If she stops moving completely and just rests her head on you, she's smitten and really likes you a lot (and tread carefully if you're not into commitments!)

As a last note, I avoid it when I'm dating women who are around my height because the stereotype of the slow dance is "man taller, woman shorter".
So maybe you want to skip this if you're around the same height or if she's taller (or keep it for after intimacy).

3. Mellow Classics

> The Romance Bread & Butter

These will form the bulk of your playlist.

You can talk over them, or cook while you listen, or, well… Also get down to it of course.
Expand your romantic playlist with mellow classics until it's several hours of songs, so it can cover a whole night.

Pick depending on your tastes here as long as the sound is mellow, romantic, and warm.
The goal is to display your "romantic side", so it's best if at least a few of them are popular and she's heard them before.

Some ideas:

- James Blunt: I picked "High", but he's got several good ones
- Dylan: Lay, Lady Lay: a nice ballad
- The Cure: "Pictures of You" is a good one
- Highwayman: a romantic string of adventures through reincarnation. You know women dig those ;)
- Moby, Porcelain:
- Simon & Garfunkel, Scarborough Fair: a transcendental sound for a transcendental experience
- Pearl Jam: Wishlist is great for romantic nights
- Classical: if you go classical, pick something easy on the ear or it'll be too much (Ennio Morricone here from "Once Upon A Time In The West)
- Kings of Leon: Closer is about a vampire, a common woman's fantasy. Perfect to slowly move closer and kiss/bite her on the neck
- Certe Notti by Ligabue: if you're an English speaker adding some foreign songs is a must. It makes you come across as more worldly and open-minded

These are better for later on and not first dates since they clearly reference "love":

- All of My Love by Led Zeppelin
- The One I Love by REM

4. Romance Soundtracks: Your Songs

Romance Soundtracks are songs specific to your story and relationship.

They stress the "us" and must feel unique to you two.

It's always good to stress and openly state (ie.: "thread expand" and "surface") each special moment you enjoy so they grow bigger, and get burned into her memory.
And the romance soundtrack is one way of doing exactly that, with a song.

For example, when I was in a relationship with a girl flying to see me, a song that spoke to us was "leaving on a jet plane" by Peter Paul and Mary.

Or if you meet a woman during your party years, it might be a party song, too ("Sky and Sand" by Paul Kalkbrenner was another big one for me).

When I'm living in Berlin, another popular artist has been David Bowie since he was living in that city and was a great representative of the "alternative" vibe that many people enjoy about that city.

The more the songs talk about you two, the better.

Play these songs more than once and she will come to associate that song with you two -or simply with the night together-.
And if you stay together for longer, they can become the songs of your relationship.

Soundtracks don't necessarily need to be sentimental in a stereotypical way.
But they must give you two the feeling of being bonded, special, eternal, or living an unforgettable moment with no past and no future -simply suspended in time-.
And they must pack a strong emotional punch. Have a "soul".
The essence of romance.

Some examples of songs with a strong emotional punch:

- We Can Be Heroes: Romance for the Underground. You two can beat The Man. Just for one day. Or forever and ever. The essence of romance.

> "We can be heroes, just for one day;
> We can be heroes for ever and ever"

See what we're talking about here?
We can be heroes. Just for one day, on this very special day, you're living together.
Or we can be heroes forever and ever, hinting at the possible beginning of a great love story.

- Sky & Sand: romance for the party people

> Design our own world,
> Ain't nobody understand.
> As long as we are flyin',
> All this world ain't got no end

See again?
"We design our own world, that nobody understands" are the perfect lyrics.
They speak of you, being so special together, that you're in a bubble where there is only the two of you -and nobody else understands that-.

- Gigi D'Agostino – L'Amour Toujours: the king DJ of the '90s, with another song for party lovers

> I still believe in your eyes
> I just don't care what you have done in your life
> You'll be my baby and we'll fly away
> And I'll fly with you, I'll fly with you

One video version of this song is also perfect as a video, with anime characters (Final Fantasy?) moving in a world of fantasy:

Final Fantasy also works for ambiance and background videos for your seductive environments.
It works great because the stories are modern interpretations of millennia-old myths of knights and heroes fighting the "good battle" against monsters and dragons. And the women in the saga look feminine and submissive, so their expressions subconsciously frame the interaction as men in charge, and women following.

5. Trance Rhythm

> To go into trance

Says a neuroscientist on Quora:

> Trance music calms down the limbic Brain.
> It brings down stress-related neuro chemicals and hormones like cortisol and norepinephrine. And at the same time can increase the levels of oxytocin and Serotonin which are happiness and trust Neurochemicals.
> Quora's answer by neuroscientist, redacted for brevity

Sounds like the perfect music to throw away the mask.
And grow intimate with the release of bonding neurochemicals.

Some survivors of psychopathic love say that "hypnosis and trance" is a tactic of seduction.

6. Romance From Exotic Sounds

> The Romance Of Far Away Lands

Relationships born in the same cultural and socio-economic background are the most common.

And also the most boring.
Give her a dream of a faraway place and time instead.

Music from a place with no boring jobs, traffic, and inept men.

Music from a land of unending romance and love

Gondolas in Venice, sopranos in Spain, and “elle ne regrette rien avec toi” when it hails from Paris.

If you have nothing that screams romance about your background, weave a story around the song as it starts playing.
Say what it talks about, what it reminds you of.

Pristine white mountains, sunsets on the beaches, backpacking adventures…

You talk about them, she dreams of experiencing their sublimated essence… With you in mind.

7. A Song For You To Sing On

> Taking It To The Next Level

Put in your playlist a few songs you can sing along with.

Sing them on your own as well so you also get better -and make yourself happier, too-.

It wouldn’t hurt to have a great voice but you don’t need to be great.
Actually, you might even get some points for singing badly: it shows you’re not afraid of making a fool out of yourself.

And sing early if she’s a bit nervous, it will release tension and put her at ease.

Like Ashton Kutcher shows you:

> Him: Roll the windows down, turn the music up, and make an ass out of yourself, it puts them at ease

The good thing about singing also is that it shows a positive, happy personality.
An attitude of “Lust For Life” to quote Iggy Pop. That’s a very, very positive trait. We all want to be around positive people.

I know the lyrics of most songs I like, so I can pick whichever moment I want to make a fool out of myself.
This one is the most stereotypically romantic song I have in my playlist, which sounds difficult but is actually rather easy to sing on: Tu Che Mi Hai Preso Il Cuor.

And bonus points if you have a guitar of course.

Note: we’re talking about just a bit of singing here, a few lines of lyrics. It’s not a performance.

8. Break Pattern Songs

> Roller Coaster Ride

Similar concept to “venue change”:

Same as always sitting in the same place can feel stale, staying always in the same tempo and rhythm can start feeling dull.
And if it’s all very high romance, it can start feeling saccharine.

Changing the tempo and mood of your songs is often a good idea.

I like to mix more romantic songs with something happy and lively as well.

For example:

- Dancing In The Dark: Keep the romance mood but with more rock power
- Summer of 69: The melancholy of reminiscing on a great young love mixed with an uplifting beat. An air of rebellious freedom from the ’60 plus 69 in the title :).
- It’s My Life: It’s now or never, I just wanna live while I’m alive, my heart is like an open highway, an optimistic shout to enjoy the moment
- You’re Simply The Best: if you’re having a great time, she’ll associate “the best” with you
- Rolling Stones: most of the Stones is great, a great mix of rock and sensual
- Libiamo: the perfect classical song for the situation. Explain to her it’s about drinking and enjoying life: you set the right frame and even come across as cultured
- Rihanna’s “We Found Love”: there’s something perversely beautiful and addictive in the whirlwind romance mixing craziness, love, and abuse

Same as for the blinking lights in seductive environments, you want smooth shifts from one state to another.
So you want to stay in that “happy song section” for at least a few songs before going back to the mellower sounds.

Avoid These Songs

Unless you're already lovers, skip any song with guys who:

- Promise they'll do anything for her
- Cry their heart out
- Sad-sack mood, since research shows positive-affect music made men more attractive
- Complain about breakups/women/life

They send the wrong message.
And unless you're thinking about getting serious or are already serious, I would avoid all those (many) songs falling in this category:

- Professing eternal love

I would personally avoid anything too overly sentimental as well.
For example, I used to like Elvis Presley a lot but too many of his songs are a bit too mushy and low-power.

The Mindset of Romancing

The perfect romancing playlist starts with you at the helm.

The best playlist won't make for a great evening of romance by itself.

But a cool guy who knows how to move plus a great romantic playlist will take her to heaven.

Here is what needs to go along with that romantic playlist:

A Man Leading

You can alternate songs with her.

Sometimes.

But once you're 100% in romancing mode, don't ask her what she likes, or if the music is OK for her. This is no “getting to know each other time” or the moment to go for parity of the sexes.

One must let go to fully experience romance. So let her go 100% without worrying about anything.
You let go 90% and with the other 10% make all the rest happen (the songs, the drinks, the dance, the light conversation, and then the lovemaking).

It’s your world she’s stepping into, you’re leading this dance. Take her by the hand and bring her along on a beautiful journey of romance.

A Contagiously Passionate Man

You’ll notice this post is not just a list of romantic songs.

It’s because the songs must mean something to you.
Romance is feelings, and feelings are notoriously contagious.

You must love the songs you pick.
At times you will describe them, explain what’s so great about them, why you like them so much, and sometimes you will sing over them a bit.

Be passionate, love the moment and she’ll be passionate with you.

Summary

Think about the most romantic movie scenes you know.

Or some great romance in your life.
Probably there was a song or a few songs linked to them.

Good music is an essential moment to enjoy a great night of romance and you should take good care of building your own romance playlist.

Why Men Love Bitches: Is This Feminist Approach to Dating Effective (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Why Men Love Bitches (2002) is a dating book for women promoting dating strategies based on emotional and financial independence, female power, and some potentially manipulative dating games.

TPM Strategic Audit: We analyze Argov's to provide strategic awareness on female dating strategies, potential manipulation tactics, and dating red flags. It's essential knowledge for high-value men in order to vet for quality women and make decisions that are good for both.

Quick Review

High-quality men love high-quality women. As simple as that.

Why Men Love Bitches advocates for a 'me-first', assertive way of dating, but the problem is that overly assertive women tend to date poorly.

The 'bitch' is:

- Independent
- "not needing a man" and
- High power

The type of woman who'd proudly sing "I can buy myself flowers".

And power is good: this website is all about power and personal empowerment.

However, when it comes to dating effectiveness, things are not as straightforward.
Power is almost always good for men, but research shows that power for women comes with important costs (unless she's very astute in wielding it).

And that's especially true in dating.

In dating, high-power women tend to repel many high-power and successful men and only retain lower-value and more submissive men.

So while some power is good for displaying some value, too much power backfires.
Generally speaking, female power above a certain threshold reduces her options.

A book for women who are WAY too nice (only)

Here's the issue:

Why Men Love Bitches doesn't provide dating advice that works for all, or even most, women.

As a matter of fact, I'd say that Why Men Love Bitches* is only suited for a specific subset of overly submissive, overly naive women.

As the subtitle of the book suggests, such as “from doormat to dreamgirls”, Why Men Love Bitches is best suited for women who are “too nice”.

But it is not a very effective strategy for the majority of women because women maximize their sexual market value at lower levels of power than men:

“Independent” is only attractive UP TO A CERTAIN LEVEL
Just as a quick example, take availability.

Argov recommends being more on the unavailable end.

However, contrary to the book’s advice research shows that available women are actually more attractive to men (Birnbaum et al., 2013).
Of course, any single research isn’t the end-all-be-all. And you don’t want to be too available to the point where it feels like you have no life whatsoever. That would be too much and decrease your value.

But the point remains: “be unavailable to display power” is not good general advice.

Not A Book For Win-Win Relationships

Another issue with the book is that it focuses on dating power dynamics and relationship control.

That means that Why Men Love Bitches* is less suited for win-win, supportive relationships.

The risk of going into the “bitch” way of dating is the same as for toxic masculinity.
And it’s that one starts seeing relationships as zero-sum games where only one partner can win, and only if the other loses (a mindset leading to combative relationships).

Finally, it’s not effective with high-quality men, since high-quality men tend to be leaders, successful, and high in dominance.
And successful men rarely enjoy an overpowering woman who plays games and seeks to lead and control the dating process.

Also, read the foundational law of balance article and as it applies to dating:

> Why Balance Is Most Seductive

What I Liked

There are some good insights in Why Men Love Bitches.

Albeit not a psychologist, the author has an intuitive grasp of power dynamics, which makes some of her analyses very on point.

Her analysis on nagging for example, was very insightful.
She says nagging reassures men that she cares and he 'has her'. It's true, although the author missed on the power of nagging.

Potentially good advice in the right doses include:

1. Love yourself and your life first (or you become dependent on him)
2. Control the pace of the relationship, and keep it slow (or you go too fast and burn out)
3. Let him come to you <— There are exceptions to this
4. Never make him feel like he "has you" (or he will lose interest) <— Potentially trapping you to play game for the whole relationship

The last one can backfire.

Many men prefer women who become "his" -and many high-power men would only date seriously women who become "his"-.

The overall message is "be strong, be independent, and he will fall for you".
You can read more techniques in:

- How to make him value more: the "game-playing way"
- How to make him chase you: the healthier way

> 10 Mindf*ck Ways To Make Him Value You More

And, finally:

- How to make him go crazy: the sexual side of female dating strategies

What's Wrong

The main issue with Why Men Love Bitches is simple:

1. Feminine Women Date Better Than Bitches

Generally speaking:

Feminine* women who love, support, and even display slight submissiveness to a high-quality man date better than high-power women.

Power, strength, and independence in a woman follow the law of optimum balance: you need some of it to avoid being a total pushover that only attracts losers.
But if you have too much of it, most men are turned off -including successful men-.

And power for female dating has a low threshold point: it's easy to overdo it.

Here's that "optimum balance" in chart terms:

In brief and put it bluntly: high-power women are less attractive and have fewer opportunities.

2. The "Men VS Women" Approach Is Ineffective With High-Quality Men

The "men VS women" frame sells but doesn't work.

That approach leads to poor relationships and, potentially, to toxic relationships.

This is exactly what happened to this reviewer, who started applying the advice in her relationship:

> That being said, the advice for people in long term relationship is garbage. I have been in a relationship for almost 2 years and reading this book almost RUINED EVERYTHING. If you are in a long term relationship and you are told by a book to 'pull away' emotionally and physically until he sees what he is missing...then you are not in a relationship with a man, you are in a relationship with a BOY. This book should be titled "Why BOYS loves bitches". That would make more sense. If you continually want to play this cat and mouse game with your boyfriend then go for it. But it will leave you exhausted and unfulfilled.
> I tried following the 'advice' given in this book and we suffered because 'pulling away' and waiting for him to figure out what's wrong is absolute BS. I felt misunderstood, confused and angry that he couldn't read my mind. Then I realized "I'm an ADULT. This MAN that I am dating is an ADULT. We should be ADULTS and not play juvenile games."

Combative advice makes for combative relationships. It's that simple.

Unluckily, this is common in the dating advice industry.
The same happens in many dating books for men.
These books end up being misogynists because they frame dating and relationships as battles to be won (see the review of "The Rational Male" for more).

I expect my relationships -and my partners- to seek mutual support and caring.
Because if not, why being a relationship at all?
That's what high-quality men and high-quality women seek.
And that's why focusing on power and control only lands you poor-quality men and women.

After all, why should a man with options be in a relationship with an uncollaborative woman who engages in manipulative games?

High-quality men with options demand partners who add value to their lives. These men are often busy building, acquiring power and influence, and they prefer a supportive woman to help them along their journey. And if instead of adding value their partner focuses on playing games, they will drop her.

That's why I advise women (and men) to drop win-lose mindsets and nasty power moves:

> 10 Nasty Games Women Play (Women, Stop These!)

3. Traditional Family Men Want Supportive Women, Not Bitches

Traditional family men want a wife who supports them.

And guess what: most men who want a happy marriage are traditional.

You may not like Trump, but he's a prototypical "alpha male type".
Listen to what he says about his divorce from Ivana:

> Trump: Putting a wife to work is a very dangerous thing.
> That was the single greatest cause of what happened to our marriage
> Her softness disappeared. There was a great softness to Ivana
> (…)
> She became an executive, not a wife

There you have it.
Trump wanted a good support woman, not an independent bitch.
And I guarantee you that many men are like that.

4. Don't Learn Happy Relationships From Singles

DeMarco calls it the "paradox of practice".

In brief, the paradox of practice means to "sell advice that the author herself hasn't used to succeed".

Argov also wrote "Why Men Marry Bitches", but as a cautious reader, you may want to ask yourself if Argov or other practitioners of "bitch dating" are in a happy relationship.

I don't know about Sherry Argov's personal relationships, but as the learner who wants to maximize her options you should definitely ask yourself:

Are the women promoting and practicing Why Men Love Bitches advice dating high-quality men?

OR…

Are they mostly single & bitter, or in a relationship with a doormat?

From what I've seen, some of these women promoting the "bitches" advice are either:

1. Selling, without making sure the material works
2. Deceiving the competition for personal gains
3. Justify their choices with a convenient narrative to reframe their loneliness

However, it's not a case of "everyone's bad".
Some are honestly clueless.
And some others have been victims of less-than-ideal men.

So this is not necessarily an attack on many women who instead deserve understanding -or compassion-.

Some women got into this type of mindset and advice after they dated assholes, avoidant men, sociopaths, narcissists, and the male equivalent of bitches.

So it's understandable.

Still, it doesn't mean this advice works.

5. Poor Approach To Date Higher Quality Men

The "bitch" of the book seems quite a game player.

And that doesn't work well with high-quality men with options and competing interests.

Example from the author in a private video:

> Woman: (plays games)
> Men: (falls out of love)

I usually recommend high-quality women who seek high-quality men and who want high-quality relationships to date differently.
You must plant the seeds for a high-quality relationship.

And a high-quality relationship demands mutual support, which starts with dating.

You can also read:

- Mutual escalation to date high-quality men
- Most common dating mistakes for women

You can also see one real-life example here.

I found instead the bitch of Why Men Love Bitches advice being more on the bellicose end rather than on the "we're in this together".

> 7 Biggest Dating Mistakes Women Do (Before Sex)

5.2. Making Him Chase and Invest Is Good... But Harmful When She Overdoes It

Sherry Argov recommends women make him invest in them.

That's common advice in the dating literature for women and there is some evidence to confirm that it works.

For example, studies show that givers feel more committed to the recipient after giving.
So a man doting and investing in her will like the woman more.
In that sense, Why Men Love Bitches is right.

Yet, whether that technique works or backfires, depends highly on the environment you are dating in, and the type of man you are dating.

But, generally speaking, you don't want to try too hard to make him chase.

Why Not?

Because today there are more high-quality women than men, which gives men an advantage in general.
And that's even more true for high-quality men.

Asking for big investments upfront drives away the men who have the most options -and those are the ones whom ideally you want to get-.

Just look at this real-life example:

She dates like a "bitch".
If I have other options why should I want to date her beside a sexual thing? No self-respecting man would pick her for a relationship

That's why I say that this approach of "dating like a high-powered bitch" who makes men chase and invest works great… For average and below-average men.

If you don't believe me, there are studies showing that men prefer kind women. And especially so for long-term relationships.

I recommend you take a look at "why dating for successful women is harder (and what they can do about it)".

> Why Successful Women Fail At Dating (& How to Fix It)

This is especially true if she is not well versed in asking without giving back in equal amounts.
When she dates with "getting as much as possible" in mind, it's very easy looking like a low-quality woman.
Discerning men who are attuned to social dynamics will never be OK with giving and giving without anything in return (and again, those are ideally the men she wants).

This is why, overall, I cannot fully agree with Why Men Love Bitches without adding a few caveats.

5.3. Letting Him Wait For Sex Can Backfire If It Feels Like A Game

Sherry Argov seems to recommend that she lets him wait for sex.

And, again, there are plenty of reasons why that's a good idea, including the male's ingrained mindset of dividing women along the “Madonna-whore dichotomy“.

For the exceptions also check out:

- Should you make him wait for sex?
- Dating rules and exceptions

And for the techniques on how to actually delay sex, check:

- How to delay sex (and enhance the relationship)

> How To Slow Down Sex & Get A Relationship

6. You Lose Out In Relationships

I’ve dated my fair share of women who either:

- Speak straight, including admitted they needed time/attention
- Play games, including hiding their need for time and attention

And that’s a major problem for “bitches” in relationships with high-quality men who demand and expect straight talk.

It does show you’re playing games, and he’ll lose respect and attraction.

Real-life example:

She hid her feelings to look “strong”, and ruined the relationship for it (for both)

This woman acted like Argov’s “bitch” who “doesn’t need him”.

But it wasn’t her true and honest self.
So she put up a fake persona and never spoke straight about her needs and wants.

Instead, she played the game.

For a long time.
She pretended she didn't need much contact, and refrained from contacting me when she wanted to talk.

And this is among a slew of other "power games" that align with the "ideal bitch".
For example, whenever I couldn't pick up the phone, she also withdrew and avoided sending good night wishes.
She never spoke up that she felt spurned when I couldn't pick up -or that she'd expect a call back, something I could have agreed with-.

But of course, I teach this stuff, and I knew what was up.

Anyway, back to her "need for attention" that she hid.
That was also the straw that broke the camel's back.

She suffered (in silence) for as long she could.

And when she finally spoke up, it was too late.
I had lost a lot of respect for her and that was the last straw.
I lost respect for her for playing games for so long. For not (having the courage to) speak straight and early. And for playing a game of power instead of the game of partnership and making it work together that I expected -and clearly told her multiple times-.

What's sad is that, generally, she's actually a very good person.

But by the time we reached that point, I had to come to the conclusion that she too into the (sneaky) game of power, than a partnership.

At that point, I didn't believe anymore a good relationship with her was even possible.

No matter how good a person, is, if she can't put that good to work WITH you, it's useless.

7. No, Men Don't Love Bitches

When reviewing "Why Men Love Bitches", the ultimate question is:

> Do men love bitches?

The short answer is: no, most men don't love bitches.

And it's ESPECIALLY men looking for a committed relationship who dislike bitches.

Much of the modern attrition you see online between genders is men's reaction to women who claim they don't need a man.

Of course, as for everything, there are exceptions.

A minority of power-hungry men can be motivated to pursue the bitch.
Those men are turned on by the quest to control, domesticate, and dominate the independent bitch.

However, that's NOT a healthy dynamic to set off.
One, it's high in games and manipulation.
And two, those men lose interest once they get her.
So the bitch would condemn herself to a lifetime of constant aloofness and distance, becoming in a way a bit of an emotionally unavailable (wo)man.

Most men though will never go for a bitch because they prefer women who are easier to get along with.
These are usually also the mentally healthiest men and men with a secure attachment style.

This isn't just my opinion, my personal experience, and my observation of the men around me, but several studies support this view.
You can read more in "submissive VS strong women" and "are men intimidated by strong and independent women?".

> Submissive Women VS Strong Women: Who Wins at Dating?

With some other men, it's best to make them feel like they have you and they protect you and take care of you. Sherry Argov mentions this, albeit at times as a manipulative tactic for getting what she wants.

This is the type of man and relationship that Steve Harvey describes in his bestseller Act Like a Lady Think Like a Man.
See an example here:

And read the full description here:

- How to make men want to invest and protect using selective submissiveness

In summary:
yes, some men are attracted to independent bitches because they want to tame and dominate them.
However, that's a short-term attractor only, and if the "struggle for power" continues only submissive men are going to stay after sex.
Ultimately, the dating market for more submissive and feminine women is larger and with more high-quality men than the dating market for the bitches.

Smart Women Agree

If you don't wanna take my word as a man, then listen to a woman teaching class and feminity.

Anna Bey, a former matchmaker who understands dating dynamics says it perfectly well:

> Anna Bey: If you are going to be incredibly cold and rigid just not to be a "pick me woman", you might > actually end up attracting a very submissive type of guy who loves being bossed around by a woman

With "cold and rigid", Bey is actually referring to too many games and to a dating approach that seeks power.

Who Should Read It: Too Nice Girls

Why Men Love Bitches can be a great wake-up call for certain types of women.

For example, it can be good for "women who love too much", women who are too nice, fall in love too quickly or get too clingy.
For these women, it can be a much-needed wake-up call.

In that sense, it's a bit like the equivalent of the red pill for men, and the corresponding book for men would be "No More Mr. Nice Guy".

For example, I once had a girl who used to drop gifts in my postbox.

She once came to bring a gift after I shared some negative news, and I couldn't even let her come in because… There was another woman at my place.

I have never felt more guilty in my dating life than on that evening. But my guilt didn't improve her lot. She should have learned to be a bit 'bitchier' maybe.

On the other hand, I must say that if "too nice girls" can pick men who appreciate them, they'll have great relationships.
Case in point: the girl who dropped gifts in my letterbox is now in a long-term, happy relationship :).

Review

Why Men Love Bitches transfers some feminist values of independence and self-efficacy to dating.

However, there's a contradictory undertone to the message if the ultimate goal is to get a man and be loved.

And therein lies a major issue if the book: if readers want to date well, this approach isn't the most effective. Especially for women who want a long-term, high-value partner.

Still, I enjoyed Why Men Love Bitches.
There is some overlap with this website.
It was one of the earlier books to bring some power dynamics into dating for women. However, our advice is to use that knowledge to develop more genuine and collaborative relationships.

The Mask of Masculinity: Book Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Mask of Masculinity (2017) lists four masks that men and alpha-male posturers wear in an effort to appear more "alpha", more dominant, and more attractive.
Lewis Howes suggests these masks are counterproductive as they lead to pain and poor relationships.

Bullet Summary

- Men live life obeying culture's rules of what it means to be a man
- The "masks" we wear to appear manly ultimately makes us weaker and unhappy
- Dropping the masks will free us to be ourselves and become better persons

Full Summary

About The Author:
Lewis Howes is a former athlete, entrepreneur, and founder of "the school of greatness", a show and podcast where he interviews various celebrities.

Introduction

Lewis Howes calls into question the idea of masculinity in our society.

He says it's not really working well for men.
They underperform women at school, have poorer social skills, and commit nearly 90% of the homicides.

At the same time, they are also 6 times more likely to commit suicide and much less likely to ask for help compared to women.

Masculinity is clearly failing men, Lewis seems to point out.

Removing the masks will make you happier, better, and more successful, Lewis says.
So let's start to see what these masks of masculinity are.

My Note:
I don't disagree with Lewis, yet it's not all about culture.
Much of that "masculinity" is also inborn. Also, read "The Blank Slate".

> Without masks, we can be who we really are

#1. The Stoic Mask

The stoic mask is possibly the most common and pervasive in our society.

Putting on the stoic mask the man pretends he has little or no emotions.

Lewis Howes says that ridding yourself of the stoic mask will give you emotional freedom, deeper permissions, and, lo and behold, the power of feeling those emotions again.

#2. The Athlete Mask

As a former athlete himself, Lewis Howes knows this one very well.

He says that some men equate being great at sports with being great at being a man.
They will force themselves through pain and injuries just to prove their worth and will spend hours and hours practicing or in the gym.

#3. The Material Mask

Men wearing the material mask will measure their worth by their… Net worth.

Bank account statements, cars, luxury items, and, these days, social media buzz as well.

Lewis Howes says that when we manage to drop this mask we will finally meet people who like us for who we are instead than for what we have. And we'll find peace and gratitude.

#4. The Sexual Mask

This man proves his worth with sexual conquests.

His value is the number of women he has been with. Relationships are for suckers, he thinks, a real man doesn't need that safety.
A real man loves and moves on.

The sexually masked man needs the next hook-up to feel good.
And he'll always be tense and hungry until, for a fleeting moment, he feels satisfied again after that next conquest.
And then, shortly after, the cycle begins again.

A man who manages to drop his sexual mask will finally find inner peace and he will finally be able to enjoy deeper relationships.

My Note:
This one rang true also from a personal point of view. However, this description only reflects the most stereotypically negative views and psychology of this archetype.

Also, read:

- The psychology of womanizers

#5. The Aggressive Mask

Men wearing aggressive masks act with disregard toward others.

The author says that some men think that going after what they want with full disregard for anyone else is a male trait, and that makes them strong and mannish.

Men wearing aggressive masks will often get into arguments and fights.

Lewis Howes says these men think it's ok to have enemies and to hate.

My Note:
And actually, I might go even further.
Some of these men base their own worth on having enemies and hating people. One of the mottos of Benito Mussolini's fascism was "many enemies, much honor".

The aggressive mask will have men always tense and restless.
They never allow themselves to forgive and move on. Moving beyond this mask will finally give men emotional stability and control and a more enjoyable, more peaceful life.

#6. The Joker Mask

This is the man who laughs at his problems and uses cynicism and jokes to show his tough, hyper-realist attitude.

It's also a way to show his superiority, of course, and they will use irony to seem superior:

> Friend: Do you want to talk about problems?
> Cynic: Sure Dr. Shrink, lemme just recline this chair and you can start fiddling your thumbs in the meanwhile.

The problem with the joker mask, says Lewis, is that it becomes an avoidance tool to move away from uncomfortable emotions.

When you drop this mask, Lewis says, people will finally take you more seriously and, similar to all other masks, you'll be able to establish deeper human connections.

#7. The Invincible Mask

The man with the invincible mask fears nothing.

He's a daredevil with little regard for the consequence of his actions and he "lives life to the fullest".
The bigger the risks, the more his chances of proving his manhood (and one of the reasons why men die younger).

Lewis says it's ok instead to admit our fears and not do something we don't want to do.
Once we drop the invincible mask our self-esteem will go up because we won't have to feel bad about what we fear and avoid.
And we'll get permission to just be instead of proving our mettle with doing.

#8. The 'Know-It-All' Mask

The know-it man must have all the answers and know what to do at any time.

This man feels like not knowing is a weakness, and that cannot be tolerated.

Men wearing this mask are more prone to "proving" their knowledge than to learning, which will leave them at a huge disadvantage when it comes to growing and learning.

This is also one of the worst kinds of fixed mindset.

As Lewis says, everyone knows a few things more than you do, and if you learn from them instead of proving your knowledge, you will progressively become a better and better man.

Dropping this mask will not finally allow you to grow, but will also make other people like you more and develop stronger relationships. Because, frankly, nobody likes a know it.

Also, read the description of a smart alec in "Archetypes of Dominance".

#9. The Alpha Mask

The alpha mask means a man must win and dominate anything he takes part in.

As the Internet population shows all too well, many men believe there are "alphas and betas".
You can't be both.

Also, read:

- Alpha male posturing

This is similar to what Brene Brown terms in Daring Greatly as "Viking mentality".
A Viking, similar to the Alpha Male, sees the world as a split between winners and losers.

Lewis says Alpha types are not even about getting what they want, they're about the illusion of winning and feeling in control.
Which makes them weak and easy to manipulate.

You might think you're the big alpha male, but you're actually profoundly weak, he says.

Alpha males can hardly connect with others and dropping this mask will make great things for you.
It will help you create win-win solutions and relationships and make others feel better, too.

Real-Life Applications

Learn Masks
I would say it's key for your development to learn what masks you're mostly wearing and how they affect you. By reading the book and the examples you will likely understand your own situation.
Then:

Choose Masks
See which masks you want to try to drop and which ones you want to keep if they help you somehow.

Power Moves Masks
Keep in mind sometimes you will need to put on some masks. That's also part of being socially shrewd in life. Not necessarily about tricking someone, but sometimes masks can also help you help someone.

CONS

How To Drop The Masks?
An explanation of why these masks exist and how to drop them could have been useful.

Is It Really A Mask?
This idea that you can take a mask and throw it away sounds appealing but… Are we really sure all those people are just pretending?
Maybe for some, it's not a mask, but more like how they're wired…

Masks… What If You Remove Them?
Imagine a man throwing all the above masks.
He feels he can say no to any scary thing, he doesn't "need" to sleep with women, he doesn't care about "material" stuff, he doesn't need a good career… And then what?
He's like neutered Brian couch potato?

Ideally, you might want to be able to throw off your mask and still push yourself.

Pros

Good Psychology
The Mask of Masculinity provides a very, very good practical psychology analysis of men in a format that is simple and understandable to everyone.
It might seem like "pop-psychology", but it's not. Simple, yes, but also realistic.

Useful
This book can be extremely useful to understand and improve yourself.

Lewis Howes Review

I think Lewis Howes is awesome.

And we also used him here as an example of a high-quality man.

This is why I was particularly surprised to hear that he outright refused to have Layne Norton on his show to discuss about nutrition.
Laye Norton is TPM's #1 recommendation when it comes to nutrition.
Layne said that Lewis got angry when he hinted that the guests he was having to speak about nutrition were quacks.

And albeit Layne can be a bit rough around the edges, I think it was not cool of Lewis to shut the door in his face.

Book Review

I find "The Mask of Masculinity" a great book to better understand psychology and the "boxes" many men live confined in.

You will gain a better understanding of how men work and, if you're a man, how you work. And that's huge because self-awareness is key to any real development.

I see The Mask of Masculinity a bit as the extension of Daring Greatly, considered by some the "Bible of vulnerability".

The message to drop all pretenses and have the courage and strength to be ourselves, including all our flaws and weaknesses is similar.
However, The Mask of Masculinity is mostly aimed at men and also adds a layer of very practical examples which makes it extremely useful.

Utility of Masks

I personally don't fully believe that dropping all the masks at once is the best strategy.

To begin with, you first should make yourself into a man who can drop all pretenses and still be somewhat socially appealing.

And second, you can use some of the pain and humiliation from the masks to propel you to the next level of achievement (Lewis himself explains how the pain of humiliation and a few masks he had propelled him into becoming a great athlete).

I also believe that mastery of oneself -and social mastery as well- is not always "being yourself".
But sometimes it's also about being able to put on this or that mask depending on the situation.

Also, read:

- Vulnerability is not power

In brief:

Great book.
Enjoyable, easy to understand, and useful.

Just as a reminder:

Law of balance.

Don't overboard with the vulnerability and openness and remember that coming across as "strong" is part of the "alpha male game of status".
And learning how to come across as an alpha male is important to learn.

Sex At Dawn: Summary, Review & Criticism

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Sex At Dawn proposes a different interpretation of human sexuality than the standard "Western ideal" of monogamy and paternal investment. The authors challenge the precept that we are mostly monogamous and that parents care about who their children are.
Instead, suggest the author, we are polyamorous and we are used to living in communes where people don't care who their children are.

Bullet Summary

- We are (probably) naturally more polyamorous than monogamous
- Physically speaking, we are in between polyamory and monogamy
- Men lose testosterone in monogamous long relationships and crave diversity

Summary

About the Authors:
Christopher Ryan did not originally have a background in psychology, evolutionary psychology, or any of the like. But he later acquired an M.A. and Ph.D. from an online learning program.
Cacilda Jethá, the other author, is Ryan's wife and is a doctor (M.D.).

Introduction

We didn't descend from apes.
We are apes, say the authors right away.
The standard narrative of sexual evolution goes like this:

1. Boy meets girl
2. Assess mate: he looks for youth, fertility, and fidelity; she for wealth, status, health, and MPI
3. They mate and form a long-term bond
4. He keeps an eye on her and on other girls to impregnate; she's wary he doesn't fall in love with another woman and keeps an eye on genetically superior men to have a quick fling (possibly during ovulation)

The authors say researchers claim to find evidence for that narrative, and it makes sense on paper.

But they say there's no real evidence and monogamy in the west is more an adaptation to social conditions than our true nature.

Part I: On The Origin Of The Specious

The authors say Charles Darwin was a genius and a gentleman for whom they have endless respect.

But as it's the case for most gentlemen, he was a bit clueless about women.

There are two theories as to why women copulate outside of fertile days. The standard theory from Fischer says it's to cement the bonding with a constantly horny male mate.

He wouldn't have a need to look for other females, and since he wouldn't know when she'd get pregnant he also has an interest in sticking around.

The other explanation is that it evolved to "seed confusion".
The woman mating with different males would leave them unable to know who was their children, so nobody would want to kill them but, just in the off chance, take care of them.

In either case, it's a world where both genders want to confuse and cheat each other.
The authors don't seem to buy into that.

Part II: Lust In Paradise (Solitary)?

The authors say the human specie is obsessed with sex.

And before the agricultural revolution sex used to be more of a shared thing, and not such a big thing.
There was an abundance of sex.

The institutionalized sharing of resources and sexuality spread and diminishes risks and secures a more peaceful and secure social environment.
This is the case in bonobo societies. The availability of women makes males far less violent.

The authors call into question the obsession that evolutionary psychologists give to being the genetic father of a baby.

They say that if "passing the genes" is the most important thing a parent should care for, then seeing his wife sleeping with his brother should anger him less.

But that's not the case, they say.
Many societies live caring about everyone's children. And so it was probably with our ancestors.

Part III: The Way We Weren't

When we evolved in smaller groups people gave with the expectation of receiving because everyone knew each other.
At least up to 150 people.

Karl Marx's error was not that of failing to understand human nature, but to apply to large societies when it actually works best in smaller groups.
And it seems like our hunter-gatherer society was more about sharing.

Then things changed with the end of nomadic life and the agricultural revolution no longer than 10.000 years ago - the day after yesterday in evolutionary terms-.

Agriculture is highly dependent on a number of factors that make famine and scarcity much more likely.
Scarcity made people more selfish and drove them to live in families and create a private property. Men and husbands wanted to make sure they were toiling the fields for their own children and nobody else. And that changed everything. Women became, as Darwin said, coy.

That also changed what women look for.

The authors say women look for wealth not genetically but by adapting to a world where men controlled a disproportionate share of resources.
It wasn't like that in the hunter-gatherer tribes, where people shared resources -and women-.

My Note:
Of course, women don't look for money genetically, but they might as well look for help genetically, which translates into resources.
This part here betrays, in my opinion, the liberal-idealistic nature of "Sex at Dawn".

Now here's the funny thing: women are more malleable than men.
They adapt more easily to the culture. So their adoption of monogamy was a bit easier than it was for men.

Part IV: Bodies In Motion

Males' testicles are a way of observing a species' sexual past.

Bigger testicles mean the male needed to fight bigger sperm wars.
Smaller testes mean the male didn't have to fight bigger sperm wars, telling us females were mostly monogamous or faithful to one man.

Human testicles are in between those of chimps/bonobos and bigger than polygynous gorillas.
The authors say the glass is half full or half empty depending on how you look at it.
We are in the middle, you could choose which view to heed the most, whether Polyamory or monogamy.

But they then add a twist: the testes' sizes likely changed in the 10.000 years since the agricultural revolution and our testes shrank since then.

The authors say humans produce lots of spermatozoons, so the only question is if they are competing among themselves or among someone else.
And they advance a few reasons why, they say, humans seem to be wired for competition with other men:

- Men ejaculate more after they've been away from their partner or suspect infidelity
- Women report stronger thrusting in the above cases
- Porn videos feature lots of gang bang but little reverse gang bang (ie: stressing competition)
- Men watching more men with a single woman ejaculate more

The authors then seem to suggest that the standard theory of being a mostly monogamous species doesn't hold up.
We evolved for polyamory, they seem to suggest.

My Note:
The authors don't cite any study and "women reporting stronger thrusting" is very unscientific.

If we also add a penis strongly adapted to sperm competition, the authors suggest we are leaning more toward polygeny.

Differences Among Races

The condom's width for Asia is 49 mm 52 mm for Europe and 53 mm for Africa.

What it means though is difficult to say since there are so many variables at play, including food and food availability.

My Note:

Other sources I read say there are no primate species in Africa that form pair bonding but there are some in Asia.

This seems to suggest that pair bonding developed later, not earlier.
It would also make sense that humans today are more pair-bonding species and that Africans have a bigger penis for sperm wars.

It would also fit with my veeeery anecdotal evidence that black women are (far) easier than white girls.
Even when you won't be having sex with black women, they are far warmer and more welcoming upon approaching.

Women's Vocalizations

The authors say that baboons' female vocalization communicates the female reproductive state and the status of the male copulating.

If you factor in that giving away your location to potential predators is actually dangerous in the animal kingdom, it convenes that a baboon's female vocalization is actually a call for other males around to stoke sperm competition.

Vocalization in the animal kingdom is associated with promiscuous mating and not monogamy, say the authors.

And guess what human females do?

Part V: Men Are From Africa, Women Are From Africa

The authors poke a little fun at the book Men Are From Mars, Women Are From Venus, and also attack The Moral Animal when Wright says we seem designed to make each other miserable.

They say that's not true and we are each a fragment of a greater unity.

Male VS Female Sexuality

Groups of men and women were shown different sexual scenes.

The scenes were either gay erotic, straight erotic, people at the gym, and two primates mating.

They were supposed to report how they felt about it as their blood flows were also measured.

Gay and straight men reported their status in line with their blood flow. Women were turned on by gay and lesbian scenes, but they reported less arousal.

When they watched heterosexual couples they were turned on and reported even higher arousal than their body indicated. They reported nothing to Bonobo on Bonobo action but their body… Kinda liked it too.

Basically, gay and straight men and women react according to their preferences.
But heterosexual women like everything.

The author says that's exactly what the theory of erotic plasticity suggests. Such as, that we -mostly women- are conditioned to like what society expects them to like.
It's worth keeping in mind why some women report no interest in sex or difficulties in reaching orgasm.

The Dangerous Pill

Women smelling shirts worn by males tended to prefer men whose Major Histocompatibility Complex best differs from theirs, which makes genetical sense.

Women on the pill though failed to pick the man who best fit her MHC or, worst, picked the one most similar to hers.

Repression and Violence

The authors cite a study saying that cultures repressing sexual behavior, especially in childhood and adolescence are closely related to violence.

Monogamy Drains Testosterone

Testosterone levels go down as the years advance, but it's not just age, the authors say, it's monogamy as well.

Married men have lower levels of testosterone compared to single men of the same age.
Fathers of young children have even less.

Affairs raise testosterone instead. Even just talking to an attractive woman raises a man's testosterone.

Notice:
Correlation does not necessarily imply causation, as the authors themselves admit.
Albeit the study shows that simply talking to a pretty woman seems to point toward the fact that female novelty raises testosterone levels.

For men, it seems, sexual monogamy leads to monotony.
That's why, the authors say, so many marriages end up being low-sex or no-sex marriages.
Novelty itself is the attraction.

Most men don't understand it until they're married (without a prenup) and have children and joint properties.

What's A Couple To Do?

The authors seem to criticize the current trend in the western world that cheating equals "packing your backs because the marriage is over".

They suggest staying wary of "one size fits all" recommendations but don't propose much more in the way of solutions.

Except, maybe, understanding better human nature and being more ready to… Understand?

Real-Life Applications

Don't Meet Guys On The Pill!

The pill will change your perception of man. Once you go off of it, you might not like your partner as much.

Watch Out For Monogamy
Monogamy is not easy. Especially for men.

Criticism

Albeit I enjoyed "Sex at Dawn", there is also much to criticize here.

The authors mention Rousseau and talk about "socialism working for smaller groups".
They talk a lot about sharing, sexual freedom, and female libido being repressed.
To me, it feels like they are falling for that idealistic "back then it was great and today all sucks" narrative.
Altogether, it makes me a bit suspicious of progressive, left-wing ideology-driven thinking.

And this idea that bonobos are nice and peaceful isn't even true. Robert Sapolsky who actually studied bonobos says they are incredibly nasty to each other.

Sex At Dawn indeed received a flood of criticism.
Steven Pinker calls it pseudo-science in a tweet (but then links a terrible book).
And I am personally very very skeptical that fathers used to care less about the paternity of children, as the authors claim. Well, lemme paraphrase: maybe fathers did not care indeed. And that's why those fathers are not well represented today :).

And I'm really not sure that societies were much more open toward sharing sexual partners.
At the of the day, without looking for evidence and data, which the authors don't seem to do too deeply, we're just discussing personal conjectures.
From my point of view, presenting unsubstantiated claims as facts is *unethical and manipulative.

For more on the ethics of manipulation, see:

> Manipulation: Techniques, Strategies, & Ethics

More criticism:

- Lots of Inferring

Lots of the authors' theories are not based on research.

Of course, evolutionary psychology cannot always and fully rely on research, but I wished they underlined that a bit more, which would have reduced their critics as well.

- Straw Man

It's such a human tendency to build an enemy where there's none.

The authors discuss the "standard narrative" and then "blame" it for covering up the truth with the monogamy ideology.

But there's no such standard narrative.

It seems to me that mainstream Evolutionary Psychology is quite clear in highlighting that extra-marital affairs have been part and parcel of our past and that monogamous relationships are often short-lived.

Review

I enjoyed "Sex at Dawn" when I first read it, and it taught me a lot.

Among the good point, it makes:

- monogamy is difficult
- monogamy lowers men's testosterone
- we are somewhat physically and emotionally wired for sperm competition
- heterosexual women are attracted to other women -albeit maybe not always consciously aware of that-

And albeit the book does not make that point, it's obvious to me that:

- Humans are highly plastic in their sexual expressions. They can go from monogamy to polyamory to partible paternity

Still, I found "Sex at Dawn" one-sided and, even more so, idealistic. This is not science, this is more like personal opinions and wishful thinking with a smattering of data to make it sound more credible.

The Way of Men: The 4 Masculine Virtues of Jack Donovan (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 8 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Way of Men (2012) is a manosphere and self-help book teaching male readers "what it means to be a man". Jack Donovan, the author, describes our ancestral days of cave-dwelling and hunter-gathering as the golden era of masculinity, banding together as men, and defending our caves.

The Way Of Men

About the Author:
Jack Donovan is an author and prominent manosphere figure. Although apparently attracted to same-sex individuals, he doesn't use the word 'gay' for himself and distances himself from gay culture when it overlaps with feminism and leftist politics.
Some consider Jack Donovan a red pill author, leaning into a "male-tribalist" subset (similar in that sense to Sebastian Junger).

Introduction

Donovan says we sometimes see men trying to get back to what it means to be men in a primordial way.
But they have to do so in a way that seems unnatural in a culture that does not accept those natural expressions of manliness.

To Donovan, being a man means going back to when we used to sit and camp around a fire, guarding our caves, women, and possessions.
Always looking outside at what could threaten us and always ready to attack it.

Men, says Jack Donovan, are judged by other men and attract women when they obey four core values:

#1. Strength

Men differentiate themselves from women because, on average, they're stronger.

Jack Donovan says that a woman can be strong as well.
And if she is, great.
But if she's not, nothing will change much. She will still have a good life and she'll have several men lining up happy to help her out.

But if a man is weak, that's a big stain for him that will make him less respected among other men.

#2. Mastery

Mastery is your level of skills in a certain field.

This will depend heavily on the type of gang you're in. If you're a soldier, it might be your endurance or your marksmanship.

If you're a football player, it could be how well you defend or how well you score.
If you're a firefighter, it might be your courage, or your ability to go climb a tree without any gear.

Mastery is equivalent to the "Magician" male archetype in "King, Warrior, Magician, Lover".

#3. Courage

Courage means taking action even when there are risks or dangers.

A man who takes no risks or sacrifices nothing for the gang is a man that cannot be relied upon, says Donovan.

Such a man, makes the gang more vulnerable.

My Note: Courage yes, cowboy no
I think it might be easy for men to misunderstand this step. Being overly courageous and putting people's lives at work for personal glory is not courage, but it's bad leadership.
That's why I recommend reading "King, Warrior, Magician, Lover".

> King, Warrior, Magician, Lover: The 4 Archetypes of Masculinity

#4. Honor

Honor means caring for your reputation.

Your reputation is tied to the other elements of strength, mastery, and courage.
It is also mostly referring to other men.

He says that when men scoff at other effeminate men, they are often rejecting their weakness and their lack of manly virtues.
The effeminate men represent the complete opposite of what men should be standing for.

My Note:
I agree indeed that women are little concerned with honor.

Our Current Society

Jack Donovan says there's a part of us that still longs to be a man.

Today we do it with sports, video games, or trying to make a career.
And even then, most men don't take part in those.
So masculinity has become whatever people want it to be.
Even the effeminate man claims to be the "latest evolution of being a man".

But ultimately, you have to stay true to the core value of a man.
And, the book seems to suggest, it's not with words or careers that we evolved to compete.
It's with violence that we evolved to compete for status and power.

He compares the chimpanzees' society to the bonobo society. The chimps are a patriarchal society where men compete with each other.
The bonobos are a matriarchal society where women mate with everyone in the group.
And peace reigns supreme.

Jack Donovan seems to prefer the warring chimpanzees and says our current Western society is more like a bonobo one.

My Note: nonsense, why should war be better?
This is total BS.
I don't see why chimp society with constant war and violence should be any better.
The authors of Sex At Dawn instead, wish we were more like bonobos, enjoying sex more and worrying less about honor and warfare (and I also think that's hippy nonsense, by the way).

How to Form a Gang

The author also suggests that our society seems to be breaking up.

And that we might find it useful to be able to find our way of men.

Frankly, I found it to be wishful thinking of someone who almost hoped that was the case, and somewhat of a tin foil hat theory.

But hey, you never know, and if you're interested I invite you to get the book for the actual steps on how to build your own gang :).

Criticism

There is much that I don't buy from "The Way of Men", but please refer to the review for that.

1. Romanticized View Of Tribes and Gangs

I feel Jack Donovan fell for what I call the "back then when it was better" fallacy".

He romanticizes the old days of life in a gang, which is something that I have seen before from other authors (see "Tribe by Sebastian Junger").

It also reminded me of Rumble Fish, where a very immature Rusty James (Matt Dillon) fantasizes about gangs until the brother he so much admires tells him "it wasn't anything":

I feel the same way as Mikey Rourke in that movie.

Gangs weren't anything as "cool" as Donovan makes them out to be: a bunch of tribes killing each other, sometimes for food, some other times for women, and sometimes, as well… For nothing.

2. Romanticized View of Tribal Life

Donovan seems lost in a romanticized view of the past, of the gangs, and of warfare as well.
And he seems to suggest that the only way forward is… Going backward.

Just look at the book cover and you'll understand what Donovan likes about that past: men in skimpy clothes, guarding some "territory" with their lives.

Life in our past was probably much more boring than that.

Plus, I doubt that leaders and high-status men were exactly as Donovan describes them.
Getting to the top can be a dirty business, coalitions, and Machiavellianism. Often, it's not the strongest and most honorable man that goes to the top, but it's the most socially skilled, ruthless, or Machiavellian man.

The most honorable man might be more admired.
But he might refuse to kill a man in 3 against 1. The most ruthless man, would. And the most Machiavellian man, instead, makes sure he stays alive and builds a coalition that will carry him to power.

You can see it with chimps too, where it's the chimp with the best mix of strength and connections that makes it to the top, not the absolute strongest (Sapolsky, 2017).

I wish it were like Donovan says, but you can just look at the modern world of business and you will see that it's often Machiavellis at the top, not honorable men.

Review

The Way of Men is a well-written book for men with some interesting takes on masculinity, social status, and 'respect' among men.

Personally, I don't think anyone, inlcuding Donovan, can self-appoint himself to tell others "what it means to be a man".

Donovan says that terrorists are "manly" and one of his follow-up books is called "Becoming a Barbarian".
That says a lot about what "being a man" means to Donovan.

In Donovan's view of "what it means to be a man", men are enslaving themselves to the group, and to others.

I disagree with that.
Not only do I think this is toxic BS, but it also makes men's lives worse.

It can be an easy sell because some young men need a group and group-level ideals.
I know because I've been there, and I've been pulled into the irrationality of groups and "bands of men".
But I now know men can find a better ideal rather than falling for groupthink and obedience.

> Men cannot find themselves in a gang, men need to find themselves first as individuals.

What About The Positives?

Jack Donovan's take on masculinity are good from a sociological and power dynamics point of view.

Some might find this book sexist, and yet it won't change the fact that men indeed ARE often judged for their strength, courage, and honor.

Stifling View of Manliness

At the same time, though, Jack Donovan's view is also stifling for men.

Why should men live by those ideals?
Why should anyone allow society, Jack Donovan or anyone else to define them?
That's giving them way too much over us, and the power of judging us.

When you let people define you is also when you allow others to control you.
Read how women control men and relationships, which explains exactly how women leverage "what it means to be a man" to control men.

The empowered individualist rejects that.

Summary

About The Author:
Mark Manson is a former dating coach who turned self-help author and penned several books in a "bro philosopher" style, including "The Art of Not Giving a Fuck" and "Everything is Fucked".

Introduction

Mark Manson says that a lot of Pick Up Artist advice makes you look and act like a phony.

Ie., stay away from:

- The Game
- Mystery Method

It hit him the hardest when an ex-girlfriend of his told him to "act normal".

He says there's a striking lack of solid relationships among PUAs because they're all about gimmicks and not about deeper human connections.

1. Learn What Attracts Women

Manson says there are many variables changing what women find attractive, including:

- Menstrual cycle
- Relationships status
- High diversity
- Mismatch between body arousal and perceived arousal -as explained in Sex At Dawn-.

It seems clear though, says Manson, that women want men with status and power.
Status is shown by how you treat other people, how they treat you, and how you treat yourself.

Also, check out:

- Dating Power Dynamics

2. Get Rid of Emotional Neediness

Mark Manson says that your attraction is inversely proportional to your level of neediness.

His definition of neediness is to be more invested in what people think of you than in what you think of yourself.

In dating it means that you should be less willing to alter your thoughts, feeling, and motivations compared to the woman. He calls the three of them "investments".

Mark Manson uses evolutionary psychology quite a bit to explain his stance. But personally, like Nassim Taleb, I'm skeptical about "ad hoc" evolutionary explanations.

More importantly, the author says that we often reveal neediness in seemingly innocuous ways but women perceive it at an unconscious level.
He says it's impossible to be completely uninvested, but you should be less invested than she is.

3. Become More Vulnerable

Manson says that vulnerability is the opposite of Neediness and it's the path to true and deep human connection (something Brene Brown expands in Daring Greatly).

My Note:

He's right, just make sure you don't overdo the vulnerability part and read Vulnerability is Not Power.

Neediness is caring more about the perceptions of others while vulnerability prioritizes and reckons with your own feelings and perceptions.

You'll feel vulnerable any time you do something that makes you feel uncomfortable and ashamed.
But as you keep making yourself vulnerable you'll develop more than a "*not a give a f*ck attitude*".

He says that to become more vulnerable you need to become more attuned to your emotions and learn to express them without inhibition and without being afraid people will like you less.

Desire and Neediness

The author says showing desire is a paradox in that it's vulnerable, but also a bit needy and lowers your status.

PUA (pick-up artists) looks for tactics and tricks to pursue her without showing attraction.
But that only works in the short term, he says.

Vulnerability "short-circuits" that issue as men comfortable with being vulnerable don't behave in a needy way.
And desire shown without neediness is attractive.

My Note:
"Showing attraction mixed with vulnerability" wasn't super clear for me here.

4. Use The Gift of Truth

Mark Manson suggests the pickup ideal of pursuing women without letting her know you're interested is bogus.

And he says that being honest and upfront is better.

The vulnerable man, being honest and upfront, encourages women to do the same.
The vulnerable man indeed is not afraid of speaking his mind, drawing boundaries, and telling her when she's being out of line.

And that's very attractive.

5. Polarize With Full Honesty

Mark Manson says that full honesty is polarizing.

And that's great. Quick screening tool and no time-wasting.

Many rejections you will get as an honest man is from women who are actually attracted.

But they're scared of a man who isn't afraid of honesty, and they'll reject you -and lash out maybe- out of fear (this is a woman's mistake I mention in Women's early dating mistakes).

6. Overcome Fear of Rejection

People are afraid of rejection because they are operating on other people's truths.

Because if you operate within your own truths, what's there to fear?

7. Work On The Three Fundamentals of Attraction

Mark Manson says the three fundamentals of attractions are:

1. Attractive lifestyle (honest living)
2. Overcoming fears and anxieties about women (honest action)

3. Expression of emotions and communication (honest communication)

Honest living is about doing what you love in life or you are living by other people's values.

Honest action means that if you're attracted to a woman the most honest action you can do is talk to her. Otherwise, you're being dishonest to yourself.

Honest communication means communicating your true intentions and communicating them well.

HONEST LIVING

Money Matters, But It's Not All

Money, looks, and success do matter as they are all indicators of status.

They matter less than many people think though.

Behavior is also an indicator of status.
So the more money and looks you have, the less attractive behavior you need.

Beautiful Women Are Prizes For Insecure Men

The author says most men approaching these women do so because they want to show her off and are hunting for status.

That's very needy behavior.
That means that most guys approach these women very insincerely.

Hence Manson suggests looking at something you like about her beyond the looks.

How To Be Attractive

In this section, he talks about:

- Style
- Fitness
- Body Language
- Vocal Tonality

They're all primer so I suggest you delve deeper into that stuff separately. Here are some resources on body language:

HONEST ACTION

The author says that the needier you are, the more anxiety you have.

Anxiety stems from our unwillingness to be vulnerable.
And the first step to overcoming our anxieties is to understand the pattern we fall into.

How To Take Action

Mark Manson recommends you do not try to suppress your fear but embrace it.

Incremental high-volume exposures are better than facing extreme scenarios.
And that means starting small with something you can bear. Then do a lot of it and build up from there.

Ultimately, fear will never go away but it changes shape and won't affect your sense of worth anymore.

HONEST COMMUNICATION

How To Be Charming

Mark Manson says that connecting deeply is more powerful than any technique you could ever use.

Building an emotional connection is what makes the difference.

And he gives us a blueprint on how to do it:

1. Become aware of your emotions and motivations
2. Share them (will create trust)
3. She will share in return

Instead of saying things like "oh I like that too", tell why you like it and relate it to your life in a way that builds emotional trust.

Also, read:

- How to be charming
- How to be charismatic

Communication

Taking a leaf out of Leil Lowndes book Mark says that friends speak in statements, not questions.

Questions create the feeling that you want something from her, and she must oblige.
Instead of questions, use statements.

For example, instead of saying:

> "how long have you been knowing each other"

Say:

> "you guys look like you are old friends".

My Note: best is mixing questions with statements
I partially agree with the statements VS questions topics. But I disagree that questions (always) mean that you want something from her and that it puts you at a disadvantage. Because the moment she works to reply to your question, she is obliging, and also investing. And those are good.

Many questions in a row are terrible, yes, but so is stacking up a lot of wrong statements.
Plus the wrong statements scream “nothing in common”. I think the best is a mix of questions and statements.

Communicating With Women

Mark Manson says that men discuss things outside of themselves while women enjoy talking about themselves.

Men should then speak to women about things relating to the two of them. Their stories, their dreams, their feelings.

My note:
that much is true.

Say Your Name to Approach

So, how do you approach women?

Mark Manson recommends you never approach from behind and that you smile and give good eye contact.

It won’t matter what you say, he says.
He usually just blurts “Hi, I’m Mark”.

Also, read:

- How to approach a girl

> How to Approach a Girl: 9 Science-Based Steps

The Dating Process

Mark Manson talks a bit about calling vs texting strategies (also read: How to Text & Text Flirting).

His dating process consists of doing lots of interactive activities and changing venues several times during the date.

The author ends the chapter with an overview of the signals that women send.
Also, read:

- Undercover Sex Signals
- Signs she likes you

My Note:
I see the utility of doing lots of things during the date and changing venues. However, I prefer simplicity.
Planning lots of things also involves lots of investment.

Err On The Side of Risk

The rule of thumb, when you’re not sure when to escalate, is to go for it.

It’s better to be rejected than to do nothing and not know what could have been.

Real-Life Applications

- Take Charge Of Your Interests

Don't just volunteer at events, promote them; don't just attend art exhibitions, organize them.

The idea is that you take responsibility roles in what you like doing in your life.

- Incremental Exposure Beats Extremes

To learn something difficult "jumping at the high end of the water" might not be the best solution.

Better to do something you can manage repeatedly and then build from there.

PROS

- Great Novel Outlook

Models by Mark Manson introduces an honest approach that is quite refreshing in the pickup world. You can see he is a well-read man as he weaves together feelings, attraction, and seduction -instead of looking at the latter in a silo-

- Good Wisdom

Much of what Mark says makes sense. And much of it is also backed by science and, well, reality.

CRITICISM

Some Inconsistencies in Mark's Dating Claims

Mark Manson seems like a smart guy, and I like his approach to life.

There are a few inconsistencies though in Models I'd need to flag.

In the book he says he "kissed more than 300 girls" and then he says he has "been with almost 100 women".

In the chapters on first impressions, though, he says that "of the thousands of women I've been with, around 90% we clicked right away".

Which one is which?
If you 'clicked' with thousands of women and only 'been with almost 100', that's a low conversion rate, and it's not effective dating.

In terms of actual experience, "almost 100 women" is not that much for someone who focused on dating around, and travels a lot.
Finally, in this AMA session on Reddit, he lists he's been with women from over 18 Countries (link to highlighted part). Counting countries may suggest a diversion from raw numbers (and I'm personally not impressed by people who keep track of nationalities).

Dating Models... Or Marrying Girls Next Door?

Mark Manson's wife seems awesome, the two seem happy years after marriage, and if so, he absolutely won dating.

At the same time, if one writes a book about dating models, isn't it also fair to expect the author to be dating models?

I'm not convinced on this one because both sides of the equation are right: Manson is winning at dating and relationships.
But he's not winning the way that a book on dating models would suggest. You be the judge, depending on what you want.

The Nice Guy's Guide... May Turn Out To Be TOO Nice Guy

Models is very "PC and safe".

For example:

1. Be vulnerable
2. Be honest
3. Relationships are more fulfilling than sleeping around

These are all family-friendly and “Instagram quote-friendly” positions.

But that doesn’t mean they’re the most effective approaches. That is not to say that those concepts are useless or necessarily wrong.
They are true… Under certain conditions. But poorly expressed vulnerability can be weak and repellent, something Models doesn’t even warn men about.

Ultimately, Models is not the best in terms of dating strategies and techniques to succeed.

Weaker On Techniques

Models is a great dating resource, but it’s not heavy in terms of techniques and processes.

In my opinion, there are also a few imperfections here and there when it comes to the accuracy of information (read my comments in blue).

Better editing would have helped

For example, Mark Manson introduces 3 pillars.

But the core concepts he introduces end up being much more. Now don’t get me wrong, they’re all great and, indeed, fundamental. But he could have found a better way to summarize them.

Models Review

Models is a very good book on dating for men and covers many of the foundations that men should start with.

Mark Manson is the pick up artist for nice guys, reminding readers that depth of connection beats hookups, and that relationships are superior to short-term dating.

The book straddles between general self-improvement, pick-up, and dating for genuine relationships, veering and advising on the former.
It’s also one of the best dating books on mindsets and overarching philosophy and that’s why I put it on my best dating books for guys list.

On the con side, when you try to be a bit of everything, it’s tough to excel at anything. Manson strikes me more as a relationship type of guy, and Models doesn’t excel at seduction, for example.

We can say that Models* does a great job for the average guy who just wants better ‘normal’ dating while leaving more advanced men wishing for more. That’s why it’s a highly rated book by many: because most people cluster around the middle of any bell curve.

For the types of more ambitious men we cater to, it’s a valid starting point, and then you can come back here for more advanced strategies, including Seduction University.

Ho Tactics: 17 Manipulative Moves Exposed (G.L. Lambert Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 15 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Ho Tactics is a dating book for women in which author G. L. Lambert teaches how women can trick a man into spending and doting on her.[image]

TPM Strategic Audit: We analyze this text not as a moral endorsement, but as a Technical Manual on dating red flags, manipulative personalities, and a 'taker approach' to dating and relationships. For high-value men, this power awareness of real-world 'dark psychology' tactics is essential for vetting and self-defense, so they never become 'tricks or sponsors'.

Key Takeaways

- Advanced hos only start asking for money when he's emotionally hooked
- The ho gives the illusion he's not buying her, but that she likes him and he supports her

Summary

Lambert divides women who complain about not finding a wealthy man into two categories: attractive women and career women. The former think look sufficient, and the latter feel their resumes are enough.
Both camps don't understand how to excite a man, he says.

Ho Tactics is here to fix that.

Part One: Secrets to Being a Smart Ho

#1 Ho World Order

Lambert says the best and smartest hos get what they want without ever giving sex.

To reach that high level it does take one major skill, and that's unwavering self-confidence.

#2: Why Men Love Hos

Hos show a strong sexual side but they're not prostitutes sleeping with everyone.

Hos are easy emotionally, but not sexually.
That, says Lambert, is the big secret most women cannot grasp.

Hos live in the now. They make it fun for their marks. Hos don't inquire about their relationship status and will joke and tease.

It's the mix of sexiness, joy, and carefree attitude that takes him by surprise and draws him in.

#3: Being Disciplined Around Dick

Lambert says it's natural for women to feel sexually attracted to their marks.

But a hot must resist sex because once you give sex, your leverage disappears.
To avoid the risk the author refers to the famous scene in "There's Something About Mary" and suggests you masturbate before the date.

Say Maybe

You must be strategic when saying no.

When he makes a move don't say "no".

No breaks rapport and makes him feel rejected. for more-. The 'ho' is instructed here to say "we'll see" or "wait", signaling that it's in the cards but he needs to keep working on it.

TPM Note: This can be effective
Check our article on how to reject sex without destroying the relationship (and without being manipulative):

> How To Slow Down Sex & Get A Relationship

#4: Sexual Leverage Mechanics

Lambert says that sex in the last two decades has become easy and lost much of its value. All courtesy of women who feel they need to have sex to "keep him around".

My Note:
the author says it's happened because of men's manipulative tactics. I am of a different opinion. It has little to do with men's "manipulations", which always existed. It happened because of a change in cultural mores around sex, and because of sexual marketplace dynamics, including a skewed sex ratio of quality options among certain demographics.

Also, read "Games Men Play":

> 10 Games Men Play, And How to Handle Them

But in spite of the current trends, the author says that intimacy with you must stay a luxury item if you want to be a top ho.

Here are a few suggestions from Lambert:

- Don't tell him he chooses the place or you put the power in his hands
- First date is not super expensive because it's a "free sample to get his blood flowing"
- Date two you start setting the rules: go for elegance -and dress the part-
- Reward his good behavior. Passionate kiss or playing with his private
- Leave him lusty -unattainable desire will drive him crazy-

Obviously, don't even think of paying for the first date.
Or for any other date afterward.

#5: Treats, Tricks, Sponsors

Lambert describes the different types of men you'll be hustling.

The treat will give you nice dinners and dates. The tricks will help with small ticket items such as a purse or a SPA. The sponsor will finance your life.

Does He Pay?

You need to make sure he's willing to dote on you. Check the book to see the little trick Lambert recommends.

#6: How to Flirt the Ho Way

Lambert says you must approach first.

If needed to be, you must cold approach a stranger.

And when you do it, he will think you're a slut and he has it easy. Which is great as that makes your job even easier.

How To Approach

Maria spots a potential mark at the Apple store and goes nearby to check a laptop.

And I invite you to get the book for the details.

Lambert's tips on a successful approach:

- Stand near: the nearer the higher the arousal
- Start side by side or at an angle: don't look too thirsty
- Use touches: Nudges, light chest smacks, or accidental brushes
- Think of something sexual as you talk to him
- Leave early, leave him wanting more

7: How to Seduce the Ho Way

Lambert says the ho's task is to be a fantasy woman.

The main ingredients of a ho are:

- Listening
- Being open and non-judgmental
- Never nagging
- Get comfortable with him really fast
- Knows how to be a "filthy wh*re"

Here is what basic 'b*tches' do instead:

- Waitfor him to pick the conversation and just reply
- Laugh when there's nothing to laugh about
- Don't say anything racy that might rock the boat
- Closed body language -"don't rape my body language" in Lambert words-

Ho On A Date

Lambert again uses Maria to describe how the smart ho acts during the date.
I invite you to get the book for more on that, but here's what I liked most:

First Date

- She says "are you gonna leave me here all alone" to move him beside her
- Jokes with the waiter to let the mark see men want her
- Rests her head on his shoulder and asks him to order something "as good as an orgasm"
- Lets him pay and ask how much she should tip the waiter -if he lets her, it's a bad sign-
- Flirts and jokes about going back to his but says she doesn't do "coffee" with a new man
- Kiss on the lip when bidding goodbye and looks at him with lusty eyes

Notice that she is submissive but in a very decisive way.
She lets him be a man, but she pushes him to act as such.

And notice she is both warm and sassy at the same time. It's the mixed-signal hot/cold approach.

The author says the ho hints at powerful sexuality and strong chemistry. She might tease him sometimes and not be afraid of calling him out on shit, but it's not in a confrontational way.

Ultimately she shows him she's on her side.

Second Date

Maria is touchier and tells him she dreamed about him.

In the car, she strokes near his private area and tells him he's doing something crazy to her.
But she doesn't want to bring her A game before he's ready, so she must go home -notes she says he is not ready, challenging him-.

Maria rewards good behavior with sexual attention, so she'll give him great phone sex that week and goes for an earphones test for the third date.

If the mark started pressuring for sex or showed up without earphones, Maria would drop him.

Dating Techniques

Lambert recommends that she:

- Uses kisses, but ration them
- Doesn't wait for him to call: call and say she imagined kissing him
- Stays busy and vague on when to meet next
- Doesn't ask about the next date, but tells him

#8: Getting Nasty with It

Lambert says you must sow your freaky sexual side… But in a subtle way.

He has the power to arouse that side of you, not everyone.
The ho doesn't get labeled a cock tease because it's always "just about to happen".
That's the feeling that keeps him stringing along.

#9: How to Make Him Fall in Love the Ho Way

Lambert says you need love to get lots of support.

To make him dependent, he says, the ho appeals at the same time to both nobler virtues and animal ones:

- Protector side (to make him like a rescuer, she tells him she'd be lost without him)
- Father figure
- Sexual drives

My Note:
Steve Harvey in Act Like a Lady Think Like a Man says indeed that to love, a man must feel like he can protect her.

Hos leverage their vulnerability.
First, they gain their trust, and then they show their deeper, darker side in need of protection:

The Commitment Conversation

Maria calls him when she's having a difficult moment and demands to see him.

Over to his place she holds him tight and tells him she likes him but doesn't want things to get complicated.
Men changed when things got complicated but she wants the two of them to stay fun and great as they are now.

Boom.

The mark is used for women asking for commitment and here's this girl who wants the opposite instead.

Then she tells about her life and struggles. She asks his opinion to make him feel important.
And just as they are bonded as bro and sis Maria drops again the sex bomb. She adds she's going to fuc* the hell out of him anyway.

My Note:
This section outlines effective but manipulative tactics men must be aware of.

#10: How to Ask for Gifts, Money, or Favors

Lambert says when shes starts with her hands she you get scrap change.

She must ask when there's a deep bond and he feels like a protector.
When she asks:

- Makes him feel he's saving the day
- Not fearing to be submissive and pleading
- Makes him feel he's got the power to make you happy again
- Gives him a sense of reciprocity with (valueless) gifts

#11: Exit Strategy

Lambert says you will exit either when you got everything you want or when you can't manage to get anything more.

A great exit is to simply fade out and stop calling.
If he realizes all of a sudden he's been taken advantage of, play offended and make him feel guilty for saying that.

My Note:
Men must be careful here because an even more Machiavellian woman may tell him how much she loved him and that he will always have a place in her heart.

Part Two: The Power of Sex Magic

Part two of Ho Tactics deals with hustling with sex.

#12: You Had Sex Too Fast... Now What?

Lambert says sex is a mistake.

Check the book to see how to fix it if you've done that mistake.

My Note:
I disagree sex is always a mistake. Instead, it's contextual (eg.: men with fewer options, men who are falling for her or men who are paying for some special treatment they can't get everywhere else).
Also, read:

- Should you make him wait for sex?
- How to delay sex

#13: Using Ho Tactics On Your Ex-Boyfriend

If she want to rope in an ex-boyfriend, the author says she must show she's changed. Lambert suggests:

- Stroking his ego as to how much he's improved
- Showing she's changed & improved
- Agitating him by mixing up crazy sex memories… That she potentially never did with him
- Telling him she still has a weak spot for him
- After the first date, telling him she's like to be "friends"
- Only having sex with him after he confesses or shows his feelings

If after two weeks he doesn't open up or show any feelings, drop him.

#14: Turning Old Pussy into New Money

Lambert says that no matter what women think, they all have sex the same way.

The book recommends:

- Pre-sex hype: (this is called Pre-Suasion)
- Doing something freaky to give him the idea there's nothing she won't do if he sticks around
- Screaming "Y*ou're about to make me come*"
- Making him feel like he took you where nobody else took you
- Rationing out sex: you're not to be had at any time
- Raising the price as he wants more of it

The book recommends increasing anticipation and then withdrawing it to extract more investment—a classic push-pull manipulation pattern, played with sexual desire <— TPM Note: this is highly manipulative and it may get some men hot and steaming and potentially chasing, but it's a bad way to start a relationship. Quality men will also NOT want a relationship with this game-playing type of woman.

And remember, it's about him: one ho even played Xbox after sex to make the mark feel she was one of the guys.

#15: On the Side: Making Her Man Your ATM

Lambert has a whole chapter hustling men in committed relationships.

You never want to replace her mainstay because you have more power than the forbidden fruit on the side.
When she leaves the current wife for you, you become an old pussy.

#16: How to Online Date... the Ho Way

Lambert is not a big proponent of online hustling, but he still has amazing insights even there.

He says most women going after rich and handsome do it the wrong way, which is:

- Follow him in the hope he'll follow back
- Inbox him as soon as you can

… And then you're one of the hundreds of groupies.
Much better instead is focusing on people with money who are not under much public limelight.

Online Hustle

You never add him before you speak to him and before you meet you act like it's going to be a sure lay for him. It's good stuff, I invite you to get the book for the details.

#17: How to Go From Ho to Housewife

Lambert says it's possible to go from ho to housewife because ho is a part you play, not part of your DNA.

The author has a beautiful psychological analysis here. He says the ho brings to a midlife crisis man that breath of youth and craziness that he desperately craves.

Their craziness, as Robert Greene agrees in The Art of Seduction, is addictive.
Also, read:

- 15 ways to drive him crazy.

Lambert says that if you want commitment, let him know you well in all your greatness and then say at this point in life you need to get serious.

Real-Life Applications

The whole book is about practical applications. A few pearls of wisdom for me were:

Challenge his manhood
When you challenge his manhood you strongly arouse him. Slightly doubt his power in bed, his ability to please, or his strength to resist you.

Drop Hints Of When You'll Do It
I found indeed that women dropping hints about sex or "testing him" do make men quite horny.

CONS

Sex-Witholding The Main Leverage?
If not having sex is the main leverage, then this is obviously not the book for women who want to keep that spark going for long.
I believe there are many ways to keep a man hooked even while having sex -Cleopatra and Marie Antoinette are just two obvious examples that it's possible-.

Little Sister
When discussing the protective instincts hos leverage he makes a very valid point, but the "little sister explanation" didn't convince him. He says every man has (had) a little sister he protects, but I haven't any.

Black Hood Target
In the preface, Lambert says career women don't understand men. But Ho Tactics is not tailored to them. The book targets mostly black women of low income. A career woman can hardly complain her car is being repossessed or call him crying for a bag. And she doesn't need to be told there are wealthier and better men besides pushers.

Review

Ho Tactics is a revealing resource on manipulative dating strategies, exposing how some sex workers can hook men into spending and financing their lives.

While it's written as a guide for these Machiavellian women, it also serves as a self-defense guide for men.
I wish that women interested in this book decide for a better life. If one has this Machiavellian intelligence to trick others, they may as well succeed in more honorable and value-adding ways.

How To Spot and Avoid The Ladyboy Surprise – Definitive Guide

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

If you are traveling around SE Asia -including Thailand- you need to learn a thing or two on how to avoid ladyboys and transexuals.

Don't expect them to do it for you.

It's your duty to learn, because, well… Some of them will lie to you.

Short-term fun and 'Hi handsome'. That's all you need.

How To Spot a Ladyboy

Here are the major signs of a ladyboy:

1. She Sends Your Unrequested Pictures

As if to 'prove' she's a woman or attractive.

Too many pics, including her 'looking good & feminine'. Few women do this, many ladyboys do

But women, of course, don't have to prove their femininity.

Plus, it provides ladyboys with their next move and excuse.

Such as, in case you ask, or when eventually it becomes obvious it's not a woman, she has a ready excuse.

You know, 'you've seen me, I'm attractive (right?)'.

2. Unfeminine Voices

This is probably the biggest giveaway.

Sometimes it's super obvious, some other times a bit less so. The voice will not necessarily sound masculine, but it will be "off".

It often sounds nasal, but there's no point trying to convey an auditory signal in written form because it won't help you much.

Check the video below and, in general, trust your instincts.
Trust your instincts: with women you rarely think their voice is “strange”.
So when you talk to a person who looks like a woman but the voice is somewhat “off”, that’s a big indicator.

Here is one example:

P.S.: I’m only putting this video here as a resource to recognize a ladyboy’s voice.
It’s a crazy prank, but I also find it somewhat distasteful. It kind of rubs me off the wrong way (but the ladyboy seemed to enjoy it, so it’s all cool).

Of course, this won’t help if you’re doing online dating.

3. Male Body Features

This is the obvious second one and you’ve probably heard them before.

Things such as:

- Height
- Square jaw
- Broad shoulders
- Lower eyebrows
- Straight waist
- Adam’s apple
- Hands (shape and feel)

Adam’s apple comes up first often and I’ve heard it many times, but it never helped me much.
I have found hands to be most useful.

Especially at the touch: if they feel like coarse, hardened hands, you might not be the only one who’s ever gotten hard there :).

Whenever I hold a woman’s hand and they’re soft and “womanly”, I breathe a sigh of relief (but that’s not the ultimate indicator, some take supplements!).

4. Ladyboys Tend to Be (Sexually) Trashy

Ladyboys often overdo it with their sexuality and show more than most girls would.

Is she:

- Licking a lollipop?
- Straddling the couch doggie position?
- You don’t need much imagination to picture her boobs?
- Licking the rim of the glass?

Check, check, and check.

A little story from a couple of years ago when my LB spotting skills were hovering around absolute zero:

> I was sitting with a girl who flat out denied her ladyboys-ness and got offended I even asked.
> Little later, she proudly volunteered to show me a video of some idiot smashing her from behind.

> Now I've crossed my path with a fair share of women, including one who recorded our session, but never a girl showed me her videos having sex.
> It doesn't mean there aren't such women of course, but when sexuality is thrown at your face, keep in mind that red flags come with long poles :).

This also includes sending you un-requested pictures of her looking hot and/or skimpily dressed.

Girls will rarely volunteer those pictures before you're already lovers. Ladyboys do so very gladly.

5. Ladyboys Are Sexually Forward

Women, even when they like you, tend to be coy and more reserved.

Some women who really like you can even be nervous.

But not ladyboys.
They're excited you're considering them and run towards you at 100 km/h.

- When is she free? Right now, you silly!
- Her number? Why do you need it, I'm free now! Take me!
- Oh, you need need to run to meet your friends? Here is the number! When are you going to call, handsome?
- Her schedule? What do you mean, I'm always free (for you)

Watch Out For Hotel Visits

And if you meet online and they agree to come straight to your hotel/place, watch out, that's another sign.

Plenty of real women will do it too, granted, so don't avoid it just out of principle.

But still, consider it another check for you to worry about. She might bring along a little surprise for you :)

6. Ladyboys Are Short-Term Oriented

She's looking for short-term fun and opens with 'Hi handsome'. That's all I needed to know

7. Ladyboys Are Risk-Taking

Women are naturally risk-averse.

Evolution and biology ensure that women are careful around strangers, or in committing to being alone or 'stuck' with random strangers.

Ladyboys instead have no qualms in:

- Coming to your place
- Traveling to you
- Traveling with you

8. Ladyboys Overreact

Just like histrionic women, ladyboys seek attention.

They make a big show out of everything.

But their show looks like a cheap show.

They are also more easily upset as well, and although this is not exactly scientifically proven, I'm not the only one who noticed.

9. Ladyboys Try Too Hard to Behave Like Women

> Her: I'm looking for a dress like this (shares a Barbie-looking dress) <— I didn't yet know at this point it was a ladyboy. But that put a nagging doubt in my mind. When I later asked: she confirmed she wasn't born female

It's often suspicious when tried too hard to seem masculine or feminine.

And ladyboys will accentuate any feminine trait while covering up their masculine ones.
This means:

- Exaggerated hips swaying
- Swinging their purses left and right
- “Bitchy cat walking style”
- Lots of makeup

Basically, anything that looks like someone is trying too hard to look and act like a woman is another indicator for you to worry about :).

10. Share All Contact Info on Dating App

If you’re doing online dating, you notice that lots of girls these days have their Instagram there or anything else where you can “follow them” -do not follow them of course :)-.

Ladyboys go one step beyond though.

Eager to move things along with you, they will also have their contact details such as Line ID, number, WhatsApp, etc.

11. She’s a Freelance ‘Model’

Albeit this is growing in popularity even among women, it’s still a red flag.

Jobs such as “freelance model”, “CEO”, and “owner (by myself)”, on top of being an indicator of low-quality women, can also be LB indicators, albeit not as strong as the contact info.

12. Ask Her: “Are You Natural Born Woman?”

And of course, I’m not joking here.

Make yourself no qualms.

If you’re traveling in SE Asia or Thailand Always ask.

Not when you’re unsure, not when you think she might be, but make it a habit.
You’d be astonished at how often you can be wrong.

Don’t think the girl will be offended: from personal experience I can tell you they won’t if you ask un-judgmentally.

If the first time you’re a bit queasy, you can easily spin your question into a compliment.
For example:

> You: You never know here, some of the prettiest, best-dressed girls seem to be ladyboys and you’ve got such a great style.

If she’s a woman she will likely appreciate you’re only into women.
And last but not least, the question serves as a screening device as well: with her answer, she had to “prove” herself to you.

She jumped through your screening hoops and… For that question to be relevant, she also admitted you two might be getting sexual.

Three birds with a stone.

Any time you get evasive answers, avoid them. Chances are it’s not a real woman:

She never gave a straight answer because she wasn't a "she"

The Limits of Asking

A few guides and answers around the web present asking as the final solution.

And then they add you can ask the manager.

These guys are referring of course to paid hookers working at go-go bars. Those working girls are much less likely to lie about their gender.

But if you're like me and don't do pay-per-play, then you can still meet a few bad apples who will lie about their true gender.
Once I went out to meet a Tinder girl who told me she was a natural girl. She wasn't.

Oh, and here is one more tip.
If you ask and they reply with a sexy picture, then she is transgender:

This is a common pattern. Trust it! Extra example

13. “She” Needs Lubes

This is the very final step.

Some ladyboys will be fully post-op in all areas.
And after years of hormone therapy (estrogens), their skin is softer than a real girl.
Technically at that point, they’re not even ladyboys anymore.

However, their surgical vagina still doesn’t get naturally wet.

This means that if you’re closing in and they tell you they need an external lube… You might wanna think twice about it.

How to Avoid Ladyboys in Thailand

There’s a saying in Italian:

> Trusting is good. But not trusting is better.

Most ladyboys will tell you they are ladyboys.
Those are cool.
Most are not all of them though. Some will play offended you even asked and insist they are women.

And I have met those “bad” types of ladyboys most often in Thailand.

Some ladyboys will go as far as scheduling their period and carrying tampons with them.
Don’t count on those to tell you the truth any time soon :).

And many ladyboys in Thailand are very thirsty for di*ks, especially foreign ones.
So as a foreigner, you’re a juicy target for ladyboys.

A few guys have that bragging attitude they’d never be fooled.
Most of those guys are the easiest to fool.

It goes beyond ladyboys and to life in general: let people think they're too smart to be fooled and you just made it easier for anyone to fool them.

My recommendation to be on the safe side while traveling in Thailand is this: until you see a vagina, don't kiss on the mouth.

Coping Stratagem: Avoid Making Out

And what if all else fails?

Keep reading because that's possible!

I often don't kiss on the mouth while leading to sex and prefer neck and body kisses instead.

You might not agree with that, but you might want to do it in Thailand, the Philippines, or any other region with lots of ladyboys.

Why?

Because none of the previous steps is foolproof.
Anybody who's telling you they can always spot a ladyboy is lying.

When the worst pangs of ladyboy-induced paranoia set in, you might want to do the same.

Start kissing on the neck and remove her panties first. Once you make sure there's a nice vagina there… Nice :).
Now you can relax and enjoy the ride.
And If you find a surprise instead, smile: I just saved you a make-out session with a man :).

Remember: Respect People, No Matter The Gender

As a reminder, we stand AGAINST hate here.

Men who wished they were women already have a difficult enough life.
They don't need any extra a$$hole making their lives even harder.

If you are, it's on you anyway.
It only shows what a bigot caveman you are.
The world has no use for bigots who gratuitously make other people's lives worse.

Of course, it's also not cool when trans lie or try to fool people.
Trans are just like everyone else: some are great, and some are a$$holes.

And the good and honest ones deserve our respect.

My Experience With Ladyboys

As I write this post I am traveling around SE Asia, probably the region with the highest concentration of ladyboys.

Ladyboys are so many indeed, and often so indistinguishable from pretty girls, that many guys get a bit worried.

I'm no stranger to that feeling.
Ladyboys on the hunt are one of the things that make traveling around this world region a real pain in the ass.

Don't ask me how I learned this stuff :).
But let's say that among the daily encounters, I also had a couple of close calls myself.

And my travel buddy had a proper wake-up call when he only realized at the last possible moment.
Yes, after he had done pretty much everything already :S.

This was his actual text:

> Him: Trans. I can't believe it
> Me: Sh*t!
> Him: Absolutely beyond suspicion. Perfect voice, no Adam's apple, soft curves. And the behavior!

So this is my guide on how to avoid the ladyboy surprise.
So that you won't need to learn by experience :).

The Greater Skill That Helped Me: Reading People

Spotting ladyboys is just one example of a bigger skill: learning to read people.

The same skill applies to dating, business, and life decisions.

Bullet Summary

- Quick, intuitive snap decisions can be as reliable as highly analytical ones
- Being good at snap decisions means knowing what's relevant
- Deep expertise allows people to make a reliable snap judgment (they know what's relevant)
- Extreme stress impairs our snap decisions skills

Blink Summary

About The Author: Malcolm Gladwell is a journalist and an author of popular pop psychology books.
Among his other bestsellers are "The Tipping Point", "Outliers" and "David and Goliath".

Introduction

Gladwell talks about Adaptive Unconscious a decision-making machine that operates unconsciously and quickly.

For those of you who know Kahneman, this is basically the same as "fast thinking" in Thinking Fast and Slow.

Gladwell says that with Blink he wants to:

1. Show quick unconscious decisions can be as accurate as conscious ones
2. Explore when and when not to trust our intuitions
3. Show how we can improve our snap chat decisions

So let's what these snap decisions are:

The Theory of Thin Slices

The idea behind Thin Slicing is that our mind can see overarching, significant patterns, even with small samples.

This means that we can often make a snap judgment with a high rate of accuracy on little information or exposure.

You can be effective at Thin Slices in two ways:

1. With lots of experience
2. By looking at what's relevant (experience helps to know what's relevant)

John Gottman is Gladwell's example.
John Gottman, an author of some wonderful books you can read on this website as well, became famous for predicting with a 90% accuracy rate which couples would divorce just by looking at a 15-minute conversation between them.

But thin-slicing also works with non-experts if you're looking at something which is relevant.
It's possible for example to assess people's personalities by looking at their room compared to their long-term friends.

How To Spot Future Divorces

In Gladwell's examples, the major giveaways for a future divorce were:

- Contempt, signaled by eye-rolling, eyes shutting, patronizing voice…
- "Yes, but" sentences format, which highlights Contempt
- Never giving credit to the partner
- Inflexibility

Gottman mostly looks at the ratio between positive and negative emotions. The positive signs must outweigh the negative by at least 5 to 1.
Read more from Gottman here.

Asking Direct Questions Is Useless

Gladwell also points out that asking couples about the state of their marriages didn't give many clues.

Most people had no idea how they came across during their communications.

Doctors Get Sued for Low EI

There's little correlation between doctors' mistakes and the incidence of legal proceedings.

The correlation instead was very strong with the way doctors treat patients.

The doctors who don't get sued do the following:

- Spend on average 3 mins longer for patient
- Orienting comments such as "first I examine you, then we talk it over"
- Active listening such as "go on", "tell me more about it"
- More likely to laugh

The difference was not in the information or amount of the information, but in how they spoke and treated the patients.

Thin Slicing Doctors' Suing Chances

Gladwell says a researcher could predict the likelihood of a doctor being sued simply by listening to the tone of voice -without any content at all-.

The more dominant the doctor appeared, the more likely he was to be sued. The less dominant and more concerned the voice, less likely to being sued.

The voice basically works as a proxy for the doctor's attitude. Caring and respectful or disrespectful and talking down?

The Secret Life of Snap Decisions

Gladwell discusses the subconscious calling it a "locked door".

Many decisions we make, he says, we can't even explain them consciously not even after we reflect on it.

Tennis coach Vic Braden was Blink's example: he was able to say when a player was going to perform a poor serve but he wasn't able to explain why.

The locked door also works the other way around: we can decide what we like and want consciously, but our conscious list of traits is a poor predictor of what we actually like.

That's why it's not uncommon that speed daters will end up picking participants who look and behave like nothing in their pre-drawn criteria.

Priming Effect (But Read The Note!)

Gladwell also talks about the priming effect (Bargh et al., 1988).

Reminding students about their genders or ethnicity, for example, elevates in their minds the associated stereotypes and they score better or worse depending on that stereotype.

Reminding women they're women lowers their math test scores. While Reminding blacks they're black lower their scores. But reminding Asians they're Asians raises their math scores.

Similarly, people taking a test with many age-related words result in the test-takers walking slower.

Students also interrupted other people's conversations right away or waited indefinitely depending if they were primed with politeness or rudeness.

Gladwell mentions this can be an adaptive response within ourselves.
If our brain believes our environment favors this or that type of personality, then we start behaving more like our environment.

And of course, people had no idea of the outside influence that changed them.

My Note:
The research on priming has been at the center of a storm in psychology. But of course, Gladwell missed that. More on this article on pop psychology myths)

We Never Tell The Truth When We Rationalize

I loved how Gladwell debunks the merits of "explaining one's behavior".

He presents an experiment in which people were subtly helped to solve a puzzle.
But when asked how they solved the puzzle almost nobody mentioned the external help and all focused on their own mental processes to reach the solution.

Gladwell says it's not that the people were trying to cheat, but the hint was so subtle their rational brains never realized it.
So when asked about an explanation our rational brain doesn't tell the truth, but comes up with what seems the most plausible solution.

But the most plausible solution is seldom the real explanation.

We are really ignorant about what motivates our decision, says Gladwell. And we should really be saying "I don't know" more often.

The Warren Harding Error

Chapter 3 focuses on the disadvantages of our subconscious decisions.

We have a strong tendency, for example, to vote for those who "look the part" rather than those best prepared at carrying out the duties -as happened with Warren Harding-.

Computer tests developed at Harvard University also revealed that when we are forced to make snap decisions we fall back on (racist) stereotypes.

No matter whether the person was or wasn't racist or whether he was aware of it or not, most still showed racism towards black people under the pressure of time constraints.

The biases that we have in our subconscious will determine our behavior in ways that we don't consciously control.

Test your own implicit biases here, but be aware there's some controversy and criticism on these tests.
Also, make sure to read that topic well: not all biases are bad.

Whites Pay Less

A friend of mine used to say that "only white people pay full prices".

Boy, was he wrong?

A study on car sales showed how white people on average end up paying less than other races.
And not because they're better negotiators, but because salespeople tend to haggle less aggressively.

Gladwell says it's possibly because when a sales rep sees a white person the stereotype is that he will be more educated and less likely to fall for his tactics.

Would it pay if a salesman was able to rid himself of stereotypes?
Gladwell suggests so when he introduces Bob Golob.
Golob manages to sell twice the average of other salesmen by, says Gladwell, eliminating biases towards customers.

Can We Change Our Biases? Yes We Can!

There is a way to change our biases.

To do so, we should spend more time with the people and subjects we are biased towards.
Understanding them and their culture, and becoming familiar with them as people.

That way, biases will not affect our snap decisions anymore.

When Less is More

In chapter four of Blink Gladwell says that our Western culture values decisions which are complex and time-consuming.

That should not be the case, he says.

The example here is the decision-making process in Emergency Rooms.
He says that to assess whether a patient is having a heart attack doctors use all information they can gather.

The process takes a long and doctors face a "data deluge" that clouds their brains instead of helping.

When finally a new algorithm with only three data points was tested, it proved not only to make for faster decision-making but also to be more accurate than the old "take all data" system.

> Sometimes, to make important decisions, less is more.

Gladwell also mentions research showing that the more information a psychologist received, the more they felt confident about their diagnosis.
But the rate of correct diagnosis didn't improve with more information.

When Visual Trumps Verbal

Gladwell says when it comes to face recognition we are great at visual recognition, but terrible at verbal description.

You could write a book about a person's face and still, you wouldn't recognize it.

In a snap of a second look at the picture of Marilyn Monroe's face and you would recognize her right away though.

Experts Are Better At Thin Slicing

Gladwell talks about how different people can "thin slice" things differently.

Experts can thin-slice much more efficiently compared to newbies.

Indirect Observation

Gladwell repeats again what's the main concept in "Blink".

Such as, that we can learn more from people by observing body language, facial expression, or looking at their room than by asking them directly.

While people are very good at explaining their actions, those explanations aren't necessarily correct.
Especially when the behavior arises from the unconscious.

The Package IS The Product

The author introduces the Coke VS Pepsi tasting battle.

He says that consumers don't experience the product just by itself. But product, packaging, and "brand" are experienced all together.

The mistake Coca-Cola made was to ascribe their loss of market share entirely to the product.

Feeling Misinterpretation – Failed Thin Slicing

The author explains the launch of a brand new, groundbreaking chair with steel frames in plain sight.

The first market research showed people didn't like it.
The company launched the product anyway and it became a hit.

Gladwell says it's because people misinterpreted their feelings.
They said they hated the chair, but what they really meant is that it was so new and unfamiliar that they were not used to it.

This is often when something is new and groundbreaking.
People will say they don't like it, but it's only because they're caught off-guard or shocked.
And it's easy to miss the difference between the two just by going with testers' scores.

Because given the time to warm up to it, it's also very possible they might start liking it -or loving it- (but of course, it's also possible they won't like it).

We love market research because it provides scores, numbers, and a feeling of certainty. But there can be no certainty with new groundbreaking products.

You simply must give it a try.

Thin Slicing Training

Gladwell says we can't look directly into our subconscious, but we can understand it by analyzing our reactions and behavior.

All experts that have become great at snap judgments and thin slicing did so by breaking down their area of expertise and analyzing it bit by bit.
It's similar to psychoanalysis. You analyze your thoughts for years and then start to learn how your mind works. Experts do the same with the object of their expertise.

Performing in High-Pressure Situations

Stress can help us focus.

It's what some top players refer to as "the game slowing down". It's because our brain drops all unnecessary stimuli and focuses exclusively on what matters. It's the so-called "tunnel vision".
Gladwell says this is between 115 and 145 heartbeats for minutes.

But above that threshold, stress makes us ineffective. Most of us, as a matter of fact, get too aroused in stressful situations.
Above 145 part of our body functions start to shut down. That's why for some it's difficult to even dial the police phone number.

Our snap judgment tends indeed to be impaired by extreme stress or life-and-death scenarios.
Even simply being under strong time pressure, without life or death scenarios, make us unable to see clues in body language and facial expressions.
Extreme time pressure situations make us autistic, the author says.

It convenes that we should avoid relying on our snap judgment in high-stress situations. Whenever you can, disengage instead, take a break and resume later.

Real-Life Applications

Don't Believe In Post-Act Rationalization
When people tell you why they did what they did, don't listen. They are often fooling their own mind and coming up with what seems to make sense, not the real reasons.

Beware of Feelings' Misinterpretation
Don't take reactions to new products at face value: they need interpretation. A "I hate it" could easily mean "I'm so unfamiliar with it I can't make sense of it (yet)".

Drop Snap Judgement In High Pressure
Unless you already know you perform great and can handle well high-stress situations, don't engage. Take a break and resume later on.

Thin Slicing Training
Becoming great at Thin Slicing means knowing something so well that you know what matters and you can deconstruct complex realities it to its basic elements.
In a way, The Power Moves is thin-slicing human interactions and training your snap judgment of people.

CONS

Bending Examples To Fit His Narrative
At times I feel like Gladwell bends stories and examples to fit his narrative. For example "analyzing someone's room in 20 mins" VS "knowing someone for years" are NOT measuring the same thing.
So you can't tell me the former is an example of "superior snap judgment".

Snap VS Deliberate… Wait, are these antithetical??
The narrative of snap decisions VS deliberate ones reminds me of the "EQ VS IQ" in Emotional Intelligence.
Such as, they are pitted against each other when they're not exactly antithetical.
They both have their own place and time.

Long and Theoretical
Could have been shorter and there is little focus on how to actually use this information.

Blink Review

I don't see much empowerment in pitting "snap decisions" VS "deliberate ones".

They both have their time and place.

But what makes Blink an amazing book is all the explanation that goes into snap decision-making.

On a personal level, it made me realize the usefulness of this website.
From a Blink point of view, The Power Moves makes you an expert at social interactions so that you can then slice the reality around you.

The nuggets of wisdom are too many to list, but as a website on social interactions, I will leave you the one highlighted by the doctors' study:

- How you treat people is the biggest determinant of how they will perceive and treat you.

The Millionaire Fastlane Summary: Skip Compound Interest, Build a Business (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 22 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Millionaire Fastlane teaches readers that the most touted way of getting rich, such as saving and investing, is a sucker's choice. DeMarco proposes instead what he dubs the "fastlane", such as becoming an entrepreneur.

TPM Power Takeaway: The mindsets of personal power and sovereignty
This isn't about chasing the Lambo as a young man, it's about doing what you want. You can get the Lambo if that's your thing, but you can get anything you want, on your time, and on your choice.

Takeaways

- Working a job and investing in the stock market will NOT make you rich
- Entrepreneurship (the fastlane) will give you independence, freedom, and early (wealthy) retirement
- Time is your most important resource. Buy time, don't trade time for money.

Summary

MJ DeMarco says The Millionaire Fastlane is not "The Four-Hour Workweek" that will tell you step by step what to do.
He says that is your task to find out, because success is a journey and it cannot be outsourced.

Part 1: Wealth in a Wheelchair

One day DeMarco saw a young man drive his dream car, a Lamborghini.
That was the epiphany for him and he realized the difference between "get rich slow" and "get rich fast".

Part 2: Wealth is Not a Road, But a Road Trip

The typical “get rich” scheme bandied by financial gurus, which he dubs “get rich slow” is a trap, the author says.

You need to toil your whole life employed by someone else, squandering the golden years of your life in a cubicle.

MG says that people see the big event-grabbing headlines like the IPO or the big buy-out and think that getting rich is event-driven.
But the real story is the process behind those events.

The process entails sacrifices and hard work. You will never enjoy the big ticket event without the process.

MJ also introduces the core concept of the book here: fast wealth happens exponentially, not linearly.
Employment and savings are linear, that’s why they don’t work.
And he puts people into 3 different roads when it comes to wealth:

- The Sidewalk
- The Slowlane
- The Fastlane

Part 3: Poorness: The Sidewalk

In short, the sidewalkers are those people who spend more than they earn.

They are not necessarily poor, they can be very rich, but they finance their life with an unsustainable mix of income and debt.

Instant gratification is the key for the sidewalker.
You probably heard the fable of the ant and the grasshopper. Well, the grasshopper resides on the sidewalk.

Sidewalkers also tend to pursue money through events. Things such as lotteries, gambling, “a big hit” etc. etc.

Part 4: Mediocrity: The Slowlane Roadmap

Most people reside in the slow lane.

They sacrifice today for a better tomorrow. In the ant and the grasshopper fable, these people are the ants.
They buy into the “compound interest strategy”, so they work hard today and save to be rich tomorrow.

It’s not an optimal strategy, the author says. Decades in a job you likely don’t love are also wasted decades.

In the slowlane you’re the butt-end of a sucker’s trade.
You trade a salary while your employer makes money off of you.
You trade 5 for 2 when you give Monday to Friday to get 2 days off. That’s why you see people “celebrating their freedom” on Friday”.
Only to go back in the cage again on Monday.

No, fuck TGIF: your life is now!
Your life can be Friday every day.

The other problem with the slowlane is also that you’re not in the driver’s seat. You don’t control your destiny.
What if the stock market tanks when you’re about to withdraw your money?
Or if you want to double your income today, will your boss accept it? And if you get a heart attack at 55?

Problems with the slowlane:

- Trade weeks for weekends
- No leverage (work twice harder is not twice the money)

- Trade time for money (you can never buy back time)
- Upper limit (can't work more than 24h/day)
- Trade your best years for future, uncertain money
- Compound interest takes time and only works in the final years
- Limited learning (compared to huge learning with your business)

> To trade Time Is To Trade Life

The Paradox of Practice: You're Being Conned

MJ DeMarco says gurus sell the slow lane while they themselves get rich in the fast lane.

He makes fun of Robert Kiyosaki and his "Poor Dad Rich Dad".
MJ says Kiyosaki didn't make money with his real estate tips, but by selling books with his tips.
Which doesn't make him credible.

MJ doesn't mention it, but this is similar to Tony Robbins peddling slowlane compound interest and Tai Lopez who makes his money selling courses on how to make money.

> Dump the damn job – the job sucks

Part 5: Wealth: The Fastlane Roadmap

People on the fastlane take care of their finances like slowlaners, but also enjoy life more like the sidewalker.

However, as they build their empires, they are more similar to slowlaners but with key differences:

- Fastlaners accumulate wealth in 10 years or less (instead of decades)
- Fastlaners control their assets (instead of depending on external forces)
- Fastlaners give jobs while slowlaners seek jobs
- Fastlaners use financial assets to generate cash (slowlaners use them to get rich)

However DeMarco is very clear: do not confuse "get rich quick" with "get rich easy".
Fastlane is all about frontloading your hard work.

Building a Pyramid: The Different Roads

DeMarco uses the example of building a pyramid to explain the different approaches.

I will give my own slightly different interpretation:

The slowlaner starts moving the stones. Slowly.

The fastlaner works even harder, weekends included, all impassioned about his project.
But he's not putting up any stones. After 5 years it looks like the slowlaner is getting stuff done, but then the fastlaner's crane is ready.
In a few months' time he's already surpassed the slowlaner and will finish the pyramid in a few years, ready to enjoy it while he's still young.

The sidewalker?
He blew all his initial money on Egyptian hookers and now he bums around for scrap change :).

The Solution? Become a Producer

DeMarco says we have all been conditioned to consume and buy “stuff”.

He urges you instead to get into a mentality of providing stuff.

Don’t attend a seminar, give one; don’t dig for gold, sell the shovels; don’t take a mortgage, hold one.

Divorce Wealth from Time

MJ recommends you build “money trees”.

Such as, systems or products producing income independently of you.

This part made me think of other authors as well: Ray Dalio says that if he were to do his job the best, he would find a CEO to replace him and do better than he does.

Here are good money trees options for MJ:

1. Rentals
2. Software
3. Content (books, blogs, songs, videos etc)
4. Distribution systems (app stores, e-commerce etc.)

Law of Attraction is BS

DeMarco says that many gurus sell the law of attraction because it’s easy.

He says it’s nothing but the repackaged old habit of visualization.

He says it’s not a law because it doesn’t work universally and all the times. And it doesn’t work at all unless you work hard at what you want.

I couldn’t agree more with it.
MJ then proposes a different law:

Law of Effection

The Law of Effection says that to make a million, you need to help one million people.
The more lives you improve, in scale and magnitude, the bigger your returns.

Part 6: Your Vehicle to Wealth: YOU

DeMarco says the main element of a successful business if yourself.

He stresses the importance of ownership and taking responsibility for your life.
He says that everything happening to you is because of your choices.

And then proposes two methods to make choices: the worst case scenario -asking what’s the worst that can happen and how likely and acceptable it is- and the weighted average decision matrix.

The author makes fun of inspirational quotes and says need to build daily habits instead (check The Power Of Habit).

He also mentions the famous suggestion from The Richest Man in Babylon that you should pay yourself first.
But that’s impossible as an employee because your salary comes already curtailed by taxes.
To pay yourself first, you need to start a corporation instead -which is the same advice from Rich Dad Poor Dad-.

Don't Waste Your Time

MJ talks about people spending hours playing Facebook games or watching TV.

He says those people are escaping their lives because their lives is not exciting.
He recommends you spend little time with those people and build a life that you're excited to live instead.

The More You Buy, The More Time You Lose

The author says anytime you buy something too expensive for your income, you are giving up time.

You are giving up time because that's all hours you'll need to work to pay back that (useless) expense.

Don't Waste Time to Save Nickels

The author says that many people spend lots of time to save little money.

Taking a layover flight to save a hundred and driving two hours to save 20 dollars is stupid.

Your time is the most precious resource, and you can't buy it back.
Time-wise, we're all on a sinking ship, and you should keep that in mind.

So here's another difference between slowlaners and fastlaners:

- Slowlaners are frugal with money. Fastlaners are frugal with time.

Fastlane Requires Commitment

The fastlane process is not easy.

It requires commitment.
The author differentiates between interest and commitment.

- Interest reads a book, commitment applies that book 50 times

Commitment is staying at it for long hours and through failure and failure.

My Note:
DeMarco is talking about grit here, check out Grit by Angela Duckworth and Deep Work.

Part 7: Millionaire Fastlane Commandments

DeMarco says you must not worry if someone else is doing the same you're doing, but you must worry about doing it better than everyone else.

He writes that a good business must obey five commandments:

- 1. The Commandment of Need

You must start a business to solve a need or a problem people have.
Need of the people, not your needs.

That's why DeMarco says the advice of "follow your passion" is terrible advice.
However, he also says passion is important for success and he does suggest to "do what you love".

- 2. The Commandment of Entry

The harder it is to start a business in the field you choose, the easier it is to make money and keep making money.

When barriers are low, you need to be really exceptional.

But then again, it's easier being exceptional among a small group than being exceptional among hundreds of thousands.

- 3. The Commandment of Control

If anyone can change something and send your business in a tailspin, you're not in control.

As an employee, you're not in control.

Or if your website is all your income and you get all leads from Google and AdWords, then you're too heavily dependent on Google.

- 4. The Commandment of Scale

The more you can scale your business, the more you can earn.

A street corner coffee shop is not scalable as it's limited in the amount of people it can reach and host on the premises.

A course online is scalable instead because people from all over the world can access it at the same time.

- 5. The Commandment of Time

If you want to enjoy life and win back time to do all other activities you enjoy, you must be able to eventually automate your business or have it run without you.

Part 8: Accelerate Wealth

DeMarco says your real boss is always the person who pays for your products -your customers-.

And in bussiness, DeMarco says, you should choose monogamy.
Don't spread yourself thin or divide your resources over several different ventures.
Stick to one and grow that one until you succeed.

> Dollars are like privates in your army: the more you have, the harder they fight for your freedom

Power Dynamics Behind 'The Lanes'

- Fastlane = control of value flows
- Slowlane = dependence on systems you don't control
- Sidewalk = zero leverage + consumption trap

TPM Takeaways

Switch From Consumer To Producer Mentality
Don't go through life thinking and planning only about what to buy. Think about what you can sell and provide instead.

Place a High Value On Your Time
Time is your most important resource. Don't trade your time for money. Use money to buy more time instead. Incidentally, this mindset makes you a higher-value man and shifts the interpersonal power dynamics in your favor as you become scarcer.

Stop Listening To Gurus
Stop listening to gurus who didn't make their money with their own tips. They didn't get rich giving up a coffee a day or using their own material. They're getting rich selling you that material.

CONS

- Critical takes may be too critical for some

I found the bashing of the industry's gurus hilarious and at times also on point.
But I personally found a bit out of place the critique to Kyosaki as the message of the two books is far from antithetic and at times is actually quite similar.

- College is peak life experience (educationisn't isn't useless)

I agree education is not a pre-requisite for success, however, I wouldn't go as far as the author does in discounting its utility.
What most authors like DeMarco don't consider is that university is not just a place to get information, but college is a place to make social experience and date around. It can be a peak experience for many men's lives and it completely fits what DeMarco says: you cannot get that same experience later on in life as an older man, no matter how much money you make.

Review

The Millionaire Fastlane unveils the hidden costs of a 'safe' existence based on employment and savings and propose a different, more empowering model we wholeheartedly agree with.
It's one the most underrated book I've read.

Some parts really spoke to me. I've been conditioned to be a slowlaner all my life.
I grew up with the idea that the slowslane is what serious people do.
And that diverging from that path is for good for nothing, "pie in the sky people".

If you think about it, most of us feel the pressure of the slowlane.
Who do we respect, who do recruiters look for in a CV?
Consistency!

But too often that means “consistency of employment”, the guy who held a job for years.
The guy who kept his head down the longest.

I also enjoyed DeMarco’s writing style: rebellious, biting, and irreverent.

Of course, there are parts that are not as groundbreaking.
Like when it tries to be an “how to book” and discusses which field to start a business.
That’s not as powerful.

And there are parts I don’t fully agree with, like that the main determinant of sales is marketing and not the product itself -it’s both-.

But it’s a 5 star book as it gives readers the theoretical foundation -and proverbial kick in the butt- to step off the employee’s rat race.

How To Slow Down Sex & Get A Relationship

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Turning sex down is an art.

It's part of the forgotten art of effectively saying no.

And you want to do it well because if you like a guy but make him feel unwanted you can destroy the relationship.

Luckily, if you turn him down well you will enhance your relationship.

This article teaches you how to turn down sex while also becoming more attractive, and more long-term material.

Expressions of disgust or "yucks" are the worst. It makes him feel hurt and unwanted (and he might leave for good)

The First Time You Delay Sex Is Make or Break

The first time he escalates towards sex is a very emotional, intense moment for him.

He is putting all of himself -no, not just his penis, really all of himself- on the line.

When you turn him down the wrong way it's like telling him "I don't like you, I don't want you".
And that can easily make or break the relationship.

It's indeed entirely possible that two people can like each other and still end things acrimoniously over a poorly executed sexual rejection -or sexual delay-.

This article will teach you how to turn down sex in two steps:

1. First, we analyze how women turn down sex the wrong way;
2. Second, we'll show how you can delay sex effectively

Keep this in mind:

- It's easy to crush a man's ego with a rejection: Brene Brown pinpointed "initiating sex" as one the most vulnerable moments in men's lives. That included men in relationships, and it's all truer when there is no relationship yet.
- Things can easily spiral downwards after critical phases: and escalation to sex is one of the most critical phases

How Bad Rejections End Relationships

Imagine the following scenario with a new budding relationship:

1. You're in a private location -for the first time-: You think this could lead to something physical. You're not sure about it, but you're excited and a bit nervous.
2. He makes a move: He goes to kiss you. But it's a bit too soon. You need some more time, or you don't want to seem too easy
3. You reject him – the wrong way: You pushed him away, or you physically move away as if he was a rabid dog.
4. He's hurt: Of course, you didn't mean it that way, but he feels spurned and hurt
5. Now it's weird: he is dejected, and the conversation sputters. You fumble something, you hope he can make it good again. But nobody is sure what to do or say. Oooops.

6. Things turn sour: the discomfort grows larger. You want out of this.

When you leave, you're glad your out.

And yet…

Yet, he seemed a great guy up until then.

What happened?

The Psychology Of Bad Sex Rejection

Now granted, he might have been an actual, real weirdo.

But.. Are you really sure he was?

He wasn't a weirdo at all until then.
He was a cool guy.
Why is he only a weirdo now?

Psychology is clear on it: we don't remember whole interactions.

We remember the peaks, what happens last, and what's most emotional.
A bad move from his side and a bad rejection from your side end the interaction on a terrible emotional low.

And that's all it takes for an otherwise great guy to be passed up and for a high-potential relationship to end.

I'll come out of the woodwork and say it: I have come across as a weirdo after a few failed escalations in the past.
And some other women said I was the best man they'd ever met.

How is that possible?

The difference was all in the rejection and what happened afterward.
Yes, it takes that little.

Now, we're going to learn how to avoid this scenario.

4 Bad Ways Women Reject Sex

Do you want to hear a (not so) funny thing?

I was checking what were the most common search terms for this article. In the top 10 there was this one here:

> Her: I rejected him now he rejects me

Now I will show you exactly what those women have done wrong.

Here are four common ways that women sexually reject men the wrong way:

1. "I Don't Want You" Rejections

MOST rejections fall under this category.

When you reject him you are not communicating your full range of feelings.

You are not saying "I like you, but not yet, I just need some more time".
You are only communicating the negative part, the "I don't want you, go away".

And that can be painful, and he can have difficulties recovering from there.

If you like him but need more time your rejection should communicate that.
Your rejection must deflect the physical escalation while also communicating your positive feelings.

2. "You Have To Respect Me" Rejection

Some women reject sex by demanding to "be respected".

The "respect me" line self-frames her as saintly (see Madonna/whore) and as the relationship leader who dictates the tempo.

It works well with less experienced men as they'll gobble it up and keep investing in the woman.
It works very poorly with higher-quality men who don't appreciate the power move.

You go haughty queen with that move, but only peasants will stick around.

Basically, it works well with the guys you don't want and works poorly with the men you most want.
Guys worth their salt knows that the best way to respect a woman is to bond emotionally, have great physical chemistry, and make her come.
And then bond a bit more after that.

They know the best relationships are based on honest communication and entail great chemistry.

When you tell him to respect you, you are communicating the opposite.
This is what he will hear:

- I'm not that attracted to you
- We don't have a great chemistry
- I don't respect you that much
- I'm playing games

3. Spite Check Questioning Delay Tactic

Spite check refers to a chess player who prolongs the game just to irritate the other player.

Some women unwittingly irritate him with spite-check delay tactics.

Women's way of slowing down and defusing sexual tension is to talk and ask questions.

"Spite check questions" include:

- Why?
- But why?
- Why do you have X in your room?
- But why do you want to make love to me?
- But why do you want to take my pants off?

The goal of these questions is to make him talk and frustrate his sexual mood.

And that's exactly the problem with spite check questions: they frustrate him -and destroy the mood-.

Experienced guys of course know better than to reply to those questions.
But even for them, "spite check questions" ruin the mood.

Spite check questioning sends a negative message both about you and him.

About you, it makes you come across as slightly childish, unnecessarily nervous, indecisive, and potentially also frigid.
By frustrating the sexual mood, they communicate that you might not be very much into sex, and not very much into him.
And he might feel like you don't like him.

Ideally, if you've reached that point, you should know whether or not he's a guy you're comfortable getting together with.
And you should be at least somewhat attracted to him.

Personally, when I'm on the fence about a woman and she seeks to stall me with spite check conversation, I start getting turned off.

If I like the woman I can find it endearing -up to a certain point-. But that doesn't mean I don't pass some judgment based on it -namely, that she's a bit of a big baby-.
In either case, she never comes across as a high-quality woman.

4. "You're Not Getting Any" Rejection

Some women love to see men horny about them.

And up until here, all great.
The problem starts with some women who, instead of getting themselves in the mood… They prefer teasing him and going on a sexual power trip.

Some will say things such as:

- "Hmmm you're so horny, aren't you" (talking as if they weren't horny at all)
- "I like to see men like this" (ie.: chasing after me / desperate for me)
- "You can call a hooker when I leave"
- "You look a bit serious, are you angry you're not going to get what you want?"

These women like to have power over men.
They prefer having power over men instead of actually enjoying sex and the sexual mood.

This sexual power trip can be very delusional. Especially for men who actually have options.
Personally, few things turn me off as quickly as a woman who talks as if she were the ultimate dispenser of pleasure in this world.

And sure, I'm particularly sensitive to power dynamics, but this technique is poor even for the most undiscerning man.

Why?

Well, think about it.
The problem with this technique is that it's sexually confrontational.
This technique says "you want me, I don't want you… And I am happy to see you suffer".

Who on earth might want to have a relationship with a woman like that?
It's not a high-quality man, for sure.

How Not to Delay Sex: Example

The messages below come from the worst sex-delaying attempt I have ever experienced.

This was the poster child of doing it all wrong.

This is how she behaved during our intimate time:

1. During the date, she seems bored and irritable
2. When I say I like her and imply she feels the same, she vehemently denies it (first rejection before we even reach sexual escalation)
3. She was taller and during the escalation, she repeats "how small I am" (allow me a clarification: was not talking about my penis :)
4. To keep her pretense of disinterest she finally dresses to leave while she really wanted to stay
5. I am fed up with her and don't play the game of "stay a bit longer" anymore: I gladly walk her out
6. Once away, she realizes her mistake and since she actually likes me, writes me to negotiate her come back (now she looks needy and desperate)
7. She walks back in with the same haughty and distant attitude, undresses, and lays on the bed
8. We do it and she shows no passion
9. Finally, she falls in love after she managed to fully estrange me

Can you see how each step compounded the mistake?

The difference here is that the man knew what he was doing, and that attracted her.
She didn't know what she was doing and pushed him emotionally away.

Result: he doesn't want to see her again and she fell in love.

This is an extreme example of course, but many women do at least some of those same mistakes.

Bad Rejections Only Get You The Players!

Now you might think:

> Wait a second Lucio, it's a good thing to be harsh so I only get the coolest guys!

Some guys indeed will disregard your rejection, no matter how you slice it.
They'll take a step back, talk a bit more, chill a bit more, and pour one more drink.
And then go for it again.

That's what happened in the example above, after all.

But if you only end up with those guys, then you're screening in players and fuckboys.

Those are the guys who've been there a hundred times and know how to make up for the women's mistakes.
But if you want a serious relationship, then you can't hold only onto the womanizers.

And Turn Away The Good Guys!

About the guys who are not male whores?

Those are the guys who'll most likely feel hurt by poor rejections.

They might recover with a bit of time, but the minutes after a failed move are the heaviest.
And the heaviness of that situation often doesn't afford him the luxury of time.
It's often over before you two even had a chance.

And it only gets worse when he's really into you.
You see, the more he is into you, the more your rejection will destroy him.

It might be this guy was just a bit too touchy.
Or he was just too into you. And he'd otherwise be a great guy. But you'll never know when you turn him down the wrong way.

Because when you reject too strongly you filter in the players and you filter out the guys really interested in you!

What's a gal to do then?

The end of this article answers that.

How to Delay Sex Properly

Do you like him?

If you do but you need more time -or want to resist a little bit-, you must slow things down while also showing that you like him.

A few techniques to do exactly just that:

1. The Hug Tackle

A great technique to delay sex and a win-win for everyone.

As he escalates sexually, you deflect moving towards a cuddly hug instead.

If you also rest your head on his shoulder, he might feel like you're in need of emotional support.
That will also help to awaken his protector's feelings, bringing him emotionally closer to you.

Whether you rest your head on him or not, it's best done all in silence, no words spoken.

The hug tackle switches from sexual to emotional. It slows down the tempo while at the same time increasing your bonding.

Great technique!

2. Fire First, Water Soon After

As he kisses you, kiss him back, touch him, or pant a bit.

Then all of a sudden, stop and push him back.
Don't verbalize it, but the feeling you want to convey is this:

> You: It's hot, but I'm a lady and need time, that's why I must resist.

It's a bit like she does, but you will stop far sooner (and without giving in):

This works great because you communicate at the same time:

1. You do like him (which men love) +
2. Albeit you like him, you also don't want to be easy (which men love for long-term girlfriends)

That's the perfect combo.

HOWEVER you must be careful with this one and stop very early, or else you end up frustrating him sexually.
He might slot you as a game player or a tease and hate you for it.
Plus, a small percentage of men might even turn aggressive.

So… Watch out for this one and, in doubt, avoid it.

Or use it for when you're ready to go all the way.

3. Reframe From Sexual to Romance

This might be the best way of delaying sex.

It's honest, builds him up, and develops an emotional connection.

Once he accepts your new long-term romance frame, he is also moving closer to being your boyfriend (if you want him like that of course).

Look how she executes it to perfection:

Note:
YouTube removed it.

Please see "Seduction University" with the full version of this article.

4. Only Go To His Place When You're Ready

Many a great connection died on the altar of a failed sexual escalation.

In my experience going to someone's place and escalating without getting to sex almost always spells doom for the relationship.

If you like him but you're also sure and positive you don't want to get physical I recommend you simply avoid being at your place or at his place.

As they say, an ounce of prevention…

Responsibility For Dating Failures

This article is to help women (and men) increase their chances of finding the right partner.

It's not about pointing fingers.

But since men traditionally have the "leader's role" in seduction, we could argue most of the "blame" rests on men.

But no man is flawless.
And even the amazing ones, they're not amazing all the time.

I'm pretty sure many a woman missed a relationship with Clooney or Pitt because some women rejected them poorly.
I'm pretty sure some women left these guys in disdain.

This is dating.

And ironically, the more you care and the bigger the feelings, the easier it is to derail.
Sometimes a small pebble at a key intersection can derail a train that was on course to beautiful destinations.

By knowing what the most common issues and pitfalls are, you can give your own contribution to make sure you give your and your favorite men the best possible shot.

This post helps you help men to run things smoothly.

Summary & Note

Please note that this article is to turn down sex when you want a relationship.

If you don't want intimacy nor a relationship, then research shows that a direct rejection works best.

However, if you like him and would like to explore a possible relationship, then this guide becomes relevant.

If we had to summarize this guide on how to turn a man down in two sentences, it would be these:

1. If you want to delay sex, make sure you protect his ego: show that you like him, personally and physically. You just need a bit more time and you'll get there together
2. If you want a relationship, reframe from sex to romance and add an emotional bond: with the techniques shown above

The Paradox of Choice: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Paradox of Choice (2004) is a psychology book on decision-making. It investigates the counterintuitive effect of having too many choices: it's not true that choices necessarily free us, but they can also paralyze us and make us unhappier.
Schwartz, the author, gives practical advice on how to become happier, more fulfilled, and even more effective decision-makers.

TPM Strategic Takeaway: Quit spending time on 'maximizing' small stuff, focus on ROI
For the strategic operator, the goal is to shift from a Vulnerable Maximizer (who can be stalled by details and inconsequential stuff, including with various 'bio-hacking fads') to a Strategic Satisficer (who moves with speed and agency).

Main Takeaways

- Too many choices can make us unhappy, indecisive, and regretful ("what if…")
- Maximizers, people obsessed with making the best decisions, are the worst hit
- Fear of regret leads you to sub-par decisions (and self-sabotage)
- You can learn to stress less and be happier

Notes

About the Author:
Barry Schwarz is an American psychologist and university professor at Swarthmore College.

Introduction

The usual thinking goes that the more choices people have, the freer and happier they are.

The author says that's true up to a certain point.

When there are too many choices, the negatives start overtaking the positives. Above a certain threshold, choices no longer liberate us but debilitate us.

Part I: When We Choose

Picture this study:

People could choose between 6 varieties of jam or 24 varieties. The people exposed to the tray with 6 options bought jam 30% of the time.

People exposed to 24 options only bought them 3% of the time.

Studies also show that people with fewer choices are not only more likely to buy but are also more satisfied with what they get.

Part II: How We Choose

Barry Schwartz says that we don't really shop for value.

We shop for expected value.
Then, once we tried something, we built a "remembered utility" and chose based on that.

Ideally expected, experienced, and remembered utility matches
But most of the time, they don't.
Indeed, we don't really remember our experiences all that well.

Memory Bias: We Remember Peaks

We remember the peak and the end of an experience.

The duration, for example, matters little.

So ironically, you could have a longer bad experience that ends not so bad, and you would prefer it to a much shorter bad experience that doesn't taper off at the end.

Memory bias invalidates the concept that we are rational decision-makers when we are presented with many choices.

We Don't Know What We Will Want

Even when choosing what we would like to consume in the future, we make mistakes.

This study showed that students thought they wanted to have more diversity in the future, but they didn't.

They thought they wanted variety, but instead simply stuck to what they liked most (Diversification Bias).

We Think There Is More If It's Available

Availability also makes us feel there are more options available than might be the case.

We think, for example, that there are more words in English starting with "T" than having "T" as the third letter. But that's only because we can think of more words beginning with "T".

We Can Only Decide Comparing Things: Anchoring Bias

We have difficulties considering things in isolation.

Instead, we often make decisions based on other available options.
In a rack full of 900 Eur suits, a suit at 600 feels like a bargain. The context is indeed what makes a good pick.

This is the anchoring bias (Tversky & Kahneman, 1974).

We Value What's Already Ours More: Endowment Effect

When we acquire something, it feels like its value is higher than the cash we just exchanged it for.

Since we fear loss more than gain, giving up something that's already ours feels disproportionately unacceptable to us.
That's why, the author says, some companies can safely offer guarantees: people are not willing to give up their items after they become "theirs".

Similarly, when you propose a car with full options and ask people to winnow out what they don't want, they'll end up with more stuff than if they were asked to add options to a car with zero options.

Maximisers VS Satisficers

Finally, we get to the real genius part.

Barry Schwartz introduces here the two different ways people relate to options.
The two types of people are: satisficers and maximisers .

- Satisficers: pick the first good option

Satisficers pick the first option.
They don't spend too much time pondering the different available choices. They are decisive: they take what they like first.
To sell to satisfied customers, marketers need to make their products as available and visible as possible.

Satisficers are more likely to be happy with their choices.

- Maximizers: search for the best option

Maximizers (want to) pick the best option.
Every choice is a mini-project. They conduct exhaustive and time-consuming searches, trying to come up with the final winner.
To succeed with maximisers marketers need to offer the best possible value.

Maximisers often end up less satisfied (read below why).

Maximizers By Choice
Schwartz says we're not maximizers or satisficers in every single realm of life.
Which is good news, as he implies, as it means we can choose.

Maximizers VS Perfectionists
Schwartz says that perfectionists have very high standards they don't expect to meet.

But maximizers believe they can reach their lofty goals.

That's why perfectionists are not depressed or regretful. Perfectionists are happier with the results of their actions than maximizers are.

Take the quiz here to see if you're a satisficers or maximizer.

Maximizers Suffer of Regret

Almost everyone who scores high on the maximizer scale scores high on the regret scale.

In the presence of many options, Maximizers end up unsatisfied as soon as they find it there are new or better options.
And one of the reasons why maximizers take so long to decide is also because they want to avoid future regret.

Maximizers, indeed, can sometimes even experience anticipated regret.
It's the imagination of how bad you'll feel if you realize you didn't make the best choice.

The overload of choice is indeed a burden to maximizers, not to satisficers, as they feel the need to research to avoid making the wrong choice.

Near Misses Are So Painful for Maximizers

Near Misses are particularly painful for maximizers as near misses, sorry for the pun, maximize regret.

You were so close, yet not cigar.
That's one of the reasons why bronze medalists are happier than silver medalists.

Regret Leads Us to Poor Decision-Making

Barry states that, often, we make choices based on future regret.

Imagine that you can choose between a great possible win and a good certain win.
You will choose differently depending on whether you will be available to know what would have happened if you had taken the risky bet.

People indeed show greater willingness to take risks when they can find out the "what if option".
It's because they will not have to deal with the "what if" scenario.

Regret Factors

Barry says the major determinants of regret are:

1. Personal responsibility for the result
2. How easily you can imagine better alternatives

The more options there are, the more those two factors are magnified.

Part III: Why We Suffer

Barry Schwartz talks a bit about happiness in relation to wealth and options.

He says that above a certain threshold, there's no strong correlation between wealth and happiness.

Similar to the conclusion Brene Brown reaches, he says that the biggest determinant of happiness are close social relationships.
Albeit, Barry adds, we don't know the causality here.
But likely it goes both ways: happy people make more social connections, which in turn makes them even happier.

Decisions With Trade-Offs Make Us Unhappy

Barry Schwartz says that studies show how decisions with trade-offs tend to make people unhappy.

The problem, he adds, is that most decisions present trade-offs.
A common response people adopt is to postpone the decision, he says.

Other Options Make Us Unhappy: Opportunity Costs

A study by the University of Florida shows that people value a magazine if they don't see any other magazines in it.

The simple idea that they could miss out on other options makes people feel that their choice is less valuable.

Schwartz describes an example from his own life.

He was walking along a street full of nice restaurants. He was looking forward to dining in one, but as he kept walking, he couldn't find the best option available, and he started losing both appetite and mood.

Looking at one attractive alternative after another reduces the pleasure of the next one.

Relationships and Job Hopping

Barry Schwartz implies that the feeling of having many romantic options leads people to choice paralysis, also in dating.

He says that's why people marry much later nowadays and hop from job to job.
They are never sure that what they picked is the right one. And the grass often seems greener on the other side.

This is something I mention in Mistakes Women Do In Early Dating.

We Adapt... And We Can't Predict Our Future Mood

After a few months of winning the lottery, people revert to their level of happiness before winning the lottery.

And people suffering a paralyzing accident also go from depressed to normal.

Schwartz explains what are the external causes and doesn't want to imply the two events are comparable in people's level of happiness.
However, it does tell us that people overestimate the impact of most events on their future emotional well-being.

Maximizers will likely be most disappointed by adaptation.
Because they spend so much time choosing what they believe will be a big game-changer. Only to find out it didn't really change their life all that much.

Adaptation is also at the heart of the hedonic treadmill.
And learning about adaptation can help us sweat less on decisions because, a year from now, it won't really matter that much to us.

Grateful People Are Healthier

The author says grateful people are healthier, happier, and even more likely to achieve their goals.

And contrary to adaptation, we can directly control our gratitude.

Comparisons Make Us Unhappier

Schwartz says we don't judge where we stand and the results of our choice in a vacuum, but always based on the environment and on the people around us.

Here's how we evaluate our experiences:

- People around us (because we care about status)
- Expectations
- Previous experiences
- Previous best experience

Maximizers are the ones who really care about social comparisons.

Ownership Culture = Blame & Regret

The American culture stresses the power of the individual and of the individual's choices (Extreme Ownership mentality).

Such a culture, however also puts more pressure on the individual and on the choices he makes.
Barry says that personal responsibility culture coupled with cultural ideals such as thin bodies causes depression, illnesses such as bulimia, and also an increased suicide rate.

Maximizers are most likely to feel this kind of pressure.

Part IV: What We Can Do

Barry Schwartz says that some people can lead a better life if they can learn to be less of a maximizer.

But the world is not helping you today.
There are far too many choices. Between 1975 and 2008 the average number of products in supermarkets skyrocketed from 9.000 to over 47.000.

So you must do it by yourself.

He proposes a few steps to minimize the choice paradox. This is my take on his suggestions:

- Choose when to choose

Determine what really matters in your life.

Think of how you could spend that time on something else more important. Think of how your final choice will benefit from research, if at all.

If it does, then decide how much time you spend on research.

- Become more of a satisfier

Think of the times you behaved like a satisfier and you happily settled for good enough. Then apply the same logic and methods more often

- Stick to your usual

Unless you're very unhappy, stick to what you always buy.

My Note:
This is a great suggestion. Steve Jobs, for example, used to wear the same clothes not to waste time.

- Set rules

The more rules you have, the fewer decisions you gotta make.

- Stick to oldies but goldies

Ray Dalio says great is better than new.

Similarly, Barry suggests not to be tempted by new and improved.
Don't worry about what you're missing in the world: likely you're not missing anything.

- Make your choices final

The author says that the ability to change our minds often leads to stirring disturbance and unhappiness.

A great fix is to make more of our choices final.
Also useful is to make your relationships last: you picked your partner, stick with it.

- Anticipate adaptation

Whatever you're choosing, it won't make much of a difference to you a few weeks down the road.
Think about it and pick something.

- Allow serendipity

If you allow the world to surprise, you'll be surprised -and happier-

- Practice gratitude

Stop comparing and, also recommended by Tony Robbins, gratitude is a magical thing to make your life happier.

Barry Schwartz TED Talk

Real-Life Applications

There is really a lot to learn here and much you can use to improve your life.

Especially if you are a maximizer.

- Stick to Your Choices

Many options make us feel bad about picking something or staying with something.
That's why we job-hop and find it hard to commit to a partner.
Make your choice final instead, as Angela Duckworth explains, passion grows when you stick to things.

- Stop Wasting Time on BS Decisions

I'm sure we'll be guilty of this. As MJ DeMarco explains, time is the most precious resource we have.
Let's stop spending time on small decisions and use that time for what really matters.

- Don't Allow Regret to Stop You Doing The Right Thing

I realized I have too often allowed regret to stand in the way of making the best decisions.

Out of fear of regretting something later on, I don't do anything -or self-sabotaged myself-.

When you do the same, you never give yourself a chance.

- Be Aware of Memory Bias

In how a woman should turn down a man for sex I explain how memory bias can doom our relationships early on.

When something bad happens to us, we will blow it out of proportion and forget all the good things.
Watch out when that happens so that you don't throw away the baby with the bath water.

- Embrace Serendipity

Torturing on "what ifs" not only leads you nowhere but your what ifs are most likely wrong.

Maybe if you had gone to college, you would have hated it. Or a truck would have hit you on your first day there.

You don't know the what-ifs scenario. Embrace a bit more serendipity in your life.

- Let Go of Regret

There's only something to gain when you can let go of bad decisions from the past.
And you can only gain when you can make decisions without fear of tomorrow's regret.

CONS

Published Early, It's Not As Simple
The book jumped the gun on early research, so it's not a complete overview of the impact of choices.

Bit Disorganized

The paradox of choice extends much beyond choices.
Possibly the title should have reflected that.
More importantly, I haven't always found the chapters to well reflect the content.

Review

I loved "The Paradox of Choice", it was very instructive for me when I realized I'm a maximizer, and I believe this book can help me to use this information to further boost my work and life effectiveness. And it can hopefully do the same for you if you're a fellow maximizer.

Men Don't Love Women Like You: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Men Don't Love Women Like You (2015) is a dating book for women that teaches readers "how to date like a Spartan", meaning how to take charge of one's dating life to find the right man.

TPM Strategic Note: High agency dating for women
We audit this text as a case study in High-Power Female Dating Strategies, including leading, screening, and controlling the tempo. We advise ambitious men to lead themselves, but they can learn to differentiate a high-value woman's tests from power moves and red flags.

Takeaways

- It starts with you: you have your own life, you don't settle, and you demand respect and investment
- Use the dating process to vet your men
- Become a friend, build a bond, and get a relationship before you have sex

Notes

About the Author:
G.L. Lambert is an author and dating coach for both men and women, but particularly specializes in women's dating advice. He also wrote Ho Tactics.

Part I: Awaken The Spartan

Many men play the same games the whole world over, the author says. They aren't even playing smart games. And yet women fall for it. This book is to help women stop falling for games and find love.

Forget About Your Job

Lambert says many women think their job or income makes them special.
But it doesn't.
On the dating market, a woman owning a nail salon and one working part-time are at the same level.

As a matter of fact, dating might be more challenging for successful women.
Also, read:

- How successful women must date

You Are Not What You Can Do for a Man

Lambert says you should ask what a man can do for you, not what you can do for him.

You Are Not Your Vagina

Lambert, says too many women think sex is the key to keeping a man.

But no matter what, great sex won't keep a man around if personality isn't there.
Shining outside the bedroom gets you farther.

You Are Not Your Looks

The author says looks won't guarantee success.

Pretty people break up and can't find a mate like everyone else.
Your confidence must come from something beyond your external appearances (check my article on building an antifragile ego).

Killing Basica: Resetting Your Mind

Lambert says dating is unbalanced because men don't worry about finding anyone.

They trust it will eventually happen. Women instead ache to make something happen quickly.

My Note:
this is very true.

He dedicates a whole section to how you should revamp yourself.

Games Men Play

Some of the biggest games for Lambert are:

- Ego-stroking flattery
- "No pressure" game

Some men will indeed not pressure you for sex and can even give you a relationship.
But you might still be a placeholder for them until something better comes along.
And it will destroy your heart because you gave them your heart.

Also, read:

- Full list of games men play (with examples)

> 10 Games Men Play, And How to Handle Them

Awaken The Spartan Within

Lambert says the root of weakness is insecurity.

When you are insecure, you are a slave of the “not good enough fear” (check Daring Greatly).

He then trains the reader on how a Spartan thinks.

The main takeaways for me:

- Drop the good girl supposed to serve him mentality
- Be more selfish
- Drop negative beliefs about men
- Drop the excuses: you want a man. Set goals accordingly

Part II: Date Like A Spartan

Lambert starts part II with the biggest factors holding you back.

The two points I liked most:

- #1 Understand How Men Date

The author says men put out feelers trying to do things as easily as possible for them. A typical girl will settle for his low offer.

- #2 Understand The Importance of Dates

Lambert says you must use dates to understand and vet him. Dig up dirt, and tease out his needs and objectives. Or you’ll trip on the issues when you’re already together.

The Pre-Date Battle Plan

Lambert uses in his story a fictional character called Cali.

Cali approaches him at Starbucks. The author says the key to the first contact is to get out quickly.
She contacts him a day after to give him time to think if he’s into her.

The phone call before the date is key because Spartans don’t do blind dates. They want to know the guy’s got the basics to qualify for a first date.

Date Night: Gather Intel

Lambert says the first date is all about conversation and intel gathering.

It’s a job interview where you know who you’re looking for and peels his layer with indirect questions.

Cali arrives 10 minutes late not so much to make him wait, but to test him to see what he’s made of.

Take Charge

The author says men are careful in the beginning trying to assess what image they should project.

Typical women wait for him to lead, which emboldens him to take control.
No Cali: she uses that occasion to take the lead.

Let Him Talk

Cali will not drink and will let him open up with unexpected questions.
Lambert proposes probing questions to ensure he’s a good man. For example:

> *What's the closest you came to smacking a b*tch*

From then on, to get to know the real him, make him feel comfortable and safe to share the most truthful answers.

Drop Hints of Sensuality

Touch his arm, and lightly rub his foot beneath the table when you want to cheer him up.
Stress certain words with the same style Marylin Monroe did.

End On A High Note

Lambert says to end early on a high note and tells him he'll make more time next time.

Waiting for the cab, she hugs him pushing herself against his body and laying her head on him.
When the cab arrives she gives a pecker on his lips and says with a smile "next time".

Let Him Pay

Lambert recommends letting the man pay.

Even more, he says the woman should contribute nothing financially on the first date.

But similar to what I suggest in the 7 biggest mistakes women make, you should thank him and reward him with something physical (a hug).

You Must Vet Him Indirectly

Lambert stresses the importance of making him open up and asking good questions.

While direct questions are always best with honest men, not every men is honest.
With them, don't ask whether he's faithful, tease him and make him feel he can be himself.

Ask if he'd cover up for one of the boys who cheated.
And say you'd do it for your brother.

Post Date

Don't offer to see him too soon: now you will keep him on the phone for a while.
These are the do's and don'ts of the post date:

- the day after you can text more because he's earned it
- if he doesn't contact you the whole day you call him in the evening
- assume you're not the only gal he's seeing but behave as if you are
- fit into his day, don't pretend to take it over

The Long Phone Conversation

The author recommends you treat phone calls like marathons and make their last hours (!).
If a man has time to meet, he should have time to talk too.

My Note:
I feel this is too long. But I've noticed black girls do enjoy calls

Cali now wants to stay on his mind. So sometimes she sends a funny picture or a funny email chain. But never agree to a quick lunch or hello meeting.

Go Off-Grid For A Day

Sometimes people need to miss someone to truly appreciate how much they value them.

If he attempts the same, barely notice it when he's back.

The Second Date

Let him wait for the second date and pick a place you like.
You want to vet for compatibility.

On the second date, you switch from asking to observing.

Girlfriend Experience

Cali starts with what the author calls "The Girlfriend Experience".

The goal is to make him feel like you two are in a relationship so he starts falling in love with that idea.

End of The Date

You will not invite him home.

That's why you kiss him so he knows he's not being refused and you like him.

If he insists to come home, have an excuse ready.

Read more on how to reject a man without rejecting the relationship.

Cali will not go now for another date, it's his turn. If he doesn't make a move, she'll cut him fast.

Third Date

On the third date, you can reward him with a dinner at home, but end early and no sex.

The focus and the last test from the third date on is to become real friends. To lose you, it will mean for him to lose a trusted partner.

The author has some good tips on spending the first night over. Why and how to do it.

When to Have Sex

Lambert says there's no time or date number to have sex.

All you need is proof -and intuition- that he has what it takes for the boyfriend role.

He must invest and treat you like you are his girlfriend before the title is there.

He says there are three signs you must see to green-light sex:

1. Time and effort
2. Aggressive pursuit
3. You're the first choice as a confidant and friend

From Dating to Relationship

The author recommends you have "the conversation before sex". Get the book for what to actually say.
After sex, you want to see a continued effort.

Part III: Conquer The Relationship

The third part of "Men Don't Love Women Like You" is about keeping a healthy relationship.

Relationships Problems

Lambert goes over a few common external issues that often taint relationships.
Get the book for the full list, it's worth it, this is just a sample:

- Family / Friend interference

You never tackle them directly, but tell your boyfriends about the issue. A high-value man must defend you.

- Past or Current Suitors

Men rarely burn bridges. If there's a girl he still talks to tell him it's improper and you want him to stop talking to her.

- Picking at scabs

When something you don't like happens, you either forgive or you don't. If you forgive, you can't bring it up anymore in the future.

Men Are From Mars Women Are From Venus says this is normal female behavior.

Helping Without Emasculating

Lambert says men have big egos you need to take care of.

Men live under the pressure of having to appear strong: they will not tell your anxieties if you ask them.

You must be indirect and simply listen without giving solutions instead. Then thank him for opening up.

Boyfriend Manipulations

Some of them are:

- Victim Games

A potentially emotionally manipulative approach to make you feel guilty.

- Attack your thumbscrews

Bringing up your hot buttons (33rd law of power). For example, they'll say you're paranoid like you were in the past.
Lambert says you own up to your mistakes and faults, so you are immune to his guilt games.

- Say you're bossy

Spartans are strong alpha females, so he can use it against you and say you're domineering or mean.
He's trying to take you to the level of basics.
Nice bit*h check, but you reply with facts.

Threesome & Breaks

Lambert says if you only do it for him, that's a bad mentality because you'd be over-investing. As per social investment model, over-investing signals lower-value and can decrease attraction.

And when cheating lines get blurred, they're easier to cross it. So don't go there.

Avoid Breaks

Breaks are terrible, says the author. Avoid them.

Real-Life Applications

Love pics bring more vultures
Don't think that pics of you two on social media will scare away other women. It will attract them more.

File details of top men
Lambert advises you don't pursue but you keep the contact details of great men in case your relationship won't work.

Let Him Open Up
Understand the pressure on men of being strong. Listen to him without giving solutions (or it'll emasculate them).

Vet Your Men!

CONS

- High Initial Investment

Lambert talks about getting your man used to treating you well.

True, but when you start with lots of "event dates" you start with a bang. Then it will feel like going backward when you settle down.

- Making Him Invest Much

I'm not fully convinced the strategy of keeping men chasing without sex is that effective.

Many great men simply won't stick around. Also, read why you shouldn't let him wait.

- Is Strong Women Dating Effective?

I like the "Spartan dating attitude" in "Men Don't Love Women Like You".
Yet, I'm not convinced it's always effective in getting men to do the approaching and in making men fall in love.

Also read: "submissive VS strong women" and "how to be feminine".

- Sometimes Bellicose

Men Don't Love Women Like You seem to look at relationships like power struggles.

The author himself says spartan hood is about power, but in my opinion that leads to combative and toxic relationships.

I think the best relationships are partnerships, and women should date for mutually supportive relationships (see: how to date for supportive relationships).

PROS

Great Insights
Some very, very good insights on dating and the psychology of dating.

Top Questions
The questions and techniques Lambert recommend to make a man open up are very strong and direct and require a very confident woman.
But they're also great, I was impressed.

15 Early Signs She's a Low-Value Woman

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Some women signal low value early—you just need to know what to look for.

This guide shows you the most common signs of a low-value woman and helps you spot the red flags early, often on the very first date.

Learn what behavior, mindset, and patterns give them away—so you don't waste time, respect, or effort on the wrong partner.

Definition & Methodology: We analyze "value" through Social Exchange Theory (Blau, 1964), and the evolutionary concept of mate value (Buss, 2016). Contrary to men, we exclude power as it's less relevant to women.
Definition: A woman who possesses more traits that make her socially and sexually unattractive than traits that make her attractive.
TPM Perspective: From a high-value man's perspective, more likely to be a net taker.

#1. She's Always Free

Being always and saying she's always free signal:

- 'Empty' life
- No plans to move forward

- Low social skills
- High risk of unrestricted sociosexuality (ie.: many short-term partners)

When setting a date, being free for you can be a sign she likes you. But if she does it with everyone, she may also be 'too easy'.
You won't see this often in the West, where many women are more attuned to basic game, but you'll see it more often as you travel.

Good text… If she could see you're a high-value man. But if you've just met, it lowers her value

Some women even take pride in "doing nothing", "sleeping and eating", and "being lazy". Let them find another guy who is a better match for them.

#2. Picks The Most Expensive Dishes Expecting You to Pay

This one signals low respect for your money and possibly a value-extracting mindset.

On dates, watch carefully how she treats you and your money.
A low-quality woman will make no effort to chip in, tip, or give back any sort of value.

The problem with these "give me luxury lifestyle" women is not that they want to live well.
That can be a high-quality trait.
The problem is when spending is a way to define who they are.
This is how they think:

> Low-quality mindset: I buy luxury items, so I'm better than all the rest

The 'ordering the most expensive dish' is a good signal for this mindset. It often pairs with an entitlement mentality.
They demand luxury, give nothing back, and potentially leave you when you're down on your luck.

Drop this financial ballast ASAP.

#3. She Dresses Provocatively But Lacks Class

This combines two potentially negative signals:

- Willingness to 'use' sexiness to attract, but

- Lack of cognitive capabilities and/or work ethics to pair beauty with class

Overly showy with little class can signal attention-seeking, narcissism, and appearance over substances

One example is walking poorly on heels. It isn't really about walking style, but it's an indicator of appearance over substance.

It's the belief that quick fixes -heels- will make her more attractive instead of addressing the core issue -learning to walk well-.

The male equivalent is the guy who doesn't work on himself but sprays half a bottle of Axe, believing that the stinky scent will do the heavy lifting he isn't doing.

High-quality women take the time to learn how to be truly feminine women.
They might put on high heels… But they also took care to learn how to walk with them.

#4. She Has Poor English/Language Skills

Language is an honest signal for several underlying traits, including:

- Cognitive abilities
- Family background/SES
- Conscientiousness/ambition

Ambition matters more for men, but a minimum level of drive also impacts a woman's quality.
Powerful men may not need the most ambitious woman, but they also don't want a slacker.

Being born to a lower-class family is a mitigating factor in this case.
On the other hand, being born to a lower-class family but still acquiring superior language skills through self-education is a major signal of value.

English as the global language is particularly important here. High-value men tend to move in international circles that use English as the lingua franca, so they need a woman who can make them look good.

Note: Extenuating circumstances for English skills for countries farther from Western culture and/or with strong local cultures.

I was about to turn around… :)

#5. She Asks Nothing About You

This signals a woman who does not screen her dates, meaning:

- Low standards
- Low emotional intimacy in relationships

In dates, it looks like this:

She just sits there, asks no questions, and sometimes answers with one-liners.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's Experience: It goes beyond mere disinterest
I have gotten intimate with plenty of women who sat there in complete apathy and didn't ask a single question. I have been with women who wanted a relationship and didn't know a single thing about me.

Try dating a woman who cares, and listens, and with whom you can talk about your job, passions and, in general, share your life.
And you will see the difference.

#6. She is Rude To Servers

You will see this sometimes from women who come from a caste society.

But of course, rudeness itself doesn't care about casts and it knows no borders.

For some deranged women, mistreating those they deem as low-value people is a way of showing the high value (social climbing of the worst kind).

Why should you avoid these women?

Non-Christians might have never heard of these words:

> What you'll do to the least of these you do to me

But those words remain true no matter your religion.
And the day you'll struggle and you will be a "least" in her eyes, then it will be your turn to get the whip (hopefully, you got a whip-proof prenup by then).

Otherwise, go for someone with a heart.

#7. She Has No Personality

Albeit rarer in the West, you'll sometimes meet women who are so apathetic, passive, and submissive that they don't even know what they like.

This lowers a woman's relational value.
It undermiens quality time, lowers conversational value and, lacking in any critical input, it makes for a poor 'co-pilot' in life.

This is a dramatized example from "Coming to America":

> Him: What do you like to do
> Her: Whatever you like

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's note: Although this seems exaggerated, I've dated several women who wouldn't choose a dish unless I picked it for them.

Note: Less confident men like this type of woman.
These women, emblems of submissiveness, communicate to them “sexual availability’ and “ease of control”.
But for most men with options, this ain’t attractive.

#8. She Is Lazy

Laziness lowers a woman’s quality in several ways:

- Provide less support, even if ‘only’ with homework
- Demand more from her man, including for her own needs and wishes
- Genetic risk for his legacy

Sure, agency and drive may matter more for men than women. But still, many high-power men prefer a woman who contributes.

#9. Attention-Seeking On Social Media

Working out: to all men please stop harassing us women at the gym
Different eras provide different means for escapism and attention-seeking.
We went from binging on soap operas, to reality TV, to Netflix series binging, and today to social media attention-seeking.

The attention seeker feels validated and empowered by the number of likes, followers, and thirsty suitors she attracts.

Over-reliance on external validation for self-validation is a strong sign of a fixed mindset. And almost always is a way of investing time that brings little to no benefits.
Sorry, that’s got a different name than “investing”, and it’s “wasting”.

There are different styles of attention-seeking, including:

- “Gym pictures” after workout
- Complaining about men (especially men hitting on them)
- Bathroom selfies
- Sexy selfies with “inspirational” quotes

Partaking in seemingly deep, but actually shallow and pointless social media discussions is also a sign of attention-seeking:

I guarantee you: women who will succeed at making money don’t spend time posting about money on social media.

Edit:
The game changed with OnlyFans and cam work.
Now attention wh*ring can produce real income milking ‘simps’.
An OnlyFans woman is still not the best green flag for a long term relationship, but it can be a smart way of earning her independence.

#10. Doesn’t Care About Her Looks / Weight

This might seem controversial, so let’s dig deeper.

There are two ways of ‘not caring’:

- Limited control (ie.: convert food into fat very easily, child abuse, etc.)
- Don’t care (eats junk food, does not exercise, is “happy the way she is”)

Eating junk, not exercising, and not making an effort to change communicate low conscientiousness, apathy, and low agency.
If she doesn’t care about herself, what are the chances she’ll care about anything else?

Keep the same distance between you and her as the distance she keeps between herself and a gym.

Yes, Beauty Matters

More controversial yet, beauty isn't just about aesthetics; it is a primary signal of genetic potential. In evolutionary terms, symmetry, skin clarity, and vitality are proxies for a strong immune system and heritable fitness.

#11. She Is Confrontational And Constantly In A Bad Mood

Kindness is an important trait for a quality woman: it boosts her social and mate value, makes her charming, and boost her man's value as well.

No wonder it's one of the most sought-after traits (Buss, 2016).

Angry and confrontational women instead make the relationship worse, and lower a man's social value. Nobody will say it, but many will wonder, 'couldn't she find a kind woman'?

Here is an example of a spiteful, overly aggressive, low-quality woman. Would you like to date or associate with her?

> Her: (angry and aggressive)

Victimhood & Anger Hidden Behind a 'Cause'

Nobody would admit we're full of spite, so people often hide pent-up anger behind a cause.

The secret of each entry is that they're excessive in their zeal, revealing their opposite:

- Animals first ⇒ I don't like people
- I defend women ⇒ I hate men
- I defend the poor ⇒ I resent success

I'm not angry! It's (pick her scapegoat-'cause') fault, not mine
As usual, don't generalize:

Not all women passionately defending a cause are spiteful.

But anger can be less a sign of passion for a better world, and more the sign of a spiteful, low-value woman.

#13. She Is An Inveterate Game-Player

Everyone plays some games, and it's part of social calibration, a high-value trait.

However, low-quality women play value-taking games because they're manipulative and are not in it for win-win. They tend to be more cynical and higher in dark triad traits.
Their goal is to take more than they give, which, by definition, makes someone a taker and a net drain.

Over-faking busy when scheduling a date is an example -and a typical mistake– of a bad game in dating.
For example:

She 'suddenly' gets "busy" after I told her I was busy first and then again ready and open to reschedule.

Also, read:

- Games women play
- Games women play to get commitment
- Red flags of dating in women

#14. Sells Her Beauty (Cheaply)

How she uses beauty and sexuality signal about her character.

The high-quality approach is as the icing on the cake when she has already worked on her core traits.

The low-value use of beauty instead is a standalone trait that feeds her today and leaves her hungry when that beauty fades.

My dad always told me I could have been a doctor

Note:

Some sex workers and gold diggers, although arguably not high-quality for relationships, may be smartly using their beauty to gain personal power and independence. They're low quality for relationships, but are not low-value women as individuals.

14.2. Barters Sex & Beauty for Things

Beauty, sexual access, and loyalty are valuable traits in mating exchanges.

In some cultures and for many men, virginity is also a valuable currency. It should be expended wisely, not cheaply:

She was a good woman, yet didn't know how to properly manage her own value
If she can't manage her own "Sexual Capital" effectively, she cannot be trusted to manage a family's resources or a man's legacy.

#15. She Is Emotionally Unstable

While some emotional swings are to be expected, excessive for a man mean:

- Lower relationship quality
- Emotional drain
- Time sink

Disorders such as borderline personality disorder and histrionic are more common among women than men, and no man gains from public drama or wild aggression.
Example from a movie:

Her: (dangerously out of control)

More Traits

We didn't include the most obvious indicators as they need no explanation.
Some are:

- Dark triad traits (Psychopathy, Machiavellianism, Narcissism)
- Smoker / Drug /alcohol abuse
- Disloyal, or high sociosexual orientation, carrying social and paternity risks for men
- Low self-esteem, constantly seeking validation. It can lead to higher promiscuity and shorter-term relationships (Mikach & Bailey, 1999)

Note that a bad family or being abused does not make someone low value. They may unfortunately boost the odds of short-term thinking and dating, but not always and necessarily.

Strategic Risk Assessment

Young age, poor upbringing, small-town girl, idiotic parents… These are all major extenuating circumstances for low-quality women.

However, for those extenuating circumstances to apply, she must show a willingness and eagerness to make up and move beyond her limitations.

If she proudly laughs at her lazy ass while eating McDonald's in front of the TV set, she's irredeemable for the foreseeable future.

Low-Value Women F.A.Q.

How Many Red Flags Are Too Many?

Two major red flags without strong extenuating circumstances are often enough for a reliable, quick judgment.

What do you do when you're already in a relationship with a low-quality girl?

You must consider whether she's willing to work on herself and, if you see potential, give her the opportunity and potentially help her along the way.

If she's not willing to work on herself or if nothing changes you may not be the best match.

Summary

Low-quality women are relatively easy to spot if you know what to look for and know how to vet properly.

If you have average social skills, look for any of the above signs and you'll nail it by the end of the first date.

Then head here for the traits of high value women.

How to Handle Your Girlfriend's Public Drama

Lucio Buffalmano · 30 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Handling public drama and emotional outbursts from your girlfriend can be a very awkward social situation for most men.

But the most socially skilled men gain points when their girlfriends unleash public drama.

Why?

Because they know how to handle it.

This guide will help you become that type of high quality-man.
We will see through a real-world story I witnessed when I first had the time for this article.

A Story of Drama Queen Public Outburst

I am traveling to Bantayan, a semi-empty island in the Philippines.

It's growing, but as of today, it's so off the maps that my Chrome dictionary here doesn't even recognize it as a word.

This morning I was sitting on a wooden bungalow, having breakfast with one of those delicious fresh fruit shakes on the side.

The bar is one of those hideous white-men frontier alcoves, though.

Exclusively white patrons, costlier than the average, and a TV tuned in on some hideous sports channel -what the f*ck was I doing there, I know-.

The owner, a big Swedish guy in his 50s whom we'll call Blonde, is also sitting in front of the bar.

It looked like an uneventful morning. What could even happen here except for some hangover-fueled, late-morning brawl?

I was about to be surprised.

With the tail of my eyes, I notice from across the street a local Philippine woman making a beeline for the bar.
We'll call her Drama Queen because drama queen girlfriends are most likely to embarrass you in public.

This is not the place you'd expect locals to hang out though, and much less so single women by themselves.

What is she coming here for?

Drama Queen looks nervous and purposeful at the same time.
I keep it cool on the outside, but my mind perks up: this could be Power Moves material!

I wasn't going to be disappointed.

Drama Queen Example

Drama Queen walks up behind an older English man -we'll call him Lude-.

Lude, like the two other patrons, is sitting with his back towards the entrance and facing the bar (same angle as the first girl in this picture on the left).

Drama Queen stops a meter away behind Lude and starts talking to him.

Her tone sounds demanding, but her voice gives away her true emotional state: shaken and emotional.

I only get the word "passport" and couldn't make out the rest of the sentence.
But from body language and demeanor, it's clear Drama Queen felt she had been wronged and was confronting Lude for his misdeeds.

Lude only briefly turns his head to make sure he knows who's talking and then returns fully to face the bar.

Lude is adopting a "pretend she's not there strategy".

That strategy rarely works in these cases: she's already invested too much to let go so easily.
Drama Queen indeed keeps talking, her voice becoming even higher pitched and emotional.

This is not an easy situation for either of them: while all the patrons pretend to keep doing their thing, everyone knows we are all 100% focused on this public drama.

After a few long seconds of Drama Queen venting Lude turns to the Blonde the owner and tells him to kick her away.

Blonde doesn't answer though, and doesn't move.

It doesn't look good on Lude.
He resorted to higher authority but higher authority is not on his side.

But it's not good for Drama Queen either as Lude made his move clear now: his strategy is to treat her like a ranting bum.

Lude's move doesn't come free though.
Any "pretend it's not happening strategy usually angers the already emotional woman and adds more fuel to the dramatic fire.

Drama Queen indeed digs her heels.

She uses defiant words when she says she doesn't care if they will call security.
But her voice betrays she's feeling the brunt of the social weight on her small shoulders.
A few seconds later, on the verges of tears, she says:

> Drama Queen: if you have an heart you… (couldn't get what)

And then she finally crumbles under pressure and leaves.

Lude goes after her now and they deal with each other out of earshot and out of sight.
He comes back after barely a minute and quips

> Lude: oh well that was quick

With that sentence, he's trying to appear resolute and powerful.

And then moves on to talking about which cable TV the bar is using.
He's trying to move the conversation ahead to relieve pressure from himself and what just happened.

Reflecting On The Public Embarrassment

What do you think of this story?
How did you feel?

Think about it for a second.

Drama Queen had her own share of mistakes, but we're focusing on Lude here.
Have you noticed the mistakes he made?

Here's my take: he was right with his comment that "that was quick".

But not in the way he meant it.

It was quick in the sense that it didn't take long for everyone around to reach the conclusion of who he really was.
An old bastard taking advantage of a poor woman.

Now mind you, that might not even be true, but from what people saw there, that's what most are going to think.

Here's the mistakes Lude has done:

Handling a Drama Queen in Public

Here are the typical mistakes when handling a drama queen's public embarrassment:

1. Ignoring the Drama

When you avoid engaging someone who's emotionally unstable and looking to engage you, what do you think will happen?

They'll calm down by themselves or they'll increase their effort?

They've already initiated the silly move, they're emotionally unstable at that point… When you don't engage of course chances are they'll keep escalating!

The escalation following a failure to engage can get wild.
Either into emotional collapse (leaves crying/drops on the floor, etc.), emotional (spills out all your personal stuff public), or even physical (in toxic relationships).

This scene from Blow is an example of physical escalation because he failed to engage her:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vA5159X3mH0

2. Expecting Help From People

Or, even worse, asking for help.

When Lude asks for help from the people around, he is deferring to someone else, which does three bad things:

1. He communicates he has no power
2. He's bothering someone else with his problems
3. He's making people think he's a mean man

This God-forgotten bar doesn't have any security of course, and the owner doesn't have to personally kick out anybody just because this is his place.

Nothing bad happened so far, why should he be asked to take his side at this stage?

Also, since he's calm and she's on the verge of crying, he ends up looking like a heartless bastard when he asked the powers that be to intervene for him.
Especially after she said "if you have a heart", he looks like an abusive fu*k in everyone's eyes.

When tyrants suppress the demonstrators with violence, most people end up hating those tyrants.

3. Badmouthing the Drama Queen

Badmouthing the drama queen will only have people think that it's not the drama queen to be crazy.

It's the relationship that is crazy. And that includes you.

You want to dump low-quality women right away but handle it publicly like a professional. Keep a detached public demeanor and wash your dirty clothes in private.

Notice The Godfather looking to his wife after he badmouths his sister, here behaving like a drama queen.
This was one of the social mistakes The Godfather commits.

When he comes back and says "well that was quick", he treats her like a silly, worthless problem who doesn't deserve any time and further comment.

The problem for him though is that most people are building a very bad impression of him.
And this last comment is the icing on the cake, strengthening the idea he's a lewd bastard taking advantage of poor women.

This was not the time to go for powerful. This was the time to be human.

4. Don't Forget to Own It

Lude's technique of pretending all is good is fake to everyone.

He's trying to pretend he's above that little commotion, but since he asked for external help it's obvious he wasn't.

And of course, we wouldn't do anything with his apologies.
But by not acknowledging us and the disturbance he's created he's failing to win some easy points back and ingratiating us.

Handling Public Emotional Outbursts

Here's the correct way Lude should have dealt with that woman:

#1. Engage Her

If she's not already out of herself avoid further escalation by engaging her.

A great way to engage her is to:

1. Fully turn towards her (body language speaks the loudest)
2. Quickly greet her with "hey X" (inject some normality in the exchange)
3. Say you can see she's very upset (you're attuned to her feelings)

All the steps are executed calmly but not super slow Godfather style.
You want to relate here, not show superiority.

At the same time don't come across as defensive as that is an admission of guilt and an endorsement of public drama -something you never want, here's an example–

If Lude had engaged her, he would have come off as much more of a caring man.
Nobody would have thought he fucked her and took advantage of her, and possibly she would have changed her mind about him as well.

Importantly, she would have not said the words "if you have a heart", which made everyone think he's a heartless bastard.

Look how quickly Karen takes it down a notch after she notices he's listening (and he cares):

Note:
Heavy disrespect or upsets without a cause cannot be met with nicety. In that case, you meet her at her level or it's OK to ask security to take care of her.

#2. Deal With It One-on-One

Soon after telling her, she looked upset with a calm

Making a public scene of a private affair is typical of low-value women.
If you want to test your girl, you could actually ask her what's going on there and then in front of everyone.
If she starts venting private details, she's a low-quality woman.
Calm down and then drop her.

Otherwise, if you already trust her, invite her closer to you if it's a loud environment and people won't be able to hear.

If not, stand up and move her outside or to a place where you can address her concerns like two adults.

#3. Address Her Concerns

Once you avoid a full-blown public escalation and you're one on one, you effectively avoided public disaster.

If you don't know what happened, her explanation will make the difference between you keeping her around or not.

#4. Apologize Or Lead All Through

When you come back from talking to her one to one, don't pretend nothing happened -it's obvious to everyone that's not the case-.

And don't attack her unless it's obvious she was at fault: people can easily think you're the ahole.
What you do instead is either make light of it and help people move ahead with a laugh, or be serious and apologize for having inconvenienced everyone.

If it was a major drama, it's also OK to apologize to the patrons, wish everyone good night, and leave.

Note:
the apology is not really about asking for sorry.
You did nothing wrong and don't need to ask for forgiveness. You say sorry with your words but with an otherwise neutral voice tone. It's more like a nice gesture to acknowledge them and the situation.

#5. What To Do With Drama Queens

If you are considering the outburst girl as a mainstay, you need to make sure she doesn't do her drama queen's antics in public.

Lay down a no-public drama rule first thing in a relationship. Failing to meet those criteria is failing to be in a relationship with you.

When The Drama Queen is Out of Order

The steps to dealing with a drama queen in this post are specific to this example and they are accommodating towards the woman.

They're not to be followed if the Drama Queen is rude and out of order from the start. In that case, you can't be nice toward rudeness or you show weakness and reward bad behavior.

The steps in this article apply when:

- You know you're in the wrong and
- She is still keeping it together or
- You're clueless but you respect her and know she might be onto something
- Averting a crisis is the first priority

Averting a crisis might be a top priority for example if you're with your family or at an important networking event. Or you're in the same situation as Johnny Depp in the car :).
In those cases, follow the steps to calm her down and cut her loose later on (asap).

Summary

A woman who's getting more and more emotional needs to feel she's got access to you. Seeing a shut door will likely bring further escalation and risks damaging your relationship.

Engage her instead, bring her mood down, and then resolve the issue privately.

If she went overboard or if it happens too often, she is not girlfriend material.

F*ck Him! Summary: Nice Girls Always Finish Single (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 1 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

*F*ck Him* is a book aimed at female readers who want to take control of their dating lives -and of the men in their dating lives-.
It's brief and to the point with some good insights and some heard-before content.

Clinical Note: This is a strategic audit of Brian Nox's Fuck Him: Nice Girls Always Finish Single.
We analyze this text through the lens of Social Exchange (Blau, 1964) in dating (Sexual Marketplace Dynamics), Mate Value (Buss, 2016), and Dating Power Dynamics (Buffalmano, 2022). If you are looking for adult content, this is a behavioral science resource; please look elsewhere.
Male perspective: Although written for women, this book teaches female psychology and various dating games/manipulation, helping men recognize and select quality women.

Summary

About the Author:
Brian Nox is the pen name for Brian Geert, a European author and dating coach for women who published several dating books. He says that *F*ck Him* is not meant to be applied literally, but refers to mental game.

1. Too Nice Girls Traits

Brian & Brian say the personal traits of good girls are:

- Quickly believes she has found "the one"
- Treats him like a king (but he doesn't treat her like a princess)
- Lets him be in charge of everything

2. High-Value Woman Traits

- Wants a relationship but is happy to stay single if nobody matches up
- Is kind but has strong boundaries she enforces
- Let him invest in her
- Never makes him the epicenter of his life
- Doesn't play games

I particularly appreciated the author's saying she brings her best but also expects him to do the same.

For a more in-depth analysis of high-value women read:

- High-value women traits
- How to be feminine

> 12 Traits of High-Value Women (With Examples)

3. Avoid Playing Too Many Games

Brian says that the high-value woman is honest and sincere.

Low-value women play plenty of games with men.
But the high-value woman does not play games. She doesn't pretend busy, she really is busy.
And the authors say that high-quality men appreciate that "no-BS" attitude -and he is right-.

On the other hand, I believe there must be a method for dropping games.
See an example here:

- How to drop games in an effective way: a real-life example of how dropping games can be an effective dating strategy and give women more relationship power

4. The "Mind F*cking" Framework: Psychological Investment & Reactance

Brian & Brian say there are two rules to mental f*cking:

- Don't have sex too soon
- Behave differently than most women

You are more than your body, and similarly to Hussey in Get the Guy, the authors recommend you should build an emotional connection first.

'Mind f*ck' means you behave unlike most other women.

> How to Mind Fuck a Guy: 12 Techniques (With Examples)

5. Set Good Habits Early

The authors say it's a common mistake of women to let something slip early on with the hope it'll change later on.

I agree with it, also because he would feel like you're changing for the worse.
This is particularly dangerous during the shift from passionate love to compassionate love.

6. When He Plays With You

The authors focus on a few games even the good guys sometimes play:

- Say He'll Call, Then Doesn't
- Being aloof
- Saying "I'm not ready for a relationship"

Pretend nothing happened, don't chase, and give him space instead.

> 10 Games Men Play, And How to Handle Them

7. Let Him Wait

The authors say that when you give sex too soon men will think that's what you do with all the other guys (Madonna/whore dichotomy).

I believe though that it's difficult to make a catch-all rule.
Sex depends a lot on what guys you're dealing with and the environment you're dating in.

Also, see:

- Should you delay sex?
- How to postpone sex without endangering the relationship

> Why You Should NOT Make Him Wait to Sleep With You

8. Why He Needs To Put In Effort

The authors say you should have your man put time and effort into you.

It will screen out the players and he will get used to staying on good behavior.

Also, read:

- How to make him invest in you
- Games Machiavellian women play to make him invest more

I agree with that and I also advise you not to ask too much soon, or it will reek of an entitlement mentality. And high-value men don't like that.

> 10 Mindf*ck Ways To Make Him Value You More

9. Mind Control

How do you control a man?

The author espouses the same concept that Dale Carnegie proposes in How to Win Friends and Influence People.

Such as, instead of yelling and nagging, let him believe it was his own decision.

What I liked a lot though is that the authors say that if you're always trying to change his opinions on very important subjects, then maybe he's not the right man for you.
Indeed, as I also explain in my how to make him value more guide.

10. Team-Relationships

I particularly liked this part, which sets "Fuck Him" apart from a lot of other popular "tell it like it is women's dating books".

The authors say two high-value people behave like a team in a relationship.
It's not a win-lose or lose-win, but both make concessions and stay in equilibrium.
A win-win relationship is indeed the only possible setup for great relationships.

Also, read "how to keep power in relationships", the healthy way:

> 5 Ways to Maintain Power & Control in Relationships

11. Great First Impressions

The authors say great first impressions are key because we will then filter out anything else via the first impression we have.

Brian and Brian take the example of high-value people in networking events.
They say hi to everyone and then circle back to the ones they found worthy.

12. Acquire Self-Respect

Self-respect means you don't accept disrespect and you don't change your beliefs, opinion, and behavior for anyone.

That's a trait of a high-value woman.

13. Keeping A Great Guy

The authors also deal with how to keep healthy relationships.

A part I really liked is that men need some praise from the most important woman in their life (ie.: you).

14. Is He For Real?

Brian says that to keep it simple, women look for commitment and men look for sex.

But some women make the mistake of bugging their partners to make sure they're still fully committed.
That's not a good strategy.
High-value women know that perfect security doesn't exist and use their emotional intelligence to live without any constant confirmation.

I particularly loved how the authors apply the hierarchy of needs to a relationship and how you can use it.

Real-Life Applications

Great Relationships are Win-Win
Beyond all the games, never forget this one. Avoid Combative Relationships at all costs.

Praise Him For His Success
Remember to praise him for his successes. Lots of them, he does it for you.

CONS

Digressions
The authors often digress on topics that are not highly relevant Evolutionary Psychology, Operant Conditioning, Maslow's hierarchy, and even a few pages explaining what's a Ponzi Scheme -probably too much for a book on dating and relationships-.

Some Confusion
The authors make good points explaining why women are attracted to 'bad boys' or dark triad personalities. But then say "well-sculpted" guys actually have low self-esteem, as if the two categories were the same. Then they throw narcissists in the mix as well.
Those categories are not exactly the same though.

You Need To Be Less Invested
Most women's dating books say he should invest in you as much as possible. I believe though that overdoing it is a common mistake of low-quality women. The best approach is to raise his investment in parallel with yours. That's a win-win relationship. Check: get high-quality men with mutual investment.

PROS

Honesty for Solid Relationship

I like that Knox, at the end of the day, actually recommends honesty. As simple as it sounds, it's really the best medicine.

Short and to The Point

Review

*"F*ck Him"* provides valid dating strategies for women, overlapping with The Power of The Pussy and Why Men Love Bitches, but it's more cooperative and, often, more effective for dating quality men and establishing win-win relationships.

At times, the "overlap" may have called for some credit-giving, which would have only boosted this book's authority.

Otherwise, I like that *F*ck Him* mixes the "mental game" with honesty and values.
Honesty and values will make for a stronger relationship as a team, which indeed the authors also represent as the ideal type of relationship.

How To Develop a Growth Mindset: Here's How I Did It

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

If you want to reach your full potential—socially, professionally, and personally—developing a growth mindset is non-negotiable.

Psychologist Carol Dweck's research shows that the difference between those who grow and those who stagnate isn't talent—it's how they think about their abilities.

I grew up in a fixed-mindset environment, and I know firsthand how it limits your life. Today, I'm actively cultivating a growth mindset, and the results are undeniable.
In this guide, I'll show you exact, actionable ways to shift your mindset, overcome fear of failure, and use challenges to fuel your personal growth.

Growth vs Fixed Mindset

The difference between stagnation and mastery often comes down to your learning orientation (Dweck & Leggett, 1988; Kaplan & Maehr, 2007).

Learning orientation is divided into Performance Goal Orientation (PGO) and Learning Goal Orientation (LGO). Performance Goal Orientation can be further divided into (VandeWalle, 1997):

- Performance-prove orientation (approach-oriented): focus on demonstrating their competence and gaining favorable judgments from others
- Performance-avoid orientation (avoidance-oriented): focus on avoiding the demonstration of difficulties or incompetence, as well as avoiding the unfavorable judgment of others

Dweck later simplified and popularized these distinctions in her 2006 book "Mindset" as 'growth mindset and fixed mindset'.
A growth mindset tends to produce learning orientation. A fixed mindset tends to produce performance orientation, both the approach to 'show off' when possible (performance-prove) and avoidance when competence is uncertain (performance-avoid).

Here's a quick breakdown:

Fixed Mindset (The Trap)	Growth Mindset (The Path)
Skills and intelligence are innate and "set in stone."	Skills are developed through effort and strategy.
Failure is a verdict: "I am a failure."	Failure is feedback: "I'm not good yet."
Avoidance orientation. Protecting the ego by staying in the comfort zone.	Approach orientation. Seeking challenges to sharpen social tools.
Defensive toward feedback. Shifting blame to protect self-esteem.	Analytical. Using criticism to improve performance.
Long-term stagnation and wasted potential.	Long-term growth, social proficiency and antifragile ego.

While the theory sounds simple, the social reality is brutal: a fixed mindset leads you to skip the very events, conversations, and risks required to get good. You stay "safe," but you stay subpar.

Fixed Mindset:

- Believes traits are fixed; failure defines you
- Avoids challenges to protect ego
- Fears public failure
- Stays in comfort zone, blames others when failing
- Socially: avoids social risks, fewer friends/partners, sub-par life

Growth Mindset:

- Believes skills can improve with effort
- Embraces challenges to grow
- Failure doesn't define you; "yet" is key
- Socially: takes risks, learns from feedback, grows socially

The growth mindset reframes initial poor results or skills as a starting point towards mastery, rather than something to hide and be ashamed of.

How To Develop A Growth Mindset

1. Change Associations to Past Failures

A fixed mindset is propped by fear of looking bad.

And the times in the past when we looked at our worst function as fear-laden baggage, burned in our memories. And our subconscious does everything to avoid anything similar.

Think about these past failures, but change the interpretation.
Sit with that pain for a second and you'll realize that…. You're still alive. It's not that unbearable after all, is it?Second, resist the temptation to feel extremely embarrassed, and re-interpret them as part of growing up and developing.

Here are a few reframes for you:

- I'm glad about them because they made me stronger
- It's providing me the anger I need to move ahead
- I'm proud that I did it no matter the result
- I'm glad it happened, so I can prove to myself I keep going no matter what -that's the kind of man I am-
- F*ck that noise. Other weaker men would crow. I'll do it another thousand times

Relive Shame With Power

Relive those scenarios while you are in a strong state.

Listen to some rock songs, or imagine yourself in hero-like scenarios.
Then revisit those memories imagining more empowering behavior and outcomes. Do it enough times and those memories will lose their grip on you.

2: Associate Pain to Fixed Mindset

Look at your life and realize that you're not living because of a fixed mindset. Think of what you don't have and what you have missed so far.
For example:

- Evenings at home
- No parties
- No partners
- No friends
- … Add as much as you can.

Think of your friends instead.

Get jealous!

They're enjoying life and having a good time.
Trips with girlfriends and boyfriends, parties, networking, and career opportunities.

Hate your fixed mindset in your guts.

Now start looking back in disgust, you're about to change that.

3. Associate Pleasure To Growth Mindset

Think of what you will get moving to a growth mindset.

Associate pleasure with all the opportunities.

- Friends & partners
- Growth & improvement
- Strength & Resilience
- The power of walking to an event on your own and leave with friends
- Walk into a bar and -it's not a joke- leave with phone numbers

4. Develop New Identities Associated With Growth

Identities drive behavior.

Start thinking of yourself as a man with a growth mindset, and take pride in it.
Start also talking publicly like a man with a growth mindset and the commitment and consistency principle will help you stay the course (Cialdini, 1984).

Also, read:

- how to develop an antifragile ego

5: Reinforce Every Day

Ingraining habits benefit from repetition.

You must develop new neurological pathways, and you do that with repetition.

6. Talk Back to The Fixed Mindset

For the daily grind, Carol Dweck herself advises to:

1. Hear your fixed mindset voice, for example saying that 'you don't have the talent and better quit'
2. Recognize you have a choice
3. Talk back to the fixed voice with a growth one: don't lie or brag, be real. Say you're not sure you can manage and may fail, but you will learn and you will move forward.
    - Reframe shame from failing not trying: If you don't try you didn't save face, you lost anyway. That's what's shameful for the new you. Then be proud you're going forward, this is your new identity, and this is what you will build your self-esteem around.

4. Choose the growth mindset

7. Get Excited About Learning

Get excited at the prospect of growing and learning, and filter everything through that opportunity.

In your daily life, you will come across feelings associated with a fixed mindset thinking.
Always be replacing those feelings with empowering, growth ones.

Here are some examples:

- Jealousy towards someone far better = wow, what can I learn?
- Failure = nice I went for it, what did I learn
- Painful criticism with push-back feelings = I'm excited, I'll listen and soon get better
- Pain of finding shortcomings = great, it means there's room for getting better

Someone is better than you? What can you learn?

8. Shield Yourself Against Fixed Mindset

Most people live with a fixed mindset and/or are not used to pushing boundaries and making big demands of themselves.

So in your life, many people around you will try to drag you down with their disempowering talk.

Don't try to change those people, but avoid them and cut them out of your life.
When you hear anything fixed-mindset-like, repeat three times in your head:

> I can do it if I want to
> I can do it if I want to
> I can do it if I want to

Next Steps

A growth mindset is a deep-rooted, long-term solution that touches on everything in your life.

However, it will not make you competent and successul by itself.
You still need to learn the basics of high-value behavior, power dynamics, body language, etc. etc.

Calibration is also crucial and sometimes you must avoid displaying a growth mindset or you end up as the pupil in a disempowering teacher-student dynamic.
We've spent years codifying the strategies and behaviors that make men win. If by now you believe you can learn and improve, Power University can help you become a top-1% man in the fastest possible way:

The Ultimate Personal Power Tool: The Antifragile Ego

Lucio Buffalmano · 3 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

An Antifragile Ego™ is one of the most important psychological foundations of personal power.

Performance and long-term success are not primarily determined by intelligence, but by how individuals regulate their identity, self-evaluations, and subsequent behavior.

TPM's Framework
The Antifragile Ego™ is an original psychological framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano for The Power Moves (TPM).
Leveraging foundational research in social psychology, self-regulation theory, and cognitive psychology, this framework synthesizes disparate concepts—including Carol Dweck's Growth Mindset, Nassim Taleb's Antifragility, and Roy Baumeister's research on Self-Esteem—into a singular, identity-based self-regulatory system to help you grow stronger under stress, failure, and criticism.

Intro: Ego & Its Components

In psychology, the ego refers broadly to the sense of self: the mental structure through which individuals experience themselves as a distinct, continuous person across situations and time.

The concept of ego evolved from Freud's time to be more accurately understood as a self-regulatory and evaluative system (Baumeister, 1998; Leary & Tangney, 2012).

At a functional level, a simplified description of the ego includes:

- Identity or self-concept (who I am)
- Goals, Values, and Expectations: the standards and desired outcomes that guide behavior and evaluation.
- Self-regulatory & evaluative mechanisms that monitor, assess and adjust the relationships among identity, our behavior, our social interactions, and our outcomes
  - Sociometer, specifically gauging acceptance and social status (Leary, 2000)

Identity, Behavior, & Self-Evaluations

Identity includes the roles, traits, group-belonging, and self-concepts that define who we are and who we aspire to be.

For example, you could think of yourself as a white American male, and think of yourself as ambitious, courageous, and honorable.

Identities drive behavior because people seek to act in ways that maintain consistency between action and identity (Oyserman, 2009; Deci & Ryan, 2000).
When behavior deviates from identity, we experience psychological discomfort—a phenomenon first formalized as cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1957). Relatedly, Cialdini's commitment and consistency principle (1984) demonstrates that once we commit to a self-definition, we are more likely to behave consistently with it, reinforcing both identity and behavior.

Identity can even 'override' immediate desires, emotions, or external pressures, making it a critical tool for achieving long-term goals.

Identity-Behavior Alignment & Self-Esteem

When our behavior aligns with our identity, we tend to have higher self-esteem (Higgins, 1987).

Potentially, the highest psychological well-being is when our behavior matches our ideal identity.
You probably know the feeling. It happens when you manage to follow through with actions on what your ideal self would love to do.

For example:

- You feared speaking up, but spoke up anyway
- You didn't feel like going for that run, but went anyway
- Being lazy all day would have been easier, but you did productive work instead

Mental Health: Learning & Accepting Our True Selves

Perceived identity can differ from actual possessed traits. People may have rosier self-views about aspirational traits, like honesty and 'honor'.

These mismatches can create personality conflicts and subconscious defensive mechanisms.
Gaining deeper self-awareness, improving the parts we don't like, and finally accepting ourselves can lead to better psychological adjustment and higher self-esteem.

Now let's learn how identity holds you back with the 'standard ego' most men are naturally equipped with.

Standard Ego

> Ego developed keep us functioning and to protect our sense of self with acceptable levels of self-regard, but not optimized for top achievement or top well-being

The standard ego is a functional but largely defensive system built for self-protection instead of thriving and winning.
Not good for agentic men who want to achieve goals and advance in life.

A 'standard ego' is not terrible, of course, and it works 'well enough' for most.

Resilient Standard Ego: Good, But Still Limited

It's possible to have a standard but resilient ego. Good self-regulatory mechanisms allow you to stay steadfast and maintain high self-esteem in the face of stress, criticism, or failure.

Psychological resilience is associated with adaptive coping, emotional regulation, and mental health (Masten, 2001).

But even when resilient, it's not the best structure for ambitious men.
Resilience built on a 'standard ego' is inherently limited: it only helps up to a certain point, it's not optimized for effectiveness, and creates distorting coping mechanisms.
The 'standard ego' isn't built to maximize progress, self-advancement, or to support your goals. It's built to maintain an acceptably functioning brain, with an acceptable positive self-image.

Fragile Ego: The Extreme Fragility & Defensiveness

Worse than 'standard ego' and equally common is an ego built to prioritize self-image, sometimes associated with narcissism and a fixed mindset.

When paired with vulnerable narcissism, you could properly call this 'fragile ego', marked by thin skin, reactive anger, and high threat-orientation.

Standard Ego Table: Structure & Consequences

Here are some examples of how the ego's quest for positive self-views can work against you:

Ego's goal	Ego's pain	Ego Defense Mechanisms
Be Right	Be Wrong	-Seek confirmation, not truth -Go with the crowd: it's safer -Focus on winning only, not learning or effectiveness
Be Good	Be Bad	-Look for praise, not truth -Do what you know, don't try anything new
Be Accepted	Be Rejected	-Avoid the risk of meeting someone new -Say what people agree with, not your real opinions

⁉ Outcome: You feel OK momentarily, but don't grow and don't advance

Paradoxically, the more you succeed at 'feeling good about yourself' without increasing your effectiveness, the more you set yourself up for underachievement.

In this sense, boosting self-esteem is not the answer.
Paradoxically, the higher the self-esteem, the more threats we perceive to our well-being, and the more defensive and reactive we become. Potentially even leading to reactive aggression.
As psychologist Roy Baumeister says:

> Violence ensues when people feel that their favorable views of themselves are threatened or disputed by others.
> As a result, people whose self-esteem is high but lacks a firm basis in genuine accomplishment are especially prone to violence because they are most likely to have their narcissistic bubble burst.

Psychologist Martin Seligman agrees that boosting self-esteem is not the best approach to self-empowerment (Seligman, 1991).

The solution is changing identities and self-evaluations that completely alter the ego's functioning, going from fragile, even when strong, to *anti*fragile.

The Antifragile Ego

> An antifragile ego is built on identities and self-evaluations that do not strictly need positive outcomes and can grow stronger during challenging times

This concept builds on Nassim Nicholas Taleb's notion of antifragility (Taleb, 2012), applied to psychological self-structure rather than systems or markets.

While some believe you should 'destroy your ego', the truth is that we all need an ego. And, fortunately, you don't need to 'destroy it' because it's much better to recruit your ego and make it work for your goals.

The antifragile ego is built on identities that do not require 'standard positive outcomes' like being good, getting compliments, or even winning.
And the evaluative processes based on these antifragile identities may even strengthen your self-esteem and mental well-being when you're struggling.

Antifragile Ego Table: Structure & Consequences

Antifragile goal	Pain	Antifragile Ego's Incentives
Learning	Not learning	-Seek truth, not confirmation -Try new things: you learn more – If you don't win but learn, it's a win
Be effective	Be ineffective	-Seek truth to improve, not 'ego candy praise' -Try new approaches to increase efficiency
Approach orientation	Avoidance	-Approach more if you seek dates -Speak your mind to find the people you most vibe with

⍰⍰ Outcome: you become more competent and achieve more

Antifragile Identities

The best identities are:

- Process-rewarding, rather than outcome-rewarding: You cannot control all the variables, and you don't want your self-esteem to hinge on external factors. But you can control your effort and dedication, so that's what you focus on.
- Built for worst-case scenarios: and using negative inputs to persevere ⍰⍰♂ Lucio's example: In my first martial arts classes I was the beginner-foreigner nobody picked for training. And I went home bruised and battered. But my identity was being the guy who sucks and shows up anyway. So I was driven to attend to confirm my identity, earn my own respect, and feel great afterward. That got me over the hump until I became one of the most respected guys
- With positive associations you enjoy, like a trait you want, a hero from childhood, or someone you look up to

Some identities to pick:

- I'm a learner <— Allows to you always keep growing. See 'how to develop a growth mindset'
- I'm the type of man who does his best and focus on preparation, not results <— It takes pressure off from performance, while preparing you to win
- I'm a gritty man, I never stop, and I love the struggle <— Allows you to keep going. 'to get good you have to love being bad'

⚠ Avoid Building Self-Esteem Around Winning & 'Personal Greatness'

Winning and achieving goals is the ultimate goal, we embrace that TPM.

But it's ineffective to (fully) build your self-esteem around it. If you come to depend on winning as your main source of self-esteem, you may fear not winning, turn defensive, and avoid trying any time that the odds of winning are low.

Not good, because taking your chances and using the law of large numbers in your favor is often a fantastic approach to achieving more in life.
An identity and self-esteem built around outcomes and winning may also limit learning. You may not try anything new because the brother of 'not winning' is 'not performing well'. So you never learn new things.

Finally, you don't want to depend on positive results to feel good because you become needy for something you can't fully control.
Psychologist and founder of REBT Albert Ellis echoes this same concept. He says that equating success with high self-esteem is a trap, because you become dependent on positive results to feel confident (Ellis, 1988).

Personal greatness is also risky; it's a double-edged sword.
It makes you feel great when things go well, but it makes you defensive when things don't go well. Worse yet, it's fragile: it sets you up for a major breakdown during the toughest challenges.
Learn how to harness grandiosity without fragility in our guide to Antifragile Grandiosity.

⍰♂Lucio's Take: One of my proudest days is when I missed my goal

Lucio:
I had finished my 10k race, it was the toughest run ever, and my GPS said I had achieved my long-time goal. I was ecstatic.
Then I engraved my medal with my record time and… It was different than my GPS time, and 14 seconds above my goal.

Technically, I had failed.
It should have ruined my day, but it didn't. It remains one of my life's peak experiences because I gave it all.

How to Adopt New Antifragile Identities & Self-Esteem

Adopting new antifragile identities can be as easy as this:

- Start describing yourself with the new identity
- Take pride in it, which links your new identity to your self-evaluative processes
- Act according to your new identity

Daryl Bem in 1972 first proposed that identity doesn't just drive actions, but actions also drive identity.
Our brain looks at our behaviors and then infers that if we behave a certain way, then it must be because we are a certain way.

So develop the good habits, and identity will follow.

An antifragile ego is one of the 7 key psychological foundations that will help you achieve self-control and help you lead a truly empowered life.

Immortal Mortal Mindset: Accepting Death As Psychological Edge

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Reflecting on death is one of the fastest ways to clarify priorities, reduce social fear, and act boldly.

Men who consciously engage with their mortality tend to take more responsibility for their lives, pursue their goals, and live fuller lives.

This article explores how deliberately reflecting on mortality becomes a practical advantage: a source of courage, urgency, and mental empowerment.

- The ‘Immortal Mortal’ Mindset™

Intro

Most people live as if they had unlimited time.
This tendency may have grown larger in recent centuries and especially in the West: we removed all reminders of death, and people live safely and until old age.

In practice, many people who avoid thinking about mortality delay what matters most: authentic relationships, self-expression, and purposeful action.

When you accept that time is finite, priorities sharpen, social fear loses its grip, and action replaces hesitation. You stop optimizing for comfort and approval, and start optimizing for meaning, growth, and achievement.

Costs of Denying Death

That creates several crucial issues for ambitious men, including:

- ✕ Missing our goals by living overly cautious lives and postponing decisive action
- ✕ Subpar lives filled with regrets instead of adventures
- ✕ Fitting in instead of living our dream life: One of the most common deathbed regret wishing they had been more true to themselves (Bronnie Ware, 2012).

Socially speaking, hiding your real self and biding your time for an elusive “tomorrow” are huge roadblocks on your road to social mastery.

Advantages of Accepting Death

The benefits of living with the awareness of our limited time on earth include:

1. ✓ Courage and decisiveness to take action and stand up for ourselves
2. ✓ Living life to the fullest, doing what you always wanted to do
3. ✓ Pursuing our goals with all of ourselves

Men who live with the awareness of death tend to be more decisive, bold, and potentially even more masculine and successful.

Most people dream as if they'd live forever. But they don't live as if they'll die soon

How to Leverage Mortality For A Memorable Life

Death can be your best friend when you need that proverbial kick in the butt to go for it.

Here's how:

1. Mindset: Make Everything Fit Into This Life

> Life is short. But if we live it purposefully, it can be enough
> TPM Proverb

Accepting mortality means shifting to a mindset of 'positive scarcity'.
Such as, we're on limited time, and we cannot do everything. But if we stay purposeful, we can do everything we care enough to pursue.

🤔Lucio's Take: Turn this empowering mentality into a display of value

Lucio:
Whenever someone asks, 'how come I don't X or Y', I usually reply that 'I would love to do it… If we lived 10.000 years'.
But since we don't, we must prioritize what truly matters to us. 'Life is short, but if we live it well, we can make it a good one', I usually add.

It works perfectly on dates as well. Not only does it display value, but it's also a seductive and 'lover frame' of Dionysian abandon.

2. Prioritize Ruthlessly: Say No to Everything

Say 'no' to everything and everyone that doesn't:

1. Move you towards your goal
2. Repay you of your time investment with practical or emotional returns

If you need help saying no, read:

- How to say no

> The Assertive Strategist's Guide to Saying "No" (Without Guilt or Losing Social Capital)

3. Use Mortality to Overcome Fear Of Judgement

Death is a powerful antidote to fear.

Whenever you feel fear in the presence of social judgment and criticism, think again of death.
Think of future you on his deathbed.

Will you feel any better that you didn't do what you wanted to do to avoid judgment?
Or do you think you'll be proud you took your chances?

It's a rhetorical question, of course, you know the answer already…

4. Use 'Afterlife You' to Propel You Into Action

Ali suggests looking at your present moment as if you were reliving your life after death.
It's not the present, but a memory.

Are you satisfied with that memory if you don't do what you want to do, if you acquiesce, or if you don't take a chance, or enjoy that moment?
No?
Then, change it right now.

Because you won't be able to when you're re-living your life from the afterlife.

5. Use The Collective of Humanity As Reminder

Exploring stoic philosophy, Ryan Holiday suggests thinking that someone before you has been in your exact same position, having no idea you'd even exist.

But you're making too much of a big deal about it because you personalize too much.
Someone else in the future will be in your same position, still balking and losing chances.

They'll be making a big fuck*ng deal out of saying hi to some random girl, going out solo to a club of drunks, or speaking up at a meeting nobody really gives a fu*k about.

What would you say to that guy? Probably to just go for it.

Then… Just go for it.

6. Meditate On Mortality for the Ultimate Source of Strength

They say that people who faced death acquire a certain "edge" in life.

That "edge" is the calmness and coolness of those who take any extra time on earth as a blessing.

You don't need to risk your life to achieve that same level of coolness and calm.
By reflecting, meditating, and appreciating your own mortality, you will acquire that same "edge".

7. Radical Acceptance of Life's Fleetingness

Men who haven't accepted their mortality are mentally defensive, looking for comfortable escapes or scapegoats.

Take the COVID pandemic, for example.
Viewed through a mortality-acceptance lens, much of the scapegoating during COVID looks less like rational anlysis effective decision-making, and more like an inability to tolerate the idea that humans are fragile and death is uncontrollable.
Scapegoats were Bill Gates, Illuminati conspiracies, population control, Chinese warplans, etc.

Conspiracies and scapegoats may have served as comfortable respites from the reality that we can die at any time, from a random virus that wasn't even on the horizon.
Added insult to injury, a virus you can't even see.

Men struggled to accept their inherent mortality as human beings.
But it's not mortality the weakness, failure to accept mortality is the only true weakness.

Those who are at peace with their mortality don't need scapegoats.

It's men who accepted mortality who lived boldly, built civilizations, and moved humanity forward

The 'Immortal Mortal' Mindset™

Accepting mortality leads to a paradox: the more we accept it, the more we can make a long-lasting impact.

I like the mindset that the best time of our lives, the best experiences, and the moments of peak human connections, are forever.

Think about it.

No matter how short our existence or how small we are in this universe, nothing can change the fact that at one time, in a certain place, you were great.

That's the etched in the universe mentality, 'saved' in a snapshot of time and place.

Now it's up to you to fill your life with memorable, immortal moments.

Pursue POWER, Not Status: Big Fish in Litte Pond Syndrome

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Social status delivers real advantages.
It brings influence, preferential treatment, access to resources, and psychological rewards such as confidence and validation.

However, status also has structural limitations that are rarely examined.

In particular, status is often local, context-dependent, and non-portable. When individuals invest heavily in a form of status that only exists within a narrow reference group, they may experience short-term gains but long-term strategic weakness.

This article analyzes the limitations of status, and how to smart men can get all the benefits of status, without the downsides.

TPM Concept — Small Pond Syndrome™
While the expression "big fish in a small pond" is colloquial, Small Pond Syndrome™ is a power-dynamics framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano for The Power Moves.
It describes how locally bounded social status can create psychological dependency, effort misallocation, and set the stage for self-esteem and psychological collapse once the reference group disappears.

The Small Pond Syndrome

Small Pond Syndrome is a form of psychological attachment and dependence on a non-transferable localized status. We can define it as:

> The opportunity loss, strategic misallocation, and psychological disempowerment of over-expending behavioral and emotional efforts to defend and enhance one's social status within a specific, circumscribed group ('social pond'), rather than developing Universal Power—the kind of high-value traits and assets that are portable to any environment.

The "(social) pond" refers to specific social groups you belong to, including workplaces, classes, your group of friends, or a sports team.

Why Power Beats Status

But, while power frees you, status comes with (social) chains and is group-dependent (non-portable). Academic research suggests this much:

> since status relies on others, concerns about maintaining one's status will orient status-holders outward (…) monitoring where they stand
> As such, high-status parties (…) strive to fulfill others' expectations (Blader and Chen 2012; Ridgeway 1978, 1982)
> (…)
> This description of the effects of status stands in stark contrast to the effects of power, which liberates people from social and normative pressures (Galinsky et al. 2008; Guinote 2007; Keltner et al. 2003).

From adaptive past to maladaptive modernity

For most of human history, focusing on status made sense.

Our ancestors lived in tribes of 50-150. Status in that small social pond was everything, and there was no "outside" the pond.

We're still using our stone age brain developed to chase and focus on status, but we're living in a blue ocean world where social status is transient. Sticking with our old brain modus operandi leads us to over-value the opinion of 15 people in an office, even though we'll be out of there in a few years.

In this new world, smart men are often better off transcending small-pond status.
And they can have their cake and eat it too: status in all social circles they join, without depending on it.

Small Pond Psychology

As social animals, humans naturally form social status hierarchies, and most men are hardwired to seek status.

Research also suggests that we are hardwired to feel great with higher status (Leary & Downs, 1995).
And for good reasons: high status feels great because it works great. It affords lower stress, better mood, and better social and romantic outcomes (Wang and Geng; Buss, 2016).

From this point of view, it's almost expected that many become hooked on the good feelings of social status.
This effect may be even stronger in big-fish in small-pond cases (Zell & Lesick, 2020).

Drivers of Status Addiction & Risks

In principle:

⚖ The odds of status dependency increase as status and benefits increase, and portability decreases

And the risks of negative effects increase with:

1. Validation: Use social ponds as major ego validation
2. Ego projection: Tie their identities to their small pond status
3. High effort: Spend time and effort in their social ponds
4. Dependence through specialization, growing skills that only work inside the small pond

Examples of Small Pond Status Addictiveness

Popular media offers many realistic examples of how addictive small pond status can become.

Take for example Henry from The Goodfellas parading his small pond status:

> Him: (shows off all his pond power) <— Attraction spike through status display
> Her: (impressed, already falling in love) What do you do? (caresses his hand)

Or look at John Travolta in Saturday Night Fever, the king of the small pond club:

> Him: (walks in like he owns it)
> Her: (girl kisses him) Oh my God, I kissed him! <— Pond ladies prefer mating with the alpha-of-the-pond, making localized status extremely attractive for men (Buss, 2019)

These examples show how powerful localized status can be: high in both practical benefits and psychic rewards,
It's hard for most guys who'd be perfect nobodies outside of their small pond not to become addicted to that type of power.
But they also show the risks: both men will go from heroes to zeros.

Shortcomings Of Social Status

1. Small-ish
2. Time-limited (college, company, etc.)
3. Lower-value (not many high-quality men, few mating options, etc.)

However, because seeking status is ingrained in our brains, we apply the same intensity to seeking status in any group.

So seeking status in groups that do little to make you better off is not an exception.
It's the norm.

People who seek status in the small pond do so as if that were the most important social setting in the world.

And they fail to realize a few intrinsic shortcomings of the small pond social environment:

1. Small Pond Status Is Group-Limited

Social status is almost always limited in scope to a specific group of people who belong to it, or are at least aware of the group.

Stay in the pond… You're not adapted to thrive outside of it
This means that, no matter how big a fish you've become in the small pond, you're still nobody outside of it.

A man could be the life of the party when everyone's drunk, he buys rounds, and everyone loves him.
But the day after he's just another random guy, plus a headache and minus a few hundred bills.

2. Small Ponds Are Time-Limited

Most groups are time-limited, and small spond status comes with the group's expiration date.

Many men don't think about it when they first start because they focus on gaining status.
But then high school or university ends, and they feel lost.

3. The Status Game Constrains You: Freedom Loss

Most social groups pose some unwritten limitations on their members.
Even the unwritten rules that afford status can turn constrictive because you must obey them to maintain that status.

Plus, some groups entail nastier social climbing, office politics, and various power moves.

4. Group Dependence

The benefits you derive from your status go up and down depending in good part on the group itself, rather than you.

The company's rising star is dependent on his company's results for a good salary.
Or take Henry Hill from our example before: his mafia-related status was also tied to the mafia's fate.

Neediness & Fear of Ostracization

Group dependence also means you need to maintain group acceptance, which often leads to approval-seeking neediness.

This issue compounds for men who never learned the skill to acquire status anywhere.
These men grow even more needy of the group.

Followers' Dependence: The Leadership Dependence Paradox™

Ironically, the higher up you go, the needier you become.
This leads to the leadership dependence paradox™. The group leader depends on his group more than the group depends on him because the leader has more to lose.

The Pond Dries & The Fish Dies

When the small group disappears, many former high-status members suffer.

They suddenly lose their validation and their benefits.
And the crisis is even larger if they tied their ego to being popular, 'important', or 'members of X group' (read on how to develop antifragile identities).

The Big Fish, Small Pond Cycle

Here are the stages:

1. Outsider Stage, when you're not yet in and don't feel part of it. You look at it from the outside, trying to understand it. You may even feel superior to the gossip

2. Incremental Social Integration Stage, when you familiarize with people, the culture, and start gaining status and social benefits. You may even start playing the politics that you felt so superior to
3. Investment, Identity, Neediness Stage, when the group and the status acquire significance for your life and identity, and group dynamics also heavily influence your mood
   - Neediness: the more status you acquire, the needier you become, and the more time and effort you spend in the group
4. Disappointment or Depression Stage, when either the social pond reveals itself to be nothing special, or when it disappears and leaves the former big fish to dry

Since the depression stage is the riskiest, let's dig deeper on that:

Post-Pond Depressions

For men who haven't yet experienced this phase, popular media offers several good case studies.

For example, Bruce Springsteen's "Glory Days" song captures the post-pond depression.
It's about a former 'jock' and an attractive woman.
Their peak life experience was tied to their high-school status, and they spend the rest of their lives reminiscing about the 'good old glory days'.

Or you can compare Harry Hill's life after he quit the mob.
He started saying he was 'somebody in a world of nobody', and how:

> Henry: Now it's all over. That's the hardest part (…) I'm an average nobody.

The story of Brooks from "The Shawshank Redemption" is an even sadder, more tragic version of the Small Pond Syndrome.
Brooks was somebody in prison. Outside of the prison pond, he was a nobody. He couldn't take it, and he took the gravest decision.

Unfortunately, it's not fiction.
Storr in The Status Game describes the same dynamic as Ben Gunn:

> On some unconscious level it was deeply disturbing being released. I was sitting on the floor for two weeks rocking back and forth. I could see where I was in prison. I knew who I was and what I wanted to be. Now I'm completely lost. I'm imploding.

⍰♂Lucio's Take: When I went from high status to struggling in a dried pond

Lucio:
The Erasmus student exchange program was a continuous party in the best possible conditions: thousands of students, free money from the program, easy classes, and one common mission for all: having the time of your life.

I was well-known; friends looked for me and cheered and hugged me when I walked in. It felt great. I'd feel like Harry in the video example.

But Erasmus ended as suddenly as it started.
I stayed longer in the city when everyone else had gone. The same exact city, but without my reference group and without my status.
It felt lonely, and the contrast from popular to nobody was depressing.

I probably got into a relationship with a fellow Erasmus girl in an unconscious effort to hold onto those glory days.

How to Become Universally Big Fish

Avoiding the small pond syndrome is easier than it seems.

Here are the steps:

1. Build Antifragile Ego

Replace fragile and small-pond dependent identities such as 'popular' or 'member of X' with antifragile identities.

2. Join Many Different Groups

> Put your eggs in more baskets, and you never depend on a single basket.

Be part of several different groups, and learn how to join new groups at will.

Travel & Soar Higher

> "Travel broadens the mind because it forces you to abandon your home country's stereotypes and resist adopting those of the destination."
> Claudio Magris

Traveling is also helpful, and it expands your horizon and helps you soar above single-group pettiness. Keep that spirit when you enter new groups, and you become immune to idealizing any specific group.

3. Become A 'Blue Ocean Shark': Learn to Acquire Status Anywhere

While big fish tend to be high value within their social pond, they seldom have the skills to replicate it and gain status wherever they go.

It's this skill-based lack of replicability that makes you needy.
But learn to gain status anywhere, and you become an empowered and free blue-ocean shark.

To help you become that type of globally high-value man, we created Power University.

The Power of the Pussy: Book Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 9 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Power of the Pussy (2014) is a popular dating book for women, sharing dating strategies and techniques to win at dating.
Most of all, it advises women on how to leverage the power of their most valuable asset: the pussy. Kara King, the author, says that once she learns to fully wield the power of the pussy, she can control men, lead the dating dance, and secure the relationship she wants.

Bullet Summary

- Don’t let your emotions dictate your actions
- Your pussy is a source of power: set a high price and don’t give it away
- Date a lot to find a great man. Then you’ll be free to give him your all

Summary

Kara King says that some women, no matter their looks, can get good men and can get those men to treat them well… If they learn to leverage the Power of The Pussy.

1. The Power of Controlling Emotions

Kara proposes you forget about feelings in the beginning: emotions are misleading.

The author has a lot of tips on how to control emotions, and I invite you to get the book for more.

My Note: Using selective vulnerability to make him want to invest
But, on the other hand, I must say that vulnerability and being open about wanting and needing a man can be super powerful techniques to make him want to invest and protect.

And read the full description here:

- How to make men want to invest and protect using selective submissiveness

2. The Power of the Pussy

Kara suggests that you write down all that you want from a man.

The list of what you want is your asking and your pussy will get it for you.

Men will either disappear because they can't afford it, or they'll give you your asking price.

> Put your pussy on a pedestal

Wait For Sex

Kara recommends you let him wait for sex.

Similarly, Lambert and Harvey, recommend you get the relationship before you consume it.
And to know that he is ready for sex, and ask him to do something for you to prove he's willing to support you.

Get the book for more information.

Also, read:

- Should you let him wait for sex?
- This is how you delay sex

> How To Turn Down Sex & Get A Relationship

Embracing Your Femininity

Kara shares tips on how to embrace your femininity.

She also tackles the basics which most other books don't go into (too bad).

The author recommends you shave your pussy and your ahole and pluck hair on your nipples if any (I can vouch for all).

> How to Be Feminine: Step-by-Step Guide (Videos & Pics)

3. The Power of Confidence

Kara King says that the value you place on yourself is a direct reflection of the value of the men you will get.

And I couldn't agree more (also read the science behind it).
To get high self-esteem, check the antifragile ego or "Ultimate Power".

Oh, and just one last note: Kara King says that confidence doesn't mean conceit!

> Love and value yourself, and men will do too

4. The Power of Taking Out The Trash

Many women have a "fixing men tendency", says the author.

But there's no point in trying to fix some of them, she says.
And if he cheats, he must go.

Kara King goes on to describe the behavior that should tell you he must go.
Also, check out "breakup diagnostics" if you're unsure what to do.

> Should I Break Up? Step-by-Step Guide to Overcome Ambivalence

5. Keep Yourself Busy

Kara King here says you should be busy working on your career, on yourself, and on your future.

She says men want women with their own life who wouldn't even want a man. That's part of the challenge for them.

Time for a change of perspectives:

> Dick = Distraction

6. Adopt Realistic Standards

Kara King talks about some women's crazy and unrealistic standards that are damaging them.

My Note:

I fully agree.
The paradox of choice often gets women to wait and bide their time for a dream that doesn't exist. Also, check women's 8 biggest mistakes and how to get high quality men.

> 7 Biggest Dating Mistakes Women Do (Before Sex)

Don't Approach!

Contrary to some other guy writers (Hussey, Lambert, Behrndt) Kara advises you not to approach because it turns men off.

I agree with the author here. Or at least, you should know how to approach sensibly.
For example, avoid cold-approaching with direct openers, and opt instead for social circles, warm approaches, and third-party introductions.

7. The Power of the Uterus

Power comes with responsibilities.

And that's all the more true for the power of giving life.

This chapter is really deep, and its message should be spread as widely as possible.

CONS

- Fails the law of optimum balance

Power and female independence are important in dating.
And so is to demand for investment from men.

Generally speaking, most men don't want pushovers and doormats.

However, as for most things, it's about when to be more demanding and when to be more accommodating and feminine.
it's not an "all or nothing" because extremes are often ineffective -and unattractive-.

Also, read the law of balance and, more befitting, the law of balance in dating:

> Why Balance Is Most Seductive

- A Bit Confrontational

A few passages from The Power of the Pussy made me feel as if it was "men VS women" (i.e., "men prey on emotions, you prey on need his need for sex").

I find that bitter approaches drive away the highest-quality men who have more options.
These guys know that collaboration trumps antagonism, and they can find a collaborative woman. So prefer to settle down with collaborative partners who don't antagonize and don't manipulate men.
All high-quality men that I have met prefer a more mutually supportive approach.
So for the sake of all, drop these nasty games, ladies:

> 10 Nasty Games Women Play (Women, Stop These!)

- Using Sex as Leverage

I personally disagree with the suggestion of using sex as leverage.

He might start associating sex with compromise and negotiation, and you risk looking like a blatant manipulator, which is a bad strategy for relationships -especially with high-quality men-.

> Manipulation: Techniques, Strategies, & Ethics

PROS

- Tackles the basics of self-care

The Power of The Pussy is one of the few women's dating books that tackles the basics.
And while every woman should know that stuff, there are many who don't (also see here two examples of terrible women's fashion).

- Can be an empowering read for some women

For women who are low in confidence and feel at the mercy of men in dating, The Power of The Pussy can be a great injection of confidence.

Review

I enjoyed reading The Power of the Pussy.

Kara writes well and the book is both fun, easy to read, and with lots of good advice.
The Power of the Pussy is one of the most practically-oriented dating books for women I've read, and that's a great compliment.

There are some parts I disagree with. Namely, the popular advice women should let men invest as much as possible, which is true in some cases, but not true in many others (see: why you shouldn't make him chase)

That being said, I loved the self-respect bits and the mindsets parts.
The Power of The Pussy will most likely help you both in believing more in yourself and in getting into a relationship as well.

Bullet Summary

- There's often more chance involved in big successes than people think
- We see links, trends, and causality where it's often just randomness
- Looking at what successful people do can be misleading in achieving success

Summary

About The Author:
Nassim Nicholas Taleb is a former trader, philosopher, statistician, and risk analyst.
He is also one of my favorite authors, penning masterpieces such as "The Black Swan", "Antifragile" and "Skin in The Game".

Introduction

Taleb first addresses some criticism.

He says his skepticism is not nihilism: of course, chance favors the prepared, the gritty, and the perseverant.

Skills count, he says, but skills count much less in highly random environments (such as trading and investment).

Nassim Taleb says he spent his life in a fierce fight between his brain -not fooled by randomness- and his emotions -completely fooled by randomness-.

And the success he's had is because of going around his emotions instead of rationalizing them.

Part I: Solons Warning

Part of I of Fooled by Randomness discusses the role that luck plays in life.

Chapter 1: If You're So Rich, Why Aren't You So Smart?

Nassim Taleb says that it's silly to judge people's skills and talent purely on the basis of their success or wealth.

Because there's a good chance it's just chance -or risky behavior that's not likely to last in the long term-.

Taleb lays out the example of the "master of the universe" successful traders who made millions only to later lose many more millions in the subsequent market crash.

Those master of the universe traders didn't make money because they were good, they were just piling up on risk and riding the wave.

But lucky fools never realize they are lucky fools and prefer fooling themselves into the idea they're skilled.
So when the wave turned, they drowned in it.

Nassim Taleb uses Nero Tulip, a friend of his, as an example of a more rational investor (I looked him up BTW, some say it's Taleb himself).

Nero Tulip always invested safely and ended his career early and wealthy. Not super wealthy, though, because super wealthy entails big risks and it's a huge game of chance.

Risk-conscious hard work and discipline lead to high reliability to a comfortable life, he says. Beyond that, it's high randomness.

Basically: mild success is skills while wild success is variance and randomness.

Chapter 2: A Bizarre Accounting Method

When assessing a successful individual one should also consider the possibilities of failure that he faced.

He uses Russian Roulette as an extreme example.

If you were to bet 10 million on Russian Roulette, in 5 of the 6 alternative outcomes, you'd be a millionaire.

Now, Russian Roulette is an extreme example, but in many endeavors, people carry on without realizing that much of their success is highly dependent on chance.
And the more they win, the more they feel safer because they attribute success to skills.

Finance and trading, Nassim Taleb implies, is such a field with high randomness.
Other more stable professions -dentistry, he mentions-, rely less on randomness and more on skills and hard work.

Abstraction Fallacy: Picking The Wrong Death Insurance

If you ask people if they'd like to insure against death or against death by a terrorist attack before a flight, they'd be much more likely to take the latter.

Which makes no sense, because "death" includes a terrorist attack. It turns out, what grabs people's attention is always something vivid.

Risk is Irrational Because It's Emotional

Taleb says that we don't deal with risk detection and risk avoidance rationally because the emotional part of the brain deals with risk.

Our rational risk thinking has little to do with actual risk avoidance.

What it does instead is rationalize our actions by assigning some logic to them after we've already taken a decision.

Chapter 3: A Mathematical Meditation on History

Nassim Taleb introduces the Montecarlo Simulators.

Montecarlo simulators are computer algorithms that produce a (high) number of results for a given choice.
He says the results of a Montecarlo Simulator are a much better test against randomness than looking at the past.

Simply looking at the past indeed present survivorship bias.

Importantly, Nassim Taleb says here that you don't look at mistakes after the fact. You only look at decisions in light of the information you had up until that point.

That's why I write you should base your self-esteem not based on results but on processes.
And that's what Ray Dalio refers to when he says you should "look at the swing more than at the hit".

Chapter 4: Randomness, and the Scientific Intellectual

Taleb brandishes some poetry to make the case that we don't need to apply scientific rigor in all things of life.

We don't really need to be realistic and rational when it comes to religion, feelings, and arts, for example, which is a mistake that many make.

We need to be more rational when it comes to fields where rationality is more important though, which is something that few really do systematically.

On his first salvo against evolutionary psychology Taleb says that The Selfish Gene sounds mathematical with its many equations, but it's actually just artistic prose :).

Chapter 5: Survival of the Least Fit

Nassim Taleb says some believe that plants and animals reproduce on a highway to perfection.

And the same thought has been applied to the economy as a whole, with the best companies surviving.

He says instead that there's a lot of randomness in evolution. And sometimes it goes off tangents on dead-end branches. And some other times it can even regress.

Negative mutations for example survive, not longer than for a few generations, in spite of being worse.
Taleb says that on average animals will be fit, but not all of them, and not every single time.

Basically, he says, we don't live in a world where things move continuously towards improvement.

Chapter 6: Skewness and Asymmetry

Taleb talks about median estimates and how they often lead us astray.

For example, if a patient with a certain illness lives on average for 8 months tells us little.
Why?
Because there might be a big divide between those that live past a certain month mark VS those who die very quickly.

Asymmetry is countered with the expected value.

You should multiply the expected value of an event by its likelihood and then add up the total of the expected value results.

Chapter 7: The Problem of Induction

Induction means that you can never be sure about your final results, no matter how many observations you make.

For example, no matter if you see ten white swans or a thousand white swans, you cannot mathematically rule out the existence of a black swan.
By seeing a single black instead, you can be certain black swans exist.

Similarly, he says George Soros makes several induction mistakes in his book.
Soros infers that his trading system worked because his portfolio was up.
But that his portfolio is up, says Taleb, is no proof of anything.

Part II: Monkeys on Typewriters

Taleb introduces the survivorship bias, a bias that he says is chronic in our society.

Survivorship bias is the failure to account for those who didn't survive (maybe while doing the exact same thing the successful ones did).

Ironically, the most successful survivor is also the most visible one, skewing our survivorship bias even further.
And that's why, as mentioned earlier, it's important to always adjust success and results to the odds of failure.

Chapter 8: Too Many Millionaires Next Door

This chapter starts lighter, with Taleb making fun of The Millionaire Next Door,

The Millionaire Next Door peddles the idea one should save hard to become a millionaire, but Taleb says he doesn't see the point in getting rich if you will live like a monk (same concept MJ De Marco promotes).

Then we go back to risk, chances, and randomness.

Taleb lashes out at the even more foolish The Millionaire Mind which says that "a taste for risk" is what makes millionaires.
Taleb says that "a taste for risk-taking" is necessary for large successes, but also a necessary trait for… Large failures.

An analysis of bankruptcies would also find a predilection for risk-taking, says Taleb.

Chapter 9: It's Easier To Fry an Egg Than to Buy and Sell

Taleb explains the property of volatility and randomness.

He says that successful performers will emerge even among a group of very poor performers -provided that there's enough of them-.

This is simply the effect of volatility and random distributions, but an external observer will easily misconstrue the results for skills.

Consequently, Taleb says, success presents a higher correlation with the number of players than with their skills.

He doesn't say Warren Buffett is not skilled, but that a large population of investors will necessarily produce someone with Buffett's results… Just by luck (!).

Regression to the mean: there is no hot hand

Nassim Taleb introduces the regression to the mean phenomenon introducing the hot hand fallacy.

The hot hand fallacy is the belief that people who have been successful in the past are more likely to be successful in the future.

It's simply a question of large numbers, he says: with many players, it's almost guaranteed that someone will embark on a long streak of good shots. But the tendency is to eventually regress to their long-term mean.

He says not all deviations are a question of chance, but a disproportionate amount are.

Markets Don't Always Go Up

He says that a common misconception is that stock markets, over a long period of time, will always provide great returns.

But if rational investors had bought stocks in 1900 in Argentina, Russia, USA, and UK, he would have lost it all in Russia.

Chapter 10: Losers Take All – The Nonlinearities of Life

Nonlinear means that a small change will cause a disproportionate effect on the results.

The idiom "the straw that broke the camel's back" is an example of a nonlinear result, and that happens in many realms of life.
Sometimes one new customer, one order, or that last push you make can bring a windfall.

Taleb mentions The Tipping Point, a book by Malcolm Gladwell that started a trend of people looking for virality and networking effects.

But he says that viral effects are too difficult to predict to take those studies seriously.
My Note: I couldn't agree more.

He says that it's the beginning of a path that often makes a big difference.

Our path is not independent of previous steps, and early success often begets future success (for a number of different reasons).

So a random lucky chance, in the beginning, will sometimes take people on a very successful path.
And external observers will misinterpret the path as wholly due to skills.

Chapter 11: Randomness and Our Mind: We Are Probably Blind

Taleb says we are blind to probability.

We tend to see facts and chances as either black or white, good or bad, happening or not happening.

He mentions Thinking Fast and Slow and discusses a few more biases. I invite you to check Thinking Fast and Slow because it's more in-depth.

We See Causality Where There Is Only Randomness

Taleb says people tend to see causality where there's only randomness.

For example, when a currency is down commentators give a reason for why that happened.
But, he says, it's very difficult to isolate single causes and that might not even make sense.
Because it's often just noise.

Small moves are noise, larger ones tend to be more significant, he says, in a nonlinear fashion.

Part III: Wax in My Ears

Chapter 12: Gambler's Ticks and Pigeons in a Box

Taleb says many people often pick up habits and ticks based on what they did when they have previously been successful.

He does it too, and so do many animals by the way.

It's not always easy overcoming our own ticks, so we should work around them.
For example, avoid distractions and noise if you know you tend to overreact to them.

Chapter 13: Probability and Skepticism

Taleb says that science is great, but scientists are not.

Why?

Because scientists tend to "marry their own positions".
And he is right if you see how some scientists answered to the replication crisis like rabid dogs whose bone has been taken away.

He says most scientists cling to their positions and make excuses instead of doing the courageous thing: looking for the truth and taking ownership.

That's why, he says, science often moves forward funeral after funeral.
Once the old guard dies, the new guys are more ready to accept and challenge old beliefs.

Chapter 14: Bacchus Abandons Anthony

The link between the skills of a CEO and the results of the company is very weak (similar concept from Sinek's Leaders Eat Last).

And he delves into satisfiers and optimizers.
Optimizers spend their lives looking for what to improve and they change residence to save a couple of points of income tax.
What's the point, he quips, "I thought wealth was supposed to buy peace of mind".

My Note:
I was surprised Taleb didn't quote it, but this is very similar to satisfiers and maximizers in The Paradox of Choice, another great book.

Real-Life Applications

Success does not equal skills
Don't think people are necessarily amazing because of some success they obtained. They might have achieved success because of pure randomness.

Failure does not equal bad decisions
You should only judge your decisions based on the information you had when you took them, and not on the results.

Always consider the alternatives
Similar to the above, don't think that because you won -or lost- you did well -or badly-. Consider the odds with which you played.

Inductive Reasoning is not absolute
Just because you saw someone succeed a number of times it doesn't mean it will always succeed.

Markets don't always go up
Similar to the above, don't buy into the narrative that if you invest today you will certainly be rich tomorrow. I would personally recommend you invest in yourself more than in the markets.

Ignore the noise, focus on the signal
Many things in your life -like the news for example- are just noise. Focus on what really matters to you instead and on your goals

CONS

- No Structure

I wish Nassim Taleb had been more structured with his thoughts and core messages. He goes a bit off tangents sometimes making the book more like a personal diary than a well-designed product to support his core messages.

It's a pity because those core messages are really important and insightful.

- Can Be Complex For Some

Fooled by Randomness can be a complex book to digest.

But it didn't necessarily have to be so: simplifying is a choice (and a skill).

Taleb's own dissertations and, ironically, his huge culture, get in the way of a simple message.
Literary and historical references that people will most likely miss out on are also likely to arise more confusion.

This doesn't have to be a negative though, I for one love those bigger picture (or fun) references and tangents.

Review

Fooled by Randomness is a must-read to understand how probability applies to everyday human issues, and it's one of the best books I've read on developing sound critical thinking.

Some many not like Taleb's style, but it cannot detract from the value of his work.
I personally love Taleb's irreverent and biting style.

He is not afraid of telling it how it is, even when he touches big names (Bill Gates, Soros, and Warren Buffett just to name a few).

I used to reflect on the underestimated role of randomness, and I'm glad for Taleb's work, which I can now refer to (edit: and I've referenced it countless times to critique many popular books).

The only thing stopping this book from getting a full 10/10 is that Taleb's take may lead some to underestimate evolutionary psychology, which we believe is one of the disciplines and forces that best explain human nature.

Summary

The authors are Greg Behrendt and Liz Tuccillo, both of whom have been on the consulting team for Sex & The City, a show I reference quite a bit on this website.

Greg says that because he's a guy, he knows how a guy thinks –which is irrational to say as it's an inductive fallacy: one instance does not make the rule, but we will let it slip :)-.

Greg says that men will never tell you to your face they're not into you. That's why sometimes it can be difficult. But they will let you know about their actions.

How "He's Not That Into You" Started

Liz recounts the first time Greg dropped the words "he's not that into you" it was a collective epiphany for the women in the room.
It was painful to hear, but also liberating at the same time.

No more mixed signals, no more interactions to examine… His actions will make it crystal clear whether he's interested or not.

That moment then made it into Sex and The City in this scene right here:

So let's see what are these clear signals:

1. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Not Asking You Out

> Men ask women out no matter what

Greg says women make a lot of exceptions to this rule in their minds, but they're all made-up fantasies. If a man likes you, he will ask you out, no matter if:

- You're friends (guys don't mind mixing sex with friendship)
- He might be intimidated
- You're his superior
- He gave you his number (he puts the onus on you and set himself up as the decider)

Greg admits he might need some encouragement if you're of higher status than he is, but he will.

My Note:
I don't fully agree here, I know for a fact many men will not pull the trigger on women at work if they are above his pay grade.
However, I fully agree with what he says later: should you want to be with a man who's afraid of asking you out?

You Can't Make The Move

Contrary to Hussey and Lambert, Greg says you should not make the first step.

He says the majority of guys don't like it because men like the uncertainty of results and the thrill of the chase.
OK, he admits, a few guys might like it, but those are the lazy ones.

And if you need to be the pursuer, nine times out of ten, he's just not that into you.

2. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Not Calling You

> Men know how to dial a number

And Greg says it doesn't matter if he:

- Is very important (are you saying you're unimportant?)
- Travels a lot
- Is very busy (busy is another word for asshole)

Basically: if he's not calling you, you are not on his mind.

And the author says it's even more important when he actually creates the expectation that he will call, but he doesn't.
That seems like a mixed message, but don't get sidetracked: he chose not to. And if he slips on these small things, he will for the bigger things, too.

I especially agree with Greg when he says that "very important" is not only silly but also degrading for the woman as that also says you're not that important.

3. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Not Dating You

> "Hanging out" is not dating

If a guy says he doesn't want to be in a serious relationship, he either really means it or he's actually saying he's not sure you're the right one for a relationship.

Either way, you should not waste time on this guy and go for that guy who's aching to be in a relationship with you, says Greg.

4. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Not Having Sex with You

> Men who like they always want to get it on with you

And if they don't, they either are not into you or might have other issues.

The Madonna-whore complex, for example:

5. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Having Sex with Someone Else

> There are no excuses for cheating

Greg says the cheating happened with the full knowledge that it could destroy your relationship.

He says a guy who hides his escapades is not only not that into you, but also showing he doesn't even really like you much.

The author also says you shouldn't think that a man caught with his pants down will improve.
Cheating is most difficult the first time out, but it gets "easier" for him after that.

My Note:
while I think it's weak for men to get into relationships while they're thinking of potentially cheating, I wouldn't be so black and white.
Sex at Dawn explains we're probably not as monogamous as we think.
And The Moral Animal shows men (and women too, in part) have an innate tendency to look at sexual prospects.
Also, for a woman sexual cheating is less damaging than emotional one.

6 . He's Just Not That Into You If He Only Wants to See You When He's Drunk

> It only counts if he's sober

Greg says drunk booty calls mean nothing and whatever he says while drunk means nothing too.

A solid relationship is not fueled by alcohol or drugs.
The two of you should spend -and want to spend- sober time together.

7. He's Just Not That Into You If He Doesn't Want to Marry You

> Love cures all commitment fears

All these are excuses:

- I'm not ready
- I don't believe in marriage
- I feel rushed

Greg knows this one, in this day and age, will be controversial.

He says that while some men might have some real reserves, he still believes that if he really loves you he will want to make you happy.

And you should really make sure if he doesn't want to get married or if he doesn't want to get married to you. And you should take stock of what else you have different opinions on. Because if he feels rushed but you're comfortable, you should wonder why you're waiting.

I also fully agree with the author when he says that you, as a woman, should not feel ashamed or "unliberated" for wanting a marriage.

My Note:
I agree feminism is taking a toll on many women, sometimes putting more pressure instead of freeing them.

8. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Breaking Up with You

> And don't take him back

Greg says that we all want to be loved… Especially by that someone who just broke up with us.

But you should only consider getting back with him if he's showing strong and unequivocal signs -like showing up to your door with a truck to move your stuff back in.

In any other case, cut him off and don't contact him.

And, he righteously says, be especially suspicious of men who want you back after you start dating someone else.

9. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Disappeared on You

> He didn't have the guts to tell you, but he's not into you

There's no worse feeling that not having an answer because it leaves you wondering and it feels like there's no closure.

Your reaction will be to chase and ask why.

But no answer is your answer, and the reason why he disappeared is that he didn't have the courage to tell you in your face that he's not that into you.

Psychologically, the author says, is that it's particularly painful because it possibly means the person you loved had been emotionally distant for a long time before he disappeared.

Liz says that if it makes you feel better though, it's OK to reach out to him and ask for an explanation.

> No answer is your answer -He's just not that into you

10. He's Just Not That Into You If He's Married

> Or any other crazy "unavailable" situations

You're a side chick.

Some men will use their wife as an excuse to keep on the sex level while they complain to you about her.
But don't buy without full action to back it up.
Is he filing divorce papers? Unless he's all yours, he's all hers.

> If someone is not free to love, he cannot love

11. He's Just Not That Into You If He's a Jerk

> Or selfish, bully, abusive…

Greg says women will stick with him saying he has many other qualities.

Of course he has, that's why you loved him. But the question you need to ask yourself is one and one only: is he making you happy?

The author says that abusive isn't simply beating, but it includes:

- Yelling
- Humiliating
- Making someone feel unattractive

Then Greg Behrendt says what I believe is a big truth: there aren't that many good men around.
And there are more great women than great men.

Don't Listen to These Stories

Greg says that for all of these rules, there will be exceptions.

And there are stories of friends of friends who went ahead and it finally worked out.
But he says you shouldn't listen to them.
Because they are the exceptions, not the rule.

Always go for the rule, because chances are that you are exceptional, but not the exception.

That's very good wisdom.

He's Just Not That Into You Video

This is the video version in Sex And the City of the principle "he's just not that into you":

Real-Life Applications

Look At The Big Picture
The book reminds us that meaningful actions are what really matters. Instead of wondering what a text "means", look at the most obvious signs of love and appreciation: they're easy to spot.

Is He Making You Happy?
Finally, answering the question if he's making you happy or not is as simple as it is enlightening. If it's not obvious, change it to: "in the last week, have I been happier or sadder because of him?". Does it for 3 weeks before deciding whether or not it's time for a change.

CONS

A Bit Dogmatic
Greg tends to be very dogmatic, very black and white. It's entertaining to read and he often nails it, but several situations can be more grey.

Review

"He's Just Not That Into You" is the perfect read for women who go to an extreme of overthinking things, but it's important not to go too far in the other extreme.

Remember that men also have their own dating strategies, games, and tactics, and while experienced and power-aware women may not need to overthink it, more beginner dates may need to analyze things a bit more thoroughly to best navigate dating.

That said, the book generally provides realistic and effective advice.

Bullet Summary

- Self-respect and a set of guidelines will help you even when you don't have experience
- Big initial demands don't make you a prize, they make you pretentious
- Use early investment and vulnerability as a test: if he grows with you, he's a keeper

Full Summary

About The Author: Bruce Bryan is a pen name, so I don't know much about the author except that he has written a few books on dating.

However, I can say that Bruce Bryan understands how quality men think. He presents, in my opinion, one of the most insightful dating for women on the market.

Introduction

Bruce Bryans says a woman needs a few things:

- Self-respect
- A set of guidelines for rational decisions
- Strong boundaries

Strong personal boundaries are not romance or man-centered but principle-centered (Ray Dalio recommends the same concept for success in life).

The author says women can get confused about whether they should "play games" or not.
And he spells it clear for the reader: while withdrawing as a tactic can work, her actions are not based on self-respect.

High-quality men DO NOT pursue women who fake disinterest and play games: they respect women with no tolerance for manipulation and time wasting.

When you value your self-respect more than the feeling of being liked by any given man, you will have no need for games anymore.

Reinforce His Attraction & Train Him to Chase You

Bruce Bryan suggests that you:

Are Not Too Available at the Beginning

Being a challenge will keep his interest, but also serve to separate the lazy men who don't pursue- from the ambitious ones.

And if he doesn't pursue, he's just not that into you.

My Note:
I disagree here, some cool guys will also stop pursuing if you don't give enough.
Lots of losers will keep chasing instead because they have time and don't know any better.

Don't Play Hard to Get but Be Hard to Get

Bruce Bryan underlines that you should not play hard to get, but you should be hard to get.

You should have an exciting and attractive life and be happy and content with your own life.
That's the kind of woman men want to meet.

Keep Your Life and Hobbies

And since you are content with your life, you don't give up your hobbies, family, and dreams the moment you meet a guy (similar suggestion to Why Men Love Bitches).

Prioritize Calls VS texting

Bryan says texting is the players' medium.

If you want a man to take you seriously and if you want to screen out players, you should let him call you.

If he refuses to call it's because he wants to keep it casual and he's not a serious prospect.

My note:
Lambert also recommends you encourage him to call you, and while I would also agree to go for calls when the guy is a good prospect, I disagree it will screen out players.

Don't Flake

Bryan says that when you fail to show up you communicate unreliability. And high-quality men want women they can count on.

Take Responsibility

You know those people who always blame circumstances and it's never their responsibility?

That's typical of low-value women.
Take responsibility and ownership of your life instead, suggests the author.

Restrain Your Affection

Before he has shown his part, show restraint when displaying your feelings for him.

Bruce says that the key to a successful seduction is a mutual level of interest (and you will know based on his enthusiasm for you).

Show Flexibility (and easy-to please)

Bruce says you should be hard to have but easy to please.

He says you show it in those situations where, if you just were a bit more flexible, he would find you more pleasant to be around.
Men know that adaptable women make for better long-term companions.

The only men who will tolerate inflexibility are the pushovers kind of men.

Don't Be Too Assertive

Bruce Bryan doesn't state it this clearly but says that the kind of men you want to end up with will not find overly assertive women to be very attractive.

My Note: I agree wholeheartedly with this.
Also, read:

- Submissive women VS strong women
- How to be more feminine
- Why career women fail at dating (and how to fix it)

Show Vulnerability

The author says that for a long-term solid relationship, you need an intimate and emotional connection.

And to connect, you need to be vulnerable (check Brene Brown for more on vulnerability).

Laugh at yourself, admit your mistakes, and ask forgiveness when you make a mistake.
These are all extremely endearing and will build a strong emotional connection.
And don't worry about sounding weak, a masculine man is attracted to a feminine spirit.

My Note: I agree

Show Your Love When The Time Comes

Bryan says that most men value emotional intimacy.

When he has proven his worth, it's time to start escalating the emotional attachment.

Show major appreciation whenever he does something good for you or for the two of you.
And use your female tenderness to show your love proactively.

If he responds in kind, keep him. Otherwise, next to him.

My Note: 100%. Bryan nails it.
also read:

- How to make him invest with mutual escalation

Don't Confuse Great With Right

Bryan says a man could be great, but he might not be good for you because he won't or can't give you commitment.

Always assess the potential of a man both on quality AND compatibility.

Set High Standards and Enforce Boundaries

Some nice girls will be accommodating hoping he will be the same, says the author.

When he isn't though she turns into a passive-aggressive and emotional manipulator and the relationship becomes a combative one.

He says women should be assertive in asking for what they want and need from the beginning instead.

Give Him The Joy of Conquest

If everything is too easy and obvious, he will feel like he's slowly edging closer to filling the husband's job position.

That's boring for him.

Make him feel like's slowly winning you over with effort instead.

A man's actions tell him what's important to him, and when his action show effort, he will rationalize you must mean a lot to him.

My note: this is true, rationalization is a key function of our brain, check Incognito

Don't Nag For a Change

Bryan says that if you want to change something in a relationship you never nag.

First, you have a conversation, and if nothing changes, then you withdraw. Make him anxious a bit and let him miss you.

Don't Be Exclusive With a Guy Who Isn't Exclusive

If a guy is keeping his options open, you do the same.

And never fall for the old one of "commitment problems". That only means he's waiting for someone else.

Don't Give It Up Too Easily

Bryan says that before sex you have all the power, but after sex, you have very little.

He says when sex happens too easily and too quickly most men are less likely to stick around.

The rule of thumb is that the more significant his investment before sex, the more likely it is you will keep him around for the longer term.

He recommends you watch this video (which I personally didn't find that good TBH):

Increase Your Self Respect

Bryan says that you should never allow a man's mixed signal or aloofness to become the cue for you to chase him.

Because the more you do it, the more ingrained it becomes, and that's how you build (bad) habits.

Conversely, walk away from every bad situation and you will make further investments in your self-respect.

The more you do it, the more your self-confidence will increase

Communicate High-Value and Be the Woman Men Adore

I had no further doubts that Never Chase Men Again was the best women's dating book I had read when I got to this:

Stay Positive as You Keep Searching

The author says that if you allow a bad dating experience or a breakup to infect your mood you risk becoming bitter towards men.

And that's a very unattractive trait for high-quality men.

My note:
that's exactly what I criticize for some books in the same genre such as The Power of the Pussy: they sound too bitter.

Be Graceful In Communication

Bryan says high-quality men want women with high emotional intelligence.

That means they want women who can express themselves respectfully and without emasculating them.

It's important for men because they need respect as much as women need love (also check Men Are From Mars, Women Are From Venus).

Embrace your inner vixen

Bruce says high-value men don't want cute girls, they want mature and confident women.

Act and carry yourself confidently and like you know your own value.

Don't Demand Too Much Too Early

The author nails another big one when he says high-quality men have little tolerance for egocentric women.

Asking him to do X or Y for you will not make you a prize, but a spoiled high-maintenance girl (and a low-quality woman, I'd add).

Bruce says it's fair and good you expect exceptional treatment, but big early requests reek of entitlement.
Smart men will know how to treat you based on what you show and how they like you, you will only turn them off by asking for it.

Humility speaks louder than entitlement and unpretentious goes further than self-important.

Guard Your Reputation

Robert Greene in the 48 Laws of Power says reputation is everything.

Bruce says your reputation in dating is also important.
Make sure you don't build a negative reputation for dating losers.

Don't Move In... If You Wanna Get Married

Bryan says that moving in for men is like doing a car test drive or simply a way to postpone… Indefinitely.

For women instead, it's a step closer to the final commitment.

But when you hit a snag, men will be less likely to want to work it out compared to if they were married.
There's just less pressure, either social or financial.

Be The Mountaintop, Not The Stepping Stone

Bruce has a super interesting view on being with men who "need your help" or "need a woman's touch".

The issue is that often these men will then move on to another woman once they fully bloom or once they don't need your help anymore.

Breakup if No Progression

The author suggests that first of all, you make sure he knows you want a marriage.

Then feel free to apply pressure if you think he won't budge.

If the relationship is still not progressing the way you want, you should break by making sure he knows why.
If he wants you, it's possible he'll come back giving you what you wanted. Only accept him if he shows proof of moving forward.

Date With Purpose

Don't get distracted or sidetracked: know what you want and don't settle for less.

Don't Be One Of The Boys

Bruce Bryans says you shouldn't be like one of his male friends with him. It will kill his attraction.

My note:
true. In 4 ways men touch women wrong I talk about an ex-girlfriend complaining that I was high-fiving her. She said she was a woman, not one of the boys.
My respect (and attraction) for her only grew.

Believe You Deserve His Unconditional Love

The author says most mistakes come from self-sabotage.

When the woman doesn't believe in her own value and doesn't believe she deserves his unconditional love.

Final Thoughts

To avoid time wasters, the author says, you should approach dating with an almost ruthless inclination.

Filter in quickly the good prospects, and cut off the bad ones.

To quickly spot the good ones, show your vulnerabilities, and proactively increase his emotional investment and attachment in you.
If you realize that your steps are not reciprocated, move on.

Finally, focus on becoming a great catch yourself, stay true to your standards and boundaries (remember: the more you respect them, the higher your self-esteem!), and… Enjoy the process.

Real-Life Applications

Don't Move In… If You Want Marriage
I liked the idea you better not move in if you want marriage. Women see it as a step closer, men see it as postponement -and as an easy way out if they don't fully like it-.

Don't Be Overpowering
Let him lead, and tone down your assertiveness if it can get too much

Stay a Woman
Never become one of the boys. You can be his friend alongside his lover. Just not his beer-drinking, football-watching, burping friend.

Don't Get Bitter!!
Watch out for books and gurus telling you "it's time to get some revenge on the boys". That's the perfect mindset NOT to get a high-value man (and a good relationship, of course).

Invest… And Watch
Do open up and escalate investment on both sides. Then watch. Does he reciprocate? That will tell you whether you can keep growing together or if you need to move on.

CONS

Escalate His Emotional Investment?
I would have loved to see some more concrete examples of how she should do this.

Just a few things here in there (like calls screening out players and maybe initial unavailability which is dangerous). But it's still the best book I have read so far on women's dating.

Review

I have been reading many best sellers for women's dating.

And in many of them, I found the same issues of teaching game playing without consideration for the health of the relationship.

I was glad I stumbled upon Bruce Bryans.
He was the first and so far only one who was able to avoid basic mistakes all other authors did and point out a few great truths in dating.

I feel Bruce has a great grasp of the mindset of high-quality men.

Takeaways

- Put yourself in their shoes: appeal to their needs, understand their motives, etc.
- Protect and boost people's ego: help save face, make them feel great, let them think it was their idea, etc.
- To be interesting and make friends, be interested and curious about them

Here's a pictorial summary of all of Carnegie's principles:

Notes

About The Author:
Dale Carnegie was an American writer and author and one of the first "self-help gurus" in history.
How to Win Friends and Influence People is one of the best-selling books ever and the best-selling book in the self-help genre.

He is also the author of "How to Stop Worrying and Start Living".

Part 1 – Fundamental Techniques in Handling People

Principle 1: Don't Criticize, Condemn, or Complain

Criticism is terrible when you want to influence people or change their behavior.

It's because criticism will put the recipient on the defensive and he can't listen to you or focus on changing when he is busy defending himself.

The opposite might actually happen: to protect his ego, he will make up a story to rationalize that he isn't so wrong after all… And that you're a jerk.

My note:
Criticism indeed often raises the fight or flight response in people. HOWEVER… Criticism and disappointment work great if you have a very strong emotional leverage on people.
See our article on "judge power dynamics":

> The Judge Role: A Tool For Emotional Control

Principle 2: Give Honest and Sincere Appreciation

Appreciation takes out the best in people.

Dale Carnegie says that appreciation leverages one of the most difficult needs for people to meet: the need to feel important.

Carnegie says that also flattery, such as fake appreciation, might also work.
It worked for Disraeli with Queen Victoria, he says (Greene describes it in The Art of Seduction).
But that doesn't mean it will work for you as well. Instead, always make your appreciation sincere.

My Note:
Later social experiments showed how flattery, even when people suspect second motives, is still effective. Check Cialdini's Influence.

If appreciating anything in people is difficult for you Carnegie recommends you adopt Ralph Emerson's mindset when he says -I paraphrase-:

> Every man you meet is superior to you in something. And you can learn from him

Principle 3: Arouse in the Other Person an Eager Want

To get what you want from people, you must first understand what they want.

This is the "What's In It For Me" principle and it's also a law of power in Robert Greene's "The 48 Laws of Power".

And then you can present your wants and needs in a way that will satisfy their wants and needs.

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

Part 2 – Six Ways to Make People Like You

Principle 1: Become Genuinely Interested in Other People

Dale Carnegie says that the only way to make solid and lasting relationships is to be genuinely interested in them.

As the author is famously quoted as saying: to be interesting be interested.

> You make more friends in two months by being interested in them, than in two years making them interested in you

Principle 2: Smile

Dale Carnegie says that a smile is a way of saying "I like you and you make me happy".

So smile at people when you greet them.

My note:
Schaefer in The Like Switch recommends you also flash your eyebrows upwards, which is an unconscious indicator of liking and acceptance.

Carnegie says that our actions influence our feelings as much as our feelings influence our actions.
So by smiling, you will also be naturally happier.

My Note:
That might be somewhat true, albeit there has been valid and scientific criticism of what's been later dubbed the "facial feedback hypothesis", see "self-help myths" and "pop psychology").

> Pop Psychology Myths

Principle 3: Remember Their Names

People love the sound of their name more than any other sound in the world.

Remember their names, which will make them feel valued.

> His name is to him the sweetest and most important sound in any language

Principle 4: Be a Good Listener

The most important element of being a good conversationalist is being a good listener.
And to become a good listener, the number one rule is to care.

> To become a great listener: care about the speaker

Principle 5: Talk in Terms of His Interests

Most people like to discuss their interests and hobbies.

And that's why Dale Carnegie recommends you talk about what interests them.

Principle 6: Make Him Feel Important

To make others feel important Carnegie recommends you ask yourself what is it about them that you admire.

Once you know what you admire about them, it will reflect in your demeanor and you can also tell them about your admiration.

Part 3 – How To Win People To Your Way of Thinking

Principle 1: To Get The Best of an Argument, Avoid It

Carnegie says you will always lose in an argument.

If you lose, you lose, and if you win, the other will feel resentful and you still lose.
The only way to win an argument is by avoiding it.

Principle 2: Show Respect For His Opinions

When you attack someone's opinion, you will push them on the defensive.

And again, if you get into an ideological battle, you only always lose.

Principle 3: If You Are Wrong, Admit It

… And do so quickly and emphatically, says Carnegie.
It will boost his ego and confidence, because, if you're wrong, he must be right.

My note:
Another great advantage of admitting fault is that it shows a strength of character. Most people shift blame, and those who take full ownership set themselves apart.

I particularly loved the answer from Elbert Hubbard that Carnegie used as an example.
When a reader sent an irate mail to attack the author's opinion, Hubbard replied (I paraphrase):

> Come to think it over, I don't think I completely agree with it myself.
> Not everything I wrote yesterday appeals to me today. I am glad to learn what you think on the subject.
> The next time you are in the neighborhood, please visit us and we'll talk about it.
> Yours Sincerely…"

Principle 4: Begin in a Friendly Way

Anger against anger is the fool's way of discussing and solving issues, implies the author.

It will get you nowhere -except maybe to trading blows-.

Begin in a friendly way instead and you will immensely lower his guard, lower the tension and dramatically increase the chances of a resolution.

Also, read:

- Best communication skills books

Principle 5: Get Him Saying "Yes" Immediately

Never start with disagreement as that's a slippery slope.

Start with what you agree on instead.

Carnegie says that when someone starts out saying “yes” a few times the natural tendency is to keep going with “yeses”.
And he will immediately place himself in a more positive and conducive mental disposition.

My note:
That’s what the sales technique “yes ladder” is based on. Check out my article on the nasty effects of a “no ladder“ to understand the opposite effect.

Principle 6: Let Him do a great deal of the talking

Carnegie recommends you never brag and never monopolize the conversation.

Do the opposite: let the others do most of the talking.

In truth, if you know how to brag, bragging can work.
See here how:

> How To Brag Without Bragging: The Covert Brag Technique

Principle 7: Let Him Feel That The Idea Is His

People embrace ideas quickly and work harder on them when they feel it’s their own brainchild.

So don’t push your ideas on others and fight to convince them. If you want cooperation let people feel it was their own idea.

That’s also a good way to stimulate what psychologists call “intrinsic motivation”.

Carnegie provides a very good example here.

He tells the story of a customer who was stumped among different choices -of course, see The Paradox of Choice-.
Instead of pitching the products the salesman asked the person what kind of product he would select best.
As he described the product, the prospect came to his own conclusions as to what he should buy.
And he happily bought: it was his own idea.

Principle 8: Try to See Things From His Point of View

Our natural tendency is to judge people and immediately think we’re right and they’re wrong.

But the world is rarely, if ever, so cut and dry.
And one of the biggest secrets to doing well with people is always to see the situation from their point of view as well.

Dale Carnegie says if you only take one thing away from How To Win Friends & Influence People, it should be making a habit of looking at interactions from other people’s perspectives.
Not to simply understand their opinion, but why they are even having those opinions in the first place.

Principle 9: Be Sympathetic To His Ideas and Desires

Carnegie says that people ache for understanding and sympathy.

Instead of giving them the battle they expect, he suggests one sentence that will put to rest any argument (I paraphrase):

> I don't blame you for feeling the way you feel. If I were you, I would feel the exact same way.

So simple, yet so genius.

Principle 10: Appeal to The Nobler Motives

Dale Carnegie says that when you appeal to nobler motives, you will make people want to rise up to the noble trait that you bestow upon them.

Principle 11: Dramatize Your Ideas

Dramatizing your idea basically means having good marketing for your product.

Simply stating the truth is not enough, you have to make it appealing.

Principle 12: Throw Down a Challenge

When nothing else works, Dale Carnegie recommends you make it a challenge so that people want to win as if it were a game.

This is the same concept games use and which has become famous today as "gamification": put a score on the game, and people will work hard to increase that number.

Part 4 – Be a Leader: How To Change People

Principle 1: Begin With Praise and Honest Appreciation

Dale Carnegie says that if you must criticize someone, first find something good they have done and begin with that.

The author also highlights the danger of the word "but", which negates anything you previously said.

Don't say:

> Poor Communicator: you did great, BUT…* "

but say:

> Influencer: you did great and you can do even better if… ".

My note:
Carnegie also gets into the "sandwich feedback technique". But it's so popular today that you better stay away from it.
Everyone knows the praise is setting the stage for the critique and they won't even believe it. Check out Daring Greatly for a great feedback example instead (Ctrl+f and write "feedback").

Principle 2: Call Attention to People's Mistakes Indirectly

Same as for criticizing, directly pointing out people's mistakes is a surefire way to put them on the defensive.

Telling someone "you've done a mistake" is like telling people "you're wrong".
And it hurts the most when done publicly.

My note:
Simon Sinek says in Leaders Eat Last that the task of a leader is to defend his team.
And well, sometimes you also need to defend their ego.

Principle 3: Talk About Your Own Mistakes Before Criticizing Him

Dale Carnegie says it's easier to take criticism when the person criticizing us admits to his mistakes or his own imperfections.

When we can share the blame, blame hurts less.
And when we make ourselves imperfect, we are more likely to be accepted.

Principle 4: Ask Questions Instead of Giving Direct Orders

Dale Carnegie says that nobody likes to take orders: it makes us feel subordinate and less important. So give suggestions instead of orders.

Principle 5: Let the Other Person Save Face

People will resent us if we hurt their egos or insult their skills, especially if publicly.
Always think of a way to save people's faces instead.

For example:
General Electric had a brilliant engineer who was doing very poorly as a department head.
Demoting was likely going to be very costly to his ego.
So the company instead gave him a big title and moved him somewhere else in a way that if felt he was being promoted.

Check this article for an example.

Principle 6: Praise Every improvement

If you want people to keep improving, give them praise for every improvement.

He will feel good for doing well and will be motivated to keep going.

My note:
Carnegie is basically suggesting here to use of positive reinforcement in what in psychology is known as operant conditioning.

> Be hearty in your approbation and lavish in your praise

Principle 7: Give Him a Fine Reputation to Live Up To

When you give people a good reputation, the tendency is to act in accordance with that reputation.

It's partly because being found out not as good would hurt us, and partially because we want to keep that good trait real.

Identity drives behavior, so when people start liking and believing in a new identity, they will act accordingly.

Principle 8: Encourage. Make The Fault Seem Easy to Correct

If a task seems too big or if people feel like they are far too unskilled to accomplish it, they will lose their heart and fail to act.

Encourage them instead, build up their ego.
And make the effort seem within their grasp. Then they will be motivated to act.

Principle 9: Make Him Happy About Doing What You Suggest

When you want someone to do something, make them feel happy and proud of the task at hand.

Tell them their rare skills and talent make them the best fit for the job.

Part 5 – Making Your Home Life Happier

This section was included in the original book, but not in the revised version.

It could indeed be easily summarized as saying that all previous principles apply to your relationship as well. The most interesting for me were:

1. Don't nag/criticize
2. Don't try to change your partner
3. Give honest appreciation
4. Don't over-emphasize the details
5. Read a good book on the sexual side of marriage

If you're interested in relationship books, head over to my relationships book summaries.

Real-Life Applications

Appreciate More
Most of us would do great in remembering this very simple advice: appreciate, compliment, and encourage more.

Put Yourself In Their Shoes
Whether you need to engage someone for a crucial conversation, to better understand their needs, or to lead with what's in it for them, it's a great habit to always put yourself in their shoes first. It doesn't mean you concede they are right, but it means you consider their perspective.

CRITICISM

Let's start with a quote from our power-aware community:

> What a crappy world we live in if everything I learned in How to win friends and influence people is actually counterproductive! ⍰
> TPM Community Member & PU Alumnus

Yep, that's our main criticism.

It's a great book that can easily turn counter-productive without power skills, manipulation awareness, and strategies.
You MUST be aware of the limitation.

You Need To Add Advanced Material For Status, Respect & Attraction

The book is not meant to tackle the more advanced approaches to socialization and influence.

There is no way to social strategize like Machiavellians.

Or how to handle value-takers, and assholes.

And that's important to be effective in life.

How to Win Friends is still a fantastic book.
Best for those who can come across as awkward, who struggle to make friends, or who couldn't even persuade a nice guy to get Power University.

Nuances Missing

Carnegie's principles are solid.

But the advanced game is in the nuances and exceptions.

For example, the highest achievers often want truth, not to be coddled by someone afraid to speak his mind.

Also read this:

- Glass ceiling advice

> Ceiling Effect: Why 99% of Self-Help Leads to Plateaus

Misses The Nuances of Otherwise Good Techniques: The Book Borrowing

Carnegie famously recommends asking an enemy for a favor to become closer.

It's indeed a fantastic technique.
However, that comes with consequences and obligations that may not fit everyone's goals.

The technique works because of social exchange principles.
When they do you a favor, you move from 'former enemies' to new friends -and allies-.

But getting closer and receiving a favor also indebts you to them, and adds future expectations.
They will expect you to support and help them when needed.

If they don't, they will go back being twice as big enemies -and more motivated to trip you-.

So it's not be the best approach for everyone.

It Can Make You Come Across As Weak

The various ego-protecting and indirect approaches are great principles.

As for everything, though, there is risk in overdoing the 'polished-sounding techniques'. And if you do, you can come across as weak, too passive, or submissive.

Make sure you use these techniques because you care about people or because you want to achieve certain results. But NOT because you're afraid of being blunt and honest.

Carnegie's Principles Make For Nice Books, But He Got Rich With Different Principles

Here's what Machiavelli would say.

The Andrew Carnegie receipt for power, status, and legacy:

1. Ruthlessly seek power, money, and market domination
2. Hire private goons as strikebreakers when employees seek better living standards
3. PUBLICLY support unions WITH YOUR NAME, then have your underlings be ruthless on your behalf
4. Write nice-sounding books to gain a good reputation as an enlightened man
5. Build libraries, universities and institutions WITH YOUR NAME ATTACHED for a long-lasting reputation as a philanthropist
6. Give most of your fortune away before you die as the last reputational power move because… You can't take it with you anyway

This may not be too far away from the truth.

But then again… What does Machiavelli know :).

How to Influence People After PU

Says a PU alumnus in TPM's former Discord server:

> PU definitively changed my life!
> I basically lived my life by the book „How to Win Friends and Influence People" by Dale Carnegie.
> I gave and gave and even when nothing came back I gave more for absolutely nothing. I was an altruistic giver and a people pleaser.
> One of my friends introduced me to sociology and after a bit of research I stumbled across PU.
> Long story short – It was an eye-opening experience. It felt like learning the ability of the next higher layer of language.
> As if my vision became enhanced on so many levels. I slowely started to understand the true meaning of words, sentences and behavior. Thanks to PU I now was able to build strong win-win friendships and I feel more and more people start to look up to me.
> Power University alumnus

I see where he's coming from.

And I bet he would agree that it's still a great book… IF you put it in perspective.

And you MUST be aware of the limitation.

The second part of me answer was:

> And it IS a *great*book, which makes it even more challenging to put it in perspective.
> Because it must be put in perspective as it's incomplete and can easily take people off track -similar to "The 48 Laws of Power"-.
> Lucio Buffalmano

Says another PU alumni right after:

> I went back to a glance at that particular book after PU and with the background of PU, I think I appreciate the book more. As I think Lucio implied, it's so easy to lose perspective when you're encountering new principles > from one enthusiastic perspective, since there's always more perspectives and outlying scenarios where the principles don't hold any longer.
> PU alumnus

Yep, 100%.

To make the most of a book like How to Win Friends and Influence People you may need the skills and competencies we teach here.

Review

How to Win Friends and Influence People shares valid and timeless social advice.

It's based on sound principles, and even if you're an advanced student of the social arts, it's still a great refresher.

I also appreciate that Carnegie uses many real-life examples to back his principles.

Some of the principles, like almost any principle, are not always the most effective for all situations (see 'ceiling effect').
And it would be even better if it included some power dynamics, a crucial element for ambitious men's success.

Check the best books on influence and persuasion.
And for status and power, we help our students with Power University.

How Women Make Men Value Them: Guide for High-Value Men

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Are you wondering why some women seem to effortlessly command higher respect, investment, and commitment from men — even very high-value ones?

You have come to the right place.

Before we start, this article explains psychological patterns some women use in relationships — knowing them helps you protect yourself and make smarter choices."

As a general rule, we recommend you avoid partners who engage in manipulation and nasty dating power moves.

But if you've been too naive or too giving without positive calculativeness, this article helps you understand power dynamics, defend yourself, and pick better partners.

Intro

From a general perspective, there are two ways women make men value them more:

1. Increase their (perceived) value
2. Decrease the man's value

Often, they overlap.

But the second is nastier and rooted in 'value scalping' manipulation tactics and games, while the first can be rooted in true self-development.

Let's start:

#1. She Lets You Come To Her

> Oh there you are, I hadn't seen you!

Kara King in The Power of the Pussy says the natural order of things is that men make the move, and women make the choice.

That dynamic starts from the smallest detail: who's looking at whom.

Predators peer at their prey.

Women who want to increase perceived value often avoid being the one scanning / chasing visually. Instead, they let the man spot and approach them first.

On the first date, many smart women do this: pretend they can't find you and let you come to them while they look around, walk, or check their phone.

One time a woman I was waiting for at the entrance of an underground station walked a few meters past me like she was cat-walking.

Then she stopped 10 meters ahead, looked around, and pretended to stop there waiting.

98% of guys fall for it, admire the strut, and feel lucky to be out with her.

Watch for this — it's common.

#2. She Disqualifies Your Crown Jewel

No, not necessarily your penis — unless that's genuinely the trait you're leaning on hardest.

The crown jewel is the main quality that makes you attractive to her / others, the standout trait, or the possession you're most proud of.

The move is to downplay the trait you rely on most for your confidence and self-esteem.
So imagine you're a very wealthy man and that's your most glaring quality. She might say something like:

> Her: I hope you're not one of those guys who thinks money makes him special

It does a few things to you:

- Denies your “advantage”
- Tells you that you need to come up with something else (qualifying and complying with her)
- Sets her as the judge
- Communicates she needs more
- Communicates she looks beyond superficial stuff

All in one, nice.

Now, the most astute guys will not jump through her hoops. And yet, even those start valuing her more.

Here’s an example of a girl executing this with me:

This worked especially well because a few of my pictures tend to be “poser” pictures, so she made me slightly insecure and gave her more power and control. I cared more for her opinion and wanted more for her to “accept me” in spite of my pictures, which also made me value her more.

#3. She Highlights Her Optionality & Pursuers (Preselection)

Cialdini and countless studies leave little room for doubters: people want what other people also want.

And the dating marketplace is no exception.

The best is if she gets you to see it firsthand.

And that’s why the best places to use this technique are night venues where people naturally approach each other.

She won’t always stand close hand in hand, but takes some distance.

When you’re getting drinks? She stands outside the queue and looks languishingly at some guy.

When guys approach her, she makes polite conversation.

And when you come back with the drinks and see her talking to another man… you will get into a more defensive mindset.

And yes, you will also value her more.

She can't lose if she does it well: no matter how handsome you are, if she dresses sexy a woman will always get more approaches.

#4. She Implies You 'Barely Managed'

> …. He can count his lucky stars!

This is the main idea:

She communicates that she was assessing you hard before she gave you a chance.

One more mistake there, one blunder here… And you would have gotten the chop.

No need to do it confrontationally.

The positive message she conveys is that she liked you and cheered for you, but she has very high standards and you had a few shaky moments.

You were under heavy scrutiny. That's the message.

Look at this Tinder date example. She was too childish and I was close to walking.

But the fact that she displayed such high standards was a huge point for her.

Rejecting someone raises value.

Almost rejecting you raises her value, lowers yours… And still makes you happy that you made the cut.

Win, win, and win again!

To communicate high standards, here are a couple of examples she might use:

> Her: There was that guy with the pony tail hair you were talking to… If he was your friend I'd never have given > you my number

If you're already in a more advanced stage she might look at some situations and say:

> Her: When I asked you to help me and you weren't sure… I'm glad you came through or we wouldn't be here now

Now on to the next.

#5. She Tells You You Were a Such Dork (But She Loved You Anyway)

If the relationship progresses you will eventually get to talk about the first time you met, and what you thought about each other.

She never says she thought you were a catch, cool or, God forbid, that she was scheming to meet you.

That would make you the prize of the relationship.

Instead she says she thought you were a bit of a dork.

If you were cool, she says she wasn't sure about you because you looked so try-hard.

You won her over time instead. She's super happy with you, but it's not like you swept her off her feet… But hey, you're great.

That's the message.

#6. She Talks About Her Wonderful Exes

There is a tendency for couples to match up around the same overall value.

Thus, communicating great exes is a great way for her to make you realize her worth.

Talking about great exes does a few good things:

- Signals she's a high-value woman
- Implies she can get equally amazing men

And, as well, if you don't have strong inner confidence:

- Keeps you insecure

Some men play this on women anyway.

From a message from an ex-fling of mine, talking about his new boyfriend:

Man using the male version of "my studdy ex" game

The opposite is also true.

If she makes you feel like you are something special compared to her exes you will feel like she's punching above her weight with you.

Even in the best-case scenario, you might feel like the main rooster in her life and might let yourself go.

Where else would she go, you will think.

You will acquire an attitude and potentially even treat her more poorly.

Some women do like Summer instead, parading a nice roster of exes:

> Her: (describes ex-boyfriends, including in a highly sexualized fashion)

#7. She Builds You Up For Unmanly Traits: You're A Cuddle Monster

Some men need to feel superior.

And, unluckily, for the most abusive of them, that means pushing her down.

These guys are egotists.

Meaning they have high self-esteem and big egos, but also very fragile egos.

She doesn't want to enter into a race to who's lower down, but at the same time doesn't want you to feel too good, or you will never come to respect her and recognize her value.

Solution?

She builds you up.

But NOT for personal qualities which do not help the relationship.

If you're intelligent and worldly, she won't look at you doe-eyed while you explain things.

That would only make you feel like she's not smart enough.

If you're a gym-type, ripped guy, she never shows herself too thirsty or too into your abs, muscles, or, God forbid, package.

Instead, she treats you more like a big cuddly bear.

When she negates your mostly mannish qualities and slots you for good in the big teddy bear category she effectively defangs you.

And in a very sneaky way, too: you'd never even suspect anything.

#8. She Undermines Your Achievements

This is nasty.

But the guys who are least likely to recognize her worth often do so because they are too into themselves.

Blinded by what they believe is their own huge achievements, they fail to even take her value into account.

To help them value her more, she reins in a man's over-inflated ego.

She can do it without starting a war by indirectly pointing out flaws he might be self-conscious about.

Example:

Years ago when I was dumb and inexperienced a girl told me we could go somewhere… If I'd go pick her up.

… And I felt inadequate for not having a car.

She can use the same concept when she needs to shorten the distance between you.

Ask for things you can't provide, compare you with people you can't stack up with, and talk of an underwhelming past.

All things that will cool down "Mr. too hot to handle".

The first step, as my former GF's crush says, is to never show you're impressed, which lowers her market value:

It doesn't matter how ripped / rich/smart you are. She can always take you down a peg or two by unearthing some shortcomings:

> Her: Oh that's a cool Olympic size swimming pool. Is it warmed up for winter swimming?

Or:

> Her: Oh, professor and author, nice. Maybe you know X guy in your field who wrote Y best-seller. I really like him

The secret here is to make her comments seem nonchalant, natural, and off-hand.

Powerful stuff.

#9. She 'Pinches Your Baby Fat' (playing on insecurities)

Here is when I fully realized the insidious power that this mind game has on people:

> My ex girlfriend was fit and I loved her legs.

> I thought it was fun to grab her well defined calves and comment “chub chub” as a joke. We both laughed about it.
> Then one day she told me to stop or that would make her insecure. She was too embarrassed to tell me earlier.

There was nothing that could have realistically made her insecure.

But that made me think how even the most innocent-looking gesture can have far-reaching consequences.

She can use the same principle to deflate you. Stereotypes are often the easiest to sheath with a joking semblance:

- Scrawny book worm? She tells you if she should also carry your luggage too
- Gym rat checking the grocery bill? She strokes your head and jokes she’ll call an accountant to support

#10. Ashton Kutcher Is The Hottest (Not You)

> Someone else is on Mount Olympus. You can come back to earth

I like understanding people, and that includes their tastes.

A conversation I like to have early with women is who they think are the hottest men (and women) around.

I remember asking an ex-girlfriend of mine who she thought was the hottest guy in Hollywood. We were left with two people, so we get to finally crown the N.1.

> Me: So who’s the hottest then, X or Kutcher?
> She: Well, is there really anyone hotter than Ashton Kutcher?

As you notice, I can’t remember who was the second. But I do somehow remember she was so into Kutcher :).

Basically, she had me admit I wasn’t N.1.

You cannot do this with her friends, but with actors and celebs, it’s fine (and if it’s not fine you should re-evaluate her).

#11. She Breaks Up With You

Many people only realize that they need her when they don't have her anymore.

And plenty of marriages followed a breakup, when the woman gained more power and when the man realized he truly wanted her.

Albeit this might seem like a huge power move, if she's not getting her needs met, many women actually do break up.

It's a very strong way of putting the ball in your court.

However, there is a skill in how she uses this move.

She needs to make you understand that she likes you, but that until you are unable to give her what she needs, she simply can't stay.

Something like this:

> Her: I love you, and I always will. And at the same time, I also love and respect myself. If you cannot do the same, then you are forcing me to move on. If in the future you will change your mind, please let me know. Goodbye my love.

Mic drop, exit.

If you liked her, you will realize her worth when she's not there.

And if you come back, chances are that you will treat her much better.

Bonus: She Likes You Because You Recognize How Great She Is

This is an interesting gambit.

Dale Carnegie says that to promote the behavior you want to see, you need to tell people they already have that behavior.

So if you fail to recognize her true worth, she might suggest to you that you are already seeing her true worth.

For example, she can tell you that the reason why she likes you so much is because both of you appreciate her true worth.

That you recognize that she is an accomplished woman, a pious girl, a respectful lady… Or whatever it is that she feels sets her apart.

Please Note:

If you see these dark psychology techniques used on you too often, you need to consider you might be dating a poor partner.

These techniques to make her valued more are best for:

- Knowledge sake
- Friends/colleagues you can't avoid
- Short term flings
- Sparingly with girlfriends who self-aggrandize

A swallow doesn't make summer so even great women can have a moment of weakness or can unconsciously try to make you feel inferior.

In those cases, it's good to know how to even the odds to display you're not a naive, submissive, or low-value man.

But if you often have to deal with these games, then you need to reconsider that woman.

If it happens more than very rarely, you're in a combative relationship or possibly even in an abusive relationship.

If your woman is busier putting you down than building you up. That's the definition of a toxic relationship.

And you should probably not look for ways to "balance it" because it will only take you into a downward spiral.

That's why increasing her value or decreasing yours are actually two faces of the same coin.

It's because they both focus on who's better in a sort of competition-fueled race.

A healthy relationship is different. A healthy relationship is about adding value to each other. She builds you up and you build her up.

That's the kind of relationship you deserve.

Bullet Summary

- Avoid contact after a breakup
- Resume a happy life. And if he can see that, all the better
- Only take him back if he shows he's serious about moving forward

Full Summary

About The Author: Leslie Braswell is an author of female dating strategies books.

Note:
"Ignore The Guy, Get The Guy" never openly states so, but it's geared towards maximizing the chances of you two getting back together.
I'm personally not sure that's the healthiest mindset to have, but that's your decision.

INTRODUCTION

Leslie Braswell says that how you handle the post-break makes the difference in either making him run further away or making him come crawling back for another chance.

Chapter 1: Why No Contact Works

No contact immediately after the break up is the only way to go, implies Leslie Braswell.

She says that controlling your emotions will be the hardest part. But it's key because women who fall apart communicate unattractive neediness and no emotional control.
No contact is the best medicine because:

- Hides your true state (that you're falling apart)
- Communicates you're no longer his (and men want what they can't have)
- Gives him space to miss you
- Shrouds you in an air of mystery (what is she up to?)
- You more easily move on (keeping in touch makes you stay loyal to him)
- It's the only way to know if he really wants you back

When he contacts you first, let him wait before you reply. If he sends an empty text such as "what a great day today", don't reply. Texts without a scope serve nothing: you're not out for a chat, he either wants you back, or he's a time waster.

Leslie Braswell says you keep the silent treatment until he's 100% serious about getting you back.

Chapter 2: The Aftermath of a Breakup

The author says that it's OK to take the first week to mourn and be sad. Use this time to analyze what went wrong and how you contributed to it.

After that week, it's time to move on:

- Change phone ringtone (so you don't run checking texts hoping it's him)
- Always dress well
- Keep the old messages, use pain as a reminder: love shouldn't hurt, it wasn't real love
- Set weekly "no contact reminders" and reward yourself at the end of each week

Chapter 3: The Emotional Roller Coaster Ride

Leslie Braswell says knowing the emotions you will experience will make it easier for you to endure them.
The emotions are:

1. Shock
2. Denial
3. Anger -obsessively asking what went wrong-
4. Negotiate -in this phase, you want to talk to him to fix it-
5. Acceptance

But the author says that smart women don't negotiate: they have a take-it-or-leave-it approach and don't do compromises.
However, she doesn't believe that once it's broken it's gone forever. But don't take that as a motivation to pursue him: he has to show you first. And he has to put in the effort.

Leslie says you will know if he really wants it: when a man loves you, he makes you his priority. That is simple (same concept Greg Behrendt espouses in He's Just Not That Into You).

Chapter 4: What a Man Expects After a Breakup

Leslie Braswell says a man will expect you to contact him, and possibly to fall apart.

And that's when you'll throw him a curve ball.

She says in three weeks he will realize you're not really seeking him, and after four weeks he'll wonder what are you up to. But if he hasn't reached out in eight weeks, he has moved.

Breakup Power Move

Leslie Braswell says you should bounce back and have fun -and possibly let him know that-. When he catches wind of that, it's gonna be a big hit to his ego.

How He Broke Up

The author says that a telephone breakup is only acceptable in long-distance relationships.
Otherwise, anything else outside face-to-face is a no-no to even consider getting back together.

You Can't Be Friends

It doesn't work when there are still feelings because the breakup never really ends and it only gets messier.
And there's another slimier reason why he'd want to stay friends: he's not really sure and wants to keep you as an option.

I loved the author's suggestion on what to reply when he gives you the "let's be friends" BS. You smile and say "sure". And if he calls you to be friends, ignore it.

My note:
this is also my suggestion on how to turn down a date with class. And what Carrie does when meeting his ex with a kid.

Chapter 5: Cut Him Off Completely

The author says it feels to you like you you've lost the love of your life, but you only actually need to give your body the time to re-balance from the oxytocin chemical.

Don't Have Sex With Him

The author says that men want sex while women seek security. That's why until he's providing you with security you shouldn't give sex.

My note:
Lambert says during breakups men look for new women while women stay loyal. So no sex breakup. Either together, or nothing.

Chapter 6: Hide Your Crazy

Chapter 6 of Ignore The Guy Get The Guy can be boiled down to this: you can have a nervous breakdown, but never act on it or show it.

The example is that of a former female astronaut who, obviously, didn't hider her crazy. Lisa Nowak drove hours on astronaut diapers to assault his ex' new girlfriend -oh, and in case you're wondering, the diapers served to avoid wasting time on biological breaks during the drive-.

The author poignantly asks: do you think her ex would ever consider getting back together after that?

Chapter 7: Handling a Breakup Through Facebook and Twitter

Leslie Braswell recommends you delete him from your friends list and quietly take down the pictures of you two together.

Wait a few days before changing your relationship status and change it privately.

Keep posting the same way you used to post before the breakup, so you won't show any signs of emotional trauma.

Chapter 8: How Long You Must Go Without Contact

The author says if you two shared something meaningful he'll probably get in touch within thirty days.

If he doesn't contact you within sixty days, your relationship is probably over for good.

My Note:
I don't totally agree.
There are women whom I felt so good with that I'd be ready to reconsider at any time.
But that's not to say that you should count on that!

Chapter 9: Get Your House In Order

Leslie Braswell has a few tips on moving on:

- Tell yourself there's no other option but to move on
- Join classes
- Make yourself beautiful and go out (maybe on girls' night out)
- Be open to give and receive (new) love
- Change your style: some hair highlights for example
- Go on a shopping spree
- Clean / fix the house
- Remove all his pictures from the sight

Chapter 10: Skyrocket Your Self Confidence

Leslie Braswell says that self-confidence is something you develop.

She says you should develop your own rules and value, and not simply accept what society feeds you (I agree, check my guide on how to build a strong identity).
Other tips she shares:

- Take stock of your qualities and remind yourself each day
- Surround yourself with positive people
- Do positive affirmations (what Tony Robbins calls incantation, but it doesn't work with low-self esteem)
- Try new things and new places

Chapter 11: How To Make Mr. Ex Miss You

Leslie Braswell says you should give him less attention than he gives you after the breakup.

And when you get in touch, don't say everything about yourself. Be a mystery, leave him guessing.

I especially liked in this chapter Kate Middleton's example.
The author says she'd bet Kate was destroyed after Prince William broke up with her. But she gave the opposite impression. She worked out and got in shape, she organized charity events and enjoyed the nightlife. And Prince

William went back to her.

Leslie Braswell says you might not have photographers to chronicle your life, but you can use the power of social media.

> Men are like cats: chase and they'll run. Ignore them and they'll come purring

Chapter 12: What You Should Do to Get Him Back

Braswell suggests you focus on yourself and on becoming the best woman you can be.

Chapter 13: Be Smart With Your Heart

The author says women crave a hand to hold on to or a chest to sleep on, but relying on someone else to make them happier is not good in the long term.

And she says you should first love yourself before anyone can love you.

And most of all, don't get bitter, and don't let past relationships hold you back to move toward new -and possibly better- relationships.

FAQ

The author has a list of frequently asked questions. Get the book for more.

CONS

Long
Ignore The Guy Get The Guy has useful content, but the book could have been (much) briefer.

Getting Back?
Leslie seems mostly hell-bent on making him miss you so that he might come back. I'm not too sure that's a very healthy mindset and in some cases, you might be better served with a "let's find a better guy mindset".

Review

Good book, easy to read and the concepts make a lot of sense.

You will definitely increase your chances of getting back together or moving ahead faster by following Leslie's tips.

I also appreciate the fact that Leslie doesn't take any moral high ground on the reader.
She admits it's difficult and it's a tough time. I appreciate when authors show a vulnerable side instead of pontificating while hiding behind a pen.

You’re Insignificant. The Sooner You Accept It, The More Powerful You Get

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Tomes have been written on the notion that “ego is your enemy“.

I don’t think ego is your enemy.

But it certainly does not help you when that ego becomes too big and when you start feeling like you’re a true big shot.

Let’s see how that impairs your social skills and your general life quality.

How Self-Importance Leads to Social Anxiety

I used to be conceited, jealous, always guarded, and relatively socially anxious.

My brother instead was open, more honest, and relaxed. He was more likable and, overall, a much better human being.

Today I understand what was one of the biggest reasons for our different dispositions.

I was self-centered and I thought I was important.
A song from the Beatles springs to mind: I, me, mine. That was me: a little conceited tw*t who thought he was “better”.

Everything around me was filtered through the “me lenses”: what it meant for me and for my reputation.
Since I felt I had a big name and reputation to defend and uphold, I had to be careful.

And “careful” is often synonymous with guarded, calculative, and… Rather scared of doing the wrong thing.
Because when you’re a big deal, everything’s a big deal.

And that’s why your social anxiety goes up when you think you’re important.

My brother wasn’t self-centered instead and thought of himself as “just another guy”.

Can you start to see how that impacted his life and character?

My brother didn’t have a good name to defend, so he didn’t need to look good.
Chill and relaxation were natural consequences of his disposition. He wasn’t afraid of making a fool out of himself, of looking silly, or of being rejected by someone.

Because when you're not a big deal, nothing is such a big deal.

Let's dig deeper and let's see how successful "I'm important" people still fall short of their full potential:

Importance and As*holes

You can probably see some overlap between the fixed mindset and your identity.

Indeed a high sense of importance is often tied to an "I'm important" identity and it's the most paralyzing when coupled with a fixed mindset.

But of course, out of pure randomness and out of sheer ambition, some people will succeed without a growth mindset or an antifragile identity -albeit they won't maximize their potential and be as happy as they could be.

Some high-confidence people will even avoid social anxiety while still clinging to their belief of importance.

Which often goes with a more or less open attitude of "you're not as important as I am" stance.

Those are usually the people you refer to as "as*holes".

That attitude will attract some people to you. Possibly quite a few people.

But it will mostly be less confident and less socially savvy people who are drawn to what seems like high confidence and self-esteem.

But overall you'd still be at a social loss as it will harm you this way:

- Develop jealousy and resentment from less successful individuals
- Make other men see you as competition
- Repel high-caliber individuals

The last one is key.

The highest caliber individuals usually have moved beyond the "I, Me, Mine" stage. Indeed the "I'm a big shot" stage is associated with immaturity and childishness.

Highly successful men still trapped in this stage can still get high-caliber women, but those women see them like big babies they can't fully relate to and that can easily be played by their egos.

And that's exactly what books like *Why Men Love Bitc*es, The Power of The Puy*, and *Fu*k Him* all recommend: play to his need of importance and you will control him -and they are right-.

Donald and Melania Trump have this kind of shallow relationship in good part because he hasn't moved beyond his need of being important, special, and superior.

Moving Beyond I'm Important

Mark Manson's book *The Subtle Art of Not Giving a F*ck* is basically all about moving beyond the "I'm exceptional" phase which, he says, is mostly a western problem.

Manson says that once you drop the need to be special you will be free to pursue whatever you want without the fear of judgment and the pressure of having to reach that "you're special" status.

And it's when you move beyond "I'm important" that you'll reach truth and liberation.

Moving beyond the "I'm important" mindset will make you:

- Higher value man
- More attractive to a larger population
- More vulnerable, drop the masks
- Able to develop deeper and more meaningful relationships
- Don't take things personally: stronger and more resilient

It's Not About You: Don't Take Things Personally

That last point deserves a bit more space.

Don Miguel Ruiz in The Four Agreements says during childhood we pick up the "me, me, me mentality".

That mentality leads people to always be on guard, always ready to take offense.
He recommends we move past it and develop a mindset of not taking things personally instead.

Not only do I agree, but that's a great mindset for getting good socially.

The first step to moving beyond the "me, me, me" phase is to realize, factually, how little we matter in the greater scheme of things:

Why We Don't Really Matter That Much

Let's start with the idea of "people changing the world", a typical goal of today's driven entrepreneur -and a great corporate manipulation tool to attract naive talent-.

Nobody Changes The World (Single–handedly)

Alexander the Great was the biggest conqueror the world had ever seen.

Unstoppable and undefeated in battle, he built the biggest empire the world had ever seen.
He thought he was the son of a god and wanted to be remembered forever… And you probably needed to look him up, didn't you?

Alexander was only one of the thousands of "conquerors" whose big empires soon fell to pieces -as they all do-.

A couple more millennia, less than a blink of an eye, and he won't even be the single-line entry on history books that he is today -not that any student gives a fu*k about him even today, anyway-.

You don't need to Google Steve Jobs, another remarkable man.

But it's only because he's contemporary and your friends lust after the latest iPhone.
But don't believe the hype of changing the world.
Internet-enabled smartphones were already a widespread tool (ten years before the iPhone) and even Jobs will be a nobody in just a few generations.

Well, Jesus does seem to last a little bit longer though, right?

When a commandment says killing is a sin, but millions died in the name of God, we could easily argue people don't really follow prophets, but use prophets. To justify their own actions and beliefs.
Or just go to Asia and see how well they really know Jesus.

Time Relativity: nobody remembers you

The Pharaohs took "for ever" to the next level.

Pyramids were built with the idea of lasting forever.
But believing they achieved that goal is a lack of understanding of how time really works on a bigger scale.

Pick anybody you think changed the world.

And see if anybody will remember him in 10.000 years.

Yes?

Try 300.000.

After a few more world wars and another bunch of prophets and despots will have millions up in arms and millions dying -and a bunch more huge-building projects will be started and then looted and destroyed-.

Then one billion years, after a bunch of glacial eras will give way to the sun making the world too hot to live in.

Two billion and our current world map will be nothing like it's today (our continents move). All those battles for a piece of land, this nation against that nation… How ridiculous they are when looking through the prism of time.

In five billion years the sun will be gone. By then we're either outta the solar system or we'll be gone.
"We" will make no sense by then though. Because that will be a totally different species:

Species Relativity: You're An Amoeba

By the time we either leave Earth or die, humanity won't be anything like it's today.

By then those creatures will be so different that they will feel as close to "us" as you feel close to an amoeba.

Size Relativity: You'll Always Be Small

Size matters if being important is important to you.

But however big you get on this earth… It's still a laughable matter.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1Eh5BpSnBBw

Space Relativity: You'll Always Be Confined

In some corners of the universe, there might be some interplanetary merging of civilizations going on.

If we could watch them, we might realize that if some of them are as petty as we are, someone there might think they matter.

But of course, light travels slowly, so as we watch them… They're all already long dead -or extinct-. And they really thought they mattered.

We will never know anyway, because our "importance" is physically bound to very, very small regions of the universe.

And eventually, no matter what, the universe will die out and everything inside of it will go out with it:

Survival Relativity: On a Long Enough Timeline, We're All Dead

Freeman Dyson, who famously wrote a paper on life surviving in spite of all stars dying down, is much bleaker today.

Since the discovery that the universe's expansion is accelerating, he says that "it's a rather dismal situation in the long run".

Worry not though, we're all going to die much, much sooner than that.
This all means you're not that important, but let's what other positive mindsets we can have:

Better Alternatives to Being Important

Once you drop the need to be important, we don't want to slide into a nihilist world.
In *The Subtle Art of Not Giving a F*ck* Manson says he was slipping into such a mindset.

Then he realized that if there's no reason to do anything, there's also no reason not to do anything.

1. What Life Demands Of You

Viktor Frankl knows a thing or two about the meaning of life.

The survivor of five concentration camps and the founder of logos therapy, Frankl says in Man's Search For Meaning that it's not what you ask of life, but what life asks of you.

Frankl also says love and giving back to the world are great ways of finding meaning in life. I agree with that. And I personally believe life asks you to be the best man you can be, because:

2. You Do Matter

Don't let it get to your head but, between us, you do matter.

Not in the sense that people will remember you forever, but in the sense that you matter to the people around you. Today, right now. And tomorrow.
The lives you touch, the relationships you build.

You owe it to the people around you to be the best person you can be.

3. You're A Machine

Ray Dalio in his seminal book Principles proposes an interesting way of looking at yourself: from the above.

Look at yourself from the top down as if you were a machine.

I think this perspective can be very healthy in going for what you want without allowing emotions to sap your spirit or make you all haughty and mighty.

4. Your Goals Are Bigger Than You

Finally, even better than looking at yourself as a machine, I like the perspective Tony Robbins proposes: do it less for yourself and more for others.

That, he says, is the key to happiness.

Make your goals, and the people around you, bigger and more important than you are. That way you remove fears and social anxiety from the equation.
It's important, and you matter in many ways… But it's not about you anymore.

Being Unimportant Is Ultimate Power

By now you should have realized that this post is not about taking you or anyone else I mentioned down.

It's about removing the need of being special and important.

Removing the need for importance will take the pressure off and make you freer. And, ultimately, more powerful.

Paradoxically, the less you think you're important, the more important you will actually become to the people around you.

And once you take your own importance out of your way, you can finally start tackling what really matters in your life.

Summary

Once you get a growth mindset and make your identity antifragile, the last two steps are leveraging your mortality and leveraging your unimportance.

At this point, we can start tackling the hard social skills.

10 Warning Signs of Emotionally Unavailable Men (W/ Examples)

Emotionally unavailable men characteristics

This post will use quite a few examples from Michael Corleone, the main character of The Godfather.

The reason we use him is simple:

1. He is the archetype of emotional unavailability
2. There are a lot of easily available videos

So let's start with the main signs and characteristics of emotionally unavailable men:

#1. Business Above All

Business is important, and one can prioritize business and still be emotionally available.

But when a man can only talk about business, goals, or material achievements… That's a red flag of emotional unavailability.

Note: this can be simply a phase of life for some men (more details below).

When Michael Corleone first uttered the famous sentence "it's strictly business", that's when we knew his cold, emotionally unavailable side had taken over.

> It's not personal Sonny, it's strictly business

That's when we knew The Godfather had put a defensive layer between the world and his true, emotional self.

2. Stonewalling

Wikipedia defines stonewalling as "refusal to communicate and cooperate".

Stonewalling serves emotionally unavailable men to avoid emotionally difficult topics through silence, topic changes, leaving the room, or, in the most abusive men, lashing out in aggression.

Not all men avoiding intimate topics are emotionally unavailable, but it's an indicator.

Here is an example of stonewalling from the movie "Crazy, Stupid, Love":

3. All Logic And No Feelings

There's nothing wrong with rationality.

Rationality is great.
But when it's only rationality, always rationality, then it means it must crowd out something else.

That something often is emotions and feelings: there's no place left for them.

Dealing with a partner's heavy emotional moments only rationally and matter-of-factly is a big indicator of emotional distance.

Notice how Michael Corleone first deals with his sister and then with his wife.

Note: Rational conversation in the face of emotion and worry is also a losing strategy.
His wife will only feel more distant. And it's the worst possible moment for discussing rules and demands. It's not like she is likely to remember, obey and be happy with his "just one-time rule".

4. Physical Distance

Emotionally unavailable people sometimes carry their emotional distance into the physical realm.

It can become a vicious circle where the emotionally open partner, afraid of giving too much and of being spurned, shows less and less.
Until the partner who is in touch with her emotional side becomes emotionally starved, lonely and isolated.

Here are some signs:

- Avoiding hugs
- Patting on the back (a sign of distance)
- Never initiating hand-holding
- No caressing/cuddling
- Sitting at a distance
- Avoiding kisses

Notice here how detached the godfather's answers to his sister's emotional out-pour (he just gives her his hand):

5. Texts Over Face to Face

Long-distance communication medium feels safer to emotionally distant men.

Especially written and asynchronous communication.

When you notice a pattern where your relationship issues end up being discussed over text, that's a red flag.

6. Does Not Turn Towards

Turning towards is a concept that relationship researcher John Gottman first came up with.

People who deal with emotionally distant individuals are often worried about seeking fulfillment of their emotional needs too directly and too openly.

But the fact that they avoid too direct expressions of their emotional needs does not mean they still don't have them.

So they will drop hints though in the hope their partner will pick up on them and take the conversation deeper.
But those hints go always unnoticed.

So when you see yourself trying to broach important issues but you never end up discussing them.. You may now know why.
Your partner either does not understand your hints or does not have the emotional courage and vulnerability to act on them.

There is a name for this behavior in relationship literature, and it's called: turning away.

Notice Fredo here.
When he says "Mikey… I was mad at you", he wants to open up about his past, about his personal issues. He is hoping Michael will listen to him, forgive him, and welcome him.
But Michael soon moves into the business talk (and notices how disappointed Fredo is)

If the Godfather wanted to let Fredo open up he should have asked "you were mad at me.. ?" in a curious but un-judgmental tone. Fredo would have most likely opened up.

A common mistake would have been instead to ask "why were you mad at me", which sounds inquisitive and would push your partner to defend and backtrack.

7. Forced Calmness

Mirror neurons help us feel what the people around us are feeling.

So when we are very tense, the people around us tend to tense up as well.
And same goes for emotions.

When you're riding high on emotions or showing plenty of love to him, is he always stone-cold calm no matter what?

If so, that's an indicator he's out of tune with your feelings and might be emotionally unavailable.

Notice the difference between Kay, nervous, edgy, and breathing shallow, and Michael.
Total emotional unavailability:

8. Hot & Cold

Sometimes you will see relationships that seem to go well and move forward.

Then suddenly he disappears or “changes”.
Then he goes back to being good.
But you’re never sure, he always seems to teeter between amazing and open to cold and shifty.

This might be a positive sign as it shows he’s afraid of emotional commitment, but at least he’s capable of it.
But it’s still far from certain that he will eventually be fully open (or that it will happen with you).

This might be a case of an avoidant attachment style.
Also, read anxious-avoidant relationships.

Ashton Kutcher in the movie Spread is an emotionally unavailable philanderer. Until he meets his real love (but before that plenty of women never saw that emotional side) :

If the underlying issue is solved, these men can move beyond the emotionally unavailable stage. Unless:

9. Sudden Coldness

Narcissists individuals will often start relationships “pedal to the metal”.

You will feel like you are being swept off your feet and falling into an abyss of love.
But then he suddenly changes and becomes cold and distant.

Also, read:

- Signs you’re in a relationship with a sociopath

10. Anger to Cover Up More Vulnerable Emotions

Anger is an emotion, so it might seem like it’s the domain of emotional people.

However, anger can also serve as a mask to cover emotions that are more difficult to express.

You will recognize the difference when anger is used in situations where despair, tears, or sorrow would be more normal responses.

The Godfather finding out his wife has a miscarriage is such an example:

Curing Emotional Unavailability

Do emotionally unavailable men change?

Yes, that can be the case of course.
But that they can change does not mean they will.

Below are some common sources of emotional unavailability and how to cure them.

Personality Disorders

Sometimes emotional unavailability is the consequence of personality disorders such as narcissism or, even worst, sociopathy. In those cases, drop the relationship.

Cure:
No cure, just distance yourself. In the worst cases, you might want to do it cautiously too as some of these individuals can be dangerous and abusive.
Also, read:

- Signs of abusive relationships
- Ending a toxic relationship

- Should you break up? Diagnostic quiz

Protection Walls

In some cases, emotionally unavailable men hide their emotions to protect themselves.

It can be because of past heartbreaks, traumas, or because they're scared of falling in love with you.
Sometimes it's unconscious, some other times fully conscious.

Example: the last words of a woman I liked before she disappeared from my life a couple of years ago were "I need to protect myself". Albeit that was a woman and not a man, the mechanism is the same.
Stay distant and aloof and you won't get hurt.

Cure:
If you like each other and it's conscious, give them time and show them your love first.
The feeling that they're not alone in their emotions will reassure them that it's safer than they think. The more they feel safe in the relationship, the more they can lower their wall.
If it's unconscious or because of past traumas, it might require some therapy.

Masks of Masculinity

Men can act emotionally unavailable because they think that being distant, fully rational, or unemotional is how real men behave.

They either think it's what's expected of them or believe that's how the ideal man is.
Lewis Howes recently wrote a book about it and it's called The Mask of Masculinity.

Cure:
Knowledge, age, experience, and maturity usually cure the mask of masculinity.
It's difficult to accelerate this process from the outside, and some men might even never complete it.

Achievement First, Love Second

As Harvey righteously points out, some men need to achieve a certain goal or reach a certain financial stability before they can fully allow space for love, family, and relationships.

These men won't feel accomplished enough or "men enough" if first, they don't get that to that minimum base level. The base level varies for everyone.

Cure:
Achieving that minimum level of comfort or achievement will automatically free these men to love.

If they are far from their goal and playing second fiddle is too much for you, you might want to move on.

Otherwise, you can state a minimum love requirement and ride along with them -these are the beautiful relationships starting when he had nothing and reaching the top together-.

Beware also there are some men that never make space for relationships and never stop achieving. These men often have boundless drive and ambition.

Summary

Emotionally unavailable means he will either never open up to love you, or he will never show it. Which, we might argue, is almost the same.

It can be a conscious or unconscious choice; genetic or cultural; a phase of life or unchangeable.
Whatever the cause, it must change because there's no relationship without an emotional bond.

And the closer the relationship is, the more damaging a lack of emotional bond becomes.
Ultimately, Emotional unavailability hurts people and destroys relationships.

If you are in a relationship with an emotionally unavailable man, these are the steps I would recommend:

1. Assess if you're dealing with an emotionally unavailable man
2. Determine why it's happening
3. Determine if there's a solution
4. Ask yourself if you can or cannot deal with the consequences

And then you'll even have your answer if to work on it or move on.

Takeaways

- Men show love with Professing (introducing you as official), Protecting and Providing
- Men need your support, loyalty and sex
- Set your requirements, demands and needs early on

Notes

About the Author:
Steve Harvey is an American comedian, television host and public personality.

PART ONE: The Mind-Set of a Man

In the introduction, Steve Harvey says men are simple and they all think in a similar way.
He says that “Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man” is a playbook of sorts.

1. What Drives Men

Steve Harvey says men are simple. No matter where he’s currently at, there are three things that shape his identity and self-esteem:

- Who he is (his title)
- What he does (how he gets the title)
- The reward he gets (how much he makes)

A man must achieve a minimum in those three areas to feel like he is fulfilling his duties as a man.
Before he figures out how to achieve his minimum goals in those areas he will be too busy to focus on you (and on family & relationships).

2. Our Love Isn’t Like Your Love

Harvey says men and women love differently.

Women profess their love many times a day and will probably expect their men to do the same.
But men love in three ways instead, which the author dubs the “3 Ps”:

1. Profess

He will tell everyone you are his woman and he will introduce you with an official title.
Conversely, if he doesn’t take you out and you haven’t seen his family and friends, you’re not there to stay.

2. Provide

The more a man can provide, the more he feels like a man.
If he can’t provide, he doesn’t feel like a man.

That’s one of the reasons, Steve says, that poor men run away from their father’s duties: to escape their feelings of inadequacy.

Providing is not only monetary, but it’s also about helping to fix things, moving stuff, or solving problems.
And that’s why you need to make him feel like he’s providing for you (later chapter).

3. Protecting

When a man loves you, he will defend you and stand up for you.

He will defend you physically, from people who are disrespecting you and by doing things he deems too dangerous for you.

3. The Three Things Every Man Needs

Steve Harvey says a man needs three things:

1. Love

2. Loyal Support
3. Sex

Love means to make him feel like he's special, like he's a king.

Loyal support means that you will stand by his side no matter what happens.
Sex, well, Steve says men can only go a month without it. And if you start rationing out sex, he'll be looking for it elsewhere.

When a woman doesn't provide for these three things, the relationship is doomed.

4. Talking Differences

Steve Harvey says men are about purpose-driven talk and solutions.

Men rarely open up like women do, but they like fixing stuff for you.

For more on gender difference (generalizations) read:

- Men Are From Mars, Women From Venus

https://thepowermoves.com/men-mars-women-venus-summary
PART TWO: Why Men Do What They Do

5. First Things First

Harvey says again that men are simple, and if they come to talk to you, they like you.

When he comes, he has two things in mind:

1. If you will sleep with him
2. And if so, how much effort it will take

Now that you know, he says, let him know what's your price so that you won't waste any time.

6. Sports Fish VS Keepers

Steve Harvey says men divide women among women good for a night, and women good for long term.

My Note:
This is the basis of the Madonna/Whore dichotomy

The key, says Harvey, is that it's you who decides if you're disposable or if you're a keeper.
By being a high quality woman, by setting the bar high and by demanding and requiring proper behavior, you communicate that you're a keeper.

And here's how to recognize if he's looking for something serious or for quick fun:

- He picks up the bill (VS asking to split)
- Keeps his word and shows up on time
- Introduces you his friends
- Happy to meet your kids

For more details read:

- Is he wasting your time?

> Am I Wasting My Time On Him? Check These 7 Signs

7. Mama's Boys

Does your boyfriend put his mother above you?

That's not a good sign as you should be a team. Check the book on why that happens.

8. Why Men Cheat

Harvey says that men can have sex without emotions.
Which means he can love you and still cheat for the simple act of sex.

For more on cheating read:

- Why do people cheat

PART THREE: The Playbook

9. Get Some Standards

The author says men like women with standards.

However, Harvey warns the readers this does not mean you get on a man's face telling him what he must and must not do.
You need some tact and some good presentation for your requirements (indeed high initial demands are a sign of low quality).

10. The Five Key Question Every

Steve proposes you find out 5 things about him early on:

1. Long Term Plans: and how they fit into who he is, what he does, how much he makes
2. Short Terms Actions: is he acting on his plans?
3. Relationships: with his mother and God. How he feels about family and children
4. What He Thinks About You: you want details and examples (or he's not thinking long term)
5. How He Feels About You: you want to see deep feeling (missing you, feels great with you, loves you..)

One and two tells you if he's ready for something long term.
Number 3 tells you if he wants something long term.
Questions 4 and 5 come after you have been knowing him for a while.

These questions by themselves will also cause him to start seeing you in a different, and better light.

11. The Ninety Days Rule

The ninety day rule relates to sex, and you can imagine what it means.

My Note:
Making him wait for sex is a very common concept among women's dating advice books. I think 90 days is a bit too long, check my article on why you shouldn't let him wait for sex.
But if you must, read "how to delay sex effectively".

https://thepowermoves.com/how-to-reject-sex

12. Let Him Meet The Kids

If you have children, Harvey recommends you introduce them early on because you also want to check for compatibility between them.

13. Strong, Independent -and Lonely- Women

Harvey says that when a woman says she doesn't need any men, men cannot provide and protect, and they feel useless.

For a couple good articles on the subject, check:

- Successful women dating
- How to marry power and femininity

> Why Successful Women Fail At Dating (& How to Fix It)

14. How To Get The Ring

Harvey says the only reason why he is able to stall marriage is that she hasn't required him to set the date.

So you must make the ring a requirement for your continued relationship.

My Note: Use selective submissiveness and "in need" to get the commitment
See a real-life example here:

And read the full description here:

- How to make men want to invest and protect using selective submissiveness

15. The Full Harvey System: Timing & Negotiation

From the sequel book 'Straight Talk, No Chaser', the best takeaways are:

Assess Men's Psychology Based on Age

- 20's prioritize money over relationships: He is just beginning to get his bearings on life as an adult and just finding out about the three cornerstones of manhood. Steve says that men have a "financial clock" similar to a woman's "biological clock", and it starts in earnest in his 20's
- 30's: Getting Tired of Chasing Skirts: He is achieving some of his life goals and getting tired of chasing skirts. He starts grappling with the idea that he will not always be young and fit and starts seriously thinking about children's timelines. If he looks unhappy and still working hard, he might not be ready to commit yet. Check his behavior: If he has a lot of time for extra-work activities, then he also has time for a family.
- 40s: If He's Single, It's For A Reason: Feels good about his life and is in his prime, especially if he's a husband and a dad. But if he's single, he's single for a reason. He might be afraid of commitment, happy with the single life, or giving up on the idea of a family. If he's recently divorced, it's likely he'll be chasing skirts again for a while, and it might take him a few years to be ready for serious relationships again.
- 50's: Consolidating Legacies: Are looking to solidify their legacies and are a lot more open to having a woman around and growing old with her.

No Nagging

Harvey stresses how so many women do it wrong when they want their men to do something.

They use passive aggressiveness, silent treatment, or, worst of all, full-blown verbal aggression.

He says though that it's a question of priorities, and your man's priorities aren't necessarily the same as yours and you should understand that.
Of course, he'll do the dishes… But not right after eating maybe.

He says you should be more diplomatic and pick your battles and use more of the:

The Relationship Art of The Deal

The art of the deal is a sort of tit for tat.
You help him in what matters to him and he helps you in what matters for him.

Harvey advises that you start the conversation with an appreciation and ask him what you could do more for him. Once you agree on something you can do for him, then you ask him what he can do for you.

TPM Takeaways

Let Him Lead & Feel Important (don't overplay 'independence')

He will feel more like a man and he will like you more. Many men need to feel they provide and protect their women.

Men want women who make them feel important. Men want women who want men.
They don't want independent women or women who seek power in their relationship.

Avoid playing nasty power games

Good and quality men want collaborative and supportive women. So cut out nasty power games:

> 10 Nasty Games Women Play (Women, Stop These!)

Also read:

- How to make men want to invest and protect using selective submissiveness

Pick men who feel 'accomplished enough' for LTR

- A man needs a minimum level of achievement before he can fully give himself to relationships.

That's true and Harvey is the only one of all the women's dating books I read to stress that.

- P.S. Read more dating books written by men

Women advise other women to be strong and independent. But while that's good advice for empowerment, that's a covert manipulation to handicap the competition in dating, and it's not effective.

Clearly state your goals early on

I liked and agree with the concept that a woman should make clear, early but in a tactful way, what her final goals are (marriage or kids). And she should have a timeline.

That goes against what some other authors advise. But not putting your needs and demands early is, in my opinion, too big of a risk.

CONS

I think that Harvey is a much better person to learn from than most other female authors who write for other women.

But still, there are a few cons here:

- Dogmatic: men are not all the same

Steve Harvey purports to speak for all men.

For example, he writes:

> I cannot tell you the fulfillment we have in knowing that we've secured your time (…) it's all the affirmation we need

But that's not how I feel, for one.
And I'm not alone.

Why?
Because "Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man" is:

- Tailored Towards Providers Men

This book is tailored towards men who want (and need) to provide for their women.

Not all men are like that. Some men want women who are more equals and who can work for themselves.

You don't need to take my word for it: the most up-voted bad review on Amazon is exactly from that type of man.

Also read: "lovers VS providers" and "psychology of womanizers".

- Inductive Fallacy

To prove that sleeping with him before 90 days is a bad idea, Harvey asks where are all the men you've slept with before 90 days.

But that's an inductive fallacy and doesn't prove anything.
Most sexual relationships don't last forever, whether you slept with him after 900 days or 900 seconds.
Plus, women who are reading this book are likely looking for a man, which of course leads to almost all the readers answering positively -ie.: a trap question-.

Review

"Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man" shares valuable dating insights for women and several of his approaches are effective and well-calibrated.

Overview

- Abusive people prey on the weak: muster the capacity for aggression to protect yourself against abusers
- Don't let people -or your kids- mistreat you or embarrass you: it will breed resentment
- Tell the truth and stand up for your values: it will build an honorable character

Notes

About The Author:
Jordan Peterson is a Canadian clinical psychologist and professor of psychology at the University of Toronto.
He has risen to fame when he refused to use government-mandated pronouns and then successfully debated many left-leaning personalities. More recently, he became more openly political and leaning towards conservative and alt-right movements and, in part, for red-pill communities.
He is also the author of "Maps of Meaning" and the follow-up to this same book "Beyond Order 12 More Rules for Life".

See more more on Peterson's personal (d)evolution here:

#1. Stand Up Straight With Your Shoulders Back

The author says naive people have too rosy of an outlook on the world.

They believe people are mostly good, but they invite abuse because abusive people prey on the weak and naive. I agree with that.

Also, read:

- Alpha male body language

Aggression Can Be Good

Jordan Peterson says People who buy into the idea that any sign of aggression is wrong can end up with psychological issues.

These people try to block within themselves ALL aggressive emotions, and bottling up emotions need to come out some way.

Peterson says there can be good uses for aggression.
Aggression does not necessarily translate into cruelty and destruction. Aggression is also channeled into good causes.

Jordan says when people see themselves as dangerous (at least potentially) they're shocked at first, but their fear also decreases. And they develop more confidence and self-respect.

They see in themselves the ability to withstand aggression and evil. And tt that point, they might be able to begin resisting oppression.

> If you can bite, you often don't have to

My Note:
I have built The Power Moves partially out of anger, indeed.

See my speech about it:

Also, read "using pain and defeat for motivation" and this other speech on the dark side of motivation.

#2. Treat Yourself Like Someone You Are Responsible For Helping

Well, the title said it all for me here.

The rest of the chapter was some deep mental lucubration. Interesting, maybe.
But not highly applicable and loosely connected to the title at best.

#3. Make Friends with People Who Want the Best For You

Carlo Rogers says it's impossible to convince someone to change and improve.

The desire to improve is indeed a precondition for progress, says the author.
Peterson says it's a good thing, not a selfish thing, to choose people who are good for you, he says.

#4. Compare Yourself to Who You Were Yesterday, Not Who Someone Else Is Today

This is one of my favorite rules.

The author talks about the popular invisible gorilla experiment and says that our mental resources are limited to what we pay attention to (also see Incognito).
That means that we really see what we focus on.

And there's no point in focusing on people who "have it better".
Compare yourself to yourself instead. Compare yourself to how you're improving and getting better.

My Note:
Exceptions apply.
If you can find motivation in anger, then it can be OK to compare yourself to others as a tactical device.

#5. Do Not Let Your Children Do Anything that Makes You Dislike Them

The author says refraining from some parental tough love is only going to harm our children.

The world, he says, will dish out far harsher punishments on the unprepared.
Parents, Peterson says, must act as (caring) proxies for the world.

He also says no adult human could tolerate being dominated by an upstart child.
When you do that, you will harbor resentment which will lead to revenge either directly or indirectly. That's why you shouldn't allow your children to behave in a way that will make you dislike them.

> If you allow your own kids' behavior to repel you, imagine what it will do to others

#6. Set Your House in Perfect Order Before You Criticize the World

Setting your house in order means working on yourself before you think about anything else.

It means focusing on what you can change and what you can do, instead of wasting time on everything that's wrong.
I couldn't agree more.
As the 7 Habits of Highly Effective People say, start with yourself first.

My Note:
And this is one of the reasons why I don't recommend Greene's advice from "The 48 Laws of Power" of "seeking attention at all costs".

Seek improvement at all costs instead. Then, maybe, seek attention.

#7. Pursue What is Meaningful (Not What is Expedient)

Pursuing what's meaningful is to forego instant gratification to build a better future.

Today's sacrifice will forge your character and provide tomorrow's reward.

This is very true indeed.
The key to future success is today's habits of hard work.
And as Roy Baumeister explains in "Evil", a good chunk of the world's evil is the consequence of short-term thinking and shortcut-seeking.

#8. Tell the Truth, or at least Don't Lie

The easy way out or the truth is not just a different choice, but a wholly different path through life.

And lying is the easy way out.

Lying is a betrayal of yourself and it weakens your character. Especially when you say yes but really wanted to say no.

Learn how to say no:

> 5 Techniques to Say No (Polite, But Effective)

My note:
I agree with the weakening of character. And that's important because your identity becomes that of someone who can't speak his mind.
Read here how to build a resilient identity.

#9. Assume that the Person You Are Listening to Might Know Something You Don't

Speak more than you listen.

And listen without premature judgment.

My Note:
I would personally underline "premature". There is nothing inherently wrong with judging, and high-quality men and women do judge.
Don't judge too early, but don't otherwise get lost in a sea of relativity.

If you're interested in communication skills check the:

- Best communication skills books

#10. Be Precise in Your Speech

LOL, this is funny coming from Peterson.

The guy built his career on being precise with his speech and that's how he controls and wins most of his debates.

Being precise in your speech is not just about your words. It also means being precise in looking at the world around you.

Like Ray Dalio writes in his seminal book Principle: look at the world as it is, love reality even when it hurts.

#11. Do Not Bother Children when they are Skateboarding

The author says it's not true that gender is a social construct.

It's not, and it's not a debate because data proves it: genders are different.
And trying to culturally change that by removing masculine traits is bad for everyone.

Also, read:

- The Blank Slate
- The Female Brain
- The stupidity of the Swedish bathrooms

My Note:
I couldn't agree more here.
It's popular these days to say that "men and women are the same", but that doesn't make it any less wrong to anyone who has taken the time to research, study and analyze the world around him.

The Dark Side Calling

The author says that when softness becomes the only socially acceptable virtue, then dominance and violence start becoming unconsciously appealing.

This is, he says, one of the reasons for the rise of fascist political parties. And part of Trump's appeal (check Trump's dirty debating tactics).

> People have a great capacity for evil as much as good

#12. Pet a Cat When You Encounter One on the Street

In the last chapter, Peterson deals with the hard moments of life.

But abandoning oneself to nihilism and hatred is not the answer, he says.

There's nothing in nihilism, he says. It only perpetuates and spreads more evil and pain.

He proposes instead to look for the beauty in life.
Petting a cat stands for enjoying the sparkles of beauty that life has to offer.

Real-Life Applications

- Master Your Dark Side

Don’t hide or repress your dark side but use it for good. I like the way Tim Grover put it:

> To get what you really want, you first need to be who you really are.

- Channel Your Aggression

Don’t allow your aggression to dominate you or take ugly forms. Use it to stand up to evil, protect and foster good and for creative endeavors.

- Educate Your Children

Educate your children in a way that prepares them for the world. Importantly, don’t let them -or anyone else- disrespect you or that will breed resentment in you. And resentment will eventually show.

- Stand For What You Believe

Stand for what you believe in and don’t hide behind lies. It will build your character.

CONS

- Big words, could be simplified

Jordan Peterson own rule says to be precise in your speech.

Obviously, there’s a difference between precise and simple, because he certainly doesn’t have simple prose.

It doesn’t have to be a con, especially if you like poetry. But at times it feels to me like aesthetics get a bit out of hand to become the message instead of supporting the message.

- Diluted, could be briefer

There are some great insights that really spoke to me.

Some of them changed me for the better and even clarified this website's mission in a way.
I would have preferred the book to be built around those key insights instead of being just ingredients in the bigger dish.

PROS

- Great primer on self-development and power-awareness

There is much wisdom in The 12 Rules for Life.

And it's a type of wisdom that's rather unique and very rare in the self-help literature (see 'naive self-help').

That's a pity because this type of information is highly relevant and highly useful.

12 Rules For Life Criticism

Jordan Peterson is a controversial figure.

And his book was bound to be somewhat controversial.

I read the Financial Times' review and The Guardian's summary before reading the book.

And lo and behold, they were both scathingly negative and even derisive.

I didn't know Peterson well, and I let the reviews influence me negatively: I was indeed expecting 12 Rules for Life to be a terrible book.

Boy was that an awesome experience.

As I started listening to it, I was flabbergasted at how both reviewers spectacularly failed to see the sparkle of greatness.

And that's where I think those reviewers failed: they let the part they disagreed with contaminate the whole.

Big mistake.

There's indeed much of this book that can ruffle feathers if you're not religious -or if you prefer more fact-based, less aesthetic writing-.
But denying the nuggets of wisdom in 12 Rules for Life is a spectacular failure both as a reviewer and as a man looking for truth and self-development.

For me, The 12 Rules for Life is a book with some genius content mixed with too much aesthetic. Read below for more details.

Review

10 seconds review: "12 Rules for Life" has major Christian influences and a bit of a bombastic style. But it also has many sparkles of genius, several practical tips, and lots of great psychology.

There were some key passages that really struck a chord with me -and that are very similar to this website's credo and values-.

The first chapter of "12 Rules For Life" particularly spells out some of our core values.
Peterson says that some people are too naive and let the world take advantage of them. And that the ability to muster aggression is needed to stand up to evil.

Failing to do so, and failing to acknowledge the existence of evil, opens you up to oppression and abuse.

And this is exactly The Power Moves credo.

And the knowledge of how to master and deploy aggression will also decrease the chances it will ever be needed.
Because if you can bite, you generally don't have to.
And this is another pillar of this website.

The author then goes one step further when he says:

> There is little difference between the capacity for destruction and strength of character.

Let's dig deeper:

Part I: Paradigm and Principles

Covey says most people look for quick fixes.

They see a big success and want to know how he did it, believing (and hoping) they can do the same following a quick bullet list.

But real change, the author says, comes not from the outside in, but from the inside out. And the most fundamental way of changing yourself is through a paradigm shift.

That paradigm shift is a new way of looking at the world.
"The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People" presents an approach to effectiveness based on character and principles.

The first three habits indeed deal with yourself because it all starts with you.
The first three habits move you from dependence on the world to the independence of making your own world.

Habits 4, 5, and 6 are about people and relationships. They will move you from independence to interdependence. Such as, learning to cooperate to achieve more than you could have by yourself.

The last habit, habit number 7, focuses on continuous growth and improvement.

> The way we see the problem is the problem

Part II: Private Victory

Habit 1: Be Proactive

> You Create Your Reality: You're In Charge

Proactive is not what most people would think it is.

For Covey being proactive means exercising your power of choice between the stimulus you receive from the world and your response.
If you feel down, it's because you allowed the stimulus to bring you down.

The author quotes Viktor Frankl, author of Man's Search for Meaning when he says:

> Between stimulus and response there is a space. In that space is our power to choose our response. In our response > lies our growth and our freedom

This is also a major stoic philosophy pillar.

Focus On What You Can Control

Covey introduces the "circle of control" to represent all that we care about.

We can only influence a portion of what we care about, and that's what we should be focusing on.

Focusing on anything else means focusing on what the author calls "the circle of concerns".
Focusing on what we cannot control is a waste of time and energy. And often also spoils our mood because it takes the form of worrying and complaining.

Ironically, the more you focus on the things you can control, the more your abilities and skills improve. Which in turn will further enlarge your circle of influence.

To start mentally shifting your focus into the circle of influence the author suggests you stop using "if" sentences such as "if only I had…" and start using instead "be" sentences, such as "I can be more.."

Habit 2: Begin with the End in Mind

> Start Creating Your Reality

Beginning with the end in mind means being clear about who you want to be and where you want to go.

And then travel that path.

However, it runs deeper than Robert Greene's "plan all the way to the end" as described in "The 48 Laws of Power".

Habit two is based on imagination and on the idea that two different forms of creation exist: mental creation and physical creation.
The mental creation comes first, and the physical creation follows the mental one.

Covey says that if you are not clear about the mental creation of where you want to be you are the mercy of randomness and circumstances.

Personal End in Mind: Principles

Covey recommends that as much as you think about your life goals, you also think about who you want to be.

When you have that clear, you can draft principles and values in accordance with that person.

With your principles and values clear you will approach life and all the events in your life with a high level of clarity and confidence.

Aligning Life and Principles

To make sure your life goals and personal principles are aligned Covey recommends you write a personal mission statement.

The mission statement should answer the questions "who do you want to be and what you do want to accomplish".

This chapter reminded me of the auto-suggestion chapter in Think and Grow Rich, but better and without woo-woo.

> What do you want to be when you grow up?
> Decide and then become it.

Part III: Public Victory

Habit 3: Put First Things First

> Time Management is Life Management: Put Your Life Priorities First

Habit three is all about prioritization.

If you follow the steps of Habits 1 and 2 then you have your values and life goal very clear.
This means you know what are your priorities… And which are not.

Basically, your first and major prioritization is through the filter of your life goals.

Once you have a burning desire to become and do what you want your yeses will also clearly show what are your nos. That's the bedrock of prioritization.

The Time Quadrant

Covey introduces here the now-famous time quadrant.

To effectively manage your time you should spend most of your time on non-urgent and important tasks.

This way you will rarely have to deal with urgent and important tasks, which heighten your stress and often deliver sub-par results.

Habit 4: Think Win / Win

Covey says that win/win is a character-based approach to human interactions.

To achieve this level, you must first acquire three essential character traits:

1. Integrity (sticking with who you are: feelings, values)
2. Maturity (expressing your ideas and feelings with a balance of courage and consideration)

3. Abundance mentality (life is not zero-sum, there's plenty for all)

I particularly liked that the author stresses the importance of integrity in the sense of aligning yourself with your public actions.
That's indeed a great way to acquire personal confidence and self-esteem.

The author says most people think in terms of either/or: it's either you're nice (and a pushover) or you're tough (and get your own way).
This is what Brene Brown calls Viking or Victim mentality in Daring Greatly.
Maturity instead is that happy balance in between.
It requires you to be empathic and confident, considerate and brave, all at the same time.

Social Bank Account

Covey talks about human relationships in terms of emotional and human balance.

He says when you approach life with a win / win mindset, you always treat people well and you make deposits in your emotional bank.

If one day something goes wrong and you need a withdrawal, you can count on years of systematical balance surpluses.
And people will be happy to help you.

This theory reflects the view of social interactions as exchanges, with which I agree with.
And it also reflects much of this website's foundational laws of power.
See:

- The 9 irrefutable laws of Power
- Mix power with warmth

Other Interaction Scenarios

These are all subpar approaches:

1. Win / Lose (egoistical and authoritarian)
2. Lose / Win (too nice and pushover)
3. Lose / Lose (when two Win / Lose butt heads)

Habit 5: Seek First to Understand, Then to Be Understood

Covey says that communication is the most important skill in life.

And we are all heavily under-trained in listening. Indeed, very few people even listen at all.
This is a pity because the foundation of influencing people is to first understand people.

If you need some help, check out the best communication skills books.

Covey says there are four levels of listening:

1. Ignoring
2. Pretending to listen
3. Attentive listening
4. Empathic listening

Even most good listeners stop at the third level of attentive listening.
Attentive listening entails the following:

- Evaluating: judge and then agree or disagree
- Probing: ask questions from your own frame of reference
- Advising: advising based on own frame of reference
- Interpreting: interpreting his action and feelings based on his own frame of reference

Empathic Listening

Empathic listening is about removing your own frame of reference as much as possible.

Empathic listeners look at people's body language, tone of voice, and nonverbal gestures.

Ultimately empathic listening means putting yourself in their shoes and feeling what they're feeling.

This is key because before people can move to solutions they need to feel you understand them.

To be understood the author advises not to start and communicate with just logic but to explain where you're coming from emotionally as well.

My Note: True, emotions should be part of the solution
I agree. Trying to completely take emotions away might seem "stronger" but ultimately destroys relationships.

Further reading
Dale Carnegie proposes the same approach in How To Win Friends and Influence People. And if you want to read practical applications in conversations I recommend the books Crucial Conversations and Difficult Conversations. Or check all my summaries on communication.

Habit 6: Synergize

> A Team is Stronger Than an Individual

The idea of synergizing is that the whole of a well-functioning team is greater than the mere sum of its part.

The key to an effective group synergy, says the author, is to really value the differences among us.
So ask yourself: do you want to be right, or do you want everyone to agree?
Learn to embrace differences as a strength instead.

Synergy also entails "flow" and perfect group automation as if the group was functioning as one. That's when you achieve top results.

Part IV: Renewal

Habit 7: Sharpen the Saw

> Take Care of Your Greatest Asset: Yourself

No habits in the world will take you far unless you preserve, take care of, and keep improving yourself.

Covey recommends you focus on the four major dimensions of your life:

- Physical: exercise, nutrition, and rest
- Social/Emotional: meaningful human connections (see "how to bond and connect")
- Mental: learning, visualizing, acquiring new knowledge
- Spiritual: art, meditation, music, time in nature, prayer, and service

He says it's important you commit some time to each dimension. And he's right.

Real-Life Applications

Remember You Have The Ultimate Trump Card
Nobody can make you feel bad if you don't allow them. Your mind is yours, you wield the ultimate power.

Build Your Future (You)
Think about the (wo)man you want to be and what you want to have. And then forge your path to get there. On the way, keep your eyes on the ball. Meaning:

Prioritize What Matters To You
Do and spend time on the things you care for and that will lead you to where you want to be. Don't allow circumstances to sidetrack you.

Do you really like what you're doing? Is what you're doing taking you where you want to be?

If not, change.

CONS

Some Key Mindsets Missing
The 7 Habits of Highly Successful People is so successful that I'm afraid some people might not read anything else.

And in all its greatness, it's also missing a few key mindsets for self-development. A growth mindset, for example, is a key element missing (check here how to develop a growth mindset)

Review

"The 7 Habits of Highly Successful People" is a fantastic book.

I might even go as far as saying that it's a must-read.

The last thing I'd like you to notice is that Stephen Covey says even today, more than a decade after he wrote the book, still struggles with the principles.
It's a constant practice, he says.
The better you get, the more you realize you can do even better.

Bullet Summary

- You can only lead when you are the most respected person in the group
- Your leadership skills are the upper bound of your team's effectiveness
- People buy leaders first, and only after, maybe, they'll buy into visions
- Leaders put their people first

Full Summary

About the Author:
John Maxwell is an American pastor, author, and speaker.
He is also the author of "25 Ways You Win With People".

Introduction

To get the most out of the 21 laws of leadership you must first understand that the rules can be learned.
And if you didn't know that, you need to develop a growth mindset first thing-.

#1 – THE LAW OF THE LID

> Your level of leadership is your level of effectiveness

The law of the lid says that if you are at level 8 on a leadership scale, 8 is also your maximum effectiveness.

Maxwell gives the example of the McDonald's franchise.
Ray Kroc controversially introduced himself as the founder of the company. But he wasn't the founder, he bought the company.

Maxwell says that the previous owners of McDonald's had lower leadership abilities than Kroc and that's why they couldn't maximize the company's potential.

My Note:
I'm not sure the story in the example is really connected to leadership. I feel Kroc was probably more well-versed in business systems.

I enjoyed the example of a buy-out firm.
The firm management would always fire the leaders of the organization they bought. Of course, says Maxwell, that makes sense. An organization is always intrinsically limited by the ability of its leaders.

My Note:
it reminded me of Extreme Ownership when the authors say: there are no bad teams, only bad leaders.

#2 – THE LAW OF INFLUENCE

> The proof of leadership is in the followers

A leadership title does not make one a leader, says Maxwell.

Leadership must be earned through the people that want to follow you.
The final proof of leadership is in the followers.

> The true measure of leadership is influence. Nothing more, nothing less

#3 – THE LAW OF PROCESS

> Leadership develops daily, not in a day

Your agenda today determines the type of leader you will be tomorrow.

Nobody likes to be lead by someone who is stagnant over time.

You need to grow over time -and make the people around you grow over time-.

#4 – THE LAW OF NAVIGATION

> Leaders chart the course

You can't get anywhere without a destination.
Good leaders have a clear vision of where they're going and they craft a map accordingly.

#5 – THE LAW OF ADDITION

> Leaders add value by serving others

Maxwell says we become valuable when we provide value to others.

Maxwell stresses here the importance of providing value not just materially, but also at an interpersonal level (also read The Social Exchange Theory).

Knowing who the people are, what they care about, and what are their goals and dreams.
And assisting them along their way. Successful leaders also provide value by giving credit to the team.

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

Leaders Speak Last

Maxwell says that positional leaders are quick to speak.
But the successful leaders speak last.

And you will recognize the leaders because when you make a question everyone will look at them.

#6 – THE LAW OF SOLID GROUND

> Leadership is builds upon foundations of trust

Maxwell says that leaders earn trust and respect by putting what's best for the organization and the followers ahead of what's best for themselves.

It's important you keep your standards up because you cannot break trust and keep influencing people.

#7 – THE LAW OF RESPECT

> You can only lead when you're the strongest of the bunch

Strongest does not refer to muscles.

Strongest means that people respect you the most.
And when people don't respect you anymore, your legitimacy as a leader also dissolves.

#8 – THE LAW OF INTUITION

Maxwell says the most successful leaders don't need to spend hours on all the facts and details.

They develop intuition.

My note:
This isn't really intuition, this is most of all experience.
With experience, we learn what's important and what's not important, so we can only focus on that 15% of information that will give us 90% of confidence.

#9 – THE LAW OF MAGNETISM

> Birds of a feather flock together

You will attract people who are like you.

People who work with you are not a consequence of HR or your company's

If you're not happy with the people around you, look within yourself first. Like the 7 Habits of Highly Effective People say: real change is from within.

#10 – THE LAW OF CONNECTION

> You can't move to action unless you first move their hearts

Some leaders have an issue with the responsibility of the leadership to connect with the team.

They think they're the leaders, so it's up to others to step up to their plate.

But successful leaders take it upon themselves to build relationships and connect emotionally.

#11 – THE LAW OF THE INNER CIRCLE

> You are the average of the people you spend the most time with

Surround yourself with great people.

#12 – THE LAW OF EMPOWERMENT

> Secure leaders empower others

Scared and weak leaders, like Henry Ford, actually was, don't want great men around them because they feel intimidated.

They prefer weak people, so they can feel strong and validated -and likely, they have a fixed mindset-.

Developing others and giving them responsibility is not only good for the people you empower but also for yourself.

> The more you empower, the more powerful you become

#13 – THE LAW OF THE PICTURE

> One example is worth a thousand pictures

Maxwell famously says that "people do what people see".
Show with your actions what the right course of action is, not with your words.

#14 – THE LAW OF BUY-IN

> People buy leaders, then visions

You cannot separate a leader from the cause he champions.

People don't follow worthy causes first, they follow worthy leaders who promote worthy causes (and sometimes, as history teaches, unworthy causes too).

#15 – THE LAW OF VICTORY

> Leaders find a way to win

Maxwell says that the best leaders share an unwillingness to accept defeat. And they keep going until they find a way to win.

#16 – THE LAW OF THE BIG MO

> Trend is your friend

The only way to change inertia and a negative spirit is to get going. Get some momentum on your side and no obstacle is too big to overcome.

#17 – THE LAW OF PRIORITIES

> Activity is not accomplishment

Busy work is a waste of time and resources. Leaders put first things first.

#18 – THE LAW OF SACRIFICE

> To go up you have to give up

Leadership does come with certain perks but also comes with responsibilities and sacrifices.

Similar to the message Simon Sinek shares in Leader Eat Last, Maxwell says that leadership means putting others ahead of yourself.

#19 – THE LAW OF TIMING

> Success comes from the right action at the right time

Master the art of timing, says the 35th law of power. Similarly, leaders must learn when it's time to lead.

#20 – THE LAW OF EXPLOSIVE GROWTH

> Lead follower for linear growth; lead leader for exponential growth

To nurture leaders and set off explosive growth, focus on the top 20%,

#21 – THE LAW OF LEGACY

> Time is the ultimate test of leadership

Great leaders make sure to leave behind capable organizations and teams that will thrive even after long they have gone.

Real-Life Applications

Pick Your Leaders
Refuse to work for people or bosses who are not above you on the leadership scale. Don't waste your time working for people whom you don't trust. It really takes away a lot of joy from your life.

CONS

List Format
List format, bullet points, "laws" or "hacks" always make me fear "attention seeking".

This was not the case, the book is great.

But I think Maxwell could have reached even more people if he had chosen a different format.

Unscientific
The laws are great.
But they're not grounded in science.

The Millionaire Mind: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Millionaire Mind surveys more than 1.300 mostly self-made millionaires, based on Thomas Stanley's large-scale research into affluent households to understand how they think, what they do, and what they did to achieve what they achieved.

TPM Strategic Takeaway: The millionaire mind is positively calculative and strategic
Many of these traits (social skills, discipline, spouse selection) are part of the basics of what we teach here, including smart cooperation, reading people, and effective calculativeness.

Bullet Summary

- Social skills, discipline, and courage are the most important personal traits
- Passion and love for what you do is paramount
- Saving and a good life partner are major factors

Summary

The biggest benefit of being a millionaire is to live free and happy. Free from debt, bad bosses, and making ends meet. And loving because they love what they do.

1. Hoesty, Discipline, & Social Skills

Stanley asked the millionaires to rank 30 different success factors.
The top three were:

1. Honesty
2. Discipline
3. Social Skills

As a website focusing on social skills, I was not surprised. 94% of the millionaires said that getting along with people is one of the most important factors in getting rich.

TPM Note: Good social skills include POWER skills
Most successful, attractive, and high-value men aren't just socially skilled in the sense of being liked, they're socially skilled in the sense of gaining status, respect, and attraction. They were good at competing and winning, achieving goals, and influencing others.
It's not just being liked, but being competent (see: communion vs agency).

Learn more:

- Laws of social success

> The 5 Laws of Social Success: Smart Power, For Smart Cooperation

2. Poor Grades Didn't Hold Them Back

Stanley says a majority of millionaires did not attribute their success to either university or grades.
Indeed many millionaires were rather average. And they were judged as not good or smart enough to get into the top schools and professions.

My Note:
Don't diss school though. Keep in mind that 90% of them had a degree. You could easily wonder how many of them would have become a millionaire without that degree.
A degree is not just a piece of paper and classroom knowledge. It's also an opportunity to live on your own, socialize, date, and make a defining life experience.

But many of those millionaires used the judgment to fuel their own ambitions and hunger.
Indeed the harsh judgment drove them to prove the opposite. They became good with people, they hunted for opportunities and they built a strong work discipline.

My Note: Mental empowerment is key
Basically, they didn't let the system and others tell them what they could or could not achieve. This is the foundation of an empowered mind.

> Top grades are the beaten path. The millionaire mind challenges that

Read:

- Confidence University
- Healthy grandiosity

3. Smart Risk Taking

Of course, all of them said that to accumulate wealth you need to take risks.
Some key mindsets:

- Overcoming fear
- Believing in yourself
- Keep working at it and confidence will come

Employee is also risky

Millionaires have the mindset that being an employee is the riskiest position of all. You can get fired at any time, and you have a ceiling on how much you can earn.

Note: this isn't true in some parts of the world where employee protection are high

Invest in the Business

Everybody talks about investing in the stock market, passive income, and compound interest. But millionaires focus on building a business instead.
This is the same mindset that DeMarco espouses in The Millionaire Fastlane.

> 9 to 5 is the biggest risk

4. Do What You Love (Vocation, Vocation, Vocation)

This chapter of The Millionaire Mind can easily be summarized as: do what you love.

There's a strong relationship between how much you love what you do, how much you work on it, and how good at it you become.

Don't think that your passion necessarily comes from some lofty goals. Love comes from continuous effort and the deepening of skills.

Getting good at spotting opportunities, wherever they come from, is also something one could be passionate about. Millionaires indeed are happy in launching car washes or truck spare parts businesses.

To find your vocation, Stanley recommends you try many different things before you eventually stick with one.

5. Pick a Good Partner

90% of married millionaires say their spouse has been instrumental to their success.

These guys are, as you would expect, very careful when choosing mates.
However, most of them mentioned the most stereotypical reason you would expect: love. Attractiveness and common interests were also important.

Among character traits, they appreciated:

- self-worth
- integrity
- compassion
- honesty

6. Keep Expenses Low

Millionaires budget and spend carefully.

For example, they buy products in bulk, fix their shoes instead of buying new ones, use coupons, etc.

However, they are not the Scrooge McDuck type of men (of course: you don't get rich wasting time).

They are frugal but not DIY maniacs. They were aware of the opportunity cost of doing menial tasks. So they hire and outsource to focus on what they are actually good at and what makes them the most money.

This is similar to The Millionaire Next Door, which Stanley co-authored.

7. Buy Real Estate Smart

Millionaires present a few common tendencies when buying a house. They:

1. Don't pay the initial ask price
2. Take time scouting for good options (foreclosures, divorce sales, etc.)
3. Don't build from scratch (73% never had a custom-built home and 80% never had a spec house)
4. Only buy what they can afford (if their income were cut 50%, they could still afford it)

Basically, it's the same concept of being frugal applied to real estate investments.

8. Live a Simple Lifestyle

Stanley says that the millionaires he surveyed don't spend money to have fun. They don't do crazy holidays, splurge on super-cars or go on exotic vacations.
They bootstrap for business ventures instead of borrowing and, on average, attend religious activities.

Real-Life Applications

Use Harsh Judgement as Fuel
Most millionaires were not slated for success by the system, school, or the world. But they used that as fuel to get great. That's the biggest takeaway for me.

Do What You Love… But also what you're good at!
Doing what you love often works because love often follows competence, not the other way around. Ensure that what you love you is also what you can be good at.

CONS

Biased Survey
A survey of all the successful people is, by its nature, incomplete. There are probably people who behave the exact same way as these guys but did not succeed.

Nassim Taleb in Fooled by Randomness criticizes this approach to studying wealth as survivorship bias: risk-taking also produces many failures, but those are invisible in millionaire-only samples.

Spending Money for Fun & Experiences Makes Life Worth Living
The idea that one should not spend money for "fun" is dangerous to me. Studies show that people spending on experiences have a happier and more meaningful life.
Foregoing holidays, traveling, and trying new things make for a poorer life.

Review

The Millionaire Mind is a good analysis of how wealthy individuals think and behave.

It shares some concepts with Rich Dad Poor Dad when it comes to real estate investment, The Millionaire Fastlane when it comes to business vs employee mindset, and The Millionaire Next Door when it comes to frugality.

Why Making Men Wait for Sex Backfires With High-Value Men (Dating Psychology Explained)

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Are you being subjected to the common "make him wait for sex" tactic?

Are you unsure if she's waiting because she's high-value, or if she's simply playing a low-value, manipulative game?

You've come to the right place for clarity.

"Make him wait for sex" is one of the most common—and misleading—pieces of dating advice women get.

But here's the reality: while that tactic may keep low-quality men chasing, it often backfires with high-value men who have options, standards, and self-respect.

What The Dating Advice Says

> Let him wait for sex.

It's the battle cry that all the dating best sellers for women chant in unison.

It's a long list with the same message, but here are some of the most popular ones:

- Reddit's Female Dating Strategies
- Ignore The Guy, Get The Guy
- Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man
- F*ck Him (yep, even that one tells you to wait)
- …

King suggests 60 days minimum; Lambert says get a relationship before sex; Harvey has a 90 days rule; some other authors go indefinite with "as long as you can".

Heck, even the gold-digger guide says to never have sex with him!

So…

Why make him wait?

Advantages For Women

The concept of "waiting" is largely based on this assumption:

Men want quick sex and women want relationships.

And, albeit it's a generalization, it's true that on average men seek more hookups.

So when you give quick sex, most guides say, men get what they want and have less interest in sticking around. And plus, some authors say, men despise "easy" women.

Letting him wait for sex supposedly does the following great things for you both:

What Waiting Does For You

1. Protects your feelings (women bond more than men through sex)
2. Filters for serious men (theory being that players and fuckboys won't wait, which is often true)
3. Keeps you in control (he's like the dog waiting for the treat, which is also a potential con if you stress the "power" part)

Some also believe that waiting for sex increases the odds of a relationship.
However, I'm not convinced at all about that and have seen no good logic, data, or real-life examples to back it up, so we'll discard that.

Still, these are some big advantages of waiting.
So the approach is not to be discarded but, rather, "refined".

What Waiting Does For Him

1. He sees you as "serious" long-term material (based on the Madonna-Whore Dichotomy)
2. The more he invests during the waiting time, the more likely he stays after sex (and rationalizes he must like you, a process called "sense-making" in psychology)

Advantages for Dating Strategies

The advice of letting him invest works well on paper.

It is founded on solid psychological principles and in some environments and situations, it might indeed be the best way to go (more on it later).

Here is the science behind the advice of letting him wait to sleep with you:

1. He Likes You Because You're Scarce

It's true that people value what's scarce.

Especially when it's scarce because of high demand from others (scarcity principle, Cialdini).
This is a general rule that few human beings escape.

2. He Appreciates You Because He Invests

Several studies show this seeming conundrum:

We appreciate more people for whom we invest in, than the people who invest in us.

Cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1985) plays a role here. Such as, people often back-rationalize based on their actions (also see Aronson, 1972).
In simple words, he (unconsciously) thinks:

> I am investing in her and sticking around even without getting the ultimate prize… Then it means she must really be valuable and I must really like her.

In that sense, the more he invests without payoff, the more he values you.

3. You Look More "Good Girl"

Many (most?) men think along the Madonna/Whore Dichotomy.

Such as, they divide women into "easy girls" -the whores- and "good girls -the Madonnas-.

And they seek whores for quick or kinky sex and seek Madonnas for long-term pair bonding.

The Madonna/whore dichotomy even affects most men who say they are not affected by it.

So in that sense, not getting too wild, too soon, might help you to stay away from the whore side of the dichotomy.

However, there is a potential pitfall to it.
The pitfall is the exact same as the positive one: he will see you as the good, "serious" girl.

Many a man pay prostitutes because they have a mindset that they "can't do that with their wives".

Not good.
Ideally, you want a man who sees you for who you really are. A woman with her own defects, needs, and sexuality.

4. You Gain Bargaining Power

We could argue that "having power" might not be the best approach to a relationship.

But still, power dynamics affect any relationship, even the most collaborative ones.

And if we embrace the theory of sex as an arms race between genders, then holding onto the sex card will give you more bargaining power indeed.

I'm not a big fan of the power argument, though.
And not on the ground of morality, but of simple long-term effectiveness.
Because if your main power is sex, then you lose all your power the moment you "give" sex.

And I'm sure you'd agree when I say that you don't want to be the lady whose only allure is sex.

So... Why Not Always Wait, Then?

Alright.

So there are many reasons why letting him wait to sleep with you is good.

Why do I tell you to also consider a different approach, then?

Because the strategy, like almost any other social strategy, is not universal.

So the most important questions become:

1. When does it work?
2. Who does it work with?

Let's see.

When Waiting Works...

The approach of "letting him wait" works in:

1. It Works In Conservative Cultures

In cultures where waiting is the norm, wait.

You can't go wrong by giving men the waiting time they expect -or even want, sometimes-.

2. It Works When Men Outnumber Women

However, how about more libertine places, which include most of the West?

We make a long dissertation on the economics of sex here:

- How to date effectively: a scientific guide

But here's the short of it:

When there are more men than women, the culture and the dating dynamics shift towards a romantic, courtship style of dating with men wooing women over the long haul.

That means that when (high-quality) women are scarce, you should let him wait.

But when there are more women than men, the culture devolves into more of a hookup culture.
Exceptions always apply of course, but generally speaking, in highly libertine cultures, many men aren't ready, prepared, and willing to do the long-courtship thing.

Even men looking for relationships tend to end up with women who contribute and "help them" along the dating process.
In "difficult markets", the most successful women focus on moving forward together instead of "getting as much as possible" while giving as little as possible.

That means that when (high-quality) women are abundant, waiting games are more likely to backfire.

You should know that in our current environment, especially in the West, high-quality women (far) outstrip high-quality men.

Also, read:

- Successful women dating

> Why Successful Women Fail At Dating (& How to Fix It)

3. It Works With Average Guys

The problem with "letting him wait" is this:

It can create major imbalances of power and value exchanges (i.e.: in the give-and-take, you may end up taking more than giving)

Of course, it doesn't have to.
For example, if both are happy to wait or if she wants to wait and he's cool with it, then waiting is a win-win.
But the way I've seen more coaches and resources advise on waiting for sex, it does create imbalances.

So unless you take steps to rebalance things, what happens is that he invests time, money, and effort while you receive and (calculatingly) withhold the sex.

Who do you think is going to stick around with a sucker's deal?

Millionaires globetrotting the world?
Entrepreneurs building companies?
Driven men too busy to make their dreams a reality?

Usually not.
Higher-quality men demand at least a balance of give and take (Equity Theory of Love).

Even "normal" guys who are just moderately power-aware won't be happy with that deal and might as likely walk away.

But worry not, lower-value men, optionless men, and clueless men will be more than happy to provide and wait for some P.

These are the guys most likely to be OK with the short-changing tactics of letting him wait for as long as possible.

Here's an example from "Crazy, Stupid, Love", a scene that always makes me smile:

It's the average man who "thinks he did everything right" and was happy to wait.
The cool guy knew better.

Some of the authors do understand the principle, albeit they don't apply it.
Kara King, one of the biggest proponents of delayed sex and high investment, writes in The Power of The Pussy (I paraphrase):

> It's a clear sign you should break up with a guy when you invest a lot in him while he doesn't invest in you

I wonder why then she expects men to accept the same?
Indeed the same author a few pages later says you should "lower your expectations".
Why?
Because she says:

> "a perfect 10" would never open the door for you or do all the nice things for you.

Bingo!
So if a perfect 10 would never invest too much, who would?
Exactly!

If you focus on controlling men… You get easy-to-control men (not cream of the crop)
In short:

The bad men will stick around.
And the best ones…

When Waiting Backfires

First off, a reminder:

We are talking here about the more "game-y", power move version of "let him wait".
If he's happy to wait and/or if you frame it and implement it as a win-win, then it must not be an issue.

However, the more disempowering for him waiting becomes, the more it becomes an issue under these conditions:

1. Doesn't Work in Difficult Markets

We can define "difficult markets" as:

> Sexual market places with an abundance of great women and not many great guys.

Jon Birger in Date-onomics makes a good case that most women with a degree in the west are in difficult markets simply because there aren't that many well-educated men.

When good female prospects outnumber men, men tend to become more promiscuous and expect early sex as part of the deal.
Most women might recoil in disgust here, and I get you. I would react the exact same way.

However, that doesn't make it any less true. And as Ray Dalio says, we can all only gain from looking at reality as it is.

And the reality is that if there are more equally great women available, it's fair to expect some of them will sleep with him sooner and some will sleep with him later.

And who do you think he is more likely to end up in a relationship with?
It's the woman he is having sex with, of course.

Also, read:

- Easy VS difficult sexual marketplaces

> Global Intersexual Dynamics: Where Dating Is Easy (or Hard)

Now on the next biggest issue with long waiting times:

2. Doesn't Work With Many High(er)-Value Men

Sure, there are plenty of high-value men who don't need or request early sex.

HOWEVER…

The waiting must not be framed and implemented as a win for her, and a loss for him.

The law of social exchange says that no healthy relationship can stay out of balance for too long.

Eventually, you have to reach an equilibrium.

See where I'm going?

If the guy you're seeing has very little to offer compared to you, he'll invest a lot.
And wait.

Because he needs to make up for that imbalance.

But of course, women prefer guys who are "better".

And high-quality men are least likely to accept an unbalanced relationship with a "taker".

With higher-value guys and/or same-value guys, you should aim more for a balance.

Bruce Bryan of Never Chase Men Again is one of the few authors of women's dating books who gets this point.
He says:

> High quality men have little tolerance for egocentric women.
> Asking for the moon will not make you sound like a prize but like an entitled princess on a pea
> -from "Never Chase Men Again"

And entitlement is a typical trait of low-quality women.

Smart men know how to treat you based on who you are and how much they like you, says Bryan.
And he adds that men with a backbone are annoyed when you need to remind them.

Bryan is right.

And indeed, those men with a backbone will flee if all you do is demand, without giving.
And withholding sex as a bargaining chip is part and parcel of that mentality of "get without giving".

Top 1% Men Don't Accept Suckers' Trades

One other issue with the "waiting game" is exactly that: the "game" part of the equation.

Unluckily, that's exactly how all the dating resources I stumbled upon approach it.
Waiting is always a game to gain power, leverage, or, at least, as a chip to get his commitment.

Now don't get me wrong, some games are good and helpful.
But the waiting game to gain power is a win-lose type of game.

And the highest-value men are not cool with being the suckers in a lose-win exchange.
That's just basic power dynamics: top men didn't reach the top by being suckers.

So if you want to wait, you must at all costs avoid framing your waiting for sex in a way that comes across as win-lose (win for you, lose for him).
Ideally, you'd even frame it as a win-win.
It's possible, and we also teach that here.

Smart Men Know There Is Little Link Between "Waiting Time" and "Chastity"

Experienced or more socially aware guys know better.

They know the relation between "slow to sex" and "Madonna" has more holes than an Italian mama colander.

They know some of the quickest sex happens with inexperienced women and women without second motives -women who don't play games-.

And when they see a girl who's otherwise been around putting the breaks on them, they'll think:

> Experienced Man Thinking: She's sampled around, she's probably had a few lusty encounters… And now she wants to put me under the yoke and pretend she's a good gal?

And while some might be OK with that, some others will resent you.
And may even plot to wait until sex, and then drop you.

See Samantha's comment on guys disappearing after 10th date sex.

Some other guys might see through it, but for whatever reason still accept it.
Exceptions always exist, after all.
But you don't make the rule with the exceptions.
And the rule of sexual bargaining is that if you frame the wait as a hoop he must jump though, you can only make him wait if he is lower sexual market value.
And… why would you wanna be with a lower-value man?

3. Doesn't Work With Men Who Value Sex & Sexual Chemistry

Here's another possible issue with waiting:

Waiting for sex can sub-communicate low chemistry.

Matthew Hussey in Get The Guy writes that sex should happen after an emotional connection has taken place -albeit he adds that's unlikely to happen on a first date-.

And then he says:

> Waiting too long is a mistake because he will feel like he's not important to you sexually.
> And men do get their validation through sex

For many men, that's true.

And with those types of men, the longer you wait, the more you communicate that you're not so attracted to him. When you wait too long for sex, unless you're very skilled at maintaining romance and attraction, your relationship can easily resemble more of a friendship.

And that's not really a dream start, is it?

Then one day a seductress looks at him with lusty eyes he may start to wonder… "Damn! Wouldn't it be nice if my partner felt the same about me?"

4. Doesn't Work When Other Women Have Early Sex

This entry is a subset of "difficult markets".

Now ask yourself:

Why do almost all women tell other women to wait?

Well, in many cases, it's because they have their best interest in mind and it's solid advice and well-meaning.
But in some other cases, women tell other women to wait as a (subconscious) *manipulation.

It's intra-sexual manipulation to lead the competition astray to gain at an individual and personal level.

Such as:

> I tell other women to wait, while I have sex with the guy and lock him in.

Why would a woman gain doing that?
Because, at parity with everything else, this is the general rule:

Men are far more likely to pair up with the woman they're having sex with than with the woman they're NOT having sex with

It just makes sense, no?

So if he's seeing two women, chances are higher that the woman who moves the slowest will be passed up for the woman with whom he's having sex.

Game theory shows this concept as well, with the more forward women getting the guy first.

And it seems logical as well.
It's a simple law of momentum and the path of least resistance.

Think about it this way:

He can meet one woman and he needs to court her, take her out, bring flowers, and pursue her, and then… Then nothing, he goes home and she goes to hers.

Or he can meet another woman, enjoy sex, cook a meal together, watch a movie in bed, and be his real self (because men are always more natural and relaxed when sex has already happened).

As you can see, it's not even all about sex.
Earlier sexual intimacy just makes dating easier -and more pleasurable- even beyond sex.

Who do you he is more likely to end up in a relationship with?

At parity of value and at parity with his personal preference, he will keep seeing the woman he is sleeping with.

And you can check out my own example from my last relationship.

The Quality-Woman Approach

Now a note:

Don't get this article wrong.

The premise is always to respect yourself, never feel rushed or forced and that, whenever you're not comfortable with having sex, by all means, don't do it.

Furthermore, making him wait is also an effective strategy at the right time, with the right man, and when well executed.
And it's also possible to make it work in more challenging circumstances.

As a matter of fact, in some cases, waiting can be the sign of a girlfriend-quality woman, and if it's honest, then it's also an honest and reliable signal.

However, you want to be strategic in your approach whenever not having sex can lead to losing a man you like. Because it's easy to get this wrong, even when well-meaning.

To begin with, what you need to avoid:

1. Don't Frame It As A Power-Thing

Such as:

Don't frame sex as a bargaining chip to ask for his investment (ie. some sort of "sex only in 3 months, if you prove yourself to me").

Because that only works with men who are lower quality than you are.

But Frame It This Way:

Instead, be honest about your preferences and concerns and make sure that the "wait time" is framed not as a hoop for him to jump through, but because you:

- Prefer to wait to make sure it's real

- Are very careful about STDs and pregnancies
- Need to be comfortable with someone
- Need to feel some level of intimacy before sexual intimacy
- Prefer to know each other first to make sure you're the right fit
- See sex as the natural progression of romance/love, with romance taking some time to develop
- Only have sex with a few selected men

And, important: don't shove it down his throat as if it were a "take it or leave it" requirement, because that's disempowering and most self-respecting men will walk away just to maintain dignity.

Instead, get his buy-in with it, and then you'll be both fine.

I highly recommend this article:

> How To Slow Down Sex & Get A Relationship

2. Keep The Relationship Balanced

Keep the relationship somewhat balanced.

If he does something nice for you or both of you, appreciate and give back. That's the best way to advance a healthy relationship: in lockstep.

Read this article:

- Win-win dating for high-value men

And to delay sex effectively here are a few techniques:

3. Frame It As "Taking It Slow Because It Might Be Something Meaningful"

This is a great approach if you truly feel this way.

It's sincere, it builds him up and it deepens your connection all at the same time.

And that's a huge step towards a relationship.

Watch her execute it to perfection:

P.S.:
YB removed that video as it contained some nudity.
It's now in Seduction University.

4. Show The Light At The End of The Tunnel

Say you're not ready but, don't forget to mention:

It will happen eventually if you keep seeing each other and get along well.

For more, you can read How to Reject Him Properly.

Or alternatively:

5. Make Sex a Pleasurable, Guilt-Free Experience

In "The Tao of Dating", a great dating book for women, author Aziz recommends you don't follow any rules but listen to yourself and decide accordingly.

If that means waiting, wait.
If it means earlier than usual, go for it.

Indeed, great initial sex sends a strong, powerful signal of strong chemistry.

It shows an honest and sincere attraction from your side and, of course, men too love to feel wanted.
A woman who lives in the now and can enjoy the beautiful things of life.

My Personal Take
This is just me, I'm not pretending to speak for everyone and plenty of men are happy to wait. But for me the only relationships I've been in started with early sex -or, at least, not long waits-.
All the rest felt dull to me.

6. Best of Both World: Early Sex & "Serious" Girl

Early sex must not be a curse.

And unless you're dating very traditional men who expect to wait, then you can turn it into an advantage.

If you do early sex well, it's possible to enjoy the sex, make him feel great, and also avoid coming across as "easy".

One way to do it is to alternate resistance to sex with moments of abandonment.

Basically, you show that you are attracted to him.
You want to resist -like you usually do-, but the chemistry is just so good… That eventually, finally… You relent.

But just for him.

We call this the "Madonna-whore seduction".

For more details, read:

- How to drive him crazy

> How to Mind Fuck a Guy: 12 Techniques (With Examples)

Summary

Most dating resources for women tell you two things:

1. Let him wait for sex as much as possible and
2. Make him invest as much as possible.

That's how you get a guy to stick around, provide and adore, is the message.

The premise of this article is that first and foremost you should respect yourself and should never rush if you're not comfortable with it.

Talking about actual effectiveness, we then show that the "make him wait for sex" approach works… In some circumstances.

It doesn't work nearly as well in libertine countries with an abundance of attractive women who are not waiting.
It also backfires with higher-quality men when it reeks of a power move because, generally speaking, it's only lower-quality men who accept a sucker's trade.

And we then show how to make the wait work for (both of) you.

In Seduction University you can learn more strategies and methods, plus the full system for a happy love life.

Entitlement Mentality: Signs & Cure (W/ Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Entitlement mentality is the state of mind that you are owed something when most people around would beg to differ.

The second part of that sentence is the key.
Indeed, the most toxic expression of entitlement mentality is the gap between egotism and reality.

Should you fix your entitlement mentality?

Absolutely!

Until you get rid of it, you will have difficulties achieving what you want to achieve and it's unlikely that you will maximize your true potential.

This article will show you how examples of entitlement mentality and, by the end of it, you will know how to overcome it.

A generation Entitled?

Some people say that millennia and Generation Z have a huge entitlement mentality.

You've maybe seen the now-famous speech of Simon Sinek, author of Start With Why.

Frankly, this video is more of an emotional/bitter rant than a thorough analysis, but it makes some good points

Mark Manson says that entitlement is the consequence of advertising and fake self-help telling you that yes, "you're special" and yes "you deserve it".

And some sources claim that entitlement seems to be an issue in the western world, with its individualistic and materialistic values.

But still, I say that's all hogwash.
Not because it's not true.

But because you don't need to worry about it.

You are not your generation and you are not your geography!

Why should you care if your generation is X, Y, or Z?
You are an individual, with your own mindset and psychology. You are bigger than your generation.

Wherever you come from and whatever your age, being entitled is not doing you any good in your life.
And particularly so for your social life and personal power.

So let's see how to change that.

The Entitled Social Life

In social settings, an entitlement mentality is particularly unhelpful.

Here's how entitled people undermine themselves socially:

1. Give Little Recognition to Others

To entitled people what others accomplish, say, or do doesn't matter much.

They filter out the world through the "me" lenses and hence miss out on the chances of building others up.

2. Talk Too Much

They believe that attention is owed to them.

And that others must be interested in their stories.
So instead of managing a good back-and-forth conversational flow, they monopolize the conversation
See the group conversation walkthrough for an example

3. Ignore Other's Opinion

People can often be easily won over by your way of thinking.

But first, they need to feel that you care about them and understand their opinion (seek first to understand, 7 Habits).

Entitled people believe their opinions are more important though, so they jump straight to that.

4. Interrupt / Deny / Pontificate

Being social is striking a balance between "I" and "them". And often more about "them" than "I".

Of course, entitled people struggle with that, and they commit all the most typical rapport-breaking mistakes.

They say "no" (big rapport break), interrupt others; launch with their own stories to "outdo" others.
Check common conversation mistakes.

Entitlement Mentality Examples

Here are a few sentences that reek of entitlement:

- "Let's do it, I know how to market a product" (the "serial entrepreneur" with 3 failed startups)
- "No, what you should really tell her is this… " (the 3 years single guy who didn't choose singledom)
- "I'm a woman, he should pay for me" (low-value woman with a man who obviously doesn't feel that way)
- "I deserve it" (but can't afford it: hilarious example here)

Billy Bats in this Goodfellas scene shows an entitlement mentality:

He just looks like an entitlement complainer. Nobody takes you seriously when you talk like that.

Or look at this acquaintance of mine who “deserved” the Louis Vuitton bracelet -but didn’t really have the money for it-:

Entitlement Self-Help Examples

There’s a lot of bad self-help literature that is all based on entitlement.
This is what it sounds like:

- Breakup: You were too good for him

But you’re crying over the breakup

- Didn’t get the job: They didn’t deserve you

But you really wanted the job

- Looking to improve: no, just be yourself

Even though “being yourself” hasn’t gotten you where you want to be.

What Makes You Entitled?

We could slice and dice entitlement in many ways.

But I will rein in my tendency to over-write :).
This is, in short, the definition of an entitled personality

> You believe something is owed to you..

And the second leg of entitlement is this:

> …But the world feels otherwise

Let's analyze some of the above statements with the entitlement X-ray goggles on:

- "Let's do it, I know how to market a product"

Experience entitlement. If you're barely making ends meet the world doesn't think you know how to market a product.

- "No, what you should really tell her is this… "

Attention entitlement. He didn't ask your opinion, you're assuming he wants to hear it.
And could be OK if you really had deep insights. But 2 years single not for choice might suggest otherwise.

- "I'm a woman, he should pay for me"

Vagina entitlement. That guy didn't really feel like he owes you a meal. Become a higher quality woman or learn to pick better men and the next one probably will.

- "I deserve it"

Lifestyle entitlement. Your bank account feels differently pal. Give more to the world and you will be able to spend more.

- Just be yourself

Egocentric entitlement. If she's crying being herself maybe isn't delivering. And doing the same and expecting different results is like asking the world should start treating you differently.
But changing the world is hard because, well… Because the world doesn't revolve around you.
Change yourself instead.

How Entitlement Eats Away At Your Power

Entitlement can help to acquire power, actually.

In "how to gain power quick" I explained how a sense of entitlement coupled with ballsy and resolute actions is a key trait to acquiring power quickly.

However, entitlement is also the enemy of long-lasting power.

Writes Robert Greene in The Laws of Human Nature:

> Whatever the cause, it infects all of us, and we must see this sense of entitlement as a curse.
> It makes us ignore the reality—people have no inherent reason to trust or respect us just because of who we are.
> It makes us lazy and contented with the slightest idea or the first draft of our work.
> Why do we have to raise our game or strain to improve ourselves when we feel we are already so great?
> It makes us insensitive and self-absorbed.
> By feeling that others owe us trust and respect, we negate their willpower, their ability to judge for themselves, and this is infuriating. We may not see it, but we inspire resentment.

Entitlement has led some poor leaders and dictators to their bitter (and deserved) end.

Overcoming Entitlement

To overcome entitlement you'll need vulnerability and the initial courage of staring at your current inadequacies.

"Love reality even when it hurts", says Ray Dalio.
Let's start with that:

1. Stare Naked At Reality

Before proven otherwise, this is the default status:

- You're a dime a dozen and you're not that special
- Nobody cares about you
- You're not great

And that's OK.

2. Pull Your Own Weight

Some cases of entitlement are because of helicopter parents.

Move out or start contributing and helping your parents. Their love might be unconditional, but it's unconditionally asshole of you to just take.

3. Wisdom Awaiting Outside Your Comfort Zone

The belief that you are "good" is often a fantasy we build to protect our ego.

We keep that fantasy by not really trying anything difficult and by shielding ourselves from failure.

Do the hard things instead.
Get out of your comfort zone and get some wisdom slapped into you by the real world.

And watch your entitlement mentality disappear.

4. Put Yourself in Others' Shoes

Take a moment to think of typical entitlement behavior:

- How do you feel when people ask for more than they contribute?
- What do you think when a smug face feels like they cut the line in front of you?
- And when they interrupt you because they think they know better?

Yep, that's how obnoxious entitlement is.

5. Give More To Get More

Peter Diamandis, author of Bold, says that to become a billionaire you have to help a billion people.

Get that mindset!

What you take is what you give.
Socially as well, with such things as the law of social exchange. The trick, as Dale Carnegie says, is to make people want to do things for you.

Replacing Entitlement

To fully deal with your entitlement mentality and zip past it, you need to replace it with something else.

The entitlement mentality is built around the idea that you're good, important, and "better".
Not only that's not (always) true, but it makes you act like a moron.
We will replace that with a different identity based on being a:

- Learner (read developing a growth mindset)
- Someone who never gives up (read Grit by Angela Duckworth)

Read building an antifragile ego which lays out all the steps.

On Your Road to Greatness

Now that you're not that special anymore… It's quite a bit freeing, isn't it?

You're just a guy/girl who's finally free to try new things and… Possibly fail.

And now that you're not so great anymore, you can finally start getting great for real. Because nothing is owed to you, but everything you want is for the taking when you become the right person for it.

What would happen if you made your goal to be the best at whatever you do?
It's not entitlement anymore to believe you're the best when you're actually the best.

Exception: When Entitlement Is Useful

As for most things:

Balance.

And context.

Some entitlement can be useful, in some situations and for some basic beliefs and rights.
Including beliefs and rights that support personal empowerment.

Feeling you are NOT entitled to anything leads to over-passiveness, over-submission, and to under-achieve in life.
And extreme non-entitlement to basic respect can also lead to abuse.

Basic Rights: You're Entitled to Respect and Dignity

You do are entitled to:

1. Basic respect and dignity
2. Respectful behavior and communication
3. To never be abused and taken advantage of

And you are entitled to demand proper and respectful treatment and communication.
When not forthcoming, you are also entitled to push back, fight, or find any other means to stop the abuse and disrespect.

Maximizing Entitlement

There are also some situations when feeling entitled can help you achieve more by taking more chances.

For example, feeling entitled to a good mate or a good job pushes you to look for partners and jobs, and that can ultimately lead to better results.

However, it's still good to remain realistic and focus on self-development as well, or the only thing you'll get is a string of rejections and burned bridges.

Generally speaking, to maximize your results you want your entitlement to only marginally be ahead of your "actual value".

When Entitlement Helps Succeed

Finally, it's also a generalization that entitlement never leads to success.

Some entitled and narcissistic personalities believe they can simply talk about themselves and receive attention and money for it.
And for very few, it works.
Our era of digital gossip made that possible even outside of the old established media.

However, never forget that one, those are the rare exceptions.
For every entitled famous person who makes a living from their IG updates and selfies, there are 10.000 who get their ego thrashed for believing they should, but not getting it.
And two, it's still probably not the best, healthiest, and even happiest way to succeed.

Next Level: Enlightened Entitlement (Entitled and Humble & Realistic)

Because in some situations entitlement can be helpful and support both confidence and self-esteem, the next level of development is in being able to both feel entitled and:

- Realistic about your self-assessment
- Humble about life and your achievements

Call it "enlightened entitlement".
And it's a pattern of "walking the line" we've seen often on this website.
I highly recommend these articles:

- Enlightened individualist: a monster of an article but central to TPM
- Enlightened collaborator
- Enlightened cynic

Summary

Entitlement mentality is costing you in your quality of life, your achievements, and in your social relationships.

Get rid of it and you'll take a further step towards (social) success.

Note: it's very possible you were too good sometimes. Or that he should have paid for you or that people should have listened to you. But the question is: is the rest of your life proving that?
Because the onus to prove otherwise is on you.

Full Summary

About the Author:
Daniel Wendler is a fellow writer and researcher on social dynamics.
He says that, as a man with Asperger syndrome, he was socially awkward growing up, but that he improved immensely with constant work and focused self-development.
Wendler holds a doctorate in clinical psychology from George Fox University, is the founder of the biggest social skills community on Reddit, and is an active blogger on his personal website.

Foundations: Overcoming Social Anxiety

Wendler says the first step to overcoming social anxiety is to understand the difference between physical fear and true fear.

True fear is because something in your environment is truly dangerous and your fear is justified.

Physical fear is the activation of the fear system without any real danger. And, of course, social anxiety is a physical fear.

Learn The Basics of Body Language

The author gives you a very nice crash course on body language.

I totally agree with him when he says that there are thousands of different expressions, but the only two signals you need to understand are comfort and discomfort.

He says when you learn that, you can gauge your interaction and adjust accordingly. Seeing discomfort? Start troubleshooting or cut your conversation short, maybe you're boring them.

Comfort signals?
Greenlight, keep going.

For some pictures on body language check:

- High-power body language
- Submissive body language

Manage The Conversation Flow Like Ping-Pong Match

Daniel teaches you how to manage conversations effectively.

He introduces the concepts of invitation (a question) or inspiration (saying something that will make the other person want to jump in).

Only invitations will make the conversation like an interview. Only inspiration is hard.
So the author proposes a mix.

Just a note from my side, I like the idea of Mark Manson in Models saying it's good to replace questions with statements. A question, he says, begs for an answer.

Learn The Basics of Group Conversation

I agree with Daniel's suggestion.

He says the first thing you should look at, is if the groups are open or closed to new people joining.
Closed means they are huddling and there's little physical space to actually join.
Open means they are facing the larger group or it's physically easy for new members to join in.

To join a group, he advises you either introduces yourself directly or indirectly. Check the book for the details on how to execute both, it's quite good.
Also, check:

- Successful group conversation

Develop Empathy To Get To The Next Level

Daniel stresses the need for empathy to succeed socially, with which I wholeheartedly agree.

And he proposes you check out the book Social Intelligence, which to be honest, I haven't found to be very enlightening (and removed it from our website for being so thin).

The author says that empathy is partly innate, and partly you can grow it.

Daniel says first you need to understand yourself and allow yourself to feel the feelings you're feeling, and then you can move to empathize with others.

Make Some Friends & Develop A Relationship

"Improve Your Social Skills" also has chapters dedicated specifically to where and how to meet friends and how get girlfriends.

And how to nurture and develop both friendships and girlfriends.

We come from very different perspectives and experiences when it comes to dating, but I respect Daniel's opinions.

He proposes to start as friends, and it's an interesting opinion because he says that's the only way to be attracted to real personalities.

Most of all, I really appreciated something he said, which I will quote:

> If you are more concerned with what your partner can do for you than with what you can do for your partner, then you should not be dating them.

And the other way around.

After having read a bunch of women's dating books all about playing games, I really appreciated Daniel's point of view. That's indeed how the best relationships are.

Real-Life Applications

Match Eye Contact
I like how Daniel simplifies eye contact, which in many resources is made to sound very complex.
Simply hold eye contact with them more or less as they hold eye contact with you.

Review

In spite of social skills being some of the most important abilities one could develop, there are few good books on the subject out there.

And I find Improve Your Social Skills to be one of the best beginner's guides available.

I don't know the author personally, but I have a very good impression of him.
He communicates with solid morals and ethics and he focuses on adding value to the people around him.

The fact he overcame Asperger's Syndrome to become socially effective gives Daniel a strong perspective on working on the basics that most other authors don't have.

And, if I may add, it's also a testament to human capabilities: a beautiful message from Daniel there.

Value & Availability: Two Foundations of Social Dynamics

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Value and availability are two key concepts of social skills.

They have important consequences both for your social success and for your dating success.

Yes, this might sound a bit theoretical, but you still need a solid grasp of them to learn and understand social and power dynamics.
Value and investment are highly relevant to dating.

INTRO

In the Social Exchange framework, we explained social dynamics can be seen as a big exchange.

In a nutshell, the main principle is that the more value you have, the more you can demand.

But it's not always that straightforward. And there's a caveat. The caveat is: how available that value is.

This concept originate in the dating literature for men, from a dating coach called Sebastian, originally called 'attainability'. We place it within larger social dynamics and TPM's existing concepts, including "collaborative frames" and "power and warmth".

Value and Availability: Explanation

Imagine the bars below represent the total value of three different folks:

In a digital world free of psychology, both Amber and Christy want Black and pursue black.
And Black could easily get friendship, romance, or at least a warm welcome from both Amber and Christy.

But in the real world, it's not as straightforward.
People also have a sense of what their personal value is, and they know that higher-value people might not be thrilled to hobnob with them.
That's why Amber and Christy might want Black, but not pursue Black. They might act aloof, snub him, or even be curt towards him so as to reject him first.

That's a case of self-rejection.
If you are high value, self-rejection happens when people don't think you will accept them, and they self-reject themselves before you do so.

In the above example, Amber and Christy might think Black is not interested in them, so they self-reject themselves.
It's also possible that self-rejection turns confrontational. Amber and Christy might be hurt by Black's (potential) rejection, so they act out their own rejection with their own unfriendly and dismissive behavior.

In short, it doesn't just matter how high-value you are.
High value might not be enough, because people only want to enter a meaningful social exchange if they believe that your value is available to them.
That, in a nutshell, is the concept of perceived value availability.

And that's one of the reasons why I recommend that as you get better, you mix power with warmth.

Value Availability

What does "making your value available means"?

Well, think of it this way:

> Making your value available means "welcoming people into your higher-value world" and making them feel accepted and valued for who they are.

That's true no matter if we are talking about a relationship, a friendship, a networking event, or a seduction.

Let's now explore value and availability with an example.

Unavailability and Self Rejection

Imagine Amber (bar A) is out at an event and wants to talk to someone.

But Amber will likely not go for Black because the difference with Black (bar B) is too big. Amber thinks it's likely Black will reject her because Black is "too good".

That's a typical case of self-rejection. Remember that self-rejection happens when we feel someone might reject us and we reject them first.
People who self-reject take themselves out of the running, often unconsciously, without even trying.

People who self-reject do so either to protect their ego, which doesn't help them succeed in life or to protect their social standing, which can make sense in case of public rejection.

Signs of Self-Rejection

How do you recognize if you are pushing someone into self-rejection?

These are some of the signs:

- Ignoring you
- Being in awe and too nervous to speak to you
- Disliking you (even if they haven't spoken to you yet)
- Being rude to you (they feel hurt, you make them feel "not good enough", so they hurt you back)

And that's also one of the reasons why when dealing with underminers, frenemies, or early enemies, I often recommend trying to be kind and collaborative with them first.
Many of those people are in self-rejection and you can turn them around if you make them feel like you do not reject them, but value them.

Self-Rejection & Teasing Too Much

Now, what if Black were to approach Amber?

Well, Amber might be elated (and nervous at the same time).
But she might not take him seriously, wondering if he's toying with her.

It's also possible though that Amber will be rude or shut Black down. Afraid of being eventually hurt or let down by Black, she does the rejection first.

The worst thing Black could do is tease her too much.
Too many guys focus only on building their value as high as possible and coming across as powerful as possible but forget about availability.

Seen an example here:

> Him: come on, you gotta keep it interesting, interest me
> Her: ahh… I studied at Oxford University
> Him: booooooring!

She liked him!
But he keeps being playing too hard to get, too aloof, and too rude as well. He makes his value too unavailable, so she thinks she does not like him, and self-rejects.

Self-rejections tend to be final, so one must always strive to prevent them:

Fixing Availability Issues

If Black wanted to have a deeper interaction with Amber he should make her feel like he accepts and respects her. Ideally, he values her.

And, if he likes her romantically, also that he likes and is attracted to her.

Black could either come down to her level -for example with humbleness, deprecation, or vulnerability- or, even better, raise Amber to his level -getting to know her, appreciating her, etc.-

People Want The Highest Value, Available Person Possible

Do you know the red pill?

If you have been reading manosphere blogs, you know the mantra around "female hypergamy".
The idea is that since women look for the best possible men they can find, then you can never trust women in relationships.

But albeit female hypergamy is certainly real, it's not exactly true that women -or men- always look for the best possible mate.
Instead, people seek the highest possible mate among the ones they feel are available for them (ie.: the ones they feel they can get and the ones they feel will appreciate them).
Much different.

Even before the approach, people will always be gauging how valuable the other person is and how available he is.

And during the interaction, people use the following signals to gauge availability:

Availability Signs

- Warmth
- Friendliness
- Touching
- Effort (to keep the conversation going for example)
- Interest in the other

Unavailability Signs

- Coldness
- Aloofness
- Physical distance
- No effort (let the conversation die for example)
- No interest (no questions, looking away, etc.)

On the extreme end, unavailable signs become repulsion instead of no attraction. Then it's aggression, disgust, etc.

The Value & Availability Matrix

To make the Value and Availability concept clearer, let's project it onto a matrix:

Low Value / Low Availability

People in this box aren't even on the map in either the social or dating world.
They have no qualities or skills worth of notice and are unfriendly and socially clueless.

Low Value / High Availability

On the extreme side of this box, imagine fangirls screaming "pick me, pick me" under a singer's stage: super available and low value because there are a hundred of them.

On a more day-to-day basis, these are people with little going on in their life. They're always free for you and are the most likely to chase you.

High Value / Low Availability

These are the people we call haughty, pompous, and full of themselves.
Low availability can make the people around you jealous and resentful. That's one of the reasons why celebs have so many "haters".

High Value / High Availability

These are people who are high-value and welcoming. They make the people around them feel accepted and high value as well.

Bill Clinton is a great example:

Bill Clinton being high-value and high-availability (or, at least, looking high availability)

Availability Influences Value

Value is also influenced by the availability of the value itself.

Indeed, psychologically, we are programmed to use availability as a shortcut for value. If something is abundant, we find it less valuable.

If on the other hand, something is scarce, our brain tells us that it must be valuable and we want it more (also see Cialdini).

Hence, it is possible to make our value go up by faking scarcity.

An experiment found out scarcity increases perceived value in the following order:

1. What's scarce
2. What has become scarce
3. What has become scarce because of social demand

Maximizing Your Results

To maximize your results, you should increase your value and find the sweet spot for availability.

Increasing Your Value

Increasing your value should be the core of your efforts.
And it means you become a better person and get more of what other people value.

Maximizing Your Availability

The availability sweet spot is this:

- Available enough so that people don't self reject
- Scarce enough that you're still selective, a challenge, and appreciated for your time

The availability sweet spot It's usually less relevant in social settings and friendships -where it's best to add value to each other-.
It's a bit less relevant in good and established relationships -where it's best to add value to each other-.

But it's very relevant at the beginning of dating:

Availability in Dating

The idea of being scarce to be more attractive is an old one.

Virtually all female dating advice centers around being scarce to make him chase.
It works in principle.
But has several drawbacks, most notably:

1. You risk the target will stop pursuing (self-rejection)
2. It's a game everyone plays: more available singles can steal your lunch

Let's not go into that now but let's have an overview of availability:

Being a Challenge: The A/V Sweet-spot

Imagine your availability as a peephole to your value.

If what people see is good (your value) and if it's visible enough (your availability), then it's exciting and people will want to get it.

If people can't see any light at the end of that peephole (zero availability), you're too hard to get and they won't pursue you because they don't think they have a shot (except for stalkers of course).

Gauging Your A/V Sweetspot

Remember this:

- Your value is relative (social value relativity & sexual market value variability)
- People's confidence in their ability to access your value varies

What does that mean?
It means that you cannot stick with the same strategy with everyone, but you must vary and target your value and availability to the specific person and situation.
To do that, emotional intelligence and knowing some basics of body language are key.

The rule of thumb is:

Bitterness / Rudeness
When people are bitter and combative towards you, they might be self-rejecting. Be less of a challenge.

Lukewarm / Unresponsive
When people are not interested in they'll be rather nice as they don't want to hurt your feelings. But they will not want to meet you or move with you.
If that's the case, you should be more of a challenge.

Super High Value / High Availability

Ideally, the best of the best is to be so great as to wow someone upon approach (super high value and at risk of self-rejection).

And then proceed to make yourself more available by taking the edge off of yourself with humility and self-deprecation.
Or even better: build him/her up to your level so that he/she feels he has a shot with you.

On a social scale, this is exactly what Clinton was doing.

False Self-Rejection To Make Them Chase

As a last note, I wanted to show you a high-level use of self-rejection.

When someone is being a bit out of order, you can choose to ignore, tell them that's not cool, or… You can feign self-rejection.
This is called "false takeaway".

If they like you, that will get them chasing.

See a perfect example here:

> Her: that's exactly what American women think Italian men say
> Him: (looks hurt and disappointed) thank you (walks away)

Did you spot the guy's (fake) self-rejection? It's rather easy, at minute 2:07.

This is a greatly effective technique that we call "collaborative shaming" here, it's delivered with high vulnerability from a judge role.

Summary

Your value, be it your overall value or your sexual market value, are crucial to do well with others.

You knew that already.

However, people will often judge your value depending on how available it is for them.
If they think you don't wanna share your value by talking to them, helping them, being kind to them, or sleeping with them, they might either avoid you, despise you, or self-reject and never even consider you as a sexual option.

Socially
To make friends, make your social value easy to access -ie.: be approachable and welcoming-.
Also read: mix warmth with power.

Romantically
Romantically, make your value available enough they feel they can get it but not so available they think you're too easy.

WIIFT: When & How to Use It (& When to Avoid It)

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

WIIFT stands for What's In It For Them.

It postulates that if you want to influence people, you should highlight what they stand to gain from doing what you are proposing.

And that makes a lot of sense… Usually.

By the end of this article, you will gain a better understanding of when to use WIIFT, how to use it, and when it's best not to be so direct.

Contents

- When To Avoid WIIFT

  - How to Show Value: Two Guys Looking For a Room
  - The "No WIIFM freeloader"
- Summary

When To Avoid WIIFT

What's In It For Them is about being upfront about what you can do for them.

In Value and Availability though, we showed that sometimes you want to show yourself not too available to the other party, especially in romantic situations.
WIIFT is the total opposite. WIIFT is the pinnacle of availability.

WIIFT is also not ideal for political candidates or for leaders, because, well… Often, there is little in it for them, and you're better off leveraging higher ideals (see Drive by Daniel Pink).

When should we use WIIFT, then?

Let's see:

WIIFT: For When You're the Asker

You want to start with what's in it for them in all situations where you play by their rules.

In those cases, you don't have (yet) the power and social pull to demand something back.

The characteristics of these situations are:

1. Obvious power imbalances: Power imbalances can be so obvious sometimes that there's no point in trying to pretend they should be interested in you and that's why you communicate first and foremost what's in it for them

2. Not-in-person: When not in person people can't see or get a sense of your other qualities, so you have to go right to the point of what you can do for them

3. Time starved: When you have little time you can't let them slowly discover your qualities, so you gotta be more obvious.

Here are some examples:

- Swipe-based online dating
- Sales cold outreach

- Elevator pitches
- Emailing for a job
- Asking for funding

WIIFT: Logical Interactions

Logic-based transactions are transactions where there is no social stigma in being upfront about what you want and what you can give.

You are looking for something, they are looking for something and you have to prove to each other you have what it takes to enter into a mutually convenient transaction.

Here you want to be obvious about what you can give and at the same time be obvious and direct about what you want.

Some examples are:

- Some types of sales
- Arranged Marriages
- Interviewing for jobs

No WIIFT: Social Interactions

In social interactions, you want to be more indirect.

You want to show attractive external qualities and drop hints about the less visible parts of your value.
Let them dig out for more as you slowly reveal more and more about your awesome personality.

"Oh my god" they'll be thinking, "how many other cool things is this guy hiding".

No WIIFT: Dating

In dating the script is inverted.

Here ideally you want them to show you what's in it for you.

Because in dating the one who's doing the selling is communicating he's lower in the pecking order. And people - especially women- are not very attracted to those who are beneath them.

So ideally you want to show your external qualities first and foremost, but without selling yourself on the deeper ones.
Then you build a connection by being interested in them.

Ideally, you will get physical on chemistry attraction even before she finds out about all your other deeper qualities.

Let's check a couple of examples now:

WIIFM Examples

I will show you a couple of examples.

How to Show Value: Two Guys Looking For a Room

This is what happens when you rent a place in a city where everyone is looking for a place to stay:

I ask for a relatively high rent and yet many people always reach out (above are the messages of people who wrote on Facebook only).

This is the type one, super obvious situation: there's a clear power imbalance because they ask and I am the chooser. Plus, it's not in person and there is high demand.
This is when you have to front-load your value as much as you can.

Let's see the difference between those who get it and those who are oblivious to the Rules of Social Exchanges.

The shirtless man with a selfie in front of the mirror is a great example.
I wrote my ad in English, and he wrote to me in the local language, which is the first bad sign: you have to adapt to the chooser when you're the asker.

Second, he doesn't make it easy for me to proceed.
What am I supposed to ask him a thousand questions now about when he's free, what he does, and if he can pay?
Not going to waste my time on that dude.

And of course, he makes the crucial mistake of not leading with what's in it for me.

"Ich brauche das" literally means "I need it".

These are the same people who complain that nobody replies to them -and you really have to wonder why… -.

If the message wasn't idiotic enough, would the emoji seal the deal?
Compare it to the two people who get it, which are those I invited over to get to know them.

They quickly show their interesting personalities (social currency), lay out what's in it for me (good job and ability to pay, traveling most of the time, no mess in the kitchen), and make it easy for me to say yes (propose their availability).

Now, even if I didn't particularly care about their benefits, it shows that these are people who get it.
And we all like people who get it.

Hi Lucie!

My name is [redacted] and I am an Ami expat in Berlin (one of many, or so I hear). The flat looks excellent and the description fits exactly what I'm looking for (apologies for the English, can easily switch to German for future correspondence, just a bit jet lagged at the moment).

As for myself, I travel for work as a Manager for Ernst & Young during the week (Monday morning to Thursday evening), and spend my weekends reading, writing, spending time at an improv theater in Neukölln (Comedy Cafe Berlin), hiking, and exploring. Overall, I am a clean, kind, and courteous person, but am happy to provide references from past landlords and roommates as well.

My current landlord recently informed me that she will be moving back into the flat early, so I need to find a new apartment, and the timing of the room you have works perfectly! If you are available this weekend, I would be happy to discuss it in advance as well :).

For any questions, feel free to email me [redacted]

The "No WIIFM freeloader"

Have you read the article on freeloaders?

Check it out; it's well-in-depth, and "no WIIFM" is the definition of freeloading.

Look at this guy asking for a free month:

OK, you cannot pay $9. But what can you give back? Put THAT in the email.

Hello Mr Lucio, I am interested in your Power Moves website.. it is unlike anything I have seen, so in depth! But, the paywall has become issue for me, would there be any way to set up a trial for a month? Money is a big concern right now but I am still interested in becoming a better person using your services.

He starts off with no "WIIFM".

And the sentence "the paywall has become an issue for me" tells me this guy does not see that relationships among strangers require a sort of exchange.

Especially if he had the emotional intelligence to consider that maybe I receive a lot of these emails.

But hey, if I can help, I'm happy to.

So I give him the chance of providing him with a "WIIFM". And I tell him I'm happy to give it to him for free… If he is willing to share the articles he likes the most on his social media.

A simple way to help him out and to help him make this a fair exchange.

Here is his reply:

He does not get that I'm offering him the opportunity of a fair exchange in the form of a "WIIFM".

Instead, he keeps pressing on a deal with no "WIIFM".

Not a good signal to send me because this whole business teaches how to defend against people who seek win-lose (instead of win-win).

Summary

In The Rule of Social Exchange, we talked a bit about social currencies.

We said there that to get what you want, you have to give what people want.

In this article, we differentiate a bit on when to be very direct about what we can offer and when we should let them show us what's in it for us instead.

How Quality Women Make Men Invest: Low vs High Value Tactics

Lucio Buffalmano · 1 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Most women want men to invest in them, and chase them.

Howevre, how they go about it tells you everything about a woman's character, quality, and whether she is relationship-material.

As experts in social and dating power dynamics, we break down in this article the dynamics of investment in dating, and what it says about both men and women.

Intro

Relationships are 'mixed games' of converging and diverging interests where both partners must strategically display some interest to maintain the relationship, but also hide interest to avoid depreciating its value and signaling lower value (Blau, 1964; Buffalmano, 2016).

However, hiding interest entails risks. Over-hiding interest can derail a budding relationship and undermine attraction.
To overcome the impasse and avoid the risks, ideal dating between interested partners would allow both partners to display interest, and increase it in lockstep.

This model maximizes dating effectiveness without undermining attraction (or even increasing it, when well executed).

What 'Investing' Means

First of all, a quick overview of what "investing in a woman" actually means.

We define investing in a woman as:

> Any act of caring or adding value to her life and well being that requires the expenditure of effort, time, or resources.

Sounds too abstract and theoretical?

OK, here are some simple examples:

- He initiates calls/texts and always replies
- He picks her up / drives her back
- He listens and asks questions
- He is protective
- He offers to help
- He seeks to impress or look good
- Any act where he inconveniences himself to help and support her

As you can see, investing is mostly good.
Even better, investing in each other is what develops great relationships!

Mutual investing might indeed be the single most important indicator of a great relationship.

But one partner investing a lot in the other without equal investment back…?

Not so great, as we shall see (and not good for your dating effectiveness, either).

Typical Dating Advice On Making Him Invest

Let's quickly review the popular dating advice for women.

Most authors of women's dating advice say that the goal of dating is to make him invest in you as much as possible.

It's a common mantra in:

- Power of The Pussy
- Get The Guy
- Ho Tactics
- F*ck Him

So far, so good.

The bad news is that some of these authors spread the idea that best of all is to get a lot while giving back as little as possible.

Why?

Why He Should Invest Much More

The idea of making him invest as much as possible is that:

1. You weed out the non-serious guys (players etc.)
2. You'll be in control and won't fall for him too soon
3. He will like you more

And for the most part, these are all true.

Why It Makes Sense (on paper)

These are the advantages of typical dating advice on making men invest in you:

- You Weed Out Players & Low Investment Guys

Generally, you don't want men who invest very little because they don't make for great relationship partners -and the same is true for women-.

And as a rule of thumb, fuckboys and womanizers tend to invest less.
So it might be true that pushing for him to invest more could weed out the players.

However, as we shall see, it also weeds out more discerning and experienced men who are simply not OK with being "pushed" into more and more investment.

- You Will Not Fall In Love

We tend to like less what's very available (Cialdini), so investing little while receiving lots will "safeguard" your feelings indeed.

This is only good if you don't want to fall in love, though.

- He Will Like You More

Studies show that givers feel more committed to the recipient after giving (Horan & Booth-Butterfield, 2010).

This is probably partially because of sunk costs (Coleman, 2009) and back rationalization (Eagleman, 2011).
But in a nutshell, it's true: the more one gives to you, the more he values you.

There are exceptions (especially in difficult markets, read The Eligible Bachelor Paradox), but overall the theory does make sense.

But now, the big question:

Who does it work with?

The Drawback of Making Him Invest

Social relationships can be seen as big exchange markets.

And the Law of Social Exchange postulates that good relationships tend to reach a balance of value -who you are- and investment -what you do for the other-.

Frist off, giving and investing much more invites exploitation.
Second, a corollary of the social investment model is that when one side has some major lack in overall value, he must make it up with "external value injections".

Investing is indeed a way of making up for a lack of value.

So when you make him invest a lot, this is what the relationship looks like from a purely exchange-driven model:

Now, can you start seeing why "forcing him to invest a lot can be an issue?

As for anything people-related, there are exceptions of course, but, as a rule of thumb: the men who are OK with investing in you without an equal amount back are the ones who are not good enough for you!

Yes: it's mostly men who feel they're not good enough for you that will over-invest.

When they cannot bring enough value with who they are, then they throw on the table different kinds of extra services, such as:

- Wining and dining
- Carrying bags
- Fixing stuff
- Ready at your beck and call
- Emotional tamponing
- …

On average, men who invest a lot tend to be less experienced, less valuable, and lower-quality types of providers (see: providers and lovers).
In short, they often don't know any better.

Here's an example that always cracks me up:

When he says "I thought I did everything right", he refers to investing a lot.

Cooler Guys Seek ROI

ROI is a financial term that means "return on investment".

And it applies to dating as well.

We all have an internal system of value exchange, and we all seek to keep it balanced.

What does that mean to you?

It means that men who are around your same value or higher are unlikely to invest a lot without requiring equal amounts back.

This is what it looks like with bar charts:

These guys will invest the first time and then… And then they will expect you to do the same. They might not be aware of it consciously, but unconsciously they expect something back (unless they read ThePowerMoves, in which case they will consciously expect it :).

And when they see nothing coming from you, they will feel something is off.

And what will happen if you keep following the typical dating advice and expect even more without giving?

Bruce Bryan of Never Chase Men Again hits the nail on the head when he says that men with a backbone will flee very soon if you demand without giving.

Indeed those guys will think you're an entitled woman, with big demands and little to show for it. That's a big trait of socially clueless women and low quality women.

That's why I highly recommend you don't seek to make him invest without giving equally back.
Because a high-quality man might be very happy to date you… Unless you start demanding and expecting over-investment, in which case you are driving the very best men away.

Power Move Tip:
Strategically, you can differentiate between men.
You might for example seek investment from the clueless ones who are blind to the imbalance.
While you can seek a balance with the cooler and smarter ones.

Making Him Invest: The Right Way

What's the alternative then?

The alternative is reciprocal investment escalation.

Let him do the first step, and make sure you reward him and make him feel good, which will encourage more giving.
Give something too, which will reassure him you're in it as a contributor as well.

And the virtuous cycle of mutual investment will start feeding on itself.

Not only this attitude of reciprocal investment will foster more and more giving, but research shows that partners' inequitable relationships are happier and last longer (Equity Theory of Love).

This approach displays what psychology calls 'welfare trade-off ratio' (Buss, 2021), such as how much we focus on our needs VS how much we focus on our partner's needs.
This approach shows the healthiest balance of caring for oneself, while also caring for him.

See here a chart bar example of how a woman can lock in a higher quality man (starting from the bottom):

This is how you move onward and upward together
Let's now dig deeper into how you can get into a great relationship with the mutual investment virtuous cycle.

Reciprocal Investment Blueprint

#1. – First meeting:

- He: buys you a drink
- You: thank him and get to know him

#2. – First date:

- He: invites you out and pays for dinner
- You: thank him. At the end of the date warmly hug him, look him in the eyes and tell him you're happy you two met

#3. – Second date:

- He: invite you to some event

- You: you offer him a round of drinks and toast him to such a nice company (building him up)

 # 4. – Third date:

- He: invites you somewhere or to a home-cooked meal
- You: bring him a gift with little money value but that says "I thought about you"

That's how you show him you're a keeper.

That's a woman he feels he can rely on for life, which is indeed a major trait all the male authors highlighted in women's dating books.

Emotional Investment

Emotional investment is a subset of overall investment, but it's the most important.

Bruce Bryan recommends you open up first and show your vulnerability.
If he shows nothing, it's not a good sign: he might be an emotionally unavailable man or an avoidant attachment type.

If he replies with his own emotional investment (ie.: opens up, listens, asks more questions, increases intimacy, etc.) he's a keeper.

I like the idea of making the first move and gauging the reaction.
But whoever makes the first major overture, the pattern is the same: one step each.

Building the tower of a great relationship is a common effort. One brick at a time, one brick each.

One brick each and you go twice as higher

Summary

The advice in most dating books for women is to make men invest as much as possible, while she invests as little as possible.

Then, the advice goes, he'll pursue her and want her more.

While that might be true, I explain in this post that making men invest as much as possible only works for lower-value men, and it often backfires with higher value men, who see it as a red flag.

It also doesn't bode well for setting up functional relationships. As Blau notes 'Only when two lovers' affection for and commitment to one another expand at roughly the same pace do they tend mutually to reinforce their love.

A woman with a good character will always accept a man's investment warmly, make him feel good about giving, and give back as well.
If she escalates investment by giving back, that's the healthiest progress towards a win-win relationship.

Dark Capital: Turn Pain and Anger Into Fuel for Success

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Many of us will face challenges in life.

We will face losses, rejections, heartbreaks, pain, and failure.
Some of them can bring us to our knees.

This post is here to tell you that not only can you recover, but that those dark days can become the foundation of your future, upgraded self.

This article shows you how.

Avoid Victim Stance

Bullying, rejection, failure… These can be defining moments in our lives.

In the beginning, it's OK to sit with the pain and process it. Avoiding this part can create unresolved issues and coping mechanisms.

We don't deal with therapy here, we deal with power, personal power, and achievement.
And from that point, do this:

1. Don't Pretend 'It's OK'

Most people pretend nothing hurtful happened.
Instead of dealing with their lack of assertiveness and power, they pretend they are OK with their state of subjugation and submissiveness.

Example*:*

- The "friend" is making fun of you. He always cracks jokes about you and all the group laughs. And you laugh along
- Your boss coaxes you into overtime with a pat on the back and a fake compliment that 'the team would be nothing without you'

You smile in both cases and accept.
Except, you really didn't feel like laughing at all.

Don't pretend you're OK with it.
You're not.

Recognize and accept that you got shitty friends and a terrible boss.
They're not the end of the world, and there is no need to pretend otherwise.

2. Don't Complain Privately & Do Nothing

This is another common response for most people.
They complain to themselves or to someone close… And do nothing.

Example:

- The boss disrespects you in front of colleagues. But instead of standing up to your boss, you prefer complaining to your colleagues.

"He's an asshole", you say. But private complaints with zero action make you look even more powerless.
You can complain privately only if it's part of a strategy to undermine or foment a rebellion.

3. Don't Make Excuses For Them

Here are some examples of making excuses for others:

- He was just stressed out (justifying disrespect)
- He is weak, that's why he bullies you (psychologizing-justifying)
- They were just joking, didn't mean to offend (pretending they're friends)

The fact that he might have his own problems doesn't mean he must create problems for you.
And the idea that bullies have low self-esteem is not true, it's a pop-psychology myth (Baumeister, 1997).

Turn Pain Into Anger & Fuel

Every painful event becomes fuel, a ‘dark capital’ that you can use as propellant.

Some examples of ‘dark fuel’:

- Rejection when you were desperate for a yes
- Heartbreak when you didn’t expect it, maybe being cheated
- Bullying, either physically or verbally. Being the butt of the jokes also qualifies
- Feeling inadequate

Or it can be deeper and darker.

An abusive parent, like your father telling you that you’d never amount to anything in life.

Most people try to hide these painful events, pretending it never happened, or trying to forgive and forget. Instead, we propose to use it for motivation.

Start like this:

1. Accept It Happened, And That It Sucked

Acceptance prevents it from staying in your subconscious and wreaking havoc in your life. It’s the first step to healing. And it’s also the first step to using it as motivation.

2. Turn It Into A Catalyst For Positive Change

Some people turn destructive, antisocial (toxic externalizing) or destructively inward with drugs and depression (internalizing).

But some of the most ambitious overachievers used their most painful experiences as a catalyst for positive change and hard work.
For example:

- Tony Robbin's mother poured glue into his mouth
- Oprah was abused during childhood
- David Goggins' father beat him mercilessly

The question is, are you going to let your pain devour you or are you going to channel it positively?
It's OK to be down, depressed, or take time off. But then, eventually… Are you going to rise up?
Remember, the night is always darkest before the sun rises.

> It is always darkest just before dawn

3. Turn It Into Positive, Controlled Anger

Anger can be destructive when it's too much, and in bursts.

But controlled and within an optimum balance, it can be the fuel behind your hard work.

Star trainer Tim Grover for example says that anger gets you in the zone.
It's anger simmering beneath your skin, barely about to burst, but you keep it under control for laser focus and peak performance.

4. Tap Into The Pain Whenever You Need A Boost

And whenever you're depleted, tap into it:

- Thank you, Dad, for telling me I'd never amount to anything, this last set is for you
- Your ex dumped for a richer guy. These last 10 approaches are to show her you can get better

Remember: smooth sailing rarely carried anyone to greatness. But men are born and characters are forged in your darkest hours.

> It's in your darkest hours that men are born and characters are forged.
> -Lucio Buffalmano

5. Move Past Darkness

Dark fuel is powerful, but it also pollutes heavily. And over time it can pollute your mind and health.

And it can also cost you in honor and empathy.
As Nietzsche said:

> Whoever fights monsters shall see to it that in the process he does not become a monster.

Eventually, you want to move to more positive motivation, such as:

- Identity-driven motivation, you do it because that's who you are (see 'antifragile ego')
- Value-adding motivation, to have a positive impact and legacy
- Life-quality motivation, for yourself and the people around you. This approach is especially suited if you want a family

🤔Lucio's Take: My drive went from anger to identity and value-adding

Lucio:
I started TPM with more anger as fuel.

With time, anger played a smaller and smaller role. I still use it, but my main drive today comes from identity ('this is whoI am and what I do'), responsibility to TPM's mission ('creating the best in-class, ever-lasting repository for men's empowerment), and responsibility towards humanity ('adding my little brick to help humanity forward').

The goal is to harness pain and anger, use them, so they can help you fly farther and higher.

And that's the ultimate human conquest: harnessing the dark so that you can create more light.
For yourself, and for the world.

> Harnessing the dark, so that you can create more light

Bonus: Later On, Be Compassionate to Your Suffering

This approach is the 'warrior phase', and it's important to get your life moving in the right direction.
However, it may leave some emotional wounds open.

Eventually, you may want to revisit your wounds with more compassion, and potentially with a therapeutic approach.
Not to wallow in the pain, but to fully heal it. You want to avoid looking at your past emotional pains and think you're weak for having them. You're not weak, you're human. Instead, extend love to yourself, including the one who suffered. Self-love is the foundation of self-esteem and mental health.

The peak of self-development is to combine compassionate self-love with the warrior approach to life.

Social Relativity: How Go From Low to High-Value

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Personal value and social status are 'relatively relative'.

They are relative because there is no set measure and because they don't depend only on you. Indeed, for the most part, they depend on the assessment of the people around them.

You can be a star in one group and a nobody in another one. In the short span of a few minutes.

This post will review social relativity from a group's perspective.

Social Relativity: Intro

Researcher Joseph Henrich tells us this on the psychology of status:

> While not infinitely malleable, what constitutes a valued domain is amazingly flexible. The differential success of societies and institutions will hinge, in part, on what domains are valued.

However, the competition for what affords status is a constant, and not relative (Barkow, 2020).

Let's quickly review different types of groups that will make you valuable -or useless- within them.

Interest-Based Clubs Afford Status Relative to Their Interest

Some groups aggregate around their interests.

Being good at whatever skill those groups value will give you status within that specific group.

- In a stamp collection club, the guy with the most stamps will see a boost in his social value
- In tuning groups, the guy with the most powerful car and stereo will probably be one of the coolest guys
- And in a group of hooligans, it will be fanatism—or violence—that will determine who has the highest value and most social power

Some Groups Exclude Based on Lack of Common Traits

Some groups bond around a certain trait.

That trait might not be an advantage because everyone has it.
But if you don't have it, you're almost automatically excluded.

For example, older people who go to university feel awkward.
Why?

They will be the only older ones, the same age as the professors but on the part of the students.

But being of a different age almost automatically makes you an outsider in that social hierarchy.

Which basically means: you don't belong.

Hate Groups: There Is One Hidden in Any Group

Sometimes groups can get nasty toward outsiders.

As a matter of fact, as Baumeister explains, almost any group has in it the seeds to oppose other groups.

Hate groups often award the most status to the most extreme members.
The most extreme member might not otherwise shine in any other way than his shallow charisma, hate, and rage.

Hate groups are most likely to form when:

- There is a strong pride in what makes them a group
- They build their pride around out-group enemies
- There is a high level of similarity among members
- Out-groups are seen as dangerous for the group

Here is one example from the movie "School Ties":

The highest social status is probably going to the one who concocted and prepared the hated banner.

Rank-Based Groups Afford Status Based on Rank

In companies, a lot of your social status will depend on your position within that company, which is rather formalized through a title.

As John Maxwell says, titles don't make leaders, but titles certainly have a major impact on the social hierarchy within the company—and on the social status too.

Bars & Clubs: Your Status Is Relative To Strangers

Sometimes you will loosely be part of a group simply because of your geographical location or proximity.

In a club, for example, your social status is highly relative to the people who are attending that club and is mostly based on your looks, clothes, body language, status cues, and group of friends.

Sometimes that will play well for you, and other times it will not.

For example, one evening I ended up in a club in Madrid where the local football players hang out. Most of the girls in there were hookers looking for football players.

The social currency there was (football) popularity and money.
I shouldn't need to tell you I was pretty much a nobody there :).

Forced Groups Are Free For All

Some groups form out of necessity and not out of our participants' own will.

Some examples are:

- High school
- Military drafts
- Prisons

These groups tend to be highly differentiated, and there is little overlap between what's popular in one group and what works in another group.

Popularity is the high school social currency; strength is the social currency in the military; and violence and alliances in prisons

Environmental Impact On Personal Values

Sometimes you will completely change the environment without joining any specific group.

For example: when you travel to different countries,

Simply being more exotic can get people to notice you more and make you more interesting.
Or because of stereotypes or real differences, you can be perceived as "better" than the people around you.

Dating is one of the starkest examples of social relativity.
A white man traveling to an African or Southeast Asian country will immediately boost his status.
In some cases, it will skyrocket your value. See this example of this Philippine woman, who had never seen me nor met me, throwing herself at me:

social relativity can swing to some crazy extremes

Win Every Time: Value Targeting

And now, how can you use the theory of social relativity in real life.

To get what you want from people, to start friendships, or to start a relationship: get and show them the currency they specifically value.

For example:

Get artistic value to date an artist

Do you like artistic folks, do you want to join an art circle and maybe have an artist as a wife/husband?

Of course, they are likely to want people with the same social currencies that they value.

Here's what you do: start drawing, acting, and attending art exhibitions.

You'll pick the lingo and the common topics and you'll be able to give the comfort of a shared culture and passion.

Or learn the history of art better than most and teach her about the history of art -women dream to sleep with their professors :)-.

Give business value to get business value

Do you want to mingle in business circles and attract a top business mentor?

Don't write you seek employment from them, that's what everybody does. Speak to him in a currency he wants instead.
Ideally, you'll go for an emotional bond and connection. Or he will want to be a father figure to you.

But that's not easy to achieve.
So the second best option is what all business people appreciate: "what's in it for them".

Tell him you'll work for free for 3 months, and if you're great and only if you're great he can start paying you.

Otherwise, you'll be happy for having learned from him and he got free labor.
Now he's going to listen.

Social Chameleon

Being a social chameleon is all about understanding what social currency the people around you appreciate.

And then playing up those qualities while muting the ones they don't.

In short: understand the group's social currency and trade that currency.

A breadth of experience will help you develop lots of reference points so that you will always have something to offer.

Group Social Value Drawbacks

The very nature of group specificity makes groups' status less valuable.

In the Small Pond Syndrome, we reviewed how some people spend an inordinate amount of energy to boost and defend their social statuses in some specific groups.
Only to one day move out of those groups and realize that what they had was… Meaningless.

The new group doesn't know about their previous social status and… They couldn't care less.

Now they're back to nobodies.

That's why unless you stick to a specific group for your whole life, I would advise caring little about the group's internal social status.

When Status is LESS Relative

Alright, here is the good news:

You can develop currencies that will work no matter which you join.

In The Social Exchange Rule, we reviewed that social relationships often obey a non-written rule based on social value exchange.

It postulates that the more social value you possess, the more you can demand from others.
We dubbed that social value "social currency".

In this article, we saw that the currencies always change depending on the group.

True.
That stands.

However, some currencies are almost always in demand, no matter the group you are in.

Some examples of them are:

- Social skills
- Conversation skills
- Great looks
- Lots of resources (or ability to acquire them)
- Confidence

When you possess them, you tend to do well in almost any social circle you join.

Better Specific Currencies or General Ones?

In some instances, groups' specific currencies, or the qualities that a specific group appreciates, can count more than the general ones.

And in extreme examples, even subvert them.

For example, a positive and upbeat personality is what most people like.
But if you want to enter a circle of emo and Gothic subcultures your smiles and positive attitude might make you an outcast.

However, as a rule of thumb, you should put all your effort into developing general-appeal currencies.

Those allow you to enter and do well in almost any group.

Developing group-specific currencies instead is dangerous and ties all your fortune to a single group.
And you're better off free as a bird than anchored to the same group for all your life :).

Summary

We have seen that what people value can be highly relative depending on the groups you join.

Your social status in those groups will hinge on whether or not you have the currencies that the group values.

Most groups however are not very strict and value what most other groups value.

Focus on those general currencies and you'll do great.

How Women Seduce Men: 3 Archetypes of Female Seduction

Lucio Buffalmano · 4 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Ever wondered why some women seem to hypnotize men without saying much?

This guide breaks down how top female seductresses do it — the psychology, power moves, and emotional hooks behind male desire.

Understand their playbook, so you can spot it, learn from it, and never lose control in the game of attraction.

Intro

First of all, there are several different ways to effectively seduce men.

That means that you don't need to change your natural self, but you can leverage your strengths.

Indeed, I highly recommend you choose a style that is most similar to your base character: nothing beats a sexy woman who's comfortable in her own skin (and game).

Some styles, like Marilyn Monroe, work on virtually every man.
But worry not: each seduction style in this article works for the majority of men.
Even many of those who say "they are not into that".

Let's start then.

1. Marilyn Monroe Seduction Style

> The Sexual Innocence

A guide on female seduction couldn't start with Marilyn Monroe.

Marilyn's seduction power plays on the mixed signals of always-on sex vibes coupled with her defenseless girly attitude.

1. Orgasmic Faces

Look at the first 10 seconds of the video below.

What does it make you, what sensations does it evoke in you?

It's a mix of orgasmic and dreamy expressions.
As if she'd just awakened. Or as if she'd never wake up. She's always there to take you to her dream world.

2. Innocence

The second most important element of Marilyn is innocence.

It's the mix of sex and innocence that is so explosive.

Sex alone is common and would make her no more than the typical TV soubrette.

Innocence is the element that allows her to scream sex from every pore without looking desperate.

Thanks to her innocence, Marilyn escapes labels: on the Madonna-Whore dichotomy, Monroe takes both.

Her natural aura of innocence gives Marilyn a huge advantage over almost any other woman.

With a mix of innocence and sex, she seduces men at two different levels:

- Carnal desire
- Male provider role

At the same time that men want to possess her, they also want to protect her.

3. Promises of Endless Pleasures

Look at the first 20 seconds of the video below.

Her voice, her softness, and her demure attitude are already captivating.
Then the interviewer asks a difficult question.

She pauses, without getting defensive or guarded.
She admits she doesn't know what to say, showing her vulnerability and inhibition.

Then she cracks a joke… And flashes her orgasmic face.
Marilyn in 20 seconds.

How does it feel?

Does it feel like this woman around the house would nag you about dirty dishes?
Or complain about crumbles in the kitchen?
No, it feels like she'd float around, never bothering, never pestering… And never rejecting his man for sex.

4. Madness

This is the last major pillar of Marilyn's appeal.

As Greene also explains in The Art of Seduction, men are smothered by the need to always be rational and in control.
And that's why irrationality and madness exert such an unconscious pull.

Madness also puts a man slightly on edge.
He never knows what's coming… And he never feels he fully has her.
All powerful tools to hook him in.

Notice how she lays against him, slightly unnatural. And how she's short of breath as if pained by some mysterious mental issue.

How Marilyn Seduces Men: Summary

If I had to summarize Marilyn feminine seduction powers in one sentence, it would be this:

Marilyn Monroe oozes sex to make every man think she's primed for intimacy, while also sending out submissive, naive, "protect me" signals that make men want to provide, protect, and invest at the same time.

And here are the steps:

- Look like sex
- Seem easy
- Add innocence
- Play the girl in need of protection
- Add a touch of madness and unpredictability: you're not easy to tie down

Aida Yespica Seduction Style

> The Sexual Tease

"Gatte morte" knows how to seduce a man.

I know that's not English.
There's no equivalent for that Italian expression. It would be something like a crossover between "tease" / "feminine" / "coy".

But we'll see what that means with examples.

In the latest years, I've never seen anyone topping Aida Yespica when it comes to the teasing seductive style.

Rumors had it she would charge thousands of Euros for her company before she even got famous.

And I still remember my friend's comment: "I would totally pay for it".

Now why would a penniless -and very handsome- teenager go into debt when he had an abundance of women -and when equally beautiful hookers were available at less than 100?-.

Because none of them knew how to use teasing to seduce a man, of course.

Try To Guess

Watch this video first, and see if you can guess who's the seductress we're talking about.

Don't just look at bodies.
Look at the overall aura:

Who makes you want to possess her the most?

It's not even a contest, right?
The girl who grabs her own boobs and shows her tongue is Aida Yespica.
Here is what makes Aida stand out:

1. Hedonistic Playfulness

It's all a game for her.

Life is dancing, laughing… And very possibly sex, we imagine.

Aida makes you feel like you're drinking from the source of eternal youth.
Because She is eternal youth and hedonistic passion.

If you want to have the same vibe:

- Laugh hard
- Dance with abandon
- Be positive and upbeat
- Socialize, make friends quickly
- Be happy, have a lust for life

2. Sexual Inhibition

Aida emanates confidence in her own body and sexuality.

It feels as if she could do it herself, she would.
And as she grabs and touches herself, many men probably imagine her doing just that.

There's a strong relationship between how much we accept our bodies and how inhibited we can get in bed.

We know that unconsciously, and that's why sexually inhibited seducers are so good at arousing men.

See her again in action:

Notice again that sexual liberation is only the first step, but not enough to get you into the Olympus of top seducers.
It's the tease and provocation that Aida adds to the mix indeed that takes her to the next level:

3. Sexual Provocation

The way Aida mixes sex and fun is a big provocation.

She puts sex in front of you, then pulls it away as if it was all in jest.
She pokes fun at your manhood.

It's like telling him:

> "I'd go for it… But you were too slow.. We're just friends now… Unless you're man enough to come and get me?".

That's the kind of sexual provocation the top coquettes go for.

It's waving the red flag in front of the bull, only to sidestep at the last second and get him chasing with his blood roiling.

Here's an example of the concept from a TEDx talk on seduction:

And now let's move to the third and most feminine seductive style.

Margarita Levieva Seduction Style

> The Essence of Feminity

An article on how to seduce a man could not avoid the most natural of seduction: pure, concentrated femininity.

It's Margarita Levieva, pure femininity in motion.

And I wasn't surprised to read she was born in Russia and was a competitive gymnast.

1. Dancing Skills

Some art expressions can give you big points when it comes to femininity and seduction.

Singers, violinists, and fashion designers are some of them.
And of course, dancing.

Dancing is the public, dressed-up expression of lovemaking. Nothing screams femininity like proper dancing:

2. Feminine Body Language

The devil is in the details.

The best feminine seducers incorporate highly feminine body language into their daily expressions, making it all-natural.

Even when they don't look like they're trying to seduce, they are still seductive.

Here's an example:

Did you guess it? The cues are head tilt and a slight swayback posture.

3. Flowing Motion

Men tend to move in a blockier fashion.

Some women, too.
And they are not seductresses.

Because the best seductresses move flowingly instead, like colorful butterflies.

Here's the perfect entrance: no bombast, but 100% femininity:

Notice how she moves like she's walking on air.
She's late but still doesn't hurry: she's a lady and the man can wait.

And most of all notice how she gets into the chair: she doesn't use her hands or pull the chair up.
She seductively moves her body.

4. Purring Voice

Notice in the above video her accent on the words "late", "ever" and "forgive".

It's like a cat purr. It's not about meaning, it's about sensuality.

A Goal Digger's Guide: Manipulative Tactics Exposed (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 4 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A Goal Digger's Guide (2010) teaches women how to attract rich men, get them to invest, and use that leverage for financial freedom. It's part manipulation playbook, part empowerment guide.

TPM Strategic Audit: This text is audited here as a study in a 'taker's approach' to dating (Resource Extraction strategy) and dating power dynamics. For the high-value man, this summary serves as strategic knowledge about the 'dark psychology tactics' to help you spot red flags and vet for quality and supportive women.

Key Takeaways

- Educate yourself, save up, and don't give it up
- Ask for what you want, and drop him if he doesn't give it
- Gold digging is a means to an end: financial independence is your end goal

Summary

A Gold Digger Guide is a pun between gold digging and goal digging. But it's actually both.
The author's approach is about chasing personal goals and never being dependent on anyone. But she pursues financial goals with gold-digging.

Here is how the author suggests combining both approaches:

1. Ask For What You Want

An effective gold digger always asks for what she wants.

Ask in front of other people too, so the pressure is on them to say yes.
And if they don't comply, leave right away.

If you're shy?
Use text or emails.

2. Never Apologize

This is all about power and interpersonal power dynamics.

If you never apologize, you come across more as an authority figure, and he's more likely to comply.

⁉️♂ Lucio's note: major red flag for men and women who also want a good relationship
Not apologizing when an apology is due is a major red flag. Not apologizing is a strong signal of dark triad personality, and it's often linked to gaslighting.

Also read:

- Judge power dynamics, linked to emotional power dynamics and authority figures

3. Go For Owners, Not Players

Go for wealthy low-key owners, not for the flashy guy with the abs.

Fletcher says men with real money often are low-key and don't flash around jewelry and sports scars.

You recognize owners through the people they have around, and how they treat them.

4. Never Ask What He Does

Unless he asks first, don't ask what he does.

When you do, you come across as too interested in his material wealth.

You want to recognize that he's rich beforehand, not ask him how rich he is.
Your confirmation will come later, once you will ask for what you want and he will provide it.

Ask Him What He Wants To Do Instead

If he asks first, don't reply like most other gold-diggers do. Ask him instead, so you can gauge what kind of man he is.

5. Test For His Compliance

Fletcher takes "shit tests" to a whole new level.

The first compliance is to test how hard they chase you and how much they invest in you.

You must screen out men who don't comply, men who don't chase, and men who don't invest.

If he is not complying, no need to waste your time.
Don't chase men who don't spend on you from the beginning or who don't come to you.

Money is useless unless they're willing to spend it.
And men who won't listen to you will rarely splurge on you when you ask.

The Subtle Gold Digger Test

So make sure you test his mettle early on by asking this:

> Gold Digger: What are you drinking

If he doesn't offer you the same, drop him.

6. Get His Contact Discreetly

Never use your phone when you're talking to a guy: it will seem like you're exchanging contacts and you come across as less exclusive.

If he takes his phone out, tell him to put it away.

Instead, memorize his number.
Baje has some tricks to memorize phone numbers, and I invite you to check the book for that.

My Note:
I think exchanging business cards might be a happier medium than memorizing phone numbers.

7. Take a Look at The Backdoors

Actual backdoors.

Important and rich men often use backdoors and alleyways to get in: keep an eye on them.

And make friends with DJs, bouncers, and managers to get the lowdown on people and to know who's there.

8. Meet Outside the Restaurant

Why?

So he can pay for parking and fuel.

If you're afraid of asking, make him follow you to your car when you leave and tell him you need to stop for gas.

If he doesn't offer to pay, ditch him.

9. Don't Listen to His Life Story (to Stay Detached)

If the gold digger listens to him, she will start seeing more as a person.
But, the author says, the gold diggers cannot allow themselves to fall for him and must maintain emotional detachment.

In a way, the author's advice here is to become 'more psychopathic', having no empathy, and only seeing him as a target.
This is why it's almost never a good idea for men to date gold diggers.

If You Think He's Lying...

… Ask the question and stay silent.

The pressure will lead to adding more details or dig himself deeper.

10. Buy Him a Drink

To throw him off.
That's something that rarely happens to him.

Bonus: Ask a No Question to Skip Intimacy

This technique leverages reciprocity from the social exchange.

The author says that there will be times when a guy may pressure for sex. And you don't want to give him sex. When you feel like you want to get out of there or you need an excuse to deny him: ask a no question.

A no question is a large request which will compel him to say no. Once he says no, you have an excuse to refuse him or to leave.

Baje's Books Recommendation

Baje Fletcher also recommends a bunch of books to read, among which:

- The 48 Laws of Power <—⍰⍰♂ List of maxims, not an 'how to'. Complement with 'dating power dynamics 101'
- The Art of Seduction <—⍰⍰♂ Solid. Consider the deeper Seduction University
- Poor Dad Rich Dad <—⍰⍰♂ Good, but it's basic
- Think and Grow Rich <—⍰⍰♂ Some good points, but lots of woo-woo.

Check out our recommended best resources:

- Best books and courses for self-empowerment

PROS

- Empowering go-getter approach

We do not agree or endorse all of Baje's advice, especially the Machiavellian taker's attitude, which doesn't align with our honorable preference.

But this book isn't just gold-digging, it's goal-setting.

The main dish is about self-improvement, long-term planning, and achieving one's goals.

Cons

A Goal Digger Guide is chock full of great tips, and with real-life stories and examples, but:

Misses Advanced Seduction

Although several tips and techniques are spot-on, the deeper psychological insights that make men crave her were missing.

So while A Goal Digger Guide may be good for some tricks, it's not as good for deeper seduction.

Baje doesn't mince words, so the book is heavy in manipulation techniques, but then again, would anyone expect anything different from this type of book?

Review

A Goal Digger's Guide is an entertaining read that offers a mix of practical tips on how to be a gold digger, and genuine self-development strategies and mindsets.

While the guide also shares tips on 'the art of gold digging', it may as well be called "get an education, invest in yourself, and plan for your future".

I leave you with one of my favorite quotes from the author.
She says some women get weak in the knees in the presence of celebrities and very rich men.
But they're just normal people, she says.
And talking about one of them who got the cash, but not the manners and skills, she comments:

> In my eyes he was just another brother who happened to get a lucky break, but still had no clue how to handle a woman.

Summary

About The Author:
Tim Ferriss says in the introduction that he is not a doctor and you should consult your doctor for any doubts, issues, and pre-existing conditions.
Tim Ferris indeed is an American entrepreneur and "hack-seeker" who became famous after his first book "The 4 Hour Work Week".

🤔Lucio's Take On Tim Ferriss

> Lucio: Tim Ferris is a bit of an over-optimizer, sometimes a bit too Machiavellian, I don't follow him… But he's a smart guy, not a bad guru, and can be a worthy guy to learn from

Foods To Avoid

Avoid white carbohydrates, which are:

- White bread

- Pasta
- Cereals
- Potatoes
- Rice
- Crackers

And also avoid:

- Cream-based sauces (herbs and spices are fine)
- No deep-fried (stir-fried is OK)
- No whole grains or steel-cut oats

Beverages: Mostly Stick to Water

Drink plenty of water.

No juices, milk and limit soft drinks to 500ml max, and only diet versions.
If you like coffee and tea, drink them without sugar.

Note:
The diet version of soft drinks often contains “hidden sugars”, some of which are even worse than sucrose.

Alcohol: Dry Wines, Without Sugar

If you like wines, the best ones are dry and red (no more than 1.4% of sugar content).
Avoid champagne.

Note:
1.4% feels like quite a random number to me.
But here are my favorite low-sugar wines:

- Rosso di Montalcino DOC 2020 – Caparzo.
  Residual sugar: 1.3
- Nipozzano Chianti Rufina Riserva
  Residual sugar: 1.6
- Brunello di Montalcino DOCG 2015
  Residual sugar: 1

No Fruits

Most doctors and nutritionists do recommend lots of fruits.

Not Tim Ferris.

Tim Ferris recommends no fruits for your diet.
He says that in the research literature, there is no consensus on the benefits of eating lots of fruits.

The only exceptions are tomatoes and avocado -but not too much of it-.

My Note:
Ferris talks about the benefits of “lots of fruits”, which is generic and specific at the same time.
What does he mean by “lots”? And who says that “some” fruits per day are not good?

Allowed Food

These are the food you can eat and enjoy:

- Eggs (organic)
- Fish: such as tuna and salmon
- Meat types: chicken, beef, pork
- Legumes such as: lentils, black beans, pinto beans, red beans, soybeans
- Most vegetables such as: spinach, asparagus, broccoli, peas, beans
- Nuts: almonds, walnuts, etc.
- Tomatoes
- Yogurt

Repeat The Same Meals

Tim Ferris suggests you repeat the same meals over and over.

He says that the research literature shows no consensus on the merits of a balanced and diversified diet.

But if you still crave variety, then you can mix the allowed foods above.

My Note:
Again Ferris mentions “no consensus”.
But the consensus is almost never reached: one single small study proving Y against a thousand proving X would still mean no consensus. Yet you’re far better off with X.

Cheat DayL One Day a Week Binge

The concept of “cheat day” has become very popular in dieting.

In short, it means:

Pick a single day in a week in which you can eat as much as you want of whatever you want.

I personally disagree with cheat days.
And not because I’m a nutritionist expert, but because logically -and psychologically- they make little sense.
For the logic, Sean explains far better than I ever could:

Use Thermal Dieting For Faster Weight Loss

And now we finally get into Ferris’ penchant for hacks :).

When we are in a cold environment we lose calories due to heat loss.
So you can accelerate your weight loss with “cold treatment”.

Tim recommends cold showers and ice packs on the back of the neck and upper back for 30 minutes (you can also do it while watching a movie).

And drink half a liter of icy water when you wake up.

Avoid These Common Mistakes

Tim Ferris lists a few of the common mistakes people make.

I will pick the best ones and transform them from the negative form (not eating..) to the positive form (make sure you do..).

Make sure you:

- Eat within half an hour of waking up
- Eat enough proteins (at least 20 grams per meal)
- Drink lots of water, especially on the binge days
- Avoid too much sweeteners, whether artificial or natural
- Avoid lifting and going to the gym too much (2-3 times a week is enough)

The 15 Minutes Orgasms

Tim Ferris also has some tips on how to reach orgasms.

Here's the gist (for men):

- In missionary shift weight on the hips and grind her clitoris
- When at the bottom, rise up so that your torso is at 160 degrees (lean back 20 degrees)

For the improved angle missionary and the pictures, you must get the book.
Or read:

- How to last longer in bed

CONS

- Simply average or poor advice

Please learn from those who actually know what they're talking about:

- Outdated

Nutrition evolves quickly, and you're probably better off with newer content

- NOT Good for Binge Eaters

This diet is not good for people who have food addiction (ie.: binge eating, huge cravings, often thinking about food).

People high on the food addiction scale must skip the binge days (also read "Bright Line Eating")

- Over-analyses & Obsessions Make For Poor Quality Life

Tim Ferris is a “hacks” guy with a geek approach to nutrition

“x grams of this a day”, “a capsule of that at this time”, “percentage variation of Y” etc.

That’s what also makes him a great writer and what makes the 4-hour body great.

On the other hand, though, there are so many factors influencing whatever we measure in our body, that one has really to wonder: what about being fooled by randomness?

And if you pick up the same attitude, you will be spending most of your time measuring instead of living.

- Health as Mathematical Obsession

In general, being data-driven is good.

But not all realms of life can be exactly measured.

And I find Tim Ferris in general to be too numbers-driven in realms that are difficult to reduce to simple equations.

It feels like the author feels he can measure anything and find a direct correlation to body size, shape, and energy levels.
But there are plenty more variables that can make these too-detailed measures not only a fool’s errand but actually misleading.

Campbell in Whole refers to it as a mathematical equation approach to nutrition, and he says it’s wrong. I agree with Campbell.

- Heavy Cognitive Load

Following Tim’s full list of advice, your diet can become a big heavy cognitive load in measuring amounts and applying ice packs.

What I’d wonder is: are you living for your diet, or is your diet that should be serving your life?

- Too Many Topics?

From weight loss to exercise, it makes sense.

But diet, orgasms, testosterone, sperm banks, and “engineering sleep” might be a lot for someone who’s looking for an answer to a specific question.
(that being said, it’s all interesting and important stuff Tim writes about).

PROS

- He Worked On It

Tim Ferris did research hard for The 4-Hour Body, and I appreciate that a lot.

Review

I find The 4-Hour Body to be dated and a purveyor of many debunked myths.

And back when it first came out, it might have been one of the first forerunners -and myth inflaters- of the low-carb diet.

It’s also counterproductive to approach food with the “geek mindset”.

This is something that Michael Pollan calls “nutritionism” in In Defense of Food and he explains very well all the drawbacks of looking at the single nutrients instead of the whole food.

I prefer a more holistic, whole-food approach. Which is also simpler to live with.

Disagree on Binge Days

Tim says a binge day a week is actually helpful to lose fat.

And I have no reason to doubt it may have been helpful for Tim Ferris.
But I just didn't like the idea. For sugar lovers "eating whatever you want" could easily mean kilos of pies, desserts, and ice creams.

I don't think that's good. Plus there is food that should be off-limits at any time, like industrial trans fats.

Addendum: after reading books such as Hunger by Roxane Gay I understand that binge days are not just a real issue, but completely a bad idea for people with food addictions. Also, check out Bright Line Eating.

- Develop a system of automated withdrawals for your investment
- Defend from downside risks: it's more important than gaining
- Don't forget: money is only a tool and an enabler. Think about why you want and how you'll use it

TPM Note: Compound interest is 'slow-lane', not for smart and ambitious men
Robbins approach is a valid system that works for many, and is especially useful for overspenders. But it's less suited for ambitious and smart men who may be better off with entrepreneurship. Also consider that Tony Robbins advocates this model, but didn't use it for himself.

Summary

About The Author:
Tony Robbins is a self-help guru and not an investment expert himself. And with his brief forays into financial advice in his early work, he often left me scratching my head.
But things have changed with "Master the Game", where he did his homework and where he consulted with top financial experts such as Ray Dalio.

More on Robbins:

> Lucio: Robbins is a fantastic motivational speaker, a self-help "guru" with great content… And an endless marketer and covert bragger. Still thumbs up, though

These are the most important takeaways of "Money Master The Game":

1. Develop an Automated Investment Plan

Don't stress about money: develop a system.

Tony Robbins says that most people with a normal job will not manage to earn financial freedom unless they're deliberate about it.

And that's what you should do: be deliberate and build an automated withdrawal order for your investments.

Then forget about that money and let the compound interest do the work for you.

2. Know the Basic Investment Rules

Tony Robbins proceeds to bust some myths about the market that many people hold:

- You can beat the market

No, only very, very few people manage to beat the market and only a tiny minority of professionally managed mutual fund does.

Better instead than you invest in an index fund matching the big indexes, such as an ETF.

- Mutual funds hide their fees

There is a litany of hidden fees when investing in mutual funds, and the average total fee adds up to 3.17%.

That's huge when you take into account that you will be missing a huge chunk of compound interest year after year.

That's another huge reason to use ETF and passively managed index funds.

- Mutual funds embellish their returns (ie.: don't lose money!)

Tony Robbins says that a core tenet of investing is that it's more important to avoid losses than to make gains.

If you go down 50% in your first years and you go back up 50%, you're still overall down 25%.
But the mutual fund will mask that reality by only stating the nominal changes.

- Brokers might not be on your side

Brokers need to increase your money and the company's money.

Those are often mutually exclusive, so he often has a conflict of interests. For those who live in the US, a registered investment advisor is a much better choice.

- Your 401(k) is not a good investment vehicle

The 401(k) is at the mercy of all the top three myths.

And it also taxes your withdrawals and doesn't do anything to shield you from the timing risk (ie.: you need to retire your money during a financial crisis).

- Target date funds aren't that safe

Target date funds start very risky when you begin your contribution and become progressively more conservative as you get closer to retirement.

The idea is that by being more conservative you will not lose much on your retirement day if there will be a financial crisis.

The idea is good, but it often rests on a bad concept: that bonds are safer than stocks.

3. What You Really Want: Your Life Vision

Tony Robbins explains that nobody really wants money.

And you should better investigate what it is that you actually want.
He says what you want is something the money might help you to get and he introduces his principle of the six basic human needs.

Once you know what you're really after, you can determine what it will cost you financially.

And you might easily find out you don't need nearly as much as you thought -or you can find a way to get to your need at a fraction of the overall costs, for example by leasing or renting-.

4. The 5 Levels of Financial Success

Tony Robbins lists five levels of financial success:

1. Financial Security: half the basic costs

When you reach a point where the returns on your investments and savings will pay for half of your basic costs (housing, food).

At that point, you reach a fundamental level of independence: you can choose a job you really like instead of a job that you might not like but which pays more.

You are also allowed to take risks to chase your dream: launch a startup or start freelancing for example.

2. Financial Vitality: half discretionary spending

If you can cover half of your discretionary spending (sports, entertainment) you are halfway through never having to work at all again.

3. Financial Independence: all basic costs

Once you can cover half your discretionary spending and all your basic costs, you reached the point where you do not have to work again unless you want to.

4. Financial Freedom: some luxury spending

When you can afford some significant luxury spending (sport-scar, holiday house, etc.)

5. Absolute Financial Freedom: whatever you want

There are many steps you can take to achieve the level you would like to achieve.

Cutting costs, saving more, finding a way to save on taxes, or… Move to a cheaper country. Or to a country that will provide you with lots of things you like.

Italy, for example, can give you the sea, the best food and wines in the world, and all the history and culture you want.

5. Learn The Investment Vehicles

Tony Robbins goes into the nuts and bolts of investment and describes many different investment vehicles you could use.

A simple Google search for each investment vehicle will give you all the basics about each one (ie.: stocks, bonds, options, and commodities being the four main ones).

6. Upside Without Downside: The Dalio Secret

This is possibly the best part of the book because Tony Robbins relies heavily on one of the best investors in the world: Ray Dalio.

Here's the allocation:

- Long-term US bonds: 40%
- Stocks: 30%
- Intermediate US bonds: 15%
- Gold: 7.5%
- Commodities: 7.5%

Backtesting this portfolio, you would have solidly beat the market.

The secret of this allocation is that it heavily shields you against losing years, which as we have seen are the years that really impair your long-term growth.

My Note: Backtesting does not assure future performance.
Especially now that this portfolio mix is out in the open.

7. Retiring in Safety

Robbins explains that with the advances in medicine, we can expect to live longer.

That's great.
But it also means that once you retire you need to know how to allocate your resources.

Treasuries and CDs provide terrible returns, so he recommends fixed-indexed annuities

8. Money is Only a Tool

In the last part, Tony steps back from pure money talk and goes back to the big picture.

He says the three most important decisions in your life are:

- What do you focus on
- What does your life mean
- What you will do (action)

Money only enables you to leverage your decisions in those three areas. And money will allow you to better enjoy life's beauties, like experiences, quality time, and giving.

Use the money for growth and contribution and you'll live a happier and healthier life.

Real-Life Applications

Don't Invest in Mutual Fund
Fees are often too high and eat away at your long-term growth

Don't Use Brokers
They often have a conflict of fiduciary duties (between your interests and their companies' interests)

CONS

"MONEY Master The Game" is the best book on personal finance and personal investment.

But it comes with a few cons, too:

Implies Past Predicts Future: Performance Is NEVER Guaranteed

The idea that all books on investment rely on is that financial assets will always go up… On a long enough timeline.
As Nassim Taleb explains in Fooled by Randomness, that's not true:

1. The past doesn't equal the future, there are no guarantees that returns will beat inflation, let alone that they will stay at 7%
2. On a long enough timeline… We're all dead

You might want to keep that in mind.

Fails to Address Inflation & Quality of Life

Rarely do I hear compound interest theorists talk about inflation.
Or what giving up those monthly installments will do to the quality of life of average or below-average-income people.

Or… That someone may not live until old age to enjoy the money.

Compound Interest Is A Half Lie

"Money Master the Game" rests on the compound interest concept (including the usual crazy-sounding examples).

I love Robbins, but it's NOT how he made his money.
It's what DeMarco calls the "paradox of practice". Tony Robbins didn't get a private jet and an island investing a few hundred a month. He got there using the Millionaire Fastlane. Or check Rich Dad Poor Dad.

That concept makes you somewhat wealthy, that may be true. But when you're old… IF all turns out well. Which is a big if, as we've seen above.

Conflict of Interest?

I haven't investigated myself so I can't deny or confirm, but it's a flag I feel like I need to raise.

The highest-rated negative review on Amazon warns that Robbins' son works for one of his highly recommended companies.
Check out the review and replies here and judge for yourself:

US – Centered

It's not a con but a plus if you're a US citizen. But if you're not a US citizen, the practical side of Money Master the Game is US-centered.

PROS

Well Researched
Tony Robbins interviewed the who's who of the financial industry here, which gives Money Master The Game an authority level that Tony couldn't have reached on his own.

Top Information
I listed a lot of cons there, but if you've got lots of cash and want to grow your money with long-term investments, then Money Master The Game is one of the best books of its genre.

Review

Tony has taken huge strides since his (poor) earlier years of financial advice.

With "MONEY Master The Game", he has done some major legwork and interviewed several top financial minds.

And you can see the results.

What he says makes a lot of sense and some of the insights he shares can be life-changing for some. And even for those who don't plan on living to invest such as myself, you will still gain super helpful insights.

In short:
MONEY Master the Game is a great financial crash course. Plus, some valid Tony Robbins mindsets all over it.

Full Summary

About The Author: Steve Harvey is an American comedian and TV host. He has no formal background in psychology but has made a name for himself when it comes to dating advice and relationships with his best-seller "Act Like A Lady, Thinks Like A Man".

Intro:

Steve Harvey says that not all men are ready for a relationship.

Why not?

Because some of them are not yet mature enough for it.
Some men need to learn how to be men before they can focus on a fully committed relationship.

And he gives an overview of how men change depending on their age:

How Men Think: The Age Factor

Harvey refers heavily here to the key concept of how man defines themselves from his previous book Act Like a Lady Think Like a Man.

The idea is that man defines themselves along the line of:

- Who he is (title)
- What he does (main occupation)
- What he gets in return (how much he makes)

Men in Their 20's: Finances Higher Prio Than Women

He is just beginning to get his bearings on life as an adult and just finding out about the three cornerstones of manhood.

Steve says that men have a "financial clock" similar to a woman's "biological clock", and it starts in earnest in his 20's

Men in Their 30's: Getting Tired of Chasing Skirts

He is achieving some of his life goals and getting tired of chasing skirts.

He also starts grappling with the idea that he will not always be young and fit to be the kind of father he wants to be.

For the first time, he starts seriously thinking about children's timelines.

If he looks unhappy and still working hard to make his life plan a reality, he might not be ready to commit yet.

To be sure: check how he spends time on hobbies and friends outside of work. If he has a lot of time for extra-work activities, then he also has time for a family.

Note: keep in mind Steve Harvey is talking about ambitious men here.

Men in Their 40s: If He's Single, It's For A Reason

A man in his forties feels good about his life and is in his prime, especially if he's a husband and a dad.

But if he's single, he's single for a reason.
He might be afraid of commitment, happy with the single life, or giving up on the idea of a family.

If he's recently divorced, it's likely he'll be chasing skirts again for a while, and it might take him a few years to be ready for serious relationships again.

Men in Their 50's: Consolidating Legacies

Are looking to solidify their legacies and are a lot more open to having a woman around and growing old with her.

Are Women Intimidating?

Many women, especially successful women, say that men are intimidated by them.

But Harvey says that's BS. And it's only an excuse for women to rationalize why they're single.

He says men are OK with strong and independent women. What men have a problem with, is not being needed. And that's what some of these women do.

Harvey says it's also OK to tell people and men about your big credentials. But he poignantly asks: what about some truths after?

Yes, you are really happy, but you're also looking for a man to complete you. You got yourself halfway, but you also want a husband to get you to 100%.

Also, read:

- Are men intimidated or rational?

Women Who Make More Money

Harvey says that men will not hold it against you that you're making more, but against themselves.

Especially if that involves staying at home with the children and he didn't choose it, he will not be happy about it.

Read;

- Effective dating for successful women

Difficulties of Strong, Successful Women

I find that Harvey really dispenses some big truths when he tackles the problems that successful career women face.

It's that they only look at men who are equally successful.

But men who are equally successful look at a bigger chunk of the dating pool.

Sugar Daddies Aren't Sweet

Steve Harvey says that you might feel good and smart when a sugar daddy is pampering you and buying you stuff.

But those men enter those relationships willingly, you're not really pulling his legs on anything. And it's actually likely that you're the one being played.

No More Games: Asking the Right Questions

Harvey says that men will only give you the answers that will make them look best.

He will use the buzzwords such as commitment, kids, hard work, etc. But those are only superficial answers.
To get to the real truth, you gotta dig deeper.

The secret for Harvey is to ask three questions.
After two questions, men have no more in their lying pool. And you'll get the truth.
So for example you say:

1. Why did you divorce from your wife?
2. If she was a good woman, why didn't you work harder on it?
3. If you were caring and were looking for more support, what made her give up?

And then Harvey tells a great story of how exactly that worked for him.
You cannot grill him like in the Menace to Society scene (below), says Harvey, but drop the questions over time.

Avoid grilling men like an FBI investigator.

And he has one more great tip. Tell him that honest men turn you on.

Always Look Good

Harvey recommends you always look good.

When you're still looking for a man, you'll be ready for any chance. And when you're in a relationship, it's still important to put in the effort to keep a healthy relationship.

The 90 Days Rule

Harvey restates his 90 days rule for sex.

I don't fully agree with that though, check my why you shouldn't let him wait for sex.

No Nagging

Harvey stresses how so many women do it wrong when they want their men to do something.

They use passive aggressiveness, silent treatment, or, worst of all, full-blown verbal aggression.

He says though that it's a question of priorities, and your man's priorities aren't necessarily the same as yours and you should understand that.
Of course, he'll do the dishes… But not right after eating maybe.

He says you should be more diplomatic and pick your battles and use more of the:

The Relationship Art of The Deal

The art of the deal is a sort of a tit for tat.

You help him in what matters for him and he helps you in what matters for him.

Harvey advises that you start the conversation with an appreciation and ask him what you could do more for him. Once you agree on something you can do for him, then you ask him what he can do for you.

Real-Life Applications

Show Appreciation
Show him you appreciate his help. It's the best way to make him happy and make him want to keep doing the good stuff.

Don't Nag and Scream
Don't ever nag or scream, it's the fastest way to kill his love in the long run (I can't agree more with that).

Give To Take
To take, learn to give. Always be ready for a good deal: do what he cares for, and have him do more for you care for.

Review

"Straight Talk No Chaser" is a great book to understand the everyday psychology of dating from the male mind's perspective.

It provides a lot of hard truths that some women would do well to heed, such as being more feminine instead of complaining men are intimidated.

And it shares some great insights and very useful wisdom for women in a relationship.

How Women ‘Mindfuck’ Men: Dark Triad Tactics Analyzed

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This article exposes the psychological tactics Machiavellian women use to control the dating power dynamics and trigger obsessive attraction.

This article analyzes 12 “mind-fuck” tactics associated with Dark Triad seduction. It breaks down the psychological patterns behind these attraction dynamics so men can recognize sexually manipulative tactics and protect their emotional frame.

Knowledge is power. Understanding these dynamics helps you spot them early and avoid getting pulled into obsession-inducing games.

Note on Ethics & Power Dynamics: While some of these tactics can be integrated into healthy, high-value relationships, many are inherently manipulative. We advocate for a “win-win” approach to dating. However, these dynamics remain objectively effective. We analyze them here so men can recognize the patterns and choose better partners.

1. The Dionysiac Mind-Fuck

You know how men like watching the craziest dancer on the dance floor?

That's the appeal of the dionysiac spirit.

There's much external pressure on men to appear rational and in control more times than they'd want to.
And that's why irrationality and a touch of madness can be so appealing to the unconscious.

And a woman who can muster irrational abandon and Dionysiac sexuality exerts an irresistible pull on him.

Example

Look at this example from "Dating In The Dark".
She uses a Dionysian spirit of irrationality to make him want to possess her.

Notice his reaction when he says:

> Mindfucked guy: In a weird way I'd still like to see Ilona

And then he ends with “damn”.
He’s been taken for a ride. And he just experienced the power of irrationality:

> Her: Did you hear that? Whenever I’m in bed with someone I really really fancy my stomach always does that
> (…)
> Her: That must be someone in this room I really fancy. It could be you. Or it could be a spirit, a ghost
> (…)
> Her: We don’t come from apes, we actually came from dogs
> (…)
> Her: We’re not gonna get married, are we
> Him: (commenting later on his date) my date with Ilona was like jumping straight into the twilight zone. The whole thing was one shock after the other. But in a weird way I’d like to see Ilona again because I’m just so confused. But… Damn!

In this example, she effectively makes him want to possess her.
The downside in this specific case is that she also ends up looking like a low-quality girl.

But madness is not synonymous with stupid and seductresses do the same without looking stupid.

See the example from Aida Yespica in:

- 3 styles to seduce a Man

2. Madonna-Whore Seduction

Carnal desire and a powerful sexual chemistry validate men and enslave their minds.

But there is a danger: one might appear too “easy” if it’s too soon (see: Madonna-Whore Dichotomy).

Advanced players resist him AND show an overpowering sexual lust: the best of both worlds.

Example

This is a quick story of a woman (unconsciously) using the madonna-whore seduction on me:

🤔♂Lucio’s Experience

Lucio:
She was willing and into it, but still delaying.

So I decided to let her do some touching.
I took her hand and started running it across my body.
My abs, then down on my upper leg and thigh. Then slowly back up again.

Finally, I slide her hand across my crotch.

And then back up again.
On the next pass, I let her linger a bit more on my crotch. Then lower down again.
Eventually, I let her slip under the underwear's elastic band. But just a dip.

A few more motions and then I finally let her lace her fingers around it.
And that's when she jumped on me, panting heavy and her tongue swirling in my mouth.

She was showing me all the signs of pure sexual abandon.

I'm thinking we reached the 'boiling point' and we're ready to go.
But she snaps back to rational and delaying.

Have you figured out which part is the madonna/whore seduction?

Of course her panting and horny is the whore, while resisting again in spite of her dripping sexuality is the Madonna part.

The succession of unbridled lust and rational resistance lasted for a while. I'm not a fan of women resisting for long, but of all the resistances I've encountered… That was the best lead-up to sex I have ever had.

I sometimes still think about it…

How They Do It

Simple:

Machiavellian women show powerful sexual attraction while also fighting off the urge.

- They let him come to them
- They abandon themselves in the heat of the moment
- They suddenly “wake up”: it’s not easy but they’re forcing themselves to stop
- Rinse and repeat

For more techniques on delaying sex also read: how to turn down sex.

And here is a short video example from the movie “Seduce and Abandoned”:

3. Push-Pull Seduction

Lust and emotional dependency thrive on mixed feelings.

Anger and lust, passion and fear, warmth and coldness. And, most of all, physical heat and emotional distance.

The key is to alternate them.
Advanced players give positive feelings, then take it away. Then have lustful sex. Then rinse and repeat.

A mix of strong and positive emotions alternating with negative ones rarely fails to make men lust and obsess over dark triad seductresses.

Example

🙍♂️Lucio’s Experience

Lucio:
My date was late and, slightly annoyed, I used that time to shop for groceries.

When I came out, there she stood: a perfect candid baby face with a striped suit (mixed signal).

She didn’t apologize and was cold and distant when I hugged her. That annoyed me once again.
I asked her to help me carry the grocery.

And she refused.

My patience was running out.
I was teetering between telling her to go back home or take her back and possess her.
Of course I decided for the latter.

We walked without exchanging a single word for a couple of minutes, and then she went from cold to teasing.
She made fun of sulking me.
She told me I should call her “miss no” and teased me if other women do the same (she sets herself up as “different” and “superior”).

Then she finally swung the opposite direction.
She apologized, took more than half the grocery and lightly hit me with her leg as if to say “wise up, I was just messing with you”.

I was already horny, but that boosted it even further.

How They Do It

Machiavellian women make him feel like the best man in the world, make him feel like he can make them so happy and satisfied.

Then they take it all away and keep him guessing.

- They love him, then
- They make him angry
- They are cold and distant, then
- They have wild sex
- They are cuddly (letting them think for a while they have them)
- Rinse and repeat

4. Mixed Signals Seduction

Similar as above.

Push and pull is a typical form of mixed signal and the most famous example, but there’s more tactics seductresses can use:

- Angelic face (paternalistic instincts) + naughty undertones
- White dress & blonde hair (purity)+ revealing clothes
- Baby face (naivety) + suit (seriousness)
- Striped suit, back from office (power) + asking him to possess her

The Madonna-whore sexual seduction also leverages push-pull and mixed signals

5. Regression Seduction

> Nobody really ever leaves his mother

Here's a sum of Western women's dating strategy:

1. Show no emotions
2. Pretend they're not into him
3. Make him chase and invest

While that definitely can work (albeit often with the wrong guys!), the opposite strategy can work even better.

And the opposite is what Robert Greene dubs "regression seduction" in his seminal The Art of Seduction.
Greene says that the most powerful Regression, the Infantile Regression, is all about unconditional love.

Example

An ex-girlfriend of mine was a natural when it came to oedipal regression strategy.
This was what my ex did:

Healing Kisses

- I woke up one morning with little sleep and dark circles around my eyes. She leaned in and kissed the area under my eyes

That was unexpected.
I fumbled a "thanks" and a smile.
I couldn't even remember my mother having done that, and I was smitten by her display of caring.

Sleeping Temple Kisses

- During sleep I realized that before going to the bathroom she kissed me on the temple

Tucking In

- When I'd join her in bed, she would raise the cover to help me in
- On a night flight, I fell asleep and woke up with the sleeping cover snugly arranged on me (she did that for me)

These are caring signals the way a mom would do to a baby.

How did that affect me?

It's easy to tell sex stories, but it's less easy to be open with emotional ones. But the truth is that I still feel emotionally connected to my ex. I think of her as "my baby", but probably the opposite would be more correct. And if I have to think of an ex-girlfriend I'd ever want to be together forever, it would be her.

Example

Listen to what she says:

> Charlie: Always trying to get back to that primary state of completeness, connectednesss, they took total care of me, and I felt peace in their presence.

And again:

> Charlie: why this relationship sticks so much with me. What about this girl? I don't care. This other girl? I don't care. But this one? Oh, call her right now

That's total emotional control.

And again:

> Charlie: this person must provide for your most basic needs to feel save, loved, and enough. (…)
> With this woman was the only time I let myself watch movies, I let myself eat junk food, it was the only time I let my brain take time off work

How They Do It

Dark triad seductresses use this one when they want a strong long-lasting relationship.

For the specific moves, advanced players copy the above examples and add some of these:

- They caress him
- They remove lints, fix his clothes
- They show unconditional love when he makes a mistake
- They show total acceptance
  - They say they like his belly
  - They say they like him when he's dorky
  - They say they like him when he's drowsy in the morning

Best With

It works with everyone.

And it's especially useful if Machiavellian women want to hook wealthy but rascal playboys, or driven men who can never let go.
They will use and forget all other women, but they'll always come back to the seductress.

6. Inverse Regression Seduction

This is the inverse regression.

Youthful behavior is attractive to men for evolutionary reasons (Buss, 2016), and in the presence of youth some men feel like their own youth is coming back.

They get to feel like fathers and take care of the seductress, but with the addition of the sexual side.

Mixing sex and innocence is exactly what made Marilyn Monroe so appealing.

Example

> Him: (jokingly chases her with a knife)
> Her: (shrieks like a baby, runs away)

How They Do It:

- They play naive, lost… In need of protection and guidance
- They laugh out loud and with gusto: they haven't experienced the darker side of life yet
- They feel free to be awkward: they haven't yet internalized society's rules of "proper" behavior
- They emphasize weaknesses and vulnerabilities

The rules bend with inverse regression.
Don't worry about entitlement mentality or asking too much: children are egocentric and believe the world revolves around them.
And he will act accordingly and do everything for the seductress.

Best For:

This is perfect for Machiavellian women to get sugar daddies to pamper and spoil them.

Reversal:

Some men can be put off (I once told a girl playing baby with her Tweety underwear not to wear them anymore).

It's lightheartedness with sex undertones, not full-on baby. The first part here is good, the last one is too much.

7. Guilt-Trip

Some Machiavellian female players don't just stop at sex and seduction, but enter into the more morally fraught realm of emotional manipulation.

To become 'the judge' and control him, they may try to make him feel bad for some putative failures of morality, masculinity.
The more he seeks her approval while trying to make things right, the more she controls him.

Example

There are many sexual moments I'd like to relive in my life.

Some of them, because they were great.
Some others, because I didn't have her and thought I should have had her.

But if I could go back in time one time, and one time only, that would be to change things with the woman who told me:

> Ex-fling: I wish I had never done it with you.

Something changed the day she uttered those words.

I could no longer look at myself and say I'm a giver.
In a way, those words stole my innocence and burned a little hole in my conscience.
And even to this day, after she forgave me, I still feel I need to make it up to her.

How They Do It:

- They let him feel he pushed too hard
- They tell him they feel so hurt
- They let him know they're devastated after he cheated

As Harvey correctly points out, men who cheated often go back to being perfect husbands. But only if the seductress makes him feel bad about it.

Reversal:

It will not work with narcissists and psychopaths.
Some of them will even see it as a badge of their deceptive skills.

8. Dangerous Woman Seduction

Danger mixes well with madness and irrationality, and takes it a step further.

Danger is exciting, that's one of the reasons why heart-breaking players appeal to women and why James Bond is so alluring.

And, if present, it also plays into possible latent masochistic tendencies.

Example

We were pillow talking and she was prodding about me and my life -funny how some women remember to do that after, BTW-.

I love after-sex conversations. You can drop the masks and really be yourself.
But back then "myself" was a bit of a childish tw*t.

So when it came to talking about love and past relationships, I delivered my line -which I thought was so cool-:

> Me: "just don't fall in love with me"

With a serious and stern tone she said:

> Her: "No, I will fall in love with you and then I will kill you"

I laughed at the beginning thinking how that was the best comeback I had ever heard.
But I also realized later I was perversely more attracted to her.

The “Dangerous Woman Seduction” is also one of the driving seduction forces of the movie “Basic Instinct”, where in the final sex scene he suspects and fears for his life.

9. Possessive Dominance Seduction

Disclaimer: Prioritize mutual respect and consent
These dynamics are sometimes symptomatic of a toxic relationship. Prioritize safety, consent, and meantal health

Anger, aggression, and attraction are distinct constructs, but can powerfully overlap.

Physical domination appeals to some women more than most people would care to admit.
For many women, the fantasy of being ‘overpowered’ is a powerful aphrodisiac (Ogas, 2011; Costa, 2022; Critelli & Bivona, 2008; Joyal et al., 2015).

And, sometimes, more than a fantasy.
Relationship researcher John Gottman in “The Science of Trust” reveals some shocking confessions from women.

In any case, it’s different for men, but they will get excited if the seductress puts up a little fight, or when she teases him physically or sexually.

Example

Intimacy during heightened emotions is extremely arousing, sometimes even when anger is in the mix.

Do you think this scene is sexy or not:

> Her: fuck you!
> Him: that’ll make you happy (LOL, what a comeback :D)
> Her: walks away

> Him: (grabs her when she's leaving)
> Her: no, no, it's over
> Him: (starts kissing and undressing her, culminating in dominant passion)

Notice the mix of emotions: hate, carnal passion and love.
P.S.: The full upload has been flagged, so you get the PG-13 version here.

How They Do It

To stay in the safe zone, advanced players do the following:

- The first time they put up some physical resistance (see above)
- They resist from time to time and let him "earn them" with some dominance
- Pillow fights
- Play wrestling

10. Private Area Pokes

This is a big weapon in the arsenal of the teasing seductress.

The below the belt touches are a form of waving a red flag in front of him.
It's like saying:

> Teasing Seductress: I might be into you… Are you gonna be man enough to come get me*, or are you sleeping down there?

And rest assured, he will want to possess the seductress and obsess over her the whole night (or life) long.

A similar and equally effective technique is "accidentally" rubbing the pelvis or chest against him, which were rated as the most effective technique to turn him on by David Buss' research.

Example

See an example from this real-life documentary:

> Her: (touches above his ass while walking away)

If Machiavellian women seek intimacy, this move compels men to chase

If they want to be more provocative and they're in private, advanced players can have grab/poke or touch his private parts (note: video's been deleted).
Just remember: don't be too direct or thirsty, this is not the seductress who wants him: this is her making him want her.

How They Do It

- They touch his upper leg when seating
- They rest their hand on his inner thigh for a split of a second
- They touch the side of his leg while waking
- They joke "hit him" below the belt (not necessarily crotch, side of the leg is also fine)

11. Sex-Talk Seduction

Actions speak louder than words.

But that doesn't mean that words can't have their place in making him crazy about the seductress.

Indeed sexually-laden talk is a great, great way to arouse someone.
It's also a game men use with women, and it works even better when women do it to men.

As we've seen in the text flirting guide, it's best when implied, understated, and hinted.
Direct can also work, but be aware it's at a higher danger of slotting the seductress into the short-term type of gal.

Example

The best way to do it is to pass obvious hints at sex, but without getting crude.

That way, Machiavellian women make him want to have them while still coming across as a high-quality woman.

> Him: all I need is a blanket, I don't need all the sheets
> Her: I don't want you getting your funk all over
> Him: my funk?
> Her: yeah, I can't wash a couch. G'night
> Him: thank you
> Her: I would let you sleep in my bed, but uhm… I wouldn't want you to get confused

Check this forum entry for a couple more ideas on talking about sex without using curse words.

12. Sexual Bursts Seduction

> Uncover your wild side… Then take it away.

Quick bursts of whirlwind sexual passion will leave him speechless.

Actually, better than speechless: it will leave him horny and excited.

And that's when brain neurological patterns are more easily shaped: the seductress is literally branding him.
Obsession guaranteed.

Example

Watch Summer's perfect execution:

> Her: (submissive and feminine tonality) hey
> Him: hi
> Her: (walks towards him, doesn't say a word)
> Him: so, it was.. fun… the other day…
> Her: (starts making out with him with her body against his)

Please notice the body language and how she moves and looks at him.
Notice the slight panting of sexual arousal towards the end, how she looks at him deeply, but briefly, so that he looks at her far more and far longer (higher investment).

That's perfect.

How They Do It

Dark triad seductresses catch him where sex is not to be expected, and initiate high-risk physical intimacy in public settings to create a surge of adrenaline.

Flaky Girl Texting: Text-by-Text Case Study

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

What to do if a girl flakes but keeps texting?

First of all, know that it's a common issue.

I have been there countless times.
And eventually, I refined a good method that works most of the time.

With this article, you will learn the method through a text-by-text case study.

What to Text Flaky Girls

Most guys drop the ball with flaky girls by pushing too hard until the women lose interest.

Or they give up themselves complaining about flakes.

Granted, some flakes you will never meet, but you should at least do your part properly.

Please note she has very bad English. Albeit I believe that terrible English is an indicator of a low-quality woman, she was young and learning. And very attractive.

#1. First Text: All Seem Good With Flakes

Our first in-person interaction was very good.

And the fact that she answers the first text is another major positive sign.
Usually, flaky girls do reply to the first texts because they enjoy that push-pull dynamic going on, and push-pull starts with a pull.

My plan was to contact her the day after and ask about her schedule.

#2. Dealing With The First Flake

She misunderstands my request of “what’s your schedule” and/or doesn’t give me a date. Not the best situation.

I propose a date and she denies it without proposing another date. Not good.

At this point, I could have asked her when she comes back, but that would have been quite a lot of chasing from my side.

I decide to go another route:

#3. Take Pressure OFF After First Flake

Pressure off and I want to get some points back. I want to give her a reason to say something and engage.

I send a picture of an amazing place which almost everyone would like. You could do the same with some food: that also almost always works.
Notice I say you should go there with your friends, which is slightly dismissive.

After that, I don't reply.
I'm trying to accumulate some brownie points for my next charge by making her write last.

#4. Take A Break... Then Go For It Again

Now I can freely call and go for it again without being too chasey.

She doesn't pick up: expected.

With my after-call text (always write right after the call) I bridge back to the last conversation. It's always good to put a bit more meat on the fire so it doesn't look like you're only and always trying to get her out.

She proposes to go with a friend.

This is typical of younger girls and girls who have mixed feelings about you. They like you but they're also a bit worried/shy/apprehensive.

I reply I'd rather meet her on her own. It's a risk you gotta take. I make a slight mistake here though: I should have asked why she wants to meet with a friend.
That would have uncovered her real issue but at that point, I was kinda confident she'd go for it.

#5. Two Flakes: It's Now Officially A Flaky Girl

We exchanged a couple of texts where she seems positive about the meeting.

But again, she flips flops when it's time to set it up. and doesn't reply. The whole interaction was hanging on a thin thread here and it was close to the end for good.

Writing her name with a few dots is a good way to resume a conversation when she doesn't text back. It works mostly when there was a previous convo.

Pushing here would have probably been the end of it.

My best bet is to let her re-engage first. I put a crying smiley. It should be obvious I'm exaggerating but just to be sure I add "lol ok".
No more, you must remain unaffected.

The day after she comes clean on her real issue: limited language skills. Great, now I can address it:

#6. Rinse & Repeat: Pressure OFF V.2

Telling her "it's OK, you don't need to worry and blablabla" is a typical, common mistake.

It would be too much effort and too much push. Make her feel it's fine by relating to her instead.

And then I go for it again, mildly.
I'm banking on the fact that now that we've addressed the issue she's OK with going ahead. Whether she is or not, you'll never know without actually going for it, so you simply have to.

Because pressure is off, yes, but the mantra still applies:

> Always be closing

Her reply is again leading absolutely nowhere.

Replying to that sh*t would be a mistake. It's the second time she asks, and it's leading me astray.
Plus you don't wanna follow her lead and reply to her questions when she's not following yours (giving you a date).

#7. Blow Her Off To Regain Power

I have a different plan in mind: blow off her question and get her to follow my lead instead.

She's Japanese, so I tell her I tried a local Japanese restaurant, which should easily get her to jump on my topic.

Which indeed is the case:

#8. In or Out Text: You Must Stop The Buck

Trying to send her a picture here would not be too good because, again, you'd follow her lead when she's not following yours.

At this point, it's time to start getting a bit more disengaged. We've exchanged quite a few texts and you can't keep chatting with flakes for too long.

So this time I don't ask her when she's free but I tell her where I will be.

Notice that I don't rush to go to her just because she says she's there.
Never run after flakes: that's how they string along men for eternity!

P.S.: the time doesn't match because of the different time zones.

#9. Capitalize On Any Opening

When she says she's with a friend it's also a key moment.

If it was at the beginning of interaction it might be OK to tell her she should choose you in a slightly cheeky way, like for example:

> it's OK, tell your friend you have to to meet a handsome guy

But at this point, I'm not gonna invest a zilch anymore. I've spent enough time, addressed her concern, and made her invest enough. If she's into me at all, she should be cool with meeting me.

So I tell her we do our things and we'll see.
And finally, it goes just the way I want. The moment she says "where are you" indeed marks a turning point. That's her putting in effort and chasing me.

I know it will take me longer than half an hour, but now that she's finally chasing I want to string her along a bit. I need to make back some points.
However, don't overdo it. At the end of the day, it should still be a win-win to meet, so don't go overboard with ignoring or not showing up at all.
As for most everything in life: balance.

#10. Strike

And finally, we met.

What to Text Flaky Girls: Overview

I define here flakes as women who never seem to make concrete steps to meet. They seemed interested, and they kinda reply… But keep out of reach.
You handle these women like this:

1. Go for the meet
2. Pressure off and let them invest
3. Don't reply for a few days
4. Call and go for it again
5. If they flake again, let them invest again

If they don't meet you again, they're either never gonna meet you, or there's an issue. So:

1. Uncover the issue (scared, no English, no money.. ?)
2. Address root cause
3. Go for it again
4. My way or the highway: it's either it happens now, or you have close contact

Handling Flaky Girls: Summary

Texting flaky girls can be (relatively) a lot of work as you can see.

It's your choice whether or not to engage in it, but know that among flakes there are many girls who actually like you.

So if you also like them, it could make sense to take some time on it. Just remember the golden rule: don't chase too hard, try to rebalance the power, and strike as soon as you can.

7 Texting Mistakes That Turn Guys Off (W/ Examples)

  - Example
- #5. Bored Texts
- #6. Talk To Me Texts
  - Example:
- #7. Selfies Texts
  - 7.2. Sexting
- Summary

#1. Ping Texts

Ping texts are messages like:

- Hey
- What's up
- Yo
- "the guy's name"

While it was you who wanted to get in touch, ping texts shift the burden on him to actually come up with something meaningful.

It screams that you are trying to make him chase and make him invest in you.
But it does so in the wrong way.

Now he'll be thinking:

> Him: Hmmm… She contacted me.
> Do I have anything to say?
> No, then why should I try at all?
> I'm just gonna send the ball back on her court instead (and hopefully she'll get it)

Example

Notice the girl below makes the same mistake twice.

The first text was useless and I give her a chance to articulate her thoughts.

But instead of fleshing out a meaningful message, she shifts the burden on me once again (demanding I explain).

Now if we had been close, I might have taken the time to explain. But we weren't close enough for her to demand so much investment.

We had a good time and I sincerely wish her well, but that was our last text.

Communicate meaningfully, or forever hold your peace

#2. Low Investment Text Messages

Gimme more messages are messages aimed at making him write as much as possible with as little effort on your side as possible.

They suffer from the same downside of all the "let him invest tactics": less discerning men will chase you.

More socially aware men will get annoyed.
Read more details on why you should aim for a balanced investment.

- "and.."
- "so… ?"
- "…"
- "?"

Races to the bottom only go one place: to the bottom

#3. Powerless Woman Texts

I used to call these texts “rudderless boat texts”.

Why?

Because they communicate the woman relinquishes control of her life.

And if she relinquishes control of one of the most important areas of her life, what does that say about her?

Some rudderless texts are hilarious in their timeless idiocy:

- “I like being spontaneous” (like should we wait to run into each other?)
- “We’ll see” (see what exactly)
- “I’m not sure” (who is sure then)
- “I believe in destiny” (and that’s why you’re single)

Even when you’re sincerely on the fence, rudderless texts make you look indecisive.
If they’re excuses because you don’t want to meet him, you can do better. If you’re really not sure, then think about it and reach a conclusion.

And if you actually like him, then lay up and go for it (or other women will).

No plan is a plan to fail

#4. Rage-Texting

When you get angry, he is reassured that you are emotionally invested.

That easily translates into the feeling that “he has you”.

Indeed, when you get snippy two possible things happen:

1. The guy backtracks and apologizes -and then you know he’s a wuss-
2. The guy laughs -and he knows you’re under his thumb-

And, worst of all, you look like a low-quality woman who can’t control herself and maintain a polite, respectful conversation.

High-quality men don’t want angry women.
What do you think it’s like to be in a relationship with a woman who often rages and flies off the handle?

I can tell you that: it sucks.

Example

My reply was a joking way to nudge her into dropping the bragging tone.

But when she got snippy I knew for sure that she was indeed trying to impress me and that she was emotionally invested.

If she was really bothered, stopping communication would have been a better way of sending the message.

But the best course of action was to make a joke about it and move on. That would have actually given her some points.
Something like:

> Woman Who Gets It: LOL yeah, I like making sure people know they're talking to a big shot :D. Jokes aside…

OR:

> Woman Who Gets It:LOL, I want to make sure you know you gotta bring the A game around me :D. Jokes aside…

Instead, her reply communicated that she was totally under my thumb.
And that she would make for a poor relationship partner, too!

Stay cool or ghost out trying

#5. Bored Texts

Few things scream low-quality woman as complaining about being bored.

I'm not even gonna dig on my phone for examples: don't do it, just don't do it.

#6. Talk To Me Texts

Talk to me via text and let him know that you were thinking about him and that his silence is getting to you.

And maybe both are true and, sometimes, it's great to be sincere and vulnerable.

But do it too often, and they signal insecurity and neediness.

Some examples:

- "you don't talk to me"
- "why don't you reply to me"

Example:

Notice that the first text, in the second part, could actually be a text you should emulate.

It's like saying "I'm for real, step up and come get me".

But the first part ruins it. It says she's insecure and high maintenance from an emotional point of view.

Don't force him; make him want it

#7. Selfies Texts

Unless you're a teenager and unless you two are already lovers you better avoid texting selfies.

They scream attention-seeking and time-wasting.

And if he's a cool guy, chances are he doesn't know what to do with your pictures before you two are close.
He should want you physically in real life, not in the byte version.

7.2. Sexting

And worst of all, of course, are unrequested (half) naked selfies.

Trust me, that's what trans and ladyboys do and it's a major warning signal for guys who've been around the block.

At 5:56 I knew it was a bad idea…
And unless you're going to marry and be together happily ever after, who knows where those pictures are going to end up.
Don't risk it, and avoid sexting.

Summary

There are many ways to send terrible texts and I could make this list longer.

But I feel these 7 covers some of the most common bad texts I've seen around.

#AskGaryVee: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- Be self-aware to understand your limits and what you should pursue
- Invest in your strengths and work hard
- Set big goals to keep you focused and motivated

Full Summary

Hustle

A major tenet of Gary, in all his communication, is the need to hustle (ie.: working hard). Gary proposes to remove some time from television and invest it in anything else that moves you closer to your goals.

Your question is:

> Are you working as hard as you could?

Self Awareness

Self-awareness from an entrepreneurial perspective means knowing a few key things:

1. What excites you (so you can set motivating goals)
2. What you're good at (to focus on)
3. What you're not good at (to outsource it)
4. How you're doing

Gary seems to be in the realistic camp. Like Ray Dalio he stresses the importance of staying grounded on reality. He says it's important, especially for people in a position of power, to have people around telling you what you're doing well or wrong. If you don't, you're likely to build your own reality, which might not work well.

Gary also recommends you ask the people around for feedback on what you're good at.
And once you know the overlap between what excited you and what you're good at, you can draft your goals:

Big Goals

Peter Diamandis in Bold calls your big goals "moonshots".
However you call them, your goals are important for two things:

1. Drive you
2. Keep you focused on the long game

Also read:

- The Magic of Thinking Big

Drive

Don't worry if your goal doesn't sound worthy, your goal is to motivate you, not to make you look good or cool.
Gary for example wants to own the New York Jets, which to me sounds silly.
But it doesn't have to sound good to me, that's what motivates Gary to keep going. Indeed it's not what a goal is, it's what a goal does (to you).

Long Game

When you have a big north star lighting your path, you will worry less about the pebbles on the way. A big goal not only will keep you focused on what matters, but it will also increase your grit and resilience, which are key to success (also read Grit by Angela Duckworth).

[bctt tweet="It's not about what your goal is; it's about what it does " username=""]

Love it All

Another great takeaway from #AskGaryVee for me was to learn to love everything you're doing. Gary says he loves the calls with angry customers, the HR headaches, and the daily grind.

Tying it back to his big goal, he says that it's easy to love it all when you know everything is inching you closer to your big goal.

Invest On Strengths

The next use of self-awareness is knowing your strengths.

Gary espouses an idea common today in self-development circles, which is to work on your strengths. Your weaknesses should receive your attention only as long as they are holding you back. Otherwise, focus on what you're good at: that's where the biggest bang for the buck comes from.

Clouds VS Dirt

Clouds are your overarching vision and values.
Dirt is the tactical, day-to-day grind to execute on that vision.

Real Life Applications

Love it All
I really liked the idea of loving it all, struggles included. When you can reach a place where you really love what you're doing, including the difficulties, you're golden.

Pursue What You're Good and Passionate About
Analyze what you're good at and what you're passionate about. That's probably what you should put your efforts into.

CONS

Longish
Could have been a bit shorter.

Black & White
I believe that to give good answers, one should also draw from the data. Gary's answers are more based on his views and opinions, which tend to be rather black and white.

Review

As of 2018, #AskGaryVee is possibly my favorite Gary's book (and it's likely to stay that way because I think I got most of his great business philosophy and wisdom not planning to absorb more from Vaynerchuk's personality).

Watching the show to get Gary's philosophy can be long and time-consuming.
With #AskGaryVee you get all his wisdom in a condensed form (and you can skip the show if you don't have time).

You will like it if you're a fan of Gary.
Or if you're a fan of "hustle culture".
Otherwise, this website believes you can prioritize other folks to learn from.

- Femininity: Does it Bother You?
  - Mindset: Drop Resentment
  - Femininity Is Power
- Summary

1. Remove Markers of Masculinity

The first step to being more feminine is to avoid masculine expressions.

Have you noticed most men make a point of avoiding pink and doing anything effeminate?

You might agree or disagree with that attitude, but you should probably start considering the same approach.

Example:

One evening, I cajoled one of the most feminine women I’ve ever dated to play football with me.

She was very reluctant, though, because, as I later understood, she didn’t want to play typically male games.

When I high-fived her across the table –a typical male behavior– she drew the line and, with a touch of baby talk and a pouting face, told me:

> Her: “don’t high five me, I’m not a guy”.

Boom!

There she was.
In a country where 95% of women pretend there are no differences between genders, she’s a feminine woman who wants to be treated as a feminine woman.
I respected her more after that, treated her more like a woman, and even liked her somewhat more.

That girl made a point of being feminine by outright refusing male behavior.

If you are interested in how to be feminine—very f*emin*ine—I recommend you take the same approach.
And actively remind men that “you are not one of the guys”.

Let’s now see more masculine traits to eliminate so that you can troubleshoot yourself:

Shake Hands Like A Woman, Not Like A Man

Are you a businesswoman?

Great!
In business, shake hands like a man.

Outside of business, shake hands like a woman.

This is the business handshake:

Very common for American women, but avoid it outside of business
And this is how women greet men when they haven't been instructed to behave like men:

Use this one: rest your hand on his hand
A woman shaking hands as if it were a business transaction can be off-putting.
Especially to more experienced men, who will think "here's another woman who thinks that proper socialization means acting like a man".
Avoid it most of all in dating and socialization for potential dating, where it sends a message of cold distance.

Needless to say, you can keep the business style in business and then revert to the female style outside of business.

Refuse Unfeminine Behavior

One could write a book about what are typical mannish behaviors, but here are some

- High-fiving (you're not one of the guys)
- Cussing (leave that to the truck drivers)
- Speaking too loudly (leave that to show-off men)
- Spreading out (few things are more unfeminine than this)
- "Bro hugs"

About the latter, keep in mind that a little distance is very high.

If you need to be close to someone, put your body close to them instead (Marilyn's video below is very arousing for men) or go arm in arm.

Purge Unfeminine Body Language

We could write a book about masculine body language, but here are some examples:

- Hands-on hips (AKA akimbo, exceptions for playful akimbo and sensual akimbo)
- Walking with spread legs
- Arms far from the body's trunk
- Leaning against objects
- Jutting chin forward (an aggressive indicator)

This video exaggerates everything about how a woman should not move. Stay away from anything that looks even mildly similar:

The braggart entrance, the swaying of arms, the bounce of the feet… That's how men move—not even the well-refined ones).

To understand unfeminine body language, you can also watch how many female UFC fighters behave.

Compete While Looking As Unaggressive As Possible

Ronda Rousey, a former MMA fighter, always tried her hardest to look and sound like a man.

Even saying she would beat men of equal weight.
Do the opposite, and avoid direct competition with men, as that makes you more like a man.

Competition is a male trait.

And of course, if you are reading this, you want to go places, and you must compete.

However, to be feminine, you must compete without looking overly aggressive, overly ambitious, or too overpowering.
It's not easy, I know.
Nobody said being feminine was easy.

Also, avoid competing with the men you are dating.
Trying to be better than the partner is typical low-quality male behavior, so it's a huge no-no.
That's not your role, let him compete with the other boys. And let him compete to win you over.

Remove Unfeminine Clothing

Avoid neutral clothing as well.

It's popular among hipsters these days to wear shapeless body bags: please stay away.
They're the death knell of anything feminine.

Avoid shapeless, straight-line clothing
You can see one more example of bad female style here.

Here are two simple litmus tests:

- Would a gender-neutral person wear it? If yes, don't wear it
- Would a stereotypical lesbian wear it? If yes, don't wear it

And now let's start with the proper traits of femininity:

2. Be More Vulnerable

Vulnerability is crucial.

Why?

Because, once you get it correctly, you can be courageous, go-getter, and strong WITHOUT being mannish.

Why?
The answer is in the difference between how men and women display courage and boldness.

Men's Courage
Men do it as a display of strength, with stress on display. And they do it while hiding their emotions and fear.

Women's Courage
Instead, the most feminine way of courage is to admit fear and show up anyway, humbly and without bombast.

Here's a good example from "Dating in the Dark":

She openly speaks about her fears while also having the courage to show up. Notice the unassuming way she opens the door, too.

Also, notice the different reactions. The guy defends his ego by bragging and boasting:

> Braggard man: "I'll go ahead and close some more women like I usually do".

When the moderator tells her "she'll find someone," she doesn't flaunt her options like he did.
And instead vulnerably replies:

> Vulnerable woman: "hopefully yeah".

Finally, notice that in all her humility and vulnerability, she puts the bragging guy to shame, which is a powerful reminder that femininity does NOT have to mean "less powerful".

3. Be Modest

Males are naturally showier and braggarts.

That's where the terms "peacocking" and "cocky" come from. It's about showing off.

But femininity is often the opposite of mannishness.
And that's why, while humility is good for everyone, it's particularly good to be more feminine.
See an example from Monroe here:

A touch of coyness and self-consciousness, well-placed insecurity… All are very feminine.

Notice how unassuming Marilyn is when she says "I hope it will be a good picture". Impossible not to like her.

4. Display Coyness

Notice how Angelina Jolie plays it coy by turning her face away. Super attractive to men:

Notice the similarities?

5. Learn to Move "Smooth & Flowing"

Nothing says feminine like flowing, smooth movements.

Dance and yoga classes can be very useful here.
Here's an example from Margarita Levieva:

Notice the way she sits in the chair. She doesn't pull the chair up, she uses it as an occasion to put her body on display instead.
Perfect.

6. Develop A Feminine Walk

Body language research says that women who want to appear more appealing sway their hips more.

Indeed, there are two major traits of a feminine walk:

1. Hip swaying
2. Small strides

High heels can help with both (Morris et. al., 2013).
See Marilyn Monroe, in high heels, displaying both signs of a feminine walk:

Also notice how she has a bit of a "jump" in her steps, visible through her fur movements.

That's exactly how an ex of mine used to walk, by the way, and I could never resist sneaking up from behind and (jokingly) spanking that sexy swaying ass.

Warning:

The wider the angle and the more pronounced the sway, the more "sex" it will scream.
And too wide can go from "feminine" to "whorish":

Unless you are doing it strategically, for example as a coquettish move to dare a man to rail you hard, avoid being the lady who screams "sex" too obviously.

Here is a good example of being sexy in a feminine way without looking like a whore:

The secret is that you have to look like it's just natural to you and that you are not trying to draw attention.

7. Speak With A Purring Voice

Go back to the "flowing movements video examples" (N.5).

Have you noticed Levieva's voice?

She purrs on the words "late", "ever" and "forgive".

It's not so much about what she says, words are an excuse to exhibit her feminine purr.
Wonderful.

8. Adopt Feminine Body Language

When you make feminine body language part of your repertoire, you'll always be seductive.

Even when you don't want to seduce.
Here's an example:

Some more feminine body language:

- Head tilt (video above)
- Swayback (video above)
- Neck show (video above)
- Glancing over the raised shoulder
- Leg twine (examples 1 & 2 are feminine because men cannot do it, and N.3 is sexy for its coyness and submissiveness)

You can, of course, combine femininity with a more aggressive sexual stance for an explosive mix of feminine lust.

Check out:

- Sexy body language for women

Feminine & High-Power Body Language

In the foundational laws of power, we explain the “return on investment” concept, which says that:

The less effort you expend, the more powerful you are.
Powerful and feminine women will achieve the same goal with fewer words, and more body language.
Notice how she invites him to leave not by saying “you should go”, but simply by looking at the door:

> Her: I’m really tired (intonation that sub-communicates disappointment) > (long pause)
> can we talk about this tomorrow? (look at the door, sub-communicating that he should leave)

9. Pick Feminine Careers & Hobbies

Your environment matters.

Your environment shapes you and encourages you (or discourages you) to find your femininity and bask in it.

For example, a female executive at Lockheed Martin (an arms producer) or at Jeep (a typical male car) will have more difficulty embracing her femininity than a woman owning a hair salon or a design agency.

The latter will be around more women, more feminine women, and is immersed in an environment that screams femininity.

The former will have to play down her feminine side, play up her masculine side, and be constantly immersed in a high-testosterone environment.
Indeed, if you read the best business and career books teaching women how to be successful in a male organization, they are all about teaching how to play the game the man’s way.

It can be hard for you to exhibit more masculine traits at work, and then unplug every day at 6 p.m. and every week on a Friday, ready to embrace your femininity.

Sure, you can be successful and feminine in male-dominated organizations. And you can unplug whenever you want.
But you're not choosing the easier path.

And to make it easier on yourself, you can pick more female-dominated environments.
If you've already chosen your job, here are a few more hobbies to consider:

- Ballet
- Painting/drawing
- Languages
- Fashion
- Music

There is nothing more feminine than a woman who can sing or play

I remember many years ago, I was hitting it off with a woman at a social function.
Then she went to play the piano… And hordes of men clustered around her.

And if you want to take it 3 steps further, pick a languid song and go Jennifer Connelly on it:

Also, notice her clothes and her movements

10. Play Up Typically Feminine Qualities

Typical (and sometimes stereotypically feminine) traits and qualities include:

- Caring
- Listening
- Helping others shine

- Seeking middle ground
- Tending and befriending

If you're on a date, you can rest assured that men will like nothing more than you asking questions and making them feel great about what they have to say.
Another smart move to be more feminine is to avoid talking too much, too loudly, or taking too extreme positions. Prioritize bridge-building and harmony instead.
You can see here a great example:

- How she conquered every man's heart by not picking sides

11. Go For "Strategic Submissiveness."

When it comes to being more feminine, the "little girl looking for protection" takes the most flack (see below).

But a hint of insecurity, admitting your shortcomings, and letting him lead are very feminine traits.

If you're not comfortable with this one, think of it this way: Don't do the heavy lifting when you can let a man do it.

Notice Marilyn Monroe resting her head against him. As if to communicate that he's the leader of her world.

You don't need to make yourself a full subordinate, but it's the little details that make the difference:

- Lower your gaze first
- Laugh at what he says (if it's funny enough)

Your hand on your neck, covering your belly, closing your jacket as if you sought protection… These are also very feminine poses that make men want to protect you and take care of you.

Self-hug and neck-massaging: both very feminine

Pro tip:

At the intersection of coy, submissive, and extremely seductive is being naked and covering your private parts with your hand.

This is also a favorite of mine.

A Note on Submissiveness

Some women will recoil at the word "submissiveness".

The word has indeed taken on negative connotations. In a way, it requires you to give away power, but it also gives you a different form of power back.

Furthermore, sexual and dating submissiveness is a matter of choice. It's not about being submissive to everyone. It's about choosing who to be submissive to.

Read more:

- Strong women VS submissive women (who wins at dating)
- Strategic vulnerability (to make men chase and invest)

12. Advanced Level: Simpering Moves

Some of the most feminine and attractive women engage in what reminds me of cat-like behavior.

Here's a perfect example (click, it's a video):

Notice that instead of repeating herself she leans in and prods him with her head -similarly to how a cat or feline would do-.

Powerful AND feminine at the same time.

I remember one woman before we had sex.

Laying on the bed, she told me how she wanted to be a cat in her next life.

"She does this, and then this", she said about her cat while she copied some of the moves.

It was a real pleasure making love to that cat-woman :).

How Not to Be Feminine

As much as there are low-quality expressions of mannishness, there are also low-quality expressions of femininity.

And much as it's true for men when too much manliness becomes a drawback, extreme expressions of femininity can also become a drawback.

Here are some examples:

- Over-the-top emotions
- Shrill expressions of excitement
- Too early, too deep emotional attachment
- Too much makeup / too skimpy clothes
- Over-the-top plastic surgeries
- Demands to be "treated like a lady" (instead of being one and letting the man decide to treat you as a lady, see how to make him chase)
- Too childish / too baby-like behavior

See an example of too childish from "How I Met Your Mother":

Notice that some men will still appreciate that over-the-top attitude, but it's a minority.

Why Being More Feminine

Why would you want to be more feminine?

Pat Heim, a female career coach who helps businesswomen become more successful, says this about femininity:

> Your gender is a large part of who you are. You can't feel good about yourself and not feel good about your femininity. To be comfortable with her power, a woman must be both powerful and feminine.

Frankly, I don't 100% agree with that.
I don't build my ego and self-esteem around being "a mannish man", either.

But there are many practical advantages to a woman being feminine, including:

1. You will gain a huge advantage in the dating marketplace
2. You will reduce the backlash against powerful women: both men and women cut more slack to powerful women who retain their femininity
3. You will be more charming, which results in more social power as well

Finally, learning to become more feminine can be a great opportunity for you: since so few women are feminine these days, you will gain a huge comparative advantage.

Femininity: Does it Bother You?

Femininity as a topic annoys some women, who lash out in anger at articles like this one.

Some women get angry for a variety of reasons, including:

- Fear of competition (women fear more feminine women because they tend to be more successful, and attacking articles like this one is a manipulative strategy of intra-sexual competition, also see "pro-group feints" as manipulation strategies)

- Culture & feminism: feminism has become a cultural diktat for many women who feel pressured to reject femininity as an outdated, "patriarchial" value
- Wanting to have one's cake and eat it too: some women want to gain more social power, and it bothers them that it comes at a dating cost

But in part, the push-back against femininity also reflects a difficult position for women in today's society.
Many women today are expected to work and fend for themselves while they are also expected to be feminine when it comes to dating.

It's not easy to successfully combine the two.

But it's paramount that you purge yourself of jealousy and bitterness:

Mindset: Drop Resentment

The fact that someone could point at another woman and say "see? She's more feminine than you" hurts them, and anger is a defensive reaction.

It's the same for men.
And it's understandable.

Some of these women are smart professionals who had to adapt to male-dominated organizations by dropping more typical feminine traits and acquiring more masculine ones.

And after they've done so much to prove their worth, the idea that their male colleagues might want to date a woman who plays girly in need of help maddens them.

Albeit understandable, you are still better off dropping the resentment.
It communicates insecurity and spite and it hurts yourself first and foremost.
Plus, look, deep down you already know the truth: men (and women as well) will still prefer more feminine women.

Femininity Is Power

Part of the animosity towards femininity also stems from a misconception.

The misconception is that femininity means dumbing yourself down, becoming less independent, or becoming weaker.

And albeit marrying power and femininity is not easy, femininity and intelligence, success and power are NOT antithetical.
And we could argue that women who master femininity are actually better able to get what they want, which is a definition of power.

Just watch the examples of femininity above and ask yourself if any of those women are "weak" or "dumb".
To me, they seem the opposite: high-quality women and human beings who also manage to be feminine.

Summary

I see very few women these days who can get femininity right.

And the number seems to be dropping further and further.

And that's great news for you!
It's a huge opportunity to stand out and make yourself a super high-class woman.

7 Biggest Dating Mistakes Women Do (Before Sex)

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

These are some of the most common biggest early dating mistakes.

I have seen them over and over again and they are making countless women (and men) around the world unhappy.

Early Dating Mistakes

The biggest dating mistakes I'm focusing on here are those which happen before the relationship starts getting any serious.

This is a highly critical period because you haven't developed a bond with a man yet. And any mistake in early dating is much more likely to lose you an otherwise great partner.

Note: all the tips here are based both on the science and data of dating and on personal experience. All texts are actual texts I received.

1. Playing Unavailable Games

> Date Frequently, Date Fast, Date Forward

I put it first because most sources recommend the opposite: that you should show value through being unavailable (Glamour cray advice example).
I can't think of anything more counterproductive.

Making yourself unavailable, either when you're scheduling a date or by playing aloof upon the first meeting, does not do much good to you. If a man is pursuing you it's because he already likes you (wants to sleep with you for sure, and very possibly more). Thus, being unavailable or playing too hard to get gives you limited additional benefits.
Being unavailable and aloof is one of the biggest risks women take in dating because many men don't like to chase too hard*, and they just stop pursuing. And that is all the truer for higher quality men with lots of options.

Why It's Bad

1. Time Passes And You Forget

Early relationships and dating are a bit like clay pigeons shooting. It's not a very romantic analogy, I know, but it fits perfectly: from the moment you meet your possible beautiful relationship is hurtling away. And the more time goes by, the fewer the chances you'll ever get together. You wanted to play unavailable, but then you (or him) forget, get busy, it starts feeling stale and less fresh.. And it never happens.
Like the example below. Don't let that happen to you!
Strike when it's hot.

Hard to say if she was playing a game. But since she canceled a few hours before, it's possible. I didn't reply. She wrote me sometime later, but we never met. Great chemistry, gone to waste.

2. He Will Self Reject (and Stop Pursuing)
Play coy, fake busy, and be unavailable too much and men will self-reject. Such as, they read your unavailability or postponement as a possible no, and instead of pursuing further and "risking"a full blow-off, they decide to protect their egos and stop pursuing you.

Following the unavailability advice

3. You Will Unconsciously Downgrade Him

Read it as this is possibly new info for you.

Playing unavailable makes him chase and you unconsciously interpret his reach outs as a sign of him being lower status compared to you -otherwise, he wouldn't need to chase me, you tell yourself-. And of course, you want men who are "higher" than you, so very soon you will unconsciously start liking him less and less.

It probably happened to you that you met a cool guy but he began losing points after a while, right? Now here's the funny thing: you changed your own opinion! He probably IS a cool guy but you'll never know.

Other women who say yes and meet him quickly will find out for you.

4. Available Women Will Steal Your Lunch

This is particularly true if you are dating in a difficult market.

In difficult markets, women less intent on playing unavailable games will simply tell him when they're free. And they will schedule. And they will meet up with him. Like the woman on the right side of these two texts behaved.

And if he's as cool as he seemed at first, he might soon be off the market.

Cool guys don't stay single indefinitely: go meet him!

It's not a question of opinions, it's a simple fact of offer and demand.

See an example, same place, same woman:

At parity of sexual market value the more available woman will date more, and have more options to choose from (and just to be sure: dating more doesn't have to mean "sleeping" with more men).

The unavailable one, especially if she's catty, will generally have a harder time.

Solution

Say yes to the men you like when they ask you out.

If there was a good vibe between you two men do NOT interpret eagerness to meet as desperation. Men interpret eagerness to meet as great chemistry. As a matter of fact, they'll feed off your eagerness and get more excited to meet you (look at point 7 for an example and read: waiting for sex or not?).

Look at this girl.
Her supportive attitude is exactly what made me want to meet her even more:

Or, even better, look at these examples:

- Strategically dropping games
- One simple text that made me look forward to meeting her

The "Equity Theory of Love" is pretty clear about this: when you demand more and more investment, you make the relationship unbalanced, and unbalanced relationships are unhappier and shorter.

Exception:

For the sake of clarity, throwing yourself to him IS also a mistake (this message is an example). Making yourself available because you like him and see potential is one thing, top priority is another.
The top priority has to be earned over time.

It's also after sex has been consumed that is too easily available, especially for booty calls, and risks lowering your long-term girlfriend value (here's an example).

But 90% of women are instinctively aware of it.

#2. Demanding Too Much

> How Do You Take It All? By Not Asking

The second biggest dating mistake women do is Investments Requests, or put simply "demanding too much". It's often jarring for guys when women's demands are too big or come too early. The most common demands include:

- To have dinner/drinks paid
- That he comes to your chosen spot

- That he has to write you first and last (unspoken demand)
- To help you with stuff
- To do what you say

Having men commit to increasing demands is a sneaky and effective way of getting… Poor quality mates. Read investment imbalances for more details.

Why It's Bad

The first reason is that a big imbalance of money spending risks turning the relationship from a collaborative, loving one into a "market one" (read the psychology in Predictably Irrational).

Second is that when you demand too much too soon it's either you end up with a puppet or you'll drive the cool guys away.
Funny enough, some men will even comply with women's requests but then resent you for it. An example from a Dating In The Dark episode:

Note: demands and investments are always a question of balance.

Remember:

1. Men appreciate women who say a genuine thank you when they are invited
2. Men appreciate women who offer to split -even if he ends up paying in the end-
3. Cool guys don't appreciate women who expect to be invited and don't say thank you

Here's an example from How I Met Your Mother: Ted explains her date the mistake she made and, later on, Ted decides whose girl he wants to see again.
It's tongue in cheek, but based on reality.

#3. Focus On Getting More, Not on Balance

> NO Begets NO; YES Begets YES

This is the smaller brother of the above.

Most women dating advice books tell women the same things: make him invest, make him chase, be the prize of the relationship, make him wait for sex.

That's a mindset of "get as much as possible, give as little as possible".
Many women in the West seem true to follow that rule, and they focus more on "staying ahead" instead of "staying in balance".

Some small acts that keep relationships out of balance:

- Not letting the guy plan the date
- Refusing to comply with small favors
- Not chipping in for the date expenses

This is what you will see a lot from women who are considered "stuck up".

Why It's Bad

The problem with refusing investment is that balanced, cooperative investment is one of the major drivers of relationship growth.

And a refusal to invest is also a refusal of moving the relationship forward.

Look at these messages below and notice both the refusal of investment and the consequences.

Coming after a long first date together and after sex, this was a fairly balanced request: I invite her over, she brings some food -whatever she likes- and I get the wine.
A win-win collaborative effort to spend a nice evening together to eat, enjoy good wine, get to know each other better and make love.

That's the perfect date to deepen the bond.
Her refusal to participate not only stops the relationship from growing, but takes it back onto game playing and a combative "someone win, someone loses".

In spite of her great looks, after this message, I wasn't keen on a closer relationship with her.

The issue I saw here were two:

1. She seemed more hell-bent on power than on collaboration
2. She missed the chance of escalating mutual investment

What could she have done better?

She could have said, "OK, I will bring X, can you make sure you get Y and Z?" Easy and efficient way to move the relationship forward with mutual investment and mutual acts of caring.

#4. Too Little Femininity

> Opposites Attract

There have been cultural and societal shifts that brought women to behave less feminine these days.

One is that more women work today, and many lines of work reward testosterone more than femininity (Pease & Pease).

The other shift has been feminism, a great and welcome cultural revolution. In some western countries though feminism reached a stage where it's not helping women anymore but damaging them.
Feminism has become the new slut shaming it purported to fight (slut shaming in Wikipedia).

A few examples:

1. My ex-German girlfriend had the biggest fallout with her best friend when the friend told her she wasn't "emancipated enough". Apparently, being too happy about one's boyfriend is terrible because it signals a girl "needs" a boyfriend;

2. This year a local girl visiting my room hated the painting on the wall because the woman figure was too sensual. Apparently, it's wrong to look "girly" and women should avoid sensuality

3. Notice how Charlotte feels guilty for deciding to quit her job instead of simply being free to do what the hell she likes:

Basically, for some of the current feminists, girls should be more like men and never too sensual.

And a subset of the female population is buying into it.
Here are a few mindsets which aren't helping women when it comes to dating:

- I don't need a man
- I don't have to take care of myself (for a man)
- Men and women are the same
- I shouldn't allow a man to lead or decide for me

Why It's Bad

There's no point in pretending it's not true:

Men are attracted to feminine women.

If you're a high achiever, it might not be easy to blend femininity and a go-getter career, but it's not impossible. And therein lies your opportunity.

Some articles on femininity and successful women dating:

- How to be more feminine
- Successful dating for successful women
- Sensual body language for women

#5. Combative Stance

> Warriors Rarely Find Love

I have seen this dating mistake several times, often from younger / less experienced women.

It's born out of an internal struggle and out of fear of:

1. Being "one of many" or a quickly forgotten sexual thing
2. Falling in love (too soon)
3. Being not good enough

The first is when the man comes across as a player. She likes him and wants to be with him, but at the same time, she resents him.

The second is when the emotional whirlwind is very intense, she likes him a lot and she's afraid of falling head over heels.

For the first two, belligerence is the armor she wears in an effort to push him -and the danger he represents- away.

The third case is a bit more complex, and she uses a combative stance as a way of getting back at him and taking power away from him to re-balance the relationship.
This can also happen in already established relationships (video example below with Elon Musk and Talulah Riley)

Here are a few examples of combative dynamics:

- Running Away

Can be physical and quite literally in an effort to make the man chase.

This is childish and I've seen it mostly from Asian girls and labile women (picture below).
More commonly it's emotional and looking for the same reaction but only at an emotional level. Both try to raise her value and lower his value by making him chase.

Terrible game: she loses high-quality men (who won't run after her) and sticks with low-quality ones (who will)

- Pushing him Away / Rejecting Him

Rejections hurt, and women are even less used to it.

So when a woman (often mistakenly) feels the man is too good, she will push him away or reject him before he can reject her.
It's an unconscious mechanism of ego protection.

- Fighting for Wins / Escalating

Fighting for wins and escalating smaller issues into "my way or the highway" are most often the consequence of feeling unworthy or not cared for enough.

Drama and fights then become a way to force him to pay attention and care (Brene Brown describes a similar dynamic in Daring Greatly).

More rarely it can happen when she felt sex happened a bit too quickly and/or she feels it's difficult to get a relationship with him and now she resents him.
This is the below example, notice that's both a major escalation AND a refusal to invest.

I let my ego get in the way and I should have understood where she was coming from. But she also started an unneeded escalation trying to make me jump through her hoops.

- Taking Value Away

When she feels he's too good -or people think he's too good-, she will try to make him look bad as a way of re-balancing the relationship (check combative relationships).

Note she says "she would have said yes to anyone", basically communicating to him "you're not special". Super mean. And later on, she says she sometimes feels like taking a plane and running away.

Why It's Bad

A combative attitude is a major dating mistake because high-quality men don't want a relationship with a combative woman (makes sense, no?).

And once you're in a relationship (most likely with a low-quality man), it's equally bad because it leads to toxic relationships.

Solution

When you catch yourself acting combative, stop immediately and assess what's driving you.

Are you self-sabotaging because you're you might get hurt?
Are you resentful because you feel he's too good?
Because you feel he's a player?

Once you'll know the reason why you'll be more able to act accordingly and, if that's what you'll decide, overcome the internal resistance to the two of you getting together.

#6. Fear: When It's Too Good

I can't count the interactions I have had with overflowing chemistry.

Big emotions, excitement, the sparkle of a great romance in the air… And yet they never had a follow-up.

Look at this example below.
She was so overwhelmed that, she admits herself, she couldn't speak. Theoretically, if this girl were you, you should be very happy to meet him again, right?

Well, often unluckily, it's wrong.

She was so nervous and excited she couldn't speak. Did she come out and meet me again? Nope

Women way too often don't meet the men that excite them the most because those same big emotions end up playing against them.
And it's relatively common. This is one more example.

Let's see why:

- Fear of Getting Hurt

When you like someone a lot and want something to happen badly… You're also very afraid it could go wrong.

Maybe you tell yourself he's too good.

Or you tell yourself you will say yes… But you're a bit nervous or emotional to reply now, so you tell yourself you'll do it later on. And you put it off.. And then put it off more… And it never happens.
So instead of going out with the guys with whom it was "soooo good", you end up going out with the guys with whom it was "OK".
Silly, no?

- Cognitive Dissonance

Meeting a man with perfect chemistry can be a huge emotional roller coaster.

But emotions can dissipate or can come crashing down. And that's where it all goes to waste.

Your rational side takes over.
Now you feel silly, or weak for having been so excited. Maybe you have a more boring boyfriend, or you see yourself as "rational". So to avoid he reminding you of your moment of "weakness" you cut him out (Commitment and Consistency principle, Cialdini).

- Rationalization

And if you were horny and nothing happened, guess what?
You get angry, disappointed.

You will ruthlessly cut him out, maybe even being angry at yourself.
You will rationalize your feelings telling yourself something like "I thought he was great but how silly of me, another good-for-nothing man..".

It's because from an evolutionary perspective, a man who can't capitalize on a horny woman is an ineffective man.

But here's the funny thing: your unconscious mind won't differentiate if you met him half naked in a cave a hundred thousand years ago or with your mom at the mall -the latter being a bit more difficult to make happen right there and then… –

It has a name: left brain interpreter (and more in Incognito by Eagleman)

Why It's Bad

These are three slightly different instances, with fear probably being the most common.

However, they're all interlinked as the most damaging early dating mistake you could commit because they all happen with the men you like the most. Basically, when you give in to fear and fall prey to cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1957), you are missing out on the very best!

Silly, right?
The men that excite you, the men that give you strong emotions and the men with whom you have the biggest chemistry are also the men with whom you can have the best encounters and the best relationships of them all.

Solution

Spend time with him right there and then when possible, and if not possible, make this your new rule: any time, upon meeting someone, you:

- like him
- have butterflies
- are sexually attracted
- there's strong chemistry

Go meet him no matter how you feel afterward.
Worst case scenario, it will be a new experience and a drink outside. Most likely, you'll do a favor to both him and to yourself.

#7. “It Will Happen When It Will Happen” Mindset

Big cities, Tinder and chatting apps trick your brain into believing there are more options than there really are.

The consequence?

You hold out and pass up good opportunities one after another -the phenomenon has a name: The Paradox of Choice-.

Why It’s Bad

Put simply, while you’re lazy, other women take charge of their dating life, make things happen and pair up with cool guys.

Below is an example.
Cheeky, bold, and sexy at the same time.

The issue is even worst for appealing and educated women, who mistakenly bide their time confident in their “strong hand”.

But the opposite happens: more commitment-aggressive women pair up with the cool guys early and the longer you wait the fewer good men left (game theory for dating).

Solution

The solution? Drop the “waiting” attitude.
You have to help him make it happen.
And when the phone rings it’s time to wake up from the passive dream and do your part to make it a reality.

Sometimes you won’t feel like, but make an effort if you like him.
Don’t be like her:

Example

As I was saying in the “unavailability games” this didn’t feel easy or overbearing.

It felt special that she had chosen me in connection to her lofty feelings and emotions.

And it felt like immediate, powerful (sexual) chemistry.
A memorable night followed and a beautiful relationship blossomed from there.
Take a leaf out of her book, be brave, and go for it.

Summary

Many women are unhappy being single and many more are not in great relationships.

This post only addresses the mistakes happening early on in the dating process.
But a good start is half the way already.

Quite simply, the women who get the early process right and get the relationships they want are the women who say yes to the men they like and (help those men) make things happen.

These are the women who, without necessarily taking an active role, remove the obstacles along the seduction road (and oftentimes make him feel like he did everything).

These women:

1. Send easy-to-read signals (men need more than women think)
2. Are pleasant in the first approach and make him feel liked (no aloof games)
3. Say yes and find the time to meet later on (no unavailable games)
4. Go meet him
5. Escalate mutual investment
6. Keep him by being feminine and making him feel like a man

There are very, very few women like that, and they don’t stay single for long -provided they want a relationship of course-.
So once you will become one, you’ll definitely stand out.
And once you pair up, you can even chill and enjoy the rainy nights in with him after.

Full Summary

About The Author:

> Lucio: Robbins is a fantastic motivational speaker, a self-help "guru" with great content… And an endless marketer and covert bragger. Still thumbs up, though

Unshakable

Tony Robbins starts first by explaining what "unshakable" actually means:

Unshakable is a state of mind. That you are safe and will be alright no matter what. This book should help you to feel financially safer.

The Money Masters

The men Robbins interviewed for the book are a who's who of finance:

- Ray Dalio, possibly the most successful investor ever -read his Principles–
- Mary Erdoes, managing nothing less than 2.4 trillion assets at JPMorgan
- Jack Bogle, the pioneer of index funds and founder of The Vanguard Group;

- T. Boone Pickens, billionaire takeover operator of the ’80s
- Carl Icahn,
- John Paulson, who made 4.9 billion in one fell swoop during the financial crisis (read The Big Short)
- Warren Buffett, who doesn’t need any intro

Compound Interest

Tony Robbins is a big proponent of compound interest. He says that you will not earn your way to riches: just look at celebs and how they go bankrupt all the time.
It’s saving and using compound interest, says Robbins, that will transform small amounts of monthly installments into fortunes.

My note: albeit resources like The Millionaire Next Door and The Millionaire Mind pitch the same idea, I fully disagree (read the cons).

Stock Market is Safe

Tony Robbins uses a bunch of statistics to basically say that the stock market is safe. “It always rebounds”. Nobody will know whether it will rise or fall but, in the long term, it will rise.

Stay in The Market

Robbins says that the biggest danger you face is actually staying out of the market. The longer you stay out, the more your sabotage your compound interest.
Compound interest requires you to be always in the market.

Taxes & Fees

The author reviews a bit of the big impact that government taxes and hedge fund fees can have on your returns. In a nutshell, you should:

- avoid actively managed funds
- take steps to minimize your taxes
- Avoid transaction costs by trading less
- avoid brokers (they work for a company, not just for you)

He has a list of questions to ask your financial advisor, for which I recommend you get the book.
Or check Money Master the Game.

Investors’ Mistakes

Confirmation Bias
Seeking confirmation of your investment decisions and beliefs instead of looking for opinions to contradict them

Trend Extrapolation
Believing a current short-term trend will continue.
My note: one could say the same about the stock market “always going up”.

Overconfidence
We overestimate our abilities.

Greed and Gambling
We have a tendency to look for the home run, the big payday, and the lottery win. But it’s slow and steady that wins the game.

Investing Home
The tendency is to invest in companies and markets geographically near. Diversify internationally instead.
Loss Aversion and Negativity
During financial turmoil and a bear market, your brain will want to panic. Don't. And do what's logical, not what your pain-avoiding brain tells you.

Also, read Thinking Fast and Slow and my thesis on the psychological pitfalls leading to the financial crisis.

Mastering Your Mind

Tony Robbins says financial freedom is only one part of success and fulfillment. And he spends a good chunk of his book on "the other important parts of life".
As usual this in high Tony Robbins standards. I invite you to get the book and check Awaken the Giant Within or Personal Power II

CONS

The compound interest theory
Rarely do I hear compound interest theorists talk about inflation. Or what giving up those monthly installments will do to the quality of life of average or below-average-income people.

You'll never earn your money through earnings?
Never…? I love Robbins but that sounds precious to say and it's what DeMarco calls the "paradox of practice". Tony Robbins didn't get a private jet and an island investing a few hundred a month. He got there using the Millionaire Fastlane. I also invite you to check Rich Dad Poor Dad.

Nobody knows… But it will go up
I experience a strong pushback anyone somebody says the stock market will always go up. Especially when they talk about psychological pitfalls but then they're all so sure the market will always go up. Hell, it went up for the last 100 years… Which still doesn't say anything of course.
If you're one of those guys I warmly invite you to read Fooled by Randomness.

Review

I listed a lot of cons because, as usual, I feel I need to make all counter-argument I can think of.
But overall Unshakable is a great resource for investing.

Verbal Judo Summary

About The Author:
George J. Thompson is a former police officer and a communication skills trainer.
As he shares in his own book, he is also a martial arts expert but dedicated his career to using words to get what he wanted.

Introduction

The author says that verbal judo is about using and deflecting the other person's aggression to reach your goal.

It's the opposite of "verbal karate", which is more likely to escalate and leave people's feelings hurt.

Underpinning the whole idea of verbal judo is to treat people with dignity and respect.

Don’t Take Things Personally

This is rule #1.

George J. Thompson says that if you learn not to take things personally, you’ll already be ahead of the curve and barely need any verbal judo.

Most of interpersonal issues, indeed, are born out of ego (read how to rebuild your ego).

> Say what you want but do as I say

Develop Empathy

Empathy is the most critical skill of verbal judo, says the author.

Empathy doesn’t mean sympathizing or approving of him. It means to see through his eyes and understand.

3 Types of People

The author says there are three types of people:

- Nice People (will do what you say)
- Difficult people (will push back and want to know why and what’s your authority)
- Wimps (will not say anything but will resent you and breed discontent)

With difficult people, George shows early on what’s in it for them.

Always Go for Win-Win

Following a major tenet of the 7 Habits of highly effective people, Thompson presents the solution he wants as a win-win for both.

For example, he would say something like:

> “so far you have only done X. if you refuse to cooperate, you will spend the night in jail, get a criminal record and I will have to do a lot of paperwork. If you step out of the car and cooperate, we will be done in 10 minutes”.

This is also a similar technique as presented by a former FBI agent in The Like Switch.

Learn to Paraphrase

Paraphrasing is another key ingredient of effective verbal judo.

Paraphrasing often serves to soften the tone.
Angry people don’t really mean what they say, so when you paraphrase them and use their own words such as “always” and “on purpose” they will soften the tone themselves.

When you paraphrase never ask if they understood you: nobody will admit they didn’t.
Let them repeat.

And to paraphrase them, here’s the perfect way:

> Let me be sure I understand what you have said

Avoid These Bad Phrases

Verbal Judo has a very interesting chapter about the top phrases to avoid.

I invite you to read the book for the complete list, but here are some that struck me the most:

- What's your problem (instead: what's the matter, how can I help)
- Calm down
- I'm gonna do X to you (don't warn people of impending action or they'll get ready)
- This is the last time I say it (it's probably not true and you'll lose credibility)
- Because those are the rules

Here's Why You Need to Explain The Rules

Some rule enforcers don't like to explain the rules.

Why Not?

Because they are being egotists.
The author says that when people refuse to explain they show they are more concerned about themselves and appearing dominant than about the other person's well-being.

And it's most likely to escalate.

If someone else gives you the dreaded answer "because those are the rules" you could say:

> "Could you explain to me why those rules were put in the first place. They don't make sense to me and if I understood it would be much easier for me to comply".

The 5 Steps of Verbal Judo

The author proposes a five-step approach to the conversation:

1. Ask (ethical appeal)
2. Set context (reasonable appeal: explain policies and rules)
3. Present options (reasonable appeal: what's in it for them and what if they don't)
4. Confirm (practical appeal: "can I do or say anything to make you cooperate")
5. Act

When you present options, make him feel like it's his choice (saves his face, also read How to Win Friends).
And flash out the stories, give details: make him feel what it's like to choose the difficult option or the easy one.

The Structure of Verbal Judo: LEAPs

The author provides 5 steps and tools to generate compliance:

1. Listen
2. Empathize
3. Ask
4. Paraphrase
5. Summarize

He goes into details for each step and I invite you to get the book for the details.

Praise and Criticism: Avoid The Sandwich

I love the author's take on the typical sandwich feedback technique.

He says most people will not believe your praise at all when followed by a "but" or by a critique.

Do the opposite instead: start with the criticism and what you want to see them improve on.
Then deliver heartfelt praise that is highly specific. Specific praises are credible and memorable.

React to What People Mean, Not What They Say

George Thompson says to react to what people mean, not to the actual words.

When people are angry they might not really mean what they say or not understand the situation.

Address the underlying issue and concern instead.

Cross-Cultural Communication

The author says the stress on cross-cultural communication can sometimes be more counterproductive than useful.

He says instead something I always believed in as well: what if we focused on the commonalities instead?

Same as the author, I too agree there are more key commonalities than differences.

Also, read:

- The futility of intercultural communication training

Real-Life Applications

Confront Wimps
You need to confront the people who talk behind your backs or they will undermine you.
Exposure is unbearable to wimps, so if you call them out on it, they'll disappear like snow on a hot day.

Don't Repeat Yourself
Don't repeat orders over and over because it's a sign of weakness for people in a position of authority.
And if you're executing, execute orders high-power.

Don't Say What Makes You Feel Good
… Unless it also makes the other person feel good.
When you're angry it might feel good to lash out, but it's almost always the wrong reaction. And you can never really take back what you said.

CONS

- Some Macho Attitude

Albeit he presents himself as a man of words and not brawns, Thompson often comes across as a bit macho.
And, in a couple of instances, even slightly braggart.

Review

Verbal Judo is a treasure trove of great communication tools.

It's up there with the best of them, like Difficult Conversations and I liked it even more than Crucial Conversations.

I absolutely recommend you to get it.
This is only an overview and the examples in the book are what make the difference.

EDIT:
As I reviewed the best communication skills books, I moved "Verbal Judo" from 5 to 4 stars.
It's still up there with the best ones, but not as good as "Difficult Conversations" in my opinion.

7 Proven Questions to Spot A Player

Lucio Buffalmano · 14 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Spotting a player can be easy… Once you have a bit of experience and know what to look for.

And most articles I have browsed around the web have no clue as to what to look for.

So while in this other article we tell you the signs of a f*ckboy, this article will show you how to proactively spot a player with 7 simple questions.

Contents

- Intro: Leveraging Players' Psychology
- Questions to Spot a Player
  - 1. Ah, what do you know about women, you're a guy
  - 2. My ex was such a player. He knew the game, he slept with more than 15 women

- Summary

Intro: Leveraging Players' Psychology

To spot a player, you have to understand the psychology of a player.

Player is indeed more about a state of mind than about the act of bedding women.
And that state of mind is underpinned by a common thread:

- Pride

The most inveterate players, those who play out of a drive and lust for women are all proud of their "player status".

They are proud of their "skills", their love for women, their female knowledge, or, more crudely, of their partners' count.

And pride is what you need to leverage to spot a player.

Questions to Spot a Player

Direct questions won't work every time.

A few players, some of whom are very high-quality players, will tell you very openly that with them it's all about a roll in the hay and no more.

But most will hide their true status.

The best way then is to lure him out.
Remembering that he structures his ego around women, you need to put him in a position to defend his "honor".
You must provoke him to prove his worth.

Here are a few great ways:

1. Ah, what do you know about women, you're a guy

You are prodding his pride here. Provoking him by implying he doesn't know women.

If he defends his female knowledge, he's a player.

2. My ex was such a player. He knew the game, he slept with more than 15 women

Say it with a little disdain.

The boring guys will tell you "poor you".
The good guys will be interested in how you felt.

But the player?

You just aroused his competing instincts. Now he won't wanna come second to your ex.
And that's how you will catch him.
If he laughs or at looks at you with a smirk and asks "oh why, is that a lot?", then you know he's a player.

Only as briefly as a few years ago I wouldn't have personally resisted this question either and would likely ask back "and do you think that's a lot?".

3. My girlfriend met Mr. Perfect.
She won't sleep with him so he'll be serious with her

This is just an example of a dating question.

The idea here is that you indirectly broach the topic of seduction, dating, and dating strategies.
Possibly, you might even ask more directly "a guy's opinion" on what a girlfriend of hers should do with a guy she is seeing.

If he starts talking at length about it and if he sounds like he knows a lot about the topic, then there are two options:

1. He has been around a lot (he is or was a player)
2. He is studying the topic (he is or wants to be a player)

4. I don't know, you seem like a guy who would hurt women..

Now notice that many guys here will reassure you they are for real. And that they don't hurt women.

But that's not how players act and think. They don't think in terms of "not hurting" and "taking care".
They think in terms of giving and "sharing adventures".

And they will tell you about "giving" whirlwind romance, "giving" passion, and great sex.
Or losing themselves in the moment with you.

Tell him that sentence. Then start digging deeper into his answers. It won't take long till you get to his "player's honesty time".

See here an example of what that looks like from the movie "Forgetting Sarah Marshall":

5. I think there are two types of men: long-term, for serious stuff; and short-term, to have fun. You look like a short term

Bingo.
That's exactly the player's mentality!

You just did three things when you say that.
You:

1. Stroked his ego
2. Gave him a great reason to come out (ie.: position himself as "for fun")
3. Make him feel like he can be honest with you

Chances are he will jump on the chance of coming out and he'll want to actually prove that he's short-term material.
Once he does that, it's your call: enjoy the night, or drop him.

6. How Do You Spend Most of Your Time

This question is not for the real players but for the guys who simply end up behaving like players.

These guys might be marriage material… In the future.

But right now they don't have time for women. They might enjoy women, but their priorities are different.

If all he's doing is work, if he has no time for anything outside his passion and goals… He might see women the way James Bond does. A good distraction.

7. Are you a player?

You'll be surprised to see that, contrary to what most other sources online say, many guys are open about it.

This can be either because they validate their ego with women, or because they are high-level womanizers and don't need to lie.

Read more in Signs of a Fuckboy.

Types of Players

Let's use the definition of a player as:

> A man who sleeps with more women than most other guys

We can then differentiate players into four different categories:

- Opportunity player (they have the chance and take it)
- Love for women players (Casanova types)
- Validation player (sleep with women for ego validation)
- Sex addicts

Players, per se, do not say much about the overall quality of a man.
Some players can be high-quality men, while some other players have little to offer.

For more:

- Types of players and their psychology

Players Are Vocal Minority

There are no official statistics, but I'm pretty confident players are a minority.

Most guys indeed do not have very easy access to women, are not hell-bent on retching up lays, and are not slaves to women's beauty the way Casanova was.

But though they're a minority, with their skills and charm they also make up an important part of the dating scene. Since they approach more and interact more with women, you get to see and talk to them more often than you do with normal guys.

That's why an underestimated way of spotting a player is to ask yourself how did you meet him.

If he came up to you, if he seemed confident and unafraid, then chances are higher that he is a player.

If he was an old friend, introduced by a common friend, or is part of your social circle, then chances are lower that he is a player.

Summary

Learning how to spot a player is a great skill to learn and it will immensely improve your dating efficiency.

If you're not yet looking for "the one" or for a serious relationship, then you need to worry less about spotting players and you can simply enjoy the experience.

But the more you want to get serious, the more this skill will come in handy.

This post provided you with 7 proven questions to spot a player.

High-Performance Habits: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 15 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In High-Performance Habits, Brendon Burchard answers the question of what differentiates high performers from the rest.

It's not bad, but there is nothing new or earth-shattering either.

Bullet Summary

- Focus on what really matters
- Get breaks so you can stay energetic till the end
- Love the struggle

Full Summary

Seek Clarity

High performers focus on what matters, which helps them filter through what doesn't matter to only spend energy on what's important.

Generate Energy

Brendon says that a big difference between normal people and higher performers is their level of energy throughout the day. Most people lose energy long before the day ends.

Effective performers instead are able to quickly recharge their batteries between tasks. The secret is to take micro-breaks between tasks. For example, going from your desk to a meeting, you could close your eyes, meditate for a second and put yourself in the state of energy that you need for the meeting.

The author suggests you do the same with micro-breaks every 45 or 60 minutes.

Raise Necessity

Brendon says that the top performers associate a sense of identity with great performance. They have a way (read Start With Why). The author recommends you think about whom needs you to be at your top level -could be your family, spouse, or customers.

My Note: I agree with the necessity and with tying it to your identity. At the same time, I would recommend not to put the pressure of winning on yourself. Put the pressure on doing your best. Read more on my anti-fragile identity guide.

Increase Productivity

Brendon says highly effective people increase productivity by focusing on what matters. And they think of all the steps it takes to achieve what matters and focus on them.
If it's a matter of skills, they'll work tirelessly in acquiring those skills.

Develop Influence

Burchard says people who yield a big influence do two things:

1. Change the way people think
2. Challenge people to grow

Most interesting of all for me, was Brendon saying that some of the best influencers have a giving mindset and believe they are making a difference.

Demonstrate Courage

The author says that highly effective people do things in the face of hardships and risks:

1. They are willing to speak up and share their truth
2. They expect, respect, and often love the struggle

Real-Life Applications

Prioritize Health
Take care of your rest, nutrition, and recharging breaks.

Make Your Own Mood
Don't wait for joy, happiness, or whatever feeling you want to happen. Make it happen.

CONS

Informercial
There's a lot of referencing to online courses and material on his website. There's also an assessment you can take on his website… If you leave your email. I'm not a big fan of those marketing techniques (check my Tai Lopez article).

Longish
The book is longish, it could have been made shorter.

Review

The concept of "High-Performing Habits" is similar to Tools of Titans in the sense that it lists a few insights into what successful people do.

I didn't find anything earth-shattering, but it's not too bad either.

In more frank words, it means you can probably skip it.

Womanizers Psychology: The 10 Types of Players

Lucio Buffalmano · 15 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I write this article on the psychology of womanizers, leveraging both research and personal experience.

We leverage the largest collection of scientific psychology handbooks at The Power Moves, and I have a history as a player: a perfect combination to understand the underlying dynamics.

By the end of this article, you will understand the psychology of players, the types of players, and what drives and motivates them.

Romantic womanizers are the most dangerous

- Womanizers Summary

Overview: Players' Psychology

Humans adopt two macro mating strategies:

1. Player strategy: Find (easy) women to have sex with, and move on (short-term, uncommitted)
2. Relationship strategy: Get serious with a quality woman, invest, sire children with her, and provide (long-term, committed)

It's shades of players

Both tendencies, in varying amounts, are present in all men (and women).

Evolutionary psychology indeed suggests that humans have a history of 'non-full monogamy'.
Meaning: the tendency for pair bonding is a human universal. But so is a history—and a wandering eye—for straying.

The player/relationship type is a continuum and few, if any, are 100% either of them.

There is often some element of both in the same man, but many men lean (far) more on the right or (far) more on the left (Figueredo, 2022).
And the two archetypes come with different psychologies and preferences:

- Relationship guys place a higher value on non-physical attributes that players do (e.g.: personality, intelligence, see Regan, 2000)
- Players tend to prefer youth and looks

For a more in-depth analysis and examples, see:

- Lovers VS players VS friends

The "player psychology" includes:

Trait 1: Avoidant Attachment Style

The avoidant attachment style is uncomfortable with emotional intimacy.

That allows the player to remain at a safe distance, and ready to move on.

Quoting from The Handbook of Evolutionary Psychology:

> Attachment avoidance is assumed to refect a relationship commitment minimization strategy (Del Giudice, 2019; Karantzas et al. , 2019), in which parental investment is traded off against reproductive investment (…) (Szepsenwol & Simpson, 2019).
> (…) aligns with a fast life strategy and short-term mating strategies (…)

Trait 2: Dark Triad Traits

The dark triad constellation includes Machiavellianism, narcissism, and psychopathy.

Players tend to exhibit higher dark-triad traits (Lyons, 2019).

Narcissists are the most successful dark triads daters (Rauthmann and Kolar, 2013) and, speculatively, agreeable Machiavellians (Alexander, 2024)

Trait 3: Unrestricted Sociosexual Orientation

Unrestricted social sexual orientation, or "more inclined towards casual sex", is the defining trait of the player type.

Recent research showed that restricted and unrestricted orientations are related but can also move independently.

That means that usually people lean one way or another. But it's possible to be high in desire for casual sex while still desiring a committed relationship.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's experience:
I loved most the initial phases of seduction and infatuation. My initial desire and enjoyment of the relationship plummuted while my desire for freedom came back with a vengeance.

Visual Fixation to Attractive Others

Committed men avert their gaze faster when they're in a relationship.
Men with higher sociosexuality stare more.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's experience: I've always been drawn to attractive women, and noticeably more than most peers

Trait 4: Higher Testosterone

High testosterone is associated with higher mating effort, and potentially rockier relationships.

Edelstain summarizes his research on testosterone and relationship quality saying:

> high testosterone may be incompatible with the maintenance of nurturant relationships

Trait 5: Risk-Taking Behavior

Including more frowned-upon dating approaches with frequent cold approaches, mate poaching, and 'rotations of partners'.
And, potentially, sexual risk-taking, with unprotected sex (Seal, D. W., & Agostinelli, G. 1994).

More to Be Researched

I suspect more will be discovered by future research, including:

- Less jealousy & controlling behavior, both pertaining to relationship and commitment types.
  ⍰⍰♂ Lucio's experience: I had low jealousy and even lower 'control motivation' in my relationships. I was more often freely offered faithfulness

- Less heartbreak, quicker rebounding, and sometimes happy at the breakup
  ⁉️♂️ Lucio's experience: My first breakup was half painful, and half celebration. The successive ones, I felt worse for her, than for me
- Dominance motivation, including seduction as a game of increasing influence
  ⁉️♂️ Lucio's experience: My biggest heartbreaks are not relationships, but failed seductions that I believed were meant to happen
- Faster infatuation but lower long-term companion love and lower relationship satisfaction
  ⁉️♂️ Lucio's experience: I sometimes even idealized during the infatuation stage, only to swing in the opposite direction afterward
- Stronger post-nut clarity, which for players may include a stronger loss of interest
- Coolidge effect, or decreasing sexual interest for the same partner, stronger for players
  ⁉️♂️ Lucio's experience: intimacy was fireworks with high sex drive women, but that could become an issue over time as women's drive was stable or increasing, while I lost interest

Hypothesized sexual interest over repeated copulations for women, increasing with intimacy; most men, decreasing slowly; and high sociosexual orientation men (player types), starting highest but collapsing fastest. Chart and concept by Lucio Buffalmano.

For now, this is enough to show that player types have a different psychology than relationship-type men.

With that being said, let's now explore the archetypes of players:

Types of Players

#1. Slaves to Love Womanizer

> I have loved women even to madness..

I love that quote from the most famous womanizer of all.

Giacomo Casanova epitomizes the type of player with a boundless love for women.

It's not true that all players are manipulative and deceptive, or that they only play games with women, and it's also not true that all players "only want to fu*k".

Casanova-type of players will truly love you.
And love you deeply and passionately. But the problem for some of those women is that "women" is plural. Indeed the next part of Casanovas's quote is

> ".. But I loved freedom above all".

Casanova types of lovers will remember you forever, think of you fondly, or even get heartbroken when they depart… But they do depart.

These types of players love the feeling of romance.
And the goodbye is often part of the romance. There is a bitter-sweet, poetic touch in goodbyes.

⁉️♂ Lucio's experience:
Some of my favorite moments of a sexual encounter are walking her back.
And some of my sweetest memories are farewells to lovers.

The Casanova type of player is the most likely to break hearts.

He enters into your life with a whirlwind of romance and passion, something you've probably never experienced before.
And it will be amazing… Until he needs to go for another romance.

Do They Stop?

Rarely.

This is the archetype of the "ever-moving womanizer".
They will always keep an eye open for other women.

#2. The Artistic-Soul Womanizer

> Life is short, might as well enjoy it

The artistic seducer loves art and beauty—of which women are an expression.

Artists have a touch of madness that hinders long-term pair bonds and facilitates short-term ones—a link also found in research:

> creativity could implicate being relatively detached from relationships because of creativity's association with subclinical levels of schizotypal traits, associated with a disinterest in long-term pair-bonds
> Brown in Cambridge Handbook of Sexual Psychology

Artists can pull women into dysfunctional on-off relationships of rescuer and troublemaker, while some women also get ot live the fantasy of being a muse.
This is an interesting example of 'inverted polarity' seduction: a boy at the mercy of his emotions forces her to use her love to be a healing/mother figure for him.

Some, like Pablo Picasso, have an ugly mean streak. That too, unfortunately, can be a potent seductive trait, especially for women with masochistic tendencies.

Milder artists are brooding, slightly depressed, and can evoke women's maternal instincts.
Think of Kurt Cobain in "Nevermind" unplugged, lost in his music, and with a touch of lonesome sadness.

Some are more direct and active, though.
This is an example from the movie "Vicky Christina Barcelona":

Do They Stop?

They might, but that might also mean that as they get tamed, they also lose their best artistic talent.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's note:
Deep down I always looked down on this player type as a L, and too feminine.
And the dark narcissist ones like Picasso disgust me.

#3. Opportunistic Womanizer

> I'm popular, might as well take advantage of it..

Remember we said there is a player in most men?

Well, that's what gets awakened when opportunity meets dormant evolutionary tendencies.

Opportunity players are not truly players at heart.
They're just passive recipients of the fruits of success and fame.

Some men in college -at least the attractive ones- are opportunity players thanks to the hookup culture.

#3.2. Predatory Opportunists

These bottom-feeding players abuse their position of power to get sex in exchange for preferential treatment.

Weinstein was such an example.

A true shame for the category.

Do They Stop?

Once they get their fill, opportunities dwindle, or they crave a family life, they stop.

Just make sure they've had enough playing time though, and if you can somewhat restrict their options, that won't hurt either.

#4. Infatuation Womanizer

> Short bursts of relationships

These guys are not notch collectors, but more relationship guys.

We could even argue if they are real players since they tend to stick with one girl.. At least as long as they're together.

And that's the whole point.

These men are enamored with the infatuation phase, lasting at most for two years.
After that, they're on to the next relationship.

Example?
George Clooney.

Do They Stop?

Yes, they can stop.
It will take an amazing woman, as Clooney said… And some years of playtime.
Then, after they've strung a few, they will be looking for a high-quality partner for the long haul.

#5. Charmer Womanizer

> What's Life Without a Flirt

Some players enjoy the social power of their charm almost as much as they enjoy women.

They are indeed social charmers, as Greene called them, and see women as one of the pleasures of life.

Jack Nicholson is a good example:

Notice how he relishes his power over her, and see how affable he is with the interviewer.

Do They Stop?

Many of these individuals form families, but some struggle to adapt to a committed life.

They keep paying flirty compliments to the waitress and throwing sensual smirks at the clerks. Maybe with their wives on their side.
Quite disrespectful and childish, we could argue.

#6. Bigger Pursuit Womanizer

> A pleasurable break from my other pursuit

This is the James Bond type of player.

But, as much as they might seem on the opposite spectrum to the superficial observer, also Einstein-types.

This type of player likes women, but he has bigger goals and drives in his life and can't commit.

While Casanova lives for women and romance and falls in love passionately, James Bond has a bigger loyalty to his mission.
Which is also part of his allure.

See an example from James Bond, when his bigger pursuit came up:

P.S.: all players will enjoy the line "I'll be back". Players like players' characters.

Do They Stop?

Yes, they can stop.

That happens when their main hustle becomes not so important anymore. It shouldn't just be their main hustle that ends though, but their drive behind the hustle as well, or they might look into something else.

This might happen if they:

- Achieve their goal
- Reach a comfortable enough position they're happy with
- Change mindset
- At a certain age, the urge for family gets bigger than their goal
- The woman becomes part of the hustle (ie.: business partner)

#7. Validation-Seeking Womanizer

The validation of collecting notches props up an individual's own self-esteem and grandiosity, and social status.

Example of a text I received with a humblebrag:

> Him: I gotta go underground, I keep getting caught (attaches a snapshot of a woman saying they saw him with other women)
> Me: (validates him, then attaches his own screenshot to vibe)

These types of players seek women for secondary emotional benefits—conquest, self-esteem, bragging, etc.
So they brag about it.

Lucio's experience:
Conquest was also a major driver of mine.
Separating after a 'conquest' indulged my avoidant personality with 'me time' to bask in the 'glory of victory'.
Turning a stranger into a lover in a matter of hours also boosted confidence.

Do They Stop?

Yes.
Some slow down once they mature, and some slow down after they reach 'their number'.

#8. Addicts Womanizer

Sex addicts need women to appease their urges, whether they seduce them or pay them.

But this category also often mixes sex addicts with substance addicts, making for very low-quality partners.
Charlie Sheen, who allegedly spent millions hiring prostitutes, is an example.

Do They Stop?

Yes, once they get clean.

When that happens, the woman can provide the stability they need to kick the drugs for good.

If that's the case, he will always come back to you because he needs you as his anchor.

These relationships are perfect for alpha-females who lead and keep them in check.
It becomes a co-dependent relationship, albeit the "healthy" type of co-dependent.

Be careful if they relapse, though: it's a slippery slope and you don't want to be dragged down.

#9. Predatory Womanizers

Predatory womanizers make women worse off.

In general, the harsh truth is that short-term and uncommitted dating is less cooperative than long-term monogamy.

As Condolin explains, monogamy aligns interests and promotes cooperation between the sexes.
By contrast, and sometimes unwittingly, the uncommitted player pursues a 'quantity of offspring' strategy that leaves women without a provider.

This approach is inherently more fraught with opportunities for conflict.

The difference is that an honorable man with morals will be upfront, won't lead her on, and will do his best to keep it win-win (a 'high quality man' who happens to be a player)

But predators have no morals.
Psychopathic predators sit at the antagonistic extreme because not only do they lack morals, but they may actively seek to harm their partners.

Predators are getting more common.
As women empower themselves, they also become more and more targets for their assets (Hare, 1993)

The lazier ones become fully dependent on her, which in the long run often turns her off.

Example:

> Him: (gains emotional leverage over her, then chills when she is hooked)

There are slightly different kinds of predatory players:

- Power-hungry (seeks control)
- Gold-diggers (seeks money)
- Narcissist (seeks status via a trophy partner)

Of course, there is often a comorbidity of traits and they overlap.
These are the worst types of players: read the signs and avoid them at all costs.

And for a VERY sobering read, check this:

- Psychopaths predatory mating

> Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

Womanizers Summary

"Womanizer" is the end result of chasing and/or sleeping with lots of women.

But the deeper causes of what brings a man to be a womanizer differ, and they make all the difference in the makeup of that man's personality and overall value.

This article helped you better understand who womanizers are.
And you can practically apply this knowledge to become a better dater, too.

- Being rich is a mindset: mindset-rich people can create their wealth at will

- You will be paid in direct proportion to the value you deliver

Full Summary

About The Author: Harv Eker is an American businessman and motivational speaker.
He deals with topics such as personal finance, wealth, entrepreneurship, and motivation.

Introduction

Being rich, as much as being poor, is a mindset.

To change your life, including financially, change the way you think.
And for good or for worst, explains Eker, a mindset is often passed on from parents to children.

My Note:
God, I can relate to that. I grew up in a family where a government job was the ultimate dream and, for a long time, I kept that mindset.

Develop Internal Locus of Control

Rich people believe they're in control of their lives and that they can fix things.

They don't complain about the government, society, or what's wrong in the world. They think about what they can do to change their conditions.

As The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People say: change starts with yourself. Start by focusing on what you can control, and your area of control will automatically expand.

Rich People Think Big

They have an abundance mentality, they think there's more and more out there, and the only question is how to get it.

And the opposite is also true: poor people think small.
They clip the coupons, try to hold on to the tip, and spend hours to save a few cents.

Also, read:

- Freeloaders and their small-timer mindset

Spend Time With Rich People

Rich people spend time with other people who also have a millionaire mindset.

Play to Win, Not to Avoid Losing

Millionaires play to win, while poor people play to avoid losing.

Playing to lose is a defensive mindset, and when you focus on not losing you will miss out on all the big chances to win big.

Focus on Opportunities, Not Threats

Rich people focus on opportunities while poor people focus on threats and obstacles.

Admire Success, Don't Hate it

Rich people admire other successful people.
They want to connect and learn from them.

Poor people instead resent successful people and try to take them down instead of learning from them.

Promote Yourself

Wealthy and successful people are not afraid of promoting themselves.

This was a big one for me.
I always shied away from self-promotion, but the author says that rich people aren't afraid of selling and promoting themselves.

Focus on Value & Results

Rich people choose to get paid based on results.

They know they'll get paid once they can deliver results and value, so they focus on building great products and efficient business systems.

Poor people think in terms of time instead. And they sell their time in exchange for (often little) money.

Make Money Work For You

This is similar to the concept of Rich Dad Poor Dad.

Rich people invest in assets that will generate income. And they invest their money in a way that generates more money.
Poor people, exchange time for money, keep working hard, and are enslaved to money.

Learn and Grow

Rich people keep increasing their knowledge because they look for knowledge.
Poor people think they know it all.

Also, read:

- how to develop a growth mindset

Money is Power: Save Money

While poor people focus on buying and spending, rich people focus on investment and, when needed, keeping expenses low.

This is indeed exactly the mindset of the millionaires as analyzed in "The Millionaire Next Door", and it's the opposite of what Greene recommends in "The 48 Laws of Power", where he advises "letting your money circle freely".

Real-Life Applications

Don't Save for Rainy Days, Save For Your Freedom!
Save for your financial freedom days!
It's a small mindset shift, but it's a little golden nugget that can change your perspective for the positive.

Find a Good Cause to Make Money
If your drive to make money is insecurity, fear, or the need to prove yourself, money will never make you happy.
Find a better and more empowering alternative to becoming rich.

CONS

Rich Mindset: Spend
To get you into a rich mindset, the author advises you to spend money. I am not fully convinced this is a good idea.

Infomercial
There's a lot of referencing to other products and seminars of the author. I didn't particularly appreciate that.

Review

I liked "Secrets of The Millionaire Mind".

The focus on mindset, culture, and psychology is a different approach than the typical "get rich" book on personal finance.

Tony Robbins has a similar approach, but Eker adds tons of good examples to help the readers differentiate between rich and poor mindsets.

If you are a beginner and if you come from a "poor mindset" culture, then this book will help you de-program yourself..

The 5 Second Rule: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The 5 Second Rule is a book by Mel Robbins on how to skip motivation, which in her opinion is useless, and jump straight into the actions that are needed to accomplish anything worthwhile.[image]

Bullet Summary

- Count from 5 to 1 and then start doing it
- Fear blocks you. The 5 second rule won't give fear time to kick in
- Your brain wants to save energy: the 5 second rule will short-circuit that

Full Summary

We are all scared of doing something and we would all prefer being lazy. Whenever you are faced with a difficult task you know you need to do, use the 5 Second Rule:

The 5-Second Rule In A Nutshell

1. Count down from 5 to 0
2. Start moving when you reach zero

That's it.

Once you reach the "go" time, start moving. Don't give yourself time to think about it or you'll come up with excuses.

Why it Works

Mel says that there's a five seconds window between thinking we have to do something and our brain coming up with excuses why we should not do it.

If you move before excuses start, you'll move.

How It Helps You

It helps us overcome two issues with starting:

- Conservation of energy
- Fear

Systems, including humans, tend to save energy and follow momentum. Starting up action takes energy (activation energy), and we must overcome our do nothing momentum to start.
Then there's of course fear, coming from our reptilian brain which wants us to stay safe (read Linchpin and how to stop worrying).

The counting distracts you from the excuses and it will help you focus on the goal. It will move you from your reptilian brain and activate the prefrontal cortex.

Break Poor Habits

The more you delay action, even on small things, the more those small actions build up to become bigger and bigger.

Start by breaking the bad habits with the small things -getting out of bed, doing your exercise, finishing a task- and you will begin to shift your all life with a bias towards following through.

Instill Positive Habits

Use the 5 Second Rule often enough, and it will become a starting ritual, your new positive habit of action.

Remember, the first difference between daydreamers and the people who make their dreams come true, is that the latter start.

The more you will build on the small things, the more your self-confidence will increase (also read ego and self-esteem).

> The one thing of people who make their dreams come true is that they start

Who It Works Best With

It works especially well with people who overthink stuff. And with those who tend to give in to procrastination and laziness (basically everyone :).

Start The Day With The 5 Second Rule

Mel Robins suggest you start with the first thing you do in the morning: wake up.

She recommends you set up your alarm and then go for it.
The key is to start going before your brain starts coming up with counterarguments.

My Note: I recommend you don't wake up with an alarm actually. Especially if you're not a morning person.

Motivation Is a Myth

Motivation is naive self-help, says Robbins.

More than that, Robbins seems to have a pet peeve against motivation.

She says the concept you should feel motivated and inspired to do the hard things in life is garbage.
Put simply, you will never feel motivated to do anything that is hard or difficult.

CONS

A Simple message doesn't need a book
This might be the epitome of space-filling elevated to art.
Stretching a 5-second concept into a full book may even be a feat one has to, in some distorted way, admire.
Unluckily though, stretching a 5-second concept into a whole book means that the difference between what the concept should take you, and what it actually takes you reading the book is all time that you're never going to get back.

Too Long
The book could be shorter.
If you wanted a shorter version, all you'd need to know would be: what's the 5 second rule and some examples of implementation.
And then if you're curious, why it works. A single blog post could accomplish that.

Review

The 5-Second Rule is an OK book with a good idea that ultimately, in our opinion, you can skip reading.

The idea of moving quickly before you start making excuses is not new.

The old Pick Up Artists called it the 3 seconds rule, such as approaching a girl you like within 3 seconds or you'll start coming up with excuses.

Still, the 5 Second Rule concept in itself is a great and valid concept.
It can really help you get going and build positive habits of an action taker. Just make sure you couple that with staying power and Grit.

However, frankly… You may not need the whole book for one single concept.

8 Proven Signs You're Dating A Fuckboy (With Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

How do you know if you're dating a fuckboy?

Well, some of them are easy to spot.

But some try to hide their true selves.

Experience also helps: once you meet a few, you will start growing your fuckboy-spotting antennas.

But until then, this guide is here to help you.

Fuckboys show off abs in the most unlikely places

- Summary

8 Signs Of a Fuckboy

All the following signs are indicators that you're dealing with a fuckboy.

None of them by themselves is a guarantee, but once you put them all together, they start telling you a fuckboy story.

#1. The Fuckboy Approaches Quickly

> Practice makes smooth

Most men are tense before approaching a girl.

It will show once he actually approaches, and some men will be open and vulnerable about their own feelings and tension.

But a fuckboy builds his pride around not being tense. He prefers cold approaching, just to show that he's a hunter. And he will try his darn best to look ballsy and in control.

If the fuckboy has been around the block, it's possible he truly doesn't feel much pressure anymore.
It might be the case that chasing skirts is the fuckboy's sole occupation, in which case he might have become well versed in it.

He:

- Approached you in "difficult" conditions
- Approaches himself (VS sending a friend)
- Was out by himself

See an example of a deep-sounding fuckboy from the movie "Vicky Christina Barcelona":

Low-level, clueless fuckboys are likely to use pick-up lines, while more aggressive fuckboys can open with sexual compliments about your figure.

#2. Dress to Impress

> Better style = easier lays

Lower-status and younger fuckboys adopt 'hood fashion' and seek the "Insta-friendly" artsy shot to display masculinity or muscles, without looking like he's flexing

Any seducer worth his salt knows that a good style gives him a huge leg up in dating.

Plus, most fuckboys are high-dark triads, which includes narcissism.

The lower fuckboy tries to have his own style. But he often botches it. He overdoes it, exaggerates the alpha male poses, comes across as too "macho-man" and, ultimately, you just have to think "what a fuckboy".

Players tend to take better care of themselves than the average Joe, and the average fuckboy will either try to dress to look tough, or adhere to the latest fads.

Often, he does not have his own style but copies whatever is trendy and whatever the latest teen band is popularizing.

Fuck boys usually prefer street attire, tank tops, and/or bad boy style (tattered clothes, leather jackets, etc.).

However, the higher-level fuckboys will also know that a solid suit and a classy style work wonders.
See an example from "Crazy, Stupid, Love":

#3. Fuckboys Want to Skip Dating & Jump to Bed

Players a few hundred years ago might have courted you and smothered you with love letters.

But today the game has changed, and fuckboys are a modern, libertine, and mostly urban phenomenon.

In today's diverse and fast moving societies with lots of options, fuckboys go for quantity, not quality.

They seek "down-to-fuck girls", and try to screen for them.

Fuckboys will:

- Try to get you home as soon as you meet
- Try to schedule a date as soon as you meet
- Talk little about yourself and themselves

- They already have a place in mind
- And they insist on their place because:

#4. Fuckboys Date Near Their Place

> And follow a process

Low-level fuckboys are disorganized in their dating as much as in their lives.

Don't expect much from low-level fuckboys, neither in terms of conversation, dating, or, possibly, even sex.

Higher-level fuckboys, though, are more organized.
When they meet you, players might ask what you would like to do, but they have something in mind anyway.

Here are a few fuckboy warning signs for the date:

- Meeting place is close to his place
- Gives you 2-3 options, which can include his place
- Knows the staff of your date's location (goes there often)
- Lets you speak and ask questions (more advanced players)
- Ends the date himself (more advanced players)
- Asks you if you want to go back "for a drink" or "for five minutes."

The fuckboy arranged the date right away and confirms ASAP

#5. Fuckboys Quickly Make Their Move

> Comfortable and quick move

Players want to get to sex fast, so they will try to coax you to their place as soon as they feel they possibly can.

Once at home, if they are experienced, it's likely they will follow a process. Here are a few signs:

- Lets you take your shoes off (you commit to staying)
- Shows you the house (you get comfortable)
- Too good a place (great music, books about tantra and massage, etc.)
- Stays in the kitchen for a bit (bedroom might be too quick)
- Makes a move early
- If you reject him, he won't be flustered, but go for it little later (more advanced players)

#6. After Sex The Fuckboys Only "Dates" At Home

> Sex-based relationships

Have you had sex already?

If so, the fuckboy will try to go for a "sex-at-home based relationship".

Meaning he will invite you over and go out a little, if at all.

The more demanding and entitled fuckboys will even ask you to prepare and bring something to their place:

A fuckboy-busting countermove

#7. Fuckboys Lie. A Lot

This is the most important part.

And what really differentiates a fuckboy from a high-quality womanizer (read more in the next paragraph).

Fuckboys lie and hide.

They will try to make up for their mistakes with a show of affection and love, trying to win you back and make you feel good.

Alternatively, they will try to make you dependent on them with the opposite behavior: treating you badly and making you feel unworthy.
But they won't leave you, because they need you for sex and validation.

Watch out, particularly for small lies and inconsistencies, because they hide bigger ones.

Did he say he was meeting Bob, but a week later he said he met Alex?
His family was in town for a week, but when he talks about it later on, it was 10 days?

The more you spot him, the more likely it is that he is a low quality fuckboy.

#8. Fuckboys Puff Up Their Chests With (Fake) Confidence

The fuckboy obeys the mantra that "confidence makes women wet".

And to look confident they will go to the gym, repeat to themselves how great they are and try to fuck women to get their filly of ego stimulation.

When the fuckboy is inebriated, he is at the top of his world. He is less afraid of rejection and can lay it on thick, just the way he likes it.

Here is the cocky fuckboy approach (from the movie 500 Days of Summer):

Liquid confidence swells the ranks of fuckboys in bars and clubs.

The Misogynist Toxic Fuckboys

There is a more toxic version of fuckboys.

The women-hating fuckboys.

They seek success as "revenge" against women and how badly they treated him (often it's a victim mindset and all in his mind).

They are likely to hang out in communities close to toxic masculinity, read covert women-hating authors such as Rollo Tomassi, and use feminism as an excuse to attack women and paint a society of "us men vs. them women".

They call themselves alpha males, but they are emotionally damaged and alpha male postures per excellence.

Stay as far away as possible from these bitter, low-quality men at all costs.

#9. Fuckboys Spin Uncommitted Sex As 'Romance & Bonding'

Example from online dating:

> Fuckboy: Frames the uncommitted sex as a more romantic 'making unforgettable memories'

Fuckboys VS Womanizers

The difference is huge.

I will call fuckboys the low-quality players, and womanizers the high-quality ones.

Most sources online refer to low level fuckboys when talking about players (for example, Wikihow and Goodmenproject).
But that's very reductive because high-quality players can make for great short-term relationships, sex, excitement, or rebound.

Or, when they stop, they can make for great long-term partners, too.

High-Quality Players

High-quality players have richer lives, have an abundance mentality when it comes to dating, and believe they can give a lot.

Since they feel they are enough and the next woman is behind the corner however it goes with you, they don't lie (nearly as much).
Many of them will actually be upfront.

High-quality players are also more likely to care about you and your feelings. And they don't want you to get hurt.
Rayan Gosling in the example above is actually more on the high-quality side than on the fuck boy side.

In some cases, women with high-quality players will actually gain even if the relationship ends abruptly.
Naomi Campbell, for example, considers his ex-playboy boyfriend Flavio Briatore a mentor.
In case of age differences indeed high-quality womanizers can be a sort of mentor or father figure.

Low-Quality Fuck Boys

The low-quality players don't have a major life goal beyond women and small timing.

They don't have -or don't feel they have- that much to offer. Except for a di*k, which is not in short supply anyway.

Since they often don't feel they are good enough, they make up for their lack of lies and shenanigans.
These are the guys who create drama, build two different relationships at the same time, and string women along for as long as possible.
They also often use women to feed their egos (read validation player).

These are the players that will tell you that you're great, better than your friends, that they love you, etc., etc.

The protagonist of the movie "The Pick-Up Artist" is a great example of a fuckboy. Is he a low-quality dude with little going on in his life.
Lies and mind games are his forte.

It must be that way.
Lying must be part of his repertoire because his genuine self wouldn't be enough to attract a quality woman.

So if you want to be a quality woman, start by cutting out all fuckboys from your life.

Summary

Fuckboys can be all you need for a night.

But you should at least know you're dealing with one, and you should be able to differentiate between a low-quality fuckboy and a high-quality fuckboys (womanizer).

The issue with fuck boys, contrary to high-quality womanizers, is that they are low-quality men overall.

Internally conflicted, low-level fuckboys get their validation through your emotional attachment (ie.: "two girls are into me, I must be great!").
And that can eventually hurt you.

If you missed the fuckboy signs and have already been hurt: don't let that become bitterness towards all men.
Fuckboys are just but a tiny minority.

Bullet Summary

- The diffusion of new technology follows a tiered bell curve
- There's a gap between all groups
- The biggest gap, a chasm, is between visionaries (early adopters) and pragmatists (early majority)

Crossing The Chasm Summary

About The Author: Geoffrey Moore is an American management consultant, professional speaker, and organizational theorist.
Moore started as a literature student and an English teacher later. But eventually, he moved into corporate and quickly developed his expertise.

Introduction

The chart below was the standard diffusion model of innovation (in tech sectors also called: the technology adoption life cycle).

Before Moore, it was usually thought to be a linear Bell Curve distribution.

the yellow line is the market penetration

Innovators

> Technology Enthusiasts

Innovators love technology themselves.

They sometimes scout the market and seek novelty before the technology has even been officially launched. Innovators want to be the first.

Winning them is key because early deployment proves that the technology works and the product is viable.

Early Adopters

> Visionaries

Early Adopters are visionaries and understand technology, but are not high-tech geeks themselves.

Their goal is not one of technological innovation per se, but a business goal.
For visionaries, technology is a business opportunity. They want a breakthrough and they embark on high-risk and high-visibility adoption projects.

Since the technology is so new, Early Adopters are willing to take a risk and they will work with fresh and unfunded vendors.

Moore says that Early Adopters are easy to sell to, but they're not easy to please: they have a dream and they might be unhappy with the issues standing between dreams and reality.

Moore says Early Adopters are not where the real money is. The real money lies with more prudent buyers who want to see a technology tested in the real world.

Early Majority

> Pragmatists

The Early Majority also understands the technology, but they are much more pragmatic.

They don't necessarily look at what visionaries do, but at how the technology will fit into their existing business.

These guys are harder to sell to: they care about buying from an established vendor, the reliability of the product, and the interface with other systems.
The issue can also be a cultural and communication one.
Pragmatists communicate best with other pragmatists and with people in their own industry.

Late Majority

> Conservatives

The Late Majority has all the concerns of the Early Majority but they are not well versed with technology.

These guys dislike disruptive technology and wait until the new technology has become the established standard.

Laggards

They don't want the new technology, for whatever reasons. They are usually not worth pursuing.

Gaps Between Segments

Moore demonstrates though that there are gaps between each different group.

And it will be difficult for each group to adopt the new technology if you present it the same with which you presented it to the earlier adopter.

So the chart looks more like this, with cracks in between:

- Innovators / Early Adopters Crack

This first gap happens when a hot new technology cannot translate itself into a major business benefit.

- Early Majority / Late Majority Crack

Since the late majority doesn't have the same tech skills as the preceding groups, the product must be made increasingly easy to use. Then this group will be comfortable adopting it.

The Biggest Chasm

The biggest gap is between early adopters and the early majority. Moore calls it a "chasm". So this is how the final chart looks like:

Geoffrey Moore says the chasm can go unnoticed because customers and order sizes can be the same.
What changes though is the reason why they order in the first place.

The early adopter buys for an edge on the competition -and as we've seen are ready to bear with a few glitches-.
The early majority guy buys an improvement on the existing process.

They're not looking for a revolution, but for a system that works reliably and with no surprises.

How to Cross The Chasm

The author recommends that you focus on a single market that you can dominate.

DO NOT start selling randomly: your goal is to secure a beachhead on a single niche market.
Once you dominate that single market, you can then use it as a stronghold to move to the adjacent markets.

Focusing on a market niche allows you to:

- Optimize resources
- Become a market leader (and pragmatists buy from leaders)
- Get word of mouth going (pragmatists communicate vertically within the industry)

#1. Target Market Niche

Pick one market niche and focus all of your efforts there.

Focusing on one niche will keep your costs lower as you can repeat and use the same processes and knowledge across similar companies.

Pick a strategic niche, one that will be easier for you and that has good links with adjacent markets.

My Note:
Focus on your effort also happens to be one of the 48 laws of power.

#2. Invasion Force

Create your product not with tech first in mind by with your customers' problems in mind.

Present your product as a ready-to-go solution. Think of integrations, installation, training, etc.

#3. Define the Battle

Position yourself and standardize your communication. Reduce your competitive advantage to a two sentences formula.

#4. Launch The Invasion

Get a sales force using consultative selling and a team of application and tech experts to develop and propose solutions.

Remember, crossing the chasm is about going from tech-based values to market-based values:

In the early market, you showcase tech superiority and product.
In the mainstream markets, you showcase company credibility and market leadership.

Selling to Early Majority

Moore says that to sell effectively to these guys you need patience and you need to become relevant and specific to their industry.

For example:

- Develop tech relevant to their industries

- Develop partnerships with other vendors in their industry
- Get mentioned by industry magazines and websites
- Show at their industries' trade shows
- Be an insider: learn the lingo, know their issues
- Earn a reputation for service and quality

Mistakes Selling to Early Majority

Moore says that visionaries alienate pragmatists in four major ways:

1. Not respecting their experience
2. Putting tech before their industry specifics
3. Not recognizing their current systems and infrastructure
4. Focus on disruption

Overleaping The Chasm

The current digital world offers a new opportunity to jump the chasm with mass market disruptive innovation (this is only in the third edition of Crossing The Chasm).

Basically, when you have a B2C digital product that can go straight for the consumers and you don't need any distribution channel there's no chasm for you. Examples are Instagram and Tumblr.
How to get users quickly? Virality and quick adoptions are key, read more on The Tipping Point and Made to Stick.

Moore says that while crossing the chasm means you get paid as you move forward, the new digital disruption is more of a URL approach: ubiquity first, revenue later.
And he proposes a 4 gear approach:

1. Acquire traffic
2. Engage users
3. Monetize their engagement (don't do it too early)
4. Enlist the faithful (also read Start With Why)

Real-Life Applications

Tech Savvy Early & Business Savvy Later
The gap between early adopters and the rest makes me think that you might want to have technically savvy salespeople early on and then more business-savvy people later on.

CONS

War Terminology
This is just my thing, but I really dislike the continuous referencing of war terminology for business. I remember as a salesperson it was always about "trenches", "going to war" etc. It always seemed stupid and… Plain wrong. See yourself as adding value, not launching an invasion.

Review

"Crossing the Chasm" doesn't apply to all fields.

As the author himself says, it's for disruptive innovations and B2B.
It's not for incremental innovations (continuous or sustaining innovation) and B2C.

But "Crossing the Chasm" is still a great read for almost everyone.
No matter the industry, psychological principles apply anywhere. And if you're in tech B2B, then it's an absolute must-read.

And it's also a great read for people interested in human psychology.

Totally recommended.

6 Proven Steps to Deal With Judgmental People (W/ Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 18 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Judgmental people can be very annoying and easily get under your skin.

This post teaches how to deal with their annoying judgmental attitude with six simple steps.

We will also use a case study to help you understand the power dynamics of assault/defense that dealing with judgmental people entails.

Contents

- #1. Do Not Give Them Moral Authority!
- #2. Refuse to Take The Defendant Position
- #3. Dig Up Their Dirt: Show They Are Unfit to Judge
- #4. Call Out Their Game: Don't Allow Them to Shoot & Hide
- #5. Stick to Your Guns: Don't Apologize
- 6. Keep The Mental Edge: Don't Let Them Get Under Your Skin
- The Power Dynamics of Judgmental People

- Summary

#1. Do Not Give Them Moral Authority!

Judgmental people only have power over you if you give them authority.

They need authority to feed their ego, increase their social status, and, of course, make you feel bad.

And they usually assume authority based on something of self-appointed superiority.

The self-appointed superior can be based on skills, results, "being better"… Or general moral superiority.
They set themselves up on that moral high ground, and look down on you.

But here's the thing:

They can only stay there if you allow them to!

There's rarely an official "moral handover" and it all happens because the entitled attacker takes the moral superiority.
So the number one step is a mindset:

- Never feel like he is superior to you!

And whenever they take an authority position over you, contest it.

#2. Refuse to Take The Defendant Position

The other side of the coin of not giving judgmental people the authority position is to not take the subordinate position.

You have to do this consciously and remind yourself about it.

Why?

Because unless you're already very skilled or self-assured the natural tendency when facing a judgmental attitude is one of subservience.

Avoid like the plague to:

- Follow
- Justify/defend yourself
- Backtrack
- Ask what you should do
- Ask what they would do

Instead, a good idea is to cut the topic short while you make it clear their judgment is not welcome.

Say something like:

- That's a fair point but I disagree
- I disagree, but thank you for your opinion
- I see it otherwise, but thanks for sharing

Or block their judgmental ways with a stronger verbal opposition:

- NO, that's not true
- Sorry mate, but lemme be frank here: you don't know what you're talking about
- (shaking your head, no words spoken)

#3. Dig Up Their Dirt: Show They Are Unfit to Judge

This is a nasty but effective technique.

And it consists of kicking the soapbox off their haughty feet.
Your aim here is to show through their track record that they are unfit to judge.

If they can't pontificate, they can't judge you.

Seen an example:

Nasty, but effective.

#4. Call Out Their Game: Don't Allow Them to Shoot & Hide

Often judgmental people will make us feel bad without coming out in the open.

They won't say anything directly to our faces but a smirk, a look on their face, or an off-hand remark will sub-communicate they are judging us -and disapproving-.

Exactly what happens in this sex and the city episode:

Notice Miranda's judgmental comments:

- "Tray suggested… ? "
- "Like what… "

She never directly admits her true feelings. She never says that she thinks the idea is silly, but she makes Charlotte feel under heavy -and negative- scrutiny.
This is called "cover aggression" because you know the aggression is there, but it's hidden.

This leads to a fight later as in typical passive-aggressive behavior Charlotte didn't address the issue head-on.
You want to do the opposite: take the behavior in full light and address it.

Say something like:

> You: I perceive some hostility from you right now. Can you please clarify?

Then keep going until they admit it.
If they keep denying, you still won as they've shown they don't even have the courage to voice their disagreement.

#5. Stick to Your Guns: Don't Apologize

Judgmental people have the power to make us feel bad about our choices, our ethics, and our behavior.

But again, only if you give them that power. A great antidote is to answer with full conviction and pride in your own choices and ethics.

This is particularly important in situations where the judgmental person backs a widely held view in society.

For example, things such as "don't party too much, don't sleep around, don't live unemployed, etc., etc."

6. Keep The Mental Edge: Don't Let Them Get Under Your Skin

If you overreact, you lose.

Indeed, as George Thompson teaches, it's crucial that in difficult communication you keep the mental edge by remaining unaffected.

If you let judgmental people get to you, you are blessing them with a lot of power.
Notice their behavior, maneuver around it, and stay unaffected.

The Power Dynamics of Judgmental People

Judgmental people are powerful because, with their judgment, they are indirectly saying:

1. I'm better than you
2. You're not good enough

The first part goes under our skin, while the second part makes us feel unworthy.
Once we feel unworthy, we want to change our behavior to comply with the judgmental person's standards.
And that's why judgmental people are manipulators. Judgemental people seek to make you feel bad in order to control and manipulate your behavior.

If the judge position is uncalled for, it can be a dominant, effective form of emotional manipulation.
And the more you emotionally invest, the more power you give (law of Social ROI)

Judgmental people always use a judgment frame against you.

They seek to frame themselves as the only ones who hold the true moral and ethical code, and they seek to frame you as living outside of that moral code, which makes you "not good enough" for them, for their group, or for society.

To learn the power dynamics of the judicial role, please see:

> The Judge Role: A Tool For Power & Control

Summary

The keys to dealing with judgmental people are:

1. Don't give them power
2. Put a spotlight on their spiteful attitude
3. Never apologize: stay proud of who you are
4. Stay unaffected

Summary

About The Author:
Robert Greene has a background in classical studies and is a best-selling author of books on power and life strategy. He also wrote The 48 Laws of Power, The Art of Seduction, Mastery, and The Laws of Human Nature.

⍰♂Can a geek teach you power???

Lucio:
Shall we address the elephant in the room?
Greene is no seducer himself.
Can he really write a book about seduction?
Well, yes he can, and he wrote a GREAT one. One of the best available, indeed. But his lack of personal experience still poses important limitations. Especially when it comes to translating seduction into actual dating success

How to Correctly Deal With Fear

Greene says there are two ways of dealing with fear:

1. Avoiding what we're afraid of
2. Confronting what we're afraid of

Greene says that when we're forced to face our fears we often find out we're stronger than we thought we were. These moments are therapeutic. But if we have the chance, we go back to our safe shells.

The author says there are people though who have been forced to continuously face their fears. And they have grown fearless. He says the many examples of celebrities and successes coming from the ghettos have been schooled in fearlessness.

Love Reality

I really loved the chapter on realism.

I found somewhat what Ray Dalio embraces in his seminal book Principles: Life and Work.
Contrary to many self-help myths of "constructing your own reality", Greene says you must learn to look at reality as it is, and stay as close as possible to it.

Sharpen your curiosity and openness, and never turn your back to reality. Dreamers waste time and do the biggest mistakes.
The real inventors and innovators are realists.

> Reality is my drug, the more I get, the higher I go

To Live Fully: Embrace Your Mortality

Greene says that to learn to live well and fearlessly you need to appreciate your mortality.

People who had a brush up with death get a sense of urgency that leads them to work hard, accomplish more and enjoy life.
When their turn of dying will come, they'll have no regrets and will have lived a happy life.

The author says you don't need to risk your life to become fearless, but you can reflect and meditate on it. And then structure your life going backward.

My note:
I couldn't agree more, and it's funny a few weeks before reading The 50th Law I had actually written my own post exactly on this topic. Read: leveraging death to live.

Learn to Be Self-Reliant

We come into this world with the only real possessions that matter:

- Your body
- The time you have to live
- Your energy
- Thoughts and ideas

And yet you give it all away.

You spend years working for others, you listen to experts, and lose your unique ideas to embrace the majority.

And I really loved this part: don't think your boss cares about you. He will drop you off as soon as he doesn't need you anymore or someone cheaper comes along.

For more life truths, read:

- Corporate lies

True ownership can only come from within yourself.
It comes from rejecting anyone who limits your mobility, it comes from confidence in your own decisions, and by using your time in constant pursuit of growth and education.

> Own yourself first. Or you'll be at the mercy of someone else.

Understand and Be OK With This: You Are Alone

You're alone in this world.

Everyone is pushing and pursuing their own agendas.
It's not a thought you should fear, you should use it to push yourself towards full self-reliance and freedom.

It's liberating.

Master Aggression: Know When to Be Bad

This chapter reminded me of both the 12 Rules of Life and the spirit of The Power Moves, on this website.

Greene says we are often naive, believing people are peaceful and desiring good for us.
We are too good and avoid conflict, and sell our real selves away in the process.
The author says that we need inner strength to deal with conflict. And that has nothing to do with bad or good but with strength and fear.

If people feel like they can take from you, they will take from you, says Greene.

Be a Feared Leader

Greene says that many leaders take the wrong route when they decide to be benevolent leaders.

A leader will oftentimes be in a position to ask people to do things they don't wanna do.
And when he's too nice, people will rebel -or execute those tasks too high-power for the leader's liking-.
Much better, he says, being a ruthless leader. No issues in getting your orders executed, and when you make a compliment, people will really cherish it.

I don't fully agree here.
Also, read:

- How to be a great leader
- Why the 48 laws of power is wrong

Believe in Your Leadership

Appear is if you always know where you're going.

Pretend you're driven by a God, a destiny, or a vision nobody else can see.
Like Joan D'Arc and Moses were.

Also, read:

- How to be a charismatic leader

Master The Process: Stick With Things

Greene says that fearless people learn to master processes also through boredom.

Don't fall for the quick and easy solution: it doesn't exist. Mastery takes time, grit, and hard work.

Focus On What You Can Control

Greene talks a bit about the freedom of choosing our own reaction to any event we encounter.

Similar to The 7 Habits of Effective People, the more we focus on what we can control, the more our control zone expands.

He also goes a bit into weak ego and a strong ego. Check the book for more or read my post "building an antifragile ego".

> In general, be less respectful of rules others have established for you

Real-Life Applications

Don't work for others
Your time is one of the most precious things in your life, don't squander it on someone else's dream.

Despise anybody limiting your freedom
To become successful, I indeed believe it's a great asset when you despise anything and anybody limiting your freedom.

That's indeed one of the greatest motivators that brought to me start to this website.

CONS

Is this supposed to be a winner?

I like 50.

He's smart, sharp, fearless, and strategic.

But, in my opinion, TOO Machiavellian/dark tirad.
To the point that it cost him in his relationships.

Look at his life.

Besides money, it doesn't seem to me this what one should aspire to.

50 has one ex-wife who hates him, one single child who hates him, and he's only alive by a miracle.

I know a hundred men who have better lives than that.

Reality VS Stories: doesn't add up to me

50 Cent says he was trying to go provoke Ja Rule but Ja Rule didn't take the bait.

So he started dissing Supreme, a former druglord friend of Ja Rule, who in turn put pressure on Ja Rule to "destroy" 50th.

This doesn't add up to me.
Why would a drug lord ask a rapper to "destroy" a rapper with nothing less than a… Diss track? A diss track that would only bring him more attention?
Also, the fact that Ja Rule had to "prove his toughness" with a song… Doesn't add up.

Inductive Reasoning

Social sciences are a bit of an art and not pure sciences.
Yet there's quite a bit of inductive reasoning fallacy in The 50th Law.

For example, Robert Greene has a theory that ghetto life makes people fearless, which in turn drives them to success.

Yet just because you see a few successes coming from the ghetto doesn't necessarily mean ghetto life makes you fearless or more likely to succeed.

Indeed, probably the opposite is true.

Review

The 50th Law is a fantastic book.

I even approached it with the wrong foot, thinking it was mostly a fluff book done for marketing.

Boy, I was wrong.
I much enjoyed "The 50th Law.
But we strongly recommend here to also prioritize good relationships with high quality people. And for that, our honorable man approach may afford the best of both worlds: strategic Machiavellianism, with a genuine side for great people.

The Tao of Dating: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- Love yourself first
- To attract masculine (yang) be feminine (Yin)
- Give good men a chance: love develops over time

Summary

Binazir says that educated and talented women find themselves in unhappy dating situations at an epidemic scale.

I could not agree more with that.

So let's see how "The Tao of Dating" can help you fix that.

Dating With Tao: The Foundations

Binazir starts with important mindsets that will help you not only in dating but in life.

They are:

- Fulfillment is a feeling, NOT a person
- The world is a reflection of ourselves: love and accepts yourself
- Be grateful (the author quotes Viktor Frankl)

- You're a manifestation of divine energy: radiate it

Become Yin to Attract Yang

Binazir suggests that good relationships are a balance of Yin (femininity) and Yang (masculinity).

A woman, to attract a masculine counterpart, should embrace her Yin.

Most men respect strength and leadership qualities indeed, but unless they are expressed in an overall framework of femininity, respect does not translate into attraction.

> Respect for female strength does not translate into male attraction

Also, read:

- Dating Advice for successful women

And:

> How to Be Feminine: Step-by-Step Guide (Videos & Pics)

Relationships Types (Jerks VS Good Men)

The author presents 3 archetypes of male/female relationships:

1. Mannish woman (no Yin / no heart) and submissive woman (lots of Yin / no spine)
2. Sensitive man (little Yang) and independent woman (little Ying)
3. Good guys (minor in Yin, major in Yang) and good woman (minor in Yang, major in Yin)

In the last stage, both understand the other sex but at their core, they stay true to their genders.

Love Takes Time

When I read Ali Binazir talking about women's attitudes towards dating, I knew I was possibly reading the best book on dating I had ever read.

He mentions this story:

A female friend of his had a great date.
She spoke to him until 3 am in a cafe' and deeply vibed with him.
So Binazir asked her when she would see him again.

Her reply?

She wasn't sure she was going to see him again.

Why not?

Because she didn't have "butterflies".

But, says the author, love rarely means madly falling in love with someone during the first date. Love is an ever-deepening feeling that develops over time.
Which, I would add, is exactly the same for developing your passion: developing, not finding (read Duckworth's research about it).

Develop Self-Esteem to Keep & Attract High-Quality Man

The author drops another big pearl of wisdom as he cites the (nearly not enough) famous research of Swann et al., 1994.

The research explains that low self-esteem in women is the fertile ground upon which toxic relationships develop.

Also, read:

- Low self-esteem and toxic relationships

Learn How to Spot Bad Boys & Good Guys

The author describes how to spot bad boys.

He says they come with extremes and then describes a few of the bad men types.

Get the book for the full descriptions and check these:

- The 10 types of players
- 7 signs that he's a player
- 7 questions you need to ask to find out he's a player

Binazir also describes how to recognize good men.
He has several different telltale signs, and the one I liked best is this:

- Has own moral compass and knows what he wants: he doesn't look and cater to outside sources

The outside sources will at times also includes you.
And that's why high-quality men will not chase you and do everything for you.
I couldn't agree more.

Also, check my article:

- how to get high-quality men with mutual investment escalation

To Meet Him, Show You Like Him

Signaling your intention is important.

The author has some great suggestions –check the book– and mentions the movie "O brother" for some sensual beckoning inspiration:

If you need some more help with your body language, also read:

- Signs she likes me
- Attractive body language for women

Develop Sensuality and Femininity

The Tao of Dating also has some great exercises for rediscovering your femininity.
Get the book for the exercises and read:

- How to be feminine
- World best seductresses: 3 case studies

Attraction, Rapport

The author delves into attraction, rapport-building techniques, and also how to make him fall in love with you.

Read the book for more and also check How to make him crazy about you.

But the high-quality way to make him fall in love, the author says, is to let him become a better man together with you.

Don't Flake: It's A Dating Slippery Slope

The author introduces a concept I'm very fond of: "back justification".

When you flake on someone or cancel at the last minute your mind will back-justify your action telling you that you didn't care enough about him.

That might not even be true.
But now you unconsciously lose interest in a guy who might otherwise be an amazing guy.

My Note:
So true.
I also list this point as the very first mistake in my 7 biggest early dating mistakes women do.

I would also add that, similarly, you shouldn't:

- Willingly let him invest much more than you do
- Let him wait for sex (as a bargaining chip)

Make Sex A Guilt-Free Experience

I fully agree with Binazir outlook on sex, which is less strict than most other dating authors.

Binazir says that sex can be thorny, and indeed how long you wait depends on your chemistry, how you feel, and the type of man.

But, if you make sex a good, guilt-free experience then it will help your dating, no matter when it happens.

Relationships

Relationships can be challenging.

But Binazir says that if you are good with people in general, then relationships will also be easier.

Because in spite of what some popular psychology books say, men and women are not from different planets (he's hinting at Men are From Mars Women are From Venus).

No difference has been supported by scientific evidence, so avoid over-generalizations based on gender stereotypes.

Review

My bad!

I approached The Tao of Dating with some unwarranted reservations ("Eastern philosophies" raise woo-woo red flags in my mind).

But boy was I wrong.

The Tao of Dating is the best dating book for women I have read so far. Ali Binazir shows a great grasp of human psychology and an understanding of high-quality men that few other authors match.

I can only praise and recommend The Tao of Dating.

How to Invest Without Getting Played (John Bogle's Strategy)

The Intelligent Investor is a classic of investing literature and is considered by some as the Bible of value investing.

Bullet Summary

- Choose a strategy: defensive or enterprising and stick with it
- Most people should choose defensive and use diversification (index funds, ETFs)
- Most speculators and market timers lose money

Lucio's Take: Quit playing the market, focus on your craft

Lucio:
In TPM's approach, time is a power resource. That means it's not just about getting good returns—it's about leveraging your time and attention toward outcomes that maximize your status, freedom, and strategic advantage.

A key trap for many men is mistaking financial tinkering for a worthy pursuit of their time. Spending hours watching charts and trying to beat the market—when 95% of investors don't—often results in wasted time, diminished returns, and less life power.

So here's the core TPM takeaway:

- Go long-term gains with minimal micromanagement (like passive index investing), it aligns with TPM's ethos.
- If your trading requires constant attention for lmited returns, it's just another form of busywork disguised as empowerment.

⚖️ In short: Power = control over outcomes with minimal input. Use this lens to filter what's worth your time.

Full Summary

Benjamin Graham refers to the "intelligent investor" as the one who follows the rules of value investing.

The Intelligent Investor VS Speculator

A recurring theme in The Intelligent Investor is that of the value investor, also called the "Intelligent Investor" VS the speculative investor. Graham defines investment as:

> The result of a thorough fundamental analysis in the company in which you invest, which results in the promises safety of principal and an adequate return

Any investment not meeting that requirement is speculative by nature.

Also, notice the word “adequate” return. Value investing indeed is not looking for outsized returns.
Graham is very skeptical of the speculative methods and says it’s likely to lose money.

Defensive Investor: A Profile

The defensive, or passive investor, wants freedom and safety.

He doesn’t know the intricacies of markets and investment very well, so he buys 10-20 high-grade stocks with a long positive history of dividends and keeps them for the long haul (note: there were no ETFs at that time).

A good option for the defensive investor is not to look much at prices but simply buy the same amount of stocks on a recurring basis, a technique which is called Dollar Cost Averaging.

Enterprising Investor: A Profile

The enterprising investor has the time, willingness, and market knowledge to try to beat the average market returns.

The enterprising investor looks at a company that is undervalued through financial quantitative analysis and qualitative analysis of growth prospects.

Once he picks a good stock chances are it will grow quicker than the overall market as other investors realize these companies are underpriced.
Usually, he will start his research first by looking at companies with a low price-earnings ratio and a low price-book ratio (P/B).

Few Speculative Bets

The enterprising investor looks mostly at high-quality companies, but might sometimes look at more speculative investments and lower-quality securities.

He only does though when he has a firm grasp and knowledge of the market, the security is very lowly priced, and he has hedged his investment.

Fewer Growth Stocks

Growth stocks are stocks that are overpriced compared to the overall market because they have ambitious growth plans or because the market expects them to keep delivering outstanding and uncommon results.
The enterprise investor will rarely invest in growth stocks.

Not Trying to Time The Market

The enterprise investor is focused on “price” and not on “time”. Timing is the attempt to buy and sell based on the idea that one can predict whether the market will go up or down. That’s a speculative effort that rarely pays off.

The enterprise investor instead focuses on price as he looks for undervalued stocks.

Enterprising Commandments

Graham’s tips for enterprising investors are:

- Don’t trade daily
- IPOs are often over-hyped (and overpriced)
- Junk bonds are risky
- Only look into foreign bonds if the expenses are lower than 1.25%
- Great companies don’t necessarily make great investments
- Temporary setbacks and unpopularity can be great buying opportunities

Defensive or Enterprising: Which One Should You Be?

A frequently asked question is if you should be a defensive or enterprising investor.
Graham is clear that few people should follow the enterprising investor path. Unless you're very knowledgeable and spend lots of time, you should expect to achieve lower returns with an enterprising investor strategy.

Whatever you pick, make sure you're serious about it.
If you decide to be an enterprising investor, you must invest time and effort in your portfolio. If you're a defensive investor don't over-trade. Don't let the flurry of news and the speed of the Internet dupe you into becoming a speculator.

Is Investing More Art or Science?

Graham admits that value investing is not an exact science but entails a margin of art, experience, guesswork, and risk. However, the risk is not so high when investing in high-grade companies because, even if you got it wrong, the company might not grow but it will rarely sink either.
He advises buying a stock when, based on your analysis, it's at more than a 50% discount.

Past Does Not Equal Future

Graham says a common mistake is that of extrapolating from the past to guess the future. It's another human bias to see a trend and believe it will keep going… Indefinitely.

The Mind is The Enemy

Graham says that human psychology and our tendencies of overreacting and going with the crowd as the worst enemies of an investor.

I couldn't agree more with this.
Also read Thinking Fast and Slow, Fooled by Randomness, and an extract of my master thesis on the human mind pitfalls that led to the 2008 financial crisis.
As a matter of fact, he should do the opposite of what the crowd does.

Mutual Funds: Watch Out

Graham says most investment funds are overpriced compared to their expenses.

This is a common refrain in many investment books, including the valid and more recent Money Master the Game and Unshakable.
Here's what you should look into before investing in any of them:

1. Expenses
2. Risk level
3. Reputation of decision-makers
4. Past performance

Later on in his life, Graham recommended passive index funds, especially good for defensive investors. These days you can buy them easily through ETFs.

Listen to Warren Buffet talk about Benjamin Graham:

Real-Life Applications

Don't Overtrade
This is typical of guys starting out. I know it was for me.

Don't Time the Market
Don't try to time the market.

Tune Out Noise
The market is irrational and often random. Don't overreact to the daily price swings.

Review

If you have been around markets and investments for a while, you know the main principles of The Intelligent Investor. But that's only because The Intelligent Investor made those tenets popular and because time proved them right.

If you're just approaching markets and investment, it might make sense to start with what is Warren Buffet's favorite book: The Intelligent Investor.

The Compound Effect: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- Focus on doing the daily activities that move you toward your goal
- Build momentum and results will start to compound
- Consistency is the key to compound results

Full Summary

Darren says most people get discouraged when they don't see immediate results. But that's the wrong mindset because:

Constant Actions Towards Your Goals

Great results require constant, daily effort spread over time.
The author suggests that you exchange the "right now mindset" with a mindset of daily micro achievements that are consistent with your goals and core values.

This was really the key part for me and I couldn't help but nod along. Also, read Grit by Angela Duckworth on the need for consistency and Start With WHY by Simon Sinek for actions in line with your core values (your WHY).

When To Be Patient

Since daily actions seldom yield immediately visible results, it begs an important question: How do you know you're on the right path? How do you know you're just not wasting your time?
To answer that question you should measure your growth, not your final results.

Since small daily steps toward your goals rarely give you huge results, you shouldn't focus much on the final results when you're starting it out and grinding it out. But you should focus on the growth.
If you can spot a growing trend, then you're probably on the right path.

My Note: this is very important indeed because small growing trends usually don't yield positive results until they reach a tipping point. And that's when you start seeing the results and your daily efforts start paying off. And that's when you start overcoming all those who chose the easy path.
This is a similar concept applied to disruptive technologies in Bold by Peter Diamandis.

Daily Small Steps of Discipline

You don't get too huge of success easily: success is daily discipline and doing the hard thing every day.

Hardy says you should focus on positive daily habits that let you take every day small incremental steps forward. If you're straggling there you can focus on the beginning and the end. Start and end the day with positive actions toward the attainment of your goals.

And the author says that you need habits because willpower by itself is not enough (read here the contentious science of willpower).
To learn more about habits also check out The Power of Habit.

Daily Compound

If you focus daily on improving and small daily steps as you move towards your goal, your effectiveness will compound over time.
The steps you take daily don't seem that significant. But over time, they will build upon each other.
Years from now, you will look back and be amazed at what you've achieved.

Consistency is The Compound's Enabler

The author says that there's one thing that matters the most and that trumps the intensity or length of your efforts. And that is consistency. It's consistency that builds momentum and enables the compound effect to achieve the unachievable.

> Consistency builds the momentum to achieve the unachievable

Obstacles Are The Way

Darren says that obstacles can spur your growth. The risk though is that you might feel accomplished after the big achievement and fall back on your old habits.
The key indeed is to keep going once you have overcome the obstacles. Also, read The Obstacle is The Way.

CONS

Unproven, technically untrue concept: often progress "adds up", doesn't "compound"
The idea of linking the financial property of compound interest to self-development is catchy and sexy.
Yet, I don't think it works exactly the same way.
Not in many areas of self-development, at least. Your self-development does move you constantly forward, but it seldom "compounds" over time.

Real-Life Applications

Measure Growth
Measuring growth instead of final results is a powerful concept.

Align Your Actions to Your WHY
And here's another key nugget of wisdom: make sure your daily actions are aligned with your goals and morals. Do what makes you fulfilled, do what moves you towards your goals.

Boring Consistency
It's the daily grind and boring daily tasks that will propel you to great success.

Review

The Compound Effect is an interesting, easy, and potentially really value-adding read.

Frankly, I don't fully buy into the "compound" idea.
At least, not for many self-development activities -ie.: healthy and fitness, knowledge, social skills, etc., etc.-.

Yet, they might apply in some fields.
For example, in some types of business growth and tipping-point market penetration dynamics.

Furthermore, the principle of "staying at it" is crucial in many more areas, whether or not the progress "compounds" or simply "adds up".

And some smaller nuggets of wisdom -like measuring growth- can make the difference between you giving up and you soldiering on to success.

To be frank, you probably don't need the whole book after this summary.
But the full book might help to drive the key concept home.

7 Offensive Jokes And How to Respond (W/ Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 23 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Yes, it's not necessarily you have a bad sense of humor.

Humor can be a form of aggression, and science shows that dark-triad individuals are more likely to engage in aggressive and demeaning "humor".

In this article, we will learn how to respond to bad jokes and dark humor.
Most of all, we will deal with the type of humor that can be considered as microaggression or covert aggression.

How many times have you heard this:

> I'm just joking!

Don't ever believe those words.

A joke is rarely just a joke and it often hides an attempt to ridicule you, isolate you, decrease your status, or increase the joker's status.

1. “I’m Better Than You” Type of Jokes: Avoid Laughing!

The first urge you gotta resist in any type of nasty joke is this:

Avoid laughing along!

That’s the too-nice-guy answer, and it’s never good.

Imagine a guy in a culture that frames his skin as ‘higher status’, standing beside a woman:

> Him: we look like a black and white picture
> Her: so what, you think you’re better than me?
> Him: ahaha I’m just joking, why are you taking it so personally

The Real Meaning:
behind the joke’s smokescreen -and helped by her offended reaction- he positions himself as the superior party by virtue of skin color.
In the long run, if he keeps making similar “jokes” she will feel insecure and inferior to him.
Notice that her overreaction proved to him that she indeed has skin color hang-ups. Now, if he wants to keep her one down, he knows one of her thumbscrews.

Beating “I’m Superior” Jokes:
Don’t laugh because that’s the equivalent of accepting the message behind the joke.

People who laugh at these kinds of jokes become the cool friends who “know how to laugh at themselves”, but who are really just there to make the power mover feel superior.
And don’t push back either like the girl in the example.

What you want to do is to either completely let it go or frame back the joker’s position as the “one down”.
In the above example she could have said: “yeah, you really need some tan buddy”.

2. “You’re Below Me” Type of Joke: Uncover Their Nastiness!

It might be difficult to differentiate “I’m better than you” VS “you’re inferior”.

As a matter of fact, they’re two sides of the same coin.
But “I’m better than you” is more focused on pulling the joker above and “you’re inferior” more focused on pushing the victim out.

Here is how you deal with them:

2.2. Surface It ™ & Draw Them Out

Surfacing makes the nastiness obvious to all for everyone to see.

Here is what it would look like:

> Him: So my neighbor popped his head above the picked fence and asked me “what’s going down brother”. And I said “the value of my house since you moved in you f (N-word)”
> You: Oh, I’m not sure I get it..
> (you want to make it clear here that he’s engaging in blatant racism)
> Him: It’s about people not wanting to buy properties when colored people move in a neighborhood
> You: Oh, really. I suppose that only concerns white people though. I didn’t even know about that. Is that still happening today
> Him: Yeah..
> You: And you find it funny?

“I suppose that only concerns white people” move the needle from “everyone VS black” to “this specific group”.
I didn’t even know about that” is the first hidden counter-attack, painting him as old school racist.

Finally, by asking if he finds it funny you back him into a corner where he has to fess up or justify himself (the typical defense being “it’s just a joke”).

2.3. Negate the joking frame (& deny their retreat)

The technique of more passive-aggressive players is that of hiding their snarky remarks behind the "just joking" shield.

By adding "just joking" they deny you of a target and rob you of your ability to hit back or get offended because, "hey, they didn't mean it, it was just a joke".

The problem if you keep telling them that "it was not a joke" is that it becomes a battle of wills and you risk looking overly aggressive. And you don't want to end up with the people around jumping in and trying to contain you.

A great way of handling this situation then is to deny them the easy retreat.
Here is how:

> Him: So what brings you to Germany from Italy man. Except of collecting unemployment benefits I mean. Ahahah just joking man, but no seriously, what brings you here
> You: Collecting unemployment benefits?
> (you want to pin them down here on their nasty remark)
> Him: Yeah, you know what they say of Italians coming to Germany, but I was just joking
> You: Yeah, I know you were just joking, but it's not really funny. What do they say of Italians coming to Germany

You know they were not really just joking, but pretending to accept their excuse blows off their cover.
You steal their shield and they can't use it anymore.
If they try again, you will say:

> You: Yeah, I know you were just joking, but it's not funny
> Him: I was just joking man
> You: Of course you were just joking, you're quite a joker, but this one was not funny

2.4. Go Meta

Going meta means you explain what they have just done.
Take this example:

I sometimes deal with these funny "jokes".
Sometimes it's a question of frenemies and envy, but if they are done in public, their effects can still be harmful to you.
Consciously or unconsciously, their effect is that of ostracizing you from the dominant group and pushing you down. It's like saying "you don't belong here, you're different".

Here is how it would look like if you wanted to deal with it going meta:

> You: That doesn't make any sense. Randomly picking two products and comparing them to end up with sweeping generalizations says absolutely nothing (or: "is the epitome of racism")
> Him: I know, I know, it was just a joke
> You: Well, you know what psychology says about jokes: jokes are simply a shield to share our uglier but very real feelings.
> If you feel superior by virtue of your nationality that's how you feel, but don't take it on me and please don't do these "jokes" (make quotation mark gesture with hands) with me from now on

When you explain to them exactly what they are doing like this, you score a huge win and will send them scuttling in an embarrassing retreat.

Personally, I didn't go meta in that situation because I don't allow these people to get under my skin.
But I did take note of it: you always want to take note.

2.5. Tit for Tat

Tit for tat consists of delivering the same message back to them.

In the example of Porsche/Fiat "joke" it would go like this:

> You:The Romans did their best to civilize the barbaric Germanic tribes. It's been a while since then, and some people still need to catch up

I recommend you avoid tit for tat because you play within their frame of reference and lower yourself to their level. With tit for tat, you are reacting.
And you know as they say: you roll with the pigs, you get dirty, and the pig loves it.

Also, see more on frame control techniques:

> 10 Frame Control Techniques to Out-Frame Anyone

2.6. Switch From General to Individual

Remember: people who attack you at a general level, often feel bad at a personal level.

The personal level is what you have done and who you are.
The general level is your skin color, your nationality, your religion, your political affiliation, and anything which can be grouped together.

Attacking the general level is often effective in making people overreact because it's demeaning and depersonalizing: it feels like you are branded for life and there is nothing you can do… Except lashing out in anger. But that's the wrong way to deal with it because, again, you let yourself drag down to your level, you react, and you play within their frame of reference.

First of all, here is what you must know to handle these situations well: people happy with themselves and content with their lives rarely go around offending and making racist remarks.
It's usually angry and bitter people or people who feel like you're doing better than they are who resent you.
Case in point.

That's why, if you want to hit back effectively, you must avoid the general level they're at, and play at the individual level.

The general level in the example above would be this comment:

It's reactive and it stays within the attacker's frame of reference: bad
Where are you going to go with that? Not only do you stay within her frame and legitimize it, but you create a pointless race of "who was there first"?
You don't need that.

That's why, if you want to go tit for tat, you should attack her at an individual level.
But, again, I don't recommend you descend to their level.

2.7. Use Vulnerability to Call out Rudeness

Simply say "that feels very rude to me".

If their apology is not enough you can add "it's OK", but without looking like you really mean it.
You want to say "it's OK" very flatly with an attitude of "that was really out of line" (we will hear an example of this tonality later).

2.8. Blank Stare for Social Pressure

Look at them with an expression as if to say “really?”.
Or alternatively utter “wow”, as if to say “can’t believe that was you”, which is very shaming.

2.9. Judgmental Sarcasm

She does it very well:

3. Personal Attack “Jokes”: Draw Your Boundaries!

The simplest way is what Jonah does with Jimmy Kimmel:

Call it out!

Jonah simply asks the question back with an annoyed expression:

> Kimmel: first of all you smell good, which is surprising
> Jonah: why is that surprising?

Simple and super effective!

Another example:

> Him: Oh it was easy. OK, Jane didn’t get it, so let’s say it wasn’t too complicated for anyone with an IQ above 30

Here are a few ways of dealing with it:

3.2. Battle Sarcasm With Sarcasm

This is best for people with great humor.

Example from the show “Weakest Link”:

But even if you lose the war of jokes, don’t worry.
Smile when you have no more comebacks and move on. You might even say “well done” and look like a real winner.
Look at Trump doing it when he was losing to Bush:

3.3. Hit them back with the same medicine

If you can find a way to use the same criticism back on them it’s golden as you show them, and everyone around, what type of game they are playing.

See Jay Leno doing here when being accused of being “the weirdest looking person”:

> Louis: I hope I can say this without insulting you <— sets the cover
> You’re the weirdest looking person (…) I don’t mean it as a negative… (he’s about to get even more sarcastic)
> Leno: Just the fact that I got a full set of hair (<— one-up back) I don’t mean that to offend you (<— plays the same game back)

Leno uses humor to show that his guest is hiding behind humor to be a little bit too nasty.
Perfect!

3.4. Say “we have a joker here”

If nothing comes up, you can always resort to these proven and tested retorts:

> We have a joker here!
> What a funny guy..

From a movie example:

> Tony: How much
> Care salesman: 43.000 fully equipped
> Tony: that all?
> Car salesman: machine gun turrets are extra (implies he might be a gangaster)
> Tony: he’s a funny guy

You can power up this retort by pointing your finger at them as if to say, “Listen to this funny guy”.

4. Snarky Comments: Dish Out The Same Medicine!

Snarky comments are barbs barely veiled with humor.

Some people around might laugh, but they are not laughing at the joke itself but at the social power move and the daring of the individual delivering it.

It happened once to me when I went back to my place after a long time and one woman said:

> Her: Oh my God, I saw you walking by and I barely recognized you with a bald head

And this was my reply:

> Me: Hey, yeah I know the feeling, I had the exact same when I saw you. I remembered you so much thinner. Not in a bad way eh, you look even better now with some more kilos.

“Not in a bad way” is there not really to soften the blow, but to make it more socially acceptable and not to make it seem like I was escalating and replying out of nastiness.

That’s exactly what you gotta do when you want to reply with social grace to nastiness: you make a comment back that is nasty, but then you pretend to take some of the stings out so that people can laugh about it.

And indeed, a big laugh from everyone around.

Note on beating snarky comments:
I actually like a bald head. But this is about social strategy: you don’t react only when you care: you react when it serves you.

You react to the power move to defend not a hurt ego, but your social status.
Plus, it’s always good to stand up to assholes.

5. People Laughing At You: Leave Them In The Dust!

The dynamics of people laughing at us can be extremely painful.

Being laughed at by a group usually comes in two different social flavors:

1. Everyone in the group is piling up in a mutually reinforcing cycle

2. There is a clear leader that functions as the group-buffoon

This interview of McGregor and Diaz is an example of the second type:

Usually, the buffoon has good standing in the group, but it's an easier situation to control.
As Robert Greene writes in The 48 Laws of Power: strike the leader and the sheep will scatter.

Solutions:

5.2. Strike the leader

If you can take out the leader, you solved the issue.
Sometimes you can even lose and still solve the problem -as long as the leader sees you're not easy pickings.

5.3. Isolate the leader

Work on becoming good friends with the members who are not as sanguine towards you.
Little by little you can carve your own sphere of influence and if you keep growing in the group you might even be able to overthrow the leader.

5.4. Abandon the group forever

Here is the truth:

It's not easy changing the dynamics of a group that has chosen you as the scapegoat for their frustrations and small-time status-jockeying.

But that should be a wake-up call as to what type of groups you are being part of.

Usually, these people are very stationary in life and if you're reading here you want to go places.
Start by leaving the idiots of yours behind.
Just as a learning opportunity, you can use them to try different things though: use them as free social training.

5.5. Abandon the group, work, and come back like a G

As we've said people who pick on others usually don't go very far in life.
Work on yourself. Don't try to forget their derision but use them as fuel to become better and better.

Then if you want you can go back improved and upgraded, maybe saying hi while you drive from a Ferrari.
But chances are you will care very little about them in the future -and I recommend the "leave behind path", including emotional disengagement-.

5.6. Change dynamics, then lead

Groups that pick on people rarely do so out of strength, but because they need their own psychological boost.

If the group moves to a novel situation and environment where you can show strong skills and leadership, suddenly you're no laughing stock anymore.

Example:
I remember as teenagers when we went go-carting and the shy guy people liked to pick on whoop everyone's ass.
Not many jokes on him that day.

5.7. Achieve big where they are failing

People usually pick on the ones who have the least skills and power.

But achieve some big goals in life and there won't be much for them to laugh about.

I remember when the kids in my group stopped laughing at Gabriele.

Why? Because Gabriele was the first to get a girlfriend.

6. The "Not Funny At All" Story-Joke: Make

Here's the coolest reply:

Don't answer at all!

Not verbally, at least.

You can just stand there and make a serious facial expression.
Or even better, a facial expression that says "this guy is so annoying".

Very high power because it's low-investment.

And the more their "joke" is poor, the more they're harming themselves, and the better this works.

Look Khabib executing it here with his "not-so-good friend" DC:

> DC: How many times do you have to say… You answer the SAAAME thing EEEVERY TIME. I heard you say the SAAAAME thing..
> Khabib: (rubs his face with a facial expression that sub-communicates "what an annoying c*nt")

Khabib handles it well with:

- Avoid the "too nice trap", which would be to laugh along or pretend all is well
- Direct request to drop it
- Body language that frames the attacker as an annoying c*nt
- Low investment
- A verbally high-warmth "see you later", but with the re-empowering sub-communication of "f*ck you"

7. And... Learn to Laugh About Yourself

As a final note, don't see all jokes as power moves.

Even if almost all jokes are at least somewhat connected to power hierarchies, you will still gain from a more relaxed and open stance toward the world.

Even from a pure power point of view, a clear, unemotional mind will always operate at a higher level than one fuming with rage and indignation.

Learning not to take yourself too seriously and learning to laugh about your shortcoming and the stereotypes of your race/religion/country is an immensely powerful trait to develop.

Offensive Jokes Are Power Moves

Racist jokes, offensive remarks, mean comments… These are all a form of social power moves.

Hidden under a sheath of irony, offensive jokes tell the story of a power relation: the joker seeks to take the dominant position, while the butt end of the joke gets socially demoted.

These types of jokes are nothing but forms of social climbing.

Power Dynamics of Offensive Jokes

Power Moves masked as jokes work by reinforcing a stereotype, prejudice, public perception, or sometimes, let's be frank here, an uncomfortable truth.

The joking layer with which the power moved is sheathed allows the joker to set the power relation in a socially acceptable way.

Basically: the attacker hides behind the joke to hurt and social climb.

And it allows him to sidestep any possible backlash behind the joking pretense.
I'm sure you've seen these:

> Social climber: Hey come on, it was just a joke
> Social climber: God I was just kidding, I actually love Italy (/Africa /women /blacks etc. etc)

But don't be fooled by the "joke" pretense, most of the time that's only the sugar coating for the dominant power move.

Power Jokes Breakdown:

When you put your social x-ray goggles on this is what a superiority joke really says:

1. I'm superior
2. You're inferior
3. By accepting the joke you accept that power dynamic

The Social Consequences Of Mean Jokes

The joke can have lasting consequences.

If it's not met with any backlash, public opinion can start shifting.
Not only it becomes more OK to throw mean and racist jokes, but some people can start believing they are actually true.

Equally important, the Joker feels more powerful, and the butt of the joke starts feeling inferior.
As the butt of the joke starts buying into that frame the joke becomes more and more reality.

Until the Joker doesn't even need to throw power moves anymore: everyone accepts his superiority.

Mean Jokes Examples

Power jokes happen more often than most people could think.

Some men use this technique to keep control of their relationships (see "combative relationships").
And when they are successful, the woman can start losing her self-esteem, which might lead to abusive and toxic relationships.

Or people can use offensive jokes are used to pump their own ego or, of course, for good old social climbing.

Here are a few examples:

Skin Color Power Move

> White guy in Asia: "I'm whiter than you"
> Girl: "so what, you think you're better than me?"
> Guy: "ahaha I'm just joking, in Europe it's actually cool to be tanned"

Result: behind the joke's smokescreen -and helped by her offended reaction- he slots himself as the superior one by virtue of skin color.

In the long run, she will feel insecure and inferior to him.
Notice that her overreaction proved to him that she indeed has skin-color hang-ups.

Gender Power Move

> Guy: "you bought a new pair of shoes?"
> Girl: "yes, do you like them"
> Guy: "yeah.. And good for my figure you don't spend as much time in the kitchen as do with shopping"

Result: he implies she spends too much and that her role is that of cooking (and she's failing it). In the long run, she might feel insecure and less of a woman for failing in what he presents as her female duties.

Nationality Power Move

The mean joke in the message example at the beginning of this post was basically saying:

- (We) Germans are (economically) superior to you (Italians).

Result: I might start believing it myself.
Also, I would admit that yes, he's right, and there are good reasons why Germany is a bigger economy (namely because Germans are superior).
I don't know you, but I'm not cool with that.

The Little Book of Common Sense Investing: Summary

The Little Book of Common Sense Investing does what it says: lays out great -and easy-to-follow- investment principles in a short amount of time.
And that's pretty great.

Bullet Summary

- Avoid middlemen: skip the advisers
- Avoid high-priced funds
- Pick index funds (ETFs) covering big indexes and sit back

Full Summary

The author, John Bogle, is the founder of Vanguard Investment and he often quotes Benjamin Graham, author of The Intelligent Investor.

Cut Middlemen

People who promise to manage your money to make money for you are actually taking money for you. Ask yourself: does that make sense? The author says that, often, it doesn't.
This means you should look for ways to invest with the fewest middlemen possible.

Minimize Fees

The author indeed says that the average investor should, first of all, focus on minimizing fees. Taxes are fees too, and from a US-tax perspective the less transaction a fund does, the more it will maximize taxes' payments. Another reason why index funds are better.

Stocks Match Businesses

Bogle says that stocks' returns, in the long run, closely match the performance of the business you are buying. The short term is different as it can be governed by emotions but, long run, stocks do seem to move rationally.

Managed Fund: The Short-Term Gains

The authors concede that some funds are better positioned to provide outsized returns in the short term in certain niches and in certain market conditions.
During the dot-come bubble for example many funds managed to beat the market and provide huge returns. But while the overall market survived and recovered from the bust, many of those funds collapsed.
So again, long-term managed funds perform poorly.

Investment Advisers? No Thanks

Investment advisers do far worse than the market once you weigh in their fees.

Index Funds

The Little Book of Common Sense Investing builds up toward one simple truth: you should invest in index funds yourself.
How do you do that?

Picking the Best Index Funds

1. First, eliminate all the high-cost funds
2. Pick funds with the widest coverage (funds covering big markets)

Don't look too much based on past results. They're not an indicator of future results and in the long run, the performances average out.

Play Money

The author advises you to keep the lion's share of your portfolio on broad index funds tracking the biggest indexes. But keep a small portion with which you can play around and speculate a bit.

Your portfolio will be safe and you also get to enjoy some playtime.

[image][image]

Real-Life Applications

Play Money
The idea of leaving only a small portion of your portfolio as "play money" is simple, yet genius. You can use this small portion of the portfolio to let your irrational instincts take over and realize that no, you likely won't beat the market through speculation.
I wish I had stumbled upon this idea years ago :).

Review

The Little Book of Common Sense Investing is a perfect introduction to investment.
And most of all, it lays out how normal people can get great results -or better: match market results- without wasting money on advisers or wasting time following financial news.

Date-onomics: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 24 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Date-onomics (2015) reviews how the gender ratio (men to women) affects behavior and personalities, both within dating and outside of dating.
It is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand dating psychology, intersexual dynamics, and increase his general mating intelligence.

Overview

- Gender ratio heavily affects dating behavior
- Men refuse to settle down when there are many women
- There are far more women than men holding a college degree (bad news for women)

Notes

Jon Birger makes a compelling case that the falling marriage rates, hook up behavior and a chronic lack of good caliber men willing to commit in the college-educated cohort are all byproducts of lopsided gender ratio (ie.: too few men compared to women).

Not Enough Men With Degrees

The issue for women holding a college degree is that, historically:

1. Women with a degree don't often marry men without one
2. There are more and more women compared to men who finish college

I laughed hard when the author quips that "it's not that He's Just Not That Into You, it's just that there aren't enough of him".

Also read:

- How successful women must date

Why So Few Men With Degrees?

The author says that:

1. Men can get good paying jobs without degree
2. Women need it more: the pay gap between high school and college is bigger for women
3. Women mature earlier, giving them an advantage in school
4. Men are more prone to disciplinary issues (from ADHD to criminality)

Where Does It Happen?

Birger says the issue is present in almost every developed country.

How Few Educated Men Transform Dating

What does it mean to you?

Birger draws parallel with other nominally monogamous animal species and notes that the effects of changing the gender ration are stunningly similar.

Scientists seem to agree that, albeit changes impact both gender, they affect men more than they affect women (you can see similarities here with evolutionary psychology literature such as The Selfish Gene and The Moral Animal).

How Men Change

When there more women than men, men are:

- More likely to cheat
- Less likely to form long term relationships
- More likely to entertain more sexual partners at once

How Women Change

When there are more men than women, women also are more likely to cheat.

But not as much as men.

Most importantly, women tend to become choosier. Their focus is on screening men harder as they look for the best they can get.

How Culture Changes

The author quotes the book "too many women" -which I'm planning to review soon- in assessing the cultural changes of gender ratio.

More men bring a culture of courtships, romance and men doting on women.

But when women outnumber men, women are more likely to become sexual objects.

Other consequences of fewer men:

- Quantity and quality of sex improves for everyone
- Women more likely to bridge the gender's gap (they want to decrease men's power)
- Women less sensitive to male's look (can't be too picky) but:
- more attentive to other women's looks and (competition)
- Women are more likely to forgive cheating

Other consequences of fewer women:

- Lower teen pregnancy
- Lower sexual assaults (the study's author say women are more protected and respected)
- Men value girlfriends and wives more
- Men more likely to work hard (need money to attract mates)
- Men more likely to spend and go in debt (to show off for women)

Is Feminism The Consequence of Disgruntled Women?

The author links the rise of feminism to the woes those same women face with men.

Since men are hard to come by, women are more likely to focus on work, career and possibly politics.

As we've seen, when men are in short supply, women are treated poorly and more like sexual objects.
So, since women are more and more at the mercy of men, they fight back demanding more rights.

Couple that with the possible resentment towards men, and you have a major driver for feminism.

Let Him Chase is Bad Strategy!

I almost wanted to cry when the author debunked the idea that most women's dating books sell: that you have to make him chase and invest.

No, Birger explains: in difficult markets, it's the assertive women who get the guy.

These are the women who meet the guy, play little unavailability games and who ask for the relationships.

Thank you Jon Birger, more women should heed that.

Also read:

- How to make him invest
- How to make him chase
- How to make him value you more

Why The Best Women Remain Single

The author tackles a few more interesting phenomenon, including:

- Why the best women stay single
- Why women in "bad markets" with few men would better hurry
- Why attractive women get approached less
- Should you give him a commitment ultimatum?

Get the book to read the answers to those questions.

Real Life Applications

Check the gender ration beforehand
Check the gender ration of the place you want to move to, the career you want to take, the college you want to attend.

CONS

There were a many “empirical evidence stories”. I get a bit skittish when I read the micro stories as evidence for the whole.
But, overall, this was not the case: Birger uses enough data to back up the stories.

Review

Date-onomics is a crossover between sociological research, a data-driven scientific paper, and an evolutionary psychology text.

It’s an insightful text, and I listed in the “best red pill books list“.

Date-onomics is not a dating book in the strict sense, but it’s one of the books that explains dating the best.
And it indirectly suggests some of the best high-level dating strategies one could ever apply.
Way too underrated and super recommended.

Jordan Peterson VS Cathy Newman: Power Dynamics Analysis

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Jordan Peterson vs Cathy Newman has been one of the most popular debates in recent memory.

By and large, Peterson won it.
And it propelled his name into one of the contemporary giants of conservative thought leaders.

By the end of this article, you will understand exactly how Jordan Peterson out-debated Cathy Newman.

Quick Peterson Background

Jordan Peterson, author of 12 Rules for Life, is a contemporary thought leader of conservative ideology, generally seen as taking a stand against feminism and Marxism (albeit not all women hate him).

Kathy Newman is a more left-leaning, potentially feminist-leaning host who had some fiery debates against other conservative figures.
Let the debate begin:

Jordan Peterson VS Cathy Newman

We have already seen a few power debate techniques and we have already done a debate analysis in the Trump VS Clinton debate.

But I would put Jordan Peterson above anyone else when it comes to debating.
Without using any unfair debating techniques, he wins by staying in control and showing himself a better leader.
This is the good leader, prestige approach to gaining status.

Cathy Newman instead never seemed up for an honest debate.
She was looking to score a win and make Peterson look bad.

She might have won. Or at least scored some points against any other opponent. But not Jordan Peterson.
He was too good for her.
Let's see.

1. Straw Man Technique

This is an old technique and you better learn how to watch out for it.

Newman had a simple strategy: try to paint Peterson as a villain, make him an easy target, and score an easy win.

This is a subset of the straw man technique, which consists in refuting an opponent's view which the opponent never really had to begin to win. Usually, unfair debaters pick for their straw man opponent an easy target, such as a view everyone disagrees with, an opinion everyone hates, or a position that is easily assailable.

Example: The Gender Pay Gap

Sneaky Warning!

Jordan Peterson's view on the gender pay gap is that it's real and it's the consequence of many different variables. One of them is the difference in personality (agreeableness) and part of it is also prejudice.
Overall, it's a level-headed and fact-based opinion.

Cathy Newman however wants to shoehorn Peterson into an extreme position. One that she can easily rail and pontificate against. She seeks to trap him into saying something along the lines of:

- The gender pay gap doesn't exist
- Women should put up with it
- "I want to defend the pay gap"

If Newman were to manage to make Peterson admit to any of the above, she would score an easy win.
Watch her try it in an increasingly desperate fashion:

Defense

The straw man technique can be unnerving.
When someone uses it against you many times in a row, you might be tempted to espouse the extreme positions just so you can raise your voice and get into a fight.
Never do that.
Here's what you should do instead:

1. Calmly repeat your positions rationally. Over and over again if needed
2. Accuse your opponent of offensiveness
3. Show superior, fact-based knowledge: you look powerful, and they look infantile

That's a powerful way of leveraging vulnerability.

#2. Block Their Attempt at Undermining Your Authority

Bringing up bad associations is a way to smear the opponent's persona instead of engaging with his facts and logic.

The past, some mistakes, friends… Anything that can throw dirt on him. The idea it tries to conjure is that "once wrong, always wrong".

Cathy tries to attack Jordan by saying that his followers are all male (!), divisive and abusive.

Defending Against Authority Attacks

- Don't defend yourself (gives credibility to the accuser)
- Say your only answer for yourself (or it's in the past and you've moved on)
- Refuse to comment further: let them look like vultures scavenging for a non-existent scoop

#3. Don't Allow Them to Label You

Cathy Newman really wanted to corner Peterson.

An unfair debater will try to have you confess or admit to something which the public often frowns upon so they can make you look bad.

The most dangerous words to label you are emotionally charged ones, such as “racist”, “illegal”, “addict”, “violent” etc.

Example: Losing the Labeing War

Look at this man.

He “admits” that a leaflet of decades earlier “could be defined as racist”. Big mistake.
He was an honest man, but honesty doesn’t pay with unfair debating.

Notice how she abuses that admission to continually back him into a corner:

Note: I had to cut the video eventually and the original video I first posted has been taken down. However, she keeps going much further with the same technique.

Defending Against Labels

1. When you’re unsure never say “yes”: always say no
2. Accuse the interviewer of unfair tactics
3. Refuse to answer, always rephrase

Notices Newman tries to do the same with Peterson, but see how it never works because he always denies and rephrase:

A “no” makes you look more powerful and in control. And it doesn’t give any ammo to your opponent.

How Peterson Won

Jordan Peterson dominated the debate against Cathy Newman in the following ways (in order):

1. Stay Cool and Collected

Getting nervous with an unfair debater like Newman is very easy.

But showing too many emotions is often seen as an indicator that you’re not confident enough in your opinions.

See how Jordan remained confident and calm even when facing the worst slanders:

2. Showcase Superior Knowledge

This goes back to the roots of reaching mastery of anything, from social mastery to winning a debate: know your stuff better than anyone else. Jordan knows his stuff much better than Newman.

But “knowing” wouldn’t be enough.
Jordan showcases it:

SUMMARY

Jordan Peterson VS Cathy Newman wasn’t even a contest.

Peterson’s debating skills such as calmness, logic, and superior knowledge, would have been enough to win.
If that weren’t enough, the failure and conspicuousness of Newman’s unfair debate tactics made her look biased and antagonistic.

Overall, this wasn’t even a contest because Peterson was just too good for Newman.

He dominated it by and large from the beginning to the end.

Adopt Peterson's techniques, grow a knowledge that matches his, and you'll be able to do the same with any unfair debater you'll ever meet.

The Entrepreneur Mind: Summary, Review & Criticism

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Entrepreneur Mind is a book for entrepreneurs and aspiring entrepreneurs.
Kevin Johnson, the author, shares one hundred crucial mindsets with which entrepreneurs view the world.
The readers can learn about the entrepreneurs' mindsets and, with some work, adopt the same.

Bullet Summary

- Get a sense of urgency: don't delay or postpone, all must happen today
- Build systems that don't need key people (or yourself for that matter)
- Decouple feelings from the right actions
- Build an environment where criticism flows openly

The Entrepreneur Mind – Summary

About The Author: Kevin Johnson studied computer science and started out his career as a software programmer for IBM.
He showed early signs of entrepreneurship by successfully launching and selling one of the first content management systems. And he eventually went fully back into entrepreneurship in 2000, when he founded and grew his current company Johnson Media.

Strategy

1. Think big: If you think small you will not maximize your potential. And as Tony Robbins says, that's your biggest failure. Better to come short of lofty goals than to leave untapped potential on the table. Also, read The Magic of Thinking Big.

2. Create new markets: Creating new markets means no competition. Companies operating without competition in monopolistic markets enjoy all the profits. Also read Zero to One, where Google is such an example.

3. Work on your business, not in your business: Hire employees to take care of operations so you can focus on growth. Read The E-myth Revisited.

4. All risk isn't risky: While we all know that entrepreneurs take risks, they are also able to calculate that risk and make informed choices that try to minimize those risks.

5. Don't waste time: Get a sense of urgency

6. Systems-dependent, not people-dependent: Automate processes, you can't bet all your fortune on a few people who might leave.

7. Ask for help: Don't be afraid of looking less powerful.

8. Business first, family second: One of the rules that might be hard to digest for many.

9. Do what's most important first: Prioritize, prioritize, prioritize.

10. Hire a good lawyer: get the book for the details

11. The business plan is overrated: Do the background checks first like competition and customers first. I was surprised to read Johnson saying you also develop a prototype before a business plan.

12. Require criticism and disagreement in your company: Be aware of yes man. This is a great point, also read Principles: Life and Work for more on this concept.

13. Fire your worst customers: Some customers waste too much of your time and can even make you lose money. Don't serve them.

14. Make money while doing nothing: Again, focus on processes that don't require you.

15. Outsourcing makes sense: Noncore functions can suck up too much of your time. Outsource them.

16. Move on fast from bad business: Tenacity and grit are the soul and parcels of an entrepreneur, but you have to be able to recognize when an idea is dead.

17. A bad economy is a great opportunity: Start when nobody else does and you'll be ready to reap the benefits when the economy turns.

18. Adopt technology early: Being an early adopter will allow you to see connections and possible new mass uses. Also, read Crossing the Chasm

19. Ignorance can be bliss: Newcomers often come with a mindset that is not hampered by the old ways of doing things.

20. Adapt to change quickly: Check the book for more

21. Technology is an opportunity, not a threat: Check the book for more

22. Always follow up: Fear of rejection can get in the way. Don't allow that to happen

23. Have laserlike focus: Focus on making a few great products. Too big a lineup can spread your resources thin (which is also one of the 48 Laws of Power)

24. Nonprofit really means profit: Nonprofit organizations have money to spend

25. Explore new adventures for inspiration: Go on an adventure, it will open you up mentally and make you come up with new ideas and solutions

26. Failure doesn't kill you; it makes you stronger: Read the book for more

27. Seek partnerships for the right reasons: Don't make partnerships for PR: good partnerships show up in your cash flow (increase revenues or reduce costs)

28. Be a master at leveraging resources: Not everyone will always pay with cash. Learn to get creative with all possible resources. Read Disrupt You! for more.

29. It's not ideal, it's execution: Focus on speed

30. Find an enemy: An enemy can rally the troops and motivate employees. Read The 48 Laws of Power

31. Don't underestimate your competition: Companies with different products and business models also can be competition

32. Ask for what you want: You'll be amazed at how much people are willing to give

33. No competition = no market: If there's no competition, ask yourself why, there's probably a good reason (albeit not necessarily)

34. Put out fires quickly: Respond quickly to customer issues

35. Have an exit strategy: It will help you put things in perspective for decision-making and recognize exit chances along the way

Education

36. School is not necessarily education: This is not school bashing, but entrepreneurs keep learning after school

37. You're in no rush for MBA: An MBA while you're building a business is a distraction

People

38. Spend time with smarter people: You will learn the most

39. Office space is not a priority, a good team is: You can keep working from wherever you are

40. What you wear isn't what you're worth:

41. You don't always have to be the smartest one in the room: The best entrepreneur are humble and are more interested in bringing in smart people than being the smartest ones

42. Talent trumps seniority: Don't get hung up on ranks, it's solutions and execution that matter

43. You are odd, and it's okay: Dyslexia, ADD, and Asperger have all higher incidence among entrepreneurs

44. People don't only work for money: Check Drive by Daniel Pink for more on motivation

45. You have a sidekick: 2+2 is more than 4

46. Don't let people abuse your flexibility: You might have flexible hours, but work is still your priority

47. Don't manage people, manage expectations: Set deadlines instead of micromanaging

48. Get the right mentor: Read Mastery for more

49. Choose your spouse wisely: Spouses can be your boon or can be your ruin (read Men on Strike and The Millionaire Mind)

50. Fire unproductive people: also read "how to be an effective leader"

Finance

51. You don't need money to make money: To make lots of money quickly money is helpful, but entrepreneurship is about workarounds and doing something with nothing

52. Pay taxes quarterly: If you only do it at the end of the year, you might not have enough left

53. A check in hand means nothing: Don't assume you've been paid until the money is in the bank, always double-check dubious checks

54. Avoid negative cash flow: Some companies can get in trouble with negative cash flow even when they're profitable. Make sure that doesn't happen to you

55. Borrow money before you need it: You won't get a loan when you need it, so get one when you still don't

56. Prepayment is king: Build trust so you can get paid. Otherwise, make sure your payment timelines are clear and respected

57. Professional accountant is money well spent: Good accountants will save you money and time

58. Manage debt well: Most businesses fail because of under-capitalization. Do get the money you need

59. There's a downside to having investors: External money can sometimes exacerbate your problems

60. Focus on building revenue: If you go for external investors, show some revenue and sales first, it will make everything easier

61. The biggest investment is yours: Show your own investment before asking for any

62. Use different banks to minimize risk: Keep business and personal accounts separated at different banks or they'll affect each other (credit scores and asking payments from personal account)

63. Know your PAYDEX score: Check the book for more

Marketing and Sales

This section is a lot about sales and people's skills.

64. You're in sales: Start selling early, you need to make sure people want it

65. Your customer is your boss: Always refer to what the market wants

66. You have sales before you have a business: The best way to start a business is when people are willing to pay even before you have a product

67. You aren't always the best person to close a deal: Hire the best people to make the sale, and that's not necessarily you

68. Networking isn't all about you: Ask how you can help

69. Don't waste time on people who can't say yes: Ask who's the final decision maker and don't waste time

70. There's no such thing as a cold call: Research before calling

71. Tell everyone about your business: Shyness, fear, or politeness will make you miss out on opportunities

72. Ask the right questions: Open-ended questions

73. Receive the maximum value: Don't change prices to accommodate customers

74. Don't patronize customers: Entrepreneurs believe they need to "act big" to impress people because that's what CEOs do. Terrible mindset.

75. Build your network creatively: The right environment is not necessarily the standard networking environments

76. Don't hold grudges: A no today can be a yes tomorrow, don't alienate people

Leadership

77. Act in spite of how you feel: Don't let emotions get in the way (also read Emotional Unavailability)

78. Push beyond your fear: Let your goals guide you.

79. Be a maverick: Most entrepreneurs have a rebellious streak.

80. Make your dreams come true: Read the book for more

81. Make difficult sacrifices: Entrepreneurship requires sacrifices

82. You have unbelievable endurance: Endurance is possibly the most important trait for entrepreneurs. Also, read Grit by Duckworth

83. Be prepared to lose it all: Most businesses fail, don't be surprised

Also, read:

- Best leadership books
- Values-based business (about this website's credo)

Motivation

84. Being successful is not the goal: The feeling of success is fleeting, entrepreneurs should be motivated by the creation process. Also, read Start With WHY.

85. You are excited for Monday: You can get to start a fresh new week and the world is ready to move along. My Note: when I first read it I was disappointed, there are no Mondays and Weekends for me.

86. You're disappointed For Friday: They're less productive, you gotta pay people and you won't be able to restart 100% until Monday My Note: I didn't like the sense of powerlessness. There's plenty you can do during weekends.

87. A 9-to-5 is worse than death: The biggest fear for entrepreneurs is that of having to go to a "normal" job. I can attest to that.

88. Your parents demand a real job: Don't get angry about it, be compassionate

89. You get resentment: People sometimes won't understand or will be jealous

90. It's not about being your own boss: Those who want to go the entrepreneur road not to have a boss often lack the discipline that entrepreneurship requires. And entrepreneurship also requires vision

91. Entrepreneurship is in your blood: The author recommends you research your family history for some more motivation. But I disagree with this one.

92. You know your worth: You might have to say no to seemingly good money if you don't believe it meets your worth or your company's worth

93. You can't keep a job: The author says entrepreneurs are not good at staying at a job. They either quit or get fired. I couldn't agree more with this.

94. You cry when things don't go your way: Steve Jobs did, so you can do it too

95. It's never too late: Media focus on young upstarts, but older people start more companies than teens and 20-something

96. You feel unequaled joy when your idea becomes reality.

97. Following your passion is bogus: Not all passions can be monetized. But I disagree here, finding fulfillment and joy in what you do is key

98. You have the right motivation: Read the book for more

99. You love your life: Controlling your destiny makes you happy. And I couldn't agree more.

100. You're an entrepreneur forever: Once you get a taste of it, you can never go back

Real-Life Applications

A lot of concepts in The Entrepreneur Mind were really good and aha moments for me. Such as:

- Fire your worst customers
- Borrow money before you need it
- Tell everyone about your business (my tendency is to keep it under wrap)
- You can't keep a job (I found this ringing so true for me)

Review

The Entrepreneur Mind is an easy and wisdom-rich read that you will go through at light speed.

While some concepts are more obvious and won't add as much value, they can still serve as great refreshers. And you will likely find many gold nuggets to help you propel forward.

Also, I particularly appreciated the psychology behind some points, such as that many entrepreneurs can't stay happy in their jobs and end up either fired or quitting.

8 Steps to Handle A Boss Who Shouts at You

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Some bad bosses shout, and it can be a distressful experience for employees.

It's also highly disempowering and can cost you in status, respect, and career opportunities.

Especially if he yelled at you in front of other colleagues.

Between us, it's demeaning, humiliating, and emasculating.
Not good for your own self-confidence.

So by the end of this post, you will learn how to put your yelling boss back in his place.

She disrespected me publicly. But she quickly regretted it

- SUMMARY

#1. Internalize Aggression Is NEVER OK

As usual, mindsets come first.

You have to believe it in your core that:

1. You are worthy, no matter where you stand in the silly org chart
2. It's NEVER ok for someone disrespects you

That includes when you make a mistake, because:

#2. Internalize Mistakes Are OK

We all make mistakes.

And whenever we commit a mistake, it doesn't mean we become sub-humans who can be abused.

If your boss is yelling at you, yes, you probably made a mistake.
And you will learn from it. But you need to internalize that mistakes and abusive reactions to mistakes are not connected.

Mistakes are natural and fair game, verbal aggression is not.
Ignorance does not justify aggression.

Never allow anyone to link mistakes to yelling (read below) and especially do not link them in your mind.

Yelling is also very poor leadership.
It instills a fear of making more mistakes, which stifles creativity, teamwork and, ironically, is more likely to induce mistakes.

So here is another mindset for you: it's your duty to limit the power and scope of poor managers.
If you let them get away with it, they will keep abusing people for their whole life.

#3. Let Him Yell

If he's really furious, let him go ahead.

He's chipping away at your social status, that's for sure.
But you're in for the war, not the battle.

And in the meanwhile, he's also embarrassing himself as he shows no internal control whatsoever.

When you let him yell uninterrupted, you allow everyone to see he's a dickhead.
A few minutes from now, everyone will be on your side when you'll serve him skewered.

The trick here is not to listen without listening.

What do I mean?

To let his words go through you without hurting you and without getting under your skin.

“Be like water”, said Bruce Lee (and Robert Greene).
And communication trainers such as George Thompson and Douglas Stone make emotional detachment a centerpiece of getting what you want in difficult exchanges.

See the point?

In short: most smart people agree that a crucial aspect of verbal power and control is being able to not take things personally.

If you can’t yet, meditate.

The goal is to reach a point where you can remain calm while you plan the exact wording of your next move, which will come as soon as he stops.

In the meanwhile, while he speaks:

#4. Keep Proud Nonverbal

Don’t look down, don’t droop your shoulders, don’t arch your back.

Stand straight, as if you had an air of defiance -minus the air of defiance in your face-.

Basically, look strong, just without facial signs of aggression.
You avoid facial signs of aggression because first, you don’t want to escalate. And second, you don’t want to warn him about what’s coming.

#5. State You Are Not OK With Yelling

> Me: I have no idea about the test, and I appreciate a more respectful tone

Now the time has come for you to speak.

Do NOT address your mistakes here: that will make you look weaker and give ammo to the yelling boss.

Do NOT address the words of what he said: you don't want a debate.

Once he's done say instead something like this:

> You: I understand you are angry. But I am not OK with you screaming at me

Alternatively, a bit less strong but equally powerful:

> You: I understand you are angry. But I feel that yelling is very impolite and aggressive

Then pause.

#6. Hold Your Own

If you reached this point: congratulations!

Whatever you do now, even if you muck up all the rest, your boss and the people around will already respect you much, much more.

Now let's keep going.

Two things can happen here:

- He will ignore what you said and resume reaming you for your mistake even harder (don't worry: that's OK)
- He will attack what you said and state that it's not aggressive or impolite

In either case, he will probably perceive what you've just done as insubordination and he wants you to backtrack.

Here you want to clarify the point that you're not out for a fight or to deny your mistake.
But you're demanding fair treatment.

If he says you fuc*ed it up, you answer:

> You: I made a mistake, and I own it.
> But that does not give you the right to yell at me. That's very rude and it's unacceptable behavior

Whatever he says, keep repeating your point, just with different words:

> You: I always strive to improve my performance and I am happy to talk about it in private.
> But yelling at me publicly like is completely out of line and I do not accept that kind of behavior

The more he screams, the more you look powerful and in control: he's the one flipping out and you're the one making him dance to your tune.

#7. Don't Accept "Sorry But You... "

As we've seen mistakes and aggression are two separate things.

But bad bosses will try to use your mistake to justify their aggression.
Never allow that!

If you allow it, you empower them to make you look so bad that it's your fault that they can't control themselves.

So when they say:

> Boss: yeah, sorry, BUT you did X / Y, that's unaccetapble and it's costing us..

You say:

> You: you're right, and I am happy to discuss my mistake, how to fix it, how to learn from it and how to never make it happen again. But these are two different topics.
> The other topic is verbal bullying ,and that's not OK.

Basically: make sure you keep the mistake and the verbal abuse separate.

Dealing with the abuse and the mistake at the same time is nothing but double abuse.

Have you noticed the parallel?
This is the same as saying "OK, she was victimized, I'm really sorry, but what was she doing at 2 am at the flat party?"
That kind of "rationale" humiliates the victim twice.

Don't allow anyone to do it to you.

P.S.:
We teach how to become a respect-worthy man in Power University.

#8. Demand a Public Apology

Here is what sneaky bosses will do when forced to apologize

They had their aggressive display of strength in public and they will later apologize in private.

An apology is a meaningful step, but you will have to demand a public apology.

Say:

> You: Thank you, I appreciate you realizing it wasn't cool and apologizing. At the same time though you yellet at me in public, and I lost face in public.
> I believe you should apologize in public as well.

If he doesn't, he's not a great human being.

His ego is more important to him than respecting the people around him and achieving the organization's goals.
He probably has a fixed mindset. Good to know.

Learn from bad bosses, too. It will help you become a much better leader once it is your turn.

Also see:

- How to get rid of bad bosses

Case Study

In a Toastmasters leadership WhatsApp group.

Think of the social power dynamics, and think of ways you would handle the shouting boss:

Now take a look at my reply and try to think of why I said what I said:

Now read the comments and the notes below:

Lots of power moves in my replies. Get Power University for the full strategy

> Her: You make it difficult to discreetly ignore you <— Rude and babying
> Her: FIND THE D TEST! <— Equivalent of rude yelling
> (3 minutes later) <— ♟ Strategic fast reply. I didn't want her to apologize on her own. I wanted her to apology because of me ⍰⍰
> Me: I have no idea about the test <— Confidently owns it.
> And I appreciate a more respectful tone Eva <— Focuses on the tone, sets boundaries with straight talk
> Her: Sorry! <— Good, but not enough
> Me: (silence) <— ♟ I wanted everyone to read. I wanted her to stew on it, and add more
> Her: (audio message) <— High-investment extra apology
> Me: OK, let's make sure it doesn't happen again, and apologies accepted :) <— Now it was enough to accept.

Because I found it unacceptable, I was ready to stand my ground as long as needed.

Anyway, let's go on and see what happened:

After the apology, I strike a conciliatory tone.

If you have enough power and want to come out on top avoid the socially friendly "let's" and say:

> OK, make sure it doesn't happen again and apologies accepted

Note the video "I'll do my very best" is a further apology, albeit not an empowering one.

To begin with, "doing one's best" is not enough when you're serious about not accepting abuse. He must do it full stop, not doing his best.

And second, "doing one's best" implies the possibility, and power, of doing it again.

Not too cool. Ideally, you want to be near the same level of power as your boss so that he doesn't even think that yelling (again) is even a possibility.

> 10 Ways to Maintain Power When Executing Orders

But OVERALL…

I gained significant status and respect.
Do something similar with a bad boss, and others will see you as a leader with strong values.
It wasn't by accident I was proposed as the next president, and it went unchallenged.

SUMMARY

So to deal with a yelling boss start with the mindsets: you deserve respect.

Then, grow leverage.
Develop your skills, network, options, and save money.

This article then showed you the step-by-step techniques you can use.

Remember this lesson when you become the boss: treat people with dignity, and you'll contribute to a better world.

Men on Strike: Summary & Review

Men on Strike analyze feminist and gender-related issues. Helen Smith, the author, says that society has become hostile towards the male gender, and this attitude is costing both men, women, and society at large.

Bullet Summary

- Our society has become increasingly hostile and unfair toward men
- Men lose their shirts in case of divorce and are held hostage by their wives
- Men are reacting by "refusing to play": not getting married, not being chivalrous

Full Summary

About The Author: Helen Smith, the author, considered herself a feminist. Until she found out that feminism didn't mean equality of sexes, but female privileges and discrimination against men.
She decided she wasn't going to stand for that.
"Men on Strike" represents her new philosophy when it comes to feminism and gender issues.

Marriage Is Unfair to Men

The author says that marriage has become a better and better deal for women and more and more dangerous for men.

She cites a survey from Men's Health showing that men in cohabiting situations are happier and more confident than married men. And the wives thinner.

This is because, says the author, marriage gives power to the woman, who takes the man for granted and treats him as hired help rather than as a partner (albeit, I have to add, correlation does not imply causation).

Also, read:

- The tools women use to control men and relationships

I also found it interesting, albeit it's drawn from a small sample size (141) and on self-described traits, that the men more likely to be against marriage were virgins and low earners.

Men who identified themselves as alpha males were more likely to want a marriage.

Society is Becoming Feminine and Male-Unfriendly

Helen Smith says that schools, colleges, and society frown upon masculinity.

And the tendency is to eradicate and stamp out male traits from the boys.
Men, says the authors, are seen as abusers and dangerous sex.

Colleges Are Pro-Women & Against Men: And That's Why Men Abandon College

Since at universities, the environment is so anti-male, more and more men are abandoning college.

And that's why, implies the author, there are more and more women on campus.
This is similar to the message that Jordan Peterson more recently has been sending out -check his 12 Rules for Life-

My Note:
It's probably true that feminism and anti-male campaigning is too strong in universities, but I believe the reasons for decreasing male attendance are, by and large, of different nature.
Read Date-onomics, successful women dating, and how to date.

No Father-hood Control

Men don't have much control over their fate as fathers.

If the woman tricks the man into saying she was on the pill, he has no say on whether or not the baby should be born.

And his woes aren't over because:

He Has No Say On Parenthood, But He's Stuck With Child Support

The man will be forced to pay for child support -it doesn't matter whether or not he was tricked into it-.

Indeed, there are many cases of women who used a man's sperm for self-impregnation and received big checks as a reward for their shenanigans.

In one shameful example, Boris Becker was forced to pay for child support even when the woman made him a BJ and then manually inserted his semen in her vagina.

Even in statutory male rape, a man is forced to pay. And this is why, by and large, I agree with the author.

Men's Affirmative Actions

What can men do?

The author has lots of great tips on groups you can join and even great advice on how you can react to women trying to put you down.

And most of all, I liked the concept that you shouldn't fall for the mindset of "man up and shut up", but speak up against abuse.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

I'll make a proper article about it, but not to get screwed the author recommends:

- Stay single
- Cohabit but don't get married
- Know your local law and palimony laws

CONS

Empirical Evidence
Men on Strike sometimes presents a lot of empirical evidence based on stories and some too small sample sizes to draw conclusions (like a poll on Vox Day with 141 respondents).
But this is not to say the book doesn't make valid points: it does make very valid points.

Review

What a wonderful sociological analysis!

I disagree with some of the key tenets of Men on Strike. Namely, men are withdrawing from college because they sense unfairness. And I think it goes a bit too far at times.
But it also presents extremely valid points.

I have to admit I was skeptical before starting to read it. I reject feminism because of its juxtaposition of genders, of viewing women VS men.
So for the same reason, men VS women (or VS current feminine society) was equally meaningless to me.

Plus I was loath of sounding like a complainer and I had always refused of entertaining the thought that current regulation was unfair towards men.
After all, nobody ever says it.

But this book opened my eyes to many current injustices.

And I had to nod as I realized for the first time that yes, it's not damn normal that as a man I don't want to be seen too close to children. And that's possible because society's image these days is that of men as children's predators (urgh!).

And of course:

- Men forced to pay child support for children who are not theirs
- Men forced to pay child support for children they fathered as teenagers with 30-something women

All pretty crazy.

So I not only recommend you read Men on Strike, but I would warmly welcome people to reflect on its message.

The Magic of Thinking Big: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- The first step towards success is thinking big
- Whether you believe you can or you can't you're right: believe you can
- Drop all excuses and start

Summary

About The Author:
David Joseph Schwartz (1927-1987) was a professor of marketing at Georgia State University, but he is best known for his work as a motivational writer and coach, most of all with the book we are reviewing here, "The Magic of Thinking Big".

Believe in Success and You Will Succeed

1. Believe you will succeed
2. Dream big

Schwartz says that to succeed you must believe you will succeed.

Start by changing all your fears and doubts into positive thoughts. And think big: the size of your success is in direct proportion to the size of your beliefs.

> The size of your success is proportional to the size of your dreams

Drop All Excuses

Schwartz dedicates a chapter to the excuses people come up with to avoid going for lofty goals.
But to be successful stopping the excuse mill is mission-critical step 1.

Don't Underestimate Your Intelligence

Do not underestimate your own intelligence as much as you don't want to overestimate other people's intelligence.

Schwartz also says that attitude is more important than IQ (read Emotional Intelligence) and, I would add, your intelligence is not cast in stone.

You can change your brain and grow your skills. Also, read how to develop a growth mindset.

That being said, your intelligence also matters more or less depending on which field you decide to pursue.

> The less excuses you make, the more successful you will be

Build Confidence and Destroy Fear

I really liked two guidelines by the author:

1. Take action – it's loitering inaction that feeds fear
2. Only do what you believe is right to do

Also read: How to Stop Worrying and Start Living.

Think & Dream Creatively

1. Believe you can do it and your mind will find ways to do i
2. Don't let past traditions get in the way: experiment, go for new approaches, and think of different
3. Demand yourself how you can do better and magical answers will show you the way
4. Scramble therapy: meet and talk to new and different people, and get new inputs in your mind. Ideas in = ideas out

You Are Who You Think You Are

Change how you think about yourself and you will change your life.

1. Carry yourself as if you were important. Because you are
2. Think of your work as important. Because it is
3. Ask yourself how the ideal and important you would act. Then act that way

Go First Class

Get the best people you can around you, pick the best advisors, and only listen to successful people.
Always go for the best in class. You can't afford anything else.

> Always go first class. You can't afford anything else.

Think Right Towards People

The Magic of Thinking Big also deals with social skills.

Schwartz encourages the readers to introduce themselves and be proactive in making new friendships.

Similar to How to Win Friends he recommends you take care of remembering people's names.
And a very good suggestion is to accept people as they are and focus on the positives.

Also, read:

- The best social skills books

Think Like a Leader

To get people to follow you, start by putting yourself in their shoes and looking at things from their perspective.

Treat people fairly and lead by example.
Also, read:

- How to Become a Leader

Get In The Habit of Action

Start things, don't wait for conditions to be perfect because they never are.

Waiting for the perfect time is often only an excuse you're making. You will meet obstacles anyway, start and solve them as you go: the obstacle is the way.

The author recommends you don't wait for your spirit to get you going, but build the habit of moving right away.

> You don't dare because it's difficult, but it's difficult because you don't dare it's difficult

Turning Defeat Into Victory

Schwartz says that you must study your faults and mistakes in order to avoid repeating them in the future.

Don't let the pain overwhelm you, as Tony Robbins says there's some good in every situation, you only need to find.
And if you can't find any, here's what Ray Dalio says: pain + failure provide your biggest drivers for growth.

Set Big Goals

Get clear on where you want to and write it down: your life is too important to leave it to chance.

Then let your goals drive you and motivate you along the way.

The Magic of Thinking BIG

The author finally ties down the power of thinking big in driving you forward.

Even in the toughest situations:

- When haters hate: think BIG, it's proof you're growing
- When you get scared: think BIG, focus on your strengths, look important, and remember nobody's any bigger than you
- When you're getting angry: think BIG, a quarrel is not probably worth your time
- When your romantic life is in trouble: think BIG. Rebuild romance, don't get even

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Don't Overestimate People's Intelligence
That is so true. As Steve Jobs said, "when you realize it's people no smarter than you are that run this world, things change". It took me a long time to realize that… And I'm still in that process.

Put Positive Memories in Your Brain
I liked the idea of putting positive thoughts and memories in your mind when you wake up and before going to bed. Try it out, it's helpful.

CONS

It's aged a bit
If you've been around the self-help literature for a while most of the information in here won't be new to you. But that's not to say the book isn't valid: quite the opposite, it's this book that propagated many of those ideas.

Does thinking big really work?

Thinking big may, or may not work, and we don't know for sure because there are no experiments or research that show how thinking big leads to achieving big.

When it comes to "focusing on the positives", that's a popular mantra of self-help, but that doesn't mean it's correct.

Self-learned optimism, as the more scientific Martin Seligman calls it, is different than simply thinking positively. And optimism is in some fields and endeavors, but not every time and everywhere, as Seligman himself stresses out.

Also read: self-help myths and pop-psychology myths.

Review

The Magic of Thinking Big is an OK book with an interesting, but ultimately untested concept.

In my personal experience, I think that many people would gain with bigger goals.
But I've also seen plenty of people with way too big goals for their levels and skills, and not nearly enough realism, self-assessment, and strategic thinking to even increase their odds of success.
They miserably failed.

The concept of The Magic of Thinking Big reminded me a bit of the concept of moonshots in Bold.

Overall, it's a good book, but most people can probably find more impactful books and resources in the vast self-help literature.

To Be Good, You First Need to Be Bad: Here's Why

Lucio Buffalmano · 30 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A big tenet of this website is that to be a force for good in the world, you have to learn how to be bad.

The concept of facing evil as a necessity for good is not simply a matter of philosophy, but there's enough empirical evidence to prove it.

The first part of this post will address the quantitative, more empirical side.

The second part will address the question more from the individual point of view.

An Empirical Case For Mastering Evil

Cooperation can be a conundrum in the face of otherwise selfish genes.

But Axelrod's experiments detailed in The Evolution of Cooperation explain how cooperation also makes sense for selfish individuals.

The experiment is a computer program running a simplified version of negotiations (iterated Prisoner's dilemma). Many different negotiation strategies were pitted against each other.

By Christopher X Jon Jensen (CXJJensen) & Greg Riestenberg (Own work) [CC BY-SA 3.0 (https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0)], via Wikimedia Commons

In brief, these were the main strategies:

- Always defect to get maximum selfish payoff (cheating, in human terms);
- Always cooperate (too nice, in human terms);
- Middle of the road between the two (shall we say, "strategic". Or, to humanize even more, assertive and win-win).

Albeit obviously simplistic when compared to human social exchanges, these experiments are still significant for us.

And the "too nice" VS "too cheating" strategies also allow to draw parallels with human behavior.

The results of these game theory experiments are very telling:

1. Abusive & Too Nice Strategies Die Out

The strategies skewed towards maximum payoff -"abusive"- die out.

And the same fate awaits highly cooperative strategies -let's call them "too nice"-.

Who wins, then?

2. Conditional Cooperation Wins

The strategy that won out, TIT FOR THAT, could be interpreted as a middle-of-the-road, sort of an "assertive win-win".

Read more on TIT FOR TAT strategies, but in a nutshell, it works like this:

1. First, it cooperates
2. It keeps cooperating with those who cooperate
3. It retaliates with those who cheat

4. It starts from scratch after the retaliation

3. Retaliation is Required

"Tit for tat" embodies, empirically, the central thesis of this post (and a central tenet of this website).

And that is that to allow cooperation and win-win you need to be able to punish and cast aside the abusers of this world.

There have been more elaborate techniques that eventually beat "Tit for tat", but they all included the capacity of cooperating as default while defending and isolating abusers (for a good overview see Ridley, 1996).

> For cooperation to even exist, evil must be met with evil

Too Nice Is The Root of Evil

Helplessness to evil invites evil (and gives evil the world)
As the empirical experiments show, highly cooperative strategies ("very nice", in human terms) are the best for everyone IF everyone else around were to be equally very nice.

But it's important to notice that unless forever ring-fenced, naively cooperating environments are in high danger of being invaded and taken over by opportunistic cheats.

Indeed, as long as an abusive alien force can penetrate a highly agreeable system, the agreeable players will be relegated to ever-increasing indigence, enslavement, and, eventually, extinction.

Indeed a dishonest strategy seeping into a cooperative-only strategy (too nice strategy) would make it easy to pick off everyone who can't retaliate.
Unable to defend themselves, the too-nice people of this world succumb to the self-centered, evil player.

The World Needs Good Men With Capacity for Evil

When we extrapolate the results of game theory, we get a bleak outlook for virtues without the capacity for evil.

Because if people with good intentions don't arm themselves with the tools and knowledge to muster evil when it's necessary, then this world is mathematically doomed to be run by evil people.

No wonder so many people around the world lost all faith in the political class: it seems like getting to the top automatically filters out the good players.
Which is indeed something that happens when systems become rotten to the core.
Mathematically indeed, it's impossible to infiltrate a cheat-only system with a collaborative strategy (unless many collaborative players enter it at once).

More Evil In Real World

There's one more twist.

The simulation probably makes it harder for abuse to pay off.

"Tit for tat" for example plays multiple rounds with fixed payouts.
But what if one could win big once without retribution? Or cheat without anyone else knowing it?

Indeed, abusive behavior is more likely to pay off socially when:

- Nobody knows you have cheated
- The other player cannot retaliate
- You will never meet the other player again
- You can win huge and give back little when retaliated against

You will notice that any of the above are common instances in life.
An abuser who is able to legally -but not ethically- take advantage of someone else, for example, will often face no retribution.

What's left to do, then?

Why You Must Master Evil

By mastering evil I am referring to:

1. The ability to recognize evil when you see it
2. The strength, and skills, to withstand it (avoid it or destroy it)
3. The ability to act evil, when needed

Once you can do that, it will do a myriad of great things for you, the people around you, and the world at large:

1. Mastering Evil Prevents Abuse

When you know how to recognize dishonest players, you are also more likely to defuse them or even beat them at their own game.

It's a little bit like martial arts training.
You will be able to spot the signs of aggression and are more likely to respond calmly and confidently.
Which, overall, lowers the chances a fight will ever be needed.

2. You Remove Yourself From The Easy Target List

Who do abusers prey on?

Mostly on people who are easy to prey on, of course. When you can read the signs of dishonesty and cruelty and are able to send back equally powerful signals, you are less likely to become prey.

And if everyone were able to withstand evil, evil will cease to pay off. And cease to exist.

> If you're unable to muster evil, you're enabling evil to exist

3. You Respect Yourself More

As Jordan Peterson, author of 12 Rules For Life, explains: if you are too nice, too agreeable, and too passive in the face of abuse, you will pay the price emotionally.

All that action that you're not taking, all that anger you're bottling up makes you become bitter and resentful.

Peterson says that if you're harmless you're not virtuous. There's no virtue in being harmless.

But if you're a monster without acting monstrously, then you're virtuous. And, I would add if you can be a monster and act virtuously, then you're a hero.
Why don't you be a hero instead?

4. The Only Way to Do Good

Ultimately, I believe, you can't do good in any meaningful way without being able to be bad when the time calls for it.

I'm afraid it's again simple logic that supports this statement: the higher you aim, the more you will have to contend with evil.

Your success will attract lots of great people and great opportunities. But also the swindlers, the resentful haters, and the vultures looking for easy spoiling.
And of course, it might be the case that unfair competitors won't stop at anything trying to squash you.

It derives that you cannot spread love at scale if you cannot destroy the evil that stands in the way.

The better angels of our nature are useless if they can't confront evil

The Hero Journey

“Having an impact” has become a catchphrase.

Usually, people mean to say they want to have a positive impact.

Albeit we find the mantra to be potentially manipulative, we appreciate the goal of succeeding while adding value. That’s what win-win is, and we’re all for win-win here.

However, to effectively add value while also winning for yourself… You do need to learn all the “darker” disciplines we teach here:

- Machiavellianism
- Manipulation
- Social power dynamics
- Leadership power dynamics
- ….

And you must learn all of that… While also never forgetting the light.

As Nietzsche says: when you stare into the abyss, the abyss stares back at you.
That’s especially true when you move forward in life. The higher you go, the more ahole you will meet.

And all the turkeys you meet along the road may

But don’t let that stop you.
Mastering the dark while still pushing ahead for the light is the ultimate hero’s journey.

Go for it.

> Get your sword. Then keep it sheathed (most of the times).

Summary

We talked about why you need to be bad.

But don’t get this article wrong:

We’re not promoting endless cynicism here -more enlightened cynicism.

There are plenty of good men and women in the world.
And some will even help you while asking for little or nothing in return.

But what this article says is that you can’t count on that.
There will be people wanting to take advantage of you along the road. That’s also human nature. And you’re better off being prepared for that.

This is what this website -and Power University- are all about.

A Random Walk Down Wall Street: Psychology of Stockmarkets

A Random Walk Down Wall Street makes the case that the stock market moves randomly in the short term, and it helps readers understand how they can leverage that knowledge to improve their investment strategy.

Bullet Summary

- The market moves randomly and unpredictably
- There's a long-term upward bias though
- Don't try to outperform the market

Full Summary

About The Author:
Burton Malkiel is an American economist and writer.
Burton largely espouses the efficient-market theory over the long run. But he adds that there are exceptions and, in the short term, markets are much more random than economists had long believed.
This is a position that behavioral finance has eventually confirmed (see Thaler, 2016)

Foundations and Castles in The Air

Burton says there are two ways of approaching investment:

1. Financial fundamentals investing (value investing)
2. Castle in the air

Castle in the Air is based on following trends and emotions.
And it's not necessarily a poorer alternative as it can give much higher returns.

An example of Castle in the air investing would have been to invest in cryptocurrencies when the hype was reaching the early majority and about to go into a buying craze.

Irrational Exuberance Exists, But It's An Exception

Malkiel reviews a few of the financial bubbles over the years, such as:

- Tulipomania
- Nifty Fifty
- South Sea Bubble
- Wall Street Crash of '29
- Dotcom Bubble

The author says that the markets always return to roughly the pre-crush levels.
It's because markets do tend towards efficiency and after the irrational binge they tend to get back to rational levels.

Technical Analysis: A Non-Science

Malkiel introduces the two main analyses people use to decide when to buy:

- Fundamental analysis -poring over financials and market prospects-
- Technical analysis -looking at chart patterns-.

He severely criticizes technical analysis, saying that most correlations are dubious and that when you focus on charts you're focusing on the micro and losing sight of the macro.

Indeed, when a completely random chart was shown to some famous "chartist", they couldn't tell the difference between a random walk and a real stock's movements.

Fundamental Analysis: Better But Still Not Perfect

The author has more respect for fundamental analysis, but he says that's also lacking.

Not only the whole idea has several flaws, but the results are poor.

He says that analysts who were asked to predict the price of a stock within 5 years were very inaccurate.
They shorten the period to one year and they were even less accurate. And it wasn't a question of industry: no industry turned out to be easy to predict.

Random Walk Means You Shouldn't Try to Predict

Basically the central thesis of "A Random Walk Down Wall Street" is that stocks move in a random pattern that cannot be predicted.

The shorter the timeframe, the more random the movements will be.

Technical analysis is mostly bogus, while fundamental analysis is based on actual data, but is still poor at predicting the future.

However, long run, the trend is upward.

> It's flipping a coin – with a slight upward bias

The question is, how long:

Anything Less Than A Decade It's Pure Randomness

The author says that the past is a very flawed indicator of the future.

Yes, over a long period of time, stocks will likely outperform bonds and will beat inflation, but in the short term, there's no such guarantee. And in periods shorter than a decade, it's basically random.

That's why Malkiel believes that Target-Date Funds are a good idea because these de-risk as your chosen date -often retirement- approaches.

My note:
This is contrary to Robbins in MONEY Master The Game, who says the idea that bonds are less risky is wrong because stocks and bonds can often move in the same direction.

Where to Invest?

If you can't beat the market -and if even trying would require so much time and effort-, what are the alternatives? The author recommends:

- Invest in Index Funds
- (Mostly) avoid actively managed funds
- Don't overtrade

[image]
CONS

I mostly agree with Malkiel.
Yet, there are also important holes in his theory that he should have addressed.

For example:

- What About Those Who DO Beat The Market?

Warren Buffet, following Graham's value investing theory, and Ray Dalio, just to name two, do beat the market for long stretches of time.

What about them?

There ARE exceptions who manage to beat the market in the long run and Buffet uses fundamental analysis that Malkiel says doesn't really work.
And it would have been interesting to read about the exceptions to the rule.

Review

Any new young man who thinks he can make money in the stock market should read "A Random Walk Down Wall Street".

This text will hopefully help them see that trying to beat the market is mostly a fool's errand.

RSD Julien Scandal: Handling Shame Attacks (CNN)

Lucio Buffalmano · 1 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The story of the RSD scandal involving Julien Blanc is the story of a typical shame attack.

In 2020's words, you'd call it a "cancel culture attack".

Intro

Cancel culture is about power.

The attacker also referred to as "moral police", "virtue signaler", or "social justice warrior" publicly attacks a sacrificial lamb.

The goal of the attacker is, whether he knows or not, power.
Often, it's in the form of:

1. Reputational "virtuosity" gain, to look saintly and "right"
2. Leadership gains, to lead a charge of other cancelers
3. Self-signaling gains, so that he can hide his own dark side to himself and pretend he's "good"
4. Rational and strategic gains, for example by eliminating a competitor
5. Culture influence. Please note that sometimes that influence of a virtue signaler can be a positive influence!

Cancel culture does not always have bad effects.
Sometimes someone deserves to be canceled. Or it can be good for society to cancel something.

However, as for everything, canceling can be done for good causes, or… Not so good ones.

And with everything, also come the excesses.

So, in many cases, canceling others is at least of dubious moral virtues.

To gain more points, the attacker frames the victim as "bad beyond reproach" and "not good enough" to live and operate in the society that the virtue signaler wants.

Anyone who works and operates outside of the morality of their zeitgeist can be the victim of a similar scandal.
So it's good if you prepare yourself.

By the end of this article, you will learn what you should do in a similar situation and how you can deal and beat the moral police.

Julien Blanc Scandal: Intro

Julien Blanc (previously RSDJulien), was a dating coach at a company called RSD.

He was mired in a scandal for some videos he had done in Japan, and he appeared on CNN for an interview (you can watch the full version here).

It wasn't a friendly interview, though.
There were no questions, no letting him explain, and no finding out what really went on.

The interview format was confrontational and framed him in the most negative light. Indeed, he demonized Julien, took the worst pictures he could find, and bullied him on live TV.

Albeit I believe the interviewer was rather unfair and Julien didn't deserve that much hate, this post is not about taking a position on the issue but more to analyze the interview.

The objective is to share and learn how to deal with moral attacks when you actually did do something wrong.

What's Moral Police?

I will define moral policing as such:

> The act of shaming someone for breaking an alleged standard of ethics and morals, and framing him as "unworthy" for that morally just society

The standards of ethics and morals are either the majority's standards or simply the ones that the moral police prefer.

Moral policing is a pejorative term, implying that the ethics and morals used as yardsticks are not necessarily good and positive but can simply be a tool to win an argument and destroy an opponent.

The moral police always take a judge role against the attacker, framing themselves as "moral and fair" and framing the attack as "not good enough" for us.
To learn more about judges please read here:

> The Judge Role: A Tool For Power & Control

We have seen shame attacks and more policing before on this site, for example analyzing the Charlie Sheene interview.

But this case is different because Julien Blanc's public behavior gave critics legitimate material to attack, which made the shame dynamic easier to trigger.

So, in truth, the first step is 'don't be an asshole, be an honorable man'.
Once you do that, you can focus on defending yourself like a high-power, high-value, honorable man.

Here is how you do it:

#1. Don't Give Them Moral High Ground

This is the very first rule.

Whenever you allow anyone to take the moral high ground on you, you're going to fight an uphill battle.

They will be always on the offensive and you will always be on the defensive.

Which is what, partially, happened to Julien Blanc.

See an example of how the interviewer takes the moral high ground by setting himself up as the defender of "meaningful relationships" VS "whatever Julien preaches":

The interviewer sets himself up as the judge of "what's good" and Julien allows it, thus legitimizing his authority.

#2. Break The Attack Early

The later you act against the moral police's attacks, the more you'll be fighting against the momentum.

The key is to react early and nip their attack in the bud.

This is one of the reasons why Julien Blanc was in a difficult spot: the interviewer swung for the hilltop right off the gates. Julien gave his flank and never recovered from there.

Do the opposite instead:

- Match their intensity
- Push back and deny accusations

See how Trump did it:

> Trump: "No I didn't say that at all, I don't think you understood what was said, this was locker room talk"

Totally different approach, right? Trump led the exchange and controlled the narrative.

Reject, powerfully, and reframes effectively.

Of course, say may say Trump was lying and gaslighting.
We don't advocate manipulation here outside of a "strictly needed basis" and always prefer a honorable man approach.

Julien Blanc could have done something similar.
A stronger response in that position would have reframed intent, rejected extreme characterizations, and emphasized context without accepting the attacker's moral framing.

#3. Counterattack: Highlight Moral Police Hypocrisy

As Robert Greene suggests, hypocrisy is a powerful weapon in moral battles.

Whenever you can point out their hypocrisy, you're halfway through winning.

See how Trump goes for it against Hillary Clinton:

Note: Trump's move was not the most effective here, but it did help in removing a lot of heat from himself and opening a new front on Hillary's side.

#4. Remove Their Power: Agree

Moral police gather power only by virtue of their opponents.

Keep that in mind because that's crucial to understand the power dynamics of shame attacks.
The moral police only exist thanks to its opponent and only draw power because of its opponent.

Basically, their power is correlated to how bad they can make you out to be. The bigger the villain you are, the bigger they win.

On the other hand, the more virtuous you can make yourself out to be, the less power you have.

What you will do then is you will avoid entrenching yourself behind positions that are objectively too hard to defend.

What you will do instead is you will agree with some of their most agreeable positions and build bridges that show you're a sensible man.
Appeals to love, unity, and togetherness always work.

Julien could have done the same by going deeper into the wedding stories he mentioned and then adding something like:

> You in Julien's Place: Absolutely many guys meet their partners for life with our seminars. And I'm so happy for them.
> My job at the end of the day is about helping people find love, and that's what makes my work so meaningful to me

Look how Trump does it again with Hillary Clinton:

Clinton paints a picture of "togetherness" by trying to paint Trump as a divisive dark horse. And what does Trump do? He agrees

#5. Prove The MPs Wrong

If you're going into a protracted war, even better than words, is using actions.

When Hillary tried to nickname Trump "dark" he did the opposite, defending the rights of middle America and showing up around poor minorities.

Do the same. When the moral police try to paint you as X, you do Y.

#6. Reject Their Frame

When accusations are framed to trap you, do not accept the premise blindly.

When the moral police won't be able to attack you head-on, they will try sneaky maneuvers to catch you off guard and then spin their web around you.

If the interviewers is biased and out to frame you, then it's 'no first, and clarify later'.
Or say that "it depends", or tell them to be clearer before you commit to any answer.
This is the technique Jordan Peterson used against Newman:

Jordan Peterson's denying strategy never allowed Newman to gain a single small foothold from which to launch her moral policing campaign

#7. Extol Your Virtues (Broken Record Technique)

Moral police will keep trying to make a villain out of you.

The problem with that?

That if you let them play their game while remaining mostly silent, you do become a villain.

After neutralizing the attack, reinforce the broader identity and values you stand for. Public conflicts are battles over narrative identity, not just facts.

Repetition shapes perception. In public conflicts, the side that consistently reinforces its narrative often defines how events are remembered.

Case study from Trump:

When they attack you and you extol your virtue it becomes your word against theirs. If you did a good job of denying them authority, this technique will give you the edge.

SUMMARY

Julien Blanc had a close encounter with moral police in that CNN interview.

Because the RSD scandal blew out of proportion, that wasn't an easy chair to sit on, so no judging here.

This article highlights some pitfalls you should avoid and gave you the basics on how to act when someone is using moral superiority.

Stay strong, and never let the moral police push you around.

About The Author: John Maxwell is an American pastor, keynote speaker, leadership expert, and best-selling author.
He is also the author of "21 Irrefutable Rules of Leadership", "Sometimes You Win, Sometimes You Learn" and "12 Invaluable Laws of Growth".

Introduction

Don't fool yourself:

Changing your thinking will be neither automatic nor easy.
But it can be done if you apply yourself.
And it will be very worth it.

6 Basic Rules to Change Your Mindset

Here are 6 ways to change your thinking for the positive:

- Expose yourself to good input
- Be around good thinkers
- Only spend mental cycles on positive thoughts
- Act on those positive thoughts
- Schedule out time for thinking
- Repeat the process

Also, read:

- How to develop a growth mindset
- The antifragile ego (the most important mindset of self-empowerment).

1. Focused Thinking

Successful people have very clear targets.

A very clear target allows you to get highly relevant feedback in a short period of time, which, in turn, will allow you to take strides toward your goal.

2. Possibility Thinking

Winners have a can-do attitude.
They believe in possibilities and believe there's a way to achieve anything.

3. Creative Thinking

Creative thinking is the ability to make connections and associations in a way that the final product is different than the sum of all the inputs.

Does it make sense?

Basically, Maxwell is saying that creative thinking is about combining different ideas and inputs to reach a conclusion that is different from every single input taken by itself.

I especially liked the concept that creative thinking has a relation with "screwball thinking".
"Screwball thinking" means that to think creatively, you need to tolerate some craziness.

4. Realistic Thinking

Leaders must be grounded in reality and take into account best-case scenarios, worst-case scenarios, and likelihoods.

5. Strategic Thinking

Strategic thinking requires that you put your ideas and solutions into a bigger plan.

Basically, thinking about contingencies and how to actually make it happen.

6. Reflective Thinking

Reflective thinking takes time to ponder things.

Block out time and only dedicate it to thinking over your ideas.

7. Question Popular Thinking

Popular thinking is the most widely held view that most share.

But sometimes you need to escape and distance yourself from widely held views if you want to disrupt and come up with something groundbreaking.

8. Unselfish Thinking

Givers are the happiest people in the world.

If you want to improve yourself and the world, adopt unselfish thinking and learn to be a giver.

9. Bottom Line Thinking

Bottom line doesn't necessarily mean thinking in dollar terms.

But it means knowing what you're after so that you can filter out your decision based on what you really want.

10. Big Picture Thinking

Successful people look deep.

But they don't get lost at the tree level: they look at the whole forest.

Review

If you're into self-development you probably won't have many "wow" moments as a lot of the material will not be new for you.

But that is not to say that the message is any less valid of course.
The principles Maxwell shares in "How Successful People Think" are true and timeless.
And they can always serve as a reminder.

I did prefer however some other work from Maxwell, including "The 21 Irrefutable Laws of Leadership".

Pitch Anything Summary

About The Author: Oren Klaff is an investment banker and consultant with lots of experience in helping businesses and entrepreneurs raise money.

1. The "STRONG" Method

Oren Klaff introduces his method via the acronym STRONG, meaning:

- Set the frame
- Tell the story
- Reveal the intrigue
- Offer the prize
- Nail the hook point
- Get a decision

2. Set the Frame

The author goes into detail on what a frame is.

As the author of a website on social skills and power dynamics, I can tell you frame is basically an umbrella word for who's got the power in the interaction.

You could say that most articles you read here are about frames. And the main idea Ofer wants to convey is that when you pitch investors, you want to do it from a position of strength.

That means: make yourself the prize, and they the commodity (money is a commodity after all).

Don't Over-Explain or You Lose The Frame

In every interaction, there's one party who has the stronger frame, and the stronger frame ends up absorbing the weaker frames and controlling the social interactions.

And usually, the author righteously says, when you find yourself in the position to respond (ineffectively) to what the other is saying, you have the weaker frame.

And when you need to explain your authority, you rarely hold the stronger frame.

How to Seize The Frame (& The Money)

Oren says that defiance and humor are the keys to seizing the frame.

It's key not to be confrontational because otherwise you will trigger their flight or fight response, and you don't want that.

The moment you can be defiant without being abrasive, that's when they understand they're dealing with a pro.

Ofer recommends you approach with a "playful" mindset. Imagine it's a game that you are enjoying.

The Time Power Frame

When I read this part I couldn't help but think: this book is basically The Power Moves for entrepreneurs!

Oren describes a typical situation in which a salesperson loses power with a customer:

> Customer: "hey, I only have 5 minutes, but come in"
> You: "Thank you for your time, I appreciate you finding a few minutes"

And right there and then, you handed him all the power.

Now he's the guy feeding you crumbs and you're kissing up to him, happy for receiving scraps.
Here's instead a way for getting more power in that exact situation:

> Customer: "hey, I only have 5 minutes, but come in"
> You: "Sorry I don't work like that, we can't reschedule unless I know we can work well together. I need to know if you're the kind of person who can keep appointments"
> Customer: "yes you're right, sorry, come in"

When you break his controlling frame like that, he will respect you more and listen to you properly.

Similarly, if they send in a subordinate saying that the big shot can't make it, don't try to pitch the subordinate. Tell him you can give Mr. Bigshot 15 minutes to be there or you can call it a day.

And of course, the oldest trick of them all is making you wait.
Read:

- What to do when someone makes you wait

Defending The Frame

When investors or potential buyers are drilling you down on financials, they are reinforcing their power frame.

They are the choosers.

Instead, Oren suggests that you quickly answer the financial parts, but then revert back to the relationship question.

Because your frame must be:

- Are we a good fit to work together? This is what you want to find out

See?
With that frame, you become the chooser!
So here's how Oren suggests you present the pitch:

> Revenue is X, expenses are Y, the net is Z.
> The numbers and details you can verify later and take all the time you need.
> But first I want to find out if we are a good fit to work together.
> This is what I came here to do.

Defending The Frame II

Ofer recommends that if they want to change the agenda, the time you've scheduled, or the people who will attend, you should refuse and withdraw.

My Note:
I could partially agree with the time. Albeit I wouldn't cancel but simply make it a bit harder for them to reschedule. I don't personally see any issue though with changing the people who attend.
If you want money because you believe in your project you shouldn't get hung up on the details of the attendees.

The Intrigue Frame

When investors meet you, it's because there's something in your product or presentation that piqued their interest.

You know something they don't, and that gives you power.

During the presentation, they will be asking themselves if they have seen it before and fully understand it, and the moment they realize they do, you lose a lot of power and they lose their interest.

What's the answer then? Don't let them feel they understand it at all!

3. Be The One With Highest Status

Status closely interrelates with frames.

The person with the highest status is most likely to hold the most powerful frame.

Here are the key steps to keep a higher status:

1. Ignore their power rituals (and avoid following)
2. Don't let his global status affect you (only focus on the situational status)
3. Look for a small acts of denial and defiance to increase your status
4. Once you have enough power move to your domain of expertise
5. Position yourself as the prize to be won over
6. Find a way to let them qualify to you and confirm your higher status

See a few of my articles with clear examples of power relations:

- Putin & Obama's power plays

- Macron VS Trump: a failure to Influence
- How Trump won the debate

4. Pitch Anything Framework: Less Than 20 Minutes

Ofer says your pitch shouldn't be longer than 20 minutes.

After 20 minutes people disconnect and start forgetting what they've already learned.
Here are the steps for an effective pitch:

4.1. Pitch Overview

First of all, reassure them it will be brief. 20 minutes only, a few questions, and then you gotta go.

It puts them at ease, raises your status, and increases their focus.

4.2. Introduce Yourself

5 minutes, a key few facts about you and your major accomplishments.

4.3. The Big Idea: Intro

- Who is it for
- Why your target customers can't find something similar
- How does your product change that (solution-based features)
- How your product differs from anything else

It's important that you show how your idea is not coming out of a lone genius mind, but it's the natural evolution of market forces and demand.

Do name competitors: it shows you are grounded in business reality.
And add some time pressure: this is the moment to strike before those competitors wake up.

4.4. Budget & Secret Sauce

Every investor know you will be conservative about your expenses and overly optimistic in your growth predictions.

Don't dwell too much on growth, but show you're good at budgeting: that's a rare and prized skill.

And then introduce what you do better than anyone else, that something that gives you an edge over the competition and will allow you to keep market share even when competitors jump in.

And last but not least: make sure they understand one of the biggest assets on the table is you.

5.5 Offer The Deal

Tell them what they will get when they will do business with you.

I particularly liked the idea of push and pull.
Ofer says that when you only pull (hard sell) people will get suspicious.
You should float the idea of not giving them the deal (taking it away) and then giving it back to them.

For example:

> It might not work out between us (push). But then again, if it does, we could really do something great together.

5. Use Hot Cognitions

Hot cognition happens when you decide you like something even before you fully understand it.

And that's what usually happens: we don't make decisions with rational cognitive processes but with emotional ones.

And then we use the data to justify those decisions.

The overarching ideas are that:

- Emotions and feelings are key
- Complex abstract concepts need to be processed by the neocortex
- But people would rather avoid using the neocortex

Ofer revisits some of the hot cognition points that will help you get to the final decisions via the lizard brain and bypass the neocortex. Some of them:

Prize Hot Cognition

This is the mindset:

You have one of the best deals available, but you are choosy as to who you work with.

Yes, you might work with them, but you need to know more: let them tell you about themselves.

Time Pressure Hot Cognition

Ofer explains there's a scarcity hot button in our brain (also read Influence by Cialdini).
And your pitch should make that button itch by putting some time pressure on the deal.

6. Eradicate Neediness

I was surprised to see Ofer introduce Taoism here, but it does fit very well.

Basically, he says that neediness is a huge deal killer.

The more you can reach a mindset that you want nothing from others, the easier business deals will get.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Don't let them solve the puzzle!
When you're pitching don't make your product too simple to grasp too soon or they will lose attention. Keep something that will keep them on edge throughout the whole presentation.

Pitch to the lizard brain
Don't unload all the numbers right away: structure your pitch to appeal to emotions.

Don't get skewered!
Don't let them drill you down on the details and financials or they get all the power. Remember your frame: you're there to assess them.

CON

Too hung up on being the one with power

If you've been too needy or accommodating all your life, you need to focus on power dynamics.

But at the same time, unless you have become very good at it, people who appear to be hung up on power come across as dickheads.

"Pitch Anything" sometimes feels like it's too much about power struggles.

And while that is very important, you should also learn to influence and persuade when you're not the most powerful person in the room (and you don't always need to be to get that money).

Review

In "Pitch Anything" Ofer mixes psychology, a good Machiavellian understanding of social dynamics, and a long experience in deal negotiation.

In my opinion, this method might come across as too hellbent on “getting the power”.
On this website, we would say that “it’s power taking” and “no power-protecting enough”. In simpler words, that can piss people off and harm you.

However, there is also plenty of gold if you know how to use this information more smoothly.
I see a lot of overlap between Pitch Anything and this website.

So, overall, I enjoyed “Pitch Anything” and I couldn’t recommend it more.

The Feminist Lie: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 3 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Bullet Summary

- There's no male patriarchy
- Women have an advantage in today's society, not a disadvantage
- Men should be careful with the legal system (divorce, fake rape) as it's skewed to favor women

The Feminist Lie – Summary

About The Author: Bob Lewis is a pseudonym. As far as I know, the real author's identity is not known.
Albeit I would have preferred a real name, I don't see any particular issue with that.

Types of Feminism

The author says there are two main types of feminism.

One is about females' choices, and the other one overlaps with Marxist ideology puts the group first, and says that feminists cannot be oppressors.

But both of them believe in an invisible system of oppression against women that they call "patriarchy".

The Lie of Patriarchy and Male Privilege

The author has a quick excursus of world history, pointing out several successful and powerful women.

A point, he says, which should deny there ever was a patriarchy.

My note:

Albeit I'm not a big believer in patriarchy, circumstantial evidence is no definite proof of anything. This is an inductive reasoning fallacy, also read Fooled by Randomness.

The author says men are enjoying no privilege.
For example, most men are homeless, but it's women who disproportionately are welcomed into shelters.

Feminism Is Responsible for Fatherless Families

Bob Lewis says that feminism is somewhat directly responsible for the rise in crime.

Why?

Because feminism leads to more divorces. And children growing up without a father are more likely to veer into an unlawful life.

I agree that it's best for children to have both parents, but I'm not fully convinced that feminism is directly responsible for the higher incidence of divorces.
Sure, bitter women who hate men are less likely to make for happier marriages which in turn makes it more likely that marriages will end. But is it feminism's fault or is it just that some women are naturally difficult to live with, feminism or non-feminism?
Maybe there's a relationship between feminism's adoption and broken marriages, but I wouldn't feel like endorsing the idea that feminism is a (major) contributor to the rise of crime.

The author also says that the feminists' war on marriage is also leading more men to suicide, and he cites a few interesting stories here that do make sense.

For example, those fathers couldn't get to see the children nearly as much and were forced to pay for alimony checks that they couldn't afford.

However, I'd have to wonder again if it's feminism's fault or if it's just the system that needs to be addressed, feminism or not.

The Wage Gap Is A Lie

The author says there cannot be any wage gap, at least in the US, as that's been coded into law many decades ago.

He says that the law allows for differences in wages to cover any single factor excluding gender. But including output.

So you can have the same job title but different work output. And he says women complaining about wage differences should first focus on deserving to be paid more.

The Fake Rape Pandemic

The author says there's a fake pandemic across the US and across colleges' campuses.

He uses numbers to back his claims and cites many stories.

With the due premise that fake is a terrible crime and must be properly investigated, I had to agree with the author.

His numbers were credible and the system does seem skewed to make it too easy for women who want to abuse it (for example, to get back at someone).

Domestic Violence Lie

When there's violence from one single partner at home, it's more likely to be originating from women (read the study here).

That could make sense if you take into account that women can be more emotional and more likely to overreact. However, the author deals with the incidence but does not take into account the intensity of the violence, and the study shows men are more likely to inflict injury.

This is the first question that popped into my mind as I read the book: a slap or a push in a moment of heightened emotion could not be compared to years of punches.

In a nutshell, it was very interesting data the author presents.
It does call into question the widespread idea that men are far and wide the perpetrators of domestic violence.

The author's data is confirmed by other research I have read as well. For example, you can check Baumeister's work "Evil".

Women Enjoy More Privileges Than Men

The author dedicates a whole chapter to what are female privileges.

For example, in case of divorce, the woman gets a huge slice of the household wealth even though it was mostly wealth created by him.

The woman can also single-handedly decide on whether to keep or not keep a baby and the man has no say in it. But the man will be forced to pay.

He will be forced to pay.
Including, the author recounts, some jaw-dropping cases such as when the woman committed statutory rape or when she surreptitiously used his semen without his knowledge.

Feminism Harms Women

I couldn't agree more with the idea that feminism, in many cases, is harming women.

Both in making some women way too bitter and in harming them at dating.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Watch out who you marry
For all the men out there, watch you who and how you marry. You can be stuck paying big.

Watch out for fake rape accusations

I have sometimes been afraid of this. Some of the stories of men accused of fake rape are terrifying and it can be way too easy to make up a case.
I won't go into details here, but I'll make one full article going forward.

CONS

The bias left me wondering

The topics are extremely interesting and the author does use many statistics and studies to back his claims.

At the same time, he seems rather one-sided.

That doesn't mean his points aren't valid, they are, but I always felt I couldn't let myself go and fully absorb knowledge. I was constantly feeling like I needed to double-check to avoid one-party bias.

For a deeper criticism of red pill and Manosphere authors, check out:

- The Rational Male criticism
- Toxic masculinity mindsets you must drop

The Feminist Lie Review

The Feminist Lie has some similar content to the female's authored Men on Strike, albeit it's more aggressive and, in my opinion, darker and more polemical.

And those are the two parts I have the most grievances with.
Albeit I don't have any sympathy for men-hating feminists, I prefer a conciliatory approach.

An approach that, at the end of the day, shows that the genders are not antithetic but are better together. That's, in my opinion, the only winning approach.

That being said, the book has tons of great data and it will get you thinking big time.

Awaken the Giant Within

[image]by Tony Robbins
Summary | Audiobook | Kindle | Print

Could anyone draft a top 10 of the best self-help books and not have Tony Robbins featured in it? My personal favorite from Robbins is an audio product called Personal Power II.

But Awaken the Giant Within is the book overview of most that Robbins preaches. It's equally inspiring and motivational as it is practical and applicable.
No small feat.

> Quote: "People are rewarded in public for what they practice in private"

Mindset: Psychology of Success

[image]by Carol Dweck
Summary | Print

Why is Mindset the N.1 of our best self-help books reading list? It's because a growth mindset underpins the success of the highest kind, including wealth, relationships, and happiness.

It's the bedrock of living fully. Putting our egos aside, relishing new experiences, and being openly vulnerable… They are all key consequences of a growth mindset (also read developing a growth mindset).

Mindset opened my eyes not only to key mental roadblocks standing in my way but also helped me better understand human psychology.
With Mindset, suddenly, human behavior made so much more sense.

> Quote: "Talent isn't passed in the genes; it's passed in the mindsets"

The Millionaire Fastlane

by Mj DeMarco
Summary | Audiobook[image] | Kindle

Two things really got me about this book:

1. The paradox of practice: if authors selling get-rich products got rich selling to you, are they credible? Probably not…

2. Slow lane wake-up call: employees, duped by the compound interest myth, trade invaluable time today for distant (and uncertain) riches.

And the fast lane..? You'll have to read the book.

> Quote: "Dump the damn job. The job sucks"

The Obstacle is the Way

[image][image]by Ryan Holiday
Summary | Audiobook | Kindle | Print

Ryan Holidays draws on stoicism and Meditation by Marcus Aurelius to deliver a breathtaking treaty on how to approach -and turn around- life's obstacles.

It's an inspiring and mind-blowing read that can change your approach to life's problems. A real gem.

I have yet to read Meditation, but I consider The Obstacle is The Way the ultimate treaty on problem-solving.

> Quote: "When you've truly done it all, relax. The final word is in the lap of the Gods.

Spontaneous Girls Are Lying: It's Just A Dating Mind Game

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It will not take long before you meet a woman who defines herself as "a spontaneous woman".

Often you will see the "spontaneous girl game" when it comes to dating.
Oh yes, because that is a dating game.

So much so and so widespread indeed that we can even give it its own name: the "spontaneous girl game".

This article shows you what this psychological game is all about and how you can deal with it.

An Example of "Spontaneous Girl" Dating

> "I like being spontaneous"

How many times have you heard that sentence from people you're trying to schedule something with?

I was having a couple of beers with the guys yesterday evening, making a pleasant exception to my work schedule and diet regimen.
As we drank and chatted, I asked Mark about Anna, a common acquaintance of ours.

Mark likes Anna, but they're friends, so it wasn't a typical case of setting the date.
But don't get fooled: the dynamics are the same whether it's friendship or dating.
Dating just happens to be more common and more extreme.

Mark asked Anna for a couple of possible dates when she was free and she replied, you guessed it, that "she prefers being spontaneous". Mark then did a common mistake guys do: taking her words at face value.

So he pinged her a couple of times "spontaneously" and, since this was friendship, he was finally able to find a time.

He changed his schedule for Anna, dropped a couple of friends to have some more 1:1 time, and then… Then 30 minutes before the "spontaneous date"… She spontaneously canceled.

That was the moment when I knew I had to rush out an article on "spontaneous dating".
So let's begin this spontaneous dating article:

What Spontaneous Really Means

When someone replies to you they like being spontaneous, don't read it at face value, but translate it in your head with one of the following:

#1. I'm not sure about you...

> I'm stalling you for a while as I make up my mind

Be advised that "for a while" often ends up being "forever".

#2. I'm not sure about my life

> I'm not good at reaching decisions. Postponing is my way of deciding.

Spontaneity, on those rare occasions, when it's actually true, communicates a lack of priorities and a clear vision for one's life.

Because, guess what, people with clear goals know what to say yes and no to and they don't let chance and "spontaneity" get in the way of their goals.

#4. I'm politely brushing you off

> I have difficulties saying no to people. And you're so cute I'm afraid you might get hurt. So I give you a future maybe.

Some people have a hard time saying no.

It can be too-nice girls, too-nice guys, or even people with passive-aggressive personalities.
And they rather deflect the date than say no right away.

#4. I'm keeping you in the backburner

> You're not my top priority, but I'm keeping you as an option. Maybe you'll propose to take me shopping. I'd say yes to that?

This is the so called "friend zone".
Of course, even if you two are just friends, you still want a relationship of equals, so you shouldn't be OK with her dictating the tempo 100%.

Also read:

- Friends, lovers and providers

#5. You should chase me: make it easy for me

> I'm not gonna block any time for you. Try to ping me and if I'm cool with it and I don't have my period… I might consider you.

Be advised that the more times you ping and the more NOs you get, the more she'll never be free (here's an article on turning around no ladders).

#6. Do more to prove yourself to me

> I'm not yet fully open to you but start by jumping through my hoops a bit more first. And if I'm entertained enough I might consider it.

And here's a rule of thumb: the more you jump through people's hoops, the less they respect you.

#7. I'm top dog

"I like being spontaneous" most of the times is an unconscious power move.
But conscious or unconscious, the effects are the same.

The party who likes being spontaneous is the party with more power. And the party who accepts it is also accepting the subordinate role in the relationship.

After all, think about, who do people want to be spontaneous with?

Who Are Women Spontaneous With?

If you think about it, who do women -or people in general for that matter- usually give the "spontaneous woman" line to?

- Bosses? No

I bet you those spontaneous people don't show up late at work saying they like being spontaneous.

Even with terrible bosses, if they care about keeping their jobs, they would at least take care of coming up with a more credible excuse.

- People who can't wait? Nope..

If our spontaneous friends are flying on vacation somewhere, they probably don't show up one hour late at the counter telling them they spontaneously wanted to enjoy a wine before checking in.

- Boyfriends? Neither these guys..

And if they have a boyfriend they like they probably don't tell their boyfriends they want to be spontaneous when he's organizing a meal together.

As silly as the top 2 might sound, what do all these scenarios have in common?

- Bosses have power over them
- Planes don't wait for them
- They want to meet their boyfriends (in a healthy relationship, at least)

This Is Who Women Are Spontaneous With

In short, this is who women (and men as well) pull the spontaneity card with:

- People who have little power over them
- People who will wait for them
- People they are not yet sure are important enough in their life

Not sure however doens't necessarily mean "no".
So here comes the juiciest part of this article:

Wrong Ways of Dealing With Spontaneity

Here are the most common bad ways of dealing with the “I like being spontaneous” line:

- Accepting it at face value

And chasing after her schedule.

- That’s cool, I like spontaneous

Notice there’s a slight jab in “I like being spontaneous”. And that’s that she’s free and rebellious, and you’re a bit of square.

When you say you like her for that, your are rewarding her for impolite behavior, which is the opposite of what you should do.

- Me too!

When you say “me too”, you’re doing a U-turn: you’re dropping your scheduling ways and conforming to her free-flowing standards.

And of course, women will like you when you make them U-turn, not when they make you change opinions.

Dealing With “I Like Being Spontaneous”

You deal with “I like being spontaneous” by refusing to accept it.
Three ways:

1. You say yes and never contact her again
2. You leave it up to her
3. You force a decision

#1. Say Yes & Move On

In the first case, you accept that either you’re not top priority for her, or that she’s a time waster, low quality woman and you move on.

#2. Leave It Up to Her

If it’s a friend and you want to stay in touch, I think leaving it up to her (or him) might be the best way to go.
You simply tell your friend:

> You: Hey, I understand that you’re busy and it’s difficult to plan in advance. Tell you what, if you want to meet up, ping me when you’re good to go and we’ll see if we can set it up

This option tells your friend that you are not going to accept any subordinate role.

You expect her to do what both parties are expected to do in a healthy relationship: chip in and contribute. So since she’s the party who can’t make plans, it’s also her who must come up with spontaneous ideas (and not you pinging her).

If it’s a dating scenario, I like the third option best:

#3. Forcing a Decision

I like forcing a decision as you can never be sure who you can move to yes until, well, until you actually push for a final decision.

To force a decision, you reject the spontaneous gambit and pin her to an exact date (or to a no thanks).

Here's a great way to do it:

> You: Oh I totally get you.
> I used to love being spontaneous too!
> Now I'm a bit too busy for spontaneity though and I'm afraid it might never happen if we don't plan (and… That could be a pity).
> What do you say we set a date instead

I love this one.

It starts by relating to her and pretending you're going along.

Then it delivers the punch (counter-power move) to re-establish balance in the relationship. That's when you're basically telling her she must not have much going on to be spontaneous. But you do have much going on and can't afford spontaneity.

And then it rebuilds her value a bit to avoid ending on a combative tone, which is the part when you say "I'm afraid it might never happen".
And ends on a conciliatory tone making it a collaborative effort when you end by asking her to weigh in.

Deliver this line and chances are you'll get a yes.

Example of Effective "Spontaneous Girl Handling"

And here's is a successful real life texting example:

Note: in text keep it short and not too stern: it's easy coming across the wrong way in text (this is an excerpt of my texting guideline from texts to dates).
Also read a case study on handling flaky girls.

Summary

In this article, we saw that “I like being spontaneous” is often either a brush off or a game to put you in the subordinate role in the relationship.

To avoid it, you must not ping her spontaneously but must put the ball in her court or force her into a decision.

Best of all, if you deliver it with a counter-power move saying you’re too busy for spontaneity… But you’d like to see her. So she better let you know her schedule.

Best Communication Skills Books

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It's difficult to learn communication skills only from a book.
But it's also difficult to learn the practice only, without any theory.

The best way, which is also the way that worked best for me, is to mix quality theory with practice.
For the theory part, these are the 9 best communication skills books you can find.

Just let me be precise here.
Most lists of communication skills books that I have seen online actually include books on general social skills.

But I like being precise.
So I have a different list of social skills books while this list is strictly focused on verbal communication.

So without further ado, here's the list:

Contents

- 11. Soulmate Sequence
- 10. Speaking Pro
- 9. Crucial Conversations
- 8. Verbal Judo
- 7. Eliminating Passive-Aggressiveness
- 6. How to Win Friends and Influence People
- 5. Difficult Conversations
- 4. The Power of a Positive No
- 3. People Skills
- 2. The Gervais Principle
- 1. Power University
- Final Words
  - Also, read:

11. Soulmate Sequence

By R La Ruina
Summary | Amazon

Richard La Ruina is a skilled analyst of social dynamics, and Soulmate Sequence contains some truly high-quality examples of smooth and flowing conversation.

> Quote: "The key to all success in all social interactions, as I'm sure you've noticed, comes back to making other human beings feel good"

10. Speaking Pro

By R Love
Summary | Get Speaking Pro

Communication isn't just 1:1 communication.

As a matter of fact, if you want to kick it up to the next level, you must learn how to communicate to several people at a time, either while delivering a speech, or a presentation, or while talking to a room of people at your daily meetings.

This is also a skill that will help you greatly advance your career.

> Quote: "Connect with anyone. Never assume that anyone in the room doesn't have influence"

9. Crucial Conversations

[image]

by Patterson, Grenny, McMillan, Switzler
Summary | Kindle | Print | Audiobook

Crucial Conversations is one of the most popular titles in our best communication skills books list.

Among the biggest takeaways:

1. Make it Safe: people hold back out of fear. That's why you must create an environment where people feel safe to speak and cared for;
2. Fill the Pool: I loved the image of "the pool", or the shared space of meaning between speakers. The more you fill it, the more successful the conversation will be.

Do get ready for high-stakes conversation, because paradoxically when it matters the most is also when we're most likely to perform the poorest.

> Quote: "When it matters the most it's when people are most likely to avoid or get emotionally. Both major screw up "

8. Verbal Judo

[image]
by George Thompson, Jerry Jenkins
Summary | Kindle | Print

Thompson says that as long as you can manage to never take things personally, you'll hardly need any verbal judo.

But even if you can manage that, I still think Verbal Judo will help you become a better communicator.

Here's something I loved: start with the negative. When you give feedback, start with the negative first, then end on a positive note.

With informal prose and plenty of examples, including straight from the streets (Thompson is a police trainer), Verbal Judo is worth its communication skills weight in gold.

> Quote: "Say what you want. As long as you do as I say"

7. Eliminating Passive-Aggressiveness

by Andrea Brandt
Summary | Kindle | Print | Audiobook

Unluckily I couldn't find statistics on how many people are passive-aggressive.

And that's probably because every one of us, at times, resorts to passive-aggressive communication.
This is exactly the reason why Andrea Brandt makes it into the top 5 of our best communication skills books: you will communicate with passive-aggressive people. And Brandt teaches you exactly how to recognize and how to deal with it.

It's a great book with top advice and a choke-full of super helpful examples.
A real eye-opener in the communication genre.

> Quote: "If you're not assertive and if you're bottling up anger, then you're passive aggressive"

6. How to Win Friends and Influence People

[image]

by Dale Carnegie
Summary | Print | Audiobook

Could anyone compile a reading list of best communication skills books without Dale Carnegie in it?

I didn't think so either.

How to Win Friends might not be for you if you need more assertiveness since it's all about finessing and making others feel good.

But I can hardly think of anyone who cannot stand to gain by applying the timeless principles of this huge classic.

> Quote: "To be interesting, be interested "

5. Difficult Conversations

by Douglas Stone, Patton, Heen
Summary | Kindle | Print

Difficult Conversations has been the very first communication skills book I've read.

And every page I turned I only grew more and more excited realizing I had a wisdom-bomb in my hands.

Difficult Conversations dissects conversations at the three most important levels: what happened, feeling, and identity.
Difficult conversations are difficult because they are heavy emotions and, sometimes, can reach us at the core of who we are (identity, also read antifragile ego).

> Quote: "Humans feel binary when conversations touch identities: either great & lovable or terrible & unworthy "

4. The Power of a Positive No

By William Ury
Summary | Kindle |Audiobook

In between a book on how to become more assertive communicators and defend our boundaries and a top-tier communication skills book on how to better engage with people in our lives.

And in both realms, William Ury does a wonderful job.
It's definitely one of my favorite communication skills books.

> Quote: "Even in the face of the other's provocations, keep showing respect, remembering that you give respect not because of who they are but rather because of who you are"

3. People Skills

By Robert Bolton
Summary | Kindle

It's called "People Skills", but it's all about communication. To be precise, assertive communication.

It was previously in the first spot on this "best communication skills book" because most people need some help in striking that balance between the passive communication style and aggression.
And People Skills is one of the best I have read when it comes to assertive communication.

However, it lacks both the strategic need for social effectiveness because assertive communication is NOT always the best approach, and it lacks the darker side -hence "The Gervais Principle" and "Power University" leapfrogged it-.

Still, a great book on communication skills, and also includes good psychology and real-life examples.

> Quote: "Listening and assertion are the yin and yang of communication"

2. The Gervais Principle

By Venkatesh Rao

Summary

It's crazy how few resources truly cover either the power element or the darker side of human nature -let alone both of them-.

As if humans' darker side didn't even exist, as if one could simply be honest, straight, and direct and everything would go well.

Obviously, it doesn't work like that.

And communication skills books are no exceptions: many of them write with the "ideal human being" in mind, who is not going to play games, who is not going to take offense and become a frenemy, and who is not going to use your honesty against you.

That makes a good chunk of communication skills books part of what we call here "naive self-help".

The naive self-help also fails with more honest characters, because if you care at all about advancing, you need awareness of the power dynamics.

That's what Rao correctly says in "The Gervais Principle": if you try to learn the techniques and words of "proper" communication without acquiring the power skills that allow you to understand the dynamics, deliver the words properly, and handle infinite possible directions the communication take, you'll only sound like a bigger fool.

So for proper communication, you NEED power awareness.

The only downside of The Gervais Principle is that it only addresses the power and "darker" component of human socialization.
But since almost no other resource does that, even the single chapter in this wonderful book that addresses communication is enough to put it near the top of this list.

> Quote: "In Powertalk, you play with money (the currency is most often reality-information). In the other languages you are playing with no stakes."

1. Power University

By Lucio Buffalmano & TPM Community
Overview

Power University is “communication for the real world”.

It teaches you how to win and establish win-win, to set up and maintain positive, value-adding, and fulfilling relationships with anyone -colleagues, spouses, friends relatives, etc.-.

And it does so with examples and case studies so you can watch and hear how to deliver the lines.

The strategies and techniques for good communication, frame control, and persuasion are also based on the reality that people may have divergent interests, may dislike you, maybe enemies or frenemies -or dangerously become so-, or maybe inveterate manipulators.

Final Words

If you’re starting out, you can’t go wrong with any of these verbal communication skills books.

Finish reading a couple of these, apply the teachings, and watch your communication skills go to the next level.

Then, once you get the basics down, and maybe even start realizing the limitations of the more popular but naive approaches, you can step up to a TPM course.

One only thing left to do: subscribe and get updated when a new entry will crack into the must-read list.

The 15 Invaluable Laws of Growth: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The 15 Invaluable Laws of Growth lists John Maxwell's rules to keep growing and improving.

Bullet Summary

- Your character is the foundation of everything: work on that first
- Don't worry about plateauing or reaching your goals: there's never a real stop to growth
- And don't make it just about you. The quintessential growth is making others grow

Full Summary

About The Author: John Maxwell is an American pastor, public speaker, and best-selling author of books on leadership and personal development.
He is also the author of "21 Irrefutable Rules of Leadership", "Sometimes You Win, Sometimes You Learn" and "How Successful People Think".

The following are the 15 Invaluable Laws of Growth:

1. The Law of Intentionality

You don't just grow "accidentally", you must be intentional and deliberate about it.

2. The Law of Awareness

You cannot improve if you don't know yourself: where you stand and where you need to work the most.

The law of awareness says that the more you know yourself, the more you can grow.

3. The Law of the Mirror

To effectively work on yourself, you must first believe you are worth the effort.
That means getting rid of limiting self-beliefs and developing high self-esteem.

Similar to what Don Ruiz says in The Four Agreements, Maxwell proposes that you only use yourself as a paragon. Don't compare yourself to others.

4. The Law of Reflection

Do take and schedule time to reflect on yourself, your lessons learned, and your next steps.

5. The Law of Consistency

What will really make you grow in the long run is consistency.

Start small.
The author says most people don't even show up and it's very easy to beat them. Start there, by showing up: that's your 80%.

On the science of developing good habits also read The Power of Habits.
For more on grit and consistency also read Grit by Angela Duckworth and The Compound Effect.

> Motivation makes you start. Discipline keeps you going and growing

6. The Law of Environment

The people and the environment around you are major contributors (or detractors) to your growth.

Make sure the people and the environment around you are not pulling you down but helping you up.

7. The Law of Design

You must look at self-growth seriously. Look at it as a mission and design your plans to make it happen.

No plans are planning to fail.
Or as Jim Rohn said:

> No plans means falling into someone else's plan. And do you know what they've planned for you?
> Not much…

8. The Law of Pain

No pain, no gain.

Maxwell says that it's good management of bad experiences that lead to the biggest growth.
As Ray Dalio said: pain + reflection = growth.

9. The Law of the Ladder

I found the law of the ladder to possibly be the deepest in The 15 Laws of Growth.

Basically, it says that everything you built rests on the foundations of your character -who you are-.
If you go very high without a solid personal character, you're on shakier and shakier foundations.

> Achievement is not something you do, it's who you are

And especially touching was Solzhenitsyn's story.
Imprisoned for having to be critical of Stalin, he blesses his prison experience.
He says the objective of life is not to prosper as he had been brought up to believe but to mature and grow one's soul.

Beautiful!

10. The Law of the Rubber Band

If you're not stretching yourself, you aren't growing.
Look for change, look for growth opportunities.
Always keep the growing tension in your life, never let your rubber go soft :).

11. The Law of the Trade-Offs

To achieve your full potential you must be willing to sacrifice something.
Be it time in front of the TV set, your videogame playing hobbies or maybe working on something during holidays.

This is also similar to the law of sacrifice in Maxwell other fantastic book 21 Irrefutable Laws of Leadership.

My note:
I wouldn't look at this law as sacrificing. I would actually encourage you to look at "sacrifices" as welcome opportunities to test and temper your character.
You can't drink cola anymore? Great! That's no sacrifice. That's great for your body and it will strengthen your character.

12. The Law of Curiosity

Growth is fueled by questions and curiosity.
To keep growing, you need to be thirsty about knowing more and more.

As the saying goes:

> Those who know how to do will always have a job. Those who know why they have to do what they have to do will always be their bosses.

Also, read Sometimes You Win, Sometimes You Learn.

13. The Law of Modeling

Find a mentor and look for a coach who has already been where you are going.
They will help you grow quicker by showing you the way and pointing out your mistakes.

Also, read Mastery by Robert Greene.

14. The Law of Expansion

Don't think there's ever a limit to your growth and expansion.

It doesn't matter what you've done or achieved, you can always do more.
And that's great news.

15. The Law of Contribution

The greatest joy in life is in contribution. As you grow yourself, help others to grow as well.

[image]
Review

The 15 Invaluable Laws of Growth is an easy and pleasant read.

If you are into self-development you are probably aware of most of the concepts, but it can be a good refresher and you will possibly get some new gold nuggets.

For me, it was the Law of The Ladder or the idea that your character should be the foundation of your achievements.

That was a much-needed reminder and put things into the right perspective: first of all, it's who you are. Then comes habits and then eventually achievements.

And that's the order you should work on.

Dark Triad Strategies to Get a Girl With a Boyfriend: an Analysis

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Mate poaching, or wooing a girl with a boyfriend, is a universal, recognized evolutionary mating strategy (Buss, 2016; Hudek-Knezević et al., 2022) that has likely been going on since time immemorial in the human species.

Mate poachers tend to be less empathetic and conscientious, and higher in dark triad traits, especially psychopathy (Wade and Fisher, 2022).

In this article, we will review the strategies and tactics that dark triads use to get a girl with a boyfriend.

TPM Note: This article is descriptive, not prescriptive. Use cautiously
While some of these strategies and tactics can be fair and even win-win, their effectiveness and ethics depend on context. This information is also invaluable for self-defense: to secure your relationship, and to recognize when someone is trying to poach you.

1. Stir Doubts

For example:

> Does it bother you he's younger?
> Was it an issue for you, that you've got a master and he doesn't?
> In some relationships it can be an issue he's making less money. How is it for you…

As soon as they hit the issue, mate poachers stop the questions or they'll arouse suspicions.

If she starts complaining, poachers listen to thread-expand the issue.

Otherwise, they focus on behaving with confidence and power.

1.2. Consider A Bold Lover Move

Poachers say relationships for them are about growing together, sharing adventures, mutual support, and traveling to faraway lands… They make it sound amazing and hardly comparable to their reality.

Then they go suddenly deep and ask point-blank:

> Have you ever been deeply, passionately in love?

Most women will balk at the love question, which plants the seeds of relationship doubt.
Poachers want her to think “no I haven’t” or even better.. “no I’m not”.

The mate poacher’s question covertly implies her relationship is boring and stale
Of course, exceptions apply.
If her boyfriend is a thrill seeker and she wants more stability, then poachers are the stable guy.

When She Complains About Boyfriends

If she complains about her woes, all the better.

Gottman, a famed relationship researcher, says friendships turn into affairs when she complains about her relationship.

Machiavellian mate poachers show interest, but without acting in love or chasing too hard. They say they’re sorry, but without being too affected.
This approach maintains power and frames them as a high-mate value options.

If she’s getting emotional about her boyfriend, poachers get a bit closer to her, but never white knight her with “poor you”. Poachers avoid saying they would treat her better at this early stage to avoid coming across as chase-y. Experienced poachers may add light physical closeness, like a hand on her back, or a slight rubbing of her upper arm, but without overdoing it. They want her to come to them.

Overall poachers make their presence felt by staying calm and collected, a rock in the storm of life.

2. Fuel Her Discontent

Whatever she complains about, poachers expand on it.

But they don't just agree with her. That's weak. poachers let her flesh it out instead of asking questions and listening.

The more she expands on the negatives of her boyfriend and realationship, the more fertile the ground becomes for poaching.

Poachers contribute their own if they can add good insights.
If they cannot, poachers may describe her situation with generalizations that apply to almost anyone.

For example, poachers may tell her that people stay "stuck" because changing is scary. They are planting the seeds for her to be brave and consider a better relationship.

He 'paces her reality' of a dull relationship to make her agree with it. This tactic 'thread expands' the weakness of her relationship

Soon after, poachers will start setting themselves up as the man with better alternatives.

3. Covertly Undermine Her Boyfriend

For example:

- Yeah, it's great you to take care of yourself. Does he also go to the gym? <— If he's a couch potato
- Rock on, keep it up like that and I'm telling you: you're going places <— Boost her self-esteem to make her realize she deserves better
- So, in what exotic place is he taking you for holiday <— If he's not taking her anywhere

This is even a recognized approach in the research literature, called ‘competitor derogation’.
And if done well, it works.

And to do it well, poachers do it COVERTLY.

If they’re too obvious they signal petty jealousy. It makes her the prize and them the lower-value chaser.

Example:

> Him: I can’t believe this is your boyfriend <— Too obvious: petty and aggressive

4. Position Yourself As The Better Replacement

For example:

- Is he poor? ➡ They throw some money around
- Is he overweight? ➡ They talk up how much they value staying fit
- Is he boring? ➡ They are exciting

Also this tactic is supported by research and experience:

> Me: Freedom is good <— ⍰⍰ I don’t need a girlfriend because I’m a high-value man who can get women whenever he wants

In this example, he went for a lover approach.
If mate poachers want to be her new boyfriend, they can also play up more

5. Be A COOL Friend: Don’t Chase

Machiavellian mate poachers never chase, but even less so when they want to get girls with a boyfriend.

When poachers chase and compete, most of the time they lose. She's got a history with her boyfriend and she's still sleeping with him.
While there they are, expanding efforts to woo her without anything in return.
Of course, the boyfriend looks better off.

Poachers stay distant and aloof for a while before going for an actual invite.

Most of all, they avoid being the overly-interested, overly-available friend.
Low-value friends never get a girl with a boyfriend.

But both research and experience converge to suggest that women consider high-value friends for switching.

6. Pull Back When She's Falling For You

IF poachers have leverage, then they quit reaching out, and let her come to them.

Poachers use this technique after they had a great time (and may made a move that she rejected it for being taken).
What do poachers do then? They disappear!

She told them they could be friends, and experienced poachers knew she is into them.
But they told her it wouldn't work.

They explained that "yeah, we could be friends", but their way of being friends.
Such as that if they saw her again, they would do exactly what they had just done (ie.: escalate towards intimacy).

She complained and got emotional.
Exactly what the poacher wanted. And he stayed firm but calm:

> No, you can of course refuse at any time, but if we meet again, I'll do exactly the same.

The poacher could see she was horny and could have probably made it happen with a bolder push, but didn't want to cause trouble.

But one month later:

> Her: My marriage sucks and want to celebrate. How about you? <— Effective poachers become option #1

Yes, disappearing is higher risk and they must be ready to walk away for good.
But as Casanova said, love is not a place for risk-avoiders.

7. But Show That You Value Her

It might sound contradictory to show interest without chasing.

But there is a difference between being smitten and appreciating someone.
Being smitten is lower value, while appreciating is high-power chooser ('the judge').

Showing some interest is OK, but without ever overdoing it.
Poachers walk that line.

Because if, on the other hand, they never show signs of interest, she'll never really consider them.

In this example, they were giving her the chance to open up, which shows a bit of interest from their side, and were moving toward a possible date.

He didn't pull the trigger on the date and delivered two dismissive statements to make her invest more.
They wanted something more from her (and wasn't aching to go to some pretentious cafe' with sexually confused metrosexuals).

IF they're in a similar situation though, poachaers may do things such as:

1. Check online reviews of that place
2. Comment on "what you heard from friends about it"
3. Vibe back with her
4. Invite her there if she doesn't do so herself

Notice what's point 2?
Why isn't she going there with her boyfriend?
It's possibly because he's not the kind of guy to explore new places. Or not the artistic kind of guy.
That's their occasion to show the opposite face.

8. Concoct "Destiny" Meetings

Many women believe in destiny.

So… Effective mate poachers give them destiny.
Spontaneous and chance meetings work because they're not chasing after a date.

But of course, it's the appearance of destiny.
Poachers may also simply hang in shared social spaces, projecting a social and high-value image that boosts their preselection. Girls do notice.

9. Prepare Your Move

These strategies can be effective to get committed women to even chase the poacher.

She will develop feelings for them and things may naturally lead to intimacy.

However, Machiavellian poachers have a whole process to boost the odds with well-oiled seduction processes. For example, they have:

- Seductive environments in their home
- Romantic playlist to set the mood

Poaching Main Strategies

There are three main strategies for sleeping with a girl with a boyfriend:

1. Close friend who slowly takes over
2. Acquaintance who times his move
3. Attractive hookup guy, often related to partying or nights out

This article mostly discussed 1 and 2 here.
#3 is often harder to plan, and mate poachers may sleep with taken women without ever even knowing it.

However, even the short-term 'f*ckboy approach' requires some strategy.

If poachers started from a cold approach or as an attractive stranger, they must move quickly.
If things won't happen fast, chances are they never will.

One committed the mistake of letting sexual tension dissipate without consuming their passion, and they never got together:

Poaching

Pursuing girls in a relationship is an area fraught with moral implications, intense emotions, and grave consequences.

It's important to think about it carefully to avoid causing harm, or even putting oneself at risk. Violence from a protective boyfriend is always a real risk.

Poaching Self-Protection: Strengthening Your Mind

Loyalty is an important value and it's always better to find loyal women who believe in loyalty as a virtue.

However, it's always best for a man not to rely on loyalty alone. Instead, the focus must be on making the relationship a win for her, and cheating a loss.

This video shares the foundational mindset shift:

> Lucio: Only weak men crave loyalty. Strong men are offered loyalty

⍰⍰♂ Poaching Failure: A Personal Story

I believe in living an honorable life, seeking to add value instead of making the world worse off.

And while I was laughing looking for old messages for this article… I laughed no more when I stumbled on my worst case of taking a married woman.

She had a husband. A husband whom she divorced a little after we met.
Then the two of us got into a relationship… For a while.

For me, it was one of the best "serious" relationships I've ever had.
But she was looking for a much longer term and my version of "serious" and "long term" wasn't nearly "serious" or long enough for her. And it turned out to be her biggest heartbreak.

Her last email told me in no uncertain terms how she felt after our "great" relationship:

> Her: I feel so devastated, empty

I still have pangs of guilt.
This remains the biggest, most shameful stain of my dating life.

And the fact that she's now back with her ex-husband -the same she divorced partially because of me- makes me think that things weren't nearly as bad between them.

As one can see, seducing women who have a boyfriend is an emotionally dangerous game.

And I don't want my material here to be used for evil purposes, which increase the pain in this world.

So I advise to use these strategies in the following two scenarios:

1. You seek a long-term relationship (doesn't mean you guarantee success of course)
2. It's clear to all you're just a short-term fling

If doubts persist, it's on the poacher to clarify them.

Poached partners make for bad relationships

Evidence shows that relationships that start with poaching and infidelity are lower-quality relationships.

Quoting from The Oxford Handbook of Psychology:

> individuals who had been poached by existing partners tended to have poorer-quality relationships, including less satisfaction, commitment, and investment.
> Poached individuals also reported being more attentive to alternative partners, perceiving their alternatives to be of higher quality, and engaged in more infidelity relative to nonpoached individuals (Foster et al., 2014).

Meaning: mate poachers pass the "girl with a boyfriend" if they're looking for a relationship.

Of course, this is on average.
And in truth, they could be the exception…

Poaching FAQs

Is it okay to pursue a woman who has a boyfriend?

Generally, it is considered a morally grey area to pursue a woman who has a boyfriend, and especially so if the boyfriend is an acquaintance or, worse yet, a friend. If the boyfriend is a friend, it's also highly disrespectful and widely considered as breaking the unwritten "male code of honor".

Is it always wrong to pursue a woman with a boyfriend?

It's not always wrong to pursue a woman with a boyfriend as it depends on the situation. If she is in an unhappy or unhealthy relationship, then providing a better alternative can be a win for her. If she is not in a fulfilling relationship and she prefers you, then her choice and preference also matter. And if you can provide a better life and relationship, then one could argue that it's fair for people to choose what's best for them.

Should I tell her how I feel if she has a boyfriend?

Generally, it's not a good idea to share your interest or love for a girl in a relationship if she hasn't first shown any signs of interest in you. It puts her in an awkward situation, it makes things weird socially between you, her, and her boyfriend, and it also lowers your value if she isn't reciprocating. It's only OK to share your feelings if you're fairly sure she reciprocates. But even then, men who understand dating and power dynamics usually rely more on subcommunication and building tension rather than verbal confessions.

The 33 Strategies of War: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The 33 Strategies of War lists and analyzes various strategies and techniques that have been deployed in war through the ages. But it's more than just about wars, and it's also applicable to interpersonal and social power dynamics.

Overview

- First of all, you need to "conquer your own mind."
- Avoid frontal attacks when you can hit the flanks or the sources of power
- Make enemies work for you or infiltrate them. Bloodless wins are the quintessence of strategy

Notes

About the Author:
Robert Greene has a background in classical studies and went on to a string of low-ish status jobs around the world before becoming a best-selling author of books on power, manipulation, and practical social psychology.
He also wrote The 48 Laws of Power, The Art of Seduction, Mastery, and The Laws of Human Nature.

⍰♂Can a geek teach you war?

Lucio:
Shall we address the elephant in the room?
Greene has no experience on anything war-related.
Can he really write a book about war?
Well, he wrote a great one because he has a great intuition for power dynamics and psychology.
BUT… There is a but.

Intro

"The 33 Strategies of War" begins with an overview of the key mindsets of war.
Most of all, I liked:

- Look at things as they are: your emotional responses are a disease

As Greene himself stressed in The 50th Law, and as Ray Dalio says in Principles, the men who learn to look at reality for what it is, with dispassionate eyes, hold a huge advantage.

- Judge people by their actions; words are covers for their strategic maneuvers
- Depend on your own arms

Alliances shift easily. You better depend on your own weapons and strengths.

> Let him who wants peace prepare for war

Part I SELF-DIRECTED WARFARE

> First declare war on the enemies within you.

1: Declare war on your enemies: Polarity Strategy

Do not become a sheep in the crowded center: go to the extreme. A dominating, polarizing presence has more pull than middle ground men.

Don't necessarily get into the idea that you need to be liked -as in How to Win Friends-, being respected is better, and even being feared is better. Don't be afraid of battles and enemies either. Your enemies give you purpose and direction.
And battles are what will allow you to win.

And ultimately, victory over your enemies will bring you the most meaningful and lasting popularity.

> Victory over your enemies is the best form of popularity

Reversal

Don't see enemies everywhere, and always keep them for yourself. If you're wrong, nobody will judge you.

Do like Cortez did. Keep it to yourself, pretend you didn't notice. Let them come more and more to the surface, and when it's obvious to everyone that they're enemies, then strike.
And don't make enemies or pick fights at any time. You don't want to make enemies with everyone.

2: Do not fight the last war: Embrace Change

Your past successes can be your biggest obstacles if you believe that repeating the same strategy will give you more victories.
Let go of the past, and embrace change and fluidity instead.

3: Keep your presence of mind: Counterbalance

Detach yourself from the fog of war and the chaos of battle.
The counterbalance to doubt, fear, and losing our minds is an intensification of confidence and determination.

Ultimately, it's preparation and a grasp of all details that allow you to see the whole picture. And understanding the trees while looking at the forest is the main quality of all great generals.
However, let others believe that your Zen qualities come from some mysterious source.

> Preparation is key. But let others think you're gifted

Greene says that we tend to overestimate others and trust ourselves less. Overcompensate it by doing the opposite: trust yourself more and trust others less.

4: Create urgency and desperation: Death-ground

Creating urgency and desperation means putting yourself and the troops in a position where there's no other option but winning.

It's the "burn your bridges" strategy.

Greene recommends using the thought of death as your driver to spur you into action.
I loved this part so much that I wrote a whole article about it. If you're interested in the subject, also read: leveraging mortality.

Place yourself where your back is against the wall, and you have to fight like hell to get out alive.

Part II ORGANIZATIONAL WARFARE

You'll rarely win by yourself: you need leadership skills to bolster team morale.

5: Avoid groupthink: Command-and-control

People naturally have their own agendas in the groups you lead.

If you're too authoritarian, they will resent you, and if you're too lax, they will revert to their own interests.

You need a chain of command where people buy into your vision and naturally follow your lead.

The overall strategic vision must come from you and you alone. But make the group feel involved in the decision-making. Take their good ideas, deflect the bad ones, and if necessary, make minor changes to appease the most political ones.

The Dangers of Groupthink

People in groups tend to act and speak conservatively because they're all worried about what others think.
That's not what you need. And that's why you need unity of command (you).

Beware of Political Animals

Political animals are not only after themselves but also form factions to further their agendas and create their small fiefdoms of power.

You should avoid hiring these people in the first place.
Watch out for those who mirror your ideas 1:1; they're probably trying to ingratiate you.
If it's too late, isolate them

6: Segment your forces: Controlled chaos

Decentralize your army to gain mobility and speed.

The critical elements in war are speed and adaptability—the ability to move and make decisions faster than the enemy.
Break your forces into independent groups that can operate on their own. Give them the spirit of the campaign, a mission to accomplish, and room to run.

7: Transform your war into a crusade: Morale

People are cynical nowadays, speeches and group activities do little.

Build a group myth. Use the past to forge the idea that your group is mythical and legendary. People will feel the pride and work hard to live up to that image.
Those who don't want to will be forced by the shaming pressure of their own peers.

> Don't push from behind. Make them run to keep up with you

Get them to think less about themselves and more about the group.
Involve them in a cause—a crusade against a hated enemy. Make them see that their survival is tied to the success of the army as a whole.

Part III: DEFENSIVE WARFARE

Fighting defensively is not a weakness: it's a smart strategy.

And in a word that frowns upon direct warfare, making your enemy make the first overt move is the hallmark of great strategy.

8: Pick your battles: Perfect-economy

Not all battles are worth being fought.

The costs of war are high. Even if you do have an enemy, sometimes covert warfare is best.
Think about it shrewdly: Pyrrhic victories are more common than you might think.

Reversal

Once you're engaged make sure you don't lose because you're cutting costs. That's not economy but stupidity.

9: Turn the tables: Counterattack

Let them go first. Let them believe you're weak.
Then destroy them with a counterattack once they're over-stretched.

> The best blows are the ones they never see coming

10: Threatening presence: Deterrence

Make your enemy believe you're too difficult to attack.

Look stronger than they think, build a reputation for fighting till the bitter end, sometimes taking your enemy with you. This works great with enemies who have a reputation.
If you're smaller, they have little to gain and much to lose.

Or even better: build uncertainty. When the enemy doesn't know the real costs and dangers, he will stay put.

11: Trade space for time: Nonengagement

Infuriate them by refusing to fight.

Gain time to reflect and rebuild your defenses as they keep over-extending.

Robert Greene also mentions Murphy's laws: the more time passes with your enemy on the moves, the more likely it is that something will go wrong (albeit I'd say there are also chances something good will happen to your enemy or that something bad will happen to you as you wait).

Part IV OFFENSIVE WARFARE

The biggest dangers come from the unexpected. When you attack first at their vulnerabilities you take action and minimize the unexpected.

12: Lose battles & win the war: Grand strategy

Look beyond the present battle and think about the overall war.

Here Greene talks a bit about visualization and successful people who visualized a lot (albeit that's an inductive reasoning fallacy), reminding me a bit of Think and Grow Rich.
He recommends you set big goals that will drive you forward.

13: Know your enemy: Intelligence

Similar to his work Mastery, Robert Greene focuses here on the importance of reading people.

Don't ask too many questions or you'll put them on the defensive.
Put a friendly, or even subservient front, observe them, and let them open up voluntarily. Uncover their weaknesses. And use them.

> The most powerful armies are beaten unhinging their leaders' minds

14: Overwhelm with speed: Blitzkrieg

Move quickly, and strike first without giving your enemy the time to prepare. Make him emotional, afraid, and error-prone.

15: Control the dynamic: Forcing

> Control the battlefield, control the war

The ultimate control is leading the enemy to believe he's in control.

It works best when you move with his energy and works best with the aggressive and passive-aggressive types.

Then slowly change the battlefield in a way that suits and makes your enemy uncomfortable.
If the discussion is about money, reframe it as a moral issue.

16: Hit them where it hurts: Center-of-gravity

Don't exchange punch for punch, that's the hallmark of stupidity. Look instead at what's supporting him and strike there.

Your enemy derives its power from a few key sources. Strike there, cut off his lifeline.

Find the source of your enemy's power. Find out what he cherishes and protects and strikes.

17: Defeat them in detail: Divide and Conquer

Sow the seeds of discontent, and turn large enemies into smaller parts. Then attack and conquer.

18: The flank attack: Turning

Frontal attacks are the equivalent of going punch for punch: the sucker's way of fighting.
The key to a flank attack is disguising your intentions.

19: Envelop the enemy: Annihilation

Encircling deflates your enemy.

Give him the feeling that he's being attacked from all directions. Phalanxes closed in on him from all directions.

Reversal

With the enveloping strategy, you reveal your intention of annihilation. Either you are successful, or you might be left in a difficult position.

20: Maneuver them into weakness

Confuse your opponents so that they don't know where to defend themselves.
Create disorder, then attack.

Boasting your own skills reeks of self-promotion.
Instead, let them speak first and reveal themselves. Now you can use it to your advantage. If they pick an extreme position, say they are dangerous revolutionaries.
If they tone down, say they are inconsistent.

Before the battle begins, put your opponent in a position of such weakness that victory is easy and quick. Create dilemmas where all potential choices are bad.

21: Negotiate while advancing: Diplomatic war

Don't trust people's words.

They will break their promises and find moral justifications for their amoral behaviors.
And people will forget broken promises when you're strong and in the position to offer something they want.

Keep advancing and waging wars during negotiations.
When you keep winning the war you will get better deals and you can use the conquered terrain as bargaining chips.
If on the other hand you stop, you will often find your enemy much stronger in battle because he didn't stop.

It's even more important you keep advancing when you're holding the weak hand, so you can show resolve.
Act strong and people will treat you as strong.

22: Know how to end things: Exit strategy

How things end is all that matters. The ending is your final judge.

Greene talks here of the quicksands of protracted wars with no end in sight, like the Russians in Afghanistan or the Americans in Vietnam. The only two options in these cases are:

1. A major blow that will drive victory home
2. Cut your losses and move out

When you see that defeat is inevitable, you can make an effort to go down in style. Planting the seeds of future victory during a defeat is the strategy of the highest order.

The Mental Side of Defeat

Defeats are inevitable, so you should learn how to lose gracefully -both for yourself and for others-.

See it as a temporary defeat, welcome it as a way to make yourself stronger, and as a way to demonstrate your character and your strength to stay upbeat even in loss.

> Short term defeat is better than long term disaster

Part V UNCONVENTIONAL WARFARE

The greatest element of surprise comes with using new strategies that nobody expects.

As people push for novelty though, says Greene, there's a race to the extremes, leading to dirtier wars.
But you must go dirty yourself. You can't risk loss out of a sense of morality.

23: Blend fact and fiction: Misperception

Deception is not about making big shows off elaborate distractions.

Most people are aware you'll try to deceive them and won't fall for it. The best deceptions mix reality with fiction. Spread your deceptions to people who believe in the lie themselves, and they'll work to convince others, naturally, of your deception.

Finally, make up realities that match your enemy's desire and they'll deceive themselves into believing it.

24: Line of least expectation: Ordinary-Extraordinary

Greene says that the greatest general has a touch of strategic madness.

As we age though we more and more tend to conform to old habits, and that's how Napoleone declined and came to rely more on size than on brilliant strategy.
Keep an edge of unconventional instead and break the habits.

25: Occupy the moral high ground: Righteousness

Make your cause seem morally justified and paint your enemy as evil.

Pick a fight with an enemy you can portray as morally corrupt, authoritarian, or power-hungry. Don't drum up your moral superiority but show it: contrast your own life with theirs.
Convince people you're fighting for a just moral cause and nobody will take note of the tactics you deploy.

I wrote a lot of examples of real-life this. Check:

- Beating the moral police
- Dealing with judgmental people – Charlie Sheen interview

26: Deny them targets: The Void

Let your enemies chase you into emptiness.

Avoid fighting, give them no target. Empty will drive them crazy.
An example is Napoleone in Russia.
And another great example is Trump VS Hillary.

27: Seem to act for the greater good: Alliances

Most people operate with feelings and emotions and make alliances based on liking and friendships.

Bad strategy: the best alliances are the ones giving something you can't get on your own.
Sometimes we think instead that the more allies the better. But it's not true: the more you have, the more likely it is you'll be dragged into other people's wars.

Alliances must be based on mutual interests. See them as stepping stones towards getting what you need.
Finally, never become too dependent on alliances: they will drop you when it best serves them.

Alliances Strategies

Seem like you want to help and let them do the work, then reap the benefits.

You'll be accused of playing the alliance game, which is nothing but strategic moral attacks. The only real danger is that your reputation will be so tarnished that people won't wanna ally to you anymore.
But, says Greene:

> Self interest rules the world

The example of Murray Bowen was a genius. He created a family storm on purpose to bring all back-talking to the surface. Then… Read the book for more.

28: Give rope to hang themselves: One-upmanship

Sometimes enemies are your colleagues, your collaborators.

That's unconventional warfare at its best as they all try to keep the appearance of working for the greater good.

Don't attack them head-on: it will only make you look bad and they will have an easy way out.
Look at this Family Guy skit for a preview of how it will end up:

Never attack coworkers directly. It's easy to make you look like a bad team player

Get under their skin subtly instead. It works best with people who need to perform as they won't be able to be at their best.

Instill doubts and insecurities in rivals, getting them to think too much and act defensively. Make them hang themselves through their own self-destructive tendencies, leaving you blameless and clean.

Rigid types who cannot stand breaking moral codes are the easiest to one-up. They will overreact and attack you too obviously, making them look vindictive.

29: Take small bites: Fait Accompli

Most people cling to the status quo and are loath of starting wars over trivial matters.

That's why you will take small bites, bite by bite. Every time it will be too small to start a war and once you take enough bites they won't even be able to wage war against you.

30: Penetrate their minds: Communication

The goal of communication is to further your interest, to penetrate the enemies' minds. Anything else is self-indulgent talk.

Make people reach your conclusions and let them believe it was their own ideas.
Very interesting analysis of The Prince here by Robert Greene and how also writing must be focused on spreading your ideas to be effective.

31: Destroy from within: The Inner Front

Instead of fighting your enemies: join them.

Infiltrate their ranks, and rise to the top. Then slowly get what you want or stage a coup.

The example here was that of Canaris, a high-ranking officer in Hitler's spy networks. I was very surprised to read the story as I had never heard about it.
Basically, this guy was one of the biggest influences in the Nazi's loss and no history books have ever mentioned him.

32: Seeming to submit to dominate: Passive-Aggression

Seem to submit and go along with them.

Disguise your aggression so you can deny it even exists.
People are not well equipped to see both aggression and submission at the same time and will usually just go along with one.

Make sure your front is spotless.

It's also difficult to fight people who fight without violence. If your enemy attacks, they will look terrible and justify further revolts. If they let you go, you can grow your clout (Gandhi example).

Dealing With Passive Aggression

In a world that despises full aggression, passive aggression is on the rise.

First of all, eliminate any feeling of guilt you might have when they show the passive side.
Whenever you can, disengage. When you can, never attack directly, but use their own tactics right back.
If it's a partner in a relationship, make them feel safe to express themselves.
Also, read:

- Passive aggressiveness

Examples:

Roosevelt pretended he didn't want to run for a third time, so nobody could accuse him of being power-hungry. When people asked for him, he showed up almost as if he had to oblige.

Partners in relationships who try to force the other into what they want while denying doing so.

33: Sow panic with terror: Chain Reaction

Terror strategies aim at raising havoc, making enemies fearful, and provoking desperate overreactions -or surrender without fighting-.

They serve well to smaller groups who can't fight openly because of size disparity.

Their goal is to spread fear with small acts of violence that reverberate through stories and media and command outsized attention compared to their real effect.

Counterstrategies include keeping calm and rational and alienating the terror groups from the masses to deny any political base (Brigate Rosse in Italy).

Stopping the terror from spreading is also important (UK managing V2 terror), and heavy military engagement from the stronger side is often a mistake (what happened to the US recently).

Examples:

Mongols and spreading stories of their horrors so enemies would give up without a fight.
Robespierre and holding to power through an actually peaceful time thanks to the fear he instilled in enemies and people alike.

CONS

- Don't forget to make friends and allies

This is not really a con, but more like an important reminder.

The 33 Strategies of War, like its cousin "The 48 Laws of Power", focuses war and competition only.

Be aware of enemies and covert enemies, but don't be paranoid.

Remember you can and should create alliances.

And that relationships can be based on mutual caring as well.

Skip Blinkist: It's NOT Worth It for Serious Learners

Lucio Buffalmano · 9 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Blinkist is a paid service that provides access to book summaries and markets itself as a tool for acquiring knowledge faster and more efficiently.

While we agree with the speed angle, we don't necessarily agree with the 'efficient' part, and this review explains why.

TPM Strategic Audit: The Pitfalls of Low-Resolution Learning
Most summary apps optimize for speed and volume—not understanding, internalizing, and upgrading mindsets and behaviors.
Blinkist is low-resolution learning: it gives you the feeling of knowledge without the ability to apply, connect, or think critically.
We keep this review as a case study for our high-agency readers. If you outsource your thinking to a low-level summary, you outsource your competitive advantage.

Intro

This Blinkist review comes from Lucio Buffalmano, social scientist and avid reader who has read thousands of books and reviewed hundreds of them on this very same website.

That's me.

The headphone strings you see are from noise-canceling headphones so that I can listen to audiobooks on the go.
Indeed, as you can see from our reviews list, I read a lot. And I like being strategic about it.

So let's see why I don't use Blinkist (and why I don't recommend it to TPM's audience).

Where Blinkist Can Be Useful (Limited Cases)

Here are the advantages of using Blinkist:

1. Saves Time on Poor Space-Filler Books

> Short waste of time is better than big waste of time

Let's be frank, not all books are worth your time.
Some might even be great books, but they don't fit your goals, personality, or lifestyle.
And some might be great authors or great people, but they're just putting out content to monetize their name-brand.

In these cases, a summary saves you time (and money).

P.S.:
Most best-sellers are fluffy for smart and high-angency men. See:

- Why I stopped reading best-selling books

2. For Many Books You Can Get 80% of Value in 20% of Time

> Pareto says yes in his Blinkist review

Some books -but not all, read the cons!- can be easily summarized and you can get most of the value in a quarter of the time (and cost).
One example could be The 10X Rule.
Even with some great books, you can get 80% in 20%.

Why it Doesn't Work for Top-1% Men

The main cons for our target demographic are these:

1. Science-Based Books Are Not There

We prefer textbooks written by researchers because they're the best tools to properly understand the world, and become effective in that world.

They pay the biggest bang for the buck, and are the most reliable and evidence-based books you can get.

But…

They're not on Blinkist.

2. Great Books Can Lose 80% of Value

The really good books, with lots of content and lots of wisdom, are difficult to summarize. For anyone.
And I don't think Blinkist does a good enough job with the books I tested.
I think of The Art of Seduction, which the Blink summary pretty much butchered.

3. You Must Trust Blinkist Employees (some bad summaries)

Some summaries I tested didn't meet my expectations.

4. No Ranking Means You Can't Prioritize

Services like Blinkist don't -and possibly can't because of the agreements they sign- rank their books.

But ambitious and busy men must prioritize.

5. Blinkist Does Not Provide Critical Review

Blinkist summaries don't criticize the book, only summarize it.

For example, in the otherwise good book The 48 Laws of Power, we listed the risks of over-antagonism and loss of cooperation (see 'why The Laws Don't Work').
But that's not something you would read on a Blinkist summary.

6. Books As Silos: Get The Trees, Lose The Forest

By looking at books as silos, you lose sight of the broader literature, which often offers a superior lens for understanding reality.

This is especially important for books that go against the grain of the consensus, or that try too hard to be unique and contrarian to capture attention and boost sales (example: The China Study, which Blinkist doesn't put in perspective with the consensus on nutrition).

But mentioning contrasting theories is important for readers to make sense of a subject.
For example, in How to Win Friends, we say that it's a must-read book. But also add that ambitious men must look at the full social skills spectrum, which includes power dynamics, positive dominance, and strategies.

7. Fun-Fact Approach to Learning Doesn't Serve 'Pros'

It's good that Blinkist seeks to make reading 'fun': it's good if more people who wouldn't otherwise read, read.

But it's not the approach that best fit our audience.

Here is an example:

"But did you know that" is a typical "fun fact" approach. But I am not interested in fun facts. I want facts, not fun facts.
And I want to know how they can help me move forward.
It's the same for TPM's audience.

Validation-Reading

Books should add value to your life.

Adding books like players add notches under their belts won't move you an inch toward your goals.

In that sense, Blinkist and its marketing may nudge people towards 'reading for reading's sake':

> Ever read read four books in a day?

Ego validation, anyone?
No I haven't, and neither do I want. I'd rather learn from 1/10 of a top resource every day. And internalize and apply that wisdom every day.

Should You Get Blinkist?

If you're an ambitious, driven man who reads to boost his competence and personal power to achieve goals, you shouldn't get Blinkist for your core learning.

Quip George Clemenceau when he said that "war is too important to be left to generals".
Similarly, I say:

> Knowledge is too important to be left to random people's summaries

You can use it as a 'filtering tool'

However, you can use Blinkist for two high ROI approaches:

1. Save time on space-filling fluff books (many are)
2. Get a first idea about a book

This approach can also work for our readership, which can use Blinkist alongside the full book, or TPM's own analyses.

If you get it... Keep this in mind

Ultimately, by removing the most popular books without adding criticism or power dynamics, Blinkist can unwittingly promote ineffective naive self-help.

The Five Love Languages: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Five Love Languages (1992) explains that we all express our love and affection in different ways (languages). And to make sure we all show our love in a way that others can understand, we must learn to speak the right language.

Bullet Summary

- People express love and feel loved in different ways
- For a happy and loving marriage, you need to know your partner's love language
- There are people with two love languages and there are "dialects" within the same language

Full Summary

About The Author:
Gary Chapman is an American pastor and relationship counselor.
He can claim to have written the biggest-selling book when it comes to relationship advice.
And for good reasons: it's short and to the point and with great relationship wisdom.

Introduction

The 5 Love Languages states that people express and feel loved in 5 different ways.

If two people from two different love languages are together they can ruin their relationship by not making their partner feel loved.

To fix the issue you should learn how your partner communicates and receives love and adjust accordingly.

Let's start then with the 5 Love Languages:

Love Language #1: WORDS OF AFFIRMATION

Words of affirmation communicate with words how much you love your partner.
If words of affirmation are your partner's primary love language, it will mean the world to them when you say how much you love them.
Here's how you can communicate through words of affirmation:

- Tell them "I love you"
- Make compliments
- Say you love them so much when they do X

Reversal

People whose primary love language is quality time will be deeply hurt by criticism and hurtful comments.

Love Language #2: QUALITY TIME

People who have quality time as their main love language will value spending time with their partners and getting their full attention.

Quality is the keyword here, which excludes activities such as watching TV together (TV gets your attention) or driving (the road gets much of the attention).

Here's how to express love in the quality time language:

- Going for a walk just the two of you
- Eating together while having personal conversations
- Doing new experiences together

Reversal

You will hurt people whose love language is quality time the most when you avoid spending time together.
Avoid postponing dates, being distracted, and not listening to them.

Love Language #3: RECEIVING GIFTS

If your love language gifts, you appreciate gifts and concrete symbols of love.

Indeed, that's what gifts stand for: a symbol of appreciation, a sign you are thinking of them, and, of course, a symbol of love. No gifts mean no love.

The value of the gift is actually often less important (unless she's a low-quality girl).

My note:
I can relate here. I had a girlfriend whose language of love was gifted, and she always came up with super personalized gifts for me. Often of little value but requiring work and thought.

Reversal

If you never buy gifts and your partner's love language is gifts, you are hurting them. Especially hurtful is missing gifts for celebrations, birthdays, and anniversaries.

Changing Attitudes Towards Money

I particularly liked the note Chapman does on people who are money savers and don't like spending on "meaningless" stuff (I am like that).

Savers feel good about themselves when they save money, so when savers are in a relationship with a partner whose language of love gifts, it could create problems.

But, the author says, by not purchasing gifts you ARE purchasing for yourself. You are purchasing emotional security and self-worth. You are caring for yourself… And hurting your spouse.

Love Language #4: ACTS OF SERVICE

People whose love language is acts of service appreciate concrete help as a sign of love.

"Let me do that for you" is the keyword here. You use your own time and resources to take a load off your shoulders.

Here are examples of acts of service:

- Cooking
- Preparing the table
- Changing children's diapers
- Mowing the grass
- Taking the garbage out

Different Dialects

Here Chapman introduces the possibilities of "dialects" within the same love language.

For example, you can both speak acts of service as your love language but value different types of services.
He might feel his duty is mowing the lawn, but she should take care of the children. While she could feel they are both parents and it's not loving of him not to help with the kids.

Chapman recommends you ask your spouse to come up with a list of tasks she would appreciate help with.

Reversal

Refusing to help and breaking promises is particularly painful for those who speak acts of service as their love language.

Love Language #5: PHYSICAL TOUCH

Partners whose main love language is physical touch will feel your love when you kiss them, hug them, cuddle, have sex and hold each other after sex.

Even here there are different dialects that are expressed through situational physical touch and which parts of the body one likes most.
Don't assume, but ask or, better, observe.

My Note:
also note that men and women touch each other very differently. Read more on 4 ways men touch women wrong.

Reversal

Lack of touching is of course particularly painful for people whose main love language is physical touch.
You might be a guy who's not into holding hands -I wasn't-, but if your spouse is, hold that hand while walking.

For children, if their primary love language is touch, they will remember a slap for their whole life.

Real-Life Applications

Learn Your Own Love Language
And let your partner know about it.

Find Your Partner's Love Language
And communicate with him/her using his/her love language.

What Are The Five Love Languages?

The five love languages are compliments (words of affirmation), quality time spent together, gifts, concrete help (acts of service), and physical touch.

Criticism

Is It Sexist / Traditional?

The 5 Love Languages has been criticized over time.

One of the main criticisms is that Chapman recommends a woman try to revive her marriage on her own.
And since her husband always wants more sex with her, he recommends she have sex once a week first and then increase it to two times a week.

I don't see much point in this critique.
If one wants to give it a try to revive a marriage -or any relationship for that matter-, why not start from oneself first?
If it doesn't work, that's fine, but one can always try.

On the sex question, if one party wants to have more sex, there are only three ways to solve it. 1. have more sex and make him happy; 2. don't have sex and only make yourself happy; 3. or meet in the middle.

Chapman's recommendation just seemed a way to meet in the middle.
And it was smart in the sense that sex also underpins an emotional connection, and can be an indicator of an improving relationship.

Is It Too Religious?

Chapman is a pastor and there are biblical references in "The 5 Love Languages".
But it's not all based on religion and scriptures like, for example, Boundaries is.
And personally, I didn't find those references to take anything away from the main message.

Is It Unscientific?

One of the main criticisms against the 5 Love Languages instead is that of having a little scientific background.

That's a stronger critique.
As I listened to the audiobook, indeed, I couldn't help but notice that Gary Chapman's 5 Love Languages had little scientific research backing its claims.

It did seem to make sense, but so do many other pop psychology myths.

But when I looked into the research to confirm (or disprove) the 5 Love Languages, there didn't seem to be any consensus.
However, some evidence points to the validity of the love languages.
See: construct validation of the 5 languages of love and a validity test of Chapman's 5 Love Languages.

At the time of revisiting this review, I am 'cautiously optimistic' the love languages may apply to some individuals.

PROS

- Brief and to the point
- Practical
- Potentially useful

Review

The 5 Love Languages is an interesting book with an interesting theory, turend into a global phenomenon.

Although I'm not yet fully convinced of how universally valid the 5 Love Languages are, I still consider it valuable information to possess.

Respect for Chapman

As a last note, I have major respect for Chapman if what The New York Times says about him is true.

Chapman devoted all income from "The 5 Love Languages" to a charity.

The charity promotes Christian values and one might or might not agree with that. But he's certainly a man who puts his money where his mouth is.
And that's not something many do.

The Man's Guide to Women: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Man's Guide to Women (2016) is a research-backed book for men to learn more about women and relationships.
It touches on topics such as relationships, courtship, female psychology, and sex.

TPM Note: Great for monogamous relationships, less suited for other options
Gottman's work is invaluable but focuses on traditional monogamous relationships and does not account for sexual market dynamics or mate value disparities. It also skips the mating choices available to top-1% men. However, Gottman remains a top resource for committed relationships.

- It's men's behavior that makes or breaks a relationship

- Making great love starts long before bed and it's in most parts mental

Summary

About the Author:
John Gottman is an American researcher and clinician who focused most of his career on relationships.
He is also the author of "The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work".

Introduction

From the start Gottman delivers a key takeaway: men are the crucial factor between a great relationship and a failed relationship.

It's not to say that women don't count: it's a relationship between two individuals, so sure they count.
But men and their actions are the key variables.

What's a man to do, then?

Read on.

What do Women Really Want?

First of all, women are unique, and if she contradicts what Gottman's love lab says, listen to her.

They do however have several traits that are likely to be shared. And the number one thing women want is this:

Trustworthiness

Trustworthiness in dating and relationships means that:

1. You are who you say you are
2. You do what you say you do

The authors say women want safe and dependable men and that's why they find firefighters hot: they epitomize the role of the dependable hero.

And that's why symbolic actions of protectiveness and concern, such as opening doors and pulling chairs actually do work.

My Note:
I think Gottman's right, but I need to make an addendum.
Firefighters being hot is relative and varies from country to country.
In Italy, it's seamen who have the hot stereotype. And the seaman stereotype is "a woman in every port".
I'm not saying that safety is not attractive to women. It can be and it's helpful in relationships. But danger and excitement are equally attractive, especially for short flings. Also, read the 10 types of players.

This is very important also sexually because trustworthiness and sex are linked for women.
Sex means being vulnerable for women, and fear or lack of trust will inhibit them sexually.

Women's 2 Biggest Complaints

Women in relationships have two major complaints:

1. He is never there for me
2. There isn't enough intimacy and connection

They are related complaints of women who want more intimacy but feel alone in a relationship.

Men's 2 Biggest Complaints:

1. Too much fighting
2. Not enough sex

Men are also, in a way, lonely in a relationship and they want intimacy as much as women.
But men feel more intimacy through less fighting and more sex.

What Men Want: Men want to be desired and to feel like their woman adores them and approves of them.

The Biggest Relationship Fix: ATTUNEMENT

Attunement is how you increase intimacy, remove most fights and increase sex.
But first, here's what most men do wrong:

Men's Mistakes: Dismissing Emotions

The fights of many couples are the consequence of men dismissing women's emotions instead of attuning to them.
You dismiss women's emotions every time you:

- Minimize them (or say she's exaggerating)
- Fix them
- Try to distract her from them
- Make fun of them
- Mock them
- Ignore them

A big mistake men do is to feel responsible for the woman's emotions.

When they do that, they either try to fix her or become irritable as they take her feelings personally.

Men have problems, especially with negative emotions. They think dwelling on them makes matters worse and will rather avoid them altogether. This is, again, a mistake.
Acceptance is key instead. Or even better: look at emotional "crisis" as an opportunity to build trust.

Attunement

Women want trustworthiness, and trustworthiness is built with emotional connection, which in turn is created with attunement.

Men who learned emotional attunement got what they ultimately wanted from their relationships: less fighting and more sex.
To understand attunement, we can use it as an acronym (A TT U N E):

- Attend and give your undivided attention
- Turn toward: not just a metaphor, but physically turn towards her
- Understand: whatever she says, strive to understand. Ask questions
- Non Defensive Listening: don't justify or attack back
- Empathize: understanding is intellectual, and empathizing is emotional. Feel what she's feeling

Non-defensive listening

A special note goes to listening without defending.

Men more easily go into flight or fight, so it's not easy for them to listen calmly. But those who were able to stay calm were men with great relationships.

Women's Rhythms

Women change as their hormones change during their menstrual cycles.

This is just a general guideline, as it varies widely from woman to woman:

- First 2 weeks of the menstrual cycle women are friendlier, more talkative, and more relaxed
- Second 2 weeks they can be more stressed, irritable, and craving lone time
- During ovulation, women can be more emotional and interested in sex.
- PMS (premenstrual syndrome) can last one day or a full 2 weeks. Can include depression, anxiety, irritability, emotional sensitivity

You can help smooth things out by:

- Listening to her feelings (which are real)
- Avoid blaming PMS
- Get familiar with her cycle (not every woman has a 28 days cycle)
- Remember that women constantly change, so:
- Don't take her moods personally: they often have nothing to do with you
- Know that your woman of last week will be a different one from this week

My Note:
The authors also recommend you avoid telling her to cut caffeine and exercise more -which helps with PMS-.
But I disagree here. If she can do something to help the relationship, she should.

Hormones and Sex

Men have sex centers in their brains, which are twice the size of women.

And men think about sex on average six times more frequently than women.

But while men peak in the sexual drive during teenage years and early adulthood, women don't hit their sexual stride until their thirties.
Sexual drive for the two genders indeed aligns more closely in the forties and fifties.

Alpha VS Beta: The Cycle Effect

Women are more attracted to aggressive alpha men when ovulating and more attracted to kinder and nurturing men when not (beta).

The authors say that heroes adapt their behavior to be both alpha and beta depending on their woman's cycle.

My Note:
The authors are all well-learned, but their alpha/beta designation seems wrong here.
Betas are second in command, often very close to alphas. Associating aggression with alphas and nurturing with betas sub-communicates low scientific backing and lowers authority.

Women and Fear

While men go through most of their daily life without experiencing fear, that's not the case for women.

It was highly instructive for me to read the example in the book:

> A marriage counselor asked a room full of couples when was the last time they were afraid.
> Men were astonished to see their spouses were afraid or feeling uneasy on a daily basis. Including when walking in the parking lot to get to that same seminar room.

Stress Response In Men and Women

Men get less fearful in high-stress situations.

Women get more fearful instead and are also more likely to get mini-traumatized and be even more afraid of similar situations in the future.

An example is a near-car crash where the man chases the other driver and the woman gets more and more afraid.

Holding Hands During Fearful Situations

An experiment in MRI scan showed that holding hands with their husbands completely erased fear in happily married women.
It slightly decreased fear in unhappily married women. And it had no consequences when holding hands was a stranger.

Women & Attraction

Women look for confidence, intelligence, and high social status.

High social status is highly contextual, though.

So you can be a nobody at work but have high social status on a night out playing board games (also read: relativity of social status and small pond syndrome).

The authors say that the expertise you demonstrate in an area of interest is what attracts women. So if you collect stamps, be highly knowledgeable about stamps.

Romancing a Woman

The authors say that women remember the first kiss more than anything else.
Even more, than losing their virginity.

An example of a memorable kiss:

Is She Girlfriend Material?

The author recommends you take note of how she treats her pets, friends, and family.

That will give you a good idea of how she will treat you in the relationship.
Some more warning signs:

- Does she complain often?
- Pattern of friendships
- How she treats service personnel and strangers
- Is she considered self-centered?

Also read: 17 early signs of low-value women.

> Choose your partner carefully. Your relationship is 90 percent of the joy or sorrow in your life

Making Love to a Woman

The Man's Guide to Women has a whole chapter on making love.
I invite you to get the book for that.

But here are a few droplets of wisdom that no other sex book will tell you about women's mindsets:

Beauty for Women is a Matter of Survival

There's constant pressure on her from society and more and more from the media from any direction.

A woman's self-identity is tied to her body. She doesn't see herself separately from her body, so her self-worth is often tied to it.

While men are judged by their performance and abilities, women are judged today by the same standards PLUS how good they look and how they dress in the process.

So here's what a hero does:

- Comments on how great she looks
- Answer "you look good in everything" when she asks if she looks fat
- Does NOT make funny jokes about her eating
- Let her know he's attracted to her
- Appreciates her body in and out of bed

When heroes do that, they also get much better sex.

The Mental Side of Sex

Good sex and lovemaking start before bed.

A woman's anatomy is actually only a small percentage of what turns her on and gives her pleasure.

And, the authors say, the greatest sex organ of a woman is her mind.
It's a myth that if a woman doesn't reach an orgasm the man is not a good lover. Ultimately, say the authors, a woman is responsible for her own sexual pleasure.
She must first allow herself to reach an orgasm with you.

My Note:
Indeed I have experience with women who've never had orgasms and it's not easy to get them to peak. They seem to reach the orgasm point but never actually get there. With women who did experience orgasms, it's instead easy to give them multiple orgasms.
Indeed, the authors say, it takes a modicum of skills to pleasure her if she's experiencing desire.
I once experienced a woman in a trance-like state once back home after a long day together. She had multiple orgasms… While we were still on the bed… Dressed (!)

> The greatest sex organ of a woman is her mind

Handling Conflicts

First of all, makeup sex is a myth: fighting puts a damper on women's desire.
Women's anger has its roots in three different categories:

- Powerlessness
- Injustice

- Other people's irresponsibility

Research in the Love Lab shows that most of the time conflicts start without a reason.
And when it happens, women want a good listener because women's goal is to be better understood by their partners.

Men & Conflicts

Men are more likely to get aggressive, passive-aggressive, or seek revenge when they are angry.

Men get emotionally flooded and overwhelmed during conflict situations: they feel the shock of the attack and the need to defend themselves.

Those who can reduce heart rate while staying present tend to respond better and have better relationships.

To avoid flooding, there are three strategies:

- Breath deeply
- Count to 10
- Take a break (WITHOUT thinking about your wife, but taking your mind off)

Your main job as a man is to learn to calm down when she has strong feelings or criticisms. It's not about bending over, say the authors, it takes lots of strength to really listen while staying detached.

> Men can't differentiate between a spear and a verbal spear

Women & Conflicts

Women are on average better at managing conflict, and that's one of the reasons they don't understand men stonewalling or leaving mid-conflict.

They are less likely to express anger directly, stay angry longer, and become more resentful.
Since women are more likely to use indirect ways to express anger, they are also more likely to simply stay silent.

Women Need Friends

While men need a woman to live longer, it's friendships with other women that determine women's longevity.

Breast cancer patients also showed that the survival rate was highly correlated with the number of friends, and not on whether or not they had a spouse.

Note:
just as a note, women do get health benefits from marriages, but only if the marriage is good. Men get benefits anyway.

Women have a natural inclination for friends. They make friends more naturally than men, like while shopping or having a manicure done.

Confidantes and Genders
In a study of blue-collar marriages, their spouses were the only confidantes for men and men spoke to their wives about almost anything.
But their wives had many topics they didn't talk about with their husbands and preferred other women instead.

Men's Jealousy

Some men are jealous -and feel threatened- by their spouses' girlfriends, and it was a major cause of domestic violence.

In the case of male friends though they might have a reason to worry.
The authors say that friendships slip into affairs when the woman complains to him about her relationship (read: how to sleep with women with a boyfriend).

Stages of Love

Love has three stages:

1. Limerence: the period of butterflies (but not necessary nor sufficient for lifetime love)
2. Trust: women make sure he's responsible for children (a couple of years)
3. Loyalty: you've chosen commitment, the relationship transcends the two of you and becomes a thing of beauty

Limerence, the period of crazy love, is not the right time to make decisions about long-term commitment.
But the couples who don't experience it sometimes feel as if something is missing. And wonder if they've done the right choice.

Importantly, the authors say that any other relationship type beyond monogamy in stage two is a threat to the relationship. Once you enter stage three, there's a sense of purpose in the relationship. Couples feel like they have created something bigger than their mere sum.

How do you know if she's the one?

Research has shown that similar interests matter little.

Feelings compatibility matters, though.
That's about how you express affection and love (read the 5 love languages), how you express feelings, if at all.
People have different ways of expressing feelings: passionate and all over or uncomfortable and shying away from feelings.

If you are mismatched there, it rarely works out.

Here's an example of a more rational woman withholding emotions VS one who makes no effort and bursts at the seam:

If meta-emotion works, here's what matters next: how does it feel being together?
If she makes you feel happy, appreciated and that you can be yourself, then she is the right one for you.

Marriage Is Important to Relationship Health

Turns out, marriage is more than a piece of paper.

The longer a couple lives together without getting married, the less they behave like a couple. They were also less likely to support each other and more likely to leave if someone better came along.

Overall, The Man's Guide for Women makes the case that marriage is good.

Women and Children

The main message here is that women do put their children first once they become mothers.

They tend to build social networks that will help them support their babies, and the father is a central piece in such a network. She needs you, and countless studies show countless benefits for children who grow up with an active father.

Heroes bond with their children as well instead of being jealous. And help raise healthy children in a happy family.

How to Stay Together For a Lifetime

Heroes are always curious about her and never stop investigating her and asking her questions.

And they're never afraid of sharing their own world.
Staying curious is how you keep healthy communication and tell her you care with facts. Sharing your world is how you keep trust and an open relationship.

The authors say that betrayals don't happen out of the blue, but are the result of a long slide of secrets, unexpressed feelings moments of connection that went missing or dismissed.

If you turn away from your partner too many times, she might not be there when you finally turn to her again.

So here's the other key: be present.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Don't take her moods personally
Often they have little to do with you

Inject Excitement on Your First Date
When you do something exciting on your first date, she will feel aroused with you. The authors mention bungee jumping, which I wouldn't do. But you could, for example, visit a weird venue.

Don't Compete
women are much more geared toward collaboration than competition. On your date, don't make it a matter of who's right or wrong. Also, read 4 communication mistakes men do in relationships.

CONS

- Evolutionary Psychology Misunderstanding

The authors say that since women have been schooled only on dressing for 3.000 years, that came “bred into their bones”.
3,000 years is not much in evolutionary terms though.

- Misleading Use of Evolutionary Psychology

I felt the authors’ use of evolutionary psychology to “explain” their findings was wrong.

For example, they say men can bond when standing sideways because that’s how they sat while hunting for buffalo. That’s so random that it’s ridiculous.

I think men are comfortable sideways because full frontal shows genitalia to other men, which is awkward. But I don’t make up an evolutionary psychology story because I know full well what my explanation would be: my own (meaningless) guesswork.

- Wrong Alpha VS Beta designation?

Women tend to be somewhat more attracted to aggressive (alpha) men when they are ovulating and more attracted to kinder, gentler, more nurturing (beta) men when they are not.

But where does it say that beta males are more nurturing?

And a beta male is, technically, second in command. Gottman could be more careful with the words he picks: he’s supposed to be a scientist, not a red pill bro-scientist.

Review

The Man’s Guide to Women is a wonderful book for men interested in better understanding the psychology and dynamics of successful, monogamous and committed relationships.

Absorbing Information The Efficient Way: Reading Guide

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Effective reading begins with mental preparation.

The mental preparation makes sure you are ready to welcome and retain the new information.

Contents

- 1. Crave New Wisdom
- 2. Open Yourself To Be Changed
- 3. Prepare Your Mind To Absorb Information

- Reading Quickly
  - 1. Read Everywhere
  - 2. Leverage Audiobooks
- Technical Tips
  - Leveraging E-Readers

1. Crave New Wisdom

> The End Wisdom Justify the Means

Craving new wisdom is easy.

Accepting that new wisdom no matter what can be more difficult than it can seem at first.
It's not even just a question of habit. It's about fully internalizing the "learner mindset" and refraining from our most natural animal spirits.

When we read something we don't like, we experience cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1957) and our natural reaction is to discard or attack the new source.

When we don't like someone, we experience a natural pushback to whatever he says.

Here are some examples:

Don't Let Bad Apple Spoil The Bunch

- Tony Robbins' nonsense

Tony Robbins in his Personal Power II talks about some law of attraction nonsense and he has some silly things to say about financial investment.

If I had let that one take away from the overall message, I would have lost on an otherwise breathtakingly beautiful program.

Don't Let The Bunch Spoil Good Apple

- 12 Rules For Life religious zealot

Sometimes it's the opposite.

Sometimes the gold nuggets are to be picked among tons of stones. The book 12 Rules For Life is too convoluted and packed with Bible references that go nowhere.

It's also quite right-wing. I read the Financial Times' review and The Guardian's summary before reading the book: both highly scathingly negative and derisive.

When I read 12 Rules For Life I realized the reviewers… Were kinda right? But they also completely missed the genius in the book. And there's quite a bit of it!
They allowed the bunch to spoil the few amazing apples.

Don't Let Bad Trees Spoil The Apple

- Robert Kiyosaki snake oil

Sometimes you don't really like the producer of the apples.

My instinctive reaction to Robert Kiyosaki after I uncovered a few murky moral spots was to immediately reject him and shut him down.

But his book Rich Dad Poor Dad has some simple yet groundbreaking content.
By dividing the message from the messenger I was able to fully internalize some powerful mindsets.

Attention, this doesn't mean you lower your standards for the people around you or lower your BS scan.
It only means that you filter in the great insights no matter where it comes from and no matter what else it comes from.

2. Open Yourself To Be Changed

> There's No Growth Without Change

When we encounter content that goes against our worldview, values, or current knowledge we experience cognitive dissonance and the immediate reaction is to push back and hold to our current state.

That's particularly important for those who, like me, are mismatchers (looking for opposing information) and highly critical thinkers (looking for holes and counterarguments).

One of the reasons I'm good at doing social dynamics breakdowns is exactly because of that: my natural tendency is to look for holes and inconsistencies, which helps me see when someone is full of "it".

Approaching a book with that mindset, though led me to look for ways to tear a message apart instead of learning from it.
I didn't eradicate my BS detector: it's what makes me a great book reviewer.

But I also force myself to be open to being changed while looking for new wisdom.
I'm not saying that I am always successful, but it helped me hugely.

Be Open to Disturbing Content

A special mention goes to "disturbing content".

This is content that hurts us because it reminds us of how we're not doing what we're supposed to be doing, how we're missing out in life, or how we've wasted so much time in the past with wrong decisions.

It's imperative you move past the first natural pushback here.

3. Prepare Your Mind To Absorb Information

Before starting a book I browse the synopsis, read the whole table of contents and even quickly scan a summary of that book.

Sometimes I might even read a few reviews.

It doesn't take long, but why doing it all?

Because when you don't prepare yourself, your brain is taxed with the complex task of making sense of things as you go.
Your brain needs to understand what's the topic, what's the overarching message each section builds to and what's the point with all the seemingly unconnected stories.
That's why sometimes people really get little from a wisdom-packed book: because they didn't prepare in advance and it was simply too much for them.

When you already have a general idea instead the brain is better prepared to absorb, make sense and retain that knowledge.
It knows which area of previous knowledge or experience it can activate, it understands where each individual part is moving towards.
And it can guess in advance what's the point of that long a*s story the author wants to surprise you with.

Reading Quickly

Here are a few tips to churn through a high number of books quickly:

1. Read Everywhere

Some people suggest finding a time and place where you read as that will solidify your habit. I say that's BS.

Your time and place to read are everywhere and at any time.

I read before going to bed. I often read while I eat as well (not I'm not that crazy, sometimes I just listen to music and dance between morsels).

And I take it with me whenever I travel. Too early at the airport or was the flight delayed? Great, I love it, best time to read!
Some asshole is pulling a power move on you and making you wait..? No problem, not gonna waste my time fiddling my thumbs.

I always have an audiobook on my mobile and always take earphones with me.
They are noise-canceling earphones, which means I can listen to books while I walk around traffic or as I'm on a bus -and without the need to pump that volume to ear-damaging levels-.

At home, I have two portable speakers that I connect with Bluetooth to my phone.
So when I'm in the bathroom flossing, I'm listening to audiobooks.
When I'm eating -if it's not something too crunchy and noisy-, I either call home or, you guessed it, listen to a book.
When I'm going through my stretching and exercising routine at home… I listen to audiobooks.

Some time ago I had started to switch the speaker from remote when I'd wake up so that I'd use those 10 minutes where you just lie in bed doing nothing (but I stopped it: that's my time to think and be grateful now).

Of course, don't go thinking I'm this monster of efficiency: plenty of times I slack off. Too many times. But I often remind myself I need to demand better of myself and the less I use those downtimes, the dumber I'll be. And then I force myself to tune in.

2. Leverage Audiobooks

I listen to audiobooks at faster the normal speed so I can read more in less time.

I try to go as fast as I can manage while still understanding the message.

I also earmark important parts so that when I summarize them, I can re-listen to those key parts without listening to the whole thing again. This is the equivalent of highlighting on an audiobook basically.

Unluckily I haven't yet found a highly efficient equivalent for the audiobook version of a note.
A nice feature would be an app allowing you to record your voice and insert it in the audio file, but I haven't found any for that (if you did, shoot me a message :).
Therefore, as of today, I jot down a few lines on an Evernote file on my phone for anything I absolutely want to keep top of my mind.

To play the audiobooks I use an app called Audipo. I chose it because it was the only one that allowed me to go faster than 2x.

Speed Training

At times I'm reading a book that is very easy, or I'm listening to a book a second time for a recap.

Or I might have forgotten to load a new one so I have no other options. I use these instances as "speed listening training".
Since full understanding is not a top priority anymore, I go slightly faster than I could otherwise so that I can train my ear to discern words faster.

Technical Tips

And here are more of the actual mediums I use:

Leveraging E-Readers

I highlight and take notes as I read.

Something that clicks and makes huge sense, I write "booom" in the notes.
Some amazing insight, I write "genius".
Something good, I write "that's true".
Something personally, I write "this is something you do / this is you".
If there's something I want to double-check, I write "check it", and that means I'll google that information later.

Then I copy-paste the highlighted parts on a Word file and that'll form the basis of my summary.

I also learned and applied some speed reading techniques (I was particularly slow before).

About the reader as a device, I used to have a Sony and now got a Kindle. My next one will be a Sony again because Epub are easier to find compared to Mobi and I save time in converting formats.

Best Dating Books for Women

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I have perused all the most popular dating books, resources, and gurus available when it comes to women's dating advice.

As a matter of fact, I'm not aware of a single major title I haven't read.

Coming up with a shortlist of the best dating books for women was not easy and some good titles had to be left out. But done with the talking.

Let's start:

Contents

- 10. Women Who Love Too Much
- 9. Date-Onomics
- 8. Seductresses
- 7. Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man
- 6. The Art of Seduction
- 5. The Woman's Guide To How Men Think
- 4. Attraction Explained
- 3. Never Chase Men Again
- 2. The Tao of Dating
- 1. Seduction University
- Good Dating Books for Women
- Also, Read

10. Women Who Love Too Much

by Robin Norwood
Summary | Audiobook

Let's start with the basics.

This is more of a self-help, self-love type of book, but it's a necessary step for some women in order to avoid scumbags and toxic relationships.
Self-love forms the foundation of any effective dating, and it becomes even more important for relationships.

I also recommend:

- Self-esteem in relationships: how healthy self-esteem underpins healthy relationships, as well as prevents abuse
- Psychopaths: the profiling of a sex predator: a sobering, even shocking analysis of a psychopath's strategy to procreate, abandon, and control women. Learn this for the red flags and types of men to avoid

9. Date-Onomics

by Jon Birger
Summary | Kindle | Print

Date-onomics is not a dating book in the strict sense of the word.

There are no “place yourself near him” tips or “make him chase” suggestions. But it’s the best book available to link behaviors, difficulty (or ease) in finding a good mate, and… Numbers.

One of the (many) key concepts is that in “difficult markets” women who date proactively win.

Date-onomics is eye-opening, fun, and highly applicable.
And it might have the best dating advice you could ever receive:

- The best way to (easily) find a man is to be in an environment with lots of high-quality men

Take care of that, and you might not need any further advice.

> Quote: “It’s not that he’s not that into you, it’s that there aren’t enough of him”

8. Seductresses

By Betsy Prioleau
Review

The seduction strategies outlined in this book only apply to 0.1% of women.

Such as much of the book deals with dating exceptions.

It's for women who are either extremely skilled, talented, driven, or, as well, for women who are extremely egotistical, narcissistic, or with sociopathic tendencies.

For most "normal" women, this book might actually be dangerous.
It's dangerous because much of Prioleau's strategies translated, half-baked and watered down, into feel-good self-development mantras such as "powerful women are attractive women" and "women who don't need a man attract men".
That's only true in a few specific cases, when the woman is "all in" and extraordinary, in her own way.
If she is middle-of-the-road, suburban, and office or small-business type of successful, then it likely won't apply.

But it's still a very important book to understand seduction at 360 degrees.

> Quote: Seduction demands spunk and "daimonic assertion." "Venus favors the bold!" Next they'd urge us to boost our self-esteem and get high, mighty, and magnificent. And, of course, to discover our genitals (…) Finally they'd advise us to tune out the pretty-power propaganda and dial up the neglected psychological arts.

7. Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man

[image]

by Steve Harvey
Summary | Kindle | Print |Audiobook

Two caveats: while Harvey proposes a 90 days no-sex rule, I believe long waiting times are unhelpful.
Steve also caters to more traditional men who want to be providers. He's right, but it doesn't apply to everyone.

That being said, Harvey has boatloads of dating wisdom and introduces one groundbreaking concept:

The Minimum Achievement Bar. It says that men need to reach their minimum life goals of income/career before they can fully focus on a woman.

Overall, in his huge bestseller, Harvey provides an effective crossover between actual dating and successful relationships.

> Quote: "Women who let him lead win at dating"

6. The Art of Seduction

[image]

by Robert Greene
Summary | Kindle | Print |Audiobook

Robert Greene is one of the deepest connoisseurs of human nature, world history, and psychology.

Different realms he wisely mixes and combines to back his theories with examples and famous case studies.

Greene (48 Laws of Power; Mastery) is one of my favorite authors, and his foray into seduction might as well be his crowning jewel.

I put it "only" as fourth in the best dating books for women list because it's heavy in theory. And the actual seduction stage is more geared toward men.
But don't get me wrong: The Art of Seduction will deepen your psychological knowledge of dating like few other books -if any- ever could.

> Quote: "Sirens offer the promise of endless pleasure… And a little bit of danger"

5. The Woman's Guide To How Men Think

by Shawn Smith
Review (removed) | Audiobook

A book on how men think… Written by an actual psychologist and couples' counselor.

Wow, what a rarity.

Add on top of the credentials actual great content, and you know why this book had to be here.

Most women know little about men and are ill-prepared to be in healthy relationships with men.
This book will help you date with a relationship in mind, setting up healthy dating patterns from early on, so that you can both enjoy a healthy relationship.

> Quote: Maybe you've seen one of those cartoon diagrams of a man's brain in which most of the brain areas are labeled "sex." Those cartoons might be more accurate if they depicted a man's brain as one giant marketing firm designed to earn the affection and admiration of women.

4. Attraction Explained

by Viren Swami
Summary | Kindle

Just when I thought "Date-Onomics" was the only source to provide some data and science on female dating, I stumbled onto Viren Swami's work.

And what a gem it is.

This book will help women cut through the BS of "Cosmopolitan" style advice by sharing what's been proven to work and what's most likely to backfire.

Here is one quick tip: "playing hard to get" is more likely to backfire because like begets like and dislike begets dislike.

Also, read more on scientifically proven dating strategies:

> 9 Proven Female Dating Strategies (Science-Based)

> Quote: "When we play hard-to-get, we give the impression that we dislike the person – and that just isn't conducive to sparking attraction"

3. Never Chase Men Again

[image]

by Bruce Bryans
Summary (removed) | Kindle | Print |Audiobook

Bruce Bryan focuses on high-quality men, and he does a great job at that. He really gets how high-quality men think.

A couple of takeaways from this great book:

1. Escalate Emotional Investment: when he's proven his worth, show vulnerability and escalate emotional investment. If he reciprocates, he's a keeper;
2. Don't move in if you want marriage: men consider moving in a way to test ride or forestall marriage.

And many more great pearls of wisdom await you in "Never Chase Men Again".

> Quote: "Men with a backbone don't take demands as a sign of quality but as self entitlement"

2. The Tao of Dating

by Ali Binazir
Kindle | Print |Audiobook

Binazir takes the top spot on our women's dating reading list when it comes to actual books.

As a matter of fact, I think this may be the most underrated book when it comes to dating advice for women.

The author has a deep grasp of human nature and understands dating and high-quality men's mindsets.
He shares lots of deep wisdom, some of which includes:

1. Fulfillment is a feeling NOT a person (so don't get hung up on any specific man)
2. Don't play unavailable games: it will mistakenly make you like him less (back justification)

He's also the only author of all the best dating books for women who says that early sex can gain you leverage if it's a great, guilt-free experience. And I couldn't agree more.

> Quote: "Respect for female strength does not translate into male attraction"

1. Seduction University

By Lucio Buffalmano
Overview

Seduction University is a course that includes written text, pictures, videos, and real-life examples.

It's a unique product that combines first-hand experience with science, and real-life examples of effective dating strategies and techniques.

That way, you learn what truly works, and you can see how to make it work.

Seduction University does not sugarcoat things to pander to the readers. But it provides you with real tools and strategies to become a more effective dater.
Whether you want more sex or a relationship, you will learn the best strategies to get them.

> Quote: "negotiating a mate is not that any other negotiation. The product you've got matters. But the good negotiators polish the product, present it well, engratiate the other party… And they get more.
> Same for dating. Learn what men want, market yourself accordingly, play often, play well… And you will win.

Good Dating Books for Women

Outside the "best of" list, but still books with some wonderful information and advice:

- The Power of The Pussy: a bit more focused on the friction and sexual conflict between men and women than on pure dating strategies. But good on tackling the basics and thumbs up for exhorting women to date more and give more men a chance rather than complaining and rejecting all men off the cuff.
- Why Men Love Bitches: this one is the female equivalent of "No More Mr. Nice Guy", and it's a good read for women who are way too nice. Just don't make the mistake of going to the opposite end and becoming too abrasive, because that doesn't work. Also watch out for the feminist undertones, because feminism can give you power outside of dating, but not so much dating power
- F*ck Him: takes some leaves out of the above two books, but with a more collaborative frame which I think is far more helpful to both date well, and start good relationships
- Get the Guy: this book takes a lot of male dating advice and repackages it for women. Sometimes, that doesn't work too well. But some other times, that's exactly what women need to do more. Starting from the mindset of taking a more active approach to their dating lives

The Criteria for The List

To make the cut in this dating books reading list I had a simple rule: there shouldn't be any major advice which, in my opinion, could work against women.

For example, the popular concepts of making him chase, invest and wait for sex as long as possible do sometimes work.
But, depending on the individual and the environment, they equally often backfire (they work better with low-quality men and avoidant men, -and you don't want either).
So I scrapped all books that only focus on those aspects.

Another popular concept is that of being a highly independent woman. That's very popular among female writers and feminist-leaning authors. But as good as it sounds on paper, there is plenty of evidence that it doesn't work well in dating -and telling other women to be strong and independent is a form of female intra-sexual manipulation-.
That type of advice makes you an effective gal at work and in life, but purely in terms of dating opportunities, it can be a double-edged sword.
So I eliminated the dating books that don't accurately flesh out those concepts (also see: successful women dating).

> Why Successful Women Fail At Dating (& How to Fix It)

Yet another popular concept is that of playing lots of dating games.
And you should play some games.
But too many of them, and too many win-lose games drive away the higher quality guys.
So I skipped all books that focus too much on win-lose games. And you should scrap those, by the way:

> 10 Nasty Games Women Play (Women, Stop These!)

The books in this list instead all share one thing in common: top dating advice for women with little or no downside.

Dating a Woman with Low Self-Esteem: A Guide for Men

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

You've probably heard the advice that you should never date a woman with low self-esteem.

While it's a generalization, there is some truth to it.
A woman with low self-esteem can make a great relationship feel like an uphill battle, leaving you confused, emotionally drained, and frustrated.

They tend to be more anxious, less trusting, and can create power dynamics that prevent a relationship from being a true partnership.

This article is a proactive guide for men on how to identify the key signs of low self-esteem early on and navigate these dynamics from a place of strength and purpose. You will learn:

- The psychological reasons why low self-esteem women can't handle a high-quality partner.
- The self-sabotaging "dances" that a man can fall into with them.A strategic framework for building relationships based on mutual respect, not codependency.

  - Low Self-Esteem Drives Quality Men Away

The Theory of Self-Esteem

We like people who build us up and make us feel good.
In psychology, this is sometimes referred to as self-enhancement.

Women with low self-esteem abide by the self-enhancement theory only at the beginning of dating.
This might be because women during dating are still in "assessment mode" and less focused on themselves.

But during long-term relationships, a switch happens.
Women with low self-esteem switch from self-enhancement (ie.: make me feel good") to self-verification (ie.: treat me like I deserve).

Self-verification means that people don't want to be treated well, but they want to be treated the same way they think they deserve to be treated.

Can you see the possible issue there?
If a woman thinks she is not worthy of a good man, she will find it difficult to deal with a man who treats her well. The man who treats her well feels like

Nobody can exactly say when that shift happens.
But when it does happen, women with low self-esteem grow apart from men who love them and treat them well. Why?

Because they revert back to their low self-appraisal and their mind goes:

> Why does he love me if I'm such a mess?
> Why does he think I'm great If I'm terrible?

When that happens cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1957) kick in. Cognitive dissonance is the mental discomfort in the presence of two opposing views.

Women with low self-esteem and loving partners feel like their loving partners don't really get them. So they lose emotional connection with their spouses. Distrust can also set in becuase they think that 'there must be something wrong if he's interested in me'.

Low Self-Esteem Inhibits Loving Relationships

Low self-esteem women seek consistency through their men's actions.

Any man who treats them well is not consistent with their own self-beliefs. They cannot trust loving men and cannot feel a connection with loving men.
How could they?
Loving men see them as lovable, but they see themselves as unworthy!

The result?
Low self-esteem women sadly cannot hold a happy relationship with loving men over the long haul.

Steps For Men

1. Understand Her Psychology & Sabotage Behavior

The core scientific concept you need to grasp is self-verification theory (Swann, 2012).

In a nutshell, people seek consistency between their internal self-image and how others treat them.
A woman with low self-esteem believes she is unworthy of a high-value man's love.

When you treat her well, it creates cognitive dissonance—a mental discomfort from two conflicting beliefs: "He loves me" and "I am unlovable."

This can cause her to subconsciously sabotage the relationship to confirm her negative self-belief.

Identify the Behavioral Patterns

Scientific research shows that low self-esteem manifests in specific behaviors. Your first step is to recognize these patterns without taking them personally:

- Constant reassurance-seeking: She frequently asks, "Do you love me?" or "Am I good enough?"

- Self-sabotage: She may pick fights, pull away, or become overly critical of you to create distance.
- Jealousy and suspicion: She may question your intentions or get jealous of your friends or accomplishments.
- Rejection of compliments: She might deflect or argue with you when you give her sincere praise, as it doesn't align with her self-image.

2. Choose: Work It Or End It

It's not your duty to save or fix anyone.

However, if you want to, it's fair to decide to at least try.

And if you want to give it a try, you must do your part.

Your goal is to not just be a good partner, but to help her rewrite her internal narrative.
You must help her believe she is worthy of you.

Here are some approaches for that:

3. Implement Proactive, High-Authority Strategies

- Validate, Don't Just Reassure: Instead of just saying "I love you," validate her feelings. If she says, "I'm not good at anything," you can say, "It sounds like you're feeling down about yourself right now. I want you to know that I see how hard you work on X, and I admire that." This acknowledges her pain while providing specific, authentic praise.
- Model Self-Respect and Boundaries: Your job isn't to fix her, but to be a model of a healthy, high-value partner. A woman with low self-esteem can unconsciously try to drag you down to their level. By maintaining your own self-respect and setting healthy boundaries, you demonstrate what a balanced, respectful relationship looks like. You are a leader, not a fixer
- Encourage Self-Care and Growth: The real work must come from her. Support her in finding hobbies and activities that build her own sense of self-worth outside of the relationship. This could be anything from joining a group to picking up a new skill.
- Communicate with Kindness and Clarity: Use the Gottman method's principle of "turning toward" your partner's emotional bids. When she tries to open up, respond with curiosity and empathy, not logic or defensiveness. At the same time, if a behavior is unacceptable, communicate your needs clearly and respectfully, without being critical. For example, "When you accuse me of flirting with my coworker, I feel hurt. It makes me want to pull away."
- Avoid the "Fixer" Role: You cannot heal her. Your role is to be a supportive partner, not a therapist. If she is struggling with deep-seated issues, gently suggest professional help.

4. Don't Be Paranoid, But Be Careful of Infidelity

Low self-esteem overlaps with anxious attachment, and both may predispose to infidelity.

Writes Susan M. Hughes in The Oxford Handbook of Infidelity:

> Individuals high in anxious attachment may be willing to risk engaging in a secretive infidelity relationship as the other man/woman simply because it is a way in which they can receive a self-esteem boost and feel greater intimacy that they so desire.

⚠ 5. Ensure It's Not A Tactic

Finally, as experts on power and manipulation dynamics, we must raise a warning here.

This is something that other resources shy away from.

But seeking your validation or creating issues can be a manipulative tactic to make you invest more in the relationship.

For example, Buss notes that women who pursue a short-term mating strategy appear to intentionally signal sexual exploitability.

Some cues to exploitability may be similar to low self-esteem.
Such as: While men evolved to spot and potentially target exploitable women, women may have learned to send false signals of exploitability to arouse and gain male investment.

These cues of exploitability may overlap with low self-esteem.

Don't Fall For Toxic Relationship Dynamics

Finally, cycles of up and downs, pursuing and avoiding, and fighting and making up can lead to toxic relationship dances.

That may also be an evolved tactic to maintain a man's interest.
Crosby makes this point in The Cambridge Handbook of Sexual Psychology and Female Adaptations.

He hypothesizes that 'when women face a mate retention problem, they may experience increases in sexual desire, engaging in sex in response to facilitate partner retention'.

That 'pattern retention' means getting mired and stuck in a toxic relationship.

This is a pattern I've noticed from anxiously attached women and borderline personality disorder (BPD).
And self-esteem appears to be more unstable among BPD as well as among anxiously attached women.

Her Part of The Work

Here are some behaviors you want to encourage, demand, or expect from her if you wish to work on your relationship:

1. Accept positive feedback

Chronic low self-esteem women reject positive feedback.

She must fight that urget and willingly allow it to sink in.

2. Make herself useful

We base much of our self-esteem on how useful (and needed) we are to others.

Here's a win-win then: join an organization, engage in service, focus on helping people. Being useful to the world will lift her spirit like few other things will.

Or, simply, she may be more supportive towards you.

3. Build antifragile ego

It's easy to break our spirit when our ego is built around "being good".

Self-esteem built around being good is easy to destroy: just make a mistake and you're not good anymore.

This is also why women whose goal is to be good wives to an abusive man often stay with low self-esteem: he proactively seeks to makes her feel 'not a good wife'.

Instead, encourage her to build her self-esteem around non-fragile beliefs, like:

Build your self-esteem around concepts that are not assailable instead.
Something like:

1. I try my best, whether I win or fail, I judge myself on doing my best
2. I'm a learner: mistakes don't define me, but help me move forward

Also, read "the antifragile ego".

4. Demand and expect authenticity

The "faker" she is, the more the main issues will go unresolved.

Fakeness and games may 'work' during courtship and dating, but as soon as you move in, the issues will only get bigger.

Note:
This largely rest on you, in being able to spot the games, call them out, and demand better.

6. Get good... At something

Encourage her to do something she's good at.
Or even better, to start improving at something.

Join a gym, a Toastmasters club and overcome the fear of public speaking, or as simply as learning to cook a new meal.

She needs to feed her brain with something that she can use to tell yourself "see? I'm not that bad, I learned and improved on this one thing".

Finally, I want to dispel a myth:

Why do men like women with low self-esteem?

First off, it's not true that all men like women with low self-esteem.

But some men prefer women who signal 'exploitability' because they may be easier to control (Buss, 2019).
And some men may also find signals of exploitability attractive for short-term mating, or even predation.
For example, imprisoned psychopaths have been shown to target victims based on cues of exploitability.

This is why low-esteem women tend to attract and keep lower-quality men.

More controlling and abusive types of men may even prefer a low self-esteem partner.
They don't even have to do the 'work' of lowering her self-esteem, and she is less likely to run away from value-taking control tactics.

Low Self-Esteem Drives Quality Men Away

High-quality men tend to be put off by low self-esteem women.

Low self-esteem women tend to drive away quality men, but stay in lower quality relationships.

A lower quality and more abusive type of man behaves in a way that is consistent with a woman's negative self-image.
This is what she tells herself after the abuse:

> He's right… I am terrible. I deserve it

A relationship with an abusive man hurts her, but she stays with abusers because abusive behavior is consistent with her own self-image.

Are those guys treating her well?
They're fake and never really understood her.

Takeaways

- Business is about people
- You can't go far alone
- You should treat networking seriously for what it is: one of the most important tools for success

Notes

About the Author:
Keith Ferrazzi is an Italo-American entrepreneur, speaker, and author.
Ferrazzi says that a lot of problems, even in business, are not business problems but people's problems. And he made people the focus of his career.

The Mind-Set of Networking

1. You can't go very far alone
2. Seed relationships today to enjoy tomorrow's fruits
3. Ask! You need to ask
4. The power of networks grows exponentially
5. To get: give

Smarts, talent, and resources all matter. But they still won't do much by themselves without good people around them.

Business is a human enterprise.
When you strip any business, at its core, is always about people dealing with people. People selling to people, people working with people, people hiring people, etc., etc.

Connecting for Options

Why would you want to connect with more people?

Many reasons, Ferrazzi says.
Including:

- Financial safety
- Career options
- Control over one's life

Ferrazzi says that in a world of shifting employments and shorter stints, connecting replaces the old loyalty and security that big organizations used to provide.

This is an idea I espouse as well to give yourself more power and control over your own life (read: how to deal with a bad boss).

Relationships Are Give and Take

Giving and taking are interlinked, you can't just do one or you'll only do half the equation.

A network functions only as long as the different needs are recognized and met, and that's at the core of the give and take.

Finally, Ferrazzi proposes that you focus on giving first without keeping scores. The more people you help, the more help you will receive.

And he paraphrases Kennedy in saying "don't ask what people can do for you, but ask what you can do for them" (albeit that was a big political manipulation).

Adding People to Your Goal Setting

Keith Ferrazzi proposes a goal-setting path with a twist: adding people to it.

Devise your goals in the next three years, then break them down by months and smaller goals.
Then connect those goals to people who can help you obtain them.

The last step?

Find what you can give these people and how you will reach them.

Never Eat Alone: Stay Visible

Never eating alone means keeping your networking schedule always full.

One connection might not pan out, but you must have another 6 engagements just like that lined up over the week through breakfast, lunches, or after-work events.

As an up-and-comer you must do the legwork: stay visible, connect, and network.

Networking Tips

1. Do your homework: know what they're like before meeting them

2. Follow up: remind them what you can do for them, not the other way around
3. Be authentic: Ferrazzi says vulnerability is one of the most underrated traits
4. Treat gatekeepers well: they're often close to the decision-makers
5. On events: help organize them and speak there
6. Relationships are like muscles: the more you use them (give & take) the stronger they get
7. Connect with connectors: those people who know everyone
8. Exchange networks: everyone in your network is a door to a huge network; help them with yours, and they'll help you with theirs
9. Quality time for deeper relationships! What are they about? Health, wealth, and children are usually what matters most to people
10. Ping! The network will die unless you keep in touch. Pinging is grunt work, but it's what keeps your network alive

How to Give Value

To develop a good network, you need to be a valuable person to others.

Here are the three tips:

- Opinions

Ferrazzi says that to be interesting, you need to have some uniqueness.
Talking about events and stuff is not enough, have an opinion on them instead.

- Expertise

Forget about job titles: what's your expertise? Become a master at something so that you can bring expertise to the table.

- Story

Once you know who you are, what you stand for, and what's your expertise: build a compelling story around it.

Develop a Brand

A brand is what everyone thinks of you when they see you or hear your name.
Here are a few tips to develop a good brand:

- Distinct Message

Have a clear message associated with your and to your name.

- Package the Brand

Visuals matter more than words. Be polished,

- Stay True to It

Look the part and live the brand.

Mentors

Keith Ferrazzi strongly recommends you find mentors.

A mentor, different than a coach, is someone who is emotionally invested in you. Someone who really wants to help you and see you grow.

The key to finding a mentor, as usual, is looking for what you can give them.

I also recommend you read Mastery by Robert Greene for more on mentors.

> Networking is not a zero sum game

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Give, Share & Feed
Share your contacts, make intros, and give to your network.

Ping
Making contacts will become a fool's errand unless you stay in touch with them. Ping your network from time to time to keep the relationship alive.

Keep a full schedule!
Always keep a full schedule of people you meet. From meeting people for breakfast to lunches to after-work events, always be on the go and always exchange contacts.

Keep a file!
Keep a file of the people you meet. I do it, and I write some key info about people I see daily or whom I deem worthy.

Don't be afraid of approaching big names
Another big takeaway for me is a powerful reminder that people are people. It doesn't matter what their business card reads, we all want the same thing and we all equally appreciate people who connect with us and care about us. So do connect with the bigger names in the room.

CONS

Self Referential
Several passages are a bit too much about the author and his accomplishments.

Self Serving
Albeit Ferrazzi tells you to give and not keep score, ultimately that's not what he's angling for. Connections for him as for your own utility. Which is normal, but it somewhat came across a bit too egotistical and self-referential at times.

Review

Never Eat Alone is a powerful reminder of something that is too often forgotten by many: business is about people. And personal success, I would add, is also about people.

Anything people do, as a matter of fact, is about people. People are always central to almost anything you want to accomplish.

It's both easy to read and useful, I can recommend it.

Conversation Starters for High-Power Men That Work Every Time

Lucio Buffalmano · 18 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

High-value men use conversation starts to sub-communicate power and confidence from the get-go.

High-value conversation starters aren't about being funny, 'unique', or impressive. Those are try-hard. Great conversation starters communicate power, poise, masculinity, and confidence.

This guide gives you proven conversation starters to connect, lead, and leave a lasting impression—especially with women and people of value.

The best conversation starters do three things:

- Make your entrance seamless and natural
- Add value without demanding too much (easy on the receiver)
- Makes you look positive and confident

Contents

- Best Conversation Starters
- Keep The Conversation Going
- End The Conversation
- Bad Conversation Starters
- Summary

Best Conversation Starters

People on their own are always your best bet to start a conversation. But as you become higher status, you can approach anyone, and even groups.

These work because their simplicity communicate confidence. Simplicity displays the confidence of the man who knows his value and doesn't need to try hard.

Walks to someone and simply say:

- Hi, I'm Lucio

If you have someone near with a drink momentarily on his own raise your drink for a toast and say:

- Cheers!

In line for the drinks or as you're side by side against the bar:

- How you doing

To approach a group, hover a few secs on the periphery. If nobody turns, keep moving. If the group stops:

- Hey guys, I'm Lucio, hi (shake hands in a circle)

When you want to impose your presence without waiting for anybody, step into the group and say:

- Hey, do you mind me joining, I'm Lucio

Or even simpler, which is confidence while also building them up at the same time. Put a mischievous smile on and say:

- Hi guys, I wanted to join you :)

At buffets with high tables, any table is an easy island to plant your flag on. Then you're a micro-host of your table island.
As soon as you see someone interesting pass by, start talking:

- Hey, how are you enjoying the event

If the table is busy but there's enough space for one more go for it. Nobody can refuse space: they are shared.
Put on a warm smile and put them in front of your fait accompli intrusion:

- Hi, I hope you don't mind me sharing the table

Compliments are another fantastic way of starting a conversation.
Approaching someone who spoke at an event:

- I loved your speech. Especially the courage of putting yourself out there: so open and vulnerable

To anyone who put effort into his appearance:

- I love your style man

To the host:

- Hey, thank you for organizing and great job, it's such a great event

Here are a few tips to keep the conversation going after you've delivered your conversation starter

Keep The Conversation Going

Always go for open-ended questions that get people talking:

- How did you end up here
- How come you chose this event

I particularly love to re-open people you spoke to earlier, either as part of a group or from a previous conversation.
Also, notice the finessing of saying "I heard it's a competitive field", so if it's not going well you already offer him an excuse to say it's not exactly flying :)

- How's that VR company you launched going, I heard it's a competitive field

Look for interesting bits where to dig deeper:

- Oh wow, you two were in a relationship and now you go out together as friends? Respect, how did that work out for you

Look for commonalities:

- Oh, you're also in tech, cool. What kind of tech start-up are you in

P.S.: you can use the above even when you're not in the same field or have the same interest. Maybe you worked there in the past, have friends who work there or you're just interested in it.

End The Conversation

Always end the conversation on a high.
For example:

- I see, sounds like a great plan. Hey, I wish you all the best with it, I'll take a walk and see you around

Or if you exchanged contacts and agree to meet again:

- Cool, I admire your determination. Kate, it was a pleasure! I'll write you later to schedule something then

And here are's the bonus on the conversation starters you want to avoid:

Bad Conversation Starters

I scoured around the web for common conversation starters, and while most of them are good, they're not ideal for a masculine and confident man.
These openings for example are good for average folks, but fall flat on the top 1%:

- Which [speaker/panel] are you most excited about?

Few if any really care about the speakers.

One, it's because you don't learn from prepared speeches; top achievers learn from experience, handbooks, or coaching from other top achievers.

Most others are there to network, enjoy the free food, show their new dress, and possibly meet some girl/man.
They're all focused on themselves and asking about the speakers shows a lack of understanding of their world.

- Tell me about you

What's wrong with this?
It asks for major investment right off the bat and socially aware people don't like that (same as for dating).
This is, effectively, a power move as it asks people to jump through your hoops before you give anything.
It works well if it's a dating situation and a man wants to get a woman to invest quickly, but otherwise, avoid it!

- What's your story?

Just imagine someone walks up to you and asks you what's your story. How do you even reply to that?
The only fair reply I can think of is "and who the hell are you".
Never start telling your story to someone you've just met!

- What personal passion project are you working on

This is the equivalent of Trump describing the way he meets women: grabbing them by their private parts.
Openers like there indeed are equivalent to conversation starters' rape.
Open neutrally first, and build up as you go deeper.

Summary

Here's a step-by-step to make your conversation starter work well:

1. Nonverbal comes first: warm smile, open body language
2. Start easy: the most receptive people, the wallflowers, etc.
3. Say "hi, how is it going, my name is"
4. Talk a bit, then move: socialization is like a snowball: the more momentum you get the better you perform

How Women Seek to Become “The Prize” In Relationships

Lucio Buffalmano · 19 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The relationship prize is the higher value and higher power partner in a relationship.

Women seek to be the relationship prize to make men commit and invest, keep men around, and control the relationship.

Women have three ways to become the relationship prize:

- Become a high-value woman
- Date a man with lower sexual-market value, or clueless about power dynamics
- Use manipulation and power moves.
  for example:
  - Nasty dating power moves: these are the win-lose games designed to make him chase and invest
  - Relationship manipulative games: these are the equivalent games to keep him investing and pedestalizing
- The first one is what high quality women do.
- The second is fair enough.
- And the third is what you want to avoid the most.
- Unluckily it’s also the most common.
  People don’t like the hard work of the holistic approach so resort to dark psychology and relationship power games.

This article deals with relationship power plays.

Example: How My Ex Set Herself Up As The Prize

Here is how one of my exes’ power play to set herself up as the relationship prize:

My first girlfriend, whom we’ll call A, had a very traumatic breakup with her first boyfriend, whom we’ll call “EX”.

Splitting up took a big emotional toll on A and she lost the childhood “feeling of home” after that.

EX took full advantage of it whenever he saw fit (read: whenever he wanted to bust a nut). He kept re-entering G’s life and caused the breakup of two of her new relationships.

Sometimes he re-entered -pun intended- her life sexually and sometimes sexually and in an emotionally destructive fashion (very weak of him BTW).

One evening my ex was talking to me about EX and I told her I didn’t want to hear about him at that time.
Sensing that I was a bit peeved about the topic, she replied cheering me up:

> Her: But you should be happy: you won!

Interesting statement.
It was the first time I heard that, but not the last.

Now, what does that actually say?

The True Meaning Behind Her Power Play

When a woman communicates to you, directly or indirectly, that you “won” over the competition, she is doing two things:

1. Implying that she’s in demand
2. Setting herself as the prize of the relationship

In my example, it was very direct.
But some other times, it can be more indirect.
Some examples are:

> “I prefer you”

or

> “you’re better”

Yes, it’s a way of complimenting you, and yes, it does raise your value (somewhat).
But it raises your value by comparing you to other men who were in the running.
She’s still the chooser among several candidates.
And the one who chooses is always the prize in the relationship.

Furthermore, there’s often a darker side implied in the contest power move. And that’s: are those other men really out of the running or should you stay watchful?

The “contest power play”, as I will call it is a weak form of triangulation, which is a very nasty mind game women play.

At the end of the day, you’re never in the best position when you get compared to others.
And of course, it does not set a win-win dynamic for the relationship either.

> 10 Nasty Games Women Play (Women, Stop These!)

Consequences of “Contest Power Plays”

Contest power plays are so obvious that even a clueless me of more than a decade ago could see it from a mile away.

It bothered me and it only ended up taking points away from her.

Whenever a girl uses the competition of other men to become the prize in a relationship, she’s not doing anybody a favor.
Not to the relation, not to you, and, ultimately, she’s undermining herself too.
Here’s what it says about her:

1. She thinks you’re so dumb you’ll be proud for “winning”
2. Such low-level power plays say bad things about her IQ
3. Using exes and other men as power plays is rather low
4. It might be a sign of insecurity
5. Power plays or building a great relationship: you can’t have both. What is she focusing on?

Overall, it’s a move that a low-quality woman would do.

Reacting to Relationship Prize Power Plays

And here’s what you do when she tries to become the prize of the relationship with a contest power move.

1. Ask her why she’s comparing you to her exes or to other men
2. Go meta (ie.: explain what she’s doing)
3. Show what the proper way of behavior is through your values

In this case, it’s something like this:

> I’m not really comfortable with you saying that.
> I feel you are stacking me up against exes and making a contest out of it. I have no interest in being part of a competition of winners and losers.
> We are together now, and I hope in the future as well. And that’s what matters.
> I see relationships as collaborations to be better… together. and as much as I am very glad we ended up together, I also believe you won as well.
>
> And unless you’re curious or it’s relevant to the topic, I have no interest in discussing my exes with you.
>
> This relationship is about you and I, and I wanna keep it that way. My exes have no part in it.
> I’d like if it were the same on your side.

Now that will actually shame her.
She will likely backtrack and make excuses.
And that's good.
Albeit strong and critical, your message is a collaborative one and the best way of approaching relationships.

Then watch.
Does she drop the BS going forward? Great.
If not, well… You might want to re-assess your relationship.

This is the mindset of high-quality men who also happen to be "enlightened collaborators":

> They want and prefer kind and collaborative women for the woman they will elect as their partner. But they know that not every woman is up for that position.
> And so, they must test and screen.

Nasty Relationship Prize Games

The "contest power play" is annoying.

And yet, it's not the worst kind of relationship power play.

It sets her up as the prize of the relationship but does so by raising your value and complimenting you.
And that's inherently a "kinder" type of relationship power play.

But there are of course far nastier power moves that women (or men) use to set themselves up as the prize of the relationship.

Some of them include:

1. Threatening to end the relationship (breakup threats to keep him on his toes);
2. Devaluing his efforts (hints he's not being enough for her, also read female relationship control)
3. Lowering his self-esteem (to keep him dependent on her approval, this is the nastiest side of soft power)
4. Raising jealousy (= "look at how many options I have, I'm the real prize here")

Discussing every single one here would transform this article into a book, but as you can see we have already covered many of these, so you can browse around a bit.

However, I want to leave you with a quick final warning that is very important.

Differentiating between good power plays and nasty ones makes the difference between a great relationship with a high-quality woman and a toxic relationship with a low-quality one.

Here is a quick way to differentiate between the two:

1. Fair games: Games to make you value her more without pushing you down are "fair" types of games, and what any high-quality individual would do
2. Nasty games: Games that bring you down are poisonous and toxic

You can try to educate women who play the first kind of relationship power plays.
But you should be very watchful for the second type and consider dropping her if you spot them in more than one instance.

Because that's emotional abuse.

As an example of the second, nastier type of relationship power plays, you can watch this video analysis of Elon Musk's relationship:

Full Summary

"Why Marriages Succeed or Fail" leverages years of research and contains lots of expletive examples.
The examples are not present in this summary.

Types of Successful Marriages

Gottman highlights 3 different types of successful marriage.

And do you want to guess what's a major way to tell them apart?
How they fight :).

Here are the three types:

- Validating

They're calm and make an effort to understand their partner's point of view and their emotions.
They use a lot of "aha" and "I see" and encourage the partner to share everything.

Validating couples tend to have traditional and defined roles and to be good friends valuing the “we” of their marriage.

Risks: passionless and losing sight of unique personalities for the “we”.
But overall it’s a solid marriage.

- Volatile

Frequent and heated arguments without listening to each other. They’re all about winning.
They value full honesty and independence.

Risks: Can verbally hurt each other or lead to violence in extreme cases.

- Avoidant

They minimize conflicts and avoid “unsolvable” issues altogether.
The bond is so strong that it trumps the disagreements.

Risks: They don’t learn to address issues. And they are low on introspection and understanding, which can lead a partner to think their spouse doesn’t really understand them.

Matrix of Types

These are the different mixes of personalities we can have.

“You” is the first half:

- Conflict Avoider / Volatile

You can feel overwhelmed with conflict engagers and feel your partner is too combative. You can feel it’s too much when they “force” you to resolve conflicts (instead of sidestepping).

- Volatile / Conflict Avoider

Your spouse probably feels you always bring conflict into the marriage and that you are overly emotional

- Validator / Volatile

You find your partner argumentative and domineering and they don’t give you the chance to express your feelings.
You wish you could work more as a unit and as a “we”

- Volatile / Validator

You perceive your partner as too detached. You try to get a rise out of your partner sometimes and feel like your need for autonomy falls on deaf ears.

Types of Unsuccessful Marriage

Gottman recognizes two types of relationships when they’re heading toward divorce.

- Hostile Engaged

They argue often and use name-calling and sarcasm.

- Hostile detached

They are equally offensive to each other, but without fully engaging their spouse. It happens when two stonewallers are in a relationship and it’s the most likely to break up.

What Determines Successful Marriages

Gottman says that happiness in relationships is not in a particular style of fighting or making up, but:

- Balance between positives and negatives (5 positives to 1 negative minimum)
- Actions toward each other

Later in the book he gives two more pointers:

- Agreeing on a style to handle disagreements with
- Repair mechanisms (to limit negativity and increase positivity)

If you allow negativity without making an effort for positivity your marriage will get sour.
Gottman advises making an effort. Think of your spouse in a positive light during the day, for example.

And notice that anger per se is not negative (unless expressed with contempt, defensiveness, and criticism).
Couples who divorce and split up fight a lot, yes, but volatile couples also fight a lot. But then make up for it with far more time laughing, joking, and loving each other.

Disagreement is Needed

Gottman then wonders if it wouldn't be better to avoid all disagreement and negativity.

He says in the short run maybe yes, but in the long run, couples need to hear the differences.
Disagreements and anger might lead to short-term misery, but they're helpful in the long run.

The Four Horsemen of The Apocalypse

Relationships with lots of negativity often have toxic elements which Gottman dubs "the four horsemen of the apocalypse".
He chose that name because they easily predict marriage dissolution.

Here they are:

1. Criticism

There's a key difference between complaining and criticizing.

Complaining mentions a specific behavior or instance, or something you wish would be different.
They often start with "I".

Criticism is a global attack on personality or character and passes a judgment. They often begin with "you" and add "always" or "should".

Examples:

> You always do that, you only think about yourself

Antidote: complain without blame and make your criticisms specific. Use I statements and express your needs in a positive form. What would you like to see more?

2. Contempt

Contempt is the intention to insult, hurt and psychologically abuse your partner.

The partner using contempt takes a position of superiority and wants to make the other feel inferior and unworthy.
When contempt engulfs your relationship you have difficulty remembering any single positive quality of your partner.

Signs of contempt are:

- Insults and name-calling (bitch, fat, ugly, failure, losers..)
- Hostile humor "we could go there… If you can manage to move from the couch, that is"
- Ridicule "oh yeah you sooo care about me"
- Facial expressions (sneering, rolling eyes, curling upper lip)

Antidote: it's the greatest predictor of divorce and must be fixed. You counteract it with a culture of appreciation and respect.

3. Defensiveness

Play the victim, counterattack, or rightful indignation. You deploy them to defend yourself or reverse the blame. Defensiveness prevents you from solving the problem and making your partner feel heard and cared for.
The partner using defensiveness feels under siege and therefore doesn't see anything wrong with being defensive, which makes it so hard to invert.

Signs of defensiveness:

- Denying responsibility
- Cross-complaining (ignore your partner and launch your own complaint)

-You never sit with us for dinner
-It's because you never clean the place and it's so dirty

- Denying previous commitments "I never said I would do X"
- Making excuses "it was external forces that led me to do that.."
- False smile, protective body language (moving from side to side, closing off, self-soothing)

Antidote: Calming yourself is the first step, then stop seeing your partner's words as an attack and force yourself to understand and empathize.

4. Stonewalling

Stonewalling happens when one partner withdraws from an argument or interaction.
He stops engaging or physically leaves to convey disapproval and distance.

You could see stonewalling as the opposite of exploding. It's an implosion and, similar to exploding, does not help your relationship.

Most stonewallers are men (85%) and they often do it not to hurt their wives but while trying to be neutral. However, women's heart rate jumps when their husbands stonewall them as for women it's emotionally painful (men are not as bothered by wives stonewalling them instead).

Stonewalling can compound when the wife's kitchen sinks, such as starts aggressing more and more to get a reaction out of him, starting a vicious circle.

Antidote: let your partner know that you need to take a break. Then calm down and go back to engage her (/him).

Inner Scripts Impaired

Gottman says that the tipping point towards divorce happens when the four horsemen turn our internal self-narratives fully negative.

When that happens, we can't see past criticism to find a solution. We hear a complaint and we think "typical of this princess", or "classic of his ahole attitude".

When that happens, we cannot avoid defending ourselves and we can't see any qualities in our partners anymore. Everything our partner says takes a negative connotation.
The two types of impaired scripts:

- Innocent victim

As long as you feel like an innocent victim of an abuser, your marriage will not improve

- Righteous indignation

Feeling like a victim plus hostility and contempt towards the spouse.
When inner scrips are permanently damaged it leads to vicious cycles of negativity

Flooding

Flooding is the experience of feeling swamped or "system overload".

Men get flooded more easily, which possibly explains why men are more likely to stonewall (imploding under pressure).

Gottman says people can become chronically flooded. And that's when inner scripts get impaired.
The flooded partner ignores positive gestures or sees them with suspicion. And interprets negative interactions as "the clear sign of who he really is".

Flooding is the driving force behind the isolation cascade that leads to dissolution.

The stages are:

1. You see your marital problems as severe
2. Talking about problems with your spouse seems useless (and look for solutions on your own)
3. You start leading parallel lives (and actively avoiding your partner)
4. Loneliness (the marriage is unofficially over)

If you feel lonely, you need to admit to your spouse how you feel. Let them know you're lonely and you need to change or you fear for your relationship.

Breaking Cycle of Negativity

To avoid flooding:

- Calm yourself

First, recognize when you're flooding. To calm yourself down, breathe slowly and deeply.

Take a break for 20 mins and only go back when you're fully physiologically calm. If you don't, you'll take over your partner's emotions.
It's important you don't think of your spouse or of the fight, especially in negative forms. Instead, read, work, and read a magazine.

Gottman proposes to measure the heart rate and advises the exact percentages at which you should take a break.
I don't feel it's helpful for most couples as they won't go that far. Just keep in mind that you're only fully calm after you actually feel fully calm. So stay another 15 minutes away.

- Speak non defensively

Start with listening non-defensively. Empathize and put yourself in your partner's shoes.

Avoid any facial expression that conveys disappointment or sarcasm.

- Validate each other and the relationship: praise and admiration

Gottman says that we sometimes focus on negatives to improve, but we must be careful not to let negativity take center stage.
Looking at the positive also works in relationships as in all other areas of life.
Using lots of praise and admiration is a great way to forestall cycles of negativity and institutionalize virtuous cycles instead.

- Internalize the principles

Changing is not a matter of one-off changes. It's a matter of repetition: you must internalize the changes (read the power of habits).

Gender Difference: Women VS Men

Gottman first warns of the dangers of generalization because that's what they are: generalizations.

With that in mind, here are some key differences between gender:

- Women have an easier time with emotions; men get lost in a sea of emotions
- Men have shorter fuses and tend to get flooded quicker -criticism is enough-
- Stonewalling is distressing for men as they brood on the issue; for women because they want to work through emotional issues
- Men tend avoiding issues; women prefer to address issues
- Men can have sex even when angry or distant; women don't

On average, women are the emotional managers in relationships and the ones to bring up difficult topics.

Advice for Men

- Embrace her anger: she's not attacking you, she just needs you to address the issue

Advice for Women:

- Confront him calmly
- Say you still love him and only want to change a specific behavior
- Let him know that talking is a way to keep your relationship great

Advice for Both:

- Accept the differences

Suggestions for Happy Marriage

A few more tips on improving your marriage:

- Schedule discussions (and don't postpone)
- Divide discussions in:
  - agenda
  - persuasion/arguing
  - resolution (only say yes to something you're happy with)
- Summarize your partner's point of view or what you agree on instead of only your opinion

- Be realistic in your exceptions and accept differences
- Make time for the things that make you two happy
- Experience new things together
- Tell the stories of your common good times: glorify them

Real-Life Applications

Take Care of Your Relationships
There's so much great information here that I cannot summarize it in one go. The only thing I'd like you to focus on is to… Focus on your relationship.
It's one of the most important determinants of your happiness, health, and even success.
And the good thing? You don't just do it for yourself but also for your partner (and the people around you).

CONS

Repetition
There's so much information that I'd have really appreciated a better structure.

Review

Why Marriages Succeed or Fail is another pearl from John Gottman.

The book is too good to summarize effectively and it has a ton of examples that will help you understand the concept to make your marriage great again (and sorry for spoofing Trump :).

The 10 Best Free Book Summary Websites

Lucio Buffalmano · 19 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

As the main editor at The Power Moves, having analyzed and published more than 500+ books reviews over 10 years on psychology, strategy, and human behavior, I'm very familiar with the 'free book summary industry'.

In this review, I list the best free book summary websites, differentiating based on added value and Return on Investment for high-value men who want more than generic information.

This analysis of the free book summary industry ranks options based on critical approach, summary quality, and effectiveness for ambitious men to achieve their goals.
You'll find out:

- Who actually adds value
- Who just repackages ideas
- And where most readers get misled

Table Comparison

The most crucial differences is between free summaries that only summarize, and free summaries that critically analyze books:

Feature	Summary-only Sites (Blinkist, 12Min)	Strategic Audit Sites (TPM, Nat Eliason)
Primary Goal	Save time / General Knowledge	Acquire Power / Strategy
Tone	Neutral / Professional	Critical / Analytical
Critical Vetting	Rare ("faithful" to author)	Strict (Logic Audits; TPM vets for science)
Social Engineering	None	High (Extraction of Strategies & Tactics)

10. ~~Optimize.me~~ (Library)

Edit:
Optimize.me used to be a top choice, but does not do summaries anymore. Brian's old reviews are still available on his YouTube channel.

It's refreshing to see a human being deliver the book summaries and reviews, rather than the more typical "animated summaries" that are common on YouTube.

I sometimes see his advertising on Facebook and I can tell you that he is the only guy I am actually happy to see among the ever-annoying Tai Lopez, Sam Ovens, and all other 'gurus'.

⍰ Pros

- Contagiously positive guy

Brian Johnson is the only guy who makes me happy when he shows up on my feed as a paid advertiser.
Don't ask me how he pulls that off, but he does :).

- High-quality free book summaries
- The blackboard style feels like a free online university
- "Meta-summaries" by topic: The best shortcut to knowledge

Brian and ThePowerMoves are the only ones on this list to provide "meta-summaries" by topic.
Such as taking tens of books on a given topic and summarizing all their content into one (VS a summary for each different book).
That way, you can get an overview of the whole literature in one hour, saving tons of money and time.

⍰ Cons

- Less critical reviews

Brian Johnson is one of those reviewers who had decided to only say positive things about the book he reviews.

Brian Johnson does not challenge or criticize potential snake oil salesmen and only decides to share the positives of their messages.

I respect that, but I personally prefer a different approach.
As you might have noticed, this is a pet peeve of mine. I don't just like to read what's good about something. I also want the author to be challenged. I prefer to investigate biases, mistakes, and why the author might have been wrong -or why he's been proven wrong-.
That's why I personally don't like the approach of "neutral summaries". But hey, that's just me.

- Bit less scientist, more philosopher's approach

Brian considers himself a philosopher, which is great.
I also love philosophers.
When it comes to knowledge acquisition, I personally prefer a scientific approach. Best of all, a skeptical scientist approach.

9. Paul Minors

When Paul summarized a book that I was interested in, he used to be the guy I turned to.

Paul was my #1. favorite resource of free book summaries.

Nowadays my favorite books tend to be very specialized in psychology, advanced social skills and strategies, power dynamics, or truly research-based texts, so it rarely happens that Paul covers one of them.

⍰ Pros

- Detailed, in-depth summaries
- Summaries follow the book's chapter structure

That way, you truly get much more than a simple sneak peek but a much deeper overview.

⍰ Cons

- A few typos here and there
- More summaries, less reviews

Paul does not weave in much of his personal life and personal thoughts. For some, that's an advantage. For some others, it's not. Up to you.

- Guns for hire summaries

Paul Minors is not personally writing the summaries anymore, and sometimes that shows.

8. Four Minute Books

Niklas is a legend.

He is a friendly and really likable guy, but when it comes to free book summaries, he is also the 900-pound gorilla in the room :).
One might probably say that Niklas started this whole "free book summaries" thing, and a few more joined in after seeing his success -and mimicking his website's name, too-.

When it comes to quantity, FourMinuteBooks is unbeatable.
And Niklas doesn't rest on his laurels but keeps on going and going, publishing 3 (!) new book summaries a week, that keep adding to what's already the biggest completely free book summary repository on the web.

Niklas summarizes books into 3 major takeaways for each book.
No more, no less.
If you want a quick look into a popular book -or almost any book in the near future, really- Niklas probably can help.

⍰ Pros

- One of the largest collections on the web of free book summaries
- Niklas seems like a cool, good-spirited person

⍰ Cons

- Summaries of summaries

The book summaries are often summaries of Blinkist summaries, so it's actually a summary of a summary.
That works out well for many books, but since I'm not a huge fan of Blinkist, I am sometimes skeptical when it comes to heavier and more research-based books.

- More summaries, less reviews

Niklas focuses on the summary of the book. He provides a small review section, but he does not go berserk like yours truly in finding faults, criticism, and comparing notes with other books.

That must not necessarily be a con though.
Depending on your point of view, that might even be a positive.

- 3 lessons learned format: pros & cons

Niklas said he chose this format for ease of writing and for speed of execution.
That makes sense.

And I can also appreciate the format that repeats for every single book: it's a sleek-looking solution.

Of course, the downside is that some books need more than 3 takeaways, while some won't even need 3 :)
Again, that's my approach as a petulant reader. For most other people, 3 takeaways will do just fine.

---

7. Fight Mediocrity

Edit:
The channel stopped posting new videos.

This YouTube channel shares not just book summaries, but more personal analyses mixing book insights with how the reviewer applied them in his real life.

6. The Book Summary Club

The Book Summary Club

LET US DO THE HEAVY READING

The Book Summary Club writes short summaries of books for business owners.

Sure nothing beats a good book, but there's nothing worse than spending over fifteen hours reading a book to only get one or two takeaways. Or worse, spending five hours reading to realize the book isn't for you.

This is a relatively new entry in the world of free online summaries.

It uses a “3 lessons learned” format similar to “Four Minute Books”, but Book Summary Club has longer summaries, “real” reviews, and a more personalized approach.
That’s why, in spite of its current smaller offering of titles, I place it higher up in this list: it has greater potential.

Pros

- High-quality summaries

Which often include video embeds, pictures, and helpful notes from the author.

- Learn with Humor

Vince adds his personal touch to each book summary, making the reader not only informational but also fun and entertaining. A true breath of fresh air.

- Vince’s personality

While perusing Vince’s book summaries for this review, I couldn’t help but smile at this quote from his “The 4h Hour Body summary“, talking about Ferris’ advice on sex:

> I also learned during this book that at times, I’m still too immature to read things like this without giggling.

That’s right there is an author who’s not pretending to be someone he’s not and is not afraid of being himself. Reading Vince’s review feels in between reading a summary and reading a well-written magazine article.

Cons

- Needs to grow the offering a bit

But that will come with time. And Vince might consider doing a few summaries in a row on specific topics, which will help grow his expertise and make him more of an authority on specific niches.

5. 12Min.com

As far as I understand, 12min.com was formerly known as "Nuggets" and now it shifted its focus from simple quotes to full summaries.

As of today, 12Min is both a book summaries website app and a website. And, as well, even a cool organizer of events in several world cities (I attended a few myself, and were always great).

⍰ Pros

- Audiobook version of each summary
- Longer summaries: on average, 12min provides summaries that are long enough to truly get to the core of what a book is about
- Critical review in the end: 12min tries to combine both neutral summaries writing with personal touch by adding a personalize critical review in the end

⍰ Cons

- More summaries, "professional" reviews

Their reviews are very professional, and in this day and age, that can feel a bit politically correct to some, as if in fear of offending someone.
I get that, and see the point -I've had a few issues myself with angry authors who didn't appreciate my reviews :)-.

- The audiobook summary version is read by a robotic voice

By now robot readers are pretty good, so this doesn't have to necessarily be a con.
It's such a great idea that… I might think about it for this website as well.

- The writers are a "12min team", it feels impersonal

I appreciate book reviewers who put their faces behind their business and their writers.

You can write to them, comment, understand where they come from… And maybe even grab a drink one day with them.
But when it's "teams", like 12min or Blinkist, then it feels impersonal, and you are also lacking some crucial information about the reviewer.

- Random list of quotes

The last section of their summaries is a list of tweetable quotes.

But the quotes are out of context and left unexplained. Why are those quotes good or important? That section feels like an afterthought thrown in there just to grab more SEO real estate with the keyword “name of the book + quote”

3. Grahammann.net

A recent entry, Graham has been climbing the rankings thanks to quality summaries and simple, captivating and innovative design.

✅ Pros

- Modular approach of super-short overview or deeper dive
- Best-in-class design
- Personal analyses, not just regurgitating notes

❌ Cons

- TikTok-generation approach designed for reduced attention spans

Get My Searchable Collection of 200+ Book Notes

Nat Eliason is a legend.
You don't just get summaries from a guy who simply loves reading, but from a doer who's been using that information. He has been a successful startup employee, plus a successful entrepreneur, plus a very successful blogger, too.

He doesn't call his book summaries "summaries", but "notes" and "lessons learned".
For practical purposes, that's basically the same.

⍰ Pros

- Great reviews

With Nat you don't just get summaries, but also book reviews. And, very often, great book reviews (check out the best book review websites, too).

- Nat summaries are personal reviews

Nat doesn't try to be neutral: he puts his own personality, thoughts, and experiences in his summaries.

- Nat's not afraid of thrashing what needs to be thrashed

This is what I loved the most.

Nat seems like a book summary writer who is not afraid of speaking his mind and calling a spade a spade.

For example, he gave a 3/10 to "Tools of Titans" and 1/10 to "You Are A Badass".
I agree with both. And that, in my opinion, makes Nat's website a good resource to decide what you should or should not read.

⍰ Cons

- Varying quality:

some summaries are great, some others are shorter

- Random topics might dent authority:

Nat is interested in many different topics, and I can relate to that.
That lack of specialization might make the reviews somewhat less authoritative if you're looking for a specific subject matter expertise subject (say, for example, psychology books and reviews).

On the other hand, I must say that he is a reviewer with high critical thinking skills, and those apply to any subject.

- Some summaries are bullets and/or lists of quotes:

I'm not a fan of summaries in bullet points or in a list of quotes taken straight from the book (more on it below).
On the other hand, there are countless full-length summaries, so to speak.

---

1. AI Summarizers

In 2026 you don't need a free book summary website anymore. Upload your target book to a good AI tool and ask for a summary on demand.

⚠ Note of caution: often PC, lacks 'BS-filter'
While AI provides the best on-demand 'what,' it lacks the 'BS-filter.' AI will summarize a snake-oil salesman just as faithfully as a scientist. Use AI for the overview, dig deeper for what will work for you.

Bonus: The Power Moves

Most "book summary websites" give you compressed content.
We do something else entirely.

As part of our three-pillar approach, we constantly study the available literature on power, strategies, seduction, and men's empowerment, and often share our reviews publicly. We focus particularly on scientific handbooks that provide an overview of the full research literature.
And we don't just 'summarize', we audit, pressure-test, and cross-reference books against real-world power dynamics, scientific research, and prioritary frameworks.
The same can be said for courses and authors as well.

⍰ Pros

- Best for scholars and researchers

Focusing on deep summaries of handbooks on psychology, evolutionary psychology, and human behavior.

- Critical reviews vetting for science, logic, and real-world effectiveness

We don't just repeat the author; we challenge them. If a book's advice is "PC fluff" or scientifically unsound, we flag it.

- Interconnected Intelligence

Our reviews link directly to similar sources, proprietary frameworks and real-world case studies, turning "book knowledge" into learning systems.

- Best-of *resources not just books, including authors, websites, courses, etc.

The "best of" lists help you go straight for the best of the best information, saving money and time, and making you more successful, and quicker.

⍰ Cons

- Sometimes there are typos

Some book summaries were written for the author himself, just so that he could remember the content and come to it in the future.
And some other times writes passionately but forgets the more methodical proofreading.

- High entry barrier, and some may not like the vetting approach

TPM is not for the 'casual' reader or the easily offended. We prioritize harsh reality over comfortable myths. If you prefer simple and 'feel-good' summaries that never challenge the author, TPM is the wrong fit.

- Focus on power, strategy, seduction & men's empowerment with scientific foundations

TPM focuses on more advanced resources that move the needle when it comes to understanding the world's nuances and affecting change on it, including achieving outcomes like social status, respect, and attraction. We prioritize power, psychology, dating, and strategies. This means that many common but generic best-sellers won't be covered (see: 'why TPM prioritizes handbooks', including the 'Best-Seller Quality Tradeoff™')

More Free Book Summaries

Also deserving a shout-out:

- James Clear: the most famous, but with a limited library

James Clear is a top result for anyone searching 'free book summaries' and he commands high citations and rankings even with shorter formats.

Clear's summaries are more limited in number, and that also impacts his "best of" lists, since they only include the books he reviewed on his website.

On the plus side, Clear is a wonderful writer and author himself, a big success story to learn from, and, last but not least, his website design is minimalistically awesome.

- Samuel Thomas Davies: bullet format summaries

If James Clear was lacking in quantity, Samuel Thomas Davies isn't.

Sam was one of the biggest names in the free online book summaries space, and he is probably the best organized in this whole list, breaking up his summaries into tens of different categories.

I am personally not a big fan of bullet-style summaries because I feel that prioritization goes missing. And without a narrative around the wisdom it's harder to mentally store and digest information.

Elon Musk Biography: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 21 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Elon Musk by Ashlee Vance could be considered the Elon Musk biography. It's easy to read and gives a good glimpse into the mind and personal traits of Elon Musk.

Bullet Summary

- Elon Musk is ambitious, passionate, and driven. He doesn't take "no" for an answer
- He has a large ego and a sometimes difficult personality
- His overarching goal is to ensure humanity a future

Elon Musk Summary

Elon Musk is the most iconic entrepreneur of our generation. Here's his biography:

Childhood

Elon Musk parents separated when he decided to live with his father despite having a difficult relationship with him.
On top of a difficult atmosphere at home, Musk was also nearly friendless and constantly bullied.
One time a bunch of bullies beat him up so hard that he missed school for a week.

Musk retreated from the world through reading and study. And he was good at it (read how to absorb knowledge).
Ashlee Vance says Musk has an incredible photographic memory.
He particularly loved the book The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy. and soon began planning ways to improve our civilization. He thought of conquering other planets (of course), solar power, and paperless banks for example.

He also started early with entrepreneurship: at 12 he also sold his video game for $500

College in Canada

Musk recovered confidence in college, which he attended in Canada because he didn't want to serve military service in South Africa.

He studied business, attended public speaking courses, and successfully courted his first wive Justin Wilson.
She wasn't particularly fond of him, but he kept insisting.
Ashlee Vance says that when he was stood up at an ice cream parlor on their first date, he found out what her favorite ice cream was and showed up with two of them.

College in Pennsylvania

Musk would organize house parties and charge a 5 dollars entrance fee.

Zip2

In 1995 Musk launched with his brother Zip2 to help businesses go online for the first time.
They didn't sell much, but things changed when Mohr Davidow Ventures invested in the company after being impressed by Musk's drive.
In 1999 Compaq paid $307 million for Zip2, but of course, Musk wasn't going to stay and work for Compaq.

X.com

With the new cash, Musk bought a supercar, a condo, and a jet.
And all the rest he put into X.com. The company was doing well but instead of going head to head with their main competitor, they decided to join forces with Musk as CEO.
Things weren't going well after the merger, and when Musk left for his overdue honeymoon, the board staged a coup.
They went to Peter Thiel -author of Zero to One– and asked him to replace Musk. Thiel accepted and X.com changed its name to Paypal.

It didn't go well for Musk though, Paypal sold to Ebay for $1.5 billion and netted Musk $250 million.

SpaceX

The Elon Musk biography says that he was into space exploration and wasted little time getting into it.
His planning for the first rocket was wildly optimistic. He planned the first launch after 15 months of launching SpaceX.
It took 4 years, but they did make it.

Saving The Human Race

Elon Musk wants to save humanity.
Musk thinks the earth is not enough. The resources won't last forever and living on a single planet makes us vulnerable to a host of potentially race-threatening events.

Ashlee Vance says this is a concern that never leaves Elon Musk's mind and it gives him unwavering drive and determination.

Tesla

Musk didn't actually find Tesla.
He invested in the already existing company $6.5 million and became the sole shareholder and chairman.
It was the first foray of tech into the car industry and it's been a huge success since the

SolarCity

The Elon Muk biography says he funded his two cousins with SolarCity becoming the biggest shareholder of the company.

SolarCity today is the biggest solar panels company in the US.

A Big WHY

Musks' businesses complement each other.
This is because he doesn't think of businesses as silos, but looks at them through the prism of his goal: ensuring that humans will have a future.
In the words of Simon Sinek, Elon Musk has a big, overarching WHY (read Start With WHY).

Character Trait

Albeit it might seem hard to believe by looking at him, Elon Musk, similar to Steve Jobs, also verbally abuses employees who fall short of his high demands (read: what to do when a boss yells at you).
His ex-wife says that Musk told her he "would fire her if she was one of his employees". As a guy who writes about people's skills, it's one of the most stupid things a man could tell a partner.
The wife also says that he wanted her to dye her hair blonde and expected her to be a trophy wife, a role in which she wasn't comfortable.

Some people say Elon Musk can be mean and some even say he lacks empathy, citing his dismissal of his long-term secretary as proof.
But other people close to him say he's a loving and caring person.
My guess looking at his interview is that he is indeed a good person. Much better than Steve Jobs :).

My Note:
if you have a strong goal, the personal relationships that trump that goal should be that many.
Otherwise, you're a guy shooting the breeze at the bar.
As Ray Dalio says, the solution is to do what you need to do with compassion.

[image]

CONS

Sometimes You Wish It'd Go Deeper
At times you wished this Elon Musk biography would go a bit deeper.
As interested in human relations as I am, I wanted something more about Musk's relationships. Or sometimes I was curious how he secured a billion from NASA (without which SpaceX might be a bankrupt company).

Elon Musk Review

Vance does a great job with this Elon Musk book.
Easy and entertaining, it also sheds light on the qualities and traits you need to become a successful entrepreneur.

Berlusconi Power Moves: Stealing The Show (Case Study)

Lucio Buffalmano · 22 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

How to steal the show when someone else is the most popular (or most powerful) person in the room but you don't want to be their subordinate?
Berlusconi came up with an interesting solution to that.

Berlusconi Background

Trump has often been compared to Berlusconi. And for good reasons. Both self-made billionaires, they both went into politics and reached the highest heights in their respective countries.

Trump is Touchier though and more of a loose cannon. Berlusconi is a bit warmer and more humor-loving.
Plus, of course, the singing and the women.
In a way, Berlusconi is "more stereotypical Italian" than Trump.

But don't let that fool you.
If anything, it makes Berlusconi even more dangerous. Trump won a "lucky election" in many ways. Berlusconi instead dominated politics and won election after election.
Berlusconi also has a much tighter grip on Italy than Trump on the US (easier since it's a smaller country) and he is richer than Trump (and that's more difficult since the US is richer than Italy).

Both Berlusconi and Trump though have an immense drive to accumulate wealth and a boundless thirst for power. They both stop at nothing.

Video Background

The owner of many enterprises, the premier for the best part of a decade, and the undisputed leader of his party, Berlusconi is used to being in charge.

But he's not in the twilight of his years.

In the last elections, he managed a surprising comeback but was still the junior coalition partner in the right-wing political landscape. That means Berlusconi had to give way -and defer to someone else.
And deferring is something Berlusconi is not particularly fond of.
What would he do then?

Watch this video first and see if you can think of what he's up to:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mRsGA55ZYOI

And here's what Berlusconi was up to steal the show:

1. Pretend You're The Master Mind

If you cannot give the speech yourself, pretend you are the mastermind behind the speech.
You're the one who did the tough choices, he's the flunky delivering it for you.
How does Berlusconi do that?

1. Spell out the words
2. Gesticulate as he speaks

That way it looks like he's an active participant in the speech. Or, even better, people will think he knows the speech so well that it must have been him who wrote it.

2. Don't Look at Him

The more you look at the speaker, the more you're giving him power.
Notice Berlusconi rarely if ever looks at him.
Compare it with the woman, who's looking up to Salvini while she touches her necklace's beads (at 50 seconds mark of the above video).
Don't worry, we won't make any Freudian references :).

3. Don't Follow

When somebody has finished speaking or delivering a speech, don't leave after them.
When you do, it looks like you're their low-power entourage.
Leave before if you can or, even better, linger on and leave later just like Berlusconi did.

4. Acts of Insubordination

The more you are in service and the more you follow orders, the more you're in the subordinate role. Thus, avoid being in a position of following orders as much as you can.
Ideally, you will sneak in little acts of insubordination.
For example, someone might tell you:

> Alright, let's go.

Instead of going, you say:

> Yes I'll join you in a second, lemme finish this (/go to the bathroom), you go ahead

Notice you say "yes", but then deny it with a good excuse (so it doesn't seem like a direct confrontation). "You go ahead" is very natural there, but it's a de facto counter-order.
In Berlusconi's examples, he avoids leaving indeed and:

5. Get in The Last Word

The more someone speaks while you just listen, the more it seems like you don't count much (unless you're the one assessing and making the final decision but that's different!).
Try to weigh in with your opinions instead.
Best of all is if they are staggering or struggling to answer some tough questions. Don't jump right in. Let them roast, then provide the right answer for everyone to notice.

If they don't struggle in any way, you can add a small detail or weigh in with your own opinion at the end. It will slightly discredit them and it will increase your clout.

Countermove

Countering Berlusconi's game while delivering a speech was difficult.

Stop the middle speech, and you look like your priorities are in-fighting instead of delivering. Draw attention to Berlusconi, and you look petty and easy to derail.

Salvini didn't do too shabbily actually. He's also a shrewd guy.
By not giving any attention to Berlusconi, he didn't validate him. And by turning to the woman instead, he isolated Berlusconi and made him look like an outsider vying for attention, which was also not bad.

What when wrong though is that he had a normal knee-jerk reaction to the power move. Berlusconi power moves him, and his power moves the woman (put hands on her, escort her away).
However the power dynamics there was Salvini on the woman, but Berlusconi on Salvini, so not ideal.

To fully neutralize that last shove, he should have dealt with Berlusconi directly. How? Two ways:

- Linger on further in front of the microphones.

That would have made Berlusconi look powerless standing from behind and not getting what he wanted.

- Turn to Berlusconi, and tell him to speak

Another good power move could have been to turn around to Berlusconi and tell him something while pointing at the microphones (it doesn't matter what since nobody would hear that).
That way, it would have looked as if he was allowing Berlusconi and telling him what to say. Great way to fully flip the script.

Lessons Learned

Berlusconi was supposed to be in Salvini's team and camp, and look what he did.
I think there's an important lesson learned from this video.

When you have "in your team" people with boundless ambition or people with a huge hunger for power… Don't trust them!

Or at least keep an eye on them.

The power-hungry and the super-ambitious have only one team: their own.
Best of all is if you can rid of them.
If you can't, ring fence them or expect they'll conspire against you.

No Logo: How Brands Trick the Masses

Lucio Buffalmano · 23 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

No Logo (1999) provides an analysis and criticism of the modern effect of marketing on culture and people's behavior.
Naomi Klein's book became the bible of the anti-globalization movement of the early 2000s, and it's an important read for those who are interested in persuasion, power dynamics, and marketing manipulation.

Bullet Summary

- Corporations are only interested in profits
- Big brands focus on marketing to insecure teenagers
- There's a growing anti-brand resentment brewing

No Logo Summary

About The Author: Naomi Klein is a Canadian social activist and filmmaker. She teaches media, culture, and feminist studies at Rutgers University.
Naomi Klein has written several books, but she is most famous for "No Logo".

Introduction

Naomi Klein says that "No Logo" doesn't stand for a call to arms. It's not about telling you what to do. It's about empowering people to learn how brands and big corporations market and operate.

What you do with that information, is up to you.

Brand in The Office Create A Dream Knowing Nothing About Actual Operations

Naomi Klein explains how brands are created by marketing departments in the office and they have little to do with the actual production of the goods.

Marketing departments are busy thinking about how to position their brand in the mind of the users -images of things instead of things-.

And the actual production, that's outsourced to places with cheap labor.
Brands would rather spend money on marketing than on actual production.

Klein provides several examples, but a recurring one is, as you might expect, Nike.
Nike has long been embroiled in several scandals of child exploitation and yet still managed to come out of it unscathed (this is Nike's answer to No Logo allegations).

Brands Sell to Young People Leveraging Self Doubt

Klein says in No Logo that brands love selling to young people.

They take advantage of their fragile identities and self-doubts. Marketing is about giving the illusion that by possessing some cool products, teenagers can rub off some of that “cool” on themselves.
And be a bit more popular and well-liked.

And that’s why brands try to associate and incorporate anything that teenagers can think of cool. Movie stars, sports stars, grassroots movements, and, as well, iconoclastic movements pose a threat to the brand itself.

The effort is worth it, says Klein.
Teenagers are fantastic profit machines. They shop in packs, so if you can sell to a few of the cool guys, then everyone will follow suit.
This is why, says Klein, brands have been trying -and often succeeding- in getting a foothold in schools.

Brand Resentment is Growing

Naomi Klein says there’s a growing resentment against brands.

Corporations’ greed has brought lots of pain to real people.
They removed jobs from high-paying countries bringing unemployment and poverty; they gamed and rigged the system to pay employees as little as possible (McJobs); and they pollute and take advantage of any loophole they can while also taking advantage of the environment by polluting and contaminating the environment.

My Note:
I’m afraid to say that this resentment is nowhere strong enough. Brands are still going strong. If not stronger.

Alternative Movements Against Globalization

Finally, Naomi Klein says she can start seeing an alternative movement blossoming. She shares several examples, including Adbusters magazine, the culture-jamming movement, Reclaims the Streets, and the McLibel trial.
But the book has aged and the landscape has surely changed.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Watch Out for Copyright Laws
No Logo was prescient in talking about how corporations (ab)use copyright laws to silence critics and maintain market dominance and the image of "cool".
This has become more and more of an issue in the digital age (if you're a YouTube you're probably aware of it). It happened to The Power Moves as well with a book summary. I received a false copyright claim because my review was not very positive.
Watch out if you want to publish critical reviews.

CONS

- Globalization Has No Positives?

A bit typical of the left-wing, No Logo criticizes without recognizing the positives of modernity and globalization.

Yes, I also don't necessarily like sprawling multinational brands and marketing, but modernity and globalization also have countless advantages.

There's no mention of that in No Logo.

- No Alternatives

No Logo criticizes, and it provides wonderful criticism. However, it does not come up with alternatives.

That's not necessarily a con though: the author says it first that her work is an analysis.

No Logo Review

I have a special emotional attachment to No Logo.

It reminds me of my teenage years as a self-styled No Global boycotting McDonald, Nike, Coca-Cola, and many other big brands.

You would call it today "alter-globalization", but back then I didn't know that.
Indeed, you might say that I was nothing more than the typical clueless teenager more concerned about protesting than understanding what he's protesting against -which is what The Economist criticizes No Logo for-.

But The Economist, going overboard with its criticism, shockingly misses out on all the great aspects of Klein's work. And there is lots of it.

Including, for example, the psychology of brand marketing and its effect on young people. And, on a more pragmatic tone, the journalistic fervor with which Klein laid bare the corporate skeletons in the closet of some of the biggest and most popular brands.

And as well, The Economist and the critics, miss out on the fact that idealism can serve an important part in people's lives.
I think idealism is a gift to keep within ourselves. A bit of idealism can serve as a drive for a better world.
No Logo might as well be too simplistic and negative -and it is at times-, but it's also a great book with much wisdom.

Who Should Read No Logo

No Logo is not (simply) a protest book. It's an intelligent and well-researched account of how brands and marketing work, and the impact they have on a large swath of the population.

I think No Logo should be a must-read for:

- Marketers
- Designers
- Sociologists
- Idealists striving for a better and freer world

13 Signs of a Bad Boss (That Got Me to Quit)

Lucio Buffalmano · 24 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Being able to read the signs of a bad boss is extremely important for employees.

A bad boss will not only damage your career but also your personal development and your life satisfaction.

Ultimately, though, I am grateful for bad bosses. Bad bosses provided me with the anger and fuel that pushed me into entrepreneurship.

Never forget: you can also fire your boss

- Summary

Intro

This article does not copy-paste a few annoying traits like most posts on the web do.

This article leverages solid psychology to provide you with a list that underlines the key personality traits of bad bosses -and, in general, bad people-.

When you see these red flags present in your boss, you should seriously consider moving on because your bad boss is probably making you a worse person.

Before diving in, I urge you to consider reading right after this article "how to be a great leader", which is a psychology-backed article on how to become a great leader and manager.

1. Takes criticism personally

The ideal boss has a moral framework within which he fully focuses on achievement.

And to achieve at the highest level, as Ray Dalio says, you need to constantly search for the truth against the backdrop of reality. And that means that you need to put your ego aside.

For the ideal boss, it doesn't matter whether he's right or wrong. It only matters what's the right answer and what will move him, you, and the whole company forward.

It's a sign of a bad boss instead of focusing on being right, having the last word, and taking feedback personally. All of these, by the way, are the signs of a fixed mindset.

If this is you, don't worry: it's common. And it's fixable.

Read more here:

- How to develop a growth mindset

Example

One day I sent an email to my boss with a better description for our Linkedin company page, which was full of grammar mistakes, and for our website's SEO (I was already running this website and could spot some obvious improvement opportunities).
Instead of being excited at the chance of moving forward, he got defensive and aggressive. And that's when I had no doubt anymore: I was dealing with an idiot.

2. Believes that providing a salary is all that matters

Look at this scene from "Adman":

If you know what's wrong with Don Draper's approach, then you have a good intuitive grasp of what's wrong with bad managers

John Maxwell says in the 21 Irrefutable of Leadership that leaders add value.

But by "value" he refers to both quantitative aspects, such as a salary, and qualitative ones, such as an emotionally safe environment, a supportive group, and a leadership figure that you can learn from.

If all your boss can provide is a salary, then you have another sign of a bad boss and you probably shouldn't be working for him.
If your exchange is only monetary, then you'd better be making good money.

3. Believes a salary is the main motivator

Some bad bosses believe that giving you a salary is all they need to provide to keep you chained -and motivated-.

That is a huge failure of understanding basic human psychology and what really drives us. And as Daniel Pink explains in Drive, that's often not money.

With a boss like that, you are not learning what makes people tick.
And you are not maximizing your potential.

And just for you to know, this is the difference between intrinsic and extrinsic motivation, as adopted by Haslam, 2006.

4. You have a "TGIF" mindset

This is an indirect sign of a bad boss.

If you're looking forward too much to the weekend and if Mondays and your last day of a holiday feel like a small drama, that's a big sign you have a bad boss and/or a bad job.

5. Doesn't know you at all

Simon Sinek in Leaders Eat Last says that leaders are not responsible for results.

What are they responsible for, then?

Great leaders are responsible for the people who in turn are responsible for the results.

That means taking care of the employees, knowing them as people and not numbers, and appreciating them for their unique contributions.

Failing to know anything about you is a clear sign that your boss only sees you as an entry in the cost center and not as a human being.

6. Can't pronounce your name

This is a corollary of the above and another glaring sign of a bad manager.

Dale Carnegie famously said that the sweetest word in any language, for anyone, is the sound of their name. And not caring about how to correctly pronounce your name is a big sign they don't really care much about you.

Example:

Some weeks ago a friend of mine asked me what could be a good Westernized name for her Chinese name. She needed it because her European boss could not pronounce her name and needed a Westernized version.
I told her she shouldn't change her name for anybody.
Change your boss instead of changing your name. Or better yet, tell him he's a smart guy and you're sure he can learn it… If he only applies himself just a little bit.

Also, read:

- Office power moves
- When people pronounce your name wrong.

7. You don't respect him

To have a good relationship with anybody, you need to respect him.
Ask yourself:

1. Do I respect him as a person?
2. Would he be my friend?
3. Do I respect him as a leader?
4. Would I be happy to help him?

One "no" is not a good sign.
If you answer no twice, you can't work for that guy.

8. Finger pointing

Mistakes happen. All the time.

They're the only way we can improve and it's also the only way we can move forward.

Bosses who cannot accept mistakes and mishaps as a normal part of life fail to understand the basic truth of life. And they show another terrible sign of bad managers: they focus on negatives and on blame instead that on solutions.

The great bosses, instead, take responsibility for all failures (read: Extreme Ownership).

Also, read:

- Archetypes of office players

9. No gratitude, no rewards

Great managers celebrate their team's achievements and pass the glory to the people around them.

I used to work at a start-up as an early employee. At the time I left and after we'd raised double digits millions in both debt and equity, I was responsible for, numbers at hand, 80% of the revenue.
Not a single time I had ever heard a "well done" from my direct manager.

Not the kind of boss you appreciate, let me tell you.

10. They have favorites

We are humans, obviously, we will like someone more than others.

But the ideal manager treats everyone equally.

The worst kind of favoritism is not even based on results, bad on race, gender, or simple physical attraction.

As you can understand from this website, I do like women. But I think few things are as weak as a boss taking advantage of his position to sleep with his reports.
Or even worst, flirting or being all nice and tender to the female reports.

A terrible boss playing favorites was one of the main reasons I set out on my own:

If your boss has favorites, it's another sign of a poor manager.

11. Disrespects you

There are many more ways to subtly (or openly) disrespect you.

For example:

- Makes you wait
- Types on laptop when talking to you
- Doesn't find the time to speak
- Doesn't introduce you to customers and superiors
- …

These are often the signs of a boss who feels superior because of his title. And they're also a sign of a bad person, looking at titles instead of human beings.

11.2 Yells at you

Yelling is a common example of open disrespect.

Yelling to adults is disrespectful and I can think of very few exceptions (life/death scenarios, military jobs, stealing..).

You can read here how to handle a boss yelling at you, but if the problem persists either make sure your terrible boss gets fired or you find yourself a better alternative.

12. Treats employees as expendable pawns

Some bosses see employees as expandable pawns and cannon fodder to win their own war.

Example

I was once at a job interview as a senior candidate and was invited to attend a few strategy meetings before even joining. The founder referred to employees in what he deemed easy positions as “monkeys”.
He used to say “we just put need monkeys for those jobs”.

I was really tempted to join from a Power Moves experience perspective, but finally, I decided against it. Our time is too valuable to be spent with terrible managers.

You might not get such a direct example of a “take no prisoner attitude”, but here are a few red flags:

- Profits above all
- All their pride is in bottom-line achievements
- All credit to themselves
- “Collateral damage attitude” towards the victims of their final results
- Choice of words (enemies, battlefield, trenches, etc.)

Now don’t get this wrong: without profits, there’s no company, and achieving your results is key. But if that’s all they brag and care about, it’s a big red flag.
These guys have no loyalty and morals: don’t even think about growing with them. Think instead that as soon as you don’t serve their final cause, you will become the enemy.

Also, read:

- Corporate manipulations

13. Engages in Power Games

A leader who is at the top should look for his team.

But a leader who is at the top and looks to defend his turf and increase his social status shows inner insecurity and a lack of basic leadership qualities.

Some signs of power games:

- Social climbing
- Undermining
- Throwing people under the bus

Here is an example from, case in point, “Horrible Bosses”

Bonus: No Good Bosses

At last, I’d like you to consider a completely different perspective.

There are no good bosses.

This is a great mindset if you’re interested in entrepreneurship and need that final kick to get started.

Alternatively, I like Brian Tracey's position when it comes to employment.
He proposes that no matter what's your company, you always see yourself not as an employee, but as the president of your own corporation.

Summary

Most signs of a bad boss are also the same signs of a bad person.

That's why I put a lot of weight on the question "do you respect him" and "would you be his friend".

The problem with having a bad boss is that, well, life is short.
You will enjoy your work less -or even hate it- and your chances for growth and improvement are severely impaired.

If your boss is really terrible, I'd suggest you either think about changing job or using the situation to your benefit.
Either use your bad boss to learn about power moves or to profit personally (read: dealing with a bad boss).

Alternatively, you can use it as your motivation to become your own man and start your own business.

9 Common Sex Mistakes Women Do

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

There are a few common mistakes I have noticed in women when it comes to sex.

By “mistakes”, I mean that they either make the men less interested, less attracted, or even less horny and less interested in having sex or in having sex again in the future.

This article will list the common sex mistakes purely based on personal experience.

Contents

- Common Sex Mistakes
  - 1. Passionless Resistance to His Advances
  - 2. Going For His Penis Too Quickly
  - 3. “Yuck” Rejections
  - 4. Talking Too Soon After Coitus
  - 5. Asking If It Was OK
  - 6. Assigning Morality to Sex Positions
  - 7. Finger Interlacing During Doggy
  - 8. Dictating The Rhythm
  - 9. Not Allowing Yourself To Let Go

Common Sex Mistakes

Here is the list of the most common sex mistakes:

1. Passionless Resistance to His Advances

The first time a couple has sex can be a memorable moment.

And resisting a man’s advances without showing any sign of attraction is one of the most common sex mistakes women do to ruin that moment.
Resist and postpone as long as you want, but if all you do is push him away you:

1. Will make him feel hurt and unwanted
2. Risk he’ll self-reject and write you off
3. Sub-communicate you’re not into him or into sex

Much, much better to tell him you’re attracted to him but it’s too early for you (read how to reject sex) or to reject him while also showing bursts of passion (read Madonna/Whore seduction)

2. Going For His Penis Too Quickly

I was guilty of this one when I first started out:

I remember my first girlfriend proposing to me we should play the doctor game.
“What the hell is she thinking”, I thought.
Then she finally admitted: I was too quick in going for her female parts. And the game was her way to teach me a more gradual build-up.
Face palm :).

Today, several years and experiences later, I've been on the receiving end of "jump-start sex" more than once. Albeit the issue is not as bad for men, it can take a lot away from the overall experiences. Especially when it repeats over time.

Note: super hot moments of tearing each other's clothes off are an exception.

3. "Yuck" Rejections

How women rejected men can make or break a seduction:

I couple of years ago I crossed paths with a fellow countryman while traveling through Thailand. He liked the local women, he said because they enjoyed oral sex.
And that was in contrast to his previous Italian girlfriends whom, he said, rejected oral sex saying "no ma che schifo". That roughly translates as "yuck no that's disgusting".

However open-minded a man can be, it's never a good feeling when a woman says "Yuck" to his member :).
Of course, don't do anything you're not comfortable with, but a bit of tact in turning things down goes a long way.

A few other expressions to avoid:

- It smells
- It's disgusting
- I don't wanna do that with you
- I don't do that on a first date

4. Talking Too Soon After Coitus

This is another relatively common one.

The first couple of minutes after coitus are one of the pleasures of life.
And it's one of those pleasures that it's best enjoyed and respected with the utmost silence :).

Right after he has peaked, he wants to enjoy that moment without any distractions. And if you talk to him, he might see you as a momentary nuisance or, worst, as someone who "doesn't get him".

Here's a rule of thumb, then: no conversation for the first two minutes after sex. If you're not sure, let him speak first.

Comments that don't need a reply are allowed though.
Especially if positive:

- That was great
- I've never come so hard before
- God, I feel good now

5. Asking If It Was OK

It's OK asking if "it was OK".

But it should be done with tact or you come across as needy -and you might disturb that after-coitus phase that actually bonds partners together.

I was once going for non-typical intimacy with an ex, but we stopped because it was a bit too painful for her.
After we were done and laying down, she asked:

> Her: Is it OK for you?

> Me: Ja
> (a few seconds later)
> Her: Is it OK that we didn't do it..
> Me: Yes

Asking if it was OK for him right after sex slots you as the one who has to please him. It puts him in charge.

But worst of all, it can make you come across as a bit insecure.
Now mind you, strategic weaknesses can be highly seductive… As long as you are aware of it.

6. Assigning Morality to Sex Positions

Don't get this wrong, you refuse whatever you're not comfortable with.

A few women however refuse some positions -for example from the back- because they see it as "demeaning" or "unpure".

Love, caring, compassion… These are all key traits of a relationship. And no sex position takes any of that away. If anything, it's refusing to do something with your partner that might diminish your bond.

And when you slot sex positions into "good" and "bad" categories, that might send the wrong message to a lot of guys out there.
Including:

- Domineering attitude (sex as a power struggle)
- Fringe-feminist beliefs (ie.: not from the back because it's "dominant sex")
- Inability to lose oneself in carnal passion (rational approach)
- Possible hang-ups about sex

7. Finger Interlacing During Doggy

I'm thinking here of the flat doggy-style position when the man's hands are sometimes near the face of the woman.

Placing your hand on top of his and interlacing fingers could be seen as too cutesy at that point.

Note: this applies more strongly when you're not in a relationship. And it changes depending on how you live sex with your partner and what "kind" of sex you're having (more on the rougher side or more on the "sex as emotional bonding" type).

8. Dictating The Rhythm

The rule of thumb:

The woman on top decides the rhythm.
In other positions, a man decides the rhythm.

Plenty of exceptions to the rule of course.
But it's often off-putting when women try to dictate the rhythm. Sometimes she's trying to do it for him, and sometimes after he's announced that he's about to come.
At that point, he knows best how to thrust to maximize his pleasure. As tempted as you might be to show off your pelvic mobility, it can easily end up out of sync and only take away from his pleasure (and it's mostly about timing: I've experienced some skilled twerkers… Who got the timing all wrong).

Exception: if you're in a relationship and want to learn to take it to the next level. Then learning to time each other's pleasure can pay off handsomely.

You'll get it wrong a few times most likely, but once you reach the perfect thrusting-timing for each other, then… Nice :).

9. Not Allowing Yourself To Let Go

This goes beyond simple "sex mistakes women do" and into a fundamental truth of many women's life and psychology.

Men's sexual skills are important, but even more important are her attitudes toward her body and towards sex. And her willingness and ability to let herself go correlate highly with those attitudes.

It's indeed relatively easy to give multiple orgasms to women who have experienced orgasms before.
But it can be very difficult to give orgasms to women who've never had an orgasm before.

So the first, and the very first thing you can do make your sex life as pleasurable as it should be, both for yourself and for him… Is to give yourself permission to.

Full Summary

About The Author: Mortimer J. Adler was an American philosopher, teacher, and author.
He is most famous for the book "How to Read A Book".

Introduction

Reading is learning.
But it's learning from an absent teacher, which requires some necessary adjustments.

In a way, you're on your own while learning from a book. And that's why it's all the most important you use a few tools to maximize your reading effectiveness.

Inspectional Reading: Does It Even Deserve A Read?

Inspectional reading gathers information before you start reading in earnest.

During inspectional reading, for example, you can decide whether or not the book even deserves your full attention.

Inspectional reading concerns: Reading the preface and the table of content.
Checking if the chapters have a summary at the beginning and at the end, and check the end of the book to see if the author summarized it. If so, read it.
If there's a chapter you're particularly interested in, start reading that one.

Have a Purpose For Reading

Don't read books just for the sake of reading.
Read them because you're interested in a certain topic. Or even better, because you need to read it and the information is relevant to your life.

Use Several Modes

Instead of just reading, writing the information down. Think about it, visualize it, and put it into action.

If It's Good: Read It More than Once

If a book is very good or if the information is very important to you: read it again.

My Note:
Instead of reading the whole book again, you can read your note again if you're a good note-taker.

Take Time to Process Information

You know those dares of 50 books a year, or 20 books a month?

That's crap.

You know Blinkist, encouraging people to read 4 books a day?
That's also crap.

Don't cram stuff just so you can say you read X books. Take time to think the information over and it will more easily sink into your brain.

Question The Information

Understand the author and his position, understand the period of time it was written, and question what the author says.

A big note of caution here: before you question anything, I would urge you instead to also do the opposite: accept it. And ask yourself "what if the author was right?".
I say so because, more than believing everything we say, most of us tend to reject whatever we don't believe in or whatever causes cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1957) in us.
And that's probably even more dangerous than believing something that is not true.

Know Where You Can Go Faster

On some pieces of information or on some chapters you can go quicker.

On some others, you have to slow down to really understand the message.
Knowing when you can go faster and when you need to slow down is a major skill in reading quickly and effectively.

Before You Disagree…

… Or before you agree, or suspend judgment, you have to be able to say “I understand”.

Syntopical Reading

Syntopical reading is the reading we do when reading many books on the same topic and comparing what they talk about.

This is how I read and this is how I structure my how to absorb knowledge.

General Tips

- Take notes as you read
- Place your thumb and first two fingers together and use them as a pointer as you slide across text lines
- Understand and respect the difference between knowledge and opinion
- Read the book before the summaries

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Skim Read Before Reading

Read the preface, the summary, and the table of contents before reading the full book.

CONS

- It's dated quite a bit

How to Read a Book is an old book. And that's not an issue… Except for the fact it misses many new tools, one can leverage for knowledge.

Of course, there's no mention of audiobooks, e-books, and checking the Internet.
And that's not a minor lack because these tools really revolutionize the way we learn.

Review

Knowing how to read a book is a foundational skill.
And "How to Read a Book" is a good help in that direction.

Adler says you should read the full book before reading summaries while I recommend you do the opposite in my guide on how to absorb knowledge.

I also stress that it's more important that you open your mind even before you question the author.
But I can otherwise agree with most of "How to Read a Book's" content.

The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work (1999) is the most popular book from relationship researcher John Gottman and it's a seminal text when it comes to understanding what makes successful relationships.

TPM Strategic Audit: A top book for traditional monogamous stability.
We host it as Gottman's best book, neatly putting together all of his research.
Warning for High-Agency Men: This book assumes a 50/50 "Equalitarian" model within monogamous relationships. It often ignores Mate Value (SMV) and other important relationship power dynamics.

Key Takeaways

- Marriage satisfaction has a huge impact on health and happiness
- You can likely save your marriage even when it's not going well
- You can likely improve your relationship even when it's already going well

Summary

Unhappy marriages can increase your chance of getting sick by 35% and shorten your lifespan by around 4 years.

Gottman says that by working just 10% on your marriage instead of the gym, you'd get 3 times the health benefits.
TPM Note: You can do both.

Myths of Relationship

Gottman starts off with a few myths that need to be debunked:

- Affairs destroy relationships

It's often the other way around, bad relationships cause affairs.

- Men are not built for marriage

Cheating is more about the opportunity. Today young women outstrip men in infidelity.
My Note: this is not fully true based on the latest data I've seen, including from the Oxford Handbook of Infidelity.
The two genders are near, but men are still slightly ahead. On average, men engage more in sexual affairs and women in emotional affairs (which of course can include sex, too)

- Reciprocity makes good relationships

NO, keeping tabs is bad, Happy couples help each other without keeping scores

- Men and women are too different

Yes and no, 70% of men and women agree friendships are the key

What Makes Marriage Work?

- Positive Sentiment Override

"Sentiment override" refers to how people see the relationship as a whole. If you have a positive image of your partners and your relationship, you will take notice of the positives and discount the negatives.
But if you have a negative override, you look with suspicion -or disregard- what your partner does well.

- Sense of Meaning (or purpose)

When partners have a strong sense of meaning, they understand each other's dreams and aspirations and support them.

- Repair Attempts

Repair attempts are words, sentences, or actions that stop negativity from escalating.
Repairing attempts are crucial in saving marriages as they lower stress levels and prevent flooding.
Indeed, couples overridden with The Four Horsemen but engaging in successful repair attempts stayed together in 84% of the cases VS 90%+ of breakups without repair attempts.

How to Predict Divorce

- Harsh startup

A harsh beginning with criticism and contempt in the first 3 minutes predicts the trajectory of a 15-minute conversation with 96 accuracies. That's to say that beginning set the tone for what's to come.

- Four Horsemen

If you're familiar with Gottman's work, you know these are criticism, contempt, defensiveness, and stonewalling.
Criticism is an attack on the other person;
Contempt is criticism on steroids by adding sarcasm and cynicism;
Defensiveness is about defending ourselves instead of listening and, often, counter-attacking;
Stonewalling is tuning out of the discussion and usually arrives later in the relationship.

- Flooding

Flooding is an overwhelm of our system and we cannot rationally function well anymore (increased heart rate, flight or fight kicks in).
Usually, people stonewall to protect themselves from flooding.
85% of stonewallers are men because they flood easier (women produce more milk when relaxed and oxytocin is in the brain while men survived easier when they reacted more strongly)

- Bad Memories

Couples who are badly entrenched in negative views (negative sentiment override) rewrite their past with a negative tone. And that's why past memories become a good predictor of the future.

Solvable & Unsolvable Issues

Some issues can be solved, while others are perpetual.
The majority (69%) are unsolvable problems.

Some examples are:

- Having or not having children
- Sex frequency
- Children's religion

Marriages are successful to the degree to which you can live and compromise with unsolvable problems.

Principle 1: Enhance Your Love Maps

Love maps are, in a nutshell, how well you know your partner.

The more familiar you are with your partner, the more intimacy you can share, and the stronger your relationship is.
Couple with stronger love maps is also much better at weathering life crisis periods (including the birth of a baby).

Principle 2: Nurture Fondness & Admiration

Fondness and admiration are a great antidote to the four horsemen, and to contempt first of all.
Gottman says a great way to increase fondness and admiration is to:

1. list all the qualities of your partners you admire
2. tie the qualities of a practical event
3. share it with your partner
4. celebrate the happy moments and the history of your relationship

Principle 3: Turn Towards Each Other

Turning towards each means paying attention to your partner. It allows the couple to stay connected, and it happens daily starting with all the small things.

Example 1:

A man looking at a magazine commenting to his wife "wow, look at that boat". And the wife replies it's like the one they saw last summer, with the husband confirming.
Couples engaging in chit-chat like that stay happily married.

Example 2 (at the grocery)

> Her: Do we still have wash up liquid at home?
> Him: I'm not sure, but let's take some just in case
> (instead of shrugging the answer)

Example 3:

> Her: I had such a bad dream tonight
> Him: I'm in a big hurry, but tell me about it quickly so we can talk more about it tonight

Exercises

1. Take turns to speak
2. Don't give advice, just listen first (women react more negatively to quick advice)
3. Show genuine interest
4. Communicate your understanding
5. Take your partner's side
6. Express a 'we against others' attitude
7. Express affection (say I love you, put an arm around them)
8. Validate emotions (empathize)

Principle 4: Let Your Partner Influence You

Letting your partner influence you means sharing power.

It means you listen to them and you are open to compromise and change your opinion if it makes sense.

Both partners can refuse influence, but it's more commonly a male issue. And it's a big mistake: 81% of couples that don't allow influence split up.

Principle 5: Solve Your Solvable Problems

This principle is about problem-solving and communication. To a certain extent, it comes down to having good manners.
Here are the steps:

- Soften your startup

Women tend to be the ones who bring up issues, but they also tend to do so in a harsh way. Make sure you start warmly.

- Learn to make and accept repair attempts

Humor or direct (ie.: "can we take a break", "I was too mean, sorry"). Announcing them often amplifies their power.

- Soothe

Understand when you're flooding and need to self-soothe and help your partner do the same.

- Compromise

Part of accepting influence. Giving ground is an important part of reaching happy solutions.

- Be tolerant of your partner's faults

Also, see:

- Enlightened cooperation

https://thepowermoves.com/enlightened-collaborator

Principle 6: Overcoming Gridlock

Gridlock happens when a partner doesn't respect the other partner's dreams or "the way he is". For example, spender VS saver or security VS safety seeker.

Here's how to find out your partners' dreams:

- Become a dream detective

Some people might disguise their aspirations as "childish" or "impractical dreams". But dig deeper anyway or they will resurface without your support and understanding.

- Work on them

There are three steps to work on your partners' dream:

1. Listening (without criticizing)
2. Financially supporting them
3. Taking an active part in them

And, ideally:

- Find common ground

You might never be able to fully solve gridlocked issues, but you can find out the areas where you can compromise and workarounds for the areas you cannot.
Or simply understanding where you cannot compromise is already a major win.

- Appreciate

It might not always be easy to appreciate and say thank you after a gridlocked discussion but do end on a positive anyway.

Principle 7: Creating Shared Meaning

A shared meaning is a togetherness between two individuals that goes beyond the differences and arguments.
It takes years to build, but here are a few ways to promote it:

- Family culture (dinners, Christmas traditions, holidays together, etc.)
- Shared symbols
- Reflect on your history together

Real-Life Applications

Work on your relationship
The amount of helpful and relationship-saving and enhancing wisdom in this book is too much to summarize. The main real-life application I would take away from "The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work" is this: relationships matter. They're one of the biggest factors to determine your health, success, and happiness. Not working on them is plainly stupid.

CONS

- Disjointed: it's far more than 7 principles

It's called "7 Principles" but the principles and key concepts in the book are much more. Trying to reduce them to 7 but then disseminating the book with more crucial wisdom isn't helping the reader.

- A few unneeded off topics

I find the book going sometimes off track, like in the discussion of cultural shifts in gender roles.

- A bit self-aggrandizing

Especially at the beginning of the book, it reiterates (a bit too) often on the scientific foundation of the book. Once was enough :)

PROS

Great Wisdom
As for most of Gottman's work, The Seven Principles to Make Marriage Work has deep wisdom that will make your relationships better.

Novel Content

I particularly appreciated that it goes well beyond the usual “Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse”. Especially the concept of repair attempt was very instructive.

Review

The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work is a fantastic source to understand what makes monogamous relationships truly work.

Not only does everything Gottman says make sense, but I also appreciate that it’s not just his intuition speaking, but that everything is grounded in research and data.

Highly recommended for men interested in monogamous relationships.

The only important downside is that the book implies a relationship of equals, while high-value men may be better off with different setups. Equally respectful and win-win, but fairer for what they bring to the table.

How to Handle Aggressive Debaters: Tucker Carlson Case Study

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever wondered how you could handle an aggressive, unfair debater?

It's not easy, because they are willing to do anything to get under your skin and make you look bad.
However, if you know how to, you can turn their techniques around.

This article will show you how can debate -and win- against an aggressive and unfair debater.

Contents

- Background

- #1. Strawman Technique
- #2. Undermine Credibility
- 3. Provocation
- 4. Aggression
- Summary

Background

Tucker Carlson is a Fox News host and is often seen as a regarded debater.
He certainly does have some good debating skills.

But at times he uses plenty of underhanded techniques that make him an unfair debater.

These are four unfair debating techniques that he used in his interview with Lauren Duca:

#1. Strawman Technique

Carlson attacks Lauren not on what she said, but on how he would like her to be.
Which, of course, is nastier and more extreme than who she really is.

Also, notice how confirms his own strawman when he says "that's what you said" (49s).
That's quite a bit sneaky.

#2. Undermine Credibility

Carlson uses two techniques to undermine Lauren's credibility:

1. Nitpick quotes from the past

Picking what someone has said in the past is an effective and overused technique to discredit someone.

2. Undermines her credential

He mentions she writes for Teen Vogue, then quotes her description of Ariana Grande's style.

Then pretends to go back to politics as if that were a normal detour.
Indeed, Carlson undermines her credential in an indirect way, as if the information slipped incidentally. That way it's even more powerful as it seems unbiased information.

But of course, as Lauren herself said, whatever magazine she writes for shouldn't delegitimize her in any way (but people's psychology doesn't work that way, of course).

3. Provocation

Tucker Carlson is a world-class provocateur.

Almost as good as Ben Shapiro.

His fake laughter, pungent sarcasm, and out-of-context quotes can easily drive his guests angry.
And he's no exception here:

4. Aggression

Tucker Carlson is a powerful debater.

He has lots of energy, speaks loudly and when he feels like it, he doesn't shy away from aggressing and disparaging guests.

Interestingly enough, that's where Tucker loses most points.

He only wins here in the eyes of the staunchest conservatives who already agree with him.
But any moderate will find him overbearing and overly aggressive. And they'll side with the guests.

Summary

Tucker Carlson is a smart guy and a highly skilled debater.
And he's a very, very aggressive debater.

He doesn't shy away from using lots of unfair debating techniques though, and he sometimes goes overboard in aggressing his guests.

And that's where I feel he is doing no favors to his own conservative camp.
The moderates are more likely to turn away when they see contempt, sneering, and aggression.

Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage: Summary

Bullet Summary

- Deal with irreconcilable issues by understanding your partner, talking about it, and compromising where you can
- Keep high expectations for your marriage: they translate into better marriages
- Share the power in the marriage: listen to your spouse

Ten Lessons Summary

Ten Lessons to transform your marriage goes through 10 couples who want to improve their relationships and analyze a typical dialogue of theirs.

Then Gottman explains what's the issue, gives pointers on how to improve, and shows us the improved dialogues.

And he teases out a few lessons learned and exercises you can apply to your marriage as well.

The Two Truths of Married Couples

Julie and John say that the two simple truths of happy couples are:

1. They behave like good friends
2. Handle conflicts in gentle and positive ways

Behaving like friends means their relationships have lots of respect, affection, and empathy.

Positive Behaviors You Must Implement

Couples who are happy together present a few common positive behaviors.

They aren't necessarily huge, but repeated daily is what makes the difference:

1. Soften Start-up: they introduce complaints gently, without accusing and criticizing the partner
2. Turn Towards the Partner: they tune in to turn their partner when their partner needs them and give them full attention
3. Repair Conversation: when a conversation is going south they manage to stop it instead of escalating it
4. Accept Influence: they listen to the partner's opinion and are open to being persuaded (this is mostly for men)

Look for Longing in the Complaints

The advice I found particularly useful was that of looking beyond the complaint and going to the root cause.

For example, if your partner shouts you're never there and all you can do is work, it's most likely they are actually saying:

> I miss you, I like you a lot and need more of your time

Many men though take it as an attack or, even worse, feel inadequate.

Do Deal With Problems

Some couples will always try to avoid talking about problems.

They might be afraid of giving too much air time to negative feelings, or afraid of opening a Pandora's box. But not talking about the problems leads to emotional distance.
And a sense of loneliness, which can be a precursor of infidelity as well.

And if it's your partner who avoids digging deeper into the problems, then it becomes your duty to make sure he/she hears you.

Emotionally Distant Marriages

Avoiding problems and deeper feelings is typical of avoidant relationships (read: Why Marriages Succeed or Fail) and "emotionally distant" marriages (also read: emotional unavailability).

The risk of not getting to know each other well is to develop "inner lives" they keep away from their partners and you won't feel understood.

Gottman suggests that conflict-avoidant couples learn to share strong emotions instead of suppressing them.

Focus on The Positives

Anthony Robbins says often: you get what you focus on.

And it's similar to marriages and relationships. To get more feelings of fondness and admiration, you should make a conscious effort to pay attention, notice, and express your feelings of fondness and gratitude for any positive thing happening between you two.

Similarly, avoiding replaying negative thoughts in your mind.

Respect Your Partner's Dreams

Gottman explores dreams and gridlocked conflicts, a topic he already covered in The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work.

It's important to notice that our dreams and the deepest expressions of "who we are" are not always obvious.

To bring our deepest differences to the surface and prevent them from being an issue, do the following:

1. Create a safe environment where it's safe to discuss our deepest drives and dreams
2. Find areas of flexibility
3. Compromise where you can

The most important step is to know that your dreams are respected and understood.

Do Not Suppress Anger

Anger, like all other emotions, should not be suppressed.

Gottman says you can actually use anger. For example, when you use anger to stand up for yourself, you gain self-respect.

But to allow anger to transmute into a positive force, you have to express it openly and in non-destructive ways. You must also avoid down spiraling thoughts such as "how could he do that to me, that's so unfair, I need to show him now, he will see.. ").

The right way to express it instead is like this:

> I feel so angry right now and it's a fair emotion. I can handle this feeling and I need to talk to him right away and fix this situation

When you're angry, it's not true that "getting it off your chest" will help (also read pop-psychology and self-help myths). Ranting and raging without a listening partner only makes you angrier.
What you need indeed is someone to hear you out and work through your feeling.
And that will calm you down.

Avoid Children-Centered Marriages

Gottman says that putting your children always first means you put your relationship second. And it's likely that your relationship will suffer. Which in turn, it's been proven, is bad for children.

[image]

CONS

Misleading title
I find the title slightly misleading. This is more like 10 case studies and the lessons we can learn from each one.

Is affection necessary?
Gottman says that happily married couples behave like good friends with lots of respect and affection for each other.
But in other titles, he says that couples with lots of fights also can stay happily married (as long as the positives outweigh the negatives 5:1).

The two aren't mutually exclusive: for example, a couple with frequent arguments can still be affectionate, but it still raised a question mark for me.

All the books necessary?
Of course, some information repeats. I wish Gottman had done one single book and put everything in there. Then maybe a few more books with only case studies.

PROS

Lots of dialogue examples
I am a big, huge proponent of learning through examples -which is indeed one of the founding principles of this website-.
And "Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage" has lots of dialogues that Gottman breaks down and analyzes.

Some great psychological wisdom
There's some great psychological wisdom. Like for example why people growing up with difficult families can become oversensitive to criticism (because children believe everything's their fault and take responsibility for the family's issues)

Review

10 Lessons to Transform Your Marriage is yet another great book by John Gottman.

It's hard to overestimate how much the wisdom of his work can help couples build better relationships.
I especially loved the dialogue examples with a sentence-by-sentence analysis.

The Relationship Cure: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 1 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In The Relationship Cure author John Gottman focuses on emotional intelligence and "bid for connections". Such as, how partners open up for emotional bonding and what it means for relationships.

Contents

- Bullet Summary
- Full Summary
  - Responding to Bids For Connection
  - Recognizing Bids
  - Partners Don't Try Again After Failure
  - Men Are Key
  - Families Influence Our EQ Levels
- Real-Life Applications
- CONS
- PROS
- Review

Bullet Summary

- Responding well to bids for (emotional) connection is crucial for healthy relationships
- You need to know your partner to effectively and constantly recognize all the bids for connections
- When communication is poor some bids can be hidden behind criticism, arguments, or seemingly innocuous remarks

Full Summary

A bid for connection can come in many forms. It can be a question, a touch, a comment, a gesture… Any expressions through which someone wants to feel connected with you.

How people respond to bids has a huge, huge effect on relationships.

Husbands heading for divorce, for example, miss (or disregard) bids for connections 82% of the time, while husbands in stable relationships only miss it 19% of the time (for women, it's 50% and 14%, which also tells us men miss more bids for connection).

Responding to Bids For Connection

There are three ways to respond to bids for connection:

1. Turning towards (and we increase our emotional capital)
2. Turning away (it ignores the bid)
3. Turning against (it reacts with anger)

Here's an example:

The man is at the computer to fix an important work issue. He looks nervous and worried. The wife gets up and silently puts a hand on his shoulder.

If he reaches out to her hand or turns around and touches her, he's turning towards her. If he keeps ignoring her, he turns away. If he gets angry and tells her not to touch her, he's turning against her.

Recognizing Bids

It's not always to recognize bids. Sometimes a question or a comment can be "transactional", such as it has no deeper meaning beyond getting something done or conveying certain information.

Gottman says that it requires emotional intelligence and getting to know the person well.
Once you know the person, you will better understand them and will also recognize where, when, and how they're more likely to make emotional bids.

Hidden Bids

Sometimes bids are not even made but are hidden behind a complaint or a criticism. It's what Gottman refers to as the "longing behind the criticism" in Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage.

For example, if you're at the computer and your wife complains to you that you're always working, she might not really be tired of you working so much.
But she might be actually making a bid for connection in asking you to turn towards her care more about her.

Partners Don't Try Again After Failure

After a bid for a connection has been rejected, people usually don't try it again.
Gottman says people only retry in 20% of the cases.

Men Are Key

Women make bids for connection at the same rate independently of the health of their relationships.
Which, Gottman implies, gives men more power to turn around those relationships for good.

Men keep having the same chances to emotionally connect even when things are not going well.

Families Influence Our EQ Levels

Family culture is key.

- Emotionally intelligent families teach children

Emotionally intelligent families teach children to accept their feelings and to handle them appropriately. They value emotions and the expression of emotions, which is key in raising healthy children.

- Emotionally dismissing families suppresses EQ

Some other families dismiss feelings or disapprove of them.

Children are subtly -or non-subtly- discouraged from showing feelings. When a kid or a family member is emotional or too sad, the family turns away (or against it).
Minimizing feelings is also in the same category (ie.: "oh come on it's just a toy").

Also, check:

- Emotionally unavailable men

Gottman also doesn't believe people should force themselves to be positive. He says that experiencing all emotions is the better option.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Watch out for bids!
Take care of bids for connection, they're the main building block of relationships.
I see people missing those all the time, and that's where relationships turn sour and partners feel lonely. This goes for any kind of relationship!
Check out: 4 communication mistakes men destroy relationships with.

To build an emotional connection…
… Turn towards that person emotionally as often as you can.
This is the greatest advice since How to Win Friends and Influence People.

CONS

- Could be more precise

I think this bidding concept is way too underrated and way too misunderstood.
In a way, I'm glad Gottman dedicates a whole book to it. But in a way, I'm also angry that the Relationship Cure, in my opinion, doesn't do a great job of clarifying and exemplifying what bids are.

- A bit fluffy

Atypical of John Gottman's books, I found The Relationship Cure to be a bit fluffy. The concept is fundamental, but it's also simple and it could have been said in a briefer fashion.
Instead, it covers lots of topics that Gottman covers better in other books such as The 7 Principles for Making Marriage Work and Why Marriages Succeed or Fail.

- Some fuzziness in the definitions

Gottman talks about the "emotional command systems" but honestly I failed to see much relevance in there (let me know in the comments if you think otherwise!).

And getting into micro-expressions and body language was yes relevant, but trying to explain these complex topics in a few paragraphs felt out of place.

PROS

Sheds light on an important topic
This is an important topic that doesn't get enough recognition.

Review

If you're unaware of bids for connection, I recommend you look into it. "The Relationship Cure" is a great start.

Rommate Choice: Common Mistakes

Most people meet once, have a good feeling, and proceed to move into a flat (or accept new roommates).

That's not a good strategy.

Some others believe they are going deeper with questions about what he does and what he likes.
And that might be even worse.

Much better is to inquire and look for compatibility in the key areas that make for a good life in the flat.
At the end of this article, you will know exactly what to look for in a roommate to find the best roommate you can get.

My Experience With Flatmates

Since I moved out of my parents' house my life has been a continuous experience in flat-sharing.

I have traveled the world and the seven seas sharing flats, and if I've learned anything… No, it's not that everybody's looking for something -albeit that's also true-, it's that who you share your space with matters.

My name is Lucio, I am a psychology buff and all of my work is basically about people and human dynamics. Through studies and personal experience, I realized that to find the perfect roommate you should match in the following traits:

#1. Match Extroversion Levels

The very first personality trait you must match is your extraversion-introversion levels.
Extraversion is on a continuum:

Few people are 100% introverted or 100% introverted, and people in the middle are often referred to as "ambiverts".

This is all the more important if you are very introverted or very extroverted because life together will be hell. The introvert will think the extrovert is annoying and overbearing, and the extrovert will think the introvert is slippery, and "weird" and that he hates him.

Topic	Extroverts	Introverts
Eating	Want to eat together	Want to enjoy food alone
TV / Sport Events	Watch TV and sport together as a shared event	Watch the match alone (and comment it on an online forum)
Use of common spaces	Camp out on common areas (and hope roommate will come out)	Stay in the room (hoping roommate will get the fuck out so they can go out)
Feelings towards the other	• weird • slippery • always avoiding me • doesn't like me	• "too much" • overbearing • all over me • likes me too much

Basically, when two people at the opposite end of the extraversion level meet, they end up looking like an anxious-avoidant relationship: the extrovert chases for talking and connection while the introvert runs away.

Here is an example of how I, an introvert, immediately spotted that an Airbnb guest of mine was not going to be the perfect flatmate:

Imagine you are traveling. You're going to a new country, a new city, a conference in the pharmaceutical field you love.
Much to visit, much to do, right?
Who is going to say, under those conditions "I can't wait to spend six nights (!) with you?".
A super extrovert of course!

And how is an introvert going to react?
By trying to dodge all that connection and chitchat of course!
Look at me trying to avoid too much talk. And notice his reply:

"Let's see if we can take ten minutes to catch up later", LOL.
It never dawns on many extroverts that there is an extroversion mismatch and they never realize that the introvert is, indeed, avoiding them. But not because the introvert doesn't like the extrovert, it's simply because they need their own space.

Finally, when he leaves me feedback, look at what he writes:

No comments about cleanness, location, the attraction of the new city, or anything.
Just says that "I am willing to talk".
Who provides such feedback? An extrovert chasing down an introvert for connection, of course.

What To Ask:

What can you ask to spot if your future BFE (best flatmate ever) is an introvert or an extrovert?

Here are a few good questions:

- Do you cook?

Cooking is often more about the shared experience of cooking, talking, and then eating. At the very least, it will tell you if they spend lots of time outside their room.
If you're introverted, avoid people saying yes.

- What type of flat-share do you like?

Extroverts will mention activities within the flat and things they like together with their roommates.
Introverts will mention their activities outside the flat and will talk about what they do.

Look at Their Behavior

On top of just listening to their replies, notice how they behave.
Extroverts talk a lot. And often they talk a lot about themselves.
If you're an introvert, avoid gushers. If you're an extrovert, avoid people who ask lots of questions and talk little.

Extraversion & Introversion Are Relative

Extraversion in a flatshare is the pattern of relating between people and not unchanging constants.
You can become an introvert to a super extrovert and be an extrovert to a super introvert.
So it's best to pick someone around your extraversion level.

#2. Match Attitudes Towards Privacy & Personal Space

Sharing a flat is about, well… Sharing.

Sharing space, sharing things in the common areas, and also partially sharing our personal spaces.
That's why finding a good roommate often means finding someone who doesn't differ too much from us when it comes to privacy.

Example:

I am slightly tilting towards privacy seekers, but without being a nazi about it.

And I have been living with people far on the "communal" line. I can tell you it's an issue. These people opened my door without knocking and left their own doors open while studying, playing video games, and even while sleeping and… Showering.

Some of these people I could absolutely be friends with… But they were not people I could live with :).

Topic	Communal	Privacy Seeker
Giving possessions	You can take my food	I don't want your food, buy mine
Taking possessions	I take yours, then you can take mine	No, it's my stuff and I don't want yours
Common space	My cabinet, your cabinet… What's mine	Hey, don't put your stuff here: it's mine
Personal Room	1. Leaves their doors open 2. Knocks, then opens door	1. I wish he'd close his damn door 2. Please wait for me to say "come in"
Feelings towards other	• uptight • jealous • keeps me at distance • such an elitist • doesn't like me	• too easy going • overbearing • doesn't respect my space • such a communist • doesn't like me

What To Ask

Here is what to ask to make sure that you match your future flatmate's attitudes toward communal living:

- Do you usually close your door?

Anything but "well of course" tells you they probably have a very communal attitude towards spaces.
It means they will also treat your own space as if it were their own… Unless you teach them. Sometimes, repeatedly.

- Would you mind if I took your stuff sometime (and you can then take mine)?

Anything but an emphatic "absolutely" tells you they care about their private property.

#3. Cleanliness Levels

Dirty roommates make for terrible roommates for clean people (the opposite holds less true).
As a matter of fact, a very dirty roommate can make living impossible for a very clean person.

What to Ask

Here are the best questions:

- How clean is the place for you right now?

If you're looking for a good roommate, leave the place at your average cleanliness level and let them rate it.
If they say it's very clean, they're too dirty for you. If they say it's dirty, they might be too clean for you

- Is this how you keep the place, on average?

If they are offering the room, ask if the current state of the place is what they're comfortable with and see if it's enough for you.
If they cleaned for the occasion, ask:

- Can I check your room?

Chances are they cleaned and organized the common areas but not their rooms. Check their room for a real litmus test on whether they'll be great roommates or not.

Note: cleanliness correlates highly with organization and house chores, so you don't need to prod for all of them.

#4. Check for Noise Sensitivity

Some people ask about circadian rhythms, and albeit that's good information to have, it's not really crucial… Unless you or your roommate have very light sleep.
In which case, watch out.

What really matters instead is how people are bothered -or not bothered- by noise.

For example, when I moved into my current flat I asked a neighbor how it was for him. He told me he was just about to move out because the lady from the last floor was so noisy and annoying.
I prodded for more data.
He said that she would listen to the TV at full blast with the window open and the noise would "bounce back from the building in front" and ruin his whole day.

This guy was on the 3rd floor, talking about a lady on the 5th floor. There was a whole floor in between and he was talking about "noise bouncing back from the building in front?".
Obviously a highly noise-sensitive guy!
I moved in and it's been for me one of the quietest places I've ever been to -but then again I've been living in Roma with cars honking all over the place and noisy scooters zipping from left and right-.

What to Ask

- Do you have a light sleep?
- Do you find it annoying if someone is up late / wakes up very early?

A yes to any of these answers can make for a difficult living together if you stay up until late or go out a lot.

#4. Match Noise Attitudes

Does it sound a lot like the previous point?

Nah, it's similar, but it runs deeper.

Noise seekers fear silence and need their life to be constantly filled with noise.
Many activities they do, they do with background music. Sometimes they also study with music, which means an almost constant stream of noise during their wake hours.

The worst example I had, was a guy who would sleep with his hairdryer on, which meant 24h noise!

Topic	Noise Avoiders	Noise Seekers
TV	Why the hell do you keep it on if you're not watching it!	Sometimes I pay attention. It keeps me company.
Ubiquitous Noise	You're in the kitchen, can't you switch off the stereo in your room	I do back and forth. And I guess I like a lively house
Talking	Can you turn off the TV / phone music while we speak	But I can hear you
Feelings towards other	• loud and crass • unfocused and scattered • low quality • he's not like me	• boring and uptight • overachiever • smart / cultured • he thinks he's better

Noise is highly related to nervous system sensitivity, and people who are very sensitive to noise also tend to be very sensitive to light, commotion, lots of people, stress, pain, caffeine, emotions, etc., etc.
Also, read:

- The Highly Sensitive Person
- Are You Highly Sensitive? Take The Quiz

What to Ask

- How important is silence to you?

Watch Out For Personal Loudness

Watch out, particularly for a loud tone of voice.

It's often an easy giveaway for people who are used to screaming to be heard above their background noises :)

Not that the attitude towards noise is also influenced by the introversion/extroversion personality type. Research showed that introverts prefer quieter places while extroverts like noisier environments (Cain, 2012).

5. Beware of Love & Attraction

I used to be quite open and liberal about the sexual orientation of my flatmates.

But after this awkward experience, I'm not too sure that's a good idea:

Indeed familiarity and repeated exposure tend to increase liking (Schafer, 2015). That means that if there is an even minuscule amount of liking, then living together will likely amplify it.
As a matter of fact, I believe that living together is one of the easiest ways of developing feelings.
Which can also eventually lead to (unreturned) love and lots of troubles.

As much as that might sound unfair, if you're straight you might want to consider avoiding non-straight men.
And if you're in a relationship, you might want to avoid members of the opposite sex.

Ultimately, that's up to you. Just be aware of the dangers though.
Personally, I won't let one bad experience change my "LGBT-friendly policy" and I'm still open to any gender orientation.

No that type of brother in arms :)

6. Avoid Living With Owners

When you're a paying flatmate in someone's house you are officially buying your own space.

But unofficially chances are that you will always feel like a guest.
And that the owner will always feel like an owner.

Especially for long-term rent, it's best if you don't rent with the owner in the flat.

Bad Questions to Ask Potential Roommates

Many people -and most guides online- focus on personal questions.

Things like:

- likes and dislikes
- hobbies
- profession
- aspirations

That stuff is important when you want a friend, but matters little when it comes to finding a great roommate.

If someone is a lawyer, it says very little about how you'll get along.
If they're passionate about arts, it won't make much of a difference in your flat-sharing life if they leave their dishes unwashed and you hate that.

But if he's a super extrovert lawyer who wants to talk to you about his latest art gallery discovery when you'd rather enjoy your food by yourself… Then that's an issue.

These typical “flatshare interviews” tell you nothing about the person.

Summary

It’s crucial to understand that finding a good roommate is not the same as finding a good friend.

Most people -and online guides- focus on questions and aspects that help you find friends, but that have little significance when it comes to sharing a flat.

This guide will help you find a good roommate.
Up to you then if you want him to also be a friend (or more :).

Criticism in Relationships: Examples & Solutions

Lucio Buffalmano · 4 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This article is an in-depth take on criticism in relationships.

You will see real-life examples of criticism and you will learn why criticism is destructive and how to properly give feedback without criticizing.

But first of all, I want to give you some motivation to tackle this area of your life and relationships.

Why We Need to Fix Criticism

Relationship skills are some of the most underappreciated -and underdeveloped- skills in the world.
This is silly, considering relationships are the biggest determinant of a happy and healthy life.

As John Gottman said (I paraphrase):

> working on your relationship instead of going to the gym makes you 3 times healthier in a fraction of the time.

Criticism: Part of a Bigger Problem

Criticism is one of what John Gottman calls "The Four Horsemen of The Apocalypse", which are:

1. Criticism
2. Contempt
3. Defensiveness
4. Stonewalling

Why should you know this?
Because when couples engage in any of the above, a break up follows 90%+ of the time. And couples that don't split up experience terrible relationships.
So let's start now.

What Is Criticism?

In Why Marriages Succeed or Fail Gottman introduces criticism as

> A global attack on personality or character

Criticizing differs in one important characteristic from a complaint.
A complaint is about specific issues, whereas criticism is an attack on a defining personality trait.
With criticism, you attack your partner at an identity level.
Criticism is hurtful and pushes your partner to either defend or counterattack. And that, instead of helping us solve the issue, escalates the negativity.

Here are some elements that can help you recognize criticism:

- Start with "you"
- Use absolute adverbs such as "always" and "never"
- It's about them, not the situation

Criticism (wrong) VS Complaints (right)

On the left side, are some examples of criticism.
On the right side, how a more emotionally intelligent partner would communicate the same issue?

Bad Criticism	Proper Complaint
You never listen to me, you are so egoistic!	I want to hear about your day, I really do. But I also want to share mine. It makes me feel you don't care about me when you don't listen. Can you please listen and pay attention to me?
You always leave a mess! You're not a responsible adult, you're a baby. But I'm not your mom to clean your shit!	I feel so tired and overburdened. And now that I see you throwing your socks on the floor I feel like exploding.
You "forgot" what? How can you forget the bills! Probably too busy thinking what shoes to buy! God you are so sloppy it would be funny it wasn't tragic	I am furious you forgot to pay the bills. I want to discuss this matter deeply with you once I calm down. For now, this is your issue and I want you to think of possible solutions

Notice that moving beyond criticism does not mean being nice or taking things lightly.
In the last example, he has taken the matter very seriously. And he lets her feel the brunt of his anger and disappointment by refusing to get involved and letting her work on it by herself first.
But he still avoids the pitfalls of making it a personal criticism. A personal criticism would have escalated into an ad hominem argument, poisoning both of their moods and moving them farther away from a solution (and from each other).

Why Criticism Dooms Relationships

When criticism becomes pervasive the relationships start becoming toxic.
Three things often happen:

1. Partners behave more like enemies than teammates
2. Criticism begets criticism: fights multiply and good times disappear
3. The sense of "us" disappears and emotional distance grows

In Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage, Gottman says (I paraphrase for brevity):

> We need a supportive partner to share what matters to us: dreams, fears and feelings.
> But a criticizing partner makes us feel psychologically unsafe. We fear our vulnerabilities could be used against us.
> So we clam up, and we grow emotionally distant.
> And that's a lonely way to live.

Examples of Criticism in Relationships

And here are a few real-life examples of criticism in relationships:

1. Sex And The City – Carrie and Aidan Fight

https://youtu.be/fdZhsn9Fgs0?t=161s

> Aiden: Oh, your stuff, your bathroom… You always do that, you never want to let me in"
> Carrie: I don't "always do" anything, and I have.. Let you in

"You always" is an open sign of criticism. And with your stuff your bathroom, he is communicating:

- You are (always) egoist and self-centered

Even more harmful for the relationship, he says she can never manage to let him in.
That's a defeatist, hopeless expression. When you talk like that, you are verbally admitting your relationship has no future and you have no power to change it.
From there on the argument only escalates, going into contempt, flooding, and ending with stonewalling (we'll deal with them in the next installments).

2. Mrs. Doubtifire – Divorce Scene

> Miranda: You set me up every time to be the bad guy.
> Daniel: You spend too much time with those corporate clowns you used to despise
> Miranda: I spend too much time with you, Daniel.

She says he guilts trip her. Because it's every time it's not circumstantial, it's a criticism of his persona. She is basically saying:

- You're a psychological manipulator

Daniel implies she has become a corporate clown -another personality criticism-.

Note: Daniel has other issues here beyond criticism. He is lacking a spine, especially after the divorce line (the correctly rewritten script below takes that into account).

3. Sex and The City – Carrie & Miranda Fight

> Miranda: Every time you get near him, you turn into this pathetic, needy, insecure victim.

"every time you get near him" is broad enough to qualify as criticism. Especially considering that what comes next is so aggressive that it would take a zen master not to take it personally.

> Carrie: You're gonna cut me out of your life like you did to Steve? The first sign of any little weakness or flaw, and you just write people off. My God, Miranda! You are so judgmental.

Typical of criticism, it leads to an escalation. Carrie's three hits are slightly different, but all point out to the same personal criticism, basically telling Miranda:

- You are a cold-blooded, heartless b*tch

Friendships tend to be more resilient. But if that were a romantic relationship, it might have scarred them for a long time.

Fix Criticism: Proper Relationship Communication

Here are the steps to move beyond relationship criticism:

1. Start With "I"

Effective complaints begin with a soft start-up, often stating your feelings. It might be an emotion or a physical state.

2. Talk facts

Focus on facts, not on the person.

3. State a positive need

How can your partner -or both of you- make it better?

Rewriting The Criticism Examples

And here's what the above criticism examples would look like by using the correct complaint mechanism:

Express Feelings	State Facts	State Need
I am so annoyed and hurt	That you label shared areas as "yours".What the hell is that Carrie. I feel like you are closing off to me.And that's the last thing we need -> this is "team framing"	Carrie…(pause for emphasis)Can you please be respectful about my things and a bit more welcoming towards me?(recruit her help to break negative cycle)
The way you shut off our party, that made me feel so crushed and unworthy	We are growing apart Miranda.And that pains me because I believe we still have a shot at making a good family.(empowering, hopeful frame)But we're far from it now and it will take both of us to change that.(team framing & realistic)	Now this is my mess, so I'll clean it.(takes responsibility, relieves her)But after I'd like you to sit down with me and talk it through. OK for you?(get compliance) Cool, go rest now, it's been a tense afternoon (smiles) -> this is repair attempt
Carrie, I feel so angry right now that I'm about to blow off	The last time you have been with that guy it was terrible on you and took a toll on all of us	I don't want to see you again in that state.And right now, with the anger I feel, I don't feel I could support you.

What It Takes to Move Beyond Criticism

Moving beyond criticism is not difficult from a technical perspective. Practice it consciously 20 times and it will start to come naturally.
It can be emotionally more difficult though.

Here's what it takes:

1. Ownership & Team Framing

I statements are a form of ownership. "You" passes the blame along. "I" takes responsibility.
Once you can take ownership of your part, look for ways to take a joint, or couple ownership whenever you can involve both of you.

Vulnerability also plays a role here. It can be hard for ego-protecting people to say "I feel hurt".

2. Vulnerability & Courage

Stating your needs can require lots of vulnerability when it's an emotional need.
In the feminist era, it can be hard for some women to say "I feel lonely". And it's no better for men. Hiding behind a mask of masculinity, they often prefer not to state any need at all.
That's why it's important to foster an open, criticism-free environment: because the alternative to vulnerable asking is aggressive fighting.

3. Emotional Intelligence & Repair Attempts

Emotional intelligence is your greatest ally in stopping criticism's vicious circles. If you are reading, and thinking of how this article applies to you, you are right now increasing your emotional intelligence.

With emotional intelligence, you can realize what's going on, step back and deploy repair attempts.
Repair attempts are anything a partner does or says to break the escalation of negativity.
We will discuss it more in-depth in another installment. But for now, here's an example of a successful repair attempt.

4. Practice

Here's the good news of this all: the more you use complaints and vulnerability instead of criticism, the easier it gets.
It's a virtuous cycle.

It's Not About Suppressing Emotions

I want to stress this further again.

Fixing criticism is not about being overly nice, "letting your partner off easy" or even suppressing your anger.

As a matter of fact, you should embrace your feelings and anger (studies show suppressing emotions is bad for relationships).

Fixing criticism is about channeling your negative feelings away from destructive outlets and into helpful ones. And don't say to your partner that The Power Moves said it, but if you're in a fiery relationship, it's also OK to shout.

Summary

Criticism will make for a terrible relationship at best and soon destroy your relationship at worst.

The solution is swapping criticism with specific complaints. That's relationship communication 101.
And it's powerful.

If you have experienced both heavy-criticism relationships and criticism-free ones, you know it.
They're worlds apart.
You can't wait to end the former. And the latter are the relationships that make life a pleasure to live.

How to Make Someone Your Bitch: Trump Vs. Macron

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

How to make someone your bitch might seem like a weird title.

How do you even do that, how is it possible to consciously make something like that happen?

In this case study, Trump publicly put Macron in a submissive role to demonstrate dominance.
We respect Macron and understand this may have been a strategy of appeasement. But in real life, you must avoid these dynamics to avoid 'becoming someone's bitch'

This article will show just the dynamics of 'making someone's your bitch' and how you can avoid becoming anyone's bitch.

TPM Note: prefer getting respect & giving respect as a baseline approach
We do NOT endorse bullying or gratuitous humiliation. We help men become strong, high-value, respected, but also honorable men who lead other men and women forward.
This article's purpose is to teach interpersonal power dynamics, asserting healthy boundaries, and getting respect.

Intro

Macron recently traveled to Washington to meet with Donald Trump.

And the media went berserk about their deep friendship. Bromance, some wrote.

Sometimes I'm amazed at how dumb and superficial much of the mainstream media can be.
The New York Times even writes:

> Or perhaps mr. Trump was trying to please, or dominate, his guest

As if pleasing and dominating were synonyms. Or even if there were any doubts Trump was dominating Macron. Indeed, unless your idea of friendship consists of one party dominating the other, Trump-Macron is no friendship. The dominance display is so overt that, that you must truly lack any power-awareness not to see it.

Let's quickly analyze the signs:

#1. Preen Him

Principle:

⚖ If you treat a guy like a girlfriend and he's OK with it… He's your bitch.

Preening, as Allan Pease notes, is typical of couples and romance. And it rarely, if ever, pertains to friendship.

And here's the other thing about preening: while it is a sign of high devotion, it's also a sign of ownership. The party preening the other is communicating that "this person belongs to me".
And when a man does it to another man, it's awkward at best and a sign of physical domination at worst.

We all have a personal space indeed, and usually, people are wary of invading it. When they are not wary, it's because they are either very comfortable with you…. Or not scared in any way.
And not being scared means that they are far above in the dominance hierarchy… And that you are powerless of hitting back.

See preening in action:

> Trump: We have to make him perfect (touches Macron's lapel)
> Trump: There was a little dandruff <—- there likely was nothing, it was just an excuse to pull the power move

2. Touch Him With Impunity

Principle:

⚖ If a guy asserts no boundaries… He's your bitch

Trump repeatedly touches Macron in a way that communicates "I'm in charge".

Or, at times, in a way that communicates "you're my boy Macron (and I'm the boss)".

Here are some of them:

> Trump: (pats Macron's hand, pats Macron on the side, grabs Macron full frontal while looking at him like a : you big boy", kisses Macron on the temple, etc.)

Special mention, of course, to Trump taking Macron's hand and carrying him away.

That's a behavior you expect, again, in couples (hopefully from the man).
When a man does it to another man, it's both awkward and disrespectful. It shows, in that instance quite literally, that Trump is the leader and Macron is the follower.
At best.
At worst, it shows that one party takes the masculine role, and other party is the feminine.

And putting another head of state in the position of the girlfriend is not exactly how a "friend" should behave.

3. Talk Of Him In The Third Person While He's Present

Principle:

⚖ If you can talk about someone next to you like he's not even there… He's your bitch

Trump talks about Macron in the third person, as if he weren't there.

And he does it with a condescending tone.
He makes comments about Macron the same way a crassy boss would do of the latest intern to make everyone laugh.

Here are a few examples:

> Trump: We have to make him perfect. He is perfect

"we have to make him perfect" as Trump pretends to remove a piece of dandruff. That feels like a father who is sending his boy out on his first date.
And Macron totally acts that part, too.

> Trump: I like him a lot

"I like him a lot" as he points at him. Yes, it's a compliment, but it's a domineering compliment.
Just imagine, would you go to your boss or company's CEO, point at him, and say "I like him a lot"? No, it would feel awkward, right? But is the CEO doing that to an employee?
Fair game, it's a compliment. But it's a compliment that highlights a power differential.

> Trump: He will be a great president. It's my prediction. It's only a prediction

This is a compliment similar to the above, again stressing the power differential. But this time Trump goes one step further: he takes it away in a push/pull power move.
It's as if he's telling everyone "he still has to prove himself (to me)".

#4. Refuse Their Influence

Principle:

⚖ If he listens to you, but you brush him off… He's your bitch

Macron went in there mostly to convince Trump about the Iran deal.

If Trump wanted to respect Macron, he wouldn't make any bold statement that he made up his mind without at least hinting the two will talk about it.
Instead, he does just the opposite.

Again, Trump is not behaving like a friendly host. He contradicts Macron, cuts him out, and makes "I" statements. He is basically communicating that Macron's opinion counts for nothing.

How to Avoid Being Someone's Bitch

Macron does little to counteract Trump.

To his credit, sometimes he puts his hand on top of Trump or touches him, but it's almost always as a follower or in response to Trump.
And Trump's power moves are so obvious that Macron's moves just seem like little drops in the ocean.

To be honest, Macron was not in an easy position:

1. He had already chosen the chummy friend role
2. Trump is a power-obsessed man
3. He was in the lion's den

However, fu*k the excuses. People like Trump will treat you how you will let them treat you, so it's up to you to stop the deluge.

Here are some ideas.

How to Counteract Preening

During the preening moments, Macron could have done a few things:

- Counter-preen

The most obvious. He could have reached into Trump's jacket and pretended to remove a hair, then make a joke it was easy to find the blonde hair on the dark jacket.
Without being abrasive or anything of course, but jokingly and in a friendly manner. Maybe even saying "ahaha thank you, lemme help you out to look perfect as well".

- Laugh, say Trump is always so service oriented

He could have framed Trump as service-oriented by saying something like "ahaha thanks, President Trump is always so helpful with me", then lightly slapping him on the back.
Such as he would frame Trump as the one working hard for him (the dynamics are: server/boss).

How to Counteract Hand-Holding

Countering the hand-holding was a difficult one as any insubordination would have been highly visible to everyone.

But then again, being taken by the hand was also very visible.
What to do then?

He could have avoided Trump's hand and lingered a few seconds longer pretending he wanted to take another question.
Or even less obvious, as Trump went to grab his hand he could have started speaking and said to the journalists:

> Macron: Alright, thank you everyone, it looks like Mr. President wants to go back in (laugh here as if you were making light fun of him). Thank you so much, see you later

That way, he would have followed Trump, but without looking like a puppet. He would have taken the stage, make a light joke about Trump's domineering stance, and "closed the stage".
All while keeping a friendly tone.

How to Counteract One-Way Influence

Macron could have said little while Trump gushed about internal politics and the "terrible" Iran deal.

But he could have done a lot indirectly.

Instead of sitting at the edge of the chair like a nervous schoolboy waiting for the teacher's question, he should have sat back.
That way, he wouldn't look like the insignificant man in the room who has been cut out. He would have looked as if he was the king kicking it back as Trump sweated out all the questions.
A slightly amused, relaxed smile on his face would have helped the image too.

How to Counteract Condescending Third-Person Tone

At each condescending remark, he should have bitten back with the same kind of humor.
Example:

> Trump: I like him a lot

> Macron: (smiling, making it obvious it's a game he's not taking seriously) I like him even more

Note that the above is a follower reaction. It's OK in this case, you can't escalate there. He's the guest and wants to keep a good relationship.
By saying something back, even as a follower, he'd send the message he's alive and kicking while also keeping a friendly tone.

> Trump: He will be a great president. It's only a prediction
> Macron: Thank you, thank you. I'm sure he'll make America great and will be a powerful candidate in the upcoming election

The latter is a backhanded compliment hinting that he's not omnipotent but has to go through elections again. And might not be re-elected.

Summary

Most of the media got the relationship between Trump and Macron completely wrong.

They are not friends.
Trump went out of his way to out-dominate Macron, and to do it publicly.

This article rectifies what has really happened. And gives you a few pointers on what to do when someone behaves with you the same way as Trump did.

Trump humiliated Macron and got his revenge in full -and then some- from the day Macron disrespected him at the NATO summit.

And when it comes to us: never let anyone run slipshod over you.

Why You Must Address Relationship Contempt

Contempt is the single biggest predictor of divorce.

And I said that first to be your motivation.

John Gottman's research shows that contempt is the single biggest predictor of divorce in both heterosexual and gay couples.
Contempt is so harmful that it actively makes sick. In one of his many books, Gottman says that contempt in a relationship erodes our immune system.

So let's start fixing contempt by first understanding what it exactly is.

What is Contempt

Contempt is a type of communication that attacks our partner with ridicule and sarcasm.

The contemptuous party takes a position of judgmental superiority as it seeks to embarrass and shame our partner by painting him as unworthy.

Contempt uses sarcasm and cynicism in an indirect way, and it's slightly passive-aggressive in its nature. As with most passive-aggressive communication, it can be difficult for partners to detect and directly confront.
Contempt is the opposite of respect.

Here are some signs of contempt:

- Derisive humor
- Contemptuous facial expressions (eye rolling, sneering, raising upper lip..)
- Exaggerations
- Disdain towards partner
- Insults and name-calling (fat, ugly, bitch, loser, etc.)

Examples of Contempt

This is an example of contempt with derisive humor:

> I've been running around all day, then you come back and all you can do is flop on your lazy ass. It's pathetic. Do you want a bib and a biberon too, that way maybe you can manage to be a bit more pathethic?

This is an example of contempt with exaggeration:

> You would rather me to stay in tonight ahaha how unexpected, hooow unexpected (looks away). If I had to let you decide how to live my social life, I'd be here tied up with a gag ball in my mouth

And this is an example of contempt with disdain:

> You would wish "these people" would sleep on the floor

The last one is a real-life example.
That was what the mother of an ex-girlfriend of mine said about my parents when she heard they hadn't yet booked a place to stay.

Consequences of Contempt

Similar to criticism, but even more powerful, contempt makes relationships unsafe.

And worst than criticism, it makes our partner feel unworthy and inferior.
In that sense, in many ways, contempt is a power move and a tool of soft power (and a very nasty one, too).

If you let it fester contempt will drive a wedge between you two and break the emotional bond.
The relationship becomes a place where you need to defend and protect yourself. You don't go home after a long day and look forward to relaxing.
You go home after a long day and you're bracing for the next fight. Or walking on eggshells to avoid the next big painful argument.

And when we cannot be our true selves and when we don't have an emotional connection, guess what? You don't have a relationship.
Remember this:

> Any relationship where distance is safer than closeness is not a relationship.

With time, if you don't fix contempt, it will make enemies of you two. And at that point breaking up is not only unavoidable, but actually the best solution for both.

Let's see now a few contempt examples to better understand this dynamic:

Examples of Contempt In Relationships

Let's see now some examples of contempt in relationships:

#1. Forgetting Sarah Marshall

This is a typical example where the woman started focusing on the negatives of her partner.
Contempt was the consequence of her seeing her partner in a negative light.

https://youtu.be/RvNuTuiKyIo?t=55s

Russel Brand starts off highly critical, but he goes back into a productive stance when he says:

> Him: I've heard that women do fake orgasms, but I've never seen one. It really deeply upset me

That "it really deeply upset me" is great communication.
It's when she goes into heavy contempt that the fight moves to a whole new level:

> Her: You should have seen yourself at dinner. 'Oh, I'm Aldous Snow. Bullshit, bullshit, bullshit. 'No, no drinks for me, thanks. 'Bullshit, bullshit, bullshit.'

After that, it's a vicious circle of contempt and criticism.

#2. Terms of Endearment

Jack Nicholson starts opening up and, as it's often the case for the very first emotional openings, it's not easy for him.

When partners are opening that's the moment you want to be the most unjudgmental and open you possibly can. Those are the moments that bond partners together.

Contempt during an emotionally charged conversation is the most damaging because your partner will feel the relationship is not a safe place to be himself.

Let's watch:

> Him: It makes it rough, especially living next door. I'm starting to think I gotta watch what I'm doing…
> Her: (mocking with a disgusted expression) Bla bla bla

He is strong enough to look past the first contemptuous attempt and doesn't escalate.
But of course, he stops opening up. And you sure can't blame him when he refuses to turn towards her bid for emotional connection ("I feel humiliated") and leaves right after.

Note: Jack Nicholson in this movie -and possibly in life- is the type of guy with an avoidant attachment style. The quickest way to make avoidants drop their partners, of course, is by using contempt.

#3. The Life of David Gale

This isn't a relationship -yet- but it's clear there's something between the two already.

> Gale: (…) It was Berlin
> Constance: Ooh great. Oh, that's great, great. (…) Great. You are so weak.
> Gale: You're not my wife Constance. Thank God!

Contempt is her sneering at him, looking away, and repeating “great” in a mocking fashion.
She makes him feel unworthy and “inferior”, and ends with a criticism as icing on the cake (you are so weak).
Gale’s is a typical defensive reaction with aggression.

#4. Nonverbal Expressions of Contempt

Somehow Rihanna often uses nonverbals or contempt (or at least people love highlighting them):

And:

How to Fix Your Partner’s Contempt

If contempt is the opposite of respect, this means that women who have contempt for their men don’t have respect them.

So the key to fix contempt is to gain foundational respect from your partner.

Contempt stems from powerlessness and ineffectiveness as a man.

The Power Moves is fully dedicated to becoming the type of man who never have to even think about contempt.

For a quick heads up, focus on:

- Personal power & positive dominance
- Masculinity
- Leadership, including win-win leadership

Or for the quickest solution, go through Power University.

How to Fix Your Contempt in Relationships

Sometimes contempt is a sign that we don’t appreciate our partner anymore. If that’s the case, you should wonder if the relationship still makes sense.
At the very least though, you should try your best to rekindle the positive feelings before giving up.

In some other cases, contempt might not necessarily mean we think our partner is pathetic but it’s a general -and toxic way- people communicate with.

In either case, you are always well served by eliminating contempt from your communication repertoire.
Below are some practical steps to work both on your relationship and on your communication skills.

1. Understanding Our Darker Sides

Some personalities tend to use contempt more than others.

Here are personalities who, in my experience, are more likely to resort to contempt:

- People with a sarcastic wit (example from SATC)
- Passive aggressive people (example from Knocked Up)
- People whom we often refer to as “mean”
- Haughty people (example of haughty contempt in the picture and in the video)

It takes courage to look at ourselves when we behave as any of the above, but that’s the first step to curing ourselves.

2. Replace Contempt With Direct Communication

Contempt is indirect criticism.

Express your criticism openly instead. Anything is better than contempt.
But since we're here, learn to express your anger with the complaint format (I feel + state the fact + what your partner can do to help you).

3. Change Your Feelings

If contempt is a sign you're growing to dislike your partner you need to change that ASAP to save your relationship.

You could consider therapy, but the basics are simple: rid yourself of negative feelings and start liking your partner again.

Here are a few ways:

3.1 Look for positives

The biggest secret of a happy life is focusing on the positives.

Contempt grows its ugly roots in an environment where we see our partners in a constantly negative light. But it's rarely the case that our partner is as negative as we sometimes imagine.

Focusing on the positives will not only make your life better overall, but it will also help eliminate contempt and make your relationship better.

3.2 Revisit your past

Gottman says that talking about happy events of the past can help couples reconnect.

Think together of the best moment you've had. How you met, your first dates, your honeymoon.

4. A culture of appreciation

As you revisit your past and focus on the positives, build a culture that constantly celebrates the beauty of your relationship.

Evening rituals, sitting down for lunch, weekend getaways, date nights, etc.
Celebrate your partnership and contempt will have no space in a content relationship.

Summary

Contempt in relationships is the biggest predictor of breakups.
And it makes for miserable relationships -and miserable people-.

Sometimes contempt is a sign that we don't appreciate our partner anymore. Some other times it's bad communication habits that we picked up.

In either case, you and your relationship will gain by removing contempt.
This article shows you how.

Bullet Summary

- Stop trying to change the outside world: the shift you need to be happy and peaceful is within you
- We mostly think negatively: meditate and learn to let negative thoughts go without affecting you
- Pain is OK. Don't fight it or you "bottle it up". Feel the pain and slowly let it go

Full Summary

About The Author:
Michael Singer is a spiritual teacher who has spent years with yoga and meditation.

Find Your Inner Voice

Our mind never stops humming in the background.
It's always churning out thoughts and interpreting what it receives from our senses.

The very first step towards enlightenment is being able to listen to that background voice, which The Untethered Soul calls the "Inner Voice".
The Inner Voice is our self.

Our inner voice influences our emotions, and our emotions in turn influence how we perceive ourselves. How we perceive ourselves is the personal self.

For example, if we often feel jealous -the self-level-, then we will think of ourselves as jealous persons -this is the personal self, how we perceive ourselves-.
But that's a mistake.

The Inner Voice Is NOT You

This is the key concept of "The Untethered Soul".

What you think and feel is not the real you.
Feelings and thoughts do not define you. Your inner voice is not you.

This is also a crucial lesson from Eckard Tolle, another famous spiritual teacher and author of "The Power of Now".

Getting in Touch With Your True Self

The only way to go past your inner voice is to meditate for 15 minutes minimum.

After a while, you will notice that your background Inner Voice has disappeared.
And that's when you can get in touch with your true self.

Shield Out Negative: Flow & Pain Resistance

Michael Singer talks about the negative events in our lives, and how to prevent them from leaving a long-lasting impact.

And here is an example for you:

Imagine you're driving and see your ex with someone else. You'll keep driving, but the thoughts of your ex will depress you for days to come.
That happens at the Inner Voice level, and it keeps pestering us for a long time because we keep holding and blocking the inner voice thoughts within us.
The author instead recommends you "lean away" from the negative, painful thoughts. Look at them. But don't dwell on them and they will not take over you.
Meditation will help you achieve the power to pull that off.

Examples of Blocking VS Letting Go

Examples of blocking are:

- God I'm so weak, I gotta get over her
- I need a new and better girlfriend to show her
- I want revenge on her

Michael Singer says we should learn instead to let the thoughts of the Inner Voice go by. Negative thoughts will come anyway, but you let them go instead of holding them.

Examples of letting go:

- It will be painful, but I won't resist and I'll get over it
- That image will run through my head for a few days and that's OK.
- It's just another event of my life, it shall pass

For more on letting go and traumas, also read:

- Letting Go
- The Body Keeps The Score

Don’t Attach Feelings to Thoughts

Most of the thoughts in our minds are not true.

They are random, or heavily skewed towards negativity. When we fully entertain them, think about them, and attach feelings to them, that’s when they become real.
And that’s when they poison our lives.

Learning to let negative thoughts roam without entertaining them and without attaching feelings to them is liberating.

Let Fear Flow

The Untethered Soul explains how for evolutionary reasons we give more weight and importance to negative information.

But fear is just another thought of our Inner Voice. It’s not you. It’s not even part of you.
And the same as jealousy, instead of bottling it up, ruminating over it, and letting it consume you, you can accept it and let it go.

Death Makes Life Meaningful

Michael Singer explains how reflecting on death can help us make our lives more meaningful.
Also, read leveraging death for a better life.

Real-Life Applications

Meditate
Meditation is not woo-woo stuff, it has real, proven benefits.

Letting go of the pain
This is something that has always been hard for me. I want to win, and I hate losing.
I’m very happy to be getting better at moving past pain now and it’s a life changer.

CONS

Disorganized
If you've been reading my summaries a bit you know that I like a tightly organized book. I don't think The Untethered Soul was well-structured.

Longish
It felt like a bit of lengthy, verbose prose at times. I think The Untethered Soul could have been briefer and built around the 2-3 key deep nuggets of wisdom it presents and how to reach that state.

Much hope, little how to
I found The Untethered Soul could have gone a bit deeper into how to reach the enlightened stage the author talks about.
"Let go of fear" is not as helpful as saying "it took me X years to reach this level of awareness, and every day I've done X, Y, Z".

There is Power In Pain
Sometimes you need to accept a painful memory and find a way through it. But other times there is power in wallowing in pain.
Pain and failures can be cathartic moments of growth and you don't necessarily need to overcome them.

Anger is what allowed me to grow and build the life the way I wanted it. I talk about it here:

PROS

Potentially life-changing wisdom
The Untethered Soul popularizes some key concepts of meditation and spiritual awakening, and that's a good thing.

Useful, practical knowledge
Albeit reaching the level of awareness and control it takes to let go of things is not easy, I believe it's a key, central skill of an empowered (and happy) life.
And while not easy, it's certainly within reach for all of us.

Review

The Untethered Soul is about the ultimate control: mind control.

It reminded me a bit of Eleven Rings, where Phil also talks about his meditation practice of letting thoughts come and go. He says after a while, you will realize those thoughts have less power over you.
Definitely, a book to read and cherish.

Relationship Destroyer #3: Meanness

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It's understandable to be angry.

And some people, when angry, revert to this conditioning: hurting the person is making them angry as much as possible.

However, when we are mean in an effort to hurt our partner, we are actively tearing our relationship apart.

Meanness can sometimes be all that it's needed to destroy a relationship.
And even if we move on and heal, meanness will leave a scar.

From now on, you can bet, he'll always wonder if she has ever been honest with him

What Is Meanness in Relationships

In the previous two installments of Relationship destroyers, we dealt with:

- Criticism
- Contempt

Both criticism and contempt are part of Gottman's research.

Meanness is something that I personally added myself, from my own experience and observations.
Meanness goes beyond criticism and contempt and is common enough that it deserves its own category.

Meanness -or cruelty- is anything a party says to cause the most possible harm to their partner.

It attacks the most closely held values and undermines people at an identity level. Either the personal level ("you") or at the relationship level ("we").
Cruelty is the opposite of loving and caring.

What Cruelty Does

Cruelty is often a point of no return.

It might be the ending salvo of the relationship.
Or it might leave an indelible emotional mark that prevents the return to a normal, healthy relationship.

Cruelty shows a previously unknown, ugly side of our partner.
And the question emerges: can we really trust our partner when they're willing to go this far?
And the answer will always linger in our heads:

> Maybe not.

Sure, they were angry, but we expect better from a life partner.
And can we still like them after what we've experienced?

The second main problem of cruelty is that it often references something real.
And if our partner really thinks so lowly of us, why the hell are they with us? That's the kind of question that destroys the emotional connection of a relationship.

Examples of Meanness

Here are some examples of retorts that qualify as overly mean:

> Her: And you know what I did? I went to my ex and sucked his big cock while playing "our" songs.

Whether or not that was true, he will not be able to get that out of his mind. And with just one sentence, you destroyed your relationship.

> Him: Stop acting like you're an artist, you have no talent whatsoever. And that's why you resent me and my business success.

Now she will never again be able to share her work with him and believe that he is honest in his praises.

> Her: And you're such a limp dick. I faked all my orgasms and I can't wait to find a real man!

Tries to attack his manhood. And these often work. Even men who don't take it personally will think of you like someone who is untrustworthy when things get tough because all you care about is "winning" the battle.

> Him: I didn't want to introduce you to my friends because I was embarrassed. You eat like a pig, snore and have more body hair than I do… You're not a real woman, you're a butch!

Same as above, tries to attack her at her identity level (femininity).

> Him/Her: I regret that I did it with you (/that we ever got together).

You will notice that a lot of these hurt at a closely held identity level. Masculinity, femininity, what we stand for, or erases history as a “we”.

Cruelty in Relationships Examples

1# La La Land

Here is a great example of how one single instance of cruelty can mark the point of no return:

> Sebastian: Maybe you liked me more when I was a failure because it made you feel better about yourself.

Meanness delivered calmly is worst than a heated screaming exchange.
It means you’re saying it rationally and really believe it.

Sebastian from the scene above is not only saying that she is a failure. He says she is a failure with a terrible character who can’t manage to be happy for her partner.

Since a healthy relationship is about mutual support and being happy for our partners, this type of cruelty spells the end of a (healthy) relationship.

2 Forgetting Sarah Marshall

This scene starts off already very badly. As we’ve previously seen it’s a perfect example of contempt -and some criticism to boot-.

https://youtu.be/RvNuTuiKyIo?t=59s

It moves into cruelty when she says:

> Sarah: And that does not make you a citizen of the world. It makes you full of shit.
> (…)
> Sarah: I hate your music
> Russel: Yeah, well, I fucked the housekeeper the other day.

Criticizing his ideology is mean because, contrary to typical criticism (“you’re so full of shit”), she tries to undermine all that he stands for. And she’s going out of her way to hurt him emotionally.
After her second attempt at meanness Russel finally adds his own, which puts the final nail in their relationship coffin.

Could you see this relationship going back to a loving and mutually supporting one after that exchange?
Or breaking up and staying good friends?
Exactly, that’s the magic of meanness.

Fixing Meanness

Meanness can become a mainstay of the relationship when:

1. Deeply disliking our partner
2. Response to meanness (the case of Russel above)
3. Anger management issue.

If it's #1 and #2 you should ask yourself if it makes sense to stay in the relationship. If you still find a reason to stay, then it's time to revamp everything and possibly consider therapy.

If it's #3 then you have to take responsibility for your personal change.
I had a girlfriend with a trend of burning bridges with family members out of anger fits when she would sink into meanness.

The quickest fix is counting to 10 before speaking or leaving the room when you feel you're reaching the boiling point.
Long-term anger management therapy, meditation, and working on communication skills will also help.

I remember an ex-girlfriend of mine who was once about to blow up. But instead of blowing up, she simply left the room and went into another room to sit by herself.
My respect for her grew tenfold after that.

Summary

There are situations in a relationship when one party will say anything to hurt the other.
These moments can break a relationship in one go, or make a damage for years to come in mere seconds.

Watch out then if you have a tendency of exaggerating when you're angry. If that's the case, it's best to walk away and take a pause.

How to End Defensiveness in Relationships: Examples & Fixes (W/ Videos)

Lucio Buffalmano · 8 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Defensiveness is a relationship pattern that focuse on rejecting blame, rather than tackling problems.

It's of one of John Gottman's Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, and an indicator of breakup risk.

In this article you will learn what defensiveness is, you will see defensiveness examples, and non-defensive communication examples, and finally, you will learn to move past defensiveness in relationships.

What's Defensiveness

Defensiveness is a form of self-protection that many people naturally resort to when faced with feedback, criticism, and complaints.

Defensiveness is one of the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse.

As per John Gottman's research, when the four horsemen of the apocalypse engulf a relationship, divorce ensues more than 90% of the time.

The other three horsemen are: criticism, contempt, and stonewalling.

There are three types of defensiveness:

#1. Righteous indignation

Righteous indignation is pushback with an "how dare you" message.
An example of righteous indignation:

> Her: You work so hard every day that you forget when it's time to eat together

> Him: You mean I work so hard to put our food on the table?

The other type of defensiveness in relationships adds a counterattack:

#2. Defensive aggressive

The most common type of defensiveness in relationships does not simply defend but includes a counter-attack.

When we say "it's not my fault" the effect is that of communicating that "it's not my fault because it's your fault".

> Her: You work so hard every day that you forget when it's time to eat together
> Him: It's not my fault if I'm the only breadwinner here <- it's your fault I have to work this long

And then we have the:

#3. Innocent victim

This technique works like this:

The defensive individual seemingly accepts the feedback and goes one step further.
If the feedback says the dinner is not well-cooked, the recipient cries and blames himself for being a terrible cook and for falling short of expectations.

What's the game here?

With tears and self-shaming, the defensive individual feels like he can prevent any further attack and win our partner's sympathy.
This is most common for women.

Why We Get Defensive

For 99% of us, defensiveness is a natural response to criticism, complaints, and negative feedback.

Of course, different people have different thresholds for defensiveness.

For example, people with a fixed mindset are more likely to answer defensively because they always take criticism personally.
A high tendency towards defensiveness is a major issue when touchy partners get defensive even with well-communicated complaints.

Consequences of Defensiveness

Defensiveness does three bad things:

1. Tells our partner we don't care about their feelings
2. Escalates the argument into a fight
3. Destroy any chance of solving the issue as a team

"I Don't Care About You" Message

Defensiveness in relationships gives our partner the feeling we are not taking their complaints and their feelings seriously.

Imagine this scenario:

> Her: Oh God you're back, why so late! Everyone's already there, my parents will be so disappointed
> Him: Oh come on, who cares, it's just one hour, I had to work hard today

His defensiveness here makes her feel he couldn't care less about her feelings.

Arguments' Escalation

Defensiveness escalates fights when we hit back

> Her: Did you bring the lemons I asked you do this morning?
> Him: No, you know how busy I am, stop asking me sh*t, buy your own grocery, do something!

This is a typical defensive attack. Instead of admitting fault and mistake, he tries to clear himself by counter-blaming.

Relationship Consequences of Defensiveness

The result of defensiveness is:

1. Continuous fighting
2. A sense we're not being heard, understood, and cared for
3. Drying up of good feelings for each other

Not the kind of relationship you want.

Examples of Relationship Defensiveness

Here are a few defensiveness examples:

#1 – Blue Valentine

This is a great example of defensiveness stemming from a hidden contemptuous and judgmental attitude.

Her passive-aggressive approach is a very damaging way of voicing opinions and concerns.

Let's watch:

Albeit her way of communicating is very poor, his defensiveness adds to the problem

> Her: It doesn't ever disappoint you? <- doesn't make her point clear, it might be a critique?
> Him: (starts to get irritated) Why? Why would it disappoint me? <- defensive right away
> Her: Because you have all this potential <- still unclear, is she unhappy with her husband career?
> Him: So what? Why do you have to f*cking make money off your potential? <- defensive counterattack

His whole reaction is pure defensiveness. He probably feels judged and feels he needs to defend his lack of ambition.
But he will never know for sure if his life is unhappy because he escalates with defensiveness.
This conversation could have been a chance to understand each other and connect more deeply, but he will never know.

#2. SATC: Carrie and Aleksandr

This is an example of defensiveness following an attack with emotional out-pour:

> Carrie: How could you abandon me like that when I gave up my party for you
> Alex: I didn't abandon you<- defensiveness stripped to the bones :)
> Carrie: I sat on a bench, alone, in a museum
> Alex: Let's not do this now. I'm tired. I had a stressful day<- makes her feel uncared for

Leaving the room, in the end, is an example of refusing to engage, or stonewalling.

#3. The Break Up

The last one is super interesting as it's both very sneaky and very common.
Men do this most often and that's how many fights end up looking like he is calm and she overreacts.

Let's watch:

> Her: Oh come on, really? (…) I wanted 12. Baby wanted 12.
> Him: Why would you want 12 lemons? <- sneaky defensiveness: pretends he forgot
> Her: Because I'm making a 12-lemon centerpiece.
> Him: So, no one's even eating them? They're just show lemons? <- defends by framing her will as ludicrous
> Her: (..) I'm glad you find that amusing, but I cannot fill a vase with only three lemons <- she does great in staying calm
> (…)
> Him: Let's scratch the centerpiece, because the chicken could use a little lemon. Guess what? We make a better meal versus something visually nice to look at <- defends by disrespecting her idea, a power move

He frames her request as making no sense. That way, he makes her look as if she's overreacting for nothing. This is a type of behavior that drives many women in relationships crazy.
When he says "better meal versus something visually nice" he implies her idea was silly and that her cooking needs improvement.

That fight was 90% of his making and all because he used defensiveness when he should have owned up to his mistake.

Fixing Defensiveness

For all the harm that defensiveness causes, don't worry: there are many ways of extirpating it:

1. Avoid using criticism

A lot of defensiveness happens as a result of criticism and aggressive communication.
Avoid criticism and contempt and you'll avoid most of the defensiveness as well.

2. Teach your partner about defensiveness

If you're the one reading these articles and your partner doesn't, you must take it upon yourself to teach your partner how to communicate properly.

3. Accept differences

Gender differences are overplayed by books such as Men Are From Mars, but there's no denying they exist.

He doesn't care about a centerpiece of lemons. She should be more careful in reminding him how important it is for her or it's likely he'll forget.

Sometimes, you might also consider simply picking your battles and letting something else slip.

4. Soothe yourself

Being criticized is an emotional moment for many of us and that's when defensiveness becomes our natural response.

In Why Marriages Succeed or Fail Gottman says that calming yourself is the very first step to avoid getting defensive.

5. Take responsibility

Sneaky, low-value people refuse responsibility. And that's where most of the defensiveness stems from. Be a real (wo)man and stand behind your f*ck ups.
Developing a growth mindset will help you tremendously in acquiring an "extreme ownership" mindset and avoiding defensiveness.

6. Look at underlying concerns

Many fights start because our partner cannot muster the vulnerability to go to the crux of the problem. And they attack a sign instead of expressing a need.

Instead of addressing the superficial attack, you might want to address the underlying cause right away. Emotional intelligence is what will help you here.

Example:

> Her: you always work so late, I'm tired of it <- the real complaint is that she wants more time with him
> Him: that's true I've been working a lot recently. Do you feel like I'm neglecting you?

And here's a great video example from Ashton Kutcher.

Non-Defensive Communication Examples

Defensive	Non-Defensive

Her: It doesn't ever disappoint you? Him: (starts to get irritated) Why? Why would it disappoint me? (escalation)	Her: It doesn't ever disappoint you? Him: Hmmm what do you mean exactly… Her: Because you have all this potential. Him: Thanks! What do you mean by potential and what do you think I should do with it Her: bla bla bla Him: I see, you have some good points. And tell me, does it disappoint you that in your opinion I'm not using my potential?
Carrie: How could you abandon me like that Alex: I didn't abandon you Carrie: I sat on a bench, alone, in a museum Alex: Let's not do this now. I'm tired. I had a stressful day	Carrie: How could you abandon me like (pause) Alex: I'm sorry. (pause) I'm so overburdened and I can see how that must have been painful for you. Come sit here. Tell me about it.
Her: Oh come on, really? (…) I wanted 12. Baby wanted 12. Him: Why would you want 12 lemons? Her: Because I'm making a 12-lemon centerpiece. Him: So, no one's actually even eating them? They're just show lemons? Her: (..) I'm glad you find that amusing, but I cannot fill a vase with only three lemons.	Her: Oh come on, really? (…) I wanted 12. Baby wanted 12. Him: Damn, I forgot! I'm so sorry. Her: How can I do a centerpiece now Him: Well, you can't I suppose, it was so stressful that it just slipped my mind. I'm sorry. Was it important for you? Her: You bet it was!! Bla bla bla… Him: I understand, now I see your point. Sorry. What can we do now

Defensiveness in relationships prevents us from listening and connecting with our partners.

It escalates fights that often would not even need to become fights at all and it prevents us from solving the problems.

To fix defensiveness, work both on how your partner communicates and how you react to it.

Attached Review: Foundations of Attachment

Lucio Buffalmano · 9 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Attached (2010) introduces attachment style theory and suggests that partner attachment is a basic human need that entails a risk for being dependent on someone, but that adds many health and life benefits, making us stronger and more secure.

Overview

- Attachment quality improves happiness and well-being
- Attachment style predicts relationship patterns
- Good intimate attachment provides a safety foundation that increases confidence and life effectiveness

Notes

About the Author:
Amir Levine, MD, is a psychiatrist and neuroscientist researcher at Columbia University.
He is the author of "Attached", a popular book based on attachment theory.

#1. We're Wired to Be Dependent

You know the dating mantra, don't you?

Make him chase, let her come to you, pretend you don't need him/her, and keep yourself busy so you don't grow dependent.

That's a wrong assumption, though.

Many dating advice books are based on the wrong presupposition that we can function equally well on our own.

But that's, well, wrong.

Amir Levine cites John Bowlby's work and says we have a genetically programmed need to be with someone. And that has nothing to do with how much we love ourselves or how fulfilled we are.

Once we get attached codependency kicks in automatically.
However, that doesn't mean we become dependent and weaker. Quite the opposite. With attachment, we grow stronger.

#2. Attachment System Keeps Us Wired Together

The attachment systems are a pattern of emotions and behavior that brings us close to our loved ones.

The attachment systems activate in children when their mother goes away and it stays active through crying and sobbing until she re-establishes contact.
The same happens with adults and their romantic partners.

Protest Behavior Pushes Us Back Together

All our patterns of emotions and behavior we utilize to get in touch again with our mother as children or our partners are adults are called "protest behavior".

The author says evolution shaped our attachment system and protest behavior because staying closer to our loved ones helps us -and our children- to stay alive.

#3. The Paradox: Dependency Makes Us Stronger

When we have a solid attachment with our romantic partner and we know they are there to support us and care for us, we become stronger.

Imagine this simple analogy:

> A solid relationship for humans is like solid foundations for a house

We can reach out to the stars and go out in the world with more confidence.
We feel more secure in taking risks and being more vulnerable.

And the opposite is true: if we are insecure about our partner, our relationship gobbles all our energies and fills us with worries.

When we feel secure in our relationships, we feel more confident in ourselves. A solid relationship allows us to take more risks

> To be independent, find the right person to be dependent to

#4. The 4 Types of Attachment Styles

In brief:

50% are secure, 25% avoidant, 20% anxious, and the rest falls into a "disorganized" category (with unhealthy traits from both).

- Read the overview of attachment styles with examples

Anxious

- Want and can be very close
- Fear partner doesn't want the same
- Ge attached very (too) quickly

- Relationships take lots of your energies
- Very sensitive to partner's moods
- Spot moods early but are often wrong (but if they avoid overreacting they're also more accurate)
- Experience many negative emotions
- Misbehave, say things you regret
- Feel there's something wrong with them

It's important to notice though that if your partner provides all the security and reassurance, anxious individuals will drop most of their insecurities.
That's why anxious individuals are best with Secure.

- Anxious attachment style with examples

Secure

- Naturally warm and loving
- Enjoy intimacy
- Not too worried about relationship up and downs
- Effectively communicate needs
- Good at supporting the partner
- Have a realistic view of the blame

Read examples of secure attachments here:

- Secure attachment style with examples

Avoidant

- Puts independence and autonomy above all
- Want to be close but feels uncomfortable with too much intimacy
- Not worried about relationship up and downs
- Doesn't open up
- Worried the relationship is "becoming a cage"
- Has an "ideal true love" they never meet
- Feel there's something wrong with the partners they're with
- Tend to be less happy and satisfied in a relationship

Here are examples of avoidant:

- Avoidant attachment style with examples

Now the question becomes: how does one become one or the other?

#5. How Attachment Styles Develop

It's a mix of all influences.

Genes, life experiences, and how our parents raised us all contribute to determining our attachment style.

There is a certain "stickiness" for attachment styles in adults: around 70-75% of adults remain the same attachment style during their life.
And yet, life and romantic experiences can change that even in adulthood.

#6. Avoidant Deactivating Strategies

Let's focus now on one of the potentially most harmful attachments.

Studies suggest that it's not true that avoidants don't feel emotions. Their attachment reactions still work under the hood, but they just are "better" at repressing them.

Indeed, more studies reveal that when avoidants go through highly stressful events their defenses break and they seem to behave as anxious people behave.
These are the techniques avoidants use to avoid fully entertaining their feelings:

- Professing not being ready to commit, but staying anyway
- Focusing on their partner's imperfections
- Reminiscing about an ideal ex
- Flirting with others
- Moving away when things are going great
- Going into impossible relationships (long distance, married partners, etc.)
- Keeping secrets
- Avoiding physical closeness

Once avoidants break up, they can sometimes see the truth and how good their relationship really was.

#7. Attachment Styles in Intimate Relationships

Here is some good news>

Secure individuals can date with both avoidance and anxiety, and this helps them overcome their limitations -as long as they stay secure-. Anxious become less anxious with secure partners indeed.

Anxious with avoidants is one of the worst and it's very common.
While there are fewer avoidants than secure, they are more often on the market because they have fewer long-lasting relationships. And they bounce back sooner, so they go back to the dating pool much quicker.

- Examples of anxious-avoidant relationships

Avoidants don't usually date each other. They lack the emotional pull to stay together (and, I might add: they don't get the ego kick of being in control of their relationship).

#8. How Different Styles Deal With Conflict

Only secure people approach conflict openly.

Anxious are wary of their partners' response and can get scared about the whole relationship trajectory. When they engage in conflict, they exaggerate with strong accusations, cry, or use an angry style of silent treatment.

Avoidants also fear their partner won't be there when they need them. But to deal with these thoughts they distance themselves and find fault with their partners.

Real-Life Applications

Notice your partner's attachment
Notice what type of attachment your partner has. Unless you're both secure it will make you understand where most of your conflict stems from.

Date with attachment in mind
If you're single, look for a partner with a complementary attachment style.

Change yourself
Understand your limitations and move towards a secure style as much as you can

Ask your partner to change
Explain to your partner attachment styles and what it means for your relationship

Look for a great relationship
Don't be ashamed to "need" a great relationship. That's what human biology is all about. Worry instead about how to find a great boyfriend or girlfriend.

CONS

No Gender Data
The author says the stereotype of women being most anxious and men mostly avoidant is a stereotype. But it fails to provide numbers and that was a big question mark for me.
I researched it and numbers seem to say there are more avoidant men and more anxious women (read a study of middle school students here and an overview of studies here).
I wonder if the author missed it in access to political correctness. I do not know that…

PROS

Insightful
It took me a while to finish it because I wanted to make sure I was absorbing everything out of it

Well Researched
With lots of studies and authors mentioned, the Attached gives me the impression of a book I can trust

Great Examples
Many good examples and great charts.

Review

Amir Levine's "Attached" is a fantastic book on attachment styles and an incredibly helpful resource to better undersrtand people, relationships, and oneself.

It served as my foundational introduction to attachment theory, fundamentally reshaping my comprehension of interpersonal relationships.

In hindsight and after having learned more, I believe that what's missing to contextualize attachments is an evolutionary lens. That evolutionary lens would explain why certain attachment styles may be adaptive for certain environments and people, even if they're not 'secure'.

What's Stonewalling

IIn Why Marriages Succeed or Fail, John Gottman defines Stonewalling as:

> One partner withdrawing from the conversation and stopping to engage.

Stonewalling is expressed in a variety of different ways:

- Turning around and looking away
- Silent treatment
- Physically leaving the room
- Refusing to answer or talk about the issue at hand
- Yelling to stop the conversation

Stonewalling is the fourth and last Horseman of the Apocalypse, a nickname John Gottman uses for Criticism, Contempt, and Defensiveness.

The Four Horsemen of The Apocalypse often go together and predict divorce in more than 90% of the cases. That's why it's crucial you fix them.

Stonewalling often happens often as a consequence of flooding, such as feeling so overwhelmed that we can't focus. But instead of exploding, the stonewaller implodes.

Men Are Usually Stonewallers

While criticism, contempt, and defensiveness are gender-neutral, stonewalling is mostly a male phenomenon. Indeed, men account for 85% of stonewalling cases.

Why is it more men?

Stonewalling Explained Through Evolution

The reason why men are kings of stonewalling arches back to evolution, explains John Gottman in one of his best books.

Women produce more milk when they're relaxed and oxytocin flows in the brains. So self-soothing during tense situations was advantageous for women.

Men instead survived more frequently in the wild when they quickly accessed their fight or flight response -a great state to survive but a terrible one to talk things out-.
Still to this day that holds true: men get flooded more quickly and it takes them longer to soothe and relax.

When Stonewalling Spells Relationship Doom

Shirley Glass, author of Not Just Friends, says that when wives complain about a lack of emotional intimacy they are still committed to the relationship.
But when they start withdrawing and stonewalling, it's a sign that they have become discouraged and are giving up.

Funny enough, men are happy about female stonewalling in the beginning because they believe the nagging has stopped and they have finally won some respite.
But it's a false sense of security: female stonewalling is often the sign the relationship is about to end.

Why Partners Stonewall

There can be different reasons why a partner stonewalls, including:

- He can't take it anymore (honest flooding)

- To willingly hurt or win an argument (a power move)
- Fear or unwillingness to vulnerably engage (avoidant strategy)
- Feeling of complete powerlessness
- To avoid further escalation

The last one is particularly interesting. Many stonewallers indeed erroneously believe that by withdrawing they are doing their part to make things better.
But they couldn't be farther from the truth.

Stonewalling Power Dynamics

Keep this in mind:

Stonewalling communicates powerlessness.

It's men who have given up arguing, negotiating -and winning- that retreat into a silent world.
As psychologist Shawn Smith explains, it's men who have given up on their marriage and who are about to lose their relationship who are also most likely to stonewall and avoid arguments (Smith, 2014).

Men who are in control of their relationships don't retreat like babies into a silent cave.
They confront the issues and take action.

They are good at controlling frames and enforcing boundaries. If she was wrong, they tell them as such.
If she was right, they are not afraid of admitting it and making good on their words.

The good thing is that many conflicts will disappear once men start taking action because their wives' respect for them will increase.
It's a positive circle: the less he stonewalls, the fewer reasons for stonewalling he will have.

What Stonewalling Does to Relationships

When women stonewall, it frustrates men.

But when men stonewall, it can truly hurt women.
Laboratory studies show that when men stonewall women's heart rate jumps (Levenson & Gottman, 1985).
Unbeknownst to most men, stonewalling is emotionally painful for women and damages relationships in the following ways:

1. It Escalates Arguments

A partner who refuses to answer can lead the other partner to see their engagement with more and more vehemence. The result is an escalation of the conflict.
And bitter feelings for both: the wife aggresses to reconnect, and he is more and more indignant by her reaction.

2. It Leaves Problems Unsolved

Checking out prevents any possible solution to problems and, if anything, it precipitates them and snowballs problems.

3. It Leads to Emotional Disconnection

With one partner fails to fully engage there can be no emotional connection. And emotional connections are the bedrock of good relationships.

4. It Triggers Sense of Hopelessness In her

When stonewalling becomes the norm, the couple loses the ability to talk and solve problems.
A sense of hopelessness about the relationship sets in, and that's the death of the relationship.

Stonewalling Examples In Relationships

And here are a few examples of stonewalling in relationships:

#1. Spread: The Avoidant Stonewalling

Kutcher has a typical avoidant attachment style in the movie Spread. And like many avoidants, he distances himself from relationships when they start getting too serious.

Stonewalling is one of their ways to keep emotional distance:

He stonewalls when he leaves.
But notice how by avoiding defensiveness when he's under attack he manages to stop the escalation.

#2. Spread: Defensive Stonewalling

This is an example of stonewalling with a mix of defensiveness and emotional overload.
Both the critique and the emotional intensity of "I love you" were too much for him to handle.

Let's watch:

Stonewalling after someone opens up their heart is, needless to say, one of the worst moments to leave.

#3. SATC: Emotional Overload

This is a more hidden, under-the-radar example of stonewalling in a relationship. But at the core, he couldn't handle her emotions.

Let's see:

If anything, this is a sneakier form of stonewalling in relationships.
By giving an appearance of caring in the beginning, he makes it seem as if she is overreacting (which she probably is, BTW :).

#4. The Godfather: Aggressive Stonewalling

Stonewalling isn't always necessarily peaceful and quiet.
Trying to forcefully stop the conversation is also a form of stonewalling, as exemplified here:

> Godfather: "I don't wanna hear about it. OVER!"

Maybe not an accident that her first comment after his aggressive stonewalling is "I feel no love for you anymore".

#5. Crazy Stupid Love: Powerless Stonewalling

In this example, he feels so powerless to listen and engage that he goes out of his way to end the interaction (another pun, sorry :).

Now that's some high commitment to stonewalling :).

I don't want to overload this post with too many examples, but if you're interested check out again Cal Weaver, later in that same movie he uses another stonewalling technique: pretending not to hear and talking about something else.

How to Get Through A Stonewaller

Let me give you the bad news first:

The best way to deal with a stonewaller is to make the stonewaller want to fix stonewalling.

But I know that's not always possible or easy.

So here are some quick tips for you:

- Start softly

Most men stonewall because they feel they are being overpowered by a barrage of highly-emotional complaints. Men take longer to warm up and prep up.

The solution? bite the bullet and go slower.
Talking always beats yelling and the one who goes slow and steady wins the race.

- Repair and de-escalate

When you see your partner begins to tense up or when he starts getting defensive, it's not the time to double down as most people do. It's time to repair and take a step back.

Remember: one step back, two forward.

- Remember his ego: paraphrase

Yes, many men (and women) have a fragile ego. Remember that and try to use

If their breath stinks, don't use the word "stink", but turn it into a positive. Say that you love to kiss their mouth when it's fresh right after the toothbrush.

- Accept influence

Remember that influencing is a two-way street. If you accept their needs and wants, they are more likely to accept yours.

As much as you can, make it a communal problem-solving.

- Let him read this guide

As I mentioned before, most men are clueless about stonewalling. They have no idea how painful it is for women and how deeply it can damage relationships.

If he is open-minded, mature, and strong enough to accept and incorporate feedback for improvement -and if you, the man, are reading this, you should be-, chances are he will be willing to help.

How to Stop Stonewalling

Once you understand that stonewalling damages your relationship, here's what you can do to combat it:

1. Stop arguing

If you notice your partner stonewalls, stop arguing because it will only get worse. Tell him you both need a break instead.

2. Call a break if you stonewall

If it's you who stonewalls, heed the signs. Such as, when you feel your heart rate increasing, diminishing focus, and defensiveness kicking in, that's the moment to call a break.

Here are a few things you can say:

- I want to listen to you but this is getting too intense for me. Let's take a break and resume in 20 minutes
- I feel like I'm about to blow up and I don't wanna blow up to you. Give me please a few minutes to recollect
- I can't handle this anymore, please help me soothe and then we'll continue

3. Practice self-soothing

Watch during the break:

Gottman says men are more likely to think negatively about their partner during the break. Those breaks only make matters worse if you allow negative feelings to fester.
Instead, it's paramount you don't ruminate and truly take your mind to a neutral state instead.

Some good activities during the break include:

- Working
- Reading a magazine or book
- Take a walk around
- Listen to music

It's important that you only go back once you are fully calm, and it usually takes more than we think. Stay 5 minutes longer in the break after you already feel fully calm.

4. Trust yourself and engage

Finally, trust yourself that you can handle emotional arguments. And the more you do it, the better you become. And remind yourself that engaging is good for everyone: for you, for your partner, and for your relationship.

Summary

Stonewalling is a refusal to engage with our partner.

It leaves our partner feeling ignored in the best case, and it actively hurts our partner and escalates the fight in the worst cases.
And of course, it prevents us from actually solving the issue.

In the long run, it leads to emotional death and hopelessness.
In this article, you have learned what's stonewalling and what you can do to deal with stonewalling in your relationship.

What Happened: Clinton Doesn't Take Ownership (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

"What Happened" (2017) is Hillary Clinton's memoir on the 2016 campaign elections.
She details the unfolding of the events that led to her stunning loss to conservative candidate Donald Trump, together with all the political manipulation, and the various culprits for the results.

Key Takeaways

Clinton says:

- Russian meddling was a huge factor in the election
- James Comey was the man who influenced the elections the most and gave the presidency to Trump
- Clinton should have campaigned less on policy and realism and more on "populism" like her opponent did

Notes

About the Author:
Hillary Clinton is a politician, Bill Clinton's wife, and a two-time presidential runner-up.

Coping With Grief

What Happened has some good points on how to cope with a scorching defeat. Here are some key points from What Happened by Hillary Clinton:

- Stay in touch with a support network of friends and family

It also helped her to hear how motivated people were to get into action.

- Don't allow rage to take over

Hillary did fume, but she made sure to use her anger and not let it take over (also read: how to use anger).

- Talk it over

She talked a lot to her husband Bill during long walks. They also spoke about the campaign to figure out what happened

- Irish wake

Another great way to combat cynicism is an Irish wake, such as celebrating right after a saddening event. The Irish wake version of Hillary Clinton was hosting a post-election staff party.

- Take a day off

Clinton took a day to "lay low" and regroup. I believe taking some time to grieve is indeed a great medicine.

- Back to work

She also soon started taking action again. She says her first task was a thank you letter to the campaign staff and making sure they were getting salary and health insurance coverage until the end of the year.

Why She Wanted The Presidency

What Happened tackles a common critique of Hillary's campaign: that she was a power-hungry woman who felt the presidency was "hers".

Nothing could be farther from the truth. Clinton wanted to be president because she honestly felt she could be of great service to the Country. She set out to tell her long history of public service but it wasn't easy with so many painting her as a crooked power-hungry politician.

She says she could have done a better job at highlighting her qualifications, but she's never been too good at bragging and showcasing and instead prefers talking about policies and strategies.

Issue 1: Gender (and Sexism)

Clinton never wanted to make gender a major focus of her campaign, but she says that misogyny is a strong influence in politics and in American life.

Politics is dominated by men and the fact that the American people elected a man who bragged of sexually assaulting women, she says, is the proof.

Issue 2: Clinton Chose Realism, But Bombast Won

Clinton approached politics with the idea of being realistic about policies' impact and what could be done.

For example, Sanders campaigned for free college for everyone without a realistic plan to make it happen, without considering how much it would cost in raised taxes for everyone.
But she has learned that big lofty goals are more important than carefully analyzed plans (My Note: I think she should have known).

She could have done more there, like, for example, rolling out her idea of "Alaska for America", such as redistributing to Americans the wealth of future Alaskan raw materials. But she scrapped it because her team could not make out the fine details of the plan.

Issue 3: Email Scandal Was a Thorn on Her Side

Every secretary of state had been using a private email account, but for Hillary, it turned out to be a huge problem that she could never clear.

The night television news spent three times as much time talking about the emails than about the policies.

With the email scandal obsession, it was hard for Hillary Clinton to reach people about her real intentions. And it was hard to make the facts speak louder. And the facts are that her email blunder was not a crime nor a security threat.

Coal Miners Blunder

With the media focusing more on email and blunders, Hillary's mistakes in communication always took full precedence over her policies.

So when she talked about "putting coal minders out of business" she never fully managed to make her real message come across. Such as that she wanted a greener economy and to help those coal miners as well.

Issue 4: Lies Trumped Facts

Trump was a new and different political beast the world had ever seen.
And according to PolitiFact and independent fact-checkers, he was the most dishonest candidate the site had ever measured. And Clinton was the most honest.

Trump never worried himself with reality and facts. He was all bombast

My Note:
That may be that Trump lied and spoke with slogans, but that doesn't change the fact that Hillary should have dealt with that more effectively. Hillary talks about "clear debate wins" over Trump, but I beg to differ.
Check here the analysis:

- Trump VS Clinton Debate I
- Trump VS Clinton Debate II & III

Issue 5: Russian Meddling Helped Trump

Russian hackers hacked the emails of the Democratic National Committee and the email account of John Podesta, Clinton's campaign chairman.

The email had nothing bad in them but were released at key moments during the campaign to distract voters. Such a key moment included the days after Trump's groping campaign went public.

My Note:
Clinton says the hacking of her email was released at key strategic moments. But so were Trump's groping comments, so she shouldn't play the virgin innocent here.

The Russian meddling was even more damaging with a host of Twitter and Facebook profiles and pages releasing a flood of anti-Clinton messages and fake news.

Issue 5: The Nail in The Coffin Was James Comey

What Happened gets very interesting here.

Hillary Clinton seems to put most of the blame for her loss on James Comey, the then-director of the FBI.
Both the CIA and FBI were aware of Russian cyberattacks to support Trump at least three months before the election. But while the CIA said so, the FBI never sounded the alarm.

Comey said he didn't do so because he didn't want to influence the elections, but that's exactly what he did on October 28 when he told Congress -and hence the world- that they had discovered new emails from the then closed Hillary Clinton case.

A week later, a few days before the election, he said the emails were not new, the FBI was already aware of them, and that the case remained closed and with no evidence of wrongdoing.

Clinton says that changed the fate of the election.
Nate Silver, one of the most respected statisticians in the US, gave Clinton an 81% chance of victory before Comey's revelations. After, it dropped to 65%.

Rod Rosenstein, Deputy Attorney General of the Justice Department, also condemned Comey's actions.

Real-Life Applications

Bombast Helps
Sticking to policies only will lose you some voters. You need some communication punch and passion.

Deal With The World As It Is…
… And not as you wish it would be.
It seems to be sometimes Clinton refused to deal with the world as it is, making voters smarter and more rational than they actually are.

CONS

Little Ownership
I didn't see much ownership or self-analysis of her own mistakes. The power and passion of Sanders and Trump campaigns that she lacked barely gets any credit, but that was in my opinion one of the biggest contributors to the result.
And I believe she fails to see how damaging to her rep the Wall Street speeches were. And that was another huge stain on her image she never managed to clean.
And I see little disclosing of her own camp's dirty games (ie.: Brazile giving her debate questions).

Look at this video to see that, when you put all the excuses together, it looks quite ridiculous:

Bit Self Promotional
Too Much of What Happened by Hillary Clinton is about her life, achievements, and all the great things she had in mind. We could have done with a little bit less of that.

PROS

Fact Backing
I have to admit, I approached the book a bit skeptical, but I actually learned a lot from it. And I really changed my mind about what happened.
And she makes good, statics-backed points about the impact of Comey's revelations.

Behind The Curtain Peek
For those who are not aware of the working of this world, you get to learn quite a bit of the behind the scene of political campaigning.

Power Moves Awareness
What Happened by Hillary Clinton raises awareness that this is a world where many sharks will do whatever it takes to hobble you, if that serves them.
It's a powerful reminder and one of the founding principles of this website.

Review

I have to admit, after What Happened, I do believe that without external factors Hillary may have won the elections.
However, I also believe that Clinton would have easily won in spite of the external factors if she had presented herself better. And that's where What Happened falls short.

Too Good to Leave, Too Bad to Stay: 13 Questions to Overcome Relationship Ambivalence (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Too Good to Leave, Too Bad to Stay tackles relationship ambivalence and helps readers decide whether to stay and work on the relationship or to cut their losses, break up and move on.
Mira Kirshenbaum, the author, calls that in between "ambivalence", and you want to spend as little time as possible being ambivalent.

Full Summary

About The Author:
Mira Kirshenbaum has been helping people with relationships, either as individuals or as couples, for more than thirty years. I could not find any information regarding her educational background.

Introduction

The author says the worst position to be in is ambivalence, such as not knowing whether you want to stay or you want to go.

Most people, when faced with ambivalence, take the approach of weighing in pros and cons. But that, says the author, is the worst possible approach.

You shift from yes and no as you focus on either the pros or the cons, and that gets you stuck in ambivalence.
She proposes instead a diagnostic approach: that single answer that will tell you if it's too good to leave or too bad to stay.

Here are the questions you should ask yourself:

#1. If Things Were Ever Good

> Diagnostic question: When things between you two were good, would you say they were really good?

If you find that when things were at their best they weren't really that good, that's a bad sign. You can often fix what got broken, but you can't fix what never worked.
And you should consider breaking up.

#2. If You Had No Obligations

> Diagnostic question: If God said it was okay to leave, would you be relieved you can finally end your relationship guilt-free?

Some people might feel bad for leaving the relationship. This question will make sure it's not morals, friends, or any external forces that still keep you in the relationship.

#3. If There's Still Some Good

> Diagnostic question: Do you share, or look forward to sharing any activity which makes you feel close?

Even if there's just one thing that reliably bonds you and makes you feel good, it's possible that by fixing your problems you can have a good and healthy relationship.
This guideline excludes children.

#4. Lying

> Diagnostic question: Did you get to the point where you feel what your partner say is more likely to be a lie than the truth?

If you reached that point, there's no trust in the relationship and you'll be happier leaving.

> When you're married to a liar, your marriage is a lie

#5. Affection & Sex

> Diagnostic question: Do you both want to touch each other and make efforts to touch each other?

Sex is an indicator of health in a relationship. In relationships that are not going well you can predict there's less lovemaking. If for several months you go on without touching each other and there's no sign of that changing, it's a very bad sign.

#6. Problems: Acknowledgement & Action & Results

> Diagnostic question: Does your partner see or admit your problems as a couple? If yes, does he take effective action?

First of all, you need to make sure your partner knows how much the issue means to you.
If your partner still does not acknowledge and work on the problem, then how can you solve it? Chances are it will only get worse over time. It's also important that he actually can solve it.

#7. Can You Leave?

> Diagnostic question: Look at the reality of leaving and ask yourself: does it still make sense?

Some men leave thinking they'll date younger women, some women are afraid of leaving because of money issues. These imaginative realities are not necessarily real.
Look at what your life would be realistically, and then ask yourself again if you'd be happier.

#8. Are You Losing Self-Respect?

> Diagnostic question: Is your partner making you feel so bad that you started believing those accusations yourself?

If your partner is making you feel bad about parts of your personality that are important to you and if you start losing self-confidence in those areas, then you'll be happy to leave.

#9. Are You Avoiding Your Partner?

> Diagnostic question: In regard to disrespect, are you actively trying to avoid your partner?

If your partner is so disrespectful that you are trying to limit contact with him, then the level of disrespect has reached gigantic proportions and you'll be happy to leave.

#10. Support & Interest

> Diagnostic question: Does he show concrete support for and interest for what's important to you?

If he's interested and supportive of what matters to you or what you're trying to achieve, then it's a partner's there when it counts. And that makes it a relationship that is too good to leave.

#11. What If He Were Gone?

> Diagnostic question: If you were to break up, would you lose and miss something important in your life?

If there is not about him you would miss, then you know this relationship is too bad to stay. If there is something about who he is and does for you that really matters in your life, that's an important positive sign (but not enough to say it's too good to stay).

#11. Do You Get What You Need?

> Diagnostic question: If you are a reasonable need, are you able to work it out?

If yes, it's a good sign that your partner accepts influence. If your partner cannot help you with your basic, reasonable needs, then you'll probably be happier to leave.

#12. Painful Emotional Intimacy

> Diagnostic question: Does it feel that getting emotionally close often results in pain for you?

Kirshenbaum says it's normal to occasionally get hurt when getting close to someone.
But if you feel hurt too often and it seems your partner's main interest in getting close is to harm, then it's a relationship where you cannot be close. And you'll be happier to leave.

This might be that he is emotionally unavailable, or that he has an avoidant attachment style.

Also, read:

- Anxious avoidant trap

> When distance is safer than closeness, you don't have a relationship

#13. If All Problems Disappeared

> Diagnostic question: If all the problems in your relationship were solved today, would you still feel ambivalent?

If you're not sure you want to stay even if nothing were wrong, then you're not happy with your partner or your relationship. And you'd be happy to leave.

Real-Life Applications

Decide. Then commit to your decision
Ambivalence is a terrible place to be in. Go through the questions instead and decide whether to stay -and then make your relationship better- or leave.

CONS

What about a final big shot?
I wish sometimes Kirshembaum would stress just a little bit more that it might be worth it to try this final solution: give your everything. For one month straight, just give. And if your partner doesn't improve, then you're 100% sure.
But don't get this wrong: the author is not encouraging you to leave and actually has great suggestions on how to improve things. But I feel that unconditional giving as a last resort is worth trying because it helps break possible vicious circles.

PROS

Can be a life changer
I think Too Good to Leave Too Bad to Stay can be a life changer for many people who are unsure about what to do with their relationships.

Eureka moments
Everything Mira says just makes a lot of sense. But it's that kind of "making sense" that is not readily available and obvious to everyone and that sometimes you must read or hear from someone else.
Then, after you do, everything clicks and makes sense. Eureka!

Deep wisdom
The author really has a lot of deep wisdom in between questions that just by themselves would be worth the price of the book.

Review

Should I Break Up? A Guide to Overcoming Relationship Ambivalence

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

When to break up is a daunting question, isn't it?

And the funny thing is that, as psychological research shows, the people least equipped to well diagnose their relationships are the partners themselves (MacDonald, Ross, 1999).

It's a daunting decision.
And it's good to get some expert resources to help.
By the end of this article, you will likely know whether to break up or stay together and work on your relationship.

When to Breakup

This article is not a list of questions I randomly came up with.

It's a guide based on the work and clinical experience of Mira Kirshenbaum and it adds on top my research on science-based relationship literature.

This article is here to help. But the final decision maker, of course, is you.

Why You Need to Decide

If you are not sure whether or not you should leave or stay in your relationship, you are in a situation of ambivalence.
Being ambivalent is bad in many ways:

1. You are not committing to your relationship, likely making it worse
2. You do a disservice to both you, your partner, and the relationship
3. You destroy your self-esteem (it says to yourself you're indecisive)

Ambivalence is, on average, more of an issue for women, since they tend to be more risk and loss averse.
But independently of gender, everyone will gain by sitting down for one hour or two and coming up with a decision.

How to Use This Guide

A common mistake people make when they want to decide whether to break up or not is weighing the cons and the pros.

You will rarely reach a decision like that.

Much better is a diagnostic approach instead, which means looking at key areas of the relationship and looking for a big strike.

One strike in a single major cue means you must go.
On the other hand, no major negative strike and good positive signs mean you have solid fundamentals and you can work on them.

So let's start.

Diagnostic Questions

First of all, the basics:

A pattern of violence, substance addiction, and complete disregard for your health and safety are immediate grounds for breaking up.
No further ink is needed.

If there are no such obvious red flags, then here are the signs for you to weigh:

#1. Was It Ever Great?

> When things between you two were good, were they really good?

The answer to this question is important because you can often fix what's broken.
But you cannot fix what never worked.

If you look back at your past and see a lukewarm story, then you don't expect any magic and, if you want magic,

you will probably be happier ending your relationship.

#2. Are There Still Positive Emotions?

> Deep down, do you still like your partner, and does he like you?

This is an important question because some people have been so conditioned to repeat the “but I love him (/her)” mantra that they end up losing track of their present feelings.

Pause for a second then, and if you realize that your love is a ghost you will be happier with a breakup. It’s indeed very rare you will start liking and loving again after you’ve lost the positive feelings.

#3. Has Your Subconscious Decided?

> Have you taken concrete steps towards a life without your partner?

Some people have decided on an unconscious level to end the relationship, but cannot yet fully process that decision rationally.

Examples of unconscious decisions are:

- Applying to jobs in different cities (or accepting a job)
- Starting divorce papers
- Affairs you don’t even care about hiding

If you answer yes the answer to when to break up is “now”.

#4. If There Were No Consequences...

> If your parents wouldn’t be disappointed, if kids weren’t there, if you weren’t ashamed, if God said you can… Would you leave?

Too many people judge their relationship based on the impact it us on other people.

And other people are important. But for a correct diagnosis, first of all, you need to think about you and yourself only.

This question will help you obtain that clarity without morals and external influences involved.
A “no” is a very positive sign that your relationship might be too good to leave.

#5. Do You Look Forward to Something Together?

> Do you share, or look forward to sharing any activity which makes you feel close and happy?

Think about it:

If you share positive experiences that make you forget all your problems and make you feel there’s still love in the relationship, then you might be onto something.

At the very least, there’s a chance that by fixing the issue you can have an overall happy relationship.
A “no” here still doesn’t doom your relationship, but at the very least you should be able to discover (or re-discover) such an activity. If you aren’t even able to find or rediscover a pleasurable activity to do together, then it’s time to break up.

#6. Can You Get Your Main Needs Met?

> Can you get your reasonable needs without a power struggle or being completely ignored?

If anything that is dear to you requires a huge power struggle then chances are this is not a relationship based on love and mutual support.

Of course, the focus here is on fundamental needs. Not whether or not you get your favorite ice cream every day. But if, say, time together with your parents is a huge need of yours, does he at least try to accommodate some time together?

And if you really want children but your partner doesn't, then that's another obvious sign.

If he could not care less about your main needs, you should break up with him/her.

#7. Does Your Partner Stand in The Way?

> Does your partner block any need, goal or dream you'd be unsatisfied not to pursue?

Imagine you're old and grey.

Looking back at your life, would you feel that your life was not satisfying if you didn't pursue something that means a lot to you? That's the kind of need we are talking about here.

If your partner stands in the way or vetoes that option then you will know you need to break up.

For example:
You're unhappy at your job and you dream of starting your own company. But your wife threatens to leave you if you quit. Then you should break up with her.

#8. Is There Support & Interest For What Matters To You?

> Does he show interest and concrete support for what's important to you?

This is the other side of the coin for the above question.

If he's interested and supportive of what matters to you or what you're trying to achieve, then you have a partner that is there when it counts.
And unless you find any other major strikes, you should probably stop thinking about the breakup because you have a relationship that is too good to leave.

#9. Is There a Shared Sense of Mission?

> Does your partner share your same dreams and ambitions, or actively takes part in them?

The next step would not just be a supportive partner, but one who shares the same goals and works alongside with you.

Pay attention here though: if it's just about launching a company, then you're business partners. And if it's about winning X trophy, then you're done after you achieve it.
The best goals and dreams are deep and non-time-bound (ie.: spreading ideals, making the world a better place, etc.).

#10. Can You Talk About What Matters?

> Can you openly and freely discuss issues, fears, dreams, solutions.. ?

There are many ways your partner can frustrate your attempt to communicate issues that are important to you.

They include:

- Stonewalling
- Change topic
- Dismiss it and say it's not important
- Pretend to listen while not really listening

Whatever the style, if you can never talk about what's important to you, then things will hardly ever get better and you should break up.

#11. Acknowledgment, Action & Results

> Does your partner see or admit your problems as a couple? If yes, does he take effective action?

Maybe your partner can talk, but can he acknowledge there are important issues in your relationship that you want to address?

Some men and women are so defensive and ego-fragile that they can't admit there is a problem.
With these partners, you are not going to fix any problem.

And is he taking action? If he's taking action, are the results making the relationship better?
If he keeps failing to change for the better the last step should be to change with the help of a therapist.

#12. Is Emotional Intimacy Painful?

> Does it feel that getting emotionally close often results in pain for you?

Kirshenbaum says it's normal to occasionally get hurt when getting close to someone.
But if you feel hurt too often and it seems your partner's main interest in getting close is to harm, then it's a relationship where you cannot be close. And you'll be happier to leave.

> Distance should never be safer than closeness

#13. Affection, Touching & Sex

> Do you both want to touch each other and make efforts to touch each other?

Sex is an indicator of health in a relationship.

In relationships that are not going well, you can predict there's less lovemaking than there used to be.
And a lack of craving touch for long stretches of time is a deep sign of alienation.

Here's the answer, then: If you have gone a few months without touching, if you don't feel like touching and you don't see an imminent end to it, then you should break up.

#14. Is Sexual Attraction Strong?

> Are you attracted to your partner in a unique, different way than to anyone else?

Most of the related literature seems to convene that there isn't such thing as great enough sex to salvage a relationship that doesn't have anything else.

But if you are attracted to your partner in a way that you are not attracted to anyone else, then that's something special. And if you don't have any other major strike that tells you to break up now, you should stay and work on the rest.

#15. Are Your Differences Too Big?

> Are there irreconcilable personality differences that make a happy shared life together?

Differences are OK.

But some differences can loom too large.
By irreconcilable differences, I don't mean typical gender differences -overblown by books such as Men Are From Mars– or big by society's standards.

It simply means that the differences go at the core of who you are and how you imagine a happy life.
For example, one could prefer city life and another prefer rural life. And that's OK… Unless it goes to the core of how you see the perfect life.
If one dream of a rural lifestyle and the other cannot live away from the city, then that's the kind of irreconcilable difference that makes a breakup the best solution.

> Your relationships should reflect your idea of life, not the other way around

Conversely, if there are no core differences:

#16. Are Your Similarities Too Big to Ignore?

> Do you feel that deep down your partner is like you in some respect that's important to you?

A deeply shared similarity that makes us feel good is a strong sign that your relationship might be too good to leave.

What do I mean by that?

Liking rafting is not good enough. But if you both like rafting because you both love a life full of wild emotions, discoveries, and thrill-seeking, then that's deep.

Why is it important?
Because a deep similarity about a core aspect of our personality helps overcome hundreds of differences. And if you answer yes here, you know that it's worth staying in your relationship.

#17. Is It Still Fun?

> Do you still have fun together?

If you still have fun together, that's a strong sign you should not break up but work on your relationship.

Fun is an often underestimated, but crucial element of a healthy relationship, a happy family, and also one of the most important elements of love.

#18. What Are The Other Options?

> Look at the reality of breaking up and ask yourself: does it still make sense?

Shouldn't deciding when to break up be all about love and the two of you?

Up to a certain point, yes.

But relationships don't happen in a vacuum and many people who misread the environment ended up making big mistakes.

Here's the exercise, then: write down your options and lifestyles in case of a breakup. Then write down your fears. Then research a bit or ask around.
Looking at reality you might realize working on your relationship is better than breaking up.

Example:
A woman might find out her sister's offer to host her wasn't that real after all.
And some men divorce thinking they'll still be able to see the children while dating younger women. And they're often wrong.

#19. Are You Losing Self-Respect?

> Is your partner making you feel so bad that you started believing those accusations yourself?

Does your partner make you feel bad?

Is he making feel bad about aspects of your personality that are important to you?
And are you start losing self-confidence in those areas?

If you answered yes to all of them, then you might actually be in a toxic relationship with an abusive partner.

And chances are that you'll be happy to break up.

#20. Are You Avoiding Your Partner?

> Are you actively trying to avoid your partner?

If your partner is so disrespectful and nasty that you are trying to limit contact with him, you have another terrible sign. Relationships should be a sanctuary of safety and support.

When you actively avoid your lover you have an enemy in your house, not a partner. And you should break up.

#21. What If He Were Gone?

> If you were to break up, would you lose and miss something important in your life?

If there is nothing about him you would miss, then it's time to break up.

If there is something about who he is and does for you that really matters in your life, that's an important positive sign (but not enough to say it's too good to stay).

#22. If All Problems Disappeared...

> If all the problems in your relationship were solved today, would you be happy to stay?

If you're not sure you want to stay even if nothing were wrong, then you're not happy with your partner or your relationship.
And you should break up with him.

Wait, Read This Before You Break Up!

Please note that these questions take for granted:

1. You communicated well to your partner what your issues are
2. He is aware of how important they are for you.

If you're not sure, tell him:

> You: "I love you and want to keep loving you, but this current situation is destroying our relationship and I'm losing my feelings for you.
> You gotta help me to change that or I am afraid for our future as a couple. Are you willing to help me?"

The day after, ask him how much he thinks the issue matters to you from 1 to 10.
If he says 9 or 10, then every single question fully applies.

Summary

This article helps you to decide whether you should break up or get back to work on your relationship.

Most of these questions go to the core of what a good relationship means. If you got even a single negative answer to any core question, then your only option is to bring the issue to your partner, in full clarity, and give it another last try for a couple of months.
Failed that, you should really break up.

This article also doesn't deal with the complexities and costs of divorce, for which you might want to consult a lawyer.

Attachment Style Test (Immediate Results, No Email)

Are you looking for a scientific, reliable and free attachment style quiz?

You have come to the right place.

This attachment style quiz will give you an answer to what's your attachment style like. At the end of it you will have a much better understanding about yourself and about your relationships.

Note:
The following attachment style quiz is an adaptation -and simplification- of the work of Fraley, Waller, Breannan. Based on the results it gets for my clients I find it to be highly reliable.

Attachment Style Quiz

The quiz is quick, simple.

Below is a list of statements.
If you don't agree with the statement, simply move on to the next one.
And if you agree with one of the statements, mark down the respective letter next to the statement (A, B or C).

Answer thinking about you feel towards relationships in general, and not just about your last one.

- I'm scared that if we break up I won't find anyone else (A)
- I'm uncomfortable when my partner gets too close (C)
- During arguments I tend to say things I later regret (A)
- I don't question the relationship because of a single argument (B)
- My partner often urges me to be more intimately close (C)
- I worry I am not good looking enough (A)
- I might be seen as boring because I'm rather stable (B)
- I miss my partner, but when we're together for long I miss my own space (C)
- I'm comfortable speaking up if I disagree with someone (B)
- I don't like the feeling that someone else depends on me (C)
- I quickly get over jealousy if someone I'm involved in looks at other people (B)
- I am relieved if someone I'm involved with looks at other people because they won't try to make things too serious (C)
- I get depressed if someone I'm involved with looks at other people (A)

- If someone I'm dating acts cold I wonder what's happened, but I don't think it's about me (B)
- If someone I'm dating acts cold I am indifferent. Sometimes even relieved (C).
- If someone I'm dating acts cold I worry I've done something wrong (A)
- If my partner wants to break up I'll try to show them what they'll miss (A)
- If my partner of a few months wants to break up I'd be hurt but I'd get over it (B)
- Sometimes in a relationship I get what I want and then I'm not sure about what I want anymore (C)
- I have no problem in platonically staying in touch with an ex (B)
- I don't create much drama in my relationships (B)
- I often worry my partner might get involved with someone else (A)
- Emotionally supporting my partner is not easy for me (C)
- When I'm single I'm more anxious and "incomplete" (A)
- I bounce back quickly after break ups (C)
- I fear that if someone knows the real me they won't like me (A)
- It's easy to be affectionate with my partner (B)
- I often worry my partner will stop loving me (A)
- I'm comfortable with being dependent on my partner (B)
- My independence comes first (C)
- I don't share my deepest feelings with my partner (C)
- I'm afraid my partner will not return my feelings if I share them (A)
- I'm generally content with my relationships (B)
- I often think about my relationships (A)
- I don't like being dependent on my romantic partner (C)
- I get attached very quickly (A)
- I express my needs and wants rather easily (B)
- Sometimes I'm angry and annoyed at my partner without a clear reason (C)
- I'm hypersensitive to my partner's moods (A)
- If you're honest, most people are also honest and dependable (B)
- I prefer casual sex to sex in committed relationships (C)
- I am comfortable sharing my thoughts and feelings (B)

Anxious:

People with an anxious attachment style have great capacity for emotional intimacy and get attached strongly and quickly.

Relationships take up a lot of their mental cycles and a lot of their energy.
They tend to be more temperamental, more sensitive to their partner moods and, along with the positive feelings of intimacy they experience lots of negative emotions as well, including worrying their partner does not return their feelings.

They can often get carried away and say mean things that they will later regret. As a result, their relationships tend to be mercurial and with lots of up and downs and lots of arguments and make ups.

Anxious people will greatly benefit from a relationship with a secure partner because someone with a secure attachment style will take away many of the worries, anxieties and arguments.

Read more about anxious attachment.

Secure:

Secure people are the most calm and confident of them all.

They are comfortable with intimacy without being overly worried or jealous. They communicate effectively and they tend to keep an even keel without any major swings of moods or emotions.

Read more about secure attachment.

Avoidant:

Contrary to popular belief, avoidants also have the same needs for emotional connections and intimacy, but their brains often shuts down or overturns those needs.

So they end up being torn between the willingness for closeness and the rejection of it. They also have a strong need for keeping their own space on top, which makes for uncomfortable intimacy in the relationship.
That's why one of the questions was "you miss your partner, but crave your space when you're together for too long".

Avoidants often put independence and autonomy before their intimate relationships and they don't spend much time thinking about their relationships.
These are the "committaphobes" out there.

What Determines Your Attachment Style

Your attachment style is measured on two different variables:

1. Level of comfort (or discomfort) with intimacy and closeness
2. Anxiety towards your relationship status and partner's love

The two usually go together, but a low number of the population (4-5%) are both insecure about their partner's availability and have high discomfort with intimacy.

Attachment Styles in Relationships

Often, for a number of reasons, avoidants end up with anxious.
These make for the fieriest of relationships with lots of fights and reconciliations and big emotional drama.

If you are an anxious, chances are you are more attracted to avoidants. You must overcome that tendency, because anxious and avoidants together make for very bad relationships.
I highly recommend you read this article to recognize the signs of impending danger:

The 4 Types of Attachment Styles: An Overview (With Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Adult attachment theory provides insights into how humans pair bond and form relationships.

Research has shown that people tend to fall into different attachment styles.
And understanding them is crucial to understanding both human psychology, and relationships.

In this article, we explain the four attachment styles, where attachment styles come from, how to recognize the different attachment types, and what type of attachment makes for the best relationship.

What's an Attachment Style

Based on the original researchers of attachment theory (Ainsworth, 1973; Bowlby, 1969), we define an attachment style:

> An attachment is a deep and enduring emotional bond that connects one person to another across time and space

Although most people refer to attachment styles when they talk about relationships, they don't necessarily pertain to relationships.
You can be attached to a friend, an animal, a person who doesn't have any emotional bond with you, or, of course, a parent or a child.

Why We Develop Attachments

Evolutionary theory may suggest that attachment styles likely evolved to ensure people stayed in relationships for the good of the offspring.

As The Oxford Handbook of Evo Psych and Relationships suggests, we develop an attachment to increase reproductive fitness:

> From an evolutionary standpoint, the attachment behavioral system refects an organized set of physiological and psychological mechanisms that encode and process early life experiences with attachment fgures to produce phenotypes (i.e. , attachment styles) that are more likely to increase ftness in particular environments (Simpson & Belsky, 2008; Szepsenwol & Simpson, 2019). In this respect, attachment styles refect the adaptive calibration of life history strategies (Szepsenwol & Simpson, 2019)

What attachment makes most sense depends on the environment.
That's why we mostly pick our attachment as children: because children take early environmental cues to predict what life will be like.

Great parents?
You get to be secure.

Distant, unloving, or bad parenting?
Insecure.

History of Attachment Theory

Attachment theory was first started by John Bowlby in 1988. Quite surprisingly, there was no previous comparable theory for emotional attachment.

And it was quite a revolution.

Sue Johnson, an author of Hold Me Tight, places Bowlby ahead of Freud when it comes to humans' contributions to our understanding of psychology.

Where Do Attachments Come From

There are different takes on how attachment styles, depending on what they give more weight to:

- Genetically and/or pre-programmed at birth
- Through parent/child interaction
- With life experience

More Freudian authors like Harville Hendrix, author of Getting the Love You Want, says that we develop our attachment styles depending on how our parent cared for us during childhood.

Other authors like Steven Pinker and Jerome Kagan stressed the importance of later life experience.

While Bowlby himself and Lorenz believed that we are all wired to attach via our genes.

All Influences Matter

Well, as it's often the case with complex personality traits, it's very possible, and likely, that it's a mixture of them all that contribute to our attachment styles.

Genes, life experience, and parental caring (plus more) all contribute to shaping our attachment style.

And the proof that genes and parental care are not the be all end all lies in the fact that around 25%-30% of adults change attachment styles based on life experiences and romantic history.

That's also great news because it means you can change your own attachment style to achieve healthier intimate relationships.

Attachment System

The attachment system is a pattern of emotions and behavior that sets off when our loved ones move away from us.

It is already evident in children.
When their mother goes away and a child starts crying, that's his way of "bridging the gap" and re-establish contact.

The same happens with adults and their romantic partners.

Attachment Styles in Children

Attachment styles can already be recognized in babies.
For example, this is how the different attachment types react when the mother leaves the room:

Anxious: becomes extremely distressed when mommy leaves the room. When the mother returns, he is ambivalent: angry and happy at the same time.
It takes him longer to calm down, and when he finally pacifies he angrily pushes the mother away, often followed by more tears.

Secure: is visibly distressed when the mother leaves the room. But when she comes back, he is happy and calms down.

Avoidant: when the mother leaves and comes back, he acts as if nothing happened.
But it's only a facade: researchers show that the baby's heart rate is as high as those who show extreme distress. And their cortisol levels—an indicator of stress—are also high.

Parental Caring

It is a well-known fact that parental caring (or lack of it) has a strong influence on our psychological development.

In the early days of attachment theory research it was believed that the mother's caretaking style was the main determinant of the adult attachment style.

Today we know that there is indeed a statistically significant link between caretaking style and attachment style.

The Four Attachment Styles

Earlier work on adult attachment used a three or four-category scheme.

Current attachment scholars conceptualize adult attachment along two broad dimensions:

1. Discomfort with closeness and intimacy (avoidance)
2. Anxiety about the ability to find and keep love

There are two more dimensions scholars tend to agree on: views of self, reflecting self-worth and lovability, and view of others reflecting their availability and trustworthiness.

But, for simplicity, we can still conceptualize attachment styles as a quadrant:

Amir Levine, an author of Attached, says that 50% of people have a secure attachment, 25% an avoidant attachment, 20% anxious attachment, and the rest fall into the fearful category (with unhealthy traits from both).

1. Secure Attachment Style

The secure attachment type is sometimes portray as the most stable, mature and "healthier".

And when looking for relationship partners, most people desire a secure-type of partner.

Secure attachment types enjoy intimacy and are not afraid of opening up. Their relationships tend to last long and they are the ones with the highest relationship satisfaction.
Secure types play little games because they tend to have a very healthy and mature mindset, similar to the following:

> Secure: "here I am, I like you. If you don't like me, it will hurt a bit but I'll understand. And if you also like me then there's no need to hide and play games".

You can work on yourself to become more secure and we'll talk about it in another article.

What Gives People a Secure Attachment

Many factors increase the likelihood of a child being secure, including:

- Mothers sensitive to child's needs
- Easy temperament as a baby (makes it easier for parents to be responsive)
- Good maternal conditions—marital satisfaction, low stress, no depression, and social support
- Fewer hours with a non-parental caretaker
- Genetic predisposition
- Life experiences (avoiding big romantic traumas)

Secure Attachment Style Example

Now you might be expecting an example that's all about being calm and rational.

And that might indeed be a secure attachment type.
But secure people are people just like everybody else. They also get angry, tense, and emotional. So I'll give you a better example.

An example of a secure attachment type in a very tense, highly emotional situation:

Don't be fooled: the fact that he is emotional does not preclude he might be a secure man

What makes it secure?

1. Embraces emotions
To begin with, he's not afraid of his own emotions. He doesn't hide them, neither to himself nor to her (hiding emotions, after all, is a way of playing games).

2. Vulnerability
He's not afraid of asking her "will you stay with me", which is very vulnerable and something that only a man who's not afraid of rejection can pull off.

3. Welcomes intimacy

He talks to her very openly about the two of them together in a relationship. Only a man who's not afraid of intimacy and commitment can do that.

4. Little fear
But he is also secure enough to know -and to say- he'll get over it if she decides to go.

5. Control
In a situation that is so emotionally charged, he is still relatively in control. And lets her go without doing any further drama or going crazy.

What about the other attachment types?

An anxious might have started screaming without making any factual points.

Or he might collapse, telling himself she doesn't want him and he must be bad.
An avoidant would have enjoyed the sex and either be OK with her leaving or, at least not, have promised to stay together forever. Also, an avoidant would have never shared his feelings so openly.

That being said, The Notebook can be quite of a corny movie, apologies to the male readers :).

Insecure Attachments

As mentioned earlier, attachments tend to reflect a certain childhood environment.

Schmitt and his colleagues measured over 17,000 people's attachment styles from 56 nations.
They related insecure attachment styles to various indexes of familial stress, economic resources, mortality, and fertility.

And, as explained in The Handbook of Relationship Initiation:

> They found overwhelming support for developmental-attachment theory.
> For example, nations with higher fertility rates, higher mortality rates, higher levels of stress (e.g., poor health and education), and lower levels of resources tended to have higher levels of insecure romantic attachment.

Schmitt (2005a) also found that short-term mating was related to insecure attachment across cultures.
Spedifically, the dismissing attachment, a sub-type of "avoidant attachment" was linked to short-term mating in men. And fearful or anxious forms of insecure attachment were linked to short-term mating in women.

2. Anxious Attachment Style

The anxious attachment type, sometimes also referred to as "preoccupied" craves emotional intimacy.

Often, craves it too much and/or too early.

But at the same time that they want to get close, they're constantly worried about their relationship status and are afraid their partner might not feel the same.
They are very sensitive to their partner's moods and tend to be temperamental. With their doubts, worries, and mood emotional swings they make relationships very fiery. And often not in a good way.

Anxious Attachment Style Example

There are tons of anxious examples in the movies because they make for big entertainment.

This one of from La Dolce Vita:

What makes it anxious?

1. Craves intimacy
She wants so badly.

2. Fear
She's jealous and afraid of other women. Irrationally so. And she's worried about her relationship.

3. Mental cycles
This takes so much of her energy. She can see how passionate and absorbed she is. She probably spends her whole day thinking about him and their relationship.

4. Mood swings
She goes from threatening to planning a romantic and loving time together. If you're crazy, an anxious partner will certainly make you happy :).

5. Needs reassurance
She has probably a very low opinion of herself and needs constant reassurance. Low self-esteem is one of the reasons -albeit not the only one- that in the long term, anxious women have difficulty hanging on to secure men (read how low self-esteem dooms your relationships).

Read more about:

- the anxious attachment style and
- the toxic relationship it forms with the avoidant.

---

3. Avoidant Attachment Style

Avoidant attachment types are uncomfortable with intimacy and being too close, and they keep partners at arm's length.

They don't open up fully in their relationships and need their own space not to feel suffocated.

From a neurological point of view, researchers seem to point to avoidants having the same need for closeness and intimacy as anybody else, but they suppress those needs. One of the ways they do so is by focusing on the negatives of their partners.
In the end, avoidants tend to be less happy in their relationships and to make their partners less happy as well.

Avoidants tend to be defensive and avoiding getting close is also a form of avoiding pain and rejection.

Dismissive attachment is a sub-type of avoidant.

Avoidant Attachment Style Example

Jack Nicholson in Terms of Endearment is an example of avoidant.

Notice how he tries to make a silent exit as soon as the family reunites:

Jack Nicholson might have been an avoidant in real life as well, and not just in the movies.

Why is it avoidant?

Distance

He is uncomfortable being introduced to the family. That would mean “making it official” and strengthening the ties.
And he makes a quick exit.

4. Fearful / Disorganized Attachment Style

The fourth attachment type is also sometimes referred to as “disorganized” or fearful.

It takes the worst of the avoidant and the anxious but luckily it’s much less frequent (4-5% of the population).
They have a low opinion of themselves and find it hard to get close to their partners.

Unluckily I don’t have in mind a movie example of a fearful attachment style. If you have any ideas lemme know in the comments, I would be very happy to look into it.

Attachment Styles And Differentiation

Schnarch defines differentiation as:

> “Differentiation is the ability to maintain your sense of self when you are emotionally and/or physically close to others—especially as they become important to you”

Differentiation is a concept developed by Murray Bowen as part of his Family Systems Theory (Brown, 2013 for an overview).

Differentiation is relevant to attachment styles because anxious people have low differentiation and tend to see themselves as one with their partners (enmeshed)
Anxious types instead feel too much differentiation and seek too much differentiation.

The secure attachment types tend to strike a better balance:

From de Azevedo Hanks, 2016

However, that differentiation of the avoidant can sometimes be a front.

For example, as a teenager avoidant, I always sought differentiation from my family by rebelling and starting verbal disputes.
But it wasn't healthy differentiation, it was more of a defensive differentiation, partly motivated by the resentment of the parents' judge role (also see Harris, 1967).
Being secure means being comfortable in who you are, as an individual, while also welcoming and enjoying emotional bonds with others.

Limitations & Lack of Attachment

Attachment theory seems to assume that an attachment is present. However, some psychopathologies, including psychopathy, are defined by a lack of attachment.

For example, in The Handbook of Psychopathy, Patrick points out that 'standard attachment-style inventories are not well suited to indexing the weak social connectedness that characterizes classically "detached" psychopathic individuals'.

A lack of attachment is essentially different from affectively dysregulated externalizing individuals. In psychopathy, this lack of attachment is sometimes accompanied by a disinhibited pursuit of goals or resources.
Patrick's Triarchic model of psychopathy characterizes this combination as 'agentic disaffiliation', pursuing goals without concern for the feelings or welfare of others (Patrick et al., 2009).

Summary

Attachment theory will lead you to a better and deeper understanding of people.

But it will also give you a very practical understanding of how to get better relationships.
To do so it is very important to understand your attachment style first and to be able to recognize other's attachment styles as you date them.

Throwing Someone Under The Bus: Real Life Example

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

What does it mean to throw someone under the bus?

It's a social move where you shift blame or sacrifice someone—often to protect yourself or gain power.

And while most people see it as disloyal or mean-spirited, the truth is: sometimes, it's the smartest and fairest move you can make.

In this guide, you'll learn the exact meaning of "throwing someone under the bus," see real-world examples, understand the power dynamics behind it—and know how to do it (or defend against it) strategically.

Contents

- Intro: Meaning
- When You Must Throw Under The Bus
- How to Throw Someone Under The Bus
- Example
  - #1. Flash a Fake Smile
  - #2. Power Move (Sarcasm)
  - #3. Cut Him Out
- Saving Someone From The Bus
- Summary

Intro: Meaning

> Throwing someone under the bus refers to social punishment for a social blunder, usually entailing ignoring > someone, or cutting them out a conversation or social group

The person you throw under the bus is usually not an open enemy. And sometimes you might even have a good social relationship with them.

But they have made such a big mistake that they risk dragging you or others down with them.

At that point, as painful as it might be, you need to cut them loose to avoid a domino effect.
And that's when you have to throw them under the bus.

When You Must Throw Under The Bus

There are several situations when you need to throw someone under the bus:

- They made an offensive comment

Imagine someone making an offensive remark, a racist joke, or simply saying something stupid.
And then they look at you and smile, expectantly, as if to communicate you two are in cahoots or you two agree on the topic.

At that point, if you don't distance yourself from them, it will seem like you are tacitly agreeing with them.
And in many situations, you might not want that.

Something similar happened to McCain.
One of his own supporters made a silly remark about Obama. It was not an easy situation for McCain: accepting the comment would have won him points with the lady speaking and, possibly, with the audience.

But he knew it was not the right thing to do.
And so he chose to throw her under the bus by cutting her short:

Notice though McCain was too rough there. Throwing someone under the bus can be emotionally painful for people, so if you can somehow help them save face, you should.

- They make a socially dangerous comment involving you

Here's an example that happened to me some time ago.

We were sitting down with me, a friend, and a couple. The friend made a joke about me being a threat to their relationship status (for possibly going after her).
That's a kind of joke when you need to throw your friend under the bus.

- They're butting in on a conversation they have no place to join

You're having a private conversation, or you are hitting it off with a girl. And here comes a clueless guy trying to talk to you.
He might not have bad intentions, but at that point, it's either you give up your 1:1 conversation or… You throw him under the bus.

How to Throw Someone Under The Bus

The 'throwing under the bus' power move follows this structure:

1. Social faux that undermines you
2. Hit back (socially)
3. Move on
4. .. And leave him on the outside with no way of hitting back

Throwing under the bus is not about escalating or making a big fuss. It's about hitting and then moving on, leaving the bus lover without recourse.
It's a resolute yet subtle move from your side.

Here are a few ways:

- Turning your back on them
- Not replying
- Pretending they're not there
- Turn your face away
- Make a disgusted face for everyone to see
- Start a conversation with someone else, leaving him alone
- Leaving and letting him stand alone

Etc. Etc.

Example

Watch this video and see if you can spot the move:

Of course, you can, you wouldn't be reading here otherwise :).
Here's how she did it:

#1. Flash a Fake Smile

Throwing under the bus usually is not a nasty escalation or an all-out war.

In this case, Trump had authority over her, so avoiding any nastiness was a must.
And her smile keeps the semblance of acceptance and goodwill.

A smile or any sign of friendliness is not a necessary must, but without it's much nastier.

See a great example here:

#2. Power Move (Sarcasm)

Next comes the hit.

It could be coldly uttering "thanks" or sarcastically saying "very funny".
In this case, it was nonverbal sarcasm expressed to her with her smile.
It's as if she were saying:

> Funny, veeeery funny, Donald

Right after that, she cuts him out.

#3. Cut Him Out

The next move is to distance yourself from him or to cut him off from the interaction.

In the Donald Trump example, she turns her face away from him and toward the other guy who was speaking. That effectively ignores him and cuts him out of the interaction.
It also adds a further social slap as it communicates he's not worthy of her attention.

Saving Someone From The Bus

In this case, Donald Trump was partially saved by the man who laughed at his joke. That was a life preserver that he threw him. On the other hand, she was aided by the cowboy guy who kept speaking and all the others around who ignored the joke.

Indeed, the people around you can make all the difference in how a social power move will play out. Read more here:

- How to rescue friends from social assaults
- Saving friends from socially awkward situations

And that's one of the advantages of having lots of power: all the sycophants around will side with the power.

Summary

Throwing someone under the bus is rarely a pleasurable activity.

But sometimes, you just gotta do it to avoid letting the bus lover drag you down. This article showed you a great example of how to throw someone under the bus with great social grace.

Launch: Summary & Review (Jeff Walker)

Launch (2014) shares a system and a set of steps to help digital marketers and content creators bring their products to market and maximize sales and revenues.

Bullet Summary

- You cannot leave your success to chance
- A mailing list is the most essential tool you can dispose of
- Use mental triggers to amplify your sales

Launch Summary

About The Author: Jeff Walker is an online marketing expert. He defines himself as "the creator of the Product Launch Formula", a system that helps digital creators effectively market and sell their products.

Introduction: Don't Hope, Plan

Most businesses succumb to hope marketing.

What's "hope marketing"?

It's hoping that by simply preparing a product, people will buy it.

They think their idea is a winner, their product will be successful, and then, when they finally find the courage to launch it and it's not really selling at all, they quit.

What's the alternative to hope marketing?

A well-planned approach in your launches.

Use Scarcity

Scarcity is a well-known principle as explained by Cialdini in Influence.

The author says a good way to use scarcity is to say that your product's price will rise very soon.
For example, you could offer a pre-launch price for a limited time only.

Use Sequences and Stories

Sequences are a great way to build excitement toward the last piece of the sequence.

Think about Harry Potter: what was the book that had fans the most excited about? It was the last one.
Think if you can set your product at the end of a series of sequences.

Stories sell much better than empirical data.
So when you devise your marketing strategy, make sure you do it by telling great stories.

Build and Use A Mailing List

Whatever you do, Jeff Walker says that your mailing list is the most important asset you own.

He introduces the idea of a squeeze page, such as a page where users must either leave their email or leave. Personally, I find it too aggressive and don't use it. I know some marketers use their homepage as a squeeze page, but I prefer having an introduction about the course there.

The emailing list is not high-converting, but in values-based business, I explain that my main goal is not to maximize profits but to live well with a business I love and that customers love.

> The money is in the list

Product Launch Formula

This is the sequence of a Product Launch Formula:

- Pre-prelaunch

The name of the game here is piquing interest and getting early feedback before you even start working on the product.
Don't seem like you're selling or you will turn people off.
The author has some good tips on how to structure the email for feedback.

- Pre-launch

Release high-quality content.

First part is why they should care, then what your content will do for them (use a story/case study), and then how your product will help them.

The last part should tell prospects how much they can expect to wait and the sweet deal you'll give to the very first customers (scarcity).

- Launch

Release and publicize your product

- Post-launch

Follow up with your buying customers and with the followers who haven't yet bought

Joint Venture Launch

I particularly liked the idea of the joint venture launch.

A joint venture launch means partnering with people in your industry to access their own list. You should prove to them that your product sells first (do an internal launch to your list first) and offer them something (a commission on every sale, for example).

If you find good partners to launch with, you could as well double your sales or even more.

[image]

Real-Life Applications

Partner Up!
Link up with people in your space. Don't just think of them as competition, think of how you can work together.

Plan Up!
Plan your launches. Get early feedback, then build suspense, then release on a market that is already ready to buy.

CONS

- A bit sleazy?

I am not a big fan of online marketing and what I call "persuasion triggers overload", which I find sneaky and annoying.

Yet, I am aware that if you want to run an online digital business, you need to take them into account.

Still, I don't always appreciate these techniques, and when I read the full title of "Launch", I am reminded of why I don't like them:

> Launch: An Internet Millionaire's Secret Formula To Sell Almost Anything Online, Build A Business You Love, And Live The Life Of Your Dreams

"Secret formula"…?

- Big Upsell

Launch has a lot of references to Jeff Walker's website and products. But then again, that's maybe part and parcel of what a successful marketer is supposed to do.

- Mental Triggers

Some of the mental triggers Launch recommends are well known and everyone is already using them.
As a matter of fact, am I the only one who's put off by ads with a "limited time only" sticker?
To me, it reads spammy right away and makes me not want to buy a product.

PROS

Solid Foundations
The ideas of getting early feedback, planning, and preparing your market are all solid concepts.

Great Steps for Product Launch
For people without previous knowledge, the steps for a product launch can be real game changers

Launch Review

I'm not (yet) an expert on online marketing so giving a major recommendation at this point would be premature for me.

It's not earth-shattering information and you can find the same information online.

But as a newbie, I definitely did find lots of value in Launch.
And as of now, I can only recommend it.

- SUMMARY

The Anxious Avoidant Trap

The anxious-avoidant relationship, AKA "anxious-avoidant trap", is one of the most common forms of dysfunctional relationships.

It binds together the anxious and the avoidant, the two most antithetical attachment styles.

The anxious-avoidant attachment makes for a terrible relationship because, at its core, the two have opposing approaches to intimacy.

The anxious moves towards intimacy, and the avoidant moves away from intimacy to regain his space. The anxious need intimacy, and the avoidant needs to maintain independence.

Here is how the trap unfolds on a loop:

#1. Anxious Moves Towards

The anxious type needs and craves lots of intimacy.

And when he doesn't get it, his attachment system activates. In very simple terms, that basically means that he needs to get closer to his partner, both physically and emotionally.

#2. Avoidant Moves Away

The problem is that the avoidant partner reacts in the opposite way.

Avoidants get easily overloaded with too much intimacy and need to regain their space and autonomy by moving away.
When their partner gets too close or stays close for too long, avoidants start to pull away.

#3. Argument Ensues

When the avoidant partner moves away, the anxious partner starts arguments to get the attention they are lacking.

Arguments are often a front that doesn't address the real issue: the lack of intimacy.
Indeed, anxious types are often afraid of asking for intimacy because they're concerned their partner doesn't feel the same way.
Often, they do feel the same way, but they just express their love in very different and sometimes incompatible ways.

On the other hand, the avoidant doesn't address the issues because, well… The avoidant doesn't want to solve the issue!
Solving the issue would be easy, but it would mean giving up the physical and emotional buffer that they need.
Indeed, sometimes the avoidants enjoy the fights. Not that he likes the fights per se, but he enjoys what the fights can provide him: a good excuse to get more time on his own.

And if she complains, an easy excuse for him:

> you started the fight darling and you were rather nasty, now leave me alone!

Arguments Don't Get Solved Easily

During fights, anxious people tend to get flooded (basically, "overwhelmed", read more on flooding) and to focus on the negatives.
They overreact and say things they regret.

After the argument, the opposite happens: the anxious person regrets what they said and focuses on the positives of their partner. Now the anxious person wants to mend things and get close again.

But avoidants react differently: after an argument, they turn off their attachment system and only remember the negatives.
Now they want to stay away.. For a while.

Which makes a reconciliation not always straightforward.

#4. Reconciliation

When reconciliation finally happens, it usually doesn't last long.

It's called the "anxious-avoidant trap", but it should be called the "anxious-avoidant cycle" instead. Because it is indeed a repeated pattern, on a loop.

Notice the pattern below: it's obvious that the unhappy moments far outweigh the positive ones. But still, couples stay together for far longer than the relationship's health would warrant—we'll discuss why later on.

The anxious is too much, and the avoidant is not enough
See that caption?
That caption is exactly what an ex-girlfriend of mine once told me.

> I'm too much for you and you're not enough for me.
> -My ex

It still rings in my ear.
Back then I didn't know about attachment styles, and yet I felt that with one single sentence she had fully summarized all our issues.
That's indeed a great summary of the anxious-avoidant trap.

Now, would you like to take a guess as to who was the anxious and who was the avoidant in that relationship?

Why Anxious & Avoidant End Up Together

If the anxious and avoidants are not compatible, why do they end up together so often?
Here are the main reasons:

1. Anxious types think it's love

Some sources, like Amir Levine, say that the anxious type confuses the ups and downs of their activated attachment system for "real love".

It's important to notice here that the emotional ups and downs are the exact reason why the anxious partner is so attached to the avoidant.

And the opposite is also true.

When anxious types meet a secure partner—a partner who's honest, direct, and emotionally present—they find him more boring.
They don't feel the "spark" they get with the avoidant and they think that "it must not be real love" -but it's worth repeating that it's not really a spark with the anxious: it's just an activated attachment system going awry-.

It's a bit like for the ass*ole / nice guy thing where women sometimes find the latter too "plain" and boring. Avoidants are not the same as ass*oles, but they overlap sometimes and many often (mistakenly) equate the two.

2. Emotional codependency

Some avoidants get their sense of self-esteem when they compare their independence and "power" to how much their partner needs them.

This means that some avoidants only feel strong and independent with a partner who needs and pleads for them. A sad reality for some people: is that they feel strongly about the weaknesses of others.

And that's one of the reasons why avoidants do not date each other: they don't get the kicks of being the strong and dominant ones in the relationship.

In the most extreme cases, this can devolve into a codependent relationship.

3. A question of Numbers

Only 25% of the population is avoidant.

Yet you will meet avoidant attachment types much more often than the raw numbers would suggest.
It's because they are more often on the single market, they are more likely to "look around" when in relationships and they don't date other avoidants.

And they often end up with, guess whom? The anxious, of course.

Gender of Anxious & Avoidants?

Studies show there are more women who are anxious and more men who are avoidants.

This means the chances of the woman being anxious and the man being avoidant are much higher.

This is not to say that there are no anxious men or avoidant women. There are, and below is a video example.

4 Signs of Anxious Avoidant Relationship

By now, you probably know if you are or if you've ever been in an anxious-avoidant attachment.
Here are a few more signs for you:

- Roller-Coaster Effect

There's a constant alternation of great times followed by bad ones. Like in the circle above, and that's why the anxious-avoidant attachment is also called the anxious-avoidant trap.

- Constant feeling of instability

Anxious-avoidant relationships often last as long as secure ones. But there's always an element of uncertainty, which leads to dissatisfaction among both partners.

- You feel treated badly

It's crazy for the anxious attachment type that the avoidant partner treats them more poorly than people who are not as close. But that's how it can end up being for the most avoidant types out there: the closest person can be the biggest threat for them.

- You feel trapped

Deep down, you know that this partner and this relationship are not right for you. Yet it's hard for you to leave. But whether you are aware of it or not, all the ups and downs are actually addictive.

The Anxious Type Loses

Since anxious-avoidant relationships often last a long time, it's normal to ask: what happens?

Who gets the upper hand?

Does the avoidant get the distance he wants, or does the anxious person get the intimacy they need?

Well, in a way, neither wins.

Anxious-avoidant relationships indeed tend to be less satisfactory to both partners. But in the bleakness of the overall relationship, it's the anxious who loses the most.
Indeed, after every fight, it's the anxious that has to make concessions to the avoidant to reconcile and re-establish a minimum of intimacy.
And she is the one who has to settle for the little intimacy that the avoidant will dish out.

This is really not an ideal situation.
For the anxious, the relationship is mostly a barren desert of unmet needs with small oases of reconciliation (and again, it's worth repeating: the rare emotional rewards make people addicted in a similar fashion that drugs make us addicted).

And if you're anxious, you might want to ask yourself: Could it be that you can do better than that?

Anxious-Avoidant Attachment Examples

Now, we've talked a lot about theory.

Wouldn't it be cool to have a few examples of Anxious, Avoidant relationships in real life?
Well, I'm glad you asked.

Here I break down three famous movies with my own annotation so you can see exactly what we're talking about (I just love great real-life examples to make everything clear :).

#1. Five Easy Pieces

He is the avoidant type, and she is the anxious type.

> Her: (seeks closeness)
> Him: (gets annoyed)

#2. 500 Days of Summer

As we've said, the anxious-avoidant attachment is more typical with him as the avoidant, but there are plenty of relationships where the roles invert (will put the video example back up as soon as I can).

#3. La Dolce Vita

La Dolce Vita presents the typical fight-reconciliation loop of the anxious-avoidant attachment, with a touch of borderline personality disorder as well:

> Her: (seeks closeness)
> Him: (drives away)

Overcoming The Anxious Avoidant Trap

What should you do when you are in an anxious-avoidant trap?

That's the million-dollar question, and the answer to that, without knowing your situation, can only be "it's difficult to say".
But here are some truths that can help you decide on the best course of action:

1. The Relationship Can Last Long

If the anxious needs for intimacy are not too big and the avoidant needs for independence are not extreme, the relationship can hum along.

Indeed, as perverse as that might sound, anxious and avoidant relationships tend to be long-lasting.
Part of the reason is that the ups and downs are addictive, and some anxious people believe they might not be able to find "so much love" with someone else (don't fall for that BS).

However, long-lasting is NOT synonymous with good or healthy. And as we saw earlier, the anxious partner tends to lose out.
So make sure you take the necessary precautions.

2. Be Careful You Don't Become The Enemy

In some anxious avoidant relationships, the avoidant partner will become perennially annoyed with the anxious partner.

We have seen that example in the video above with Jack Nicholson (look at it again, it's really good to explain that dynamic).

It's also possible that the avoidant partner will start seeing the anxious partner as an enemy. They will keep secrets, stop confiding, and actively avoid their spouses.

To avoid it, try to grant the avoidant partner some of his much-needed breaks and avoid thinking in terms of "I'm right, he needs fixing".

3. Assess Your Options

Try to detach yourself emotionally and make an assessment of your options.
Here are a couple of helpful articles:

- How to decide when it's time to break up

4. Don't Take the Blame!

Many anxious types cannot understand why their avoidant partners are moving away.

They feel rejected, they take the blame, and their self-esteem tanks (read how low self-esteem can open the doors to abuse).

Don't fall for that trap: it's not you. And it's not your partner either, in a way. It's simply that you are both wired in a way that makes you two, shall we say, "wired for drama".
And sure, brain wiring does change and you can change it… But that's not to say that it's easy.

5. Make More Friends

There can be more hidden issues compounding anxious avoidant relationships.

But a more common and benign “aggravating circumstance” is the mismatch in the extroversion scale. For example, the avoidant might also be an introvert or an anxious extrovert.
I have already talked about the issues that extroversion mismatch creates with flatmates, where it ends up looking a lot like an anxious-avoidant relationship.
But the good news is that if the anxious is also extroverted, then it’s easier to improve the relationship.

And you do it by increasing the anxious social life.

More friends and acquaintances will help the anxious get her fill of “human connections” outside the relationship, while also giving some more time off to the avoidant.
Win-win.

P.S.:
Just watch out that one of those connections doesn’t become an emotional affair :)-.

6. Focus on Quality, Not Quantity

Learning to bond and connect with people is a life skill.

It’s a skill that makes great relationships and that can also help in the anxious-avoidant relationship.

How can it help?

Here is how: if the avoidant learns to be fully present, to build a human bond and connection, and to really care about the partner, then chances are that less time together will actually be needed for the avoidant.
Result: more quality time for the anxious and more lonely time for the avoidant.

And there are no risks of going wrong or overdoing it here: a focus on quality time can never go wrong.

The quality time technique seen from the avoidant

7. Try This Crazy Move!

Have your avoidant (or anxious) partner read this article, which will probably be an eye-opener.

After all, one of the reasons why it's so difficult for many couples to survive the anxious avoidant trap is that neither can understand what's happening, and they both end up blaming each other.

Then tell him, tactfully, that you are worried your relationship isn't going to last unless you two make the necessary changes.

If he is in it and acts on it, it's a very good sign you can fix it.

Don't Confuse The Trap For These

There are more relationship issues that can compound or be confused with the anxious avoidant attachment.

On top of the extroversion/introversion mismatch we have seen, here are a few:

1. As*holes Are Not Avoidant

Anxious, avoidant attachment is a common relationship.
And it's what some people sometimes mistake for "being in a relationship with an ass*ole".

But while the two can overlap, such as when you have an avoidant who is also an as*hole, an avoidant is not necessarily an as*hole (and vice versa).
Indeed, many avoidants can also be "nice guys". And people who look at your relationship from the outside might even be surprised at your issues with "such a nice guy", which increases the risks that the anxious self-blames BTW.

If you are interested, read more here:

- do women like ass*oles: what attachment theory says

If I had to pick a partner for an anxious woman, I'd actually pick an ass*ole for her over an avoidant.

2. Borderline Personality Disorder

The anxious partner might be confused or also present traits of borderline personality disorder.

BPs also switch from fears of abandonment to engulfment, but the swings tend to be wilder and more dramatic.

For more information on BPs, read:

- Stop Walking on Eggshells
- I Hate You, Don't Leave Me (best BPD resource I've read)

3. Emotionally Unavailable Men

The avoidant might also be emotionally unavailable because of trauma or personality.

The Godfather is an example of an emotionally unavailable man, as would be Mr. Big from Sex & The City.

Emotionally unavailable men do miss their partners and do want intimacy. But then they also miss their freedom and independence. Or their guard goes up again and takes the distance again.

Of course, they might pop back into your life just when you need them the least:

3. Highly Sensitive People

Similar to introverts, highly sensitive people have a very sensitive nervous system, which causes them to pick up cues from the environment that most other people miss.

However, they also get overwhelmed easily, which means they need to take "breaks" and sit down in the quietness of their own space, both mentally and physically, sometimes actually sitting down in a dark, quiet room-.

Highly sensitive people can replicate the anxious avoidant trap by getting close and then needing "time off".
This is more of a benign type of emotional roller coaster, though.

Read more on HSPs here:

- The Highly Sensitive Person

4. Manipulative Relationships

This is a minority of cases, but I need to raise the red flag.

It's a sad reality of life that there are some sick people who purposefully dish out intermittent rewards to make people dependent and addicted.

These relationships might look similar to anxious-avoidant relationships as they also present high emotional highs and deep throughs.
The difference is that they are more extreme, and the avoidant is not so much an avoidant as he is an abuser, a "dark psychologist", a manipulator… Or call him, as you prefer, an asshole, anyway.

Chances are this is not your case, but making sure won't hurt.

Here are a few articles:

- Signs you're dating a sociopath
- Signs of gaslighting

If you suspect this might be the case, I recommend taking the situation very seriously.
You might want to talk to a therapist or someone who knows how to interpret the signs.

SUMMARY

This article shows you the inner dynamics of the anxious-avoidant relationship.

As a recovering avoidant myself, I know this dynamic all too well, and I can empathize with you and your difficulties.
It's not a great relationship, especially for the anxious partner.

However, whether you are the avoidant or the anxious, the good news is that it's possible to become more secure in your attachment. And it's also possible to improve your anxious-avoidant relationship.

What is Avoidant Attachment

The Oxford Handbook of Evo Psych and Relationships defines avoidant attachment as:

> Attachment avoidance is characterized by a discomfort with closeness, a chronic distrust of others, and excessive self-reliance (Brennan et al. , 1998; Gillath et al. , 2016; Karantzas et al. , 2010)

In brief, avoidants are uncomfortable with too much intimacy.
Or, sometimes, avoidants are uncomfortable with intimacy, period.

The avoidants’ attachment system works the opposite way than for a secure and anxious type: when someone gets too close, they feel the need to get away.

Avoidant Traits

	Anxious	Avoidant	Secure
Traits	· Clings to relationships · Anxious during separation · Fearful of abandonment · Overwhelmed by emotions · Mixes thoughts and feeling	· Ends relationships too soon · Uncomfortable being emotionally close · Intimacy on a surface level · Unaware of thoughts & feelings	· Can form relationships, but also comfortable alone · Can manage emotions · Can separate thoughts and feelings
Differentiation	Low	Low	High
Attitude	Hesitant	Guarded	Confident
Barriers to Assertiveness	· Afraid to speak up for fear of creating distance or rejection · Fear of overwhelming others · Inability to identify and tune in to emotions · Make excuses for people’s patterns of boundary crossing [especially when attachment is already formed]	· Disconnected from own emotions, especially during conflict or stress · Prevents conflicts [or avoids] · Avoids discussing emotions [for fear of getting “too close”] · Confuses felt emotions as the result of an occurrence · Confuses partners’ search for felt intimacy as crossing his boundaries · “Lets things go” even when it bothers or hurt him	· May have difficulty identifying emotions · May have difficulty communicating emotions · May lack confidence to be assertive or speak directly
Goals	· Attachment’s self-awareness · Acknowledge value of close relationships & interdependence · Connect to emotions · Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants · Develop communication skills	· Attachment’s self-awareness · Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants · Develop emotional management strategies · Develop communication skills	· Attachment’s self-awareness · Develop emotional vocabulary · Develop and/or solidify assertiveness skills

Based on Hanks, 2016

Let's now review some typical traits of avoidant attachment personality:

1. Secretive

Avoidant individuals tend to engage in low levels of self-disclosure.

The authors of The Handbook of Relationship Initiation say it reflects their fear of dependence and lack of trust in others.

2. Braggart

Avoidant people tend to present an inflated view of themselves to others in order to appear strong and self-sufficient.
This approach often impairs, rather than promotes, the development of intimacy (Mikulincer, 1998).

3. Comfortable Wiht Impossible Relationships

Sometimes avoidant attachment types will go for long distances and other hopeless relationships.

It may be an unconscious choice to maintain their freedom and distance.

Aron, commenting on research showing that avoidant experience more unrequited love than secure types suggested it may be a way to experience love, without the relationship.

4. More Likely to Cheat

The avoidant attachment is part of the "player psychology makeup".

Such as, seeking more short-term mates, rather than long-term pair bonds.

As part of this shorter-tern strategy, avoidants tend to enjoy sex without commitment more than other styles do, suggests psychologist Martin Seligman (2002), although that doesn't necessarily mean they do have more sex.

When in a relationship, avoidant attachment types are more interested in individuals of the opposite sex.
This "interest" also translates to a higher incidence of infidelity among avoidants (Dewall et al. 2011).

In some studies, up to twice as much as the other attachment styles.
On the flip side, they are less likely to develop strong feelings for the affair partner (Allen, Baucon, 2004).

If you want to understand the unpleasant phenomenon of cheating a bit more also check the following

- How to overcome infidelity
- Why people cheat

5. Potentially Dark Triads Traits

Quoting Lyons, M. (2019):

> research has found that those high in psychopathy (Jonason, Lyons, & Bethell, 2014) and Machiavellianism (Brewer, Bennett, Davidson et al. , 2018) have avoidant attachment styles

The avoidant attachment style supports the psychopaths' and Machiavellians' preference for short-term dating and uncommitted relationships.

6. More Likely to Date Anxious Types

We spoke about the Avoidant Attachment Style in the overview of the four attachment styles.

Avoidants rarely end up in relationships with other avoidants and Amir Levine says they become somewhat less avoidant when dating a secure attachment.

It's not uncommon for avoidants to end up with an anxious. When avoidants pair with an anxious, they form the toxic anxious attachment trap.
It's a type of dysfunctional relationship with lots of drama and lots of up and downs. I welcome you to check the article so you will know what you need to avoid.

7. Mentally Biased Against Relationships

The literature refers to the avoidant's biases as "deactivating strategies".

We list them here, together with examples:

Mental Biases	Examples
Black & White Bias	I could never live with her, this prove it I knew she wasn't the right one!
Generalizations	I was born to be alone We will never get along
Threats Bias	She's controlling my life, I gotta stop it She always pushes me, I must hit back
Unfavorable Comparisons	My mom is so much kinder My ex would have never done it
Malice Bias	She forgot her purse here on purpose She's obviously trying to annoy me

8. Unassertive

Overall, avoidants tend to be lower power than secure types.

Their closeness can be mistaken for power, but it's just a front.
Says psychologist Martin Seligman:

- Lack of confidence, especially in social situations
- Regard people with suspicion, guilty until proven innocent (bitter cynicism, not positive cynicism)
- Put greater emphasis on achievement than relationships
- Keep people and partners at arms' distance
- They don't disclose, they don't tell you how they feel

And they are also worst at assertiveness, an all-important communication skill.

Are Avoidants Truly More Independent?

We all have a fascination for autonomy and independence.

It feels like total unneediness and… Power!

And it's not totally untrue.

The APA Handbook of Personality and Social Psychology says that "Attachment-related avoidance is associated with a reduced desire for closeness and intimacy".

However, it seems to be at least not total unnediness.

And studies prove that avoidants aren't so independent after all.

To begin with, avoidants are as happy to be accepted by others as anyone else. And their happiness increases when they know they will be socially successful (Carvallo, 2006).
And, under highly stressful scenarios, they behave like anxious attachment style types (Levine, 2010).

On the other hand, In the case of a loss, avoidants tend to suppress or avoid attachment-related emotions. Evidence shows that in general, individuals with an avoidant attachment style adapt well to loss (Fraley & Bonanno, 2004; Mikulincer & Shaver, 2008).

I'd venture to say that avoidants have the same basic needs, but adopted an attachment that masks those needs.
So although the need is still there, they "cover it up", resulting in a strange mix of higher independence and lower intimacy, albeit still not 100% genuine.

Avoidant Attachment Examples

There are many examples of avoidant attachment in the movies. They make for a lot of excitement -to watch- and big emotional swings.

Check the article on the anxious-avoidant trap for a few more video examples on top of the ones here:

#1. Mr Big: Moving Away

Here's a typical avoidant: Mr. Big from Sex and The City.
Not exactly a great relationship, right?

We back up all our videos for Power University

What makes him avoidant?

When Carrie proposes to move to Paris, he doesn't want her to move "for him". He feels the tightening circle of responsibility closing in on him and has to break free.
The "relationship" he wants is the avoidant utopic relationship. It's a relationship where he can move any time he wants, wherever he wants, without considering the impact on the partner.

Carrie is right when she says that it is about them and not about work. She's not fully correct though in believing it's fear that prevents him from getting close.
It's not so much fear, but more of a "reverse attachment" whereby every avoidant needs to push back to preserve their space.
Avoidands will miss their partners once they have regained distance. At this point, they will seek to reel their partners back in, only to need distance later on. And there goes the carousel again.

Note:
When Mr. Big says "I don't wanna talk about this anymore", that's stonewalling behavior right there.

#2. Craving Intimacy... Only When In Need

Mr. Big again, a perfect example that avoidants also want intimacy.

But in special situations, often when they're down in the gutter and need help up.

When in need an avoidant can look like he's healed. But it might be just temporary.

Overcoming Avoidant Attachment

To have a happy relationship -and happy life-, you need to overcome the shortcomings of the avoidant attachment style.
Here are the steps:

1. Own It

First step, is to acknowledge it.

And it's already something that very few men do.
Dismissing adults identified via interview methods almost always rate themselves "secure" on attachment questionnaires (Creasey & Ladd, 2005).

1.2. Keep It! There's Nothing to Fix

Also, don't jump to the conclusion you must "fix yourself".

The author for one is an avoidant and is NOT trying to change it.

If you want to do the same, you can stop reading here.
Otherwise, keep doing.

1. Work Around The Limitation

Have you learned how the psychology of avoidance?

Good.

Once you become aware of your deactivating strategies, you must ask yourself whether or not your thoughts are real or if they are exaggerated by your avoidant tendencies.

Are the imperfections you start noticing real deal breakers or is it that you're overplaying them to distance yourself?
Mental blocks also include fantasizing about sex with others and thinking she's pathetic for being so needy.

Work around them
Once you're aware of your mental blocks, work around them.
For example, when you feel the urge to pull away, explain what's happening to your partner. Tell her you need time on your own… And that you will be back more energized to spend time together.

As a matter of fact, to help your partner understand, let them read this same article.

2. Associate Avoidance with Weakness

Knowing the science of avoidant attachment is also helpful.

And here's what the science says: avoidant attachment types also need intimacy. But they repress it subconsciously. And as we've seen studies show that when a big upset happens in the avoidant attachment type's life, they become insecure.
And that's another reason to strive for a secure attachment.

3. Drop Cool

Some avoidant attachment types think it's cool to be an avoidant because it makes them stronger.

As we've seen above, it makes you weaker. And only hurts the people around you.
Here's an example of avoidant hiding behind the mask of coolness:

Until you realize there is nothing cool in being avoidant, you will never truly emotionally mature

4. Associate A Secure Attachment to Strength

Know this:

A solid relationship with a secure emotional attachment will make you stronger and more confident.

Secure attachment types are stronger than avoidant ones, and part of it is because of the solid foundations they have with their relationship.
Instead of the quest for autonomy, look for a partner with whom to establish a secure attachment.

5. Find a Secure Partner

Secure partners have the power to make the anxious and the avoidant attachment types also more secure.
You will recognize secure types because they play little games and talk straight.

6. Drop The Idea of "The One"

Avoidant attachment types often look for mistakes in their partner as a subconscious excuse to move away. And then they tell themselves she wasn't the one.
There's no such as thing as "the one" who is perfect. Understand instead that you're an active participant in making the relationship as good as it can be.

7. Get Closer Indirectly

It's easier for avoidants to get closer if there's a shared task in between. For example, intimacy while cooking dinner and eating together is easier than sitting on a couch and hugging without doing anything.

So you can ease your way in with shared activities.

Don't Confuse Avoidant Attachment With...

The avoidant attachment is somewhat similar to an emotionally unavailable man and it's what sometimes women refer to as "an ass*ole".
But it's neither, really.

Emotionally unavailable

While emotionally unavailable is mostly neutral and cold, avoidant are capable of intimacy… Until they subconsciously block themselves. And while emotionally unavailable stays on an even keel, the avoidant goes through cycles of missing and then pushing the partner away.

As*holes

And while as*holes tend to be confident and not care about their partners, avoidants come in all shapes and sizes.

They can be confident, but also shy and un-confident. And they can also actually care about their partner.
But still unable to provide on the intimacy level of the relationship.

SUMMARY

Avoidants are uncomfortable with intimacy and constantly need to defend their space.
They subconsciously repress their needs for intimacy and they focus on they can more easily focus on the negatives of their partners.

Avoidant attachment types make for really bad relationships, especially when coupled with an anxious attachment style.
In this article, you learned what you can do to overcome the avoidant attachment style curse.

10 Steps to End Toxic Relationships You're Addicted To

- SUMMARY

Introduction: It's Not Love

First of all, if you think it's love, know that it's probably not love.

Understand that "someone you love" and "toxic relationship" is an oxymorons. Just because you have feelings for someone it doesn't mean they are justified.

But, most importantly, it's not love but your attachment system has gone awry. It's possible that you have an anxious attachment style and you cannot tolerate the distance.

If he is an abusive partner, it's also possible that it's the abuse that is keeping you hooked.
Don't worry: there is truly no shame in that and it's more common than you think.
Relationship researcher John Gottman was shocked to hear that woman after woman told him that the hottest sex they had was right after a beating.
Of course, it was not the sex that was good, it was the perverse attraction of dominance and violence.

That's fine.
But from now on, you will only accept love from someone who's able to provide a healthy relationship.

And now let's follow the steps for getting you out of this toxic relationship you're in:

1. Get leverage over yourself

Most women go back to their abusers (Buss, 2021).

That is not a mystery, unluckily.
And plenty of ink has been written on the "why" that is the case.
This article though is more about the HOW, and how to execute the breakup.

And the "how" is that while now HE has leverage on you, you need to remove his leverage, and gain your own leverage over yourself.

No statistics or moral argument will do (Becker, 1997).
Instead, you want emotional leverage. Some way of doing it is to ask yourself:

1. How would you feel if a man treated your daughter/mother / best friend the way he treats you?
2. How do you differ from your daughter/mother / best friend? Don't you deserve the same?
3. How would your daughter/mother / best friend feel if she saw your partner abusing you?
4. What kind of role model are you being for the people you care about?

The difference is that your daughter has you, but… You don't have you. If you don't get out soon, your daughter won't have you either.

2. Plan ahead of time

Don't break up with the abusive partner at a moment's notice.

The attachment will be too strong and you'll suffer more. And the risk of getting back will be too strong.
Start thinking that you will break up instead, and plan your move in advance. The more you think about the breakup, the more the relationship will become a thing of the past in your mind.

And once you start considering your relationship finished, the act of actually ending it will be much easier.

3. Keep a journal

Keep a journal.

Why?

Because studies show that partners who keep a journal break up at a higher rate than those who don't.

But we'll go one step further.

I don't want you to keep just a normal journal with ups and downs: in your chronicles, you will mostly focus on the negatives of the toxic relationship.
A journal with a bias on a partner's defects and relationship issues will do two good things:

1. will focus your mind on the negatives and
2. it will build a wall between the two of you.

The journal is your secret to keep away from your partner.
And the more secrets you have, the less connected the two of you are. Use the journal afterward as well to remind yourself why, indeed, it was a bad relationship.

4. Prepare your support network

Do you know why lots of people go back to abusive partners?

Because they don't know what else to do and where else to go!

Crazy, isn't it?

Don't fall for that: options are power.
And options will empower you to move on for good.

Build a network of friends and family that will be there for you once you end your toxic relationship. Don't underestimate this step: it's important to have someone to confide with and someone to take your mind off.

This is one of the reasons women are more socially successful than men: they are better at building support networks.

5. Stop sharing life events

Stop confiding with him, stop sharing stories about your day, and stop telling your feelings.

Why?

Because it's that sense that "our partner knows us" that keeps us longing to get back to our partners.

But the opposite is also true.
The less your partner really knows the real you, including what's going on with your life, the easier it will be to leave.

The less information you feed your toxic relationship, the easier it will be to detach yourself.

6. Do exciting things with new people

What is it that often breaks people apart?

It's moving on with our lives while our partners don't change with us.

Start doing just that!
Go skydiving, start Toastmasters, hit the gym or an oratory club. Whatever it is that you might like and your partner won't do.

The more you move ahead without your partner, the more you will get out of your toxic relationship.. Naturally.
And if it involves adrenaline, all the better: it'll make you feel alive without your partner.

> Move forward… And he'll naturally be rear-view mirror stuff

7. Lie to him

Good relationships are built on honesty.

And dying relationships are built on lies.

When you start building a wall of lies between you and him, the disconnect between you and him will grow. And the larger it grows, the farther apart you move.

There is also a psychological factor here that helps, and it's cognitive dissonance.
Since we usually lie to people we don't really care too much for, your brain will also think that you must really dislike him if he's not worthy of the truth.

8. Give less, be more egoistic

Here is another tip straight from psychology:

The more we give, the more we feel like someone must be worthy of us.

But the opposite is also true: the less you give, the less you think he is worthy.
By giving less, you also set in motion a "vicious circle". Vicious circles are how most relationships end, and once you start on… You end up right where you wanted to be.

9. Start an affair

Simple, yet so effective.

Going home after the high of an exciting affair will quickly drive a wedge between you and the toxic partner in a way that nothing else can match.

There is a caveat though.
This is only valid if you can start an affair with someone "better". Don't make the mistake of just sleeping with someone randomly. That will make you feel bad and, icing on the cake, will subconsciously tell you that your partner is not that bad after all.

But find someone more exciting, and you're golden.

10. If sex is great, get a vibrator

If sex is one of the things that keep you close to him, get a vibrator.

If you only had sex with one person so far, it's easy to forget that orgasms can be had with… Pretty much anything.

For men, pay a hooker.
Get the hottest woman you've ever had. If you're into boobs, pick one with huge boobs.
If you're into assessment, pick the finest ass you've ever seen.

11. If you're on the pill, quit it

When you quit the pill, your hormone levels change.

That makes it possible that your feelings for him will change as well.

But getting back to condoms will also help. It will give you the feeling that you two are a bit more distant.

And it will give you the sensation you two are moving apart, which is exactly what you want.
And if he gets winey: even better. The more you can draw out poor behavior from him, the more you'll be able to leave the abuser.

12. Get emotionally close to someone else

Love has a lot of overlap with emotional intimacy. It's rare that we're in love with someone without any emotional connection.

Thus, if you can get emotionally close to someone else, then getting out of your toxic relationship will happen naturally.

Some smart colleague, someone in your same situation or, better of all, someone from your new activities is perfect.

Should You End a Toxic Relationship?

Well, if it's truly toxic, then yes.

If you are not yet sure, here are a few resources for you:

- Avoidant and anxious attachments
- Signs of abusive relationships
- Jealous boyfriend or paranoid boyfriend?
- Signs you're dating a sociopath

There is a lot more, but those will help you get started.

Most of all, check this article that will help you think through your relationship and come to a decision:

SUMMARY

Toxic relationships often have a pattern of fighting and making up that's addictive.

That's fine, it's normal, don't beat yourself up over it.

The secret sauce is to start thinking you will end it beforehand. That will make your partner more and more alien to you. And in the meanwhile, you will start building a life outside your relationship. And will drive a natural wedge between you two.

Then add the other steps in here and getting out of the toxic relationship will be a breeze of pleasure.

The 4 Horsemen of Relationship Apocalypse (And How to Stop Them)

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse is a concept developed by psychologist John Gottman to describe four specific negative behaviors that can undermine relationships.

Based on decades of observational research at the University of Washington's "Love Lab," Gottman found that when these behaviors become a regular pattern, they predict relationship breakdown with over 90% accuracy. That's why understanding and fixing them is one of the most powerful moves you can make in your relationship.

This article gives you a quick but actionable breakdown of what the four horsemen are, how they show up in daily life, and what you can do to stop them from ruining your connection.

What Are the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse?

These four destructive behaviors: Criticism, Defensiveness, Contempt, and Stonewalling, are what Gottman calls the "Four Horsemen of the Relationship Apocalypse."

As an overview:

- Criticism and contempt suggest a lack of basic interpersonal respect.
- Defensiveness may point to ego fragility, and potential narcissism
- Stonewalling reflects a lack of interpersonal skills

Below is a practical overview of each, with real-life examples and fast antidotes. If you want to go deeper, follow the internal links to full guides for each issue.

#1. Criticism

Criticism happens when you attack your partner's personality or character, instead of focusing on a specific behavior.

Unlike a complaint ("I feel ignored when you don't text back"), criticism makes sweeping judgments like:

> "You only think about yourself. You're so selfish."

It shifts the focus from an action that can be addressed to who your partner is, making them feel defective or attacked. Over time, repeated criticism erodes intimacy and trust.

Antidote to Criticism

Use "I" statements that express your feelings without blaming, and focus on specific behaviors instead of general character judgments.

Example*: "I felt hurt when you didn't ask me about my day. I really value being checked in on."*

Partners on the receiving end of criticism must:

- Analyze your behavior: are you generally behaving in a respect-worthy fashion?
- Analyze the criticism: is it fair?
- Analyze the criticism delivery: is it framed respectfully, or as an attack?

If you're on the receiving end of unfair, aggressive, or demeaning criticism, you must enforce boundaries of mutual respect.

Read more about criticism here.

#2. Defensiveness

Defensiveness is a way of warding off a perceived attack, but it often ends up blocking empathy and resolution.

Partners become defensive when they feel accused, attacked, or unfairly blamed. Instead of listening or trying to understand, they deflect, deny, or counterattack—often without realizing it.

This is especially common in people with a fixed mindset or a fragile ego.

Unfortunately, defensiveness communicates to your partner that their feelings don't matter—and worse, it can make them feel alone or even crazy for bringing something up.

Example from the movie "Blue Valentine":

> Both: (attack and defend, without ever trying to understand each other)

Antidote to Defensiveness

Instead of defending or blaming, pause and try to hear the deeper concern. Take responsibility, at least partially, when it's fair to do so.

Example: 'I see why that upset you. I wasn't thinking clearly, and I get how that came off'.

Read more about defensiveness here.

#3. Contempt

Contempt is the most dangerous of the four. It goes beyond criticism and involves mocking, sneering, sarcasm, name-calling, or body language that signals superiority.

Contempt is not just hurtful—it's toxic. It often reflects deep-seated resentment and a lack of respect. Gottman found it to be the strongest predictor of divorce.

Example*:*

Contempt can be expressed with facial expressions or with mean comments that sub-communicate disgust, superiority, or lack of respect

Antidote to Contempt

The antidote to contempt is building a culture of respect and appreciation. Start by noticing the things your partner does well, and say them out loud.

Since contempt often stems from unresolved resentment or anger, work on emotional regulation, and if needed, take space before speaking.

For partners who are on the receiving end of contempt, you must earn your partner's respect first, and then call out the poor behavior.

Read more about contempt here.

#4. Stonewalling

Stonewalling is when one partner shuts down and withdraws from interaction instead of staying engaged.

This might look like silent treatment, walking away, or simply going emotionally blank during a conflict. It's common when someone feels overwhelmed or overstimulated—but the impact is disconnection and frustration.

In heterosexual couples, it's statistically more common for men to stonewall, and for women to feel emotionally abandoned when it happens.

Example from "Crazy, Stupid, Love":

> Her: (talks about the betrayal)
> Him: (doesn't reply, and jumps out of the car)

Antidote to Stonewalling

Learn to recognize when you're emotionally flooded, and take a short break (20+ minutes) to calm down. But crucially, return to the conversation when you're ready.

Read more about stonewalling here.

Summary

The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse are powerful predictors of relationship breakdown. Fortunately, they're also reversible with awareness and effort.

Men must learn to:

- Earn respect from their partners, enforce boundaries, and give respect back
- Develop an antifragile ego, move past 'thin-skinned narcissism', strengthen your mind and self-esteem, and learn not to take things too personally
- Learn to face issues head-on, without withdrawing

If you notice any of these patterns in your relationship, that's not a reason to panic, but an opportunity to change course.

Use the antidotes, behave like a high-power man who respects her partner, and you may have a healthy, long-lasting relationship.

Anxious Attachment Style? This Is How You Should Date

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Dating for individuals with an anxious attachment style can be tricky.

And if you follow the standard women dating literature, chances are that you are setting yourself up for pain and failure.

But don't worry, by the end of this article, you will know how you can date well as an anxious person.

Note:
I will write this article from the woman's perspective because statistically it's more likely you're a woman. But this article applies to both genders.

Anxious Dating Needs

In short, this is what an anxious need from dating:

> They need intimacy but are afraid of showing their need for intmacy while at the same fearing that their partner does not want them.

With this premise, the dating literature is not helpful for anxious daters.
As a matter of fact, the common dating advice is dangeorus for anxious types.

If you have been reading any dating books for women, you will realize that most of the most popular ones can be boiled down to very few tenets they all repeat:

1. Show less interest than he does
2. Be unavailable
3. Pretend you don't want a relationship

Amir Levine in his seminal book on attachment styles though righteously points out that's a very bad strategy for anyone with an anxious attachment style.

Indeed, you should do the opposite of what the dating literature recommends.

Why Anxious Should Be Straightforward

Scarcity is a known principle that makes us want more of whatever is scarce (Cialdini).
So, in principle, it also works in dating (but with important exceptions).

However, it doesn't work too well for the anxious attachment style for the following reasons:

1. Common dating advice attracts avoidant partners

When you act like you don't want and don't need intimacy, guess who will be comfortable with you?

Of course you will attract partners who want distance

It's much better instead to show your true colors early on.

When you demand for the intimacy you need right from the beginning it's more likely you will find out early if the person you are dating can accommodate you or not.

You want to weed out as soon as possible emotionally unavailable men and avoidant men (with which you would form the terrible anxious avoidant trap).

- Find out here the signs of an avoidant

2. When you feign disinterest he decides the level of intimacy (without you having a say)

Guess what happens when you don't demand what you need?

The other party decides it for you.

The common dating advice is to never show interest so that he will show lots of interest, chase you and seek more intimacy with you.

That might "work", sometimes, if you meet a guy who chases a lot and wants to see you a lot.

But there is a huge problem with that.

And the problem is that you never get to know the real him, and you risk wasting a lot of time with someone who is not a good fit.

Worst of all, if you meet an avoidant, then you are allowing him to get his cake and eat it too.
Basically, he can enjoy intimacy when together and then drop off the radar for as long as he wants.

What's the alternative?

The alternative is that you date more honestly and more respectfully of you needs. Ask and demand how much you expect of him, so that you can quickly assess if you are compatible.

3. Fake beginnings mean future troubles

Dating is a bit like weighing each other up at the beginning.

And assessing for compatibility.

It's normal everyone tries to be in their best behavior.
But if being on your best behavior means behaving the opposite of who you are and what you need… Then it's more likely you will end up in all the wrong relationships.

By all means, show yourself at your best because your partner does the same.
But don't behave the opposite of what you want and need. If you have an anxious attachment style, pretending that you don't care is self-defeating.

I can guarantee you that playing the "feigning disinterest game" is self-defeating from personal experience.
One of my girlfriend was hiding her avoidant personality.
It was awesome in the beginning.
She fell in love, I fell in love… And then the train-wreck. Her demands were too much for me. She was an anxious, I was an avoidant.

Had she been honest from the start we'd have saved time and hearts.

3. Fakeness smells

When you act, you act.

And you can only act for so much and so long before cracks will start to appear. I can tell you as much as an avoidant myself and I could often see the games sometimes girls were playing.

From the random phone call of her waiting for the bus that, guess what, stops in front of my place to the text message complaining how busy she is to that forced reminder that "no, she doesn't think of me that often".
Guys with a bit of experience can see through that.

4. Lower self esteem

When we act contrary to our feelings and value, our self esteem tanks (read ego and self esteem). And you don't want that.
Low self esteem is also the breeding ground for abusive relationships.

Effective Dating For Anxious Types

And here's how an anxious attachment style can get better at dating.

1. Accept Your Needs

In 7 biggest mistakes women do in early dating I mentioned an ex girlfriend of mine who always fought her needs for intimacy trying to appear stronger.

But that's not strong, that's weak.

Most anxious attachment style types indeed often feel the pressure of society -and feminism- on being more independent-.
But why should you listen to what others tell you to value?

But most importantly, it's only by getting what you need that you can grow more emotionally stable.
Studies indeed show that when an anxious meets a secure partner who can provide reassurance, they become less anxious.

Yes you read that right.
The best way to cure anxious attachment is by getting intimacy. Not by trying to repress it.

There is a partner out there who enjoys exactly the same things. No need to change yourself (when it's not needed).

2. Show Your True Colors

Once you accept yourself, it's time to also show your true self.

As usual, the virtue is often in the middle.

If you feel you need to hug someone tight the very first time you meet them, well… That you might want to resist.
And save it for at least until the first date has been going on for a few hours :).

3. Express your needs

If you've been dating for a while and need the relationship to move to the next gear, whatever that means for you, state it.
As Steve Harvey says, demands are often a sign of high quality.

4. Find a Secure Partner

Anxious partners become less anxious when they date a secure partner.
Try to date a secure partner.

SUMMARY

Understanding your needs and attachment style is the very first step to dating well as an anxious.

The anxious attachment style is the one that has to be more careful when it comes to dating as it's the style with the biggest needs.

As a man recovering from an avoidant attachment I can tell you that too many women wasted time and heartache on me.
And they'd avoided that with a more direct communication and by showing their true selves earlier.

What Is Anxious Attachment

Individuals with an anxious attachment style crave and need intimacy from, but is fearful (anxious) that they may lose their partner, or never be loved back.

Sometimes also referred to as “anxious-ambivalent”, it is one of four possible attachment styles.

Attachment styles refer to patterns of interpersonal relationships, and they are most salient and most visible in romantic and intimate relationships.

Attachment Systems Gone Awry

People with an anxious attachment style have a highly sensitive and often active attachment system.

The attachment system is a natural, inborn mechanism to track the availability of our attachment figures (that would be: mothers for children and romantic partners for adults).

That means that any slight changes in the availability of the attachment figure -mother or boyfriend- make the anxious type feel threatened.
And she will not calm down until she gets close to his partner again or until the partner confirms his availability.

See a good example from the movie “La Dolce Vita”:

Why It Evolved

Why does the anxious even exist, if it seems so poor?

An evolutionary perspective posits that, to evolve, it had to work in at least some environments.

In the Oxford Handbook of Evo Psych and Relationships the authors suggest the anxious clings to its partner to maximize investment, and keep the commitment:

> attachment anxiety is assumed to be associated with physiological arousal and hyperactivating behaviors, designed to pressure a romantic partner to give more attention and support.

Feeney and Karantzas (2017) call it an egoistic approach that neglects the partner’s needs to fulfil one’s own needs and desires.

Traits And Behaviors

Thoughts	Behavior
Worshiping • Remembering only good qualities • Putting partner on a pedestal	Constant Contact • Calling and texting several times a day • Waiting with bated breath for his text • Moving around their house or workplace

Emotional Over-investment • Constantly thinking about him • Difficulty concentrating on other tasks	Attention Seeking • Threatening to break up • Tell him she'd be better off without him
Low Self Esteem • Fear you'll never meet someone new • "Maybe he will change… "	Hostility • Arguments out of nothing • Meanness & contempt (you'll later regret)
Anxiety & Pain • Feeling calm only in his presence • Discord causes major grief	Manipulations • Games such as: faking busy, not texting back, making him jealous • Keeping scores, waiting for him to make up, attacking the partner when he doesn't

Anxious attachment is also correlated with:

- Rush disclosure to speed up emotional intimacy, which often backfires (Mikulincer & Nachshon, 1991)
- Devalue themselves to others
- Vulnerable narcissism (Besser & Priel, 2009)
- Anticipate rejection so either don't approach, or fail to approach effectively (Mikulincer & Shaver, 2006)
- Generally anxious: in therapy, preoccupied adults demand extra appointments, contact therapists between sessions, and demand more support, yet seem unwilling to make progress

It's rarer, but sometimes the anxious attachment style pulls away instead of moving closer.
I give a few examples of pulling away in my article on the biggest mistakes women do in dating.

Anxious Attachment Styles by Gender

Studies seem to suggest there are more women with an anxious attachment style than men.

And there are more avoidant men, which means anxious women should be very watchful not to end up with avoidant men.

How Anxious Become Anxious

The current literature agrees that our attachment is part of genes, past life experiences, and part parental behavior.

In the case of the anxious attachment, it's possible that we had a distant parent who didn't soothe us enough.
That made us slightly "emotionally scarred", and we seek constant reassurance that yes, our lovely (mother/partner) is still there.

Dr. Karyl McBride in Will I Ever Be Good Enough says that narcissistic mothers are especially distant and make their children particularly insecure when it comes to receiving love.
Narcissistic mothers are more likely to raise anxious children, says McBridge offering this popular movie scene as an example.

However, other studies point out that it depends on what type of narcissism we're referring to. Write Spivak et al in the Handbook of The Psychology of Narcissism:

> Otway and Vignoles (2006) found grandiose narcissism to be associated with recollections of parents as both cold and excessively admiring; whereas vulnerable narcissism was found to be associated with anxious attachment*. In line with these findings, Young, Klosko, and Weishaar (2003) described grandiose narcissists as suffering from difficulties experiencing love or being loved by others*

Drawbacks of Being Anxious

Martin Seligman says in Authentic Happiness (2002) that anxious types:

- Feel they have little control over their lives
- Find others difficult to predict
- Cling to others and always fear rejection
- Flaunt their anger and distress

They also tend to have poorer communication skills and come across as lower-power and more submissive.
See the chart:

	Anxious	Avoidant	Secure
Traits	- Clings to relationship - Anxious during separation - Fearful of abandonment - Overwhelmed by emotions - Mixes thoughts and feeling	- Finds relationships too scary - Uncomfortable being emotionally close - Interacts at a surface level - Unaware of thoughts & feelings	- Can form relationships, but also comfortable alone - Can manage emotions - Can separate thoughts and feelings
Differentiation	Low	Low	High
Attitude	Hesitant	Guarded	Confident
Barriers to Assertiveness	- Afraid to speak up for fear of creating distance or rejection - Fear of overwhelming others - Inability to identify and tune in to emotions - Make excuses for people's patterns of boundary-crossing (especially once the attachment is already "formed")	- Detached from own emotions, especially during conflict or stress - Prevents conflicts (or avoids) - Uses distancing emotions (for fear of getting "too close") - Confuses fair standing up for oneself as rudeness - Confuses partners' search for fair intimacy as crossing his boundaries - "lets things go" even when it bothers or hurt him	- May have difficulty identifying emotions - May have difficulty communicating emotions - May lack confidence to be assertive or speak directly
Goals	Attachment's self awareness - Acknowledge value of close relationships & interdependence - Connect to emotions - Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants - Develop communication skills	Attachment's self awareness - Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants - Develop emotional management strategies - Develop communication skills	Attachment's self awareness - Develop emotional vocabulary - Develop and/or solidify assertiveness skills

Anxious Attachment In Relationships

Shirley Glass in Not Just Friends says that, in her experience, anxious types tend to marry secure attachment types.

This is compatible with what Harvile Hendrix says in Getting The Love You Want, such as that people go after the feeling of "wholeness" and get what they miss.

However, says Glass, they tend to replicate the maternal avoidant pattern when (and if) they look for an affair partner.
The anxious type then is likely to develop an emotional bond while the avoidant keeps the distance.

Anxious Attachment With Avoidant Attachment

Amir Levine in Attached says that anxious attachment types often end up with avoidant attachment types.

In my experience, I have often seen anxious together with avoidants as Amir Levin says.
And the numbers that Levine uses to back his theory also make sense to me.

When the anxious type is removed from their affection, they activate their attachment system. The attachment system monitors the distance from the loved partner, and when he is not present, it starts going in alarm mode.

That's why anxious types get very emotional and fearful when their partner is far away.
They soothe themselves; the anxious will then seek to re-establish a connection with their partner.

But when the partner is an avoidant, their attachment system is constantly activated, and the anxious will experience huge emotional roller coasters.
Now the bad news is that many anxious types mistake the emotional roller coaster for love.

If you are an anxious type and learn one single thing from this article is this: an emotional roller coaster is not love.

Many people indeed when they say that "women love as*holes" often actually mistake bundling together in the as*holes term avoidant types.
But more than as*holes women fall for the avoidants who activate their attachment systems.

Anxious Attachment With Secure Attachment

The anxious type is best served in a relationship with a secure attachment.

Secure types are not afraid of intimacy, they play less games and are happier to soothe you.

Anxious Attachment	Secure Attachment
Needs intimacy and closeness	Comfortable with intimacy
Overly sensitive to any possible sign of rejection	Consistent with their messages, don't push you away
Find it difficult to speak their mind and use protest behavior instead to communicate their needs	Considerate of your well being and it's possible you will learn a more direct and open style of communication with them
Need to be reassured	Happy to provide reassurance, often even early on
Need to know where you are standing in the relationship	Are happy to label the relationship, to commit, to make it official and to let you know where they stand

Overcoming The Anxious Attachment Style

Well, maybe "overcome" is not the right word.

There is nothing inherently wrong with being anxious.
But it definitely makes for sub-optimal relationships.

And since anxious types tend to be unhappy in relationships, it's best if you can move past its limitation and become more secure.
The following steps will help you on the way:

1. Become Aware

The very first step is awareness.

The more you know your limitations, the more you can fix them or work around them.

2. Be Selective In Your Dating

Says The APA Handbook of Personality and Social Psychology relationship volume:

> such individuals appear to be relatively unselective in initial attraction contexts

That's a risk because anxious must be even more selective.

So make sure you don't jump on the first available person just because, well… They're there.

3. Show Your True Self

Anxious tend to be more afraid their partner will not return their love.

And they tend to buy into the idea they need to feign disinterest and play games to get the love they want (as peddled by many dating books for women).
And while that can be helpful sometimes (but not always!), that's a big mistake for anxious attachment types.
Remember this: to get what you want, you first need to be who you really are.

Read this more on:

- Anxious attachment style dating.

4. Learn to use Direct Communication

Direct communication means asking for what you want and what you need.

Use direct communication early, so you can weed out bad partners and you can keep having your needs met in the relationship.

Every time you find yourself starting a fight to get an emotional connection, remember to state you would love -or you need- to be close.

5. Differentiate Love From Roller Coaster

Many anxiety attachment types equate love with the heightened feelings of their activated attachment systems.
And the push and pull of the anxious-avoidant relationship further hook them in.
But that's not love. That's a toxic relationship. Don't fall for the dynamics of over-investing in partners who don't invest.

6. Pick Partners Based on Intimacy

Pick your partner based on how much he can satisfy your intimacy levels. Notice if he responds to your appeal if he gets to the bottom of it, and if he tries to satisfy your needs.

7. Find a Secure Partner

Studies show that an anxious partner in a relationship with a secure partner becomes more secure.

So drop the crazy and addictive antics of the anxious-avoidant relationship then and settle down with a secure partner.
Secure partners communicate directly and openly, don't play games, and don't shy away from intimacy.

Anxious Attachment Arguments

Anxious relationships tend to fall a predictable pattern.

From the outside, they can seem neurotic, and wild and, often, resemble borderline personality disorder, with which sometimes they can overlap.

#1. Anxious Creates Arguments

Anxious attachment does not go for direct communication.

Instead, they prefer creating arguments as a cover-up for the intimacy they crave.
Needless to say, that does not work.

#2. Anxious Feels Guilty

After the argument, the anxious partner feels terrible and seeks to mend the relationship.

#3. Anxious Seeks Contact Again

The anxious partner does not get what they want with the fight, and their need for closeness, intimacy, and love only grows larger.

So they seek contact again.

But again direct communication rarely takes place, and the anxious rarely says “I’m sorry” and never articulates the real reasons for their bad behavior.

#4. Reconciliation

It takes courage and vulnerability to make the first step toward reconciliation, which might lead the fight to drag on longer than it needs to.

From a power dynamics perspective, the anxious partner needs contact more than her partner does, which moves the balance of power on the partner’s side.

#5. Rinse, Repeat

When they finally make good again, it’s only a brief pause before the cycle begins again.

SUMMARY

An anxious attachment style can be problematic in relationships.

But you still have the opportunity to experience a good relationship.

You have some work to do, and find the right partner.

This article gives you a deeper understanding of what anxious attachment means for you, and what you can do to address it.

9 Easy Signs of Avoidant Attachment Style (From of An Avoidant)

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Are you trying to recognize if your partner or the person you are dating is an avoidant?

Well, it's not always easy to guess.

But these proven signs of avoidant attachment will help you come up with a fairly reliable self-diagnosis.

Why Should You Want to Spot Avoidants?

It's a fair question:

Why should you even worry about it?

An obvious reason is that avoidant attachment types don't make for great intimate partners.
So if you care about having a great relationship -and you probably should- and if you care about a supportive and intimate environment, then you should also care about spotting avoidant types.

Spotting an avoidant attachment becomes even more important if you are an anxious attachment type since we have seen that anxious and avoidant form a toxic relationships together

Signs of Avoidant Attachment Style

These are the cues to recognize an avoidant attachment type early on:

1. Sends Mixed Signals

- Talks about moving forward, but somehow it never happens or he gets cold feet
- Sometimes he's very effusive, some other times very distant
- Alternates periods of lots of calls and attention with periods of no contact

2. Doesn't Hold Hands

Or:

- You had to do it first
- You have to ask
- You have to remind
- Doesn't want to do it publicly / with friends around

The same goes for other intimacy-related behavior.

Says The APA Handbook of Personality and Social Psychology relationship volume:

> attachment-related avoidance is negatively associated with the desire to engage in intimate sexual behaviors such as holding hands, mutual gazing, and cuddling (Fraley, Davis, & Shaver, 1998)

My exes would have been better off if they had read this signal as the warning signal it is.

3. Devalues You

This is the dark side of the avoidants.
Not every avoidant has it, but it's another sign to watch out for (and a sign to watch out for with anyone, really).

Some of the signs:

- Makes fun of your body or your abilities
- Undermines you in front of others
- Jokes about himself and other women
- Talks about you being so into him
- Suggests you are overreacting, too needy, or too sensitive

- He disregards your emotional needs

Also read how to make him respect you more, an article heavy on games but which can be helpful to understand the most Machiavellian types.

4. Values of Independence

Avoidants place independence and, most of all, their own independence, above intimacy.

Many avoidants also value independence as a strong personality trait because they mistake independence for strength (in truth, as Levine explains, the opposite is true: strong relationships and strengthen intimate bonds make people stronger and mentally healthier).

Some of the signs:

- Encourages you to be more independent
- Looks down on what he calls "neediness"
- Has times of the day when it's best to call and other times when not to call

5. Keeps Ex-Partners (and you) Away

You can recognize avoidants because of their refusal to fully commit.

The most obvious signs are:

- His past relationships are short-lived
- He had a long relationship, but never moved in
- His relationships tanked once they moved in
- He moves often
- Goes on holidays alone
- Prefers not sharing a bed
- Not taking your hand on his own initiative when walking
- You rarely know clearly when you're going to meet again

Here is an example from Terms of Endearment:

6. Keeps Strong Boundaries

Avoidant types need their space and, when you cross them, they become passive-aggressive or aggressive (and, more rarely, assertive).

Here are signs of avoidant boundaries:

- "my things", "your things"
- Wants to keep his family, friends, colleagues, and partner as separate entities
- Has a strong preference for either his place or your place

7. Has an Unrealistic View of Relationships

This one might seem counterintuitive.
But avoidants can sometimes seem romantic. They believe in the perfect partner, in "the one" and they don't settle because, well… "it's not perfect".

The search for “the one” might be an unconscious mechanism to avoid settling down and getting intimately close to someone.

- Searches for “the one”
- Says arguments shouldn’t happen in perfect relationships
- Idealizes past relationships
- Has a preference for specific types of partners (often not easy to find)

8. He Is Mistrustful

Avoidants are afraid of getting close.

They tend to think that getting close will diminish their power, or that it will make them weak and prone to manipulation.

- Insists on prenups or on not marrying to avoid being taken advantage of
- Believes partners are out to limit his freedom
- Thinks that women act nice… Until marriage, then they change

9. Does Not Communicate His Intentions Clearly

Secure people know what they want: a strong and happy relationship. And, with time, they are not afraid of admitting so.

But avoidants never seem to move forward. And when you try to move forward or have “the conversation”, they will seem elusive and noncommittal.

Some of the signs:

- You are not sure where the relationship is going
- He leaves things murky and unclear
- Never says “I love you”
- Talks about possible big changes (relocating, taking a year gap) without consideration of what that means for you

10. Difficulty Discussing Feelings & Intimacy

- He shies away from discussion on feelings, the relationship, and the two of you
- Makes you feel uncomfortable to bring up topics about the two of you
- When you bring up a hot relationship topic, he somehow avoids it
- He just doesn’t seem to get what your needs are
- He stonewalls or leaves during arguments
- Prefers facts over feelings

11. Uneasiness With Your Families, Friends

The avoidant partner will be uneasy around your family and close friends because that’s when he fears things are getting too close.

He might want to have you a bit closer, but getting to know the in-laws and your circle might be definitely too much for him.
And of course, he might be afraid that “things are getting too serious”.

Jack Nicholson wants to be an outsider. Because he is not comfortable with being part of the family. Too much intimacy and “obligation” for him.
He needs his space.

How to Test For Avoidant Attachment

What if you could not just passively look for the avoidant signs but actively test for them?

Well, you can, and I recommend you do it early before you find yourself mired in a years-long relationship and realize that you are not happy and can never be happy.

Here are two ideas for you:

- Leave on purpose something at his place early in the relationship

How does he react? Is he annoyed by it?

- Do call him whenever you need him – even if it’s early

Why would you hold back? Because women dating books tell you to do so? That might not be a good idea. You can fake disinterest early, but you only increase the chances of ending up with an avoidant and being very unhappy later on.
better finding out early!
This is something that Amir Levine, author of Attached also recommends.

What to Do If He’s Avoidant

Now the difficult question.

What should you do if you realize he’s an avoidant?

Well, people can change.
But that doesn’t mean they want to change or that they can change easily.
As a matter of fact, change is rare and it might be better for you to base your decision on the fact that he won’t change.
I offer relationship coaching, and of all the anxious-avoidant I have coached not a single one managed to fix their intimacy issues.

Still, I cannot answer that question for you while writing here. You have to decide that.
I can point you to a few more helpful articles:

- How the anxious-avoidant relationship looks like
- How to decide when to breakup

SUMMARY

Spotting an avoidant attachment style is very important to understand how your relationship will look like. And with an avoidant, that means it’s low on intimacy.
Once you know that, it’s up to you to decide whether you’re OK with it or not.

Getting the Love You Want Review: Interesting Speculation, But Little Evidence

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Getting the Love You Want is a relationship advice book that focuses on how childhood wounds influence our relationships. It has lots of practical exercises to heal childhood wounds and improve our relationships.

TPM Scientific Check: Unproven hypotheses. Men better include agency alongside communion
This book prioritizes communion over agency, which can backfire for men. It presents a popular therapy-based model of relationships. However, it relies heavily on clinical observations and speculative theories, with limited empirical backing.
While some insights may be useful, readers should prioritize evidence-based frameworks such as evolutionary psychology, social exchange theory, and power dynamics. Men specifically should prioritize self-sufficiency to maintain long-term attraction.

Overview

- We have wounded children looking for salvation
  - We look for partners with the same traits as our parents
  - We appreciate partners with complementary traits to feel whole again
- We can consciously fix our childhood traumas with our partners
  - Understand first our wounds
  - Share them in an atmosphere of safety and trust
  - Focus on our partner's needs to help them heal

Notes

Above everything, we seek connection, says Harville Hendrix.

And what brings most couples to therapy is a lack of connection between them and the world around them. Their relationships are more of a “me VS you” than “us” (also read: how to fix combative relationships).
And the reason why they fail at connecting, says the author, is because of their childhood. Children need an attuned parent.

Attuned Parenting

Children need a caregiver who is present both physically and emotionally. It’s a caregiver who soothes you and takes care of you. An attuned parent also encourages the baby to express all emotions by accepting them.

> “are you angry, do you want to stop playing”?
> “happy baby, you are such a happy baby”

Attuned parents raise children who are more likely to create solid and satisfying relationships as adults. They are not attracted to people who abuse them and attract good mates with ease because they have a positive self-image (read how low self-esteem gives you abusive relationships).

My note:
Harville is basically describing a secure attachment type.

When Children Experience Rapture

The rapture children experience and that which scars them as adults are:

1. Neglect (not attending to our needs)
2. Intrusion (meeting their own needs through us)

The author says most children suffer both wounds as many families tend to have a neglecting parent and an intrusive one.

Fixing Child Wounds (& Relationships)

By connecting with our partners deeply we fix our children’s wounds heal. It’s because our unconscious mind doesn’t differentiate between the present and the past.
Hence building a strong connection with our partners both improves our relationships and fixes our old wounds.

Important note: you cannot connect if there’s lots of negativity in the relationships (also read the four Horsemen that destroy relationships).

The 5 Secrets of Great Relationships

Hendrix says that if he were to take all the insights he accumulated over thirty years and sum them up, it would be this:

1. Accept that your partner is not you
2. Be an advocate of your partner’s uniqueness
3. Make your relationship a holy space removing all negativity
4. Respect your partner’s boundaries
5. Practice the Imago Dialogue (mirroring, validating, and empathizing, below)

This is the author explaining Imago:

Attraction Models

The author explains why we are attracted to certain people and summarizes the theories.

Biological Theory

We pick mates that enhance the chances of offspring survival. Men go for beauty and fertility (young age) and women go for alpha qualities (also read The Selfish Gene and The Moral Animal).

Exchange Theory

Social psychology postulates we pick mates that are more or less our equal (also read The Social Exchange Rule).

That much is true and has been shown in multiple studies.

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

Persona Theory

This refers to how a potential mate enhances our own self-esteem, and that we tend to pick mates who make us look good (also read how to have perennial high self-esteem).

Harville says there is some truth in this theory.

The Unconscious Drives Us Back to The Caregiver

The theory Harville Hendrix add is that of the unconscious mind pulling us towards mates that resemble our caregivers. It's something he sees over and over in therapy.

Why We Look for Our Parents

The author says that we seek mates who are similar to our caregivers to heal child wounds.

Our old brains believe we have finally found the ideal candidate to make up for the psychological damage of our childhood.
Indeed we look both for positive and negative traits from our parents, but the negative traits are far more influential.

Push or Pull & Attachment Theory

Parents who push children away raise children with an insatiable need for closeness (anxious), and parents who smother their children and never let them explore raise children who crave personal space (avoidants).

My Note: the theory makes sense… In theory. I am an avoidant and my parents gave me all the freedom in the world.

Feeling Rejected Scar Children

Children will invariably get the message that some of their behavior is not OK, which makes them feel like they are not accepted as a whole.

The parts that are not accepted become our "lost selves".
And we often project the traits of our lost self that we denied into our partner. For example, we might project our repressed anger onto our partner and feel that they are angry persons.

The author says the mistake many parents do is to ignore or disapprove of a baby's feelings.
He proposes instead that a parent always validates the child's feelings, even when they disagree. For example, they could say:

> Parent: "I can see you are mad, and you don't want to do what I ask. But I'm the parent and you need to do what I say".

Feeling Whole

To feel whole again we often look for complementary traits in our mates.

The Power Struggle of Dating

At a certain point, romantic love ends and the power struggle begins.

The author says that once the relationship is secure a switch happens and we activate all the latent infantile wounds. We find that those complementary personality traits annoy us, and the traits of our lost self that we longed for now wound us. The same way our parents hurt us when they neglected or repressed us.

Only a minority of couples manage to overcome the power struggle phase. The author says that the secret is to satisfy each other's childhood longings.

Conscious Partnership To Fix Each Other

The conscious partnership is all about fixing each other's problems.
The book has a lot of exercises. If you feel this is an issue you have in your relationship, then I recommend you grab a copy.
I particularly liked a central tenet, which is that to be loved, we must first love.

> To be loved, we must first love

Changing the approach to criticism

The author proposes a different approach to criticism in relationships.

Criticism indeed often tells as much about the criticized partner as it says about ourselves, which is what we should explore more.
Here is how to go about criticism:

1. Accept that the criticism you receive from your partner has some basis in reality
2. Much of the criticism of your partner is because of our own unmet (childhood) needs
3. Sometimes we criticize our partner for what we lack ourselves
4. Our criticism might come from our lost self and a wish to be more like what we criticize in our partner

[image]

CONS

Little Evidence Backing The Psychoanalytic Approach

The book is very 'Freudian', and one may argue that Freud was a genius.

But Freud also jumped to many unscientific conclusions that proved to be wrong.
And I see the same tendencies in "Getting The Love You Want".

For example, the author says that we look for complementary traits in our partners so that we can feel whole again.
That could be the case.

But what if we want complementary traits because of the imprinting from our parents, as some theories suggest?

Or what if we look for similarities because we like and feel comfortable with what's familiar?

All these theories seem, to me, more plausible than this "whole" theory.

Evolution & Power Dynamics Matter, But Aren't Here

Childhood is important but it's not everything. And probably not even the most important element.

Mate value, sexual market dynamics, and availability of options often matter far more for who we pursue, fall in love with, and end up with.

Do you think that if a guy has a shot with an attractive woman who is exactly his type, higher mate value, and he has no other option, he will not pursue her because she's not exactly like her mother?
Please..

Drawing principles from therapy clients is textboot biased sample

I'm not convinced that you can create a comprehensive theory by looking at a therapist's experience alone.

First, there is the issue of how the case studies were captured and recorded. Second, how large was that sample? And third, there is self-selection bias. People who go to therapy are inherently self-selecting, and that's a well-known sampling bias.

Confusing attachment style denomination

Hendrix ends up talking of avoidant, anxious, and secure attachment types quite a bit but never mentions the theory. And calls them in different ways such as "fusers" and "isolators".

I found that strange because this book is basically an explanation of how attachment styles develop.

Review

Getting the Love You Want is an interesting book with some potentially valid insights and exercises to help couples, but with important limitations.

It's not a book for everyone, possibly not for most, and most likely not for healthy and securely attached couples who didn't have childhood issues.

It's also not perfectly aligned with The Power Moves and it seems to speak more to a feminine quest for relationships as temples, rather than a masculine drive to achieve goals.

Secure Attachment Style: Overview & Examples

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Secure attachment is one type of attachment style characterized by self-reliance, emotional maturity, and honest communication.

This article explains what a secure attachment style, is and how you can get one.

- SUMMARY

What is Secure Attachment

Secure attachment types enjoy intimacy and are comfortable with it.

They are comfortable in asking for intimacy, giving intimacy, and talking about intimacy.
They are emotionally centered and tend to trust their partners and their partner's love without the need for continuous confirmation.

When secure people like you, they show you so and they are not afraid of saying it.
Secure types also tend to provide more emotional and practical support, without withdrawing or playing any games.

When secure people date, they look for consistency and reciprocal investment. That means that they give, but they also expect to get back.
That's the proper stance of an enlightened collaborator, the approach most conducive to social -and life- success. They despise games and don't make it a big issue to screen out people that don't respond to them -and that's one of the reasons why I advise that playing nasty dating games backfires more often than not-.

Are secure types supermen?

No, they're not supermen, but they do have a higher level of emotional intelligence compared to other attachment styles, are better at understanding their partners and they make, on average, better relationships.

Luckily, this is something you can develop -this is what this website is all about after all-.

Here is a quick overview of what secure types are like:

Mindsets	Explanations
No need for games	Being close is what a relationship is about. I want it and my partner wants it too. And if not, I need someone else. No need for games.
Comfortable with intimacy	I'm not afraid of being hurt -it sucks but I'd get over it- and I don't need to run away. So I can fully enjoy intimacy.
Treat partners well	My partner is one of the persons closest to me. I can count on them and they can count of me. Of course I treat them well
Give and take	I give in my relationship, and I expect the same from my partner. Relationship is about mutual support. If they can't do that, they go.
Take responsibility	A relationship is built by two individuals. So, at the very least I control half of it. And I take responsibility for how my partner feels.
Emotional intelligence	I know that behind a partner's criticism sometimes there's fear, worry or anxiety. I don't take it personally but help them express it.

Secure Attachment in Relationships

In a relationship the secure types tend to be:

- Very good at conflict management: they don't feed the need to act defensively or counterattack their partners
- Quicker to forgive: they tend to have a positive outlook on the relationship and of their partner, thus they are blameless, and are quicker to forgive
- Ready to commit: they tend to view sex and relationship more like two faces of the same coin. They are not afraid of commitment and "labeling" the relationship

In a relationship with a secure type, you will experience fewer up and downs, especially so if both partners are secure types.

Where Does Secure Come From?

Some sources say a secure attachment stems mostly from parenting and what's called "attuned parenting" (Hendrix, 1988).

But these days that's considered a limited view and it's been overseeded by more recent studies.

Today the consensus is that attachment styles are the consequence of several different influences, including parenting, genetics, and life experiences (Levine, 2010).

Here is a list of what contributes to the development of a secure attachment:

- Mother sensitive to child's needs
- Easy temperament of the baby (makes it easier for parents to be responsive)
- Good maternal conditions—marital satisfaction, low stress, no depression, and social support
- Fewer hours with a non-parental caretaker
- Genetic predisposition
- Life experiences (ie.: avoiding big romantic traumas)

If you're a mother, avoid this behavior (from the movie Terms of Endearment):

We back up all our videos for Power University

Science of Secure Attachment

A laboratory experiment showed that secure attachment types have easy access in their brain to themes such as love, closeness, and hugs.

And they don't register as easily topics such as abandonment, loss, and separation.

And contrary to avoidants, they still didn't access those areas when they were distracted. This makes secure people very confident in their relationships.

They are also more able to switch off negative thought patterns when they want to, which makes them bounce back quicker after an argument. That means that secure people have stronger control of their emotional selves, and they don't keep a grudge for days on end.

Definitely, something we might want to emulate.

Also because, as the APA Handbook suggests, secures tend to be the most attractive:

> In studies in which people perused descriptions of potential dating partners, participants tended to prefer descriptions of secure individuals the most and descriptions of avoidant individuals the least (Baldwin, Keelan, Fehr, Enns, & Koh-Rangarajoo, 1996; Chappell & Davis, 1998; Klohnen & Luo, 2003; Latty-Mann & Davis, 1996

In truth, avoidants may be somewhat more attractive in the beginning.

But secures are probably "superior" in already formed relationships.

Secure Attachment Examples

I love the idea that a picture is worth a thousand words.

And a good video is worth a thousand pictures.

These video examples will clarify for you what's a secure attachment:

#1. Not Afraid of Emotional Pain

Being secure doesn't mean being cool and loving all the time.

It also means asking for the truth when that truth might hurt. It's the power of vulnerability.
Something that Ted from "How I Met Your Mother" shows very powerfully here:

The willingness to ask, to explore the emotional side of the relationship, and the courage to show heartbreak are signs of a secure attachment style. When he adds "forget I said anything" is a moment of weakness, but it's understandable.

#2. Not Afraid of Emotional Honesty

Call it "power of vulnerability", if you will.

But sure people are comfortable sharing their emotions.

And they can also be assertive to have their emotional needs met

#3. Secure is not (necessarily) confident

Let's dispel this myth.

Since secure speaks his mind, is not afraid of commitment, and doesn't play games people might think of them as some sort of very confident, super-human type.

But that's not the case.
Secure types can also come to be less confident, or be too vulnerable, and come across as less powerful.
Here's an example:

That being said, since secure have less of a need to hide, they also tend to be more assertive, and that is a big plus when it comes to social skills and social effectiveness.

Secure is Best For Most

There are plenty of advantages to being secure.

However, what "works best" really depends on the environment.
As the Oxford Handbook of Evo Psych and Relationships explains (caps mine):

> Although secure attachment is typically viewed as the most optimal and adaptive style within the developmental literature, an evolutionary perspective suggests that attachment security has an adaptive advantage in safe and predictable environments but NOT in harsh and unpredictable environments (Simpson & Belsky, 2008; Szepsenwol & Simpson, 2019

However, since most people reading here do NOT live in harsh and unpredictable environments, most men and women living in civilized countries are better off with a secure attachment.

Psychologist Martin Seligman says in 'Authentic Happiness' (2002) that of people with a secure attachment style:

- Remember their parents as warm, available, and affectionate
- Have high self-esteem and few doubts
- Regard others as trustworthy and reliable until proven otherwise (less likely to be bitter cynics, and are better placed at being enlightened-collaborator)

- Strive and work on intimate relationships with those they love
- Admit when they are in distress (can be vulnerable while still coming from a high-power frame)

And when it comes to relationships, research shows that the best predictor of happiness in a relationship is a secure attachment style.

And the great thing about secure partners is that they have the power to lift up in their relationship satisfaction levels both anxious and avoidant attachment styles.

Secureness is a thing of beauty in relationships.

Secure Attachment and Power Dynamics

Secure people tend fare be better in most realms of socialization and come across as more confident.

See here:

	Anxious	Avoidant	Secure
Traits	- Clingy to relationships - Anxious during separation - Fearful of abandonment - Overwhelmed by emotions - Mixed thoughts and feeling	- Ends relationships too soon - Uncomfortable being emotionally close - Interacts on a surface level - Unaware of thoughts & feelings	- Can form relationships, but also comfortable alone - Can manage emotions - Can separate thoughts and feelings
Differentiation	Low	Low	High
Attitude	Hesitant	Guarded	Confident
Barriers to Assertiveness	- Afraid to speak up for fear of creating distance or rejection - Fear of overwhelming others - Inability to identify and tune in to emotions - Make excuses for people's patterns of boundary crossing [especially when attachment is already in [illegible]]	- Detached from own emotions, especially during conflict or stress - Prevents conflicts [illegible] - Avoids discussing emotions [illegible] of getting "too close" - Confuses fear of closeness as the result of assertiveness - Confuses partners' search for fair intimacy as crossing his boundaries - "Lets things go" even when it bothers or hurts him	- May have difficulty identifying emotions - May have difficulty communicating emotions - May lack confidence to be assertive or speak directly
Goals	- Attachment's self-awareness - Acknowledge value of close relationships & interdependence - Connect to emotions - Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants - Develop communication skills	- Attachment's self-awareness - Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants - Develop emotional management strategies - Develop communication skills	- Attachment's self-awareness - Develop emotional vocabulary - Develop and/or solidify assertiveness skills

So far, I haven't seen a single resource clearly explaining how to become secure, but I found that general self-help helps.
There is some information though on how to remain a secure attachment type.

How to keep a secure attachment

Attachment styles don't stay fixed for the whole life in every single case. A shift is possible and a secure attachment could become more anxious.

Secure indeed can exaggerate in feeling like their partner's well-being is their responsibility, and they can be overly inclined to forgive.

One way that can happen is if the secure partner continually responds to their partner's unacceptable behavior and keep tolerating it.

That's more likely to happen in inexperienced secure attachment types, but make a mental note anyway: too much cr@p, and you cut the cr@p.

Signs to Watch Out For

Here is what to watch out for:

1. If you start getting too jealous or worried (anxious)
2. If you are less trusting, start playing games and find it difficult to talk (avoidant)

Then you're in the wrong relationship.

Also, read:

- When to breakup
- Types of toxic relationship dances

SUMMARY

Secure attachment types are comfortable with intimacy and they talk straight.
They have stronger, more stable relationships and are happier in them.

Secure is the way to be and to become, and you can work on that.

For those who are already secure, keep in mind that poor partners can make you regress to avoidant or anxious. If you feel you're becoming less secure and more anxious, it's a potential red flag to investigate.

Intro

My name is Lucio.
I am a man, so this article takes the point of view of a man getting his girlfriend back -or, as more often was my case, a lover-.

Some steps can apply to a woman who wants to get back his boyfriend, but I believe this article is best tailored for men.

1. Acknowledge the problem

If your ex doesn't want to see you anymore, there is a problem.

And if you want to get your ex back, it's time to go into problem-solving.

2. Address the problem head-on

Needless to say, if you just keep trying to meet you will only push your ex further away.

And if you leave the issue unaddressed, you only allow it to fester and grow.

The best thing you can do instead is to address the issue right away.

Simply tell her you've noticed a change and you'd like to know how things are on her side.
This is very confident communication and how people with a secure attachment style communicate.

Notice that right away, I take the pressure off.

You don't wanna meet?
No big deal!

I want to make sure she knows I won't lash out, go crazy or have any negative feelings toward her.
This way you let your lover free to open up and, of course, she will start getting more positive feelings about you.

3. Ask directly, but DON’T CHASE

When your ex-lover tells you what’s the issue, you text that you’re cool with it and that you understand.

Don’t try to convince her that she’s wrong (yet) and don’t push for a meet (yet).

Most of all, don’t get emotional or over-promise change.
Not just yet. It may work, but it disempowers you and it kills attraction.

Instead, do this:

4. Empathize with your ex!)

If she shows an emotional side, or if she discloses some issues she’s having, that’s the perfect moment to empathize.

Empathizing will bring the two of you closer again, and getting some loving vibes is a great way to get your lover back.

5. Offer support, without chasing the relationship

Support is the bread and butter of good relationships.
And it's the first step towards renewed intimacy.

Of course, you want to get your lover back to give her some sexual support as well. And she wants it too, don't worry.

But if you were previously lovers, the sexual part is implied. There's no need to text flirt here, no need to make silly wink wink or to tell her what you'll do to her.
That's more likely to make guys horny. And sometimes women too, but it's too risky.

Show instead there's more on your camp.
This is especially important if your ex-lover is distancing herself because you were too aloof (avoidant attachment style).

6. Offer something, then let HER come for more

Don't make the mistake to try to get your ex back right after empathizing: it's too early.

Now you will let the pressure off instead.

And the vacuum will give her a chance to come to you.
Alternatively, even higher risk, higher rewards, is to bid her farewell.

This step here is the time of real reckoning: make it or break it. But as Casanova said, love is not for the timid of heart :). If she comes to you, chances look good.
If she leaves it there (for now) you must do the same.

Notice there are 3 positive signs that my former lover was changing here:

1. Yeah we'll have it (good but not enough)
2. Always offer words of cheer (a compliment: getting better)
3. Give me your positive energy (good enough to strike upon)

How does that old cliche go? Oh, right:

> Set them free. And when they come back they're yours

7. Set up the next date

Albeit that can certainly happen, women won't usually make full U-turns and ask you out.

That's why, at the first major signs of change, you want to move for an-inperson meeting.

Propose a meeting, but don't be timid.

Ideally, you want to re-enter her life by bringing that old whirlwind of passion back.
So propose something highly suggestive of sexual chemistry.

Any meeting is better than no meeting.
But of course, if you can make it to your place (or her place) chances are higher that you will get your lover back the way it should be done: with fireworks.

I could have taken the beer outside here and I think it would work well.
But since I don't have much time to waste, I aim higher:

8. Make it a great date

Behave as if you two are already back, and then let her come to you for more.

Why This Works to Get Your Ex Back

Well, let's recap what this post does to get your lover back.
You are:

1. Attuned to her feelings and quickly recognize something is going on
2. Addressing it confidently and openly
3. Cool if she doesn't wanna see you again..
4. .. But can still give her great sex
5. Together with emotional support
6. And will still be cool whenever she wants to look for something more serious

That's a rare breed there.
Of course, chances are she will be at least interested.
This takes us to the next point:

Should You Try to Get Your Lover Back?

In my case here, I had gone traveling for half a year while we were seeing each other.

We had had a great time together as unattached adults and I felt things were cool enough that we could safely reconnect.

Otherwise, I would advise you to try to get your lover back only in specific cases.

If she broke up because you couldn't give her the committed relationship she wanted then let her go (unless you're ready to give it now). If she was deeply in love, also let her go.
If you were deeply in love, best not to.

Have you even lost her?

When does it become "official" that your girlfriend, lover, or 'casual prtner' is not available anymore?

Well, when she tells you so for sure.
But communication won't always be so direct.

When she does not go along with your plans of meeting up without proposing an alternative, that's already a strong sign you are losing her.

A second time that she avoids making concrete plans, then you have already more evidence than you can possibly need.

Therefore here is the rule: two times that she is not forthcoming about meeting up, and she is (almost) officially an ex.

SUMMARY

Winning your ex back is easier than winning a new girlfriend over. The flame was there, so it's more about rekindling than starting it from scratch.

If you are dealing with a girl you are not yet sexual with and who has stopped replying to you, check what to text to make her reply. If it seems hard to meet her, check getting dates with flaky girls.

Or best of all, check the complete guide on texting, from 1st text to date under the “speed learning” section.

Outliers: Summary, Review & Criticism

Malcolm Gladwell explores in Outliers what makes the difference between successful and unsuccessful people, and his conclusion is one that many would rather not hear: often, it's simply chance, coincidence, and happenstance that make people successful.

Bullet Summary

- Success is sometimes a matter of external factors
- Culture shapes us more than we think
- Long practice is the main difference between good and amazing

Full Summary

About The Author: Malcolm Gladwell is a Canadian journalist, public speaker, and author of several books on psychology and psychology fun facts.
Among his other best-sellers are Blink, The Tipping Point, and David and Goliath.

Introduction

In Outliers, Malcolm Gladwell makes the point that success in life is often a matter of early advantage and circuitous circumstances.

Hard work goes on top and it's also one of the most important variables, but hard work is also often dictated by circumstances.

For example, Bill Gates studied in the only middle school in the US with a computer terminal. There he had the chance to practice programming at a Ph.D. level.
Would Gates have become Gates without that circuitous stroke of luck? Who knows…

Early Advantages Make The Difference

Hockey players who were born in the first three months of the year (January to March) are over-represented in the professional league.

Malcolm Gladwell says that's because of early advantages and reinforcement.

Children born at the beginning of the year had more time to develop physically, which gave them an early advantage. Then they got positive reinforcement with feedback, results, and encouragement to keep going. They ended up both having more opportunities to practice more and wanting to practice more, which kept them going.

Many professionals didn't become professionals because they were particularly good or talented. Just because they were born earlier and rode on that early advantage until the end.

The 10.000-hour rule

Outliers are possibly most famous for the 10,000-hour rule, which Gladwell borrowed from psychologist Anders Ericsson, author of Peak.

The rule says that the people who reached the highest highs in their profession seemed to have trained for 10.000 hours, which is more than most of their "very good" or "good" peers did.

My Note:
This idea has been heavily criticized in the sense that training is a condition sine qua non, but it's also not enough to guarantee top performance by itself.
And reducing it to a number is simplistic and rather wrong.
Read more here:

- Why the 10.000 rules is a pop-psychology myth

The 10.000 rule, albeit wrong, has spread like wildfire

Time Is Of The Essence

Gladwell looks at many successful tech entrepreneurs and notices that their birth dates also show a pattern: they were all born during the personal computing revolution period.

Getting into business during the digital revolution made it somewhat easier to achieve what they achieved.

> Success was (also) a product of the time in which they grew up

My Note:
This makes little sense to me.

And it's more about sensationalistic journalism than true, deep analysis.

Gladwell is measuring his contemporary and successful entrepreneurs only. Of course, the birth date of contemporary entrepreneurs will all be similar because entrepreneurs are more likely to cluster around a certain age.

As we move ahead in time, more and more entrepreneurs will be born outside of the initial digital revolution. Yet, we aren't going to say that successful tech entrepreneurs must be born in a specific time window.

This is not to say that being born in a certain period, like for example in the early days of a revolutionary technology cannot be an advantage: it can be a huge opportunity.
But if Gladwell had measured how many also failed, he would have probably realized that the numbers were pretty similar.

Language Advantages

Some languages provide an advantage in dealing with numbers.

For example:

Chinese Helps With Math

Chinese for example has shorter names for numbers. What difference does that make? Well, people can hold in their short-term memories more of those numbers.
And that provides an advantage in mentally handling numbers.

English Has Logic Weakness

The logical structure of languages also makes a difference.
The English language is not logical in the way it structures its number after 10.
In Korean, Japanese and Chinese instead of the number 11 is "ten one", which makes logical sense.
And 24 is "two tens four". This allows Asian kids, says Gladwell, to be one year ahead by age 6 when it comes to math.

My Note:
And yet again, this is only half of what a good analysis should do.
How about age 24, or 50? Does that advantage stay constant, diminish, or totally disappear?
I suspect it diminishes and very possibly disappears as people internalize the link.

Intelligence and Success Correlation

IQ points translate into success only up until 120.

Any point above that threshold doesn't correlate anymore with success. To be successful indeed you don't have to be a genius, it's enough not to be too below average.

Gladwell also refers to "practical intelligence" as opposed to IQ, which he describes as knowing when to say what, to whom to say, and how to say it. Basically, that's social mastery and emotional intelligence.

[image]

Wisdom From Outliers

This is what I enjoyed the most from "Outliers":

- As long as you're good enough… Effort makes the difference

There are likely many, many fields where you can be in the top 5%.

Not every single field, but there are many. Once you are good enough, then the amount of time, energy, and deliberate effort you put into those activities will make all the difference between you and the rest, and in the final results, you will get.

- Don't listen to early results

Sometimes you can see it early if you're good at something. But some other times not so. Stick to it for a while and don't give up at the first difficulty.

- The longer you stay at things, the better you are

As simple as that, yet so powerful. Also, read Grit by Angela Duckworth.

CONS

Outliers is an interesting read, but we need to raise a few red flags:

- The 10.000-hour rule is misleading

Naming a number of hours as a differentiator is preposterous. And the reality is, as usual, a bit more complex.

In different fields, the amount of training will have a different impact, and not everyone can become world-class at everything solely based on training.

Also more important than time is how people train, read The Talent Code, and the importance of deep practice.

- Random patterns and shallow analysis

Some explanation made me think of Fooled by Randomness, which explains how men see patterns where there are none.
For example, the idea that rice provides "rice cultures" with the ability to stay focused for longer seemed truly nonsensical to me.

PROS

Some fascinating analysis
The Java founder, the Bill Gates story, the hockey players' patterns… All fascinating and highly instructive stuff.

Big humility lesson
Putting so many successes in context is a big humility lesson that can be useful to many of us.

Emphasis on consistency
Albeit I believe the "10.000-hours rule" is very misleading, it does have a great advantage: it highlights how much effort matters. And that's all in our control.

Outliers Review

I'll say it outright: "Outliers" is not my favorite type of book.

To me, it's more a collection of curiosity with a smattering of pop-psychology than a truly enlightening wisdom and deep analysis.

Outliers take complex life issues, apply some (random) research and popularize a few psychological principles in a way that makes them sound deep and smart.

And that makes for interesting reads for the layperson.

Whether or not they can contain life-changing advice or you can easily apply them to your life, that's another question.

There is one hugely positive, important pro in books like "Outliers" though: they help readers to think outside of the box and look at less obvious explanations and variables.
And it puts to rest the idea that "it's all talent" or "it's all work". It's both. Plus some randomness.

#1 Reason Relationships Fail: Breaking The Vicious Cycles

Lucio Buffalmano · 18 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

There are often many factors that lead to relationship failures.

But no matter what those factors are, the ultimate factor is always a vicious cycle.

This post will help you analyze vicious cycles and teach you how to break a vicious cycle in your relationship.

- SUMMARY

What Are Vicious Cycles

I will define a vicious cycle as:

> A vicious cycle is a pattern of thoughts and actions where both partners get stuck in fighting, revenge and, possibly, negative thinking associated to their partners.

Notice that the most dangerous types of vicious cycles involve feelings.
It's relatively easier to break up fighting and arguments and move on. But it's more dangerous when it starts involving our feelings and our judgment.

Once partners get stuck in negative thinking indeed, it's possible that the negativity "crowds out love" and, if it goes on unchecked for too long, it can also kill the love.

And that's why it's crucial that you actively break the negative cycles.

How We Get To Cycles Begin

Healthy relationships start like this:

With a sense and a non-written agreement that both partners will make an effort to support and contribute to the other (and for the whole).

And they expect their partners to do the same.

Basically, this is the tacit agreement:

> We each do our best to respect each other and contribute to our common good

However, this is the tacit corollary to that agreement:

> But if you stop doing your best, and if you hurt me or disappoint me, then I might stop doing my best. And I might try to hurt you back

This second corollary is what allows vicious cycles to take hold and potentially destroy so many otherwise great relationships.

Can you already see when it's riskiest that vicious cycles take hold?
Vicious cycles are most dangerous when the relationship is composed of two individuals who are not willing to forgive.

Of course, sometimes it's not about "willingness", but "ability" and "strength" to forgive.

Making that first step back towards reconciliation takes strength.
It takes courage and vulnerability. Be that courageous (wo)man and you've already insulated yourself from vicious cycles.

Let's now analyze the two types of vicious cycles.

Vicious Cycles of Emotional Withdrawal

Emotional vicious cycles happen when the partners stop supporting each other.

It can start in different ways and at different times in the relationship. It can start with a sexual rejection in bed, or it can start with criticism and a big argument on a day we're particularly sensitive.

That day when our partner's actions are just that little bit more painful, then we will unconsciously vow that we will make them pay for it.
And we will hurt them by either pulling back or attacking them later on to even the score.

And guess what often happens from then on? A vicious cycle starts.
And when the mutual emotional shutdown starts, each partner feels too hurt and too "in debt" to even think they need to give to make the relationship whole again.

Mira Kirshenbaum, author of z, says that she has never seen a relationship in trouble where the mutual shutdown wasn't working its black magic.

Vicious Cycle of Combativeness

The other reason why relationships fail is when negativity takes hold with arguments and fights.
Arguments start becoming more and more common, and the good times start becoming less and less.

When the vicious cycle of combativeness reaches its apex, the couple avoids each other. And every time they meet, their walls are up because they cannot see anything good coming from their partner.
That's effectively the point when the couple behaves more like enemies than supportive partners.

This is also the case that Gottman discusses in his many books on relationships. The vicious cycle of negativity does include indeed the four horsemen of the apocalypse. Such as, criticism, contempt, defensiveness, and stonewalling.

Note: Notice indeed that it's not just about fights and arguments. Arguments are fine.. As long as couples can go back to being supportive soon afterward instead of getting bitter. And as long as the positive times outweigh the negative ones.

Vicious Cycles Examples

And this is an example of the end stages of a vicious cycle. You can see that it's the N.1 reason why relationships fail: there's no good left. Only spite and poison.

And they got there little by little, slipping on the slippery slope of a vicious cycle.

I have also done an article on combative relationships, which is another advanced stage of negativity.

How to Break Vicious Cycles

Hitting back when we are hurt is a mutual reflex, so don't be too hard on yourself if you ended up in a vicious circle.
Apply instead the exercises below to fix your relationship.

1. Be Proactive

Prevention is the best cure for the N.1 reason why relationships fail.

How do you do that?

Every time you see your partner pull back, every time you see your partner holding a grudge, don't do the same.
But force yourself to give.

2. Start Well

A great predictor of how things develop, as Gottman found out, is how they start.
Make sure you start your interactions positively then.
Greet him with a smile and a hug when he comes back home.

3. List of Appreciation

Write down a list of what you love about your partner and read it to each other.

4. List of What We Want to Hear

This exercise might sound a bit weird and it's not would I would personally go for, but Harville Hendrix, author of Getting the Love You Want recommends it.

Your partner writes a list of what they want to be appreciated for.
Then you read it and tell them about every occasion you can remember when they showed those qualities.

5. Focus on Positives

Focus on the positives.
Think back to when things worked and focus on those times instead that on the last fight.
This is especially important for avoidant attachment styles who tend to dwell on the negatives.

6. Start Positive Cycles

People tend to react more quickly and more strongly to negatives than to positives.

For example, if your partner does something nice for you, you might think "wow that's nice," but you don't do or say anything.
And that's exactly what you'll need to fix. Reward positive behavior as soon as you see one.
As a matter of fact, look and hunt for positive behavior which you can praise!

That will help you start positive circles.

7. Stubborn Giving

This is my definition of single-handedly breaking down the negativity spiral.

It means that one partner, all by himself, will give and give even in the face of a hostile partner.
Do it for a month and chances are high, very high, that your partner will also start contributing. Stubborn giving is powerful stuff.

In a nutshell, you will recognize that every single exercise is about going back to positivity.
Indeed, the big secret is making it a habit to be good to each other. Gottman says that successful relationships have a balance of 5 positive moments to 1 negative. Securing a 5 to 1 ratio will prevent a vicious circle and give you a solid, healthy relationship.

What If You Can't Give

If you're in a situation where you simply cannot even imagine being nice and giving to your partner, then I see the only solution for you: your partner has to do it for you.

If neither is willing, then vicious circles, the N.1 reason why relationships fail, has destroyed your relationship too.
It might be the time to break up and take your lesson learned for the future.
If you're still ambivalent at this stage, take also a look at this article on when it's time to break up.

One Last Effort

Before giving up, I would suggest you force yourself into stubborn giving.

Every single person in a relationship with much negativity will answer that "no, they can't start giving".

And they won't.
And that's also why most people don't do much in life at all. They are weak in emotional intelligence and can't see beyond their immediate fears and basest feelings.
They would rather not try than risk their ego getting hurt.

I would encourage you to be brave instead and go for it. Give stubbornly for a month. It will be hard. And if it won't work, you can tell yourself you've done your best.
And much respect to you for trying.
And if works… What a win!
You just single-handedly prevent the N.1 cause of relationship failure to ravage your life.

SUMMARY

The N.1 reason why a relationship ends is too much negativity takes hold through vicious cycles.

There are two types of vicious cycles:

1. Emotional withdrawal (at a feeling level, there's no emotional bond anymore)
2. Combativeness spiral (at the behavioral level, arguments are the only way you communicate)

Things can start off seemingly innocently, but little by little negativity builds upon itself in a vicious circle until it squeezes out all the good in you and all that is left is bitterness and anger.

You fix it by focusing on the positive, giving without keeping score, and breaking the negative circle with "stubborn giving".

Do Girls Like Assholes? No, They Like Avoidants

Lucio Buffalmano · 19 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Do girls like assholes?

In part, yes.

And I highly recommend you first start reading about:

1. "asshole game"
2. then come back here,
3. then go to "how to be a good asshole".

However, more than "liking assholes", it's some asshole traits that are attractive.
And being "barely available" is one of those traits.

Let's learn more.

That's the wrong, low-quality way of being a jerk

INTRO: The Asshole Myth

I remember years ago.

A colleague of mine was complaining about women who, in his mind, “just want to be mistreated”.
And he said:

> Really, next time I’ll just go over to a woman and kick her. They always like men who treat them badly.

Urgh, what a bad attitude!

Was he wrong?

Not 100%.
There is latent masochism in some women -and people in general- that seeks abuse.
Hopefully, you are not interested in that subset.

But was he right for the majority of women?

Not really.
But we need to dig a bit deeper.

In a complex world, black-and-white thinking is bound to be wrong most of the time.

You see, high-quality women don’t really line up for assholes. And especially not the crudest, less attractive types -obviously, no?-.
But they like them just a tad better than too nice guys.

But that does not make assholes great. Just a tad better.
And women don’t like much of an asshole. Just a few traits.

Let’s see more.

Some assholes are attractive because they’re handsome, and they’d be attractive anyway

Why Assholes Are Attractive

Some of the (potentially) bad traits of the asshole are attractive.

And these include:

- Confidence (but sometimes over-confidence in assholes)
- Social skills (but sometimes used to one-up others)
- Dominance (or apparent dominance to protect a fragile ego, it depends)
- Strength (or apparent strengths)
- Some hints of seductive dark triad traits

And, in some cases, it's not to write off some women's tendency towards masochism and self-fulfilling low self-esteem.

But it's mostly what the asshole doesn't show that is attractive.
And those are the negative traits of the pushover.

Things such as:

- Over-chasing and over-investing
- Indecisiveness
- Putting himself last
- Over politeness

All the above traits scream powerless, fear, and subordination.
And of course, women are attracted to the opposite of that: competence, authority, and power.

So it's mostly what sets the assholes apart from the too nice guys that make them attractive. And not really being an asshole per se.

Indeed the asshole attractiveness is often overplayed.

In "Attraction Explained", psychology researcher Virem Swani well explains that assholes are only better than pushovers.
And research shows that most women, albeit not all, would otherwise prefer "kind men".

Here is an example from 500 Days of Summer:

Some guys may mistakenly think that guy was cool in his approach because he "had balls".
But again, that's not what's most effective.

Assholes Are Not Women's Magnets

The idea that girls like assholes and assholes get women like nobody's business is also somewhat wrong.

And it happens because of representatives' bias.
Such as, we see lots of too nice guys struggling in life. Then we see a few assholes getting women and we generalize that all assholes get girls and that all girls like assholes.

Of course, there are many assholes who are very successful and sleep with lots of women.
But there are also many assholes who don't get any women and end up bitter and on their own.

Example here from Sex and The City:

What's an Asshole?

There are many characteristics of an asshole.
Some of them include:

- Being rude
- Putting his needs first
- Being unruly
- Not listening to people around
- Disregarding her needs
- Etc. Etc.

But the two major overarching traits of the asshole are the following:

1. Self-centered ("me comes first")
2. Not fully committing to the relationship

However, most people use asshole as an umbrella term. And therein lie the mistake of why so many people wrongly believe that women do like assholes.

The Definition of Asshole is Wrong

One of the reasons that many think assholes are attractive is because of the vagueness of the term.

Jen Kim, for example, says that many women use the word assholes for pretty much any behavior or outcome they didn't want, including non-committing.

Someone doesn't want to commit? He's an asshole.
He doesn't call when he says he will? He's an asshole
Mean? Asshole.
Bitter, inconsiderate, emotionally unavailable, unfaithful…? Asshole, asshole, asshole, and asshole.

Girls Don't Like Aholes, They Like Avoidants

We have seen that girls do like some asshole traits associated with the "me comes first" attitude.

But what about the other side of the equation?
Do girls like assholes who can't commit?

Yes, they do. Quite a few of them, at least.
But those guys are not (necessarily) assholes. They have a name, and that's avoidant attachment men.

Avoidants naturally do the following:

- Send off mixed signals
- Pull her close… Then push her away
- Keep her at arm's length
- Unavailable when she needs him

… And all the other unavailable signals that many labels as the umbrella term of "assholes" but which are actually the typical signs of an avoidant personality.

Who Do Avoidants Attract?

Avoidants are especially addictive to anxious attachment-type women.

This is important, because if you're a woman and asking yourself "why do I always end up with assholes", well, here is the answer: it can be because you have an anxious attachment style.

Anxious and avoidant, together, form the highly volatile, highly addictive anxious attachment trap.

The anxious attachment trap, such as a relationship where she needs him but he stays noncommittal and out of reach, is exactly what people mistake as a relationship with an asshole.
People look at that dynamic and believe that assholes are attractive and addictive to women.

And albeit that dynamic of being out of reach is very attractive for many women who keep going after these guys, not every woman is into it.

Secure Women Don't Like Assholes

Amir Levine in Attached introduces a secure attachment-type woman.

You will see how her mindset would be impervious to assholes.
Here's what she says (I paraphrase for brevity):

> All men I have been with wanted to be with me in a relationship.
> I know that I get the message across that I'm someone who's worth getting to know, that there's a treasure to be revealed if they stick around.
> But it's very important to me that the guys don't play games. When they call me right after, I show interest in return right away. Only two men in my life waited to call me back. And I cut any contact with them.

Notice that her high self-esteem prevents her from thinking think it was she who was not good enough.

She thought those guys were playing games, and she is only interested in men who can communicate her affection openly.

This is the type of high-quality girl doesn't like assholes. And who rarely fall for them (albeit, never say never).
And they also tend to be higher-quality women.

SUMMARY

So do girls like assholes?

They like them better than the completely spineless guys, yes.

However, assholes are far from the peak of sexual market value.

And the guys that women often get hooked on are not assholes. It's avoidant men whom they get hooked on and that erroneously end up being labeled as assholes.

And we have also seen that some of the highest quality girls, those with a secure attachment style, don't like either assholes or avoidants.

Hence, often, it's lower-quality women that the assholes end up with.

Power Hungry People: Psychology, Diagnosis, and How to Deal Wit h Them

Power-hungry women and, most often, men, can make your relationship a living hell.

Unless you fully submit to them, that is.

But if you prefer a more equitable, supportive, and win-win relationship, this article is here to help.

> Me: (Sticks to my frame: share the topic first)
> Power hungry: (Forced to concede, but hides her concession behind a formal mass text framed as a change due to everyone's schedule, rather than a concession or favor to me)

A conciliator person here would have 'power protected' her refusal to share the topic, for example saying that 'she couldn't do it for legal concerns', but that 'she was looking forward to explaining everything in person'.

But power-hungry personalities don't think about sharing power. They think about hoarding power and dictating terms.
It's all a game to maintain power, with power hungry people.

Can You Date A Power-Hungry?

This is the general rule:

> The more power hungry they are, the more undateable they are.

To be precise, you can still date them.
And you can also marry them.

But if you're the man, she should NOT be power hungry with you and instead accept your leadership.
Or, at least, you should be OK being the 'junior party' (not what our readership prefers).

It's one of these two or… You're in for endless fights for control.

Some women instead happily marry power-hungry men because some women confuse power hunger for positive dominance.

Power addiction is that it can truly work as an addiction.
Power addicts feel unsafe unless they're in control. In a relationship, that means that your needs will never be cared for -unless they overlap with his need for power-.

Power Hungry Are Always In Fight Mode

It's hard having true intimacy with power-hungry men.

For them everything is a fight to win, starting with the toxic mindset of "who needs whom the least".
Power-hungry men are focused not on win-win and adding more to the pie, but on taking as much as possible from that pie.
If the pie shrinks, such as if the relationship suffers, power-hungry men don't care: all they care is that they keep getting bigger slices… Until there is no pie left.

Sometimes it's hard for normal people to understand power-hungry men. These people fight for a whole host of things that make no sense to others.

Needless Fights: An Example

For example, imagine Kate, the wife, asks him to take her home when she asks so. Kate has a sister in the other part of the world and she wants to show Kate the newborn baby. Since Kate cares so much about family, she wants to take the Skype call on the big screen.

The power-hungry man might say yes.

If you're a normal person and your wife would tell you in advance that being home on time is crucial for her, you would do so because she pleaded to do so and you agreed.

But a power-hungry person?
On the way home, he might stop at the office. Or stop the car to make a call.

Why on earth would he do that?

It's because he sees a power struggle in going straight home and doing what she asked for.
If she gets home on time when she asked so, in his mind she acquires power. To avoid that, he comes up with an excuse to reassert his power.

In his mind, it's as if he was making this statement:

> Power Hungry Mindset: "I matter more in this relationship and I can do whatever I please. I am going to prove it to you now but thwarting your plans and wishes".

They Never Switch Off "Fight Mode"

They have the same mindset in the office and in their job, too, always about winning and displaying dominance.

And they carry that "need to win attitude" home. But there, it doesn't work. And they end up with truly poor relationships

Power Hungry Men Don't Allow Improvements

The most maddening part of dating a power-hungry man?

You can't discuss your issues.

It's hard fixing issues with them because guess how they interpret any attempt to bring the issue to the table?
Exactly, like a power struggle they need to win.
They'll see it as an assault on them and will fight to win.

Power-hungry men have different responses to your attempts at discussing problems.
Some of the most common:

- Fly off in a rage
- Pretend they agree and then do nothing (or the opposite)
- Agree in front of the therapist and then refuse to do any more therapy

Some relationship therapists report power-hungry men agreeing with their spouses and the therapist on the need to change.
Then they do the opposite of what they agreed, refuse to see the therapist again, or fly in a rage at home (the most abusive of them).

The more manipulative might lie, saying that the therapist is "destroying their marriage", and they will try to pitch the therapist as the common enemy.
In truth, of course, they just see the therapist as a threat to their dominance and hold of power.

In truth, power-hungry men are powerless to change and improve. And, often, they are powerless to save their relationships.

> Power hungry men are powerless with their need for power

Power Hungry, Domineering Women

Power-hungry men are more about winning and exercising control over her.

Power-hungry women can be equally dogged in 'winning' and getting it their ways.
But because of different evolutionary forces, women may also seek to control their men in two unique ways:

1. Securing his commitment
2. Securing his resources

And I have written a popular article on how women control relationships and their resources.
But here are two video examples to give you an idea of how power-hungry women exercise relationship control:

Have you noticed the difference?
The first time is the power-hungry woman who is direct and uses raw power. That's what you'd call a "domineering girlfriend".
The second one instead is using manipulation and soft power.

Power Hungry's Power Moves

Let's not review the tools of influence of power-hungry people.

We have already seen in different articles how jealous paranoids and controlling and abusive partners use power.
So let's focus here more on the covert aggression techniques.

Here are some of them:

#1. There's Something Wrong With You

When you talk about something you need, they will say or make you feel like there's something wrong with you.

They will label people with that same need are "bitchy", "neurotic", "amoral" or whatever.
So to distance yourself from that category you will automatically want to give up your need.

Lucio's Example: When I acted too power hungry

Lucio:
My ex-girlfriend wanted a gift for Saint Valentine. I gave the usual spiel about "imposed holidays" and how I felt about them.

And I told her that asking for a gift made me feel like those guys traveling in poor countries where local girls ask for gifts in exchange for sex. My girlfriend was half-Asian and at that one, she gave up.

Back then, those were my real feelings. Now I realize a compromise like a dinner out would have been fairer instead of going full-on with my influencing power.
Curing oneself of power-hungry shortcomings is also about awareness, self-awareness, and maturity.

#2. Says Yes – But Don't Do It

Another great -sarcastic great of course- technique is pretending to go along with it.
And then not doing it. Or doing it their own way.

This is mostly used by less assertive and more submissive partners. And that's why it's more common for power-hungry women.

For example, in her book Why Men Marry Bitches, the author recommends women do exactly this: say yes and then find a way to do it her way.

#3. Overwhelm Power

The overwhelming tactic can be used in a variety of ways:

- Emotional meltdown
- Verbal aggression
- A litany of “rational reasons”
- Ethical impossibilities

Whatever the technique, it’s a barrage that confuses everything.
What’s sure is that, unless you give up, the consequences will be uncleanly dire.

#4. Badgering Power Move

The power-hungry partner will keep coming and coming at you without end.

They will exasperate you so much that giving in seems like the only viable option.

As the example suggests, this is a favorite one for very young, budding power personalities.

#5. Power Through Fear

Another technique for power-hungry is to browbeat the partner with fear.

Power-hungry men might go mad to the point of scaring her.
And power-hungry women might threaten to break up to keep him on his toes.

#6. Victim Manipulation

They will pretend that you are making them sick.

#7. One-Up Power Move

This is the most childish and annoying.

But alas, it exists.

Whatever you say or do, they take it one step further.
You talk about a promotion, they talk about a big career change they have in mind.
You’re tired from work, they are exhausted from work.

Whatever you want to celebrate, they have to make it seem like it’s nothing compared to what they did.

Is Your Partner a Power Addict?

If you have read so far, you have an idea already.

However, there could be some confusion between power addicts and dominant or strong-willed personalities.

This section is to help you come up with an answer.

The Power Hungry Test

Try this test.

Pick an issue where it’s blatantly obvious that they are the one always deciding and then say this:

> You: “it’s not fair that you always decide”.

For example, if they always decide what meal to eat, tell them it's not fair they always pick.
And then watch where it goes from there.

How do they react to your appeal to fairness? Do they take this into account? If they try to have you say that you like their choices, say you like it indeed, but one evening per week you would like to pick.

If they accept your appeal, then maybe you're not dealing with a power addict.
If they resort to one of the above techniques to have it their way, then they are dealing with a power addict.

Diagnostic Question

Some power-hungry personalities are great at their game.

So good indeed that they will stop just one whisker away from you quitting the relationship.

They will just give you that one thing every once in a while right before you were about to go.

If that's the case, then you should ask yourself Mira Kirshenbaum's diagnostic question:

> Diagnostic Question: Do you often feel humiliated? Do you often feel in rage or depressed? Do you often feel like you're invisible or that your wants and needs don't count at all?

If the answer to the above questions is yes, then you are probably dealing with a power addict.
If repeated attempts to address the issues fail, you may need to reassess the relationship and consider whether it is meeting your needs.

In one observed case study, a spouse refused to comply with a partner's demand, demonstrating a potential 'protest behavior' in power-hungry dynamics:

> Her: (refuses to hold his hand) <— This is reaction is in line with a possible 'protest behavior' in reaction to a partner who may focus more on power than on communion

Should You Break Up From a Power Hungry?

As we said, there is an overlap between power-hunger and abuse.

To be precise: abusive men seek power and control over their partner, which makes them almost by definition power-hungry.
Power-hungry men, on the other hand, are not always abusive, but that also depends on how hungry for power they are. Hunger for power is a scale after all, and at high levels, it almost always becomes somewhat abusive.

If that's the case, and I don't usually make recommendations here, you are probably better off breaking up.
As George Simon explains in "In Sheep's Clothing", change is not easy. It requires you to acquaint yourself with the dynamics of power and take a big, assertive stand.

If your partner is "only" power-hungry and not abusive, you can first try together counseling.
But he has to be open to admitting that he has a power addiction first.

For more information read:

- When to break up diagnostics
- Accepting influence (and sharing power)

Why Do People Stay With Power Hungry?

The question comes naturally:

Why do people even stick it out so long in a relationship with a power addict?

Well, deep down many of us admire power.
And of course, that's especially true for women.

They will tell themselves "of course he's domineering, but he's also smart, capable, and blablabla".
In a world with a lot of too many too-nice men, a man who "always wins" might seem like a strong man to rely on, after all.

And as much as they hate their power-hungry men, they also admire them.

After years of living in the shadows of their power addict husband, some women might even think they wouldn't be able to handle life by themselves.

Don't Fall For The Gambler's Trap

Another reason why people stay with power-hungry addicts is the revenge factor.

Some develop the mindset that the only way to get back their pride and make up for their humiliation lies in undercutting your power-addict partner.

And that's why they stay: to score a win, save face, and get back their pride.
The best approach is to set firm boundaries rather than seeking indirect revenge, or moving on to better alternatives.

Fixing a Power Hungry

If your partner's need to win means that you will not get any of your needs met, it's tough to find a solution.

If you already calmly discussed the issue with him multiple times, I would suggest you try two things:

1. Therapy
2. Stubborn giving

Therapy means you bring your power-hungry partner for couple therapy and see if you can get anything out of it.
Stubborn giving is something I talked about in the vicious circle of negativity that destroys relationships.

It means you give and give and give and see if anything changes.
Try it out for two months and see if any changes happen.

If that fails, too, it's time to use your largest leverage, and tell them that it's either they change, or you must move on.

And if he still doesn't change, then follow through with your breakup.
Make sure you set timelines for change.

Persistent feelings of rage, humiliation, or frustration in a relationship indicate a power imbalance that needs decisive action.

Indeed, it's a mistake to think that the worst relationship ends in divorce. The worst relationships keep going in the face of the daily horror they dish out.

Signs He's Wasting Your Time

One swallow does not make spring.

And one sign in isolation does not necessarily mean he does not and will never get serious.

Keep in mind, indeed, that the signs in isolation can be misleading. So you must take that into account and look for patterns, quantity, and frequency.

The more of them you see and the more often you see them, the more likely it is that he is a time-waster.

Let's start:

#1. He Says He's Not The Commitment Type

Telling if a guy is wasting your time can be easy sometimes.

As Greg Behrend says in "He's Not Just That Into You", if he says he is not the relationship type of guy, then stop wondering.
He told you all you need to know.

Don't be like my ex, who when I told her I wasn't the relationship type still tried to "reform me":

That ended up with her heartbreak and with my own "guilt baggage" (I met her again years later and it felt great to see she was doing well and I was able to apologize).

However, often, it's not that cut and dry and some POS of men will not tell you things directly.

Luckily, these are still several strong early indicators to tell you if your boyfriend or sexual partner is of the "time-wasting" kind.

#2. Sends Mixed Signals

Sending mixed signals is a clear sign he's not yet 100% ready to commit. That might change, but it's a first warning sign.

Mixed signals are also a major warning sign of avoidant attachment types, which don't make good relationship partners.

What are mixed signals?
Here are some examples:

- One day he's all over you, another day he's distant
- Today he talks about a holiday together, then he's not sure if he'll have time
- Last week he texted 2 times a day, now it's been 5 days, and no single text

Anything that makes feel you like "it's going somewhere" and then makes you unsure is a concrete sign of mixed signals.

#3. He Talks About Other Women

If he:

- Talks about other women
- Points to other women to ask your opinion
- Talks a lot about his exes
- Comments on other women's attractiveness in your presence

Chances are he's got more of a fuckbuddy / fun / fuckboy mentality. Or he might be an inveterate womanizer, or maybe even consciously willing to let you know he's not serious.

In any case, it's a strong sign that, if you want commitment, you might have to look for it with someone else.

#4. He Has No Jealousy Whatsoever

Conversely, if he's very open to talking about your ex or what you think of other men, that's a sign that he's not jealous at all.

Little jealousy could be a good thing… But no jealousy at all can also be a sign he doesn't want anything serious. Researcher John Gottman indeed found out that a complete lack of jealousy is often the precursor of a breakup. Men who want their women for themselves should show at least a hint of protectiveness and jealousy.

When I was dating I used to ask girls a lot about their exes and their other current options.
One because I'm curious -makes sense I started this website, no?- and two because, in a way, it was my signal that they should be looking elsewhere for a serious thing.

So no jealousy at all and him asking about other men is a big, big sign that he's wasting your time.

#5. His Future Doesn't Include You

If he talks about his future without including you in it, it can be a bad sign. Especially if you've been dating for a while.

If you just started dating, it's not a big signal as it might simply be a guy who takes his time instead of rushing in.

These are the signs when he talks about:

- The places he wants to see (not the places you should visit together)
- His projects and what it means to him (not the two of you)
- The cars he wants to buy (and not where he wants to take you with them)
- The money he wants to make (and now hot he wants to make you and him better off with that money)

As a matter of fact, to find out if he is wasting your time encourage him to talk about the future, and then see how he talks and related to the future.
Is it just him? Or is it both of you?

#6. There Is No Relationship Growth

Relationships that lead to commitment often get there following a path.

That path is not carved in stone, but there are a few common milestones that can provide you with good information.

It's a bad sign if he avoids anything that would send the message that the two of you are growing closer, such as:

- Avoids doing anything on Saint Valentine

- He has no idea where this is going
- Never introduces you as either his girlfriend or the one he's dating
- No gifts, ever
- The time you spend together stays the same (ie.: at his place and a little more)
- Has some stupid rules about "no sleepovers"

"Jokes" about not sleeping over also count. There is always a backdrop of truth in jokes.

#7. He Never Initiates Contact

Men who are serious about relationships and are secure in their attachment don't play "who texted to whom" games.

If the only conversation he initiates is about scheduling hookups, you have another bad sign.
Notice that only meeting for sex might be the start of an actual relationship. But it needs to take off and expand from there. And to test if he's serious, you might want to propose doing more things outside of his place (just don't propose to exchange BJs for a trip with her like a lady did to me, that's truly a terrible game).

#8. He Says He Has Past Issues

Yep, if he's saying it… Believe him.

You'd be surprised how many people hear those words but totally ignore them.
They tell themselves "well… Who hasn't".

But most people who have "normal" issues and exes don't talk about buggages.
Men who talk about baggage are often code-communicating they are still into their exes, that they are not ready to move on, and that they truly have commitment troubles.

Don't listen to your girlfriend saying it's OK, they are being bad girlfriends -or at least, bad at giving advice-.
Instead, consider it for what it is: an important warning sign that he might be wasting your time.

Look At The Whole

It's worth repeating:

One sign by itself might be misleading.
Don't stop and don't stress about each and any single sign.
But look at the whole.

How do you feel, overall?
Let me be frank: if you are asking yourself whether or not a time waster is already a negative sign.

False Signs He's Wasting Your Time

There are many articles around the web helping women decide if he's time wasters.

But they are seldom written by real dating experts and by people who really understand psychology.
That type of advice is not only generic but often misleading.

Here are some signs that don't necessarily mean he's wasting your time:

- Meet / Doesn't Meet Your Friends

Some guys are naturally outgoing and enjoy crowds and new people.

Some others are shy, introverted, or outright antisocial.

Thus meeting or not meeting your friends can often be more a reflection of his personality than his seriousness about relationships.

- Never Takes You Out Anywhere

Some guys love doing things with girls they've just met.
Some others are more about chilling because. It's not that they don't take you out much, it's that they just don't go out much in general.

So always double-check with this one with his lifestyle. If he's all work, or all work and video games, then don't stress it.

- (No) Public Affection

This is another sign that many women mistakenly use an indicator of a guy who's wasting their time.

It could be, but again, this is also often more a reflection of his personality.
Some men are highly effusive in public while others tend to keep the romance behind the curtains.

Some men show little public affection, but that doesn't necessarily mean they're not serious

What To Do When He's Wasting Your Time

And now, the big question.

Imagine after this article you realized that yes, he might be wasting your time.

What do you do?

Some very popular dating books for women would let you believe you better never ask for a relationship.
But that's the wrong approach.

Consider this: a survey showed that 60% of the women who got married were ready to walk away if the man wasn't going to commit. That suggests that those women were not afraid of fielding their demands.
And as Harvey righteously points out, asking for the commitment that you want is a sign of quality.

It shows you think you are worthy of a stable relationship and that you communicate clearly, without playing games (that's how secure attachment types communicate).

Here's how you can structure it:

> You: Tom, we have been seeing each other for a while now. And I really like you and cherish time this. I feel I need something more tangible and stable out of it. Deep down, I am looking for a committed relationship. How's your point of view in this.

Or instead, if you want to be more aggressive, already after the 2nd or 3rd time you meet after sex you can say what my ex-girlfriends said:

> You: I don't do sex outside of relationships.

If he replies with anything that's not a timeline or a tangible sign of commitment, start cutting back the time you spend together.

How to Stop Time Wasters

Some men are as*holes and some men play a lot of mind games.

These are the reasons why men waste women's time, including women who seek long-term commitment and a family:

- Ego validation
- Safety of emotional attachment
- To keep the sex coming

Unluckily, you cannot change that.
You can't change men, but you can stop men from wasting your time. And, after all, that's all you need to do.

The first and most important step is mental.
And it comes with the realization that hoping to only meet high-quality men and real leaders who will take a personal loss over your well-being will not get you anywhere.
Because those men are rare.

You must go from "is he wasting my time" to "am I allowing him to waste my time?".

The second step is to ask for what you want and need.
I have plenty of articles up on how to do that effectively while retaining your allure and femininity, so browse around.

The third step is to have a timeline.
If you don't get the commitment you want, you must break up (just don't put it in the form of a breakup threat).

The fourth step is following through with your breakup.
You'd be surprised at how many women get the commitment they wanted after a breakup.
But don't break up with that mind. Break up with the idea of looking for someone who can give you what you want.

> You must go from "is he wasting my time" to "am I allowing him to waste my time?".

SUMMARY

No, you're not being paranoid asking yourself if you're wasting your time with him.

As a matter of fact, you should be asking yourself that question. And then use this article and your gut feeling to listen for the answer.

When you're still not clear: ask for the commitment you want.

How to Get a Boyfriend ASAP: The “All-In Method”

Lucio Buffalmano · 20 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Getting a boyfriend is easier than you think.

Most women date badly, so if you follow these simple steps you will naturally put yourself in a position to get a boyfriend… Fast.

This article shows you exactly how to get a boyfriend.

- You Got a Boyfriend. Now What?
- SUMMARY

#1. Take Care of Yourself

> 80% of your results come from mastering the basics

When I see a woman with unshaven legs, my heart cries.

I think you know the basics.
You only have to stick to them.

That's the ABC and you have to take care of the ABC.
For more details on taking your ABC to stellar levels:

- Increase your feminine appeal (femininity is in short supply, use it!)
- 3 effective seductive styles
- Seductive body language for women
- Avoid these dressing styles (please!)

#2. Go Out A LOT: Help Chance Work Its Magic

> Life is a number's game. And dating is even more so

Do a lot of everything social for one month.

- Events
- Meetups
- Couchsurgin meetups
- After work drinks
- Bars and clubs
- Join clubs
- Take up classes

After one month, assess what worked best, and do more of that (yes, you're going to be strategic about this, we're not joking around here :).

Pick Places With Lots of Men, Few Women

Which classes to choose from?

Well, Data shows environments with more women make men lazy and entitled.
So pick something that is either 50/50 women to men or that has more men in it.

Here are some great ones where you'll be the big prize in the room:

- Tech meetups (you're curious about that world, and might want to learn coding)
- Coders' meetups
- Gamers (even if you don't game, say you want to start)
- Chees clubs

- Sports bars (I know, they suck, but try it)
- Entrepreneurs meetups

Then, once you're there:

#3. Send Available Signals

> #1 rule of social skills: make it easy for people to do what you want

And as a rule of thumb:

The more you seek long-term, the safer you want to make men feel to approach.

Why?
Because some guys will approach anyway.

And it's those guys who make women lose hope in finding a good boyfriend.
Because when the bar is high it's mostly players and drunk slobs who approach.

When you lower the bar, you also get more men who are not on the fringes.
And you get far better prospects.

Here are a few signs of availability without looking easy:

- Smile a lot & be social
- Be warm to men who approach to invite more of the same
- Talk to your friends and glance at good prospects
- Look at him, then look down
- Look at him, then smile

For more pictures and videos, check out "does she like me", where I break down the signals of attraction.

Tilted head and showing the neck invite him to approach
Now to make sure your potential boyfriend comes to you:

#4. Position Yourself Strategically

> Not even the best womanizers can hit on an hidden woman… Let alone normal guys

I actively seek to meet women when I go out.

And sometimes I'd like to (friendly) slap some women to instill them with some wisdom.

They stare at a guy, smile, talk to their girlfriend, and then look at him again… They give me all the typical signs of interest.

But they never move from sitting in their big circles of friends! It's as if they're scared to make it easy for a cool guy they like to say hi.

Be smarter instead:

Avoid These!

1. Going out with guys (men won't approach)
2. Sitting the whole time
3. Staying in the middle of your girlfriends
4. Getting too drunk
5. Flirting with everyone and getting to know no one

Do the following:

1. Go out with one girlfriend, two top
2. Go out by yourself
3. Move around a lot
4. Don't smoke, but go out in the smoking area
5. Go to the bathroom often and by yourself
6. Go outside by yourself for a breath of fresh air
7. Look at people dancing by yourself
8. Admire the view (if there's any)

Don't be afraid of being a bit by yourself: we are past the jungle age and guys don't carry a club anymore.
Not the bad kind at least (allow me at least one bad joke per article :).

#5. Fish The Office: Help Your Colleagues Make a Move

> Lower the bar in your social circle

Most relationships bloom in workplaces or social circles.

Great, so you also know they got a job and are not bums :).

It's too good a market to ignore.
Some of your colleagues are wary of mucking it up at work.

But that's not going to stop you.

The solution?

Spread through the grapevine that you love your colleagues.
You don't date colleagues BUT are happy to meet them for a drink.
That makes you more precious and lowers the pressure for guys to ask you out.

And if you end up hitting it off, it will only seem like you've made an exception just for him (and you even boost his self-esteem, how nice of you :).

And of course, to hell with that "no-colleagues" rule, you never meant it to begin with.
It's a stupid rule anyway.

Also, read:

- How to hit on colleagues

#6. Cast The Widest Net: Use Online Dating

> Which net catches the best fishes? The wide one!

Sometimes women ask me this:

> Should I use online dating?

And I can't believe what I'm hearing.
Like, you're looking for a relationship, and you're not yet using online dating??

That's like saying you have been looking for a job but aren't sure if you "also" should look online.
Nonsense!!

Sure, I get why some women aren't there yet.
I remember laughing once at the online description of a Tinder profile:

> I wish you had spoken to me on the metro instead

Yeah, I wished he had done that.

But he hasn't, so… Get real.

Of course in person is ideal and you dream of finding a boyfriend who'll sweep you off your feet.
But while we keep that dream alive, be realistic as well.
Hope for the best but also cast your net as wide as possible and you will get as many boyfriend candidates as possible.

Why Online Dating?

Many great men can be more on the shy side.

And many great men might not even approach at all.
Why should you miss on those? It's a huge market!

And of course, there are many high-quality men who are too busy to go to lots of social events.
And maybe they don't take the metro because they got cool cars :).

Plus, as Hussey says in "Get The Guy", the guys who are most likely to approach you are also more likely to be players. And too smooth an approach can be a sign of a womanizer.

#7. Give 'Em A Chance: Boring Men Make Great BFs

> Rejection give women a rush of power… Which they will enjoy all by themselves :)

How to get a boyfriend in the shortest possible time?

Give as many men a chance!

Why It's Important To Give "Boring Guys" A Chance

The paradox of choice says that the more options you have, the more unhappy you are while pondering too much and picking nothing.

Modernity is a huge dating paradox of choice.

Urban life, dating apps, social media, and Hollywood movies make us feel as if there are exciting men everywhere. Advertising further raises our expectations beyond reality.

The result?
Women wait and wait… And wait.

But the reality might be harsher: there aren't that many great men. And the more time goes by, the fewer there will be (math says so!).

Don't let that happen to you: to get a boyfriend, give those boys a chance.

Especially the ones that seem "boring".
"Boring" is not a disqualifier (keep on reading).
Boring is the new sexy.

I'm not sure where to go… Maybe I'll just stay put for a while

#8. Show Some Excitement

> Emotions are contagious. And honesty is refreshing.

Scarcity does up your value… Up to a very limited point.

But unavailable games are also often abused and misused.
I talk about it more in-depth in the 7 biggest mistakes women make in dating. For here, suffice to say that if you really wanna use scarcity, tweak it like this:

> You: I'm very busy and don't have much free time… But I can find some for someone who deserves it

Bang!
Now you communicated scarcity -if you really need to do that- plus showed him the light at the end of the tunnel.
And you built him up.

What to Text Before the Date

But best of all is showing candid interest.

Emotions are contagious, so he'll likely feel the same.
Plus, an honest gal is so refreshing in this day of game players!

Example:

I was working hard on this website those days.
So if she was going to cancel, I'd have been half-happy. But after she sent me that message with an empathic "yes!" and that she was looking forward to our date?
Then I was also looking forward to meeting her!

#9. Go Meet Him – Don't Flake

> Not once in history did a woman get a boyfriend by canceling a date

Once you set out the date, don't flake.

Don’t cancel and try not to reschedule.
The reason is deeply psychological -and scientific-.

The Science Behind It

It’s the sad reality of back-rationalization (AKA “sense-making” in psychology).

If you don’t make it happen soon, your mind will back-rationalize that maybe you didn’t like him that much.
That’s not true, but that’s how the mind works.

Example: Strike When It’s Hot

Many times I’ve had an underwhelming first encounter.
But we met quickly and things just happened.

Some other times I have had an amazing first encounter with a woman.
Then something happened and we had to reschedule the date.

And we never met again (example below).

We missed the first try. Missed the second too. And it never happened. It was a great connection, and maybe she’ll end up with some boring schmuck.

#10. Don’t Hope For The Spark: Develop It

> The spark is great. But love also builds over time: don’t depend on sparks, develop them

Listen to this story.

Aziz in his book The Tao of Dating talks about a girlfriend of his who had just been on a great date. The two daters talked for the whole night and they had so much in common.
But… She wasn’t sure she was going to see him again.
The reason? There was no spark.

Spark's Great...

Now don't get me wrong, I love initial chemistry.

It's amazing.

But The spark is cr@p as a predictor of long-lasting love and of commitment. If you are wondering how to get a boyfriend, that's NOT by looking at sparks.

I and this woman had a great spark.
With lots of fireworks soon after, too.
And see how it ended:

> Her: I feel so devasted, empty

My heart sinks reading that.

I'll always feel guilty thinking of that relationship -and those lines-.
But I couldn't help it getting deep into it because the chemistry was so crazy and we were so into each other.

Again, chemistry -and sexual fireworks- are crappy predictors of relationship success.

.. But love develops over time

Love is often like developing your passion: it builds over time.

People who feel the butterflies are often anxious attachment type dating an avoidant attachment type. And that's the recipe for the worst relationship you can have.
Indeed anxious women craving intimacy often pass up the best boyfriends –secure attachment types– because, well… They're too stable.

#11. Don't Be Too Needy

> Let his momma smother him

This is another very popular basic advice you know already.

And it's mostly for the girls out there who want to get a boyfriend but get too needy when they're about to get one (check Why Men Love Bitches).
However, in my experience, this is a minority of women in the West.

But if it's you, well, try to keep a balance of contact. Let's say no more than 1.-2 times for every time he contacts you.

Also, read:

- How to make him chase
- How to slow down sex

#12. ...But Don't Play Too Unavailable Either

> In a world of gamers, honest women shine bright

But don't play unavailable games either.
The whole dating advice industry is built on two (often wrong) fundamentals:

1. Be unavailable (make him chase)
2. Invest little (and make him invest much)

Both work, but almost nobody says they work only in specific scenarios and, often, with the wrong kind of guys.

It works with avoidants, the guys who can't commit, because they will be very happy that you keep the distance (and if you want to get a boyfriend, you need to screen these guys out).

If you want to get a boyfriend fast, I recommend you do the opposite.
Look at this woman and how she sped up the dating while also dropping games (and while also showing me a lesson and taking control of the dating process):

Also, read:

- Female dating strategies

#13. Move Forward In Unison

> Life is a tango. And there's no dance if the partner doesn't dance along

Bruce Bryan in Never Chase Men Again says that high-quality men have little tolerance for egocentric women.

Asking for the moon will not make you sound like a prize but like an entitled princess on a pea (and entitlement is a typical trait of low-quality women).

That's why you should move the relationship forward together with him. One steps him, one steps you. He comes towards you, you move further towards him.
He does something nice, you do something nice back.
That's how you advance steadily and resolutely toward a committed relationship.

Read more here:

- How to get high-quality men with reciprocal investment

How to Test Men for Relationships

If he doesn't do much to further the relationship, I like this technique: the big surprise.

For example, invite him home where you have a home-cooked dinner with a top wine, candles, and all.
Then, if he appreciates and gives back to you, he's a keeper.
If he doesn't, you might want to drop him.

And that's how to get a boyfriend the smart woman way. You quickly screen out the time-wasters who can't commit, and quickly find those who are happy to be your boyfriend.

#14. Demand Commitment (Early)

> Good things come to those who don't wait

Some dating coaches would want you to behave as if you never wanted a relationship in a million years.

I say I've never heard the biggest BS than that.

Some others swung in the opposite direction and would want you to ask for a relationship before sex. I say that's way out of line and will only work, again, with men you probably don't want as boyfriends (read: should you delay sex).

What Is The Solution?
The solution is to ask for commitment as soon as you have enough leverage to do so.

In doubt, sooner is better than later.

Steve Harvey in "Act Like a Lady Think Like a Man" recommends you ask for a relationship early because demanding commitment shows you've got standards. And standards are a sign of quality.
And I couldn't agree more.

Here's the line my last committed relationship used on me:

> You: I don't do sex outside of relationships

We were already intimate, and the fact we were having a great time together was all leverage for her to come up with that very early -like 3rd date or so-.
She doesn't threaten anything directly, which you should never do, but does two great things:

1. Shows her value: she's not a fu*k buddy type of gal
2. Indirectly* implies we might not see each other without commitment

Exactly like we like it: ruthless, yet feminine and kind.

> Shoot. Or get off the range

You Got a Boyfriend. Now What?

Now relationship skills take center stage.

But it would be beyond the scope of this article.
For now, congrats :).
Then later you can start reading about relationship strategies :).

Cheers!

SUMMARY

And here's a one-sentence summary on how to get a boyfriend ASAP:

1. Cast your net wide
2. Meet many
3. Date many
4. Go deeper with a few you like, and then it's:
5. Commit quick or get off the pot.

Love Maps For Strong Relationships: Examples & Exercises

Lucio Buffalmano · 21 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

As per John Gottman's research, love maps are a fundamental element to make relationships work in the long run.

Taking care of your love maps, or the knowledge you have about your partner, will make sure you keep a happy, long-lasting relationship.

This article will explain:

- What is a love map and how it's a form of strategic intelligence
- Why love maps are the foundation for a resilient relationship
- How you can use a love map example to proactively improve your relationship

- SUMMARY

What Is a Love Map

John Gottman is funny sometimes.

He seems to have little sense of marketing and uses complex names that bare little resemblance to reality and which confuse instead of helping.

But the definition of a love map is super simple:

> A love map is the knowledge you have about your partner.

Sounds simple?
Yes, because it is!

And what, it gets better: building a love map means getting to know your partner.

But don't close the page just yet.
If it were just that simple, we wouldn't have even needed an article on it. But there is something more in store for you.

The more you know about your partner, the richer your love map is. Here are some examples of a love map:

- Major events in your partner's life
- Goals and dreams
- Worries and fears
- Favorite food, cities, holidays, etc.

Why Love Maps Need Updates

The bulk of the love map stays the same.

Once you deeply get to know your partner, you've got most of your map. But it doesn't end there, of course.

As your partner grows and changes, so should the love maps.

Updating love maps means you stay curious about your partner, and it's crucial to keep the relationship strong.
Why?
Because updating love maps sends the message that you care about your partner.

Updates are where most couples slip

At the beginning of a relationship, it's easier to build love maps.

This might be even more true in more traditional cultures or in cultures with longer dating periods before sex (of course, that's on average: staying longer without sex is obviously no guarantee that the couple is any good at building love maps).

As time goes by though it's unluckily rather common that couples start taking each other for granted and stop updating their love maps and asking about each other.
As Brene Brown points out in Daring Greatly, stopping to care, or disengagement, is the first sign of betrayal.
Indeed as we will see in the love map examples, that's the perfect recipe for romance to die -and extramarital affairs to blossom-.

Why Love Maps Are The Foundation of a Relationship

Gottman says that couples who stay together for the long haul stay together for a reason. And that's usually not because of great sex, lack of arguments, or power of will.

It's usually because they like each other. And liking has a strong relationship with how well we know each other and how well we keep being interested in each other.

Love Maps & Love

Without a love map, you can't really know your partner. And if you don't really know someone, how can you truly love them?

Staying together without love maps indeed sends a very bad message.
If you don't care to get to know the person, you basically communicate you are with your partner because you had no other options. You couldn't get any better, she's got a vagina (or penis), and boom, there you are.
Now, don't tell your partner, but even if that weren't true, you can still grow fond of each other.
Deepen those love maps, and start being together growing love and appreciation.

Love Maps Are Like Insurance

In The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work, Gottman says that deep love maps give solid foundations to a marriage. Couples with rich love maps indeed cope better with the stressful events in their lives.
A strong love map will strengthen the bond, and that bond will keep you going when the going gets tough.

On the other hand, if you don't start with deep love maps it will be easy to lose your direction when a major upset hits you.

Examples of Love Maps

Here are a few examples of love maps from relationships:

#1. Pillow Talk Love Maps

Bedroom conversation can often be the perfect time to expand our love maps. Pillow talk after an orgasm is also a perfect time to expand on sexual love maps.

Here is an example from “Crazy Stupid Love”:

https://youtu.be/vFvWh_XSnK4?t=60s
Note that the above relationship example is just starting. As we’ve mentioned, it’s easier to start with deep love maps. But it doesn’t mean everyone does it well.
Start well and you’re halfway through!

#2 Deep Romance Love Maps

Before Sunrise is the perfect example of love maps romance.

The whole movie is basically based on the magic and romance of love maps and getting to know the partner like nobody else has ever known them.

Here is a great example:

The opposite instead are relationships with no love maps, or with zero updates:

3. Dead Relationships Lack of Love Maps

The movie Fargo is an example of a completely absent love map.

Notice she tries to build him up without asking him how he feels, which is a bit of empty support.

But it’s on his side that it gets really terrible.
He knows nothing about his wife’s life and his “I love you” sounds empty and meaningless. When we love somebody we know nothing about, it’s fair to think we’re in love with our own made-up image, not with the person.

#4. Affair Love Maps

Now it gets even more interesting.

A lack of love maps pushes partners into affairs. Indeed statistics say that most affairs, especially for women, start in the workplace and with an emotional bond first –read here how emotional affairs begin-.

It’s not uncommon for affair partners to say “you understand me so much better” (love map is not the same as understanding someone, but you can’t have understanding without love maps).

Here is a good example:

Updating Love Maps Prevents Affairs

Updating love maps is indeed a great antidote to affairs.

It keeps the connection going and the romance fresh. And it creates a “team effect” with which the couple takes on the world a duo, not as separate entities.

Love Map Questions

To deepen your love maps you can ask each other any kind of question and branch off from there.

I would start from the deeper, most basic stuff.
Here are some examples:

Deep Maps

- What did you want to do as a kid
- Why you didn't do that
- How did you end up doing what you do now
- Does satisfy you?
- If not, what would you want to do now if you could do anything?
- Is that your dream?
- If not, what would you say is your dream life?
- If you could be paid the same you're paid now, what would you do?
- Don't you think you could do that, somehow?
- How would you like to be remembered
- Do you care about leaving a mark on this world?

Current Maps

- What are you busy with these days
- What worries you these days
- The best thing that happened to you in the last week
- What are you looking forward to the most in your daily life
- What are you looking forward to the most in the upcoming month
- Your favorite way to spend this evening?

Other People in Their Life

- Favorite colleagues
- Most hated colleague
- Most handsome/beautiful colleague
- Best friend
- How are your friends doing
- What's your relationship like with your friends now
- Has anything happened to your friend
- When did you last speak to your family
- What did you say
- Who do you look forward the most to seeing

Personal Preferences

- Best way to soothe?
- What dish do you look forward to the most
- Favorite sexual position
- How do you usually orgasm
- Best holiday ever
- If you could go anywhere, where would you go right now? Why?
- The next book you would like to read
- What team do you support if your team is out of the competition?

- Your most secret ambition you would never tell anyone
- A secret you have never told anyone

As you can see you can really go wild about it. And I bet many of these answers are unknown to you your partner.

Love Maps Games

Instead of asking your partner, let your partner come up with one of the questions above -or simply make your own questions-. Then you talk about what you think your partner would reply.

Then listen to what your partner says and use it as a discussion topic to deepen your love maps and to better get to know your partner.

SUMMARY

In a nutshell, why should you care about love maps and getting to know your partner better and better?

This why:

1. The better you know your partner, the more solid your relationship
2. The more you ask, the more you care (and the more your partner feels cared for)
3. The more you share, the deeper the bond and the higher the quality of the relationship

Bids for Connection: How to Build Emotional Intimacy in Your Relationship

Lucio Buffalmano · 22 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Bids for connections can build or destroy emotional intimacy, and may even make or break a relationship.

Recognizing them and 'turning towards' requires empathy and advanced social skills.

By the end of this article, you will know how to recognize an emotional bid and how to correctly turn toward, developing empathy and social skills on the way.

What Is A Bid For Connection

A bid for connection is any attempt—a question, a comment, a gesture, or an action—to get a partner's attention, affirmation, or emotional support. It's an invitation to engage, requiring "turning toward" to support a partner, and strengthen the emotional bond.

These bids for connections are often unspoken, which is why many men low on empathy miss them.

We can define "emotional connection" as follows:

> An emotional connection is the attunement couples have to each other's feelings.

We connect emotionally every time we recognize that something is meaningful to our partners and we turn towards them.
Every time our partner wants to connect with us (bid for connection) and we turn towards them, we build emotional connection.

This example will clear everything out for you:

Bid for Connection	Turning Towards	Turning Away	Turning Against
Wife screens the room and signs: I gave that presentation today. I was so nervous...	Oh really? Tell me about, how did it go!	Husband looking up: Hmmmm OK.	Whatever, can't you see I'm working?

Turning Towards & Emotional Connection

Turning Towards is the expression John Gottman uses for emotional connection.
This article is based in large part on Gottman's work, but I will be using the expression "emotional connection" in place of "turning towards".

1. Turning Towards

Turning towards is what builds trust and emotional connection. To turn towards, one must first recognize the bids for connection.

Recognizing Bids for Connection

Bids for connection are attempts for affection, attention or any type of positive connection.

In The Relationship Cure, Gottman says that recognizing bids for connection requires a bit of emotional intelligence as it's not always straightforward to recognize a bid for connection. Sometimes a comment is pure "transactional", meaning that our partner wants to get something done or just says something with no feelings or deeper meaning behind it.

However, as you get to your know your partner better -"expand your love maps" in Gottman's wording-, you will naturally become better and better at recognizing bids for connection.

Bids for Connection & Gender

As a rule of thumb, women make more bids for connection than men.

Men make less bids for connection when the health of the relationship deteriorates. Women instead keep making the same amount of bids independently of the health of the relationship.

This gives men a great chance to turn things around by turning towards those bids more often when things aren't going well.

When People Miss Bids for Emotional Connections

Missing a bid for connection is the equivalent of turning away.

And it's important to get bids for emotional connections right because Gottman research shows that people will not try again 80% of the times.

Recognizing Hidden Bids

Sometimes bids for emotional connection are not even verbally expressed but hide behind a complaint, a criticism or an argument. In Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage Gottman refers to them as "longing behind the criticism".
Here's an example:

Notice how he recognizes her bid for emotional connection beyond her facade aggressiveness.

2. Turning Away

Turning away can happen because the partner:

- Lacks emotional sensitivity
- Doesn't care
- Is engaging in suppressed negativity (passive aggressiveness, stonewalling)

This is an example of a guy lacking emotional sensitivity and misses all the chances to turn towards her partner:

Notice his mistakes:

> "It's not that big of a deal"

And looks away instead of fully engaging

> I don't know what to say, what do you want me to do

He's obviously not paying attention to the emotional conversation going on. He needs to attune and turn towards -and she could do a better job to communicate it more clearly-.

Emotional Connection & Infidelity

A lack of emotional connection in the relationship is one of the major causes of infidelity.

The movie The Good Girl is fully based on infidelity born out of emotional disconnection:

3. Turning Against

Turning against is less often suppressed negativity and more often about full blown belligerence.

This includes the whole gamut of relationship killers: criticism, contempt, defensiveness and meanness. If belligerence starts to supersede the positive aspects of the relationship it can often give birth to a vicious circle of negativity.

Emotional Connection & Relationships Impact

John Gottnam followed newly wed couples for 6 years.

At the 6 year mark he noticed that couples who were still married turned towards each other 86% of the times. And couple that divorced turned towards each other only 33% of the times.

That's the kind of difference that turning towards each other and building emotional connection does for a relationship.

Emotional Connection Examples

And as usual, here are some example to better understand through practical examples.

#1. Fake Turn Towards Example

Sweet Dreams (1985) has a great example of what I'd call a "fake turn towards".

Let's see:

He turns towards only verbally.

He has no follow up questions and, most of all, he doesn't turn towards with his body language. She gives him another chance when she says:

> Ask me something else? Come on, let's have a conversation

But he turns away once again. And he shows how clueless he is when he says "I don't want to have a fight with you". Of course she doesn't want a fight, she wanted some attention and emotional connection.

#2. Turn Away Example

Here's a real life example of turning away. It needs little explanations:

A good example of how learning to turn towards can drastically improve a relationship.

#3. Sexually Turning Away

Bid for (sexual) connections are particularly obvious when initiating sex.

Turning away or against in this case can be particularly painful for the partner as it's a double rejection.

Here is an example from "Wake Up That Libido" (1996):

#4. Turning Towards

And, albeit it was very easy for him to spot, here's a turning towards example.

Notice that the conversation soon takes a bad turn, but the beginning is typical turning towards.

Learn to turn towards and to stay on that emotional wave, and you're golden.

How to Emotionally Connect

To emotionally connect better, we can do a few things:

1. Improve your emotional intelligence

We can learn body language, nonverbal and typical situations when people make bids for connection (ie.: after a loss, when grieving, when feeling lonely etc.)

2. Communicate Clearly

Our partner can't read our minds and might not be highly emotionally intelligent.
That's OK, we can help train them!

Instead of hiding behind an argument, we have to make it clear to our partner that we are making a bid for attention. This is how secure attachment types communicate.

3. Learn about your partner

Here's how to kill two birds with a stone: the more you know your partner, the stronger your relationship. And the more you know your partner, the more you will know when they are making a bid for connection.
Read how to get to know your partner.

4. Listening Without Offering Empty Reassurance

Sometimes it's difficult listening to our partner's pain. Especially if we feel like we caused. But responding with "don't worry, it will be fine" does not feel like support.
It feels like you don't want to be bothered by her feelings.
Much better instead to say something like: "of course you are upset, anyone would be upset".

5. Don't Dismiss and Minimize

Many couples fight because men dismiss their partners' emotions instead of attuning. To avoid dismissing emotions and keep a strong emotional connection in your relationship, avoid all of the following when she's sharing her feelings:

- Minimize them (or say she's exaggerating)
- Fix them
- Try to distract her from them
- Make fun of them
- Mock them
- Ignore them

Men shouldn't think of emotions as troubles that need to be fixed, but as opportunities for emotional connection.

6. Do The Following

1. Take turns to speak
2. Don't give advice, just listen first (women react more negatively to quick advise)
3. Force yourself to listen non-defensively even if it's about something you did wrong
4. Show genuine interest
5. Communicate your understanding
6. Take your partner side
7. Express a 'we against others' attitude
8. Express affection (say I love you, put arm around them)
9. Validate emotions (empathize)

SUMMARY

Turning towards our partner when they make a bid for connection increases our emotional connection in relationships. Emotional connection is the difference between great relationships and floundering ones.

What is Relationship Influence

Influence is the ability to affect a partner's attitudes, beliefs, and actions.

Accepting influences instead means influence means taking your partner's opinion into account, and being open to use her (or his) input to decide together on what to do as a couple.

Basically, it means that for decisions that impact both of you, both of you get a say.
Sounds fair, right?

And from a power dynamics point of view, accepting influence providers the relationship leader with more legitimacy and, ultimately, more power.

Why Relationship Influence Matters

Let's start with a big WHY.

Why should you care and why should you learn to accept influence?

Researches show that there's a strong correlation between accepting the partner's influence and both the level of happiness and the life expectancy of the relationship.

In The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work Gottman says that 81% of couples that don't accept influence split up.

And of course, even if you don't split up, you end in a combative relationship which really does not make your life a great one.

Better Conflict Resolution

There's a strong correlation between accepting influence and the ability to tackle issues successfully.

Indeed The Four Horsemen of criticism, contempt, stonewalling and, most of all, defensiveness, are often the sign that a partner is resisting influence.

And it's not a coincidence that 65% of men increase negativity during an argument. It's because they are resisting influence with a barrage of counterattacks instead.

Incresed Influence

Contrary to what some might think, accepting your partner's influence is the best way to acquire more respect, power and influence.

Cialdini in his seminal Influence shows that even in business negotiations, giving and compromising on something is a great indicator of successful negotiation outcomes.

Women are also more likely to be kinder during confrontations when their partners accept their influence.

Gender Dynamics: It's Harder For Men

Accepting influence is harder for men.

Research shows that a majority of women—even in unhappy relationships—do accept influence.

It doesn't mean of course, that women are always agreeable or make fewer mistakes.
But it does mean they let their men influence their decision-making and that they do take their men's opinions and feelings into account.

It also seems that it's mostly and heterosexual men's issue. Heterosexual men are indeed the very worst at accepting influence.

Research shows that same-sex couples, including gays, are far better at sharing power and influence.

No Bashing, But Knowledge For Power

The Power Moves is a website to grow and empower onself.

However, power doens't come from dominating others. Power means achieving your goals, which in a good life include a good and healthy relationships.

So learning to accept influence is empowering because it improves relationship quality for both.
Often, accepting influence also means that our partner is more likely to accept our influence. This is a basic principle of interpersonal dynamics based on reciprocity (Cialdini, 1984).

Personalities Who Struggle Accepting Influence

Some people are higher dominance than others.

And while dominance per se isn't necessarily bad, domineering, with a 'need for winning', generally is.

We called this approach 'power-hungry' before, and this personality has difficulty in accepting influence.

And these are exactly the people who need to work the hardest on themselves and on their relationships.
There's a different, more problematic breed of people who refuse influence, though. These are what we call "power addicts". For power addicts it's almost impossible to share power and accept influence.
I wrote an article on it:

- Relationship with a power addict

In a nutshell, it's hard to even get these people to change because they see changing/not changing as another power struggle they need to win (instead of a step towards a better life and relationship).

It's A Balance: BOTH Must Accept Influence

This article is also not to say that men should give up all their power, accept everything, and never influence their spouses themselves.

Relinquishing all power is the safest way to turn a woman off.
But it does mean that men should share more power and take their partner's opinion more into account.

Example of accepting influence from a position of power

In my last relationship, for example, I'd openly tell my girlfriend that the man should be the one in charge.
But it's a sharing the decision kind of thing, as she's the second in command.

And based on the division of tasks and responsibilities, of course, there are situations where I am the sole decision maker or she is the sole decision maker.
And the other simply trusts the partner to handle those matters.

How to Accept Influence: Mental Shift

There is a simple way to fix all influence-related issues in a relationship.

It requires a shift in the way people see the world.
It's about going from a zero-sum game of win or lose and "I" VS "her" to an "us".

It's about deciding together, finding compromises both are happy with and respecting our partner. We should want our partner to be happy and to participate in the decision.

Anything else is relationship-deranged thinking.

More, it's WEAK.
Only weak men stay in relationships they don't want.

So if you are in a relationship, ensure it's a good relationship.

And one of the best approaches to good relationships is leading the relationship, with win-win in mind.

A good mindset:

> If only one partner wins, then they're both losing

Examples of Accepting Influence

And here are a few ways of dealing with relationship power struggles:

#1. Refusal of Influence

Look at this example.

Grant Cardone utterly refuses her influence on the topic. And goes even one step beyond when he recruits the help of the people in the audience to isolate her.
Simply terrible.

See if for yourself:

Her reaction says it all.

#2. Fake Acceptance of Influence

The Godfather when Kay is leaving alternates from a fake acceptance of influence to outright refusal.

Fake Acceptance
When he says "I will change Kay" he is giving her a front about changing. But it doesn't sound sincere.

He doesn't take the time to listen to her, doesn't take the time understand her, which would show that he cares.
It's no coincidence that when he says: "I know how you felt" he actually totally misses the point.

Refusal of Influence
When he tells her the discussion is over, that's an obvious refusal of influence.

Accepting Influence Quiz

Ask yourself the following questions about. Does your partner:

- Listen attentively to your opinion and needs
- Make you feel what you say count
- Listen even when you're having an argument
- Takes care you share your point of view
- Respects you during disagreements and conflicts
- Avoid making it all about winning
- Believe in give and take
- Believe in "shared leadership"
- Use all his persuasion skills when deciding about something

- Approaches problems with a win-win mentality
- Approaches problems like you need to solve them, not win them
- Lets you finish to make your point
- Tells you when you have a good idea
- Usually looks for points of agreements
- Largely avoids getting overly emotional (or hysterical)

If you answer yes, then you (or your partner) can accept each other's influence.
If your answers are mostly no, then you need to work on this.

SUMMARY

Accepting your partner's influence, deciding together and caring about what she thinks is really one of the best things you can do in your relationship.

And it's exactly what high quality men, relationship leaders do.

It's one of the pillars upon which any healthy relationship rests.
I think the following quote will perfectly summarize this article:

> Accepting your partner influence communicates you care and respect her. And it means being in it together, as an us instead of I.

David and Goliath: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- Always think how to turn your disadvantage into an advantage
- Don't compare yourself to the brightest: focus on your uniqueness
- Sometimes advantages can "U-turn" and, above a certain threshold, weaken us

Full Summary

About The Author: Malcolm Gladwell is a Canadian journalist, public speaker and author of several books on psychology and, frankly, pop-psychology.
Among his other best sellers are Blink, The Tipping Point and my personal favorite, Outliers.

Don't Compare Yourself to The Brightest

Malcolm Gladwell says we usually compare ourselves to the very brightest out there.

But it's a mistake because, in comparison, we suffer relative deprivation, which leads us to lose confidence and self-esteem.
The author says that's one of the reasons why top tier schools have a higher drop out rate: the students there compare themselves with the best of the best.

The alternative? Stop comparing yourself and follow your own path and uniqueness.

Focus on Uniqueness

Gladwell says that most of the times when the underdogs beat the most powerful opponent, they didn't go head to head in direct opposition. Instead, they fought with unconventional tactics leveraging their strengths.

If you are weaker then, don't seek direct confrontation, but leverage unconventional tactics that will level the playing field.
Read 33 Strategies of Warfare for more.

The Curse of Wealth

Gladwell says that children from very wealthy families can struggle more than poorer ones.

Why?

Because they don't learn the importance of hard work and fending for themselves.
This is also a topic explored in The Millionaire Mind and what Daymond refers to when he says that being broke can be an advantage (become a subscriber to read "The Power of Broke").

The Power of Disabilities

Malcolm Gladwell says that people with learning difficulties sometimes end up being much more successful than "normal" people.

Why so?

They work around their issue by developing strengths in other areas that normal people never took the time to explore.

For example, David Boies, one of the most successful lawyers in the US, is dyslexic. And since reading was difficult for him, he developed an uncanny ability to read witnesses and spot possible lies.

[image]

Real Life Applications

Be Prepared to Unsettle
Gladwell says that entrepreneurs are much more disagreeable than the average, and that leaders took social risks by not compromising their beliefs.
The message: to reap big success, sometimes you have to be ready to piss off someone.

Steel Yourself
Watch out for too much mollycoddle in your life: it can take your hedge off. Keep pushing yourself instead.

CONS

Malcolm Gladwell books are easy and interesting to read. But they're not very factual.

For example:

- The Revist of David and Goliath is Bogus

I don't buy the way Gladwell revisits the David and Goliath history by flipping the script.

He says Goliath was probably affected by giantism, which made him slow and nearly blind.

David instead was a more effective fighter because of his slingshot experience.
Slingers, he says, were "the most important" part of the artillery back in the days and "time and time again" the decisive factor against infantry.
Hence, David was the one with the real advantage there.

The story makes no sense to me.
If Goliath was such an ineffective fighter, why would the Philistines send him to fight?
Because they wanted to set themselves up to lose? Doesn't make sense.

But mots of all, the way Gladwell tells the story, he makes it sound as if David's win was inevitable.
The way he overblows slingers' accuracy is also nonsense.
Snipers will miss many shots today with perfectly engineered rifles with a scope. Let alone if David couldn't miss with a slingshot!

Gladwell also overplays the power of slingers in history warfare: if infantry, cavalry and archers and not slingers were the numerically predominant fighting force, there was a good reason for it.
You can hear this story in his TED Talk.

TL;DR: the re-visitation of Goliath being the underdog rests on shaky ground at best.
Listen to Gladwell to learn how to deliver a good storytelling speech and to increase your critical thinking, but NOT to learn factual information.

- Disjointed

"David and Goliath" talks about underdogs, entrepreneurs, people facing big obstacles and the effect of a harsh punishment system. I find the link among all these topics tenuous.

PROS

I have been very critical above, but there are several good points in "David and Goliath".
For me, one of the best was this:

- Great Insight on Entrepreneurs Psychology

I loved the analysis Gladwell makes of entrepreneurs and leaders from a social perspective. Entrepreneurs, for example, are very high on disagreeableness.
And successful leaders took big social gambles by not compromising their beliefs to avoid making waves.

- Good take on turning weaknesses into strengths.

Turning weaknesses into strengths and stunning wins is certainly possible a surprising number of times in life. And if "David and Goliath" will help you just to get into that type of mindset, than it will have been worth it.

Review

David and Goliath, in a nutshell, says that advantages are not always advantages and disadvantages can instead become our strengths.

I didn't find the Gladwell particularly insightful here, but I like the message of using our weaknesses as our strengths (something I talk about in leveraging pain and failure).

From a mindset perspective of turning obstacle into advantages, I preferred The Obstacle is The Way.
But overall, David and Goliath has lots of great insight, some of which also very inspirational.
And of course, Gladwell knows how to write. All his books have been NYT best sellers, so you can definitely learn how to write a successful book and how to tell a story.

Fondness and Admiration: Gottman's Secret to Stay In Love (Explained)

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

How to stay in love might sound like a silly question.

Turns out, it's true what someone said: there are no silly questions, only silly answers.

And the answer to "how to stay in love" is fondness and admiration.

Let's go step by step.

- SUMMARY

The Beginning of Love

Limerence is a term coined by psychologist Dorothy Tennov in his book Love and Limerence.

Since then, it has rapidly been accepted in the scientific community as a valid concept.

People sometimes refer to limerence as the "honeymoon phase", "butterflies in the stomach" or "puppy love".

Some sources even list “having a crush” as a form of limerence.

When in limerence we often feel the following:

- Happy and upbeat
- constant thoughts about our partner
- strong sexual attraction for our partner
- desire for reciprocation
- craving to see our partner
- hope and optimism for the future
- when reciprocated, a feeling that nothing could tear you apart

Now, that last point is the most important.

Because when limerence is still going strong, we don’t notice much of our partners’ flaws. And when we do notice, we also tend to accept them and to be confident that we can overcome them.

But what when limerence ends?

Turns out, what breaks many relationships is the failed transition between the “butterfly love face”, or limerence, and the “real” relationship right after.

Let’s dig deeper.

After Limerence

Dorothy Tennov says limerence can last from a few weeks to several decades, but the average is 18 months to three years.

Once the limerence is over, our blinders also come off.
The romantic attraction might still be there, but it’s not anymore the main driver that keeps us together.

And all the small issues that bothered us at the beginning started screaming louder and louder.
And if we are not careful contempt, criticism, and stonewalling can all plant their ugly roots right after limerence and poison our relationships.

And to stay together in a happy, healthy relationship we need something else.
What can we do then to keep love alive?

How to Stay In Love

Fondness and admiration are the second layer of Gottman’s solid foundation for a relationship to work (the first being love maps).

Fondness and admiration are the perfect antidote to the limerence expiration date and they are the perfect way to keep us focused on the positives.

Because of the positive atmosphere they foster, they are also the perfect antidote to vicious circles and contempt as well.

Fondness and Admiration Examples

Being fond of your partner includes the following:

- Feeling of pride for your partner
- Liking our partner

- Attraction for our partner

Here are a few ways to express it:

- It drives me wild when you… (come back home and start kissing me)
- I'm really proud of you… (getting that promotion)
- I love how you… (smell so good before coming to bed)
- I am really impressed by your… (knowledge on X topic)
- I really respect you because of… (strong values)
- I very much appreciate that you… (work so hard for us)
- Thank you for… (admitting that)

When Love Expires

When love expires without fondness, we could get a vicious spiral into the four horsemen of the apocalypse and a separation.

But it's also possible the couple stays together. Indeed, as Mira Kirshenbaum wrote, divorce is an overrated predictor of poor relationships.
Many poor relationships indeed never end. They just stay poor.

This is a perfect, sad example of a relationship fully devoid of fondness and admiration:

Staying In Love Test

Read the statements below and think whether or not they apply to you.
Do you:

1. Touch and kiss affectionately
2. Say "I love you"
3. Respect each other
4. Feel loved
5. Think of your partner fondly when away
6. Can easily list 3 things you admire about your partner
7. Feel accepted and liked
8. Feel proud of your partner
9. Enjoy his achievements
10. Can easily say you dated him
11. Feel he finds you attractive and sexy
12. Think there's fire and passion
13. Feel turned on by him
14. Would date him again if you could go back
15. Feel romance is still alive
16. Sleep showing affection
17. Feel glad when you see your partner
18. Appreciate the things your partner often does
19. Feel your partner generally likes your personality

20. Feel satisfied with your sex life

If you can say yes to more than 10 questions, your relationship is very healthy.
If you score poorly, not everything is lost. Sometimes fondness and admiration must be re-discovered beneath layers of negativity.
You can start with the exercise below.

Staying in Love Examples

Here's an example of appreciation I liked:

> Her: Thank you for admitting that

Coupled with her expression of sincere gratefulness, it makes it a great moment of appreciation and admiration.
If she wanted to go one step further she could have added "thank you for admitting that. I really love you when you are so honest".

Exercises to Stay In Love

In The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work, Gottman introduces an exercise helping couples rediscover fondness and admiration and stay in love.

The idea is to pick 3 positive adjectives from a list that describe your partner.
Then name situations when your partner recently showed those qualities. And tell them about it.

- Loving
- Graceful
- Thrifty
- Strong
- Committed
- Relaxed
- Tender
- Powerful
- Sexy

The idea of this exercise is not to do it once and end it. The idea is to kick-start a habit.

Creating Shared Meaning

The second level of this exercise is to go deeper. Explore with your partner why you picked the virtues that you picked.

And articulate why they are important to you. This is why you will better get to know your partner and you will create shared meaning.

SUMMARY

The beginning of love is always great.

But to build strong, healthy, and long-lasting relationships, we need to throw the basis and foundation for when the "butterflies phase" runs out.

We do it by building a culture of appreciation, fondness, and admiration.
This article gave you a few examples and an exercise on staying in love forever.

Go Pro: Why We Don't Recommend Network Marketing (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In Go Pro (2013) Eric Worre teaches readers how to become a successful networking marketing professional. Thanks to its step-by-step guide and the author's in-depth expertise, Go Pro is considered the Bible of network marketing.

TPM Strategic Audit: Tactical Persuasion in Predatory Systems
Go Pro is the definitive manual for Network Marketing (MLM)—a business model we generally advise against for our high-agency and ambitious readership. However, we maintain this review to understand the power dynamics and potentially manipulative dynamics of MLM (and as a warning for anyone interested in joining MLM organizations). Our readers can also learn from Eric Worre, an outstanding communicator.

Main Takeaways

- MLM pitch is that network marketing is a dream job <— TPM's note: Only for a very few people (many of whom are the founders)
- It takes effort, time, and commitment
- Never stop learning, but most of all, never stop applying it

Notes

About the Author:
Erico Worre is an American author and self-made man. He is a proponent of network marketing and teaches people how to be successful at it.

Introduction

Eric Worre says being a network marketer is an amazing job. It can actually be a dream job. But as for anything else, you must put in the work.

Worre's Three Levels of Network Marketer

He says there are three levels of network marketers:

- Poser: want quick profit without time and effort investment
- Amateurs: they have some talent and will, but lack total commitment
- Pros: total commitment and drive to becoming the best they can possibly be

TPM Note: The 'pros' may as well consider putting that much work into their own business

Mechanics in MLM Sales Funnels

Worre breaks down the main sales work into these 'seven skills':

1. Finding Prospects

Professionals approach

1. Write down everyone you know
2. Write down everyone they know
3. Add 1-2 persons a day
4. Network with your recruitment goals in mind

2. Inviting

Think like a farmer more than like a hunter. Build trust and relationships: educate more than sell. Invite them to a presentation or to a seminar.
And invite your prospects in a way that's easy to replicate so that you can invite a large number of people.

Eric Worre also has a few power moves tips to be used for phone and face-to-face invites:

1. Be in a hurry – people are attracted to those who have lots going on
2. Compliment
3. Make the invitation
4. If I were, would you? – ask if they'd try the product if you gave them one
5. Confirmation #1 – ask when they think they will try it
6. Confirmation #2 – confirm commitment ". So if I call you at X, you tried it, right?
7. Confirmation #3 – schedule the follow-up
8. Get off the phone – close the conversation

This is the formula that will book you prospect meetings, says Worre.

TPM Note: Common 'hard selling' tactics, and only works with outstanding products
"These are 'Urgency Frames.' By appearing busy, you artificially inflate your status and lower the prospect's time to think. It may be effective with more naive and more passive (rather than assertive) people, but we don't recommend becoming this 'pushy' type of salesman. And overusing it with friends harms your relationships.
Also, without outstanding products, this will not translate nearly as well to income.

3. Present Your Product

It's never about you, it's about the presentation. Here are four steps to a captivating story:

1. your story
2. what you didn't like about your story
3. how does your product/company rescue you
4. your results and feelings

A quick win is to simply model your presentation on the successful people in your upline.

4. Follow Up

Eric Worre says the only reason for exposure is to set up the next one. It takes an average of 4-6 exposures for people to join but can take more than 10. So be patient… But persistent.

Some people won't believe enough in themselves or in network marketing. Be empathic: explain without getting defensive.
The author proposes you use the feel, felt, found strategy, such as: empathize first, say about someone who felt the same way, and how they changed for the better with your product.

5. Sign'Em Up

Assume they will join, reassure them you will be there to help, and always have the documents ready.
Here are some questions:

1. How much would you like to earn
2. How much time can you commit to that goal
3. For how long would you do it to get that income
4. If I can show you plant to do just that, are you ready to start?

6. Help Them Start

Make sure they know all the best practices and that they know where to get all the information and products.

For a great start, you need to set the right expectations and give them some early wins. Here is what you should make clear to them:

1. You're there as a guide, but success is up to them
2. Your task is to let them be independent of you ASAP

7. Attending Events

Do attend your company's destination events. They are huge learning and networking opportunities and being around those who made it will give you all the motivation.

Eric Worre In Action: Power Dynamics

I recommend you listen to Eric Worre. The guy is a wonderful communicator and a smart man.
If you want to check out this interview he's done with Larry King, it's masterful.

Notice what he says to Larry King:

He turns the hard question on King and makes it into a compliment, thus getting off the hard question and buying goodwill at the same time. Masterful.

Criticism

On top of thinking that most -but not all- network marketing schemes are quasi-Ponzi schemes pushing average, over-hyped products, I think this is another huge handicap of this business:

Family and Friends Burner Lister = Lost Social Capital

I don't like the idea of starting to pitch family and friends. They are obliged to listen to you because of your relationships, but let's face it: you will annoy most of them.

Why would you want to bother the people closest to you?

Start with those you don't know, and your family and friends will come to you once they see success.
But don't start burning the people close to you (that's my opinion at least).

Also, read here:

- Why network marketing sucks you dry

⚠ MLM is NOT Entrepreneurship, It's No-Salary Salesman

I don't believe you can call network marketing entrepreneurship. Unless you started it, you're not an entrepreneur. And you don't learn and you don't earn like an entrepreneur does.

Instead, an MLM "Pro" is actually just an unpaid commission-only salesperson for someone else's company. Real power comes from building the system, not being the most efficient cog in it.

It's Only The Founders Who Benefit (IF It Succeeds)

It seems to me that most network marketing companies only really benefit the owners.

And you're working for the founders' benefits much more so than if you were an employee, so I don't buy this idea of "being your own boss".

I struggle not to see network marketing schemes as pyramid-selling organizations as great for the top… And terrible for the bottom.
You can still make lots of money, but I believe you still need not only all the skills and dedication but also an early start in the company.

Overpriced Goods

This is a question I've always had: how can you have so many layers of marketers all making money on the final product without the final product being overpriced?

My answer is that you can't.
And if you want to be your own boss or be an entrepreneur, I would recommend you not to get into multilevel marketing.

PROS

The 3 Levels Examples
I liked the example of the 3 levels of people.

Good Sales Techniques
The sales techniques are a bit pushy at times, but it's a good process that Eric lays out in Go Pro.

Lucio's Experience With MLM

I have been approached a few times by random people who tried to "recruit" me to their teams.

Both of the guys who approached me acted like they were from a People's Temple sect. They invited me to their seminars and pitched me products with "magical effects".

They talked and plastered their Facebook walls about success and inspirational quotes.
They rambled on about "continuous learning", but they all seemed to me they had little depth in their skillset, both in sales skills and in social skills.

Review

While we may actually recommend "Go Pro" to the few for whom networking marketing makes sense, we generally discourage MLM as a business option.

The network marketing model is a low-return business model where founders capture the vast majority of the added value while late joiners harm their closest relationships with often unwelcomed pitches.

This model also raises some ethical red flags and, from what I've seen in practice, it sometiems goes along with manipulation, low-level naive-self help based on 'motivation' and boosterism, and win-lose exchanges.

The Magic Relationship Ratio: How to Stay Together

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

There's a magic relationship ratio to stay together, and it was a huge surprise for me.

The relationship ratio tells us that it doesn't matter whether couples fight a lot or not.
What truly matters, says John Gottman's research, is that no matter the conflict style the couple has, they will stay together as long as the positive moments outnumber the negative ones by 5 to 1.

What The Magic Ratio Tells Us

Gottman's research debunked an old myth:

Great couples fight less.

Indeed, in the past, and in large part also today, many believe that strong relationships have little fights in them. But research has dispelled that myth.

Indeed in Why Marriages Succeed or Fail, John Gottman explains that one type of successful couple, which he calls “volatile”, fights frequently and, often fight vehemently.

But here is the key: as long as frequently fighting couples kept a ratio of positive to negatives of 5:1 during their arguments they remained happy and stable together.

Why 5:1?

Why 5:1 and not, say, 1,5:1?

Wouldn’t more positives simply be enough to outweigh the negatives?

Well, no.

Negativity has more power to inflict damage than positivity has the power to heal and bring us closer.

Relationships As Bank Account

Imagine your relationship as a bank account.

In a way, it’s not a big stretch since most social relationships entail a form of exchange.

For every positive interaction and act of caring, you deposit one Dollar. Every negative interaction is worth five Dollars.

To keep it positive, it’s not enough to be slightly kinder than you are mean. It means you need to be overwhelmingly kind to offset any meanness and contemptuous signs.

Examples of Negative Interactions

This should be obvious, but it’s worth repeating:

It’s impossible to keep a positive balance if negativity permeates our relationships.
The signs of negativity besieging our relationships are The Four Horsemen of The Apocalypse:

- Criticism
- Contempt
- Defensiveness
- Stonewalling

When they get together and the negatives start outweighing the positives, the relationship can spiral into a vicious circle and lead to a breakup.

And I added:

- Meanness

Meanness is a special case of a partner seeking to say the most hurtful thing they can say.
With that type of cruelty, you don’t go to minus five Dollars, but you might as well go to minus five hundred Dollars.

Positivity

The examples of positive interactions during conflict are the following:

- Interest
- Asking questions
- Kindness

- Empathy
- Affectionate

How to Stay Together

The analogy of the 1 dollar VS the 5 dollars is a good one because, Gottman says, it's all indeed about small daily actions and behavior.

For example:

- Turning towards instead of away
- A smile
- Affirming nod
- Hugging
- A kiss when you're back home

If they don't come naturally to you… Don't worry. Start by implementing them intentionally and consistently. Create a habit of daily, constant positive reinforcements.

Where to Start

How do you start making positive contributions to your relationship account?

Here is what Gottman suggests:

1. Start by getting to your know partner well
2. Then add a culture of appreciation, fondness, and admiration
3. And learn to read your partners' bid for affection
4. Learn how to turn toward those bids

If you get those four rights, chances are you will never have to worry about keeping a good relationship ever again.

SUMMARY

To stay together research has shown that the positives have to vastly outnumber the negatives.

That’s why it’s paramount that you build positive daily habits of doing many small nice things towards each other.

Positive Perspective: The Secret to Happy Relationships

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This article is about the Positive Perspective, John Gottman's concept that is the key to happy relationships.

By the end of this article, you will learn how keeping a positive attitude (positive sentiment override) will make your relationship a paradise.
And how a negative attitude (negative sentiment override) can destroy your relationship (and happiness).

- SUMMARY

What's Positive Perspective

The Positive Perspective is the fourth level of Gottman's Sound Relationship House.
And it refers to how people see the relationship as a whole.
Basically: do you have a positive impression of your partner and your relationship or do you have a negative one?

When your relationship has a positive perspective, Gottman calls it a "Positive Sentiment Override"

What a Positive Perspective Does

In The Seven Principles to Make Marriage Work Gottman explains the positive impacts of the positive perspective. I paraphrase for brevity:

> When you have a positive image of your partners and your relationship, you will take notice of the positives and discount the negatives.

But if you have a negative perspective (negative override), you look with suspicion -or disregard- anything that your partner does positively.

Keys to a Positive Perspective

A positive perspective is partly a mental attitude of willingly focusing on the positives of a relationship.

But it also happens almost automatically if all the previous three levels of the sound relationship are working well.

Such as:

- Getting to know your partner

Remind yourself what you appreciate about your partner and say to each other.

- Turning towards

Instead of “doing your own thing” you engage with your partner and show that you care.

- Letting your partner influence you

On top of the three levels of the sounds relationship house, Gottman also mentions the importance of letting your partner influence you.
This means that you accept your partner and their influence in your decision-making and your issue discussions. Accepting your partner’s influence takes away the combative element and introduces teamwork. This is a crucial element of shared leadership, which is a key trait of effective leaders, both in relationships and in life.

Negative Sentiment Override

The opposite of a positive perspective is a negative sentiment override. In Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage Gottman writes:

> When the negative thoughts about your partner overwhelm any positive thoughts about you. You keep track of grievances and offenses.

Basically, when you have a generally negative outlook you focus on the negatives you only see the negatives. Here’s a perfect example of negative sentiment override:

> Him: (Focuses on the negatives about her when she was alive. Only to miss her badly when she’s gone)

⍰⍰ Lesson learned: appreciate what you have, while you still have it.

Vicious Circle VS Negative Sentiment Override

A vicious circle is somewhat similar to a negative sentiment override.

The difference is that a vicious circle involves both partners and arguments with the four horsemen of the apocalypse (criticism, defensiveness, contempt, and stonewalling).

Negative sentiment override instead can be from just one partner and it doesn’t necessarily translate into an open fight -just like the example above-. This mindset is a sign of a lack of personal power and internal locus of control. Instead of taking personal responsibility for your own happiness, you become a victim of your partner’s perceived faults.

Are You in a Negative Relationship?

Think about your current relationship and ask yourself if you often feel the following:

- Innocent and unjustly accused
- It’s your partner’s fault
- Hurt / angry/ disappointed
- Your partner is a bad person
- Your partner is annoying you
- There are many bad sides to your partner’s character
- Maybe you and your partner don’t fit well
- You want to get up and leave

- Under attack
- Vengeful
- Like you want to protect yourself
- Your partner is trying to control you

If you answer yes to a lot of the above questions, you might either be in a negative vicious circle or a negative sentiment override.

Away Time Test

Here's another quick test: when you're away from your partner, do you think of them positively or negatively? Do you think of what they do for you or what they don't do?
Of the good times together or of the bad times?

If you focus on the negativity, you're probably in a negative sentiment override.

Positive VS Negative Override: Example

The movie 500 Days of Summer provides a great example of the difference between a positive and negative sentiment override.

> Him: (loves everything about her)
> Him: (hates everything about her)

Nothing changed for the man in the example.
But the first one idealized her object of desire. It was too much. And the second part projected is anger and disappointment onto her, resenting everything about her and the relationship.

As for most things, the key is in the balance.
Balanced optimism is often the best approach.

Often how we view life reflects how we view our relationships.

And as much as anything else, we see what we feel in relationships. Feel positive, focus on the positives, and you will have a happy relationship.

This is something Tony Robbins also talks about a lot. Ultimately, embracing a positive perspective is an act of personal power because it means you choose to be the leader of your own mindset and emotional state, rather than being a victim of your circumstances.

SUMMARY

In life as in relationships, you get what you focus on. If you have an overall positive image of your relationship, you will naturally focus on the positives. But if you have an overall negative image of your partner and your relationship, you will only see the negatives.

So if you're wondering how to have a happy relationship, here are the keys to building a culture of positivity:

1. Celebrate the good times together
2. Remind and remember the positive times
3. Give to your partner and be grateful for what they give you

Hold Me Tight: Emotional Attachment for Couples (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Hold Me Tight explains to readers that the most important element of any intimate relationship is emotional intimacy.

TPM Note: Valid points, but men must maintain agency and masculinity
It's not a coincidence that this book, with this title, was written by a woman. While what she writes also applies to men of course, men must balance attachment needs (communion) with pursuing other goals outside the relationship as well (agency). This approach also improves the relationship dynamics and maintains long-term attraction.

Main Takeaways

- The emotional need to be close to our partners is wired in our genes
- Effective dependency means that we are stronger when (securely) dependent to our partner
- Communication fixes the signs of relationship troubles. To fix the cause, we need to build emotional intimacy

Notes

About the Author:
Sue Johnson is an English clinical psychologist, professor, and researcher. Her focus has been on couple therapy and adult attachment.

Introduction: Attachments Are Key

The author says that John Bowlby, with his attachment theory, revolutionized the understanding of human psychology.

And she would put him ahead of Freud when it comes to contributing to understanding human psychology.

1. Emotional Attachment Is a Basic Need

Sue Johnson says that love is the pinnacle of human evolution. It bonds us together and helps us survive.

We need emotional attachment as much as we need food, sex, and shelter.

When a safe connection is lost, we go into fight or flight mode. We get aggressive or shut down.

⚠ TPM Note: It's foundational for men to increase self-sufficiency
Even men who want a relationship are at risk of losing attraction if their first and main need is attachment to her. Prioritizing relationships is associated more with the feminine pole, and not with masculinity.
To maintain long-term attraction and positive relationship dynamics we advise men to always balance 'attachment needs' with agency, social power, and self-sufficiency.

Intimate Relationships Help Us Recover From Traumas

Having someone emotionally close to us whom we can rely on has been proven to strongly affect how people recover from traumas.

As a matter of fact, the secure attachment types survivors of 9-11 were even better adjusted after the trauma of 9-11.

2. Learn Your Attachment Type: An Overview

The author quickly goes over the different types of attachment styles.

She says it's normal that we all experience a bit of fear when we disagree and argue with our partners. The arguing impact different attachment styles very differently though.
It's a small blip for secure attachment types and avoidant attachments don't mind too much either.
But it's overwhelming for anxious attachment types.

3. Manage Your Insecure Attachment

Unsecure types descend into a "primal panic" when they fear for their partner's attachment -for example after a fight-.

And do two things:

1. They become clingy and demanding (=notice me, care about me!)
2. Withdraw and detach trying to soothe (=I won't let you hurt me, I'll stay in control)

They work at the beginning, but they set out on a vicious spiral of insecurity that pushes the couple farther apart.
Couples with demand-withdraw patterns are emotionally starved. Usually, it's the woman who pursues as she's more emotionally attuned.
The author says we fail to repair these dynamics because we are not attuned to our partners.

Also, read:

- The anxious-avoidant relationship

TPM Note: 'Hold me tight' makes me think of insecure attachment
In constant need of reassurance. Balance your attachment needs with self-love.

4. Prioritize Emotional Attachment Over Communication

Sue Johnson says that most couples' therapy so far focuses on fixing conflicts and power struggles. But those are only the signs, not the core of the problem.
Communication and negotiation will not fix the problem. Happy couples, she says, communicate no better than unhappy ones.

The best predictor of marriage solidity is the couple's emotional responsiveness (also read: turning towards).

> Marriage failure is not a conflict increase, but an emotional decrease

5. Ensure You Cover 'Emotional A.R.E.'

The basis of E.F.T (Emotional Freedom Techniques) is A.R.E.

A.R.E. stands for:

- Accessibility: Can you reach your partner?
- Responsiveness: Can you rely on your partner to respond emotionally
- Engagement: Does your partner value you and stay emotionally close

Basically, these are the questions: Are you there and are you with me?

7. Have The 7 Conversations

TPM Note: The first four conversations limit the negativity in the relationship. They are what Gottman mostly focuses on in his Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. See our John Gottman's hub.

The next two conversations demonstrate how you can promote emotional bonding through forgiving injuries and sexual intimacy. The final conversation shows you how to care for your relationship on a daily basis.

1. Recognizing Demon Dialogues – First of all you identify the common emotional reactions that lead to arguments and negative cycles. This is basically where you learn emotional intelligence.

2. Finding the Raw Spots – You learn to look beyond the immediate reactions to better understand your feelings, craving, and deep needs.
Raw spots are particularly important because they relate to painful sensitivities that are particularly damaging when touched. The author says it often stems from past relationships (also read Getting the Love You Want for how our past influences us)

3. Revisiting a Rocky Moment – Break down and analyze some typical arguments. Go beyond the anger to understand how your deeper needs are shaping up your cycles of negativity.

The fourth conversation is the one that transforms relationships by making them more accessible, emotionally responsive, and engaged.

4. Hold Me Tight® – Here you learn to be emotionally accessible, responsive, and engaged. This is the bedrock of a solid relationship.

The last 3 all rest on the emotional foundation of the fourth conversation.

5. Forgiving Injuries– Forgive the past hurt so that you can move forward.

TPM Note: Forgive what's forgivable, not what's unforgivable

6. Bonding Through Sex and Touch – Emotional connection enhances physical connection and the two feed into each other in a positive cycle.

7. Keeping Your Love Alive – Here you learn to make you Hold Me Tight learning a mainstay of your relationship.

Real-Life Applications

Here are my two biggest takeaways from "Hold Me Tight":

Embrace Your Emotional Needs
In 8 dating mistakes women make I mention an ex of mine who was always struggling to be independent from me. As Sue Johnson explains, that's a mistake: we are all wired for connection and emotional co-dependency with our partners makes us stronger.

Learn Emotional Intelligence
As one of the foundational skills for not only emotional intimacy, but also for win-win, cooperative relationships. You can check here a few examples for conflictual relationships.

CONS

7 Conversations Confusing
Listening to the audiobook, I find it hard to clearly define and differentiate among the seven conversations. Indeed I feel like we didn't need seven conversations. Hold Me Tight should have stayed the core and only concept and all the other conversations mentioned as support.

Too Long
Overall, it was a bit too long. The real pity is that it felt that the main core message was a bit diluted.
A lot of conversation examples could have been shorter for example, and more strongly tied back to the need for emotional understanding and emotional connection.
Same for the part on sex.

Excusing Anxious Attachment
The author says that the powerful emotions she experiences in couples therapy are not irrational but make perfect sense. That's true, but I wouldn't want it serves as a justification for the anxious attachment types to justify their behavior.

Anxious also need to take concrete steps to tackle their oversensitive attachment systems.

TPM Power Lens

Emotional connection strengthens relationships and it's a crucial skill and outcome for high-value men who want a relationship.

That said, attraction and respect rely on a balance of connection (communion) and independence (agency). High-value men cultivate both.

Review

Hold Me Tight is a good read for anyone who wants to understand relationships and human nature.

Particularly important is the concept that communication and conflict management is often about solving the signs and not the root problems.

TPM's take is that it's the women of strong men who should want to be held tight, and not the other way around.

What Solving Relationship Conflict Means

First of all, solving relationship conflict doesn't mean eradicating conflict altogether.

Let's be clear about something right away: conflict is inevitable.

As a matter of fact, relationship researcher John Gottman says it should probably not be avoided at all. And conflict per se is not a predictor of break up.
But how you handle conflict is a predictor of breakups.

This article is about handling relationship conflicts in a way that can be healthy and productive.

Skills to Fix Relationship Conflict

Let's get right into it.
Gottman outlines six major skills to handle relationship conflict.
They are:

#1. Self Soothing

During conflict our heart beats faster and, especially if it starts heating up, it's possible that we enter into flight or fight.

Gottman refers to flight or fights as "flooding".
When that happens it's highly unlikely that we will have a productive conversation and very likely instead that we will escalate into criticism, contempt, meanness, and overall develop a very negative outlook of our partner and our relationship.

Solution:
The solution is to take a break whenever we feel we are getting too nervous. And this is especially important for men because they enter into flight or fight much faster than women.

#2: Soften Start-up

Interactions often end the way they began.

So if you begin with a belligerent or contemptuous attitude, it's not likely to get any better from there.
How to do that?
For the first three minutes:

- Avoid verbally assaulting your partner
- Avoid finger pointing body language
- Try to start slightly more calmly to avoid a defensive response

There's also a strong relation between emotional connection and soft start-up: the more attuned the couple is at an emotional level, the more natural a soft startup will happen.

#3: Repair and De-escalate

Repair attempts are all the techniques that strong couples use to de-escalate their conflict.

It's a fantastic tool for conflict management that avoids spiraling negative cycles.

Here are a few ways in which you can repair and de-escalate an argument heating up a bit too quickly:

- Say you're getting flooded and need a break
- Make a joke
- Tell your partner you appreciate how cool she is keeping it
- Say that you understand his point and you would also be angry
- Accept responsibility
- Ask for forgiveness

But also sentences such as:

> - OK, I'm not making myself clear enough, sorry, lemme rephrase it. What I mean is that..

> - Hmmm It feels to me like we're talking past each other now. Let's go about it one at a time. You tell me everything you wanna say and I will just listen. Then you will listen to me. OK?

Here's a great example of a repair attempt:

He realized they were going into a vicious circle and he broke the pattern

#4: Look for Underlying Causes

In Ten Lessons to Transform Your Marriage, Gottman says that perpetual gridlocked arguments (more below) often hide feelings and dreams that are not being clearly communicated.

The solution is to listen to our partner to get to know the real them. Once our partners feel safe to open up, they won't have to hide their feelings and dreams behind an argument and we can finally find better compromises.

Some good questions:

- OK… It sounds like you really care about it, could you explain to me why
- I really want to understand you here.. Can you tell me why it's so important to you
- OK. Well, what does it mean to you when I do X

Gottman says there are three levels to support our partners:

1. Listening (without criticizing)
2. Financially supporting them
3. Taking active part in them

Notice that the third is not necessary. But maybe you can still find a little compromise there. For example, with a sport-loving partner, you might not want to go run every day, but you could go once a week and run for half the distance.
Then wait for them at the ice cream parlor.

#5: Accept Influence

Accepting influence is most often -albeit non-exclusively- a problem for men.

Not accepting influence is really a bad omen for relationships: 81% of relationships where he doesn't accept her influence end up in divorce.

Notice that accepting influence doesn't mean you have to agree with your partner's idea or solution. Nor does it mean that you are losing power: as a matter of fact accepting influence will give you less rebellion, more love, and more influencing power.
Accepting influence begins with wanting to understand what your partner wants, what her needs are, and what you can do to meet them and make her happy.

Read more here about accepting influence.

#6: Compromise

Relationships, where only one party gets his way are not good relationships (read about power addicts).
To get into a compromise mindset you need to give up the idea that one partner can be a winner and the other can be a loser.

The only way to win is when both win.

Bonus: Communication Skills

On top of Gottman's 6 basic skills, I would also add some good communication skills to stave off The Four Horsemen of The Apocalypse.

We talked about it in the article on criticism.
And here's a quick wrap-up:

- Use I statements
- Complain about specific issues instead of general personal traits
- Focus on how you are feeling instead of how bad your partner was
- Describe what happened without judging
- Make sure you understand before you are understood

Types of Relationship Conflict

In The Seven Principles to Make Marriage Work Gottman introduces the three type of problems a relationship face:

- Solvable problems are situational issues. It might be what to eat today, or who will pick up the dry cleaning.
- Perpetual problems center around fundamental differences in personalities, lifestyles, or values. Most of the problems -69%- are actually perpetual problems that most couples will return to over and over again.
- Gridlocked perpetual problems are perpetual problems that the couple is not handling well and have become hot topics that lead to ugly conflicts.

Example of Unsolvable Gridlocked Conflict

Mrs. Doubtfire's divorce scene is an example of a gridlocked conflict.
It's recurring, it's based on personality traits and it has reached a point where she's lost all respect for him because of it:

The gridlocked conflict here is along the personality traits of seriousness (being a square) and playful (childish).

Solving Unsolvable Conflicts

Harville Hendrix, author of Getting The Love You Want, explains we often pick partners with traits that either remind us of our parents or that " complete us".

This is how it works: at the beginning, we admire their different traits because they can make us feel whole or because we wish we had their traits.
However, after we've been together for a while those same traits start annoying us. And since they're so different than how we are, they are the most likely to arise gridlocked conflicts that turn nasty.

Trying to solve unsolvable issues that relate to personalities can be counterproductive. You can rarely solve them for good and it's easy to get drawn into personality battles.
Discussing them can provide an opportunity for understanding and growth.
Here are three strategies:

#1. Listen Without Persuading

Abandon the idea of winning, convincing your partner, or making your point across. One of the two of you will have to only listen until you fully understand your partner.

To make sure you fully understand your partner, you have to repeat your part. This is actually the most important part.
Since you will not fully solve most unresolvable conflicts -but hey, never say never!- the feeling that our partner understands is often enough.

#2. Find Areas of Flexibility

Once you fully understand your partner, if you have a positive relationship, you should normally strive to do something to make your partner's situation better.
Think of where you can compromise.

#3. Thank and Appreciate

Thank your partner for opening up. If no compromise was possible, agree to disagree and learn to appreciate them for their differences.

> Choosing a partner means choosing a set of unsolvable problems

Relationship Conflict Types

In Why Marriages Succeed or Fail Gottman outlines the different personality types depending on how they approach conflict in a relationship.
Here are the three types:

- Validating (high EQ arguing)

They're calm and make an effort to understand their partner's point of view and their emotions.

Even when disagreeing in the midst of a fight they let their partners know they consider their emotions and opinion to be valid.
They use a lot of "aha" and "I see" and encourage the partner to share everything.

Validating couples tend to have traditional and defined roles. The wife takes care of children and sees herself as nurturing, the husband is the final decision maker and sees himself analytical.
They tend to be good friends and value the "we" of their marriage.

Risks: turning the marriage into a passionless arrangement and foregoing personal lives and self-development for the "we" cause.

But overall it's a solid marriage.

- Volatile (lots of arguments)

They fight frequently and have an even bigger time making up (which attention, it's not to say all fighting couples have stable marriages!).

Their quarrels are heated and they don't listen to each other: they try to persuade the other right away. They're all about winning.
They use a lot of "yes you do" and "no I don't", and "you're wrong".

They value full honesty and independence.

Risks: Too much bickering can consume their marriage, or lead violence in extreme cases. The teasing they enjoy can end up hurting

- Conflict avoidant

They minimize conflicts and they avoid "unsolvable" issues altogether.
They consider issues "resolved" when they can't find a middle ground and don't try to convince the other.

Avoidant couples prove that a marriage can work even without solving disputes. It's a different kind of "we" for avoidant couples: the bond is so strong that it trumps the disagreements.

Risks: They don't learn to address issues which can be an issue should they need to have an argument one day. Also, they are low on introspection and understanding, which can lead a partner to think their spouse doesn't really understand them.
When someone is too much an avoidant they believe there are no relationships conflicts in great couples. And that's wrong: conflict is unavoidable in relationships.

Conflict Matrix

These are the different mixes of personalities we can have.
"You" is the first half:

- Conflict Avoider / Volatile

This is a rare mix, and Gottman speculates it's because it never moves past the dating period. The avoider feels overwhelmed by the partner's combativeness. And you can feel they're too impinging when they push you to solve conflicts.

- Volatile / Conflict Avoider

Your spouse probably feels you always bring conflict into the marriage and that you are overly emotional

- Validator / Volatile

You find your partner argumentative and domineering. You don't think they give you a chance to express yourself and you wish you could function more as a unit.

- Volatile / Validator

You perceive your partner as too detached. You try to get a raise out of your partner sometimes and feel like your need for autonomy falls on deaf ears.

Is Zero Conflict Possible?

In a way, the avoidant style couple has very little conflict.

But zero conflict at all, it's probably not a healthy relationship. Couples need to hear their differences and they need to raise the issues that are painful for them.

So while disagreement and conflict might make us feel miserable at times, it's helpful in the long run.

Emotional Bond & Conflict Management

Finally, I would like to introduce a different point of view.

All the techniques we discussed are helpful.
But Sue Johnson, author of Hold Me Tight, says that handling conflict is the tip of the iceberg, and the real core issue is a strong emotional bond.

With a strong emotional bond, even poor conflict management skills will give you a solid, healthy relationship.

I believe conflict management skills are more important than Sue makes them out to be, but I also agree with her marriage.
Check this video: no conflict management could save the argument once they realize their emotional bond has vanished.

On the other hand, a strong emotional bond will automatically secure your relationship.

Conflict Management in Perspective

Conflict management is also one of the key skills of The Sound Relationship House by Gottman, but not the only one. The others are:

- Getting to know your partner
- Fondness and admiration

Remind yourself what you appreciate about your partner and say to each other. Fondness and admiration indeed help emotional bonding.

- Turning towards

Instead of "doing your own thing" you engage with your partner and show that you care. This is another tool to replenish your emotional bank account and show your partner that you care

- Positive perspective

A positive perspective ensures that you focus on the positives.

SUMMARY

Knowing how to handle relationship conflict is a key skill for a successful relationship.

But as important as it is, it's only when it's part of a bigger strategy of emotional attunement, appreciation, and positive perspective that it can be helpful.

This article showed you both how to solve conflicts in your relationship and how to put it in perspective of an overall healthy relationship.

How to Develop Deeper Relationship Intimacy: Shared Meaning

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Intimacy in a relationship is often correlated with how much shared meaning the couple has.

In plain English, it means this: the more common you have, the more you'll feel closer to your partner.

This article describes and explains the shared meaning and gives you a few ideas on how you can improve it to enjoy more relationship intimacy.

Spending time in nature could be part of their shared meaning

What's Shared Meaning

Shared meaning is all about sharing a common culture.

And what constitutes a common culture in a relationship?
Here are a few examples:

- References
- Inside jokes
- Daily habits
- Anniversaries
- Symbols and rituals
- Foods you both enjoy
- Couple secrets
- Knowledge of each other's dreams

But it's also all the little things you do sometimes that you don't even talk about. You might not talk about how much you enjoy a good Italian wine on the weekend for example. But if you do it constantly, that's part of your culture and shared meaning.

And if you are both loud and crass instead of bookworms, that's also shared meaning.

Why Building Shared Meaning

First of all, as we've already said, couples who develop shared meaning are much more likely to develop intimacy.

And second, shared meaning helps form the glue that keeps couples happily together for the long haul.

A new relationship indeed, with its butterfly love period, is naturally exciting. A new relationship doesn't have much shared meaning but it doesn't need any: limerence makes the couple stick together.
But limerance, or the puppy love period, ends.
And when it ends, shared meaning helps build a deeper connection that outlasts the initial infatuation.
Shared meaning indeed can create a deeper bond than the initial infatuation.

Shared Meaning is Friendship

Have you heard or read that friendship is the key to great relationships?

Well, that's actually true.

But what most articles don't explain is how to develop that friendship.
A shared meaning, together with knowing your partner well, forms the building block of a friendship. And friendship is what great couples refer to when they can't even think about the possibility of their relationship ending.

It's because they are so close to their partners and the shared meaning is so deep that losing their partners would mean losing a part of who they are.

Creating Intimacy Via Shared Meaning

In The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work Gottman says that a shared meaning takes years to develop.

But there are many ways you can use to make that process faster and more effective.
Here are a few:

#1. Talking about your shared meaning

This one works like a charm.

I know, because I always do it when I am seeing a girl on a constant basis.

Remember the example of the couple enjoying a good Italian wine on the weekend?

We said that maybe they don't talk about it, but it's still shared meaning.

Well, what if they started talking about it instead as "their" thing?

When you talk about it, you make the shared meaning somewhat "official" and you strengthen it. It's not about your individual taste which happens to overlap: it's about the two of you.

#2. Share a dream or vision

Sharing a dream, goal or vision is possibly the biggest shared meaning you can have.

In solving conflicts we talked about how important it is to understand our partner's dreams. Working together towards that goal is an even bigger glue.

But it doesn't have to be something tangible: sharing a vision or common values also creates a larger meaning in life that transcends the smaller day-to-day differences.

#3. Develop Daily Rituals

Find out something that you can do at periodical time intervals together. It could be evening dinners or weekend getaways.

#4. Celebrate Anniversaries

Wedding anniversaries or birthdays are an example.

But it can go beyond that. It could be a spring picnic, or a winter hot wine at the same Christmas market.
Or a walk in the woods in autumn.

#5. Develop Cultural Artifacts

Pick something that is meaningful for you and make it a symbol of your relationship.

For example, I met my first girlfriend when we were both living in Poland and we both loved it. So some Polish food and drinks became our relationship symbols.

And of course, it can also be movies, cities, or songs -which you can start seeding from the dating period by the way-.

#6. Start Joint Activities

Starting joint activities you can do together is another concrete example of a shared culture.
It could be a sport, volunteering, or even committing to raising your children with a certain set of values.

7. Write Down Your "Couple's Values"

Some counselors suggest you can also write down the values of your marriage.
I'm not a big fan of this one though.

People develop and writing down things can become constrictive.
If a partner realizes they're moving on, for example, they might silently start to believe you have no shared meaning anymore.
I believe it's best to let your shared meaning grow with you without committing to anything in writing.

Some Ideas for Shared Meaning

- Hug every time you're back home
- Cuddle time before falling asleep
- Exercise together
- Booking holidays during the same period
- Movie nights
- Chores together
- Taking breaks during heated arguments

Intimacy & Shared Meaning Examples

How I Met Your Mother has an example of inside jokes that fosters shared meaning:

Lily and Marshal also have lots of recurring moments of shared meaning and intimacy during the show:

Shared Meaning in Perspective

Shared meaning is one of the levels of the sound relationship house of Gottman.
It's very important, but don't forget the other layers:

- Love maps (knowing each other)
- Fondness and admiration (the other building block of long-term love)
- Turning towards (emotional bank account)
- Handling conflicts

SUMMARY

Sharing meaning and building a couple's culture is one of the best ways to reliably improve your relationship's intimacy and overall health.

It's one of the layers of Gottman's solid relationship house, and this article showed you examples and tips on how to grow your shared meaning.

Facts About Cheating & Cheaters (Science VS Myths)

Lucio Buffalmano · 31 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

- SUMMARY

#1. Unhappy Marriages Lead to Cheating

Assumption: people cheat because their marriage is unhappy and their spouse doesn't satisfy them.

Fact:

While unhappy marriages can be a cause of cheating, it's not one of the major causes. And especially not for men.

Digging Deeper

Men indeed present little correlation between the level of relationship happiness and the incidence of cheating.

Shirley Glass, recording decades of couple's therapy experience, concludes that men who engaged in sexual affairs were as satisfied with their marriages as faithful men.

The link between relationship health and the incidence of cheating is stronger in women though.
Women in any kind of extramarital affair were less happy in their marriage than their non-involved counterparts.

Why do people get this one wrong

Some people believe that marriage dissatisfaction is a major cause of cheating because they hear the cheating partner complain about their marriage after they initiated an affair.

That's often back-justification coupled with unfair comparisons (or plain lying).
It makes little sense to compare the thrill of an affair with the daily life of a long-term partner.

#2. Affairs Are Based on Sexual Attraction

Assumption: affairs happen because there's better sexual chemistry with the affair partner.

Fact:

While better sexual chemistry can be one of the reasons an affair started, most of the time it's not.
What draws committed partners in an affair are the following:

- Thrill of the forbidden
- Exploring new roles
- Breaking free of old habits
- Rejuvenation
- Ego validation

Cheating for ego validation: "I still got it"

The last one is particularly interesting. Often people start a relationship with partners who are more or less their equals.

But as we grow older we experience more and some of us get wiser and more successful. Younger people can look up to us as role models. That's in stark contrast to our relationship partner, who keeps treating us the same way we were when we started out.

And that's when affair partners, especially men, begin relationships with younger coworkers.
The younger coworkers are more than a younger piece of meat. They end up being a bit of sexual partners, a bit of mentees, and a bit of provider of ego validation.

Rejuvenation:

And of course, for both genders, a new partner can wake up in us a side of us that we thought dead: strong sexual attraction, physical performance, and the puppy love we thought was only for teenagers.

#3. An Attentive Partner Can Find Cues

Assumption: a cheater will always leave cues, but naive spouses bury their heads in the sand.

Fact:

Most affairs are never detected, and it's not because anybody put their head in the sand. Some cheaters are just very good liars or very effective at creating double lives.

#4. Cheating Decreases Relationship Sex

Assumption: a cue that your partner is involved in an extramarital relationship is a decrease in sex or the decrease in sexual attraction.

Fact:

An unfaithful partner might have less sex in the relationship or avoid the official partner. But he can also have a higher sexual drive and more sex in the relationship.

Digging Deeper:

It's really hard to tell if a partner is cheating simply by looking at how often he or she initiates sex. But if you notice major swings compared to the past, either in craving sex or in rejecting sex, that might be a telltale sign.

#5. People Cheat When They Don't Get Enough X

Assumption: people cheat because they aren't getting enough of something in the relationship. Not enough sex, not enough love, not enough intimacy, etc.

Fact:

It's more likely that the partner who is not giving enough will cheat.

More Info:

Giving creates a deeper bond and makes us more invested in the relationship. A partner who gives nothing is also a partner who cares less about the relationship. This is one of the reasons I always recommend against the typical dating advice of giving as little as possible.

#6. Cheaters Treat Their Partner Poorly

Assumption: you can detect an unfaithful partner because he will treat you poorly.

Fact:

A straying partner might become more bitter and resentful. But could as well swing in the opposite direction and be much nicer to you. That can happen either out of guilt or to escape detection.

Digging Deeper:

When you notice swings from bitterness to exaggerated devotion and niceness, that might be a sign.

#7. Men Cheat More Than Women

Assumption: men are naturally hunters and naturally looking for opportunities. Women are naturally after love and commitment.

Fact:

While, there's some truth in the assumption the reality is, as it's often the case, more complex. In more open societies such as in the West and among younger generations, the incidences of infidelity between genders are comparable.

More Info:

Gathering reliable data on relationship infidelity is arduous. But based on the available surveys, women are catching up on men in the West -at least for the younger age brackets-.

We went from double the rate of affairs of men to women in 1953 (Kinsey report) to approaching parity in the 1990s (Michael Wiederman, 1996).
In older age brackets though men still cheat more.

This might be possibly due to the fact that men tend to retain sexual market value longer than women. And of course, the inverse of the coin: women's tendency to go after power and resources.

#8. Cheating Happens Mostly When Drunk / High

Assumption: most cheating happens when people are drunk, high, or partying.

Fact:

It's actually the growing presence of women in the workplace that has driven the recent increase in affairs' incidence. In Shirley Glass' clinical sample, 50% of women and 62% of men met their affair partners at work.

#9. It's Not An Affair Without Sex

Assumption: it's not really cheating unless there is sexual involvement.

Fact:

Extramarital affair is usually defined as sexual intercourse, but that definition is misleading. Indeed, for evolutionary reasons, emotional cheating is worse for women than sexual cheating (David Buss, 1994).

#10. Talking About The Affair Makes It Worse

Assumption: better to forget about the affair and move on.

Fact:

This is possibly the most damaging myth of them all. Once the affair has been discovered the best way to mend the relationship is to answer all our partner's questions and talk about what happened.

#11. The Cheater Prefers The Affair Partner

Assumption: to cheat people must think that the affair partner is somewhat "better" than their long-term partner.

Fact:

Most affairs don't happen because the affair partner is "better".

Frank Pittman indeed observes that the choice of the affair partner is based on how different they are from the relationship partner.
Another proof the affair partner is not often "better" is that in the vast majority of the cases that an affair is discovered the unfaithful partner chooses the long-term partner.

Digging Deeper:

The affair can be more exciting though not because of real personality traits, but because of the affairs' very nature. The risk, the social hazard, the breaking of rules together…

The affair partner sometimes isn't even a real person. It's an idealization and that ideal never gets real because, well… You never deepen that connection with a life together. You only see the best side of the affair partner, but rarely the problems.
As someone said:

> The grass is always greener when you don't have to mow it

#12. Compatibility Is Higher With The Affair Partner

Assumption: the cheater has better compatibility with the affair partner

Fact:

Since the affair often rides on high emotions it might feel so. But the truth is different: 75% of cheaters who marry the affair partner divorce -a much higher incidence than the normal divorce rate-.

#13. Betrayals Are Not Such a Big Thing: The Cheated Should Get Over It

Assumption: a betrayal is not such a big thing, and especially not in modern times. It's common, so the betrayed partner should not make it such a big deal.

Fact:

According to therapists who treat couples, infidelity is the second most difficult relationship problem, second only to domestic violence (Survey of 122 family psychologists, Journal of Family Psychology,113, 361-366.).
And it often takes years for people to come to terms with betrayal.

#14. Cheating is Commonplace / Rare

Assumption: cheating is widespread, says the unfaithful partner; cheating is rare, thinks the faithful partner.

Fact:

Cheaters are highly influenced by the families and environment they grew up in.

The pattern of unfaithfulness can indeed often be traced in the family (Emily Brown, Patterns of Infidelity and Their Treatment). And cheaters tend to focus on other cheaters, so they end up seeing more of it. To them, it often really seems like cheating is everywhere.

Conversely, the faithful partner often comes from faithful families, and the people they respect are other faithful committed partners.
So they end up seeing more faithful people and to them, it seems like cheating is rare and "a big thing".

SUMMARY

There's lots of great research and scientific findings on relationships and infidelity. And there's also a lot of terrible advice around.
This article dispels a few common myths about cheating and infidelity.

Make Your Bed by William McRaven: Lessons in Strength & Resilience (Book Review)

Make Your Bed

Make your bed is meant in part figuratively, but the book also means it literally.

The reason why you do your bed is to start the day with an accomplished task. You start with a win, and it puts you in the positive mood of someone who gets things done.

TPM Note: Go for figurative, and swap making your bed for higher ROI habits

You Need a Teammate

You need friends and teammates in life.

And I particularly loved that one of William McRaven's examples of a teammate is actually his wife.
It helped him get through a difficult time in life in which, without her, he would have become depressed.
That's very powerful and very vulnerable of him to say and he's right. The science of attachment indeed explains that having strong emotional support from our partners makes us stronger.

Life is Unfair: Get Over It

Life is unfair, and you should stop wasting your time and energy complaining about it.
That's how it is, do something about it instead of complaining.

Use Your Failures

McRaven's swimming team during his SEAL training was constantly arriving last.

That also means they'd have to go through intense punishment training called "the circus". The circus was so tough that many members would quit instead of finishing it.

But he went through it, and at the final swim test, his team finished first. That's a lesson on how to use your failures.

And if you want a more intellectual approach, I am a big believer in what Ray Dalio says: pain + reflection are your biggest growth opportunities.

Personally, I used my failure for motivation.
And my failure and my darkest days are the driving force behind this website.

Dare Greatly

There is always the possibility of failure. The more you go for bigger goals, the bigger the possibility of failure.

If you want to achieve anything significant in life, you must move toward the obstacles head first. Those who live in fear of failure and embarrassment commit the ultimate sin: not living up to their potential.

Real-Life Applications

- Stand Up to Bullies

I loved the analogy of the sharks and the sharks of life.
That's basically the spirit of this website. Face the sharks and stand up to bullies. You do it for yourself, but also for the world.

- Accept Life's Not Fair

This is another big lesson. Life is not fair: accept it. And use your energies and wits to work around, learn from it, leverage it, or… To contribute to making it fair (without whining).

CONS

- Never Quit…?

I can imagine people who finish exhaustive training tend to feel proud they went through and tend to look down on those who quit.

The author indeed stresses the idea of never quitting and equates quitting to "ringing the bell" when a Navy SEAL would quit the training.

I think there are many situations when quitting is the best option.
Quitting your dull job, quitting before your risk severe injuries… Or even quitting Navy SEAL training if that's not your thing. Maybe you'll go ahead and do wonderful things without your life.

- Make your bed… Literally?

Personally, I believe it's a waste of time. And especially so for a driven man looking to maximize the use of his time.

You're going to sleep in it again in the evening anyway (or if you're like me, even work while you're lying on it).

PROS

- Teamwork

I love how to Make Your Bed stresses that having a strong network around you, including your romantic partner, is key to making you stronger.

- Motivational… In a Positive Way

Make Your Book is Motivational… But not in any empty way. It's motivation in a very powerful way. For example when it says that the smaller crew always finished first in his training. Nothing mattered, he says, but your will to succeed.

> Measure a person by the size of their heart, not the size of their flippers

There are a lot of sharks in the world. If you wanna change the world: face the sharks

Review

Make Your Bed is a powerful book on the power of persistence and heart.

But also on the importance of building a great supporting team around you, including your relationship.

I would give Make Your Bed 4 stars because, after all, the messages are well-known. Albeit they are experience-backed and well-told.

Bullet Summary

- Excellence starts with great habits
- Trust and caring sell: develop a love for all people
- Learn to control your emotions

Full Summary

About The Author: Og Mandino was an American author, best known for this book, which has sold over 50 million copies. That easily makes "The Greatest Salesman in The World" the best-selling book on sales.

Habits Are the Foundations

The foundation of any excellent performance begins with the habits you shape (also read The Power of Habits).

Sadly, says Mandino, most of us are full of bad habits.
And they often start the very first moment we wake up: we snooze the alarm 4 times, then rush to work because we're late and we're grumpy and dozing off the whole morning.

Your first step will hence be to replace your poor habits with positive ones.

Love Sells: Sell With Love

Selling is about being good with people and gaining trust. And the best way you can show trust is with love.

The author recommends you internalize your love for people by repeating every morning:

> I will love everything and everyone

And when you talk to someone, repeat in your head:

> I love you

When you communicate with people from a place of love, they will also warm up to you.
It's amazing when you do it with people you don't have a good relationship with, and they will often turn from enemies into friends.

Persist

Don't give up. Your next customer, your next call, and your next reach out can be your sale.

If you start stringing failure after failure, stop and regroup before going into the next. And never end the day with a failure.

And if you just can't manage: put everything behind in your night's sleep and raise up on the next day fresh and invigorated.

Don't Copy: Forge Your Own Path

Do what other successful people do is a common suggestion.
The Greatest Salesman in the World proposes instead that you don't imitate others, but find your own secret sauce for success.

Control Your Emotions

Controlling emotions is a key skill for Og Mandino (also read Emotional Intelligence).

The Greatest Salesman in the World recommends you keep an even keel without getting too arrogant or too depressed.

A great way to change your emotional state, says Mandino, is to stop taking things so seriously. And to laugh at yourself and the world.

Take Action

Procrastination is an ever-so-seductive muse. And you must destroy her with action.
Set up a plan of successive action steps and goals instead and get going right away.

Have Faith

Have faith in God above and ask for guidance.

CONS

No hands-on techniques
The Greatest Salesman in the World is all about mindsets. That means there are no actual sales techniques.

PROS

Much more than selling
The Greatest Salesman in the World is about much more than selling. It's about self-improvement.

Fictional story
If the author had shared the concepts in bullet points, The Greatest Salesman in the World wouldn't have been nearly as successful.
This book is a testament to the power of storytelling. Teaching with stories is much more powerful because we project our own personality in the story and we're more open to accepting and retaining the lessons.

Review

Sharing the concepts through a fictional story can be a great way of teaching.

The reader feels closer to the main character, projects his own persona onto him, and thus is more open to absorbing the book's lessons.

However, I'm not convinced that love and caring are either the only or most effective tools for selling a lot.

As a last note, "The Greatest Salesman in the World" is based on Christian beliefs and faith, which might be a pro for some and a con for others.

Bullet Summary

- Don't give up right after the affair!
- Affairs are traumatic
- Rebuilding trust is a top priority
- You must rebuild intimacy with your partner (and cut out the affair partner)

Full Summary

About The Author: Shirley Glass was an American psychologist who focused on researching infidelity and helping couples recover from infidelity.

Intro

Not Just Friends goes deep and wide into infidelity and psychology. This is a very brief summary with further links to more in-depth articles.
And of course, I invite you to get "Not Just Friends" in full. Especially if you're interested in people and psychology: it's truly a treasure trove.

After Infidelity Wait 3 Months Before Breaking Up

Shirley Glass says the immediate reaction to ending the relationship is a mistake. It's like buying high and selling low.

She advises instead that you wait 3 months and at least try to rebuild your relationship.
If it still doesn't work, at least you can tell yourself you've done your best.

Walls & Windows: The Intimacy Divide

Shirley Glass says that the increase in modern affairs happens because of the increased opportunities for men and women to mingle.

Affairs often start at work, and they start as friends.

The affair begins when one partner starts spending more and more time with someone who was just a friend. Glass says that the shift from friendship to affair begins when one or both start confiding to each other. When that happens, the "friend" starts becoming more intimate and emotionally close than our partner. That's when the walls and windows change. The "friend" is the one with us in the house, and our partner starts moving outside.

Partner's Reactions Can Be Traumatic

Not Just Friends repeats this concept very often: an affair is a traumatic experience for the betrayed partner.

Don't listen to anyone telling you to "move on" or "it's just some sleeping around".
Healing must start with the understanding that it's psychological trauma.

Coping With Trauma

The rule of thumb is that women obsess and men repress.

But in infidelity traumas the betrayers repress and the betrayed obsesses. Glass says that obsessing is not pathological but it's a normal response.

Here are some good tips to let go:

- Write down your thoughts

Many obsess in fear that they could "forget" their pain.
When you write them down you can more easily let go. Also, write letters to the affair partner (without necessarily sending them) and write down all the questions you want your partner to answer.

- Get the truth

Secrecy fuels obsession. With the help of your partner, get the truth.

- Emotional control

You can schedule "obsession time slots" when you are free to think about the affair. Outside those times, distract yourself.

- Avoid painful situations

In the beginning, it's best not to avoid any situation that could remind you of the affair. The advice to face your fears right away is a typical example of bad folk wisdom.

- Face flashbacks together

It's incredibly helpful if your partner supports you in dealing with traumatic flashbacks. Little by little you can also revisit the crime scenes with your partner, for example, holding your hand.

Healing Together

These are the steps to healing together:

- Safety first: cut contact

The unfaithful partner must eventually cut all contact with the affair partner. If the betrayed partner asks to be present when the unfaithful partner makes the last call or sends the last text/email/letter, that's a fair request.

- Tell the story with honesty

You rebuild trust with complete honesty. If the unfaithful partner still has feelings towards the affair partner, he must confess so.
Sharing all (unavoidable) contacts with the affair partner too.

- Accept ambivalence

If the unfaithful partner feels ambivalent and still has feelings for the affair partner, he must say so. It's hard for the betrayed partner to accept that, but they must strive to.
Of course, if there are no feelings involved or if the unfaithful partner can move on quickly, it's much better.

- Reverse walls and windows

Cut out the affair partner and rebuild intimacy in the relationship.

- Discussing the story of the affair

To fully heal and build a stronger relationship, the couple must discuss and understand what happened. Then also based on the shared meaning they reach of the affair, fix the weaknesses.

- Restart loving each other

It's important for quicker healing that the partners "bite their tongue" and are not too mean when they discover the affair. Little by little, they should start giving again and being warm towards each other.

Real-Life Applications

You can decrease the chances of cheating
Albeit completely eliminating the chances of cheating is impossible, you can take many effective steps to make it less likely.

You can pick partners less likely to cheat
There are several variables in the personal history and personality traits that decrease the chances a partner would cheat

CONS

Length & Repetition
It took me a long time to finish reading Not Just Friends. If you want to read it because you're dealing with an affair, then you better be a quick reader and have lots of time :).

Little How To
The information is all there, but it's sometimes buried in long texts and paragraphs.
I believe Not Just Friends could be very much improved in a trimmed and shorter version: cut all repetitions, make it more schematic and this would become the Bible of affairs and surviving affairs -if it isn't already, that is-.

Sometimes Sources were off?
Glass says that 80% of sex addicts at a rehab center were corporate executives. But the source here doesn't say that. Also, the statistic is meaningless because a private center with very high costs will naturally cut off those who can't afford it.

Attachment Styles confusions
The naming of the attachment styles felt off and wrong to me. Maybe it's not because they were wrong but because I'm using to call them in a different way.

PROS

Extensive Research
Albeit some of the sources are a bit dated, there's lots of data and extensive research to back up the claims. Also a note on the date of the resources: humans don't change in a matter of decades, so good old research in psychology is much better than a less good recent one.

Review

Not Just Friends is a deeply insightful book on the topic of infidelity. It goes well beyond simple infidelity and into trauma recovery, human psychology, and even personality disorders.

Would I heed the recommendations?

I have to add that, although I love the book and learned hugely from it, I wouldn't necessarily heed the recommendation to work on the relationship in case my partner had an affair.

I think that, as a man, you lose lots of power if you stay -but then again, this comes from a guy who writes on a website called ThePowerMoves).
And as a proud man, I feel there are only two answers to cheating: that's the door or fair game on both sides from now on.

Surviving Infidelity As a Couple: A 13-Steps Guide

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Surviving infidelity is not easy.

Discovering an affair can be a traumatic event, and to heal properly, you must approach it as the traumatic event that it is.

This is a guide to survive infidelity as a couple and to build a stronger relationship *together. Or, at last, to give it your best shot.

Moving on by yourself or detaching from your partner may be valid choices, but it's just not this article's topic.

How to use this guide

The guide is based on research and experts' opinions in the field, especially Shirley Glass and her book Not Just Friends.

The numbered titles are the steps you need to take in chronological order.

The smaller titles are aimed at either the unfaithful partner (in blue) or the betrayed partner (in pink).
But don't let the colors confuse you: the steps are the same whether the cheating partner is male or female.

I recommend you share this guide with your partner as well. Two people doing the right thing is not twice the healing power, it's 10x.

⚠ Note: We don't necessarily advise everyone to stick together no matter what.
In many cases, we may advise moving on. Especially for men, sticking together may come at the cost of self-respect and partner's attraction.
This guide is not for those who are undecided or prefer ending it. It's a guide for those who want to rebuild their relationships.

#1. Start Well: Confess The Affair

When betrayed partner corners the unfaithful spouse, the cheater responds in four different ways. Here in order of worst to best:

1. Denial only makes the recovery harder and further erodes trust
2. Stonewalling communicates he doesn't care enough to reply

3. Staggered disclosures: drags the pain further and prolong the pain
4. Full honesty: the only way to go

Unfaithful Partner: Admit It

Immediate honesty is the best way to face the problem head-on and rebuild trust.

Betrayed Partner: Channel The Rage

Nobody says it's easy, but I'm talking about what's useful for recovery here, not what's easy.
The betrayed partner can make things easier for the unfaithful partner to share the truths by avoiding being overly mean as a revenge tactic.

Anger is normal, but the worst offenses you can muster may preclude future options.
Exaggerated rage will also push your partner into a bigger wall of denials and stonewalling, which will delay full revelation and recovery.

Example

In the movie This Is 40 the husband finally admits he has been hiding the truth for years because of her furious reactions.

It's not so uncommon, and you want to avoid that.

The Ideal Scenario

If you can muster to communicate love and understanding right off the bat, that immediately takes you into full healing mode.
Here's an example of what a betrayed partner told her husband (I paraphrase):

> Betrayed partner: If she can make you happier, then you should go. If you want to work on our relationship, I love you and I'm ready

The husband was aghast and immediately valued her so much more. Both went to work on it and not only saved their marriage but improved it.

Note: I'm not suggesting that you should do the same or that it's the best way to react. I wouldn't react like that in a million years.
But I am saying that if your goal is healing and you still have a functioning relationship, that might be the quickest way to jump into healing mode.

2. Don't Give up right away!

The first knee-jerk reaction after a betrayal is to abandon the relationship. While understandable, it's best not to jump to emotionally driven, rush conclusions.
Give it at least three more months before deciding. And if afterward you still feel like leaving, then you know your decision is rational.

Unfaithful Partners: Don't Jump Ship (just yet)

The unfaithful partner is caught between a rock and a hard place.

The pain and suffering that he caused at home on one side and the tough choices he needs to make between the affair and the relationship.

Statistically speaking leaving the marriage to build a relationship with the affair partner is rarely the best solution. You carry the unresolved issues with you and second marriages have an even higher divorce rate than first marriages (Hetherington, 2003).
And marrying an affair partner has even higher divorce rates.

Betrayed Partner: Don't Slam The Door

Shirley Glass, with decades of clinical experience curing unfaithful couples, says that the regret for not having done enough to save the marriage of extremely common.

Partners who quit too soon find out that being alone is harder and that they miss their partner more than they ever thought they would.

> Giving up right after cheating is buying high and selling low!

3. Arm Yourself with Patience

Healing from cheating takes some time, some effort, and some resolve. Sometimes more than some. As they say, love is not for the faint of hearts. You can do it.

Unfaithful Partners: Trust Takes Time

The unfaithful partner cannot stand to be under heavier scrutiny.

He often resorts to saying things like:

> Unfaithful Partner: You gotta trust me. It's either you trust me, or you don't.

But there's no "trust button" in people. Trust takes time.
And lemme be frank: you broke that trust, and now you gotta accept it takes time to rebuild it.

Betrayed Partner: It'll Be Up & Downs

Be ready that you will experience up and downs.

Some days you'll feel fully healed, but then the day after you'll feel like a fool for staying with a partner who cheated.

Especially if your partner hasn't fully come back to you emotionally yet you'll be worried and insecure.

During the final stages of recovery, it will be mostly steps forward. But then you'll have sometimes a step backward canceling all the gain you've done. Unluckily negative experiences carry more powerful than positive ones.

Note: healing comes first in frequency of occurrences and only later in intensity. This means that months down the road as you think you're getting better… BAM! There comes a flashback of stinging pain, anger, or disgust.
Don't worry: eventually also the intensity will dissipate, but it takes longer.

4. Answer Honestly...

Hiding from uncomfortable truths is a natural human reaction. But you have to face up to the issues if you want to solve them.

Unfaithful Partner: Open Up

The unfaithful partner has a key role in the healing process. He must stay close to his partner and let her know he will answer any possible question.
In the beginning share the basics, such as:

- The identity of the affair partner
- How you met
- How long it lasted
- Where did you meet

Refusing to share the identity is a common, major mistake. It protects the lover and keeps the spouse on the outside.
For the unfaithful partner sharing the story also helps close the affair. Daniel Wegner indeed shows that past relationships that remain secret increase desire and make the partner appear more appealing (The Allure of Secret Relationships, 1994).

Share Ambivalence

Unfaithful partners fear that sharing their ambivalence and emotional entanglement will upset their spouse and forestall any improvement.
Well, it will upset your spouse most likely, but honesty will also rebuild trust. And rebuilding trust is the most important thing right now.

Overcoming Ambivalence

Here's what you can do to overcome relationship ambivalence:

- Picture your life with the affair partner 5, 10, and 20 years from now
- Do you two want the same things?
- Does the affair partner what children? And you?
- Do you think the traits that attract will annoy you later on (likely)?
- How's your relationship going to be without the excitement of secretly?
- What if your affair will be on the same trajectory as your current relationship?
- Would you still divorce if it weren't for the affair partner

Sources:
The importance of transparency and answering all questions is backed by Peggy Vaughan's survey of 1.083 betrayed partners.
86% of couples stayed together and 72% rebuilt trust when the unfaithful partner answered all the questions. Only 59% stayed together and 31% rebuilt trust when the unfaithful partner refused to answer questions.

Note: there was a link to the survey, but the webmaster moved the page.

5. ... But Wait on Graphic Details

It's natural that the betrayed partner will obsess, and it will often be over the most painful bits of information.

Such as either graphic sexual details or evidence of love such as texts, gifts, or letters.
It's best to tread lightly here.

Unfaithful Partner: Open to Share... But in Time

Unfaithful partner should say they are open to share everything their spouse wants to know. They should share right away all the main parts of the affair. But they should avoid the graphic details.
Say something like this:

> I will tell you everything you want to know. I am concerned though the details will only bring unnecessary pain to you and harm our recovery. I'd rather wait a few days. And then if you still want to know, I'll tell you.
> OK for you?

Betrayed Partner: Test & Wait

In most cases getting all the graphic details is a mistake. And the craving usually disappears as the relationship improves.

Ask yourself whether the details will really help you move on. And if you are unsure, start with a single painful detail. If it helps you heal, then get more. If it only brings you pain without any further improvement, then drop it.

Example:

He feels good as soon as he hears it. But it's only because of the rush of winning the argument. The trauma will likely only be bigger for him now that the details are burned in his mind.
He would have most likely bounced back quicker without the graphic details.

6. Do a Clean Break

Healing cannot start in an unsafe environment: a clear cut with the affair partner is a fundamental step to restoring safety and moving forward together.

Unfaithful Partner: Cut All Affair Contacts

The unfaithful partner must cut any relationship with the unfaithful partner.

- If your partner so prefers, have the last call in front of them
- If it's a colleague, make it clear it's only business from then on
- If you stumble upon them, share all meetings with your partner
- If you meet them with your partner, stay close to your partner

If you cannot manage a clean break you must be honest about your ambivalence. When you are honest, you also get closer to your relationship partner because you break walls of secrecy. And, even if through pain, you become more of a team.

Betrayed Partner: Ask for Proof

You don't have to, but if it makes you feel better it's fair for the betrayed partner to ask to be present when the last communication of break up is sent.
If at all possible it's also fair for the betrayed partner to ask that the cheating partner stops attending whatever activity is shared with the affair partner.

7. Mourn & Use Social Support

Take some time to mourn and grieve.
It's important that you don't speed this process up to heal properly. This is valid for both the cheater and the cheated.

Unfaithful Partner: Mourn & Share

Few people will give you the benefit of the pain. They'll point fingers and add you deserve it. But keep those understanding people close: they're precious.

Your mourning is about the ending of the affair relationship.

Betrayed Partner: Mourn & Share

Share your grief with some good friends.
For women, it's important an important element of health and mental strength to have other female friends (Gottman, The Man's Guide to Women). It helps in healthy relationships and it helps even more now that you need support.

In this phase strive to view the affair partner as a human being as well. Demonizing the affair partner is unhealthy for you, for your relationship, and also for your partner: it's an easy way to let them off the hook.

Keep Family Out

It could be a bad idea to involve your family. It will be hard for them to forgive your partner in case you decide to stick together.
And keep the children out.

8. Rebuild Intimacy And “We Spirit”

The steps you have taken so far aim to rebuild intimacy in the relationship. The affair is highly damaging because it puts a human wedge between you two.
It creates a stronger, more intimate bond with the affair partner and keeps the spouse on the outside.

You need to cut with the affair partner and share everything with the spouse because that way you move the affair partner out and you rebuild the bond with your spouse.

Understanding the theory is important so that you can put all the practical steps in perspective.

Stop keeping your partner out!

9. Be all in

In Shirley Glass’ clinical sample, 80% of couples starting therapy with high commitment to save the relationship stayed together.

Less than half of couples who started with low commitment made it together at the end of the therapy.

Here are some arguments to motivate you and throw more resources and faith into the relationship:

Unfaithful Partner: Understand Affair is Unreal

Your affair wasn’t real.

When the affair is discovered it’s common to say “I love you but I’m not in love with you” to the spouse. And it’s common to think “you’re in love” with the affair partner.

But that’s likely to be superficial love. Part of it is fueled by secrecy and by the idealization of the romance.
You get to see the best of your affair partner without the downside, which creates an unrealistic image. As they say, the grass on the other side is always greener because you don’t have to mow it.

Also, keep in mind we often pick affair partners who are different than our spouses or different from ourselves. If that’s the case, experience shows that we will resent those same traits later on (Harville Hendrix, Getting the Love You Want).

At the end of the day, I can’t tell you what to do. But if you want to choose what’s most likely to be good for you, that might be to relish the experience you had and stick with your long-term relationship.

Betrayed Partner: Overcome Ambivalence

Here are a few exercises to help you decide and overcome ambivalence:

- Imagine a future without your partner: how does it feel like?
- Picture family events without your partner
- How would your children feel differently?
- What would you miss about the relationship?

> The grass is always greener when you don't have to mow it

10. Swap Bitterns for Kindness

We have seen in a previous article that negative vicious circles are a leading cause of breakups.

And affairs are very likely to lead to vicious circles.
The betrayed partner feels the need for revenge and the unfaithful partner avoids the spouse to avoid the negativity and the feeling of guilt.

Unfaithful Partner: Empathy & Boundaries

As we've seen the unfaithful partner can get impatient when trust takes time.

He would want to be welcomed with open arms, but that takes time.
And to accelerate the process, he must make an effort to resume caring.

If the unfaithful partner cannot manage to care, it can be a sign of lingering emotional attachment to the affair partner.

Set Boundaries for Disrespect

The unfaithful partner must set boundaries if he's dealing with continuous verbal abuse.
Crying requires your shoulder, and calling you a scumbag for days on end requires you to set boundaries
Here's one way you can put it:

> Cheating Partner: This affair has been disastrous on you, I know. I wish I could undo it… But I can't. But that doesn't give you any right to verbally abuse me.
> I want to help you and I want to get back on track, but that behavior only pushes me away.
> I want that you make sure this is the last time you use those words with me.

Setting boundaries of respect is something you do for both. Research shows that one put down will undo hours of kindness (Cliff Notarius, 1994).

Betrayed Partner: Out Meanness, In Kindness

It's not uncommon for the betrayed partner to hold back on any warm or caring gesture.

It's because they can feel as if any sign of kindness is a sign of forgiving.
What's also common is a sense of entitlement. In the worst cases, the cheated partner feels that their pain gives them a free pass to disrespect and demand without giving.

While that's completely understandable, it's super helpful if the betrayed partner moves out of this mindset as soon as possible.
Resuming caring also helps to overcome ambivalence on both sides.

> There can't be no final healing until caring resumes

Tips For Kindness

- Go First

Both partners look at the other partner for signs to stay and work at it harder. One must make the first move. Instead of waiting for the other, start yourself!

- Treat Kindness as In The Moment

Separate in your mind forgiveness from kindness. Treat all affection as "in the moment". If you feel you need a hug, go for it: it doesn't mean the cheating didn't hurt you or that you are forgiving it (not yet, at least).

- Fake It Till You Make It

Behavior can sometimes proceed and lead the way for feelings to follow. Start giving even if you don't exactly feel like it and see if that helps (chances are it will).

> Choose happiness over righteousness!

11. Explore the Affair History

Trauma experts Diana and Louis Everstine say that telling the story is an essential part of recovery (Strategic Intervention for People in Crisis).

And Judith Herman proposes to review the trauma by analyzing the life before the trauma and the circumstances leading to the traumatic event (Trauma and Recovery).

The best time to get into analysis mode is once you've established a safe enough environment. These are some of the questions you want to explore:

- Why did you get involved with someone else?
- Did you think about me?
- What was missing from our marriage
- Did I do anything wrong?
- What does your betrayal say about you

Both partners should work as a team to find out the answers.

How to Improve the Relationship

Introspection and understanding are helpful per se, but it's even more powerful when you can use them to address the weaknesses of your relationship.
Here are some examples of what you can address:

- Find new roles

The allure of an affair is to try on new roles for us. For example, a serious partner might enjoy being more free spirit with a younger partner.
The relationship couple then can try on new roles together instead of looking outside.

Example: I really liked the example of A Walk on The Moon, where the betrayed husband -an overly serious "square"- shows his willingness to work on the relationship by changing the tune and dancing to a rock song.

- Sexual liberation

Sometimes a partner can feel freer with an affair partner. But sex doesn't have to stay the same just because a couple has long been together. This can be an opportunity to look for more liberated sexual expressions.

- Equalize give and take

If there was an imbalance between who gives most in the relationship it's a great occasion to build a more equitable relationship.

- Empathic listening

A common refrain among betrayals is that the affair partner understands them better. And feeling accepted after years of no emotional connection can be supremely attractive.
But emotional intelligence and empathic listening are something the couple can learn and implement in their relationship.

You must be the opposite of this couple:

When you're in a relationship like the one Warren was in you're an easy prey of emotional affairs!

12. Finally, Forgive

If you execute together all the steps so far, they should naturally lead, eventually, to forgiveness. Forgiveness is not essential for personal recovery but it is essential for healing as a couple.
These are the overarching steps you have achieved: so far

1. Let go of anger
2. Create empathy and understanding
3. Create shared meaning

Now, if hasn't come naturally already, you can consider making a conscious effort to forgive.
Studies show that commitment to a relationship will help you forgive, and that forgiveness will further move you toward full healing (Ysseldyk, R., & Wohl, M. J. A. (2012)
Here's a post fully dedicated to forgiving:

- Forgiving infidelity: the steps you can take as a couple

13. Further Help

The steps outlined so far are "essential" and basic. But of course, there's always more you can do.
Here are more tips to stay together after an affair:

- Focus on the positive shared past (reminisce, tell stories, look at old pictures together)
- Imagine a positive future after all the turmoil
- Don't do solo therapy or you recreate distance (single therapy only to work out ambivalence)
- Men should ask about emotional involvement first and women about sexual involvement
- Reclaim territory: when ready you can experience the crime scenes together, holding hands
- Reclaim memories: do with your spouse what you did with the affair partner, but better and bigger (power move!)
- Build a shared vision of monogamy: the libertine partner should converge toward the stricter values
- If it's all too difficult a period of separation might help
- From what you've learned, cheat-proof your relationship

- Destroy the memories of the affair together as a symbolical rite of passage

Here is an example of destroying the signs of betrayal:

When Healing is Difficult

For completeness of information, here are instances when staying together happens less frequently:

- The affair is both sexual and deeply emotional
- Unfaithful men describe the affair as more emotional than sexual
- Both partners had affairs (around half relationship ended in this case)
- Unfaithful wives are childless and younger than 31 YO
- When cheating happens early (conversely long-term couples are more resilient, Gottman)

If you weren't happy, to begin with, this an excellent article on deciding whether to break up or not.
And don't be discouraged if you're in any of the above categories: that's only indicative.

Surviving Infidelity: FAQ

Here are some of the most frequently asked questions when it comes to affairs:

- How long does it take to overcome cheating?

It depends -you didn't see this coming, did you :)-.
If it's a deep emotional wound it's unrealistic to expect healing in less than a year. It could be years to fully heal, but here's the good news: most of the time things get progressively better.

- Is it easy?

No, it's not.
It's much, much better if the cheating partner cooperates. And it helps a lot if both partners know what they're doing (use this guide for that).

- Will things ever be the same?

No, your relationship will never be the same again after you discover an affair.
But asking for "the same" is the wrong approach: a relationship always evolves, even without any cheating.
And your goal should not be to come out of the affair with the same. That's weak sauce. Your goal should be to come out of it with a better relationship. As much as you don't believe it right now for many couples an affair was the catalyst for a (much) better relationship.

- Can you stay together?

There's no guarantee, but yes you can: many couples do that. And many couples manage to build stronger relationship, too.

Even Gottman reviewing the literature in The Science of Trust concludes that the prognosis of healing from betrayal is good when both partners are willing to make the journey.

SUMMARY

Affairs are traumatic events. But you will get through it and many couples manage to build stronger and happier relationships.

10 Questions For Your Unfaithful Spouse (For Closure)

Lucio Buffalmano · 3 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Betrayal is a traumatic experience.

Common first reaction are storming out (forever), attacking your partner, or self-harming.

Resist all of them.

Much better is to get to the bottom of what happened, so that you can make the best possible decisions.

Questions to Ask A Cheater

The following 10 questions are not random.

They are based on the work of relationship and infidelity researcher Shirley Glass, author of "Not Just Friends".

These questions will help you get to the bottom of the infidelity and help you decide whether or not you should stay in the relationship.

#1. How did you give yourself permission?

Ask them what did they tell themselves.

With this question, you want to gain deeper insights into his morals and values.
If they didn't think much, or if they never thought it was wrong, they value monogamy and fidelity very little.

It's also possible that they value you very little, or that they simply value people in general very little (also check: are you dating a sociopath?).

#2. Did you feel guilty after sex?

Similar to the above, but focused on sex.

If they deny or they seem insincere, you might have very different approaches towards sex and extramarital affairs.

Or you might have very different moral standards.

It doesn't necessarily mean they are bad.
Some people simply grew up in families where cheating is normal, and that influenced their approach to monogamy.
Still, it's something to keep in mind if full monogamy is very important for you.

#3. What about previous opportunities? Have you had any, did you think of any?

Ask them if they had previous opportunities for infidelity and, if so, how was this different.

You want to understand if your partner is constantly scanning for opportunities or if it was a one-off. It might be the case your partner has had more than one affair, or that he might do it again if it's simply a matter of opportunity.

Or it might be that this affair just grew out of weaknesses from your marriage.

Your Opportunity of Developing a Better Relationship

Pay attention here: if your partner says that there is a better connection with the new partner, it might be the case that the new partner listens and supports them better.

I know it's hard to admit it right now.
But this is an opportunity for you: if you learn to support and listen, then this is a chance to make your relationship better.

See an example of this type of emotional infidelity from Jack Nicholson:

Typical example of falling hard for the first woman who happens to truly listen to a man.

#4. Why did it last if you knew it was wrong?

Most partners will not answer they didn't think much of and will admit to at least a little bit of guilt.

This question explores whether or not the guilt recedes.
It's important to know because people react in different ways to an ongoing sense of guilt.

1. Suffer continuously and eventually end the affair
2. Get used to it and the guilt recedes (or the involvement increases)
3. Build mental models that allow them to suppress guilt

You want to know about this because among those mental models is painting the relationship and the betrayed partner as undeserving.
This is something you need to fix if you want to heal your relationship after a betrayal.

#5. Did you think about me at all?

This is likely to be painful.

The betrayed partners often see themselves as central elements in the affair. But often the unfaithful partner didn't think much of the betrayed partner.

If the unfaithful partner got emotionally involved, it will be even more painful to know that they think of their affair partner when at home but think little of their spouse when with the affair partner.

Part of the reason is because of the secrecy.

Secrecy and thought suppression increase the attraction of the affair partner (The Link Between Thought Suppression and Level of Arousal, Debbie Layton-Tholl).

This is one of the reasons why honest communication is crucial to moving on and healing.

#6. What did you say about us?

An affair is devastating because it drives a wedge between the couple.

With this question, you want to understand how close the two were and how far off you had drifted.

This question also helps demolish the wall between you two and start getting close again.
That's the key to healing. If you want to heal you need to rebuild the togetherness and make the affair partner the one "on the outside".
Opening up with the spouse and cutting the affair partner out is the best way to do so.

#7. Did you talk about a future together?

This one will tell you a lot about how deep their passion and romance ran.

If their affair was deeply emotional, it's possible the two of them were planning to escape, elope and build a new life.

It will be extremely painful to hear, but don't overplay the significance of their plans: often it's just the kid's insight of the adult who dreams of a different life.
It doesn't mean they wanted to escape from you, it's just a psychological infant within them who longs to go back in time. Back to teenager-dating and restarting life.

It's still maddening, I know, but few people are 100% adults, 100% mature.

Since it can be painful to hear the answer to this one, you can consider leaving it for later on, when the traumatic shock has started to taper off.

#8. What did you see in the affair partner?

This goes at the core of the personality traits.

Often affair partners are very different from the spouse or from the unfaithful partner.

For the cheater, the difference is exhilarating in the short run, but in the long run, it would get annoying (divorce rate of unfaithful partner with an affair partner is the highest).
But few have the foresight to understand that.

#9. How were you different in the affair?

The answer to this question is important to understand the weaknesses of your marriage.

It's possible the unfaithful partner was attracted to new roles or newly found feelings.
For example, a strict and rational man at home, might enjoy being a free spirit with the affair partner.

When you know what it was, you can expand your personal roles and try on new personas within the relationship.

#10. Did you have unprotected sex?

And get ready to get tested if yes.

⍰♂Lucio's Question: When are you moving out?

Lucio:
While these questions are all valid, it's important to maintain self-respect and never to grovel or plead.

We'd all like to think we're unique or different, but the truth is that cheating is part of humans' evolved repertoire.

Honorable partners may make it a question of personal values to avoid cheating.
But many are not honorable.
And spouses cheat because they're cheaters. When opportunity meets a cheater, infidelity happens.

So once you've explored enough to be ready for closure, switch to the next phase: ending the relationship.
Do it swiftly and resolutely.

What If Your Spouse Lies?

It's certainly possible.

But the way they behave will tell you a lot about the truth.

Lingering silences, pauses, and half-sentences will let you know that there is much more that they don't have the courage to say.

Big shows of denying and minimizing might suggest your spouse is the kind of person who does not respect truth and honesty.

And on the other hand, honest and "hard to swallow" revelations can be seen in a positive light: your spouse might have cheated. But at least is honest and forthcoming.

Cheating is cheating.
But an honest confession after cheating may at display positive signs of a good character.

The #1 Question To Ask Yourself

And the question is…

Why Am I In This Situation?

Tough question, I know.

If you just found out, go easy on yourself.
Especially if you tend to over-blame yourself.

On the other hand, it's a fair question to ponder, and an opportunity to do better in the future.

Here are some good questions:

- Did I pick the right person? Was I a poor judge of character?
- Was I too needy? Or am I being needy now, hoping they will pick me/
- Did I miss the signs? Check the signs of cheating for future reference
- Was I a good partner?
- Am I too naive, believing that cheating is rare, or would never happen to me

If you're a man, I highly recommend this video for a major mindset switch:

> Lucio: high quality men don't demand or expect loyalty. But they naturally get it

Because I can tell you this: men who learn human nature aren't caught off guard.
Men who learn how to read people pick faithful partners.
And, finally, high-value men don't get cheated because women are overjoyed to be with them.

These are all skills that can be learned. We teach them here, and in Power University.

Second, it's also good to explore the overall health of your relationship, as that will tell you a lot about whether it's worth the work or not.

What's an Emotional Affair

Let's start with the definition of an emotional affair:

> An emotional affair is a relationship characterized by intimacy and emotional involvement between a person and someone other than their official partner.

As a rule of thumb:

The higher the difference in intimacy between the new partner and the official partner, the more dangerous the affair is to the official relationship.

How Emotional Affairs Start

Before we jump to stages and cures, we must first understand how emotional affairs start.

Not all, but probably a majority of unfaithful partners set out on the emotional slippery slope without any awareness of how friendships morph into emotional and sexual affairs.
There might be some chemistry or some liking, but it's rarely love at first sight or "fatal attraction".

Where do They Start?

They start in places where interactions happen often.

As Schaefer points out in The Like Switch familiarity is a major element of the like equation, and emotional affairs are likely to start in places that breed familiarity and continuity of interaction.

If you are guessing "at work", you are right.
Writes Glass:

> Of course the workplace, with its daily interactions and increased female participation, has been the main driver of the increase in infidelity in the last decades.
> Indeed, 82% of all the unfaithful partner Glass treated in her career began as friends (Shirley Glass, 2004).

Stages of Emotional Affairs

Here are the steps that emotional affairs usually entail:

Stage 1: Platonic Friends / Secure Relationship

Most affairs start as friendships.

People who get involved in emotional affairs might be somewhat attracted to their affair partner in the beginning, but they don't usually set out to make their friendships into affairs.

Stage 2: Intimate Friendship / Insecure Marriage

The boundaries shift slowly and it's hard if at all possible, to pinpoint a specific moment when the friendship starts becoming too intimate.

But here are a few signs that you are entering stage 2 and that relationship is morphing into an emotional affair:

- Are you sharing things you don't tell your partner?
- Is your friend sharing details they don't share with other friends?
- Are you looking forward to talking to your friend?
- Do you often think of your friend?
- Do you look forward to sharing events in your life?
- Are you hiding this friendship from your partner?
- Are you trying to avoid other friends/colleagues seeing you when meeting?

It's at this point that the "friendship" starts becoming a wedge between the couple.
When you share things you don't talk about with your wife, you start creating a bond that is stronger than the bond you have with your spouse.

This is one of the reasons why a strong friendship and intimate connection in the relationship is one of the best antidotes to an affair.
As a woman in a strong relationship said:

> How could I have an affair, my husband is the first person I share all significant events with. I'd immediately have to run and tell him!

Now that's an emotional affair-proof bond.

Stage 3: Emotional Affairs / Emotionally Detached Marriage

At this point, the new romance starts taking more and more real estate in our minds.

The affair is secret, emotionally intimate and now also abounding in sexual chemistry.
We feel great with our affair partner and we love the feeling that our partner feels the same with us.

Here are signs that you are in stage 3:

- You are sexually excited in the presence of your friend
- You feel better with your friend than with your spouse
- Meetings start happening in secrecy
- The emotional distance in your relationship increase
- You are annoyed and uncaring in your relationship

This stage is especially dangerous for unhealthy relationships engulfed by criticism, constant fighting, and meanness.
Bad relationships indeed create a bad image of ourselves. When we contrast that with the way the affair partner makes us feel, it's like experiencing a rebirth.

This is important because you can't fully heal from emotional affairs unless you fix your relationship first.

Stage 4: Sexually Intimate Affair / Threatened Marriage

The affair might have been consumed or not by step 3. If it's not, then you reach the final step once it becomes sexual.

Notice that you're already having an affair even without sex and some sources put emotional affairs on the same level as emotional + sexual (but I disagree with that).

Interestingly enough, the later sex happens, the more likely it is the affairs will be deeply emotional.
It might be counterintuitive, but an emotional affair that is consumed later on will bond the affair partners much more strongly.

Examples of Emotional Affair

Here are a few examples of how emotional affairs come to happen:

#1. Emotional Affairs For Emotionally Starved Partners

Some relationships are at high risk of emotional unfaithfulness for a simple reason:

They had little emotional bonds in them! When a relationship has little emotional intimacy between the partners, then it's only normal that one partner will fall hard for a new partner that provides that emotional aspect that they are missing.

How do you know if your relationship is emotionally weak?
An emotionally weak relationship lacks the following:

- Knowledge of the partner (love maps in Gottman's speak)
- Understanding and acceptance
- Shared meaning (ie.: a "couple's culture")
- A positive emotional bank account (ie: fondness, appreciation, and liking for our partner)

Emotionally starved partners are highly susceptible to falling for the first person who will listen and understands.

See here a perfect example:

#2. Isolated and Lacking Human Connection

Emotional affairs can sometimes start when we need the most human connection.

It's not by chance that partners who are emotionally starved at home are more likely to fall for it.

Election (1999) is such an example

Cognitive Dissonance of Affairs

Not all, but most people have a sense of guilt when they engage in affairs.

They know it's wrong at some level, but the emotional bond with the new partner keeps them stuck.

To avoid cognitive dissonance (Festinger, 1957) they lie to themselves or change their own stories.

Here are a few ways they deal with it:

- Hiding the truth

Unfaithful partners often suppress or gloss over any detail that is inconsistent with their values and wedding vows. When asked "how could you do that" they have a little answer because, well… They meticulously avoided anything that would help them answer that question.

- They tell themselves "everybody's doing it"

Some people resolve the internal conflict by telling themselves "it's not so bad, everyone's doing it".
And they focus on everybody else who is cheating while disregarding the faithful ones.

- Unconsciously want to get caught

As strange as it might sound at first, some get caught on purpose to release internal pressure.

- Blaming the partner

This is the most pernicious and dangerous one for the relationship.

The unfaithful partner focuses on the faults of the relationship and the shortcoming of his partner.
He tells himself his partner "deserves it", or he convinces himself that his relationship is dead. It often becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy as he withdraws more and more from his relationship.

The Stages of Revelations

The revelation of the adulterous relationship usually isn't a smooth process.

It starts with suspicion, and the first confrontations arrive when there's a little bit of evidence.
At first, it's adversarial. Then it moves towards information seeking by the cheated partner. And finally, it reaches the stage of looking for deeper meaning and possibly then fixing the relationship.

Let's explore the stages of revelations:

Stage 1: Truth Seeking

The beginning of the confrontation is often a difficult phase that may include anger and a barrage of question.

A softer start from the betrayed partner and honest communication from the unfaithful partner can go a long way in healing the relationship as a couple.

Bad example of truth-seeking:

Aggression and verbal abuse make it difficult for the unfaithful partner to be honest. It also starts a hostile dynamic that makes it difficult to move into a collaborative and healing phase.

Stage 1: Reactions

These are the most typical reaction to confrontations:

- Denying

Most people deny it at first.
When there's lots of evidence, denial adds insult to injury. And when the truth finally surfaces the betrayed partner has two wounds: the sad reality and the false reassurances.

- Partial admissions

Whatever they admit to, is often just a tiny fraction of the reality.

- Lying

Denying any emotional attachment or sexual involvement is another common reaction. Lying can be a sign that the affair partner is not yet ready to end the affair.

- Gaslighting

Gaslighting happens when the cheating partner tries to frame the betrayed partner as crazy. If your partner does it to you, you are probably better off breaking up.

Here is an example from the movie "Goodfellas":

Sometimes the cheating partner can give in to endless inquisition, or he might come clean to end the relationship.

Stage 2: Information Seeking

This stage is a bit calmer and neutral.

More lies are usually unearthed and the full truth starts taking shape.

To make the process smoother, show your partner that you will not use any information against him. And don't highlight his previous lies.
If it makes you feel better, some of those lies might have also been aimed at shielding you and rescuing the relationship.

See:

- Questions to ask the unfaithful spouse

Stage 3: Mutual Understanding

In this stage, you explore the deeper meaning of what the affair meant and what are the weaknesses of your relationship.

It's an important part of healing and it will strengthen the relationship by creating shared meaning.
Ideally, this phase also sets the stage for the improvement and strengthening of the relationship.

Stage 4: Fixing The Relationship

Not all couples make it to this stage.

But all couples should probably at least try.
It's indeed possible that while working at it, the couple re-discovers deep feelings about each other and enjoy a new honeymoon time.

If you are interested in at least exploring the possibility of recovering together, I highly recommend this post:

Stages for Cheated Partner

Affair revelation and discoveries are traumatic events.

Partners who didn't expect it can experience feelings of unreality, as if they were disconnecting from the world.

#1. Numbness

Some people can go numb and stay that way for a while without feeling much.
When they start feeling again the feeling won't be positive, but it's a step forward nonetheless.

#2. Relief

Surprised to read this one?

Well, this is for specific cases.

If the partner long suspected an affair, the first moments of revelation can be a big relief.
Finally, they can confirm they didn't imagine everything, they're not crazy and that, in a twisted way, they won for being right.
But soon after the relief comes a whirlwind of less positive emotions, including rage, disbelief and a general feeling that someone pulled the rag under them.

#3. Obsession

Betrayed partners obsessively relive the scene of revelation over and over in their minds.

They add up evidence and suspicion, cross-check dates, and try to make sense of what happened.
And they picture with horror their spouse with someone else.

#4. Endless Questioning

Betrayed partners have an unquenchable need to know.
Some cannot constrain their deluge of questions, and the interrogation often leaves both exhausted.

Stages For Unfaithful Partner

Because society disapproves of affairs and cheating, the unfaithful partner can often be very lonely in his struggle.

Here are the steps they go through:

#1. Shifting Emotions

Sometimes the initial emotions solidify and strengthen in the weeks and months that go by. But some other times they shift.

Defensiveness can turn into openness -which is good- or into aggression. And ambivalence can turn into decision paralysis or full clarity.

Here is a good post to diagnose both relationships:

- Should I break up?

#2. Realizes How Much He Cares

Sometimes coming out of the closet is like a big truth moment for the unfaithful partner.
He might have been planning to break up and elope with the affair partner, but all of a sudden he realizes how much he cares about the relationship.

#3. Impatience: When Are We Going to Be Good Again?

If they want to work on the marriage, the unfaithful partner might expect to be welcomed back with open arms and is annoyed to find now an untrustful and hurt partner.

#4. Grief: Should I Abandon One?

The involved partner mourns the loss of the affair partner.
This can be very painful to witness for the betrayed partner, but it's a good sign that the affair is over.

#5. Shame & Fear

The cheating partner is sometimes ashamed of his behavior and fearful that it might cost him both relationships (and a costly divorce).

Gender Differences in Affairs

There are important gender differences in both affairs and emotional affairs.

On average:

Women cheat less when they are in a happy relationship.
Men instead tend to end up in affairs independently of how they rate their relationship.

Many women in very happy relationships have blinders that screen out any potential affair partner. Even when a man makes a pass at her, she may discount it thinking it was just being friendly.

And that's a great example of how interest creates opportunity: if you're in a relationship with a player, he'll be looking for opportunities everywhere.

When they emotionally detach

Women tend to detach from the relationship before the affair begins. Men tend to detach after the affair has begun.

Sexual Designation

The two sexes differ as to what they usually consider a sexual affair.
For women, any kind of sexual intimacy, including kissing, counts as an entrance into sexual infidelity. For men, the threshold is sexual intercourse.

Women Have More Emotional Affairs

Historically men have had sexual affairs with less emotions and women have had emotional affairs.

But men are now having increasingly emotional affairs as well. In Shirley Glass recorded clinical sample, 83% of women who had extramarital sexual affairs, also had strong or very strong emotional attachment VS 58% of men.

Some people begin an affair because of sexual attraction and jump right into sex.

At that point, emotions might or not might not develop.
If they do, they are usually less strong than if the affair had been consumed later on. So, theoretically, quick sex is better than delayed sex.

Needless to say, emotional plus sexual infidelity is the most damaging to the relationship.

Signs of Emotional Affairs

Here are some cues that can be telltale signs:

- They look for more privacy
- More time away from home
- Refusal or inability to share details about mysterious commitments
- Less family involvement
- Interests in new activities
- Going to the gym, taking care of themselves, or buying new clothes/underwear
- More undercover expenditures
- Opposites pattern of behavior: sometimes too clingy, sometimes far away
- Avoids social gatherings with a spouse or excludes her
- Sex can happen more or less frequently and more passionately
- Emotional withdrawal and less affection

Emotional withdrawal will be stronger for people who have strong monogamous tendencies.
These partners can't manage two relationships at the same time and the affair takes over (Reconstructing marriages after the trauma of infidelity). When people have strong monogamous tendencies, you will also notice:

- Sex rejection
- Less caring
- Sometimes high irritability
- Forgetfulness
- No more saying "I Love you"

The signs are indicative and there is no surefire way to tell that someone is having an affair. Some people are very, very good at lying and compartmentalizing lives.
The woman in the movie "Up In The Air" is such an example:

For more about the signs of infidelity, check out "signs your partner is being unfaithful".

SUMMARY

Emotional affairs often start as friendships with people we interact often with.
They start out as friendships where both partners admire and like each other.
Little by little, they spend more time together, talk more and share more and more about themselves.
The emotional bond deepens, and they become emotional affairs.

Signs Your Partner is Cheating: The Full List (Science-Based)

Lucio Buffalmano · 4 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Can you always spot the signs that your partner is cheating? Well, not always.

But if you are observant and keep your antennas up, chances are you can catch a cheating partner more times than not.

After this post, which leverages scientific literature and data, you will know what signs to look for.

Signs of Cheating

There are many possible signs of cheating, but you should look for clusters and patterns rather than relying on a single piece of evidence -unless you catch them with their pants down, then you don't need anything more :)-.

Here are some key clusters:

#1. Changes in Behavior

The central tenet here is that an affair will change your partner's behavior.

This is not always true, of course, but it's a fairly reliable sign of a change in your partner's life.

Here is what is more likely to change in a cheating partner"

- More critical and unforgiving toward you
- Doesn't talk as much
- Unusually apologetic
- Excludes partners from social events
- Goes out by himself
- Refusal to be accountable for their whereabouts

#2. Has Less Time For You

The cheating partner needs to meet the affair partner.

And that time needs to come from somewhere.
That means, less time for you or for activities he used to perform.

These are some common signs related to time:

- More work trips
- Longer hours at work
- Less family involvement
- Misses social gatherings with a spouse or excludes her
- More weekend commitments

#3. Renewed Passion for Life

Sometimes life and relationships can grow stale.
An affair can bring a whirlwind of renewed passion and lust for life.

A cheating spouse might:

- Start going to the gym
- Buy new clothes/underwear / sexy or stylish garments
- Interest in new activities
- Abandon activities shared with the partner
- New diet and efforts to lose weight
- Happier, more confident (at least when not dealing with the spouse)

Here's an example of the dynamic I'm talking about from the movie "Election".

The man in the video has a boring relationship with his wife and the affair gives him wings:

Note: to fix these affairs, you need to fix your relationship.

#4. Changes In Behavior Towards Money

Unfaithful partners might need more expenditures for their side partners.

This means:

- More privacy around money
- Balance not adding up
- A different pattern of withdrawals
- More money spent on lifestyle and beauty

#5. Explanations Are Too Fuzzy or Too Elaborated

What happens if you confront them?

Well, the cheater will most likely not admit to cheating.
Not right away, at least.

Instead, he/she will come up with some explanations.
And to explain away their changes cheaters might be either overly detailed, or they might use blanket rules.

The blanket rules sound like these:

- New project
- I'm stressed out for work
- So many more demands with the new responsibility

You can expect lots of details instead from more shrewd individuals.

Changes in Details

It's an important sign if they were previously sharing stories about work, or a specific person, and now it doesn't happen anymore.

#6. More Demand for Privacy

Cheaters need more personal space to carry on communication with the affair partner.

An increased search for privacy or for personal space is a good indicator of betrayal.

Here are some examples:

- Locks the door
- Goes outside to speak on the phone
- Clears the browsing history
- Puts a password on his phone (and hides it from you)
- Stashes his phone away if you're looking
- Gets nervous if you get close while he's at the computer

#7. Avoids You

What Glass calls the “monogamous type” cannot stand the lie and cheating.

This type of personality cannot compartmentalize two different lives, so he will give off the most signals (Glass & Write 1997).

Often, he will avoid you altogether to avoid the lie.

#8. Leaves Hints to Get Caught

The monogamous type wants to end the dual life which is causing cognitive dissonance.

That’s why when confronted, they usually cannot muster the strength to deny or build a castle of lies.
They are more likely to passively confirm. Or to actively volunteer information.

Example:
Marshall in How I Met Your Mother is a typical example of a monogamous type:

Indeed if you fail to confront them they might either get caught on purpose, start leaving more and more obvious signs or they might end one of the two relationships.
And when you confront them, they are more likely to admit it (example from A Walk On the Moon).

#9. Little Things That Feel “Off”

So far we have signs that clearly go in one direction: either increase or decrease.

However, depending on personalities and relationships, some other indicators will just change, and we can’t make a blanket rule on whether they increase or decrease, improve or worsen.

Change is the only good indicator for:

- Sex frequency
- Passion
- Sex experimentation
- Warmth and kindness
- Irritability, criticism, and contempt
- Frequency of arguments
- Frequency of “I love you”

Stay away from sources that say an increase or decrease of any of the above is a strong sign of cheating.
That's just not true.
Different people will react differently when it comes to sex, kindness, and, yes, even the frequency of "I love you".

Kinder

For example, a partner feeling guilty might become nicer to you to overcompensate.

The same for a partner who wants to preserve both relationships: he might be nicer out of fear and subconscious prevention.
A partner who doesn't want to be in the relationship anymore and who is emotionally involved in the affair can instead become irritable and pick more fights than he used to.

Changes In Sex Frequency

A partner with an awakened sex libido will want to have sex more often, while monogamous partners might completely avoid sex with you.

Women also have a higher tendency to withdraw from sex with their husbands when they engage in affairs.
On average, though the changes when it comes to sex are not exaggerated. The rule of thumb is that there is no significant impact on marital sex as long as the affair stays secret.

Strongest Signs of Cheating

Some signs carry a very big weight in assessing whether your partner is having an affair or not.

These are the most obvious signs of cheating:

- Proposes you should see other people
- Doesn't want monogamy anymore
- Actively avoids talking about certain people or groups
- Doesn't answer when you ask if they are cheating
- Accidentally calls you by someone else's name
- Turns down dates more often
- Friends report you they've seen them with someone else
- Forgets anniversaries
- A sexually transmitted disease you didn't have (doh!)

We will now focus on the different psychological personalities of a cheater.

Understanding where your partner fits will give you strong cues on what to look for.

Compartimentalizer Leave Little Signs

Some cheaters are good at lying and compartmentalizing lives.

They are so good because it's not even "lying" for them, it's just having two separate realities.
They have no intention to abandon the relationship and, as a matter of fact, often take extra steps to keep their relationship safe.

Emotionally and sexually they show little changes and they often lead lives that allow them to easily cover their tracks (ie.: business trips, offshore commitments, nomadic lifestyle, etc.).
That's why it's very difficult to sniff out the cheating signs of a compartmentalized.

Sometimes the affair partner doesn't even know they were in a relationship.

Example:
The movie Up In The Air is a great example of a compartmentalizer:

Tips to Uncover Betrayals

And of course, you don't have to limit yourself to passively analyzing information but you can actively look for the signs of cheating.

Here are some examples:

- Check mileage on the odometer
- Count condoms (or viagra pills)
- Check credit card reports
- Hire a detective
- Check their phone while they sleep
- Voice-activated voice recorder (this is the highest rated on Amazon)

You can place it in their car or under the bed when you're away.
But if you don't find any signs, you might also want to consider that you're over-worrying.

SUMMARY

As we have seen you can't always and reliably tell if someone's cheating.

It depends a lot on their personality and psychological makeup.
Stay away from articles like "what every woman does when she's cheating" because they are simply untrue.

This article gave you a good overview of some of the most common signs of cheating and of how different personalities behave during affairs.

Why People Cheat: Psychology, Opportunity, & Avoidants

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

If you're wondering "why do people cheat" you're asking the wrong question, and you may be coming from an overly idealistic point of view.

The real question is why are people faithful.

This article shows you the key psychological drivers for extra-pair sexual interest and the psychology of cheating.

But first, an overview:

Psychology of Cheating

People cheat because they had the opportunity to, and because evolution programmed them to take advantage of that opportunity.

This is true for any personality type.
From avoidants to dark triads who are most likely to cheat to 'good guys and nice girls' who may have lower intentions to cheat.

The Science of Infidelity

From a general point of view, cheating increases payoff in any cooperative relationship.
As The Oxford Handbook of Psychology:

> the greater net individual benefit of defecting in a trust game (i.e. , when one partner cheats but the other does not) suggests that human's evolved mating psychology is configured to motivate calculated deception (i.e. , infidelity)

And more specifically for relationship infidelity, cheating is adaptive and inborn.
Both men and women are 'programmed' with the possibility of cheating, as Harrison writes in the Cambridge Handbook of Female Sexual Adaptations:

> Since our brains process information in a manner to facilitate adaptive behavior (Cosmides & Tooby, 1987), it seems that selection favored at least some degree of extra-pair sex (Andrews et al., 2008)

Both men and women cheat because cheating can provide reproductive advantages.

For men, cheating can spread our genes wider and can help them produce better offspring or both.

And for women, it can provide superior genetic offspring from a higher mate value man, or at least increase genetic diversity for her offspring.

Cheating is indeed relatively common, and a human universal.
And you don't usually reach a wide "adoption rate" despite the heavy risks, unless it provides a genetic advantage.

Now for the really complex, this article explains what factors increases and psychological traits increase the odds of cheating.

External Factors

A few factors are independent of personality, values, and morality.

These factors don't "force" anyone to betray, but they increase the likelihood of cheating for everyone.
Here are some of them:

#1. Lifestyles of Cheating Opportunities

Professions and lifestyles that require lots of time away from our partners, for example:

- Regular travels
- Conferences attendance
- Military personnel on far away basis
- Nomadic lifestyles
- Long distance relationships

For most people, the workplace with its daily interactions and increased female participation, has been the main driver of the increase in infidelity in the last decades (Shirley Glass, 2004).
Road warriors and conferences, with alcohol mingling and hotel rooms readily available also lower the bar for cheating.

Example:
The movie Up In The Air is such an example:

#2. Libertine Social Environments

We are social creatures and we have a strong tendency to accept the values that our society and social groups embrace.

And also a rather strong tendency to act along the social-sanctioned rules.

A study in the Netherlands confirmed indeed that the sanctions -or lack thereof- from the group predicted the willingness to engage in extramarital affairs.

That means that if we have many friends who cheat, we are much more likely to cheat. If our friends don't cheat, or if grew up in an environment where cheating is highly sanctioned, cheating is much rarer.

Traits of Cheating Partners

As much as there are traits that increase the odds of finding a loyal man or woman, there are also traits that have been shown to correlate with infidelity.

- Extroversion
- Sensation seeking (Lalasz & Weigel, 2011)
- Poor impulse control (Brady et al. 2020)
- High sexual permissiveness & Unrestricted sociosexuality (Barta & Kiene, 2005; Rodrigues et al. , 2017)
- Avoidant attachment style (DeWall et al., 2011)

Family Influences

How we grew up has a huge influence on how we are. Including how we are when it comes to fidelity.

#1. Like Father, Like Son

Studies show that affairs and cheating are more likely to occur among individuals who have a history of affairs in their own family (Emily Brown, Patterns of Infidelity).

And the correlation is quite huge: Bonnie Eaker Weil recorded the data in her clinical experience and found out that 90% of unfaithful patients had at least one unfaithful parent (Bonnie E. Weil, Adultery: The Forgivable Sin).

#2. Parents' Bad Influences

Some influences are unconscious, deeper, or darker:

- Uncaring parents

Some parents are very hands-off and give their children all the freedom they want. Some children can take it as a sign of neglect.
If their partners also grant them all the freedom, they might act out more and more to get reprimanded -a sign of caring-.
Eventually, they might end up cheating as their ultimate effort to get a sign of love.

- I won't be cheated on: strike first

Sometimes a woman who sees a womanizing father make her mother suffer might vow, consciously or subconsciously, to never be like her mother.
This means she'll be like her cheating father…

- I won't be dependent like dad

If we see a parent who is stuck in a terrible marriage they have little control over, we might subconsciously avoid any strong ties.
Cheating then becomes a way to assert our distance and independence.

- Childhood abuse

Men or women who were sexually abused during childhood may engage in compulsive sexual behavior. It goes for both men and women (Carol Rinkleib Ellison, 2000).
The movie Mysterious Skin is a good example but it's too heavy and I won't post it here.

- Emotional incests

Some father snubs their wives and showers their daughters with gifts and attention (Patricia Love, The Emotional Incest Syndrome).
Some other times the daughter sees the father giving all the attention to a lover and not to her mother.
These girls develop the unconscious desire of being the other woman and go after married men.

- The caretaker

Some children grow up in an environment that forces them to take care of several members of their family. They give, give, give, and take little or nothing.
Most of the time, it's women.
These women tend to get stuck with cheating men who give them very little in return.

Relationship Phases

Some transitions can create discomfort and require some adjustments.

The more the couple has difficulties readjusting, the more cheating is likely to happen.

These are the major phases:

#1. Resisting Commitment (young relationship)

The couple hasn't fully tested yet their compatibility.

If they were wrong and living together proves difficult, partners can start being more open to extramarital affairs. And of course, some partners can find solace in cheating when they are afraid of commitment. Cheating then becomes a sort of escapism.

#2. Run Before It's Too Late (pregnancy)

The man can feel he's about to get trapped for good when the woman is pregnant. Cheating at this point is a way to break free and re-assert his freedom.

#3. Baby-Envy (parenthood)

The baby usually gets the lion's share of the woman's attention when he comes into this world. And hormonal changes happen.
Here are some common issues:

- Some men are less attracted to their women (see Madonna/Whore complex)
- Many women have less sex drive after a baby
- Some men are jealous of the mother/baby bond and feel left out

#4. Respite Cheating (turbulent teens)

When children become teenagers the household can experience some turbulent times, and marital satisfaction is often at its lowest during this period.
Cheating and having an affair can provide some respite. Also, some mothers can be reminded of their sexual yearnings by their own children.

#5. Should I Also Go (launching)

When children leave home, another critical phase rushes in.
Couples who experienced friction with their children can experience a re-blooming of their relationship.
But child-centered relationships are where children the glue can come apart. Or stay together while looking for outside sources of pleasure.

#6. I Can Still Do It (retirement)

Retirement is another major adjustment period. Some can feel a pang of meaningless, wondering if there's nothing more to live for. And an affair can give life the sparkle.
For some others, especially men, it serves to prove they are still young enough to find a mate.

Personal Troubles

As much as the relationship goes through phases, so do the people in those relationships. Cheating is more likely to happen during these phases.

#1. I've Changed... And You?

Sometimes we evolve, but our partner stays the same.
That's when cheating with a partner who is more like we are becoming is more likely to happen.

Some other times it's not about how we are becoming but how we would like to be.

Example:
We don't know if Mrs. Doubtfire cheated, but it's a typical example where an affair is likely to happen because of how apart the couple grew:

#2. Midlife Crisis

Midlife crisis can bring a host of issues, including:

- Existential crisis: is this all there is?
- Parents' death: are we next? Am I doing the best I can do?
- Am I still young enough? A younger mate can prove that
- Comfort level: not much more to strive for

Example:
The lovely movie Lost in Translation is an example of an affair during middle life crisis:

#3. Attachment Styles

Here's a quick lowdown:

Secure attachment types tend to have one relationship at a time, create a strong and solid emotional bond, and tend to cheat less. The monogamous types we talked about in signs your partner is cheating are usually secure attachment types.

Anxious attachment types crave emotional closeness but are always afraid their partner might not feel the same. They often end up in a relationship with the avoidant types (Amir Levine, Attached), which makes them feel starved for affection. They might cheat to get the emotional intimacy they crave, and they get attached very quickly to the affair partner.

Avoidant attachment types are fearful of emotional intimacy. For these types, an affair provides a way to get more autonomy, and research proves avoidant cheat the most: twice as much as all the other attachment types. And they are more likely to cheat multiple times and have more one-night stands (Allen, Baucon, 2004).

Example:
Mastroianni in La Dolce Vita is a great example of a cheater-avoidant attachment type

Relationship Issues

Cheating can be the consequence of troubles in the relationship. And when you can fix those relationship issues, you can also lower the chances (and the need) for cheating.

#1. Cheating to Escape

Sometimes life in the relationship can become a grey doldrums. And sometimes it can be straight-up painful.

Imagine having to attend to a sick parent or a child who's had an accident.
These tragic occurrences can take a huge toll on the couple. Cheating can be a way to escape emotional pain: the lover is the antidepressant.

#2. Power Struggles: Cheating to Get Even

Some spouses can feel smothered under the tight grip of their more powerful partner. Cheating can be a way to get back at him and get even.

And of course, the most popular cheating is revenge against having been cheated.

#3. Loneliness: Cheating for Emotional Starvation

Some couples spend years or even decades without ever really getting to know each other.

When they finally meet someone who listens, asks questions, and wants to know their fears and dreams, then they are liable to fall for them hard.

Example:
There are many examples in movies, but I like The Good Girl which is basically all about emotional cheating:

You fix this issue by asking questions, listening empathically, and getting to know your partner. And by learning emotional intelligence and emotionally tuning in to your partner.

#4. Child-centered Relationships

Some relationships put children above everything else.
That also means though that there's no space for romance between the spouses.
And when there's no romance at home, partners look for it outside.

#5. So Bad There's No Escape

Sometimes people cheat at the end of the umpteenth terrible argument, or when they just can't take it anymore and they deeply want to move on.
They can cheat as a way to "force themselves" out of the relationship or to officialize that it's over.

How to Prevent Cheating In Relationships: 12 Steps-Guide

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The most effective way to prevent cheating comes down to:

1. know how affairs usually begin
2. build a solid relationship
3. pick the right partner

By the end of this article, you will have a much deeper understanding of all three of them.

How to Prevent Cheating

This article leverages literature, data, and research to give a thorough understanding of the phenomenon of cheating and infidelity.

It's a good starting point, and if you want to delve deeper, there are more links you can explore.

Let's start.

1. Avoid Emotional Slippery Slope

This is the most critical prevention if both of you want to stay committed.

Both you and your partner should know how cheating usually happens.

As we've seen in emotional affairs, most cheating starts as friendships in places of daily interaction -often work-. First, there's maybe some mutual liking. You talk, and you discover some common interests. Then you share something we wouldn't share with other people.
And little by little you open up and share things that you don't share with our partners. Then you start hiding your meetings… And you both know there's something going on.
And that's when the emotional affair has reached the deep waters.

These are the precautions you must take:

No Relationship Talk With Opposite Sex

Anybody who could potentially be an alternative to your spouse doesn't get to talk about your relationship with you. Especially if you want to complain about your relationship. If you want to talk to someone about your relationship, he or she must be a friend of the relationship, not just one of you.

Talk to Friends as a Couple

Helping a friend of the opposite sex with emotional support, confidentially, and without anyone else knowing is a well-beaten path toward infidelity.

If a friend wants to talk to you about their problems and there is some attraction going on: talk to him/her as a couple.

Attractive People Must Be Friends in The Relationship

Anyone who can be considered an attractive alternative must be a friend of both of you. Pay especially attention to:

- People who are different than yourself and your spouse

Frank Pittman notes that the choice of the affair partner is often not about "superiority" or attractiveness, but rather on how different they are (Private Lies: Infidelity and The Betrayal of Intimacy). Interestingly enough, Hendrix Herville notes that it's exactly those traits that will later annoy you the most (Getting the Love You Want).

- Friendly men

Women in happy relationships often have blinders that make any potentially interested men invisible. For women, friendships are also about being open and self-disclosing, but men can read these signs as interest.

2. Form a United Front

Strong couples, the couples who stay together and have each other's back, present a united front to life.

When you don't present a united front, it's easier for life situations and for other people to drive wedges between you two.
Children especially are particularly apt at pitting the two parents against each other to get what they want, so make sure you never badmouth your partner in front of the children.

Instead, approach friends, in-laws, and children, as a unit.

3. Stay Away From Old Flames

Former lovers are some of the most dangerous individuals for relationship fidelity.
And especially so when years have passed.

When you look into each other's eyes you often don't see the problems and hurt and the shortcomings. You remember the passion and it takes you back to your younger self. It's a feeling of both passion and safe familiarity: we are more excited and less afraid of being rejected.
And we long to go back in time.
But wanting to relive the bygone years is a fool's quest.

Note: if you are single though reconnecting with old lovers could be a good idea. Nancy Kalish's survey shows that rekindled romances stay together 72% of the time, much higher than the average. And if they were first loves, it's 78% of the time (Nancy Kalish, Lost & Found Lovers).

4. Confess Early Infatuations

The most difficult something is to confess, the more important it is that you do it.
If you started liking someone, don't feel afraid to tell your partner. It's only normal that we go through life being attracted to others.

It's important that we share feelings because research has proven that secrecy fuels desire and attraction.
Talking about it decreases attraction while at the same time increasing the bond between you two.

5. Avoid Sticky Situations

It's normal to be attracted to other people. What's wrong is to have the mindset that "if he/she was the right one for me, I wouldn't be attracted to someone else".
The right mindset instead is to not fantasize about those other people because many affairs start in the mind before they take place in real life.
And don't flirt with them, because flirting sends signals of availability.

To recap:

- Attraction is normal
- Don't act on it
- Don't fantasize
- Don't flirt with them

- Avoid risky situations such as time alone and drinking together
- Make him chase -and you'll automatically devalue him-

Example:

Nicole Kidman flirts a lot in this video, but she ends powerfully. By making him chase for a meeting and closing with a blowing kiss, she ends up like the most powerful of the two. And women don't drool after less powerful men.

6. Become Best Friends

It's a sad reality in many relationships that many topics become taboo and that we talk more freely with our friends than with our spouses.

Friends can be more friendly and accepting, less judgmental, and overall easier to get along with because they have fewer expectations from us.
But the more topics you keep off from your spouse, the more likely cheating and emotional affair become. The more you can behave like good friends, the more likely it is you're cheat-proofing your relationship.

In Emotional Affairs, I quote one woman saying:

> I share all significant events with my husbands. How could I have an affair, I'd have to immediately run and tell him about it

Now that's an emotional affair-proof bond.

7. Don't Compare!

Researchers Drigotas and Rusbult introduce a model sometimes called the CL(alt) model (A Dependence Model of Breakups).

It basically says that people are unhappy when their Comparisons Levels with expectations and previous experiences are negative for their current relationship. And when they compare their CLs to seemingly better Alternatives (alt), that's when they cheat.

I find the mathematical model interesting and, in this case, backing up something that we all can naturally grasp and understand.
When people compare a potential colleague or friend with their partner they are comparing the infatuation period, which is usually strong and unrealistic, with a long-term relationship.
And they are comparing the best version of the infatuation subject, which is a fantasy, with the real-life reality of their partner.
The comparison is bound to be unfair toward our partner.

Indeed, when people marry affair partners, the divorce rate is considerably higher than the average (Glass, 2004).

8. Foster Fondness

Relationship researcher John Gottman says that a big difference in the likelihood of cheating is how we feel and think about our partners when they're not there.

If we have a generally low opinion of them it will be easy for us to go along when the opportunity arises. We might even think that it's great we've had the chance we had.

If we hold our partners in high esteem instead and if we care about them, it's unlikely that we will cheat.

Read here for more information on how to foster fondness in your relationship.

9. Fix Relationship Issues

The more issues you can transform into strength, the safer -and better- your relationship will be. The issues below are some of the most critical to make the relationship cheat-free:

Child-Centered Marriages

Child-centered marriages can break the bond between the couple. How do you recognize if you have a child-centered marriage?
Try to answer the following:

- You talk little about your work, your life, your plans
- At dinner, you talk about children
- You only go out with other couples with children…
- … But you don't go out much at all
- Children are the main factor in deciding holidays
- Movies are always children's movies

If you are a child-centered couple, you should build a shared culture as a couple. Or your intimate bond will disappear and make your relationship more prone to cheating and affairs.

Sexual Perspectives

Steve Harvey says that when a man doesn't get enough sex, he'll automatically be looking for more outside of the relationship.

Well, Steve Harvey is not a researcher, but a different sexual perspective can be an issue. Usually, but not always, the man wants to have more sex than the woman.

Sometimes women want less sex soon after a child is born, and sometimes the issue is different approaches to sex. Men tend to want sex no matter the atmosphere in the relationship, but women want sex when they feel good about their partners.
And then, of course, men are OK to jump right into it while women sometimes prefer a slower start. Trying to find a compromise is possible most of the time.

The good news is that sexual drive tends to decrease in men and increase in women, so you only have to bridge the gap until you'll naturally converge in perspective :).

Lack of Common Interests

When there's no common interest, you spend less time with your spouse and have less to talk about.

And it's more likely you will eventually meet someone with the same interests and with more things to talk about.

But "lack of common interests" is often more about laziness than an unchangeable state.
Here are a few things you can do:

- Shake up your life: take up no hobbies
- Join a dance class, Toastmasters or do sport
- Go to church together
- Do yoga
- Start habits together (Saturday night out, Friday wine, etc.)

10. Be Realistic

John Gottman says that couples with high expectations tend to be happier.

But Shirley Glass says unrealistically high expectations can lead to affairs when they are not met.
A good dose of realism in your high expectation can be healthy then.

A common vulnerability leading to infidelity is the disillusionment that develops when expectations about marriage are not met. Individuals with high expectations can be easily dissatisfied because they expect more than any one relationship can reasonably provide. Unrealistically high expectations can lead to affairs, just as undeniably bad marriages can.

Example:
Maybe her expectations about “love” are a bit unrealistic

11. Pick A Safe Partner

We live in a world where saying that some people are more likely to cheat is almost taboo (also read The Blank Slate).

Well, don’t be afraid of the “politically correct police”, because different people also differ in their likelihood to cheat.

Some factors that reduce the likelihood of cheating are:

- Parents stayed together and didn’t cheat on each other
- Religious background
- Conservative political views
- Low number of sex partners

I have written already on the research of cheating and you can read more here:

- How to pick a loyal partner

12. Improve Your Relationship

Men tend to cheat when they are happy in the relationship as well, but a bit less. And women cheat considerably less when in a happy relationship.
That’s another reason to make your relationship great.

I have written a lot on this website on how to improve relationships, and they are all solid articles based on research. Instead of writing all of it, I invite you to take a look if you’re not yet experienced in relationship management:

- Get to know your partner
- Turn towards and build emotional connection
- Get a positive perspective
- Accept influence
- Learn conflict management skills
- Avoid the 4 Horsemen of The Apocalypse (criticism, defensiveness, contempt, stonewalling)

Or, for an overall overview:

This article on how to prevent cheating reviewed a few key areas and common weaknesses in the relationship that often lead to infidelity.

By addressing them, you will greatly increase the chances that both partners will remain faithful.

How to Find a Loyal Girlfriend: 99 Traits of Faithfulness

What makes a loyal partner?

How do you recognize and pick a faithful and loyal girlfriend material?

This article reviews a number of sources and statistics to answer that question.

Traits of Loyal Partners

If you want to pick a loyal mate, statistics say that the following traits correlate with fidelity:

- Religious
- Traditional values that include family, housework, and supporting family and husband
- Monogamous social circle
- Lower partner count
- Later first-time sex: Robert J. Levin and Amy Levin surveyed 100.000 women and found that only 16% of women reported extramarital sex when they lost their virginity after the age of 21. Compared to 48% of women who lost their virginity at 15 years old or younger.
- Lives in a small town and likes living in a small town
- Monogamous family
- Present father
- Personal values that include respect for monogamy, truth, and honesty
- Secure attachment style
- Empathy and altruism (as opposed to dark triad personality)
- Conservative cultural background
- Introverted
- Serial dater until she commits to one, instead of "simultaneous dater". Langlais et al.(2015) found that mothers who engaged in simultaneous dating drank more alcohol and had more unprotected sex even when they wanted a relationship
- Neuroticism (but findings are not consistent across cultures)
- Prioritizes character over looks: In numerous studies, Gangestad and his colleagues have shown that women who seek short-term mates place special importance on the physical attractiveness of their partners

I'm personally not convinced that having a "party phase" increases the risks.
Women who've never had "fun" in their younger years may grow very curious as older women (example from "Walk On The Moon").

Looks can give you many good hints. But the last word always comes down to character

Traits of Cheating Partners

As much as there are traits that increase the odds of finding a loyal man or woman, there are also traits that have been shown to correlate with infidelity.

Personality traits:

- Extroversion (Altgelt et al. , 2018; Orzeck & Lung, 2005; Yeniceri & Kökdemir, 2006)
- Sensation seeking (Lalasz & Weigel, 2011)
- Poor impulse control (Brady et al. 2020)
- Sexual excitation,albeit stronger for men (Mark et al., 2011)
- High sexual permissiveness & Unrestricted sociosexuality (Barta & Kiene, 2005; Rodrigues et al. , 2017)
- Avoidant attachment style (DeWall et al., 2011)
- Dark triad (narcissism, sociopathy, Machiavellianism)
- Antisocial/low agreeableness
- Low religiosity: less religious people were more likely to be unfaithful (Whisman et al. , 2007)

Life History Risks:

- Poaching history: poached you, you poached her, or poaching in the past
- Right out of divorce/breakup (re-enters the “assessment phase”)
- Family infidelity, albeit this can swing both ways with some children “swearing off” infidelity
- Physical abuse as children (sorry to add insult to injury)
- Positive past experiences with cheating, including not getting caught
- Absent fathers sub-communicating that men can’t be trusted to stick around and provide

- Harsh environments predispose for a “fast life strategy” of earlier sex and uncommitted sex

Cultural Risks:

- Libertine cultures
- Libertine workplaces or with common cheating
- Lack of infidelity condemnation (ie.: France)
- High female empowerment cultures may decrease the shame and stigma on female infidelity and high sexual partner count
- Drinking and partying cultures, linked with hookup culture

Opportunity Risks:

- Travels a lot for work or recreation
- Attractive and freewheeling colleagues who provide opportunities
- Lives in a large metropolitan area
- Many attractive opportunities around

Relationship Risks:

Remember that the quality and direction of your relationship heavily impacts the odds of cheating.
Some of the risks include:

- Relationship dissatisfaction/unhappiness, stronger predictor for women (Mark et al., 2011)
- Declining sexual adjustment (Scott et al., 2017)
- Cheating partner and revenge: Warach et al.(2018) found that sexual betrayal was the single best predictor of sexual infidelity of the personality dimensions they examined
- Mate value mismatches: she may cheat if she thinks she’s higher mate value, but also if he’s much higher mate value and she cheats because she believes he will as well (Buss and Shackelford, 1997)

This is great news because it means that as long as you stay a great guy and maintain a great relationship, most women will be faithful.
And as relationship researcher Gottman said “women in love are wearing blinkers (to other men)”.

Shape Your Loyal Partner

This article is about the traits of loyal partners and not so much about what you should do to ensure loyalty.

So I won’t go much into the details, but here’s a primer for completeness’ sake:

Men: Be A Confident, Good Leader For Both

- Be a good leader
- Don’t put up with cr@p
- Be open to her influence and shared decision making
- Be the best man she’s ever had
- Pay attention to her emotional needs

⚠ Be careful of emotional infidelity
Men are more likely to underestimate emotional infidelity because it’s psychologically less threatening. But to women it's important, and many breakup or sexual infidelity start as emotional infidelity.

Women: Be A Good, Loving Woman

- Keep your financial independence
- Keep your social circle of girlfriends (helps both you and the relationship)
- Don't move in into his place (find a new place)
- Seek a balance of investment
- Be the best woman she's ever had
- Make him feel important

Both Men and Women: Be The Partner You Wish to Have

- Be loyal and address issues head on
- Keep taking care of yourself
- Ban criticism, contempt, defensiveness
- Keep learning and being curious about each other

Build Total Relationships

Research shows indeed that infidelity was rare in "total marriages", such as marriages that had psychological, intellectual, and recreational compatibility.

That means that when you go strong on an emotional, intellectual, and interests level, then you have a total marriage and you have few reasons to cheat.

Gender Differences

Men on average cheat more, albeit the difference has been closing in the West and is much smaller in open culture and among younger individuals.

What's also interesting is that men and women value different things when it comes to loyalty.
Such as:

- Women care more about emotional fidelity
- Men care more about sexual fidelity

SUMMARY

Infidelity is a widespread phenomenon.

How likely it is that your partner will cheat depends on a wide variety of factors.

Some of them are environmental, such as the availability of mates, society's culture, and the subculture they ascribe to.
Some of them are more personal, ranging from genetic makeup, values, and family background.

This article gave you a broad overview of the traits you need to pay attention to if you want a loyal partner.

Should You Forgive a Cheater?

I cannot answer that question for you.
It's a fair question and if there were deeper issues in the relationship this is a good moment for you to take stock of your situation.
I recommend this article to troubleshoot your overall relationship health:

- Should I break up or not

When You Should Forgive

What I can tell you is that if you want to rebuild the relationship, then forgiving is a must.

I've seen couples staying together that never moved into forgiveness and kept that constant, burning rage of resentment within them.

And it's not pretty.

Forgiving is also the final step to recovery. You can heal without forgiveness, but healing with forgiveness is the fuller, final stage.

In short: if you don't want to forgive, it's a respectable choice and you should break up. If you want to reach a fuller level of healing and/or stay together, then you should forgive.

Forgiving a Cheater And Recovery

Keep this in mind:

Forgiveness is trauma recovery.

There's no independent and parallel track for healing and forgiving: the two work together.

We talked about how to ease the pain of infidelity and how to heal together as a couple. As you heal together, you are also laying the foundations for forgiveness.
Here are the overarching steps when bundled together:

1. Letting go of anger
When you re-establish safety (contact with the affair partner cut) and restart compassionate communication, you are letting go of anger.

2. Empathy
When you search for the deeper causes and build shared meaning around the affair and why it happened, you were building empathy for each other.

3. Caring
With every compassionate listening, with every caring gesture, you are removing the last bits of revenge-seeking tendencies. And as your resume caring about each other you are moving towards forgiveness.

Forgiving Timelines

When to forgive is another difficult question to answer without knowing your situation or personality.
Here's what I can tell you though: if you wait too long, you are feeding feelings of despair and hopelessness. Not good either for you or your relationship.
If you forgive too soon, it's not really forgiving and you will try to rebuild your relationship on shaky foundations.
Ultimately, you have to forgive when you are ready to forgive.

Impediments To Forgiving

Forgiving is not always easy. These are some of the most common pitfalls on the road to forgiving:

1. Victim Mentality

The victim mentality is the one that can never move beyond pain… And beyond accusing the cheating partner of that pain.

It sounds like this:

> -I will never be able to move on from the pain that you have caused me

Or:

> -You ruined my life

Sometimes cheated partners have difficulty in moving beyond the victim mentality because they see themselves as the “good” side of the relationship, the saintly half that did nothing wrong.
As long as you keep dividing the relationship into “good” and “bad” you’re not doing yourself any favor. Reality is often more complex than that.

2. Suspicion of Ongoing Cheating

Safety is a necessary precondition for healing. You can’t move on and you can’t forgive unless you’re certain that the cheating has stopped.
It’s a protection mechanism: if you don’t let go of fear, you are in some way shielding yourself if cheating is once again uncovered.

What to do

If it’s true that cheating has not stopped and your partner is lying, you might consider breaking up here.
If you’re not sure, it’s fair to find ways to make sure: hiring a detective is a valid option.

A cheating partner should also welcome all chances he has to prove himself to be on the good side: it’s in everyone’s interest.
Once you make sure cheating has stopped… It’s time to move on.

3. Pain From the Past

If the betrayed partner is mired in anger, suspicion, and revenge-seeking in spite of everything else being clear, there might be other issues.
Some possible issues here:

- Painful infidelities in the family
- Sexual abuse
- Chronic low self-esteem
- Deep-rooted distrust or hatred of men/women

Those should be addressed separately.

4. Aggressive Suffering

Some victims unconsciously want to hold on to their pain. This is something that happens to victims of incest and domestic violence but can happen in very traumatic cases of infidelity as well.

The victims unconsciously believe that a full recovery would mean letting the cheating partner off the hook. If they’re not in pain anymore, that would send the message that cheating was not a big deal.

In a way, this is an aggressive form of pain as it aims to make the cheater feel forever guilty. Of course, this stance is unhelpful to anyone, first of all, the betrayed partner.
You might even push the cheating partner into the more caring embrace of another affair if aggressive suffering keeps going on indefinitely.

5. Self-absorbed Perennial Pain

Sometimes the betrayed partner cannot forgive because he can only focus on himself. This does not apply to every case of course, but in many cheating instances, the betrayed spouse is also part of the blame.

For example, a partner cheat after their spouse broke up with them. When they get back together, the betrayed partner still considers it cheating but fails to realize how his own actions -to break up- also caused the cheating -and the pain-.

If that's the case, allowing yourself to experience part of the cheater's pain, or to see things from his point of view, can help you move forward from self-absorbed perennial pain.
Even if you bare little responsibility though, looking at the situation from the cheater's eyes is important: compassion is a major element of forgiveness.

6. Too Early, Fake Forgiveness

Some partners jump too quickly into forgiving as a way to cut through the difficult confrontational period. It's a mistake and it doesn't help anyone.

The betrayed partner will be unhappy in the relationship because they haven't really moved on. And they'll wonder if it was the right decision.
Fake early forgiveness will also send the wrong message to the cheating partner: that cheating wasn't so bad.

You can't and should not pretend that cheating never happened or that it didn't hurt. It happened, and it was a mistake.
And it hurt, and that's OK.
Take the time you need to reach full healing and real forgiveness.

Steps Into Forgiveness

Mutual empathy is the most important ingredient to achieve forgiveness.

Keep in mind you will get there gradually.
It's a slow and sometimes barely perceptible process, but if you do it right it inexorably advances until, if you do all the rest right, you will have a stronger and healthier relationship.

These steps will help you get there faster and more deliberately:

#1. Look At Your Contributions

I know this will ruffle the feathers of many cheated partners.
But hold on.

Don't worry, it wouldn't even cross my mind to turn the tables on you if it weren't a helpful part of recovery.

It will not apply to ALL partners, but before ruling yourself out, please at least consider the possibility of your contributions: this is an important exercise.

Here are some examples of how the betrayed partner might have unwittingly contributed:

- Leaving your partner on the outside of a child-centered relationship
- Putting work first, second… And third
- Turning away and missing opportunities for emotional connection
- Being generally uncaring and taking the partner for granted

#2. Forgive Yourself

Betrayed spouses rarely feel guilty about their partner's cheating -but if you do, this applies!-.

But they can often feel guilty about having missed the signs, about having been so gullible, or they feel guilty for what the whole situation will mean to the people around them.

Before forgiving your partner, then, you must forgive yourself first.
The signs are only obvious in hindsight and you weren't gullible. And even if you were, let it go, we all are gullible at times and there's nothing wrong with it.

#3. Explore The Betrayal Together

Looking into what brought about the affair from a neutral perspective will help replace anger with understanding.

You should do this exercise with the cheating partner so that it will also build shared meaning, increase each other's knowledge and build a common understanding.

#4. Address Relationships Weaknesses

An affair is often the contribution of several weaknesses in the cheating partner, the betrayed partner, and the relationship overall.

Looking at cheating as the culmination of several joint weaknesses instead of just the cheater's fault will help you expand on compassion and empathy.
As you do it, start addressing and working on those weaknesses.
As the relationship improves, forgiving will be easier within a framework of a healthier, happier relationship.

#5. Accept Amends From Cheating Partner

The capacity to forgive is highly -very highly- correlated to the willingness and practical steps that the cheating partner takes in making amends.

Let's not forget this: the cheating partner must actively seek forgiveness for the mistake.
If they don't, let them this guide. If they still don't, they might have a case of entitlement mentality and feel entitled to extramarital affairs.

The more they are willing to make amends, the easier it will be for the betrayed partner to forgive.
Here are some ways the cheating partner can facilitate:

- End the affair pronto
- Allow the spouse to be present when drafting the final letter or doing the final call
- Be more concerned about taking care of the betrayed partner than defending yourself
- Show concrete signs you're working on the relationship
- Use your spouse's language of love to make it up
- Prepare and deliver a heartfelt apology

For the betrayed partner: get all the amends you can.
It's possible that it will be difficult for you to accept early amends as that would mean you're forgiving too early and letting them off the hook.
Don't let that mentality trap you: treat each amend separately and "at the moment". As you welcome them, you will also take gradual steps toward full forgiveness.

#6. Ask for Forgiveness

As a final step, once you're almost fully ready to forgive, you can reward your partner's hard work by asking for your own forgiveness.

Based on the first step when you looked at your own contributions, you can tell your partner what you're sorry about.
Don't underestimate this step: your partner will likely be very touched and it will catapult you into a renewed level of "we-ness".

#7. Grant Forgiveness

Finally, you're ready for the big step. Granting forgiveness. Here are the steps:

1. Acknowledge the pain it all caused
2. Say how you felt
3. Tell them you still hold them accountable…
4. … But that you are no longer angry…
5. … Because you have no compassion for their weakness and understanding of the situation
6. Explain forgiveness is for the past, but in the present and the future…
7. … You won't tolerate X, Y, Z (for example: further cheating)
8. Finally, end emphatically by telling them you forgive and are ready to move on
9. Make a final grand gesture: a hug, pull out a gift, or a card to remember this day

Stop blaming and start living

Rituals of Recommitment

It can also be helpful to perform symbolic rituals to mark the end of infidelity and recovery and to kick-start your new and improved relationship.
Here are some ideas:

1. Destroy Symbols of Cheating

Rona Subotnik and Gloria Harris propose to write down a list of all the wrongful acts that happened. Then tearing it up and throwing it into a river -or alternatively burning it and burying the ashes as a symbol of the death of the affair-.

Note: I might be a hopeless environment-friendly guy, but please don't throw it down a river :).
Burning it should do, then go have a picnic on that river and enjoy it clean and nice.

2. Courtship

Sometimes cheating can be very painful when the betrayed partner discovers typical courtship activities in the affair relationship.
It's even more painful if that courtship was missing in their relationship.

In either case, kicking off a renewed period of courtship with dates, romantic movies, and candlelight can benefit any recovering couple.
In case you need some inspiration for the music.

3. Renewing Vows

Renewing wedding vows is another way to strengthen the bond and officialize the new beginning. You might also go on a new honeymoon afterward.

Checklist for Banning Affairs

To prevent future affairs, here's a brief checklist of what you need to make sure of:

- You are aware of your past weaknesses
- You are clear about what constitutes inappropriate "friendship" out of the relationship
- You present a united front to the world
- You agree on what commitment means
- You are open to talking about future vulnerabilities and dangers
- You make your relationship a priority

Summary

Forgiving the cheater is the final step towards healing from an affair. You can heal without forgiving, but you cannot rebuild a strong relationship without forgiving.

Whether you want to forgive or not and whether you want to work on the relationship is up to you.
But if you want, this article showed you how to forgive a cheater and build a stronger relationship together.

7 Types of Dysfunctional Relationships (W/ Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Dysfunctional relationships can lead to toxic relationships, vicious circles, and ultimately breakups.

BUT, if you catch them in time or if you can fix them, then you can also fix your relationship.

This article lists 7 of the most common dysfunctional relationship types.

Dysfunctional relationships follow patterns of behavior that are repeated over time, and that's why some relationship researcher calls them "dysfunctional relationship dances".

I will use the same expression for this article.

- SUMMARY

What Are Dysfunctional Relationships

Let me say this right away:

Almost every couple develops what some relationship researcher calls “relationship dances”.

Dances are interactions based on traits and behaviors that are repeated in a loop through the years.
There are advantages to relationship dances, such as familiarity and shared meaning.

Relationship dances can be healthy and helpful.
For example, if every time that one partner is down the other cheers him up, that’s a positive dance.

The disadvantage is that they can become inflexible, and potentially even constrict our personalities at times that we are growing or want to change -or that we should change-. And that’s when some partners have affairs: to try on new roles.

And of course, some of these dances are unhealthy and bring unhappiness to the relationship.

This is, then, the definition of a dysfunctional relationship:

> A dysfunctional relationship is a relationship where patterns of destructive, harmful or abusive behaviors, also called “dances”, are repeated over time

It’s important to distinguish between “one-off” events and patterns of behavior.
A one-off event can be abusive, but it doesn’t qualify as a “dysfunctional relationship” unless it’s repeated over time.

The Ugly Side of Dances

Harville Hendrix in Getting The Love You Want explains that we naturally seek partners who are different than we are.
The opposite traits are attractive in the beginning. But in a deteriorating relationship, they start to annoy us, they grow more extreme and they exacerbate the relationship problems.

Dysfunctional Relationship Dances

In dysfunctional relationships partners have their personality defined and validated by the other partner’s role.
This is a list of some of the most common and dysfunctional relationship dances:

#1. Child and Parent

In a child/parent relationship, the parent is the partner who has the highest authority.

But not only in the relationship but also in the outside world.
The parent may have a good career, an authoritative position, or hold major responsibilities, and he is held in high self-esteem by society and by the couple’s social circle.

The child admires his partner but also resents him.
The parent in exchange envies the freedom and freewheeling spirit of the child.

Albeit these roles were attractive to each other in the beginning, the couple might grow uncomfortable being in a child/parent relationship. It might feel incestuous, or we might feel our partner is not up to our level and/or too different.

Age Is No Always A Differentiator

It can be the case that the parent is older.

But it's not always the case. And sometimes it can also happen the older partner is the baby.
Vasco Rossi, a famous Italian rocker (yes, famous only in Italy :D), sings:

> (…) and maybe you're right, when you say that I'm a child… And you're 20 years younger

Vasco Rossi, a drug abuser and an alcoholic, is singing about her life partner who is more mature than he is in spite of the age difference.

Example:
The movie Mrs. Doubtfire is such an example. But Miranda / Steve relationship is even more obvious:

#2. Saint and Sinner

AKA: "savior & troublemaker".

In the saint and sinner dysfunctional relationship dance, there's a "good" partner and a "bad" and wild one.

And the bad one is busy reforming, taming, and trying to teach the wild one about the "normal" life they would like to share.

She might be the party girl and he might be the guy bringing her headache tablets the day after. Or he might be the philanderer and she is the one trying to make him monogamous.

But it's more codependence in the Saint and Sinner, and it replicates the parent/child relationship of teenage years. The sinner rebels, while the saint stays watchful.

#3. Authority and Rebel

In the authority and rebel dance, one partner is strong, judgmental, and intimidating.

And the other tries to carve his own space by resorting to subterfuge and small acts of rebellion.

The rebel sometimes learned to act behind their parent's backs as a child. When they grow up, instead of facing their partner openly and voicing their opinion, they might say yes and pretend to go along with it. Only to then do what they want to do when the partner is not watching.

This is a very bad dynamic that stifles the development of a solid emotional bond. They are also very prone to affairs and cheating because rebelling is used to commit and hide small acts of sabotage.

Example: Female Sinner

My father and my mother often tell the story of my mother's smoking.

My father was in the Navy and used to gather all the free cigarettes he didn't smoke.
One day he picked the stack to give to some friends. And there and then he realized… They were all empty.

Instead of coming clean about her smoking habits and risking facing a judgmental husband, she smoked behind his back.

This example might not qualify today as a saint and sinner, but back then people didn't think cigarettes were harmful and women often smoked as a sign of independence.

#4. Demand-Withdraw Dance

This is very common and possibly one of the least destructive on this list.

There are two types of demander and withdrawer:

1. Actual tasks: one partner asks to do a task, and the other postpones
2. Resolution: one partner demands to discuss or fix a problem, while the other withdraws (Papp et al., 2009)

Often the woman demands and the man withdraws.

Example:

The Break Up (2006), is a movie featuring a demander and a withdrawer. At the beginning of this video you can see an example:

#5. Pursuer and Distancer

Somewhat similar to the demand and withdrawal, but the struggle is over a deeper connection and less about a specific event.

The pursuer, often the woman, seeks an emotional connection or a discussion about relationship issues. And the man withdraws emotionally or runs away physically.

The running only makes the pursuer chase harder, and that often means an escalation with criticism and contempt, to which the man responds with defensiveness and stonewalling.

The pursuer and distancer are part and parcel of the "anxious-avoidant trap".

Watch out: this cycle doesn't usually go on forever. It usually sets off a vicious cycle that makes the relationship worse and worse.
As long as the wife keeps chasing, she's still invested in the relationship. But eventually, she will stop chasing after him, which means she mentally checked out.
And a break up soon follows suit.

Also see the "anxious-avoidant trap", a typical pursuer and distancer relationship.

> Anxious-Avoidant Relationship: Analysis & Fixes (W/ Examples)

#6. Boxer and Avoider

Gottman talks about boxers and avoiders when he describes the "fighting styles" of different couples.

The boxer is the partner who is a conflict engager.
He raises his voice, uses barbed words, and overall tries to get a rise out of the avoider.
The avoider is a conflict avoider though and shies away from any confrontation or tension.

The boxer feels there's no intimacy in the relationship not because there is no real intimacy, but because there is a mismatch in argument styles.

From a cultural perspective, the stereotype is that boxers tend to be from Latin or southern European cultures while conflict-avoiders tend to be from more withdrawn cultures.

#7. Reminder and Forgetful

In the reminder-forgetful dance, one partner is responsible and detail-oriented, while the other appears a lazy slacker.

It's similar to the demander and procrastinator, but the demander is not necessarily precise, while the response is all about "doing it properly".
The demander feels the forgetful is untrustworthy and a slob. The forgetful feel of the reminder is an annoying square.

Fixing Dysfunctional Relationships

You are not stuck in any position or situation in life, but it's up to you where you will move and where you will end up.

The same is true for dysfunctional relationships: it's wholly up to you to stay stuck in them or transform them into healthy and invigorating relationships.

The simplest step is to start meeting halfway.

There's a strong element in dysfunctional relationship dances where the partners expect the other to be extreme and they automatically go on the other extreme end just to start with an advantage. Or sometimes just to annoy their partners.

Instead of falling for these hollow power games, start meeting halfway.

- The partner who pushes, backs off a bit
- The partner who retreats, meets halfway and shows more proactiveness

When you moderate yourself, you also make it easier for your partner to moderate themselves.

SUMMARY

Dysfunctional relationship dances entail each partner occupying a different extreme of temperament, goals, or personality.

But since they are not ready to accept their partner as they are, they end up arguing and fighting to get it their way.

StrengthsFinder 2.0: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

"StrengthsFinder 2.0" (2007) helps readers find their strengths and innate talents. Tom Rath, the author, famously argues that people shouldn't focus on addressing and fixing their weaknesses, but go all-in on their strengths instead.

- Focus on areas where you have the most potential
- Stop wasting too much time on your weaknesses
- Hire and partner up with people strong at what you're weak at

Full Summary

About The Author: Tom Rath is an American consultants and researcher on employees engagement, wellbeing and productivity.
Strengthsfinder is his bestselling book, in which he identifies 34 keys strengths people possess.

#1. Focus On Your Talents and Potentials

Popular self-development literature will tell you that you can achieve anything you want, no matter your starting point.

But Tom Rath righteously says instead that talent and potential do matter.
At least if you want to maximize your potential and achieve the most you can achieve.

#2. Don't Waste Time on Weaknesses

Most people waste a lot of time and effort trying to "fix" their weaknesses.

That's silly, because you struggle against your natural tendencies, come short against people who are naturally good in those areas and to cap it all off… You make yourself miserable.

Except When Weaknesses Hold You Back

Dropping your weaknesses doesn't mean ignoring anything you're not good at.
There are baseline competence levels in some areas that you want to reach.

For example if you're a public figure, CEO or representative and are terrified of public speaking, you should probably address public speaking. But it doesn't mean you will spend years trying to get better at public speaking, it means you will reach a level where you can comfortably speak to the press and effectively address the employees.

Basically: focus on your weaknesses only when they interfere with your strengths.

#3. Find PartnerS With Complementary Strengths

Instead of addressing all your weaknesses, find partners who are strong we are you are weak.
This allows you to work on your strengths while someone else does the best possible job in your areas of weakness.

This is called comparative advantage.

#4. And Work on Your Strengths

Tom Rath says your time is best deployed working on your strengths.

So if you're good at selling, become great at selling.

Why should you focus on your strengths?
Because you aling effort witih talent, you will make the quickest progress while getting positive feedback and results and while enjoying yourself.

#5. Talent Becomes Strength With Work

Do not confuse talent with strength. You still need to work at what you have. Talent per se means little. A talent only becomes a strength when you work on it.
Talent is having natural abilities at something, but results are erratic and random.
A strength is a consistent, near-perfect performance at a given task.

Achievers' Personality

Achievers are people who are extremely driven to achieve. The alarm rings and they can't wait to get out and start getting things done.
They overwork, but people who tell them to take a break don't understand: getting things done makes them happy.
It's their innate drive and reward system that allows them to work so much and keep going and going.

Dangers For Achievers

The danger of the achievers is that they burn themselves out and think of themselves as not good enough in spite of all they do.
Tom Rath recommends they remind themselves of their achievements and only tackle what they're good at instead of trying to do everything.

Commanders' Personality

Commanders are people who say what they think, no matter what.

In my experience they are proud of calling a spade a spade, and I agree with the author when he says that they can create fear and resentment.
They also tend to impose their will and command with directives instead of building support.

Recommendations:

Tom Rath recommends they soften their approach to fully maximize their strength.
For example, stop imposing your will and focus on your reputation as honesty and straightness.
Eventually, if you learn to build consensus, you won't have to rely on imposing your will.
A good read for commanders is How to Win Friends and Influence People.[image]

Real Life Applications

Drop the feel good idea of being great at anything you want
Yes, it's true you can improve at anything.
And maybe it's true you can be good at anything. But why wasting your time on being at something when you can be exceptional working on your strengths?
That's the message.

Weaknesses are OK
I believe that one of the reasons why people often waste time on their weaknesses is that they feel bad about them.
And working on their weaknesses becomes a way for them to try and improve their self esteem.
Don't be bothered by that: learn to love your weaknesses as something that positively define you for what you are not.

CONS

Here is what I would warn the readers of Strengthfinder about:

- Categories of Personalities = Generalization

The categories you end up with, such as "achiever", "WOO", "relator" etc. are neat and nice to read.
They feel like uplifting horoscopes.
But they're also simplification of reality and fail to address the "cross-skills" or "cross-weaknesses". In the end you're a complex web of different traits, categorizing yourself might not make you any favor unless you're aware of the limitations.

- Paid Upsell

The book gives you a free pass at the test, but it's limited and you need to fork out more $$$ for the full version.
Here's a free test I've taken on the web and which I liked. It got my weakness spot on: focus.

PROS

Great Life Tips
I couldn't agree more on working on your strengths. It's an important message that might be lost in the wave of "you can do anything" self help.

Strengthsfinder Review

Honestly, I am not a huge believer in the Gallup's Strengthsfinder method.

To begin with, it focuses on your strengths and not on what you love doing. And you're better off finding the intersection of the two, not just your strengths.
If you had to pick one between strengths and passion, I'd recommend passion because with a growth mindset you can develop your strengths.

Furthermore, that life is the greatest teacher of your strengths.
Do and experience a variety of different things, especially in your younger years.
Then pick one thing you love -and ideally you're strong at- and let it consume you.

That being said, if you need some help in deciphering yourself and are interested in personality tests, then StrengthFinder can give provide you with some good insights on what you're good at.

Bullet Summary

- Trauma is more common than most people think
- Traumatized patients vividly remember everything of the trauma their whole life
- You can cure trauma with yoga, mindfulness, supportive relationships… A few new interesting scientific breakthroughs

Full Summary

About The Author: Bessel van der Kolk is a Dutch psychiatrist, author and educator.
His main area of focus and research has been in the area of post-traumatic stress.

Introduction

Bessel van der Kolk says that trauma is more common than most people realize.
War, rape, accidents, assaults… They can all lead to trauma. And authors expert in betrayal says that betrayal can also often lead to trauma.

And many crimes many people think are isolated are not isolated at all.
In the introduction van der Kolk shares a few statistics about rape for example, and shows that it's unluckily a relatively widespread crime (read for example Hunger, a Memoir of My Body).

What's Trauma

Trauma is the consequence of a highly stressful or painful experience.

Trauma is often associated with war, but violent crimes and accidents also can lead to trauma. And as Shirley Glass explains, even harmful actions and betrayals by the people we love the most can be traumatic (read how to overcome infidelity).

Consequences of Trauma (PTSD)

Trauma can deeply affect the lives of people.

The consequences of trauma are often referred to as post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).
The individuals feels helpless or too overwhelmed to cope with further life adversities. Here are some of the consequences:

- Depression
- Substance abuse
- Difficulty trusting people (especially those without the same PTSD)
- Flashbacks

Flashbacks

Flashbacks are vivid memories of the traumatic experience.

Experiments shows that when patients relive flasbacks the left area of their brain responsible for rational thinking slowed down, which means they have difficulty in differentiating what's real and what's not.

Stress hormones shoot up and take much longer to go back to normal compared to a non traumatized person.
Also the mental area responsible for speaking slows down, sometimes leaving patients unable to speak.

Traumatic Memories Are Vivid

Normal memories tend to be stripped out of details and sensory inputs, and they change in time.
Such as, we remember the general feeling, but we don't remember the smell of the room.
And by the time we tell the story a few times, it will likely be quite different from the first time we recalled it.

Traumatic memories instead tend to be vivid and detailed. And they don't change over time.

Traumas in Children

Traumatic events are much more devastating in children because their brain neural connections haven't fully developed yet.

Those traumatic events can scar and change them for the worst.
Some traumatized children develop a strong focus towards negativity, and they see more threats, dangers and possibility for disaster where most other children see the positive scenarios.

How to Recover From Trauma

Mind and bodies are connected, and trauma leaves our body with an hypersensitive, always on alarm system.

#1. Yoga

Yoga helps practitioners understand the connection between mind, body and emotions.

For example, when an a rape victim started with yoga it wasn't easy. A pat on the back would send off her alarm system. But she stuck with it.
Some positions were particularly difficult, like the ones she'd have to do with her legs open. But she stuck with it without trying to repress her feelings.

It taught her that she could deal with those sensations without running away from them but tackling them head on.

#2. Mindfulness

Mindfulness is about being conscious and aware of our body and emotions. That's especially difficult for PTSD patient as they tend to shut down emotions instead of addressing.
And that's exactly why it can be very beneficial to open up and deal with them instead. Tackling the issue can be the very first step towards recovery.

#3. Supportive Relationships

A supportive network of people around is also a crucial step to recover from trauma.

#4. Neurofeedback

Our brain functions on electrical signals.
And the intensity and type of the electrical signal influences how we feel and how relaxed or nervous we are.
When we are relaxed we produce alpha waves in our brain. But people with PTSD tend to be more hyper-vigilant and nervous.

But with conscious effort, we can learn to relax ourselves and produce more alpha waves. Bassel would show patients their own level of alpha waves on a screen, and let patients try to increase it consciously. The video could also display a reward similar to a video game, thus starting a positive feedback loop to relax and calm themselves down.

Real Life Applications

You Can Overcome Traums
It starts with you facing the fears instead of drowning them in alcohol and drugs. But many people overcame it, many people are overcoming it, and you can do it too.

Another Great Review

I think someone who has first hand experience trauma is best placed to review The Body Keeps the Score.
I particularly liked this review:

CONS

The Body Keeps The Score is a misnomer
It might sound like a nitpicking, but I was bothered by the reference to the body keeping the score. There are nowadays researches pointing to smaller centers of sensory processing across the body, but it's mainly the brain which keeps the score.

PROS

Deep, wide, insightful
The topic of trauma is well laid out and explained

Start of the art tech
The author explains much of the current literature and approaches on curing trauma. Then he adds his own experiments and experiences and lays out the newest and most promising therapies. And some of them can give big causes for optimism.

Review

"The Body Keeps the Score" should be a must read for anyone tackling traumas or anyone who wants to understand trauma, patients and doctors alike.
Bessel van der Kolk reminded a bit of Ramachandran because of his sometimes unorthodox approach and willingness to try and experiment. And we need scientists like this.

Overall, it's a highly recommended read for anyone dealing with trauma, for trauma researchers and, in general, simply for curious people who want to better undersand human psychology.

#Girlboss: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

#Girlboss is the autobiographical story of Nasty Gal's founder Sophia Amoruso and, as she put it, how a nonconformist leveraged her uniqueness to win, rather than fitting in and toeing the line.

Bullet Summary

- Not being good a school doesn't mean you can't be successful
- Find out what you're good at and find a way to make a career out of it
- Getting your finances right is key to freedom

Full Summary

A #Girlboss is not just someone who is a boss or runs a business. Being a #girlboss is about being in charge of your own life.

Unconventional Path

An unconventional path means following what you feel like and avoiding what you don't want to do. There's a risk with an unconvetional path though, and that's the risk of failure.
However, that's a no risk, because the risk of failure is always present anyway.
Then, why would you do something that's not true to your nature?

The Importance of Following Your Bliss

Amoruso did try to fit in and she amassed a bunch of jobs she either quickly quit or was fired from. In the beginning she thought it was her laziness problem.
But it actually was that those jobs weren't for her.

Because when she negotiated clothes and resold clothes she loved, she worked so hard and passionately that she didn't even realize time was flying.

Be an Expert at What You Love

Once you understand what you love doing, then you need to become an expert at it. Which should be a pleasure anyway, as this is your thing.
As Angela Duckworth explains in Grit, passion deepens when we do what we like.

Ask to Get What You Need

Amoruso one day found herself on the road in the middle of a heavy rain downpour. She didn't have any money on her, but as a Greyhound bus approached she put her thumb out and hitched a ride. For free.
That hit her hard: to get what you want, you need to ask.

Break Rules – but not laws

The author invites the readers to think and move creatively, breaking rules.
But the day she got caught shoplifting and paid a fine to avoid jail-time, she realized it's not worth it to break the law.
Just break the arbitrary rules.

And Always Abide This Rule

And always abide the golden rule of the universe:

> Do to others what you want them do to you

Avoid Revenge: Focus on Yourself

One day Amoruso saw a competitor copy her whole website and try to pass it off as her own. I can imagine was a shocking and upsetting experience that must have been.
But the author swallowed her anger and rededicated herself to her business, working on making it better.
If let others sidetrack you from your work and passion, you'll turn your back on your creativity and innovation.
That's a lesson I often ponder as a public writer myself.

Creativity + Business = Success

A creative entrepreneurial approach questions the rules and challenges the status quo.
But often creative people forget the practicality of the business side. You shouldn't go too deep into either and too far away from one another.
And not to err too into the short-termism of business it's important you hold steady to your core principles.

Confidence

Sophia Amoruso says the biggest glow doesn't emanate from your clothes, but from your confidence. Confidence, as a person and as a brand, means also knowing what you stand for and having the courage to carve your own path in life.

And to Amoruso, it means talking and engaging to people, even strangers, without playing the "aloof game" to look cooler.
Because that actually hides a lack of confidence.

[image]

Real Life Applications

Keep your anticomformista ways!
Your anti-conformism can be your surest-fire way to success. But:

Get great at what you do
You can't be an antinconformista and expect success because of it. That's how all the naughty struggling and entitled artist think and feel, and they deserve staying unsuccessful.
You have to work to deliver on your gifts.

Work around your introversion!
As an introvert myself, I particularly liked how Amoruso tackles this issue. She says people give too much weight to networking (read: Never Eat Alone). She says introverts have different skills and qualities they can leverage. And the Internet era make it easy to work around the introvert's limitations (indeed).

CONS

Scamming and Stealing
I don't think that's cool or gives you any bragging rights. I feel the author sometimes revels in her small-time illegal past, and that's everything but cool to me.
Sign of a sociopath.

> 30 Signs You're Dating a Sociopath (W/ Examples)

Bit Self Aggrandizing
It's understandable since she tells the story of her own success, but at times it feels a bit self-aggrandizing.

Interviewing Digression
I find her description of interviewing, hiring, and firing unneeded.

PROS

Perfect for nonconformists
It's really a great, great book for all artists, noncomformists and people who generally struggle in abiding the rules while working for someone else.

Review

I liked #girlboss.

I didn't expect it to be honest as I thought this was some feminist-heavy book. It's not and it actually really spoke to me.

In many ways, I feel close to the early trajectory of Sophia Amoruso of struggling in jobs and occupations that didn't satisfy her unconventional nature.
And by leveraging her uniqueness -working hard on it-, she made it her own way.

I can really recommend #girlboss not just to women, but to all unconventional people who want more than a 9 to 5.

How to Stop People Undermining You

How to prevent someone from undermining you?

I'm glad you asked.

This article will delve into the nasty social phenomenon of social undermining.

By the end of it, you will know:

- What does it mean to undermine someone
- Why do some people undermine others
- How to stop someone from undermining you

- SUMMARY

Intro

We will work with this definition for "undermining someone":

> Someone is undermining you when they say or do anything which decreases your social status, calls into question your moral and ethics, seeks to decrease your authority in a relevant field or causes third parties to lose respect for you.

In simpler words, an underminer acts like an asshole who is out to disempower you.

How to Undermine Someone

There are countless ways to undermine someone.
Here are the most popular:

- Highlight their mistake
- Make a joke at their expense
- Directly challenge or attack them
- Laugh disproportionately at someone's mistake (it's a way to highlight it)
- Diminish their achievements (they cheated, lied, didn't do so great after all)
- Adding something after someone's finished talking

Here is an example from the last one.
Coming from Family Guy it's ironic and exaggerated, but it makes the point quite well:

Adding something is often a sneaky way of highlighting a mistake and stealing the show.
It's as if they were saying "good, but you forgot this, now I will fix it". And that decreases your authority (and increases theirs).

As you might have noticed, it's a common cheap shot of workplace warriors.

Undermining VS Social Climbing

In a previous article we have talked about social climbing.
Social climbing is taking value away from someone for our own social gain.

Undermining and social climbing are similar and there's often an overlap. Undermining however doesn't have to happen in social settings.

It's because the underminer is not only and not always motivated by social gain, but also by an (unconscious) need to feel better with himself.

And dragging people down is one way to achieve it, whether it's in a social setting or not.

Why do People Undermine Others

It's been my life experience that people undermine when there is envy, animosity, low self-esteem or somewhat of a "competition mentality".

- Envy

People undermine you when you're in charge or have more social power but they feel close enough to feel that they could be on top. And they resent it.
Undermining you is their way to bring you down so they can go up.

Laughing at someone is one way to undermine someone's status

- Low self esteem

Bringing people down is a (sick) way for some to build themselves up. A very sick way. Instead of working on themselves and building alliances of equally cool people, they try to drag you down to make themselves feel better.

- Socially clueless

Some people just don't know any better.
They grew up in a family where one-upping and microaggressions are the norm, and never realized how damaging it is.

- Power move

Undermining is a way of challenging someone and saying "I can tackle you" or "I'm above you / you're not that far higher up".
With these people, you better nip it in the bud or they will see your silence as a sign of weakness.
Never let the power mover smell blood.
But in my experience, power movers are a minority when it comes to undermining, and the majority are in the first three categories.

Undermining Examples

Here are a few real-life examples types of underminers:

#1. The Ironic Underminer

The ironic underminer throws a jab and then hides behind the "it was just a joke" defense.

Here is an example:
It was a hot day a couple of weeks ago. But it was a long time I hadn't rocked my Japanese-styled overcoat, and I decided to take it for a spin.
When I arrived at my location, I was greeted with a typical ironic undermining move:

> Underminer: Hey, nice jacket, are you feeling cold today?

Well no, now that you say it my dear underminer, I finally realize what an idiot I was to overdress -eye-rolling-.

#2. The Serious Underminer

Has this ever happened to you:

You joke about something, and you think it should be obvious it's a joke. Then here it comes the guy who does not get, or pretend he doesn't get it, and schools you as if you what you had said was not in jest, but serious.

If you don't know what I'm talking about, here is a great example.
The topic was that opprobrium that is GDPR:

You can almost see the underminer's finger being wiggled there
Mine was rather obviously a joke, but the underminer twisted it as if it was a serious comment. And then proceeded to take the high-authoritative road on me.

This was undermining + power move.
It reminded me of this scene in Meet the Parents.

#3. The Inconsequential Mistake Fixer

Some mistakes are inconsequential.

People busy with their life will let it drop.
And socially skilled people would act like Carnegie suggest in How to Win Friends and help others save face.

But not the underminer. Any mistake they can fix is too good an occasion to pass up!

Look at this example:

The humorous delivery frames the "I got you SOB" undermining game

Why do some underminers like to fix other people's mistakes?
Fixing someone's mistake is a big shot of confidence for the ego starved. It says "I got you, I'm smarter". And the more someone perceives himself being lower on the value scale, the bigger the boost they get from undermining you.

If you are in a similar situation, deliver your correction in a serious tone, or you risk looking like a cheap underminer who derives joy from pointing out other people's fault.

#4. Undermining in Relationships

One of the most heinous forms of undermining happens in relationships.

It's one of the worst because relationships should be the safest place for us, and undermining instead tells our partners that it's not really "us", but it's you VS me.

Here's an example:

> Her: I have 37.000 followers on IG
> Him: 36.999 of which are mine

By saying "36.999 of which are mine" he is undermining her achievements and dragging her down. Terrible stuff for any relationship, please don't do that :).

Why You Must Stop Undermining People

If you catch yourself doing any undermining, start by not being too harsh on yourself.

I've been there, I sometimes still fall for it.

But at the same time don't accept that kind of behavior from yourself.
Here's why we must fix it and eradicate it:

It's Low Quality

Not undermining is not about being nice and friendly. Undermining is low-value behavior.
It's passive-aggressive, sneaky and the most glaring sign of "frenemy". High-value people either speak directly or ignore.

It Wastes Your Own Resources

When you undermine you waste resources and mental cycles on the negative aspects of life. On tearing people down instead of increasing your own value.
It makes you bitter and ugly -in the large sense of the word-.

It Doesn't Work

Undermining people won't increase your status. It's more likely to decrease it!
Not everyone will consciously understand what you're up to, but they will catch on to the negative, subconscious feeling of disgust that undermining evokes in most people.

How to Stop Someone From Undermining You

And now here's the meat of the article.

How to stop people from undermining you:

#1. Seek To Turn Them Into Friends

Remember this:

> Many underminers are undermining you out of jealousy and envy, plus because they think you disdain them

In social dynamics, I call this "self-rejection".
Such as, they think that you're high-value, but that your high value is unavailable to them -or potentially will be used against them-.
Or they think you will reject them -or have already rejected them-, they feel bad about it, and so they jump into "social attack mode".

That's why I recommend first and foremost to try to extend an olive branch, add more warmth to your power, and set-up collaborative frames.

Strategically, it pays off to be high-warmth.
Sometimes, it even pays to be kind first.
See this chart:

	You Seek Win-Win	You Seek Win-Lose
He Prefers Win-Lose	• He rebuffs you • You look naive for trying • .. Or you look superior • You got an enemy • You both lose	• You got an enemy • You both lose
He Prefers Win-Win	• He thinks he got you wrong • He feels bad he opposed you • Goes out of his way to show repentance and friendship • You both win	• You got an enemy • You both lose

So first, try to mend things.

Yes, you might be angry at the underminer. But remember that he might be undermining because he thinks you're an ahole.
And even if you are a bit of an ahole, this strategy simply works better.
So show him first you can be a good friend, and then if that doesn't work move to the next steps.

#2. Address it Directly

Prolonged undermining can be annoying and can call into question your actual power, authority, or willingness to confront disrespect.

That's why addressing it directly, either publicly or privately, can be a great antidote.
You would start with something like this:

> You: Hey, I'd like to talk you about something. It makes me quite uncomfortable when you…

Two things to remember when you address it directly:

1. Either bring specific, clear and recent examples
2. Do it as soon as they undermine you

Otherwise, if you do it too long after they will play dumb, pretend it's not true, or say they were "just joking".

#3. Take it To the Surface

Undermining comments derive their power by being sneaky and looking almost like normal comments.

By questioning you want to push the underminer fully into the "bad guy" side, so that he will show himself for who he is.

At that point, once you make it clear for everyone to see what he was up to, you can either take the high road and drop it or you can address it directly.

I much recommend the former.
Here's how that would work with the first example:

> Underminer: Do you realize it's like 30 degrees today?
> You: It's a hot day, yes, why are you saying that > Underminer: you're wearing a jacket
> You: And? Is there something wrong with wearing a jacket on a hot day?

See where you're going?

Now you're cornering him.
You're basically communicating "why the hell are you criticizing me", but playing his own game, without being direct.

Now he either comes up with something, and he looks judgmental and narrow-minded, or he has to backtrack.

If he backtracks, you won.

If he keeps going, you keep cornering him further before he is so over-extended that it's just natural to drop your social ax.
Like this:

> Underminer: yeah, it makes no sense to wear a jacket when it's so hot
> You: who says that, is there like a law prohibiting to wear a jacket on a hot day
> Underminer: not it's just silly
> You: I don't think so and you sound a bit judgmental today mate. Anyway, good seeing you

You can also use this technique in a bit more of a confrontational tone if the situation calls for it.
Here's a great example from "Horrible Bosses":

Notice his facial expression: perfect.

#4. Ignore It

This is pure basic frame control.

Both socially and mentally, never let an underminer get to you.

If you can't ignore it and it's taking a toll on your psychological well-being, then you need to address it with one of the two above options.

But if you can truly and honestly be superior and ignore it without the underminer actually denting your self-confidence and your social standing, then you're golden with just moving forward.

You won't waste energy on it and you can focus on yourself.

Eventually, the underminer will be naturally crushed by the huge distance that you will put between yourself and him.

And they will be free to move on to undermine someone else a bit more on their level.

Don't Undermine: Build People Up!

Now, here's an example of a socially skilled, warm and friendly fella.

Compare the first example of my jacket on a hot day with what a more uplifting guy said that same day:

> Me: Wow, cool jacket man, as usual you're on top of the game. Where did you get it

Who do you think I liked most?

But also, let's drop who I liked the most as maybe nobody gives a flying F about who I liked most.
Who brought good vibes for everyone? Who improved the mood and who everyone else also liked more?
Silly questions, right?

People who make friends, but also people who build alliances and are socially successful don't undermine people, they build them up!

How High-Value People Behave

High-value people don't usually have frenemies that they try to undermine.

They have friends. Or have enemies. Or largely ignore or keep a distance from those they can't make enemies, but don't want to be friends with.

If you have a problem with someone, you talk to them straight.
If you don't like someone, don't engage them and ignore them. Or say it to their face.
Like Scarface brilliantly explained:

- Alpha male posturing (quit that shit)

SUMMARY

This article was originally entitled "how to lose friends and make enemies".
Then I changed it to make the topic clearer.

But that old title still tells the truth: undermining people will not make you friends and it can easily make you enemies.

All the while, you poison yourself and you broadcast low-value to the world.
They all sound great reasons to stop undermining and start building up.

Leadership & Self-Deception: Naive Advice in a Strategic World

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Leadership and Self-Deception explaines how our self-centered and self-aggrandizing tendencies can eradicate our natural empathy and kindness and ruin our relationships.

Full Summary

About The Author:
There isn't a single author as "The Arbinger Institute", a management consulting firm, decided to release the book with the name of the company and not of any single person.

Self-Centered Box Thinking

The authors talk about self-centered self-deception, which they call "being in the box".

We deceive ourselves when we see other people's needs as less important than our own. We may consider them as simple nuisances to our well-being and see them as objects.

We're Great – They're Flawed

Another consequence of box thinking is to inflate our own qualities and to magnify other people's weaknesses. The main issue of this distorted worldview is that of blaming others instead of looking at our own contributions.

Fake Out of the Box

The goal is to get out of the box.

But most people are only apparently out of the box.

How?

The authors say that sometimes we still harbor negative feelings about the people around, but we externally manifest positive feelings and nice behavior.
That's because people can perceive our real feelings.

> No matter what we do on the outside, people respond to how we feel on the inside

My note:
The authors seem to describe "passive aggressiveness" here.

Self-fulfilling Box Thinking

Our box thinking can feed on itself in a vicious circle.

For example, if we feel we are superior and more knowledgeable than the people around, we will block off new information.

And if we feel somebody is sneaky, we might force them to exhibit that exact behavior simply to confirm our own self-deception.
We treat them as sneaky, they answer with more negative behavior and there goes the vicious circle.

Self-Deception Starts With Self-Betrayal

The author says we are naturally social people and we naturally feel empathy.

But sometimes we betray ourselves by not following our natural instinct of caring for the people around.
That's the first step towards self-deception.
Since you acted incongruent with who you are, now you need to change your worldview to accommodate your new action.
And you start seeing yourself as a self-centered person, and you will start acting more and more like a self-centered person.

And now, you're in the box baby.

Staying Out of the Box

To stay out of the box, you must keep honoring your instinctive natural feelings of caring.

My Note:
I wonder how do the authors know that the natural instincts will be positive.
Because, in my opinion, they're not.

[image]

Real Life Applications

See Yourself as You Really Are
If I had to derive one teaching from this book, would be to look at reality how it really is and avoiding
As Ray Dalio says in Principles: love reality.

Stop Blaming Ohters
This is a natural reflection for many of us. Resist that temptation. And since you're there, develop a mindset of Extreme Ownership to greatly benefit your life.

CONS

There are great ideas here.
But also much that left me wondering:

Concepts could be simplified

The book takes concepts that could be easy and makes them sound complicated by making a new category for them (out of the box or in the box).

I find bigger virtue in taking the complex and making it simple.

New category for old (and disparate) concepts

This is a technique people sometimes use to sound more authoritative, to simplify things (not in this case) or to repackage information in a way that it seems like new insight.

I personally find that the book puts too many and disparate human tendencies into this box.
And when there are too many things inside a category, then that category isn't useful anymore.

Self-centeredness is not unnatural

I feel sometimes the author makes a convoluted story to explain what's simply natural in human beings.
It's only normal that any form of live puts his well-being first.

Trying to paint humans' natural self-centeredness as misplaced does not help.
We should talk about ways to use and channel our natural inclinations for the greater good instead, not demonizing them.

Caring for others is not always our default 'nature'

I don't particularly like black and white thinking, and at times it feels to me that "Leadership and Self Deception" devolves into pure black and white thinking.

For example, when they say they encourage us to follow our natural instinct of being kind and helpful, that's black and white thinking to me.

As complex as that might be, we have both aggressive and nurturing instincts that co-exist.

PROS

Good idea to "step outside ourselves"
I liked the idea of "stepping outside ourselves" and viewing and considering people as people. It can be helpful for many of us in many situations.

Review

"Leadership and Self-Deception" didn't resonate with me.

I found it simplistic in its blanket rule approach of "we are all hardwired to be nice". Instead, I find this approach naive, ineffective, and potentially even dangerous.

But it can be good for people with a superiority complex or people who lack empathy.
It has plenty of great reviews, though, so maybe you will find it helpful for you.

Merkel VS Trump Body Language Analysis

This picture of Donald Trump and Angela Merkel at the latest G7 made the waves.
I couldn't help but smile when I saw it.

Who do you think has more power here?

Jesco Denzel/German Federal Government via AP
Well, the German government released it believing they'd make Merkel look good. But it only shows how Trump runs the show.
Trump looks isolated, yes, but also the most powerful man in the room.
Here's why:

1. Center of Attention: Trump

To begin with, everyone's huddling around Trump. We know why from all the other news: it's because everyone wanted to convince him about something ("don't put up barriers", "don't talk to Nuke Man", "don't pollute the world" etc. etc…).
Which means that everyone wants something from him. Even if in a non positive way, that gives him all the power.

The Only Kid With the Ball

This scene took me back a few decades. It felt to me as if Trump were the only kid in the playground who's got the ball. And he wants to go home.
He's by far the most unpopular, but everyone needs him somehow. And now everyone's begging him to stay. Or at least to leave the ball.
That kid has all the power.

But what if we had no idea of what was going on?
Well, then Trump would look even more powerful. In that picture he's like the sun around which all planets orbit around. It reminds me a bit of the last supper:

2. Investment Level: Trump

The more someone is investing to speak and engage with us, the more they are communicating that they want or need something from us. Which gives us power.
In the picture Trump is sitting while all the others are standing. It's a rather obvious indicator that Trump is in the power seat -pun intended-.

3. Defensiveness / Aggression: Merkel

Merkel is in what is sometimes referred to as "towering position", such standing very close, in slightly domineering and threatening fashion, to someone who is sitting.
Merkel's hands are firmly planted on the table and she reaches out to Trump. It's as if she were the interrogator, grilling the suspect.

> Merkel: I know you ate the cookie. Just confess and mutti will not get too angry.
> Trump: Well… What are you gonna do about it

Trump on the other hand has his arms crossed, a well known and defensive position. It's also a position of someone who is resisting influence, which is indeed the case.

However his chin is slightly jutting forward, which can be a sign of aggression or, in this situation, of defiance.
Merkel takes the point for being on the offensive, but Trump is not backing down in the slightest.

4. Sheer Power: Trump

Now this is interesting. Merkel has on her side a whole army of people.
And Trump is alone.

Merkel looks definitely like the most liked and supported person in the group.
But the fact that Trump is standing there by himself makes him look much more powerful. Nobody would pile on the weakest for a simple reason: there's no need to get everyone up in arms against the weakest. But it does take the whole gang to assault the toughest kid.
In that sense the fact that Trump, by himself, is holding up the whole onslaught makes him look powerful.
Isolated, but powerful.
It's a Trump one man army.
He looks rather comfortable too. As if he were saying

> Trump: Keep yapping… I've made up my mind.

To go back to that police interrogation parallel it feels as if the police are trying their hand. But have no real proof.
Hence: lots of barking, but ultimately very little they can really do.
Which is exactly the reality of the situation.

SUMMARY

This is an amazing shot.
It might become a historically symbolic picture, too.
In one single image, it tells the whole story not just of the G7 meeting, but of the whole US / West historical rift.

You might not like Trump, or you might disagree with most of what he does and say -you won't be alone in that camp-.
But the picture here is clear: he's isolated. But still the most powerful man in the room.

Steal Like an Artist: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In “Steal Like an Artist” Austin Kleon teaches exhorts artists to embrace the creational process by “stealing” from other artists, past and present, and to create something new by adding your own spin and art to theirs.

Bullet Summary

- There is no such thing as original art: everyone builds upon others
- Immerse yourself (/steal) from your favorite artists: imitate and then emulate
- When you realize you’re not quite like them, you’ve found your own voice

Summary

Give Up Originality

There is no such thing as a completely original form of art. No person lives in a vacuum and no art is created in a vacuum.
Everyone is influenced by the world and the artists that live around you and came before you.

Some artist can be pushed against the wall by the erroneous concept of “originality”.
Don’t let that happen to you.

> Don’t let “original” be your shackles

Austin Cleon says that art creation is a bit like making children. Same as the DNA of two people combine to give new life, new art is the mixture of different influences to create something new.
That means that the artistic process start when you find the right art to build upon -or to steal from-.

Start Imitating Your Heroes

Sure you can’t plagiarize, but you can imitate them.
Steal Like an Artist recommends you live and breathe the artists you like. Learn what makes them tick, and reproduce their own art for your own consumption. Then branch out to the three people that your favorite artists most learned from.

Eventually, you will realize that you are not quite the same as any of your artists -the author calls them “weaknesses” that you can’t quite replicate the same way-.
You have your own style and you can make your own contribution.
You’re another branch in the tree.

> Surround yourself with art worth stealing” username

Keep Hobbies and Leisure

The author recommends that as much as you love your art, you shouldn't drop other hobbies and passions of yours. They make you a more rounded individual and they are creative sources that will inspire you in your art.

Similarly, don't hole in at your workplace or home studio. But go out, or even change city and live in some other country.

Share Your Work

The author says there are benefits in being unknown and obscure, such as the total freedom of failing and experimenting.
Eventually you want to reach a certain level of fame though. The best way to do that is to share everything you do.

When you share you will receive some harsh criticism. The author says it's important you don't allow the negativity to drag you down or sidetrack you through anger.
And if you can't stop anger from getting to you, then you can use that anger for a source of creativity. Also read:

- How to leverage failure and anger

Keep A "Praise File"

Austin Kleon recommends not only that you use anger as fuel, but also that you save all the praises you get.
You can then read through all the praises you got when you need an uplift.

My Note: This is not such a good idea, lest you remain slave of your own ego and narcissism
I don't like this idea.
It trains your ego to depend on other people's praises. Praise should only be used as a feedback tool, but not to derive ego satisfaction. Sophia Amoruso I recently read also is of the same opinion.

Read more here:

- How to build an antifragile ego

> Copy 1 person and you're influenced. Copy a 100, you're a genius

Real-Life Applications

Stop Stressing About "Copying"
I write a lot of reviews here so I end up speaking with authors. And quite a few of them hold many grudges against anyone who "copied" their work.
Yet I rarely think their work has been copied. It had quite a different flair in my opinion. Don't stress about copycats too much.
As Prada CEO said:

> We're not interested in creating products that nobody wants to copy

Just make sure, of course, that they're not copy-pasting your work and that you find your own voice even when you re-interpret old concepts.

CONS

One-Idea Book
Albeit I like the idea, Steal Like an Artist rotates around one single idea basically. I felt the same for The 5 Second Rule, for example.
But that might be a bit unfair to say as some of the other tips can also add quite a bit of value.

PROS

Brief and Easy
It might have been even shorter -but I often think that-, but it's certainly not long and drawn out. And it's very easy and pleasant to read.

Great Concept
I loved the idea. There's no such thing as new and 100% original. So don't stress about it, consume all media and feel free to say what's already been said… But with your own unique

Review

I absolutely loved the idea and concept behind Steal Like an Artist. I often thought the same -albeit not nearly as eloquently put- and I couldn't agree more with the author.

The 4-Hour Work Week: The Solopreneur Lifestyle

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The 4-Hour Work Week is a book for solopreneurs and digital nomads seeking to escape the shackles of a corporate job, create an online business, and live the life of their dreams.

Contents

- Overview
- Notes
  - The 4-Hour Workweek Criticism

- PROS
- The 4-Hour Review

Overview

- You don't need to be rich to live like a rich
- Working a job you don't like is a waste of life
- Time and freedom are equally important as money -and you can have them all-

TPM Strategic Note: Sovereign strategy for independent men
This is not a book about "working less", it's a book about escaping the 9-to-5 and living life on your terms, without having to chase VC money or deal with cofounders. It is a book about the 'new rich' lifestyle, rich in time and freedom, and with enough money to travel and experience the world.
Core Value: 9.5/10 for the "Sovereignty Mindset." Current Relevance: 6.0/10 for the technical "How-To".

Notes

About the Author:
Tim Ferris is an American author, entrepreneur, investor, and was somewhat of a celebrity at the intersection of "self-development", "bio-hacking", and "solopreneurship".

> Lucio: Tim Ferris is a bit of an over-optimizer, sometimes a bit of a Machiavellian marketer, I don't follow him… But he's a smart guy, not a bad guru, and can be a worthy guy to learn from

Introduction

Tim Ferris calls the new generation of people who earn money while enjoying the freedom of no fixed place and time "the New Rich", abbreviated to NR.
These are the overarching steps to becoming a New Rich for The 4 Hour Work Week:

1. Definition: what do you want? In the 4-hour work week it's a good life of experience free of grueling work and rigid structures. I'm in!
2. Elimination: cut all distractions, material clutter, and useless tasks, and focus on the 20% producing 80% of results
3. Automation: outsource, hire VA, and build processes that run without you
4. Liberation: now… You're free.

Millionaire Without Millions

Do you need to work like a slave to live like a millionaire?

Tim Ferris says that the common-sense rules of the world are nothing but fragile collections of socially reinforced illusions.

Meaning: no, being a millionaire and living like a millionaire are two different things. You don't need to slave away at a desk on a grueling, soul-crashing 9-5.

> Most people will choose unhappiness over uncertainty

Money Isn't Freedom

Tim Ferris makes a compelling point that lots of money and much ownership is not great and that sometimes it ends up being enslaving and oppressing.

They have riches, but the riches actually have them

Money Multipliers: WWW

Money is multiplied in life depending on the quantity of "W" you control in life, such as:

- When you do it
- Where you do it
- With whom you do it

The 10 Commandments

Tim outlines 10 rules that you need to consider and keep in mind;

1. Retirement Is Worst-Case Insurance. Working your whole life to enjoy the last years is a fool's errand
2. Interest and Energy Are Cyclical. Alternating work and rest is necessary to work at your full potential
3. Less Is Not Laziness. Our culture glorifying sacrifice over productivity is bogus
4. The Timing is Never Right. It's never the right moment for significant changes, and that's the exact reason why you should do them
5. Ask for Forgiveness, Not Permission. Don't give anyone the opportunity to stifle your growth opportunities
6. Emphasize Strengths, Skip Weaknesses
7. Things in Excess Become Their Opposite. As in the example of money, as also explained in Taoist philosophy
8. Money Alone Is Not the Solution.
9. Relative Income > Absolute Income. The per-year income is arbitrary and misleading. Time is equally important and it becomes more important once you reach the minimum amount for your goals
10. Distress Is Bad.

Conquering Fear

Tim Ferris uses some techniques from How to Stop Worrying and Start Living.
Here's his recipe to beat fear:

1. Define what's the worst-case scenario
2. Identify how could fix or improve on that worst-case scenario
3. Define the benefits

You'll see most of the time that the worst-case scenario is not that bad or you can take steps to either prevent it or fix it.
And the upside potential will still be there.

> Conquering fear = defining fear

It's Crowded In The Middle

99% of people in the world are convinced they cannot achieve great things, so they aim for average. It's crowded and the level of competition is the fiercest for mediocre spots.

If you're insecure, don't worry: that's what everyone else is. Don't overestimate the competition and underestimate yourself.

DreamLining

There's less competition for bigger goals and it will provide an adrenaline infusion.
Ferris defines "dreamlining" as putting a timeline on what sounds like unrealistic goals.

> Don't overestimate the competition and underestimate yourself.

Don't Get Stuck Making More & More

The 4-Hour Work Week introduces a slight variation of the hedonic treadmill.

Ferris says that people keep working when they use a financial goal instead of defining what they want and how they will remove themselves from their business.
They will keep repeating themselves "I'll work till I make X money", but X is a moving target and keeps increasing.

> Until I make X money is code for "fat man in BMW"

Tim Ferris then says how he escaped the US after he was fired to avoid taking an Uzi into a McDonald's and becoming a fat man in a BMW (hilarious).

> NR is doing exciting things, not just owning enviable things

The Busy Myth

Tim Ferris says we live in a world where "busy" is more important than "productive".
Being busy is a form of laziness: lazy thinking and indiscriminate action. And being overwhelmed is as unproductive as doing nothing and far more unpleasant and unhealthy.

> Busy is a form of laziness

Escape the Office

In an office environment, you are expected to work 40 hours minimum no matter if you can produce the same results in 5.
But a 9-5 is not the kind of place where you want to be productive, because the expectation will be to produce 8 times more to fill the 40+ hours.
9-5 is arbitrary, a collective social agreement, and a dinosaur of old legacies: you don't need that.

> Doing less is the path of the productive

Pareto & Parkinson

Tim Ferris introduces the Pareto and Parkinson's law to be more productive:

1. Focus 80% of your time on the 20% that produces the most results (Pareto)
2. Shorten the work time to limit your tasks to the important

Don't be busy: be productive!

Outsource & Delegate

The goal is to free your time to focus on better and bigger things, so even when you can do it yourself more cheaply it can still make sense to outsource.

Delegation dangers:

1. Automation to inefficient operations magnifies the inefficiency
2. Automation applied to efficient operations will magnify the efficiency

And don't forget:

1. Eliminate before you delegate: never delegate something that can be eliminated
2. Never delegate something that can be automated

Picking a Market

And here are Ferris' top tips for picking a good market:

- Know the Market

Don't speculate about your target market. Be a member of your target market instead, so you know it inside out.

- Pick a Niche

Don't go broad: too much free information, too many competitors. Don't do dogs and pets lovers, do training German Shepard instead.

- Be First

The author recommends you become the largest, best, or first. Be a big fish in a small pond instead of a big fish in a big pond.
Tim Ferris prefers first.

- Price High

Less competition, more customers with money who will return and complain less. Between 50 and 200, higher customers need to speak to someone.

- One Clear Sentence

Your main benefit should be one sentence. And clear.
Tim Ferris uses Apple's example of "one thousand songs in your pocket", which later Sinek will also use for Start with WHY.

> People can dislike, but should never misunderstand you

Getting Fired is Great

Tim Ferris quit 3 jobs and got fired from all the rest.

He says that it's a God-sent benefit to you.
Most people won't quit, but someone else makes the decision for you so you don't have to sit in the wrong job for the rest of your life.
I can only quit Tim Ferris here because it's so eloquently beautiful:

> Most people aren't lucky enough to get fired and they die a slow spiritual death over 30 to 40 years of tolerating the mediocre

God, I can't even start on how much I love that quote!

> The average man is a conformist accepting misery with the stoicism of a cow in the rain

Ferri's path into entrepreneurship has been similar to my own path, where I just couldn't take working for mediocre people anymore.
I discuss the motivation behind ThePowerMoves' business here.

Effectiveness & Further Tips

- Don't finish what you start if it's not worth it
- Don't read it unless you need it immediately
- Learn to be difficult and assertive
- Don't worry to offend someone when requesting effective communication: hard feelings pass, and foolish behavior sticks
- Check emails only once a day
- Batch things together and address them all together

The 4-Hour Workweek Criticism

There is much criticism of Tim Ferris online, including many of the claims he makes about his awards, successes and

I don't have enough free time to investigate his background and pick sides.
One of the reasons Ferris attracted criticism though is that both his advice and personal background sometimes fall into a gray area.

For example:

- 4 Hour Expert

I didn't like the tips on how to sell your expertise by faking it.

Yes, Tim Ferris doesn't exactly tell you to "fake it", but let's not BS each other here, what he proposes is basically to build some easy reputation to then pitch your products.

It reminds me of some snake oil salesman who hit it big without having the expertise:

- “Brain Quickening Pills” background

Also, Tim Ferris was selling “brain quickening pills”, and… Oh well, let’s not get down that rabbit hole now :).

CONS

- Time Wasted in Details

The 4-Hour Work Week wants to be a how-to book, so the details suit the goal.
But in my opinion, it gets too much at times when he provides URLs and phone numbers (!) of companies, or talks too long about virtual assistants.

- Scatterbrained

From the meaning of life to speed reading to getting cheaper tickets: I had the same feeling as for The 4-Hour Body. Such as a bit too many topics in one book.
But I have to add this: I enjoyed them all.

- Genetic, Mass Tourism Travel Tips

Tim Ferris says that your destination is as safe as your place and that worries are overplayed. But that’s a wild generalization only valid for virgin first-time travelers -and even there, are plenty of exceptions-.

- Misleading Information on Favelas

Just a little later Ferris says he avoided favelas because of civilians with machine guns and pedestrians wielding machetes. Where did he get that idea?
The movie City of God.
Far from me to say favelas are safe -they’re not- but Ferris isn’t combating generalizations with that.
You can enter favelas in relative safety, they have electricity and running water.

- Imprecise Travel Tips

Travel tips tend to be quick and dirty, not adding much value in my opinion. Ferris mentions Taipei mentioned as part of his Chinese recommendation, but only Chinese people believe Taipei is in China :).

- Sound Self Aggrandizing

> I could be racing motorcycles in Europe, scubadiving on a private island in Panama, resting under a palm tree between kickboxing sessions in Thailand or dancing tango in Buenos Aires.

He's telling a story, but it does sound a bit like tooting his own horn at times.

- Less Applicable Today

As of today (2019), some of the advice and "how-to" information in The 4-Hour Workweek is oldish.
I live in Berlin and the cheap rent Ferris boasts is double what he mentions, if not triple.
I'm not sure his business ideas are also as relevant, I've met plenty of people who did the same as Ferris did in supplement and nutrition stuff.
But there's certainly a lot of information that is valid anytime, anywhere.

- Poor Pick Up Advice

The advice he gives to ask women for numbers is reminiscent of bad PUA style -Ferris is a friend of Neil Strauss- and not really that effective.
But the goal is just to overcome fear and not really to pick up so it doesn't matter in that case.

- Poor Feedback Technique

Ferris shares quite a few great communication insights, including negotiation techniques. But I was really surprised when he introduced the old "sandwich feedback technique" to deliver feedback.

It's not a good technique. Everyone knows it and everyone's waiting for the negative part, completely disregarding your compliment (example below).

Read "Thanks for The Feedback" for more information.

PROS

- Autobiographical Description: Hilarious!

The autobiographical description of Tim Ferris is one of the best I've ever read. It's funny, exciting, and self-deprecating at the right point. Perfect.

- Lots of Power Moves

The 4-Hour Work Week has plenty of smart power moves and great social skills tips. For example, how to build authority and avoid the "founder" title as it screams startup.

- Great Communication Tips

Similar to the above, plenty of great sales and influencing techniques, both to negotiate with bosses and with providers.

The 4-Hour Review

Guys, I listed a lot of cons and sometimes Tim Ferris' advice can sound "gray area".

But don't get it wrong: "The 4-Hour Work Week" is a masterpiece for me and I listed it in my best entrepreneurship books list.

It's not just about the actual advice though, which by now has already aged quite a bit.
It's the mindset behind that I vibed with.

I see quite a bit of myself in Tim Ferriss. That guy is me, but just a bit brighter, smarter, much more successful, and taller. Albeit that last one is easy :).
Yeah, basically we're not alike at all :D, but I see many similarities and he really speaks my mind when he talks about the way of life of the New Rich.

- Friendship is key for long-lasting love relationships
- More communication would greatly improve sex life
- Trusting trustworthy partners -and people in general- is great for the relationship for general health
- Mistrust and betrayal are more likely when he has more power, with negative effects, and when she cannot influence him

Full Summary

About The Author: John Gottman is an American psychologist researcher who focused most of his career researching relationships.
He is also the author of "Ten Lessons to Make Marriage Work" and "The Man's Guide to Women".

Unhappy Couples Are All The Same

You probably heard about Tolstoj's famous sentence:

> All happy families resemble one another, each unhappy family is unhappy in its own way.

Well, Tolstoj was wrong.
Happiness provides the liberty of much diversity of expressions. Unhappy couples have all similar dysfunctions instead.

Expressing Resentment is Wrong

Gottman takes aim at many books that have been written without research, such as The Intimate Enemy.

The Intimate Enemy postulates that suppressing resentment is bad, so it advised couples to hit each other with rubber bands.
But that has no cathartic effect and instead only builds resentment.

Anger is OK

That being said, anger in itself is not bad.

Many therapists are wrong to believe that anger should be suppressed.
It's the escalation of anger that is bad, especially when expressed through the four horsemen of the apocalypse.

Escalation led to divorce after 5.6 years after the wedding.

Who Dies Young

Gottman says that there are people who, reliably, die young.

These are:

- Lonely
- Socially isolated
- Disconnected

And they're predominantly men.
Lonely people are more attentive to social cues but tend to misread them. They allow others to treat them unfairly in order to be liked, but they're also extremely suspicious of potential unfairness.
Such as, they withdraw to avoid the potential hurt of trusting someone, and end up not trusting anyone, including the trustworthy ones.

Something that some men should be attention to.

Trust in a Relationship

Trust in a relationship translates in this sample question:

> Are you there for me

And Gottman adds "can I trust you to pick me over your family", "can I trust you to pick me over your friends".

Sex and Domestic Violence

Of the couples with domestic violence incidences that Gottman studies, most of them had dissolved after 9 years.

But here is a crazy piece of information:

Gottman says he was shocked to find out that women consistently told them that the best sex they had in their lives was after a beating by their husbands.
As I explain in how to make him crazy, there's a certain relationship between violence and arousal.

Sex and Communication

Gottman says that all the books on sex and communication talk either about sex or about communication.
He says, though there's a need for the two fields to combine.
Too many women fake orgasms and too many men think their penis is the only way of giving her an orgasm.

Betrayal and Trust

Gottman says we should not forgive when the pain was too deep, the betrayal too big and the masquerade too evil that forgiving would damage our own sense of self-esteem.

But when -and only when- both partners are willing to reconcile the prognosis is good.

Also, read:

- Scientific facts about cheating
- Signs your partner is cheating

Dominance in Relationships

Gottman says that albeit men are more likely to emerge as leaders in initially leaderless groups, gender is not a good predictor of dominance when:

- groups meet for extended periods of time
- members know each other well
- when the tasks draw on skills and expertise more women's competence

But the dominance in family power literature is complex and inconclusive.
But Gottman quotes Understanding Family Process, a book from 1993. And you might be better served with these:

- How women control relationships
- Sexual power dynamics

CONS

For Academicians
Gottman made me chuckle when he made fun of that as a researcher he must define and give clear directives, unlike Oprah or Dr Phil :).

But The Science of Trust does get very technical at times.

Too Long
The part on game theory was unnecessary way too long. It felt to me it had barely much to do with relationships at a certain point.

PROS

Great Summary & Review
The first chapter reviews all the major milestones in John Gottman's decades-long research. That's really good there.

Dialogues
I liked the dialogue examples, to which Gottman added his own commentary of what the couple was thinking to add further clarity and explanatory power.

Review

All John Gottman books are above average when it comes to content and relationship insights.

The Science of Trust is a bit more academic though and ends up talking a bit less about relationships and more about relationship literature, exploring Sue Johnson, Shirley Glass, attachment styles, etc.

Gottman also gets very technical and somewhat lost around game theory, which felt a bit tangential to the relationship topic.
I wished for a more result-oriented book, this felt a bit more speculative.

Invincible by David Tian: Review & Summary

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Invincible is a dating product for men by David Tian.
It consists of ad-hoc videos, recordings of live seminars, guided meditations, and a few examples from movies as well.

What I liked

I liked a lot of things from David Tian's Invincible program.
Some of them:

Focus on Fundamentals

I liked a lot that David Tian stresses the fundamental which goes well beyond dating. Basics such as:

- Women won't make you happy (but a life purpose will)
- Whatever you feed your mind will shape you
- You need a greater goal than getting women

Dispelling Some Seduction Myths

He says a few key tenets that seem to have been lost in much of the seduction circles:

- Being friends is not the end of the seduction but can often be the beginning (true)
- Getting introduced first is much better than cold approaches (true in many instances)

Value / Investment / Beliavability

David Tian explains that attraction is a mix of value, investment (compliance), and what he calls "beliavability" (whether she believes your sincerity).

What I found interesting though is that Tian says that your attraction level is given by the lowest level of any of the three.
I'm not convinced about that, to be honest, I think it doesn't make sense that a billionaire who's getting huge compliance will be thrown away just because he doesn't seem too "beliavable".
But I could maybe agree that the lowest level in each has a bigger weight than the simple average.

I also agree with him that most players stumble in the beliavability area and, while they think that being a player is always an advantage, that's actually not the case for men who want to date high-quality women.

This is one of the reasons why pick-up artists like Todd Valentine get a lot of shit-tets: they seem fake.

Also, read:

- Players VS providers: it's about quality, not a role
- Seducers types: the different types of seducers

> 10 Types of Male Seducers: Pick Your Niche!

Body language

Again, the author stresses what matters most: the fundamentals.

I think David Tian has a good grasp of body language.
He says that when you enter a club you should not look around as that makes you look insecure.
Stop instead, then look around. But when you walk, don't look around.

I don't fully agree, you can walk around a little bit and if you're a cool guy you should probably catch some eye contact from the gals. Smile a bit, then look straight again.
I often do it with great effects, and I'm not even attractive, I just carry myself well.

Overall great overview of body language, though.
Another two great tips:

- Chin slightly up as you walk
- Mirror her angle: if she angles away and you face her head it's low value

Also, read:

- Alpha male body language
- How dominant men speak (and from there go to how they move)
- The archetypes of dominance

Eye Contact

Blink as little as possible.
And then a great power move: the sticky eyes, something also Leil Lowndes talks about.
When you want to move eye contact away from someone, start moving your head first but keep your eyes on them for a second.
Then move your gaze away as well.

Conversation: Focus On Positives

Cut off the negative threads and expand the good ones.
If someone makes you a compliment don't let them get away with something generic.
But ask instead "what did you like about it", which will make them invest more in you.
Very good advice there.

Date Moving to Several Different Locations

I like the idea of picking a few date locations that progressively move toward your place. So it makes it easier to end up there.

Spend no more than an hour and a half on each place.
The more you move, change, and experience together, the more it will feel like you know each other for a long.

Great stuff there.

At Home

Keep the music and dim light on the way out so your place is ready for the pull.
Love the tip, will start implementing it.

Then tell them where's the bathroom right away as you go in.

I prefer instead to go to the bathroom myself before we leave and let her go as well.
Why?
Because it can beak the atmosphere if she goes to the bathroom as soon as she's in your house.
A few other great ideas:

- Put on a foreign movie with beautiful landscapes
- Know the movie so you know when to make your move
- Don't give her what she wants if she's not giving you what you want. For example, if she wants to make out but not have sex, then don't make out.
- Create contrasts: be passionate and heated when making out but boring and factual in conversation.

Take care of your voice

But what I really, really liked most was David Tian's introduction to speaking and voice tonality.
He introduces and the mellow way he can manage to speak is really fascinating.

What I Liked Less

Some things I like a bit less. For example:

1. Texting Advice

Tian proposes ping texts which are better than Kezia's texts, but still, I don't like the idea of the ping texts.

Read more on texts:

- Text flirting
- What to text when she doesn't reply
- How to text flaky girls

2. Exercises for Masculine Energy

Tian had a few exercises to build masculine energy which entailed listening to rap music and switching from calm to aggressive, for example by imagining an intruder at home.

They were not my cup of tea but could work well for you.

3. Longish

I had Invincible sometimes in the background just listening to the audio and other times to fill some gaps.
And it took me a long time to finish.
In my opinion, some fat could have been cut out and made a bit leaner and meaner.

4. Overlap With Other Sources

Tian says one of his mentors was Sebastian, which was also Chase Amante's mentor (read here: How to Make Girls Chase).

So there's some overlap with the value and investment part. But that's fine: valid content which correctly describes reality will always overlap when we're talking about the same topics.

Where I found the overlap a bit too strong is with Tony Robbins and programs such as Personal Power II and Robert Greene's The Art of Seduction.
Tian is very open about the overlap with Robbins but I haven't heard about Greene.
That was a bit befuddling for me since it was a sizable portion of the course.
"The Art of Seduction" is an awesome book though, so it won't hurt you to listen to that part.

Dating Skills Review Controversy

I was taking a look at other reviews of David Tian.

And stumbled upon this comment on Reddit:

| Brainbust100 2 points 2 years ago

The problem with David Tian is, most of his Invincible program is stolen from others (uncredited). So of course it's going to have manipulative stuff like that in there, even if David Tian presents himself as "authentic."

There is certainly nothing authentic about his marketing of Invincible. That has to be one of the most deceptive, sleazy advertisements for a product I've seen.

Last year I left a review on datingskillsreview for Invincible. It was the only review that wasn't glowing. It was never published on the site, and there are still 19 glowing reviews for Invincible. I have the product and I was put off by it.

Well, I had to test it out.
So I left an overall positive review for "Invincible", and also mentioned what I liked less.
Indeed, the review was never published in Dating Skills Review.

Also, read:

- Affiliate scams: don't put too much trust in online reviews

Real-Life Applications

Train, don't learn
You need to apply what you learn or you will forget and you're only wasting time. Learning is the first step, it gets you to the staircase. Then you need to start walking.
Consuming the content is useless. Training the content is what makes the difference.
True that.

Wear glasses if…
… you have big cheekbones. When there's space between your glasses and your face, it doesn't look good.
I thought this was a smell detail but really genius. I had never thought about it that way and it's very true. Indeed Tian has a good sense of style.

Review

So, what's the final verdict?

Positive.

I liked Invincible and my review of David Tian as a trainer would be equally positive.

He markets his academic credentials and Ph.D. a bit too aggressively, also considering it's in Asian languages and culture, not in any people or psychology-related field.

Yet, Tian shows a good understanding of psychology and of dating and Dating Power Dynamics.

I particularly liked he addresses most of the basics.

I would have personally liked Invincible to be a bit shorter and give proper credit to Robert Greene, but that might be just me.
Overall, thumbs up.
4/5.

Update:
After having gone through more courses and resources, and after having researched a bit more, I downgraded the product.

The Power of Now: Spirituality for Agentic Men (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Power of Now teaches enlightenment and spirituality through meditation and a specific approach to mindfulness that lets go of past and future worries to only focus 'in the now'.

TPM Strategic Take: Detachment as the Mental Power.
Detachment helps ambitious men overcome the 'me-me-me' syndrome, where weak self-centeredness makes you emotionally and socially over-reactive and behaviorally defensive and threat-oriented because you're too worried to 'look good' to yourself and the world. That's weak narcissism, and meditation and detachment can help you overcome it. See:

  - The Power of Now for Ambitious Men

Overview

- Separate yourself from the overthinking mind
- Remove the negative influences of the past and the future: focus on the now
- When your full focus is in the immediate present, in the now, there's rarely any suffering

Notes

About the Author:
Eckhart Tolle is a German-born spiritual teacher and practitioner.

1. Forget Past and Future

Tolle makes the case that lots of our suffering and pain happen because we allow the past and the future to poison our present.
This makes no sense to Tolle because the past and future don't even exist.

> The past cannot survive in your presence: it can only survive in your absence

TPM Note: Look into the future for strategy and goal-achievement.
Use "power of now" to stay focused during intense work or quality time with your loved ones. But look into the future in your strategic mode.

2. Now is All There Is

Past and future are mental constructs that bear no reality.

Things only happen in a continuous stream of present moments.
When you feel something about the past you are feeling it now. So it's not true that you are feeling some pain from the past: you are experiencing it in the success of present, "now moments".

Our feelings indeed can only give you information about the now, about this specific moment.
What we call the past is nothing but a collection of once-present moments. And the future is made of present moments that have yet to materialize.

3. How "Now" Empowers You

Dwelling on past pains and future worries does nothing good for you.

If you deal with them in the now instead, you will only be dealing with smaller problems that you will be tackling without any future worries.

For example, you might have a huge project that is running behind schedule.
Most people project the future worry of not making it on time or having to face an angry boss in the now, which does nothing good neither for either them or the completion of their project.

If you tackle it instead in the now, you can focus on doing all the actions that need to be taken now, free of future worries.

> The secret of life is dying before you die. And finding there's no death

4. Pain is Focus on What You Can't Change

Eckart Tolle says that we experience pain when are unhappy about things we have little control over.
The past for example, or future issues we don't feel like we can fully control.

It's because we focus too much on the past and the future but we only have the present to tackle them. And the present cannot always fully tackle future events and it can hardly rewrite the past as well (albeit Tony Robbins shares a few techniques to change your past memories).

5. We Create Pain – And We Can Erase It

As much as the past and future are our own construct, so is pain.
It might feel like external circumstances bring pain to us, but that's not true: we create our own pain.

Accept Unavoidable Pain

The Power of Now doesn't deny that some pain is unavoidable.
Death of loved ones, for example, will always be painful.

Tolle says that you should accept unavoidable pain for what it is: a part of life that cannot be changed.
And you will avoid needless suffering.

Accepting means that you stop wishing it weren't, or that you stop blaming yourself for any possible contribution.

After all, being present in the now is not strictly about avoiding, suppressing, or ignoring all pain and negative feelings.
But it provides the strength to accept them.

> Accept it as if you chose it

6. Ego & Thinking Are The Enemies

We equate our ego with the thoughts in our minds.

The problem with that is that our mind is always projecting into the future to secure its survival.

This is why you cannot find the present moment as long as you are in your mind.
For Tolle indeed the enlightenment is to stop the incessant thinking of our mind.

Tolle says that Rene' Descartes got it wrong with his famous "I think, therefore I am".
He made the typical mistake of equating thinking with being and identity with thinking.

7. How to Live in The Now: 3 Steps to Enlightenment

To reach an enlightenment state you need to separate yourself from your constantly thinking mind and observe it as you'd observe a third party.

Tolle proposes several different ways to do that:

- Ask yourself "What will my next thought be?"

When you fully focus on that question your mind will stop its background humming for a while and you will create a gap in the flow of thinking.

- Listen to your mind without judging

Judging is an act of your mind, so when you allow your mind to judge its own thought you are allowing it free rein.

So for example if in the middle of something you feel like taking a break outside, follow that impulse instead of deeming it unrealistic.
Conversely, if you're outside taking a break, listen if your thought says "you should be working instead of wasting time" but don't judge it. Just acknowledge it exists.

This "listening without equating yourself to your emotions and thoughts" is a core concept of mindfulness and Eastern tradition.

- Experience full alertness

A great to focus on the now is putting yourself in a state where you are awaiting for something important to happen.

When you are in a state of tense awaiting your body and mind are fully alert without any spare resources for worrying about the past and future.

Active waiting can also be a tool you can use to enter a state of flow, for example before an exam or before a race. This is why, Tolle says, Jesus answered the disciples who asked him how to live a good and peaceful life:

> Be like a servant waiting for the return of the master

The servant, fully alert, is living in the now.

> "The second coming of Jesus is in your enlightenment

8. Relationships In the Now

Living in the now can be of great help to your relationship.

It allows you to listen without ego and without judging. And you will have no need to possess and restrict your partner.

However, it can also make your relationship difficult when only one partner lives in the now.
Eckhart Tolle says that light and darkness cannot coexist.
The non-enlightened partner will always try to bring you back to the pains of the past or the worries of the future.

> Only light can recognize light

Addiction & Relationships

The author says that any addiction starts with pain and ends with pain. Being addicted to one person is like being addicted to any other substance.

The addictions, states the Power of Now, stem from a personal refusal to address personal pain.

Relationships With(out) Yourself

When you are enlightened, says Tolle, you won't have a relationship with yourself anymore because you move beyond equating yourself with your ego.

9. Mind & Body Go Together

The author says that many spirituals got it wrong in trying to transcend the body.
Trying to repress the body is not the way to enlightenment.
Buddha only found enlightenment when he stopped his 6 years of abstinence. Jesus always embraced the body: he ascended to heaven with his body and told the disciples that "your body is a temple".

Interconnectedness of Everything

Eckhart Tolle says that he cannot tell you anything that you don't already know, deep inside.
And when you reach a certain stage of interconnectedness, you will recognize the truth when you hear it.

When you reach a high level of interconnectedness, you will realize that God is everywhere around you.
That's why Jesus said:

> Split a piece of wood; I am there. Lift up a stone and you will find me there

[image]

Real-Life Applications

- Accept it as you chose it

Accept all that you cannot change as if you had chosen it yourself.

- Use clock time

Such as when you need to set deadlines for the future, only treat it as clock time instead of allowing the pain and worry to take over in your present.

- Goals & Drive VS In The Now

Some people might use "The Power of Now" as an excuse not to plan, make strict goals or push themselves through suffering.

I have a different approach: keep making goals and deadlines, but actively weed out all the worries the future brings into your present.
Plan in advance and enjoy your journey in the now.

CRITICISM

Past and present can add value to your life

While Tolle mostly focuses on the past and the future as a harbinger of pain, I couldn't help but wonder: what if the past and present instead mostly brought us good feelings and sensations?

Disempowered "guilt-tripping" on humanity

Eckhart Tolle answers a question by saying (I paraphrase for brevity):

> Of course, there's something wrong with you, and you are not being judged. Don't you belong to the human race who killed over 100 million members of its own species in the 21st century alone?

I think that's nonsense.
And it's naive empiricism -with the added insult of being disempowering-.
Check out this article on naive-self help to understand the logic behind it.

Just like Jordan Peterson, we believe here that the individual is not guilty of the sins of others -and especially not from previous generations-.

If you fell for Tolle's guilt-tripping we highly recommend this foundational article on "enlightened individualism":

Superficial guilt tripping on men

The author talks about the "collective female pain body" as due in large part to collective male violence and repression of women throughout the planet over the millennia.

I personally disagree, but it's also factually wrong as a patriarchal society is not "global".
Plenty of societies have been matriarchal.

See our articles on The Red Pill and Overgrowing The Red Pill.

Simplistic & misleading views on issues outside of meditation

For example, relationship descriptions are lacking in depth and evidence.

Even worse was the author's take on addiction. The author says that addiction is always the refusal to address personal pain.
That's not completely true in my opinion and can be deceiving.

Review

The Power of Now is an OK book on spirituality, meditation, and what some people refer to as "enlightenment" or "awareness", but also includes some disempowering mindsets that can lead to a loss of personal agency.

Ambitious men should be careful to only take away the positives from Tolle, but carefully avoid the parts that can lower their self-esteem, mental and social power, and the drive to achieve goals.

The Power of Now for Ambitious Men

Ambitious men need the ability to detach to remain mentally healthy and resilient.
However, they must combine that mental power with social power to and skills for more agentic pursuits and outcomes (including status, respect, and attraction).

I Will Teach You To Be Rich: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I Will Teach You To Be Rich is a beginner's personal finance book that teaches the basics of money-saving, money accumulation, and simple but popular money investment strategies.

Bullet Summary

- Spend less
- Invest early
- Automate your investment

Full Summary

About the Author:
Ramit Sethi is an author, marketer, social skills coach, career coach, and personal finance coach. He is also the author of Earnable, Dream Job, Mental Mastery, How to Talk to Anybody, Advanced Connector Package, etc.

Adapt A Conscious Spending Plan

Samit says that a conscious split of income would look something like this:

- 50-60% fixed costs
- 10% investments
- 5-10% savings
- 20-35% spending

If you're struggling focus on making more instead of saving.

Automate Your Money Allocation

Samit recommends you set up a system that automatically allocates your money according to the above split.

Personally, this feels like an overkill and a limit on your personal enjoyment and freedom.
Maybe you can automate investing and automate some payments so you save time, but automate everything…?

Be Frugal, Not Cheap

Frugal is not the same as cheap. Frugal care about the value first, not just the cost. They think long-term and are willing to spend what they care about.
Cheap care about costs in a way that negatively affects the people around them.

Don't Try to Predict the Market

Nobody can predict the market, says Ramit who espouses the same theory of A Random Walk Down Wall Street.

Then, why not invest in index funds, which simply replicate the market?

This is an idea similar to Unshakable and The Little Book of Common Sense Investing.

My Note:
Psychology applied to finance (ie.: behavioral economics) shows that it's not impossible to beat the market. It's just very difficult for most "normal" folks.

Start Investing Early

The earlier you invest, the more you'll be able to take full advantage of the compound interest.

I Will Teach You To Be Rich suggests maxing out your 401(k) if you have an employer which matches your contribution.
That makes a lot of sense of course.
And then add some Roth IRA -another form of retirement plan which you can better control- and lifecycle funds, which shift into safer investments as you approach retirement.

My Note:
However, I have to add that Money Master the Game, the top investment book Tony Robbins wrote with people of the caliber of Ray Dalio, does not recommend 401k and target-date funds.

CONS

A Bit Simplistic For Any Non-Beginner
Most people reading, understanding, and enjoying TPM as a go-to self-development resource will probably find this book a bit too beginner-level for them.

Misnomer: I Didn't Learn How to Be Rich
The title is misleading.

To me teaching someone to be rich is teaching entrepreneurship or hard skills. Teaching how to manage money is more like accounting or money management.
Read The Millionaire Fastlane to understand exactly what I mean.

> The Millionaire Fastlane: Summary & Review

The Compound System Only Works To Make Already High-Income Folks Wealthier
I find most of the personal finance books to be geared to people that either badly misspend or to people with a higher than average income.
For poor and low-income folks there's just too little spare cash to truly become "rich" in a lifetime.

Didn't Like Investment Recommendations
Some of the investment recommendations run against what I have read -and agreed with- in other books.

PROS

Love the Automation
I love the automation idea for some of the expenses and investments.
It saves not just money, but time. Which is also money, just better :).

Spend and Save
I felt particularly close to the idea of cutting mercilessly for all those things that don't really improve your life.
While spending for what you really love and making your life worth living.

Detailed How To
If you're really a beginner -and if you live in the US- I Will Teach You to Be Rich lays out a plan which you can follow step by step. That can be very useful if you fit the description.

Review

I Will Teach You To Be Rich is a good book on money management for beginners.

In that respect, much similar to The Total Money Makeover, The Richest Man in Babylon, and most other personal finance books.

The main weakness is that most personal finance books work best only under two scenarios:

1. You are spending too much and not optimizing -if you're being mindful already, you're covering the basics already-
2. You have a high income with which to "play around" -otherwise, the compound interest won't make you rich-

I'm glad these guys are out there to teach the basics to the first guys (those with easy credit card finger triggers).
But if you're not falling into both the first and second categories, then the benefits are limited.

I'm not a crazy spender myself, which makes the value of I Will Teach You to Be Rich more limited for me.

I'm more after entrepreneurship and internet marketing than paying off debt. But if you still need to get your spending under control, then I Will Teach You to Be Rich can help.

Passive Aggressive Behavior: Signs, Examples & Fixes

Lucio Buffalmano · 18 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Passive aggression is one of the four modes of communication. Passive aggression combines elements of both passive, such as the fear of confrontation and the difficulties in speaking up, with the drive, anger, and hostility of the aggressive style.

In a society that encourages competition while looking down on aggression, passive aggression might be on the rise.

Luckily, there are ways to protect yourself and, if you are passive-aggressive, to cure yourself.

This article explains how.

	Passive	Aggressive	Passive Aggressive	Assertive
Actions	Keeps quiet Puts himself down Apologizes for self expression Hides his disagreement Inconvenience himself	Expresses himself over others Belittles or disrespects others Ignores, insults, or talks to other opinions	Denies personal responsibility Passive aggressive Sarcastic Agrees to avoid discussion, then looks for ways to sabotage the agreement	Directly expresses needs, wants & feelings Expects others to be equally open & honest Accepts different opinions without disrespecting them
Looks	Makes himself small Looks down & hunch over Avoids eye contact Speaks softly	Makes himself large Looks threatening Penetrating eye contact Loud	Similar to passive	Relaxed Comfortable body language Frequent eye contact (but not glaring)
Beliefs	My needs are less important than others I don't have as many rights as others My contributions are not as valuable as others	My needs are more important and justified than others I have more rights than others My contributions are more valuable than others	My needs come first, but I don't expect others to meet my needs I am not responsible for my actions I am entitled to get my way, even if I make different commitments	My needs are equally important as others I have equal rights We both can make valuable contributions I am responsible for my behavior
Emotions	Fear of rejection Helplessness & low self esteem Frustration Resentment towards others who "succeed"	Anger Powerful (or All-angry) when winning over others Envy, potentially resentful for motivating others	Fear of rejection if being direct or assertive Resentful of people's demands & power Fear of being controlled	Positive feelings about self Positive feelings about establishing with others Feel all emotions
Goals	Avoid conflict Please others (no matter at what cost to me) Let others take control (including others over me)	Win at any costs Control others Always make sure others know who's in charge	Get it my way, without taking responsibility Get it my way, but without having to assert myself	Express himself Find an agreement Keep fair boundaries of mutual respect

What's Passive Aggressive

This is a definition of passive-aggressive behavior:

> Passive aggression refers to types of behavior where resistance, criticism, anger or resentment are hidden or verbally denied.

The passive-aggressive individual can potentially express that anger in an indirect, covert, or subversive fashion.

For example, he might verbally agree on a course of action but then either fail to act in accordance with the agreement or act in ways that lead to opposite results.

Signs of Passive Aggressives

Some traits of the passive-aggressive:

1. Passive Aggressives Project Their Anger Onto Others

Passive-aggressive people often project their anger onto the people around them.

They feel like the world is out to get them, and that everyone else communicates anger as they do: in a sneaky and covert fashion.

The other person might not be angry at all, but that can change as they keep interacting with the passive-aggressive.

What happens is that the passive-aggressive eventually succeeds in annoying the people around, finally provoking real anger.
Once that anger finally turns into an argument, the passive-aggressive feel validated in their feelings of unfairness and external aggression.

2. Passive Aggressives Deny Their Feelings

Passive-aggressives are poor communicators:

The people around eventually catch up to the passive-aggressive covert anger, and they might ask them what's going on.

But the passive-aggressive is always on the defensive.
They feel like the world is out to abuse them and they don't feel like sharing their true selves.
And when people keep asking, they feel violated.

What's the solution?
Before you keep asking and asking, make sure you have a good relationship first, and make sure the passive-aggressive feels safe with you. Or don't keep demanding "how they truly feel" once they are first denied.

3. Passive-Aggressives Take Everything Negatively

Passive-aggressives like to take things negatively (Williams, 2020).

Why?

Because they often have repressed anger and like to be on the attack, so taking things negatively justifies their anger as well as subversive machinations against you.

This is another great reason why you want to avoid passive aggression at all costs: it poisons your interactions as well as your mood.

4. Passive-Aggressives Fight Covertly

Passive-aggressive can be quite Machiavellian.

When you make a mistake, they indirectly win without having to do anything, so they may withhold information that leads you to miss a deadline.

Or they could be the coworkers who "forget" to CC you in the customer email so that you don't stay in the loop.

Why do they do this? Usually, it's a form of punishment or perhaps a subtle way of making you do things without directly asking you to do it. A good example would be a family member who leaves his dirty clothes on top of the washing machine. If you do the laundry and later confront them about it, then they can defend themselves by saying they never asked you to do it.

5. Passive-Aggressives Do Things Sloppily

Their work is half-assed.

It's as if these passive-aggressive are daring you to get angry at them -which is exactly what they want sometimes-.

And if you end up redoing the work yourself, they've just won.

6. Passive-Aggressives Remain Non-Committal

Passive-aggressive individuals are masters of ambiguity.

It can be very hard to pinpoint whether they're telling you yes or no, and it's often premeditated.
That way, they keep their options open and do whatever they please.

And when it comes to telling what you should do, they also often keep it ambiguous, so they can always accuse you later.
You know, "you don't have to if you don't want to", they'll say. But if you don't, they'll sulk.

67. Passive-aggressive murmur threats or profanity

The passive-aggressive might be seething with anger, but:

- He is afraid of his own anger
- He is afraid he will be punished if he expresses himself fully
- He is afraid of the confrontation, of the consequences, of engaging and "losing"

But when the anger is so strong, it can seep out at the seams. Save to put it all back in behind a fake smile if confronted.

Here is an example:

> Him: (irritated and fighting his own irritation, now speaking louder, getting aggressive) Ma'm! I answered your question
> Her: I'm sorry sir?
> Him: (now changes tack, moves back to passive, tries to smile more) Ma'm, I answered your question. I answered. I'm cooperating here, and there is no… (mutter)
> Her: (going on the offensive) Sir, you have no call in getting snippy with me, I'm just doing my job here
> Him: (retreats even further)

She was also not fully assertive, though.
A more assertive response from her would have been:

> Assertive Option: I understand this is frustrating but this is my job and I intend to do it properly. And to do a proper job, I need you to cooperate with me sir

8. Passive-Aggressives Have Weak Boundaries

Passive-aggressives, often fearing confrontation even with disrespectful people, often fail to erect and enforce their personal boundaries.

Here's how a passive-aggressive deal with boundaries:

- Doesn't protect personal space
- Reveals too much
- Get caught up in other people's troubles
- Neglect own needs for others
- Tolerates abuse
- Easily persuaded by one religious creed or another

9. Passive-Aggressive Are Extremely Indirect

Instead of asking you to do your part of the cleaning, they might clean only their side of the flat.

You know, "sending you a message", instead of speaking up.

Or they might leave their dirty laundry on top of the washing machine. And when you complain that you had to do the work for them, they'll say they "never asked you to".

10. More Signs of Passive-Aggressives

More signs and behaviors typical of a passive-aggressive personality include:

- Undermining others
- Ambiguity and avoiding responsibility
- Doing less than agreed, doing it late, or doing it sloppily
- Negativity (pouting, resisting influence, or creating arguments)
- Withholding important information
- Frenemy-type of behavior
- Backhanded compliments
- Microaggression or covert aggression & covert power moves

> 10 Techniques Against Microaggression

Signs of Passive Aggressive at Work

Passive aggression is commonplace at work for a number of reasons:

1. Display of emotions is frowned upon
2. Hierarchy makes it difficult for employees to communicate assertively with bosses
3. It's not easy for bosses to give candid feedback without violating policies
4. There's a natural competition among peers, but it often must be kept under wrap

That means that workplaces are hotspots for passive aggression. Both up and down the chain and, of course, laterally with your lovely colleagues.

Here are some typical signs of passive aggression at work:

- Questioning colleagues or reports in front of others
- Refusing to grant holidays or bonuses without proper explanation
- Removing a colleague from email communication

- Making very difficult questions after a presentation
- Arriving late or taking longer lunch breaks
- Using notes or e-mail to avoid face-to-face confrontation
- Complaining about policies & procedures, but doing nothing to change them

Passive-aggressives rarely attack directly.

But they might be doing so when they feel strong enough or when the pay-offs are particularly big.

A vengeful boss for example might "punish" a report for what the boss perceives to be a slight or disrespect, but the employee will never know because the boss will use some other excuse for his punishment.

Colleagues can turn passive-aggressive out of competition, or sometimes just out of envy.

Example of Passive Aggression Against Authority

Here's an example of passiveness out of strong hierarchies:

> Him: It's the way we prefer to handle it, Gerry
> Gerry: (passive, but plots on how to screw them behind their backs)

Looking at the scene only, this is passive.
But within the whole movie, it's passive-aggressive because he goes beyond everyone's backs to orchestrate a kidnapping to get it his way.

Make Friends, Not Enemies: Power Protect People to Prevent Passive-Aggression

This example also serves as a stark reminder to bosses and managers.

When it comes to politics and smart social strategies: to avoid turning employees into backstabbing enemies, you want to power-protect them, instead of dominating them and making them lose their face.

This is also part of our higher social strategy of "make friends, not enemies".

Causes of Passive Aggression

What causes passive aggression?

Almost always it entails a submissive personality or a conflict-avoidant personality.
Clinical Psychologist Jordan Peterson also lists "high in agreeableness" as a possible cause of passive aggression.

There can be other causes though, including:

- Underlying personality disorder

- Medication
- Envy / Jealousy
- Sense of powerlessness / low self-esteem
- Fear of losing our partner (can be a sign of anxious attachment style)
- Nurture (learned the pattern of behavior from a parent)

Let's now dig deeper into childhood as it's one of the least understood causes:

Learning Passive Aggression At Home

Some present a relationship dance composed of a dominant partner and a subversive, passive-aggressive one.

If one of the parents is dominant and the other subservient, then some children are likely to develop some passive-aggressive personality traits.

Why?

Because the children learn that powerful people shouldn't be approached directly.
Here's a key sentence with which people learn passive-aggressiveness:

> Mother: OK, but let's not tell your father

With that, the child learns that people should not deal directly and honestly with authority, but are instead best served with underhanded tactics and going behind their backs.

The child learns to form coalitions against authority instead of honest conversation

Passive Aggression Techniques

Passive-aggressive people use similar techniques which are at the same time signs of passive aggression and, sometimes, their weapon of choice to attack others.

Here are the main ones:

1. Deny Feelings

> I'm not mad..

Passive-aggressive people don't embrace and admit their feelings.

When you question a passive-aggressive type about their apparent anger or dissatisfaction, they will deny their own anger -see again the video above from the movie "Fargo"-.

2. Delay Execution

Passive-aggressive people resist change internally, but they will always give you the appearance of complying and getting along.

That's why they will often say yes while delaying the execution as an act of subversion and/or to get out of tasks.

This is how many couples get locked in perennial infight. See here an example from the movie "The Breakup":

> Her: Well, I'm gonna go do the dishes.
> Him: Cool
> Her: It'd be nice if you helped me
> Him: No problem. <- passive aggression
> I'll get them a little bit later. I'm just gonna hit the streets here for a little bit.

Note: passive aggression is a type of communication and pattern of behavior. But it doesn't mean necessarily "being wrong".
The fact that he's passive-aggressive doesn't mean that she's right in asking to do the dishes right away.

> Her: Gary, come on, I don't want to do them later. Let's just do them now. It'll take 15 minutes.
> Him: (..) If I could just sit here, let my food digest, and just try to enjoy the quiet for a little bit.

He keeps being passive-aggressive because, very likely, his intention was never to do the dishes.

Note that he's not really hoping the issue will go away. Deep down he knows that it's only likely to escalate.
But he's going for what he perceives to be the path of least resistance.

3. Sulking While Faking Resolution

> Fine!

Sometimes the passive-aggressive can stonewall, hide behind silence, and refuse to answer.

But stonewalling might even be too direct for some extreme passive-aggressive types.
So he prefers to verbally agree while actually sulking and building resentment on the inside.

> Him: Fine. I'll help you do the damn dishes <- passive aggressive: complies while arguing even harder
> Her: Oh, come on. You know what? No. That's not what I want
> Him: You just said that you want me to help you do the dishes

Typical of passive-aggressive, he is pretending not to understand. Of course, she's not gonna be happy with his "resolution", but he fakes total ignorance to keep getting back at her.

Finally, note that this is also a common female behavior.
See "how women control relationships".

4. Substandard Execution

> I didn't have time..

Sometimes procrastination is not an option, in which case the passive-aggressive may decide to carry on the task… In the most sloppy way, he can manage.
Examples:

- A student half-bakes his paper project
- A husband overcooks the pasta while knowing fully well his wife likes it al dente
- Overspending while pretending he didn't realize there was a cap
- Complying with an attitude

See an example from "Raging Bull":

> Her: You want your steak?
> Him: Yeah, right now!
> Her: Good. There's your stupid steak. Can't wait for it to be done?
> Him: No, I can't wait.
> Her: Good. Okay? Happy? Happy? <- fake friendliness

When a passive-aggressive is confronted about his sloppy execution, he sometimes accuses back. For example, he could undermine the decision for the task, saying it made no sense.
Of course, they don't realize they should have said that before the event.

> How to Stop People Undermining You

5. Purposefully "Failing" to Help

> I thought you knew

The passive-aggressive, especially when behaving out of bitterness and envy, can be happy to see you fail.

That's when they will not help you avoid a mistake, even it would have been easy for them.

Of course, when you confront them, it will be an excuse-fest:

- I thought you knew it
- I didn't notice
- Oh I'm sorry, I thought you were doing it on purpose to test things

6. Defending Themselves

> I was just…

> Her: I was just going to buy some groceries

In the face of obvious evidence to the contrary, the passive-aggressive will try to look innocent. And might try to frame you as overly abusive, strict, or paranoid.

7. Silent Treatment

> Sorry I didn't see you..

Looking into someone's eyes and not saying hi is rather direct. The passive-aggressive behavior is sneakier.
They might pretend to look away, and when confronted they might say they haven't seen you.

8. Aggressive Body Language

> OK (rolling her eyes up)…

Sneering, behind-the-back gestures, and other nonverbal signals of disapproval are other typical passive-aggressive behavior.

In this example, De Niro's facial expression is a split second, but it communicates "you're talking smack".

Preference For Nonverbal Attacks

Why do passive-aggressive people rely more on nonverbal attacks than verbal ones?

First of all, it's less likely to cause confrontation.
And second, because they can always deny their action. You cannot deny a clearly stated verbal disagreement that everyone hears (unless you're Trump).
But if you just make a facial gesture and the recipient confronts you, you can always say: "it's not true I'm undermining you, where did you get that from".

9. Back-Handed Compliments

There are two types of backhanded compliments:

Offensive Compliments

Offensive compliments deliver an attack right next to a compliment.
For example:

- You landed a great job for your level of education
- Not bad for your actual skills

Complimenting someone else

Complimenting someone else, especially if the target has just failed, is a great way for the passive-aggressive to demote the target socially (also read social climbing).

Here's a great example from "Meet The Parents":

> She: The airline lost his bag.
> Mother: Oh! They didn't!
> She: Yeah, they did.
> He: What about you, honey?
> She: No, I carried on.
> He: That's my girl! <- indirect assault on Greg

10. Sarcasm

> I was just kidding…

Sarcasm is another popular tool to hide real feelings of bitterness and, sometimes, hatred.

And if someone calls the funny joker on the inappropriateness of the "joke", of course, they were just kidding (read here how to respond to inappropriate jokes).

Here it is Billy Batts using passive aggression on the wrong fella:

> Billy: He'd make your shoes look like fuc*ing mirrors. Excuse my language. He was the best. Made a lot of money too.
> Tommy: No more shines. You been away a long time. They didn't tell you. I don't shine shoes anymore.
> Billy: Relax. What's got into you? I'm breaking your balls a little, that's all. I'm only kidding with you. <- dang! Passive aggression, hiding his hand
> Tommy: Sometimes you don't sound like it. There's a lot of people around. <- great move! presses on, forces him to apologize again
> Billy: I'm only kidding. We're having a party.

As you can see from this example, passive aggression does not always mean "submissive", "afraid", "beta male" or however you associate it with.
Sometimes it can just be part of a larger social assault, and it can be used smartly.

Notice though that in the end, Batts snaps out of passive-aggressiveness to being purely aggressive.

11. Tentative Aggression

Sometimes it's not just employees but also bosses who avoid direct confrontation.

They avoid direct confrontation, but they still want to make sure they throw their weight around.

Here is an example from "Office Space":

This video example is a feast of passive aggression.

If the two bosses feel the employee's mistake is really that important, they should address it properly.
And if the employee feels he is unjustly targeted, he should be a bit stronger in his replies. Shaking his head instead is a typical sign that he is building resentment for what he perceives as unfair nitpicking.

Passive Aggressive Examples

In this section, we present passive-aggressive scenarios and how to address them.

Passive Aggressive Justice

Eva and Christie live together and they do grocery shopping every week when they drive to a mall: it's cheaper there.

In the morning Eva goes for the milk only to find there's nothing inside.
Eva doesn't drink milk, so she inquires:

> Eva: What happened to the milk
> Christie: oh my boyfriend was over yesterday, he probably had some, sorry!

Depending on her personality, Eva can answer in three ways:

> Aggressive: well, you should try thinking, if you can figure out how. . Is your boyfriend contributing to the household budget now? I hope he enjoyed my milk.
> (as she throws the milk carton out)

It's impulsive and emotional: anger is highly visible here.

> Passive: That's OK, I'll get coffe on the way to work. Have a good day.

This is passive because she doesn't express her needs or protect her rights. It might be because of low self-esteem: she is single. Her flatmate must be "better" for having a boyfriend. She feels unworthy of even complaining.

> Assertive (takes a deep breath): W*e have to rethink our shopping list I suppose, or shop at the local market when supplies are running low. But let's talk it over tonight.*

The breath is to release some anger. She makes an effort to be reasonable, but their needs have collided and it's time for a discussion. This is a responsible and sensible approach.

> Passive Aggressive: Ahm, that's OK, I'll find something else for breakfast.*

Then she sees Eva's yogurt, the last on the shelf. She feels a pang of anger and self-righteousness and takes it when Christie doesn't see her.
Typical passive-aggressive behavior: doesn't say anything directly to her face, but evens the scores behind her back.

When Christie will ask about her yogurt Eva might reply that "she had to have something for her cereals". How could Christie be angry?

Passive Aggressive Over Time

Lucia hates waking up in the morning, and her mother has to call her over and over again.

Lucia replies she will get up soon, but her mother always has to walk to her room to make sure.

With time, Lucia developed an understanding of when her mother reached the door and gets up right before she enters.

By complying with a delay, Lucia creates anger in her mother, who eventually tells her she'll call only once, and then she'll have to walk to school.

Now Lucia gets up right on time, but "makes her mother pay" by taking a lot of time in the bathroom.
When she finally comes out, she says:

> Lucia: Sorry, I guess it takes time when one is still sleepy*

Notice what she's doing there? She is indirectly blaming her mother for waking her up.

Years later Lucia is in college.
She buys the latest version laptop on her parent's credit card because she feels entitled to it. After all, her parents could not send her to the first pick of school.
When her father asks, she replies that it's almost mandatory for students to have a good laptop. But deep down, it was probably a bit of a vendetta for her.

Passive Aggressive Relationships

This is a typical dialogue in a relationship with a passive-aggressive personality:

> Him: I won two tickets for the football match, not that you would ever care to join though? <- implies she never wants to accompany him
> Her: Sure, why not <- She disregards her own needs and reservations. Maybe to prove him wrong
> Him: Really? I thought you didn't like football
> Her: Not much but you won the tickets
> Him: Then why you said yes. You always say yes and then find some reasons to back out. Will you really go this time?
> Her: Well sure… Unless it's too cold, I can't sit outside in the cold
> Him: Christie it's November, it's going to be cold. Forget it!

Passive aggressiveness in relationships can lead to vicious circles and breakups.

Effects of Passive Aggressive Behavior

Passive aggressive behavior is highly harmful to relationships.

And it takes a toll on "both sides": both the passive-aggressive and their victims fail.

Effect On Others: Stoking Anger & Hostility

Generally speaking, people don't like passive-aggressive types.

Passive aggressive come across as sneaky, underhanded, and weak but mean-spirited at the same time.

With their sneaky and underhanded tactics, passive-aggressive people can often get under the skin of their victims.

It happens because the passive-aggressive keeps calm and pretends to be shocked when the others blow up in anger.

As a matter of fact, some passive-aggressive types take pleasure in seeing others overreact and blow up. Especially if in front of others.
The effect can be similar to gaslighting, as we saw some cheating partners using it in their relationships.

This is how a blow-up through sneaky passive-aggressive maneuvers would look like:

Notice her face, eyes rolling, and his sneaky comment "who talks like that", which implies that she talks in that low register, not them.

Victims of passive aggression are also likely to become hostile and more aggressive.
Says clinical psychologist Harriet Braiker:

> Passive-aggressive actions actually incite your partner to greater hostility. Your passivity combined with the denial of your own deeply buried aggression becomes intensely frustrating to your partner.
> (…)
> Your passive-aggressive behavior makes you a participant in an interactive pattern of behavior that enables your partner to continually become angry with you.

Effect on the Passive Aggressive: Emotional Anguish, Low Status

As we've seen the passive-aggressive is rarely in control.

As a matter of fact, most of the time the passive-aggressive is as much of a victim.
He often suffers in silence indeed, under the belief that he is the one being unfairly treated. He builds up resentment inside because he has no other safety valve to vent and doesn't have the strength and skills to stand up for himself.

It's not uncommon for passive-aggressive to wish ill fate on their mostly made "enemies". Or to imagine assaulting them.

Generally speaking, if he comes across as sneaky and not strong enough to speak directly and openly, people view passive-aggressive types as weak and cowardly.

That means that passive aggressives stay stuck at the bottom of social hierarchies, and rarely rise to the top of any social groups -and especially so in "high-power circles", where people tend to have the courage to be direct and open.

Dealing With Passive-Aggressive People

Here are a few ways to deal with passive-aggressive behavior:

1. Ignore It

Ignore, or at least don't overreact.

When you rage, nag, or criticize, you escalate conflict and give the passive aggressor a reason to keep up the covert operations.
It's possible they might drop the behavior if they see it doesn't get through to you.

2. Distance Yourself

Stay away from passive-aggressive people whenever you can: they're not healthy relationships and you have very little to gain from them.

3. Use the Same Strategy

Robert Greene in the 33 Strategies of War recommends you never attack back directly but use the same game back on them.
This is especially useful if you are indeed dealing with someone who's using passive aggression as a power move.

4. Confront Them

If you are going to confront them, do it exactly when they display passive-aggressive behavior and explain to them exactly what they're doing.

Once they understand you know their game and can explain it in detail, chances are they will stop.
People fear those who can call them out -potentially publicly-.

5. Empower Them

Some passive-aggressive individuals resort to indirect communication because they feel powerless.

In those cases, it can help to empower them.

Tell your partner that you are listening, tell your colleague you care about their opinion, and give them credit.
Once they will feel heard their need for passive aggression will disappear.

Look at this example from Elon Musk's life:

> Talulah: (undermine Musks by framing him as a socially clueless nerd)

She's being highly disrespectful.
But not "in your face aggressive".
She is covert. Passive-aggressively undermining his authority.

Probably she feels lower value next to him.
Potentially, unappreciated as well. So she feels the need to back-stab him to "bring him closer to her".

Stopping Your Own Passive Aggression

Here are a few ways to stop being passive-aggressive if you are one:

1. Embrace Conflict

Overcoming your fear of conflict will go a long way towards making you a strong communicator and overcoming passive aggression.

2. Make Your Own Agenda

Some passive-aggressive follow people they don't want to follow because they don't have their own goals.
Decide what you want out of life instead and go for it. And stop following bosses and leaders that you don't respect.

3. Accept Your Feelings

Anger is a fair feeling. Even in romantic relationships, Gottman has shown that anger in itself is not dangerous.
Embrace it and channel it productively instead.

4. Practice Assertive Communication

Whenever you don't like something or don't want to do something, say it!

5. Compassionate Assertiveness

Why compassion?

Well, sometimes passive aggression stems out of self-absorption. We think others are out to get us, out to annoy us, or we make everything about us.
We need to see the situation from the other's point of view as well.

Using Passive Aggression

If passive aggression evolved in people… It probably served a purpose.

There are indeed strategic uses of passive aggression, as well as some limited situations in which passive or covert aggression can be useful, or even high-quality options.

Read more on Power University on how to strategically use passive aggression.

13 Best Relationship Books

This is my recommended reading list of the best relationship books based on what I have reviewed so far.

It's a perfect reading list if you are short on time but are keen on improving your relationship.

Just a note: don't put too much emphasis on the position: any relationship book on this TOP 10 list is sure to be life… Ehmmm, a relationship changer.
Which is pretty much the same anyway, plenty of studies show that the biggest

12. Not Just Friends

by Shirley Glass
Summary | Kindle | Print[image]

Not Just Friends is actually about cheating and affairs. Some statistics seem to point out that cheating happens, sadly, in around half of relationships.

If that weren't a good reason enough to learn and research how to prevent affairs, Not Just Friends will greatly expand your knowledge on love, passion, and emotional attachments.

A must-read.

> Quote: Affairs are traumatic for the cheated partner, and should be treated as such.

11. Too Good to Leave Too Bad to Stay

by Mira Kirshenbaum
Summary | Print | Audiobook

Mira Kirshenbaum's book focuses on helping you decide whether to stay and work on your relationship or break up.

However, it ends up providing much more than that. As she goes through the core questions you should be asking yourself, she also highlights what are the central elements that make relationships too good to leave (or too bad to stay).

A really outstanding book and a must-read to overcome any hint of ambivalence you might have.

> Quote: "when distance is safer than closeness, you don't have a relationship".

10. Why Marriages Succeed or Fail

by John Gottman
Summary | Kindle | Print

Gottman debunks a big myth here: that there's little arguing in strong relationships. He goes on to explain the different types of relationships that different "arguing personalities" form, telling the readers what works and what doesn't.

All are based on years of observations and research. Fascinating, fascinating stuff.

> Quote: "It's not about how much you argue, it's about how you argue"

9. Women Who Love Too Much

By Robin Norwood
Summary | Hardcover | Audiobook

This will not be relevant to everyone, BUT, for those for whom it is relevant, it's a potential life-changer and life-saver.

I wish there was a similar book called "men who need too much love". Unluckily, there is no such book (yet). Luckily, Norwood covers that part as well.

For more on abusive relationships, please check:

> Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

> Quote: The choice is yours. If you choose to begin the process of recovery, you will change from a woman who loves someone else so much it hurts into a woman who loves herself enough to stop the pain.

8. The 5 Love Languages

by Gary Chapman
Summary | Kindle | Print

The "5 Love Languages" is the biggest seller of them all on this list. As a matter of fact, Chapman holds the record of the biggest-selling books of all the relationship genres.

The "5 Love Languages" is a very simple book that shares a very simple concept. But let's not confuse easy with important!

We all have a favorite language to share our love, says Chapman. And if we don't use the same language as our partner, we are failing to communicate and understand love.
Definitely, something we should be aware of!

7. The Tactical Guide to Women

by Shawn Smith
Summary | Amazon

Albeit written for men, the focus of this book is what all relationship books should start with picking the right partner.

Pick the right partner, and you're already halfway through a successful relationship.

> Quote: "If I'm scaring you about marriage, good. It's a momentous decision"

---

6. The Woman's Guide to How Men Think

by Shawn Smith
Review (removed) | Audiobook

Women think they know better about relationships.
But, in truth, most women know little about men and are ill-prepared to be in healthy relationships with men.
This book helps women learn about men so that they both can enjoy better relationships.

> Quote: Maybe you've seen one of those cartoon diagrams of a man's brain in which most of the brain areas are labeled "sex." Those cartoons might be more accurate if they depicted a man's brain as one giant marketing firm designed to earn the affection and admiration of women.

5. The Man's Guide to Women

by John Gottman
Summary | Kindle | Print

I can already hear some guys chiming in: "why is there a book on men understanding women, but not one on women understanding men?".

Well, first of all, I have added that type of book to a second revision.
But this one still features higher because Gottman's research shows that men play a bigger role than women in determining the success -or lack thereof- of a relationship.

In a way, that empowers men. On the other hand, very few men understand of women (and relationships) work. Worry not, The Man's Guide to Women is here to fix that.

4. The APA Handbook – Vol. 3 Relationships

By Various Authors
Summary | Amazon

We just had to have at least a science-based handbook in here.

Frankly, it's not the best book on how to succeed in relationships.
That's not the goal.

The goal of this handbook is to provide an overview of the available empirical evidence on relationships.

And to gain a good understanding of most topics, you often need to look at the available evidence on that topic.

> Quote: "Additionally, social exchange perspectives (e.g. , Thibaut & Kelley, 1959) suggest that individuals seek the "best" mate they can attain on the basis of the limits imposed by their own mate value, which leads partners who have similar "market value" to pair up"

3. The Oxford Handbook of Infidelity

by Todd K. Shackelford, Tara DeLecce, et al.

Summary

While The Oxford Handbook of Infidelity focuses mostly on infidelity, infidelity is a crucial topic and risk when it comes to relationships.
As with any cooperation, it's always important to be careful of potential risks of defection.

For some, this may be a needed wake-up call.

> Quote: The forces that drive people to seek new mates are in a continual battle with a socially endorsed ideal of lifelong bonds (…) Despite the best efforts of many well-intentioned individuals, innate inclinations often overwhelm the imperatives imposed by marriage or partners' strong intentions of fidelity. We humans simply are not evolved to remain with one partner exclusively and indefinitely. When we nevertheless do so, it is often with frustration and resentment.
> (…)
> In an era with long life spans and permanent marriages, love's relative brevity tends to lead to disappointment. Romantic love almost inevitably fades within a few years, leading to diminished commitment and broken vows
> (…)
> The prevailing expectation of monogamy, which appears difficult to uphold considering EDI rates, causes individuals to feel devastated when infidelity occurs (Campbell et al., 2012; Coontz, 2005).

We believe monogamy is certainly possible here.
But it may present important challenges in many Western countries that have become more liberal.

2. The Oxford Handbook of Evo Psych & Romantic Relationships

by Justin K. Mogilski, Todd K. Shackelford, et al.
Summary | Amazon

Another handbook in our top 3.

If you're looking for advice on how to make a relationship work, skip to #1.

if you want to learn about relationships and why they exist… Look on further.
This is the true #1 at the time of writing to explain the true dynamics of dating, love, and relationships.

As with any evolutionary texts, the most naive folks here should expect some "harsh truths" about human nature.
BUT there is also plenty to be optimistic for, including what this quote represents:

> Quote: Despite the often too prevalent perception of a war between the sexes in the social sciences (see special issue of Sex Roles, e.g., Vandermassen, 2011), to a large degree interdependent reproduction promotes cooperation rather than confict (Buss, 2017; Mikulincer & Shaver, 2007)

1. Seven Principles to Make Marriage Work

by John Gottman
Summary | Kindle | Summary

Dear reader, honestly… Every single book on this list could have been #1. They're just all so good.

In the end, I went for The Seven Principles to Make Marriage Work as it seemed to give a greater overview of what works and what doesn't.

Again, all based on years of observation and empirical research.

All you have to do is apply the information to your relationship and enjoy the big rewards.
What's not to love?

> Quote: "Spend 10% of the gym time on your relationship and you get 3 times the benefits"

Recap

Human relationships, including, intimate relationships, are one of the main determinants of a happy life.

Relationships also weigh heavily on our health and our longevity -probably more than all the biohacks so popular these days-.

Yet, it's exceedingly rare for people to approach them systematically and as an improvable skill.

This list of best relationship books is here to buck the trend: grab these books, learn what works, and improve your relationship -and your life-.

15 Signs of Abusive Relationship (W/ Examples)

Lucio Buffalmano · 20 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The signs of an abusive relationship are easy to spot when you know what to look for.

But they're not always obvious when you are in a relationship.
So this guide is here to help you troubleshoot your relationship. Keep this in mind: you don't need all the signs. One single sign might be enough to tell you all you need to know about your partner.

Note: I will use the pronoun "he" because most abusers are men.

1. Controlling Behavior

Abusive men believe it's their right to control their partner.

What they think, what they say, and how they act.
If they are having an argument, he expects his word to be the last word, and he gets particularly angry in the face of defiance.
Here are typical attitudes of a controlling, abusive man:

- If I insist on something and you disagree, you are wronging me
- I know what's best for you and the relationship
- If you disobey my authority I have the right to take all the steps to re-establish it

Some abusive men can talk about "allowing" their partner this or that freedom. And they feel entitled to eventually remove the freedoms that they grant.

Example of Controlling Behavior

The most conservative and abusive men want to control when their partners are allowed to speak.

Example from Raging Bull:

Note: abusiveness is always this obvious of course. Sometimes it's much more subtle. It might be a doctor asking you "where did you get that from" to make you feel you're not qualified to answer. Or a professor saying that your statement is "unfounded".

Fiefdoms of Control

Not all abusive men are controlling about the same things, and most pick a few fiefs to establish their control.

For example:

- Decision-making: they control all major decision-making in the family
- Personal freedom: what you wear, where you can go, and at what time you're back

How Control is Exercised

Most imagine a controlling man as yelling and expecting deferential execution of their wishes.

Or maybe physically assaulting.

And that might indeed be the case.

But they can also use:

- Criticism: constantly criticizing and ridiculing your friends
- Incessant complaints
- Claiming it's in your best interest
- Pretending your behavior is hurting them

Seeking Power & Defending Ego

Research on domestic violence often reaches the conclusion that husbands who batter their wives do so to establish power in the family.

Some authors say that batterers' wives outclass their men in some sort of significant way for them, for example earning more or having a better education.

Batterers tend to seek power and believe in male superiority.
And when their ego and ideal position as "head of the family" comes under threat, they resort to violence to re-assert their position.

However, it's wrong to think that these men are low in self-esteem. As social psychologist Baumeister explains, violence is mostly committed by egotistic men with high or relatively high self-esteem.
But while they are high in self-esteem, they also have a very fragile ego they need to defend.

2. Possessiveness

Another big sign of an abusive relationship is abnormal possessiveness.

The abusive partner feels like he owns you, and that he can make decisions on your behalf.

Out of possessiveness, your partner might also try to isolate you from friends and family.
When you are isolated you are easier to control and you are more dependent on him.
Indeed, some abusive men see your friendships are a threat to them.

Breakup and Possessiveness

Possessiveness is one of the reasons why abusive men fail to see the seriousness of a breakup. Or they fail to accept it.

How can you break up with him, when he believes he owns you?
That's the twisted mindset of an abusive man.

3. Entitlement Mentality

Entitlement is another huge sign of an abusive relationship.
Abusers don't always and necessarily have a general entitlement mentality towards the world. But they do have one for their partners.

There are several layers to abusive entitlement:

Entitlement to Relationship

This is an early warning you must heed at all costs.

Some abusive men feel like they are entitled to have a woman. Even when she doesn't want them.

Here is an example from the movie "Beautiful Girls":

In a scene little after he will plow snow against her garage door to block her driveway as revenge for saying no.

Another example of abusive behavior. And the movie even portrays them as somewhat likable characters.

Physical Entitlement

This is mostly valid for the most traditional abusers.

They see you as an unpaid maid.
You might be supposed to clean the kitchen, do the laundry and take care of the kids.
But of course, the most important is that you take care of him.

Emotional Entitlement

Some abusers want you to pay attention and listen to them.

If he accomplished something great at work, you should be happy for him. Even if you have all the reasons in the world to be sad at that precise moment, it doesn't matter: the world revolves around him.

If he wants emotional closeness, you should drop everything you're doing to soothe him when he's down. And he can get aggressive if you failed to understand needs that he hasn't even expressed.

But no matter how much you give him, it will never make him better.
And it will never be enough for him.

Sexual Entitlement

Whenever he feels like it, you should be ready to go. If he does not feel like it, he won't move a finger (figuratively as well as physically).

The craziest thing?
Some abusive men might resent it if you don't reach an orgasm. Not that they care that much about you, often, but they might care about seeing themselves as great lovers.

Example of Entitlement

In this scene, Carlo feels entitled to ask Connie to make dinner and to leave when the dinner is ready without having to explain anything.

Expecting his wife to simply accept his behavior is an example of a huge, entrenched form of entitlement.

You know what will happen afterward, both in the movie and in many -albeit not all- abusive relationships?
Connie will interpret her own crazy behavior as an overreaction and will make excuses for Carlo. She will actually protect and defend him, saying it was her fault.
Connie might have overreacted indeed, but that does not make Carlo any less abusive.

4. You Cannot Criticize Him

Abusive men are above reproach.

Or at least, they don't want to hear any pushback.

If you complain about something, however valid, he sees it as nagging or provoking.

I don't want this scene on my website, but you can click here for an example.
Again, most abusive relationships will reach that level and might not get violent at all. But the threat of violence or the fear of violence is often present.
Or verbal and emotional abuse can follow when you criticize him.

5. He Does Not Accept Your Boundaries

Many abusive men want total control.

And they feel they have a monopoly on anger.

When you do get angry, he will try to squash you as soon as he can. And he might use your anger to put you down as overly emotional, irrational, or “full of spite”.

Holding up on anger is unhealthy of course, which might lead you to develop different symptoms, such as:

- depression
- emotional numbing
- eating and sleeping problems
- passive aggression

The icing on the cake? Your abusive partner might use any of the above to belittle you further or make you feel crazy.

Anger Does Not Cause Abuse

By the way, anger doesn’t cause abuse. And he isn’t abusive because he is angry.
It’s the other way around: it’s his entitlement and unrealistic expectations that cause him to be angry.

Anger Explosions as Control Tool

Many survivors of high-conflict relationships report that ‘explosive anger is rarely just a loss of temper—it is a strategic choice. Adelyn Birch, who documents these patterns from a survivor’s perspective, describes how abusers use these outbursts to create “one-trial learning,” conditioning the partner to walk on eggshells to avoid the next explosion.

6. Manipulations

Very few men exclusively rely on verbal abuse, battering, and intimidation to control their partners.

After all, the abuser does need some good times to make you stick with him.

That’s why most abusers are well-schooled in the art of power moves and mental games.
And the more intelligent and well-learned he is, the more refined his manipulations.
Here are some typical manipulations:

- Mood swings, which keep you off balance
- Denying what he has done or said, making you feel crazy
- Making you believe it’s best for you to do what he wants
- Using guilt and making you feel sorry for him
- Shifting the blame to others, including you
- Turning you against your friends or family (divide and conquer)
- Spreading rumors about you among friends and neighbors
- Accusing you of his own sins

7. He Disrespects You

Disrespect is not only a major sign of abusive relationships, but it’s the core of an abusive relationship.

Disrespect takes many forms and can also be covert.
For example, Keltner (1998) found that domineering men used more antisocial and value-taking teasing.

But whatever the form, you never abuse someone you respect and you don't respect someone whom you abuse.

De-Humanization to Keep Abusing

Many abusers go on with their abuse and disrespect guilt-free because they dehumanize you and objectify you.
Dehumanization and depersonalization allow them to sleep well and lead guilt-free lives while they keep abusing you.
This is the process by which otherwise normal people can act evil (Zimbardo, 2007). And it's one of the reasons why abusiveness doesn't improve by itself.

I have noticed that online communities such as The Red Pill, theoretically there to help improve men, are actually incubators of misogyny and female dehumanization.

Public Abuse

As we will see later abusive men often care a lot about keeping a spotless public appearance.
But some abusers are more careless and won't refrain from public abuse either.

8. He Feels Superior to You

A sense of superiority is not a prerogative of abusers: many men see themselves as "above" their partners.

Yet, when it's a sense of superiority in many different aspects of life, it's another indicator of an abusive relationship.

The abusive man indeed often sees you as beneath him in intelligence, competence, and sometimes even sensitivity.

Unfavorable Comparisons

Sense of superiority often mixes with disrespect and takes the form of comparisons between what he does -valuable and hard- and what you do -nothing and easy-.

If he works and you stay at home, you chill all day thanks to his hard work. If you both work, his job is more demanding and yours is easy.

Note: the character in the movie is not abusive overall, and indeed she's not afraid in the slightest. But this scene is abusive.
She starts the argument with the wrong approach too by assuming guilt. She is a bit contemptuous of him -which of course doesn't justify abuse-,

9. He Strives for Good Public Image

Not all abusive men do this, but many seek a public affable image and want others to believe they are good and respectable men.

You Have Nobody to Turn To

Since people around think that your boyfriend is a good person, that makes it hard for you to even get support.
Who are you going to talk to?
Some might even think you're a lucky woman.
The good public image becomes another tool that he uses to keep you locked in an abusive relationship.

What's Wrong With Me?

The contrast between a nice public image and behavior and the treatment he reserves for you can be highly damaging for some women.

They wonder if they are at fault for triggering his buttons.
That further lowers their self-esteem, which in turn keeps them tied to the abusive relationship (read here the link between low self-esteem and abusive relationships).

10. Justifies Abuse With Your Allegedly Poor Behavior

The abusive man has always some good justification for his abusive behavior.

And they often include your (made-up) shortcoming and/or your machinations:

- She knows how to get under my skin
- She pushed me too far
- There's only so much I can take
- She's just terrible

Are Abusers Psychopaths?

Well, some of them can be, but the two pathologies are completely different and only seldom overlap (only around 5% of the time, says abuse researcher Lundy Bancroft).

Most abusers indeed do have a conscience, but use entitlement, dehumanization, or made-up excuses to work around it.

Indeed abusers do answer for their actions outside of the relationship. It's just with their partners that they make an exception.

11. Demands Public Perfection

Some men want to parade their women to make them look good.

These men will demand you look great, dress perfectly, and behave impeccably.

Even if you manage to behave at their high level of expectations, they are not really in love with you but with the image you provide them.

And they will viciously attack you afterward if you've had any minor slip-up that "made them look bad".

They might refer to you as “embarrassing them” even though you had no idea.

12. Denies and Minimizes Abuse

If after the abusive incident your partner minimizes or denies what happened, you are probably in an abusive relationship.

Only a few abusive men have a borderline personality disorder in which they insulate their consciousness (less than 10%).
Most other abusive men are consciously lying.

Psychiatric Symptoms

If the abusive partner really convinces her partner that the abuse didn’t take place, she can develop psychiatric symptoms.

Non Abusive Reaction:

There is a big difference between an abuser and a non-abuser after any incident which can resemble abuse.

A non-abusive person will feel bad about it and want to make up for it. Sometimes he can be as shocked and disturbed as you are.

With the denial and minimization of the abuser, you can instead expect that the abuse will keep going and very possibly increase.

13. Sees Everything As Personal Affronts

Abusers see abuse from their spouse where the was no abuse.

Imagine for example you are having dinner with a couple of friends of yours and they talk about a delicious restaurant they have been to but how incredibly expensive it was.

Your partner turns to you and says you should try. You reply something like “I don’t know dear, it sounds awfully expensive”.

For a normal man, there is nothing wrong there.
But an abuser might take it as an embarrassing, public assault on his manhood for “not being able to afford the place”.

Writes Baumeister in seminal work “Evil“:

> The driving force was his own pride, his high self-esteem, his male ego.
> He was so intent on being superior to her that he watched for any little episode or remark that could possibly be interpreted as reflecting badly on him, and whenever he found one he turned violent against her in response.

This is why I am personally very wary of “male pride” and alpha male posturing: they are antechambers to abuse.

14. Escalating Intensity

Be warned:

Research shows that domestic violence usually increases over time.

Couples typically start with insults or cruel remarks, then they might yell, then maybe they threaten to end the relationship or to get “really angry”.

Then finally they start hitting each other.

If you start seeing an escalation of aggression, don't hope it will get better: actively work on it (or end the relationship).

15. Mutual Escalations

Finally, it would be a huge, albeit common mistake, to consider abuse as a male-only problem.

Research by Murray Straus shows that mutual aggression is the norm.
And when only one spouse was abusive, he/she most often reported to be reacting out of injustice from the other.

Most people want to see violence in morally black-and-white terms with innocent, victims and evil abusers.
But most abusers only become violent when they think they have been attacked.

Sure, in many cases as we have seen that is wholly in their mind.
But in many other cases, both partners contribute to mutual hurt, violence, and aggression.

Signs You're In Danger

Safety expert Gavin de Becker lists the following signs as red flags of future violence or even potential murder:

1. Intuitive feeling you're at risk
2. He accelerated the pace, prematurely placing on the agenda such things as commitment, living together, and marriage.
3. He resolves conflicts with intimidation, bullying, and violence
4. He is verbally abusive.
5. He uses threats and intimidation as instruments of control or abuse. Including threats to harm physically, defame, embarrass, restrict freedom, disclose secrets, cut off support, abandon, and commit suicide
6. He breaks or strikes things in anger. He uses symbolic violence (tearing a wedding photo, marring a face in a photo, etc.).
7. He has been battered in prior relationships
8. He uses alcohol or drugs with adverse effects (memory loss, hostility, cruelty)
9. He cites alcohol or drugs as an excuse or explanation for hostile or violent conduct ("That was the booze talking, not me; I got so drunk I was crazy")
10. He has a history of police encounters for behavioral offenses (threats, stalking, assault, battery)
11. There has been more than one incident of violent behavior (including vandalism, breaking things, throwing things)
12. He uses the money to control your activities, purchases, and behavior
13. He becomes jealous of anyone or anything that takes your time away from the relationship; he keeps you on a "tight leash," requires her to account for her time
14. He refuses to accept the rejection
15. He expects the relationship to go on forever, perhaps using phrases like "together for life;" "always;" and "no matter what."
16. He projects extreme emotions onto others (hate, love, jealousy, commitment) even when there is no evidence that would lead a reasonable person to perceive them
17. He minimizes incidents of abuse
18. He spends a disproportionate amount of time talking about you and derives much of his identity from being your husband, lover, etc.

19. He tries to enlist your friends or relatives in a campaign to keep or recover the relationship
20. He has inappropriately surveilled or followed you
21. He believes others are out to get him. He believes that those around you dislike him and encourages you to leave him
22. He resists change and is described as inflexible, unwilling to compromise
23. He identifies with or compares himself to violent people in films, news stories, fiction, or history. He characterizes the violence of others as justified
24. He suffers mood swings or is sullen, angry, or depressed
25. He consistently blames others for problems of his own making; he refuses to take responsibility for the results of his actions
26. He refers to weapons as instruments of power, control, or revenge
27. Weapons are a substantial part of his persona; he has a gun or he talks about, jokes about reads about, or collects weapons
28. He uses "male privilege" as a justification for his conduct (treats her like a servant, makes all the big decisions, and acts like the "master of the house")
29. He experienced or witnessed violence as a child
30. You fear he will injure or kill you. You discussed this with others, you made plans to be carried out in the event of your death, or you planning to or thinking about doing so
