage of the 19th amendment.

Susan B. Anthony was jailed, chastised and ridiculed. She nonetheless remained faithful to the eventual success of her vision. "Failure is impossible," she stated, energizing the younger activists who would pick up the mantle after her death.

Failure is impossible

A great deal has changed since Anthony's time. Women can now own property, initiate divorce, vote, and serve as lawyers, judges, and on a jury. We take these basic rights for granted and easily forget that a few generations ago they existed only as illuminating ideas held true by a handful of "fringe" activists. For example, my paternal grandfather was born in 1918, before any of the aforementioned rights were legal.
...
I am an intactivist.

I firmly support the right to genital integrity for all children. I uphold the rights of individuals, upon reaching the age of consent, to choose whether or not they want to permanently alter the most private parts of their bodies -- be it for religious, cultural or personal reasons.

As in any social justice movement, the intactivist community is diverse. Some of us live and work in countries where the cutting of girls is a widely practiced religious and/or cultural norm. Some of us live and work in countries where the cutting of boys is openly accepted. Intactivists opposing such practices range widely in their approach to protest. Like the suffragette bloomers, America's "bloodstained men" boldly challenge emotionally charged norms in visible and daring ways. Other intactivists are quiet in the holdings of opinions; perhaps only voicing them with a polite "No, thank you" when asked by a labor and delivery nurse if a newborn boy is to be circumcised.

Recently, intactivist Heather Hironimus, a mother whose story continues to make headline news, served jail time and faced intense public scrutiny as she engaged in a Herculean struggle to safeguard the rights and well-being of her 4 ½ year-old son.

Charged with contempt of court for refusing to sign consent forms authorizing an unwanted and unnecessary elective circumcision, Hironimus fled to a domestic violence shelter. There, she took refuge with her son for over 80 days. Currently, she is being punished for violating the custody agreement she had with the boy's father, Dennis Nebus, who didn't have access to his regular visitations while Hironimus and the boy lived and received counseling in the center.'

Why Do Girls Have A Right To Genital Integrity, But Not Boys?

Matt · 27 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Podcast and discussion here. Excerpt:

'The mother of a four-year-old son, Heather Hironomus, tearfully signed an order allowing for the circumcision of her boy, so that she could be released from prison. The event has stirred a national debate about the necessity of circumcision, and the question of whether all children should be allowed the right to bodily integrity.

Hironomus was imprisoned after she fled with her son, attempting to avoid the fulfillment of an agreement with the boy's father that would see him circumcised. She's now taken center stage on the issue, with anti-circumcision activists rallying to her cause, raising $50,000 in legal bills to defend her son, Chase Hironomus. The father wishes to circumcise the boy so that he looks like him.'

"Is it time to shelve the #maletears approach to internet feminism?"

Mastodon · 27 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"Chances are, if you move in feminist circles, you will have at least one friend who has a "Male Tears" coffee cup, "Misandrist" nameplate necklace, or is a regular user of hashtags and GIFs of the #maletears variety.

"Ironic misandry", as Slate's Amanda Hess summarised last year, emerged as "a clever tactic for furthering the feminist agenda", whereby identifying as an over-the-top man-hater (a typical skewering, by certain men, of almost any feminist) helps feminists avoid the extremes of in-fighting while beating certain critics to the punch.

This can be especially enjoyable within expressly feminist spaces, where steam can be let off by way of an expression of cartoonish man-hating that always makes me think of the divorced women's group from Jerry Maguire and the elegant older lady in a velvet beret yelling "I FINALLY GOT IN TOUCH WITH MY ANGER!!"
...
To be clear, nothing in Mustafa's behaviour as diversity officer was racist or sexist. It is absolutely necessary, in some contexts, to maintain safe spaces. As the old response to "Why isn't there a 'men's room'?" goes, because the whole university is a 'men's room'."

Sexual assault bills aim to expand disciplinary actions

Mastodon · 27 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lawmakers in California are currently working to pass three separate bills aimed at addressing campus sexual assault which, if enacted, could severely restrict students' rights.

Less than a year after the Golden State legislature unanimously approved a "yes means yes" law that redefined sexual consent to require "affirmative, unambiguous and conscious" consent from each party, lawmakers are making efforts to expand administrators' power dealing with campus sexual assault at state community colleges.

Democratic Assemblyman Das Williams spearheaded the effort by introducing a Campus Sexual Assault Legislative Package. The package includes three bills that would lengthen punitive measures administered to students accused of sexual assault, require administrators to annotate students' transcripts to divulge their involvement in any sexual assault hearings or allegations, and force applicants to disclose if they were previously convicted or found guilty of sexual misconduct by officials at a previous university.
...
However, none of the additional power granted to administrators through the legislation would be contingent on a student's conviction in the criminal justice system, according to Andrew Medina, a consultant for Assemblyman Williams.

"The minimum standard would fall under the campus adjudication process separate from the criminal justice system," Medina wrote in an email to Campus Reform."'

UK: Bahar Mustafa Allowed To Keep Job Despite 'Kill All White Men' Race Row

Mastodon · 27 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Goldsmiths' student diversity officer has been allowed to keep her job, despite tweeting the hashtag "kill all white men" and referring to people as "white trash".

Bahar Mustafa has been embroiled in a race row after telling white people and men they were banned from an event at the university. She also then made a public statement insisting she could not be racist as she was an ethnic minority woman.

An online petition calling for her resignation has received more than 21,000 signatures. However a spokesperson for Goldsmiths' student union said not enough students had signed in order to trigger a referendum to vote on Mustafa's job.

“Following actions taken during the occupation of a university building last month, 165 students signed a petition calling for a Vote of No Confidence in Welfare and Diversity Officer Bahar Mustafa," the spokesperson said.

"This represents 1.9% of our 8,000+ members and our rules require 3 per cent to have signed to trigger a referendum."'

New York State governor seeks toughest law in nation vs. "campus sexual violence"

Mastodon · 29 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Gov. Andrew Cuomo is pushing for passage of what he calls “the toughest law in the nation” against campus sexual violence.

It would make campuses in New York a hostile environment for young men. One misstep and they could find themselves accused of “sexual assault,” denied a fair hearing, expelled and unemployable.

The law would apply at all private colleges in the state, extending regulations that Cuomo has already imposed on the state university system.

Everyone should want to prevent rape. But Cuomo’s bill criminalizes normal sexual interactions.

The bill requires “affirmative consent” at each step of the way when two students have sexual contact. Amazingly, that means punishing students who fail to ask “May I unbutton your blouse?” and “May I kiss you?” and wait for the answer. On May 20, Cuomo said there has to be “clear, unambiguous and voluntary agreement” before any “specific sexual activity.”
...
Cuomo’s bill officially designates the accuser as “victim” or “survivor,” revealing the bias that the accuser is always right. The accuser would get extensive counseling, but for the accused, no legal representation, subpoena power or due process.
...
Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand is pushing for legislation to apply the same “guilty until proven innocent” standard nationwide.'

Also see: Cuomo’s risky campus sex code crusade

NPO: Steve Hitner's Guide to Family Court Reform

Matt · 29 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What does "Trouble in the Village" mean and how does it relate to changing existing law? The answer is simple — legislators do not act unless they have "Trouble in their Village."

The secret to changing an existing law is proving that there is a problem. In most cases office-holders will not acknowledge that a problem exists. Your job is to dig up the bodies. In other words, find and expose the evidence of the need for family law reform.

The following are the steps necessary to accomplish legislative reform. When I took on alimony reform in Massachusetts, I was told "it'll never happen." Well, I proved them wrong. Not only did I make possible the most dramatic social policy change in decades, I did it with a unanimous vote from both houses of the legislature.'

Just What Is Smegma And Why Does It Make Us Cringe?

Matt · 29 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'But smegma is far from some godforsaken curse of humanity, at least usually. First thing's first, as ticking and tocking animal bodies, we excrete oil and water from our skin all the livelong day, and for good reason. The oily byproducts, known as sebum, coat our skin against microbial invaders and keep the skin waterproof. Likewise, smegma serves its own purpose. Namely, it helps lubricates our genitals during sex. Particularly in uncircumcised men, it helps ensure that the foreskin can easily slide on and off the glans, or head, of the penis without irritation (though cut fellows still produce it). And it's not just a human thing, all mammals make and use smegma to their heart's content.

...

As the 2006 review notes, it wasn't just the smell that made people so dead set on finding a link between smegma and disease. It was the perception of sex as a dirty-minded hobby. In the 19th century, it was old hat to declare the very act of masturbation an abject sin, and along the way, both smegma and the foreskin were similarly demonized as unclean and degenerative to human health. That hysteria has mostly abated, but we're still left with the idea that smegma is an unpleasant, unneeded part of our anatomy.

Nuts to that, I say! Evolutionarily speaking, we owe a great debt of gratitude (and our sex lives) to smegma. As long as we keep ourselves clean, there's not a damn thing wrong with it. So next time you hear the word, instead of cringing in horror, you should instead mentally fist-bump the little oily secretion that could.'

Police Arrest Men for ‘Manspreading’

Mastodon · 29 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'New York police allegedly arrested two men for “manspreading” (sitting with their legs far apart) on the subway, according to a report entitled “That’s How They Get You” released by the Police Reform Organizing Project. “On a recent visit to the arraignment part in Brooklyn’s criminal court, PROP volunteers observed that police officers had arrested two Latino men on the charge of ‘man spreading’ on the subway, presumably because they were taking up more than one seat and therefore inconveniencing other riders,” the report states. Metro Transit Authority rules ban people from taking up more than one seat “in a station, platform or conveyance when to do so would interfere or tend to interfere with the operation of the Authority’s transit system or the comfort of other passengers.”
...
Now there’s no doubt that some dude taking up enough room for two people on a crowded train is annoying — but the report claims that the arrests occurred late at night, when the train probably would have been pretty empty: “Before issuing an [adjournment contemplating dismissal] for both men, the judge expressed her skepticism about the charge because of the time of the arrests: ‘12:11AM, I can’t believe there were many people on the subway.”'

"College Rape Survivors Help Create New Assault Reporting System That Protects Victims"

Matt · 29 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A nonprofit company, Sexual Health Innovations, has designed a new online system allowing college sexual assault victims to report crimes anonymously and safely:Callisto has not yet launched, but a campaignto help fund the project has already raised more than $6,000 toward a goal of $10,000.

What's unique about this system is that college-aged sexual assault victims and activists helped create it, and focused on ensuring victims feel safe and comfortable reporting their abusers. Users would visit their school-specific Callisto site and anonymously fill out a form reporting a sexual assault. They would then receive an explanation of reporting options and the opportunity to report as they choose right away, or save a time-stamped notice that the form was received and submit later if/when they feel ready. It's up to the victim who she wants to report it to, how much she wants to reveal, and when she wants to submit it.'

Also see: University Of San Francisco Becomes First College To Adopt Callisto, A New Rape Reporting System

Professor: Faculty Now Fear Students Demanding ‘Safe Spaces’

Mastodon · 30 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Northwestern University professor was accused of retaliation and investigated after students claimed an article she had written had a “chilling effect” on students’s ability to report sexual misconduct.

Writing on Friday in the Chronicle of Higher Education, Laura Kipnis describes an academic climate in which professors lay awake at night in fear of losing their careers over a single careless word or missed trigger warning. A new academic culture is rising in which hurt feelings are considered evidence of an attack. This hypersensitivity is being abetted by an expanding process of Title IX charges which allow anyone with an agenda or a grudge to go on the offensive against the faculty:

"As I understand it, any Title IX charge that’s filed has to be investigated, which effectively empowers anyone on campus to individually decide, and expand, what Title IX covers. Anyone with a grudge, a political agenda, or a desire for attention can quite easily leverage the system.

And there are a lot of grudges these days. The reality is that the more colleges devote themselves to creating “safe spaces” — that new watchword — for students, the more dangerous those campuses become for professors. It’s astounding how aggressive students’ assertions of vulnerability have gotten in the past few years. Emotional discomfort is regarded as equivalent to material injury, and all injuries have to be remediated.

Most academics I know — this includes feminists, progressives, minorities, and those who identify as gay or queer — now live in fear of some classroom incident spiraling into professional disaster. After the essay appeared, I was deluged with emails from professors applauding what I’d written because they were too frightened to say such things publicly themselves. My inbox became a clearinghouse for reports about student accusations and sensitivities, and the collective terror of sparking them, especially when it comes to the dreaded subject of trigger warnings, since pretty much anything might be a “trigger” to someone, given the new climate of emotional peril on campuses."'

All 8 women fail Ranger School: Some Rangers say standards should change

Mastodon · 30 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On Friday, the Army is expected to announce that all the women who had attempted to graduate from Ranger School had officially failed to meet the standards, according to a military source.

Ranger School, which grooms the Army's most elite special operations fighting force, opened its doors to women for the first time this year. Eight of the 20 women who originally entered the school's first co-ed class were allowed to recycle through the program after they fell out in their first go-round. The Friday announcement will confirm that this happened again.
...
But there is another opinion quietly being voiced as well: that Ranger School is more akin to a rite of passage – an opportunity for men to "thump their chest," as one Ranger puts it – than a realistic preparation for leading in war. That women can actually make Ranger units more effective. And that the standards that keep them out are outdated.

Expelled under new policy, ex-student files suit

Mastodon · 30 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In December 2013, Amherst College imposed its first major sanction under a new get-tough sexual misconduct policy, expelling a 21-year-old senior after a disciplinary board concluded that he had forced a female classmate to perform oral sex during an alcohol-infused encounter nearly two years earlier.

In April 2014, however, the expelled student presented the college with new evidence — a series of text messages the woman sent to two other male students immediately after the alleged rape, according to a lawsuit. To one, a dorm counselor, she described the sexual encounter in language that suggested it was consensual and she wrote, “It’s pretty obvi [obvious] I wasn’t an innocent bystander.”'

...

Citing the text messages, Stern charged in his lawsuit that Amherst’s investigation of the episode by an outside lawyer was “grossly inadequate,” overlooking signs that Stern says would have cleared his client. What’s more, the lawsuit also asserts that the action taken against John Doe, who is Asian-American, is part of a pattern since 2013 in which the college has sanctioned only “male students of color” for sexual misconduct.

Pete Mackey, the Amherst College spokesman, said in a statement that the college’s disciplinary process is consistent with federal requirements and is fair to all parties.

“That process was followed in this case,” he said.

“We are confident that the process the college followed was appropriate and that the court will conclude that the College’s process was fair,” Mackey said.'

Feminist professor assailed after daring to challenge Title IX abuse

Matt · 30 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Wonder if/when the scales'll fall from her eyes? Excerpt:

'The February essay that Northwestern University Professor Laura Kipnis wrote in the Chronicle of Higher Education was certainly provocative. Titled “Sexual Paranoia Strikes Academe,” the piece lashed out at campus overregulation, particularly against dating between professors and students. “Intergenerational desire has always been a dilemma as well as an occasion for mutual fascination,” wrote Kipnis. “Whether or not it’s a brilliant move, plenty of professors I know, male and female, have hooked up with students, though informal evidence suggests that female professors do it less, and rarely with undergraduates.”

Denunciations of what she terms the “Great Prohibition” jibe with Kipnis’s claims that contemporary campus culture essentially coddles students to the point that they can’t rely on themselves to deal with the world that awaits them. “The new codes sweeping American campuses aren’t just a striking abridgment of everyone’s freedom, they’re also intellectually embarrassing,” she wrote. “Sexual paranoia reigns; students are trauma cases waiting to happen. If you wanted to produce a pacified, cowering citizenry, this would be the method.”

In addition to such essayifying, Kipnis summarized a legal battle between a Northwestern University undergraduate student and a philosophy professor accused of “unwelcome and inappropriate sexual advances.” After laying out the conflicting accounts of their interactions, Kipnis commented, “What a mess. And what a slippery slope, from alleged fondler to rapist.”

These thoughts had perhaps more impact than Kipnis could have imagined. Asreported by the Daily Northwestern, 30 or so campus protesters “marched to the Rebecca Crown Center carrying mattresses and pillows Monday morning to protest a lack of a reaction from administration after Communication Prof. Laura Kipnis wrote an opinion piece Feb. 27 criticizing strict rules against professor and student relationships.”'

"Celebrating Brit Shalom" reviewed

Matt · 30 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Review here. Excerpt:

'In this blog entry, I have assembled my own shorthand notes of a really important book by Lisa Braver Moss and Rebecca Wald: Celebrating Brit Shalom, (2015, Notim Press, ISBN-13: 978-0692353332). I hope what you find on this page encourages you to buy the book. It is clear and informative, short enough to read quickly, and inspiring in its fully set out scripts (English, and the few bits of Hebrew needed) of three sample ceremonies, including ideas for music. This book would be ideal as a resource for any parents who wanted to inform themselves, but also have as an authoritative and thoughtful resource they could show to family and friends to introduce them to the idea of a brit shalom. And, of course, it is extremely useful for anyone who wants to create their own ceremony to welcome someone into their Jewish family, people, and heritage. Although the authors do not mention it in the book, I can imagine the ideas here would be very useful for men converting to Judaism, but not wanting to have to be circumcised.'

Mentioned in it is a link to resources for Brit Shalom.

State Senate passes "Say Yes" sexual consent bill

Mastodon · 31 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'According to Sen. Mae Flexer, D-Killingly, who spearheaded this bill, college students would be required to “say yes” or indicate nonverbally through “physical cues” that they are willing to have sex with another college student.

A major flaw in this proposed legislation is that it would impose a legal requirement that college students engage in a specific type of speech or behavior in a certain situation. Although this requirement is unenforceable, if a university did find a way to enforce it, the university would be infringing upon students’ constitutional rights to freedom of speech. . . .
Sen. Joe Markey, R-Southington, was correct when he said it is “peculiar” for the state to pass a law that applies only to accused students in university disciplinary hearings and not to defendants in criminal courts. College students are not a special class of citizens who are exempt from the Constitution’s protections of freedom of speech, due process and the presumption of innocence for the accused.

This bill is an example of political correctness gone wild. Why did the majority of state senators who voted for this bill, including many lawyers, fail to recognize that the bill has provisions that would be unenforceable and would infringe college students’ constitutional rights? Hopefully, the House will realize that the proposed legislation would not accomplish its proponents’ objectives and would make colleges and universities vulnerable to lawsuits for violating students’ civil liberties.'

How Affirmative Consent Laws Criminalize Everyone

Mastodon · 31 May 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This year, nearly all college students in New York and California started their spring semesters under a new state-mandated regime of sexual policing called affirmative consent ("yes means yes"). Under these policies, any student who cannot prove that he obtained active, ongoing, unambiguous consent to any sexual activity will automatically be guilty of violating campus sexual assault policies. These draconian new rules are binding only on college students. They do not apply to college faculties and administrators, and they certainly don't apply to the legislators who passed these laws.

Affirmative consent laws trivialize sexual assault by turning nearly everyone who has ever dated into a sexual offender. For example, if a student throws her arms around her boyfriend and kisses him without his permission, even if she has done this dozens of times before, she has violated affirmative consent policies. She can, at some later date, be hauled before a campus judiciary on charges of sexual assault. Victims of sexual assault should fear this new regime, because it will inevitably confuse rightful cases of abuse with capricious accusations.'

Men barred from women-only Hillary Clinton fundraiser

Mastodon · 1 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Eliot Spitzer's ex-wife Silda is hosting a fundraiser for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton in Manhattan, and only women will be allowed to attend the $2,700-a-ticket event.

The two-hour long fundraiser, which Silda will host along with four other women, will allow those who go to chat with Clinton on June 1. All proceeds will benefit "Hillary for America," Page Six reports.'

"Squeeze play: She bashed male kin with juicer, say cops"

Mastodon · 1 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Stapleton woman tried to put the squeeze on a male relative - bashing him with a juicer Wednesday night, allege prosecutors.

Awilda Mendoza, 32, attacked the victim at about 9:55 p.m. during an argument in her home on the 200 block of Gordon Street, said a criminal complaint.

The victim suffered lacerations of the ear, arm and torso, the complaint said.

Ms. Mendoza was arrested on a felony count of assault, along with misdemeanor charges of assault and criminal weapon possession, according to information from acting District Attorney Daniel Master's office.'

Reader Comments:

"I would have used my George Foreman grill. Designed by a heavyweight fighter....."

"The toaster wasn't available?"

1,400 Summonses For 'Manspreading' In 2015

Mastodon · 1 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Some people are arguing that this is an excuse by police to increase their arrest quotas, and to crack down on undesirable ethnic minority males. Russia Today reported that the NYPD issued approximately 1,400 summonses for manspreading in 2015.
...
Robert Gangi, Director of Police Reform Organizing Project (PROP), said to Russia Today “We think it’s driven by a quota system. There is almost no other rational explanation for why the cops would conduct this kind of arrest unless they are under pressure to meet certain numbers, to meet with their productivity goals. It’s a classic pattern. Somebody gets a summons for a low-level thing, they don’t show up in court, the warrant is out… A cop stops you a second time, even if for another low-level thing, and it’s the policy of the department to arrest you.”

The first man arrested had his charges dismissed, due to the fact that he was arrested at 12:11 a.m. and the judge believes that no one was likely to be inconvenienced at such an early hour.'

Sexual assault by deception could become a criminal offense

Mastodon · 1 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'LYING TO GET sex has been going on since Adam ate the proverbial apple.

It will never stop. But wouldn't it be great if there was somewhere that a burned lover could turn to if she discovered that the man who told her he was childless not only had a 10-year-old, but also a pregnant side jawn?

Or if the person they're sleeping with showed them photos of a beautiful home he claimed to own but in reality was living in his parents' basement?

In other words, wouldn't it be great if a woman duped into having sex could have the jerk arrested?

Absolutely, says Mischele Lewis. The 37-year-old suburban-mom-turned-activist is the inspiration behind a bill in New Jersey that would make sexual assault by deception a crime.

I know this is going to make some readers livid, but stay with me: Introduced late last year by Assemblyman Troy Singleton, D-Burlington, the bill would make "sexual assault by fraud" a punishable offense. The bill defines it as "an act of sexual penetration to which a person has given consent because the actor has misrepresented the purpose of the act or has represented he is someone he is not."'

Change.org: Let's Have A Google Doodle For International Men's Day

mens_issues · 1 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You can sign the petition for a Google Doodle for International Men's Day, November 19 2015. Excerpt:

'We, the undersigned, respectfully request that Google and its doodlers do something as creative and fun as possible for as many people as possible to celebrate "International Men's Day" and have it made public on 19 November 2015.

Background: International Men's Day (IMD), like so many grassroots initiatives, has a history and people who need to be acknowledged.'

Workplace Worries for Women vs. Men

Mastodon · 3 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, of which NIOSH is a part, says women are more likely to have work-related cases of carpal tunnel syndrome, tendonitis, respiratory diseases, infectious and parasitic diseases, and anxiety and stress disorders.

Women's work-related health concerns differ from men's for a number of reasons, including different types of jobs being performed, as well as social, economic and cultural factors. For example, because women are more likely to hold part-time jobs, which are typically more unstable, they could be more afraid to voice safety concerns for fear of losing their jobs, the CDC says.

Apart from straightforward safety concerns, women also face sexual harassment, which can impact physical and mental health and cause anxiety, depression, lower self-esteem, alienation, insomnia, nausea and headaches.'

From Occupational fatality on Wikipedia:

'The majority of occupational deaths occur among men. In one U.S. study, 93% of deaths on the job involved men, with a death rate approximately 11 times higher than women. The industries with the highest death rates are mining, agriculture, forestry, fishing, and construction, all of which employ more men than women.'

“Women only” Hillary event forced to admit men after poor turnout

ErikaLancastor · 3 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. First of all I need to ask the (fairly obvious) question: What do you think the reaction would be if a male presidential candidate held an event for men only?

Well, of course the outcries of "sexism" would be heard 'round the world and thus would be the end of that male candidate's run for president, as well as his political career as a whole. No bones about it, and well it should.

Yet Democrat presidential candidate Hillary Clinton holds a women-only event, and of course no sexism there, what? Clinton claims to be for "equality", but as is the case with most feminists, their actions speak louder than their words. In any case, it rather blew up in her face, like a stick of TNT for Wile E. Coyote. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton had trouble attracting high-powered women to a New York talk hosted by Silda Wall Spitzer two weeks before her campaign officially kicks off. Sources said that after ticket sales fizzled for an intimate, $2,700-per-person, “just for women” meeting on Monday, the event was thrown open to men at the 11th hour, and the deadline extended to buy tickets.

The “Conversation With Hillary Clinton” event at Midtown law firm Akin Gump was originally aiming to attract 125 women. An email invitation seen by Page Six said the event is “just for women.” But by Friday, “They’d only sold 50 tickets, so they threw it open to men,” a source said. “Ticket sales were supposed to close at 10 a.m. Sunday, but the hostesses were working the phones and pushed the deadline till Monday.'

Oh my goodness! What's the world coming to when a female presidential candidate cannot discriminate against men? It's the fault of the "patriarchy" I tells ya!

SAVE: Revelations of Campus ‘Inquisition’ Stir Outrage

Matt · 3 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'A recent article by a Northwestern University professor about flawed campus sexual assault policies has triggered sharp criticism and calls for reform. Professor Laura Kipnis detailed how campus policies designed to address sexual assault have deprived the accused of their due process rights. Titled “My Title IX Inquisition,” the editorial was published in the May 29 edition of the Chronicle of Higher Education.

Kipnis had published an article in February criticizing Title IX procedures, which she described as overly-intrusive and unfair. Title IX is the federal law that bans sex discrimination on college campuses.

Her article resulted in two student complaints alleging Title IX violations. Northwestern University investigators then refused to inform Kipnis of the exact nature of the allegations, denied her legal representation, and did not allow her to record conversations with investigators.
...
“Thanks to the Department of Education policies, even the most absurd accusations can now result in a full-bore investigation,” notes SAVE spokesperson Sheryle Hutter. “Lawmakers need to act now to restore due process on campus and bring an end to policies that micro-manage the most intimate sexual activities.”'

NPO: 50 Media Wins in 2 Months Advances Shared Parenting and Parental Equality Efforts

Matt · 3 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'National Parents Organization has been featured in the media more than 50 times in the past two months — an accomplishment that brings significant attention to the organization's shared parenting and parental equality advocacy efforts.

These publicity wins have included prominent stories on shared parenting in some of the nation's most influential news outlets, including TIME magazine and The Wall Street Journal. In addition NPO members' opinion pieces on family court reform legislation have landed in publications throughout the nation, and numerous news outlets covered NPO's Parental Alienation Awareness Day involvement as well as other efforts.'

Survey: Half of bullying bosses are women who bully women

Matt · 5 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. From 2004, but still a good read for anyone with a bully-boss. It's a rare acknowledgement indeed. Excerpt:

'It's no secret that there are abusive bosses out there -- you know the type. Bullies with big job titles that make the people working for them miserable.

According to the Workplace Bullying and Trauma Institute, an abusive boss is more likely to be a woman than a man. That's right -- forget their nurturing image! Woman to woman bullying represents 50 percent of all workplace bullying; man to woman is 30 percent, man to man 12 percent and woman to man bullying is extremely rare -- only 8 percent.
What should you know if you're the victim of an abusive boss? Here are today's five tips.
...
If your boss has a difficult management style, you don't have to let their bad behavior go. You can respond -- just remember to stay professional.
So, if your boss insults you or puts you down, Susan Futterman, author of "When You Work for a Bully" and the founder of MyToxicBoss.com, suggests responding with something like, "In what way does calling me a moron or an idiot solve the problem? I think that there's a better way to deal with this."'

Fewer Young Men Fathering Children Outside of Marriage: CDC

Minuteman · 5 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Fewer unmarried American men are becoming first-time fathers, U.S. health officials reported Thursday.

Thirty-six percent of first-time fathers younger than 44 had a child out of wedlock during the first decade of the 2000s, officials said.

"This represents a decline from the previous two decades," said report author Gladys Martinez, of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's National Center for Health Statistics.

In the 1980s, she said, 42 percent of first-time fathers were unmarried, as were 40 percent in the 1990s.

The national survey also found a larger proportion of unmarried first-time fathers living with the mother and child than in the past.

The report is good news, given prior research indicating that "having a father involved positively with his child benefits the child and the family on a number of outcomes," said Dr. Craig Garfield, an associate professor of pediatrics at Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine in Chicago.'

California's sexual re-education camps are coming soon

Matt · 5 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Not content to redefine consent to mean asking permission before every step of the sexual process, California is now on the path to teaching high school students the proper way to have sex — because human nature is now wrong.

To recap: Last year California Gov. Jerry Brown signed a law aiming to redefine consent as an "affirmative, conscious, and voluntary agreement," that is "ongoing throughout a sexual activity and can be revoked at any time." Saying "no" to unwanted sexual contact was no longer necessary, as a "lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence mean consent." Also, previous sexual history "should never by itself be assumed to be an indicator of consent." Alcohol also negates consent, since the line between "intoxicated" and "incapacitated" can be decided after the fact by an accuser.

This means that every time two college students have sex they have to act like they've never met before and ask for approval for everything from the first kiss and touch through intercourse. I tried multiple times to ask the sponsor of the California bill, State Sen. Kevin de Leon, how someone could prove they obtained consent under his law, but only received press releases and quoted paragraphs from the bill. When asked to clarify how one would prove they had obtained consent, his spokeswoman didn't respond.'

Columbia’s Mattress Girl Has Made An ‘Artistic’ Sex Tape

Matt · 5 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Can just imagine Gillibrand's reaction to this. New York voters, paying attention? She's the one who's lionized this person right up to the last State of the Union address. At this point I have to wonder, is Mattress Grrl trying to capitalize off her self-styled victimhood as an amateur porn star? This is why I don't bother with fiction. The news is sufficiently bizarre. Excerpt:

'Emma Sulkowicz, the Columbia graduate famous across the country as “Mattress Girl” after she hauled a mattress around campus for a year to protest the school’s handling of her alleged rape, has apparently released a sex tape recreating her alleged rape.

Titled Ceci N’est Pas Un Viol (‘This Is Not A Rape’), the video shows two people, one of whom appears to be Sulkowicz, entering a dorm room and proceeding to have sex from four different camera angles. Timestamps in the upper corner of each camera are used to make the video appear dated to August 27, 2012, the date Sulkowicz claims she was raped by fellow student Paul Nungesser. Over the course of the video, Sulkowicz’s partner becomes violent and begins to hit her, essentially recreating the experience Sulkowicz claims she underwent at the hands of Nungesser.

The video’s release comes just two weeks after Sulkowicz graduated from Columbia, drawing renewed attention after she completed her project by carrying her mattress on-stage despite the protests of Columbia administrators.'

Expelled student claims in lawsuit the inability to consent

Matt · 5 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Apparently consensual sex, intoxicated participants, bad advice from the university and employees, and damning text messages: A pattern is emerging in litigation by students accused of sexual assault against the universities that punished them.

Amherst College is the latest to be targeted by a punished student for his role in a sexual encounter, following similar allegations by accused men at Occidental College and Columbia University.

The May 29 lawsuit accuses Amherst of conducting a “grossly inadequate investigation” of John Doe and accuser “Sandra Jones,” depriving Doe of a competent adviser, withholding evidence during a hearing before the Sexual Misconduct Hearing Board, and harming Doe’s reputation.

What differentiates the Amherst suit from others, though, is that it portrays Doe as unable to give consent, and Jones as the initiator and the sober party.

And in a potentially explosive claim, the suit alleges the university has “targeted male students of color” like Doe since changing its sexual misconduct policy. Jones’ allegations were the first to be investigated under the new policy.'

Senators Exclude Statistics At Premiere Of Campus Assault Documentary

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The premiere event for Vice News' campus rape minidocumentary brought Democratic Sens. Claire McCaskill and Kirsten Gillibrand to George Washington University on a stormy Monday Night, yet notably failed to provide the statistics for the issue and did not mention the creator of a rape protest movement the event celebrated but whose story of sexual assault is now doubted.

Neither the documentary itself nor McCaskill and Gillibrand presented a hard number on the rate for sexual assault on campus — and it wasn't due to no one asking.
...
McCaskill replied that the statistics for rape are hard to come by, and she couldn't give a number for the amount of rape cases that were based on false allegations. But she did say that her experience as a prosecutor precludes her to believe that they are especially low due to the arduous process involved in a rape investigation and the toll it takes on a victim.

The documentary itself doesn't mention the statistics for college rape and just said it's a "growing problem."'

Campus tales: Manspreading, rape, and Title IX idiocy

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The politics of sex and race often sound like dispatches from the lunatic fringe. Two stories, one about man-spreading, and one involving Title IX, emphasize that impression.

The Title IX story comes from Northwestern University in Chicago. Professor Laura Kipnis wrote an article for the Chronicle of Higher Education in February in which she described sexual paranoia on campus. She used as an example a case involving a philosophy professor at Northwestern who was accused by an undergraduate of “unwelcome and inappropriate sexual advances.”

Kipnis named no names, but the young woman involved and a graduate student who had also filed a charge against the professor decided that Kipnis had made the campus an unwelcoming, even hostile place. They sued.'

Editorial demands stop to Title IX inquisition “insanity”

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'So far, 2015 looks like a pretty bad year for Title IX — and mainly because it has finally turned on the academic class that wielded it for their own purposes. The recent experiences of Professor Laura Kipnis, as well as the Rolling Stone hoax on the subject of “campus rape” and the use of ludicrously inflated statistics to feed what Kipnis calls “sexual paranoia” on campus, have put the moral panic in stark relief. An essay by a pseudonymous untenured academic on Vox underscored just how badly “higher education” has Bowdlerized itself in attempting to survive the latest witch hunt...

...

The New York Daily News has had enough of Title IX enforcement on speech, calling the result “thought crimes on campus.” The editors blasted the Obama administration’s guidances on Title IX that demanded low standards of proof for administrative review of allegations, and the star chambers that have erupted as a result. It’s time for Congress to intervene to put an end to the “insanity,” they write:

"Madness has been unleashed on college campuses — not by drunken frat boys but by the White House.

A wildly mishandled Obama administration campaign to combat student sexual assaults has morphed under a federal gender-equality law into a nightmarish weapon against free speech and academic freedom."'

Iceland politicians seek women-only Parliament

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Alþingi parliament came together at 11.00 this morning and the first item on the agenda was parliament itself.

Left Green MP Steingrímur J. Sigfússon started by endorsing a suggestion from Independence Party parliamentary chairman Ragnheiður Ríkharðsdóttir for a women-only Icelandic parliament—though Steingrímur's idea is a little different to the original proposal.

Steingrímur said that there is nothing new in the idea that the world might be a better place if women had more of a say in how it is run, Vísir reports. He pointed to a conference where he put forth the idea that women should be allowed to run the whole world for fifty years in an experiment to see how much better of a place it might become.

"I don't take Ragnheiður's idea as a joke and I have a suggestion for how we can begin," Steingrímur told Alþingi. "I propose that we men in parliament give up our seats and let our deputies take our seats. Then any male deputies do the same so that the commemorative parliamentary meeting of Alþingi on 19th June will only be made up of women. That would garner attention a long way from home."'

With new US law, more funding to protect women who have children after rape

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'President Obama signed the Rape Survivor Child Custody Act into law on May 29 as part of the bipartisan Justice for Victims of Trafficking Act. It boosts funding for states that allow women to petition for the termination of parental rights based on clear and convincing evidence that a child was conceived through rape.
...
Currently, about 36 states address the issue in law, but many of them require a criminal conviction of the rapist, which leaves little protection for the vast majority of victims, since very few rapes lead to prosecution. The “clear and convincing” standard – in place in 10 states – allows a judge to block the alleged rapist’s access to a child in a civil proceeding with a lower burden of proof than the “beyond a reasonable doubt” standard required in criminal courts. ...'

US Spends Nearly $800,000 On Video Game to ‘Limit Aggression’ of 8th Grade Boys

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"The Department of Justice spent nearly $800,000 to develop a computer game to “limit the aggression” of middle school boys.

The National Institute of Justice (NIJ) paid for researchers at Rhode Island Hospital to team up with a multimedia company in Colorado to create the game, which seeks to prevent dating violence among eighth graders in Providence, Rhode Island.

“The aim of the proposed study is to develop and refine a web-based intervention that reduces the risk of dating violence among middle-school aged males,” the NIJ grant states. “The final intervention, to be used by parents and adolescents together, is based on the empirical literature linking emotion regulation deficits to violent behavior as well as studies showing that parental involvement is crucial to offset dating violence risk.”

The proposal argued that since teenage boys like to play video games, they would also like to play one about “partner violence.”

“Research has also shown that game playing is the most popular internet activity for early adolescent boys; thus interactive, web-based games and videos are ideal to engage young males in dating violence programming,” the grant said.
...
“One of the things I’ve recognized is that there’s not enough out there for adolescent boys,” Rizzo said. “We need to create more for adolescent boys, from anger management to general relationship skills to how you manage jealousy in a relationship.”'

Study: Teenage Girls More Violent than Boys

New York Governor Screens 'The Hunting Ground,' Introduces Campus Rape Legislation

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Inspired by The Hunting Ground, a widely praised — and criticized — cinematic documentary on campus sexual assaults, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo is using screenings of the film to promote legislation that would establish a uniform definition of consent, as well as reporting and investigative procedures for all his state's public and private colleges and universities.

As part of his campaign, Cuomo hosted a private screening of the film at Lincoln Center Tuesday with a question-and-answer session afterward. The proposed statute is titled "Enough Is Enough" and is modeled not only on a code already adopted by the State University of New York system, but also on California's groundbreaking "Yes Means Yes" law. The key to both the California law and New York's proposed statute is a clear definition of what constitutes consent to sex: an unambiguous "yes" to specific acts. That legal consent cannot be given by an individual intoxicated by alcohol or drugs.

...

After seeing that movie, which was nominated for an Academy Award, then-Defense Secretary Leon Panetta implemented sweeping reforms across the armed services. New York Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand credits the film with inspiring her to introduce the Military Justice Improvement Act, which set up an independent judiciary to review sexual assault allegations in the armed services.

The Hunting Ground, however has become the source of some controversy, with the Libertarian publication Reason and the generally liberal online magazine Slate alleging that some of the cases reported in the film misrepresent or exaggerate the actual facts of the encounters.'

Central Allegation in The Hunting Ground Collapses Under Scrutiny

Detergents linked to genital defects in baby boys

Mastodon · 6 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Pregnant women regularly exposed to a range of detergents, solvents and pesticides have a substantially greater risk of giving birth to boys with genital deformities, according to a new French study.

The research, led by two professors at the Regional University Hospital Centre in the French city of Montpellier, found that women who regularly work with such chemicals, including cleaners and hairdressers, were at greatest risk of having sons born with hypospadias.

The birth defect, which affects about three in 1,000 newborn boys, is a condition where the urinary opening is abnormally positioned on the penis.

Hypospadias can be treated with surgery but it can affect the boy's fertility once he reaches adulthood.

The study, led by pediatric surgeon Nicolas Kalfa and pediatric endocrinologist Charles Sultan, was carried out over five years and examined 600 children at hospitals in four French cities, 300 of whom were boys born with hypospadias.'

Men as minorities

ErikaLancastor · 7 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was thinking, a bit ago. (Yes, I know, "look out!!!" right?) but I was rather wondering, since women outnumber men, in this world, have any of you chaps ever considered going for minority status?

Yes, yes, yes, I know. "Erika, you silly girl, what are you on about?"

If just on principal, alone, think about it.

"Minorities" are usually, realistically or unrealistically considered "disadvantaged" in life, compared to the majority. This covers a range of things:

1. Unequal representation in the media. (check)
2. Unequal health care. (check)
3. Issues and concerns ignored. (check)
4. Higher rates of incarceration in proportion to the majority. (check)
5. Ignored and even persecuted by the government, at times. (check)
6. Shorter life expectancy. (check)
7. Disadvantaged in education. (check)
8. Unfair/unjust laws targeted at them, and not members of the majority. (i.e. "manspreading") (check)
9. Persecution by the majority. (check)
10. Defined as lesser people than the majority (expendable) (check)
11. Smaller number to the majority population. (hence "minority")(check)
12. Higher rates of suicide, drugs and alcohol. (check)
13. Used for manual labor that the majority avoids. (check)
14. Prone to more violence than the majority due to social status. (check)

Anyway, I'm sure there's more, but, that's all I could come up with on short notice. But nonetheless, there you have it. At least 14 things that qualify a particular group for minority status , along with the special considerations and protections that come with it.

Consider it, hmm?

Punishment comes before proof on campus today

Mastodon · 7 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In February, Laura Kipnis, a professor at Northwestern, wrote an article for the Chronicle of Higher Education in which she decried the creeping bureaucratization and fear that surrounds sexual activity on campus. Last week, she revealed that as a consequence of that article, she had been investigated for violating Title IX of the Civil Rights Act.

No, I'm not eliding some intermediate step, where she used printed copies of the article as a cudgel to attack her female students. The article itself was the suspect act. According to Kipnis, it was seen as retaliation against students who had filed complaints against a professor, and would have a "chilling effect" and create a "hostile environment" for women in the Northwestern community. Northwestern put Kipnis through a lengthy process in which she wasn't allowed to know the nature of the complaint until she talked to investigators, nor could she have representation.

But the process worked, says Justin Weinberg, because Kipnis was eventually exonerated. Weinberg, who teaches philosophy, also thinks it's "not obvious" that writing an article about an ongoing complaint, which does not mention either the students or professors by name, is retaliation under Title IX. Like Brian Leiter, I find his summation of the facts underwhelming, and as Leiter says, "If Kipnis's opinion piece about sexual paranoia on campus, in which the graduate student is not even named and barely referenced, constitutes adverse 'treatment,' then there is no right for any faculty member at any institution receiving federal funds to offer any opinions, however indirect, about any question surrounding allegations of sexual misconduct at the institution."

But I'll let Leiter argue with Weinberg about the case itself, because I want to take issue with this passage: "As I noted earlier, the Title IX investigation yielded no finding of retaliation against Kipnis. One can only imagine how disappointed she will be with this. It turns out that the process she had been demonizing-which of course may have its flaws-pretty much worked, from her point of view."

This is deeply wrong, and for all that, it is not an uncommon sentiment. You often hear this sort of argument when people complain about the byzantine procedures that colleges use to adjudicate charges of a racial or sexual nature, or when they argue that we should always presumptively believe any rape accusation: "Well, if they didn't do that, the system will figure it out eventually, so what's the big deal?"'

Delhi High Court frees 5 men, says false rape charges destroy lives

Mastodon · 8 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Just as rape causes great distress to the victim, a false charge destroys lives and damages reputation, the Delhi high court has said, acquitting five men who were jailed sixteen years ago on the charge of gangrape.

"There is no doubt that rape causes great distress and humiliation to the victim of rape but at the same time false allegation of committing a rape also causes humiliation and damage to the accused. An accused also has rights which are to be protected and the possibility of false implication has to be ruled out," a bench of Justices G S Sistani and Sangita Dhingra Sehgal noted in its verdict.

The court set aside the conviction of the five men after it found that the woman who had leveled the charge of being gang raped gave inconsistent statements in court and hid the fact she was in a relationship with one of the accused. "Her version has no correlation with other supporting material being medical, scientific and expert evidence," the bench observed.'

Mandatory sentencing for college infractions is violation of due process

Mastodon · 8 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'How many young men will be improperly convicted of sexual assault because amateur boards were more sympathetic to the young woman in a "he said/she said" case? College disciplinary boards often only need a victim to prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence, which is far less stringent than the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard needed at a criminal trial. Female accusers may often be able to achieve preponderance of the evidence simply through innate sympathy toward women.

Worsening this unfair system of justice is a new bill in California, which would mandate minimum suspensions of two years for anyone found guilty of rape by campus disciplinary boards. Automatically, anyone found guilty under the unfairly weak standard of "preponderance of the evidence" by a board of amateurs would be kicked out of college for at least two years. Given the high cost of tuition and the likelihood of dropping out after time away from school, young men who are suspended will forfeit a considerable amount of current and future property.

Due process was created to prevent the forced forfeiture of such property. Supporters of campus disciplinary boards argue that, since defendants do not risk losing their freedom [by going to prison], they have less need for due process. But, given the high cost of college, it is silly to assert that young men who are suspended or expelled are not being deprived of their property. If you are to nullify someone's $40,000 investment in their education, you must prove him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.'

Suicide rate of female military veterans is called 'staggering'

Mastodon · 8 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'New government research shows that female military veterans commit suicide at nearly six times the rate of other women, a startling finding that experts say poses disturbing questions about the backgrounds and experiences of women who serve in the armed forces.

Their suicide rate is so high that it approaches that of male veterans, a finding that surprised researchers because men generally are far more likely than women to commit suicide.

"It's staggering," said Dr. Matthew Miller, an epidemiologist and suicide expert at Northeastern University who was not involved in the research. "We have to come to grips with why the rates are so obscenely high."'

Judge sentences woman to 6 months and banning of cell use for vehicular homicide

Matt · 9 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Suppose a man would have gotten the same deal, or would a spouse been as apparently forgiving toward same? And does anyone really think she'll never use a cell phone again? Excerpt:

'A Michigan woman has been banned from using a cell phone – or any other form of texting device – as part of her sentence for fatally striking a cyclist while driving last September.

According to WLNS-TV, Judge Stewart McDonald of the Clinton County District Court decided to take away Mitzi Nelson's cell phone because she was using the device when her car hit 35-year-old Jill Byeich.

McDonald said, according to USA Today:

"I don't think she has a right to have a cellphone. I think it's a privilege."

Incidentally, the idea for the punishment actually came from Byeich's widower, Jordan. He does believe that Nelson is remorseful, however – and even gave her a hug after the trial was over.'

How To End the Title Nein Fascism in Five Minutes

Mastodon · 9 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'By now it is evident even to honest liberals that Title IX is an out of control monster that makes old fashioned political correctness and speech codes look like a John Stuart Mill seminar. The Laura Kipness episode at Northwestern University might prove a tipping point, but I doubt it: between the determination of the will-to-power left, the cravenness of most college administrations (including Northwestern's feckless president Mort Schapiro—I've got a file on him, as this isn't his first epic failure in academic leadership), and the push from the Alinskyites in the Obama Administration, the Title IX campus brownshirts are likely to roll on.
...
The informal "guidance" character of the Title IX corruption can be undone in the first five minutes of the next administration, if a conservative is elected. On Inauguration Day, the new president should direct the Department of Education to send out a "Dear Colleague" letter to all colleges and universities that, first, withdraws the Obama DoE Title IX guidance letter, and, second, instructs that all colleges and universities that do not follow full formal due process (including the right to have an attorney present at all campus hearings) for all charges of harassment or sexual assault will be investigated by the Justice Department, and may have their federal funds cut off.

Problem solved. Bonus: Maybe a few liberals will start to warm to the idea of abolishing the Department of Education.'

Hope Solo benefits from double standard in domestic dispute cases

Mastodon · 9 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Ray Rice has made some bad decisions in his life. Among the worst was becoming a male football player.

If he were a female soccer player, he could slug just about anyone he wants.

The proof was in goal Monday night as the U.S. took on Australia in the Women's World Cup.

Everybody knew Hope Solo was a one-woman reality show. We just didn't realize how gnarly she could be until an ESPN "Outside the Lines" report on Sunday.

It fleshed out a domestic-abuse incident last summer and left you wondering if the NFL has taken over U.S. Soccer.

The organization is apparently willing to employ anybody who'll help it win. The difference is Roger Goodell looks strict compared to the powers running U.S. Soccer. And Solo still has apologists who recoil at Rice comparisons.'

Amherst’s Version of Kafka’s ‘The Trial’

Mastodon · 10 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Kafka was born too early to write about Amherst College. At campus hearings on claims of sexual assault, procedures are relentlessly stacked again males and evidence of innocence doesn’t count. Amherst expelled a student for committing rape—despite text messages from the accuser, sent immediately after the alleged assault, (1) telling one student that she had initiated the sexual contact with the student she later accused (her roommate’s boyfriend); (2) inviting another student to her room for a sexual liaison minutes after she was allegedly raped.

Amherst, on grounds that the accused student (who, per college policy, had no attorney) didn’t discover the text messages until it was too late, has allowed the rape finding to stand, even though the college’s decision relied on the accuser’s credibility (which is now non-existent). Amherst faces a due-process lawsuit in the case. You can read the complaint here.

Nine Gender-Biased Indian Laws That Are Unfair Towards Men

Matt · 10 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We all talk about equality of all genders, but unfortunately when it comes to the Indian constitution, it is far from reality. True that there was a time when the government had to make special provisions in the constitution for women to ensure equality, but unfortunately, some of these provisions are clearly unfair to men. Here are 9 laws in our country that are unfair towards men:

1. The father of the deceased doesn't inherit property, but the mother does.

Under the Hindu Succession Act of 1956, if the deceased has no will, the spouse, mother and children inherit the property belonging to the deceased. The father is only entitled if the deceased does not have a spouse, mother or children.'

Nigeria Bans Female Genital Mutilation, But Advocates Say There's Still More Work To Do

Matt · 10 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Indeed, they could also ban MGM, too! Excerpt:

'Before stepping down, Nigeria's former president made sure his legacy boasted fighting for women's rights and protections.

Goodluck Jonathan signed into law last month a ban on female genital mutilation, a practice that involves partial or total removal of the external female genitalia for non-medical reasons, the Guardian reported.

However, activists say laws alone won't put abolish the practice, and that a systemic cultural shift is required to make sure women and girls are no longer subjected to the harmful procedure.

"Global experience tells us that ultimately, it's through changing attitudes, not just laws, that we will end FGM," Tanya Barron, chief executive of children's charity Plan International, told Reuters.'

Tikkun, Jewish Intactivism, and Human Kindness

Matt · 10 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'According to the religious interpretation of Halachah, all Jewish laws are interpreted within the framework of moral and human rights. Morals and human rights are always placed above laws, ritual, and scripture. This is a constantly evolving process as the realm of human rights continues to expand. Slavery and animal sacrifice were outlawed from Judaism thousands of years ago. Women increasingly gained rights, and eventually entered into the Rabbinate. Most Jewish communities are fully accepting of gays and lesbians and most non-Orthodox Rabbis will perform gay and lesbian weddings. Issues like the environment, creating a compassionate world, and global human rights affect the ways that Jews adjust their lives to act in more ethical ways. Today children and babies are seen as possessing more human rights and more Jews are questioning circumcision as a result, even Rabbis. Some are questioning circumcision from a historical perspective. There are even some Jews who support laws against circumcision. Some Jewish Intactivists like Moshe Rothenberg and Ron Goldman have been pushing Jews to acknowledge these issues for decades, while many younger Jews are adopting Intactivist views more easily due to the use of the internet and holistic parenting ideas. The rise of Feminist thought and gender equality are also factors in the rise of Intactivism among a younger generation of educated Jews.'

Accused of Public Sex in Broad Daylight Outside Store - woman ticketed, man arrested

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A man and a woman who had apparently just met on a Chula Vista trolley on Valentine's Day allegedly had sex outside a dress store in an incident that stunned onlooking employees and customers, a San Diego-area station reported.

...

The man and woman reportedly didn't even know each other names, and police said they had just met on a trolley.

The station reported that the woman was ticketed while the man was taken away in handcuffs.'

Use discretion with rape accusations

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As a criminal defense attorney and longtime feminist, I am startled at the current social climate against young men accused of sex assaults. In light of all the negative press surrounding the Missoula County Attorney's Office, the public outcry to prosecute more campus sex assault cases and the biased journalism in town, people have forgotten about the Constitution and the presumption of innocence. Our justice system is designed to protect the accused from rumor, speculation and mob mentality. Victims' "rights" do not trump the rights of the accused.

Somehow, in sex assault cases, there appears to be a presumption of guilt. When a woman accuses a man of sexual assault, she is automatically believed and damn anyone who questions her. Every effort to defend the accused is portrayed as victim-blaming. Taxpayer dollars are being spent to fly in out-of-state so-called "experts" to explain how rape victims act in ways that defy common sense. Have we forgotten our history of false rape accusations? The Scottsboro boys? The Tawana Brawley case? Brian Banks? Conor Oberst? The Duke Lacrosse team?'

"A Conversation With Senator Kirsten Gillibrand"

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'And then Emma Sulkowicz came forward and told her story, which led to a backlash, and then a backlash to the backlash, and questions are still being asked about it. And then you have the Rolling Stone story, which prompted completely appropriate questions of a different sort. And these discussions, regardless of where you land on what they mean or who is right or wrong, take the conversation to a different place than where you are trying to lead it.

Correct. And it can be damaging. Because it can stifle debate, and it can result in survivors withdrawing, and not [being] willing to put themselves out there and tell their story. But I think a lot of survivors have begun to feel empowered by the boldness of their peers. Emma has given courage to many more survivors than those who are now doubting [her story]. I think the perseverance and will to be heard, despite criticism, is meaningful. Despite the noise, and a lot of the negativity is unhelpful, it's part of the debate, that is normal, it is to be expected, but unfortunately, it will result in some shying away from reporting.'

The gender wage gap: Why it may never close

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'But how? Here's one idea. Get women in university to switch their majors. Instead of sociology, they should take petroleum engineering, which pays three or four times as much. That would close the gap in no time.

In fact, most (not all) of the wage gap is a myth, based on the same sort of flawed statistics that vastly inflate the problem of "rape culture." Yet if you doubt the magnitude of either of these problems, you will probably be denounced as a misogynist, or worse.

Just ask Christina Hoff Sommers, a mild-mannered feminist who argues that modern feminism has gone off the deep end. Take the pay gap. She points out that much of the gap is explained by the fact that women choose career paths that pay less than the work men choose. Once you correct for occupational differences, hours worked per week, and tenure in the work force, most of the pay gap disappears. The statistics bear her out.'

UK: Oxford's new feminist hit squad

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'But this year a group of undergraduates — mostly women — will be shunning all this. They will be staying in their college rooms, fingers flying across their keyboards as they scowl at the screen. They are the hard core of a feminist cult that has gripped Oxford and makes life miserable for hundreds of undergraduates across the university. The cult uses Facebook to snoop on students who aren't 'proper' feminists. It tries to force young women to use its extreme rhetoric and denounces them if they don't.

Its digital tirades can poison college life. One young woman told me that new friends she'd made at Oxford suddenly shunned her in the dining hall after the word went out that she held 'incorrect' views on women's rights. (She was so worried about repercussions that she asked me not to mention which area of women's rights she felt strongly about.)

I'm going to call the cult 'Country Living'. That's not quite accurate: it's actually spelled without the 'o', a gynaecological pun that's the only evidence of a sense of humour you'll find among its leaders. I reckon calling it Country Living will make them cross. Which, to be fair, is not difficult. These lasses are very, very cross all the time. If there was an Oxford blue for taking offence, they'd be champions.

Country Living is an internet cult that polices behaviour both online and offline. Its manifesto can be read by anyone who visits its page on the blogging platform Tumblr, which is mocked up to look like a 1970s student magazine. Here we learn that anyone can become a C-word, which is a badge of honour, not a term of abuse. Those four letters have been 'reclaimed' by the group. (Like feminists everywhere, Country Living does a lot of reclaiming.)'

No men allowed: publisher accepts novelist's 'year of women' challenge

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Small press And Other Stories has answered author Kamila Shamsie's provocative call for a year of publishing women to redress "gender bias" in the literary world.

The novelist made what she called her "provocation" in Saturday's Guardian, revealing that just under 40% of books submitted to the Booker prize over the past five years were by women, and pointing to everything from the author Nicola Griffith's research, which found that far more prize-winning novels have male than female protagonists, to the Vida statistics showing that male authors and reviewers command more space than female.

"At this point, I'm going to assume that the only people who really doubt that there is a gender bias going on are those who stick with the idea that men are better writers and better critics," wrote Shamsie. "Enough. Across the board, enough ... I would argue that is time for everyone, male and female, to sign up to a concerted campaign to redress the inequality ... Why not have a year of publishing women: 2018, the centenary of women over the age of 30 getting the vote in the UK, seems appropriate."'

Why Do Feminists Cook Up Stories About ‘Misogyny’ When They Lose Debates?

Mastodon · 11 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the most frustrating things about debating feminists and feminist academics is how readily they reach for words such as “abuse,” “harassment” and “safety” – particularly, it seems, when they are losing the argument.

Yesterday I debated Dr Emily Grossman on women in science and, sure as night follows day, she reached for the same vocabulary afterwards, claiming on Twitter that she was “absolutely reeling” from the “mysogynistic [sic] backlash” and that she “hadn’t quite realised the extent of #everydaysexism.”

Kirsten Gillibrand's Campus-Rape Mendacity

Mastodon · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a Time op-ed, she made two alarming claims, claims that — if true — would mean that the plight of women on college campuses truly was a national crisis, one that should command the attention of all levels of government. First, she echoed President Obama and the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights, declaring that "the price of a college education should never include a one in five chance of being sexually assaulted."

One in five is a terrifying ratio, a ratio so large that it made her next "fact" appear uncontroversial — that "women are at greater risk of sexual assault as soon as they step on a college campus." Fixated on these statistical claims, Senator Gillibrand became a fixture in public reporting on the sexual-assault "crisis," appearing in The Hunting Ground, an alarmist documentary that features heart-wrenching stories from alleged "survivors" of sexual assault — many of whom had watched their allegedly guilty assailants walk free. She even invited perhaps the nation's most prominent "survivor," Emma Sulkowicz, to the State of the Union Address, giving a truly national platform to a young woman who'd carried her mattress around Columbia University to protest the handling of her own sexual-assault claims.

...

In an interview with New York magazine, Gillibrand was unapologetic for her role in advancing potentially false allegations — allegations that damage the lives of the accused. She was mainly concerned that criticism could "stifle debate" and "result in survivors withdrawing." As for Sulkowicz herself, Gillibrand said, "Emma has given courage to many more survivors than those who are now doubting [her story]." Close scrutiny of criminal allegations is just "noise" and "negativity." In other words, the ends justify the means, and lies serve a useful purpose.'

We don’t have a rape culture, we have a victim culture

Mastodon · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It takes courage to tell a bunch of Canadian feminists marchers against ‘rape culture’ that they are talking rubbish. And courage is something Lauren Southern, a reporter for The Rebel, appears to have in abundance. She had the guts to go to a ‘SlutWalk’ in Vancouver holding a sign that said: ‘There is no rape culture in the west’. You can see her video above.

Lauren made the not unreasonable point that Canada is hardly a rapist’s paradise. ‘Rapists go to prison here,’ says Lauren. ‘Rapists are actually hated here. Rapists are fired from their jobs. Men who make rape jokes are fired from their jobs.’ But it is lost on the SlutWalkers, who are so desperate to talk about — and display — their bodies that they will not listen to reason.

That’s partly because, in 21st century English, rape has become a stun-grenade of a word: its utterance blows up common sense. And common sense suggests that westerners don’t live in a rape culture. We live in a victim culture — the perfect expression of which is a group of women daubing themselves with the word slut and walking about un-dressed in the name of drawing attention to the issue of sexual violence. They are really drawing attention to themselves.'

Reporter clashes with feminists at 'Slutwalk'

Mastodon · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A WOMAN held up a provocative sign dismissing the idea of a 'rape culture' in the West at a feminist rally which was trying to raise awareness of sexual assault.

Lauren Southern, a reporter with TheRebel, held up the controversial placard on the steps of a march organised in association with SlutWalk in Vancouver which read: 'There is no rape culture in the West' and then documented what happened.

She describes how she got into a "huge confrontation" with those involved, and claims that her cameraman was shoved, her sign torn up and that she was the victim of misogynist language - from other women.

Ms Southern also wrote that she decided to perform the stunt as a way to "challenge the fear mongering feminist narrative about men, women and violence".

"It is intellectually dishonest to think we are living in a rape culture," Ms Southern says in the introduction to the video.'

Video here.

Child Support System Dysfunctional

el cid · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Robert Franklin reports on a study by a Dr. Brenda Williams that reveals some troubling information about child support enforcement. Some excerpts:

Blacks are 87% of those incarcerated:

"My non-profit group, The Family Unit, recently studied the incarceration of non-custodial parents in Sumter County for non-payment of child support. We found that 87 percent of those incarcerated are African-Americans and the majority are indigent, don't have a high school diploma, live in low-income neighborhoods and are unemployed."

Fathers are 98% of those jailed:

"Based on all the incarcerations of parents for child support arrears in the state except three counties, those data revealed that some 98% of those incarcerated were fathers."

NCPs are jailed for failing to pay attorneys:

"Additionally, scores of non-custodial parents are ordered to pay thousands of dollars in fees to the attorneys of the custodial parents. The court commonly rules that attorneys must be paid in full, either immediately or within one to four months. Failure to pay means incarceration for at least 90 days."

"Manspreading puts New York's commuters in a jam"

Mastodon · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If you've ever been forced to stand for a long journey on a bus as some average-sized bloke spread his thighs across three seats, or spent an entire flight with your knees in your nostrils because the guy next to you was carelessly spreading his legs, you will be familiar with "manspreading".

It's a newish buzzword for an old bugbear. For some men, it almost seems the different poles of the earth pull their knees in opposing directions as they sit, hoarding space between their legs.

...

Like people who think their bags are too precious to sit on the floor or in their laps, and instead give their inanimate belongings a seat of their own, manspreading reeks of entitlement.

There was plenty of publicity and appreciation then, when New York City, where I now live, appeared to declare war on manspreading six months ago. It started with a public awareness campaign, and escalated recently with reports that two men had actually been arrested.'

Should White Men Stop Writing? A Q&A With Elisa Gabbert

Mastodon · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If you want to get a distilled version of the present moment in American politics, it's not a bad idea to listen to what poets are saying, believe it or not. Right now, of course, a lot of the arguments are about identity. Elisa Gabbert is a poet and essayist who lives in Colorado and is the author of The French Exit and The Self Unstable. Last week, in an advice column for Electric Literature, she answered a note from a white male poet worried that "the need for poems from a white, male perspective just isn't there anymore." The column ran under the provocative headline "Should White Men Stop Writing?" and caused a storm on social media. The letter summed up a conversation about writing and gender and race and identity that's been going on for a long time but building momentum again since the poets Juliana Spahr and Stephanie Young's paper about gender balance in experimental poetry journals and anthologies, "Numbers Trouble," was published in 2007. And then with the annual VIDA counts that break down contributions to literary magazines by gender, and more recently ethnicity. I was on a airplane when the storm over Gabbert's column hit, but we'd corresponded in the past, so I asked her about it.
...
Here's what I see as wrong with the standard-issue line that women and POC should submit more to even out the numbers: A) It's honoring the status-quo, racist, sexist system that got us here in the first place, and asking underrepresented people to conform to that system and play by its rules, rather than dismantle the system. It's just like telling women the reason they get paid less for the same jobs is because they don't ask for raises and promotions, and they're not aggressive enough. I, for one, don't want to work in an environment where everyone is as aggressive as the most aggressive guy in the room, and aggressive behavior isn't rewarded in women the same way it is in men. Also there are many jobs where being aggressive doesn't make you more effective. It's like giving out promotions based on height. B) It wouldn't solve the problem. It wouldn't solve the problem because editors don't read blind, and they make judgments based on the perceived gender and race of the author, whether they're aware of it or not. As to whether it'll "ever happen," I don't expect my advice to single-handedly solve racism or sexism. (Did anyone ask me to?) One person's vegetarianism doesn't solve world hunger or animal cruelty. One person biking to work doesn't solve climate change. You don't do it to solve the problem on your own, you do it so you can feel like an ethical person and go to sleep at night and maybe effect some small change around you.'

Toxic masculinity is killing men: The roots of male trauma

Mastodon · 12 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If we are honest with ourselves, we have long known that masculinity kills men, in ways both myriad and measurable. While social constructions of femininity demand that women be thin, beautiful, accommodating, and some unattainable balance of virginal and fuckable, social constructions of masculinity demand that men constantly prove and re-prove the very fact that they are, well, men.

Both ideas are poisonous and potentially destructive, but statistically speaking, the number of addicted and afflicted men and their comparatively shorter lifespans proves masculinity is actually the more effective killer, getting the job done faster and in greater numbers. Masculinity's death tolls are attributed to its more specific manifestations: alcoholism, workaholism and violence. Even when it does not literally kill, it causes a sort of spiritual death, leaving many men traumatized, dissociated and often unknowingly depressed. (These issues are heightened by race, class, sexuality and other marginalizing factors, but here let's focus on early childhood and adolescent socialization overall.) To quote poet Elizabeth Barrett Browning, "tis not in death that men die most." And for many men, the process begins long before manhood.

The emotionally damaging "masculinization" of boys starts even before boyhood, in infancy. Psychologist Terry Real, in his 1998 book I Don't Want to Talk About It: Overcoming the Secret Legacy of Male Depression, highlights numerous studies which find that parents often unconsciously begin projecting a kind of innate "manliness"—and thus, a diminished need for comfort, protection and affection—onto baby boys as young as newborns. This, despite the fact that gendered behaviors are absent in babies; male infants actually behave in ways our society defines as "feminine." As Real explains, "[l]ittle boys and little girls start off… equally emotional, expressive, and dependent, equally desirous of physical affection. At the youngest ages, both boys and girls are more like a stereotypical girl. If any differences exist, little boys are, in fact, slightly more sensitive and expressive than little girls. They cry more easily, seem more easily frustrated, appear more upset when a caregiver leaves the room."

...

We have set an unfair and unachievable standard, and in trying to live up to it, many men are slowly killing themselves. We have to move far beyond our outdated ideas of masculinity, and get past our very ideas about what being a man is. We have to start seeing men as innately so, with no need to prove who they are, to themselves or anyone else.'

Columnist calls out paper for bogus campus sexual assault poll

Mastodon · 13 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Late this morning, the Washington Post sent a “News Alert” e-mail announcing the results of an “exclusive” poll it conducted together with the Kaiser Family Foundation. The poll purports to find that “20 percent of young women who attended college during the past four years say they were sexually assaulted.” This is an explosive number — and not just because the very thought of one in five women being sexually assaulted on campus is horrifying.

The number, it turns out, exactly mirrors the percentage announced in a 2007 federally funded study of two universities, which has been cited by President Obama, Senator Kirsten Gillibrand, and the Department of Education as proof of a campus sexual-assault crisis. This has, in turn, provided the justification for the ongoing, draconian crackdown on free speech and due process at colleges across the nation, one that has done real harm to innocent young men.

The original 20 percent number was suspect from the start. The 2007 survey used an exceedingly generous definition of sexual assault and its response rate was relatively low. A more comprehensive and rigorous Bureau of Justice Statistics survey subsequently put the rate at 6.1 per 1,000, and found that sexual assault was 1.2 times more frequent for nonstudents than students and had — in fact — been declining since the 1990s. When confronted with the BJS survey, even Senator Gillibrand removed the one in five number from her website. So the Post number, if valid, would give a second wind to an Obama administration crackdown that was running on factual fumes. Unfortunately for the Post and the administration, the study’s number is not even close to valid. Even worse, in its main story about the poll, the Post misleads about the key question — the source of its one in five headline.'

Also see: Are 20 Percent Of Women Really Assaulted In College?

Senator says U.S. Soccer 'tone deaf' in Hope Solo controversy

Matt · 13 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Sen. Richard Blumenthal, D-Conn., called U.S. Soccer's explanation of its handling of Hope Solo's domestic violence arrest "tone deaf" and "nonsensical" in an exclusive telephone interview Saturday afternoon with USA TODAY Sports.

"I saw the response, which unfortunately and regrettably is really tone deaf," Blumenthal said. "Most striking in this response is the use of the term 'he said, she said.' Most commonly, that's the reason given by prosecutors for failing to take effective action in domestic violence cases. That comment reveals a mindset that is part of a culture that fails to successfully prosecute domestic violence in this country."

On Thursday, Blumenthal, who was outspoken in his criticism of the NFL's handling of the Ray Rice incident last year, released a letter he sent to U.S. Soccer president Sunil Gulati, calling for the federation to "conduct a thorough investigation into (the Solo) incident."'

Woman charged with making false rape report

Mastodon · 13 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Wood River woman has been charged with making a false police report alleging she had been raped.

Kiersten Cherry, 19, came to the South Roxana Police Department with her boyfriend on May 20 and reported that she had been raped by a resident of South Roxana, according to police. An investigation led to Cherry's admission that the sex was consensual, according to police.

...

Coles said he was "disturbed" by false reports, which he said in this instance was motivated by a guilty conscience from multiple consensual contacts.

"The stigma from being accused of a sexual offense is not something that goes away when guilt or innocence is proven," he said. "It can haunt the person for the rest of their life."

Cherry has been charged with disorderly conduct, a Class 4 felony punishable by one to four years in prison or up to two and a half years' probation.

A warrant has been issued for her arrest, but she was not in custody as of late Tuesday. Coles said he expected her to be apprehended shortly.'

With Father's Day Pledge, Initiative Encourages Taking A Stand Against Domestic Violence

Mastodon · 13 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'June 21 is Father's Day, and a local group says celebrating Dad should also mean taking a stand to end domestic violence.

The Father's Day Pledge to End Gender Violence encourages people, particularly men, to sign a pledge that indicates their commitment to the prevention of domestic and sexual violence and abuse.

The pledge, which was launched just last year by the Southwest PA Says No More initiative, calls for men to not use violence in their own relationships and also to intervene when they see another man harming women or girls. Many notable locals, including Mayor Bill Peduto, University of Pittsburgh Head Basketball Coach Jamie Dixon and CEO of Peoples Natural Gas Morgan O'Brien have already signed this year's pledge.

"The Father's Day Pledge to End Gender Violence is a four-point pledge that helps men who are supportive of this issue have a better sense of what might their role be in promoting prevention," said Kristy Trautmann, executive director of the Fisa Foundation.

The pledge can be found on the website of the No More initiative. Started by the FISA Foundation and the Heinz Endowments, the initiative is part of the national No More campaign focused on the prevention of domestic and sexual violence. The local initiative has engaged with many corporate, political and religious leaders in Pittsburgh to promote this campaign, some of whom appear in its launch video.'

Carly Fiorina, Feminist?

Mastodon · 14 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Carly Fiorina is rivaling Sen. Rand Paul in trying to be the most heterodox candidate in the Republican presidential field. And now, she may well be the first Republican feminist to run for president.

Fiorina, who is set to deliver a speech to the Competitive Enterprise Institute Thursday night, has staked out her place in the Republican primaries as someone who is not afraid to hit Hillary Clinton, the only other woman in the race, and hit her hard.

...

"Today, only 23 percent of women identify with the term feminist. Liberal ideas aren't the answer. Their version of feminism isn't working. It is time for a new definition," Fiorina's prepared remarks for Thursday night read. "A feminist is a woman who lives the life she chooses. We will have arrived when every woman can decide for herself how to best find and use her God-given gifts. A woman may choose to have five children and homeschool them. She may choose to become a CEO, or run for president."

...

"Feminism began as a rallying cry to empower women—to vote, to get an education, to enter the workplace. But over the years, feminism has devolved into a left-leaning political ideology where women are pitted against men and used as a political weapon to win elections.

Being empowered means having a voice. But ideological feminism shuts down conversation—on college campuses and in the media. If you are a man—or a woman—who doesn't believe the litanies of the left, then you are "waging a war on women" or you are a "threat to women's health" or you are variously described as "window dressing" —Joni Ernst—or offensive as a candidate—Carly Fiorina.

The progressive view of feminism is not about women. It is about ideology."'

Senator asks for broader investigation of Hope Solo DV incident

ThomasI · 14 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story and video here. Excerpt:

'Sen. Richard Blumenthal (D-Conn.) called on U.S. Soccer president Sunil Gulati to "actually conduct a thorough investigation" into women's national team goalie Hope Solo and domestic violence accusations against her.

Blumenthal also suggested that U.S. Soccer "reconsider Hope Solo's position as an active member of Team USA," in a letter dated Thursday.

"Domestic violence is unacceptable," the letter said, "particularly for an athlete representing the United States of America on the global stage."

Outside The Lines, with new court documents and an interview with Solo's half-sister Teresa Obert, took an in-depth look into Solo's actions that led to her arrest in June 2014 after an altercation with Obert and Solo's teenage nephew.

Police said Solo was belligerent and insulting toward officers during her arrest, and had been drinking. Domestic abuse charges were dropped in January on procedural grounds, but prosecutors filed an appeal with the Superior Court of Washington. They are scheduled to file their argument by July 13, with the defense due to respond by Aug. 10. Oral arguments are scheduled for Sept. 11.'

A New Guide to Intact Jewish Welcoming: Review of "Celebrating Brit Shalom"

Matt · 14 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Review here. Excerpt:

'Rebecca Wald and Lisa Braver Moss have followed a time-honored tradition in Judaism, one followed by Rabbis, scholars, and the Jewish people for centuries. They've looked at our world, the way we practice Torah, live our lives, and proposed adjustments to accommodate a more ethical approach. The guide, titled Celebrating Brit Shalom is the first published prayer book for leaders of this new Jewish ritual. So far, the book has won good reviews from Jewish celebrants in the UK, progressive Jews in California,Orthodox-raised Jewish Intactivist Jonathan Friedman and others.

A surgical, violent practice that is somewhat unquestioned in Judaism, is finally being discussed widely in the Jewish press. The subject of the book is bris ceremonies that exclude circumcision, for Jewish boys who are not going to be circumcised. These rituals emerged in the 1970's and 1980's and there are many beautiful stores about them. They are called a variety of different names, but they share in common a rejection of circumcision. According to one estimate, more than 1,000 of these rituals have been done in the United States since the movement began. Moshe Rothenberg, an early Jewish leader estimates that he himself has performed more than 100 of them on the East Coast, beginning in the early 1980's. Parents are creating a variety of rituals to name newborn Jewish boys, and Rabbis are starting to think and talk about these in new ways. Among the Reform, Humanist, and Reconstructionist movements and the non-denominational, which make up more than 75% of American Jews, acceptance of these rituals are increasing.'

NPO: An Important Message from the Divorce Corp. Team

Matt · 14 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last November, Joe Sorge's organization, Divorce Corp., sponsored an important conference in Washington, D.C. on the need for reform of family courts and family laws. The National Parents Organization was pleased and privileged to be a major player there. One of the many constructive plans to come out of the conference was the creation of a structure to allow everyday people to tell their stories about their treatment by family courts. Now that effort is underway. If you have a story about your experience with family courts, the following message from Divorce Corp. lets you know how to make it public. Most of these will be "horror stories," but not all. It's equally useful to let people, courts and lawmakers know what works as well as what doesn't. Here's Divorce Corp.'s message:

Divorce Corp. Followers:
We are writing to you with an update from Susan Settenbrino regarding her inquiry to all of you about the success and outcomes of any judicial misconduct complaints you may have filed.

Please see her message to all of you about her new website and plans for the project:

Ms. Settenbrino received overwhelming responses to her inquiry announced here, on DivorceCorp. She wants to thank you for all of your responses and to let you know that she will be addressing them accordingly. Ms.Settenbrino and Greg Roberts have created Uncheckedpower.org, to address unchecked power in the government and court system as a whole.'

Male survivors of sex assaults often fear they won't be taken seriously

Matt · 14 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For all the intensity, emotion and pervasiveness of the debate about sexual assault in college, there's an element that's often lost and unheard: men's stories.

Though sexual assaults on men are rarely reported to authorities, a Washington Post-Kaiser Family Foundation poll of current and recent college students found that 1 in 20 men said they were sexually assaulted while in school.

Some of the incidents were terrifying. Others, like one Episcope described, left the men involved confused, sometimes wondering how they could have lost control.
...
By his account, "Suddenly they were like, 'Drink, drink, drink!' " he said. He didn't have much experience drinking, and he soon found himself hammered. He was drifting in and out of a blackout, he said, when he realized one of the women was having sex with him.

He's conflicted about what happened, and he kind of laughs it off. "A guy is like, 'Yes, tie me up, take advantage of me — grab that whip!' " For a woman it would be downright scary, he said, then added: "It is kind of scary."

It was troubling, knowing he hadn't intended to do it, knowing he couldn't walk away. But — echoing some other men who had unwanted sexual encounters but also don't know quite what to make of it all — he said he wasn't traumatized but was mostly confused. "For me it was like, 'This really shouldn't be the way I should be getting some.' "

In interviews with men who participated in the poll, they described a wide range of unwanted sexual experiences — some blurry, some violent, some confusing, some terrifying. Some joked about it or blamed themselves. Others are tortured by the memories.'

The Pecking Disorder: Social Justice Warriors Gone Wild

Matt · 14 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The ordeal of Northwestern University film professor Laura Kipnis, hauled before a campus gender equity tribunal for publishing a critique of academia's current obsession with sexual misconduct, has brought the backlash against "political correctness" to reliably left-of-center venues such as Vox. But this is only the latest incident in the culture wars over "social justice" that have been wreaking havoc in a wide range of communities—including, but not limited to, universities, the literary world, science fiction fandom and the atheist/skeptic movement.

The progressive crusaders driving these wars have been dubbed "social justice warriors," or "SJWs," by their Internet foes. Some activists on the left proudly embrace the label, crowing that it says a lot about the other side that it uses "social justice" as a derisive epithet. But in fact, this version of "social justice" is not about social justice at all. It is a cultish, essentially totalitarian ideology deeply inimical—as liberals such as Jonathan Chait warn in New York Magazine—to the traditional values of the liberal left, and not just because of the movement's hostility to freedom of "harmful" speech.

At the core of social justice dogma is fixation on identity and "privilege." Some of this discourse touches on real and clear inequities: for instance, the widespread tendency of police and others to treat African-Americans, especially young and male, as potential lawbreakers. Yet even here, the rhetoric of privilege generates far more heat than light. University of California-Merced sociologist Tanya Bolash-Goza, who accepts the social justice left's view of pervasive structural racism in America, points out that the term "white privilege" turns what should be the norm for all—not being harassed by cops or eyed suspiciously by shop owners—into a special advantage unfairly enjoyed by whites. (Indeed, in its dictionary meaning, "privilege" refers to rights or benefits possessed by the select, not by the majority.) This language speaks not to black betterment but to white guilt. It also erases the fact that the "privilege" extends to many non-white groups, such as Asians.'

California Lawmakers Propose 'Affirmative Consent' to State and Federal Level

Mastodon · 15 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The act of sex is not illegal. But if two members of the American Law Institute have their way, it will be — unless you follow their rules.

Law professors Stephen J. Schulhofer and Erin Murphy are trying to update the criminal code when it comes to sex offenses, believing current definitions of rape and sexual assault are antiquated. The focus of their draft is on what constitutes consent. It adopts the "yes means yes," or "affirmative consent" model that was passed in California last year.

The California law applies only to college campuses, however. Schulhofer and Murphy aim to take that definition of consent — which says that before every escalation of a sexual encounter, clear and convincing consent must be given — to the state or federal level. No one actually has sex this way, requesting permission and having it granted perhaps a dozen times in a single encounter.

But the theory that millions of Americans are having sex wrongly has gained currency among campus activists. This new attempt to alter the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code, a highly influential document that has been adopted in whole or in part by many states' legislatures, is part of a push to bring authoritarianism into the bedroom.

... Any act of sex in which permission is not repeatedly requested and granted would put at least one of the parties, usually men, in legal jeopardy. Absent the repeated "May I…?" and affirmative responses, any woman could later have her partner locked up over unexpressed mental reservations. Men could make the same accusations.

No one who opposes this legal change argues that consent is unnecessary. But the "yes means yes" standard is so stringent that it would criminalize millions of Americans overnight unless no one reports them.'

Wrestling coach who criticized Title IX treatment of college men is fired

Mastodon · 15 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The UNC-Chapel Hill wrestling coach who has been a critic of how universities handle sexual assault allegations that do not go through the courts is out of a job.

After 12 seasons as head coach of the UNC wrestling program, C.D. Mock was “relieved of his duties” by UNC athletic director Bubba Cunningham.

...

Toward the end of last year and the beginning of this year, Mock became the subject of much criticism for personal social media posts on a blog he set up after his son, a nationally ranked wrestler at the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga, was accused of rape last March by a student.

Criminal charges were not filed, but the case went through the Tennessee university’s judicial process.

Amid a heightened national attention to sexual assault allegations on college campuses, C.D. Mock, a 1982 graduate of UNC, questioned whether the due-process rights of the men accused were being trampled. He also became a critic of the “yes means yes” standard for consent to sexual activity as a replacement for the “no means no” standard.'

Feminist Professor Says People Who Ask For Proof of Rape Culture Aren't Human

Mastodon · 16 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lyndsay Kirkham is a radical feminist who is very active on her personal Twitter account. Following a name search, she is listed as a "Professor" in the "School of Liberal Arts and Sciences", on the Toronto based Humber College's staff directory page.

Kirkham is engaged in a wide variety of extreme dialogue (as one would expect from a feminist professor nowadays). But SoCawlege recently learned that she tweeted something rather disturbing about those critical of the so called "rape culture".

Direct link to Tweet

In addition, she describes herself as a fan of "misandry" (the inverse of misogyny, it means a hatred of boys or men) in her Twitter bio.
...
Regardless, back onto the rape culture claim – the purpose of college is to question your idea of how the world works and to broaden your horizons. Why is asking for proof of something so terrible that it means you are doing "human" wrong? We are inquisitive creatures last time I checked.'

New Questions On Alleged College Sexual Assault Cases

Mastodon · 16 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Watch Prof. KC Johnson provide insight into college sexual assault and due process. Also see this article: Amherst Student Was Expelled for Rape. But He Was Raped, Evidence Shows. Excerpt:

'Amherst College expelled a male student who was accused of sexually assaulting a female student while he was blacked out. Again, while he was blacked out. The woman he allegedly assaulted was fully lucid.

How did that happen? It didn't. The evidence overwhelmingly suggests that the male student did nothing wrong. If anyone committed sexual assault during their encounter, it was in fact the female student.

...

This outcome was obviously a gross miscarriage of justice. I think even the most staunchly pro-victim anti-rape activists would admit that (maybe). But it strikes me that this is exactly the kind of confounding verdict that a college is likely to reach when forced to adhere to the favored policies of the anti-rape activists: affirmative consent and preponderance of the evidence standards. When university administrators poorly trained in legal procedures are asked to determine whether it is more likely than not an accused student had obtained ongoing, enthusiastic, affirmative consent during a sexual encounter, they will invariably convict the innocent.'

Legislators should reject governor’s campus sex bill

Mastodon · 16 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As the legislative session comes to a close, Gov. Andrew Cuomo is making an eleventh-hour push to gain support for a well-intentioned but poorly conceived campus sexual assault bill.
...
Unless students record the entirety of each of their sexual encounters, or trade text messages afterwards that confirm the interaction was consensual, it is unclear how they are expected to demonstrate that they obtained affirmative consent. After all, even with an agreement signed in advance, a person has the right to revoke consent at any time.

Affirmative consent also renders plainly lawful sexual activity punishable by colleges. Couples routinely touch each other without advance permission. If an individual finds the interaction unwelcome, the criminal code asks them to communicate their disinterest to their partner. Only if the initiator proceeds despite the request to stop does he or she run afoul of the law and social norms. But under the affirmative consent standard, even a student who ceases contact immediately upon being asked to do so is guilty of sexual assault on campus because he or she didn’t obtain consent up front.'

Natalie Portman Puts Halt on Feminist Ginsburg Film Until Female Director is Found

Mastodon · 16 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminist icon and Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg revealed recently that Natalie Portman, who is innegotiations to play her in an upcoming biopic, has put a halt on production until a female director is attached to the film.

The film, titled On the Basis of Sex, will follow Ginsburg's life as she fights for equality in her career.

"Natalie Portman came to talk to me about [the film landing a female director], and we had a very good conversation," Ginsburg said during an American Constitution Society convention panel Saturday, viaMSNBC.

"And one thing, interesting, that she insisted on, it held up the project for a while," she continued. "She said, 'I want the director to be a woman. There are not enough women in this industry. There are many talented out there.' And now they do have a woman director.'

More College Rape Hype — This Time from the Washington Post

Mastodon · 16 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Since 2012, the New York Times has led the way in systematically biased coverage of on-campus sexual assault allegations and how colleges are responding. The paper has relentlessly hyped the issue, has smeared quite possibly innocent students while omitting evidence that they were innocent, and has cheered efforts to presume guilt and deny due process for the accused. It has also parroted egregiously misleading statistical claims used by the Obama administration and others to portray the campus rape problem, which is clearly serious, as an out-of-control "epidemic," which it clearly is not. (In fact, the campus rate rape has plunged in the past 20 years.)

Now the Washington Post has joined a race to the bottom among the legacy media, in a June 12 package of two very long front-page articles and a third inside the paper that includes both the results of a Post-Kaiser Family Foundation poll and detailed interviews of some respondents. The main headline: "1 in 5 women say they were violated." The articles and the poll purport to confirm claims by the administration, its congressional supporters, most of the media, and campus activists that around 20 percent of female college students are sexually assaulted while at school. In this portrayal, the nation's campuses are hotbeds of violent crime.'

Kirsten Gillibrand Q&A: ‘I’m not going away’

Mastodon · 16 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'DS: You've dropped the '1 in 5 college women raped' statistic from your website, which some say is proof this isn't as big an issue as you make it out. How do you respond?

KG: Well, we may not know what the actual rate is, but we know it is prevalent, and we know it's real. And so if somebody wants to hide behind not having the right statistic, they're actually denying that problem that really does exist. And these men and women who tell their stories — they are horrific. And it is happening all across all campuses, whether it's a small school, a big school, private or public. And I think those who deny this is an issue are just wrong. And the power of these individual stories will overcome them.'

Fathers Into Felons

Matt · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Federal courts have long recognized parenthood as a “sacred” and “inherent, natural right,” “far more precious than property rights,” and “for the protection of which, just as much as for the protection of the rights of the individual to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, our government is formed.” Shell summarizes assumptions that, until recently, have been virtually universal among free societies: “No known government, however brutal or tyrannical, has ever denied, in fact or principle, the fundamental claim of parents to their children. …A government that distributed children randomly … could not be other than tyrannical. Even if it had the best interest of society in mind … a government that paid no regard to the claims of biological parenthood would be unacceptable to all but the most fanatical of egalitarian or communitarian zealots.”

As a statement of society’s moral consensus Shell’s point is unexceptionable. Yet it also illustrates the ignorance pervading current debates. For current marriage law has both validated her point and negated her fact: “No known government” ever crossed this line until about 30 years ago, well before same-sex marriage, when most of the Western democracies did so. It is having precisely the consequences she postulates.'

Micro-Aggression Is The Road To Micro-Tyranny

Matt · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The political left has come up with a new buzzword: "micro-aggression."

Professors at the University of California at Berkeley have been officially warned against saying such things as "America is the land of opportunity." Why? Because this is considered to be an act of "micro-aggression" against minorities and women.

Supposedly it shows you don't take their grievances seriously and are therefore guilty of being aggressive toward them, even if only on a micro scale.

You might think that this is just another crazy idea from Berkeley. But the same concept appears in a report from the flagship campus of the University of Illinois at Urbana.

If you just sit in a room where all the people are white, you are considered to be guilty of "micro-aggression" against people who are not white, who will supposedly feel uncomfortable when they enter such a room.
...
In a sense, the political left's attempts to silence ideas they cannot, or will not, debate are a confession of intellectual bankruptcy. But this is just one of the left's ever-increasing restrictions on other people's freedom to live their lives as they see fit, rather than as their betters tell them.
...
The left is not necessarily aiming at totalitarianism. But their know-it-all mindset leads repeatedly and pervasively in that direction, even if by small steps, each of which might be called "micro-totalitarianism."'

Child allegedly abducted by mother placed in county care

Matt · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A child allegedly abducted by his mother from Sunnyvale and found in Newark over the weekend has been placed under the care of the Santa Clara County Department of Family and Children's Services division, a Sunnyvale public safety captain said on Monday.

The child's mother, 20-year-old Christina Rodriguez, was arrested along with 19-year-old Alina Herd and 22-year-old Joel Lopez in connection with the alleged abduction on Saturday, public safety Capt. Jeff Hunter said.

The trio was booked into county jail where they were booked on suspicion of parental child abduction and conspiracy, according to Hunter.

Around 3:45 p.m. Saturday, public safety officers responded to a report of a child abduction in the 800 block of San Aleso Avenue where 16-month-old Trinnian Gonzalez was taken, Hunter said.'

Accomplice in New York prison break suspected in plot with escapees to kill husband

Matt · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'His wife is accused of helping two convicted murderers break out of a New York prison. And the escape plan, a source says, also included a plot to end his life.

But how much did Lyle Mitchell know?

That's one question investigators are asking as they search for two fugitives in a massive manhunt.

The answer depends on whom you ask.

A source with direct knowledge of the investigation told CNN that prison tailor Joyce Mitchell knew the inmates had plotted to kill her husband, told him about their plans to break out of the facility and warned him that his life could be in danger.

But a lawyer representing Lyle Mitchell said the husband, who also worked in prison's tailoring block, was kept in the dark.

...

She'd been investigated in the past for an inappropriate relationship with Sweat that led corrections officials to move him out of the tailor shop in 2013 and keep them separated, said Wylie, the district attorney.

That's the year when she started having a sexual relationship with [escapee Richard] Matt, the source said.

The sexual relationship took place at the tailor shop in the Clinton Correctional Facility, the only known place the two were together, the source said.'

Ex-pro cheerleader pleads guilty to sex charge

ErikaLancastor · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Yup, quite a "rape culture", we have going, here, eh? How much you wanna bet she won't serve anywhere near a 15-year term? Excerpt:

'A former Baltimore Ravens cheerleader charged with having sex with a 15-year-old in Bethany Beach pleaded guilty in Sussex County Superior Court Tuesday.

Molly Shattuck pleaded guilty to one count of fourth-degree rape. She settled nine different charges, some of them more serious, by agreeing to plead guilty.

Superior Court judge E. Scott Bradley told Shattuck she faced up to 15 years in prison when she gets sentenced on August 14.'

Michelle O calls men "useful" in meeting with girls

Matt · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'She suggested that while boys and men were important, it was crucial for them to talk about the lack of education for girls around the world.

“You know our sons are important, we love men, we all do, they’re good, they’re useful,” she said.

“I have one in my life,” she added, referring to President Obama. “I like him but you know we have to change the definition of what it means to invest in our young girls.”'

2011 Update to Title IX: The Pendulum Has Swung Too Far

Mastodon · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Jump the paywall by Googling the first paragraph text and clicking on the first search hit. Excerpt:

'The federal law that requires gender equality in higher education, commonly referred to as Title IX, has brought about many laudable results since it was first passed in 1972. But at the behest of the U.S. Department of Education in 2011, the law that was passed to ensure that female students get equal opportunity was refashioned to require that schools investigate and punish sexual assaults on campus under DOE-approved procedures.

In the name of the wholly laudable goal of combating sexual assaults, the DOE placed schools in the precarious position of adjudicating allegedly criminal acts in their discipline systems, with the threat of potentially ruinous sanctions, should the schools' efforts fall short. Recognizing that at least some accusers have historically been mistreated, the department insisted on changes in how the system was to run, but those changes have gone too far and now undercut fundamental rights of those accused of wrongdoing. For instance, the DOE demanded that colleges apply a "preponderance of the evidence" standard in determining whether a sexual assault complaint has merit, and prohibited both the "clear and convincing" and "beyond a reasonable doubt" thresholds. Further, the department dictated that schools should prohibit the accused from cross-examining the accuser, warning that doing so could create a hostile environment—effectively taking the position that everyone accused is guilty, and that having the temerity to question the accuser would compound the trauma.'

Megyn Kelly lashes out at Amherst College again

Mastodon · 17 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'For the second night in a row, Fox News host Megyn Kelly has criticized Amherst College over its handling of a sexual assault accusation.

Kelly opened her show with the story, and could hardly contain her disdain for the way the case was handled. A young man, blacked out after a night of drinking, had a sex act performed on him, and then two years later was accused of sexual assault and expelled. He hired a lawyer to sue the university, and his lawyer discovered text messages strongly suggesting that the accuser was not sexually assaulted. Yet Amherst refused to reopen the case.

Kelly brought in fellow Fox host Trace Gallagher to divulge details of the case, quoting from text messages where the accuser practically bragged about the night in question — with no sign of the distress she claimed she was going through at the time. The accuser even invited another man over that night. He provided a sworn affidavit that she "did not appear in any distress ... she was friendly, flirtatious and spirited."'

A Nobel professor's hounded from his job for 'sexist' remarks in disturbing trend

Mastodon · 18 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'First of all, let me just say that I do not intend to resign on account of what I am about to say. Or issue a grovelling apology, or cry in the loos.

So if you're a touchy 'feminazi' with the sense of humour of a Ryvita, or just one of those weird people who like getting in a massive lather about things, save your spittle. If, that is, you have any left. Because you did it, ladies. You got your man. Sir Tim Hunt, 72, Nobel Prize winner, one of Britain's top scientists last night resigned.

No doubt it will be extra helpings of organic non-GM muesli all round at breakfast this morning now that this scourge has been banished from scientific circles. After all, men like him can't be allowed to go around the place making giant scientific breakthroughs of the kind that may one day lead to, oh I don't know, a cure for cancer, unless and until they have fully submitted to the will of the mob.

Heaven forfend that an old fellow like Hunt should try to make a bit of a joke about the ladies and his own inability to resist their charms without being tarred and feathered and locked in the stocks so that he, too, like many before him, can receive his 15 minutes of hate.

It's days like these that I despair of my sex. Of the stupid, pampered, spoilt women who have nothing better to do with their lives than whinge and whine about utterly trivial items of entirely innocuous cack-handedness by slightly inept men who have no intention whatsoever of offending the Sisterhood, but who, entirely by accident, end up getting it in the neck.'

‘Happy Father’s Day, Mom’ Angel Soft’s Newest Campaign

Mastodon · 18 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'On the newest commercial for Angel Soft titled ‘Happy Father’s Day, Mom,’ several adults tell the stories of how their mom had to play both parental roles. On Sunday, June 21st fathers are celebrated for this special holiday.

Their stories are tear jerkers as they talk about how their mom not only juggled a family, jobs and personal lives, but made sure there kids had the best life she could give them. One of the men even said during the video, “She really is the most amazing mother, but she was an incredible father.”

Although some fathers may feel a bit offended, Todd Wingfield, Angel Soft’s Senior Brand Manager, told Centric TV, “We celebrate families in all forms, shapes and sizes. Our vision is that this is the first in a series of unique stories we’ll be sharing. Dads also play an important role and exemplify those traits of being soft and strong every day.”'

Women Against Paternity Fraud (WAPF) Opens New California Office and Launches a New Website

Matt · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'Women Against Paternity Fraud (WAPF) a national non-profit organization that educates the public, media, and policy makers on issues relating to paternity fraud (which is devastating to men, women, and especially children) opens up a new California office.

Year after year, the American Association of Blood Banks reports that approximately 28% of all paternity tests excludes the targeted man. In LA County alone, 80% of paternity establishments are entered by default judgments.

The mission of WAPF is to institute dialogue and educational efforts that encourage reform – to insure that children develop a relationship with their biological fathers, have access to their family medical history, their heritage, and inheritance and medical insurance benefits. With the goal of ending paternity fraud and the devastation it creates within families.'

Kirsten Gillibrand claims her bill gives equal rights to accusers and accused, but it doesn't

Matt · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'During a Washington Post symposium on campus sexual assault Wednesday (which included no speakers advocating for due process), Gillibrand was asked if the bill she has introduced — the Campus Accountability and Safety Act — takes into account the rights of accused students. Gillibrand responded with an emphatic "absolutely" before claiming that she and her Senate colleagues worked with accused students while crafting the bill.

"[We] made sure that they had the same rights of representation as someone who was alleging the crime," Gillibrand said. "And so, all notice requirements are for both, all representational requirements — that you can have someone by your side representing you — are for both."

This is not accurate. Gillibrand's bill does not specifically lay out what rights accusers (the bill calls them "victims" throughout, except for once, illustrating a clear bias) and the accused have. It states only that schools must provide each student with written notice of the process to provide them "with the opportunity to meaningfully exercise the due process rights afforded to them under institutional policy."

Due process rights are mentioned elsewhere in the bill as being provided by a certain section in the Higher Education Act of 1965. That section calls for a supposedly "fair and impartial investigation" conducted by minimally trained campus administrators (more on that later). It also calls for both students to be notified of the process and outcome of the investigation and allows them to have "others" present at the disciplinary hearing.

The idea that Gillibrand's bill advances the rights of accused students was challenged by Joe Cohn, the legislative and policy director for the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, an organization that has been working hard to ensure that students are provided their due process rights.'

NPO: Washington Post Urges Men to ‘Go All In’ for Work and Family

Matt · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This article in the Washington Post strikes a blow for men as fathers (Washington Post, 6/6/15). Specifically, it’s about changing parental leave laws and policies to allow dads to spend meaningful time with their kids in the first weeks of life. That of course is a good idea. Mothers biologically bond with their children during pregnancy; fathers do so mostly after their kids are born when testosterone levels take a sharp dive and prolactin levels rise. And children need to see, hear and feel their dads early in their lives to form the usual child/father attachment.

So parental leave for fathers makes sense for dads and their kids.

But societal norms interfere with that. The WaPo article makes clear that expectations of men to be the breadwinner in the family intrude on the father-child dyad. It’s not news that fathers spend much more time at work than do mothers. That’s a behavioral norm that’s evolved over (potentially) millions of years in every known human culture.'

The Trouble with Boys: Social Influences and the Gender Gap in Disruptive Behavior

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This paper explores the importance of the home and school environments in explaining the gender gap in disruptive behavior. We document large differences in the gender gap across key features of the home environment - boys do especially poorly in broken families. In contrast, we find little impact of the early school environment on non-cognitive gaps. Differences in endowments explain a small part of boys' non-cognitive deficit in single-mother families. More importantly, non-cognitive returns to parental inputs differ markedly by gender. Broken families are associated with worse parental inputs and boys' non-cognitive development, unlike girls', appears extremely responsive to such inputs.

This paper is available as PDF (252 K) or via email.'

Governor OKs payment to Brian Banks for time spent in prison on false rape allegation

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Gov. Jerry Brown on Wednesday authorized a nearly $1 million payout to three wrongfully convicted former prisoners, including Brian Banks, a former Poly High football star who was exonerated on a rape conviction three years ago.

Banks will receive $142,200 after spending five years behind bars. He was exonerated after his accuser, Wanetta Gibson, a fellow student, recanted her story.

In 2002, Banks was a 17-year-old football standout at Poly High, attending summer school ahead of his senior year, when he had what he always maintained was a consensual encounter with Gibson.

Gibson later claimed Banks raped her. Facing a 41-year sentence for rape and kidnapping, Banks, who once received a scholarship offer from USC, pleaded no contest in order to receive fewer years behind bars.'

Sobering Father's Day PSA Reminds Dads to Talk to Sons About Domestic Violence

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Many of this year's Father's Day messages have tugged at our heartstrings, but The Ad Council and organization Futures Without Violence have teamed up for a more sobering message for Dads.

A TV spot, created by RSA Films, starts out like a typical Father's Day ad, with a voiceover (by Forest Whittaker) reflecting on what Dads teach their sons; to hit baseballs, goals, and other sporting achievements. It goes on to ask "But how much time did you spend on teaching him what not to hit?"'

Rethink masculinity for Father's Day

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Father's Day might seem like the wrong holiday to discuss discrimination against mothers. But the problem is an enduring workplace affliction, which also harms dads.

Employers too often believe mothers are less competent and less committed, even though there's no evidence to back up that bias. It's an archaic assumption in an age when women receive more advanced degrees than men and make up half of the workforce.

To bust the stereotype, the U.S. needs to do more than enhance women's role in the workplace; men need to ask for "daddy leave," a family-friendly policy that has worked in places like Sweden.'

To Stop Mass Killers, We Have To Stop Drugging Our Young Boys

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As America comes to terms with a monstrous shooting in Charleston that has left nine churchgoers dead, bewildered members of the public are seeking rationality in apparently wanton and inscrutable crimes.

We may never know quite what drives some people to kill. But it seems that in young Dylann Storm Roof, we have further evidence of a trend that should worry us all. I'm talking about his dependence on prescription drugs: suboxone, to be precise.

Roof is just the latest in a long line of young men who have committed appalling crimes after a lifetime on psychotropic drugs. If you don't believe me, consider some of the most notorious young male shooters in American history.

Sandy Hook shooter Adam Lanza? Lexapro and Celexa. Red-headed Aurora killer James Holmes? Clonazepam and sertraline. Virginia Tech mass murderer Seung-Hui Cho? Prozac. Charles Whitman, the "Texas Tower Sniper"? Dexedrine. Columbine executioners Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold? Zoloft and Luvox.

You get the idea. These young men were all on prescribed medication. Feminism helped to get them there. In particular, female teachers who either dislike men or are completely ignorant of healthy behaviour norms for boys are creating a generation of emotionally stunted, drugged up young men.'

"Are You a Manterrupter? – Part I"

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

“Manterruption,” “mansplaining” and “bropropriation” are neologisms that spell bad news both for women trying to make the most of their seat at the table and for men claiming to be equal opportunity communicators. All these terms represent characteristics of male communication – whether intentional or the result of unconscious biases and attitudes – used as displays of dominance and power:

- Manterrupting: When a man interrupts a woman frequently and unnecessarily.
- Intrusive Interrupting: When a person intentionally or unintentionally usurps a speakers’ turn at talk in order to derail their ability to complete their thought and make their point.
- Mansplaining: When a man interrupts a woman to explain something to her she knows more about than he does, often including putting a “manly” spin on a “soft” or feminine mode of expression.
- Bropropriating: When a man usurps a woman’s idea – often with the support of other men — and takes credit for it.

This new vocabulary is deliberately sarcastic, not simply to provoke confrontation, but to highlight the frustration that interruptive behavior causes competent, creative and articulate women. Through these terms, women are trying to sound a wake-up call. Can men listen? Can they change?'

Rolling Stone Writer, Editor From UVA Rape Story Unaffected By Layoffs

Mastodon · 19 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Layoffs hit Wenner Media this week.

Those affected worked at US Weekly, Men's Journal and Rolling Stone.

The cuts, reported The Hollywood Reporter, affected employees on both the business and editorial sides of the magazines.

Those who were unaffected by the news?

Sabrina Erdely, who wrote the now widely discredited UVA rape story, and Sean Woods, the deputy managing editor who helped manage the 2014 debacle.

Maybe the mag really is standing by them, despite a Columbia Journalism School investigation that called the story a "journalism failure."'

"What Are Men's Rights Groups Angry About Now? Toilet Paper"

Mastodon · 20 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Earlier this week, Angel Soft brand toilet paper released an internet-only Father's Day ad honoring the women who, whether due to death or abandonment, have had to raise their kids on their own. In the commercial, attractive men and women who were raised by single mothers offer teary testimonials over a bed of soft piano music, concluding in a warm "Happy Father's Day, Mom" to the women who have had to be soft but strong, just like septic-safe, 2-ply Angel Soft brand toilet paper. ...

A lovely sentiment with which one could not possibly argue, right?

Ha, just kidding, this is the internet in 2015 and literally anything can send idiots into a blind, spitting, boycotting rage. The top comment on the video is "Great way to give the shaft to fathers on Father's Day." A post on Reddit says: "It's time to troll #HappyFathersDayMom and @AngelSoft." Within 24 hours of the ad's release, a men's rights activist named Tommy Sotomayor uploaded a response video entitled "Angel Soft Commercial Feminism Viciously Attack Fathers Day Masculinity!" And on Twitter and Facebook, there's a tempest in a toilet bowl, with people calling the ad "despicable," "disgraceful," and angrily asking the social media intern of a toilet paper brand why men don't get more attention, respect and deference in America. One of the complaining complainers simply and tartly summed up the collective sentiment by tweeting: "Don't ruin others father's day because you lack a father. Fuck off." (I will not even go into all the angry tweets and comments directed at "Angle Soft," the world's most uncomfortable and least effective toilet tissue.)'

Woman staged 'rape' scene with knife, vodka, called 9-1-1, police say

Mastodon · 20 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Police officers acting on a 9-1-1 dispatch found overturned furniture inside an East Lampeter Township home on March 10.

A knife and bottle of vodka also were found at the home where a woman claimed she was raped by a stranger at midnight.

Further investigating - including a review of a Fitbit activity tracker - showed the scene was staged and 43-year-old Jeannine Risley knowingly filed a false report, police allege.

Risley is now headed to trial on three misdemeanor counts for prompting the emergency response and manhunt for an intruder that allegedly never was.'

The US Is Leading The Way In Fatherlessness And It's Hurting Our Kids

Mastodon · 20 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'America leads the industrialized world in fatherlessness.

Right now, around 41 percent of children are born to single mothers.

For women under 30, who bear two-thirds of all children, that rate is 53 percent.

Many unmarried women are cohabiting with partners at the outset of their children's births, but those couplings disintegrate at twice the rate of marriages.

In total, about one-third of all children are raised in father-absent homes.

By some estimates, this means more kids are growing up with televisions in their bedroom than with both of their biological parents.

Boys are especially affected by this trend. Without positive and consistent male role models, society misses out on much of their constructive potential.'

UK: Why are our universities blocking men's societies?

Mastodon · 20 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A male Durham University student was so moved by the suicide of a close male friend that he felt compelled to start a society for other men who may need support – only to find it blocked by the Student Union this week for being too “controversial”.

When Adam Frost, 21, a third-year Italian and French student, proposed the Durham University Male Human Rights Society, he was ridiculed on campus, with remarks such as “Isn’t this a bit like starting a society for white people’s rights?”

Adam told me: “Last October, a friend who was depressed reached out to me, but I didn’t know what to say. I tried to help, but two weeks later I found out he’d killed himself. That hit me hard. I started looking into male suicide and found some shocking statistics. The reason behind that is that male depression isn’t taken seriously – we’re supposed to just ‘man up’ and deal with it. Men are ridiculed.'

UK: Feminist lies exposed by politician

Kaka81k · 20 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This interview explains why feminist ideas are baseless and how the government today is biased against men.

The problem with the media's coverage of sexual assault

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This month, Slate's Emily Yoffe accused filmmakers behind the campus rape documentary "The Hunting Ground" of being inaccurate.

Yoffe's take on "The Hunting Ground" comes in the wake of the Columbia School of Journalism's report on Rolling Stone's erroneous account of a gang rape at the University of Virginia. Published last November, the story drew heavily from a UVA student's graphic account of her rape at a fraternity.

Soon after, the Washington Post and other media outlets found that the victim at the core of Rolling Stone's story fabricated her account.

After a four-month investigation, Columbia concluded that the fault was with reporter Sabrina Rubin Erdley and Rolling Stone's editors and fact-checkers, who didn't stop publication when certain facts couldn't be confirmed.
...
When researchers define a wide range of activities with broad terms, Rennison says it can impact the resulting data.

Pointing that fact out is complicated, she said, citing the case of UC Berkeley professor Neil Gilbert. When Gilbert published a controversial article suggesting that statistics related to rape may be inflated, protesters threatened to cut off his penis.'

Banned from Toronto Pride, controversial men's rights group walks in York Region's pride parade

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'They might have been barred from marching in Toronto's Pride Parade, but organizers of a similar event in York Region gave a controversial men's rights group the green light to participate in their parade Saturday.

Just days after Pride Toronto's dispute resolution process banned the group from forthcoming celebrations, the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) — a group denounced by critics for being anti-feminist and misogynist — were peacefully walking the streets of Richmond Hill for Pride York Fest.

Dave Williams, the event's co-ordinator, said he was aware that CAFE's potential Pride involvement had sparked concern in Toronto, but he wasn't going to stop them from taking part in the York event because he hadn't received any complaints about the group.

Plus he pointed out, "We do have two groups in our parade specifically for women. If we were to have a policy that says groups for any one gender are problematic, then those women's groups would have to go. We don't believe that would be fair."'

Boys to men: Fathers, family, and opportunity

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It isn't easy being a man today. That is, at least, the strong message coming from professors and movie producers. Men are now, according to a provocative cover article in The Economist, “The weaker sex.” They are failing to launch, failing out of school, failing in relationships. The new world of feminism and globalization has pulled out the rug from under men who could once enjoy respect and a decent living simply by virtue of their Y chromosome.
...
There are both generational and class gaps in the state of the modern male. Older men worked their way up in world of strongly gendered divisions of labor. But their sons have seen the labor market alter beyond recognition. With many more women than men now graduating college, this trend is set to continue. The pre-feminist world is gone—for good.

Well-educated men have been able to adapt more easily to the new world, and indeed have benefited on many fronts. They have more educated, higher-earning wives, which reduces some of the pressure to be a sole breadwinner—as well as boosting household income. Affluent couples have adopted more egalitarian norms about gender roles, especially with regard to paid work and parenting. They may not yet have created “symmetrical families”—but they are moving in that direction.'

Leading law journal calls Department of Ed's Title IX letter to colleges 'unconstitutional and unfair'

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's not just conservatives and civil libertarians warning that the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights exceeded its authority with its 2011 "Dear Colleague" letter to colleges.

The Legal Intelligencer, "America's oldest daily law journal" and part of the company founded by Court TV founder Steven Brill, writes in a staff editorial that the "mandate" was "unfair and unconstitutional."

The department has botched Title IX so badly that Congress should just amend it, the editors say:

"Recognizing that at least some accusers have historically been mistreated, the department insisted on changes in how the system was to run, but those changes have gone too far and now undercut fundamental rights of those accused of wrongdoing. For instance, the DOE demanded that colleges apply a "preponderance of the evidence" standard in determining whether a sexual assault complaint has merit, and prohibited both the "clear and convincing" and "beyond a reasonable doubt" thresholds. Further, the department dictated that schools should prohibit the accused from cross-examining the accuser, warning that doing so could create a hostile environment—effectively taking the position that everyone accused is guilty, and that having the temerity to question the accuser would compound the trauma.

We know that each of these [due process] rights means that an accusation is less likely to result in a conviction. Yet no serious person proposes doing away with those basic rights, solely for the sake of increasing the conviction rate."'

Ignore the bad fathers on Father’s Day

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. Excerpt:

'Dear Editor,

It is here again. The day we refer to as ‘Father’s Day.’ But I humbly submit that this special day is being used for male bashing by just too many influential people in our society. Father’s Day was first observed in the United States of America, in June 1910. In 1924 President Calvin Coolidge supported the idea of a National Father’s Day in the USA. Then in 1966, President Lyndon Johnson signed a presidential proclamation declaring the third Sunday of June as Father’s Day. Over the years, Father’s Day has been observed in well over 100 countries around the world, including Guyana. Regrettably, in more recent years, Father’s Day, like Christmas Day, is being attacked and abused.'

UK: Nobel Scientists Condemn Feminist ‘Lynch Mob’ That Ousted Professor

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Eight Nobel prizewinning scientists have rallied to the defence of Sir Tim Hunt, the British scientist who was forced to resign his honorary professorship at University College London (UCL) after making comments on the “trouble with girls” in laboratories.

Sir Andre Geim, who won the Nobel prize for physics in 2010, said Sir Tim had been “crucified” by feminist fanatics and condemned UCL for “ousting him” from his honorary post. A senior colleague of Sir Tim’s wife Professor Mary Collins also accused UCL of a “knee-jerk reaction” following a Twitter storm.

Sir Tim, who won the Nobel prize himself in 2001, said he feels “hung out to dry” after the hysterical backlash over his “joke” comment that women who work in laboratories cry when criticised and distract male colleagues by falling in love with them.

The Times newspaper contacted various Nobel laureates, eight of whom either condemned UCL’s decision or said the press reaction had been out of proportion, while only two said the college was right to remove him.'

County responsible for false rape case, says local police dept.

Mastodon · 21 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Defending against a federal lawsuit, which claims Fremont police falsely arrested, imprisoned and accused a Marine veteran of rape, the town is now shifting blame to the Rockingham County Attorney's Office.

Veteran Andrew "Drew" Cullen filed suit in the U.S. District Court of New Hampshire alleging the town of Fremont and two of its top police officials falsely imprisoned him and cast him in a false light by untrue accusations that he sexually assaulted a mentally-disabled woman. In a 5-count federal lawsuit, Cullen names the town, former police chief Neal Janvrin and police Sgt. Adam Raymond as responsible for failing to investigate the initial allegations that were made by a woman with well-documented mental limitations, who gave three different versions of her story and previously made a similar false claim against someone else.

A Circuit Court judge in February 2012 found there was no probable cause that Cullen committed the crime and the case was dismissed, according to court records. Probable cause is considered a low legal threshold and few cases are tossed at that level.

For reasons that have not been made public, Janvrin was fired six months later and he responded with a wrongful termination suit against the town of Fremont.'

New document available for download

Matt · 22 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the Documents section, I added a new item (#8) that I hope will be useful to those new to MRM activism. If you are so inclined, have a look. The direct link is here.

Two People Have Filed Over 1,700 Sex Discrimination Complaints With Dept. Of Education

Mastodon · 22 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Exactly two people are responsible for filing over 1,700 sex discrimination complaints with the federal Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights in the last few years.

Catherine E. Lhamon, the Education Department's secretary for civil rights, won't identify these two highly litigious individuals.'

Former pro baseball player found dead in murder-suicide

Mastodon · 22 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Former Mets outfielder Darryl Hamilton was identified by police in Pearland, Texas, as one of two victims in a murder-suicide.
...
Officers responding to a disturbance call Sunday found Hamilton's body near the front entrance. Monica Jordan, 44, was found dead in another part of the home.

Hamilton was shot more than once and Jordan died from a self-inflicted gunshot wound, according to investigators.'

The male Pill is coming - and it's going to change everything

mens_issues · 22 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Found in The Telegraph, ironically under Women's Health. Excerpt:

'Male contraception is coming.

Vasalgel is a non-hormonal male contraceptive owned by the medical research organisation the Parsemus Foundation. It's poised as the first FDA (Food and Drug Administration panel) approved male contraceptive since the condom.

What's more, it's estimated to hit the US market around 2018-2020 - and could change the way we view contraception for ever.

...
Research tells us that at least half of men would use it.

Vasalgel is essentially a polymer that's injected under local anesthetic into the man's sperm-carrying tubes, accessible through the scrotum — not in his penis or testicles as some authors have erred. It works by blocking sperm and is expected to be reversible through a second injection that dissolves the polymer.'

Meet The Taxpayer-Funded Feminist Professor Who Demands ‘Men Control’

ErikaLancastor · 23 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A women’s studies professor at the University of Maryland, College Park has used her Twitter account to call for legislation to restrict the actions of males because of their masculinity.

The taxpayer-funded professor is Ashwini Tambe. The tweet is the highlight among a set of Tambe’s outrageous tweets compiled by the website SoCawlege.com.

Here is a screenshot of Tambe’s May 2014 tweet demanding “men control”:'

Woman claims she was beaten by black men found to be only wearing makeup

Mastodon · 23 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Texas woman's plan to get attention in the wake of a racially-motivated church shooting in South Carolina backfired when people quickly figured out it was fake.

According to The Daily Dot, Texarkana, Texas, resident Ashley Casey Martin wrote on Facebook that she was "jumped by 3 African Americans ourside [sic] of the as [sic] Walmart" alongside some photos of her alleged injuries.

The photos didn't show injuries, but a laughably bad makeup job featuring what looks like black eyes literally drawn with black eyeshadow. Blood looks to be some sort of blush or red lipstick.

The Daily Dot contacted both the store and Texarkana Police Department public information officer Mike Jones who both said they had no reports of any incidents.
...
A friend later contacted the Texarkana Police Department to say that Martin is "emotionally disturbed."

"We were informed that she is emotionally disturbed and that they are attempting to get her the assistance that she needs," the department wrote, adding that they deleted a Facebook post about the incident. "We have removed the post to avoid contributing to her difficult struggle."'

Australia: Queensland researcher to start world-first study into women-only police stations

Mastodon · 23 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Police in Australia deal with a domestic violence matter every two minutes, according to estimates, a disturbing reality authorities around the country are struggling to combat.

Queensland researchers are now looking across the world to South America, where a unique and cooperative approach has been achieving success under the radar.

Women-only police stations designed specifically to deal with domestic and sexual violence have been quietly running for decades across Brazil, Argentina, Ecuador, Nicaragua and Peru with multi-agency and government cooperation.
...
Professor Carrington said that, as the name suggests, the stations are staffed by female police officers, psychologists and social workers.

"They don't look like police stations in that they are very brightly coloured, they have flowers [and] they are very inviting and welcoming," she said.'

Rape on Campus: Guilty until Proven Innocent

Mastodon · 23 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Megyn Kelly recently interviewed the attorney for "John Doe," a pseudonym for a young man who was charged with sexual assault when he was a sophomore at Amherst College by "Sandra Jones," another pseudonym. Evidently, colleges and universities now have panels or tribunals to judge charges of sexual assault. This began in 2011, when the Obama administration issued an edict claiming that one out of every five women in college has been sexually assaulted and warning that schools who didn't crack down and reduce the numbers of sexual assaults could lose federal funding. Colleges and universities rushed to set up panels and tribunals to "judge" these accusations in order to keep the cash flowing.

Now it appears that all any woman has to do is accuse a male of sexual misconduct of any type, and this tribunal process begins. John Doe was a victim of this edict.

K.C. Johnson, author of Until Proven Innocent, in a interview with Megyn Kelly, had the following to say about the tribunal system:

`Once the complaint is filed, an investigator, who lacks subpoena power, interviews the accuser and the accused student; beyond that, the college promises only that the investigator will make a "good faith effort" to speak to relevant witnesses, and will "try" to obtain relevant physical or medical evidence. If the investigator's "good faith" effort doesn't track down relevant witnesses, the policy presumes that the accused student won't be able to call those witnesses before the hearing.

"Attorneys cannot participate in the Hearing Board process" at Amherst (although, the college helpfully notes, the accused student can hire an attorney—at his own expense—and have the attorney present on campus the day of the hearing, perhaps for a very expensive form of virtual, moral support). The attorney-less accused student does receive an "advisor" from the campus community, but this advisor "is not an advocate for the student."

Amherst does not permit the accused student to directly cross-examine his accuser; he can only submit questions to the panel chair, who may ask or reject the questions as the chair chooses. Effective cross-examination under such circumstances is all but impossible—even more so since the accuser is allowed to write responses, rather than respond to questions orally. Any guilty finding is "permanently noted on the student's record."`

Although there have been other examples where the lives of young men have been ruined in similar circumstances (Duke Lacrosse, Tawana Brawley), in 2014, the Obama administration doubled down and said the colleges weren't doing enough. Sexual assault as defined by the administration now includes verbal threats.'

How rating men on a 'sexist' app is making dating safer for women

Mastodon · 23 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The free app has just launched in the UK, following success in the US (it had over 200,000 users after two months, and a 60 per cent retention rate).

Simply, it allows women to anonymously comment on the men they know and have dated. The app is designed exclusively for women so they can anonymously research any man they're interested in dating.

They can post photos of the men, write reviews and list the best and worst things about their character, style and sense of humour. You don't rate the men yourself (marks out of ten this is not), instead you take a multiple choice quiz and the app works out their score. The men are also assigned hashtags that reflect their best and worst qualities, such as #SweetToMom or #RudeToWaiters.

Gulp. Soon the straight, single men of the UK will be at the mercy of their old girlfriends.

But is this fair? Lulu has plenty of critics, who accuse it of shaming men. They argue it's an example of reverse sexism and non-consensual objectification isn't acceptable, whatever your gender. There has even been a lawsuit against it in Brazil.
...
"Lulu is also about safety. When we date online, we don't know who we're meeting, and Lulu means men are held accountable in a way they haven't been before," she says.

I'm reminded of that immortal Margaret Atwood line: "Men are afraid that women will laugh at them. Women are afraid that men will kill them."
...
She is passionate about making the world better for women, both in dating and as a woman in tech.

"We want more balance in the tech world and most of the dating apps are made by guys," she explains. When every other aspect of our internet lives gets a digital rating, why not apply it to the men we meet?"'

'Dateline' highlights campus sexual assault and the difficulties for college adjudication

Matt · 24 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'NBC's "Dateline" aired Sunday night with an episode about campus sexual assault and the alleged failings of colleges and universities in handling complaints.

But perhaps inadvertently, the program also highlighted the fact that colleges – no matter how much the media and politicians want them to – just can't adjudicate a sexual assault the way the police can.

And, like many attempts to discuss the issue of campus sexual assault, the episode's star victims told some questionable stories.'

"Fainting couch feminism"

Matt · 24 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'AEI resident scholar and former professor Christina Hoff Sommers has been lecturing on college campuses for more than twenty years. Recently, some students have conducted protests against speech they find objectionable. They've forced lecturers to cancel talks, have security protect the speakers, or even have universities launch investigations into the student complaints against their professors. Dr. Sommers takes a look at this recent wave of protests, and posits that the First Amendment is being replaced by a woman's right not to be made uncomfortable.'

‘Rape culture is a dangerous myth’

Mastodon · 24 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Earlier this month, Lauren Southern, a young Canadian reporter and a political-science student at the University of the Fraser Valley, caused a media storm when she challenged a ‘SlutWalk’ in Vancouver by holding up a placard which said ‘There is no rape culture in the West’. Last week, I talked to Southern about why she decided to speak out.

The protest Southern disrupted – she held up the placard and challenged the protesters’ views on camera – was linked to Women Against Violence Against Women, a rape-crisis centre set up in Vancouver in the Eighties, which follows a ‘feminist anti-oppression philosophy’ and claims that ‘rape culture is real and huge and everywhere’. SlutWalks began four years ago after a policeman in Toronto suggested that ‘women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimised’. In response, feminists took to the streets of Toronto in their underwear in protest at the cop’s ‘slut-shaming and victim-blaming’ statement. SlutWalks have since become popular across the globe, and are held annually in many cities.

Southern had previously sparked debate by posting a picture online of her holding up a sign that explained why she didn’t ‘need feminism’ – a response to a popular feminist selfie campaign. Following this up a year later with a video entitled ‘Why I am not a feminist’, she called out feminism as a ‘faux form of equality under a gender-biased word’. In Southern’s report on the Vancouver SlutWalk, she explained that she had attended the rally to ‘challenge the fearmongering feminist narrative about men, women and violence’. It is this ‘rape culture’ narrative, she tells me, which is really trivialising rape. ‘Women are going to equate things that aren’t rape with rape because they interpret guys whistling at them as rape culture’, she says. ‘The misuse of the word [rape] is very dangerous because it allows for false accusations.”'

How testosterone shapes society

Kaka81k · 24 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'Testosterone has long been considered what makes men masculine. But is this common perception selling the hormone short? Dr Phillips investigates just how this molecule affects our abilities, behaviour and health.

"I've found I was less drawn by an attractive woman's body, but found that I could appreciate what people's expressions were more." Since being diagnosed with prostate cancer, Professor Wassersug has noticed both pros and cons to being testosterone-deprived. Evidence suggests that the hormone has a big influence on how our brain develops; it has the potential to affect behaviour, empathy-levels, language, and the way we build relationships. Because of this, regulating testosterone-levels may just hold the key to healthier and happier lives.'

NPO: Fathers' Day Media Messages: A Sea-Change from Past Years

Matt · 24 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Every year, equal parenting advocates anticipate Fathers' Day with a mixture of joy and alarm. The joy of course is because fathers across the country are acknowledged and valued for what they are — one of the two most important people in their children's lives and vital to their well-being. The alarm comes from the sad fact that, every year, there are some who seize on Fathers' Day as an excuse to denigrate fathers even more than usual.

But this year, in keeping with what I see as a cultural sea-change in attitudes about fathers and shared parenting, the anti-dad crowd was mostly silent. Indeed, compared to previous years, it was almost non-existent. The number of anti-father messages was vanishingly small. Yes, Angel Soft toilet paper ran an ad pointedly extolling single mothers, making clear the attitude that fathers don't matter. And of course the feminist site Jezebel took the opportunity to refer to your dad as a "Piece of Sh*t." Classy, very classy. And the New York Times mostly restricted Fathers' Day messages to shopping tips, carefully avoiding ideas of any greater depth or importance.'

Malecare: FY2016 CDC Prostate Cancer Research Restored

Matt · 24 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Malecare.org:

CDC Advocacy Update June 24, 2015

The line item for FY 2016 CDC prostate cancer funding of $13,205,000 is restored in both the House and Senate appropriations bills, as authored by their committees. Since both the House and Senate committee bills restore funding, there will be no conference discussion, nor is it likely to be debated by the full House or Senate. Only a new amendment by the full Senate committee actually directing the removal of prostate cancer funding could alter this outcome...that is unlikely.

You did it! Thanks to the several thousand of you who took time and effort to write emails and letters to the Congressional House and Senate Budget Committee. You who responded to our call to action at http://malecare.org/cdc . It is rare when so many prostate cancer survivors work together to create a force. This success helps validate our Patient Action Leaders project as a new method for prostate cancer advocacy. We thank Mark Vieth from Cavarocchi Ruscio Dennis Associate, James Manser from Endo and Col. Paul Taylor from Zero Cancer for their guidance and insights. These three guys understand the value of selfless collaboration in advocacy. I will also be thanking the House and Senate budget committee's legislative directors and representatives. And, I repeat, our big thanks to you!

Advocacy done well, works. Even if you didn't actually do anything regarding this particular advocacy effort, we hope that you will feel inspired to participate with us, next time.

Best regards,

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare
Men fighting cancer, together

darryl@malecare.org

Darryl Hamilton's killer burned down her house in 2006 to spite her husband

Mastodon · 25 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As investigators in Pearland, Texas, try to connect the dots in the murder-suicide that claimed the life of former Mets outfielderDarryl Hamilton, new details are emerging about the woman police say shot him and then took her own life.

According to a report by the Houston Chronicle, Monica Jordan pleaded guilty in 2008 to felony arson after burning down a house in 2006 where she had been living with her husband at the time. There were reports she tried to spray him with gasoline before lighting the fire.

Jordan and Hamilton had a 14-month-old son together. He was found unharmed at the site of the murder-suicide.'

"Upcoming Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault Awareness Events Focus on Men"

Mastodon · 25 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A full day of events addressing issues of sexual assault and domestic violence is planned for Thursday, June 25th, but the intended audience isn't the demographic most affected by those crimes.

Rather than focus on women for these events, the Sexual Assault Kit (SAK) Taskforce is inviting men to be guests at its quarterly "community conversation" event. That public forum will be immediately followed by the annual Walk a Mile in Her Shoes event, where men are asked to don high heels for a one-mile awareness walk.

"Men have been basically silent on the issues of domestic violence and sexual assault. And the silence is what creates the permissive space for abusers to be abusive," said Kevin Reed, the Shelby County judicial commissioner over the domestic violence court and a member of the SAK Taskforce.
...
The Memphis Area Women's Council (MAWC) is behind the annual Walk a Mile event, which is in its fifth year. The walk kicks off at 5 p.m., immediately following the community conversation meeting. Participants will walk from the Cannon Center to the FedExForum Plaza, and while high heels aren't required, they are encouraged.'

France: Mother charged with multiple infanticide counts

Matt · 26 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. From March; I heard on the radio the trial has started. Excerpt:

'The bodies of five babies, four in a freezer, have been discovered in a house in southwestFrance, in what appears to be the country's worst case of infanticide in recent years.

The mother, 35, was taken to hospital and the 40-year old father taken in for questioning after he alerted police to the body of a newborn he found in a thermal bag earlier in the day.

Officers then "discovered four more bodies of babies during their search" at the house in Louchats, near the city of Bordeaux, said a source close to the inquiry.

It was the father, a farmer, who made the initial macabre discovery of the bag containing the first corpse of a newborn baby at the family home.

The mother apparently "gave birth at home alone", the source said, adding that she had been taken to a hospital in nearby Bordeaux "for gynaecological and psychiatric examinations".'

Accused Student Suing Emma Sulkowicz for Misandry

Mastodon · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Misandry, or the man-hating equivalent of misogyny, has gone from a far-out accusation leveled by Men's Rights Activist types to an ironic, re-appropriated feminist inside joke, and now it has come back out the other side. In a lawsuit against Columbia University, counsel for the male student Emma Sulkowicz has accused of rape are using language that usually connotes anti-female harassment. In a pre-trial letter posted on the Wall Street Journal, they cite "intentional discrimination on the basis of his male sex by condoning a hostile educational environment due to knowingly permitting and apparently approving of Columbia student Emma Sulkowicz's and Defendant Columbia Professor Kessler's engaging in prolonged sexual harassment of Plaintiff Nungesser, with the consequence that Plaintiff Nungesser had been effectively denied equal access to Defendant Columbia's resources and opportunities."

They're using Title IX, the same law that activists use to push schools to be more responsive to accusers, to demand damages for Paul Nungesser. Specific sub-accusations include Columbia's allowing Sulkowicz to do her performance art project for campus credit, allowing her to graduate with honors, and allowing her to walk onstage with her mattress (which the school actually forbade her from doing but she did anyway):

'"Columbia Professor Jon Kessler and Emma Sulkowicz jointly designed her senior thesis "Carry That Weight" mattress project for which Emma Sulkowicz received Columbia University course credit and the public endorsement of Defendant Columbia Professor Kessler as showing how Defendant Columbia felt about the issue.""'

North Dakota should stop trying students in kangaroo courts

Mastodon · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A policy giving college students full legal counsel in disciplinary proceedings is a good first step, but it needs to go further.

We should stop trying serious crimes in campus disciplinary hearings, which have few protections for the accused and are run by people with scant experience in such proceedings.

Unfortunately, given the back story of how this shift in policy came to be, there may be little hope for additional progress.'

"A New Study Shows Just How Dangerous Masculinity Standards Really Are"

Mastodon · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Thanks to the feminist movement, society has devoted much thought, scholarship and attention to the ways female gender roles restrict women. But in recent years, a growing chorus is pointing to just how detrimental rigid masculinity standards can be too — not only for individual men, but other people in their lives. Now a new study confirms just that.

A University of Washington study recently published in Social Psychology found that men exaggerate stereotypical masculine traits and behaviors and reject feminine ones when their masculinity is threatened. When men received average scores on a strength test, the study revealed, they did not attempt to highlight their other "masculine" traits, such as height, number of romantic partners or athletic prowess. But when male participants were given falsely low results on the same strength test, they actually exaggerated these same qualities.'

"The Military Has a Man Problem"

Mastodon · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For generations now, the debate over women in combat has put the onus on women to prove they can handle the infantry and other traditionally all-male units. Yet today's wars have made it clear that the military's problem lies not with its women, their ability or their courage. The military's problem, instead, is with some of its men—and a deeply ingrained macho culture that denigrates, insults and abuses women.

"Oh, it's too rough for women," such men tend to say. Others complain, "Women would ruin our camaraderie" or "We'd be competing for women instead of looking out for ourselves." As retired Gen. Gordon R. Sullivan, a former Army chief of staff, wrote, lifting the combat ban against women would be "confusing" and "detrimental to units."

These attitudes reveal deeply patriarchal, condescending and creaky stereotypes about women, as if they are capable of being nothing more than soft, sexy objects of romance—or sexual prey.'

Don’t be stupid and pretend Title IX requires colleges to police off-campus conduct

Mastodon · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

The University of Kansas isn’t getting any love from its rival, in a legal fight that tests whether colleges must police the off-campus conduct of their students under Title IX anti-harassment policies.

As The College Fix previously reported, KU is defending the propriety of its expulsion of a student whose alleged harassment of his ex-girlfriend took place over the summer, off campus. The student also called his ex a “psycho bitch” on Twitter, though he blocked her from his feed.

KU pointed to the Department of Education’s Office for Civil Rights (OCR) “Dear Colleague” letter from 2011 as justification for its punishment of the student, as the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) notes.

Kansas State University filed a friend-of-the-court brief arguing against KU, pointing to Title IX language that bars discrimination “under any education program or activity” – meaning the school must have “substantial control” over the harasser and “the context in which the known harassment occurs.”'

Secretary of State Kerry refrains from condemning forced sex reassignment surgeries in Iran

Matt · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A report issued Thursday by the Department of State repeatedly refers to sex reassignment surgery in Iran as “gender-confirmation surgery.”

Speaking at the release of the State Department’s annual human rights report, Secretary of State John Kerry said of the designation that “There is nothing sanctimonious in this,” emphasizing the need for “humility” in the face of the U.S.’ own racial inequality. The State Department did not respond to a request for clarification by The Daily Caller News Foundation.

Iran has a well-documented record of coercing gay and lesbian people into having the gender reassignment surgery, that is, disrupting rather than “confirming” the gender identity of hundreds per year. Since homosexuality can be punishable by death in Iran, known homosexual men tend to accept the government-subsidized surgery to become women, and vice versa.'

Democrats gave away tickets to a Hillary Clinton speech due to lack of purchases

Matt · 27 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Sometimes fate does for you what you're not smart enough to do for yourself. In The Hildebeast's case, it's to keep her the hell out of the oval office. She'll be a lot happier anyway enjoying the last chapters of her life as a private citizen vs. POTUS. (Most people who hold that job either go gray from it, gray-er from it, or come close to dropping dead from the stress more than once, though those stories don't make it to the news desks of America.) She's so much better off not being in the WH, and so are we. Excerpt:

'The Democratic Party of Virginia was giving away free tickets to an event featuring Hillary Clinton on Friday night.

Clinton is headlining the party's annual Jefferson-Jackson dinner on Friday evening. Though the event is raising money for the Virginia Democrats rather than her presidential bid, it is considered an important campaign appearance for Clinton. The dinner is Clinton's first campaign stop in Virginia, a crucial swing state. It's also one of her first stops outside of the early primary states.

Tickets for the event are being sold for $30 and $125. However, on Friday afternoon, some Virginia Democrats received an email advertising "FREE TICKETS" to the dinner. The email was given to Business Insider by a source. It contained a promotional code to get $30 tickets to the event for free.

An operative for one of the Republican 2016 candidates joked that the ticket giveaway showed Clinton is having trouble generating enthusiasm.

"How bad is it out there for Hillary? She's gone from paid speeches to paying people to hear her speeches," the operative said, referencing the past controversy over Clinton's speaking fees.'

The Highly Intelligent, Creative, Self-Destructive White Male in Literature and Film

Mastodon · 28 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The common theme of these self-depreciating, intelligent, white males is something that can be looked at in multiple ways. It is often times represented because for thousands of years white males have had a lot of control over society, and while that is blatantly wrong, in some ways these characters are ingrained to feel like they have to prove themselves. On the one hand, they appear to be wasting their life and negatively impacting the ones around them, but on the other, they are striving for something that so few people ever reach: Becoming the best at any single thing in the world. While this may not send a good message, it does show how just how close the gap is from above average intelligence and creativity to pure genius.
...
Around 70 percent of all suicide victims in the United States are white males and it is no secret that high intelligence and creativity is a blessing and a burden, given that the more of each trait one possesses, the greater the chance of viewing the world and one's self in a negative light. The simple conclusion is that if they do not consistently reach their own personal goals set by their peak levels of intelligence and creativity they have deemed themselves a failure, and there is not much else to do besides sit back and watch them spiral downhill. While we are watching, we wonder why they abuse their bodies with alcohol and drugs, push people away, and flush their potential down the toilet. Unfortunately, the small percentage that have the penchant for this type of mindset often times are unable to stop falling down. However, sometimes they find a way out of that spiral, but only the ones with the most creativity and intelligence are capable of overcoming their greatest adversary: Themselves.'

Pursuit of gender equity [in high school sports] can go too far

Mastodon · 28 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Minnesota isn't the only state that's grappling with this issue. A high school boys tennis team in Pennsylvania was forced to forfeit five matches this spring when state officials learned that one of its doubles player was female. In New York and New Jersey, the past five years have been filled with debate (and some lawsuits) about rules that specifically prohibit girls from playing with boys in contact sports like football or hockey, while leaving the door open for them to fence, play tennis or run cross country on boys teams, provided that their schools don't have girls teams in those sports. (In New York, the rule cuts both ways — a boy can play field hockey or volleyball on a girls team.)

...

It would be easy to point out that Aney's presence sent one Century boy to the sidelines, but by all accounts, the Century boys team wanted Aney on the squad. They recruited her, and a senior team captain happily sacrificed his own playing time in order to see his team make it to state.

That's noble and entirely praiseworthy — but what will happen if and when a great female player bumps aside a boy who's been biding his time, practicing hard and waiting for his chance to play varsity tennis? He wouldn't have the option of trying out for the girls team the next fall.'

WHO Approves ShangRing, The New 'Minimum Bleeding' Circumcision Device

Mastodon · 28 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The World Health Organization (WHO) has approved the use of a new male circumcision device, named 'ShangRing.' Reportedly, the disposable device eliminates the need for sutures and involves minimal bleeding.

The device consists of two plastic rings. The rings lock over the foreskin of the male reproductive organ, without requiring suturing. The device is the first of its own kind to be pre-qualified by WHO. Pre-qualification means that the product meets the international standards in terms of safety.

ShangRing can be used for circumcision of boys aged between 13 and 17 years, in addition to the adults. It is believed that the pre-qualification of the device by WHO will ensure its easy accessibility in the regions most affected by HIV, including sub-Saharan Africa. Clinical research data show that circumcision can reduce the occurrence of HIV contraction among men through vaginal intercourse by almost 60 percent.
...
WHO is trying to fulfil its target of cicumsicing a minimum of 20.8 million males by the year 2016. The organization is hopeful that with the use of ShangRing, it will be able to achieve its target.'

New report highlights gender equity gap in high school sports

Mastodon · 28 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As the U.S. Women's World Cup soccer team prepares to take on China in the highly anticipated quarterfinal matchup today, there's renewed attention here at home on just how big the gaps are in high school when it comes to sports teams for girls and boys.

...

"When you are talking about a 10 percentage point gap ... the typical school would have to add 91 additional opportunities for girls" to bring the gap to zero, said Neena Chaudhry, the center's senior counsel and director of equal opportunities in athletics.

"We have not seen any schools that have 10 percentage point gaps that are in compliance with Title IX," Chaudhry said, adding that the courts have ruled that gaps as small as 3% are "not good enough."

The women's advocacy organization released its rankings this week on the 43rd anniversary of Title IX.

"I think it just shows how much work schools still have to do in terms of focusing on this issue, prioritizing girls' sports," said Chaudhry, who said it remains an issue not just from kindergarten through 12th grade but also in college and in professional sports, including the Women's World Cup.

...

While under federal law, colleges are required to reveal how many women and men are playing on sports teams and how much money is being spent on athletic programs, public high schools are not required to reveal that information. The National Women's Law Center is pushing for a federal bill that would change that, mandating that high schools across the country reveal data for their sports programs both by race and gender.'

Regulating Sex

Matt · 29 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'THIS is a strange moment for sex in America. We've detached it from pregnancy, matrimony and, in some circles, romance. At least, we no longer assume that intercourse signals the start of a relationship. But the more casual sex becomes, the more we demand that our institutions and government police the line between what's consensual and what isn't. And we wonder how to define rape. Is it a violent assault or a violation of personal autonomy? Is a person guilty of sexual misconduct if he fails to get a clear "yes" through every step of seduction and consummation?

According to the doctrine of affirmative consent — the "yes means yes" rule — the answer is, well, yes, he is. And though most people think of "yes means yes" as strictly for college students, it is actually poised to become the law of the land.

About a quarter of all states, and the District of Columbia, now say sex isn't legal without positive agreement, although some states undercut that standard by requiring proof of force or resistance as well.

Codes and laws calling for affirmative consent proceed from admirable impulses. (The phrase "yes means yes," by the way, represents a ratcheting-up of "no means no," the previous slogan of the anti-rape movement.) People should have as much right to control their sexuality as they do their body or possessions; just as you wouldn't take a precious object from someone's home without her permission, you shouldn't have sex with someone if he hasn't explicitly said he wants to.

And if one person can think he's hooking up while the other feels she's being raped, it makes sense to have a law that eliminates the possibility of misunderstanding. "You shouldn't be allowed to make the assumption that if you find someone lying on a bed, they're free for sexual pleasure," says Lynn Hecht Schafran, director of a judicial education program at Legal Momentum, a women's legal defense organization.

But criminal law is a very powerful instrument for reshaping sexual mores. Should we really put people in jail for not doing what most people aren't doing? (Or at least, not yet?) It's one thing to teach college students to talk frankly about sex and not to have it without demonstrable pre-coital assent. Colleges are entitled to uphold their own standards of comportment, even if enforcement of that behavior is spotty or indifferent to the rights of the accused. It's another thing to make sex a crime under conditions of poor communication.'

British Nobel Laureate Crucified for Sexism by Woman with Little Credibility

Mastodon · 29 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A British Nobel laureate, Sir Tim Hunt, 72, who won the Nobel Prize for his work on cell division, was forced out of honorary positions at University College London (UCL), the Royal Society, and the European Research Council (ERC) after a British academic named Connie St Louis, whose credibility is itself under fire, reported Hunt making sexist remarks in Seoul, South Korea.

The Daily Mail reported that Hunt was speaking to roughly a group of 100 science journalists, comprised primarily of women, when he said, according to Hunt, “Let me tell you about my trouble with girls. Three things happen when they are in the lab. You fall in love with them, they fall in love with you, and when you criticize them, they cry.”

St Louis posted the quote on Twitter, prompting a world-wide barrage of invective targeting Hunt and also provoking the subsequent actions by the academic societies. Hunt, who called Hunt a “sexist speaker,” said Hunt boasted that he was a “male chauvinist.” She said Hunt stated that single-sex labs were better than mixed ones, while saying of Hunt, “Really, does this Nobel laureate think we are still in Victorian times?”

Hunt, returning from Seoul, could only defend himself by voicemail to Radio 4’s Today program, offering an apology for the “very stupid” comment, adding that he was “really, really sorry” to have “caused offence.” His wife, Professor Mary Collins, also a well-known scientist, said that Hunt became depressed, recalling, “‘Tim sat on the sofa and started crying. Then I started crying. We just held on to each other.”

But then a backlash from famous scientists roared back, led by eight other Nobel Prize winners and some female academics. Sir Andre Geim, the 2010 Nobel Prize winner in Physics who developed graphene, the world’s thinnest material, which may utterly change the world, said Hunt was being “crucified” by ideological fanatics. Some of the scientists surmised Hunt had been joking. All of the scientists told the UCL, the Royal Society and the ERC to reinstate him.'

Japan: "The Lonely End"

Mastodon · 29 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Three months ago in an apartment on the outskirts of Osaka, Japan, Haruki Watanabe died alone. For weeks his body slowly decomposed, slouched in its own fluids and surrounded by fetid, fortnight-old food. He died of self-neglect, solitude, and a suspected heart problem. At 60, Watanabe, wasn't old, nor was he especially poor. He had no friends, no job, no wife, and no concerned children. His son hadn't spoken to him in years, nor did he want to again.
...
Watanabe was, at 60 years old, the average age of most male victims, and having suffered from a heart problem, he died in the manner most common to kodokushi.

"Around 90 percent of the cases I deal with are men," Koremura says. "Unlike women, men seem incapable of integrating themselves into a community when they live alone."

Watanabe was a child of the "boom years" and of the "Japanese dream," and it is therefore probable that his death was linked to the faltering economy. In Japan, the identity of many businessmen, or "salarymen" as they are commonly known, is fused with that of their business. During the boom years many of these workers sacrificed family and friends for the growth of their companies. However, when the Japanese economy eventually crashed in the early '90s, many of these salarymen lost their jobs or were forced into smaller, less prestigious roles with less social security. Having lost their status they found they had no purpose in life. Scott North argues that "the fact that most deaths are between 60 and 64 [years old] supports the idea that separation from the workplace community and inability to adapt to retirement may contribute to isolated deaths."'

"The Insecure American Male, and College Rape"

Mastodon · 29 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There is a strain of American male whose life is shaped by chronic insecurity. This strain's considerable numbers and pronounced behavior patterns make the phenomenon obvious -- yet largely invisible.

This male's symptomatic behavior is now so common, giving the impression of being the norm, that he is largely invisible, but with a little perspective his oddness becomes apparent. The macho culture of adolescent posturing and compulsive self-affirmation is everywhere: in ads; in the adulation of celebrities; in the stern cross-armed stance of TV anchors; in the alcohol fetish; in the unquenchable thirst for voyeuristic violence; and, of course, in the theatrical cocksure approach to women.

This last is rooted in nature and evident in all cultures -- in various modes, to varying degrees. It stems in part from the rivalry for mates; it also expresses the sublimated truth that many men often are intimidated and overwhelmed by the female persona when it is not reduced to basic eroticism. Maturity involves reconciling all these elements.'

Medical team caught insulting man during procedure, revealing their misandry in process

Mastodon · 29 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Sitting in his surgical gown inside a large medical suite in Reston, Va., a Vienna man prepared for his colonoscopy by pressing record on his smartphone, to capture the instructions his doctor would give him after the procedure.

But as soon as he pressed play on his way home, he was shocked out of his anesthesia-induced stupor: He found that he had recorded the entire examination and that the surgical team had mocked and insulted him as soon as he drifted off to sleep.

In addition to their vicious commentary, the doctors discussed avoiding the man after the colonoscopy, instructing an assistant to lie to him, and then placed a false diagnosis on his chart.

“After five minutes of talking to you in pre-op,” the anesthesiologist told the sedated patient, “I wanted to punch you in the face and man you up a little bit,” she was recorded saying.

When a medical assistant noted the man had a rash, the anesthesiologist warned her not to touch it, saying she might get “some syphilis on your arm or something,” then added, “It’s probably tuberculosis in the penis, so you’ll be all right.”
...
There was much more. So the man sued the two doctors and their practices for defamation and medical malpractice and, last week, after a three-day trial, a Fairfax County jury ordered the anesthesiologist and her practice to pay him $500,000.'

Complaining About Manspreading Is Just as Bad as Fat Shaming

Mastodon · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Alright, we've got our two buzzwords to play with; consider "fat shaming" with the following scenario: There is a larger bodied person boarding public transport, say a bus. This person is wider than the pre-molded seats. This person sits down and takes up the two-person row.

In one current Internet narrative, this person is doing nothing wrong, but merely taking up the space their body requires. You're a jerk if you then get on the bus and find annoyance that the fat person is taking up more than one seat and you have to stand. To shame this person with mean words or glares or a passive-aggressive Facebook post would be to remove their bodily autonomy. Let's please agree on this, okay?

To insist a fat person stand so two thin people might sit is wrong and rude. To suggest that the fat person's body is at fault is appalling, and some might even claim it is discrimination.

And yet, if it was the same bus, with a passenger that is not obese but male-presenting, suddenly it's fine to shame him online, to take his photo without permission, and even to come into nonconsensual, unprovoked physically contact with him.'

Forget chauvinism: It’s good to be a woman in business

Mastodon · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'ALMOST every week, another story portrays the City as a bastion of chauvinism, where women are underpaid and undervalued, dominated by macho males and discriminated against.

In almost 20 years, I have never seen this happen. I have never been overlooked for a job, promotion or pay rise because I was a woman. My salary was the same as my male colleagues’ – and sometimes higher – and the “ceilings” I came up against were perfectly tangible and mostly to do with poor performance or lack of skills.

I actually find that being a woman in business is an advantage. You are different and have more chances of being noticed. In a room full of men in grey suits, a woman commands attention. Vigdís Finnbogadóttir, former President of Iceland and the world’s first democratically elected female head of state, wore a striking blue dress to her inauguration because it allowed her “to stand out from the men”. When I was 26, my photo appeared on the front page of The New York Times because I was the only woman in an article about young professionals in Russia.

Then there is positive discrimination, which is as ripe in the City as sexism. A decade or so ago, when I was applying for a job at what is widely considered the world’s best investment bank, the MD told me (after a few drinks) that, other things being equal, the bank would hire a woman over a man. A staggeringly incompetent partner at one of my old firms held on to her job for over 20 years, surviving recessions and redundancies. No-one knows why she is still there, and the only explanation is that she is a woman.'

UK: Boys left behind girls at school from just age five

Mastodon · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Boys lag behind girls at school from an early age, according to a new study.

The gender gap can be detected as early as age five, when small children attend Reception year at school.

Researchers found that 42pc of boys from a poor background started school with a language level that is considered below the basic standard. In comparison, only 27pc of girls from a similar background exhibited poor communication.

And while children from weathlier households had a better language skills when they started school, the gender divide was still in evidence, with a quarter of boys displaying inadequate speech skills versus just 15pc of girls.'

Harping On: The Hypocrisy and Lies of Twitter's Most Notorious 'Anti-Abuse' Activist, Randi Harper, Part 1

Mastodon · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Set yourself on fire."

"You've made your bed, now get fucked in it."

"Fuck your feelings."

To most, these will sound like the words of an online troll, or at the very least someone with what in the 1990s we used to call "anger management issues." And that's probably an accurate assessment.

Yet these are not occasional, one-off outbursts, but rather part of a pattern of behaviour from perhaps the most darkly fascinating person currently causing grief on social media. They are the words ofRandi Harper, an activist who runs a charity set up to prevent online abuse. Yes, you read that correctly.

This is the story, in three parts, of how Harper rose to prominence, how she has gotten away with such outrageous behaviour for so long while maintaining friendships with influential media commentators, activists, and journalists, and how she treats those who disagree with her far-left, hardline feminist politics.

It is the product of dozens of interviews with friends, former colleagues, and objects of Harper's vindictive social media crusades. Almost all of them refused to speak on the record for fear of reprisals from Harper and her band of social media supporters.

...

Our interviews reveal a deeply troubled, hateful, and damaged human being in desperate need of help. They also expose just how tolerant to hatefulness the authoritarian left-wing establishment in America has become, provided the abuser in question has the right sort of opinions.

"Randi Harper is probably the person doing the most harm to the cause of feminism on the internet today," a well-known progressive journalist confided last week, on condition of anonymity. "Ordinarily we could dismiss her as a mess. But she has become a damaging force."'

Ms. Harper's web site: http://onlineabuseprevention.org/. Google her name to learn more about her postings.

"Science Finds Yet Another Reason Men Need Feminism"

Mastodon · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On the one hand, it's funny to think that a man who's worried he's considered weak would overcompensate by going on a power tool shopping spree at Home Depot, even if he really wants a sweater from Banana Republic that day. On the other hand, it makes you sad for the guys out there who might be feeling pressure to conform to an outdated societal norm of what it means to be a man.

For now, what we do know is that redefining masculinity and making it a more inclusive construct can only be a good thing for the men whose egos get deflated when they don't measure up and the people who have to interact with them when that happens (and Banana Republic, apparently).'

Brazil's "That's sexist!" president strikes again

Matt · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Interview here. Remember: Criticism = SEXISM, so be forewarned! And I'm sure all those cute men working for her appreciate the compliment. Excerpt:

' People say that you are a micromanager. But they also say that since the last election, you have changed and decided to empower people like your finance minister and your vice president, Michel Temer — to enable Temer to negotiate with Congress.

Have you ever heard someone say that a male president puts his finger on everything? I've never heard that.

So you think that is a sexist comment?

I believe there is a bit of a sexual bias or a gender bias. I am described as a hard and strong woman who puts her nose in everything she's not supposed to, and I am [said to be] surrounded by very cute men.'

Malecare releases survey on prostate experience

Matt · 30 June 2015 · Archived copy · Original

My Prostate Cancer Experience is a new survey, helping us understand how prostate cancer treatment affects day to day living. The Prostate Cancer Experience encompasses all of the prostate cancer treatments that you may have chosen, from watchful waiting/active surveillance to those for advanced stage disease.

My Prostate Cancer Experience is a collaboration between the USA based prostate cancer support group network, Malecare and the Prostate Cancer Foundation of Australia. The results will be available on many prostate cancer focused websites in the Fall of 2015.

My Prostate Cancer Experience takes less than nine minutes to complete, is anonymous, and is open to all men diagnosed with prostate cancer, at any stage, using any treatment, from all countries.

Only you know what you are experiencing ... spend a few minutes helping us guys understand what prostate cancer treatment is all about. We'll all be glad you did.

You can contact me directly if you have any questions or comments.

Best regards,

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
darrylm@malecare.org

Wish I was this "oppressed"

Matt · 1 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Read A college balks at Hillary Clinton's fee, books Chelsea for $65,000 instead and ask yourself if you'd mind being as oppressed as Chelsea and Hillary (or Gloria Steinem too, for that matter). Excerpt:

'When the University of Missouri at Kansas City was looking for a celebrity speaker to headline its gala luncheon marking the opening of a women's hall of fame, one of the names that came to mind was Hillary Rodham Clinton.

But when the former secretary of state's representatives quoted a fee of $275,000, officials at the public university balked. "Yikes!" one e-mailed another.

So the school booked the next best option: her daughter, Chelsea.

The university paid $65,000 for Chelsea Clinton's brief appearance Feb. 24, 2014, a demonstration of the celebrity appeal and marketability that the former and possibly second-time first daughter employs on behalf of her mother's presidential campaign and family's global charitable empire.
...
So the university turned back to others, eventually choosing Chelsea Clinton when the agency indicated she was willing. Just shy of her 34th birthday, Clinton commanded a higher fee than other prominent women speakers who were considered, including feminist icon Gloria Steinem ($30,000) and journalists Cokie Roberts ($40,000), Tina Brown ($50,000) and Lesley Stahl ($50,000), the records show.
...
"As my mother has observed, equal rights for women and girls remains the unfinished business of the 21st century," she said, according to a university account of her remarks. "We will only complete this business if we are equally committed and we highlight the role models we are already blessed to have."'

Outsourced Campus Judges

Mastodon · 1 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Campus hearings, even when they're regarding an activity as serious as sexual assault, are not courtrooms.

It's a distinction that the U.S. Department of Education has embraced, requiring colleges to conduct their own investigations into claims of sexual assault, and to adjudicate those cases under Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. Colleges use "preponderance of evidence" instead of "beyond reasonable doubt" as the standard of proof. If a student is found in violation of campus rules, he or she is "responsible" for the misconduct, not "guilty" of a crime. The potential punishments are writing assignments, suspension or expulsion -- not prison.
...
Colleges that opt to use outside adjudicators, Lake said, don't often advertise that fact, so it's difficult to get a read on how common the practice currently is.

Brett Sokolow, president and CEO of the National Center for Higher Education Risk Management, said he couldn't comment on which colleges use outside adjudicators, but noted that a few of NCHERM's clients do use judges now. It's not a system he recommends, though.

"I am hearing about it more," Sokolow said. "Generally I don't think judges are a good idea, as it makes the process more legalistic and held to higher standards in terms of later legal challenges."'

Problems with campus sexual assault bill

Mastodon · 1 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Senator Claire McCaskill (D-Missouri) says having college administrators use a "preponderance of evidence" as a standard for dealing with someone accused of rape or sexual abuse is an expedient way of expelling someone they believe is guilty.

But Joseph Cohn, legislative and policy director for the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, believes that's irresponsible.

"It provides tremendous resources to student complainants in the form of confidential advisors, but no resources whatsoever are provided to accused students – and that gives complainants a leg up in the process," he explains.

Cohn says these investigations wouldn't consist of witnesses testifying under oath, and there would be no discovery and no forensic evidence would be presented.

"... It's not that the preponderance of the evidence can never be fair," he continues, "but on campuses that don't include any of those other protections, reducing the burden of truth to the preponderance of evidence is very problematic."'

Laura Kipnis On How Campus Feminism Infantilizes Women

Mastodon · 1 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Excerpt:

'"What now gets labeled feminism on [college] campuses," says Northwestern University Professor Laura Kipnis, "has to do with dialing back a lot the progress women have made establishing ourselves as consenting adults."

That was the main argument of an essay Kipnis published this past February in The Chronicle of Higher Education, titled, "Sexual Paranoia Strikes Academe." After the article appeared, the Northwestern campus erupted in protest. Students demonstrated by carrying mattresses and pillows and wrote a public letter accusing Kipnis of "[spitting] in the face of survivors of rape and sexual assault everywhere."'

Uproar over FDNY activist's 'white boy privilege' rant

Mastodon · 1 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'The leader of the city's female firefighters has sparked outrage for blasting "white boys" and "white privilege."

Sarinya Srisakul, president of United Women's Firefighters, is taking heat from fellow Bravest after some found her online comments.

They read:

"'These white boys crying and complaining over this because their white privilege is being messed with. Trying living a life being racially profiled!!!!'"

Critics say Srisakul violated the FDNY's social-media policy when she posted the comments in November. The policy bars statements that bring the department into disrepute, but some firefighters say Srisakul gets away with it because she is "politically correct."

Srisakul, who failed the Fire Academy twice before graduating after a third try, has been outspoken about the FDNY's hiring criteria, calling some requirements unfair to women.

Srisakul could not be reached for comment. An FDNY spokesman said the posting is "under review."'

Guard-inmate sex: flipping the sexes, but the outcome is the same

ThomasI · 2 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. When male guards have sex with female prisoners, the men are evil and the women are victims. When female guards have sex with male prisoners, the men are still evil and the women are still victims. Welcome to third wave feminism: men bad, women victims with no agency. Excerpt:

'As allegations emerged about the potential relationship between two escaped convicted felons and a prison employee, one former female corrections officer is providing an insider perspective on forbidden love behind bars.

According to Robin Kay Miller, 53, a corrections officer for nearly 20 years until she retired in 2005, sex between officers and inmates has always been an issue in prison. Miller is writing a book about her experience working in the prison system.

“Inmates are con artists,” she said. “They know how to play the game and they know how to manipulate.”'

Wimbledon 2015: Heat break rule for women sparks sexism row

Mastodon · 2 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Female tennis players at Wimbledon are being allowed to take a 10-minute heat break while men must play on, as a quirk in the rules raises concerns of sexism in the sport.

The Wimbledon Championships are incorporating the rule which means that, if temperatures exceed 30.1C, a heat stress index will be taken and female players can request a short break between the second and third sets of matches.

However, there is no comparable rule in the men's game, which is run by a separate governing body to the women's sport.
...
British men's No 1 Andy Murray previously complained about the heat rule at the 2014 Australian Open, when sweltering temperatures of 42C caused one player to vomit and a ball boy to collapse. At the time, Murray said: "I don't know why there are different rules. If there's a medical reason for it, then I'm fine with it. If there isn't, I'm not."

In a statement, Wimbledon referee Andrew Jarret said that only one player need request the break for the rule to be implemented and that the rule applies only to ladies' and girls' singles matches.'

NPO: Can Fathers Sue Courts Under ‘Disparate Impact’ Theory?

Matt · 3 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Will last week’s ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court permitting same-gender couples to marry have any impact on the movement for equal parenting following divorce? It’s a question many people asked immediately after the opinion was announced.

My guess is that it will have no direct impact. The right of same-gender couples to marry has little legal relation to the importance to children of keeping both parents in their lives when the parents split up. The value of both parents is addressed to the “best interests of the child” standard that’s already found in Supreme Court precedent. As I see it, constitutional law is already where it needs to be as regards parental rights. What needs to change is factual - the awareness of state legislatures that children do best with both parents involved in their lives, an arrangement family courts need to stop obstructing.

But another, far less heralded opinion was issued by the Court holding, as it has in previous cases, that state action that creates a disparate impact on the basis of a suspect category like race, creates a cause of action under federal civil rights laws (Wall Street Journal, 6/25/15). That is, a plaintiff seeking to sue need not produce evidence of an intention on the part of the defendant to discriminate. Here’s how this article described the case in question: ...'

Women Against Paternity Fraud debuts PSA

Matt · 4 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

PSA video here. Summary:

'Women Against Paternity Fraud is a non-profit organization that educates the public, media, and policy makers on issues relating to paternity fraud. To learn more information and to be become a member: http://www.womenagainstpaternityfraud.org'

The Future of Sex is Terrifying

Matt · 4 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The American Law Institute (ALI)—a respected body of professors, judges, and lawyers that draft model laws oft adopted in whole by state and federal government—has spent the past three years deliberating over sexual assault statutes (an area it hadn't revisited since 1962). A draft of the group's recommendations, released in May, endorsed "the position that an affirmative expression of consent, either by words or conduct, is always an appropriate prerequisite to sexual intercourse, and that the failure to obtain such consent should be punishable under" criminal law.

...

To this aim, ALI proposes establishing the new crime of sexual intercourse without consent, a misdemeanor, which takes place when a person "knowingly or recklessly has, or enables another person to have, sexual intercourse with a person who at the time of the act of sexual intercourse has not given consent to that act." (This is, of course, absent any sort of force, coercion, or indication the victim protested/resisted, which would remain felonies.) It would also expand the definition of criminal sexual contact to include any unconsented to contact with any body part if the perpetrator intended the touch amorously or lustfully.

...

"[T]he appropriate default position clearly is to err in the direction of protecting individuals against unwanted sexual imposition. ... Of course, a legal standard requiring the affirmative expression of consent to sex will—inevitably—entail many false negatives, in the form of findings of unwillingness when in fact passionate desire was present. But the contrary standard now prevalent in American law will—just as inevitably—entail many false positives, assumptions of willingness and subsequent sexual intrusion when such intimacy was entirely unwanted. Section 213.2(2) reflects the judgment that the harms that arise under the latter standard present far greater reason for concern."

...

"As with other areas of criminal law," caution the dissenting ALI members, "expanding the statutes in the ways set forth in the draft would fall particularly hard on individuals of color who are represented disproportionately at each stage of the criminal justice system." American law enforcement "has an unfortunate history of excessive punishment in the name of protecting women especially when issues of race are present."

People who want to solve social problems by reflexively invoking the power of state justice often overlook exactly whom and what systems will be enacting this justice, and how they've historically operated. It's not going to be pretty, or just, to turn virtually everyone into potentially prosecutable sex criminals.'

Here’s One Rape Culture The Media Wishes Were Fake

Matt · 4 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Trump's mistake was his over-generalization, maybe coming from the sound-bite timeframes in which political messages get delivered these days. Had he been more precise in his accusations, he'd probably have less business-related fallout right now. Excerpt:

'Whenever The Donald is invited to defend his views for the umpteenth time, the questioning usually veers to the rape angle, as it did when Trump was interviewed by CNN’s Don Lemon Wednesday night. During the interview, the presidential hopeful brought up a Fusion article that reported that 80 percent of women coming into the U.S. illegally are sexually assaulted.

Lemon — sensing a delightful bit of schadenfreude within his grasp — pointed out that the article referred to migrants being raped, not the other way around. Unfazed, Trump responded, “Who’s doing the raping?”
...
But the answer to who’s raping these young women doesn’t appear to be a major concern. Mediaite added as an afterthought, quoting from the original Fusion piece, that “perpetrators can be coyotes, other migrants, bandits, or even government authorities.”

WaPo didn’t even bother to answer the question.

This lack of an answer reflects how so many members of the media treat this awful rape epidemic. They find out that eight in ten female illegal immigrants are raped and all they want to do is mock Trump — the mere messenger of the statistic.

It’s a far cry from how mainstream outlets treat college sexual assault. When it comes to campus rape, these same reporters deploy the old one in five trope ad nauseam to claim that it is a very serious problem. Pundits and commentators then place the blame on fraternities for fomenting a rape culture on campus and harboring predators in their midst.'

Canadian Libertarians in Revolt After Party Leadership Suspends Anti-Feminist Candidate Lauren Southern

Mastodon · 4 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Libertarian Party of Canada is in turmoil following the bizarre suspension of Lauren Southern, one of the party's most visible and popular candidates, at the behest of a small group of aggrieved feminist activists.

Members and candidates are now in open revolt amid concerns that the party has been co-opted by a small group of left-wing culture warriors whose socially authoritarian agendas are alien to the majority of libertarians and toxic to the general public.

Southern, a libertarian activist and commentator for The Rebel Media, rose to global prominence last month when a video emerged of her challenging feminist campaigners at a "Slutwalk" demonstration in Vancouver.'

UK: 'Victim' who made false rape claim spared jail

Mastodon · 4 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A WOMAN who sparked a police investigation when she falsely claimed she had been raped on a train was given a community payback order yesterday.

Karen Farmer, 35, told officers that a man had sexually assaulted her when she was travelling from Glasgow to Blantyre.

But the court heard that she had consented to having sex with the man with whom she had been on a date in the hours leading up to the journey. She made the rape claim after he ran off and left her when the train reached its destination.'

Gender Inequality Mutilates the Bodies and Spirits of Boys

mens_issues · 4 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A well written article by Laurie A. Couture, here. Excerpt:

'Our society has been silent, apathetic and cruel for too long about how our boys are treated, ignored and harmed. As a mental health professional who has worked with youth and families for close to two decades, I am on the front lines watching the spirits, minds and hearts of youth weep, tremble and rage with pain from schools, families and a society disconnected from their needs. However, while girls are embraced with incessant cultural messages of empowerment, “girl power” and support, boys must face a constant barrage of shaming, pathologizing, mockery and punishment for their maleness. Their needs, pain and suffering are simply denied existence. Not only is this pathologizing and shunning of boys happening in the media, it is happening in the fields of education, mental health, human services, the law and in the global social justice efforts that shape the world’s perceptions of gender.
...
Like their sisters in our society, all boys should be able to experience such a loving “embrace” of awareness, validation, support and empowerment for what they endure, especially when their very natural behavioral and emotional clues indicate to us a problem. However, far too many raging, aggressive, hyperactive and violent boys are labeled as “behavioral problems” rather than as victims of abuse or neglect. The pathology is not the behavioral and emotional reactions of boys; the pathology is our society and how its views and treats boys and maleness. Where are the advocates for boys?'

Scholar Takes On ‘The Authoritarian Juggernaut’ Of Campus Feminism

Mastodon · 5 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Countering feminist misinformation with facts has landed Christina Hoff Sommers, an avowed feminist and avid number cruncher at the American Enterprise Institute, into a cauldron on American college campuses and into a new alliance with gamers.

Over the last two years when a swarm of gender studies feminists attacked gaming as sexist, racist and offensive based on their social justice narratives, the incensed gamers pushed back against the authoritarian leftists and found an ally in Sommers, a scholar and author who calls on feminism to be grounded in reality and truth. Looking at the games and the research, she decreed the gamers falsely accused. They called her “Based Mom.”'

University of Minnesota to adopt 'affirmative consent' rule for sex partners

Mastodon · 5 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Minnesota is joining a national movement requiring students to obtain “affirmative consent” from their sex partners or risk being disciplined for sexual assault.

The policy change, sometimes known as the “yes means yes” rule, has been sweeping college campuses across the country since California passed the first such law last year.

The U’s new rule, which is poised to take effect this month after a 30-day comment period, says that sex is OK only if both parties express consent through “clear and unambiguous words or actions.” Absent that, it would fit the U’s -definition of sexual assault.

So far, the plan has prompted little dissent at the U. But nationally, critics have derided such policies as absurd and dangerous, particularly when it comes to protecting the rights of the accused.

“Once that accusation has been made, it’s somehow up to the accused person to prove they did have consent,” said Robert Shibley, executive director of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), a civil liberties group in Philadelphia. “What that means is that they’re guilty until proven innocent.”'

Why affirmative consent laws are bad for women

Mastodon · 5 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"Researchers investigating why women do not generally ask men out on dates discovered that ‘a great majority of the women, 93%, preferred to be asked out -- only 6% preferred to do the asking. The majority of men preferred to do the asking, 83%, while 16% preferred to be asked out on a date’, confirming that when it comes to making the first move, both women and men prefer men in the driver’s seat. Some feminist commentators describe this almost universal preference as ‘sexual aggression’ on the part of men, ascribing specious motives to a social preference shared by men and women alike.

New affirmative consent laws have the potential to turn much of this preferred behavior into sexual assault, retroactively, and given that men are expected to initiate expressions of sexual interest, the laws will initially be used to reclassify expected behaviours from men as criminal, depending on how women feel about those actions at a later date. Using the example of holding hands, critics of the law point out that much of what is now considered normal human interactions will fall under criminal assault if the new laws are effected. In a dissenting memo, ‘readers have been asked to consider the following scenario: "Person A and Person B are on a date and walking down the street. Person A, feeling romantically and sexually attracted, timidly reaches out to hold B’s hand and feels a thrill as their hands touch. Person B does nothing, but six months later files a criminal complaint. Person A is guilty of Criminal Sexual Contact' under proposed Section 213.6(3)(a).’
...
Women are ill-equipped to implement affirmative consent laws in their personal lives, and there is little cultural expectation that they do so, but legal standards will apply to them, regardless. Men prosecuted under college affirmative consent laws have increasingly been fighting back and suing colleges that sanctioned them for alleged sexual assault. Colleges generally require a ‘preponderance of evidence’ standard rather than the more rigorous ‘beyond a reasonable doubt’ standard, making colleges vulnerable to large financial settlements to men wrongly accused and punished for sexual assault, once the accused bring their cases to the formal legal system. Even when men arefound innocent of all charges under the lower standards, colleges are still permitting them to be harassed and accused of rape and sexual assault.

Men’s willingness to sue colleges for mishandling sexual assault accusations suggests that affirmative consent laws, deployed against men in the general public, will trigger a similar backlash. Men will invariably begin to charge women with criminal sexual offences, and women, accustomed to being asked for consent, but not asking for consent, stand to face a much higher conviction rate than men. Affirmative consent laws turn mutually preferred social customs into criminal activity, and it is women who are likely to face the higher conviction rates."

Study: Bisexual men at greater risk for psychosocial problems, HIV

Matt · 5 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An American study involving nearly 7,000 men drew some jarring conclusions about bisexual males' psychological and sexual health.

According to the study, men who have had sex with both men and women are "disproportionately impacted by psychosocial vulnerabilities," are more likely to report depression, suicidality, incarceration and substance use.

The study also backed the notion that the bisexual community faces a greater risk of HIV, the virus that can lead to AIDS. Its authors called MSMW -- or men who have sex with men, who have also had female partners -- a "priority population for HIV risk reduction."
...
Given the other sexual tendencies they discovered among bisexual men, it may be a challenge. Looking at both lifetime sexual history and sexual activity from the past year, the study found that bisexual men in relationships with women had a greater chance of unprotected sex, sex in exchange for resources and sexually transmitted infection (STI).'

Teenager’s Jailing Brings a Call to Fix Sex Offender Registries

Matt · 5 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'That sexual encounter has landed Mr. Anderson in a Michigan jail, and he now faces a lifetime entanglement in the legal system. The girl, who by her own account told Mr. Anderson that she was 17 — a year over the age of consent in Michigan — was actually 14.

...

As an Indiana resident, Mr. Anderson will most likely be listed on a sex offender registry for life, a sanction that requires him to be in regular contact with the authorities, to allow searches of his home every 90 days and to live far from schools, parks and other public places. His probation will also require him to stay off the Internet, though he needs it to study computer science.

Some advocates and legal authorities are holding up Mr. Anderson’s case as the latest example of the overreach of sex offender registries, which gained favor in the 1990s as a tool for monitoring pedophiles and other people who committed sexual crimes. In the decades since, the registries have grown in number and scope; the nearly 800,000 people on registries in the United States go beyond adults who have sexually assaulted other adults or minors. Also listed are people found guilty of lesser offenses that run the gamut from urinating publicly to swapping lewd texts.'

Megyn Kelly freaks out over NY affirmative consent law: What about men's rights?

Mastodon · 8 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The implementation of an affirmative consent law in New York state had Fox News host Megyn Kelly concerned on Tuesday, as she fretted that men are presumed guilty too often in college sexual assault cases.

"It is important to improve the rights of women who are victims of sexual assault on college campuses," she told colleague Brit Hume. "But we are going in a direction where we almost entirely eliminate the rights of men. And there's a presumption now in these campuses, thanks to the Obama administration, of guilt. There's a presumption of non-consent. And if you are a young man who gets accused, it's your burden to go in there and prove consent, and we're getting to the point where you have to have a contract. And if you don't, you're gonna be presumed a rapist."
...
For his part, Hume argued that advocates for affirmative consent "have never had any sex," and described laws like the one in New York part of the "re-regulation of sex," a change from the social mores during his own college days, when universities had strict rules regarding mingling between men and women.
...
The sexual revolution, Hume argued, was the precursor to what he called today's "hook-up culture."
...
"It was the culmination of the de-regulation of sex," Hume responded. "Now what we're seeing is, because people particularly don't like some of the results of that, they're trying to re-regulate it, and that's where we are."'

Sexual Consent Contracts Are Now A Real Thing You Can Buy

Mastodon · 8 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Sexual consent contracts," once the stuff of parodies, are now a real product that activists are selling online for the purposes of promoting "sexual respect."

The "Consent Conscious Kit" is being sold online by the Affirmative Consent Project at the website InstantConsent.com. For only $1.99, one can get a small bag (available in both faux-suede and canvass varieties!) filled with a condom, a pen, some breath mints, and this simple contract:

[Graphic]

The contract recommends that potential lovers take a picture of themselves holding the contract, or else use the pen to fill out the back, which reads "On this date, [blank], we agree to have consensual sex with one another." There are then lines for two people to both print and sign their names (the contract is apparently no good for threesomes or orgies).'

Is It Rape to Hold Someone's Hand Without Explicit Consent?

Mastodon · 8 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I suggest they call it the Princess & the Pea Code. (Or Princess and the Penal Code?) The group seems to be on the verge of endorsing the idea that every step in any encounter that could conceivably lead to sex must be explicitly agreed to by both parties. Let's first state that obviously, no one wants anyone raped, ever. Duh. But how far back in any encounter should we start regulating and punishing? And how fragile do we take our species for, when we state that any unwanted anything, even the grasp of a hand, is too much to bear and requires legal intervention? Shulevitz writes:

"In a memo that has now been signed by about 70 institute members and advisers, including Judge Gertner, readers have been asked to consider the following scenario: "Person A and Person B are on a date and walking down the street. Person A, feeling romantically and sexually attracted, timidly reaches out to hold B's hand and feels a thrill as their hands touch. Person B does nothing, but six months later files a criminal complaint. Person A is guilty of 'Criminal Sexual Contact' under proposed Section 213.6(3)(a)."'

DNA clears man in rapes; accuser arrested

Mastodon · 8 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'DNA evidence has cleared a man in two rapes in Norcross, and a woman who accused the same man of rape in Brookhaven has been arrested and charged with providing false statements, police said Tuesday.

Anamirna Cabello-Loeza, 31, surrendered July 1 and was jailed after detectives determined statements she provided in connection with the case “were not truthful,” Brookhaven police Officer Carlos Nino said in an emailed statement.'

Due process for campus sexual assault is not a left/right issue

Mastodon · 9 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sexual assault is a serious issue that should be dealt with seriously. But the proposed solution for this problem on college campuses creates an entirely new problem. It eviscerates due process for accused students in the name of helping accusers.

The fight over campus sexual assault and due process has somehow devolved into a Republican vs. Democrat issue. The most vocal supporters of draconian sexual assault policies are Democrats like Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York and Claire McCaskill of Missouri. There are several prominent Republicans on a Senate bill to curb sexual assault, but none have made a name for themselves as a proponent.'

Hundreds sign online petition seeking 'affirmative consent' policy at university

Mastodon · 9 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Student leaders have started an online petition urging the University of Minnesota to implement a new sexual-assault policy without delay.

The petition, on Change.org, has drawn more than 800 signatures in the hours since Wednesday's decision by President Eric Kaler to postpone the so-called "affirmative consent" rule until September because of concerns raised by members of the Board of Regents.

The rule, which is similar to those surfacing on college campuses throughout the country, would create a new definition of sexual assault at the U. It states that students could face disciplinary action, including expulsion, for sexual encounters unless both participants express consent through "clear and unambigous words and actions."

On Wednesday, Regent Michael Hsu asked for the delay after news reports about the policy, which critics have denounced as unrealistic and unfair, particularly when it comes to protecting the rights of the accused.'

EU accused of telling families 'who should do the dishes'

Mastodon · 9 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"Men should be encouraged take on at least half of all domestic chores as part of a European-wide 'strategy for equality', according to a group of Euro MPs.

A European Parliament committee has called for a Brussels-backed campaign to promote an 'equal division of domestic work'.

The Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality said men needed to be pressured into doing more around the house to take the 'unequal division of family responsibilities'."

A Father's Struggle to Stop His Daughter's Adoption

Kris · 9 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Emanuel's girlfriend repeatedly promised him that she would never put their child up for adoption. But he couldn't erase the possibility from his mind. So he posed the question to her, "If you ever had to give your baby up for adoption, you're going to give it to me, right?" She said she would, but insisted that she had no plans to give the baby away. He says they made plans for her to move in with him permanently at the end of the year.
...
After the encounter, Thomason started researching paternity rights on her own. That's when she learned about the South Carolina Responsible Father Registry, which, according to the state's Department of Social Services, "gives a man who has fathered a child with a woman he is not married to the right to be notified when an adoption or a termination of parental rights action occurs." Without the registry, his girlfriend could put the baby up for adoption without telling Emanuel about it. Registering with the state wouldn't guarantee him custody of Skylar, but at least he'd be notified and have a say in court.
...
In the end, this omission was all that mattered. The majority pointed out that the registry had been designed specifically for cases like Lehr's: to allow biological fathers to "demonstrate [their] intent to claim paternity of a child born out of wedlock," entitling them "to receive notice of any proceeding to adopt that child." The Court noted that he could have registered "simply by mailing a postcard."'

University police chief brags about circumventing due process in sexual assault cases

Mastodon · 10 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Due process on college campuses has become passé, and even an impediment to justice — at least according to sexual assault activists. But police officers like Susan Riseling may be giving activists a leg up.

Riseling is the chief of police and associate vice chancellor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, and recently told a conference audience that using the records from campus sexual assault hearings could be beneficial to police investigations.

"It's Title IX, not Miranda," Riseling said. "Use what you can."
...
K.C. Johnson, who co-wrote the book on the Duke Lacrosse hoax, took Riseling's comment to be an "explicit celebration" of the evisceration of due process.

"The chief offered a rare explicit celebration of what too often is implicit: lack of civil liberties protections is a desired aspect of college inquiries," Johnson wrote. "The 'advantage' of the disciplinary hearing process, it seems, is that accused students have minimal due process protections, and — since sexual assault is, of course, a crime — law enforcement can then use student disciplinary proceedings to obtain information that they could not, under the Constitution, in a normal police investigation."'

Colleges turning to retired judges to adjudicate campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 10 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Colleges and universities are increasingly looking to outside judges to help adjudicate accusations of campus sexual assault.

Under pressure from the Obama administration, schools in recent years have been adjudicating accusations of sexual assault. The results have been a disaster.

First, accusers insisted that the process was rigged against them, and that facing the accused was too traumatic. So the Department of Education mandated the "preponderance of evidence" standard and "strongly discouraged" schools from allowing cross-examination. It also provided no due process rights to accused students.

This, along with threats of lost funding, encouraged schools to expel more accused students based on nothing more than accusations. Accused and expelled students began fighting back. But they didn't get the support and media attention accusers enjoyed.'

UK: "Mansplainers Are Offended By Natalie Bennett's Opposition To Mansplaining"

Mastodon · 10 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

One user said the Greens are now "the most sexist political party in the UK":

"The Greens really are now the most sexist political party in the UK. They only want men to go to prison, men appear to be completely sidelined in the party (despite them claiming to have equality when it comes to the leadership and deputy leader position).

Can you name a current Green Party figure who isn't female? When did you last see a male from the party sent to be their representative on TV or speaking at one of their press conferences?

Looking at Bennett's background we see she worked for the extremist feminist organisation the Fawcett Society and therefore it's no surprise she comes out with sexist rubbish such as this. No wonder so few males vote for the party."'

Man protests musician Bono over his pro-circ position

Matt · 10 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Bono has a lot of fans. They adore him. They love every part of him. It's likely the U2 front man has grown accustomed to constant adoration over the years. It's also likely that he's never received adoration quite as pointedly specific as that espoused by one lone protester standing outside Toronto's Air Canada Centre this past Tuesday evening holding a sign that read: "We Support Bono's Superb Irish Foreskin."

That protester was Glen Callender, founder of the Foreskin Awareness Project. The Vancouverite has been standing outside of every Canadian date of U2's current world tour to bring awareness to Bono's public support of circumcision to prevent the spread of HIV in certain countries in Africa.

"It's kind of hard to fit on a sign," admitted Callender outside of the Air Canada Centre Tuesday night. He was dressed in his customary protest getup — black combat tam, polished army boots, black briefs and a black shirt emblazoned with the surprisingly incendiary phrase "I love my foreskin." In addition to his sign supporting Bono's supposed foreskin (Bono has not confirmed nor denied whether he himself has been circumcised), he also had one reading "Circumcision does not prevent HIV" and "We condemn Bono's Support for Mass Circumcision." This is just stop number three on Callender's six-city "Foreskin + Experience" protest tour, as he trails U2's "Innocence + Experience" tour across Canada and into the U.S.'

Why do women outlive men? Science zeroes in on answer

Matt · 10 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Beltran-Sanchez and his colleagues began by examining common causes of death of people going back more than 200 years. They used data from the Human Mortality Database to find information about the deaths of people born between 1800 and 1935 in 13 countries across North America and Europe. Then they combined this with data from the World Health Organization's Mortality Database to determine death rates by cause.
...
While these numbers are small, they add up over time - for people born between 1900 and 1935, men were two to three times more likely to die in their 50s and 60s than were their female counterparts, the researchers wrote. This gender imbalance, which Beltran-Sanchez refers to as "excess male mortality," is caused primarily by cardiovascular disease and smoking-related deaths, he said.

In the first part of the 20th century, smoking was much more common among men than women, Beltran-Sanchez said.'

Ellen Pao Out as Reddit CEO, Blames Site's Users

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Silicon Valley Business Journal just reported that "Ellen Pao is resigning from Reddit after eight months of drama as interim CEO."

Having kept her Reddit position despite losing America's highest profile sexual discrimination lawsuits against what she called Silicon Valley's "boy's club," Pao was forced out for firing a popular female employee.

When the Ellen Pao five-week-long and very salacious San Francisco trial against the elite venture capital firm of Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers for alleged sexual discrimination went to the jury on March 26, most observers assumed it was a slam-dunk that the former junior partner would win a big chunk of her demand for $16 million to compensate for sexual discrimination and up to $144 million for punitive damages.

Pao's salacious lawsuit filed in 2012 had been a lightning rod for Jesse Jackson and other diversity camp followers to disparage the "backward culture" of Silicon Valley. Hoping to unmask Silicon Valley's supposedly greedy venture capitalists victimizing the reserved little Asian woman seemed like a done deal in a case that was supposed to be about the larger implications regarding the future of women and minorities in the tech field; which is dominated by a ratio of 70 percent white and Asian men, but only 30 percent women.'

Bar Charged Women 77% of Their Bar Tabs to Raise Awareness About Gender Pay Gap

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'After learning that on average women earn 77 to 78 cents for every dollar men make, a Brooklyn bar owner had an idea for how to close the gap, even if just for one night.

As a one-time offer on 7/7, Andy Heidel of The Way Station charged women only 77 percent of their total bar tabs to raise awareness and start a conversation about the disparity in wages between genders, The Guardian reports.

“I have three sisters. The majority of my staff and friends are women,” said Heidel. “I thought this would be a great way to even the playing field even if it was for one night only.”'

Traditional circumcisions take toll on South African boys

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'South African experts have urged government to strengthen standardisation of circumcision procedures as the act claimed a total of 24 lives since June.

According to local custom, circumcisions are normally viewed as traditional passage for young boys to enter manhood.

Dr Van Merwe, a Surgeon who had perfumed successful operation on some boys said on Friday that the government must regulate circumcision practice while preserving the traditions.'

New Zealand: NCEA 'eliminates the competition young men enjoy'

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'NCEA is better suited to girls, two boys' school principals believe.

An analysis of NCEA results since 2004 shows the pass rate for boys at NCEA level 1 has increased by 21.3 percentage points to 81.1 per cent last year.

But girls are still doing better. Last year, 87 per cent of girls passed level 1.

A gender gap also persists at levels 2 and 3, and boys are falling even further behind girls when it comes to merit and excellence endorsements at these levels.

Only in scholarship examinations, where the country's very top pupils are assessed, boys are doing equally as well, if not better than girls.'

HPV vaccine: The growing campaign for including boys

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It makes economic sense to give the HPV vaccine to boys, say advocates who are stepping up pressure on the Ontario government to fully fund school immunization programs against the common sexually transmitted virus.

Despite the most recent public campaign to include boys as well as girls, the province's Ministry of Health is deferring the issue. The ministry says it's "reviewing" the current program to determine whether changes are required.

...

In a growing push to make the vaccine free for boys, several young gay men made themselves available to media cameras as they were vaccinated against the human papillomavirus last week at the Hassle Free Clinic in Toronto.

A ministry statement released last Wednesday referred to "economic and societal factors" as reasons the province is still considering whether to expand the program, without elaborating, beyond mentioning "cost effectiveness and impact on the health system.'

Heinous case of child abuse compares boys to ‘prisoners of war’

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Authorities in Texas are comparing a disturbing case of child abuse to that of treatment of prisoners of war.

KPRC in Houston reports Sandra Anna Gonzalez is accused of severely starving and beating two of her sons. She is charged with two counts of injury to a child.
The details came to light last year when an elementary school administrator reported the abuse to authorities after observing Gonzalez’s 10-year-old son with a black eye.
“The 10-year-old told the administrator that he did not want to go home because his mother was abusing him, according to court documents. School administrators immediately called authorities,” KPRC reports.

The boy told investigators his mother shot him and his brother with a BB gun.

According to KPRC, in addition to the bruises and scrapes on the boy’s knees and around his eye, deputies saw numerous scrapes and bruising on the tops of his hands and bruising and swelling on his back. The boy also appeared to be severely malnourished, and investigators said they could clearly see his ribs and spine. Investigators documented that the child looked “like a prisoner of war who had been starved.”

Investigators also found similar injuries on the boy’s 12-year-old brother.
...
Gonzalez had three girls, ages 5, 10 and 14, but they all appeared to be in good health. It was her boys that she would take her anger out on, investigators say.'

State says dads equally guilty in freezer deaths case

Mastodon · 11 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A state attorney told the fathers of Mitchelle Blair's children they are just as responsible for the abuse, torture and death of the children whose bodies were found in March because they abandoned and deserted them.

Kelli Megyesi said Alexander Dorsey and Stephen Berry are "trying to pass the buck" for their roles in the tragedy.

Dorsey and Berry sat quietly during the tongue lashing from Megyesi during the conclusion Tuesday of a hearing about whether the parental rights should be terminated for Blair and the two men. All three are seeking rights over Blair's two surviving children, an 8-year-old boy and a 17-year-old daughter.

"They should feel guilty," she said. "They should feel culpable because they are."

...

Adam Devlin, Dorsey's attorney, said he reported in 2005 injuries to his daughter he suspected Blair of causing. Devlin said Dorsey also tried to see his children but was restricted by Blair to remain on the porch when he came to visit.

Laura Anderson, who represents Berry, said her client had a relationship with his sons and that he "never saw Ms. Blair being abusive to the children"

Anderson blamed Child Protective Services for not following up on investigations in 2002 and 2005 involving referrals for possible child neglect and abuse by Blair.'

Woman attacks boyfriend after he refuses sex

Matt · 12 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'An Augusta woman was arrested after she attacked her boyfriend for refusing to have sex with her.

Tabathia Lee Grooms, 35, came home around 11:30 p.m. on June 24 and attacked her boyfriend while he was sitting on the couch, according to a Richmond County Sheriff's Office incident report. She said she was angry that he refused her advances earlier that day, so she scratched him on the face, head and neck, then bit him on the arm. He ran into a bathroom and called 911.

When deputies responded to the house on Haynie Drive, Grooms would not give her name at first and threatened to run over a deputy with a baby stroller, according to the incident report. She admitted she had been drinking.

Grooms also punched her 66-year-old mother in the eye during the ordeal, according to the incident report.'

Isis's female Gestapo wreaking terror on their own sex

Matt · 12 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. And what is America's Feminist Establishment blithering about? Getting randy undergrads to sign pre-hand-holding contracts of mutual consent. Isn't it ironic that for maybe all of you, you read this story first on a MRM web site? Excerpt:

'Whatever the reason for living in this hellish place, all women are prohibited from going outside or travelling without a male relative. Islamic State imposes a strict dress code demanding all females from puberty upwards wear two gowns to hide their body shape, black gloves to cover their hands, and three veils so their faces cannot be seen, even in direct sunlight.

Women have been publicly buried alive in sand for breaking the code. One former Syrian schoolteacher trapped in the city told Channel 4 in a documentary, Escape From Isis, to be aired next week: ‘We have no freedom. We cannot go out on the balcony or look through the window. They will arrest a woman if she wears perfume or raises her voice. A woman’s voice cannot be heard.’

The teacher told of her horrifying capture by the city’s ruthless all-women police unit, the Al-Khansa brigade, created to enforce IS rules. ‘They said my eyes were visible through my veil. I was tortured. They lashed me. Now some of them punish women by biting. They give you the option between getting bitten or lashed.’

As many as 60 British women, including Aqsa Mahmood, the 20-year-old Glaswegian woman who left her family to become an Islamic State apparatchik last year, are thought to be members of the brigade. They are paid up to £100 a month, a fortune in the Islamic State bad-lands.'

The Mixed-Up Brothers of Bogotá

Matt · 12 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. A strong case for mandatory DNA testing post-birth even when no paternity fraud is suspected. Excerpt:

'As Laura walked into the grocery store, catching up with Janeth, she was surprised to spot someone she knew. Behind the butcher counter was a colleague from her job at Strycon, an engineering firm. She gave him a big wave. He hardly acknowledged her. "That's Jorge!" she told Janeth. "He works in my office." He was a well-liked 24-year-old who worked a few floors up from her, designing pipes for oil transport, so she was surprised to see him waiting on customers in the shop.

"Oh, no, that's William," Janeth said. William was a hard worker and rarely left that butcher counter, except to sleep. He definitely did not work at Strycon.
...
Eventually, William texted Wilber, who was working at a different butcher shop that day, and told him he needed to come right away. When Wilber arrived later that afternoon, William said he had to show him something and clicked, on his phone, on a photo of Jorge and Carlos. Immediately, Wilber saw, with total clarity, what it took everyone else hours to grasp.

"So we were swapped," Wilber said, shrugging, annoyed by the sense of momentousness William seemed to want to attach to the photo. "I don't care who they are. You're my brother, and you'll be my brother until the day I die."'

Court won’t overturn ruling that cleared former college student

Mastodon · 12 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A ruling that found Iowa State University administrators improperly removed a men’s basketball player from the team for alleged sexual misconduct will stand, an appeals court ruled Thursday.

The Iowa Court of Appeals dismissed an appeal filed by the university’s governing board, which argued the discipline against former Cyclone guard Bubu Palo was appropriate for his actions toward a female student in 2012.

The decision leaves in place last year’s ruling by District Judge Steven Oeth, who threw out the university’s sanctions against Palo and questioned the accuser’s credibility. The judge said ISU President Steven Leath had kicked Palo off the team and imposed other disciplinary sanctions despite no clear evidence that the sex was nonconsensual.'

Scotland: Nightclub and pub staff to be taught how to detect potential rapists

Mastodon · 13 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A NEW campaign has been launched to teach workers in nightclubs and bars to spot predatory rapists.

Bystander training is being rolled out across the country to encourage staff to intervene if they see women in potential danger of sexual assault.

The training will run in parallel with a hard-hitting anti-rape initiative from Police Scotland targeting the 16-27 age group, who account for a third of victims and perpetrators of the crime.
...
“We have examples of where the predator has moved in, looked for the girl who has had a bit to drink and when she has got up to go to the toilet or the bar, has insinuated himself with her.

“The predator cuts her out of the group and he will be the one who buys her that last drink and he is the one who leaves with her. That is when that woman is at her most vulnerable.”'

"6 Reasons Men Can Literally Never Be Victims Of Sexism"

Mastodon · 13 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the most frustrating things a man can do is claim that he's a victim of sexism. Men's rights groups who espouse the systemized oppression of men are ridiculously wrong in their philosophies. Sure, men might experience discrimination, bullying or even disparagement of their gender, but this doesn't equate to sexism. Sexism is institutionalized. Having someone be biased towards you in an isolated context, for instance, a woman excluding a man from something based on his gender, is simply mean or discriminatory, because it's an individual act, rather than one that's historically ingrained in the way society operates to the detriment of men. It's the exact same "nope, not even close to the same thing" comparison that happens when white people assert that they've been victims of racism: That is literally not possible, because you are in the privileged majority. If you think that isolated instances of feeling slighted or discriminated against amount to having the entire balance of favor in society stacked against you, then you're self-involved, ignorant, or at best, misguided about what words like "sexism" and "racism" actually mean. The fact is, if you're a white, straight, middle-class man, then society operates in your favor, regardless of any instances of discrimination. You always win. Congratulations, you are the lord of the genetic lottery, so give chance a giant hug for making your life so easy.'

Tim Hunt not to be reinstated at University College London

Mastodon · 13 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Nobel laureate Tim Hunt, who ignited a debate over sexism in science with his comments about women at a conference last month, will not be reinstated as an honorary professor at University College London (UCL), the university has confirmed.

...

In a short statement on 9 July, the university's governing body, UCL Council, wrote that it “unanimously supports the decision taken by UCL’s executive to accept the resignation”. The council said that the extent of media interest was unprecedented and that it recognized the distress caused to Hunt and his wife Mary Collins, an immunologist at UCL. But it also said that “all parties agree that reinstatement would be inappropriate”.

Hunt declined to comment on the UCL statement but wrote in an email to Nature: "I’ll just point out that my ‘contract’ was due to expire early in 2016, and I’d already given my last lecture, so there really didn’t seem much point in reinstatement from my point of view."'

See previous item on MANN here.

IVF paternity fraud father: make DNA tests routine in child maintenance cases

Mastodon · 14 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A father at the centre of Britain's first known case of paternity fraud involving IVF has called for the introduction of routine DNA testing in divorce after he was tricked into raising another man's child as his own for six years.

The man, whose identity cannot be published for legal reasons, is also calling for an overhaul of the law after a judge ruled that his ex-wife could not be forced to hand back tens of thousands of pounds in maintenance payments even though they were the result of "fraud".

He is urging MPs to consider new legislation to recognise paternity deceit as a crime rather than a civil wrong in cases involving premeditation and large amounts of money or serious emotional damage to children or parents.

The man, a lecturer and businessman based in southern England, was cheated by his ex-wife, a successful businesswoman, into believing that the baby she conceived through fertility treatment at a clinic in Spain was his child.'

Due process win: California judge rules campus kangaroo court 'unfair'

Mastodon · 14 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A California judge just issued a win to proponents of due process in campus sexual assault hearings.

Judge Joel M. Pressman deemed a University of California-San Diego campus hearing "unfair," ruling that the hearing panel limited the accused student's right to due process.

The accused student, listed as John Doe, had sued the university after being suspended for sexual assault without due process. John claimed that his right to cross-examine his accuser and adverse witnesses was limited, and Pressman agreed.'

"The Good, The Bad, and The Beta Male"

Mastodon · 14 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'No one (or group) made an attempt to stop the assailant who was the first to exist the train and into the crowd of families in D.C. for 4th of July celebrations. Oblivious to what harm he may continue to do, the others on the car were just relieved to see him leave.

John Daniel Davidson at The Federalistwrote, “That Spires had a knife—what the police said was a ‘small, black folding knife’ they later recovered from a trash can—is no excuse. Any two adult men in that subway car could have stopped him, no matter how crazy or strong he was, and saved Sutherland’s life.”
...
Prior to reading these and other stories, I would have chalked up the “beta male” stories to liberal fantasies to stomp out masculinity. But these are no longer fantasies. The beta male movement is real. It started with drugging little boys who didn’t want to sit still in class. The outcome is big boys sitting still while a man is stabbed to death. We must save the alpha males before they are extinct.'

Judge says "regret" at root of rape case

Mastodon · 14 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Administrators at the University of California San Diego failed to properly investigate sexual assault allegations against a male student and increased sanctions against him for appealing their decision, ruled superior court judge Joel Pressman on Friday, July 10.

A female student accused the 20-year-old male, known as John Doe, of inappropriately touching her on the morning of February 1, 2014. The male student denied these allegations and later told an officer who was investigating the accusations that the two had had sex both the night before and after the alleged touching occurred. However, John Doe's statements to investigating officers, as well as other evidence, was not allowed to be presented during the Title IX sexual misconduct hearing.

"The Court finds that substantial evidence does not support the finding of non-consensual sexual activity," reads judge Pressman's July 10 ruling. "First, as stated above, crucial findings...were based upon [the officer's] investigation summary that was not presented at the hearing in any meaningful way. Given the fundamental unfairness of relying on this report without a meaningful opportunity for petitioner to challenge its contents, the court has no choice but to exclude the report from consideration in evaluating whether substantial evidence exists to support the conclusion."'

Taking the transcript beyond academics

Mastodon · 14 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Interest is growing in using transcripts to note dismissal or expulsion after a student has been found responsible for a sexual assault based on a preponderance of evidence.
...
The idea of noting a history of sexual assault on college transcripts is one of many that have been suggested to combat the high incidence of such violence on campuses across the country. Many colleges have been accused of preferencing their sports programs over the safety of female students, turning blind eyes to the behavior of some male athletes. The SEC in June became the first athletic conference to take a united stand against allowing students with such histories to find a home on the courts or in the fields of college athletics. Continued publicity of cases in which alleged victims lie about assaults makes the job of administrators considering blanket policies a tricky one.'

Hillary Clinton's White Male Voter Problem

Mastodon · 14 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Karl Savage is the kind of guy that makes top Democrats nervous.

He lives in a working-class neighborhood, with a cigar-store Indian perched on his front stoop and a carved Harley-Davidson sign on his garage. He's voted in Democratic primaries, he's older, he's white—and he does not care for Hillary Clinton. Not one little bit.

He made this very clear, in fact, to a Clinton campaign volunteer who rang his doorbell recently only to watch the front door close on him just seconds into his pitch. A short while later, his wife, Pamela, offered this explanation before similarly shutting the door: "We're not interested. We don't like her."

So while Republicans fret about their party's outreach to Latinos and other minorities, this one Saturday morning door-knock encapsulates the fear among leading Democrats: Their party no longer speaks to white people, particularly white men, and they could lose the White House because of it.'

Even if false rape reports are rare, they shouldn't be ignored

Mastodon · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Whenever a high-profile account of alleged campus sexual assault comes crashing down – such as Rolling Stone's gang-rape accusation – activists predictably fall back on the claim that only 2 percent of rape accusations are false.

This isn't accurate. First, the 2 percent figure refers to false reports made to the police. Making a false police report carries a penalty, which exists to deter people from doing so (although sometimes that penalty isn't enforced, such as with the Duke Lacrosse rape hoaxer). No such penalty exists on college campuses. (Indeed, even the accuser in the Rolling Stone article, though proven to have lied, did not face any punishment from the school.)

Not having that penalty is meant to make accusers feel more comfortable coming forward, although it's difficult to see how being punished for lying would make truthful victims fearful. Regardless, a lack of consequences makes it easier for student accusers to come forward and punish fellow students who may have hurt them or with whom they had a previous regretted encounter that has come to be seen as assault.'

UK: Why the gender pay gap is a myth

Mastodon · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Today the Prime Minister has set out to ‘end the gender pay gap in a generation’. It would be an ambitious goal, if a wage gap actually existed. According to the latest ONS figures, women between the ages of 22 – 29 earn 1.1 per cent more on average than their male counterparts and women between the ages of 30-39 are also earning more.

And it doesn’t stop there. There’s evidence that when men and women follow the same career path in the UK, women tend to out-earn and out-perform men. There is growing evidence that if you control for similar backgrounds, women actually tend to get more aggressively promoted than men by their employers.

This alleged gap that the Prime Minister refers to is actually indicative of personal lifestyle decisions, not employer discrimination. While women who choose to stay on rigorous career paths usually find themselves rewarded, many women choose to take more flexible jobs and/or years out of work to focus on different – but equally important – parts of life, like raising a family. Naturally a drastic change in working hours, work-place responsibilities and shift of focus will have an impact on one’s salary.'

Here’s How Hillary Clinton Could Hike The Gender Wage Gap

Mastodon · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton’s flagship economic ambitions for getting more women in the workforce could have the opposite effect of widening the very gender pay she has campaigned so hard to narrow.

...

A key ambition of the Democratic front-runner is to raise the female labor force participation rate after stagnating for close to two decades. To that end, Hillary trumpeted the virtues of paid family leave as well as the reform of sick days.

Data from the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), however, shows there could be a link between more liberal parental leave policies and a higher gender wage gap.

...

Since Hillary’s speech Monday, analysts have warned of the potential unintended consequences of using policy tools to hike the female labor participation rate. “Once again, we find examples of government overreach into wages and labor markets backfiring on the very people it is trying to protect,” Adam Smith Institute Research Associate Kate Andrews told TheDCNF.

“The gender pay gap has been debunked for the myth that it is; women are not earning less than their male counterparts on the whole because of employer discrimination, but rather because many women make different lifestyle choices that do not value a high salary above all else,” she added.'

Is It Right For a Publisher to Accept Only Women's Books?

Mastodon · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The phrase "wheels of justice," of shady proverbial origin, is a popular way both to celebrate and lament the process of law. These wheels do turn, we are told, but they turn slowly. Are there not also wheels of injustice, constructed of a much stronger alloy, and forever counterposed to the forces of equity and morality? Most certainly there are, and they operate in too high a gear for us to bear.

The worst injustice is that which its perpetrators claim is meant to correct another. Nowadays one finds examples of this almost at random. A small British publishing house called "And Other Stories," for instance, has committed itself to publishing only women writers for the year 2018. The stated reason is to correct the imbalance in women's representation in the literary world, particularly when it comes to writing prizes. A senior editor at the publisher, Sophie Lewis, took to the pages of The Independent, one of London's daily papers, to explain her company's decision.

And Other Stories normally publishes men—in fact, according to Ms. Lewis, "even though most of us [at the company] are women, most of our books are by male authors. Fascinating, experimental male authors, but still male." She continues: "We have been putting it about, gently, for the last few years, that we're particularly looking for fiction by women," Ms. Lewis wrote. "They could be from anywhere really. And what do people send us? Why, more exciting, boundary-pushing men, of course."'

UK: Rape Crisis has 'concerns' over smartphone app which films sexual consent

Mastodon · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Users of We-Consent record 20-second clips naming who they're about to have sex with.

The app only works if the camera detects human faces and if both people involved are clearly heard saying "yes".

However, support group Rape Crisis says that although the app has good intentions it "throws up concerns".

Katie Russell, the national spokeswoman for Rape Crisis in England and Wales, told Newsbeat: "Someone saying 'yes' to sex on camera does not necessarily prove that they have given their consent.

"Consent must be fully and freely given by someone with the capacity to do so.

"Video footage might not capture whether someone has been threatened, bullied or intimidated into saying 'yes' to sex and, if they have, then they have not fully or freely given their consent, even if they've said the word 'yes' out loud.

...

"The concept seems to assume and suggest that 'false allegations of rape' are a common problem that young people need to be worried about; they're absolutely not.

"In fact, the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) has looked carefully at false allegations of rape and concluded that they are 'very rare'."'

Zambia: Magistrate convicts woman of indecently assaulting minor

Minuteman · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'THE Chipata Magistrates' Court on Friday committed a 40-year-old woman to the High Court for sentencing after she was convicted of indecently assaulting a 14-year-old boy.

Magistrate Philip Mpundu committed Malita Banda to the High Court for sentencing after the court established a prima facie case against her.

Particulars of the offence were that Banda indecently assaulted the 14-year-old grade four boy contrary to the Laws of Zambia.

Facts were that on April 7, 2015, Banda had sex with the boy in her house.

During trial, the boy told court that he was going to see his friend when Banda called him into her house where she had sex with him while her husband was away.

...

And Dr Jackson Kabwe of Chipata General Hospital told the court that on April 7, he received a child whose foreskin was swollen because of a sexual act.

Dr Kabwe told the court that he circumcised the minor's foreskin to protect his manhood and signed the medical report.'

Canada: Ruling in Twitter harassment trial could have enormous fallout for free speech

ErikaLancastor · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'After hearing closing submissions Tuesday from Chris Murphy, who represents 54-year-old Greg Elliott, Ontario Court Judge Brent Knazan is expected to rule on Oct. 6.

In the balance rides enormous potential fallout for free speech online.

Elliott is charged with criminally harassing two Toronto female political activists, Steph Guthrie and Heather Reilly, in 2012.

Allegations involving a third woman were dropped.

The graphic artist and father of four lost his job shortly after his arrest, which was well-publicized online, and if convicted, could go to jail for six months.

These are astonishing repercussions given that it's not alleged he ever threatened either woman (or any other, according to the testimony of the Toronto Police officer, Detective Jeff Bangild, who was in charge) or that he ever sexually harassed them.

Indeed, Elliott's chief sin appears to have been that he dared to disagree with the two young feminists and political activists.'

Paid crew roles on men's rights issues documentary being shot in London

Matt · 15 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Martin - who in 2012 sued the London School of Economics for discrimination against men on it's Gender, Media and Culture Masters programme - is now shooting a documentary in London, to investigate ways men can get women to pay their half on dates - and is hiring crew.

The camera operator ad is here, and you can contact Tom directly at sexismbusters-at-hotmail.com if you would like to collaborate in any other capacity.

Ruling in favor of student accused of sex assault could ripple across U.S.

Mastodon · 16 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The encounter snowballed into a sexual assault complaint, university investigation and a finding that the male student should be suspended.

But the accused student fought back in court and won — marking what is believed to be the first judicial ruling in recent years that a university failed to provide a fair trial in a sexual misconduct case. Some legal experts said Tuesday that the finding could have a broad national impact.

"It could have tremendous persuasive influence on other courts," said Amy Wax, a University of Pennsylvania law professor who, along with 15 colleagues, has raised concerns about the rights of accused students in campus sexual assault cases.'

DC Legislators Want to Brand Accused Students as Rapists—Even if They're Never Convicted

Mastodon · 16 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This is the brilliant idea of Councilwoman Anita Bonds, a Democrat:

"Newly proposed D.C. legislation would require colleges to put a permanent and prominent notation on the academic transcripts of students who are convicted of sexual assault or who try to withdraw from school while under investigation for sexual misconduct — a "Scarlet Letter" that would follow them to new schools and graduate programs or into the workforce.

Council member Anita Bonds's proposal Tuesday — which comes as the nation is paying more attention to the widespread problem of college sexual assault — immediately drew praise from several colleagues for its bold approach to attacking the issue. But it also caught officials at the city's colleges and universities off guard, proposing what is certain to be a controversial way of permanently punishing those accused of assaults."

The "Scarlet Letter" plan isn't exactly new; lawmakers in other jurisdictions have proposed similar policies. But the idea that this should apply to students who are never found guilty—because they withdrew before the investigation was completed—is less common, and much more disturbing.

I can understand the desire to protect students at other universities from rapists. But the best way to do that is put the rapists in jail, not mark their transcripts.

After all, the campus judiciary hearing is often farcical. When an accused student is denied his due process rights, access to a lawyer, and is convicted under a preponderance of the evidence standard, is it really fair to mark him forever? If he withdraws from the college to avoid such a miscarriage of justice, should legislatures really make that public knowledge for future employers?'

Judge dismisses man’s claim of Title IX violation

Mastodon · 16 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'That summer, the student filed a complaint with USF against his ex-girlfriend. It was a complaint similar to the one she filed against him, claiming she violated the school’s code of conduct.

University officials did not investigate his complaint because it mirrored the one filed by his ex girlfriend, the suit says.

John Doe argued that his complaint should have be treated the same as hers.

Says his lawsuit: “Male students at USF, such as John Doe, are discriminated against solely on the basis of sex and are invariably found guilty, regardless of the evidence, or lack thereof.”'

Updating the cliche that it's better to let '10 guilty men go free'

Mastodon · 16 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The old liberal cliché that it's "better 10 guilty persons escape than one innocent suffer" has been upended in recent years — at least when it comes to accusations of sexual assault.

The cliché has been replaced by: "It's better 10 innocent persons suffer than one guilty escape."

The push to reduce campus sexual assault has bred this new sentiment, as policies purporting to make colleges and universities safer actually increase the likelihood that innocent students will be accused and punished. The new policies broaden the definition of sexual assault while narrowing the definition of consent, and remove due process protections for accused students while severely limiting what constitutes "evidence" in their defense.'

SAVE: Affirmative Consent Policies Eliminate the Presumption of Innocence, Critics Charge

Matt · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'WASHINGTON / July 14, 2015 – Following recent passage of a law in New York on campus sexual assault, Affirmative Consent policies are coming under fire from civil rights and legal experts. The New York law will require that “clear affirmative agreement” be expressed before any sexual activity occurs between two students.

Robert Shibley of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, a civil liberties group, notes that Affirmative Consent policies serve to promote a “guilty until proven innocent” mindset.

In her June 27 column, New York Times contributing writer Judith Shulevitz decried the notion of making “sex a crime under conditions of poor communication.” Her article quoted Harvard law professor Jeannie Suk who chided Affirmative consent as an “unworkable standard.”

In her July 1 column, ‘Affirmative Consent’ Will Make Rape Laws Worse, Megan McArdle charges Affirmative Consent will make it more difficult to prosecute an offender because predators can “always insist they got that affirmative consent.'

Spiritual authenticity and the circumcision decision

Matt · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Though the prospect of circumcising a baby boy typically causes some anxiety, Jewish parents most often to go through with it. Circumcision is a concrete symbol of the ancient Abrahamic covenant, an affirmation of membership in the tribe, and a way for the boy to “look like Dad.” Sealing the deal for many is the idea that circumcision provides health benefits throughout a child’s life.

These days, however, there are Jewish parents who consider the issue carefully—and come to a different conclusion. To them, circumcision seems unnecessary, harmful or traumatic, and they decide not to do it. The question is, do these families represent a disheartening watering-down of tradition? Or do they perhaps have something unique and precious to offer to the ongoing Jewish narrative?

My sons, now grown, are both circumcised. But I acquiesced unhappily, despite grave misgivings. My husband was in favor of circumcision, and like him, I wanted my boys to be fully accepted in Jewish life. I wanted to be fully accepted in Jewish life. In short, my compliance was calculated. It was not an expression of my spiritual beliefs or my relationship with God.'

China: Mother Refused To Break Into Expensive BMW To Save Toddler Son From Heat

Matt · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A mum has sparked outrage after she refused to allow firefighters to break into her car to save her toddler son from the heat because the vehicle was too expensive to damage.

The unnamed mother was unable to open the door of her BMW when it accidentally locked itself.

Her three-year-old son was trapped inside and was suffering in the heat as no windows were open.

Firefighters who arrived at the scene in Yiwu city, China, were about to break the glass to rescue the boy - but his mum told them she wanted to wait for a locksmith instead so the car would not be damaged.'

SAVE E-lert: Help Stop a Draconian Policy in Minnesota

Matt · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The University of Minnesota President, Eric Kaler, is attempting to enact an affirmative consent policy at the school.

Members of the University's Board of Regents asked him to hold off until they could review such a serious change at their next meeting.

Now, the President is getting pressured into enacting the policy by media, even though affirmative consent would result in draconian and overbroad definitions of sexual assault crimes.

Such definitions would require the school to call innocent students 'criminals'.

Please contact President Kaler now and tell him to NOT pass an affirmative consent policy, and to instead stick with state definitions of crimes.

Call: (612) 626-1616
Or Email: upres-at-umn.edu

Yours,

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Student Expelled for Tweeting '#Psycho,' Bureaucrats Cite Title IX

Mastodon · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A University of Kansas student was expelled for calling his ex-girlfriend a “psycho bitch” on Twitter. The tweet, which did not mention the woman by the name—and was not visible to her—is disallowed under Title IX, KU has argued.

...

After a dispute between Yeasin and his ex-girlfriend—who was also a student—KU imposed a no-contact order on him. KU then accused him of violating that order by tweeting “psycho bitch” and “#psycho,” even though the tweets did not identify his ex-girlfriend as the target of these insults. He was eventually expelled. A county judge ruled in favor of Yeasin last November, but KU appealed the decision.'

Woman coolly confesses to police after allegedly killing neighbor with baseball bat

Matt · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Brenda Martinez walked into San Mateo police headquarters about 8:30 p.m. on the Fourth of July, authorities say, and flagged an officer to report that a homicide occurred about 30 minutes earlier. She told them to go to a North Claremont Street apartment to find the scene.

And then she told them she did it.

Martinez, 40, sits in San Mateo County jail on suspicion of murder after police say she fatally attacked her neighbor with the victim's own baseball bat. And true to her confession, when police went to the involved home, they found a gravely injured 66-year-old woman with "obvious head trauma."'

Canada: Foreskin Pride rally planned outside One Direction concert in Vancouver

Matt · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'It will be a demonstration unlike any other outside a pop-music concert in British Columbia.

On Friday (July 17) from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m., members of the Canadian Foreskin Awareness Project will rally outside B.C. Place Stadium to show their support for Harry Styles's alleged refusal to get snipped.

Styles and his pals in One Direction are singing that night in front of a massive Vancouver crowd.

In 2013, the National Enquirer reported that Styles and singer Taylor Swift parted ways because she wanted him circumcised and he refused to do this.'

Stabbing victim said he went out with woman once, a month before she attacked him

mens_issues · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Fury and a woman scorned. Fortunately, a neighbor helped the stabbing victim out: “I thought she was an alright girl. There’s something wrong with her,” he said. Quite true. Excerpt:

'A woman scorned and a man stabbed around 20 times.

It happened at about 6:30 pm Tuesday at the Locust Park Apartments in Loveland.

As 45-year-old Walter Puttoff showed stab wounds all over his body he explained to FOX31 Denver what led to the attack.

“She just said ‘I’m going to kill you,’” explained Puttoff.

Puttoff said he thought he was going to die after 37-year-old Bernedette Vasquez, knocked on his door wanting to talk.

“I knew I was going to die,” he said less than 24 hours after the attack.

“She must have had the knife behind her back or something and the next thing I know she just come in just stabbing,” he explained.'

"Skilled female gamers at risk of harassment from inferior men"

Mastodon · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Men are bullies -- at least online, in games, and disproportionately towards women, an international study has found. The kicker though, is that men are most likely to harrass women when they're being beaten by them.

In their paper "Insights into Sexism: Male Status and Performance Moderates Female-Directed Hostile and Amicable Behaviour", Michael M. Kasumovic of the University of New South Wales' Ecology and Evolution Research Centre and Jeffrey H. Kuznekoff of Miami University Middletown's Department of Integrative Studies researched whether "female-initiated disruption of a male hierarchy incites hostile behaviour from poor performing males who stand to lose the most status."

Kuznekoff and Kasumovic looked at behaviour in Halo 3 multiplayer matches, creating three different Xbox Live accounts and measuring player reactions. All matches were recorded for later analysis. The 'control' account merely played the game, without using the real-time voice comms to interact with other players. The remaining accounts were assigned male and female attributes, with researchers broadcasting pre-recorded phrases in a gender-specific voice.'

University Accused of Sex Discrimination, Violating Title IX Over Tank Top Ban

Mastodon · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'About a month after the UCF Recreation and Wellness Center started enforcing a ban on shirts that don't "fully cover the back, front and sides of the torso," students say staff are now only enforcing it among men and not women.

"You guys have to understand this is sexism at its finest because you're yelling at me and not saying anything to the girls," said Austin Medlin, in a video he took during an argument he had with an RWC staff member about the policy.

Medlin has been banned from going to the UCF RWC as of Wednesday, after accusing the RWC staff of sexual discrimination. He also believes UCF is violating the federal Title IX law.

"I was on a bench they came up, Troy and another guy and told me to leave and my privileges have been restricted. Once I went upstairs they told me the same thing, and I have to take it up with student conduct and I can't use the facilities anymore," said Medlin.

Mo Barhamje, a former SGA Vice Presidential candidate, told KnightNews.com that he is planning on filing a Title IX complaint with UCF Title IX Coordinator Maria Beckman.

UCF's policy on the Title IX states, "Prohibited conduct includes treating a member of one sex differently than the other, based on sex." The entire document can be found here.

NPO: National Parents Organization on a Roll

Matt · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Lead article here. Excerpt:

'July has been good to the National Parents Organization so far. Despite many state legislatures no longer being in session, NPO continues to fight the good fight for shared parenting and family court reform in the media. Here's a list of our media placements so far. Child custody reforms push for equal time with both parents'

When Prosecutors Believe the Unbelievable

Matt · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Three years ago, one of the strangest criminal cases in recent memory began in Charlottesville, Virginia, where I live, when a young woman sent a series of text messages telling her boyfriend that a man had abducted her, followed by a series of texts, allegedly from her captor, taunting her boyfriend with threats of sexual violence. Her story was strange, and the case was fraught with complications from the get-go, but the accused ended up in prison long after the doubts outweighed the evidence.

This story is bizarre, but it's not all that unusual: Prosecutors can prosecute even the weakest, most clearly flawed cases relentlessly, and innocent people can end up in jail.

This week, after two and a half years in prison, Mark Weiner saw his conviction vacated. It finally ended a saga in which Weiner was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to eight years in jail on charges of abducting a woman with the intent to sexually harm her.

...

When defense counsel learned of the cellphone evidence and attempted to use one of the detectives as a defense witness, Lunsford had him disqualified as an expert, objecting to the fact that the defense attorney hadn't subpoenaed the right witnesses to get the phone record evidence in. When the defense lawyer asked in chambers for a continuance so that he could call the correct witnesses, the motion was denied by trial court Judge Cheryl Higgins. Jurors would never hear what the phone tower records showed. Local lawyers and trial observers were shocked.

...

Because we elect our prosecutors, there is no chance of apology, and no admission of error. Justice by popularity contest will ensure that. But Mark Weiner's journey into legal purgatory is more than just a quirky local tale; it shows why innocent people get trapped in a system in which it is costless for prosecutors to make errors, while mistakes made by defense counsel at trial are virtually impossible to correct.

Mark Weiner's freedom did not come about this week because the system worked. It came about because the system protected the system from abject embarrassment. That isn't justice. That's just sad.'

False rape accusations tell us something important about America

Mastodon · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Summary: The changes in America are often easily seen in the news, if read analytically (rather than as entertainment). Read about the latest false accusation of rape to see not just a gripping story of injustice and eventual vindication — but also an important trend affecting America.

...

In Harper Lee's novel To Kill a Mockingbird all-white jury convicts an innocent black man of raping a white woman in a small 1930s southern town, despite the efforts his lawyer who defies the town's lynch-mob mentality and proves the victim's story to be false. It's a new century, a sequel has just come out — and we have a new surge of men being falsely convicted of rape despite the evidence.

The latest example is Mark Weiner, who on a rainy day gave a woman a ride to her home — ending in a sentence of eight years in jail for abducting a woman with the intent to sexually harm her. There was almost no evidence of his guilt, and considerable exculpatory evidence (some of which was not disclosed to his attorney), but that does not matter to the true believers who increasingly run America. This happened in Charlottesville, home of the infamous fake rape publicized in last November's Rolling Stone.

...

For those who believe in the power of the media to limit governmental abuse of power, this story was covered in detail by journalist Lisa Provence (who deserves a career boost from this). As in this story about the Judge's sentence of 20 years in prison (8 suspended), quite impressive given the not just the evidence showing his innocence. After two and a half years in prison, this week a judge vacated his conviction.'

Girl, 17, Sues for Right to Register for Military Draft

Mastodon · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A teenage girl in New Jersey is suing the federal government for the right to be drafted. Or at least the right to register for the draft, which hasn't been used in decades. Though identified only as E.K.L. in the federal class-action suit, the Star-Ledger identifies the teen as recent high school graduate Elizabeth Kyle. And her complaint is fairly straightforward: Now that the military is opening up even combat roles to women, it makes no sense to require males to register for the draft at age 18 but not females. In fact, it's unconstitutional, she argues. Kyle filed the complaint via her mother, asserting that the Selective Service violates the civil rights of females by excluding them.

"If the two sexes can fight and die together, they can register together; if not, then no one should have to register," the complaint states, as quoted by Courthouse News Service. Kyle says she tried to register online but got shut down as soon as she checked the box for female. She hopes to represent a group of women ages 18 to 25 in the suit. Any such change would require Congress to tweak the wording of the law, says a Selective Service spokesperson. Legislation introduced by Rep. Charles Rangell earlier this year would do that, along with reinstating the draft itself, notes the Hill. (The first batch of women tried out for the Army's elite Ranger branch.)'

Rights of the accused cannot be sacrificed to make their accusers feel comfortable

Mastodon · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of California-San Diego's treatment of a student accused of sexual misconduct was not only unfair in the eyes of a state judge, but also to the editorial board of the Los Angeles Times.

The editorial generally supports the overhaul of sexual-misconduct policies and investigations at the behest of the Department of Education. "But in revamping their procedures, some schools have set up campus tribunals that curtail the basic rights of the accused," it says:

"...
Hearings like this one are not criminal proceedings, and they cannot result in prison sentences or other criminal sanctions. But fundamental due process rights should apply even in quasi-judicial settings. Most sexual assault victims don't lie, of course — and they should certainly be treated with respect and sensitivity — but the rights of the accused cannot be sacrificed to make their accusers feel comfortable. The accused deserve a full and fair opportunity to cross-examine, ask questions, challenge statements and look into the eyes of their accusers."

Note what's left out of the editorial: the unreliable 2-8 percent false-accusation statistic that's increasingly deployed to defend campus investigative practices that are heavily tilted against accused students. The editorial board members probably felt safer using their own "preponderance of the evidence" standard and figured that where there's smoke, there's fire, 50.01 percent of the time.'

Man wrongly accused of rape speaks out one year later

Kaka81k · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video report here. We need a list or a website that tracks and maintain records of these woman who falsely accuse innocent men of rape. This should be an open source where anyone can upload his side of the story. Description excerpt:

'Police found inconsistencies in the story of a Fort Collins woman who claimed she was raped soon after she reported the crime, according to a police interview obtained by 7NEWS.

Katherine Bennett, 21, was eventually convicted for lying to Windsor Police when she claimed Dustin Toth kidnapped and raped her. Last year, Toth, now 26, spent the day before Thanksgiving in jail.

That same day, Bennett was called in for questioning.

"Right now the statements I've been given don’t match evidence," the investigator told Bennett, adding that Toth could spend 30 years to life in prison for the crimes she accused him of.

"There are some things that aren’t exactly clear to me and might not be exactly true," Bennett told the investigator. "But did he violently rape me, yes."

When the investigator continued to bring up problems with Bennett's story she said, "It's fine, I'll drop all charges."'

14 Facts the Tanking ‘Women in Tech’ Movement Doesn’t Want You to Know

Mastodon · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Every week, we are subjected to stroppy Gawker posts and soporific op-eds in national newspapers about how a woman in the technology industry who was fired for poor performance was secretly a high-achieving go-getter brought down by entrenched sexism and patriarchal oppression.

And every week we’re told that the reason more women aren’t working in technology is a combination of sexism, outdated social attitudes and stereotypes, historical prejudices and too few educational support programmes for women.

We’re told that women find it more difficult to get jobs and that when they do get jobs they’re subjected to hostile workplaces, sexism and bullying and that they’re paid less than their male counterparts for the same work.

We’re invited to believe, contrary to the evidence all around us, that the highly-progressive, socially-conscious and liberal-minded technology industry is in fact one of the most retrograde and oppressive places for women to work.

But here’s the dirty secret about the shrill and insatiable “women in tech” movement: none of that is true. And ordinary women innately sense that this is so, which is why — despite frenetic, wall-to-wall media coverage and endless plugs from politicians and celebrities, the women in tech movement is losing the sympathy of ordinary people and why, by some measures, the number of women going into tech is actually going down.'

"Circumcision denier derided"

Mastodon · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Goldman and his group, the Circumcision Resource Centre, give counselling to US men who say that they have emotional problems attributable to their being circumcised as children.

Goldman's book, Circumcision: the Hidden Trauma, and his website, share anti-circumcision sentiments such as: "We are interconnected. When a baby boy's sexuality is not safe, no one's sexuality is safe."

Goldman's comments in The Times yesterday were attacked by scientists. He blamed most of the HIV infections in Africa on contaminated injections and surgical procedures.

Goldman said circumcision did not reduce the risk of HIV.

Scientists and activists yesterday called his group "fringe fanatics" and "conspiracy theorists".'

UK: We must stop indoctrinating boys in feminist ideology

Mastodon · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On Wednesday, the Daily Mail reported that a school in Oxford has become the first to introduce “Good Lad” workshops, in which boys are singled out for sessions that teach them about “the scale of sexual harassment and violence aimed at female students” and how they must stand up for women's rights.

The workshops are the latest in a mushrooming series of initiatives in which ideologically-driven activists are being invited into schools, driven by the belief that boys need to be re-educated to prevent them from becoming a threat to women.

In November last year, The Times reported on a programme in London Schools in which two American women, one a former sex crime prosecutor, “re-programme teenage boys’ sexual manners so they are fit for a feminist world”.

According to the report, they start the class by asserting that “misogyny is on the rise”, before going on to “describe real-life sex crimes that have happened to teenagers in this area with brutal accuracy”. The article concludes – approvingly -- that by the end of the session, the boys are “scarred for life”.'

Life for young Greek men is completely in limbo

Mastodon · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'With the Greek crisis entering its last stages after another fudge of a deal was reached earlier this month in Brussels, everyone is now supposed to think the adventure is over (it isn't), and that we're safe to switch channels from the endless bulletins of what a German or Greek politician said about the deal or Greece's debt or someone's mum. (That last bit might be an exaggeration, but trust me reader, we're getting there.)
...
Youth unemployment in Greece stands at a staggering 50 per cent right now. Alongside them, the group that has been hurt the most is those in their late thirties and early forties, professionals who are way into their professional lives, making them too expensive to employe compared to the young coming on to the job market with great qualifications, but not senior enough to challenge the boomers who, like in most of Europe, got off lightly compared to everyone else.

Equally spread between men and women, the ailments of the Greek economy have brought medical and social issues to the forefront. Heart attacks among the under-45 have jumped by 74.5 per cent. The greatest increase was amongst women, at 86.5 per cent. In 2014, there were 802 new cases of HIV infection, of which 86.8 per cent were men.

These issues have given birth to a prevailing sense of despair. Mental health is suffering too: 12.3 per cent of the Greek population has shown symptoms of clinical depression. This is obviously tied to the rise of 35 per cent in suicides, in which the most vulnerable group is middle-aged men who were facing financial difficulties. Men under 34, meanwhile, have gone back to living with their parents in a rate of 2 out of 3, a situation definitely adding to their problems.

What I've seen, among Greek friends and family, is young men who before the crisis had entered the job market and in many cases were doing really well, leaving their old lives behind after losing employment and social status. In Greece, being unemployed is a social stigma, unlike what many outside think. (It's worth pointing out too that contrary to the popular myth of the "lazy Greek", the OECD stats make it clear that Greeks work "the longest hours in Europe".)'

A ‘scarlet letter’ for students implicated in sex assaults: D.C. bill sparks debate

Mastodon · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'No one said this was an easy issue. As people considered a bill from D.C. Council member Anita Bonds aimed at preventing campus sexual assault, in part by requiring colleges to permanently mark the transcript of a student found responsible by school officials for a sexual assault, they tended to look at the extremes.

They talked about cases in which a student attacked another, got expelled and transferred easily to another college — only to assault another victim.

And they talked about cases in which a student was falsely accused, unable to assert his innocence in a campus investigation, then branded as a rapist.
...
Stuart Taylor, an author who has written extensively about campus sexual assault, said a permanent mark would be appropriate if there were a criminal conviction.

“The problem with the college proceedings is they’re wildly unreliable, wildly inconsistent with the presumption of innocence and due process,” Taylor said. They’re incapable of being fair, he argued, without the resources to fully investigate evidence, without the power to subpoena witnesses, without the standards of a criminal proceeding."'

Admirably intended, this D.C. bill on campus sex assault is deeply flawed

Mastodon · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'RAPE ON college campuses has finally begun to get the national scrutiny it deserves, with lawmakers across the country attacking a problem that has plagued schools for decades. Unfortunately, bad policy can nullify even the best of intentions. That's certainly the case for D.C. Council member Anita Bonds (D-At Large), who introduced legislation this week shortening the city's leash on local universities when it comes to their sexual assault policies.

Ms. Bonds's proposal misfires on multiple counts. The heart of the bill — a mark on the transcripts not just of those found responsible for sexual assault on campuses, but also of those who have been accused and then withdraw from school — flips legal codes on their head by ignoring due process and presuming guilt rather than innocence. And many of the bill's other provisions, while sensible in theory, are actually unnecessary given the status quo.'

Student Expelled for Rape Has Evidence He Was the Victim, College Refuses to Review It

Mastodon · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A preponderance of the evidence suggested that John Doe, a male student at Amherst College, raped his girlfriend's roommate, Sandra Jones, according to the college's sexual assault adjudication process. But text messages sent between the alleged victim and other Amherst students point toward the opposite conclusion: that Doe did nothing wrong.

He was expelled anyway—and Amherst has utterly refused to take a look that text messages that might acquit him.'

Vindicated ‘Sexist’ Scientist Banned From Conference Due To Feminist Threat

Mastodon · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'An Italian university has banned Sir Tim Hunt from speaking at a conference because of “some hazardous occurrence” threatened by a local group of feminists. The silencing of the renowned scientist follows a recording of his now infamous toast finally surfacing in which laughter is heard following the joke, confirming that it was taken in jocular spirit.

Sir Tim was due to speak at a conference of the Italian Society of Anatomy and Histology in Ferrara later in the year. However, in an e-mail seen by The Times, president of the organising committee, Silvano Capitani, apologised to the scientist before writing:

“[The society’s board] have reached the conclusion that your presence at the society’s 69th annual conference… might result in some hazardous occurrence for you and for the regular course of the event… I have several evidence [sic] that activists have already taken [a] position on the issue, and regardless [of whether] they are right or not, this represents a potential serious problem.”'

Video reveals: Sir Tim Hunt was joking, outrage mob still has his job

Mastodon · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As written about here previously, Nobel prize winning scientist Sir Tim Hunt of the United Kingdom lost his reputation and several affiliations and titles in the wake of joking incorrectly and crossing feminist outrage mobs in June.

Several weeks after the uproar, started by one activist academic in attendance at the toast, which Hunt gave to a room full of journalists in Seoul, other accounts began to surface suggesting his objectionable toast about women in the science fields had in fact been an obvious joke, not a serious assessment. In fact, in telling the joke, he had referred to himself as a “chauvinist monster” to satirize the very environment in the sciences that feminists used his words to bemoan.'

Rolling Stone says White House adviser introduced U.Va. rape accuser

Mastodon · 23 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Obama administration disclosed Tuesday it first learned about Rolling Stone's ill-fated story on campus rape in Sept. 2014, about two months before it was published, when reporter Sabrina Rubin Erdely called seeking information on the government's investigation of the University of Virginia's handling of sexual assaults.

The revelation from the Department of Education came the same day that a media watchdog group asked congressional oversight committees to start an investigation into what the administration may have known about the story before and after it was published and what it did to address the concerns raised in the article.

"The larger question we raise regards the role of public officials: Was this contrived, indeed fabricated story, part of an orchestrated power grab over U.S. universities by administration officials intent on using a major publication as a political weapon?" the Institute on Government and Media Integrity wrote in a letter to Rep. John Kline, Minnesota Republican and House Education and the Workforce Committee chairman.'

High School Teacher Accused of Sex With 6 Students Left Defenseless by Brain Condition: Attorney

Mastodon · 23 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A high school teacher accused of having sex with six male students has a brain condition that left her defenseless to the students' aggressive behavior, her lawyer said Tuesday.

Nicole DuFault, 36, of Caldwell, pleaded not guilty in April to aggravated sexual assault and child endangerment charges. DuFault was a language arts teacher at Columbia High School in Maplewood before she was arrested last September.

Authorities have said the victims were 14- and 15-year-old boys and the assaults occurred numerous times between 2013 and 2014. Some of the sex acts occurred on school property and in DuFault's car, they said.

Her attorney, Timothy Smith, told NJ.com that the teacher suffers from "frontal lobe syndrome," a condition that experts say is associated with socially inappropriate behavior. It also leaves them unable to control their impulses, among other symptoms.'

"The Right to Confront"

Mastodon · 23 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Earlier this month, a California trial court judge ruled that the University of California at San Diego must reverse the suspension of a male student whose due process rights UCSD officials violated during a hearing over allegations he assaulted a female student.

The lawsuit is a rare win for accused male students who turn to legal action after having been found responsible for sexual misconduct. While the lawsuit is unlikely to set any true legal precedent unless the university appeals, some experts say that the case could provide a road map for other suspended or expelled students looking to challenge the way universities adjudicate allegations of sexual assault against them.

“I think if any other judge knows about this case, it’s going to more easily allow them to take a similar stance when they see the outrageous way colleges handle these cases,” said Mark Haberkorn, the lawyer who represented the male student and who is now turning his attention to similar lawsuits. “I don’t think schools should be involved in this process whatsoever.”'

Law professors line up against New York's new campus sexual-assault law

Mastodon · 23 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The law is "horribly unrealistic" because it misunderstands how the average sexual encounter works for college students and ignores the common presence of drugs and alcohol, which can impair judgment and sometimes communication, according to John Banzhaf, a law professor at George Washington University.

"The opportunity for misunderstanding is much greater with 'Yes means Yes,'" Banzhaf said, using the informal term for affirmative-consent standards, partly because consent can't be inferred between two partners with a consensual sexual history.

"The way to deal with this problem is to have a law that says 'no means no,'" he said.'

"Men On Strike" review

Matt · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Another great book review by J Steven Svoboda. This one's of Helen Smith's Men On Strike. Snag the review here. Excerpt:

'As a long-time reviewer of books about men and masculinity, I continue to marvel at the ability of new authors to come along with fresh energy and new things to say. Dr. Helen Smith, a Knoxville, Tennessee psychologist specializing in forensic issues and men's issues, is no exception in her book Men on Strike. Smith and I would probably not completely agree on all aspects of the gender wars, but who cares—her heart is in the right place and she is full of compassion for all of us. "There truly is a war on men going on in our society, and the average man knows it full well." It strikes me that Dr. Smith is writing for a newer phase of the men's movement, with us already having enjoyed at least the limited success of getting our basic message across to "the average man."

Dr. Smith cannot brook stories such as that of "father Cliff Hall, who paid his outstanding child support for his eleven-year-old son but was sentenced by a female judge to six months in jail anyway." Much worse, exploitation of our honored service members appears to be endemic. One says, "When I was in the Marine Corps, I was sued by 11 different women for child support…. It's a huge scam, and no one cares." Well, thanks to authors such as Dr. Smith, not quite no one.'

Clinton on candidacy: 'One of the merits is I am a woman'

Mastodon · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton is touting her gender as among the factors that voters should consider when judging her qualifications for the presidency.

"Clearly, I'm not asking people to vote for me simply because I'm a woman. I'm asking people to vote for me on the merits," Clinton said while on the campaign trail in West Columbia, S.C., according to CNN.

"I think one of the merits is I am a woman. And I can bring those views and perspectives to the White House."

Clinton was reportedly responding to a questioner who said his daughter had told him that men have had the presidency for "long enough."'

Sexual Assault as a Civil Rights Violation Under Title IX

Mastodon · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. If you get a paywall, Google the text of the first paragraph and click the link that takes you to The Legal Intelligencer site. Excerpt:

'There is no dispute that the standard of beyond a reasonable doubt is essential in criminal cases where one's liberty is at stake. The clear and convincing standard is rarely used in civil proceedings, and only when significant liberty interests are at stake, such as termination of parental rights, deportation, and commitment to a mental institution. The preponderance standard is appropriate for civil rights actions, civil actions, and school disciplinary proceedings that result, rarely and at most, with school expulsion.

Civil remedies are commonly available to victims of crime. Is the editorial board suggesting that civil remedies not be available to any victims of crime or is it limiting this objection to victims of sex crimes, thus eliminating a remedy for sexual assault victims (who are mostly women) while providing an unparalleled shield of protection for the accused student? Is it also suggesting that campus disciplinary proceedings should not be used to address student conduct that also might be criminal in nature (e.g., other assaults, arson, robbery, vandalism) or are they just singling out sexual assault?

As to cross-examination and legal representation, Title IX procedures are more than consistent with court interpretations of the process due an accused student under constitutional law (applicable to public schools) and contract law (applicable to public and private schools). Courts have made clear that due process does not require a full-fledged court-like proceeding that imports the rights accorded defendants in criminal proceedings. Rather, due process in an academic setting requires a fair proceeding in which the accused student is provided notice of the charges, explanation of the evidence, and an opportunity to respond.

Consistent with the OCR's guidance discouraging schools from allowing parties to personally question or cross-examine each other, courts have found due process satisfied where parties engage in indirect cross-examination accomplished by having the hearing officer or panel direct the parties' questions to the other party.

Furthermore, neither courts nor the OCR require active representation by lawyers in disciplinary proceedings. The OCR, however, requires schools to make representation equally available to both parties if school policy allows lawyers to participate in the proceedings. To the extent courts have recognized a potential need for legal representation in school proceedings, it is limited to an advisory role and only when the accused student faces criminal charges as well. Recent amendments to the Clery Act, another federal law that applies to campus sexual misconduct proceedings, make clear that schools must provide both parties with the opportunity to be accompanied to disciplinary proceedings by an adviser of their choice, which includes attorneys.'

No (White, Straight) Boys Allowed

Mastodon · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'From Jerry Lewis' Chinese chef to Dan Whitney's Larry the Cable Guy, playing on stereotypes has long been an integral element in the fabric of comedy. The reason is simple: It's easier to deliver a quick punchline about a shared preconceived notion rather than explain a lengthy set-up.

No Straight White Guys, a monthly comedy show at Foam Coffee & Beer, attempts to place a mirror in front of cultural and gender assumptions promoted within humor. In the process, however, they may have unintentionally raised questions about stereotypes in the world of comedy itself.

Though hosted by local comedians Amy Milton and Milly Naeger, ironically the show was conceived by Jeremy Hellwig -- described by Milton as "a pretty straight, extremely white man." Aware that he couldn't host the show himself, Hellwig turned to Milton and Naeger, who he described as having "some of the funniest, most original voices I've seen in comedy, and I don't just mean in St Louis."
...
For Kirkwood native Nikki Glaser, however, this was never a problem. Glaser, one of the most successful comedians to emerge from the area over the last decade, says she had no problem starting out on open mics that were dominated by men.

"Male comics are a mostly docile, socially anxious group," Glaser says. "They were never mean." If anything, she explains, "It was another woman who made my few first years of comedy the hardest. Saying that I had slept with comics for stage time and material. I was a virgin at the time. It was straight out of Mean Girls."
...
Yet as the show embraces an agenda of social progress through laughter, there are those that have taken offense to the show's exclusionary title. Mikey Manker, a Chicago comedian with St. Louis roots, was taken aback when he passed a poster for the show last month.

"I had gone on this rant about how I was tired of seeing straight white men in comedy falling into this stigma that we are nuisance and we all dress the same, and talk about the same things on stage," Manker said. "I understand the need for diversity. And I get that white men have dominated the standup scene for a long time. But that's not our fault."
...
"I think comedy is a powerful means for social transformation because it hits on a different level," he says. "I think women's voices are important and need to be heard, and we need to remove the stigma that feminists can't have a sense of humor. Also, I think racial and gender stereotyping is generally weak comedy and No Straight White Guys helps make people more conscious of this fact. I think when/if we lived in a post-sexist, post-racist, world, NSWG wouldn't make any sense."'

Colleges with buildings named after ‘white, heterosexual, upper class males’ deemed offensive

Mastodon · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The College Fix thought it had uncovered all of the most ridiculous microaggressions leftist minds had drummed up.

What, with declaring “America is the land of opportunity,” “There is only one race, the human race,” “America is a melting pot” and “Everyone can succeed in this society if they work hard enough” offensive microaggressions – that’s a hard list to top.

Yet, never underestimate a liberal’s ability to see racism where there is none.

A University of Missouri list of so-called “environmental microaggressions” cites one example as “a college or university with buildings that are all named after white, heterosexual, upper class males.”'

Sorry, Buzz Aldrin, The Moon Landing Was Just ‘Cosmic Manspreading’

Mastodon · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'American hero Buzz Aldrin came under fire today from prominent feminist Linda Thump, who claimed that the astronaut’s pride about being the second person to walk on the moon was little more than “cissexist white male privilege.”

Speaking on Twitter, Thump said Aldrin’s “constant braggadocio and toxic masculine preening” was the worst example of sexist ignorance in the sciences today. “I mean why would we even want to go to the moon? Have you SEEN how white that thing is? Why not focus on Mars as a testament to the brave struggles of the indigenous American peoples.”

“Are we even sure he went there? I read online that the whole thing was probably faked anyway, and it wouldn’t surprise me to learn that the patriarchal Establishment is seeking to consolidate its chokehold on women with fabrications and frauds,” she explained. “As any gender studies major can tell you, scientific progress is an illusion invented by sexist pigs to keep women down.”

“I’m sure Buzz thinks landing on the moon was some kind of ‘scientific accomplishment,’” she continued, “But all it really demonstrates is how far women still have to go to achieve real equality.”'

U.S. State Dept.: "WiSci Camp for Girls Begins in Rwanda"

Minuteman · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'The first-ever WiSci Girls STEAM Camp begins tomorrow, July 25, at the Gashora Girls Academy in Rwanda. The camp is a public-private partnership designed to advance and expand Science, Technology, Engineering, Arts, and Mathematics (STEAM) opportunities for girls. The program will empower participants with the knowledge and skillset to enhance their competitiveness during a time of rapid technological development, by providing them with access to high-tech resources, like-minded peers, business connections, and inspiring mentors.

Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues Catherine Russell will travel to Rwanda for the opening ceremony of the camp, and will be joined by Ambassador to Rwanda Erica Barks-Ruggles and Rwandan Minister of Education Dr. Papias Musafiri.
...
This first-of-its-kind program is organized by the U.S. Department of State, Microsoft 4Afrika, Intel, AOL Charitable Foundation, the United Nations Foundation's Girl Up campaign, and the Rwanda Girls Initiative, with support from Meridian International Center, the Rwandan Ministry of Education, the African Leadership Academy, and the Global Entrepreneurship Network. Additional programmatic support was contributed by UNESCO, HeHe Labs, and Indego Africa.'

U.S. State Dept.: "Remarks at the 2015 Global Entrepreneurship Summit Youth + Women Event"

Minuteman · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'I'm also here to talk to the investors and government officials, who in many ways are critical to entrepreneurship and growth. My message to them is simple: don't let outdated perceptions get in the way of a good business investment. Because at the end of the day, that's bad for business. That's one of the many reasons why the United States cares about promoting these entrepreneurs who are all too often overlooked or underserved.

But today isn't only about bottom lines for investors and businesses. It's also about better lives for individuals and societies. As business owners in your communities, you help create jobs. These jobs create stable communities. And these stable communities contribute to global peace and prosperity.

...

President Obama's words illustrate our fundamental belief that entrepreneurship has a tremendous capacity to change the world. And we're proud to support women and young people, with initiatives like regional networks, programs, exchanges, and more. For example, our African Women's Entrepreneurship Program is a platform for programs to connect women to credit and build their capacity. And, through wPower, we work with women entrepreneurs in clean energy. Women right here in Nairobi are building a market for clean energy technologies to both lift women out of poverty and address climate change.

...

Yet the artisan sector is often ignored or overlooked. That's why the State Department developed a global partnership called the Alliance for Artisan Enterprise. The Alliance works to promote, connect, and expand opportunities for the artisan sector. This September, the Alliance will begin a global campaign to tell the story of artisans—and we want you to be a part of it.'

The Effort To Stop Campus Rape Is Finally Starting To Focus On High Schools

Mastodon · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Girls cannot prevent rape through purity pledges alone," said Mary Koss, a University of Arizona professor and longtime sexual violence researcher. "Boys must stop imposing sexual acts on unwilling partners. Rape reduction requires a comprehensive approach of which accurate knowledge, communication skills and understanding healthy relationships [are] clearly a part."

The activists responsible for pushing campus sexual assault into the national spotlight have said they want affirmative consent taught in K-12 schools, and California is currently considering legislation to make it required in high school sex ed programs.

California's bill is unusual in that it would require schools to teach students about what constitutes consent. Most state laws are more vague and refer to programming around "healthy relationships" or "coerced sex."

Sex ed material that focuses on sexual violence would have to be "age-appropriate" and "must also be culturally and linguistically appropriate," the Teach Safe Relationships Act stipulates.'

Good consent double-standard graphic

Matt · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From the world of Facebook, here it is. Feel free to distribute it far and wide. :)

The Left Versus The Internet

Mastodon · 26 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Rep. Kathleen Clark (D-Massachusetts), in a fit of #Gamergate derangement syndrome, has introduced a bill to spend taxpayer money to turn the Federal Bureau of Investigation into a Twitter banhammer for Left-wing feminist campaigners. Hollywood—arguably the Left's most treasured constituency—reacted with apoplectic rage at Redditors who exposed the nude photos of Hollywood starlets, almost as if sacred icons had been besmirched. Some even accused those who viewed the photos of virtual rape, which I suppose is bad news not just for Reddit, but for Hustler Magazine and the entire paparazzi.

...

Instead, now it is the Left that is ossifying. When confronted by social science and investigative journalism that eviscerates the hysteria over "rape culture," the Left retreats into dogmatism. As IQ denialism increasingly looks, to paraphrase the liberal social psychologist Jonathan Haidt, as credible in social science as young earth creationism is in biology, left-wing sociologists cry "racism" and let slip the dogs of war. Rather than debate critics of their increasing turn toward melodramatic paranoia honestly in open court, now dissent is dealt with via Argumentum Ad Title IX. Indeed, any criticism of a left-wing cause, no matter how silly, is often simply met with shrill assertion that one is "on the wrong side of history."'

"To Hold Women Back, Keep Treating Them Like Men"

Mastodon · 26 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Are men and women different? While almost every executive I have ever met, anywhere in the world, says yes, most diversity policies are designed as if the answer were no.

Last week, the Global Head of Diversity of a leading professional services firm told me that she “didn’t want to be treated differently.” That, I answered, is why most professional services firms are still hovering well below the 20% female partner level. As long as men and women are treated exactly the same by organizations, most women will continue to be shut out of senior roles.

And yet for the past 30 years, managers have been taught to do just this: treat men and women exactly the same. That is considered the progressive thing to do. Any suggestion of difference was, and often still is, labelled a bias or a stereotype, especially by many women, eager to demonstrate that they are one of the guys, or the in-group.

The business world’s denial of differences hurts women, and excludes them in a myriad of ways – consciously and unconsciously – from leadership. Because differences are not recognized, women are too often simply judged as “not fitting” the dominant group’s systems, styles and patterns. There were good reasons for pushing “sameness” in the past, and the laws of many countries underlie today’s companies’ insistence on similar treatment – being treated the same is, after all, better than being treated worse. But today, those are not our only options. It’s time for companies to adapt to women – or watch them walk out the door to competitors who will. In all the companies I work with, lack of recognition of basic differences like career cycles, communication styles, or attitudes to power is enough to eliminate one gender and prefer the other.'

A major push to counter paternity fraud is the need of the hour

Kaka81k · 26 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video report on YouTube here. This story is old but sets the tone for the future. Description:

'Published on Jun 25, 2014 - Carnell Smith is the International Expert Spokesman on Paternity Fraud, Family Law and DNA testing issues. Smith is a Strategist, Coach, Advocate, Speaker and frequent contributor to TV, radio, newspapers, magazines and film projects Worldwide. See www.CarnellSmith.com'

UK: Police stand down after rape allegation confirmed to be false

Mastodon · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt

'POLICE investigating a reported rape in the Kenilworth Road area of Billingham have been stood down after a woman confirmed that her earlier rape report was a false allegation.

A 32-year-old man arrested in connection with the allegation has been released from police custody with no further action.

Cleveland Police said there will be no ongoing police involvement and officers are no longer appealing for witnesses.'

On men's rights, from India and Pakistan

mcp · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A surprisingly candid story about the invisible problem of violence against men in a mainstream paper, the Times of India (even though the tile has a question mark). Also, an open letter to feminists by a Pakistani female journalist reminding them that "anti-feminist" is not equal to "anti-women". The Indian subcontinent is slowly but surely taking on feminist hypocrisy.

Senate Plans One-Sided Sexual Assault Panel

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The U.S. Senate is planning a hearing Wednesday on the issue of campus sexual assault. Not invited: advocates of due process rights for the accused, or anybody else who is likely to question the narrative that campuses are rife with “rape culture.”

The hearing, being held by the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions (HELP), includes two whole panels on the topic of “Combating Campus Sexual Assault.” The first panel consists entirely of four U.S. Sens.: Claire McCaskill of Missouri, Dean Heller of Nevada, Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire, and Kirsten Gillibrand of New York. The four senators are all co-sponsors of the Campus Accountability and Safety Act (CASA), a proposed bill designed to deploy the power of the federal government against campus rape.
...
Senators backing the bill have often been evasive on the topic of due process, and Gillibrand has even been dismissive on the topic, saying reduced due process and lower standards of proof in campus sexual assault cases are fine “because you’re not throwing someone in jail,” as she said at a Washington Post panel in June. All four of those testifying have repeated the claim that one in five women have been sexually assaulted in college, although there are many reasons to be wary of that figure.'

‘Enough IS enough': Colleges don’t need more sex-assault legislation

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Earlier this month, New York Governor Andrew Cuomo signed the “Enough Is Enough” legislation, which aims to increase protections against sexual assault on college campuses statewide. While there is a lot that is good in the new law, I remain very concerned about the broader implications of state-by-state legislation to address sexual assault—particularly as the District of Columbia takes up its own legislation—and find Governor Cuomo’s comments about the reasons for advancing the law quite flawed.

Cuomo asserted at the bill signing that campuses have not previously acknowledged issues like domestic violence and campus sexual assault and that institutions are putting their reputations before the needs of their students.

Cuomo is flat-out wrong.

Advancing half-truths and twisting statistics for political gain does nothing to prevent incidents of sexual assault, help victims or make campuses stronger. Public and private college and university administrators, advocates and other experts are working together proactively and students are safer now than they have ever been.'

'Yes mean yes' policies endorse discriminatory enforcement, says lawyer

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Not only will students ignore new rules regarding how to have sex, but those rules also promote "discriminatory enforcement," according to author and lawyer Wendy Kaminer.

Kaminer, in a new op-ed for the Boston Globe, reminds readers that just two decades ago, the notion that students need to follow a strict question-and-answer session template for each sexual encounter was mocked by "Saturday Night Live."

"These days, no one's laughing," Kaminer wrote.

Kaminer is quick to point out that there is nothing wrong with teaching students about consent, but cautions against the "yes means yes" approach of imposing such teachings as "quasi-criminal laws on campus" that pose "serious risks of expulsion to students accused of not obtaining consent for every move or for acting on mistaken impressions of implied consent."'

News at the International AIDS Society conference in Vancouver draws out genital mutilation critics

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the (very frank) stories I posted from the International AIDS Society conference in Vancouver last week pertained to a device used by nurses to circumcise men in Africa. The story (which you can link to here or read below) drew plenty of feedback, mostly from those in the circumcision-is-mutilation camp.

Some commenters doubt the validity of research showing that medical circumcision cuts the risk of HIV/AIDS transmission in heterosexual males. However, randomized, controlled studies like this and this (among others) have been done and the World Health Organization has based its recommendations on such research. This is an excerpt from WHO:'

UK: Equality workshops teach boys to be empowered, not ashamed

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It’s long been recognised that the teenage years are a particularly troubling time. During these formative years, young adults become more engaged in the external and online world; the nature of their relationship with the opposite sex – and their own – changes, all while they are striving to find their own identity.

To help teenagers navigate this difficult period, a series of workshops are offered around the country by various different organisations. As the manager of the Great Men project, which runs participant-led activities in schools to help teenagers explore the expectations placed upon boys and girls, it's a landscape I know well. So I was disappointed to read Dan Bell's article on these pages earlier this week, in which he argued that workshops such as the ones we run seek to make boys feel ashamed and guilty about their gender.
...
Our male volunteer workshop facilitators are specially trained to ensure they encourage free discussion and not to put across their own agenda or views. Using external facilitators such as ours allows boys to speak more openly about the sensitive issues they are considering, and to think about how they will react, free from fear or lecture. Issues discussed at our workshops include: sexual consent; healthy relationships; homophobia; violence; porn; the influence of the media; and male mental health and suicide.'

In the Tim Hunt Affair, Where Have All the Grown-Ups Gone?

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Regarding the colossal farce of the Tim Hunt affair, about which I wrote previously on this site, more remains to be said about the doubling down of Hunt's dissembling critics and delators. Connie St. Louis, his principal and most effective accuser, whose pre-redacted CV has now been rumbled as a document full of misrepresentations and "downright falsehoods," is unrepentant about the snuff job she helped foment. Berating Hunt for sexism and old-boyism while bowdlerizing his text and excerpting only the "problematic" portion of his pre-luncheon toast, she essentially reverse-triggered the larger context of his speech. In this way she tampered with evidence in order to convict her prey.

For this piece of skullduggery, she suffered no qualms of conscience. "I've no regrets about breaking a journalistic story," she boasted.

In fact, her story has nothing to do with journalism as we once knew it. It is a journalism so yellow and speckled it resembles a rancid banana. Of course, if she is referring to contemporary journalism, then she is spot on, for most mainstream reporting in our day is little more than a vast propaganda and indoctrination mill serving the progressivist cause. In a fair milieu, it is not Hunt but St. Louis who should be drummed out of her profession and summarily dismissed from her teaching post. If I were Tim Hunt, I would immediately retain a pitbull lawyer and sue for malfeasance, libel, and defamation of character.'

Current and Past SOCOM Commanders Split on Women in Combat

Mastodon · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

The current and former heads of U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) split last week on lifting the restrictions on women in combat in special operations and throughout the military.
...
In a separate panel at Aspen, retired Adm. Eric Olson, SOCOM commander from 2007 to 2011, said that the military and the nation must look beyond standards in making the decision and view women in combat in another context.

"I think that we are only having part of the discussion on women in combat," Olson said in a separate panel discussion at Aspen. "I think that we need to ask ourselves as a society if we are willing to put women in front-line combat units to take the first bullet on target."

Olson continued: "Are we willing to cause every 18-year-old girl to sign up for selective service? Are we willing to cause women to serve in infantry units against their will as we do men?"

"About 30 percent of infantry units are men who didn't volunteer to be in front-line combat, and if we are willing to order women into combat -- not just let them volunteer for it -- then that is an entirely different discussion."'

SAVE E-lert: HELP Us Stop HELP Immediately

Matt · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The U.S. Senate HELP Committee will be holding a one-sided hearing tomorrow, July 29th, to discuss the Campus Accountability and Safety Act (CASA).

This bill does nothing to protect the due process rights of accused students OR get campus sexual assault cases back in the hands of criminal justice experts.

Help us contact the HELP Senators and tell them to vote against this bill before it leaves the higher education committee. This will be the best way to stop CASA.

Find the HELP Senators here to contact the whole list.

Make sure to call Chairman Lamar Alexander's office at (202) 224-4944 and Ranking Member Patty Murray's office at (202) 224-2621!

Tell the Senators to vote against CASA and to protect due process!

Very truly yours,

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

No more campus sexual assault legislation, begs national group of college administrators

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Colleges don't need any more sexual assault laws or policies, says Kevin Kruger, president of NASPA — Student Affairs Administrators in Higher Education.

I would only disagree in that legislation might be needed to guarantee basic due process rights to students who are accused — sadly, the current campus culture ignores such constitutional rights.

Kruger, in an op-ed for the Washington Post, has taken issue with the notion that colleges were not previously taking campus sexual assault seriously.

"Advancing half-truths and twisting statistics for political gain does nothing to prevent incidents of sexual assault, help victims or make campuses stronger," Kruger wrote. "Public and private college and university administrators, advocates and other experts are working together proactively and students are safer now than they have ever been."'

How an Influential Campus Rape Study Skewed the Debate

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The public debate over the extent and causes of the campus sexual assault crisis is fraught with misleading information. The previously acclaimed work of psychologist David Lisak deserves that distinction as well.

The federal government, universities, and members of Congress have all used Lisak's theories to justify rape adjudication policies that are biased against accused students. They should reconsider those policies in light of new discoveries about the inapplicability of Lisak's work.

Lisak has cultivated a reputation as one of the nation's foremost authorities on sexual assault, and his thinking undergirds the most vexingly anti-due process policies currently mandated by the Education Department's Office for Civil Rights. His authority on the subject is so uncontested that even critics of draconian anti-rape policies feel obligated to grapple with his assertions, according to Slate's Emily Yoffe, who described Lisak's work as foundational "in the movement to curb campus sexual assault."'

Campus serial rapist survey debunked

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the most widely cited and uncritically questioned surveys on campus sexual assault has just unraveled.

No, it's not yet another 1-in-5 study, which purports to show that one in five women are victims of sexual assault in college. This one claims to show that the majority of campus rapes were perpetrated by a small number of repeat offenders. The study, authored by David Lisak, was first questioned last year by Slate's Emily Yoffe, who pointed out that the study's respondents were not limited to college students and couldn't be used as a representative sample of national college students.

Now, Reason contributor Linda M. LeFauve takes an incredibly detailed look at just how flawed Lisak's study truly is.

The most damning evidence LeFauve presents is that Lisak's study — which has since been used to claim that students accused of campus sexual assault are probably potential serial rapists — had nothing to do with campus sexual assault.'

Federal Government Requires Peering Through Students' Bedroom Windows

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Just when did sexual conduct, not involving the crossing of state lines, become a concern of the federal government?

And what business do colleges have in passing judgment on whether adult students have observed proper sexual etiquette?

A petition for writ of mandate filed in Los Angeles Superior Court on June 29 prompts these questions—though these aren't issues in the case. Los Angeles Superior Court Judge James Chalfant will be asked to decide whether Occidental College breached the "fundamental vested rights" of a 20-year-old male student who performed oral sex on a 20-year-old female student, not ceasing in response to an ambiguous utterance on her part that arguably constituted a directive to stop—and was expelled.

According to the petition, drafted by attorney Mark M. Hathaway of Werksmann, Jackson, Hathaway and Quinn, petitioner "John Doe" (a false name, in this instance justified) "continued performing oral sex" on a classmate "after she said, 'Wait, I haven't shaved.' " He thought she was concerned that "he might not want to continue performing oral sex because she hadn't shaved," evoking his response, "I don't mind, it's ok," the pleading recites. It adds that "the female student put her hand on his head and moved or pushed his head while he was giving her oral sex."

The college determined that this was "sexual misconduct" because, Hathaway recites, it viewed the female's utterance as signaling "a withdrawal of consent due to hesitancy or uncertainty."

Moreover, the college found, there was a "sexual assault" because the male engaged "in sexual intercourse without first obtaining verbal consent from the female student and relying instead upon non-verbal indications of consent, stopping when the female student said, 'Ow, That hurts.'"'

UK: Woman given 'strong words of advice' after false rape claim - but will not be charged

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A woman who made a false rape claim will not be charged, police said today.

The woman has now been given “strong words of advice” by officers after it emerged the incident never happened.

She told police she was sexually assaulted on Kenilworth Road in Billingham yesterday.

But Cleveland Police has decided against bringing criminal charges against her.

A spokeswoman said today: “The woman has been given strong words of advice by police for her actions.”

Police appealed for witnesses to the ‘incident’ after the woman claimed she was attacked in the early hours of yesterday.

A 32-year-old man was arrested but was released with no further action to be taken.'

Senators Address Sexual Assaults on College Campuses, Propose Legislation

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Kirsten Gillibrand and Patty Murray were among a group of senators speaking before a committee Wednesday on ways to deal with sexual assaults on university campuses.

Sen. Murray, D-Wash, said the issue impacts a huge number of college students.

"The harsh reality is that one out of five women is sexually assaulted in college, and men as well," she said.

As far as the perpetrators, Sen. Gillibrand, D-N.Y., argued that colleges have allowed many to stay on campus.

"They'll routinely kick you out if you cheat on a test, but the statistics for students who have violated other students, who have sexually assaulted or raped them and found responsible show that only one-third are actually expelled for the crime," Gillibrand said.'

Do students get a fair hearing? An effort to change how colleges handle sexual assaults

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As heated debate continues over how to handle allegations of sexual assault on college campuses, another bill is about to be thrown into the mix – this one most notable for its efforts to ensure students are able to get a fair hearing on campus, and give law enforcement a more prominent role in such cases.

It also could trigger concern from victims' advocates who have long pushed to make it easier for students to report violence, and who point to evidence that students may be hesitant to ask for help if they feel a complaint would automatically trigger a criminal investigation or other harsh sanction.

The House bill, sponsored by Republican Reps. Matt Salmon of Arizona and Pete Sessions and Kay Granger of Texas, is expected to drop Wednesday morning.

That coincides with a Senate hearing Wednesday on a closely-watched bill with bipartisan support which aims to bring more visibility and vigilance to efforts to prevent and adjudicate sexual assault on campus. That bill would require colleges to regularly survey students about sexual violence and publicly report the results, provide a confidential adviser to students who report an incident, and impose fines on schools that don't comply with federal rules.'

Fraternity & Sorority Political Action Committee (FSPAC) applauds introduction of The SAFE CAMPUS Act

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The SAFE CAMPUS Act, sponsored by Rep. Matt Salmon (R-AZ), Rep. Kay Granger (R-TX), and Rep. Pete Sessions (R-TX), introduces meaningful and much needed reforms to the current system of investigating and adjudicating sexual assault allegations on our nation's college campuses.

"Fraternity and sorority members have been leaders in seeking solutions to the most important issues facing students. Campus safety and preserving a student's constitutional rights on campus are among our top priorities," said FSPAC's Executive Director Kevin O'Neill. "The SAFE CAMPUS Act includes numerous provisions that emphasize improvements in campus safety and engage law enforcement to bring more perpetrators of sexual violence to justice. It enhances the rights of all students in the campus adjudication system and reaffirms the importance of a student's right to be involved with a single-sex campus organization."

The SAFE CAMPUS Act provides rights and protections for everyone on campus. The bill reforms the campus adjudication process to provide all students with due process, increasing transparency and trust in the system. Under SAFE CAMPUS, students affected will have full knowledge of the status of their cases, the charges and evidence, and why decisions were made. The SAFE CAMPUS Act requires that students have access to counsel, are able to cross-examine witnesses, and know the evidence and testimony that is brought against them. It extends due process to student groups on campus so that entire organizations cannot be suspended without cause.'

UC president advises lawmakers on deterring sexual assaults

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'UC President Janet Napolitano told lawmakers that she believes the state's 10 UC campuses are already in voluntary compliance with the key elements that senators have included in the bill. For example, Napolitano says the UC system has established an office at each campus that victims can turn to for help.

Senators asked Napolitano how best to foster a culture of sexual assault prevention.

"It begins with creating that culture from the day they begin on campus and then consistency and persistency throughout the college experience," Napolitano said.'

From 2012: Big Sis Janet Napolitano 'promoted woman with whom she had a 'long relationship' while her female staff tormented male colleagues with 'sexually charged games:

'Homeland Security boss Janet Napolitano is facing a mega lawsuit from an official who claims she gave a less-qualified woman with whom she has a 'long-standing relationship' a job over him.

The suit also accuses Napolitano of turning the department into a female-run 'frat house' where male staffers were routinely humiliated and on the receiving end of 'sexually charged games'.

Napolitano's chief of staff Suzanne Barr repeatedly targeted men because of their gender and once called a male employee's hotel room to use sexually explicit language, the suit claims.'

Hardly any mention of due process at Senate hearing on campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There was little discussion of due process rights in campus adjudications during a Wednesday hearing on campus sexual assault.

As expected, the one-sided hearing of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions committee focused on how to make reporting easier for sexual assault accusers — which is very important — but failed to address the very real problem of false accusations. Typical statements from senators and other panelists consisted of long discussions about providing help for accusers, with a passing statement about ensuring a fair process tacked on at the end.

Most of the senators present — including Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand, Claire McCaskill and Patty Murray – continually referred to accusers as "victims" or "survivors" and the accused as "accused," "alleged perpetrator" or "rapist." This, like the language of the Campus Accountability and Safety Act, imposes a clear bias.'

New House Bill Would Protect Students Accused Of Rape

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A trio of House Republicans have introduced a new bill that seeks to guarantee due process when college students are accused of sexual assault, while also increasing the involvement of law enforcement in such cases.

The Safe Campus Act's three sponsors are Reps. Matt Salmon of Arizona along with Pete Sessions and Kay Granger, both of Texas. All three are Republicans. The bill's release coincides with renewed interest in the U.S. Senate over another bill intended to help prevent campus assaults. (RELATED: Senate Plans One-Sided Sexual Assault Panel)

Wednesday's bill stands out by placing a strong emphasis on implementing due process provisions in campus judicial proceedings, while also trying to get the police more involved, so that colleges aren't seen as the main agents for policing campus sexual assault.'

More due process for students accused of rape in new House bill that would gut disciplinary process

Mastodon · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Senate's Campus Accountability and Safety Act (CASA), which concerns itself mostly with students who allege they were sexually assaulted, has new competition from the House – a bill that would give greater protections to accused students in campus disciplinary proceedings.

In other words, it would completely reverse how schools increasingly run their rape investigations.

The Safe Campus Act was introduced by three Republicans – Reps. Matt Salmon of Arizona and Pete Sessions and Kay Granger of Texas.
...
The bill would also preclude punitive interim measures if an accuser doesn't report the accusation to law enforcement, and allow both parties to hire lawyers "to represent them throughout the process," as FIRE notes. Crucially, it would allow those attorneys to "ask questions in the proceeding, file relevant papers, examine evidence, and examine witnesses."
...
The bill also prevents officials from playing "multiples roles" in the process, such as a "victim counselor" also serving as an investigator; give all parties access to "material evidence" at least a week before a proceeding starts; and importantly, repeal the authority of the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights to order colleges which evidence standard to use (currently the "more-likely-than-not" preponderance standard).

Only North Carolina and North Dakota have statewide protections for accused students along the lines of House bill.

A spokeswoman for SAFER Campus, an advocacy group, told The Washington Post that accused students should essentially have no rights until the campus disciplinary system works perfectly for accusers:

"We are not at a point to analyze 'due process,' when many survivors are publicly shamed on their campuses, when charges against assaulters can be dismissed out of hand by administrators, when an assaulter is allowed to sit across from a survivor and shout down their story."'

Three UVA Grads Sue Rolling Stone Over Retracted Rape Article

Mastodon · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Three members of a University of Virginia fraternity caught up in a firestorm of criticism over a since-retracted Rolling Stone article alleging a sexual assault have filed a lawsuit against the publication and its author.

The three UVA graduates say in the complaint filed in federal court Wednesday that they were humiliated and mocked after they were presumed to be participants in an alleged sexual assault that was the centerpiece of the story.

They were not identified by the since-discredited article, but information in the story led to them being identified online as participants in the alleged attack, the lawsuit claims.

The three men suffered "vicious and hurtful attacks" in the aftermath of the article, the lawsuit says. Online, "plaintiffs' names will forever be associated with the alleged gang rape," the lawsuit claims.'

Also see this story.

Scotland: Campaigners say LibDems must introduce women-only shortlists

Mastodon · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'SCOTTISH Liberal Democrat leader Willie Rennie has been urged to introduce women-only shortlists for parliamentary candidates after his only female MSP was ousted from the top of one of his party's regional lists by a male rival.

The move will mean Alison McInnes, the current LibDem MSP for North East Scotland, is unlikely to be re-elected to Holyrood and her seat could be taken by the former MSP Mike Rumbles, who secured top ranking.

McInnes is currently the only female LibDem parliamentarian in Holyrood and Westminster.

Apart from her, the party has four male MSPs and eight male MPs, including Alistair Carmichael. Its only MEP is a woman – Catherine Bearder.

Only one of the party's eight regional lists for next year's

Scottish Parliament elections is headed by a woman.'

Is Male Circumcision A Violation Of Human Rights?

Mastodon · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'While flipping through the WestJet TV lineup on a recent cross-country flight, I reluctantly settled for a popular daytime talk-show (my other options included Days of Our Lives and re-runs of Here Comes Honey Boo Boo), which saw a panel of 4 diversely opinionated women duking it out to see who could make their co-host seem like the bigger idiot. Sigh.

Interestingly, however, the subject they were debating that day happened to be male circumcision, a surprising topic for daytime TV.

Two of the female hosts in particular were taking the stage with polarizing views on the matter. One host saw the medical procedure as a hygienic practice that lowered the risk of disease while the other saw it as an archaic and highly irrelevant surgery.

In the end, the audience was left undecided. I, however, was left with an ignited curiosity about a medical procedure that I had never really taken time to question.

I was impressed by the research the anti-circumcision host had prepared for her debate, and it got me thinking intently about the ethics behind the globally rooted practice.'

Senate Ready to Serve Obama, Marginalize Falsely Accused

Mastodon · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The senate hearings are based around faulty statistics, like the frequently debunked “one in five women on campus are sexually assaulted” myth, and overhyped false accusations like the fabricated UVa rape case. In the Caleb Warner case at the University of North Dakota, the Duke Lacrosse case, and more all over the nation, false accusations bring life-altering consequences to the accused. In the Warner case, the University even upheld his expulsion after police brought charges of filing a false report against the accuser.

In this environment of fraudulent anecdotes and phony statistics, the senate on Wednesday opened discussion on a bill ostensibly designed to curb campus sexual assault, but which is notably devoid of due process rights for the accused. In fact, the bill refers to accusers as “victims,” despite ample evidence that they are often victimizers.

Those testifying before the senate are a veritable who’s who of anti-male, radical feminist social justice warriors, including Janet Napolitano. As president of the University of California, Napolitano –formerly U.S. Secretary for Homeland Security – commissioned a task force to institute a new policy regarding sexual assault on UC campuses. Napolitano’s task force also ignored rights of due process, and exhibited a proclivity toward presumption of guilt with discussions of “affirmative consent” confidentiality for accusers.'

Due-process questions stump witnesses at Senate hearing on campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Gillibrand reinforced traditional gender roles by consistently referring to rape accusers as “she,” and even made an uncredited reference to Columbia rape accuser, activist and porn star Emma Sulkowicz, whom Gillibrand invited to the State of the Union address in January.

...

While AAU supports the “goal” of CASA, it doesn’t want the confidential adviser to have any investigative or reporting role and it sees “potential conflict” with Title IX reporting requirements, Flounlacker said. Collins, who chaired most of the hearing in Alexander’s absence, agreed that “we’re putting schools between a rock and a hard place” on the adviser’s role in CASA.

Napolitano said the advisers would serve as “gatekeepers, not reporters” who must inform the administration of assault allegations. “Survivors need to know what to expect to receive out of a reporting process” as well under CASA, Bolger said.

...

Due process concerns were first raised substantively by Sen. Bill Cassidy, R-La. “I actually know a woman who’s being accused” and “she feels as if she’s not been accorded rights,” he told witnesses. “In our democracy you’re innocent until proven guilty.”

“We’re actually looking into that right now,” Napolitano said of the UC system, implying it wasn’t part of the new framework the school approved last year. The school is weighing “what kind of support do we provide to a respondent in addition to a complainant” and whether it should be the “exact same thing.”'

On Modern Feminism, From A Male Perspective

Mastodon · 31 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A small contingent of women (probably today's feminists) take the same position as other "minorities" that there is a large majority keeping them down. They are playing on political correctness to accomplish certain goals they define improperly as those of women in general. But the concept is false on two levels.

First, it defines women as a class, a mass, a collective. Women are individuals, just as men are. Each woman has a mind, heart, lungs, brain, the capacity to learn, act, and achieve, and the ability to choose her own goals. And, by the way, the 2010 census tells us that women are a majority, not a minority. They comprise 50.8% of the U.S. population.

Second, it defines women's goals as universal. They aren't. Because each woman can define herself as well as decide what to do with her life's energies. Many women become lawyers, doctors, politicians, business owners, technicians, cab drivers, school teachers, IT specialists… (As the King of Siam says in The King and I, "et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.") Lo and behold, some women even choose to be housewives, mothers, homemakers, and matriarchs.

Yes, women have not always received proper treatment in society at large. According to the great historical author Barbara Tuchman, many women in the Middle Ages chose the convent over a marriage in which they would be dominated, often cruelly, by a husband who thought they were chattel. Up until the early 20th century, women did not have the vote. There was a glass ceiling forty or fifty years ago. My wife once told her father she wanted to be an architect. He discouraged her. It was unlikely, he explained, that a woman could be accepted in that profession.

But not anymore. Women are seen in all walks of life and a great many of them are visibly and admirably successful. Ask Condoleeza Rice. Ask Carly Fiorina. I'd say ask Hillary Clinton, but she takes the lying narrative to new heights, as does Michelle Obama, who recently claimed that America had somehow been unfair to her. Sure.'

Opponent of new campus due process bill doesn't hide her contempt for basic rights

Mastodon · 31 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An opponent of a new bill aimed at providing due process rights to students accused of sexual assault disparaged the thought of such constitutional rights because schools "must prioritize the needs of survivors first and foremost."

That's all well and good, but one does not know whether someone is truly a "survivor" unless his or her story can hold up to scrutiny, something deliberately absent from current campus hearings. But that doesn't seem to matter to Sarah Merriman, a spokeswoman for SAFER Campus, who told the Washington Post why she opposes the "Safe Campus Act."

Youthful indiscretion instead of the deliberate violent act that it is, and it is not the survivor's job to 'save' the assaulter from criminal prosecution," Merriman said. "Though there are many college faculty and administrators that have the best interests of their students at heart, SAFER cannot agree that leaving judicial proceedings, and especially the standard of evidence, completely up to the school is best written into law."

The majority of campus sexual assault accusations do not include a "deliberate violent act" of a predator and prey. They are, contrary to Merriman's claims, cases involving alcohol, misunderstood actions and he said/she said situations. "Deliberate violent acts" would be much easier to prosecute, as there would be evidence of such violence. But college cases are far more complex, which is exactly why students need to be able to exercise their due process rights.'

Kangaroo courts on campus: a legal travesty

Mastodon · 31 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, the Guardian published a report on sexual abuse on UK university campuses. It detailed a number of stories involving young women telling university staff members that they had been sexually assaulted, and the staff's allegedly poor response. The staff were accused of 'victim blaming' and minimising the students' complaints. The Guardian suggests that a standardised, country-wide set of guidelines be established for universities when dealing with allegations of sexual assault.

Such a standardised system has a precedent. In the US, alternative tribunals of the kind anticipated by theGuardian report already exist on campuses. American universities have a federal duty under Title IX of the Education Amendments Act of 1972 to prevent sexual harassment and abuse. Today, it is becoming more common in the US to formulate what is known as a 'Title IX complaint' after the police have indicated that there is insufficient evidence to pursue a criminal case. A website set up to offer advice on launching Title IX claims says this procedure can be a useful 'alternative' to pursuing a complaint where the normal requirements of due process cannot be fulfilled. Not surprisingly, these campus tribunals have not turned out well. There have been successful lawsuits against American universities for failing to treat fairly defendants accused of sexual assault. Many defendants have complained of having few due-process rights. Students have been expelled on the basis of weak evidence, only to be cleared later.'

University system spending $1.7 million to study campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new state law and a $1.7 million study aim to make the University of Texas a safer place for students when it comes to sexual assault

The new state law mandates all Texas schools inform students of their sexual assault policy and go over it with them every two years

"It's a long time, it is four years," said UT grad student, Omar Awapara. "It is good to have more than one reminder of that."

University of Texas System is also spending $1.7 million to study sexual assault, harassment and dating violence over the next four years. The study will include things like student surveys and focus groups. They'll also track a select group of students through their four years on campus. University officials say this will be the most in-depth study ever conducted at a college campus.'

Iowa court upholds ruling clearing student of campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An Iowa appeals court has dismissed an appeal from Iowa State University that would have overturned an earlier ruling regarding a campus sexual assault accusation.

In May 2012, Yempabou "Bubu" Palo, an ISU basketball player, was accused of sexually assaulting a fellow student. Palo and another man, Spencer Cruise, had been friends with the accuser — listed in court records as H.B. — since high school. Palo and H.B. had engaged in sexual activities years earlier.

H.B. accused both men of raping her, and Palo was criminally charged with second-degree sexual abuse. But after an investigation — which included the discovery of fabricated evidence — the charges were dropped. H.B. had claimed that the blouse she had worn the night of the alleged attack had been torn during the encounter but that she had lost it. About seven months after the alleged incident, she found the torn blouse, but said she had washed it a week after the event.

A forensic expert determined the blouse had been torn after it was washed. That, along with several inconsistencies in H.B.'s story, led to the charges being dropped against Palo and Cruise. Despite this, ISU conducted its own investigation using a lower standard of evidence. An administrative law judge led the hearing against Palo, but determined the charges to be unfounded.'

DC’s ‘scarlet letter’: a recipe for injustice

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lawmakers in Washington, DC have proposed the idea of having a ‘scarlet letter’ that would permanently mark the transcripts of students who are investigated by campus authorities for sexual misconduct. If they are introduced, these markers would ‘follow [the accused] to new schools [and] into the workforce’.

Considering the Kafkaesque nature of campus sexual-assault proceedings, which infamously lack even the most basic elements of due process, and the vague (not to mention unromantic) definitions of consent that are often used in them, one would think requiring men who are convicted in these tribunals to be branded for life was a recipe for injustice. But that’s not even the worst part.

This scarlet letter wouldn’t just apply to students who are convicted of sexual misconduct, but also to those who ‘try to withdraw from school while under investigation’. You heard right: if a student tries to escape his inquisition, his life will still be ruined. When I forwarded this story to a bleeding-heart-liberal relative of mine, the first thing she said was, ‘Aren’t we in America?’. Apparently, men on college campuses are exempt from exercising the rights all Americans enjoy.

These men’s lives and careers could be put at huge risk, all because of a hysteria around sexual assault on campus that is based on misleading statistics and scaremongering. As with all moral panics, this one is replete with ironies and unintended consequences.'

Database: Lawsuits Against Colleges and Universities Alleging Due Process and Other Violations in Adjudicating Sexual Assault

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On April 4, 2011 the Department of Education issued its disastrous “Dear Colleague” letter to colleges and universities across the United States, requiring administrators who had neither the investigative nor prosecutorial prowess of the criminal justice system to determine the guilt and innocence of students accused of felony sexual assault, and to reach their conclusions independent of whatever the police and courts decide.

Worse – the Department of Education demanded these schools determine guilt via a radically low standard of evidence for sex-assault cases: the “preponderance of evidence” standard. Under this model if an administrator feels that there might be a 50.01% chance that the alleged crime occurred, he/she must find the student guilty (“responsible”) for sexual assault. This is further complicated by the lack of numerous other procedural safeguards and methods of evidentiary examination.

Predictably, a wave of lawsuits soon erupted as young men wrongly accused of sex crimes found themselves hustled through a vague and misshapen adjudication process with slipshod checks and balances and Kafkaesque standards of evidence. This page is dedicated to cataloging their legal challenges against schools which – they allege – have violated their rights to due process, unjustly destroyed their names, deprived them of educational opportunities, and committed various other injustices against them in the name of “just following orders.”

This database exists as a public service to victims, their families, attorneys, advocates, journalists, scholars, and concerned citizens. Because it maintains records of due concerning sexual assault cases in particular (not sexual misconduct in general) sexual harassment cases will not be included in the database at this time; AVFMS will maintaining unpublished records of such cases, however, in the event that the database will be expanded.'

"Campus Sexual Assault Defense" as a legal specialty

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Campus Sexual Assault Defense

If you are a student who has been accused of sexually assaulting another student, please get help quickly.

Too often students who are accused of serious misconduct in a student disciplinary proceeding keep silent, assuming that if they just tell their version of what happened, everything will work out fine.

This is a mistake.

I have represented students in school disciplinary proceedings who have been accused of sexual assault. It is impressive how many resources a university can bring to investigate and discipline its own students.
...
The school's interest is not in being fair. The school is not trying to make sure that the truth comes out. Rather, the school is trying to make sure it protects itself.

The United States Department of Education has told schools that it takes allegations of sexual harassment or sexual assault very seriously. The Department of Education can cut all federal funding to a school – money for federal student loans and money for faculty research – if the school handles a rape complaint in a way that the Department of Education doesn't like.

If a student complains about rape on campus and the school doesn't handle the situation aggressively, the school can be sued, and the Department of Education can start a lengthy, and expensive, investigation of the school.'

Ed. Note: The appearance of this item is not an endorsement of the firm in question. It appears as an example of how quickly the issue of college students needing legal representation in the face of Title IX and "Dear Colleague" letter-inspired kangaroo courtism has arisen.

Anti-domestic violence group apologizes for saying Ray Rice deserves a second chance

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An anti-domestic violence group led by men has apologized for standing up for former Baltimore Ravens star Ray Rice. In an interview with ESPN's Adam Schefter earlier this week, the co-founders of A Call to Men said they "feel strongly about him having the opportunity of having a second chance."

"He's deserving of it," said Tony Porter and Ted Bunch, noting their experience with Rice who they've worked with since November "has been tremendously positive." The two also referred to Rice knocking out his then-fiancee in an Atlantic City casino elevator as a "mistake."

On Thursday, however, the group, rolled back its comments, which the leaders admitted to making "without consulting the community."

"After hearing from so many of you who lead the work of the domestic and sexual violence movement and have supported A Call to Men, as well as our own soul searching, we realize we were wrong to independently endorse Rice's second chance at his football career," Porter and Bunch wrote on the group's Facebook page.

"We also irresponsibly characterized Rice's actions as a 'mistake.' We have worked tirelessly alongside you to educate the public that domestic violence is not a mistake," they continued. "Men's violence against women is a choice rooted in patriarchy and sexism, used to gain power and control over another person.'

This 19-Year-Old Will Spend the Next 25 Years as a Registered Sex Offender

Mastodon · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Zach was arrested last winter after having sex with a girl he met on the dating app “Hot or Not,” who claimed she was 17. But she admitted to police that was a lie. She was really 14.

If he had known she was so young, Zach said, he never would have met her.

“I wouldn't even have gone to her house, like I literally wouldn't have gone to her house at all,” he said.

As a convicted sex offender, the terms of Zach’s probation are incredibly strict. For the next five years, he is forbidden from owning a smart phone or using the Internet. He is not allowed to talk to anyone under age 17, other than immediate family. He is banned from going to any establishment that serves alcohol and he has to be home before 8 p.m. every night.

“They make me out to be a monster,” Zach said. “I can't even look at life regularly.”

His parents say his punishment is cruel and unusual, and they are waging a very public fight, even setting up a Facebook page, hoping to rally support for their son.

Zach graduated high school just last year. Like many teens, he turned to his smart phone to find a date one night. He says he was on the dating app “Hot or Not” for about a week when he started talking to the 14-year-old.
...
“[She] was actually the first person I had met up with or anything from that,” Zach said. “I had asked her when we were messaging. I said, ‘How old are you?’ And then she had told me 17... I just got out of high school. So it's two years difference. I didn't think that was a big deal or anything.”'

SAVE: Safe Campus Act summary

Matt · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

SAVE has a summary of the Safe Campuses Act here. Excerpt:

'The Safe Campus Act was introduced on July 29, 2015 in the U.S. House of Representatives. The Act provides a Safe Harbor to a college that follows the provisions of the Act from being sanctioned by the Department of Education for not following policies of the Office for Civil Rights such as the 2011 Dear Colleague Letter. The complete text of the Safe Campus Act can be seen HERE.

The Safe Campus Act delineates a series of procedures and protections designed to balance the interests of the alleged victim and the accused student:'

There's Nothing Academic About Campus Rape

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"The price of a college education should never be the risk of a sexual assault," Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, D-N.Y., told a Senate hearing Wednesday. Too many colleges don't treat rape, she observed, as "the violent felony that it actually is." Her solution is the bipartisan Campus Accountability and Safety Act, or CASA, which would require college campuses to designate confidential advisers to victims of sexual assault and establish rules for campus investigations of sexual assaults.

Gillibrand means well; there's no question about it. But Congress telling American universities how they should handle campus rape truly is an instance of the blind leading the blind. If the goal is to treat campus rape as the violent felony it is, don't expect deans and assistant deans to conduct investigations -- unless you want to over-politicize the process. If you want to treat rape as a crime, leave assault investigations to the police.'

Court Affirms Conviction, Sentence In False Rape Case

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Michigan appeals court has upheld the conviction and sentence of a woman who was charged with falsely accusing two men of rape in the Port Huron area.

It's one of two cases that have put Sara Ylen, now 40, in prison. In another case, she tricked an insurance company and generous donors into believing she was dying of cancer.

In a decision Friday, the appeals court says a judge made no errors last year in sending Ylen to prison for at least five years. She was convicted of lying about being attacked in her Lexington home in 2012. She was also convicted of tampering with evidence after police said she used makeup to create what looked like bruises. She did not testify in her own defense.

Ylen's story resembled a "cheap novel," prosecutor Suzette Samuels told jurors. "She's lying through her teeth. … This was unreal."

Attorneys opine on campus sexual assault processes

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'So if the student is found responsible for sexual misconduct when he's 19, then applies for a job that requires his transcript 30 years later when he's married with two children, his transcript would still mark him as a rapist. One would hope that an employer would care a lot less 30 years later, but that company will surely have a concern about its own liability for sexual harassment from that employee. This transcript note could effectively end a person's career before it even starts.

If these transcript notes came in an unambiguous area of the law where the processes were full and fair, this scarlet letter may not be troubling. It's also ironic that these laws are being proposed at the same time President Obama is urging companies to hire people who were convicted in real courts of real crimes. There is a legitimate question about how long a person's past should haunt his future.

But campus sexual assault cases are not unambiguous, and the procedures in these cases are not fair.'

Study: Girls do better in school when taught by women

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sorry, boys, but the news only gets worse.

Across the board, data show that women are better students than men. From test scores to college graduation rates, females outperform males in almost every metric of educational achievement.

Now, two economists from Texas A&M University report that schoolgirls do even better than their male counterparts when they are taught by female teachers. Specifically, the authors found a significant change in female test scores in math—long considered the last bastion of male educational dominance—when taught by a woman instead of a man.'

Judge refuses to terminate parental rights falsely-accused father

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A major victory for a family from Brighton, torn apart by what they say were false allegations of child abuse. On Wednesday morning, a judge decided not to terminate the parental rights of baby Naomi's father, Joshua Burns.

"The court does find by a preponderance of evidence that it is not child's best interests to terminate the respondent father's parental rights," said Livingston County Probate Judge Miriam Cavanaugh.

Burns broke down in tears, with his wife Brenda next to him. Both were crying with relief.

"Naomi's mother does not support termination, does not believe it is in her best interest, but rather will be a profound loss for her, and this court agrees," said Judge Cavanaugh.'

Guess Which Mass Murderers Came From A Fatherless Home

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As more information slowly seeps out about Dylann Roof, the 21-year-old who murdered nine people at a church in Charleston, South Carolina, one fact should surprise exactly no one: Roof came from a broken home. Roof's parents divorced three years before he was even born, later reuniting just long enough to produce a child who would later become a mass murderer.

The media loves to find an easy scapegoat for mass shootings, whether it be the pharmaceutical industry, the National Rifle Association, or even Donald Trump. Of course these scapegoats are designed to fit the politically correct narrative, and they are an easy sell (especially when it's all Donald Trump's fault, as Americans increasingly love to blame the proverbial 1 percent for their sorrows). Scapegoats serve another purpose, too: they ensure the media can avoid the uncomfortable truth that unstable homes produce unstable individuals.

In the aftermath of tragedies like Charleston or Sandy Hook, Americans hear the shared characteristics of the shooters: typically they are young males whoobtained a gun (duh), used drugs (legally or illegally), dropped out of school, and committed or planned suicide as the grand finale to their murders. But to focus on these characteristics is to focus arbitrarily on the 12 to 24 months before the shooting. It ignores the roots of the problem: the household.'

"Why are men useless in an emotional crisis?"

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Cheer up, it might never happen."

Yes, my best friend really did proffer those priceless words of wisdom as we sat having a drink during one of my periodic lows. The fact that I had been made redundant recently – that it had actually happened! - didn't seem to have occurred to him.

Forget the shame, drop in income, bout of depression and all-round disillusionment, he was implying. What mattered was that a few drinks, reminiscences of teenage escapades and some immature banter would easily rectify things. And he was right – too much introspection does no one any good.
...
We might think we have a higher tolerance of physical pain but, when it comes to emotional pain, we're genetically stunted. It's not that we can't handle it, just that we seem unable to share in others'. We're not indifferent to people's predicaments but our instinctive reaction is selfish: rather than "poor you" we want to say "thank God that didn't happen to me" and then proceed to mistake false cheeriness for empathy.'

'Another boy!' Planned Parenthood Medical Assistant picks through body parts

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The doctor, the MA, and the “buyer” all observe the contents in the pie plate, joking around about various organs they see. Coming across an intact kidney the doctor determines it’s “good to go” as the MA exclaims, “Five stars!”

The sifting continues. The doctor is curious as to any usefulness the brain might have. Before the “buyer” can answer her question, she eagerly asks, “Do people do stuff with eyeballs?” as an eyeball of a tiny baby is pushed around on the plate.

The doctor and the MA continue to huddle over the plate, noting there are lots of organs available, identifying several by name, as Ginde says: “Here’s a stomach, kidney, heart, adrenal. I don’t know what else is in there. Tiny.” The MA says, “I don’t see any legs. Did you see any legs?”

After searching for a few more moments, she finds the legs she was so eagerly looking for and enthusiastically announces: “And another boy!”

I am at a loss for words.'

Canada: Disagreeing with Feminists to be Made Illegal?

Mastodon · 2 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here.

"Disagreeing with feminists on Twitter could be made illegal in Canada in a shocking case that has frightening implications for free speech."

Also see here.

Shut out of sexual-assault hearing, critics of pro-accuser legislation flood Senate committee with testimony

Mastodon · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'At a hearing last week on campus sexual assault, a Senate committee considering changes to higher-education law only allowed certain witnesses to testify – those who believe that alleged victims currentlyget a raw deal in campus investigations, relative to accused students.

The hearing was carried live on C-SPAN and the committee's own Web page, giving a national audience a very skewed impression of a problem that's largely caused by a combustible mix of alcohol, miscommunication and celebrated sexual permissiveness.

It was so tilted that a Democratic senator, the former attorney general of Rhode Island, had to jump in at the last minute, to cast aspersions on the ability of campus administrators to run a system with any semblance of competence or fairness.

Critics of the bill under consideration, the Campus Accountability and Safety Act, had to resort to filing their testimony for the record, away from the cameras. That's probably good for the committee members, because they would have looked like fools if these experts in the law and victimized men had counted down the multiple problems with the bill they were coronating.'

More Evidence The Campus Rape Epidemic Is Overblown

Mastodon · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We've heard it over and over again: rape is epidemic on college campuses, and it's being committed by sociopathic, serial rapists. "This cannot be emphasized enough," says Amanda Marcotte at Slate. "The high rates of campus sexual assault are due mostly to a small percentage of men who assault multiple women."

Al Jazeera reported that serial rapists commit 9 out of 10 campus sexual assaults, citing a 2002 study by psychologist David Lisak. The problem is, Lisak's work has now been debunked. His study, as Linda LeFauve at Reason discovered, is seriously flawed, relying on survey data Lisak didn't collect and having no direct connection to campus sexual assault.

"The basis of Lisak's 13-year old paper was not his own research but data collected as part of one student's master's thesis and three dissertations, none of which were about campus sexual assault," LaFauve writes. "The most widely quoted figures—that 90 percent of campus rapes are committed by serial offenders and that they average six rapes each—were calculated on a total of 76 non-traditional students who were not living on a college campus, and whose offenses may or may not have happened on or near a college campus, may or may not have been perpetrated on other students, and may have happened at any time in the survey respondents' adult lives."'

Campus sexual assault activist: Focus on survivors, not due process

Mastodon · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A victims' advocate who previously voiced her contempt for due process on college campuses is back again, this time writing in the Washington Post that if colleges are "doing what is right" for accusers, then "due process" is not necessary.

In an article titled "College administrators should help rape survivors, not their school's public image," Sarah Merriman, spokeswoman for Students Active for Ending Rape, dismisses the notion that colleges have made strides in addressing campus sexual assault while arguing that due process shouldn't be part of the equation.'

Australia: Women-only police stations proposed to end domestic violence

Mastodon · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If we're serious about ending violence against women, we must trial women-only police stations.

That is the belief of QUT criminologist Professor Kerry Carrington, who is calling for at trial of women-only police stations in Australia to help end violence against women.

Professor Carrington is head of QUT's School of Justice and investigated the key features and different models of women-only police stations in South America earlier this year and said once a woman gets through the doors, she is safe.

...

"Women-only police stations deal exclusively with female victims of domestic violence," Professor Carrington said.

"They do employ male police officers but not on the front desk.

"They are one-stop shops for these women as they are staffed by specially trained female police officers, psychologists, lawyers and social workers."

Professor Carrington said the stations offered women protection, and they did not need to go outside to access other vital services.

"The officers prepare warrants, take testimony, interview suspects, witnesses and complainants, prepare police facts and briefs, and liaise with the prosecution branch," she said.'

Men’s heightened risk of AIDS-related death: the legacy of gendered HIV testing and treatment strategies

Minuteman · 5 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Women are frequently depicted as the face of AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa (SAA) [1–3], where they comprise nearly 58% of all reported HIV infections [4]. Donor dollars, policies and HIV programmes have followed suit, resulting in a near-exclusive focus on women (e.g. [5]). Although African women are represented as particularly vulnerable to HIV infection [6], it is men, not women, who are more likely to die of AIDS [7–9]. AIDS prevalence may have the face of a woman, but AIDS mortality has the face of a man.

...

Much of the literature implicitly blames men for their poor use of testing and treatment, focusing on the role of masculinity as the primary explanation [21,22]. Recent data, however, raise doubt that masculinity is the main culprit. Men are just as likely as nonpregnant women to initiate voluntary counselling and testing (VCT) in some settings [23,24], and once tested positive, men initiate ART at similar rates as women [25,26]. These findings suggest that institutional supply-side barriers, and not solely masculinity, contribute to men’s lower rates of testing and treatment.'

American Bar Association jumps on campus sexual assault bandwagon

Mastodon · 5 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The American Bar Association must see a potential goldmine in campus sexual assault adjudication, as it has recently adopted three resolutions guaranteed to bring in future clients.

At the ABA's annual meeting on Tuesday, delegates passed three resolutions addressing sexual assault. And despite the organization being full of lawyers, due process was only added to one of those resolutions after George Washington University Law School professor Stephen Saltzburg requested it. And even then, it was given only passing reference in the last sentence.

"Further resolved, that the American Bar Association urges federal, state, local, tribal and territorial governments to adopt meaningful remedies and vigorous enforcement mechanisms, including civil remedies, for sexual harassment, sexual assault, stalking, gender-based violence and intimate partner violence, while assuring that the rights of those accused of such acts are recognized, respected and protected; and to fully fund implementation of such remedies and enforcement," the resolution stated. (Emphasis added.)'

Former student accused of rape sues university

Mastodon · 5 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former Clark University student who was allegedly kicked off campus this past spring after being accused of rape is suing the school and several of its administrators, court records show.

The plaintiff, John Doe, claims in the complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Worcester on Tuesday that Clark led a biased inquiry into the charges against him, denying him rights promised in the university's own student handbook and dismissing key phone records that supported his innocence.

Mr. Doe is a Connecticut resident and was a freshman at Clark last year. In a 29-page lawsuit he said he and his accuser had had a consensual sexual encounter in January that the female student reported as a rape to the university three months afterwards. The charge came at a time when an anti-sexual assault campaign on campus "was at its peak," which Mr. Doe claims created an environment prejudiced against males accused of rape.'

This ‘Sexist Air Conditioning’ Interview Has Killed Feminism Forever

Mastodon · 5 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Oh silly season, how I love you. The newspapers are filled with absolute crap, our politicians are ignoring major national issues, because all the decent journalists are on holiday, and our 24-hour news channels have to rely on second string hosts and guests to fill time.

I can only imagine this is how someone like Radhika Sanghani manages to get a spot on Sky News to talk about how air conditioning is… wait for it… sexist.

Oh it was such a beautifully infuriating interview. I laughed, I cried, I vomited a little bit in my mouth. And I hope you will too. Not in my mouth, mind you. In your own.

There is nothing better than watching a trumped up, 14-year-old looking, RadFem make a total prat out of herself on live television.'

‘Sea Slaves’: The Human Misery That Feeds Pets and Livestock

Matt · 5 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Most people trafficked and enslaved today are men. But you wouldn't know that by reading most MSM articles. This one is a rare exception. Excerpt:

'Lang Long’s ordeal began in the back of a truck. After watching his younger siblings go hungry because their family’s rice patch in Cambodia could not provide for everyone, he accepted a trafficker’s offer to travel across the Thai border for a construction job.

It was his chance to start over. But when he arrived, Mr. Long was kept for days by armed men in a room near the port at Samut Prakan, more than a dozen miles southeast of Bangkok. He was then herded with six other migrants up a gangway onto a shoddy wooden ship. It was the start of three brutal years in captivity at sea.

“I cried,” said Mr. Long, 30, recounting how he was resold twice between fishing boats. After repeated escape attempts, one captain shackled him by the neck whenever other boats neared.

Mr. Long’s crews trawled primarily for forage fish, which are small and cheaply priced. Much of this catch comes from the waters off Thailand, where Mr. Long was held, and is sold to the United States, typically for canned cat and dog food or feed for poultry, pigs and farm-raised fish that Americans consume.

The misery endured by Mr. Long, who was eventually rescued by an aid group, is not uncommon in the maritime world. Labor abuse at sea can be so severe that the boys and men who are its victims might as well be captives from a bygone era. In interviews, those who fled recounted horrific violence: the sick cast overboard, the defiant beheaded, the insubordinate sealed for days below deck in a dark, fetid fishing hold.'

How to survive wacky sexual politics on campus

Matt · 6 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Another from Christina Hoff Sommers.

3 Lies That Linger Even After Rolling Stone's UVA Rape Story Was Debunked

Matt · 6 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's been a big week in rape-related news, inasmuch as that counts as a category of news. Donald Trump and his lawyer. Bill Cosby. Now, three men are suing Rolling Stone magazine, claiming that the later-retracted article "A Rape on Campus: A Brutal Assault and Struggle for Justice at UVA" defamed them.

The plaintiffs are members of Phi Kappa Psi, a fraternity the identified in the article. According to the article's pseudonymous "Jackie," seven young men gang-raped her at a Phi Kappa Psi party. The article follows Jackie's alleged attempt to get alleged justice for the alleged crime from UVA administrators.

It turned out that all of those 'alleged's are pretty important. Shortly after Rolling Stone published the piece, skeptics nosing around in the facts discovered that Jackie's story wasn't adding up. (If you need to further get up to speed on the background events, Margaret Hartmann's thorough timeline of the UVA rape case should do the trick.) Soon Rolling Stone retracted the piece.'

Obama calls for end to female genital mutilation in Africa while US has highest rates of male circumcision

Matt · 6 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'During President Obama's recent visit to Africa, he urged Kenyans to reconsider their treatment of females as "second-class citizens," who are routinely subjected to violence, sexual assault and forced marriages while being prohibited from obtaining an education or owning property. What caught my attention, however, is Obama's calling for an end to female genital mutilation, in which he stated, "These traditions may date back centuries. They have no place in the 21st century."

My thoughts exactly. Female genital mutilation (FGM), also known as female genital cutting, involves any number of procedures performed on a female's genitals, ranging from a ritual nick to infibulation, the most well-known and horrific form of FGM. What most people don't know, however, is that infibulation, which includes the complete removal of external female genitalia and a suturing of the vaginal opening, occurs in less than 10 percent of all documented cases of FGM, according to the World Health Organization. By far, more common forms of FGM involve a procedure in which only the female foreskin is removed.

Does this sound familiar? It should, because it's the most common surgical procedure performed in the United States without anesthesia, without informed consent, and without any valid medical reason - except that it's routinely performed on baby boys shortly after birth. Most people in the United States would cringe at the thought of anyone comparing any type of FGM to male circumcision. But the reality is that both procedures share much in common.'

UK: Why are fewer boys going to university?

Mastodon · 6 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A report published last week by the Independent Commission on Fees has uncovered a widening gender divide in university admissions. For whilst over a third of 18-year old girls enrol on a higher education course in Britain, only one quarter of boys follow suit.

So why are fewer male students applying for university courses?

Mary Curnock Cook, the chief executive of UCAS, believes the "potential of young men is somehow being let down by the school system". This suggests that the methods and techniques used to prepare pupils for their GCSEs and A-levels are angled more towards female students, and that schools and sixth forms may not be preparing boys adequately enough for these academic hurdles.'

SAVE E-lert: Get This Bill Passed

Matt · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The time has come.

Thanks to your hard work, a strong due process bill has been introduced to address campus sexual assault. SAVE formally endorses it, and we need your help to get it passed.

The bill is called the Safe Campus Act (H.R. 3403) and was introduced last week by Reps. Matt Salmon, Kay Granger, and Pete Sessions. The bill can be read here.

The bill will pass off most investigations to the police and restore many vital due process protections on campus, such as the right to a lawyer and to cross-examine.

Please contact your legislators today and tell them to co-sponsor the bill.

To reach your representatives, call the Capitol switchboard at (202) 224-3121, or find your U.S. Representative at http://www.house.gov/representatives/find/

Thank you so much!

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Feminism, Lesbianism and the Hidden Consequences of Anti-Male Rhetoric

ErikaLancastor · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I thought this was an interesting little tidbit. Excerpt:

'One of the strange things about feminism is how this movement, built upon hateful slander, has acquired the power to silence its critics. In 1977, when a few dozen women turned out to hear Andrea Dworkin speak in Amherst, it was still possible to oppose feminism on an American university campus. Today, dissenting voices are almost never heard in academia, where feminists exercise the kind of controlling power wielded by the mullahs in Tehran or by Kim Jung Un in Pyongyang.
...
Silencing opposition is necessary to feminism's success in reducing educational opportunities for males. Females are already 57 percent of college enrollment and in some fields, such as psychology, women outnumber males more than 3-to-1. As the percentage of males on campus dwindles, feminists in academia become ever more vehement in their denunciations of male students as rapists and harassers. Colleges now "teach women that men are the enemy and men are treated as such on campus," as Helen Smith explains in her book Men on Strike. "Many men have just decided that they don't belong in college ... more and more men drop out of college or never attend."

Feminist hegemony in academia has fostered an implacable hostility toward males on campus, and perceptive young men recognize feminism as the source of this hatred. The problem is that there are few if any male professors on the faculty of the modern university who are willing to criticize feminist ideology. With no good examples to follow, young men tend to express their opposition to feminism in ways that are crude and inarticulate, transparently motivated by personal resentment. This tendency, in turn, inspires feminists to become even more militant, as when Helen Lewis declared in 2012 that "the comments on any article about feminism justify feminism." Such circular reasoning — that opposition to feminism proves the need for more feminism — points us toward a future of endless hostility, as feminism becomes more and more anti-male, and men become more and more anti-feminist.'

The Campus Sex Scene: How Congress Can Make It Worse

Mastodon · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There are two rival bills in Congress addressing campus sexual assault. A nominally bipartisan bill spearheaded by Democrats Claire McCaskill and Mark Warner focuses on heaping more requirements on schools to turn their disciplinary systems into witch-hunts. Republicans in the House of Representatives, meanwhile, have introduced a bill that tries to balance protecting women from sexual assault with protecting the rights of those who have been accused of this horrible crime.

Right now, absent the case of a star athlete who the school needs for a championship shot, if a school receives a complaint by someone alleging sexual assault it has every incentive to find the male student guilty, regardless of what actually happened.

On the one hand, if the man is found not responsible – perhaps because he didn't actually commit a sexual assault – the school can be sued by the woman, investigated by President Obama's overly aggressive Department of Education, and publicly shamed.

Student expelled for sexual assault is allowed to proceed with his lawsuit

Mastodon · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Unhappy with a campus judicial proceeding that led to his expulsion following a sexual assault allegation, a former Washington and Lee University student will be allowed to contest the finding in a federal courtroom.

The student's lawsuit against the school can go forward, a judge ruled this week.

U.S. District Judge Norman Moon wrote in an opinion that the allegations made in the lawsuit, if "taken as true, suggest that W&L's disciplinary procedures, at least when it comes to charges of sexual misconduct, amount to a practice of railroading accused students."

Identified in court records only as John Doe, the student cited several grounds for his assertion that an internal judicial process slanted to favor female accusers over male defendants resulted in his being wrongfully found to have had nonconsensual sex with a fellow student.

For one thing, he claims, a university administrator who handled the investigation in November recently had given a talk on campus about "regret equals rape," or the argument that what first passes for a consensual sexual experience later can be called a rape by a woman who has second thoughts.'

Malawi: Circumcision Disaster - Malawi HIV Infection Rate Doubles

Mastodon · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Following up the reports that Malawi24 released on 25 July that circumcision does not help in the reduction of HIV but exacerbates it, reports have emerged that have agreed with the facts that we had earlier established.

Medecins Sans Frontieres (MSF), one of the world's renowned NGOs working on public health, has released statistics showing that HIV infection rate in Malawi has doubled in recent years despite a range of interventions put in place to tackle the spread of the virus that have included relentless campaign on condomisation and circumcision.

According to the statistics by MSF, HIV rates have doubled in Malawi moving from 10% to 20% in 1 year. Strangely, this has been the same period that Malawians have been manipulative forced to go through circumcision in masses with the promise that it reduces the contraction of HIV.'

California Green Party Promotes "Free Slaps" For 'Straight White Men'

Matt · 8 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The California Green Party is attracting controversy after posting an image on its official Instagram page which promotes “free slaps” to be metered out to ‘straight white men’.

The photo shows two women sat behind a table which is covered with a banner that reads “Finally! Free Slaps For Cisgendered Straight-identified White Men.” The image is supposedly designed to draw attention to ‘rape culture’, a perennial obsession for feminists and liberals that has been vehemently debunked.
...
The post attracted numerous irate comments, including from one woman who remarked, “Why is it just cis white straight males??? How is that NOT offensive. Are they the only ones (raping). I’m a rape survivor and I hate this.”

“My rapist(s) weren’t just white straight cis males,” she added. “The person who molested me as a child was a woman, the guy who raped me when I was 19 was black.”

“I thought this only existed on tumblr?” commented another individual.”I fully support the Green Party but someone needs to bitch slap these people.”'

The Dean of Sexual Assault

Matt · 8 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'But I found myself thinking, I didn't sign on for this. Unlike professional athletes or musical performers or reality TV stars, people who become deans of students are not usually interested in the spotlight. Our work goes on behind closed doors where the hearts of students are laid bare and need to be repaired, or in campus forums where our students get to question our decisions and we can defend them, or change them. These things happen in the context of community, and that is what provides meaning and validity. That is how change, and improvement, occur.

And now our work is the subject of bloggers and activists who are so driven by agendas that they cannot consider an alternative viewpoint. Our efforts to serve our campuses are being pushed aside by the cottage industry of "consultants" and lawyers who prey on the fear of presidents and boards, worried that their institution will be the next one featured in The New York Times.

Did we need to be challenged about sexual assault response? Yes, and we were, and we worked hard to improve.

Did we need to be better as a profession? Yes. I have never believed I had it all figured out, and don't know any other deans of students who would make that claim. But when swept up in a tidal wave of uncivil and often uninformed opinion offering, unfounded accusations, questionable Title IX complaints and spurious litigation, it is hard to do anything other than keep from drowning. Trying to improve one's stroke at that moment is impossible.'

The Rescue: Chicago mom revels in boys' compassion for injured bird

Mastodon · 9 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"We saved a baby bird!" my oldest son burst out.

"Don't worry, Mrs. Walsh, we didn't actually touch it with our hands," assured a flame-haired pal who shares my obsession with E. coli. "We used stuff in the alley to pick it up."

"It wasn't squished or run over or anything, so we took it to the animal hospital on Western," explained another boy, still incredulous that their mission had been successful and that the animal hospital hadn't turned them away.
...
As the mother of three boys, I remain extremely sensitive to the increasing trend in male-bashing. After all, these are my loves, my life. They are not responsible for releasing a single ill onto the world. They are not predators or instigators of war.

Yet, even I once believed they would walk right past a fallen bird without notice.

Instead?

These boys chose to carry a broken soul to safety in an old beer box.

It makes me wonder what they might do tomorrow if we let them.'

Stop Putting a Stigma on Uncircumcised Cock

Matt · 9 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I didn't realize that having foreskin would make me a pariah. I've met guys, and dated some, who were completely turned off at the thought of an uncircumcised penis. I've heard countless friends over the years say they're grossed out at the thought of discovering their man's penis wears a hoodie with the drawstring pulled out all the way. I wondered: What is so unfathomably vile about uncircumcised peen? I'm a firm proponent of penile hygiene. Mine works just as well as the next dude's. It doesn't scream when you push the skin back. What is it? All these people expressing their disdain for uncut cock are acting like they're going down on someone and finding a Venus fly trap. It made me feel ashamed and embarrassed, and just added to the insurmountable anxiety I get whenever I get intimate with a man. What if the guy I'm about to have sex with takes my pants off and then stop, drop and rolls out of the room?

...

I'm making the decision to not be ashamed of how my penis looks and stop caring if some schmuck I go out with is turned off by it. Taking a step a day, no matter how small, is still a step in the right direction to being comfortable in your own skin and ultimately leading a happier and healthier life. Be good to yourself, and take no shit. ...'

New Campus Rape Bill Offers a Better Way

Matt · 9 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Safe Campus Act seeks to overhaul this system. Under the proposed House bill, colleges and universities would have to report all sexual violence complaints to the police except when the complainant asks for confidentiality—but in that case, no disciplinary action could be taken against the alleged offender. (While the police investigation is pending, colleges would be able to take interim measures such as reassigning dorms or rearranging class schedules to avoid contact between accuser and accused, and briefly suspend the accused if there are safety-related reasons to do so.) While colleges would still hold their own hearings on sexual misconduct, both the accuser and the accused would have the right to legal representation and full access to all the evidence. Colleges would also have more latitude to decide what standard of proof to use in evaluating these cases, in contrast to current federal policy which directs them to use the most complainant-friendly "preponderance of the evidence" standard.

The bill is already being criticized by some victim advocates for failing to "prioritize the needs of survivors" and seeking to "limit college rape investigation." In the past, campus anti-rape activists have opposed state-level measures that would require schools to turn over sexual assault reports to law enforcement, arguing that it will discourage many women from coming forward. Many activists see campus "justice" as a more compassionate, feminist and victim-friendly alternative—an environment in which "believing the survivor" is a strongly held principle, sexual assault is defined more broadly than under the law, and the burden of proof is increasingly shifted to the accused (especially with the rise of the "affirmative consent" standard).'

Judge upholds accused student's gender-bias claim

Matt · 10 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Virginia judge will allow a formerly accused Washington and Lee University student to continue with his lawsuitalleging gender bias against the university.

Judge Norman K. Moon denied W&L's motion to dismiss the lawsuit, allowing John Doe — as he is referred to in the claim — to continue to seek damages resulting from his expulsion from the university. John believes he was wrongly accused of sexual misconduct, and Moon appears to agree.

On Feb. 8, 2014, John and his eventual accuser, Jane Doe, met at an off-campus party. The two danced, talked and kissed.

The two eventually went back to John's residence and talked for awhile. Jane then walked over to John and allegedly told him, "I usually don't have sex with someone I meet on the first night, but you are a really interesting guy." Jane then began kissing John and the two had sex.

The next morning, John drove Jane home and the two exchanged cellphone numbers. Shortly after the encounter, the two became friends on Facebook. The two exchanged friendly messages.

During the summer of 2014, Jane worked at a women's clinic that handled sexual assault issues. After speaking to people there about her encounter with John, she began reclassifying the encounter as sexual assault.

When she returned to campus in the fall, Jane claimed on a study abroad application that she had been sexually assaulted. She also attended a presentation by W&L's Title IX officer Lauren Kozak. Kozak claimed that "regret equals rape," and introduced the concept as a new idea people were now supporting.

Once Jane learned that John had been accepted into the study abroad program, she filed a sexual assault claim, now eight months after the encounter.'

Another Major College Rape Case Has Collapsed

Mastodon · 11 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A state court in Tennessee has ruled in favor of a student expelled for sexual assault, saying his school's procedures improperly assumed he was guilty and forced him to prove his innocence.

The case of Corey Mock and Molly Morris, both students at the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga (UTC), has attracted significant attention thanks to a lengthy profile of Morris that was published by Vice last year. Morris claims she was given a drugged drink at a party, and then was later raped by Mock while she was barely conscious and unable to consent. She complained to her school several months later and got Mock expelled. Mock has aggressively protested his innocence, and his father even started a blog dedicated to his son's case.

Now a Tennessee judge Carol McCoy says the school's reasoning for expelling Mock was fatally flawed, relying on a standard that forced him to prove that he'd obtained consent for sex, rather than forcing his accuser to show he hadn't.'

Judge orders treatment in Parental Alienation case fathers4fairness · 11 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When three Bloomfield Hills kids, caught up in a bitter custody feud, refused to have lunch with their estranged father, a frustrated family court judge found them in contempt and sent them to detention, a move that made national headlines.

Now the judge is poised to try a new — and some say controversial — tack, ordering the family into a days-long intensive intervention, perhaps with live-in therapists.

Oakland County Family Court Judge Lisa Gorcyca is expected to order the Tsimhoni children, ages 14, 10 and 9, into a “reunification program” to help heal their relationship with their father, Omer Tsimhoni. He and the children’s mother, Maya Tsimhoni, divorced in 2011 and have been involved in vicious litigation since.

The mother has physical custody. The father lived in Israel, but has since returned to Michigan, where he is employed as an engineer.

The intensive therapy is designed to treat “parental alienation,” a term coined 20 years ago by a family therapist who noticed some children displayed extreme behaviors in high-conflict divorces, developing unnatural aversions against one parent, the result of the other parent’s attempts to sabotage the relationship.'

Campus Rape Expert Who Misrepresented His Work Faces Powerful New Criticism

Matt · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Dr. Mary Koss—a scientist, feminist, and acclaimed expert on the subject of campus sexual assault—says the psychologist who popularized the serial predator theory of student-on-student violence has misrepresented his research for years.

“It’s one of the most egregious examples of a policy with an inadequate scientific basis that lives on because it offers a simplistic solution,” said Koss, in an interview with Reason.

Her analysis supports the findings of a recent Reasoninvestigative series scrutinizing the work of Dr. David Lisak, a psychologist and former University of Massachusetts-Boston professor whose faulty 2002 study on undetected rapists persuaded advocates, policymakers, and even the White House that most campus rapists are serial predators.

Koss, an American Regents’ Professor in the College of Public Health at the University of Arizona, criticized Lisak for broadening his data and misapplying the serial predator theory to the majority of campus rapists.

Lisak’s 2002 study, “Repeat Rape and Multiple Offending Among Undetected Rapists,” produced the statistics he relied upon to make the claim that most campus rapists were repeat perpetrators rather than one-off offenders. But a detailed investigation spearheaded by Reason contributor Linda LeFauvefound significant flaws with the study, which was actually based upon surveys that had nothing to do with student-on-student violence.'

How 'emotional reasoning' informs current campus sexual assault hysteria

Mastodon · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The notion that one's negative feelings reflect reality is permeating our college campuses when it comes to free speech and sexual assault.

In an informative article for the Atlantic, Foundation for Individual Rights in Education president Greg Lukianoff and social psychologist Jonathan Haidt tackle "The Coddling of the American Mind" — specifically how "microagressions" and "trigger warnings" are leading to mental health problems on college campuses.

While discussing the reality distortions identified by cognitive behavioral therapy, Lukianoff and Haidt invoke the concept of "emotional reasoning," defined by adjunct psychiatric professor David D. Burns as assuming "that your negative emotions necessarily reflect the way things really are: 'I feel it, therefore it must be true.' " The distortion is also defined by other cognitive therapy experts as letting "your feelings guide your interpretation of reality."'

Women-in-tech events are anti-male, say men's rights activists

Mastodon · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Are businesses that cater to women inherently anti-male?

Entrepreneur Stephanie Burns would say no. Burns runs Chic CEO, a startup that hosts networking events and provides online resources for female entrepreneurs.

But three men's rights activists didn't see her services as benevolent. They sued her for being denied entry to an event in San Diego.

The lawsuit cites a California law called the Unruh Civil Rights Act,enacted in 1959, which prohibits businesses from discriminating based on factors such as sex, race, religion and disabilities.

Burns told CNNMoney that men are allowed to attend her events, but that particular one was at capacity. But Chic CEO's promotional materials -- which all catered to women -- were fuel for the lawsuit. The event was described as a "fun, relaxed environment to meet up with entrepreneurs, mompreneurs, CEOs, directors, savvy business women."

Attorney Al Rava, who filed the lawsuit, said he has filed 150 sex discrimination lawsuits against California businesses in the past 12 years.

Rava, who also serves as secretary to men's rights organization National Coalition for Men, declined to talk to CNNMoney by phone. ("I do not trust you will quote me correctly or in the proper context given your leftwing, pro-female, anti-male bias," he wrote in an email.)'

Circumcision Gone Wrong: 8-Day-Old Baby Boy's Penis Reattached After Botched Brit Ceremony

Mastodon · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It sounds like every new parent's worst nightmare when sending their newborn son off to have a circumcision. An 8-day-old baby's penis was reattached after a circumcision went wrong, reports Israel Hayom.

The publication calls the circumcision a brit, which is also termed the "Brit Milah," according to Chabad. It's a ceremony that represents one of the oldest and most revered practices of Judaism — practiced by those of Jewish heritage and also by certain Christians who don't normally term it a "brit" or "bris" ceremony. Either way, circumcision usually only involves foreskin removal and holds a deep spiritual significance for those who view it as more than a surgery to help with genital cleanliness.

The circumcision of the baby in question went wrong and was somehow botched. However, the quick-thinking family was able to save the infant's penis by storing the dismembered member on ice until such time that it could be reattached successfully at the Rambam Healthcare Campus Hospital's Pediatric Emergency Unit.

The cringeworthy event has caused the article about the baby boy out of northern Israel to go viral worldwide, with more than 1,300 Facebook recommendations on the piece thus far.'

Feminism: the latest celebrity must-have

Mastodon · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminism is the new moral orthodoxy: reject it and you are a woman-hater; criticise it and you're confused or ignorant. Despite its supposed focus on women's equality, feminists guard their cliquey politics with such force that it sometimes feels like you're back in school and wearing the wrong shade of pink. When writer and student Lauren Southern posted a picture on social media stating that she was not a feminist, she received an onslaught of hate mail, including messages from women who claimed that her picture had made them so upset they were physically sick.

...

Women who decide to bin the feminist badge are actually making a progressive point. Contemporary feminism is defined by a cult of victimhood, one which demands that women cry on social media about their faux daily oppression at the hands of the opposite sex and beg for the intervention of a protective state. A woman rejecting feminism in all its drippy glory should be celebrated. Young women have it good, and no woman in the UK is born into inequality on the basis of her gender. Problems more significant than catcalling arise later in life, but abortion, motherhood and household chores aren't as easy to hashtag as nipple piercings and tampons.'

Why Any Male Student Should Think Twice Before Applying to Washington & Lee University

Mastodon · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This should terrify any parent whose son is about to head off to college or is presently matriculating anywhere in the Ivory Towers of academia.

The fundamental lack of due process and oppressive tactics used by university administrators at Washington & Lee University (W&L) should lead any family to keep their sons from applying to the university. Male students at Washington & Lee risk serious consequences if they engage in an entirely consensual sexual relationship with a female student who later is convinced to “regret” what she did, or who becomes jealous if the male student starts a relationship with someone else. That is exactly what happened in this case.
...
The facts show that what occurred was not only entirely consensual, but that Jane was more than just a willing participant. Jane continued to go to parties at John’s fraternity, where witnesses saw them interacting in an entirely unremarkable, normal manner. That is, until Jane saw John kissing another female “and left the party early, upset.” It became “public knowledge” that John and this other female “were an exclusive couple.”'

Student Wrongfully Expelled for Rape Triumphs in Court: Due Process Beats 'Yes Means Yes'

Mastodon · 14 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A judge overturned the expulsion of Corey Mock—a University of Tennessee at Chattanooga student and star wrestler—after determining that UT's administration had improperly required Mock to prove that he was innocent of sexually assaulting another student.

The decision is a significant blow to the concept of affirmative consent. According to Judge Carol McCoy, UT's consent standard wrongfully shifted the burden of proof and violated Mock's due process rights.

Mock's expulsion stemmed from a sexual encounter with a fellow student, Molly Morris, during the spring of 2014. Morris and Mock had met online and quickly become friends; they hung out on several occasions and decided to attend a house party together. Morris had too much to drink—someone might have slipped her something, though no evidence established this—and went to the bathroom to be sick. Mock found her, took her to a bedroom, and they had sex.

A week after the incident, Morris told Mock that she had not given consent. Three months later, she formally accused him of raping her.'

UK: "Labour should not be run by two white men"

Mastodon · 14 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Yvette Cooper launched a scathing attack on Labour leadership front-runner Jeremy Corbyn yesterday and claimed the party should no longer be run by ‘white men’.

The Shadow Home Secretary insisted she was the ‘real radical’ and made the case to be Labour’s first woman leader – saying the party needed a ‘feminist approach to our economy and society’.

She hit out at the prospect of ‘a Labour Party after a century of championing equality and diversity which turns the clock back to be led again by a leader and deputy leader, both white men. Who’s the real radical? Jeremy or me?’

Former minister Tom Watson is widely expected to win the deputy leadership under Mr Corbyn.'

University casts straight, white males as ‘villains’ in skits (and other observations from freshman orientation)

Mastodon · 14 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'His public university’s orientation, for example, included “an interactive theater experience focused on diversity and inclusiveness,” comprising “four skits, each addressing a cardinal sin of the liberal perspective—racism, sexism, heterosexism, and class politics,”according to Dent, who detailed his experience in an essay for the Pope Center for Higher Education Policy.

“The skits set forth various scenarios,” Dent notes. “The first showed an Indian woman talking to a white friend, who unintentionally acted racist. In another, a man aggressively flirted with a woman who was clearly uncomfortable. The next skit showed two friends asking another friend of lesser means to go out to lunch and immediately assuming he had the means to do so. The final skit showed a gay man react with offense at the use of the word ‘gay’ as a derogatory term.”

“Instead of showing that all people are equally deserving of human dignity, the theater group created its own caricatures: the ‘villains’ in each of the skits were either white, male, heterosexual, middle class, or some combination of the four,” Dent added. “Perhaps, if the objective had been solely to learn how to navigate a community whose citizens hail from increasingly diverse backgrounds on ethnic, religious, and cultural lines, this exercise would have been helpful, if ham-handed.”'

Prosecutors' Group Backs Changes to College Campus Sexual Assault Investigations

Mastodon · 15 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Jump the paywall by Googling the first paragraph text and click the result that goes to the WSJ site. Excerpt:

'A national prosecutors' group is backing a congressional proposal that would upend the handling of campus sexual assault cases, saying universities need to consult police before adjudicating and punishing potentially criminal offenses.

The National District Attorneys Association said it supports the recently introduced Safe Campus Act, which would require police investigation of sexual assault claims before schools begin disciplinary proceedings against accused students. The mandatory-reporting requirement would be a sea change from the current practice, as schools commonly handle allegations of sexual assault independently.
...
Some backers of the Safe Campus Act say federal rules have put universities in the position of investigating, prosecuting, defending and judging cases. The Fraternity and Sorority Political Action Committee said the University of Virginia wrongfully suspended Greek activities after a Rolling Stone magazine article described an alleged gang rape at a fraternity house. A police investigation later found no evidence of a gang rape and Rolling Stone retracted the article.

"What's becoming clear is that Congress recognizes the status quo is broken," said Kevin O'Neill, the committee's executive director. "Anybody who's defending the status quo is going to be fairly disappointed."

Civil-liberties advocates say mandatory-reporting requirements and the right to legal counsel are a step in the right direction. "At all campuses, there's the question of the competency of campus amateurs to investigate and come up with reasonable findings," said Joseph Cohn, policy director at the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education.'

Daughter hammers elderly mother to death

Matt · 15 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. A dubious first -- first murder in Sunnyvale, CA of 2015. Excerpt:

'An 81-year-old woman was killed with a hammer at the hands of her daughter after an argument Thursday in the Sunnyvale home they shared, police said.

Linde Adrienne Smith, 50, was arrested and booked into the Santa Clara County jail on suspicion of murder after the afternoon slaying at their home in the Plaza del Rey mobile-home park off Tasman Drive and Lawrence Expressway.

Smith was the person who called police around 12:50 p.m. to report what would soon be classified as the city's first homicide of the year, according to the Sunnyvale Department of Public Safety.

Officers arrived, searched their home and made the gruesome discovery: the body of Anne Frances Smith with blunt-force injuries, alongside a hammer that is believed to be the weapon used, Capt. Jeffrey Hunter said.'

Society of Professional Journalists' #GamerGate Debate Suspended By by Bomb Threat

Mastodon · 16 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Society of Professional Journalists' debate on the GamerGate controversy had to be evacuated earlier today after the venue hosting the event was targeted by multiple bomb threats.

Police arrived at the venue shortly after 2pm, interrupting a panel discussing how the media should cover GamerGate, a movement calling for improved standards in video games journalism, as well as other amorphous online movements.

The afternoon panel featured Breitbart editor Milo Yiannopoulos, Reason contributing editor Cathy Young and Christina Hoff Sommers, resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. Also present on the panel were independent game developer Derek Smart, Poynter Institute educator Ren LaFome, and prospective SPJ president Lynn Walsh.

The SPJ event, known as Airplay, aimed to address concerns about journalistic ethics and accurate reporting raised by the GamerGate movement, which began last September after gamers raised questions about ethical standards and groupthink in the games press.

This is the second time a GamerGate event has been targeted by a bomb threat. Earlier this year, a gathering of more than three hundred supporters in Washington DC had to be evacuated after a similar anonymous threat, which proved to be a hoax.'

Conference comments Christina Hoff Sommers planned to make

Mastodon · 16 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This afternoon multiple bomb threats were called in to a Society of Professional Journalists debate about GamerGate. I've been passed the remarks my fellow panellist, AEI scholar and feminist academic Christina Hoff Sommers, was planning to make.

A video game journalist from Vancouver recently took to Twitter to draw attention to a Tweet sent by a gamer: The gamer had tweeted: "I fucking swear—they get rid of Huge Boobs, I'm gone." For this journalist those 11 words captured the essence of the gamer crusade. The hypermasculine dudebro attitude—– the crude objectification of women. It's all there. Or so it seemed to him. As he put it: "#Gamergate summarized in one impossibly perfect tweet."

But as is often the case with media accounts of GamerGate– the facts don't really fit the narrative. First of all, the author was not talking about video games, but rather efforts to censor images of buxom ladies on Reddit. But more importantly—the author of the tweet is a young woman named Alison. Alison is a lesbian gamer who apparently enjoys gazing at images of busty women. For me, it is the game journalist's tweet, not Allison's, that is emblematic. It is an impossibly perfect illustration of a serious flaw in contemporary journalism: the narrative matters more than truth. The Rolling Stone's apocryphal story about a gang rape at UVA is frequently cited as the classic example of narrative over-reach. But the press literature on GamerGate is strikingly similar.

According to dozens of media stories, #Gamergate is a nightmarish cabal of right wing males who will stop at nothing to keep women out of gaming. Comparisons with hate groups, lynch mobs and terrorists are not uncommon. In reality Gamergate has support from hundreds of thousands of rank and file video game enthusiasts from all over the world and across the political spectrum. Gamers identify with GamerGate for different reasons. A recurrent theme is consumerist–gamer journals are toadies for the game companies and need to be replaced by authentic critics, they say. Another—and the one that drew me into the world of gamers—is impatience with cultural scolds who evaluate games through the lens of political correctness. Are there some bullies and lunatics on the fringes of GamerGate? Yes there are. It's the internet.'

Male Students Discriminated Against in Sexual Misconduct Inquiries

Mastodon · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This case arises amidst a growing national controversy about the responses of colleges and universities to alleged sexual violence on college and university campuses.

The Federal Government, through the U.S. Department of Education, has been pressuring colleges and universities to aggressively pursue investigations of sexual violence on campuses under Title IX, the federal civil rights law that prohibits discrimination in education on the basis of gender, and for violations of the Clery Act, which requires all colleges and universities that participate in federal financial aid programs to keep and disclose information about crime on and near their respective campuses. Compliance with reporting sexual violence is monitored by the U.S. Department of Education, which can impose civil penalties for each infraction and can suspend institutions from participating in federal student financial aid programs. The Jeanne Clery Disclosure of Campus Security Policy and Campus Crime Staistics Act or Clery Act is a federal statute codified at 20 U.S.C. §1092(f), with implementing regulations in the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations at 34 C.F.R. 668.46.
...
In this case, Petitioner has not been charged with any crime nor any civil wrong. Occidental College does not serve the public nor the People of the State of California. Occidental College serves its own private financial and institutional interests to protect its right to receive federal education money, and for Occidental College students to have access to federally-guaranteed student loans to pay their tuition to Occidental College, which federal money is at risk due to the pending U.S. Department of Education investigation into Occidental College's conduct.'

New sexual misconduct requirements at the state level and beyond

Mastodon · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Considering campus sexual assault disciplinary issues, courts and legislators are beginning to emphasize due process requirements, including fairness protections for those accused that conceivably contradict protections aimed at preventing sexual violence. In addition to pending federal legislation on campus sexual misconduct, including sexual assault, 29 states have introduced or passed their own bills on the topic; virtually all of this legislation includes some nod to fairness as well as prevention provisions, such as the “yes means yes” laws passed in California and New York. Balancing those due process and complainant protections requires careful navigation of legal requirements.

Three recent cases emphasize potential challenges, with favorable outcomes for student-respondents in California, Tennessee and Virginia.'

Judge Stops University from Expelling Football Player Who Failed to Prove He Wasn't a Rapist

Mastodon · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Bryce Dixon, a football player who was expelled from the University of Southern California for sexual assault, should resume classes and might be able to rejoin the team, a judge has ruled.

On Wednesday, Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Robert H. O'Brien barred USC from carrying out the expulsion on the grounds that the university's sexual assault adjudication process was miserably unfair to accused students.

Bryce's attorney, Mark Hathaway, released the following statement:

"Judge O'Brien agreed with Bryce that USC's Title IX sexual misconduct investigation was unfair and lacks due process." said Mark Hathaway, attorney for Bryce Dixon. "USC's investigator acts as police, prosecutor, and judge. There is no hearing, no right to counsel, no rules of evidence, no presumption of innocence, and no right to confront witnesses. Courts are beginning to recognize the injustice imposed on students."'

Botswana: "Men need to change perceptions"

Minuteman · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Kgosi Tumelo Puleng of Letlhakeng says time is nigh for men to shed their bad boy image of associating with undesirable practices in society and to learn to be more responsible.

Giving welcome remarks at the Kweneng West MenCare graduation ceremony in Letlhakeng on Saturday August 15, Kgosi Puleng said for a long time, men had been associated with societal ills such as abuse, rape, incest as well as drug abuse.

“This is even evidenced by the fact that men’s prisons are always filled to capacity as compared to women’s prisons,” he said. He said men were also known to be slow on issues of sexual reproductive health as well as advocacy for gender equality.

“Such concerns as the reluctance to test for HIV and AIDS as well as unwillingness to participate in initiatives meant to address societal ills like abuse gives the impression that they are the perpetrators. So it is up to men to stand up and clear their image by meaningfully participating in these initiatives,” he said.

Kgosi Puleng also expressed concern about the level of reluctance by men to participate in the safe male circumcision campaign, saying instead women were leading in taking their newly born baby boys for circumcision.

“This programme was specifically designed for men, so it was only our legitimate expectation that men should lead and spearhead its success, but instead, it has been the opposite,” he said.'

How a little-known education office has forced far-reaching changes to campus sex assault investigations

Mastodon · 18 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For the last four years, a little-known civil rights office in the U.S. Department of Education has forced far-reaching changes in how the nation's colleges and universities police, prosecute and punish sexual assaults on campus.

With a strong mandate from President Obama and Vice President Joe Biden, the office's lawyers have redefined campus sexual assault as a federal civil rights issue, changed the standard by which allegations must be judged and publicized the names of a growing number of schools under investigation for allegedly failing to respond properly to complaints of sexual misconduct.

...

"Some schools see OCR as a bully with enforcement powers," said Terry W. Hartle, senior vice president at the American Council on Education, the lobby group for higher education.

"Universities are desperately trying to do the right thing, but these cases can be really difficult to resolve fairly. Often, you have two conflicting stories, no evidence, no witnesses, and it's all combined with substance abuse."

University officials, many of whom will speak about the subject only on condition of anonymity, complain of heavy-handed pressure from Washington and a growing bureaucracy.'

NAS endorses Safe Campus Act

Matt · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The National Association of Scholars (NAS) endorsed the Safe Campus Act, which ensures that campus sexual assault allegations be judged by law enforcement agencies.

When a college student reports being a victim of sexual assault, the college often begins its own inquiry leading to disciplinary procedures. Under the Safe Campus Act, the college may take these steps only if the alleged victim consents to an investigation by law enforcement.

Provisions of the Act are outlined in a diagram at the website of the organization Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE).

The Safe Campus Act, H.R. 3403 (full text here), is an amendment to the Higher Education Act of 1965 currently before the House Committee on Education and the Workforce.

The National Association of Scholars has historically called on colleges to discourage “hook-up culture,” and has declared that “Sexual assault on campus is a serious problem and there is a strong case that colleges and universities should be doing more to protect their students.”'

Male student who claims he was sexually harassed can sue Northwestern for ‘deliberate indifference’

Matt · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Male students can suffer from gender discrimination too, a federal judge ruled in letting a Title IX lawsuit proceed against Northwestern University.

The Daily Northwestern reports that the unnamed medical student is accusing the school of “deliberate indifference” and retaliation against him when he filed a complaint against a microbiology and pathology professor:

"The professor began sexually harassing the student within three months of his July 2007 enrollment in the program, according to the suit. The professor allegedly started “making suggestive comments” about the student’s physical appearance and “ogling” him. At a 2010 off-campus retreat, the professor allegedly invited the student back to his room so he could cut his hair. The suit also claims that the professor asked the student’s peers about the student’s sexual orientation."'

Girl destroys feminism in minutes

Mastodon · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A few years ago, Lauren Southern held up a sign saying "I don't need feminism because I believe in equality".

The image went viral and soon she was getting a lot of attention for the bold statement – some nice and some not so.

"I got a lot of support, but I also got a lot of hate and criticism," she said.

"Mostly from feminists who said I did not know what feminism means, but feminism is actually a movement for equality."

"So today I wanted to speak to those feminists and explain why I'm still not a feminist and why third wave feminism is NOT actually a movement for equality," she added.'

More academic fascism

Mastodon · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As parents prepare to fork over $20,000 to $60,000 for college tuition, they might benefit from knowing what greets their youngsters. Deceitful college officials, who visit high schools to recruit students and talk to parents, conceal the worst of their campus practices. Let's expose some of it.

Christina Hoff Sommers is an avowed feminist and a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. She's spent a lifetime visiting college campuses. Recently, upon her arrival at Oberlin College, Georgetown University and other campuses, trigger warnings were issued asserting, in her words, that her “very presence on campus” was “a form of violence” and that she was threatening students' mental health.

At Oberlin, 30 students and the campus therapy dog retired to a “safe room” with soft music, crayons and coloring books to escape any uncomfortable facts raised by Sommers.

The problem for students and some professors is that Sommers challenges the narrative, with credible statistical facts, that women are living in a violent, paternalistic rape culture. As a result, she has been “excommunicated from the church of campus feminism” in order to protect women from her uncomfortable facts. This prompted Sommers to say, “There's a move to get young women in combat, and yet on our campuses, they are so fragile they can't handle a speaker with dissenting views.”'

Mom killed her three young sons to help her daughter, prosecutor says

Matt · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'But three times was too many, in this town of 13,000, which boasts of being home to the “first concrete street in America.”

Under questioning by police, Brittany Pilkington broke down and confessed to suffocating all three of her sons by putting blankets over their heads, according to the Columbus Dispatch and the AP.

The reason for the alleged murder spree?

She wanted her husband to pay more attention to their daughter, a prosecutor said.

“In her mind, she was protecting her daughter from being not as loved as the boys were by their father,” Logan County prosecutor William Goslee told the Columbus Dispatch.

Brittany Pilkington was charged with three counts of murder and jailed on Tuesday, according to the AP. Her remaining child, Hailey, was taken into custody by a Logan County welfare agency.'

Fathers and Families New York: Pass the Safe Campus Act

Matt · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Petition here. Excerpt:

'Campus sexual assault has recently become the focus of extensive national attention and debate. Up until now, efforts by the government to combat this horrific crime have focused on campus disciplinary committees. Yet most Americans disagree with this approach and instead believe that campus sexual assault is a matter best handled by the criminal justice system—and for good reason. In cases where the accused student is guilty, the most these committees can do in expel someone who really belongs behind bars.

And in cases where the accused student is innocent, critical due process protections guaranteed by the Constitution are missing, running the risk of wrongful expulsion. Indeed, numerous lawsuits have been filed against schools over the last few years by students claiming to have been wrongfully expelled for an offense they did not commit.'

From Penile Cancer To Sexual Pleasure, 6 Little-Known Facts About Your Penis' Foreskin

Matt · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excetpt:

'The foreskin: a highly debated part of the male anatomy that some say is an unnecessary health risk, while others consider it a vital part of the reproductive system. Most Americans choose to have their children circumcised at infancy, forsaking the foreskin to prevent a slew of health problems that some medical professionals warn about. But in recent years, many are finding the benefits of keeping your crusader caped.

While people in most countries around the world choose to keep their sons as they are when they're born, the U.S. has been the leader in performing circumcisions for non-religious reasons. That may soon be a thing of the past, however; according to a 2014 report published in Mayo Clinic Proceedings, circumcision in America is on the decline. Researchers found that instances of circumcision decreased from 83 percent of men in the 1960s to 77 percent of men in 2010. CBS News says that currently, the average percentage of men between the ages of 14 and 59 who are circumcised represent 81 percent of the American population.

So what gives? Why has this trend suddenly been turned on its head? Well, it may be that some scientists are changing their attitudes about circumcision and finding evidence that keeping your manhood fully clothed may be less risky than we previously thought. Here's the truth, as we currently know it, regarding the foreskin.'

Legislation to involve police in campus sexual assault claims gains momentum

Mastodon · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Having law enforcement involved in adjudicating campus assault claims is a key part of federal legislation that gained momentum this week with noteworthy endorsements.

The National Association of Scholars and the National District Attorneys Association have both come out in favor of the Safe Campus Act of 2015, which aims to protect the due process rights of students accused of assault or rape.

The bill comes after dozens of male students in recent years have sued their universities, alleging they were essentially railroaded by campus officials after unsubstantiated and biased sexual assault claims were lodged against them.'

Lack of campus due process could one day help an actual rapist

Mastodon · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Due process for college students has been in the news lately, as judge after judge makes favorable rulings for students accused of sexual assault.

Naturally, those outraged over the supposed epidemic of campus sexual assault claim that due process is an impediment to justice. An accusation is as good as guilt, some activists seemingly believe.

But accused students who feel they have been wrongly vilified are fighting back, by suing the universities that expelled them and treated them as guilty from the start. They're claiming a lack of due process protections.

For instance, most colleges and universities don't allow the accused or accuser to have legal representation (some schools allow a lawyer to sit in but not speak), many schools don't even provide students with an explanation of the charges against them, or allow the accused to cross-examine his accuser. No testimony in campus courts is given under oath, yet the transcripts and evidence can be turned over to police afterward.'

California continues descent into campus sexual assault madness

Mastodon · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Two more bills currently in the California state legislature would aim to address the issue. One would require all of the state's universities – public and private – to disclose what disciplinary actions were taken against students accused of sexual assault. Another bill would require universities to indicate on transcripts when a student cannot re-enroll due to a suspension or expulsion.

Some proponents of the new policies have described campus adjudication of sexual assault as an educational process, rather than a criminal proceeding. That might be true if the consequences of a finding of responsibility weren't as damaging to one's future as a criminal trial.

A student found responsible for campus sexual assault is often branded a rapist in local (and often national) media, his transcript is forever marked and his reputation is forever tarnished. And let's not forget that a finding of responsibility can be achieved on nothing more than an accusation, with exculpatory evidence and witnesses ignored and a complete lack of due process.

An expulsion with a mark on the transcript could keep him from continuing his education. When accused students have been suspended and allowed to return to campus, outrage has sometimes ensued. Colleges are now being pressured simply to expel. Expelled students — again, expelled based on nothing more than an accusation — find it nearly impossible to transfer to another school. Their education is halted, and if they can't afford an attorney to sue the university for wrongful expulsion, their lives are put on hold.

As one male student told Buzzfeed: "At first I thought they didn't want me to participate in campus activities. Then I thought they didn't want me to graduate. Now they don't want me to have a job or be part of society. Do they want me to commit suicide? Is that what they want me to do? What is the endgame?"'

Felony charges for student who admitted she made up sexual-assault claims

Matt · 21 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There are consequences for lying about having been sexually assaulted, but apparently only if the accuser first blames an unnamed stranger.

The University of Arkansas is dealing with its second false report of a student being attacked in a campus parking garage in the past year, The Arkansas Traveler reported:

"Junior Lindsey Sweetin pleaded not guilty to charges of filing a false police report at her arraignment. A court date was scheduled for Aug. 18.

Police said the false report was made March 9 after 20-year-old Sweetin claimed a man she did not know groped her in the Harmon Parking Garage on Feb. 26. Testimony from witnesses and video camera evidence could not support Sweetin's claims. After further investigation, she admitted her claims were false. …

About a year before Sweetin's report, another UA student Julia Garcia,18, filed a complaint that she had been attacked in the Garland Avenue Parking Garage. An investigation that included surveillance videos proved that the events never happened. At court, Garcia pleaded guilty and admitted she made up the story."

Had these students falsely claimed that a sexual encounter with an acquaintance was actually an assault, they almost certainly would not have been punished.
...
Meanwhile, the false accusers whose identities are often shielded by their schools, who have the power to permanently ruin the lives of the real people they slander, will continue getting away with it, because to punish them would allegedly stop "survivors" from reporting their incidents.'

CDC reference circumcision-for-STI-prevention in screening of immigrants. Comments needed by 24 Aug. 2015.

Minuteman · 21 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. There is a blue 'Comment Now' button in the top right-hand corner of the screen. You can upload documents if 5000 characters in insufficient space.

Excerpt (emphasis added):

'Internationally, most countries do not track any of the three infections; however, the few publications and records available suggest case rates have declined worldwide over the past 50 years. Declining rates of these conditions are likely due to a variety of factors. Improved living conditions, better sanitation (e.g., availability of soap and water), condom use, and educational efforts are all believed to be important factors (6, 21-23) contributing to the decline in the incidence of these infections. Improved recognition by physicians and treatment based on clinical presentation of sexually transmitted infections, coupled with treatment of sexual partners, also appears to be important in their decline. Increased antibiotic usage for treatment of other unrelated conditions may have contributed to the declining incidence of these infections. Additionally, HIV prevention strategies such as male circumcision may be playing a role, although definitive studies of this effect are still pending.

Given the low burden of these three infections globally, the potential introduction of additional cases into the United States by aliens is likely to have a negligible impact on the U.S. population for several reasons.'

We have several threads over at F-R.net tagged skepticism which might be helpful for researching and drafting a response.

UK: MP's fears over new guidelines on rape: How do you prove consent was given, he asks

Mastodon · 21 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"A row broke out last night over guidelines which would see men accused of date rape being asked to prove that a woman wanted to have sex.

As part of a major shake-up of investigations into sex offences, the Director of Public Prosecutions said it was vital to remove ‘any grey area’ to recognise situations where a woman may have been unable to give consent.

Campaigners described the move as a ‘huge step forward’ in ensuring fewer rapists escaped justice.

But critics said the guidelines threatened to undermine Britain’s long-standing principle that people were innocent until proven guilty.

Tory MP Philip Davies said: ‘It is not clear how anyone is supposed to prove that consent was given. Is the CPS really suggesting that you have to get a signed statement off someone before they have sex?

‘Nobody wants to see rapists walk free. I’m as hardline as they come on crime, but this is ridiculous. Our legal system is based on people being innocent until proven guilty and the CPS are trying to turn that on its head.’"

Cops: Guidance Counselor Victimized 16-Year-Old Male With Naked Selfies, Harvard Admission Promise

Matt · 21 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'In addition to the inviting photos, cops say Feeney also promised the unidentified student that she could get him admitted to Harvard University, reports local CBS affiliate WPVI-TV.

Feeney's months-long pursuit of the student was a hard, persistent but ultimately unsuccessful slog, Chester County district attorney Tom Hogan charged.

Her quest began in 2014. There were hundreds of emails, police say. There were texts. These messages included a topless photo and other imagery of Feeney partially disrobed in various ways.
...
"If you'd… just stop fighting and let it happen, you'd be a lot less uptight and much happier," another missive said, according to investigators.

Feeney used her official Malvern Prep work email account, cops say.

Feeney kissed the teenager at one point as well.

"The defendant was extraordinarily predatory in the way she attacked this 16-year-old boy, going after him again and again and again," Hogan told WPVI.

However, it was all for naught. The teen said he repeatedly spurned Feeney's advances.

"I'm not interested in you end of story," he reportedly said. "I'm 16. I'm not into you."

Undaunted, Feeney allegedly tried the old if-you-hook-up-with-me-I-will-totally-get-you-into-Harvard trick. Specifically, said she could use her connections in the college admissions industry to get him admitted to the Ivy League school. He stood a chance at earning a spot on Harvard's swim team, she allegedly told the teen. ...

"You owe me big time," Feeney allegedly said.

That gambit also failed, the student told investigators.'

Ex-Ravens cheerleader sentenced to 48 weekends in jail in rape case

Minuteman · 22 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'A Delaware judge on Friday sentenced former Baltimore Ravens cheerleader Molly Shattuck to two years of probation for the sexual assault of a 15-year-old boy, calling the case a difficult one and saying the socialite has already suffered great public humiliation.

Shattuck, who pleaded guilty to the rape charge, will serve 48 weekends in jail for the term of the probation. Prosecutors said the mother of three performed oral sex on the teenager, who attended McDonogh School in Owings Mills with her son."I take full responsibility for what I did," Shattuck, 48, said in between sobs as she stood before Judge E. Scott Bradley. "I was the adult."
...
The judge sentenced Shattuck to 15 years in prison — the maximum sentence for the charges — with all but two years suspended.

"It's not a walk in the park," defense attorney Eugene Maurer told reporters outside the courthouse. He called the sentence fair.

"(The judge) is punishing her ... while at the same time not punishing her children," he said.

Shattuck will serve her time at the Violation of Probation Center in Georgetown, Del. The sentence begins the first weekend of September.

Other charges against Shattuck were dropped in her plea agreement. In addition to her sentence, Shattuck is required to register as a sex offender in Maryland and Delaware and cannot be around anyone under the age of 18, except for her children. She will also pay more than $10,000 in restitution to the family.'

CA Sexual Assault Bill Allowing Punishment for Off-Campus Offenses Passes Unanimously

Mastodon · 22 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Senator Hannah-Beth Jackson's Senate Bill 186 (SB 186) passed the senate floor with a unanimous 63-0 bipartisan vote on Monday.

SB 186, introduced by Jackson in February, would allow California community colleges to discipline students for off-campus sexual assault and sexual exploitation violations. The bill successfully passed through the senate and currently awaits approval by Governor Jerry Brown, who can sign it into law. University of California (UC) and California State University (CSU) campuses currently have jurisdiction to expel, suspend or enact disciplinary action on students who commit sexual assault, but not the authority to punish students for incidents that happen off campus grounds.

Jackson said the bill's success was backed by the common understanding that all college students from UCs, CSUs and community colleges should be held accountable for crimes such as sexual assault.

"I think, clearly, if everyone has to meet to the same standards, there won't be the sense that someone can get away with something that another can't," Jackson said. "So there's going to be accountability, and hopefully there will be disciplinary action in both circumstances."

According to Jackson, the bill mandates punishments such as expulsion and suspension for students found guilty of sexual assault regardless of whether or not the incident happened within or outside of campus boundaries.'

Both Sides: Do colleges need more 'yes means yes' laws?

Mastodon · 22 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Belinda Guthrie: Sexual consent laws help prevent bad behavior

...

Critics of affirmative consent argue it places an undue burden on the initiator of the sexual activity to prove that he or she had consent and violates the due process rights of the accused.

They argue that such policies will lead to an increase of false reporting of sexual assault after incidents that are, in truth, regretted sexual encounters but nonetheless consensual.

Critics also argue that affirmative consent policies are impractical and impossible to enforce and do nothing to improve the resolution of cases involving "he said, she said" arguments and cases in which one or both parties were intoxicated or under the influence of drugs.

Fundamental fairness and due process requires schools to conduct a thorough, reliable, fair and prompt investigation carried out by an experienced, trained and impartial investigator.

An inadequate investigation or the poor handling of a case by an institution does not warrant a movement away from states adopting affirmative-consent policies.

...

Samuel R. Staley: Questionable laws turn sex into a police process

Rape is inexcusable and deserves to be discussed seriously, but the current nationwide push for so-called "yes means yes" laws is likely to cause more harm than good.

In brief, a "yes means yes" law puts into state statute a legally binding requirement that all parties involved in a sexual encounter demonstrate an "unambiguous, affirmative and conscious decision" to engage in voluntary sexual relations, to quote California's legislation, which passed last year.

In practice, this means getting verbal consent — an explicit "yes" — at every progressive step in a sexual act.

While this would appear to be a reasonable approach, it is both unreasonable and unworkable.'

"Title Nein from Outer Space"

Mastodon · 23 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The problem with nearly every government program or regulation is that it spawns a private sector industry to leach off the regulation, as well as a new constituency group to support the perpetuation or expansion of the regime.

Today's example is the egregious Title IX sexual assault protocols for college campuses, which, as noted here previously, isn't even a formal federal regulation. It proceeded from a "dear colleague" "guidance" letter from the Department of Education—an example of what legal scholars call the growing practice of "informal rule-making." It may seem informal to you, but when you're on the receiving end, with the threats and blandishments of the federal government coming at you, it seems about as "informal" as a request from Don Corleone.

The Title IX campus rules would never survive a the formal regulatory rule-making process under the Administrative Procedure Act, but the DOE's "guidance" letter was enough to generate the Association of Title IX Administrators, which exists to offer expert guidance to college administrators everywhere. (This seems to be the creature of the plainly leech-like NCHERM Group, which offers "risk-management consulting services" to universities.) They offer a premium newsletter, Title IX Today, for a mere $299 a year. Such a deal! (The email I received promoting this must-reading has the subject heading: "Title IX: Now Better than Ever!")'

Canada: Controversial men's group marches in Capital Pride

Mastodon · 23 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A controversial men's issues group that has been banned from Pride Toronto's festival took part in this year's Capital Pride parade in Ottawa.

The Canadian Association for Equality has a reputation for anti-feminist views, although the organizers insist it promotes gender equality and is not meant to be radical.

CAFE's event have drawn crowds of fierce protests in the past and the group was banned from Toronto Pride Parade this year, for a second year in a row.

According to Pride Toronto's news release in June, the group failed to meet that festival's vision to "create a safe space to engage communities in the celebration of their sexuality."

The group started a local chapter based in Ottawa this year.

Justin Trottier, CAFE executive director, said the group is a "very moderate social services organization" despite its reputation.

The organizers, which include qualified counsellors and women, are focused on male-specific issues such as suicide or violence against men, and are not responsible for the radical comments, Trottier said.

Tammy Dopson, chair of the community advisory committee, said there were no complaints about CAFE participating in the parade this year.'

One year in, 'yes-means-yes' policies begin to fall apart

Mastodon · 24 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It has been nearly a year since Democratic California Gov. Jerry Brown signed into law the first-in-the-nation "yes-means-yes" policy on sexual consent. Since that time we've seen more schools adopt the policy, more lawsuits from students and more rulings from judges determining the merits of campus kangaroo courts.

One recent ruling, limited in scope but broad in its potential ramifications, addressed the yes-means-yes policies head-on. Judge Carol McCoy addressed two of the biggest concerns shared by opponents of yes-means-yes — the burden of proof being shifted onto the accused, and the nearly impossible task of proving such consent was obtained.

McCoy overturned a University of Tennessee-Chattanooga ruling that a student accused of sexual assault failed to prove he did obtain consent. Of course, such proof could not be obtained, as there are very few ways — and even fewer legal ways — to provide such proof.

"Absent the tape recording of a verbal consent or other independent means to demonstrate that consent was given, the ability of an accused to prove the complaining party's consent strains credulity and is illusory," McCoy wrote.'

While women overseas face true oppression, Western feminists dream up petty hashtags

Mastodon · 24 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'She had posted a satirical cartoon on Facebook to protest proposed legislation to restrict birth control and women's rights. Farghadani has since been found guilty of "spreading propaganda" and "insulting members of parliament through paintings." She has been sentenced to 12 years in prison.

Farghadani is one of millions of women whose basic rights are being ruthlessly violated. In countries like Iran, Yemen, Egypt, and Cambodia, women are struggling for freedoms most women in the West take for granted.

But American feminists are relatively silent about these injustices — especially feminists on campus. During the 1980s, there were massive demonstrations on American college campuses against racial apartheid in South Africa. There is no remotely comparable movement on today's campuses against the gender apartheid prevalent in large parts of the world. Why not?

Today's young feminist activists are far too preoccupied with their own supposed victimhood to make common cause with women like Farghadani.'

Scotland: Willie Rennie eyes women-only Lib Dem shortlists

Mastodon · 24 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'SCOTTISH Liberal Democrat leader Willie Rennie is to seek to change his party's rules to allow women-only shortlists for parliamentary selections.

Mr Rennie said he had "lost patience" with the current system and would take steps to address the gender imbalance within his party at its spring conference.

The party was criticised after its only female MSP, Alison McInnes, lost out to former MSP Mike Rumbles at the top of the party's north-east Scotland regional list for next year's Holyrood election.

Similar proposals have been rejected by the party in the past but Mr Rennie said the time was right for a "fresh start".

He has pledged to lead a working group to look at measures to increase representation of Liberal Democrat women in Holyrood, Westminster and Brussels.'

"Women make better politicians" -- again

Mastodon · 24 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Former Queensland premier Anna Bligh kicked off the topic by answering a viewer's question about whether she would advise young women to pursue a career in politics.

She said women needed to persist longer to be selected as leading figures in politics.

"We need the best and brightest. And to get the best and brightest, we need just as many young women to put their hands up as young men, to stay in the political parties long enough to get preselected and go through those sorts of jobs," she said.

Ms Bligh said despite the brutality of being a woman in Australian public life, she would not discourage young females to make this as their career choice.
...
Former federal independent MP Tony Windsor went one step further in saying women made better politicians than men, praising Julia Gillard for her role as the first Australian female prime minister.

"I think women — I'm generalising here — but I think women tend to make better politicians than the men," he said.'

Australian Senate Inquiry: "Economic security for women in retirement"

Minuteman · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Readers interested in making a submission (comment) can do so until 30 October 2015. Excerpt:

'a. The Senate notes that, although women's increasing workforce participation has contributed significantly to Australia's economic productivity and to women's financial independence, significant socio-economic disparity remains between men and women, illustrated by the pay gap between men and women which sits at 18.8 per cent and the gap in superannuation at retirement is 46.6 per cent; and
b. the gender retirement income gap be referred to the Economics References Committee for inquiry and report by the first sitting day in March 2016, with particular reference to:
i. the impact inadequate superannuation savings has on the retirement outcomes for women,
ii. the extent of the gender retirement income gap and causes of this gap, and its potential drivers including the gender pay gap and women's caring responsibilities,
iii. whether there are any structural impediments in the superannuation system [impacting on the superannuation savings gap],
iv. the adequacy of the main sources of retirement income for women, and
v. what measures would provide women with access to adequate and secure retirement incomes; including:
A. assistance to employers to assist female employees' superannuation savings,
B. Government assistance, with reference to the success of previous schemes, and
C. any possible reforms to current laws relating to superannuation, social security payments, paid parental leave, discrimination, or any other relevant measure.'

RS at it again: "America Has a Rape Problem"

Mastodon · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Is that what you mean when you say in the book that "every American boy is at risk of growing up to become a rapist"?

"When I say that, I mean that American boys are all growing up in the same rape culture, so they're growing up with this incredible sense of entitlement to women's bodies. Boys are taught that sex is their right – it's on demand, basically – and that girls will resist, and their job is to overcome that resistance. Instead of teaching them about respecting girls as fellow human beings, they're taught that girls are sexual organs.

A culture that devalues girls and women gives social cover to people who want to rape. You don't know which boy is going to be the one who says, "I'm going to go for it." (And it almost always is a boy. There are cases of women raping both other women and men, but men are predominantly the perpetrators, regardless of the gender of the victim.)

So when I say that every American boy is at risk of growing up to become a rapist, I mean that we don't know which young boy is absorbing this message of entitlement. People like to think, "My child would never…" or, "I'm such a good parent." But when you see things like campus rape stories – your typical rapist is someone who knows their victim, someone who the victim trusts at least a little bit – that is the child of someone who thought their child would never do that."'

The Fainting Couch at Columbia

Mastodon · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'But the initiative signals something more worrisome than just Columbia's distorted priorities, according to this refusenik. "People like me might be losing the right simply to be silent, to be left alone," he writes. "For the first time I, along with anyone else remotely willing to dissent, am not even being allowed to stay quiet and keep my opinions to myself. The initiative implies that agreement with the ideology—indeed, with a university-mandated code of sexual ethics—is actually required for attendance at this institution."

In fact, the sexual-respect initiative never challenges the regime of drunken hook-up sex. To do such a thing, of course, would not be "sex-positive." Rather, the initiative simply assigns wildly asymmetrical responsibilities and liabilities within that regime, consistent with the current practice of college administrations everywhere.
...
This second reading is unthinkable in today's university, however, where the male is always responsible for regretted couplings, and the female a wilting victim. If this sounds like a resurrection of Victorian values, that's because it is, but with one major difference: The modern college co-ed retains the prerogative of unbounded promiscuity (think: "sex-positive"), while also retaining the right to revert at will to a stance of offended innocence.'

SAVE: Four Rulings, Four Reversals: Judges Give ‘Thumbs Down’ on Campus Sex Tribunals

Matt · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'In four recent cases, judges have overturned sexual assault findings by campus disciplinary committees. In each case, the judges ruled the college proceedings lacked necessary due process protections. As the new academic year begins, these judicial decisions highlight the need for renewed focus on fairness in college sex assault cases, SAVE says.

In the most recent case, federal judge Norman Moon ruled that Washington and Lee University created a climate of gender discrimination that served to “railroad” students who are wrongly accused of sexual assault. The judge concluded the university’s bare-bones adjudication process “plausibly support a Title IX claim” by the plaintiff. See Doe v. Washington & Lee Univ.: https://d28htnjz2elwuj.cloudfront.net/wp-content/uploads/2015/08/06171146/Opinion-on-MTD.pdf

In a landmark case, Judge Carol McCoy ruled that the affirmative consent standard used by the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga was unfair because the rule “erroneously shifted the burden of proof” to the defendant, robbing the student of his due process rights. McCoy noted that “requiring the accused to affirmatively provide consent… is flawed and untenable if due process is to be afforded to the accused.”https://kcjohnson.files.wordpress.com/2013/08/memorandum-mock.pdf

In mid-August, Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Robert H. O’Brien barred the University of Southern California from expelling Bryce Dixon, a football player who was expelled on an allegation of sexual assault. The judge found that that the university’s sexual assault adjudication process was fundamentally unfair to accused students: http://reason.com/blog/2015/08/13/judge-stops-usc-from-expelling-football

And in July, Superior Court Judge Joel Pressman overturned a decision to suspend a University of California-San Diego student based on an allegation that consent for sex had not been obtained. Concluding “the hearing against petitioner was unfair,” Judge Pressman found serious procedural flaws in the university’s handling of the case: http://documents.latimes.com/uc-san-diego-sex-assault-case-ruling-doe-vs-regents-uc-san-diego/

“The presumption of innocence and due process lie at the very heart of notions of fairness and justice,” notes SAVE spokesperson Sheryle Hutter. “Universities that flaunt these standards can expect to become the focus of judicial scrutiny.”'

Wardrobe malfunctions and double-standards

Matt · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As you probably already know, Lenny Kravitz recently experienced a pretty extreme wardrobe malfunction. The 51-year-old rocker was wearing leather pants while performing in Stockholm, and during a particularly impassioned squat with his guitar, his pants ripped, resulting in his entire groin region being exposed. Yes, the whole block and tackle fell out, and people photographed it.
...
There are a lot of tricky factors to this case. As many have noted, it's somewhat similar to the time Apple's iCloud service was hacked and hundreds of celebrities (mostly women) had their private nude photos splashed all over the internet, including Jennifer Lawrence and Gabrielle Union. It's also similar to crotch-level paparazzi photos that caught Lindsay Lohan and Anne Hathaway sans panties. Many argue that Kravitz's case is different because he was on stage, and when you're on stage you recognize that there will be people snapping photos.
...
But I think the biggest distinction between these cases is that this non-consensual photo is of a man. And somewhere, deep inside, most people don't think that men deserve privacy or the right to give consent.

For any person willing to look at this photo of Lenny Kravitz's genitals, an important question must be pondered: If a woman's leather pants ripped on stage and her entire vulva were exposed, would you click through to see? Would you share the photos, stories, and godforsaken GIFs gleefully on your Facebook page? My guess is that most women and men who call themselves feminists or pro-feminist would not want to participate in that. So why aren't we more upset about this?'

Study suggests method for predicting men who may kill their spouses

Mastodon · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The psychological and forensic profile of men who murder their intimate partners varies from murderers who kill people they don't know, a study published online Friday in the Journal of Forensic Sciences suggests.

The study, conducted by scientists at Northwestern University, involved more than 1,500 hours of interviews with 153 male and female murderers charged with and/or convicted of first-degree murder in Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Colorado and Arizona.

"You learn a lot about them in that amount of time," lead author Robert Hanlon, director of the forensic psychology research lab at Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine, said in a news release. "I saw the same patterns and trends over and over again."

"The findings provide important information that may help prevent future domestic homicide because they help identify individuals at risk of committing domestic murders, added Hanlon, who is also an associate professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at Feinberg and a neuropsychologist at Northwestern Memorial Hospital, and who testified in the James Holmes Colorado theater mass murder trial in Denver in July. "The killers in this group are very similar to each other and different from men who commit nondomestic murders, which are often premeditated."'

State assemblywoman charged with trespass and indecent exposure during domestic incident

Matt · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Maryland politician was busted on charges of indecent exposure and trespassing at her ex-husband's house, court documents show.

Delegate Ariana Kelly flipped out when she dropped off the couple's kids in Bethesda and realized her former spouse's fiancee was home,the Washington Post reported.

The 38-year-old state lawmaker rang the doorbell over and over during the June 27 encounter, and then pulled out her breasts, according to the complaint.

The Montgomery Democrat stood "with one breast in each hand (shaking) them up and down," according to the documents obtained by the Washington Post.

Kelly's ex-husband, Barak Sanford, recorded the bizarre episode on his cell phone and called police, authorities said.'

U of Minnesota to roll out revised 'affirmative consent' policy

Mastodon · 26 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'At the University of Minnesota, yes now officially means yes.

The U's revised "affirmative consent" policy on student sexual relations will roll out next week, in time for freshmen to begin arriving on campus for Welcome Week Sept. 2-7.
...
Critics of affirmative consent say it places an unfair burden on the accused. The policy has been implemented at schools across the country during the past year. But this summer, courts in Tennessee, California and Virginia have criticized it in cases where students accused of sexual assault didn't receive due process.

"What the court said is that you cannot require someone to prove that consent was manifested, particularly in a typical date-rape situation where there is no other evidence and where it often comes down to he-said, she-said," said John Banzhaf, a law professor at George Washington University.'

Yale’s latest report on its sexual-misconduct investigations shows more curiosities

Mastodon · 26 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Yale is reporting not only on cases brought forward since Jan. 1, but also providing updates on past cases.

In one example, one of the school’s Title IX coordinators “brought a formal complaint alleging that a [Yale College] student engaged in sexual touching without consent.” Upon further review, the school “did not find sufficient evidence to support the allegation,” but continued to maintain no-contact restrictions on the cleared student.

On other occasions, accused students did not even get a hearing, receiving punishments directly from Title IX officers.

On one occasion, a student accused another of inappropriate sexual touching but decided to not go forward with the case. Without any adjudication of the allegation’s merits, the Title IX coordinator “counseled the one identified respondent on appropriate conduct and referred the respondent for training on sexual consent.”'

S. Africa: Uncircumcised boys reportedly targets of bullying

Mastodon · 27 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Circumcision is supposed to be a rite of passage, but a new study by World Vision has confirmed the fears of many that some boys are subjected to abusive and bullying practices.

The charity's study, In the Name of Culture: Forced Initiation in Orange Farm South Africa, which was carried out in Orange Farm, south of Johannesburg, found that boys who do not go, or do not complete initiation, are picked on and excluded.

"For example, fellow students will take away their chairs and won't allow them to use the school bathrooms unless they pay a fee," World Vision said a statement.

Paula Barnard, national director of World Vision SA, said society is not acting cohesively or fast enough to deal with illegal initiation schools.'

Late night TV host surprised by frank discussion about circumcision

Mastodon · 27 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Jeff Goldblum had his son circumcised, but didn't hold a bris — the ceremonial Jewish circumcision ritual — he told Conan O'Brien, when Conan asked. Instead, he and his wife and their pediatrician, a former New York Met, sang "Take Me Out to the Ballgame" during the procedure. Goldblum asked Conan and sidekick Andy Richter if they had circumcised their sons, and Richter took the bait.

Richter did not have his son circumcised, and that's only the tip of the personal iceberg he shared. O'Brien stayed out of the debate, only jumping in occasionally to let everyone know how uncomfortable he was with the turn of the conversation. "With my son, as I told the doctor, I said, 'He was born perfect — why change him?'" Richter said, to appreciative murmurs from the audience. "So, what I'm saying is, you've mutilated your child," he added, good-naturedly ribbing Goldblum. Goldblum said that Ricther was probably right, and Conan took the opportunity to wrap up the debate. ...'

Paternity Fraud: If A Man Grows Close To A Child He Finds Out Is Not His, Should He Still Provide For Them?

Mastodon · 27 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In the United States, paternity fraud is recognized and handled as a criminal offense. It happens more often than we think and is often done in an attempt to obtain higher child support benefits than can be provided by the biological father. Or better yet, to hide infidelity. It's a messed up situation, however, in Nigeria, cases like these are often swept under the rug and rarely result in legal action. Culturally, West African fathers often care for their children as well as children born out of wedlock, children from extramarital affairs, and children from a different father if they are in a relationship with the mother. A majority of the cases have more to do with creating a stable family for the children regardless of if he's the real father or not. In Nigeria and other African countries, it's also not uncommon for some women to marry for status even if they already have children, and it is also not uncommon for men to have several women with whom they have children with. As for the way things play out Stateside, it's much different. Men and women are less likely to care financially for a child who isn't theirs biologically. Being a key figure or positive role model in a child's life is one thing, but being mandated by courts into child support is another, and questions fairness. But it happens all the time. Just ask the singer Ne-Yo, who was forced to pay child support for a boy his ex-girlfriend made him believe was his own–until a DNA test cleared things up:

"In the state of California, if you put yourself out there as the father, the mother can then come after you in court like you're the biological father," Ne-Yo told VH1. "So we settled out of court for what I thought was an ungodly amount of money. Shortly after that, Jesseca and Chimere vanished."'

Manspreading: why does the 'man' prefix always mean something awful?

Mastodon · 27 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Question: What's the one thing that's more annoying than men who sit with their legs too far apart on public transport?

Answer: the word used to describe it.

Manspreading might be a silly made-up word to explain the selfish male practice of splaying oneself in an antisocial manner on a bus or train carriage (or even chat-show sofa), but it has now been recognised by the online Oxford dictionary.
...
But what is particularly irritating about manspreading is that it is one of seemingly countless modern words to adopt the prefix "man-". And none of them reflect well on men.

Those three simple letters can turn almost any noun, verb or adjective into something rude, sexist, vulgar, pathetic, vain or childish, as the list below demonstrates.'

"Murder is the second most likely way for women to die at work"

Matt · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Remember: It's only a problem if it affects women, and then only as it affects women. Excerpt:

'Many people work at dangerous heights, or with deadly chemicals or crushing equipment. But, as the gruesome killing of reporter Alison Parker and cameraman Adam Ward reminded us Wednesday, murder happens surprisingly often on the job. Out of nearly 4,600 workplace deaths in 2013, 9 percent were caused by homicides, according to the census of workplace deaths by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

It's a pattern that disproportionately affects women. After car accidents, homicide is the most likely way for women to die at work, representing 21 percent of workplace deaths. Men, on the other hand, are more likely to die many other ways. Murders represent 8 percent of workplace deaths for men, preceded by car accidents, falls and contact with objects and equipment.

Overall, more men are murdered on the job than women. But that's because more men are killed on the job overall. Women do more than 40 percent of the work hours in this country, but represent 7 percent of workplace deaths, according to the census of workplace deaths. So more dangerous types of work result in 13 men dying on the job for every woman who dies.'

Columbia U seeks to end lawsuit by accused student in mattress case

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Columbia University on Friday asked a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit by a recent graduate who said it allowed a student who accused him of rape to harass him by carrying a mattress around campus in protest, even though the school had cleared him of the allegation.

In a filing in Manhattan federal court, Columbia said the discrimination lawsuit by the plaintiff, Paul Nungesser, suggested that the school had an obligation to silence his accuser, Emma Sulkowicz, from speaking publicly about sexual assault on college campuses, an issue of national concern.

Nungesser in April sued Columbia and visual arts professor Jon Kessler, who oversaw Sulkowicz' senior thesis "Mattress Performance (Carry That Weight)," in which she drew national attention by carrying a mattress around the campus in Manhattan's Morningside Heights. Columbia's president, Lee Bollinger, was also named as a defendant.

"What plaintiff asks this court to do is to second guess the kinds of decisions made by professors and administrators at Columbia in applying disciplinary and academic policies, respecting free speech, and preventing sexual misconduct, as Columbia did in good faith here," Columbia said. "This court cannot and should not accept plaintiff's invitation to do so."'

Rape culture and the crisis of intimacy

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When spiked's law editor Luke Gittos decided to write a book on 'rape culture' he must have known it was likely to cause him a lot of trouble. Gittos is a privileged, white, London-based, (possibly cis-gender) male lawyer who claims no experience of forced sex. His book could not be more of a challenge to the current zeitgeist.

Hence, there will be those who say his privileged, white maleness disqualifies him from speaking out on the issue of rape, and that this book, Why Rape Culture is a Dangerous Myth: From Steubenville to Ched Evans, is a 'mansplaining' display of insensitive arrogance by someone with no sense of women's experience. Others will probably be tempted to dismiss any man who writes a book challenging 'rape culture' as an attention-seeking controversialist intent on provoking feminist fury. The publisher should probably have issued a Twitterstorm alert.

But such attempts to dismiss the relevance of Gittos's arguments would be mind-numbingly stupid. Because, despite his gender and background (neither of which are his fault), Gittos has produced a useful and intelligent analysis that clarifies and makes sense of an issue that has become very muddled.

Gittos's tightly written polemic argues against the accepted view that we live in a society in which misogyny and everyday sexism have created a so-called rape culture, in which rape is pervasive, underreported and ignored. He does not believe that the police and the law courts are failing women by failing to convict rapists. On the contrary, Gittos argues that the obsession with a 'culture of rape' has seriously distorted our view of sexual violence, and that the expansion of laws to protect women is eroding areas of privacy and inviting state regulation of our most intimate affairs.

This is dangerous for us all – not just men who may find themselves dragged into court following a sexual encounter they believed was consensual. Gittos holds that the drive to prosecute (and improve conviction rates against) more and more people has dangerous implications for the fundamental principles of justice, and for basic freedoms. The situation as things stand, he maintains, does no one any favours: it undermines society's ability to deal adequately with extreme assault, and it undermines our ability to live intimately with one another.'

Yes, women are also better home-builders, too

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'The Department of Human Settlements said women in construction build better quality houses than men.

Deputy Minister Zou Kota-Fredericks hosted a Women in Construction Summit yesterday under the theme 'Women in Construction Taking South Africa Forward'.

Kota-Fredericks said she's pleased to see women enter the male dominated industry.

“The ones that are built by woman normally are of good quality, because the women are normally in terms of detail. They've got a high acumen. They make sure the product that they give us as government is a quality product.”

Kota-Fredericks said the department is on track to build 1,9 million houses by 2019.'

British Socialist's Latest Idea: Women-Only Train Cars

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'British politician Jeremy Corbyn proposed reinstalling female-only train cars on Wednesday as a solution to a reported increase in sexual harassment on public transit. The candidate for the Labour Party's leadership post also proposed a 24-hour hotline so women can report perceived sexual offenses as soon as they occur.

Rail carriages reserved exclusively for women existed on British trains for nearly 100 years, until 1977; until now, no public figure as high-profile as Corbyn, who has developed a reputation for proposing radical solutions to social problems, has talked publicly of reviving the practice.'

Congresswoman Speier's Gender Equality Summit: Title IX For Pro Sports?

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"There's a reason why we have Title IX, which is now over forty years old," California Congresswoman Jackie Speier said in an interview today. "There's a reason why we put the spotlight on inequality that exists in women participating in sports."

Now Speier wants to focus that spotlight on the world of professional sports, starting with a summit on gender inequality this Wednesday, August 25, at Mercy High School in her home district of San Francisco.

You may remember Speier as being one of several legislators in an official letter from Congress to chastise FIFA for unequal prize money, lack of equal developmental opportunities, and inferior playing conditions in the wake of the Women's World Cup. At the time the letter seemed ambitious, but it seems to have caught some attention at FIFA's headquarters in Zurich, Switzerland. Speier and company received a reply from FIFA last week.'

UK: Women in their 20s earn more than men of same age, study finds

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Women in their 20s have reversed the gender pay gap, but their earning power is still overtaken by men later in life. Figures compiled by the Press Association have shown that between the ages of 22 and 29, a woman will typically earn £1,111 more per annum than her male counterparts.

Using data from the Office for National Statistics (ONS), PA analysed the comparative earnings of men and women between 2006 and 2013. Statistics for 2014 have yet to be verified and were excluded.

While younger women in their 20s came out top in the earning stakes, the story was vastly different for workers in their 30s. A man turning 30 in 2006 would have brought in on average £8,775 more than a woman of the same age.'

No More Double Standards for Women in the Military

Mastodon · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, two female Army officers and West Point graduates made history when they successfully passed Army Ranger School, known as one of the most physically challenging and difficult leadership schools in the military.

Not only is this a phenomenal personal accomplishment, but they have paved the way for other women to advance in the military hierarchy. While a proud nation congratulated the women on their incredible achievement, it demonstrated how outdated and discriminatory the Selective Service law is.

As the Selective Service law stands now, only men, within 30 days of their 18th birthday, must register with the Selective Service. This means that in the event that the U.S. needs a military draft, these men would be called up and selected through a lottery.

...

As a society that celebrates equality, we can't undermine the meaning and advances that have been made throughout our history by accepting selective equality. We can't pick and choose when we want things between men and women to be equal. Women are now on the brink of serving in ground combat jobs. They have been critical for success on the battlefield. It's time that they share the responsibly of protecting our nation if the time comes.'

Sailor still imprisoned despite court victory in Navy rape case

Mastodon · 29 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Navy enlisted man whose rape conviction was reversed six weeks ago remains imprisoned in South Carolina, caught amid the military's accelerating campaign against sexual assault.

Now, in an unusual move, attorneys for Airman Dustin M. Clark are urging the same military appeals court that threw out his 2014 conviction to order his immediate release. The 23-year-old Missouri native has already done too much time for a crime he didn't commit, his attorneys say.

"It's outrageous," David P. Sheldon, one of Clark's attorneys, said in an interview. "They're making sure he stays in jail."

It's rare for a military appeals court to reverse a conviction because of "factual insufficiency," as the U.S. Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals did with Clark's conviction July 14. This means the appellate judges thought prosecutors failed to prove their case

The government, though, apparently wants to keep Clark incarcerated at the Naval Consolidated Brig Charleston in South Carolina pending further review, a process that Sheldon estimates could last as long as 10 months.'

India: Nearly half of all rape charges false, say cops

Mastodon · 29 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'After two recent cases, one of alleged rape and another of gang-rape, turned out false cases, police are in a quandary. Policemen refusing to file cases in such matters can be charged under Section 166 of IPC (public servant disobeying law), which attracts punishment of a year in prison.

IG Meerut zone, Alok Sharma said, "From January 2014 to May 2015, 400 dowry-related cases were filed in Meerut Mahila thana. Of those, in 122 cases, rape charges were slapped against either the husband or his relatives. In 30% of such cases, rape charges were made." He said he smelt something suspicious in the high numbers of women bringing rape charges.

...

Unwilling to be quoted in the matter, a senior police officer said, "Almost half all cases of rape are turning out false. Renowned lawyer KK Pahwa corroborated this opinion. "Just about half the rape cases end up genuine ones," he said, adding that the matter is grave, since marital discord is often reported as a case of rape against relatives of the husband.

Pahwa said, "Women are taking to levelling charges of rape in a bid to humble opponents. In 2014, the Allahabad HC, in its 'Shaukeen Vs State' verdict, said the police could not arrest a man immediately, even if the offence he is alleged to have committed attracts punishment of up to seven years in jail. That is why lawyers have struck on a new strategy -- they include Section 376 of IPC (rape) along with 377 (unnatural sex) or at times even 276 D (gang-rape). These sections call for immediate arrest. If convicted of crimes under these sections, the person may end up in jail for the rest of his life."'

Malecare: A Unique Prostate Cancer Awareness Raising Event for Our Guys

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Malecare Prostate Cancer Support is launching a new prostate cancer awareness campaign called, TOPOFF, (http://topoff.org/) drawing attention to the need for better diagnostics, better treatments and better understanding of prostate cancer. There are many ways to build awareness. We think the hardest way is to expose yourself, to put your body on the line and say to the world, this is who I am. I matter. Fighting Prostate Cancer matters.

We take our cue from female Breast Cancer survivors who post selfies of themselves, bald because of their chemo treatment. We are equally bold, brave and honored by our treatment choices and desire to raise awareness about our disease.

Part's One and Two of the TOPOFF Prostate Cancer Awareness Campaign begins now!

Part One of TOPOFF asks men diagnosed with prostate cancer and their allies and supporters to take photographs (selfies) of themselves with their shirts off, upload them to http://topoff.org or email them to: topoff@malecare.org

Both print and broadcast journalists have already expressed interest in the TOPOFF campaign and prostate cancer. So, take your selfies and send'em to topoff@malecare.org Your name and identifying info will Not be attached to your photo.

Part Two of TOPOFF asks for 3-5 men to volunteer to be profiled, with your names attached. We will take high end, editorial style pictures of you for TOPOFF. We will then create an accompanying article on each of you and your journey with prostate cancer.

You need to be willing to be photographed with your shirt off, share your story in a professional interview and allow us to use your name in the media. You can be one of the men who also share a picture on the TOPOFF website.

Please consider this truly unique approach to building prostate cancer awareness. If you are willing to be in Part Two, Contact me right away, by email: darrylm@malecare.org

Many thanks in advance for considering this. Please spread word about TOPOF.org though your social media, too. Here's to our success in raising prostate cancer awareness with TOPOFF.

Please feel encouraged to contact me with any questions or comments.

Very best regards,

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare
Men fighting cancer, together.
www.malecare.org
darrylm@malecare.org

Due process goes to school

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Announcement here. Description:

'America's universities are much more than classrooms: they are four-year residences for many students. Unfortunately, crimes do take place on college campuses, including sexual assault. In response, colleges and federal bureaucrats have developed various laws and regulations designed to protect students. While this impulse is laudable, sometimes the results are not. Some college administrators have adopted questionable procedures that appear to favor the accused and have put political correctness above the rights and interests of the accused and the need to engage in a legitimate search for the truth.

Join us as three distinguished advocates discuss these issues. How prevalent is campus sexual assault? What is the appropriate way to deal with alleged victims? How can we make sure that the rights of the accused are also respected, so that travesties of justice like the Duke lacrosse case and the Rolling Stone rape hoax are not repeated?'

Courts, Not Campuses, Should Decide Sexual Assault Cases

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Announcement here. Description:

'High-profile cases have recently put campus sexual assault in the spotlight. One question that has repeatedly come up: why are these cases being handled by campuses at all? Title IX requires that every school receiving federal aid must take concrete steps to deal with hostile environments and sexual assault. This leaves colleges and universities with the task of figuring out what policies and procedures to enforce. Proponents say that campus investigations serve a real need, forcing schools to respond to violence and protecting the interests of victims in ways that the criminal justice system may fail. Can schools provide due process for defendants and adequate justice for victims, or do these cases belong in the courts?'

Michigan court says juveniles can be raped and abused in prison

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Imagine a scenario where children are raped, abused, and neglected, yet the court refuses to address the problem or hold those responsible accountable.

Seems crazy? Well, welcome to Michigan.

In yet another example of America's disturbing incarceration traditions, Michigan imprisoned a number of 17-year-old juveniles with adults, and prison guards and other staff did a terrible job of providing these children sufficient monitoring and protection. These kids were raped and abused by other inmates and even sexually assaulted by guards.
...
This week the court made a shocking decision, as you can read below.

A Michigan appeals court dismissed the case on a minor procedural technicality, one that did not warrant or require the court to dismiss. And, if that wasn't bad enough, the court decided to also address the substantive claims—and ruled against the children. ...'

Paternity fraud a national problem

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Countless children go through life not knowing the true identities of their fathers. Shame on their mothers. And shame on the U.S. court system that, more often than you realize, forces child support on men with no DNA connection.

These false establishments of paternity, as they are called, happen in courts across the country. Our broken family court system is intent on getting someone – really anyone – on record as being responsible for the children so the state won't be.

The result? Circles of victimized people.

First, the child who is denied the truth about who his or her biological father is, any hereditary diseases they may develop, their heritage, extended family and inheritance rights.'

University Police remove notices of alleged sexual assault on campus

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Notice how the article remains written in a way to suggest that the facts reported in it remain irrelevant. It quotes a nervous female student talking about how scary such reports are (and indeed, they are) and that a campus-wide alert system should be in place -- right on the heels of the reported fact that this was a false report. Talk about ignoring reality! Excerpt:

'Arkansas State University alerted students Friday night about a possible sexual assault that allegedly occurred on campus Wednesday, but took down the notifications Saturday evening.

According to the news release, University Police were notified that a student was held against her will and sexually assaulted by an unknown male in a vehicle parked by the Red Wolf Recreation Center.

The alleged incident was believed to have happened at 10:30 p.m. on Aug. 26.

Police made the decision to remove the notifications after the information provided by the victim didn't add up with other facts.

They believed the incident did not happen and that there is no suspect.

Students around the recreation center said they do have concerns after seeing the notifications when simply walking across the street.'

Why should ‘manspreading’ be just for men?

Mastodon · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Yesterday, the term “manspreading” was added to the online Oxford Dictionary. It made the news and I felt surprisingly pissed off about it. On the way to work, I counted three women participating in fine examples of “manspreading”. Ever since I was a teenager, it has always irritated me that sitting with your legs open was seen to be the preserve of men. It seemed to be based on the outmoded assumption that women always wear skirts and that even in trousers they should be making themselves small and polite in public spaces. In an admittedly minor rebellion, I started to sit like that too.

Of course, I don’t think anyone should ever stop someone else from sitting on a train because they need space for their own knees, but frankly when there’s room, it’s pretty comfortable to sit with your legs open. Just be good-mannered about it. Then yesterday’s win for the term “manspreading” made me think that even when a man or woman is doing it in an irritating way, when the body language isn’t exactly endearing, the word describing this seated position has become unnecessarily gendered.

There are obviously bigger feminist battles to be fought and I write this very aware of the brilliantly feminist roots of “manspreading” and the need to highlight an action men feel entitled to and women often feel they can’t do. Squishing women on the tube isn’t cool. Other man-prefixed words work the same way.'

The big lie behind the campus-rape crusade

Matt · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'What happens when the statistical basis for a massive, nationwide legislative push crumbles into dust? Absolutely nothing, if the subject is sexual assault on campus.

This year, more than half the states in the country considered legislation dealing with sexual assault on college campuses. California and New York enacted affirmative-consent policies, Connecticut and Virginia announced new laws intended to prevent sexual violence on campuses and last year President Obama created a task force designed to deal with what liberal political elites claimed was a startling rise in sexual assault.

But the very studies these politicians relied on don't say what they have claimed — yet the "yes means yes" juggernaut rolls on.

A study by prominent psychologist David Lisak, "Repeat Rape and Multiple Offending Among Detected Rapists," has been used by the federal government, schools and activists to justify policies slanted against the accused.

The report purportedly showed campus rapists as serial predators. "This report analyzes the most recent, reliable data about rape and sexual assault in our country," Obama pronounced. The recent documentary "The Hunting Ground," a film about campus "rape culture," relies heavily on Lisak.'

California lawmakers approve equal pay protections for women

Mastodon · 30 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'California's state Assembly on Thursday approved legislation aimed at closing the wage gap between women and men through what proponents describe as the strongest equal pay protection in the nation.

The bill by Sen. Hannah-Beth Jackson, D-Santa Barbara, would let female employees challenge pay discrimination based on the wages that the company pays to other employees at different locations. They could also base challenges on wages the company pays to other employees who do substantially similar work.'

Nestle accused of using slave-caught fish in cat food

Matt · 31 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Nice to see some exposure in something like the MSM. Will it make prime time news? I doubt it. But it should. Excerpt:

'Swiss food giant Nestle is being sued in the United States for allegedly knowingly allowing its Fancy Feast cat food to contain fish from a Thai supplier that uses slave labor.

Pet food buyers who filed the class action lawsuit on Thursday in US federal court in Los Angeles seek to represent all California consumers of Fancy Feast who would not have purchased the product had they known it had ties to slave labor.

According to the lawsuit, Nestle works with Thai Union Frozen Products PCL to import more than 28 million pounds (13 million kilograms) of seafood-based pet food for top brands sold in the United States, and that some of the ingredients in those products came from slave labor.

Men and boys, often trafficked from Thailand's poorer neighbors Myanmar and Cambodia, are sold to fishing boat captains who need crews aboard their ship, the complaint said.

It spoke of shifts of up to 20 hours a day with little or no pay, and beatings or even death if the work is deemed unsatisfactory.

"By hiding this from public view, Nestle has effectively tricked millions of consumers into supporting and encouraging slave labor on floating prisons," said Steve Berman, managing partner of the Hagens Berman law firm.'

To The Contrary takes on today's campus situation

Matt · 31 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Available on YouTube here. Ashe Schow is part of the panel. The topic starts at time mark 8:28.

UVA president blames feds for response to Rolling Stone debacle

Mastodon · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'University of Virginia President Teresa Sullivan blamed federal privacy regulations for her school's failure to debunk the Rolling Stone gang-rape story.

Those regulations did not stop her from treating innocent people as rapists, however.

Sullivan, speaking to the Richmond Times-Dispatch, said the school couldn't counter the Rolling Stone article about a now discredited accusation of a brutal gang rape because of a law known as the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act.

"The university couldn't say it wasn't true because of FERPA," said Sullivan, referring to federal student privacy law. "And the only reason I can say it to you now is because there's a police chief's report, which is not FERPA-protected."'

Queens woman gunned down lover before lighting the body on fire in front of her kids

Mastodon · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Queens woman sporting nine fake fingernails told cops she wasn't with her boyfriend when he was shot to death in his left side early Saturday. But the lie fell apart — leading to her arrest Monday — when a sharp-eyed detective noticed her one naked digit.

"On his body we find a fingernail and we noticed that when we talk to his girlfriend she's missing a fingernail," Chief of Detectives Robert Boyce said. "We take her back into custody, we start speaking to her, and she makes admissions she actually killed him."

After the murder, police say Dawn McIntosh, 46, of Long Island City, enlisted the help of her son and daughter to carry Sh-Ron McWhorter's body to a car. He was too heavy, so McIntosh tried to burn the victim's body to mask the crime. The mom was charged with murder, criminal possession of a weapon and tampering with physical evidence.

Firefighters doused the blaze, but the 43-year-old Brooklyn man couldn't be saved. Police identified McWhorter by the "Sugar Sha" tattoo on his left arm, sources said.

McWhorter's heartbroken mom called McIntosh "a stalker" and said her son wanted nothing to do with the accused killer. Wiping away tears, she said she turned 67 on Monday and her son always remembered her birthday.'

Due process group distributes warning flyers to campus men

Mastodon · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'To combat wrongful accusations of sexual assault on college campuses, a pro-due process group is distributing flyers meant to prepare young men for potential expulsion.

The organization, Families Advocating for Campus Equality has already begun distributing the flyers on California campuses, where "yes means yes" consent policies were adopted last year. The policies purport to make clear what is and isn't consent, but make it impossible for accused students to prove their innocence and in fact redefine normal human actions as rape.

"This flyer was created by a small group of California mothers of sons, including some whose sons have been falsely accused, to raise awareness of the propensity of college and university disciplinary panels to find male students guilty of sexual misconduct, often with no evidence except the accuser's claim, and frequently in the presence of tangible evidence to the contrary," said Cynthia Garrett, an attorney and board member of FACE.'

America's Boys: A Bunch of Budding Little Rapists

Mastodon · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This is an excerpt from a Rolling Stone interview with the author of a new book on rape culture, Asking for It. Since it is Rolling Stone, of course there is a kind of shill factor. The publication has no credibility—about anything, really, but about rape issues for certain. The book and the attitude it represents, however, are both real. From "America Has a Rape Problem—And Kate Harding Wants to Fix It":

`Is that what you mean when you say in the book that "every American boy is at risk of growing up to become a rapist"?

``When I say that, I mean that American boys are all growing up in the same rape culture, so they're growing up with this incredible sense of entitlement to women's bodies. Boys are taught that sex is their right – it's on demand, basically – and that girls will resist, and their job is to overcome that resistance. Instead of teaching them about respecting girls as fellow human beings, they're taught that girls are sexual organs.

A culture that devalues girls and women gives social cover to people who want to rape. You don't know which boy is going to be the one who says, "I'm going to go for it."`` `

America's boys. Just a bunch of budding little rapists.

And I do wonder, what does the mother of the 15-year-old boy who was groomed and raped by his friend's mother, a former NFL cheerleader who got 48 weekends of jail, think of that?

Duped ‘Dads’ Aren’t the Only Ones Hurt by Paternity Fraud

Matt · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Countless children go through life not knowing the true identity of their fathers.

Shame on their mothers, and shame on the U.S. court system that — more often than you realize — forces child support on men with no DNA connection.

These false establishments of paternity, as they are called, happen in courts across the country. Our broken family-court system is intent on getting someone — anyone — on record as being responsible for the child so the state won’t be.

The result? Circles of victimized people.

First, the children who are denied the truth about who their biological fathers are, the hereditary diseases they may develop, their heritage, extended family and inheritance rights.

Then there is the innocent man and his family. They are robbed of hard-earned cash and emotional well-being, living with an unfair court order — one that demands compliance for as long as 18 years — takes a terrible toll.'

Prosecutors: 2 Former Day Care Workers Ran ‘Fight Club’ For Kids Aged 4-6

Matt · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Two New Jersey women faced charges Monday for allegedly staging a “fight club” among boys and girls at a day care center, Union County prosecutors said.

As CBS2’s Christine Sloan reported, investigators said the former day care workers – Erica Kenny, 22, of Cranford, and Chanese White, 28, of Roselle – referenced the movie “Fight Club” as they encouraged preschoolers and kindergartners to fight each other on the playground at Lightbridge Academy in Cranford last month.

“About a dozen children — boys and girls between the ages 4 and 6 — just fighting; throwing each other to the ground; hitting each other,” said Union County Prosecutor Grace Park.

Kenny allegedly shot video of the fights and sent them to a group of people on the app Snapchat, prosecutors said.

“Most parents would be astonished by the behavior,” Acting Union County Prosecutor Grace Park told WCBS 880’s Jim Smith.

...

Prosecutors said the former workers staged the fights for pure pleasure. Neighbors of defendant White were stunned.

“It’s unbelievable – God, it’s unbelievable,” said the Rev. James Smith.

“She was very nice, but you don’t really know anybody, really,” said neighbor Betty Farinelli.

The two women have been fired.'

Sousa: “It feels that I have my rights back”

Mastodon · 2 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Francisco Sousa returned to San Diego State’s campus Wednesday, speaking to media at the Conrad Prebys Student Union about the conclusion of his sexual assault case and impending lawsuit.

“It feels that I have my rights back,” Sousa said in an interview with The Daily Aztec. “It feels that I have what I should have had from day one, which (would) be (to be) able to enter freely a campus which I traveled halfway around the world to be (at).”

On Tuesday Sousa confirmed to The Daily Aztec that his suspension from SDSU had been lifted, but that he had no interest in becoming an SDSU student again.

Sousa was suspended for violating Title IX, a federal law prohibiting sexual discrimination on college campuses. He was accused of sexually assaulting a woman at a party last December and was arrested on Dec. 9 for false imprisonment and forcible oral copulation of a female. Those charges were later dropped in February.'

"Why Aren't More Women Reaching The Top Of College Sports?"

Mastodon · 2 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Amy Huchthausen: Women are generally more empathetic and compassionate to people, (although not necessarily caretakers) and so they may look deeper into things when making decisions than men do. The richer experience and perspective you have, the better leader you become. Women have to navigate a different environment and that will impact their personal constitution, and that gives them a different perspective.

Lynn Hickey: I wouldn't say they lead differently, but I do think women can think differently. Women are multi-taskers and think out of the box a little bit more than their male counterparts. I think at times my brain can be like chicken wire in that it is interconnected to all of the things that are going on. In my opinion, women aren't as one track in their thinking. Also, women's level of empathy can be greater than men's, although it doesn't necessarily make us more emotional or gentler in decision making and dealings. It just seems to make them better at serving as a mediator/collaborator when it comes to highly contested issues.

Heather Lyke:I don't think of myself as a female leader, just as a leader in collegiate athletics. When you are hiring people, you are always looking for specific traits and skill sets, regardless of whether they are a man or women. Leadership is not defined by your gender but rather your leadership styles which have to vary given different situations and circumstances. In general terms, women are often more perceptive of what is going on in the lives of those around them. They are in-tune with people outside the workplace, and that helps them be more humanistic and understanding at times.'

Vanderbilt Women's Center to Lecture Men on 'Healthy Masculinities'

Mastodon · 3 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Vanderbilt University's Women's Center will be hosting a week-long event dedicated to lecturing men about what it means to have "healthy masculinity."

The "Healthy Masculinities Week" is sponsored by Vanderbilt's Margaret Cuninggim Women's Center, which claims to be devoted to "Celebrating Women" while "Empowering All."

The mission of the Women's Center is to affirm a "space for all members of the Vanderbilt community that acknowledges and actively resists sexism, racism, homophobia, and all forms of oppression while advocating for positive social change."
...
"Healthy Masculinities Week" hopes to encourage men to "[e]xplore healthy masculinity through various lenses," such as "American society, the gay and bisexual community, fraternities, and more."

The first event as part of the "Healthy Masculinities Week" is called, "The Macho Paradox: Why some men hurt and how all men can help." The title is a reference to a book by Jackson Katz, who is a self-proclaimed "anti-sexist activist" and the speaker for the event.'

California makes ‘aggressive’ push to combat campus sexual assaults

Mastodon · 5 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Advocates argue that the campus system is a crucial alternative to provide some form of justice for victims who may be afraid to report to law enforcement, don’t want their parents to find out, or want action taken sooner than can occur in a lengthy legal process.

“That doesn’t mean she shouldn’t be entitled to other accommodations with classes or not have to see the accused,” said Sandra Henriquez, executive director of the California Coalition Against Sexual Assault. “She still should have the right to have all of the support and have the campus help her to complete her education.”

A backlash is growing, however, from critics who worry that schools are supplanting the criminal justice system with unfair tribunals that run roughshod over the accused. They point to proceedings run by faculty and administrators, a lower “preponderance of the evidence” standard for finding guilt, and a lack of fundamental legal protections like the right to a lawyer.

Those arguments gained traction in July, when a judge overturned the suspension of a UC San Diego student found guilty of sexual assault by a university panel because he was not allowed to confront and cross-examine his accuser.

“At the end of the day, you have an amateur trying to figure out if a rape has occurred,” said Joe Cohn, legislative and policy director for the Foundation for Individual Rights, a Philadelphia-based nonprofit that advocates for free speech and due process at universities. “The better approach would be to make sure predators are actually removed from society and are in jail.”'

Voices Against Violence launches program to includes men in sexual assault conversation

Mastodon · 5 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Voices Against Violence, a group affiliated with the Counseling and Mental Health Center, launched a new program Thursday aiming to include male-identified individuals into the conversation of sexual and domestic violence on campus.

With it's first event, "This is Men's Work," the program, MasculinUT: The Healthy Masculinities Project, hosted a panel of speakers which included Michael Messner, professor of Sociology and Gender at the University of Southern California, as well as UT faculty members and Student Government representatives.

"We intentionally pluralize masculinity because we want to explore the different facets of what it means to be a man in our world," said Erin Burrows, outreach specialist for Voices against Violence. "One of the things we really landed on was most violence was committed by men but most men aren't violent, so how do we fill that gap and really work with men to engage other men in this conversation?"

Messner said he thinks younger generations of men identify with feminist values but don't necessarily use the label as an identifier because of a millennial disinterest in ideological labels.'

Quentin Letts accuses the women revolting over 'manspreading' on trains of being hypocrites

Mastodon · 5 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Chaps, we are under attack. It is time to man (and I mean ‘man’) the defences. In yesterday’s Femail magazine, writer Ginny Dougary accused us of space-hogging — of taking up too much room, particularly in railway carriages.

The problem has become so common that the Oxford Dictionary now has an approved term for it: ‘Manspreading’.

Ginny described (with, it has to be said, rather brilliant gusto) how men plonk themselves down on train seats and thrust wide their beefy thighs. She was so fed up with this behaviour that she was declaring war. Her article was illustrated by a photograph of one man sitting beside three women. Whereas the ladies sat with their knees together or petitely crossed, selfish old Captain Groin had his upper legs as wide as a skier’s snowplough.

As with many gross slanders, Ginny’s article contained a grain or two of truth. Yet that picture was by no means ‘the whole truth and nothing but the truth’.

If it had been, it would have shown certain other objects, would it not? It would have shown the women’s clutter.

Where were their numerous handbags? Where were their coats and wheelie-cases and Filofaxes and half-full Costa coffee cups with smears of lipstick on the rim? And where, if you can illustrate such a chirruping nuisance, was their incessant, temple-denting chatter?'

--
Wikipedia on Quentin Letts here.

Clinton rallies around gender appeal

Mastodon · 6 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a state with a history of electing women to its highest offices, and on the 20th anniversary of her famous speech in Beijing, where as First Lady she declared “women’s rights are human rights and human rights are women’s rights,” Hillary Clinton defined the entire economic agenda of her 2016 campaign as a women's issue.
...
“Raising the minimum wage is a women’s issue,” she said. “Holding corporations accountable when they gouge us on drug prices, pollute our environment or exploit workers are women’s issues.”

Corporations profit-sharing with their employees, college affordability, and creating a pathway to citizenship for immigrants, she added, were all women’s issues, too.'

--
Also see: Hillary Clinton takes aim at rivals but has no qualms about playing gender card

'Remarks About Physical Appearance' Considered 'Sexual Violence' in Rutgers Student Survey

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new survey of Rutgers University students reinforces the idea that one in four college women will be victims of sexual assault... but only if you don't look at the study too closely. Zoom in and you'll find the same problems that plague so much research about sex crimes on college campuses, from defining violence to include rude comments to failing to differentiate between an unwanted kiss and forcible rape.

The Rutgers survey—conducted by the school's Center on Violence Against Women and Children at the request of the White House Task Force to Protect Students from Sexual Assault and the Department of Justice—was carried out last academic year at the state school's New Brunswick campus, attended by about 42,000 students. Around 10,800 students completed the online survey; the majority were undergraduates (80 percent) and women (64 percent).

Rutgers used definitions of sexual violence and sexual assault based on material from the White House task force. "'Sexual assault' and 'sexual violence' refer to a range of behaviors that are unwanted by the recipient," notes a school summary of survey findings, "and include remarks about physical appearance, persistent sexual advances that are undesired by the recipient, threats of force to get someone to engage in sexual behavior, as well as unwanted touching and unwanted oral, anal, or vaginal penetration or attempted penetration."'

Columbia Wants Judge To Toss Suit by Emma Sulkowicz's Accused Rapist

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Columbia University on Friday asked a federal judge to dismiss a lawsuit by a recent graduate who said it allowed a student who accused him of rape to harass him by carrying a mattress around campus in protest, even though the school had cleared him of the allegation.

In a filing in Manhattan federal court, Columbia said the discrimination lawsuit by the plaintiff, Paul Nungesser, suggested that the school had an obligation to silence his accuser, Emma Sulkowicz, from speaking publicly about sexual assault on college campuses, an issue of national concern.

Nungesser in April sued Columbia and visual arts professor Jon Kessler, who oversaw Sulkowicz' senior thesis "Mattress Performance (Carry That Weight)," in which she drew national attention by carrying a mattress around the campus in Manhattan's Morningside Heights. Columbia's president, Lee Bollinger, was also named as a defendant.

"What plaintiff asks this court to do is to second guess the kinds of decisions made by professors and administrators at Columbia in applying disciplinary and academic policies, respecting free speech, and preventing sexual misconduct, as Columbia did in good faith here," Columbia said. "This court cannot and should not accept plaintiff's invitation to do so."'

Would You Rather Be a Man or a Woman Facing a Sexual Assault Trial?

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"She admitted in court to having sexual contact in 2009 with two boys who were age 10 and 12 at the time, Smith-Norton said. The sexual contact came to light in late 2014 after the boys stepped forward and talked to authorities. They told police the sexual contact began in 2005, when they were about 6 and 8 years old, according to Talent police."

That full story is here.

Three hundred and sixty-six years in prison:

"A Victorville man is facing 366 years in prison after being convicted of sexually assaulting a little girl for [two] years beginning when she was only 6, the San Bernardino County District Attorney's Office announced Tuesday."
...
That full story is here. Compare the offenses, ages, and timelines to the sentencing, and the rhetoric.

When these discrepancies come up in the news, most see a male/female gender bias for the criminals, which is certainly there. As a mother of a son, however, I see a lack of respect for the little boys. The 6- and 8-year-old little boys were violated just a surely as the 6-year-old little girl, only the boys' attacker got a relative slap on the wrist.'

Differing Definitions

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For years, advocates pressing colleges to do more to prevent campus sexual assault -- including the White House -- have cited a 2007 statistic that claims one in five female students experiences a sexual assault in college.

That statistic, based on a survey of only two colleges, has been questioned for as long as it has been cited, with a particularly strong backlash emerging in the last year. But, by broadly defining sexual assault in a way similar to the 2007 study, a number of surveys at individual campuses in recent months have started to reach the same conclusion. The most recent research to bolster the statistic comes from Rutgers University at New Brunswick, which was asked by the White House Task Force to Protect Students from Sexual Assault to pilot a climate survey developed by the U.S. Department of Justice.

The university announced the results of the survey today, and provided a list of recommendations to the White House about how to better implement it.'

NZ: Circumcision cut from public funding, people put off by cost

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The strict criteria for publicly-funded circumcisions has seen fewer procedures carried out in the Waikato.

Over the last four-and-a-half years, 403 males received a publicly funded circumcision, with more than half of those patients aged five years and under.

Waikato Hospital Services executive director Brett Paradine said policy does not allow paediatric surgeons to perform circumcisions for religious or cultural reasons.

"We are confident as we can be without a manual search of all records, that the circumcisions that have been done have been done for clear medical indications, often as a necessary part of other surgery."

K'aute Pasifika nurse Maiotele Lowen said circumcision is common among the Samoan community but it was more of a religious practice as opposed to a cultural practice.'

US House Hearing Sept. 10: “Preventing and Responding to Sexual Assault on College Campuses”

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Hearing notice here. Excerpt:

'Sep 10, 2015

The hearing is scheduled at 10:00 a.m. in room 2261 Rayburn H.O.B. Witnesses to be announced.'

Malnourished two-year-old found being breastfed by dog in Chile

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A malnourished two-year-old boy has been rescued by Chilean police after he was found being breastfed by a neighbour's dog.

A witness saw the dog, called Reina, feeding the boy on Thursday at a mechanic's workshop in the desert port of Arica, more than 1,000 miles north of the capital, Santiago, according to police.

The boy was also suffering from a skin infection and lice infestation, according to 24Hora.cl.

Captain Diego Gajardo told The Associated Press that the child was released from hospital on Friday and is under the care of child welfare authorities.

He added that the mother of the child arrived at the hospital drunk, but that she has not been placed under arrest because there had been no physical harm to the boy.'

Recent story-creation issues resolved

Matt · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

ADMIN ANNOUNCEMENT

If you recently had problems creating a story to submit ("Forbidden" error), these should now be resolved. If you continue having such problems, drop me a note at admin-at-mensactivism.org.

Better data needed on sexual assault

Mastodon · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A study regularly touted by numerous media outlets (not to mention the White House) says 1 in 5 women will be sexually assaulted on her college campus before she graduates.

Let me say that another way.

If you believe this finding and you're a female college freshman, then you must accept that you have a 20 percent chance of being sexually assaulted in the next four to six years.

Twenty percent.

That's greater than the likelihood of a woman being diagnosed with breast cancer (1 in 8) in her lifetime.

And if true, it would make college campuses one of the most dangerous places for women in America today.'

Feminist research fellow: Put all men ‘in some kind of camp’

Mastodon · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In an interview with the website radfem collective, founder of the group Justice for Women and research fellow at the University of Lincoln Julie Bindel says that she would “put … all [men] in some kind of camp where they can all drive around in quad bikes, or bicycles, or white vans.”

She also says that heterosexuality won’t survive “unless men get their act together, have their power taken from them and behave themselves.”

From the interview:

"I mean, I would actually put them all in some kind of camp where they can all drive around in quad bikes, or bicycles, or white vans. I would give them a choice of vehicles to drive around with, give them no porn, they wouldn’t be able to fight – we would have wardens, of course! Women who want to see their sons or male loved ones would be able to go and visit, or take them out like a library book, and then bring them back.

I hope heterosexuality doesn’t survive, actually. I would like to see a truce on heterosexuality. I would like an amnesty on heterosexuality until we have sorted ourselves out. Because under patriarchy it’s shit."'

NZ politician: We'll take the women and children, but male Syrian refugees should 'go back and fight'

Mastodon · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The New Zealand First leader, a long-time immigration critic, backs the Government's emergency intake of 600 refugees from the war torn country, but with a controversial condition.

"I think we can do better, but we can't while we've got mass immigration," Mr Peters said.

"If we are going to do it, let's take the women and children and tell some of the men to go back and fight for the country's freedom like we are."'

An Emma Sulkowicz timeline

Matt · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Emma Sulkowicz is an American arts student, born in New York in 1992, who gained media attention for carrying a mattress around campus to highlight what she saw as Columbia University's lack of action to remove her alleged rapist from the campus.
...
The relationship progresses to "friends with benefits". In the spring of 2012 they have sex twice, the second time, according to Nungesser, includes anal sex, which Nungesser has not experienced before. Sulkowicz said she had tried before with other men and enjoyed it.

One of the main reasons their relationship does not become deeper was that Sulkowicz had previously been having sex with Nungesser's close friend, known as John Doe. While Nungesser is back home inGermany for the summer, she messages him that she had tested positive for an STD (Chlamydia) after having having drunken sex at a party with John Doe, and his best friend Joe.'

LA Unified board unanimously approves girls-only STEM school

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Thanks to an unanimous vote by the LA Unified school board yesterday, the district will become the first in California in a decade to open a girls-only traditional public school.

The approval of the the school was anti-climactic in that the board had already approved it by a vote in April, but at the time needed to still secure a waiver from the state Department of Education, which it now has.

The vote dedicates over $231,000 for the district to convert a traditional classroom building at Los Angeles High School in the Mid-Wilshire neighborhood into the new Girls Academic Leadership Academy. The school, which is scheduled to open next fall with space for 450 students, will begin with students only in 6th and 9th grades and will grow one grade level each year.'

Wake-up call: Boys are falling behind in school, college, careers

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a recent ranking of the states on women's equality, Maine garnered high marks for a relatively small gender gap when it comes to college degree attainment. But these high marks are misleading: The education gap in Maine is small because too few men have college degrees.

WalletHub, which ranks states based on many different sorts of data, ranked Maine sixth in the country for gender equality based on three measures: workplace environment, education and political representation. The education ranking included two subcategories: the percentage of residents over age 25 with a bachelor's degree or higher and math scores.

Maine tied for first with Alaska, Hawaii, North Dakota and Vermont for the smallest gap between the percentage of men and women with bachelor's degrees or higher (these states' gaps were actually negative, because more women than men have degrees). All of these states boast percentages of college-educated women that beat the national average of 28.7 percent, according to 2013 census data, which WalletHub used for its comparisons. But in three of these states — Maine, Alaska and North Dakota — a below-average percentage of men have bachelor's degrees. In Maine, 26.9 percent of men over 25 have bachelor's degrees, compared with 29 percent of women. In 2013, the national average for men was 29 percent.'

Men missing from workforce may not come back

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Millions of workers who dropped out of the job market during the last economic slump were supposed to jump back in once things turned around. But more than six years after the recession ended, the missing millions are increasingly looking like they're gone for good.

The nation's labor participation rate – defined as the share of the working-age population that is either working or looking for work – hasn't budged from a 38-year-low of 62.6 percent this summer. And most experts don't see an upswing on the way.

The reasons include the nation's aging population, swelling ranks of people on disability and the changing nature of jobs. But one of the biggest factors has to do with men in the prime of their work lives, particularly those with less education.'

Britain's top family judge rules that a single father has no rights over his own son

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A single man's fight to be recognised as the sole parent of a surrogate baby boy that he paid to have born in America has been rejected by a leading High Court judge in a unique test case.

The British man, who cannot be named, paid a US agency £8,000 - and a surrogate mother more than £20,000 - in his bid to become a father.

The unnamed one-year-old boy was conceived using the man's sperm and a donor egg and he has been recognised as the child's father in the state of Minnesota.

But that held no sway with Britain's most senior family judge, the President of the Family Division, Sir James Munby, today in court.

Whatever the position in America, the judge said English law emphatically recognises the surrogate mother as the child's only legal parent.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008 dictates that only 'two people' - effectively a couple - can be officially recognised as the parents of a surrogate baby.'

California lawmakers seek nation's first 'Yes means Yes' high school sexual assault training

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Lawmakers on Friday sent Gov. Jerry Brown a "Yes means Yes" bill that backers said would make California the first to bring the sexual assault training to high schools.

SB695 requires school districts to teach sexual violence prevention as part of their health curriculum if health education is required to graduate.

The bill by Senate President Pro Tem Kevin de Leon and Sen. Hannah-Beth Jackson follows legislation last year requiring all colleges receiving public funds to adopt a so-called affirmative consent standard for investigating assault allegations.

The bill would specify that students be informed about the "Yes Means Yes" law.

"By teaching our youth about assertive consent and healthy relationships, we will be building a strong foundation — strong foundation for our young men, our young women, a strong foundation for our schools, a strong foundation for our community so we can understand, so we can learn about what sexual assaults are all about," said de Leon, D-Los Angeles.'

Colleges can't win when it comes to campus sexual assault complaints

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It doesn't seem to matter what a college does when responding to a sexual assault accusation — they are always wrong. That's according to the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights, which investigates colleges and universities for alleged Title IX violations.

In a recent ruling against Michigan State University, OCR determined the school had violated Title IX because it took too long — four days — to remove accused students from their dorms. The fact that the students weren't immediately evicted from campus, even though an investigation hadn't even started, was also evidence of a violation.

OCR looked at two complaints, from students identified as Student A and Student B, to determine MSU was in violation of Title IX. While OCR mostly found "insufficient evidence" to support the complaints of the two students, what the agency found the university in violation of seemed like nitpicking.'

College Promises to Punish Hecklers of Mandatory Play

Matt · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A iberal arts college in North Carolina is pledging to identify and potentially punish students who heckled a play about sexual assault the college forced them to attend.

"It Stops Here," an original play produced by students at Greensboro College, was first performed last Wednesday before a crowd of students, but the performance didn't go as planned. According to people at the play, members of the audience frequently heckled the cast and shouted sexually explicit remarks.

"Many of the boys started calling out 'She wanted it, it's not rape,' and making masturbation noises," stage manager Claire Sellers told a local news station. Sellers said the remarks were so excessive that cast members "became physically ill and vomited after the show because they were so vulgar."

Notably, though, the hecklers do not appear to have been invading the performance to disrupt it. Rather, attendance at the play was mandatory for all incoming freshmen at Greensboro, as well as for some older student-athletes who were required to attend by coaches.'

"My warning to incoming and returning college students"

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As classes begin at colleges and universities across the country, incoming and returning students need to be keenly aware of the current culture surrounding sex on and off campus.

First and foremost, students can assume that they have no constitutional due process rights on their college campus, even in public institutions. One might think that they do, as those rights are guaranteed under the Constitution, but the truth today is that when you step foot on that campus you live by their rules.

That is because college campuses are now responsible for their own criminal justice system, thanks to an interpretation of a federal law. While colleges would never be expected to adjudicate a murder, they are now expected to adjudicate accusations of sexual assault. And the marching orders from Washington suggest that the goal of such adjudications should be to punish accused students, truth be damned.

And these campuses are not bound by the presumption of innocence or the rules of evidence or any other basic legal concepts. These days, an accusation almost ensures a finding of guilt and an expulsion. And the evidence used to justify the expulsion is becoming flimsier and flimsier.'

Of frogs and misandry

Matt · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Seems anything can be turned into an opportunity to bash on men. Excerpt:

'Dating is getting a whole lot harder in suburban frog ponds.

In a new study published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, researchers David Skelly and Max Lambert sampled hundreds of frogs from Connecticut ponds and found that males are disappearing. And they aren't just being born at lower rates than females — they're actually becoming female.
...
Now, I know what you're thinking: Poor lady frogs! How are you supposed to find a boyfriend if all the guys are disappearing? It's hard enough to be a fly-eater and now you're telling me there's a serious dude shortage. Well, lady frogs. I come to you with a message of hope: Life without males could actually be an improvement. Think of a problem real quick. Let's say … climate change. And who do we have to blame for that? Henry Ford comes to mind. Also the CEOs of oil companies, most politicians, and whoever thought up capitalism in the first place. Basically, a bunch of men. Now, how about the Syrian refugee crisis? Whose fault is that? That would be one Bashar Hafez al-Assad, otherwise known as A MAN. Same thing for dog fighting, deforestation, homelessness, the European debt crisis, and the fact that my street always smells like piss. There's a dude behind it all. Lady frogs, consider yourselves lucky. Got room in there for one more?'

Hungary: Camerawoman trips up fleeing migrants

Matt · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article and video here. "Women are naturally more compassionate than men," saith the feminist. Ugh.

'A Hungarian camerawoman has been sacked after apparently tripping up migrants.

They were trying to escape from a collection point in the village of Roszke near the Serbian border, in Hungary.

Hungary's N1TV, who she worked for, said in a statement that an employee had shown "unacceptable behaviour".'

MEPs call for free, gender-equal public education for all children

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Even though women now make up the majority (60%) of higher education graduates in the EU, they are still less paid for their qualifications than men and are underrepresented in management positions, science and engineering. To encourage more women to take up science, technology, engineering and mathematics, MEPs call for equal access measures and the use of information and communication technologies from pre-school education onwards.
...
Members call on EU member states to encourage girls and boys to take an equal interest in all subjects beyond gendered stereotypes, stressing the role of positive female role models in schools, universities and science.
...
Furthermore, Member states could consider making age-appropriate sex and relationship education compulsory in all primary and secondary school curricula, to teach girls and boys about relationships based on consent, respect and reciprocity, MEPs suggest.

To combat discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation and gender identity, MEPs urge the Commission to support the inclusion of objective information on LGBTI issues in school curricula. to fight gender-based violence, discrimination, harassment, homophobia and transphobia, in all their forms, including cyber-bullying or online harassment, says the text.'

Dear stores, What about the boys?

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Dear Gap,

I'd like to take a minute to introduce you to my son. He's a bright 11-year-old who wants to go to MIT when he grows up. He plays guitar and piano. He has a kind heart and sometimes gives up his birthday presents in lieu of dog and cat food for our local animal shelter.

This year, when we were school shopping at your store, he said something that made me want to write to you. After much shrugging and dragging his feet, he picked a few things out to buy. This is not usual behavior for my son. He enjoys buying things whether they are clothes, a remote helicopter, or a new graphic novel.

But when we finally reached the cashier, my son quietly said to me, "I guess boys are insignificant."

I thought I misheard him and bought the clothes, but then he enlightened me: He nodded towards the girls' side of the store. I'm ashamed to admit I hadn't even noticed the advertisements. Three large prints of beautiful young girls were advertised as future engineers, athletes, and musicians. I explained to my son that Gap is trying to encourage girls; they are trying to make girls feel like they can do anything. In essence, Gap is trying to empower the women of the future.

Then he motioned to the boys' side of the store. There was one advertisement of a boy in Gap clothing. His future was not projected. And, frankly, there were very few clothes for him to choose from.'

UK: Lawyer accused of sexism after complimenting barrister on 'stunning' LinkedIn picture

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A 57-year-old lawyer was accused of “unacceptable and misogynistic behaviour” after he sent a barrister half his age a LinkedIn message complimenting her on her “stunning picture”.

Alexander Carter-Silk was named and shamed on Twitter by 27-year-old human rights lawyer Charlotte Proudman who posted her reply to the message online.

He has since apologised for the message, in which he told Ms Proudman he was “delighted to connect”, adding “I appreciate that this is probably horrendously politically incorrect but that is a stunning picture !!!”

The lawyer, a partner at international firm Brown Rudnick continued: “You definitely win the prize for the best Linked in picture I have ever seen.
...
Her response, which prompted praise on social media, read: “I am on linked-in for business purposes not to be approached about my physical appearance or to be objectified by sexist men.'

10-year-old autistic boy kept in cage at school

Mastodon · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Photos have emerged of the cage installed in an Australian classroom to hold a 10-year-old boy with autism.

The two-metre by two-metre cage made out of blue fencing, which has a self-closing door and latch, was built in a Canberra classroom on March 10 and removed 17 days later. It was dismantled after the education department was made aware of the "inappropriate structure."

The installation of the cage made national headlines at the time, and an investigation was launched by the Australian Capital Territory's (ACT) Education Directorate. This led a to a report, released Tuesday, which stated the construction was an isolated incident and it was decided by one individual, the principal of the school, who hired an external party to carry out the work.'

SAVE: Law Professors Voice Concerns Over ‘Affirmative Consent’ Policies for Sex

Matt · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'A growing number of legal scholars are expressing concerns over affirmative consent policies that some universities are considering for implementation. The concerns follow recent passage of laws in California and New York mandating such policies on college campuses.

This past week, Tamara Rice Lave of the University of Miami law school wrote on her blog, “I have a problem with legally requiring affirmative consent. I don’t see how making a person prove that her partner consented doesn’t switch the burden of proof to the accused…I find this trend to be extremely troubling.” http://prawfsblawg.blogs.com/prawfsblawg/2015/09/affirmative-consent-and-switching-the-burden-of-proof.html

Nadine Strossen, former president of the American Civil Liberties Union and current professor at New York Law School, recently noted, “These affirmative consent rules violate rights of due process and privacy. They reverse the usual presumption of innocence. Unless the guy can prove that his sexual partner affirmatively consented to every single contact, he is presumed guilty of sexual misconduct.” http://news.hamlethub.com/ridgefield/events/48981-former-aclu-president-nadine-strossen-will-be-the-keynote-speaker-at-wcsu-s-constitution-day'

Education Department Harms Innocent Colleges and Students through Illegal Title IX Mandates

Matt · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Education Department, where I used to work, is becoming more and more extreme in how it interprets and applies federal law. Sometimes this comes at the expense of colleges: as a task force of college presidents recently noted in a report to the U.S. Senate, the Education Department frequently makes up new legal mandates out of thin air under the bogus pretense that they are required by some statute, and then imposes them on colleges, without even going through the notice and comment required by the Administrative Procedure Act.

Sometimes, its overreaching comes at the expense of individual people. The Education Department has thumbed its nose at court rulings by creating entitlements for people who make false discrimination and harassment complaints—even though such baseless complaints can make life miserable for the victims of such false allegations (and cause serious problems for the institution they work for or attend).'

Australia: Position Vacant - Men & Families Worker (northern Adelaide, SA)

Minuteman · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Dad's Business operates in the Playford Council area and has a strong community development focus. It aims to foster environments where all young children can have optimal developmental opportunities for their physical, social and emotional growth.

The support offered includes ante and postnatal sessions for young parents and fathers, parenting and activity groups for fathers only, and with their children, and some community event participation and facilitation with a focus on wellbeing messages for fathers and families.

The role involves liaising with community, including Aboriginal community, to ensure that the program meets the needs of the Playford population.

The successful applicant will have strong child development knowledge, including an understanding of the importance of play. Proven experience in engaging vulnerable families, group facilitation and a community development background would be desirable.'

Another lopsided congressional hearing on campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Senate committee that handles education issues held a hearing this summer on campus sexual assault that didn't feature any advocates for due process or rights for accused students.

Those advocates had to submit testimony for the record, rather than have the opportunity before a national TV audience to explain the plight of students falsely accused of assault.

Its House counterpart's higher education subcommittee is holding a hearing tomorrow on campus sexual assault that at least features one advocate of due process, Joe Cohn of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education.

But the rest of the witness list suggests he'll be in the minority.'

The Return of the Sex Wars

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last summer, the Harvard law professor Janet Halley sat down at her dining-room table to look through a set of policies that her university created for handling complaints of sexual assault and harassment. Halley had taught this area for years, and she was interested to see what the university came up with. The new rules were released amid pressure from student-led groups of rape survivors and their advocates, who demanded that schools across the country do more on behalf of victims. Harvard was also responding to years of calls for change by the Obama administration. Just eight months earlier, Valerie Jarrett, a senior presidential adviser, called for a “more victim-centered” campus approach to dealing with the problem of sexual assault.

But as Halley read the new rules, she felt alarmed — stunned, in fact. The university’s definition of harassment seemed far too broad. She worried that Harvard’s new rules would not be fair to the accused. She thought of a case she wrote about years earlier, in which a military serviceman was discharged because another serviceman complained that the man had looked into his eyes for too long in the mailroom.'

We need to stop telling ourselves that women and children are the only refugees who matter

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'David Cameron has now pledged to take in 20,000 refugees from Syria over the next five years, and singled out vulnerable children and orphans. This wasn't limited to one side of the political spectrum. Before his announcement, the former Labour Home Secretary David Blunkett called on the Government to take 25,000 refugees over the next sixth months, and said that Syrian women and children should be given priority.

So far this hasn't proved controversial – everyone seems to agree that young people and women require the most attention. But we must be careful not to forget that this is a humanitarian issue, and one that affects an entire population. Otherwise, the message we're sending is that the lives of Arab men do not matter.

If our humanitarian sympathies are only summoned in response to children and families, then we risk dehumanising Arab men. This only helps to reinforce a history of Western misrepresentation, in which Arab men are viewed as dangerous, uncivilized, barbaric, and incapable of reason. This might not seem immediately obvious from their absence in the media's coverage. But the invisibility of the Arab men allows these ideas to insidiously fill the gaps, sometimes even subconsciously.'

McCaskill: Senate with majority of women will mean better government

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Women will one day outnumber men in the Senate and when that happens, government will work better, Sen. Claire McCaskill said Wednesday.

And if women want to succeed in politics, they need to get over the “disease to appease” and be hyper strategic, the Missouri Democrat told a crowd of about 150 students at George Washington University. One thing they don’t have to do? Give up plans to have a family.

“I have not been a perfect mother, but the notion that you cannot do this job and be a mother is just BS,” McCaskill said.

Marine study finds all-male infantry units outperformed teams with women

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Marine Corps study that found all-male ground combat units more effective than teams that included women has raised new concerns about the Pentagon's push to open all jobs to women next year.

A summary of results released Thursday from the unprecedented study showed that all-male ground combat squads were faster, stronger and more lethal in most cases than units that included women.The women also suffered higher injury rates during physically demanding training.

The Marine Corps and other services face a deadline the Pentagon has set for requiring military branches to open all specialties to women, including infantry and special operations forces, beginning next year.

The services have until the end of this month to request an exception to the order for some occupations.

The Marine Corps has not yet said whether it will request a waiver, but the study's results are likely to fuel a growing debate over including women in ground combat jobs.'

Want More Women In IT? Drop the Geek

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Two studies done by the University of Washington show that one potential impediment to girls becoming IT pros is the "geek" stereotype of the IT pro, especially in the classroom.

A study conducted at the University of Washington and published in the Journal of Educational Psychology in August showed that girls might actually choose not to take introductory computer classes because the rooms in which they are conducted might be too "geeky." For the study, 269 14- to 18-year-olds were shown photos of two classrooms. One room had Star Trek and videogame posters on the walls and other "geeky" decor. The other had posters of art and landscapes on the walls and live plants in the room. Other than the decor, the rooms were identical.'

Dem Rep. on Campus Rape: Better to Expel More Students, Even if 80% Are Innocent

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'During a House Education and Workforce Committee hearing, Democratic Congressman Jared Polis said that even if a whopping 80% of accused campus rapists are innocent, it was still better to kick them all out of school.

“I mean, we’re talking about a private institution,” he said. “If I was running one, I might say, ‘Well you know even if there’s a 20-30% chance that this happened, I would want to remove this individual.”

Freedom for Individual Rights in Education policy director Joseph Cohn responded by telling Polis that the sort of standard he was discussing would be highly unlikely to pass the due process requirements that public universities must legally abide by.'

Contact info for Rep. Polis is here. Feel free to let him know what you think of his position.

Campus sexual assault hearing applauds witch-hunt mentality

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'At a congressional hearing on campus sexual assault, Colorado Rep. Jared Polis suggested that expelling students based solely on the idea that they might have committed a crime is an acceptable standard. And the hearing audience applauded him.

Polis, a Democrat, was discussing due process and standards of evidence as they apply to colleges and universities adjudicating sexual assault. Currently, colleges must be only 50.01 percent sure that an accusation is valid before punishing an accused student (more on that later). Polis began advocating for allowing colleges to use a lower standard than that.

"I mean, if there's 10 people that have been accused and under a reasonable likelihood standard maybe one or two did it, seems better to get rid of all 10 people," Polis said. "We're not talking about depriving them of life or liberty, we're talking about their transfer to another university."

For this, the audience applauded.'

--
Also see: Rep. Jared Polis Thinks Colleges Should Be Able to Expel Students When They're Only 20% Sure a Rape Happened

Students carrying mattresses, wearing red ‘X’s’ protest sexual abuse on college campuses

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Last week on the Northern Kentucky University campus, a female student carried a mattress on her back around the campus to call attention to her issues with how the university dealt with a sexual assault complaint.

Today, at noon, a group of students organized a peaceful protest, urging a demonstration to support survivors of sexual and domestic violence.
...
A flyer distributed to encourage student participation suggested carrying a mattress, a pillow or other symbol and the taping of a red X on clothing to show support. The flyer added, “Domestic abuse, sexual assault, and rape have all been an alarmingly large part of American society, particularly on college campuses. Society blames the victims, so the victims can often be driven to self-harm and suicide. . .This peaceful protest is a way to give a HUGE middle finger to the perpetrators of these crimes, many of which may in fact share classes with us.”'

Intel Cuts $300M in Jobs, Research, Education and Talent... to Fund Fashionable Feminist Nonsense

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A pressing dilemma is troubling the budget departments of Intel, the chip and microprocessor giant. Should they invest in STEM education, to cultivate the next generation of American geniuses? Or should they blow all their cash on finding people with the right skin colour and genitals?

It shouldn't be a difficult choice. But apparently it is. The company recently announced that it's pulling $6 million in sponsorship for the Science Talent Search, just months after memos leaked to the Oregonian indicated that they'd have to slash budgets by $300 million across business groups.

Does that $300m number sound familiar? It should: it's the same amount Intel pledged "diversity" efforts, including the widely derided Feminist Frequency, just a few months ago.

It would seem that pointless, hand-wringing political gestures have become more important to Intel than cultivating scientific expertise in America and Israel. Maybe we shouldn't be surprised. Intel's diversity drive was a direct response to hectoring from people whose primary experience of tech is complaining about microaggressions on social media.'

A compliment isn’t misogynistic

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If you were in any doubt that we live in mean-spirited and vengeful times, then Complimentgate should put you straight. Complimentgate is the name I’m giving to the naming and shaming of a solicitor who had the temerity to say something nice about a woman’s looks. For doing this, for paying someone a compliment, he has now become an object of Twitter-ridicule, fodder for the insatiable global outrage industry, which rails not only against people who are abusive online but also against people who are nice. No one is safe from their virtual slings and arrows.

The man in question is Alexander Carter-Silk. Via LinkedIn, he sent what the press is bizarrely referring to as a ‘controversial message’ to one Charlotte Proudman, a barrister. His crime was to describe Ms Proudman’s profile pic as ‘stunning’, which was a bit too generous in my view – her fringe needs work and her pout is too severe. Ms Proudman, describing herself as a ‘fearless feminist’, informed Mr Carter-Silk that his message was ‘offensive and misogynistic’ and then splashed his wicked words on Twitter. Before long the Twitterati, sniffing an opportunity for outrage, were churning out 140 characters of fury about what a twisted, disgusting world we live in, whereby a man thinks he can say something nice about a woman and get away with it.'

'Thumb-Sucking Little Beta Males' - Fox's Andrea Tantaros Blasts Vanderbilt's 'Healthy Masculinities Week'

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On the September 4 episode of the Fox show "Outnumbered," co-host Andrea Tantaros blasted a conference that is taking place September 10-17 at Vanderbilt University.

“Healthy Masculinities Week” describes itself as a way to “explore healthy masculinities through various senses: American society, the gay and bisexual community, fraternities, and more.” It is sponsored by the Margaret Cuninggim Women’s Center at Vanderbilt.

DAGEN MCDOWELL: Why does Vanderbilt see the need to have this masculinity week?

ANDREA TANTAROS: Because they're trying to demasculinize men. I mean this is theme beyond just Vanderbilt University. I mean they are trying, and by they I mean the academics and the liberal Left, is trying to turn men into thumb-sucking little beta males in skinny jeans. All you have to do is look at what they're trying to teach these guys. Why don't they just ask them to check their cajones at the door when they walk in? That's basically it. You mentioned "Magic Mike." Who likes "Magic Mike"? I do, but I'm a woman. And so now they're just feminizing all these men coast to coast. It's a problem.'

The Anti-Romeos: Feminism's Assault on Masculinity

Mastodon · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'American women should be outraged. Not because of their supposed oppression over the years, but because American women have been starved of one of the greatest values available to them while living life on earth: masculine men.

This is not to say that masculine men don't exist—they do, by the millions! But, culturally, they are suffocated.

Before the malicious feminist revolution, women could enjoy not just men, but masculine men. Popular actors included the masculine Paul Newman, the gentlemanly Clark Gable, the cool and confident Sean Connery. Women could line up at military bases to watch their favorite men in uniform. Up until just before the women's liberation movement, women used to faint after seeing their favorite men in concert. In my lifetime, I have yet to see such a health concern at a concert—unless the raped, dehydrated, and mud-covered women of the 1999 Woodstock count.

For the past 30 years, the dirtiest, most politically incorrect concept to talk about has been masculinity. It has been pushed under the rug, twisted, turned, and manipulated. In our newly feminized nation, few want to talk about it or define it. Let us now define it.'

Freshman charged with rape 'no longer permitted on campus'

Mastodon · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Christopher Petersen, a freshman student who was charged with first-degree sexual assault of a woman in Sandoz Hall, is no longer allowed on campus, the university said in a statement on Thursday afternoon.

"UNL has taken steps to ensure the safety of the campus in the wake of this report," university spokesperson Steve Smith said in an email. "I can confirm that Mr. Petersen is no longer permitted on the UNL campus."

Petersen was released on a $50,000 bond from the Lancaster County jail. Petersen was arrested on Monday on suspicion of the sexual assault. He was charged with first-degree sexual assault by Lancaster County prosecutors after a student living in Sandoz Hall told police she was raped in her dorm room on September 5.
...
Under the University of Nebraska-Lincoln student code of conduct under Appendix A: Response to Allegations of Student Sexual Misconduct, the university is allowed to pursue disciplinary action against a student at the same time the student is facing criminal charges for the same offense, even if the criminal prosecution is pending, or has been dismissed.

"It is worth emphasizing that student disciplinary records are private," Smith said. "Therefore, in the interest of privacy of the individual, we are prohibited from disclosing further details."'

"All men are potential rapists"

Mastodon · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Please beware, the male feminist in this video is extremely disturbed. I'm not embellishing when I say his comments are frightening. Sadly, he may be a microcosm of a new generation of self-loathing males. Description: "You can thank MRAs for fighting tooth and nail to preserve rape culture."

Dad's Wage Gap Fix: Save for Daughter, Not Son

Mastodon · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Paul Ford has preschool twins, Abe and Ivy. But he's worried that, thanks to gender inequality and the ongoing wage gap that still pays women only 78% of what men make, his little lady isn't going to get a fair shake financially when she's older. So, he writes for Elle, he came up with the idea for a "Jump the Gap" fund for Ivy. Adjusting for inflation, Ford figured out what salaries his kids would make upon entering the workforce in 2032 and how much in lost wages Ivy would rack up by 2070 (between $1 million and $3 million, by his count), figuring in the years she might leave work to care for future kids. "We can predict that, because of the systematic economic inequities, our daughter will not be on the same financial footing as our son. And so why not start now?" Ford writes, insisting he's not favoring Ivy over Abe, because if Abe really needed financial assistance down the road, Ford and his wife would "go all in" and do what they could.

Ford also thinks his son won't be jealous if he and his wife do a careful job raising both kids with info about gender bias. Others are weighing in on Ford's "purchasing her equality" initiative, as he puts it. Katy Osborn writes forTime that, despite his "imperfect response ... at least he's putting his money where his mouth is." But Kelsey Miller notes for Refinery 29 that Ford's "mansplaining" and his suggested solution "reads like A Modest Proposal for the Internet Age." Ivy's extra stash won't "inoculate her from unequal pay or prejudicial hiring practices," Miller writes, may create an unhealthy sibling rivalry, and isn't practical for most families. "His solution is one that only an extremely privileged minority could possibly achieve, and so to present it as a viable option to the general public is so nonsensical that it borders on trolling," she notes. ...'

Male Control Theory

Robber748 · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminist scholarship leaves a lot to be desired. Feminists often provide statistics that cannot be sourced, perform highly biased studies with major flaws, and shame men into giving in to feminist demands even after their prevarications have been exposed.

Male Control Theory is a feminist theory that contends that the male patriarchy motivates men to try to control women, and to use violence if necessary. This theory appears to be the basis of many feminist legal and ideological arguments. For example, it is the feminist basis of men's domestic violence against women, and states that most female-on-male violence is defensive in nature. This theory has been used to institute policies that blame and punish men for domestic violence.

Evidence has been mounting that this theory is pure crap. A study led by Elizabeth Bates provides such evidence. This study found that women are more likely to be physically and verbally aggressive against their partners than men are, and that women are more likely to seek control over their partners. The study also found that defensive violence was more likely to be used by men than women. Chivalry tends to reduce mens' tendency to be violent against women, while it simultaneously contributes to increasing women's violence against men, since women understand that men are reluctant to hit back. This study found that the basis of domestic violence is not mens' need to control, but a violent personality, which can be found equally well in men and women. The study noted that earlier studies promoting Male Control Theory in domestic violence suffered from selection bias, since many only studied women in women's shelters. There are many other studies confirming Bates' results against Male Control Theory. Once again, we have faulty science performed by feminists and then used for decades by feminists to promote counterproductive and male-oppressive policies. There are many feminist campaigns of hate against men.'

FACE Responds to Hearing Testimony from House Education and Workforce Committee's Subcommittee on Higher Education and Workforce Training

Matt · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'Families Advocating for Campus Equality (FACE), a not for profit organization that advocates for fairness for any student accused of sexual misconduct on campus, expresses the following responses to key points made in testimony before a House subcommittee meeting on the topic of campus sexual assault held on September 10, 2015

FACE strongly disagrees with the statement by Congressman Jared Polis (D-Co 2nd District) that lowering the standard of proof in order to expel more students makes campuses safer and fairer. As other speakers noted, Title IX is a gender neutral law, and any innocent student who is expelled from college is illegally deprived of access to education. Being expelled from college does not simply lead to transfer to another college, as permanent disciplinary records with ominous findings make it difficult or impossible to enter another institution or find employment. Furthermore, the profound and lasting emotional trauma associated with a false accusation, just as for victims of assault, is not a matter to be taken lightly. Many victims of false accusations suffer from PTSD, depression and other health issues as a result of their experiences.'

Boys continue to outperfirm girls in math portion of SAT

ThomasI · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The College Board released its 2015 SAT college-entrance test results this week, and the overall results were somewhat disappointing ("ugly" according to AEI's Rick Hess's article below), see Washington Post article "SAT scores at lowest level in 10 years, fueling worries about high school" and the National Review article "The New SAT Results Aren't Pretty," by AEI scholar Rick Hess, who points out that the "scores on the SAT have sunk to the lowest point since the venerable college-admission test was revamped in 2005."

As in the past, my main interest in the annual SAT test results is the ongoing gender gap in favor of boys for the SAT math test, and this year wasn't any different than previous years. ...'

University settles with former student in sex assault case

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The University of Michigan has reached a settlement agreement with a former student suspended in 2012 after he was accused of sexual assault.

Under the agreement, confirmed Friday by a UM spokesman, the university states that student Drew Sterrett's disciplinary record will reflect that he did not violate its sexual misconduct policy. As part of the agreement, Sterrett cannot reapply to the university and cannot disparage or contact the female student who brought the complaint against him.

Sterrett's alleged victim is unhappy with the settlement and is weighing her legal options in light of the agreement, her attorney told The Detroit News on Friday.

The settlement — signed by the university on Sept. 1 and Sterrett on Tuesday — is in response to a federal lawsuit Sterrett filed against the university alleging that it unfairly forced him off campus by denying him due process in its investigation of the sexual misconduct allegation.'

Mothers of sons falsely accused of rape hammer congressman who called for expulsion of innocents

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When Rep. Jared Polis, D-Colo., suggested yesterday that colleges be allowed to expel students accused of rape even when they were only 20 percent sure those students were guilty, he was applauded in the subcommittee hearing room.

The reaction outside of Rayburn 2261, though, was swift and vituperative. Perhaps the group with the most moral authority to rebuke Polis was Families Advocating Campus Equality.

Founded by three mothers of sons who were falsely accused of rape at their respective colleges, FACE has ample experience with campus disciplinary proceedings that are identified as “educational” by administrators but Kafkaesque by the accused and their loved ones.'

Navy Secretary criticizes Marines' infantry study in interview

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Navy Secretary Ray Mabus has doubled down on his assertion that all combat jobs should be opened to women in the wake of a new study showing that all-male Marine control groups outperformed those with women in nearly every infantry task.

Mabus spoke to David Greene at NPR a day after Marine officials revealed findings from a nine-month infantry experiment that assessed the performance of male and female Marine volunteers during physically demanding ground combat tasks. A summary of data showed that mixed-gender teams completed tasks more slowly and shot with less accuracy, and that women sustained injuries at more than twice the rate of their male counterparts.

In his radio interview, Mabus suggested the Marines' study was flawed due to the caliber and mindset of the volunteer participants.

"It started out with a fairly large component of the men thinking 'this is not a good idea,' and 'women will never be able to do this,' " Mabus said. "When you start out with that mindset, you're almost presupposing the outcome."'

University Of California May Give Students Right To Not Be Offended

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of California may explicitly recognize a right for students to not be offended, if a resolution under consideration is approved by the board of regents next week.
...
"Articulating a view that people with various intellectual disabilities are incapable of various intellectual tasks, or people with various physical disabilities are incapable of various physical tasks, would be condemned by the authority of the University," he writes. "Saying that illegal aliens (or noncitizens who are legally here) ought not be appointed to be, say, the student member of the Board of Regents — likewise condemned."

Attempts to discuss cultural or biological differences between men and women, between gay and straight people, or between different ethnic groups will be condemned totally, without any tolerance for speakers to give an argument, Volokh argues. For example, the question over whether gay parents can raise children as effectively as straight parents, relevant to the gay marriage debate, would be silenced before it could even be held, Volokh notes.'

NYC ends consent requirement for circumcision suction ritual

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'People who perform an ultra-Orthodox Jewish circumcision suction ritual will no longer have to get parents to sign acknowledgements of potential health risks, the city Board of Health decided Wednesday, reversing a policy that pitted health officials against religious leaders over a practice that dates to biblical times.

The vote formalized a tentative policy shift Mayor Bill de Blasio's administration made in February. The city now distributes information about what officials see as possible risks of oral suction circumcision, but signed consent forms are no longer required.

"The Board of Health, from the start, aimed to ensure that parents had information so that they could make informed decisions," Health Commissioner Dr. Mary Bassett said Wednesday, adding that the consent requirement "hadn't been that effective."

The practice is performed each year on an estimated 3,000 New York City babies, a fraction of the city's Jewish population. The ritual, formally called metzitzah b'peh in Hebrew, entails a rabbi or another circumciser sucking blood from an infant's circumcision wounds.'

Title IX Attacks Male College Students

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excetpt:

'Young men considering college may want to look at safer pastimes, like race car driving. Colleges are hell-bent on penalizing the male gender.

So far their efforts have not held up in court, yet.

“In four recent cases, judges have overturned sexual assault findings by campus disciplinary committees,” Gina Lauterio of Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) noted late last month. “In each case, the judges ruled the college proceedings lacked necessary due process protections. As the new academic year begins, these judicial decisions highlight the need for renewed focus on fairness in college sex assault cases, SAVE says.”'

Girls are the majority at some of D.C.'s top high schools, which some see as an inequity

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Benjamin Banneker Academic High School has an abundance of college-level classes and one of the highest graduation rates in the District. It's also overwhelming female. Three out of four Banneker students last school year were girls.

Banneker is not the only high-performing District high school that serves mostly girls. Duke Ellington School of the Arts, which offers both arts and academic enrichment, was 67 percent female in 2014-2015, according to school data. And School Without Walls, where some students take classes at nearby George Washington University, was 60 percent female.

An academic gender gap — with women outperforming men — is increasingly defining education nationwide. Young women are more likely to graduate from high school and go on to college. Female students began to outnumber males on college campuses in 1979, and now account for about 57 percent of college enrollment, according to federal data. An annual abundance of female applicants has led many private colleges to offer affirmative action for male applicants.'

Are men who major in business expressing an unhealthy masculinity?

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Are you a man who majored in business because it interested you or because you felt it would lead to a great career? That may be an unhealthy form of masculinity, according to a series of seminars coming next week from the Vanderbilt University Women's Center.

Yes, you read that correctly: A women's center seems to be telling men how they should and should not behave. Imagine the outrage if a male-dominated group attempted to tell women how they should and should not behave. You don't have to imagine, just remember all the anger that comes whenever a man speaks up about abortion. (Well, this actually happens only to the men who don't agree with feminists on abortion.)'

Judge rules early-release program must include male inmates

Matt · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Well it's "some justice," I suppose. Excerpt:

'A Sacramento federal judge ruled Wednesday that an early-release program for female inmates in California's prisons is unconstitutional and must be expanded to include male inmates.

"When the state draws a line between two classes of persons, and denies one of those classes a right as fundamental as physical freedom, that action survives equal protection review only if the state has a sufficient justification for the classification. Here, the state does not," U.S. District Judge Morrison C. England Jr. declared in a 35-page order.

The Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation "shall immediately cease denying admission to the (Alternative Custody Program) on the basis that an applicant is male," the judge ordered.'

The Rise of Victimhood Culture

Matt · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last fall at Oberlin College, a talk held as part of Latino Heritage Month was scheduled on the same evening that intramural soccer games were held. As a result, soccer players communicated by email about their respective plans. “Hey, that talk looks pretty great,” a white student wrote to a Hispanic student, “but on the off chance you aren’t going or would rather play futbol instead the club team wants to go!!”

Unbeknownst to the white student, the Hispanic student was offended by the email. And her response signals the rise of a new moral culture America.

When conflicts occur, sociologists Bradley Campbell and Jason Manning observe in an insightful new scholarly paper, aggrieved parties can respond in any number of ways. In honor cultures like the Old West or the street gangs of West Side Story, they might engage in a duel or physical fight. In dignity cultures, like the ones that prevailed in Western countries during the 19th and 20th Centuries, “insults might provoke offense, but they no longer have the same importance as a way of establishing or destroying a reputation for bravery,” they write. “When intolerable conflicts do arise, dignity cultures prescribe direct but non-violent actions.”'

Rolling Stone Reporter Cried Over False Gang-Rape Article, But For Selfish Reasons

Mastodon · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For Sabrina Rubin Erdely, it's all about her.

The disgraced author of a retracted Rolling Stone article about a gang-rape at the University of Virginia reportedly sobbed to one of her sources in the weeks after the story fell apart. But Erdely wasn't upset because her 9,000-word piece, "A Rape on Campus," had falsely accused a UVA fraternity of a gruesome gang-rape of a female student.

Instead, Erdely was worried about her career.

"She started bawling and said, 'I am going to lose my job,'" Alex Pinkelton, a source of Erdely's, told Vanity Fair in a new tick-tock about the fallout from the article.'

Passions Supplant Reason in Dialogue on Women in Science

Matt · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We're not new to studying women in science. Nor are we insensitive to the prejudice some women experience in academic science.

For the past decade, we have researched some of the challenges female scientists face that their male counterparts often don't, such as balancing work and life demands like child care (see our 2012 article in American Scientist). Our guiding principle has been to follow the data wherever it takes us. We have found, for example, that women and men have comparable rates of success with grant and article submissions, and that affirmative action doesn't lead to a preference for less-competent women (forthcoming), and that women have a harder time getting tenure in biology and psychology and are less satisfied with their jobs than men in the social sciences.

However, none of those findings have aroused the passions that our most recent research has. In a recent issue of the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, we published an article on data from five national studies that took us to an unexpected destination. The data showed that, in tenure-track hiring, faculty prefer female job candidates over identically qualified male ones.

Because that finding runs counter to claims of sexist hiring, it was met in the news media and in academe with incredulity and often panic. We have responded to those criticisms in five pieces in the Huffington Post (parts one, two, three, four, and five), as well as another essay in American Scientist and one on the website of the Society for Personality and Social Psychology.

Some critics saw in our findings a disavowal of their own experiences with academic sexism. Even though our study examined only entry-level hiring, they viewed it as invalidating biases they faced outside the hiring context and as an attack on their advocacy for women. But data from multiple studies using different methods kept revealing the same striking preference for hiring women. So we reported the empirical data, hoping to generate an honest, productive dialogue about modern discrimination in the academy. Since hiring is no longer a roadblock, where else might we need to direct efforts and advocacy to help more women succeed?'

Gender matters more for perpetrators than victims in child sex abuse

Matt · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There has been a great deal of outrage over the past couple of weeks regarding the alleged discrimination between male victims of child sexual abuse and female victims.

The main argument seems to be that recent abuse against young boys only resulted in the abuser receiving weekend work detention. Abusers of young girls, in contrast, have received hundreds of years behind bars. This implies that the judicial system must not care about young boys.

But what if the gender discrimination is placed on the wrong side of the equation?

It was former Baltimore Ravens cheerleader Molly Shattuck's case that seemed to spark interest in this phenomenon. Shattuck was sentenced to 48 weekends at a work detention facility — spread out over the next two years — for statutory rape against a 15-year-old boy. Shattuck had performed oral sex on the boy, who was a friend of her own son.

But the two stories being highlighted to show this discrimination involve a different female abuser of young boys and a male abuser of young girls.

A 32-year-old man was found guilty of sexually abusing a young girl for years, starting when she was just 6 years old. That man faced 366 years to life in prison. Meanwhile, a 25-year-old woman pleaded guilty to attempted rape of young boys at a trailer park in California. The female abuser in that case had previously been indicted on several other charges, including first-degree rape. She had pleaded guilty to the lesser charges as part of a plea agreement, and received five years' probation.

It's not difficult to see how one might come to believe that the vastly different sentences in these cases comes from a justice system that does not care about young boys. I believe it has more to do with the gender of the abusers.'

The biggest problem with Rep. Jared Polis' sex assault comments

Matt · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Colorado Congressman Jared Polis' comments about expelling students merely accused of sexual assault weren't just an affront to the American justice system, they were also incoherent.

At his Washington Post blog "The Volokh Conspiracy," Eugene Volokh summed up Polis' view: "If there are 10 people who have been accused, and under a reasonable likelihood standard maybe one or two did it, it seems better to get rid of all 10 people."

Volokh, a professor of free speech law, wrote that while a "whiff of suspicion" may sometimes be enough to remove someone from his or her current position, he "just hadn't thought that being a college student would or should be one of them."

Polis had followed up his statement about expelling students with the claim that "We're not talking about depriving them of life or liberty, we're talking about them being transferred to another university, for crying out loud."

Using Polis' logic, innocent students would be expelled and have their education disrupted or stopped entirely. Meanwhile, some actual rapists would be free to prey on students at another campus.

Such is the conundrum faced by current activists fighting to make it easier for those accused of sexual assault to be expelled. On the one hand, they say sexual assault is a serious issue — a crime even — and that accused students should be expelled based on little evidence and without due process protections. On the other hand, they say being expelled from college isn't that big of a deal.

They can't have it both ways. Now, for a wrongly accused student, an expulsion is a huge deprivation. It means lost tuition, lost friends, lost education, lost time and an unclear future. But for rapists, an expulsion means they're free to prey on non-students (or students at another university).'

Teen who had sex with 14-year-old girl who lied about her age taken off sex-offender list

mens_issues · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A young man from Indiana who had consensual sex with a 14-year-old girl who told him she was older has been removed from Michigan's sex offender registry pending his resentencing.

Zach Anderson, a 20-year-old Elkhart, Indiana, resident, spent 75 days in jail after pleading guilty to a misdemeanor.

He was given a five-year probation that banned him from using computers or the Internet and also had faced 25 years on Michigan's sex-offender registry.

But the conditions of that sentence no longer apply due to last week's decision to order a new sentence for Anderson, Berrien County Trial Court Judge Angela Pasula said at a bond hearing on Friday.'

Prison worker: Escapees had control over me

Matt · 13 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Didn't their plan also include murdering her husband? How soon we forget. And what a pathetic gender card approach to her rationalizations. Hope they toss the key. Excerpt:

'Joyce Mitchell, the upstate prison worker who aided the escape of two murderers in June, said she was going through depression and “got in over my head” when she conspired with the two men.

Mitchell, in her first public comments, told NBC’s Matt Lauer that she loves her husband, but got swept up in the allure of helping inmates David Sweat and Richard Matt, who she was believed to be having an affair with inside the prison.

“I know it’s hard to believe. But I do love my husband. And I’ve always loved my husband. I just– I was going through a point in my life — a lot of people go through depression,” Mitchell said, according to excerpts released Friday by NBC. “A lot of people go through that. And I just got in over my head. And I couldn’t get out.”'

From Club To Clinic: How MDMA Could Help Some Cope With Trauma

Matt · 13 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Most military PTSD victims are men, but there are many ways a person can get PTSD. If this story's substance pans out, it'd be a huge game-changer. Excerpt:

'MDMA, often known as Ecstasy or Molly, has for decades been used as a party drug — consumed in clubs, fuel for all-night raves. But lately, the substance is also being used in very different settings, for a very different purpose: to treat post-traumatic stress disorder.

The Food and Drug Administration has approved phase two clinical studies of the treatment, and they're now underway in four locations. Results so far have been promising, according to reporter Kelley McMillan, who has been investigating this new use of MDMA and has written about it in the current issue of Marie Claire.

"The findings from these most recent studies are supporting the earlier phase two findings, which found that 83 percent of participants were cured of their PTSD — compared to 25 percent who were cured from talk therapy alone," she tells NPR's Rachel Martin.

These conclusions remain preliminary, however, and phase two trials often fail by the time they reach phase three. And McMillan offers a word of caution of her own.

"People should not be going out and taking MDMA recreationally and thinking that they're going to have these healing experiences," she says.'

‘Out of Darkness’: Eighth-annual fundraising walk sheds light on suicide redwoodwriter · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A fundraising walk this month aims to bring discussions about suicide and mental health “out of the darkness” and into the light.

The eighth annual Watertown Out of Darkness Walk for Suicide Prevention will be held at noon Sept. 26 at Thompson Park.

The walk is one of more than 300 Out of Darkness Walks around the country organized by the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention. It raises money to support research and local education programs to fight suicide.

“When you walk in an Out of Darkness Walk, you join with people across the country to help raise awareness of suicide and financially support the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention, which supports the survivors of suicide loss, advocates for public policy and invests in research and educational programs to prevent suicide,” event organizer Vicki S. Hill said in a news release.

Ms. Hill said she became involved with the event to honor her brother, Joe Morse, who was lost to suicide in January 2012.'

Campus Rape Hysteria Has No Use For Due Process

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On what planet is it right to punish the innocent in a quixotic effort to curb campus rape?

Unfortunately, it's a-okay in the bizarro world that is Capitol Hill. Democrat Colorado Rep. Jared Polis earned roaring applause on Thursday when the lawmaker declared it is just to expel all students — regardless of guilt — who are accused of sexual assault.

"I mean, if there's 10 people that have been accused and under a reasonable likelihood standard maybe one or two did it, seems better to get rid of all 10 people," Polis said at a House hearing on campus sexual assault. "We're not talking about depriving them of life or liberty, we're talking about their transfer to another university."'

Democrats vs. FIRE, Joseph Cohn

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One of the things that got overlooked last week was a congressional hearing "before the House Committee on Education and the Workforce's Subcommittee on Higher Education and Workforce Training on the topic of 'Preventing and Responding to Sexual Assault on College Campuses.'" The highlight (or lowlight depending on your view of the Constitution) came from Rep. Jared Polis, (D-CO).

Sparks flew when Rep. Polis said "It seems like we ought to provide more of a legal framework, then, that allows a reasonable likelihood standard or a preponderance of evidence standard. I mean if there's 10 people that have been accused, and, you know, under a reasonable likelihood standard maybe one or two did it, it seems better to get rid of all 10 people. We're not talking about depriving them of life or liberty, we're talking about, they're transferred to another university, for crying out loud."'

Rise of the Supernanny Feminists

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Describing the words someone uses as ‘unacceptable’ can appear politically neutral, unemotive and simply commonsense. It allows the speaker to take the moral highground by suggesting there are ways of speaking and behaving that all right-thinking people agree upon. Those whose words are labelled ‘unacceptable’ are deemed to have crossed a line and committed a transgression against such normal codes of decency and politeness. As we have seen with Charlotte Proudman’s calling-out of the supposedly sexist barrister, and all those who rushed to decry Tim Hunt’s joke, the biggest infringement against the acceptable is to commit speech crimes against feminism. The feminist war on unacceptable language now encompasses everything from jokes and compliments to mildly flirtatious comments.

The roots of this obsession with policing language began at least as far back as the 1980s. A social constructionist view of gender as performative rather than biological met an emerging postmodernism that assumed discourse constructs not just perceptions of reality but reality itself. This led feminist theorists, such as Julia Kristeva, to argue that it is language that constructs power relations and the conditions for oppression. According to this view, women’s oppression could be challenged by changing the language and images through which people constructed the world. Today, when young women are seemingly quicker than ever to declare themselves victims of everyday sexism and casual misogyny, the notion that words are pre-eminently important in shaping reality has remained. Only now it has been joined by the notion that language can inflict mental harm on women, who are seen as vulnerable to everything from adverts on the Tube to clapping.

Offending words are now found everywhere. According to modern feminists, exposing them simultaneously challenges sexism and, perhaps more importantly, confirms that it still exists. The importance of language is overstated at the same time as the capacity of women, as autonomous individuals capable of taking responsibility and making independent choices about their own lives, is played down. This leads to an increase in what Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge, writing in Professing Feminism, have termed ‘ideological policing’, both inside and outside of universities. Modern-day feminists have much in common with their bourgeois Victorian fore-sisters, whom Patai and Koertge suggest saw it as their job ‘to monitor language and enforce norms’ of what was socially acceptable.

Today’s constant calling-out of what is considered unacceptable to feminist sensibilities is a demand to censor language deemed threatening to women – who are presented as a homogenous and vulnerable group. It is a patronising way for a recently emergent social elite to dictate who gets to be heard as they enforce new values, social norms and codes of conduct. This is why the cry of ‘unacceptable’ is most often used against a generation of older white men whose very existence is a sin against the new etiquette.'

Is it now sexist to put your arm around your girlfriend's shoulder?

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Just when you thought the everyday etiquette of how men are expected to integrate with women couldn't get any more confusing, Dame Helen Mirren has announced, of all things, that cuddling is sexist.

Speaking yesterday to the Mail On Sunday's You magazine, Mirren, 70, said: "It annoys me when I see men with an arm slung around their girlfriend's shoulders. It's like ownership. Of course, when you're young, you want the guy to take your hand and look after you.

"But when I see girls being leaned on, I want to say, 'tell him to get his damned arm off your shoulder'."

Now, regular readers will know I collect "sexism is everywhere!" stories like a sheep attracts ticks. I try not to, but I just can't seem to stop picking them up. But even I didn't see "teenage cuddling: it's a tool of the patriarchy!" coming.'

Vanderbilt's Healthy Masculinities Week under scrutiny

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"First-year Megan Meadows, while recognizing the importance of having programing geared towards men, noted that the Women's Center's involvement seemed odd.

"It's kind of difficult for women to define what a man is for men," Meadows said.

Senior Rebecca Shaw said men on Vanderbilt's campus may not want to attend programming led by the Women's Center.

"If it's aimed towards men I could see how it could be a deterrent like 'why is this woman telling me how to be more masculine?'" Shaw said.

However, junior male Jason Thome sees it differently — he thinks the Women's Center's background in issues of gender and stereotypes equips them to lead masculinity week. Thome, a Student VUceptor, noted that some of his favorite sessions during VUcept training were lead by representatives from the Women's Center.

"I think if anyone's equipped, it's the people who have dedicated so much of their lives to breaking down stereotypes and barriers, so I support that 100 percent," Thome said.'

A war on college men

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Is Congress waging a war on college men? It's starting to look like it.

Last week, Rep. Jared Polis, a Colorado Democrat, suggested that even innocent students should be booted from campus if they were accused of sexual assault. According to Polis: "If there are 10 people who have been accused, and under a reasonable likelihood standard maybe one or two did it, it seems better to get rid of all 10 people."

So one of the longstanding traditions of American law — that it is better to let 10 guilty men go free than to imprison one innocent — has now been turned on its head. Under the Polis standard, it's basically the other way around.

According to Polis, it's not such a bigdeal: "We're not talking depriving them of life and liberty, we're talking about their transfer to another university, for crying out loud," Polis said, laughing off the idea that his suggestion would violate due process rights. He is not alone in taking the due process rights of the accused lightly, a widely-backed Democratic senate bill is just more circumspect.

But it's no laughing matter. A student with expulsion for sexual assault on his record will have great difficulty gaining admission to another college, with life-altering consequences. (If you don't believe that, then you don't think that college matters much, which is something I doubt higher education boosters want to maintain.) And even if he succeeds, the expulsion will affect his chances for employment for the rest of his life, too.'

Federally-funded group at university sponsors mattress-carrying demonstration

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'NKU Director of Public Relations Amanda Nageleisen provided the following statement to Campus Reform correcting an inaccuracy in the Northern Kentucky Tribune article cited in this story:

"The protest in question was NOT organized by the Norse Violence Prevention Center; it was organized by a group of students. A NVP staff member did attend to provide support to any student who may have been triggered by the protest.
...
Several students at Northern Kentucky University participated Thursday in a “mattress girl”-themed demonstration organized by a group funded by federal grants.

A week after one female NKU student spent a day carrying a mattress on her back to protest the school’s handling of her sexual assault complaint, a laEmma Sulkowicz, several other students gathered outside the student union bedecked in bedsheets to demonstrate in support of the survivors of sexual assault and domestic violence,The Northern Kentucky Tribunereported Thursday.

Flyers distributed beforehand to encourage participation in the event encouraged students to bring a mattress or pillow as a symbol, or else to tape a red X on their clothing to show their support.'

Vaping, "toxic masculinity", and MRAs

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The hypermasculine image that vape marketers are selling is a self-fulfilling prophecy that could lock vaping out of the mainstream if the community can't overcome the stigma.
...
"The non-vaping public sees vaping the same way they see fedoras," Avery said. "They associate it with this awful MRA [men's rights activist], neckbeard culture."
...
If vaping wants to go mainstream, it needs to include women. A handful of surveys and research papers show that women are anywhere from 1.27 to 2.05times more likely than men to try vaping. But in terms of advertising? The disconnect should be obvious by now: Men are 1.25 times as likely to see a vaping-related advertisement.

"Everybody in the vaping community has the same blinders on, thinking that they need to target this young male population," Avery said. "The industry itself is doing a good job of keeping that reputation as well: a young shitty male activity."'

Hillary Clinton's plan to crack down on campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Monday in Iowa, Hillary Clinton will promise to crack down on sexual assault on college campuses — broadly embracing policy ideas supported by President Barack Obama, Vice President Joe Biden, and a bipartisan set of US senators — according to a campaign official.

The preview of Clinton's plan, which was scant on details, broke down her aims into three main buckets that largely reflect policies incorporated in a bill Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-MO) introduced in late July.
...
The campaign official noted that Clinton's ideas are in line with Obama's efforts to combat sexual assault on campus. Last September, the president unveiled the "It's on us" campaign to raise awareness about the issue, with Biden, the author of the Violence Against Women Act and a potential Clinton primary rival, at his side.'

"Right Now Is The Most Dangerous Time To Be A Woman At College"

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's the time of year called the Red Zone: the weeks between new student orientation and Thanksgiving break when college students are at the greatest risk of sexual assault. According to statistics, one in five women will be sexually assaulted while she's at school — usually by someone she knows — and a disproportionate number of those attacks are happening right now.

Several factors contribute to this disturbing trend. First year students are meeting new people and trying new things. Many of them are newly independent, living without parental support for the first time. And, they're in a new place, adjusting to an unfamiliar and often bigger environment.

A first year student at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington put a fine point on it: "Since we're in a new place, we're all really vulnerable and uncomfortable with our surroundings for a while. People can tell if someone's a freshman."

We should not accept this as the status quo; it doesn't need to be inevitable. Our friends and sisters entering college shouldn't have a target on their backs. And, I don't need to tell you how damaging sexual assault is for survivors. You know that rape is traumatizing, probably through personal experience or because someone you love was assaulted. It breaks my heart that this has happened to people I care about, and that it will happen thousands of times between now and Thanksgiving. But, I want to tell you this is not a problem without a solution. This is not someone else's problem. This is our problem, and we can solve it.'

Hateful columnist proposes concentration camps for all men

ErikaLancastor · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. We keep hearing from feminists that feminists do not hate men and that feminism is not about misandry. This article, from my home country in the U.K., does little to convince me to the contrary. We keep hearing over and over from feminists that they don't hate men. Yet, we keep hearing over and over from feminists how much they hate men. Excerpt:

'In the feminist world, Bindel's views are far from isolated and she's just the latest in a long line of high profile feminists to propose either imprisoning all men or even eliminating or exterminating all or the vast majority of the male population. Bindel's fellow travellers in this regard include author of the "Scum Manifesto" Valerie Solanas, "academic" Mary Daly (for whom Bindel wrote a glowing obituary) and also Sally Miller Gearhart, an author who also worked at San Francisco State University. Nor is this an isolated incident in terms of Bindel's behaviour, for example in 2006 she wrote a Guardian column titled "Why I hate men" and her writing regularly attacks men as a whole falsely paints violence and abuse as gendered, something done by men to women, rather than by people to other people.

More recently, feminist hatred of men has made the news with incidents involving Bahar Mustafa at Goldsmiths' University and Lib Dem Executive Committee member Sarah Noble at the NUS Conference (a story broken exclusively by HEqual). it's interesting that the one common theme that almost every piece of feminist hate is the involvement of the higher education system. Mustapha is the Diversity Officer at Goldsmith's Students Union who banned white men from events and called for their death on Twitter. Noble's misandry came to light due to her calls to "ban men from society" at the NUS Women's Conference, with her Twitter acocunt also littered with misandrist hate speech and she's since started a new job at the NUS too! Daly was a professor at Boston College who didn't just want men to be reduced to 10% of the population, she infamously kicked male students out of her classes too!Gearhart worked at a University for decades too and therefore it's little surprise to see that Bindel is a research fellow at Lincoln University and has previously held a position at bth Leeds and Brunel Universities too. Numerous other feminist extremists also work in institutions in places such as the North east and in Bristol with others exposed in a leak of info from the Rad Fem Hub website. It's little wonder we have such a huge gender education gap when so many universities are hotbeds of unopposed gender hatred.'

Hillary Clinton Cites Debunked 1-In-5 Campus Sexual Assault Stat During Campaign Speech

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton claimed on the campaign trail in Iowa on Monday that one-in-five women in college have been sexually assaulted, though the ratio she cited has been debunked by many scholars who believe it overstates the problem of campus sexual violence.

“This is a special time and a special place to be talking specifically about an issue that effects one-in-five women on campus,” Clinton said during a “Hillary for Women” event at the University of Northern Iowa.

Clinton’s remarks were timed with the release of a three-pronged policy proposal to help combat the “epidemic” of campus sexual assault. The plan aims to provide a support network for survivors of sexual assault. It also proposes to increase focus on university disciplinary proceedings for accusers and the accused. She also addressed providing sexual violence prevention programs for students earlier in school.'

Hillary Clinton Suggests Changing Sexual Assault Policy Changes To The Criminal Justice Sytem

Mastodon · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In Cedar Falls, Clinton told the crowd that one in five women report they were sexually assaulted in college, a statistic often cited by politicians that is also a source of debate. “Think of the impact on their lives while they’re trying to manage the emotional, the physical, sometimes the educational, financial fallout,” said Clinton. “They miss classes, some drop out, some never finish their education.”

She also suggested that she would propose policy changes to the criminal justice system — and encourage schools to do the same to their own disciplinary procedures — to "ensure a fair process."

“Rape is a crime wherever it happens,” she said.

Before her speech, Clinton met with about 15 students and local activists to discuss the ideas, an aide said, and to encourage feedback. “There are good smart solutions," she told the crowd in Cedar Falls. "We just need more of them."'

India: Maneka's 'male-generated violence' comment sparks outrage

Mastodon · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Standing out among all the politicians with recent foot-in-the-mouth misogynistic comments, Union minister for women and child development, Maneka Gandhi, on Monday, claimed that "all the violence is male-generated" leading to an onslaught of criticism for her sexist remark.

During a scheduled public interaction on popular social media platform, Facebook, Maneka said that the role of men in gender sensitisation was critical as they are responsible for all the violence.

This digital interaction spewed controversy on yet another social networking site, Twitter, as people slammed the BJP politician for encouraging 'misandry' with such anti-male sentiments.

"Misandry is as bad as Misogynistic views. Violence comes from within irrespective of gender or race. #maneka Gandhi" tweeted one Susan Paul.'

UK: Domestic violence perpetrators ("men") should be 'better-monitored', says Tony Abbott

Mastodon · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Perpetrators of domestic and family violence can expect to be monitored more closely, Tony Abbott has flagged during question time.

“We need to ensure that men with a predisposition to violence against members of their families are better monitored, better tracked, so that the instant there is any suggestion of harm the police can act,” the prime minister said.

Earlier this year, the government put forward a proposal to the Council of Australian Governments (Coag) that high-risk domestic violence offenders be tracked via ankle bracelets in the same way that sex offenders in some states are monitored.'

Not all comments are created equal: the case for ending online comments

Mastodon · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It shouldn't be a surprise that I'm not fond of comments sections. I think you'd be hard-pressed to find many female writers who are. On most sites – from YouTube to local newspapers – comments are a place where the most noxious thoughts rise to the top and smart conversations are lost in a sea of garbage.

There's a reason, after all, that the refrain "don't read the comments" has become ubiquitous among journalists. But if we're not to read them, why have them at all?

I wasn't always a comments-hater. When I started a feminist blog in 2004, I was thrilled to finally be able to talk with other young feminists online and was open to chatting with detractors. I saw the comments section as a way to destabilize the traditional writer/reader relationship – no longer did audiences need to consume an article without a true opportunity to respond. Comments even made my writing better those days; feedback from readers broadened the way I thought and sometimes changed my mind.'

Intelligent machines: Call for a ban on robots designed as sex toys

Matt · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. As predictable as snow in New England! Excerpt:

'A campaign has been launched calling for a ban on the development of robots that can be used for sex.

Such a use of the technology is unnecessary and undesirable, said campaign leader Dr Kathleen Richardson.

Sex dolls already on the market are becoming more sophisticated and some are now hoping to build artificial intelligence into their products.

Those working in the field say that there is a need for such robots.

Dr Richardson, a robot ethicist at De Montfort University in Leicester, wants to raise awareness of the issue and persuade those developing sex robots to rethink how their technology is used.'

SAVE: US Rep 100% Wrong

Matt · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In a House hearing on campus sexual assault last week, Polis stated that a student should be expelled if there is a 20% chance he is guilty.

Polis also stated that the standard used should be lower than "preponderance of the evidence."

Polis added, "If there are 10 people who have been accused, and under a reasonable likelihood standard maybe one or two did it, it seems better to get rid of all 10 people."

Tell Rep. Polis (CO-2) that expelling innocent students is unacceptable advice, and wrongful accusations are damaging. Our representatives should instead be advocating for more due process in the campus kangaroo courts.

Call: (202) 225-2161
Email: https://polis.house.gov/forms/writeyourrep/default.aspx

Tell a Congressman that student rights matter.

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Canadian Children's Rights Group Questions New Circumcision Policy

Matt · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A just released policy on infant male circumcision by the Canadian Paediatric Society (CPS) was judged today by the Children's Health & Human Rights Partnership (CHHRP) to be a step in the right direction, but was "nevertheless 'predictably inadequate' with respect to several specific issues."

CHHRP Medical Director Dr. Christopher Guest, MD, FRCPC, said the new policy is consistent with international paediatric associations that affirm infant boys should not have their healthy foreskins routinely removed.

Citing the position of the CPS that recognizes the unique sensory functions of the male foreskin, Dr. Guest asserted that, "A growing number of medical associations now recognize that an intact penis with a foreskin contributes to sexual pleasure for the male and his partner." According to Guest, in 2010 the Royal Dutch Medical Association concluded, "the foreskin is a complex erotogenic structure that plays an important role in the mechanical function of the penis during sexual acts."

"Circumcision alters the structure of the penis, which inevitably alters function. Long term harm to men from infant circumcision has never been studied" Guest said. Despite this, Guest says men are reporting long-term adverse consequences at the Canadian-based online Global Survey of Circumcision Harm. Although the CPS failed to include it, Guest says scientific evidence has emerged that supports these men's claims. In 2011, Dr. Morton Frisch published findings in the International Journal of Epidemiology showing that in Denmark, where circumcision is rare, 'circumcision was associated with frequent orgasm difficulties in Danish men and with a range of frequent sexual difficulties in their female partners, notably orgasm difficulties, dyspareunia [difficult or painful sexual intercourse] and a sense of incomplete needs fulfilment."

Free Speech Can't Be Trumped By Title IX -- But College Officials Use It That Way

Mastodon · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When federal politicians passed the Higher Education Act, they thought they were only going to help good students who couldn't otherwise afford college to attend. They did not think about possible unintended consequences — like making college far more expensive, undermining academic standards, or giving federal bureaucra'ts leverage to dictate to colleges and universities.

But all of that has happened.

I'm going to focus on that last consequence—the way federal intervention in higher education has empowered bureaucrats to whittle away at free speech on (and even off) campus.'

Rep. Polis states he didn't really mean it, but then says he sort of did

Mastodon · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Essay here. Excerpt:

'I mis-spoke.

During a subcommittee hearing last week about sexual assault on college campuses, I committed a major gaffe during the back-and-forth exchange with a witness who was advocating for removing the authority of colleges to adjudicate sexual assault cases that happen on their campuses. My words did not convey my beliefs nor the policies I now or have ever supported.

...

To most people who don't know much about this issue, it makes sense to solely adjudicate these cases in our criminal justice system, just like we do other crimes. The witness mentioned above who I was questioning was arguing for just such an approach.

However, this is a deeply dangerous idea that demonstrates a cursory and superficial understanding of the issue. Ask any sexual assault advocate and they'll tell you the same thing.

There are very important reasons why colleges and universities currently have jurisdiction over assaults that occur on their campuses, and why the process is separate from the criminal justice system. In my effort to defend this practice, I went too far, and I regret that my remarks have detracted from the substance of this debate and have reflected poorly on the good work being done by college offices across the country that investigate these cases, including two in my own backyard in Colorado (University of Colorado at Boulder and Colorado State University).

Decades of research and case histories show how woefully inadequate the criminal justice system can be for survivors of sexual assault. For starters, rape survivors are unlikely to report cases to police, citing things like not thinking it's important enough, not wanting others to know, not having proof, fearing retaliation, and being uncertain about whether what happened constitutes assault . According to a recent Department of Justice study, only 20 percent of campus sexual assault survivors report the assault to police.'

Sexbots: Why Women Should Panic

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Another reason men might be enthusiastic about female-free sex is obvious: the sociopathic, man-hating feminism we see so much of on television and in our newspapers today is turning men off dealing with women altogether. Constant whinging about “toxic masculinity,” “manspreading,” “mansplaining,” the bogus gender pay gap and the absurd campus rape culture myth are pushing the sexes apart, fostering mistrust and fear.

The fact that wacky, misandrist intersectional feminists are an unpopular minority — as a result of their horrid influence, just 18 per cent of women now call themselves feminists — doesn’t matter because they hold court in the media and on campuses, and young women are starting to parrot discredited and absurd nonsense about the “oppressive patriarchy,” picking up on a victimhood script they believe they can leverage for social and professional advantage.

In response, men are simply checking out, giving up on women and retreating into porn and video games. I call it the “sexodus,” and its immediate victims aren’t men, but women, who are being consigned to singledom as men lose interest in them or are simply too exhausted or fearful of the social consequences of approaching girls romantically. The truth is, men get along okay without women, unlike women, who become shrieking, neurotic messes if they’re still single in their 30s.
...
I think he’s right. What’s clear is that the purchase women have over men, sexually and emotionally, is fading fast. That’s perhaps one reason for the “spitting tacks” fury of modern feminism: the louder they yell, the more men simply tune out and disappear into porn, robots and video games. Technology didn’t disempower women sexually — they did that to themselves with feminism — but it is accelerating the process.'

Boy arrested for bringing clock to school

ThomasI · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Texas police have decided not to charge a 14-year-old Muslim boy who was arrested for bringing a homemade clock to school.

Officials at MacArthur High School in Irving alerted police because they thought the device was a "hoax bomb".

Ahmed Mohamed's arrest has been sharply criticised, and the boy has received an outpouring of support including an invitation to the White House.

Ahmed's family believes he was detained because of his name.

"We have always had an outstanding relationship with the Muslim community," Irving Police Department chief Larry Boyd said on Wednesday. "Incidents like this present challenges. We want to learn how we can move forward and turn this into a positive."

The boy was placed in handcuffs and fingerprinted before he was released after it was determined there was no threat.'

Kathleen Willey slams Hillary's new sex assault survivors ad

Matt · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Clinton believes victims of sexual assault have "a right to be believed." Except, of course, if the accusations are made against her husband and could complicate her political aspirations.

In Clinton's new web ad, titled "Hillary's Message to Survivors of Sexual Assault," the candidate claims:

"I want to send a message to every survivor of sexual assault.

Don't let anyone silence your voice. You have a right to be heard. You have a right to be believed. We're with you."

But that's a very different message Kathleen Willey received in 1993 when she accused Hillary's husband, President Bill Clinton, of sexually assaulting her.

"She believed what happened for sure," Willey tells The American Mirror. "She just chose to ignore the plight of all of his victims, thus enabling him to continue to abuse and rape women in the future."'

Teen charged with encouraging her boyfriend to kill himself

Matt · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'At first glance, the text messages appear to show a disturbing case of cyberbullying: one teen urging another to kill himself.

But the texts were not sent by a school bully. They were from a 17-year-old girl to her boyfriend, whom she called the love of her life.

"You can't think about it. You just have to do it. You said you were gonna do it. Like I don't get why you aren't," Michelle Carter allegedly wrote to Conrad Roy III the day he parked his truck outside a Fairhaven Kmart and killed himself through carbon monoxide poisoning.

Prosecutors have charged Carter with involuntary manslaughter in Roy's 2014 death. They say that in the week before Roy killed himself, Carter assisted by urging him to overcome his doubts about taking his own life, pressuring him to do it and even telling him to get back in his truck after becoming frightened that the plan was working.

Carter's lawyer has strenuously denied that she pushed him to kill himself and has asked a judge to dismiss the case.'

Michigan Admits It Screwed Up By Suspending Student For Rape

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Michigan has become the latest school to vacate a sexual assault judgment against a student due to legal pressure.

Drew Sterrett was a student at Michigan until 2012, when a school hearing found him responsible for sexually assaulting a fellow student. Rather than take the judgement lying down, Sterrett sued Michigan in federal court in 2014, arguing the school's hearing process deprived him of his due process rights.

Sterrett's case had much in common with other controversial college sexual assault cases. Sterrett had exculpatory evidence at the time, via a text from his roommate, that the sex between him and another student (identified as 'CB') was consensual. Not only that, but after their encounter in March 2012, no complaint was filed until the following August, and Sterrett was found responsible without ever being allowed to question his accuser or see the claims against him in writing. Sterrett also never faced any criminal charges.'

Bernie Sanders signs on to campus sexual assault bill day after Clinton's high-profile speech

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The same week Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton made a high-profile speech saying that sexual-assault accusers have "the right to be believed" and calling for more campus resources to help alleged victims, her chief rival for the nomination appears to have quietly responded.

Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., is the first new cosponsor in nearly two months of the Campus Accountability and Safety Act (S-590). Congress.gov says he signed on to the bill Tuesday, just a day after Clinton's speech at the University of Northern Iowa.

It's a toe in the water for Sanders, who had to explain this spring why he wrote a "rape fantasy" essay in 1972 for a Vermont alt rag. He's beenawfully easy on Clinton as well, neglecting to point out the perceived hypocrisy in her "right to be believed" remarks when her husband, former President Bill Clinton, has been repeatedly accused of sexual assault.'

Rep. Jared Polis did not misspeak, he just doesn't like the backlash

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Colorado Congressman Jared Polis claimed in his local newspaper that he "misspoke" when he called for innocent college students to be expelled simply for being accused of sexual assault.

He can claim whatever he wants, but his actions last week tell a far different story than that of someone who merely didn't choose his words carefully.

First, we have to go back to his original statement, made during a House hearing on campus sexual assault. During a back-and-forth with a panelist advocating for due process rights for students accused of sexual assault, Polis said it's better to throw out accused students even if they're likely innocent, just in case.'

Hillary Clinton uses sexual assault to win votes

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Hillary Rodham Clinton is once again pandering to women with her three-pronged proposal to end the “epidemic” of campus sexual assault, but Mrs. Clinton’s own actions directly contradict her newly released plan.

“It is not enough to condemn campus sexual assault. We need to end campus sexual assault,” Mrs. Clinton said to a group of supporters on Monday at the University of Northern Iowa.

But while the former secretary of state claims to be fighting a sexual assault “epidemic” on college campuses, what she is really fighting for are female votes.

“To every survivor of sexual assault … You have the right to be heard. You have the right to be believed. We’re with you,” Mrs. Clinton tweeted out on Monday.

Mrs. Clinton’s newly proposed standard violates the most sacred principle of the American criminal justice system, innocent until proven guilty.'

"Yes Means Yes" Bills to be Introduced

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"No Means No" could soon change to "Yes Means Yes." Some local lawmakers proposed that bill on Tuesday, hoping it could help prevent sexual assaults on campus.

The general idea is anything less than yes, should mean no when it comes to sexual assault.

"It's not about what she wore, it's not about what she drank, it's about whether or not the perpetrator got consent and it was a mutual interaction," said Erin Roberts, Executive Director of E.V.E.

Working with victims Roberts says that distinction makes a big difference. Which is why she supports "Yes means Yes" -- meaning that only a sober yes on both sides counts as consent.
...
Police officers who investigate sexual assault cases say this could change investigations because it creates a clearer standard for holding perpetrators accountable.'

Affirmative consent policies debated on campuses

Mastodon · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Legal scholars across the nation have spoken out against affirmative consent sexual misconduct policies implemented at many universities, including LSU, with proponents of the policy saying it bolsters the fight against rape culture at college campuses.

Affirmative consent, as it applies to sexual misconduct policy, means a person who initiates sexual contact must hear “yes” from the other person before engaging in a sexual act, said Morgan Lamandre, Vice President of Survivor Services at Sexual Trauma Awareness and Response in Baton Rouge.

Former American Civil Liberties Union President Nadine Strossen recently said the policy violates rights of due process, according to a news release from Stop Abusive and Violent Environments.

“They reverse the usual presumption of innocence,” Strossen said. “Unless the guy can prove that his sexual partner affirmatively consented to every single contact, he is presumed guilty of sexual misconduct.”'

Australia: "Domestic Violence Protections for the [SA] Tenancy Sector"

Minuteman · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here.

Excerpt from the Information Paper:

'Australian women are most likely to experience physical and sexual violence in their home, at the hand of a male current or ex-partner. For 62% of women who had experienced physical assault by a male perpetrator, the most recent incident was in their home.

The Weatherill Government has made a strong commitment to addressing domestic violence in our community. Last year, the Premier reaffirmed domestic violence prevention as a priority for this Government with the release of the 'Taking A Stand – Responding to Domestic Violence' paper. Since then, the Government has embarked on a series of initiatives to address domestic violence in our community. To build on these initiatives, the Government is pursuing changes to strengthen the level of protection afforded to victims of domestic violence in the tenancy sector.

The proposed changes will recognise domestic violence in our tenancy legislation, and provide further protections for victims in the tenancy sector, including rooming house residents, to either continue in the tenancy without the perpetrator, leave the tenancy and no longer be liable for the premises, or terminate the tenancy altogether. The South Australian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (SACAT) will be empowered to determine that one or more, but not all co-tenants, are liable for compensation to the landlord and order that the bond be paid to the landlord and any co-tenants not liable for compensation as it thinks fit, but not so as to unduly disadvantage the landlord.
...
The Intervention Order (Protection of Abuse) Act 2009 (the IO Act) contains measures to help victims of abuse safely stay in their home. It allows an intervention order to prohibit the perpetrator from being anywhere near the family home, even though the perpetrator may own or rent it. The aim is to encourage victims of abuse and their children to stay in the family home if they want to and prevent their lives being unnecessarily disrupted. It also offers a means of longer-term security to protected persons who wish to stay in the home.'

Australia: 'Mansplaining' and Taylor Swift lyrics take on Turnbull

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

During question time in parliament on Wednesday, the new man in charge was accused of "mansplaining" by Labor deputy leader Tanya Plibersek.

Mansplaining is when a man explains something in which he is less of an expert, to a woman who is more so, because he assumes she is ignorant.

Ms Plibersek had asked whether Mr Turnbull could "confirm how much he will restore to the foreign aid programme after the cabinet he was part of cut the budget by $11.3bn dollars" in the last budget.

Mr Turnbull responded: "If the honourable member wanted to get a serious answer she should ask a serious question. If all she's interested in is making an allegation, making a political argument across the dispatch box, that is fine. But it's a complete waste of Question Time."
Unimpressed with the verbal jousting, she replied: "Mr Speaker, I'd rather have an answer than the mansplaining by the prime minister."

Within minutes, "mansplaining" was trending on Twitter in Australia, winning Ms Plibersek - and the word itself - both fans and critics.'

Barrister Charlotte Proudman called friends 'sexy' and 'hot stuff' on Facebook

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The barrister who exposed a senior lawyer who she accused of sending her sexist messages has previously commented on pictures of friends online, calling them 'sexy' and 'hot stuff'.

Charlotte Proudman, 27, posted screenshots on twitter of 'misogynistic' messages from Alexander Carter-Silk, a senior partner in a top London firm who she said had ‘objectified her’ on the professional networking site LinkedIn.

In a response to the married 57-year-old, which she also posted online, she said: "I am on linked-in for business purposes not to be approached about my physical appearance or to be objectified by sexist men."

The Daily Mail has now reported that Ms Proudman, who is also studying for a PhD at Cambridge University, has made several comments on pictures of both male and female friends in the past, praising their physical appearance.

Underneath a picture of one friend she is said to have commented: ‘Hot stuff!’, while under an image of another male friend, she wrote: ‘oooo lalala!’

The Daily Mail reports that Ms Proudman also told female friends they looked ‘sexy’ and ‘stunning’ – the same word used by Mr Carter-Silk.'

Another accused student tries Title IX as a club to beat the hell out of his college

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'College Fix readers are undoubtedly aware of the Occidental College sexual-assault case, which we've covered several times as a prime example of the near-impossibility of male students defending themselves against accusations even when hard evidence is solidly in their favor.

Even when their accusers appear to have initiated sexual relations.

One due-process lawsuit and one Department of Education complaint later, the accused student "John Doe" has filed a second lawsuit against Occidental, this time claiming it discriminated against him based on his gender, City News Service reports:

`The current suit alleges Title IX violations and maintains Occidental's discipline of Doe occurred in part because of "internal and external forces demanding Occidental find more male students responsible for sexually assaulting female students."

The complaint states that colleges and universities have been under pressure from the federal Department of Education's Office [for] Civil Rights to address sexual violence on campus or face the withholding of federal education money.`

His accuser is herself accused of initiating the sex – a claim validated by the investigator the school appointed – making this case different from many others where the parties either agreed the man initiated or neither could remember because they were so drunk.'

Student Sued Over False Sexual Assault Accusations

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former San Diego State University student accused of sexual assault last December has announced plans to bring a lawsuit against the institution after charges were dropped and the student's suspension was lifted.

Francisco Sousa, a transfer student from Portugal, faced charges of forcible oral copulation with force and false imprisonment with force before the District Attorney determined the charges could not be proven beyond reasonable doubt, according to an April report in the University's newspaper the Daily Aztec.

Sousa has now said he will seek not only monetary damages from the University, but also an apology from officials for sending an all-campus email that informed the University community that he had been arrested 10 News reported. Sousa's suspension was lifted when the university determined the sexual misconduct allegations were unsubstantiated.

"One of the things I want from San Diego State is for them to send a public email to students to announce the decision, the same way they sent an email to make me look like a criminal," Sousa said according to the San Diego Union-Tribune.'

Lawsuits: University sexual misconduct policies slanted in favor of women

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A University of Cincinnati senior football player who was suspended over what he says was a false sexual misconduct allegation filed a lawsuit against the school on Wednesday over its handling of the case.

This is the latest in several lawsuits filed by students against Ohio colleges and universities this year claiming that strict sexual misconduct policies are slanted in favor of female accusers. They claim the U.S. Department of Education's crackdown on campus sexual assaults has forced schools to create unfair policies or risk losing federal funding.

"No student who has been accused of serious sexual misconduct at UC has ever been exonerated. You can't win," said Joshua Engel, an attorney for the football player, who is identified as John Doe in the lawsuit.

Engel is asking U.S. District Court Judge Timothy Black to lift the suspension and football ban while the case moves through the court system. A hearing on the temporary restraining order will likely take place this week.'

State legislature to propose 'Yes Means Yes' bill

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Democrats in the Michigan state legislature are set to propose a “Yes Means Yes” bill this week.

State Senator Curtis Hertel Jr. and State Representative Tom Cochran said Tuesday they will propose the bill in an effort to combat sexual assault.

The legislation proposes additions to the state’s standard high school sexual education curriculum to teach the “yes means yes” concept of sexual consent.

If the bill is passed, the state’s curriculum will be changed to “teach pupils that in order for consent to be given by both parties to sexual activity it must be affirmative consent.”

...

“Affirmative consent is a dangerous policy and we [should] strongly oppose it,” stated Gina Lauterio, policy project director for Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE), in an email to Campus Reform.

“Yes means yes flips the burden of proof onto the accused student, who then must show how he or she received consent for each particular sexual activity.”'

Australia: ARTC gets permission to target women for rail jobs

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Australian Rail Track Corporation has been given permission to hire only women for track maintenance roles across Newcastle and the Hunter Valley.

Currently only 18 per cent of the ARTC's workforce is female and the company would like to increase that proportion to 30 per cent.

In the Hunter region, the figure is 12 per cent.

It has obtained permission from the Anti-Discrimination Board to specifically target women for some current vacancies, based in Muswellbrook, Scone, Maitland and Newcastle.

ARTC CEO John Fullerton said increasing workforce diversity is vital and will lead to greater innovation and creativity.

He said businesses like ARTC must 'lead from the front' to ensure change in what has traditionally been a male-dominated industry.'

A Father's Fight to Win Back His Daughter Secretly Put Up for Adoption

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Skylar is a rambunctious toddler who runs and plays and giggles with her father, Chris Emanuel.

But she has no idea she sat at the heart of a massive custody battle with far-reaching implications for fathers' rights.

Emanuel, a 25-year-old from Aiken, South Carolina, met Skylar's mother, whom he now refers to as simply "the egg donor," through their work as fork lift drivers at a manufacturing company three years ago. He said they started off as friends before it escalated into something more.

"She wasn't the ordinary girly girl. She was a girly girl but she could play pool. I could sit down and play pool with her," he said. "She listened to the same music that I listened to but she rode horses. You know, it was different. I never met someone of that nature before but I definitely enjoyed the moments that we shared."

In the beginning, Emanuel said they texted all the time, and their affectionate messages soon turned into flirtations. Three months later, Emanuel was overjoyed to learn he was going to be a dad.'

Paternity Fraud: Is It Legal to Lie About A Baby's Daddy?

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If you aren't the daddy, is it your baby?

In March, a businessman in Britain sued his ex-wife, a similarly successful businesswoman, because she has fraudulently convinced him that his "son" was of his own DNA. Turns out, she had used a sperm donation from her former boyfriend to conceive the child during a time of "trouble" within her and the man's marriage.

From birth, the man was convinced the child was his. (Obviously. Who thinks to DNA test your wife's baby?) But, these hoes ain't loyal.

The ex-boyfriend later told the court, "Her main objective was to have a baby but she wanted me to be the father."'

UK: Should we be doing more to expose paternity fraud?

Mastodon · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It could be the ultimate fraud. Across Britain, thousands of men are likely to be raising children that they have been tricked into believing are theirs, when they were really fathered by another man. And now one victim of paternity fraud is calling for it to be made a criminal offence after he spent six years bringing up a boy he thought was his son, only to find out that his wife had used the sperm from her ex-boyfriend at an IVF clinic.

The man sued her for the £60,000 he had handed over in child maintenance after they split up, but only gained a small amount of compensation, even though the judge said he had been a victim of “clear deceit and fraud”.

It sounds like an extreme and isolated case. But studies suggest somewhere between two and 10 per cent of men have been fooled into raising another man’s child.

For obvious reasons, paternity fraud – or paternal discrepancy as healthcare professionals refer to it – is hard to track. The best British review was published in the journal Epidemial Community Health ten years ago. Looking at all other good studies, it said the median average was a rate of four per cent. So one father in 25 is labouring under a serious misapprehension.'

Hear Them Roar: Meet the Honey Badgers, the Women Behind the Men's Rights Movement

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'You've seen the video, right? The one with the vicious, weasel-skunk-fox hybrid sticking its nose into bee-filled holes, gnawing on mice, tearing the heads off snakes, and shaking off venomous cobra bites, waking up after a few minutes to return to eating its attacker? You know, the one that ends with, "Honey badger don't care. Honey badger don't give a shit"? If you're one the nearly 75 million people who've watched the YouTube sensation since it was posted in 2011, you may think you're familiar with this whole Honey Badger thing. You have no idea.

The women scattered across the U.S. and Canada who call themselves Honey Badgers have no true affiliation with the ferocious carnivorous mammals, nor with the viral nature mockumentary meme. They are, in fact, a group of concerned individuals who have banded together to stand up to a society that unfairly targets a segment of the population vulnerable simply because of its gender. That marginalized group? Men.'

UK: Lib Dems accused of sexism after banning men from event on juggling politics and family life

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Lib Dems have barred men from a “juggling politics and family life” training session at their annual conference.

The move has led to claims of sexism at the conference, which opens in Bournemouth on Saturday.

The conference fringe event is only open to women, sparking accusations that organisers do not respect men’s role in bringing up children.

The meeting is listed in the official directory saying: “Time management: getting the balance right between politics and the rest of your life (Women only) Ideas on how to successfully juggle politics and family life.”

One former candidate criticised the decision to exclude men. Mike Powell, who stood in the Pontypridd constituency at the last three general elections, said: “This is just as likely to affect men as it is women these days.

“My wife and I share the fun of looking after our four-year-old daughter - parenting is not just a female thing.”'

"Should Colleges Get Rid of Fraternities?"

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excrrpt:

'Fraternities simply don't fit into the mission of 21st century higher education. They represent a dominant and dangerous social culture that needs to be removed from universities.

We're used to the headlines by now—stories of widespread abuse and bias that have no place on a modern campus. In leaked videos and emails, fraternity brothers across the country have been caught describing raping women or slinging racial slurs. Many researchers have found that fraternity members are more likely to commit rape than nonfraternity members. One study author has stated, "It is reasonable to conclude that fraternities turn men into guys more likely to rape."

These toxic attitudes and behaviors don't belong at the center of campus social life. I should note, however, that I'm generally not referring to minority fraternities, which typically don't have houses and focus more on cultural networks.'

Hillary and her no-questions-asked position withstands the withering of her campaign

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'R29: I want to talk about Emma Sulkowicz at Columbia — she's the woman who dragged her mattress with her everywhere during senior year. You said last year that the image of her and her mattress should haunt all of us. What does the plan you want to put into place accomplish for women like Emma?

HRC: "You know, first of all, there needs to be a decision in our country and on every college campus that any women who reports an assault should be heard and believed, and there should be a process that is in place — not made up every time that something like this happens. There should be a regular process in place to examine what she is saying, to begin to hear from people to make some kind of decision that is viewed as fair to everybody, because it does need to be fair to everybody. But many women like her feel that they are basically being asked to remain silent. That nobody wants to hear from them, that nobody wants to believe them, and nobody wants to have the comprehensive services that they need. We have colleges that don't even have services in their health clinics, or any cooperative agreement with nearby hospitals even to treat somebody who's come forth. So there's a checklist we're going through that every place should have to be able to comply with. And then, when it comes to the process, I have talked with survivors, and a lot of them don't want to go into the criminal-justice system. They don't feel that they will be heard or believed there, and it's a difficult process for many.'

--
Also see: Hillary Clinton pushes campus sexual assault myths

UK: Why is the government taking the NUS's 'lad culture' survey seriously?

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'You thought starting university was meant to be fun? Think again. A new league table, published in time for freshers' week 2016, ranks universities on the basis of their local crime rate. The Complete University Guide has published the results, alongside a guide to 'sexism on campus', which gives students tips on how to scope out their university's attitude to sexism and sexual harassment. But as the survey points out, official data for crime specifically against students is not available, so these figures are chosen because they relate to crimes 'most likely to affect students'.

The growing panic about sexual violence on campus is based on various reports published by the National Union of Students (NUS). The most recent claimed that '50pc of study participants identified "prevailing sexism, 'laddism' and a culture of harassment" at their universities'. The reportwas written by the director of Gender Studies at the University of Sussex, Alison Phipps, and research associate Isabel Young. Titled 'That's What She Said', it featured interviews with just '40 women students across the UK'. Yet it claims to present hard evidence about the 'social, personal and educational impacts of lad culture in higher education'. The report was able to produce shocking statistics by asking participants to answer broad questions about everything from unwanted chat-up lines to actual sexual assault.'

Working with men is bad for your health, researchers say

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Yet another reason to ban men.

A new study from the Indiana University Bloomington has found that working in male-dominated offices can do serious damage to female employees' health.

In a large US survey, researchers studied the stress hormones of more than 440 women who worked in offices where at least 85% of the workforce were men.

They found that women working in these strongly male-dominated environments had unhealthier patterns of cortisol – the damaging stress hormone – than those who worked in more gender balanced offices.
...
Men, meanwhile, don't exhibit the same disrupted cortisol levels as women in offices where there are 85% or more men.

The only logical solution? Kick all the men out of the office. Let's woman it up.'

Woman’s Reaction to 10-Year-Old Boy’s Purported Bad ‘Manners’ Caught on Surveillance Video

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A 10-year-old boy in the Bronx, New York, was allegedly assaulted by a woman for having bad “manners.”

Mohammed Almontsire told WABC-TV that he went back into his father’s deli to get a bag that he had left there earlier. That’s where a woman, who police are now looking for, ordered the fifth grader to say “thank you.” But Almontsire refused.

“She slapped me two times. I punched one time,” Mohammed said.

The boy claimed the woman also used “bad words.”

Ibrahim Almontsir, the boy’s father, later saw surveillance footage of the incident and said it was “indescribable” to watch his son being “chased and beat up.”

“The way she punches him around, he was very helpless,” the father added.'

Students will be marked down if they write ‘mankind’ in North Carolina State women’s studies class

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A women’s and gender studies lecturer at North Carolina State University is docking her students’ grades for using “sexist language” in class assignments.

What’s sexist? “Generalized pronouns,” according to a portion of a syllabus obtained by The College Fix.

The directive is aimed at students in Nancy Bishop’s online class “Women and Poverty.”

“Thanks to evolution, generalized pronouns and other biased references are no longer acceptable in any class,” the syllabus reads in a section on “Non-Sexist Language.”

“You may NOT use ‘he’ or ‘him’ or ‘man’ to refer to both men and women,” it continues. Bishop tells students they can replace “mankind” with “humans” or “humankind,” and should write “she or he” instead of just “he,” though the syllabus is unclear on whether students should always lead with a female pronoun.'

SAVE: U.S. Rep's Math Still Wrong

Matt · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Thank you for telling U.S. Representative Jared Polis on Monday that it's wrong to expel innocence students.

As you may recall, Rep. Polis stated that a student should be expelled if there is only a 20% chance he is guilty.

He has since apologized! http://www.dailycamera.com/guest-opinions/ci_28818663/jared-polis-colleges-should-handle-sex-assault-cases

In his apology, however, he states that 1 in 5 female students in the class of 2019 will be assaulted or raped. Perhaps Polis likes the number "20%," but we know this number has been debunked: http://www.saveservices.org/sexual-assault/myths/

We want you to contact Rep. Polis again and tell him that he needs to look at facts before advocating for sexual assault policy changes. To do otherwise is dangerous and unprofessional.

Call: (202) 225-2161
Email: https://polis.house.gov/forms/writeyourrep/default.aspx

Thank you!

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Judge Orders College to Reinstate Student Accused of Sexual Assault

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A federal judge on Thursday ordered Middlebury College to reinstate a student who had been expelled over alleged sexual misconduct during a study-abroad trip last year, the Associated Press reports, citing court documents.

The student, identified only as John Doe, was initially exonerated by the School for International Training, which ran the study-abroad program, in an unnamed foreign country, in which both John Doe and his alleged victim took part. Unhappy with the school's findings, the victim, identified as Jane Doe, said she intended to file a complaint with the U.S. Education Department's Office for Civil Rights, which is already investigating more than 100 collegesover their response to reports of sexual misconduct on their campuses.'

Harvard Law prof debates Title IX

Mastodon · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Harvard Law School professor Jeannie C. Suk argued at a forum in New York this week that the criminal court system, not campus resources, should investigate and adjudicate cases of alleged sexual harassment, sexual assault, and rape.

At the forum—hosted by Intelligence Squared Debates and titled “Courts, Not Campuses, Should Decide Sexual Assault Cases”—Suk and Yale Law School professor Jeb Rubenfeld argued in favor of the motion. Michelle Anderson, the dean of City University New York School of Law, and Stephen Schulhofer, a professor at New York University School of Law, argued in favor of university involvement in the contentious issue.

"What campuses are doing under pressure from the Department of Education is hurting the cause of gender equality,” Suk argued during an opening statement. “Campus tribunals use procedures that lack basic fairness and often reach inaccurate outcomes.”'

Women earned majority of doctoral degrees in 2014 for 6th straight year, and outnumber men in grad school 136 to 100

Mastodon · 19 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Here's my prediction – the facts that: a) men are underrepresented in graduate school enrollment overall (100 men were enrolled in 2014 for every 136.4 women), b) men received fewer master's (41% of the total) and doctoral degrees (47.8% of the total) than women in 2014, and c) men were underrepresented in 7 out of 11 graduate fields of study at both the master's and doctoral levels last year will get no attention at all from feminists, gender activists, women's centers, the media, universities, and anybody in the higher education industry.

Additionally, there will be no calls for government studies, or increased government funding to address the significant gender disparities favoring women in graduate schools, and nobody will refer to the gender graduate school enrollment and degree gaps favoring women as a problem or a "crisis." Further, neither President Obama nor Congress will address the gender graduate enrollment and degree gaps favoring women by invoking the Title IX gender-equity law, like they have threatened to do for the gender gap in some college math and science programs. And there won't be any executive orders to address the significant under-representation of men in graduate schools by creating a White House Council on Boys and Men like the executive order issued by President Obama in 2009 to create the "White House Council on Women and Girls." Finally, despite their stated commitment to "gender equity," the hundreds of university women's centers around the country are unlikely to show any concern about the significant gender inequities in graduate school enrollment and degrees, and universities will not be allocating funding to set up men's centers on college campuses or providing funding for graduate scholarships for men.'

Constitution Day inspires Title IX debate at University

Mastodon · 19 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Erin Buzuvis, director of Western New England University School of Law's Center for Gender and Sexuality Studies, and Christina Hoff Sommers, author of several books and resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, traded prepared remarks and answered questions about Title IX — the 1972 law that prohibits discrimination in federally funded education based on sex — as well as modern feminism and current campus issues.

The debate, sponsored by CNU's Center for American Studies, drew a near capacity crowd of students in Ferguson Center for the Arts' Music and Theater Hall. Since gaining its official holiday status in 2004, Constitution Day has required institutions that receive federal funding to provide educational programming related to the constitution.'

Mansults: the put-downs that are always levelled at straight white males

Mastodon · 19 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The other evening, I attended an excellent London Thinks debate on free speech – or rather, the apparent lack of it, through “safe spaces” – on British university campuses.

It was a night of much eyebrow-raising, but the sharpest intake of breath was reserved for a comment made by a certain Ms Bahar Mustafa.

Sharp-minded readers may recall how, last April, Mustafa, 27, the Welfare and Diversity Officer at London’s Goldsmiths University, Comment and launched the controversial Twitter hashtag #KillAllWhiteMen, which she later claimed was merely a joke.'

'Don't Be That Guy' campaign on UW-Madison campus gets mixed reviews

Mastodon · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Don't Be That Guy," a new campaign from UW-Madison Police designed to grab young men's attention and remind them that sexual assault is not OK, is getting mixed reviews on campus.

The campaign uses provocative images — like a passed-out young woman — on posters now dotting campus to drive home its message.

UWPD spokesman Marc Lovicott said the campaign, launched in August, is intended to move the focus of anti-sex assault messages from women's behavior to men's. A past campaign, for example, urged women to report assaults, he said.

"One thing we heard is that everybody always focuses on the victims," Lovicott said. "Why not focus on the perpetrators?"

The UWPD modeled the campaign after similar campaigns in Canada and the United Kingdom. Only a handful of police departments in the United States have experimented with a version of "Don't Be That Guy," said a department news release.'

"One in four"

Mastodon · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One in four.

That is the amount of women who are assaulted on college campuses. Look around you. Twenty-five percent of the women on Saint Joseph's University campus could be a part of this statistic.

St. Joe's, however, is trying to combat this staggering statistic. With an updated sexual misconduct policy and required faculty and staff training on the new policies, the university is taking steps toward preventing assaults on campus.

While this is a good step forward, it seems as though they are only implementing faculty training because they have to. An email sent out by the Saint Joseph's Human Resources Office stated, "…to comply with what is now an expectation (rather than a suggestion) under recent changes in federal law, we will provide live training on these revised policies and procedures…" This statement makes it seem as though the university is none too enthusiastic about the prospect of this training.

The Clery Act statistics also look a bit skewed. The reported stats say that only 12 sexual assaults—both "forcible" and "non-forcible"—have taken place on campus between 2011 and 2013. There have not been any incidents reported to Saint Joseph's Office of Public Safety by students living off-campus.

The U.S. Department of Education defines "forcible sex offenses" as "any sexual act directed against another person, forcibly and/or against that person's will; or not forcibly or against the person's will where the victim is incapable of giving consent…"'

Why Marines have a problem with women in combat

Mastodon · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Some believe the service fired an opening shot in the battle on June 30,when it sacked the head of the recruit battalion at Parris Island, S.C., where all enlisted women are made into Marines. During her year in command, Lt. Col. Kate Germano irked her boss as she pushed for tougher standards for female recruits — and boosted their performance.

Before she was fired for what the Corps described as toxic leadership, abuse of authority and poor “playground skills,” Germano had lobbied for the dismantling of the service’s current system of gender-segregated boot camp instruction.

She thinks the Corps should reinstate its old methods that had men and women shoulder-to-shoulder during basic training, tackling the hikes, obstacle courses and classroom lectures together, as recruits do today in all of the nation’s other military services.

Some Marine women disagree, including a gunnery sergeant who told The San Diego Union-Tribune that “not being around boys” helps female recruits concentrate more on the mission: “It becomes a sisterhood and makes us stronger and prouder.”

What the Corps intends as a separate-but-equal training program designed to reduce distractions between the sexes and instill confidence in female recruits is actually the root of many of its problems today, Germano said in an extensive interview. Those challenges include sexual misconduct, lower marksmanship and physical fitness levels among female Marines, and hostility toward integrating women into ground-combat units.'

Female Sheriff’s Deputy Arrested For Domestic Abuse

Mastodon · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'PCSO deputies arrested 44-year-old Consuelo Gallegos-Bias of Mulberry, who is a PCSO deputy sheriff, and charged her with one count Battery Domestic Violence (M-1), one count Resisting Officer Without Violence (M-1), and one count Tampering With Evidence (F-3).

According to the affidavit, PCSO was contacted by Gallegos-Bias’ adult son after he heard an argument between his parents that occurred in the master bedroom. According to the son and two other family member witnesses who were in the home at the time, the suspect was verbally arguing with the victim in the master bedroom, which escalated into the two of them wrestling over a firearm on the floor. The firearm was discharged into a piece of bedroom furniture and nobody was injured. The suspect then battered the victim by hitting him in the head. The victim sought assistance from the witnesses, who called PCSO.'

Male circumcision rates in Utah decline as parents reconsider the procedure

Matt · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Spenst Hansen knows better than to take his body for granted.

Born in the midst of his parents' divorce, the 24-year-old Salt Laker was, of course, a major sticking point in the split. More surprisingly, so was his circumcision status.

"My mother and her side of the family really wanted to get [the procedure] done—so much so, apparently, that they were threatening to get it done behind my father's back," Hansen says. "My father was very adamant and very passionate about letting me keep my whole and unaltered body. From what I understand, he actually put out a court-ordered cease and desist for every pediatrician in the state."'

Judge orders College to cough up student and alumni disciplinary files in sex and drug lawsuit

Matt · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The sex-and-drugs case of John Doe v. Reed College took a peculiar turn this week when a federal judge ordered the school to turn over nearly seven years of student disciplinary files to lawyers in the case.

U.S. District Judge Michael W. Mosman's five-page order Tuesday spells out specific records sought about current and former Reed students, including those accused of violating the school's Honor Principle, Sexual Harassment Policy, Discriminatory Harassment and Sexual Misconduct Policy or Alcohol and Other Drugs Policy.

It's not clear how many records that might include. But the school tallied more than 800 crime reports on campus for drug, alcohol and sexual violence during a three-year period ending in 2013, according to Reed's website.

A former student identified only as "John Doe" filed a federal Title IX lawsuit last April that accuses Reed College and his ex-girlfriend – identified as Jane Roe – of causing him to be wrongly expelled and falsely labeled a sex offender. In Reed and Roe's answers to the suit, Doe is described as someone who distributed drugs, arranged group sex, shared a homemade sex video and would have been tossed out of the college anyway.'

Child victims partly to blame in priest sex-abuse cases, bishop testified

Matt · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Need I mention the what-if around the victims being girls and not boys? Excerpt:

'The victims of child-molesting priests are partly to blame for their own abuse, the bishop of Syracuse said in a sworn deposition that revealed his views on the church's sex abuse scandal.

Bishop Robert Cunningham testified in a 2011 deposition in response to a federal lawsuit filed by a man who said a priest in the Syracuse diocese sexually abused him as a child.

The man's lawyer asked Cunningham whether, in the eyes of the church, a child molested by a priest has committed a sin.

"The boy is culpable," Cunningham said Oct. 14, 2011, according to a transcript of the deposition.

His sworn testimony provides rare insight into the thoughts of the highest-ranking Catholic in Syracuse about one of the most troubling chapters in the church's history.'

U.S. Soldiers Told to Ignore Afghan Allies' Abuse of Boys

Matt · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'In his last phone call home, Lance Cpl. Gregory Buckley Jr. told his father what was troubling him: From his bunk in southern Afghanistan, he could hear Afghan police officers sexually abusing boys they had brought to the base.

"At night we can hear them screaming, but we're not allowed to do anything about it," the Marine's father, Gregory Buckley Sr., recalled his son telling him before he was shot to death at the base in 2012. He urged his son to tell his superiors. "My son said that his officers told him to look the other way because it's their culture."

Rampant sexual abuse of children has long been a problem in Afghanistan, particularly among armed commanders who dominate much of the rural landscape and can bully the population. The practice is called bacha bazi, literally "boy play," and American soldiers and Marines have been instructed not to intervene — in some cases, not even when their Afghan allies have abused boys on military bases, according to interviews and court records.

The policy has endured as American forces have recruited and organized Afghan militias to help hold territory against the Taliban. But soldiers and Marines have been increasingly troubled that instead of weeding out pedophiles, the American military was arming them in some cases and placing them as the commanders of villages — and doing little when they began abusing children.

"The reason we were here is because we heard the terrible things the Taliban were doing to people, how they were taking away human rights," said Dan Quinn, a former Special Forces captain who beat up an American-backed militia commander for keeping a boy chained to his bed as a sex slave. "But we were putting people into power who would do things that were worse than the Taliban did — that was something village elders voiced to me."'

Female sexism: Why it sucks to work with too many men

Mastodon · 21 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As per a new study, covert and overt forms of sexism are equally damaging to working women.

Frequent sexist wisecracks, comments and office cultures, where women are ignored are just as damaging to women as single instances of sexual coercion and unwanted sexual attention, according to the study.

Norms, leadership, or policies, that reduce intense harmful experiences may lead managers to believe that they have solved the problem of maltreatment of women in the workplace, wrote the study authors.

They added that the more frequent, less intense, and often unchallenged gender harassment, sexist discrimination, sexist organizational climate and organizational tolerance for sexual harassment appeared at least as detrimental for women's wellbeing. They should not be considered lesser forms of sexism.
...
The authors further wrote that the results suggest that organizations should have zero tolerance for low intensity sexism, the same way they do for overt harassment. This will require teaching workers about the harmful nature of low intensity sexist events, not only for women, but also for the overall organizational climate.

The study appears in The Psychology of Women Quarterly (a SAGE Journal). ANI)'

Pentagon promotes 'Lean In' groups to boost women in leadership

Mastodon · 21 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter, keen to expand the number of women and minorities in military leadership, on Monday will endorse "Lean In" discussion groups sparked by Facebook Chief Operating Officer Sheryl Sandberg's bestselling book, a senior defense official said.

Carter and Sandberg will meet at the Pentagon with 15 women from all ranks and military services who already lead Lean In groups, followed by a news conference, where Carter will promote creation of more such groups, at government facilities and even during working hours.

"If you look at the numbers, it's clear that we are not where we should be in terms of the leadership reflecting the overall force," said the official. "It's important that our force reflect the nation that it protects."'

Another Survey Probably Overstates Prevalence Of Campus Rape

Mastodon · 21 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The alleged one-in-five sexual assault rate at American colleges is being pushed with renewed vigor Monday thanks to a massive new survey released by the Association of American Universities (AAU). But the new survey has many of the same problems that have dogged earlier surveys.

The survey was administered by the AAU, a collection of America's top public and private research universities, at 27 member campuses. Over 150,000 students responded, approximately 19.3 percent of the total population. According to the survey, about 23 percent of female undergraduate students have experienced some kind of sexual assault, ranging from rape to lesser offenses like unwanted groping. Just under 11 percent of women said they experienced non-consensual sexual penetration of some kind.

The survey is being widely touted as "validation" for the one-in-five sexual assault statistic that has been repeatedly cited as a call to action. But whether this is actually the case is quite dubious. The new survey took a very similar approach to earlier surveys (such as a Washington Post survey from June), and consequently has many of the same flaws.'

U.S. State Dept.: "Connecting Women Entrepreneurs in the Americas"

Minuteman · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'Recognizing that investing in women-owned small and medium enterprises is one of the best ways to accelerate economic growth and prosperity, 18 women entrepreneurs are in the United States beginning this week to form connections with their U.S. colleagues and share best practices to expand their business networks. The Women's Entrepreneurship in the Americas (WEAmericas) Initiative – launched by President Obama at the 2012 Summit of the Americas and part of his Spark Global Entrepreneurship initiative – leverages public-private partnerships to encourage inclusive economic growth and break down the barriers that women entrepreneurs face.
...
The WEAmericas exchange is a core element of the larger WEAmericas initiative. The State Department has worked with partners, including the Walmart Foundation, Goldman Sachs, Thunderbird for Good, Cherie Blair Foundation, the Multilateral Investment Fund, the Inter-American Investment Corporation, Ernst and Young, and others since 2012. Over 20,000 women in more than 20 countries are expected to benefit from these partnerships by the end of 2015.'

'Shadow' campus system is no solution

Matt · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As a person who deals with the issue of sex assault on campus , it seems appropriate for me to offer some opinions in the context of Congressman Polis's remarks and the discussion they have engendered.

First, it is important that we be clear what is being discussed. Sex assault is a very serious crime. Most sex assaults in Colorado are at least class 4 felonies, potentially punishable by many years in prison, mandatory registration as a sex offender, court-ordered sex offender treatment and large fines, as well as the life-changing consequences of a felony conviction.

Our criminal justice system has developed effective protections and strategies to assure fair and honorable investigation, charging and prosecution of sex offenses, carefully balancing the rights of the accused with the rights of a victim. Though law enforcement sometimes fails to act quickly and appropriately (some cite the recent reported problems in Jon Krakauer's book, "Missoula"), a well-run district attorney's office is fully capable of reviewing, investigating, filing and prosecuting cases when a conviction is appropriate. Failure of law enforcement to handle these cases appropriately is normally due to one (or both) of two common problems:
...'

Ed. note: The author is the DA of Boulder County, CO.

University Pulls Kiss Cam After Complaint It Encourages Sexual Assault

Mastodon · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'If the author of a letter to the editor published on Syracuse.com last Friday has his way, the famous “kiss cam” employed at countless sporting venues across the country might go the way of the misogynistic dodo. That’s because, following said letter, Syracuse University will discontinue its use of the gag at the school’s Carrier Dome on Saturday.

On the one hand, this seems like yet another example of political correctness gone mad. Without the popular kiss cam, moments like former president Jimmy Carter‘s loving smooch with his wife Rosalynn Carter will never again grace the next day’s newsfeeds. Yet after reading the Syracuse.com letter, the reasoning behind the school’s decision begins to make some sense.

“The first two people (and probably most people that wind up on the kiss cam) were happy to oblige the camera,” writes Steve Port of Manlius, New York. “However, the cameraman then scanned into the student section where a young man and a young woman were shown. Clearly not a couple, the male student pleaded his case for a kiss on the big screen while the female adamantly shook her head no. So what does this guy do? He grabs her head and shoves his tongue down her throat, the crowd cheers.”

Port continues, saying that the third kiss cam target also appeared to be yet another non-couple, and the female student again shook her head “no.” This time, members of the crowd sitting behind her forcibly shoved her face into the man’s.'

College's hypocrisy on standard of evidence when it comes to accused students

Mastodon · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Vermont college was ordered to halt the expulsion of a student who was expelled for sexual assault without being given a hearing. But what the college argued in its defense was rather interesting.

Middlebury College used a "preponderance of evidence" standard (meaning campus administrators have to be just 50.01 percent sure an assault was committed) even before the Department of Education mandated colleges to lower the bar on proof of charges against students. But when it came to defending itself from this student's lawsuit, the college demanded the higher standard of "clear and convincing" evidence that it had wronged him.

In a footnote of the judge's decision to halt the expulsion, noticed by Samantha Harris of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, the college argued for the higher standard of proof.

"Middlebury argues a higher standard — requiring Plaintiff to demonstrate 'a clear or substantial likelihood of success on the merits' — applies because an injunction will provide plaintiff with substantially all the relief sought and the relief cannot be undone and because plaintiff seeks to alter rather than maintain the status quo," the footnote reads.'

NHL Legend Blows Off Woman's Attempt To Extort Him With Post-Sex Photo

Mastodon · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'NHL legend Jaromir Jagr, 43, recently hooked up with a bombshell 18-year-old model, and after the sex session the model attempted to extort Jagr for $2,000 in return for not releasing a photo of them in bed, according to Complex.

Jagr then hit the model back with the greatest response of all time: "I don't care."

That legendary response led to the photo of Jagr in bed with model being released.'

More Help for College Men With Depression and Anxiety

Mastodon · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Concerned that they aren't reaching enough young men, college counseling centers are making extra efforts to draw them in.

The centers, which usually offer support groups and one-on-one therapy for struggling students, have faced growing demand for their services in recent years. Still, men make up only 33.9% of clients, according to the latest annual survey by the Association for University and College Counseling Center Directors. Men represented 43.8% of the student population at the schools surveyed.
...
At the University of Missouri in Columbia last year, the counseling center reached out to the leaders of the school's fraternities. The center, along with the school's Office of Greek Life, conducted a course on masculinity, covering alcohol abuse, respect for women and how to talk about emotions.'

Canada: Up For Debate gives voice to neglected women's issues

Mastodon · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For instance: how to make Canada a safer and better place for women? Start with the "testosterone-flooded" House of Commons, said May, which prompted gales of laughter in the audience at the U of T.

All leaders spoke about fixing women's inequality from inside Parliament first by increasing women's representation. Trudeau and May said that getting rid of first-past-the-post would lead to more women MPs.

Mulcair promised to introduce a 50-per-cent female quota for the boards of directors of federal organizations.
...
May said women's issues, along with the environment, are too often shoved to the back burner because political discourse in this country caters to men.

"What are the issues that appeal to the alpha males? We still live in a patriarchal society, we still live in a society where men don't want to admit they're sexist, but there is pervasive sexism," she said. "I've never worked in a workplace as male-dominated and testosterone-flooded as the House of Commons."'

Cyberspace misogyny exaggerated

Mastodon · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If you believe the numerous reports on cyberspace misogyny that have appeared in the past couple of years, merely being female on the Internet—whether you're a politician, a journalist, or just a random woman with the temerity to have an opinion—is enough to make you a target for constant sexist insults, vile harassment, and even threats of rape and murder.
...
Certainly, one can point to alarming cases of targeted abuse directed at women, from the rape and death threats sent to British journalist Carolyn Criado-Perez after she campaigned to put Jane Austen on a banknote to American feminist writer Amanda Hess's account of being targeted by a persistent stalker.

But men are hardly immune to such cyber-warfare. Lee Stranahan, a reporter for the American right-wing website Breitbart News, has received death and rape threats directed at himself and his family—which included his home address and phone number being posted online—and has also been the target of phony reports of child abuse.

British videogame critic John Bain (known by the alias TotalBiscuit) has shared a troubling account of being deluged with abusive messages, many wishing him death from cancer, while undergoing chemotherapy.'

University Implements Controversial Sexual Assault Prevention Program

Mastodon · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Wisconsin – Madison has implemented a new sexual assault prevention program for the current school year that is 100% directly targeted at only men being potential rapist. The program titled “Don’t Be that Guy” includes four promotional posters. Each poster is an attempt to instruct men on how to not become a rapist.
...
There is absolutely no mention anywhere in the campaign of potential male victims of sexual violence or potential female aggressors in sexually violent situations.'

Huffington Post Celebrates Woman Who Set Ex-Boyfriend's Car On Fire

Mastodon · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Someone's car got a makeover!

After years of having a car that was boring and unimaginative, much like his relationship with Amy and probably all his exes, Eric has a new ride to go along with his new secret mistress who is no longer a secret at all.

Yeah, this cheating bastard boyfriend's car is looking hot, hot, hot!

Amy hopes you're enjoying your new makeover, Eric, because she certainly is! You might just be too hot to handle at this point, so maybe it's time to go your separate ways.'

Circumcision protest group to demonstrate in Princeton

Matt · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'If you're in Princeton Wednesday and happen to see a bunch of people who appear to be wounded in a very painful manner, don't call 911.

They're part of a group called The Bloodstained Men who are opposed to circumcision, and they've been traveling to cities in the Northeast to draw attention to what they believe is needless surgery on baby boys.

Their attire is designed to shock: white pants with red paint daubed over the groin. They refer to themselves as "intactivists," or activists who favor intact genitals.

Craig Adams, of Dover, one of the demonstration organizers, said he became interested in the issue after the birth of his son in 2013. He and his wife declined three separate inquiries about circumcision while at the hospital, prompting one nurse to remark to their newborn, "You're a lucky baby."'

SAVE: Survey Labeled Students as Sex Offenders for Violating Policy that Didn't Exist

Matt · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'A widely publicized survey on campus sexual assault by the Association of American Universities (AAU) classified male students as violators of affirmative consent policies, even when such policies were not in existence on the campus at the time the survey was conducted. SAVE is calling for AAU to retract the survey and recalculate its findings.

On September 21, the AAU released its Campus Climate Survey on Sexual Assault and Sexual Misconduct, which was conducted at 27 colleges around the nation. The survey reported that 23.1% of female undergraduates experience sexual assault or sexual misconduct sometime during their college careers.

The survey defined "sexual misconduct" to include failure to obtain affirmative consent. But affirmative consent is a controversial, possibly unconstitutional policy, and most colleges had not implemented the policy when AAU fielded the survey in April 2015.'

Soldier uses GoPro to prove wife's domestic abuse

Matt · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'It was a low blow, captured on a man's GoPro that has led Pinellas County Deputies to put his estranged wife in jail.

"This is just one of many instances where I've had to use the camera to either prove her guilt or prove my innocence and that's the only reason I am carrying it," said Michael who recorded the attack. 10 News is protecting his identity since he is a victim of domestic violence.

In the middle of a long divorce and custody battle over twin 2-year-olds, Michael has been tying the GoPro to his belt using parachute cord to make sure each exchange with his ex is documented.
...
In a custody exchange last Thursday, the camera shows Michael reaching into the back of the car to unbuckle one of his sons. As he is doing that you hear him scream and jerk back. Going frame by frame, in the bottom right hand corner of the video you see what appears to be the hand of 37-year-old Corinne Novak as she forcefully grabs his genitals.'

Congressman: Expel Students Accused Of Rape, But Don’t You Dare Touch My Tea

Mastodon · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Jared Polis, the Colorado Democrat who raised eyebrows this month by suggesting students merely accused of sexual assault deserve to be expelled, has apparently found something more deserving of fairness and leniency: Colorado’s kombucha tea industry.

Kombucha tea stands out from other teas because it requires fermentation to make, meaning the drink usually has a small amount of alcohol in it. While this amount is minimal, it can sometimes drift above 0.5 percent, which triggers a host of federal regulations and potential fines. That has left kombucha producers in constant fear of a federal government crackdown that could put them out of business.

Now, Polis says he’s fed up with this unjust reality.'

The latest big sexual assault survey is (like others) more hype than science

Matt · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Amazing the Post ran it, given it's so highly critical of it. The Post typically doesn't like to entertain criticism of itself. Still, anything to shore up lagging sales, even taking opposite positions on the same subject. Money talks. Excerpt:

'"Survey: 1 in 5 women in college sexually assaulted."

This headline, on The Washington Post's long Sept. 21 article about a large survey of students at 27 public and private universities across the country college, is false.

Although the survey, by the Association of American Universities (AAU), was itself deliberately designed to exaggerate the number of sexual assaults on campus, even the AAU said that "estimates such as '1 in 5′ or '1 in 4′ as a global rate" across all universities is [sic] oversimplistic, if not misleading."

This is not to suggest that The Post misrepresented the AAU survey's findings any more than did most major news media. Such advocacy-laden surveys on campus sexual assault — and breathless media reports overstating their already exaggerated findings — have become the norm in this era of hysteria about the campus sexual assault problem.

The problem is no doubt serious, if shrinking. But it has been vastly exaggerated by the Obama administration, anti-rape activists, their media allies and universities pandering to them. It's no surprise to see the AAU joining this chorus.

Below are three ways in which the 288-page AAU survey report is grossly misleading, as are others like it and the credulous media coverage of them all.'

Australia: PM's scathing attack on men who commit domestic violence

Mastodon · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull has called on all Australians to make a "cultural shift" and stop disrespecting women, declaring that gender inequality lies at the heart of domestic violence.

In comments that have been labelled a "gamechanger" for the fight against domestic violence, Mr Turnbull called on parents, teachers and employers to get on board the culture change, saying he wanted Australia to become known as a country that respects women.

"I'd say that as parents, one of the most important things we must do is ensure that our sons respect their mothers and their sisters," Mr Turnbull told reporters in Melbourne on Thursday.
...
"Violence against women is one of the great shames of Australia. It is a national disgrace," Mr Turnbull said.

He also said it should be "unAustralian" to disrespect women.'

Dept. of Education shredded for lawless overreach in Senate hearing

Mastodon · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Practically all of the changes in how colleges and universities handle sexual-assault allegations and investigations were spurred by a 2011 letter from the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights (OCR).

Known as a "Dear Colleague" letter, the OCR proceeded to threaten the higher education community with the loss of federal funding if institutions didn't adopt slanted procedures against students accused of sexual misconduct, notably the low "preponderance of evidence" standard.

It was issued without a notice-and-comment process, making OCR's guidance arguably unenforceable, yet the office has launched Title IX investigations against scores of schools for allegedly violating its unenforceable rules emanating from that letter.'

Hillary Clinton sits for interview with Lena Dunham

Mastodon · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'In an effort to reach out to millennial women voters, Hillary Clinton will appear in an interview opposite Girls star Lena Dunham, set to post online Tuesday, POLITICO has learned. The already-taped segment also includes comedy sketches filmed at Clinton's Brooklyn campaign headquarters, including a cameo by comedian Amy Schumer.

The pair make something of an odd couple: Dunham is the queen of oversharing, while Clinton can come across as overly scripted. But in a short clip of the interview reviewed by POLITICO, the former secretary of state appears relaxed. In the full interview, Clinton will engage with Dunham in an intimate discussion about what her own life was like in college, and the ambivalence she felt in her early 20s about her own life and career path, according to a spokesperson for Dunham's new website, LennyLetter.com, where the interview will appear.'

Lena Dunham Describes Sexually Abusing Her Little Sister

Prominent college basketball player suspended after sexual assault allegation

Mastodon · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Dayton senior forward Dyshawn Pierre has been suspended from school after he was accused of sexual assault by another student, reports Josh Sweigart of the Dayton Daily News.
...
In May, a female student accused Pierre of sexually assaulting her at his campus residence after they returned from a night out at a local bar. She told an investigating officer that she “pushed at the suspect and told him to stop.”

Pierre has denied wrongdoing in the incident.

“At no time did she by words or actions ever indicate that she was an an unwilling participant,” Pierre wrote in a statement. “I never held her down so it was impossible for her to get away, or held her down in any way. I never told her to or demanded that she do anything. Everything we did was totally consensual.”

In June, an investigation of the incident was turned over to the Montgomery County Prosecutor’s Office, which has declined to press charges “due to insufficient evidence,” reports the Dayton Daily News.'

Harvard students edit Wikipedia in effort to ‘dismantle the patriarchy’

Mastodon · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Reason No. 128 why trusting Wikipedia can be dangerous territory: Harvard students recently held a Wikipedia “edit-a-thon” in an effort to “dismantle the patriarchy,” The Harvard Crimson reports:

With the stated purpose of changing and adding Wikipedia pages related to feminist, BGLTQ, and human rights issues, the group of about eight students went on an editing spree, taking out phrasing they saw as offensive and otherwise tweaking the site.

In a mass email advertising the event, student-run feminist publication Manifesta Magazine described the event as part of a movement to “dismantle the patriarchy” on Wikipedia.'

"A Strange and Barbaric Practice"

Matt · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Letter here. Excerpt:

'In the well-written City Weekly cover story on circumcision ["Circumcision Decision," Sept. 17], the God of the Jewish, Muslim and Christian religions is credited with beginning this practice: God demands that the 99-year- old Abraham cut off his foreskin in order to prove his loyalty. God further demands the same of all Abraham's male offspring.

Why was God so fascinated with an old man's penis? If God required a physical proof of a man's membership in this limited fraternity, why not something more easily visible? A tattoo on the upper arm would have sufficed. Only a complete body search would reveal this mark of the chosen ones.

Today, it would be considered pretty sick and against the law if the coach of a football team required circumcision of the players. Likewise, it would be very strange if a corporate CEO demanded that all male employees show proof of not having foreskin.'

Faculty At University Firmly Reject ‘Trigger Warnings’

Matt · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A faculty resolution passed at American University (AU) in Washington, D.C., stands out as one of the most vocal and direct condemnations of the “trigger warning” phenomenon sweeping college campuses.

The resolution, passed unanimously by AU’s faculty senate, lays out in no uncertain terms that trigger warnings are wholly incompatible with the intellectual environment a university is supposed to foster.

“For hundreds of years, the pursuit of knowledge has been at the center of university life,” the resolution declares. “Unfettered discourse, no matter how controversial, inconvenient, or uncomfortable, is a condition necessary to that pursuit.”'

SAVE E-lert: A Dangerous Study Gone Wrong

Matt · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Earlier this week, the Association of American Universities (AAU) released a study on campus sexual assault. The study is deeply flawed, and needs to be restudied.

To determine whether or not sexual misconduct or assault occurred, the study used definitions of these crimes far beyond any state criminal law and far beyond most school policies.

In fact, a majority of the schools that participated in the study (15 out of 27) did not even have an affirmative consent definition, but the students' activity was categorized as 'misconduct' if the students didn't follow this illogical, unconstitutional standard.

The survey is already being used to drive the campus rape hysteria hype. We need AAU to retract its biased and flawed survey. Accuracy matters.

Call: AAU President, Hunter Rawlings, at (202) 408-7500 today.

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Gender issues speech balanced, informative

Mastodon · 25 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"When you look at the way feminists have responded to men's issues it's a pretty bad record," said American journalist Cathy Young at a controversial event in Toronto Thursday night. A movement that was once about equality seems to have transformed in strange ways, its excesses amplified by the internet and campus theatrics.

It's sad that I even need to describe Young's talk, entitled "The Politics of Gender and Victimhood", as "controversial".

Young - whose writing has appeared in The New York Times, Daily Beast, Reason and more - was initially a feminist when she arrived in the U.S. from the USSR in 1980. But after following the movement questions arose and she's now a critic.

Her engaging and fact-based speech was a far cry from the angry, misogynist chest-thumping "men's rights" shindig that opponents of similar events on campus have tried to label them.'

Advocates want black mark on college transcripts for campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 25 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One group pushing for more college involvement in campus sexual assault accusations wants to make sure there's a black mark on the transcripts of any student punished for assault or harassment.

This suggestion by the Association of Title IX Administrators might be a good one if today's campus climates were different. As matters stand, not one in which students who probably didn't commit acts of sexual violence are routinely punished anyway.

To brand someone a rapist based on colleges' preponderance of evidence standard — that is, based on 50.01 percent certainty the assault happened — is a dangerous precedent in itself. To brand someone for life in this way, effectively making transfers impossible, is even worse. I get where ATIXA is coming from, but if we're going to try and keep a student from having a future, we probably need more certainty that he deserves it.

Currently, young college men are being expelled based on accusations without evidence, thanks to federal rules from the Department of Education. Many of these young men are fighting back by suing their universities for denying them due process. Colleges and universities are incentivized to punish students based on accusations alone, rather than to conduct a fair hearing that might result in a finding of "not responsible" and bring down federal pressure.'

Attention paid to male issues doesn't diminish from feminism: it's not a zero sum game

Mastodon · 25 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Cathy Young is a widely admired libertarian "equity feminist" American journalist, whose considerable critical skills often deployed in dismantling the "rape culture" narrative, continually ruffle ideologues' feathers.

Young was scheduled to speak at the University of Toronto tonight, Thursday, September 24th, on "The Politics of Gender and Victimhood," an event planned by the University of Toronto Men's Issues Awareness Society (UTMIAS) and sponsored by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFÉ), on whose advisory board I sit.

But some nasty words on the Internet and a moral panic over them conspired to push the event off campus at the U of T's insistence, and so Ms Young will be speaking instead at Intercontinental Yorkville (7 pm). She will speak in Ottawa Sept 25.

The back-story is this: On Sept 5, disturbing comments were posted on BlogTO expressing pleasure in killing women with guns and knives, massacre-style. They recall similar comments on the same blog in June mentioning the use of guns, bullets and machetes to inflict violence and death on women (which the U of T sat on for some reason until now).'

NZ: Police say runner's rape allegation was false

Mastodon · 25 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Police have charged an 18-year-old woman with making a false complaint after she alleged she was accosted and raped this week while running in Napier.

The woman claimed she was attacked on Monday evening along the river stopbank near the Pettigrew Green Arena in Taradale.

The claim prompted a police plea for sightings of men seen acting suspiciously in the area.

The woman will appear in the Hastings District Court next week and police said she had been referred to mental health service providers.

Police said she was charged after an "extensive investigation" into her allegations.

She has also been charged with theft, which police said was an unrelated event.
...
"This sort of activity is very frustrating, but police have to take every complaint seriously and we will investigate any allegations, especially ones like this of a serious sexual nature," he said.'

Google Ideas assembles the usual suspects to help combat online abuse

Mastodon · 25 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Those familiar with #GamerGate should recognize some of those people right away, but suffice it to say that group does not consist of cyber security experts, criminal investigators, master psychologists, or pretty much anyone who could contribute productively to stopping Internet trolls from making life miserable for everyone. Instead Google Ideas picked out a handful of the same feminist agitators, social justice warriors, professional victims, and all around despicable personalities that have been the bane of the Internet for at least a year now.

Of the bunch, Anita Sarkeesian is probably the one most recognizable to HotAir readers since Jazz reported on her cancelling a talk last year. She's made a small fortune off accusing the video game industry of being a misogyny factory with her Feminist Frequency videos, and she's parlayed the inevitable backlash she's received into being the go-to spokesperson for anyone interested in talking about women getting harassed online.

Gamers will note Zoe Quinn's on that list too. Quinn's the infamous creator of the game, and I use that word as loosely as possible, Depression Quest whose dalliances with members of the video game press created the conflicts of interest that sparked the #GamerGate movement. Just a few days ago a judge finally tossed out the unconstitutional gag order she had placed on her ex-boyfriend to stop him from airing any more of her dirty laundry online, but despite that she'll be joining Sarkeesian to talk about cyber violence at the UN today.'

A troubling trend in campus sexual assault findings

Matt · 25 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Two recent findings from the federal government regarding how school's handle campus sexual assault cases have had a disturbing similarity: Both schools were faulted for not investigating an accusation even when the accuser didn't want it investigated.

At Michigan State University, the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights determined the school failed to provide a "prompt and equitable" response to an accusation because it failed to investigate an informal complaint — one where the accuser chose not to go through the school process of a formal hearing. Now the same accusation (among others) has been made against the University of Virginia.

U.Va. was found in violation of Title IX because, among other things, OCR determined it hadn't handled 22 out of 50 reports of sexual harassment and assault between the 2008-2009 and 2011-2012 school years. When U.Va. President Teresa Sullivan was asked about those cases by the Washington Post, she noted that each of those 22 cases involved students who didn't file a formal complaint or want to go through the procedure for what are technically known as "informal" complaints.'

UN reports recommends wide censorship to save feminist feelings

Mastodon · 26 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a report released yesterday, entitled “Cyber Violence Against Women And Girls: A Global Wake-up Call,” UN Women, the group behind last year’s risible “He for She” campaign, called on governments to use their “licensing prerogative” to ensure that “telecoms and search engines” are only “allowed to connect with the public” if they “supervise content and its dissemination.”

In other words, if search engines and ISPs don’t comply with a list of the UN’s censorship demands, the UN wants national governments to cut off their access to the public.

So, what sort of content does the UN want to censor? ISIS recruitment videos, perhaps, which lure women into lives of rape and servitude? Live-streamed executions from Syria? Revenge porn or snuff videos? There’s no shortage of dangerous and potentially traumatising content on the web, after all, much of it disproportionately affecting women.

Alas not. The UN is hung up on “cyber violence against women,” a Kafkaesque term that is apparently shorthand for “women being criticised on the internet.” At least, that’s how at least two attendees at the launch of the UN report, published by the United Nations Broadband Commission, explained it yesterday.'

Girls outnumber boys in juvy, report shows

Mastodon · 26 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Girls now make up a larger share of the juvenile justice population, according to a new study released Friday.

The report, “Gender Injustice: System-Level Juvenile Justice Reforms for Girls” by the National Crittenton Foundation and the National Women’s Law Center, said arrests of girls increased by 45 percent over the past two decades, while court caseloads and detentions increased by 40 percent and post-adjudication placement rose by 44 percent.

A number of the girls coming through the system were found to have been victims of violence and sexual abuse at home and in their communities.

“The traumatic and unhealthy social environments in which many girls live result in behaviors that are criminalized or are mishandled by other systems, resulting in girls’ entry into the juvenile justice system,” the report said.'

'Bloodstained' circumcision protestors are not here for the Pope

Matt · 26 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'"I love my circumcised penis!"

This is one of the more colorful things David Atkinson, 27, often hears while protesting male circumcision across the country. Passers-by outside City Hall on Thursday were more curious than crude towards the group of a dozen men, who wear all-white clothing with fake bloodstains splattered on the crotch. Their signs carry messages like "Stop cutting baby penis", "Foreskin theft" and "His body, his choice."

Atkinson belongs to Bloodstained Men, a California-based organization raising awareness about male genital mutilation. They're not religiously affiliated, though they note that circumcision is "a freedom of religion issue." Moreover, the group says it doesn't do any political lobbying for their cause.

"It's not really very effective in the current legislative climate," Atkinson said. "What's more effective is public awareness, because parents are the ones who decide whether or not their child gets to keep his whole penis."'

Students Are the Real Victims of Censorship

Matt · 26 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The 2015-16 academic year has opened with a predictable collection of demands for banning certain views, often involving sexual or racial matters. Many are couched in convoluted claims that disagreeable speech is making students feel "unsafe."

Much of the squelching aims to fend off challenges to some of the more ludicrous theories of victimization. Well-constructed thoughts on social injustice can be defended in debates.

But the concern here goes beyond the issue of free speech. What do these bizarre definitions of sexual or racial harassment do to the students' heads? They, too, are free speech, but when they are shielded from counterarguments, they take on the air of "facts." The students leave school with "givens" that are not givens 5 feet outside the campus gates.

Case in point is the story of Ellen Pao. A hotshot Harvard-educated lawyer, Pao sued her Silicon Valley venture capital employer for gender discrimination. As evidence, she cited a partner's referring to a porn star on a private jet.

Where would an otherwise worldly woman come to see a mere mention of porn-watching as evidence of sexual bias? No need to answer.

Brown University just issued another survey "finding" that about 1 in 4 of its undergraduate women have suffered "nonconsensual sexual contact." It's hard to know what the heck that means, but you wonder how the throngs of unescorted high-school girls roaming nearby Thayer Street manage to survive the evening.'

Report Claims Women's Ranger School Graduation 'Planned In Advance'

Mastodon · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new report in PEOPLE Magazine claims that the graduation of the United States Army Ranger School's first two female cadets was rigged from the start.

According to PEOPLE's Susan Keating, the graduation of First Lieutenants Kristen Griest and Shaye Haver was a heavily politicized event, even before the possibility of their ever graduating from the school became a reality in August. The news comes just days after Rep. Steve Russell (R-Oklahoma) requested documentation relating to the matter from the Department of Defense over concerns that "the women got special treatment and played by different rules."

Multiple unconfirmed sources told Keating that an unnamed general told subordinates that "a woman will graduate Ranger School" back in January. "At least one will get through," he concluded at the time.

"Even though this was supposed to be just an assessment, everyone knew" another source told PEOPLE. "The results were planned in advance."

Among other things, the sources revealed that female entrants were sent to a special two-week training program to help prepare from for Ranger School. Unlike the male students, the women were allowed to repeat the program until they passed. They were also given individual nutritional counseling.

During their time at the Ranger School, women were given previews of certain parts of the course that men would only see once they were tested. They were also pulled out of difficult portions, like patrols, and allowed to repeat them. Men were not allowed to do the same.'

The Problem With Campus Sexual Assault Surveys

Mastodon · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This week, headlines in newspapers across the country trumpeted the troubling findings from a massive new survey on campus sexual assault. “1 in 4 Women Experience Sex Assault on Campus,” declared the New York Times. “One in four female undergraduates reports sexual misconduct, survey finds,” reported the Los Angeles Times. “More than 1 in 5 female undergrads at top schools suffer sexual attacks,” offered the Washington Post. Conducted last spring by the Association of American Universities, the survey of students on 27 campuses, including all but Princeton University from the Ivy League, would seem to confirm the assertion by President Obama that “1 in 5” young women are victimized during their college years. This was the key statistic the president cited when he announced last year that campus sexual assault would be a signature issue for his administration.

That number has come in for muchdebunking. While reporting a story on the perceived epidemic of sexual violence on campus last year, I interviewed Christopher Krebs, the lead author of the 2007 Campus Sexual Assault Study, from which the 1 in 5 number was first derived. “We don’t think one in five is a nationally representative statistic,” he said, noting that he’d conducted his surveys on just two campuses. The more wide-ranging AAU survey would seem to sweep away the doubt. But its authors also explicitlywarn against making the kind of national claims suggested by this week’s headlines: “[M]any news stories are focused on figures like ‘1 in 5’ in reporting victimization,” they write, then advise that it is “oversimplistic, if not misleading” to conclude that any study, including their own, proves that 20 or 25 percent of female students are victims.'

Field Report: Law Professors Face Off In Intelligence Squared Debate On Campus Sexual Assault

Matt · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Submitted by a MANN reader and SAVE member who attended the debate:

'On September 16, Intelligence Squared held a debate in New York City on the issue of whether sexual assault cases taking place on college campuses should be decided by courts rather than by the colleges where the crimes allegedly took place. The motion being debated was stated simply as, “Courts, not campuses, should decide sexual assault cases.”

Arguing for the motion that these cases should be decided by courts were Jed Rubenfeld of Yale Law School and Jeannie Suk of Harvard Law School, while Michelle Anderson of CUNY School of Law and Stephen Schulhoffer of NYU School of Law argued against it. Both sides acknowledged that false allegations and wrongful convictions happen and that the issue needs to be taken seriously. They also both acknowledged that there need to be changes to the college disciplinary process to address false allegations, although those arguing against the motion gave no specific proposals as to what they would change and made it clear that they support the preponderance of the evidence standard currently required by the Department of Education.

Unfortunately, it was clear that both sides viewed the interests of the falsely accused as being of secondary importance. While it was not explicitly stated, it was clear that both sides assumed that false allegations are rare. Those arguing against the motion at one point discussed the Duke lacrosse case and qualified it by “not saying that such cases happen every day,” although they provided no evidence to support this claim. Given that 90% (297/330) of those who have been exonerated by DNA evidence were wrongfully convicted of sex crimes, this assumption is severely misguided (1). They also cited the statistic that nearly 5% of college men are serial rapists, which comes from a 13-year-old study that that has been debunked on the grounds that the students surveyed were not a representative sample of college students (2) (3) (4).

Also troubling was that those arguing against the motion took the position that the law should provide no guidance at all in terms of how schools should handle these cases. While they opposed the Department of Education’s “Dear Colleague” letter and its requirement for schools to use the preponderance of the evidence standard, the alternative that they proposed was to leave schools to do whatever they want to accused students without the law requiring any evidence before they are sanctioned.

One of the more compelling (and surprising) arguments from those arguing for the motion was an extensive discussion of the potential for innocent students to either be wrongfully convicted or take plea bargains in the criminal justice system. Neither side addressed the question of why, if we believe that there’s a significant probability of this in the criminal justice system where proof beyond a reasonable doubt is used, we shouldn’t expect an even higher wrongful conviction rate under the preponderance of the evidence standard. They also claimed that pushing these cases into the criminal justice system would contribute to mass incarceration. This assumption is highly questionable, considering that there is good reason to believe that many of those making false allegations today would not be doing so if it meant going under oath and opening themselves to charges of perjury if evidence should emerge to prove that they are lying, rather than being protected by the confidentiality and non-retaliation provision of FERPA and Title IX that apply to colleges and universities.

The issue of broadening the definition of sexual assault was also raised, and there was extensive discussion of how to handle the case of a student groping another student. Concern was raised that prosecuting the student would require him to register as a sex offender, and both sides seemed to agree that handling a more minor case like this within the school might be appropriate.

The audience was asked to vote on the motion both before and after the debate. In the initial vote, 56% of the audience supported the motion, while 12% opposed it. In the final vote, 56% continued to support the motion, while 31% opposed it. Those who opposed the motion were considered by Intelligence Squared to have won the debate because they gained the most between the two votes. However, the results show that, after hearing both sides, nearly twice as many people felt that these cases should be handled by courts as by campuses.

Overall, the debate had both encouraging and discouraging signs. Intelligence Squared should be commended for conducting a balanced, respectful debate on the issue, providing a much-needed change from media coverage that has been largely one-sided. The discussions underscore that much work still needs to be done to ensure that the rights of falsely accused students are adequately protected.

NOTES:

(1) http://www.innocenceproject.org/cases-false-imprisonment/front-page#c10=published&b_start=0&c4=Exonerated+by+DNA

(2) http://www.wcsap.org/sites/www.wcsap.org/files/uploads/webinars/SV%20on%20Campus/Repeat%20Rape.pdf

(3) https://reason.com/archives/2015/07/28/campus-rape-statistics-lisak-problem

(4) https://reason.com/blog/2015/07/28/campus-rape-stats-lisak-study-wrong

It's Not Your Imagination, Single Women: There Literally Aren't Enough Men Out There

Mastodon · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Finding a man, yeah.
But if you're really marriage-oriented and this is a high priority for you and you have geographical flexibility, you just might want to put this on your list, you know. San Jose, Denver, Seattle—those are going to be better dating markets for women than Miami or Fort Lauderdale or New York.

That's really interesting because it also speaks to tech's problem as a very, very male-dominated industry...
Right. Back East, the city with the best gender ratio is probably Columbus, Ohio, which has a real burgeoning tech community there.

I'm making a quantitative argument not a qualitative argument. I don't know if these [tech] guys are good guys or whether—I don't know if they can carry on a conversation or not.

They can't.
I'm just telling you by the numbers I think they're less likely to act like dickheads because they don't have the same kind of leverage.'

Shadow college system embraces accusation

Mastodon · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Two weeks ago, a federal judge in Vermont blocked the expulsion of a Middlebury College student who had been accused of sexual misconduct and, without a hearing, was barred from enrolling for the fall semester.

"This case presents a unique situation where the plaintiff was exonerated of the charge of sexual assault by one U.S. institution following an investigation and hearing, allowed to continue his studies the next term, and subsequently determined by (Middlebury) following a second investigation of the same allegation to have committed sexual assault, after which he was expelled," wrote U.S. Judge J. Garvan Murtha.

The student, identified only as John Doe, was enrolled in a study-abroad program run by The School for International Training in November 2014 when he was accused by a non-Middlebury student of misconduct.

The school was informed of the allegations and accepted the result of the first inquiry, at least until it learned that the accuser intended to file a complaint with the U.S. Department of Education.

Then Middlebury launched a re-investigation and dropped the hammer on Doe.'

False domestic violence claim draws probation sentence, report says

Mastodon · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here.

'A West Milford woman and her Wanaque co-defendant were sentenced Friday to five years' probation and $20,000 in restitution for making a false domestic violence complaint that landed the father of her child in jail for 18 days, the Record reported.

Jeanette Crowley, 53, and John DeWitt, 55, both apologized to Michael Stitt in Passaic County Superior Court.

Police arrested Stitt in September 2011 in front of his then 9-year-old son based on an allegation by Crowley that he stalked and assaulted her. Prosecutors later obtained evidence that the allegations were false and charged Crowley and DeWitt with perjury and providing false information to police.'

The myth of the college ‘rape culture’

Mastodon · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'So Harvard has now released the results of its sexual conduct survey and there’s only one question left to answer: How many incidents of sexual assault did not involve drinking?

In a letter to the Harvard students, faculty and alumni earlier this week, the university’s president Drew Faust explained: “Sexual assault represents a deeply troubling problem for Harvard, for colleges and universities more broadly, and for our society at large.”

The data, drawn from the survey conducted in the spring, “reinforce the alarming frequency with which our students, especially but by no means only our undergraduates, experience incidents of sexual assault.”

How frequent is it? Of the Harvard seniors who responded, “31% (or 172 women) said they had experienced some form of ‘nonconsensual sexual contact’ since college began.”'

Will any university stand up to the bogus ‘rape epidemic’ hype?

Mastodon · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new survey of sexual assault on college campuses? Cue the claims of proof positive that a “rape culture” exists at schools across the nation.

Take it with a large grain of salt — for the same reason so many similar studies have turned out to fall far short of similar headlines.

In reality, there’s absolutely no sign, in this study or any other, of any “campus rape epidemic.” Indeed, national crime statistics clearly show that women are safer on a US campus than off.

Yes, the heads of Yale, Harvard and other schools responded to the new study with shock and horror. But they’re under fire for supposedly lax responses to what President Obama calls a growing crisis — and plainly lack the courage to stand up to the hype.'

Another Title IX slapdown

ThomasI · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Kansas must reinstate a student it expelled for derogatory tweets he posted about his ex-girlfriend, the Lawrence Journal-World reports.

The Kansas Court of Appeals ruled on Friday that Navid Yeasin, who was expelled in 2013, couldn't be held responsible under the university's code of student conduct because there was "no proof in the record that Yeasin posted the tweets while he was on campus," and the code governs only behavior on the campus or at university-sponsored events.'

Ending Circumcision, circumcision, Part One: The case for extending legal protections to America's boys

Matt · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The story of Rita and Nate is fictional in just one sense. The couple authorized the illegal genital cutting of a daughter, not a son. In every other aspect, the dynamics of their story unfold daily for infant boys in the United States.

We stand alone as the only country in the world that routinely cuts the genitals of infant boys for non-religious reasons. This practice has spawned a multimillion-dollar industry centered upon the harvesting of foreskins (just "google"neonatal human dermal fibroblast). Doctors willing to profit justify the imposition of an elective, irreversible, painful, and risky procedure on the most private parts of infant boys who are unable to offer any semblance of consent.

If we had inherited the religious or cultural practices that celebrate the removal of a girl's labia and/or clitoris, then the cutting of girls, the selling of their genital tissue, and an accompanying compendium of pseudo-scientific justification would be commonplace.'

Another suspension, another lawsuit

Matt · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. It's a total boon for litigators and a nightmare for college men. Excerpt:

'An attorney for University of Dayton basketball player Dyshawn Pierre calls UD's decision to suspend him for a semester following a sexual assault accusation that didn't lead to criminal charges unfair, and says he will fight it.

"Ignoring that decision made by qualified professionals, the University of Dayton subjected Dyshawn to fundamentally defective and unfair university disciplinary procedures orchestrated to appease a broken Department of Education policy," said a statement from New York attorney Peter Ginsberg.

"We will be challenging the university's handling of this matter in the near future."

Ginsberg's statement released Wednesday evening followed exclusive reporting by this newspaper that Pierre is not enrolled this semester at UD after another student accused him of a sexual assault that he denies happened, and county prosecutors say lacks sufficient evidence to merit charges.'

SAVE E-lert: All Victims Deserve Help

Matt · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

October is Domestic Violence Awareness Month.

To show your support for all victims, take a moment next month to help raise awareness:

- October 5th: Talk to a friend about domestic violence. Use SAVE's handout on domestic violence to get the conversation started: http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/Seven-Facts-Every-American-Should-Know-About-DV.pdf
- October 10th: Read SAVE's Special Report on "Arrest Policies for Domestic Violence," and contact your local police department to advocate for best practices: http://www.saveservices.org/reports/
- October 15th: Wear a Black Dot to start the domestic violence discussion with a stranger. Learn more about this new campaign here: http://www.kgw.com/story/news/local/2015/09/19/black-dots-new-signal-domestic-violence-victims/72480260/
- October 22nd: Wear purple on #PurpleThursday to show support for domestic violence victims.
- October 26th: Share SAVE's Special Report on domestic violence funding with your federal legislators so that resources are allocated equally to all victims: http://saveservices.org/pdf/SAVE-Accountability-and-Oversight.pdf

Help be the voice for silenced victims in October. Remember, all victims deserve help.

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Firm Comments on College Campus Sexual Misconduct: When a Kiss is Not Just a Kiss

Mastodon · 29 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A recent Association of American Universities Campus Climate Survey reported that one in four undergraduate female students have experienced unwanted sexual contact sometime during their college experience. Overall, the study reported that 23 percent of undergraduate women at the participating universities said they had been physically forced — or threatened with force — into nonconsensual sexual contact or incapacitated when it happened. That included activities ranging from sexual touching or kissing to actual sexual intercourse.

Kimberly C. Lau, a partner at the law firm of Warshaw Burstein in New York City, has spent years defending students accused of sexual misconduct in over 40 cases. She has represented both male and female students who have faced life-altering consequences of expulsion, suspension, and branding as a sexual offender for kissing, touching and even requesting too many social media connections.
...
Another private university found a male student responsible of sexual misconduct (stalking) for sending multiple Instagram follow requests to a female student's Instagram account, and for a single incident of staring at the female student on campus. The male student's disciplinary record now reflects "sexual misconduct" and he was suspended for one year.

As these campus sexual assault cases obtain legal representation by the accused, they often settle before reaching the courtroom. Several colleges had to settle with the accused male student, including Duke, University of Virginia, Amherst, University of Michigan, University of Connecticut, Brown,Occidental College, CU Boulder and others. In the last five years, at least 70 male students accused of sexual misconduct brought lawsuits against their schools, alleging that their treatment violated their contractual or due process rights or was so biased as to constitute sex discrimination against them.

"Herein lies the problem with campus tribunals determining if a crime of sexual misconduct was committed – students can be wrongly accused because the accusation becomes the proof or, simply, because the definitions are too broad and too ambiguous; students can be accused months or even years after the incident; and those wrongly accused are denied due process," continued Ms. Lau. "The campus culture is that the accused is guilty and alcohol precludes the victim from cognitively giving consent to an inebriated act of sexual activity."'

1 in 4 Women: How the Latest Sexual Assault Statistics Were Turned into Click Bait by the 'New York Times'

Mastodon · 29 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As someone who has worked on college campuses to educate men and women about sexual assault and consent, I have seen the barriers to raising awareness and changing attitudes. Chief among them, in my experience, is a sense of skepticism--especially among college-aged men--that sexual assault is even all that dire of a problem to begin with.

"1 in 4? 1 in 5? Come on, it can't be that high. That's just feminist propaganda!"

A lot of the statistics that get thrown around in this area (they seem to think) have more to do with politics and ideology than with careful, dispassionate science. So they often wave away the issue of sexual assault--and won't engage on issues like affirmative consent.

In my view, these are the men we really need to reach.

So enter the headline from last week's New York Times coverage of the latest college campus sexual assault survey:

"1 in 4 Women Experience Sex Assault on Campus."

But that's not what the survey showed. And you don't have to read all 288 pages of the published report to figure this out (although I did that today just to be sure). The executive summary is all you need.

Here is what the authors of the survey--prepared on behalf of the Association of American Universities (AAU)--had to say in their introductory remarks:

`[E]stimates such as "1 in 5" or "1 in 4" as a global rate [are] oversimplistic, if not misleading. None of the studies which generate estimates for specific IHEs [institutes of higher education] are nationally representative.`

They go on to highlight that only 19.3 percent of students who were contacted actually responded to the survey, despite incentives--a low response rate for these kinds of surveys--and that even they were not likely to be representative of the student body within their own schools.'

Attack of the Lying Breastapo Feminazis

Mastodon · 29 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Caroline Starmer was not assaulted by the security guard in much the same way as “Jackie” (the anonymous victim of the UVA campus rape story) was not raped as part of an initiation rite during a chapter house party, as actorvist Lena Dunham was not raped at Oberlin College by a Republican called Barry and, indeed, as Sulkowicz herself was almost certainly not raped at Columbia university.

What is it with these crazy chicks?

Well I think I know the answer and it’s one, I’m pretty sure, that all the crazy chicks out there are going to agree wholeheartedly: basically it’s all the fault of men.

Up until recently, you may recall, we lived in a universe entirely run in the interests of the oppressive patriarchal phallocracy. Men made all the rules, men started all the wars (because they think fighting’s cool), men would insist on showing off in that pathetic male way of theirs by writing most of the best literature, composing the best music, painting the best paintings, inventing all sorts of ostentatious blokey toys like the internal combustion engine, the television, the internet, the aeroplane, the printing press and so on. And frankly it just wasn’t fair.

So something had to be done to correct the hideous gender imbalance. And if you buy into the above analysis of historical male domination – as how dare you not? – then there can only be one possible explanation as to why things have since shifted so markedly in women’s favour. It happened because men allowed it to happen.

Some of you may disagree. Not it wasn’t men who were responsible for this: it wasmanginas (or manginae, for you Latin scholars) who are another thing altogether.'

University Orientation Video for Men

Mastodon · 29 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Part of an exciting patriarchal strategy that ensures only men feel welcome on university and college campuses.

Latest Capitol Hill sexual harassment scandal

Matt · 30 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"“What do you do if you’re being sexually harassed in your office?” one user asked Monday morning on the anonymous Capitol Hill social-networking app Cloakroom.

It prompted one person, identifying himself as a 26-year-old male working for a 40-year-old female chief of staff, to share his own situation.

“She has slapped my ass, talked about her vibrator, and has asked me sexual questions. I have ignored them but I am thinking about going to the member,” he submitted to the online community, limited to users whose GPS location is within the Capitol complex, or those who register with a staff email address.

The thread drew 30 responses, ranging from vulgar to stoic. Some advised contacting the appropriate ethics committee to document the details or reaching out to the House Office of Employee Assistance for professional and emotional counseling. One warned the user to accept that reporting the harassment means, “You will need to accept that your career on the Hill will be over.”"

The unilateral war on college men

Mastodon · 30 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It appears to many — including me — as if the Obama administration is engaged in a war on college men. Using debunked statistics, the president, the vice president and various other political officials have falsely claimed that there's an epidemic of rape on college campuses, even though campus rape is, in fact, falling, just as off-campus rape is. (And, in fact, rape is less common on campus than off).

And, ever since the Department of Education issued a "Dear Colleague" letter to universities in 2011, in essence ordering them to adopt new and draconian campus "sexual assault" rules that treataccusations as presumptively true and force the accused — almost always men — to prove their innocence, sometimes even very strong evidence of innocence is ignored.

Spearheading this effort has been Assistant Secretary of Education for Civil Rights Catherine Lhamon, who has characterized the letter as binding on colleges and universities even though it is not a law, was not adopted as a formal or informal rule making after notice and comment under any law, and appears to have very little to do with the federal anti-discrimination law Title IX, which says only that "no person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."'

To End Violence Against Women, End Violence Against Boys

Mastodon · 30 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In her quest to achieve some semblance of justice in the world and in her own life, abuse survivor Rachael Kay Albers angrily sought refuge in feminism.

Until one day, she noticed an irony: In her aggressive approach to fighting for a more humane world, she was becoming like her abuser.

"I was becoming an angry, militant activist, simply participating in and replicating the greater cycle of violence," Kay Albers said. "As I began to recognize some of my own abuser's characteristics in myself, he turned from abuser to human. I started looking at these issues from a place of empathy and compassion."

Like many social problems, gender-based violence stems from myriad root causes. From child abuse to cultures of violence, the intersections highlight how the common 'oppressor versus oppressed' narrative fails to paint the full picture.'

"Feminism is on the verge of reverse sexism"

Mastodon · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

By the simplest of definitions, I'm a feminist. I'm for the equal rights of all genders, races, religions, sexual-preferences, etc. However, as of late, I refuse to call myself a feminist.

There's a specific group of feminists who jump on every opportunity to attack what they consider to be male privilege. However, with these people, the term "male privilege" applies to almost anything that has to do with a male. Don't get me wrong, this isn't against the feminist, or as I prefer to call it (and will hereafter refer to it as) "equalist," movement, but rather the recent unequal representation of men in gender issues as a result of one group's agenda to reverse that of women.
...
The problem at hand here isn't simply one of women being oppressed, but one of equal rights for all. Men are expected to be tough and man up, while women are expected to be gentle and kind. Men are encouraged not to show emotion, while women are judged harshly as being the weaker, more emotional sex. My point is this: third-wave feminism has become a problem in our country. Instead of focusing on feminism, we should focus on equalism, because everyone is important and deserves all the same rights and privileges.'

UK: Infamous "LinkedIn Offended Lawyer" stumps for quotas

Mastodon · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On the back of her newly found fame, so-called ‘feminazi’ lawyer Charlotte Proudman has attacked a leading Supreme Court judge as “sexist” and demanded positive discrimination and special treatment for women in a column for The Guardian, as “only quotas can challenge male privilege.”

Proudman is the barrister and social justice warrior who hit the headlines a couple of weeks ago when she attempted to destroy the career of a fellow lawyer who paid her a modest compliment on a social networking site.
...
Females now make up 62.3 per cent of law undergraduates, and 54.5 per cent of postgrad students. However, as is the pattern in other professions, such as medicine and politics, they constitute fewer of top positions (25 per cent of judges) because they make different decisions – choosing to work fewer hours and taking time out to have children.

In an interview on Tuesday, Supreme Court judge Jonathan Sumption argued againstrushing to force more women into senior judicial positions, as doing so will put off talented male candidates and destroy the delicate balance of the legal system.'

New draconian sexual-misconduct policy violates everyone's rights

Mastodon · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In 2007, the University of Delaware proved that it had no need for a "Path to Prominence" in one area: it was already a national leader in the forced indoctrination and brainwashing of students.

The Office of Residence Life was running what the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) called a "shocking program of ideological reeducation." As FIRE described it, "the Orwellian program requires the approximately 7,000 students in Delaware's residence halls to adopt highly specific university-approved views on issues ranging from politics to race, sexuality, sociology, moral philosophy, and environmentalism."

Having apparently learned nothing from its prior national disgrace, UD now seeks to extend forced ideological indoctrination to its faculty. Official sources, including the acting president, repeatedly stated – until local AAUP made them back down – that all faculty must complete an online training course about UD's new "sexual-misconduct" policy. To complete the course, some professors are forced to endorse specific propositions, such as a widely disputed statistic on the prevalence of campus sexual assault. Everyone on campus must also promise to abide by the policy, though, as we shall see, no honest or moral person could sincerely agree to do so.'

Australia: What’s behind the shortage of male teachers?

Mastodon · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'New research by the Australian Catholic University (ACU) of ABS Labour Force data has revealed that for the last 20 years as few as one in five Australian primary school teachers have been male.
The ACU reviewed the country's most populous states and found that in 2014:

16 per cent of NSW primary school teachers were men
18 per cent of Victorian primary school teachers were men
15 per cent of Queensland primary school teachers were men.
...
Professor Aspland, executive dean of education and arts at ACU, said addressing the gender imbalance among Australian primary school teachers was long overdue.

"It is widely recognised that male teachers can play a positive role in school communities,” Aspland said.

“Studies by Australian researchers indicate that both boys and girls benefit with male teachers acting as strong role models and even father figures.”'

India: Woman lies about rape, cabbie endures over 4 months of jail

Matt · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'He languished in jail for over four months for a sexual assault which the court says he never committed. His children were mocked and ostracised in school and his family was reduced to penury. His brother, who was looking after the family, went into depression.

For 35-year-old Ramesh Kumar, life took a sudden turn on April 9 this year when he says he demanded his agreed fare of Rs 500 from a woman who had hired his cab late at night in Dwarka. As an argument ensued, the woman tried to bite her way out and flee. When he tried to stop her, cops reached the spot, alerted by a PCR call made by a passerby about a brawl.

Kumar's pleas about his innocence went unheard. He was arrested and within no time had been named as the second rapist cabbie on the prowl after the Uber incident. It was a nightmare for him. He found himself in jail number 4 of Tihar the next day. He had a new identity: Inmate number 3519.

"I did not get any sleep at night. I recalled each and every scene from that night but couldn't figure out why I was here. Should I have allowed her to go without paying my fare just because she was a woman? I told cops to get her medically examined but they said they were bound by law and that I will have to prove my innocence in court," Kumar told TOI on Wednesday.'

SAVE E-lert: No Silence for the Silenced

Matt · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Today, the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence (NCADV) is calling for a moment of silence at 11 a.m. EST (8 a.m. PST/9 a.m. MST/10 a.m. CST) to raise awareness that every 9 seconds, a woman is battered or abused.

In this awareness effort, no mention is made of male victims. But the unspoken truth is that millions of men are also the victims of domestic abuse each year, at comparable rates.

Moreover, it is often harder for them to find support or services--for example, many domestic violence shelters do not allow men in.

Call or email NCADV and tell them this unspoken bias against male victims is unacceptable.

This is the silence we're paying attention to today.

Call: (303) 839-1852
Email: mainoffice-at-ncadv.org

Please take a moment to speak for the silenced now.

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

Teenager falsely accused of rape commits suicide

Mastodon · 2 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A teenager took his own life after he was falsely accused of rape, an inquest heard.

Jay Cheshire, 17, who was "mature and well-liked", was at the centre of a police investigation which ended in June this year when the alleged victim dropped the charge.

But he tried to commit suicide a few weeks later and after being taken to Southampton General Hospital, died on 5 July.

An inquest at Winchester Coroners Court, Hants, heard Jay struggled to cope with the false accusations and was "absolutely distraught."

Jay, from Southampton, was a sixth form student at Bitterne Park School studying English Literature, Film Studies and Geography - and hoped to become a history teacher or a writer.'

Overly broad definition of sex assault ensnares innocent students

Mastodon · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As I wrote in my column yesterday, not all accusations of campus sexual assault are black and white. Yet colleges are treating accusations as if the accused were a potential rapist, even when the accusation involves nothing more than requesting social media connections one too many times.

Kimberly Lau, a lawyer who has defended wrongly accused students in more than 40 cases, released a statement regarding a recent survey purporting to show that one-in-four women will be sexually assaulted while in college.

Lau notes what other critics of the survey, including me, have pointed out: that it relies on an overly broad definition of "sexual assault" in order to inflate its numbers for scary headlines. Lau has specific knowledge of the ways normal interactions, though possibly jerkish, have been elevated to the level of assault, warranting severe punishment.'

UK: Feminist conference melts down due to internecene conflict

Mastodon · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminism in London (FiL), one of the largest feminist conferences in the UK, has seen two major speakers pull out because of “ideological totalitarianism” and “sectarian” “warring feminist factions,” who fell out over an attempt to “no-platform” certain speakers who were “unsafe” because everyone did not agree with them on everything.

It all started when male-to-female transgendered feminist campaigner, and proponent of so-called ‘safe spaces,’ Jane Fae was uninvited or “no-platformed” form the feminist conference, which is due to start of the 24th of this month.

“It would have been grotesque for me to have been on a platform talking about the need for safe spaces, whilst the question of me being unsafe was on the agenda,” saidFae on BBC Radio 4.

She claimed that the problem was endemic to the Left generally: “This is not just about feminism. This is a sort of absolutism in politics today, and it happens within feminism, it happens in the trans community, it happens in the Greens, with the Cobynistas; which is, you have to toe a party line.”
...
The culture of offence taking and viewing debate as “trauma” is evidenced on the conference’s website. In their Frequently Asked Questions section, it is asked: “I am worried I will be triggered by the content of the workshops?” The answer: “We have quiet rooms set aside and listeners in the ‘Green Rooms’ area.”

Iain Dale described the episode as “a terrible combination of managerial impotence, financial caution and political timidity,” on Politics.co.uk.'

India: Man on hunger strike over compensation for false rape conviction

Matt · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'40-year-old Gopal Shetye was acquitted by the Bombay High Court on Thursday. However, there was nothing to rejoice for this man except the consolation of being proved innocent. Shetye is now sitting on hunger strike at the Azad Maidan seeking to meet Chief Minister Devendra Fadnavis and demanding that seven years of his life be returned during which his world turned upside down.

His release came three months after he had completed his seven year sentence in a rape case. Shetye of Nagpur's Narked had appealed in 2010 after he was convicted by the fast track court in Mumbai's Sewri.

Lawyer Ramesh Majgaonkar said Shetye had twice applied for bail before the Bombay High Court but these were rejected. It was his third bail application that bore fruit.

During the incarceration, Shetye lost his father, his wife remarried (with his consent) and his two little daughters were left in an orphanage. "I want seven years of my life back. I demand justice," said Shetye. The order overturning the conviction reveals how the police tried to frame an innocent.'

Professor found guilty of sexually assaulting disabled man

Mastodon · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'As the jurors walked out of the Newark courtroom on Friday, Rutgers-Newark professor Anna Stubblefield sat slumped over at the defense table, weeping with her head against her hand.

The jury had convicted the 45-year-old philosophy professor of sexually assaulting a 34-year-old disabled man, known as D.J., who has cerebral palsy and is unable to speak beyond making noises. Psychologists have determined he is mentally incompetent and cannot consent to sexual activity.

Stubblefield had claimed she and D.J. fell in love, saying he is not intellectually impaired and was able to communicate through a controversial typing method, known as "facilitated communication."
...
Stubblefield is now facing between 10 and 40 years in state prison when she is sentenced on Nov. 9.

After the jury had left the courtroom, Stubblefield's attorney, James Patton, asked Superior Court Judge Siobhan Teare to allow Stubblefield to remain released on bail until her sentencing.

Patton argued Stubblefield does not present any danger to the community or a risk of flight, and noted that she has no criminal history.'

12-Year-Old Boy Suspended for Looking at a Girl. At Her Face. That's It.

Mastodon · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Kids can get in trouble for smooching. They can get in trouble for touching. They can get in trouble for chewing, playing with toys, and making sugary snacks. They can get in trouble for waving their hands the wrong way (don't even get me started on pencil-twirlers). And yes, they can even get in trouble for staring.

According to WLWT.com, the principal at St. Gabriel Consolidated School—a private institution—suspended a pair of 12-year-old boys for a day for playing a staring game with a female student:

`Tolbert believes her son and another student at St. Gabriel were unfairly punished.

Tolbert said the boys got into a staring match with a female student last school year.

"He was playing a game with her. He said she was laughing. They were engaged. When she finally giggled and said stop. He stopped," Tolbert said.

The female student was cited in court papers as saying she also stared at the boys.`

The relevant part of the school code gives administrators the power to suspend without hearing any student "whose presence possesses a continuing danger to persons or property or an ongoing threat of disrupting academic learning."'

Editor/reporter ejected from Slut Walk event for questioning "rape culture" idea

Mastodon · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Breitbart editor Milo Yiannopoulos was ejected from the Amber Rose Slut Walk in Los Angeles this afternoon. Slut Walkers could be heard yelling to police officers, “Thanks for taking out the trash!”

Yiannopoulos was reporting from the event with a film crew, interviewing Rebel Media broadcaster and Canadian libertarian politician Lauren Southern about the feminist movement which protests against “rape culture” and “slut-shaming.”

Southern had just asked host Amber Rose whether she believed in rape culture. Event organizers immediately announced to Breitbart that they were calling law enforcement to have both journalists escorted from Pershing Square in downtown LA.

Protesters snatched and tore up Yiannopoulos’s placard, which read: “‘Rape Culture And Harry Potter': Both Fantasy” in view of the police, who stood by while protesters bellowed and grabbed at a second placard that read, “Regret is not Rape.”
...
LAPD officers arrived within a few minutes, threatening arrest if Yiannopoulos and Southern did not immediately leave Pershing Square.

The end result of today’s Slut Walk was ironic: a protest against patriarchy calling on the patriarchy to eject a female politician and a gay reporter, and another blow for press freedom and freedom of speech.'

Hillary has long history of beating up Bill behind closed doors: book

Matt · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'She's on a mission to be a softer, warmer, funnier candidate — but according to a new book, the real Hillary Clinton is so volatile and prone to violent outbursts that she terrorizes staff, Secret Service agents and even her own husband.

In "The Clintons' War On Women" (Skyhorse), out Oct. 13, political strategist Roger Stone details Hillary's abusive behavior — dating back to the Clintons' days in Arkansas, where Bill served as governor.

"Hillary Clinton has a long history of being domestically violent with Bill," Stone writes. "Hillary has beaten Bill, hit him with hard objects, scratched and clawed him, and made him bleed."

Stone, a controversial figure who recently decamped from Donald Trump's campaign, also delves into the more fantastical rumors that have dogged the Clintons for years.

Accounts of marital discord, however, have been well-reported for decades. Even Bill Clinton's former press officer Dee Dee Myers later admitted that she covered for the first lady.'

Obama Ignores the Obvious in Oregon: Another Fatherless Killer

Mastodon · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'How President Barack Obama and countless other politicians and pundits can fail to grasp—or be unwilling to confront—the obvious connection between the breakdown of American family life and a rise in violent crime is a mystery deserving examination.

For example, after Thursday's Oregon mass shooting, Obama predictably focused attention on the availability of firearms on America, calling on citizens to pressure legislators to enact gun control laws.

"The reporting is routine. My response here at this podium ends up being routine," Obama said in a remarkably lucid moment of his speech.

What Obama did not say in his impassioned address, what would have truly been a break in the "routine" and rhetoric that inevitably follow tragedies involving firearms, was that 26-year-old shooter Chris Harper Mercer was the umpteenth example of a fatherless boy who grows up to be a violent criminal.

It is, of course, much easier to blame guns for our problems than to address the underlying causes of American violence. For one thing, gun control is a popular, quick fix. All it takes is a law and legislators can pat themselves on the back for having "dealt with" the problem.'

Feminists Call the Cops When I Show Up, Here's Why

Mastodon · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I'm a slut, and I have been shamed. Yesterday I rocked up to the Amber Rose Slut Walk in downtown LA, alongside Rebel Media broadcaster and libertarian political candidate Lauren Southern. Event organisers called the police when they realised we didn't buy into their barmy conspiracy theories about patriarchy and rape culture, and we were escorted from the event by the LAPD.

Southern and I represent something horrifying to the loony feminist Left: we're not straight white males, yet we're both relentlessly critical of hysterical, fact-free narratives about an American rape epidemic (which is just wrong), the idea that society supports rapists (also wrong, we put them in jail) and the notion that somehow western culture subtly encourages others to become rapists, sexist, and misogynists (hilariously wrong).

Our opponents would like us to be angry, old, doddering, white male conservatives. Instead, they get a sassy gay shitposter and a fearless hot blonde female politician, both of whom who refuse to be drawn into the senseless victim culture that the Left has sought to construct around both our identities.

We aren't alone: young, smart, tech-savvy millennials are rapidly turning against the zany excesses of the modern progressive Left and its fear of free speech and free expression. Increasingly, it's simply uncool to be a social justice warrior. Cultural libertarianism is on the rise.'

Stop the unjust prosecution of a teenager

Matt · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Petition here. Excerpt:

'Cormega Copening, a 17-year-old high school student, has been charged with five felony counts and forced off his football team, just because he had pictures of himself and his girlfriend, who is the same age as him, on his cell phone. He faces the possibility of being added to the sex offender registry for this "offense." His life as he knows it would be ruined.

Yes, both teens were naked in the photos. However, their relationship was entirely consensual and broke no laws. Furthermore, the photos were private, for their viewing only. It wasn't until the police searched Copening's phone that they were seen by anyone else. Furthermore, four of the five counts against Copening are for having pictures of himself. His girlfriend, Brianna Denson, was also charged. She accepted a plea for 12 months of probation.

Please join me and help end this terrible nightmare. Sign my petition asking Cumberland County District Attorney William West to drop the charges against young Cormega Copening and reverse Ms. Denson's plea deal.

Essentially, the prosecutors have come up with some twisted rationale to count Copening and Denson as minors when appearing in the photographs, but adults when possessing those same photographs on their phones.'

Anti-circumcision supporters stage demonstration in downtown New Haven

Matt · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'During demonstrations, Brother K wears white pants with a strategically placed fake blood stain that alludes to the name of the nonprofit organization he established.

The organization is called Bloodstained Men and it aims to call attention to what Brother K refers to as a cruel and barbaric medical procedure: male circumcision. The fake blood stain is located in the crotch region, which Brother K said is a kind of “shock treatment” for people who are in denial about the seriousness of the practice.

“It’s destructive, harmful and unnecessary,” Brother K said. “The blood stain on my pants is the wound that I wear under my pants, it’s scarred on my body.”

On Saturday morning, Brother K was joined by a handful of supporters on the corner of Chapel Street and College Street, holding up signs and handing out cards with information on the organization and the reasons why it opposes circumcision. But don’t call Brother K an activist; he prefers the term “intactivist,” a combination of “intact” and “activist”.

“We’re determined to reach parents,” Brother K said. “They think it’s like the baby getting its toe nails trimmed or something. They don’t understand.”

The procedure itself is harmful, Brother K said, as he said it usually involves strapping down an infant. The procedure is destructive because removing the foreskin eliminates some pleasure sensors; it also removes tissue meant to function for protective purposes, Brother K said.'

Bloodstained Men confront circumcision in Providence

Matt · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Bloodstained Men & Their Friends, a traveling anti-circumcision protest group, set up outside Providence Place Mall yesterday in concert with Intact Rhode Island. Both groups have held protests in the past, but this year report that their message was greeted with more thoughtful consideration and less incoherent invective than in the past.

Circumcision is an issue that confronts Americans mores on sex, childcare, health and religion. It's a hot button issue. The Bloodstained Men, wearing coveralls with a large red stain on their crotches, confront these issues in not so subtle ways. Their signs, such as, "STOP CUTTING BABY PENIS" and "STOP TORTURING BOYS" are jarring and unexpected sights. ...'

Free Speech Advocate: College Censorship Is Damaging Young Minds

Matt · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article/video here. Excerpt:

'"The battle over free speech is not partisan," says a proud liberal whose organization helps a wide variety of clients facing free speech threats. He has spent fifteen years in the field as a fearless advocate who worked at the ACLU before coming to the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE).

Greg Lukianoff, the President and CEO of FIRE, starts this 20 minute video interview for The Daily Caller by assessing global issues. "The international situation for freedom of speech is dire," says Lukianoff, focusing on the emergence of blasphemy laws to not offend Islam.

This harks back to a previous Daily Caller interview with Steve Coughlin, author of "Catastrophic Failure," who discussed the Organization of Islamic Cooperation's Ten Year Program of Action to make Islamic speech codes the global speech standard. In America, this would entail making free speech conditional on not defaming Islam, a religion of less than 1 percent of the US population.'

Woman sentenced to 40 years-life for abduction and sexual assault of girl

Matt · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A former day care worker convicted of abducting a 5-year-old girl from her Philadelphia kindergarten classroom and sexually assaulting her has been sentenced to 40 years to life in prison.

Prosecutors believe 22-year-old Christina Regusters donned a Muslim dress and veil to impersonate the girl's mother and take her from the public school classroom in January 2013.

Regusters apologized Monday but said she is not a "monster." She says her only role was taking the child from school and leaving her half-naked the next morning at a playground.

The girl says, "I think what she did to me was wrong, and I think she shouldn't do it to anyone else." The Associated Press doesn't identify victims of sexual abuse.'

DA: Mother injected heroin into teens

Matt · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Chester County mother is behind bars, charged with injecting two teenagers, including her own 14-year-old daughter, with heroin.

Jessica Lynn Riffey, 34, of Telegraph Road in Honey Brook, is charged with endangering the welfare of children, corruption of minors, drug delivery, and related offenses.

Chester County District Attorney Tom Hogan said West Caln Township police were called to Riffey's home last Thursday to check on Riffey's 14-year-old daughter and a 16-year-old boy.'

Rethinking how we deal with campus sexual assault

Matt · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As the 2015 freshmen class navigates their first semester, sexual assault at our nation's colleges and universities remains a topic of serious concern. The current system of investigating and adjudicating allegations of sexual assault on campus is broken. It does not serve the interests of students, schools or the public.

A recent poll by Penn Schoen Berland found that over 90 percent of likely voters believe that law enforcement — not colleges and universities — should be responsible for investigating and prosecuting allegations of sexual assault on campus. It is time to bring justice to campus, protect the rights of all students and student organizations, punish perpetrators and ensure a safe college experience for students.

Today, colleges and universities are frequently required to investigate and judge reported crimes of sexual violence without first involving law enforcement. Because schools do not possess the investigative and forensic capabilities of law enforcement, or the due process protections of the criminal justice system, this results in a deeply flawed process that is less capable of stopping and punishing perpetrators and more likely to violate the basic due-process rights of those involved. Recently, San Diego Judge Joel M. Pressman ruled that the University of San Diego did not give an accused student a fair hearing, sparking conversations nationwide about the need to overhaul this troubled system.'

Canadian politician among those ejected from recent "Slut Walk"

Mastodon · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sunday night on SiriusXM Channel 125's Breitbart News Sunday program, Breitbart Executive Chairman Steven K. Bannon interviewed Rebel Media videographer and Canadian Libertarian candidate for Parliament Lauren Southern about getting ejected from Saturday afternoon's SlutWalk event in Los Angeles.

Southern and Breitbart editor Milo Yiannopoulos were escorted by police from the so-called Amber Rose SlutWalk event, which drew a few hundred attendees to Pershing Square in downtown Los Angeles to protest against "rape culture" and "slut-shaming."

"Essentially, it started out after a cop in Toronto, Canada said that if women don't want to get raped, they should dress less like sluts, which, to be fair, was an offensive comment," Southern explained of the origins of the SlutWalk event. "But statistically, he's not wrong, that when women do dress more scantily-clad, they are more likely to get raped, based on police statistics."

"But feminists got very angry with this, so they decided to have SlutWalk to end 'slut shaming,'" Southern continued. "So it started out with somewhat of a purpose, but walking around in your underwear on the street to end it doesn't really make much sense."'

Another report finds 1-in-5 campus rape reports to be false

Mastodon · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A campus crime report from the University of Miami has found that 1-in-5 reported rapes are "unfounded," a finding similar to that of a recent Harvard University report.

Colleges across the country are releasing campus crime statistics, and it turns out campus sexual assault might not be as rampant as recent "studies" claim. Even worse for advocates of draconian sexual assault policies that eviscerate due process is the notion that a good chunk of the accusations are false.

"Forcible sex offenses on campus went up from four in 2013 to five in 2014, with one case being reported as 'unfounded,'" reported the Miami Hurricane student newspaper. "Four of the five cases were reported in student residencies, where the one 'unfounded' case occurred."

One might notice that literally 1-in-5 reports were "unfounded," meaning there was no basis for the report, as there were only 5 reported rapes in 2014. That's far fewer than at Harvard, which saw 33 reported rapes.'

U.N. Says Cyber Violence Is Equivalent to Physical Violence Against Women

Mastodon · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Cyber violence is just as damaging to women as physical violence, according to a new U.N. report, which warns women are growing even more vulnerable to cyber violence as more and more regions gain internet access.

The report calls itself a “wake-up call” about cyber violence as a systemic concern, especially as technology is spreading across more regions. Presented by U.N. Women and the U.N. Broadband Commission, the report estimates that 73% of women have endured cyber violence, and that women are 27 times more likely as men to be harassed online. In Europe, nine million girls have already experienced some kind of cyber violence by the time they’re 15. Anita Sarkeesian, a gamer and activist who has long agitated for more action against cyber violence, spoke at the launch of the new report, titled “Cyber Violence Against Women and Girls: A Worldwide Wake-Up Call.”'

Babysitter who had 'sex' with 11-year-old boy gets suspended sentence

Mastodon · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A judge has been criticised after deciding not to imprison a 21-year-old babysitter who admitted sexual activity with the 11-year-old boy she was looking after.

Judge Tim Mousley QC gave Jade Hatt a suspended jail term for the offence, committed in November 2014 when she was 20.

Mousley said she was immature, while the boy was mature for his age, and he felt able to step outside normal sentencing guidelines.

He said: “Having read everything before me, it was quite clear he was a mature 11-year-old and you were an immature 20-year-old so that narrows the arithmetic age gap between you.”

The judge also took into account that the boy’s father spoke up for Hatt in court, claiming his son was “fully up for the experience”. However, the boy said he knew what had happened was wrong and he said he had not enjoyed it.'

College tribunals wrong venue for sex charges

Mastodon · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Colleges must be terrifying places these days, with the supposed explosion of rape on campuses. Why would any parent pay $60,000 a year for private tuition if there truly is a “rape culture” on college campuses?

Also frightening: the response to this rape “epidemic” has led to an increasing number of students who are falsely accused of sexual assault and subjected to Star Chamber prosecutions on campus.

Typically the accuser is a young woman and the accused is a young man, but not always.
...
My friends’ daughter was hauled in front of one of these campus kangaroo courts. She was fortunate: her parents understood that she needed a lawyer. And they could afford to hire one to represent her in this burgeoning area of law — defending students accused of sexual assault not in court, but in Title IX proceedings. However, because the rules of the campus hearing did not permit her to have a lawyer present, her lawyer could only accompany her as an “adviser.” That is, he had no right to make objections or cross-examine witnesses.'

UK: Former TV host says being falsely accused of rape reduced him to a jobless pauper

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here.

'The former star – now a local radio presenter – said his once charmed life turned into “a hell of a place to be” after he was linked to an attack on fellow presenter Ulrika Jonsson.

Ms Jonsson described being raped by a “fellow celebrity” in her autobiography.

It was alleged on television in 2002 that Leslie was responsible.

While no charges were brought over that allegation, the former This Morning host was arrested later that year and charged with unconnected indecent assault allegations.'

"California Is Getting Serious About the Gender Wage Gap"

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'First, what's so great about California's new Fair Pay Act? Most important, it requires that employees receive equal pay for "substantially similar" work, even if their job titles aren't actually the same as their colleagues'. This language is intended to cover more female workers and capture more subtle gradations of inequality than the truism of "equal pay for equal work," which is enshrined in the federal Equal Pay Act. As DoubleX contributor Bryce Covert has written at ThinkProgress, there was a groundswell of support for the standard of "comparable" or "substantially similar" work in the 1980s. Twenty states adopted this kind of language—the movement that really spawned the idea of "pay equity"—and, as a result, "more than 335,000 women got a raise and 20 percent of their gender wage gap was eliminated," Covert reports. Unfortunately, many of those statutes have since lapsed.

But California is trying to bring the concept of "pay equity" back into vogue—and to expand on it. The new bill gives women some additional leverage by specifying that they can demand equal pay with workers at different physical sites; the law applies to anyone doing comparable work for the same company. It also bars employers from retaliating against workers who discuss their own pay or seek information about others'. California women are doing better than American women overall—making an average of 84 cents on the dollar, versus 78 cents nationwide—but the gap for women of color is among the worst in the country: Latina women in the state made 44 cents for every dollar a white man earned in 2014. "We're closing all the loopholes," said California state Sen. Hannah-Beth Jackson, who wrote the bill. "No more excuses."'

Marines unveil new gender-neutral standards for 29 jobs

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It could get a whole lot tougher for Marines to make it into more than two dozen ground combat jobs as Corps officials unveil new physical standards that troops must meet before shipping off to the fleet.

Marines who leave boot camp or Officer Candidates School hoping to join infantry, weapons, artillery and mechanized units will now face a host of new requirements before they can graduate from their military occupational specialty schoolhouses, Marine Corps Times has learned.

The new rules, which require Marines to prove they can accomplish some of the toughest tasks related to their jobs, are gender-neutral. That means all Marines — male or female — will have to meet the requirements before they're cleared for graduation.

The requirements affect Marines heading into 29 MOSs in the following fields: infantry; artillery; combat engineering; tanks and amphibious assault vehicles; ground ordnance; and some close-air support roles.'

The Gender Pay Gap Is The Result Of Being A Parent, Not Discrimination

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'That women, on average, earn less than men is true. That this is the result of discrimination seems not to be true. Rather, it appears to be down to the different different reactions of men and women to becoming a parent. Which, given that being a mammalian and viviparous species is pretty much central to the experience of being human means that the gender pay gap just might be one of those things not amenable to having a solution.

This is not to say that there aren't examples out there of what economists do call "taste" discrimination. Nor that there weren't very obvious, even extreme, more general examples of such discrimination surrounding women in the labor market in the past. But as far as we can work out now, about what is happening today, there's just not much, if any, of the difference in average income between men and women that can be ascribed to such discrimination.'

Campus speaker touting men’s rights has fire alarm pulled on her

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Cathy Young, a prominent writer critical of exaggerated campus rape statistics and radical feminism, elicited protests during a recent two-stop speaking tour at college campuses in Canada, which included having a fire alarm pulled during one of her speeches.

She and her hosts – the Canadian Association for Equality, or CAFE – were also called “rape apologist scum” by campus protesters and her speech at the University of Toronto on Sept. 24 was moved off campus after a comment urging violence against feminists was posted online.

“Amid an intense reaction to the threat, university administrators felt it was inadvisable to hold my event on campus; the venue was moved to a nearby hotel,” Young explainedin Newsday. “One student activist wrote on a Tumblr blog that ‘chasing these misogynists off campus is a victory.’”'

Women in AP ‘Diversity’ Program that Bars Straight White Men Decry ‘Gender Discrimination’ in Locker Room Flap

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Whoever said that becoming the story serves as the journalist’s worst nightmare forgot to tell the female reporters who turned a two- to three-minute delay in entering the locker room of the Jacksonville Jaguars into fifteen minutes of fame.

The reporters, participants in the Diversity Fellowship Program of the Associated Press Sports Editors (APSE), decried the delay allegedly brought on by a Lucas Oil Stadium usher uncertain if the men’s locker room remained off-limits to women.

The man reportedly inquired whether the three women could enter the locker room and received a yes from the Jaguars. The women then entered the facilities where players shower, change, and speak to the press but not, presumably, before the patriarchy allowed their male colleagues to scoop them on all the hot postgame takes from T.J. Yeldon and Jonathan Cyprien and Mercedes Lewis that every sports fan breathlessly awaits in a manner akin to Ralphie impatiently counting the ticks until the Christmas morning arrival of his official Red Ryder carbine-action two-hundred shot range model air rifle.'

Michelle Obama’s misguided girl power agenda

Mastodon · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In 2013, according to the Current Population Survey, 25- to 34-year-old women were 21 percent more likely to have a college degree than men and 48 percent more likely to have finished graduate school.

While liberals love to talk about the War on Women, it clearly has not affected their educational prospects. Indeed, it’s not just middle- and upper-class women who seem to be ahead of their male counterparts. Even the most disadvantaged girls are more likely to get an education here than boys from similar circumstances.

Richard Whitmire, author of “Why Boys Fail,” has argued that our discussions about the racial achievement gap and even the effects of poverty on educational attainment have masked the biggest disparities, which are between girls and boys.

In an interview in the magazine Education Next, Whitmire cites a 2009 study by the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University that tracked the students who graduated from Boston public schools.

For every 167 women in four-year colleges, there were only 100 men. But poverty wasn’t the problem — all the kids were coming from the same neighborhoods.

“The study found that black females were five percentage points more likely to pursue further study after high school, including community colleges, four-year colleges and technical or vocational schools, than white males,” notes Whitmire.'

The Feds Are Officially Investigating Hollywood's Glaring Gender Gap

Mastodon · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has officially launched an investigation looking into the lack of female directors working in Hollywood.

The LA Times reports government officials have already requested interviews from some 50 women working in the industry and will start interviews as soon as next week to ultimately determine if Hollywood is violating federal law.

"I hope they force people to change the way they do business because Hollywood is not exempt from the law," Lori Precious said in response to Monday's news. Precious is one of the women the EEOC requested to talk to as a part of the formal probe.
...
Earlier this year, a staggering gender bias study found only 30.2 of all speaking characters in 2014 were played by women.

"For every 2.3 male characters who say 'Dude,' there is just woman saying, 'Hello?!" the Times Manhola Dargis wrote.'

Student accused of rape sues university over discipline

Mastodon · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'An Augustana University student accused of rape has filed a lawsuit against the school claiming it is violating his rights by moving to expel him before he has a chance to defend himself in court.

The federal lawsuit filed last week by Koh Evan Tsuruta calls for the university to suspend its disciplinary hearing until his criminal case is resolved.

An Augustana official said the university's action follows federal guidelines, and that Tsuruta has no legal grounds to force it to delay its hearing while his criminal case is pending.'

UK: Conservative Journalist Banned From Participating in University Debate on Censorship

Mastodon · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Manchester Student Union has banned Breitbart editor Milo Yiannopoulos and Guardian journalist Julie Bindel from participating in a debate on whether or not modern feminists stifle free speech.

Bindel was the first to be banned from the British university. “The Students’ Union has decided to deny this request based on Bindel’s views and comments towards trans people, which we believe could incite hatred towards and exclusion of our trans students,”they wrote. Bindel, who identifies as a radical feminist and a lesbian, is also a critic of transexuality and gender reassignment surgery.

At first, Yiannopoulos joked about being allowed to attend, saying he’d have to “up his game.” But sure enough, he was banned soon thereafter. In their statement explaining their decision, the Student Union called him a “professional misogynist” and “rape apologist.”'

Uncut: A Look at the Wacky, Wrinkly World of Foreskin Restoration

Matt · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Carl is one of thousands of men who resent being circumcised, which they liken to genital mutilation. They call themselves restorers and, to cope, endeavor to stretch their skin to take the place of what was snipped away at birth.

But regenerating an inch of skin is a superhuman feat. A foreskin can't simply grow back like a lizard's tail; it takes one to five years of grueling stretching and a slew of strange devices. It's physically torturous and also isolating, since most men take on restoring without talking to loved ones or doctors. Many turn to online forums for guidance and support. And most quit before reaching their goal.

"Some people think this is a body modification," Carl says. "But, if you think about it, it's really a reversal of a body modification."'

SAVE: Dept. of Education Sexual Assault Program Falls into Disarray; SAVE Calls on Congress to Take Action

Matt · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'The Department of Education has long claimed that universities must comply with its campus sexual assault policies or risk loss of federal funding. But in testimony to the Senate Homeland Security Committee, two Department of Education officials recently admitted that its 2011 Dear Colleague Letter is non-binding guidance that does not hold force of law: https://www.thefire.org/second-department-of-education-official-in-eight-days-tells-congress-guidance-is-not-binding/

...

In direct violation of legal requirements, the Dear Colleague Letter was published without prior public review and comment. Given the long-standing pattern of improper and unlawful Department of Education actions in this area, SAVE is calling on Congress to assert its full oversight and legislative authorities.

“For over four years, a rogue Department of Education has strong-armed schools with the threat of removing their federal funding,” notes SAVE spokesperson Sheryle Hutter. “These practices amount to nothing less than illegal bureaucratic extortion.”'

India: Man suicides after argument with wife, getting beat up by in-law and threatened with false 498A complaint

Matt · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Police said Rakesh Pilania, who was a manager at the MG Road branch of RBS Bank, took the extreme step on Monday night, following a tiff with his wife Shobhika.

Following a complaint by Rakesh's father, Anand Prakash Pilania, on Tuesday, police have booked his wife, brother-in-law Shubham and parents-in-law on the charge of abetment to suicide.
...
On Monday evening, an argument broke out between the bank manager and his wife over her intention to continue with her job, despite his objection, police said. Shobhika called her brother Shubham, who allegedly came and beat up Rakesh. Shubham then took his sister away to their parents' place. When Rakesh and his mother went to his parents-in-laws' place to negotiate with them, Shobika refused to return to her husband's place.

"Around 8pm, after returning to his flat with his mother, he locked the flat and jumped off the bedroom window. Around 11pm, we got the information. He was rushed to a private hospital where he was declared brought dead," the investigating officer said.
...
In the complaint, Rakesh's father said his wife had been harassing from the time they got married on December 03, 2014, and she and her family members had threatened to file a fake dowry case agaisnt him. "On Monday morning, he had called his mother and me and told us everything. His brother-in-law came and fought with him too. Finally my son jumped to his death," said Ananad Prakash Pilania, who is a manager in Syndicate Bank in Bhiwani.'

Campus Judiciaries on Trial: An Update from the Courts

Matt · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Students accused of misconduct on college campuses have long suffered from a lack of due process in university adjudications. From its founding in 1999, for example, the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) has received complaints from students alleging that they were treated unfairly in campus proceedings.

Over the past five years, however, a particularly dire situation has emerged for the increasing number of students who find themselves accused of sexual misconduct on campus. Under tremendous pressure from the federal government, colleges and universities routinely use their internal disciplinary processes to adjudicate claims of sexual assault, often with shockingly little regard for the due process rights of students who stand accused of one of society's most heinous offenses. The result is students whose lives are dramatically altered by patently unfair proceedings.

Increasingly, these students are seeking redress in federal and state courts, alleging that their universities violated their due process rights, breached contractual obligations, and even discriminated against them on the basis of their sex. So far, the results have been mixed. It is clear that in many cases, these students do have cognizable legal claims against their universities. However, it is also clear that many judges—particularly federal judges—are extremely reluctant to interfere in the internal workings of university judicial systems absent a showing of the most egregious disregard for basic fairness.'

SAVE E-lert: Don't Give JWI A Green Light

Matt · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For Domestic Violence Awareness Month, the Jewish Women International (JWI) Red Light, Green Light Campaign is intended to raise awareness about the realities of this crime.

But its launch of the #WhenShe campaign implies that women are always the victim in domestic violence situations: https://jwi.org/emailviewonwebpage.aspx?erid=7029494&trid=2e44d9c2-710c-4d23-8a70-124e522a6fe5

In reality, however, sometimes women are the aggressors of domestic violence. It is important to stop violence against women, but we cannot do so by creating the presumption that men are always the problem.

Please ask JWI's Executive Director, Loribeth Weinstein, to help correct the narrative.

Call: (800) 343-2823
Email: loriweinstein-at-jwi.org

Let's make sure false narratives are stopped before they're turned into biased laws.

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

What the Men’s Rights Movement Gets Right– And Wrong

Mastodon · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As a critic of feminism, I’ve checked out the Men’s Rights Movement (MRM). Some things I like, some things not so much. They have good points when it comes to divorce, custody, and how courts are biased towards women. These are real equality issues that need to be addressed.

Also, I dislike how men have become the punch line in today’s society. Just check out commercials and sitcoms. The husbands are portrayed as complete idiots with the maturity of five year olds. The wives, on the other hand, are brilliant personality-less parental figures to their dumb husbands.

One of my pet peeves is how it’s somehow acceptable to insult your husband in public. Haha, I don’t know how he dresses himself in the morning! It’s laughable when a woman does it. The other way around? That wouldn’t fly!

Then I check out Men’s Rights Activists forums… oh boy. I acknowledge that not every comment represents the whole movement, of course. But there’s a significant amount of: women are gold digging you-know-whats! Marriage is always a bad deal for men because women are lazy moochers! Women wear makeup to trick you into procreating with them!! THEY ARE LIARS!

Whoa....

It just reminds of man-hating feminists who talk about all men being cheating scumbags and implying that all men are rapists. Both of these groups have clearly been burnt by the opposite sex. What heterosexual person hasn’t been? They’re taking it to an unhealthy place and blaming an entire gender for crappy things someone did.'

The Gender Wage Gap–A Myth that (Still) Just Won't Die

Mastodon · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Earlier this week, the Governor of California signed a bill intended to help women. Supported by the Chamber of Commerce, the new law looks to eliminate the "gender wage gap," or the supposed discrepancy between the pay of men and women.

The bill received immense support in both houses of the California state legislature and will "ensure that women are paid equally for work that is substantially similar to the work of their male colleagues."

While California policymakers may be well intentioned, as an economist, this makes me want to bang my head against a wall. I've discussed this very issue on this blog before. But, alas, here we are again.

So, one more time, with feeling.

There is no meaningful gender wage gap. Such a gap makes zero intuitive or economic sense.'

Hillary Clinton’s Problem With Men

Matt · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The latest round of polling for Clinton is brutal. This week’s NBC News/Wall Street Journal shows her favorability rating with men at a mere 27 percent, while two-thirds view her unfavorably. Her minus-39 net favorability with men is 28 points worse than Vice President Joe Biden and 27 points behind Sen. Bernie Sanders. The story is the same in New Hampshire, where the NBC/WSJ/Marist poll found both Sanders and Biden with net-positive ratings, while Clinton’s approval is deeply underwater, stuck at 30 percent.

The swing-state polling is a mirror image of her national numbers. Last week, Quinnipiacfound Clinton’s negative ratings with white men at a stunning 72 percent—significantly worse than the Democratic Party’s already-serious struggles with that demographic group. Meanwhile, she’s not performing at nearly a strong-enough level with women to counteract the problem. Only 49 percent of women viewed her favorably in the poll, with 47 percent holding negative views. For all the self-inflicted problems that Republicans have in reaching out to a diversifying country, Hillary Clinton’sfavorability with white men is worse than Jeb Bush’s with Hispanics, Ben Carson’s with African-Americans, and Carly Fiorina’s with women in the same survey.'

Children do not have affairs with older women, they are abused by them

Mastodon · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There is nothing new in a victim of a sexual assault being blamed for the offence. Back in 1982 there was a national outcry when a convicted rapist was punished with just a £2,000 fine after the judge ruled that his victim, by hitch-hiking in a skirt, was “guilty of a great deal of contributory negligence”.

At least things have moved on, or so one might have thought. Yesterday, 21-year-old Jade Hatt walked out of court with a suspended sentence after being convicted of unlawful sexual activity with a child. The leniency was explained in part by mitigating testimony that the victim was “sex mad” and “‘fully up for the experience”. The encounter was a “notch on his belt” and he was “totally unaffected by it”. The victim was just 11 years old. As if that were not sufficiently horrific, that testimony was provided by the boy’s own father, who had himself been in a previous sexual relationship with the defendant.

Everything about this case is appalling. The crime itself. The manner in which the victim’s own testimony that the incident felt unpleasant and wrong was apparently considered insignificant. The defence counsel’s bizarre plea that his client was “a small, immature, woman and the victim was very advanced for his years”.'

U.S. Navy teaching members to combat ‘male privilege’

Mastodon · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The United States Navy’s Bureau of Medicine and Surgery has issued a warning about “male privilege” and is teaching ways to combat it.

The agency has issued two charts, the “Power and Control Wheel” and the “Equality Wheel,” in a new document posted on the Navy’s website.

...

As Social Memo points out, the Navy’s document appears to only address physical and sexual violence perpetrated by men.

A 2012 study by Bert H. Hoff, J.D. found “More men than women were victims of intimate partner physical violence within the past year, according to a national study funded by the Centers for Disease Control and U.S. Department of Justice.”

Hoff’s research found that in the 12 months prior to the study’s release, “an estimated 5,365,000 men and 4,741,000 women were victims of intimate partner physical violence.” That’s 53% and 47% respectively.'

Mom Accused of Kicking Her Boyfriend's 17-Month-Old Son to Death

Matt · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A 20-year-old woman has been charged with second-degree murder for allegedly kicking her boyfriend's 17-month-old son to death.

Alicia Goemaat, from West Seattle, Washington, is accused in the death of Drue Lehto, whom she was looking after as his dad, Derek, ran errands on September 27.
...
She said that on September 27 she kicked Drue in the stomach, knocking him to the ground, according to reports. She reportedly said she kicked him again before putting him in his playpen, where he was later found unresponsive.

After the boy's father arrived home, he tried to administer CPR but the youngster passed away before medical staff arrived, according to Seattle PI. An autopsy found that he died of abdominal trauma and internal bleeding, and the Medical Examiner's Office ruled his death a homicide.

Goemaat denied knowing what happened to him until she was arrested days later, on October 1, according to reports.'

American Law Institute Memo: "Revisions to Sexual Assault Provisions of the Model Penal Code"

Matt · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Memo here. Dated 5/12/2015, it was only recently released after all the signatories had a chance to review and sign it. Excerpt:

'As you are aware, the American Law Institute (ALI) has undertaken a review of the sexual assault provisions of the Model Penal Code. The undersigned members of ALI are concerned about the direction the project has taken. Although the drafts have generated little attention outside of the project itself and although the project has been criticized for late distribution of drafts (see e.g., ALI Reporter, Summer 2014 at 23), we hope that you will consider our concerns both before and during the upcoming Annual Meeting session on Tuesday, May 19 at 9:00 a.m. when Discussion Draft No. 2 dated April 28, 2015 will be considered.

If there is political consensus on anything in the United States today, it is the consensus that our government has overcriminalized and overincarcerated the American public. See, e.g., http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/28/us/politics/being-less-tough-on-crime-is-2016-consensus.html?emc=edit_th_20150428&nl=todaysheadlines&nlid=58186502 and http://www.bipartisansummit.org. In his message to the Bipartisan Summit, President Obama said that, “[T]here is an increasing realization that what we’re doing is wrong.” http://www.cut50.org/summit1. The ABA also is actively working to reduce overcriminalization and you are aware that ALI itself is running a project to revise the Model Penal Code provisions on sentencing and to reduce the collateral consequences of criminal convictions. ...'

Music Video Violence: It’s No Longer Just a Guy Thing

Mastodon · 9 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Damsel in distress no longer describes female pop artists in music videos. With the release of the music video ‘Disclosure’ by Magnets featuring Lorde, there is an undeniable gruesome violent trend coming from female singers and it is sweeping across the music video industry.

The 'Disclosure' music video portrays Lorde tying a man, presumed to be a cheating guy, to a chair and then pushing him into a pool as he begs for her to stop. She then opens a lighter and throws it into the pool, setting it ablaze. Sounds like something straight out of a horror film.

Lorde took to Twitter explaining how the scene actually allowed her to live out a long time fantasy of hers. She wrote, “”one of my life goals has always been ‘to one day play a hitgirl who pretends to seduce then burns alive douche boyfriends[.]”"
...
Don’t expect this estrogen-infused and media-glamorized killing spree trend to disappear from the music scene. The feminist equality mentality combined with upping the shock value is a dangerous mix. For now it seems, if you can’t beat the boys, then you might as well join them — or in this case just kill them.'

Poverty Stats: The Fatherless Generation

Mastodon · 9 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'While the problem of poverty and homelessness is showing it's [sic] face in more and more obvious ways here in Shasta County, the real impact it has on our community may still be sliding under the radar. It's not just those on the streets and in the camps that are experiencing homelessness and extreme poverty, but many children inside our classrooms are also in desperate situations. Even more elusive from the scopes is what many are increasingly coming to realize as an underlying cause for increased poverty in the United States: a fatherless epidemic.

UK: Police apologise for not clearing former MP over false rape claim before he died

Mastodon · 9 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Met Police has apologised to the widow of Leon Brittan for not telling the former home secretary he had been cleared over a false rape claim before he died.

Deputy Assistant Commissioner Steve Rodhouse wrote a letter to the lawyers of Lady Brittan in which he admits "clarity should have been provided" with regards to the dropping of the allegation against the former Conservative MP.

Brittan died in January from cancer aged 75 unaware that police had concluded there was no case against him over allegations he raped a 19-year-old student at a flat in London in 1967. In a letter, seen by The Times, Rodhouse wrote to Lady Brittan's lawyers, Mishcon de Reya on 7 October saying: "I do recognise that this clarity should have been provided at an earlier stage and I apologise for any distress that this has caused to Lady Brittan".

Metropolitan Police investigated the allegation in 2013, but no charges were brought against Brittan after the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) ruled there was no evidence to support the claims of the woman.'

British rape laws need urgent reform to prevent injustice

Mastodon · 9 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Those who make their living in the criminal justice system are a pretty unshockable lot. Human folly and vice are their trade, after all. Yet one lawyer, who works on a lot of rape cases, tells me he was somewhat startled that lately what he calls “an unchivalrous habit” has sprung up among certain defendants.

...

We diminish the pain of every woman who has been raped when we heed the “Ooh, I’ve got a terrible hangover, maybe I was raped last night” school of sexual complaint. The number of women who make malicious allegations is still relatively small, but they are a menace. As one senior lawyer who has worked on many high-profile cases, puts it: “Every single false accusation does immense damage to the cause of those trying to get higher conviction rates for rape.”

...

When men have started videoing sexual intercourse lest their partner decides later that she’s been “raped” then something has gone very badly awry in human relations. The Government must act now to stop men being named before they are charged with rape or sexual abuse. There is huge public support for such a measure. No suspect’s name should be put into the public domain until the point when the CPS authorises a charge – except with the consent of a judge after an application by police in very specific cases like that of multiple child abuser, Stuart Hall.'

Council of Europe doubles down on anti-ritual circumcision stance

Matt · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Council of Europe is maintaining its position that non-medical circumcision of boys is a violation of children's rights, despite reports in Israeli media that said the council reversed its position.

According to statements from Israeli politicians and Jewish activists, the Council of Europe — a body for pan-European dialogue that lacks executive powers — switched positions when its Parliamentary Assembly passed Resolution 2076 on "Freedom of religion and living together in a democratic society" on Sept. 30.

Milah UK, a leading Jewish advocacy group supporting the practice of circumcision, on Tuesday said in a statement that the resolution "cancels a previous motion that had cast into doubt the legality of religious circumcision." Milah is the Hebrew name for the ritual circumcision of eight-day-old males.'

Metzitsah B’Peh Must Be Banned

Matt · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One topic I’ve never before addressed on Beyond the Bris is the practice of metzitsah b’peh. There are reasons for this—and I’ll discuss them further down. This very ancient practice takes place during traditional religious circumcision, just after the mohel has removed the foreskin.

Before this practice was in the news because of infants contracting herpes, and long before I was involved in the genital autonomy movement, the way I had always understood the practice—the way it must have been described to me at some point during my childhood (not by my parents)—was as a brief “washing” of the circumcision wound with wine that the mohel (ritual circumciser) took into his mouth.'

Celebrating Brit Shalom Headed to Huge Rabbi Gathering

Matt · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A 4000-plus convergence of Reform rabbis and congregational leaders is taking place in Orlando this November and Celebrating Brit Shalomwill be on hand.

Celebrating Brit Shalom is the first-ever book specifically for Jewish families opting out of circumcision. Brit shalomis an alternative to brit milah for parents who want to give their boys a formal welcome to Jewish life, minus the circumcision.

The Union for Reform Judaism's 2015 Biennial calls itself the largest Jewish religious gathering in North America. Conference registration is open to the public, with much of the programming geared to those with leadership roles in congregations. Also during the biennial, decisions are made about the policies of the Reform movement.

Throughout the five-day event, taking place Nov. 4-8, Celebrating Brit Shalomwill have a booth in the exhibit hall. Lisa Braver Moss and I will be on hand to discuss our book and the album of accompanying music, as well as the growing Jewish movement to question circumcision and the concept (pioneered by Lisa) that families who opt out of circumcision should be openly welcomed by the Reform movement.'

NPO: Q and A with Dianna Thompson of Women Against Paternity Fraud

Matt · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'WAPF is a non-profit national organization dedicated to educating the public, the media, and policy makers on the issue of paternity fraud and the devastation this issue creates within families and especially for children. While many think that "paternity fraud" is just a men's issue, it is not. Both men and women, boys and girls, can be victims.

Many women are paternity fraud victims, when the truth about who their biological father is was never disclosed to them until years later, or when a medical emergency occurs, or their inheritance rights are being denied. Also, many women -- wives, mothers, grandmothers, sisters, and daughters are also affected by paternity fraud when the men in their lives are victims.

Regardless of whether you are a man or women paternity fraud is devastating. WAPF is composed of women (and men) who have been negatively affected by this issue (or just care about truth and justice) and seek reform.'

Kampus Kangaroo Kourt - The Fiamengo File

Matt · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'Sex is dangerous for male students. An accusation from an angry female ex-partner can lead to the total destruction of his life in the Kangaroo courts set up at every university in North America. The male student has no legal rights and the word of his accuser is often enough "evidence" to find him guilty.

In Episode 9 Professor Fiamengo sends a warning to the boys mothers, many of whom are feminists.'

Huffington Post: Blame 'Hegemonic Masculinity' for Mass Shootings

Mastodon · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In the aftermath of the murderous rampages like the recent one in Oregon, some weep for the dead and pray for the wounded. Others, such as the Huffington Post feminist Soraya Chemaly, exploit such barbaric acts of violence to push their own political narratives. As stated in Chemaly's headline, the real culprit behind mass shootings like the one in Oregon is "Masculinity, Masculinity, Masculinity."

Despite the fact that Oregon shooter Chris Harper-Mercer has a mixed-race appearance, Chemaly lamented that "another young white man with a gun has wreaked havoc on a community and once again the media is fixated on a numbing conversation about guns and mental illness." She grants that both these topics are "important dimensions of this crisis," but claims that

`[w]ithout addressing the gender and race dimensions of male entitlement in the United States -- and the role they play in the treatment of mental illness, gun culture and the targeting of victims -- we will never tackle this problem in a meaningful way.`

From here, Chemaly construed several mass shootings into a homicidal attack on women.

`Schools make up 10 percent of mass shooting sites in the US and are...places where educated women aggregate and compete with men as equals. According to one thorough analysis, women are twice as likely to die in school shootings….Workplace shootings also have a marked result: being killed while at work is the second most likely way for women to die in the workplace, after car accidents….So, it doesn't require an explicit statement of misogyny to result in a explicitly disproportionate harm to women and children due to the violent expression of masculinity.`

After framing mass shootings as specific attacks on women rather than the murder of a variety of victims, Chemaly then pointed a finger at a particular racial group.'

"Toxic masculinity"

Mastodon · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We see this dynamic play out often in mass shootings. These typically young to middle-aged men have some sort of perceived grievance against the world, and they feel that violence is the only way to gain retribution. Too often, perceived wrongs at the hands of women are given as reasons for mass violence. One of the most infamous examples is Elliot Rodgers, a man who just last year killed six people near the University of California, Santa Barbara. He posted a video on YouTube called “Elliot Rodgers’ Retribution” explaining that he wanted to punish women who’d rejected him because he was “22 years old and still a virgin” and “girls gave their affection, and sex, and love to other men.” Similarly, recent reports have alleged that Harper-Mercer complained online and in a typewritten manifesto about not having a girlfriend and being a virgin. These men felt that they were fully entitled to women, relationships, and sex. When they didn’t receive what they thought they deserved, they turned to violence. In their minds, being slighted to this degree—at the hands of all women—would require a dramatically large act of violence in order to reestablish masculinity.
...
As a man, you are taught that you own the spaces you inhabit, so it would be easy to believe that, by extension, you have a right to decide what happens to the bodies and lives of those around you. With a sense of male entitlement and easy access to legal guns, these two men reacted violently to regain their status under an ingrained and twisted definition of masculinity.'

Case highlights the gray areas of campus sex assault investigations

Mastodon · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In March 2014, after a night of partying, two St. Louis University students ended up in bed together at a house off-campus.

Two months later, the man got a letter from the university telling him he was under investigation for sexual assault.

The investigation carried on for months. During the inquiry, it was never disputed that the woman packed an overnight bag, willingly walked to the man's house, got into his bed and had sex with him.

The pivotal question is whether the man knew the woman was too drunk to consent.

Initially, SLU suspended the student for a year just as he was preparing to graduate.

Two months later, the university reversed itself and cleared him of any blame — but not before holding his education in limbo.'

Did You Actually Read the AAU Sexual Assault Survey?

Mastodon · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For example, did you know the AAU considers unwanted kissing a crime (sexual battery)?

For example, did you know that persistently asking someone out on a date or for dinner is sexual harassment?

For example, did you know that telling “offensive” jokes is sexual harassment?

For example, did you know that if your partner has ever made a decision for you, you are a victim of intimate partner violence?

For example, did you know that the words “rape” and “assault” were never used in the survey questions—only vague terms like “sexual touching”?'

The dark side of Title IX sexual-assault investigations

Mastodon · 11 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As young adults settle in on college campuses around the country, they'll experience new freedom to make mistakes. While we hope for good choices based on parental example, the fact is that most people learn only from painful experience.

Some will have their first brush with alcohol or drugs. An unlucky few will mix the two and awaken next to someone else in a room full of regret. That's a horrible way to "win" the sexually-transmitted disease lottery or the pregnancy sweepstakes, but worse, it is also an invitation for Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 to levy permanent and devastating consequences to their future.

Under Title IX law, there is virtually no need to respect rules of evidence or constitutionally guaranteed rights to a speedy trial, a jury of one's peers, the ability to confront and question witnesses or the provision for a capable defense.

Hello, Title IX; goodbye, Sixth Amendment!

Every college is required to have a Title IX coordinator, and in cases of alleged sexual misconduct, the coordinator will assign an investigator to take statements from the accused, the accuser and any witnesses in order to make a determination based on the "preponderance of the evidence."

Your child and/or legal counsel are forbidden to cross-examine witnesses or the accuser.'

Sound data needed to curb sexual assaults

Mastodon · 11 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A recent report about sexual assault on the Ohio State University campus shows that an alarming number of OSU students have been sexually assaulted. The university community should act quickly to develop policies to end sexual violence on campus.

But determining those policies can be difficult without accurate information, and there is reason to believe that the survey significantly overestimated the level of campus sexual violence, an issue of concern to me and a number of OSU faculty colleagues (http://bit.ly/1L8SB6H).

A recent letter to the editor in the Ohio State student newspaper, The Lantern, stated that the survey found that "by their senior year, more than one in four OSU women undergraduates experienced at least one sexual assault." But as the OSU press release announcing the report noted, the survey likely overestimates the true victimization rate.
...
We must move forward with the important work of ending sexual assault at OSU with the recognition that effective solutions to social problems are hindered by inaccurate interpretations of biased data. Sexual violence on Ohio State's campus is, by any measure, a serious problem, but it probably is not an insurmountable one. It's on us to undertake this important work in a way that protects the well-being of all of our students and preserves the most fundamental and long-standing strengths of our rich Ohio State community.'

UK: Student campus rape activist accuses herself of "rape" and bans herself from events

Mastodon · 12 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A high profile student activist who has campaigned against “rape culture” has resigned from all political position and barred herself from National Union of Students (NUS) events and safe spaces because she is “unsafe.” She said she had “failed to properly establish consent before every act” during a sexual encounter at the NUS annual conference, and had “touched somebody in a sexual manner” in a night club three years ago.

Third year Oxford student Annie Teriba is best know for her driving role in theiconoclastic #Rhodesmustfall campaign to remove “racist” historical statues of Cecil Rhodes from campus, and for forcing the Oxford Union to declare themselves “institutionally racist” and mandate racial awareness workshops for committee members, because they organised a cocktail party called “The Colonial Comeback.”

She is also editor of the No Heterox zine blog, the People of Colour and Racial Equality Officer at Wadham College Student Union (SU), and a member of both the National Campaign Against Fees and Cuts (NCAFC) National Committee and the NUS’s Black Students’ Committee.'

Hillary Clinton On Capitol Hill Sexism: Some Men “Were Just Troubling”

Mastodon · 12 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last year, when Kirsten Gillibrand was promoting her memoir — a book detailing a number of sexist encounters with unpleasant male colleagues — the senator said of one occasion, “I wasn’t in a place where I could tell him to go fuck himself.”

Hillary Clinton, on the other hand, has been in that place.

“Yes, I have,” she said in an interview with Another Round, a BuzzFeed podcast, declining to elaborate. Typically, however, Clinton said she refrains from cursing. “I say, ‘Did you hear what you just said?’ I’ve had some luck with that over the years.”

“But I’ve encountered those kinds of situations over the years,” she said, describing men who find it difficult to work respectfully with women. “Sometimes you just have to ignore what’s happening because there’s a larger issue you’re trying to deal with, and sometimes you have to confront it, and it’s almost a snap decision.”'

App contest offers award for women-only teams

Mastodon · 12 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'UNM is preparing to launch its third annual mobile app contest, partnering with CNM for the first time in a collaboration that has brought innovations to the competition, including an award for teams composed exclusively of women.

The “Women in Technology” award is up for grabs for female applicants to the contest, whether they apply individually or as a team. So far the contest has four such applicants, according to Manikantam Chitturi, the contest coordinator.

“We thought of encouraging women to be involved more,” Chitturi said.

The award is $2,500, to be given to an individual contestant or divided evenly among members of a winning team. For comparison, the contest’s overall first-place winner will get $5,000; second-place, $2,500; and third-place $1,000, according to the contest’s webpage.

Chitturi said that the award is incentive for women to enter the contest, as there were no female contestants last year.

“Partly, this is the input of CNM,” said Moira Gerety, deputy CIO of IT at UNM. “Some of the funding they’re using for the program comes from contributors and funders who are interested in diversity.”'

Google boss: 'Volkswagen scandal wouldn't have happened if more women were in charge'

Mastodon · 12 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A top Google executive has suggested the Volkswagen emission scandal would not have happened had the company employed more female engineers.

Eileen Naughton, managing director of Google UK and Ireland, said a lack of female workers could have contributed to Volkswagen rigging pollution tests.

“Imagine a woman engineer actually knowingly and willingly tricking that technology, when she might be thinking of the allergens put into the environment and the eyes of the child that might get irritated by 40 times the legal output of diesel - particularly when it’s not allowable by law,” said Naughton.'

Four questions men should ask when searching for a college

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'1. What is the school's definition of sexual harassment and sexual assault?

If you read just one section of your student handbook, read the definitions the school provides for what constitutes sexual misconduct on its campus. Some schools have adopted a "yes means yes" policy, which guarantees a finding of responsibility if an accused student can't prove the crime didn't occur. This particular policy turns the justice system on its head by shifting the burden of proof onto the accused. A judge in Tennessee recently ruled that "Absent the tape recording of a verbal consent or other independent means to demonstrate that consent was given, the ability of an accused to prove the complaining party's consent strains credulity and is illusory."'

California ruling could end kangaroo-court investigations of campus rape, law professor says

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Is this the end of campus adjudications of “he said, she said” rape accusations in California?

According to a law professor at George Washington University, it could be, if schools take the initiative.

By a 2-1 vote, a three-judge panel of the California Court of Appeals ruled that UCLA has no “special relationship” with a student that would justify liability on its part for the student’s on-campus stabbing by another student – known to have psychological problems – in a chemistry lab.'

In California, Mandatory Minimums for College Sex Crimes Almost Became a Thing

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The state of California has obligated universities to adjudicate sexual assault under an unworkable affirmative consent standard, it has instructed high schools to teach teenagers that consensual sex requires affirmative consent, and it has tried to force colleges to expel students found guilty of violating these absurd policies. But the last of these policies will not become law, thanks to Gov. Jerry Brown's veto of Assembly Bill 967.

The bill would have established mandatory minimum sentences for students found responsible of sexual misconduct by a university tribunal, essentially requiring two-year suspensions as the default punishment. In his letter announcing the veto, Brown explained that the bill was unnecessarily meddlesome:

"It is eminently reasonable to expect that discipline shall not vary based on a student's status as an athlete or a declared area of study. This bill, however, could deprive professionals from using their better judgment to discipline according to relevant circumstances. Moreover, it creates an expectation that the state should recommend minimum penalties for violations of specific campus policies. …

I don't think it's necessary at this point for the state to directly insert itself into the disciplinary and governing processes of all private and nonprofit colleges in California."'

Why Justin Bieber's naked pictures highlight feminist double standards

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Everyone had a nice chuckle when a photograph of Justin Bieber with his you-know-what out surfaced on the internet a few days ago.

He was photographed by paparazzi during what he assumedly thought was a private moment on holiday in Bondi Beach. The pictures were published with glee on New York's Daily News, prompting an avalanche of jokes on Twitter.

At first glance, this jocular reaction might seem reasonable. The popstar isn't very well liked, his music has annoyed most people over the age of 14 for a good few years now, and he's been publically shamed for his bratty and illegal behaviour on more than one occasion.

However, look just a little deeper and it's obvious that we're dealing with shocking double standards when it comes to nudity and privacy.'

Women Will Likely Have to Register for the Draft, Army Secretary Says

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

Women will eventually have to register for the draft if "true and pure equality" is to be realized in the U.S. military, Army Secretary John McHugh said Monday.

"If your objective is true and pure equality then you have to look at all aspects" of the roles of women in the military, McHugh said, and registration for the draft "will be one of those things. That will have to be considered."

McHugh said draft registration was not a subject to be decided by the services or the Department of Defense, and will ultimately have to be dealt with by Congress. He expected a "pretty emotional debate and discussion."

However, as more military occupational specialties are opened to women, the debate on Selective Service System registration was inevitable, McHugh said. "If we find ourselves as a military writ large where men and women have equal opportunity, as I believe we should," he said.'

Google slammed by feminists over 'misogynistic' new product - but is it really offensive?

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Google has made the humiliating decision to change the name of one of its new products over fears it would offend feminists.

Last month, the tech colossus released a program called Brotli , which compresses websites to make them load quicker.

But it made the "controversial" decision to make this new program produce files ending with the suffix ".bro".

In America, feminists use the word bro as a shorthand to refer to beer-swilling blokes whose sexism and misogyny is alleged to contribute to sexism and "rape culture".

It's also just a word men use to refer to each other.

But Google decided to change its filename for fear of offending "social justice warriors", or SJWs, who are known to lead vociferous online campaigns against anything they deem offensive or inappropriate.'

"Who Stands in the Way of a Feminist Utopia? Women"

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Radical feminism may pack its biggest punch on college campuses, where gender-identity issues can be injected into any academic topic and impressionable students are encouraged to see the world through a skewed feminist lens, but its impact ripples through society, seeping into political debates and the popular culture.
...
Fanciful economics, however, isn't feminist utopia's biggest obstacle. It's women—actual individual women who have their own plans and dreams for their lives—who really doom feminist visions such as Bapat's.

Bapat, who carefully mentions both "men and women" receiving payments for caring for their own dependents, nevertheless assumes that this system would encourage more men to participate in childrearing. In fact they have to, otherwise she'd have to acknowledge that her system would dramatically undermine other central feminist goals, such as increasing women's power and prestige in the world of corporate and political affairs. Bapat's feminist sisters dream of women holding (at least) 50 percent of all corporate board positions and elected offices, and their policies' aim is often to make it easier for women to succeed at work.

In the countries where such government-sponsored policies have been implemented, however, they have often backfired when measured in these feminist terms. Western Europe, for example, is often held up as a model for their state-provided family-leave policies and childcare subsidies; many European countries even provide a version of Bapat's direct cash payments to parents for taking care of their own children. Yet asober examination of the results of these programs reveals that they have impeded women's economic advancement, making it more likely that women will earn less and hold fewer leadership positions in the business world.

The insurmountable problem for those who dream of a feminist utopia is that most women simply don't seem to share the feminists' obsession with economic power, and often prefer spending their time and talents at home, even when their work there offers no monetary reward.'

"Masculinity Under Siege"

Mastodon · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last Friday the New York Times Men's Style section published an article that I'm still desperately hoping is satire: "27 Ways to Be a Modern Man." If it's not, then the state of modern manliness is a sorry one indeed.

We'll get to that article in a moment; it wasn't the only recent commentary on contemporary manhood. Writing last week in National Review, for example, David French expressed disgust with our "unmanly" "victim culture" that encourages us to cultivate "a sense of weakness and fragility." It is a mindset that is "killing manhood," he warns.

The College Fix reported this week that Vanderbilt University recently held a "Healthy Masculinities Week" (who knew there's more than one masculinity?) featuring programs that helpfully deconstruct America's "narrow definition of masculinity" for impressionable students.

A short video from Huffpost Women that openly equates masculinity with sexism (tagline: "Because sexism hurts men too") has been making the internet rounds again. In it, a handful of rather effeminate hipsters suffering from vocal fry struggle to answer the question, "What does masculinity mean?" One of them comically posits that, "historically," masculinity has been "a way to differentiate yourself from women." Well, duh.'

China: Men Crawl in Leashes to Promote Women’s Equality (and men's subordination, apparently)

ErikaLancastor · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. It appears that Mangina-itis has hit China, now, as well. sigh Excerpt:

'February 8th, on Guanggu Road in Wuhan, a woman leads three men in chain leashes crawling on the ground. Amongst them is a man crawling prostrate on the ground, licking the shoe on the woman’s foot. The organizer claims this performance art is to show opposition against a male society, and call for equality between men and women.

[Above] 25-year-old Kang Yi (center) majored in oil painting in college. In 2005, he threw himself into creating contemporary art, and in recent years has been exhibiting throughout the country various thematic performance art. Amongst them includes exchanging slaps with someone who was suffers paralysis of the face and kneeling on the ground thanking sanitation workers. This time is him and his team’s first time coming to Wuhan.'

"Why we made ‘Yes Means Yes’ California law"

Mastodon · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The problem of sexual violence on college campuses — a problem exacerbated by a societal culture of male entitlement — is made worse by school administrators who quietly sweep assaults under the rug, wrongly thinking that doing so is in the best interest of their colleges.

...

In a court of law, due process is necessary to protect the accused’s liberty. With a high burden of proof, district attorneys are all too often unable to gather enough evidence to prosecute offenders. Because perpetrators are most often repeat offenders, it’s important for campuses to have a way to hold aggressors accountable.

...

Now, on our California college campuses, there is an administrative adjudication process in place to ensure that students abide by the code of conduct, including affirmative consent, that they agreed upon when they entered college. Disciplinary proceedings evaluate allegations of sexual violence to see whether student codes of conduct were broken. For too many years students’ reports of assault were mishandled, discouraging survivors to come forward and identify themselves as victims and face peer harassment without justice. With a fairer process, more students are coming forward to report crimes, and in time our campuses will be safer.'

Rethinking how we deal with campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As [members of] the 2015 freshman class navigate their first semester, sexual assault at our nation's colleges and universities remains a topic of serious concern.

The current system of investigating and adjudicating allegations of sexual assault on campus is broken. It does not serve the interests of students, schools or the public.

A recent poll by Penn Schoen Berland found that more than 90 percent of likely voters believe that law enforcement — not colleges and universities — should be responsible for investigating and prosecuting allegations of sexual assault on campus. It is time to bring justice to campus, protect the rights of all students and student organizations, punish perpetrators and ensure a safe college experience for students.
...
The current approach is much more likely to result in errors that could harm students for the rest of their lives. In many cases, students are not allowed to review the charges against them, are not permitted access to counsel and cannot cross-examine witnesses or know the status of their cases. Student groups have been subject to blanket bans or suspensions due to the alleged activities of a small number of students.

When a perpetrator has been found guilty by the school, the most serious punishment available is expulsion. But those who commit sexual violence should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. As the Rape, Incest and Abuse National Network wrote to the White House last year, "It would never occur to anyone to leave the adjudication of a murder in the hands of a school's internal judicial process. Why, then, is it not only common, but expected, for them to do so when it comes to sexual assault?"'

"The cure for all-male, all-white panels"

Mastodon · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A couple of weeks ago I was asked to be on a panel about the suburbs. It's a subject that fascinates me, so I thought about it over a few days and then rejected the idea.

The very last thing the suburbs need is an old, white guy representing them in any capacity. It would shore up a stereotype the suburbs are trying to break.

I don't do panels anymore. I enjoyed doing the TPT Almanac media panel for the several times I did it, then got tired of having brilliant comments dismissed because I'm the "old, white guy." Same with a few news panels in house at MPR.

Clearly, that's a selfish reason, but it still provided an opportunity to begin to listen to other voices, especially more ethnically and racially diverse voices.

...

All of this sounds far more noble than it really is. But the conclusion is the same. If white men are really interested in supporting diversity in the public space, the very best thing they can do to achieve it, is to sit down and be quiet.'

Feminist Studies Professor Who Assaulted Pro-Lifers Settles Lawsuit, Won’t Apologize

Mastodon · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Earlier this year, University of California Santa Barbara Professor of Feminist Studies, Mireille Miller-Young was sentenced in a criminal case in connection with an assault on pro-life young people who took the pro-life message to the UCSB campus. Now, the civil side of the legal battle has concluded with her settling with the pro-life students she victimized, but still failing to issue an apology for her actions.

The incident, which took place on March 4, saw two pro-life students Thrin and Joan Short, lead the peaceful pro-life outreach event with 11 friends, most of whom were students from Thomas Aquinas College. They used signs displaying images of abortion victims to begin conversations with students before a confrontation by Professor of Feminist Studies, Mireille Miller-Young turned violent.

The angry professor interrupted the students’ calm interaction with the activists by grabbing a pro-life sign out of the hands of one of them, carrying the sign off through the campus flanked by her students, and then assaulting Thrin Short while trying to hide from police, who were on their way, the group said. Police officers later found the remains of the sign, which had been destroyed.'

"No Man's Land: How to Build a Feminist Utopia"

Mastodon · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Waking up each day in the Land of Hims, where the pay gap is wide and sexism both subtle and overt, it's tempting to wish that the easy comfort and understanding found in the company of other women were a 24/7 reality. Spend some time at a women's college, or scroll through secret feminist Facebook groups where conversation can take shape freely, away from the patronizing or defensive rebuffs we've trained ourselves to brace for, and you might understand the lark of the feminist utopia. A place populated solely by women who Get It, living and working with ease. No leaning in, no pushing against, and best of all: no men.

Existing most famously in feminist theory, the lesbian separatist communes of the 1970s called on women to claim lesbianism or celibacy and move out to rural farms deemed "womyn's lands"—an act of literally and figuratively expunging men from their way of being. Though most of us wouldn't actually be willing to pack up and leave (either men or our lives), for some the wistful dream of an equitable women-only paradise, somewhere far off and away, remains an irrepressible desire.

Kate White is trying to put that desire into action. After coming up unsatisfied with the existing intentional communities she researched, which either required a hefty buy-in or were "too religious" for her goals, she's now in the midst of planning an entirely new space, using Charlotte Gilman's 1915 utopian sci-fi novel Herland as a guiding principle. The book imagines a placid world called the Land Without Hims, ruled and inhabited only by women, who have been free of gender stereotypes since the fall of men two thousand years before. "We are putting feminism into actual practice rather than just discussing things," White explains. "Building something new avoids the need for a revolution here [in the US]."'

"False rape allegations hurt true victims"

Mastodon · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The argument that false allegations ruin lives, meaning the system is flawed, erodes the support that sexual assault victims need. The law gives victims power for a reason. Without it, victims wouldn't get needed care. UNL promotes an atmosphere that allows all students, regardless of gender, to feel safe on campus. Police enforce laws that aid the less powerful and prevent tragedies. The most productive step taken to help sexual assault victims is allowing them to report their case to police officials right away. Almost instantly, an officer can be at the scene, and together with law enforcement, the university's investigation can be underway. While countless sexual assaults still go unreported, the fact that any victim can receive immediate attention after a horrific crime has taken place gives the victim the opportunity to step forward.

The system is undeniably skewed to help the victims, which can lead to unwanted consequences. Since the weekly emails have started, I've heard frequent conversations about false reporting of sexual assault. The FBI states that two percent of rape accusations are deemed false, equal to any other violent crime. Some dispute that number because of the murkiness around sexual assault statistics, but the concern is still on students' minds. A Rolling Stones article titled "A Rape on Campus" detailed the story of a girl who had been raped in a fraternity at the University of Virginia. Her story was later deemed fictional but along the way ruined the reputation, career and life of the accused. The same system which gives victims hope permits deceitful individuals to make untrue accusations.

While false allegations are rare, they hurt everyone trying to prevent sexual assault. Any good work disappears with the excuse that the system is flawed. This excuse isn't given in attempt to hurt victims, but instead to defend oneself in a situation that harms all parties.

The situation is frightening. After one night together, one person can change the others' life. Relationships could be defined by a headline over a mug shot. The accused who once cheered for our university on game days may no longer step foot on campus. Years of prison could be faced in criminal charges.

False accusers of crime not only change the lives of their partner, but erode the system which gives victims hope. One false accusation belittles the genuine claims made by others. Previous false claims prevent future victims from speaking out and generate skepticism whenever a new case makes headlines.'

Biden saves his harshest words for male staff only

Matt · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. No surprise, really. First, high-level pols are notorious for their attitudes of entitlement and being abusive toward staffers. But it looks like VAWA Joe reserves his rudest and most abusive language for men only. Surprise, surprise. Guess I'd rather be called "dumb fuck" over being fondled by him any day, which is his M.O. with women around him. Excerpt:

'But if you just worked your ass off for him for a few years, he ignored you, intimidated you, sometimes humiliated you, took no interest in your advancement, and never learned your name.

“Hey, Chief,” he’d say, or “How’s it going, Cap’n,” unless he was ticked at you, in which case he’d employ one of his favorite terms for male underlings: “dumb f–k.”

“Dumb f–k over here didn’t get me the briefing materials I needed.” It was both noun and adjective: “Is the event leader a Democrat or a Republican? Or are you too dumb f–k to know?”

Connaughton was doing the hard, thankless, essential work of soliciting money, and for this he was forever stigmatized, because Biden hated fund-raising, the drudgery and compromises it entailed.'

California Trains Kids To Ask For Consent Every 10 Minutes During Sex

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A look at the new landscape of sex education published by The New York Times contains an eye-opening anecdote: In California, teachers are telling kids to get consent every ten minutes during sex to avoid committing rape.

The article is about the brave new world created by affirmative consent, or “yes means yes,” which holds that a person must obtain explicit prior consent for every sexual act or else be considered to have committed sexual assault.The standard isn’t limited to sex itself; a person would also need explicit affirmative consent to kiss somebody, too.'

Innocent until proven guilty? Not under ‘yes means yes.’

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Affirmative consent, the latest policy intended to prevent sexual assault, has roiled college campuses. Those who advocate for affirmative consent legislation say those who want to have sex should be required to discuss and verbally agree to such activity before it happens. Opponents say that such stringent requirements de-romanticize what should be a subtle, interactive process often based on nonverbal cues.
...
The second aspect of the consent rule is what I call the “enforcement principle.” It involves how the system — whether it be the legal system or the academic disciplinary system — decides whether a given sexual act did or did not receive consent. Here I would insist on the actual Blackstonian principle being applied. Even though it is better for 10 potentially welcomed sexual acts not to occur than for one non-consented act to take place, it simply doesn’t follow that the same calculus should be applied in the context of enforcement and punishment on a college campus. In that very different context, it is better for 10 individuals who did not obtain consent to go free than for even one individual who did obtain consent to be wrongfully punished. Being wrongfully punished can be catastrophic for a student.

This is where universities are making a dreadful mistake. Fearful of being sued by the federal government, many schools have made it easier both to report accusations of sexual assault (a good thing) and to find a student guilty based on low standards of proof (a bad thing). Rather than requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt – the standard of evidence required to reach a conviction in a normal court system – many schools are willing to deliver a guilty verdict and permit punishment to be imposed based on a mere preponderance of the evidence: a showing that there is no more than a 51 percent likelihood that the assault occurred.'

The new sex ed: Yes can also mean no

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In the new sex ed, boys are presumed to be rapists until proven otherwise. Why else would boys be required, every few minutes, to repeatedly ask women if they are enjoying the sex – and if they fail to ask, be accused of rape?

Consent from the person you are kissing — or more — is not merely silence or a lack of protest, Shafia Zaloom, a health educator at the Urban School of San Francisco, told the students. They listened raptly, but several did not disguise how puzzled they felt.

`“What does that mean — you have to say ‘yes’ every 10 minutes?” asked Aidan Ryan, 16, who sat near the front of the room.

“Pretty much,” Ms. Zaloom answered. “It’s not a timing thing, but whoever initiates things to another level has to ask.”`

Look at how the bar keeps rising! At first, there was common sense that if a woman didn't object, there was no problem. Then a woman had to consent. Then a woman has to be specifically asked about sex and has to specifically consent. Now a woman has to consent at each level of sexual intimacy. At the rate things are going, men will be required to ask for consent each time they want to move six inches forward or backward.'

False accusations prove wisdom of lawmakers giving students due process

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A policy recently passed by state lawmakers giving due process protections for students accused of crimes on campus was vindicated at the University of North Dakota last week.

Since 2011, the Obama administration has stretched Title IX into a requirement that campuses adjudicate serious accusations of sexual assault and harassment on campus. This has resulted in kangaroo courts often presided over by inexperienced academics or administrators where alleged victims have all university resources working on their behalf. Alleged perpetrators aren't even allowed basic tenets of due process: rights like legal counsel, the right to cross examine witnesses against them, and the right to be made aware of the charges against them.'

WikiLeaks' Anti-Feminist Rant

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a series of tweets on Wednesday, the official WikiLeaks account questioned whether "feminism" (always in scare quotes) was "a reactionary vehicle to push state interests such as censorship and imprisonment." Links to accompanying blog posts implied that the 2010 sexual assault accusations against Assange might have been falsified by government officials as justification for his arrest, a common theory among his supporters.

"Has modern 'feminism' become a reactionary vehicle for state censorship, repression and war?" Wikileaks tweeted on Wednesday. The tweet links to a 2010 post by blogger Daisy's Dead Air questioning whether the charges against Assange—two allegations of molestation, one of unlawful coercion, and one of rape—were genuine, or if they had been manufactured by the United States government.'

For Students Accused Of Campus Rape, Legal Victories Win Back Rights

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'College students can't miss the warnings these days about the risk of campus sexual assault, but increasingly, some students are also taking note of what some perceive as a different danger.

"Once you are accused, you're guilty," says Parker Oaks, one of several Boston University students stopped randomly by NPR between classes. "We're living in a society where you're guilty before innocent now."

Xavier Adsera, another BU student, sounds a similar theme. "We used to not be fair to women on this issue," he says. "Now were on the other extreme, not being fair to guys."

As colleges crack down on sexual assault, some students complain that the schools are going too far and trampling the rights of the accused in the process. In recent months, courts around the nation have offered some of those students significant victories, slamming schools for systems that are stacked against the accused.'

Fraternities Hire Trent Lott To Lobby For Limiting Campus Sexual Assault Investigations

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'National fraternity and sorority groups have hired former Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) to lobby for legislation that would prevent colleges from punishing certain students accused of sexual assault.

Lott is among a group of lobbyists who have collected $140,000 from the "Safe Campus Coalition" so far this year, according to congressional disclosure filings. The coalition is made up of the National Panhellenic Conference, North American Interfraternity Conference (NIC), Kappa Alpha Order, the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity and the Sigma Nu fraternity.

The lobbyists are helping the groups push for the Safe Campus Act, which would restrict colleges from punishing students for sexual assault unless the police are also involved. Other illegal behaviors -- such as theft or physical assault -- would not be held to this requirement. The proposal is uniformly opposed by advocacy and activist groups that work with rape victims.'

'Being A Man' Festival Founder Jude Kelly: 'When We Talk About Gender Equality, That Includes Men's Liberation'

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Whether it's body image, lad culture, fatherhood or masculinity, men are lacking support and direction as they struggle with the multi-faceted expectations around being a man.

Many are at breaking point.

One symptom of this is the biggest cause of male deaths under the age of 35: suicide. Mental health issues such as depression and anxiety often go untreated and without discussion.

This crisis prompted the launch of the Southbank Centre's Being A Man festival last year, which returns at the end of November to explore the challenges and pressures surrounding masculine identity in the 21st century.

The event, which HuffPost UK are proud to partner with, takes place one week after International Men's Day (19 November) and will feature a three-day programme packed with talks, debates, performances and workshops from over 150 speakers, including Akala, Frankie Boyle, David Baddiel and Kellie Maloney.'

Toxic masculinity is tearing us apart: Christopher Harper-Mercer, 4chan and the fragility of America's alpha male

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The state of being a man is a compilation of external influences that ultimately define whether someone is a "real" man or not.Guns, sex, and money serve as a sort of holy trinity for traditional masculinity, the tropes by which a supposedly true man is known. When it's stripped down to its toxic core, "what is a man" ends up being defined by how many chicks he can bang, how much ass he can kick, and how much money and "status" he has. Among the people most obsessed with traditional masculinity—your men's rights advocates, your Red Pill enthusiasts, your incels—you'll hear about "alpha" and "beta" males. Alphas presumably rank higher on the violence, sex and status trinity, lording their inherent superiority over their lesser, beta brothers.
...
We need to recognize just how damaging it is to sell the idea of men at their worst—brutish, violent and barely in control of themselves—is the only way to be a "real" man. We've stuck ourselves with a toxic idea of masculinity where you continually have to prove you're a man—being willing to hurt others in order to do so—instead of manhood being something inherent. We need to recognize, accept, and even celebrate the wide variety of masculinity—from virgins to playboys, asexuals to satyrs, from macho to femme, cis men and trans men, gay and straight and everything in between.'

Feminists want us to define these ugly sexual encounters as rape. Don’t let them.

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There was the time when, 19 and naive, I was guilt-tripped into entirely unwanted physical intimacies with a much older married man. And the time, three or four years later, when I went to visit an on-and-off long-distance boyfriend and quickly realized that it was over for me — but he assumed we were still on, and I didn’t have the nerve to say no. And the time I told a man, “Look, I’m not going to sleep with you,” and it was taken as, “Try again in a couple of hours.” He did, and it worked.

When they happened, my views of these encounters ranged from “it was a mistake” to “it’s complicated.” They still do — even though, these days, we are encouraged to reinterpret such experiences as sexual violations. To many feminists, stories like these are evidence of a pervasive, misogynistic rape culture. “Kids see movies where there’s an aggressor who gets pushed away, but keeps trying until the girl relents,” advocate, author and filmmaker Kelly Kend writes. “. . . This is a rape dynamic that has been played off countless times as just how it works.” Canadian feminist author Anne Thériault laments “the still-pervasive and very flawed idea that if she doesn’t say no, it’s not rape” — clearly referring not just to attacks involving violence or incapacitation (for which few would demand a verbal “no” as proof of rape), but encounters in which a woman yields to unwanted overtures, like I did.

This isn’t just feminist theory; it’s having an impact in the real world. Consent-education programs on college campuses, fromColumbia University to the University of Texas at Austin, are increasingly adoptingthe “yes means yes” approach. But this crusade against “rape culture” oversimplifies the vast complexity of human sexual interaction, conflating criminal sexual acts such as coercion by physical force, threat or incapacitation — which should obviously be prosecuted and punished — with bad behavior.

Was I a victim? Even in the first incident, in which the man knowingly pressured me into something I didn’t want, I could have safely said no to him. Despicable behavior is not always criminal, just like getting guilt-tripped into giving money to a freeloading friend is not robbery.'

Australia: PhD Scholarship in Social and Global Transformation - "Seeking Change: Allowing Women to Raise their Young Children whilst in Prison SA"

Minuteman · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Link here. Excerpt:

'In South Australia women are no longer able to care for their young children in prison, whereas other Australian state models show that it is in the best interest and wellbeing of the child and the mother/child relationship to allow young children to be cared for by their mothers.

The project focuses on the theme of Social and Global Transformation and in particular the question of individualisation, citizenship and human rights. It also examines the parenting needs of diverse groups of women including Indigenous women and teenage mothers. International organisations such as the Human Rights and EO Commissions have called attention to this social issue.

...

The student should have one of the following disciplinary backgrounds, social policy, gender studies, social and cultural geography, sociology, law, social work or psychology and have a strong interest in social policy. The successful candidate will be required to work closely with industry partner, the South Australian Council of Social Services (SACOSS) and will be embedded in the organisation up to 2 days per week.'

Army wants more female recruiters

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Army needs more female recruiters over the next several years as it gears up for the end of the ban on women serving in tens of thousands of combat-related jobs, according to a top recruiting official.

Maj. Gen. Jeffrey Snow, in an Oct. 4 memo to the top Army personnel officer, has requested an annual boost in the percentage of women recruiters by 1% per year until 2018 "to improve the recruitment of females for Army service."

Women, Snow said, are 23% better at recruiting women than men. "Increasing the number of females on recruiting duty will improve the effectiveness of recruiting women," he wrote.

The request comes as the Pentagon moves to open all its frontline combat units, including special operations forces, to women by year's end. The services may request an exemption for a combat specialty if they can document that women cannot perform the required tasks. Thus far, no such waiver requests have been made public. However, the Marine Corps released a study last month showing that all-male units outperformed those that included women, suggesting that the service may seek a waiver for its ground combat forces.'

SAVE E-lert: AG Lynch Shamefully Ignores Male Victims in DV Speech

Matt · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For Domestic Violence Awareness Month, U.S. Attorney General Loretta Lynch delivered remarks about domestic violence at a Justice Department event.

As one can see from the transcript, here: http://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/acting-associate-attorney-general-stuart-f-delery-delivers-remarks-justice-department, AG Lynch repeatedly refers to female victims, but doesn't mention male victims once.

We at SAVE know that male domestic violence victims do exist, and it's important that our national leaders take time to acknowledge them so that they receive critical resources and attention.

Please contact the Department of Justice and share your concerns: (202) 353-1555 or http://www.justice.gov/contact-us

We also invite you to review the new VAWA provisions, referenced by AG Lynch, to make them inclusive of all victims: http://www.saveservices.org/inclusive-vawa/legal-provisions/

Gina Lauterio, Esq., Policy Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
www.saveservices.org

ALI Model Penal Code for Sexual Assault and Related Offenses

Matt · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The American Law Institute works to promote the clarification and simplification of United States common law. In 2012, a Prospectuswas issued proposing to update the ALI Model Penal Code (MPC) on Sexual Assault, last revised in 1962. The Prospectus highlighted several anachronisms of the 1962 version such as the gendered character of the offense and the broad marital exemption.

Two years later, Tentative Draft No. 1 was released. A review of the draft Model Penal Code reveals that it enormously expands criminal liability at a time when the American Bar Association, lawmakers, and the American public have come to the realization that our country faces a serious problem with over-criminalization. ...'

Fact-checking the UN: Is the Internet dangerous for women?

Matt · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'A new UN report claims that “73 percent of women have been exposed to online violence.” To combat this alleged epidemic of sexist mayhem on the web, it calls for draconian measures—including more government supervision and censorship of the internet. Before anyone acts on these UN recommendations, let’s check out a few facts.'

'Yes means yes' policy coming under fire from judges

Matt · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Judges across the country are saying “no” to the “yes means yes” standard of affirmative consent for date rape.

The legality of the standard – adopted on California and New York campuses by state legislatures and in effect on numerous other colleges throughout the country – is in question following a series of recent rulings that cite a lack of due process.

"These decisions are harbingers,” said John Banzhaf, a professor at George Washington University Law School and a public interest lawyer. “It does take time for new ideas to percolate through the system.”

Under the standard, the accused, typically a male, has to prove he obtained consent, even if neither party remembers what happened. The standard forces the accused to prove his innocence, rather than be proven guilty.'

Jewish mom proposes replacing bris with naming ceremony

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Rebecca Wald's father had to perform circumcisions during his medical training. It was awful. Her husband, also a physician, wasn't a fan of the procedure either. He understood the medical complications. So when the Walds' son was born in 2005, the family decided not to circumcise the newborn. But they are Jewish.

“My husband and I are Jewish, but we couldn't see putting our newborn through the trauma and exposing him to the complications,” Wald explains. “Every circumcision has complications, by the way, because of the lifelong damage it does to the organ.”

The bris, however, is a Jewish tradition dating back thousands of years, to Abraham, the biblical patriarch of Judaism. Instead of having a mohel slice off the 8-day-old's foreskin, Wald urges Jewish families to consider throwing a naming ceremony called a brit shalom. “Jewish families who don't want to circumcise often want to keep the affirming aspects of the bris while skipping the pain and damage of the procedure,” Wald says. “This is what brit shalom is all about.”'

UK: Well done, feminism. Now men are afraid to help women at work

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A new book claims that male office workers are now so afraid of being on the receiving end of a sexual harassment case, they are reluctant to mentor, assist, befriend and even hold open doors for female colleagues.

Crushingly, Sex & The Office suggests men now view such ordinary, decent behaviours as “too risky” – and, in what will be a bitter irony for equality campaigners – claims that, as a direct consequence, women are now failing to advance at work.

This terror of being accused of sexual harassment is now so common it has its own term, “backlash stress”. It sounds like something straight out of a Claims Direct ad – where the only victims are men.'

Man charged with paying a woman to make false rape complaint

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A Gridley Street man has been charged with paying a woman to falsely report a sexual assault against another man.

David Hernandez, 29, of 96 Gridley St., is facing charges of conspiracy to commit second-degree falsely report an incident, conspiracy to commit second-degree providing a false statement, criminal liability of for acts of another for second-degree falsely reporting an incident and criminal liability for acts of another for second-degree providing a false statement.

He allegedly paid a woman $100 in June to tell police she was raped in RockwellPark, according to the warrant. Hernandez gave the woman a description of the phony suspect with the intent of it matching the man who was dating his ex-girlfriend, the warrant continued.

Police allege he was trying to break up the relationship so Hernandez would have a chance at getting back with his ex.'

Feminists assaulted men while attacking a cathedral in Argentina

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Feminists attacked a cathedral in Argentina Monday as a line of men defending it were being grossly assaulted.

The disturbing scene is part of Argentina's National Women's Encounter, a festival of shameless feminism sponsored every year by the state's Department of Culture as a "social interest" event.
...
Men stood in prayer in front of the Cathedral of Mar del Plata while unruly feminists possessed with rage cursed and assaulted them, throwing bottles and feces and even starting a small fire.

That's when the police finally intervened and made an effort to tame the rioting crowd of hysterical women. The attempt to restore order was met with petty acts of defiance. Many of the girls, several of whom were topless, threw anything they could find at the police, who didn't use much force to gain control of the situation.

Some left-wing media outlets are nevertheless reporting the story as an example of police brutality. Argentinos Alerta, the organizers of the peaceful resistance, thanked the police for stepping in to help — something they hadn't seen in any of the past years while facing the same violent behavior.'

The anti-campus sexual assault movement is elitist

Matt · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One major and negative narrative about the justice system is that wealthy and well-connected people get to live by different rules than the rest of us. One can find examples both reinforcing and undermining this, but the prevailing narrative remains.

If one wanted to find a blatant example of wealthy, privileged people getting their own justice system they can bend to their will, look no further than the anti-campus sexual assault movement. Born of false statistics and exaggerated (orwholly made up) victimhood, the movement has created (and seeks to maintain) a separate court system for those who can afford college.

What we're left with is a movement that seeks "easy justice for me, but not for thee." It's a slap in the face to the millions of Americans who are at a higher risk for sexual assault and who cannot afford college, many of them poor, minority women.'

UK: University student divides opinion after opposing Union's sex consent lessons

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A student at the University of Warwick has divided opinion online after speaking out against being invited to sex consent training lessons – a move, he says, was 'the biggest insult I've received in a good few years'.

Writing in online student publication The Tab, politics and sociology student George Lawlor described how he was excited to receive an invite to what he thought was a social event, but says his crushing disappointment quickly melted away to be overcome by anger when he realised what he was being invited to.

Having acknowledged how people should only interact with mutual agreement, he said he still found the invitation to be loathsome, adding: "It implies I have an insufficient understanding of what does and does not constitute consent and that's incredibly hurtful. I can't stress that enough."'

"Breaking news: rapists can be nice university educated boys"

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I'd like you all to take a moment to think about someone you've probably never met.

His name is George Lawlor, and he's a student at Warwick University. And, dear readers, something terrible has happened to George. You see, George logged on to Facebook recently and noticed that he had an invitation to an event.

Perhaps Lawlor doesn't get asked to all that many parties - such was his dismay at this particular invite. Instead of a request for his presence at the coolest club in town, he'd been invited to something entitled "I Heart Consent" - a workshop where people willingly turn up and learn about the idea of sexual consent. These sessions, popping up on campuses across the country, are happening in a bid to decrease the number of assaults.'

Why I don’t need consent lessons

Mastodon · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Ah, the special feeling you get when logging into Facebook and find someone thinks you’re cool enough to invite to their event. Is it a house party? Is it a social? All the possibilities race through your mind. Then it hits you. You tap the red notification and find you’ve been summoned to this year’s “I Heart Consent Training Sessions”. Your crushing disappointment quickly melts away and is overcome by anger.

Let me explain, I love consent. Of course people should only interact with mutual agreement, but I still found this invitation loathsome. Like any self-respecting individual would, I found this to be a massive, painful, bitchy slap in the face. To be invited to such a waste of time was the biggest insult I’ve received in a good few years. It implies I have an insufficient understanding of what does and does not constitute consent and that’s incredibly hurtful. I can’t stress that enough.

I feel as if I’m taking the “wrong” side here, but someone has to say it – I don’t have to be taught to not be a rapist. That much comes naturally to me, as I am sure it does to the overwhelming majority of people you and I know. Brand me a bigot, a misogynist, a rape apologist, I don’t care. I stand by that.'

Canada: Uni set to kick-off Healthy Masculinities Campaign

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Sexual Assault Support Center (SASC) is starting a program this month to facilitate the exploration of masculinity.

The “Creating Healthier Masculinities Leadership Program” seeks to question social expectations of men through conversation, training and eventually whatever program participants decide that UBC needs.

To kick off the project, former BC Lions player JR LaRose will discuss his own relationship to the hyper-masculine stereotype.

“Men, this isn’t a women’s issue, a trans issue, [or] a gender non-conforming issue — it’s your issue.... We’re trying to contextualize it more than just, ‘Stop screwing up, do better,’” said AMS President Aaron Bailey and soon to be participant in the training. “This could make you healthier, make you better able to deal with things.”

The goal of the campaign is to help men overcome the harmful societal expectations that prevent them from accessing counselling, exploring male privilege and other personal issues.'

What's Behind the Reversal of the Gender Gap in Higher Education?

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'That women have grown more likely to graduate from college in the past few decades seems natural: We have access to a far wider range of careers than our great-grandmothers did, and the economy favors the well educated now more than ever. In light of the rising value of a college degree, it's just strange that men haven't prioritized their education as much as women have. Why haven't they? Why do women increasingly outnumber men on college campuses?

...

The results showed that among young people who had lived with their fathers at some point, 72.1 percent of women and 63.1 percent of men had some college education, meaning men enrolled at 87.5 percent the rate of women. Among those with no father present, the figures were 61.3 percent for women and 49.2 percent for men; the men enrolled at 80.3 percent the rate of women. In other words, a gender gap favoring women was evident in both groups, but the gap was larger among young people whose father was absent. The ratio of the relative risks (0.918) indicated that the finding was statistically significant: "Males were disproportionately less likely than females to attend college if they came from a family in which the father had been absent from birth." The method Doherty et al. used to analyze the Add Health data did not allow for controlling for the usual background characteristics; however, the relative education levels of the Add Health sample's male-female sibling pairs, who would share many socio-demographic traits, were consistent with those of the overall sample.'

Janet Napolitano writes essay criticizung her own 'Yes means Yes' policy initiative

Matt · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Essay downloadable from here. It is by Janet Napolitano, a driving force behind the current campus nutsery. But hang on, sometimes Hell freezes over... jump to page 398 of the essay and be prepared to feel your jaw hit the floor. Description:

“The critical issues of sexual violence and sexual assault have right-fully gained greater attention at universities and colleges in our country. Though these issues are not confined to university campuses, a few key reasons help explain the emphasis on sexual violence and sexual assault, as well as sexual harassment, within the higher education world. First, at many institutions of higher education, vast numbers of young adults live independently and in close proximity to one another for the first time. Second, federal law imposes reporting, response, and prevention requirements on colleges and universities that are not present in other contexts. And third, students, parents, faculty, staff, alumni, members of governing boards, members of the community, and members of the state and federal governments all appropriately expect that colleges and universities will provide a safe and secure learning and working environment.”

Feminist Professor Claimed ‘Moral Right’ To Censor, Batter Teen Abortion Foe

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of California, Santa Barbara has agreed to settle a civil lawsuit brought by two anti-abortion protesters after feminist studies professor Mireille Miller-Young mocked them, stole their sign, destroyed the sign and scratched up the wrists of one protester — a 16-year-old girl.

The financial details of the settlement will remain confidential, reports Campus Reform.

The plaintiffs, sisters Thrin Short and Joan Short, say they are “very satisfied” with the settlement amount.

The events that gave rise to the lawsuit occurred in March 2014. At the time, Thrin Short was 16 and Joan Short was 21.'

NBC Cheers Feminist Magazine's Campaign to Photoshop Men from Pictures of Elected Officials

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Closing out Thursday's NBC Nightly News, the evening newscast found it pertinent to tout a new campaign by the British edition of the liberal feminist magazine Elle to photoshop men out of pictures of elected officials in an effort to promote the global need for more women in office.

Anchor Lester Holt led into correspondent Stephanie Gosk's piece by admitting that "it's one thing to talk about the gap in power between men and women" but "another to see it before your eyes." He continued by explaining that this represents "the idea behind a thought-provoking new campaign that's making its point with the help from photoshop."

Passing it off as free press (pun intended) for Elle, Gosh explained that the publication "assembled and doctored" various pictures of elected officials that include the United Kingdom's parliament to show there's "some pretty lonely women at the top." Adding that "[t]he statement Elle is making is loud and clear," Gosk also promoted a companion video that has "lit up the internet" with "[e]ight million people [having] shared the hashtag more women."'

Democratic National Committeewoman says her party is 'clearing a path' for Hillary because 'the women in charge' want it that way

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"The Democratic National Committee is 'clearing a path' for Hillary Clinton to be its presidential nominee because its upper power echelons are populated with women, according to a female committee member who was in Las Vegas for Tuesday's primary debate.

Speaking on the condition that she isn't identified, she told Daily Mail Online that the party is in the tank for Clinton, and the women who run the organization decided it 'early on.'

The committeewoman is supporting one of Hillary's rivals for the Democratic nomination, and said she spoke freely because she believes the former Secretary of State is benefiting from unfair favoritism inside the party.

Clinton aims to be the first female to occupy the Oval Office, and 'the party's female leaders really want to make a woman the next president,' the committeewoman said, rattling off a list of the women who she said are the 'real power' in the organization.

'I haven't heard anyone say we should make Hillary undergo a trial by fire,' she added. 'To the contrary, the women in charge seem eager, more and more, to have her skate into the general [election].'

'I have nothing against women in politics,' she underscored. 'But it's not healthy for the party if we get behind a woman because she's a woman, and risk having her implode after she's nominated because she isn't tested enough now.'"

Yes Means Yes: Yes or No?

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Q: How to prove consent?

How, in a realistic scenario, could a person accused of sexual assault under affirmative consent provide evidence that consent occurred?

A: Jaclyn Friedman

That would depend a lot on the details of the case. But the standard is no different than in a kidnapping case - if a defendant wanted to defend against a kidnapping charge by saying that the person agreed to go with them voluntarily, they'd have to convince a judge and jury that was true. Rape is no different.
...
Q: criminal law "yes means yes?"

It's my understanding that "yes means yes" provisions are confined to college campus codes of conduct---for now. Is this a standard we would want in our criminal law?

A: Jaclyn Friedman

I agree that there's a lot to think about when considering applying affirmative consent laws more broadly across the US. But Canada has had affirmative consent as the law of the land. I also think it's not materially different than kidnapping cases - if a victim claims she didn't consent to go with someone, and a defendant wants to prove that she went voluntarily, the defendant would have to make that case to the judge and jury. Affirmative consent doesn't have to change the burden of proof. It just changes whether we assume the people we're having sex with are in a state of already-consenting, or whether they're in a state of not-consenting until we find out otherwise. We don't assume that someone we're talking with will consent to going with us somewhere. We ask, we don't just drag them off. We already practice affirmative consent in most other parts of our social lives.'

Joe Biden calls 'yes means yes' consent policies 'tricky'

Mastodon · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Vice President Joe Biden has called current campus consent policies "tricky," but is apparently still just fine with using them to brand students as rapists.

Biden, speaking at a Domestic Violence Awareness Month roundtable on Thursday, said that current "yes-means-yes" — or affirmative consent — policies can be "tricky," despite his continuous insistence that schools do more to curb an alleged epidemic of campus sexual assault.

"The cultural norms make it still kind of hard to say, 'Yes, I'd like you to kiss me,' or 'Yes, I'd like you to do that,'" Biden said, according to veteran journalist and Washington Editor for PJ Media Bridget Johnson. "So it's still tricky."

Biden seems to be acknowledging just how unrealistic yes-means-yes policies are, yet the Obama administration is doing nothing to halt their spread. Biden is the second person in recent days to be confused by the policy his administration's hysterical claims have created. In San Francisco, a woman who writes the lesson plans for teaching yes-means-yes policies couldn't definitively tell students how the policies work."'

Q&A: Sen. Bob Casey on his campus sexual assault bill

Mastodon · 17 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'USA TODAY College: Is the statistic that 1-in-5 women will be sexually assaulted in college widely accepted in Congress? It's gotten some backlash from university administrators who think it's an exaggeration.

Sen. Robert Casey: The number is important. Even if the argument proves true that it's not (valid) — that it's 1 in 6, 1 in 7, 1 in 10, 1 in 20 — that is still way too high. I have four daughters, two in college. So this hits people in a very personal way. We could spend all day debating numbers. I'm much more concerned about taking action.

(The SaVE Act) is a substantial step forward because for the first time in a long time we're focused on making sure there's more transparency, that every student knows their rights. And that it's on all of us. Everyone has a role to play — especially young men. For too long they've had no responsibility or accountability. I've said directly to young men, "Don't think that it's not your problem. You can't be a bystander who does nothing. You've got to speak up, be aware, watch for indications of when (bad) conduct might occur." If you know someone who's drunk, who's behaving inappropriately, you've got to act right away.

What I worry about isn't whether the 1-in-5 statistic is accurate, but about underreporting — that young women who are victims are alone or feel like they're alone. The ones who don't engage in a system that they feel won't bring about justice or treat them with the respect they should be accorded as a victim of a horrific crime.'

Unfair treatment alleged in school suits

Mastodon · 17 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'But Joshua Engel, a Mason attorney who is representing students suing Ohio State University, the University of Cincinnati, Ohio University and Marietta College, said universities have a financial motive for unjustly treating the accused.

“Schools are scared,” he said. “They’re scared that if they don’t crack down and show they are tough on allegations of campus sexual assault, that the federal government is going to come in and take all their money. How do they keep the federal government from investigating them and threatening their funding? The way to do that is by throwing kids out of school because that impresses the federal government, evidently.”'

Women And The Draft: How Equal Do We Want To Be?

Mastodon · 18 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If the words “Selective Service” aren’t a call to arms for you, it might be because you are a woman – with no sons. For American young men and their parents, “Selective Service” means “the draft,” and, yes, boys still have to sign up for it.
...
True, the country has not yet re-activated a draft, leaving Selective Service to fade into near obscurity, while our all-volunteer military has fought three more wars. However, the consequences for men who don’t register are immediate and real: up to 5 years in prison, a fine of up $250,000, and ineligibility for government jobs or financial aid.

That’s right; your son can go to jail if he does not register for the Selective Service within 30 days of his 18th birthday.

But don’t worry; your daughters are still safe. They can choose to serve or not. Even if your son has a disability, he must register. But America’s healthiest daughters do not.'

Is The Tide Turning On Phony College Rape?

Mastodon · 18 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Over the past few years, the apparent epidemic of rapes on college campuses (backed by shady statistics) has been the Left's favorite talking point.

But, as rules and laws get continually more stacked against male students–who often face the challenging task of proving their innocence, rather than having their accusor prove guilt–there's the beginnings of backlash.

Male students at the United Kingdom's University of Warwick are up in arms about a class, called "I Heart Consent," that teaches them how to not accidentally rape their partner. No, really.

In an article called, "Why I don't need consent lessons," published by the student newspaper, The Tab, student George Lawlor struck at the very heart of the liberal narrative:

Like any self-respecting individual would, I found this [invitation to the "I Heart Consent" class] to be a massive, painful, bitchy slap in the face… It implies I have an insufficient understanding of what does and does not constitute consent and that's incredibly hurtful. I can't stress that enough.'

Sexual assault “Yes Means Yes” legislation necessary in understanding consent and the accused

Mastodon · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Male students are claiming that a bias against them has resulted in unfair trials in which the accused are not able to submit potential evidence in sexual assault cases. One student at the University of California, San Diego, was accused of sexually assaulting a friend, and in his hearing at the school he attempted to submit text messages as evidence that would have proven that the woman had given consent to the sexual relationship. The submission of the text messages was denied, and the student lost his hearing because he couldn’t prove consent. Later, Superior Court Judge Joel Pressman said, “the hearing against petitioner was unfair,” NPR reported.

It is likely true that some of men who are accused of sexual assault aren’t guilty. But this arguably wouldn’t be an issue if students were taught to cover all of their bases, so to speak. It isn’t difficult to be a decent person. It isn’t difficult to realize that if a person is drunk, you shouldn’t have sex with them, because they aren’t in the right state of mind to give you consent. Herein we tie back to the question of, “what if one person says it’s okay, but decides in the morning they didn’t want it?” It’s simple, really: no matter how many times a person may say something is okay, no one is able to give consent when they are drunk. Period. And if this “Yes Means Yes” legislation begins teaching this fact in the tenth grade when it really starts to matter, then the government is doing its job. We need to learn to play it safe. We need to teach that if you shouldn’t drive a car when you’re drunk, as it could change your life in ways you never imagined, the same goes for sexual conduct.
And that is why it is so important that schools and colleges give everyone a chance for fair trial. All evidence must be submitted and everyone must have a chance to say his or her piece — it’s only fair in the grand scheme of democracy in this country. Because proof of affirmative consent can’t possibly be required, therefore, it’s necessary that all those accused be able to present their cases. We would rather see someone falsely accused than see someone avoid coming forward for fear of retribution for wrongly accusing someone.
...
All roads lead back to education here. If “Yes Means Yes” influences students to act responsibly and colleges and universities to maintain fairness in all sexual assault cases, then by all means, let’s start implementing this legislation into every state education system.'

Man sues university, accuser in sex-assault allegation

Mastodon · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The Brown University students met last October at a party where they flirted and kissed. Their intimacy escalated later in his dormitory room. But what he viewed as consensual groping and fondling, the woman claimed were unwanted sexual advances that spiraled into an assault.

She filed a sexual-misconduct complaint with the Ivy League school, and that led to his suspension for 2-1/2 years. Now, as a plaintiff named John Doe, he is suing the school in U.S. District Court. He accuses Brown of violating his due process rights and discriminating against him based on his gender, in violation of Title IX.

In another lawsuit brought by the same lawyer in the same court, a John Doe, of Texas is suing a Jane Doe, of California, accusing her of defaming and slandering him by filing a false sexual-misconduct report that led to his 2-1/2-year suspension from an "elite" liberal-arts university in Rhode Island and his being labeled as responsible for a sexual offense. That lawsuit does not name Brown but details the same chronology.'

'5 Signs You Might Be Dating A "Man-Child"'

Mastodon · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The idea of a boy who never grows up is promoted and even romanticized in our culture as sexy and just "the way men are." Sadly women often pay the price for such a prize. There are consequences to keeping this type of "man" in check. She does the work for two and he coasts by. This may partly explain why men, by and large, benefit more from marriage than do women.

Marriage brings for most men greater happiness, physical health and greater wealth than their bachelor counterparts. Women on the other hand, can't take for granted that they too will reap these same benefits. In fact, for women benefiting from marriage or long-term partnership is dependent upon the quality of the partnership.'

Australia: Premier warned: don't put domestic violence against men above women

Mastodon · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The premier of Queensland has been warned not to recognise male victims of domestic violence at the expense of women after she said she had changed her language to include male victims.

Annastacia Palaszczuk, who has committed to ending domestic violence, told a community cabinet event violence against men is something that needs to be addressed more.

“I do understand that there are a number of men have gone through or are going through [domestic violence],” she said on Sunday, according to Fairfax Media.

“I actually did change my language when it did become public because it was brought to my attention that there was some serious issues surrounding some men in our community needing help as well.'

UK: Schools to Appoint 'Gender Champions' to Police 'Sexist Language'

Mastodon · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'UK schools will appoint ‘gender champions’ tasked with monitoring the language of schoolchildren as young as five in order to stamp out sexist terms such as “sissy”, “cupcake” and to challenge stereotypes.

Under new guidelines to be published tomorrow, senior teachers will be named ‘gender champions’ in schools to help headteachers promote ‘male subjects’ – science, economics, technology, engineering, and mathematics – to girls, while pushing boys towards humanities and languages.

The aim of the guidelines, drawn up by the Institute of Physics (a London-based scientific charity that works to advance physics education) and promoted by the Department for Education, is to eliminate gender stereotyping in schools from the outset, targeting pupils as young as five-years-old.

The Institute’s Professor Peter Main told The Sunday Times:

“The government is backing this. They have told us to send our good practice guide to every school in the country. Sexist language has a considerable impact but in our research we found that it was often dismissed as just banter and was much more common than teachers were aware of.”

Examples of the oppressive language to be targeted have come to light after a pilot programme was run in some schools. At one, volunteer girls were assigned with the task of spotting sexist language in the playground and reporting the perpetrators to staff.'

Father speaks out after college-athlete son cleared of rape: ‘How many young men have to have their lives destroyed?’

Mastodon · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excrrpt:

'A young man falsely accused of rape during college was recently cleared by the courts. A father and mother can breathe again as their 24-year-old son applies to grad schools, his bachelor’s degree earned and his season of turmoil behind him.

But for the Mock family of North Carolina, getting to the place they’re at now had a steep price. Careers ruined. Dreams dashed. Athletic glory denied.

C.D. Mock said he believes he recently lost his job as wrestling coach at the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill in part because of his son’s ordeal.

As for Corey Mock, he enrolled at the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga a talented wrestler, and going into his senior year last fall was ranked fourth in the nation. It was set to be one the most exciting, challenging and fulfilling years of his life.'

UK: The Women’s Equality Party would criminalise buying sex and de-criminalize selling it

Mastodon · 20 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Under WE's proposals, those who sell sex will not be criminalised, and the party would remove from law the few scenarios, such as kerb-crawling and soliciting in a public place, under which sex workers can currently be prosecuted. Sophie Walker, leader of the party, said at the launch that the party would aim to begin criminalising sex buyers within two years of establishing support and exiting services for current sex workers.
...
The document also argues that only a "small percentage" of sex workers work voluntarily and independently of pimps or drug abuse.

This approach runs contrary to the views of many campaigning sex workers, who are pushing for decriminalisation of the industry. A recent (and controversial) Amnesty report on sex work also called for decrimanilisation, as opposed to the Nordic approach.'

--

Paying for sex has become a lifestyle choice for thousands of UK career women

'As well as paying men for their time between the sheets, women are also prepared to pay for "companionship".

The so-called "boyfriend experience" involves male escorts meeting up with their female clients and going for a drink or a meal before progressing onto a massage and then sex.

And business is so brisk that the number of men offering paid sexual services to women in the UK has TRIPLED over the last five years to more than 15,000.'

UK: MP pushes for greater numbers of women in STEM careers

Mastodon · 20 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In response, Ms Morgan said: "It is good to see that maths A-level is now the most popular A-level. We've got more girls studying STEM subjects both at GCSEs and A-levels.

"But the issue is that women are concentrated in less well paid occupations. Women are 92 per cent of secretaries, 94 per cent of child care assistants but only 7 per cent of engineers and 20 per cent of architects. Again that has to change.'

Bath MP Ben Howlett is pushing for greater numbers of women to pursue careers in science, technology, engineering and mathematics.

The MP has pressed the Secretary of State for Women and Equalities to do more to improve these numbers.

Addressing Nicky Morgan in the House of Commons Chamber, Mr Howlett said: "A recent report by CASE found that when parents were asked what type of job they want their child to pursue when they finish education, there was a clear gender bias with parents wanting for their son a career in engineering and for their daughter a career in nursing.

"Does the Minister agree that it is crucial we break down these barriers?
...
"There should be no gendered careers, women make excellent engineers and similarly men make excellent nurses.

"We should be striving for complete gender equality in this country, and by turning our focus to the next generation, we have the chance to make this a reality."'

Women have substantial advantage in STEM faculty hiring, except when competing against more-accomplished men

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Audits of tenure-track hiring reveal faculty prefer to hire female applicants over males. However, audit data do not control for applicant quality, allowing some to argue women are hired at higher rates because they are more qualified. To test this, Williams and Ceci (2015) conducted an experiment demonstrating a preference for hiring women over identically-qualified men. While their findings are consistent with audits, they raise the specter that faculty may prefer women over even more-qualified men, a claim made recently. We evaluated this claim in the present study: 158 faculty ranked two men and one woman for a tenure-track-assistant professorship, and 94 faculty ranked two women and one man. In the former condition, the female applicant was slightly weaker than her two male competitors, although still strong; in the other condition the male applicant was slightly weaker than his two female competitors, although still strong. Faculty of both genders and in all fields preferred the more-qualified men over the slightly-less-qualified women, and they also preferred the stronger women over the slightly-less-qualified man. This suggests that preference for women among identically-qualified applicants found in experimental studies and in audits does not extend to women whose credentials are even slightly weaker than male counterparts. Thus these data give no support to the twin claims that weaker males are chosen over stronger females or weaker females are hired over stronger males.'

UK: Sexist banter 'should be tackled' in schools

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An Institute of Physics (IoP) guide argues schools do not take sexist "banter" as seriously as they do racist or homophobic language.

This can lead to gender stereotyping and turn girls away from studying science subjects as often as boys.

"No woman should feel that their gender is a barrier to their success," the government said.

The guide, Opening Doors, to be presented at a conference hosted by the IoP, also urged teachers to reflect on their own language to ensure they are "not inadvertently transmitting negative messages".

It is based on the results of interviews with staff and young people in 10 schools in England.'

Students: Transgender Woman Can’t Be Diversity Officer Because She’s a White Man Now

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A student who was born female felt perfectly comfortable identifying as a man at Wellesley College — until people said he shouldn’t be class diversity officer because he is now a white male.

Timothy Boatwright was born a girl, and checked off the “female” box when applying to the Massachusetts all-women’s school, according to an article in the New York Times. But when he got there, he introduced himself as a “masculine-of-center genderqueer” person named “Timothy” (the name he picked for himself) and asked them to use male pronouns when referring to him.

And, by all accounts, Boatwright felt welcome on campus — until the day he announced that he wanted to run for the school’s office of multicultural affairs coordinator, whose job is to promote a “culture of diversity” on campus.

But some students thought that allowing Boatwright to have the position would just perpetuate patriarchy. They were so opposed, in fact, that when the other three candidates (all women of color) dropped out, they started an anonymous Facebook campaign encouraging people not to vote at all to keep him from winning the position.'

Male Student Suspended for Sexual Misconduct Takes on the University and His Accuser

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'After being found responsible for sexual misconduct by a campus kangaroo court, a Brown University student is taking the unusual step of suing the university and suing his accuser. He's accusing Brown of violating its own policies after putting him through a campus judicial proceeding that — as described in the complaint — would make any self-respecting lawyer recoil in disgust. The plaintiff, who goes by "John Doe" in the complaint, paints a picture of a university that was committed to punishing him from the start, exhibiting bias at every stage of the campus process.

John Doe is suing his accuser for making "false and defamatory statements" — focusing on her own contradictory testimony and on the substantial gap between her statements to Brown officials and John Doe's evidence, including pictures and text messages. Doe's defamation suit is extraordinary. Rarely do men accused of sexual assault directly confront their accusers — typically choosing to take on the school alone. But if John Doe succeeds, look for more defamation suits against accusers — if for no other reason than leverage against the university (many women will have quite a story to tell of campus activists urging them on, coaching them on how to obtain campus convictions.)

Unless and until universities stop the witch hunt and start referring law enforcement matters to competent courts, there will only be more litigation. Ideologues on campus demand more campus prosecutions. The Obama administration demands more campus prosecutions. Yet kangaroo courts can't fabricate rape, they can only fabricate verdicts. And when they do, they'll face a plaintiff's bar hungry for a chunk of the university's endowment.'

Congressional staffers briefed on campus due process needs

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Because due process rights aren't apparently considered when discussing campus sexual assault, congressional staffers on Monday had to be briefed about them by the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education.

FIRE staffers Joseph Cohn, Shelby Emmett and Samantha Harris met with congressional staffers to discuss the lack of due process rights afforded to college students accused of sexual assault, and provided analysis of current legislation on the subject.

FIRE discussed the need for accused students to have access to the evidence against them (because such an obvious right is currently not afforded to college students) and the elimination of conflicts of interest among campus investigators. Currently, the person investigating a sexual assault claim can also be an advocate for the accuser, producing a clear bias for an allegedly impartial investigator.'

--

Also see: FIRE Briefs Congressional Staffers on Due Process

Campus sexual assault policies, at U and elsewhere, drawing scrutiny

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Weeks into her freshman year at the University of Minnesota, Courtney Blake was sexually assaulted in her dorm room. She reported it to campus officials, rather than police.

Though the young man argued the sex was consensual, he was found to have violated the student conduct code and put on disciplinary probation, given mandatory counseling and assigned to write a paper, according to an investigation document. Blake was moved to another dorm.

Less than a year later, Blake was assaulted at an off-campus party by a different student. This time, she turned to the police as well as campus officials, but quickly learned the justice system's limitations. She got a more tangible response from the U, which expelled her assailant.

...

Critics of these internal investigations say colleges and universities are ill-equipped to handle cases that in a courtroom would constitute a felony. Because schools don't have subpoena power, investigators and panels have to make decisions based on whatever evidence they can get.

"They lack a lot of critical powers that law enforcement has," said Samantha Harris, director of policy research at the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education. "This is why you don't see university judiciaries adjudicating murder cases."'

New York Times Reveals Stupidity of ‘Yes Means Yes’ Sexual Assault Policies

Mastodon · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week the New York Times published a balanced news story that inadvertently revealed the stupidity of “Yes Means Yes” policies. Those policies redefine a great deal of consensual sex andtouching as “sexual assault,” and effectively require college students to engage in “state-mandated dirty talk” during sexual encounters (as one supporter of “Yes Means Yes” policiesgloated). That potentially violates the Constitution, and such policies have led to costly lawsuits against colleges that have such policies.

By printing ideologically inconvenient truths, the Times allowed the stupidity of “Yes Means Yes” policies to shine through, rather than covering up their stupidity. This was remarkable for theTimes, which usually can’t cover social issues or discuss thefailures of big government withoutinjecting its usual doctrinaire left-wing slant. It quotes the developer of the “Yes Means Yes” curriculum admitting that under “Yes Means Yes,” “you have to say ‘yes’ every 10 minutes” during a sexual encounter to avoid sexual assault charges, resulting in constant awkward communication:

“‘What does that mean — you have to say “yes” every 10 minutes?’ asked Aidan Ryan, 16, who sat near the front of the room.

“‘Pretty much,’ Ms. Zaloom answered.”'

India: Dowry charge slapped on dead man: Wife and her family register FIR a day after her husband killed himself 'to counter abetment to suicide charge'

Matt · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A case of dowry has been registered against a dead man.

On October 5, 30-year-old banker Rakesh Pilania jumped from his apartment in an upscale Gurgaon locality. His family alleges that he committed suicide out of fear of being implicated under Section 498A of the IPC (cruelty against wife by husband or his relatives).

His wife, meanwhile, registered a dowry harassment case against her husband and his family a day after Rakesh died.

Though Rakesh is no more, proceedings under Section 498A would continue against his family.

Experts say Rakesh's case brings to the fore the misuse of section 498A and its grave consequences, including suicide.

"In this case, the FIR seems to be an attempt at evading action for abetment to suicide. Even after the man's death, his family would have to face a legal battle," says Deepika Bhardwaj, a journalist and filmmaker, currently working on a documentary on possible misuses of the controversial penal section.'

SAVE: Affirmative Consent -- NY Times Article Elicits Derision and Outrage: ‘We have let the radicals hijack this issue’

Matt · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Press release here. Excerpt:

'A recent New York Times article about affirmative consent, “Sex Ed Lesson: ‘Yes Means Yes,’ But It’s Tricky,” is triggering a strong negative public response. The article details the confused reactions of California high school students who are being instructed to ask permission for sexual activities every 10 minutes, or risk being adjudged guilty of rape.

The highest-rated reader reaction to the NYT account deplored how “The yes-means-yes standard turns almost all of us into rapists. We have let the radicals hijack this issue with disastrous results for innocent young people.”

Another reader commented ironically, “As far as I can tell, the new ‘affirmative consent’ paradigm allows for a very realistic possibility of two adults raping each other at the same time, which makes a mockery of the whole concept of rape.”

The NYT article has triggered numerous editorials, as well. Washington Examiner writer Ashe Schow charged, “If you don’t have sex the way the government tells you to, you’re a rapist.” Columnist Blake Neff wrote, “some kids are getting the impression they need to set a timer during their intimate encounters to make sure their casual hookup doesn’t accidentally become a rape.”'

NPO: Europe Moves Towards Shared Parenting

Matt · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The International Council on Shared Parenting (ICSP) is a dynamic young European-based organization that is pulling together a wealth of leading-edge information about shared parenting that is often hard to find in the United States. It is holding its second International Conference on Shared Parenting in Bonn, Germany from December 9 to 11, 2015. The primary language of the conference will be English; a few presentations will be given in French or German, in which case there will be simultaneous translation into English.

Best airport from North America: Frankfurt, then high speed train to Bonn. Or combine a fabulous trip to Paris or Amsterdam with an easy train ride to Bonn. The dollar is strong, so your timing is perfect.'

Actor Mickey Rooney badly abused by wife and son for years before death

Matt · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'For her part, Jan, 76, who now lives with Chris at his house (and receives $100,000 a year from Rooney's SAG pension and Social Security benefits), insists that she has been falsely accused and characterizes her late husband's Senate testimony as coerced and unreliable. "Mickey was a 90-year-old man who was in and out of it mentally and was easily influenced by other people," she explains.

Only now will the public learn that the alleged debasement was not just financial but physical, too. Numerous family members and others close to Rooney say the small-statured actor frequently was abused by Jan, his wife of 36 years, who weighed twice what he did. THR also has learned that she was struggling with mental health issues during this time. These close acquaintances also say Rooney — who himself was arrested in 1997 by the Ventura County Sheriff's Department on suspicion of hitting Jan during a fight (the case was dropped) — was bloodied and bruised in multiple altercations, in his final years emerging as a feeble man lying to his doctor about why he was being treated for this black eye or that missing tooth. While Rooney always denied spousal abuse, multiple sources tell THR that, when confronted, Jan herself acknowledged assaults. In a long interview with THR via email, Jan is adamant that "I never physically abused Mickey, but we had some minor pushing scuffles, tempers flared when we were angry. Sometimes it was his fault, sometimes mine. We always made up." (As a condition of answering questions, she insisted that THR publish a transcript. ...'

China: Gay man tortured and beaten in horrific clinic ordeal to 'cure' his homosexuality

Matt · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. I have to wonder, does this really also happen to gay women there, too? The article says it happens to both, but gay men tend to receive the most frequent and harshest persecution in societies where there is institutionalized intolerance of homosexuality as compared to gay women. Excerpt:

'The documentary reveals how the activist Chen Wei is electrocuted, drugged and beaten, and even told his homosexuality was either a curse from his dead parents who were haunting him - or caused by grief over his dead pet parrot.

There are reportedly thousands of clinics containing everything from quack doctors through to exorcists in China, claiming that they can cure homosexuality and help gay men and women return to "normal lives".

As he undergoes the abuse, brave Chen from the capital Beijing secretly filmed what was going on.

He approached the clinic claiming that he was confused about his sexual orientation and did not understand why he was attracted to other men.

In the documentary, Chen Wei is exposed to dangerous electric shock therapy and drugs, which the clinic's doctor promised would cure his "disease" within three days.'

'No circumcision for my son – it's not moral'

Matt · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Why do we circumcise our baby boys?

Most of us automatically answer it because that's the custom, that it is a mitzvah, to honor the family, or because it's healthy. Few of us give further thought to the ancient practice.

Rani Kasher, 54, a father of six children between the ages of 11 and 23, a coordinator of a cultural center in Kfar Giladi, a lecturer on nature and owner of a printing house, undertook the mission of bringing to the public's attention the true meaning of the act of cutting the foreskin.'

The Boy Crisis: A Sobering look at the State of our Boys

Matt · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here. Description:

'What is causing a worldwide Boy Crisis and how do we resolve it. A sobering look at the current state of Boys in our society and what we must understand before we can help them.

Dr. Warren Farrell is an American educator, activist and author of seven books on men's and women's issues., including the international bestsellers, Why Men Are the Way they Are, plus The Myth of Male Power. He is the only man in the U.S. to be elected three times to the Board of the National Organization for Women in NYC. and he is Chair of the Commission to Create a White House Council on Boys and Men. Warren has appeared on more than 1000 TV and radio shows, including numerous “ratings periods” for Oprah. GQ calls him (2015) the Martin Luther King of the men’s movement. Warren is currently co-authoring with John Gray the forthcoming The Boy Crisis.'

Lessons from dismissed campus due process lawsuits

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Students who have been found responsible for campus sexual assault and are expelled sometimes sue their universities. But they have had mixed success in the federal courts.

The Washington Examiner spoke with one lawyer, Andrew Miltenberg, who has filed many cases on behalf of accused students. He described what he's learned from cases that have been dismissed.

"I've learned that the federal courts are very good courts but that they're reluctant to grasp on to this issue of bias or prejudice, unless it appears to be widespread," Miltenberg said. "And one of the problems is that in any one of these cases you're only really looking at a singular event."'

Canada's feminist Prime Minister Justin Trudeau targets GamerGate in anti-misogyny call to action

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'New Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has described himself as a proud feminist and named GamerGate as an example of an issue that society needs "to stand clearly" against. He made the comments only a few days after winning the national election as leader of the Liberal Party.

Speaking in a recent TV interview (via The Star) Trudeau said: "Yes, Yes. I am a feminist. Proud to be a feminist. My mom raised me to be a feminist. My father raised me, he was a different generation, but he raised me to respect and defend everyone's rights, and I deeply grounded my own identity in that, and I am proud to say that I am a feminist. The things we see online, whether it is issues like Gamergate, or video games misogyny in popular culture, it is something that we need to stand clearly against."'

Anti-Feminist Speaker Disinvited to ‘Uncomfortable Learning’ Lecture Series

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A student group at Williams College that hosts speakers who challenge the campus's biases has rescinded a speaking invitation to Suzanne Venker, a conservative author and vocal critic of feminism, in response to furious condemnation from other students.

The decision to disinvite Venker is steeped in irony, given that the group's lecture series is called “Uncomfortable Learning,” and the sole reason for ditching Venker seems to be that she was a good fit.'

Why one activist thinks we need a men's movement

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This is why when I think about manhood in our 21st-century context, I think instantly of mayhem, confusion, violence. These things have come in the form of one mass shooter after another, murdering people at work, on military bases, on college campuses, in grade schools. These things have come in the form of misogynistic comments from men as different in pedigree as billionaire presidential candidate Donald Trump and Grammy Award-winning rapper T.I. These things have come in the form of my travel as a speaker and activist, reading local newspaper stories of men and boys, more aggressively and brutally than ever, raping or killing women and girls, oftentimes their girlfriends or wives.

It is clear to me that manhood in this nation is in deep crisis, our growth stunted at epidemic proportions. Meanwhile, few are talking about or doing anything remotely close to addressing the issue. When we brace ourselves for the next mass murder, we are quick to cite gun control and mental illness, but rarely do we ask, Why are the overwhelming majority of these mass shooters men? When we see poor men in poor communities blow each other away with guns, quite a few of us utter a litany of socioeconomic factors, but rarely do I hear, Why are these boys-to-men doing this to themselves, to each other?'

Feminists Angry a Man Won’t Help Them Negotiate Their Salaries

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'If a man dares to answer a question about feminism, he better be prepared for the backlash if he doesn’t give the acceptable response. But since it seems like even feminists don’t know what they want men to say, good luck to him figuring out what that acceptable answer is.

Even in liberal Hollywood. Take for example The Avengers actor Jeremy Renner’s response to the question, “Would he be willing to negotiate alongside his female co-stars on future projects?” asked by Business Insider UK, Oct.20 during a press conference.

First, some context. Renner’s American Hustle co-star Jennifer Lawrence recently penned an open-letter, highly-lauded by the media, where she explained her shock in finding out how little she made compared to her male co-stars and how she had been afraid to negotiate for a higher salary because she didn’t want to be perceived as spoiled.

Now, the media is buzzing about equal pay in Hollywood and hunting down actors to see if their opinions on equal pay match up to the feminist dogma.

So Renner responded to the question of whether or not he’d help a female co-star get more money, saying, “That’s not my job. I don’t know contracts and money and all that sort of stuff.”

He went on to say he supported equal pay for women in Hollywood but he’s there to focus on his acting, not on everyone’s salaries. “I’m a performer and I know human behavior. When it comes to that sort of stuff I let other people deal with that,” said Renner. “I do what I’m good at, that's what I focus on,” he stated.'

A Disadvantaged Start Hurts Boys More Than Girls

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Boys are falling behind. They graduate from high school and attend college at lower rates than girls and are more likely to get in trouble, which can hurt them when they enter the job market. This gender gap exists across the United States, but it is far bigger for poor people and for black people. As society becomes more unequal, it seems, it hurts boys more.

New research from social scientists offers one explanation: Boys are more sensitive than girls to disadvantage. Any disadvantage, like growing up in poverty, in a bad neighborhood or without a father, takes more of a toll on boys than on their sisters. That realization could be a starting point for educators, parents and policy makers who are trying to figure out how to help boys — particularly those from black, Latino and immigrant families.'

WaPo: Elementary Kids Should be Taught How to Get and Give Sexual Consent

Mastodon · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'While parents everywhere dread giving “the birds and the bees” talk to their kids, they might have to prepare for something even more complicated: Trying to explain to their child what the teacher's lesson on consensual sex actually means.

In an op-ed for The Washington Post Oct. 14, feminist activist Annie E. Clark whined, “Why are we waiting until college to learn about consent?” She went on to argue that it was necessary for elementary and middle school-age children to be taught about how to give and receive sexual consent.

“The first time students hear ‘consent’ should not be at their first-year [freshman] orientation,” she wrote. This is a “public health issue," and can be talked about in an “age-appropriate way,” she argued.

Really curious to see the Sesame Street episode on that.

What the Post declined to disclose outright, is that Clark also happens to be one of the prominent players in CNN’s smearing college-rape documentary,The Hunting Ground.

'The Hunting Ground' predicted for Oscar nomination

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The campus sexual assault propaganda film "The Hunting Ground" will be in the running for an Oscar, according to predictions from Variety editor Kristopher Tapley.
...
But "The Hunting Ground" is not a documentary about a horrific epidemic of violence across the U.S., it is a propaganda film based on false statistics and inaccurate accounts of accusers. The film relies heavily on the claim that 1-in-5 women will be sexually assaulted in college, a statistic that has been debunked time and time again as the result of biased and flawed studies.

It also relies on the "expertise" of researcher David Lisak, whose own study claiming that campuses are hotbeds for serial rapists was debunked just a couple months ago. Lisak's study, which has been used to legitimize eviscerating due process rights for accused students, wasn't even about sexual assaults that occur on campus.

Beyond the faulty statistics, the accusations in the film haven't held up to scrutiny, either. The film presents Kamilah Willingham's accusation as evidence that schools let violent offenders back on campus after finding them responsible for sexual assault. But the man Willingham accused, while found responsible and suspended from Harvard University, was found guilty in a court of law of only "misdemeanor touching of a nonsexual nature." The reason for this was that Willingham was not a credible witness.'

UK: Women's Equality Party calls for quotas for female MPs

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'At a policy launch in London, Ms Walker, herself a former journalist, said many of the problems facing women were a product of the fact they were not "equal decision makers", whether in politics, business or other areas of public life..

"We have made some progress but the path to shared power is taking too long to pave," she said. "So we have concluded that as a temporary measure quotas are necessary."

It was lamentable, she said, that women still made up less than a third of the Commons - 191 of the UK's 650 MPs.

"We will put Parliament into special measures for two elections. Political parties should field women in two thirds of seats, including two thirds of safe seats. We can have a 50:50 Parliament in a decade."

She also called for 75% of new peers to be women and for all publicly listed companies to have a 50:50 gender ratio on their boards and executive committees by 2025.'

UK: "Why I'm a male supporter of the Women's Equality Party"

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Positive discrimination is so often viewed as a negative. The naysayers complain that it goes against the very ideals on which ‘equality’ is founded and that it becomes exclusive, rather than inclusive.

I’d hazard that most of those dissenting voices are, again, ‘male, stale and pale’. They’re a section of society that has, for so, so long, had a grip on the reins of power, and they’re unwilling to see the damage it does. If you believe that people can rise on merit alone, regardless of gender, race or social class, then you have to believe that white men are just better than everyone else – which is clearly ridiculous. So it’s time to force those white, male hands to loosen their grip - or they never will.

...

So here’s a call to the white, middle class men (like me), who don’t know how easy they’ve had it thus far. If you want to live in the same world I do, support the introduction of gender quotas and be prepared to step aside. Don‘t despair if you’re overlooked for a job that goes to a woman. Instead, rejoice! You’ve just done your bit for society – and that should feel good.'

The Man Who Defends Men Accused Of Campus Rape

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last December, James Clark* was finishing his first semester as a sophomore at a prestigious New England liberal-arts college when he received an email saying the dean wanted to speak with him. On the phone, the dean informed him that a female classmate had reported Clark for sexual misconduct. An official process began. School investigators began conducting an inquiry into the incident, and a no-contact order was issued, requiring Clark to keep his distance from the accuser while dates for future interviews with the dean were scheduled. Clark was shocked — he'd thought what happened that night was consensual. As a transfer student, he was new on campus, but had made a few friends. They were supportive, but after that phone call, he was essentially alone. Just as their classmates were finishing finals and embarking on winter break, Clark and his accuser were caught in a narrative that would alter the course of their lives forever. From then on, they would be weighted down by the same albatross: She would be the woman who believes she was sexually assaulted, and he would be the man who believes he was falsely accused of assaulting her. [The Cut was unable to reach Clark's accuser for comment.]'

Suzanne Venker: What I wanted to tell students at Williams College

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'As you know, feminism is a large umbrella for an enormous range of topics — from its signature issue, abortion, to sex and relationships, women in the workplace, marriage, divorce, domestic violence, women in the military and work-family balance.

There isn't a person among us who doesn't have a stake in at least one of these issues.

But they are not "women's issues," as the media often claim. They are everyone's issues.

Men have opinions on these matters as well, as they should, yet their voices are rarely heard.

Same goes for women who don't consider themselves feminists — which, for the record, is most women.

We hear from feminists the most for good reason.

A. Feminists pride themselves on being the arbiter of all things female.

B. They have the microphone. Indeed, the feminist elite run the show.

The feminist elite is comprised of left-leaning professors, journalists, writers, psychologists, actresses and lawyers whose beliefs have seeped into the culture to such a degree that anyone who takes a non-feminist view of any topic is branded either sexist or a misogynist.

This group uses their clout to bully people into silence, and the result is a lack of reasonable dialogue.

Since people don't wish to be attacked for simply questioning an idea, they say nothing — giving feminists free reign of the conversation.

I'm sure you've heard a lot over the years about liberal media bias, but feminist bias is an offshoot of that — and it's far more toxic.

As former CBS News journalist Bernard Goldberg wrote in his book "Bias," "I know a few top male producers who would rather walk barefoot on cut glass while drinking Drano than have to face the Missus back home after giving the green light to a story on the excesses of feminism."

There are even doctors, scientists and researchers in this country who can't publish their findings if what they've discovered undermines a feminist worldview. That's the insidious nature of feminist bias.'

Feminist Professor: Chemically Castrate Men Who “Harass” Women

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"Chicago Professor and cultural critic Laura Kipnis – whose work has been published by Slate and the New York Times – thinks that men who “harass” women should be chemically castrated and publicly executed.

If this is what influential college professors are telling young women, is it any wonder that we’re seeing an acceleration of the Sexodus? Men checking out of dating and relationships because they’ve completely given up on approaching women.'

Before you complain about 'patriarchy'

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'So last week, gay conservative writer Milo Yiannopoulos declared October 18 ”World Patriarchy Day.”

Yiannopoulos wrote: “Feminists like to claim that there is a sinister cultural phenomenon known as the ‘patriarchy,’ through which all men, especially if they are white, contribute to a set of values and social norms that marginalise and exclude women. What a load of old (bull). I honestly can’t believe people fall for this rubbish. So, in an attempt to redress the imbalance between fact and fantasy, World Patriarchy Day is the day on which you should feel free to express your masculinity in the most odiously toxic manner imaginable.”
...
But it led Rachel Edwards to write a thoughtful piece noting that there isn’t actually a patriarchy, at least not in the West, where one hears the most complaints. “Feminism can only exist in the kinds of countries that are doing so well that they don’t have to consider eating rats for much needed sustenance. It can only exist in a place with enough human rights to care that you as a woman are a little upset. Feminism can only exist in countries where women can be smart enough to understand the concept of oppression, yet stupid and coddled enough to believe that such words describe the country that they live in. In fact, a country has to care about women, period, for feminism to even be a thing.”'

Mom charged with deprivation of parental rights in connection to missing daughters

Mastodon · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The mother of two Lakeville girls who went missing in 2013 was arrested in Florida on Sunday.

Sandra Grazzini-Rucki, 50, was charged in August in Dakota County with three counts of deprivation of parental rights in connection with the disappearance of her daughters Gianna, 15, and Samantha, 17.

The charges were not made public until Grazzini-Rucki's arrest by U.S. Marshals early Sunday.

Detectives have learned a network of people is taking the girls and keeping them in hiding, police said. They have made a list of "persons of interest" in the case.'

Feds Have Spent More on Origami Condoms, Fat Lesbian Studies Than on Benghazi Committee

Matt · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The amount of taxpayer funding that has gone toward the investigation into the terrorist attack in Benghazi, Libya, is less than the amount the federal government has invested in “Origami condoms” and studies on why lesbians are obese.

...

The National Institutes of Health (NIH) gave$2,466,482 to Daniel Resnic to develop three versions of the Origami condom, including the “first of its kind” anal condom. Resnic was later accused of wasting the money on full-body plastic surgery, trips to Costa Rica, parties at the Playboy mansion, and patents for inventions such as “rounded corners.”

The NIH has also given $3,531,925 to researchers to determine why lesbians are obese and gay men are not. Results have included: gay men have a “greater desire for toned muscles” than straight men, lesbians have low “athletic self-esteem,” and young men think about their muscles.'

The phony campus rape crisis

Matt · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In August 2012, two rapes by unknown assailants were reported at Harvard University, sending the school into crisis. Police cruisers idled around the campus; uniformed and plainclothes officers came out in force. Students were advised not to walk alone. A member of the undergraduate council called for the closing of Harvard Yard. “I thought Cambridge wasn’t a dangerous area,” a freshman told the student newspaper. “It was Harvard—it was supposed to be safe, academic.” (In fact, Harvard still was safe. The campus authorities ultimately deemed at least one of the rape allegations baseless, judging by the FBI’s Uniform Crime Reports. Since Harvard never disclosed the outcome of either of its investigations, its findings regarding the other supposed incident remain secret.)
...
Why the disparity between administrative talk and action? Harvard, after all, is not the only college capable of forcefully responding to alleged rape. In the fall of 2014, the University of Virginia doubled down on security after a student was abducted and presumed raped (the girl was later found to have been killed). If Drew Gilpin Faust and her fellow presidents really believe that they are presiding over a crime scene of what would be unprecedented proportions, they should at the least radically revamp their admissions procedures to prevent sex fiends from joining the student body, if not provide round-the-clock protection to female students.

Nothing of the sort ever happens, however. And that is because there is no such crime wave on college campuses—according to the alleged victims themselves. The vast majority of survey respondents whom the AAU researchers classified as sexual assault victims never reported their alleged assaults to their colleges’ various confidential rape hotlines, sexual assault resource centers, or Title IX offices, much less to campus or city police. And the overwhelming reason why the alleged victims did not report is that they did not think that what happened to them was that serious. At Harvard, over 69 percent of female respondents who checked the box for penetration by use of force did not report the incident to any authority. Most of those non-reporters—65 percent—did not think their experience was serious enough to report. This outcome is inconceivable in the case of real rape. No woman who has actually been raped would think that the rape was not serious enough to report. The White House Council on Women and Girls, echoing campus rape dogma, maintains that colleges are churning out legions of traumatized rape “survivors,” who go on to experience a lifetime of physical and emotional disability. Apparently these victims are so shellshocked that they don’t even realize how disabled they are.'

Gloria Steinem’s laughable excuse for feminism’s bad rep

Mastodon · 24 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Countless women refuse to call themselves “feminists,” and Gloria Steinem knows why: It’s Rush Limbaugh’s fault.

And, no, it’s not funny.

The ur-feminist stopped by “CBS This Morning” on Friday to promote her new book. Host Norah O’Donnell began by noting that Meryl Streep “doesn’t consider herself a feminist. She says she considers herself a humanist. Why is it that the feminist label do you think has that —”

Steinem broke in, rushing to insist that Streep says she’s both — and, anyway, it’s Limbaugh who’s given feminism a bad name, because he “talks about feminazis every day.”

Sorry, Gloria: The brand turned sour long before Rush ever launched his first rant — a victim of its own leaders.'

American Academia's War on Due Process

Mastodon · 24 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'We are still, for the most part, a nation of laws, except on college campuses.

At the Heritage Foundation recently, Samantha Harris, director of policy research at the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), said that "students have complained about the lack of due process" at colleges. "In the last five years, thanks to unprecedented intrusion by the federal government…due process has gotten a lot worse," she said. Too often, accused students are left "without a hearing or [cannot] confront their accuser" in court, Harris averred. By her estimate, "more than 60 students have filed lawsuits" of unfair treatment by colleges by withholding due process.

She said that in her travels, people ask, "Why are colleges handling rape cases?" Her answer? "The short answer is Title IX." "Over the years," Harris pointed out, "reports and administrative agencies have expanded the meaning of discrimination to sexual assaults," rapes and other types of cases. Title IX has "inserted the agency directly into the minutia" of sexual assault cases that have gotten media attention. The Office of Civil Rights (OCR) at the Department of Education discourages cross-examination by college administrators, which is considered an essential part of a fair trial by lawyers. If a college rejects this Title IX directive from the OCR, it is found to be out of compliance and will see their its federal funding revoked.'

Gynocentrism in Men's Rights Movement - Blessing in disguise or unwarranted hurdle?

Mastodon · 24 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In a world otherwise grappled with the thoughts of male-chauvinism and privileges of being a male, a movement that talked about the issues faced by men and the need for their rights was sensational in itself.
This sensationalism took the men's rights movement in India to a much elevated platform wherein, within a very short span of time, the men's rights activists were able to sensitize the Indian parliament about some of the issues that face men and get them thinking about those issues.
...
At the same time, a parallel development was taking place. Many women, who were at the receiving end of feminism and Gynocentrism in the society, resorted to men's rights movement. They took up the cause and started talking about men and their issues.

And, this gave rise to a new phenomenon which even the mainstream media showed more keenness to highlight and that phenomena was - "Women in Men's Rights Movement for the sake of brevity.

Many a times, we are approached by journalists who want to talk about this particular aspect - "Women in MRM!"

For sure, it gives impetus to the movement as the talk goes around but what are the hidden messages carried by this phrase?
...
Therefore, this Gynocentrism in men's rights movement needs to stop as it is not a blessing in disguise; it's rather an unwarranted hurdle.

And before we end it, it's important to understand that it's not the Women in the MRM who are responsible for "Women in MRM!" but it's the men in the movement and the men in the society who are responsible for it. They want a feminine certification for everything and this is something men need to introspect themselves and overcome the need for feminine certification.

If we cannot reform ourselves, we should stop thinking about reforming the society.'

Women’s Groups Urge Colleges and Government to Rein In Social Media

ThomasI · 25 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Seventy-two women’s and civil-rights groups on Wednesday announced a campaign to enlist the federal government in pressuring colleges to protect students from harassment via anonymous social-media applications like Yik Yak.

The groups have sent the U.S. Education Department a letter calling for it to treat colleges’ failure to monitor anonymous social media and to pursue online harassers as a violation of federal civil-rights laws guaranteeing equal educational access.

The letter says many colleges have cited "vague First Amendment concerns" to shirk their obligation to respond to harassment, intimidation, and threatening behavior via such applications. It calls on the department’s Office for Civil Rights to require colleges to fight such online abuse by taking steps like identifying and disciplining perpetrators and creating technological barriers to the use of social-media applications that harassers favor.'

But if you read the article, you will see that what REALLY upsets them is the hostile comments on feminism.

How Sexual Harassment Codes Threaten Academic Freedom

Mastodon · 25 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In its zeal to spread "gender justice," the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights (OCR) threatens to stifle academic freedom and infantilize women, says feminist legal expert and New York Law School Professor Nadine Strossen. At a recent talk at Harvard's Shorenstein Center on Media, Politics and Public Policy, the former American Civil Liberties Union head warned that current campus policies to curb sexual harassment are overbroad and dangerous. And while "safety"-mongering students deserve some of the blame, bureaucrats are the biggest progenitors of this paranoid style in American academia.

"By threatening to pull federal funds, the OCR has forced schools, even well-endowed schools like Harvard, to adopt sexual misconduct policies that violate many civil liberties," Strossen said.

Sexual misconduct is an umbrella term under which fall school rules against sexual assault, sexual harassment, intimate-partner violence, voyeurism, and stalking. While much of the recent focus in this realm has been on sexual violence, school sexual harassment policies also deserve some scrutiny.

"Over the years, there have been many types of overly broad sexual harassment policies," explains Samantha Harris, director of policy research for the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE). "FIRE has actually had some success in getting schools to roll these back over the years."'

Double standard? Clinton must beware accusing Sanders of sexism

Mastodon · 25 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'This time around, Clinton is fully embracing her status as woman. She is vocal about sexism, misogyny, and gender inequality. However, could she take her gender battle too far?

At the Democratic National Committee's Women's Leadership Forum, Clinton subtly accused Bernie Sanders of sexism. Senator Sanders (I-VT), the populist and progressive candidate, is actually more moderate than Clinton on one single issue: Gun control. Clinton has been referencing this issue heavily in the wake of recent mass shootings, including taking a dig at Sanders at the Democratic debate on October 13. Since then, Sanders has cautioned that candidates that "all the shouting in the world" will not improve gun laws.

Clinton told women at the DNC forum, and later told voters in Virginia, that she was told to "stop shouting about guns." She leveled her accusation when she continued on and said: "Actually I haven't been shouting, but sometimes when a woman talks, some people think it's shouting!" Though Clinton got plenty of cheers at the heavily pro-Clinton events, she must be careful when accusing others of stereotyping and negativity.

Ironically, Clinton herself had previously mocked Sanders for "shouting," though about economic problems instead of gun control.

In early September, Clinton accused Sanders of much the same behavior. According to The New York Times, Clinton tacitly referenced her former Senate colleague when she said "you can wave your arms and give a speech, but at the end of the day are you really connecting with and really hearing what people are either saying to you or wishing that you would say to them?"'

The Crucible, Now at a Campus Near You

Matt · 25 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Believe the victim"—the mantra of today's feminist anti-rape movement—is a remarkably prominent theme in Miller's play. At one point, Deputy Governor Danforth, who presides over the trials, notes that unlike "an ordinary crime," witchcraft is by its nature invisible: "Therefore, who may possibly be witness to it? The witch and the victim. None other. Now we cannot hope the witch will accuse herself; granted? Therefore, we must rely upon her victims—and they do testify." Today, advocates for "survivors" of sexual violence argue that since such crimes virtually always take place in private, especially when victim and offender know each other, it is imperative to believe those who come forward with accusations.

Of course, "believe the children" was also the mantra of the child abuse trials of the 1980s and early 1990s. But in those cases, the children themselves were a somewhat passive presence, more victims of adult manipulation than active accusers. Not so the girls ofThe Crucible, whom Miller made older than their 10- and 11-year-old historical counterparts—more young women than children. (Danforth and other adult authority figures in the play often refer to them as "children"; but today's anti-rape advocates, too, often use language that infantilizes young people and young women in particular, sometimes explicitly insisting that college "kids" are not really adults.)

When the Salem girls' veracity is questioned and Danforth asks their ringleader, Abigail Williams, if her visions could be false, Abby responds with self-righteous outrage: "Why, this—this—is a base question, sir. I have been hurt, Mr. Danforth; I have seen my blood runnin' out! I have been near to murdered every day because I done my duty pointing out the Devil's people—and this is my reward? To be mistrusted, denied, questioned…" As Danforth backs down, assuring Abigail that he doesn't mistrust her, she warns, "Let you beware, Mr. Danforth. Think you to be so mighty that the power of Hell may not turn yourwits?"'

"Feminism is over, the battle is won. Time to move on"

Matt · 26 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It would be easy to believe from the papers these days that women have never been more oppressed. From the columnist Caitlin Moran to the comedian Bridget Christie, a new creed is preached: that we are the victims, not the victors, of the sex war. Feminists claim we are objectified by the builder's whistle, that a strange man attempting to flirt with us is tantamount to sexual assault. Suddenly, just as it seemed we women were about to have it all, a new wave of feminists has begun to portray us as feeble-minded — unable to withstand a bad date, let alone negotiate a pay rise.

Worse still, they are ditching what was best about the feminist tradition: solidarity with the sisterhood and the freedom of every woman to do as she pleased. Feminism 4.0 consists of freely attacking other women over, erm, crucial issues such as bikini waxing, wearing stilettos and page three of the Sun. Moran writes that it is childbirth that 'turns you from a girl into a woman' (causing every woman in my office to snort involuntarily) and that feminism will only triumph 'when a woman goes up to collect the Oscar for Best Actress in shoes that aren't killing her'. The revolution will be televised, with 'Nicole Kidman in flip-flops'.

Well, if this is feminism, then feminism is dead, and the triviality of the fights feminists pick is the surest proof of its demise. What started as a genuine crusade against genuine prejudice has become a form of pointless attention-seeking.'

Taxpayer-funded groups seek to deny due process to students accused of rape

Mastodon · 26 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Fraternity and sorority groups are paying a former high-ranking senator to help protect their members' due-process rights in campus rape investigations.

Sexual-assault awareness groups and universities are lobbying to deprive them of due process, using taxpayer money.

The war of words is heating up over the Safe Campus Act, introduced in July by three House Republicans, who were joined in sponsorship by two Democrats in the past several weeks.

Former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., and lawyer Cleta Mitchell, an adviser to two Chi Omega fraternity chapters, promoted the Safe Campus Act in aWashington Post op-ed earlier this month. Lott is lobbying for fraternities and sororities on the issue.

They wrote that the bill "would require that law enforcement authorities have a first look at claims of sexual assault on campus" and "provide interim measures to improve student safety, due-process protections for students and student organizations, and more education to prevent such crimes."'

The Number of Male Domestic Abuse Victims Is Shockingly High — So Why Don't We Hear About Them?

Mastodon · 26 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'When you think of a victim of domestic abuse, who comes to mind?

If you're being honest, it's probably a woman. After all, domestic violence against men isn't a theme of many Hollywood movies.

Yet in 2010, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released data from its National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey — and one of the most shocking statistics wasn't just the sheer total of victims of physical violence but also how those numbers broke down by gender.

According to the CDC's statistics — estimates based on more than 18,000 telephone-survey responses in the United States — roughly 5,365,000 men had been victims of intimate partner physical violence in the previous 12 months, compared with 4,741,000 women. By the study's definition, physical violence includes slapping, pushing, and shoving.

...

Ivankovich says there isn't much buzz about these numbers or their implications, because we don't know how to handle intimate partner violence against men. "Society supports that men should not hit women, by virtue — but the same is not true for the reverse," she explains. "The fact is, it's simply not acceptable to hit anyone."

Yet, woman-on-man violence is often turned into onscreen amusement, like on a slew of reality shows — or the punch line of a larger, depressing narrative, says Anne P. Mitchell, a retired professor of family law at Lincoln Law School of San Jose (Calif.) and one of the first fathers'-rights lawyers in the country.'

Feminist filmmaker sees project in danger as her sympathy for the MRM grows

Mastodon · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'There is a documentary film on gender currently running a Kickstarter campaign that feminism would prefer never sees the light of day. You may be imagining some amateur film made by buffoons bumbling their way through a hit piece on feminism, but you'd be well off the mark. The film isThe Red Pill, by self-professed feminist Cassie Jaye.
...
Jaye describes her latest project, The Red Pill, as "a fly-on-the-wall film about men's rights activists." But, she says, at some point during filming the process morphed into her journey through ideologies opposing feminism. What makes the film unique is that it will document her "chipping away at long held beliefs, as my worldview changed within the first month," a process captured, she says, through video diaries which will be included in the film.
...
The underlying suggestion in all of this, of course, is that she has come to sympathise with the men's movement and jettisoned a lot of received feminist wisdom.

As a result, Jaye has seen her funding dry up. One observer told Breitbart that grants and funding have been withdrawn and institutional support revoked.'

Feminists think a Supreme Court ruling on K-12 speech restrictions applies to colleges

Mastodon · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'UCLA Law Prof. Eugene Volokh, an expert on First Amendment jurisprudence and Washington Post columnist, has closely examined the legal arguments made by the Feminist Majority Foundation and allies in their quest to shut down Yik Yak on college campuses.

Calling the feminists' push to eradicate boorish speech on the anonymous social-messaging app "another example of today's Anti-Free Speech Movement for American universities," Volokh finds their arguments contrary to well-established legal precedents.'

Newborn Dies Following Botched Circumcision That Parents Didn't Want in the First Place

Matt · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In January of 2013, Ontario natives John Heydari and Homa Ahmadi gave birth to a little boy they named Ryan. He was perfectly healthy and the parents had no desire to circumcise him because they believed "mother nature created us the way she intended us to be."

But their physician, going against the recommendation of the Canadian Pediatric Society, suggested the boy should be circumcised anyway. The unnecessary procedure was botched and the boy died three weeks after his birth due to blood loss.

...

"In fact, the case only became public because the couple appealed the original Ontario College of Physician and Surgeons rulings, which were rendered in secret.

An appeal tribunal upheld this month adecision by the College to caution the doctor who saw Ryan in the emergency department hours after his circumcision, his diaper stained red with blood.

The Health Professions Appeal and Review Board also confirmed the college's separate advice to the pediatrician who conducted the procedure to be aware of its potential hazards, and document his efforts to get informed consent."'

Feminist Majority Foundation (publisher of Ms. Magazine) and others call for restricting campus speech

Mastodon · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The recently amended complaint against University of Mary Washington, filed with the federal Education Department, shows how Title IX has become a tool for people to try to suppress speech they disapprove of. I blogged about one aspect of this campaign — the letter to the Education Department from what I called the national coalition in favor of campus censorship — yesterday. Today, I want to focus on the UMW complaint (filed by some UMW students and professors, as well as the Feminist Majority Foundation), which has been in the news alongside the coalition's letter: just last week, the Education Department was reported to have launched an investigation based on the complaint.
...
What's striking, though, about the UMW complaint is how far it goes beyond criminal threats. Here are some examples of the posts that the complaint complains about:

1. "Students posted Yaks about the Greek life issue and Feminists United, including 'this feminist needs to calm the hell down,' and 'these feminists need to chill their tits,' and specifically calling Ms. McKinsey 'scary.'"
...
The Feminist Majority Foundation, though a publisher of a magazine, doesn't seem to care much about the First Amendment rights of students, or of accused university officials. Its complaint goes far beyond constitutionally unprotected and rightly punishable speech, such as true threats of violence.'

Secrecy questioned about baby's death after circumcision

Mastodon · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One Toronto pediatrician was cautioned in writing and another told to get informed consent from parents after 22-day-old Ryan Heydari bled to death following a circumcision in 2013.

Details about the complaints against the two physicians made to the College of Physicians and Surgeons, including their identities, would have been kept secret had Ryan's parents not sought a review by an appeals panel. That is a level of secrecy that critics say must change, even as the college is promising to improve transparency.

Earlier this month, the Health Professions Appeal and Review Board (HPARB) upheld the decision made by the college's inquiries, complaints and reports committee to "advise" Dr. Sheldon Wise, who performed the operation on Ryan following a referral by a family doctor, to document his consent procedure — including discussion of potential risks and complications around circumcision. Death following circumcision is rare, a three-member panel of the board noted.'

Circumcision rates dropping, but infant death highlights ongoing debate

Matt · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The post-circumcision death of an infant boy in Ontario has highlighted the ongoing debate about circumcision in Canada, where about a third of parents still choose to circumcise their newborn boys.

Ryan Hedari's parents say their physician urged them to circumcise their son despite their wish not to, and in 2013 the boy died seven days after the procedure due to shock from blood loss.

Earlier this month an appeal tribunal of the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons cautioned the doctor who saw the baby in an emergency room hours after the circumcision procedure, and urged the performing doctor to be mindful of the risks of the procedure and to receive informed consent from patients.

Though the numbers are declining, about a third of Canadian parents still choose circumcision for their sons. That's despiterecommendations from the Canadian Paediatric Society(CPS), updated last month, saying that circumcision should not be routine for newborn boys.'

Protesters to AAP: No More Circumcision

Matt · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A small, but vocal, group of anti-circumcision protesters gather daily outside the convention center here where the American Academy of Pediatrics is meeting -- and they promise to keep doing so until the AAP backs off its "permissive" stance on circumcision.

The protesters, including a group of men dressed in white with crotch areas stained red, represent various groups opposed to routine infant circumcision.

"It's an ethics argument -- not a science or medical argument," said Georganne Chapin, JD, MPhil, and founding executive director ofIntact America, one of the groups at the protest. "We want [doctors] to tell parents that it's not medically necessary and they don't have a right to their son's body. We can't carve up our daughters, we shouldn't be carving up our sons and they can stop."

The protesters were mostly young to middle-aged men and women. Several of the men shouted, "My body! My rights!" at conference attendees, while one woman said loudly to a passerby "Sorry your mom took your foreskin!"'

The Movement to Force Young Women into Tech

Mastodon · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Breitbart's own Milo Yiannopoulos recently highlighted a number of facts often omitted in the "women in tech" discussion, which includes the fact that women pursuing careers in technology often see preferential treatment during the hiring process over their male counterparts, largely due to quotas and affirmative action in the name of diversity. Being a woman, in general, is an immense advantage, and yet few women are pursuing these fields.
...
The idea that an extremely specific technology degree is needed in order to contribute to the advancement of our society is arguably the gravest error in thinking we as a people have ever made. The second gravest is not truly appreciating those who have stepped into the roles of technological innovation, instead telling them that their worth is intrinsically tied to their gender.

If young girls, on average, find themselves naturally shifting away from computers, why do we, as a people, feel a collective need to fight that? We certainly wouldn't fight many other harmless natural inclinations.

For Wojcicki, it was worth fighting. She proudly enrolled her daughter in an all-girls coding camp, which effectively reconditioned the child and helped her embrace her computer overlords, who apparently hold the one and only key to a successful life. Thank goodness we are finding ways to teach young girls that their passions must align with what is expected of them by others. We wouldn't want them thinking that no means no, right?'

Hillary Clinton Releases New TV Ads Demonizing Men

Mastodon · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Hillary Clinton campaign is pushing back against Wednesday night's Republican presidential debate by releasing four TV ads in New Hampshire and Iowa that feature women struggling in some way due to alleged gender pay disparity.

The ads, not content to simply advocate for women, actively demonize males who work at high levels in the private sector.

The ad "Mindy," featuring a cardiac nurse, inexplicably compares a nurse to a presumably male "top CEO."
...
Another ad features a female office worker who allegedly has to work two extra hours to get a paycheck equal to her male colleagues.

The ad "Alexis," at least, features a Caucasian male janitor in the background cleaning up an office, but makes no attempt to advocate for his interests alongside those of the female character in the ad.'

Dear Feminists, The Fight For ‘Women’s Rights’ In America Is Over

Mastodon · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The other day I saw an ad for an incumbent Democrat congressional candidate here in Maryland. As you can imagine, it was pretty inspiring. It used important words like “bold” and “leadership” and “effective” and “jobs” and other sweet-nothings that focus groups like to have whispered in their ears. It promised us that the candidate would defend the environment, take away the scary guns, “grow jobs” (whatever that means), protect entitlements, and fight for women’s rights.

Of course we’ve heard all of these things a million times from a million politicians. Still, I couldn’t help but stop and reflect upon the absurdity of it, especially the last part.“Fight for women’s rights”? Why is that listed as an issue distinct from the others? Why is it listed at all? The matter of “women’s rights” was settled a long time ago in this country. Women have rights. Where has this person been for the past century?

That’s a rhetorical question. I know “women’s rights” is an effectively meaningless phrase in modern American society, used by feminists to reinforce a fantasy of patriarchal oppression and systematic man-on-woman victimization. The left relies heavily, almost exclusively, onfalse narratives, and the contemporary “fight for women’s rights” is perhaps the greatest and falsest of all.

The left talks about “women’s rights” as a thing yet to be fully achieved; women in America are “second-class citizens,” they breathlessly insist. Therefore, they say, the struggle for “women’s rights” is not only a political issue, but one of the biggest political issues we face, which is a bit like saying smallpox is one of the biggest health issues we face.'

Deep Cuts: Anti-Circumcision Activists Protest Pediatricians

Matt · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'"M.D. doesn't mean mutilate dicks," a sign says. "Foreskins are fabulous," another reads. And yet one more, "Circumcision: history's greatest medical fraud."

Anti-circumcision groups, who call themselves "intactivists," are in town for the American Academy of Pediatrics Conference. They've organized what they're calling the Genital Autonomy Demonstration, which began on Saturday. While their main protest location is in front of the convention center, where about 10,000 pediatricians are gathered, some groups have taken their message to the White House and are considering a march on the Mall.

"It's kind of miserable to strap a baby down and cut off part of his penis," says Danelle Frisbie, co-founder of Saving Our Sons and the INTACT Network, which has satellite groups in different states. "But it's a big money maker. It's a multi-billion dollar business. There are ethical physicians who won't do it, but others are trying to make a buck."

Frisbie got involved in the intactivist movement through her postgraduate studies in human sexuality, where she was focusing on female genital mutilation. "I had mentors say, 'If you're going to focus so much on female health, you should look at male circumcision.' It made me question, 'Why is my position kind of sexist?' I mean, if it's wrong to cut baby girls, it's wrong to cut baby boys."'

Australia: Male teachers abandon classroom fearing inappropriate label of working with children

Mastodon · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The Queensland College of Teachers (QCT) has commissioned a review to examine what influences people to choose teaching as their first career.

The review is being held as the number of male teachers in Queensland state primary schools has fallen to just 16 per cent.

QCT director John Ryan said the review would be a valuable insight for education employers looking to recruit more men.

Queensland Teachers' Union president Kevin Bates said there was still an unfair view that teaching was women's work.

"In our community there is a bit of a perception that it is a feminised profession," he said. "There are elements that attach suspicion to men in the classroom, which are not justified."

Queensland Association of State School Principals president Michael Fay said remuneration was often a factor too.'

Foreign student branded a rapist could die if university sends him back to Syria, suit claims

Mastodon · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The consequences for students found responsible for sexual misconduct in the campus system usually end with expulsion, a curtailed career, drastically lower earning power and a ruined reputation that's hard to repair.

For a Syrian student at Pennsylvania State University, it could mean his death.

The Legal Intelligencer reports that "John Doe" is suing the school for suspending him following its switch to an Title IX "investigative model" that "removed his ability to confront his accuser or call witnesses of his own."

He's asking a federal judge to place his suspension on hold while considering his claims that Penn State violated his due process rights in its investigation of allegations that he violated a female student at a frat party:

"Doe is a fourth-year architectural engineering student and Syrian national who was attending the university on an F-1 student visa from the United States. His family currently lives in Kuwait on civil identification cards, and Doe said his ability to enter and remain in Kuwait is dependent upon his status as a student. If the civil ID card is revoked, Doe said, he is at risk of having to return to Syria where he said two of his relatives have already died in the country's unrest, according to the complaint."'

Canada: Man sues Revenue Agency over race and sex discrimination

Mastodon · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A Canada Revenue Agency worker alleges his employer discriminated against him because he had the misfortune of being born a white man.

Joe Bate, 40, is representing himself in the Federal Court case. He claims he was an “efficient and productive” appeals officer for CRA, outshining many of his colleagues.

But instead of being promoted, he says his employer used the Employment Equity Act to pass him over.

“I could be twice as efficient (as my co-workers), have better communication skills ... but, unfortunately, I was born white,” Bate told the court Tuesday.

He said the Employment Equity Act was passed in 1986 to ensure inclusion in the workplace of four groups — women, visible minorities, aboriginals and persons with disabilities. But, he said, it excludes “one specific group.”'

'Guilty until proven innocent': life after a false rape accusation

Mastodon · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Jay Cheshire was cleared of rape in June. Allegations made against the 17-year old were withdrawn by the complainant just weeks after being filed, resulting in the investigation being closed. Yet, two weeks after the teenager was acquitted of the charge - and with his adult life still ahead of him - Jay was discovered hanging from a tree in his local park.

According to coroner Grahame Short, Jay was a sensitive young man who had "found it difficult to cope with the police investigation" - a conclusion reiterated by the boy's mum, Karin, who said of the accuser: "She accused him of rape and said he was a sexual offender. He was absolutely distraught."

To prosecute an individual for rape - or indeed sexual harassment of any type - is notoriously difficult. However, since the tragic events surrounding the death of Jay Cheshire, thoseopposed to the current laws and practices concerning sexual harassment have become increasingly active in voicing their criticism of the system.'

Teaching consent, policing intimacy

Mastodon · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Until recently, the idea of consent was associated with acts that are voluntary, free of coercion or compulsion. As theOxford English Dictionary puts it, consent is a ‘voluntary agreement to or acquiescence in what another proposes or desires’. It is ironic, therefore, that advocates of so-called consent workshops in universities want to make them, well, non-consensual. As one supporter of consent classes said: ‘It’s crucial they’re compulsory or the people who need to go won’t go.’

It seems those demanding that consent workshops be made compulsory have little understanding of the idea of consent. But then, these workshops aren’t really about the meaning of consent. Rather, they are informed by a desire to police intimacy and to moralise about student behaviour.

Take the UK National Union of Students’ ‘I Heart Consent’ guide for consent-workshop leaders. It says consent workshops should provide a ‘safer space where people feel comfortable to explore topics, definitions and myths’. But the discussion it advocates is anything but exploratory. The guide promotes a rigid party line and any view that deviates from this line is castigated as a myth or as a ‘problematic’ view that must be corrected. The guide insists that workshop leaders must ‘challenge myths and rectify problematic perspectives on consent’ as well as ‘encourage a healthy view of consent’. ‘Healthy’ here is not a medical term; it’s a moralistic one, referring to ‘healthy’ attitudes and ‘healthy’ sentiments.'

Malecare: Please Tell the USPSTF What You Think About Prostate Cancer Screening

Matt · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The U.S. Preventive Services Task Force (USPSTF) posted a draft research plan on screening for prostate cancer. The draft research plan is available for review and public comment from October 29, 2015 to November 25, 2015. To review the draft research plan and submit comments, go to: http://bit.ly/1LEu5g3

The USPSTF is the organization responsive for the recommendation against prostate cancer screening. Their May 2012 recommendation reads:

"The U.S. Preventive Services Task Force (USPSTF) recommends against prostate-specific antigen (PSA)-based screening for prostate cancer."

This recommendation has caused massive controversy throughout our health care system. We ask you to post your comments on the USPSTF website, at: http://bit.ly/1LEu5g3

Whether you agree with their 2012 finding or not, our prostate cancer community needs to be heard. This new research project gives all of us an opportunity to influence the outcome of prostate cancer screening in the United States.

Even if you don't know anything about research or the PSA test, it will be helpful to let the USPSTF know that prostate cancer patients and family members like you are keeping a watch on their work.

There are ten questions for you to comment on, spread over ten pages. For example, on page three, you are asked to comment, What are the harms of PSA-based screening for prostate cancer? You can select a multiple choice response and have the option to write one or several sentences with your personal thoughts. It takes about ten minutes or less to run through the pages, so please go to: http://bit.ly/1LEu5g3

Please let us know if you commented and or if you have any questions. You can email me directly at darryl@malecare.org

Best regards,

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare
Men fighting cancer, together.
www.malecare.org
darrylm@malecare.org

Senators Call Out Fraternities, Sororities For Backing Safe Campus Act

Matt · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) called out national fraternity and sorority groups for lobbying to support a bill that would limit college sexual assault investigations.

Taking aim at the North-American Interfraternity Conference and the National Panhellenic Conference, the senators held a special phone call with reporters on Thursday to declare the groups' support of the Safe Campus Act "misguided."

The Safe Campus Act would block colleges from taking action on reports of sexual assault unless the alleged victim also reports the attack to police. The requirement would not apply to any other form of misconduct.

"Keep in mind, they have only carved out this exception for sexual assault -- not any of the other violent crimes," McCaskill said. "So a young woman could be robbed at gunpoint, decide she wanted to just try to get that person off campus and go to their university ... but if she was raped, she would not be able to do that unless she went to the police."

The NIC and NPC hired former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican, as a lobbyist to push the groups' position on campus rape rules, The Huffington Post first reported. Congressional lobbying records show the fraternity groups have spent $210,000 this year -- $70,000 per quarter -- on this effort.

Both Gillibrand and McCaskill noted they were members of sororities as undergraduates, but neither NIC or NPC had spoken with them prior to supporting the Safe Campus Act.'

We Can And Should Repeal Title IX

Mastodon · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In the four decades since Congress passed Title IX (the federal law against sex discrimination in education), the measure's results have grown increasingly perverse. From its inception, the law started to weaken men's athletics in the name of the great goddess Equality – despite the fact that sports matter much more to men than they do to women. After Obama's election, the Department of Education began using Title IX to mandate date rape courts of injustice. And just this month, liberal groups have begun screaming "Title IX" to try to purge America's campuses of speech that offends them.

Title IX has become a catch-all bludgeon for imposing feminist ideology on American universities. The threat of withdrawn federal funds – not to mention punitive damages – cows colleges into submitting, sometimes with great reluctance, to these socially destructive directives. But even conservatives seem to have forgotten that Title IX is just a law – a law like any other.

It's time to repeal Title IX.'

UK: Forget women in boardrooms — we need more men in classrooms

Mastodon · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Women, know your place. And that place is in the boardrooms of Britain's biggest companies.

A new Government-backed report from Lord Mervyn Davies has called for a target of at least a third of boardroom positions at FTSE 350 companies to be held by women by the end of the decade.

Lord Davies, who has been championing gender equality in the boardroom, stopped short of calling for quotas for the number of women in directorships but he hailed the "near revolution which has taken place in the boardroom and profound culture change at the heart of British business".

And it is indeed nothing short of a revolution, with 26 per cent of board members at leading companies now being of the female persuasion – more than double the figure just four years ago.
...
If David Cameron genuinely believes that institutions benefit from having a balance of men and women working in them, then he would do well to look beyond the boardroom to the classroom.

Because there is a far more worrying gender problem at the other end of the income scale from the six-figure-earning businesswomen that today's report focuses upon, and that is the chronic lack of men in our primary school classrooms.

Only one in four teachers in our schools is now male, while that plummets down to just 14 per cent in our primary schools.'

NYU Students Are Baffled By New Affirmative Consent Laws

Mastodon · 30 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A newly-released video shows that New York students remain confused about the implications of a new affirmative consent law that dramatically changes how they are expected to act in sexual situations.

Under a New York law enacted last summer at the urging of Gov. Andrew Cuomo, all colleges receiving state funds are required to handle sexual assault complaints using the standard of “affirmative consent.” This standard, also known as “yes means yes,” means that a student commits sexual assault if they do not receive explicit approval for every sexual act they engage in, from kissing to intercourse. This policy stands in contrast to current criminal law (sometimes called “no means no”), where sexual assault occurs when a person explicitly refuses to consent and is ignored or overpowered.

Confused yet? New York college students certainly are. A new video produced by the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), a campus civil liberties group, suggests that affirmative consent laws are hardly intuitive to students at New York University (NYU) in Manhattan:

Ireland: Woman made false rape allegation against man she was angry with - court

Mastodon · 30 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A WOMAN with a personality disorder who made a false rape allegation against a man she was angry with has been given a suspended sentence.

At the end of a brief relationship Sarah Eastwood (34) had told the man: “You messed with the wrong person, I will get you sorted out.” She later alleged he raped her in a city centre pub toilet.

The man was never arrested but was interviewed by gardaí during an extensive investigation. He had not been in the city that night and recovery of large amount of CCTV disproved the allegation.

Eastwood, of Judge Darleys Hostel, Parkgate Street, Dublin pleaded guilty at Dublin Circuit Criminal Court to two counts of knowingly making a false report during garda interviews at Store Street and Pearse Street garda stations on dates between June and August 2013. She had no previous convictions.'

What's so funny about a men's rights debate?

Mastodon · 30 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An extraordinary thing happened in the Houses of Parliament on Tuesday. A member of the seven-strong Backbench Business Committee burst out laughing at the suggestion that MPs should be allowed to debate a range of gender issues including domestic violence, suicide and premature mortality rates.

In an age when offending the sensibilities of anti-sexism campaigners can cause Nobel laureates to be sacked and drive astrophysicists with unfortunate dress sense to tears of redemption, it's a miracle there hasn't been another hysterical lynching in the court of public opinion.

At least it would be if it were a male politician caught on camera chortling at the suggestion that parliament should discuss issues like violence against women, breast cancer screening and eating disorders.

The reason the media hasn't grabbed hold of SniggerGate yet, is that the sniggering MP is female and the gendered problems she appears to find funny are issues that disproportionately affect men and boys.'

Students voice concerns with proposed sexual assault bill

Mastodon · 30 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A bill recently introduced in Congress would change the way sexual assault investigations are conducted at universities nationwide – including the University of Texas at Austin.

Supporters say it will strengthen the due process rights of students who are accused of sexual assault.

But many UT Austin students are voicing their concerns. Student Government passed resolution A.R. 14, in opposition to H.R. 3403, also known as the Safe Campus Act.

If the bill is passed, victims of sexual assault will have to decide whether or not they want law enforcement involved in their case. That decision could impact how or if their case is investigated at all.'

Should women be drafted? Congress may have to decide soon

Mastodon · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A small advisory group called DACOWITS -- the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services -- makes regular reports on such issues directly to Secretary of Defense Ash Carter, and has advised him to ask Congress to change the Military Selective Service Act to require women to register for the draft.

“I think [Congress] would either be faced with disbanding Selective Service and the requirement to register for the draft, or they would be required for women to sign up,” said Colorado Congressman Mike Coffman, who sits on the House Armed Services Committee.

Coffman, a volunteer soldier who served alongside draftees in the Vietnam era, favors getting rid of the draft altogether and introduced legislation to do that earlier this year.

But others advocate opening the draft to both genders.

"Our male counterparts are thinking about the draft and its consequences from the ages of 16 or 17 on," said Kristen Kavanaugh of the Truman National Security Project. "What if by asking women to register for the Selective Service, we instill that same value early on and highlight their responsibility to our nation at a young age?"'

Questions answered about women and the draft

Mastodon · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Selective Service for men has largely gone unnoticed, even while women have fought for equality in all other aspects of society. We have said — and proved — that "women can do anything men can do." Now we have to be willing to accept all the responsibility that equality brings.

As our society moves toward becoming more gender neutral, even at Target, the burdens that men have always shouldered should now become women's, too. That's equality.

Through Selective Service, our government operates on the idea that an unwilling male soldier is better than even a willing female one. Are feminists really okay with this?

• So you're in favor of Selective Service?

Actually, I'm not.

• So why do you want to force our daughters to do something that you don't even want your sons to do?

Selective Service goes under the radar because society and lawmakers are not ready to deal with the issue of drafting women. It's a political no-win. Asking the question alone creates all sorts of problems for the "war on women" argument.

Basically, we've been so busy giving women access to the military, we've ignored the unintended consequences. Once women are included in the discussion about Selective Service, the inequalities in it for men become more apparent.

Each time someone argues why women shouldn't be included in the draft ("we need them to procreate," "some women don't want to join the military," "not every woman is cut out for combat," etc.), it becomes more obvious — again, in our gender-neutral society — that maybe men shouldn't be either.'

UK: Jess Phillips MP mocks an application to debate men's issues on International Men's Day

Mastodon · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here.

Philip Davies is a highly-regarded Conservative MP, and virtually unique among 600+ MPs for raising men's issues in parliament from time to time.

Also see: Labour MP Jess Phillips apologises for telling Diane Abbott to 'f off'

Rival bills on campus sex assault stirring controversy

Mastodon · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Gillibrand and McCaskill are optimistic about their own legislation -- the Campus Accountability and Safety Act – will be included in a reauthorization of the Higher Education Act that a Senate committee plans to act on later this year.

McCaskill said the bill protects due process for those accused of sexual assault and addresses the same concerns the Salmon bill addresses without handcuffing colleges' ability to take swift disciplinary action under Title IX.

“The prosecution process is about depriving someone of their liberty, putting them in prison, labeling them a sex offender for the rest of their life,” she said. “The Title IX process is for campus safety and it is a much different kind of process and should be treated much differently.” Criminal investigations can be lengthy, she said. Title IX bars sex discrimination in education.'

Former Oregon player accused of rape sues university

Mastodon · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Former Oregon player Brandon Austin filed a $7.5 million lawsuit against the school and four administrators alleging they damaged his prospects of playing in the NBA.

Austin was among three Oregon players who were kicked off the team and barred from campus after a woman accused them of rape last year.

In the lawsuit filed Thursday in Lane County Circuit Court, lawyers for Austin say he was wrongly accused and was denied a chance to adequately defend himself in university disciplinary proceedings.

Lane County prosecutors declined to charge the players following the March 2014 incident, saying there was insufficient evidence. The players say the sexual encounter at an off-campus party was consensual.

Austin seeks $7.5 million for alleged civil rights violations, negligence, intentional infliction of emotional distress, interference with economic relations and breach of contract. The lawsuit names the university along with former President Michael Gottfredson; Sandy Weintraub, director of student conduct and community standards; Chicora Martin, the former assistant dean of students; and Robin Holmes, vice president for student life.'

Listen Feminazis, don't try to stop me calling you Feminazis

Matt · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Right on target. Excerpt:

'So what do I, as a card-carrying feminist myself, mean by a feminazi? In the absence of an official definition (although it is probably only a matter of time before it gets one) I use the term to mean radical, authoritarian feminists who view everything in gender terms and brook no dissent – least of all from other women.

So is calling someone a feminazi really comparing them to the Nazi mass-murderers, as one critic claimed, or "equating the fight for gender equality with mass murder", as another stated? I don't think so.

In exactly the same way that calling someone a grammar-Nazi doesn't imply that they want to send people to the gas chambers for misplacing apostrophes.
...
Just because some people don't like a word, that doesn't automatically mean other people shouldn't use it. If that was the case, the wonderful breadth of the English language would be swiftly cut down to just a few grunts in a matter of weeks.

Words have meaning and often, as with the case of feminazi, that meaning can be potent. If people don't like it, then they can choose not to use it themselves, but they don't have the right to tell anyone else which words they should or shouldn't choose.

That, after all, is just the sort of thing the Nazis would have done.'

Why family matters, and why traditional families are still best

Matt · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's been a good month for champions of the traditional family, but don't expect the family wars to be ending any time soon.

In recent weeks, a barrage of new evidence has come to light demonstrating what was once common sense. "Family structure matters" (in the words of my American Enterprise Institute colleague Brad Wilcox, who is also the director of the National Marriage Project at the University of Virginia).

And Princeton University and the left-of-center Brookings Institution released a study that reported "most scholars now agree that children raised by two biological parents in a stable marriage do better than children in other family forms across a wide range of outcomes." Why this is so is still hotly contested.

Another study, coauthored by Wilcox, found that states with more married parents do better on a broad range of economic indicators, including upward mobility for poor children and lower rates of child poverty. On most economic indicators, the Washington Post summarized, "the share of parents who are married in a state is a better predictor of that state's economic health than the racial composition and educational attainment of the state's residents."

Boys in particular do much better when raised in a more traditional family environment, according to a new report from MIT. This is further corroboration of Daniel Patrick Moynihan's famous 1965 warning: "From the wild Irish slums of the 19th century Eastern seaboard, to the riot-torn suburbs of Los Angeles, there is one unmistakable lesson in American history; a community that allows a large number of men to grow up in broken families, dominated by women, never acquiring any stable relationship to male authority, never acquiring any set of rational expectations about the future — that community asks for and gets chaos."'

Lawsuit alleges tutor set up athletes and daughter for sex

Matt · 1 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Hey, where'd all the "believe the victim" people go? Excerpt:

'A University of Notre Dame student has accused a female academic coach of coercing young football and basketball players into having sex with her daughter, according to a lawsuit.

The student came forward Friday accusing an unidentified faculty member of orchestrating “sexually and racially motivated” trysts with her daughter by including condoms, transportation and hotel rooms for academic favors.

The accusor is an African-American student while the academic coach is white. Neither the student, coach nor her daughter are identified in court documents filed Friday in Indiana’s St. Joseph Circuit Court.'

An Assault on Common Sense

Matt · 2 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In August 2012, two rapes by unknown assailants were reported at Harvard University, sending the school into crisis. Police cruisers idled around the campus; uniformed and plainclothes officers came out in force. Students were advised not to walk alone. A member of the undergraduate council called for the closing of Harvard Yard. “I thought Cambridge wasn’t a dangerous area,” a freshman told the student newspaper. “It was Harvard—it was supposed to be safe, academic.” (In fact, Harvard still was safe. The campus authorities ultimately deemed at least one of the rape allegations baseless, judging by the FBI’s Uniform Crime Reports. Since Harvard never disclosed the outcome of either of its investigations, its findings regarding the other supposed incident remain secret.)

In September 2015, Harvard president Drew Gilpin Faust announced that Harvard students experience sexual assault with “alarming frequency.” Faust was responding to the results of a sexual assault survey conducted at Harvard and 26 other colleges earlier in the year. According to the survey, spearheaded by the Association of American Universities (AAU), 16 percent of Harvard female seniors had experienced nonconsensual sexual penetration during their time at the college and nearly 40 percent had experienced nonconsensual sexual contact. The “severity of the problem” required “an even more intent focus on the problem of sexual assault,” Faust said. Harvard professor and former provost Steve Hyman decried the “terribly damaging” problem that “profoundly violates the values and undermines the educational goals of this University.”

And yet, apart from Drew Gilpin Faust’s recital of Harvard’s burgeoning rape bureaucracy—50 Title IX coordinators, a new Office for Sexual and Gender-Based Dispute Resolution filled to the brim with “trained investigators,” a doubling of staff at the Office for Sexual Assault Prevention and Response—nothing else happened. No beefed up escort services, no added police presence. Life went on as usual, including the usual drunken parties and hook-ups.'

The NYT erroneously reports marathon winner based on sex

ThomasI · 2 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Mary Keitany won the MARATHON

But poor Stanley Biwott... He ONLY won the MEN'S MARATHON

UK: Jess Phillips vs Philip Davies on ‘ridiculous’ International Men’s Day debate

Mastodon · 2 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'PD: If you actually look in Parliament, those things — like the under-achievement of boys in school, testicular cancer rates and the under-reporting of male victims of domestic violence — very rarely get debated and they are real issues.

If Jess is saying that these issues can be debated at other times, then exactly the same things applies to things around national women’s day; we have a monthly questions of women and equality in Parliament which we don’t have for men. So if Jess is going to say to people who want a debate on international women’s day ‘well you don’t need one as there’s plenty of other opportunities to raise these issues’ then that would be entirely consistent. What wouldn’t be is if she supported an international women’s day debate but deprived one for international men’s day.'

UK: Philip Davies MP: 'Political correctness is damaging men'

Mastodon · 2 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Philip Davies, the Conservative MP for Shipley, found himself at the centre of a raging gender storm last week, when he suggested that men's issues should be discussed in Parliament on International Men's Day, November 19th.

Despite making an impassioned plea to the Backbench Business Committee last Tuesday – underscored by troubling new data on Thursday that showed a 40 per cent spike in male suicides for men in their 40s and record low educational achievement for white, working-class boys – his comments were met with unbridled ridicule from Labour's Jess Philips.

Despite claims on the Labour website that Ms Philips, MP for Birmingham Yardley, "helps the poorest and most vulnerable in society," she openly laughed and petulantly pulled faces while Davies spoke, then scoffed: "You'll have to excuse me for laughing. As the only woman on this committee, it seems like every day to me is International Men's Day."

For many, Ms Philips' sneering contempt of these serious – and increasingly fatal – men's issues left a sour taste in the mouth.

Over centuries, working men built Britain and millions died in its wars, yet in 2015 men's issues are laughed out of the House.'

NY Times: Death Rates Rising for Middle-Aged White [Male] Americans, Study Finds

mens_issues · 2 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A New York Times article points out that death rates have been rising for middle-age white Americans, but fails to point out that this is likely mostly men driving this increase. Excerpt:

'Something startling is happening to middle-aged white Americans. Unlike every other age group, unlike every other racial and ethnic group, unlike their counterparts in other rich countries, death rates in this group have been rising, not falling.

That finding was reported Monday by two Princeton economists, Angus Deaton, who last month won the 2015 Nobel Memorial Prize in for Economic Science, and Anne Case. Analyzing health and mortality data from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and from other sources, they concluded that rising annual death rates among this group are being driven not by the big killers like heart disease and diabetes but by an epidemic of suicides and afflictions stemming from substance abuse: alcoholic liver disease and overdoses of heroin and prescription opioids.

The analysis by Dr. Deaton and Dr. Case may offer the most rigorous evidence to date of both the causes and implications of a development that has been puzzling demographers in recent years: the declining health and fortunes of poorly educated American whites. In middle age, they are dying at such a high rate that they are increasing the death rate for the entire group of middle-aged white Americans, Dr. Deaton and Dr. Case found.'

Many commenters astutely pointed out that it's probably mostly working class men suffering job loss and loss of income in the recent economic downturn, exacerbated by them turning to alcohol/drugs in response.

'Gay' rape in military underreported by Pentagon

Matt · 3 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Far more military men are being raped by other men than is reported by the Pentagon because of the stigma attached to such sexual assaults, says a new study published by the American Psychological Association.

“Rates of military sexual trauma among men who served in the military may be as much as 15 times higher than has been previously reported, largely because of barriers associated with stigma, beliefs in myths about male rape, and feelings of helplessness,” the APA said in releasing the findings Tuesday.

The Defense Department issues a biannual report on sexual assaults. Based on Internet emailed surveys it found that more men than women, in pure numbers, are sexually assault victims. Women make up about 14.5 percent of the 1.4 million active force.'

Court Wins for Accused

Mastodon · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Last week, Brandon Austin, a former college basketball player, filed a lawsuit against the University of Oregon for $7.5 million, arguing that administrators there violated his rights when they suspended him over his alleged involvement in a gang rape.

Austin was able to transfer to a community collegeand play basketball there last season, but has since left to (so far, unsuccessfully) pursue a professional basketball career. In the lawsuit, Austin claims that the punishment caused him emotional distress and lessened his chances of one day playing in the National Basketball Association. His case joins more than 50 other pending lawsuits filed by men who say they were unfairly kicked off campus after being accused of sexual assault.

If filed last year, Austin's lawsuit would have seemed like a long shot, especially as the athlete had been accused of sexual assault at another institution before he enrolled at Oregon. But accused students suing the institutions that suspended or expelled them are now increasingly winning those lawsuits, including at least four cases in the last four months.'

Gillibrand, McCaskill Hope to Derail Greek-Backed Campus-Sexual-Assault Bill

Mastodon · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand and Claire McCaskill will sit down Thursday with the leaders of national fraternities and sororities, hoping to earn allies and to kill legislation sponsored by the Greek groups to combat campus sexual assaults—a bill that, the senators say, would actually be harmful to victims.

The Safe Campus Act, written by Republican Reps. Matt Salmon and Pete Sessions, would require victims of sexual assault on college campuses to report their attackers to the police. It also allows schools to increase their standards of evidence for sexual-assault cases. The bill is backed by the nation's major fraternity and sorority organizations, who hired a lobbying team, including former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, to support the bill just last month.

But the legislation is opposed by hundreds of advocacy groups for the victims of sexual assault. On Monday, 220 of those groups co-signed a letter to members of Congress deriding the bill as well as similar legislation. The groups argue that requiring victims to report sexual assaults to the police will reduce the number of assaults that are reported.'

Men should have rights, even on college campuses

Mastodon · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I've written previously in this column about how many colleges and universities — some of them the most elite in the country — are not allowing free speech on campus. Listening to different points of view should typify students at any university, but it no longer is the case.

But another disturbing trend on college campuses is to disallow male students from defending themselves against accusations of sexual assault. In many cases colleges have taken action against the defendants, such as expelling them, when they were not allowed to state their case or hire a lawyer to defend them.

This is particularly disturbing considering the number of high-profile cases where accusations have been proven to be bogus. It was predictable that defendants would start filing lawsuits against the universities, and that is now happening. This will probably get the schools' attention more than anything.

Sexual assault continues to be a serious problem on campuses, and in the past many colleges have ignored the problem or covered it up. University officials were more concerned with maintaining the reputations of their schools and "keeping things quiet" than with helping young women who had been assaulted or trying to fix the problem.

But now, the policy appears to be to have these same colleges handle sexual assault accusations without a proper trial and thereby in some cases ruin the reputations of innocent men. In my view, sexual assaults are a crime, and should be handled through the regular justice system.'

An open letter to feminist students (from a guy who shoots straight)

Mastodon · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Perhaps you'll smear all of what follows as "mansplaining" so as to extricate yourself from critical engagement. That would be a shame, though not wholly unanticipated.
...
It is repugnant that women are coached by feminist enablers who are, broadly speaking, informed by the ideology's principles to reinterpret past sexual encounters as rape because they presently feel emotionally damaged—and are then actively encouraged to weaponize that regret to the ruin of many young men who are simply following cultural cues brought about by the Sexual Revolution—ostensibly a feminist movement, to boot.

We should be sickened by the abrogation of due process in the wake of this hysteria. It is not the job of a university to adjudicate potential rape claims. That task falls to and is within the purview of police departments (which gather evidence) and then to the courts (which discern the veracity of said evidence and, if necessary, then mete out a proportional punishment). The rule of law and due process specifically were enshrined in our Constitution to protect the rights of the accused (yes, they do indeed retain certain rights, ladies), and insulate them from tyrannical, mob-like, groupthink-fueled decisions (think Rolling Stone's UVA rape scandal non-story or Emma Sulkowicz, "Mattress Girl," of Columbia).'

Feminists are trying to frame Linus Torvalds for sexual assault, claims open source industry veteran

Mastodon · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminists in tech have been staging attempted “honey traps” to frame prominent male software developers for sexual assault, according to explosive claims on the blog of Eric S. Raymond, a pioneer of the open source movement. In allegations that will rock the world of software development, prominent targets included Linus Torvalds, creator of the Linux kernel.

Raymond quoted excerpts from an online chat with a trusted source, who told him that the Ada Inititiative, a recently-discontinued feminist advocacy group in tech, was trying to “collect scalps” by concocting charges of attempted sexual assault against male software developers.

The source told Raymond that the “MO” of the feminists was to “get alone with the target, and then immediately report attempted sexual assault.” The source said he had stopped mentoring female developers over fears that they might fabricate such charges.'

Wikipedia on Linus Torvalds here.

Feminists lashing out at 'The Red Pill'

Mastodon · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Feminists are in meltdown following the successful funding of The Red Pill, a documentary about the Mens' Rights Movement by award winning filmmaker Cassie Jaye. How awful!

The documentary's Kickstarter project was successfully funded last week. Following an article by yours truly, campaign donations surged. The movie sailed through its original goal of $97,000, and now — as icing on the cake — it is likely to exceed the amount raised by Anita Sarkeesian's Tropes vs Women in Video Games, a series that had the entire weight of the progressive media behind it. Not gonna lie, I am enjoying the spectacle enormously.

Although Jaye is an accomplished filmmaker, with two award-winning documentaries under her belt, she was forced to turn to Kickstarter after her original backers abandoned her.
...
Feminists aren't just upset that a fair documentary about the hated men's rights movement is going to be released. What really terrifies them is Jaye's own story: she was a feminist who intended to make a "fly-on-the-wall" documentary about activists like Dean Esmay and Paul Elam, in much the same way that she had profiled the U.S abstinence movement.

Instead, she discovered her own beliefs were changing, and now the documentary is about her personal journey as well as the movement itself. Feminists are shocked, angry, and afraid that one of their own could see men's rights advocates as anything less than pure evil, so they're doing all they can to ensure that Jaye's story never reaches a wider audience.

Public mood is shifting, and progressives don't like it one bit. This undercurrent of panic and disbelief can be seen in many of the comments prominent feminists have made on social media.'

Fiorina blasts modern feminism: 'It pits women against men' to win elections

Mastodon · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Carly Fiorina has previously described feminism as a "weapon used to win elections." Now, she's offering an alternative definition.

"Feminism began as a rallying cry to empower women – to vote, to get an education, to enter the workplace. But over the years, feminism has devolved into a left-leaning political ideology where women are pitted against men and used as a political weapon to win elections," the Republican presidential candidate wrote on Facebook Thursday.

Fiorina has frequently compared the familiar 'pull yourself up by your bootstraps' philosophy, which she claims enabled her rise from secretary to chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, to contemporary feminism, which tends to emphasize instances of women's oppression and has developed a reputation of intolerance toward dissenters.

"Being empowered means having a voice. But ideological feminism shuts down conversation – on college campuses and in the media," Fiorina wrote Thursday. "If you are a man – or a woman — who doesn't believe the litanies of the left, then you are 'waging a war on women' or offensive as a candidate, as I have been called."'

Case makes Air Force base ground zero in military's new gender wars

Mastodon · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'He is an award-winning combat photographer who stands accused of trying to pick up women in the public affairs office at MinotAir Force Base in North Dakota, and for that prosecutors wanted to put him in prison for 130 years.

The prosecutorial zeal was so great that an Air Force officer appointed to investigate the case said the piled-up charges were combined to "artificially exaggerate the criminality of the accused," who often was simply "socially maladroit and crass."

This is a glimpse into the new U.S. Armed Forces and its gender wars. It is a slice of military life stemming from the Pentagon's order in 2013 to erase all sexual harassment and, to enforce it, staff the ranks with an advocacy bureaucracy to empower victims and make sure complaints are filed.'

Female student pens scathing review of 'rape culture' for college course

Mastodon · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A pre-med student attending college in California has penned a scathing review of the current climate surrounding sexual assault on college campuses.

The student, who wishes to remain anonymous, wrote her essay in response to a public-health class assignment asking students to watch a video in which Emma Sulkowicz, the former Columbia University student who carried a mattress around protesting what she claimed was rape, discusses her mattress project. Students were asked a series of questions pertaining to the video, including "What do you think of her approach in responding to her case of rape?" (notice the absence of "alleged") and "Look into her story and see how her alleged rapist responded. How do you think the university handled this delicate situation?"

The student responded by condemning Sulkowicz's behavior as "a parody of all the worst parts of radical or 'Tumblr' feminists" and said she was "ashamed to even belong to the same species as her." The student was outraged by Sulkowicz's accusation, especially after having followed the accused student's side closely.

"Not only was Emma's false accusation abhorrent and did she inflict physical and emotional trauma on Paul [the man Sulkowicz accused], but her response to the widespread media attention is the most immature and attention-seeking action she could've possibly taken," the student wrote.'

DA: Rape accusation will likely haunt hockey player for years

Mastodon · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The rape investigation of Chicago Blackhawks star Patrick Kane ended Thursday, as Erie County District Attorney Frank A. Sedita III described the young woman's claims as "this so-called 'case'… rife with reasonable doubt."
...
Despite Sedita's strong statement that "physical and forensic evidence ... tend to contradict the complainant's claims," the accusation likely will continue to haunt Kane, affecting his reputation and potential for endorsements.

And some still doubt him. Once an accusation is made, it's hard to take it back.

"The best thing for him to do is ... tell his side of the story to the extent that his attorneys will permit him given the possibility of a civil lawsuit," said Stephen W. Bell, a partner and director of crisis and reputation management with Eric Mower + Associates in Buffalo.'

Also see: Another high-profile rape accusation falls apart

S. Africa: Principal removed after school circumcision debacle

Mastodon · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'The principal of the Noordgesig Primary School has been removed following a debacle involving 40 boys who were taken to an undisclosed location to be circumcised.

"I have taken the decision to immediately remove the principal from the school. There will be a formal disciplinary hearing for her and her two deputies," Gauteng Education MEC Panyaza Lesufi told parents and residents gathered at the Noordgesig community centre on Thursday evening.

The crowd responded with cheers and applause.

Non-profit organisation Right to Care, which was involved in taking the pupils to a clinic the parents were not aware of, would also be blacklisted from entering any school premises.'

Quote of the Day

Matt · 7 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Item here.

'Dear Judge Peeler, I feel that my mom should stay in prison because I seen her stab my dad clean through the heart with my sister in his arms. That took a big amount of happiness out of my and my sister's lives… I think it would be better for me and my sister if my mom would stay in prison because I'm afraid of her. I have seen what she did to my dad.

— Bradyn Takach, age 10, in his powerful letter to Judge Robert Peeler, arguing against his mother's early release from prison. Shannon Smith has served almost 6 years of her 10 year sentence for the death of Robert Takach. Smith's hearing is scheduled for tomorrow.'

Sweden opens world's first male rape centre

Matt · 7 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Södersjukhuset already runs a round-the-clock walk-in clinic for women and girls who have been sexually assaulted in the city, treating between 600 and 700 patients a year. Now, the hospital, which hosts the largest emergency care unit in the Nordic region, is opening its doors to men and boys who are victims of rape and sex attacks.

"We are happy that we now can finally open the first rape clinic for men following the rape clinic for women," Rasmus Jonlund, a press spokesperson for the Liberal Party, which led the campaign for the department in the Swedish capital, told The Local just ahead of the launch.

"It is the first in Sweden (...) We think it is the first in the world. We haven't found another from our research on the world wide web," he added.

The opening was also celebrated by the Liberal Party's centre-right Alliance partners in Stockholm City Council; the Moderates, which are the largest group in the capital's coalition, the Christan Democrats and the Centre Party.

"Emergency medical care for raped men will be free of charge, and offered around the clock, all year," said Marie Ljungberg Schött, a local Moderate Party party politician and council representative on emergency care in a statement.'

Raising Kids and Running a Household: How Working Parents Share the Load

Matt · 7 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Family life is changing, and so, too, is the role mothers and fathers play at work and at home. As more mothers have entered the U.S. workforce in the past several decades, the share of two-parent households in which both parents work full time now stands at 46%, up from 31% in 1970. At the same time, the share with a father who works full time and a mother who doesn't work outside the home has declined considerably; 26% of two-parent households today fit this description, compared with 46% in 1970, according to a new Pew Research Center analysis of Current Population Survey data.

In economic terms, families with two full-time working parents are better off than other families. The median household income for families with two full-time working parents and at least one child under 18 at home is $102,400, compared with $84,000 for households where the father works full time and the mother works part time and $55,000 for households where the father works full time and the mother is not employed. But as a new Pew Research Center survey shows, balancing work and family poses challenges for parents. In fact, more than half (56%) of all working parents say this balancing act is difficult. Among working mothers, in particular, 41% report that being a parent has made it harder for them to advance in their career; about half that share of working fathers (20%) say the same.

The survey, conducted Sept. 15-Oct. 13, 2015, among 1,807 U.S. parents with children younger than 18, also shows that in two-parent families, parenting and household responsibilities are shared more equally when both the mother and the father work full time than when the father is employed full time and the mother is employed part time or not employed.1 But even in households where both parents work full time, many say a large share of the day-to-day parenting responsibilities falls to mothers.'

Facebook executive tells Air Force Academy cadets that military is one of worst for bias

Mastodon · 8 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Corporate America and the military are sexist and show racial bias, a leading businesswoman told cadets Friday at the Air Force Academy.

Sheryl Sandberg, chief operating officer of Facebook and author of the book "Lean In: Women, Work, and the Will to Lead," told a crowd of nearly 3,000 cadets that society tells women they are less competent and capable. She described the military as one of "the worst" organizations for bias during a 30-minute speech.

"Women and minorities face barriers white men don't face," she said.'

UK: Family's nightmare after false rape claim

Mastodon · 8 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Geoff was exonerated of any crime by police and the legal system and cleared after his daughter Tina Long – who waived her right to anonymity when he was convicted – admitted she had lied in court and made up the allegations.

He was released after wife Louise turned detective and went through all the evidence to expose what they call a web of lies by Tina Long, who confessed in court in January that she had lied.

Geoff, 67, said, "I cannot describe how it felt to stand and listen to my only daughter accuse me of paedophilia. I had been advised by my legal team to try to remain impassive when Tina was giving evidence. But inside I wanted to scream the roof off. This was my own flesh and blood."

Although the court had ruled she would remain anonymous because of her age at the time of the alleged offence, Tina opted to write a magazine article telling in intimate detail the false tale of her supposed abuse.'

University wants due process for itself, but not its male students

Mastodon · 8 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The University of Virginia and Virginia Democrats lobbied the Education Department to provide the school due process, something not afforded to its own students.

Specifically, the university wanted due process and fair treatment from the Education Department as it investigated the school for violations of the anti-gender discrimination law known as Title IX. But when the school conducts Title IX investigations of students accused of sexual assault, such due process is nowhere to be found.

It's a clear case of "due process for me, but not for thee."'

Congressman's office has perfect response to anti-due process advocates

Mastodon · 8 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"Colleges and universities are institutions of higher education. They are not investigatory bodies, law enforcement professionals, nor are they a part of the judicial system established and guaranteed by our Constitution," said Tristan Daedalus, Salmon's spokesman. "The Safe Campus Act mandates that institutions of higher learning follow the same laws as off-campus landlords, religious institutions, private sector employers, and government agencies when dealing with the heartbreaking consequences of rape and sexual assault in our society."

He added: "The suggestion that university deans and professors are somehow better equipped to end sexual assault than law enforcement, judges, and juries is bizarre to say the least."

Currently, colleges and universities are adjudicating campus sexual assault claims as if they are law enforcement, and accused students are often denied constitutional due process protections such as the right to legal representation or even the ability to see the evidence (or lack thereof) against them.'

Eighth Grade Math Questions About Sexual Abuse, Prostitution Raises Eyebrows

Mastodon · 9 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'One story problem on an algebra test in Florida has parents questioning the school district's judgement.

The Lee County School District in southwest Florida has raised the ire of some parents over their choice of test for an algebra class. The subject used in the set-up for the questions on the test was the late Maya Angelou's life. What parents are objecting to is some of the parts of Angelou's life they decided to highlight, they believe, are inappropriate not only for a math test, but for 8th graders.

One of the questions causing a stir is:

y=x+2
3x+6y=12

Angelou was sexually abused by her mother's _____ at age 8, which shaped her career choices and motivation for writing.

A. (0,2) Boyfriend
B. (4,6) Brother
C. (-3,-1) Father'

Fraternity Files $25 Million Lawsuit Aginst Rolling Stone For Debunked Gang Rape Article

Mastodon · 9 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Phi Kappa Psi fraternity at the University of Virginia filed a $25 million dollar defamation lawsuit against Rolling Stone for an article the magazine published in Nov. 2014 that alleged seven fraternity members participated in the brutal gang-rape of a freshman girl as part of a hazing ritual.

The widely debunked and eventually retracted article “A Rape on Campus” by Sabrina Rudin Erdely garnered intense scrutiny after media outlets attempted to verify the story. Subsequent investigations found no evidence of a gang rape at the Phi Kappa Psi house. Though Rolling Stone originally stood by Erderly’s reporting, in April the magazine formally apologized for the piece.

In a statement Monday, Phi Kappa Psi said, “the fraternity chapter and its student and alumni members suffered extreme damage to their reputations in the aftermath of the article’s publication and continue to suffer despite the ultimate unraveling of the story.” The statement also said student members and their families were subjected “to danger and immense stress” due to the article.'

FDNY recruit finally graduates thanks to instructors' 'help'

Mastodon · 9 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A female FDNY recruit has graduated from the Fire Academy after her instructors fudged on her strength, agility and running requirements, insiders say.

Choeurlyne Doirin-Holder, 39, never achieved a passing score of 17 minutes and 50 seconds on the Functional Skills Test, a course of job-related tasks in full gear such as stretching hoses and dragging dummies, according to an FDNY source familiar with the training. She did not come in under 24 minutes in practice tests.

Doirin-Holder also failed to run the required 1.5 miles in 12 minutes or less — even after the running course was slashed by an estimated quarter-mile, the source said, alleging that the start and finish lines were moved to shorten the run.'

15 Quotes By So Called 'Feminists' That Explain Exactly Why People Are Losing Faith In Feminism

Mastodon · 9 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

List here.

1. When a woman reaches orgasm with a man she is only collaborating with the patriarchal system, eroticizing her own oppression. ~Sheila Jeffrys

2. If anyone is prosecuted for filing a false report, then victims of real attacks will be less likely to report them. ~David Angier

3. Women have their faults / men have only two: / everything they say / everything they do. ~Popular Feminist Graffiti

4. I want to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig. ~Andrea Dworkin

5. The institution of sexual intercourse is anti-feminist. ~Ti-Grace Atkinson

6. I feel that 'man-hating' is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them. ~Robin Morgan, Ms. Magazine Editor

7. The more famous and powerful I get, the more power I have to hurt men. ~Sharon Stone

8. The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10 per cent of the human race. ~Sally Miller Gearhart, in The Future – If There Is One – Is Female

9. As long as some men use physical force to subjugate females, all men need not. The knowledge that some men do suffices to threaten all women. He can beat or kill the woman he claims to love; he can rape women…he can sexually molest his daughters… THE VAST MAJORITY OF MEN IN THE WORLD DO ONE OR MORE OF THE ABOVE. ~Marilyn French

10. Since marriage constitutes slavery for women, it is clear that the women's movement must concentrate on attacking this institution. Freedom for women cannot be won without the abolition of marriage. ~Sheila Cronin, the leader of the feminist organization NOW

11. If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. ~Mary Daly

12. I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which man structurally does not have, does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it. ~Barbara Jordan, former Congresswoman

13. Men who are unjustly accused of rape can sometimes gain from the experience. ~Catherine Comins

14. Politically, I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated. ~Catherine MacKinnon

15. Marriage as an institution developed from rape as a practice. ~Andrea Dworkin

Feminist Professor Calls For ‘Muscle’ To Help Remove Male Reporter at U Miss Protests

Mastodon · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A shocking video emerged Monday from the anti-free speech protests that took place at the University of Missouri following the resignation of school president Tim Wolfe.

Video recorded by journalist Mark Shierbecker shows an assistant professor of mass media at the school named Melissa Click calling for “muscle” to help remove him as he was trying to film protests being held on campus.
...
A phone call and email to Click was not immediately returned. The University of Missouri website shows that Click teaches classes in mass communication and television analysis.
...
“Current research projects involve 50 Shades of Grey readers, the impact of social media in fans’ relationship with Lady Gaga, masculinity and male fans, messages about class and food in reality television programming, and messages about work in children’s television programs,” her bio reads.'

--

See: The Future of Feminist Media Studies

Sen. Claire McCaskill decries 'mansplaining'

Mastodon · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'It's unusual to hear a politician ridicule about half her constituents on national television, but certain topics simply supersede politics. For Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), that issue is apparently mansplaining. Or maybe just men talking? As one of 20 women in the Senate, she wants more women to run for office, she said for Monday's Late Show, "but equally important is encouraging more men to sometimes just shut the hell up." She quickly clarified, sort of, telling the world's men: "It's not that women don't value your thoughts, it's just that we don't value all of them."

What topics should men just shut up about? Don't worry: McCaskill had a list. An incomplete catalog includes "what women do with their bodies," "who the next James Bond should be," Star Wars, selfies, pantsuits, millennials, "Star Wars again," all art, carbs, and turkey brining. But she did throw in a little consolation prize for men: "If you can control yourselves and hold back from further expressing your opinions on any of these topics, we'll let you keep weighing in on marijuana legalization — but that's a huge, big 'if.'" Brave? Foolish? Funny? All of the above? Watch below. But perhaps we'd have a better sense if Stephen Colbert invited one of McCaskill's male colleagues on to give his list of topics men don't want to hear women talk about anymore. Anyone? Anyone?'

When evidence is allowed, Stanford changes its verdict on an alleged campus sexual assault

Mastodon · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'In 2013, Elise Clougherty accused her ex-boyfriend of a year, Joe Lonsdale, of abuse and sexual assault. She reported her allegations to Stanford University, where she was a student and he was her mentor. Stanford found Lonsdale responsible for sexual assault and banned him from the campus for 10 years.

In early November 2015, Stanford reversed the ban, citing "new evidence" in the case.

That "new evidence" was apparently emails sent from Clougherty to Lonsdale during their relationship that raised doubts about her accusations. The emails were not included in the original investigation against Lonsdale, and were only brought to the attention of Stanford administrators due to a New York Times article about the case.'

The real Rape Culture

fibtastic · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It's not on college campuses, and its victims aren't women. A story from the NY Daily News that graphically illustrates the real "rape culture" in the US: a state-sanctioned campaign that casually uses the threat of incarceration and repeated rape as a punishment and deterrent for men. Excerpt:

'New Mexico man got a harsh wake-up call from a judge who said he would be someone's "b---h" in prison.

When Isaiah Gay, 20, was being sentenced Tuesday for his burglary charges by Bernalillo County District Court Judge Christina Argyres, she asked him what he thought could happen to him in jail.

Gay assumed the worst would be beatings, but the judge had a different outlook, according to court transcripts.

"You would probably be raped everyday, number one," she said. "You would be beat up every other day."

Shaken by the judge's harsh forecast, and facing a 15-year sentence for his string of burglaries, the first-time offender promised he'd never commit another crime, blaming his previous antics on "being young and dumb."'

'If bears killed 1 in 5 people'

Matt · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Late last week, College Humor (partnered with the Obama administration)released a video asking: What if bears killed one in five people? It was supposed to be a humorous attempt at getting people to consider just how dire it is that "one in five women will be sexually assaulted by the time they finish college."

Except there's no evidence that one in five women are sexually assaulted during college. That statistic has been debunked again andagain and again. Only the most incredulous (or calculating) media outlets still print it as a fact without noting what it actually refers to or that it has been disputed.

The statistic comes from surveys of college students who are asked whether they have ever experienced a broad range of sexual activity. The students are also asked if they have ever engaged in said activity while drunk or on drugs. Based on answers students give to these questions, biased researchers hoping to prove "rape culture" exists determine that these students have been sexually assaulted.'

SAVE: Lawsuits Multiply, Expelled Students Often Prevail in Campus Sex Cases

Matt · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Gina Lauterio
Telephone: 301-801-0608
Email: info@saveservices.org

WASHINGTON / November 9, 2015 – The number of lawsuits filed by students alleging violations of due process in campus sexual assault cases has ballooned in the last two years. And increasingly, courts are ruling in favor of the expelled students. These trends highlight the need for colleges to re-evaluate their sexual assault procedures to assure constitutionally protected rights are respected.

According to the Database of Due Process Lawsuits Against Colleges and Universities, 100 lawsuits have been filed across the country alleging due process and other violations by colleges and universities. Prior to 2014, the annual number of lawsuits remained in the single digits. In 2014, this number jumped to 31. Thus far in 2015, 33 lawsuits have been filed: http://boysmeneducation.com/lawsuits-database/

In the past, courts often upheld the expulsions. But in the past several months, courts have consistently ruled in favor of expelled students, as seen in cases from Washington and Lee University, University of Tennessee – Chattanooga, University of Southern California, and University of California San Diego: http://www.saveservices.org/2015/08/pr-four-rulings-four-reversals-judges-give-thumbs-down-on-campus-sex-tribunals/

In addition, students at Middlebury College and Pennsylvania State University were recently granted preliminary injunctions, allowing them to remain in college, according to a recent report from Inside Higher Ed: https://www.insidehighered.com/news/2015/11/05/more-students-punished-over-sexual-assault-are-winning-lawsuits-against-colleges

These lawsuits can be costly. Last month Brandon Austin, a former college basketball player, filed a lawsuit against the University of Oregon for $7.5 million, alleging a wrongful suspension. An earlier case against Brown University was reportedly settled for $1 million: https://www.insidehighered.com/news/2015/11/05/more-students-punished-over-sexual-assault-are-winning-lawsuits-against-colleges

“Referring felony sex crimes to ill-equipped campus disciplinary committees has been a complete failure,” explains SAVE spokesperson Sheryle Hutter. “Victims, the accused, and justice itself are all being shortchanged by the current regime.”

SAVE urges that felony-level allegations of sexual misconduct be handled by criminal justice authorities, not campus disciplinary committees: http://www.saveservices.org/

Men in Asia continue to be defrauded, abused, and enslaved by fishing companies

Matt · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'When Eril Andrade left this small village, he was healthy and hoping to earn enough on a fishing boat on the high seas to replace his mother's leaky roof.

Seven months later, his body was sent home in a wooden coffin: jet black from having been kept in a fish freezer aboard a ship for more than a month, missing an eye and his pancreas, and covered in cuts and bruises, which an autopsy report later concluded had been inflicted before death.

"Sick and resting," said a note taped to his body. Handwritten in Chinese by the ship's captain, it stated only that Mr. Andrade, 31, had fallen ill in his sleep.

Mr. Andrade, who died in February 2011, and nearly a dozen other men in his village had been recruited by an illegal "manning agency," tricked with false promises of double the actual wages and then sent to an apartment in Singapore, where they were locked up for weeks, according to interviews and affidavits taken by local prosecutors. While they waited to be deployed to Taiwanese tuna ships, several said, a gatekeeper demanded sex from them for assignments at sea.'

Pentagon ‘gay’ rape debacle: Report alleging male-on-male sexual trauma retracted

Matt · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'The American Psychological Associationhas taken the extraordinary step of retracting an in-house journal article that asserted the rate of rape and other sexual trauma among military men was as much as 15 times higher than the Pentagon’s own survey.

In a press released posted Sunday night, the APA said outside scholars had examined the study, “Preliminary Data Suggest Rates of Male Sexual Trauma May be Higher than Previously Reported,” and determined that the method for randomly selecting and surveying male combat veterans was flawed.

“Although the article went through our standard peer-review process, other scholars have since examined the data and raised valid concerns regarding the design and statistical analysis, which compromise the findings,” Gary R. VandenBos, APA’s publisher, said in announcing the retraction.'

NPO: December Conference in Germany on Shared Parenting a Unique Opportunity

Matt · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Don’t forget to register for the December 9th through 11th conference of the International Council on Shared Parenting in Bonn, Germany described in last week’s newsletter, it will give you access to important information on shared parenting that is not widely available in the U.S. This information could help in your individual case. And professionals will need this information to remain fully informed on one of the most important issues of the day.'

Modern Educayshun

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Video here.

'The follow up to #Equality, Modern Educayshun delves into the potential dangers of our increasingly reactionary culture bred by social media and political correctness.'

Cover Your Buns and Then We'll Respect You

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'I am in receipt of your email stating your forceful objection to my recent column on rape prevention. I understand that you objected to my claim that a woman wearing a Glock tee shirt is less likely to be targeted for rape than a woman wearing a Pink (or Victoria's Secret) tee shirt. However, I do not understand your claim that the column sexually harassed you. Nor do I understand why it was necessary for you to label me as a "filthy subhuman scumbag" and "a (f-bombing) piece of (poop)." Today, I wish to provide a reply that is more rational and intelligent than your response to my column. Fortunately, that will not be difficult.

As an initial matter, you need to be instructed on the proper use of the term "harassment." Put simply, ideas are not harassment. This goes against what you have learned in your Women's Studies classes. But virtually everything taught in these classes is both factually incorrect and ideologically bigoted. No court would ever sustain a charge of harassment made by a woman who lacks the good sense to avoid reading columns she may find offensive. If you knew the column would offend you and you read the column anyway then you must enjoy being angry. That probably explains why you are a campus feminist. Regardless, something cannot be harassment if you actually enjoy it.

...

When women started to attend colleges and universities in greater numbers several decades ago there were those who objected to their enrollment. Those objectors claimed that women were irrational and emotional and really didn't belong in a setting where controversial ideas were being discussed. In fact, it was thought that they should stay at home where they could do things more suited to their nature – such as cook, clean, and care for children.

To the extent that you actively seek out ideas that you know will be offensive - and then pretend to be shocked when you hear them - you reinforce stereotypes of women as emotionally weak. When you have the kind of emotional meltdown you displayed in your email you resemble a European soccer player flopping on the ground after being slightly bumped by an opponent. The soccer player would like to be treated like a real athlete. But he cannot be taken seriously because he is a wilting lily. You would do well to consider the analogy before you pollute the intellectual marketplace with another emotional outburst.'

Vice president Joe Biden urges students to change campus rape climate

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'"We have a cultural problem. We have to change the standard of decency by which we measure ourselves," Biden said. "The standard with which we have to measure ourselves is if we do not have consent, it is rape. Period."

Biden delivered that message at Morehouse College, where he spoke to a crowd of students mainly from Morehouse and Spelman colleges as part of the White House's "It's On Us" campaign. Morehouse was the final stop on Biden's three-campus swing that began Monday at the U. S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., and continued Tuesday morning at South Carolina's Clemson University before his afternoon stop in Atlanta.
...
Much of the onus for changing the rape culture on campuses is dependent upon men, Biden said. Men are the perpetrators of sexual violence in most cases, and have the responsibility for first not committing the act, abiding by the strict standard of consent and reporting other men who may be violating women, he said.'

Fathers' Rights Protesters Rally Outside County Courthouse

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Protesters rally for fathers' rights to child custody outside the Allen County Courthouse. A group of people supporting fathers' rights gathered in Lima to protest the current Ohio family law that gives full child custody to the mother if her and the father split. Protestors say the law makes it difficult for fathers and grandparents to get visitation rights, and they want to change it so parents will share equal 50/50 rights to their children, or prove that the other parent is unfit.

The protest organizer started the slogan "Dads Against Deadbeat Systems". He says they are looking for 1,500 signatures on their petition to get on the spring ballot for shared parenting. "The deadbeat thing is yes, of course there are deadbeat dads out there that aren't taking care of their kids, but the system right now is making it hard for fathers that want to be involved in their kids lives," said Devin Green, "We get the stigma as being a deadbeat, because we're not seen with our children or around our children, but we want to be, the court process isn't set up for us to be able to be involved in our kids lives right now. So, deadbeat, it's a play on we're not deadbeat dads, the system's what's deadbeat right now." They plan to have 1 rally a month in different counties around Ohio to promote rights for fathers and grandparents. green says you can sign the petition at 12 East Bar and Grill in Lima.'

St. Paul's School and a New Definition of Rape

Matt · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'An eighteen-year-old male student's sexual encounter with a fifteen-year-old female student at St. Paul's School has led to his being sentenced to one year in jail, followed by five years of probation, and registered for life as a sex offender. Both feel their lives are destroyed. Our fascination with the secret sex rites of the New Hampshire prep school put Owen Labrie's bespectacled face in all the papers. But the deeper pity and fear the case inspired revolved around a basic question we increasingly project onto the bodies of our young: What makes sex rape?

Based on an incident in a campus mechanical room, Labrie was charged with an array of crimes and convicted of five. The three most serious charges were "aggravated felonious sexual assault," corresponding to penetration with a finger, penis, or mouth. For a conviction, the prosecution needed to prove that the accuser had shown, by speech or conduct, that she did not freely consent, and that the accused knew or should have known she was not consenting. But the jury acquitted him of these charges, meaning that it did not regard the acts as lacking consent.
...
The jury did convict him of three charges of misdemeanor sexual assault, which, in New Hampshire, did not require proof of non-consent but were based instead on the fact that the girl was under the age of sixteen. Even if the girl had sworn that the sex was fully consensual, Labrie still would have been guilty of these charges. (Minors cannot legally consent, no matter what they feel.) Similarly, Labrie was convicted of endangering the welfare of a child, a misdemeanor charge that asked the jury only to find that he solicited sex from a minor. Presumably, the jury saw such a solicitation in the so-called Senior Salute, the campus tradition of graduating boys inviting younger girls to a romantic encounter. Labrie's felony conviction for using computer services—e-mail and Facebook—to "seduce, solicit, lure, or entice" a child under sixteen to have sex was also unrelated to consent. If he had used e-mail to ask the girl to meet and they had unambiguously consensual sex, all these criminal convictions could still stand.
...
We are in the midst of a significant cultural shift, in which we are redescribing sex that we vehemently dislike as rape, and sexual attitudes that we strongly disapprove of as examples of rape culture. For centuries, the legal definition of rape was intercourse accomplished by force and without consent. Many states have done away with the force criterion, and no longer require proof that the victim physically resisted the assailant or failed to do so because of reasonable fear of injury. With force absent from rape definitions, there has been increasing pressure on how to define consent. In the past several years, on many college campuses, consent has become affirmative consent, according to which not obtaining agreement before each sexual act is sexual misconduct. California and New York require affirmative-consent policies at schools receiving state funding. Some college campuses have gone even further and defined consent as not only positive but "enthusiastic" agreement to have sex. Anything short of that becomes sexual assault. It is not surprising that Judge Smukler, presumably influenced by these ideas, would say that, even though lack of consent had not been proven, this didn't mean that the girl had, in fact, given consent. Far-fetched at the time, Catharine MacKinnon's 1981 statement, "Politically, I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated," is effectively becoming closer to law, even if it is not on the books.'

Celebrating Brit Shalom Brings Its Message of Inclusion to Union for Reform Judaism

Matt · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Being so involved in the circumcision issue, it's easy for me to forget that many are still unaware of the anatomical facts, or even the controversies surrounding the practice. This was evident during my recent trip to the Union for Reform Judaism Biennial, held this year in Orlando, Florida. "Why would any parent want to opt out?" "Hasn't it been proven healthier?" These were among the many questions that Lisa Braver Moss and I encountered during the five day event.

Thanks to the generous backing of three individuals—the first underwrote the $2000 cost of our booth; the second provided funds for set up and materials; and the third donated his skills as a graphic artist—we were able to have a booth in the exhibit hall during this important conference where we showcased our new book,Celebrating Brit Shalom. While staffing the booth, we engaged scores of rabbis and those with leadership roles in their congregations, as well as lay members of the Reform community. We sold several dozen books (and gifted a number as well). More importantly, we engaged a very progressive and thoughtful group of Jewish people who were often eager to hear what we had to say.'

Malecare: Respond to PSA test decision

Matt · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Soon after our October 29 email, Malecare sent questions to Albert Siu, MD, Chairperson of the U.S. Preventive Services Task Force about plans to review their 2012 recommendation against the use of the PSA test for prostate cancer screening. Dr. Siu was quick to reply.

I encourage you to read our questions and his answers, here: USPSTF RESPONDS TO MALECARE

MALECARE EMAIL OF OCTOBER 29, 2015 RE-POSTED, BELOW:

The U.S. Preventive Services Task Force (USPSTF) posted a draft research plan on screening for prostate cancer. The draft research plan is available for review and public comment from October 29, 2015 to November 25, 2015. To review the draft research plan and submit comments, go to: http://bit.ly/1LEu5g3

The USPSTF is the organization responsive for the recommendation against prostate cancer screening. Their May 2012 recommendation reads:

The U.S. Preventive Services Task Force (USPSTF) recommends against prostate-specific antigen (PSA)-based screening for prostate cancer.

This recommendation has caused massive controversy throughout our health care system. We ask you to post your comments on the USPSTF website, at: http://bit.ly/1LEu5g3

Whether you agree with their 2012 finding or not, our prostate cancer community needs to be heard. This new research project gives all of us an opportunity to influence the outcome of prostate cancer screening in the United States.

Even if you don't know anything about research or the PSA test, it will be helpful to let the USPSTF know that prostate cancer patients and family members like you are keeping a watch on their work.

There are ten questions for you to comment on, spread over ten pages. For example, on page three, you are asked to comment, What are the harms of PSA-based screening for prostate cancer? You can select a multiple choice response and have the option to write one or several sentences with your personal thoughts. It takes about ten minutes or less to run through the pages, so please go to: http://bit.ly/1LEu5g3

Please let us know if you commented and or if you have any questions. You can email me directly at darryl-at-malecare.org

Best regards,

Darryl Mitteldorf, LCSW
Executive Director
Malecare

Men fighting cancer, together.
www.malecare.org
darrylm@malecare.org

Harvard law professors call ‘The Hunting Ground’ a piece of ‘propaganda’

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Sexual-assault prevention activists on campus rarely acknowledge the disproportionate rates of allegations against nonwhite students, which is why law professors have to remind them.

Nineteen members of the Harvard Law School faculty, heavily tilted to the left, including feminist and black professors, wrote their own press release today assailing the campus sexual-assault documentary The Hunting Ground as “propaganda” that continues to smear an innocent student, their own Brandon Winston.
...
Signatories include Janet Halley and Nancy Gertner, prominent feminists; Institute for Race and Justice Director Charles Ogletree and Laurence Tribe, both of whom taught future President Barack Obama; and Randall Kennedy, another expert in race relations and the law.'

'Affirmative Consent' Won't Work in Sexual Situations

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'Teaching about sex in high-school health classes is about to get even more controversial as a result of the passage of a new law in California ("For Teenagers, Sexual Consent Classes Add Layer of Complexity to Difficult Subject," The New York Times, Oct. 15). The state became the first to require that all high-school health education classes provide instruction about "affirmative consent." But I doubt that schools can do much to affect the behavior of young people in any sexual situation ("Schools Can't Stop Kids From Sexting. More Technology Can," The New York Times, Nov. 10).

What affirmative consent means is that each level of increased intimacy must be accompanied by verbal approval. It stresses that if someone is intoxicated or asleep, the person cannot be considered as giving consent. Colleges in California have been required to follow the rule since last year. But this is the first time it has been applied to high schools. It also expands what constitutes rape, which if strictly enforced will likely make felons out of many boys.

I applaud the intent of the new law, but I question how realistic affirmative consent is at either the high-school or college level. I say that because sexual passion and rational thinking do not mix any more than oil and water. It's a comforting delusion to believe that once students have been instructed about affirmative consent they will remember what they've been taught, either in person or via texting. I hope I'm wrong, but human beings are hardwired a certain way. We can try, but I don't think we will succeed.'

UK: Number of white working class boys taking AS or A-levels 'shockingly low'

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'White boys from poor families in deprived areas face the double disadvantage of poverty and geography that means they abandon education earlier than their peers in better-off areas, according to new research by Oxford University.

The findings, commissioned by the Sutton Trust, reveal the powerful and long-lasting influence of background in shaping educational outcomes and suggest that income is only partly responsible for the variations in levels of education by different groups.

The research found that just 29% of white working class boys from deprived neighbourhoods in England go on to take A-levels or AS-levels in sixth form, compared with 46% of white boys who came from the same economic background but lived in more affluent areas.'

Feminist film-maker criticised for making 'balanced' men's rights documentary

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'A feminist film-maker has been criticised for deciding to make a documentary about men's rights activists that takes "a balanced approach". Cassie Jaye, who has previously directed documentaries about sex education and gay marriage, endured problems with funding and a backlash from other feminists after announcing The Red Pill.

We weren't finding executive producers who wanted to take a balanced approach, we found people who wanted to make a feminist film," she told the website Breitbart. "I started to see the bias towards women's films and against men's. There are no categories for men's films [when applying for grants], though there are several for women and minorities. I submitted the film to human rights categories, and was rejected by all of them."

After funding was pulled, Jaye turned toKickstarter where she has raised almost $204,000, more than double her target of $97,000.

Jaye initially planned to profile the men's rights movement from a feminist point of view, but found her beliefs changing while filming the documentary. The Kickstarter page promises the film will document "a life-altering journey where she would never see the world the same way again".'

Vox Media Bans Staff from 'Mansplaining'

Mastodon · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Left-wing online media giant Vox Media has just announced its new code of conduct, which includes “strong discouragement” against “microaggressions”, described by Vox as “subtle put-downs which may be unconsciously delivered.”

“Regardless of intent, microaggressions can have a significant negative impact on victims and have no place on our team.”

But it doesn’t end there. Vox’s code of conduct also bans “mansplaining,” a bizarre term invented by feminists to describe men who explain things to women. By that logic, the vast majority of Vox’s content, which promises to “explain the news,” must be mansplaining. No wonder they’re paranoid.

With the sudden outbreak of politically correct hysteria at Missouri and Yale, it’s easy to forget that there are examples of wacky identity politics and bigotry outside of college campuses. Indeed, it’s America’s bonkers progressive media that is responsible for so much of it in the first place.'

U Missouri's director of ‘Greek Life’ placed on leave following confrontation with photographer

Mastodon · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'One of two female University of Missouri staffers seen confronting a pair of student journalists in a viral video has been placed on leave.

In a statement from Mizzou’s department of student life on Wednesday, Janna Basler has been relieved from her duties as director of Greek Life & Leadership, pending a university investigation into her actions.

In the video, shot Monday by Mark Schierbecker and later posted to YouTube, Basler and several other students attempted to block student photographer Tim Tai from taking pictures of Carnahan Quad, a public space on campus where members of the Concerned Student 1950 group had gathered in a makeshift tent city. Tai and Schierbecker were present to document student response to Tim Wolfe’s resignation as University of Missouri president.'

Denver Broncos and UCHealth team up for men's health

mens_issues · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It's nice to see the Denver Broncos addressing men's health issues. Excerpt:

'The Denver Broncos and proud partner UCHealth will use the month of November and a special event during the Broncos' Sunday Night Football game against the New England Patriots (Nov. 29) to raise awareness for men's health issues and encourage fans to receive their recommended health screenings.

Throughout the month, the Broncos and UCHealth will share information and tips on denverbroncos.com/menshealth and on social media platforms about health topics affecting men, including prostate and testicular cancer, heart health, exercise, nutrition, lung cancer screenings and the importance of annual checkups with a primary care physician.

"The Denver Broncos have some of the most dedicated and passionate fans in all of football," Broncos President and CEO Joe Ellis said. "We also want our fans to be as healthy as possible, and that's why we're committed to raising awareness about these important health issues."'

Police Officers Will No Longer Take Fitness Tests After Discrimination Lawsuit

Mastodon · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'"I think it's wrong."

Colorado Springs residents had a lot to say after hearing that Colorado Springs police officers will no longer have to take physical fitness tests this year.

"I think it's a mistake," Mary Jo Piccin told CBS4's Tom Mustin. "I think the police need to be able to chase down them criminals."

Last Friday the Colorado Springs Police Department agreed to the demands of 12 female officers who filed a civil suit claiming the fitness tests are discriminatory. All the officers were over the age of 40.
...
The police test consists of two running exams. Officers also have to do 52 push-ups in 2 minutes, and 45 sit-ups, also in 2 minutes.

The female officers who filed suit had been moved to desk duty after failing the test.'

No, feminists, college campuses are not like ISIS

Mastodon · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'File this under "headlines I can't believe I had to write."

Ms. Magazine, a feminist media outlet, posted an article (archived here so you don't have to give them traffic) by Global Rights for Women attorney Amy Lauricella on Tuesday titled "Institutionalized Rape; It's Not just an ISIS Problem." The article claimed that, just as the Islamic State endorses rape, "college administrations similarly facilitate and perpetuate the rape of women on campuses."

Lauricella's evidence for the claim that college campuses are just like the Islamic State is a deeply flawed survey of students who responded affirmatively to situations the surveyors decided were rape, even though the vast majority of those students didn't believe they had been raped. She uses the study to claim that as many as 1 in 4 college women have been sexually assaulted but doesn't acknowledge that what the study deems as sexual assault is everything from a stolen kiss to forcible rape.'

USA Today: Rousey shouldn't get a pass on DV el cid · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Domestic abuse is a vicious and violent crime that can never be tolerated, no matter the circumstances or the person committing it.

That includes Ronda Rousey.

The MMA star has largely gotten a pass for a violent encounter with an ex-boyfriend that she recounted in her autobiography published earlier this year. The incident occurred after Rousey confronted the ex-boyfriend, who she identifies only as “Snappers McCreepy,” about nude photos he’d taken of her, photos she worried would be leaked to the public just as her career was taking off.

“I slapped him across the face so hard my hand hurt,” Rousey wrote.

The ex-boyfriend doesn’t respond physically, but he blocks the door and refuses to move when Rousey tries to leave.

“I punched him in the face with a straight right, then a left hook. He staggered back and fell against the door,” Rousey wrote. “… I slapped him with my right hand. He still wouldn’t move. Then I grabbed him by the neck of his hoodie, kneed him in the face and tossed him aside on the kitchen floor.”'

"Million Student March"

Matt · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'Student demonstrations are set to engulf the U.S. today in the ‘Million Student March’, as activists from campuses around the country stage a day of protests against tuition fees and student debt, further inflamed by recent social justice protests at Yale and Missouri.

A statement from the activists reads: “We are people of all colors, genders, and sexual orientation, and we are united to fight for education as a human right.” Protesters are calling for tuition-free public college, cancellation of student debt, and a $15 minimum wage for college workers… plus a lot of other stuff about “straight white male patriarchy” and rape culture on campus.

The atmosphere is likely to be particularly charged given that the day of protests occurs after a week of political unrest on U.S campuses, particularly Yale and the University of Missouri, over racial issues. Breitbart News will bring you live updates from around the country as the protests unfold.'

UK: BBC3's anti-male coverage shows that men's issues are still not taken seriously

Mastodon · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'On Monday, BBC3, the corporation's channel dedicated to teenagers and young adults, aired the latest documentary in its gender season, The Rise of Female Violence, in which presenter Alys Harte explored everything from alcohol-fuelled female street violence to knife attacks by girl gangs and female-perpetrated domestic abuse.

At the heart of the show were two questions: 'Does society treat female-on-male violence less seriously than when the genders are reversed? And if so, why?' A very good place to find the answers to both of these questions is in the one-sided gender narrative typified by BBC3 itself.

...

The most-recent in this parade of male murderers and abusers aired just a week before Monday's female violence documentary, entitled Britain's Biggest Sexists. An hour-long roll call of shame, it asked four comedians - three women and "a token man", as the female presenter quipped at the start – to scrutinize everything from Lad Culture and pick up artists to discrimination against women in The City and sexist chants on football terraces. For the shows denouement, the comedians were asked to judge who they considered to be "Britain's Biggest Sexist".'

Press Owes Gigantic Apology To Palantir Founder Over Fake Rape Claims

Mastodon · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

"'Horrifying. “Sickening.” “Horrific.” That’s how tech and mainstream news outlets irresponsibly and negligently reported on false rape accusations against Silicon Valley venture capitalist Joe Lonsdale, who was convicted in the media long before he cleared his name in court.

The story began when Lonsdale was accused of rape by his former intern, Elise Clougherty, whom he had previously mentored while she was a student at Stanford University. Between 2012 and 2013, Clougherty and Lonsdale were in a relationship. After the relationship ended, Clougherty would allege that it was physically and emotionally abusive and that Lonsdale engaged in “hundreds of non-consensual, and often violent, sexual acts.” Clougherty has now withdrawn all of her claims, and the case has been dropped.

Lonsdale, who filed a counterclaim of defamation, said that Clougherty was hurt that he had ended the relationship and described her claims as a “vengeful, personal attack” aimed at hurting his career. In a statement, Lonsdale claimed to have a text from Clougherty to a friend, in which she described her plans as a “Joe take-down scheme.”'

Boy, 9, threatened with sexual harassment charges for writing love note

Mastodon · 13 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Excerpt:

'A 9-year-old Florida boy could face sexual harassment charges for penning love notes to a girl in his class, his furious mother said.

The tiny admirer gushed about his crush, telling her she's "pretty and cute" while boldly revealing his feelings for her in the handwritten loose-leaf letter, ABC Action News reported.

"I like you," the Tampa fourth grader in the Hillsborough County Public Schools district wrote inside a heart drawing. "I like your hair because it is not sloppy. I like your eyes because they sparkle like diamonds."

The romantic proclamations landed the little boy in the principal's office, where school officials threatened they'd get authorities to slap him with sexual harassment charges, according to ABC.

They said his pining was inappropriate and came in several "unwanted" letters.

It also prompted other students to tease the young writer, saying he wanted to see the girl naked, though the notes never expressed any sexual intentions, the news station said.

"He's 9," said the boy's mother, who wasn't identified. "What little kid doesn't write love notes? My 9-year-old doesn't even know what sexual harassment means."'

Ronda Rousey admitted to beating up her ex, so should we be outraged?

Mastodon · 13 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. Excerpt:

'"I fully accept my bias," Pentico said. "A well-trained, well-toned, football player cold-cocked his fiancée and dragged her out of an elevator without any emotion. It was an assault. It was a violent, blood-curdling assault. If that was my daughter, I would lose my mind.

"I own that there's a double standard here," Pentico continued. "Until the tables turn in our society, it is going to be that way."

Pentico explained, "a woman's fear of a man is different from a man's fear of a woman." And that is true in almost all cases. Men don't fear being sexually assaulted, or attacked as they walk down the street at night, or drugged in a bar. Physical violence and sexual violence are closely linked for women, and not nearly as much for men.
...
Still, society's attention to domestic violence against women might be undermining a needed attention to domestic violence against men. According to a 2010 study by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention, more than 5 million men had been domestically abused in the prior year. And the same study found 40 percent of cases of severe domestic violence were perpetrated on men. "About 1 in 4 women (24.3 percent) and 1 in 7 men (13.8 percent) have experienced severe physical violence by an intimate partner," the study found. So the idea that domestic violence against men isn't a major issue is simply untrue. It's a problem too, just one that isn't treated as such.'

Documents reveal due process concerns for UVA by Governor

Matt · 13 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Story here. Bear in mind, McAuliffe is a dyed-blue Democrat and been a cheerleader for The Hildebeast in years past... and even he has "concerns". Excerpt:

'The University of Virginia waged an intense fight over the summer to influence the conclusions of a federal investigation into sexual violence at the school, newly obtained documents show, while Virginia's governor personally pressed the nation's top education official to ensure that the elite public flagship would not be unfairly tarnished.

Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D) [link added] urged U.S. Education Secretary Arne Duncan to give U-Va. a chance to review the findings of the four-year investigation of the school's record on sexual assault before they were made public, saying he feared that U-Va. was being denied "very basic requirements of due process."

McAuliffe also expressed concern about what he viewed as an "adversarial" posture from the investigative agency — the U.S. Education Department's Office for Civil Rights — toward U-Va. The governor said he preferred "constructive and cooperative" approaches to reform.

"I respectfully urge you to act in order to guarantee that the very important work of OCR at the University of Virginia is not undermined by any unfair or unjust process," McAuliffe wrote Duncan on Aug. 14.'

Anti-male ignorance on parade at the CBC

fathers4fairness · 14 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Article here. In the heated exchange on “The Sunday Talk” segment of CBC’s The National (Nov 8), I was incredulous at the politically-willed ignorance and prejudice on display. The two opposing panelists were both ardent feminists who approve denial of official status to men’s groups. Excerpt:

