> It’s a longstanding tradition acquired from the field of psychiatry, with its medical authoritarianism (…) going back at least to Freud, research psychiatry has been dominated by a handful of despots who treat dissenters like invading barbarians usurping their domain. One critical word from a young disciple and he was banished.
> I’ve preferred the humanistic tradition. To the scientists of the Renaissance, your critic was really your ally, helping you advance upon reality.

True.
But it didn’t always feel like it.
I think one of Seligman’s error was to borrow so many words and expressions from military campaigns, which give readers the feeling he also feels the same way -and that’s an issue with the English language, in general-.

2. Nationalistic beyond what’s expected from a scientist

Says Seligman:

> If this epidemic continues, I believe that America’s place in the world will be in jeopardy. America will lose > its economic place to less pessimistic nations than ours, and this pessimism will sap our will to bring about social justice in our own country.

Mr. Seligman, science belongs to the people.
The idea that research should be used to prop up international power orders is not a mindset deserving of a true scientist.

Update:

I later read Seligman's "The Circuit of Hope", which is basically Seligman's autobiography.
Seligman dedicates plenty of space to criticize the "left-wing psychologists who took over APA", and who "attacked him for being an ultra-nationalist".

3. Sometimes self-congratulatory

It's a normal human need to be recognized for one's own work.
Some scientists hide it better than others, while others are more open about self-promotion.
Seligman seems to be more part of the latter category.

He often lavishes praises on his students, which is nice.
And sometimes he likes to take a little bit of that credit as well, which is OK.

Some other times, it might feel as if he was (unwittingly) devaluing others.

For example, of the first time he was introduced to experiments on dogs and electric shocks, he says he had already understood the concept of learned helplessness:

> As I listened to Overmier and then looked at the whimpering dogs, I realized that something much more significant had already occurred than any result the transfer experiment might produce: Accidentally, during the early part of the experiment, the dogs must have been taught to be helpless.

It might be.
But that was just a hunch, and everyone has hunches.
When Seligman describes the situation the way he did, he indirectly devalues professor Solemon and Overmier, who now might come across as very un-bright researchers for missing the obvious link.

This is a form of social climbing which I call "social climbing in absentia".

It's the same attitude I find in Steven Pinker (see the criticism of "Enlightened Now" and "How the Mind Works").

4. Some Unneeded Evolutionary Psychology & Sociological Analysis

Seligman spends several pages investigating why evolution has endowed with pessimism at all.

And, later, why our society is more pessimistic than it's ever been.

Some of those reflections were good, and Seligman makes great points.
Some others felt a bit more random, and even propagandist.

Says Seligman:

> More "primitive" societies go out of their way to nurture the individual when loss occurs, and thus prevent helplessness from becoming hopelessness.
> (…) When a Kaluli's pig runs away and he displays his grief over the loss, the tribe will give him another pig. Loss is recompensed by the group, and helplessness does not escalate into hopelessness.

This is nonsense.

It sounds like Seligman might be on the left-wing of the political spectrum. And even if he isn't, he fell for the typical noble savage idealism that many left-wing folks fall prey to.
The truth is that primitive societies can be as ruthless and selfish as our modern societies are. Often more, since they're fighting for their lives and have little surplus (see Pinker, 2018).

Overall, I thought the book could have been even better without those off-topics analyses. Those theses, deprived of evidence, only took some authority away.

5. Are Pessimists Wiser... Or Not?

In "Authentic Happiness" Seligman says that it might not true that pessimists might be wiser, after all.

But here he said that:

> There is considerable evidence that depressed people, though sadder, are wiser.
> These have been the consistent findings over the last decade.
> (…)
> Overall, then, there is clear evidence that nondepressed people distort reality in a self-serving direction and depressed people tend to see reality accurately.

So, which one is which?
I personally feel like pessimists are more realistic, but probably not as much as the evidence showed when "Learned Optimism" was written.

6. Could be briefer

"Learned Optimism" is a monument to not only Positive Psychology but to psychology in general.
But it could have been better edited, briefer, and avoided many repetitions.

PROS

- Life-changing wisdom

As I've already said, this is life-changing information.

- Learn how academia really works

Martin Seligman is very open about the true power dynamics that govern academia.

You might be disappointed at how science truly advances behind the curtains (see criticism above).
But you will certainly be more knowledgeable -and empowered- because of it.

Review

"Learned Optimism"… What a monument to personal empowerment.

Absolutely recommended.
Learning self-help from actual scientists is far better than learning it from self-help gurus.

And I must say this in spite I don't personally like the author, at least as he comes across from his own writing.

Note: Avoid the audiobook!
The audiobook is only a very shortened version and most of the narration goes to read out loud the exercises.
This summary you're reading here goes deeper than the whole audiobook, so if you want more, go for the ebook or paper book.

9 Best Positive Psychology Books

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

From all I have read so far, these are the best positive psychology books available.

This is also one of the most life-changing book lists if you are interested in being happy.

And yes, the above clarifying statement is a persuasion gimmick, since pretty much everyone wants to be happy.

Luckily, positive psychology uses no gimmicks, and it can teach you how to be happier and more fulfilled. And while being based on solid science and research.

So let's start:

Contents

- 9. The Little Book of Stoicism
- 8. The Happiness Project
- 7. Flow
- 6. Delivering Happiness
- 4. Man's Search for Meaning
- 4. Authentic Happiness
- 3. The Happiness Advantage
- 2. How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable

9. The Little Book of Stoicism

By Jonas Salzgeber
Summary | Audiobook

Yes, this is about stoicism.

So, technically, not a “positive psychology book”.
But Jonas Salzgeber hits the nail on the head when he says that much of positive psychology repeats the same things that stoicism embraced more than 2.000 years ago.

This is not to say that positive psychology simply copied, and neither it is to say that positive psychology added no value.
Positive psychology scientifically tested many of the stoics teachings and proved them right. And it codified that knowledge in actionable steps, turning them into therapies against depression, or into tools for maximum performance -or just plain happiness and optimism-.

Plus, as you might have noticed, I’m a science wonk, so no bashing of positive psychology from me.

All I’m saying is that you can also learn much of positive psychology from the greats of the past.
Plus you can learn some history, and how those greats deployed stoicism. Like Marcus Aurelius, who as the emperor of Rome never stopped seeking personal self-development.
I find it invigorating and almost magical, that you can use the same tools that the greatest emperors and philosophers of the past used in the old days, and repeat similar great feats in the present.

> Quote: Zeno (founder of Stoicism) is our friend. But truth is an even greater friend.

8. The Happiness Project

By Gretchen Rubin
Summary | Audiobook

This is a different book than all the rest.

Instead of seeking to show you what happiness or fulfillment is all about, Gretchen Rubin tries to live it in her life. She chronicles the story of how she implements one new concept every month and tries to live it out as she goes by her normal life of an urban mother in New York.

I found “The Happiness Project” to be at the same time entertaining, funny, and instructive.

> Quote: The belief that unhappiness is selfless and happiness is selfish is misguided. It’s more selfless to act happy.

7. Flow

By Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi
Summary | Ebook

"Flow" might as well be the first book of positive psychology.

And its author, Csikszentmihalyi, is as legendary as his surname is inscrutable -I must have written his name 20 times on this website and not even once was I able to do it without checking it on Google-.

Martin Seligman, one who knows a thing or two about positive psychology, described Csikszentmihalyi as the world's leading researcher on positive psychology -plus admitted to being nervous the first time he met Csikszentmihalyi-.

Truth to be told, I didn't find "Flow" to be particularly enlightening when it comes to general happiness.
It's not that it's not useful, but I find it hard to see how flow by itself could change most people's lives.
As a state, flow is very circumscribed to certain types of activities. So you probably can't build your life around "flow".

Still, "Flow" remains a staple of positive psychology.

> Quote: Most enjoyable activities are not natural; they demand an effort that initially one is reluctant to make. But once the interaction starts to provide feedback to the person's skills, it usually begins to be intrinsically rewarding.

6. Delivering Happiness

By Tony Hsieh
Summary | Audiobook

OK, we got it.
Positive psychology can make you happier, more optimistic, and more personally successful.

But could it make your business also better?

Well, Tony Hsieh tried to do just that.
He engineered his company to make both employees and customers happier. Happiness was one of his goals and KPIs.

And it turned out quite well for him.
An 800+ million exit, probably more than one billion in today's money, is nothing to scoff at.

Albeit, as positive psychology proves and as Hsieh himself says, money won't buy you happiness.

> Quote: Money alone isn't enough to bring happiness . . . happiness [is] when you're actually truly ok with losing everything you have.

4. Man's Search for Meaning

By Viktor Frankl
Summary | Audiobook

What can concentration camps teach us about human resilience, optimism, and happiness?

A lot.
It's when life is at its most difficult, that positive psychology has the most to teach.
And when you know you can be OK at your worst, you know you that you have reached ultimate control, and ultimate power. Or, simply ultimate life enjoyment.

> Quote: Everything can be taken from a man but one thing: the last of the human freedoms—to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way.

4. Authentic Happiness

By Martin Seligman
Summary | Audiobook

Martin Seligman pioneered the research on learned helplessness.
From there, and thanks to an initially harrowing feedback from John Teasdale, he branched out to explanatory styles, fighting depression, and “learning optimism”.

In “Authentic Happiness” Seligman goes wider than optimism or even just “happiness”.
He focuses on meaningful lives and full lives. “Full lives” include a deeper meaning for that life, working while leveraging one’s strengths and skills, and the enjoyment of pleasures.

If you’re interested in living full lives, this book is for you.

> Quote: Authentic happiness derives from raising the bar for yourself, not rating yourself against others.

3. The Happiness Advantage

By Shawn Achor
Summary | Audiobook

Albeit Shawn Achor might be the only non-psychologist in this list of best positive psychology books, “The Happiness Advantage” deserves high praise.

What Achor does, and well, is what scientists are often reluctant to do: compiling in one single book all the most important findings and techniques, rather than just focusing on their own research -or talking up their work, Martin Seligman, I’m looking at you-.
Plus, presenting them in a way that is as practical as possible.

But Achor doesn’t stop here, and he also advances an important hypothesis: it’s not success that gives us happiness. It’s the other way around. It’s happiness that leads to success.

> Quote: Happiness is not the belief that we don’t need to change; it is the realization that we can

2. How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable

By Albert Ellis
Summary | Audiobook

The best book I have ever read on therapy (and self-therapy).

Ellis discusses and teaches REBT, which is a form of cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT).
The wisdom in this book can make you happier, more effective, as well as more emotionally in control of yourself.

And it can also help you to heal childhood wounds while skipping long, time-consuming, and expensive psychoanalysis.
I can vouch for it: it certainly did help me to overcome some smaller issues I had from childhood.

Highly recomended.

> Quote: How, then, do I become an incompetent or bad person?”
> “You don’t! When you do incompetent or evil acts, you become a person who acted badly—never a bad person.

1. Learned Optimism

By Martin Seligman
Summary | Audiobook

Seligman, again.

But let me come clean first:

I don't like Martin Seligman's personality as it transpires from his writing.
He strikes me as self-absorbed, narcissistic, reactionary, and even blindly patriotic and militarist.
Not good for a scientist.

But his work… That is good.

"Learned Optimism" is a classic by now.
And albeit like most classics it has seen some water go by under the bridge, it remains as good as ever.

"Learned Optimism" is optimism for intelligent folks.
It's optimism for people with critical thinking skills, and people who want to maintain the ability to set optimism aside and stare naked at the truths of life.

And you can do exactly that.
As Seligman explains, "learned optimism" is different than simple positive thinking. Learned optimism is based and grounded on reality.

I paraphrase him from another book of his:

> Positive thinking is about upbeat statements such as "Every day, in every way, I'm getting better and better" in the absence or in the face of contrary evidence. (…) Many educated people, trained in skeptical thinking, cannot manage this kind of boosterism. Learned optimism, in contrast, is about accuracy.

Optimism indeed is nothing but a pattern of thoughts, and you can choose whether and when to adopt them.
Sometimes, when you want to take a critical and deep assessment, or when you need to make critical decisions, you want to avoid too much optimism and you want to think and analyze more like a pessimist.
But all the other times, you can choose to think and live more like an optimist.

And to me, that's tremendously empowering.

Yet, I still recommend you go with the first and original.

Positive Psychology: Overview

Positive psychology is what most people are after in life: happiness and fulfillment.

Yet, for some of us driven folks, happiness can sometimes fall on the wayside.
We think we weren't born for happiness, but to pursue and achieve stuff.

And that's where positive psychology can open a new world for us driven people: you can be both happy and driven.

As a matter of fact, happiness, and optimism even more so, will likely increase the chance you will ever experience objective success.

Optimists also make for better leaders, more charismatic leaders, and, incidentally, also win more elections (far more).

Overview

- Some psychopathic traits, at the right time, can help you succeed, without harming others like some psychopaths do
- Psychopathy ranges on a scale
- Too much psychopathy is harmful to the individual, and to society

Notes

About the Author:
Kevin Dutton is a British psychologist, author, and researcher. He gained his Ph.D. from the University of Essex and worked as a research fellow at the Faraday Institute, St Edmund's College, and the University of Cambridge. At the time of writing, he is a research fellow at the Department of Experimental Psychology, University of Oxford.

He is also the author of "The Good Psychopath's Guide".

Psychopathy is Good In Small Doses

The central thesis of "The Wisdom of Psychopaths" is this:

"High doses" of psychopathy are unhealthy both for society and for the individual.
But, "psychopathy in smaller doses" helps individuals achieve more and get things done. And it can also be good for society.

Says Dutton:

> Psychopathy is like sunlight. Overexposure can hasten one's demise in grotesque, carcinogenic fashion. But regulated exposure at controlled and optimal levels can have a significant positive impact on well-being and quality of life.

Basically, this is the law of balance applied to psychopathy.
We agree with it and highly recommend this article understand the general concept:

> The Law of Optimum Balance

#1. Walk Confidently: Psychopaths Can Spot Easy Victims By Their Gait

How you walk says a lot about you.

Apparently, it also says a lot about how likely you are to be a victim of crime.
Research by Angela Book found out that psychopaths were indeed more likely than psychopath inmates were more likely than non-psychopaths to assess personal vulnerability.
The same was true for undergraduate students when divided between in high in psychopathy traits and low in psychopathy traits. The difference was that the students didn't know why they could guess it right, while the inmates knew exactly it was because it was of the way people walked.

Lucio's Note: How to Walk High Power

I found the description of what makes for a submissive walk according to the study:

- Slower walking speed
- Shorter strides
- Asynchronous movements

Raj Persaud also includes in vulnerable body language patterns of eye contact, body posture -more closed off-, and body gestures -smaller or more subtle gestures-.

Also read:

- Signs of submissiveness
- Speech patterns of submissiveness
- High power walk

> How to Walk Sexy & Confident: Men's Guide (W/ Videos)

But Normal People Can Also Detect Psychopaths (?)

On the other hand, neurotypicals -as non-psychopaths are sometimes referred to-, are equally good at spotting psychopaths.

Research by Reid Meloy found out that 77% of mental health and criminal justice professionals who interviewed psychopathic subjects reported a physical reaction to the psychopath's presence.

Female subjects were more likely to notice the difference than males.

My Note: But those people knew they were interviewing psychopaths
The study is not very telling of the general population because it seems like those interviewers knew they were interviewing psychopaths.
Dutton goes on to weave his theory that women learned to spot psychopaths more than men do because they're more vulnerable. It might be, but I'm always skeptical of ad-hoc evolutionary psychology theories.

Psychopathy Ranges on A Scale of Different Traits

Psychopathy is a spectrum disorder.

That means that, on a psychopathy scale, you score on a continuum. There is a minimum threshold to be considered a psychopath, but you can still score high on the scale without being a "full-blown psychopath".

Furthermore, since many traits are being measured, one can score around the middle of the psychopathy scale but still score very high on certain specific traits.

Says Dutton:

> One individual, for example, may be ice-cold under pressure, and display about as much empathy as an avalanche (we'll be meeting some like this on the trading floor later), and yet at the same time act neither violently, nor antisocially, nor without conscience. Scoring high on two psychopathic attributes, such an individual may rightly be considered further along the psychopathic spectrum than someone scoring lower on that dyad of traits, yet still not be anywhere near the Chianti-swilling danger zone of a person scoring high on all of them.

Certain Psychopathic Traits Can Be Helpful In Life

Continuing on the argument that some psychopathic traits can be useful in life, Dutton says:

> Think of psychopathic traits as the dials and sliders on a studio mixing desk.
> If you push all of them to max, you'll have a sound track that's no use to anyone. But if the sound track is graded and some controls are turned up higher than others—such as fearlessness, focus, lack of empathy, and mental toughness, for example—you may well have a surgeon who's a cut above the rest.

Psychopaths Are More Likely to Victimize You, But Also to Save You (???)

The second biggest thesis in Dutton's book is this:

psychopaths are more likely to victimize you, but they are also more likely to rescue you when you're in trouble.

I quote him:

> But what if I was to paint you a different picture?
> What if I was to tell you that the arsonist who burns your house down might also, in a parallel universe, be the hero most likely to brave the flaming timbers of a crumbling, blazing building to seek out, and drag out, your loved ones?

Dutton seems to have little doubt on his own thesis, adding:

> Claims like these are admittedly hard to believe. But they're true.

But I haven't seen convincing evidence so far that they are indeed true (see the note on "criticism").

#2. Don't Let Empathy Stop You from Pursuing Good Goals

However, there are situations when a psychopath's lack of conscience might more readily save people.

It seemed to me like these decisions all end up involving "collateral damage" whereby to save someone you must kill or sacrifice someone else.

For example, if you had to personally kill someone to save five, a psychopath might more readily kill that single person.
Naturally, people with a conscience will balk at killing anyone. Psychopaths, without a conscience, have fewer problems in thinking in purely utilitarian terms.

Let's dig a bit deeper:

When Emotional Empathy "Gets in The Way": Utilitarian Problems

Dutton says there are two types of empathy: "hot" and "cold".

My Note: There is also emotional empathy and cognitive empathy
Emotional empathy is what allows people to form emotional bonds with others. Cognitive empathy is to simply understand what's going on in someone's mind. Psychopathy researcher James Fallon says that psychopaths can be good at the latter, but do not have the former.

The author refers to Joshua Greene's Dual Process Theory, similar to Daniel Kahneman's "system 1 and system 2" theory of mental processes.

The first type of empathy is immediate, easy, and automatically applied to most life situations (deontological).
The second type instead requires more conscious thinking and deliberation because it involves trade-offs and, potentially, collateral damage (utilitarian).

A typical example involving the second type of moral judgment is the trolley problem.
The first class of trolley problems says you can save 5 people but kill 1 if you pull a switch that will change the trolley's direction:

Many people here struggle but ultimately say they would pull the lever (even though an experiment shows that in practice, few did).

In the second version though to save the 5 people the subject should push a man over the tracks:

And here it gets dicey for conscientious people. They would be killing someone with more direct action on their part, actively pushing and touching someone.
While most people would pull the lever in problem 1, most people would not push the fat man off the bridge.

Since psychopaths have no conscience and little emotions, it's in this second variant that they, far more than neurotypicals, are willing to sacrifice one person to save many.
Thus, in trolley-like problems and purely from a utilitarian point of view, psychopaths can act for the greater good more than neurotypicals can.

Says Dutton:

> Quite unlike normal people, they also make pretty short work of case 2. Psychopaths, without batting an eye, are perfectly happy to chuck the fat guy over the side

Trolley problems are processed in different parts of the brain depending on how active someone must be to save -or sacrifice- others.
Joshua Greene's first experiment of this kind showed that "impersonal" dilemmas -such as diverting the trolley with a switch- preferentially engaged regions associated with controlled reasoning, while "personal" dilemmas -pushing a man off the footbridge- preferentially engage brain regions associated with emotion.

In the brain, neurotypicals and psychopaths react differently.

Says Dutton:

> This difference in behavior is mirrored, rather distinctly, in the brain. The pattern of neural activation in both psychopaths and normal people is pretty well matched on the presentation of impersonal moral dilemmas—but dramatically diverges when things start to get a bit more personal.

But what does this tell us?

Overall, it's true that psychopaths are more in line with utilitarian judgment (Kahane, Guy et al., 2017).
But the trolley experiments do not lead to the conclusion that psychopaths are generally more altruistic, of course.
Probably, the opposite is true.
Continue Guy et al.:

> So, while psychopaths may be more willing to push someone off a footbridge to save five others (or be less shocked by support for infanticide or euthanasia), it would be surprising if these same psychopaths signed up to join an Effective Altruism Club or showed care for the plight of strangers in the developing world.

Finally, trolley problems are certainly extremely interesting and tell us a lot about human psychology and behavior.
But… How likely are real-life situations to reproduce this scenario?
It's an interesting thought experiment.
How often are you likely to encounter similar situations in real life?
Trolley experiments have indeed received some valid criticism about both their usefulness and predictive power in real-life situations (see here and here, for example).

#3. Polish Your Presence: The Psychopathic Traits Help to Achieve Business Success

Do some psychopathy traits help people climb the corporate ladder?

The idea is not new, and it's already been proposed several times.
See for example Snakes in Suit, by two esteemed psychopathy experts such as Hare and Babiak.

Dutton here quotes a study by Board and Fritzon called "Disordered personalities at work".
Says Dutton:

> A number of psychopathic attributes were actually more common in business leaders than in so-called disturbed criminals—attributes such as superficial charm, egocentricity, persuasiveness, lack of empathy, independence, and focus—and that the main difference between the groups was in the more "antisocial" aspects of the syndrome: the criminals' lawbreaking, physical aggression, and impulsivity

The study had a small sample, just 39, but it indeed confirms Dutton's theory that the presence of some psychopathic traits, in the right doses, can help people climb the corporate ladder.

Furthermore, there is Robert Hare's survey.
In 2010 Robert Hare handed out the PCL-R to 203 top US business executives and compared the results with the general population.
In Dutton's words:

> Not only did the business execs come out ahead, but psychopathy was positively associated with in-house ratings of charisma and presentation style: creativity, good strategic thinking, and excellent communication skills.

However, what Dutton doesn't say, is that those business execs high in psychopathy weren't exactly all-around star performers.
Here is an excerpt from that same study:

> Perhaps the most dramatic results of this study had to do with how the corporation viewed individuals with many psychopathic traits. That is, high psychopathy total scores were associated with perceptions of good communication skills, strategic thinking, and creative/innovative ability and, at the same time, with poor management style, failure to act as a team player, and poor performance appraisals (as rated by their immediate bosses). These latter associations were rather strong. It is noteworthy that, in Still, Dutton's point remains: those individuals high in psychopathy did make it through the ranks.

Indeed, adds Babiak:

> It is easy to mistake psychopathic traits for specific leadership traits. For example, charm and grandiosity can be mistaken for self-confidence or a charismatic leadership style; likewise, good presentation communications, and impression management skills reinforce the same picture.

> The psychopath's ability to manipulate can look like good influence and persuasion skills, the mark of an effective leader.

#4. Develop Coolness Under Fire: Useful for Extreme Jobs and Situations

Coolness in stressful situations is one of the traits Sutton talks up the most.

He says Neil Armstrong in his moon landing was cool under pressure and luckily saved the moon-landing mission because of it.

But the same trait is helpful for surgeons, military operatives and, as well, bomb-disposal operatives.
Ramachan found out that the most decorated subjects maintained a lower cardiac rate when making difficult discriminations under threat of shock.

#5. Work On Total Focus and Consciousness: Great for High-Intensity Work

Dutton seems to imply that psychopaths have a stronger ability to focus 100% on a task while shutting down everything else happening around.

He draws parallels between Buddhist monks trained in meditation and mental control, and psychopaths.

This ability becomes all the more important when in the face of external danger and threats.

Going back to the study of bomb-disposal operative, he says:

> Whereas the heart rates of all the operatives remained stable, something quite incredible happened with the ones who'd been decorated. Their heart rates actually went down. As soon as they entered the danger zone (or the "launch pad," as one guy I spoke with put it), they assumed a state of cold, meditative focus: a mezzanine level of consciousness in which they became one with the device they were working on.

in general, I'm not convinced this is a trait that could be considered "psychopathic".
What Dutton seems to be describing here is Flow, as researched by Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi.

But he might have a point on reaching flow in extreme situations in which external threats might interrupt most people's focus and concentration.

The Dark Side of "Coolness": Profiling The Batterers

Famed relationship researcher John Gottman profiled two types of batterers.

One gets more excited and emotional while battering (pit bulls), while the other becomes cooler before assaulting (cobras).
He calls them “cobras” and “pit bulls”.

The way Sutton describes them, the cobras are the psychopaths.

Here are the differences:

COBRA	PIT BULL
Displays violence toward others	Usually only violent toward partner
Feels little remorse	Shows some level of guilt
Motivated by immediate gratification	Motivated by fear of abandonment
Able to let go and move on	Obsessive; often stalks victim
Feels superior	Adopts the role of “victim”
Fast talker; spins a story for police	Greater emotional lability
Charming and charismatic	Depressed and introverted
Control means “not being told what to do”	Control means “constant monitoring of partner” (see: too jealous boyfriend)
Traumatic upbringing; violence prevalent in family	Some degree of violence in family background
Impermeable to therapeutic intervention	Sometimes benefits from treatment programs
Manipulative: partner less likely to leave	Partner more likely to leave
Antisocial: 90%	Antisocial: 33%

And this is how they differ in the use of violence:

COBRA	PIT BULL
Violence: more severe	Violence: less severe
Use of closed-fist / strangling: 91%	Use of closed-fist / strangling: 62%
Threatened partner with knife or gun: 38%	Threatened partner with knife or gun: 4%
Actual use of knife or gun: 9%	Actual use of knife or gun: 0%
Violence outisde relationship: 44%	Violence outside the relationship: 3%

This is also the type of information that makes Dutton’s position on the “good” in psychopathy more difficult to sustain.

Psychopathy Is Extreme, And Cuts Both Ways

Dutton says that psychopathy is about excesses.

It can be helpful in reaching higher highs, both in terms of personal success and pro-sociality, and it can drag you to lower lows, both in terms of personal success and pro-sociality.

Through an analogy with sports cars, he says:

> A powerful sports car is neither a good thing nor a bad thing in and of itself, but depends on the person who’s sitting behind the wheel. It may, for instance, permit a skilled and experienced motorist to get his wife to the hospital in time to give birth to their child. Or, in a parallel universe, run an eighteen-year-old and his girlfriend off a cliff.
> Psychopathy really is like a high-performance sports car. It’s a double-edged sword that inevitably cuts both > ways.

I'm not contending that some of the psychopathic traits can be used for good.
Of course, they can.

My question though is:

What's the likelihood of either those options happening, when we're talking about an actual psychopath?

What's the likelihood that the "psychopathic sports car" will be used for pro-social acts, and what's the likelihood that it will be used to trample on others?

That's the question that Dutton never answers.

#6. Learn to Be Emotionless for Your Investment Decisions: Psychopath's Make Good Traders

On this website, we saw several times that humans can behave irrationally in ultimatum games.

Such as, when one player offers to split a sum of money "unfairly" many players will reject the offer even when rejecting the offer means they will get nothing.
Instead, as shown by Ohira's research at Nagoya University, psychopaths are not bothered by small offers and accept them anyway.

Dutton also interviews some hedge fund managers high in psychopathy. One of them says that they can only beat the market during crashes, because everyone else is panicking.
Another one says that the most important trait of a good trader is coolness and detachment. The great traders, at the end of the day, you wouldn't be able to say if they made a billion or if they lost it all.

#7. Develop a Ruthless Reputation: Psychopathic Traits Can Be Helpful in Jail...

In a title reminiscent of one of the 48 Laws of Power, Dutton writes:

> To Get to the Top, Send Your Reputation Up Ahead of You

Using the "Aryan Brotherhood" as an example, he describes how in prison a reputation for ruthlessness can pay off.

As Baumeister also said in "Evil", a reputation for being a ruthless fighter will lead to fewer challengers -and fights-.

... And Moderate Psychopathy Can Be Helpful Not to Get Caught At All

Aharoni and Kiehl asked 307 incarcerated psychopaths to confidentially report the crimes for which they were caught and the ones for which they were not caught.

The result was that "the greatest criminal success was associated with moderate to high psychopathy scores, particularly for violent crimes".

However, adds Dutton:

> A very high dose of psychopathy (all the dials turned up to max) is as bad as a very low one. Instead, it's moderate levels that code for greater "accomplishment."

The survey seems to sustain Dutton's hypothesis.
Personally, though I wouldn't lend too much credibility to a survey based on self-reported data, from a relatively small sample size.

The Formula to Become a "Functional Psychopath"

Dutton interviews James Blair and asks him if "it pays to be a psychopath".

Blair replies:

> It's a dangerous road to go down. "It's true that if bad things are happening the individual with psychopathy might be less worried about it.
> However, it's not so clear that their decision making in such situations would be particularly good. By not analyzing levels of threat appropriately, they might walk into danger, rather than away from it.

So Dutton chances his equation to:

> Functional Psychopath = Psychopath – Poor Decision Making

Then asks the same question to Kent Kiehl, author of "The Psychopath Whisperer", who replies:

> It makes sense that psychopathic traits are normally distributed across the general population.
> But the difference with those at the high end of the spectrum is that they can't switch off [the fearlessness] in situations where it might be appropriate. A CEO might be non-risk-averse in certain areas of business, but probably wouldn't want to walk around a rough neighborhood at night. A psychopath isn't able to make that distinction. With a psychopath, it's all or nothing.

So Dutton further adjusts his equation:

> Functional Psychopath = (Psychopath – Poor Decision Making) / Context

The 7 Traits to Borrow From Psychopaths

Dutton calls these the "seven deadly wins":

1. Ruthlessness
2. Charm
3. Focus
4. Mental toughness
5. Fearlessness
6. Mindfulness
7. Action

But you can't just borrow them or work to increase them and expect success.
The usefulness of each one of them lays deeply in the context.

The power in each one of them is context and modularity, using them when needed, and then reverting back to a more "normal" you.

More Wisdom

- Psychopathic "high-risk/high-reward" leads to many losers and some winners. and that's why they're stable: some experiments of game theory, which in truth were very simplified versions of reality, show that a strategy of "risking it all" and cheating produces lots of failures and deaths, but also some successful survivors which keeps the population stable at around 1-2%

- Dark triad traits can lead to more sexual partners: men with dark triad traits tend to have more sexual partners. But that's also because they seek more sexual partners, while more secure men are happy to eventually stop with one partner. Also see: the psychopath's sexual strategies, and: do psychopaths get laid more?
- Make them share something personal, then interrupt them right away, and tell them later what they've just told you: a technique of dark psychology is to make you open up and share something, then quickly change the subject, then, later on, tell you what you told them as if it also happened to them. Also see: Machiavellian fake self-disclosure
- Psychopaths can be good at faking emotions and very good at lying
- Psychopaths are extremely drawn to rewards: it's not just that psychopaths aren't afraid of punishment. That doesn't predict violence. The other side of the coin is also true: psychopaths are particularly attracted to (immediate) pleasure and rewards
- Psychopaths have "cognitive empathy" and can recognize emotions (and might be good at it): Dutton says that one experiment shows that psychopaths don't feel what it's like to have a certain emotion, but recognize it when they see it. This is cognitive empathy as opposed to emotional empathy, which allows to bond and connect with others
- In prisons psychopaths are less unpredictable than psychotics: Psychopathic violence is predominantly instrumental, a direct means to a specific end. It's on the psychotic wards that things are less predictable. I once went out with a psychotic woman

Criticism

I enjoyed "The Wisdom of Psychopaths", and it's an important book for this website's philosophy (ie.: to be good, you must know how to be bad).

At the same time, there are some important issues one needs to discuss:

1. Adaptiveness Is Less About 'Moderation' And More About Calibration

Dutton's argument relies on an 'optimum balance' of psychopathic traits, and partially on which traits to modulate (respectively, the subclinical and multiprocess model of successful psychopathy).

Regarding the former, Benning, Venables, and Hall write in The Handbook of Psychopathy:

> empirical work suggests that successful psychopathy involves the presence of adaptive attributes rather than just lower pathological tendencies

Besides balance and trait-dependence, at TPM we also highlight the crucial importance of contextual calibration.

In some situations, very high fearlessness can be adaptive.
In other situations when you must think long-term and survive, zero fearlessness and high inhibition may be adaptive.

We teach these nuances in Power University.

2. Lack of Conscience: The Big Trait That Slipped Through

Conscience and guilt are defining traits that differentiate psychopaths from neurotypicals.

Martha Stout, author of "The Sociopath Next Door", wrote in her critical review:

> Nowhere in this book about psychopathy does Dutton accurately define psychopathy, so I will do so here. Psychopathy is a disorder of brain and behavior, the central characteristic of which is the complete > absence of conscience. All of its other pathological features emanate from this defining deficit (including callousness, habitual lying, and ruthlessness).

Stout goes on saying:

> Dutton does not once discuss the concept of conscience, and, in the entire body of his book he mentions the word itself—conscience—a total of four times, and then only in passing.

I'm not sure if Stout was reading a different version of the book.
In mine, to be fair, Dutton does mention conscience as a defining trait of psychopathy.
I quote Dutton verbatim:

> I suddenly get a flash of insight.
> But the most fundamental difference between one individual and another must surely be that of the presence, or absence, of conscience. Conscience is what hurts when everything else feels good.

So, yes, Dutton does acknowledge that conscience is the main difference between psychopaths and non-psychopaths -albeit it feels strange that an expert on psychopathy says it dawned on him as a "sudden flash of insight"-.

Still, Stout's criticism is fair.
Conscience is a crucial aspect that Dutton should have probably expanded more on, including how adaptive/maladaptive it is, and the costs of not having one.

Robert Hare Had More Positively Feedback

Robert Hare, author of "Without a Conscience" and "Snake in Suits", and one of the world's experts on psychopathy, is equally strong when warning people about the social dangers of psychopathy.

Yet, he provided a public review and praise of Dutton's book.

3. Are Psychopaths Really More Likely to Help, and Be Heroes?

Dutton suggests that psychopaths are more likely to perform heroic actions.

Martha Stout instead says:

> Really?
> Why an individual who feels neither conscience nor caring would wish to save another's life is difficult to imagine, (…) and reveals an essential misunderstanding of the nature of the predator

I tend to agree with Stout here.
I asked a psychopath if they would endanger their lives to save someone else, and the answer was a resounding "no".
I asked again on Quora though, and this time the answers were more mixed, ranging from "yes, it's more likely", to "it depends", to "it's laughable, I'd never risk my life to save others".

- Profiling of a sexual predator: a psychopath reveals his sexual strategy

> Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

4. Some Questions About The Sources

- The "Great British Psychopath Survey"

This is a survey Dutton hosted on his personal website, and it was anonymous.

Lindsay Abrams over at The Atlantic asked Dutton about it, and Dutton said he received about 5,500 responses. No information about it, and no data is retrievable. The website "Wisdomofpsychopaths.com", which also later hosted a "Great American Psychopath Survey", redirects to Dutton's website.

Edit: I later found a picture from web.archive (thanks to Richard Smith):

An interesting survey with some interesting, if quirky results. But more for fun, it's not scientific.

- Psychopathy levels of US presidents

The analyses of the psychopathy level of US presidents are based on what the biographers of those presidents answered. It's still an interesting result, for sure, but not a very scientific one.

- Dutton's research psychopath's ability to identify guilty individuals

Some other studies had small samples. Dutton's own study, for example, had just 30 students. He goes on analyzing that study saying:

> The results were extraordinary. Over 70 percent of those who scored high on the Self-Report Psychopathy Scale correctly picked out the handkerchief-smuggling associate, compared to just 30 percent of the low scorers.

But if you take "those who scored high on the Self-Report Psychopathy Scale", which is a subset of the total, then you come up with an even smaller number. So saying that "over 70% of those who…" was probably the equivalent of saying "4 or 5 of them". Dutton never mentions that this was a low-powered study, which does not help to lend credibility to the book.

Some Research Felt a Bit 'Massaged'

As we reviewed above, "The Wisdom of Psychopath" makes it seem as if psychopaths are more prone to act in a utilitarian way and for the greater good. But, as we reviewed, in practical life those utilitarian situations rarely if ever emerge.

And high-psychopathy individuals in business weren't exactly all-around star performers one might glean by just reading "The Wisdom of Psychopaths".

Similarly, a study that purposefully "proves" that psychopaths make better financial decisions under certain circumstances did in a situation that's unlikely to take place in real life. The game concocted for the experiment provided a gain of $2.5 for each coin toss win against a loss of just $1. Psychopaths played more and won more. But… How likely are you to see those a house consistently stacked on your side in real life?

5. Psychopathic Traits Can Be Used For Good, But Will Psychopaths Do So? Let's Not Be Naive...

There are no doubts that one can use some traits common among psychopaths for good causes.

Fearlessness, calmness under stress, and the ability to move on can be used for a successful life and for helping others.
Of course they can.

But Dutton seems to suggest that psychopaths are as likely to use them for good, as they are of using them for bad.

And I don't think that's true at all.
Actual psychopaths are far more likely to use their signature traits for their personal good only. And they are probably far more likely to use their skills for harming others, than for helping them.

It's this crucial and basic understanding of psychopaths that's missing in Dutton's "The Wisdom of Psychopaths". And this is what irked many reviewers.

5. Psychopathic Sources Shouldn't Be Taken As Reliable

If you research some psychopathic writers as I've done, you will notice that they often have some crazy stories in which they often turn out to be the heroes.

Whether that story was true or not, well… Who can say?

Here is one such story Dutton shares in "The Wisdom of Psychopaths" from one of his interviewees:

> Tom tells me a story. One night, a few years ago, he's heading back to his apartment after watching Saw. Suddenly, out of a doorway, a guy with a blade appears. His girlfriend is terrified and starts hyperventilating. But Tom, ahem, calmly disarms the guy and sends him packing.

Sounds strange like a scene of a movie, doesn't it?
And it strangely seems to happen to psychopaths fare more often than to most normal people…

Nonsense "Preparation" for War With Slagging: Another Psycho Story

Interviewing a supposed psychopath in the British special forces, he says:

> "So, in the regiment, everything's fair game. The slagging is purely functional. It's an efficient way of building up psychological immunity. It inoculates you against the kind of shit they can throw at you if you're captured.

How does that help?

He keeps going:

> if [your captors are] any good, they'll start to look for weaknesses. They'll look for the tiniest of reactions that might give away your true mental state. And if they find anything, then take it from me: that's that, mate. It's game over. Put it this way. If you've got a problem with the size of your dick, an Iraqi interrogation suite probably isn't the best place to find out.

I don't see how banter in the regiment can prepare you for being a captive, frankly. And if the captors decide to extract secrets, they probably won't do it by teasing you on the size of your member.

Quotes

On heroism, quoting Philip Zimbardo:

> The decision to act heroically is a choice that many of us will be called upon to make at some point in our lives.
> It means not being afraid of what others might think. It means not being afraid of the fallout for ourselves. It means not being afraid of putting our necks on the line. The question is: Are we going to make that decision?"

PROS

- A wake-up call on success?

In the face of some self-help books that only see success as the realm of "good people" who "help others", this book can be an eye-opener.

- Consulted with top scientists

Dutton has spoken with an impressive number of academic heavyweights for this book, including Steven Pinker, psychopathy expert Kent Kiehl, Robert Hare, and Philip Zimbardo, just to name a few.

Review

The Wisdom of Psychopaths is a good book with a provocative concept we'd generally agree with, but that needs more nuance to be a rigorous scientific reference and more practical refinement to be useful to top 1% men.

On the plus side, this is an important book for this website, reinforcing the notion that "to be good, you have to know how to be bad".

We agree that some psychopathic traits can be useful for personal success, without necessarily harming others. And sometimes, those traits might also be used for the greater good.

Lucio Buffalmano · 19 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The myth of Emotional Intelligence (EI) states that the more empathic, self-aware, and relationally skilled you are, the greater your career success will be. This belief has flooded the pop psychology literature and business world, but does the data actually support it?

This article contends that EI helps you only up to a certain point.
Our analysis, using corporate data and psychological research, reveals a shocking truth: If you want to reach the executive level, emotional intelligence—especially high empathy and focus on relationships—can actually be harmful.

What truly wins at the top are traits like Power* Intelligence and Machiavellianism. Here, we debunk the EI myth and show you the strategic skills that ruthless executives actually use to get promoted

What's Emotional Intelligence

Emotional intelligence (EI), measured as "emotional quotient" (EQ), is an umbrella term that could be loosely defined as:

> The capacity to be aware, control, and appropriately express one's emotions, to understand other people's emotions, and to empathetically handle interpersonal relationships.

Daniel Goleman, who popularized the term, divides emotional intelligence into four components:

- Self-awareness (personal competence 1)
- Self-management (personal competence 2)
- Social awareness (social competence 1)
- Relationship management (social competence 2)

The first two elements of personal competence refer to being aware of your emotions and managing your behavior. The second two elements are where the definition of EI loses value since it can encompass everything, including ruthless calculativeness. However, as it's sometimes understood, social competence excludes the calculative and ruthless aspects to focus instead on 'applied empathy'. Understanding other people's feelings, moods, and behavior to improve the quality of your relationships.

Obviously, those competencies are important.
But how important are they when it comes to career progression, compared to other skills?

The Myth of Emotional Intelligence

This quote made "emotional intelligence" popular:

> As much as 80% of adult "success" comes from EQ

That was Daniel Goleman.
Since then, emotional intelligence entered the collective imagination, more supporting "evidence" emerged, and seminars teaching emotional intelligence have sprung up around the globe.

Goleman, in his sequel book "Working With Emotional Intelligence" (review removed) restates that IQ does not determine career success, but EQ does.

Travis Bradberry in his book "Emotional Intelligence 2.0" and in this Forbes article says that EQ predicts salary, and that a "one-point increase in EQ leads to an increase of 1.300 dollars of annual salary" (which doesn't make sense by the way, because it cannot be a linear progression to infinity).

But is it really true?

Empathic Nice Guys Might Not Finish Last, But Stuck in The Middle

In brief:

From all the evidence I have gathered, it's not true that emotional intelligence is a key contributor to career success.

It matters, in a way, yes, but it's not a linear progression.
It doesn't help you in all types of jobs and, most importantly, it doesn't seem like it helps you reach the top.

One single chart, plotting the EQ results by job titles, should suffice to put the theory to rest:

Data from Travis Bradberry, “Emotional Intelligence 2.0”
Bradberry computed the results of his emotional intelligence survey from more than 100.000 individuals, across multiple industries, and on five continents.
Plus, Bradberry is one of the pundits for emotional intelligence, selling emotional intelligence training. That means: Bradberry’s interests are in direct contrast to what his own survey shows (so big kudos to him for releasing discordant data).
Both the numbers and the inverse conflict of interest make the results very telling, in my opinion.

And the results say that emotional intelligence is only high up until mid-level management.

Bradberry, in this Harvard Business Review article poignantly titled “heartless bosses”, asks:

> How could it be that the very people who need emotional intelligence the most seem to have it the least?

Well, to me, an obvious reason looms in the distance: because, it seems, you don’t need a high EQ to be promoted to the executives rank.

What does the author of the original survey have to say about it?
In this article, Bradberry acknowledges that executives might have lower EQ because their job “erodes” EQ, and because companies don’t take EQ into account when deciding who to promote.

Maybe.
My answer is somewhat different.

It’s not that CEOs are (necessarily) emotionally stupid. They probably aren’t. But they just have different priorities. CEOs are more concerned with power, winning, and getting things done than with what helps you score high in emotional intelligence -things such as understanding what others feel, protecting people’s egos, nurturing relationships, and “social harmony”-.

CEOs are able to doggedly pursue their goals, independently of what others think and feel. CEOs aren’t too touchy, and they don’t care if others get offended.
Those traits make your EI score tick downward.

Machiavellianism is also correlated with lower results on EI tests when you remove the possibility for manipulation and strategic self-interest (Bereckzei, 2017).
But, at work, both Machiavellianism and the hard-charging attitude help you move upward.
Says psychologist George Simon in his best-selling book "In Sheep's Clothing":

> CEOs most often have inflated self-esteem (…) and are undetered by adverse consequences or societal condemnation.

Simon is basically saying that a thick-skin and feeling great no matter what others say or think is a trait that, albeit potentially anti-social, helps you advance in life.
This is the equivalent of dialing empathy down, not up.

So, if being able to dial down one's own empathy and sensitivity is useful, might it be possible that not having empathy and sensitivity at all could be an advantage?

Well, there is indeed much evidence to suggest that the opposite of empathy and emotional intelligence can help you get to the top.
Enter, the psychopath, the individual with no empathy and no conscience.

The Scarier Truth: Psychopathy Might Beat Empathy

Jon Moulton is a successful private equity investor.

Asked by the Financial Times what his 3 best features are, he replied (italic is mine):

> Determination, curiosity and insensitivity

Why insensitivity?
Moulton says that insensitivity "lets you sleep when others can't".

That doesn't sound like a man high in empathy, does it?
It sounds much closer to psychopathy than to an empathic leader.

I witnessed similar examples.
Of the ones I can share here, I once had a CEO who said we'd "throw bodies at the operations department" -he loved repeating that in his previous company he handled the breakneck speed of growth by "throwing bodies at operations."
The venture was going to be a slam dunk, he loved repeating (grandiose view of self), and the prospects who didn't want to work with us were "stupid" (demeaning towards others).

Another founder, a speed metal singer who told me he fancied himself a "warrior", invited me to pre-launch meetings with the goal of wooing me in. How did this one refer to the guys running operational tasks in his future business?
"Monkeys".
And had the same braggart, grandiose sense of impending, easy victory as the previous example. His company was going to be raking in money, and for the easy task of actually getting the work done, "we'll just hire monkeys" (I left in mild disgust that day and never saw him again).

The Goldwater rule says you shouldn't diagnose people whom you haven't professionally examined. But if I had to bet money, I'd bet that those two would score quite high in psychopathy.

This should not be a shocker to anyone in the social sciences.
The idea that psychopathy -or certain traits of psychopathy- can help individuals climb hierarchical organizations and acquire power is nothing new in the field (Dutton, 2012; Hare & Babiak, 2006)

Data and evidence are not forthcoming in this field. We can understand why: few business leaders would be happy to be measured and identified as high in psychopathy.
But some data does exist, and it points to interesting conclusions.
Babiak and Hare administered the psychopathy checklist to a group of 203 American business executives.

The results?

While the median psychopathy score was not high, the prevalence of psychopathic traits among business executives was far higher than among the general population.
3.9% of the business executives had a score of 30 or higher, which is the minimum threshold to be clinically considered a psychopath. That means that there were 2 to 3 times more psychopaths among the business executives than in the normal population (that's a lot).

And we're not talking about extreme cases like "Chainsaw Al" or Elizabeth Holmes and Theranos.
We're talking about random samples of successive businesspeople.

Holmes' Machiavellianism allowed her to be hailed as a role model for females entrepreneurs while she bullied her way to unlimited power

There is a very interesting caveat to the Hare's study, though.
The caveat is, in part, worrying. But in part, it also holds the keys to a solution.
Here it is: the psychopaths from Hare's study received poor evaluations from their superiors. And they were correctly identified as poor team players and as having poor management styles.
So it seems like it's not true that psychopaths can go up undetected. They do are recognized as some sorts of a-holes -which makes sense-.

Research conducted in Australia also confirms the costs of psychopaths in leadership positions are felt by everyone in the organization:

> When Corporate Psychopaths are present in leadership positions within organizations, employees are significantly less likely to agree that the corporation does business in a way that shows commitment to employees, significantly less likely to feel that they receive due recognition for doing a good job, to feel that their work was appreciated and to feel that their efforts were properly rewarded.

Yet the obvious reality remains: being correctly identified as poor leaders of people didn't stop psychopaths

from climbing the corporate ladder.

Equally worrying, some of their psychopathic traits did indeed help them get near the top.
Says psychopathy expert Babiak in that same study:

> Even those traits that reflect a severe lack of human feelings or emotional poverty (lack of remorse, guilt, empathy) can be put into service by corporate psychopaths, where being "tough" or "strong" (making hard, unpopular decisions) or "cool under fire" (not displaying emotions in the face of unpleasant circumstances) can work in their favor.

And he adds:

> In sum, the very skills that make the psychopath so unpleasant (and sometimes abusive) in society can facilitate a career in business even in the face of negative performance ratings.

That's not the only study to link psychopathy with business success.
Board and Fritzon had a smaller sample of just 39 business managers, but it emerged that a number of histrionic and narcissistic attributes such as charm, egocentricity, and lack of empathy were more common in business leaders than in so-called disturbed personalities.

The difference was that the business leaders' group was less likely to display the more "antisocial aspects" of psychopathy, such as physical aggression, instability, and hostile defiance (factory 1 psychopathy).
So, yes, violent psychopathy won't get you far. And high levels of psychopathy seem inversely linked to work-related success (Spurk et al., 2015)
But the dark triad traits in factor 1 psychopathy, Machiavellianism, and narcissism do seem to carry you higher.

The Future Trend: Less EQ, More Ruthlessness

What's the trend?

Will EQ be more rewarded, or will psychopathy traits be more rewarded?

It's difficult to say.

World-renowned psychopathy expert Robert Hare says that psychopathy is on the rise. And the general corporate environment, with its faster pace and more frequent job changes becoming the norm, is generally becoming more suitable for psychopaths.

From Hare's writings, it also seems to me that many high-earning professions are more likely to downplay the role of emotional intelligence and to instead reward psychopathy.

Investment banking seems to be a popular industry for individuals high in psychopathy.
And Robert Hare is often quoted as saying that:

> "if I wasn't studying psychopaths in prison, I'd do so at the stock exchange".
> -Pyschopathy researcher Robert Hare

The 2008 financial crisis has also been linked with psychopathic behavior (Boddy, 2011). It's not a mystery to anyone that plenty of executives made lots of money and walked away from the mess while leaving the taxpayers on the hook.

The Darker EI That Helps You Advance

So, is EI useless?

No.
Quite the opposite.

From Bradberry's and Goleman's work, plus further menta-analysis, it seems true that emotional intelligence is positively correlated to job performance (except for non-people facing jobs Newman et. al, 2010), and makes for better leadership.

Such as, emotional intelligence is important for good governance and good leadership.
It just doesn't seem to be so important for personal advancement and selfish ends.

Unless… Unless we enlarge the definition of Emotional Intelligence.
Emotional intelligence can help you advance. But it's not the emotional intelligence as it's often understood to be, such as caring and empathizing with your team.

Emotional Intelligence For Manipulation

A less naive view of emotional intelligence includes the ability to manipulate.

An emotionally intelligent person doesn't necessarily use empathy to help others.
He may use empathy to better take advantage of others.

The Routledge Handbook on Persuasion states:

> People who possess more emotional awareness (Wielgopolan & Imbir, 2020) and skilled at expressing basic emotions are better at deception (Riggio & Friedman, 1983).

Emotional intelligence should also include the ability to read power dynamics -call it "power intelligence"- and how to use it for selfish goal-call it "Machiavellianism"-.

There are two main types of empathy: emotional, and cognitive (Cox et. al., 2011).

Emotional empathy allows you to feel what other people are feeling, feel sympathy and compassion for their pain, and possibly feel bad about it at a more or less deep level (sometimes referred to as "somatic empathy").
Cognitive empathy instead helps you to understand what other people are feeling, but without being emotionally affected, and without caring for people's suffering.

As psychopathy researcher James Fallon says, psychopaths have little or no emotional empathy, but they can be good at understanding what others are feeling. And they use that information strategically, and for selfish ends only (sometimes referred to as "tactical empathy").

The same can be said for emotional intelligence at large.
As organizational psychologist Adam Grant shrewdly notes, EI can be used for good or for less good purposes.
And the type of emotional intelligence that helps you make a good career is a different type of emotional intelligence.

Such as:

The type of emotional intelligence that helps you advance at work is more Machiavellian. You understand how people feel, what behaviors are more likely to be rewarded, and you put that information to the service of career strategies that get you promoted.

Just to be clear: emotional empathy does not necessarily hurt your personal career and success potential. It's just that it's not strictly needed, either. And too much emotional empathy can also become harmful, leading to paralysis and the inability to act (Sapolsky, 2017). At work, that would mean not firing people when you should fire people.
What does matter when it comes to promotions, is cognitive empathy for effective social strategizing.

This is the high-EQ that helps you advance:

- Knowledge of human psychology (including your own psychology)

It's people who decide who advances and get promoted.
And knowing how people work underpins any effective decision and career strategy.

Some psychopaths actively research psychology and power dynamics to become better abusers.
Read here a shocking account of a psychopath's sexual strategy.

- Office politics mastery

Depending on the definition, office politics is either all the human element of work, or all the human element outside of the sanctioned rules.

But even if we adopted the latter definition, since most organizations don't promote only on competence, office politics mastery is crucial for anyone who wants to make it to the top.

And how about when those interests can't be aligned?

- When interests cannot align, the EQ that helps you advance is Machiavellian in nature

One study by David Buss and Liisa M.Kyl-Heku analyzed different career strategies.

And found out that a "manipulative strategy" was as effective as a strategy based on industriousness (ie.: hard work).

Frankly, I don't think you can reach a conclusion on 'most effective strategy'.

But I think we can all agree that Machiavellianism can help you advance.
This is a case where scientific studies confirm what most of us have seen with our own eyes.

The Machiavellian player knows that there are plenty of areas of conflicting interests between himself and the organization, and between himself and his colleagues.
And he is keenly aware of how to maximize self-interest while looking like he's playing for the team.

This is the area of EI where psychopaths do quite well.
Psychopaths are indeed good at recognizing emotions in other people's faces. And they do not always score low in emotional intelligence (Copestake et al., 2013). It's "just" in the conscience and empathy side that they're lacking.

- Knowledge and mastery of power dynamics

Here is the big secret:

It's alpha males and alpha females who get promoted.
You will rarely see a CEO who's a wimp, a CEO who acts submissively, or a CEO who speaks with uncertainty.

The simple rule is that to make it to the top, you need to act like a top dog.
Also see this article on executive skills that get you promoted.

I Wish I Could Tell You Differently

I'm not happy to write this article.

And I wish reality was different.

But for now, from the evidence I have seen so far, career progression has less to do with empathy and emotional intelligence, and more to do with looking the part, smart politics and, sometimes, ruthlessness and unabashed selfishness.

SUMMARY

Emotional Intelligence is crucial in life.
It helps you understand people and yourself, get along with people, and bond and connect with people.

It also helps you at work.
But not in the way it's usually portrayed.

Emotional intelligence helps you to get up to mid-level management.
After that, at executive and board levels, different traits come to the fore.

Learning how to play politics, including sometimes in potentially Machiavellian ways, becomes more helpful.
And what we call "executive skills" matter more than emotional intelligence.

This, by the way, could be one of the main reasons why women are still struggling to make it to the very top.
Women take emotional intelligence more seriously. And more literally.

A Quote to Go By

Finally, I'd like to leave you with a quote from "The Good Psychopath Guide":

> There are two things that rise to the top. The cream, and the scum.

To which, I add: to be the cream, you need to know how the scum operates.

Lucio Buffalmano · 19 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The myth of Emotional Intelligence (EI) states that the more empathic, self-aware, and relationally skilled you are, the greater your career success will be. This belief has flooded the pop psychology literature and business world, but does the data actually support it?

This article contends that EI helps you only up to a certain point.
Our analysis, using corporate data and psychological research, reveals a shocking truth: If you want to reach the executive level, emotional intelligence—especially high empathy and focus on relationships—can actually be harmful.

What truly wins at the top are traits like Power* Intelligence and Machiavellianism. Here, we debunk the EI myth and show you the strategic skills that ruthless executives actually use to get promoted

What's Emotional Intelligence

Emotional intelligence (EI), measured as "emotional quotient" (EQ), is an umbrella term that could be loosely defined as:

> The capacity to be aware, control, and appropriately express one's emotions, to understand other people's emotions, and to empathetically handle interpersonal relationships.

Daniel Goleman, who popularized the term, divides emotional intelligence into four components:

- Self-awareness (personal competence 1)
- Self-management (personal competence 2)
- Social awareness (social competence 1)
- Relationship management (social competence 2)

The first two elements of personal competence refer to being aware of your emotions and managing your behavior. The second two elements are where the definition of EI loses value since it can encompass everything, including ruthless calculativeness. However, as it's sometimes understood, social competence excludes the calculative and ruthless aspects to focus instead on 'applied empathy'. Understanding other people's feelings, moods, and behavior to improve the quality of your relationships.

Obviously, those competencies are important.
But how important are they when it comes to career progression, compared to other skills?

The Myth of Emotional Intelligence

This quote made "emotional intelligence" popular:

> As much as 80% of adult "success" comes from EQ

That was Daniel Goleman.
Since then, emotional intelligence entered the collective imagination, more supporting "evidence" emerged, and seminars teaching emotional intelligence have sprung up around the globe.

Goleman, in his sequel book "Working With Emotional Intelligence" (review removed) restates that IQ does not determine career success, but EQ does.

Travis Bradberry in his book "Emotional Intelligence 2.0" and in this Forbes article says that EQ predicts salary, and that a "one-point increase in EQ leads to an increase of 1.300 dollars of annual salary" (which doesn't make sense by the way, because it cannot be a linear progression to infinity).

But is it really true?

Empathic Nice Guys Might Not Finish Last, But Stuck in The Middle

In brief:

From all the evidence I have gathered, it's not true that emotional intelligence is a key contributor to career success.

It matters, in a way, yes, but it's not a linear progression.
It doesn't help you in all types of jobs and, most importantly, it doesn't seem like it helps you reach the top.

One single chart, plotting the EQ results by job titles, should suffice to put the theory to rest:

Data from Travis Bradberry, “Emotional Intelligence 2.0”
Bradberry computed the results of his emotional intelligence survey from more than 100.000 individuals, across multiple industries, and on five continents.
Plus, Bradberry is one of the pundits for emotional intelligence, selling emotional intelligence training. That means: Bradberry’s interests are in direct contrast to what his own survey shows (so big kudos to him for releasing discordant data).
Both the numbers and the inverse conflict of interest make the results very telling, in my opinion.

And the results say that emotional intelligence is only high up until mid-level management.

Bradberry, in this Harvard Business Review article poignantly titled “heartless bosses”, asks:

> How could it be that the very people who need emotional intelligence the most seem to have it the least?

Well, to me, an obvious reason looms in the distance: because, it seems, you don’t need a high EQ to be promoted to the executives rank.

What does the author of the original survey have to say about it?
In this article, Bradberry acknowledges that executives might have lower EQ because their job “erodes” EQ, and because companies don’t take EQ into account when deciding who to promote.

Maybe.
My answer is somewhat different.

It’s not that CEOs are (necessarily) emotionally stupid. They probably aren’t. But they just have different priorities. CEOs are more concerned with power, winning, and getting things done than with what helps you score high in emotional intelligence -things such as understanding what others feel, protecting people’s egos, nurturing relationships, and “social harmony”-.

CEOs are able to doggedly pursue their goals, independently of what others think and feel. CEOs aren’t too touchy, and they don’t care if others get offended.
Those traits make your EI score tick downward.

Machiavellianism is also correlated with lower results on EI tests when you remove the possibility for manipulation and strategic self-interest (Bereckzei, 2017).
But, at work, both Machiavellianism and the hard-charging attitude help you move upward.
Says psychologist George Simon in his best-selling book "In Sheep's Clothing":

> CEOs most often have inflated self-esteem (…) and are undetered by adverse consequences or societal condemnation.

Simon is basically saying that a thick-skin and feeling great no matter what others say or think is a trait that, albeit potentially anti-social, helps you advance in life.
This is the equivalent of dialing empathy down, not up.

So, if being able to dial down one's own empathy and sensitivity is useful, might it be possible that not having empathy and sensitivity at all could be an advantage?

Well, there is indeed much evidence to suggest that the opposite of empathy and emotional intelligence can help you get to the top.
Enter, the psychopath, the individual with no empathy and no conscience.

The Scarier Truth: Psychopathy Might Beat Empathy

Jon Moulton is a successful private equity investor.

Asked by the Financial Times what his 3 best features are, he replied (italic is mine):

> Determination, curiosity and insensitivity

Why insensitivity?
Moulton says that insensitivity "lets you sleep when others can't".

That doesn't sound like a man high in empathy, does it?
It sounds much closer to psychopathy than to an empathic leader.

I witnessed similar examples.
Of the ones I can share here, I once had a CEO who said we'd "throw bodies at the operations department" -he loved repeating that in his previous company he handled the breakneck speed of growth by "throwing bodies at operations."
The venture was going to be a slam dunk, he loved repeating (grandiose view of self), and the prospects who didn't want to work with us were "stupid" (demeaning towards others).

Another founder, a speed metal singer who told me he fancied himself a "warrior", invited me to pre-launch meetings with the goal of wooing me in. How did this one refer to the guys running operational tasks in his future business?
"Monkeys".
And had the same braggart, grandiose sense of impending, easy victory as the previous example. His company was going to be raking in money, and for the easy task of actually getting the work done, "we'll just hire monkeys" (I left in mild disgust that day and never saw him again).

The Goldwater rule says you shouldn't diagnose people whom you haven't professionally examined. But if I had to bet money, I'd bet that those two would score quite high in psychopathy.

This should not be a shocker to anyone in the social sciences.
The idea that psychopathy -or certain traits of psychopathy- can help individuals climb hierarchical organizations and acquire power is nothing new in the field (Dutton, 2012; Hare & Babiak, 2006)

Data and evidence are not forthcoming in this field. We can understand why: few business leaders would be happy to be measured and identified as high in psychopathy.
But some data does exist, and it points to interesting conclusions.
Babiak and Hare administered the psychopathy checklist to a group of 203 American business executives.

The results?

While the median psychopathy score was not high, the prevalence of psychopathic traits among business executives was far higher than among the general population.
3.9% of the business executives had a score of 30 or higher, which is the minimum threshold to be clinically considered a psychopath. That means that there were 2 to 3 times more psychopaths among the business executives than in the normal population (that's a lot).

And we're not talking about extreme cases like "Chainsaw Al" or Elizabeth Holmes and Theranos.
We're talking about random samples of successive businesspeople.

Holmes' Machiavellianism allowed her to be hailed as a role model for females entrepreneurs while she bullied her way to unlimited power

There is a very interesting caveat to the Hare's study, though.
The caveat is, in part, worrying. But in part, it also holds the keys to a solution.
Here it is: the psychopaths from Hare's study received poor evaluations from their superiors. And they were correctly identified as poor team players and as having poor management styles.
So it seems like it's not true that psychopaths can go up undetected. They do are recognized as some sorts of a-holes -which makes sense-.

Research conducted in Australia also confirms the costs of psychopaths in leadership positions are felt by everyone in the organization:

> When Corporate Psychopaths are present in leadership positions within organizations, employees are significantly less likely to agree that the corporation does business in a way that shows commitment to employees, significantly less likely to feel that they receive due recognition for doing a good job, to feel that their work was appreciated and to feel that their efforts were properly rewarded.

Yet the obvious reality remains: being correctly identified as poor leaders of people didn't stop psychopaths

from climbing the corporate ladder.

Equally worrying, some of their psychopathic traits did indeed help them get near the top.
Says psychopathy expert Babiak in that same study:

> Even those traits that reflect a severe lack of human feelings or emotional poverty (lack of remorse, guilt, empathy) can be put into service by corporate psychopaths, where being "tough" or "strong" (making hard, unpopular decisions) or "cool under fire" (not displaying emotions in the face of unpleasant circumstances) can work in their favor.

And he adds:

> In sum, the very skills that make the psychopath so unpleasant (and sometimes abusive) in society can facilitate a career in business even in the face of negative performance ratings.

That's not the only study to link psychopathy with business success.
Board and Fritzon had a smaller sample of just 39 business managers, but it emerged that a number of histrionic and narcissistic attributes such as charm, egocentricity, and lack of empathy were more common in business leaders than in so-called disturbed personalities.

The difference was that the business leaders' group was less likely to display the more "antisocial aspects" of psychopathy, such as physical aggression, instability, and hostile defiance (factory 1 psychopathy).
So, yes, violent psychopathy won't get you far. And high levels of psychopathy seem inversely linked to work-related success (Spurk et al., 2015)
But the dark triad traits in factor 1 psychopathy, Machiavellianism, and narcissism do seem to carry you higher.

The Future Trend: Less EQ, More Ruthlessness

What's the trend?

Will EQ be more rewarded, or will psychopathy traits be more rewarded?

It's difficult to say.

World-renowned psychopathy expert Robert Hare says that psychopathy is on the rise. And the general corporate environment, with its faster pace and more frequent job changes becoming the norm, is generally becoming more suitable for psychopaths.

From Hare's writings, it also seems to me that many high-earning professions are more likely to downplay the role of emotional intelligence and to instead reward psychopathy.

Investment banking seems to be a popular industry for individuals high in psychopathy.
And Robert Hare is often quoted as saying that:

> "if I wasn't studying psychopaths in prison, I'd do so at the stock exchange".
> -Pyschopathy researcher Robert Hare

The 2008 financial crisis has also been linked with psychopathic behavior (Boddy, 2011). It's not a mystery to anyone that plenty of executives made lots of money and walked away from the mess while leaving the taxpayers on the hook.

The Darker EI That Helps You Advance

So, is EI useless?

No.
Quite the opposite.

From Bradberry's and Goleman's work, plus further menta-analysis, it seems true that emotional intelligence is positively correlated to job performance (except for non-people facing jobs Newman et. al, 2010), and makes for better leadership.

Such as, emotional intelligence is important for good governance and good leadership.
It just doesn't seem to be so important for personal advancement and selfish ends.

Unless… Unless we enlarge the definition of Emotional Intelligence.
Emotional intelligence can help you advance. But it's not the emotional intelligence as it's often understood to be, such as caring and empathizing with your team.

Emotional Intelligence For Manipulation

A less naive view of emotional intelligence includes the ability to manipulate.

An emotionally intelligent person doesn't necessarily use empathy to help others.
He may use empathy to better take advantage of others.

The Routledge Handbook on Persuasion states:

> People who possess more emotional awareness (Wielgopolan & Imbir, 2020) and skilled at expressing basic emotions are better at deception (Riggio & Friedman, 1983).

Emotional intelligence should also include the ability to read power dynamics -call it "power intelligence"- and how to use it for selfish goal-call it "Machiavellianism"-.

There are two main types of empathy: emotional, and cognitive (Cox et. al., 2011).

Emotional empathy allows you to feel what other people are feeling, feel sympathy and compassion for their pain, and possibly feel bad about it at a more or less deep level (sometimes referred to as "somatic empathy").
Cognitive empathy instead helps you to understand what other people are feeling, but without being emotionally affected, and without caring for people's suffering.

As psychopathy researcher James Fallon says, psychopaths have little or no emotional empathy, but they can be good at understanding what others are feeling. And they use that information strategically, and for selfish ends only (sometimes referred to as "tactical empathy").

The same can be said for emotional intelligence at large.
As organizational psychologist Adam Grant shrewdly notes, EI can be used for good or for less good purposes.
And the type of emotional intelligence that helps you make a good career is a different type of emotional intelligence.

The type of emotional intelligence that helps you advance at work is more Machiavellian. You understand how people feel, what behaviors are more likely to be rewarded, and you put that information to the service of career strategies that get you promoted.

Just to be clear: emotional empathy does not necessarily hurt your personal career and success potential. It's just that it's not strictly needed, either. And too much emotional empathy can also become harmful, leading to paralysis and the inability to act (Sapolsky, 2017). At work, that would mean not firing people when you should fire people.
What does matter when it comes to promotions, is cognitive empathy for effective social strategizing.

This is the high-EQ that helps you advance:

- Knowledge of human psychology (including your own psychology)

It's people who decide who advances and get promoted.
And knowing how people work underpins any effective decision and career strategy.

Some psychopaths actively research psychology and power dynamics to become better abusers.
Read here a shocking account of a psychopath's sexual strategy.

- Office politics mastery

Depending on the definition, office politics is either all the human element of work, or all the human element outside of the sanctioned rules.

But even if we adopted the latter definition, since most organizations don't promote only on competence, office politics mastery is crucial for anyone who wants to make it to the top.

And how about when those interests can't be aligned?

Frankly, I don't think you can reach a conclusion on 'most effective strategy'.

The Machiavellian player knows that there are plenty of areas of conflicting interests between himself and the organization, and between himself and his colleagues.
And he is keenly aware of how to maximize self-interest while looking like he's playing for the team.

This is the area of EI where psychopaths do quite well.

Overview

About the Author:
Roger Love is an American voice coach with decades of experience. He has coached many celebrities and famous singers, including Selena Gomez, Gwen Stephani, and self-help guru Anthony Robbins.

Breathing Is The #1 Fundamental of Voice

Speaking Pro starts first with the basics.
Which is great, because it means you don't need to purchase or go through a beginner's course first. You get everything into one: the fundamentals of voice, the exercises, and warm-ups, plus how to speak in public.

Breathing and speaking with air support are two fundamentals of voice because, of course, it's air that fuels your voice.

I was familiar with diaphragmatic breathing, sometimes referred to as belly-breathing, but I still took away some new information, including:

- Breathe in normally: Don't fill your belly to capacity like it's going to explode. This is something I was doing wrong in my exercises: I forced air in until I was filled to capacity
- Only stomach when your stomach is coming in: that's how you will support your voice with enough air. A good exercise is to count two 2 as your breath in, then count to 8 with your hand on your belly making sure that it's coming in

The 6 Building Blocks of Voice

Roger Love lists six building blocks of voice.

These are the "levers" that you will work on depending on how you want to come across and what you want to communicate.

So for example Roger Love explains than when you are the leader or want to come across more authoritative, you speak with a lower pitch, lower melody, and higher tone (ie.: less air).

On the other hand, when you're in a meeting and you're not the leader, you don't want to "outshine the master".
So you speak with lower volume (you don't want to overpower him), higher pitch (you don't want to sound more alpha than he is), and faster pace (you don't want to take more time than the leader).

PITCH: How high or low your voice sounds

- Speaking within your best pitch range will ensure that your voice sounds genuine
- Your voice pitch can provide an instant connection or disconnect with your listeners.

PACE: How fast or slow you speak

- A slow pace can communicate that you're lethargic
- Too fast of a pace may sound restless.
- Controlling the pace of voice can help you appear intelligent, creative, spontaneous and surprising.

TONE: Determined by the amount of airy or edgy sounds you make

- An edgier tone can make you appear more forceful or strong
- A more airy tone can appear gentle or submissive
- A certain amount of airiness can be useful for suggesting that you're friendly and accessible but it can easily undermine your credibility.

MELODY: A string of notes that are attached to one another

- To rise above the competition, you can use melody to connect with listeners and showcase your amazing content
- Used correctly, this can bring words to life, entertain, and engage audiences
- Monotone: a form of melody using only one note is not advised
- You'll get best results if you spend time consciously varying the types of melody you use

VOLUME: How loud or soft you speak

- Volume enables you to control how others perceive your confidence and the importance of what you are saying

Middle Voice Allows You to Reach & Connect Both Men and Women

The "middle voice" didn't exist before Roger Love came up with the theory.

So, what's this middle voice?
The middle sits in between "head voice" and "chest voice". The head voice is higher, and more associated with femininity. While the chest voice is lower, and more associated with masculinity.

A good middle voice can go both into head and chest.
When you can draw from both chest and head voice, you get two big benefits:

- Your voice is "fuller", and freer to move up and down
- You connect with both genders, more easily

That second point is was the most interesting for me, both from a persuasion point of view, and from this website's perspective of self-empowerment.
Indeed, one of the values this website espouses, is that there is more power in understanding and being able to leverage both the feminine and masculine within the same individual.
And that's something that our current culture largely misses on, encouraging women to behave more like men to be successful at work, and the manosphere encouraging men to neglect the feminine qualities.

See for example Elizabeth Holmes, trying too hard to talk like a man.

As Roger Love says, you shouldn't see to defy your natural voice. You should work on your voice and make it sound as good as you can. And then embrace that.

The Emotion of A Speech: Start Happy, Then Grateful

And you want to start happy because it captivates and it draws people in.

And they will be wondering: what is he so excited about?

But happy is not about smiling or cracking jokes. As a matter of fact, Roger Love recommends you do not start your speech or talk with a joke.
"Happy" is about your voice tonality.

You make "happy" by going up with your tonality, speaking a slightly higher volume, and adding melody -"a ton" of melody, says Roger-.

As you progress, says Roger Love, you want to move into gratitude.
Gratitude speaks still a high-ish volume, but decreases the melody and slows down the words. Most of all, it stretches out the vowels.

This should all be done in the very beginning, before you move into the main content.
After you captured people's attention, then you can move into the content.

As Roger Love says:

> Give happy. Give grateful. Then you have their hearts, and then you have the rest of the time to deliver the rest of the speech.

Delivering Emotions: Avoid Acting To Make the Audience Feel

Some speakers try to deliver emotions by feeling them and acting them.

But that's not what Roger Love recommends.
It comes across as fake when you try to embody your emotions. Trying to be angry as you "act" angry can end up looking silly.

Instead, you should focus on making the audience feel the emotion themselves, without necessarily embodying the emotion yourself.
There is much more power in showing controlled emotions, rather than overly re-enacting them.
And I agree with that.

Speaking With Charisma: Bringing Your Speech to Life

This was one of my favorite parts.

And I think this is what differentiates the great, charismatic presenters, and the average -or poor- ones.
The charismatic ones add "flavor" to their speech by changing rhythm, melody, or volume of certain key sentences or words.

Roger Love says there are three ways to emphasize anything in a sentence:

- Pace: faster or slower, also stretching out specific words or shortening them
- Melody: ascending, descending, or flat
- Volume: softer or louder

In Speaking Pro Roger Loves shows exactly how to make the keywords in your speech, and how to deliver them:

This will be useful to anyone, but especially to those who tend to deliver flatter and more monotone speeches and presentations.

Working the Stage to Connect With the Audience: The 5 Stage Spots

Roger Love explains how both singers and presenters should move on a stage.

To draw everyone in, you want to speak to your center, to your left, and to your right.
And when you are making your most important point, you want to step forward.

When you step back though, you should never give the audience your back. Stepping backward might also seem unnatural.
A better way instead is to go again to your right, then walk diagonally back to your left, and then again to the center, back to square 1. And you can start the process again.

Roger Love shows you how to execute this move while walking on an actual stage, which is great to learn.

Mastering Audience Participation

This was another great lesson in Speaking Pro.

Roger Love is not just good at teaching voice, but is also good with people and psychology. And it shows here. Some of the takeaways:

- If you're inviting people on stage, don't wait for them to come to you, walk towards them: the stage is your house, and you want to meet them at the door
- If they are too scared, keep holding onto their hand and maybe put a hand on their back to provide a human connection
- If a guest on the stage says he's angry and he disagrees with what you said, let them vent and answer gracefully

Roger Love showing how to encourage a shy or fearful individual you've just invited on stage

This lesson was also good to develop emotional intelligence.

How to Handle the Applause

Those among you who took speaking courses or who attended Toastmasters will know this.

But 90% of people don't, so here it is for you:

- When the audience applauds as you're walking up to speak, stand in your starting position for a second and just smile. After about two seconds, begin speaking
- After you speak, stand there and smile. The applause is a gift the audience wants to give TO you. If you walk off stage too soon, it's as if you're not willing to accept the gift of applause that the audience wants to give you
- When the applause starts to fade, bow or nod, say "thank you" and walk off the stage smiling

How to Interview Well

In this section, Roger Love explains how to interview in studios.

He explains both how to interview well as the interviewer, and as the interviewee.

Here are some takeaways:

- When your interviewer looks at the camera, you should, too
- Don't fidget or draw attention to yourself while your interviewer is introducing you: that's when he's touting your horn, help viewers keep the focus on them, as they shine a spotlight on you
- When they ask you a question, begin answering the question while looking at the interviewer. Then, move your glance to the cameras. Continue to rotate your glance between looking at the interviewer and at the cameras based on the way your answer naturally segments itself
- Point your body at the camera and only rotate your head, shoulders, and upper torso towards your interviewer.
- Use melody to signal to the interviewer that you're finished answering a question. For instance:
  - Going down in melody signals that you're done speaking
  - Going up or staying on the same note communicates that you have more to say or are not yet finished with your response

How to Master Business Meetings

Some authors say that when you're pitching your ideas to a room of people, you should zero in the only person who's got the most power.

But I agree with Roger Love instead when he says that you should look at everyone while you speak.
As Roger says:

> Never assume that anyone in the room doesn't have influence

Furthermore, if you overdo it and ignore people too much, you risk coming across as an asshole.

Here are some tips if you are presenting your ideas in a business meeting:

- Look at people randomly: if you create patterns, you become predictable and you dull your speech. If you people know you're not gonna look at them, they might get distracted
- Speak loud, at around a 7 on a scale from 1 to 10. But add melody, so it doesn't seem like you're angry
- Be on the happier side of the spectrum, which shows you're not needy. You all have you need in your life, no matter what they decide. And you're there to add value to their lives.

If you're not the leader of the meeting

Roger Love understands power dynamics quite well.
As Robert Greene says, if you're not the leader, it's a good career strategy to take precautions not to make the leader feel threatened.

So, when your boss is in the room:

- Look a bit more often and longer to the leader
- Lean forward towards the leader, avoid sitting back
- Speak with a lower volume than the leader
- When it comes to pace, speak faster than the leader, let him be the slow alpha male of the room
- Make your gestures smaller than the big boss, allow him to take center stage

If you're a total newbie and you're sitting far away from the heavy hitter, it's OK to move more and talk a bit more excitedly.

It's good to show some passion.

CONS

- The Mehrabian study

As a fastidious social scientist, I would note that it's not always true that the words you choose only account for 7% of your communication.

- Some videos could have been higher resolution

Some of the videos might have been uploaded at higher resolution maybe. This is something I'd recommend the Roger Love team to look into. The current resolution is not a handicap in any way, but with higher resolution video, it might be even better.

- Some real-life examples?

One of the philosophies of this website is to teach with real-life examples. So I would have liked to also see some real-life examples of poor voice in a presentation, or of good use of voice.

On the other hand, Roger Love is so good at mimicking voices, that he is able to embody good and bad examples with his own voice.

PROS

- Great overview of effective public speaking

Speaking Pro covers public speaking from a voice point of view, of course, but also body language, connecting with the audience, as well as speaking with power and authority.

And does so across several different speaking environments, including business meetings, studio interviews, and speeches.

- New exercises even for foundations of voice

Even though I went through the basic voice course "The Perfect Voice", I still learned a couple more good voice exercises.
For example, counting to 2 to breathe in, and counting to 8, while your stomach comes back in.

- You can download the mp3

God, I love this option!

- Professionally formatted

Speaking Pro is a premium course, and comes with the bells and whistle of a premium course, including a professionally formatted PDF.
See here an example:

You can see the PDF example here.

- More than just voice: very good on power dynamics

Obviously Speaking Pro focuses on voice and that's where most of the added value comes from.
However, there was much more than voice, and Roger Love is very good at understanding people's psychology as well as power dynamics.

His advice on putting people at ease, bonding and developing rapport, as well as communicating with power and political savvy is all spot on.

Review

Speaking Pro combines the basic exercises of The Perfect Voice, plus all the added value on how to speak effectively

That "effectively" includes both how to bond and connect with the audience, how to speak power, charisma, and authority, and how to speak in a politically savvy way that makes your boss feel good.

I think than not just entertainers and public personas, but also most businesspeople would gain a lot in going through Speaking Pro.
As I repeat many times here, public speaking and presentations are part of the "executive skills" that will help you get into the boardroom.

The Shadow Negotiation: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

In The Shadow Negotiation author Deborah Kolb examines negotiation at the level that rarely gets spoken about but that can either make or break the deal: personal feelings and biases, nonverbal communication, and frames.
The Shadow Negotiation teaches women how to negotiate effectively by going for both personal advocacy and pie-enlarging relationships.

Key Takeaways

- In all negotiations there are hidden and unspoken frames, biases, and personal beliefs that will impact the negotiation: they're part of the shadow negotiation
- If you don't take those unspoken assumptions and frames to the surface, they might undermine your negotiation
- To do well in negotiations, you need to be good both at advocating for yourself (pushing) and connecting
- For short-term, one-off deals, advocacy/pushing is more important
- For long-term relationships, you are better off with more connection
- For long-term relationships in which you don't know each other well, use "mutual inquiry"

Notes

About the Author:
Deborah Kolb is an American researcher, author, and teacher. She received her Ph.D. from the Sloan School of Management, MIT. Kolb serves as a women's-leadership consultant to, among others, Google, Fidelity, and the White House.
She is the co-director of the Negotiations in the Workplace Project at Harvard and pens her own blog at DeborahMKolb.com.

What's the Shadow Negotiation

Says Deborah Kolb:

> The shadow negotiation is where hidden agendas and masked assumptions play out. Often it is defined by a whole array of attitudes of which the participants are only dimly aware.

It's important to know and understand the shadow negotiation because those hidden agendas impact the negotiation as much as the explicit issues and differences do.

To negotiate effectively, you must recognize the shadow negotiation and bring those misguided assumptions to the surface.

For example, when women negotiate at work, the assumption is often that work was "her choice", and that she will always put family before work. Hence, she shouldn't be negotiating hard.
A woman who doesn't address those issues will face an uphill battle.

But the shadow negotiation also includes nonverbals, body language, power dynamics, and interpersonal relationships, all of which influence the negotiation but that are rarely talked about.
Says Deborah:

> Even though they seldom address the subject directly, they decide between them whose interests and needs command at tention, whose opinions matter, and how cooperative they are going to be in reaching an agreement.

Before "Creative" Negotiation and "Making the Pie Larger", You Need to Show Some Strength

Strength matters.

If your negotiation partner thinks you're a pushover, or that you will make all the concessions, no amount of creative problem solving will help you reach a good outcome.

Says the author:

> The people you negotiate with need to know that they cannot push you around before you can convince them to take you and your interests seriously.

Frames in Negotiation: Strategic Turns

Deborah Kolp calls "turns" what in the end are "frames".

If the other party is trying to make you the issue of the negotiation, negotiating becomes impossible (and it's often a negotiation power move to manipulate you).
You cannot defend when someone accuses you, or you continue to operate within their frame of choice, which is helping them and damaging you.

Some framing techniques the author recommends:

- Interrupt the move: by changing the pace you break the momentum and the frame might never have the chance to establish itself.
- Correct the move: offer an alternative explanation to whatever they are accusing you of. Often, you will go from a negative explanation of your motives and behavior, to a positive one (for example: "you don't have enough appetite for risks", "my appetite for risk hinges on having good information, which is what I am asking you to provide me with"

- Divert the move: go from personal, back to the problem
- Name the move: this is the equivalent of "going meta", such as you explain what they are trying to do

The author also presents examples for each, and one of them was particularly impressive.
Charlene won the promotion to committee chair over Ellen. One their first meeting, Ellen was late. And when she arrived, she had printed a memo that she handed out to everyone. Ellen was acting as if she were the chair. Instead of pushing back right away and look territorial, Charlene looked at the memo and said "what a lot of work".
Then asked people if they wanted a refill of coffee before restarting. Once the meeting restarted, Charlene said:

> Charlene (boss): We have not made so much progress as Ellen did independently.
> We have yet to identify the approach we want to take, let alone the priorities.
> Perhaps, Charlene suggested, it would be better to consider Ellen's memo when ideas had been discussed a bit more.
> So, let's start with the ideas now…

Without the interruption, the committee would have focused 100% on Ellen's memo.
But with the break, she prevented Ellen's memo to dominate the discussion, and thwarted Ellen's attempt to act as the leader.

Advocacy, Connection, And Striking the Right Balance

The author distinguishes between two different approaches:

- Advocacy: pushing for what you need. When you're dealing with one-off negotiation and single items, like selling/buying cars and houses, it will be more about advocacy
- Connection: the relationship side of the negotiation. You will use it more for repeated interaction and for complex negotiations. When negotiation is defined as a search for joint gains, connective skills become more important.

Advocacy: You Need to Be Able to Push

I totally agree with Deborah Kolp:

> Pushing has a taint associated with it.
> But being able to push effectively is an important skill for all negotiators. Despite whatever collaborative inclination we may have, some deals, by their very nature, require pushing, and some people drive us to push simply to protect our interests.

Some good advice for women (but also for men):

- Believe it's possible to negotiate, seek opportunities: To even think about negotiation, you first have to realize it's possible. Otherwise, opportunities for negotiation go wasted
- Look at your strengths and the value you bring to the table: too many women focus only on their weaknesses

- Let your negotiating partner work to whittle you down, don't do it yourself: people second-guess themselves before going into the negotiation and start decreasing their own demands before their negotiation partner does it for them
- Think how to make your requests more palatable, rather than scrapping them

On using threats effectively:

- If you use a threat, it must be real, and you must be prepared to follow through
- Better than a stand-alone threat, couple it with a conciliatory move: for example, you can say what you will be forced to do if your fair demands are not met
- Better than threats, talk about other options you have: letting the other party know you have other options is equally effective, and carry fewer risks of retaliation and/or of ruining the relationship

Also read:

- How to present options for maximum leverage in salary negotiations

Pushing, Packaging, and... The Third Way

The author defines two typical negotiations we engage in:

1. Pushing: this is advocacy only, and it's used in competitive negotiation with a win-lose frame
2. Packaging: you seek to make the pie larger. Rather than push for what you want, you try to discover the different interests in play, and make a trade based on those differences to make a "package deal".

And she adds a third way:

- Mutual inquiry: builds explicitly on the open relationships and trust forged in the shadow negotiation. Bargainers may re-evaluate what they want, and redefine the problem itself

Says the author about mutual inquiry:

> You work together to learn more about each other's experience, and agreements emerge not from floating attractive options but from this exploration.
> In other words, new ideas don't come from brainstorming, as in problem solving, but from listening, learning, and creating together.

Reframing From Slacker to Too Busy: An Example

One of the things I liked most of "The Shadow Negotiation" are the examples.

Caroline, for example, was getting stretched thin and had no more capacity to add one more project.
When her boss approached her and asked her to take over one more project, the risk was that she could be seen as a slacker by her boss if she said "no".
Instead, she showed her boss all the projects she was working on, with their due dates, and she asked him what he would prefer to delay. Instead of saying "no", she showed she was working on a lot of projects and bringing a lot of value, which turned her "no" into a smart self-promotion opportunity.
And as a result, her manager hired an assistant for Caroline.

More Wisdom

Some more nuggets of wisdom:

- When there is a big power difference, appreciative gestures are not to connect, but to make up for the difference: when there are bigger power imbalances, overtures, kindness, or going the extra mile, are not tools to connect, but tools of advocacy to make up for that difference

- Relationships are indispensable for collaborative negotiation: the other party must feel comfortable with you before he or she begins to accept that your commitment to a mutual solution is genuine.

Real-Life Applications

Some good ideas for your negotiations:

- Time your negotiations when you're most needed: try to negotiate when the company needs you the most. And when you're literally more in demand. One woman in the examples set up the negotiation meeting during the hour she was needed the most, with people physically knocking on the door looking for her
- Use intermediaries to positively prime the other party: if you can send someone higher up, or someone the other party is friends with to start influencing your target
- Only share sensitive information after some trust has been built: the example in the book is from a negotiation with the union in which a hotel manager shares the financial of the hotel -something that had never been done before-

But, says the author:

> The timing of this sharing is significant.
> Had Shannon furnished the financial information earlier, the union leadership would probably not have believed they were getting the whole story, and they would have been suspicious about the numbers they were given.
> Shannon, on the other hand, would have risked having that information used against her to extract concessions. Trust on both sides of the table was a precondition for her candor.

So very true.
Only make your biggest overture after some trust and connection have been established, or you give away your biggest weapon too early, and it will not have nearly as much leverage.

Quotes

On negotiation as not an art, but something anyone can learn and get better at:

> It is not surprising that along the way we elevate negotiation to an "art form" practiced by the innately talented. A real estate developer with the instincts of a street fighter attaches the article "the" to his first name and labels what he does The Art of the Deal.
> There is nothing magical or mystical about negotiation. People get better at it with practice.

Watch our what women get praised for, it might as well harm you:

> As one commentator put it, an emphasis on women's special qualities of caring and nurturing amounts to a "setup to be shafted."

On people's tendency to "negotiate against themselves":

> When we worry about whether our demands will be hard to swallow, rather than trying to make them more palatable, we handicap ourselves from the start in the shadow negotiation.

On connections as the antidote towards adversarial negotiations:

> Many negotiations start out with opposing sides squared off. When you connect with the other person, you alter this dynamic.

On mixing both advocacy and connection:

> Advocacy and connection go hand in hand.
> If effective advocacy enables you to claim a place at the table and garners credibility for you and your demands, the relational skills of connection define the engagement that takes place.

CONS

- Could have been briefer

One of the reviewers on Amazon gave this book zero stars writing that it was "too wordy for the average Jane".
To which I replied that with that attitude, Jane will certainly remain average.

- One passage felt a bit random

This passage:

> Women, through their capacity to mother and from their subordinate status at work, have developed not just coping mechanisms but real strengths.

I didn't get how exactly is that strength "developed" through the subordinate status at work.
But it's just a minor sentence on a book that is otherwise well-balanced, rational, and that speaks a lot of sense.

PROS

- Lots of examples

One of the greatest plusses of "The Shadow Negotiation" is that it's full of examples.
That makes it both a more interesting read, and a more effective book to help people learn the concepts.

- Mixing power with warmth

Deborah Kolb's advice for negotiations is to mix advocacy (assertively and smartly pushing for one's own needs) and connection (caring and human empathy).

That is the same approach I advocate on this website when I talk about mixing power with warmth.
Also see: the basic strategies of power.

Review

"The Shadow Negotiation" is a wonderful book to learn more about negotiation.

Deborah Kolb is a sharp mind that sees and understands frames, social dynamics, as well as deeper power dynamics.
Albeit originally marketed at women and for women, I find that it's equally useful to both genders.

Most of all, I liked that it contains a lot of examples, which also makes it a good text for beginners.

The Good Psychopath Guide to Success: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 31 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Good Psychopath Guide (2014) discusses how to leverage dark triad traits to become a successful psychopath. Kevin Dutton says that some psychopathic traits, in the right doses, are advantageous in life, and non-psychopaths can learn to adopt them and become more successful, but without harming others.

Overview

- Some psychopathic traits can help you become more successful
- Some professions require the ability to switch off sympathy or to detach yourself
- Take the good traits of psychopathy, avoid the antisocial ones, and become a "good psychopath" (we teach how in Power University)

Notes

About the Authors:
Kevin Dutton is a British psychologist, researcher, and author. He previously published "The Wisdom of Psychopaths".
Andy McNab is a former British Special Air Service (SAS) operator, novelist and, supposedly, a psychopath. He has been criticized for making up stories.

The Traits of Psychopathy

Kevin Dutton says that many people get psychopathy wrong.

When talking about psychopathy Ted Bundy or Hannibal Lecter comes to mind. But what defines a psychopath is not necessarily a history of heinous murders, but a set of traits that can also be helpful in life.

These traits include:

- Ruthlessness
- Fearlessness
- Impulsivity
- Self-confidence
- Focus
- Coolness under pressure

- Mental toughness
- Charm
- Charisma
- Reduced empathy
- Lack of conscience

Imagine these traits on a “dialing desk”, where you can push them up and down.
Having all of them cranked to the maximum at all times will lead to lots of troubles, poor performance, and self-destruction.

But at the right time, and at the right intensity, they can be helpful and they can help you achieve success.

We agree with that and it obeys the law of balance.
We highly recommend this article to understand the higher level concept:

> The Law of Optimum Balance

Precision-Engineering Psychopathy

Says Dutton:

1. The most effective alignment will depend on circumstances
2. Some jobs, professions, or situations, requires those traits to be cranked up a little higher than “normal” baseline

The precision-engineering psychopathy Kevin Dutton refers to is the alignment of each of the psychopathic traits in a way that will allow you to perform at the top of your abilities, within a specific environment.

Professions Where Psychopathic Traits Help Succeed

Kevin Dutton lists a few professions in which he believes that some psychopathy traits can help.

They are:

- Surgeon: you need to dissociate yourself emotionally from the person you’re operating on, remain calm if something goes wrong
- Businessman: you need to be able to fire people, have the courage to take appropriate risks
- Trader: need to execute trades without getting emotional and avoiding the typical human psychological biases
- Lawyer: needs the narcissism to be at the center of the attention, belligerent self-confidence to make his case

Surgeons for example need to learn how to operate. And they learn by making mistakes. If a surgeon is too sympathetic, he might give up and never become a great and experienced surgeon.

And when it comes to business, McNab says he hopes there are more psychopaths as CEOs:

But he might not need to hope too much.
Also see:

> The Myth of Emotional Intelligence: Machiavellis At The Top

Good Psychopath VS Bad Psychopath

Kevin Dutton says we can differentiate between good and bad psychopaths.

The differences revolve around a number of key components that make up our social environment, including other people, social context, interpersonal social dynamics, and society at large.

So here are the differences:

	Bad Psychopath	Good Psychopath
Others	No compunction in inflicting pain onto others	Doesn't cause undue or unnecessary harm
Context	He is stuck at high levels of psychopathy, in all situations	Psychologically flexible, can adapt his behavior
Society	Has no concern for the consequences of his actions	Leverages his traits to contribute to society at large
Learning	Never learn how to best channel psychopathic traits	Learn how to use it for win-win with Power University
Bottom line	Psychopathy is a curse	Psychopathy is a talent

But this isn't the whole story.
The authors say that it's possible to be both of them at the same time.
And the "functional psychopath" and the "successful psychopath" are also part of the discourse.

- Functional Psychopath: the term was introduced, but not really described. The way I understood it though, it means that you have psychopathic traits, but "modulate" your traits to enhance your skills and work effectively within society
- Successful Psychopath: both good and bad psychopaths can be successful. The bad ones can threaten, cheat, lie, or manipulate their way to the top

The level of intelligence and predisposition to violence also heavily influence the trajectory that psychopaths can take.

- Violent and non-intelligent: Violent and non-intelligent psychopaths have very poor prospects, likely to hand in a gang, in prison, dead, or… All of them
- Non-violent and non-intelligent: If you remove violence, then it gets a little bit better, and the psychopaths will end up being a small timer crook, con-artist, or drug dealer. He might still end up in prison, but for smaller charges
- Non-violent and intelligent: the best combination. The authors say you're most likely to make a killing in the market and enjoy the fruits your work
- Violent and intelligent: exotic occupations become possible, from the head of a criminal organization, to spy or special services

The authors go on with further divides among psychopaths, including "good/good guys" (James Bond), bad/good guys" (Gordon Gekko), "bad/bad guys" (Hannibal Lecter" and the "good/bad guys" (Dexter).
But I didn't find this part to be very clear or enlightening (plus, how is Dexter "good"?).

The 7 Skills of Good Psychopaths

Dutton lists seven skills of the good psychopath, to which he dedicates a chapter each:

1. Just do it: psychopaths don't waste time, and neither should you
    1. Procrastination prolongs the pain in the short term, arms you in the long run, and wastes mental resources
    2. We overplay the risks compared to the rewards. Psychopaths are very reward-driven and don't fall for that mental bias

2. Nail it: you must learn how to switch one when it really matters, and play to win
3. Be your own person: psychopaths are not afraid of not fitting and doing their own thing, no matter what others think.
   1. Know what you want to be, and know what you don't want to be
   2. Learn to withstand social pressure, to say no when you don't want something, and to enforce your boundaries
4. Become a persuasion black belt: "getting into the minds of their preys give them a distinct advantage"
   1. Frame it as if it's within their self-interest to do it
   2. Make them feel good about doing what you want them to do
   3. Learn how to empathize to tailor your message to the target
   4. Learn how frames work, and how to control the frame to persuade others
5. Take it on the chin (move on): psychopaths move on. They don't beat themselves up and don't have regrets
   1. Ask yourself: "what would I do if I didn't take this personally" and "what would I do if I didn't feel the heat"
   2. Stop taking accusations personally. First of all, we over-attribute intent to what people say or do. And even if they meant it, the problem is with them, not you.
6. Live in the moment: be focused when it matters. Psychopaths share this trait with elite Buddhist monks and great athletes
   1. Anxieties often stem not from reality, from anxieties of our own anxieties (second-order emotion)
7. Uncouple behavior from emotions: take a spet back and remove emotions from the situation

> Godfather: it's not personal, Sonny, it's strictly business

When Michael Corleone shows he's uncoupling emotions from the action, you know he is ready to become the godfather.

Beating Procrastination: Know Your Style

Kevin Dutton says there are three types of procrastinators:

1. Ruminators: not making a decision absolves from the responsibility of the outcomes of that decision
2. Avoidants: are avoiding the fear of failure (or fear of success). They fear what others think of them, and would rather people think they lack effort, than ability
3. Perfectionists: they'd rather do nothing than having to measure up to their own unreachable standards

They all lie to themselves saying they will feel more like to do it on another day (they won't), that it isn't important (it is), and that they work best under pressure (not true).

Procrastination reduces your success in the long run, of course. But it's also bad in the short run. People who dawdle only prolong the discomfort within themselves.

To counteract procrastination:

1. Visualize yourself doing it: carrying it out successfully and overcoming the challenges
2. Find out exactly what you don't like: once you know what it is, you can start working through them (this was very helpful for me, for example finding ways to cut down on the parts I disliked the most)
3. Focus on the future: the benefits it will bring, and how you will feel once you've done it
4. Plan and ring-fence the activity
5. Downsize your time: procrastinators wait for the perfect time and long stretches of free time. Instead, do whatever you can, in the little time you might have

6. Destroy perfectionism
    1. Find out your bullying voice that demands perfection
    2. Talk back to it
    3. Take appropriate action
    4. Celebrate doing it rather than doing it perfectly
    5. Do it repeatedly
    6. Sometimes set out with failure as your goal, just to realize that failure and rejections aren't such a bad thing

Life Has No Meaning: It Just Wants to See If You're Good Enough

This was a brief passage, but very deep and philosophical.

Kevin Dutton quotes Albert Camus, who said that life has no meaning whatsoever.
That's hard for many people to grasp, since most people need meaning in life (also see: "Man's Search for Meaning").
But for psychopaths and trained SAS soldiers, says Dutton, there is no need for meaning.

The Traits of Good Special Forces Soldiers

I frankly missed the connection between "meaning in life" and how that applies to psychopaths and/or to special forces.

But Dutton says the traits that make good special forces soldiers are:

1. The ability to let things wash over them
2. Not take things personally
3. Not dwell on the past
4. Not overthink the present
5. Not worry unduly about the future

More Wisdom

- Psychopathy might be on a scale: Kevin Dutton says the debate is still on. In the past, it was thought that you either are, or are not a psychopath. Today it seems more like it's a matter of shades of grey in between the black and white
- Psychopaths learn more from rewards than punishment: psychopaths are slower to learn than normal people when they are taught through punishments. But they are quicker to learn when they are taught with rewards.
- Psychopaths are more drawn to rewards than punishments: and that's why they are more concerned about winning than avoiding losses
- In the special forces, there is more respect, more emotional detachment, and less violence: special forces are more about being effective, than getting emotionally worked up. They don't call the enemies "enemies", but "players"
- Dutton says that psychopaths have an empathy switch which by default is on "off". But if instructed to put themselves into other people's shoes, they did feel empathy

Also, learn more on dark psychology here, and manipulation here:

> Manipulation: Techniques, Strategies, & Ethics

Real-Life Applications

- Quick being too nice, be comfortable with conflict: evidence shows that folks who are too agreeable (ie.: too nice) earn less than less agreeable folks
- Respond to situations instead of reacting to people: if you find it difficult to say no, learn to de-personalize the situation and answer to the proposal or requests, instead than to the people who are asking you. That way, it will be easier to say "no", and you will make more rational decisions

CRITICISM

Naive Self-Help

It's funny:

How can a book on "how to be a good psychopath" be naive self-help?

Because, this is the "psychopath guide to success" based on Andy's history:

- Join the army & get sent out to a senseless war
- Invent stories that sell books and make you famous
- Get an accredited psychologist as a co-author
- Charm said psychologist to write well about you
- Write nothing about that book
- Get a good chunk of the revenues of that book
- Milk the extra fame for more money
- Enjoy life

There is much to learn there.
Especially on the "charisma of psychopaths" to charm certain men.
But… It's not in the book.

Is There Such A Thing As A "Good Psychopath"?

Same as for Dutton's previous book, there is criticism regarding whether or not psychopaths can be good.

This time it's Lilian Glass, author of "Verbal Self-Defense", to criticize the idea of a good psychopath.
In an interview with NPR, Glass says that psychopaths are dangeorus, and to write a book inviting people to act more like psychopaths, is dangerous.

She says:

> If you are a psychopath, you don't dial up the levels of the traits. … It can't be done. Psychopaths don't pick and choose how ruthless or nonempathetic they will be.
> They are these traits, and it is not by degree.

Personally, I am in between Dutton and Glass, but closer to Dutton when it comes to how useful his argument is to most people.

Such as, a clinical psychopath will hardly choose to be "good". But "good" people with empathy and who don't see others as pawns to be maneuvered, can learn to be more successful by learning to use some psychopathy traits.
And they can do so without harming others or also while largely remaining forces for good.

For a sobering read on the explosive cocktail that the psychopath's selfish, amorality, and power-craving can lead to, please read:

- Confessions of a psychopath: my sexual strategies

> Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

Some Psychopath Traits Feel Embellished or Mistakenly Applied to All Psychopaths

For example:

- Psychopaths live in the moment like Buddhist monks?

Dutton says that psychopaths and the best Buddhist monks share a mental state of mindfulness and living in the moment.

But when he put that question to Mark Williams, professor of clinical psychology at Oxford and founder of mindfulness-based cognitive behavioral therapy, Mark disagreed.
Mark said that psychopaths are more about "devouring" the present moment, more than savoring it. And Andy agreed -albeit he added that "savoring or devouring is better than missing it altogether"-.

Dutton himself in the book sayd of Andy McNab that he has the "attention-span of a goldish on speed" (if I remember the drug correctly).
Which does not seem do go along well with mindfulness.

- Psychopaths great at persuasion?

I'm not sure how much we can generalize on psychopaths being great at persuasion.

Sure, they like to manipulate people so you might expect they might get good at it.
But that's far from being a given.

- Psychopaths have more sexual partners?

Albeit it's true that dark-triad men have more sexual partners, I also wouldn't generalize on psychopaths abilities with the ladies.

Also read: Do psychopaths get laid more?

- Psychopaths better at making rational financial decisions?

Dutton also says that the most successful brokers might "plausibly be termed" functional psychopaths, thus suggesting that decoupling emotions from decisions is a psychopath-only ability.

But based on what does he say that?

Some of the best investors, like Ray Dalio and Warren Buffet, don't strike me as being high in psychopathy.
Quite the opposite.

McNab Contradicts The Idea of Successfully Removing Emotions From Decision-

Making

As the “psychopath in house”, McNab is often used for real-life examples of the principles.

McNab says he bought a Porsche 911 not because he wanted it, but because he wanted to “show” the salesman who hadn’t taken him seriously that he could buy it.
Very funny story and well written. But contradicts this ideal of psychopaths removing emotions from decisions -at least in that situation-.

Can You Trust The Stories of A Psychopath?

There is another trait of psychopathy that Dutton forgets to mention: manipulation and lies.

If someone is a psychopath, what he says should probably be taken with a pinch of salt.
One of the traits of psychopathy is fearlessness.
But when McNab tells the story of his first shootout in the army, he says he was “scared, really scared”.

McNab’s “Bravo to Zero” book has also been criticized by several sources for being fabricated or “embellished”.
The denials of McNab’s claims also come from his own colleagues in the mission (see a short summary of the criticism in the Wikipedia entry).

Good Psychopaths Likely Make For Shitty Leaders

This is something Dutton never talks about.

A lack of conscience and a lack of empathy likely make for really bad leaders.

Here is how to make this point clear.
Dutton asked McNab if he would sacrifice a spy to feed the wrong information to the enemy. If the spy is captured, the victory will happen marginally quicker, and with slightly fewer casualties.

But here is what being captured meant for the spy:

> He would be horrendesouly tortured, mutilated, and ultimately killed

To which Andy McNab replies:

> Of course I would why wouldn’t I?
> Because he’s loyal and brilliant, I hazard.
> (Andy laughs)
> Then all the more reasons to use him

From a utilitarian point of view and exchanging one life for a few more lives, it might still make sense.
But, first of all, it might not make utilitarian sense from a total of pain being borne by the troops.

And second, who on their right mind would want to work for such a boss, with so little respect for his own loyal men, and with so little respect for human suffering?

Do Psychopaths Even Make For Great Warriors?

I partially agree with McNab and Dutton.

There certainly are some psychopathic traits that can make for better warriors.
The lack of fear, the drive for stimulation, the risk-taking attitude, the ability to focus and concentrate, and also the lack of empathy that makes PTSD less likely.

However, there are also psychopathic traits that make for very bad warriors.

Says neuroscientist -and psychopath himself- James Fallon ((opens in a new tab)Fallon, 2013):

> The problem with inviting psychopaths to war, however, is that the military also wants soldiers to be team players who can connect with their unit and fight not only against the enemy but for their own.

Psychopaths have no allegiance, and are in only for themselves.

And says psychopath researcher Dr. Robert Hare (Hare, 1993):

> When in the rare case they make the selection into high-risk fighting units, they are seen as "cowboys" and "loose cannons" and usually don't last long

Yep, lots of psychopaths are just that: loose cannons.

Exaggerates the Incidence of Psychopathy

Says one of the authors:

> Take banking and politics. The financial centers of the world and our leader are filled with psychopaths. Totally focused, totally ruthless.

"Filled"?
That sounds like an exaggeration. And I don't see much "total focus" or much emotional detachment in many politicians, for example Donald Trump, whom many think might be a narcissist.

Machiavellianism Might Be More Helpful

If we're exploring dark triad traits for life success, then probably Machiavellianism is better.

Machiavellianism overlaps with factor 1 psychopathy, which is the subclinical level of psychopathy.
Dutton could have probably explained that a bit better.

Quotes

A brain surgeon on brain surgery:

> The brain represents the high seas of modern-day medicine. And the 21st-century brain surgeon is pirates and buccaneering.

On what rises to the top:

> There are two things that rises at the top: the cream, and the scum.

On not turning the other cheek:

> Is turning the other cheek a legitimate strategy by which to live one's life? Science I tell Andy has in fact come up with an answer, and it's "no".
> Research has shown that responding to nice people by being nice, and to not nice people by being not nice, is by far the most effective way forward.

On fighting tips:

> The first thing you learn when you're taught the noble art of street fighting in the regiment is that you never go > down during a fight. Hardly anyone can throw a decent punch. But everyone can kick.

On not taking things personally:

> If someone is insulting, abusing you, or manipulating you, then the problem is not about you, it's about them. It's about their issues, not yours. It's about their problem, not yours. It's about their personality, not yours.
> Of course, that you think it's all about you, and not about them, that's about you.

CONS

- Would have preferred fewer lad-stories and more information

There are a lot of stories, all told in a "lad in a pub" style that might seem out of a place in a book written by a psychologist, and meant to be taken seriously.

That makes it more of a pop-science book.
Nothing wrong with that. But sometimes I wished for fewer stories and deeper information or citations.

On the other hand, some of the stories did add value.

- Some self-promotional and ego-stroking stories

There are a few "ego-stroking" stories and "look at me how cool I am" self-descriptions.
For example, when Andy speaks about himself:

> It didn't matter if I was going to be number 1 through the door of an hostage rescue or going under cover with a South London accent or, these days, talking to the board members of a company that's going tits up because they don't know their asses from their elbows.
> Fuck it, I'll get away with it. I always have. Even as a kid…

A meme for ex-military books and memoirs comes to mind:

Source: https://ifunny.co/picture/there-i-was-surrounded-knee-deep-in-hand-grenade-pins-938z0Yqd6
Plus, on that Andy's quote, he himself says that he's been in prison.
And he got caught in Iraq, too. So he didn't exactly "always get away" with it, as he states.

- Sometimes insensitive towards victims of abuse

There are several examples of domestic abuse, including one where a former SAS soldier killed his wife.

But there is not a word of condemnation for abuse.
Sometimes, it seems to actually make light fun of it. Talking about the incident in which Andy's former colleagues killed his partner, he says that the argument "didn't go well".

- Heavy in Brit slang and culture

In the "Wisdom of Psychopaths" there was already a heavy dose of brit-centrism.
For example, the author said that "if you didn't know Andy McNab, the most famous soldier since Henry, you have been living on the moon" (or something like that).

Well, I had no idea who that guy was, and I've been living on earth.
Just outside of Britain.

And the Brit-centrism kicks into higher gear here.
For example, analyzing one result, he says that you are "50% Russel Brand, and 50% Jo Brand". Russel Brand is famous enough outside of Britain, but few know Jo Brand, so both the joke and the information are lost.

The English slang and colloquialisms also get thick. Couple it with the heavy British accent of the narrators, and some American and international listeners might.

- Sometimes, misplaced admiration for psychopathy

The author says that non-psychopaths "envy" the psychopath's ability to break free from the shackles of societal restraint and from our own self-consciousness.
And then he says: "but you guys, you psychopaths can, and I think in that sense we envy your existential freedom".

There is a lot of bromance between these two. And sometimes I suspected that Dutton might have been under Andy's spell.

- The power posing effect on hormones

That "power posing" changes hormones concentration has been disputed. Everyone still talks about it, which makes a typical case of pop-psychology, but it failed replication. And it's one of the main examples of the recent psychology replication crisis.
On the other hand, it does make people feel more powerful, so at least some elements of the study stand.

- The pick-up line that works every time?

This one, Dutton says, worked every time it was used in an experiment that I couldn't personally check:

> "My mates me bet me 20 quid that I couldn't start up a conversation with the best looking girl in the bar. So how about we go buy some drinks and spend their money"

But the line only works if you later add a compliment, says Dutton.
But I'm unconvinced.

PROS

- Same philosophy as ThePowerMoves on "being bad", to be good

Albeit it's expressed somewhat differently and my version of "being bad" goes beyond psychopathy, we both embrace similar philosophies.

I wholeheartedly agree that to be good, people learn how to be bad, and to learn about the darker side of human nature.

Where more empathic and less selfish people reach the top, it's a win for everyone.

- Good case for the usefulness of some psychopathy traits

Albeit saying that some psychopathy traits can be useful in life is bound to be controversial, I ultimately agree with Dutton.

- Some funny jokes

Sometimes the authors tried too hard to be funny.
But there were also very good lines.
For example:

> If he orders liver and Chianti for lunch, I'm off

Review

The Good Psychopath Guide is a good book built on an insight we both share: being a good psychopath is, in a way, the goal of this website.
While it's great for beginners, to be truly helpful for ambitious men, it needs more refinement and practical application that a mass-market book may struggle to deliver.

Power University helps you become a good psychopath.

Given our alignment, I nitpicked in this review.
I had to ensure readers understand psychopathy and don't see it through some rose-tinted glasses.

My point of view on this is that it's unlikely that clinical psychopaths can be good psychopaths, but empathic people can and should learn to become good psychopaths.
Empaths can learn to become more like good psychopaths, and thus increase their personal power and leverage, while not harming society or potentially even contributing to it.

The Good Psychopath's Guide: 7 Traits for Success (Summary)

The Good Psychopath Guide (2014) discusses how to leverage dark triad traits to become a successful psychopath. Kevin Dutton says that some psychopathic traits, in the right doses, are advantageous in life, and non-psychopaths can learn to adopt them and become more successful, but without harming others.

Benevolent Racism: The Hidden Power Play Behind White Sympathy

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

After the murder –or martyrdom– of George Floyd, the messages of support towards the black community have been pouring in -or, shall we say, flooding social media-.

In many ways, that's a good thing.
It shows people are empathetic, and that some of them want to see a better world.

But from a power dynamic point of view, we can see a different story to it.
And from a mental empowerment point of view, virtue-signaling towards "black people" is mental poison.

Let's dig deeper.

Sympathizing with colored folks for purportedly being oppressed only confirms a two-classes world. Progressive folks and empowered people of color alike do NOT think of themselves as victims.

Intro: What's Benevolent Racism

We define benevolent racism as:

> "Support or sympathy towards individuals of a minority race that—while well-meaning on the surface—reinforces a power imbalance by implying inferiority or victimhood."

Benevolent racism recalls the more popular 'benevolent sexism', later enlarged to 'benevolent prejudice' by some.

This article introduces the term benevolent racism, and we expand the power dynamics and socio-psychological consequences.
Many of these dynamics apply to benevolent prejudice in general.

Benevolent sexism parallels

Benevolent sexism is a popular and accepted term, both in and in academia.
But, I argue in this post, the underlying power dynamics are similar for both.

Quoting from The SAGE Handbook of Gender and Psychology:

> Benevolent sexism can be manifested in several ways, such as by introducing restrictions on women's activities in order to protect them (Moya, Glick, Expdsito, de Lemus, & Hart, 2007) or by paternalistic forms of help (Becker, Glick, Ilic, & Bohner, 2011).
> Such behaviors are enveloped in a positive layer of protection and flattery, but they also subtly convey the belief in women's inferior abilities to defend themselves, help themselves, or deserve rewards. The positive tone of benevolent sexism is thus only superficial.

Similarly, benevolent racism may:

- Offer sympathies for minorities
- Discuss 'white privilege', 'admitting it' or even attacking it
- Support 'equality of outcome' instead of equality of opportunities
- Suppress research into possible differences among classes of people

The first two indirectly suggest that minorities are disadvantaged.
And, in so doing, may reinforce that belief in people's minds.

And the last two suggest that different capabilities are the root cause of the issues (or else you would welcome equality of opportunities), and that nobody can handle those truths and use them to better themselves (or else you would welcome research).

The Power Dynamics of White's Sympathy

We first introduced covert power moves on this website.

Covert power moves are words or actions that on the surface are friendly and supportive.
But that, on a second level order, hide a power relationship where the person being friendly and supportive is disempowering the receiver.

Examples of covert power moves are:

- "Sorry for not picking up your call" (= you were not a high priority for me)
- "I'm sorry that you had to wait for me here" (= I have the power to let you wait)

These examples are kind and sympathetic on the surface.
And the speaker might even mean well.
But they also hide a power dynamic where the speaker is disempowering the receiver and pushing him down the hierarchical ladder.

Offering support works in the same way.

Offering support indirectly says that you need support because, apparently, you are not doing too well in life (but they are).

Attention, with that I'm not saying that most white folks are consciously disempowering black folks.
Many people are being warm and welcoming and many of them really feel empathy and want to help.

But some others, of course, are riding the SJW wave.
Many starlets and public figures belong to this category (Emma Watson example):

Emma Watson "stands with you" ("you" who?)

Even our beloved virtue signalers might in the end be OK persons and somewhat well-meaning.
But still… Even if they mean no active harm, in this case, virtue signalers' support still re-affirms a power dynamic that empowers them and disempowers the subjects of their "support".
Virtue signaling is to the benefit of the signaler, and rarely if ever of the receiver (Miller, 2019)

The duality of wanting to help but actually harming is something that other researchers have noted as well.

Take linguist researcher Deborah Tannen, for example. Tannen says that asking someone "where are you from" as a first question can be both an attempt to connect and a power move, as it can both seek to connect and pin someone down.

And the same can be said of gender relations.
Kim Scott for example says that men treating women with kid gloves at work might have wanted to be nice, but they were actually relegating them as second class citizens in the office.
That type of kindness, she correctly points out, is damaging women.
Men who are nice in fear of hurting women are also indirectly saying that women are not strong enough to play within a level playing field. It says that women need that help. And that men are the powerful ones who need to dispense that help.

It's the same for the sympathy expressed by white folks to black folks.
The support and sympathy of white folks towards blacks also indirectly say:

> "I am (somewhat) superior and more powerful".

Or, at least:

> "I am a somewhat higher class citizen".

There is also another element that disempowers "black folks". And it's addressing them as a collective.

Don't Let "Black" Stifle Your Uniqueness

It's great to offer support to individuals as individuals.

But it's disempowering to support individuals for their (supposedly) group of belonging.

Why?

Because when people address you by your group belonging, you become "a black person", and they disempower you of telling and controlling your own story.
You become "a (random, nameless) black person", with all the stereotypes attached to it. And it strips your uniqueness away.

The same happens when people frame you with other groups of belongings, like with nationalities, for example.
This is why when people ask me "where are you from", I give a fuzzy answer ("Originally, from there, but I studied abroad, I live there, and travel all the time… So, I'm international, really).
I do that because I don't want any fucking one to pin me down with Italian stereotypes. Don't get me wrong: I like being Italian, but I am still an individual, I carve my own path in life, I write my own story, and I present my own story, unencumbered by stereotypes.

Finally, framing a single case of brutality as a "black people issue" also serves to confirm the status quo.
Indirectly, it confirms that indeed society empowers a certain ethnicity and disempowers another.
And while there might be some truth to it, when you keep repeating it, you also make it more real, and you contribute to keeping it alive.

And that's an unhealthy worldview to internalize. It's dangerous to internalize that being black is such as huge handicap (and it's not).
It's the highway road to a victim mentality.
And white people's "support" only reinforces the nonsense narrative that blacks are at a big disadvantage in life.

Don't believe that shit not even for a nanosecond.

This is about personal empowerment.
If this isn't yet clear, please read this post on enlightened individualism:

> Enlightened Self-Interest: Making of The Ubermensch

You're Bigger Than Any Single Trait, Always Remember That

Individuals are made up of a multitude of traits and belonging.

Their genders, skin color, eye color, nationalities, sexual preferences, preferences, skills, attitudes etc. etc.

Reducing them to just one, however visible it might be, is disempowering.

Now let's be honest: there might be some truth in the "white privilege" thing.
But to me, it's still BS.
So, white skin might confer some advantages under some circumstances. So what?

Advantages and disadvantages are part of life, and the same is true for all possible traits you can imagine.
From eye color, to amount of hair on your head, to height, to IQ, to… Whatever. Any trait will confer either some advantage or some advantages under certain circumstances.
And you can rise above each one of them.

Stop Babying Others

Telling others that you "support" them makes people feel good.

It makes them feel good because they can feel kind. And because, unconsciously, as we saw, it says that you are more powerful than they are.

Somehow, this often happens to race.
Probably, because race is such an important issue in much of the US. But that doesn't your "support" any less condescending.
But as much as you don't publish posts telling short or unintelligent or people that you "support" them, it's condescending to tell black people that you "support" them.

Me, I don't think that any race or group as a whole needs my support.
I think there are countless individuals within those groups who are strong and capable enough to control their own destiny, and to far more successful than most individuals in any other race or group.

Addressing the whole group is highly condescending towards those folks.

Here is an example of condescending, borderline de-humanizing support I have recently seen on my Linkedin wall:

> Her: I see you and support you

So self-congratulatory, and so offensive. It implies that (most) others don't see "them".
Cut the haughty pomp, your black friends and colleagues have names, and they probably don't know what to do with your condescension.

How Benevolence Reinforces Victim Mentality

What we've just described so far is bad enough.

But there is a pernicious, deeper danger of constant sympathetic messages.
And unless you're aware of the power dynamics, it can go unnoticed.

Sympathetic messages frame you as "poor you", a victim.
To me, there is nothing more offensive, and nothing that angers me more quickly, than a "poor you" frame.

If you don't question the "poor you" frame, you can start believing it, and it can become your reality.
The danger of accepting people's support without questioning it is the internalization of the belief that you do need support because the deck is stacked against you.
The danger is that you internalize that "poor you".
When you internalize that, you are also accepting that you do are indeed a second class citizen.

You should be worried and afraid of internalizing that belief, because it's terribly dangerous.
When you internalize it, you start believing it. And you start to act accordingly.

The consequences are two, and they stem from the same internalization of the "poor you" frame

1. Learned helplessness: whatever you do, you can't win
2. Lashing out in anger and becoming anti-social

Two very different scenarios, but both being the consequence of believing that it's too difficult for you to win in this society.

And white people's "support" is reinforcing the idea that you can't do anything to succeed in this society:

So is this implying that a black person “cannot have a cellphone”, or “go jogging”? Don’t let this BS virtue-signaling sway you. You CAN do anything you want in life!

There is a good scene from the movie “Menace II Society” that well shows what I mean.

The black protagonist, Caine, is talking to a close girlfriend.
The girlfriend is encouraging him to move, pursue self-development, and leave behind small-timing burglaries and drug dealing.

I found the movie, and edited so you can see it:

> Caine: Ain’t nothing gonna change in Atlanta. I mean, I’m still gonna be black. Just another nigga from the ghetto

Caine internalized the belief that there is no chance in life for him because he’s black.
What a fucking tragedy!
This is called learned helplessness in psychology (Seligman, 1991), and it’s the belief that no matter what you do, you can’t win.

And virtue signaling messages contribute to creating learned helplessness among black folks.
It’s ironic, but the sympathetic messages that want to offer support do more harm than good.

That’s why I recommend black folks to put up shields against superficial and general support and sympathy.
Stand guard to the gates of your mind, friends.

You’re first-class, top 1% citizen, if you want.
Think it, believe it, dress it, act it.

Experiment: “Whites” in The Condescended Shoes

Some white folks these days are inviting others to put themselves in black people’s shoes.

That’s always a great exercise.

The first part of that exercise, the one that everyone is embracing, is to “feel the pain” of black people.
Great.

Now let’s finish the exercise, though.
Let’s add the power dynamics part I’m addressing here.

And put yourself in the shoes of being the subject of your own friendly support.

Here is what other races could tell white people:

- Jew person: I’m sorry there is a pandemic of white people being born with such lower IQs compared to us. Society shouldn’t discriminate against lower IQ. I stand with you, white people.
- Asian person: I’m sorry white people have to be born so selfishly individualistic. And so unconscientious, with such poor work ethics. Society shouldn’t discriminate against poor work ethics. I stand with you, white people.
  - Asian woman: I’m sorry white girls are so unfeminine and white guys prefer us. It’s not fair that men like feminine women more. I stand with you, white women.
- Black person: I’m sorry white people have no street smarts, have little dicks, and cannot sprint or jump. Society shouldn’t discriminate against any of that. I stand with you, white people.

Albeit these examples are obviously exaggerated, they also show the “other side of the coin” of offering support and sympathy -the power dynamics side-.

How would any empowered white person answer to any of that?
Any empowered white person wouldn't even want to hear any of that.

And this is how they might answer:

- Thanks, but I'm doing great. My IQ is fine. And power intelligence matters more anyway: all that IQ didn't help you avoid a history of prosecutions, it seems (huge one-up back)
- Thanks, but I'm doing great. Western work ethics allowed Westerners to rule the world, so I think we're pretty fine (medium one-up back)
- Thanks, but I'm doing great. Girls love my dick, and I prefer swimming and long-lasting sports to sprints (mild one-up back)

You will notice that these answers are more on the aggressive aside.

From a framing point of view, they (correctly) read the initial "offer of help" not as a friendly gesture, but as an attempt at one-upping, and they answer with a one-up back of their own.

Answering with a one-up defends your own power, and also serves to protect one's own mind and self-esteem. After that, you can move to move conciliatory tones.

However, since messages of support rarely show the true power dynamics so obviously, you need to answer with more tact.

Let's see:

How to Handle Benevolent Sexism

How to answer to all the condescension we've just described?

How can a black person answer, without being aggressive, while also defending his individuality and his personal power?

Here is an example:

> White person: (chest out, with the pride of the self-appointed savior) You have all my support. I stand with you!
> Black person: Thanks. But… "You" who, and… Support for what? (a simple question that will dismantle his whole self-righteous frame)
> White person: For the racism man. That's disgusting that you guys must go through that so often. I can't imagine what it's like
> Black person: Thank you, I appreciate your friendliness (don't call it "support").
> I suppose some policemen see some races with more animosity than others, in limited cases (reframe the problem as localized, instead of general).
> But hey, I'm Alex (shrugh shoulders, as if to say "I'm me", and distance yourself from the group, reclaim your power as an individual).
> And personally, I'm doing great (reclaim your power as an individual 2).
> I see life as a world of opportunities, not threats (frame yourself as a high quality man, not as "a black dude").
> This is a life of opportunity for those who want to take them (switch the tables: maybe he could use some of your support, instead?)

That's it.
Power reclaimed.

How to Address It Socially: Building Bridges

The other problem of generalized white sympathy is that it tends to vilify police.

Again, the issue is the same: support "blacks" as a whole and vilify "police" as a whole.

Bridges and healthy individualism are the answer.
Some cops are racist and scum.
Some protesters are thugs.

Unluckily, when we tend to paint everyone with broad brushes, we only flame the fires of hatred.
And we're only more likely to get hatred.

Probably, most cops are good and/or normal people worthy of respect.
And the same is true for most people of color, and of most random groups you want to pick.

To get over this, be the first to condemn the bad apples within your group of belonging.
Then, build bridges and spread the love.
And extend some love to policemen as well.
They're humans, too.

SUMMARY

The avalanche of messages of sympathy and support towards the black community is, overall, a good sign.

It's a sign that people care.

However, there is one potentially disturbing element of support:

1. Generalized messages of support de-individualize individuals and places everyone under the supposed "black guy disadvantage"
2. Constant messages of sympathy reinforce the notion (reality?) that people of color are second-class citizens

Both of them disempower the black community.

That's why, ultimately, I would advise people of color to distance themselves from that support.
Politely say "thanks", but immediately reclaim your power as an individual.

And never think of yourself as moving in a world where you can't win.
Fuck anyone who implies you're a victim. You make your own world, my friend.

But, I argue in this post, the underlying power dynamics are similar for both.

Quoting from The SAGE Handbook of Gender and Psychology:

> Benevolent sexism can be manifested in several ways, such as by introducing restrictions on women's activities in order to protect them (Moya, Glick, Expdsito, de Lemus, & Hart, 2007) or by paternalistic forms of help (Becker, Glick, Ilic, & Bohner, 2011).
> Such behaviors are enveloped in a positive layer of protection and flattery, but they also subtly convey the belief in women's inferior abilities to defend themselves, help themselves, or deserve rewards. The positive tone of benevolent sexism is thus only superficial.

Similarly, benevolent racism may:

- Offer sympathies for minorities
- Discuss 'white privilege', 'admitting it' or even attacking it
- Support 'equality of outcome' instead of equality of opportunities
- Suppress research into possible differences among classes of people

The first two indirectly suggest that minorities are disadvantaged.
And, in so doing, may reinforce that belief in people's minds.

And the last two suggest that different capabilities are the root cause of the issues (or else you would welcome equality of opportunities), and that nobody can handle those truths and use them to better themselves (or else you would welcome research).

The Power Dynamics of White's Sympathy

We first introduced covert power moves on this website.

Covert power moves are words or actions that on the surface are friendly and supportive.
But that, on a second level order, hide a power relationship where the person being friendly and supportive is disempowering the receiver.

Examples of covert power moves are:

- "Sorry for not picking up your call" (= you were not a high priority for me)
- "I'm sorry that you had to wait for me here" (= I have the power to let you wait)

These examples are kind and sympathetic on the surface.
And the speaker might even mean well.
But they also hide a power dynamic where the speaker is disempowering the receiver and pushing him down the hierarchical ladder.

Offering support works in the same way.

Offering support indirectly says that you need support because, apparently, you are not doing too well in life (but they are).

Attention, with that I'm not saying that most white folks are consciously disempowering black folks.
Many people are being warm and welcoming and many of them really feel empathy and want to help.

But some others, of course, are riding the SJW wave.
Many starlets and public figures belong to this category (Emma Watson example):

Emma Watson "stands with you" ("you" who?)

Even our beloved virtue signalers might in the end be OK persons and somewhat well-meaning.
But still… Even if they mean no active harm, in this case, virtue signalers' support still re-affirms a power dynamic that empowers them and disempowers the subjects of their "support".
Virtue signaling is to the benefit of the signaler, and rarely if ever of the receiver (Miller, 2019)

The duality of wanting to help but actually harming is something that other researchers have noted as well.

Take linguist researcher Deborah Tannen, for example. Tannen says that asking someone "where are you from" as a first question can be both an attempt to connect and a power move, as it can both seek to connect and pin someone down.

And the same can be said of gender relations.
Kim Scott for example says that men treating women with kid gloves at work might have wanted to be nice, but they were actually relegating them as second class citizens in the office.
That type of kindness, she correctly points out, is damaging women.
Men who are nice in fear of hurting women are also indirectly saying that women are not strong enough to play within a level playing field. It says that women need that help. And that men are the powerful ones who need to dispense that help.

It's the same for the sympathy expressed by white folks to black folks.
The support and sympathy of white folks towards blacks also indirectly say:

> "I am (somewhat) superior and more powerful".

Or, at least:

> "I am a somewhat higher class citizen".

There is also another element that disempowers "black folks". And it's addressing them as a collective.

Don't Let "Black" Stifle Your Uniqueness

It's great to offer support to individuals as individuals.

But it's disempowering to support individuals for their (supposedly) group of belonging.

Why?

Because when people address you by your group belonging, you become "a black person", and they disempower you of telling and controlling your own story.
You become "a (random, nameless) black person", with all the stereotypes attached to it. And it strips your uniqueness away.

The same happens when people frame you with other groups of belongings, like with nationalities, for example.
This is why when people ask me "where are you from", I give a fuzzy answer ("Originally, from there, but I studied abroad, I live there, and travel all the time… So, I'm international, really).
I do that because I don't want any fucking one to pin me down with Italian stereotypes. Don't get me wrong: I like being Italian, but I am still an individual, I carve my own path in life, I write my own story, and I present my own story, unencumbered by stereotypes.

Finally, framing a single case of brutality as a "black people issue" also serves to confirm the status quo.
Indirectly, it confirms that indeed society empowers a certain ethnicity and disempowers another.
And while there might be some truth to it, when you keep repeating it, you also make it more real, and you contribute to keeping it alive.

And that's an unhealthy worldview to internalize. It's dangerous to internalize that being black is such as huge handicap (and it's not).
It's the highway road to a victim mentality.
And white people's "support" only reinforces the nonsense narrative that blacks are at a big disadvantage in life.

Don't believe that shit not even for a nanosecond.

This is about personal empowerment.
If this isn't yet clear, please read this post on enlightened individualism:

> Enlightened Self-Interest: Making of The Ubermensch

You're Bigger Than Any Single Trait, Always Remember That

Individuals are made up of a multitude of traits and belonging.

Their genders, skin color, eye color, nationalities, sexual preferences, preferences, skills, attitudes etc. etc.

Reducing them to just one, however visible it might be, is disempowering.

Now let's be honest: there might be some truth in the "white privilege" thing.
But to me, it's still BS.
So, white skin might confer some advantages under some circumstances. So what?

Advantages and disadvantages are part of life, and the same is true for all possible traits you can imagine.
From eye color, to amount of hair on your head, to height, to IQ, to… Whatever. Any trait will confer either some advantage or some advantages under certain circumstances.
And you can rise above each one of them.

Stop Babying Others

Telling others that you "support" them makes people feel good.

It makes them feel good because they can feel kind. And because, unconsciously, as we saw, it says that you are more powerful than they are.

Somehow, this often happens to race.
Probably, because race is such an important issue in much of the US. But that doesn't your "support" any less condescending.
But as much as you don't publish posts telling short or unintelligent or people that you "support" them, it's condescending to tell black people that you "support" them.

Me, I don't think that any race or group as a whole needs my support.
I think there are countless individuals within those groups who are strong and capable enough to control their own destiny, and to far more successful than most individuals in any other race or group.

Addressing the whole group is highly condescending towards those folks.

Here is an example of condescending, borderline de-humanizing support I have recently seen on my Linkedin wall:

> Her: I see you and support you

So self-congratulatory, and so offensive. It implies that (most) others don't see "them".
Cut the haughty pomp, your black friends and colleagues have names, and they probably don't know what to do with your condescension.

How Benevolence Reinforces Victim Mentality

What we've just described so far is bad enough.

But there is a pernicious, deeper danger of constant sympathetic messages.
And unless you're aware of the power dynamics, it can go unnoticed.

Sympathetic messages frame you as "poor you", a victim.
To me, there is nothing more offensive, and nothing that angers me more quickly, than a "poor you" frame.

If you don't question the "poor you" frame, you can start believing it, and it can become your reality.
The danger of accepting people's support without questioning it is the internalization of the belief that you do need support because the deck is stacked against you.
The danger is that you internalize that "poor you".
When you internalize that, you are also accepting that you do are indeed a second class citizen.

You should be worried and afraid of internalizing that belief, because it's terribly dangerous.
When you internalize it, you start believing it. And you start to act accordingly.

The consequences are two, and they stem from the same internalization of the "poor you" frame

1. Learned helplessness: whatever you do, you can't win
2. Lashing out in anger and becoming anti-social

Two very different scenarios, but both being the consequence of believing that it's too difficult for you to win in this society.

And white people's "support" is reinforcing the idea that you can't do anything to succeed in this society:

So is this implying that a black person “cannot have a cellphone”, or “go jogging”? Don’t let this BS virtue-signaling sway you. You CAN do anything you want in life!

There is a good scene from the movie “Menace II Society” that well shows what I mean.

The black protagonist, Caine, is talking to a close girlfriend.
The girlfriend is encouraging him to move, pursue self-development, and leave behind small-timing burglaries and drug dealing.

I found the movie, and edited so you can see it:

> Caine: Ain’t nothing gonna change in Atlanta. I mean, I’m still gonna be black. Just another nigga from the ghetto

Caine internalized the belief that there is no chance in life for him because he’s black.
What a fucking tragedy!
This is called learned helplessness in psychology (Seligman, 1991), and it’s the belief that no matter what you do, you can’t win.

And virtue signaling messages contribute to creating learned helplessness among black folks.
It’s ironic, but the sympathetic messages that want to offer support do more harm than good.

That’s why I recommend black folks to put up shields against superficial and general support and sympathy.
Stand guard to the gates of your mind, friends.

You’re first-class, top 1% citizen, if you want.
Think it, believe it, dress it, act it.

Experiment: “Whites” in The Condescended Shoes

Some white folks these days are inviting others to put themselves in black people’s shoes.

That’s always a great exercise.

The first part of that exercise, the one that everyone is embracing, is to “feel the pain” of black people.
Great.

Now let’s finish the exercise, though.
Let’s add the power dynamics part I’m addressing here.

And put yourself in the shoes of being the subject of your own friendly support.

Here is what other races could tell white people:

- Jew person: I’m sorry there is a pandemic of white people being born with such lower IQs compared to us. Society shouldn’t discriminate against lower IQ. I stand with you, white people.
- Asian person: I’m sorry white people have to be born so selfishly individualistic. And so unconscientious, with such poor work ethics. Society shouldn’t discriminate against poor work ethics. I stand with you, white people.
  - Asian woman: I’m sorry white girls are so unfeminine and white guys prefer us. It’s not fair that men like feminine women more. I stand with you, white women.
- Black person: I’m sorry white people have no street smarts, have little dicks, and cannot sprint or jump. Society shouldn’t discriminate against any of that. I stand with you, white people.

Albeit these examples are obviously exaggerated, they also show the “other side of the coin” of offering support and sympathy -the power dynamics side-.

How would any empowered white person answer to any of that?
Any empowered white person wouldn't even want to hear any of that.

And this is how they might answer:

- Thanks, but I'm doing great. My IQ is fine. And power intelligence matters more anyway: all that IQ didn't help you avoid a history of prosecutions, it seems (huge one-up back)
- Thanks, but I'm doing great. Western work ethics allowed Westerners to rule the world, so I think we're pretty fine (medium one-up back)
- Thanks, but I'm doing great. Girls love my dick, and I prefer swimming and long-lasting sports to sprints (mild one-up back)

You will notice that these answers are more on the aggressive aside.

From a framing point of view, they (correctly) read the initial "offer of help" not as a friendly gesture, but as an attempt at one-upping, and they answer with a one-up back of their own.

Answering with a one-up defends your own power, and also serves to protect one's own mind and self-esteem. After that, you can move to move conciliatory tones.

However, since messages of support rarely show the true power dynamics so obviously, you need to answer with more tact.

Let's see:

How to Handle Benevolent Sexism

How to answer to all the condescension we've just described?

How can a black person answer, without being aggressive, while also defending his individuality and his personal power?

Here is an example:

> White person: (chest out, with the pride of the self-appointed savior) You have all my support. I stand with you!
> Black person: Thanks. But… "You" who, and… Support for what? (a simple question that will dismantle his whole self-righteous frame)
> White person: For the racism man. That's disgusting that you guys must go through that so often. I can't imagine what it's like
> Black person: Thank you, I appreciate your friendliness (don't call it "support").
> I suppose some policemen see some races with more animosity than others, in limited cases (reframe the problem as localized, instead of general).
> But hey, I'm Alex (shrugh shoulders, as if to say "I'm me", and distance yourself from the group, reclaim your power as an individual).
> And personally, I'm doing great (reclaim your power as an individual 2).
> I see life as a world of opportunities, not threats (frame yourself as a high quality man, not as "a black dude").
> This is a life of opportunity for those who want to take them (switch the tables: maybe he could use some of your support, instead?)

That's it.
Power reclaimed.

How to Address It Socially: Building Bridges

The other problem of generalized white sympathy is that it tends to vilify police.

Again, the issue is the same: support "blacks" as a whole and vilify "police" as a whole.

Bridges and healthy individualism are the answer.
Some cops are racist and scum.
Some protesters are thugs.

Unluckily, when we tend to paint everyone with broad brushes, we only flame the fires of hatred.
And we're only more likely to get hatred.

Probably, most cops are good and/or normal people worthy of respect.
And the same is true for most people of color, and of most random groups you want to pick.

To get over this, be the first to condemn the bad apples within your group of belonging.
Then, build bridges and spread the love.
And extend some love to policemen as well.
They're humans, too.

SUMMARY

The avalanche of messages of sympathy and support towards the black community is, overall, a good sign.

It's a sign that people care.

However, there is one potentially disturbing element of support:

1. Generalized messages of support de-individualize individuals and places everyone under the supposed "black guy disadvantage"
2. Constant messages of sympathy reinforce the notion (reality?) that people of color are second-class citizens

Both of them disempower the black community.

That's why, ultimately, I would advise people of color to distance themselves from that support.
Politely say "thanks", but immediately reclaim your power as an individual.

And never think of yourself as moving in a world where you can't win.
Fuck anyone who implies you're a victim. You make your own world, my friend.

Sorted!: Summary & Review (Kevin Dutton)

Notes

About the Author:
About the Authors: Kevin Dutton is a British psychologist, researcher, and author. He previously published "The Wisdom of Psychopaths" and "The Good Psychopath Guide".
Andy McNab is a former British Special Air Service (SAS) operator, novelist and, supposedly, a psychopath.

The 7 Deadly Wins

The authors repeat the 7 laws of their previous book, which are:

1. Just do it: don't waste time overthinking it. You don't need like feeling to do something to just do it.
   1. Procrastination prolongs the pain in the short term, arms you in the long run, and wastes mental resources
   2. We overplay the risks compared to the rewards. Psychopaths are very reward-driven and don't fall for that mental bias
2. Nail it: you must learn how to switch one when it really matters, and play to win. The difference between the good and the great is that when it matters the good ones get 80% out of themselves, while the great ones get 100%.
3. Be your own person: psychopaths are not afraid of not fitting and doing their own thing, no matter what others think.
   1. Know what you want to be, and know what you don't want to be
   2. Learn to withstand social pressure, to say no when you don't want something, and to enforce your boundaries
4. Become a persuasion black belt: "getting into the minds of their preys give them a distinct advantage"
   1. Frame it as if it's within their self-interest to do it
   2. Make them feel good about doing what you want them to do
   3. Learn how to empathize to tailor your message to the target
   4. Learn how frames work, and how to control the frame to persuade others
5. Take it on the chin (move on): Move on. Don't beat yourself up and abandon all the regrets. "Let go, or be dragged".
   1. Ask yourself: "what would I do if I didn't take this personally" and "what would I do if I didn't feel the heat"
   2. Stop taking accusations personally. First of all, we over-attribute intent to what people say or do. And even if they meant it, the problem is with them, not you.
6. Live in the moment: be focused when it matters. Psychopaths share this trait with elite Buddhist monks and great athletes.

    1. Anxieties often stem not from reality, from anxieties of our own anxieties (second-order emotion)
7. Uncouple behavior from emotions: take a step back and remove emotions from the situation
    1. Studies show that imagining making a difficult phone call is more nerve-wracking than doing it. So just take action.
    2. Ask yourself: “what would I do if I didn’t feel this way”, “what would I do if I didn’t give a damn what others thought”, “what would I do if it just didn’t matter”

Too Much Psychopathy Is Dangerous, But Some Psychopathy Is Good

Mimicking what he said in his previous two books, Dutton repeats that low levels of psychopathy traits can be helpful in life.

He says about the double-edged sword of psychopathy:

> If you lie out in it from dawn to dusk it will burn you to a crisp. You’ll have what amounts to personality cancer. But at low levels, it’s a different story. Take it a bit easier and psychopathy can do you good. It’s personality with a tan.

Learn to Say No

Too many people are too agreeable, too afraid of saying no.

If you’ve been too nice, for too long, start with these first:

- Not this time
- I’ll think about it: good delay tactic to say “no” from a safe distance
- I’m afraid I can’t, but have you considered…
- I’d love to, but…

The Steps of An Elevator Pitch

I like these 3 steps for an effective elevator’s pitch.

1. Explain what you do
    1. What PROBLEM you SOLVE
    2. What NEED you MEET
    3. What VALUE you PROVIDE
2. Identify your USP
3. Invite feedback

Most of all, I liked N.3, which most guides on elevator pitches often seem to miss.

So this is how it sounds all together:

> Hi, I develop mobile apps that organizations use to train their staff in their own time. This takes a significant chunk off the manager’s workload.
> Unlike most other developers, our apps are tailor-made to suit individual requirements within individual organizations. Although this takes a bit more time, it means tha, 95 per cent of our clients are satisfied with the first version of their app.
> At the moment, how does your company go about training new people?

Learn Empathy to Influence Others

Empathy is crucial to influence others.

But it's not the empathy that most people think, because most people get empathy wrong.
Says Dutton:

> Contrary to popular belief, empathy is not about showing concern for other people.
> That's sympathy.
> Instead, empathy is about being able to put yourself in someone else's shoes, to see things as they see them.

And he continues:

> In the corporate arena then, this is what empathy is all about: working out what makes others tick and second-guessing what they're going to do. Nine times out of ten the answer is simple: What's in it for me?and "What am I going to get out of it?"

Don't Jump to Conclusions When Studying People

Says Dutton:

> As soon as someone starts telling us about something that's happened to them, we immediately compare it with similar things that have happened to us, and assume they feel like we did.
> But do they? Actually, chances are they may not.

So don't rush to conclusions.
And don't jump in with your "I, me, mine" stories, but keep listening and digging.

How to Bond With People Using Their Own Secrets (Manipulative)

This is a technique Dutton describes in the previous books as well, and it works like this:

1. Open up yourself first
2. When they open up, encourage them to speak more with nods and empathy
3. Once they shared something important, immediately change the subject. They will forget they just told you that
4. A month or two later, modify what they said, and paraphrase it back to them as if you were opening up to them

After that, says the author:

> BAM! From that point on, you can pretty much take what you want.

My Note: not sure this works as well as the author simply
What happens when someone is opening up about a secret or emotional pain point in their lives, and you immediately change topic? It comes across as very emotionally stupid and completely insensitive.
You likely lose a lot of points with them.
And I also doubt that people will forget that they shared their vulnerability, since they tend to be such emotionally laden conversations.

The author was indeed sharing this technique from a conman, and you know that you can't really trust a conman.

Also read:

- How to bond with women (without gimmicks)

> Manipulation: Techniques, Strategies, & Ethics

Think of Every Problem As Having a Solution

Just as simple as that.
It will help you to solve far more problems that you would otherwise just stop you.

How to Pick Up Girls: Gimmicks

Here is how two guys picked up girls fabricating lies about themselves:

1. Selection: pick two girls you both like, far from each other who can't see themselves
2. Contact: get the girl's name – including surname – and a bit of background information
3. Withdrawal: reconvene and trade information
4. Analysis: access the two girls' Facebook profiles. Scrutinize the pages for particular 'likes' – actors, singers, musicians, TV shows, etc: the more obscure the better – and select a couple they think would go down well. Let's say one girl is a huge fan of Game of Thrones and the other is big into Coldplay.
5. Prep: both guys change each other's names on their phones to Peter Dinklage (Tyrion Lannister in Game of Thrones) and to Chris Martin (the Coldplay frontman)
6. Approach: they cold-approach their target girls (the ones their friend spoke first)
7. Set-up: steer the conversation into the general direction of what they do for a living (one is in TV and the other in music, of course)
8. Cue 1: leave the mobile phone in plain view on the table in front of the girls, and call each other. The caller? Peter Dinklage and Chris Martin
9. Taxi: once the guys have super high value in the eyes of the women, invite them home

My Note: Really interesting technique
A bit convoluted, but this was genius and it might work.
Would like to try it one day, actually.

Make People Flatter... Themselves

Flattering is good, but even better is if you provide people with the opportunity of flattering themselves in front of you.

Says the author:

> It's a triple whammy!
> Because if somebody tells you something good about themselves their brain infers – at a subconscious level – > that there has to be a reason. And the only reason there could possibly be is … because you're important!

True that.
It's also an under-the-radar way of setting up a judge frame.

Be Nice: Give People Power Over You, & They Will Be Nice In Exchange

Kevin Dutton showed a group of traffic cops (unluckily he doesn't say the number) two different videos.

One video showed a guy using a confrontational attitude and arguing with the cop, not admitting guilt.
The other one used an appeasement strategy.

Result?
95% of the cops said they'd write a ticket to the confrontational guy but they'd let the "nice" one go.

So, how does the nice guy manage to get off the hook?

Well, it's all about dropping confrontational frames and embracing collaborative frames.

Says the author:

> 'the driver immediately convinces the officer that, far from being a rival, he's actually on his side,' observes Andy.
> 'Which, when you think about it, is exactly what you want to do when you meet anyone for the first time – not just when you get pulled over by the fuzz. I know, it sounds like common sense 101.
> But when you read all the geeky human resources stuff about managing first impressions, it's incredible how often basic human virtues get elbowed out to make room for all that mirroring and cold reading and NLP crap.
> OK, there might be something in it, but there's a hell of a lot more in simply being pleasant.

Agreed.
Smart social strategists prefer to use collaboration as a first step:

Real-Life Applications

- Get a grip on your email: emails can be addictive, and they are distracting to get work done. Designate a time in the day you will check and answer emails, and don't let them distract you
- Practice well to maximize your time: practice deliberately, and work with breaks, maximizing for your circadian rhythms, and take battery-recharging naps
- Look the part: the movers and shakers want to be seen with people that other movers and shakers would talk to (also see: executive skills to look the part)
- Listen more: to listen well, caring and compassion are not prerequisite, and many great listeners are con-artists

- Avoid cliches' because they minimize other people's problems and break rapport: things such as "plenty of fishes in the sea" or "nobody died" break rapport. Also read "how to comfort people" and "what to say when someone died" to learn more about what to say
- Avoid bragging, be more strategic with self-promotion: bragging makes you come across as a blow-hard. Give credit instead, it's a far better social strategy.
- Men with shaved are seen as more dominant

Quotes

On body language:

> Much has been written on body language and the like down the years, and frankly a lot of it is bollocks.

On creationism and the U.S.:

> The rest really is history. These days even Americans have come to embrace evolution. Some of them, anyway.

CONS

- Some inconsistencies with previous books

In the previous book, I remember McNab saying that he gave up sugar one day, and that was it.

Here, it says that "you don't want to be standing behind McNab in the queue at Costa Coffee if they run out of his favorite chocolate gold coins".

Sure, it's a small thing.
But if one is not being straightforward with the small things, can you fully trust them for the bigger ones?

- Some made up evolutionary psychology

Kevin Dutton says that without psychopathy we would have perished as a species.

He says:

> If our prehistoric ancestors some two hundred thousand years ago hadn't included among their number the ruthless, the resilient and the risk-takers, we would've perished, in an evolutionary eye-blink, on the Palaeolithic killing fields of deepest, darkest Africa.

However, that's his own opinion, there is no widely accepted or evidence-based theory in evolutionary psychology to corroborate the thesis that "without psychopaths we would have gone extinct".

- Some jokes are in bad taste

The authors call the critics and "trolls" of their previous books "fruitcakes", which in UK is a derogatory term for gay people.

Or using known cases of pedophilia to crack jokes:

> 'Perfectionism is to self-esteem what Jimmy Savile was to child-minding,' says Andy. 'A complete no-no.

PROS

- Some great wisdom

There is much good wisdom here on how to persuade and influence others, as well as some good information on general life effectiveness and assertiveness.

- Some funny jokes

For example:

> Andy: ‘A woman came up to me at a book signing once and told me she’d had her nipple pierced.’
> Me: ‘Really? What do you say to that?’
> Andy: ‘There’s only one thing you can say to that: I don’t believe you!’

Review

I love Dutton’s trilogy on how psychopathic traits can help succeed.

I can’t stand fake self-help advice based on platitudes and hypocrisy.
“Sorted!” instead is more amoral. Not in the sense of inviting readers to be amora, but in the sense that it’s based on what works. A bit like “The 48 Laws of Power“.
Or like Power University, for that matter.

Sometimes it felt a bit like a mix of random psychological advice loosely connected to psychopathy.
But there is also much great information on the basics of persuasion and social skills.

Overall, thumbs up.

What's A Beta Male & How Stop Being A Beta In 10 Steps

Lucio Buffalmano · 16 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Beta male originally meant the second-ranking male in a hierarchy. But in manosphere parlance, it now describes a low-status, submissive, often "too nice" man—unassertive, sexually frustrated, and dissatisfied with life.

In this guide, you'll learn exactly what makes a beta male, see real-life examples, and discover 10 practical steps to stop being one.

In correct terms, the beta male is doing well. In common parlance, "beta male" refers to the omega male: lowest status and struggling in life

What's A Beta Male

In ethological terms, beta males are men who rank second highest within the social ranking of a primate group.

However, in common parlance and among men and manosphere groups, "beta male" has come can be defined as such:

> A beta male is a man who is submissive with other men, subservient to women, and ranks very low in dominance hierarchies.

In ethological terms, that would be an "omega male".

In this article, we will discuss the beta male in the manosphere terms. Such as, that guy who is socially clueless, and near the bottom of the social ranking. For simplicity -and for SEO reasons-, from now on, will (incorrectly) call him "beta male".

Ultimately, the only defining trait and definition of a beta man is to be low-rank

A few hand-picked examples of betaness to start

Before we dive in, let's take a look at a few examples of beta males we have already covered on ThePowerMoves:

- The sad tale of beta boyfriend: pictorial storyline of chasing for scraps of intimacy and attention, while she made him jump through his hoops
- Talulah Riley humiliates Elon Musk: can a billionaire be a beta male? If you let your partner disrespect you, yes

And now, here is a simple 10 steps formula to move out of betaness:

1. Cut Your Submissive Behavior

If there was one major trait common to beta males, it's this:

Beta males display signals of submissiveness, often and conspicuously, and largely use a passive style of communication.

The general rule indeed is that alpha males are dominant, while beta males are submissive.

Beta males are submissive in two very different ways towards men and women, and we will address both in this article.

For now, start here so you can root-out any overly submissive signs you are sending out:

- Submissive body language signals
- Submissive verbal signals

1.1. But Watch Out for Fake Aggression

Too much submissivness is a no-no, that's for sure.

That being said, the solution is never to just add aggression.
You're simply not gonna fix betaness by swinging in the opposite direction and acting hyper-aggressive.

The fixing must go deeper.
It's the whole frame of mind that must switch, together with acquiring basic social skills (and later adding more advanced power dynamics skills).

Simply adding aggression is like trying to turn a turd into gold with a can of yellow spray.
If you only add that thin paint coat of aggression, you end up looking like those abused, beaten down dogs who curl up at the end of a cage, barking out of fear.
Those people who don't know how to engage in constructive or assertive behavior are barely any better than a submissive beta male.

An example?
Look at this scene, and you'll notice right away who and what I'm talking about:

> Bryan Callen: If someone tries to bully me I'll show up at your fucking house and I'm gonna kill you. That's what fucking happens
> (proceeds to keep yapping, get interrupted, and shown for a big loud mouth who can't back up his treaths)

Exactly the type of aggression that screams "beta".

2. Don't Put Women On A Pedestal

There are two ways beta males deal with women the wrong way:

- White knighting

White knighting is an old PUA concept.

A man has a white-knighting mentality when he sees women like poor damsels in distress who can't get by without his help.

White-knighting stems from the false belief that women need to be saved.

Many men feel good about supporting and providing for a woman.
What's different with white knights betas is that they take it to the extreme, which also leaves them easy victims of what I call "damsel in distress manipulation".

The solution?

Feel free to support the woman you pick as your life partner, but it must be mutual support.
If you're running around all day doing all the work for your queen, then you are probably white-knighting and you must re-assess the give and take of your relationship.

- Low-quality providing

Low-quality providers are men who date as providers, and who don't feel like they are good enough for women.
Dating as a provider is not beta per se, and one can be an alpha male provider.
But it is beta the way that beta men do it.

And how do they do it?

Beta males approach dating with the mindset that the woman is always far more valuable than they are. Such as: low-status men think they are not good enough.
In the beta male's mind, there is a bottomless gulf of value between him and her, so he seeks to make up for that value differential in all ways he possibly can.

Beta males seek to fill that bottomless gulf with money, emotional support, promises of endless love, services, and… Massive doses of submissiveness. Why submissiveness? Because unconfident men feel like they must be submissive to their woman or else she'll just pick up and leave.

With white-knighting and the feeling of not being good enough, beta males always end up placing women on a pedestal.

Luckily, the cure is simple: think of yourself at least as equal in value.

Getting on your knees only works when in jest, and when you are the undisputed relationship leader. In all other cases: avoid.

- The Madonna / Whore dichotomy: the "Madonna" in the dichotomy is the natural consequence of the beta male, white-knight idealization

3. Learn Power Dynamics to Stop Beta Behavior

Nobody sets out to become a beta male.

So, why are most men still beta?

Because they don't even know they are.
The main reason some men are stuck in "beta male" territory is that they are unaware of power dynamics.

In truth, all the steps above, plus most issues on this list, are going to be taken care of once you learn about power dynamics.

For that, I think there is no better cure than this website's course:

- Power University

3.1. Internalize This: "You're Worthy of Being Respected"

Beta males allow others to disrespect them.

Sometimes, they even fail to label the abuse and disrespect as such.
Beta males prefer to pretend it was OK, that the other person "was just joking", and that they "didn't mean it".
Or even that they are "good friends".

Sure you are… NOT.

See here a perfect example from beta male Fredo:

> Godfather: Is that why you slapped my brother around in public?
> (jumps in, defending his abuser)
> Fredo: Oh no, eh-eh, that was nothing Mike. Oh no, Mo didn't mean nothing by that. Sure he flies off the handle every once in a while, but.. But me and Mo are good friends, right Mo, eh?
> (gets ignored by Mo, confirming all his betaness)

Now it's true, Fredo might not have had the power to slap back Mo when he was humiliated.
And maybe even not be in a place to demand proper behavior right away.
But remember, acquiring personal powerful starts not with the power of pushing back on any and all affronts.
Personal power starts with this simple mindset:

> Nobody has the right to treat me rudely.

Every time you can push back on any disrespect, do it.
And if the risk of pushing back is small, take that risk (hint: getting fired should be included in those "small risks").

But of course, in life there will be times when you won't have the power to push back.
And that's OK: it's your mindset that matters most, and your mindset is still the same.
To move out of betaness -and of victim mentality- shitty behavior must NEVER become "OK" within you.

You don't take the affront too personally because you're building an antifragile ego, and you move on…. But you also don't forget. And if one day you get the chance, you'll even the scores.

4. Lift / Exercise

The effects of testosterone are context-dependent, and more complex than most online resources describe them.

For example, in environments where pro-social attitudes help increase status, men with more testosterone actually become more pro-social, not more aggressive or anti-social (Sapolsky, 2017).

And that's actually great news.
It means that more testosterone doesn't make you more of an asshole, it just makes you less of a beta.

Also read:

- How to become a GOOD asshole

> How to Be A Good Asshole

So you've got no excuses.
How to increase that T in your body?
An often-recommended solution is to exercise. And it makes sense.
Studies show that heavy exercise and high-intensity training increase testosterone.

Bigger size and more muscles might also have a more direct, positive effect on your social power.
Jon Anthony, for example, says that bulking up got him more respect from men, and more attention from the ladies:

- The power dynamics of getting ripped

4.1. Consider HIIT Training

What if you don't have time for gyms?

Consider doing high-intensity interval training (HIIT).
HIIT is a training method that consists of short bursts of all-out effort punctuated by brief rest periods.

HIIT is effective no matter the age.
A 2017 study found that HIIT training increased testosterone also in men in men over the age of 60.

HIIIT is my go-to exercise.
Being often on the move, it's difficult to attend gyms. So I do HIIT.

Plus, I use all props and furniture I can see around.
I pick up chairs and squat, or use 6-packs of water bottles. Or just jump up and down a bed.
Get creative, it's double exercise: body, and mind :).

4.2. Eat Healthy (Without Becoming a Soy Boy!)

Diet is as important if not more important than exercising.

Reduce the carbs, especially the refined ones, and avoid the real junk such as:

- McDonalds / KFC / BurgerKing and all
- Sodas of any kind
- Snacks of any kind
- Sugar-filled "sports drink" and juices
- All kinds of packaged food

My opinion on nutrition is this: learn the basics, apply them 95% of the time, but don't go crazy with it.
It's very beta-like to be scared of the carbs in a whole-grain spaghetti carbonara as if there was a tarantula hiding in them.

Sometimes, just eat whatever the fuck you like, and do have a few drinks when you feel like.
Life is also meant to be enjoyed.

Both exercise and diet fall into a general mindset of caring and taking of yourself.
When you care and take care of yourself, it all ties together: you don't allow assholes or mean women to disrespect you, you put healthy food in your mouth, and you take care of your engine/body with exercise.

5. Unfriend All Your Beta Males Friends

You know the saying:

> He who walks with the betas learns how to become one

Alright, there wasn't such a saying before I wrote it.
But now there is one, and it's true.

You can't hang out with betas and expect to be an alpha male.
Even if you are the alpha among the betas, chances are you're still a beta outside of that group.

There might be an alpha male within a LAN party. But he's most likely a beta as soon as he steps out

Remember, there is no such thing as a shark in a pond. Sharks just don't live in ponds.
And alpha males don't hang out in betas' ponds.

6. Learn How Beta Males Act. Then Do The Opposite

I think this is a heavily underestimate way of learning things.

Instead of just watching how great people act and trying to do the same, also watch how the people you don't want to be like act.
And then do the opposite.

What do beta males do?

Things like:

- Take all kind of crap from anyone
- Engage in endless virtue-signaling
- Feel guilty about themselves, for being men, or just for being evil humans
- Follow orders, always toe the line
- Engage in scapegoating, never accept responsibility
- Carry her bags while she waltzes around
- Relinquish all power in their relationships

Begging and pleading are typical beta-males behavior

On, and these days, the new variety of betas going by the name of “soy boy”, also do this:

- Yell for “getting rid of police”

The belief that the world would be better off without police is part of an enlarged “white-knight fantasy”.
Such as, as much as betas believe that women are innocent creatures, they also believe that almost everyone is good and innocent.
Evil is extremely rare for the soy boy, and mostly concentrated within hyper-males, which includes the police.
That also gives beta males another excuse to be betas: the “bad guys” are hyper-male and conservative. And the good guys like him are feminized and progressive.

More anti-beta reading:

- How women control men (and what to do about it): you don’t need physical power to manipulate and control people, a basic truth of human life that seems to escape many beta males

7. Unfriend All Attentions Whores You Are Not Sleeping With

This is attention whoring:

> Attention whoring consists of sharing sexy pictures (thirst traps) to attract the attention of thirsty males

Attention-whoring also includes emotional and touchy stories (“depth traps”), sad stories (“pity traps”), and political tirades (the soy-boy progressive types will never fail to like and share).
But it’s the sexual side that really hooks the thirsty beta males in.

Attention whoring is dangerous because it steals men’s time and diverts their energies from worthy pursuits to feeding the ego of the attention whore.

Unluckily, there has never been more attention whoring in the history of the world than we have today.
The favorite places of attention whores are, in the order:

1. TikTok
2. Instagram
3. Facebook
4. Tinder / dating apps

To avoid falling for the beta thirst trap, unfriend all attention whores.
Alternatively, you can unfollow them.

You might skip this step if you're more advanced and/or if you've Warning: you're only at this stage if you can tell yourself "hot, but LOL, she's such a low-quality attention whore".

8. Don't Pursue Women From The Friend-Zone

There is a new word in the 2020s:

Simp.

> A simp is a man who puts women on the pedestal, lavishes them with gifts and attention, and seeks to win their favor by acting like a doormat.

Look, I hate black-and white thinking.
So let me be more precise here: it's sometimes possible to get women after long chases (see: "atypical seduction techniques").
But not when you chase in a low-power, low-value fashion.
And it's possible to bang women as friends if they see you as a hot cool "friend".
But not when you're a "loser" friend.

Finally, it's also possible that a woman will eventually decide that the beta male orbiter is "good enough" and, in the absence of a better prospect, she might have sex with him or get into a relationship with him.
But he'd be entering those relationships as super low in power.

Also read:

- Relationship power dynamics 101

Hopefully, you want some more efficient and high-power strategies, so do the opposite of what beta males do:

- Seek to befriend women to later date them
- Chase women too hard, and too obviously
- Wait forever before making a move
- Wait 3 months for intimacy

So you, you just do the opposite.

And I will end this one with a quote from "alpha male strategies":

> Unfortunately, there's always a beta male willing to play these women's waiting game, just make sure it's not you.

8.2. Drop All Women Who Demand You

Have you heard of books such as:

- Why Men Love B*tches
- The Power of The Pussy
- A Gold Digger's Guide

Do you know what they have in common?
Well, they all have in common that they are wrong.
Alpha types and men with a backbone want supportive partners who add value.

These books tell women that they are teaching them how to get men.
In reality, they are teaching women how to get beta males.
Because only beta males would get into a relationship with a woman who demands without giving.
She demands, expects to be chased, expects emotional and financial investment… And then gives nothing back?
Drop her immediately.

Here's an example for you of a woman who has to be dropped immediately.

For more red signs of women you will have no time for, read:

- Nasty games women play

9. Unplug From All Beta Sources

Tough call, I know.

Betaness is all over TV, popular media, and songs.
Well, great!
This can be a great opportunity to free up much of your time:

- Drop pop-music (especially J and K-pop), and anything where androgynous-looking men gush about love
- Stop watching celeb news, you shouldn't even know who Rihanna is married to (or whether or not she's married)
- Cut down on memes / games: PewDiePie, memes, Reddit, games… Not exactly "beta", but not really "alpha" either, since you're not being productive
- Quit mainstream media

Many shows have beta-types of men as main characters.
Heck, even Iron Man in Avengers is a beta type, in many ways:

> Ironman: (chases and gets disrespected)

If you love movies, it's a great opportunity to enlarge your horizons outside of Hollywood.
You'll find plenty of more realistic, masculine, and positively dominant men.

- How to use leadership to get women

Unplug From All Sources of Betaness

As you stop hanging out with beta friends, you also want to stop beta social media connections from getting any access to your brain.

An example?
Whenever anyone posts or likes shit like this one on your wall:

Take articles like that one as an invite for an immediate unfollow / unfriend.

But there is something deeper here.
Why do males love to share articles about female empowerment?

To begin with, because they think they are gaining social (and sexual) points by professing their supposed "open mind" (in truth, they're not open-minded at all, of course).
But most of all, beta males love sharing female empowerment stories because it makes them feel good. The female empowerment narrative makes beta males feel like it's OK not to wear the pants in their relationships.
The high-betaness of those messages reassures them by communicating something like this:

> See, my dear beta?
> Women are better than men, so it's OK that women in your life lead you. Actually, every man should let women lead because they're better at it, so you're being a forward thinker

So the beta can keep being a beta, and feel good about it.
Oh, and if you're interested in that nonsense Forbes article, you can read more here why it's nonsense.

10. Escape the Betalpha Trap

You made it to the last step.

Don't skip this last step, though.

Too many men stop here and never really get 100% out of the beta male stage.

I call this the "betalpha" trap.
They are the quicksands in which some men get mired when they first learn about power dynamics.

Betalphas come in different stripes, but they all tend to have a few things in common:

- They're not focused on getting better, but feeling better: hence, they engage in social climbing and alpha-male posturing, mocking beta males to feel better about themselves
- They get angry instead of getting effective: some online communities are too ripe with anger and misogyny to be helpful. Venting and raging will not make you any better off
- Follow other betalphas: see for example the story of LondonReal, where betalphas lost $1.000.000 to a second-tier narcissist cult-leader.
- Misogyny, and joining forces with other men against women: this is one of the most dangerous stages some men get stuck into. They realize the world is not a Hollywood romance, and get angry at the system -and at women- for having "lied". So they lash out.
  Unluckily, there are plenty of manosphere leaders who are happy to keep men stuck in anger

Wanna see an example of a betalpha?
Here is one, from a commenter on a YouTube video showing a man running faster than a woman (no shit, eh?):

> NateSim: Why is this so satisfying to watch

Answer:

> Because you are projecting your individual identity into the whole "male gender" group (mistake #1), and you think that your personal value hinges on that group of men being "better" than women (mistake #2).

It's ironic, but since betalphas tend to be angry and confrontational, it's more likely that a beta male will have a more fulfilling life than a betalpha will ever have.

How to avoid getting stuck in this stage?

To begin with, remember this:

> Your path of self-development is about YOU.
> If there is anyone holding you down or fighting you, it's yourself.

As long as you believe there is someone, a gender, or a conspiracy theory holding you down, you will always stay stuck with a victim mentality.
If you really must pick up a war with someone, be it with yourself (but even then, I discovered that self-love is usually superior).

Striking a Balance

Yes, this last step means you must strike a balance.

As much as you reject feminism and cannot stand virtue-signaling male feminists, you also reject the manosphere's misogyny.

A mentally healthy high-quality man does want to be the leader of his relationship. And it's also healthy to believe that it's best for the man to be the leader of the relationship.
But he also sees that relationship as an opportunity for win-win and mutual collaboration -which is what relationships are-.

This is an important concept part of "enlightened collaboration":

Summary

There, we make it to the end.

There is actually one last step that should be obvious and already part of your life if you're reading here:

- Commit yourself to a self-development plan

Keep working yourself, and you can escape betaness in just a few months.

What Is A Power Move

Most power moves are deliberate and often conspicuous actions that shift power dynamics in your favor, catch the other party unprepared, and impress observers with a major display of superior value, wit, or dominance.

In its broadest sense, any action that shifts power dynamics is technically a power move. However, in common usage, the term usually refers to conspicuous, high-impact, and memorable moves.

Power moves can be divided into several categories, including:

- Dialectical power moves: quips or rebuttals that win the exchange and display mental superiority
- Negotiation power moves: gambits that win a concession (see 'negotiation power moves')
- Raw muscle power moves: using physical size (example), superior weaponry, or fearlessness displays
- Status power moves display of higher rank within a hierarchical structure,
- Mental power moves display higher confidence or higher-value mindsets

A single well-placed power move can change everything, including sometimes flipping the power script and taking you from subservient to dominant.

Power Moves Examples

Let's now explore 13 power moves examples you can also use in real life:

1. The Underdog Flex™: Beat Them At Half-Power

Nothing shows absolute dominance like beating everyone else with a handicap.

For example:

Competition lines up with carbon running shoes, fuel gels, and moisture-wicking shorts? You outrun them in jeans.

Subtly or openly parade your handicap: it sub-communicates you'd have crushed them 10x harder if you even cared to put in some effort.
Tyson Fury does it here:

> Tyson: This is the undisputed heavyweight champion of the world (stands up and shows his 'soft' physique)
> Tyson: (turns to his fit and athletic opponent) Have a look. Fat man. That's who beat you

Winning against the odds is also a 'self-signaling' power move that boosts your confidence.

2. The Money Flex™: Display "F U Money"

Money is the true power equalizer.

Money doesn't look at your dress, skin color, or appearance.

If you have lots of money, you can always pull a power move that propels you from the bottom to the top.
As a matter of fact, the best timing for this power move is when others look down on you.

Why?

Because with this power move, you are telling them:

> ⍰⍰If me, someone whom you think is beneath you, can buy you and all your worthless establishment, what does it say about you?
> It says you must really be a nobody.

Look at an example here:

> Bartender: (dismissive, looking down on him, implying he can't afford it) The Latour is 400 pounds a bottle
> The Saint: Then we will have two bottles. (hands a wallop of bills) There, you count it

There is an art to this power move.
Don't flash credit cards at women: it screams 'simping'. And don't throw money in anger, which signals emotional overreaction, like in this scene from "The Wolf of Wall Street".

To execute this power move correctly:

1. Pick an expensive item
2. Stay cool if they mention the price, or smile a little, as if you're thinking "LOL, if this poor loser only knew"
3. Take out a big wallop of money: the bigger, the better. And make sure it's big notes
4. Handle money as if it were paper, almost with disdain: it signals you have so much you couldn't care less
5. Say "keep the change": researcher Deborah Tannen notes that very large tips can be offensive as it's a way to "show them".

Alternative ways:

- Hire a 'payer' to handle bills for you: a 'money flex' on its own. Then tell him: "Don't tip, they're rude" as you leave

Abundant resources also win you freedom.
As Nassim Nicholas Taleb says:

> This is sometimes called "fuck you money," which, in spite of its coarseness, means that it allows you to act like a Victorian gentleman, free from slavery.
> It shields you from prostituting your mind and frees you from outside authority–any outside authority.

How To Use It To Score On Dates

SEE SEDUCTION UNIVERSITY

F*ck You Money For Women

Women can best pull this power move with a feminine twist -a "coquette style", for example.

See Charlotte executing it to perfection:

> Friend 1: Charlotte, this is really inappropriate
> Sidney: Yes, you're such a…
> Charlotte: What, what am I, Sidney? (stares them with a power gaze, drops a note inside the glass, walks out)

Her frame control is confident, without being overly aggressive.
Faced with a judge-role shame attack, she refused to backtrack and owned the accusation with pride.

3. The 'Win & Shame': Rub Their Noses In Your Wins

Valentino Rossi, a formerly dominant racer, called the new young guys "pussies" for preferring 'clean' racing.
Unluckily for Rossi, the "pussies" were finishing ahead of him, and Lorenzo pulled the power move:

Lorenzo: Shame for Rossi to be beaten by "pussies"

MotoGP
Peter McLaren
13 May 2011

Share:

'Young MotoGP riders are pussies' - that was the controversial claim made recently by seven time champion Valentino Rossi...

> Rossi: Young riders are p*ssies
> Lorenzo: Shame for Rossi to be beaten by p*ssies

Obama does something similar here:

> Obama: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agend..
> Republicans: (interrupt with applause, cheering) Yeeeeeah
> Obama: I know, because I won both of them <—- ⍰⍰ Suck my winning d*ck, losers

The secret to doing it well is to move forward right after you deliver the power move, lest you look narcissistic, too into yourself, and emotionally thin-skinned.

Note: Winners Don't Overreact

Here's a power nugget of wisdom for you:

Look at the video above again.

And note who goes wild at Obama's joke.
It's the backbenchers and the smaller players who truly go wild.

Top players know how to act high dominance, and they know that overreactions signal low power.

4. The 'Not Worth My Words': Show Your Superiority With Nonverbals

Nothing says "I'm better than you"… Than saying it without words.

The law of least social effort says that the less effort you expend, the more powerful you look.

So when you cut off or ignore people without saying a word, you naturally come across as superior.
Some tips on how to pull off this power move:

- Exhale emphatically
- Roll your eyes upward
- Show disgust with facial expression

5. The Royal Delay: Let Them Wait (With Royal Attitude)

Letting people wait is a power move.

While we don't advise abusing it because it's disrespectful, there can be situations when it's fair.

The secret to perfect execution is "sprezzatura", like it's the most normal thing in the world, and like people are supposed to wait for you.

Look at how this man from the movie "Il Marchese del Grillo" does it.
Note his tonality and his body language:

> Butler: Mr. Marquis, there is downstairs a French official in barouche, he says he is…
> Marchese: Oh yeah, that's captain Blachard, let him wait (waves hands in the air as if to say "who cares"), I had even forgotten about him (and stays seated talking to his mother)

This is how old-world royalty moves and thinks.
They think like they are owed power, and that it's actually fair for people to wait for them.

6. The Ask & Own: Ask Their Opinion, Then Contradict Them

This is pure social power at play.

And the movie "Meet the Parents" provides the perfect context.
Guys who "met her parents" instinctively feel the tension between husbands and fathers-in-law.
If the two meet before marriage, the father-in-law can:

- Be territorial with his daughter
- Test the new man
- Stake a dominance claim to remain 'the alpha male' around his daughter

On the other hand, the boyfriend seeks the family's approval, which can put him in a subservient frame of mind and give away power.

In this example, De Niro goes for verbal signals of power.
And caps it all off with the "contradict power move":

> Jack: Let me ask you a question, Greg: can you really trust another human being, Greg? <— Ask
> Greg: (thinks about it) Sure, I think so
> Jack: No, the answer is that you cannot <— Own
> Greg: (does not reply, looks away, owned)

7. The Shock & Chill™: Make Them Nervous, Then Tell Them to Relax

Making people nervous with your presence, questions, or jokes is a dead giveaway of dominance.

To avoid breaking rapport after you made others jittery, you can add “just joking” or “chill”.
Denzel Washington does it in a few of his movies.

And De Niro does it here:

> Jack: Oh, you’d be surprised how accurate they are. I can tell fairly easy if one is lying or not
> Greg: (Squeaks and sweats)
> Jack: Relax, relax

8. The Godfather Power Move: Extend An “Offer They Can’t Refuse”

Could we make a list of power moves without this classic?

No, we couldn’t:

> Producer: Johnny Fontane will never get that part
> (…) You don’t understand: Johnny Fontane never gets that movie
> (wakes up next to his favorite horse. Johnny Fontane gets the part.)

These power moves propose a negotiative option. They say:

> ⍰⍰ We can get to you easily, but for this time, we just wanted to warn you.
> You can play ball with us and get your fair value back, or your will force us to use force.
> We hope you choose to negotiate in friendliness.

To pull it off, show that:

- You can reach a favorable outcome with or without them (flaunting other options)
- Take what you are negotiating through negotiations or with nastier means (violence, hostile takeover, replacing them, etc.)
- Make them pay a high price if they don’t negotiate as you please

9. The Leadership Takeover: Conspiciously Refuse to Follow

Principle:

Never adapt to others, always let others adapt to you.

Who adapts to whom is all about power dynamics.

And when people try to “teach” you about their culture, they are indirectly saying that you should learn their culture because it’s important.

The moment you start following them, not only you empower them, but you also become, well… The follower.
And power players don’t follow.

The real power players refuse to follow and take the lead, instead.
See here a great example:

> Streisand: (teaches De Niro how to pronounce) L’chaim! L’ha-ha. Like you have popcorn stuck in the throat.

> It's a…
> De Niro: (looks away, smiles derisively, as if to say "fuck you and your BS") OK, to family <—- Refuses the 'learner's frame', takes the lead
> Everyone: laughs

10. The Neg: Hit With a Back-Handed Compliment

Nothing screams "power move" like offending people with a compliment.

Billy Bats does it well here:

> Billy: This kid was great.
> They used to call him "spitshine Tommy" <—- ⍰⍰ The 'neg'
> I swear to God, he made your shoes look like fucking mirrors. He was the best. Made a lot of money, too <—- ⍰⍰ You don't make a lot of money shining shoes, it implies Tommy was poor and working hard for a pittance > Salute, Tommy!

This whole dialogue is an attack masked as a compliment.
It's covert-aggression (albeit not too covert).
It's far more annoying being on the receiving end of covert aggression. If you get angry without playing their same game you look over-reactive because it was not overt aggression -plus the attacker can always say "take it easy it was just a joke"-.

11. The Humor Power Move: Use Humor to Call Out the Unspeakable Big Issue

Harsh truths can sound overly aggressive if you just blurt them out.

But frame them as a joke, and it becomes a covert power move that lets you get away with almost anything. Humor makes it harder for others to challenge you back. If they do, they'd look over-reactive.

> Joe Rogan: you want people to walk down the street with a mask on?
> Bill Burr: let's not start this, Joe
> Joe Rogan: do you, though? Let's start it
> Bill Burr: I'm not going to sit here with no medical degree, listening to you with no medical degree, with an American flag behind you, smoking a cigar, acting like we know what's up better than the CDC

Ouch!

In that same interview:

> Burr: You don't have the body fortitude. Your fu*king knuckles would scrape on the floor

⍰ You're like a dumb gorilla

> Burr: Oh God, you're so tough with your fucking open nose and throat. G.I. Joe and his five o'clock shadow. This is a man over here.

⍰ you're a posturer pretending to be tough

And later:

> Burr: Now is the bitch Joe. Now is the bitch
> (Joe laughs with hissing sound)

⍰ In the end, you're not even tough.

Burr frames Rogan as a loudmouth talking things he doesn't understand.
It took away all of Rogan's authority.
It robbed him of any credibility, present and future, to talk about anything outside of, maybe, combat sports and pot.

Humor is a technique that suits people like Bill Burr especially well. Since it's his job to make fun of others, you cannot attack him back easily.

12. The Puppeteer's Call™: Draw Them In, Leave Them Hanging

> Law of kings #1: Use your smaller allies to look hyperdominant. Smaller allies can't rebel witout losing the alliance. They're forced to submit. Use their neediness to display dominance with impunity

Calling people up to you displays power.
And letting them hang there displays total dominance.

Example:

> Trump: Where is the United Kingdom <— Acts like a teacher taking attendance
> Starmer: (walks to Trump) <— Obeys like a good pupil
> Trump: (turns around and leaves Starmer hanging, who then must walk back in shame)

Starmer already lost power walking to Trump. Trump could re-empower him a bit. Instead, he doubles down and embarrasses him even more.

13. The Stealth Flex™: Drop Hints, Let Them Connect The Dots

Machiavelli said it first:

> Every one sees what you appear to be, few really know what you are.

What's the point of having power, if you cannot flaunt it?

However, there is an art to displaying power.
Do it in one of two ways:

1. With bravado, as if to say "This is the reality of things, friends" (also see 'how to brag on dates')
2. Indirectly, as if you're trying to hide your real power

Here are some examples of this power move:

> Random guy: So, what do you do?
> You: I do some charity work to help less fortunate people <—- ⍰⍰ I'm rich, I don't need to work

And:

> Random Guy: Where are you from?

> Me: Originally, Italy, but EU during summers and warm places in winters <—- ⍰⍰ I lowkey live my dream life

And:

> Him: If you had to choose between a rich and handsom but jerk and nice but poor, what would you choose?
> Her: Well… I have more than enoguh and don't need any help there. Beauty does not impress me either, so… <—- ⍰⍰ Your low-value criteria don't apply to me

The guy's options are both poor frames. She switches the power tables by making him come across as petty and low-value.

14. Switch The Power Tables

This is the peak power move: going from power down to winning.

FAQs

What is the meaning of a power move?

A power move is a noun referring to a strategic social maneuver used to assert dominance or high status.
In practice, its meaning is defined by its impact on the frame of the interaction: it instantly shifts the power balance from a state of neutrality or subservience to one of superior value, power, and control.

What are some examples of power moves?

Notable power move examples include The Underdog's Flex (beating a competitor while at a disadvantage), The Money Flex (displaying extraordinarily abundant resources), and The Shock & Chill (intentionally inducing and then releasing social pressure). Other strategic examples include The Puppeteer's Call, or calling others to oneself only to then ignore them; and The Ask & Own, or contradicting others to display social dominance. These tactics are categorized into dialectical, negotiation, status-based, and mental power moves.

Are power moves always obvious?

No, power moves can be either conspicuous or subtle. While some are bold and highly visible, many effective power moves are quiet behaviors—such as controlled silence or a dry 'I disagree'—that are not as obvious, but still display power, self-sufficiency, and confidence.

Remember: Life Success Needs More Than Showy Power Moves

This article, just like its cousin "office power moves", is based on solid principles of power dynamics.

But while these high-impact moves are effective to impress and look supremely cool, true success comes from a baseline of high-status behavior and life strategy.

Power Dynamics: Why It's The Most Important Self-Help Discipline

Lucio Buffalmano · 23 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Power dynamics shape every interaction — from your career to your relationships.
They decide who leads, who follows, who gets respect, and who gets ignored.

Understanding them isn't optional — it's the difference between being effective or being outplayed.

The Power Moves pioneered power dynamics as a foundational branch of men's self-development, advanced social skills, and life strategy.

This guide explains what power dynamics really mean, shows real-life examples, and reveals how mastering them gives you an edge in status, attraction, and success.

Power Dynamics Definition

> Power dynamics is the study of power negotiations between individuals or groups

Power includes but is not limited to, influence, resources, and achieving specific goals and outcomes.

In academic terms, power is commonly defined as the capacity to influence others or control resources (Keltner et al., 2003).
However, we find that listing sources of power often gives a misleading sense of precision. Lists of power sources cannot provide a definitive list, while still adding complexity. To cut through the academic noise, we use a definition that focuses on effectiveness:

> Power is the ability to do and get what you want

As such, power dynamics includes the study of:

- Strategies to reach goal
- Negotiations, including of conflicting interests
- Cooperation among individuals to reach goals
- Influence and persuasion, as well as manipulation
- The negotiation of status between individuals and within groups
- The formation and acquisition of rank within structured hierarchies

Application of Power Dynamics

Here is how power dynamics are applied to some of the major areas of human socialization.

TPM Power Dynamics Framework

The TPM Power Dynamics Framework, developed by Lucio Buffalmano, is a systematic model for understanding and intentionally navigating power in human interactions to achieve goals and life-relevant outcomes.

While power dynamics have long been studied in sociology and psychology, TPM was among the first self-development frameworks to treat power dynamics as a foundational discipline for men's empowerment, translating abstract theory into concrete, real-world principles and strategies for achieving goals and life-relevant outcomes in dating, work, leadership, and everyday life.

The TPM Power Dynamics Framework is organized across two primary levels of analysis:

- Interpersonal Power Dynamics (TPM Model): The structural analysis of how power operates between individuals in one-to-one interactions such as dating, negotiation, conflict, competition, and leadership
- Social Power Dynamics (TPM): The analysis of power at the group level, including status, hierarchy, coalitions, reputation, and institutional influence

1. Interpersonal Power Dynamics

While social and interpersonal are often used interchangeably, they refer to very different levels of analysis.

Social power dynamics refers to social groups and social classes. Interpersonal power dynamics refers to 1:1 interactions, or one-to-many interactions seen from the individual's perspective.

Social Skills vs. Power Dynamics

Power dynamics and social skills overlap, but we can recognize a slightly different focus:

- Social skills is getting along, as it has historically focused on the more communal aspect of socialization, like getting along, and being liked
- Power dynamics is getting ahead, it's the more agentic aspect, focused on status, influence, dominance

Power	Social Skills
Get ahead	Get along
Status	Inclusion
Influence	Communication
Independence	Interdependence

This distinction is helpful for a first basic-level conceptualization, but it's of course simplistic. For example, getting ahead also means getting along enough not to be ostracized.
And even getting along requires some power-intelligence (e.g., avoiding power-related pitfalls like unwittingly disempowering others).

In general, we believe that true social skills include power-awareness, and social skills without power are hollow. Especially for a man.

But everyone is well advised to pay some attention to power dynamics. To quote one of this website's mantras from "The Prince":

> A good person is ruined among the great numbers who are not good

2. Leadership Power Dynamics

Power is central to leadership.
The process of becoming a leader is a process of status acquisition, status being a form of power, and sometimes of competition among leadership candidates.
The job of a leader also largely rests on the influence he exerts over his followers, influence being a form of power.

Finally, power dynamics also help differentiate between good leaders, and not-so-good ones.
Social psychologist John Turner refers to influence, authority, and coercion, which also aligns with Cheng and Tracy's two-model approach to status. Leaders who rely solely on rank and dominance tend to disempower followers, while prestigious leaders who gain followers' admiration tend to empower followers.

3. Dating Power Dynamics

Men and women have both converging and diverging interests, which also vary depending on individuals and context.

The converging and diverging interests create opportunities for cooperation, but also for possible defection and cheating.
This is why it is so crucial to understand dating power dynamics.

4. Relationship Power Dynamics

Contrary to what some may think, power dynamics are present in all relationships, including the best relationships. Healthy relationships start with mutual respect, accepting influence, and a willingness to negotiate win-win outcomes. These all have to do with power.

Conversely, it's sometimes a lack of power that creates issues.
For example, a lack of personal power in the form of no assertiveness leads to poor communication, bottling up grievances, and growing resentment.

5. Workplace Power Dynamics

> The study of power dynamics in workplace environments, including the strategies to gain unofficial status and win official promotions

Workplaces are a hotbed of politics and hidden power moves.

Power dynamics are hidden and sometimes Machiavellian because workplaces operate under two contrasting forces.
On one hand, there are company values, teamwork and 'company first' as the ultimate values to display publicly.
On the other hand, people must pursue their selfish interests to advance, and that often diverges from what's best for the team and the company.

Power Dynamics in The Social Sciences

There is no individual branch of social sciences called “power dynamics”.
And, as the APA Handbook suggests, it hasn’t been heavily investigated by empirical research:

> Given its paramount importance, one might expect power would hold a privileged place in the field of social psychology (…) Although there are (…) isolated pockets of research (…) power has never been a hotbed of theoretical or empirical activity.

On the other hand, since power is embedded in personal relationships, one could say that any research on human interactions already includes power.
In that sense, power dynamics are embedded in the very fabric of social science research.

🤔Lucio’s Take: How TPM Started Using Power Dynamics for Self-Development

Lucio:
I was an avid student of self-development, and I felt that something was missing.

Even the limited, non-naive literature on power, never provided practical guidance on achieving power-related goals.
Even best-known authors (like Robert Greene) offered great principles but not a cohesive, practical framework for daily encounters — the moments where status, influence, and attraction are negotiated.

So one day, as I reflected on an 'office power move' and how to best respond to it, it dawned on me: it was on me to create such a resource.

Measures of Power Dynamics

Many measures have been developed over the years to measure different aspects of power dynamics in various disciplines.
We handpick some that we believe to be most significant:

- Need for Power (nPow): Classic motive measure capturing a desire to influence, lead, control, or impact others.
  - Status Motive / Need for Status: Measures how motivated someone is to seek higher social rank, respect, visibility, and prestige.
- Personal Sense of Power (SOP / POW): Measures how powerful a person feels in their relationships and daily interactions. Captures subjective interpersonal power.
  - Leadership Self-Efficacy: Measures a person's belief in their ability to lead, influence, direct, and coordinate others — a form of functional power.
- Interpersonal Power Inventory (IPI): Measures how people use power in relationships across different bases of power (reward, coercion, legitimacy, expertise, etc.).
  - Dominance–Prestige Scale (Cheng & Tracy) Measures two core strategies of status: dominance (force, intimidation), and prestige (skills, respect)

- Social Dominance Orientation (SDO): Measures preference for hierarchy, inequality, and dominance of one group over another. It's a social construct, but also significant for personality psychology
- Communion / Agency Scales: Measure focus on agency (assertion, influence, leadership) versus communion (warmth, cooperation). Agency is directly tied to power.

Why Power Is Hidden From Public Discourse

As important as power dynamics are… Why so few people (openly) talk about it?

The reason can be well explained by power dynamics itself:

1. Reputational risk

You may be branded as "power hungry" or "dark triad".

Someone "bad", or to be careful around.

And few people want that.

2. Strategic misguidance

If you can pass for naive, others may lower their guard, or compete less hard.
Lower competition makes life easier for the strategic player who feigns disinterest in power.

3. Virtue signaling

Public dismissal of power-relevant pursuits may display kindness and prosociality. If one virtue signals against someone else he may catch two birds with a stone: disempowering the attacker, and look better by comparison.
For example:

> Him: (attacks Lucio for writing about power) <— Funny thing, the attack for writing about power is in itself a power move, with the sometimes unconscious goal of acquiring power.

4. Public scorn, private consumption

People may publicly profess disinterest in power, only to seek it privately.

Publicly, it's a virtue signal to look better and a manipulation attempt to discourage others from learning a crucial life skill.
Then, privately, they double down to gain an edge.

Early on this website's existence, I used to share articles on Facebook.
A connection wrote a scathing message on a post. But a few days later wrote privately that it was 'interesting'. And a few days later asked for coaching.

Why Learning Power Dynamics

Power dynamics is a foundational skill and knowledge because life itself demands it.

The goal of life is to survive, advance, and reproduce.
And these basic functions require both cooperation, often under the constant threat of defection, and competition.
Both of them are grounded in power dynamics (not just competition!).

Achieving any challenging goals also requires power and strategies.
And achieving them with an honorable approach, giving while also not being taken advantage of, may require even more power mastery ('enlightened giver'). Including knowing how to spot and handle bullies, takers, and various manipulation tactics.

The Positive Contribution of Power Dynamics

We believe that society gains from the empowerment we seek to provide.
There are different reasons why:

1. Predators and takers intuitively understand power dynamics, so they gain comparatively less
2. Good people gain more than bad people because they often lack an intuitive feel for power
3. Empowered people decrease predation across the board: predators prey on easy prey. The fewer easy prey, the less abuse in this world
4. Less scum and more cream to the top (more meritocracy): power-aware and bold players can sometimes advance with little competence. The more good people learn the game of power, the more competence will make the difference
5. Less naive idiots follow bad leaders. Dominance complementarity theory suggests that submissive followers better fit with dominant and narcissistic leaders (Carson, 1969; Kiesler, 1983; Grijalva & Harms, 2014); and research suggests that the weaker vulnerable narcissists tend to elect populists (de Zavala, 2018)

And, now we can revisit Machiavelli's quote:

> A good man is ruined among those who are not good.
> But a good man who has learned power dynamics is armed and ready.

True that.

When you don't need power dynamics

Power dynamics become less relevant when:

- You're OK languishing at the bottom of society
- You achieved all that you wanted to achieve

- You’re a hermit
- People in your life are absolutely, 100% good, honest, and value-giving

Beyond those extremes, you may need it less if you deal with mostly good people and are fully satisfied. But caution is necessary: life circumstances—and people—can change fast

For everyone else, in competitive environments — careers, dating, leadership, influence — power dynamics isn’t optional.
The only choice is whether you understand the game or get outplayed by those who do.
If you’re an ambitious man, Power University teaches you that game, so you can win it:

Dark Psychology: 7 Ways Manipulators Trick You

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Dark psychology is the study and practice of manipulation, influence, and coercion to gain power at the expense of others.

At The Power Moves, we're experts in decoding these tactics and revealing how manipulators use them in various areas of life—dating, relationships, politics, and more.

In this article, we'll uncover the most common manipulative techniques, exposing the dark strategies that control minds.

  - 7. Dark Psychology in Business
- What Dark Psychology is Not
  - Summary

What's Dark Psychology

We define dark psychology as such:

> The use of psychological principles of influence, manipulation, and coercion, for ends that can benefit the perpetrator but that harm or limits the freedom and power of the receiver.

From now on, we'll call "dark psychologist" anyone who deploys tools of influence and persuasion in a way that harms the receiver.

Of course, sometimes the lines between a normal person, and a dark psychologist can blur.
And it's also possible to manipulate others to exact fair revenge or for personal defense.

Yet, let's not get lost in a sea of relativism, and let's be realistic.
Some people are "darker" than others, and manipulate far more than others. And the opposite is true: some people have stronger values and ethics, and you can more reliably expect them to be honest and fair.

Now let's quickly review some myths of dark psychology.

1. Dark Psychology For Social Manipulation

> Dark psychology in social settings consists of strategies and techniques to manipulate people to do what's good for the dark psychologist, but harmful for the victims

The applications of darker psychology in interpersonal relationships are endless.
We have a website for that, and a whole course that teaches men how to naturally spot manipulation and red flags.

But some examples include:

- Tell nice guys that they're great people, so they remain too nice guys while the dark psychologist advances by NOT being a too nice guy
- Guilt tripping or "pity play" to make others feel bad and do what you want out of guilt. And despite they can reek of manipulative, research suggests they can work
- Encouraging other women to be independent to handicap their dating. This is the 'feminist manipulation'.

Many people use these techniques without even knowing their names, of course.
They just have a natural 'feel' for manipulation.

2. Dark Psychology in Dating

> Dark psychology in dating applies psychological principles to meet one's own sexual strategies at the detriment of the dating partner

We said this several times on this website:

Dating between men and women presents common objectives as well as some diverging interests.

For example:

- Men gain from having sex ASAP, women lose
- Men gain from sex without commitment, women lose
- Women gain from lots of investment before sex, men lose
- Women gain when men in their lives dote on them, men lose

Of course there are exceptions, and there are plenty of ways to smoothen out the divergences -with collaborative frames, for example-. But the above statements are still true plenty of times to make dating a fertile ground for manipulators and dark psychologists.

The dark psychologist dates with complete disregard of the well being of their dating partner, while seeking to exclusively maximize their own self-interest.

The Male Dark Psychologist

The male dark psychologist:

- Strings her along without a relationship: he lies about his future goals and plans, pretends he wants to settle down, but just "later"
- Seeks "sex on the side": he gives commitment, but does not keep his word (very common)
- Chameleon manipulation: he presents a mask of the man she wants, instead of the man he is. The game is to pretend there are no conflicts of interests, and that they want the same thing, which in turn helps to lower her defenses, and get to sex quicker

An example of the latter, and a cheap one at that, is the man who feigns to be into long term relationships to get women who are seeking a relationship.
Like this guy: selling the "ideal relationship guy":

> Him: (commenitng on the ideal of perfect marriage) now, that's my idea of a perfect marriage
> Her: totally (he stares at her and sighs)

Seeking sex ASAP is not "dark" per se. That's a fair, and potentially smart, lover strategy.
But it can become dark when the man cajoles, lies, or offer fake rewards that never materialize (see Weinstein promising acting roles).

The Female Dark Psychologist

Among the female manipulations:

- Position herself as the prize: reject him, feign low interest, make him chase… These all serve to keep him on his toes and make him invest
- Control him through sex: most men need sex more than women. And some women use sex, dispensed as a reward or withheld as punishment, to get what they want.

P.S.:
one of the most popular articles on this website is "How to make him crazy" and one of the most searched keywords is "How to mindf*ck a guy".

2.1. Dark Psychology in Seduction (Advanced)

This is how we define dark psychology seduction:

> Dark psychology in seduction seeks bonds and attachments based not on mutual love and affection, but on predatory one-sided attachment, or on traumatic bonds that leverages or creates psychological wounds

Some examples include:

- Regression seduction: seduction through mother / father roles
- Judge seductions: the individual frames himself as superior, and makes the partner chase for his approval (see: "the judge role")
- Traumatic bonding: the individual makes their partner attached through physical and/or emotional abuse
- Emotional roller-coaster bonding: increasing attachment through cycles of fights and re-pacification (also see: anxious-avoidant attachment)
- Control through personal kinks: the dark psychologist provides sexual satisfaction through kinks that the target keeps secret.
  The dark psychologist becomes the only person that can sexually satisfy them, plus they acquire an important secret the target wishes to keep secret, which gives them leverage

Some dark seducer techniques can be used subconsciously. Or as a consequences of someone's psychological makeup.
But they can also be premeditated, as with this example:

> Dark seducer: (uses sex, romance and Mach techniques to gain power over her)

3. Dark Psychology in Relationships

> Dark psychology in relationships applies psychological principles to gain power and control one's partner

There is less conflict in relationships than in dating.
But there is still some conflict.

For example, each partner can gain by keeping one nominally committed relationship, with all the sexual and emotional benefits that entails, while also seeking more sex on the side -and that's why cheating exists: it can pay off-.

- Psychological tools of female control: women naturally deploy a set of very specific (dark) psychological tools to control their men
- Gaslighting & crazymaking, including a pattern of win-loses, power-hoarding and low-quality behavior that some people also deploy in friendships and business partnerships
- Males techniques for mate-control: men more than women gain from controlling their partner, so they deploy a set of both physical and psychological tools to guard their partners. These range from outright abuse, to jealous controlling, to shaming techniques, to lowering her self-esteem so that she is more dependent on him
- The psychopath's control tools: which include:
  - Devaluation
  - Operant conditioning with punishment / reward
  - Drama to induce cycles of positive and negative emotions

- Fear of abandonment to make the partner submit ("dread game")

But the whole article is a shocking read on Machiavellian strategies and dark psychology techniques:

> Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

4. Dark Psychology in Politics

> Dark psychology in politics consists of techniques of propaganda and political debating designed to negatively frame one's opponent, influence voters, and enduce citizens to abandon individualistic behavior in favor of the collective

There are many levels of political dark psychology, and we can separate them into two major groups: during campaigns, and in office.

In democracies, these two phases can overlap since politicians in power are still campaigning for the next elections. But even in democracies, you can still notice a marked switch from campaign to office.

Here is a quick difference:

- During campaigns
  - Frame the opponent as ineffective and unworthy
  - Frame the current state as hopeless
  - Frame yourself as the man to fix the situation
  - In extreme situations, make up an enemy and paint yourself as the right person to handle that enemy
- Once in power
  - Frame the status quo as positive
  - Take personal credit for things going well
  - Find scapegoats for things going poorly
  - Foster ideals of nationalism to drop rational selfishness in favor of the group (which ultimately benefits the politicians who lead those groups)

The last stage is common in many groups.
Government officials indeed can be seen as group leaders. And in the case of extremist governments, despots act the same way as cult leaders and hate groups leaders act, using the same principles of dark psychology.
That includes:

- Making up enemies
- Increasing group cohesion through extremist values and religious zealot
- Stoking fears and framing oneself as the only one to effectively tackle the danger (see Trump with immigrants)
- Stoking anger as a diversion tactic

5. Dark Psychology Leadership

> Dark psychology seeks to reduce the followers' power and independence, while increasing the leaders' power and control

Have you read the Power Moves' values?

One of them advises readers to develop themselves before getting too deep into any group.
Why do I advise so?

Because most group leaders want to decreases members' power and independence while increasing their power and influence over those same group members.

To make people more dependent on the group, group leaders will deploy several tactics of dark psychology, including:

- Make people's problems appear as bigger than they actually are: so people believe they will need the group and group leader to solve them
- Ridicule, disempower, or exclude discording voices: cult leaders seek to cut out all discordant opinions. Since that's rarely possible, group leaders frame any discordant voices as "idiotic", "uninformed", or "manipulative" (funny, eh?), so that they can inoculate their effect and keep followers loyal to the group's diktats and dogmas
  For example:
  - Don't listen to the "femininized society" = that's what manosphere groups say
  - Don't listen to the "patriarchal society" = that's what feminist groups say
    Funny, eh? Same exact society, but two specularly opposite way of framing it, to keep the group loyal.
- Make up a big, huge enemy that can only be fought as a group: see the feminists with the "patriarchy", or the red pill with "feminized society". When people perceive a big external enemy, they will want to seek refuge in the group

More dark psychology techniques in groups are:

- Fostering group's superiority over the individual: humanist and enlightened ideals of individualism and personal freedom are a threat to group leaders. They seek instead to prioritize the group over any individual. The more people sacrifice themselves for the group, the more power they have.
- Dissolving members' ego with the group: the more members identify with the group, the more power the group -and the group leader- will have on its members
- Fusing the group with the leader: the last stage of dark psychology is for the leader to embody the group. That way, he can reach total control over its members. At that point, there is no group anymore, just the leader and its followers who are in it for the leader

6. Dark Psychology in War

> Dark psychology seeks to instill terror, to mentally dominate or unsettle the enemy in a way that will handicap its fighting abibility and, ideally, to make their fight and resistance seem futile.
> Manipulative communication during war frames the enemy as barbaric, and brutal, and spreads that view as widely as possible.

The armed conflict is only one aspect of war.

Psychology, information, and propaganda all become crucial strategic tools to support a military campaign.

6.1. Terror to Win Without Conflict

The biggest dark psychology power move in war is this:

> Lead the enemy to surrender without even firing a shot

For example, Genghis Khan purposefully crafted a reputation of merciless brutality towards anyone who resisted him.
That way many walled cities and castles on his path simply opened the door without opposing any resistance.
That was the equivalent of a big display of submissiveness in exchange for their lives.

Encirclement tactics or displays of superior firepower also serve to win without firing a single shot.
In a way, dark psychology at war can actually save lives.

6.2. The Nazi Stuka: Noise as Psychological Warfare

There are countless examples of psychological warfare.

A genius and innovative one was the light bomber plane Stuka, which had a siren attached to its nose.

The nazi engineers planned it that way to spread fear among the ground troops under attack. The goal was to build in the minds of the enemies an association between the sound of the siren with impending disaster and death.

From a psychological point of view, the Stuka siren wanted ground troops to “learn helplessness” (Seligman, 1967). Once troops learn they can’t defend from an attack from the sky, they paralyze in fear, disband, and retreat in chaos. Exactly what the Germans wanted. And exactly what happened in Dunkirk.

6.3. Dark Psychology on The Air

During wartime, psychology is even more effectively deployed to control and sway public opinion.

Wartime manipulation consists of five different elements:

1. Frame oneself as “good”: ideally, as “holy”, or as having a responsibility to export “good” wherever you’re going to fight
2. Frame the enemy as evil: the enemy is oppressive, brutal or, even better, a threat to our way of life or our own same existence
3. Make victory seem easy and obvious: few people want to actually go fight that war. So make it seem like a quick and easy business
4. Hide the true costs of war: nobody wants to pay for that war. So hide the costs, make it seem like the people will gain from it
5. Hide the true emotional costs: nobody wants to see that our holy war is bringing death and suffering. So hide the casualties, the mothers with dead children, and the children crying on the bodies of their dead parents. How’s that for dark psychology :(.

Claiming holiness and God on one's side helps in two ways:

1. It makes one's own troops feel destined to victory
2. Props up internal civil support for the ongoing war efforts

6.4. Mo' Power, Mo' Manipulation

Dark Psychology can provide the cover for continued brutality.

Countries with bigger budgets engage in dark psychology to control what the world thinks of their wars.
By dominating the informational war, more powerful countries can keep engaging in modern-day colonialism and invasions without people realizing what they're truly up to.

Up until recently, Israel was very successful ad controlling the narrative.
Upon revision of this article in 2025, things changed though and grassroots movements changed the game.

7. Dark Psychology in Business

> Dark psychology in business manipulates employees into giving up their indivual self-interest in favor of the organization, while accepting only a small portion of their true contribution.

There is no point in saddling you with more information here.

There is already a large resource on this phenomenon, with plenty of examples:

What Dark Psychology is Not

Dark psychology is extremely powerful, but it's not dark magic.

This section will dispel some dark psychology myths.

1. Dark psychology is not hypnosis to make anyone do anything

Hypnosis is powerful.

A series of well-placed commands embedded within a distracting word-salad of nonsense can bewilder people enough to give you some control over them.

Once they disengage their critical thinking, you can then quickly escalate their compliance until you can successfully ask them to hand over their wallets, for example.
Or let you go instead of giving you a ticket, if they are cops.

See here an example of the latter:

> Officer: you burned the stop sign
> Hypnotist: (hypnotizes police offer)

This video is interesting.
Yet, it also shows hypnosis's limitations:

1. The cop was friendly enough to allow the driver to dominate the frame at will. Same for Derren Brown's subjects: all passive and compliant
2. The hypnotist was himself shocked it worked, which tells us that it doesn't usually work
3. The hypnotist admits that he picked a bunch of tickets trying to finally "hypnotize" a cop (ie.: it didn't work most of the times)

Learn the power-based strategies to avoid traffic tickets (alumni only!)

2. Dark psychology is not NLP and "undercover seduction triggers"

Again, there is some truth, here.

Well-designed stimuli, including auditory patterns, can change people's moods and induce trance-like states that can facilitate or amplify seduction.

And yes, with the right settings and techniques it's INCREDIBLY POWERFUL.

I once had a woman who had never orgasmed to orgasm multiple times as she over and over professed her love.

Sounds impressive?

Well it will sound a lot more impressive when I add that I was shorter than her.
And Far less "alpha" than all her past boyfriends and that… We were just lying next to each other fully clothed.

Yes, it is powerful.

HOWEVER…

That was only the peak of a longer seduction process after a day together where I acted like a high-value man. (Yes, you can be high value even as a short, "non typical alpha type").

You MUST be high value for any dark psychology technique to work.

The confusion comes from unscrupulous snake oil salesmen.
Have you ever seen those advertisements of "send her these 3 texts and she'll be all over you"?
Or NLP-based courses, or "secret combinations of words" that will make her yours?

Total BS.

In truth, she has to like you and trust you before you can induce any turnaround -or any trance-like states-.

Otherwise, the more you speak, the more you chase, and the more you repel her.

See here for some good real dark-psychology seduction tools:

- How to set up your room for seduction
- Songs for seduction

> 10 Steps to Prepare Your House For A Date (Seductive Environment)

3. Dark psychology does not turn anyone into a cult-sect follower

Again, some truth.

Cults and sects are real.
And cult leaders do deploy solid psychological principles to ensnare people (plus they are often very good with power dynamics).

It's a myth though that anyone could be recruited into a sect and become a blind follower.
Remember this general truth about manipulation:

> Manipulators' biggest skill is always in picking the targets who are easiest to manipulate

That's not to say that you should have too much confidence in yourself. After all, the best way to put yourself in danger is to believe you're unassailable.
But it does mean that the power of dark psychology in cults is also limited by the targets' own power, which includes his knowledge of power dynamics and his knowledge of manipulation principles.

When you read of cult leaders who had their members do this or that crazy and dangerous acts, including self-harm, never forget this: most of those people were not the mentally strongest and most fiercely independent people to begin with.

And if you are reading here and enjoying The Power Moves' content, chances are very low that you'd end up in a sect.

And it's also not...

- Brainwashing: brainwashing requires total control over someone, do not work on everyone -possibly only work on a minority of people-, take a long time, and its effects tend to dissipate with time
- World control by a small subset of people: the idea that governments, CIA, or any elite controls what everyone thinks and does thanks to propaganda is a failure to appreciating the complexity of our world. Yes, propaganda is powerful. But the world is far messier to be controlled in some fantasy war-room
- Hannibal Lecter types of predators: that's just a BS Hollywood movie
- Psychopathy: psychopathy is a mental disorder. And while some psychopaths are good users of dark psychology, many aren't.
- Sears, psychics, spells, curses, potions, fortune tellers… : those are not psychology, neither dark, nor light. That's just, well… Largely BS
- Subliminal manipulation: subliminal advertising works, but it's been largely overstated by early fabricated false reports (Gass and Seiter, 2022). It only works when existing associations are already present in our brain. And you can probably hardly change deep-seated beliefs with subliminal messages
- Creepy pictures: clowns, dolls without eyes, Halloween costumes… Those are not dark psychology, they're just creepy artwork

“Dark psychology” is associated with creepy images, sowing extra confusion around this topic

Summary

Dark psychology is not a formal and recognized branch of psychology.

There is no such thing as research labeled as “dark psychology”, or any formal education courses on it.

That’s why if you research it on the web you get a lot of dubious sites and books on the topic (many of which are poor, see our review on “Dark Psychology 101“).
However, that is not to say that dark psychology itself is ineffective, or wholly unsubstantiated. Quite the opposite.

Dark psychology can be effective because dark psychology is simply psychology, applied for harmful and abusive ends.

The Psychopath Inside: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Psychopath Inside (2013) is the autobiographical account of James Fallon, a neuroscientist who found out he had the brain wiring of a psychopath.
The book takes the readers on a dual journey: a scientific one, with plenty of details on neuroscience, and a personal one, with Fallon's own life as a high-functioning psychopath.

Key Takeaways

- Psychopathy is inborn, but to become a "full-blown, anti-social psychopath" you also need a bad childhood and a warrior gene
- There is no precise definition for a psychopath, and no exact science to measure psychopathy
- Mild traits of psychopathy can be advantageous for the individual, as well as for society (but full-blown psychopathy, above 30, is not)

Summary

About the Author:
James Fallon is an American neuroscientist. He is professor of psychiatry and human behavior and professor of anatomy and neurobiology at the University of California, Irvine School of Medicine.

There Is No Precise Definition of A Psychopath

Searching for a definition of a psychopath, Fallon had to agree that there wasn't any.

The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) only lists "antisocial personality disorder", but it's not the same.
As Dr. Rober Hare also explains, most criminals are antisocial, but not all criminals and antisocial personalities are psychopaths.

Says Fallon:

> Many doctors and researchers have their own definitions of what makes a psychopath. The problem is, every definition is different and none are cut-and-dried.

We Still Know Too Little of The Brain to Be Accurate (But We Can Still Spot a Psychopath)

One of the reasons there are no precise definitions and no accurate criteria to measure psychopathy is that we still know little of the brain.

Says Fallon:

> Diseases are based on knowledge of the cause (or etiology) of a particular disorder and the effects (or pathophysiology) they have on the body. Unlike for many true diseases of other organ systems, we don't have this luxury with diseases of the mind since so little is known of the underlying pathological biological mechanisms at work.

And more on psychopathy as a "disorder" of the brain:

> Therefore, most psychiatric problems are called disorders or syndromes. Psychopathy stands on the lowest rung of this disease-disorder ladder, since no one agrees on what defines it—or if it exists at all—and so there is no professional agreement as to the underlying causes.

And he takes a swing at the "Hare Checklist":

> Trying to identify or define psychopathy with just a checklist of traits and no cause is like using a field taxonomy guide. If it flies and eats and makes noises it could be a bird, but it could also be a bat or an insect; you haven't nailed down what the thing really is.

However, on top of the widely used and recognized PCL-R (Psychopathy Check List Revised), there are a number of scientific tests we can run, including:

- PET (positron emission tomography)
- fMRI (functional magnetic resonance imaging)
- Genetics tests
- Behavioral and psychometric tests

Taken together, these tests can reveal symptoms that can point towards a psychiatric disorder.
Plus, ends Fallon:

> I see psychopathy like others see art; I can't define it, but I know it when I see it.

Lack of Empathy: The Defining Trait

Most psychiatrists agree that one of the defining characteristics of psychopaths is the lack of interpersonal empathy.

Psychopaths live in what may be defined as a “flat emotional playing field”.

Cold & Hot Cognition

- Cold cognition is rationality independent of emotions: emotionless processing of thoughts, perceptions, short-term or executive memories, plans, and rule-making
- Hot cognition is emotional cognition through and with emotions: Fallon includes in this category emotional memory and socially, ethically, and morally programmed behaviors.

Connecting with others requires both cold cognition, where you understand what they’re thinking and what’s an appropriate response, and hot (emotional) cognition, where you can empathize with their feelings and attitudes.

Someone with damage to the hot system might have difficulties predicting other people’s thoughts and, most of all, sharing his feelings.

Theory of Mind

Fallon defines theory of mind as:

> elaborated medial prefrontal system that allows us to consider others’ thoughts and beliefs, even if they’re different from our own

The author says there might be a dichotomy between empathy and theories of mind.

My Note: Did he mean “link between empathy and theories of mind”?
I didn’t get the point and it feels like Fallon used the wrong word there.

Autistic people have empathy but no theory of mind, while psychopaths have theories of mind but lack empathy.

That means that psychopaths lack emotional empathy, but have cognitive empathy.
Such as, they can guess what you are feeling, but do so without in a cold and calculated way, without feeling sympathy.

Says Fallon (bold and italic are mine):

> A psychopath has a poorly functioning ventral system, usually used for hot cognition, but he can have a normal or even supernormal dorsal system, so that without the bother of conscience and empathy, the cold planning and execution of predatory behaviors becomes finely tuned, convincing, highly manipulative, and formidable. Because psychopaths’ dorsal systems work so well, they can learn how to appear that they care, thus making them even more dangerous.

Brain Damage Is Necessary For Psychopathy, But A Bad Environment Is Needed, Too

The author was a staunch believer that we are shaped by nature, not nurture.

But as he got to know himself more, and as he began to research, he started changing his mind.

My note: some of his evidence for nurture VS nature is lacking
Read the criticism for more

Genes and environment interact in a number of ways:

- Genotype-environment correlation: if your father is aggressive, he will pass on the genes, but also the attitude at home which will reinforce those genes. And an aggressive attitude in life might lead to more confrontations, making the kid even more aggressive
- Epigenetic marking: a "tag" of chemical information that only gets activated under certain situations and with certain environment-related stimuli.
  Says Fallon: "the genome is the book you inherited at birth, the epigenome is the way you read that book"

But Don't Exaggerate the Role of Nurture

Fallon also makes a note that we shouldn't overplay the importance of nurture.
He says:

> Kids are malleable, but mostly at the extremes. In the absence of bad abuse or extreme genetics, kids will turn out okay.

A New Theory of (Criminal) Psychopathy

Fallon comes up with his own new theory on psychopathy, which requires 3 legs:

1. Unusually low functioning of the orbital prefrontal cortex and anterior temporal lobe, including the amygdala
2. The high-risk variants of several genes, the most famous being the warrior gene
3. Early childhood emotional, physical, or sexual abuse.

He calls it "theory of psychopathy", but he seems to be referring to the more extreme version of psychopathy, the more criminal and violent one.

Psychopaths Cannot Change Themselves

One of the chapters is called "can you change a psychopath?".

Fallon's answer is:

> We are machines and cannot fundamentally change ourselves through sheer force of will.

But Fallon also acknowledges that a little change might happen if he changes the narrative of his actions and motives (ie.: reframing).
He says:

> I could be like someone who describes himself as having a refreshing, flexible, open, and healthy attitude to sex, rather than just admitting to himelf that what he really is is promiscuous.

But then again, he adds, that wouldn't change the nature of the underlying behavior.

He could try to push through a plan of behavioral redemption, but the problem with that is that he doesn't care to change.

He could control a specific issue of his behavior, but if he did so, all his energies would be sucked up in that one thing.

It's like Oprah controlling her weight. Oprah is not lacking willpower, and if all she did was focusing on her weight, she could stay thin. But if she wants to also pursue all her other ambitions, she will get back to putting on weight.

For other possible cures and drugs, says Fallon:

> Psychopathic tendencies are particularly hard to fight, and attempted cures may make only small differences. Drugs that influence the monoamine neurotransmitter systems can partially reduce impulsivity and aggression, and early interventions involving diet and meditation can decrease behavioral problems, but the core neuropsychological deficits leading to lack of empathy and remorse remain.
> There are no magic bullets.

Psychopathy Might Rise in Areas With Chronic Violence

If psychopathy is partially nurture and environment, then it convenes that bad nurturing and bad environment will churn more psychopaths.

Indeed, says James Fallon:

> I've hypothesized that in areas with chronic violence, from Gaza to East L.A., the concentration of genes associated with psychopathy might be increasing as women mate with bad boys for protection and aggressive genes spread, increasing the violence and repeating the loop. Over generations, we end up with warrior societies. It's a speculative idea but one that's important to consider and study further.

However, I would add, the opposite is also true.
And in peaceful areas, women might be happier with kinder and more protective men, and the genes for kindness and pro-sociality might increase.

I have personally noticed that in safer and more peaceful countries and cities, women are afraid of too direct approaches.
Instead, they respond much better to "social circle game", or to more careful approaches where the man can put them at ease.

The Usefulness of Psychopaths

In the last chapter, Fallon discusses two important topics:

- Why psychopaths exist at all
- The "utility" of psychopaths to society

He says that, since psychopaths exist and are still among us since the dawn of time, then it means that at individual level psychopathy must be somewhat useful.
At least at moderate levels, he adds, making a note that full-blown psychopathy might not be useful, but just a question of randomness:

> Perhaps full psychopaths, those scoring 30 points or more on the Hare Checklist, are just a statistical fluke or a roll of the dice in the genetic casino, amassing too many of the genes that are helpful individually.
> But 2 percent is a lot of people. And that number is constant across races, even though the prevalence of specific genes, such as the warrior gene, vary widely. We should consider why psychopathic traits might be individually advantageous, or at least tolerable, from an evolutionary standpoint.

Among the advantages of psychopathy Fallon lists:

- Ability to lie without giving out “tells” (my note: this is useless though since people are NOT good at catching other people’s lies)
- Less anxiety, which means a better functioning immune system (my note: not that useful when psychopaths, with poorer impulse control, indulge in heavy drinking and drug abuse)
- Manipulation of mates: known psychopaths have women waiting for them outside prisons, while unknown psychopaths are still good with women thanks to their ability to fake unconditional love (my note: only partially true, see “the myth of the psychopath seducer“)

However, it’s true that psychopaths can be very good at manipulating and controlling mates.

1. Taking Risks That Will Benefit Civilization (?)

At a group level, psychopaths can make for strong leaders.

They tend to take more risks, which may or may not work in favor of the group. But more risks can benefit civilization as a whole.

Says Fallon:

> On a larger scale, it benefits civilization to have groups take chances, because some will succeed and move civilization forward—just as biological evolution benefits from mutations, even though many of them are deadly.

He may have a point there.

And he keeps on going:

> I don’t think we should remove the psychopathy-related traits and genes from society. It would lead to passivity and wipe us out. (…) Individuals with low empathy and high aggression, if they’re treated well, can have a positive impact.
> Of course, they put stress on their families and friends, as I do, but on a macro level they’re beneficial to society.

I don’t fully buy that, but he might have a point here:

> I believe there’s a sweet spot on the psychopathy spectrum.
> People who are twenty-five or thirty on the Hare scale are dangerous, but we need a lot of twenties around—people with the chutzpah and brio and outrageousness to keep humanity vibrant and adaptable—and alive.

2. More Detached Decision-Making

Fallon quotes Hare to say that psychopathy is common in high-returns professions such as investment banking (Hare, 2006).

Fallon says that psychopathy is popular in business because people expect quick returns on their investment.
I quote him:

> The general public wants to make that quick and easy buck and, while lacking their own combination of high risk and knowledge, use hired guns like Madoff and other investment mavens to do their dirty work for them.

Sure, it may turn out the psychopath was in it only for himself, acknowledges Fallon, but common experience still shows that we fall for the strong risk-taker.

The author mentions Kent Kiehl, a psychopath researcher, who estimated the social costs of psychopathy at $460 billion a year, in 2011 dollars.
But Fallon disagrees, saying that psychopaths might also save money. For example, by being less emotional and more surgical in their operations.

Also read:

- Psychopaths VS empaths: why Machiavellianism helps you win at life

3. Good Warrios (But Also a Double-Edged Sword)

Fallon says that psychopaths make for good warriors.

But that comes at a high cost, as Fallon himself admits:

> The problem with inviting psychopaths to war, however, is that the military also wants soldiers to be team players who can connect with their unit and fight not only against the enemy but for their own.

4. Turning Psychopathy On-Off On Per-Needed Basis?

Fallon talks about a former colonel who said he was able to switch his fighting instinct on and off, at will.

He could go on a killing mission and then be a loving man once the mission was over.

So he wonders: could it be possible to do the same for everyone?
Says Fallon:

> Can such an effective emotionality on-off switch be (…) applied to the recruitment and training of combat personnel? This can be determined, but probably at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars in long-term research.
> One option is to artificially flip the switch using transcranial magnetic stimulation (TMS). If you put a focused electromagnetic coil in the helmet you might be able to disrupt emotionality at the flip of a literal switch. Off: social mode. On: killer mode.

Quotes

On colleagues calling him a “psychopath”:

> People often refer to others as “crazy” or “a psychopath” without meaning it literally. Looking back, though, I probably should have paused to consider the sources in my case: trained psychiatrists who specialized in mood > and brain disorders and would probably not be so quick to abuse a professional term simply because they were mad.

On effective manipulation;

> You don't manipulate people by snarling. You do it by being sweet as shit.

On "proper" psychopathy:

> I don't want to kill anybody or hurt anybody. And I don't like to steal things or lie. That's for losers. If you have to do that, you're a disappointment as a psychopath. Violence is crude and it destroys the fun. My concern is not moral but practical: I'm looking to get the most bang.

On the power of good nurturing:

> Real nurture can overcome a lousy deck of cards dealt at birth by nature. There are good behavioral, genetic, epigenetic, psychiatric, and social reasons to clean up neighborhoods and to treat vulnerable children with an extra bit of love.

More Wisdom

- The earlier the abuse, the more harmful it is: "the later the stressors, like emotional or physical abuse, occur, the less the effect will tend to be"
- The The "Macdonald triad" is not really predictive of psychopathy: bedwetting is not a great predictor, and animal cruelty and fire-starting are relatively common among boys
- You can have sympathy without empathy: You can have sympathy without empathy, says Fallon. Sympathy is the ability to retrieve emotional memories, including memories that can predict what type of pain is about to befall others, together with the will to help that person
- Libertarians are fairness above emotions: libertarians rely more on a sense of fairness and justice than on how they feel emotionally about a person or a group of people. Gandhi and Mother Theresa might be two examples that fought for grander causes, but cared little about individuals

Some potentially overblown stories & contradictions

Some psychopaths tend to make up grandiose, exaggerated stories that sound either out of a movie, or plain impossible.

See for yourself if this sounds realistic:

> I jumped out of my car and ran down the hill and was just able to crawl through a smashed window to position myself over the face of the driver, who was an elderly gentleman in the throes of death.
> His chest was crushed and while he was vomiting and regurgitating blood into my face, I kept him revived by mouth-to-mouth for about twenty minutes, until the police arrived. They pulled me out of the man's car by my legs, and I was furious, since I was so intent on reviving him. After testifying at the police station, I ended the interview melodramatically by throwing the old man's bloodied dentures onto the police sergeant's desk.

Contradictions

The author says he's a terrible flirt, and that his wife Diane knows it because she knows how women respond to him.

But just the line before that, he says that if a girl tells him "Do you wanna do it now?" that's good enough for him because he feels he's been validated and he could control those women.

Well, those two statements are somewhat in contradiction.

The author also says he never cheated, but some other times he makes it sound like he is chasing women or enjoying their company.

Overplaying the role of nurture?

The author says that brain damage is a precondition for psychopathy, but bad parenting and a poor childhood is also necessary.
I agree poor parenting adds up, but it's not always necessary.

Says Fallon:

> A small survey of thirty-five psychopathic offenders in youth detention facilities found that 70 percent reported serious mistreatment throughout childhood.
> Given that the onset of reliable memory for childhood events in adults may reach back to three to four years of age (…) it was possible that more than 90 percent of them were abused (…). Add to this those psychopaths who protect their abusers, and the percentage could approach 99 percent, or so I reasoned.

Well, that's quite some mental legwork to go from 70% to 99%. On such a small survey, too.

And again:

> I looked at all the case studies I could find in the literature and in my work, and saw that for all the psychopaths, including dictators, who had psychiatric reports from their youth, all had been abused and often had lost one or more of their biological parents.
> While there may be cases where this is not true, I could not find any proven ones. There were cases where the murderer denied early abuse, but many people will deny such abuse, only for it to be discovered later that either they were too embarrassed to admit it, or they were protecting the abusing adult, typically a family member.

The author is taking criminals who said they were abused at their words, but does not accept criminals who said they were not abused.

It makes little sense to me.
There also incentives in making up abusive stories to gain sympathy with the jury.

Indigo child woo-woo

The author says he always thought of Indigo and Orchid children as woo-woo pseudo-science.
But then he says, when he started reading the description, it made sense, because it described him well.

That didn't increase trust in the author for me.

PROS

- Very good to understand psychopathy

Texts about psychopaths written by psychopaths will always provide readers with a new angle with which to understand psychopathy.

Sure, sometimes you have to read between the lines, because psychopaths like and self-aggrandize, so you need to be able to weed through the chaff, but that's also part of the experience of learning about psychopathy.

It makes a good companion with "Confessions of A Sociopath".

- A smart author, and a scientist with critical thinking skills

There were just a few instances in which Fallon seemed to "massage" the numbers, or to accept some woo-woo, both of which are highlighted above.

However, overall, this is a smart guy with high critical thinking skills. And he's mostly a neutral writer who writes based on facts.

Review

"The Psychopath Inside" is an entertaining and instructive read.

It deepened my understanding of psychopathy and dark-triad traits, and it's interesting to see how different authors differently characterize psychopathy.
Martha Stout and Robert Hare tend to portray psychopathy as "high danger, stay away" and "no contribution to society, only taking". And it's not like I disagree with it.
However, it's not the full story.

James Fallon adds another piece to the puzzle.
Somewhat, he makes psychopathy more about shades of grey. And a mixture of nature and nurturing, and not mostly nature as it was previously thought.

Bullet Summary

- Always think "individual-first" instead of generalizing to "all men" or "all women"
- Good men care about relationships and want to make you happy
- But most men are different than most women, and those differences can create some rifts
- You can learn to get along better if you learn more about typical gender differences, traits, and possible issues (plus, about your partner's specifics, of course)

Summary

About the Author: Shawn Smith is a clinical psychologist and author. He also published "The Tactical Guide to Women", this same book but for men and he writes on his blog at docsmith.co.

Intro: Individuals Differ

The author knows that too many people read about "general tendencies" and (mis)apply them to the whole population.

That's a mistake, because the individual always trumps his gender, group, nationality, or whatever background he might have.

Says Smith:

> The man you might be thinking of is a unique individual, not a statistical average.

Smith encourages the readers to always look at your specific partner first, and to listen to him more than you listen to anyone talking about general principles.
He is right.

Still, I also believe you can learn much from a book like this because chances are that your man will share at least a few commonalities with all the other men.

It's A Book About Good Men

Smith says he writes about "good men".

Who are good men?
Good men:

> Good men are dutiful men. They want to be effective in their lives, their careers, and their relationships.

"Good men need to be effective", says Smith and, later on, he adds that he is talking about "good men with strong male natures".

Good Men Want to Devote Themselves to a Woman

Smith says that men must have a purpose, or they lack a sense of direction in life.

And albeit most men are loath to admit it, I agree with him when he says that, for most men, dedication to a woman is the highest purpose for many men.
He says:

> We men can find our purpose in many places—work, play, camaraderie with other men—but nothing scratches that itch quite like devoting ourselves to a good woman.

Sure, not everyone is the same.
And some men might want more freedom than women, while some other men see sex as a conquest (see: types and psychology of players).

Historically, men might have had more of a penchant for multiple partners but, quoting research from David Buss, Smith says that men desire lifelong partners as much as women do.

In short: few men are players, and most of them want to devote themselves to a woman.

Men Can Work Overtime As A Sign of Love, Albeit It Might Not Seem So

Men feel the pressure to provide and get resources.

Says Smith:

> By devoting ourselves to that which provides resources, we're indirectly devoting ourselves to the ones we love because we're advancing their survival too. Whether or not it's perfectly logical, this seems to be inborn in men.

As Smith says, many women would prefer to have more time with their men rather than making some more money and never see them.
But men still feel the pressure to work hard.
That's why some men will work longer hours even if spending more time at home will make everyone happier -men included-.

Men Also Feel An Obligation to The Team

Albeit men want to support their women, they also feel an obligation towards the team.

Men indeed have more of an innate "team mentality" and, contrary to women, they cooperate even more when their group is in competition with other groups (Van Vugt, De Cremer, and Janssen 2007).
This means that, if the company needs him, your man feels compelled to be there and help.

Says Smith:

> We desire that intimacy, but we also want to be a cog in a larger system.

Men Can Find It Difficult to Drop Their Emotional Guard

Says Smith:

> One of the biggest challenges for men is allowing themselves to be emotionally exposed, which includes talking openly about needs and desires.

He says socialization is partly responsible for it, as boys who show vulnerability are teased, ridiculed, or punished. Those lessons aren't necessarily bad, but they might come with some downsides.
For example, men tend to over-hide what they consider "weak" emotions such as sadness and swap with anger, humor, or withdrawal (also see: stonewalling).

Some of the issues deriving from the lack of men's emotional awareness:

- Men can sense when they aren't pleasing women, but don't often know what to do about it
- The rule of stoicism prevents men from approaching women when they're worried, hurt, or frustrated
- Men sometimes lack the training or willingness to put words to thoughts or emotions
- Men tend to put some emotions behind secondary expressions like anger, humor, or withdrawal
  - Depressed men are more likely to hide depression with anger or alcohol, and the more they do it, the more fearful they are of negative emotions (Greene and Addis, 2012). That fear of emotions can trap men from finding more effective solutions
- Men can get lost when expectations shift in the relationship because they are not good or are afraid of communicating about the relationship (I remember my first relationship when I was so annoyed by my girlfriend's want to always talk about the relationship, and me avoiding all the time)

Some Men Can Feel Inadequate Because They Think Women Want It All

Writes Smith:

> We know that you women are watching us, and we want to impress you. Unfortunately, we think you're only interested in the perfect man.

When it comes to money and resources, most men tend to overestimate how important money is for women. That can lead them to over-work or to feel inadequate.

And when it comes to muscles, it's pretty much the same: even muscular men tend to think that women want more muscles.

On average, anything women can like, men tend to overestimate its importance.
Says Smith:

> It's that same old wiring: we aren't sure what you want from us, so we figure we can never have too much of a good thing.

Fix Relationships With His Male Nature In Mind

Most relationship counseling is woman-centered.

Says Smith:

> My profession doesn't help. Psychology is a word-based endeavor. We repair relationships mostly by talking about them, and we tend to impose that on men.

That doesn't mean men can't improve their communication skills: they can, and should.
But a better approach is to understand both sides, with both partners taking steps towards each other.

Men also often assume that relationship problems are their fault because they're taught that the female way of relating is the correct way. But, again, understanding both sides is a better approach.

In extreme cases, psychological counseling can hide hostility toward men.

We Form Pair-Bonding Because It's Good For Both... But We Pick Each Other Poorly

In spite of some areas of sexual conflict, the general rule is that relationships are good for both men and women.

But we pick each other poorly for a few reasons:

1. The qualities women are drawn to during courtship aren't necessarily the qualities they want in a long-term mate
2. The qualities that are attractive during courtship can become irritating when the flip sides of those qualities reveal themselves
3. The confidence trap: women want confident men, but men are only confident around women they don't care about

As an example for number 2, the intelligent woman he admired can annoy him when she intellectualizes and wins arguments.
And the industriousness she admired during dating can hurt her when he chooses office over family life.

Strong & Vulnerable Men Are The Sweet Spot (But Are Rare)

There are few men who can embrace and talk about emotions while also being strong.

That can create some issues in relationships.

Says Smith:

> Many men worry that the woman in their lives will find them unattractive if they show vulnerability, whereas she may feel that vulnerability builds intimacy.

And here is what a female responder's to Smith's survey say about men who are either strong or sensitive:

> "Men who are strong and ambitious are frequently arrogant and sexist. They certainly don't want to deal with the emotional terrain of a relationship. Nice guys complain that they never get ahead, but they rarely ask for what they want. Sensitivity and guts seem to be mutually exclusive."

How to Improve Your Relationship

Here are some common issues you can fix:

Ineffective Strategies Women Use

- Time-traveling: women are "pattern" oriented, that's why they bring up old events. But to men, that feels like an unfair attempt to win the argument and make them feel bad
- Not forgiving him: some women are fearful that if they stop remind him of his mistake or the pain he's caused, he will do it again. But if you don't let go, you will harm your relationship. Endless retaliation for past mistakes also makes you look bad in the eyes of most men (I can attest to this)
- Punishing him for talking: don't shame when he finally talks, but make him feel good for doing it
- Expecting him to read your mind: no, mind reading isn't the proof you're meant to be together. Nobody can read minds.

- Avoiding solutions: your man will propose some solutions when you just want to be heard. Don't be angry. Sometimes, take one of those solutions

How to avoid relationship quicksand

Relationship quicksand for Smith are what "vicious circles" are for John Gottman.
Here are the steps to overcome them:

- Be someone your partner wants to be around: difficult times are precisely when it's most important to be the person our partners fell in love with
  - Don't forget basic respect: when angry and while arguing we might say things that come back to hurt us, and that will harm our relationship for a long time. Also read: meanness in relationships
- Respond to primary emotional reactions
- Create a pattern escape hatch
- Accept peace offerings: any acts of caring during turbulent periods are great opportunities to seize on and rebuild goodwill
- Don't assume he understands: some subtler signals you think are clear might not be clear to him. In doubt, be clear
- Rebuild intimacy
- Seek couples therapy: men can be intimidated by couples' therapy. Makes it easy on them explaining that he's not going to be framed as the bad guy

Concrete steps you can take

- Let him please you: don't forget that men love to please women. They feel ineffective if they don't. if they see no way of pleasing you, they give up
- Give brownie points: yes, men crave your appreciation
- Be specific when you express your needs: give him exact pointers on what he can do to help you and the relationship
- Weigh his actions as much as his words:
- Understand his silence: they are not a way to punish you, it's the man's way of stopping a fight
- Be intimate: Smith stops short of advising women to have more sex. He just says that it's important for men to have sex, and that it's also helpful to the relationship
- Acceptance: if you're pushing him to change and he doesn't change, try to tell him instead that you accept him as he is, that you will do your best to be a good wife, and that you hope you will do the same
- Go at the roots of the problem: watch out for relationship dances, for example, the "demand/withdrawal". It's all too easy to focus on the immediate pain and miss the root cause

Women Hold a Lot of Power Over Good Men

This is not something Smith says, but it's something you can glean both from what he says, and what the men wrote in his survey.

How do women hold power?
Because good men want to provide and protect, and want to make the woman in their life happy. So women end up being an important point of reference for men's need to be effective.
If the woman is not happy, or criticizes him, the man feels like he is failing in an important realm of life.

One of them wrote:

> "When a woman is proud of you for doing something well, it's a wonderful feeling. I don't mind working twelve hours a day, but like a good dog, I appreciate a scratch and a 'good boy' at the end. … It sometimes annoys me how much I still want my wife's approval, even though I'm successful at work and in other areas.

That's pure judge power right there (see: "soft power").
And also see:

- How women control relationships

More Wisdom

- Men respond to social and physical dominance in a similar fashion: That gives us the ability to establish dominance without violence, since losing an argument affects our perception of dominance the same as losing a fight (Watkins, Jones, 2012)
- Social status makes men more cooperative: the existence of recognized social status and hierarchies decreases conflicts and fights, and makes men more cooperative (ie.: status is a good thing)
- Men fish for compliments: for men, their women's approval is so important that they sometimes fish for compliments. Women can either fail to realize this, or find it unnecessarily annoying
- Make sure he has a way to please you: if you want him to spend more time with the family but you often criticize him when he's around, he feels he can't win. Men who feel they can't do anything to please their partners stop trying
- Women underestimate the power they have on their men: female happiness is very important to men. When she is upset, men are also upset
- Men think about sex more often than women, but not by a large margin: A person's openness to sex more accurately predicts the frequency of their sexual thoughts than does their gender (Fisher, Moore, and Pittenger 2012)
- Men better in larger groups, women better in smaller groups: both genders are social, but in different ways. Women excel in small groups with intimate relationships, men larger groups with looser relationships. Men also prefer larger groups and are better at solving problems within larger groups, while women do better in pairs (Benenson and Heath 2006)
- Some men hide their feelings even during sex: the emotional can make the woman feel used, while instead, he is just being overly protective of himself and over-abiding the stoic rule of "never showing emotions"
- Men and women care equally about relationships, but in different ways: it's not true that women care about relationships (Simon and Barrett 2010), but women are more concerned about whether it feels secure, while men zero in more on problems
- Men seek to impress women: that goes all around, even during intimacy and sex. Smith says that men's brain is less about sex, and more about a big marketing device to win women's affection and admiration
- High-value men treat their women better: they use less violent mate-guarding techniques and are more likely to provide value-adding benefits to keep her happy and in the relationship (Starratt and Shackelford 2012)
- Men are more interested in numbers: women are equally good with numbers, but they are just less interested (Ceci and Williams 2010)
- Men are quicker to forgive
- Men experience emotions as intensely as women, but actively work to suppress them: it's a good skill to have for certain activities, but it makes men less educated about their own emotions

CONS

- One case of correlation / causation

Smith says that men who join gangs have more sexual partners because of status (that they apparently gain by joining the gang).
But this is a chicken or the egg kind of situation, and we don't know if those men would have had more partners even if they had not joined gangs.

- Women complain that men who earned their love become risk-averse?

This one left me baffled.
Says Smith:

> Many women complain that once men have earned their love, they become risk averse.

Do women really complain about that?
I think some men grow complacent, stop trying hard, and become more "housey", staying more at home.
But it comes somewhat as a surprise that women would complain about men becoming risk-averse.

PROS

- Science-based

Lots of good research to back the author's claim

- Great author, high in knowledge, experience, and critical thinking

Shawn Smith is my type of author: intelligent, well-read, has plenty of experience, does not over-generalize, and adds research and evidence.

When you have those traits, you are bound to create great work, which Smith does.

- Practical and effective

Many relationships would improve if more women (and men) read books like this one.

Quotes

On men seeking female affection:

> Maybe you've seen one of those cartoon diagrams of a man's brain in which most of the brain areas are labeled "sex." Those cartoons might be more accurate if they depicted a man's brain as one giant marketing firm designed to earn the affection and admiration of women.

On women's changing preferences during their cycles (and on not overstating the differences):

> I don't want to overstate the matter. It's not as if women prefer Rocky Balboa on Tuesday and Mr. Mom on Friday. The effects are subtle, which is why men and women probably don't notice them on a day-to-day basis. Plus, it's possible that some people are essentially unaffected by these ancient drives.

Women want both bad boy and altar boy, and many men are actually both:

> Do women want the bad boy, or the altar boy?
> It seems (…) both, but not necessarily at the same time.

> (…) It seems that we men are wired to give you both. (…) Bad boy when we're trying to win you over, and the altar boy after we win your love. Another way to put it: we show off our more masculine, Fonzie-like traits when we're trying to earn your love, but we switch to reliable Richie Cunningham mode once we have a relationship (and possibly offspring) to protect.

On the importance that men keep their word:

> Some of the happiest, most relaxed women are the ones who know from experience that their partner is a man who keeps his word, even on the little things.

On gender differences:

> There really are no male or female traits; there are simply traits that one gender, on average, possesses in greater quantity or uses differently.

Review

"The Women's Guide to How Men Think" is a wonderful book.

It helps women to better understand men, get along with men, and develop better relationships with men.

The Judge Role™: Emotional Power in Interpersonal Dynamics

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Most people think of power as authority or dominance. But some of the most influential people in your life—parents, partners, bosses—use no force at all.

They have emotional* leverage.

This is what we call the "judge role™": the person who decides whether you're valuable, worthy, good enough… Or not.

This article analyzes how these emotional power dynamics play out in life to influence others in relationships, dating, and the workplace.

Note: a novel concept from many existing insights
The Judge Role™ is a framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano for The Power Moves, building on insights from transactional analysis (Harris, 1967), emotional and interpersonal power dynamics, prestige-based social status (Henrich & Gil-White), frame control, and manipulation dynamics.

Intro

The judge role™ is defined as:

> The individual who assesses other people's worthiness, dispenses emotional rewards and punishments, and influence over others through emotional control

At the foundational level, everyone can have some 'judge power' over others because, as Blau pointed out in his seminal Exchange and Power in Social Life, social approval is a basic reward people seek in their associations with others.

However, the 'judge leverage' that people carry over others varies widely from individual to individual.

Judges operate mostly at an emotional and 'soft power' level. However, judges' powers can also overlap and increase when combined with different expressions of social power and dominance.

Inescapable Dynamics in All Socialization

For a good part, interpersonal power dynamics come down to who is judging who.

And the individual with more power is the individual whose judgment most affects the other.
Understanding these dynamics is crucial for gaining interpersonal influence, and protecting your own power and independence.

Judging Worth

The most basic judgment comes down to being good or not good enough.
It's the most basic sense of people's worth, earning one's place on this earth, or not.

Most other judgments simply assess someone's worth against different sets of criteria or group belonging, for example:

- Good enough as a human being, life competent, socially competent, prosocial enough, etc.
- Good enough as a man: providing, attracting a mate, being masculine enough. Very powerful for men since men must 'earn' their manhood (Bosson and Vandello, 2011)
- Good enough for a specific group

Loser = not effective in life = “not good enough”

Judgments of ‘basic requirements’ are hot buttons because they leverage internalized criteria of minimum standards to meet.

Who Are Judges (& Examples)

Anybody can be a judge, but some roles ‘facilitate’ the acquisition of judge power, including:

1. Mothers / Fathers

Evolutionary psychology logic suggests that to boost their own odds of survival, children are predisposed to seek a parent’s approval.

That makes children highly sensitive to what their parents think and feel about them, giving parents a large emotional influence over children.

Great parents provide a baseline of love and acceptance for their children.
Poor parents may instead use their emotional leverage for power, control, and achieving their goals without regard for the children’s well-being.

2. Mother / Father Figures

Mother and father figures may have the same influence as biological parents, a dynamic sometimes facilitated by a biological parent’s absence or unfitness for the role.

Mentors or coaches are both well-placed to become father figures.
The more the mentor is respect-worthy and the more the mentee looks up to him, the more the mentor acquires judge powers.

Case Study: The Tyson-D’Amato Dynamic

This Mike Tyson interview displays the emotional judge-role dynamic with a father figure:

> Tyson: My joy was when I make Cuss D’amato happy

In another documentary, Tyson goes even deeper, saying "I was madly in love with Cuss D'amato, I became totally in love with him, I became his slave".

3. Dating & Relationship Partners

Researchers documented judge-related emotional power dynamics while studying power distribution in relationships.

Wagner and colleagues asked couples to imagine how they would feel if they bought an expensive item, and their partner disapproved.
The discrepancy between how the person felt when the spouse disapproved versus approved represented "dependence on the other's agreement", which would reflect low power.

Albeit they never referred to emotional power dynamics, it reflects the same dynamics we describe here.

In principle, the needier, more attached, and more admiring a partner is, the more he will be dependent on the partner's approval.
Mate value and various dating strategies or 'games' people play also heavily affect these dynamics.

Falling in love is also a magnifier of judge influence.
The person in love can anguish at the slightest sign of disapproval, ignorance, or rejection.

4. Older Brothers / Sisters

Case Study: Jordan Brothers Dynamics

See Michael Jordan:

> Brother: Get back in the house with your mom, boy, you're never going to be anything
> Michael: (commenting on video) when you go through it, it's traumatic. Because I want that approval

Sensitivity to other people's approval and recognition may have been an important driver for Jordan's dedication and success.

5. Coaches, Bosses

Anyone who has power to direct and assess someone's work is in a good position to also wield judge powers.

The more central work is to someone's life and identity, the more likely it is that coaches and bosses will acquire judge power.
Since few people separate work results from their ego, it's relatively common for bosses to acquire a large influence on people's mental health and self-esteem.

6. Therapists

Therapists can wield large emotional influence over their clients. Transference is a well-known concept in psychology and refers to a client's displacement of feelings, fantasies, and desires from past relationships onto the therapist (Marrazzi et al., 2025).
It's also not uncommon for people in therapy to fall in love with their therapists (Rabasco et al., 2023).

7. High Power Men

In general, anyone in a position of power is more likely to also acquire judge power because 'hard power' tends to spill over into 'soft power' (and vice versa).

The simple act of judging signals higher power because lower-status people aren't as free to judge those above them (ie.: bosses judge employees, but rarely the other way around).

An extreme example is the "Stockholm Syndrome", in which hostages develop a psychological bond with their captors. It's generally interpreted as a survival coping mechanism where appeasing the captors may boost survival odds, paralleling children and parents' dynamics.

7.2. Honorable Men

Honorable men tend to influence because others hold them in high regard. This is the prestige approach to social status and influence.

8. Public Opinion

The judge is a role, and applies to collectives or institutions as much as it does to people.
Including the nameless and faceless collective of people that in our minds represent social and public opinion.

9. Yourself: Your Own Judge

We all have our own judges within ourselves.

A strong negative judge can be a powerful motivator, but it must be used strategically. Wallowing in harsh self-talk can undermine self-esteem and mental health.
People who judge themselves well instead tend to have high self-esteem and a sense of well-being, but it may cost them extra motivation.
The details are off-topic for this post, but we dig deeper in Confidence University.

Judge Frames

> Judge frames are verbal and nonverbal signals that structure the interaction as one between a judge and the judged.

Judge frames give power to the judge if they go unchallenged, and disempower the judged. At the very least, they tend to frame the interaction as the judge being higher status or higher authority. And, potentially, can also make the judged seek to prove himself and gain the judge's approval.

Some formats of judge frames include:

- Direct verbal judge frames.
  For example:
  - "great job" / "poor job"
  - "You are smart" / "You're not very smart"
  - "I'm proud of you" / "I'm disappointed"
  - "You'll be a great success" / "You'll never amount to anything"
- Nonverbal judge frames with body language such as a negative eye roll or looking away, and positive smiles and giving full attention
- Behavioral signals of approval and disapproval. Happy & facing towards = approval; disappointment & ignoring = disapproval
  - ⍰ Happy wife, happy life: Wife's happy, husband feels he's doing a good job. Wife is unhappy, husband feels he's failing

Impostor Judges & First Mover Advantages

While judge powers and judging competence tend to go together, one may acquire judge power by simply starting to judge first, independently of competence.

It's not uncommon for people to also use judge frames for undue influence and manipulating emotions and behavior.
For example, a woman may make his husband feel unworthy compared to her friends' husbands for not making as much money. That's a potentially game-playing approach to pressure him into spending more on her.

Also read:

- Nasty games women play to become the relationship prize

Careful when people start judging you
Whether it's approval or disapproval. The natural tendency is to seek more praise or change their mind. But doing so gives away power to the judges. Often, it's better to reject the judgment—mentally first, and sometimes socially as well.

How to Spot Judges

Keywords like "disappointed" or easy-to-spot judgmental attitudes and nonverbals are strong signals.
But your own internal thermostat is even more telling if you:

- Fear someone's judgment
- Care a lot about what someone thinks
- You feel great or bad depending on someone's acceptance

Exaggerated harshness or disgusted facial expression can signal someone's goal to unsettle you and control you emotionally

Value-giving vs. Value-taking Judges

Like any other form of power, emotional leverage can be used for value-adding, or value-taking purposes.

For example, Cuss D'Amato's strong influence on Tyson put him on the path of hard work, world championships, and riches.

If you're an ambitious man, it's possible that you enjoy or will enjoy judge powers over someone.
Being an honorable man also means being careful in using that power positively.

Value-Taking Judges

Value-taking judges -"bad judges", for brevity-, use their power in ways that harm others.

Examples of bad judges include:

1. Abusive Judges

> Abusive judges use their power to control, manipulate, and maintain a target in win-lose, value-taking relationships

In this example, the athlete says of his harsh coach:

> Mary Cain: In my own, sad, never-fully healed heart, I wanted Alberto to still take me back. Because when we let people emotionally break us, we crave more than anything their very approval.

Mary Cain was impressively self-aware, and it's likely the trainer withheld approval while relying mostly on criticism.

At the extreme, the judge role becomes a tool for significant behavioral and mind control, sometimes in conjunction with 'traumatic bonding'.

Toxic judges tend to be:

1. Impossible to please
2. Hypercritical, without guidance for improvement

The facial expression that says "no matter what you do, it's never enough"

2. Manipulative Judges

Individual and social judgment can be potent weapons to alter someone's behavior or limit someone's freedom.

Since much of our evolution revolves around mating, it's not surprising that much judgment revolves around sexual mores.
For example:

- She's a slut for doing OF <— Men try to shame women away from sex work because it serves their favorite strategy of male provisioning and pair-bonding
- Real men commit<— Women try to shame high-value men into a provide and commit strategy to increase their negotiation leverage

These are all selfish strategies of sexual manipulation, hiding behind the guise of a (fake) indignant judge.
Only people with an 'influence and control motive' spend much effort publicly judging and shaming.

Virtue-Signaling Judges

Virtue signaling can be a fair form of value-signaling.
But often, virtue-signaling judgment seeks to look better by framing someone else worse.
Also read:

- Virtue signaling is a sexual strategy

3. Dark Psychologist Seducers

Robert Greene in "The Art of Seduction" advises mimicking the listening posture of a therapist, which is a judge-approach to gaining leverage over a target.

Being distant and stand-offish can also function as a dark-psychology technique.
The seducer sub-commutates that the target is "not good enough for his full attention", which can lead the target to seek his approval.
Some women enter relationships with these types of men and bend over backwards to please their impossible partners (Norwood, 1985).

Also see:

- Mother figure seduction

In more benign ways, the concept of "validation" from pick-up literature is also based on the judge role.
"Not being validated by the woman" means to reject her judge role. Validating women instead signals that the man is the judge.

Unfortunately, outside of legitimate therapeutic contexts, providing emotional support can also be a tactic of some pedophiles and groomers, targeting kids who struggle with social and self-acceptance.

How to Combat Bad Judges

Generally speaking, unless a judge figure is obviously helping, ambitious and empowered men are better off rejecting judges.

Here is how:

1. Be aware of judge frames

Awareness is 50% of winning the war.

2. For pathological approval-seeking, consider therapy

If you still overly crave people or a specific person's approval, therapy may help.
Says Braiker:

> When you hear the commanding should in your self-talk, you are hearing the voice of your judging conscience. (…)
> That voice is the amalgamation of your parents, teachers, older siblings, coaches, or other authority figures that (…) laid down rules that stayed with you throughout your life.

One of her clients said:

> "(…) I'm literally still trying to get my father's approval. It's just absurd. He's 83 years old and as critical and withholding as ever. I keep hoping he'll let me know that he really loves me before he dies.

Here are some questions for a quick self-assessment:

- Authority figure issues: Do you have constant issues with authority figures? Do they have outsize influence on your emotional inner life? If so, you may be sensitive to authority figures
- Authorities seen as parent figures: Do you see bosses as mother or father figures?
- Parent issue and/or poor parenting: Did you have emotionally distant, unusually demanding, or manipulative parents who loved you conditionally and used you for their own gratification?

3. Fight it smartly: Frame Control

While bursts of anger can display power and be effective, often getting angry confirms the judge's power.

Some better techniques include:

- Ignore
- Ignore verbally and defend *nonverbally (eye-roll, head shaking, throwing under the bus, etc.)
- Judge right back, fighting for the judge frame
- Undermine their judge authority (ie.: "you're not in a position to judge")
- Own the accusation with pride (ie.: "yeah, I'm a bad man, and I'm cool with it", a high-risk, high-reward strategy)
- Go meta: explain what they're doing, including their second motives

See one example here:

- Fighting judge frame of 'what it means to be a man'

4. Use it as 'dark fuel' for motivation

Many high achievers climbed hierarchies fighting against judges.

Michael Jordan leveraged many judges across his career:

> Jordan: He started the whole process (…) because when he made the team and I didn't, I wanted to prove (…) you made a mistake dude.

Also see:

- Using pain as motivation

However, even if negative judges are pushing you forward, you're still reacting to them.
So this is the ultimate root-cause solution:

5. Increase self-sufficiency: be your own judge

While it's good to care about what others think, balance is important, and it's much more empowering to:

1. Being able to ignore others at will
2. Develop antifragile identities that remove many 'hooks' judges may use
3. Prioritize your own judging criteria

Says clinical psychologist Harriet Braiker speaking about 'manipulation resistance':

> The most important, effective, and lasting source of approval is the acceptance you give to yourself. Develop a clear sense of your own judgments and values and govern yourself accordingly.

For a grassroots-level intervention, see:

> Empowered Individualism: Why the Individual Must Come First

Technical Clarifications (Optional Reading)

This is a later entry to the original article.

The concept of judges has helped many, but like many new concepts, it may require some extra details to be well-understood.
Let's clarify.

Judge VS Judging

Judging, "the judge", and having judge power overlap, but they're all different.

1. Judging = "I think Mark is not a high-value guy" (but if Mark is not present, no judge dynamics are set in motion)
2. Judge role = "Mark, I expected better from you, and I must say, I'm disappointed" (ie.: I'm judging you as not being good enough for me/my standards)
3. Judge effects = (Mark craves the judge's approval, feels bad, and changes behavior)

For the judge to have effect, the receiver must grant that power. Without the receiver craving emotional reward and hurting for negative judgment, there is no judge influence.

Compliments, Fair Assessments, & Power Protection

- A compliment is a judgment, but more often value-giving, rather than a power move

In this example, in a sentence like "Thank you for your great website, Lucio!", most people want to give, rather than frame you as below them.

- Re-empowering is not a judge power move

If a manager says 'Please review the email I sent you and amend accordingly. Otherwise, great job', the aim is to ensure the work is properly framed as good work, only in need of a correct.

- A judge power move may not set the full judge-dynamics in motion

Trump saying "great job" is also a great example of power move, but little judge dynamics:

> Trump: (to Comey and with cameras all over) Good job

Trump's main goal in this interaction is to frame himself as the big boss, and Comey working for him. Plus, one may argue, to send a message of power and control: Trump must be happy with Comey's work (or he could get fired, as it happened).

But since Comey shook his head and he never looked up to Trump, the influence was not judge-based, but coercion-based.

- Figures of speech are often just figures of speech

Stock sentences such as "keep up the great work" are rarely delivered with the intent to set up a judge dynamic.

For one more example, see:

- "That's a good job"
- "Keep up the great work" – plus my reply below

Similar to Judges

Similar, overlapping, or applied judges we discussed on TPM include:

- Women relationship control: often based on holding the judge role
- Shit tests: shit tests are judge tools. It's the judge who sizes up others. A focus on passing those tests only confirms that frame
- Shame attacks, based on self-appointed judge-powers (ie.: you're not prosocial enough/good enough as a human being)

Bullet Summary

- Women who love too much are addicted to toxic relationships
- Women who love too much confuse pain and anxiety for love and sexual chemistry
- Women who love too much can recover. But they first need to admit they have issues to tackle

Summary

About the Author: Robin Norwood is a licensed marriage and family therapist. She worked in the field of addiction, both substance and relationship addiction, for fifteen years.

What "Loving Too Much" Means: A Definition

In chapter 2 I found this description which I thought was the best definition of "loving too much":

> It means obsessing about a man and calling that obsession love, allowing it to control your emotions and much of your behavior, realizing that it negatively influences your health and wellbeing, and yet finding yourself unable to let go. It means measuring the degree of your love by the > depth of your torment.

It does NOT mean, instead, loving too many men, or falling in love too often, or having too great a depth of genuine love for another.

Such as, it's totally fine to love deeply and greatly. If you love deeply and the relationship is sound and healthy, then you have a great relationship. It's only when love becomes pain within a dysfunctional relationship that you are loving too much.

You're Loving Too Much When...

You are loving too much when:

- When being in love means being in pain we are loving too much
- When most of our conversations with friends are about him, his problems, his thoughts, his feelings—and nearly all our sentences begin with “he . . .”, we are loving too much

- When we excuse his moodiness, bad temper, indifference, or put-downs as problems due to an unhappy childhood and we try to become his therapist, we are loving too much
- When we read a self-help book and underline all the passages we think would help him, we are loving too much
- When we don’t like many of his basic characteristics, values, and behaviors, but we put up with them thinking that if we are only attractive and loving enough he’ll want to change for us, we are loving too much
- When our relationship jeopardizes our emotional well-being and perhaps even our physical health and safety, we are definitely loving too much

Ways in which women “help” their men

Women who love too much helps their men in ways that can severely impair their emotional and financial well-being.

Some examples include:

- buying him clothes to improve his self-image
- finding a therapist for him and begging him to go
- financing expensive hobbies to help him use his time better
- going through disruptive geographic relocations because “he’s not happy here”
- giving him half or all of our property and possessions so he won’t feel inferior to us
- providing him with a place to live so that he can feel secure
- finding him a job
- allowing him to abuse us emotionally because “he was never allowed to express his feelings before”

For more on abuse, please check out:

- Profiles of abusers
- The psychopaths’ strategies to make you fall in love: detailing tactics and techniques of the type of men you must avoid the most

Types of men she finds attractive

- Unstable man: We find the unstable man exciting
- Unreliable man: challenging
- Unpredictable man: romantic
- Immature man: charming
- Moody man: mysterious
- Angry man: needs our understanding
- Unhappy man: needs our comforting
- Inadequate man: needs our encouragement
- Cold / distant man: needs our warmth

Says the author:

> We take his emotional unavailability, his anger or depression or cruelty or indifference or violence or dishonesty or addiction, for signs that he has not been loved enough. We are determined to save him through > the power of our love

And, finally, the man you wouldn't expect:

- The loser: a man who can't attract anyone else assures women that he wouldn't be able to meet others, including other women. Many women who love too much fear abandonment. Better to be with someone who didn't quite meet her needs but whom she wouldn't lose than with someone more loving and more lovable, who might leave her for someone else

Says one woman:

> Also, I had at least twenty IQ points over him. And I needed that edge. It took all that and more to make me even begin to believe I was his equal, and that he wouldn't leave me for someone better.

And what about "good men"?
That's not interesting because we can't be helpful to him, and he doesn't make us suffer enough.
The good man is also scary, because he doesn't need us, and he might leave us.

Traits of Women Who Love Too Much

1. Come from a dysfunctional home in which your emotional needs were not met. Children are to some extent damaged in their ability to feel and relate.
   1. Denied feelings: Emotional needs also include having your perceptions and feelings ignored or denied rather than accepted and validated (example: "why are you mad at daddy", mother replies angry "I'm not mad". The child feels fear, confusion, anger, and guilt. The child learns not to trust his own perceptions)
2. Received little real nurturing, so you try to fill this unmet need vicariously by becoming a caregiver, especially to men who appear in some way needy.
3. Unable to change your parent(s) into the warm, loving caretaker(s) you longed for, you respond deeply to the familiar type of emotionally unavailable man whom you can again try to change through your love
4. Terrified of abandonment, you will do anything to keep a relationship from dissolving.
5. Almost nothing is too much trouble, takes too much time, or is too expensive if it will "help" the man you are involved with
6. Accustomed to lack of love in personal relationships, you are willing to wait, hope, and try harder to please
7. Take far more than 50 percent of the responsibility, guilt, and blame in any relationship
8. Critically low self-esteem, and deep inside you do not believe you deserve to be happy. Rather, you believe you must earn the right to enjoy life (also see: consequences of low self-esteem)
9. Desperate need to control your men and relationships, having experienced little security in childhood. You mask your efforts to control people and situations as "being helpful."
10. Focus on "how it could be" instead of "how it is", you are much more in touch with your dream of how it could be than with the reality of your situation.
11. Addicted to men and to emotional pain
12. Potentially, a predisposition to addiction: you might be emotionally and biochemically predisposed to becoming addicted to drugs, alcohol, and/or certain foods, particularly sugary ones
13. Little self-care: By being drawn to people with problems that need fixing, or by being enmeshed in situations that are chaotic, uncertain, and emotionally painful, you avoid focusing on your responsibility to yourself
14. Possible tendency towards depression: you may have a tendency toward episodes of depression, which you try to forestall through the excitement provided by an unstable relationship

15. Find reliable men boring: you are not attracted to men who are kind, stable, reliable, and interested in you. You find such "nice" men boring (see: the friend role)

Childhood trauma is a centerpiece of Norwood's work, and she says:

> The more difficult it is to end a relationship that is bad for you, the more elements of the childhood struggle it contains.

She says that women who love too much are unconsciously seeking to rectify all wrongs of their childhood by persevering in toxic relationships.

How Women Who Love Too Much Related to Sex

Women who love too much have a very peculiar relationship with sex.

They tend to confuse fear and anxiety for both love and sexual attraction. And sex is also one of the main ways women try to "love him toward health".

- She seeks a man who needs her: She asks the question "How much does he love (or need) me?" and not "How much do I care for him?"
- Sex as a way to get him hooked: Most of her sexual interactions with him are motivated by "How can I get him to love (or need) me more?"
- Gives sex freely to be loved: Her drive to give herself sexually to others whom she perceives as needy may result in behavior that she herself labels promiscuous, but her behavior is primarily for another's gratification, rather than for her own.
- Sex as manipulation: is one of the tools she uses for manipulating or changing her partner
- Power struggles are exciting to her: she often finds the power struggles of mutual manipulation very exciting. She behaves seductively to get her own way and feels great when it works and bad when it doesn't. Failing to get what she wants usually causes her to try even harder
- Confuses anxiety and fear for love: She confuses anxiety, fear, and pain with love and sexual excitement
- Confuses anxiety with love: She calls the sensation of having a knot in her stomach "love."
- She derives her pleasure from him, not from herself: She takes her excitement from his excitement. She doesn't know how to feel good for herself; in fact, she is threatened by her own feelings.
- Sexual attraction only exists through anxiety: Unless the challenge of an unfulfilling relationship is there, she becomes restless. She is not sexually attracted to a man with whom she is not struggling. Instead, she labels him "boring."
- She picks inexperienced men to be in control: she often teams up with a man who is less experienced sexually, in order that she feel in control.
- She yearns for physical closeness, but can't get emotionally close: because she fears being enveloped by another and/or being overwhelmed by her own needs for nurturing, she is only comfortable with the emotional distance created and maintained by stress in the relationship. She becomes fearful when a man is willing to be there for her emotionally as well as sexually. She either runs away or drives him away

My Note: this is a fearful attachment style
This was another passage where attachment styles would have added further depth to this book. The author is partially describing here a fearful / anxious attachment style.
Also read:

- The anxious – avoidant trap: this article will explain the dynamics of the toxic relationship between women who love too much and unavailable men

- Dating for fearful/anxious attachment styles: advice on how to date that works well for women who love too much

Sex As Release of Tension

Sex can be gratifying in toxic relationships for a number of reasons:

1. Women see it as a way of bonding again and fixing the relationship. Thus, the degree of sexual release may be highest when the discomfort with her partner is the highest
2. Sex is a release of tension, hence, the higher the tension the higher the release

The good sex could then be used as a way of validating the relationship and sticking together in spite of the toxicity. She can point at sex and think "look how great we fit and make each other feel, we belong together in spite of all the pain".

Says Robin:

> The sex act, when it is highly gratifying physically, has the power to create deeply felt bonds between two people.
> For women who love too much, especially, the intensity of our struggle with a man may contribute to the intensity of our sexual experience with him and thus our bond to him.

The converse is also true. Relationships free of pain and anxiety also seem less exciting for women who love too much.

Says the author:

> Because we are not in an almost constant state of excitement over him, and because sex isn't used to prove something, we may find an easier, more relaxed relationship to be somewhat tame. Compared to the tempestuous styles of relating that we've known, this tamer kind of experience only seems to verify for us that tension, struggle, heartache, and drama truly do equal "real love."

In part, that's because people don't differentiate today between love and sexual attraction.
Plus, women who love too much also aren't able to see the link between pain and sexual satisfaction.

The Toxic Bond Can Be More Addictive

Sex is part of an overall trend by which the toxic relationship can be more addictive than a healthy one.

Says the author:

> It would be safe to say that the attraction between two people who have the capability of creating a rewarding relationship based on the exchange of healthy responses, while perhaps strong and exciting, is never as compelling as the attraction between a woman who loves too much and the man with whom she can "dance."

Also read:

- Relationship dances: the chaser and runner (or pursuer and distancer) is a common dance that women who love too much engage in

Loving Too Much Is An Addiction Based on Fear

Women who love too much are addicted to men -certain types of men- and to toxic relationships.

The author says that the relationship is not based on love, but on fear.
The fears include:

- fear of being alone
- fear of being unlovable and unworthy
- fear of being ignored, abandoned or destroyed

Says Norwood:

> We give our love in the desperate hope that the man with whom we're obsessed will take care of our fears. Instead, the fears—and our obsession—deepen until giving love in order to get it back becomes a driving force in our lives.
> And because our strategy doesn't work we try, we love even harder.

Men Get Addicted Too, But Sometimes to Different Things Than Relationships

Says Norwood:

> Most men who have been damaged in childhood do not develop an addiction to relationships.
> Due to an interplay of cultural and biological factors, they usually try to protect themselves and avoid their pain through pursuits that are more external than internal, more impersonal than personal. Their tendency is to become obsessed with work, sports, or hobbies.

My Note: Attachment theory explains men's reactions
This is where the attachment theory would have made this book more complete.
Many men with attachment issues become avoidants and/or emotionally unavailable.

Childhood Traumas That Lead to Loving Too Much

Obvious problems:

- Incest
- Addiction in the family
- Violence at home

Subtler problems:

- Mysoginist father: maybe your father, while providing a financially secure home, disliked and distrusted women
- Unloving father: and his inability to love you kept you from loving yourself
- Jealous mother: your mother's attitude toward you may have been jealous and competitive in private even though she showed you off and bragged about you in public, so that you ended up needing to do well to gain her approval and yet fearing the hostility your success generated in her

Norwood said that there are a thousand ways family dynamics can be toxic and lead to the dysfunctional patterns of loving too much.
However, all toxic families have one thing in common, she says:

> What all unhealthy families have in common is their inability to discuss root problems. There may be other > problems that are discussed, often ad nauseum, but these often cover up the underlying secrets that make the family dysfunctional. It is the degree of secrecy—the inability to talk about the problems— rather than their severity, that defines both how dysfunctional a family becomes and how severely its members are damaged.

In dysfunctional families, people cover a certain fixed role that are set in place to hold up a certain (false) narrative, or to avoid discussing and addressing tabu topics that the family carefully avoids (see "Transaction Analysis").

Says Norwood:

> Because our family denies our reality, we begin to deny it, too. And this severely impairs the development of our basic tools for living life and for relating to people and situations. It is this basic impairment that operates in women who love too much. We become unable to discern when someone or something is not good for us.

Dependency to Relationships As a Drug

Norwood repeatedly draws parallels between addiction to (toxic) men and relationships and the addiction to drugs.

She says the two are similar even in their stages.
These are the stages seen through one of her clinical examples, a woman called "Jill":

1. Initial high: early in each of her relationships there was an initial "high," a feeling of euphoria and excitement while she believed that finally her deepest needs for love, attention, and emotional security might be met.
2. Use the "drug" more and more: the woman seeks the drug more and more frequently
3. Addiction grows: Jill became more and more dependent on the man and the relationship in order to feel good
4. More drug is needed: Then, like an addict who must use a drug more as it produces less effect, she was driven to pursue the relationship harder as it gave her less satisfaction and fulfillment. Trying to sustain what had once felt so wonderful, so promising, Jill slavishly dogged her man, needing more contact, more reassurance, more love as she received less and less
5. The worse it gets, the harder it is to let go: the worse the situation became, the harder it was to let go because of the depth of her need. She could not quit
6. Withdrawal symptoms: Some women may unconsciously seek powerful the stimulation of a difficult and dramatic relationship in order to stir their glands to release adrenaline. But when the strong stimulant of involvement in an unhealthy relationship is removed, either because the relationship ends or because the man begins to recover from his problems and to relate to her in a healthier way, a woman of this type will usually sink into depression

We Take Full Blame to Dupe Ourselves That We Have Control

Extreme ownership can be a good thing.

And it can be an empowering mindset, too (follow the link for the forum discussion).

However, some people take extreme ownership as a defensive mechanism to protect their emotional well-being and to cling to tiny shivers of hope.
Says Norwood:

> When an emotionally painful event occurs, and we tell ourselves it is our fault, we are actually saying that we have control of it: if we change, the pain will stop.
> This dynamic is behind much of the self-blame in women who love too much.
> By blaming ourselves, we hold on to the hope that we will be able to figure out what we are doing wrong and correct it, thereby controlling the situation and stopping the pain.

Women Who Love Too Much Are Attracted to Needy & Distant Men...

Says one of the women that the author introduces as examples:

> I remember now how I kept trying to be in his direct line of vision and how he kept sort of puffing away at this pipe, looking off to the side or up at the ceiling, or fiddling with keeping the pipe lit. I thought he was so very mature, with his furrowed brow and faraway look. I was drawn like a magnet.

The woman had a distant father and she always tried to get his attention to make him stay at home.
Now she was doing the same with this unavailable man.

... And Men Who Are Loved Too Much Are Attracted to Strong and Caring Women

But who are the men?

Who are the men who get mired in toxic relationships?

Says Norwood:

> Though the details differ from story to story, always present is the appeal of the strong woman who somehow promises to make up for what each man is lacking in himself or his life.

Says the author:

> "Do you need me?" the woman who loves too much secretly asks.
> "Will you take care of me and solve my problems?" is the silent query behind the spoken words of the man who would choose her to be his partner.

This made me think that the author is wrong when she says that men don't "love too much".
Some of these men are actually seeking the relationship that they lacked with a distant mother.

Also interesting are the stories of men who fall for the women, including:

- Men feel great for the attention women who love too much shower them with
- Men feel great for women who fix their mistakes
- Addicts fall for women who love too much because they help them stay addicts

However, when the women's strength help fix the man's weakness, the man sometimes can come to resent the woman.
Says Norwood:

> When someone helps us, we often resent that person's implied power and superiority.
> Moreover, a man often needs to feel stronger than his female partner in order to feel sexually attracted to her.
> In this case, the help Rita gave Bart by getting him into a hospital only made it clear how very sick he was, and her deeply caring gesture thus undermined, at least for a while, his sexual attraction to her.

Very good understanding of relationship power dynamics from Robin Norwood.

The Steps of Recovery

1. Go for help
2. Make your own recovery the first priority in your life
3. Find a support group of peers who understand

4. Develop your spiritual side through daily practice
5. Stop managing and controlling others
6. Learn to not get “hooked” into the games
7. Courageously face your own problems and shortcomings
8. Cultivate whatever needs to be developed in yourself
9. Become “selfish.”
10. Share with others what you have experienced and learned

Don’t seek the support of the people you were helping: they need you to stay sick so they can keep doing what they were doing.

Traits of Recovered Women

Recovery is a life-long process, it’s never a finish line at which you can say “done”.
But you will know you’re getting close when you can recognize yourself in the following traits:

1. She accepts herself fully, even while wanting to change parts of herself. There is a basic self-love and self-regard, which she carefully nurtures and purposely expands
2. She accepts others as they are without trying to change them to meet her needs
3. She is in touch with her feelings and attitudes about every aspect of her life, including her sexuality
4. She cherishes every aspect of herself: her personality, her appearance, her beliefs and values, her body her interests and accomplishments. She validates herself, rather than searching for a relationship to give her a sense of self-worth
5. Her self-esteem is great enough that she can enjoy being with others, especially men, who are fine just as they are. She does not need to be needed in order to feel worthy
6. She allows herself to be open and trusting with appropriate people. She is not afraid to be known at a deeply personal level, but she also does not expose herself to the exploitation of those who are not interested in her well-being
7. She questions, “Is this relationship good for me? Does it enable me to grow into all I am capable of being?”
8. When a relationship is destructive, she is able to let go of it without experiencing disabling depression. She has a circle of supportive friends and healthy interests to see her through crises
9. She values her own serenity above all else. All the struggles, drama, and chaos of the past have lost their appeal. She is protective of herself, her health, and her well-being
10. She knows that a relationship, in order to work, must be between partners who share similar values, interests, and goals, and who each have a capacity for intimacy. She also knows that she is worthy of the best that life has to offer

On choosing to admit the problem, and start the road towards recovery:

> The choice is yours. If you choose to begin the process of recovery, you will change from a woman who loves someone else so much it hurts into a woman who loves herself enough to stop the pain.

Healthy relationships start with the self:

> Many women make the mistake of looking for a man with whom to develop a relationship without first developing a relationship with themselves; they run from man to man, looking for what is missing within. The search must begin at home, within the self.

This part made me cry.
It's a man reflecting at his father's funeral:

> My brother-in-law, trying to be funny, said, "You know, this is the first time I've been in this house when the TV wasn't on and he wasn't watching a game." I looked at my brother and he started to cry again, not sadly but bitterly.
> All of a sudden I saw what my father had done all his life and what I was doing, too. Just like him, I wouldn't let anybody be close to me, know me, talk to me. The TV was my armor.
> I followed my brother outside and we took a drive together down to the lake. We sat there for a long time. As I listened to him talk about how long he'd been waiting for Dad to notice him, I started really seeing myself for the first time, realizing how much I'd become like my father. I thought about my step-son, Tim, always waiting like a sad little puppy for some of my time and attention, and how I had kept myself too busy for him or his mom.
> On the plane ride home I kept thinking about what I wanted people to say about me when I died, and that helped me see what I had to do

The nurse who saved a woman's life (this was just too touching):

> On her last night in the hospital a nurse sat quietly with her and asked her some gently probing questions. The whole story came pouring out. The nurse finally said to her, "I know you're thinking of trying it again. Why shouldn't you? Nothing's different tonight than it was a week ago. But before you do, I want you to see someone."
> The nurse, a former client of mine, referred her to me.

On the importance of providing guidance, instead of telling people "I trust you":

> "I called my mother and described him in glowing terms to her. She said, 'I trust you to make the right decision.' Well, she shouldn't have. I decided to marry him, which was definitely a mistake.

On women needing toxicity and relationships falling apart as men improve:

> When I started making what we'd wished for a reality, we fell apart. The more middle class we became, the less she liked it. I guess she couldn't feel sorry for me anymore

More Wisdom

- Avoid minimizing your problems

It's a human tendency to tell ourselves that we are "OK" even when we're not.
We amplify other people's problems and minimize our own so that we can feel good. But that way, we don't address the problem.

- An high-achiever career with toxic relationships can be common

Says Norwood:

> Like so many women who love too much, she was obviously a very responsible person, a high achiever who was succeeding in many areas of her life, but who nevertheless had little self-esteem

If this is you, I also recommend reading "Will I Ever Be Good Enough".

- Obsession: caring too much, thinking too much, contacting someone too often

When you care so much more than your partner and you need constant contact and reassurance, that is obsession.
When you know you should give him space, but you can't, that's obsession.

- Adults are responsible for preventing sexual parent/child bonds

The author explains that it's normal that children want the parent of opposite gender all for themselves.
And those feelings can find a more fertile ground when the mother is missing, and the daughter has to step up and help the father take care of the household.

Says Robin:

> In an effort to avoid violating, even in thought, the powerful incest taboo, she may numb herself to most or even all of her sexual feelings. The decision to do so is, again, unconscious, a defense against the most threatening impulse of all: sexual attraction for a parent. Because it is unconscious, the decision is not easily examined and reversed.

A mother who is present and a healthy relationship within parents instead allows the daughter to develop a healthy, sex-free emotional attachment to the father.

- Women who love too much and the attraction to criminals

Some women who love too much end up with men who have been in prison -prisoners' wives, as Nordwood calls them-.
The allure of these men is that they are broken and need fixing, and that they are unavailable.
The women prefer to dream about a possible love, than work and make it happen in real life.

- Help is the Sunny Side of Control

Says the author:

> It is not easy or comfortable for us to consider that selfless behavior, "being good," and efforts to help may actually be attempts to control, and not be altruistically motivated.
> When efforts to help are practiced by people who come from unhappy backgrounds, or who are in stressful relationships in the present, the need to control must always be suspected.

- Toxic relationships often go from bad to worse

When a relationship fails, women think that if they couldn't make it work with a loser, or with a toxic man, then they must really be worthless.
So for the next relationship, they pick a worse man.

CONS

- Attachment styles are missing

The author wrote the first version of the book when attachment styles weren't as widespread knowledge as they are today.

Norwood describes many patterns of fearful/anxious women, but never calls them so.
With attachment styles, this book would have been even more complete. But it's a small con, given the huge value this book provides.

- Some women say it demonizes support (but I disagree)

Some reviewers say that the author is encouraging women to love less. But I don't think it's true at all.

PROS

- Great psychology
- Life-changing content:

Review

"Women Who Love Too Much" is an eye-opening book and, potentially, a life-changing book.

By looking around the web, I could find many women who credited "Women Who Love Too Much" with having helped change their lives for the better. I believe those reviews are genuine, since the psychology just makes sense.

Sadly, "Women Who Love Too Much" only addresses women, but I believe that many men will also equally benefit from this book.

Who should read it?

- People who always fall in love with the wrong person
- People who confuse pain with love
- People who fall in love for the unavailable partner
- People who fall in love with messed up partners who need constant rescuing
- People who fall in love for partners who are below their actual value

Different types of seducers can all be successful in different niches.

And while being a high value man -and high mate value– is the most reliable way to date well, these seducer niches work even for average-looking men.

So let's dive in:

1. Sensitive Artist

The sensitive artist doesn't even seem interested in women.

He is lost in his art—or at the mercy of his own emotions and dark side.
And that makes him even more attractive.

He is:

- Brooding
- Dark
- Slightly depressed
- Deep

PROS:

- Women chase him: sometimes as admirers, and sometimes forced into a toxic relationship dance of rescuer/troublemaker, with dreams of being inspirational muses
- Pure lover, also thanks to creativity's association with subclinical levels of schizotypal traits (Nettle & Clegg, 2006). Some women may even become the artist provider

CONS:

- Quality women stay away: some sensitive types date dysfunctional women, including what Norwood labeled "women who love too much" types (Norwood, 1985). Even a top 1% artist like Kurt Cobain ended up with a basket case
- Potential for losing women's (respect): the struggling artist abdicates typical male responsibilities that some women expect, like strength, provisioning, and general life competence
- Potential for toxic relationships: if he attracts the crazy type of artist… It's gonna be fireworks.
  Example:

> Her: (shoots gun)
> Him: You're going to kill yourself
> Her: I don't wanna live

Welcome to the life of the crazy "artist" -where "artist" is often just a convenient cover for "crazy"-.

Women He Attracts:

- Artists and struggling artists
- Groupies IF he is a successful artist
- Rebels
- Hipsters
- Crazy

Subtypes:

- Dandy: the narcissist type of artist
- Hipster: the non-artist, but likes to dress like one
- The Rebel: they both seek to live on the society's fringes

2. Rocker

Professionally, you might consider “the rocker” an artist.

But when it comes to seduction, he is very different.
He attracts even more women, especially when successful.
And instead of being brooding and depressive, he has ‘lust for life’.

PROS:

- Stage effect: stage performance almost automatically puts him at the top of the social pile. And that’s true even for less famous rockers
- Assumed preselection: women assume that because he’s in a band, he must be very successful with women

CONS:

- Less appealing to women looking for stability: women who are looking for a boyfriend might disqualify the rocker as a long-term partner (but some of them might still want him for a night)

Women He Attracts:

The rocker has a large seductive appeal.
And he has the largest pull on:

- Groupies: the “limelight effect” is always stronger on a subset of women
- Promiscuous & highly sexual women: they feel free to embrace their full sexual self with a rocker type
- Romantic women: if he sings ballads or love stories

3. Successful Alpha

A new trend in the male dating advice, but an old seducer type.

The overachiever:

- Prioritizes his purpose over women
- Prioritizes self-development over women
- Never chases
- Refuses to entertain games women play
- Get women as a consequence of his sexual market value

The old PUA "lifestyle game" strategy sought to get women through an attractive and rich lifestyle.
The "overachiever" does the same, but it comes natural to who he is. He gets women not just for his lifestyle, but as a consequence of who is and who he becomes -a tycoon-.
That's why the alpha male chases little: he does not put women first.

PROS:

- Gets high-quality women: high-quality women prefer all-around successful men (duh!)
- Dates with power: the alpha male enters his relationships with lots of power
- Reaches higher stations in life: by putting his purpose first, the alpha male tends to rise high in society

CONS:

- Focus on work-only may leave personal growth blind posts: the overachiever is all work and has no time for other self-development efforts. Some are naturally high-power. But some others are not. So he can also be a "beta overachiever", and clueless when it comes to women (see Zuckerberg, Elon Musk)
- Prisoner of a fragile ego: some overachievers build their ego around "being rich" or "being alpha", and that's an inherently fragile ego. He can take rejections too personally, take fewer shorts, and self-reject
- Unbalanced relationships of master and puppet: high-power overachievers tend to be driven alpha males who demand total power in their relationships. Some strong women aren't comfortable with that (not an issue if you prefer submissive women)

You can see it in Trump's relationship:

> Trump: Give me your hand
> Melania: (swats his hand away)

When you try to "alpha" more independent women without their full respect, she will rebel (and it's his fault, not hers).

Women He Attracts:

- Most women: successful overachievers have a very large appeal
- Submissive women: submissive women make for better partners to alphas, since they gladly embrace their subordinate role
- Traditional women who seek a strong male figure

But also some feminist women who hate him are sometimes at the same time turned on by him.

4. Outlaw

Is the outlaw appealing?

Let's hear from an outlaw about his history with women (Norwood, 1985):

> When you've done time you learn that some women think you're a creep and have nothing to do with you. But there are other women who get turned on by the whole idea. It fascinates them. They see you as big and bad and they get real seductive, trying to tame you. Or they think you've been hurt and they feel sorry for you and want to help you.

The outlaw is a polarizer.
He repels many women, but attracts a few of them.

A theory by some researcher proposes that the outlaw appeal grows in times of violence and upheavals, and decreases in times of peace and safety.
But findings are mixed on this.

PROS:

- Polarizing effect: you get clear-cut attraction or rejection, and don't waste time on maybes
- Carnal attraction: for the women who are into it, it can make for raw attraction

Otherwise though, not many advantages.

CONS:

- Poor for high-quality women: high-quality women usually go for men at the top of the pile and outlaws are usually not high-up in society
- Few women to choose from: higher status outlaws are on top of male-dominated gangs, with a small pond of women to fish from
- Success is capped: the success you obtain from within society, both sexual and non-sexual, is superior to whatever you can obtain from outside of society
- Aggressive-looking men scare most women away: Starting a cold approach with a smile is often better than going in at "high intensity"

Women He Attracts:

- Repressed women: some of these women feel the quickest way to recover ground on all the life they didn't live is to swing to the extreme
- Women angry at their parents: getting with an outlaw type is the biggest revenge against their parents
- "Prisoners' wives": a subset of "women who love too much". It's a group of anxious-attachment women who are too afraid of abandonment, so they pick men who are physically unavailable and who can never leave them
- Fearful women: paradoxically, fearful women might feel safer with commanding and dominant men. And the most extreme ones might feel safer with an actual criminal
- Hybristophiliacs: a psychological umbrella term for all the various subsets of women who are attracted to violent criminals

The Serial Killer Myth: Don't Believe The Hype

Many misunderstand and overestimate the seductive power of violent criminals.

It's mostly fame that attracts groupies, and there is only a handful of Ted Bundies who get famous. Most others are nameless, lonely criminals.

Subsets:

- Fighter: Fighting men for women is not a smart dating strategy. We're also not a species where (Ridley, 1993).
- Pusher & 'pimp'
- The Rebel: the tamer side and the "cool" kid in high-school. The rebel has the fortitude to buck the unwritten "social laws", and only breaks smaller laws. He attracts rebel women who don't have the courage to rebel themselves

In my teens and early 20's I was a rebel type:

5. Pick-Up Artist

The pick-up artist is not afraid of chasing women.

Indeed, that's all he does.

He approaches a lot, talks to a lot of women, and women generally take a very high priority in his life -often, the only priority in their lives-.

Among the traits of the PUA:

- Lots of cold approaches
- Focus on games
  - Mostly verbal games (push-pull, yes ladders, routines, sex innuendos, "couple frames", etc.)
- Lots of smiles and jokes
- Higher energy
- Extroverted

PROS:

- Works well for cold approaches: the high energy helps women snap out of autopilot, and his friendliness eases possible initial fears
- Many approaches = many opportunities: the pick-up artist puts the law of the large numbers on his side
- Extroversion makes approaches seem natural: he can approach women without looking like he's hitting on every single girl (an unattractive and low-power behavior)
- Well-rehearsed: the many approaches make him socially lubricated and, in the best of cases, smooth

CONS:

- It's lower power: by walking to a girl first, the PUA is almost automatically lower in power. Over-smiling and joking can also make him lower power
- Gets lots of shit tests: PUAs can come across as somewhat fake, unnatural, and big game players. Women wonder "is this guy for real?", and throw plenty of roadblocks his way
- Branded as immature: women and men alike tend to think of PUAs as immature, which partially makes sense, since many men go through a "chasing women" phase and then grow out of it. That makes it harder for the PUA to gain social status
- Wastes lots of time on women: sessions of approaching women require lots of time and investment, and pick-up artists don't always place enough high value on their time

Subtypes

- The party animal: high energy, happy, and hyper-social. The good ones can sport a beer belly while still enjoying success with the party crowd. Some PUAs go down this road and be the life of the party
- The wealthy womanizer: wealthy womanizers usually lead a lifestyle that gets women to them, but they might also dabble in cold approaches
- The natural: he never set out to be a PUA, but he sometimes behaves a bit like one

6. Bodybuilder

Yes, muscles and definition are attractive.

Only scrawny jealous guys deny that.

And muscular men tend to have more sex partners, and be more sexually unrestricted (Kordsmeier, 2018; Swami et al., 2014).

Don't overdo it!
While men's respect, probably because of evolution (Puts, 2010), increases with increasing size, women prefer moderate muscle mass ("threshold effect")

PROS:

- Carnal attraction: promoting hot sex
- Fast sex with right targets: the muscular man can more easily date as a lover with the subtypes of women who are into muscles. Sex happens quickly

CONS:

- Time-intensive: getting big takes time and effort, and it comes with opportunity costs. Make sure you enjoy lifting, don't do it just for women
- Less appealing to certain types of girls: while every woman prefers a masculine body, it's matters comparatively less to hipsters and artistic types

- Can make some women feel insecure: women are very body-conscious. Some really shredded men can make some women feel insecure in the relationship. It can be fixed by upping availability
- Too much is… Too much: a study with 141 women in their 20's found that women preferred "men with moderate muscularity".

Women He Attracts:

Well-toned bodies have large appeal.

A few exceptions apply for long-term-minded women who may feel safer with "dad bobs", but it's a minority.

Lifters enjoy an especially large pull with:

- Female bodybuilders
- MILFs: evidence is lacking, but my experience suggests older women are more into it

Subtypes:

- The fighter: overlaps because getting big sub-communicates physical power
- The jock, albeit the jock's seduction power is more about social status than pure physique
- The narcissist: some lifters are (body) narcissists

7. Feminine Heartthrob

A boyband, or girlfriends taking a selfie?

Some are surprised that men with (a touch of) femininity can be attractive.

But personal tastes matter, and every rule has its exceptions.

Men who fancy themselves as masculine -or who wish to be masculine- look down on the feminine type as not a 'real man'.

But if they struggle to gain masculine men's respect, the boyband type can take solace in the arms of the many women who adore him.

PROS:

- Very polarizing: women who like them will really like him

CONS:

- Struggles to gain men's respect and struggles to gain social status

Women He Attracts:

- Younger women (Murphy, 2025): and real-world observation shows it
- Urbanites: the metrosexual dates better in large and generally safe cities
- Fearful women: whereas dominant men can seem scary, Greene suggests that the feminine type puts women at ease
- Bi-curious women: and for the record, many women are bi-curious

Subtypes:

- The dandy: the dandy has a touch of femininity
- The narcissist: over-concern for appearances and people's opinions adds a touch of femininity to many narcissists
- The hypersexed bisexual: the hypersexed bisexual oozes sex and "swings both ways"

> Russel Brand: Women lower their guard and feel at ease around me because they think I'm gay <— like other glam-rockers, he leans feminine. And he's bi

8. Intellectual

Is knowledge attractive?

Not much.

So, what's attractive about the intellectual?

The intellectual is attractive because of intellectual authority an important subset of interpersonal dominance.

Machiavellian intellectuals also take a judge role, further boosting their social power (see Seduction University).

🤦♂Lucio's Take: 'She said I 'looked like a professor who was going to scold her'

Lucio:
I use some pictures of me teaching workshops for online dating.

One date confessed during pillow talk that I looked like a tough professor who was going to scold her.
And she liked that ⍰⍰⍰.

Women He Attracts:

- Father complex-women:
  - Women without father figures
  - Father admirers (and seek someone similar)
- Sapiosexuals: yes, it exists (Gignac et. al., 2018), albeit it's more about perceived intelligence -and intellectual dominance, of course- than actual IQ points
- Anxious women: the calm serenity of the intellectual type soothes them

We must keep some examples private, but our students know this.

Subtypes:

- The professor: attractive because of his power position, and because he can teach children (Miller, 2005)
- The philosopher
- The writer: at the intersection between the artist and the intellectual

9. Charmer

Clooney is the charming archetype

The charmer charms everyone.

And especially the ladies.

The good social charmers are:

- Socially skilled
- Socially confident
- High status
- Intelligent (or intelligent-sounding)
- Verbally gifted
- Well dressed
- Well-read

PROS:

- Gets high-quality women: he is well-liked by everyone, advances within hierarchies, and gets status and resources. That vibes well with high-quality women
- Keeps women: because he tends to be a genuine high-quality guy
- All-terrain, 360° seducer: thanks to his social skills, he can cold approach or move into any social group, gain status, and get women attracted

CONS:

- Without edge he might be "too nice": if he focuses too much on being liked, he can come across as too friendly and not sexual and edgy enough
- Can become too unavailable: if he is equally charming to everyone, women might feel he is not interested in them, which leads to self-rejection

Overall though, high-quality charmers who learned power dynamics have few cons since they know how to avoid those pitfalls.

See this case study on how to combine charming with power:

> Lucio: I seduced very attractive woman with advanced social skills and strategies. But it wouldn't have worked without strategic displays of power, confidence, and dominance

Women He Attracts:

- Most women: if he's a high-quality charmer, his appeal is one of the broadest of them all

Subtypes:

- Edgy types: their seductive pull is not in their social skills, but in their intensity. See for example the eyes of Nikola Tesla:

- Narcissists: some charmers have a touch of narcissism. They became good with people because they like climbing social ladders and being popular
- Lovers: equally polished and high-value, but more focused on women. They can be closer to the pick-up artists, and have a touch of narcissism

10. Narcissist

Studies suggest that narcissists are the most attractive of the dark triad.

Narcissists think they're hot stuff.
And because they so well act the part, many women also think they must indeed be hot shit.

As an example of narcissist's seductive pull, the song "You're So Vain" shares the love story -and heartbreak- with a narcissist:

> You walked into the party
> Like you were walking on to a yacht
> Your hat strategically dipped below one eye
> (…)
> You had one eye in the mirror

> As you watched yourself Gavotte
> And all the girls dreamed that they'd be your partner

PROS:

- Maximizes his looks: narcissist take great care of their looks, maximizing a crucial trait for attraction
- He shapes reality with his perceptions: by acting high status, they tend to get high status. When they don't, some women will still fall for it

CONS:

- Many narcissists don't grow: they tend to be poor learners, which keeps them stuck in life (Bernstein, 2000)
- It needs some results or fame: narcissism by itself won't give you great results. Narcissists who are low-status do better than low-status low-confidence men, but still not great
- When self-image badly outstrips reality, can come across as pathetic: when a narcissist with too high an opinion of himself is actually a loser, he's twice more of a loser than a "normal" loser
- Can be poor persuaders: seduction and persuasion skills overlap. And many narcissists are poor persuaders because they think that everyone should be able to see their "obvious" genius

Narcissism can be good if you're around a 6 or 7 on a scale from 1 to 10. Above that, it becomes counterproductive.
Also read:

- What differentiates successful narcissists from losers

Women He Attracts:

- Status-conscious women: they like equally status-conscious men, especially if they appear high-status
- Naive women: they confuse narcissism for real value. Please read here on naive self-help
- Social climbers: they want to ride on the narcissist's social clout, and manipulate him with the compliments and adulation the narcissist craves

Bonuses

Some rarer types:

- The pimp / psychopath (not endorsed by TPM): pimps are abusive men whose "game" is total control, operant conditioning through punishments and few rewards, and emotional dependency with judge frames.
  Here's an example of a guy teaching others how he does it on "ask the red pill" (though you never who's making stuff up there):

> All you need to know is my relationship game is the exact same as a literal pimp. Do hoes dare attack their pimps? Do they dare to get the police involved in something. Fuck no.
> Women never call the cops. There are dudes that beat their girlfriends/wife's for years and they still dont call the cops. Why? Because women like abuse emotionally and physically. Note: only a few labile ones do. It's more "addiction" than "like"

Besides ethical considerations, I don't recommend it because you get lower quality women (Sandra L. Brown, 2008).

Also read "are psychopaths successful with women"?

So back to more value-adding styles:

1. The famous man: he isn't even a seducer, since women just fall into his lap. Fame might be the single biggest "sexual market value hack" available, and fame also turbocharges any lover style we list here
2. The passionate romancer: loves women above all, always in love, and always lusting for new adventures. Casanova is the prototype of the passionate romancer. All modern dating coaches (righteously) admonish not to chase, but a passionate romancer is the exception (Prioleau, 2014)
3. The sexual seducer: he promises great sex and seeks to arouse women with either sexual talk, or sexual body language.
   Example:

Sex-based seductions are high-risk and high-reward.
Quick and hot sex is the reward. Driving away women who need a slower build-up -or have hang-ups around sex- is the risk.
Better not try this via text, the risks far outweigh the rewards. It's far better to allude to sex, but never go caveman via texts:

Hint at the sexual, but more in a romanticized way. Avoid full-on sex talk via texts

Competition Among Styles

Question:

> If so many different styles are effective, why do people argue on what's "best"?

For a simple reason: people become their style.

And when their style becomes who they are, they are not really promoting or defending a style, but they are promoting and defending themselves (plus, sometimes, their businesses).

As a rule of thumb, the more they have invested, both in time, finances, and self-identity, the less open-minded they will be.

Manipulation: Definition, Techniques, and Real-Life Examples

Lucio Buffalmano · 20 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Manipulation is not an anomaly; it's the norm.

In any social species, cooperation, competition, or exchanges of value create powerful incentives for manipulation.

Most discussions of manipulation focus on bad actors, the dynamics of manipulation run deeper to include context and asymmetric payoffs of cooperation.

This article maps manipulation at its structural level, as a system of recurring dynamics that appear in relationships, organizations, markets, media, and ideology.

Let's start.

Intro

The TPM Manipulation Model postulates that manipulation is not an anomaly, but a pervasive feature of human communication, and its expression can be predicted based on the interplay of Self-Interest, Asymmetrical Returns in cooperation, Personality (Dark Triad traits vs. Prosociality), and Strategic Refinement (manipulative skills).

Definition: Manipulation is the influence over others for selfish ends, and can be costly to the receiver.

Manipulation is omnipresent and embedded in human socialization and communication, and it's as natural as life itself.

Manipulation is bound to evolve in any complex organism.
In nature, whenever there is a "signal" (like a man's provisioning capacity), there is an evolutionary incentive to fake that signal to get the reward without the cost or the value to back it up (Dawkins & Krebs 1978).

Manipulation further grows and spreads among social animals that cooperate, particularly for value and investment signaling (Buffalmano, 2026).
Cooperation must emerge against the constant threat of defection. But manipulation belongs to cooperation just as much as it does to cheating: it helps the manipulator to control others, and get more of the cooperative pie.

Many forms of manipulation are also innate. And children cry, get in between parents, and act seductive to maintain love and gain extra resources (Pinker, 1997).

Let's now explore some of the main forms of manipulation:

Interpersonal Manipulation

Interpersonal manipulation refers to manipulation between individuals, in a constant arms race between deception and detection.

Social Scalping™

> A form of value exchange manipulation to inflate one's contribution and devalue the target's contribution to increase the target's indebtedness and take more

Social Scalping™, short for "social exchange scalping," is a concept developed by Lucio Buffalmano for The Power Moves.
It exploits the social exchange norms of reciprocity (Cialdini, 1994), and people's natural 'social accounting' to keep track of give and take.

The manipulator tries to inflate the value he gives while deflating the value he receives, and to inflate other people's debt with him while deflating his debts with others.

Debt Inflating Examples

Debt inflating seeks to increase the victim's burden of repayment.
Some techniques include:

1. 'It took me 3 days of 12h work a day' <— High-effort signaling to increase the costs of the favor
2. 'This is just for you, I'm making an exception' <— Make the favor feel special
3. 'This was good for you wasn't it?' <— 'Thread expands' the usefulness of their favor

Here's an overview of social exchange manipulation:

Thanks to Ali & Matthew on the infographics thread

Some real-life examples:

- Tinder player seeks to manipulate the TPM community
- Woman spins leftover into a gift
- Social scalping counter-strategy

Interpersonal Manipulation Tactics

There are countless manipulation tactics, just to name some examples:

- Get denied to deny: propose something they're forced to say "no" to deny their future, fair request
- Manipulative win-win frames: fake collaboration while competing or trying to exploit. Example: "stop being so defensive"
- Manipulative tit for that: offer something useless just to ask for something valuable in return
  - Manipulative Self-Disclosure: offer unrequested personal information to then ask for the victim's more valuable information. Example: manipulative informational tit for tat

Personal Value Scalping™

> A form of personal value manipulation to inflate one's perceived value and deflate the target's personal value

Value Scalping™, short for "Personal Value Scalping", parallels social scalping, but it applies to one's personal value rather than exchanges of investment and give-and-take. (Think of 'I am great, you're not so great' for value scalping, vs. 'my giving is so valuable, yours is not' for exchange scalping).

Some examples include:

- Covert bragging and pride signaling to inflate one's value
- Criticizing, comparing or devaluing others' achievements to lower their value

Psychological Manipulation

Psychological manipulation changes the target's states, emotions, or beliefs.

Many forms of manipulation are psychological in nature.

Normative Cognitive Restructuring

To change a target's system of morals and beliefs to those preferred by the manipulator

There are two forms:

- Manipulative shaming to frame the target's beliefs and morals as immoral and inferior
- Manipulative moralizing, presenting the preferred norms as morally superior

They work best when delivered by a high-power, authoritative figure, like a 'judge'.
Judgments of 'good' or 'not good' are used to change the target's norms of reference, and gain his conformity.

Public Shaming

Concentrated, intense, and public moralizing browbeats targets into compliance while setting the norms for everyone else.
It's the psychological version of public hanging, setting the normative precedent for everyone to obey.
An example here:

Julien Blanc shamed on CNN

Emotional Manipulation

Emotional manipulation uses emotions to gain leverage or compel the target into action that benefits the manipulator.

Some examples include:

- Provoking to get an emotional reaction from the target. It can be used to induce mistakes, make the target look unhinged, or blame the target for aggressiveness
- Inducing fear with aggression, veiled threats
- Guilt tripping & pity plays: use others' conscience and sense of duty to manipulate behavior

A real-life example of guilt-tripping:

Research suggests guilt tripping can work, but it can also easily backfire, and reeks of manipulation (Singh, Crisafulli, & Quamina, 2020).

Social Manipulation

Social manipulation refers to manipulation between individuals and groups, or between and among groups.

Prosocial Scalping™

> To encourage individually costly prosocial efforts, while defecting or gaining from others' effort

While related dynamics have been studied in economics, politics, and evolutionary psychology, prosocial scalping™ is a TPM framework that identifies and systematizes this behavior as a recurring manipulation strategy in interpersonal and ideological power dynamics.

Prosocial scalping exploits the asymmetrical payoffs of group contributions vs. selfish behavior.
Everyone gains with universal contribution, but the manipulator gains more by promoting contribution, while defecting himself.

The manipulator also gains social points by looking selfless and prosocial.

⚠ Prosocial Manipulative Freeriding

> To encourage in-group support that's costly to the target, but beneficial to the group and the manipulator

Sometimes they take the form of nasty in-group and out-group frames that increase social combativeness, make people bitter and angry, and may even harm humanity.

Here are some examples:

- Politicians' patriotism: to encourage giving and fighting for 'the country', empowering those who lead that country
- 'Honor' for dead soldiers: generals and politicians promote nationalism and tribal 'honor', but only soldiers on the ground risk their lives
- Proxy warfare, stoking hatred in others to let them fight the war for you

Understanding this dynamic is not a call to join an opposing ideology, but to exit manipulative games altogether.

Competitors Manipulation™

> Spreading subpar information and offering subpar advice to disempower the competition

Competitor Manipulation™ is a TPM-codified manipulation dynamic describing how subpar advice and disempowering narratives are promoted to reduce and disempower the competition, often under the guise of wanting to help others.

Some examples include:

- Naive self-help: devoid of crucial knowledge for life effectiveness like manipulation and power dynamics
- Weakness & withdrawal as virtue, making targets feel good for exiting the competition
  ⍰ Examples: monk mode, NoFap (see video ⍰ 'why NoFap can be manipulative')

Sexual Manipulation

Sexual manipulation seeks selfish gains on dating and reproduction, and may be the main driver behind all social discourse and hierarchy-formation.
Write Pratto and Sidanius:

> intrasexual competition among males may encourage men (…) control women's sexual and reproductive behavior, but also to form (…) coalitions against outgroup males (…) will result (…) in class stratification among men.

While oppression can be part of it, much of that competition is more subtle, based on narrative control and manipulation.

Competitor Manipulation & 'Market Clearing'

There are two types of sexual manipulation:

- Intra-sexual manipulation to disempower same-sex individuals
- Intersexual manipulation to disempower or influence the opposite gender

Value and ideologies are frequently used as competitors' manipulation.
For example, a woman promoting 'extreme independence' to her peers is performing a 'market-clearing move'—reducing the number and effectiveness of active competitors for high-value mates while she herself may secretly defect from those same rules.

Some examples:

- Slut-shaming (women on women): to discourage short-term dating and maintain more negotiation leverage for long-term dating
  - Slut-shaming (men on women) to limit sexuality and increase the odds of finding a loyal partner
- Feminist 'strength as a virtue': 'strength and independence' in women can decrease dating options. The manipulator can defect, or avoid being the outcast for choosing a single or 'career-first' life
- Rational males quitting dating: framing women as manipulative and untrustworthy discourages men from dating and lowers the competition for the manipulator.
- Body positivity and body shaming, See here:

> Her: I wonder why women supported me in my 'all in' journey <— The support handicaps the target and conveniently benefits the manipulator

Cultural Wars For Sexual Advantage

The TPM Manipulation Model predicts cultural wars as inevitable, some of which will be split along gender faultlines, each gender favoring the culture that best represents its interests.
In general, you'd expect:

- Male-Promoting Strategies: Focus on men's comparative higher status and paternity certainty. This includes 'cultures of honor' and restrictive sexual norms (including 'slut shaming')
- Female-Promoting Strategies: Focus on resource independence and freedom of choice. This often includes status and financial equality to reduce male dependence, shaming of male control, and shaming of men's preference for feminine and younger women to maintain optionality

Some of these dynamics are visible in some branches of feminism and manosphere red pill, each defending their gender's best interest framing it as values and virtue. Much public discourse is self-interested manipulation framed as moral virtue.

For example, writes Atari in The Cambridge Handbook of Evolutionary Perspectives on Sexual Psychology:

> (…) a culture of honor (…) evolved in response to the adaptive problem of mate retention (…) religion may function as a strategy to restrict women's mating opportunities

While self-interest often splits along gender lines, plenty of exceptions apply. Often, the exceptions still predictively follow self-interest.
Quoting The Oxford Handbook of Evolutionary Psychology:

> parents support ideas and practices that benefit their offspring.
> For example, families with single, adult daughters are more likely to support women's reproductive rights, whereas families with more adult men are likely to oppose those rights (Betzig & Lombardo, 1992)

“A” stands for “adulteress”. The scarlet letter is an example of socio-cultural manipulation to repress sexual freedoms and ensure fidelity

⁉ Gender-aligned cooperation isn’t monolithic, and exists alongside intra-gender competition.
Interestingly, we can expect that gender-aligned cooperation increases after the main reproductive years, when the main motives of reproduction-driven intra-sexual competition subsides.

Dating & Relationships Manipulation

Early pick-up artists studied hypnosis to improve their dating outcomes (Strauss, 2005)

Few, if any, date with maximum honesty and genuineness.
But while basic manipulation is expected, some take it to more 'dark psychology' levels. Some manipulative tactics include:

- Jealousy-stoking: triangulation, flirting with others, talking about exes, etc.
- Disempowering the target: 'negging', ignoring, etc.

Relationship Manipulation

Manipulation in relationships includes:

- Increasing control
  - Isolation from support
  - Increasing dependency, for example, convincing to give up one's job
- Disempowering the partner
  - Lowering self-esteem with criticism, or belittling achievements
  - Gaslighting

Dig deeper:

- Women's relationship control strategies
- Relationship prize, or the higher value partner

Business Manipulation

Business manipulation can be understood at different levels:

- Lobbying with manipulative frames to get undue support or protection, nationalizing costs (externalities) while privatizing the profits
- Public relations to look more moral and virtuous
- Marketing:
  - Brand emotional association (higher strategy)
  - Response marketing (tactical level, ie.: scarcity, promotions, experts' opinions, etc.)

An interesting example of a marketing tactic:

This marketer pretends to personally care about a prospect to increase attendances adn conversions

Companies gain from workers' prosociality and teamwork at the expense of selfish pursuits. That creates fertile ground for manipulation

Employees Manipulation

Owners and employees have some converging interests, and several diverging interests that promote manipulation. For example:

- 'Big family' frames: owners benefit when employees feel like a family because people give much more to family
- HR as employees' support, instead of a tool of management

Example: Ray Dalio's 'principles'
In his book Ray Dalio's principle for his company was "what's good for the whole is good". But Ray Dalio owns the whole. This is the principle of the owner/employee incentive misalignment.Leadership manipulation refers to the manipulation of followers and in-group members.

Leadership Manipulation

While leaders and followers share some interests, the areas of diverging interests create a fertile ground for manipulation.

Group Identification: Giving Up Self-Interest

> Leaders encourage individuals to give up up their individuated identities for group identities

The more followers identify with the group, the more their self-interest becomes the interest of the group.
That benefits the group and the leader, but it rarely benefits the individuals.
Some tactics include:

- "We" & "Us" talk
- Individual disempowerment to increase group dependence

- Ingroup vs outgroup frames and making up enemies, which increases dependence and cohesion (Haslam, 2006)
- High powers and missions to serve, and against which individuals don't matter. Like in religious cults

Also read:

- Healthy individualism as the solution

Fake Prototipicality

Leaders get the largest share of the group's collaboration returns, but hide their special status and play up the similarity with other group members.

Thus, you get PR stunts like CEOs serving fries or wartime leader photo-opping on the frontlines.

Leaders often use 'costumes' (military uniforms, factory jumpsuits) to bridge the status gap of a top 0.1% and manufacture a false sense of shared struggle

Leading By Example, Hiding The Payoffs

Leaders can be more honest in their prosociality because of the status-related asymmetric returns of prosociality. Such as, as the main beneficiary of the group's payoffs, prosociality provides higher payoffs to leaders than to lower-status followers.

Thus, leaders can 'lead by example' because they hide or downplay their higher payoffs.

Channeling Anger For Power & Attention

Populist leaders inflate enemies and troubles and channel people's discontent into the promise of positive revolt and change.

Angry and resentful men who feel short-changed by the demonized group are easier to mobilize, radicalize, and leverage.

The more discontent available or stoked, the more extreme the leader who emerges.
Historical examples could be Robespierre, Savonarola, Lenin, Hitler, etc.
However, these dynamics apply at all levels, from influencer fueling and channeling bitterness to angry social media posts chasing likes.

Intrinsic Motivation

> Higher motivation = lower pay

Effective leaders use intrinsic motivation to get the most out of their team, and manipulative leaders exploit the same dynamics to underpay the team.

The principle is this:

⚖️ The more intrinsic motivation you elicit, the less material benefits people require

In the simplest terms, psychological motivation substitutes material compensation. At the highest level, the target is happy to do the work without even wanting any material benefit.

This is how the most successful leaders and strategists operate.
Men and women with the strongest relationships don't criticize their partners, they make them feel good to be with them, or to protect and provide.

Great leadership and manipulative leadership share the same foundational dynamics
Intrinsic motivation is crucial for any leader, including value-adding ones. This is why we say that "great leadership is great manipulation". But the same principles can be used to extract maximum resources from followers, underpay them, and benefit poor leaders and goals.

Some tactics:

- Shine up and praise down: 'kiss up and kick down' lacks sophistication and demotivates the team. Strategic operators instead shine up and praise down to combine the best of both worlds
- Higher goals that attract and motivate people beyond self-interest
- Patriotism and contribution as a value, so people exchange hard work for more ethereal social prestige

Self-Manipulation

Self-manipulation is both the best source of manipulation and a major source of disempowerment.

Robert Trivers first proposed and later tested that self-deception, or believing in a certain lie, better allows one to convince others.
But self-manipulation is also costly when we avoid facing real issues.
For example:

- ❓ She's not so bad, she just got emotional and broke all our dishes <— Minimizing out-of-control emotionality
- ❓ She had an abusive father, I must just keep loving her <— Psychologizing abusive behavior away

Integrating Your Manipulative Tendencies

Believing you have no drive to manipulate others is also a form of self-manipulation.
It's better instead to own up to your own drive to power and control, and channel it for better ends.

Socio-Cultural Manipulation

Individuals and groups seek to influence the culture to what benefits them most.
For example:

- Wealthy men frame success as based on merit: it signals higher value (as opposed to strategic or lucky), and helps to maintain the favorable hierarchy (framing the underclass as high in warmth/low competence can help stabilize the status quo (Fiske and Cuddy, 2002; Sapolsky, 2017)
- Virtue-framing: framing techniques change the way people think about issues. For example, when expressions such as "tax relief" or "pro-life" spread, conservatives are more likely to win debates and influence policy (Lakoff, 2004)

Media Manipulation

The media operates under a widespread belief that it reports information and news.
In truth, the simple selection of what to report is a form of bias (McCombs and Shaw, 1972). Plus, the media's incentive to capture attention naturally leads to forms of manipulation such as:

- Sensationalism: "new record", "never seen before", "first woman ever to…"
- Fear-mongering: fear sells and attracts viewers. The media overstates risks while downplaying long-term, positive trends (Pinker, 2018)

Greta may have been a victim of sensationalist media and the weaponization of youthful Idealism. Global warming is a serious issue we must tackle, but better doing so with rationality and level-headedness

Benefits and Risks

Manipulation offers large benefits, but as for most things, there are risks and costs, including:

- Exclusion from cooperative circles if overdone
  - Reputational loss. ⁉️♂ See a real-life example from my brother

  - Loss of high-quality cooperators: high-quality men and women don't like inveterate manipulators
- Poorer relationships. The longer the relationship, the higher the odds of being found out
  - Potential for lower life quality since good relationships are crucial to health
- Weakness when it covers a lack of assertiveness: unassertive people often come across as sneakier/manipulative trying to get their needs met, without direct talk

These costs are on a spectrum depending on frequency, gravity, and context.
In general, blatant and constant manipulation is a poor strategy, but:

Strategic manipulators still enjoy a life edge
It would be naive to think that due to the costs, manipulation is a losing strategy. Instead, costs and payoffs largely come down to skills and calibration. Advanced players may be genuine to enjoy close relationships, but manipulate when the payoffs are high.
In general, poor manipulators bear the costs, and skilled ones get most of the benefits.

Spotting & Avoiding Manipulation

Steps to help you recognize and avoid manipulation:

1. Read people's character, because people differ. For example, dark triads (narcissists, Machiavellians, and psychopaths) tend to manipulate more (Lyons, 2019).
2. Develop critical thinking ⍰ Example: critical thinking vs. marketing
3. Think in terms of power and exchanges, leverage, and next steps
   - Always ask 'what's in it for me', and consider 'what's in it for them'
4. Look at areas of diverging interest, where most manipulation attempts cluster
   ⍰ Conflicts of interest at work
5. Quit projecting your own 'goodness' into the world: honest people project too much honesty in others and default for "truth by default interpretations" (Levine, 2014)
   - Always ask about possible second motives

Helpful resources:

- Smart cooperator
- Outsmarting a manipulator

Can you reform a manipulator?

Redemption is possible with good and moral people and when you have leverage over them.

Change is less likely with low leverage, when genetic influences are present, and with conscious manipulators.
Conscious manipulators tend to be "ego-congruent", and some may even consider manipulativeness a strength.
In these cases, you must constantly call out the manipulation. And at that point, you may want to consider whether the relationship is even worth it.

Manipulation As A Life Skill

Manipulation is a foundational life skill for self-defense and for competing against others who are not honorable.

Sometimes manipulation is also fair to use, and the same principles can be used for honorable and value-adding ends.
For example, guilt tripping may be used to raise money for a good pro-social cause.

> The inability to manipulate doesn't make you virtuous. It only makes you ineffective, and a target for manipulator

Leadership

- The Power Exchange Model of Leadership™ states that the more value a leader seeks to extract from followers, the more power he needs—whether to coerce, provide value in return (extrinsic or intrinsic), exert influence (leadership, charisma), or strategically manipulate the exchange.
- The value–control tradeoff™ states that the more competent an individual is, the more demanding he is, making it more challenging for leaders to attract, influence, and retain. Leaders lead best by increasing their ability to exchange or extract performance from high-value, low-control individuals.
- The Power Exchange Model of Entrepreneurship™ applies the leadership model to entrepreneurship, stating that to get high value from high-value individuals within voluntary exchanges, entrepreneurs must give back high value (extrinsic or intrinsic), exert personal influence (leadership, charisma), or strategically manipulate the exchange.

Social Exchange Dynamics

Exchange theory, social: in social and power dynamics, a framework model that looks at relationships as transactions governed by the laws of economics and individuals' self-interest.
It starts from the premise that people are rational players who seek relationships that add value to their lives and make them better off.

- Sexual marketplace: the social exchange for dating and sex
- Balanced exchanges (AKA: balanced relationships): exchanges between individual who mostly match each other in terms of value exchange

Explanation:
Many relationships are more than pure transactions, and a transactional model alone, without psychology and emotional intelligence, would result in a poor understanding of people and, as a consequence, in low personal effectiveness and poor relationships.
However, this website maintains that the exchange nature of relationships is fundamental to understand social and power dynamics. Understanding the laws of the social exchange theory makes people more effective, while those with low social effectiveness who fail with relationships are often oblivious to the transactional nature of relationships.

Bean counting™ (social): an exaggerateldy nitpicking approach to social exchanges.

Explanation: Bean counting may rub others off, but can help people advance, when it's done at a high-level and in high-stakes negotiations.
However, in everyday socialization and especially with friends and partners, it looks petty and drives high-quality givers away.

- Passive-aggressive bean counter: he resents that you "took" from him, or that he gave you something, but does not speak directly. He might throw something back at your face when you least expect it
- Open exchange talk bean counter: as soon you ask for something, he says "I'll do it, but you'll owe me". Or he might ask for something specific "OK, I'll do X for you, but can you do Y for me?.
- One-upping bean counter: he might actually be happy to give, but only because he knows that he can then use it to one-up you or embarrass you at a later stage

Examples:

> One-upping bean counter: yeah, like that time I gave you 3 olives when you forgot your lunch, remember that?

Exchange risk: the risks that entering into social exchange entails for the individual.

Explanation: social exchanges, from friends, to relationships, to business partnerships, all entail an investment, and (emotional) exposure risk. The investment can be time, emotions, money, or a mix of them all. If those exchanges turn sour, we stand to lose (net value loss), or to lose an opportunity for what could have been a better exchange (opportunity loss).
"Smart cooperators" take steps to minimize those risks.

Principle of Social Exchange Inflation™: The tendency for any give to lose value and related interpersonal leverage over time.

Explanation: The value of a give is highest before the exchange, drops sharply once given, and continues to decay over time—along with the receiver's sense of gratitude, obligation, and likelihood of repayment.

Fair value marketing, social: in social exchanges, to appropriately sell and present one's own contributions and value-offering in a way that other people will correctly value and appreciate.
Conversely, to address "social scalping" attempts by more manipulative and Machiavellian individuals to avoid that they claim too much credit for their contributions.
This is the "honorable collaborator" approach.

Explanation: imagine "social exchange marketing" on a continuum.
Clueless people fail to have their contributions and value-offering properly valued, and they fail to spot or correct individuals who devalue their contributions ("credit erasing") and/or inflate their own contributions ("social scalping").
At the opposite end of the spectrum, manipulators will seek to devalue other people's contributions, and inflate their own.
Fair value marketing sits in the middle, and it's the equivalent of assertiveness in social skills. It assertively seeks win-win.

IOU, social: IOU, short form for "I owe you" are social signals that acknowledge the receipt of value from someone and either directly or indirectly promise, imply, or suggest the willingness to pay back the favor.
Thanks to Ali Scarlett for hashing out this dynamic

Explanation: by social exchange theory, when someone receives value from someone else -either a favor, a good advice, or some help- he incurs a debt and "owes" the helper.
IOUs include all the different ways by which people can acknowledge the helper's credit with them, and/or their willingness and promise to repay.
The presence (or absence) of IOUs after you've done a favor can also help you recognize those who are good collaborators, and those who might not be good collaborators (value-takers).

Examples: "thank you so much man!! (by acknowledging the help, it indirectly implies the helper has accrued social credit)"; "if you'll ever need something from them to just let me know; "I will never forget this" (= your credit will never expire)

- Bad IOUs (AKA "empty gratitude"): like "bad cheques", these are "IOUs" that the individual fails to follow through on.
  Explanation: since present gratitude is cheap to deliver, expect that a portion of the gratitude you receive is uncovered and won't be honored when you will need something
  Example: one receives a favor, makes a big show of appreciating it, but when the favor giver is in need and/or asks for something, he does nothing to help
- Promissory credit notes (AKA: future promises): to promise the delivery of value in the future after the desired favor is first obtained Example: "if you do this for me now, then I will… "
  - Manipulative credit notes (AKA: empty promises): to promise the future delivery of value and/or a big social credit in exchange for a favor, but to never intend to honor the debt
- Social credit enhancing: to exaggerate the extent of the help received.
  Explanation: can be helpful to show off an individual's willingness to cooperate, as well as serve to make people more willing to cooperate (read here).
  Example: "man, you just changed my life"; "it's all because of him, that was such a great idea, he saved the day"
- Social debt enhancing: to exaggerate the extent of the debt incurred.

Example: “man, how could I ever repay you this favor”, “there is no way we can thank him enough for what he’s done, but as a token of our appreciation… “

Credit re-assignment: when people mistakenly think someone else is responsible for the value added to them or their team, but that someone else decides not to take advantage of the credit mistakenly foisted upon him, and he re-assigns it to the right person.

Explanation: re-assigning credit instead of taking advantage of a mistake and stealing it for oneself is a honorable move that can serve to increase an individual’s reputation as a honest and fair man.

Example:
Person: “thank you so much, John, you saved our life!”
John: “yeah, indeed, that was a huge game-changer, you have to thank Max though, he did everything himself, he had lots of courage, God bless him”

ROI: The measure of all relevant returns from each action, transaction, or behavior.

- Social ROI: accountancy of al socially-relevant gains or losses
- Power ROI: accountancy of all power-relevant gains or losses

Explanation: ROI in monetary terms accounts for monetary gains or losses, and the same concept can be extended to all types of exchanges to account for all relevant gains or losses of an (in)action, including status, trust, social capital, etc.
What might make no sense from a monetary perspective can make sense from a social point of view. For example, donations incur a net monetary loss, but they can provide a net (social) gain via added status, trustworthiness, and personal good feelings.

Social scalping™ (short for ‘social exchange scalping’): a manipulative approach to social exchanges consisting of social credit and social debit manipulations aimed at taking more value, while giving back less.

As a schematic and pictorial overview of social exchange manipulations.

In simple terms, “social scalper” are manipulators who abuse the social exchange system to:

1. make it seem like they are giving more than they actually are (“credit inflating”)
2. make you feel more socially indebted than you actually are (“debt inflating”)
3. make you feel like you are giving less than you actually are (“credit erasing”)
4. make it seem like they have a smaller social debt than they actually have (“debt erasing “)

Stef and Anon have contributed to this important concept.

Infographic for “credit inflating”:

Example (of “debt inflating”): Offering unrequested “help” is an example of social scalping (“debt inflating kind”). Unneeded and unhelpful “help” increases your debt while providing little or no value -or, sometimes, a cost-.

- Counter scalping: the techniques and strategies to prevent a scalper from taking more than he’s owed or give less than he owes you.

Example:

> Social scalper: “I pulled all connections I had to make this intro and get you this interview bro. That job pays a lot, just go there, be confident, do a good job. I got you in”.
> You: “thanks bro. I already have a few interviews lined up, including one with my true dream company. But > one more option is always good, I appreciate your help”

To fight a social scalper, you need to play the same game. That was a “social credit erasing” power move.

- Credit deflecting: to deflect the credit someone has with us towards someone else, so that someone else shoulders the debt. see example here.
- Credit invention: to completely fabricate and make up a past instance for which the manipulator claims of having provided value and/or expanded effort to provide value, but has never received anything back

Explanation: this is the most extreme case of social scalping in which someone completely makes up a past event to demand something from you

- Credit / debt swapping: trying to pass what should be a credit for the recevier (and a debt for the requestor) into a credit for the requestor (and a debt for the receiver) (thanks to Alian Scarlett for the name).

Example: trying to pass a request for help into an offer for value is a form of debt swapping. See here for examples.

Social Invoicing™ (short for ‘social exchange invoicing’): Social invoicing lists past favors and presents them as an invoice still due, even though they were given with no strings attached at the time. Repayment is rarely the actual goal. More often, the invoice itself is the weapon: reciting it guilts and shames the receiver into compliance.

Value: In social exchanges, social value is an umbrella term for everything that makes or can make people better off (value-positive)

There are two forms of value:

1. Personal Social Value™ (PSV) → who you are
   Traits, status, competence, personality, attractiveness, intelligence, reputation, etc.
   AKA: ‘personal value’ or ‘social value’ in general discourse.
2. Value Exchange™ (VE) → what you give/take (relates to ‘investment dynamics‘)
   Favors, time, help, money, effort, support, opportunities, introductions, etc.
   AKA: Give-and-take, investment

Passive Social Value™ refers to a latent form of value derived from inborn or low-effort traits such as looks, fame, or generational wealth.

Social accounting™ is TPM’s term for the cognitive process by which individuals unconsciously or semi-consciously track and maintain mental balances (positive or negative) of value-giving and value-taking transactions in their social interactions and relationships, applying to both actual or anticipated exchanges.

Social Capital is the net balance of social ledger, with social credit, accrued through value-giving or high personal value, and social debt, accrued through value-taking.

Passive Social Capital™ refers to the potential of giving, a latent, net-value effect that high-value people enjoy without even having to give anything

Value Visibility Model™ is a TPM framework postulating that exchange dynamics are largely shaped by visible value.
As a result, strategic actors engage in ‘value signaling’ and, potentially, deceptive signaling to increase their own perceived value.

Value-gatekeeping™ is the mechanism by which highly visible outer layers invite or repel access to deeper, lower-visibility inner layers of value.

Value-signaling refers to the communication or sub-communication of one’s social value, where the approach and effect depend on strategic predispositions and interpersonal skills.

The Value Signaling Framework™
A social strategy and communication model explaining how people evaluate your worth, and how you can effectively communicate that worth to maximize your success.

The Perceived Value Formula™
States that perceived value equals visible personal value multiplied by signaling skill (Perceived Value = Visible Personal Value × Signaling Skill). Higher objective value makes signaling easier and more effective, so the model favors working on objective value first.

The Value Credibility Hierarchy™
Ranks value signals by credibility, from least to most credible: direct verbal claims (least credible) → personal sub-communication (verbal and nonverbal) → third-party signals → contextual signals → first-hand observation (most credible).

The Congruence Principle™
States that when signals conflict, people trust the one that scores higher on cost, difficulty to fake, and lack of bias, not the louder or more repeated one.

The Leakage Principle™ (corollary of the Congruence Principle)
States that unintentional, lower-value signals tend to be more credible than deliberate claims, since self-interest incentivizes signalers to inflate their deliberate signals, making the involuntary "leaks" the more trustworthy tell.

Signaling ROI™ (and signaling ROI matrix):
The ratio of perceived value gained to signaling cost. High Signaling ROI comes from low (perceived) effort signals and Low Signaling ROI comes from effortful, easily-detected, high-neediness signals (direct bragging, verbal claims with no backing).

Currency Hardness™ refers to the breadth of social appeal of a given social currency. Hard currencies are universally valued, while soft currencies have limited appeal.

Judge credit awarding: to persuade others to act while providing emotional rewards -approval, compliments, public praise, etc.-, or by stopping negative emotional punishments -disapproval, criticism, avoidance, etc.-.

Explanation:
This is the judge role within social exchanges.
Rather than give back anything concrete, the judge can prod others into action through emotional rewards and punishments alone.
Women can sometimes use this technique with men and within relationships.
As a rule of thumb, watch out for people who use judge roles and seek judge frames within social exchanges: it's often a manipulative approach.

Example: "if you can do this for me, I will love you for ever".
Inverse psychology can also be used. For example "no way anyone could ever do this", which implies that if you do it, you're uniquely awesome, and you will get the judge full emotional rewards.

- Imaginary generosity (AKA: "easy social scalping"): it refers to providing value, help, or support in hypothetical situations that have not happened in real life. Most of the times, imaginary generosity refers to situations that are unlikely to happen in real life, or that cannot happen since they refer to the past.
  Anon in the forums correctly analyzed and conceptualized this power move

Explanation: the social credit scalper can gain some social capital by showing his willingness to help and support. Whether his stated intentions would have translated in actual value-giving and effective help and support is a moot point.

Example: “man, if I was there when you were jobless and down on your luck, I would have introduced you to my hiring buddies and got you a good job”

Fraudulent credit awarding: To exaggerate or to outright make up the extent that a person will award social credit if a certain action or favor is performed.
Once the action is performed, the manipulator will then either quickly forget, or renege on his promise to pay back.

Explanation:
Fraudulent credit is a form of social exchange manipulation.
It can be achieved with an outright lie -direct exchange talk-, credit inflating -“you will save my life”, or indirectly by exaggerating the severity of one’s own situation -“crying wolf”-. “Crying wolf”, by exaggerating or dramatizing the extent of one’s woes, indirectly says “I’m in such a bad situation, that if you help me, you will have a big credit with me”.
Albeit it’s possible for wolf-criers to be grateful and pay back, most of them cry as part of a low-power, manipulative approach to social exchanges, and they never even considered the possibility of paying back.

Romancing: a milder and less manipulative form of social credit scalping in which the romancer seeks to increase his own credit, but without going too overboard

Explanation: Romancing happens when someone has indeed done something for you, or something that keeps the exchange win-win, and they exaggerate and embellish their contribution, or the work they had to put in to make it happen.

Pro-sociality suppression phenomenon (AKA: “good guy punishing”): in social exchanges and public good games, to punish (“antisocial punishment”) or criticize (“do-gooder derogation”) overly collaborative or altruistic individuals.

Pro-sociality suppression strategy (AKA: “good guy punishing”): to punish overly collaborative or altruistic individuals in order to decrease competition for social status and reputation, or to enter into value-adding deals or social-exchanges.
Credit to Stef for flagging this strategy and coming up

Explanation: very collaborative individuals make it harder for less collaborative ones to enter into win-win social exchanges, and they make them “look bad” from a reputation point of view.
Pleasant & Barclay suggest that the “good guy punishment” can be a social strategy that low cooperators use to avoid looking bad when high cooperators escalate cooperation.
However, “good-guy punishing” can be a fair strategy when “naive collaborators” demand too little value in return and start a “race to the bottom”. Think of punishing strikebreakers, for example, who are making it too easy for the owners and damaging all other employees (more here).

Social Hit and Run: to get value from someone, and then disappear from that specific interaction, or in general, in order to avoid giving any value back.

Explanation:
Social hit and run is about taking value and disappearing.
After someone gets value, the expectation of a collaborative, “fair” exchange would be to give some value back.
Giving value back might be as simple as acknowledging that value was given, and replying with a “thanks” or with anything that shows gratitude for the value given (emotional value-repaying).
instead, by taking and disappearing, the social hitter and runner turns a potentially win-win interaction into a win-lose.
Social hit and run can save some time and/or resources for the hitter and runner, but comes at the cost of depleting social capital vis-a-vis the original value giver. And, if public, it can come at a rather high social cost through the loss of social reputation and status.

Example:
We coined this term in the forum for those who ask a question, get value through a reply or feedback, and then fail to either give value back, either with an update about their (improved) sitution, or by simply saying “thanks” to the person who replied.
Similar “hit and run” situations occur in person as well, of course.

Social Status: in social dynamics and social hierarchies, a measure of a person’s value as seen and assessed by others.

Explanation: many different factos go into social status, and those factors can vary depending on the individual who’s assessing the status, and the environemnt. For example, in mafia organization, “honor” and “defending one’s honor” are important, while in a club getting bottle service is enough to confer high status within that environment. Social status roughly matches the power and level within dominance hierarchies, but in structured organizations the “rank” or “title” usually confers more power and authority than social status.

- Status-giving: any action, words, or frame, that increases the status of the receiver
  - Giving back status: to give back status after status was taken away
- Status-taking: any action, words, or frame, that disempowers the receiver
  - Retaking back status: techniques and strategies to re-gain status
- Status-protecting: to position or phrase a potentially power-taking action or sentence in a way that does not take power from the receiver, or that takes less power from the receiver

Status symbol: in social dynamics, a prized possession to indicate a person’s superior wealth or high social status.

Trojan Horse Value: the act of giving something to someone that seems value-adding on the surface, but that actually turns out to be value-taking.
Thanks to Ali.

Example: a good chunk of “feel good” self-help might be considered “trojan horse value”,as it makes people feel good in the short run, it costs them time and/or resources, but delivers no value in the long run.

Trust, social ™: in social dynamics, social trust refers to trusting and feel comfortable with someone.

Trust tends to develop over time and over social exposure. When first meeting someone, trust tends to be low. Meeting people through friends and recommendations though helps “jumpstart” social trust. A great reputation also increases and jumpstarts trust.

Explanation: Low trust means little leverage over people, while high trust means more leverage.
Low trust also means lost opportunities for win-win, since people don’t enter exchanges when they fear defection. This is highly relevant in both business as well as seduction. You can have interested prospects who still don’t deal or meet with you because they can’t (yet) fully trust you.

- Social trust fund: the amount of trust you have with someone

Value, social: In social exchanges, social value is an umbrella term for everything that makes people better off and thus that they want and appreciate (value-positive), or for what makes them worse off and thus that they dislike and avoid (value-taking)

- Passive value: value that exists before an exchange even takes people. Explanation: Attractive people or people with a good reputation tend to be perceived as value-positive and potential value-givers even before they even interact with anyone.

Explanation: High-value people are generally value-positive people who provide -or who could provide- what others want.
For the simple fact that they do -or can- give lots of value, high-value people are wanted and sought after.

Value-taking people instead make others worse off, and for this simple reason, they are shunned and avoided. Being high value or providing value creates “social capital”.

Value presupposing: in influence and sales, to “guess” and presuppose what the relevant “value proposition” will be to the receiver.

Explanation: To “guess” what someone might value, appreciate, or want (their “WIIFM”), and to craft your pitch around that presupposition.

Example: “so if we do this podcast together it will showcase your material to my community and help you reach more people within the LGBT community”.
This message presupposed that the receiver cases about “showcasing his material” and that he ares about reaching more LGBT folks.

Vulturing: to take advantage of negative social dynamics to pile up, attack, or thread expand on someone’s mistakes.

Example: the boss seems to be losing his patience with employee B in a 3-persons meeting. Employee C, knowing full well that his colleague hasn’t yet had the time to start the customer report asks “at what point are we with the report?”
Vulturing cna also blend with general nasty social climbing. An example is to butt-in during a disagreement and/or argument to gain more “social clout” for one’s own opinions during a time when everyone is more attentive. If a high-status member is involved, the vulture can seek to gain even bigger by siding against the higher status member. Lucio also noticed this in the forum sometimes as well.

- Emotional vulturing: to purposefully create, incite, or amplify disagreements and problems in order to gain some personal relevance that makes the emotional vulture feel important.

Similar: ganging up

Social Value

There are two types of social value:

- Personal value: more related to intrinsic and genetic traits such as intelligence, looks, and character
- Exchange value: more related to external resources such as status and money, and to what one can do with behavior and social cues, such as gratitude, favors, etc.

The two together form ‘total value’, or the full value that people can trade in social exchanges for connections, work opportunities, and dating and mating opportunities.

- High value man: A high-value man is a man who possesses more traits and resources that make him socially and sexually attractive than traits that make him unattractive, enabling him to achieve goals and be a net value-giver to those around him
- Low value man: A low-value man is a man who possesses more traits that make him unattractive than traits that make him socially and sexually attractive, is less likely to achieve goals, and is more likely to be a value taker than a value giver.
- Low value woman: a woman who possesses more traits that make her social and sexually unattractive than traits that make her attractive
  - From a high value man’s perspective: and who is more likely to be a net taker on a high-value man’s life
- High value woman: a woman who possesses more traits that make her socially and sexually attractive than traits that make her unattractive
  - From a high value man’s perspective: and who is more likely to be a net giver in a high-value man’s life

Value-Taking

Abuse: in power dynamics and manipulation, to treat someone with contempt (emotional abuse), cruelty, and/or violence (physical abuse).
Abuse can be value-adding for the abuser (win-lose), or value-taking for both (lose-lose). But, in the short term, abuse is always value-taking for the victim.

- Proxy abusers (AKA: flying monkeys): people who support and/or act on behalf of an abuser towards a third party, usually for an abusive purpose. Proxy abusers are either allies of the abuser, or are doing the abuser's bidding because they believed the lies and/or are being used as pawns in the abuser's hands

Abusive techniques: in manipulation and abuse, abusive techniques are recurring methods and patterns ("games"), that people use to abuse others, control others, or keep others subjugated power-down

- Dread game: a general umbrella term to control a spouse through fear, including fear of loss (direct or indirect breakup threats), fear of cheating (sexual triangulations, jealousy, flirting with others, etc.), fear of missing out, or fear of physical abuse.
  Seeking to control others through fear alone is a form of "value-taking mindset"
- Sexual triangulation: the act of introducing a new real or potential sexual partner to an already sexually and/or emotionally bonded partner. There are many ways of instigating sexual triangulations, including through previous lovers, parading suitors, or directly talking about other dates (see an example of direct sexual triangulation).

Aggression: in social and power dynamics, words, tonality and body language that communicate anger or exasperation.
Aggression can be physical aggression. But even when it's still only at a verbal level, it often sub-communicates the willingness, readiness, or the state of mind for a possible physical attack.
In the submission-assertion-aggression continuum, aggression often refers to overreaction and to a failure of proper assertive communication.

- Aggressive push-pull: a technique to dominate and control the frame consisting of aggressing first, and then pulling back. The pull back can be a compliment, a more friendly joke, or simply saying "I was just kidding man, you're a cool guy".
  Explanation: aggressive push-pull can help dominate others and control the frame without necessarily breaking rapport.
  Example: see this thread and video

- Argument ad potentia: to win an argument not by virtue of logics and facts, but by power, dominance, or intimidation.
  Explanation: When people start defending and submitting, they can look guilty by behavior, rather than by logic and facts.
  Example: see Trump's debating techniques here and here.

- Covert aggression: to aggress someone in indirect ways. Also see the main entry.
- Micro-aggression: small scale aggressions. Also see the main entry.
- Smug microaggression: to attack and diminish someone's status with a "smart alec attitude". Often, smug micro-aggressions are actually a form of "covert aggression" or "micro-covert aggression".

Availability ™: in social dynamics and seduction, it refers to how available an individual feels to others. High availability with high-value is the hallmark of social charmers who uplift others. But high availability with low value is useless.

Similar: personal value, SMV, self-rejection, rapport, pulling/pushing.

- Availability, seduction: in seduction, it refers to how attainable a man is to a woman, and how attainable she feels he is. If a woman feels a man is unattainable, no matter how high SMV he might be, she will reject him (self-rejection)
- Attainability: Availability in pick-up and seduction circles, originally from Sebastian Drake. The concept is valid for all social settings, so we called it "availability" and enlarged its scope to all social exchanges.

Babying, power move ™: a power move that frames the (covert) aggressor as a father/mother figure and frames the target as a baby. The power mover frames himself as more mature, powerful, emotionally stable and/or knowledgeable.
A babying frame can also be used in seduction and, when used by men, can also help advance the seduction.

Backhanded compliment: in social and power dynamics, a compliment that truly hides an insult.
It's a specific type of covert insult, and how much a backhanded compliment is an insult or compliment varies depending on the wording, the delivery, and the situation.

Example: "ThePowerMoves.com is a good website on power dynamics" might be interpreted as a 20% compliment and 80% offense if one considers ThePowerMoves.com to be the first, best, and only website dedicated to power dynamics.

Bag dropping: in social and power dynamics, it consists of introducing someone to an individual or a group with low-value people and/or negative dynamics at play, and then leaving immediately after.
Explanation: it's a power move that makes the bag dropper look socially powerful and magnanimous, but in truth, he is getting rid of a social liability.
Example: You can see an example in this forum entry.

- Bag sharing: introducing someone to a low value individual or group to "share" the bad situation
- Manipulative bag dropping: the bag dropper pretends he is adding value
- Bag holder: the person who is left with a low-value individual, or is stuck in a value-draining group or situation

TPM Female Relationship Control Model: A behavioral framework describing how control shifts in relationships through higher value positioning, investment differential based on value positioning, moral authority (judge role), emotional pressure (drama/nagging), behavioral compliance (tasking), and identity enforcement (shame). The model explains how acceptance of covert frames leads to psychological and material investment, internalization of standards, and long-term power asymmetry.

Similar:
'Betaization: the tendency of some men to become tamer and more submissive when in a long-term relationship.
"Betaization" is a term of Red Pill communities, and on this website we use the term "domestication".
Read here a description of the dynamics betaization

Big fish, small pond strategy: a strategy of focusing one's effort in acquiring status and power within a relatively small, specific, and circumscribed group or locality.

Explanation: most people unwittingly follow a strategy of seeking status within a circumscribed niche.
Some people also seek refuge within small ponds when they can get validation within that pond. For example, club queens with an average life enjoy clubbing because of the validation they get there and that they don't normally get outside of it.

- Fried fish: when an individual gave up his ego (ego-loss) and life for a specific group (pond), but the group has vanished (dried out pond)
- Big fish, small pond syndrome: to become so overly invested into a specific group (pond), that the group becomes the only way for the individual (fish) to receive personal validation and to feel alive

Bro science: an extreme form of pop-psychology, most often brandished by men not as a way of informing with facts, but as a way of gaining status by instructing others and by acquiring the role of “expert” on a given subject. Women, being on average less status-conscious than men, don’t do it nearly as much, so there is not widely circulating equivalent term for women.

Brother in arms / sister in arms ™: in life strategies and power dynamics, a strong ally you can rely on.

Burning stakes power moves ™: the act of calling out for (digital) lynching, retributions, or boycotts against a largely made-up enemy (a strawman enemy).
Purists, moralizers, and populists are the figures that engage the most in burning stakes power moves. But SJW can also go for as a way of virtue-signal.
Obviously,y this is a nasty power move and an extremely lopsided form of win-lose.

- Burning stake ™: the (figurative) location where shaming attacks and the most extreme moralization power moves are consumed.
  These days, the burning stake locations happen to be more often online than in the physical world.
- Burning stake shows ™: the public consummation of the retribution, punishment, or payback against a supposedly guilty and monstrous individual (a straw man).

Burning stakes are where the collective thirst for masochism and toxic quests for power sublimate. The darker, evil side of the individuals who organize and enjoy burning stake shows hides behind made-up or largely inflated charges.
People who enjoy burning stakes also often seek a release valve for the feelings of inadequacy and personal failures.

Example:

Buy in: in persuasion strategies, the individual’s acceptance, willingness, and conviction to actively support and participate in something.

Calibration, social: in social and power dynamics, the act of adapting one’s own behavior and responses to the individual and/or situation.
Explanation: calibration is what differentiates the beginner students of power dynamics and social arts, and the advanced students. Most general advice is useless for those who seek mastery, since it lacks in calibration and results in calibration failure.

- Calibration failure: the failure of adapting to the specific individual or situation.
- Over-reacting: a failure of calibration by reacting or answering too strongly, usually too aggressively or too angrily.
  See for example "calibrating to micro-aggression".

Cementing ™: in power dynamics and frame negotiation, it consists of expanding and solidifying the thread of the "agreement reached" to solidify the new frame and increase its effectiveness.

Explanation: Frame cementing increases the likelihood that the other party will stick to the new negotiated frame, and/or it increases the likelihood that your persuasion will be internalized and accepted as the new reality (VS just agreeing with your frame as a form of short-term capitulation).

- Cementing appreciation: a compliment, praise, (positive) evaluation, or a general sign of appreciation that comes at the end of a frame.
  It can reinforce the value-giving of the original frame if it's honest, which is most often the case, but it can also empower and strengthen the value-taking effects of the initial frame if the initial frame was value-taking.

Explanation: the appreciation reinforces the frame. It also serves to put a "seal", a stamp of approval on the frame, which often turns the appreciator into a "judge" (= "I'm appreciating/judging you for being good").
The appreciation or positive evaluation make it harder to fight the frame because not only it strengthens the initial frame or label but, being apparently kind and value-giving, it makes the receiver feel ungrateful for rebelling against the compliment.

Example: "Bravo!", "well done", "congratulations!"

Similar: similar to covert framing compliments, but the "cementing compliment" comes at the end of the frame. The two can sometimes co-exist together, like in this example.

- Self-cementing: self-cementing is a property of frames that tend to cement themselves when they unchallenged.
  Explanation: if a frame goes unchallenged, then people's subconscious tends to derive that the frame is valid, and real.
  This is especially true for value-taking frames and (micro)-aggressions, since people think that if the person who lost value had the power and skills to challenge the frame, he would have.
  Hence, it must mean that he did not have the power or skills to challenge the frame. Meaning, it's true that the value-taker must be of higher power /status.
  Example: If a guy jokes about you being an idiot and you let it go, then the fact that you're an idiot becomes more and more of a reality for the people around. And the fact that he is of higher status/power and "better" than you also becomes a reality.

Chameleon, social: an individual who can socialize seamlessly in the most disparate social groups.
The best social chameleons don't just socialize in different groups, but are able to gain status and rise through the ranks of any group they join.

Character assassination: in power dynamics and frame control, to go after an individual's history, reputation, and personal flaws instead of addressing his arguments.

Note: be careful with character assassination, it makes you come across as petty, morally bankrupt, and lacking real arguments.

Example: Ray Dalio used character assassination when he went after the reputation of a critical journalist and, as a consequence, looked petty… And guilty.

Cognitive biases: in psychology, cognitive biases are systematic patterns of deviation from what would be expected in “perfect rationality”.

Some critics made the case that not all cognitive biases are irrational, but can be effective ways of reaching non-perfect, but often-good-enough conclusions with minimum cognitive effort.
Some evolutionary psychologists also point out that from the point of view of evolution, cognitive biases are not necessarily “mistakes”, but can provide a survival advantage even while deviating from “perfect rationality” (Buss, 2019 and Pinker, 1997)

Cold-blooded: see “icy men”. Also see “Slavic men“.

Conspicuous consumption: the act of carelessly spending money as a way to ostentatiously display an abundance of money and resources.
It can be a very effective technique of gaining both social status and sexual attention.

Covert Power Moves

Covert aggression: a form of aggression, bullying, or attempt at dominating others that is partially hidden.

Explanation: Covert aggression is often hidden with indirect talk, humor, nonverbal expressions of disapproval but without words, and/or sayings or expressions which seem to apply to the victim but are not directly addressing the victim.
Covert aggression can be highly upsetting because the victim knows it’s aggression, but cannot easily address it without in turn looking overly aggressive or touchy.
Once attacked back, the covert aggressor will often pretend he “meant no harm” and “was just joking”, and frame the victim as “overreacting” and “overly-aggressive over nothing”. Handling covert aggression requires a certain mastery of power dynamics.

- Covert insult: a specific type of covert aggression that hides an insult behind a compliment or behind a facade of friendliness.
  Example: this Goodfellas’ example. “*This kid was great. They used to call him Spitshine Tommy. He’d make your shoes look like fu*kin’ mirrors He was terrific, he was the best. He made a lot of money too, ah salud, Tommy*.”
- Covert warfare: constant covert assaults protracted over time
- Self-denied assault: it consists of verbally denying that one wants to assault or offend someone, and then attacking them either throguh the denial itself, or soon after Example: “I don’t say that you’re stupid as a way of offending you, but as simple description of reality”, or “I don’t mean to offend you, BUT…”. Or see Trump:

> Trump: I never attacked him on his looks, and believe me, there is plenty of subject matter right there

- Smug covert aggression: to criticize or allude at someone’s faults with a “smart alec” approach. It can be done with a proverb, a saying, or a foreign or Latin expression.
  Example: you are telling someone why you disagree with them. And to avoid taking your reply seriously, they say “Condemnant quo non intelligent”. And they later explain it means that “people condemn what they don’t understand”. Basically, it’s a double covert aggression. Before they go smug, quoting Latin. Then, they covertly imply you’re too dumb to understand.

Covert framing compliment ™: a compliment, usually a description or an adjective, that sets a specific frame for the complimented. When the frame is seemingly positive but actually negative and value-taking, it becomes a covert power move and, potentially, a case of covert aggression as well.

Credit: Credit to Matthew for first spotting this power move.

Explanation: All descriptions of positive traits and all compliments delivered with an adjective, in a way, set a frame.

99% of them are value-adding and you don't need to worry about them.
The covert framing compliments you must be aware of are the ones that set a value-taking frame, or a frame that you don't be associated with.
Since the compliment is, apparently, value-giving and "kind", some people miss on the actual power of the frame and, if the frame is negative, it can either slip under the radar, or be more difficult to challenge.
Even people who get annoyed by the frame of the compliment can find it more difficult to fight it because, on the surface, the complimenter was being kind and value-giving.

Example: "that's going to be interesting for an intellectual like you" frames you as an intellectual; "you're always such an optimist" frames you as an optimist.
See an example here.

Similar to: it's similar to using a compliment to "cement" a frame, but rather than coming at the end of the frame to "seal" and "confirm" the frame, the compliment itself is a frame.
The two can also go hand in hand in the same sentence, as in the example linked above.

Covert manipulation ™: covert manipulation is manipulation that nudges and persuades others to act in the way the manipulator wants them to act, but without the manipulator having to expose himself too directly.
For example, the manipulator may allude to something, or he may stoke fear and anger in his followers so they take action without him ever having to say "do it" or, God forbid, lead the charge himself.

Example: Trump never told his followers to "riot violently", he simply made them angry enough, and then kept repeating "see you the 6th of January", alluding that it was their last chance to have their voice heard.
But since he never said "be violent", he was at least able to later condemn violence and pretend he was being a magnanimous president.
See an example here.

Covert power moves ™: in power dynamics, covert power moves are power moves that are delivered in a guise that seems neutral, apologetic, or even value-adding or submissive, while actually increasing the power and/or status of the power mover, and potentially disempowering the victim.

Example: "I'm sorry that I made you feel so bad".

Explanation: while it apparently asks "sorry" for having made you feel bad, it also says that they can make you feel "so bad" and that they did make you feel "so bad". That means they have power and leverage over you, and it implies that they might make you feel "so bad" again in the future.

- Covert-criticism: to deliver criticism without exposing oneself, or while framing it as anything but criticism.
  Example: "look, you made some good points and don't take this the bad way, I'm only saying this for the good of our organization, BUT …"
  Explanation: criticism can decrease your status and increase the criticizer's status and reputation. But some players, loath of criticizing too directly, prefer to shoot from sheltered positions.

Similar: covert guilt-tripping, covert aggression

Covert requests: to start conversations or to approach people under a ruse, and only later on to indirectly seek or request help.
They can be a form of power scalping and social scalping, since they protect the asker's power, and reduce the asker's debt by avoiding direct requests.

Explanation: if I come to you and say "I need your help", that empowers you and disempowers me, since the "helper" is usually higher power than the help receiver.
From a social exchange point of view, if I ask for help and you start putting in the effort, everything that comes after that is social credit for you, and debt for me.
But if I can get that help "indirectly", without requesting, then, well… You offered it, I never asked for it. My power is intact, and my debt is much smaller.

Example:

> Covert requester: “hey man, I was just passing by and thought about “why not stopping by and say hi to that great guy”
> You: “oh, thanks man, how are you doing”
> Covert requester: “great, great, lemme invite you for a quick beer”

Over the beer, the covert requester starts complaining about his relationships/business/life.
He wanted someone to listen to, and someone to give advice. But he never directly asked for any.

Covert question: covert questions are techniques and ways to gather information and input from others, without directly asking a question.
Techniques of “covert questioning” include hiding a question behind a statement, an objection, an analysis, a complaint, a list of things we’ve done but didn’t work, an or attack against someone or a third party.
They can be a form of power scalping and social scalping, since they reduce the asker’s debt by avoiding direct requests.

Explanation: a question puts the asker in a position of weakness. The asker admits he doesn’t know something, while the person who answers is in a position of power for having the information and the “expertise”.
Even if the person who answers doesn’t really have any answer, the person who asks still advertises his ignorance with the simple fact that he had to ask.
This is why some people prefer to hide their question behind a statement, analysis, or objection. If people confirm, they were right and, they didn’t “lose” any power. And if they were wrong, they get the answer without asking directly

Albeit covert questions have their place, this website generally advises avoiding them as a pattern of behavior since they communicate a lack of antifragile ego and growth mindset.
Furthermore, covert questions are social scalping in nature (credit-erasing), because by hiding the question, they don’t give the responder the credit for their help.

Example:

> “John, this computer is acting stupid, I can’t even log-in to the email (you guys in support should provide us better laptops than this crap you give out)“.

By laying the blame on the computer, the person above avoids the difficult words of “John, can you please help me”.
That covert request for help denies John of his fair social credit for helping out.
If he keeps on going with his blame game and blames the support team for providing poor equipment, he goes even a step further and not only denies John credit, but increases his debt (even though the issue might all be due to his ignorance).

Relating Power Move
The cover is to relate.
Legit relating is a great technique to power-protect, bond, and make others feel good and accepted.
It’s part of “normalizing” whatever one says or may feel bad about.
The mis-use of relating to instead thread-expands and make the victim’s situation seem larger and worse, while also social climbing to show that they “solved it and moved on”.

Example:
Yeah, I understand. Before I learned this, like you I also was constantly making a fool of myself.

Dark psychology: the use of psychological principles in ways that harm the target

Similar: value-taking behavior, value-taking leadership

Dark triad: in psychology, the dark triad refers to the three different but sometimes related personality traits/disorders of psychopathy, narcissism, and Machiavellianism.

Machiavelliasm: a personality trait of self-centered and amoral individuals who pursue personal advancement through a calculative, rational, and opportunistic approach to life

- Effective Machiavellianism™: the ultimate stage of strategically optimizating the Machiavellian trait, taking the functional strengths—rationality, emotional coolness, adaptability, and strategic thinking—while removing maladaptive tendencies like excessive cynicism. It treats Machiavellianism as an amoral, neutral toolset capable of delivering high-level effectiveness, while reducing the costs to maximize life quality.
- Strategic Machiavellianism™: the process of dialing Machiavellianism for maximim effectiveness
- Honorable Machiavellianism™: to place honor, a preference for win–win, and the ultimate goal of adding value as the baseline approach, while adding Machiavellian traits whenever necessary

Narcissism: a personality trait of grandiosity, self-centeredness, and craving for status and admiration

- Effective Narcissism™: the ultimate stage of strategically optimizing narcissism, taking the functional strengths while removing maladaptive tendencies like excessive cynicism.
- Strategic Narcissism™: the process of developing empowering narcissistic traits while removing or avoiding the maladaptive ones (ie.: rivalry, fragility, and entitlement)
- Honorable Narcissism™: to place honor, a preference for win–win, and the ultimate goal of adding value as the baseline approach, while adding the benefits of high agency, social boldness, and antifragile grandiosity
- Antifragile Grandiosity™: It synthesizes the high-agency benefits of grandiose narcissism—such as unmitigated confidence and visionary drive—while replacing ego fragility, entitlement, and defensive reactivity with the psychological resilience of an antifragile ego.

- Effective Psychopathy™: it's not about being antisocial, it's the ultimate stage of strategically optimizing psychopathy, taking the functional strengths while removing maladaptive, self-harming traits
- Strategic Psychopathy™: the process of developing empowering traits sometimes associated with psychopathy while removing or avoiding the maladaptive ones (ie.: disinhibition, externalizing, etc.)
- Honorable Psychopathy™: to place honor, a preference for win–win, and the ultimate goal of adding value as the baseline approach, while adding the benefits of more positive traits such as boldness. It's TPM's favored and recommended approach

- Dark tetrad: the dark triad plus sadism. Cruelty is not a means to an end, but a pleasurable end in itself
- Defensive mindset: a mindset of those who focus more on the risks of loss and defeat, than on the opportunities of victory and win-win.
- Explanation: people with a defensive mindset are more likely to miss out on opportunities for win-win and collaboration.

Similar to: defector mindset, fearful defector, risk-avoidance, pessimism, nihilism.

Dehumanizing: the act of framing, addressing, or describing the victim in a way that is so base, inferior, or monstrous, as to lack basic human qualities.

Dehumanization has been described as an enabler of evil (Zimbardo, 2007), because when someone lacks basics human qualities, then it means that it's fair to treat him as an insect.

- Objectification: a milder form of dehumanization.
- Sexual objectification: the act of seeing, or treating an individual as an object for personal sexual pleasure

Examples: the most common examples of dehumanization refer to genocides, but dehumanizations are also common in our daily lives. Calling women "plates", for example, is a small act of dehumanization.

Deny-Me Games™: deny-me games are a manipulative social technique that consists of purposefully fielding questions or requests for favors that the victim is, for whatever reason, forced to deny.
The perpetrator then gains social credit for having been denied once, while the victim incurs in social debt, accompanied by a sense of guilt, for having refused a favor.
The perpetrator then exploits the favorable social exchange to get more out of the social interaction.

- Deny to get denied: a specific type of deny-me games consisting of getting purposefully denied first, to later deny the victim and make it seem like it was a fair exchange.
  See how you can use it to avoid sharing a windfall.

Difficult people: an umbrella term for all types of people who are difficult to deal with.

- haughty / consdescending / pompous / know-it-alls
- whiners / complainers
- irresponsible / lazy / indifferent
- negative / overly critical
- rude / insensitive
- overly sensitive / thin-skinned
- creeps / weird / stalkey / socially clueless

Direct talk: in communication and social dynamics, a style of communication that goes directly to the crux of the matter, wasting no time in preambles or in cushioning potentially difficult subjects.

- Direct talk bully: aggressors, bullies, and manipulators will sometimes hide their aggression or darker social strategies behind the guise of "direct talk". If you complain, direct bullies will flip the frame and pride themselves of "calling a spade a spade". Don't fall for that. Abuse is unacceptable, no matter how it's delivered.

Disqualifying: in social and seduction strategies, telling the target that you're not interested in them because of a certain trait they lack and that you seek. The idea is to remove the frame that you are chasing them, and to make them chase you

- Self-disqualifying: to provide a reason why you are not pursuing the target.
  Example: in seduction, to say "I'm gay" or "I'm in a relationship" (if they're false, they're also called "false disqualifiers")

Domestication™: in social and power dynamics, the process by which an individual loses certain rebellious or more selfish traits and characteristics while acquiring more cooperative and conforming traits and qualities that make him a better fit for life with a certain group or with a certain person.
While domestication is usually good for society, the group, or for the individual who domesticates, it's up to discussion and interpretation whether it's good or not for the domesticated.

- Social domestication: the process by which individuals internalize the social rules of "proper" conduct
- Professional domestication: the process by which individuals learn to live and operate within a business organization

- Female domestication™: the process with which women bring a man under their control. Much of domestication is made possible because women take the judge role, in most relationships.

Dominance: the more showy and obvious displays and signs of power. While power is about what you want in a myriad of way, dominance is usually about getting what you want by bending others to your will, or imposing your will.

Effectiveness, social: in social and power dynamics, social effectiveness relates to power and influence through people.
It includes the ability of building relationships, entering new social groups, acquiring status, persuading and influencing, or simply getting along with others.
Social effectiveness also includes the ability to manipulate, so social effectiveness alone is not synonymous with personal quality, and no guarantee that the effectiveness will be used for win-win and/or value-adding purposes.

Empathic one-up: to put oneself in someone else's shoes, not as a way of understanding them or to validate them, but to one-up them. It can be used to win an argument, generally disempower an opponent, or to self-frame as superior.

Example: "If someone did to me what I did to you, I'd be happy about it, because I have a learner's mindset, I appreciate honesty, and I can grow from direct feedback".

Explanation: empathic one-up can be a manipulative and covert power move that feigns understanding, but it's actually used as a tool to win an argument or disempower an opponent.
It can also be used as a gaslighting technique, because it suggests that they are the problem, and if it was us -or someone else- in their shoes, then everything would be OK.
Empathic one-upping can also unnerve the opponent, as many people don't know how t oreact to it.

Solution: you can use the mirror technique and empathically one-up them back. For example "if you were in my shoes, you wouldn't have to deal with this anyway, because if I were in your shoes, I would have been far kinder and gracious".
Or ignore it and go back to the issue: "I'm not sure about that, but let's avoid hypoethical situations, and let's stick to the facts. How about… "
Or use it for a resolution: "Thanks for the idea of putting ourselves in each other's shoes. Let's keep doing that. Trust me that I were in your shoes and you had asked me to do X, I would have listened to you. Now I undesrtand that you don't have time, but could you consider… ".

Fanatics: a fanatic is an extreme moralizer, purist, or populist politician with strong convictions and black and white views that can come across as charismatic.
Fanatics are often power-craving narcissists. If they can rally enough support to get to power, democracy and meritocracy are the first victims, often followed by plummeting quality of life for the citizen.
Fanatics often use extreme forms of straw-manning, make up enemies, and indulge in dehumanizations.
Examples: Lenin, Jim Jones, and Hitler are examples of fanatics.

Feinter, manipulative ™: the manipulative feinter professes to adhere to a set of supposedly ethical rules.
His main motive though is to look trustworthy, gain social status, and disempower others. He then often defects on those same standards he professes.
Most manipulative feinters embrace seemingly prosocial causes (prosocial feints, see below).

Similar: SJW, virtue-signaling

Scalping, proscial™: the act of feigning adherence to a set of rules as a strategy for personal power and personal success.

- Scalping, prosocial freeriding ™: the ethical rules the feinter professes to embrace happen to be costly to the individual, but good for society at large.
  Example: a married man encourages other men never to sleep with taken women. But he then does sleep with taken women
- Pro-group freeriding scalping™: the feinter professes adherence and support to a specific group and invites others to do the same. He then either defects privately, or enjoys more success because he effectively disempowered the competition.
  Example: feminist encourages women to be strong and independent. That makes the sexual marketplace easier for her, since women become generally less attractive as feminists
- Leaders' pro-group scalping™: the leader of a group talks up the importance of belonging, contribution, and sacrifice for the group the ideal behavior. But he only does so because prosocial members are good for the group, which is ultimately good for the leader

Festering ™: in social dynamics, the negative feelings that expand and envelop a person's mind after a negative experience. Festering is more pronounced in people who tend to ruminate, but it happens to almost anyone.
People who get good at social dynamics know that when a negative event like a rejection, a social faux pas, or an unwilling offense happens, they need to rebuild good feelings right away, or the silence will invite festering.

Example: if she rejects a sexual attempt or an invite home, the man must brush it off and engage in more rapport-building talk to rebuild goodwill and avoid festering.
See an example here.

Firestarter, Social ™: see "pyromaniac".
A firestarter feigns being shocked, angry, and scandalized to frame others as unworthy just like a pyromaniac does. But he does not necessarily do so on a continuous, daily basis (yet).

Frame / Frame Control

Frame: in power dynamics and frame control strategies, a frame is a set of beliefs, values, and perspectives with which people negotiate meaning. The "meaning" includes how they interpret and see the world, a specific topic, or simply how they interpret and negotiate the social interaction between them.

Covert frames ™: frames and assumptions that are set up without direct talk but that often influence meaning and behavior more than explicit words rolling one's eyes to covertly frame someone as "boring", "weird" or, generally "not good enough".

Example:
You can see an example of covert frames, as well as strategies on how to handle them, in this forum topic.

Frame control: in power dynamics and frame control, the techniques and strategies to control the frames that govern social interactions.

- Agree and amplify: a technique to control the frame that consists in agreeing with whatever someone said, and then purposefully exaggerating to the point that it sounds silly or humorous.
  It's the most widely circulating technique for frame control, especially in pick-up and seduction, but it's not optimal, and ThePowerMoves.com does not recommend it as your go-to frame control technique.

- Frame individualization: a technique that diminishes someone's authority by severing the link to any external authority, and thus reducing someone's frame -or attack- to a simple personal opinion.
  Example: see this post for an example.
- Frame flipping: reframing that flips a narrative on its head from an obvious negative, to a positive

- Bridge Leading™: To manage the bridging from two different frames with the goal of maintaining the lead
- Engagement Frame Control™: choosing the terms of engagement and the contest arena that best suit your strengths or preferences, without backing down, and while rejecting their terms of engagement
- Philosopher's Frame™: to disagree or undermine an argument or speaker, while remaining unassailable by linking to broader and timeless general principles and truths.
- Frame Shaming™: using superior or superior-looking moral framing to gain power through ethical legitimacy and shame the other party as 'morally inferior'
- Frame Surfacing™: to 'surface' a covert power move to fully display the nastiness of an attack
- Frame Imposing™: to hold your frame as the only possible option and refuse to yield , even at the cost of friction
- High Power Amplification™: To agree and amplify frames that empower you

Moral high-ground: in frame control and power dynamics, it consists of attacking others from a position of self-righteous moral "rightness", which in turn frames the victim as "morally bankrupt", mean, cruel, and generally worth of social ostracization.

- High-grounding: it's the battle for the moral high-ground, something that does not come natural

Explanation: moral attacks and shame attacks are based on the attacker self-framing himself as morally superior - ie.: "taking the moral high-ground", and framing the victim as morally inferior.

- High-grounding: it's the battle for the moral high-ground, something that does not come natural to most people but that's often a great way of fighting moral and shame attacks
  Example: if someone were to accuse the author of Power Univesity for asking too much money for the course and for being a money grabber, I might "high-ground" by saying that what's really low and amoral is asking to get great value without giving anything back.
  Also see an example here.

One-up / one-down / one-across: a framework to analyze power dynamics in frames.
One-up means empowering the frame-setter and disempowering the frame accepter, one-down means accepting the one-up frame and/or giving away power (submitting), while one-acrosses are generally power-neutral answers to frames, often useful to buy time and/or find out more about the frame setter's intentions

Self-framing™: self-framing is what the frames says about the person who sets the frame.

Explanation:
frames don't just communicate information about the world and the interaction, but they also say something about the framer.

Example:
If someone frames you as inept with a joke, they are also self-framing themselves as more intelligent, skilled and "better" than you are.
Also, they frame themselves as higher power and higher-status for the simple fact that they can make fun of you.
If you let that frame slip with submissivness or acquiescence, you confirm that frame.

- Thread-Expanding™: To expand the effect and/or time spent on a certain frame
- Thread-Minimizing™: To minimize the effect and/or time spent on a certain frame
- Frame Cementing™: To expand and solidify a resolution or agreement

Frenemy: in social and power dynamics, an envious friend who prefers to see us fail than succeed.

- Schadenfreude: the feeling of happiness for other people's misfortune. Frenemies experience Schadenfreude with their friends

Opposite: vicarious happiness, such as the feeling of happiness for other people's happiness

Similar: passive-aggressive, undermining, Schadenfreude

Games of chicken: in power dynamics, social gambits where one player binds the victim into a 2 options outcome: accepting their requests, or incurring a lose-lose outcome.
The victim of games of chicken feels like it's either they give in, or they will bear the costs and responsibility for everyone's losses.

Example: Break-up threats are an example of games of chicken. The victim either accepts what the threatener asks, or he will set off the lose-lose outcome of the relationship loss

Games: in social and power dynamics, games are patterns of behavior that repeat over time.

Ganging up, social ™: in social and power dynamics, to join forces and form alliances with other individuals in an effort to isolate, mute, ridicule, or generally overpower someone.
Ganging up is most obvious when physical, as well with official voting systems, when several people with voting rights can block or override someone's initiative.
It can be more subtle in free-flowing social dynamics though, and it can be used strategically to achieve social goals and forge alliances.

Example:

> Attacker: (spills water on the desk, then turns towards guy 2) hey man, come on, pay some more attention
> Ally: (gangs up on guy 2) yeah dude, really, watch out

Attacker and ally gang up on guy 2, starting one-upping joking frame in which it was guy 2 who spilled the water, when it fact it was the attacker.

It can also be premeditated to put someone in the minority group and make it more difficult for him to disagree or say no.
See Bel's example in a work context.

Explanation: Everyone knows it was the attacker who made the mistake but ganging up has far more reaching consequences than a simple bumbling move. It says that guy 2 is isolated, while the gangbangers are allied and can overpower him.
The "joke" of blaming guy 2 is also a veiled threat: the gangbangers might blatantly lie, turn the joke into a serious accusation. And then it's two against one.

Solution: in the example above, a good solution is to shame them, and go slightly meta, denying the joking frame. For example: "dude, what are you like 12? If you need help let me know and I'm happy to help, otherwise, don't play those games on me".

- Manipulative ganging up (AKA "false gang"): the power mover frames the conversation as if the group, or an imaginary group, is against the target, creating a "non-existing gang".
  The group may have never expressed any cohesive opinion or attitude against the target and, in some cases, the group may be neutral or even be closer to the target than to the manipulator.
  However, when the target buys into the manipulator's frame he gives up on the opportunity to sway the group to his side.
  When the target buys into the manipulator's frame he is the co-creator of the new frame and reality where it's him against everyone else -and he can further dig his own hole if he starts breaking rapport and/or get aggressive against the full group.
  Solution: reject and surface that the group has taken sides, always challenge the power mover only, and win the group to your side (remember: this is a battle for group support and group leadership). Ideally, isolate the power mover and surface that he was being a nasty manipulator.

Thanks to Bel.

- Value-adding ganging-up: albeit the term "ganging up" conjures thoughts of abuse, ganging up can be used strategically to isolate troublemakers or value-taking individuals. You can see an example of value-adding social ganging up in this entry in my journal.

Giving Rope: In social and power dynamics, as well as in manipulation, a technique to covertly prod and invite people to ruin their own reputation, by themselves.
Example: to ask a bragging man for more details about his story, so he brags even more, taking too much time from the group (value-taking behavior), and while looking like a lying, hot air status inflater.
A similar technique is to show skepticism someone is able to do something, so they will try even harder to convince everyone of their prowess.

Godfather, style: in power dynamics, a style of dominance that is calm and understated. The Godfather style talks little, uses lots of pauses, and remains calm and unreactive when under attack, pondering his next move in total emotional detachment.
Can seem similar to the icy man, but contrary to the icy man, the Godfather feels and cares about the people around him. But he switches on when getting down to business.

Godfather, the: a landmark movie on mafia dons with much to learn from.

Goodwill: in social and power dynamics, as well as in social exchanges, it refers to the positive predisposition people have towards an individual.
In leadership dynamics, it refers to the willingness of followers to following a leader independently of his rank and official authority.

Similar: social capital

Hot potato, social: in social and power dynamics, hot potatoeing consists of introducing a new controversial topic and asking someone to answer it.

Similar: bag passing.

Hypergamy: in social and sexual marketplaces, it refers to the attraction, pursuit, and preference of lower status individuals for higher status and/or higher-income individuals.

- Female hypergamy: Female hypergamy is the pursuit and/or attraction felt for males of a higher class, income or social status

Men are equally as hypergamous as women, but their hypergamy is of a different nature (looking for better looks rather than better socio-economic classes).

Honest exchange talk (AKA: "direct exchange talk"): in social and power dynamics, as well as in value exchanges, it refers to openly talk about the size of each social bank accounts, and who owes how much to whom.
"Direct" refers more to the style of the talk, while "honest" stresses the use of this technique when people are being both upfront and honest.

Explanation: in simple terms, to openly and candidly state that you expect a favor back after you provide value (honest credit talk), as well as to openly and candidly say that you have received value, and will repay the favor (honest debt talk).

Example: "you owe me", or "can you do this quick for me? I'm calling a favor on what I did for you last week" or, in negotiations, "if I do this for you, it will cost me. Can you make a 20% discount if I agree?".
The Godfather scene is also an example.
Honest exchange talk can also be in the positive, acknowledging one's debt and the willingness to repay. For example: “I will remember this and make it up to you one day”.

Explanation: The law of social exchange postulates that people who give, are entitled to ask for something back. But since some people like to take without giving, open exchange talk can help to remind them that they will have to give back eventually.
It’s out of place in close friendships, and some people find it annoying. Furthermore, you shouldn’t use it with fair players who do give back. But in some situations, it can be useful to deploy honest exchange talk.

- Covert exchange talk: to use indirect language to tell people that they “owe you”. For example “I know you’d do the same for me”.

Iconoclasm, social ™: it’s the drive to attack, undermine, and destroy those who have more power and success than we have.
Iconoclasts are driven by resentment, envy, or hidden feelings of personal inadequacies, and it makes them feel better about themselves when they see those above them fail.
Iconoclasm is stronger when a leader seems “too good”, unavailable, or when he is acting too entitled.
Iconoclasm is a force that leaders need to keep in mind.

Similar: frenemies, freudenschade, rebels without a cause

Icy men (AKA: cold-blooded): in power dynamics, a dominance style based on removing most or all nonverbal expressions, including signs of warmth and friendliness. Dealing with icy men is difficult because you don’t know whether to slot them as friends or enemies, and the fact that they give you no signs of being friends can make people edgy.
They also never alleviate tension and speak little, forcing others to fill the gaps and to look try-hard.

Vladimir Putin, an example of icy style of dominance

Indirect talk: in communication and social dynamics, a style of communication that uses lots of preambles, circumlocutions, and hinting. Very indirect cultures sometimes have a whole system of unwritten rules around communication that can feel like “acting out”.

Inflater, status ™: in social and power dynamics, status inflaters use, lies, exaggerations, and various types of games and power moves to artificially increase their social status and personal value.

When they use others as social pegs to inflate their social status, which they often do, then they also are social climbers. The combination of inflaters and climbers give rise to hostile climbers, since they climb by pushing others down.

Similar: social climber, social manipulator, hostile climbers

Influence, The Psychology of Persuasion: one of the most popular books on influence and persuasion, by Robert Cialdini.

Weapons of influence, for Cialdini:

- Reciprocation
- Commitment & Consistency
- Social Proof
- Liking
- Authority
- Scarcity

The Best-Seller Quality Tradeoff™ is the phenomenon where a trade-off between realistic complexity and less realistic simplicity is necessary to sell to the majority.

Investment, social: in social dynamics and social exchanges, a measure of an individual's effort into a relationship or social exchange.

- Ben Franklin Effect: in social dynamics and persuasion, the tendency for a person who has already performed a favor for another to be more well-disposed towards someone, including more likely to do another successive favor, than if they had received a favor from that person.
  Explanation: An explanation for the Ben Franklin effect is cognitive dissonance. People reason that they help others because they like them, even if they do not, because their minds struggle to maintain logical consistency between their actions and perceptions (this also sounds like a case of backward rationalization)
  Note: the Ben Fraklin effect works in specific cases and circumstances. Also read here "reciprocation VS Ben Franklin effect".

Judge

Judge, the ™: in social and power dynamics the individual who assesses other people's worthiness, dispenses emotional punishments and rewards, and exercises power and influence over others through emotional control. The judge is the individual who has power and influence within a relationship or social exchange. He derives much of his power from assessing others, who in turn seek to prove themselves to the judge, and gain the judge's approval.

- Covert judge power move: a covert power move with elements of both judge role, and tasking/requests.
  Example: "I greatly appreciate your response" means that you are supposed to respond (power move), plus the implied disapproval if you don't reply (critical judge)
- Judge power move: a power move delivered from a judge position
- Positive judge: a judge who delivers praise
- Negative judge: (AKA: "critical judge"): a judge who delivers criticism
- Value-adding judge (good judge): individuals who use their judge role and position in ways that add value
- Value-taking judge (bad judges): individuals who use their judge role and position in ways that takes value
- Sadist judge: individuals who use their judge role and position in ways that takes value, but without necessarily gaining anything themselves. They simply enjoy the effects of their power, especially the destructive effects of their power

Judge frames ™: any compliment or emotional reward, as well as any criticism or emotional punishment, that sets the giver as "judging" the receiver.

- Dismantling judge frames: to undo a judge frame. It's often a good idea to dismantle strong judge frames because otherwise you lose lots of power.
  Example 1: -"great job man, you seem like a smart guy" -"yeah, it was alright (refuses to fully accept the positive judge frame),
  Example 2: -"great job man, you seem like a smart guy" -"thanks! I'm dum as f*ck though" (refuses the positive judge frame with a joke)

Lateral-first mobility: in life strategies, a strategy of seeking easier markets. It's often far quicker, and sometimes far more effective, than working on upward mobility in more difficult markets.

Leadership: in social and power dynamics, the act of leading and/or heavily influencing a group or another individual.

- Abusive leadership: the worst case of win-lose "leadership", whereby the leader uses his power to abuse, demean, restrict other people's freedom, and generally disempower and handicap others
- Narcissistic leadership (AKA: "me, me, me leadership" & "WIIFM leadership): a form of leadership where the leader only cares about what's in it for him, his personal power, and what makes him look good.
- Power Over / Power Through: in leadership and persuasion strategies, two different and opposite approaches to persuasion and leadership.
  Power over: to have power on others by virtue of your ability to enforce your will, either through raw dominance, or by controlling punishments and rewards.
  Power through: the ability to mobilize others by "higher" appeals such as admiration and respect for the leader, inspiration, and group identification.
- Value-adding leadership (AKA: win-win leadership): leadership that benefits the leader, as well as the group and/or the individual that is being led. In case of organizations, value-adding leadership also adds value to the beneficiaries of the group's services or products.
  Value-adding leadership can be considered the final goal of any self-development effort, and it's this website's ultimate goal for its users.
- Value-taking leadership (AKA: win-lose leadership): leadership that benefits the leader on or, in the case of groups, a small portion of the leaders' cronies, while coming at a cost for everyone else.

Leecher strategy: in power dynamics, the leecher strategy is either a sycophant to a powerful man, or someone who seeks to climb power hierarchies by becoming the right-hand man of a more powerful individual.

Similar: power aligning, piggyback and run

Less dominance is more power: in social and power dynamics and in persuasion, a saying that serves to remind people that the less raw dominance you use, the more you allow for people's buy-in to emerge, and the more you will make people want to follow you, and to follow up on the agreements you have reached.

Similar: power through, self-agency effect

Leverage: in negotiation and power dynamics, it's another term for power. Having leverage means that you have the power to persuade or force others to accept your terms. Having no leverage instead means you have no power to convince, influence, or force others to accept your terms.

Life Strategies: strategies that allow an individual to reach a major life goal in a manner that is quicker, more efficient, or yielding far better results.

Little princess and the pea games: in social and power dynamics, a woman who pretends to be more refined than she really is.

She often uses fake shock to pretend she is used to a high-class way of living.

- Example: My father was about to flyswat a fly, when our lovely guest jumped in shock and shouted: “oh my God Franco, no!!”. To her, it was disgusting to swat a fly. She grew up next to a small animal farm.

Similar: relationship prizing

Little Virgin feints: in dating and seduction, a woman who pretends to be less sexual and less sexually experienced than she really is.

Loyalty tests: in power dynamics and dominance hierarchies, these are tests delivered by higher-ups to their underlings to make sure the underlings accepts the higher-up’s authority.
Sometimes, loyalty tests can seem like pointless work, but that’s the whole point. To make sure the underling honors their hierarchical authority and they are obedient and willing to sacrifice for them, the boss purposefully chooses pointless tasks.
Autocratic personalities, men, narcissists and individuals high in power are more likely to administer loyalty tests

Lover: in seduction and dating strategies, a lover is a man who is not available or for a relationship, but can be good for sex and short-term dating.
Women lust after high-quality lovers but know that they cannot turn them into boyfriends, so they have no reason to play Madonna games, and will sleep with him very quickly.

Note: Most people reading on lover strategies focus on high-quality lovers only. They forget that there are also low-quality lovers and average-quality lovers who don’t get that much sex or are only able to get average quality girls from bars and clubs.
Before worrying about becoming a lover, it can make sense to worry about becoming a high-quality individual.

- Boyfriend disqualifiers: to disqualify oneself as a boyfriend candidate with the intent of becoming a lover

Manipulation

Manipulation: in social and power dynamics, the act of influencing and convincing others to embrace beliefs or behaviors that advance the interests of the manipulator, while coming at a cost for the manipulator’s target(s)

TPM Arms’ Length Approach™: to be superficially friendly in person and in social settings while remaining emotionally closed off, minimizing meaningful contact, withholding key personal information, but maintaining a working relationship in case you can gain from it

Strategic Fade™: A controlled, low-conflict exit strategy for disengaging from manipulative and vindictive individuals. It involves gradual reduction of availability and investment while maintaining superficial friendliness and plausible excuses — ensuring the manipulator never feels openly rejected or disrespected, which minimizes retaliation risk (vendettas, smears, fake reviews)

Guilt-tripping: in manipulation and power dynamics, a manipulation attempt where the aggressor seeks to make others act out of guilt.
Guilt-tripping can also be triggered in combination with pity plays.

- Covert guilt-tripping: to make people feel guilty in covert and disguised ways.
  For example, to tell someone who had to cancel an appointment “oh, too bad, I was so looking forward to it” (notice the social credit scalping as well).
  Or to frame oneself poorly for something that the receiver is guilty of, or equally guilty of. For example: Since I didn’t keep in touch, it’s the equivalent of saying “you’re also bad for not writing”. I’m sure he didn’t mean it as a power move, but it can still break rapport, so avoid it

- Privileged guilt-tripping: The hostility or outright aggression, either overt or covert, directed towards certain groups of people who are accused of enjoying or exploiting an unfair advantage to the detriment of others.
  - Male-shaming: shaming men for being overly aggressive and supposedly preying on and/or harassing women
  - White-shaming: shaming white men for supposedly taking advantage of minorities
  - Beauty-shaming: this is an old one. Less attractive people seek to diminish attractive people's achievements and to impair their life-effectiveness by ascribing their success to an unfair advantage
- Guilt-culture: when guilt-tripping becomes pervasive, then we get a guilt-culture. Our current culture of around 2020 is replete with high-level guilt-tripping, most of it being "privileged guilt-tripping". Also read: don't fall for the guilt-tripping culture
- Triangular guilt-tripping: to complain or project anger and/or emotional distress to someone about the actions of a third party.
  The goal can be to vent, to affect you emotionally, to gain your sympathies, and/or to spur you into action. It can work, but it comes at a high cost for the triangular guilt-tripper who can easily come to be seen as an annoying complainer or a low-power passive who cannot do his own bidding.
  Credits to Bel for first recognizing and describing this behavioral pattern. See here and here for examples

Manipulation techniques: abusive techniques are recurring methods and patterns ("games"), that people use to manipulate or control others.

Olive branch trap: in social exchanges and debates, to feign a friendly overture to relax the opponent and make him drop his guard, but then to leverage the opponent's lowered guard to revert straight back to full attack mode.

Explanation: an olive branch trap can be used to make people open up and share something personal, but then to use their personal information against them.
"Good cop – bad cop" strategies leverage one or many olive branches traps.

Example: See Tucker Carlson quickly switching from "God bless you for that" to full attack mode right after.

Paradox of practice: in self-help, to teach one thing while the teacher enriches himself not through the material being taught but through the money collected with the coaching time or material.

Explanation: MJ De Marco coined this term in his book "The Millionaire Fastlane", where he says that "gurus" like Kiyosaki sell get rich schemes based on real estate investment, while they themselves got rich selling real estate advice.
Pyramid schemes and multilevel marketing are examples of paradox of practices, since the founders don't get rich through selling the products, but by recruiting others to sell their products.

Example: In self-help, Brandon Burchard might be one example: see here.

Piggyback and run ™: in manipulative strategies, it consists of associating with someone to acquire something of value the victim posses, and then dropping the victim once the value has been acquired, or once it's safe doing so

- Seductive piggyback and run: pretending to be in love with someone until a specific goal can be achieved, then dumping them, breaking up, or suing them
  Examples: visa scams, marrying up and then divorcing.

Pity Play: in manipulative strategies, it consists of purposefully looking dejected and hopeless to manipulate others into supporting, helping, or acting in the way that the pity player wants.

- Playing the victim: it consists of framing oneself as a victim to frame the opponent as a mean bully
- Playing the victimized: it consists of framing oneself as the victim of the target's wrongdoings, or purposefully exaggerating the extent of the damage.

Similar: guilt-tripping, social credit scalping

Power borrowing: to increase one's own clout, authority, or power, by borrowing the power of external sources. Originally thought of and coined by John.

Explanation: if you say "I think", then it's what you think, VS what someone else thinks.
But if you say "researchers say", "most people believe", or "everyone knows this", then it becomes "many people (or everyone) against just one person".
There are many ways to power-borrow, including:

- Appeals to "proper rules of conduct": which ends up being a judge power move (ie.: "you're not being proper")
- Appeals to rules/laws/SOPs, etc: recruiting the power of sanctioned "rules"
- Appeals to the group: simply speaking in terms of "we" rather than "I" can also be a manipulative form of power-borrowing
- Appeals to specific higher authority: "the boss said", "expert X says", "this is not what the CEO wants us to do, the CEO wants… "

Even if one simply says "that's disgusting", there is an implied power-borrowing from "standard rules of conduct" that the victim is disobeying.
For how to deal with this power move, check out "frame individualization" and read here.

Playing dumb: to pretend to not understand and/or demand unneeded clarifications in an effort to avoid owning up and/or apologizing

Explanation: if you fall for it and clarify, the person then pretendes it's not what they meant, and that there was a misunderstanding. So ntehy never own or confess of their power move.

Quicksand technique ™: to (willingly) move the conversation away from the main topic, request, or question, towards off-topic or minor issues that do not address the speaker's main concern

Example:

> Him: I felt ashamed and unappreciated when you said in front of everyone that the dinner I spent 2 hours preparing was poor
> Her: Yeah, it wasn't too bad, but the steak was definitely over-cooked

She half-apologizes, and then comes the main quicksand maneuver: moving the conversation towards a detail that fails to address his main concern. His main concern was that he was not being given any credit for his effort, and that he was being publicly shamed and disempowered.

Explanation: quicksand maneuvers are manipulative, often covertly-manipulative, and are used for different goals. To begin with, the quicksander can avoid apologizing, owning to mistakes, or making any concessions. So he can conserve his power while keeping the speaking partner disempowered.
And they can also be used for gaslighting effects. Quicksanding frustrates and annoys our speaking partner, who can end up over-reacting and getting angry. If the quicksander then points out that they are getting aggressive or worked up for nothing, we have the perfect gaslighting dynamics.

Similar to: muddling the water, thread-cutting

Self-disclosure, manipulative: in manipulation strategies, to open up with unrequested or fake information with the only intent of gaining the victim's trust.

- Tit-for-tat self-disclosure: a specific type of manipulative self-disclosure. It consists of providing fake or unrequested personal information that puts pressure on the victim to later answer truthfully to the manipulator's information request

Self-manipulation: in self-development and manipulation strategies, it consists of self-denial, minimizations, and "coloring" reality in a way that makes us feel good instead of helping us develop and achieve our goals.
There are countless examples of self-manipulation.

Standard manipulation ™: in manipulative strategies, the daily manipulation the majority of people engage in.

Explanation: They can be very Machiavellian, but most of them are mostly harmless since everyone does it, so they are already "factored in" in social exchanges.

Example: Some daily manipulations can be harmful though. Think for example on denying the importance of having money in life, or denying the importance of taking care of one's own appearance. When people buy into that, they might start acting it out in their lives, and lose a lot of their value.

Strawmanning: in power dynamics and manipulative strategies, fabricating an enemy or distorting reality to make an individual or a group seem meaner.
In debates, it consists of distorting someone's argument, often making it more extreme than it really is, to score an easy win.
In manipulative strategies, strawmanning justifies the perpetrator's attacks and anger, and is designed to fan the flames of hatred. In the worst cases, straw-manning is about de-humanizing a victim to make all kinds of abuse seem fair.

Similar: dehumanizing, moralizing, shame attacks

Triangulation: triangulation happens when communication does not happen directly between two individuals, but goes through an intermediary ("messenger").
Sometimes triangulation is meant without harm, but in many circumstances, it can be used for manipulative, win-lose, or value-taking ends.

Explanation: the receiver can be disempowered with a one-up frame, judge frame, or undue criticism, without recourse to the originator. The messenger can deliver hurtful criticism while hiding behind the "don't shoot the messenger" cover (it becomes an act of covert aggression). Both originator and third party gain power vis-a-vis the victim. See here for solutions.

Example: see Bel's examples of more subtle triangulations (probably more helpful to learn than the more obvious ones)

Wild Goose Chase, to give tasks and advice that are only meant to waste someone's time. Sometimes the advice is presented in a fake guise of help, and sometimes it's a technique to either get rid of someone, or to harm and handicap the competition
Thanks to bel

Meta, going meta: in power dynamics and frame control, it means to handle the game, power move, or manipulation attempt by explaining what they are doing, and why they are doing it and, directly or indirectly, to either shame them for it, or to explain why it's not working with you.

Going meta requires a good understanding of power dynamics, and the ability to explain them in simple terms. Going meta is very effective with "covert aggression", since explaining their game blows off the covert aggressor's protective cover.

Microaggression: Aggressions, insults, one-ups or generally value-taking social behavior expressed in covert or indirect forms, and characterized by low to moderate intensity of aggression.

Explanation: often but not always, microaggressions overlap with covert aggression, since they use humor or indirect talk to aggress.
Unchecked microaggressions result in a loss of power, social status, and sometimes even self-esteem for the victim.

Mindsets: mindsets are deep-seated beliefs, as well as recurrent patterns of thoughts and frames wich which people look at themselves as well as the world.

- Growth / fixed mindsets: a growth mindset beleives you can improve your skills and traits. A fixed mindset believes that whatever you are born with, you are stuck with.
- Value adding / value subtracting mindsets: a value-adding mindset sees it as a personal duty and/or as the best most effective road to success, to add value to others (for example: to become a billionaire, help a billion people). A value-taking mindset seeks to give as little as possible while taking as much as possible, either because the value-takier thinks it's the best way to succeed, or because it makes him feel good.
- Defensive / vulnerable: a defensive mindset focuses on the risks of loss, be it physical, financial, or emotional. A vulnerable mindset forges ahead in spite of the risk, by focusing on the potential for gains and win-win.
- Internal locus of control / external locus of control (vicim mindset): and internal locus mindset believes that the individual is responsible for what happens to him, and that he can chages his mood and life circumstances. An external locus mindset believes that external forces he has no control over determine what happens.
  - Extreme ownership: an extreme version of external locus of control where the indiivdual takes responsibility for everything in his life, including events for which he apparently had little control over.
  - Learned helplessness: when people learn they cannot control external events, they enter into a state called "learned helplessness", and they stop trying. Depression is also similar to learned helplessness.
  - Stoic mindset: the stoic mindset takes ownership of whatever is his control, while accepting and being at peace with the fact that it's impossible to contorl everything, and that the ultimate result is also somewhat up to fate and chance.

My Bitch (My Bitch Power Moves): power moves designed to totally dominate someone. If done in public, they can be highly embarrassing to the victim.
You only need to look at this thumbnail of Trump with Macron to see what "my bitch" power moves are all about:

Moralist: an individual who engages in moralizing and attacks others for not following the moral framework upheld by the moralist.
Moralists often have a self-righteous attitude and seek a judge power position to deliver their attacks. More often than not, the moralist seeks to frame his moral framework as the one upheld by the majority of people or, at least, by those whom he deems the "sensible" ones (ie. the "morally superior" ones).
Some moralists truly believe in the superiority and goodness of their moral standards, but some others are immature individuals oblivious to human nature and their own dark side. Yet some others, of course, are just out for power, manipulation (pro-social feints), or to ruin someone's reputation.

Similar: purist, firestarter, guilt-tripping. SJWs can also engage in moralizations

Moralizing: in social and power dynamics, the act of framing others as "not good enough" for not following a certain moral framework.
Moralizing is delivered from a judge role, and can be a power move to acquire power or ruin someone's reputation.

Similar: shaming, virtue signaling

Moral police (AKA: PC police): a group of moralists who bands together to enforce norms of morality.
Often based on guilt-tripping such as male-shaming or white-shaming.

Similar: SJWs, Guilt-trippers

Naive self-help: in self-development literature, it's a type of advice that fails to consider the darker, more selfish, and more manipulative nature of human beings.

Examples: give, give, give, and you will be rewarded

- Utopian workplace: the utopian, non-existent workplace of some naive career advice in which team, company, and self-interest all perfectly overlap and/or where people put the team's and company's needs above their own. In the utopian workplace, people advance only based on skills and merit, and never on politics and Machiavellian strategies.

Negotiation

A negotiation is a social exchange to reach an agreement on conflicting interests (conflict resolution), or to reach an agreement on how to split up the added value ("pie") that is created by a new deal or agreement (value-adding negotiation).

Here's Tit, where's tat technique: a technique to increase the odds of getting a concession or favor by giving something or reminding of what you have given before you ask for something back.

Explanation: It leverages the law of social exchange, whereby by giving you create social credit for yourself, and social debt for them. This way, people feel compelled to give something back after they have been given something first.

Example: "I loved staying here, and I will leave the place tidy and clean. Do you think I can check in a bit later tomorrow?"

Honey deal traps (negotiation): a manipulative technique consisting of a fake offer for a highly attractive deal to lure the target into a trap.
Example: offering an attractive deal if the victim drops the charges in court, or through a guarantor/middle man. Then reneging on the deal once the charges are dropped

Minimizing: presenting and framing your requests in a way that makes them sound like small requests and easy to deliver.

For example: “a small favor before I go”, “just one quick question”

Nudging: a simple technique of applying slight pressure when someone seems teetering between a “yes or no” and not being sure where to go.
Example: you can see an example from this real-life persuasion.

Positive display of leverage: to remind people of your leverage and power by stating or hinting that you intend to use it positively.

Explanation: it can accomplish the same goals of a threat, because you remind people that you still have leverage and power over them. But it maintains the relationship positive and value-adding.

Example: “hey man, thanks for the lovely stay. I think this place deserves a good review. Is it possible to leave my luggage here for a few hours?” (remind him that you will leave a review, which is leverage). See an example here.

Warning: don’t overdo it. If you had a positive relationship, even positive displays of leverage can be annoying.

Similar: negative display of leverage (threat)

Silver medal technique: a technique aimed at lowering the incentives for lying and cheating, and increasing the chances of getting truthful information and more collaborative behavior.
Example: if you want to know whether the salmon is fresh, tell the server that you are not sure between the salmon and the chicken. This way, the server knows that he will sell something anyway, so he has no incentive to lie about the salmon.

NLP (neuro-linguistic programming): in persuasion and manipulation strategies, NLP is a pseudoscientific approach to communication, personal development, and psychotherapy created by Richard Bandler and John Grinder in the 1970s. NLP became popular in the seduction and pick-up community, sometimes leading to some eccentric strategies and techniques.
Albeit the “pseudo-science”, there are good and proven techniques in NLP.
The name “neuro language programming” contributed to the hype around NLP, as well as to the misunderstanding of NLP principles, hypnosis, as well as general persuasion techniques. To keep it simple: you cannot program a brain as if it were a computer, and you can much less do so with language alone. Programming would entail that the brain is a blank slate with nothing pre-recorded into it, which is obviously not the case (Pinker, 2002).

Office politics (AKA: workplace politics): in office and workplace environments, it refers to the human element of business operations, including formal and informal status negotiation, as well as decisions and choices for personnel deployment and advancement. Office politics also includes, but is not limited to, the darker and more selfish human motives that people usually hide, deny, or pretend that they don’t exist.

Opening gambits, social ™: opening a new conversation with a power move as a way of testing someone’s mettle, or to assert early dominance.
Example: “what are you selling” / “and who are you” /

Passive-aggressive: in social and power dynamics, a type of behavior where resistance, criticism, anger, hostility, or resentment are hidden or verbally denied.

Similar: covert aggression, submissive behavior, frenemies.

Peg, Social ™: in power dynamics, a social peg is the victim of a win-lose attempt at social climbing. The social climber uses the victim, the social peg, to look better by contrast.
If you’re learning on ThePowerMoves.com, you don’t like being made a social peg (and you shouldn’t :)

Persuasion: the act of convincing someone to adopt certain opinions or frames of mind, or to perform certain actions

- Push: to make others act through commands, force, or threats.
- Pull: to make others want to act through their own volition ("buy-in")
  Note: The same concept also applies to self-motivation, with the "push-approach" being harsher towards the self (stick), and the pull approach being kinder and using rewards (carrot)

Plausible deniability (social): in social dynamics, the possibility and personal feeling of being able to deny one's direct involvement in a certain course of action even when the help or silence of the plausible denier was essential.

Pop-psychology: in general, the bastardization, willful misinterpretation, or ignorant misunderstanding of proper social science.
In self-help and self-development circles, the misinterpretation of proper psychology to give more authority to the pop-psychologist, who can sound more credible and convincing if he can (mis)quote a scientist or scientific paper.

- Pop-evo psych: the act of storytelling and making up credible-sounding stories to provide a semblance of credibility to personal conjectures. Very common in the dating advice literature.
  To paraphrase Tversky: "Listen to pop-evo psych long enough, and you'll stop believing in evolution"
- Bro-science: the lowest level of pop-psychology

Populist: in politics and power dynamics, a politician, often purposefully manipulative, who appeals to emotions instead of rationality, and panders to the masses of disenfranchised.
Populists also pander to the iconoclastic and sadistic tendencies of the human psyche who like to see those in power fail.
Example: Trump was a populist, and pandered to the iconoclastic desires of hurting the political class.

Power

Power: power is the measure of an individual to influence or dictate decisions, influence or dictate other people's behavior and, ultimately, to achieve goals and get the outcome, things, or results that he desires.

Power Intelligence, measured by power quotient (PQ), is the individual's capability to recognize and influence patterns of power dynamics in order to achieve goals and acquire life-relevant resources such as status, influence, and partners.

Balance of power: in social and power dynamics, how the power is split between two individuals, or within a group.
The balance of power is especially relevant in close relationships such as friendships, families, business partners, and intimate partners. Good relationships among high-quality, driven individuals, tend to be well balanced.

The impact on the balance of power can be measured with:

- Power-giving: any action, words, or frame, that empowers the receiver
  - Giving back power: to give back power after having taken it
    Example: to say "sorry", and to ask for forgiveness (the power of choice, whether to forgive or not, is given to the receiver, and that empowers them back)
- Power-taking: any action, words, or frame, that disempowers the receiver
  - Retaking back power: techniques and strategies to re-empower oneself against power-takers

Power-protecting: Approaches, strategies, and techniques that protect and maintain other people's power, status, dignity, reputation, and face (as in "saving face")
It includes framing or phrasing a potentially power-taking request in a way that does not disempower the receiver, or that takes less power from the receiver

Antonyms: disempowering, power hoarding

Explanation: Psychological reactance theory says that when a person senses that someone else is limiting his freedom to choose or act (ie.: his power), an uncomfortable state of reactance arises, creating motivation to reassert that freedom (Brehm & Brehm, 1981).
And the more important the freedoms threatened or the more arbitrary (i.e. not legitimate) the threat, the greater the reactance. And the more blatant, direct, and demanding the threat, the greater the reactance (Fuegen & Brehm, 2004; Knowles & Linn, 2004).
In simpler terms: when we don't power protect, people will push back against us, and/or grow to resent us.
Power-protecting techniques work particularly well with high-power folks, power-aware folks, high-ego folks, and by those who are above you in ranking / status

- Fake-power protecting: to provide a semblance of kindness and/or choice, but to actually leave little choice, task the receiver, and/or disempower the receiver.
  It can work as a persuasive (or manipulative) tool to provide an "illusion of choice".
  Example, thanks to Ali

- Over-protecting: to overdo the power-protecting approach and to come across not as considerate, but as waffling, overly submissive, and indecisive. Over-protecing is also ineffective. In discussions, it fails to make a point, and in leadership it does not nudge towards a specific course.
  thanks to Ali

Example: instead of "do X", you say: "a good option could be to try X. (What do you think about it)?" this type of phrasing empowers the receiver with the final decision. If you ask what they think about it, they can add their own thoughts, which also makes them part of the decision making, and raise them very near to your level

Power Dynamics: the study and analysis of social dynamics and social strategies from the point of view power.

- Dating power dynamics: the study and analysis of intersexual dynamics and sexual strategies from the point of view power
- Relationship power dynamics: the study and analysis of intersexual dynamics and sexual strategies from the point of view power

Albeit the term "power dynamics" applied to the different realms of human socialization existed before, this website was the first to address it in a more systematic fashion.

Power Move: in social dynamics and in general terms, any action that affects the power dynamics of interaction.
In more lay terms and in more common parlance, it's an action or verbal expression that abruptly and sometimes unexpectedly changes the power dynamics of an interaction.
A well-placed power move can turn an individual who was previously defensive or under assault into the one with power.
Power moves are one-off actions, while power moves that repeat over time are "games".

- Covert power move: a power move that is delivered with a mix of friendliness, professionalism and, sometimes, even submissiveness, but that in truth empowers the agent and disempowers or shames the receiver.
- Micro-power move: small scale, daily power moves that impact the power dynamics and social status. Many people fail to see and properly address the micro-power moves, which can leave them down in power and status.

Power-up techniques: in power dynamics, power-up techniques are recurring methods and patterns ("games"), that people use to gain power over others.

Power techniques, covert: in power dynamics, covert power-up techniques are recurring methods and patterns ("games"), that people use to gain power over others.

- Messenger power move: an individual sets up a “triangulation” by making up or playing up his role as the conveyor of information (messenger) from a third party (originator). The “don’t shoot the messenger” cover allows the messenger to take a judge role and/or to disempower the victim with reprimands or criticisms while making himself immune to power-rebalancing counter-attacks.

Power With Warmth™, mix: in social strategies and power dynamics, a social strategy designed to maximize social success.
It consists of displaying behavior and body language that is at the same time powerful and warm.
It’s based on the availability principle™ and the stereotype content model. The SCM, in turn, is based on a body of research showing that people first assess others based on competence (power) and warmth (friendliness).

Power showdowns (AKA: “domination showdowns”, “showdowns”)™: in social and power dynamics, it refers to an escalating confrontation, a battle of wills, and/or a frame battle.
The individual who wins the showdown gains a lot of power, while the individual who loses it, will lose a lot of power. Thus, showdowns are crucial moments that will potentially determine the direction of a relationship.
Showdowns vary in intensity, and can be big and obvious, or understated and seemingly small. But even the small ones, especially when early in a relationship, will have major impacts on the dynamics of a relationship.

- Social power showdown: showdown as a consequence of social dynamics and social pressure. There are often social power showdowns in patterns of laughter, eye contact, or holding or breaking silences.
- Power showdown in seduction: showdowns and social power showdowns are often present in the early stages of seduction, and some men completely fail to recognize them. When men lose power showdowns, attraction tanks. When men win them, attraction spikes. Simply staring into a woman’s eyes can be a socia power showdown: the first one who moves or smiles, loses.
- Domination showdowns: these are more obvious instances of power escalations, including potentially getting to blows.

Prince of darkness / queen of darkness: in power dynamics, life and manipulative strategies, this is the mantel you don when you decided you are going to wage war on someone.

Pulling rank: In power dynamics, it refers to someone directly referring to his status, authority, power, or official rank as a way of asserting his power over others.

Analysis:
Depending on the context, pulling rank can be effective to discipline someone and get back in power, but it can also come across as very weak. It can be weak because great leadership rests not just on rank, but on personal qualities and follower’s admiration and willingness to follow. Pulling rank indirectly says “you don’t respect me and you wouldn’t accept me if I didn’t have an official rank”.

Pump and Dump ™, social: in power dynamics, it consists in complimenting and building someone up in front of them, often in exaggerated terms, and then dumping them with heavy-handed criticism or with a scathing joke at their expense, as soon as they turn around.
It can also be done in front of the person, in which case it’s a “my bitch power move”.

Example: this skit from Family Guy

Purists: in social and power dynamics, purists are inveterate, more extreme types of moralizers.
Purists routinely deploy moralizations and/or shame attacks to chastise others for their apparent lack of morals, ethics, or personal value.
While they seek to portray an image of superhuman honesty, some purists buy into their own lies, and fail to recognize their own darker motives.
Of course, some purists and instead manipulators in search of some followers and some scraps of power.
The most extreme purists are fanatics.

Similar: moralizers (lighter form of purists), fanatics (most dangerous forms of purists)

Example: Chris Cuomo loves moralizing others, but it feels motivated by his own hidden perversions.

- Closeted moralists: The worst purists blame and moralize others on the same things they are perversely attracted to, but feel guilty about. This is called "reaction formation" in psychology.
  Example: the Orlando's nightclub shooter ahole who massacred people at a gay night club was supposed to be gay himself.

Pyromaniac™, social: in social and power dynamics, pyromaniacs are more extreme, inveterate firestarter.
He is the guy who continuously writes angry posts, makes up an enemy, or dramatizes situations. He strawmans his enemies, framing them as dumb, mean, or manipulative. He seeks to look smarter, purer, and "better" by comparison.

Similar: firestarters, populists, purists

Pyrrhic victory: a victory that inflicts heavier losses on the winner than on the loser. Winning a Pyrrhic victory takes a heavy toll that damages long-term progress.

- Pyrrhic validation: By extension, validation-achievements can be considered pyrrhic victories, since they make us feel enough good to stop action, but only result in time-wasting and opportunity losses.
  Example: to work hard to achieve a high-school grade at the exam, but not to actually understand the topic; or to seek a positive reaction from a woman/business contact, rather than getting a date, or a signed contract.

Qualifying: in seduction, social, and power dynamics, it refers to asking questions aimed at positively assessing an individual.
Qualifying and assessing, both in positive and negative terms, are natural extensions of the judge role.

Similar: shit tests, judge frames, screening

Rapport break (social): in social and power dynamics, rapport breaks refer to any behavior or expression with which one person is increasing the social distance from another.
The "distance" can be in negotiating meaning, power, status, or friendship. Typical examples of rapport breaks include not laughing at someone's jokes, or contradicting someone. The latter is an example of increasing the distance in terms of negotiating meaning and, potentially, power.

- Rapport break (seduction): in seduction, it refers to an individual purposefully disagreeing with another to gain power in the interaction and to potentially shit-test the target and see if they will change their minds and follow. It can work great, but it backfires if the target does not follow and just take it as a sign of unavailability or of bad chemistry. It originated in pick-up circles.
- Confrontational rapport break: to break rapport in an aggressive fashion
- Pulling social rank ™: in power dynamics and rapport breaks, it refers to correcting others and/or demanding to be addressed with a more formal or authoritative title, or with a title that highlights their Example: "Hello Mark!" "I'm doctor Schenk"

Counter strategy: see "how to handle rapport breakers" with power

Realpolitik: in politics and power dynamics, an approach of developing political strategies in amoral terms, while analyzing those power and political strategies as driven by the individuals' selfishness and thirst for power.
In many ways, I see thepowermoves.com as a realpolitk approach to self-development.

Rebels Without a Cause ™ (RWC): in social and power dynamics, RWC rebel and throw tantrums for apparently no reason.
The real reasons are internal: they are either lazy, can't get along with others, or are entitled, power-hungry narcissists who cannot stand people who have power and authority over them.

Counter strategy: RWC are difficult to be won over since it's a behavior that stems from a deep-seated personality. So leaders are better served by cutting them out as quickly as possible.
If they don't, RWC might come up with a cause to rebel for, and manipulate others into believing that it's a good cause to antagonize those in power.

- Rebels with a fake cause: make up an enemy to hide their personal frustration behind anger. They are purists, moralizers, or narcissists who want power for themselves.

Red Pill: A subset of the manosphere discussing politically incorrect notions and on theories on sexual dynamics and self-development.

- Alpha bucks ™: an alpha male with so much financial abundance, that he can maintain several women at once, without necessarily banging each specific one on a daily basis
- Alpha fathers: an alpha male who commits and/or provides financial support for the woman/women he has sex and/or children with.
- Alpha fucks beta bucks: it's a popular stock-phrase to describe the sexual dynamics of alpha males, who gets quick sex without having t commit, while the beta males commits, pays, and gets little or no sex. The worst form of alpha fucks beta bucks, albeit not as common as the red pill seems to portray, is a beta man raising the children of a previous alpha.
- Beta fucks ™: a non-stereotypically alpha male who gets sex, relationship, and children within a committed relationship. Most men in a relationship are beta fucks.
  Explanation: this is probably far more common than the extreme version of "beta bucks" who raise other men's children.
- Cads VS dads: two different mating strategies whereby cads sleep around without commitment, while dads settle down. This is far more realistic than "alpha fucks, beta bucks"
- Fearful defector ™: in red pill and MGTOW communities, men who have no hopes whatsoever in win-win intimate relationships that they decide to either never commit, or to not date at all. When they do commit, fearful defectors are naturally loath and afraid of giving and adding value, since they fear future cheating.

Relationship prize: in dating and relationship power dynamics, the relationship prize is the partner with a judge role and, in the most extreme cases, the partner who invests less while being pampered and spoiled by their subservient and over-investing partner.
The relationship prize is often the higher value or higher sexual market value, but it's not always the case. Sometimes, the relationship prize just acts, pretends, or demands to be treated like royalty and the partner simply complies.
Usually, it's the woman who becomes the relationship prize and who actively seeks to be the relationship prize.
The relationship prize also overlaps with the judge role, since the judge is the individual with emotional power who dispenses emotional rewards and punishments.

Example: see this pictorial story of how she became the relationship prize by refusing him and making him chase

Similar: woman on pedestal, pedestalizing, judge

Scalping, Power ™: in social and power dynamics, it consists of exploiting and capitalizing on any social opportunity to acquire more status or power.

For example, one can capitalize on someone's mistake to berate them publicly and, as a consequence, look more effective at work. Or someone might capitalize on someone's submissive nature to act aggressively and, thus, look and feel more dominant.

The definition originated thanks to JP's comment in the forum, where he correctly linked the similarities between social scalping and "capitalizing on submissive behavior".

Example: an abusive man doubles down on yelling and offending when his partner stopped arguing. Or a guy, to look more powerful, tells his colleague who just apologized over a minor slip: “I’m glad you realized the mistake, be more careful next time”.

- Status scalping: to take advantage of a small mistake, or to feign failure of understanding, to make someone look sloppy, and look better by comparison Example: “I’m sorry, in that slide did you mean “you’re, or your”?

- Vulnerability exploiters: to make fun, deride, or make a big show out of rejecting an individual who put himself in a vulnerable position by sharing a personal story, or declaring his feelings
  Example: a woman makes a big show of rejecting a man to show the man himself, and everyone around, that she just rejected someone

- Power scalping in absentia: just like nasty social climbing in absentia, it consists of using people who are not physically present as social pegs to look more powerful, high-status, and dominant
  Example: this skit from family guy

Scam: in manipulative strategies, a scam is an elaborate strategy to cheat and swindle the victim.

- Affiliate scams: reviewers rate products not based on quality, but based on how much money they will make from. Keep in mind this might be a majority of online reviews.
  Some online review sites allow for users’ reviews to be published to provide a semblance of truth, but in reality, fake, edit and censor the user reviews to provide.
  Examples: See an example here and here (which I personally tested and confirmed).
- “Best of” scams: many “best of” lists on the Internet are either affiliate scams, or pay per play, where those are featured paid the writer
- Playing the victimized: the manipulator exaggerates the amount of damage someone has caused them to unduly increase the targets’ debt and the manipulator’s credit

Scorched earth technique ™: in social and power dynamics, it consists of enticing the attacker to advance, and then strike when they’re over-extended.

Explanation: The strategy can be applied in a variety of different social situations. For example, with an angry attacker, if you let them attack more, they will likely end up looking too angry and nasty, and more people will dislike them and side with you.
Once the attacker has socially over-extended, the scorched earth player has an easy time framing them as nasty and uncivilized.

Similar to: “giving them rope”, but rather than just letting them do the work by themselves, you plan on attacking after they over-extend.

Example: John used a scorched earth technique here, when he did not attack back a rude and overly aggressive doctor and instead stated and restated “I’m shocked”.
Letting people spin and explain their lies when you know that you have a smoking-gun type of evidence ready is also a great scorched-earth technique: you let them over-extend with their lies, and then you prove them for huge liars and manipulators.

Screening: in social dynamics as well as in seduction and dating strategies, it means to have certain criteria and standards with which to screen partners for quality and personal fit.

Explanation: If a person does not meet your screen, then it means they should be rejected, or that you lose interest in them (“screened out”). If that person meets your screen, then it means they should be accepted, or that you are more interested in them (“screened in”).

Screening can be accomplished with questions, shit tests, or simply judging them by their behavior.

Once a person passes your screen, you can also let them know verbally ("qualifying" them). For example, you can compliment them for answering "yes" to your question about whether they exercise or not, and say that you are glad they exercise because you like people who take care of themselves (a positive judge frame).

Similar: shit test, judge frames, qualifying

Strategic charging is the act of taking advantage of a situation of uncertainty or lack of leadership to nudge towards a favored outcome, or to confidently take charge to lead towards a favored outcome

Explanation: when people are pondering new information, or when they're not yet sure what they should do, they are often very amenable to being nudged or led towards either decision they were pondering.

Example: if a girl is not sure whether or not to give you her phone number and vacillating between either giving it or not, you can take charge by taking your phone out and handing it to her. Most of the time, she will give you her phone number.
A bigger example is here.
And see more here.

Communication

Effective assertiveness™ is a goal-oriented communication and behavioral approach that focuses on picking the most effective behavior and communication style to achieve one's goal.
While it maintains a baseline preference for assertive and high-power communication, it retains the strategic flexibility to employ any style that is most effective in the context, including passive, passive-aggressive, assertive, or aggressive.

Explanation: while most resources present assertiveness as the superior approach in all or almost all situations, we see many exceptions to this otherwise valid principle and focus more on whatever is effective to achieve goals.

Seduction

Game: the strategies and techniques to meet, seduce, mate, and potentially enter into relationships with members of the opposite sex

Seduction: to make people aroused or attracted (sexual seduction), or enchanted and charmed (social seduction). The final sexual seduction is to sleep with someone, while the final social seduction is to make people want to be around you, and willingly be your allies and supporters.

Abundance addiction ™: an aberration of abundance mentality and actually achieving real abundance. Addicted guys, often "validation players", always feel the need to chase the next woman and cannot manage to hold onto a good relationship.

- Approach addiction: similar to abundance addiction, but focused on approaching

Explanation: if going out to meet new women feels better than meeting a woman you get along with, you might be falling into approach addiction.

Abundance apathy ™: getting so used to meeting new women, that one loses interest in women, together with losing the ability to feel love and romance with a specific individual.

Similar to: reverse one-itis

Abundance mentality: the ability or feeling of being able to meet and date attractive women at will.

Explanation: it can be a freeing mindset that frees men from the pressure of having to be successful with any specific woman.
It also protects men against manipulative women and value-taking partners by giving them the courage to drop them at once.

Approach, cold: approaching a woman who is a complete stranger, with no social ties and no social trust, with the intention of getting sexually and/or romantically involved with her. Cold approaches tend to have low social trust.

Approach, warm: meeting a woman through a "commonality". Usually friends, but could also be playing the same sport, working in the same company, living in the same building, or seeing her often in some place you both frequent. Warm approaches tend to have higher social trust.

Approach invitation: a verbal or, more often, nonverbal signal from a woman that she wants to be approached.

Similar to: indicator of interests (IOIs)

Attainability: how attainable a woman feels a man is to her. Also see "availability"

Auto-rejection: when a woman rejects herself because she thinks, righteously or not, that the man is not interested. It is the equivalent of "self-rejection", but limited to women and dating only

Backward rationalization: to rationalize with logic, often fallaciously, what one has previously done mostly based on emotions. It's partially based on "commitment and consistency".

Example: if a woman was drunk and wanted to sleep with you but the day after feels bad about it, she might back-rationalize that she was too drunk, and that full consent wasn't there.

Bitch shield: haughty and insufferable exterior some women put up to reject men. Some women do it because they are tired of being hit on, while some others do it to gain social power.

Boiling point: in sexual escalation, when a woman's sexual arousal outstrips her logical mind and willingness to resist.
A great way of reaching it is to finger her before moving to actual penetration.

Cementing (dating): In dating and seduction, cementing is used to amplify a positive thread.

Example: if a girl says "I never shared that before", the man can cement that by replying "I'm glad you feel so comfortable with me that you can open up. It's a great thing, it means we have a great chemistry and I'm happy about that".
Now he cemented the feeling that the two of them have a great relationship different from any other. The subsequent exchanges between the two will then operate under this new common understanding.

Chameleon, sexual ™: pretending to be just like the person that your dating partner wants to date. It's one of the games men play.

Chase frames: to frame a woman as chasing the man, or chasing men in general. It's a consequence of "prizing game" (see "prizing")

Compliance: the measure of how willing a woman is to follow through on man's requests (tasks)

Escalation window: specific and often limited time-specific opportunities during a man can and should escalate the interaction towards more intimacy. Usually, the woman sends out a signal that she is ready and willing to move forward, and if the man fails to capitalize, the escalation window closes, and she might self-reject and/or write the man off

False takeaway: an extreme form of feigning disinterest by leaving the premise or pretending to leave. The idea is to get the woman to chase.
Originally developed in the Mystery Method.

Example: see a video example in this article.

Friend zone: the label and grouping women use for men whom they like as friends, but not as lovers. Going from a dated to being "friend-zoned" means having failed in the seduction

Good guy game: an attractive and high-value man who is honest and kind, but also strong. Contrary to too nice guys, he is successful with women

Hook point: the moment a woman shows signs of being interested in the man, and investing in the exchange. For example, by asking questions

Indicators of Interest (IOIs): in seduction, a pick-up term referring to the verbal and mostly nonverbal signals of interest that a woman sends out.

Men send out IOIs too, of course. Here are the IOIs from men.

Insta-date: going on a date with a woman you have just met via cold approach

Kino: it refers to the act of touching a girl and all the techniques of escalating touch (kino escalation)

Locking in: when talking with someone, to take the most comfortable position that allows you to expend the least effort possible, while making her expand more effort to talk with you. For example, to recline against the bar while she is fully standing.

Mating intelligence: in seduction and dating, the set of cognitive and intellectual abilities, as well as the knowledge and proficiency of power dynamics and sexual strategies that support effective mate selection, courtship, reproduction, and relationship management.

Related terms: game, emotional intelligence, social skills, persuasion

Multi-threading: to quickly introduce and talk about new topics. Since friends tend to talk this way, it gives the feeling that two people who've just met are closer than they really are

Neg: abbreviation of "negative hit", an old pick-up technique designed to lower women's self-esteem and get women to chase his validation.
Note: PUAs didn't know it yet, but what they were trying to go was to take a judge role in the interaction.

One-itis: the tendency for an individual to pedestalize one woman and feel like she is "the one" and it's either he gets her, or he is desperate. Saying that "she is different" is a sign of one-itis.

- Oneitis, reverse (AKA: "emotional hibernation") ™: reverse-oneitis is an aberration of abundance mentality. It consists of viewing women as interchangeable objects, and the consequent inability of some men to view women as human beings one can bond with Similar to: abundance apathy

Orbiter: a man who spends time with an attractive woman, often as a friend, and who'd love sleeping with the woman he hangs around with

Pacing (from NLP): it consists of mirroring, vibing, and actively showing awareness and understanding for a person's emotional states or thoughts.

Pattern-interrupt (from NLP): a sudden or incongruent action or verbal expression that takes someone off guard and "snaps" them from their current state or pattern

Peacocking: dressing or wearing something flashy and attention-catching. Taking it too far thought might seem childish. It probably originated with Mystery, who also sometimes took it a bit too far

Plate spinning: in red-pill circles, it means to pursue, text, or have sex with several women at a time.
A "plate" is a woman he engages in a sexual relationship with.

Plausible deniability: in seduction, it refers to women having an excuse for sex to happen so that they don't feel slutty or like they were "too easy".

Example: "We are just going upstairs for 5 minutes so I can show you that thing I talked to you about"

Player / Boyfriend scale (AKA: perennial player / doting boyfriend scale) : a scale measuring male's varying attitudes towards relationships.

Explanation: On one extreme, there are men seeking new mates right after sex and unable to be attracted to the same partner. On the other extreme, there are men who only seek stable and monogamous relationships and are only attracted to their partner.
Different people tend to inhabit different points of the scale.

Preselection: Women find attractive men whom other women also find attractive (also called copy mating in biology or mimetic desire in philosophy)

Push-Pull: in social dynamics and seduction, a technique of flirting and attraction-building consisting in making a compliment (pull) and then denying that compliment, or following it up with a more negative comment (push).

Prizing: a man framing himself as "the catch" whom the woman has to work for. It seeks to "switch the table" on the normal seduction dynamic. Developed by a certain Swingcat

- Prizing, sexual: to frame oneself as a great lover

Qualifying / disqualifying: see the main entries for the general definitions. For seduction-specific purposes:

Qualifying: to positively communicate to a woman that he likes her for certain traits she has (ie.: she is passing his "screens").

Explanation: it's a way to gain power by indirectly increasing his value, and by taking the judge role. Plus, it puts her at ease by communicating that he likes her personality beyond simple looks.

Disqualifying: to directly or indirectly state that he is not pursuing her, or that the two of them have no future together.

Explanation: it serves to avoid a power-down frame where he is chasing, and she is assessing him, and/or playing hard to get. Ideally, she will start chasing him a bit more after he disqualifies himself.
It can backfire though if he goes too far, and she considers him unavailable (ie.: she self-rejects).

- Boyfriend self-disqualifiers: to actively disqualify oneself a boyfriend candidate by denying or hiding the qualities that would make a man available for a relationship, or good for a relationship. It's a technique to date as a lover (see "lover") and get to sex more quickly.

Screening: see main entry "screening". In short, it means to communicate to the woman that you hve standards, and that you only take women who meet certain criteria (your "screens")

Similar to: shit test, qualifying/disqualifying, conveying high value

Explanation: screening precedes "qualifying". With screening, you set up the hoops and criteria you look for. With "qualifying", you communicate that you like her because she passed those screens.

Seeding (the pull): to start talking about things you like to do and/or have at home, and then tell the girl that you'd like to show her that thing

Sex drive (high / low) : the term and definitions didn't originate with PUA communities, but PUAs first wrote on how sex drive impacts sexual strategies (and TPM included it in its model on sexual escalation and timing)

Sexual escalation: the escalation of touch, intimacy, and closeness that moves towards sex

- "I'm ready point" ™: when a woman is mentally and physically ready for sex, and won't present any LMR. In sexual escalation with already present LMR, it's when a woman who was previously resisting a man (last-minute resistances) drops all her resistances and lets the man undress her and have sex with her (or helps him along the way).

- Last-minute resistance: the resistance and rejection of a man and his attempts of sexual escalation when sex seems to be getting closer -for example, once they ended up at his place after a date-
- Token resistance: when a woman rejects a man but deep down wants to actually have sex with him. Token resistances are often weak and easy to overcome

Sexual-prizing: a specific type of sexualization, consisting of the display and parading of love-making qualities to get women excited and primed for sex. Alek Rostaldt came up with the term

Social circle game: entering social circles of celebs, rich folks, or very high-value individuals to have access to tons of attractive women. Connectors are the guys who use social circle game.

Social proof: signs of someone's social success and social status within certain people or groups. Women like men who are socially successful. First described by Robert Cialdini in "Influence"

Thread amplifying: going deeper into a topic of conversation, or highlighting/cementing a reaction to a certain topic, to expand a topic of conversation that is conducive to seduction and bonding

Thread cutting: changing the topic of conversation

Validation player ™: a man who needs women and the feeling of achieving dating success to feel good about himself. The worst types of validation player get validated by a phone number, or by a positive reaction. Most validation players waste lots of time getting validated by women and achieve little in life. Also see: the psychology of PUAs.

Venue change / bouncing: the act of changing locations with a woman as a way of more quickly building rapport and intimacy

Pick-up Artistry (PUA): in seduction strategies, a movement began in the '90s focusing on learning and teaching techniques and strategies to meet and seduce women.
The movement had its advantages and disadvantages but has described many groundbreaking concepts and ideas.

Self-rejection ™: in seduction as well as in social and power dynamics, self-rejection refers to an individual who rejects, dislikes, or undermines a higher-value individual when he feels that the higher value individual looks down on him.
It can be motivated by psychological self-defense, to defend a fragile ego and self-esteem, or by social needs to defend power and status.

- Preemptive rejection: to reject someone first, often without even knowing the person, based on the belief that the individual would ignore us, or refuse to enter with us in friendly and/or value-adding exchange.
  Explanation: Preemptive rejection serves to protect one's ego and to protect one's own social status. People with a defensive mindset, big but fragile ego, and people who are high in power are more likely to preemptively reject others.

- Self-rejection, seduction: in seduction, it describes a woman who writes an otherwise attractive man off because she believes she is not interested in her or "too much" for her
- Auto-rejection: another name for self-rejection, originally developed by Sebastian Drake in pick-up circles. We renamed it "self-rejection" as it's more descriptive, and extended its application to psychology, self,-development, and all social exchanges

Counter strategy: collaborative frames, building people up, and qualifying and rewarding from a judge role.

The “high-power and high-warmth strategy” is also designed to increase social acceptance, collaboration, and social support by minimizing the instances of self-rejection.

- Similar: availability, value, SMV, frenemies, Rebels Without a Cause

Sexual Marketplace (SMP): In sexual dynamics, the sexual marketplace is the ensemble of people looking for sex or long-term pair bonding.
In the SMP people offer their sexual value (offer), compete with other members of the same gender, and seek and assess the sexual market value of potential mates from the opposite gender (demand).

- Disassortative bartering (AKA: “bottom line pairing”): disassortative bartering is a property of sexual exchanges, and describes how couples can match and enter into relationships even if their values are very different when it comes to a specific trait or quality. That is because those couples match on overall value, and if one partner has an abundance of value in one trait, he can satisfy a partner who prioritizes that trait.
  Example: an unattractive but very powerful man can still attract and pair up with an attractive woman since he has an excess of value in status and, possibly, resources.
- Disassortative relationship: when two individuals willingly enter into a relationship, while exchanging very different types of values.

- Risk-averse sexual marketplaces: sexual marketplaces where women are generally fearful of new men, or fearful of men whom they perceive as too masculine, too aggressive, or potentially dangerous. They tend to be poorer places for street cold-approaches.
  Explanation: there certainly is an overlap between risk-avoidance, sexual options, personal SMV, as well as self-esteem, but risk-avoidance is also its own variable. Risk-avoidance also has little to do with how much women like you: a risk-avoidant woman who likes you might still not come out and meet you if there is not enough “social trust”.
  Example: Korea and Japan are examples of risk-avoidant marketplace.

- Risk-taking marketplace: sexual marketplaces where women are open to meet and give all men they find attractive enough a chance.
  Example: Philippines and black African countries are places with lots of risk-taking women

Shit-tests: In seduction and power dynamics, a shit-test is defined as a test or social challenge.
It’s often the individual with more power, or the individual who assesses and/or chooses that delivers the shit test. Since women are most often the ones who choose, a shit test originally only referred to a woman testing a man. However, tests are not a prerogative of women. Choosy or high-value men can also test women, especially for their suitability as long-term partners.

- Loyalty tests: they are a form of shit tests

Show me the hand strategy ™: in power dynamics and frame control strategies, a strategy of frame control to “surface” covert aggression and passive-aggressiveness.

Explanation: It consists of bringing the covert aggression to the surface and turning it into a direct and honest aggression or criticism. That makes the nasty intentions obvious, so that the attacker must at the very least attack in the open and give up his covert-position, together with the ability to retreat and play innocent.
If with going meta you explain what they are doing, with the “show me the hand technique” you let people, directly or indirectly, show their own games and intentions more directly and explicitly.

- Show me the hand techniques: the techniques to help you bring covert poewr moves onto the open.
  Example:

Read the analysis here

Similar: surfacing, scorched earth technique, covert frames

Slut-shaming: in dating power dynamics, sexual conflict, and manipulation strategies, it consists of shaming women for apparently displaying loose morals and/or engaging in short-term dating.

Smart Alec ™: in social and power dynamics, a style of dominance centered around intellectual superiority, and looking down on others as "not smart enough" which, in turn, translates into "not good enough (for me)".
The smart-alec takes a negative judge position in social exchanges with an ever-present air of "I know better than you, there I am better than you"

Social Dynamics

The Social Investment Model™ postulates that people trade investment and value in social exchanges, with the direction and returns shaped largely by personal value, comparative value, resource availability, and strategic refinement.

Power Exchange Equation™ (AKA Social ROI): social power is equal to your returns on your social investment

Two types of ROI:

1. Factual ROI, based on actual returns (power)
2. Perceived ROI, based on visible effort (status-related)

The Law of Least Social Effort™ states that those who appear to expend less visible effort, while others invest more in them, are perceived as more powerful — and vice versa.

The Compensatory Investment Principle™ states that in relationships marked by unequal personal value, the lower-value party invests more to compensate for the imbalance, while the higher-value party can invest less without jeopardizing the relationship.

Investment Visibility Model™ postulates that social and status dynamics are largely shaped by visible investment, based on perceived investment and perceived effort.
As a result, strategic actors manage both the amount and the visibility of their own and others' investments depending on context and goals.

Accounting, social: in the social exchange model, the amounts and balances (positive or negative) of value-giving transactions (social credit-creating) and value-taking transactions (social debt-creating) that people keep track of.

Explanation: it's based on the idea that people naturally keep track of who is giving and who is taking.
Albeit few people actually write down a list of value exchanges, social favors, and social or emotional support, most people do subconsciously keep track of how much value they are giving or receiving. And most people will have a natural feel for people who are "taking" or "asking too much", and people who are "giving". Most people want to cut off the taker, and keep the giver. People are also more likely to follow and be influenced by the taker, and they are also like to want to give back to the giver, thus starting mutually collaborative, win-win relationships.

Related to: social credit scalping, WIIFM.

Blame deflection: a technique to avoid incurring social costs by deflecting the blame towards someone else, or towards a "force majeure" outside the individual's control.

Explanation: it can be a manipulative technique, but also simply smart social skills that can improve relationships, maintain rapport, or save face.

Example:

> Guy: Oh cool man, so you run a successful e-commerce, well done. May I ask you what's the niche?
> You: Thanks man, appreciate it. Yeah, look, I'd love to share it with you, but unluckily it's such a small niche that I and my partner had to promise each other never to share that with anyone (<- blames the refusal to share on the promise and the business needs'), not even our family member (<- add one more step: now the guy can't feel guilty if not even the family members are aware). The real competitive advantage is that we're the only ones doing it. But I'm happy to share the process of how we found this untapped niche (<- provides value in a different way)

Capital, social (AKA: "social bank account"): Social capital is a measure of the social credit (or debt) you have with other individuals.
Having lots of social capital means you have lots of goodwill, leverage, and influence over someone.

- Passive social capital: this is social capital that is created without any action, but by simply being, or by having a strong reputation.
  Explanation: Attractive people and successful people naturally have passive social capital, since people want them around if they haven't yet done anything concrete to help others.

Explanation: Social capital is based on the idea that every social transaction can leave people better off (value-adding, and credit-creating) or worse off (value-taking, and debt-creating).
When you take value from others, you lose social capital. When you give value, you create social capital.

Explanation 2: As a rule of thumb, social capital increases with the more you know and interact with someone, the more you have given to someone, and the higher value you are. Being high value gives you a positive social capital even when you haven't even met someone, since everyone wants to be around high-value people.

- Balanced requests (AKA: positive balance requests): requests that are fielded with enough social capital and/or personal value to cover for the effort that is being asked for.
  Explanation: it's a matter of overall balance, and not just a matter of how many favors have taken place. If the requestor has very high personal value, a series of requests can be balanced even though the requester has done nothing for the other party.
  Example: because in the eyes of many men a very attractive woman has lots of personal value in the sexual marketplace, she can ask for the man to pick her up, pay for her, and wait for sex while the man still feels it's an overall balanced relationship.

- Imbalanced requests (AKA: negative balance requests): requests that are fielded without enough social capital and/or personal value. Imbalanced requests feel off to the receiver and like the requestor is overstepping boundaries, acting annoyingly entitled, or trying to con them.
  Explanation: It's a matter of overall account, and not a matter "number of favors". Requests can be imbalanced even though the requestor has provided a lot of favors already.
  Example: a mentee asking a favor to a mentor and a report asking a favor to a boss can both run afoul of the social exchange rule even if both have already done plenty of favors, since the mentor has higher personal value (and probably status), while the boss has higher power.

Credit collection, social (AKA: "credit claiming"): to claim one's own social credit for value that has been given.

Explanation: it can be done by reminding of the value one has provided, or indirectly, by asking questions on whether or not something was provided was helpful, which prods the value-receiver to volunteer gratefulness and social credit.

Credit Revealing: to explain, surface, or instruct someone about the value that is being offered or provided. Thanks to Ali for the definition.

Explanation: in case of "opaque" currencies and value offers, people might miss on a win-win exchange because they fail to properly assess the value that someone is offering them. In those cases, "credit revealing" can help the receiver understand the value that is being offered.
Credit revealing can also be part of "fair value marketing", as well as of "credit romancing" when someone who reveals the credit also uses that occasion to thread-expand on the benefits offered, and/or to sell and persuade.

Currencies, Social: in the social exchange, social currencies are distinct forms of value that are traded among individuals.

Explanation: Value can be delivered in all types of forms. The social currency refers to the specific form that the value is delivered. Currencies are all types of physical and personal traits, possessions, or skills that people value. The more sought-after currencies an individual has, the more successful he will be socially, and the easier it will be for him to climb social hierarchies, and get what he wants.

- Currency denomination (high / low): to be high or low value in a certain trait. However, "denomination" is not a widely used or accepted term in the social sciences.
- Hard social currencies (Or: global social currencies): forms of social value that are appreciated everywhere. Wealth, positive attitude, uplifting humor, and connections tend to be valued everywhere.
- Opacity: it refers to the visibility of a currency's value, and how "hidden" the value of a certain currency is.
  Explanation: Highly opaque currencies trade poorly in social exchanges because people can't assess their true value.
  Example: A great book. It can change lives, but until people read it, it's just a (value-less) piece of paper.
- Soft Social currencies (Or: local social currencies): currencies that are valued by a specific group or subculture.
- Sexual currencies: the traits that are sought after in the sexual market place. There is a strong overlap between sexual currencies and social currencies.

Gravitational law: a law of social dynamics stating that the importance and relevance of an event or individual is inversely proportional to its value and distance

Explanation: similar to the physical gravitational law, from which it derives its name. It has two components: the distance (proximity rule) of an event or individual to us, and its value, which also affects the ability of the event or individual to affect us.
The value is the equivalent of the "mass" in physics, and it's part of the "value accounting" considerations, dynamics, and strategies.

Examples: see an example of proximity here, and you can see plenty of examples of both proximity and value in the "enlightened individualism" article.

Uncollected credits, social: to provide value, but never to collect any social credit for it.

Example: to provide help in an anonymous form, or to help people just for the pleasure of helping.
Some individuals can also seek to self-efface social credit in order to save face for the receiver -imagine you giving a homeless some food and saying "oh no, please, it's nothing"-.

Explanation: not collecting credit can be a good and friendly thing to do, but can also be naive if you let someone take advantage of you and never give any fair value back.
For example, a salesman who brings in a lot of revenue but remains on a small salary and takes no commission is not being "nice", he's being "clueless".

Collaboration, Social

Collaboration: in social exchanges and relationships, to work together (collaborate) for "enlarging the pie", and for win-win.

Explanation: ThePowerMoves.com promotes collaboration as the ideal relationships, since collaboration increases your power and leverage over the world.
All our civilization has been built on collaboration, and by increasing the scope of collaboration you can increase your power.

- Collaborative attitude: the general attitude of people who believe in collaboration and prefer to collaborate. There is an overlap with the "value-giver" mindset"
- Envious collaborator™: a bean counter when it comes to social accounting, he collaborates only when his payoffs are bigger than the other party's payoffs.
- Fearful semi-collaborator™: he wishes to collaborate and sometimes does so, but he is too afraid of going all in. Afraid to get hurt in love and relationships, and afraid that he might make his friends and colleagues too strong in the process. He leaves value on the table, value that is lost both to him, and the people he crosses path with
- Naive collaborator™: he collaborates with everyone, and tends to trust too much. Alternatively, the naive collaborator believes in karma or in the theory that if you just give, give, and give, you're bound to receive back.
- Smart collaborator™: the smart collaborator seeks collaboration and actively expands the scope of collaboration. When unsure, he seeks to cover his downsides while leading with collaboration first ("collaborative foot forward" and "tit-for-that strategy"). But smart collaborators know human nature, and are aware of the opportunities for cheating that less ethical folks will be happy to exploit. So they observe people and keep an eye open to make sure they are also giving back.
- Machiavellian collaborator™: he collaborates when it's good for him only, and always keeps an eye on how he can get more, either with silver-tongue manipulation, or outright cheating. Also, he always keeps an eye on his grander strategy, and if defecting gives him a higher chance of winning the war, he will defect no matter how many times he previously cooperated.
- Honorable collaborator™: approaches others with a baseline of preferring win-win, and takes it upon himself to not only take, but also ensure other are getting value from him. He prefers forgoing extra gains from cheating, even when it would be instrumentally advantageous.

Related to: expanding the pie (in negotiation), value-giving mindset, defection (the opposite of collaboration).

Collaborative frames ™: collaborative frames serve to inform and/or to remind people that our goals and intentions are win-win.
Collaborative frames can often decrease resistance and increase collaboration.

- Collaborative shaming ™: a step of "collaborative refraing" see main entry

- Collaborative feints™: in manipulative strategies, pretending to be collaborative while actually nudging towards a trap or preparing to defect.
  Example: "don't be so defensive" power move
  - Peace feints: pretending to be friendly or to seek peace, while actually nudging towards a trap

Collaborative reframing ™: a strategy to turn neutral or antagonistic interactions into collaborative ones.
Explanation: it serves to remind people of the win-win opportunities of collaboration, and it increases the odds of developing win-win and value-adding relationships

Collaborative shaming ™: in power dynamics and life strategies, a technique that serves to increase the scope for collaboration and decrease the scope for win-lose games. Collaborative shaming consists of shaming someone for playing win-lose games or nasty power moves with the intent of making them backtrack, apologize, or drop the win-lose games in favor of more collaborative approaches.
Collaborative shaming is delivered from a judge role, and often followed by collaborative frames to reach a better win-win outcome for both.

Similar: shaming, collaborative frames, value-adding dominance, value-adding leadership

Defection: in social exchanges and relationships, to refuse collaboration. It can mean to either refuse to play at all ("value-neutral defection" or "opportunity loss defection"), or to play for win-lose ("win-lose defection" or "value-taking defection").
Some defectors defect because of a defensive mindset where they focus more on the possibility for losses, than on the opportunities for victory.

Explanation: ThePowerMoves.com encourages to recognize defectors, especially the value-taking ones, and either engage them with the same win-lose mindset, or to cut them out of your life.

- Defector attitude: the general attitude of people who believe in defection and prefer to cheat and/or to avoid others. There is an overlap with the "value-taking mindset".
- Envious defector: He defects because he can't stand that someone might alos gain from collaboration. Frenemies are envious defectors in friendships.
- Fearful defector: he is so afraid of being cheated, that he either avoids the game altogether, or approaches the game with a mindset of "I'll cheat first".
  Similar to: defensive mindset, pessimists.
- Sexual marketplace defectors: individuals or groups who defect dating adn relationships. Red pill men are sometimes defensive and fearful defectors who approach dating with a win-lose mindset, while MGTOW men defect dating altogether. Same for "feminazis".
- Sour grapes defector: an individual who is not particularly valuable in an exchange and pretends to refuse the game first.

Turkey downward spiral: A nasty back and forth of lose-lose power moves and attacks, often accompanied by mental and emotional investment in the fight

Explanation: You're in a turkey downward spiral when a turkey pulls a power move, you let it affect you, respond (ie.: "stoop lower", rather than "go higher") and end up mired in a nasty exchange with many back and forth, or in a competitive relationship (in either case: you end up mired in turkey manure).
To avoid turkeys' death embrace, whenever possible, ignore, go higher, or end it resolutely -so that you win, without a lose-lose downward spiral-.

Similar: lose-lose, slippery slope, baits

Strategies

Strategies: in life strategies and self-development, strategies refer to the plans and approaches to reach a certain goal.

- Life strategies: overarching strategies
- Sexual strategies (AKA: dating strategies): strategies that both men and women engage during the courtship phase and/or around sex
- Social strategies: strategies around people and groups, including gaining status, persuading others, recruiting others
- Machiavellian strategies: amoral, potentially manipulative and value-taking strategies

Aligning, Power: in power dynamics and life strategies, power aligning is a chameleon-like strategy of aligning with those who have power.
It consists of adapting the views, values, opinions, and styles of those in power, and it can include adding value with favors, social support, or ingratiating (public) flattery.
In business, it also consists of embracing and supporting whatever strategy or change the top leadership promoted.

Explanation:
It tends to be a very effective strategy since people want to promote and reward those who are like them, and those who support them.

Outside of humans:
A very effective strategy in the animal kingdom, as well. Look for example at the animal species who are thriving, like dogs and cats, and those who are dying, like tigers and elephants. The thriving ones power-aligned with the apex predators: humans.

Bluff, power: to pretend or to feign power or leverage that doesn't actually exist.
Source: Stef.

Explanation:
The ability to fake power can be power by itself. Fake power becomes true/real power IF people take it as real or even if you just instill enough doubt in their minds/hearts to alter their mindset, mood, emotions, actions, reactions, behavior, etc.
Kind of a "self-fulfilling prophecy" or "reflexivity phenomena" as George Soros would put it.
If bluff power is internalized, it can also lead to congruent behavior by the bluffer, which feels and acts like he indeed possesses the power that he is faking.
Obviously, it's a risky strategy if someone calls your bluff.

Crying Wolf: to exaggerate the extent of one's woes or difficulties in order to garner more attention, and to increase the odds of being helped.

Explanation:
Crying wolf can often work to get more attention, and it can also sometimes increase the odds of being helped.
But also comes at a personal high cost in terms of status, respect, and power. In simple terms, the high cost is that it makes you sound like a (hysterical) bitch.
High power folks often make it a point not to exaggerate their woes and instead often do the opposite: they seek to show calm and poise when most other people would be panicking.
So either use it judiciously and in limited circumstances, or just always avoid it.

Example: “Please, please help me”;
From the forums, a user wrote: ” This is a life-changing situation, so depending on your advice Lucio”.
Also see this thread which includes a deeper explanation.

So Good They Can’t Ignore You: in life and career strategies, focusing on mastery and providing the best service or product one could ever provide. Sometimes, it is used as a move value-adding alternative to politicking or more Machiavellian strategies.

- Too Good to Be Fucked With (TGFW): a similar focus on being great, but with a look more on power dynamics, status, and realpolitik strategies. It means that, together with being good, you also care about your reputation. When your reputation has reached the higher-ups and they can be considered allies and mentors of yours, then you’re on your way to becoming TGFW. See the description in real-life here.

Social Strategies

Buttercup technique: to compliment someone directly to his supervisor.

Explanation: since most people want to look good in their boss eyes, you deliver far more value when you compliment them to their bosses. You also indirectly introduce yourself to his boss, which also further spreads your name/brand and increases your clout.

Honorable man approach: to live life with certain values and a general prefence for win-win

Strategic Honor™: the practice of acting honorably but with power intelligence, and while remaining strategic with dishonest, exploitative, or competitive actors and in competitive settings.

Surfacing ™: in social dynamics, the act of bringing issues to the surface, so that they can be discussed and addressed in the open.
Surfacing is an advanced, yet fundamental technique for relationship management. It’s crucial because many people are not direct and brave enough to discuss their issues and gripes. And issues that remain below the surface, by remaining unaddressed, can lead to festering, which can eventually sour a relationship. Surfacing those issues instead allow people to address them, and potentially even improve the relationship.

Related: festering, direct talk

The 48 Laws of Power: in power dynamics literature, a popular book on tactical-level power dynamics.

The Prince: in power dynamics literature, the first and most famous book on realpolitik strategies in the West. Other books like the Arthashastra of Kautilya, written long before the prince, could also be classified as “realpolitik”.
Credit: thanks to Stefano for fixing this one!

Time preference: the current relative valuation placed on receiving a good or pleasure at an earlier date compared with receiving it at a later date.
Explanation: it says a lot about an individual’s psychological makeup if they prefer everything right now, or if they tend to savor and/or save for the future.

- Present preference: a preference for immediate consumption
- Future preference: a preference for saving or investing for the future

Trump card: In life strategies and power dynamics, to be confident that if a final escalations were to happen, you would win it.

Scapegoat: in social and power dynamics, to scapegoat, is the act of blaming someone else for faults that are not his.

The scapegoat is the person who takes the blame.

Self-agency principle: in social dynamics and persuasion strategies, the tendency for persuasion that includes the target's own volution, to be more effective and long-lasting.
In simpler terms: if you make people want to do something, it works better than pushing them.
Self-agency is based on more than one psychological principle. To begin with, people prefer dealing with those who use pull techniques (persuasion through buy-in) more than push techniques (raw dominance and hard sales technique).
And people who freely choose to do something develop more intrinsic motivation, as well as being more likely to follow through with the agreement.

Similar: buy-in, less dominance is more power, pull, power through

Sexual Market Value: in dating, intersexual dynamics and sexual power dynamics, the personal value that one has in the sexual market place.

Sexualization: in dating and sexual strategies, to introduce sexual topics in a conversation to purposefully excite the dating partner and/or to make sure this is a date for assessing intimacy and relationship opportunities and not a safe coffee "between friends".

Similar: sexual prizing, sexual frames, chase frames

Shame attacks in social and power dynamics, to shame people for their behavior or personality.
The shame attacker is the person who deploys shame attacks. He takes a highly negative and judgmental judge role, and seeks to frame the victim as an unworthy human being.

Similar: purists, moralizers, firestarters,

Shine up, praise down ™: in Machiavellian strategies, the more effective version of "kiss up, kick down", consisting of a boss making his reports feel good with emotional validation, while taking all the credits for the team or individuals' effort.

Social justice warrior (SJW): a generally low social status individual who signals his virtues (virtue-signaling) by publicly and conspicuously embracing a set of supposedly prosocial values, norms, and behaviors.
It's often an attempt at acquiring social status, sexual options, and enhancing one's own reputation as "good" and "trustworthy". It's also a technique to signal one's own belonging to a certain group of people that the SJW considers "good" or "cool".
SJWs sometimes embrace causes that have little actual effect on the big issues they pretend they're tackling.

Compare: Social justice warriors are mostly followers of trends, while the purists and fanatics of this world set the agenda for the SJWs to follow.

Social climbing: in social and power dynamics, social climbing is the pursuit of social status, including all the attempts at increasing one's ranking within dominance hierarchies.
Social climbing intended in neutral form is what most driven people do, and is not necessarily win-lose or negative per se. However, the term is often used in the negative (value-taking or win-lose social climbing), as in the social climber being too obvious, or using win-lose power moves that push other people down (social pegs).

- Social climbing in absentia ™: a special type of social climbing consisting of talking bad about others who are not present to look better by contrast.
- Hostile climber™ : a social climber that advances exclusively through competition and win-lose exchanges. He uses socially aggressive tactics, as well they use blatant power moves to inflate one's own status, plus using others as social pegs in win-lose exchanges
- Imaginary social climbing: to social climb by making up hypothetical situations where the social climber would have acted in cool and high-status ways.

Imaginary social climbing can be both neutral, without pushing anyone down, or it can be value-taking social climbing, when it pushes others down. The name derives from “imaginary generosity” in social scalping, thanks to Anon in the forum.
Example: man, if you were there yesterday, I would have introduced you to 10 hotshots in your industry, and sent you home with one of the hotties in my group

Standard games: in social dynamics and manipulative strategies, standard games are games that we all more or less engage in. For example, in dating it’s hiding in the beginning how much we like a man or a woman.
In social dynamics, an example is to seek to lower people’s expectations to beat them, or to hide our weaknesses to present ourselves in the best light we can.

Note: albeit standard games are usually not harmful, extreme forms of standard games can become harmful to the victim, and/or unhealthy for the perpetrator.

Tasking ™: in power dynamics, the act of assigning tasks to others.
In power dynamics, tasking empowers the person who tasks others (tasker) and disempowers the person who is tasked (taskee).
In courtship and seduction, tasking by a man and execution by a woman indicates she accepts his leadership.

- Lateral tasking: when tasking happens from an individual of the same rank and/or from the same level of social status, experience, or skills
- Upward tasking: when tasking happens from an individual of low rank and/or of lower social status, experience, or skills
- Downward tasking: when tasking happens from an individual of higher rank and/or of higher social status, experience, or skills

Explanation: while tasking is expected and normal when people with higher ranks task people with lower ranks (downward tasking), it can become a major win-lose power move when tasking happens from people who are theoretically on the same level (lateral tasking).
That’s how sometimes promotions are decided: a same-rank individual starts tasking another one, and he becomes the de-facto leader/boss. When it’s promotion time, the tasker becomes the natural choice for promotion since he is already acting like he’s above the taskee.

The Power Moves: the first website dedicated to advanced social skills and power dynamics.

Threshold Effect ™: in social exchanges, it’s the property of some generally and otherwise attractive traits to become unattractive above a certain threshold.
Different traits can have different threshold effects depending on the individual, the situation, or the specific exchange.

- Sexual threshold effect: (formally: Male social-sexual threshold disconnect) male qualities such as beard, low voices, and muscles have no threshold effect in gaining male respect within social hierarchies. But they do have a threshold effect with women, in dating.

Traumatic one-trial learning: explosive anger, or other intimidating behavior to establish dominance or superiority to condition or train the victim to avoid upsetting, confronting or contradicting the manipulator

Trap questions ™: in power dynamics and manipulative strategies, a generic, umbrella term for any type of questions that intends to harm the victim, or back him into a corner.

- Leading questions: the asker asks a question that is designed to lead towards the answer that he wanted to elicit
- Brag for me: a special type of trap question where the aggressor surreptitiously invites the victim to show off, brag. And bragging and showing off look weak, more often than not

- Pull ranks for me: a special type of questions or assertions that nudges people into pulling rank and tell others "they are the boss" and have "official authority". Since bosses who rely on official authority look weak, this can be an effective technique to make bosses look weak

Counter strategy: see "handling trap questions".

Validation whoring: in social dynamics, validation whores are individuals who seek emotional validation and rewards for their personalities, looks, or achievements.
They often have fragile egos and fixed mindsets.

Similar: thirst-traps (sexy pictures), flex accounts (showing off on Instagram)

Example: see this post on validation whoring on FB.

- Attention whoring: very similar to validation whoring, but the attention whore is less discriminating as to the type of attention, and will take both negative and positive feedback as long as he is in the spotlight.

Virtue signaling: in social and power dynamics, the act of publicly and conspicuously embracing a set of supposedly prosocial values, norms, and behaviors.
Virtue signalers sometimes use moralizing against others as a way of social-climbing and looking purer.

- Disempowering virtue-signaling: when virtue signaling targets an individual or a specific group of people, often "minorities", and gets tinged with a "poor you" hue, and (unwillingly) frames the target of virtue signaling as inferior, less powerful, or in need of help.
- Self-signaling: to attack someone as a way of feeling better about themselves. Ie.: "I attack this guy, so I must be better". Often, it's a way of hiding one's own shadow and dark side.

See an example here:

Similar: SJW, moralizers, purists

Upcoming young guns: in power dynamics, a style of dominance based on confidence and over-display of confidence. The upcoming young gun carries himself with an air of "I am the best, and I'm on my way to the top".

Value-giver: an individual who gives value to others.

- Value-matcher: an individual who gives back the value that he has received. Value-matchers turn value-givers when a positive and reinforcing win-win cycle has been established (credits to John for coming up with word)

Value-giving behavior (AKA "value-adding behavior") in social and power dynamics, behavior that, on net balance, is either win-win, or that removes opportunities for abuse, or win-lose. ThePowerMoves.com promotes the adoption of value-adding mindsets and behaviors.

Note: that "net balance" is important. Value-adding behavior can be initially aggressive if it serves to stop abuse or change someone's mind in a way that leads to win-win. Or it can shame someone into dropping games if that serves to adopt more collaborative approaches (collaborative shaming).

- Value-adding leadership: a type of leadership that adds value to the group, and it's Lucio's main goal for those studying on ThePowerMoves.com
- Value-adding dominance: a type of dominance and social power that adds value
- Value-adding lover: a type of lover that rejects the most blatant manipulation and seeks to add value to the women who enter into his life
- Value-adding mindset: the mindset of someone who wants to add value to those around him, to his partner(s), or to society at large. People who seek success by fixing problems or providing solutions also seek personal success with a value-adding mindset
- Utilitarian value-adding: behavior that is negative for one individual if but off-set by far larger gains by someone else, or by a group, or society

Value-taker: an individual who, on net balance, takes value.

Explanation: in simple terms, people who make you "worse off". There countless types of value takers and countless ways of being value-taking, but some of the most important groups:

- Active / passive value-takers: active value takers take value through their actions. passive value-takers take value even while doing nothing. For example, a homeless and smelly individual will take value even while taking no active action (credit to John for leading to this category)
- Agreeable / disagreeable value-taker: agreeable value takers act friendly and likable on the surface, and that surface can help them go undetected. disagreeable value-taker are more obvious and "in your face" (credit to John)
- Entitled value-taker: people who feel like they should have access to high-value people to values they seek and want, but don't realize they must have or give something back for that person to want to share their value
- Voluntary / involuntary value-taker: important difference between people who take value willingly or consciously and people who take value unwillingly or unconsciously. Involuntary value takes might have terrible social skills and make you look bad with their social ineptitude, but aren't willingly doing so
- Proud value-taker: people who their ego around their value-taking approach to life, and their value-taking behavior. Proud value takers feel "cool" for cheating and not being caught, as well as feeling cool for their "ability" to destroy, take, or leech onto others.
- Small-time value takers: low-value people in low-status positions who do no make any effort to give, but are always first in line when it comes to taking and demanding.
  These are the people who loaf the whole day, and then, when there are still colleagues needing his help, he proclaims that it's 17:30, and he's exhausted and needs to go.
- Value-leechers: an extreme and/repeated form of value-taking. For some, it can be a social strategy or a life strategy

Value-taking behavior (AKA: value-subtracting): behavior that, on net balance, is either win-lose, lose-lose, or that removes opportunities for win-win and collaboration.

- Value-taking mindset: (AKA: “win-lose mindset”): the mindset of those who seek success and power by taking as much as possible while giving as little as possible. These individuals are often “prideful value takers” as well. Value-taking mindset in relationships seeks power by taking away options and instilling fear (dread game, sexual triangulation, breakup threats, isolation, etc.), rather than by being great partners.

Techniques

Brag declaration: to call out one’s own bragging with the goal of delivering a self-promotional message, while limiting the social downsides of bragging

Explanation: Overt bragging comes at a cost. It often suggests you’re trying to gain power or authority, and that you want other people to admire you and/or like you, which is narcissistic and often not what a respected leader and/or high-quality person would do.
When you call out your own brag, you communicate that you’re aware of that, which gives you some points by itself just for “getting it”, and you change the frame of your promotional message from “I’m bragging” to “I’m being a bit cheeky here”.

Example: “alright, bragging time now, but I actually did climb Everest”.
“shameless bragging ahead”; “alright, my time for some bragging now…. “

Humblebragging: a power move that, on the surface, seems like a neutral complaint, a joke, or even a value-taking self-deprecation, but that instead raises the value, status, or power of the humble-bragger.

Tail-End Questions: a rhetorical question that is the last or hindmost part of a message and that serves to draw attention to the main message, get more buy-in, or further benefit and empower either the message itself or the messenger.

Examples: “does that make sense?”; “It’s a bit complex, I hope it’s clear?”; “wow, that was long, but I think it’s important because it might be the solution we’re looking for”.

Power Moves

Half-step power move (AKA: Innuendo power move”)
Example: “if you’re up to meet… “ imply or half-say what you wanna say, but don’t fully propose it to maintain power and have the other party act on an innuendo, rather than an actual straight outreach.
That way, they’re coming to you.

Manipulative thread expansion (or “latch onto power move”): to start from something that someone else said or did and spin it and expand it to fit the manipulator’s goals.
Thanks to Bel.

“You’re like I used to be power move”
Example: ” I used to be like that “

Which sub-communicates that the power mover is at a “higher level of development” and the receiver is “stuck at a lower level”.

Eventually, maybe… the receiver will reach that point.

That speaker then doesn’t even have to convince or provide good arguments.
As a matter of fact, not providing any argument and not even continuing to talk is then a “fly higher” manipulative (fake) punishment: he has no time for those beneath him, so he stops engaging, and leaves him to wallow in his inferiority.

Raging
To express intense anger and aggressive and potentially threatening nonverbals at someone.

Raging can be either “honest” rage when someone is truly out of control, or it can be a ploy to The goal is to intimidate others into submissive compliance.

Triangular raging: Bel noted that the aggressor hides under the cover of raging against a third party -an inanimate object, a past event, or another person that may or may not be present to the raging session- with the goal of intimidating the target victim(s).

Mental Empowerment

Mental empowerment concerns the power dynamics and self-development efforts that are within the individual.

Empowered Mind Principle™ states that the mind is the source layer of all downstream behavior, influence, and outcomes (Source Layer Principle) . An empowered internal state produces naturally congruent and effective behavior, while a weakened or reactive state produces inconsistency regardless of will and personal ambitions.

Effective spirituality™ combines the positive elements and outcomes of spirituality such as emotional resilience and unneediness, while maintaining the drive, ambition, and effectiveness of an agentic approach to life

Ego loss, social : in extreme forms of identity leeching, when an individual gives up his individuality to derives his whole sense of self (identity) from his affiliation to a specific individual, or his belonging to a specific group.
This is the ultimate state of giving up personal agency and control.

Examples: kamikazes sacrificing the self for the group, and People’s Temple members committing suicide when Jim Jones ordered so.

Identity leeching (AKA: “identity projecting”) ™: in psychology and social psychology, to project and merge one’s own sense of identity with a larger social group or, alternatively, with a specific individual.
Albeit some identity leeching can be normal and healty, too much identity leeching, or identity projecting onto the wrong groups and causes, can be toxic and disempowering.

Examples: some men feel good when other men “put women in their place” because they project their identity onto the “men’s collective” (see example below):

NateSim finds it satisfying to watch a man overtake a woman because he is a closeted misogynist and an ego-leecher. Meaning, he projects and merges his identity with the whole male group. Then when men "beat" women, he piggy-backs on other men's success to feel better about himself

Identity leecher (AKA: ego leecher) (group): someone with a rather mediocre life who derives pride and self-esteem not from what he does, but from what his group of reference doesIdentity leechers (ideal): identity leeching towards an ideal, a flag, or an institution

Example: "I'm great and better than you because I'm from X country"

- Fanboy identity leecher (individual gurus): identity leeching from an individual "guru", leader, or thought leader. The identity leecher buys into whatever the guru says, and the guru's success becomes his success. The most fanatic and manipulative thought leaders want their followers to project their identities onto them
- Identity projection manipulation: keep in mind the possibility of manipulation and personal disempowerment here: most group leaders and gurus want their members and followers to give up their identity and individualism to merge with the group, since that gives the leaders more power
- Subordinate identity: to feel represented by someone who is higher up in a hierarchy, for example, a boss, a CEO, or a country president

Explanation:

Subordinate identity concerns people who haven't yet developed a strong sense of self. They then project their identity onto external entities, including groups, famous or successful people, or people with a higher rank.

The individual with a "subordinate identity" then feels either personally augmented or diminished depending on what those higher-ups are doing.
Subordinate identity gives away personal power and agency. And automatically places the individual beneath others.

The higher power alternative instead is to only feel responsible for oneself, and only represented by one's own personal actions.

Ultralearning: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 31 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Ultra Learning (2019), lays out a strategy for acquiring skills and knowledge in a way that is both self-directed and intense. Scott Young, the author, explains that it's a strategy to get good at something as quickly as possible.

Bullet Summary

- Ultralearning is a strategy to learn as quickly and as effectively as possible to cut your time short on your way to mastery
- Ultralearning can be enjoyable, but it's also as likely to be challenging, intense, and tough
- Ultralearning focuses on lots of repeated practice

Summary

About the Author: Scott Young defines himself as an author, programmer, and entrepreneur. He has been writing on his own blog since 2006.

1. What is Ultralearning?

> Ultralearning is a strategy for acquiring skills and knowledge that is both self-directed and intense.

And, adds Scott Young:

> The core of the ultralearning strategy is intensity, and a willingness to prioritize effectiveness.

More on what ultralearning really is:

- Ultralearning is a strategy. as all strategies, it's contextual, so it can be suited for certain challenges and situations, but not others
- Ultralearning is self-directed. it's about you. You decide what to learn and why
- Ultralearning is intense. this is not about "flow", it's about learning both quickly and effectively, seeking rapid progress with great efficiency

Now, let's get down to the concrete steps for an ultralearning project:

2. The 9 Steps of Ultralearning

The nine principles are…

1. Metalearning: First Draw a Map. Start by learning how to learn the subject or skill you want to tackle. Learn how to do good research and how to draw on your past competencies to learn new skills more easily.

2. Focus: Sharpen Your Knife. Cultivate the ability to concentrate. Carve out chunks of time when you can focus on learning, and make it easy to just do it. The problems related to focus are three:
   1. Starting: tell yourself you can do just a few minutes before taking a break. That's often enough to get you going. Then you can move to the Pomodoro Technique: 20 minutes of focus and 5 minutes break.
   2. Sustaining (aka: getting distracted): don't worry about having long stretches of time. Learn to focus as much as possible even when you have little time.
   3. Optimizing: complex tasks may benefit from low arousals, such as no noise whatsoever, but simpler tasks may benefit from a place like a workshop. But ultimately, you need to test it for yourself
3. Directness: Go Straight Ahead. Learn by doing the thing you want to become good at. Don't trade if off for other tasks, just because those are more convenient or comfortable.
4. Drill: Attack Your Weakest Point. Be ruthless in improving your weakest points. Break down complex skills into small parts; then master those parts and build them back together again.
5. Retrieval: Test to Learn. Testing isn't simply a way of assessing knowledge but a way of creating it. Test yourself before you feel confident, and push yourself to actively recall information rather than passively review it.
   1. Forward testing: Retrieval helps you learn and remember even before you even begin studying!
   2. Take notes as questions instead of answers
6. Feedback: Don't Dodge the Punches. Feedback is harsh and uncomfortable. Know how to use it without letting your ego get in the way. Extract the signal from the noise, so you know what to pay attention to and what to ignore.
   The 3 types of feedback are:
   1. Outcome feedback: less useful, but can help
   2. Informational feedback: provides more precise information on what you did well or bad
   3. Corrective feedback: provides information on what you did well or not good, plus how you can fix it
   4. Praise can be harmful: "When feedback steers into evaluations of you as an individual (e.g., "You're so smart!" or "You're lazy"), it usually has a negative impact on learning"
7. Retention: Don't Fill a Leaky Bucket. Understand what you forget and why. Learn to remember things not just for now but forever.
8. Intuition: Dig Deep Before Building Up. Develop your intuition through play and exploration of concepts and skills. Understand how understanding works, and avoid having recourse to cheap tricks of memorization to avoid deeply knowing things.
   1. Struggle timer: don't give up too early, give yourself a struggle time during which you'll just keep enduring and trying
   2. Prove things: don't just understand things, but try to prove them
   3. Always start with a concrete example: most people learn abstract, general rules only after being exposed to many concrete examples. When you don't have an example, try to come up with one. If you can't you haven't learned the principle
   4. Ask yourself lots of questions, even dumb ones: don't fool yourself, and you're the easiest one to fool
9. Experimentation: Explore Outside Your Comfort Zone. The mindset of experimentation is a more advanced form of a growth mindset from Carol Dweck. It doesn't just assume growth is possible, but enacts a strategy.
   All these principles are only starting points. World-class mastery comes from exploring possibilities they haven't yet imagined. And the better you become, the more you need to experiment.
   1. Copy and create

2. Compare methods side by side
3. Introduce new constraints
4. Combine two different skills
5. Explore the extremes

Talent VS Practice: Both Matter

We know this:

Some authors say that the brain is only malleable to a limited extent (Pinker, 2002).
While some others, especially the self-help gurus, like to say that talent matters little or nothing.

Scott is in the middle.
He says:

> I take a middle position between those two extremes.
> I think that natural talents exist and that they undoubtedly influence the results we see (especially at extreme levels, as in the case of Tao). I also believe that strategy and method matter, too.

Sensible position, I think.

"Flow" is BS and Useless for Ultralearning

Alright, that title is a clickbait :).
Scott Young never said that, of course.
However, it is true that "flow", as pioneered by research psychologist Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi, has been somewhat over-hyped. Especially when it comes to actually learn things.

Peak performance researcher K. Anders Ericsson, the researcher behind deliberate practice and author of "Peak", argues that flow has characteristics that are "inconsistent with the demands of deliberate practice for monitoring explicit goals and feedback and opportunities for error correction.

Says Scott:

> My own thought is that a flow state is not impossible during ultralearning. Many cognitive activities associated with learning are in the range of difficulty that makes flow possible or even likely. However, I also agree with Ericsson that learning often involves entering into situations in which the difficulty makes flow impossible.

Bullet Wisdom

- If you're too busy, you can use ultralearning with part-time projects, learning sabbaticals, and reimagining existing learning efforts
- Break up your sessions

Says Scott Young:

> Researchers generally find that people retain more of what they learn when practice is broken into different studying periods than when it is crammed together. Similarly, the phenomenon of interleaving suggests that even within a solid block of focus, it can make sense to alternate between different aspects of the skill or knowledge to be remembered.

- Duolingo (and other cool apps) might not help you learn

Duolingo is built to increase usage, not to make learning more efficient.
Also see my review on the Blinkist app, which I suspect as being very similar.

- You need practical examples to learn

That's why this website and Power University are chock-full of real-life examples.

CONS

- One example felt just a tad forced

Sometimes it felt like the author painted one or two of the success stories in a way to make them seem more impressive.
For example, he says:

> Half in disbelief, she glanced at the referee, expecting him to indicate that Kasparov had cheated. Yet the referee didn't challenge the grand master. Reeling from the move, Polgár lost the game.

We don't know if Polgar lost the game because of that touch.
The author also seems to frame Polgar as better than Kasparov, but Polgar, albeit a prodigy and the best female chess player, never became a world champion.

But it's truly small stuff, otherwise, there are no real "cons".

PROS

- Treasure throve to reach mastery

For those who want to reach mastery, "Ultralearning" provides the tools, the mindsets, and even the encouraging stories (but then again, my guess is that most ultralearners need no encouraging stories).

Indeed, I added it in my list of best psychology books under the section of "psychology of achievement".

- Great author

And by "great author" I mean Scott Young provides a level-headed analysis grounded in science, intelligent analysis, and rational thinking.

Ultralearning Review

Ultralearning is a mix of learning strategies, studying and learning tips, plus evidence-based success stories for those who need some inspiration.

Dating Red Flags: Top 8 Nasty Games Women Use

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Recognizing red flags early is key to avoiding toxic relationships with manipulative individuals.

When you learn to read women effectively, you gain the power to choose collaborative, kind, and supportive partners.

As the most visited website on power dynamics and strategies, we bring our expertise in manipulation tactics and human behavior to help you spot the top 8 red flags in dating.

Let's dive in:

- Summary

1. “I’m The Prize” Games

Frames your as (far) lower value, having to win her over and make up the value imbalance

Including:

- Taking without giving: to sub-communicate she is worth more
  - ‘Entitled princess’ attitude towards receiving
- Princess on pea games: acting disgusted by “commoner behavior.”
- Ridiculing your courtship.
  Ie.: “*Oh, you brought pink roses*?”, implying ‘Are you stupid?’your l

⍰ Example 1: your money, her choice

> Me: (expects to pick the place as the inviter)
> Her: (expects to be invited, pick the place, and acts disrespectful)

Yep, definitely relationship material there ⍰.

Haughty attitude and nonverbals are always red flags

⍰ Example 2: From teamwork, to your work

I once set up a picnic with a date, agreeing we'd both bring something.
She brought nothing.

Similar:

- Calls the next round, without offering it
- Talks Saint Valentine -but receiving only

Why it backfires

"I'm the prize" games 'work' to get as much as possible from power-unaware men.

Some gold-diggers even wrote books about it:

- Ho Tactics
- A Gold Digger Guide

However, for effective women's dating "I'm the prize" games fail because of the social exchange rule: high-quality men move to better women, and only lower-status men will stick around.

2. Attacks & Challenges

She approaches the relationship as a competition rather than a union that makes both better.

⍰ Example

> Her: (aggressive)

But note at 3:51:

> Her: I have over 37.000 followers, thank you so much
> Him: 36.999 of which are mine <— Pushes her down.
> ⍰⍰ It's HIM who also encourages confrontational behavior ⍰⍰♂

2.2. Vengeful tit for that

If they feel disempowered, they (over-)retaliate to restore balance

This was a smaller red flag -later confirmed valid-.
But this one disqualified her for good:

> Me: (asks if she's born woman) <— Fair question in SE Asia. I asked hundreds of women, all understood
> Her: Are you born male <— Vengeful question back, asked twice
> Me: (explains why it's not the same)
> Her: (demands info she wasn't previously interested in) <— 'Get even' mode
> Me: (calls)
> Her: (doesn't pick up)
> Her: You can call now <— Dictates my time

I dropped her after that.

Why it backfires

High-quality men who make for the best relationship partners aren't looking for a woman to compete with them.

They're already competitive with their mission, work, and sport.
When they come home, they want a supportive, feminine woman.

3. Power Scalping

Taking advantage of your weakness or mistake to further disempower you

Every move forward carries a small risk.
A good woman helps you save face during rejection, but a bad one exploits your vulnerability

⍰ Examples

- You invite her out, she says "I'm not sure, what do you have in mind" <— Thread expands your pursuit, making you chase and invest more
- You say "You're very interesting", she replies "Thanks, many men court me" <— Rebuffs your compliment and frames it like one of many courtship attempts

⍰ Exploiting A Flirt

> Me: (flirts to potentially lead to a date / meet)
> Her: (spurns me to gain power) <— ⍰⍰ 'Ahaha you like me, joke's on you'

P.S.:
Never be vulnerable with these people unless it's a test of their personality.
And read this:

- Vulnerability is NOT power

Why it backfires

That lady, liked me, somewhat.

That's why she texted me, and that's why she asked me questions.

However, instead of collaborating and moving the relationship forward, she decided to one-up me and seek personal short-term power.

She sacrificed long-term win-win, for short-term win.

I pondered whether I should go for collaborative shaming, or simply drop it.
I decided to drop it.

3.2. Nasty Sexual Rejections

The nastiness is not the refusal of course, but the purposefully over-dramatization.
For example, fake disgust:

The sub-communication is:

> You want me more than I want you.
> And my over-reaction shows the gap is so large.

⍰ Similar Examples

I once had a small girl home but with huge breasts.

The moment I started touching her she cautioned me that “it wasn’t good for me”.

What was she doing?

She was implying that she wasn’t going to have sex that night. Me touching her would get me horny, not her, and ultimately leave me dissatisfied.
⍰ I was attracted to her, but she wasn’t attracted to me -makes you wonder why she’d come on a date with me-.

That’s sexual one-upping.

⍰ Extra pictorial example here

Why it backfires

Sexual put-downs are based on her not being sexually aroused.

And what's less arousing than a person who doesn't want you?
Any self-respecting man would rather 'do it alone' than pursue a woman who plays uninterested.

4. Passive-Aggressive

Passive aggression and covert power moves to make you chase, make you jealous, or gain power

⍰ Example: uses games to get commitment

From a woman I'd met only twice:

> Her: You're dating someone
> Me: We should take about this more seriously
> Her: Enjoy your date <— Passive-aggressive, prods me to justify & chase

⬆ She showed previous red flags, so it's even possible she lied.

Similar:

> Him: Let's meetup one of these days
> Her: But why, you have other girls to meet <— ⍰⍰ Tell me I'm the one, chase me

Why it backfires

Men with goals and options aren't looking for drama.

5. Judging You

The judge is the person who evaluates the other, providing emotional rewards -or punishment-, against their standards

Most women naturally take the judge position in relationships. But some women, when they're not gaining any judge power, will try to "force" it.

See an example here:

> Me: A graduate talent programme
> Her: (ignores the opportunity to say something nice) Good that you weren't a driver!
> (builds herself up) I was at headquarters…
> Me: (thinking: so cheap…)

When she said "good you weren't a driver", she sought to position herself as the high-status, demanding judge of my life/career.
She judged me "good" for 'being more at her level' (and then proceeded to brag).

6. Gold Digger Games

Seeks as much money as possible in exchange for sex, or for the 'opportunity to date her'

Ie.:

- "I really like Golden Spoon restaurant" <— Picks the most expensive restaurant
- "I need to study, but don't have money" <— Indirectly asks to support her lifestyle
- "I like shopping" <— Sets the hook for you to offer shopping

⍰ Example

> Her: (picks an expensive place & dish and insists for it)

Silver-digger games

Seeks a well-off man for a good lifestyle within a relationship

Silver diggers expect a good lifestyle from their partners, which can be fair if she is supportive.

Ie.:

- Expects a car to and from her location
- Wants to be a stay-at-home wife
- Expects you to earn a good income for holidays, Christmas gifts, etc.

⍰ Example

> Her: (demands a cab for pick up)

⚠️ Some red flags for my taste appear.
But In general, it's fair for an attractive woman to expect a good lifestyle from her man IF she gives back beyond just 'beauty'.

7. Standard Games... But Extreme

Some games are fair.

And it's also fair for many women to expect courtship.
It's sometimes cultural, and sometimes pure and simple dating market dynamics where most women are more 'valuable' than most men.

Principle:

⚖️ Any fair expectation or demand taken to an extreme becomes a red flag

❓ Examples

Fair	Too much	Sucker
Delay sex on first meet	Avoid sex for 3 dates	Only do sex after committment
Expect you to pay first date	Expect you to pay dinner & both-ways transport	Expects gifts
Expect you to text first & organize the date	Never text first after 2 dates	Never text first & replies late

8. Any Win-Lose Power Moves

Power moves can be neutral, win-win, or win-lose.

We couldn't possibly list all win-lose behavior.
But better than that, here at TPM we help you develop the feel for social power dynamics.
With that, you can recognize ANY possible red or green flag.

And we can give you a principle:

⚖ Anything where she gains and you lose is a red flag

⍰ Examples

- Triangulation: parading other suitors or attractive exes ⍰ Text example
  - "He is so great games" with random men or celebrities to set up unreachable ideas or field covert demands
- Canceling last minute: ⍰Example + possible cure
- Repeatedly late on dates: ⍰Example + possible cure
- Pretending disinterest ⍰ Example (& ⍰Compare with cooperative woman)

Nasty power moves are only win-lose, or lose-lose (value-subtracting).

Differentiate: Fair VS Nasty Games

In our forum, we made the point that it's important to differentiate between "fair" dating games and "nasty" dating games.

- Fair games: when male and female strategies and goals diverge, it's fair to expect women to follow strategies and that do not necessarily benefit you
- Nasty games: when are win-winor collaborative approaches are available, but she deliberately chooses win-lose

To get an idea of 'fair games' consider:

- Games women play
- Games women play to get commitment
- Delaying intimacy, a fair game so that she does not sleep with just about anyone

As a general rule, consider nasty games as important red flags for a more serious future together -or even just for dating-.

Do Nasty Power Moves Work?

Why do some women play these games?

The answer is simple:

Because they can work with some men.
They work with:

1. Inexperienced men: who idolize and pedestalize women. They're ready to accept "I'm the prize" games
2. Conservative-minded men: who are more likely to see it as their duty to invest, protect, and "make her happy". It predisposed them to win-lose relationships of imbalanced give and take
3. Lower-status men: who are more willing to "pay up" the difference and put up with poor behavior
   - Lower status role models, for example a father who accepted poor behavior at home

4. Naive Men: who grew up with naive self-help, and are clueless about power dynamics

If this is you, we have a program to help you become a respect-worthy, high-status, and attractive man.
You will automatically attract high-quality women for better and healthier relationships:

- Power University

Summary

Understanding the red flags in dating is crucial for building authentic and respectful relationships.

Women play these games because they 'work' with some men, but only drive away the higher quality men.

Unluckily, undiscerning men who miss the red flags end up with poor relationships with manipulative women, and they pay the highest costs.

This article, our website, and our products help men become high-quality, power-aware men who can spot the red flags, handle them, and attract better women in their lives.

King, Warrior, Magician, Lover: The 4 Archetypes of Masculinity

Lucio Buffalmano · 9 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

King, Warrior, Magician, Lover (1990) is a classic manosphere staple for men looking into self-development. The book mixes solid psychology with religion, myth, and self-development practices to teach men how to find their own highest version of masculinity.

One picture is worth a thousand words:

Source: https://stottilien.com/

And to understand what those triangles mean, keep on reading.

It's worth it, I promise.

About the Authors

Wikipedia describes Robert Louis Moore as an American Jungian analyst and consultant (??) in private practice in Chicago, as well as Professor of Psychology, Psychoanalysis and Spirituality at the Chicago Theological Seminary (that's an educational institution for pastors and ministers).

Douglas Gillette describes himself as holding a B.A. in Theater and Communications and a Master of Arts of Religious Studies from the University of Chicago (emphasis in Religion and Literature), and a Master of Divinity from Chicago Theological Seminary (emphasis in Religion and Psychology). He also engages in artistic pursuits such as painting, sculpting, and interior design.

Both authors are at the intersection of (depth) psychology (psychoanalysis and the unconscious), religion, mysticism, and myth.

The Four Major Forms of Masculinity

The four major forms of the mature masculine energies that the authors have identified are the King, me Warrior, the Magician, and the Lover.

They all overlap and ideally enrich one another. A good King is always also a Warrior, a Magician, and a Lover.
And the same holds true for the other three.

#1. King

The King energy is primal in all men.
In old civilizations and traditions, the king provides order, fertility, and blessing.

> It bears the same relationship to the other three mature masculine potentials as the Divine Child does to the other three immature masculine energies.
> It comes first in importance, and it underlies and includes the rest of the archetypes in perfect balance. The good and generative King is also a good Warrior, a positive Magician, and a great Lover. And yet, with most of us, the King comes on line last.
> We could say that the King is the Divine Child, but seasoned and complex, wise. and in a sense as selfless as the Divine Child is cosmically self-involved.

The king is:

- Centered
- Decisive
- A man of integrity
- A protector of his realm
- A provider

This is how the authors describe the king:

> It stabilizes chaotic emotion and out-of-control behaviors. It gives stability and centeredness. It brings calm. And in its "fertilizing" and centeredness, it mediates vitality, life-force, and joy. It brings maintenance and balance. It defends our own sense of inner order, our own integrity of being and of purpose. our own central > calmness about who we are, and our essential unassailability and certainty in our masculine identity. It looks upon the world with a firm but kindly eye. It sees others in all their weakness and in all their talent and worth. It honors them and promotes them. It guides them and nurtures them toward their own fullness of being. It is not envious. because it is secure, as the King, in its own worth. It rewards and encourages creativity in us and in others.

The King also embodies all the other masculine archetypes:

> In its central incorporation and expression of the Warrior, it represents aggressive might when that is what is needed when order is threatened. It also has the power of inner authority. It knows and discerns (its Magician aspect) and acts out of this deep knowingness. It delights in us and in others (its Lover aspect) and shows this delight through words of authentic praise and concrete actions that enhance our lives.

The King Shadows

- Tyrant: He is only destructive. He does so because. as we've said. he lacks inner structure. and he is afraid and terrified of his own hidden weakness and his underlying lack of potency.
  He is very sensitive to criticism and, though putting on a threatening front, will at the slightest remark feel weak and deflated. He won't show you this, however. What you will see, unless you know what to look for. is rage. But hidden behind the rage is a sense of worthlessness, of vulnerability and weakness.
  The tyrant hates. fears, and envies new life, because he feels the new life is a threat to his slim grasp on his own kingship.
- Weakling: The hidden presence of this passive pole explains the hunger for mirroring -for "Adore me!" "Worship me!" "See how important I am!"- that we feel from so many of our superiors and friends. This explains their angry outbursts and their attacks on those they see as weak that is those upon whom they project their own inner Weakling.

General Patton was a closeted weakling, say the authors.

Watch this scene:

> Instead of reacting with the compassion of the life-giving King who knows what his men are up against, Patton flies into a rage and slaps the soldier across the face, calls him a coward. humiliates and abuses him, and sends him from the hospital to the from lines.
> Though he does not know it. what he has seen is the face of his own hidden fear and weakness projected onto another. He has glimpsed the Weakling within.

And again, say the authors:

> The heroic General Patton.
> Though immensely imaginative, creative, and inspiring to his troops, at > least at times sabotaged himself with his risk-taking, his immature > competition with the British General Montgomery, and his insightful > but boyishly brash remarks.
> Rather than being assigned a mission for which his true talent qualified him {to head the Allied invasion of Europe, for instance). He was sidelined precisely because he was a hero and not fully a warrior.

My Note: Insightful, stay away from gratuitous meanness
This was truly deep and insightful.

Be careful of men who are too mean and aggressive towards other people's faults and weaknesses. Not only are they potentially hiding insecurities, but they are often poor leaders.

I often felt the same about general Mattis, who always loved to sound tough:

> James Mattis: When you men get home and face an anti-war protester (..) shake his hand. Then, wink at his girlfriend because she knows she's dating a pussy

#2. Warrior

The warrior:

- Is efficient because he realizes how fragile and mortal he is

> In addition to training, what enables a Warrior to reach clarity of thought is living with the awareness of his own imminent death. The Warrior knows the shortness of life and how fragile it is. A man under the guidance of the Warrior knows how few his days are. Rather than depressing him, this awareness leads him to an outpouring of life-force and to an intense experience of his life that is unknown to others. Every act counts.

Also read:

> The Power of Accepting & Leveraging Death to Live Fully

- The warrior raises above pettiness

The true Warrior rises above pettiness.
Says the authors:

> Living in the light of lofty ideals and spiritual realities such as God. democracy, communism, freedom, or any other worthy transpersonal commitment so alters the focus of a man's life that petty squabbling and personal. Ego concerns no longer matter much.

- The warrior can be a destructive force. But it's a destructive force for good

Say the authors:

> The Warrior is often a destroyer.
> But the positive Warrior energy destroys only what needs to be destroyed in order for something new and fresh, more alive and more virtuous to appear. Many things in our world need destroying-corruption, tyranny, oppression, despotic systems of government, corporate hierarchies may get in the way of the company's performance (…).
> And in the very act of destroying, often the Warrior energy > is building new civilizations, new commercial, artistic, and spiritual ventures for humankind.

- For the warrior, women are just there to fulfill sexual needs

When the warrior is disconnected from the lover, women are just for fun, or to fulfill sexual needs.

> Even the positive Warrior (the Warrior in his fullness) can be disastrous. As we have said the Warrior in his pure form is emotionally detached; his transpersonal loyalty radically relativizes the importance of his human relationships. This is apparent in the Warrior's attitude toward sex.

> Women, for the Warrior, are not for relating to, for being intimate with.
> They are for fun.
> (…)
> Even if he has a family, the human warrior's devotion to other duties often leads to marital problems.

- Businesspeople consumed by work are also warriors

Say the authors:

> This same thing occurs outside the military as well.
> In the relationships and families of men whose professions call for a great deal of transpersonal devotion and long hours of disciplined work and self-sacrifice. Ministers, doctors. lawyers, politicians, dedicated salespeople, and many others often have emotionally devastating personal lives.
> Their wives and girlfriends often feel alienated and rejected, competing hopelessly with the man's "true love," his work.
> In addition these men, true to the Warrior's sexual attitudes, often have affairs with their nurses, staffers, receptionists, secretaries, and other women who admire from a safe (sometimes not so safe) distance their masculine Warrior proficiency and dedication.

My Note: Great analysis, but flawed on the sexual side
Very, very good analysis.
Yet, it's also flawed when it comes to sexual dynamics. The authors fail to realize that those men developed a drive to hard work because of the more sexual opportunities that the fruit of their work awarded them with.

- But our society isn't very welcoming of warriors

Say the authors:

> We live in a time when people are generally uncomfortable with the > Warrior form of masculine energy, and for good reasons.
> Women especially are uncomfortable with it since they have often > been the most direct victims of its shadow expressions.

The Warrior Shadows

Warriors that are completely unemotional or only destructive are poor and underdeveloped archetypes of masculinity.

The movie "The Great Santini" is an example of the shadow Warrior with too much aggression and too little emotional depth:

Say the authors:

> Most of his remarks and behavior toward his wife and children are depreciating, critica, commanding, and designed to put distance between him and the family members, who keep trying to relate to him lovingly.
> The destructiveness of this way of "relating" eventually becomes so obvious to everyone, especially to the older son, that there can no longer be any hiding from the fact that Santini's sometimes violent behavior results from his own inability to be tender and genuinely intimate.

Many young men these days admire the wrong kind of warriors. Say the authors:

> A contemporary image of the Warrior turned passionless killing machine is, of course, Darth Vader from the > Star Wars saga. It is alarming how many boys and adolescents identify with him. In this same connection, it is also alarming how many of these young men become members of survivalist and neo-Nazi groups.

The Warrior as a destructive can overcome us when we are frightened or very angry, like in this scene from Apocalypse Now reference by the authors themselves:

And that's the importance of inner mental control to be an effective and value-adding warrior.

- Sadist: Though detachment in itself is not necessarily bad. as we've said. it does leave the door open to the "demon" of cruelty. Because he is so vulnerable in this area of relatedness. the man under the influence of the Warrior needs urgently to have his mind and his feelings under control-not repressed. but under control. Otherwise. cruelty will sneak in the back door when he's not looking.
  Far too often We see this same kind of sadism displayed in boot camp in the name of supposedly necessary "ritual humiliation" designed to deprive recruits of their individuality and put them under the power of a transpersonal devotion. Far too often, the drill sergeant's motives are the motives of the sadistic Warrior seeking to humiliate and violate the men put in his charge.
- Masochist: the masochist is the "pushover" and "whipped puppy" that lies just beneath the Sadist's rageful displays. The Masochist projects Warrior energy onto others and causes a man to experience himself as powerless. The man possessed by the Masochist is unable to defend himself psychologically; he allows others (and himself) to push him around.

Finally, say the authors:

> If we are accessing the Warrior appropriately, we will be energetic, decisive, courageous, enduring, persevering, and loyal to some greater good beyond our own personal gain.
> We will light good fights in order to make the world a better and more fulfilling place for everyone and everything. Our war making will be for the creation of the new, the just, and the free.

#3. Magician

The Magician is the knower, the one with technical expertise and knowledge of all kinds.

Write the authors:

> The energies of the Magician archetype, wherever and whenever we encounter them, are twofold. The Magician is the knower and he is the master of technology. Furthermore, the man who is guided by the power of the Magician is able to fulfill these Magician functions in part by his use of ritual initiatory processes. He is the "ritual elder" who guides the processes of transformation.

This is the magician era, in a way, since it's an era where technology is put to use to control our environment. But it's the other form of Magician energy that is in short supply, the one based on psychological and spiritual initiatory processes.

The Magician Shadows

- Detached manipulator: more details on manipulation here, and more information on dark psychology here
- Denying "innocent" one: using guilt-tripping and covert power moves to control others

> Dark Psychology: 7 Ways to Manipulate People

#4. Lover

The lover enjoys life's pleasure and is comfortable in his own skin and own body.

But there is also something deeper about the lover and about his interconnectedness with the world.
Say the authors:

> The Lover is deeply sensual-sensually aware and sensitive to the physical world in all its splendor. The Lover is related and connected to them all, drawn into them through his sensitivity.
> His sensitivity leads him to feel compassionately and empathetically united with them. For the man accessing the Lover. all things are bound to each other.

But he is also a rebel:

> The man under the influence of the Lover does not want to stop at socially created boundaries.
> He stands against the artificiality of such things. His life is often unconventional and "messy".

The major religions have always prosecuted the lover, say the authors.

The Lover Shadows

- Addicted lover: the addictive personality that gets lots in short-term pleasure
- Impotent lover: feel nothing, live in a muted world, and are chronically depressed

> The Lover needs the Warrior in order to be able to act decisively, in order to detach from the web of immobilizing sensuality, and he needs the Magician to help him back off from the ensnaring effect of his emotions.

Boyhood Archetypes

Like for the masculine energies, the boy energies also overlap and inform each other.

All the shadow forms of the immature masculine can be carried over adulthood if they are not fixed.

Divine child

The divine child is the future king.

The shadows are:

- High-chair tyrant: needs to learn that he's not the center of the universe, and the people and the world do not exist to serve and glorify him
- Weakling prince: the polar opposite of the high-chair tyrant. The Weakling Prince appears to have very little personality, no enthusiasm for life, and very little initiative. This is the boy who needs to be coddled, who dictates to those around him by his silence or his whining and complaining helplessness. He needs to be carried around on a pillow. Everything is too much for him. He rarely joins in children's games: he has few friends; he doesn't do well in school; he is frequently hypochondriacal; his slightest wish is his parents' command; the whole family system revolves around his comfort. He reveals the dishonesty of his helplessness, however, in his daggerlike verbal assaults on his siblings, his biting sarcasm directed against them, and his patent manipulation of their feelings. Because he convinced his parents that he is a helpless victim of life and that others are picking on him, when a controversy arises between himself and a sibling, his parents tend to punish the sibling and excuse him.

Later, when he is an "adult" and functioning primarily under the dominance of the Weakling, his repressed grandiosity may explode to the surface, completely raw and primitive, completely unmodulated and very powerful. This is the man who seemed coolheaded and rational and "nice" but who, once he's been promoted, suddenly becomes "a different person, "a little Hitler". This is the man for whom the saying "Power corrupts; absolute power corrupts absolutely" is entirely accurate.

Precocious child

He is the future magician.

The Precocious Child manifests in a boy when he is eager to learn, when his mind is quickened. when he wants to share what he is learning with others.

The shadows are:

- Know it all trickster: verbally abusive of others whom he regards as inferior. Carried over into adulthood, the man is cocky and smug, with a superior grin. But he can be good at pricking the bubbles of other big inflated egos. Also see the "smart alec" in the "archetypes of dominance".
- Dummy: like the Weakling Prince, lacks personality, vigor, and creativity. He seems unresponsive and dull. He can't seem to learn his multiplication tables, count change, or tell time. The Dummy's ineptitude, however. is frequently less than honest.
  He may grasp far more than he shows, and his dummy behavior may mask a hidden grandiosity that feels itself too important (as well as too vulnerable) to come into the world. Thus, intimately intertwined with a secret Know-It-All, the Dummy is also a Trickster.

Oedipal Child

He is hte future lover.

He is passionate and has a sense of wonder and a deep appreciation for connectedness with his inner depths, with others, and with all things.
He is warm. related. and affectionate. He also expresses. through his experience of connectedness to Mother (the primal relationship for almost all of us), the origins of what we can call spirituality. T his Mother is not his real, mortal mother.

She is bound to disappoint him much of the time in his need for connectedness and perfect or infinite, love and nurturing. Rather, the Mother that he is sensing beyond his own, beyond all the beauty and feeling (what the Greeks called eros) in the things of the world.

The shadows are:

- Momma's boy: tied to Mama's apron strings." He causes a boy to fantasize about marrying his mother, about taking her away from his father. in adulthood, he often gets caught up in chasing the beautiful, the poignant, the yearning for union with Mother from one woman to another. He can never be satisfied with a mortal woman, because what he is seeking is the immortal Goddess. Here we have the Don Juan syndrome, The Oedipal Child, inflated beyond mortal dimensions, cannot be bound to one woman.
- Dreamer: while other children are playing, he may sit on a rock. dreaming his dreams. He accomplishes little and appears withdrawn and depressed. Often his dreams rend to be melancholy, on the one hand, or highly idyllic and ethereal on the other.

All the immature masculine energies are overly tied to Mother, and are deficient in their experience of the nurturing and mature masculine. But especially so is the Oedipal Child.

The Hero

He is the future warrior.

The “death” of the Hero in the life of a boy (or a man) really means that he has finally encountered his limitations. He has met the enemy, and the enemy is himself. He has met his own dark side, his very unheroic side.

The “death” of the Hero signals a boy’s or man’s encounter with true humility.

The shadows are:

- Grandstander bully: The boy (or man) under the power of the Bully intends to impress others. His strategies are designed to proclaim his superiority and his right to dominate those around him. He claims center stage as his birthright. If ever his claims to special status are challenged, watch the ensuing rageful displays! is not a ream player. He is a loner, a hot-shot junior executive, salesman, revolutionary, stock market manipulator. He’s the soldier who takes unnecessary risks in combat and, if he’s in a position of leadership, requires the same of his men (these are the officers who get “dragged“).
- Coward: shows an extreme reluctance to stand up for himself in physical confrontations. He will usually run away from a fight. perhaps excusing himself by claiming that it is more “manly” to walk away. But he will feel wretched in spite of his excuses. It is not only physical fights he will avoid. however. He will tend to allow himself to be bullied emotionally and intellectually as well.

Say the authors:

> And all three energies give rise to the Hero, which breaks them free of the domination of the “feminine” unconscious and establishes the boy’s identity as a separate individual. The Hero prepares the boy to become a man.

But the Hero still needs to grow and mature:

> The Hero is, in fact. only an advanced form of Boy psychology-the most advanced form. The peak, actually, of the masculine energies of the boy, the archetype that characterizes the best in the adolescent stage of development. Yet it is immature. and when it is carried over into adulthood as the governing archetype, it blocks men from full maturity.

Criticism

“King, Warrior, Magician, Lover” is a great book.
But there is some important criticism to be raised.

1. Somewhat weaker in hard science

Take this example:

> Jungians have found that in every man there is a feminine subpersonality called the Anima, made up of the feminine archetypes (…) All human beings can access the archetypes

Not true.
Jungians didn’t find out.
Jungians speculated and theorized that in every man there is feminine subpersonality.

Big difference.

The same superficial approach in mixing theory and science can be found elsewhere:

> Jung and his successors have found that on the level of the deep unconscious the psyche of every person is grounded in what Jung called the "collective unconscious"

Again, these folks didn't "found that", they "speculated that… ".

Those speculations might be intelligent, thoughtful, and even correct. But they might not.
Personally, I'm not too sold on this "collective unconscious" sitting in the "deep unconscious psyche" (that name also gives away the scientific flimsiness).

Sometimes it's very Freudian, too (see next point).
For example, it gives for granted that the subconscious in men is feminine (the mother).
But there's no evidence for that.

2. At times, highly Freudian

Freudian was a genius.
And, at the same time, also an unscientific idiot who believed too much in his own speculations.

So to me, "Freudian" isn't always a compliment.
And some Freudian lines and explanations didn't convince me. For example:

> The man under the influence of the Shadow Warrior's bipolarity, unsure of his legitimate phallic power, is still battling against what he experiences as the inordinately powerful feminine and against everything supposedly "soft" and relational. Even in adulthood, he still feels terrified that he will be swallowed up by it. His desperate fear of this leads him to wanton brutality.

So some men are brutal because are "battling the feminine side"?
Hmmm, there might be something there, in some cases. But when I see these sweeping generalizations, I get angry. Some individuals are brutal because they wired that way and because they have low morals, and they are unworthy of being alive. And not because they are "battling their feminine side".

Or:

> In addition, the boy under the power of the Mama's Boy is what is called autoerotic. He may compulsively masturbate. He may be into pornography, seeking the Goddess in the nearly infinite forms of the female body.

So wait a second, a child who masturbates a lot and is into pornography is not high in sex drives and hormones, but he is "seeking the Goddess"?

Somebody once said something like this: "don't look for a convoluted explanation when there is a far simpler one that more accurately explains it".

3. Sometimes forgets that human nature exists before "archetypes" and is valid across archetypes

The author says that the warrior ethos:

> "explains the prevalence of prostitutes around military camps. It also explains the horrific tradition of the raping of conquered women."

No man, military camps have prostitutes because men want to have sex. And men raping women has little to do with the warrior ethos and more to do with general human nature. Most men who are recruited as soldiers during wars weren't even warriors by choice anyway.

Little later he says that businessmen with a warrior ethos have sex with their staff supposedly because warriors see women as fun.
Again, the authors fail to see and understand general evolutionary psychology.

Men have probably developed conscientiousness and a drive for hard work because that allowed them to bed more women.

4. Misleading on genders and homosexuality

The authors seem to imply that homosexuality and "gender identity" chaos stem from not growing well into the archetypes.

For example, write the authors:

> Some men under the infantile power of the Mama's Boy > aspect of the Oedipal Child have vast collections of pictures of nude > women, alone or making love with men
> (…)
> But instead of affirming his own masculinity as a mortal man, he is really seeking to experience the penis of God-the Great Phallus-that experiences all women, or rather that experiences union with the Mother Goddess in her infinity of female forms.

So a kid who makes love to men is not gay, but lost in the Oedipal child?

And:

> Ours is an age, as we've said, of personal and gender identity chaos. And chaos is always the result of inadequate accessing of the Magician in some vital area of life.

I loved this book and this model, but… Do the authors really believe that this model can fix everything?
How is gender identity exactly tied to the "Magician"? That made little sense to me and, at the very least, was poorly explained.

5. Some new-age woo-woo

Say the authors:

> Modern subatomic physics, it has been said, looks very much like Eastern mysticism as it approaches the intuited insights of Hinduism and Taoism.
> This new physics is discovering a microworld beneath our seemingly solid macroworld of sense perceptions.

Wait, who said that?
And then trying to tie that woo-woo to psychology.

> The same is true of depth psychology.
> Jung, as he was making his first maps of the unconscious, was struck by the similarities between what he was > discovering about the energy flows and the archetypal patterns in the human psyche and the quamum physics

6. “Back then when it was great” rose-tinted glasses

There is an element of the “back then when it was great syndrome”.
Say the authors:

> At least there were at one time sacred kings, upon whom the men in the realm could project their inner King

I think the authors would change their minds in a heartbeat if he could live some years in the reign of some despotic, petty, ignorant Middle Age king as a poor peasant.

7. Too optimistic in granting grand and positive potential to anyone?

The king is “primal” in all men?

I disagree.

I think some people are just crooked, or not born with the positive attributes to be a positive force in the world.

8. In rare cases, weak in psychological description

Say the authors:

> Though introverted and reflective. he is also extroverted and eagerly reaches out to others to share his insights and his talents with them

This felt a bit convoluted and like a description that was made up to fit the model, instead of the other way around. So he is introverted, or extroverted? Because, barring ambiverts and introverts who learned to act more extrovertedly, introversion and extraversion are usually understood as mutually exclusive.

9. Do you need “initiation”?

Say the authors:

> A man who “cannot get it together” is a man who has probably not had the opportunity to undergo ritual initiation into the deep structures of manhood

More recent authors have taken a leaf out of Moore and Gillette book on the “initiation” part and expanded on tribal belonging as “The Way of Men”.
For example, see Sebastian Junger and Jack Donovan.

I’m not too sold on the benefits of initiation, though.

I think that initiation at too early an age can easily be a form of oppression and, potentially, abusive. Initiation is about foisting and forcing values and culture into someone who is still too young to decide whether he wants to be part of that culture and way of living.

Me for one, I’d be super pissed if someone had initiated me into anything. Well, as a matter of fact, I have. I’ve been initiated into Christianity without anyone asking me.
And I didn’t like that.
Don’t f*cking force me into anything ahole, I decide for myself.

Quotes

> The drug dealer, the ducking and diving political leader, the wife beater, the chronically “crabby” boss, the “hot shot” junior executive, the unfaithful husband, the company “yes man,” the indifferent graduate school adviser, the “holier than thou” minister, the gang member, the father who can never find the time to attend his daughter’s school programs, the coach who ridicules his star athlete, the therapist who unconsciously attacks his clients’ “shining” and seeks a kind of gray normalcy for them, the yuppie – all these men have something in common.
> They are all boys pretending to be men.

The know-it-all trickster:

> Maybe you’re the practical joker. mercilessly hounding others with your pranks until someone does you one better and you are forced to realize how much it hurts.

On the trickster making enemies:

> We once knew a graduate student who was really possessed by this aspect of the archetype. He couldn’t stop exposing others’ weaknesses through his charming, and not so charming, humor at their expense.
> He laughed at his professors’ blunders in the classroom. He laughed when the president of the school stumbled over his words. He himself had political aspirations. hoping to create a student movement for his favorite cause.
> But he alienated the very people he needed as supporters

On not making enemies, also read:

- Basic strategies of power

> The 4 Fundamental Strategies of Power

On the trickster’s pleasure of ruining other without doing anything of his own:

> This is the energy form that seeks the fall of great men. that delights in the destruction of a man of importance. But the Trickster does not want to replace the man who has fallen. He does not want to take up that man’s responsibilities. In fact. he doesn’t want any responsibilities. He wants to do just enough to wreck things for others.

On envy:

> His energy comes from envy. The less a man is in touch with his true talents and abilities. the more he will envy others. If we envy a lot. we are denying our own realistic greatness. our own Divine Child. What we need to do, then, is to get in touch with our own specialness. our own beauty. and our own creativity. Envy blocks creativity.

On having heroes;

> The Know-It-All Trickster has no heroes. because to have heroes is to admire others. We can only admire > others if we have a sense of our own worthiness. and a developing sense of security about our own creative energies.

Review

Wow!

What a great, insightful, helpful book “King, Warrior, Magician, Lover” is.

Albeit I had to list the important criticism, that doesn’t cancel out the greatness that is to be found in the pages of this classic on masculinity.

Most eye-opening for me were the Warrior and King archetypes, together with their shadows.
Most of all, I was wowed because this book reflected some of the values and ideals of this website, and it helped expand on them.
One of the values of this website said:

- Do your diligence, based on healthy individualism, on when it’s time to take up arms: Some of us have natural drives in wanting to form bands, taking up arms, and fighting “the other”. If you’re a man, this is a reality of our nature. I know it is for me, too. Denying that drive is pointless, and even harmful.
  Plus, that drive can be a good thing.

What I was talking about there was the “Warrior” in its mature and value-adding form.
So the authors helped me expand on that concept.

I can highly recommend this book to men who want to grow into being the best, most powerful, and at the same time most value-adding version of themselves.

Full Summary

About The Professor: Barry Nalebuff is a Milton Steinbach Professor at Yale where he teaches negotiation, innovation, and game theory. He is the co-author of six books, co-founder of Honest Tea (a company that has grown organically to over $100 million in sales and was purchased by Coca-Cola). Alongside Honest Tea, Barry advised the NBA in their negotiations with the National Basketball Players Association and serves on the board of Nationwide Insurance. A graduate of MIT, Rhodes Scholar, and Junior Fellow at Harvard's Society of Fellows, Nalebuff earned his doctorate at Oxford University.

Negotiation Concept/Theories

1. The Pie

The pie is how much more two parties can achieve by working together than they can get on their own. According to Barry Nalebuff, you should always calculate the pie. Then, since you're essential to make that pie, you should get at least half.

2. The BATNA

The terms "BATNA" and "reservation value" are both synonyms for walkaway price. As a seller, don't accept anything less than your reservation value/BATNA. As a buyer, don't pay more.

If it helps you to understand the concept of BATNA, ask yourself: "As a seller, what is the least amount I'd be willing to accept before walking away? As a buyer, what's the most I'd be willing to pay before walking away?"

3. Anchor

A psychological principle stating that the first number we hear tends to anchor our perceptions close to that value.

We will see later how that can be used as a negotiation technique.

Negotiation Principles/Strategies

This is a list of the strategies highlight in “A Strategic Playbook for Becoming a Principled and Persuasive Negotiator”:

1. Claiming Power in the Negotiation: Put Your Foot Down

I originally thought against sharing this one because it’s a strategy suggested by John McCall MacBain that I thought was a terrible idea. However, this is a strategy that was taught to me throughout my studies at a Yale college course, so if the negotiation world really has people who resort to strategies such as this one and you want to arm yourself against bullies over here at The Power Moves, it’s only fair that I share this one so you can keep an eye out for it.

One strategy for dealing with delays is to claim the power in the negotiation by putting your foot down.

Ex 1:

> You and a journalist are buying out the balance of the equity in a business. The journalist (who is the moral force in the room) keeps delaying things. As a joke, you take his glasses, put them on the floor with your foot hovered above them and say:
> You: “Look, let’s get this done. I’ll do the typing because now you can’t see the computer and let me just put my foot here so you just listen, we’ll get these things done.”

Ex 2:

> You are negotiating in a room with another party that keeps delaying. You ask for the key, lock the room door, put the key in your pocket and say:
> You: “Look, this is going on too long. Let’s sit down and none of us leave until we get this done.”
> The Other Side: “What are you doing?”
> You: “Look, you said you wanted to get this done. Why are you avoiding staying in the room?”

For everyone who wants to be a social charmer instead of an MTU, I strongly advise against this.

2. Argument Flipping (& The Principle of Fairness)

I coined this strategy “argument flipping” because it has no definitive name, but is reminiscent of the “frame flip” in frame control techniques.*

This is a negotiation strategy where you take an argument made by the other side and flip it back on them to your benefit using fairness.

Here is an example from the course:

> The Buyer: “Hey, we’re Coca-Cola. For us, eight million isn’t even a rounding error on a rounding error. For you, one million really matters a huge amount. It’s the difference between life and death. Therefore, you should be happy with a million. We’ll take the seven million. Thank you very much.”
> You: “Well, hey, Coca-Cola, you just told me you don’t care. Eight million is a rounding error in a rounding error. So, nobody will notice if you don’t even get it. Therefore, since we care so much, we’d like to have the seven million and you can have the one million. And who will notice?”

3. Taking Items Off the Table

It's important to take items off the table so the negotiation can move forward. In a situation where multiple packages, payment plans, etc. are being negotiated, one strategy to take items off the table is writing each package on a separate piece of paper, holding it up to the other side, and getting confirmation that the information on the papers is correct. After the package has been negotiated, slam it onto the table face down.

Whenever the other side hears the slam, it sub communicates to them that reopening the package for negotiation by turning the paper back over is a bad move that could annoy you, hurt their relationship with you, and prolong the negotiation since they're now reintroducing a package that had already been negotiated.

Note: This is a strategy used by John McCall MacBain. If you ask me, this is the strategy that you might see used by your classic MTU, using confidence and physical aggression to reach their goals and top dog positions in their lines of work. If you want to use the MTU style of dominance, go for it. Otherwise, avoid this one.*

4. Lie Prevention

To prevent the other side from lying to you, one of the most important things to do is to not ask the other side questions that give them the incentive to lie. For example, say you're negotiating with your boss:

> You: "So, what's the most you're willing to pay me?"

Asking for the other side's BATNA gives them the incentive to lie since, in most cases, they want to pay the least amount possible.

Instead, ask questions that give the other side the right incentives to tell the truth.

> You: "Do you prefer distributing pay raises over giving promotions?"

5. First and Final Offer

There are some negotiators that take the approach of offering what they believe to be a generous and fair proposal. After making that proposal as their first offer, they then refuse to budge. This strategy is an ultimatum and it ignores the other side's expectations for the negotiation since you're making decisions for them and aren't allowing them to be more involved in the process. This approach also "lights a fire" which could sour the negotiation and possibly the business relationship you have with the other side.

This ultimatum can be dealt with using "The Hypothetical Offer Tactic".

6. Never Say No

Never say no.
Instead, let the other side say no to you. You can do this by making an offer the other side might reject, but that you'd be happy to take.

Ex: Imagine you're unhappy in your job and decide to quit. Instead of just quitting, come up with a package that would entice you to stay. Let the firm say no to you. The worst that can happen is they say no and you leave, but you were planning on doing that anyway. On the other hand, they might say yes.

If the other side says no to a package or deal that you would prefer, encourage them to come up with a package of their own that would entice them to take your deal.

> You: "What would it take to get you to be on board with this deal?"

Or:

> You: "Is there anything I can do to change your mind?"

7. Ultimatum

One way to get power in a negotiation is to put yourself in a position where you can make ultimatums. (Use that power with discretion!)

8. The No Incentive Principle

A fair deal should have an incentive that acts as the motivation for parties to collaborate as opposed to working independently. If there's no incentive, then there's no fairness in the deal.

> You: "To the extent that you need our help, our cooperation, our effort to make this all work, we aren't being appropriately incentivized. Whereas under this deal, we've got the incentives aligned with the action we want."

9. The Asymmetric Risk Principle

For a deal to be considered fair, the gains, as well as the risk, should all be fairly distributed.

> You: "The risk is all off. The question is, there's a huge spread between my potential loss and potential benefit, where you are taking little to no risk whatsoever. Now, maybe you shouldn't take as much risk as me, but I don't know why it's all in one party rather than the other."

10. The Potential Regret Principle

An effective and legitimate principle is the idea of no regret.

> You: "We could regret having made the decision to go with this deal if [insert risk that comes with deal] because in that case we are out [insert potential loss]. But under this deal, no matter what happens, whether [insert risk again] works out or doesn't, we are both still better off having done the deal than not."

Or:

> You: "You know, I had the option of making [insert BATNA] and now if [insert risk that comes with deal] doesn't work out, I'm only going to be at [insert benefit remaining after potential loss]. So, it's true that if [insert risk again] works out I'll be up to [insert total benefit after potential gain] and that's better off. But I will regret having made this decision in the event that it doesn't work out."

11. The Principle of Fairness

Fairness is an effective principle to base your principled argument upon and operate as a more strategic negotiator. Barry Nalebuff says that it's not numbers we treat fairly in negotiations, it's people. You can use that logic to construct arguments that are harder to counter.

> You: "This [insert numeric value of the pie] that might happen if the deal goes through is our incentive to work together. I can't do that without you and you can't do that without me. If you like, it takes two hands to make a handshake. So, since we need each other equally to make that happen, I think we should split it equally. 50, 50."

12. The Hypothetical Offer Tactic

This tactic is a clever way to encourage the other side to work with you to create new options when they're stuck or focused on only one or two options.

> The Other Side: "It's either going to be package A or package B or the deal is off."
> You: "Well, let's see. A is $25 million. Would you take $26 million?"

*Of course, the other side would want more money if it's an option. However, you're not saying that you'd give them more money, you're simply showing them that with a little joint problem-solving the both of you could find a better option than just the ones on the table. By doing this, you are able to block their ultimatum and work towards expanding the pie.

13. Anchoring

I won't go too into detail on this because Lucio has some great book reviews that explain anchoring better than I can.*

If you have the opportunity to make the first offer, a low bid may help you lower the final price. If you're selling, a high asking price may help you get more money. This is one of the advantages of going first because the first number people hear serves as an anchor or starting point. Thus, a low bid will drag down your view as to the right starting point and similarly, hearing a high number will pull up your view as to the best asking price.

A couple of quick qualifications to consider before anchoring:

1. Starting too low or too high may be counterproductive because your first offer conveys both an anchor and information. If as a seller your asking price is too high, buyers might think you're out of touch and wouldn't bother to waste their time by bidding. Conversely, if as a buyer you start with a bid that's too low, it could demonstrate that you have no idea what the seller's product/service is worth (or worse, that you do and are trying to steal the product/service from under them.)
2. In some cases, a low anchor might help you get a higher price. The reason is that it brings more people into the bidding which helps raise the price.

13.2. Ignoring the Anchor

If you're on the receiving end and the other side presents you with a low first offer or high first ask, you should be aware of the anchoring effect and consciously counter it.

> You: "I think we may be looking at this deal in very different ways. Let's try and find some common ground by discussing…"

14. Good Cop, Bad Cop

A covert threat that communicates: "If you don't do this deal with me, you'll have to face my tough, hard-hitting partner to finish the negotiations on this deal."

> The Other Side: "I think this deal is gonna go more smoothly then it could have because actually, luckily for you, my co-worker who would usually be here to do this deal is actually working another deal. So, she couldn't be here today and she's a hard hitter. I am easy-going."

Calling the other side out on their good cop, bad cop game can start the negotiations off on a bad foot and implicitly letting their covert threat go communicates that you accept their threat (and approve of this power relationship) which puts you in a weak position. So, here's how Barry Nalebuff recommends handling it:

> You: "I guess we're both lucky. My wife's not here either even though she's a pretty hard hitter too, so it's okay."

15. The Precise Bid Tactic

A precise number gets a much better response/counter than a rough number because, with precise numbers, people think that you have some logic behind it, some principle that you've given consideration and thought to in your ask. Instead, if you're just putting up rough numbers, the other side thinks you haven't given great consideration and will respond/counter thinking that maybe you have no idea what your item is worth.

Quick note for clarification: making a price which is a really round number like $200 will have a much worse response than a precise bid such as $197. A quite strategic way of getting more by asking for less :).*

16. Put Out the Fire (Humor Framing): Outrageous Offers

When someone lights a fire, a good way to defuse the situation is to use a little bit of humor while letting the other side know that what they asked for wasn't appropriate.

> You: "That's great! Where do I sign?"
> You: "Just kidding. Because if that's really what you want, I don't think a deal's gonna be possible."

17. Post-Settlement Settlement

A post-settlement settlement can be used to make both parties happier with the deal they've struck.

> You: "I'm delighted that you're happy, my goal is to make us both happier. If I can't succeed in doing that, fine, we'll go back to the deal that we both like, so that's still on the table. But, please give me a chance to see if I can make us both better off because I'm pretty sure that's going to be a possibility."

18. Recovering From A Lie: Stop Digging

A good general rule to follow is that when you're in a hole, stop digging. In other words, adding on more lies or furthering the lie you created only gets you in deeper.

> You: "My current salary is $10,000 more than what you've offered."
> The Other Side: "Fine, just bring us a current pay stub and we can match it."
> You: "I'm so embarrassed. I feel you were very sincere with me and I didn't reciprocate. When I told you that my salary was $10,000 more than what you're offering, I exaggerated. I'm really sorry and I want to apologize to you. I hope you realize that I've learned my lesson and that we could still work together."

Fighting Fires

There's a big question of what happens when somebody makes a threat, an ultimatum, lies to you, etc. How should you respond?

So, the question is really, when somebody lights a fire, how do you respond?

1. Fight Fire With Fire

A typical response is, meet fire with fire. The fight fire with fire approach is to basically say, I'll make a threat back to you.

2. Put Out the Fire (Rational High Ground)

Alternatively, when someone lights a fire, put out the fire.

> The Other Side: Delivers a threat.
> You: "Do we really want to play that game? I could say the following to you, but I don't think that's going to help us get a deal."

3. Put Out the Fire (Rational High Ground): Analyze Motivations

Sometimes you will find yourself negotiating with people who, for one reason or another, will lie. If they lie about a better alternative to your deal that they (supposedly) have to get you to put your price more in their favor, you can put out the fire by analyzing their motivations to do a deal with you as opposed to simply going with that alternative.

> You: "I can only pay up to $450,000."
> The Other Side: "I have another offer of $500,000 [crosses arms and locks eye contact]."
> You: [Ask yourself] Why did he come here? If he had another offer and he didn't think I would go up at all or very little, he wouldn't even be dealing with me. Why would he rather do a deal with me? What do I have that his alternative does NOT that he wants?

4. Put Out the Fire (Submissiveness): Embarrassment

There's no referee that yells, "Ready? Negotiation…start!" to let you know that negotiations have begun. So, if you're the kind of person that likes to go after what they want while getting the best deal possible, you may have to be the one to initiate negotiations.

When the other side tries to embarrass you about the fact that you're negotiating, negotiation expert Herb Cohen recommends taking a soft tone with a more childlike approach that communicates to the other side you want/need their help.

An example is if you're in a store and the price tag has already established the price of the product to the cashier, but you're negotiating the price anyway. By asking for help the way Cohen recommends, you get the other side more involved in the negotiation process.

Note: If you've read Lucio's articles on frame control, you know that there are more dominant ways around dealing with those who aim to embarrass you that won't lower your status in the end. I partially disagree with this strategy because while submissiveness can be used to your advantage when you have no real leverage, the extent that Cohen urges his students to behave submissively can actually harm your chances of negotiation success.*

5. Put Out the Fire (Rational High Ground): Outrageous Offers/Lowball

When someone makes an outrageous offer or lowballs you, respond with rational questions that invite them to justify their demand. If they can't justify their demand, it's worthless.

Note: Lucio might call this using questions to negotiate frames. Use questions to allow them to clarify their frame so you can persuade them into a more collaborative direction.*

> You: "I don't understand how you could come up with that. Could you explain it to me?"

6. Put Out the Fire (Humor Framing) 2: Outrageous Offers/Lowball

To deal with someone who tries to lowball you or gives you an outrageous offer, you can make up a story that invites them to justify their demand (their frame) while putting out the fire.

> You: "In a way, I was thinking about what you might come up with. I was thinking as I came over in an Uber and I said, I think he'll ask for this. No, then on the other hand, I said to myself, no, maybe he'll ask for this. I had somebody with me, so I asked him what do you think? And we both said…and so when you offered [insert outrageous offer], we were both wrong! I'm in a state of shock, how'd you come up with that?"

Something to consider with this one: this may be good at helping you build rapport since more conversation invites more opportunity to connect, but I would decide against this one.
As Lucio put it, the rules of thumb for social power are:

1. Use as little effort as possible to get it done
2. Use the most direct response you can afford (going more indirect could underline fear).

This expands a lot of social effort to achieve the same goal that "Put Out the Fire (Rational High Ground): Outrageous Offers/Lowball" does.

7. Handling "We Will Crush You"

As a buyer, one way you can get someone to do a deal with you is by raising your price to make your offer more attractive.

Another way, is by making the idea of rejecting your offer look like a bad idea. In other words, you can work to lower the other side's BATNA. This can be done through the threat of competition. In this example, let's imagine that you're negotiating with a company that wants to buy your company.

> The Other Side: "You know, you really, really really should take our offer because if you don't, what we're gonna do is we're gonna come into the market and we are going to crush you, so that your company is going to be worth nothing when we're done.
> You: [Puts out the fire] "We want to have nothing to do with you because if that's the kind of person you are, frankly, we don't want to trust our company and the future of this great business that we built to someone who wants to act in that fashion.

While this threat is aggressive, this is a situation where it's not just what you say, it's how you say it. In other words, this threat can alternatively be delivered as more of a "fair warning" if it's coming from a place of positivity and good faith negotiation practice.

For this example, imagine that you own a tea company and Coca-Cola wants to talk about buying your company:

> Coca-Cola: "At Coca-Cola, we sold tea—bottled tea—in a joint venture with Nestle, under the brand name Nestea. That joint venture wasn't working as well as we had hoped and so we've ended the joint venture. As a result, we now have a mandate to go and purchase a tea company. Tea is the biggest hole in our beverage portfolio. We've looked around the country, around the world, and you are our first choice. So we would like to buy your company and have you be apart of our family. However, if it turns out that we're not able to get our first choice, we are still going to have to do something because this isn't a "would like to have", this is a must have for us. So, we hope that we succeed in doing the deal with you, but at the end of the day, we are going to purchase a tea company."

See how this still works as a "competition threat" but isn't so much of a threat as it is a fair warning?

If you were in the position of the buyer, bullying someone into a deal would sour the negotiation and sets up a power relationship that the other side would not appreciate. However, it's okay to help the other side appreciate the consequences of what it is that's likely to happen if you don't reach an agreement.

Negotiation Quick Tips

Don't Lie

When you lie, you complicate the negotiations. Admitting you lied or fabricated information creates a whole different series of problems. How can the other side trust anything you say going forward?

Pay Attention

You don't have to be able to read micro-expressions like an expert, but if you aren't even looking at the person (say, for instance, you have your attention on your phone) then you have no hope of picking up on when the other side may be lying to you. Even if you can't recognize lies, don't make it easier for the other side to lie to you. Look at the person. Make eye contact.

Negotiating For A Raise

One of the most typical -and most important- negotiations people will ever face is negotiating for a salary increase.

So I teased out all the best content from Yale's "Introduction to Negotiation" and came up with a step-by-step guide on how to negotiate for a raise.

Bullet Summary

- Phase 1: Pre-bargaining. This is when you gather and give information before the negotiation starts.
- Phase 2: The actual negotiation and exchange/proposals which are concluded at the deadline.
- Phase 3: Afterward. (Remember, negotiation is a process which means it goes on and on and most relationships tend to be continuing. There are very few "one-shot" deals.)

Phase 1 – Pre-bargaining

1. Step Zero: Negotiation Preparation

To be successful in negotiating, think carefully about what's important to you. Maybe it's money, maybe it's responsibilities, maybe it's a title, maybe it's the ability to get more experience so you can use that to make it to the next level. It's hard to get your employer to give you what you want if you yourself don't know what to ask for.

2. Prepare Your Persuasive Motive

You're a seller. You're selling the idea of why your employer should give you a raise. It is not really a problem to reveal your motives for selling. However, depending on the reason you give, your employer will be persuaded into a positive or negative reaction. As a side note I thought of while writing this, consider using Simon Sinek's Start with Why to persuade your employer using a mission or goal you're working towards:

The course material didn't have an example, so here is one I came up with:

> Your Employer: "If I gave you a raise, what would you do with the additional money?" [Why do you want a raise.]
> You: "As a kid I pretty much kept to myself because I always felt like no one truly understood me. Anytime I would watch movies or TV I'd make believe I lived in that world for a bit–I identified with these people and even though I was alone, I was never lonely! People do things on-screen that we are too afraid to do in real life, they share themselves with the world–they are truly brave. I want to reach those people and inspire them to be more brave in their real lives–that is why I've committed such a large part of my life to being an actor and storyteller in addition to working here. With the additional money I would be able to move closer to my goal."

3. “Get Informed”

You don’t want to find yourself in a position where you’re worried that if you say a salary that’s too low, they’ll say yes right away, or if you say a price that’s too high, you’ve started a fire.

1. Research the company and the industry.
2. Find what’s acceptable to ask for and what’s not (if you’re asking for more than just a raise).
3. Position yourself to be allocentric: Learn more about the position that your employer’s in as well as your employer’s interests so you can understand and appreciate them when the actual negotiation starts. Make your best assessment of your employer’s BATNA. In other words, make your best assessment of the most that your employer is willing to pay you.

4. Think Of Negotiation In Phases

The three phases are listed in the bullet summary above. Right now, we’re in phase one.

5. Determine Your BATNA

What is the least you’re willing to accept from your employer?

6. Prepare For Several Scenarios

”If you wish for peace, prepare for war.”*

Prepare for these situations:

1. Your employer agrees immediately to your offer
2. Your employer counter-offers
3. Your employer starts a fire

7. Get Ready To Leverage Your Lead Time

If you’ve stuck with me so far, know that this is my favorite part of this strategy and why I wanted to write this post for you all. According to negotiation expert Herb Cohen, most people will wait until a week before their boss gives out salary increases to tell their boss that they expect something (and the boss has probably already put the numbers in). They are forgetting that the key is your boss and always will be. It’s about making your boss look good and feel good. So, instead, they should have gotten a commitment from their boss by playing the long game:

1. Step One: Expand the Pie as a First Resort

You go to your boss six months before he’s scheduled to give out salary increases and say:

> You: “Look, I really am trying to get a raise. What are the things I have to do in the next six months that would get me an increase in compensation?”

Then, the boss will tell you.

2. Step Two: Prime Their Expectation Level

Three months later you go to your boss again and say:

> You: “How am I doing along the way of getting that compensation increase?”

3. Step Three: Close the Deal

One month before the scheduled salary increases you check in with your boss one last time.

Then, on the day of the salary increases, you've got it already because you've affected the expectation level of your boss and the boss knows. It's like the boss has promised it to you and you've both committed to this process over an extended period of time, so you get it.

However, this doesn't guarantee your raise will be as big as you might expect or want it to be. That's why in "Negotiating for a Raise: Phase 2" I'll be going over how to initiate and properly handle the actual negotiation itself according to Yale University.

Phase 2 – Negotiating a Raise

1. Leverage Various Sources Of Power

During the process of Leveraging Your Lead Time, you should prepare various sources of power as you approach the salary increase date.

1.) The power of the printed word: When information is in print, it leads us to believe that the information is set in stone and cannot be negotiated. For example, if your boss printed a packet and said, "Here it is, from the rule book. Rule six in our company is…," then out of respect for the printed word you are likely to accept it and forget that the information in that rulebook was at one point discussed and negotiated over. So, see if you can print information of your own to show to your boss that will help you be more persuasive.

2.) The power of competition: In other words, if the other side knows you have options and that they're not the only buyer/seller they will overestimate your power in the negotiation because you have alternatives to their deal (leading them to underestimate their own power in the negotiation). Try to give yourself alternatives to the deal you want with your employer.

2. Know Your Approach

You should approach your boss in a way that will get him to invest in the negotiation. Here are some sample approaches to consider:

1.) The Relentlessly Pleasant Negotiation Style: A style of negotiation where you are "soft in style, hard in substance". You have to be relentless in terms of going after what you want (a fair deal) but will have a higher success rate by negotiating in a friendly, cooperative, and collaborative way.

2.) The Liking (by Association) Negotiation Style: One way that "liking" works is that we buy more from those we like. In this case, we want your boss to buy into the idea of giving you a raise. Since you have more power in the negotiation the more you get the other side to invest, by being more likable they will like the idea of doing a deal with you more than if you lie, show a lack of integrity, talk too much, contradict them, or act judgemental.

3.) The Low-Key Pose of Calculated Incompetence Negotiation Style: Make sure you don't appear to be the smartest person in the room. Never let people know how bright you are or what you've accomplished; they should ultimately be able to figure this out after the negotiation is over and after you've told them what a great deal they got. Make your boss feel smart. By playing dumb and inarticulate in the negotiation, you get the other side more invested and involved in the process. Train yourself to say:

> You: "I don't know. I don't understand. Can you explain that to me again?"

Then, you want to ask your boss for help.

> You: "Look, you've been doing this for years. Could you like help me?"

Get them talking, get them doing, get them involved in the process.

3. Have The Champagne Ready

At the last meeting with your boss one month before the scheduled salary increase, it's good to have a bottle of champagne very evident and glasses sometimes at the end of the table. That way, your boss knows that there's a major time element, he must finish up negotiations with you on this deal. You could even bring a card that says "congratulations" and write a note inside congratulating your boss on his good choice.

4. Prepare For A "Breach Of Contract"

You've spent months working with your boss to get this raise. For your boss to change his mind or come up with a sudden excuse why he can't give you the raise anymore would be the equivalent of a breach of contract. When your boss does not negotiate in good faith this way, you can deal with the situation by claiming the moral high ground for yourself and strategically guilt-tripping your employer into a more cooperative frame.

Note: Personally, I don't agree with some of the above strategies, including this one. Guilt-tripping your boss is not only manipulative but a good way to get yourself fired if you take it too far like how John McCall MacBain recommends in the example here.*

> You: "Do you believe in good guys and bad guys?"
> Your Employer: "Of course, I wanna be a good guy."
> You: "You really wanna be a good guy in life don't you?"
> Your Employer: "Yes, I wanna be a good guy."
> You: "Well, let's take a situation. So, I'm a good guy, like you are, and I shake hands with someone saying…However, somebody, can't be a good guy, a bad guy comes in and says no no…So that person would have to be a bad guy. And you don't wanna be a bad guy do you?"
> Your Employer: "Of course, I don't wanna be a bad guy."
> You: "Well look, I can help you. The only solution you have to not be a bad guy is to…"

5. Be Allocentric And Expand The Pie As A First Resort

You were allocentric and expanded the pie when you looked out for the interests of your boss by asking, "What are the things I have to do in the next six months that would get me an increase in compensation?" That was the equivalent of saying:

> You: "Look, at some point we are gonna be talking about dollars, I know that. And that's going to be confrontational because you're always going to want me to accept less and I am always going to want more. But before we get there, let's talk about what excites you, what motivates you and how I can help make this deal work better for you."

However, that doesn't mean you can't look for ways to expand the pie further by asking questions like this again at the last meeting.

6. Anchor (High) With A Precise Bid

If you have the opportunity to make the first offer, a high asking price may help you get more money. This is one of the advantages of going first because the first number people hear serves as an anchor or starting point. Thus, your boss hearing a high number will pull up his view as to the best price to pay you. (Qualifications to think about before anchoring can be found in this post.)

A precise number will get a much better response/counter from your boss than a rough number because, with a precise number, your boss will think that you have some logic behind it, some principle that you've given consideration and thought to in your ask. Instead, if you're just putting up rough numbers, he thinks you haven't given great consideration and will respond/counter thinking that maybe you have no idea what you should be paid.

If he accepts, congrats! If not, continue to negotiate for what you believe is fair.

Real-Life Applications

If I had to remind you of one principle, it would be this:

1. Expand the Pie as a First Resort

In negotiations, buyers will sometimes make the mistake of arguing what the seller's product is worth to be more persuasive in their reasoning for why they believe they should pay less for it. A more productive approach is to start the negotiations off in agreement with the seller on whatever it is they think their product is worth so you can redirect the conversation towards how both of you can make the pie bigger for everyone.

> You: "This is what I can do. Work with me and help me to find a way to make this deal possible at the price that I can pay. In particular, I may not be able to pay you as much cash as you like, but what are some of the other things that I can do to help make your life good? What are some of the things that you are worried about in this deal? What are some of the things that excite you about this deal? How can I help relieve you of the worries and increase the level of excitement? And I know, of course, that more cash is always good but what are some of the things besides cash that will make this deal better for you?"

You should seek to expand the pie before butting heads with the other side on just the dollar amounts of the deal. A lot of people look for opportunities to expand the pie as a last resort when there's no other way of making the deal work. By expanding the pie as a first resort, you accrue the benefit of getting people invested in the negotiation and also help appreciate how big a pie can be created.

> You: "Look, at some point we are gonna be talking about dollars, I know that. And that's going to be confrontational because you're always going to want me to pay more and I am always going to want to pay less. But before we get there, let's talk about what excites you, what motivates you and how I can help make this deal work better for you."

Or:

> You: "What else can I do besides giving you money that would make your life better? What other ways can I make you happier about this transaction besides just paying more? I know later we're going to talk about the money and that's going to be an issue of contention but right now what are things I can do to help make this deal work better for you without necessarily paying money?"

CONS

- A Bit Disorganized

My personal feeling is that the course could have done better in terms of how the material is laid out for its students. I spent a lot of time coming up with names for different strategies so it would be easier to spot and remember them because the professor did not provide names for all of the tactics, principles, etc. in the course. I would also come across a certain strategy in one week and then a week and a half later come across the same strategy after we had already covered it and moved on as a class (which can be slightly confusing and annoying).

- Some Risky Suggestions

One example of a risky suggestion the course gives is in the usage of humor. Using a bit of humor to communicate to the other side that their outrageous offer is not appropriate works as a good strategy most of the time. However, I can only imagine how joking that you're ready to sign a deal would go over with the other side after hours of heated negotiation and social effort. If done improperly or ill-timed, the joke can make you come across as someone who is immature and doesn't care about the deal or the other side's time and energy. The last thing you want to do is break rapport and sour a relationship by offending someone this way.

- Lots of Math

Early on in the course, there is a hefty amount of math you have to work through. It was worth it in the end for my understanding of the pie concept, but it felt a bit overdone since most daily negotiations don't require extensive mathematical knowledge.

- Slightly Unfocused

I took lots of notes on this course. Unfortunately, I spent a great deal of time piecing certain strategies and principles together to make sense of how they all tie together, which took away from the time I could've spent learning and is something that I felt should have been done already.

PROS

Lots of Genius
This is a Yale course, so I had set my expectations pretty high. And it delivered

Doesn't Shy Away from the Dark Side of Negotiation
Before taking the course, I didn't read anything in the course syllabus about the professor covering negotiation threats and how to deal with them, so that was a nice surprise.

Many Examples
I appreciated that there were a lot of video examples of negotiations as well as stories the professor uses to teach how to negotiate by recalling his negotiations as the co-owner of his company, Honest Tea.

Review

I have enjoyed the Yale's "Introduction to Negotiation".

However, a large part of me knows that this is more like a well-rounded introduction to negotiation and not the end-all-be-all of training in negotiation and persuasion.

But it's a great foundation to start from.

Cold Approach VS Social Circle (VS Tinder): Strategies

Cold approach, warm approach via social circle, or Tinder?

Which one should you choose when it comes to meeting and approaching women?

- Summary

1. Cold Approach

"Cold approach" is defined as:

> walking up to a woman who is a complete stranger, with no social ties and no social trust, and with the intention of getting sexually and/or romantically involved with her.

PROS:

- Empowering: knowing you can go out randomly and approach women you like is empowering both at a mental and inter-personal level

- Empowering Independence: with cold approach, you can rely on yourself and yourself alone
- Empowering Freedom: you can go wherever you want, whenever you want, and can meet new women just by walking around
- Quantity of options: IF you live in a large and dense city there are countless options

Higher-end shopping streets and stores are some of my favorite places for cold approaches

- You can leverage the law of large numbers to find a mate: go out every day for a month, approach 10 women a day. If not, just make it 2 months. Or 3. And… You see where I'm going.
- High power (for more average men and women): a well-executed cold approach can send a strong message of confidence and social power.
  BUT: most cold approaches are not high-power
- Can empower men entering LTRs: it's empowering to him if she knows he can find a mate anywhere. That makes it easier for him to maintain attraction and power in long-term relationships.
  Note: that's not to say that high-status men cannot enjoy the same benefit even if they meet via social circle
- Opportunity for personal growth: cold approach can be an opportunity to face your (social) fears and learn more about people, body language, social dynamics, and nonverbal signals

Overall, cold approach is a tool of freedom.
And that's what I love about it the most.

To enjoy some of cold approach's benefits, you don't even have to cold approach.
The knowledge that you can is empowering in itself.

CONS:

That's some impressive list of pros there.

However, how about the cons? And how about effectiveness?

Let's see:

- Many top women are not in the streets: many top-caliber women are rarely out and about in the street. They use taxis or private drivers.

As a rule of thumb:
  - The more dangerous the city, the fewer top-caliber women walking around
  - The more elitist the city, the more the top calibers women hide in high-society (balls, galas, country clubs, art exhibitions, etc.)
  - The more inequality in the city, the more top caliber women shun the streets

- Limited potential outside of big urban cities: proper day game requires bigger cities. Even more than that, not to make it a time sink, it requires densely populated big cities, and densely populated with the type of girls you like.
  Anything less than, you can approach when you see something good, but you'd waste too much time going out only for daygaming.

A young Melania Trump: you don't meet these foxy ladies in the street, but at exclusive parties and clubs

- Can be tough on ego: In cold approach, success is a statistical fluke. A string of rejections can sink someone's confidence and self-esteem.
  Note: However, this shouldn't be the reason to stop you, and only happens to men who haven't worked on themselves -see: "growth mindset", and "antifragile ego"
- You can't easily overcome stereotypes: it's harder to overcome a negative stereotype by just walking up to someone cold.
- Looks and first-impressions matter more: in cold approach she knows nothing about you, except how you look, and how you come across in the very first minutes -or seconds-.
- Potentially low returns on investment: not particularly attractive and/or skilled men will have to go through a lot of interactions to find some good prospects.
  Just look at some of the few honest videos on YB.
- Opportunity loss: Trawling the streets takes time. Time that will not be spent building careers, businesses, or reaching mastery, status, and/or fame.

- Fragile interactions, one mistake and you're out: Early interactions are fragile. But you can go for quantity rather than quality.
- Reputation risk: Cold approaches done over a long time can be a risk to some men's reputation.
- Inherently flakier: Without social ties, you also have little social capital. And unless you can have a longer interaction/instant date, you rely on fleeting emotions.
- You get more crazy and "loose" women: Cold approach can work with anyone, of course. It's just that certain types of women, such as sexually unrestricted, risk-takers, and extroverts are over-represented.
  I've been in contact and in group chats on many PUAs channels, and more than once I've seen them going out with the same women (including the drama you can expect)
  Fix: "tone it down" and read "Seduction University" for the how-to.

- Potentially low power: Approaching first inherently communicates you want something from the woman. And it suggests you probably don't already have a great abundance
  In terms of "Straight Line Seduction":

The frame of a cold approach is "I already chose you and pursue you, you judge me and see if I'm good enough"

Be Warmer With Risk-Avoidant Women

As an observant world traveler, I realized this:

To maximize results it's important to tailor your approach to the "risk appetite" of the local women.

And women's risk appetite matters the most in cold approaches.

You know you are in a risk-averse society when you have signs of attraction, but many of those attracted women will still not come out to meet you.

These are just some examples of women who showed signs of attractions but who never came out to meet me:

Risk-averse women will often either not meet cold-approaching guys, or get cold feet and cancel, even when they like them

To generalize, in risk-averse sexual markets, cold approaches yield a higher percentage of dates with more sexually unrestricted or "crazy" women.

It's not a coincidence that in my dating experience in more sexually restricted countries, I had a relatively high percentage of crazy and "unrestricted" women. It's because those were the ones most likely to follow through on cold approaches (see in the forums one example here -psycho girl section-, one more here, and one more here, with heavy early sexual frames).

Solution: Making cold-approach work in risk-averse culture

You want to increase your warmth to come across as safer.
And that's also a good idea in most other places as it won't harm you.
See "Seduction University" for more.

Best For:

Overall, cold approach works great for attractive men.

Cold approach works best for:

- Attractive men
- Well-groomed men
- Men who can act confident / high-power
- Socially intelligent men: this is about calibration
- Men who live in high-density urban areas

Pro Tip: High-Volumes, But Not Overcrowded

More than once I've seen groups of PUAs.

Most often, they all lined up in the most crowded spot in the city.
For example, a subway exit (Seoul's Gangnam station), a busy crossroad (Shibuya in Tokyo), or a shopping road / central square (Berlin's Alexanderplatz).

Women have higher defensive shields in crowded places, and are more likely to reject strangers as default responses

From a numbers' point of view, it makes sense: more women, more opportunities.

But it doesn't make sense from a psychological point of view.

We didn't evolve to move around hundreds of strangers and hop on and off subways, so people's instinctive defenses tend to be higher in transition and crowded spots.

Cold-Approaching & Reputation

As a rule of thumb:

Anyone with a reputation to uphold should be a bit more careful with cold approaches (also see Tom Torero tragedy).

See more issues and solutions in Seduction University.

Men who are seeing someone must be careful with cold-approaching

If you're not in a committed relationship, then fair game.

It can still cause some unnecessary issues though:

Even if you're not "official" yet, cold approaching can still invite drama
Sometimes it's not even your girl seeing you, but her friends. And you know that a jealous guy friend would be SO happy to record you and "report" you.

Doing lots of cold approaches in the same spot can also ruin a previous good cold approach you had.
In one instance, a woman I had cold-approached and agreed to meet again saw me doing another cold approach.
She then walked up to me and straight-up told me: "delete my number".
My respect for that woman shot up. But I had ruined it by overdoing the cold approaches.

So, as a rule of thumb, if you had some really good interactions, it can be a good idea to either pause for the day, or to at least change location.
If it's in a bar or club and it was a really good interaction, you can also consider going somewhere else.

2. Online Dating

You heard these before:

> "Online dating doesn't work"

Or:

> "There are only average girls on Tinder".

I don't find either of those to be true.
Because online dating doesn't work for those saying it doesn't work, it doesn't mean it doesn't work for anyone.

Online dating works great if you're in the top-tier category of men.
Says Ben, Charisma on Command founder:

> Ben: Before tinder, I was putting effort in dating, going to bars, talking to women in the street. Now I put less time into dating but I date as much, maybe a bit more. It's just easier.

So let's get down to the advantages of online dating:

PROS:

- Time-effective: you can swipe during down-times of your life -commuting, waiting in line, or even on the toilet, where many women do it-. You can swipe and reply as a way of chilling at the end of a long day.
- Easy to schedule hookups (if you're top 20%): If you're high enough SMV and are in a risk-taking and libertine sexual marketplace, it's easy to schedule hookups.
- Wide choice
- Mo' money, mo' matches: premium features available for more chances
- Travelers' secret weapon: you can line up dates before you even land, hit the ground… Banging.
- Market penetration intelligence at the fingertip: you can use apps to scout your best sexual marketplaces before deciding where to go (see Seduction University)
- Meet women you wouldn't otherwise meet: some women don't party, some work night shifts, and some rarely set foot in the street.

  Example:

I once had a great time with an "e-girl".
She made a good income broadcasting on camera and collecting gifts from her admirers (simps). She'd rarely leave home and was worried about being seen by her fans.
Hence, you could only meet her through online dating.

CONS:

- Not all women are online: all women say they're not Tinder, or they just downloaded "for curiosity". Still, some are telling the truth.
- Some of the most in-demand women don't do online: the more real-life options, and the more high-quality men she has around, the less likely it is she will be online. There are exceptions, as for everything.
- More sexually promiscuous women are over-represented?: Question mark there. Frankly, I have no data and I'm not aware of any available. But it's certainly possible.
- It's a winner-take-all game: great news for top of pyramid guys, but not for all the rest. If you're not getting great results, don't despair, because that's how it is for the majority of men.

But this is NOT a con:

- Some women are there for validation: sure, a few women are there just for the validation. But it's the same for real life

Best For:

- Attractive men: the good news is that it's as much about your looks, as it is about the quality and angles of your pictures.
- Rich / famous men who can show off their value: supercars, yachts, jets, or better yet, famous people won't hurt.
- Men reaping sexual marketplaces imbalances: ie.: white men in locations where white men are sought after.

Personally, online dating is highly environment-dependent for me.

It works little in some sexual markets, including in some markets where I didn't do badly in person.
But it's worked so well in some other places that I barely needed to meet anyone in person.

3. Social Events (Lukewarm)

I defined lukewarm approaches as:

> Walking up to a woman who is a complete stranger, but in a situation where talking and meeting to new people is both normal and expected.

Lukewarm approaches often take place in pre-planned social events that are about mingling, talking, or networking. They include:

- Gala events
- House parties
- Churches
- Business conferences
- Meetups
- Seminars and trainings
- Language exchanges
- Airbnb events
- Travelers' meetups (Couchsurfing, Facebook, etc.)

These events are social in nature, but plenty of people also attend them with dating in mind.

PROS:

As a mix between cold approach and social circle, you get many advantages of both.

- Socially skilled men can showcase social dominance and leadership skills -and women love that-

This is the biggest advantage and the reason why socially skilled men should do some social events to take advantage of this important strength.

- Social trust makes shier & sexually restricted women feel safer: if social circles score 10 in trust and cold approach scores 0, you're at around a 6 or 7 here, enough to make shier and more reserved women feel comfortable.
- Great opportunity for self-promotion: you can display deeper SMV values like resources, life achievements, lifestyle, as well as dating success talking to the group or to someone else, without bragging to the girl you're interested in -big difference- (see Seduction University for examples on how to do this)

- Great opportunity to become a star ("localized fame"): If you speak in front of everyone at some seminar or event, even just disagreeing or asking smart questions, people will remember you and you become "famous" in that environment. A friend of mine volunteered to sing at a tourist party. Little later, two women approached him, and he had sex with one of them (the story is here).
- Very attractive women attend exclusive events:
- Can combine dating with socialization: even if your primary goal is to meet women, you can still meet some cool guys. And who knows, either make a new good friend, or a business partner.
- Social skills training: events are a far better way of learning socialization than cold approach
- You can retain power: talking and approaching are normal, so you don't signal interest like in cold approach
- You can get women chasing you: if you acquire status in the group, some women chase you.

  Example: Seduction University.
- Sexualize from the very beginning: the smoothest seducers sexualize in social circles and extended social circles, without ever going too direct or crude (think George Clooney style).
  The movie "Eyes Wide Shut" is all based on sexualized lukewarm approaches:

> Him: (takes her glass and drinks it) my name is…

CONS:

- Limited to the attendees' list: and if there is none you like, you can't do much about it.
- Not as time effective: if your goal is only to meet women, events might not provide the opportunity for quick and successive approaches.
- Potential for high competition when men outnumber women: when there are far more men than women, women automatically "become the prize". However, if you come across as cool enough, you can use "strategic ignoring" before finally making your move and, if she preferred you, you meet her as equals.

Best For:

- Socially skilled men
  - Charming men
  - Charismatic men
  - Men who can bond and connect: grab any chance to move to 1:1 and go deeper

4. Social Circle (Warm)

Your social circle includes:

- Your old friends
- Your current friends
- College and university colleagues
- The people you go out / party with
- Your extended family
- Your neighbors -as long as you at least say hi to them-
- Your colleagues and coworkers
- Anyone who attends your same activities

Social circle game is defined as:

> To meet or pursue women with whom, because of social ties, context, or repeated exposure, it feels natural and socially normal to start a conversation with

It's a fuzzy definition, so social circle game includes meeting women who:

- You know yourself
- You know through friends or acquaintances
- You see often (barista at your favorite bar, for example)
- You're already friends with on social media
- You share some striking similarities with

Social circles can be differentiated into:

- Core circles, with the guys and girls you really know well
- Peripheral circles, with friends of friends, acquaintances, and people you see and "know they exist", but don't really talk to.

Core circles dating is more for providers and relationships. Peripheral circles can go both ways.

Research suggests that two individuals are more likely to pursue a dating relationship when third parties bring them together than without third-party intervention (Parks, 2007).

PROS:

- Shier / sexually restricted women feel safest: there is the highest in-built social trust.
- Research shows it works. Research suggests that two individuals are more likely to pursue a dating relationship when third parties bring them together than without third-party intervention.

- Best for relationship-only women: women who swore off hookups respond better to social circle men.
- A potentially endless chain of new people: you can move into new social circles with just one new person.
- With high status you can get women chasing you: women respond to power and status (hypergamy). So if you have or acquire high status in the group, you can get women chasing you.
- More room for mistakes: women tend to provide more leeway to social circle men they like.
- Attraction has a long expiration date: you have more time to get together with a girl when there is mutual attraction.
- Looks matter less: you have the time to show your deeper qualities and to "grow" on women. My first "serious" girlfriend wouldn't have given me the time of the day if I had stopped her in the street (and she let me know that, which of course was a "value me more power move")
- You can leverage the "similarity effect": people like people who are like them (Swani, 2015). In social circle, there is that feeling that "we're somewhat alike and get along with each other".
- Social circles = network = power: social circles go beyond dating. People and connections are power, and that adds value to your whole life, not just dating.
- Lifestyle approach to seduction: a few men can build a lifestyle around social circles that naturally gets attractive women around them. Think of club promoters, movie producers, model agents, but also model photographers.

- A cool social circle helps you meet and seduce women: if your friends are cool, that rubs off on you. And If you have attractive girlfriends, they work as a powerful preselection tool
- Good screening tool: you can get gather intel, get references, and observe how she behaves. That helps you avoid low-quality women

CONS:

- Most "normal guys" have poor social circles for dating: social circle dating only works for guys who have good social circles, or who can create them.
- Poor option for introverts: Introverts are not as effective and willing to develop and tend to social circles.
- Poor option for freedom lovers: social circles must be tended to, and come with social obligations.

This is NOT a con:

- Friend zone: this is a false problem. The problem is about being a low-value friend, because women are still attracted to their high-value friends.

See here an example of a "high-value" friend who has his pick of women:

> Sartain: I want to be their friends. And next time we go out, they will introduce me to their girlfriends

That's a guy doing good social circle game.

- Status and dating will be interrelated: if you got a high status, that will help you get girls, and if those girls say good things, that will boost your status. But it cuts both ways. If you chase hard, if you get spurned, if your relationship tanks, if the girl gets hurt and talks badly about you… Then you will also lose social status.
  Fix: Just don't worry about this, it's a defensive mindset
- Can't ghost / soft-next them: ghosting is often the weasel's way of ending things. But, in some cases, avoiding someone instead of having "the conversation" is a valid option. But you don't have that option in social circles.
- You move slower: not always but, on average, women care about their reputation if you know their friends.

And even more so if you are her friend. So they might move slower with you just to protect their reputation.

- Potential for personal details to leak out: when you get in a relationship with someone from social circle, her girlfriends will hear much of your personal life.
- Potential for awkwardness after a breakup: when your exes remain within your social circles not only your dirty laundry has the potential to leak out, but the dirty laundry stays there.

Funny example from "How I Met Your Mother":

> Ted: We dated for, like, a year. But now we're just friends. It's not weird.
> Victoria: No, no. Why would that be weird? I mean, if you hung out every day, that would…
> Ted: We do.
> Victoria: …still not be weird. Boy, I've never known anybody that hangs out with their ex every day.
> Ted: Well, Barney does.
> Victoria: Really? Who's Barney's ex-girlfriend?
> Ted: Robin.
> Victoria: Your Robin?
> Ted: Mine and Barney's, yeah.
> Victoria: You don't all three hang out together?
> Ted: All the time.
> Victoria: And we have weird.

Best For:

- High status and high power men
- "Cool" guys: who are liked and respected by others
- Men with "deeper layers value": such as, men with attractive traits that are not obviously visible in first approach

5. Have Women Come to You

The ideal, most effective, highest power solution.

See "Dating University".

Which One Should You Go For?

There is no general "best" that applies to everyone and in all situations.

When someone is too adamant in recommending one against the other, you should ask yourself:

1. Is he biased because he wasn't personally successful in any of the other methods?
2. Is he biased because he is selling one specific method?

What's "best" for you depends on your personal strengths, lifestyle, station of life, as well as your environment and the type of sexual marketplace you live in.

Cold Approach VS Social Circle

Social circles have received a bad rep in the dating industry.

Personally, I think it's a question of self-serving interest.
Since most PUAs sell courses and ebooks based on cold approaches, it pays to denigrate social circles (and online dating).

I almost always disagree with generalizations.
And what's best for you depends on your strengths, preferences, as well as where you live.

In terms of power and effectiveness, some coaches say that cold approachers have an advantage over guys in her social circle.
But that's only true if you're comparing a great cold approacher VS a poor social circle guy. Otherwise, the final advantage always comes back to "who's higher value", independently of how she knows him.

That being said, if we were to pitch two completely identical guys that she both likes the same way -an almost impossible proposition, by the way-, then the cold approacher might have the edge if she wants a one night stand, while the social circle guy might get the edge if she seeks a relationship.

Summary

We reviewed the different strategies to approach and meet women:

- Cold approach is to walk to a woman you have no social connection with, and strike up a conversation.
- Lukewarm approach: is to attend events, mixers, as well as bars and nightclubs where people are expected to talk and interact.
- Warm approach through social circles is to pursue or meet women whom you already know, or that you meet through something or someone in common
- Online dating is to meet women through dating apps. Easy and super-effective for top 10% folks.

And we said that the best approach is to mix all of them.

How to Keep People from Pushing Your Buttons: Summary

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How to Keep People from Pushing Your Buttons (1994) is a book on cognitive-behavioral techniques (CBT) that help readers control their minds and state.
Albert Ellis presents the ACB model as a technique to control one's emotional state and prevent nasty people and situations from upsetting our mood.

Bullet Summary

- We all think (mental response), feel (emotional response), and act (behavioral response) when faced with an event or individual (stimulus / activating event)
- Most people wrongly think that feelings and actions stem from events. If someone says something mean, then you naturally feel dejected. But that's wrong, it gives power to button pushers
- Instead, you can direct and control how you feel and act in a situation by directing and controlling how you think

Summary

About the Author: Albert Ellis (September 27, 1913 – July 24, 2007) was an American psychologist who developed Rational Emotive Behavior Therapy (REBT). He is also generally considered one of the originators and early proponents of cognitive-behavioral therapies (CBT).
Ellis is also the author of "How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable".

The 4 Screwball Feelings You Need to Handle

The 4 feelings are:

1. Excessive anxiety:
2. Excessive anger/defensiveness:
3. Excessive epression/burnout:
4. Exessive guilt: if you make yourself overly guilty, people can manipulate you

If you're wondering what's "excessive", well, it's "excessive" 95% of the times you think it's excessive.

And as a general category:

- Any over-reacting and self-defeating behavior

When you experience one of these feelings, you will not handle the situation as effectively as you could, and you will probably upset yourself -ie.: you let someone or something push your buttons-.

Warning: don't necessarily trust what people say

Watch out: Don't 100% trust other people's opinions of your behavior. ("Oh, you're just overreacting"). Sometimes they are right, but sometimes they are just using dark psychology to manipulate you.

The ABC of Button-Pushing

- Activating events: specific people, events, or succession of events that can push our buttons. They can even be positive events, sometimes, like weddings, job opportunities, etc.).
  - Real crises: it's fair to get worried about these ones. But, usually, we tend to rise to the occasion
  - Daily frustrations: these are the ones we unnecessarily allow to push our buttons
- Beliefs/thoughts: there are four main ways we think about our situations and events (here I list 5 because Ellis adds another one in another chapter). In red the bad ones, in green the one you should use:
  - Catastrophizing / awfulizing: you make things a bigger deal than they actually are.
    Catastrophizing can start with "what if" scenarios when our answers only deal with worst-case scenarios (awfulizing). It can also start with stock phrases like "I hate…", "I can't stand it when… "
  - Shoulding (absolutist thinking): "I must", "I have to", "I should" (shoulding, musting, or demanding).
    Comparing yourself to others is a form of shoulding, and they all put unduly negative pressure on you that makes you feel bad.
  - Blaming people rather than their acts:
  - Rationalizing: "Who cares!", "and so?" "it doesn't bother me". They are underreactions and poor attempts to deny or play down what's happening and how we truly feel. Some rationalizations are cover-ups for our pain, fears, or for our sour grapes. We try to con both the people around us, and ourselves, and we rationalize to avoid dealing with our button pushers.
  - realistic preferences: "I want", "'d like", "I'd prefer", and "It would be better if". They all have an overt or implied "but" in it. Such as, if the person or the situation doesn't turn the way you want, you'll still be OK with it.
    Example: When you tell yourself, "I'd like my boss or coworker to treat me well," you imply, "but he or she doesn't have to" And then you add: "It won't kill me if that person doesn't. I can still handle things."
- Consequences: represent two things:
  - Feelings
  - Behaviors in the specific situation occurring at Point A

Keep this in mind:

> It's feelings and beliefs that cause behaviors, not evens.

But that's not how most people think and act. Most people don't have this mindset.

Most people have a "victim of events'" mindset

Most people's pre-programmed mindset is that events cause behaviors.
Like this:

But that's a poor mindset that allows people, events, and the external world to control your emotional state, as well as your behavior.
Says Albert Ellis:

> Let's say you had a fight with your spouse.
> In reflecting on what happened (especially if you're still angry), you might recall that you said some pretty nasty things, but perhaps quickly explain them by saying, "Well, he started it" or "she made me so mad. . . ."
> What you would be saying is that his or her behavior (the Activating Event) caused you to act the way you did (at Point C). But that would not be completely accurate: You also contributed by what you were thinking about him or her at Point B.

Instead, the correct model for empowered folks who control their minds is this:

Says again Ellis:

> It is not what is actually, verifiably true at Point A that counts, it's what you think about it at Point B that will largely determine how you wind up feeling and acting at Point C.

This model also means that you must take responsibility for how you think and for how you mentally frame events in your life.

Some examples the author provides:

- Example 1: If you believe it's awful to screw up, you will avoid those "risky" situations, or you will fulfill your own prophecies. But if you believe that screwing up is not great, but it's OK and you can handle it and that you will learn a lot and that it's great to try and learn, then you will go for it and either win, or learn
- Example 2: If you believe you have to have someone in your life to make you a truly "whole" person, you will be miserable when you don't, and "they" will be able to push your buttons. If you believe it's better to have someone but you're OK to be alone and it's better to be alone than with a value-taking partner, then you will OK when you're single and you will pick better partners

Addressing Rationalization

There is usually some truth in rationalizations, so that they can seem plausible.

That speck of truth can make it harder for us to realize we are making excuses.
To check if you rationalizing as a way of making excuses, ask yourself:

- "Is my explanation for failing, or getting upset, or avoiding this situation a true reason?
- Am I taking responsibility appropriately, or am I placing blame on someone or something else to avoid failure, rejection, or blame?
- If I do take responsibility for my inappropriate feelings or behaviors, does that make me a bad person because I overreacted?
- Can I admit to my own feelings and behaviors, and the results they produced?"

Rationalizations when you make excuses for poor behavior are also likely to lead to submissive behavior.
When you make excuses for someone who is making you wait for hours, for example, you must keep on waiting.

And if you ask what's going on, you will do so meekly and submissively, as if you are disturbing them.

Example of Using the Model

Imagine you get a poor performance evaluation at work:

- Rationalization: My poor performance evaluation is only because I don't play office politics like the others. It has nothing to do with how good a job I'm doing. Everybody couldn't get an excellent rating; I'm just the sacrificial lamb.
- Challenge the rationalization: Am I avoiding taking responsibility for the poor evaluations? Am I afraid to consider the possibility that I did not do as good a job as I could, or as the boss expected?
- Fix your rationalization: Ask someone in the office I trust what they think of my work; talk to the boss about specific areas for improvement, and what has not been getting done satisfactorily, and what his expectations are for a better evaluation; submit a plan of action to the boss as to how I intend to meet the improvements.
- Swap with realistic preferences: I'd like to believe that my poor evaluation is only politics but it would be better if I asked someone I trust and my boss for specific feedback and get to work on improvements.

Please keep in mind that to internalize the model you need to:

1. Take responsibility for your feelings and behavior
2. internalize that changing the way you think in reaction to others is a worthwhile endeavor
3. Stick to it systematically, because it's not a one-shot fix, and it takes time and effort

Addressing Fears With ABC: Example

On his first public talk, Ellis was tense and anxious.

As it's natural to most people, he started with awfulizing:

> "What if I do a terrible job? What if everyone is bored to death and starts talking among themselves? What if I get asked a question I can't answer?
> (…)

Then, he started shoulding:

> "I should be able to give a talk to a group. I'm an adult person; I shouldn't let this bother me. If I can't do this, mother was right—I'm a turkey: I'll never amount to anything!"

And a few rationalizations:

> "So what? Who cares? Big deal! It doesn't bother me if the audience doesn't like what I have to offer. If they're too stupid to appreciate what I have to say, that's their problem!"

And that's how he fixed his mindset by replacing the bad mental habits realistic preferences over and over, each time he slipped into awfulizing, shoulding, or rationalizing: "

> I'd like this group to like me and think highly of what I have to say. If they don't, that's unfortunate—but it's not awful unless I make it so. I want to do a good job, and I will put every effort into it—but if I don't, that won't be terrible and horrible. I'll regret it and be disappointed and seriously concerned about it—but also committed to finding out how to improve on it.
> I'd prefer to answer every question brilliantly—but if I don't, I can handle that without shoulding on myself."

Also please notice that Ellis uses not positive affirmations to convince himself that everything will be fine.
Instead, he went to the heart of his anxiety, the belief that he had to do a great job at all costs, and that the group had to like him.
He moved from “had to’s”, to “wants”, and from “shoulds” to preferences.

Says Ellis about the effects of ABC:

> You will be concerned before you speak, and disappointed if you do blow it—but you won’t let the presentation push your buttons. In my case, I was able to reduce my anxiety significantly before and during the talk.

Plus, he was able to assess himself objectively, and learn from it.

Responsibility VS Blame & Fault

Taking responsibility for your feelings and actions is crucial in the ABC model -and, I would add, for an empowered life in general-.

However, it must be a healthy form of taking responsibility”.

Says Ellis (edited by me for brevity):

> First, we do not mean that you should blame or attack yourself for your poor behavior.
> Blame, and fault are not interchangeable – they actually have very different meanings.
> Responsibility means that you are accountable for your feelings and actions, because you have the capacity to direct and control them. Blaming yourself means that you put yourself, your entire person, down for having acted badly. Taking responsibility is healthy; blaming yourself is destructive.

ABC is Not Positive Thinking

Thinking positively has its benefits.

But the ABC model and cognitive behavioral therapy in general (CBT) are not always and necessarily about thinking positively.
Instead, they say that how you think about something will determine how you behave. And sometimes, thinking negatively about something might add more value to you than thinking positively.

Says Albert Ellis:

> Positive thinking surely beats negative thinking.
> But sometimes it can be a con or a distortion of reality.
> Sometimes the objective affirmations we are encouraged to tell ourselves are just a bunch of subjective baloney. There is a third option: realistic thinking.

Ellis encourages realistic thinking. Assessing situations for what they are, without catastrophizing.

Realistic preferences VS positive thinking

Says Ellis:

> Realistic preferences are not suggesting that you can or will be successful—that you can handle the situation perfectly, or that everything will turn out fine. Realistic preferences are saying that it is okay to give “it” a try—even if you might fail, be rejected, or the like.

If you fail, you don't tell yourself that it doesn't matter -that would be a rationalization-, but that you will most likely be able to handle it.
And whether you will try again or do something else, you don't get on your case.
And, to paraphrase Ellis:

> It's already not great you didn't win, should you also be miserable about it?

10 Screwball Beliefs by Albert Ellis

The top 4 are the most common:

1. Worrying too much about what other people think of you: it creates a strong fear of rejection and, ThePowerMoves.com adds, it gives others judge powers over you. The causes are the awfulizing, shoulding and rationalizing, and you can think that.
   1. People-pleasing behavior
   2. Auto-rejection and preemptive rejection: Attacking others first as a way of not being rejected first
2. The belief that you can't fail at important tasks [in business, school, sports, sex, relationships, etc.] and if you do it's terrible and you can't stand it: it leads to excessive fear of failure, inability to take criticism, not trying new things, and not learning and growing
3. The belief that people and things should turn out the way you want them to – and if they don't it's awful and you can't stand it
   1. The belief you should always be treated fairly: My note: I believe that to draw your boundaries and stand up to abuse, it's sometimes helpful to think that you deserve fair treatment
4. If any of the first three bad events happens [if I'm not liked/respected, if I fail, or if things don't turn out as I'd like], then I'll blame someone for it! They acted wrongly, as they should not have done, and they are rotten people for acting in that terrible way! dysfunctional groups always look for those who are to blame, while the most effective ones focus on solutions
5. If I worry about an event or about how someone feels about me, things will turn out better
6. Perfect solutions exist for every problem, and I must find them
7. It is easier to avoid difficult situations and responsibilities than to face them
8. If I never get seriously involved in anything, and maintain a detached perspective, I will never be unhappy.
9. It was my past and all the awful things that happened to me when I was a child, or in my last relationship, or in my last job, that causes me to feel and act this way now.
10. Bad people and things should not exist, but when they do, they have to seriously disturb me!

The exercise Ellis proposes is to score how strongly you hold any of these beliefs, and focus on them first.

The steps to change your limiting beliefs are:

1. How am I dysfunctionally feeling and acting in this situation?
2. What am I thinking to make myself upset (overly anxious, angry, depressed, guilty or acting dysfunctionally):
   - (a) about myself?
   - (b) about others?
   - (c) about the situation?
3. How can I challenge and dispute my irrational thinking?
4. What realistic preferences can I substitute for my irrational thinking (awfulizing, shoulding, and rationalizing)?

Solution for Worrying Too Much

Realistic preferences to deal with worrying too much about what others think:

> I'd like you to like and respect me, but if you won't, that's not awful, terrible, or horrible, and I can stand it. I am seriously concerned, because I think our relationship is important, and I am committed to doing everything I can to make it better. But I am not going to make myself miserable trying to win your approval, liking, love, or respect, then I have two choices: (1) I can accept that you do not like, love, or respect me; or (2) I can leave and/or find relationships wherein I can get my wants met."

Your goal

Remember, perfection is not required.

Improvement is the goal.

Ellis says you should aim for three goals:

1. Don't let the negative feelings happen so often
2. Make them less intense when you do overreact
3. Don't let them last so long

Albert Ellis ends the book by saying that both achievement and enjoying life are important. And it's possible to have both.

Exercise 1

The first exercise is to become aware of what are the people and situations that push your buttons.

Draw three columns on a sheet of paper, and write down your:

1. Dysfunctional Feelings and Behaviors (C's)
2. Events (A's) That Preceded These Feelings or Behaviors

Ask yourself whether your feelings and behavior are indeed behind dysfunctional.
You can learn to distinguish between your functional (self-helping) and dysfunctional feelings and behaviors by asking yourself questions like: "Will it help my relationships with others?" "Will it affect my health?" "Will it help me fail or succeed at my goals?"

Then, on the third column, write:

3. Functional Substitute Feelings or Behaviors

Ellis says that you want to confront your activating events. Especially if it's people. If you don't you will probably not overreact, but you don't address the issue, probably make it worse off, and certainly you are not improving yourself.
Ellis recommends that you make a list of the difficult people you will soon confront.

Real-Life Applications

- Daily practice to improve your life: practicing ABC daily will most likely help you control and direct your mind and thoughts. However, one must stress the continuous practice of the principles, as Ellis himself reminds more than once

CONS

- Some definitions could have been more consistent

The author sometimes refers to “shoulding” as “absolutist thinking”, but shoulding is only a subset of that category. I think more attention to the definitions could help people to better understand the concepts.

That’s by the way why this website launched a dictionary of power-related terms:

> The Definitive Dictionary of Power: Terms & Definitions

- Some categories could have been more consistent

The author first says there are 4 main ways of thinking about events, and 3 of them stink. But in an exercise, he adds a fourth “stinky” mental habit. That can be confusing.

- Disagreed with some relationship vulnerability

About a man who feels insecure and jealous about his wife on a business trip, Ellis recommends him to tell his wife once she comes back:

> I just want to know that you didn’t encourage anyone, and that you didn’t respond. I’d like some reassurance that you’re committed to me, and that nothing happened.

Ellis says that while some people might feel that makes you come across like an insecure wimp, it’s not true. But personally, I’m not 100% onboard and I think that would definitely impact the relationship power balances.

PROS

- Enlightening

Great wisdom and a gem of personal self-empowerment.

- Entertaining: AE is a true character

As you learn from top-notch material, you will also smile or laugh -which, by the way, is part of AE’s therapy strategy as well-.

Here are some examples:

> They took me into a small room with an officer, and inspected me carefully and thoroughly. They were looking for a bomb! I can tell you right now, I wouldn’t put a bomb where they looked for anything in the world. No cause, no crusade, nothing would get me to put a bomb where they checked!

On “trickle-down” shoulding:

> Some of us are simply great at shoulding on other people. A boss gets “shoulded on” by his boss, so he shoulds on someone he supervises—and so on, down the line. It’s the “trickle-down” theory of shoulding, until someone at the bottom goes home and kicks the cat or takes it out on a helpless family member.

Quotes

The quotes are a mix of great humor and wisdom.

On social status climbing as a form of “shoulding” on other people:

> I (A.L.) live in southern California, in an area where shoulding on people is an art form.
> So many people there run around worrying about how they stack up on the status pecking order!
> The first thing out of their mouths when you meet them is name-dropping something—anything: “I was driving in my new BMW [or Mercedes or Porsche] the other day, and there was a lot of traffic.” You stand there with a blank stare, wondering what the point is, until you realize it was to remind you of his or her new Beamer. You think, “Frankly, Scarlett. . . .” But they work the impressive facts in somehow, anyway.

Or on value-taking social-climbing questions:

> Other people have to check you out when they first meet you: “Oh, hello—where do you live?” “Oh, but what section?” “Oh, well—do you live in the tract homes or the custom Presidentials, where we are?” “Oh. But do you have a view?” Eventually, after you finally answer a question that reveals you are not as good as the questioner, the “Oh” sounds much less interested, and infinitely more disapproving. I work regularly on not letting them push my buttons in these ways.

1. Power & Strategies

Power University (10)
| by TPM

TPM's forum (10/10)
| by TPM community

The Logic of Political Survival (9.5/10) Long and complex, but a mandatory read to understand both power dynamics and human nature.
The author makes the case that it's not about the personality of the political leaders, but about the incentives and constraints they face. All political leaders care about is increasing their power and staying in power.
| by Bruce Bueno de Mesquita

The Prince (9/10) Il Principe is not an easy read. But it's a classic. It will teach you a lot about the darker side of human nature.
The Prince contains the keys to high-quality individuals who can move the world forward: developing value-adding individuals who know how to be bad.
| by N Machiavelli

The Art of Seduction (9/10) Not just about seduction, but social seduction as well. With his usual beautiful prose and deep understanding of human nature, Greene reviews charm, charisma and the use of flattery to ingratiate people.
| by R Greene

Underboss (9/10) The mafia as an organization is one of the best teachers of power dynamics and Machiavellianism. Underboss also delivers big when it comes to learning leadership fundamentals. However, for many of those lessons, you must be able to read between the lines, so it's more for advanced folks.
| by Peter Maas

The Art of Worldly Wisdom (9/10) The original "48 Laws of Power" is a treasure trove of advanced social strategies.
| by Baltasar Gracian

The Art of The Deal (9/10) Trump is not fully forthcoming here because, just like everyone else, he tries to look better. A funny example: he says that he wanted to get homeless people into one of his buildings to help them. That left me wondering. And then I found out it was a move to push low-paying tenants out (LOL so typical Trump). However, this is still a great book and it's a great resource to understand the mindset of ruthless overachievers.
| by D Trump

The 48 Laws of Power (9/10) On the dark side of human socialization, The 48 Laws of Power is an engaging read on social strategies and games people play.

TPM's forum (10/10)
| by TPM community

The Social Strategist (10/10) the best bridge between foundational social skills and advanced ones
| by Lucio buffalmano & Ali Scarlett

The Social Skills Guidebook (10/10) Possibly the best book I have read on social skills for beginners.
|by C MacLeod

Improve Your Social Skills (9/10) Daniel Wendler learned social skills as a boy with Asperger's syndrome. He knows what it means to learn the ropes from scratch. If you're experienced, this might be too basic for you. If not, go for it.
| by D Wendler

How to Win Friends & Influence People (8/10) Great, but you can find better in this day and age.

How to Talk to Anybody (5/10) 7 out of 10 for beginners and 4 or less for more advanced folks.

Daniel Goleman, both Emotional Intelligence (4/10) and Social Intelligence (3/10), both theoretical and also lacking in the theory.

2.2. Assertiveness Reviews

Power University (10/10): The only resource I've seen with real-life video examples, and the only resource that doesn't just "push" assertiveness, but that also tells you when to use, and the advantages, of passive and aggressive styles.
| by Lucio Buffalmano

The Assertiveness Guide for Women (10/10) Don't let the name fool you, it's also great for men. Ads a unique point of view between attachment styles, differentiation, and assertiveness.
| by J Hanks

The Power of a Positive No (9/10) In between assertiveness on how to defend our boundaries and a general communication skills book, Ury delivers at full marks on both fronts.
|by W Ury

8 Keys to Eliminating Passive-Aggressiveness (9/10) There is an overlap between passive-aggression and lack of assertiveness, and this is one of the best books on the topic.
| by A Brandt

Alpha Assertiveness Guide for Men and Women (8/10) Very hands-on, with many "how-to guides", lots of examples of assertive communication, and everything of generally high-quality. Thumbs up.
| by Gerard Shaw

People Skills (8/10) I disagree with some of the examples that use a "feeling" language at work, where I feel it's disempowering, but otherwise, it's a very good book.
|by R. Bolton

No More Mr. Nice Guy (8/10) Sometimes it feels like the author pegs all kinds of negative traits to the nice guy. But for those nice guys who are too nice in the sense of passive and submissive, it's a great book.
| by R Glover

- Best resources on assertiveness

2.3. Communication Skills

Power University (10/10): The only resource that extensively covers high-power, high-status communication.
| by Lucio Buffalmano

Thanks For The Feedback (9.5/10) The best book on how to give and receive feedback, including some great psychology
| by Stone, Heen

Difficult Conversations (9.5/10) The best book I have read on broaching difficult topics and negotiating interpersonal conflicts. With great psychology and awesome examples.
| by D Stone

There Is No Good Card For This (9/10) If "normal" conversation can be difficult at times, what about when tragedy strikes and there are no words? This book will help.
| by Crowe, McDowell

Crucial Conversations (9/10) One of the most popular books on verbal communication. And for good reasons.
| by Patterson, Grenny, McMillian, Switzler

Verbal Judo (8/10) If you learn how not to take things personally, you're at 80% of controlling verbal interactions. The other 20%? Thompson shares it as a cop who has had plenty of street experience with verbal judo.
| by G. J. Thompson

How to Talk to Anyone, Anytime, Anywhere (8/10) Short and to the point, all the fundamentals of listening, caring, and being genuine are here.
|by L King

2.4. Body Language Reviews

All body language books top at "9" unless they contain lots of pictures.

Power University (10/10): It has the obvious advantages over many other resources as it mixes still images and video examples.
| by Lucio Buffalmano

The Definitive Book of Body Language (9/10) The golden standard of body language books.
| by A Pease

Power Cues (9/10) An holistic approach to both body language and self-development.
|by N Morgan

What Every BODY Is Saying (9/10) The second best body language book I have read.
| by J Navarro

3. Dating, Seduction, & Intersexual Dynamics

On general dating dynamics, without strategies and techniques to find a mate (read below for those, divided by gender):

David Buss (10/10) with both The Evolution of Desire and When Men Behave Badly, he is the best source to shed a scientific light on the sexual marketplace.

| by D Buss

A Billion Wicked Thoughts (9/10) Great big-data analyses with lots of unique insights.
| by Ogi Ogas

Date-onomics (9/10) How the laws of economics and supply and demand affect dating. An eye-opening book not just for dating but for understanding humans in general.
| by J Birger

Dataclysm (8/10) Rudder, strong on his huge database of online dating interactions on OkCupid, can speak with authority when it comes to intersexual dynamics. And he shares some eye-opening insights.
| by Christian Rudder

Why Women Have Better Sex Under Socialism (7.5/10) Such a pity for the feminist and leftist bias, because her analysis on the male-female conflict for political and cultural control is spot-on. The analysis on sexual economics has some deep insights, but lacks a deeper understanding of the macro-forces that govern sexual economics.
| by K Ghodsee

3.2. Women Dating

Seduction University (10/10) the most scientific and experience-backed in this list, plus with texts, videos, and breakdowns

Anna Bey (9.5/10) A YouTube channel recommended by Ali.
LoF said it was more of a channel for wealthy male hunters and the "classy style" she preaches is only skin-deep.
If you look her up online, Anna Bey seems to have a bad "internet reputation" and lots of haters.
However, Lucio finds her content top-notch. Her dating strategies videos, here an example, share many similarities with this website. Her video on attractive body language is also great. And she understands the "optimum balance" for important traits such as confidence, independence, or "attention-grabbing" clothing and behavior.
You can learn femininity and class from her.
| by Anne Bey

The Tao of Dating (9/10) One of the best dating books for women I have read -if not the best-.
| by A Binazir

Dataclysm (9/10) Some hard-hitting truth to help women realistically assess their sexual market value, which in turn can help them shape better strategies and timeframes.
| by Christian Rudder

Seductresses (8/10) This is the book on seduction that feminists would love to be true. The good news: it probably is true, in part. The bad news: it works on certain types of men only, and it doesn't work or apply to 99% of women. The advice watered version of this book bandied by all feel-good dating coaches of "don't need a man, prioritize yourself and professional success" is not the most effective advice for many women.
That being said, in spite of the limitations I list in the review, I loved it.
| by Betsy Prioleau

Act Like a Lady Think Like a Man (8/10) The idea that men need to achieve a minimum level of achievement before settling was a groundbreaking one in the literature. It's mostly true for driven men, but something to keep in mind when dating.
| by S Harvey

3.3. Men Dating

Seduction University (10/10) possibly the best mix of science and research. This course doesn't push any personal preference, but gives you the foundations that work (or don't work) no matter what, presents every approach and strategy that work, and helps you find what works best for you
| by Lucio Buffalmano

Playing With Fire (9/10) Growfast and lilism in the TM community both recommended this YouTube channel. Lucio agreed it's solid (albeit wasn't happy it "took inspiration from TPM" without referencing). It's a good mix of "alpha male game", but without the exaggerations of the red pill -of which he's also critical- and focusing on processes and strategies.
| by Alex

Todd Valentine (9/10): Original PUA a bit more on the game-y side, but great to learn some "gaming techniques" and power dynamics, especially in verbal communication. Also great general approach focusing on doing the work and openly staying away from extremes and negativity such as the red pill. Big plus, you can learn from watching and breakdowns, which is a huge advantage over books. The same is true for his products.
| by Todd Valentine

The System (9/10) Books are great, but to learn the art, seeing is much better. That's why I feature video products very high in this list, and Todd Valentine is one of the good guys to learn from
| by T Valentine

How to Make Girls Chase (9/10) No made-up evolutionary psychology, no self-help rehash, no "you can do it" pep talk: just lots of high-quality techniques and processes.
| by C Amante

Girlschase.com (8.5/10) John in the community recommended it.
Lucio agrees: a top dating websites for men, with great contributors in its community -Alek Rolstad first and foremost for night game-.
-1 point because it goes for quantity rather than the "timeless top quality" approach we prefer. And 0.5 less because the products it sells are good, but not matching the website's quality and expertise. Lucio also didn't like the marketing and products/people it cross-promotes on the mailing list (including one we spoke with but chose not to promote here).
As for Chase, he tends over-generalize -including with a Western and libertine approach to dating-, jump to conclusions, and some bias and lack of expertise to assess studies. But he has the experience and intuition to still make him a great teacher.
P.S.:
Seems like they read and learned from TPM. Would have been appreciated if they referenced us.
| by Chase Amante + Team

Invincible (8.5/10) It draws heavily from Robbins and The Art of Seduction but it's solid material and a valuable focus on the fundamentals.
| by D Tian

Day Game (8.5/10) It's a video product. A bit brief and not too many video examples and case studies, but it's solid information.
| by T Valentine

What Women Want / Mate (8.5/10) This is slightly more geared towards long-term relationships and to those who want to date as providers (ie.: the majority of guys).
And it's possibly the best book at that.
| by G Miller & Tucker M

Fundamentals of Female Dynamics (8/10) In between a dating text and a self-help book, it makes the valid point that success in dating equates to success in life. The author has a good grasp of dating and psychology and what I enjoyed most is how he debunks many myths of poorer -but more widespread- pick-up literature.
|by M Knight

The Tactical Guide to Women (8/10): this is about picking the right partner, but also about dating as a high-value man. It's possibly the best book for those who are approaching dating to get a great relationship out of it.
| by S Smith

Skip These

The Mystery Method (4/10) Some good ideas but also some not-so-good ones. Overall, the system is too complex and many steps are often unneeded to provide real value.
| by Mystery

Transformation Mastery (4/10) The content is not necessarily bad, but it's simply not about seduction. It's mot about self-help based on "Letting Go" and targeted to the RSD followers. I actually liked the main idea, but it could have been condensed in a 10 minutes video.
| by J Blanc

Blueprint Decoded (3/10) A couple of good ideas for general self-development, but too few and far in between. Underwhelming when it comes to dating and seduction.
| by RSD Tyler

The Game (3/10) Entertaining story, but not nearly as good when it comes to effective dating.
| by N Strauss

Day Bang (3/10) Roosh presents indirect game as the most efficient and only way to get women during the day, while discouraging all other methods. That's simply not true. Plus, some of his advice can make you come across as weird and socially uncalibrated.
| *by Valizadeh R*oosh

- Check out the best dating resources for men

3.4. Relationships

The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work (10/10) If you had to read one single book of Gottman's deep well of research, go with this one.
| by J Gottman

The Tactical Guide to Women (10/10): A great relationship starts with picking the right partner. And this is the best book for that.
| by S Smith

Not Just Friends (10/10) If you are looking for information on emotional infidelity, preventing infidelity and mending a relationship after infidelity, look no further (or look at my post based on this book).
| by S Glass

Attached (10/10) Necessary read to understand relationships and a must-read if you are an anxious attachment
| by A Levine

Why Does He Do That? (10/10) Deep, eye-opening account of abusive men and the relationships they form. BUT, it's not equally deep in the psychology of WHY women often stick with abusive men anyway.
| by L Bancroft

Women Who Love Too Much (10/10) Potential life changer. I am still waiting for someone to write a book on

"men who need to be loved too much"
| by R Norwood

Men Who Hate Women, and Women Who Love Them (9/10) Best resources I have read so far on misogyny, both in terms of psychology of misogynists, how it develops, and the relationship dynamics of misogynist relationships.
| by Susan Forward

Hold Me Tight (9/10) Simple, yet profound message: great relationships are not built on great communication. Great couples don't communicate any better than poor ones.
The difference is all in emotional intimacy (boom).
| by S Johnson

The Man's Guide to Women (9/10) Great stuff for men. Many men badly need it.
| by J Gottman

The Women's Guide to How Men Think (9/10) Great text to help women better understand men, together with much wisdom on how to develop a positive relationship.
| by S Smith

The 5 Love Languages (9/10) You can both love each other, but you can fail to communicate it properly if you don't use the same language. This book will rescue you. It's a very simple concept, you can read the summary and skip the book to be honest.
| by G Chapman

Too Good to Leave Too Bad to Stay (9/10) If you are ambivalent and not sure whether you should breakup or work on your relationship, this book is for you.
| by M Kirshenbaum

The Relationship Cure (8/10) Highly specific on how small daily acts of "turning towards" build emotional intimacy. Must read for anyone who's serious about improving his relationship. | by J | by John Gottman

Men Are From Mars Women are From Venus (8/10) One of the most hated and criticized relationship books in the world. Feminists hate it, researchers hate for having no data and many hate it for implying women and men are completely different.
And still, it does get a lot of stuff right.
| by J Gray

Why Marriages Succeed or Fail (8/10) It's not true that great relationships have little arguing. Argumentative couples can get along as much as peaceful ones. But they must avoid the four horsemen of the apocalypse and keep a ratio of 5 positives to 1 negative.
| by J Gottman

4. Influence / Persuasion / Sales

Yes! 50 Scientifically Proven Ways to Be Persuasive (9/10) I usually don't like "lists" posts or books. They are often click-baits with shallow content and ankle-deep analysis. But, obviously, this is an exception.
|by Cialdini et All

Creating Lasting Change (9/10) Robbins' recipe to influence people for the better. Plenty of NLP of course and a huge amount of examples. Good stuff, just too bad that it lacks in structure as Robbins jumps left and right. He opens new topics, but then doesn't finish explaining them, which can leave the listener frustrated.
|by T Robbins

Don't Think of An Elephant (9/10) How the political class swayed poor and middle-class voters to vote against their own interest. Plus much wisdom on frames and how to use frames to influence others

|by G Lakoff

Influence (9/10) It's a huge classic and trendsetter. Most more modern and recent books on persuasion draw heavily from Influence's 6 principles.
| by R Cialdini

The Art of Deception (8.5/10) Best book on social engineering.
|by K Mitnick

Pre-Suasion (8.5/10) The sequel to Influence. Explains that what comes before your pitch is often what makes the difference. Must read as well if you're into people's skills and influence.
| by R Cialdini

The Social Animal (9/10) Albeit this is a social psychology book for universities and not a book on influencing, it talks at length on influence and changing people's minds and opinions. Being based all on science and research makes it one of the best resources available.
| by E Aronson

To Sell Is Human (9/10) Not your "how to sell manual", but by far my favorite book on selling. It's one of the few sales books with some good research and psychology behind and it debunks quite a few sales myths (ie.: "overcome objections", "tell yourself you can do it", "extroverts sell better")

50 Perfect Email Scripts (9/10): would've been great if the scripts had fewer "would love to pick your brain" sentences and more expressions of gratitude (also see Dream Job). All WIIFT mistakes aside though, these scripts are robust and I still use them with a few tweaks today.
Review by Ali Scarlett
| by Ramit Sethi

The Power to Influence (8/10) This is more sales-oriented compared to creating lasting change which is more holistic. It's a great product for sales manager and sales professionals.
| by T Robbin

Pitch Anything (8/10) This is The Power Moves applied to pitching. However, it's too aggressive and can be very off-putting.
However, do read it, you will learn a lot about power dynamics
| by O Klaff

The Art of Closing The Sale (8/10) If you had to pick one sales product from Tracey, go for this one.
| by Brian Tracy

Maximum Influence (8/10) Great overview of well-researched influencing principles in what's a very highly underrated text.
|by K Mortensen

Persuasion: The Art of Getting What You Want (8/10) No new ground was broken here, but Dave Lakhani gets a huge boost for focusing on the persona who actually delivers the message, which is indeed your 80% when it comes to persuasion.
|by D Lakhani

Skip These:

Straight Line Persuasion (6/10) This is a video series by Jordan Belfor, who is the guy in The Wolf of Wall Street. The mindsets and sales is good (but not great). But the part on voice tonality is the best I've ever heard.
| by J Belfort

Grant Cardone: mostly good for "high-pressure" type of selling, but not enough well-rounded to teach sales outside of his brand of influencers type of selling. His book “Sell or Be Sold” was OK, but skippable.

4.2. Negotiation

Negotiation Genius (10/10) If you had to pick one single book on negotiation, go for this one. It provides the best overview, and the best techniques to reach win-win
| by D Malhotra

Secrets of Power Negotiation (10/10) This is The Power Moves of negotiating. Learn what tricks the most shrewd (and sometimes sneaky) negotiators play and learn to play the game. Eye opening.
| by R Dawson

Game Theory Bargaining and Auction Strategies (10/10) After tens of books on negotiation, this is the first and so far only one that actually taught how it’s best to sell your house (ie.: with a Dutch auction).
Plus of course, I will add my own power moves to it (which I share in the Social Power course).
Oh yeah, and it also taught me about psychology, abuse and manipulation.
Invaluable.
| by G Berz

Getting Past No (9/10) All the basics of dealing with difficult negotiators are here.
| by William Ury

Getting to Yes (8/10) A huge classic of negotiation. And for good reasons: all the basics of positive and constructive negotiation are here. One or two points less because it was a bit weaker when it comes to power moves.
|by Ury & Fisher

The Shadow Negotiation (8/10) Theoretically written for women, everyone can instead learn from it. There are a ton of examples, which makes it very good for beginners.
| by D. Kolb

Never Split The Difference (7/10) Many (poor) resources focus on “getting to yes” (no matter what). The biggest pearl of this book is that to get powerful yeses you have to empathize, listen and empower them to say no.
| by C. Voss

5. Manipulation

Power University (10+/10): There is simply nothing on the market that teaches you manipulation, how to spot manipulators, and what to do about it as well as Power University does.
| by Lucio Buffalmano & TPM community

Who’s Pulling Your Strings (10/10) There are 4 or 5 really good books on interpersonal manipulation and how to defend against it and they’re all great. But if I had to pick one above them all, it might be this one.
| by H Braiker

How to Lie with Statistics (10/10) A great primer on how statistics can be willfully abused to sway us
| by D Huff

Methods of Persuasion (10/10) Kolenda makes it very clear he writes about persuasion and he opposes manipulation. However, how people use the information is up to them, and when it comes to information this one is a treasure trove: both to persuade and to defend yourself against manipulation.
|by N Kolenda

In Sheep’s Clothing (10/10) Simon explains how manipulators are aggressors in disguise, often hiding their egotistical thirst for power behind ideals and shared values.

A seminal book for the philosophy behind this website and one of the best books to understand both manipulation and psychology in general.
|by G Simon

The Art of Seduction (10/10) Deep and highly advanced wisdom on charm, social seduction, psychology and the use of sex and the allure of sex as a weapon for influence and manipulation.
|by R Greene

Emotional Blackmail (9/10) One of the best overviews of manipulation, emotional abuse, and power dynamics within close relationships, including ways to combat it and defend oneself.
|by Susan Forward

30 Covert Emotional Manipulation Tactics (8.5/10) The best mix of quality and brevity to understand, as soon as possible, if you are are in a manipulative and abusive relationship
|by A Birch

Propaganda (8.5/10) Holy cow, what a sacred cow of persuasion and manipulation. Propaganda is a huge classic and basically gave birth to the literature on persuasion and manipulation. Bernays didn't have access to advanced research and studies, yet he drops knowledge left and right.
The lack of a proper scientific approach, as well as access to modern-day research, weighs, but I loved it.
|by E Bernays

The Confidence Game (8.5/10) A good analysis of how cons work, both from the con artist's perspective, and the victim's perspective.
| by Maria Konnikova

Ho Tactics (8/10) Some of the dialogues and techniques were really good. Lambert has also written some more books on dating with lots of golden nuggets within.
|by J Lambert

A Gold Diggers Guide (8/10) The manual of the most astute gold diggers out there. If you plan on getting rich guys… Read up
| by B Fletcher

5.2. Dark Triad

Power University (10/10) Dark triad techniques and strategies applied for success. If you want to become a good Machiavellian, this is your course.
|by L Buffalmano

Casanova's Memoirs (10/10) An adventurer and lover high in Machiavellianism, power and also romanticism. That's a powerful, rare mix.

But it's not a book for everyone. It's long, and you must be able to read between the lines and across cultures to tease out mindsets and techniques.
|by G Casanova

The Dictator's Handbook (10/10) The best analysis of the techniques and power dynamics of dictatorship, with dictators usually men high in dark triad traits and power
|by B Bueno de Mesquita

Confessions of A Sociopath (10/10) If you want to learn how a female, high-functioning sociopath thinks, feels, and act, this is a good one.
| by M Thomas

The Wisdom of Psychopaths (9/10) The author unluckily misrepresents psychopathy. Otherwise, it's a good book and the concept and idea behind it is something I agree with. To be good, you need to know how to be bad, and that's also one of the main philosophies of this website.
| by K Dutton

The Good Psychopath's Guide to Success (9/10) Same as above. Same authors, but he writes it with an actual psychopath. So expect less science, more bragging, and a smattering of foul language. The idealization of psychopaths gets worse, but there is some good advice. And the main idea still stands: to be good, you need to know how to be bad.
| by K Dutton

The Art of Seduction (9/10) A book fully dedicated to seduction Machiavellianism, with the typical Robert Greene's high quality
| by R Greene

Psychopath Free (9/10) How it feels to be the victim of a dark-triad man (spoiler: it sucks). On the negative side, it could have been briefer and better structured.
| by J MacKenzie

Women Who Love Psychopaths (8/10) There seems to be a myth that psychopaths are "particularly good with women". In truth, they are good with a certain subset of women. This book is partially successful in shedding some light on who those women are. But you need to read between the lines because the author fails to connect some dots (also see: why psychopaths are sexually successful).
| by S Brown

30 Covert Emotional Manipulation Tactics (8/10) Dark triad in relationships is not all brawn and strength, and Birch does a good job at providing an overview of the sneakier aspects of manipulation.
|A Birch

Skip These

Without Conscience (7/10) Robert Hare is one of the most famous names when it comes to psychopathy, and this is his best book, meaning that it's one of the most commonly recommended or talked about. However, it's aged, and there is better on the market.
|R Hare

6. Business / Career / Money

Top Business & Money Authors

- Alex Hormozi (10/10) simply the best there is at this point in time, and great mix of business advice and life wisdom
- Warren Buffet / Charlie Munger (10/10): the best guys to listen when it comes to investing
- Tom Bylieu (9/10): only limitation may be that he is very extreme in the mindsets and extreme can turn into empty or toxic motivation. Otherwise, fantastic guy both for business mindsets, principles, and strategies.

6.2. Entrepreneurship Reviews

The Lean Startup (10/10) by now it's considered mandatory reading in startup circles, and for a good reason: launching early can save tons of money and time. Plus make your product ultimately better with early feedback.
| by E Ries

The 4 Hour Work Week (10/10) The solopreneurship bible that got hundreds of thousands of idiots with a money-losing blog to call themselves "entrepreneurs" and "digital nomads. But it's a wonderful book
| by T Ferris

Start With Why (10/10) To attract talent and motivate yourself, the people around the customers, a strong WHY is a must. Applicable to both business and life.
| by S Sinek

Step-by-Step Marketing (9/10) I got this one on Ben and Charlie's advice, and it was indeed really good. It doesn't go in-depth on anything, but that might be an advantage: it's a quick course with proven wisdom from naming your product to marketing it effectively.
Note: Eben Pagan is actually "David deAngelo" also marketing dating products. We are not fans of his dating stuff, but his marketing stuff is good.
| by Eben Pagan

Delivering Happiness (9/10) Can you marry happiness, fulfillment and business success? Not only you can, but you probably should. That's how Hsieh built a billion-dollar business.
| by T Hsieh

Crossing the Chasm (9/10) A huge classic on the adoption curve of new technologies. Even more relevant to startups than to established businesses.
| by G Moore

The E-Myth Revisited (9/10) If you want to build a business to become free and be independent of your own business, then you should take a look at this. Because many employees chasing freedom only end up more enslaved.
| by M Gerber

Zero to One (9/10) Pick founders and employees who share your same vision, dream big and think value-adding instead of disruption. Just three big ideas from this staple of entrepreneurship.
| by P Thiel

Disrupt You! (8/10) The story of an entrepreneur at heart going from small business to in-house entrepreneur in a big corporation. Some awesome stories on what it means to never give up and the right mindsets for startup founders (just one: don't fall in love with your ïdea: it's a dime in a dozen)
| by J Samit

The Entrepreneur Mind (8/10) I didn't expect much by a book with a list of 100 "mindsets bullet points". But I was wrong, there is lots of good stuff.

| by K Johnson

Avoid These

Go Pro (6/10) The network marketers' Bible. But network marketing might be a waste of time -unless you start it or jump in super early-. I actively discourage readers to go into network marketing.
| by E Worre

Earnable (6/10) Doesn't actually "walk you through" the creation of your dream business. I really didn't appreciate being left dead in the water, especially after paying such a high price tag. If the course provided some form of active mentorship, then it could start approaching ten stars.
Review by Ali Scarlett
| by Ramit Sethi

6.3.2. Marketing Reviews

Start With WHY (9/10) a great book on corporate identity and values as the main drivers of marketing and sales (people by the products as a way to state and communicate their own identity)
| by S Sinek

Methods of Persuasion (8/10) Not strictly about business marketing but plenty of insight you can apply to your marketing, both in writing and in words
|by N Kolenda

No Logo (8/10) This old no-global manifesto feels like an ethnographic study on the effects of great marketing. A fantastic read to learn more about marketing, protest movements, as well as people in general
| by N Klein

Avoid These

Purple Cow (4/10) Be remarkable to stand out from the market noise. Except that's what everyone else is trying to do? Not only such a simple concept didn't need a book, but the concept itself is also illogical
| by S Godin

6.3. Business Reviews

Principles: Life and Work (10/10) The best book on company's culture and a roadmap to institutionalize efficiency and effectiveness.
Applicable both to business and personal life.
| by R Dalio

Radical Candor (10/10) Together with Principles, the best book on company's culture and leadership.
| by K Scott

Winning (10/10) Warren Buffet said you won't need any further book after Winning. Welch, the author, is a controversial figure. As a vociferous Republican and espouser of a rather Darwinian view on HR, it couldn't be otherwise. But whatever you think of Welch, this book is really good.
| by J Welch

The Art of The Deal (10/10) Two things: first, there is controversy on whether Trump wrote it and whether it offers an embellished view of him; second, my review is not a political statement. The book is awesome. It has great mindsets and it will teach you how some sharks think and act.
| by D Trump

Sam Walton: Made in America (9/10) I used to think biographies and autobiographies weren't too helpful in building a business. I was wrong. So many lessons learned in the making of Walmart. And yes, even for tech entrepreneurs and solo-preneurs

| by S Walton

Deep Work (9/10) A great overview of the art -and science- of personal productivity. But also on business productivity, and here's the main tip there: ditch the open office concept.
| by C Newport

Drive (9/10) If you have employees or plan to have employees, you must read Drive.
| by D Pink

Start With Why (9/10) To have a strong culture, you should have a strong WHY. To market well, you should always go back to your WHY. Applicable to both business and life.
| by S Sinek

The Millionaire Fastlane & Unscripted (8/10) Not much information on actually starting a business, but if you want to switch from employee mentality to an entrepreneur mindset this provides a great kick in the ass.
| by MJ DeMarco

Onward (8/10) If you want to learn how culture can go awry and ruin an excellent business, read Onward. If you want to learn how to go back to the roots, read Onward. If you want to learn what it means to love one's business, read Onward.
| by H Schultz

6.4. Career Strategies / Office Politics

Power University (10/10) Simply the best resources available on career strategies, office politics, and advancing in your job
| by L Buffalmano

The Clever Connector (…) I wrote the foreword and Ali is a member of the community, co-author of TPM's first book, and by now a person who's quite close.
So I cannot rate it, but I can say that Ali based it on solid principles of power dynamics.
| by Ali Scarlett

Workplace Poker (9.5/10) One of the best books I have read on office politics. Very good for differentiating between the superficial lies, and how things really work.
| by D Rust

The Secret Handshake (9/10) There are non-written rules that the people at the top of each organization all follow and obey, and if you want to join that circle, you need to learn those rules. So true.
| by K Reardon

Talking from 9 to 5 (9/10) The only reason why it's not a 10 is because Tannen writes more for academics than for the general public. I loved it, but if you're looking for practical advice, it might not be for you.
|by D Tannen

Secrets to Winning at Office Politics (9/10) A very good book on power dynamics and how to navigate and leverage office politics
| by M McIntyre

Find Your Dream Job (9/10) This course didn't market itself as groundbreaking for the world of job seeking, but it did market itself as revolutionary for the lives of the people who join. And, I believe that this course is capable of creating career reinvention, growth, and everything in between.

6.5. Career & Business (For Women)

The Myth of The Nice Girl (10/10): Hauser built her successful career being a helpful and value-adding woman, so she (righteously) took offense to the many books that lambast the "nice" girl. And she took it upon herself to correct the false myth that women ought to be ruthless to succeed.
| by F Hauser

Hardball for Women (10/10) Albeit targeted at women, I have learned a lot about gender differences at work, workplace power dynamics, and career strategies. Just make sure you don't swing too much on the "male & aggressive" side.
| by P Heim

How Women Rise (9/10) More balanced than "Hardball for Women", and equally insightful. One point less because it's less incisive when it comes to power dynamics.
| by Goldsmith & Helgesen

Nice Girls Don't Get the Corner Office (8/10) It's a list of 101 mistakes women do, but albeit it might seem a simplistic format, the content is top-notch, and the author has a good grasp of interpersonal power dynamics. Note: I downrated it after having read "Hardball for Women", since there is much overlap.
|by L Frankel

- Best business & career books for women

6.6. Money & Wealth

MONEY Master the Game (10/10) The best resource on investing for the layman, skip all the rest from Tony Robbins.
| by T Robbins

The Intelligent Investor (9/10) Buffet's favorite book. It's old but the principles are the same that most other books just repeat
| by B Graham

The Little Book of Common Sense Investing (8/10) Simple and effective
| by John C. Bogle

Skip These

Generally speaking, we only recommend basic personal finance to those who haven't yet realized that spending more than you earn on a constant basis will put you in dire financial straits.

So albeit these titles are good for basic finance, they're not really for financial thriving and abundance:

The Total Money Makeover (6.5/10) Good for basic personal finance, skip if you don't need someone to tell you that spending more than you earn is a bad idea.
| by Dave Ramsey

I Will Teach You to be Rich by Ramit Sethi (6/10) Save and automate investment. OK but nothing groundbreaking.
| by Ramit Sethi

The Science of Getting Rich (2/10) The title is a misnomer because the law of attraction is not science
| by W Wattles

6.7. Networking

Decision-Maker Meetings (9.5/10) This course is geared toward filmmakers and actors. So, if you're not in the entertainment industry, you might not get as much value from it. With that said, if you are in the entertainment industry, this course is absolutely one of the best there is if you're looking to connect with influential decision-makers.
Review by Ali Scarlett
| by Mara McCann & Justin Giddings

7. Leadership Reviews

The New Psychology of Leadership (10/10) The only leadership book I've read to actually leverage science and research. And it shows. It stands in a category of its own and makes all other books look like simplistic space-fillers (and I based on this book much of our article "how to be a leader")
| by A Haslam

Leadership BS (10/10) A scathing and much-needed criticism of the leadership industry and its lies and naivete.
| by Jeffrey Pfeffer

Jocko Willink podcast (9/10) From what I could gather, it seems like a great mix of high-quality leadership with the much-needed political and power awareness that is fundamental to do well and make things happen within any organization.
The only downside is that it's imbued with the small-pond values, ideals, and narrow-mindedness typical of military indoctrination.
| by Jocko Willink

Radical Candor (9/10) It focuses on leadership in the workplace, but the principles apply to anyone who wants to lead high-performing groups. Just be aware that this is not how most organizations and leaders function, but mor elike an ideal to move towards
| by Kim Scott

21 Irrefutable Laws of Leadership (8/10) My favorite book by John Maxwell. Biggest takeaway: refuse to work for people you don't respect. They can't be your leaders. And if you want to lead: gain people's trust and respect.
| by John Maxwell

Leaders Eat Last (8/10) Leadership is not about being responsible for the numbers. It's about being responsible for the people, who are responsible for the numbers.
Nice in theory. Except sometimes you are also directly responsible for the numbers. I don't think Sinek has ever been a business leader in his life, so his advice can smack "ivory tower-ish"
| by Simon Sinek

Skip These

Extreme Ownership (6/10) It's very popular for navy seals to write books and people love a good war story. The concept of extreme ownership (ie.: take responsibility for everything) is powerful albeit, in my opinion, is inherently false to believe you can control everything, and it comes with important limitations. The book per se, I wasn't a fan of the, militarism, jingoism, and fluff.
Plus, I'm not a fan of the mindset of following orders from above no matter what.
Those who took "extreme ownership" and "followed (any) order" are not the best role models in my opinion.
| by Willink & Babin

- Best leadership resources

8. Psychology / Social Psychology / Sociology

The Social Animal (10/10) The most complete, extensive and high-quality overview of (social) psychology I have read so far.
| by E Aronson

I'm OK – You're OK (10/10) If you have or if you know anyone who has issues with authorities, this book can help (hint: it can be a parent-child dynamic). It certainly did help me to better understand social dynamics, to troubleshoot some of my relationships and to further improve my social skills.
| by T Harris

Studies in Machiavellianism (10/10) It's an academic text presenting various hypotheses, testing those hypotheses empirically, and then drawing conclusions about the Machiavellian personality based on the evidence.
So it's not a "how to" or a self-development book, but it's invaluable for a website like this.
The authors of this book are also the researchers who came up and validated "Machiavellianism" as a personality trait.
| by Richard Christie & Florence L. Geis

Will I Ever Be Good Enough? (10/10) Even if you didn't have a narcissistic mother you will learn hugely on how parents impact children's psyche. Including how demand and expectations of parents can weigh negatively on the children's whole life.
It should be mandatory reading for parents.
| by K McBride

In Sheep's Clothing (10/10) All psychologists should read this.
|by G Simon

Evil: Inside Human Violence and Cruelty (10/10) If you want to understand the dark side of human nature, look no further.
|by R Baumeister

Attached (10/10) Possibly the best book on relationships and attachment's psychology.
| by Amir Levine

The Body Keeps the Score (10/10) If you're interested in trauma, PTSD and trauma recovery, this is your resource.
| by B van der Kolk

The Laws of Human Nature (10/10) It's debatable if one single book is enough to detail human nature, but if there is one author who is going to make it both entertaining, deep and chock-full of wisdom, that's Mr. Greene.
| by R Greene

Mindset (10/10) Must read, both for personal self-development and for understanding people and psychology.
| by C Dweck

Man's Search for Meaning (10/10) Albeit not strictly a psychology book, Frankl tells you all you need to know about humans: the same species that built gas chambers, walked upright into gas chambers and gave their last morsel of bread to a dying comrade.
| by V Frankl

Machiavellianism: The Psychology of Manipulation (9.5/10) As of 2021, the best overview of all academic research and literature on Machiavellianism.
| by Tamás Bereczkei

I Hate You Don't Leave Me (9/10) Best book to understand and deal with BPD
| J Kreisman

Give and Take (9/10) I hope it can be a wake-up call for psychologists to come up with a construct and universal measure for "givers" and "takers". That universal measure non-withstanding, this is the best overview on the psychology, personality, and mindsets of givers and takers
| by Adam Grant

The Lucifer Effect (9/10) Long and too detailed. But the key message can change us -and the world- for the better: to resist the perpetuation of evil, we must empower ourselves.
| by P Zimbardo

Nudge (9/10) The Bible of Libertarian Paternalism and how psychology can help policymakers and governments develop better societies.
Any psychologist and social scientist should read it.
|by Sunstein & Thaler

Talking from 9 to 5 (9/10) Tannen is a professor of linguistics, but this book is deeply insightful on both psychology, power dynamics, and social dynamics.
|by D Tannen

The Highly Sensitive Person (9/10) For anyone interested in psychology, learning about highly sensitive people is a must.
|E Aron

Drive (9/10) Daniel Pink is the more scientific version of Malcolm Gladwell. He has a knack for turning research into simple and applicable concepts that business owners and influencers alike can use in their daily lives. And he does a great job here focusing exclusively on intrinsic and extrinsic motivation.
| by D Pink

Predictably Irrational (9/10) Yes, our mind is irrational, we know that, but Ariely gives us practical examples and applicable corollaries.
| by D Ariely

The Paradox of Choice (9/10) I have a personal soft spot for The Paradox of Choice because it helped improve my level of happiness and fulfillment. If you tend to spend lots of time choosing what to buy and if you regret your decisions, you must read this book.
| by B Schwartz

Quiet: The Power of Introverts (9/10) Don't skip it thinking you already know what's introversion/extraversion is. If you are into psychology this is a muster read.
| by S Cain

The Sociopath Next Door (9/10) Not everything is relative: there really are mean and evil people. And there are enough of them that you will eventually meet a few. Be ready.
| by M Stout

Why Does He Do That? (9/10) A seminal book on the psychology of abusive men.
| by L Bancroft

Misbehaving (9/10) If you want to understand the history of behavioral economics, look no further. If you want to understand behavioral economics in general, look no further. And it's also great to understand how new theories emerge (and the human drives to power they need to overcome).
|by R Thaler

To Sell Is Human (8/10) A scientific and psychological look at selling and persuading. A bit of a mixed bag as it doesn't focus on anything specific, but it has plenty of good insights (and I personally learned a couple of important new things).

|D Pink

Brandwashed (8/10) One of the best books to understand the manipulations of marketing. Must read for any marketer.
| M Lindstrom

The Wiley-Blackwell Handbook of the Psychology of Leadership, Change, & Organizational Development (8/10) The title is an omen for what's inside: a dense, heavy review of the research literature on leadership, change, and OD. Not recommended for non-academics, but for a website like this one, it's a treasure trove.
| by Various Authors

Incognito (8/10) Not only we are governed in large part by our subconscious, but our brain has also different "camps", all pulling us in different directions. That makes a lot of sense when you think about it…
| by D Eagleman

The Undoing Project (8/10) The history of Tversky and Kahneman's friendship, the two men who the most contributed to the birth of behavioral economics.
Don't worry, it's not just biography: lots of great psychology as well.
|by M Lewis

Stop Walking on Eggshells (8/10) If you want to learn about borderline personality disorder, this is your book. If you're living with, or have a relationship with people who threaten suicide or go on an emotional roller coaster, read this book.
| by Mason & Kreger

Thinking Fast and Slow (8/10) We have two ways of thinking: slow and logical and quick and illogical. We use the latter most of the times, and it's full of psychological biases. And Kahneman lists them all.
Good stuff.
| by D Kahneman

The Psychopath Inside (7/10) If you want to understand psychopathy from a neurological point of view, this is one of the best books available.
| by J Fallon

The Female Mind (7/10) Maybe it stressed the differences a bit too much, but overall it's a very good text to understanding the overall differences between genders.
| by L Brizendine

The Hope Circuit (6/10) One of the best books for psychology students and researchers to understand what really goes on in academia. An average book to learn psychology since it's too heavily diluted with Seligman's life details
| by Martin Seligman

Skip These

Malcolm Gladwell (4/10): great for edutainment, but not for education and learning.

Understanding Human Nature (5/10) Alfred Adler is very Freudian, and in many ways so. He has great intuitions and is a great mind in the service of psychology, but e also proceeds with little science and evidence. I had big expectations for my first Alfred Adler's book, and I found several golden nuggets. But, overall, the lack of science weighs it down.
| by Alfred Adler

8.2. Evolutionary Psychology

Evolutionary Psychology (10/10) Simply THE manual of evolutionary psychology, good for both students and laymen alike. It leaves out a few important aspects of sexual selection, but the next book takes care of that.
| by D Buss

The Mating Mind (10/10) It fleshes out Miller's theory of intelligence through sexual selection. You might agree or disagree with that -I agree-, but even beyond that central theory, if you truly want to understand evolutionary psychology, this is your book.
| by G Miller

The Evolution of Desire (10/10) One of the most scientifically sound analyses of the sexual marketplace.
| by D Buss

Behave (9/10) A long but great overview of people and psychology. The only thing missing for a 10/10 is that Sapolsky has strong political views which tinge his work with some of the typical leftist-leaning biases
| by R Sapolsky

The Moral Animal (9/10) The first time I read this book I was in awe at how everything was finally becoming clear. It's a bit old and there is been a lot of new research, and that's why not 10/10. But all the major tenets of the books have not changed since then.
| by R Wright

The Selfish Gene (8.5/10) A seminal book that spread the ideas of Williams and Hamilton, replacing group selection with the gene-centered view of selection. Make sure to get the latest version of the books where Dawkins said that humans are also altruistic, or you might get the wrong idea of human nature.
| by R Dawkins

The Origins of Virtue (8.5/10) The best analysis of how we developed altruism and caring. Too bad it lacks two crucial tools for the development of altruism: a review of kin altruism, and the impact of sexual selection
| by M Ridley

Virtue Signaling (8/10) A series of insightful papers and articles on the phenomenon of "virtue signaling", seen from the point of view of sexual strategy and mate choice.
| by Geoffrey Miller

The Blank Slate (7/10) A book fully dedicated to some of the biggest enemies of evolutionary psychology: feminists, left-wing ideologues, and cultural determinists.
I think we need to stand against ideologies, but sometimes I feel that Pinker becomes a bit of an ideologist himself and, at times, he denies the influences of culture a bit too strongly.
| by Steven Pinker

Skip These

Sperm Wars (3/10) Some good points, but imprecise and unscientific.
| by R Baker

Sex At Dawn (2/10) The authors describe what they wish were true (ie.: hippy sex), instead of what is true (somewhat nastier reality). I actually enjoyed it, but I can't give any higher ratings to what's driven by ideology instead of truth.
| by C Ryan, C Jetha

- Best evolutionary psychology books

8.3. Positive Psychology

How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable About Anything: Yes, Anything (10/10): Albert Ellis teaches how to use REBT, a form of cognitive-behavioral therapy, to improve how to think and, as a reflection, how to live and enjoy life.
Ellis is one of my favorite authors, and this is one of my favorite books. It had a major positive impact on my life, personal development, and contentedness -as well as my ability to help others-.
| by Albert Ellis

Learned Optimism (10/10) One of the first positive psychology books, and it's a classic. And still one of the best positive psychology books you can find. It teaches how positive psychology developed, and provides the best overview on how positive psychology can help you combat depression (and become more of an optimist)
|by M Seligman

Authentic Happiness (10/10) What's a truly fulfilling life? It's a life that includes al the types of pleasures, from the more physical ones, to the higher ones. And it's this optimal mix that Seligman teaches readers how to achieve
|by M Seligman

How to Keep People from Pushing Your Buttons (9.5/10) Albert Ellis again, this time teaching people how to use REBT to become more socially grounded. It would be another 10, but his other book was just SO good that he set his own bar too high.
| by Albert Ellis

The Happiness Advantage (9/10) The central thesis: first comes happiness, then success. Plus, lots of tips and advice on how to become happier.
| by S Achor

9. Self-Development

How to Keep People from Pushing Your Buttons (10/10) Ellis, an actual psychologist, teaches well-proven cognitive-behavioral therapy to become more mentally resilient and grounded.
| by Albert Ellis

Simple Habits (10/10) It combines all of the best information from habit development resources and packages it alongside a workbook that walks you through the entire process step by step. Couple that with the high-quality community he shares access to, and you have a perfect package.
Review by Ali
| by Matt D'Avella

I'm OK – You're OK (10/10) It helped me troubleshoot some of my relationships and further improve my social skills. Can also help you fix issues with authority figures and, if you are still dependent on your parents' approval, help fix those issues with your parents.
|by T Harris

The Laws of Human Nature (10/10) Greene mixes psychology, social skills and self-help. And albeit the focus is not self-help, the depth of wisdom and psychological vision that Greene masters in his work put it at the top of the pile.
| by R Greene

Essentialism (10/10) Another book with a single, simple concept. Focus on less to do more and better. So simple, yet so life-changing and revolutionary.

| by G McKeown

Personal Power II (10/10) Except for the lack of structure and the law of attraction, this is one of the best self-development audio programs. In my opinion, people only need two programs on self-help. This is one of them.
| by T Robbins

The Happiness Advantage (9/10) Self-help book the way I like them: empowering, full of applicable wisdom and backed by ample research. In a nutshell: you don't chase success to be happy. You should rather work on being happier and that will help you achieve success. Great great stuff!
| by S Achor

Peak (9/10) The best book on what the author says is a new branch in psychology which he calls "the science of expertise"
|by A Ericsson

Principles: Life and Work (9/10) "build your own reality" and law of attraction thinking are popular in the self help. Here is it is a billionaire instead who built his fortune on uncertainty and hyper-realism. Let's take a leaf out of his book.
| by R Dalio

The Six Pillars of Self-Esteem (9/10) The best overview I've read on self-esteem. But there are also some important notes and possible cons. For example, the author says that "values" and "living by one's own values" are a pillar of self-esteem. TPM instead believes in more fluid values, as well as in self-esteem that is independent of cast-in-stone values.
| by Nathaniel Branden

Give and Take (9/10) Givers win at life, but only if they learn how to be more strategic and how not to be taken advantage of by takers. Wonderful book and very well researched.
The only thing preventing it from a 10/10 under this "self-development" section is that it's not a how-to book (for that, there is Power University)
| by Adam Grant

Tom Bilyeu (9/10): Great guy, phenomenal motivational speaker, and good to learn some important mindsets. Naive and sometimes power-unaware with his guests (see for example his interview with Sadguru). Often fails the "law of balance", for example with drive, "growth mindset" and "open-mindedness". Tom sometimes spread BS fed to him by various charlatans.
However, given his moral standings and his pedigree, he's still one of the best self-development gurus around -just stick to him talking, skip most of his interviews-.

The One Thing (8.5/10) Not too dissimilar from Essentialism, but adds enough more wisdom to make it worth your time (ie.: visualize the process instead of the final goal). Can be summarized as a blog article.
| by Keller & Papasan

The War of Art (8.5/10) Let dreams guide you, but focus on the process. Day in, day out.
That's it. The "secret" to making your dreams come true. Doesn't even need the whole book, to be honest. But it's still wonderfully written.
Skip the third part with divine and woo-woo theories and the rest is golden (but if you're a woo-woo artist you'll probably love the third part too)
| by S Pressfield

The Confidence Code (8.5/10) Albeit it's aimed at women, anyone will learn a lot about confidence, what it's useful for, and a few tips on developing your confidence
| by Shipman & Kay

Awaken the Giant Within (8.5/10) A summary of most of Robbins' teachings in a single book. Great stuff.
| by T Robbins

Deep Work (8/10) Similar to The Talent Code in some ways, but with a broader appeal: it's not mostly for athletes but also for writers, researchers and any type of office worker.
| by C Newport

Meditations (8/10) It's funny how the top people are pretty much the same wherever or whenever you are. A book of 2.000 years ago condenses 60% of modern self-help literature.
| by M Aurelius

The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People (8/10) Huge classic. A bit of a mixed bag going from communication to mindset, but they are all fundamentals of self-development.
| by S Covey

The Little Book of Stoicism (8/10) If you're looking for an overview on stoicism, look no further. Brief and packed with actionable and life-changing advice.
|by J Salzbeger

Already Free (8.5/10) one of the best books on "acceptance" from Eastern philosophical traditions as it combines with the more pragmatic and hands on Western tradition of psychoanalys
| by Bruce Tift

Don't Sweat The Small Stuff… And It's All Small Stuff (8/10) the title itself is a pearl of wisdom.
| by R Carlson

Ultralearning (8/10) To me, it's not just about the steps that Scott lays out, since those can change depending on the field and the situation, but it's the mindset and belief that learning faster than most anyone think is possible is… Possible.
| by Scott Young

First Things First (7/10) A powerful reminder of giving priorities to what really matters to us in life instead of following what everyone else does or what society or parents deem as important for us. If you haven't done this type of introspection already, this is an absolute must.
| by S Covey

The Life-Changing Magic of Tidying Up (7/10) You might think it's inconsequential, but a tidier place, a leaner wardrobe and no clutter around the house will make you feel better.
| by M Kondo

Letting Go (7/10) The crazy thing about this book is that I actually love its main idea. And It's also been super useful for me.
At the same time, except for the super useful main concept, the author is also full of sh*t.
Yes, apparently great life-changing content and being full of sh*t are not mutually exclusive.
| by D Hawkins

Skip These

Mental Mastery (5/10) A few gems here and there, yet some were more effective in theory than in practice. Given the price of the course, one might expect more truly transformative material. It felt too much like it only scratched the surface.
Review by Ali Scarlett (but please note Ali left no rating, so the rating is Lucio's interpretation from Ali's review)
| by Ramit Sethi

The Way of The Superior Man (5/10) Some good life advice finding your life priority and prioritizing around it… All delivered in New-Agey format which you will either love or hate. I didn't like it.

|by D Deida

Brendon Burchard & High Performance Habits (5/10) Didn't hear anything new either from the author, nor from the book.
| by B Burchard

You Are a Badass (5/10) Good idea on the subconscious mind driving us. But all the rest is rehash, and average to poor quality self-development.
| by S Sincero

Andrew Tate (4/10) someone in the community said good thing about him and "pre-fame TAte" seemed to have more sensible and higher quality content. Overall, TPM doesn't seem to endorse or lend much credibility to the quality of his content though.

How to Rewire Your Brain (4/10) Noy bad by any means, it's just that you can find higher ROI products for self-development. And the switch from neurology to psychology makes psychology feel like a more practical use of one's time.
Review by Ali Scarlett
| by Gregory Caremans

The Seven Spiritual Laws Of Success (3/10) Unpalatable mix of spirituality and materialism. With the law of attraction as icing on the cake.
| by Deepak Chopra

Joe Dispenza , any work, including Becoming Supernatural (2/10) Too much unscientific claims presented as scientific and too much upsell ruin the otherwise good ideas that are present in Dispenza's work
| by J Dispenza

The Secret (0/10) Law of attraction, and to add insult to injury recommends you don't work hard at what you want or the universe will take it to mean that you don't really believe in it.
If life wasn't short, you could read it for laugh's sake. But just skip it.
| by R Byrne

9.2. Manosphere / Men's Self-development

King, Warrior, Magician, Lover (10/10) Normally, this wouldn't be my favorite type of book since it's lighter in evidence and heavier in "myth" and theological examples, BUT… I was surprised at actually how good and deep it is. Great both to understand human nature, as well as an actual self-development book. The only con is that it might be a bit complex, but it's worth spending some more time on.
| by Moore and Gillette

The Mask of Masculinity (8/10) The different types of masks that men wear in society to look stronger, cooler, smarter and… Generally trying hard to look better than they are (also see "alpha male posturing").
| by L Howes

Stealing the Corner Office (8/10) A red-pill, potentially eye-opening view of workplace dynamics.
|by B Reid

Rollo Tomassi (7/10) On the con side, Lucio frankly finds him mysoginistyc and biased and, if not mysoginistic, at least overly confrontational. That's not a good attitude to interanlize to either date or seduce, and even less so to enter nito relationships. On the plus side, some of his analyses are good, some were even unique and great and brought new concepts into the male self-development space.
His first book was a bit basic for more advanced audiences, and The Rational Male – Preventive Medicine might be the best from Tomassi's trilogy.

Practical Female Psychology (7/10) Some great ideas here. I couldn't get over some made-up psychology and evolutionary psychology though and, for me, all those mistakes polluted the otherwise great ideas.

|by Various Authors

12 Rules For Life (6/10) Awesome first chapter, but loses the plot and becomes a caricature of Jordan Peterson. Aesthetics are a nice touch to a good book, but at times it felt Peterson's prose built so much upon itself that aesthetics became the message instead of supporting the message.
| by J Peterson

Masculine Behavioral Therapy (6/10) Ali has positive things to say about the author. The course itself raises some question marks, including the community and what customers can learn (or not learn) from it.
Note: the rating is Lucio's own guestimate based on an initial impression from Ali Scarlett. Ali preferred not to give a review. Lucio assigned a placeholder rating because Ali's first impression, however partial, is better than nothing for someone looking for pre-purchase information.
| by Casey Zander

The Rational Male (6/10) Some great foundational concepts, but when it goes deeper, it's a bit too one-sided to provide a scientific, or even simply just neutral analysis. The sexual market value analysis is mostly based around age, which is somewhat limiting.
| by R Tomassi

The Manipulated Man (6/10) "Women are leechers", could be this book's supreme summary.
I think Vilar misses out on the fact that reproduction puts most of the strain on women, so it's only normal that they work somewhat less than men do (yeah, that too, she generalizes a lot). She also misses on more basic biology and evolutionary psychology, but it's an interesting -and very controversial- take.
| by E Vilar

Skip These

The Way of The Superior Man (4/10) It's popular and well-acclaimed, but it didn't speak to me. Cloaking sexual dominance with spiritualism helped the book's popularity, but it didn't make the message clear or precise.
The sweeping generalizations and poor psychology and relationship advice also didn't help.
| by D Deida

The Rational Male – Positive Masculinity (3/10) Of Tomassi's three books, this was the most rant-like and sectarian, more about "joining the gang" than on actual content. On the positive side, great advice on vetting her based on her past (and I agree on the ridiculousness of the media framing the "first time a woman did X.." as if it were a win for all women)
| by R Tomassi

- Best red pill books

9.2.3. Red Pill

The red pill is largely a male-only self-development movement, but we will use "red pill" in its larger sense here, including anything that can be "awakening" to a widely-held, but potentially wrong worldview.

Anatomy of the State (8/10) The government is coercive and predatory. That's the main idea, and I don't necessarily fully agree. But Rothbard presents in a way as such that it makes at least some sense, and it can definitely be a red pill awakening to how things really are / work.
| by Murray Rothbard

9.3. Women Empowerment

Power University (10/10) The most practical course to combine success, empowerment, and femininity
| by L Buffalmano

How Women Rise (9/10) A great overview of the issues standing in the way of women "rising", and how to address them
| by Goldsmith & Helgesen

The Confidence Code (9/10) Women have one more stumbling block compared to men: confidence. This book helps women address the confidence issue.
| by Shipman & Kay

Hardball for Women (9/10) Great book to understand the power dynamics of the workplace.
| by P Heim

Nice Girls Don't Get the Corner Office (8/10) Great wisdom on workplace power dynamics, especially good for women.
|by L Frankel

The Shadow Negotiation (8/10) If you want to learn negotiations, there are many examples here, including some good ones on frame control
| by D Kolb

Lean In (7/10) An important book for women who plan on having a successful career. Just make sure you skip the feminist bias and the calls on joining forces (which would be deemed "toxic masculinity" if written by a man for men)
| by S Sandberg

#Girlboss (7/10) It's good for more rebel types of women.
| by S Amoruso

Skip These

Girl Wash Your Face (3/10) A bit too much "feel-good" type of self-help in my opinion. You can get better wisdom with your time
| by R Hollis

Get Rich Lucky Bitch: (0/10) Content-less and potentially harmful. You need to spend your efforts on action and actual strategies, not on the law of attraction.
|by D Duffield-Thomas

9.3.2. Feminism

The Feminine Mystique (5/10) An historical landmark and a wake-up call for men who thought all women were the happiest staying at home as housewives. Light on data, but a good eye for catching human sentiment. Times changed though and you're not going to learn nearly as much today.
|by B Friedan

Men Explain Things to Me (5/10) lacks any real depth and there is no practical wisdom
|by R Solnit

We Should All Be Feminists (2/10) No, we should all research our topics better so we don't spread shallow and false information. It also doesn't empower women at all. It just provides some feel-good support that ultimately weakens women.
|by C Adichie

9.4. Critical Thinking

> "The reason that 'guru' is such a popular word is that 'charlatan' is so hard to spell."

> – William Bernstein

YouTube Channels

- Medlife Crisis (science and health), also good to understand the scientific method, human biases, and how to draw logical conclusions
- Coffeezilla, good for those who tend to over-trust a bit too easily
- Biolayne (nutrition), especially his "myth-busting" series
- Charlie and Ben Podcast (9/10): at times naively open-minded in a way that only college-educated white urban millennia can be, but otherwise great
  |by Charlie Houpert and ben Altman

The Black Swan (10/10) One of Taleb's best works.
| by N Taleb

How to Lie with Statistics (10/10) A great primer on how statistics can be willfully abused to sway us (and will also increase your critical thinking to understand how data can lead us astray)
| by D Huff

Fooled by Randomness (10/10) Great book on the human tendency to see trends and seek order where there is only randomness and chaos. I can't count how many times I have referenced this book while reviewing other resources.
| by N Taleb

Behave (10/10) Behave's taglines, "it depends" and "it's complicated" should form part of the "critical thinking manifesto". Do yourself a favor and get this one in audio format, because it's long, but it's great.
| by R Sapolsky

Enlightenment Now (9.5/10) The manifesto of humanism, reason, and science. Helpful to think critically about the news and behind "what people say". You know, like looking at the data behind the noise.
The only reason why it's not a 10/10 is that Pinker, reminiscent of his "Better Angels of Our Nature", seems naively overly optimistic.
| by Steven Pinker

The Believing Brain (9/10) Have you ever wondered why people seem to believe in irrational things for which they have little or no proof? Michael Shermer delivers a beautiful and credible answer (and a wonderful treaty on scientific skepticism)
|by M Shermer

The Millionaire Fastlane (9/10) It will help readers to think more critically, and be less trustworthy, of any "get rich" author
| by MJ DeMarco

The Blank Slate (9/10) Are we mostly nature or nurture?
And why is it so difficult in our current cultural climate to admit that yes, genes do matter? Those are the question that a critical thinker will power. And that's what Steven Pinker addresses here, demolishing the politically biased leftist ideology.
| by Steven Pinker

The Signal and The Noise (9/10) Possibly the best books on statistics, forecasting and common human errors that is easily accessible to the large public.
| by N Silver

Lucio's Top Books & Resources on Power, Psychology, & Strategy

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

These are the top resources that Lucio Buffalmano — founder of The Power Moves and creator of Power University — has personally studied. Each entry has been analyzed and filtered through the lens of power dynamics, social strategy, and scientific psychology.

We continuously update these lists to include the best books, courses, and resources across critical areas like social skills, influence, dating, and leadership. Some of these knowledge sources underpin TPM's methodology and programs.

Top TPM Resources

At TPM, we view resources as bricks to a castle: individual components that form a functional "suprastructure" when integrated.

Because our methodology relies on synthesizing vast amounts of research into actionable strategies, naming only a few titles would be reductive and misleading.

However, if forced to identify the main pillars for TPM and mention a single great resource associated with it, they would be these:

Foundational Resources	TPM System Integration
Social Exchange Theory (Thibaut & Kelley, 1959; Blau, 1964)	Strategies for succeeding in a social world driven by self-interested exchanges
Game Theory (Axelrod, 1984)	Strategies to maximize the gains of cooperation while managing defection risks in alliances and relationships (i.e., "smart cooperation")
Evolutionary Psychology (Buss, and others)	Strategies for social and mating success grounded in evolved psychological mechanisms
Academic Handbooks (various on Psychology/Sociology)	Strategies for successful leadership, social status attainment, managing Dark Triad traits, and broader life success and achievement

Each pillar expands into multiple TPM-derived models and applications across the site.

We're also developing our own foundational resources on less-covered topics related to power intelligence, positive Machiavellianism, and strategic thinking.
In the meantime, Power University serves as the unified framework that integrates these disparate academic pillars, plus our own contributions, into a cohesive system for real-world outcomes.

Power University: Shortcut For Ambitious Men

We turned the insights from these thousands of resources into practical strategies and techniques to acquire social status, people's respect, and women's devotion.

1. Power (Best of)

This list took me so long to prepare.

Weeks of whittling down books and deciding which one was most instructive when it comes to power and (social) power dynamics.

In the end, after two days of thinking, writing, editing and changing, I finally came up with this list:

- 30 Best Books on Power

2. Social Skills (Best Of)

Social skills are one of those skills that are not easy to learn from books.

Yet, thinking that you can skip the theory to only focus on the practice is a bad approach.

Because theory, or at least good theory, can shave off years from your learning curve. Here is the list from someone who's read (and listened/watched) to many of them:

- Best Social Skills Books
- Best social skills courses
- Best advanced social skills books

2.2. Communication Skills

This list of best communication skills books focuses on verbal communication.

It ranges from conflict resolution to de-escalation to overcoming passive-aggressive communication.

What makes some of the books in this list some of the very best books to read -ever- is the many examples they provide.
Pick even just two of them and watch yourself take a quantum leap in your communication skills:

- Best Communication Skills Books

2.3. Assertiveness (Best of)

Assertiveness is one of the major four styles of communication.

Some consider assertiveness a meta-skill, such as a skill that magnifies or enables other skills.
In large part, agree with that.
Assertiveness precedes social power. And by enabling honest communication, it's also a precondition for human connection, bond, and intimacy.
By allowing people to ask for what they want and need, assertiveness is also a fundamental skill for personal success. And by extending basic human respect, it also allows for long-term win-win relationships.

Are you sold now on assertiveness? :)

OK, good, so these are the best resources on assertiveness:

2.4. Body Language (Best of)

There are some great books on body language.

But it's hard to learn body language just from books.
So the top positions on this list are documentaries, courses, and pictorial books:

- Best Books on Body Language

2.5. Frame Control

Frame control is an important aspect of advanced social skills and social power dynamics.

There aren't that many great resources on this important topic, and barely any resource focuses on frame control. But these are the resources where I found some great tidbits on frame control:

- Best frame control resources

3. Dating & Seduction (Best of)

There are many ways why dating and seduction matter in life:

1. It allows you to meet more and higher quality people
2. It allows you to enjoy more sex
3. It allows you to enjoy romance

And, ultimately, and perhaps more meaningfully:

- It helps you to develop a relationship with someone you vibe with

3.2. Dating for Guys (Best Of)

I called it "best dating books for guys", but in reality, many of the best entries are video products.

It couldn't be otherwise.
Many of the sought-after traits in the sexual marketplace are communicated without words and with attitudes, tonality, and body language.

So video examples are needed here.

- Best dating resources for guys

P.S.:
Best Dating Books for Women

3.4. Relationships (Best of)

Contrary to dating, there seems to be more consensus about what works in relationships.

- Best Relationship Books

P.S.:
Remember, these are mostly for “normal” and egalitarian relationships.
It doesn’t mean we’d advise any high-value man to do the same. And it doesn’t mean you can’t find other arrangements that work better for you.

4. Influence & Persuasion (Best of)

You can’t do much in life without others.

And what you can do through others via sheer force or coercion is very limited.
Especially in this (blessed) day and age of freedom, democracy, and general opulence (which decreases people’s dependency on others).

Hence, much of life’s success and effectiveness hinges on how well you can persuade others to join you, work with you, support you, or follow you.

These books will help you influence and persuade people.

- The Best Books on Persuasion

4.2. Best Books on Negotiation

Negotiation is persuasion applied to deal-making.

Negotiations are going to be some of the most lucrative -or costly- hours of your life.

Better be prepared with a couple of good books.

- Best Negotiation Books

5. Manipulation (Best of)

Does manipulation deserve its own category?

Probably manipulation, dark psychology, and any Machiavellian strategies to take advantage of others wouldn't deserve their own category.

It could either be part of "advanced social skills", or a subset of influence and persuasion.

But there is a reason why I do still give it its own category.
There is so little information around about this important area of self-development and self-empowerment, that we need all the good resources we can muster.

Hence, its own category.

Influence VS Manipulation

Influence and manipulation can overlap.

Author Robert Greene says that the two are the same.
While some other authors of influential books on manipulation differentiate between the two.

A third approach is that not only we can differentiate but we must differentiate.
And like George Simon observes, not differentiating equates to making excuses for bullies, abusers, and the generally value-taking folks of this world.
And it's also important for self-development: anyone who wants to be a force for good in this world, it's important to understand where the difference lies.

In brief, I differentiate the two in this way: manipulation is win-lose, abusive, or victimizing others.
While persuasion is either win-win, or grey area with only limited loss.

Don't count on people to only limit themselves to persuasion, though.

Instead, it's better to arm yourself with knowledge on how to defend against manipulation.

- Best Books on Manipulation

5.2. Best Dark Triad Books

Power and the quest for power are correlated with dark triad traits.

These books will help you better understand the traits of narcissism, psychopathy, and Machiavellianism:

- Best books on narcissism
- Best Dark Triad Books

6. Career & Business

Let's differentiate:

6.2. Career (Best of)

To make a good career, you need political savvy.

And these books will help you with that:

- Best career books

6.3. Entrepreneurship (Best of)

Learning entrepreneurship from books is not easy.

But learning by doing only can be extremely costly.

Both in the mistakes we do and in the opportunities we miss (God knows how much quicker I could have grown this website with some well-timed advice).
But I have also grown this website much quicker thanks to some great advice I learned from books and other entrepreneurs.

The books in this list help you mostly with the mindsets.

- Best Entrepreneurship Books

7. Leadership (Best of)

This is how TPM sees it:

Leadership is the natural consequence of effective self-development.

Trying to skip to leadership without everything else makes for a poor leader.

Luckily, once you have the good foundations we teach here, then you can also work on your leadership skills.

Leadership is a skill like any other. And like any other skill, the way to improve at it is with both practice and theory.

These books will take care of the later:

- Best Leadership Books

8. Psychology (Best of)

Would you like to understand people and human behavior?

Follow this reading list of best psychology books and you will get to the top 1% when it comes to people's knowledge.

- Best Psychology Books (to understand people)

8.2. Evolutionary Psychology

David Buss says that evolutionary psychology should be the unifying framework for all the different psychology branches and specializations.

And I couldn't agree.

To get, at the same time, an overview and a deeper understanding of the human mind, you absolutely cannot do without evolutionary psychology.

And these are the best books to get you started:

- Best evolutionary psychology books

8.3. Positive Psychology

Positive psychology is self-development, with good science.

For those who can't stand the empty mantra of some self-help gurus, positive psychologists came to the rescue. We combined all the insights into Confidence University:

- Confidence University for practical tactics from Positive Psychology

9. Red Pill

"Red Pill", a concept from the movie "The Matrix", could be described as:

> Eye-opening information that replaces hold myths with new and more realistic information, including informtaionthat may be discomfroting and painful at first

The red pill has become popular with the manosphere, where it applies to a movement of information on masculinity that is (supposedly) based on reality, and against political correctness.
Most of the focus in red pill manosphere is intersexual dynamics.

In this list of best red pill resources, I pay homage to both approaches and include anything that is truly eye-opening, while mostly focusing on intersexual dynamics.

Check it out for yourself:

- Best Red Pill Books

10. General Self-Development

There are so many good books to read in the self-category that picking the best books to read was a really difficult task.

So difficult indeed that it was painful to leave many great titles out.
But in the end, this is how you should prioritize your self-help reading list:

- 10 Best Self-Help Books

And outside of our main expertise, check:

- Best Nutrition Books (for the critical analysis and spotting quacks)
- Best Personal Finance Books (alumni only)

Books to Avoid

Your time is the most valuable resource you have.

And reading is not always and necessarily the best use of your time.

Reading bad books certainly is not a great use of your time.

- Worst Books of All Time

Most Overrated Books

Best Books VS Most Popular

You will find many hidden gems in our gems.

We believe it's one of our main added value.

Many "best book lists" online are random lists of popular books.
Some of them are compiled without even reading those books.
And a few even shamelessly copy our lists.

But I found that there is little connection between popularity and quality.

So we're happy to provide a platform to showcase quality information including lesser-known books and resources.

Best Resources On Optimal Learning

To optimize your learning:

- Naive self-help: Most self-help is misleading out of naivete, virtue signaling, or just plain ignorance. Learn how to spot it and fix it.
- Law of optimum balance. The misconception that "more equals to better or more effective" is rampant in modern guru-culture. This article shows it's seldom the case.
- Glass ceilings. Or "why 99% of self-help leads to plateaus". This is a meta-review on general learning to reach the pinnacle.
- 3 pillars of mastery. Great teachers have experience, scientific knowledge, and are smart thinkers. This article helps you assess the authors' expertise.
- Why I stopped reading mainstream books. In brief, because they're optimized for selling more than instructing. They're often written by non-experts, while targeting average readers.
- Power University. The quickest yet most comprehensive way to become a high-value winner

Lucio's Top Books & Resources on Power, Psychology, & Strategy

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

These are the top resources that Lucio Buffalmano — founder of The Power Moves and creator of Power University — has personally studied. Each entry has been analyzed and filtered through the lens of power dynamics, social strategy, and scientific psychology.

We continuously update these lists to include the best books, courses, and resources across critical areas like social skills, influence, dating, and leadership. Some of these knowledge sources underpin TPM's methodology and programs.

Top TPM Resources

At TPM, we view resources as bricks to a castle: individual components that form a functional "suprastructure" when integrated.

Because our methodology relies on synthesizing vast amounts of research into actionable strategies, naming only a few titles would be reductive and misleading.

However, if forced to identify the main pillars for TPM and mention a single great resource associated with it, they would be these:

Foundational Resources	TPM System Integration
Social Exchange Theory (Thibaut & Kelley, 1959; Blau, 1964)	Strategies for succeeding in a social world driven by self-interested exchanges
Game Theory (Axelrod, 1984)	Strategies to maximize the gains of cooperation while managing defection risks in alliances and relationships (i.e., "smart cooperation")
Evolutionary Psychology (Buss, and others)	Strategies for social and mating success grounded in evolved psychological mechanisms
Academic Handbooks (various on Psychology/Sociology)	Strategies for successful leadership, social status attainment, managing Dark Triad traits, and broader life success and achievement

Each pillar expands into multiple TPM-derived models and applications across the site.

We're also developing our own foundational resources on less-covered topics related to power intelligence, positive Machiavellianism, and strategic thinking.
In the meantime, Power University serves as the unified framework that integrates these disparate academic pillars, plus our own contributions, into a cohesive system for real-world outcomes.

Power University: Shortcut For Ambitious Men

We turned the insights from these thousands of resources into practical strategies and techniques to acquire social status, people's respect, and women's devotion.

1. Power (Best of)

This list took me so long to prepare.

Weeks of whittling down books and deciding which one was most instructive when it comes to power and (social) power dynamics.

In the end, after two days of thinking, writing, editing and changing, I finally came up with this list:

- 30 Best Books on Power

2. Social Skills (Best Of)

Social skills are one of those skills that are not easy to learn from books.

Yet, thinking that you can skip the theory to only focus on the practice is a bad approach.

Because theory, or at least good theory, can shave off years from your learning curve. Here is the list from someone who's read (and listened/watched) to many of them:

- Best Social Skills Books
- Best social skills courses
- Best advanced social skills books

2.2. Communication Skills

This list of best communication skills books focuses on verbal communication.

It ranges from conflict resolution to de-escalation to overcoming passive-aggressive communication.

What makes some of the books in this list some of the very best books to read -ever- is the many examples they provide.
Pick even just two of them and watch yourself take a quantum leap in your communication skills:

- Best Communication Skills Books

2.3. Assertiveness (Best of)

Assertiveness is one of the major four styles of communication.

Some consider assertiveness a meta-skill, such as a skill that magnifies or enables other skills.
In large part, agree with that.
Assertiveness precedes social power. And by enabling honest communication, it's also a precondition for human connection, bond, and intimacy.
By allowing people to ask for what they want and need, assertiveness is also a fundamental skill for personal success. And by extending basic human respect, it also allows for long-term win-win relationships.

Are you sold now on assertiveness? :)

OK, good, so these are the best resources on assertiveness:

2.4. Body Language (Best of)

There are some great books on body language.

But it's hard to learn body language just from books.
So the top positions on this list are documentaries, courses, and pictorial books:

- Best Books on Body Language

2.5. Frame Control

Frame control is an important aspect of advanced social skills and social power dynamics.

There aren't that many great resources on this important topic, and barely any resource focuses on frame control. But these are the resources where I found some great tidbits on frame control:

- Best frame control resources

3. Dating & Seduction (Best of)

There are many ways why dating and seduction matter in life:

1. It allows you to meet more and higher quality people
2. It allows you to enjoy more sex
3. It allows you to enjoy romance

And, ultimately, and perhaps more meaningfully:

- It helps you to develop a relationship with someone you vibe with

3.2. Dating for Guys (Best Of)

I called it "best dating books for guys", but in reality, many of the best entries are video products.

It couldn't be otherwise.
Many of the sought-after traits in the sexual marketplace are communicated without words and with attitudes, tonality, and body language.

So video examples are needed here.

- Best dating resources for guys

P.S.:
Best Dating Books for Women

3.4. Relationships (Best of)

Contrary to dating, there seems to be more consensus about what works in relationships.

- Best Relationship Books

P.S.:
Remember, these are mostly for “normal” and egalitarian relationships.
It doesn’t mean we’d advise any high-value man to do the same. And it doesn’t mean you can’t find other arrangements that work better for you.

4. Influence & Persuasion (Best of)

You can’t do much in life without others.

And what you can do through others via sheer force or coercion is very limited.
Especially in this (blessed) day and age of freedom, democracy, and general opulence (which decreases people’s dependency on others).

Hence, much of life’s success and effectiveness hinges on how well you can persuade others to join you, work with you, support you, or follow you.

These books will help you influence and persuade people.

- The Best Books on Persuasion

4.2. Best Books on Negotiation

Negotiation is persuasion applied to deal-making.

Negotiations are going to be some of the most lucrative -or costly- hours of your life.

Better be prepared with a couple of good books.

- Best Negotiation Books

5. Manipulation (Best of)

Does manipulation deserve its own category?

Probably manipulation, dark psychology, and any Machiavellian strategies to take advantage of others wouldn't deserve their own category.

It could either be part of "advanced social skills", or a subset of influence and persuasion.

But there is a reason why I do still give it its own category.
There is so little information around about this important area of self-development and self-empowerment, that we need all the good resources we can muster.

Hence, its own category.

Influence VS Manipulation

Influence and manipulation can overlap.

Author Robert Greene says that the two are the same.
While some other authors of influential books on manipulation differentiate between the two.

A third approach is that not only we can differentiate but we must differentiate.
And like George Simon observes, not differentiating equates to making excuses for bullies, abusers, and the generally value-taking folks of this world.
And it's also important for self-development: anyone who wants to be a force for good in this world, it's important to understand where the difference lies.

In brief, I differentiate the two in this way: manipulation is win-lose, abusive, or victimizing others.
While persuasion is either win-win, or grey area with only limited loss.

Don't count on people to only limit themselves to persuasion, though.

Instead, it's better to arm yourself with knowledge on how to defend against manipulation.

- Best Books on Manipulation

5.2. Best Dark Triad Books

Power and the quest for power are correlated with dark triad traits.

These books will help you better understand the traits of narcissism, psychopathy, and Machiavellianism:

- Best books on narcissism
- Best Dark Triad Books

6. Career & Business

Let's differentiate:

6.2. Career (Best of)

To make a good career, you need political savvy.

And these books will help you with that:

- Best career books

6.3. Entrepreneurship (Best of)

Learning entrepreneurship from books is not easy.

But learning by doing only can be extremely costly.

Both in the mistakes we do and in the opportunities we miss (God knows how much quicker I could have grown this website with some well-timed advice).
But I have also grown this website much quicker thanks to some great advice I learned from books and other entrepreneurs.

The books in this list help you mostly with the mindsets.

- Best Entrepreneurship Books

7. Leadership (Best of)

This is how TPM sees it:

Leadership is the natural consequence of effective self-development.

Trying to skip to leadership without everything else makes for a poor leader.

Luckily, once you have the good foundations we teach here, then you can also work on your leadership skills.

Leadership is a skill like any other. And like any other skill, the way to improve at it is with both practice and theory.

These books will take care of the later:

- Best Leadership Books

8. Psychology (Best of)

Would you like to understand people and human behavior?

Follow this reading list of best psychology books and you will get to the top 1% when it comes to people's knowledge.

- Best Psychology Books (to understand people)

8.2. Evolutionary Psychology

David Buss says that evolutionary psychology should be the unifying framework for all the different psychology branches and specializations.

And I couldn't agree.

To get, at the same time, an overview and a deeper understanding of the human mind, you absolutely cannot do without evolutionary psychology.

And these are the best books to get you started:

- Best evolutionary psychology books

8.3. Positive Psychology

Positive psychology is self-development, with good science.

For those who can't stand the empty mantra of some self-help gurus, positive psychologists came to the rescue. We combined all the insights into Confidence University:

- Confidence University for practical tactics from Positive Psychology

9. Red Pill

"Red Pill", a concept from the movie "The Matrix", could be described as:

> Eye-opening information that replaces hold myths with new and more realistic information, including informtaionthat may be discomfroting and painful at first

The red pill has become popular with the manosphere, where it applies to a movement of information on masculinity that is (supposedly) based on reality, and against political correctness.
Most of the focus in red pill manosphere is intersexual dynamics.

In this list of best red pill resources, I pay homage to both approaches and include anything that is truly eye-opening, while mostly focusing on intersexual dynamics.

Check it out for yourself:

- Best Red Pill Books

10. General Self-Development

There are so many good books to read in the self-category that picking the best books to read was a really difficult task.

So difficult indeed that it was painful to leave many great titles out.
But in the end, this is how you should prioritize your self-help reading list:

- 10 Best Self-Help Books

And outside of our main expertise, check:

- Best Nutrition Books (for the critical analysis and spotting quacks)
- Best Personal Finance Books (alumni only)

Books to Avoid

Your time is the most valuable resource you have.

And reading is not always and necessarily the best use of your time.

Reading bad books certainly is not a great use of your time.

Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

Lucio Buffalmano · 9 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The psychopath's mating strategy seeks the maximum possible number of descendants with the least possible financial and emotional investment.

This article explores an individual psychopath's approach that may be representative of a larger population.

Introduction

> My goal is to be the modern-day version of Genghis Khan.
>
> – Psychopath

In The Handbook of Psychopathy, Benning, Venables, and Hall write:

> They tend to prize quantity over quality in intimate relationships, viewing romantic encounters as sources of fun (Jonason & Kavanagh, 2010) rather than as sources of commitment and intimacy (Ali & Chamorro-Premuzic, 2010)

In this article, we chronicle a psychopath's sexual strategy using his own words and quotes (sources at the bottom).

Obvious disclaimer:

We present this information for knowledge and self-defense (keep reading).

These relationships are inherently unethical.
Although some women may be willing co-participants, it's more likely to be a predatory strategy based on manipulation, control, abusive relationships, and abandonment.

1. Quantity over quality

Says our friend:

> Psychopath:
> I'm going for quantity over quality. My overwhelming quantity will make it impossible for them to fail as a whole. Just a couple need to be semi-successful.

He refers to "quantity of women/children" VS "quality of good parenting".

But, as we shall see, it also refers to the quality of women.

2. F*ck raw to impregnate women

Whenever a guy brags about not using condoms, I know he may be high in psychopathy.

But our psychopath does so with a precise strategy in mind:

> Question:
> don't you use a condom?

> Psychopath:
> I don't use condoms on vacation or with tourist chicks. My plan and goal is to knock them all up.

Psychopaths are undaunted by STDs

> Question:
> How about STDs?

> Psychopath:
> STDs are not that scary. Nothing pills can't fix. Even aids got pills you can take.

I didn't ask about the STDs he could pass to her, because you should know the answer to that: he doesn't care.

And to the worst of them, harming others is a badge of honor. It says they're effective marauders.

2.2. But use condoms with local women

Volunteers our psychopathic friend:

> Psychopath:
> With locals that know my real identity I condom up as much as I can.

Why so?
Because he does not want to pay child support, of course:

> Psychopath:
> Fuck child support. Literally one of the only reasons I started learning other languages so I can bail the fuck out of the U.S. if some whore tries to get money out of me.

And:

> Psychopath:
> The unfair child support laws benefit women to have as many kids as they can but punish men. I said fuck all that. Nobody controls me. I'm not letting the government control my reproductive rights.
> We men have no parental rights and get treated as just cheap sperm banks anyways.

Obviously he sees no opportunity for win-win exchanges in dating and relationships.

Or... Do anal

> Psychopath:
> Anal for the locals and in their pussy when they are tourist chicks. Because they are flying away. I'll never see them again.

3. Invest NOTHING in your children

First:

3.2. Persuade local women to abort

He has a persuasion system approach to convince women to abort:

> Psychopath:
> (…) has never failed me when I accidentally knock up a local.
> But the key is to get them telling you how having a baby will negatively affect her. They have to feel like it was their choice with no outside influence.

3.3. Develop contingency plans: move, start anew

In case his abortion persuasive strategy fails, he has contingency plans in place:

> Psychopath:
> I doubt I will ever get caught but that is why I'm learning all these languages. As a contingency. Leave this country and start life in another and continue.
> I can move to a country where they can't get any child support out of me and go off the mother fucking grid.
> I'll move to a country where the U.S has no international agreements to enforce it. That's why I choose Japan.

His whole thought process is geared toward taking as much as possible, while giving as little as possible.
As Ray suggests in The Cambridge Handbook, psychopathy can be seen as a cheater strategy to take advantage of others.

3.4. Prevent issues: give women fake names

> Psychopath: I have aliases yes.
> I tell them I'm a tourist also that lives in Miami or somewhere other than Vegas. Only take cabs and stay in hotel rooms. Exchange no social media. No pictures and give them burner phone number. It's impossible for them to track me. Even if they tried they would start looking in the wrong place.

Presenting a mask comes naturally to psychopaths anyway. Says the same guy in another conversation:

reddit r/asktrp Search

There is nothing like embracing another culture and customs and becoming one of them. I love being a actor and being a new person everyday. Life is my stage. It's my theater. It's true freedom. True power. My identify is whatever I make it. Learning a bunch of languages just helps me play a bunch of new roles and opens up a bunch of unique connections that only I can make.

4. Game foreign women, let them come to you

> Question:
> So you travel and go meet some of the girls you know?

> Psychopath:
> I don't travel to them. They travel to me. My hometown is Vegas. They fly in and fly out with my cum still in between their legs back to their home states and countries. It saves a bunch of time and money traveling when they just come to you.

> Question:
> How do you meet these women

> Psychopath:
> Meet them just doing day game and night game. Just normal game. I'm just gaming women that want to let loose on vacation here.

5. Impregnate married women for maximum effect

> Psychopath:
> Bonus if they are married. The husband is automatically assumed the father and put on the cert. even if dna proves him not to be the father.

In this case, the quantity strategy also becomes qualitative, as children grow with a father figure and a provider.

6. Revel in your wins: observe your seeds from afar

Says the psychopath:

> Psychopath:
> I'm really into eugenics and what that could have been and genes. This is a way I can practice from a distance sort of. Love seeing the combinations and wondering what they will look like and become. Watching them develop from a distance on social media on their moms accounts.

7. Scrounge off wealthy women with Mack Game

Psychopaths don't have stable incomes: it requires too much dedication.

Wealthy women are the attractive psychopaths' "hack" to an easy life.

He says:

> Psychopath:
> I use women for financial resources like women do men.
> I'm the one that moves in with them, instead of how it usually is with the women moving into the guys place.
> Moving in with them rent free is just one of the perks of this game.

Typical value-taker mindset.

> Psychopath:
> I live my life like Ashton Kutcher in the movie Spread.

A segment from a movie:

Ashton Kutcher may do that because he's a 10. But average psychopaths… Difficult.

Isn't scrounging off low power?

A Reddit user asked the psychopath if his game was less dominant than the "daddy style", since he is dependent on women.

Seems like that question triggered his ego:

> Psychopath:
> There is nothing more dominant then what I do.
> You think macking (ie.: male gold digger) is not dominant? I can turn it into literal pimping by just saying some words. You think pimps are not dominant?
> Fuck being daddy I'm her lord and savior. I own her very soul. Her life essence.

And ended his message with a power move:

> Psychopath:
> Power Game is full of contradictions and paradoxes. You need experience to understand all the nuances

The psychopath also said that he learned how to control relationships from pimps, both in books and in person -one allegedly took him "under his wing"-.

8. Start a harem

Once your game is good, start a harem.

> Psychopath:
> I will eventually have some that I raise my own. Those ones will be my clones and carry on my will. Genetically and philosophy.

So I inquired:

> Question:
> OK, so at a certain point you will also settle down and be a provider, it sounds?

> Psychopath:
> I'll have a harem.
> Two sister wife's maybe more. I won't be the provider. One of them will have bank. I'll be a father, not a provider. I have too much game to ever settle for a boring-ass commoner relationship. (…) My vision of the perfect family and being the best father I can be. All this game, red pill shit was just a stepping stone.
> (…) I also know it's possible because I have already made it happen multiple times. I just didn't knock them up because I'm waiting.

I'm sure someone will see some irony in the line "best father I can be".

8.2. Turn the harem into a cult -the cult of YOU-

On a Reddit thread, a user shared his goal to move into the wild, living off the land with a great woman.

The psychopath replies:

> Psychopath:
> Sounds like a good place for me to start my polygamist/cult compound. I have never actually thought about something like this.
> (…)

And of course, the good-old isolation technique (Greene, 2001):

> Psychopath:
> In order to form the cult I want, I do need to isolate all of them. This is a major breakthrough (to live in the wild, Ed.). Can't believe I never thought of this. I'm going to need to redo my vision board now and move this cult idea I have been planning into motion in a new time slot.

He then even advises another guy:

> Psychopath:
> Start studying cult leaders and using what they did on these women. Run some Jim Jones game on them.

Nothing gives psychopaths a feeling of power like leading a cult

9. Control women with abuse

Psychopaths want total power and control over women.

One, because it makes them feel good about themselves, and two because a woman under their control can be used -and abused- to better serve his needs.

The techniques he describes are some of the worst, as well as the most notable examples of dark psychology I've ever read:

9.2. Screen for women who respond well to punishment

> Psychopath:
> They cry and storm out, go to their cars, anger text me and come back up once they realize it's only going to get worse for her. That's the worse a women has ever resisted punishment. They also agree to these punishments beforehand. Otherwise she can't become my plate.

Another poster, approved by "our" psychopath says:

> As soon as she begins to try and be a bitch or power grab, she starts losing my time and attention. Either the plate breaks or the bitch changes her tune.

"Plates that break" are women with higher standards who cut contact.
Not good for the psychopath.
Psychopaths resent women who are independent and/or resist their total control. They want doormats whom they can control.

9.3. Stick to women who get addicted to abuse

Psychopaths like this one only enter relationships with women who accept abusive behavior.
So it's true when he says:

> Psychopath:
> Women never call the cops. There are dudes that beat their girlfriends/wife's for years and they still dont call the cops. Why? Because women like abuse emotionally and physically.

Of course, it's not true that "women (in general) like abuse". But some get addicted to it.
Relationship researcher Gottman was shocked to hear that several women reported peak sexual experiences after episodes of domestic violence (Gottman, 2011).
Psychopaths stick with those types of women.

Also read:

- How low self-esteem leads to abusive relationships
- The judge: explains how abusers can gain control with approval/criticism

9.4. Use abusive tactics

Including:

9.4.2. Create emotional whiplash: break them down, build them back up

> Psychopath:
> You need to game like a woman with BPD.
> Give women emotional whiplash. You need to break these women down like they are muscles. What happens when you break down muscle over and over? It grows back stronger, that's what you want to do with your > relationships with them.

> Breaking these women down and building them back up over and over is how you build a stronger relationship with them each time. It's how you create "love".
> (…)
> A women in love will give you everything. Drama to women is emotional heroin.

You do that by creating fake arguments:

> Psychopath:
> In order to do that you need to start fake arguments, that sadly many guys on here (on the red pill community, Ed.) think is stupid. They think gaming like a women is beneath them. They have no idea what they are missing out on.

At the extreme, the "whiplash" is a physical beating followed by periods of extreme tenderness.
See an example from Jon Koppenhaver (War Machine):

> Narrator: This is "the cycle of abuse".
> In phase 3, after an abusive episode, the abuser seeks connection. They act romantic, apologetic, and remorseful. The abused (…) may begin to feel a stronger connection.
> When fear and intimidation are directly followed by affection and warmth, the intimate nature of the latter can become significantly intensified.

It's worth noticing that Christy Mack, the psychopath's girlfriend, was also somewhat "off", from snake pets, to growing up in toxic households. And notice her tattoo saying "sick love".

9.4.3. Demand the moon, and expect it -or punish them-

> Psychopath:
> She needs to repent. They should put you above all else. Your word is god. Disobedience is harshly punished. She will never blow me off again. I dont give a fuck if her parents are dying, if I request her she better be there.

Does it remind you of Charles Manson?

9.4.4. Use rewards and punishments

> Psychopath:
> You need to operant condition them with rewards and punishments. You need to be sadistic and have a 50 shades of gray relationship with all of them because it works and they get wetter for you over it. It's all about results.

I doubt women get technically more "wet". Sex becomes more of a way of seeking confirmation for the emotional bond, and staving off the fear of abandonment (sex for sexual pleasure and sex for bonding are two different things).

12.6. Leverage your bottom bitch to control others

Remember that he has a "pimp" approach to dating:

> Psychopath:
> My primary is my enforcer. She's the bottom bitch that keeps my other bitches in line for me so I don't have to do any work. Most of the times I have my primary dish out punishment on the other plate. My hands are always clean.

If things go south, your primary will defend you:

> Psychopath:
> If she wants to get violent my primary can get violent back on her. (…) She calls the cops I always have a witness that she consented to everything. Again 50 shades type of relationships.

9.4.5. Once she's under your spell, use "dread game"

> Psychopath:
> She would rather share me than completely lose me. That scares the fuck out of them and keeps them in line.

9.4.6. (Mis)treat them like dogs

One man says he does not sleep well when women stay over.
Says the psychopath:

> Psychopath:
> I had the same problem. My solution was to make them sleep on the ground in a sleeping bag at first. Than I got soft I guess and let them sleep at the foot of the bed perpendicular but my yorkie didn't like that because that was his spot.

:S

9.4.7. Use sex for extra-bonding and control

Some psychopaths and abusers use sex as a tool for control (Bancroft, 2002).

Our future sect leader here takes it a notch up, and says he uses sperm as a tool for reward and punishment:

> Psychopath:
> Now I use my literal cum as a reward for positive behavior that benefits me.

And comes inside to heighten the emotional bond and personal control:

> Psychopath:
> Though I prefer to cum in them because it has that extra cocktail of hormones that further bonds them to me.

9.4.8. Hack their laptops & phones to use their secrets to your advantage

This one was the most unexpected for me:

> Psychopath:
> I personally use it to low key hack and have control of all my plates laptops. I know everything about them. Their browser history, projects they are working on, emails and twitter accounts because lol everybody just leaves everything on auto sign in.

> Also iPhones. Even the ones with Face ID omg that shit is horrible. When they are sleeping just open one of their eyes and you get access. If they have an older model just put their thumb on the Touch ID button. A normal password is far safer than biometrics.

How to use that information:

> Psychopath:
> Knowledge is power.
> They always wonder how it seems I can read their minds. It's because I am. Our phones and laptops, social media accounts are a peak at our souls.
> Let your imagination run wild as to why having that info on them is so powerful. It's like the movie what women want when they are around me.

He says he has remote software to switch on their laptop's camera and microphones, and he learned it from the book "Social Engineering".

And in another message, he explains why it works:

> Psychopath:
> People are narcissistic, they just want to be around other people like themselves. Same hobbies, jobs, interest, background etc.
> There is no better way to become their mirror than to hack and find out everything about themselves than use what you find out in conversation with them.

10. And Ultimate Step...

There is one last, ultimate power move.

Unfortunately, we can't share it publicly.

Psychopath's Seduction Techniques & Mindsets

This guy's post history is a crash course on the mindsets and psychology of psychopaths.

Some more information about him:

- He writes mostly on Red Pill subreddits

Which tells you something about The Red Pill.

- He uses social circles

Between cold approaches VS social circles, he prefers social circles:

> Psychopath:
> You're supposed the build a pipeline of pussy so you don't need to cold approach.
> I have not cold approached all year. Even before COVID. I simply just hang out and tell plates/females friends to invite more girls they know. The women in my life do all the pussy hunting for me now.

- He bodybuilds and uses steroids

> Psychopath:

> "Than said fuck all this and jumped on the juice"

Research also linked steroid use to short-term tactics and higher intrasexual competition.

- He parties a lot

> Psychopath:
> Long after my military career is over I have finally become a morning person. All it took was bars and night clubs closing

LOL you can't deny this guy can be funny.

- He does not respect any "bro code"

> Psychopath:
> I never respect the beta bro code under any circumstances.
> All the "friends" I would need to uphold this rule around got exiled and purged from my life. They will only hold you back like the crabs they are. Bro code is mate guarding simp shit.
> Our bro code with my boys is to share everything and if you manage to steal a girl from one of us it's cool just explain and detail how you pulled it off so we can all improve our game together.

To which one guy replies "If that's how you and your friends operate, then you guys are toxic as fuck."

- He insists and takes no "no"

> Psychopath:
> I never give up on sets till violence or security is called. It's a rule I have that has lead to many opportunities like yours.

- He cares nothing about his family

> Psychopath:
> I personally give no fucks about my family.
> Even if I did owe them something wouldn't give them shit. Funeral costs don't care. Bury me in the back yard for all I care. Don't even get me a casket.

Of course, God forbid if he didn't end up being a cost and burden.

- He learned seduction and power dynamics for money, resources, and power

> Psychopath:
> I always learned game from day one for money, resources, social status and power. To have a harem has been my end game since day one.

And:

> I didn't get into game for sex I'm after something far greater. Power, control and money.

His self-awareness is quite good. Definitely a high-functioning psychopath.

- He "plows" through last minute resistances (LMR)

> Psychopath:
> I don't really get LMR but my rules to deal with it is to plow. If she really doesn't want to have sex she will kick and claw like an actual victim is the only way I'm stopping.

- If he's caught cheating, he denies it

> Psychopath:
> If I get caught with another woman I make excuses that it was not my fault, I can't be held responsible, it just happened, just like women do to men.

And of course, never take responsibility or face the consequences of your actions.

Switch the tables: become the prize

The psychopath says that part of his game is to act like a "female 10".

He says:

> Psychopath:
> I'm the one that gets chased, I game in a way that makes her the pursuer. She initiates everything. She wants to fuck me she has to chase me. In a relationship, if she wants my dick she has to use foreplay on me.

Part of his "gaming like a female 10" is to refuse responsibility, make excuses of caught with other women, and create lots of drama (of course, none of that necessarily belongs to a "female 10's behavior").
Again, sounds a lot like that manosphere guru's gaslighting MO (see here).

Seeking Immortality

Projecting power over infinity

Robert Hare (Hare, 1993) hypothesized that psychopaths:

1. Follow a conscious reproductive strategy of quantity over quality
2. Seek a way of "living on forever"

Let's go back to our case study.

> Psychopath:
> I'll die but my genes will forever live on all over this planet. I made this my life purpose.
> If there was a actual god it would be very grateful for all the new life I'm creating. In a way I am god. I create new life and the women in my life worship me. That's how I see it. I'm doing the work of a god.

I questioned him on the illusion of "forever":

> Question:
> "Forever" is an illusion.
> Your genes will be so diluted in a just a few generations that nothing of "you" will be there. And it's a fair bet that all species will end, eventually. At latest, when the universe wil end.

And he replies:

> Psychopath:
> Everything will end yes. But at least a part of me will still be alive to make it to see the end of our species. Hundreds of thousands of years from now.
> (…)
> I'll make it to infinite. Till the meteor fucking drops.

More Examples

These are not diagnoses, but only examples of individuals who may have psychopathic or dark triad traits and pursued a reproduction strategy based on quantity

Years after we first published this article, we may have a real-life example of someone publicly embracing this approach:

> Psychopath-sounding man: My goal is to have as many children as possible

And in this other example, he mocks men with two children as "b*tches".

I have also personally witnessed this tendency in sperm donation cases.
For example:

- Man rejected for sperm donation goes on a vindictive spree: goes back in person to say that it's him who withdraws and not them to reject him, sends emails to the parent company complaining about laboratory workers, mentions his genes are too good for donations, and leaves online negative reviews. A behavior that may suggest narcissistic rage
- Man rejected for sperm donation throws a fit in the office, complains that the online selection criteria were wrongly stated, that he had spent two years 'preparing', and that he has two degrees, seemingly wanting to display 'donor value' and pressuring reviewers into making an exception

Further Considerations

The Science of Psychopathic Sexual Strategies

Psychopathy may be an adaptive strategy for reproduction, a concept highlighted by evolutionary psychology and most associated with Troisi (1998).

Human males tend to invest in offspring, but not equally, and not all.
In the literature, the extreme ends of the male parental investment are referred to as k and r:

- K-selection: Fewer offspring, high investment (e.g., most humans).
- r-selection: Many offspring, low investment (e.g., insects and… Psychopaths).

There are two sources of psychopathic approaches to reproduction: one based on harsh childhood environments and adapted fast life strategies, and one genetic (Mealey, 1995). However, in terms of pure behavioral results related to short-term mating, they may be similar.

Neurobiological research supports the hypothesis that dysfunctions in brain regions that are key to emotional processing and morality judgments may allow psychopathic individuals to pursue this evolutionary strategy (Glenn & Raine, 2009)

Monogamous Good Men, Players, & Psychopaths: A Continuum

As Condolin explains, monogamy aligns interests and promotes cooperation between the sexes.
This means that the monogamous and high-investing man intrinsically makes for better and more cooperative relationships

By contrast, the quantity approach aligns more with the 'player' type.
This approach is inherently less collaborative, especially long-term.

However, an uncommitted and quantity approach to dating doesn't necessarily turn exploitative if the player is an honorable man.
This is not the case with the psychopath, though.

The psychopath sits at the antagonistic extreme because not only does he have no morals to keep it win-win, but he may actively seek to harm his partner.

Read more on overlapping concepts:

- Lovers & Providers
- Alpha fucks beta bucks, a mantra for alphas, dominant and high-value men who don't commit, and betas, who commit

Is It A Conscious Approach to Quantity?

Robert Hare claimed it's a conscious approach, but without empirical data I am skeptical.

Psychopaths are also impulsive, and driven by short-term pleasures.
Hare's own examples contradicted his hypothesis, with one psychopath literally replying to him "I just like to fuck".

On the other hand, it seems that at least some psychopaths consciously plan their sexual strategy.
This same article is the evidence.

But I believe it's more often a consequence of psychopaths' brain wiring, than a conscious decision.

This is supported by the results it gets:

Does The Psychopath Strategy Work?

Though this kind of sexuality may theoretically result in greater reproductive success (Wiebe, 2004) at least for some men, Benning and colleagues stated that it has yet to be established empirically whether this is actually the case (Gladden, Figueredo, & Jacobs, 2009; Glenn, Kurzban, & Raine, 2011).

When it comes to 'poaching', psychopaths may target already taken women but also lose their partners to poaching, yielding a net neutral effect (Jonason, Li, & Buss, 2010).

More recently, Lyons suggests in The Dark Triad of Personality that psychopathic men and women had fewer children among the dark triads (Carter, Lyons, & Brewer, 2018).
Narcissists instead had more children.

But the evidence is sparse and the study had a small sample to draw significant conclusions.

Manipulative Psychopaths, Or Willing Women?

We must acknowledge that some women likely slept with him knowing what they were getting.

Or, at least, they kinda knew it's not the best setup, but went for it anyway.

Consider that some women don't have endless options.

Forced to choose between a meek, low-status man willing to commit and a dominant psychopath, some women may choose the latter.

Plus, the appeal of the psychopathic bad boy may increase for short-term.
Empirical support comes from a popular study where "Dads" and "Cads" correspond to "Proper" and "Dark" heroes in British Romantic literature, with women preferring "Proper" heroes for long-term and "Dark" heroes for short-term relationships.

This also means that women are enabling psychopaths to procreate.
Or, if you prefer, we can look at the too-nice guys who, until they empower themselves, make psychopathic men valid options.

Both angles are valid.

The Cons of The Psychopath's Strategy

Here's the short of it:

The deceptive and number-centric psychopath strategy requires less attractive and discerning women.

Let's see:

- Dark triads drop their standards, especially for short-term dating (Jonason et al., 2011)
- The easiest "psychopath victims" are lower SMV women when we read between the lines of the "victims' literature" (Brown, 2008, MacKenzie, 2015; Norwood, 1985). This is in line with our 'value-control tradeoff model™', where the higher value a person is, the more demanding he becomes of the people in his life, expecting value-giving instead of value-taking control
- High-quality women pick better options for sexual marketplace dynamics, high-quality women can get positively dominant men, without toxicity
- It requires libertine environments, large cities, and constant turnover. Otherwise, they'd burn their reputation very quickly

Of course, psychopaths would never confirm this.

Let's go back to the psychopath from this article.
This is what he says about the cocktail waitresses in Vegas:

> Psychopath:
> They also mostly have degrees and are very smart women, but don't pursue that because why would they? Whatever their degree/career pays is way less than simply being a hot woman who can pour a drink.

That is the typical tendency of inflating the value of those we date.
But I agree more with this other guy who replied:

> Lol no.
> I've worked that industry. Sometimes, I'd meet a girl working her way through college, but that was rare. Most were not "very smart women".
> (…)
> Most stable men don't want a girl who makes her money by wearing skimpy outfits and flirting with every slob.
> (…)
> These women are trading a normal/healthy long-term partner, and the option of a respectable career path or station in life, for a source of short term riches that dries up by the time they're 40, if they're lucky.
> (…)
> Idk who this guy (the psychopath, Ed.) talked to, but if they told him they had student loans they needed paying off, it's because they were trying to sucker him for a fat donation.

Lessons Learned For Women

Smart women can learn some lessons from this post.

- Always demand a condom
- Abuse is unacceptable
  - If you're attracted to abusive men, seek therapy. Also see Women Who Love Too Much
- Beware of men who insist upon your first "no"
  - Beware of men who push too hard for sex: resist sex at first instead as a valid test for man's character

A Danger To Civilization?

An increase in psychopathic traits may be a danger to civilization itself.

Civilization requires a minimum amount of cooperation and contribution from all.
In that sense, the psychopath undermines civilization by spreading anti-cooperative genes and attitudes.

Once society has enough psychopaths, it may not be able to cooperate anymore.
Or not as effectively.
It may splinter down into clans once again, bringing us back to middle age. Or worse.

I worry that with large societies, the psychopath strategy may be comparatively more effective.

The Power Moves, by empowering good men, contrasts that.

Summary

In short, the strategy:

1. Quantity of women & children over quality
2. Control women with abusive techniques

3. Impregnate & bail

Power Dynamics & Egos in Academia: Martin Seligman's Biography

Lucio Buffalmano · 22 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Hope Circuit (2018) is an autobiography of Seligman's life and work. It explains how psychology changed during his long career, how Seligman contributed to those changes, and the 'behind the scenes' politics, power dynamics, and ego clashes.

TPM's Strategic Take: While marked as a memoir, this book is valuable because it unveils the 'Shadow Game' of high-level academic success, including the power dynamics of research and funding, politics in academia, and status seeking competitions.

Summary

About the Author:
Martin Seligman is an American psychologist and researcher. He is a professor of psychology at the University of Pennsylvania. Seligman has been the president of the American Psychological Association (APA), and he is one of the founders and main proponents of "Positive Psychology". He is also the author of "Learned Optimism".

1. Psychology wrong premise: not getting it wrong ≠ getting it right

Psychology started with the premise that not getting it wrong meant getting it right.
If psychology could eliminate all the ills of the world, human life would be at its best. But the absence of ill-being does not equal the presence of well-being.

Psychology could be about the presence of happiness, not merely the absence of happiness.

1.2. Transformation Pillars During Seligman's Lifetime

Seligman says that psychology went through huge transformations during his lifetime, and that he led the transformation in more than one instance.

The four big steps of transformation are:

1. Abandoning behaviorism to embrace cognition and consciousness
2. Realizing that evolution and the brain constrain what we can learn
3. Ended the fixation of curing only what's wrong to include building what's right and positive
4. Discovered that we are driven into the future rather driven by the past

These changes together make the psychology of hope.

2. Psychology Before Seligman

Part of "The Hope Circuit" is dedicated to the "history of psychology".

Here are the main parts:

2.2. Freudian VS Behaviorists: many similarities in their shortcomings

Says Seligman:

> WHEN I FIRST encountered psychology, more than thirty years before my stint as APA president, two warring factions in the field—the behaviorists and the Freudians—were at a standoff. For all their differences, they shared many of the same dogmas. Both focused on misery. Neither took evolution seriously. Both believed that the past, especially childhood trauma, frog-marches us into the future. Both considered thinking and consciousness mere froth. They also shared many of the same blind spots: happiness, virtue, free will, meaning, creativity, and success. In short, they both missed everything that makes life worth living.

2.3. Behaviorists Are All About Internal Validity

Says Seligman:

> In direct contrast, the behaviorists are the direct descendants of what I call "atomism." (…) The thesis that real understanding comes only by working from the ground up.
> We can gain clarity about real-world issues only if we first discover and analyze the simple building blocks of the complex real world and then reassemble them to reconstruct reality.

> The model is the periodic table of the elements.

Behaviorism had the allure of hard science.
Says Seligman:

> Behaviorism was elegant. It sought to rid psychology of the quicksand of mental stuff and to place measurable behavior as the concrete footing that real science requires. A rat turning left or right in a maze was more measurable and more replicable than the sensation of slimy as composed of the sensation of warm plus that of wet. John Broadus Watson ignited the revolution in 1913 at Columbia University. Psychology, he thought, should be "a purely objective experimental branch of natural science," aiming not to understand the fluff of the mind but to predict and control behavior. Introspection was a muddle, and behavior was the right unit for scientific analysis.

The behaviorist thought that the mind was outside of science:

> Behavior could be known with certainty, but mind could not, so mind was outside science.

And within two decades, says Seligman, behaviorism had swept away introspection entirely.
The science of mind had transformed into the science of behavior, and "learning theory" now sat on the throne -together with the behaviorists taking the best professorships in the country-.

2.4. Behaviorist's Blind Spots

Says Seligman:

> These militant denials of cognition led to blind spots: that consciousness is not causal, that imagination has no role, and that free will is an illusion.

Today, thanks to the work of Seligman and others, we know that behaviorists were on the wrong track.
Says Seligman:

> - Conscious thoughts powerfully influence emotions. Thoughts of helplessness produce passivity. Thoughts of a better future produce hope. A science of behavior without the mind is hopelessly insufficient. • We continually imagine different futures, we evaluate them, and we choose among them. Try as we might, we cannot shake off free will. A science that is only about the past (memory) and the present (perception) without an account of future-mindedness is hopelessly insufficient.
> - A science that is only about negative emotions is hopelessly insufficient.

2.5. Seligman's Personal Beef With Behaviorists

Across the whole book, it feels that Seligman had a personal issue with some exponents of Behaviorism.

He says:

> "So you think, Marty, that animals have a rich mental life?" Dave asked, as if mockery should end the argument. (…) But these beliefs were so out of keeping with behaviorism that one either shut up or one endured mockery. I didn't shut up, and neither did Steve.
> All of this made us outcasts on our home turf by putting us squarely in the camp of what would soon be called "cognitive" psychology.

3. Freud Was Unscientific (Implies Seligman)

Seligman has already shown in his previous books not being the greatest admirer of Freud.

In “The Hope Circuit” he says:

> Freud was aware of this dilemma (…) It tells us where Freud stood on the importance of external validity over rigor. Freud believed that the possibility of a revolutionary insight could justify going way beyond the evidence.

4. The “Control” Literature: Helplessness is Only A Tiny Piece

Among the research on control and personal power:

- Locus of control (Julian Rotter): Julian Rotter, a social psychologist, developed the concept of “locus of control,” with some people being “externals,” believing that the environment or other people shape their lives, and others being “internals,” believing that they themselves shape their own lives
- Self efficacy (Albert Bandura): An “efficacy expectation” is the belief that you, yourself, can bring about the outcomes you desire, whereas an “outcome expectation” is the belief that the outcome you desire will simply happen.
- Appraisal theory (Richard Lazarus): When an event occurs, the organism first assesses the consequences of the event (primary appraisal), then asks if it has the ability to cope with the event and its consequences. This is “secondary appraisal.”

Says Seligman:

> So learned helplessness, finding the downside of not having control, was really just one step in a vigorous march emphasizing the benefits of the presence of control. While we self-centeredly thought of our own work as huge, Steve and I were in fact just part of two intertwined developments making their way into mainstream psychology: the new acceptance of cognition and the new dimension of control. (…) By the turn of the millennium, both control and cognition were firmly entrenched in mainstream psychology.

5. Tips for Writing Good Papers

Says Seligman:

> Most readers are busy. I sure am. Many readers just scan. I know I do. Help the scanners by using short sentences and plain words. The big word and the long sentence must increase accuracy a lot to make up for impeded reading. And don’t overwrite. Omit extra words and information that the reader already knows. Overwriting slows the reader way down and does not increase accuracy much at all.

However, also notices Seligman, a more complicated style can be “reader unfriendly”, but “reviewer friendly”, and help have your paper published.

6. American Psychology Association (APA) Power Dynamics

Says Seligman:

> For the last fifty years, APA has had three overlapping constituencies. The original and most venerable comprised the scientists. In the 1970s, the independent therapists overtook the scientists in numbers, and governance fell to them in the coup d’état staged by the self-named “dirty dozen.” My presidency in 1998 marked a brief respite and some sharing of power between the practitioners and the scientists.

> But there has always been a third, less conspicuous constituency: the social activists.

Seligman says that the social activists attacked him and APA of collusion with the Bush administration to orchestrate a coup d'etat and move APA on the far-left.
Seligman's own accusation of contributing to the CIA torture program was also part of the anti-war and social activist machinations.

The investigation that followed, from Seligman's point of view, was biased towards the social activist, and was used to launch their power takeover of APA.

I am not sure about this, but I can say that Seligman did come across as very pro-US militarism from the way he writes.

He says for example that: "when in doubt, we should err on the side of helping our nation".
I think that when in doubt you should look for more information, and probably refrain from taking action.

7. Faculties Power Dynamics: Cornell Example

Says Seligman:

> Cornell contrasted sharply with Michigan. Its homey department had only about twenty-five faculty members, completely dominated by one faction, the perception psychologists led by husband and wife team Jimmy and Jackie (Eleanor J.) Gibson.
> Jimmy was the brains and Jackie the enforcer.
> The Gibsons were the opposite of behaviorists in ideology, but they were just as cultish, tyrannical, and narrow-minded.

8. Grants Power Dynamics: Blocking Funds

Seligman describes Bill Morse as an acolyte of B. F. Skinner.

As he was pitching his research that went against everything in Skinner doctrine of behaviorism, Morse scowled at Seligman.

Then, when the jury had to decide whether or not to grant Seligman a research purse, he says:

> When the group reassembled in Washington, I later learned, the four psychiatrists all gave my application a "1.0," the highest NIMH score, equivalent to an A+. Morse asked the group, "What mark do I have to give Seligman to prevent him from getting any money?" They told him a "5.0," the almost never-used equivalent of an F.

Then, Seligman uses the opportunity to take a little revenge:

> He did, and I now take this opportunity to thank Bill Morse for unintentionally doing me one of the great favors of my life.

9. Funding Power Dynamics: Power Aligning

Seligman says that the DSM definition for "depression" had changed not because it made sense, but to turn into a psychiatric disorder.

The psychiatry guild that ran NIMH wanted the change to capture the funding, and they managed to do so.

> My renewal was about identifying depressive attributional style, which, I argued, amplified helplessness: if one interprets failure through the lens of personal (it's me), permanent (it's going to last forever), and pervasiveness (it's going to ruin everything), depression results. The NIMH branch chief for depression fired a warning shot across my bow.
> "Your proposal is about the symptoms of depression. What does that have to do with depressive disorder, Marty?" Bob Hirschfeld, a future chair of psychiatry in Galveston, Texas, asked me on the telephone. He was trying to help me stave off a rejection.
> (…) "Why don't you rewrite the proposal to be about the disorder, and by the way perhaps you might enlist and pay some collaborators from your psychiatry department."

Seligman was forced to rephrase his grant to make it sound like it was psychiatric research and, once he did, his grant was funded.

10. Academia VS Self-Help Power Dynamics

After "Learned Optimism", Seligman was branded a "self-help author".

And self-help is usually scoffed at in academia.
Seligman says that books like Carnegie's "How to Win Friends and Influence People" and Peale's "The Power of Positive Thinking" were scorned in academia.

This was Seligman's experience after he became to be known in the general public:

> This was a surprise and caused some rethinking. The professors in the humanities led the applause. For them, I discovered, a book, particularly one that emanated from a major New York publisher and then got reviewed in the Times, was the acme of success. In the sciences, a lead article in a specialized journal was the acme of success. My reappraisal was confirmed when no psychologist at Penn said a word to me—not then, not ever—even though the department broke out champagne when my colleague Henry Gleitman published his introductory textbook.

Again though, it transpires how much Martin Seligman craves people's praise.

Seligman goes on to say that, contrary to most other self-help texts, his self-help was grounded in science and research.
And he says that "Learned Optimism" was the first scientific self-help.

11. Medicine Against Psychologists: Power Dynamics

Seligman cites several studies and pieces of evidence supporting the idea that psychological states such as optimism, or depression affect our physical healthy.

But the simple notion that mental state affects physical states faces lots of headwinds.

He says:

> Our journal rejection rate from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation project at the prestigious medical outlets has been close to 80 percent, and I see a double standard in action. Studies that show positive psychological protective factors get rejected out of hand, but those that deny positive protection get accepted and publicized.

And later on:

> Psychologists are unwelcome interlopers in the world of medical science. Medicine is dominated by the belief > that psychological factors do not cause medical outcomes or only do so by way of biological processes—even if the psychological factors are known and measured and the biological factors are completely unknown.

12. Evolutionary Psychology Reframes Everything

> Natural selection reframes almost everything, and it has pervaded my thinking about psychology since.

And:

> Most importantly, I joined the battle against the "blank slate" brand of psychology that ignores natural selection and insists that while having a brain is nice, that brain is just a means of faithfully transcribing what experience writes.

That battle has by now probably been won, and it's well encapsulated in Steven Pinker's book "The Blank Slate".

13. Heuristics For Psychologists

Negative heuristics are:

- If the theory contains "self-[esteem, efficacy, worth, compassion]," hold on to your wallet.
- If you need fancy statistics to see a result, think twice.
- If an article ends with "more research is needed," be skeptical.
- If "qualitative study" or "focus group" appears, stop reading.

Positive heuristics are:

- A good theory makes surprising counterintuitive predictions (e.g., treating depression as prospection gone awry will work better than correcting false beliefs about the past and the present).
- Begin with an anecdote that distills the idea (e.g., "Sauce béarnaise used to be my favorite sauce") and only then challenge the reader with the details of experiments and theory.
- Drill down to the most basic assumption and ask, if it were false, what would follow (e.g., What if early-childhood trauma has only minor effects on adult personality? Then adolescence might be the crucial time that wreaks the tectonic changes in who we will become, and intervening then will do more good than early-childhood interventions).
- A good piece of science tells the reader that something she thought was false is true, or something she thought was true is false. You will read about a whopper that stands learned helplessness on its head in the next chapter.

14. How to Have Your Articles Published: The Sense of Audience

To get your articles published, try first to get feedback from the people who are well-known names in the field.

Says Seligman:

> Writing about creativity offers an example of the importance of audience. Creativity is an overworked topic, and almost everything has been said about it. For an article about creativity to see the light of day, it is a good idea to first send a draft to Dean Simonton, Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi, Teresa Amabile, and Howard Gardner and patiently wait for their comments.

Then, cite those people:

> Their work needs to be cited (favorably if possible) and their papers read carefully.

As a general rule, you want to send the draft out to the gatekeepers:

> Dick Solomon had a much better grasp of this principle than I. He always sent his drafts out to the gatekeepers first, and blessed with Harold Schlosberg on one shoulder and Walter Hunter on the other, commenting on each sentence, Dick had a great sense of audience.

Stay within the widely accepted beliefs and dogmas of your field:

> Ideas that are a half step ahead of the audience are good "normal" science, and the journals are filled with these. While usually boring to read, they provide the cumulative bricks.
> Papers that are two steps ahead of the gatekeepers are rejected as outlandish.
> If you wish to succeed in normal science, stay just one step ahead, but do venture an occasional one-and-one-half-step paper to keep your sense of self-respect.

And I think this is exactly why we ended up with a replication crisis. People were just publishing articles just to get them published, not to do actual research.

> Replication Crisis: A Defense of Psychology

15. Seligman Against Affirmative Action, & Racial Politics

Says Seligman:

> We were instructed to take 40 percent of all black applicants with an SAT average of 400 or better. This was the bottom 25 percent of the entire American pool. (Do you see the problem before you read on?)

Seligman says that was the beginning of the racial politics that were soon to come.

And later on:

> What did the black students want? Their demands were nebulous—more black faculty members, more black students, more black scholarships—but one "nonnegotiable" demand stood out: amnesty.

The students won out, to Seligman's chagrin:

> The faculty declined and voted to give the black students whatever they wanted, and most certainly, amnesty. A minority of the faculty, including me, was scandalized. Relinquishing the freedom to teach what one believes, giving in to violence, allocating scarce resources to the loudest group for academically dubious projects like the Ujamaa Residential College—this was not what a university was about.

Seligman also discusses the impact of the famous paper "How Much Can We Boost IQ and Scholastic Achievement?" (Jensen, 1969).

The paper discusses the heritability of IQ, as well as the IQ difference between American blacks and whites, which the paper said might be genetic.

He was afraid of discussing anything similar at Cornell, and so he decided to leave.

16. The Positive Psychology Tent

As president of APA, Seligman sought to promote positive psychology, and he wanted to so helping and supporting others with their own agenda:

- Mike Csikszentmihalyi's on flow
- Chris Peterson's and Neal Mayerson's on virtue
- Ed Diener's on subjective well-being
- George Vaillant's on successful aging
- Kathleen Hall Jamieson's on positive civic institution
- Barb Fredrickson's on positive emotion
- Jon Haidt's on awe
- Sonja Lyubomirsky's on interventions
- Laura King's on meaning.

And, finally:

- Angela Duckworth, on Grit

Seligman's own prior agenda, prevention of mental illness, was only a wee part, of positive psychology.

17. Psychotherapy works with depression, but it doesn't get funded

Seligman says that simply writing down for a week 3 things that went well and why they went well was as effective in curing depression as drugs were.

But they couldn't keep the website up and do more research because they couldn't get the funding.
Says Seligman:

> Given these very encouraging data, we applied for a grant from NIMH. It was turned down administratively without even the bother of any reviews. Annoyed, I saw NIMH more and more in the service only of neuroscience and Big Pharma.

The second issue is copyright law.
You could change a few words on a text and a competitor could copy your product, slap it a new name, and market it.
Instead, you could more easily patent a new drug.

18. Seligman's Defense: He Didn't Support Guantanamo Torture

Seligman says:

> I had made it a practice to try never to get defensive when my science was criticized, since science advances by criticism.
> But this criticism was not about my science; it was personal and moral, as well as untrue, and so this will be the only chapter that will feel defensive to my readers.

It wasn't the only chapter that felt defensive to me, to be honest.

And what follows is Seligman denying his support of CIA in devising torture methods.

I believed him, albeit a few questions linger. Like a second meeting of which he had no memory whatsoever of ever happening? He is certain he didn't talk about detainees and interrogation of detainees, but if he can't remember the meeting, how can he say he is certain?

More Wisdom

- You learn control, not helplessness: you don't learn helplessness, which is the default state. Instead, you learn that you can control events
- Skinner was a tyrant? Says Selignam: "Two rival tyrants then reigned over Harvard: B. F. (Fred) Skinner, the star of 1950s behaviorism, and S. S (Smitty) Stevens, the world's leading mathematical psychophysiologist"
- Trade book is between a scholarly monograph, and a mass market book: "The Social Animal" is the only trade book in psychology
- CEOs lack fairness, honesty, and modesty: also read "corporate Machiavellianism"

And:

- To get the best recruit, engage their vision, not your vision:

This is how Dick recruited Seligman to work for him:

> Unlike Neal Miller, Dick did not talk about himself or his own research program, but he did try to elicit my vision, if any. He did this in a nondirective, bubbly way, chatting about the issues that puzzled him in his laboratory, hoping I would "free associate" creatively from his puzzlement.

- Persuasion by mocking

Seligman was offered an assistant professorship at Harvard, to which his chairman quipped: "every jewish boy wants to be at Harvard".

Says Seligman:

> He hit the target and shamed me, and so I turned Harvard down.

Life-Strategy Tip: Hire Your Worst Critics

Teasdale had just delivered a scathing criticism of Seligman's "learned helplessness" research.
And this is how Seligman reacted:

I was flabbergasted. Teasdale had crystallized, more articulately than I had been able to, my central doubts about my theory.

> "Dr. Teasdale is right, I think," I replied. "These objections are substantive and indeed I do not know attribution theory. So I invite Dr. Teasdale to collaborate with me to dispose of the helplessness theory altogether if necessary, or better to refine it so that it might better fit depression."
> Teasdale, expecting some clever defense, startled visibly, then said, "I accept." And so John and I began a three-year collaboration.

Teasdale proved to be a great boon to refine and improve the helplessness theory with attribution theory.
Such as, people who attributed their succcess to themselves, and the failures to external causes, remained more optimistic and kept trying harder.

Life Strategies: Not Being Wrong VS Not Being Boring

Please read here:

- Not Being Wrong VS Breaking New Ground

This is very relevant for psychology students as well as for life strategies in general.

QUOTES

On fake activism VS real activism:

> Dave was the saintly roommate, the one who went down to Mississippi and got beaten up in 1964. The rest of us just talked the talk.

On the future of humanity, getting rid of all the ills of our past:

> We will go out into the world and plant gardens and orchards to the horizons, we will build roads through the mountains and across the deserts, and terrace the mountains and irrigate the deserts until there will be garden everywhere, and plenty for all, and there will be no more empires or kingdoms, no more caliphs, sultans, emirs, khans, or zamindars, no more kings or queens or princes, no more quadis or mullahs or ulema, no more slavery and no more usury, no more property and no more taxes, no more rich and no more poor, no killing or maiming or torture or execution, no more jailers and no more prisoners, no more generals, soldiers, armies or navies, no more patriarchy, no more caste, no more hunger, no more suffering than what life brings us for being born and having to die, and then we will see for the first time what kind of creatures we really are.

CONS

- A bit of a self-absorbed tone

Says one reviewer on Amazon:

> It reads like the memoir of a celebrity, enthralled by his own magnificence

And a different one:

> I also noticed a lot of ME, ME, ME, ME the great contacts he has, and how bright he is. Please, Seligman needs to have a bumper sticker that says " Say no to arrogance"

And a third one:

> The author is likely brilliant as he will spare no amount of text to tell you. After I realized what I had gotten, I just started skimming through the book and nearly every paragraph has an I, me, my, or the rare we in it

I think there is plenty of value in "The Hope Circuit", but I can see how some people felt that way.

- A touch of narcissism?

Some may think there are signs of a narcissistic personality.

Seligman talks a lot about "achieving immortality", and which scientist is going to achieve it or not.

He then says as he reflects on his life:

> I am more conscious of the awards and honors that I have not gotten than of those I have.

And he says, more than once:

> my ambition was to be like Wittgenstein, surrounded by devoted students and followers.

Over-patriotism / Jingoism

Seligman says he is a “patriotic American, eager to help his country in a time of great need”.

And later on:

> We cannot know what the future holds, but, unfashionable as it is, I strongly believe that when in doubt, we should err on the side of helping our nation.

Strongly believe?
I can see why the social activists didn’t like Seligman.
I believe that when in doubt you should seek more information, not lend your support to a random faction.

Yet later again:

> I want to encourage scientists and mental health practitioners to come to the aid of our government, and I urge them not to let this tactic deter them.

Why should he encourage scientists to aid the government?
People can freely choose what they wanna do without Seligman having to “encourage” anyone. Least of all, encouraging to help the government, independently of the government’s decisions.

The beautiful words of the books’ ending on “no more kingdoms and empires” stand in contrast to Seligman’s parochialism.

Some nasty-sounding revenge-seeking

I felt there was quite a lot of revenge-seeking in “The Hope Circuit”:

- Dick Solomon was not a gentleman

For example:

> I was surprised by the reaction from our learning theory colleagues—there was none. Dick Solomon, perfect gentleman that he was, never said a word to me about this paper.

- Barbara Ehrenreich is an idiot (?)

> Ehrenreich is confused about reality itself (…) To attribute the meltdown to optimism is pure Ehrenreich fantasy.

- Most critics of positive psychology are idiots

There is a whole chapter to list and refute criticisms against positive psychology.
Some of it felt a little bit too vitriolic for comfort.

And some of it, didn’t even deserve space.

He says:

> I CANNOT BRING myself to list all the accusations that the trolls of the internet have clubbed me with. Here's one sample (…)

But one example says nothing.
Because one guy was a crook, does that mean every criticism is a troll?
And if they were, Seligman didn't even need to mention them.

- Suzanne Miller was a homewrecker

And about the "femme fatale" Suzanne Miller:

> She made no bones about her availability. I was poleaxed. Even with two young children to raise

And next, on her looking for better mates:

> The way other men looked at her—and, more, the way she looked back—troubled me. I worried that she was still in the romance market and wanted to trade up.

And in finally trading up:

> I probably should have taken more notice of her other flirtations, since unbeknownst to me she had already successfully traded up (…).
> Within the year, Walter left his wife, Harriet, for Suzanne

An interesting example of unashamed hypergamy, but it seemed a beat mean of framing her as an unrepentant homewrecker.

Overall, this is all great to understand interpersonal power dynamics, but some people might find it annoying.

Review

"The Circuit of Hope" is a great book mixing positive psychology wisdom, with the lessons learned from an autobiography.

It also shows that aspiring academics better learn some office politics. And some Machiavellianism won't hurt either

How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 8 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

"How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable About Anything – Yes, Anything!" is a psychology book teaching readers how to apply the Rational Emotive Behavior Therapy (REBT).

TPM Strategic Note: Foundational pillar of mental empowerment
We include Albert Ellis' work as a foundational pillar of mental empowerment. His REBT framework provides an effective, research-backed system for emotional control and cognitive resilience—core traits for ambitious and high-value men.

Key Takeaways

- We all naturally tend to think in ways that make us unhappier -and more anxious and neurotic-
- Luckily, we can change that and train ourselves to think in ways that help us to be both more effective, and happier
- REBT is a set of techniques to improve the way we think, and the way we feel. It consists in disputing "awfulizing" thoughts, and replacing them with more upbeat, as well as more realistic thinking

REBT Overview

About the Author:
Albert Ellis (September 27, 1913 – July 24, 2007) was an American psychologist who developed Rational Emotive Behavior Therapy (REBT). He is also generally considered one of the originators and early proponents of cognitive-behavioral therapies (CBT) and, in hindsight, a forerunner for positive psychology.

CBT VS REBT

Rational emotive behavior therapy (REBT) is the first form of Cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT), with CBT being so popular that it can be considered an umbrella term for many similar cognitive-behavioral therapies.

Psychologist Martin Seligman frames CBT as part of a revolution in psychology that moved away from Freudian psychoanalysis and a focus on "combating illnesses" towards a focus on the pleasure of life and optimal performance.

REBT and CBT have much in common, including the stoic philosophy that we create our own feelings, and not the external events.
But, says Ellis:

> Unlike most other Cognitive Behavioral Therapies (CBTs) it highlights three basic philosophies (…) especially Feeling Better, Getting Better, Staying Better, Overcoming Destructive Beliefs, Feelings, and Behaviors; Rational Emotive Behavioral Therapy—It Works for Me, It Can Work for You; and The Road to Tolerance: The Philosophy of Rational Emotive Behavior Therapy.

And:

> These philosophies follow from being aware of your dysfunctional and Irrational Beliefs, cognitively-emotionally-behaviorally Disputing them, and arriving at Effective New Philosophies or Rational Coping Philosophies.

When it comes to the differences between CBT and REBT, I also found useful what psychologist Michael R Edelstein says on Psychology Today (I paraphrase):

- REBT goes deeper into the sources of your discomfort, while CBT encourages you to simply skip the rumination

Imagine you're afraid of asking a woman out for a date and think about her possible reactions. CBT would call your inferences "mind-reading" and advise you to drop them.

REBT instead helps you address the deep-rooted reasons that make you anxious and leads you to mind-reading, which include:

1. "Because I strongly prefer to, I absolutely must succeed, or else I'm no good,"
2. "Because I desire it, others absolutely must treat me well or else they're no good,"
3. "Because I passionately wish it, life absolutely must go well or else it's no good."

Once you start addressing those natural, yet self-harming thoughts, you will naturally improve your thinking, your mood, as well as your personal efficacy in life, since you don't get stuck into negative patterns anymore.

- REBT addresses "secondary disturbances (SD)", CBT doesn't

Secondary disturbances are disturbances about the disturbance itself.

In simple terms, if you are anxious about asking that girl on that date, and you worry about your anxiety, that's a "secondary disturbance", and it's a very common cause of anxiety, grief, and depression.

- REBT promotes unconditional self-acceptance (USA), CBT promotes "high self-esteem"

While some forms of CBT seek to promote self-esteem based on results or positive self-rating, REBT promotes self-acceptance no matter your results.

If you fail to get that date for example, you could rate your performance as poor, but you would never generalize that instance to your whole self. You continue to accept yourself as an imperfect, but a valuable human being no matter what happens.

I might add, that REBT is more "antifragile" here.

- REBT views all forms of anger as inappropriate, CBT accepts or welcome some forms of anger

Both CBT and REBT teach assertiveness, but while CBT views some expressions of anger as healthy, REBT addresses the underlying causes of anger because it does not see it as a legit or helpful emotion.

REBT, for example, says that if you get angry because that woman denied you a date, it's probably because there is a "must" or a "should" in your thinking pattern.
You had to perform well, or she had to go out with you. When you address those "musts", then anger disappears or dissipates.

I personally see some expressions of anger as legit. And sometimes, hopefully rarely, you need some aggression to be an effective human being.

But I also agree with REBT, and its approach helps you to be more analytically effective and in control of yourself, and of your life (Ray Dalio would call it "looking at yourself from the above, as if you were a machine, and Jocko Willink and John would call it "detaching")

- REBT Differentiates between positive and negative feelings, CBT doesn't

Says Ellis:

> Most other therapies—such as the behavior therapy of Joseph Wolpe and the cognitive therapies of Richard Lazarus, Aaron Beck, and Donald Meichenbaum—emphasize strong feelings, like severe sadness and irritation, and put them into the same category as feelings of depression and anger.
> Not so REBT! REBT considers your strong feelings of sadness, irritation, and concern to be healthy, because they help you to express your displeasure at undesirable happenings and to work at modifying them.

REBT instead shows you to be aware of those feelings, and categorize them as healthy or unhealthy, desirable or undesirable, as well as assessing how helpful they are in relation to the goals you are trying to reach.

The three basic "Rational Coping Philosophies"

1. Unconditional Self-Acceptance (USA) instead of Conditional Self-Esteem (CSE): You rate and evaluate your thoughts, feelings, and actions in relation to your main Goals of remaining alive and reasonably happy. When they help, you rate that as "good" or "effective," and when they sabotage you rate that as "bad" or "ineffective." But you always—yes, always—accept and respect yourself, whether or not you perform well and whether or not other people approve of you and your behaviors.
2. Unconditional Other-Acceptance (UOA). You rate what other people think, feel, and do as "good" or "bad." But you never rate them as totally bad or good. You accept and respect them—but not some of their traits and doings—just because, like you, they are alive and human. You have helpful compassion for all humans—and perhaps for all sentient creatures.
3. Unconditional Life-Acceptance (ULA). You rate the conditions of your life and your community as "good" or "bad"—in accordance with your and your community's moral Goals. But you never rate life itself or conditions themselves as "good" or "bad"; you try to change the dislikable conditions you can change, have the serenity to accept those you cannot change, and have the wisdom to know the difference.

REBT Exercise #1.: Distinguish between healthy concerns, and unhealthy anxiety

Unhealthy anxieties contain one or more of the following:

- musts
- necessities
- awfulizings (or “catastrophizing”)
- I-can’t-stand-its
- self-downings
- overgeneralizations

For example:

> If I get fined for 10.000 Euros (as I must not), I could never get financially whole again (and that would show what a wholly incompetent person I am!)

Or:

> It’s absolutely necessary that I not lose my sight, for if I did, my life would be awful and horrible, and I could never enjoy anything again!

In these sentences and thoughts, which are normal for most people, there are embedded the predictions of unconditional and complete pain, and they leave you no way out of continual suffering.

Add a “but” for healthy concerns

For example:

> I certainly wouldn’t like to being fined for 10.000 Euros, but if it does occur, I can handle it and I can build my savings back up again

And even more serious issues, without having to sugarcoat anything to yourself:

> If I lost my sight, that would be exceptionally handicapping, but I could still have a good many enjoyments.

The “but” serves you to:

1. Prevent the all-too-common catastrophizing
2. Help you consider, as well as focus, on what you can do about it, and that you can still have the option for good life

How to stop overly negative emotions: in desires & preferences, out musts & shoulds

Ellis invites the reader to imagine something dreadful or painful.

For example, a boss yelling at you.

Do you only feel sorry, sad, or regretful?
Or do you also feel angry and depressed?

Sorry or sad are OK feelings, but anger and depression are overreactions, and they are avoidable.

In that case, look in your thoughts -or hidden in the way you think- for:

- Shoulds
- Oughts
- Musts

For example:

> My boss must not criticize me like that! I can't bear that kind of continual criticism!

But it's not written anywhere that your boss is forbidden to yell or criticize. Or, at least, you can't fully prevent that because that's not up to you.

What you can prevent, and control, are your exaggerated feelings as a reaction of what someone else does.

And to avoid over-reacting, drop your "musts" and replace them with preferences and desires.

Many people have preferences, but then most people move from preferences to commands. They want something, so then they say they must get it.
And that's where neurosis, anxieties, as well as unnecessary self-beatings start.

There is a big difference in the intensity of your negative feelings when something bad happens that is beyond your preferences and desires, or your musts, shoulds, and necessities.

Drop the "must" to succeed

Similarly, what often causes anxiety is the "need" and "musts" for success.

For example:

- "Since these people are important, I must impress them"
- "Because I want to do well at work, I have to!"
- "Since I like him very much, I've got to win his approval !"
- "Passing this test is very important for my career. Therefore, I have to pass it!"
- "Because this is a high-paying job, it is necessary that I please the interviewer."

The 3 basics "musts" are:

1. "I must perform well and/or win the approval of important people or else I am an inadequate person!"
2. "You must treat me fairly and considerately and not unduly frustrate me or else you are a rotten individual."
3. "My life conditions must give me the things I want and have to have to keep me from harm or else life is unbearable and I can't be happy at all!"

Dropping the "musts" is a must -sorry the pun :)- because your "awfulizings" stem from these musts.
Says Ellis:

> Your awfulizing and terribleizing basically stems from your command, your necessity, that this very bad loss must not occur.

Stop your emotional anguish by dropping the "should have" about the past

This was really impactful for me as I fell for the "musts" and "shoulds" in the past.

For example:

- “Because I wanted the job, I should have prepared for the interview. But since I didn’t prepare as well as I must, I’m an idiot who doesn’t deserve a good job like this!”
- “I could have practiced more to win this chess match but didn’t practice as much as I should have, and that proves that I’m a lazy slob who will never be very good at chess or anything else!”
- “I could have gone to the beach on Saturday, but foolishly waited until Sunday—when it rained. The weather should have continued to be good on Sunday. How horrible it was that it rained. I can’t stand rain when I want to go to the beach!”

I also had a recent example and case study for this.

I was blaming myself over a heartbreak and for not having well protected my lover.
I’d say to myself:

> I should have known that eventually leaving Seoul was going to be a heartbreak for me, and even more for her.
> I should have warned with more advanced, and I should have taken more steps to make sure she was going to be fine and happy.
> That makes me to blame for her pain, and might make me a value-taker in her life.

In a way, it’s a great thing that I was taking responsibility not just for myself, but as well, and even more so, for her feelings as well.
That’s how a value-adding, “enlightened leader” thinks and acts. However, I was getting stuck in those loops for too long, and that brought unneeded misery, as well ad making me think and strategize less effectively on the best courses of action.

With REBT, things improved:

> Yes, I knew I was going to leave, but she knew as well.
> Yes, warning her repeatedly might have lessened her emotional pain upon departure. But then again, it might have also ruined our summer romance for reminding ourselves of the Damocles sword hanging over our head (rational disputing).
> Yes, it was very painful for her, but she also enjoyed a great summer love, got over her last LTR break-up pain, and I enriched her in many ways with power dynamics principles and self-empowering mindsets that left her a far better woman.
> And now, when the emotional pain will be over, we will still have a lifelong beautiful memory to look up, and a lifelong beautiful connection

Big change.
And also all based on truth.

Use scientific thinking to dismantle your irrational beliefs

How can the scientific method help you lead a happier life?

By using it to rip apart your nonsense generalizations, black-and-white thinking, and awfulizings.

Says Ellis:

> (the rational method can help) By taking your emotional upsets, and the irrational Beliefs (iBs) that you mainly use to create them, and by using the scientific method to rip them up. By scientifically thinking, feeling, and acting against them.

Some examples Ellis provides:

- Bad "must" thinking and awfulizing:

> "I have to be approved by people whom I find important, and it's awful if I am not!"

- Scientific analysis:

> Is this belief realistic and factual? Clearly not, because there is no law of the universe that says that I have to be approved of by people whom I find important, and there is a law of probability that says that many of the people I would prefer to approve of me definitely will not.
> It's not awful or catastrophic when I am not approved of, only uncomfortable. Bad things may happen to me when I am not approved of. But when something is "awful" it is (a) exceptionally bad, (b) totally bad, or (c) as bad as it could be. Being disapproved of by important people may not even be exceptionally but only moderately bad. It is certainly not totally bad—and it could always be worse. So this belief doesn't by any means conform to reality.

And:

> Is this belief flexible? Definitely not, because it holds that under all conditions and at all times people whom I find important absolutely have to approve of me.

And:

> Can this belief be falsified?
> Yes, because important people can disapprove of me and I can still find life desirable.

And:

> Does this belief prove deservingness? No, I cannot prove that even if I act nicely to important people that there is a rule of the universe that they ought to and have to approve of me. Deservingness is another falsifiable belief.

And finally:

> Does this belief show that I will act well and get good, happy results by holding it?
> On the contrary. No matter how hard I try to get people to approve of me, I can easily fail—and if I then think that they have to like me, I will most probably feel depressed. By holding the idea that at all times under all conditions people whom I find important must approve of me, I will almost certainly fail to work effectively at getting their approval and also hate them, hate myself, and hate the world when they do not do what they supposedly must.

If you are still struggling with the concept and process, Ellis provides several more examples in the book.

Achieving, without fearing failure: dropping "must" while still working hard

I think this is the crucial sweet spot that we all drive people must find:

How to keep pushing ourselves, while also enjoying life.

It's easy when you're driven to place high demands on yourself, and to be too harsh on yourself and your results.
But if you don't push yourself, then you're not going to achieve much.
And I think that REMBT offers a good alternative and solution for this dilemma.

I paraphrase Ellis:

How do you achieve without self-hating?
By not giving up your preference for achieving your goals, but eliminating your demands and musts.

As long as you tell yourself that "you would really like to achieve X, but you don't have to,' you'll retain your task-perfectionism but not your self-perfectionism."

I think this is so important that we need to stress it further:

Seek task-perfectionism, but not self-perfectionism.

No matter how bad your task turns out to be, you still accept yourself. And the converse is true: no matter how good your task turn out to be, you still don't think you're "the best", because otherwise at the next failure, you'll be a failure again.
This is the basis of "antifragile ego".

In my opinion, it might also be possible to feel great about your successes, without taking then feeling too bad about your failures. That's the next level though.

How to control your feelings with ABC

I summarize from Ellis' previous book –look here for full overview (for alumni)-:

- Activating events: specific people, events, or succession of events that can push our buttons. They can even be positive events, sometimes, like weddings, job opportunities, etc.).
- Beliefs/thoughts: there are four main ways we think about our situations and events (here I list 5 because Ellis adds another one in another chapter). In red the bad ones, in green the ones you should use:
  1. Catastrophizing / awfulizing: you make things a bigger deal than they actually are.
  2. Shoulding (absolutist thinking): "I must", "I have to", "I should" (shoulding, musting, or demanding).
  3. Blaming people rather than their acts:
  4. Rationalizing: "Who cares!", "and so?" "it doesn't bother me".
  5. realistic preferences: "I want", "I'd like", "I'd prefer", and "It would be better if". They all have an overt or implied "but" in it. Such as, if the person or the situation doesn't turn the way you want, you'll still be OK with it.
- Consequences: represent two things:
  - Feelings
  - Behaviors in the specific situation occurring at Point A

To control your thinking with REBT, do the following:

- Identity irrational beliefs:
  - look for musts / absolute shoulds / oughts
  - awfulizing / catastrophizing
  - frustration and intolerance ("I can't stand it")
  - self-downing -"I'm worthless"- / others-downing -"he's worthless"- / or life-downing -"life's terrible"
- Change irrational belief by asking yourself:
  - is this belief helpful?
  - where is the evidence to support this belief? Ask yourself "why I must accomplish X", and then answer that "you don't have to"
  - is it logical?

  - use metaphorical disputation: metaphors, stories humor
- Switch to more rational thinking:
  - Flexible preferences: “I want to do great, but I don’t have to”
  - Anti-awfulizing: “it might be bad, but it’s not awful”
  - High-frustration tolerance: “and I can stand it”
  - Acceptance of self, others, and life: “I can accept myself no matter what happens” / “I accept myself as a fallible human being”

REBT instead of psychoanalysis to address childhood events

To some extent, you “invented” your past by interpreting it and framing it in a certain way.

And you are certainly keeping it alive today, and allowing it to make you feel bad when you still think that it influences you and harms you.

You do that in 3 ways, says Ellis:

1. By repeating the same irrational beliefs that upset you as a child. For example “I not only want mom’s approval, but I need, and I’m a basket case without it”
2. By holding on those same beliefs today
3. By refusing to rethink, reframe, and act your irrational beliefs

Says Ellis:

> In the past, you largely made your bed of neurosis and you are insisting on lying in it today!

Instead, you can use REBT to understand how you created your early neurosis early on, how you now perpetuate them and, most of all, you can learn how to overcome them.

If, therefore, you use REBT to understand your early life, you can focus on your part in creating it and on how you now perpetuate your childish thoughts, feelings, and behaviors

Shame and humiliation are illegitimate feelings

Says Ellis:

> REBT considers feelings of shame or humiliation illegitimate because they almost always include a rational element (“I did something people consider wrong or stupid, and I would not like people to disapprove of me for doing it”) and they also include an irrational or self-downing statement (“Therefore, I am a rotten or stupid person”).

Shame-attacking exercises:

Based on this idea, Ellis created his famous “shame attacking exercises”, which consists in beating shame by doing something that you’d consider very embarrassing, including:

- Dress inappropriately
- Say something foolish to a group of people
- Confess some weakness that people usually despise, such as, “I can’t spell well.”
- Act strangely, such as singing in the street or holding up a black umbrella on a sunny day
- Yell out the stops on a train or bus

I love Ellis and he has boatloads of wisdom, but I'm personally not too sure about this technique.
Also, I remember some research showing that it's more effective to conquer fears with baby steps, rather than going "all-out", all of a sudden.

Real-Life Applications

- Constantly dispute your irrational beliefs

To make REBT work and improve your life, you must constantly use it to correct your thought patterns.

And you must:

- Belief in your disputes

If you just repeat and think in REBT terms without truly believing them, it won't work.
You must dispute your belief in a way that you can actually believe it and agree with it. Then it will work.

- Drop "grandiose thinking":

> The usual kinds of emotional disturbances or neuroses (such as most feelings of anxiety and rage) largely come from grandiose thinking. Even when you have great feelings of inadequacy? Yes, your inferiority feelings are, ironically, the result of your godlike demands.

Better yet, channel your grandiosity well. See here:

> Antifragile Grandiosity: How 'Humble Grandiosity' Makes You Powerful

- Watch out for feeling too good about your results: it's a trap

This is something I've stressed a few times on ThePowerMoves, as well as on this website's self-help book "Ultimate Power", and Ellis describes the same concept very eloquently:

> If you do feel like a noble, superhuman, holier-than-thou person, you are then, according to REBT, experiencing an unhealthy positive feeling. For you are then in a grandiose, egotistical state and have raised yourself above other human beings. You have jumped from the idea that "My behavior is outstanding" to "I am therefore an outstanding, great person!"

More Wisdom

- Conventional insight and psychoanalysis rarely help

Say Ellis:

> Conventional insight will help you very little. For it says that your knowledge of exactly how you got disturbed will make you less neurotic. Drivel! It will often help make you become nuttier!

Ellis says that insights about your past might help, if you use it correctly. But that much psychoanalysis is unscientific and that does not necessarily help. In the end, it's still about you. How you reacted to your past events or parents, how you thought about them, and how you're still thinking about them.
Says Ellis:

> (…) For even if you did take your self-hating idea from your parents, we still had better ask: Why did you > accept these ideas? What are you now doing to carry them on? How do we know that if your parents taught you to always accept yourself, you still wouldn't have concluded that you must make a million dollars to be worthwhile?

And more:

> If, for example, you truly think you have to win your father's love and that you can only do so by making a million dollars, how does that knowledge make you surrender your dire need for his approval? To change, you still would have to dispute that idea and to act against it. And psychoanalysis helps you do nothing like this—and encourages you (and your analyst) to keep looking for more brilliant "true" interpretations.

LOL, I love this guy.

Plus, often, it's either useless or wrong.

QUOTES

On acting VS being:

> "How, then, do I become an incompetent or bad person?"
> "You don't! When you do incompetent or evil acts, you become a person who acted badly—never a bad person."

This is the famous experiment of Ellis forcing himself to talk to random women:

> Although very fearful and uncomfortable, I forced myself to carry out this assignment—made myself open a conversation with over one hundred women in a single month.
> I received no direct reward from these pick-ups—since only one of these one hundred females made a date with me and she never showed up!—but I completely overcame my fear of encountering strange women and have been able to talk to them easily ever since. For by getting rejected so many times, I saw that nothing dreadful happened.

CONS

Maybe the only small -very small- con:

- Could be more optimistic

Maybe Ellis is sometimes not optimistic enough about life in general.
For example, he says:

> Life, as we say in REBT, is frequently spelled H-A-S-S-L-E. A good deal of it, with thought and effort, you can greatly improve. Not all! Not completely!

And:

> Tough. But not awful, not horrible, not terrible. Just tough.

Who says that it's tough?
I'm pretty sure that there are countless of people who don't think their life is one bit tough, but that's instead a walk in the park -and a fun walk in the park-.

Why not being one of those people?

The Logic of Political Survival: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 9 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Logic of Political Survival (2003) introduces and explains the selectorate theory of politics, providing a framework to analyze the power dynamics of politics, wealth distribution, leadership, and the true Machiavellian thinking that governs politics.

Overview

- It's not so much about good or bad leaders, it's about incentives and aligned -or misaligned- incentives
- The well-being of the population increases when the leader needs them -and their vote- to stay in power (usually happens in large-suffrages and democracies)
- Democracies with universal suffrages are generally the best system to ensure widespread well-being

Notes

About The Authors:
Bruce Bueno de Mesquita is a Professor of Politics at the New York University.
He is also the author of "The Dictator's Handbook", which is the popular and more marketing-friendly version of "The Logic of Political Survival".

Politics Is All About Staying in Power

Character plays a small role in de Mesquita's framework.

On the difference between rich and well-governed democracies and badly-run autocracies, he says:

> Good fortune, serendipity, or the "right" political culture may be the reason that some societies are ruled by civic-minded leaders and others by ogres.
> Surely some people are more civic-minded than others.
> Perhaps democracies have the good fortune of having a disproportionate share of the world's civic-minded leaders or of honest citizens. A pleasant thought but almost certainly false.

And then:

> The differences in the performance of political leaders can be explained without any appeal to civic-mindedness or national character or culture.

Instead, all leaders want is to remain in power.

Says Bruce Bueno de Mesquita:

> leaders are interested in enhancing their own welfare and so seek to produce what their supporters want.

> The phrase “their supporters,” however, is not shorthand for the citizens of the state. The behavior of leaders arises from their own self-interest in holding their positions. If that coincides with or is compatible with the welfare of the citizenry, many will benefit. If the welfare of a leader and the welfare of the society are at odds—and our theory and data will indicate that they often are—it is more likely to go well for the leader than for society.

This is the central thesis of the book.
And, as far as I am concerned, the authors proved that thesis -and, on top of the numbers, it also well aligns with people’s psychology and drives, so I take it for good-.

The Three Puzzles of Politics

De Mesquita opens the book with three “open puzzles” that conventional political science does not answer.

They are:

1. Autocrats outliving democrats: Why do autocrats last in office about twice as long as do democrats, even while delivering poorer governance and living conditions?
2. Why universal suffrages and election in autocracies: Why would any authoritarian state adopt universal adult suffrage as part of its political system? What value could leaders, elites, and ordinary citizens derive from rigged elections that everyone recognized as meaningless?
3. How does democracy even emerge: How does democracy emerge? Is there a path to it, and could there be a path back to autocracy or monarchy?

The Players of Political Power Dynamics

The groups are:

- Disenfranchised, or the people without citizenship and/or no voting rights have little say in political power dynamics (unless they join a revolution).
- Selectorate: the set of people with a say in choosing leaders -at least nominally- and with a prospect (very small in autocracies, up to 50% in democracies) of gaining access to the winning coalition (which can entail special privileges doled out by leaders).
  Politics appears to be evolving so that the selectorate, roughly the citizenry, gradually expands to take in more and more members, thereby reducing the size of the disenfranchised group.
- Winning coalition: the subgroup of the selectorate who maintains incumbents in office and in exchange receives special privileges. If enough members of the winning coalition defect to a rival politician, the incumbent loses office.
- Leadership / incumbent: The smallest set of individuals is the leadership, which makes decisions about gathering and allocating resources.
  The leadership can also be a small group of people, and not necessarily a single individual.
- Challenger: prospective substitute leaders. They want the power and leadership, and seek to persuade the winning coalition to switch to them. The inability of the challenger to guarantee that the prospective defectors will always be members of his winning coalition is a substantial advantage for the incumbent leader.

Selectorate Theory

The selectorate theory focuses mainly on two groups when we look at politics from the leaders' perspective: selectorate, and winning coalition.

Say the authors:

> We believe, however, that the infinite variety of real-world institutional arrangements can be distilled into just two critical dimensions: the selectorate and the winning coalition.

Selectorate is defined as:

> The set of people whose endowments include the qualities or characteristics institutionally required to choose the government's leadership and necessary for gaining access to private benefits doled out by the government's leadership.

And winning coalition is defined as:

> A subset of the selectorate of sufficient size such that the subset's support endows the leadership with political power over the remainder of the selectorate as well as over the disenfranchised members of the society.

Affinity

> Affinity is the idea that there are bonds between leaders and followers that both can use to anticipate each other's future loyalty.

In the selectorate model, affinity is simply a preference for one individual over another.
It might be due to the nature of personal preferences, bloodlines, ethnic belonging, political affiliations, etc.

Affinities are important, however, in a model based on self-interest, affinities take a second stage to public and private goods in the decisions of leaders, challengers, or members of the selectorate.

My Note: affinities can take center stage in some cases
This is also another mostly true, yet not always true generalization. In some cases, like in revolutions driven by idelogies, affinities can take center stage -at least until when the revolution is accomplished, then it's back to normal business-.

Why Autocrats Survive Longer

In the beginning, being an autocracy is more dangerous.

But past a few years, autocrats last longer than democrats.

Why so?

Explain the authors (redacted for brevity):

> Leaders in small-coalition systems have a greater incumbency advantage than their large-coalition counterparts, especially if there is a large selectorate.
> Political survival for leaders in large-coalition systems depends on the provision of public goods, and he is readily deposed by a challenger offering better public policies.
> For leaders in small-coalition systems, survival depends on their ability to credibly promise access to future private goods.
> This ability grows as a leader's tenure increases. Therefore, while it is initially difficult for small-coalition leaders to survive, it becomes easier the longer they remain in office

Why Large Suffrages Bring Prosperity: All About Incentives

Remember that:

> Those who are neither the leader nor members of the winning coalition derive benefits only to the extent that the government provides public goods. They enjoy none of the private benefits that coalition members get.

Leaders make three related sets of decisions:

1. They choose a tax rate
2. They spend the revenue raised in a manner designed to help keep them in office (particularly by sustaining support among members of their winning coalition)
3. They provide various mixes of public (for everyone's consumption and well-being) and private goods (distributed only to members of the winning coalition)

Keep in mind that leaders want to reward those who keep them in power and don't care nearly as much about anyone else.
When the people who keep the leader in power (winning coalition) increase, the size of the private goods gets diluted. And once the size of the winning coalition reaches a critical mass, leaders are expected to shift their effort from the provision of private goods, to public goods that benefit all in society.

So large suffrages by choosing and keeping the leader in power "force" leaders to take care of a large swath of the population, decreasing private goods and corruption, and increasing general well-being.

Why Autocracies/Monarchies Becoming Democracies Are Stable

Democracies tend to be stable because the only incentive to go back to autocracy is on the leader's side.

For the leadership and winning coalition, it's a risk to abandon democracy (and a large winning coalition).
How can they be sure they will be welcome in the autocrat's winning coalition, and not booted out or killed?
Furthermore, they already have a good life in a democracy, since democracies tend to afford good standards of living, so the risks of helping a democratic leader become an autocrat are too big.

And of course, the electorate and the general population always prefer democracy to autocracy.

So once a critical mass is reached for winning coalition's size, the tendency for the winning coalition is to push to make that winning coalition larger, not smaller. And once a large coalition is established, it's difficult to ever go back.

Large Selectorates With Small Winning Coalitions Empower Leaders

Remember that:

Coalition members, those who get the most power and private benefits, are drawn from a larger pool of "eligibles" called the selectorate.

Coalition members always want to remain in the winning coalition because that means lots of power and private goods for them.

They can be tempted though to switch to a challenger to the leader if he offers more power or private goods.
But switching is always.
However, how big that risk is depends largely on the size of the selectorate.

Says de Mesquita:

> The larger the selectorate relative to the winning coalition, the smaller the chance that a given member of the > current leader's coalition will be included in the challenger's new winning coalition and so continue to receive private benefits.

This explains the existence of rigged election: it increases the size of the selectorate, which makes the winning coalition more fearful of being booted out, and thus more submisssive, compliant, and loyal to the leader.

Says de Mesquita:

> In political systems characterized by small winning coalitions and large selectorates—as is common in many rigged-election autocracies—supporters of the leader are particularly loyal because the risk and cost of exclusion if the challenger comes to power are high.

Rigged elections are a leader's power move.

And the opposite is true:

> Conversely, in political systems characterized by large coalitions and large selectorates—as is common in many democracies—supporters of the leader have weak bonds of special privileges and so are more willing to defect.

And that's why democratic leaders don't last long.

The Incentives of War

Democratic states wage fewer wars.

Evidence suggests a few tendencies:

1. Tendency for democracies not to fight with one another
2. Tendency a tendency for democracies to fight with nondemocracies with considerable regularity
3. Tendency for democracies to emerge victorious from their wars
4. Tendency to use more peaceful conflict-management processes when democracies fight each other
5. Tendency for democracies to experience fewer battle deaths and fight shorter wars when they initiate conflict
6. Tendency for transitional democracies to be more likely than democracies to fight one another
7. Tendency for major-power democracies to be more constrained to avoid war than less powerful democracies.

Is it because democracies are naturally more "good" and virtuous?
Not really, says de Mesquita.

It's because democratic leaders who must be voted and elected face higher risk in war, so they tend to avoid them. They prefer a peace settlement, even if it's not ideal, rather than risking a war.

They do pick wars though against easy to beat opponents, since the risks are lower.
And democratic leaders pour far more resources in war efforts because they have to win in order to survive.

Autocrats instead can afford to lose a war and still remain in power. That's why they have more light-hearted approach towards war.

The Arabian Nights: When Leaders Depends on Few People, Oppression & Kleptocracy Are The Norm

I quote a whole passage as an example of real-life application of selectorate theory:

The vast Umayyad and Abbasid dynasties of the caliphate, which stretched from Spain through North Africa and much of the Middle East, were the epitome of a small-W, large-S system.

Their political structure and operations appear to have been designed to redistribute wealth from the poor to the rich through taxation.

It was a system in which kleptocracy was an essential characteristic of rule.

Effectively, the selectorate in the caliphate dynasties were the Arab nomads, whose number varied from 100,000-200,000 at the time of Muhammad's initial conquest to several million in later dynasties.

To attain and keep office, the caliphs required support from two groups. The first group consisted of the leading provincial governors, senior administrators, and senior generals. Given the pool of at least several hundred thousand potential supporters, the caliphs rarely had problems filling such positions.
In addition to relying on these secular supporters, the caliphs depended on a religious group, the Ulema, for their legitimacy.

Unlike its contemporary Byzantine rival, the Islamic religious organization was decentralized, and while the caliphs needed approval by a proportion of the Ulema, they were free to pick supporters from within the Ulema.

Competition within the Ulema to join the coalition meant caliphs never had problems attaining the requisite religious endorsement.

In contrast, to be crowned Basileus in Constantinople required the support of the head of the Orthodox church. While both Byzantium and the caliphate were small-coalition systems, this difference in selectorate size—that is, between needing the support of the religious leader in one case, and needing the support of a religious leader in the other—profoundly altered the functioning of these polities.

The larger selectorate in the caliphate led both to a lower turnover of leaders and to a greater number of rebellions in the caliphate as compared to Byzantium (see Finer's comparison of the stability of the two systems on pp. 702-704).
The kleptocratic ability of the caliphate was truly staggering.
Finer (1997, 724) reports central government revenues for 918-919 as 15.5 million dinars, of which a colossal 10.5 million was spent on the caliph's household.

It appears the luxurious excesses of the Arabian Nights were no exaggeration (Mather 1947). While it is hard to scale the value of 15.5 million dinars, it must have been a massive amount given the sheer size of the empire and the extraordinarily high taxes imposed.
Truly, the caliphate epitomized the high-taxation, high-kleptocracy approach indicative of a small-coalition, large-selectorate political system.

More Wisdom

- Hobbes was wrong, Machiavelli was right: Hobbes's confidence in monarchy was mistaken and Machiavelli's, author of "The Prince", was right: a republic is best for promoting freedom and institutional stability is correct
- Democratic leaders must be careful with force: "leaders with large winning coalitions must be careful about using force. All leaders face a higher risk of removal when they use force, but the added risk is much greater for leaders with large winning coalitions."

Quotes

On the necessity for a political apparatus:

> Make no mistake about it, no leader rules alone. Even the most oppressive dictators cannot survive the loss of support among their core constituents.

On promises VS realities once in power:

> Innumerable other revolutionary leaders promise democracy, freedom, and equality. They offer peace and prosperity, but they all too often deliver corruption, poverty, and despair.

Zorro is fantasy only:

> Terrorism and revolution make little sense for coalition members. After all, the current arrangement is giving them access to private benefits. Zorro or the Scarlet Pimpernel are the fancies of fiction and rarely a reality of politics.

On the disenfranchised:

> They have comprised the vast majority of people throughout human history. They often are the cannon fodder of revolutions and wars.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's Analysis

- Looking at politics through the lens of complete individual's rationality is a reduction of complexity ("homo economicus")

The selectorate theory posits rational players who seek to maximize their interests.

While that's often largely true and it applies very well to large systems and to the most disparate situations, the "homo economicus" is also a simplification of reality.

Also see "Misbehaving" by Richard Thaler, which is the story of how psychology improved on the economical models based on perfect individuals' rationality.

- Based on the premise that everyone wants to remain in power for power's sake

This is not really a "con", but more of a "limitation" of the approach.

And I'm pretty sure that power-hungry premise is valid the vast majority of times.
However, I can imagine there are some exceptions of leaders who were called upon to serve, but really just wanted to live a simpler life.

Those exceptional cases are not addressed in "The Logic of Political Survival", albeit the author themselves are aware of this limitation, plus also provide a great reason as to why those are very rare exceptions:

> We have no doubt that many people value other things above political survival. It is just that such people are not likely to find themselves in high office and so need not overly occupy our interest.

And they're largely right.

- Some examples felt a bit forced

The authors say that Leopold, being a good king at home and a ruthless dictator in Cong proves that it's selectorate incentives that drives the leader's behavior.

Yet, they never consider that Leopold might have cared more about Belgians than distant Africans.
Or that he might have felt a responsibility as a king of a Belgium for his subjects but not as an owner of a foreign land.

Same as for the Rome and Carthage example, with Rome supposedly fighting harder than Carthage in Italy because of its political structure.

But that fails to take into account that Rome was fighting at home, and fighting for its life, while Carthage was managing an expedition in a faraway land.
Naturally the foreign expedition was lower priority for Carthage's political leaders.

- Jumping to conclusions on xenophobic movements?

Say the authors:

> These differences in immigration rules provide a partial explanation for the rise in right-wing xenophobic movements in Germany and France, but their relative absence in the United Kingdom and United States.

Trump's election and the wall seem to prove that it's not true that xenophobic movements are absent from the US. Albeit he might be right circa the extent of those movements, or about their roots.

- Better editing would help

Some concepts repeat over and over, and the book could have been much shorter, and delivered all its enlightening wisdom in a smaller package.

The "three puzzles" in the opening chapter weren't also very clear, since beneath each were nested several different questions and topics.

- The "She" dictator

Man, talking about "political correctness".

The authors do such a wonderful job to explain the true nature of power, and human nature and rip apart all the politically correct BS that some democratic leaders share.
And then, in the same book… Fall for this modern political correctness thing of using the pronoun "she" and "her" at every single sentence.

Now, quick: how many female dictators can you name?

Exactly…

Review

Thoroughly well researched and deeply instructive, "The Logic of Political Survival" is a must-read to understand politics, as well as human psychology and general power dynamics.

Summary

About the Author:
Dr. Harriet Braiker was a social and clinical psychologist.
She holds a Ph.D., albeit I didn't find precisely on what.
Braiker first wrote about the "Type-E women" (with "E" standing for "everything to everybody"), and which is the female corresponding to "Tye-A men".
She also focused on relationships and toxic relationships, and with "Who's Pulling Your Strings" she became regarded as an expert on manipulation and controlling people. Braiker also wrote "The Disease to Please", another great book.

Introduction: This Is Not For Physical Abuse

Says Braker:

> Who's Pulling Your Strings? is about emotional or psychological manipulation.
> It is not intended to apply to relationships in which physical violence—or the threat of physical violence—is used as a means of control.

I wouldn't personally be so black-and-white about it.
There is often an overlap between the two, but I agree with her general stance: physical battering should mean ending the relationship right away, and only later maybe considering the manipulation that was also going on.

It Takes 2 People For a Manipulative Relationship

The author states that the "victim" of manipulation is also allowing the manipulation to happen.

And that's great news, because it means that you are also empowered to change -or stop- that relationship.
Say the author:

> When you stop rewarding manipulative tactics by ceasing to cooperate, comply, please, acquiesce, apologize, or respond to intimidation or threats, you will unilaterally alter the nature of the manipulative relationship.

The 7 Buttons Manipulators Leverage: Keep An Eye On These

Braiker says that manipulators seize their victims up based on buttons that "show" whenever you dealing with others.

Manipulators prefer to pick people with big buttons, and they can then use those buttons to control them.

1. Disease to Please

when your self-esteem is tied up to how much you do for others and how successful you are at pleasing them

2. Addiction to Earning the Approval and Acceptance of Others in includes the need to:

1. avoid criticism
2. rejection
3. abandonment

At the core of the niceness are dread and fear of rejection and abandonment.

Keep in mind that wanting to be liked and accepted is perfectly normal. It's when it's too much, and when it's acceptance from anyone, that it becomes an issue.

Your behavior is as easy to control when you're addicted to approval. All a manipulator need do is a two-step process: Give you his approval and acceptance (make you earn it), and then, once you are hooked, threaten to take it away.

Says the author:

> The button that will show most clearly to manipulators is your willingness to do nearly anything to avoid disapproval, rejection, and worst of all, abandonment. In love relationships or romantic entanglements that become manipulative, fear of abandonment is the ultimate lever of control.

Also read this article on "judge social power", since the author is talking about giving others judge powers over you:

> The Judge Role: A Tool For Power & Control

3. “Emotophobia”—Fear of Negative Emotions

We can define “emotophobia” as:

> An excessive or irrational fear of conflict and confrontation, as well as of negative feelings, specifically, anger, aggression, hostility.

If this is you, it means that, you will go to almost any lengths to avoid anger, conflict, and confrontation.

A manipulator can control you with as little as raising one’s own voice, or hinting that he is getting angry.
And you will be likely to comply or submit just to avoid confrontation, anger, or any negative emotions.

4. Lack of Assertiveness and Inability to Say No

This is a reality of life:

> If you have difficulties saying no, then you will always be victim of some hard-charging, high-powered individual who is going to tell you what you do.

Says Braiker:

> If you are like most people-pleasers, your aversion to saying no is probably grounded in the negative angry responses that you anticipate your denial might elicit.

Learn how to say no here:

> 5 Techniques to Say No (Polite, But Effective)

5. Blurry Sense of Identity (“The Vanishing Self”)

Here is how Braiker describes it:

> People with “vanishing selves” have only a blurry sense of their own identity, where they begin and end, whose needs they feel and fill, and what values are central to their core.

And when you’re not sure where you stand, for what you stand, you are also easier to be pushed around or recruited for whatever “cause” the manipulator cares the most -often his “cause” is a screen for his own self-interest, of course-.

It can be both a cause and a consequence of manipulation.

6. Low Self-Reliance

Braiker says:

> Low self-reliance means that you distrust your own judgment and reactions, resulting in an impairment of your self-direction.

And if you distrust your judgment, you are more likely to listen and trust others, as well as to cede leadership and decision-making about your life.

It's related to N.5 and often overlap.
To address it, Braiker says:

> Improving your decision-making ability and particularly your skills at resolving postdecisional regret—also known as buyer's remorse—will go a long way toward increasing self-reliance.

In Power University we help you address the root causes of low self-reliance.

7. External Locus of Control (LOC)

The locus of control refers to how much people feel in control of their lives.

An internal locus of control means that people feel they are in control of their lives and can shape the events in their environment.

An external locus of control means that people feel at the mercy of the world around them.

People with an external locus of control are more likely to let external events and other people control them, and they are more likely to fall prey to "learned helplessness" (Seligman, 1991), such as the belief that no matter what they do events will not change. When that happens, they are less likely to "rebel" to a manipulator.

Manipulators' Motives

Manipulative Motives Manipulators operate out of three principal interpersonal motives:

1. Self-interest: to advance their own purposes and their own personal gain at virtually any cost to others. Manipulators are self-serving by disposition, even if they say otherwise
2. Power craving: the need to attain feelings of power and superiority in relationships with other people. Control over others serves as an acknowledgment of personal efficacy and validation. The victim's compliance is the ultimate prof
3. Need for control: some manipulators want and need to feel in control for mental health purposes.
   Feeling out of control or losing control is anxiety-provoking. Some manipulators want to be seen -and see themselves- as in control of their emotions, especially emotions that they associate with weakness, such as anxiety, sadness, or loneliness.
   While these manipulators have a strong or pathologic need to control others, they generally struggle with control issues in their own lives. Their need to maintain control is frequently manifested by a need to "be right" and to make others "wrong."

Manipulators who need control sometimes have high anxiety

Says the author:

> Manipulative people frequently suffer from feelings of high anxiety when their control is threatened. Since they cannot easily or gracefully cede control to others, they will tend to micromanage in business situations.

These manipulators tend to dislike ambiguity. Grey areas make them nervous, and prefer to think in black-and-white terms.

Manipulators' Mindsets

This part was really good:

- You either play or get played: it's a zero-sum world of dog-eat-dog. You either play, or get played
- There is no win-win: in a zero-sum world full of nasty people, there cannot be win-win
- Relationships between equals do not exist: it's either one wins, or lose. So they want to make sure their partner loses
- You cannot trust others: since everyone is out to play you, manipulators obviously cannot trust others. They also don't see themselves as trustworthy

For some manipulators, these also apply:

- Others exist to meet their needs:
- Sense of entitlement: others should exist to meet their needs

This makes relationships with manipulators difficult and sometimes impossible, since, says the author:

> In cooperation and trust lies the context for mutual respect and healthy interdependence—the blend of autonomy and interdependence that makes intimacy, high self-esteem, strong sense of self, and solid self-reliance possible.

Manipulators Create Their Dog-Eat-Dog World (Game Theory Experiments)

This part was really good.

Since the manipulator cannot see how someone could be giving or cooperative, they approach all situations that require choosing between trust/cooperation and distrust/competition with the latter strategy.

But in repeated games, which in real life are the equivalent of relationships, that mindset creates a world of lose-lose.

Let me repeat it because this is crucial:

The manipulator's mindset of defection creates his own world of lose-lose.

Here is how it's experimentally tested.
Take this variation of the prisoner's dilemma:

		Al
		Cooperate	Compete
Bob	Cooperate	$10, $10	$0, $20
	Compete	$20, $0	$1, $1

- Win-win: when they both cooperate, they both get $10
- Win-lose: when one cooperates and the other defects, the defector gets $20 and the other gets nothing (cheating)
- Lose-lose: when they both defect, they both get $1

The cheater "wins big" the first time.
But as soon as the game is repeated, the collaborator will most likely adjust his strategy to defect as well -it would probably take 2 rounds top for any rational collaborator to adjust his strategy-.
And then the game turns into a lose-lose for both. If you run this game for 3-4 times or more the defector strategy is a losing one.

In any long-term game, collaboration maximizes gains, but the cheater misses out on the gains because of his mindset.

Post-interviews confirm the two different mindsets.
Cooperators who played against defectors may say that "it is just like life: There are all different sorts of people".

The manipulator instead uses the reality of his own making to justify his own strategy and life approach.

Says the author:

> Their life experience will wind up confirming their belief system, although they typically do not understand how their own distrusting behavior creates distrust, competition, and rivalry in others.

And this bit, which is crucial to this website's philosophy (redacted for brevity):

> This mindset can affect and poison an interpersonal relationship. Trusting people who allow for the possibility that others can, on occasion, behave altruistically and/or generously (…) because it is rational and adaptive will be open to the possibility of trusting relationships.
> If you approach the world with an open but realistic attitude that allows for both kinds of people your experiences will mirror your expectations. You likely will meet both kinds of people and have the opportunity to form relationships in which mutual trust and cooperation exist and are cherished by both participants.

Enlightened Cooperator Is The Way To Go

The author calls it "realistic cooperator".

This website calls it "smart collaborator" and takes it one step further with "enlightened cooperator".
In any case, the gist is the same and she hits the nail on the head when she says:

> However, the realistic cooperator also knows that competitive manipulators exist in the world; when the competitive opponent is met, the cooperator can adjust and adapt his or her behavior accordingly. You do not have to reward manipulators by allowing their exploitative behavior and tactics to work.

Read more about "enlightened collaboration":

> Life Strategy: The Enlightened Collaborator

Manipulators Are Zero-Sum Game Folks

To expand on the previous paragraph:

> The manipulator views power as finite.
> There is not enough power to go around for her to share or to acknowledge and respect your right to be empowered to make decisions and to attain control in your own life. If you are empowered to any degree, this represents less power for her. The manipulator views power as a zero-sum game.

And:

> There is no room in the manipulator's model of human relationships for a win-win scenario where power is shared or where everyone comes out gaining or benefiting from a given interaction.

Manipulators' Excuses

There are countless "fronts" manipulators use to cover their real goals.

Some of them are:

- Love and caring: "I'm doing this out of care/love for you."
- Expertise: "I'm telling you this because I've had way more experience in these matters, and I know better."
- Altruism and generosity: "I'm doing this for your own good, even though it doesn't benefit me."
- Role endowment: "I'm telling you what to do because that is my role/obligation."

Manipulators' Personalities

- Machiavellian: they buy into Machiavelli's proposition that a desired end justifies virtually any means. In game theory experiments they are opportunistic, capitalizing on ambiguity regarding the rules
  - manipulative
  - charming
  - confident
  - glib
  - calculating
  - cynic about human nature
  - shred in their social strategies
- Narcissists: expect special treatment without assuming reciprocal responsibilities in turn (ie.: in the social exchange he takes without giving)
  - entitled
- Borderline personality disorder: uses silent treatment, rage, and threats -including breakup threats– also see "Sop Walking on Eggshells" and "I Hate You Don't Leave Me"
- Dependent personality disorder: they indirectly manipulate others to assume responsibilities for them. Men tend to use demands, while women tend to use submissiveness and feigned ineptitude. Also read "Codependent No More"
- Histrionic personality disorder: the drama queens and kings, they manipulate to get more attention. They can be both manipulated and manipulators, and often resort to sexuality and seduction to manipulate. They can resort to emotional explosions, and frequently cry rape
- Passive-aggressive personalities: passive resistance like procrastination, intentional inefficiency, and feet dragging. They will never say "no" to their bosses, but will always complain behind the boss' back
- Type A angry personality: highly competitive, and obsessed with quantitative measures of success. They are often very concerned in maintaining control over their environment. They tend to manipulate with more aggressive tactics, and sometimes evoke "avoidance strategies" in others

- Addictive personality: lies, denies, and wreaks havoc in people's lives. Can become extremely needy
- Con or antisocial personality disorder: my note: it seems like the author here ends up discussing psychopath's controlling strategies and personality, but APD and psychopathy are not the same

Braiker does not list this manipulator's profile, but from what she says in a different part of the book:

- The manipulator who got burned: he has been the victim of manipulation, and vows to never be a victim ever again. So now he/she turned in manipulators.

My Note: that's the profile of lots of red pill guys.

The 2 Types of Manipulators: Conscious & Unconscious

This is an important distinction -and a FAQ when it comes to manipulation-:

Are manipulators consciously manipulating others?

Says the author:

> Do Manipulators Understand Their Own Motives? Not necessarily. Manipulators generally can be categorized into two groups: those who are aware and conscious of their manipulative motives and goals and those who remain largely unconscious or unaware of the manipulative methods they employ in their relationships with others.

This is an important distinction, because:

Can Manipulator Change? Maybe If They're Unconscious. But Not Conscious Ones

If you show unconscious manipulators what they are actually doing, that might work as a "wake up call" for them, and might lead them to stop.

Says the author:

> When an ego-incongruent manipulator is confronted with exposure of his manipulation, there may be enough inner conflict generated to help motivate change.

On this website, we defined this method "collaborative shaming".
But that only works with manipulators who have some conscience, empathy, personal values, and/or a drive to self-improve.

Manipulators who are self-aware instead are "ego-congruent". Such as, their manipulation fits what they consciously think of themselves.
On this website, we define the worst type of this category of people as the "proud value-takers". Such as, they are proud of taking from others.

These manipulators either don't experience any turmoils when faced with the reality of their manipulative ways, or they are even happy for their manipulative ways.

How Manipulation Works

Braiker says that manipulation, at the core, is simple.

And it acts by activating one or both of the two main levers of human drive:

- Gain (or reward)
- Loss (or avoidance)

And the formula of manipulation, at its basic, is:

> If you do what I want, I will reward you with [whatever the promised gain is]," or "If you don't do as I ask, you won't get what you want and need

Of course, the formula is rarely if ever explicit, and both the promise or the threat can be veiled or implied.

Some of the gains or rewards include:

- Money / material gifts
- Power
- Status (ie.., titles, promotions, admission to a club)
- Sex, love
- Approval, acceptance, or praise

And some of the threats that the victims come to fear:

- Rejection or abandonment
- Withdrawal of affection or love
- Failure
- Exposure (secrets, inadequacies or flaws)
- Conflict or anger

She says:

> All manipulative relationships depend on certain levers of control that are used to hold out the promise of gain or the fear of loss or the means to avoid something that is undesirable.

The author says that manipulation often moves from offering something that the victim wants, to then threatening to take that something away once the victim is more invested and hooked.
It's when the manipulation switches from offering something to the threat of loss that the manipulation becomes coercive.

Methods of Manipulation

Braiker groups all possible manipulative strategies into five major groupings:

1. Positive reinforcement: providing a reward for the behavior you want to promote and expand. This is particularly effective with people-pleasers, but by itself positive reinforcement is NOT manipulative. But manipulators start with positive reinforcement usually, and either make it more elusive, or then "move up the ladder of manipulation"
    1. The positive reward becomes more elusive: the manipulator holds out the promise for gain, but either doesn't deliver it, or delivers it more rarely. Now a shift happens: the victim is motivated by fear of loss, or fear of the gain never materializing (Note: this step is not added by Braiker, but by me)
2. Negative reinforcement (or "averse conditioning"): it's not punishment like people misunderstand (which is also not very effective). It's the "avoidance of pain when a certain behavior stops". Negative reinforcement starts before the victim complies, and stops with the compliance.
    It includes:

   1. Nagging (see "female relationship control techniques")
   2. Silent treatment
   3. Pouting
   4. Emotional distance as punishment
3. Intermittent or partial reinforcement (or: "gambling schedule"): partial or intermittent schedules of rewards lead to addiction, while random and unpredictable pain creates stress and anxiety
4. Punishment: negative experience is a direct consequence of undesired behavior on the part of the subject. The message is "if you do something I don't like, you will be punished". It's less effective than positive or negative reinforcement
5. Traumatic one-trial learning: to deliver such an over the top response, that the victim will be afraid of triggering the ire of the manipulator ever again

One last technique Braiker adds is the "big lie", such as the promise of a big gain -which never materializes", or avoidance of a big loss -which the manipulator might not have been able to deliver-.
In relationships with a psychopath, the "love" of the psychopath is the big lie.

Basic Rules For Dealing With Manipulation

Some of the basic "laws of manipulation", sometimes reworded by me for simplicity:

- You cannot and will not out-manipulate a skilled manipulator; do not even try (unless you're training on ThePowerMoves, then you're in with a chance :)
- You will hardly change a manipulator by pointing out his or her flaws (my note: Braiker says "will not and cannot", but she herself said that rarely it's possible, and you know I hate sweeping generalizations :)
- Do not bother telling a manipulator that she is not being fair or kind or loving: most manipulators are low in conscience and empathy anyway
- You cannot appeal to a manipulator's empathy with your feelings: with manipulators who are low on empathy your "you know how it makes me feel when you…" won't go far
- Always pay attention to what the manipulator does, not what he or she says
- Don't ask "why", their answers only add more manipulations. Ask strategically to get truthful replies: do not inquire why he or she is behaving in a particular way and expect to get a valid, useful, or truthful answer
- The best change is changing yourself: the only effective way to change a manipulator is to make her tactics ineffective by changing yourself

How To Break Free From Manipulation

In Power University we provide deeper and more advanced solutions.

But to give you an idea based on Braiker's approach:

1. Play for time: especially useful with pushy manipulators. If it's on the phone, put them on hold if you need some time. When you stop acting on the manipulator's time schedule, you take power back (also read "letting people wait")
2. Broken record: tell them you need to think about it, and keep repeating it. If they insist, you tell them that you heard them, and that you still need time
3. Desensitize your feelings: train yourself to be under the same type of pressure the manipulator puts you in, but to remain unreactive ("detachment")
4. Label the manipulation: tell the manipulator what they are doing ("going meta")
5. Tell them they're done manipulating you: tell them that what they were doing no longer works with you
6. Set your terms: tell them that from now on, you will be doing things the way you also like them. If it's a relationship, tell them how you want to be treated
7. Compromise and negotiate: come to an agreement on how to go forward

And, more on a mindset level:

1. Think of yourself as a former victim
2. Label your current feelings, as feelings not facts: powerlessness, depression, helplessness and dependence are not who you are. They are transitory states, or simply feelings
3. Trust yourself: taking the first step can be hard. Especially after the manipulator lowered your self-esteem. Trust yourself you can do it

Finally, remember that there are two different approaches:

1. Resistance: resist and/or try to steer the relationship into healthier territory
2. Extraction: leave and cut out the manipulator

Influence VS Manipulation

Braiker differentiates between influence and manipulation.

She says that the difference "depends primarily on the motives and attitude of the influencer toward his or her target or mark and secondarily on the tactics".

The influencer recognizes and respects other people's rights and integrity, while the manipulator does not respect other people's rights, and seeks influence that is exploitative and that negatively affects the victims.

This is in opposition to Robert Greene, author of "The 48 Laws of Power", who says that "any attempt to influence is manipulation".

I believe there are more grey areas than obvious "yes or no" but, overall, I tend to agree with Braiker:

- Persuasion VS manipulation: find out the difference

> Persuasion vs. Manipulation: Understanding the Fine Line

Quotes

On manipulators and zero-sum games:

> Because manipulators see life as a zero-sum game, in almost every important dimension—which to a manipulator primarily comprises power, control, and superiority—the manipulator believes that there are winners and losers.

On the willingness of letting go of the relationship if needed:

> If you are not willing to lose the relationship—even when it means losing yourself in the process— then you are not ready to stop being a victim.

Learning manipulation to disable manipulation (manipulation like a magic trick):

> Manipulation, simply stated, is much like a magic trick. If you take the time to learn how manipulation works, it is less likely that you will be caught off guard when confronted with it because you will know what to look for. The mystery will be gone.

On nagging as a manipulative tool ("negative reinforcement" type):

> She does not tell him what a fine, good boy he is or rewards him. She merely stops yelling. Voilà! Negative reinforcement.
> Nagging is the human equivalent of shock grids to the rat.

A dark-humor quote:

> I know that my husband really loves me," a depressed wife who had been victimized by emotional abuse and manipulation for years once told me in a therapy session. "But I am just a constant disappointment to him."

And the most "The Power Moves" quote:

> If he/she is going to come around to a healthier, happier relationship, you will see it happen in response to your strength, not to your weakness.

Criticism

- Imperfect analysis of relationship dynamics: conflict-avoidance is not always the hallmark of a bad relationship

Braiker falls for a common misconception about "healthy couples and relationships":

> Conflict avoidance is not the hall-mark of a good relationship. On the contrary, it is a symptom of serious problems and of poor communication.

Albeit that's indeed common wisdom, sometimes common wisdom is wrong.
Famed relationship researcher Gottman says that the "risk-avoidant" relationship is one of the types of successful relationships (Gottman, 1994).

Of course, this does not mean that all conflict-avoidants are successful, but it means that it's possible, and that conflict avoidance is not necessarily the sign of “serious problems”.

- Imperfect analysis of “low self-esteem” (pop-psychology)

Say the author when talking about the “power craving” of manipulators:

> Paradoxically, this need springs from strong underlying—sometimes unconscious—feelings of inferiority and low self-esteem.

This is a widespread pop-psychology myth, but it’s not wholly.
In truth, as psychology researcher Roy Baumeister explains, most people who fit the psychology profile of victimization are high BUT fragile self-esteem (Baumeister, 1997), which is different than low self-esteem.

- Sometimes I disagreed on what’s manipulation

The author says that a boss telling an employee that not putting in overtime means no chance for promotion is a form of manipulation.

To me, that might be manipulative, but can also simply be straight-up honesty.
What’s the alternative, not saying it and not allowing the new recruit the opportunity of choosing?

- Mis-represents Machiavelli

Says the author:

> Named after the sixteenth-century political philosopher and Italian Prince Machiavelli

Machiavelli was not a prince. He wrote “The Prince” to advise princes, but he wasn’t a prince.

PROS

- Great overview of interpersonal manipulation
- “How to book” with great defensive techniques: not just great analyses, but a great practical guide as well
- Great overview & analysis of the psychology of defectors & cheats (& why they often don’t maximize their own life’s effectiveness)

Review

Who’s Pulling Your Strings? provides a great overview of interpersonal manipulation and is a foundational book for this website’s mission and philosophy.

Outside of Power University which of course has the advantage of being larger, deeper, and a course with videos and multimedia learning, Who’s Pulling Your Strings? may provide the best overview on manipulation in book format.
And, the best compliment I can pay to the author, her teachings were extremely helpful to craft the Power University module on manipulation.

The ‘Smart Collaborator’: Giving For Win-Win, Without Being Exploited

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Most men are taught that giving and cooperation are moral virtues — and in many cases, they are.
But in real life, blind generosity gets exploited, and naive collaboration often results in victimization.

Some niche advice leans in the opposite direction, toward excessive cynicism: the belief that no one can be trusted for win-win.
This posture can feel safer in the short term, but it comes at the cost of missed opportunities, poorer relationships, and a chronically defensive orientation toward life.

The solution isn’t to stop giving, nor to retreat into cynicism.
It is to practice strategic giving: a power-aware form of collaboration that seeks win-win outcomes while actively managing leverage, incentives, and downside risk.

In this article, you’ll learn how high-value men give intelligently, protect their interests, and lead collaborations that create real mutual gain — never exploitation.

The Smart Collaborator™ is a TPM framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano.
It formalizes a third path between naive giving and over-cynicism: power-aware collaboration that creates win-win outcomes without surrendering leverage.

Cooperation evolved because it’s good for both. One man carries the tools, one the wood… And the stairs to the top develop twice as fast.

Cooperator Strategy & Mindset

> Win win is possible and mutually beneficial

The collaborator mindset starts from the assumption that win-win is possible in many repeated interactions and, when the conditions allow, it's often preferable.

When executed with power intelligence, this approach is highly effective, consistently delivering superior outcomes compared to naive giving or chronic defection.

Crucially, the collaborator mindset allows for win-win outcomes and predisposes you to look for it. And, when coupled with an honorable approach to life, it makes win-win the default preference.
This mindset increases the odds that you:

1. find more opportunities for win-win
2. enter more win-win exchanges and relationships
3. Maintain more win-win relationships

The final result?
More value created, more power, and more happiness.

Honorable Collaborator™ ⍰

The smart cooperator is an amoral strategy to maximize returns from cooperation. At times, amoral defection and cheating may pay off.
The honorable collaborator deliberately forgoes extra gains from cheating, approaching others with a preference for win-win and avoiding cheating even when it would be instrumentally advantageous.

Although exceptions always apply, this the baseline approach TPM generally recommends for men seeking long-term power, reputation, and life quality.

Benefits

Win-win tends to be superior for long-term relationships.
And it:

- Promotes and maintains reputation
- Supports self-esteem, at least for most non-psychopathic men
- Better relationships and social life
- Higher life quality when properly executed

But of course, it must be smart cooperation in order to work reliably.

Limitations

A cooperator mindset can never guarantee that win-win will follow.
That would be a 'naive cooperator' approach to life.

The naive cooperator overly trusts others and sets himself up for failure by trusting and cooperating with the wrong type of people, in the wrong contexts.

Even when win-win is possible, it doesn't necessarily mean you should enter it if you have better options. And it doesn't mean that win-lose wouldn't be better for you from an amoral point of view.

Defector Strategy & Mindset

> Win-win is not possible, people are untrustworthy, and they will cheat

The defector mindset is high in cynicism, and includes beliefs such as:

- Zero-sum world: for one to win, another has to lose ('fixed pie mindset' in negotiation literature)
- Dog-eat-dog world: you either play, or get played
- Homo cynicus: people at the core are dark, selfish, untrustworthy, and bad

Some cynics see themselves as untrustworthy and are proud of it. At TPM, we refer to this posture as proud value-taking.

Benefits

Cynics do get something right.
People are also selfish and self-interested. Life itself demands a healthy dose of self-centeredness, and the most successful players are also top competitors.

Even advancing in life without a direct competitor is still often a form of competition. You are competing against the average of other men or women, but it's a competition nonetheless.

Finally, a defector approach may allow for short-term gains, and protect against cheating with extra carefulness and avoidance.

However, as for most things, it's possible to overdo a cynical mindset and a competitive attitude.

Limitations

The main indictment against a zero-sum world is that the mere existence of cooperation proves that cooperation works, and that it can benefit even selfish individuals.

If it didn't work in at least some cases and for some people, it wouldn't have evolved. And if it evolved 'by mistake', it would have long disappeared.
It's still here because it works, even for selfish players.

Limitations are important, including:

- Missed opportunities for win-win
- Paranoia
- Poorer relationships
- Poor reputation in social circles
- Lower life quality and mental health

Game Theory Explains Defection Costs

In his seminal paper on social evolution, Trivers theorized how reciprocal altruism developed by benefiting all parties, and Axelrod formalized it with game-theoretic models of repeated cooperation.
Consider this variation of the prisoner's dilemma:

		Al
		Cooperate	Compete
Bob	Cooperate	$10, $10	$0, $20
	Compete	$20, $0	$1, $1

- Win-win: they both get $10
- Win-lose: the defector gets $20 and the cheated gets nothing
- Lose-lose: they both get $1

The cheater "wins big" the first time, if he plays against a cooperator.
That may work for one-off exchanges when and if revenge and reputation are not a factor.
But as soon as the game is repeated, the cheated collaborator likely adjusts his strategy, and the game turns into a lose-lose for both (Nash Equilibrium).
The defector loses to the cooperative one in just 3 exchanges.

And the more you run the game (repeated game), the bigger the opportunity loss.

In real life, repeated games are our relationships. Our friends, spouses, brothers, sisters, colleagues, neighbors, etc.
Meaning that the overly cynic loses misses healthy and win-win relationships.

While the game is simplistic, it offers a valid approximation of real-life exchanges (it has "high external validity").
Indeed, writes Colquhoun in The Cambridge Handbook of Evolutionary Perspectives:

> In the iterated prisoner's dilemma, we have a microcosm of real-life dilemmas that regularly occur in everyday > life – from whether we should offer people a lift, to tipping a waiter, to deciding whether or not to remain faithful to our romantic partner. Do we cooperate or do we defect? In most cases, it will be to our advantage in the long run to cooperate – so long as this is reciprocated, that is.

The first part of that last sentence is why we embrace cooperation here.
And the second part is why we caution it must be SMART, power-aware cooperation.

Each Mindset Confirms His Reality

As clinical psychologist Harriet Braiker notes referring to the similar 'manipulator attitude', both cooperators and defectors shape their own reality with their mindsets and behaviors.

In post-interviews, defectors who defected first confirm their cynical, win-lose mentality to justify staying a cynic, and maintaining their defector approach. Cynics create their own lose-lose world in an effect known as 'self-fulfilling prophecy'.

Cooperators who played against defectors instead shrug it off, saying that there are all different sorts of people. Cooperators walk away still open to future collaboration and win-win.

For a deeper analysis of "ultra-cynicism", read:

- Positive cynicism

> The Power of Effective Cynicism: Win in a World of Self-Interest While Remaining Optimistic & Honorable

The Appeal of Defectors' Cynicism

The popular literature on power is heavy on defection, predation, and cynicism (see "The 48 Laws of Power" as an example).

Elements of feminism and red pill ideology also tend to be cynical. By focusing primarily on areas of diverging and conflicting interests and defection strategies of the opposite sex, these frameworks can bias individuals toward cynical expectations.
With that mindset, win-win -and a healthy relationship- becomes unlikely.

Cynicism is appealing, in part, because of the contrast effect with naive self-help.
Politically correct self-help is so out of touch with reality that cynicism sounds more "real".

Unluckily, going from one extreme to another is rarely the best solution, which instead often requires nuance and calibration.

Smart Collaborator Approach

> Win-win is possible and preferable, but it must be carefully weighed, entered and maintained against the constant threat of defection

The smart collaborator knows that win-win is superior when available, but that win-win can be tenuous and under the constant threat of defection.
He is a power intelligent realist, knowing that even long-term win-wins can end abruptly. Still, since win-win is superior, he believes in searching for win-win as a default strategy.

The basis of smart collaboration is simple:

- Collaborate with collaborators because people differ
- Avoid cheats
- Increase the scope of cooperation
- Increase the costs of cheating
- Monitor the changing context because changing incentives can change cooperation/defection payoffs. Even established relationships can end abruptly when things sour, win-win payoff decreases, and an opportunity for defection offers large payoffs with little risks
- Cover your ass in case of sudden defection because few people are 100% honest or 100% cheats and most people are shades of grey who can turn either way.

This approach is sound and based proven power strategies.
And the power-aware collaborator views win-win as a probability to be engineered. Here are some tools:

1. Assess Characters

1. Test-giving: give freely, demand nothing back, act like you don't care. Then, keep an eye on who is grateful for your giving, who is not, and who just asks for more
2. Monitoring systems: the behavior when people believe nobody's watching is very telling (note: this is no legal advice, ensure it's legal in your jurisdiction)
3. Look dumber, see who takes advantage of it. People are also more careless around dumbness, so their manipulations are easier to spot

2. Increase Scope for Collaboration

Some of the techniques he deploys:

1. Collaborative foot forward: start high power, but warm
2. Make the pie larger by exploring mutual interests and opportunities, a negotiation concept (Ury and Fisher, 1981)
3. Focus on WIIFT as a general approach to value-giving leverage that incentivizes cooperation

4. Align interests. For example, pay contractors for projects instead of hours to incentivize effectiveness, and only add hours later if you need extra
5. Collaborative reframing: It can be as simple as saying "I value you and our collaboration" to signal your preference to remain cooperative. ▯ Real-life example
   1. Collaborative shaming as 'emotional punishment' when people play win-lose games. Best used when you have high authority ('judge') ▯ Example to handle 'dating shit-tests'
6. Cooperative frame cementing: or confirming and expanding the agreed win-win to strengthen it ▯Example and ▯'I'm glad we agree' technique
7. Stick with value-giving collaborators: When you find good people in your life, keep them! You found a treasure, cherish it.

2.2. Decrease The Scope For Destructive Competition: Gentleman Warrior Approach

You have two options in fights:

1. Antagonize & hate = turns an enemy into a bigger enemy
2. Fight while respecting the opponent = can turn an enemy into a smaller enemy

Over-antagonizing your enemies can strengthen their will to win, and worsen the war for everyone.
In negotiation, this Ury and Fisher's approach of being "tough on ideas, but kind on people'. In competitive sports, think in terms of "tough in the game/fight, but kind on the opponent outside of the game/fight".

▯Mafia Examples

Mafia historian Selwyn Raab describes this approach as used by former mafia boss Joseph Massino.

Massino took the Bonanno family in tatters, and made it the most powerful of the five New York families. Contrary to other families who'd keep a conflictual relationship with law enforcement, he made it a rule to always respect the police and the FBI.

And when he was finally caught, police granted him his wish to be cuffed outside, away from his wife and teenage daughters.

3. Decrease Scope for Defection

Let's start with the classics:

- Increase the costs of defection: for example, Massino from the above example pressured captains and soldiers to add their sons as made men, so talking to the police would be costly for their own sons in the organization
- Minimize the gains of defection ▯ silver medal technique

1. Strings-attached giving: give, but while keeping some form of leverage (ie.: the option of taking something back)
2. Punish cheats to maintain cooperation in groups. There is a long history of research showing that punishment of cheats works (for example, Ernst Fehr & Simon Gächter, 2000).
3. Positive displays of leverage: to remind people of your leverage in the exchange, but to do so within a positive frame.
   See an example here:

> Lucio: It deserves a good review <— Positive display of leverage, as it indirectly reminds him of both the value-giving power, and the value-taking leverage of a negative review
> Read more

For more, also read: "fundamental strategies of power".

4. Maintain Win-Win: Monitoring & Fair Value Marketing

Be high-value to attract interest, and add warmth to invite cooperation (see 'power and warmth').

Two crucial steps to maintaining win-win:

Monitor Changing Dynamics

- Changing context: win-win don't stay win-win forever. They can turn win-lose if the payoffs change
- Neediness: needy partners may be kind and cooperative, only to turn defectors once they don't need you anymore
- Power dynamics shifts: the more power and leverage people get, the more they may be motivated to resort to coercion

Fair-Value Marketing

1. Highlight your giving, or at least ensure people know and appreciate your contribution
2. Appreciate their giving: Recognizes and appreciates their contributions
3. Thread-expand the win-win: frame and reframe the exchange as a win-win, share your appreciation for them and your relationship to signal your positive intentions (a positive signal of an honorable character, too)

Fair value marketing includes proactively ensuring your contributions are fairly valued and appreciated.
You ensure people don't undercut your contributions ("credit erasing") and/or inflate their contributions ("credit inflating").

This is a form of assertiveness applied to social exchanges.

4.2. Dating & Relationship Win-Win

While some exceptions apply, the general rule is to lead and display dominance and value with win-win frames.

And the more the relationship progresses, the more win-win and cooperation become crucial. Women who feel on the losing end adopt protest behavior that increases the risks of cheating.

Relationship researcher John Gottman also noted that accepting influence is a key to strong relationships, and accepting influence is all about win-win power dynamics.
Also see:

- How to maintain power and attraction

5. Protect Your Downsides

Prepare for the possibility of cheating and defection.
Some examples include:

- Prenup
- Back-up plans for work, accommodation,
- Offshore bank account

6. Strategic Value Allocation: High ROI Giving

Adam Grant's research and literature review suggest that strategic giving are the most successful in life.

And while we support giving for the sole sake of giving, strategic giving is important when you're still in your 'achieve phase', and especially in competitive environments.
That includes workplaces that cover the competition with a layer of "selfless team first".

Strategic giving includes:

- Give to those who can give back. Often, it's people around your same value, or higher value
- Give to those who do give back.
  - ⚠ Careful with higher-value people who sometimes feel entitled to take from those below
- Stay neutral with those who have nothing to give. Be cordial and respectful, but maintain an "arm's length approach" to avoid making enemies

When Needed: Machiavellian Collaboration

The smart collaborator is not just stuck to "collaborate" or "non collaborate". He can also adopt a strategy of "opportunistic collaboration" mixed with "opportunistic defection".

This strategy can be used immorally, in which case we don't advise it or condone it.
But in some cases, it's fair game.

Next Steps: Becoming A Smart Cooperator

Navigating cooperation in the real world requires to internalize certain advanced skills.

Life Strategy: The Enlightened Collaborator

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We already talked about collaboration as a life strategy for success on this website.

See for example:

- 4 Fundamental Strategies for Power: an overview on applying collaboration and win-win in life

However, we haven't talked about the best approaches to ensure effective collaborative yet.
And we haven't clarified why it's superior to both naive collaboration, or cynic defection.
So this article will show you exactly why collaboration is power, and how to make sure that your collaborations are safe and effective.

Cooperation evolved because it's good for both. One man carries the tools, one the wood… And the stairs to the top develop twice as fast.

Win-Win Starts With Mindsets

The mindset always comes first.

The mindset precedes the strategies.

The collaborator mindset is the belief that win-win is possible and preferable.

The collaborator mindset is what leads you to approach people and situations asking yourself first how a win-win could be reached.

That of course that doesn't necessarily mean that win-win will always be possible.
And it doesn't even mean that you enter all relationships that present a potential win-win, either.
Some of those exchanges might add too little of a benefit, or you might have other priorities in life.

The collaborator mindset does however mean that you assess new people and scan new situations asking yourself how win-win could be achieved.

The collaborator mindset is what makes a win-win strategy possible.
And by approaching life with the win-win mindset in mind, you increase the odds that:

1. you will find more opportunities for win-win
2. you will create more opportunities for win-win by looking for ways with which win-win could be achieved
3. you will enter and enter into more win-win exchanges and relationships

The final result?
More value created, more power, and more happiness.

No guarantees, but a necessary precondition

It bears repeating.

Your collaborative mindset does NOT guarantee win-win.

That would be a naive way of looking at life ("naive cooperator").

But a collaborator mindset allows for win-win.
You still need to find, assess, and filter through for other cooperative individuals with whom to play/enter into win-win relationships.
And that's where the enlightened collaborator makes a difference.

The enlightened collaborator actively seeks expertise on crucial life skills such as:

- power dynamics
- psychology
- social exchanges "rules"
- persuasion and influence
- manipulation

This is the knowledge that transforms you from a simple collaborator, into a Jedi social strategist ready for life's success.

Defection: It Also Starts With (Cynic) Mindsets

There is quite some cynicism permeating our world.

The popular literature on power -see "The 48 Laws of Power"- rests on cynicism.

It's a great book.
But it's only the dark side of the moon portion.

And you're not gonna be successful if you stay stuck in the dark.

Popular movements such as feminism and the red pill are also both based on massive doses of cynicism.

Many feminists and red-pill men adopt a win-lose view of relationships.
With that mindset, win-win -and a healthy relationship- are hardly possible,.

Cynicism: A Manipulative Siren Against PC

In a way, I can see why cynicism is so successful.

Political correctness and much of popular self-help are so out of touch with reality that cynicism sounds more "real".

Unluckily, going from an extreme to another is rarely the solution. And the full-on cynicism is the equivalent of the Ulysses' sirens calling.
And those cynic sirens only deliver loneliness, anger, and bitterness.

Some of the "leaders" of cynic and win-lose movements are manipulators who make up enemies for personal power

At the extreme, a cynic mindset believes that people -or a certain group of people- are too selfish, manipulative, and untrustworthy to ever do anything out of kindness, or to ever enter a win-win relationship.

If you're a reader around here, I'm sure you can already see the issue with that: if you don't believe that win-win is even possible, how are you ever going to achieve it?
Answer: it's either someone shoves it down your throat till you finally realize "ugh, it's possible" or, more likely… It ain't gonna happen.

Indeed, the far likelier tragedy of ultra-cynicism is that cynicism creates its own world of lose-lose ("self-fulfilling prophecy").

Donald Trump: A Case Study for Cynic "Always-on" Competition

In politics, Trump is a great example of the cynic self-fulfilling prophecy.

I'm almost glad the Trump phenomenon happened, since it provides the perfect case study.

Trump shows what happens when an ultra-cynic approaches relationships with a competition-first mindset.
And what happens is that he creates a world of enemies.

Read more here:

- Trump's cynic win-lose failure

Or just take a look at this picture:

Sure, CNN is biased.
But we can probably agree Trump made way too many enemies.

The Cynic Mindset

Clinical psychologist Harriet Braiker does a great job describing the psychology of manipulators.

The "manipulator's mindset" Braiker describes is the same as the win-lose mindset we discuss here, which in turn is the same as the "defector strategy" of game theory.

In brief, conversely to the enlightened, win-win mindset, the cynic defector believes that win-win is neither possible, nor ideal.

This is how the cynic thinks:

- You either play or get played: it's a zero-sum world of dog-eat-dog. You either play, or you get played
- There is no win-win: in a zero-sum world full of nasty people, there cannot be win-win
- Relationships between equals do not exist: it's either one wins, or he loses. And since nobody wants to lose, they want to make sure their partner loses
- You cannot trust others: since everyone is out to play you, defectors obviously cannot trust others.

Some cynics and inveterate defectors also see themselves as untrustworthy and are proud of it.
We call this attitude "proud-value taking".

Game Theory Shows The Limitations of Ultra-Cynicism

The prisoner's dilemma offers a simple way to test the win-lose approach.

Take this variation of the prisoner's dilemma:

		Al
		Cooperate	Compete
Bob	Cooperate	$10, $10	$0, $20
	Compete	$20, $0	$1, $1

- Win-win: they both get $10
- Win-lose: the defector gets $20 and the cheated gets nothing
- Lose-lose: they both get $1

The cheater "wins big" the first time.
But as soon as the game is repeated, the collaborator most likely adjusts his strategy to defect as well, and the game turns into a lose-lose for both (Nash Equilibrium). If you run this game for 3-4 times the defector strategy is a losing one.

As a matter of fact, the more you run the game (repeated game), the bigger the opportunity loss.

What are these repeated games in real-life?

Repeated games are our relationships.
Our friends, spouses, brothers, sisters, colleagues, neighbors… These are our real-life repeated games.
And the cynic loses opportunities for collaborative and healthy relationships with the most important people in life.

The game is simplistic, of course.
And yet, it offers a good approximation of many real-life relationships (it has "high external validity").

The Different Mindsets Leading to Totally Opposite Lives

Post-interviews confirm the two different mindsets.

Cooperators who played against defectors shrug it off saying that the game is just like real life, and there are all different sorts of people -and they're right-.
Cooperators walk away that are still open to future collaboration and win-win.

But the defector?

The defector walks away that he has shaped his reality to one of cynic win-lose, and he then uses that reality of his own making to justify his own strategy and life approach.

Many defectors don't even realize that it'stheir own distrusting approach to life that breeds distrusts, aggression, and win-lose approaches from other people.

The collaborative reality of collaborative mindsets

The life experience for people who believe that cooperation is possible is much different.

Says Braiker:

> Trusting people who allow for the possibility that others can, on occasion, choose to behave altruistically and/or generously can choose to cooperate because it is rational and adaptive will be open to the possibility of trusting relationships.
> If you approach the world with an open but realistic attitude that allows for both kinds of people—trusting souls and self-promoting competitors—your experiences will mirror your expectations. You likely will meet both kinds of people and have the opportunity to form relationships in which mutual trust and cooperation exist and are cherished by both participants.

Abundance HR mentality

To me, this is a form of abundance mentality.

This is abundance mentality when it comes to "human resources".

Since there are countless of people, and a good chunk of them are awesome people happy to collaborate, it means that the scope of collaboration and win-win is almost infinite to you.

All you gotta do, is to find them.

Enlightened Collaborator Approach

The basic of smart collaboration is simple:

Collaborate with collaborators, and be extra careful with cheats.
Then, we add to increase the scope of cooperation, and "cover your ass" since few people are 100% honest or 100% cheats and most people are shades of grey who can turn either way.

This approach is sound.
It's based on positive cynicism, and proven power strategies.

The enlightened collaborator is power intelligent and, as such, a realist. He accepts that social exchanges entail a risk, since people are not always trustworthy and dependable, and interests can misalign with anyone.
It also accepts the reality that not only people's predispositions and characters differ, but that context also matters, and the same people can behave differently -or change behavior- as the context changes.

But the enlightened collaborator's approach runs deeper.
The enlightened collaborator takes it upon himself to protect the downsides while increasing the pie of the exchanges:

1. Incentivize and increase the scope of collaboration
2. Disincentive defection & cheating
3. Lead towards collaboration
4. Assess people's characters
5. Minimize "exchange risks"

1. Increase Scope for Collaboration

Since collaboration brings benefits to anyone, the enlightened collaborator increases the scope and opportunities for cooperation.

Some of the techniques he deploys:

1. Make the pie larger: so there is more for everyone
2. Align interests: the more you align interest, the better it is for both to collaborate, and to stick to collaboration. An example of aligning interest is to avoid paying a contractor based on hours, which incentivizes him to be ineffective, and pay instead for completed projects.

3. Collaborative reframing: the mindsets and techniques to turn and steer relationships towards win-win.
   It can be as simple as saying "I value you and our collaboration", which serves as a goodwill signal of your willingness to collaborate for win-win.
   Linked above is the example of collaborative reframing to improve a relationship that was teetering on the verge of competition and one-upmanship
   1. Collaborative shaming: "collaborative shaming" is a specific technique part of "collaborative reframing". It consists of shaming people who are playing win-lose games in an effort to lead them towards a more fruitful win-win for both. Collaborative shaming against shit-tests: an example on using collaborative shaming to handle female shit-tests
4. Frame cementing: once a positive and collaborative frame has been set "cementing" strengthens that frame and increases its power and its ability to influence behavior over the long term
   1. "I'm glad we agree": a power move to cap a win-win frame reminds people that you both agreed on a course of action that is good for both
5. WIIFT: approaching people with a mindset of "what's in it for them" increases the chances that they will see the exchange as win-win, which in turn increases the chances they will want to collaborate
6. Sticking with value-adding collaborators: so simple, yet such a crucial life hack. When you find good people in your life, keep them! You found a treasure, cherish it.

1.2. Gentleman Warrior Approach

Sometimes, you have a declared enemy.

And you both know it.

However, you still have two choices:

1. Antagonize & hate = turns an enemy into a bigger enemy
2. Fight while respecting the opponent = can turn an enemy into a smaller enemy

Let's take as an example former mafia boss Joseph Massino.
Massino took the Bonanno family when it was in tatters, and brought it back as the most powerful of the five New York families.
Massino always kept a "gentleman warrior" approach.

The mindset of the gentleman warrior approach is:

Yes, we're enemies and we want to beat each other. And I'll do be darn best to beat you. But we can still be courteous while we compete.

It's a bit like the mindset of "tough on ideas, but kind on people, which in this case becomes "tough in the game/fight, but kind on the opponent outside of the game/fight".

Massino imposed the same mindset and approach to all of his family.

It can take some emotional maturity to apply this mindset, and most people get swept away by the competitive spirit.

Let's see some applications in real life:

The Attitude of Antagonizing

> Franzese: I became a major target of law enforcement (exactly what you want to avoid), I was indicted 5 times, beat every case (that's a huge red flag: your enemy is dogged). Rudy told me "Franzese, if I convict you on this, you're gonna get double what your father got, I'm gonna give you 100 years. I said "Rudy, bring it on, I > beat you 4 times, let's go for round 5.

> (now wise Franzese speaking) Guys, that's the dumbest thing you could ever do. You don't antagonize them (the FBI), they don't need any more incentives to come after you.

Exactly right, that type of attitude gives them incentives to come after you harder, and to punish you harder if they can catch you.
Furthermore, if convicted, you also provide them a valid reason to treat you like a devilish enemy -very different from a "gentleman's enemy"-.

That's an attitude that some criminals and mobsters have against the police.
And it only makes their life -as well as the police's life- harder.

Flaunting how you're "beating" them will also make your enemy more dogged in your pursuit.
See John Gotti or Al Capone.
They both might have stayed free far longer, if they had avoided the spotlight and the attitude of "I beat them and I rub it in".

The Effects of Antagonizing

From that same video:

> Franzese: I've witnessed some things that were kind of unpleasant, every once in a while the agents would get out of hand (goes on to tell a story of an FBI agent who ruins his family dinner, ends up drawing a gun)

Before the rights of detainees were extended, beatings of detainees were also common -of lower-level mobsters mostly, as cops were also probably worried of assaulting higher-power mobsters-.

Life's Mindset: The Gentleman Warrior Attitude

Now compare with Joseph Massino, who took a far more friendly with law enforcement:

> "Get used to my face, because you're going to see a lot of it for a long time", Pat Marshall, the agent who had been hunting Massino, forwarned when he was brought to FBI headquarters (Pat starts off with a competitive frame).
> Marshall recognizes that he was confronting an imperturbable foe. "He took my warning with a grain of salt and said calmly no problem, do what you got to do" (ignores the competitive frame, installs a gentleman's frame to competition)

Massino called the FBI agents by name, and was always courteous.
In one instance, he even defended an FBI agent who was being encircled and then gave him back the electronic surveillance device Massino had uncovered.

The Gentleman Warrior Effects

Being courteous towards your enemy might not prevent you from losing.

In our case study here, the law will still take its course.

But it won't hurt for sure, and it might as easily soften your loss, and shorten your sentence.

Plus, it will likely make the process, and the possible conviction, far easier on you.
From the same book:

> Picked up at his Howard Beach home, Massino politely asked to be cuffed outside, not in the presence of his > wife and teenaged daughters.

> "Because he was always the gentleman and cordial with us", Marshall granted him that favor.

2. Decrease Scope for Defection

Let's start with the classics:

- Increase the costs of defection: there are many ways of going about it, spanning from fair and honest, to coercive and Machiavellian

As an example for coercively increasing the costs of defection, think of mafia organizations.
The mafia in Italy is said to be stronger than in the US.
One of the reasons might be because the Italian mafia has higher penalties for informers (cheaters). The penalties include going after the cheaters' families (attention; this is not to say that we approve of either mafia, or of that).

Massino was a master of Machiavellian collaboration.
Says mafia historian Selwyn Raab in "Five Families":

> Massino pressured captains and soldiers to volunteer their sons as made men (…) by recruiting offspring and placing them in the fathers' crews, the capos' lips would be sealed to protect their sons—and himself. And crew commanders would know that if they became traitors, their sons would be endangered by internal retaliation, possibly death. Massino insured that a defector would have a lot to lose.

More Techniques

You can never be 100% sure someone is not going to cheat.

But life is not about "100% certitudes", but a question of odds.
And there is plenty of things that the enlightened collaborators can do to increase the odds he deals with honest collaborators who will be adding value and not looking for ways to scam him.

1. Assessing people: the enlightened collaborator seeks knowledge of psychology and power dynamics to help him assess people and discern cynic defectors and "Machiavellian collaborators" from more honest collaborators
2. Collaborative foot forward: it means to start with collaboration and/or with a warm and friendly opening. the enlightenment collaborator, knowing psychology, knows that the best way to start a win-win is to open with a win-win. That approaches increases social trust right off from the bat and makes more friends and allies.
3. Strings-attached giving: give, but while keeping some form of leverage (ie.: the option of taking something back)
4. Test-giving: give freely, demand nothing back, act like you don't care. Then, keep an eye on who is grateful for your giving, who is not, and who just asks for more
5. Looking dumber: this works both to test people, and to increase the odds that a possible attack or manipulation will be easy to fend off, or to recoup from, since people will be more careless
6. Keeping a few aces up his sleeve: imagine you got an alarm system and a motion-activated camera recording system. You can share about the alarm, but you keep the information about the camera private. You never know who you catch going through your stuff
7. Silver medal technique: to decrease the incentives for lying and cheating by making it about two attractive options one can get, rather than about an attractive option, or nothing

And, finally, when win-win exchanges are not possible:

1. Keeping a safe distance: once you spot a manipulator, always avoid getting too close. Either cut them out, fade them, or keep them at a distance

2. Seek power to avoid win-lose: the enlightened collaborator knows that powerlessness is dangerous. When you have no power, you are the equivalent of the lamb hoping there are no wolves

Social exchange techniques

And some more slightly elaborated techniques:

- Fair value marketing: one of the core techniques of win-win framing and strengthening.
  - Promotion: to promote one's value-provision effectively, and in a way that they are recognized by the other party.
  - Appreciation: to appreciate the value contributions of other(s) to make them feel valued and appreciated. It also indirectly frames the exchange as win-win, while encouraging them to keep on giving to meet your appreciation and gratitude (can turn into a positive judge frame). Example in Power University.
- Here's tit, where's tat: a technique to give or to remind of your value giving before you ask for something. It serves to remind people that you have given in good fait and it increases the odds they'll give back
- Credit collection: to remind people of your value giving, which indirectly reminds them that it's also supposed of them to remain collaborative and give back
- Positive displays of leverage: to remind people of your leverage in the exchange, but to do so within a positive frame.
  See an example here:

"It deserves a good review" is a positive display of leverage, as it indirectly reminds him of my negotiation leverage on him.

For more, also read: "fundamental strategies of power".

3. Protect Your Downsides

This is part and parcel of Machiavellian strategic thinking.

You do everything possible to remain win-win, but… You can never be sure that it will stay that way.

So, to be on the safe side, do all the above, plus prepare for the possibility of cheating and defecting.

A popular example of protecting one's downsides is a prenup agreement

Dating With Enlightened Collaboration

The enlightened collaborator mindset covers dating and relationships as well.

Depending on the partner, early dating might require less -or more strategic- giving and more strategic display of value and/or power in the beginning, see:

- Leadership in dating
- Dominance in dating

But as the relationship unfolds collaboration and win-win come back to the fore for developing a strong and healthy relationship:

- How to maintain power and attraction

Or famed researcher John Gottman says that strong relationships have collaborating partners who build each other up and share power and influence (Gottman, 1999):

- Accepting influence: The key to relationship success

4. Be A Strategic Giver

We're all for free-giving here.

Especially once you reach the final stage of empowerment where you achieve all your goals.

However, when you're still in your "achieve phase", it may be better to be a strategic giver.
And especially so when you're in competitive environments.
Especially workplaces that cover the competition with a layer of "selfless team first".

Strategic giving includes:

- Give to those who can give back. Often, it's people around your same value, or higher value
- Give to those who do give back. Watch out for higher-value people who sometimes feel entitled to take from the below
- Stay neutral with those who have nothing to give. Simply avoid any meaningful relationship with them. Be cordial, but maintain an "arm's length approach" to avoid making enemies

When Needed: Machiavellian Collaboration

Finally:

the enlightened collaborator is not just stuck to "collaborate" or "non collaborate".

And he can also adopt a strategy of "opportunistic collaboration" mixed with "opportunistic defection".

The name "Machiavellian collaboration" might sound devious and amoral and, in some cases, it is amoral.
But, in some situations, it can be fair game.

In competitive environments where one person only can win, the enlightened collaborator might prefer to avoid entering any win-win exchange if he feels that he gives more value than he takes.

This can be an effective strategy in dating, for example, as well as in workplace environments.
Workplaces are grey areas environments that are not fully zero-sum, but where rewards and promotions are not infinite either.

We already showed that Machiavellians tend to win in the office.
But which strategy will work depends on your context, so you must judge what's effective on a case by case basis.

SUMMARY

One man brings wine, one cheese. They both met in the middle of the bridge they built to both be better off. It's economics 101

A collaborator mindset is what allows you to establish win-win relationships.

The enlightened collaborator, equipped and trained with power dynamics knowledge, is the next step along the line of personal evolution.

But it all starts with a collaborator's mindset first, and the belief that collaboration is possible.
Don't let the cynics drag you down.
Make friends, and develop value-adding relationships, instead. I've personally experienced it hundreds of times.
And life is much better that way.

The Power of Effective Cynicism: Win in a World of Self-Interest While Remaining Optimistic & Honorable

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Cynicism is often treated as either a moral flaw or a mark of superior intelligence. In reality, it is neither.

From a power and incentive perspective, cynicism is a strategic posture: it can protect against exploitation, but it can also destroy cooperation, trust, and long-term gains when taken too far.

This article introduces effective cynicism™, a calibrated approach that acknowledges self-interest and power dynamics without collapsing into blanket distrust or corrosive negativity. We show why the most effective strategy is neither naïve cooperation nor chronic suspicion, but a balance between strategic cooperation and self-protection.

Let's dive in.

TPM Framework Notice: Effective Cynicism™
Effective Cynicism™ is a strategic framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano, founder of The Power Moves, to analyze cooperation, power, and trust under conditions of mixed incentives.
Drawing on behavioral economics, game theory, evolutionary psychology, and real-world power dynamics, the framework distinguishes calibrated realism from both naïve cooperation and chronic suspicion.

Intro

Cynicism is the belief that people are motivated purely by self-interest, are not sincere, and are not to be trusted.

There is some truth in that because humans are self-interested.
Just like any autonomous living creature, self-interest is crucial for survival and reproduction.

However, excessive cynicism becomes self-defeating, and cynicism is only helpful within certain limits and with good calibration.
To be effective, cynicism must accept the possibility and benefits of cooperation, and pursue, secure, and maintain win-win whenever it's beneficial.

Cynicism

While cynicism comes from a backdrop of truth, the cynic over-generalizes cynical attitudes and behavior to all humans and all situations, and includes the following beliefs:

- Zero-sum world where there cannot be win-win
- It's either predation or victimization: in a zero-sum world, a win must come at someone else's cost
- You cannot trust others, everyone is scheming on how to best cheat
- Any momentary win-win will soon be broken by defection, so cheating first is smart

Cynicism is on a spectrum of course, so these beliefs also slide on a scale depending on the level of cynicism.

The Appeal of Cynicism

Political correctness, over-virtue signaling and much of popular self-help can be so out of touch with reality that cynicism sounds "real".

Take the single biggest best-selling self-help book in the world: "Think and Grow Rich".
I quote:

> Men who labor will receive more (..) they will receive dividends (…).
> But first, they must give more to their employer, and stop this bickering and bargaining by force.

This is "idealistic giving" from a "naive collaborator" mindset.
Such as: "give and everything will fall into place".
It fails to consider that, unless you assertively demand for a fair share of your added value, you will be paid far below your potential.

With this 'soft' self-help, it's not difficult to see how authors like Robert Greene could be so successful with more cynical guides to power.
Similarly some branches of feminism and the red pill both make valid points but also frame intersexual dynamics as adversarial and zero-sum, both thriving as reactions to naïve dating and relationship narratives.

These movements provide a 'Low-Resolution Realism'. They correctly identify the flaws in naive narratives but fail to reach the higher-level strategy of the strategic collaborator. They stop at the first stage of power intelligence (detection) and miss the second stage (leverage).

Advantages

After all, if cynicism even exists, it means that it must have served some fuction.
Evolutionary theories indeed suggest that overly agreeable men may put themselves at risk of being cheated, while cynicism may help avoid exploitation (Workman and Reader, 2021).

So among the advantages, cynicism:

- Protects you against exploitation
  - Sense of safety, although this can often be an escape, driven by fear
- Prepares you for worst-case scenarios
- Predisposes for short-term gains with a defector approach ⚠ This only works when well-executed in one-offs and when others have no power for revenge
- Works in some situations, like objectively zero-sum scenarios, or when win-win is no more possible

Duels are zero-sum games. Thinking outside the box, one could raise his hand to stop the game, or throw the gun away as a collaborative step forward. Great strategies for those who aren't expert shooters

Costs

Cynicism costs include:

- Missed opportunities for win-win
  - Premature break-up of win-wins in fear of defection
- Paranoia
- Poorer relationships

- Drives away cooperators, leading to lower quality social life and…
- Lower life quality and mental health

For the latter, John Gottman's research shows that highly mistrustful men -such as, cynics- die significantly younger (Gottman, 2011).
In relationships, these men withdraw from relationships in fear of being taken advantage of (we call this approach "fearful defector", and it's a consequence of a "defensive mindset").

Cynicism Long-Term Failure: Game Theory

Trivers' seminal work on social evolution introduced reciprocal altruism as mutually beneficial.
Reciprocal altruism requires the belief that, despite the possibility of defection, people can cooperate for a win-win outcome, rather than defaulting to continuous defection.

Trivers' theory provided the evolutionary basis later formalized by Axelrod through game-theoretic models of repeated cooperation.
Consider this variation of the prisoner's dilemma:

		Al
		Cooperate	Compete
Bob	Cooperate	$10, $10	$0, $20
	Compete	$20, $0	$1, $1

The payoff for the different approaches are:

- Win-win: $10 for both with mutual cooperation
- Win-lose: $20 for the defector when the other collaborates (cheating)
- Lose-lose: $1 for mutual defection

The cynical cheater "wins big" the first time when playing against a cooperator.
But as soon as the game is repeated, the collaborator most likely adjusts his strategy to defect as well, and the game turns into a lose-lose for both. The defector strategy quickly turns into a losing strategy.
In game theory, defecting players remain stuck with the little pay-offs of their defensive strategies (the Nash Equilibrium). But that equilibrium, also called "manipulation equilibrium point", leads to Pareto-inefficient results (Clempner, 2016).

In simpler terms: in repeated games where win-win is possible, the more you interact, the poorer the defector strategy performs.
Cooperative players who gain the trust of trustworthy players instead leverage win-win relationships and reap bigger rewards with each transaction.

In real life, repeated games are our daily and most important relationships, ranging from our spouses, children, parents, siblings, friends and neighbors.
Cynics tend to underperform in life relationships.

The Different Mindsets Leading to Totally Opposite Lives

Post-interviews confirm the two different mindsets of collaboration and defection (cynic).

Cooperators who played against defectors shrug it off saying that the game is just like real life, and there are all different sorts of people.
And they walk away that are still open to future collaboration and win-win.

But the defector?
The defector has shaped his own reality of win-lose, and he will walk away thinking that he is right all along in refusing the possibility of win-win.

The Evolution of Cynicism: Towards Balance

Several branches of scientific inquiry moved from excesses of over-cynicism and over-trusting to settle around an 'effectively cynical' middle.

Evolutionary Psychology

Early evolutionary thought missed some cynicism.

Hamilton was one of the first to deliver an 'effectively cynical recalibration' when he noted that by evolutionary logic, communication among animals should also include manipulation.
And Dawkins' book "The Selfish Gene" made the more cynical view of evolutionary processes mainstream.

However, as science progressed, it also recalibrated towards a more balanced view.
For example, Dawkins took stock of the new scientific evidence and in more recent versions of "The Selfish Gene" he writes:

> Cooperation and mutual assistance can flourish even in a basically selfish world (…) we can see how even nice guys can finish first.

Dawkins went as far as to say that he could have called his book "The Cooperative Gene".
Today, most evolutionary psychologists agree that cooperation emerged because it's (also) good for the selfish individual (Ridley, 1994).

This approach better explains why traits like kindness or altruism evolved, are maintained, and are even sought after.

Finally, evolutionary biology supports what can be called a law of optimum balance through stabilizing selection: when intermediate levels of a trait maximize fitness, while both extremes tend to be maladaptive (Schmalhausen, 1949).
Excessive naïveté invites exploitation, while excessive cynicism undermines cooperation and long-term gains.

People Seek & Value Cooperators, Not Cynics

People instinctively know that 'cooperativeness' is better, and this is probably why kindness is one of the most sought-after traits in ideal mates (Buss, 2016).

Human kindness and altruism have been possibly selected through sexual selection (Boone, 1998, and Miller, 2000). This means that a collaborative attitude has at least the potential of also boosting one's own sexual market value, especially for long-term relationships.

Behavioral Economics

The "homo economicus" from the Chicago School of Economics operates rationally and optimizes transactions for self-interest.

The homo economicus was, in way, selfishly calculative.
It wasn't fully wrong, of course, and the failure wasn't its focus on self-interest. Unfortunately it still also applies well in common goods scenarios where defection can improve the individual's life at the detriment of the collectivity (Berz, 2016), without even feeling immoral.
The failure was its Bounded Rationality. It failed to calculate the massive economic value of Social Capital and the long-term ROI of good relationships, good reputation within a high-stakes network, and true human psychology.

And as psychology and economics merged, the emerging field of behavioral economics delivered those better models.
The new man, sometimes quipped "homo reciprocans", accounted for feelings and preferences for win-wins, and sought collaboration and mutual gains (see Thaler, 2015).

Later research has also shown that homo reciprocans tend to be more successful in life and, unsurprisingly, to have higher life satisfaction (see Dohmen et al., 2006)

Negotiation Studies

Western negotiation literature used to be more power-centered and cynical, focused on leverage and grabbing as much as possible of the negotiation pie.
In modern negotiation science, the uncollaborative approach is sometimes referred to as “fixed pied mindset” (Malotra, 2007).

Things started to change with seminal work from Ury and Fisher, which focused on understanding other people’s needs and trying to make the pie larger first and foremost.
Influence and persuasion studies also showed that a more strategically giving attitude could deliver better results. Cialdini, for example, wrote in his seminal “Influence” that concessions lead to better negotiation results (Cialdini, 1984).

Strategic Giving For Life Success

These shifts shouldn’t be confused with naive giving and to work, they must go hand-in-hand with power and strategy.
However, they showed that pure cynicism tends to underperform a ‘smart-giving’ attitude when backed by power, and strategic thinking.

Psychologist Adam Grant’s investigation into the give-and-take approaches to social exchanges showed that strategic givers tend to be most successful in life.

Effective Cynicism

Effective cynicism accepts the premise of self-interest as ultimate motivation, while also accepting human general preference for win-win and not cheating.

The effective cynic is power aware, he knows that, despite the generalized preference for not cheating, people differ, and some have no qualms about cheating. Furthermore, context matters, and even good people can be tempted to cheat and defect when the payoff makes it worth it.

Effective cynicism is the mental foundation of the smart collaborator approach to socialization: seek win-win, but do it smart, and protect yourself against the risks of defection.

Benefits

- Allows for win-win
- Expands win-win, looking for win-wins, ‘growing the pie for both’, and maintaining it
- Attracts and maintains givers in one’s life
- Mental health
- Better relationships
  - higher life quality, as research shows that humans are happier and healthier when they enjoy strong relationships

Effective Machiavellianism

Effective cynicism isn't about being 'nice', but about being realists.
One could be an effective cynic while also being a ruthless Machiavellian operator: making the most of cooperation, and making the most out of cheating as well.

For example, one could start off more cooperatively to invite others' cooperation, only to defect later for a large payoff once he's ready to move on.
Or one may look for naive players that allow for skewed win-wins where the Machiavellian players take the lion's share of the benefits. There is some evidence that dark triads may use this approach (Brunell et al., 2013).

A Machiavellian approach may provide some benefits if one can well-execute it (a big if, since over time this attitude can show). But it also comes with costs in life satisfaction (Bereckzei, 2017; Myl-Heku and Buss, 1996).

If one doesn't care about psychological costs, in terms of pure selfish results, a purely Machiavellian approach can outperform.
Choosing value-adding over predation is therefore an ethical constraint, not a misunderstanding of power. TPM teaches what works, but prefers honorable approaches that pair maximal effectiveness with value creation and win-win outcomes.

Putting Effective Cynicism to Work

The challenge lies in real-world calibration.
Knowing exactly when to lean into trust and when to deploy strategic skepticism is what separates the elite strategist from the perpetual target.

If you are ready to move beyond "low-resolution realism" and master the high-stakes execution of win-win, Power University is the next logical step.
It provides the field-tested blueprints to detect manipulation, build high-value alliances, and command respect in any environment, ensuring you never have to choose between being effective and being honorable.

The Power of Effective Cynicism: Win in a World of Self-Interest While Remaining Optimistic & Honorable

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Cynicism is often treated as either a moral flaw or a mark of superior intelligence. In reality, it is neither.

From a power and incentive perspective, cynicism is a strategic posture: it can protect against exploitation, but it can also destroy cooperation, trust, and long-term gains when taken too far.

This article introduces effective cynicism™, a calibrated approach that acknowledges self-interest and power dynamics without collapsing into blanket distrust or corrosive negativity. We show why the most effective strategy is neither naïve cooperation nor chronic suspicion, but a balance between strategic cooperation and self-protection.

Let's dive in.

TPM Framework Notice: Effective Cynicism™
Effective Cynicism™ is a strategic framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano, founder of The Power Moves, to analyze cooperation, power, and trust under conditions of mixed incentives.
Drawing on behavioral economics, game theory, evolutionary psychology, and real-world power dynamics, the framework distinguishes calibrated realism from both naïve cooperation and chronic suspicion.

Microaggressions: Meaning, Examples & How to Handle Them

Lucio Buffalmano · 24 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Microaggressions are not just about racism or political debates.
They are everyday covert power moves—little jabs, disguised "jokes," or subtle undermining behaviors—that chip away at respect and influence.

In this guide, I'll break down what microaggressions really mean, how they differ from passive aggression and covert aggression, and give you clear examples and strategies to handle them.

We've coached thousands of men on spotting and neutralizing these status-lowering tactics. By the end, you'll be able to see microaggressions for what they are—and respond without losing power.

A Microaggression Is…

Any disempowering words or behavior that is of low or moderate intensity of directness or aggression

In "microaggression" we include:

- Covert power moves / Covert aggressions / disempowering covert frames
- Passive-aggressiveness / frenemies
- Social climbing / power scalping
- Undermining / Status scalping
- Micro revenge
- Teasing / mean jokes / ballbusting / micro one-uppings
- Smaller shit tests / loyalty tests

For simplicity think of these as "little everyday games", "frenemy", and general turkey behavior.

Albeit not overly aggressive or super obvious, they are still red flags of character ⍰.
And they're still damaging. Harmful to relationships, and disempowering -including to self-esteem-.

Especially when part of a pattern:

⚠⍰ Remember the "death by a thousand cut" law.

Many unchecked microaggressions add up to decrease status, respect, and attraction by a lot.

Example of Microaggression

A more prototypical example of microaggression as used in common parlance:

> Him: I love how Italian you sound <— microaggression. Frames an individual with his ethnic background, rather than respectfully treating him as an individual. But it's covert behind the word "love" and "sometimes"
> That's why we have Porsche and you have Fiat <— this "joke" suggests that the "love" he mentioned before doesn't include much respect

In this example of microaggression, the more typical microaggression is actually the first part.
The one that says "I love how… ".
It's also a covert aggression because of the (fake) frame of "loving".

The second part instead is more openly aggressive, and thus doesn't qualify as microaggression.

Skills to Handle Microaggressions

The skills to deal with microaggressions are:

1. Power awareness, to see microaggression. You can't handle what you can't see
2. Social calibration to meet microaggressions at the appropriate level
3. Competence with the right strategies and techniques

This website takes care of #1 (and PU even better).
And this article helps you with #2 and #3.

Let's start with the theoretical foundations to understand calibration:

1. Learn to assess the level of aggression

Indirect and covert tend to be low. Direct and open tend to be higher

Negative level: Builds you up / empowers you / submits…
Level 0. Neutral: Does not disempower you
Levels 1./2. Nano-aggression: Non-value taking joke / light teasing…
Levels 3./4./5. Microaggression: Criticism / "polite" or professional attack / one-upping / value-taking jokes / rubbing it in / mocking body language…
Level 6./7./8. Hostility: Direct attacks / "pathologizing" / insulting "jokes"…
Level 9. Aggression: Threats / threatening body language / shouting / offensive remarks / anger-fueled rants…
Level 10. Physical aggression: See Power University ⍰

Importantly:

⚠ Lower levels don't mean "OK"

We discourage from considering lower-levels "kind of OK" ⍰⍰♂.

Yes, all else being equal, a lower level power move can be less damaging.
But it's an unhelpful generalization:

- Context matters more. Ie.: insults from angry homeless are aggressive, but cost you little to ignore. A girl you like publicly one-upping you is low aggression, but costs you a lot
- Patterns of low-level power moves add up, and you die by a thousand cuts
- Checking power moves is a great opportunity to display value, skills, and intellect. Especially when they're less obvious

2. Learn to spot nonverbal microaggressions

Nonverbal microaggressions include:

- "⍰" Exaggerated laughing sub-communicates "you are laughable"
  - "LOL" is similar
- "⍰" Winks are smart-alecky ways of sub-communicating "you silly, I know better".
- Body language
  - Eye rolls
  - Looking away
  - "WTF" expressions

Example of sneering:

⍰⍰ Sneering while looking at others forms a silent alliance to ostracize you as a “laughing stock”

3. Learn to spot and handle the sub-communication

Microaggressions and covert power moves are about the sub-communication.

Everything above the sub-communication is just decoy.

Remember the iceberg:

Important articles at the juncture of sub-communication, prejudice, and self-esteem:

- Virtue signaling harms "minorities"
- Guilt-tripping harms "whites"

4. Calibrate & keep your eyes on your goal

For example, imagine this:

> Her: (sneers) <—- damaging, but it's indirect, low level aggression
> Miscalibrated: What are you laughing at! (Do you think I'm a laughing stock?) <—- direct, higher level of aggression
> Her: It's not about you, I was just smiling <—- goes under cover

OR:

> High-status person: Would be great if we could all think before talking <—- this is a strong attack. But it's impersonal, "philosopher-sounding". It's damaging, but low in terms of aggression
> Miscalibrated: Hey! Who you think you talking to like that, I'm not stupid you know <—- make it personal too fast, escalates right away, and too hot-headed for most environments
> High-status person: I never said anyting of the like to you <— now you look in the wrong for starting a miscalibrated escalation with a high-status member

It's good that he takes action.
But it feels too much, and he draws negative attention to him.

The issues are calibration, and strategy.

It's miscalibrated because it's too aggressive and direct compared to the attack.
Remember: the attack is covert, so the aggressive intent is hidden.

As for goals, your goal is to make out of it in the best light possible.
In this case, our reactive man expanded on the negatives -the laugh, and the implication of low IQ-.
If few noticed the original attack, now everyone takes note.
And you made it so noteworthy they will remember it.

If this is clear, you can skip the next paragraph.
If not, we explain further.

(Mis-)Calibrating Against Microaggressions

3 ways of mis-calibrating microaggressions:

#1. Aggression VS Microaggression

In chart:

The X-axis represents the intensity of aggression, emotion, and effort
In words:

- Level 4 is the attack
- Level 7 is the answer
- Result: +3

That net difference is what makes it uncalibrated.
⍰⍰ Remember that anger and other strong emotions are also high effort. And you generally want to avoid investing too much compared to others.

The lose-lose escalation trap

Be careful of escalating micro-aggressions, even if you do it without anger.

Arguments borne out of smaller stuff are lose-lose.
Two grown-ups arguing over small stuff feels like lower-value time-wasting. At worst, it looks like “two morons bickering over nothing”.
And even while defending yourself, people see you as “difficult”.

⚠ Watch out for “provoke/react patterns” (even in families)
It’s a turkey game of “poke the bear, enjoy the angry bear” (common with parent/child).
Even if you “beat them” with high dominance, you’re still playing their game. They get their sick payoff, and you waste energy.
Solutions ⍰

“Civil society” tends to punish the aggressor

“Civil society” tends to reject aggression, even if it follows provocation.

To most PU alumni, that means your social circle will support the provocateur.

Example:

⍰ Defender becomes the aggressor and spoils the mood

#2. Aggression VS Covert-aggression

The key here is this:

The covert-attacker can retreat and deny.

For example:

> I was just joking
> Maaan, relax (with a body language of “you’re so freaking tense”)
> Don’t take it so personally dude
> I’m just saying man, chill
> We joke all the times like that, nobody ever takes it so seriously (= you’re the overly-touchy exception)

In our aggression scale the covert aggressor retreats to a lower level.
And that leaves you even more uncalibrated.

In chart:

This is the dynamic of a covert aggressor ducking for cover

⍰ Example:

> Micro-aggressor: LOL, good to see Max tonight, all it took was a free dinner (<— frames you as stingy)
> Over-reactor: Excuse me?? That's inacceptable dude! What are you implying. I spend as much as anyone else at this table. Take that back and apologize.

And you know what comes next:

> Micro-aggressor: Dude, relax, it was just a joke, what are you getting so hot about, we're just having fun

He may also keep provoking, or add reasons why you come across as "money sensitive".

If you retreat then, you submit to his frame and attack.
If you defend, you reinforce that frame.
And if you escalate without skills, you ruin everyone's dinner -and may lose access to the group-.

#3. Manipulative Microaggression VS Aggression

The key of manipulative aggression is this:

The attacker pretends he wants to help and has good intentions.

For example:

> Covert aggressor: I'm not criticizing you, I only want to reach the best possible decisions (⍰ Sub-communication = you're about "team you", I'm about the team)

Or in toxic/abusive relationships:

> Covert aggressor: I'm saying this because I care about you. And instead of appreciating it, you get angry? This is unbelievable!

At the highest level, the sub-communication in both cases is "I'm good, you're bad".

In chart:

The high-level sub-communication becomes that "you're not good enough for them"

⚠ Beware the gaslighting

The manipulator provokes your overreaction, accuses you of being overreactive and "crazy", and professes "best intentions".
And, implied, you're "not good enough" for them.

Sometimes perpetrators aren't even terrible people.
But they're still playing a toxic game (see "Berne, 1964"). And you don't want to play those toxic, turkey games (see combative relationships dynamics, for example)-.

Pimpology – The 48 Pimp Rules: Summary

Lucio Buffalmano · 24 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Pimpology: The 48 Laws of the Game (2007) spoofs in the title the "48 Laws of Power" by Robert Greene. Pimpin' Ken, the author, teaches social strategies, manipulation, as well as dark psychology techniques to succeed in the pimpin' business. But, ultimately, he also teaches the mindsets to eventually transcend and move beyond pimping.

TPM Strategic Audit: This text is audited as a case study in Coercive Power Dynamics and Predatory Social Exchange. While the terminology is "street," the underlying mechanics—including Financial Dependency (Law 5), Information Asymmetry (Law 27), and Triangulation (Law 29)—abusive tactics with parallels in toxic cult leaders and abusive partners. We analyze this for self-defense purposes, helping individuals spot manipulation and red flags.

The 48 Laws of Pimping (List)

Note: Laws are quotes, written as they are:

- Law 1: Purse First, Ass Last
- Law 2: Get a Name in a Game
- Law 3: Don't Chase 'Em, Replace 'Em
- Law 4: Keep a Hoe in Arrears
- Law 5: Prey on the Weak: a pimp depends on a hoe as much as a hoe depends on a pimp. But pimps must make the hoe believe that they need him
  - not wanting to take responsibility is what makes a hoe in the first place
  - pick women who want (or need) to be taken care of
  - keep hoes financially dependent on you
  - tell them they need you
  - play up your support

- Law 6: When Pimpin' Begins, Friendship Ends: there is too much treachery in the game for the bond and trust of a friendship
  - "in business you have to exploit every situation you can – if friendship prevent it, then you're not on even footing with the competition, and you will lose"
- Law 7: Pimp the Game
- Law 8: Don't Let Your History Be a Mystery
- Law 9: Learn the Rules
  - Who better to teach how to pimp than how to pimp a ho than a veteran ho herself? She really taught me that this game is won between the ears, not between the legs
  - How to mindfuck a guy
- Law 10: Plan Your Work and Work Your Plan
- Law 11: Avoid Gorillas and Godzillas
  - "A real pimp is a gentleman, but these are pimps in gorilla suit"
  - "They hang around pimps, they have hoes on the track, they may even look like pimps, they are straight simps"
  - "A magilla gorilla brings the police to the track with his sucker-ass behavior. In the pimp game, this motherfucker has no place, and he's got to go. (…) This is one instance where the real pimps may work together to take care of the situation"
- Law 12: Ain't No Love in this Shit
- Law 13: Pimp Like You're Hoeless
- Law 14: Better a Turnout Than a Burnout
- Law 15: Say What You Mean and Mean What You Say
  - "They say honesty is the best policy. That doesn't mean you have to tell the whole truth, but you must always keep it real -with yourself, if no one else. Lying shows a lack of character and an inability to face reality. There are better ways to manipulate someone than to lie".
- Law 16: Give Motivation and Inspiration
- Law 17: Get You a Bottom Bitch
- Law 18: Cop and Blow
- Law 19: Turn Hoe Ends into Dividends
- Law 20: Get in a Hoe's Head:
  - "These women informed me that it's the small things in life that count when it comes to a woman. The kind words, or bringing her a gift for no reason, or remembering her birthday, and listening when she talks -those things really matter to them"
  - "Pimps don't do that square shit (…), never treat a ho with much kindness. But I took this lesson and made it work for me. It took my pimpin' to a whole other level"
  - "Unless she feels love for you, a ho is not going to give you her money for eight and ten year stretches"
  - "Some hoes want you to be hard on them, but with others it's like pimp C says: "you serve vinegar, you gonna get pickles" -the trick is to figure out each ho's mind"
  - "She told me "most hoes are lost little girls who have been neglected growing up, now living in a woman's body. Hoes don't this because they enjoy turning tricks. Most hoes don't even like sex. They believe a pimp will give them the love and care they didn't have growing up"
- Law 21: A Hoe Without Instruction is Headed for Self-Destruction
- Law 22: Keep Hoes on Their Toes
- Law 23: A Hoe Joins a Stable to Ruin It

  - “In the pimp game, we call a group of hoes a stable, but there isn’t anything less stable. It takes a lot of work to keep any household in balance -much less a group of jealous and competitive women sharing one man”
  - “The pimp is the boss, and there are two things employees love most: undermining the boss, and undermining each other“
- Law 24: Set the Trend
  - “A true leader is someone who people want to follow because the person is doing things that no one else is doing. You set the standards and it gives you the appearance of being superior to the people who try to imitate you”
- Law 25: Grind for Your Shine
  - “One of the biggest misconceptions is that a pimp is someone who wears loud suits and big hats (…) Those are clowns, not pimps. Everyone loves a clown, but no one wants to take a clown home”.
  - “When I was pimpin I looked more like a Wall Street executive, than the stereotype of a pimp”
  - “He has to distinguish himself from the average Joe on the street. My Davoucci costs 1500 dollars, and a ho would know that. I have knocked many a ho in my career simply because of my style”.
  - “A ho wants to be seen with the flyest nigga on the street, so I made it my business to be that nigga”
  - Also see: types of players (the “refined player”)
- Law 26: The Game is to Be Sold, Not Told: don’t teach and don’t give wisdom for free. Sell it.
  - “The less a young pimp knew, the better for me. I wanted him to pay in blood, like I had”
  - “The only way I’ll tell it is if I sell it”
  - “Ignorance is bliss, but only for the person with the knowledge. That’s why there’s so much misinformation and confusion out there. People with the knowledge don’t really want those without to have it.”
- Law 27: Keep Your Game on the Low
  - “being on top and staying on top is about control. Not just control of the hoes, but controlling myself and my mouth”
  - Ken would never tell a ho what he was really thinking, how much money he had, or how many other hoes he had
  - “Good pimps have a gift for gab, but smart pimps talk a lot and at the same time don’t say much at all”
  - The less someone knows about you, the better
- Law 28: Be a Leader
- Law 29: Play One Hoe Against the Next
- Law 30: Prosperity Over Popularity: too many people enter the game for popularity
  - “Being popular isn’t a bad thing, but it should be a means to an end”
  - “you can be known by the whole world, but if you’re broke, it ain’t worth shit”
- Law 31: Look Out for Suzy Choosy
- Law 32: Turn a Tramp Into a Champ
- Law 33: Bring Your People with You to the Top
  - have a few brothers in arms you can rely on
  - don’t make people feel unappreciated
  - don’t make enemies
- Law 34: Show Respect to Get Respect: “treat people the way you want to be treated. at least to their faces”
- Law 35: Trust Nothing But the Game
  - Test people around you. Leave some money around, see if they take it
- Law 36: Be Internationally Known, Nationally Recognized, and Locally Accepted

- Law 37: Let a Hoe Know
  - Let a hoe know that you're a pimp, and if she stays… You got a new ho
- Law 38: Wreck a Hater
- Law 39: Switch Up
- Law 40: Don't Down It, Crown It
- Law 41: Keep Your Front Up 'Til You Come Up
  - "Everything that glitters ain't gold, but if you appear perfect, you will more than likely be seen that way"
  - "if people think you are flawed like them, they will try to prove that the yare better than you"
- Law 42: If You Can See It, You Can Be It
- Law 43: Talk Shit and Swallow Spit
- Law 44: You Need Fire and Desire
- Law 45: Get Rid of the Word If
- Law 46: Move and Shake Like a Pimp Shakes
- Law 47: Pimpin' Is What You Do, Not Who You Are
- Law 48: Don't Believe the Hype
  - "The value of this game is in learning how to pimp the same way that Uncle Sam, big business, and power brokers in this world pimp"
  - "The real pimp game will never change. It's all about money and power, the control of dollars and people"
  - "If you can't figure out how to flip the script and pimp on something that can really make you rich, something that is legal and can make sure you never have to work again, then you shouldn't really call yourself a pimp"

The Best Pimps Are Not Pimps

Says the author:

> The absolute best pimps -business tycoons, power brokers, and politicians- don't have girls on the street, but they make countless dollars living off of other people's intelligence and hard work.

Good Pimps Make Women WANT to Work For Them

Says Ken:

> Good pimps don't have to steal or take anyone's money by force, becuase hoes will give pimps their money willingly.

Pimping is a Non-Contact Sport

> The worst pimp is a pimp who doesn't know pimping.
> Pimping is psychological warfare, it's not physical combat. Pimping is a straight mind game. Every game has its rules. The best players are the ones who not only learn the rules, but master and manipulate them.

Takeaway For Women: Avoid Pimps

Look after yourself because pimps are looking after themselves
We added this important note after this summary was linked in this sex workers subreddit.
To be clear, this Pimpology review is not meant as an endorsement: we teach how to win honorably, with win-win; takers and abusers are neither honorable nor high-power.

One trend emerges:

Pimps are more often there to take than to give.

Albeit some pimps may help with connections to higher-value clients, most pimps do not add any real value.

Pimps are often leeches who manipulate, swindle, or force women to work more and part with more cash.

Pimps are takers.

Generally speaking, we agree with that sex worker's advice to avoid pimps.
And we advise sex workers who are already working with pimps to dispassionately look at their relationships with pimps and ask hard yet often simple questions such as: "am I better off with or without this guy?", "is this guy making me better or worse?", "is this guy aggressive, manipulative, pushy, and often lying"?
Generally speaking, people who want the best for you are not aggressive, manipulative, or pushy.

A guy who wants to make you better off seeks to add value to your life, encourage your growth and independence.
If the pimp pushes you to work longer and harder and takes out a big chunk of your income, then… Quit being naive. He does have your best interest in mind.

CONS

- Sometimes overdoes the self-promotion

Sometimes it feels like Pimpin' Ken overdoes a bit the self-promotion. I feel that successful self-promotion is more understated. Too much self-promotion becomes self-damaging.

- Advises on triangulation without considering the risks

The author recommends playing a ho against another with triangulation.
But triangulation is risky.
People can talk to each other, realize you're playing them, and then they will ally to play against you.

- Some stories didn't add up…

… Or at least I didn't understand them.

- Limited tactical knowledge

The technical-level knowledge of actual pimping is limited.
There isn't much for things like how to first approach, start out, how much money to keep, how much to pay out, or the likes.

PROS

- Self-development wisdom

This book might be about pimpin', but it's also about deeper mindsets and about transcending pimping.

- Some good psychology

Here and there, there are some real gems of psychology and social strategy.
Also good to understand some psychology of pimps' controls on hookers -a good chunk of which hinges on hookers' own "buttons for manipulation" -as manipulation expert Braiker would call them (Braiker, 2013)-.

- Some valid takes on the psychology of success -or failure-

More or less hidden in some jargon, there were some real gems of what makes someone successful in life, or dependent.
For example, it was enlightening what Ken says really makes a hoe: the relinquishment of control over one's life.

- Many great quotes

Many good quotes on power and life.

Quotes

On not trying to keep them:

> Hoes belong to the community

On ignorance and wisdom:

> "Ignorance is bliss, but only for the person with the knowledge"

On wisdom and money:

> "The only way I'll tell it is if I sell it"

On paying for that good wisdom:

> The only thing that's free is air. So keep breathing nigga.

On talking without really sharing any valuable intel:

> "Good pimps have a gift for gab, but smart pimps talk a lot and at the same time don't say much at all"

On "empty popularity":

> You can be known by the whold world, but if you're broke, it ain't worth shit

On calling a spade a spade:

> "You're a pimp, ain't you?" she asked. You're a ho, ain't you?" I shot back. "Hell no!" she said indignant, "I'm an entertainer". "Ok ho, I said"

On appearing perfect to avoid competition:

> "if people think you are flawed like them, they will try to prove that the yare better than you"

Review

"Pimpology" sheds light on the mindset and dynamics of 'pimping', and although it's written more as a guide, it's equally effective for self-defense and power dynamics awareness.

Pimpin' Ken's prose mimics rap music, street English, bars, and memorable quotes.

Reading between the lines, the author himself is a case study on pimping dynamics; he comes across as charismatic, which probably helped me attract and maintain a lopsided relationship where the pimp takes far more than he gives.

Understanding Human Nature: Is Alfred Adler Disempowering Psychobabble? (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

In Understanding Human Nature (1927), Alfred Adler explores human personality and psychology from different angles, including how character develops, the nature of the psyche, how we see the world, and how we become who we are. Some people regard Understanding Human Nature as Adler's Magnum Opus and a foundational text of Individual Psychology.

Contents

- Summary

- Review

Summary

About the Author:

Alfred Adler (1870-1937) was an Austrian physician, psychotherapist, and one of the founding fathers of the "individual psychology" school.
Individual Psychology holds that the driving force of human behavior is the individual's striving for power, partly to compensate for feelings of inferiority.
Adler was initially close to Freud and a member of Freud's "Wednesday Society", or the "Vienna Psychoanalytic Society", but the two parted ways years later as they grew to dislike each other.
Albeit Adler was never a "disciple" of Freud, but a colleague, I personally can see much of Freud's psychoanalytic -and unscientific- approach in Adler-.

Why Learning Human Nature

The benefits of learning human nature:

- Deeper self-awareness
- Better relationships
- Protection against deception and manipulation

Don't Go Around "Psychologizing" Others

Says Adler:

> Nothing is more likely to arouse resentment, and nothing will attract greater criticism, than brusquely presenting individuals with the stark facts we have discovered in the exploration of their psyche.

And he's right when he adds:

> An excellent way to acquire a bad reputation is carelessly to misuse one's knowledge, for example in the desire to show how much one has guessed about the character of one's neighbour at dinner.

The True Social Scientist Is Modest About His Own Knowledge

I really liked this part.

On the depth and complexity of human nature:

The understanding of human nature is an enormous problem, whose solution has been the goal of our culture since time immemorial.

My Note: Complex because of exceptions, but not that complex
In truth, I believe that human nature is not THAT challenging.
The basics are common to almost everyone. It's the exceptions that are more challenging and the number of exceptions.
But even those, often follow a pattern that can be summarized in far fewer larger categories.

On avoiding overgeneralization:

> It is also dangerous to misrepresent the basic principles as iron laws (…) Even those who do understand the science would feel insulted by such behaviour.

And on the necessity of modesty:

> We must repeat what we have already said: the science of human nature compels us to be modest.

Men Want to Push Women Down

Adler has some good analysis of the sexual conflict between genders.

He says:

> As things stand now there is a constant striving on the part of men to dominate women, and a corresponding dissatisfaction with masculine domination on the part of women.

Things stand pretty much the same around the 2020s.
However, since the two genders also seek each other, the strive for domination leads to combative relationships.

Says Adler:

> Since the two sexes are so interdependent it is easy to understand how this constant tension leads to discord and friction, which must of necessity be extraordinarily painful to both sexes.

Read more:

- The sexual arms' race

> Sexual Conflict: How Men & Women Fight The Sex War

Submissive People Never Achieve Much

Says Adler:

> People who are characteristically servile and submissive are equally ill-adapted to jobs that demand initiative. They are only comfortable when obeying someone else's command. Servile individuals live by the rules and laws of others, and this type seeks out a position of servility almost compulsively.

Also read:

- Submissive behavior and body language

Religious Heretics (The "Personal God" Heresy)

There are some people who approach God as their personal wish-grantor.

And this quote made me laugh:

> In short, the dear Lord has nothing else to do but to be occupied with their troubles and pay a great deal of attention to them.

Of course, this is not what religion is about.
Says Adler:

> There is so much heresy in this type of religious worship that if the old days of the Inquisition were to return, these religious fanatics would probably be the first to be burned at the stake.

The same approach in social relationships is a failure to understand the nature of social exchanges as well, and asking instead of finding a way to also give.
Says Adler:

> They approach their God just as they approach their fellow human beings, complaining, whining, yet never lifting a finger to help themselves or to better their circumstances. Co-operation, they feel, is an obligation only for others.

- The enlightened collaborator

> Life Strategy: The Enlightened Collaborator

More Wisdom

- Make sure you're not being driven into unhappiness

Alfred Adler says that some of us try hard to succeed to make up for our past failures and for our inferiority complexes.
But trying too hard to compensate can lead us into chronic dissatisfaction with life.

- Parents: don't ridicule children!

> Ridicule of children is well-nigh criminal. It leaves a permanent mark on the psyche of children which resurfaces in the habits and actions of their adult lives.

- Parents: don't lie to children!

Says Adler:

> Another manifestation of not taking children seriously is the custom of telling children palpable lies, with the > result that they begin not only to doubt their immediate environment but also to question the seriousness and reality of life.

- Your life's purpose

> In everyday life, however, it makes little difference who is right and who is wrong, since the only thing that counts is getting things done and making a contribution to the lives of others.

Alfred Adler Criticism

Since Alfred Adler is so influential, I dedicate a larger portion to the criticism section.

#1. Unscientific...

Much like Freud's psychoanalytic approach is, some of Adler's insights are sometimes genius and, sometimes, probably correct.

But, being unscientific, it's also untested and sometimes unconvincing and dubious-sounding.

#2. ... But seeks to frame it as scientific

Unluckily, Adler seeks to frame his work as scientific.

He says:

> Superficiality has no place here (in psychiatry, En).
> Diagnostic errors are soon apparent, whereas a correct understanding of the disorder leads to successful treatment.
> In other words, our knowledge of human nature is rigorously tested.

It's not "rigorously tested".
Science means that it must be tested in a controlled environment and measured on a group which is then compared to a random sample.
That's not what Adler was doing.

He did not measure anything, and he did not have control groups.

To me, this is tantamount to (self) manipulation.

#3. Freudian: a psychoanalyst looking for confirmation

Adler is more careful than Freud is about linking past events to present neurosis and behavior.

He says:

> we ask for his first childhood memory, even though we know it is not always possible to test its objective truth.

Yet, he also falls for the allure of the (fake) science of psychoanalysis:

> Now let us plot the graph of this man's life style as described above, by taking one event in his life and seeking to link it with his present attitude. As is our usual practice, we ask for his first childhood memory…

Says later on Adler:

> (…) youngest child behave as though they felt neglected and inferior. In our investigations we have always been able to detect this feeling of inferiority

I'm sure he has.
And the fact that he was looking for it might have a lot to do with it.

Confirmation Bias: Psychoanalysts Feeding Patients Their Own Biases

Psychoanalysis searches for links between past and present.
And then comes up with (largely made up) theories about why people do what they do.

But, as someone said, you find what you're looking for.
And psychoanalysts don't discover the truth, they discover what they were looking for.
Sometimes even prodding the patient to provide what the psychoanalyst is looking for.
Says Adler:

> We must proceed by cautious hints and with proper delicacy.
> We further guess that all this must have begun at some time in the past when demands must have been made on her.
> We succeed in eliciting from her the admission that many years ago she had to live through a time when she lacked affection more than anything else.

And there you are, the therapist elicits what he wanted to hear.

#4. "Man Is Weak" Inferiority Complexes: Nonsense

Some of Adler's theoretical model is built around the idea of "feeling of inferiority".

Those feelings of inferiority permeate the whole human species, in Adler's point of view.

He says:

> From the above we may conclude that the human being, compared with other life forms, is an inferior organism.
> This feeling of inferiority and insecurity is always present in the human consciousness.

But based on what does Adler says that the human being is an inferior organism?
I can tell you, for one, that I feel superior to all other animals. Including a Tyrannosaurus rex, if he were alive.

Here is how Adler concludes that humans are "inferior":

> We are forced to consider human beings among these weaker animals, because they too are not strong enough to live alone.
> Without tools they can only offer the feeblest resistance to the depredations of nature. They need all manner of artificial aids merely to stay alive on this planet.

But what he says is true for any form of life.
Any form of life is victim to the "depredations of nature", in a way. And, in comparison, humans are the ones that more than any other animal managed to control that nature.

And:

> Imagine being alone (..) in a primitive forest!

> One would be more at risk than any other living creature (…) They have neither speed nor power, not the teeth of the carnivore, nor the sharp eyes or acute hearing that warn other creatures of danger. Humanity needs a whole battery of tools to guarantee its existence.

Frankly, this is nonsense.
Just for one, humans have great eyesight compared to most other living organisms.

But most of all, it remains to be explained how the hell such a weak species came to dominate and control (almost) all other species?

I highly recommend two articles here:

- 3 pillars of cognition, to explain some of Adler's biases.
- Naive self-help, look especially at "naive disempowerment"
- Self-empowerment, as the antidote for that sad sack narrative of human inferiority

PROS

- The feeling of inferiority as a driver

I criticized this idea of the feeling of inferiority because Adler takes it too far.

Yet, if one puts it into a larger perspective, feelings of inferiority can be a powerful driving force for many of us. And it is important to understand both when and how they drive us, both for our own self-development, and for understanding others.

- Acute analysis of the male/female power struggles

There is some very good analysis of the power dynamics between the sexes.

Review

Understanding Human Nature is a personal and Freudian take on human nature, with some good insights, presented as scientific.

The issue is that there are also not-so-good insights, and that it's not scientific.

I had high expectations for both Adler and this book.

But, possibly due to unrealistic expectations, I was more disappointed than impressed.

There are some deep insights in "Understanding Human Nature", and Adler seems like a dedicated student of human nature.
Yet, there are also some basic flaws in it.
The main one is the lack of scientific rigor, without the author ever even acknowledging that his theories are based on his own thoughts and interpretations, not on data or research, and not even much on his own personal experience.

The second flaw, in my opinion, is that Adler's understanding of human nature is severely incomplete due to his lack of knowledge of evolutionary psychology.
That leads to quite some distortions and many convoluted psychoanalytic explanations that have instead much simpler explanations.

Adler's own main thesis that the will to power stems from feelings of inferiority is incomplete without evolutionary psychology.
People's strive to power has been selected because it was good both for men's survival, and for men's reproduction.

But Adler never had the chance to learn evolutionary psychology, so he never thought about that.

Understanding Human Nature Summary: Alfred Adler Psychology

In Understanding Human Nature (1927), Alfred Adler explores human personality and psychology from different angles, including how character develops, the nature of the psyche, how we see the world, and how we become who we are. Some people regard Understanding Human Nature as Adler's Magnum Opus and a foundational text of Individual Psychology.

8 Strategies of Office Warfare

Lucio Buffalmano · 25 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Office enemies are different than “simple” toxic colleagues, or colleagues who play power moves.

Power moves can come from anyone, even from friends sometimes.

An enemy instead is an individual who has put you in their cross-hair.
Either out of spite or because you stand in the way, they want to harm you.
They want to crush your reputation, destroy your social status, make your life difficult or see it as their life mission to have you fired.

This is not the time to see life as win-win or trying to see the positives in them.
Naive cooperators routinely get steamrolled by the backstabbing enemies.

When it’s time to play next level mind-fuckery, this is your lesson.

Here is how you can deal with enemies:

Contents

- 1. Keep Them Close
- 2. Compliment Them Publicly to Win The Reputation War
- 3. Don’t Beg For Allies…
- 5. But Make People Want to Side With You
- 5. Let The War Take Its Toll… On Your Enemy
- 6. Unsettle Their Minds: Mark Their Territory
- 7. Shoot them (Figuratively)

- Protecting From Future Enemies
  - 1. Teach them nothing

- 2. Be friendly while you isolate them
- 3. Make them Feel They're Doing Great (While They're Doing Shit)
- 4. Give Them Too Easy or Too Difficult Tasks
- 5. Get So Good You Can't Be F*cked With
- Summary

1. Keep Them Close

You know The Godfather rule, don't you?

If you don't, here it is again:

> Keep your friends close, and your enemies even closer

The reason why you want to keep them close are:

1. you give them less room to maneuver against you
2. you fuck with their heads
3. you show your mettle and resolve

This rule is true both physically and emotionally.

Take a meeting for example.
The typical limp dick approach is to keep the distance and sit far away from your enemy.
And that shows them just how you fear them.

The proactive, power move approach instead is to sit right next to them.

This fucks with their head as they think "shit, he knows I'm out to get him and this guy still has the guts to come sit here as if nothing was going on".

It sends the message that you are more powerful and nastier than they could ever be, and chances are they will soon drop their game.

If you want to take it to next level, you will evne say this when you sit next to them:

> You: Oh, there you are!

With a smile, as if you were looking for them!
What did Tommy say to Billy Batts in the trunk?
"Look at me in the eyes".

Exactly…

2. Compliment Them Publicly to Win The Reputation War

Next level power move.

While most people would trade barbs, you want to compliment your enemy in public just when they seek to undermine you.

Without going overboard, but positive comments such as:

> You: I appreciate you care so much about this project
> You: Thank you for weighing in, you have a lot of experience on this

Why would you do this?
Because you want people to know that you are not the issue and the hatred doesn't come from you.

And when you will eventually maneuver against them it will also seem motivated by a real issue and not by personal rancor.

2.2. Judo War: Thank Them for Their Criticism

Don't push against them when they criticize you.

Especially if the criticism is well-founded or if they know what they are talking about because in that case you are responsible for 90% of your own demise.

It would be way too easy for them to make you look butthurt, selfish or overreactive.
Even if they don't say anything you will look so in front of others when you push back on criticism.

Don't "take it offline" either, because this is what they will say:

Say instead something like this:

> You: Thank you man, I appreciate an opinion. I'm not sure on what to make with it right now, let me reflect on it and then we can speak further later

Notice the embedded power move there: "I appreciate an opinion". As if you were saying "every asshole has an opinion".

Then keep going with whatever you were doing.
Unless their criticism completely invalidates what you were saying or presenting, keep going or you give them too much power.

3. Don't Beg For Allies...

You know the insurance rule, right?

> You can't buy insurance while your house is on fire.

Similarly, you can't recruit allies when you're under fire.
Why not?
'Cause it looks desperate, pal.
And it looks like you're losing the war and need back-up.

Sure, you want allies.
But nobody likes war conscription.
And you don't want neutral folks to stay away from you because you're under fire.

So… Keep your mouth shut about the war.
Especially if you're lower on power than your enemy. The last thing people want is to side with the lower-power player.

I know, keeping everything for yourself when you feel victimize not easy, so you can maybe take your load off with someone outside of work.
And if you really must speak to someone at work, at least make 100% sure the person you speak to is a friend who keeps his mouth shut.

5. But Make People Want to Side With You

To win the war, know the rules first.

And the basic rules is that people want to win easy, and for that, they want to ally with the winners.

Benito Mussolini said before entering WWII:

> I need a few thousand dead to sit at the peace talks table

He had it badly wrong, but when he made his move, it looked like he was right. And that's how the most Machiavellian players think.

If the war is over a managerial position expect that the alliances will shift on the side of who is winning -or who looks like is winning-.

Don't be saddened or angry about it, you're a professional, remember?
Instead, strategize for it.

Look confident and in control, like the power position you're fighting for is already yours.
That's how you recruit allies.

5. Let The War Take Its Toll... On Your Enemy

War can take a mental toll.

Great, let that bitch of your enemy get tolled.

First of all, you must avoid feeding him any good news.
Backstabbers and bullies feed on your overreactions.
So don't serve them any.
If they play covert and microaggressions, learn the power dynamics to deal with them effectively.

And the war is psychological as much as it's professional.
So, repeat after me: political warfare is fun.

Stay positive and show people the differences in personality between you and them.

People will naturally gravitate around you and support you when you're a force of positivity.

6. Unsettle Their Minds: Mark Their Territory

What, you thought you were going to make your territory?

Yeah, sure, and what are you gonna gain pissing on your own desk?
Let the dumb mutts play that bottom feeder's game.

You will mark their territory.
And in what matters most: the alliances.

The inexperienced -and 99% of people actually- will stick with their friends and avoid their enemies' friends.

But as we mentioned in a previous article: avoid making more enemies than you need to!
His friends and crew are not your enemies, your enemy is the only enemy.

The top power mover will destabilize his enemy by walking into his turf, joking with his friends and get friendly reactions from them.

This will isolate him and drive him to the edge.

If you do it well, chances are that he will complain to his friends for being friendly with you, or at least he will act off and lose points with them.
If he is of the domineering type, he will also want to punish his friends, who now start disliking him and finally see him for the real sorry ass MF that he is.

Finally, walking into his turf and acting friendly with him while making friends with his crew is such a display of mental and social power that he will think twice before crossing you again.

Example: Making His Friends Your Friends

Imagine you are Regina George in the movie Mean Girls, and your enemy is the emo girl.

The effect you want to have on your enemy's crew and on the people around is the effect Regina has on Lindsay Lohan.
Lohan, like all other girls, wants to be with Regina George.

And that drives the emo wild:

You want to have the same effect.
You want people, including your enemies' crew, to want to be by your side.

And that comes back to the fundamentals of who you are: a cool cat with lots of power, who does a great job and who is good with people.

7. Shoot them (Figuratively)

Figuratively… ;).

The game can't go on forever.

If all of the above steps are not enough to make him desist, eventually, you gotta maneuver to get rid of them.
You want to stop the war in one of the following ways:

1. You isolate them so well they're powerless and stop bothering you
2. You beat them so badly they change department or quit
3. You move so far ahead they become a distant memory
4. You get the promotion and fire them

Of them all, I prefer and recommend you go for N.3.

They will likely forget you too by the way.
As Taleb notes in "Skin In The Game", people get jealous of people who are close to them.
And that's why the ultimate solution is always to move forward.

Protecting From Future Enemies

If you feel that some up and coming guys are going to become enemies, do the following:

1. Teach them nothing

They will try to learn as much as possible from you, but you share as little as possible.

It's either you are their boss and gain from their good work, or why should you grow an enemy within the ranks?

If they join your calls, make sure you're not showing your best tricks.

If they want to join the important calls, say that you wish they could but you are going to talk about personal stuff with the customers and you want to keep it natural.

If they ask you to fix their coding say it's quite good without giving details. Or fix it without explaining much because "you're in a hurry".

Seem superior, like you don't have time for younger guns. You will come across a bit grumpy, but not cold and calculative.

2. Be friendly while you isolate them

Be friendly on the surface, but don't introduce them to your network.

Don't criticize them openly with your friends but don't say anything good either.

If someone says something good about them, nod or add something inconsequential and move on.
If someone criticizes them, look as if you wished you could say more but don't want to because you'd rather not bash a teammate.

Basically, you want to hit them while at the same time looking like you're not.

3. Make them Feel They're Doing Great (While They're Doing Shit)

The more people feel like they're doing great, the less extra effort they will put in.

Tell them that when you started you weren't half as good as they are, which will lead them to think that they will automatically get to your level without any extra effort.

Alternatively, make them feel so bad that they should change jobs.

What you want to avoid is the middle road where they're doing OK but they can do better.

4. Give Them Too Easy or Too Difficult Tasks

Research on peak performance shows that people improve the best when they're dealing with tasks right at the edge of their skills.

If you want to slow their development, give them super difficult tasks that they need to find someone else to do it or super easy ones where they learn nothing.

5. Get So Good You Can't Be F*cked With

Finally, never forget the biggest truth: your main focus is always on yourself and your own improvement.

The best strategy is always this: be so good they can't touch you.

Emotional Blackmail: Book Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

In Emotional Blackmail (1998) author Susan Forward analyzes the manipulative dynamics between emotionally close individuals -be it family, close friends, or intimate relationships-.
Forward writes from the point of view of the victims of emotional manipulation, describing both the manipulative tactics that blackmailers deploy, and the solutions you can implement.

Contents

- Takeaways
- Notes
- More Wisdom
- Real-Life Applications
- Quotes
- CONS
- PROS
- Review

Takeaways

- Emotional blackmail is an abusive and manipulative approach to using emotions against you
- If you let it go unchecked, it will ruin your mental health, harm you physically, and destroy your relationship
- You don't cure emotional blackmail hoping your partner will change, but by working on yourself first and foremost
- It will take courage to change the power dynamics, but with assertiveness, self-help, and some courage, you will do it

Notes

About the Author:
Susan Forward is an American psychotherapist and author. Susan had her own practice, as well as being a therapist, instructor and consultant to several Southern California psychiatric and medical facilities.

1. Emotional Blackmail: A Definition

Forward defines emotional blackmail as:

> Emotional blackmail is a form of manipulation in which people close to us threaten, directly or indirectly, to punish us if we don't do what they want.
> The basic threat, which can be expressed in many different ways, is : If you don't behave the way I want you to, you will suffer.

The closer people are to us, the more they know what they can leverage to push our buttons.

2. FOG: The Emotional Manipulators' Tool of The Trade

When the manipulative fog descends upon the victim, reality distorts, and you cannot recognize anymore what's real or manipulated, what's fair or unfair.

FOG stands for:

- Fear: afraid to cross them, or afraid of the consequences of not submitting and do as they want
- Obligation: feel like we are obliged to help, support, or consent to whatever it is they want

Says the author:

> Blackmailers never hesitate to put our sense of obligation to the test, emphasizing how much they've given up, how much they've done for their targets, how much we owe them (social exchange manipulation, En).
> They may even use reinforcements from religion and social traditions to emphasize how much their targets should feel indebted to them. "A good daughter should spend time with her mother."

- Guilt: Guilt is normal in any empathic individual, and the blackmailer leverages it. The blackmailer seeks to make us feel guilty if we don't comply with whatever they request. When guilt is unwarranted and the product of manipulation, the author calls it "undeserved guilt"

What out for guilt! Because it can lead to self-esteem vicious circles.
Then it's:

> The guilt we feel easily becomes a sense that "I'm bad, so I deserve this treatment."

3. The Six Steps of Emotional Blackmail

These are the steps of a typical emotional blackmail:

1. Demand
2. Resistance
3. Pressure: they don't try to understand your needs or point of view, but pushes to change your mind
4. Threats: if you don't cave in, here come the threats. They can be direct threats like breakup threats, but can also be more covert "guilt trips", promises of future rewards, or promises of love and intimacy
5. Compliance: if you give in, then there comes the:
6. Repetition: once the manipulator understands what makes you comply, they will be doing more and more of the same

Note:
Susan calls them "symptoms", but they seem more like steps along a progression than "symptoms".

4. The Four Types of Emotional Blackmailers

Susan differentiates four archetypes of blackmailers.

They are:

- Punishers: they make their demands and threats most obvious. Sometimes with direct talk, but also with smoldering silences. They still let us know clearly.
- Self-punishers: they emphasize what they'll do to themselves.

Says Susan about these two:

> Where punishers turn their targets into children, self-punishers cast their targets in the role of the grown-up—the only adult in the relationship.

- Sufferers: victims per excellence, blamers and guilt-trippers, they make us feel bad if we don't give them what they need. Sometimes, they pull away without even explaining what's the issue. Other times, they tell us they are ruined if we don't do them whatever favor they're asking for.
- Tantalizers: hold out a promise of something great to happen if we only do what they want. Sometimes they can frame their requests as shit-tests we need to pass to get to the promised land.

Also see:

- Types of abusers

> 7 Types of Abusive Men: a Psychological Analysis

5. The Tools of Emotional Blackmail

- The spin: derived from political manipulation, it means that whatever they do is "good" (well-intentioned or wise), and whatever we do is "bad". Resisting to their manipulation is evidence of our flaws.
- Pathologizing: if you resist them, you're ill, crazy, or need some help -maybe their help (urgh!)-. Questioning our ability to love when someone wants our love is an example of pathologizing.
- Negative comparisons:
- Enlisting allies: the closer to you they can enlist an ally, the more leverage they will have over you

6. The Psychological Profile of Emotional Blackmailers

In this section, the author goes into the psychology of an emotional blackmailer.

Some of the traits that stand out:

- Hate to lose: it's OK to be angry at a "no", but emotionally healthy can accept and compromise. With emotional blackmailers, frustration at a "no" doesn't lead to negotiation, but to pressure and threats
- Selfish, it's about them, not you

> It's a strange kind of love that is so blind to the target's feelings.

It is indeed.
I'd even wonder whether one can call it "love". At least, it's definitely not value-adding love.

- They want to take, not give ("value-takers")

> To an emotional blackmailer, keeping your trust doesn't count, respecting your feelings doesn't count, being fair doesn't count. The ground rules that allow for healthy give-and-take go out the window.

- Scarcity mindset

Say the author:

> Often blackmailers' self-centeredness springs from a belief that the supply of attention and affection available to them is finite—and shrinking fast.

- Thin-skinned, make mountains out of molehills

> Emotional blackmailers often behave as though each disagreement is the make-or-break factor in the > relationship.

> Even mild frustration is viewed as potentially catastrophic.

That's why they react with everything they have.

This can happen sometimes with emotional blackmailers who never learned to handle difficulties in life
See this forum entry for more.

- Catastrophizing + scarcity mindset

> Deprivation tape starts to play in their heads: This isn't going to work out. I never get what I want. (…)
> With these thoughts cycling through their minds in an endless loop, blackmailers believe they haven't got a chance of prevailing—unless they play hardball. That belief is the common denominator underlying all emotional blackmail: "I don't trust that I'm going to get what I need, so I have to give myself every advantage".

- Maintaining a strong connection with pain

Negative emotions, albeit negative, are still an emotional investment.
Says the author:

> (…) they are activating the target's feelings for them, and even if the feelings are negative, they've created a tight bond.
> You may resent or even hate the blackmailer, but as long as your focus is on them, they haven't been abandoned or discarded with indifference.

- Punishers see themselves as maintaining orders

Some punishers see themselves not as punishing, but as maintaining order, doing what's right, or proving they can't be pushed around.
Some of them can be very sensitive, and perceive a fair enforcing of your boundaries as an attack on their persona.

Also see:

- Power-hungry partners

> How Power Hungry Partners Ruin People & Relationships

7. The Traits That Make You Vulnerable to Emotional Blackmail

- Need for approval: it's much stronger with authority figures and people we admire. Also see "the judge power dynamics"
- Fear of anger
- Need for peace at any price
- Taking too much responsibility for other people's lives
- High level of self-doubt

7.2. Beliefs Predisposing to Emotional Abuse

Some of the beliefs of the victims include:

- It's OK to give a lot more than I get

- If I love someone, I'm responsible for their happiness
- Good, loving people make others happy
- If I do what I really want to do, the other person will see me as selfish
- If no one else will fix the problem, it's up to me
- I never win with this person
- They're smarter or stronger than I am
- It won't kill me to do this, because they really need me
- Their needs and feelings are more important than mine

And, says the author, to change your behavior you first need to change your beliefs.

8. Manipulators Destroy Relationships

Getting compliance with manipulation and blackmail ruins relationships.

Relationships become toxic, or they are hollowed out of any feelings and true intimacy.
The emotional blackmailer doesn't seem to realize this simple truth.

Says the author:

> They seem to have a childlike inability to connect behavior to consequences, and they don't appear to give any thought to what they will be left with once they've gotten the target's compliance

In my opinion, that's can be the case also because they are low in emotional intelligence, or high in psychopathy, and so form no real bond.

Says again the author:

> They're in a FOG of their own that makes them oblivious to how much they alienate other people with their bullying.

Emotional blackmailers who use their partners' weaknesses against them also actively train their partners to never share their true selves.
And that kills intimacy.

Says the author:

> What's left when we must consistently walk on eggs with someone?
> Superficial small talk, strained silences, lots of tension. Just below the artificial calm that surrounds a placated blackmailer and a target who's given in is the widening chasm that's opening between them.

This is why abusers ultimately fail, and struggle to keep high-quality partners.

Which leads me back to one of the tenets of this website: power that lasts it not coercive, but built on buy-in and making others want to follow you.
This is one of the reasons why I discourage guys on this website to learn from any "dark psychology" courses around.
Not only are they toxic, but they're based on a defensive, low-value mindset.

Also read:

- The fundamental laws of power

9. In Good Relationships, It's About Needs, Not Wins

Healthy relationships seek to find a middle ground, or to find out who has the bigger needs.

Then, the person who cares less, will usually let the partner with the stronger needs "win", since it matters more to him/her.

Says Susan:

> Actually, in many cases, the outcome doesn't matter too much, and the person with the strongest preference usually wins by default.

But if someone wants to win, they won't try to negotiate, but, try to:

- Control you
- Ignore your protests
- Insist that his or her character and motives are superior to yours
- Avoid taking any responsibility for the problems between you

The author says that good relationships have a balance of give and take, including a sense of balance and fairness.

People feel like they can give in and still not feel like they're losing, because they know the other party is not out to take advantage of them.

10. Curing Emotional Blackmail

Addressing emotional blackmail starts with you.

1. Start with 15 minutes a day with:
    1. Contract: you write to yourself that you're an adult with options, and that you are going to stand up for your rights and for fair treatment. Every day you read it and sign it.
    2. Power statement: Victims always indirectly tell them they can't stand or can't take their blackmailer's pressure. Instead, you will repeat "I CAN STAND IT.
    3. Self-affirming phrases: these are empowering new phrases that you will repeat to yourself in order to change your beliefs
2. When dealing with emotional blackmail, use SOS
    1. Stop: take distance from the blackmailer when you feel pressured
    2. Observe: take stock of what's happening
    3. Strategize: strategize about your response, then follow through

The strategies that the describes explains are:

- Nondefensive communication: this is about communicating while remaining calm and detached
- Making an ally out of an adversary: ask a question on how you can understand them better, how they can help you have a better relationship, and generally asking them if they can help you with more value-adding collaboration (the power moves approves of this solution, won't work with everyone, but worth a try)
- Bartering: the author lists bartering and humor together, but I prefer separating them

She says that bartering is better than imposing because

> No one likes to look or feel as though they're giving in, and our distaste for one-sided solutions holds most people back from taking the first step toward resolving a dispute. But bartering creates a win-win situation > that's easy for everyone to accept.

Very true.
Also see "frame control techniques".

- Using humor: this works best when the relationship is overall good. So you can poke some fun at their bossy ways as a way to highlight that it's actually annoying, but while keeping it light and fun

The author also recommends lots of exercises.
See a real-life example I used against an emotional blackmailer:

- Paradoxical therapy against a manipulator

Finally, keep in mind that "sorry isn't enough".
Many blackmailers will pretend to go along with the new assertive you, but they will then get back to their old selves.
Instead of relying on words, monitor their behavior for actual change.

And it's not a bad idea if you learn how to test people, too.

Keep in mind that some relationships will improve as you empower yourself. But some partners cannot accept you as a healthy human being, and you must be ready to let go of those relationships.
They weren't good to begin with, anyway.

More Wisdom

- Devaluing others to lessen the pain: angry blackmailer will sometimes attack their partner and devalue her. It's a way of downplaying their feelings of loss. Scared blackmailer might also initiate they breakup out of fear of getting hurt first

Real-Life Applications

- If you speak very indirectly, seek to be more direct: indirect like "gee, I wish someone would open the window" is an act of "daily manipulation" for Susan Forward. Instead, ask directly for what you want.
  Susan says that asking is high-risk, but protecting yourself too can come across as sneaky. I agree.
  Also see:
  - covert-aggression
  - passive-aggressiveness
- Don't blindly trust any doctor, they're people just like anyone else: says Susan Forward:

> Pathologizing is especially persuasive when it comes from an authority figure—a doctor, professor, lawyer or therapist. Our relationships with these people are based on trust, and we tend to cloak professionals in a mantle of wisdom that some don't deserve.

And she shares the story of an abusive therapist.

Quotes

> These are more than simple misunderstandings—they're power struggles.

On manipulation:

> Emotional blackmail takes to extremes behavior that we use and encounter all the time: manipulation. Many forms of manipulation aren't troublesome at all. We all manipulate one another at times, and we all get manipulated.

On the sufferers' type manipulation:

> When Carol saw that I was really resisting, she pulled out all the stops: "I have no one else to turn to." "I don't know what else to do—I thought you could turn to your family when you're in trouble"—suddenly I'm family again.

On blackmailers abusing the social exchange system:

> Memory, as employed by a blackmailer, becomes the Obligation Channel, with nonstop replays of the blackmailer's good and generous behavior toward us.
> When we receive a kindness from a blackmailer, it's not soon forgotten. More like an open-ended loan than a gift, it's always got payments attached—with interest—and we can never seem to get out of the red.

Examples of emotional blackmailers destroying relationships:

> What kind of relationship does Josh's father expect to have with his son if Josh provides the victory his father is demanding by giving up his lover? Margaret, whose husband, Cal, pressured her to take part in group sex, gave in to her husband's emotional blackmail, but it was the death knell for the marriage.

On the failure of blackmailers:

> Karen's mother resorts to arm-twisting to get Karen to spend more time with her, yet for all the closeness that's left between them, she'd do just as well to talk to a cardboard cutout of her daughter. The rigid interaction between them has no room for the real Karen or what matters to her.

On frenemies:

> Friends and relatives at different levels of achievement or monetary success frequently have seething envies and resentments toward one another that severely contaminate their relationships.

If you fear physical harm, get out:

> If you truly fear that another person will harm you, you don't belong in a relationship with them.

From the letter a woman wrote to her punishing husband (so vulnerable and powerful):

> Maybe instead of punishing me you could help me.

It's up to you to set limits:

> Blackmailers learn how far they can go by observing how far we let them go.

CONS

- Some small generalizations

Writes the author:

> Parents using this kind of blackmail will inevitably find a flaw in the next person, and the next, and in anyone who represents a threat to their control.

You know that generalizations are one of this website's pet peeves, so I disagree with the "inevitably".

- Sometimes it feels like the author "psychologizes" to never calls an a-hole an a-hole

Sure, there are reasons why people do mean things.
But sometimes it feels like it was too much justification, and never calling a spade a spade.

In this case, never calling an a-hole an a-hole.

The author even says:

> blackmailers may convince themselves that they're helping us with their punishments.

Sure, they can.
But I didn't read of blackmailers who are just simple, plain a-holes.

But I'm more in line with George Simon's take on manipulation: sometimes, you gotta call a a-hole an a-hole, and stop psychologizing on what are the inner drives that make him an a-hole.

- Nore sure on taking verbal abuse on the chin while remaining nonreactive

If the blackmailer gets vicious, the author recommends you remain calm and detached.
A worthy goal, of course, but I feel that's too challenging for most people and they'll just pretend they're calm, while instead they are growing angry and resentful.

PROS

"Emotional Blackmail" is a treasure trove, so just considered these a small sample of "pros":

- Lots of "how-to" guides & helpful exercises

This is a "how-to", "can-do" book, with lots of great actionable tips and exercises.
See one of the exercises here.

- Great examples

The authors weaves her concepts around real-life examples that back-up her theory, and that helps readers understand better, as well as helping them to understand what they need to do to combat emotional blackmail.

- Great psychology analyses

As a social researcher looking for wisdom, I appreciated the good psychological analyses.

Review

I consider "Emotional Blackmail" one of the foundational books of interpersonal manipulation.

Particularly, this is about manipulation in close and intimate relationships.
I learned a lot from Susan Forward and I will be using what I learned for this website's content and products.
And that's the biggest compliment I can make to any author.

This is a highly recommended book to anyone who wants to protect themselves against emotional manipulation, emotional blackmail or, in general, learn more about power dynamics and psychology.

The Assertiveness Guide for Women: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 12 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Assertiveness Guide for Women (2016) helps readers improve their communication skills and develop the skills of assertive communication.
Julie de Azevedo Hanks, the author, addresses assertiveness from a holistic perspective, including attachment styles, individuation, and general self-development.

Summary

About the Author: Julie de Azevedo Hanks is an American licensed clinical social worker and psychotherapist. She holds a Master of Social Work, from the University of Utah (1995), and a Ph.D., in Marriage and Family Therapy from the University of Louisiana.
She owns her own counseling practice and has 28 years of counseling experience, specializing in women's emotional health and relationships. She is an assistant professor of social work at Utah Valley University, and also runs an online blog.

1. What It Means to Be Assertive

> Assertiveness is about treating yourself as an equal with others and taking ownership of your well-being while respecting others' differences.

2. The 5 Skills of Assertion

The author says that it takes five skills to reach assertion:

1. Self-Reflection: Thinking and understanding who you are. Looking at your development, your relationship patterns, and how your past impacts your ability to be assertive.

2. Self-Awareness: Awareness of your feelings, wants, and needs, resulting in a sense of confidence about what you want to communicate (while self-reflection is more focused on general, high-level awareness, self-awareness is more about present, "in the moment" awareness)

Says the author on the benefits of cultivating emotional awareness:

> In summary, awareness of your feelings as sources of information is at the heart of developing self-awareness, a necessary component of acting assertively. You cannot act assertively if you aren't tuned in to your internal experiences and cues.

She adds that emotional awareness includes both your feelings, and what others are likely to feel (empathy).

3. Self-Soothing: Ability to manage your intense emotions and soothe yourself. Striking a balance between appreciating your emotions, without becoming overwhelmed by them. It leads to a sense of calmness, which allows you to clearly assert yourself and convey your intended message.

> Assertiveness comes from a place of emotional awareness but not emotional volatility.

4. Self-Expression: Ability to communicate your feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants clearly to others (communication skills), along with a willingness to back up your words with action. Good self-expression leads to stronger and deeper connections with others.

> Sharing your honest feelings in meaningful and powerful ways with others, in word and action, plays a large part in the development of healthy intimacy and connection with others.
> One memory aid that helps with this concept is to imagine that the word "intimacy" is pronounced "intomeesee," as in "into me, see"—as though a request: "Will you see into me?"

5. Self-Expansion: Openness to other people's points of views, accepting them as being, "holding space" for differences, and the desire to grow through your relationships. It leads to compassion, as well as to stronger relationships.

> Too often, differences between people result in a power struggle of whose opinion or feelings or ideas are "right" or "better."
> It absolutely does not have to be this way! An assertive woman can "hold space" in a conversation—and in her mind and heart–for another person's unique perspective or experience

3. Thoughts & Feelings: Seek the Overlap

Feelings are emotional, in your heart, while thoughts are more rational, in your mind.

The goal is to operate from a position in which the two overlap, feeding into each other to help you reach the best solutions for you.

Says the author:

> The ability to create a healthy working distance from your emotions is a process.
> The goal is to be able to separate thoughts and feelings in your mind, and then act from the place where they overlap.

I very much agree with this approach, and you can see how it was helpful for me when I faced a difficult decision, and the enlightened moment arrived when I let go of perfect rationality, and finally listed to my feelings.

4. Attachment Styles: Understand Yours to Reach Assertiveness

The author goes deep into attachment styles.

Attachment theory is based on the assumption that we are emotionally interconnected with one another and we want to form emotional bonds with others.
The way form and approach emotional bonds can be more or less healthy, and it's in good part based on our attachment styles.

There is already much on this website, see:

- Your attachment style: a test
- Overview of attachment styles

- Secure attachment
- Avoidant attachment
- Anxious attachment

And check this out:

- Anxious-avoidant attachment

How do attachment styles overlap with assertiveness?
Well, the author makes a good case that there is a strong overlap.

She has an overview that by itself is worth the price of the ebook but, as a quick wrap-up:

- Anxious: Is hesitant. Is afraid to speak up for fear of creating distance or rejection;
- Avoidant: Is guarded. Has difficulty dealing with emotions, seeks an unhealthy detachment, prefer to "shut up"
- Secure: Is confident. For him, it's more of a question of communication skills

5. Differentiation: How it Impacts Assertiveness

This part is based on the differentiation aspect of Family Systems Theory as developed by Murray Bowen (Brown, 2013 for an overview).

The author reminds us that we are born with the desire and capability of forming relationships with others.
But we are also individuals with our unique feelings, wants, and needs.

So we are both unique individuals, and interconnected with others.
Says the author:

> Our ability to navigate the tension between our desire for individuality and our desire for connection through relationships is called differentiation.

Schnarch defines differentiation as:

> "Differentiation is the ability to maintain your sense of self when you are emotionally and/or physically close to others—especially as they become important to you"

And it also includes the ability to be authentic, and engage others from a place of authenticity rather than a "fake persona" that some people develop in order to avoid conflicts.

So, how does differentiation exactly impacts assertiveness?
The ability to be assertive is essentially an expression of differentiation.

Says the author:

> Assertiveness is a way that you express difference while remaining connected

But very low-differentiation individuals might see assertiveness as a threat to the whole.
if you see your partner or family members as a single unit, you might repress your expressions of differentiations.
And if they see you as part of an undifferentiated unit, they might repress your expressions of differentiation.

Family Impact on Differentiation & Assertiveness

- Low-level differentiation family (emotional fusion or enmeshment): they consider the family as a single unit, and resist a family member's attempt to assert herself in ways that challenge family norms, rules, or threaten family identity”

- High-level differentiation families: accept a broader range of behaviors and expressions of unique feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants without feeling anxious, overwhelmed, or threatened as a unit

More Wisdom

- The emotionally closer you are, the more challenging it is: the closer a person is to you emotionally, the harder it may be to assert yourself to him or her when a difference arises, especially when it comes to vulnerable emotions like fear and loneliness

Real-Life Applications

- Stop using biting humor and then saying “I was joking”: that’s passive-aggressive, and makes you come across as slimy. Also see “micro-aggressions“.
- Avoid starting with accusatory “you.. “: also see “criticism“, based on John Gottman’s research

Quotes

> We have a built-in system to help resolve emotional hurt, too; it’s called attachment! We are designed to heal through healthy relationships.

Closing quote of the book:

> It is in the entrances and exits of life that the meaning and purpose of living comes into focus. Life’s purpose is to connect deeply with each other and to learn how to love.

CONS

- Sometimes feels there is some feminist / left-wing trope

In this passage it feels like the author wasn’t too happy at her grandmother advice on femininity:

> “Always sit with your knees together” (thanks, Grandma)

That’s not bad advice from her grandmother.
A woman manspreading sends low-quality woman signals, and there is much power in being feminine.

Sometimes it felt like the author overplayed the role of culture and downplayed the role of nature in influencing people’s behavior and mindsets.

- Sometimes a bit too psycho-analytical / Freudian

The author prods the reader to think about their first memories as children, asking if they are accompanied by connection or disconnection.

And then, with the example of a patient who had a great childhood, writes:

> Her story illustrates that all of us, even those from caring, dedicated families, have wounds or developmental gaps rooted in our early childhood experiences

I see it differently.
Maybe it illustrates instead that if you look hard enough, you will always found some issue -and maybe because you were looking for it, not because there was some “hidden childhood trauma”-.

This is not scientific, and sometimes it leads people to worry and “cure” problems that aren’t even there.

That being said, these are very small cons in an otherwise great book.

PROS

- Novel approach to assertiveness

There is a ton of books on assertiveness, and some just rehash content.

Not Julie de Azevedo Hanks.
She truly adds a unique perspective and, in my opinion, she truly adds unique wisdom that was missing in the literature.
Namely, the link between attachment styles, individuation, and assertiveness (or lack thereof).

- Very good analysis on self-esteem, happiness, and mental control

Also see “antifragile ego“.

Review

“The Assertiveness Guide for Women” is an awesome book on communication skills, assertiveness, and general self-development.

Albeit, as the author says, it’s written by a woman and for women, I found it to be quite gender-neutral, and men can learn a lot from it as well -I certainly have-.

It’s the only book on communication skills and/or assertiveness I have read that connects the dots among attachment styles, differentiation, and assertiveness.
And that made a lot of sense, Julie de Azevedo Hanks really enlightened me on this topic. It helped me to better understand how these all-important concepts are indeed interlinked.

Conflicts of Interest at Work: They Don't Want You To Know This

Lucio Buffalmano · 20 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Political awareness, as much as any good social and life strategy, starts with a good understanding of the conflicts of interest.

This is true across all socialization.
Understanding conflicts of interest is a foundational aspect of learning advanced social skills, power dynamics, as well as the scope and opportunities for collaboration (or for manipulation).

Intro

You must learn how and where the interests diverge to properly strategize.

The areas of diverging interest also create more opportuniteis for manipulations and lies.
And they're more common in business than in most other socialization area.

This is why despite we generally advocate for coopeartion and win-win, at work you may want to dial-up your Machiavellianism.

Of course, without going the full length and becoming a total asshole, or cynic side.

But… Make sure team you is also being taken care of.

Boss VS Employees

This is between you and your boss.

1. You want to work for yourself, your boss wants you to work for the team

The better the team performs, the better it looks on your boss.

Unluckily:

1. The better the team performs, the more you'll struggle to stand out
2. The more you do "for the team", the less you can do for yourself

Solution: Listen to "team you"

Leadership comes at a cost.
But those costs are smallest at work, while the rewards are the biggest.

And while you're revving up for leading, don't forget that alongside the "team" there is "team you", and both of them need your attention.

2. You want to move up, your boss wants to keep you in the team

The general rule:

The better you are at your job, the more your boss wants to keep you within the team.

If you move up, you won't be helping your boss anymore.

Some unscrupulous bosses might work behind your back to thwart your advancement opportunities.

3. You want to take credit, your boss wants to take it for himself -or the team-

The ideal team for a calculative boss is a team of faceless and anonymous individuals whose good work all fall under his name.

And the opposite is true when the team makes some major mistakes: then he wants to be able to point finger at someone and assign the blame.

Solution: Intelligent self-promotion

This is where self-promotion must meet good political strategies.
Also read here:

> 10 Techniques for Strategic Self-Promotion At Work

4. You want to keep your best customers close, your boss wants them shared with the team

Valuable contacts, be customers or powerful people, are power.

You want to keep them to yourself, while your boss wants to share them.

The more you share them, the more you lose power and leverage.
And if you leave, the team won't miss you when none of your best customers will leave with you.

⍰ Example: Law firm doesn't want lawyers to answer "thank you" emails

In Bel's former law firm lawyers were discouraged from answering customers' 'thank you' emails.

Now you understand why: because the partners didn't want the firm's customer to grow too close to their employees.

Owners VS Employees

You want a raise? Let me make an offer your can't refuse
"Owners" refers to anyone with a sizable stake in the company -and its revenues-.

But sometimes non-owners act like owners when they're given a bit more perks than the ranks and file.
It's similar dynamics of the nazi's 'kapos'.

Or when they're given the responsibility to 'control' others.
Think of HR, for example, and it's similar dynamics as in Zimbardo's prison experiment.

1. You want to put yourself first, owners want you to put the company first

This is also why owners love a 'family' culture to increase your contributions to the company.

I have seen a similar theme across business titans' biographies such as Howard Schultz (Starbucks), Phil Knight (Nike), Sam Walton (Walmart), as well as CEOs and VCs (Ben Horowitz).

They all loved their employees and felt like they were all a big family.
But only the top ones get rich.
And only the bottom ones get fired when cost-cutting.

2. You want cash, owners want to pay you with "inspiration"

This is where advanced corporate manipulation kicks in.

The most successful entrepreneurs attract less with cash, and more with vision.

Often, pro-social visions of addressing big humanity's challenges or making the world better.

The psychological underpinning is related to intrinsic VS extrinsic motivation (Vallerand, 1997).

Solution: Money Talks Straight, Listen to It

Inspiration is great, but also look at the concrete exchange and compensation.
And ensure you're not being sucked dry and short-changed.

3. You want alliances with colleagues, the company prefers you isolated

Divide and conquer disguised as teamwork
Owners hate unions because alliances make you stronger.

The same concept applies to internal alliances.
Internal alliances may be good for you, but it may cost the company.

You can see this same conflict of interest repeated at national and government levels, as well.
The government frowns upon -or outright bans- any congregation that might potentially pose a threat to the government itself -or to its ability to collect taxes-.

4. You care about personal success, the company wants you to care about the company

If the company does well, its workers are more likely to do well.

But while it's true that a "rising tide" lifts all boats, career strategist Brendan Reid points out that you don't really advance much when everyone else is advancing.

Instead, crises and restructuring can offer equally good -or even better- opportunities for rapid advancement.

5. You want to advance, your company needs un-ambitious low-paid employees

Personal value is a two-edged sword for owners:

On one hand, a skilled and driven workforce is a boon.

But on the other hand, the more you improve, the more you will want to move up the corporate ladder, ask for more money or, potentially, move to another firm.

The company does want some of its employees to move upward, but not everyone.

The truth is, all companies need someone doing simple and low-paid work.
You just don't want to be one of them.

Solution: Take all training and growth opportunities you can get

Take all training and stretch assignments you can.

This is exactly where working in a company is good from a Machiavellian point of view: you can fuck up, and not be on the hook as if you were working on your own.

6. You want to cover your ass, the company wants you to trust them

Trusting employees are more loyal, don't waste time covering their assess, and are defenseless if things go south.

Some companies will break or bend the law when they smell that an employee can be pushed around, so be careful.

Solution: Collect Evidence

Machiavellian power move:

Leave no traces of bad conduct, while you recording all infractions from your employer.

You don't need to use those records.
And you might not even want to use it.
As a matter of fact, I recommend you always go for win-win relationships, even with your employer.

But simply knowing that you have the power to win a lawsuit give you power and peace of mind.

7. You Want to Keep Your Best Strategies Private, The Owner Wants You to Share Them -Better Yet, Codify Them-

The principle is:

⚖ While your unique knowledge empowers you only, publicly shared knowledge empowers the company

Company owners want to break down and codify your skills so that that even a monkey could do what you're doing.
So that they can hire monkeys and pay monkey salaries

BTW: monkey is terribly offensive and we reject it.
But I use it because that's exactly how a founder I spoke to addressed his people behind closed doors.

See this example from "The Wolf of Wall Street:

> Owner: So, what do you say?
> Everyone: (reads from a script like a bunch of sheep)

That's the dream of every owner: everyone is the same, and everyone is easy to replace.

Solution: Machiavellian Hoarding of Wisdom

We dig deeper on this one in Power University.

Old-Guard VS New Generation

1. You want power, they want you to be an obedient grunt

Culture has changed -luckily-.

Back in the days, the expectation was for lower-level employees to be at the beck and call of senior folks.

But the senior guys did go through that mild hazing culture.
And so today the senior guys want to have the same hazing rights over the new guys joining in.

They are also secretly resentful if you get to experience too much of an easy life and, of course, they don't want to give up their "right" bossing you around.

That's how you get all-too-common tropes:

- The new generation is soft
- They are entitled without giving anything (sometimes true, but not as much as some people like to parrot)
- They don't appreciate the value of hard work

Most of the times, these are indirect cries for appreciation.
They all actually say "look at how hard I worked, how ethically I've played the game, and appreciate me for it".
So throw them a bone, make them feel good, then frame yourself as a hard worker who "wants to be like them", and you'll be good to go.

2. The Slower They Climbed, The Slower They Want YOU to Climb

Anything less will make them feel bad about themselves.

3. You Want More Flexibility, They Want You to Sweat Blood and Tears

I remember years ago, when I was "SHINE talent graduate".

We were presenting new ideas to the board comprised of all the most powerful heads of our IT center.

My idea was to change the policies around home office. "We should remove the 2 days cap a week, and scrap the need for the manager's prior approval", I opined.
That way, I argued, we could attract and keep more talent.

I had data: the new generations considered flexibility as important as salary.

And if people abused the system, we could easily identify the bad apples to let go.

The answer from the board?
A big laugh.

"These new guys want to come to work and chill with a beer", said the biggest boss.
And all the other yes-men joined in.

Of course: they did NOT have flexibility during their career.
So they resented people who could now enjoy or, sacrilege, demand it!

It was my mistake, of course.
The mistake was in the framing of the request.

I should have framed it more as a win for the company.
And I should have paid homage to hard work and the importance of face-to-face interaction as well, a wink to the "real" way of doing business, the way they did it.

Machiavellian twist: I could have joined them in laughing "at the new grads".

"But if this new generation wants to stay home with their moms, let's give it to them, and we'll even save money in office space".
See the persuasion power move?
You power-align with them, pretending to laugh at the people who instead you're going to help. That's Machiavellianism for win-win.

Individuals VS Team

Those whom the company frames as your closest brothers… Are also your biggest competitors.

That picture says a lot about the conflicts of interest at work.
Especially, about the inherent conflicts between "teamwork" and the obviously limited opportunities for career advancement.

1. You want to be promoted, and all your colleagues want to be promoted

… But you must pretend you're still all friends and teammates.

2. You gain by keeping the best information, while your colleagues want to learn as much as possible from you

The better than the rest you, are the more power you have.
But the more you teach and share, the smaller that gap becomes.

- ⍰ Information sharing strategies: what to share, and when

3. You want to shine for yourself, the team wants you to share credit

The more you shine, the more you make them look average.
And the more you self-promote, the more they will resent you.

⚠ Too nice guys feel bad to outshine and beat their colleagues
And self-sabotage themselves.

Solution: Friends With Everyone Else, Only Friend-ly With Competitors

1. Be a professional, not a friend. Be friendly and warm enough so they don't turn into frenemies, but distant enough so they won't affect your drive to compete.
2. ⍰ Think and treat them as if they were already your reports ⍰

4. You want to be close to your boss, the team prefers you to stay away from him

The closer you are to your boss, the more others will resent you as the boss' favorite.

Solution: Be Friendly to All

If you're very close to your boss, be warmer and more talkative to all, so it doesn't seem you're exclusively hobnobbing with the boss.

5. Men want to keep power, women want to upset the system

This one deserves its own post.

Also see:

> 8 Ways Men Keep Women Down at Work

Execs VS Stakeholders

This conflict of interest might be one of the best arguments against unfettered capitalism.

And it becomes especially salient during times of financial crises -especially in the banking sector-.
Then, when the ship risks going down, the captains ransack the ship leaving everyone else to hold the bag.

1. Executives want short-term profit, even if it might create problems in the future

Some classes of powerful people are incentivized to pursue short-term profits while pushing the costs onto future generations, or the public.

Politicians sometimes belong to this category.
Borrowing today, for example, helps politicians keep power, maybe even (indirectly) taking some of that money, while pushing the problem of repaying that money to the future generations (de Mesquita, 2003).

You realize you are in such a short-term profiteering environment when the bosses are pressuring people to say and do what's expedient instead of what's true and, in the most blatant of cases, to forego obvious standards of morals.

When that is the case, from a purely Machiavellian perspective, it's best for you to work to help the bosses line up their pockets and interests, and that will help you make a great career.
Then you can move somewhere else before that ship will start sinking (bad management doesn't make for great companies).

Note of caution:
As Bel correctly noted, you must be careful here. Because many (psychopathic) bosses try to push their employees to do illegal acts and then blackmail them and hold their careers on the line.
Or use them as scapegoats.

See an example here from the documentary "Capitalism":

> William Black: People who will give you the wrong answer, but the answer you want are invaluable and they often get promoted precisely because they are willing to say and do absurd things.

There is also a different approach possible though:

Dare to be black sheep

Alghouth challenging, it's possible to fly higher.

William Black from the video above does pretty well for himself.
Di Pietro, the man who fought the Italian corruption system and gave birth to the huge movement called "Clean Hands" also did great as a lone fighter (and he got my first vote).

Being the lone fighter is riskier, and can either get you kicked out very quickly, or it can make you the leader of a new movement.
Doing so requires charisma, power awareness and… Some lucky timing.

2. Execs and owners want to privatize the gains, and collectivize the losses

Similar to the above, and the two often overlap.

The further away and the more powerless the stakeholders are, the more the few in power want to enrich themselves whilst pushing the costs to the many.

This issue is huge in politics, since politicians have access to tax money and the power of the taxpayers once parted with their money is severely limited.

Owners and shareholders often have similar incentives to cut down the costs and let the have-nots to pay the price.

The costs aren't always a direct cost on people. Sometimes it's indirect, paid with common goods pollution, contamination, or depletion.
That's even easier for shareholders to pull off, since people are even more unwilling to rebel for what they don't feel it's even theirs.

There can be power, and even some potential personal benefits in making yourself the "leader of the forgotten good cause". But only if you do it outside of the corporation or political party.
Doing it from within, especially if you do it too loudly, is political suicide.

Summary

Awareness of conflicts of interest forms the basis of political intelligence.

This article showed some of the main conflicts of interest among individual contributors, teams, bosses, and owners.

This knowledge empowers you to base your win-win on real-world power dynamics, rather than on naive ignorance.

The Assertiveness Workbook: Notes & Review

Summary

About the Author: Randy J. Paterson is a Canadian clinical psychologist, author, and trainer.

4 Styles of Communication

There are four styles of relating with others:

1. Passive: Afraid of asking, taking a stand, or sharing an opinion. An approach designed to avoid conflicts at all costs, that leads to the failure of enforcing personal boundaries, defending one's own time and priorities, and letting others take advantage of them, and walk all over them
2. Aggressive: Feel entitled to control others. (Tries to) force others to do what the aggressor wants, no matter how others feel.
   He seems stronger and in control, but it's often motivated by fear and, in the long run, this approach loses power, since people resent the aggressive guy.
3. Passive-Aggressive: Wants to be aggressive and has the same anger but, often out of fear, acts more like a passive, and then aggresses others subtly and covertly
4. Assertive: Directly states opinions, demands what he wants, and knows and accepts that others are ultimately responsible and in charge of their own behavior

Assertive Style

The assertive individuals:

- Feels in charge of his own behavior
- Asserts his boundaries clearly and directly
- Recognizes that others are in charge of their own behavior
- Does not seek to force others to change their behavior but leaves it up to them
- Can state that there will be rewards -or consequences- depending on what the other person decides to do

Tips to become assertive

1. Push through the pushback: if you were passive, some people might not like the new you. If they push back, it's great news, you're empowering yourself. Push through their pushback
2. Resist the urge to go back to comfortable routines: people will initially misread your behavior because they were used to a different you. If you were aggressive, they might think you're not being "strong enouhg". Keep being assertive and clear instead of going back to yelling and aggressing

3. Change with one person at a time: changing all at once might be difficult. Consider changing with one person at a time, or in one environment at a time (work, relationship, family, or friends)
4. Start when you're feeling good: if you're at a difficult time in your life, consider starting when you have more strength and power. Becoming assertive might strain some of your relationships before they get better. But don't this be an excuse to postpone! Unless you're really in dire straits, go for it

Beliefs underpinning assertiveness

The author lists the beliefs underpinning all of the different styles, as well as how to overcome.

Here, we will focus on the beliefs of assertiveness:

1. I'm in charge of my, behavior others are in charge of theirs: this is the central belief of assertiveness
2. I decide for myself what I will and will not do
3. People can ask me whatever they want
4. And I can decline whatever they ask because this is my life
5. I am my own judge, I don't have to justify myself to others
6. Others don't have to justify themselves to me

Also see: "judge power dynamics".

DESO: A model for assertive communication

Paterson modifies Bower and Bower's model of assertive communication and comes up with the "DESO" formula.

The goal of "DESO" is to frame the situation, say what's wrong, make your request, and predict an outcome.
Using DESO can help you word your assertive requests.

It stands for:

- Describe: describe and define the situation and what's going on. If it's about someone's behavior, make sure you stick to a specific behavior, and that you don't turn it into a criticism, which attacks the personality
- Express: express and state how you are feeling in the situation
- Specify: Specify what you would like to happen
- Outcome: Describe what happens if the person goes along with what you want and, potentially, what will happen if they don't. It can be a reward or a punishment but, sometimes, the outcome is simply you being happier, or feeling better -"if you do X, I will feel so much better"

Paterson says that most people overuse punishment as the outcome, and he recommends instead to use it very sparingly.
Instead, frame those negative outcomes positively. Instead of "unless you clean your dishes from yesterday, no dinner tonight", you can say "as soon as you clean yesterday's dishes, I will go ahead and start cooking our dinner".

Be cautious using assertiveness with violent individuals or in violent relationships

Assertiveness is about setting boundaries and reclaiming your power.

Some individuals might not like that but, in most situations, that's their issue, not yours.
However, in some fringe cases, with some people and in some relationships that are either violent or teetering on the verge of violence, your new assertive attitude might spark a renewed wave of violence.
The violent or manipulative partner, seeing his grasp on the relationship slipping away, might try one last-ditch effort to “put you back in line”.

So it’s up to you to exercise caution, distance yourself, or start your new assertive journey with physical distance, well-prepared, in public, or with your friends around.

Life Tip: Only fight battles you can win

I like this passage:

> Life is short.
> You only have so much energy.
> Why waste it unless the effort will get you somewhere?
> If you have been trying for thirty years to get your mother to stop asking when you will get married, give up. Let her ask. If you have been trying for years to get your partner to be faithful, perhaps it’s time to stop trying—and either accept the behavior or end the relationship.
> Randy Paterson

Paterson links it back to a core tenet of assertiveness: controlling your behavior, and letting go of controlling others. He says that all the time wasted on battles you can’t win have one thing in common: you’re trying and trying, and hoping against hope, that you will be able to change people and control their behavior.
Give that faulty belief up, and you’ll enjoy a better life.

More Wisdom

Only sets boundaries you are willing and able to defend: if you say something and don’t follow trough you lose all your credibility

Cultural relativity only up to a certain point: the cultural factor is important to discern what exactly is assertive, but some degree of assertive behavior is appropriate in every culture

Don’t defend your opinion, it’s low-power: some people have an ingrained belief that the worth or validity of their opinion -or their own worth- depends on their ability to defend their position.
The author correctly say that this belief place you in the powerless position of having to change someone else’s mind.

Take responsibility for your feelings or requests: don’t say that something is wrong because “nobody else does it”, or because “every other husband does it this way”.
It’s cop-out to avoid taking responsibility, and it invites an easy argument that will only sidetrack you away from your request.

To deal with covert aggression, ask for clarification: the author correctly poins out that to deal effectively with covert criticism, you want to ask them what exactly do they mean as a way of drawing them out.
For example, if they give you a dirty look, you can ask “I’m not sure what that expression meant, can you please elaborate”. This is what I call “show me the hand technique“, and it’s a standard technique of uncovering covert aggression.
Also see “how to deal with microaggressions“.

> 10 Techniques Against Microaggression

CONS

- I'm not convinced that aggression originates in fear

The author says that aggression "almost always originates in fear".
I'm not too sure about that.

- I'm not convinced that "control over others is a delusion"

The author says that "control over others is a delusion".

But that's not true.
Control over others is solid power dynamics. It's not a delusion. It happens, it's real, and pretending it's not there does not help to make the case for assertiveness.

- Sometimes feels like splitting hair between "demanding" and "stating your wants", and frames persuasion as if it were a bad thing

The author says that when you state outcomes, such as the consequences of not following through, which can include rewards or punishments, you are not "demanding anything" or "tiring to control their behavior", but "simply stating what you feel and what you will do".
To me, this feels like splitting hair.

Also, I don't see the point of denying that influencing others can be someone's goal.
It's not like there is a moral prize for those who don't try to influence and persuade others. Influence and persuasion is how we get things done in this world.

- Being specific and realistic all the time comes at a persuasion cost

The author exhorts the reader to stick to reality when it comes to outcomes, and that too many people exaggerate. However, painting a picture of future victory and greatness can help persuade others. And sticking to reality too much can make someone a bit dull and boring.

PROS

- Perfect for beginners: the exercises, quizzes, and self-assessments make it a great resource to follow on the journey towards assertiveness
- Great wisdom: you will learn a lot with Randy Paterson
- One of the best overviews on feedback giving and taking: and all correctly put into the perspective of assertion

Quotes

On the honest of assertiveness:

> Assertiveness isn't about building a good disguise. It's about developing the courage to take the disguise off.

On the power of "no":

> Who's in charge of your life? If you aren't able to say "no" then it certainly isn't you.

Looking at the effects of praise and compliments from a social exchange point of view.
"Defensive-mindset" people feel like they are a drain on their social power, but the opposite is true:

> Thanks, praise, and compliments do not put us in debt to others; they support and encourage the behavior we like.

Review

“The Assertiveness Workbook” is a wonderful resource on communication skills and assertion.

Randy Paterson is an advanced analyst of social and power dynamics, and I can recommend this book to anyone who wants to develop their assertion skills. Especially those who are beginners and/or who want a plan to follow, since Paterson provides lots of exercises at the end of each chapter -plus a scorecard to help you keep track of your progress0.

Summary

About the Author: Patrick King writes and advises on social skills, dating, online dating, and communication skills.

Start Pleasing Yourself

Says Patrick King:

> You can't always please everyone, so start with yourself.

Faulty Beliefs of Lack of Assertiveness

The author says there are four major beliefs that seem to be most common among people who lack assertiveness.

They are:

1. I'm only worthy if I help (Helpaholic): Serving others is natural and looking at oneself comes last. This is the belief that you only live to help and serve others
2. I'm only accepted if I always say yes: the belief that you are unworthy of love the way you are
3. I'm only good and kind when I help and when I don't complain: and the opposite, saying "no" means being harsh and being bad. This is the belief that asserting yourself means you're a bad person
4. I cannot stand confrontations and I will always lose them: this is your typical fear of confrontation, and it's the belief that it's just better to go alogn with others rather than saying anything

Says the author:

> Being selfish isn't always bad.
> In fact, it's necessary being selfish every so often.

King does not include it in his main four beliefs holding people back from being assertive, but he later adds a few faulty mindsets which I think are important:

- "I shouldn't say how I feel and what I want": this is especially pernicious in relationships, where some people expect their partners to know what they think, feel, and want. But nobody knows that, unless you say it, express it, or demand it

Manipulation stops you from being assertive

King says that mindsets are crucial, but they are only half of the battle.

The mindsets reflect your internal states, and there can be external stumbling blocks to your assertiveness.
Those stumbling blocks are other people's manipulations.

King quotes Susan Forward and her work on "Emotional Blackmail".
See here for emotional blackmail:

> Emotional Blackmail: 9 Ways to Confront Manipulators

Make it easy for them!

If you need something from them, make it easy for them to say yes.

Meet them at their favorite restaurant, go to their office, or offer something.
Don't make an imposition, but show that you're also giving.
Try this:

> Can we meet? Lunch is on me

This was just good social intelligence based on:

- Social exchange laws
- What's in it for them

Also see:

- WIIFT failures

King also adds that it's good social intelligence to make it easy for them to say "no", so that they will not resent you. Yes, they may love your dog, but they might not want the responsibility of looking after it.

The advantages of both giving value and making it easy for them to say no is that they also make it easier for you to make a request in the first place.

Assertiveness Format

King proposes four steps for asseritve communication:

1. Objective description of their behavior: describe reality. Be specific, be direct, but don't be harsh
2. Description of the effects of their actions: describe reality of how their actions affected you
3. Description of your feelings: use "I feel" statements. Be clear, but not theatrical
4. Statement of your preferred behavior: describe how you would like them to act, either now, or in the future

Say "I don't", not "I can't"

The way you talk to yourself as well as to others influences your ability to communicate and behave assertively.

When you say "I don't", you remove your decision from the realm of your willpower, and it becomes part of who you are.

More Wisdom

- Shut up after you said "no": hold the silence. If you speak first, you are more likely to "soften" your "no", give away power, and embolden others to keep pushing

- Avoid giving too many details: the more details you give, the more ammo you give other people to latch onto and try to change your mind
- Don't allow other people's anger or pushy ways to weakne your boundaries: when you let coercion overcome your fair boundaries, you are ceding power to a bully
- Switch from "I'm sorry" to "excuse me": if you over-apologize, switch from "sorry' to "excuse me". This is good for everyday situations, for example bumping into someone. It's equally polite, but doesn't take over guilt and responsibility for things you're not guilty of

- A bit on the selfish advice side?

Sometimes I felt like the book was promoting selfish-interest a bit too strongly.

Probably the author wanted to address chronic people pleaser, in which case that type of stance and advice makes sense.
On the other hand, it's also important to remember that advanced social skills, which also include leadership, is about taking care of others, and there is lots of power in taking responsibility for others.

- Sometimes it felt less assertive and a bit shifty

The author says you can reject people by saying you'll get back to them and then "of course, you never get back to them".
He does say that you can use it for particularly pushy people, but it's still not an example of assertiveness.

Or that "you can reject X and offer Y, the hope being they have no use for Y".
But if you need to "hope" they won't take Y, then why offering it in the first place? Assertiveness is about clearly stating what you can do and what you don't want to do.

- Sometimes I didn't fully agree with what was good assertiveness

One woman felt uncomfortable with the sister's boyfriend asking some personal questions about her dating life.
So one day she told him that "she had been given that a lot of thought, and that she didn't feel comfortable… ".
The guy was shocked, and didn't see it coming. In my opinion, it's unnecessary to say "I've been given this a lot of thought" as that blows the matter out of proportion.
Much better to make it natural, like "hey John, I'm not as open as you are, I don't feel good discussing this stuff. But I'm happy to talk about football" (then, smile).

PROS

- The self-assessment quiz: was both helpful for self-assessment, and to understand what's proper assertive behavior in everyday life
- Great list of techniques on how to make rejections easier for you: possible these were the ones I enjoyed the most, there was some true nugget of genius, and I borrowed some for Power University and credited Patrick for them
- Good 30-days plan to go from passive to assertive: Patrick King lays out a plan to go from passive to assertive in a set of smaller steps to take day after day

Quotes

> The great cost of your lack of assertiveness is a life that doesn't resemble anything you ever wanted.

> Every loudmouth can win an argument, to be a true winner, your aim should be a win-win for everyone.

Review

I enjoyed “The Art of Everyday Assertiveness”.

There were plenty of nuggets of wisdom and.
Especially good were the techniques for saying “no”, which were not just assertive but also socially smart, and the connections that Patrick King established between assertion and effective social strategies, as seen from a social-exchange point of view -how to take your due credits, how to avoid making your social debt bigger, etc.-.

It’s especially suited for people who are too passive, too nice, and who struggle with a sense of guilt whenever saying “no”.

The 4 Communication Styles: Description & Examples

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Communication styles are patterns of communication and interpersonal behavior that people tend to repeat across time and across different social settings.

There are four styles of communication:

1. Passive communication style
2. Passive-Aggressive communication style
3. Aggressive communication style
4. Assertive communication style

Some sources even add a "manipulative" communication style.
But in our opinion, that's not a different communication style because passive, passive-aggressive, and aggressive can all be manipulative.

For a quick overview:

Communication Styles Intro

Albeit we use all of them at least some of the times, most people tend to stick to one of them.

That is because most people tend to adopt the mindsets, values, and beliefs of a certain style of communication, and those mindsets keep them stuck there.

That's why we will also be focusing on mindsets here.

But let's go in order.
Here is a deeper visual chart of the different styles of communication:

	Passive	Aggressive	Passive Aggressive	Assertive
Actions	Keeps quiet Puts himself down Apologizes for all expressions Hides his disagreement Inconvenience himself	Expresses himself over others Belittles or disrespects others Ignores, insults, or attacks other opinions	Denies personal responsibility Indirect aggression Sarcastic Agrees to avoid discussion, then looks for ways to sabotage the agreement	Directly expresses needs, wants & feelings Expects others to be equally open & honest Accepts different opinions without dismissing them
Looks	Makes himself small Looks down & hunch over Avoids eye contact Speaks softly	Makes himself large Looks threatening Penetrating eye contact Loud	Similar to passive	Relaxed Comfortable body language Frequent eye contact (but not glaring)
Beliefs	My needs are less important than others I don't have as many rights as others My contributions are not as valuable as others	My needs are more important and justified than others I have more rights than others My contributions are more valuable than others	My needs come first, but I can't express that openly I am not responsible for my actions I am entitled to get my own way, even if I make different commitments	My needs are equally important as others I have equal rights We both can make valuable contributions I am responsible for my behavior
Emotions	Fear of rejection Helplessness & low self esteem Frustration Resentment towards others who "succeed"	Anger Powerful (or full angry) when winning over others Lonely, powerfully responsible for motivating others	Fear of rejection if being direct or assertive Resentful of people's demands & power Fear of being controlled	Positive feeling about self Positive feeling about excitement with others Fear of other's anger
Goals	Avoid conflict Please others (in manner or what not to say) Let others take control (and blame others on control)	Win at any costs Control others Always make sure others know who's in charge	Get his way, without taking responsibility Get his way, but without having to assert myself	Express himself Find an agreement Keep a foundation of mutual respect

Based on Randy Paterson's work (Paterson, 2000)

Let's now quickly review each style.

1. Passive Communication Style

The passive communication style, overlapping with “submissive”, has sometimes been linked to the symbolism of a doormat.

At least in the extremes of the passive forms, this symbolism is correct. Since the passive communication style enforces no boundaries, it allows others to “walk all over”.

Of course, not everyone is going to walk all over an overly passive individual. Not everyone is looking to advantage of others, after all.
But, alas, some people are. And some people will walk all over the passive.

And that puts the passive communicator at risk.

How about an example of a passive communication style?
A video speaks more than a thousand words:

> Aggressive: Look Jerry, you’re not selling me a damn car. It’s my show here. That’s that
> Passive: (puts his head down, looks up to the second highest authority in the room)

The passive man often submits to avoid conflict.

He:

- Gives in to unreasonable demands

> Another weekend in the office for extra unpaid work? Uhmm, OK. No, no trouble at all.

- Goes along with the crowd

> You all want to go to McDonald’s? I don’t mind that I’m on diet, it sounds great

- Withholds opinion out of fear

> What do I think of cannabis liberalization? What do you guys think about it? I agree with you…

- Withholds any feedback that might come across as criticism

> Yeah, I had to redo your budget report, but you're doing fine

- Over-Apologize

> Oh, I'm sorry I was standing here, you bumped into me, and that I spilled my full glass of wine over my new suit

From a social exchange point of view, with their over-apologies passive people end up inflating their own social debt.

Apologizing if you've done a mistake is what you should do. But avoid over-apologizing if you've done nothing wrong, or if someone else is at fault.

PRO Tip: If you have a tendency for over-apologizing, a quick fix can be to switch from "sorry" to "excuse me".

- Never take proper credit; always minimize your effort or contribution

> Nah, it was OK, I was already awake at 3am, so no problem getting dressed and come pick you up

From a social exchange point of view, passive people struggle mightily to collect their fair social credits and devalue their own contributions.

This is important information for us since our goal is to make you successful socially and at life:

Passive individuals struggle to enter win-win exchanges and are more likely to remain stuck in win-lose exchanges, as well as in manipulative relationships

2. Passive-Aggressive Communication Style

The passive-aggressive types mix elements of both the passive and aggressive style.

They are as afraid of standing up for themselves as the passive type, but have the same drive to control as the aggressive type.

The result is a mix:

1. Capitulation out of fear
2. Followed by unexpressed anger
3. Followed by undercover aggression and sabotage to get it their way, or to exact revenge

Some of the traits and behaviors of passive-aggressives:

- Takes Everything Negatively

Passive-aggressives like to take things negatively (Williams, 2020).

Why?

Because it justifies their repressed anger and aggression.
Taking things and people negatively makes it easy for them to justify their covert operations.

This is also why you want to avoid passive-aggression at all costs: it poisons your interactions as well as your mood.

- Fight Without Fighting

Passive-aggressive can be quite twisted in their competition.

For example, they might see you're about to commit a mistake, but don't tell you anything because they think that your loss is their win.

Or they might be the coworkers who "forget" to CC you in the customer email, so that you don't stay in the loop.

- Do Things Improperly

They fear saying no, so they say yes.
But they still want to find a way out.
Result?
They half-ass their work.

- Are Non-Committal

Passive-aggressive individuals are masters of ambiguity.

It can be hard to pinpoint whether they're telling you yes or no, and it's often premeditated.
That way, they keep their options open to do whatever they please.

Afraid of talking straight, they're also foggy and noncommittal with their requests.
You know, "you don't have to if you don't want to", they'll say. But if you don't, they'll sulk.

- Leave "hints" instead of talking directly

Instead of asking you to do your part of the cleaning, they might clean only their side of the flat.

You know, "sending you a message", instead of speaking up.

- Cuss & threaten, but murmuring

The passive-aggressive might be seething with anger, but:

- Fears of his own anger
- Fears he will be punished for honest expression
- Fears the confrontation, or the consequences of engaging and "losing"

But when the anger is strong, it seeps out at the seams. Save for hiding it again behind a fake smile if confronted.
See an example here:

> Him: (irritated and fighting his own irritation, moving towards aggression) Ma'am! I answered your question
> Her: I'm sorry sir?
> Him: (moves back to passive, tries to smile more) Ma'am, I answered you question. I answered. I'm cooperating here, and there is no… (mutters)
> Her: (going on the offensive) Sir, you have no call in getting snippy with me, I'm just doing my job here
> Him: (retreats even further)

She was also not being fully assertive.
Especially the "just" part, it's a defensive statement, and she had no reason to be defensive, she has every right to keep questioning.
A more assertive response from her would have been:

> Assertive Option: I understand this is frustrating but I am investigating a crime, and I intend to do it properly. And I need you to cooperate with me sir

If she wanted to make her statement even higher power and hold an even stronger frame, she could have added some "higher values", for example:

> I owe to the victim and to his family (= you're being a selfish, low-quality citizen for stopping justice)

But it wasn't strictly necessary here.

Power... At High Cost

It might sound surprising but…

Some passive-aggressive can get power.

They can get some power because many passive-aggressives crave power.
So the more Machiavellian ones can find sneakier and more indirect ways to win.

Problem is, of course, sneaky and undercover ways only get you so far.
And "so far" rarely is to the top.

The passive-aggressive style at very high costs, including:

- Personal costs: diminished self-esteem, repressed anger, and difficulty in developing strong relationships based on honesty
- Status / social power costs: people eventually catch up to the sneakiness of the passive-aggressive
- Reputational costs: when the passive-aggressive resorts to sabotage and underhanded tactics, he gets a reputation for being unreliable, disorganized, or inconsiderate

People might never be able to point out a few clear examples and say "this is what I'm talking about", but their general opinion of the passive-aggressive declines.

Avoiding The "Too Nice Passive-Aggressive"

Sometimes you behave passive-aggressive even when you're not a passive-aggressive type.

How?

Well, since anger and enmity are frowned upon, people can sometimes over-deny those feelings.

But then, when they show up, they will look like hypocrites.

Look at this scene for example:

> Rossi: We don't have any problem
> Marquez: (offers handshake, and Rossi refuses)
> Rossi: (looks passive-aggressive)

There is an overlap between power and assertiveness, but they're not the same.

Rossi is high-power in the video above, but lacks assertiveness and falls into the passive-aggressive trap.

Marquez is also Machiavellian to look so friendly and candid, as if to say "I'd love to be friends, I'm good, it's him who doesn't want".
That contrast makes Rossi seem unjustifiably angry and vindictive.

So, what was a better alternative for Rossi?

Think about it please.

And later you will see a very similar situation, but with an assertive approach.

Handling passive-aggressive

A few tips:

- Remain calm

Passive-aggressive individuals use covert-aggression to attack others.

If you overreact, you can come across as overly-aggressive or thin-skinned, and you lose social status.

For handling covert-aggression, please see "how to handle micro-aggressions".

- Remove them from your team

If you are in a power or leadership position, consider removing them.

Passive-aggressives are toxic employees per excellence.

Letting them fester means allowing them to go beyond your back spreading rumors and breeding malcontent in the team.

- Let them know, you know: go meta

This is a risky technique since passive-aggressive can end up hating you for showing them a better, higher power, and higher-quality way of interfacing with the world.

But in some situations, it's a risk worth running.

- Pull them up

If you're in a close relationship with a passive-aggressive, consider pulling them up into self-development.
Anyone can become less passive-aggressive and more assertive, and you might be able to help them.

3. Aggressive Communication Style

The aggressive commutation style seeks to dominate others without regard or respect for others' well-being.

Aggression is a bit like that famous quote on defining porn.
Even if you're not sure how to define it, you probably know it when you see it.

Aggressive behavior includes one or some of the following:

1. Yelling
2. Visible signs of anger
3. Rude or disrespectful behavior (dismissive in the case of covert aggression)
4. Visible signs of emotional turmoil (or the opposite with total icy detachment)
5. Open and direct threats, even if delivered calmly
6. Body language that suggests the possibility of an attack
7. Physical shoving or pushing, or the threat of physical aggression
8. Stand closer, or purposefully far away to communicate superiority or disgust

There are some use cases for aggression, as well as some situations in which it's a good approach.

Indeed, from a point of view of effectiveness, aggression is better at getting things done than both passiveness and passive-aggression.

However, it comes at a rather heavy cost.
Most people don't like being overpowered, and especially not the most talented, high-value, and high-quality ones.
These higher-quality folks will either try to overpower the aggressor, or they will quickly abandon him.

And that makes it hard for the aggressive type to be an effective leader, and especially hard to make him a good leader for a team of talented people with lots of options.
After all, why would anyone with options stick with an aggressive ahole that demeans them?

Ultimately, too high levels of aggression backfire both in personal life, and at work.

4. Assertive Communication Style

And here we finally come.

Assertiveness is relevant to power dynamics and social effectiveness because there is an overlap between "assertive" and "high-power".

People who master assertion tend to come across as confident, high-power, and generally high-quality individuals who get things done.

And since they don't overpower others, they also tend to develop strong long-term relationships, which enables them to develop win-win far more than aggressive individuals can.

Assertion includes:

- Boundaries: Having, maintaining, and enforcing personal boundaries of:
  - Basic respect: expecting and demanding respectful behavior
  - Privacy: declining to answer or discuss questions and topics that feel too personal or nosy
  - Time: choosing what and when to do, not allowing others to "task" you without your full consent
  - Personal freedoms: freedom of choice, of holding different opinions, etc.
- Timely and honest communication: assertive communication is timely, honest, precise, and often direct. It includes the communication of wants, needs, emotions, feelings, goals, and boundaries.
- Expecting and encouraging honest and direct communication: expecting, demanding, and/or encouraging direct and honest communication from others
- Standing behind one's choices, opinions, & feelings: the assertive communicator acknowledges and stands behind his choices, opinions, and feelings

One of the biggest secrets of marrying assertion with power is this:

High-power assertion includes high-power vulnerability, such as admitting one's own negative or antisocial feelings.
This is the "accepting one's own dark side" we talked about in the social power module.

To understand this concept, let's go back to our previous example.
Remember Rossi falling for the passive-aggressive trap earlier?

Rossi was being high-power, but he didn't add the high-power vulnerability of admitting his negative feelings.

Compare now to this other approach.

Rossi and Lorenzo also had plenty of acrimony in their career.

But Lorenzo doesn't hide and deny it.
His approach also includes The Power Moves basic strategies of power:

> Interviewer: So in the past 2 years you've been like two old friends again..
> Lorenzo: (after talking about Rossi as a great champion) No, I don't think we are friends <— States truth openly and directly
> (…)
> But the most important thing is to have respect, and I have huge respect for Vale, and I think he has the same for me <— Ends with collaborative frame

BOOM!

This is "high-power assertive".
Rossi was high-power in the previous video example, but NOT assertive in admitting and standing behind his feelings.
And that made him come across as sneaky.

Lorenzo admits very candidly of not being friends with Rossi. All the while complimenting him and building him up.
Very high-quality.

Communication Styles Quadrant

The different styles differ in their:

1. Openness to communication
2. Respect towards others

Charting these two important variables, we can draw a quadrant:

While passive and passive-aggressive avoid communication, assertive individuals speak up.
And, crucial, they combine their communication with respect for themselves and for others.

They speak:

- Early: speak early to avoid stewing
- Directly: state your needs and wants clearly and directly
- Respectfully: but with respect and consideration for others

Overcoming Poor Communication Beliefs

It's your beliefs and mindsets that determine your behavior.

Beliefs holding you back from reaching assertiveness:

- "Dark" feelings such as anger and will to power are bad to have and even worse to show

What happens when people unconsciously hold this belief is that they deny their feelings of anger, disappointment, or resentment with words, but then act them out with actions and body language.

That makes them come across as hypocrites (see Ray Dalio example,and this discussion on political hypocrisy).

- Assertiveness means getting your own way all the time

No, that's aggression. Assertiveness is meant to put you on an equal footing with other people.

- Being assertive means being selfish

No, being assertive means being fair and high-power.
If anything, it means that you stop subordinating your interests.

- Other people can't handle my assertiveness

That's actually demeaning, to think of others as weak.

Better belief:

Many people, especially other high-quality people, actually love to deal with someone who is frank and honest.

And if some people find your assertiveness to be “too much”, then you can always calibrate and reduce the intensity.

- People should be more considerate

“Shoulds” are usually weak positions to be in.

What do you care what they should or shouldn’t do?
Act based on what they do, and what you want.

From an assertiveness point of view, when you hold this belief, you either don’t believe that you should tell them to act differently since they should know, or you believe that you must yell at them because they should know better and you have to set them straight.

- I’m afraid of being assertive and failing

You will fail.
And that’s OK. You will also learn and improve (growth mindset).

- I have to convince others

As a rule of thumb:

All the “I have to” put unneeded and often counterproductive pressure on you.

When you hold this belief, you either never start sharing your opinion, or you get angry when you cannot change other people’s minds.

You can always seek to persuade others, but you never “have to”.
Again, this goes back to basic mindsets and beliefs. A cognitive-behavioral therapy called REBT helps with this one (Ellis, 1988).

- I must look good, strong, and happy

This is about emotional assertion.

And it includes all acts of “concealing” emotions in order to look better to others.

It might be one of the major causes of male aggression, passive-aggression, as well as general communication breakdown.

Some women hold back their anger, and many men feel it’s not OK to admit their personal struggles or request (emotional) help.

So they deny their true feelings to others and to themselves and seek to have their needs met with aggression or covert-aggression.

Example of a family where everyone tries to look “strong” and happy. Result: total communication breakdown, and destruction of true intimacy and connection

Warning: this is not to say “parade your weakness”, wallow in self-pity, or to be always “vulnerable”.
Please read here for more on vulnerability:

Summary

Communication styles are patterns of behavior with which different people communicate and relate with others.

Learning to use and adapt the right communication style for the right situation is a crucial skill for social and life effectiveness.

As a general rule, the assertive communication style is the best general approach for baseline daily behavior.

Aggressive Communication Style: Strategic Pros & Cons

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Aggression is a communication style characterized by high dominance and little regard for other people's well-being.

It is one of the four communication styles, and this chart summarizes the aggressive style compared with the other 3 styles:

	Passive	Aggressive	Passive Aggressive	Assertive
Actions	Keeps quiet Puts himself down Apologizes for all expression Hides his disagreement Inconvenience himself	Expresses himself over others Belittles or [illegible] others Ignores, insults, or attacks other opinions	Carries personal responsibility Passive aggressive Sarcastic Agrees to avoid discussion, then looks for ways to delay or [illegible]	Directly expresses needs, wants & feelings Expects others to be equally open & honest Accepts different opinions without dismissing them
Looks	Makes himself small Looks down & hunch over Avoids eye contact Speaks softly	Makes himself large Looks threatening Penetrating eye contact Loud	Similar to passive	Relaxed Comfortable body language Frequent eye contact (but not glaring)
Beliefs	My needs are less important than others I don't have as many rights as others My contributions are not as valuable as others	My needs are more important and justified than others I have more rights than others My contributions are more valuable than others	My needs come first, but I can't express that openly I am not responsible for my actions I am entitled to get my way, even if I make different commitments	My needs are equally important as others' I have equal rights We both can make valuable contributions I am responsible for my behavior
Emotions	Fear of rejection Helplessness & low self esteem Frustration Resentment towards others who "succeed"	Anger Powerful (or Alt-right) when winning over others Fear, potentially [illegible] for manipulating others	Fear of rejection if being direct or assertive Resentful of people's demands & power Fear of being controlled	Positive feelings about self Positive feelings about excelling with others Fear of [illegible]
Goals	Avoid conflict Please others (no matter at what cost to me) Let others take control (instead of [illegible])	Win at any costs Control others Show others who is in charge, know who's in charge	Get it my way, without taking responsibility Get it my way, but without having to assert myself	Express himself Find an agreement Keep firm boundaries of mutual respect

Based on Randy Paterson work (Paterson, 2000)

Most resources on social skills, communication, and communication styles recommend people to avoid aggression.

The Power Moves is a bit different though.
And before advising anyone not to do something, we like to stress why some people actually do that something that most people tell you not to do.

After all, if a behavior evolved in the first place, there probably is a reason why.
And there is no reason why aggression should be any different.
Such as, aggression probably evolved because it served the aggressor's interest, at least some of the times.

So let's review the use cases of aggression.

The Use Cases of Aggression

Aggression can be helpful to:

1. Deal with other people’s aggression

if you remain assertive in front of an onslaught of aggression, assertiveness is obviously not working.

Furthermore, you can seem powerless.

In that case, meeting aggression with aggression can help stop the aggression with the “pacing and leading technique”: first you meet at their level (pacing), showing you can play the same game, and then you bring them down (leading).

Example:

Imagine your girlfriend yells at you for 10 minutes straight at home in spite of you assertively telling her she’s being rude and out of line.

Well… Assertiveness is clearly not working, then.
And if you want to put a stop to it, matching aggression with aggression might prove a far better alternative.

The only moment when Robin Williams seems to have a shred of dignity in the Mrs. Doubtfire divorce scene is when he raises his level of aggression to match hers:

Notice that it’s not about showing aggression per se.
It’s that by matching your attacker’s level of aggression, you communicate that you are not a submissive punching bag who’s incapable of defending and drawing boundaries.

2. Instill fear

Assertiveness gives you respect, but not so much fear.

Aggression can make people fear you.

Attention though: fear is not necessarily high-power and, much less so, high-quality.

Crazy individuals and homeless people often stir up fears in others.
But that fear only serves to keep them isolated and… At the bottom of society.

As we will see, this is a technique that some people use in the workplace.
They are always rude and aggressive in order to acquire some scrap of independence and to be left alone.
But they are also often left alone at the bottom of the hierarchy. You don't want to be one of them.

As Randy Paterson says:

> (People) may make fewer demands, though they will also make fewer pleasant invitations, and if you were more assertive, you could deal with their unpleasant demands confidently

3. Weapon of last resort

If you tried everything and failed, and still want to give it a last shot, going from assertive to aggressive might help you reach your goal in some cases.

Even if you still fail, at least you can say "I tried them all".

4. Win arguments by steamrolling ("argument ad potentiam")

Dominance can be used strategically to push people into the submissive end of the spectrum, or in defense mode.

When people start defending and submitting, they can look guilty by behavior, rather than by logic and facts.

Example:

Trump likely won the presidency thanks to this technique.

The 2017 presidential debates present many examples in which Hillary should have been more aggressive in dealing with Trump:

> Trump: (aggressively attacks Hillary for not having done anything as a politician, and keeps hammering and talking over her)

Trump's aggression allowed him to curtail Hillary's speaking time. She didn't even have enough air time to make her points. And from a political point of view, it looked like Trump was the embodiment of the angry citizen grilling an ineffective, crooked politician. Hillary's justification confirmed that impression.

But also please note that over-aggression was, in the end, also one of Trump's main reason for his downfall.
Had he been more socially astute, he would have mellowed once at the top.

5. In bursts, to show dominance, control the frame, without breaking rapport

I call this dominance technique "aggressive push-pull".

It's often used by the "self-amusing" dominance style, and it deploys the (more or less) covert-aggression technique of push-pull.

It consists of bursts of aggression followed by more assertive or even kinder behavior.
It serves to assert dominance without totally breaking rapport -or ven by increasing rapport, in some cases-.

Experienced or manipulative negotiators can use bursts of aggression to subtly dominate their opponents. when the opponents feel dominated, they will be less likely to negotiate hard and field their demands.

More on it later.

6. To more quickly regain power and respect with an aggressive display of force

If people long treated you like a low-value individual it might take quite some time of assertive behavior to regain their respect.

In those cases, a stronger display of power through aggression can rebalance the situation quicker.

See an example in this video:

> Professor: (slaps an aggressive pupil)
> Class: (a previously unruly class now sits down quietly, respecting and fearing the professor)

And read the full forum entry.

7. As a shortcut for status (in limited situations & environments)

Somewhat similar to the above.

Aggression can be helpful in acquiring status, and it can also be used as a shortcut if it's used successfully against someone with very high status.

There is some evidence for this in unstructured environments like in high school (Faris, 2012).

But high school is not a typical environment, and I haven't seen any experiment confirming these findings outside of it.
I consider aggression as a tool for status more in specific and limited environments, such as:

1. Prisons
2. Gangs

Even there though, aggression should be limited and targeted.
Constant aggression makes you a loose cannon with little support, and friends and allies matter a lot in those environments.

8. In sport, as channeled aggression

In some sports, a lot of aggression can help make up for talent.

This guy is an example:

His surname is “Gattuso” and his nickname was “ringhio Gattuso”, meaning “roar Gattuso”.
He was not the most skilled to use a euphemism, and he wasn’t even big.
But he was very aggressive on the pitch, driven to win beyond what’s normal.

He was one of my favorites because he was able to make up for skills, talent, and even physical size -he was small for the sport-, and still made it to the top (and won a world cup).

True legend of an underdog!
He would have never gotten there without the fire within him.

Even here though, we must add a caveat: the aggression that makes you great at sports is not violent aggression.
That gets you kicked out pretty soon and leaves your team one man down.
It’s more of a constant, controlled anger simmering beneath the surface, channeled into doing anything possible to win,

9. Aggression for revenge and “make you feel good”

Aggression can make you feel strong.
And it can make you feel good for exacting revenge on someone who slighted you in the past.

I personally see some value in revenge, as long as it’s proportionate and as long as it does not poison you.
See here a good real-life example.

But if you are being aggressive because it makes you feel strong, then you probably need to change mindsets because that type of aggression is likely making you feel powerful, but truly disempowering you in real life.

See “Ultimate Power” for better mindsets and values.

10. Maybe, to prevent challenges to absolute power? Not so sure...

There is one last possible benefit.

Some authors say that keeping people in fear can prevent challenges and murder attempts on a powerful man -say, for example, a dictator-.

I am not convinced about it.

I think there are two forces at play: on the one hand, the fear of death or torture can stop some challengers.
But aggression and fear also create a more ripe environment for wanting to get rid of that fear, and wanting to get rid of the SOB.

The challengers will also want to make sure that their aggression will leave the dictator dead or totally powerless, and they will be very careful in covering their tracks before they're ready to hit.
So the dictator gets no sign of impending danger until his premature death.

There is ultimately no proof that fear has ever prolonged -or shortened- anyone's reign. And I am personally doubtful about whether the advantages outweigh the disadvantages.

Why Constant Aggression Ultimately Backfires

There can be times and places for aggression.

But don't confuse aggression with power.
If there is one thing the vast majority of the authors agree on, is that aggression ultimately reduces power in the long run.

As a rule of thumb, and this is especially true for most people in our modern world, constant aggression erodes power.

Why is aggression ultimately counterproductive?
This is why:

1. Aggression Breeds Aggression, Leading to Lots of Wars

There is a tendency for our attitudes to shape and create our own realities.

Says psychologist Harriet Braiker:

> People with hostile, aggressive personalities expect others to be hostile. Consequently, they treat other people aggressively. When people are treated aggressively, they tend to exhibit hostility in return. Thus, since hostility breeds hostility, an aggressive person often evokes hostility from others.

Living in a world of constant aggression is handicapping in a multitude of ways, including of course from a power-strategic point of view.

Constant aggression can also lead to poorer health and a general lower pleasure of life.

That my constantly aggressive former neighbor got a stroke early in life might have been pure coincidence.
But it was not a coincidence that his perennial scowl on short term made his life less pleasurable, including few friends and no good relationships -including with his wife-.

2. Aggression Makes Few (True) Friends & Allies

Nobody rules alone.

Not even dictators (de Mesquita, 2003).

So no matter where you are, you're better of with a network of friends, allies, and supporters, than without.

One of the major issues with aggressive people is that they don't make others feel good, so few people want to be around them and support them.
That often leads to a few good relationships, a small support network and, in extreme cases, to isolation.

3. Aggression Makes Lots of Enemies

Hyper-aggressive Scarface-types can get power quickly.

But the risk is very high that it will be a localized, limited, “flash in the pan” type of power.
The reality is that lots of enemies mean little power and, in some lines of business, a short life span as well.

4. Overly Aggressive Folks Can’t Establish a Coalition

Much power rests in coalitions.

In politics and workplaces, coalitions help you carry to the top.

and in your everyday life, your coalition is your support network.

People in your sare those who are there to prop you up in power or to break your fall when you’re crashing down.

The support network in your everyday life comes from your friends, your neighbors, your family, your colleagues, etc.
But constantly aggressive people have mostly nominal friends. Those are the people who are there exclusively because there is something in it for them.
But they feel no obligation to help when you’re in need.

More socially skilled people instead tend to develop deeper relationships that also go above and beyond the most calculative side of “WIIFM“.

This aspect impacts your life at all levels.
Your support network is the people who listen to you when you’re heart-broken, who lend you some money when you’re broke, who come to the hospital with a bunch a flower, or who make an intro when you need a job.

Aggressive people have little support network, if any.

5. Aggression at the top signals insecurity

There is evidence that insecurity causes aggression.

In controlled experiments, subjects were more likely to act aggressively when their competence was challenged, and when they felt insecure (Fast and Chen 2009).

It’s a cliche’ in pop psychology that aggression stems from insecurity, and it’s not always true.
But these experiments show that, at least under certain conditions, it is true: aggression can stem from insecurity when the insecure man is at the top.

The title of the paper is also very telling: “When the Boss Feels Inadequate: Power, Incompetence, and Aggression”.

So, whenever you’re in a leadership position, watch out for aggressive behavior it communicates to others -and as importantly to yourself- that you’re either under threat, or incompetent.

Troubleshooting the causes of over-aggression

These are the reasons why people tend to behave overly aggressive.

You can use them to troubleshoot yourself and see if you fit in any of these categories:

1. Family / Background

Some grew up in aggressive families and never learned a different approach.
This is especially dangerous for lower-class individuals, since those who are overly aggressive with little qualities to offset that aggression tend to remain stuck in the lower rungs of society.

2. Addiction / Enjoyment of Confrontation

Some people are addicted -or slave to- the dopamine rushes of confrontations, as well as the brain chemical feeling of dominating others.

3. Sense of Control

Some enjoy -or need- a sense of control, and aggression gives a feeling of control.
Some authors have observed that it's this sense of control, coupled with immense drive and OCD tendencies, that made Steve Job such a notoriously irascible man.

4. Power Craving

Some people crave power, and they use aggression to always be the one-up in their interactions.

5. It Can Work in Some Situations

And, last but not least, let's be honest:

In the short run aggression often works.

Most people are not aggressive and not even assertive.
Many people end up being too passive and too compliant in the face of aggression. That makes the life of the aggressor feel easier when they boss people around.

Aggressive folks (sometimes) win in large part thanks to passive folks
Aggression can also work in the workplace, especially in some types of industries.
Aggressive individuals who can avoid the ugliest flares up often enjoy quicker ascension of dominance hierarchies.

Aggression VS Power

Constant aggression is more closely associated with dominance, than with power.

We could define power as:

> Power is the degree to which an individual can get what he wants.

It overlaps with dominance, but it's not the same.
It's an important distinction.

Dominance is measured by strength, and strength or the capability for aggression are only but one element of power.

You can be powerful without necessarily being aggressive.
And you can be aggressive, without being powerful (and without getting what you want).

Dominance is the degree to which someone can impose his will with sheer strength, display of sheer strength, threats, or aggression.
Dominance becomes coercive when propped by aggression or threats, and can as easily backfire as it can work. As a rule of thumb, leaders and individuals who rely on dominance and aggression make for poor leaders.

Power can achieve the same goals without relying (solely) on strength and aggression.
Power can use cunning, charm, charisma, resources, leadership skills, or even fake strength.

An Example From Our Ape Cousins

Think of it this way:

The alpha ape at the top of the hierarchy is strong and socially dominant.
The beta ape who makes the alpha his friend and also builds a web of supporters with which it might overthrow the alpha is putting power on his side.

This example is actually based on real events in a chimp colony.
The alpha was more dominant and aggressive than all others. But less strong and aggressive chimps banded together to overthrow the stronger alpha via a web of alliances and one single act of focused aggression (Ridley, 1997).

In ape colonies, strength is most useful when climbing the social hierarchies, showing you're not afraid and "making a name" for yourself. Once on top, leadership skills and social skills become more important.
Strength helps, but cunning is equally important.

That holds even truer in humans, since we are less (openly) violent and developed bigger brainpower for networking and relationships.

Do Develop the Capability For Aggression...

Of course, dominance, aggression, and softer versions of power are not pitted against each other.
As a matter of fact, you're much better off with both soft power and dominance.

This course will help you increase both dominance, and the social intelligence to wield soft power.

But Be As Un-Aggressive As You Can

Alain Prost, an F-1 racer once said that his goal was to win races going "as slow as possible".

You want the same approach for aggression -and, to a lesser degree, dominance in general-.
Big shows of aggression, either physical, verbal, or intellectual ("smart-alec), are the equivalent of going "as fast as possible".
As much going as fast as possible in car racing increases the risks of crashing, being as aggressive as possible also increases the social risks of crashing.

And that leads to an important principle: for maximum power, use as little aggression as possible, and always prefer buy-in (see forum Q&A for more details).

That's how you develop repeated win-win exchanges and how you set up collaborative relationships. And that's how you make people want to follow you.

Some exceptions apply, and we will see them along the course.
But you don't make the rules with the exceptions. And the general rule is that minimizing coercion and seeking buy-in leads to longer-lasting power, as well as to better relationships.

Moving Past Aggression

Values and beliefs are some of the most important drivers of behavior

Once they can change their beliefs though, behavior will follow.
So now we review common beliefs of aggressive people:

- I'm entitled to be angry = yeah, but anger doesn't equal aggression, and aggression is not that effective

Of course you are entitled to be angry.

The question is: does that give you the right to treat others rudely? Are you also entitled to treat people like crap?

Finally, it all comes down to effectiveness.

Most people telling themselves they're entitled to be angry are actually saying "I'm entitled to get what I want through anger and aggression".

However, as we've seen, over the long run expressing anger through aggression will most likely decrease your ability of getting what you want.

- If I'm not aggressive nothing will happen = great excuse for not having control over yourself

Pushing people and intimidating others can often help you get things done in the short run.

Of course, again, it comes at a heavy cost for you in the long run.
Top performers who build successful organizations and hold onto power rarely are overly aggressive.

Steve Jobs was probably an exception, and one might even argue if he was successful because of his aggression, or in spite of it.
There is maybe a parallel universe where Job learned to convey his anger with fewer explosions, and he remained at the helm of Apple for 30 years straight, never having been sacked in the first place, and produced 50 more revolutionary hits than he did when he came back later.

- Nice guys finish last = stop comparing yourself to extreme pushovers, it's a weak cop-out

It's not about where nice guys finish, because nobody says you must become a "nice guy", whatever that means.

The question for aggressive people is where aggressive people finish.
And it's rarely at the top, while enjoying an overall good life with successful relationships around them.

- Honesty is the best policy = yes, but not as an excuse to yell and offend

Honesty is great policy indeed.

But honesty is often used by aggressive people as an excuse to be rude, to offend, to yell, and to demean.

I remember many years ago the mother of an ex-girlfriend of mine told me that “I was a pussy” because I was removing excessive chili pepper from my dish.

She often used that style of communication, and her usual defense was that “she was honest”.

That’s quite weak actually. Honesty is good, aggression and offenses are rude.
Don’t even try to mix up the two, it’s weak-sauce (self-) manipulation.

SUMMARY

Aggression is a communication style high in dominance and directness, with little regard for others’ well-being, and little respect for their personal power and freedom.

Albeit it can be useful to get things done and to push people, it also comes with some important limitations.

In this article, we learned when aggression is useful, and how to move past aggression to move to a more empowering communication style: assertiveness.

Passive Communication: How to Break Free from Weakness

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The passive communication style, sometimes also referred to as “submissive style”, is an approach to interpersonal relationships characterized by a pattern of weak boundaries, unassertiveness, and submission.

In this article you will learn to self-diagnose if you’re passive, how to stop being passive, and how to become more assertive.

As an overview of the passive style:

	Passive	Aggressive	Passive Aggressive	Assertive
Actions	Keeps quiet Puts himself down Apologizes for self expression Hides his disagreement Inconvenience himself	Expresses himself over others Inflicts on others actions Ignores, insults, or attacks other opinions	Carries personal responsibility Passive aggressive Sarcastic Agrees to avoid discussion, then looks for ways to delay or fail the agreement	Directly express needs, wants & feelings Expects others to be equally open & honest Accepts different opinions without dismissing them
Looks	Makes himself small Looks down & hunch over Avoids eye contact Speaks softly	Makes himself large Looks threatening Penetrating eye contact Loud	Similar to passive	Relaxed Comfortable body language Frequent eye contact (but not glaring)
Beliefs	My needs are less important than others I don't have as many rights as others My contributions are not as valuable as others	My needs are more important and justified than others I have more rights than others My contributions are more valuable than others	My needs come first, but I can't express it directly I am not responsible for my actions I am entitled to get my way, even if I make different commitments	My needs are equally important as others I have equal rights We both can make valuable contributions I am responsible for my behavior
Emotions	Fear of rejection Helplessness & low self esteem Frustration Shame and towards others who are "superior"	Anger Powerful (or All-angry) when winning over others Fear, potentially powerful for manipulating others	Fear of rejection if being direct or assertive Resentful of people's demands & power Fear of being controlled	Positive feelings about self Positive feelings about establishing with others Trust all in team
Goals	Avoid conflict Please others (no matter at what cost to me) Let others take control (including other's opinions)	Win at any costs Control others Show others that others know who's in charge	Get it my way, without taking responsibility Do it my way, but without having to assert myself	Express himself Find an agreement Keep Girl boundaries of mutual respect

The Traits of Passive Individuals

Among the most salient traits of the passive communication style is a fear of confrontation.

The passive individual:

1. Gives in to unreasonable demands

> Another weekend in the office for extra unpaid work? Uhmm, OK. No, no trouble at all.

2. Goes along with the crowd (even when he doesn't want to)

> You all want to go to McDonald's? I don't mind that I'm on diet, it sounds great

The passive individual also fears the spotlight, so "going along with the crowd" always had the added benefit of making it easier for him to blend and disappear.

3. Withholds opinion out of fear of disagreement

> What do I think of cannabis liberalization?
> What do you guys think about it? All stoner should be imprisoned for life? Yeah, I can agree with that…

4. Withholds feedback out of fear of confrontation

> Yeah, I had to redo your budget report, but I don't mind some Excel work, you're doing fine

5. Over-Apologizes

> Oh, I'm sorry I was standing here, you bumped into me, and that I spilled my full glass of wine over my new suit

Apologizing if you've done something wrong is what you should do.
But avoid over-apologizing if you've done nothing wrong, or if someone else is at fault.

From a social exchange point of view, with their over-apologies passive people end up inflating their own social debt.

PRO Tip: If you have a tendency for over-apologizing, a quick fix can be to switch from "sorry" to "excuse me".

6. Never takes credit, minimizes one's own contribution

> Nah, it was OK, I was already awake at 3am, so no problem getting dressing and come pick you up

Passive people struggle mightily to collect their fair social credits and devalue their own contributions.

This is important information for us since our goal is to make you successful socially, and in life:

Passive individuals struggle to enter win-win exchanges and are more likely to remain stuck in win-lose exchanges, as well as in manipulative relationships.

This is embedded in the very "fabric" of the passive style.
Not being able to say "no" makes you an easy picking for the bullies and manipulators of this world.

The Strategic Uses of Submission

At first blush, there might seem to be no upside to submission.

But just like with aggression, evolutionary logic suggests that for submission to have evolved, it likely provided some benefits to at least someone in at least some context.

Indeed, evolutionary psychologist Buss lists several strategic uses of submissiveness and passivity.
And we add a few of our own:

1. Submissive people stay alive

Price's social competition hypothesis suggests that submissive signals and the passive communication style evolved to avoid costly fights in status hierarchies.

Of course, the problem with "staying alive" is that there is a big difference between "surviving" and "thriving".
And this is not the website for those who seek to "survive" :).

2. Passivity Can Save Time & Energy

Letting someone else take the lead, and potentially also let them lead you and/or your group, can save you time and resources.

Taking the lead can be a hustle, and since you often can't make everyone happy, you have to deal with the usual ballbreakers who complain about this or that.

Plus, once you become the leader, you also take on a responsibility, and you can't always just freely bail.

That's why, depending on the situation, I sometimes like to sit back in groups and let someone take the helm.
If I don't like the direction things are taking, I speak up.
And if people still want to go the way I don't like, I either change my attitude and go along, or go my own way.

Note: this point does not apply to individuals who are "stuck" in passive and submissive mode.
These folks are often overburdened with other people's work because of their inability to say "no".

3. Submissive Women Can Finish First Win At Dating

In dating, female submission can get men chasing and investing.

This is an exaggerated example of course, but the "damsel in distress" can be an extremely effective dating technique:

On average, men prefer more submissive women.

And women who can (selectively) send out submissive signals get both more men chasing for short-term, and more long-term providers to choose from.

4. To Approach Women In Sketchy Environments

Imagine a woman is:

- Walking in a dimly lit street at night
- Waiting for a night bus around lots of drunk guys
- Looking for her car in a rundown parking lot

In these cases, a smart man will make sure to send out strong and obvious friendly signals.
And friendly signals overlap with submissiveness, since they say "I'm not here to dominate you, I'm a friendly guy".

Going in too high-power or aggressive can make her recoil in fear, and then he'd have to invest a lot to overturn those dynamics.

Then later, once she knows it's all good, he can switch gears and start acting higher power.

The same holds true in sexual marketplaces where women are very risk-averse, like Korea or Japan, and it's especially true for foreigners residing there.
The same holds true for men who look more "dangerous", or imposing. Either because of their physical size, or because of how they look.

Skin color can also frame men as higher danger.
Whites can be seen as higher risk in Asia, and black men can also gain with a more friendly approach, and focusing more on comfort than on dominance.

5. To rebalance relationships after you wronged someone

When you abused or hurt someone, you're high-power.

But you're high power in a negative way.

And since good relationships are more or less balanced in terms of power, it's a good idea to not just say sorry, but also to give them back some power.

As David J. Lieberman correctly points out, if you hurt someone a "sorry" might not be enough (Lieberman, 2000).
Lieberman says that quickest -and the deepest- way to mend the relationship instead is to give them the power to punish you.

Giving them power to punish you, of course, is for more extreme cases.
But giving them power back with a big heartfelt sorry, a lowering of your head, and even letting them get angry at you, can be all good to re-establish a good relationship.

And if you pull this move well, they won't even want to get angry or punish you, since giving people power back is a high-quality behavior, and people like high-quality folks in their lives.

6. To avoid punishment when you're out of options

This is a more strategic subset of the "submission to save lives" approach.

In some cases, a (sneaky) way of avoiding punishment is by strategically playing low-power, clueless idiot.

This is can be most useful when you have no leverage whatsoever and the costs of the punishments would be huge -if they're not huge, then you can just take it in strides-.

Example:

A friend of mine had been called by the finance office for tax return misrepresentation, a potential criminal offense if prosecuted.
My friend had (stupidly) “tried his hand” and he knew he was guilty.

While some advised him to contact a lawyer, my friend showed in the office with broken local language, saying it was the first time he tried to file his own tax returns, which was true, and playing the “sorry I messed this up” role.

He then asked, “OK, what should I do now”.
Asking “what should I do now” asks the officer to direct his behavior -a sign of submissiveness-.

The tax officer admonished him to be careful because that mistake could be a criminal offense.
My friend acted with restrained shock and muttered it was probably the last time he would file his own tax returns (nice move).
Then they fixed the mistake together, the tax officer explaining in the teacher role and my friend playing the ignorant student (the subservient position).

Result: he got away scot-free.

Now I don’t necessarily recommend you try to use submissive behavior to break the law or to avoid punishment, but this is an example in which submission most likely worked better than any higher-power alternatives.
If my friend had shown up with an attitude (or with a lawyer), chances are that the situation would have escalated.

7. To Appease Someone

Similar to the above two points.

Submissive body language gives away power.

And, sometimes, you might want exactly that.

Why so?
Because people feel good about getting that power.
It can be a great strategy to give power to someone who has already power over you, since you’re not actually losing anything, but you’re improving your odds by making them feel good.

In short: submitting to someone who has already ultimate power over you can sometimes only improve your situation.
After all, they already can do anything to you, so your submission does not really change anything practically, but only seeks to make them feel good emotionally.
I know, it’s not our favorite strategy here at The Power Moves, but it can work.

Example 1: In Court

Imagine you f*cked up something big time, or you harmed someone.

And now you’re in a court of law.

If you maintain a high-power pose you show an unrepentant attitude, and judges always go down harder on unrepentant convicts.

See an example here

> Prosecution lawyer: I’d like the record to note of Mr. Koppenhaver laugh
> Judge: (with angry inflection) I’ve seen him laughing

Great job Mr. Koppenhaver, just gained a few more years behind bars, one of the most expensive smiles in history.

Example 2: To Avoid Traffic Tickets

Some signals of submissiveness towards the traffic cop send the message that it was an honest mistake, that you're sorry, and that you accept their power over you.

Dutton ran a small test showing cops two different videos of a traffic stop: a confrontational guy, and a guy giving out more submissive signals.
95% of cops said they would give a traffic ticket to the confrontational guy, but they'd let the "nice" guy go (Dutton, 2014).

Learn the strategies to avoid traffic tickets (alumni only!)

NOTE: 6 & 7 not recommended!

Albeit there is a time and place for almost anything in life, The Power Moves does not recommend these methods as your go-to behavior.
Least of all, as a mindset!

These are low-power, small-timer manipulative behavior. And, most of all, appeasing others to get out of problems is a bad mindset.
It's the mindset of the small-timer cheat.

This is "scratching with the turkeys" type of behavior. And we want you to soar with the eagles here.

8. As a Tool of Control, When No High-Power Options Are Available

Yes, submission can also be a tool of control.

Pleading, begging, guilt-tripping, pouting, crying… They are all submissive expressions that can work wonders to make people act the way the manipulator wants.

Psychologist Friz Perls argued that in close relationships the submissive party often ends up controlling the most aggressive party.
Frankly, that's a generalization and it's not always true.
But it would be wrong to think that the aggressive party always controls a relationship.

In truth, when an aggressive and a submissive have a relationship, it's a war for control that neither wins.
It's a lose-lose, toxic relationship.
So of course we recommend you don't resort to these tactics.

9. To Signal Appreciation / Respect

Some cultures use submissive body language as a "thank you" or as a sign of appreciation.

If someone holds the door open for you or gives you directions to go somewhere, you can say thank you and bow your head slightly.
In a different context, bowing could be a sign of submission, but a slight bow as a "thank you" can simply be a symbol of a polite and prosocial attitude.

10. To Keep The Support Coming

The signs of submission we mentioned above make people feel good.

They feel valued for their help, and that helps to keep the help coming.
Submission can be effective, for example, when you're a beginner with a mentor who is very high up.

Why You Must Stop Passive Communication

OK, there are strategic uses for submission.

Still, the rule of thumb is that you want to avoid sending too many submission signals unless you are doing it on purpose and for a specific purpose.

I quote Robert Bolton (Bolton, 1979):

> Submissive people do not express their honest feelings, needs, values, and concerns.
> They allow others to violate their space, deny their rights, and ignore their needs. Some submissive people do express their needs but do it in such an apologetic and diffident manner that they are not taken seriously.

What Bolton is referring to is submissiveness as a lack of capability in defending one's needs and rights.

In short, submission is bad when you do it not because it's good to do it, but because you lack the capability for assertiveness.
If that's the case, submission has the following harmful consequences:

1. Bottling up of anger and frustrations
2. Potential for sneaky, passive-aggressive behavior as an outlet for that
3. Falling (extremely) short of one's life potential
4. Opening the door to possible abuse
5. Lowering of one's own social status

You also can't have an empowered mindset if you never stand your ground when people trample your rights or treat you rudely.
Overall, for people who overdo submission, the "advantages" of a submissive life pale in comparison to the disadvantages.

Beliefs to Overcome Passive Submissiveness

I need to make it easier for them to step all over me
Beliefs are crucial.

People can change their behavior, but without changing faulty beliefs, they are fighting an uphill battle.

When people perceive themselves as unequal, they also accept unequal treatment (Shaw, 2020).
But when they see themselves as equals, they automatically expect and, almost automatically, demand equal treatment.

So in this now we examine both the faulty beliefs -in red- and the correct ones -in green-:

- I am less important than others

I am equally as important as others

- I'm less valuable than others

I might be less valuable to achieve certain outcomes in certain specific areas, but as a person, I am as valuable as anyone else.

Plus, I can always become more valuable, which I am doing right now.
And I can be more valuable than others in some other areas where I have higher expertise and efficiency.

- It's important to be nice

Yeah, why not.
Being passive is not being nice though. Being passive is being mean and value-taking… To yourself first, and to others when you don't tell them the truth.

Being assertive and honest is far nicer.

- I'm not entitled to having control over my life

Of course I am entitled to control over my life!
If not me, who else?

- I cannot do things as effectively as others

I might not do things as effectively as someone else in certain areas, and even then, I am still equal to them.
Plus, I can always get better and I can get better than someone else in other areas..

- My role is to serve

I might serve, and I might happy of doing so sometimes.
But it is not my role to serve.
If anything, it's my choice whenever I choose so. And I can also choose not to serve, as I will do every time I feel someone is undeserving of my support.

- The way to be accepted and appreciated by others is to give and give

In some situations, giving is a good thing, IF and WHEN people are also giving back.
Giving and giving to those who take and take without giving back is stupid, it's a waste of resources, and it also makes the world a worse place, since it teaches people that it's OK to not contribute anything.

- If others disagree with me, then I must be wrong

Pretty much the same chances of others being wrong.

- It's impolite to disagree

No, it's impolite to agree even if you don't.
Polite is to be honest enough to let people know what you really think.

- Passivity is the way to be loved

Passiveness is the way to be taken advantage of, attract bullies and abusers, and remain stuck scratching with the turkeys.
Passiveness makes the world a worst place because I hold back my contribution and my value-giving to worthy and deserving people, while I enrich the undeserving bullies and value-takers who take advantage of passive folks.

SUMMARY

The passive communication style is a pattern of communication and behavior characterized by weak boundaries, social tentativeness or withdrawal, and general submissiveness.

It's sometimes accompanied by social fears, as well as low self-esteem, and it's often supported by poor beliefs about life, socialization, and self-worth.
This article addresses values and beliefs to help submissive people become more assertive.

Assertiveness: Definition, Examples & How to Be Assertive

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Assertiveness means speaking up clearly and respectfully — confidence without aggression.
It is a communication style and relationship approach built on directness, self-respect, and respect for others.

Intro

Most social skills and communication resources frame assertiveness as the sweet spot between submission and aggression. Hence, to understand assertiveness, it's useful to compare it with the other styles of communication. Here is an overview:

	Passive	Aggressive	Passive Aggressive	Assertive
Actions	Keeps quiet Puts himself down Apologizes for all expressions Hides his disagreement Inconvenience himself	Expresses himself over others Belittles or disrespects others Ignores, insults, or attacks other opinions	Denies personal responsibility Uses aggression Sarcastic Agrees to avoid discussion, then looks for ways to sabotage the agreement	Directly expresses needs, wants & feelings Expects others to be equally open & honest Accepts different opinions without dismissing them
Looks	Makes himself small Looks down & hunch over Avoids eye contact Speaks softly	Makes himself large Looks threatening Penetrating eye contact Loud	Similar to passive	Relaxed Comfortable body language Frequent eye contact (but not glaring)
Beliefs	My needs are less important than others I don't have as many rights as others My contributions are not as valuable as others	My needs are more important and justified than others I have more rights than others My contributions are more valuable than others	My needs come first, but I don't expect others to meet my needs I am not responsible for my actions I am entitled to get my way, even if I make different commitments	My needs are equally important as others I have equal rights We both can make valuable contributions I am responsible for my behavior
Emotions	Fear of rejection Helplessness & low self esteem Frustration Resentment towards others who are "successful"	Anger Powerful (or full angry) when winning over others Fear, potentially powerful in manipulating others	Fear of rejection if being direct or assertive Resentful of people's demands & power Fear of being controlled	Positive feelings about self Positive feelings about excelling with others Fear of other's anger
Goals	Avoid conflict Please others (no matter at what cost to me) Let others take control (and blame others for it)	Win at any costs Control others Always make sure others know who's in charge	Get it my way, without taking responsibility Get it my way, but without having to assert myself	Express himself Find an agreement Keep clear boundaries of mutual respect

Chart comparing assertiveness to the other communication styles (Buffalmano, 2020, based on Paterson, 2000)

Key Traits of Assertiveness

- Boundaries: Having, maintaining, and enforcing personal boundaries of:
  - Basic respect: expecting and demanding respectful behavior
  - Privacy: declining to answer or discuss questions and topics that feel too personal or nosy
  - Time: choosing what and when to do, not allowing others to "task" you without your full consent
  - Personal freedoms: freedom of choice, of holding different opinions, etc.
- Timely and honest communication: assertive communication is timely, honest, precise, and often direct. It includes the communication of wants, needs, emotions, feelings, goals, and boundaries.
- Expecting and encouraging honest and direct communication: expecting, demanding, and/or encouraging direct and honest communication from others
- Standing behind one's choices, opinions, & feelings: the assertive communicator acknowledges and stands behind his choices, opinions, and feelings

Effective Assertiveness™

Effective assertiveness™ is a goal-oriented communication and behavioral approach that focuses on picking the most effective behavior and communication style to achieve one's goal.
While it maintains a baseline preference for assertive and high-power communication, it retains the strategic flexibility to employ any style that is most effective in the context, including passive, passive-aggressive, assertive, or aggressive.

This approach contrasts with many social skills and communication resources that often present assertiveness as the 'golden style' to adop in all or almost all situations.

We agree that assertiveness can be the 'baseline approach', but see more room for calibration.

Here are some examples of when our contextual model may pick a different style instead:

Style	When it is "Effectively Assertive"
Passive	When the cost of engagement is higher than the benefit of winning or leading (e.g., ignoring a low-value troll or when you just don't care)
Passive-Aggressive	When a subtle "nudge" saves you time or is less risky (e.g., telling your boss 'yes, just give one moment to settle down' instead of explaining that you don't want to be tasked right after showing up at work)
Aggressive	When a boundary has been crossed and an immediate, high-cost deterrent is required to stop an aggressor and signal that you're not an easy victim

Most communication guides also present assertiveness as an approach that doesn't seek influence, but only to state your needs.
We understand that position and appreciate it as a good mindset. However, as a platform for ambitious men who want to achieve goals, influence is crucial in many life situations.

Use All Communication Styles (Not Just Assertiveness)

Social effectiveness is all about calibrating to people and situations.

To maximize your chances of success in life, you need to learn and master the whole communication spectrum, including submission and aggression.

Why?

1. To better understand others: learning to read people empowers you to better socialize, influence, and possibly, to also help people grow
2. To adapt and strategize: different environments and different situations call for different styles of communication

Because each style has its strategic use in socialization.
Sometimes acting submissive, and letting others have -or feel– higher power is strategically the best option.
And some other times, you might have to act more aggressively to meet aggression with aggression.

So in the next lessons, we will learn when and how to use each one.

Be Assertive and Persuasive (Not Just Neutral)

Most assertiveness resources define assertiveness along these lines:

> State your needs, wants, and feelings, without trying to influence or persuade others.

While the approach of not needing to influence can be an empowering mindset to avoid outcome-dependence, the truth is that persuasion and influence are at the core of personal power and efficacy.

There is no added value or glory in "not trying to influence others".
High-quality individuals persuade for win-win outcomes, so persuasion is often a good thing.

So this is assertiveness defined within a high-quality, high-power perspective:

> To state your needs, wants, feelings, and opinions clearly and directly, to respect yourself as well as others, and to influence others to reach certain goals

Calibrate Assertiveness to Context

There is no rule carved in stone to when, how, and how frequently to use assertive communication formats.

How frequently depends on several factors, including:

- Where you're at in your life and career: it might pay off to say "yes" to your boss even when you'd want to say "no", sometimes (Caldwell, 2018)
- Where you're at in the mastery curve: beginners might learn quicker if they just accept and do what the teacher says
- Your culture: different cultures expect more or less assertion, depending on your status, gender, and role
- Your goals and chosen strategies: sometimes it pays off to be strategically more submissive, or more aggressive
- Gender (more later)
- Who you're dealing with: Calibrating is a good idea (Cruz, 2018). Be softer with those who are more on the submissive side.

Assertiveness & Power

There is an overlap between "assertive" and "high-power".

People who master assertion tend to come across as confident, high-power, and generally high-quality individuals who get things done.

And since assertive individuals don't overpower others, they also tend to develop strong long-term relationships (see "basic strategies of power").
That enables assertives to develop win-win far more than aggressive individuals can.

Assertiveness & Vulnerability

One of the biggest secrets of marrying assertiveness with power is this:

High-power assertion includes high-power vulnerability, such as admitting one's own negative or antisocial feelings.
Attention: not all vulnerability is good.
We're talking about high-power vulnerability here. This is the "accepting one's own dark side" we talk about on this website.

If you don't accept your dark side, you can be high power, and still act unassertive.
See an example here:

> Rossi: We don't have any problem
> Marquez: (offers handshake, and Rossi refuses)
> Rossi: (looks passive-aggressive)

Rossi was high-power, but he didn't add the high-power vulnerability of admitting his negative feelings.

Compare now to this other approach in a follow-up video (link in our training):

> Interviewer: So in the past 2 years you've been like two old friends again
> Lorenzo: No, I don't think we are friends <— High power honesty

This is high power assertive.

Lorenzo admits very candidly of not being friends with Rossi. All the while, complimenting him and building him up.
High-power, and high-quality.

Assertiveness Beliefs

The Routledge Handbook of Communication Skills states that beliefs make the difference between assertive men, and unassertive ones.

So let's start with the beliefs holding you back from reaching assertiveness:

Limiting Beliefs That Block Assertiveness

- "Dark" feelings such as anger and will to power are bad to have an even worse to show

This is what we've just seen with the video example.

See an example from Ray Dalio, and read this good discussion on why some (some!) left-wing folks come across as hypocrites.

- Assertiveness means getting your own way all the time

No, that's aggression. Assertiveness is meant to put you on an equal footing with other people.

- Being assertive means being selfish

No, being assertive means being fair and high-power.
However, you can be "individualistic".

- Other people can't handle my assertiveness

That's actually demeaning, to think of others as weak.

- People should be more considerate

"Shoulds" are usually weak positions to be in.

When you hold this belief, you either don't believe that you should tell them to act differently since they should know, or you believe that you must yell at them because they should know better and you have to set them straight.

- I'm afraid of being assertive and failing

You will fail.
And that's great, failing is learning.

- I have to convince others

As a rule of thumb:

All the "I have to" apply unneeded and often counterproductive pressure on you (Ellis, 1988).

When you hold this belief, you either never start sharing your opinion, or you get angry when you cannot change other people's minds.

- I must look good, strong, and happy

This is about emotional assertiveness.

And it includes all acts of "concealing" emotions in order to look better to others.

It might be one of the major causes of male aggression, female anger repression, passive-aggression, as well as general communication breakdown.

Many men feel it's not OK to admit their personal struggles or request (emotional) help.
So they deny their true feelings to others and to themselves and seek to have their needs met with aggression or covert-aggression.

Everyone tries to look "strong" and happy. Result: total communication breakdown, and destruction of true intimacy and connection
Again, this is not to say "parade your weakness", to wallow in self-pity, or to always be "vulnerable".
But some men can gain with more open, honest, and high-power communication.

Empowering Beliefs to Build Assertiveness

This is the central belief of assertiveness: I am worthy of respect and proper behavior, and I provide as much
And now the positive beliefs of assertiveness:

- I am a respect-worthy man and so are most others
- I'm in charge of my behavior, others are in charge of theirs <—- this takes the pressure off from speaking up because you're not forcing anyone. Only stating your position.
- I decide for myself what I will and will not do
- People may ask anything, and I can decline anything

- I may make mistakes, but I am still a worhty, respectable human <— Good men need it. They accept abuse after a mistake because they feel the pressure to be "good" and effective. Growth mindset and antifragile ego help solve this issue.
- I can be illogical with my decisions <—- Effective against manipulators looking for reasoning "faults". Avoid the argument altogether. Your choices are valid for the simple fact that you chose them
- I don't know everything, and neither should I
- I can ask for help <— Useful for men who "suffer in silence"
- I am not responsible for other people's problems <— Great against emotional manipulation
- Direct talk is better than covert because covert sounds passive-aggressive
- Others can give advice, but I make my decisions
- I am my own judge, I don't have to justify myself to others

 Example:

> Covert aggressor: Why did you do it that way?

> Weak: (starts justifying, then accepts the aggressor's explanation on how it should be done)
> Empowered: Because, that's what I chose to do

 Example 2:

> Aggressor: BS! what makes you even think that!

> Weak: (accepts the aggression, justifies, then accepts he is wrong)
> Empowered: Number 1, don't talk to me that way again please. And number 2, we can talk about rationale after you speak respectfully

The high-power assertive stance is this:

> As long as I remain within the law and my moral code, I can think, say, and do as I please

Assertive Communication: Skills & Examples

A quick chart overview:

While passive and passive-aggressive avoid communication, assertive individuals speak up.

They speak:

- Early: speak early to avoid stewing
- Directly: state your needs and wants clearly and directly
- Respectfully: but with respect and consideration for others

Take this new mantra of assertive communication with you:

> "Say what you mean, mean what you say, but don't say it mean."
> -The assertiveness mantra

Assertiveness & Attachment Styles

There seems to be an overlap between attachment styles and assertiveness (Hanks, 2016), and securely attached individuals tend to be more assertive.

As an overview:

	Anxious	Avoidant	Secure
Traits	Clings to relationships - Anxious during separation - Fearful of abandonment - Overwhelmed by emotions Mixes thoughts and feeling	Ends relationships too soon - Uncomfortable being emotionally close - Intimate at a surface level - Unaware of thoughts & feelings	Can form relationships, but also comfortable alone - Can manage emotions - Can separate thoughts and feelings
Differentiation	Low	Low	High
Attitude	Reactive	Guarded	Confident
Barriers to Assertiveness	- Afraid to speak up for fear of creating distance or rejection - Fear of overwhelming others Inability to identify and tune in to emotions - Makes excuses for people's patterns of boundary-crossing (respect it's since the [illegible] is always "[illegible]")	- Detached from own emotions, especially during conflict or stress - Prevents conflict [illegible] Fears discussing emotions (the fear of getting too close) - Confuses fair standing up for oneself as rudeness - Confuses partners' search for fair intimacy as crossing his boundaries - "Gets things got" even when it bothers or hurt him	- May have difficulty identifying emotions - May have difficulty communicating emotions May lack confidence to be assertive or speak directly
Goals	- Attachment's self-awareness - Acknowledge value of close relationships & interdependence - Connect to emotions Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants - Develop communication skills	- Attachment's self-awareness - Identify feelings, thoughts, needs, and wants - Develop emotional management strategies Develop communication skills	- Attachment's self-awareness - Develop emotional vocabulary - Develop and/or solidify assertiveness skills

Chart by Lucio Buffalmano and based on Hanks, 2016

While evidence is still lacking, it seems at least theoretically possible that by working on one, you could also improve on the other.

7. 8 Keys to Eliminating Passive-Aggressiveness

Summary | Amazon

Albeit Andrea Brandt focuses only on passive-aggression, this was for me one of the most eye-opening books on the topic.

And it still is.

If you already know you're passive-aggressive, or if you're dealing with a passive-aggressive in your life, this is your book.

6. The Power of A Positive No

Summary | Amazon

The simple message behind a “positive no” is very simple and at the same time very emotionally intelligent.
The steps are:

1. Say no
2. Frame it as you saying “yes” to something else you’re doing
3. End on a more conciliatory tone

This is basic, yet important emotional and social intelligence wisdom that is missing from many assertiveness books.
Many assertiveness resourcesfocus only on the strength of saying no, rather than on the strategies of saying no and keeping a good relationship.

5. Alpha Assertiveness Guide

Amazon

Some reviews on some assertiveness books say that most books resemble each other.

I don't think it's a matter of resembling each other or not: obviously, the basic theory of assertiveness is pretty much the same.
There is nothing new to invent, and if any author "invented" anything new about the basics, it would mean he's making things up.

Instead, I think that to learn assertiveness, it's about how good the examples are.
And the mindsets behind the behaviors that the author can help convey.

And "Alpha Assertiveness Guide for Men and Women" has lots of mini-case studies, and I thought they were all good-quality examples to learn from.

4. The Art of Everyday Assertiveness

Summary | Amazon

What I enjoyed the most about King's work are his many techniques of saying "no".

Some of them were simple yet genius, empowering even the most passive individauls to find a way to utter some of the most difficult words in the English language: "no".

3. The Assertiveness Guide for Women

Summary | Amazon

It's actually a pity it's called "for women", since anyone can learn from this.

Julie de Azevedo Hanks is the only one that connects the dots between attachment styles, individuation, and assertiveness.
Not as deep in terms of examples and case studies, but that wasn't this book's aim. And from an academic point of view, this might have been the best book on assertiveness I've ever read.

2. The Assertiveness Workbook

Summary | Amazon

If you're a complete beginner with social anxiety, exercises can help.
And what lands this book to the #2 spot is that it's a work-book with exercises, scoring cards, and challenges.

Some formats, like the DESO can feel unnatural in everyday communication, but it can be OK for beginners.

If you're starting from zero and want to start getting off the ground, this may be your assertiveness companion to get you going.

Then, when you're ready for the top-1% you can consider our next resource.

1. Power University

Summary | Reviews

Why is this first?

We're transparent about the fact that Power University is our program. That said, the ranking is based on clear, objective advantages that other assertiveness resources do not offer for ambitious men.

First, Power University is the only assertiveness resource that goes beyond simply assertiveness and teaches the full strategic spectrum: assertiveness, submissiveness, controlled aggression, and passive-aggressiveness.

Those behavioral strategies exist for a reason: in some contexts, being assertive is optimal; in others, a different stance yields a far better social ROI. A high-level social strategist needs to know all of them, and when to deploy each.

Power University is the only program that teaches that complete decision-making framework.

Second, you learn assertiveness best by watching assertiveness.
Books help, but real skill comes from seeing power dynamics play out. PU is the only resource that pairs theory with hundreds of real-life pictures, video analyses, and breakdowns of high-power and assertive behavior. You don't just read it: you observe it, model it, and implement it.

And while yes, we're biased, alumni outcomes speak for themselves: students consistently report not only higher assertiveness, but also higher confidence, better relationships, stronger boundaries, and objectively better social outcomes.

If you want the practical, top-1% path to assertiveness, the kind that actually changes how you deal with people , this is the resource.

TPM’s 3 Pillars Framework: How We Ensure Accuracy

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Any theory or advice is sub-optimal when built on one single source of knowledge.

Be it personal experience and anecdotes, studies and citations, or clever theorizing, they’re all lacking on their own.

At The Power Moves, we use a different standard.
Every framework we teach is built on three pillars: first-hand experience, scientific evidence, and rigorous critical analysis.

TPM 3-Pillars Framework™
A practical framework TPM uses to build reliable, repeatable strategies: it requires (1) first-hand experience; (2) careful use of scientific evidence and data; and (3) rigorous critical analysis that falsifies, synthesizes, and turns findings into usable systems. Applied together, the three pillars produce theories and tactics that work across contexts.

⍰♂Lucio’s Take: How our reviews fit into this system

Lucio:
You may notice many reviews and analyses of books, biographies, and studies across The Power Moves. These are not treated as standalone summaries, but as structured input for our 3-Pillars framework.

These resources add scientific and/or experience-based insights and, combined with Lucio’s own experience and research, processed through critical analysis to further develop our systems and teachings.

This article explains that method in full—how the three pillars work, where each one fails on its own, and why only their combination produces reliable theories, repeatable strategies, and real-world results.

Overview

1. Experience
   1. First-hand experience and Observation
   2. Second and third-hard experience
2. Science
   1. Data: the quantitative results of research
   2. Scientific method
3. Critical analysis
   1. Logic: ensures reasoning is valid
   2. Critical thinking: meta-level analysis (analysis of analysis), ensuring the analysis remains logical and grounded in data
   3. Pattern recognition: Connects the dots, building 'bridges of meaning' among them. The more you connect, the better the theories
   4. Systemic thinking: the ability to think and observe at a higher level of abstraction (Gallon, 2009)

The final products are:

- Theories, Mental Models, & Systems that explain reality, and allow for predictions.
  - General principles
  - Strategies & techniques to achieve outcomes
- Real-world outcomes from applying principles and strategies

This is the process we also use for Power University.

1. Experience

Experience includes everything that one sees, does, or experiences.

There are two levels of first-hand experience:

1.2. First-Hand Experience

Not all personal experiences are created equal.

For example, "experience" in workplace politics after 30 years doing the same job, without improvement or upward movement, is not the best type of experience to inform on how to progress at work.

In general, strong experience is:

1. Successful* experience: for example, in social skills, high status attainment
2. Repeated* success: for example, repeated across different social groups
3. Repeated successes in different contexts, with different personalities and cultures

1.3. Observation

Observation of others allows us to increase data points.

The good social researcher observes others and seeks possible causal links between others' behaviors, mindsets, and results.

Observation Added Value

Observation complements first-hand experience learning from:

- Different people in ways that we could not simply test by changing our behavior
- Outliers
- Deeper scrutiny from public courts or investigations (information people wouldn't otherwise share)
- Negative examples that we may not want to repeat ourselves

1.4. Second & Third Hand Experience

Knowledge acquired listening to others or consuming their work, including information that has been syntethized from different sources.

For example, at TPM we leverage this body of knowledge studying biographies or experienced authors' takes on syntethized body of knowledge (ie.: dating guides with authors' experiences plus the collective contributions of online dating communities).

How to Expand Experience

Some tips to learn from personal experience:

- Try different things: different activities, in different contexts, with different personalities
- Reflect outcomes, and the link between action and results
- Ask yourself "what if", "what could I have done… "
- Broaden experience with feedback: it can point to blind spots
  - ⁉️♂️ Lucio's note: I ask deep probing questions to my dates, and it provided invaluable insights into dating dynamics

Advantages of Experience

Experience is not always and necessarily the first pillar of any discipline, but it is the main pillar for TPM-related disciplines.
Among the advantages of experience:

Reliable if based on repeated success

Repeated results can provide the best data and insights to tease out the best strategies for achieving outcomes.

However, there are important caveats:

1. Generalizability: results might not necessarily be generalizable to different personalities and contexts
2. Good analysis is needed, especially to generalize to different contexts and individuals.
   Successful teachers with poor analytical skills rarely make for great teachers.

High-quality data for pattern recognition

Deeper and broader the experience allows for more pattern recognition.

Highest-quality data points for social intelligence

While people differ in social and power intelligence at birth, experience is necessary for everyone to improve it.

Limitations of Experience

For all its importance, there are also important limitations to personal experience, including:

Some results cannot be reproduced many times over

While experiences like conversations and cold approaches can be repeated many times over, some others cannot.

In some endeavors, success is inversely proportional to quantity or breadth of experience.
For example, peak relationship success may be to have one single relationship. Peak career is to quickly raise to CEO position in one's first company. Both limit the breadth of experience.

These forms of success can be problematic for deriving generalizable principles.

Success may be due to randomness and chance

For example, business success may benefit heavily from 'right time, right product'. Critical thinking may help differentiate luck from effective mindsets and strategies.

Personal experience needs critical thinking for higher-level mastery

Personal experience without good analysis is limited by one's own experience.
Also, the inability to tease out general principles may lead to failure as soon as circumstances change.

Deep but narrow experience leads to one-trick ponies

For exampe, Nassim Taleb says that trained fighters are poor street fighters because they train within specific rules. While it may not be the best example, he raises a valid point. There is an inverse relation between contextual uniqueness and transferability of results.

Personal experience is limited by individual uniqueness

Principle:

⚖ The more unique the individual, the more his experience lacks generalibility.

For example, a handsome and famous man's approach to dating may not be very helpful to lower status men.

2. Science

Includes:

- Studies, experiments, and surveys
- Big data analyses

As well as:

- Scientific method and scientifically-informed thinking

In social skills, scientific data can confirm or disprove the patterns seen in personal experiences.
Confirmation lands credibility to the validity and reproducibility of his experience. Disconformation instead calls for revisions and additional analysis.

At TPM we leverage science by studying the research literature, and we particularly vlaue research handbooks because high-authority researchers syntethize the full empirical literature.

Science Added Value

Scientific data improves our understanding with:

Mitigates the risks of inductive reasoning (Fooled by Randomness)

Science adds quantity and diversity of data that allows more confident generalizations of principles.

I often see it as a red flag when people are too self-confident based on limited experience.
It's a case of inductive reasoning, or going from one case -or a small number of cases-, to the general rule.

High quantity & quality of data

Data and surveys can provide quantity and diversity of data points that experience alone may struggle to match.

For example, it would be hard to estimate, say, the average sexual partner in a specific country just by asking around.
And yet, that's very important information to assess the sexual dynamics of a given sexual marketplace.

Scientific data is also more structured, in contrast to personal experience, which is most often unrecorded, injecting new types of biases (e.g., recency effect & salience effect). It allows for more granular data analyses (e.g.: subgroups of religious VS non-religious women, and cohorts to track changes over time).

Experiments can set up contexts that one can hardly replicate in real life

While some real-life contexts are difficult to replicate in the lab, some useful lab experiments can be challenging or rare to experience in real life (ie.: Milgram experiment on obedience).

Science can isolate variables

Studies can help isolate single variables, re-run the experiment with different manipulations, and provide a more accurate measurement.

For example, measuring the effect of "priming" on persuasion and behavioral change is nearly impossible in real life.
But a series of smart experiments can find out whether -and how well- priming actually works.

Limitations of Science

Science is a powerful engine of progress, but good scientists are aware of the limits of science.
In the social sciences, replicating and measuring dynamics of influence, power dynamics, or social strategies is particularly challenging.
Some limitations of scientific research include:

Research-specific limitations

Poorly-designed or low-powered studies can sometimes be actively misleading.

The examples are too many to count, from priming to power poses, and it prompted a period of soul-searching in psychology (and some skepticism that at times was an overreaction).

Critical thinking helps: looking at methodology, population size, and possible confounding variables helps put individual studies in perspective.

In social sciences, some research applications to the real world can be dubious (external validity)

Some studies can be perfectly executed, and still not provide great insights about real-world dynamics.

Psychologist Martin Seligman says that external validity is one of the banes of psychology research:

> This is the "white rats and college sophomore" issue: researchers can control and measure what rats and sophomores do in the laboratory, but any finding's application to real human problems is always a strain

And he adds that "public doubts about the applicability of basic, rigorous science are often warranted, and this is because the rules of external validity are not clear".

Critical thinking, supported by personal experience, can help separate scientific signal from scientific noise.

Many false positives & false negatives for complex dynamics

I'll give you an example:

Betsy Prioleau in "Swoon" says that women prefer men with feminine faces.
Indeed, there are plenty of studies that suggest that women prefer more feminine faces. But there are also plenty of studies that seem to suggest that women prefer more masculine faces.

This is normal.
Investigating complex issues with high individual variance often leads to studies reaching opposite conclusions.

Meta-analyses may help, but they're not enough.
Critical thinking must step in with hypotheses to be tested with ad-hoc studies that isolate variables (eg.: high-value women's preferences, risky vs. safe environments, women's age, etc. etc.).

Experience helps.
For example, a man hypothesizes that younger women tend to prefer more feminine faces based on boyband fandom, and that may inform future research, or how to assess existing studies.

Science Power Dynamics & Incentives Don't Always Align With Truth

Just like any other human, scientists also have personal biases, and may place personal success above 'truth'.

Some of the issues with published research:

- The full published literature is inherently biased towards larger effect sizes because
  - Publishers are more likely to publish largely significant or shocking results rather than mild, confirming, or "null" results
  - Researchers may prefer results that are most likely to be published, with an incentive to "massage" the data ("p-hacking")
- Fraud, or wholly made-up data
  See for example the cases of Francesca Gino and the Stanford Scandal
- Seek personal fame, publishing too early, fudging, or over-selling smallish (and little effective) findings.
  For example, Amy Cuddy/power poses, Angela Duckworth/"grit"
  - Self-help distortions: Although not a criticism of science, even valid constructs like vulnerability or "growth mindset" can turn ineffective when misapplied

A good chunk of pre-replication crisis results are overstated or misleading

Incentives may have been particularly badly misaligned before the replication crisis.
And researchers had much more freedom and leeway to "torture the data" until the data looked 'good'.

3. Critical Analysis

Critical analysis turns all the available data into theories and principles.
Good critical analysis could be boiled and simplified as “thinking well”.

⍰♂Lucio’s Take: The secret sauce to TPM’s uniqueness?

Lucio:
I used to think that The Power Moves’ popularity came from combining experience, with science.

Today I think differently.
Although few do it well, many creators talk about personal experience and add some citations. So today I believe that the true added value of this website is in the critical analysis.

Critical analysis includes:

- Logic
- Skepticism and ‘healthy cynicism‘ to consider possible personal biases
  - Falsification / critical refutation, or considering why a theory may not be true <— ⍰⍰♂ Lucio’s note: It’s something I do naturally, and that I believe is very useful, and something I wish to see more of
- Systems thinking, looking for patterns to turn data into coherent theories and principles
- Practical application from theories

Critical Analysis Added Value

Solid critical analyses allow for:

Critical Analysis Turns Data Into Predictive Theories

Predictive theories provide the theoretical infrastructure to understand the links among different phenomena.

For example, evolutionary theory of male parental investment allows us to understand why women are more selective than men, but why men are also selective for long-term relationships, and more selective than most other males in the animal kingdom.

Critical Analysis Turns Theories Into Strategies

To achieve real-world outcomes.

Critical analysis troubleshoots inconsistencies

Inconsistencies can arise between different experiences at different times, or between experience and scientific data.

Critical analysis provides the first test of whether inconsistencies weaken, undo, or even reinforce a theory.

For example, some men's attraction for very old women on paper could undo evolutionary psychology. However, critical analysis would look at how common it is, whether these men are also attracted to younger women, and provide first testable explanations that may even strengthen the general theory and principles.

Critical analysis tells if personal experience or science shall prevail

When science and experience diverge, critical thinking can tell what to assign more weight to.

For example, imagine in a survey 95% of men say they have more power in their relationship, 63% of the women confirm, but your personal observation suggests otherwise.

In this case, an experienced observer may be right and good analysis may explain why.
Men and women both fall for social desirability bias, and men for ego self-protection as well.

And they both focus on the 'official' leadership role, which is often a front, instead of what most often moves the needle: who has more emotional influence over the other.

Conversely, data beats personal experience when the data is highly reliable. For example, in a salespage A/B test with reliable data.

How to Improve Critical Analysis

Keep A Constant Feedback Loop Between Experience & Theory

Incorporate the latest experience into your general theory and principles.
Matching experience reinforces the theory, while mismatching experience provides opportunity for refining the theory (and continuous mismatching experience for scrapping the theory).

Let Go of Biases

You can either learn the truth and, in turn, develop effective strategies to win, or you can hold to your biases.

Analyze Feedback Non-defensively

You may dislike someone or someone's feedback.
But before dismissing it, ask yourself if there may be anything true in what they said.

Strike A Balance Between Open Mind & Brains Falling Out

For example, I consider the "law of attraction" in the sense that you can "manifest" things not true and unworthy of my investigative time.
I still keep a small window open to the possibility that it might be true, but don't waste time investigating it or researching it.

Never Stray Too Far From The Data

Good analysis limits itself.

Good analysis must stay close to the data: the farther analysis strays from data and experience, the more speculative it becomes.
And the farther it strays from good data, the more prone it becomes to being twisted by personal biases.

Just like a smart swimmer keeps an eye on the coastline to ensure he can always swim back, good critical thinking never strays too far off experience and data.

Falsify Your Own Theories: Red Team

Analyze 'why it's not true' at least as much as you ponder 'why it's true'.

Read & Learn From Critical Thinkers

And you'll naturally move closer to their way of thinking.

For more, also read:

- Critical thinking analysis of news
- Critical thinking analysis of an ad
- Critical thinking against journalist's games

Limitations of Analysis

The effectiveness of critical analysis depends wholly on the quality of that analysis.
Poor analysis may be worse than no analysis at all because it leads to wrong theories, which in turn lead to wrong predictions and strategies.

And a bad strategy is worse than a purely random strategy.
So here are some limitations to be aware of:

- Good analysis needs good data points, as per the 'garbage in, garbage out' principle. Great thinkers with little experience and data do not make for good theories
- Good analysis demands absence of personal biases, and although it may sound obvious, unbiased analysts are a tiny minority.
  - Biased good thinkers are the worst, since they are better able to fool themselves and others

Avoid teachers with poor critical thinking
Reliable signs of poor thinking include 1) over-generalizations; 2) little nuances and exceptions; 3) generic 'laws' with little notes on how to calibrate them

End Product: Systems

The end goal is developing higher-level theories that explain reality.
For our practical goals, we then extend to effective strategies for replicable results across different contexts and personalities.

The 3 pillars of learning as they start forming systems (then turning into "pillars of knowledge")
A good system empowers you to make predictions and strategize effectively to achieve goals.
You can:

- Recognize patterns: for example, quickly draw conclusions about one's character, or about the social and power dynamics of any new situation
- Superior information handling, make connections & prediction: you categorize incoming information to start forming a larger picture, and can then make connections from disclosed information and infer undisclosed information
- Respond effectively to achieve goals as you can predict what certain actions will lead to

Systems Open The Doors To All Sub-Systems

In many disciplines, different sub-systems are connected.

For example, social skills' main systems include human nature, social exchanges, and interpersonal power dynamics.
Understand those, and you understand most socialization, whether it's in relationships, business, or friendships.

TIP: For Mentors, Pick Good Thinkers Who Understand The Dynamics:
Pick not just people who are good at doing something, but people with a deep grasp of the underlying dynamics.
These people can teach you how to apply general principles to different people, in different situations.

Systems Allow For Real-World Outcomes

Many researchers stop at the theoretical level, without providing advice.

However, as a platform for male agency, we turn theories into strategies to help men achieve goals.
And the better the model, the better the strategies, including higher granularity and contextual adaptability.

Failures of The 3-Pillars Approach

The three pillars must balance each other out to prevent the distortions of their extremes when pursued in isolation.

The failure of the 3 pillars systems when unbalanced

The failures are:

- All science / empirical data, lacks real-world testing. Lacks an overarching theory. Can't offer any guidance on novel situations outside of the specific test conditions it relies on
- All experience, fails to systematize and replicate for others. Struggles to self-correct and improve as well
- All analysis, fails to ever test its theories, likely leads to heavy theorizing that doesn't produce results

Intersecting 2 pillars with each other improves the outcomes.
But still not ideal.

Let's see some examples of unbalanced pillars:

Little Data, Much Analysis: Freud

Freud was a high-powered, potentially dark-triad smart-alec

- Personal experience: high
- Science: lowish
- Analysis: very high
  - Critical thinking: low (no falsification, little scientific approach)

Freud's experience came from his practice, and on top of clinical samples being inherently biased, the data weren't quantified and systematized.
Freud focused more on theorizing, and didn't seem keen on falsifying his theories.

The results are telling: despite being a genius with groundbreaking insights, large swaths of his theories are now discredited.
Says Seligman in Authentic Happiness:

> The events of childhood are overrated (in Freudian psychoanalysis).
> It turned out to be difficult to find even small effects of childhood events on adult personality (…).
> This means that the promissory note that Freud wrote about childhood events determining the course of adult lives is worthless.
> Marting Seligman

This is a telling cautionary tale: the more you stray away from empirical evidence, the more you risk losing touch with reality and build "castles in the sky".

Self-refential theories worsen over time because they build upon themselves over increasingly poor foundations.
The data points are swapped for hypotheses until most hypotheses stand on no data at all.
The odds of mistaken theories and constructs increase exponentially.

Bad data points (poor bricks) and bad data analysis (poor construction) make for bad theories (poor buildings)

Freud's castles in the skies sounded coherent. But without grounding data, it was philosophy more than science.

Much Experience, Little Data & Analysis: Tucker Max

- Personal experience: very high
- Science: low
- Analysis: medium

- Critical thinking: low

Tucker Max was a 'frat boy' who slept around with an 'asshole style'.
Tucker has lots of first-hand experience, yet his experience is limited to:

- University
- Asshole style
- Fame-based dating

His experience is extensive in depth, but limited in breadth.
Tucker would be a poor teacher for most guys who are not interested in 'asshole game', who are not frat boys, and who are not famous.

Much Science & Analysis, Poor Critical Thinking: Homo Economicus

- Personal experience: low
- Science: very high
- Analysis: high
  - Critical thinking: very low

Early game theorists and economists developed theories and mathematical models around an ideal of full human rationality that barely exists in real life.

Says psychologist Richard Thaler, on the limitations of the "homo economicus" theories:

> As economists became more mathematically sophisticated, the people they described evolved as well.
> (…)
> Calculate the present value of social security benefits that will start 20 years from now? No problem!
> Stop by the tavern on payday and spend intended for food? Never!
> Thaler, "Misbehaving"

It shows:

1. Science can get out of touch with personal experience
2. Analysis can build upon itself if unchecked by critical thinking

Data and science had internal validity, but didn't accurately describe reality.
Proper critical thinking should have leveraged experience and said: "Wait a second, do the people I see every day around me act like perfect rational creatures? Actually, they don't… "

The Power Moves Approach

> Three-pillars, or nothing

The Power Moves is based on the 3 pillars of knowledge
Here at TPM we focus on topics where we have all 3 pillars in place.

Some exceptions apply because in some fields, not all 3 sources are available.
For example, there is limited scientific guidance on manipulation dynamics, or best career strategies. And I exited the corporate life soon-ish (albeit with successful upward mobility, some breadth of experience, and careful observation).
But TPM can sitll add value given that much mainstream advice lacks practicality or nuance.

Finally, interpersonal power dynamics as a discipline is not fully codified, and it's part of our work to contribute to this body of knowledge.

The Art of Negotiation (Chris Voss): Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 14 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Art of Negotiation is an online Masterclass course on negotiation principles and techniques in which Chris Voss, the teacher, makes the case that negotiation should be done using empathy coupled with a collaborative approach to the situation at hand.

Full Summary

About The Teacher: Christopher "Chris" Voss is an American businessman, author, and academic. Voss is a former FBI hostage negotiator, where he persuaded terrorists, bank robbers, and kidnappers to see things his way. Now, he's the CEO of The Black Swan Group Ltd, and co-author of the bestselling book Never Split the Difference.

All quotes from this point forward are quoted from Chris Voss's words.*

Negotiation Concept/Theories

1. Tactical Empathy (AKA: Emotional Intelligence)

"Empathy is becoming completely aware of the other side's perspective, their point of view, their take on things, how they see it, and what they feel. It's not agreement in any way. It's not compassion. It's not sympathy."

Tactical empathy is the act of taking what you know to be the case from understanding and empathizing with the other side (as a person) and applying it in the interaction.

2. Mirror(Ring)

"Mirroring. The hostage negotiator's mirroring. It's just the simple repetition of one to three words—one, two three-ish words. Typically, it's the last one to three words of what somebody said. But, when you get good at mirroring, you could pick one to three words from anywhere in the conversation."

This is basically the act of taking the last one to three words said by the other side and turning it into a question. Then, you ask that question with genuine curiosity and interest in what they mean. This process can be performed on literally any sentence.

> Lucio: "Allies empower, enemies disempower."
> You: "Enemies disempower?"

The following would be an example of mirroring one to three words from any part of their sentence when you get really good as Voss mentions.

> Your Friend: "Yo, do you think I could borrow a dollar for the vending machine?"
> You: "Borrow a dollar?"

3. Labeling

The act of verbally identifying or "giving a voice" to the other side's feelings.

4. Trust-Based Influence

"So, my labels are going to do several things simultaneously. They're going to build the relationship and they're going to help me gather information. And, since both of those things are happening, then my influence with you is going to increase…this is what I call trust-based influence."

"It's the lowest-maintenance, most durable type of influence there is."

Negotiation Principles/Strategies

This is a list of the strategies highlighted in "The Art of Negotiation":

1. Mirror to Gather Information

"[When you use mirroring] the other person feels listened to. It tends to connect their thoughts in their head. Part of the message it sends to the other person is 'I heard every word you said word for word and I'm proving it because I just repeated it back to you. But, it's not enough. I still don't get it.' And, when people go on with a further explanation, they're going to add more words. They're going to change their terms."

> Him: "Hey, can I borrow your notebook?"
> You: "Borrow my notebook?"
> Him: "Yea, your notebook. I want to check my work to make sure I did the homework right."
> You: "My notebook?"
> Him: "Dude. Yes. Your notebook. Or…actually, wait. You call it a binder, right?"
> You: "Oh, my binder. Yea, here you go."

Here, you used mirroring to gather more information on what exactly the other side was talking about. In this case, you cleared up the miscommunication of what they were referring to.

2. Mirror to Build Rapport

"Mirroring is also a rapport-building relationship process. People love to be mirrored. They love to be encouraged to go on. There's an old saying, 'Interesting people are interested.' If you mirror, you will be ridiculously interesting to other people because you're interested in them and [as a result] they're going to love talking to you."

When you're mirroring, show a genuine interest and curiosity in order to build rapport. "Genuine curiosity is a great trigger to get people to keep talking. And a mirror that finishes with a tone of voice of genuine curiosity is compelling. It's powerful. People are drawn to it. They want to say more."

"…you're genuinely curious about the other person, you're interested, you're looking forward to hearing what they have to say. You want to learn from them. You're positive about it. You're not judgemental. You're interested."

3. Mirror Confrontational People

Let's say someone is coming at you in a very confrontational manner in a business setting.

> Him: (verbally aggressive) Your price is too high!
> You: (pauses, looking into their eyes calmly) "Our price is too high?"
> Him: (confrontational) "Yeah! You know, we can't pay that. You know, we've got a limited budget here."
> You: (with calm and genuine interest) "You got a limited budget?"
> Him: (noticeably upset) Yeah. Well, you know, we've got other things that we have to worry about. There's a lot of things that we're trying to accomplish here."

"They're going to go on and on and they're going to elaborate and they're going to give me [you] context. And they're going to feel like I'm working with them. They're not going to feel me fighting."

"It takes two to fight. I'm going to change this wrestling match into a dance. And, if I refuse to engage in the wrestling, but I still want to engage, then that changes into a collaboration almost immediately."

4. Silence Is Golden

"The recipe for mirroring, first of all, is just, you know, the last one to three words of what someone just said. But, then the critical issue afterward is to shut up. You know, effective pause or dynamic silence…Let the other person think. Let your skill [the mirroring] sink into their head. Let it have its intended effect and go silent which also lets the person know that you really want to hear and you're going to shut up until they do [respond]."

5. Label It!

"The steps to labeling. The first step is you simply being aware of the emotion or the dynamic from the other side…Becoming aware of what your gut instinct is picking up is the first step. Then, the second step after that is to simply label it. That starts out with 'it seems like', 'it sounds like', 'it looks like', 'it feels like'. Those are the first few words of a label. And then, just fill in the blank."

Note: This is similar to the approach that you take when you're using the "framing buffet" frame control technique after being accused. Instead of saying "I" (which causes you to appear as though you're taking ownership of the issue), you keep the issue and negativity with them (the other side) by refraining from using the word "I" and, instead, choosing to label in response. So, instead of, "I would never do that man," you label by saying, "It seems like you take this sort of thing very seriously."*

6. Reinforce Positive Emotions

One way to reinforce positive emotions in the other side is by lowering their negative emotions. Labeling a negative (emotion) diffuses the negative.

In a lot of circumstances, you're probably going to have to label more than once in order to completely deactivate the negative. "A lack of response to a negative label is a good sign that you're on the right track. Just keep going. Label it some more."

An example of a negative label would be, "It seems like you really want this project to fail." Labeling that emotion calls it out into the open and calls it into question in their mind, which lowers that negative if it's what they're feeling. After using a negative label like that, getting silence from the other side is a good sign that you're on the right track and that you should keep labeling.

Note: This definitely doesn't sound like a one size fits all approach to negotiation or dealing with people in general. Depending on who you're talking to, if it's a hothead meathead that's already had a long day, you may be starting a fire with a negative label like this since it could be perceived as an arrogant (or at the very least annoying) accusation. However, I still like the idea and strategy of labeling, just not the risk that comes with certain labels that have the potential to incite confrontation such as this one.*

Another way of reinforcing a positive emotion (and the more direct way) is by labeling it as well. Labeling a positive (emotion) reinforces the positive.

> Voss: "You may be in conversation with a customer service person for an airline and they're short-tempered. They've been beaten up all day. And you didn't call them to congratulate them on doing a good job anyway. You don't call customer service to congratulate them on what a great job the airline's doing. They know that [you're calling about a problem and they're expecting you to be mad about it]…Now, here's the crazy part. Their impatience, their empathy, their perspective on this is that if you're lucky to be talking to them at all, they're actually being generous with their time [since they've been beaten up all day and are now short-tempered]! That's their bizarro worldview. Again, empathy is not the truth. It's not the reality. It's the other side's point of view. So, a great positive to reinforce here is to say to them…"It feels like you're being really generous with me right now."

7. Mirror and Label in Tandem

"After a great label, they may have given you a lot of information and there may be a part of that that you want to expand on. So, whatever their response is to the label, you can mirror one or two or three words out of that response and get a lot more information afterward."

Here's an example of how mirroring after a label might play out:

> Voss: (label) "It sounds like this deal is making you upset."
> You: "Well, it's not making me upset. What it really is is we got some real implementation problems here on the other side because we've had trouble with this in the past."
> Voss: (mirror) "Trouble in the past?"
> You: "Yeah, well, you know, it happened to us with another company. It was actually the vendor we had before you guys came in and they gave us a lot of problems. But, we're really worried that you guys are doing the same thing. We realize that you're different but, you know, we're not sure yet because we're still early in the relationship.
> Voss: (mirror) "Early in the relationship?"

After saying, "Early in the relationship?": "But any one of those selected mirrors is going to tease a lot of information out about exactly what I'm after."

Negotiation Quick Tips

Avoid competitive frames

"The stereotype about negotiation is that it's about being the biggest jerk in the room. That it's who's the loudest, who's the most aggressive, who takes the most at the other person's expense. The stereotype is that 'I win means you got to lose. And I beat you.' That is not the case. Great negotiation is about great collaboration."

Know Your (True) Enemy

"The adversary is not the person across the table. The adversary is the situation. The person across the table is a counterpart that's struggling with some aspect of the same problem that you are [facing / dealing with]. You work with them and solve that problem together and you're both better off."

In other words, the problem is not the person you're negotiating with. The problem is the situation. Once you solve the situation, you'll realize that the real problem goes away as well as the person across the table. This is because all that person was looking for is a solution to the same problem that you're having because you're both in the same situation together. Now, the best way to make that problem go away is to work with the person you're negotiating with instead of trying to solve the problem (situation) all by yourself, or worse, work against the person you're negotiating with.

As an example, Chris Voss couldn't go into hostage negotiations believing that the kidnapping terrorist was the problem. He had to believe that the hostage situation itself was the problem and work with the hostage-taker to achieve solving that problem (situation). To achieve getting the hostage-taker to do what he wants (let go of the victim), he couldn't try solving the situation all by himself, or worse, work against the hostage-taker or he'd risk failing. Similarly, you shouldn't do any negotiation in business or in life seeing the other person as the problem. The problem is the situation and you want to work with the other person to find a solution that works for everyone.

Negotiation for Goal-Achievement

"You should aim to achieve your goals through collaboration and the use of tactical empathy that creates trust-based influence."

This may be a slower way to achieve your goals since it takes time to understand the other side and empathize with them for more influence over them. However, this is the most sure-fire way to achieve getting what you want in any situation involving another individual.

Know their "rules" to know how to persuade them

"…the human nature rules that apply to all people…if you can really get at what's driving someone, you can change their outlook and you can change their decision-making. You have to understand what their rules are. I have to understand what your rules are and I have to respect those. I don't necessarily have to adopt those rules, but I've got to understand and respect what they are."

Let the other side have your way

"The common misconception about negotiation is that you have to 'make your case'. You have to make your argument. You need to come prepared with the reasons why the other side should make the deal—your value proposition if you will—and you need to lay all that out. That is not the case. You need to find out what's possible and you need to engage the other side in what their thoughts are so that they feel involved in the process and, consequently, they want the deal to happen [to give you your way]."

How NOT to Label

1. Avoid all use of the first-person pronoun "I". Doing this will communicate that you're more interested in your perspective than theirs.
2. Avoid the urge to explain a label or to add some follow up (or to talk at all, actually) after using a good label.

Good labels must have the chance to sink in for it to have its effect. If you explain or follow up after a label, you're stepping on it [the label you just used] and decreasing its persuasive power/ability to influence.

Bullet Summary

- There are human nature rules that apply to everyone regardless of if you're a terrorist or a businessman. You can leverage those rules using empathy to get the other side to give you what you want.
- "Great negotiation is about great collaboration." Ditch the competitive frames.
- To get what you want, focus less on making good, principled arguments, and focus more on building rapport. Trust-based influence is a more sure way to get what you want than making the case that your request is fair.

Negotiation Concept/Theory: Voice

Assertive (= "Analyst" Voice + Regular Speech Rate)

"This voice is declarative, straight up, and delivered like a punch in the nose." This voice is always counterproductive in negotiations.

Playful/accommodating

"This voice is a bearer of truths delivered gently. It promotes collaboration. This should be your go-to voice in negotiations."

Late-night FM DJ

"This voice is straightforward with a soothing, downward lilt."

In addition to the three tones of voice, master these two essential inflections:

Inquisitive → "Playful/Accommodating" Voice
Speak with an upward inflection, as if you're asking a question. This tone should convey genuine curiosity and interest in the other person's point of view. This should be your default inflection.

Declarative → "Analyst" Voice
Speak with a downward inflection, as if you're stating a fact. It's best employed when establishing points of negotiation that are immovable.

Negotiation Concept/Theory: Mirror Neurons

Mirror neurons are neurons in the brain that "mirror" (reflect) the behavior of another person. In other words, if your best friend opens up to you while you're talking with them and they begin to sob, cry, and seem depressed, you're likely to begin to feel your mood lower as well. This is due to them hitting your mirror neurons with their behavior causing you to respond involuntarily with the same (unhappy) behavior.

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Manipulate Their Mirror Neurons

"So, if you can see me or you can hear me, I can hit the mirror neurons in your brain. So, if I'm angry, I'm going to hit your mirror neurons [by behaving angrily such as yelling and shouting], you're going to get angry too. It's an involuntary response."

You can also speak using the late-night FM DJ voice which is soothing, deep, and slow to hit their mirror neurons which will slow their brain down as an involuntary response to your slow, calm voice. If you use this technique to calm down your counterpart, it's far more effective than trying to facilitate a change of mood from them by telling them to "just calm down". And, that's because "calm down" is an order, so they're going to hate that (especially if they're already upset). Instead, slow their brain down using the late-night FM DJ voice to calm them down.

By smiling when you talk to people, you are also triggering their mirror neurons in a positive way (since smiles are positive and value-adding).

For example, you can go for what most people might do:

> The Other Side: (with an angry, frustrated energy) No!
> You: (with an assertive tonality) Calm down please.
> The Other Side: (grows more angry)

Or:

> The Other Side: (with an angry, frustrated energy) No!
> You: (with a slow speech rate, deep voice, and soothing, empathetic tonality) You seem upset.
> The Other Side: (aggressive energy begins to fall)

Negotiation Concept/Theory: The 7/38/55 Rule

The three components of communication are the content, tonality (with which the content is delivered), and body language. When delivering a message, 100% of that message is divided into these three parts. 7% of that message is observed and considered by the other side in terms of content, 38% in terms of voice tonality, and 55% in terms of body language.

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Use the 7/38/55 Rule to Detect Lies

"One great way for getting a sense of whether or not somebody is being genuine ties back to the 7/38/55 rule. Does their delivery and their body language line up with the content of the words that's being spoken? If one of those is out of line, which one of those am I going to expect to be the most reliable? I'm going to look hard at body language and tone of voice when it's out of line with the words [content]. And, then I'm going to use a label to identify the dynamic. And, I could say something as clear as, I heard you say yes, but I also heard something in your tone of voice that made you hesitate."

Watch the Sidelines to Detect Lies

"In many cases, you're going to be negotiating in a group setting. They're going to have people on the other side of the table that are listening, that are dialed in, especially if they're concealing [information]. And, they know they're concealing. And, maybe they're concealing out of defensiveness. The people who are going to be ridiculously unguarded are going to be the people that you're not talking directly to…the people that are not being spoken to are going to be insanely honest in their physical reactions."

"The people that are off the point of focus are going to be ridiculously unguarded in their body language because they're not used to being paid attention to. They're used to having all eyes on the person that's being spoken to [the primary point of contact]. So, you're going to get some really honest, some really accurate body language off the [sidelined] people…".

So, for example, let's say you own a blog and you want to hire a content creation company to post content on your blog for you. This content creation company is owned by a father and his son, who are both in business together. But, the father does all of the talking since he has the majority of the business experience. When the father says the rate that he usually charges his clients, you notice that the body language of the son begins to shift where the son appears uncomfortable. It's a good thing you kept an eye on the sidelines…chances are the father isn't telling the whole truth here.

Identify Baselines and Spot Deviations to Detect Lies

"…for a negotiator, it's a lot more important to know when somebody is telling the truth than when they're lying because if you tell the truth, you have one way you tell the truth. You may have a bunch of different ways that you lie…and I'm trying to gain a feel for what your baseline is for telling the truth."

"It's the same way a polygraph works. You go on a polygraph, a good polygrapher is going to ask you the "control questions", the questions that are the truth. What day is it? Where are you? What's your name? What was your dog's first name? You know, any of the things that you tell the truth on. They're going to get a line on what you look like when you're telling the truth. And then, when you lie, it doesn't matter how you lie, it just matters that you've come out of it [possibly with displacement signals]…whatever you do, you didn't do it when you were telling the truth. That's an indicator that you've come out of your baseline. You're probably lying. You're at least thinking about lying."

When you see those displacement signals. When you see that they've come out of telling the truth and slipped into lying (or are thinking about lying), use tactical empathy to make them feel more comfortable.

Negotiation Concept/Theory: The Pinocchio Effect

"It's when someone uses more words than is necessary to give you an answer. If someone is lying to you, they know they're lying. And, they're worried about it. And, consequently, they're going to [feel the need] to work harder to convince you. So, the more effort that they go to convince you that they're telling the truth, the more likely it is that they're lying."

It's just as Lucio says:

> Lucio: "Another persuasion mistake: when you try too hard to convince people, people will always wonder why you are trying so hard. And they immediately think: maybe because they need lots of effort to hide the truth?"

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

How To Deal with A Lie (Like an FBI Hostage Negotiator)

"If I sense you've come out of truth-telling, I can say, 'Well, I heard you say you're OK with the deal but, seems like something's bothering you? Seems like there's something here I missed? Seems like there more here than meets the eye?' Each one of these labels are designed to have the maximum chance of success of bringing you out of the lie. They're not accusatory. The tone of voice is curious. The tone of voice is collaborative. The tone of voice is interested."

"What does it tell you about yourself if somebody is lying to you? Well, first, it tells you that they are scared to tell you the truth. They perceive you as potentially being a threat. Now, that doesn't mean that you are a threat…it tells you that their assessment of the situation is that they've got their guard up."

To deal with this, revert to the late-night FM DJ voice. As Voss recommends, "Use a voice that the other side finds reassuring, be predictable, be nonjudgmental. Be predictable in that you're not going to attack them. You're not going to try and corner them. You want to be steady. You want to be accountable…you continue to show them that you're worthy of being unguarded and they'll drop their guard."

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Ask "How" And "What" Questions

"[A] calibrated question is what we used to refer to as an open-ended question…And, we calibrate it to make the other side feel in charge. The secret to gaining the upper hand in a negotiation is giving the other side the illusion of control. And, we're going to calibrate our questions mostly with the words 'what' and 'how' because people love to be asked what to do. People love to be asked how to do something…They feel in charge. They feel in control. We've got to say it with deference."

"Instead of 'why do you need delivery in three weeks of the product'…change your 'why' to a 'what' and you say, 'what makes it necessary to get it delivered in three weeks?"

In business today, we're often told to find the other side's "why"—to discover their motivations, pain points, goals, and fears. But, when we search for their why by asking them questions using the word "why", it interferes with the relationship and rapport because the word "why" is accusatory. The word "why" creates defensiveness.

Ask Questions To Force Empathy

"Forced empathy is when you force the other side to have empathy with you, and the idea behind empathy–we're trying to trigger reciprocity. We're looking to demonstrate empathy because it's good for us, but we want empathy in return. And, reciprocity may not always kick in. So, we may have to say something at some point in time that forces the other side to take a hard look at our situation before they move forward. And, our classic phrase to force empathy into a situation is simply to say to somebody, 'How am I supposed to do that?"

For example, there was a woman who had done a tremendous amount of work for a company. The company kept promising her follow-on business as a result of it and she was afraid of being denied the follow-on business. So, they owed her a lot of money and they weren't paying, yet they kept sending her more and more work.

One day, when they called her and asked for more work, she said:

> Her: "How am I supposed to do that?"
> Them: "You're right. You can't. I know we haven't been paying you. We've actually had some real internal problems and the person that's responsible for paying you has changed. I will get in touch with that person. They'll reach out to you and we'll settle up the bill before we move forward on anything else."

Use Calibrated Questions To Shape Thinking

"The question, 'How am I supposed to do that?' is designed to shape the other side's thinking. Shape it around empathy, shape it around thinking about us, trigger slow, in-depth thinking. And, in many cases, you probably want to combine your 'how' and 'what' questions to basically ask up to three questions. They're just worded differently. And, it might be, 'How am I supposed to do that? What's going to happen if I do that? How do I overcome the challenges that I have here?' Those are all basically asking exactly the same question in a different fashion. If you ask that question three different ways, then a person you're talking to will think about it from three different angles, and they'll give it more thought, and they'll give you a better answer."

Avoid Triggering Reciprocity

Right now, this is one of my favorites since it ties into the fundamental concepts of the law of social exchange and social capital, but through the lens of one of the world's top FBI hostage negotiators.

"Reciprocity [the law of social exchange] is a natural human dynamic that exists in us because we're humans and some people are very guarded about it. So, we have to be careful about how we trigger it. If we ask, we tend to owe. People are often worried about asking us because they don't want to owe. So, it's a common dynamic that people are more or less sensitive to at all times."

In other words, when you ask for something, and the other side gives you what you asked for, they gain social credit for that deed and their social capital goes up. Using their increased social capital, they can ask for something back from you and, of course, you'll feel more obligated to give them what they're now asking for (since it's in exchange for what they've just given you).

So, if you don't want to have to give anything but you still want to receive, you have to be careful about how you ask for things, especially in a negotiation where the stage is already set to be transactional.

"In a hostage negotiation, instead of saying, 'I want proof of life,' which would trigger reciprocity [increase his social capital if he provides that value], he says, 'How do I know she's alright?' And, the kidnapper spontaneously does what he wants [he puts the girl on the phone, providing proof of life] because he did it on his own and feels like it was his idea."

In other words, "value" is anything that makes or has the potential to make you better off. That means that for that value to actually be valuable to you, it has to solve or have the potential to solve some problem in your life. In this hostage negotiation, the negotiator had the opportunity to say, "I want proof of life." But, that would signal to the kidnapper that proof of life is something that the negotiator would find valuable and would solve a problem for him (after all, if it didn't, why would he want it?).

So, if the kidnapper would've provided proof of life after the negotiator had already directly asked for it, the kidnapper would then be in a position of higher social capital. In other words, he can take the position of, "I've given you something. Now, I want something in return," which can be a dangerous position for any negotiator to be in, especially when negotiating with a kidnapper.

So, instead of framing his request as an ask, he frames it as a legitimate question. "How do I know she's alright (alive)?" By phrasing your request that way, the problem that you wanted to solve with value from the other side suddenly becomes their problem. That's because it's up to them to answer that question since it's legitimate and, possibly, prove to you that their answer is the truth. Then, when they provide you with that value (an answer along with proof they're telling the truth), you don't owe them anything because you didn't technically ask them for anything. It was their choice to prove to you that they were telling the truth when they answered your legitimate question.

Ask Legitimate Questions

"You're not looking for proof of life, but you're really looking for legitimacy. Proof that you're in a good faith as opposed to a bad faith negotiation. And, what are the natural [legitimate] questions? 'How are we going to move forward if we make this deal? How do I know that you're not just looking for free consulting? How have you worked with people like me in the past? How have you made this deal in the past?"

"You can ask them at the table because they're legitimate questions. That's why we never had a problem with any terrorist, any sociopath, any kidnapper anywhere in the world when we said, 'How do we know our hostage is alive?' They had to admit to themselves, it's a legitimate question."

Negotiation Concept/Theory: The Accusations Audit

An accusations audit is: "…a comprehensive list of all the negative assumptions, thoughts, and feelings you think the other side may be harboring against you." Voss calls these negative factors, "the elephant in the room".

"Your goal is to list all the possible negative emotions and get out ahead of them. You want the other side to come back and say, "Hold on, you're being too hard on yourself." And, that's because those negative feelings, thoughts, and assumptions the other side might be harboring against you is the elephant in the room. And, as Voss says himself, "The elephant in the room doesn't go away by pretending it's not there. The elephant in the room doesn't go away by you saying, 'There's not an elephant in the room.' The elephant in the room is diminished and eventually goes away by you saying, 'Hey, there's an elephant in the room.' And, then people go, 'Yeah. That's not that bad."

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Frame the Accusations Audit by Relationship Longevity

"So, you can frame the accusations audit a couple of different ways. If you've been in the relationship for a while, just the straight label. 'It seems like you're not getting all the information out of us that you want. It probably feels like we're wasting your time. It feels like, that we're not being honest with you…".

"At the very beginning [of the relationship], you can be a little more speculative, a little more tentative with it, a little more just recognizing what might probably happened. So, at the beginning, you might say, 'You're probably going to ask yourself why you're taking this meeting. It probably feels like, that I might seem like everybody else that's in this line of work and that there's no difference between me and anybody else. You may even think like, that the people on your side of the table are going to think you're getting pushed around.' You can be more speculative in those observations because you're converting to the other side that you're being attentive, and you're being speculative, but you're being careful about it the entire time, and they're going to appreciate your approach. This gets back to being a straight shooter."

Get Ahead of the Negatives

You can negotiate for what you want by getting ahead of the negatives. And, you can get ahead of the negatives by anchoring the other side's expectations of the magnitude of the negative significantly higher than the negative's size actually is.

> Voss: (calling from his hotel room) I need a late checkout.

> Hotel Clerk: No, we can't give it to you. You've got to check out at 11 AM…
> Voss: (accusations audit) I'm getting ready to make your day ridiculously difficult.
> (Hotel Clerk begins to worry and imagine the worst possible thing Voss could have done to their hotel room)
> (Voss continues to stay silent, letting worries marinate while waiting to be given permission to go on)
> Hotel Clerk: (worriedly gives permission to go on) What is it?
> Voss: I need a late checkout.
> Hotel Clerk: (relieved) Oh, my God. Okay, sure. What do you need? 2:00, 3:00, 4:00? What do you need?

Negotiation Quick Tips:

Be Exhaustive and Fearless

"How exhaustive should you be in your list of accusations that you're compiling? I'm here to tell you if you don't feel like you're laying it on thick, you're not laying it on thick enough…And, a great way to test that is, as you're laying out your accusations audits, read the other side's reaction all along the way. If you've got a list of 15 things and you've gone through the first three, and they say, 'Oh, you're being too hard on yourself,' you know you've done your job…because when somebody says that, they have stepped to your side of the table. You have forced empathy into the situation and that's exactly what your objective is."

Acknowledge the Danger of "Yes"

"Yeah, 'yes' is horrible…". There are three kinds of 'yes's: confirmation, commitment, and counterfeit.

Confirmation

"My confirmation 'yes' is if you've asked me a simple question where you're trying to simply confirm that something is true. My confirmation 'yes' is going to be pretty concise…the more concise and the more curt my tone of voice is, the more likely it is that it's a legitimate confirmation 'yes'." Examples include a short "yeah", "sure", or "OK".

Commitment

"But, a commitment 'yes' is an agreement. It's 'I agree. I'll go along with it. I will do this. I have agreed that I will do this.' That I'm good with what we're talking about and that I am in agreement with it. And, commitment 'yes' is going to be fairly curt and concise as well. But, it's really going to be driven by the context and what I've said leading up to that and how our conversation has gone."

Counterfeit

"The counterfeit 'yes' is the 'yes' I'm going to give you when I'm starting to feel trapped by your questions. I don't trust you, I want to find out how soon this is going to be over. [But] Maybe I want to know more. So, I'm going to give you the counterfeit 'yes' because I've already decided that I don't trust you and it's OK because I feel like you're trying to trap me."

"The counterfeit 'yes' it's typically not terribly succinct. It's not short." A counterfeit yes is typically exaggerated and drawn out, such as saying, "Suuuurre." That's because most of the time, a real "yes" is actually a "maybe" or a "no"/rejection in waiting (waiting to be persuaded into a "yes").

Value the Power of "No"

"A 'no' is so much more valuable than a 'yes'…People feel safe and protected when they say 'no'. This is another one of these human nature laws of gravity…instead of saying, 'Do you agree with this?' I'll say, 'Do you disagree?' Instead of saying, 'Is this a good idea?' I'll say, 'Is it a ridiculous idea?"

"When you say 'no', you feel safe and protected. You feel like you've made no commitment at all. So, you're going to give me a lot more information…[after the 'no'] the additional information is what's more important. 'How is this going to be implemented? What's this going to look like? What haven't we thought of?"

"If I said to you, 'Does this look like something that would work for you? 'If you say 'yes' to that, but you want to give me additional information, you're going to feel like every additional piece of information commits you before you're ready to commit…you feel like everything that comes out of your mouth reduces your autonomy."

This is because frames are the rule system of relationships. When you say "yes" to a frame, you are agreeing to and buying into that frame which sets you up to have to play by the rules set by that frame. And, that commitment to the frame you agreed to by saying "yes" reduces your freedom.

"But, if you say 'no', having said 'no', you feel there's no commitment afterward. You can share a lot of information with me. You won't have second thoughts. You won't have commitment fears. And, the information you share with me is going to be very accurate…you're much more likely to lay out what the issues really are because you're going to feel like you can share them with no commitment whatsoever."

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

The "No"-Oriented Question

About two years ago, Chris Voss was introduced to Robert Herjavec (you may recognize him from "Shark Tank").

Through this introduction, Herjavec invites Voss to lunch. Voss says it was his favorite kind of lunch at a steakhouse and that Herjavec paid (WIIFT win!)

So, Voss is spending 90 minutes with Herjavec at lunch which all started off as an email introduction. Herjavec is building out a sales team and is wondering if Voss's company that teaches negotiation, The Black Swan Group, teaches an approach that is good for his salespeople.

Voss's company happens to have a negotiation training session coming up in New York, so Voss offers Herjavec a free ticket. Herjavec's response is, "How many can I buy?"

So, what ensues is Voss's company and Herjavec's company going back and forth on how many tickets Herjavec is going to buy and Voss's team isn't getting a clear commitment out of Herjavec as to how many people he's going to send to this training session.

Voss's team calls Voss on the phone and says, "We're getting ready to sell out. And, if Herjavec and his people don't buy now they're not getting any. They're not even getting their free ticket." (Voss says this is because: "…the tickets to our events are expensive and my team is mad at me for giving away anything for free. They don't care who it is, even if it's a famous guy from TV.")

So, at 5:03 PM on a Monday, realizing he's going to sell out by tomorrow and Herjavec needs to buy now, Voss sends Herjavec a two-line email.

> Voss's Email:
> "Are you against committing to three tickets now?
> Is it a ridiculous idea for you to pay for the tickets before the business day starts in New York tomorrow?"

And, at 5:04 PM on this Monday, Voss gets an email back from Herjavec saying:

> Herjavec's Reply:

> "No, we'll make the commitment for three tickets now.
> No, we got no problem paying for them right now. My assistant will be in touch with you within the hour.
> Send her a link and we'll pay."

Voss sent the link and they made the payment by 5:23 PM that same day.

Move From "No" to "How"

"What you're really trying to get is an authentic commitment. And, even with that [authentic commitment], 'yes' is nothing without 'how'."

In other words, even if you get a genuine, honest, truthful "yes" confirmation from the other side, it means nothing if you don't know how you want to proceed with the other side.

"So, how do we transition into 'how'? Remember, the key to negotiation is always using deference…So, it's with a [humbly submissive and respectful] tone of voice. And, if they haven't given you a way to proceed, then your first question is, 'How should we proceed? What are the next steps? How would you like to proceed?' Use 'how' or 'what' to begin to pave your way into how you're going to proceed…then, think in advance a little bit because there are always going to be implementation problems. So, in some anticipation of that, you want to ask some 'how' and 'what' questions to deal with implementation problems in advance…Put [on] the safety valves of 'How do we know if we're on track?' and 'How are we going to deal with it if we're off track?' and you'll take care of your implementation.

Negotiation Concept/Theory: Bending Their Reality

"I refer to losing something—loss aversion—as 'bending reality'. Fear of loss and what people lost completely distorts their perception so much that it effectively bends their reality. You have to take that into account, and you have to find out how they feel they are losing because that's going to be the single dominating factor in their decision-making. What are they going to lose if they don't make the deal?"

This is also referred to by John B. Ullmen as pain/gain framing. For example, let's say that you're a company that can make another company 23% more money. You can say:

> You: "Work with us and you'll make 23% more money. There will be a 23% gain. The return on your investment will be 23%."

Or, you can say:

> You: "Choose not to work with us, stay where you are, don't change anything, and it's going to cost you 23% every day. While you sleep, not working with us is going to cost you 23% day in and day out."

"Fear of loss is what keeps people up at night. Nobody loses sleep—nobody gets insomnia because life is good and they're making money and tomorrow is going to be more profitable than today was. They sleep like a baby over gains. Fear of loss is what keeps people up at night…and that's why it's on of the dominating factors in human decision-making."

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Appeal to Their Sense of Fairness

Voss refers to the word "fairness" as the "F" word or the "F-bomb".

"…people will destroy deals if they feel they've been treated unfairly. Intentionally destroy deals and walk away with nothing. On the other hand, people are much more likely to make a deal if they feel the process was fair, and they might take a bad deal or a less than optimal deal if they feel they were treated fairly. So, fairness is really the issue that makes or breaks deals."

Responding to the F-Bomb

Once again, Voss refers to the "F-bomb" as the word "fairness".

"Here's the way the counterpart will try to use 'fair' to their own advantage. Let's say, 'I've given you a fair offer.' Or, they might say, 'I just want what's fair'. In either instance, they've accused you of being unfair in a very subtle way. If you don't take that deal or if you don't make the deal that they want, you are being unfair. Your fairness as a human being has been called into question. It's a great way to manipulate you short-term and you will react because you don't want to be unfair. So, it's going to have an effect on you [especially] if you don't see it coming."

So, when the other side uses that tactic on you, you respond by saying:

> You: "I'm happy to be shown how I've been unfair. Show me the information. I'm open to learning. Let me see what it is."

"They are either not going to have it or they know they don't have it."

"So, how do you use the F-bomb positively? How do I [Chris Voss] use it?"

Voss recommends that at the beginning of a negotiation, you say to the other side:

> You: "It's my intention to treat you fairly. If at any point in time I've been unfair, let me know. We'll go back and address it and fix it."

Negotiation Concept/Theory: Deadlines Are Meaningless

"Somebody setting a deadline is an attempt to kick some progress into gear. And, if it's a real deadline, there's probably less time than they actually gave you anyway. But, deadlines are designed to get progress started. Every once in a while, in extreme circumstances, a deadline is a hard deadline. Very rarely…the rest of the time it wasn't real. It was something put into the situation by one side in order to kick some progress into gear. And, if people are making substantive progress on what they're trying to accomplish, deadlines go away. So, any time a deadline comes up, shift your thought from the deadline to, 'How do we make progress to work together towards a goal.' And, the vast majority of times, the deadline will go away."

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Responding to Deadlines

"Two of the techniques that we've covered already are great ways to respond to deadlines."

Respond Using Labels

The first way is labeling.

Ex:

> You: "It seems like you're under a lot of pressure here, it seems like you're trying to get things done by a certain time. It seems like this is an involved process. It seems like the world's going to end if we don't meet that deadline?"

"You know, that's either an accurate label or a mislabel, but you're going to cause the kind of thinking that you need from the other side. And, also, it makes them think about how hard they feel the deadline really is anyway."

Respond Using Calibrated Questions

"The other way to respond to deadlines is with calibrated questions, 'what' and 'how' questions."

> You: "What happens if we don't get this done in time? How do we get back on track if we fall behind schedule? How do we pull victory from the ashes of defeat if we don't meet the deadline?"

Negotiation Quick Tips:

Leave A Lasting Impression

"When you're feeling attacked, the things that you really want to say…are probably wrong [negative and value-taking]. You know, we're giving in to an aspect of our natural human nature that wants to get back…that wants to feel like we've gotten the last word in. When the last word is a cheap shot…the last impression is a lasting impression. The last impression seeds the next interaction. When you begin to talk about it like that—that it seeds the next interaction—you begin to realize how you can really get the upper hand by making the last words positive."

So, to leave a great last impression that establishes you as someone they would want to collaborate with in the future, take what you would say at the beginning of a negotiation in order to open it positively and simply put it at the end.

Ex:

> How You Would Open A Negotiation Positively:
> You: "Look, you know, we're here because we want to make a deal. We're here because long-term relationships matter to us. We're here because we want our partners to be profitable."

> How You Would Use That As A Positive Lasting Impression:
> You: "You know, we're–we're here because we'd love to have a great long-term relationship. We'd love for our partners to prosper from doing business with us. Let us know how we can proceed. How do you want to proceed?"

"…make the last point you made to be inarguably positive and collaborative, and the last impression will be the lasting impression, and it'll see the next interaction in a very positive way."

Negotiation Concept/Theory: The Ackerman System (Bargaining)

"The Ackerman System is a bargaining model…basically, you have a target price that you want to come to. Once you've picked out your target price, you're going to come in at 65% of that price. You're going to plan on making three raises to get to the price that you wanted. And, the first raise is going to be 20% raise, the next raise is going to be 10%, the last raise is going to be 5%. Each one of your raises are decreasing increments by half. And then, when you get to the very last number, you make sure you throw out an odd number and you also throw in some non-monetary object that you know the other side doesn't want, but it makes them feel like they've really tapped you out. They've taken every last dime. You know, they've fought you tooth and nail. They've felt the decreases in increments. They still feel like they're winning. You come in with the last number. It's an odd number. It seems like that you scratched for every penny. And, consequently, they worked so hard to get you there [invested so much social effort], that they want to cut the deal. They're not going to renege."

So, it goes:

Your Set Target Price (How Much You Want to Pay)

1. 65%

2. + 20%

3. +10%

4. +5%

5. Odd Number (+ Non-Monetary Object)

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Use The Ackerman System (Bargaining)

Here's an example of this negotiation strategy in action. Let's say that Voss is trying to buy a coffee table for $100. And, that's what he wants to pay. The seller is asking for between $150 and $250.

1. First, Voss finalizes his decision on how much he wants to pay for this coffee table. He decides he is willing to pay $100. This will be his set target price since that's now the price he is aiming for.

2. Next, Voss calculates his initial price.

Initial Price = 65% x 100 = $65

3. Before throwing out his initial price to the seller, Voss anchors the expectations of the seller very low as far as what he thinks his initial price will be. (Voss calls this "emotional anchoring").

> Voss: "Look, you know, I got a price. I'll give you the price, but you're not going to like it. I mean, it's going to be low. It's really going to be low. And, I got a feeling that when I give you this price, it's going to make you really angry, and the last thing I want to do is offend you. So, I'm scared to give you the price."

"…you're getting their permission…They're going to imagine something [a price] that's worse than what you would ever throw out."

4. The seller gives Voss permission to give him the price.

5. Voss continues his emotional anchoring.

> Voss: "No, it's going to make you angry. You know, I'm scared. And, I'm afraid to give you this number."

According to Voss, by this point, they'll "almost beg you to give them the number".

6. Voss, very apologetically, says to the seller, "$65.00".

"They're not going to be happy with that price, but they asked you for it."

"They're not going to get angry because you told them they were going to get angry and that diffused it."

And, you were deferential the whole time so they feel powerful. They feel bad for you.

7. The seller says, "You know, that's not what I had in mind. You gotta do better than that. I mean, that's ridiculous."

8. In response, Voss uses tactical empathy and gives the seller an apology.

> Voss: "I'm so sorry. You know, it's horrible. I can see that I've offended you. And, you're asking a reasosnable > price and I'm being ridiculous."

9. Voss continues to hit the seller with different versions of empathy while gauging his reaction.

10. Voss does NOT budge off of his number until the seller budges off of his.

11. The seller comes off his number.

It doesn't matter what number they were willing to adjust their price to. What matters here is that they were willing to adjust it all.

12. Voss shows gratitude by telling the seller he appreciates it, that he's generous, and congratulating him.

"Whatever amount of money they come off of their number, then you've got to be grateful…You've got to enhance the positive emotions. You know, they feel like they've given in. You don't want them to regret giving in."

13. Voss moves from $65 to his next number: $85.

65% + 20% = 85%

85% x 100 = $85

"They're going to feel like that's still not where they want to be, but they're going to feel a sense of accomplishment that you've come from $65 to $85."

14. Voss continues to make the seller feel like he's really squeezing him for every penny.

> Voss: "I'd like to give you another number. I mean, I've worked really hard for this. It's been difficult for me to get to this. You know, as a matter of fact, I gotta go back and check my finances before I get this numner. I gotta check with the people. I'm not sure I can cover this."

They're still disappointed (remember, this coffee table costs between $150 and $250), but now they feel hungry because they're making progress. And, as Voss says, "As long as people are making progress, it enhances their ability to stay in the deal."

15. Voss moves from $85 to his next number: $95.

95% x 100 = $95

"Now, they're going to feel a sense of accomplishment. But, they're going to know that that last move that you made was smaller than the first one. Always increase by decreasing segments [e.g. +20%, +10%]. Always. You've got to manage the raises."

16. Voss cycles his way back through the whole "dramatic" scenario again. He begins applying more empathy, recognizing that they were generous and voices that he recognizes that he's probably making them angry.

17. Finally, Voss moves from $95 to his final number—the number he's actually willing to give based on his set target price of $100. (This final number must be an odd number.) Voss comes in at $97.43.

He "sells" it dramatically. He asks the other side for a pen and paper and starts jotting down numbers.

"Make a show that you're working really hard. You're tapping the resources where they're going to feel like they worked really hard for it. They're going to feel like they've tapped into your last dime."

18. The seller makes one last move to try and get Voss off of his final number.

19. Voss offers a non-monetary object: his jacket.

> Voss: "Ah, you know, ah…You know, I got a really nice jacket. Would you like my jacket?"

"…you're playing into the human nature aspects here which is a bit of a drama play. I realize [that], but these are people with emotions on the other side. Even sociopaths have emotions. So, whoever's on the other side, you need to make them feel a sense of accomplishment, that this was a victory [for them]. A hard-won victory. They got you there every step of the way…And, if they're going to make the deal, they'll make it because they worked so hard for it."

Pivot to Non-Monetary Terms (Bargaining)

"A lot of people are told, 'Go first and go high.' I think that's a bad idea because it's forgoing the opportunity to gather information first…So, if you go first, I get information on you. You haven't gotten any information on me. If somebody is really pushing you to go first, it's also an opportunity to pivot the terms."

When asked to give the price first, Voss recommends you say:

> Voss: "Alright, so, I'll be happy to give you a number. Let's set that aside for a few minutes and let's talk about what it's going to take to make a great deal. I mean, what looks like a great deal to you? What else do you have to have in order to make any price that I give you a good price?"

Note: This is similar to Barry Nalebuff's technique: Expand the Pie As A First Resort.*

"It's always good to prepare some things beforehand so that you're not caught off guard in the moment trying to think of what those things might be."

Voss also recommends that when making this list you view it as a "brainstorming list" to trigger some thoughts from the other side. That's because by engaging in collaborative brainstorming you can come up with ideas that will maintain a good deal when the other side throws in things that you didn't know they have (which happens in nearly every negotiation according to Voss).

And, setting the price aside to focus on the terms is a great move because, "The price will break the deal, but the deal is made on the terms."

Provide a Range (Bargaining)

"Well, setting a range is a great way to not exactly name a price first also. You can do a range of what's going on in the market. You can do a range of what you might be willing to pay."

"Understand that whenever you throw out a range, the other side is going to settle on the one that most favors them. They're not going to compromise and meet you in the middle of that range…You'd better be willing to accept that. If you come off of that, then they're going to be able to accuse you of bad faith bargaining for good reason because you gave [them] the impression [that] if you threw that number, that you'd take it."

Negotiate Price With Terms

Note: This is also similar to Barry Nalebuff's technique: Expand the Pie As A First Resort.*

"A [price] range is going to be dictated by two things: what's going on in the market and what you can pay. What you can pay may not line up with what's going on in the market. And, there's always a possibility that other terms still might make your number work. And, that's why the brainstorming with your counterpart is extremely important because there may be something really valuable that you could do [for them] that's not reflected in the market."

Anchor Emotions, Not Dollars

"An anchor is a price that you throw out that's quite some distance from where you expect to land…gives me a lot of room to manoeuver. Makes you feel like you won when you get me to my actual price."

Voss says that a lot of people will tell you to anchor extreme because they'll say that that will give you better deals. But, what that's really going to do is make a lot of deals go away because "the terms make the deal".

"I'm more concerned with the emotional anchor, the emotional reaction to my price. Negative reactions leave a toxic residue that, by and large long-term, are bad for relationships."

Voss says you want them to actually be relieved when you give them your number. So, you can say:

> Voss: "Look, my number is high. Don't expect anything other than that to be high. It's going to be higher than you expect, probably more than you plan to pay, maybe more than you have."

"Now, by the time I drop that number, you're not going to overreact to the number. It may still be more than you plan to pay, but you're not going to be mad about it."

Negotiation Concept/Theory: The Black Swan Concept

"The black swan is [the] something that nobody expected would happen, but in hindsight, changed everything as soon as it was revealed."

"So, this is what great negotiation is about. Discovering the black swan. Discovering the piece of information that nobody expected that would change all the outcomes."

Black Swans In Business

"If you're negotiating a for a salary, you might not know that behind the scenes of the company, that the person that you're going to work for is going to leave in a year. You don't know what opportunities are coming in conjunction with that job that the company's already forecasted and budgeted out. You don't know who's planning on moving on. You don't know all the things that are going on behind the scenes. All you know is they've offered you this job within these parameters. But, they already know, have a very good idea of the dynamics that they hope to change in the company over the next year. Finding out those dynamics behind the scenes could either make it a wonderful place for you to work or a horrible place. And, it has nothing to do with the job description at the moment. The things that they know that you don't know are the black swans."

There's also a chance that you have value (possibly in the form of a valuable sill set) that fills a specific strategic need in their company that they don't know you have yet. If you are in talks with them about a salary increase and they don't know that this value is something you bring to the table, that's an example of a black swan that you bring to the negotiation.

Negotiation Principles/Strategies:

Find the Black Swans

"So, the idea is to start the communication and for me to start getting the information flowing from you so that I can find out what those black swans are and I can change the outcome."

Negotiation Quick Tips:

Open Yourself to the Unknown

"Since I don't know what you're hiding and you don't know what I'm hiding, there's stuff in that overlap that we really don't know is there at all…The real black swans are where the unknowns overlap, and there's some crazy stuff in there. You can't tell yourself, 'Ah, I understand the situation, I understand all about it.' You can't tell yourself that. That's to close your mind in advance. And, there isn't anybody anywhere that says a closed mind is an advantage. So, open your mind and be curious. Be interested. Wonder about it. Don't be afraid of being surprised. Actually, hope to provoke surprises…because it's not possible to know everything [about the negotiation]."

Negotiating for a Raise

1. Step One: Prepare To Get Ahead of Your Employer's Negatives (The Accusations Audit)

Make a comprehensive list of all the negative assumptions, thoughts, and feelings you think the other side (your employer) may be harboring against you. This will be your accusations audit.

Later, you'll use the accusations audit negotiation technique to get ahead of these negatives.

2. Step Two: Walk Into Your Boss's Office

3. Step Three: Gather Information

"[As an employer] how much do you know about my ability to pay you? [When you're just starting out] you presume it's there. But you don't know. And, you don't know how to make yourself more valuable [so you can justify more money]. So, how do you do that in a job negotiation? You got to come in, first of all, and find out, 'Am I living up to expectations? How have I done? How do I negotiate my success [in the company] for the future?' Then, you start talking about what that success is worth [to them]. But, terms make the deal in any negotiation. Especially in a job."

4. Step Four: Disarm Their Negative Emotions (The Accusations Audit)

A lot of employers might see employees as being selfish. So, disarm that by treating it like it's the elephant in the room and addressing it.

> You: "Look, I don't want you to think I'm selfish. I'm gonna have a conversation with you where I'm gonna seem very selfish."

Here might also be where you want to throw out any other negatives you feel your employer may be harboring against you.

And, a quick reminder on the extensiveness of your accusations audit: "How exhaustive should you be in your list of accusations that you're compiling? I'm here to tell you if you don't feel like you're laying it on thick, you're not laying it on thick enough…And, a great way to test that is, as you're laying out your accusations audits, read the other side's reaction all along the way. If you've got a list of 15 things and you've gone through the first three, and they say, 'Oh, you're being too hard on yourself,' you know you've done your job…because when somebody [your employer] says that, they have stepped to your side of the table. You have forced empathy into the situation and that's exactly what your objective is."

5. Step Five: Start Negotiating For What You Want

Use the labeling, mirroring, and other negotiation techniques to reach your desired outcome.

6. Step Six: Find the Black Swans in Business

"If you're negotiating a for a salary, you might not know that behind the scenes of the company, that the person that you're going to work for is going to leave in a year. You don't know what opportunities are coming in conjunction with that job that the company's already forecasted and budgeted out. You don't know who's planning on moving on. You don't know all the things that are going on behind the scenes. All you know is they've offered you this job within these parameters. But, they already know, have a very good idea of the dynamics that they hope to change in the company over the next year. Finding out those dynamics behind the scenes could either make it a wonderful place for you to work or a horrible place. And, it has nothing to do with the job description at the moment. The things that they know that you don't know are the black swans."

There's also a chance that you have value (possibly in the form of a valuable sill set) that fills a specific strategic need in their company that they don't know you have yet. If you are in talks with them about a salary increase and they don't know that this value is something you bring to the table, that's an example of a black swan that you bring to the negotiation.

"So, the idea is to start the communication and for me to start getting the information flowing from you so that I can find out what those black swans are and I can change the outcome."

7. Step Seven: Move For The Close (Move From "No" To How)

Once again, "What you're really trying to get is an authentic commitment. And, even with that [authentic commitment], 'yes' is nothing without 'how'."

So, once you've reached a point in the negotiation where the deal is more of a win-win, you need to seal the deal. And, if they haven't given you a way to proceed finalize the deal), you can ask:

> You: "How should we proceed? What are the next steps? How would you like to proceed?"

"Use 'how' or 'what' to begin to pave your way into how you're going to proceed."

8. Step Eight: Anticipate Implementation Problems In Advance (Move From "No" To How)

"[Once you've finalized the deal]…think in advance a little bit because there are always going to be implementation problems. So, in some anticipation of that, you want to ask some 'how' and 'what' questions to deal with implementation problems in advance.

> You: "How do we know if we're on track? How are we going to deal with it if we're off track?"

9. Step Nine: Leave A Lasting Impression

To leave a great last impression that establishes you as someone they would want to collaborate with (give another raise) in the future, take what you would say at the beginning of a negotiation in order to open it positively and simply put it at the end.

> You: "You know, I'm–I'm here because I'd love to have a great long-term relationship. I'd love for you to prosper from working with me. Let me know how we can proceed. How do you want to proceed?"

Real-Life Applications

If I had to remind you of one principle, it would be this:

1. Labeling and Mirroring for Building Emotional Intelligence

Using labeling and mirroring in tandem is a great exercise for learning more about the receiver as well as a personal challenge to empathize more with that person. What else can you tell about them that you can label? The more great labels you can come up with, the more you're empathizing with the receiver, and the more your emotional intelligence develops.

Any time you run out of labels in your head, you can just mirror their last couple of words to draw out more information that will help you find another good label. A wonderful exercise to develop your emotional intelligence and, as we know, emotional intelligence is an important trait to become a high-quality man :).

CONS

- All video

The fact that this course is all video means rewinding multiple times to fully internalize Voss's teachings and having to guess at what time stamp in each lesson he gives a certain piece of information if I only want to review one of the points he makes. That's time that could be put towards more learning and practicing.

- Mislabeling of some techniques

The Masterclass team made a few mistakes in terms of accidentally labeling techniques in the mock negotiations wrong and defining certain definitions in the workbook incorrectly. Yet, this made the lessons more fun as I challenged myself to think critically, second-guessing what Masterclass said each technique was and seeing if I could spot the correct ones on my own.

- Overly submissive at times

Voss's negotiation style relies on being deferential so the other side feels like they have all of the decision-making power in the negotiation. This way, they don't even realize they're being subtly persuaded to give you your deal. But, this can have its cons with anyone who can see through this game or anyone who gets the impression you're not worth collaborating with because you seem too powerless.

PROS

- The Principles Are the Real Deal

Voss's approach to negotiation in terms of mindsets makes the course twice as valuable on its own. In nearly every situation, collaboration is superior to competition and Voss emphasizes that in a way that helps the student feel like collaboration is worth the possible added social and mental effort.

- Live Example Training Exercises

There are included video lessons that contain full breakdowns of how to negotiate your salary using these techniques, how to negotiate with a kidnapper, how to negotiate with your teenager as a parent, and so much more. This got me excited to try out his teachings in the field myself.

- Genuine Analytical Content

This course may be all video, but it uses that as an advantage when showing Chris Voss, a former FBI hostage negotiator, use all of the strategies, techniques, and principles in his past real hostage negotiations right before your eyes.

- Workbook Is Included

I appreciated that this course came with a professional-looking workbook. It not only made me feel like I should take this course more seriously which made me more productive, but the workbook almost worked to make up for the fact that the course is all video. The workbook contains summaries, definitions, and reviews of the course content that I can look back at any time which I found very handy in more ways than one.

Review

Really good stuff.

I wanted to take this course because I felt like it would be a good supplement to the knowledge I gained in Yale's online negotiation class. Yale's class is all about principled arguments that successfully express that your deal is fairer than theirs (and, if you're not going to play fair, why should we do a deal together in the first place?). Voss's class is all about using empathy to better connect with the other side so they will want to listen to you because you've already listened to them while showing that you were listening. By making them feel listened to and then continuing to propose your offer/deal, the expectation is that they'll feel that your deal is what they actually want because you've built up a level of trust-based influence.

Together, I felt like this was the perfect combination for any negotiation because I could alternate between listening, empathizing, and rapport-building and using principle-based counter-arguments to move closer to a truly win-win deal in any situation.

One thing's for sure, his principles are sound and are sure to help build a better, deeper connection if followed correctly.

Men Who Hate Women: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- Misogynists are anxious and afraid that their partners can hurt them
- Misogynists try to control and disempower their partner so that they can never leave and hurt them
- Most misogynists aren't going to improve or seek therapy, so women are probably better off breaking up

Summary

About the Author: Susan Forward is an American psychotherapist and author. Susan had her own practice, as well as being a therapist, instructor and consultant to several Southern California psychiatric and medical facilities. Forward focuses on toxic, manipulative, and abusive relationships, and she is also the author of "Emotional Blackmail".

Misogynists: the need for a new category

Forward had started noticing a pattern with some women in her practice.
Several of them seemed to describe a type of abusive relationship with similar traits, but that didn't fit the common profile of the usual personality disorders.

These men weren't narcissists.
Contrary to narcissists, they could love intensively. And contrary to narcissists, their need was that of controlling, rather than being admired.

They were also different from sociopaths.
The destructive and value-taking behavior wasn't generalized, but very focused towards their partner only.
He was also able of loving. As a matter of fact, his love was often particularly intense.

They weren't sadists either.
These men felt both threatened and enraged by the same pain they were causing.

Psychological & verbal abuse more than physical abuse

The misogynist is usually not a batterer, but use psychological and verbal forms of control and abuse.

The myth of masochism

Forward says that the concept of masochism has been overblown in terms of its actual incidence, and it's been wrongly used to label victims who were everything but masochists.

None of the women she cured were masochists, and none of them enjoyed pain.
Yes, many of them were emotionally attached to their partners, and some of them had trouble letting go. But none of them enjoyed the pained -they joined therapy to get rid of the pain, after all (note: that also makes Forward's own sample self-selected, and thus not a great sample to generalize when it comes to the topic of masochism)-.

Reject the abuse, or you participate in it

The woman's acquiescence to abuse is the crucial element that allows for the abusive relationship to develop in the first place.

Says Forward:

> Once she accepts an attack on her self-worth and permits herself to be demeaned, she has opened the door for future assaults.

Misogynists only stick with women who put up with it

I loved this example of a higher-quality, more assertive woman, who dropped the misogynist as soon as he started his abuse:

> He decided I'd tipped the cabdriver too much and started screaming at me in the middle of the street. I don't know why he thought he could get away with that kind of stuff. I told him I wasn't going to put up with that kind of treatment and that if he pulled that again I was going to leave. Well, then he was sweet as pie for a day or two, and then he did it again. So I left.

That's how to properly use assertiveness to stop abuse early on.

Traits of misogynist relationships

Some of the traits of misogynist relationships include:

- A sense of desperation

Both partners often crave emotional attachment. The misogynist can have a desperate need to bind the other person to him.

- The woman as the savior

Women who pair up with troubled misogynists can come to believe that they can "save them" through the power of their love and support.
It enables the woman to see herself as a goddess, earth-mother, and healer.

Also read the best book on this topic: "women who love too much".

- The first "incident"

The first instant of abuse usually happens over a minor event. The woman is left incredulous that such a seemingly good man could get so angry and aggressive. Usually, the woman wants to believe it's all OK, and she will pretend "it never happened".

- Abuse begins in earnst with committment

The outbursts are sporadic until the relationships enters a milestone, such as committment, moving in, or marriage. Then, abuse becomes a mainstay.

The Toxic "Unspoken Contract"

This is the unspoken contract between the man and woman:

- Woman: my emotional security depends on your love (and I'll renounce my wishes to get it)
- Man: my emotional security depends on being in total control (and I will become abusive and nasty to control you)

He has to win & control at all costs

All relationships entail some power struggles.

But in normal and good relationships, partners negotiate.
What usually happens, is that the partner for whom something is less important, concedes to the partner who cares most about that issue.

But in the misogynist relationship, the power struggle is constant, and he always wants to win and control.

He's always angry because total control is impossible

Since total control over another human being is impossible, the misogynist is angry and frustrated most of the time.

Psychological abuse is as bad as physical abuse

Forward says that some women find solace saying "at least he doesn't hit me".
But she says that the result is the same.
Her reply is:

> The result is the same. You are just as scared, you feel just as helpless, and you are in just as much pain. What difference does it make whether the weapon is his fist or his words?

As a matter of fact, that type of thinking will only keep her stuck is an abusive relationship for longer.

The Tools of Abuse

Among the tools of abuse:

- Implied threat: hitting is not necessary when the fear of physical abuse can achieve the same
- Unrelenting criticism: including "fault-finding"
- Denial: denying the abusive incident even happened
- Rewriting history
- Shifting the blame: if he behaves badly, it's only because of her (and for the abusive relationship to proceed, the woman must accept that she is indeed to blame)
- Isolation: the misogynist seeks to restrict the people allowed in her life to only those who support his worldview and his controlling goals
- Financial control: there are two types of misogynists, the "good provider", and the one who's always broke. If he's a good provider and stays at home, he is likely to use her financial dependency as a tool for control

Misogynists see children as rivals for household control (& woman's love)

Some misogynists resent children because they make it harder for him to control her.
And some misogynists resent children because they want their partner's full and undivided attention.

Says Susan Forward:

> No matter how many children there are, he gets to be the Number-One Kid.

See a real-life example here:

Some misogynists want her full attention because they didn't get enough motherly love, so now they seek it from her female partner.
And some other misogynists can attack her maternal adequacy and skill as a way of demeaning her.

Why women stay with misogynist

Relationships with misogynists can be intense and confusing.
Some of the reasons why some women stay stuck in them:

- The love hook / addiction: most often than not, it's not real love, but addiction generated by the intensity of the abusive up and downs
- Looking for the "magic key": the on and off and alternation between love and abuse can lead women to believe that there must be some secret formula to make things always good, and that she can find it. But there are no magic keys
- The hope hook: the hope, or better, the "fantasy" that things can change and that he can finally show her only love, without the abuse
- The collusion hook: when she believes that she is at fauls, she effectively joins him in her own abuse. Also see "Codependent No More"
- Stockholm Syndrome: developing positive feelings for those same people who abuse us. See this example
- Fear: fear is expressed in many ways, from fear of not finding another man, to fear of divorcing, to fear of a drop in living standards, to fear of dating again

Misogynists Are Fearful

To begin with, Forward says that misogynist's abuse is a covert up for his tremendous anxiety about women.

Like everyone else, the misogynist needs to feel emotionally loved, and safe.
But his normal needs to be close to a woman are mixed with fears that she can hurt him emotionally.

Says Forward:

> He harbors a hidden belief that if he loves a woman, she will then have the power to hurt him, to deprive him, to engulf him, and to abandon him.

And:

> He comes to believe that he is as dependent on his partner as he was on his mother. Inherent in his fear of this dependency is the equally dreadful fear that she will leave him.

So to assuage his fears, the misogynist seeks to make the woman too dependent, and too powerless, to ever hurt him.
If he can totally control her, if he can strip of her self-esteem, he will be safe.

How Men Learn to Hate Women

- His mother was too powerful mother

In adjusted families, the mother is the primary source of comfort, while the father helps him pull away.
But in the misogynist's household the father is either too frightening, or too passive, so the boy remains too dependent on the mother.

The mother becomes too powerful, and he views his partner in the exact same way: an overly powerful figure that can frustrate him, command him, make him feel weak, or hurt him.

- His father was a misogynist

When the father was an abusive tyrant and the mother was weak, the boy sees two options: be weak like mother, or a tyrant like the father.

Some boys choose the tyrant path, and become abusers.

- His father was abusive

This might seem counterintuitive, but if the father was abusive, many boys can subconsciously blame the mother for not doing anything to protect them.

It's also possible the wife of an abusive man seeks refuge in the children, or even ask for their support.
This puts the boy in an impossible position. He feels like he has this huge responsibility to defend the mother, but not being able to. The boy is supposed to count on the mother, not being called upon to rescue her. When his basic needs for support and protection are not met, he carries that pain and emptiness into adulthood.
Which leads us to the next point:

- He wasn't properly mothered

Says Forward:

> He didn't just forget about those needs: he took them into his adult life and particularly into his relationships with women. As an adult he expected women to meet his desperate need to be mothered in a way he never was as a child.

- He was mistreated by his mother

When the mother abuses or mistreats her children, the boy is betrayed by the person that was supposed to care for him the most. And he can grow to feel that all women are like that.
Being rejected or unloved also counts as mistreatment.

- He had a rejecting mother who made him hide his needs

A rejecting mother who makes him feel bad for his needs teaches him that it's never OK to be vulnerable, and that his needs are shameful and unacceptable.

Says Forward:

> He may begin trying to cover up his vulnerability whenever he can. Many misogynists use bullying and macho behavior toward women to defend against these unacceptable feelings of vulnerability.

- He was suffocated by his mother

If the mother is overcontrolling or overprotecting, the boy can grow to resent the mother.

A girl can stay close to her mother while she finds her own identity, but a boy needs to pull away. If the mother is too involved and overprotective, the boy can feel helpless. When he grows up, he can come to view women as malevolent being out to rob him of his independence and masculinity. And that leads to endless power struggles.

The boy from suffocating mothers can also internalize the belief he can't survive without the mother, and that he can project that sense of dependency onto all women in his life.

If the boy had a strong father figure, he could pull away from the mother, but dominan and suffocating women tend to pair up with more submissive men.

- He had weak father and dominating mother

If the boy grew up within a relationship where the mother would call all the shots and the father would never stand up to her, he can grow to believe that women are controlling and men cannot stand up to them.
That makes them overly sensitive to any different opinion or independence from women, which he interprets as a sign of her trying to dominate him.

Plus, these days, there is also the red pill to turn men into misogynists.

A man who switched from defensive misogynist to high-quality

I like this example of a man who went through therapy, learned, and made himself a better, higher-quality man:

> Ben found, to his amazement, that the woman she became was far more fascinating and exciting than the woman he'd tried to make her into.
> In our last session he told me: Before, all I wanted was somebody who wasn't going to leave me. The worst thing I could think of was that if she could stand on her own two feet she could also go. But now that I feel better about myself I'm not so afraid anymore. She's finished school and has a job, and to tell you the truth, I'm damned proud of her. She's not this dependent little girl anymore. She's more like a real person. She stands up for herself, and you know what? I like it! She's more fun. She's alive and she's interesting. I tell you, I'm more in love with her than I've ever been.

How women learn to love women-haters

The main reason why women stick with abusers and women haters is this:

- They have a negative view of themselves

The damaged self-image that they sometimes carried from childhood predisposes them to abuse.

- Childhood abuse

Including fathers who blamed children for their own insecurities (scapegoating), or who placed too high demand, and then showed all their disappointment when the child failed to meet them.

In her psychoanalytic interpretation, Forward says that "the drive to repeat the familiar combined with the equally powerful drive to make it come out better creates a trap into which many women fall".

To better understand this dynamic, also read "how low self-esteem predisposed to abuse".

- High drama family

She grows up believing that fighting and drama are the only "normal" ways to be in a relationship.

She has more power (but doesn't know it)

Says Forward:

> She actually has more power than her partner, because he is far more dependent on her than she is on him. She just doesn't realize it.

She says that his fear of abandonnment and his need to be in total contrl make him a paper tiger.

Get out of a misogynist relationships

While women hope things get better, in reality they usually get worse.

Staying in the relationship is bad for you.
And if you want to stay for the children, it's bad for them as well, since it teaches boys to become misogynists, and it teaches girls to accept abuse.

The steps Forward recommends:

1. Observe:
2. Recognize you have the choice to behave differently: keep behaving the same way, but recognize that you have the final say on how to behave
3. Write down all labels he uses: then, write next to each one of them a different adjective that better represents you
4. Use paradoxical therapy: imagine you telling your partner that they are right to abuse you, because you are worthless, go on your knees, thank them for all they do to you. Then, realize this is exactly what you're doing with your behavior
5. Imagine your partner behave and saying what he says to you, to someone else: this helps you realize what he does and say is not "normal", and that since you wouldn't accept that behavior on someone else you like, you also cannot accept it for yourself
6. Change the way you see him: stop making excuses and start to truly see his behavior for what it really is
7. Use your anger positively, instead of repressing it
8. Remind yourself of your power: he needs you as much, and very likely more, than you need him
9. Learn assertiveness
10. Be careful: when he realizes his methods are not working with you, it's possible the abuse will escalate before it disappears. That might mean some abusers can get violent. If that's the case, get away. But some abusers can react with self-destruction or with pleading, tears, and begging. The goal is the same: to stay, and make you submit again

Should you leave?

Most misogynists don't want to improve, and they don't even want to get into therapy. A minority will, but don't count on being the exception.
As a rule of thumb, it's always better to end abusive relationships.
To decide whether to leave or not, read "should I end the relationship?".

More Wisdom

- Using her sexual drives to label her as "disgusting"

> Jim used Rosalind's sexual desires as weapons against her. Because her needs were different from his, he labeled them "disgusting."

I once dated a woman with a healthy sexual appetite whose ex-boyfriend labeled her as "disgusting" and "weird" for masturbating or for using the water pressure out of the showerhead to orgasm.

But, says forward, what distinguishes the misogynist is a deep aversion towards women's bodies.

- Sexhaolics use sex for control

Said one guy to her partner: "The only time I feel I have you is when I'm in you."
Sexhaolics use sex either to escape life tensions, for example before going to work or to release tension coming back from work, or as a tool for control, as the guy from the quote above.

Eventually, women in a relationship with a sexhaolic will feel like an object.

- The misogynist believe women are untrustworthy

Says Susan Forward:

> The misogynist's underlying suspiciousness seems to come from a fear that women are "only out for what they can get."

- "I'm better because of social background" power move

I found this example interesting when it comes to relationship power dynamics:

> Gerry constantly reminded Paula that her family and background were inferior to his. He told her that because his father was a professor and hers was an electrician, she was low-class and he wasn't. He couldn't stand to spend time with her family because they were such "uncultured, ignorant people."

- Misogynysts justifie affairs saying that "the woman would do the same"

I paraphrase for brevity:

> Many misogynists who are having extramarital affairs assume their partners are doing the same. The more guilty the man feels, the more he needs to project that guilt onto his partner. By doing this he makes her the "bad" one. These affairs usually don't change the misogynist's desperate need to hold on to his partner.

- The "strong woman paradox"

This is the woman who is fully independent, possibly successful and high power in her work, only to revert to helpless child in her relationship. This was the case for Susan Forward herself actually, who realized she was in an abusive relationship with a misogynist while she cured women in a similar situation.
She'd run her successful clinic, then walk back home, and start feeling scared and helpless right before getting back home.

Quotes

On idealization:

> Idealization is a double-edged sword. It feels wonderful and flattering, but it also blinds a woman to the fact that she's doomed to fail.

On not the necessity of early assertiveness:

> I tell women all the time that you can't afford to give Hitler Poland.

On "rescuing" unstable and irresponsible men:

> Unstable, irresponsible people do not get rescued; they continue to fail over and over again, and often they wind up hating their rescuers for making them feel even weaker.

On being attracted VS staying:

> Any woman can be attracted to a misogynist. Being attracted to a misogynist is not the problem. Staying and accepting abuse for long periods of time is!

CONS

- Sometimes too much on socialization/nurture side instead of nature

Sometimes it feels like Forward discounts the role of nature and genes in favor of socialization.
For example:

> Women learn these behaviors early, and are consistently rewarded and praised for them. The paradox here is that the behaviors that make a woman vulnerable to mistreatment are the very ones she has been taught are feminine and lovable.

It's not just about learning, it's also that women are, on average, less assertive and aggressive than men.
Plus, some individual women are even more passive by virtue of how they're wired.

- Can lead to confuses common male behavior for misogyny

Writes Forward:

> Like many misogynists, Jeff saw affection and caressing as time-consuming and unnecessary once he'd "won" his woman. Foreplay became something to rush through to prepare Nancy for the main event—intercourse.

That's how many behave, and that does not necessarily make all of them misogynists.
I know Forward didn't mean to say "every man who rushes is a misogynist", but it can lead to confusion.

- Sometimes Freudian

Some analyses were good, and potentially true. Yet, also untested and very "Freudian".
For example:

> It might seem that a man who had a suffocating mother and who feels the need to control women would be drawn to a partner who is the exact opposite of his mother. However, what often happens is that this man becomes magnetically attracted to a strong woman and then tries to weaken her. What he is doing is trying to rewrite the old family script to make it come out better. If he can control a powerful woman, he can prove to himself that he is more of a man than his father was. He will win the battle that his father was afraid to fight.

That is very possibly true… In some cases, at least.
But it at least needed a note that it's not science and it's not proven.

Some other passages were pure "psychologizing" and "psychoanalyzing", and in my opinion lowered the quality of an otherwise excellent book.

- Exaggerates social bias

The author says that our society promotes the abuse of women.

I found that not to be true.
She also implies that pornography incites misogyny and/or cruelty, and I also found that not to be true.

- Warns of male therapist bias, but not of female therapist biases

The author says that some male therapists have a male bias in their approach.
Probably true, and she could have mentioned that some women, as well as some men, have a pro-female bias (Smith, 2017).

- Sometimes misunderstands human nature, makes nonsense justifications

Writes Forward about a man who had sex with female patients in his practice:

> In his work as a psychologist, he was able to gain power and control over many of his female patients by having sexual relations with them. This was one of the ways in which he attempted to deal with his longings for comfort from a woman.

So he banged a bunch of women using his influence and power position, and he did that to "deal with his longings for comfort"?
Nonsense!

Review

"Men Who Hate Women" is the best book I have read on misogyny and abusive relationships with a misogynist.

Recommended not just to women, but also to men with a tendency to dislike or distrust women. It can help them uncover -and get rid- of some of the dormant and childhood issues that predispose them to dislike and distrust women.

About Jho Low

From a psychological perspective, Low seemed to be a mix of a man with extreme personal drive to accumulate and wealth, as well as to spend that wealth, and to show off.
Low was a compulsive spender for himself, as well as a compulsive spender on others as a way to enhance his status.
He craved recognition, and he didn't even hit on many of the women he regaled with expensive gifts.

Here's my summary and review of the most important bits, from a strategies and power dynamics perspective:

Summary

1. To Steal Money, Learn How to Hide It

Says the author:

> Jho Low's story epitomizes the shocking power of those who learn how to master the levers of international finance in the twenty-first century.

- Set up shell corporations in high-secrecy jurisdictions

To begin with, you want to incorporate in high-secrecy jurisdictions. Also see the review of "Tax-Free Today".

- Give them pompous names

Low set up two shell companies with the names of "ADIA Investment Corporation" and "KIA Investment Corporation". Low chose these names because they looked related to the Abu Dhabi Investment Authority, or ADIA, and Kuwait Investment Authority, or KIA, two famous, multi-billion-dollar sovereign wealth funds. But of course, they had no real links to the funds.

- Use IOTAs to get money into the US

Say the authors:

> Lawyers, unlike bankers, don't have to conduct due diligence on a client. Details of transfers through IOLTAs, meanwhile, are protected by lawyer-client privilege.

- Buy art and jewels to launder money

Dealers are not required to disclose the identities of their customers, and often don't even know who's actually behind the purchases. Some of the most famous art galleries also offer storage of goods, so they can be turned into banks.

- Buy a yacht

You can move them anywhere and they stay outside of the reach of different governments, moving only where you are welcomed (and being welcomed means that you must pay and/or ingratiate someone).

2. Develop and Nurture Powerful Contacts & Friends

Much of Low's life success, which would have been a successful life even without stealing, was based on contacts and social networks.

Say the authors:

> He began to see Wharton foremost as a place to socialize and build his contacts.

And about his partying as a way of making friends:

> For sure, he enjoyed partying, and he liked having pretty women around, but more than anything this was an investment, one that made him appear successful and indispensable.

3. Feed Your Allies

People will give you opportunities, support, and favor, if you keep feeding them with what they want.

Say the authors:

> In these early stages, he began to focus on how to reward his allies—foremost among them Abu Dhabi executives and the family of Prime Minister Najib Razak

Low was able to get government money because he made his prime minister friend and his wife the recipients of his gifts and largesse.
Najib closed both eyes, never asked questions, and supported Low, because he was getting his big kickbacks.

4. Appear More Linked & Powerful Than You Really Are

Low's rise to power was largely based on the fact that some people who are used to luxury never prod too much to make sure they understand who they're dealing with.
They feel entitled, and if some guys appear to be on their same level, they rarely spend much time checking their credentials and background. All the more so if that guy provides what they want: money and luxury.

Say the authors about Low pretending to be a power-broker between the Malaysian government and Saudi Arabia:

> Low was doing his all to give the impression that he was indispensable, and the meeting with Prince Turki on the Alfa Nero in August was meant to deepen that feeling. Unbeknownst to Najib and Rosmah, it was a setup, a facade of officialdom, aimed at making the prime minister and his wife feel they were getting close to Saudi Arabia's royal family.

The Saudi prince was also a great target for Low: he was a true blue blood and a big name, but had uncertain political prospects and needed cash. So he was amenable to Low's promises of future financial rewards.

5. Power & Success Don't Require Dominance or Aggression

Low was an unassuming man, in many ways.
He remained out of the limelight, was rarely seen enjoying his own parties, and seemed more steeped into making others feel powerful, than to overpower others.

Say the authors about Jho Low when he was a student:

> Many adults remember Low as smooth and deferential, but adept at using this charm to get what he wanted.

And:

> With his soft way of talking, almost inaudible at times, it was easy to forget you were doing what Low desired. In 2003, he persuaded his Arab friends to help him set up a tour around the Middle East, introducing him to the richest families and most influential firms.

Low was especially obsequious with those with power, and whom he needed. Say the authors:

> Since coming into Najib's orbit, Low was always careful to remain subservient to the prime minister, calling him "my PM," and this extended to Rosmah and her son.

Machiavellianism is Required

However, he showed early Machiavellian propensities, and he was happy to use those skills to find ways around the rules.
For example, he forged a letter from the embassy of Brunei to reserve tables at a hip and expensive club, and partied there with his friends.

Say the authors about that early experience:

> It was a lesson that power and prestige—or at least the appearance of it—opened all kinds of doors.

6. Money Makes You Attractive (Even to Rich People)

Say the authors:

> The rumor that Low was a billionaire with unlimited funds made him an attractive person to know. Even for DiCaprio, one of the world's top-paid actors, with a sizable fortune of his own, the scope of Low's purported wealth was alluring.

7. Learn Power Dynamics

I loved this email. Low send out to his bankers when he was asked for comp

> "When good wealth creation is generated, as a matter of cultural respect and good fortune that arises from respect, we always give our parents the proceeds. This is part of our custom and culture." In the email, Low explained that, per custom, it was up to the elders in question to decide what to do with the gift. "In this case, my father receives it as a token of gesture, respect and appreciation and decides to give it back to me for me to then subsequently provide a portion for the benefit of my family trust." He then chided the Swiss bankers for their cultural naïveté: "I hope this clarifies as this is culturally sensitive and it would be taboo and bad luck otherwise and our family is very particular about respect of the elderly and being appreciative to family." This bastardized picture of Chinese culture in no way adequately explained the need for such shady transfers. But

> Low had another card to play—he knew BSI had become dependent on his business and, faced with the prospect of losing it, would go to lengths to keep the money flowing. “I hope I do not need to keep explaining the same matter over and over again as our time is better spent generating wealth so that the AUM [Assets Under Management] in BSI Bank can be increased as opposed to providing answers for questions which have already been provided for previously. I fully understand and respect the requirement of compliance, but one should not be over burdening your customers [especially] when they have been addressed in the past.”

CONS

- Wished for even more details that really matter: how the fraud exactly worked

The book is long and had a lot of details.
But I cared less about the brand of clothes and wines he drank, and more about the details of how he pulled the scam.

There is something about the scam as well, but not as detailed as I had hoped.

- The authors infer a lot

The authors infer a lot about how Low learned and internalized that “being a crook is OK”.
For example, he says that studying alongside wealthy children of politicians who received kickbacks from businesses stirred in him a “moral relativism”. But based on what are they saying that?
To me that accounts to “psychologizing”. And the authors never even spoke to Low.

- Sometimes I disagreed with the author’s opinions, presented as facts

The authors say that the price of art auctions was “partly due to the innate worth of the painting, coupled with limited supply”.

To me, that’s nonsense.
Modern art is worthless in terms of “innate worth”, and it’s only worth is based on social trends. The supply of art is also everything but limited. A modern artist could poop in a tin and sell it as art (which actually happened).

More Wisdom

- If a rich guy wants to keep his spending secret: beware

Many rich people spend as a way to gain status.
Reporters were invited to Low’s parties, but they couldn’t write about Low himself. Usually, when a rich man spends to attract attention, but doesn’t want his name public, there are good chances he might be hiding something.

- The world today offers more opportunities for hiding

For decades, the world was divided into two major spheres of influence: USSR, and the US/West.
But people who wanted to live the life had to depend on the West and US, since the USSR was communist, and most of the rest of the world was too poor.
With the rise of China and the rise of capitalism in Russia, now a global thief can steal and remain out of reach from the US and other Western countries while still enjoying a lavish lifestyle.

Quotes

> Steal a little, and they throw you in jail. Steal a lot, and they make you king

About Low, a guy who was all about getting out the most from social exchanges.

> Low's bashful manners belied a hard core of ambition the like of which the world rarely sees. Look more closely, and Low was not so much timid as quietly calculating, as if computing every human interaction, sizing up what he could provide for someone and what they, in turn, could do for him.

On women used as decorations for rich men:

> The first of scores of young models wearing red dresses, some of whom handed out drinks and food, while others—in the crude language of nightclubs—acted as "ambient" decorations.

On men throwing money around (and women getting on their knees to pick it up):

> After an early winning streak against the house, some of the Asian men began to throw chips around the room. Some of the Playmates, who were mingling on the sofas and around the table, chased after them, down on their hands and knees.

Review

"Billion Dollar Whale" was a fascinating read, and I learned a lot from it.
Both in terms of social strategies and power dynamics, and in terms of how to navigate the financial system.

Notes

About the Author:
Geoffrey Miller is an American evolutionary psychologist and psychology professor at the University of New Mexico.
He is also the author of "The Mating Mind", which entered in our best evolutionary psychology books list.

We All Virtue-Signal

Let's stop the game of pretending we do not virtue signal.
We all do.

Miller says that virtue signaling, albeit being a new term, goes back to millions of years, to the origins of human morality.

However, I might add, people do differ in the conspicuousness of virtue signaling, such as how heavily -and annoyingly- they virtue-signal, and on the topics they virtue-signal about.

We Virtue Signal Because We Sexually Select for Moral Virtues

Sexual selection is the key to understanding virtue signaling, says Miller.

To begin with, understand that humans appreciate both attractive bodies, as well as attractive minds.
And empirical research shows that many mental traits that are attractive, either are moral qualities, or also possess moral qualities.

Favored Traits

So, which traits do men and women appreciate most?

They are:

- Kindness
- Empathy
- Niceness
- Honesty
- Heroism

On average, moral virtues preferences are stronger when it comes to long-term mate choice, rather than short-term choice.

But higher-risk ones, like pro-social heroism, might be equally attractive for short-term mating.

Says Miller:

> The moral virtues most readily explained by sexual selection are those most conspicuously manifest in sexual courtship and relationships, and consistently valued in mate choice across cultures. Courtship generosity is the most obvious example, with clear parallels to 'courtship feeding' by animals,

Miller also says that this type of generosity is directed at a non-kin and is not expected to be reciprocated. Hence, it qualifies as evolutionary altruism evolved through mate selection.
I personally think that the "not expected to be reciprocated" should be explained better, since their expected reciprocation is sexual access to the female reproductive system, but otherwise, he's right.

Morality (Also) Evolved Through Sexual Selection

Miller says that his model of morality developed through mate choice is not meant to replace other models, but to complement them.

Note:
See Ridley's "The Origins of Virtue" for a model of morality developed through social exchanges).

Says Miller:

> Many pro-social behaviors that were assumed to arise through kinship or reciprocity are now thought to have emerged as costly signals of individual fitness, favored by social and sexual selection.

Sexual selection also doesn't work in isolation, but can "super-charge" other beneficial evolutionary processes by adding positive feedback dynamics.
For example, if a moral virtue becomes useful for social exchange reciprocity, or for kinship, then it's possible -or likely- that our ancestors didn't ignore it when it came to mate choice.

Virtue signaling signals good-parenting, good partners, and good genes

In general, sexually selected costly signals advertise good genes, or good parenting abilities.
Moral virtues can signal both. A high mutation load impairs the brain's ability to display sophisticated, empathic social intelligence.
Actually, moral virtue functions as advertiser of three important traits:

- Good genes
- Good parenting
- Good partners

The research does not yet distinguish between the three, says Miller.
In my opinion, virtue signaling is about parenting and good partner/fidelity, and less about good genes.

Exceptions

Miller, being the good thinker that he is, also says that the sexual model of virtues makes for exceptions, including:

- Not entail that all sexually attractive mental traits are virtue
- Not all virtues are attractive under all conditions
- Some individuals may prefer more Machiavellian or aggressive traits, or traits that facilitate promiscuity

Cheap VS Costly Virtue Signaling

Similarly to general value signaling, virtue signaling can be categorized as:

- Cheap virtue-signaling: bumper stickers, talking, posting or sharing on social media, dating profiles, etc. it costs little or nothing to signal about, and it's not very reliable
- Costly virtue-signaling: verifiable financial donations, changing to a lower-paying job in order to serve a cause, etc.

The costlier a signal is, the more trustworthy it becomes. Time is also a crucial variable to costs and reliability. Many guys can be supportive and loving during courtship for example, but not all of them will stay that way during the marriage.

High-Virtue Individuals Pair Up With High-Virtue Individuals

If virtues are sexually attractive, as they seem to be, then we can expect high-virtue people to pair up with other high-virtue folks.

People don't just observe, but sometimes actively probe others for their virtues (called in vernacular seduction literature "shit-testing").

Writes Miller:

> In species with social monogamy such as ours, individuals should assortatively mate with respect to virtues, because the competitive mating market should ensure that high-virtue individuals prefer each other, leaving lower-virtue individuals no choice but to settle for each other.

Virtue Signaling is Both Great, and Terrible

Miller says that virtue signaling represents both the best, and the worst of humanity.

The best, because he argues that virtue signaling is how we developed empathy and caring for others, and the worst because it drives censoring, ostracization and, albeit Miller doesn't say it, it also drives what I call "shame attacks".

Men Are Bigger Signalers

Miller says that men are bigger virtue signalers.

This is because men have higher variance of reproductive success, meaning they are more likely to have both fewer offspring than the average woman (possibly zero), or far more.
So men are predicted to allocate more energy, time, and risk to mating.

That's why men are more likely to be over-represented among pro-social heroes who risk their lives, as well as among revolutionaries and political rebels who fight for a better world

Says Miller:

> There should be more conspicuously super-virtuous males (such as Gandhi or Martin Luther King, Jr.), but also more virtue-deficient males (such as Vlad the Impaler or Stalin).

Mating is Eugenics – Random Mating is Stupid Mating

It pays to be choosy because the genetic quality of your mate determines half of the genetic quality of your offspring.
Says Miller:

> Mate choice is simply the best eugenics and genetic screening that female animals are capable of carrying out under field conditions, with no equipment other than their senses and their brains.

Plus, I would add, if you keep hanging around the mate, it also determines your quality of life.

And again:

> We generally accept that 'ought implies can' when we judge moral acts. We don't expect the poor to donate to charity (…)
> However, when judging the morality of whole persons in real relationships, we are rarely so forgiving. When the fitness stakes are high, we hold people morally accountable even for faults that are not their own.

Political Orientation as Virtue Signaling

People use political orientation as a proxy for other people's character.
Usually, people read political orientations like this:

- Liberal: caring, and empathic. Good for child care and relationship-building
- Conservative: ambitious and self-interested. Good at protecting and provisioning

Miller says that men use political conservativism as a (subconscious) tool to advertise their social and economic dominance, or their propensity to acquire social and economic dominance.
And women use political liberism to advertise their nurturing abilities.

I agree with Miller, and a staunch female Republican would come across as less feminine (same for combative Democrats though, since ideological fervor is more of a male thing).

The shift from liberal youth to conservative middle age, says Miller, is not so much about rationality, but as a better advertising tool for the increased social dominance and earnings power.

My Note: Misses on short-term VS long-term sexual signaling
I think something Miller is missing here is about short-term and long-term different types of signaling.
Liberal political philosophy tends to be more forgiving, or more embracing, of sexual expression. And that's why most young guys hide their conservativism, and that's why liberalism tends to be more popular among young folks: it's a time in life for sexual experimentation. People settle down later in life, and later in life, it makes more sense to be conservative.

- Why men oppose immigration

Why People Espouse Nonsense Causes for Virtue Signaling

Miller says that mating is a social game, and what's attractive depends on the environment:

> This is called frequency-dependent selection in biology, and it is a hallmark of sexual selection processes.

So if in the social environment the "hot issue" talked about happens to be "the female repression in Rwanda", then people will latch onto that topic to virtue signal, and they will forget about the homeless down the street, or the women in the city's abuse shelter that they could go and help right now.

And when a sufficient number of people shift about virtue-signaling towards a certain topic, say, for example, enough people decided that apartheid was the acid test for one's heart, then it becomes impossible to be apathetic about apartheid without also signaling that one is apathetic about helping others.

Communication is Personal Advertisement

Old theories of languages and communication postulated that language developed to share information.

But that is not the case.
Dawkins and Krebs in 1978 argued that it would be odd for animals to evolve ways of giving away useful information to their rivals. Communication in that sense would be altruistic, and it is very difficult for altruistic behaviors to evolve.

Since then, it became clear that most messages animals send are not messages about the world, but about themselves.

Current Virtue Signaling Punishes Neuro-Diversity

It's funny:

Recent virtue signaling is all about diversity and acceptance.
And yet, by virtue signaling's own code of conduct, Aspergers, low EQ folk ("systematizers"), and people with social intelligence are punished and ostracized.

Since virtue-signaling rules are fuzzy, change quickly, and require high EQ to understand what's acceptable, "offensive", and what's "safe to say", people with low EQ struggle to remain within the rules.
The result is that they are marginalized, especially in universities, and either quit, or silence themselves.
This is a net loss for society, since many of the world's geniuses are on the autism-Asperger syndrome, including Peter Thiel, Mark Zuckerberg, Albert Einstein, and Elon Musk.

Indeed, he has a point, see a video analyzing Elon Musk EQ:

Miller speaks from first-hand experience, as he says that he has low EQ, and is a mild Asperger.
Indeed, Miller himself fell for the virtue-signaling trap.
He says about his own coming out, which I thought was funny:

> It's different to 'come out' as aspie in a public forum. Nonetheless, I thought, we aspies have a moral duty to stand up for our rights against the censorious normies, and if that costs me a little embarrassment, so what? I've got tenure.

More Wisdom

- Male parental investment is partially explained through courtship generosity

Says Miller (I paraphrase for brevity):

> Courtship generosity may include much of paternal effort that is usually assumed to arise through kin selection ('offspring'), since most divorced fathers reduce their paternal investment as soon as they are cut off from sexual access to mothers. Thus, what looks like simple paternal investment is ongoing courtship generosity to maintain sexual access to the mother.

- Virtue-deficient individuals may fall into a vicious circle

Miller says that individuals who don't possess the attractive virtues may seek alternative and more predatory mating strategies that put them on a vicious circle path.
I paraphrase him for brevity:

> Individuals lacking the sexually-attractive virtues should more often pursue 'alternative mating strategies', just as animals with lower-quality ornaments tend to do. This may include increased use of short-term > opportunistic mating, deceptive affairs, sexual harassment, sexual stalking, and/or sexual coercion. If so, we might predict vicious cycle effects in which initially virtue-deficit individuals fail in the mating market, and adopt increasingly desperate and exploitative alternative mating strategies, which further undermine their virtues.

- Modern virtue signaling of "gender/racial equality" and "diversity" is contradictory

Two major dogmas of recent virtue-signaling, the "gender equality" and the push toward "diversity' are contradictory, notes Miller.
If genders and races were the same, then diversity would make no sense. And if someone seeks diversity because it's good, which Miller agrees with, that means that genders, races, and people in general, are not the same.

QUOTES

Interpreting single's ads through evolutionary psychology lenses:

> If a young woman places a single's ad stating "SHF, 26, seeks kind, generous, romantic, honest man", we might translate this in evolutionary terms as "single Hispanic female, 26, seeks a healthy male of breeding age with a minimal number of personality disorders that would impair efficient coordination and parenting in a sustained sexual relationship, and a minimal number of deleterious mutations on the thousands of genes that influence the development of brain systems for costly, conspicuous, altruistic displays of moral virtue."

CONS

- How about effective virtue signaling?

Virtue signaling is largely presented in its exaggerated form, and hence as a negative. However, virtue signaling as a form of 'value signaling' developed because signalers probably saw a return and, in at least some cases, we can speculate there can be some returns.

- What does Miller think today? We're not sure

In the introduction, Miller says that he has changed his mind on some of his early publications, but doesn't say which ones.
I respect Miller as an author, that's why I picked up his book, and I wanted to know what he thinks today, since the belief is that usually -but not always- people tend to move towards higher clarity of thinking over time, and closer to reality.

- Neuro diversity advantage?

I didn't necessarily share all the enthusiasm for "neurodiversity", especially when Miller included introverts (quoting Cain) and psychopathy (quoting Dutton) in there, but I can see his point, and still largely agree with it.

- Less timeless with the cultural references

The Google memo dates this work and felt more in-between manosphere talk and Miller's usual higher-quality, scholarly takes.

- Evolutionary cost of language was sharing information?

Miller says that the evolutionary cost for language is telling useful things to non-relatives, which in turn allows their genes to prosper at the expense of one's own genes.
But I disagree. The fact that you can tell useful things, doesn't mean you have to, or that you will.

REVIEW

Great book on the intricacies of virtue signaling.

The first part was the most wisdom-dense, in my opinion.
Overall, I wished for a larger take on virtue signaling as a form of value-signaling, a shared human drive to signal social and mate value, and which can also be positive for the signaler and, sometimes, the receiver.

Overall though, great read and valid insights; we appreciate Miller and his work.

Anatomy of the State: Summary, Review & Criticism

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

In “Anatomy of the State” (1974), Murray Rothbard presents and justifies his view of the state as a predatory entity. The state does not produce anything in Rothbard’s view, but rather steals resources from the productive citizens.

Overview

- Government is coercion because it takes (taxes) without providing any real value
- The free market could provide what the government does, far better, and without coercion
- The government is not “us”, it’s just the politicians in charge, and it only serves their interest
- The government needs support from the people to keep on stealing

Notes

About the Author: Murray Rothbard was an American economist of the Austrian School of economics.
He is one of the most important and authoritative voices of the libertarian movement, as well as the founder and leading theoretician of anarcho-capitalism.
He goes more in-depth on anarcho-capitalism in his book “For A New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto“.

Government Is Coercion

Rothbard’s definition of government:

> The State is that organization in society which attempts to maintain a monopoly of the use of force and violence in a given territorial area; in particular, it is the only organization in society that obtains its revenue not by voluntary contribution or payment for services rendered but by coercion

Rothbard says that the government is not “us”.
The government does not in any accurate sense represent the majority of the people.

And even if it were “us”, it’s still not morally and ethically legitimized to make decisions in the name of the majority, since that would be coercion on the minority.
Going to the extreme to make his point, Rothbard says:

> Even if it did, even if 70 percent of the people decided to murder the remaining 30 percent, this would still be murder and would not be voluntary suicide on the part of the slaughtered minority

If you listen to former mafia executive Sammy Gravano, he agrees:

Government Steals Wealth

Based on Franz Oppenheimer's work, Rothbard says that there are only two ways to acquire wealth:

1. Producing and exchanging wealth
2. Seizing another person's goods or services with force and violence

By now, you probably know where Rothbard places the government.
The government produces nothing, but feeds itself on the production of its citizens like a parasite.

The Government Needs the Majority's Support

Says Rothbard:

> in order to continue in office, any government (not simply a "democratic" government) must have the support of the majority of its subjects.

Importantly, it's not necessary for people to love or approve of the government to offer their support.
Says the author:

> This support, it must be noted, need not be active enthusiasm; it may well be passive resignation as if to an inevitable law of nature. But support in the sense of acceptance of some sort it must be;

So, how do the elites secure this support?
In different ways, including:

How the Government Secures Support

The government has many techniques to secure support, including:

- Bureaucrats' vested interests: the small class of people who do benefit from the government handouts, and often work for the government
- Religion: especially in the old days, the king was either in cahoots with the religious leaders, or he was a god himself
- Tradition: the "way we were" and respecting history ad our ancestors becomes a way to legitimize the present and the future
- Spreading fear: the government serves as protection against invading armies, and marauders
- Judiciary system: what's "constitutional" becomes legitimate (see below)
- "Inevitability": if the state and government seem "inevitable", then people never even think about a world without the state, or come to accept it with passive resignation (ie.: "only death and taxes are certain")
- Guilt-tripping: by making people feel guilty and greedy for amassing resources and pursuing individual wealth without "giving back"
- Nationalism: political manipulation is all about fusing people's personal identity with the state. When people mistake their identity for their "land", then being good citizens means they need to work for that state, or provide protection to it. And that way, they end up serving the political elites to their own detriment (see first quote)
- Intellectuals: they are the opinion-swayers, they spread the misinformation that the government is necessary to society, to provide basic services and/or to stop evil, and thus intellectuals prop-up the government by giving it legitimacy. They include professors, authors, speakers, etc.

Why Intellectuals Support the State

The state needs intellectuals to provide the government with legitimacy.

Intellectuals also need the state, since intellectuals by themselves are not well-positioned to earn a living and make money.
So the state offers them a job, and a salary. And it becomes an exchange of "money for support".

The Judiciary Support the State

Theoretically, the judiciary and legal apparatus in most democracies is independent of the government.
But, in truth, courts and judges do the bidding of the government.

Rothbard says that the Constitution interpreted by a judiciary supposedly independent of the other branches of government places limits on the government.
But the constitution's limits tend to be ever-broadened, and the judiciary can then provide a stamp of legitimacy to whatever it approves as "constitutional".

Says Rothbard quoting Charles Black:

> The State has, in the process, largely transformed judicial review itself from a limiting device to yet another instrument for furnishing ideological legitimacy to the government's actions. For if a judicial decree of "unconstitutional" is a mighty check to government power, an implicit or explicit verdict of "constitutional" is a mighty weapon for fostering public acceptance of ever-greater government power.

The State Prioritizes Power & Self-Preservation

The state fears anything that limits or takes away its power.

The state can only be overthrown by:

1. War
2. Revolution

So the state focuses all its propaganda and effort on those two issues.
In war, the state manipulates people into believing that they need to fight for self-defense.
This is why the gravest crimes for the state are the refusal to fight, or the fight against the state itself.

I felt that Rothbard makes a great point here.
I quote him:

> We may test the hypothesis that the State is largely interested in protecting itself rather than its subjects by asking: which category of crimes does the State pursue and punish most intensely—those against private citizens or those against itself?
> The gravest crimes in the State's lexicon are almost invariably not invasions of private person or property, but dangers to its own contentment, for example, treason, desertion of a soldier to the enemy, failure to register for the draft, subversion and subversive conspiracy, assassination of rulers and such economic crimes against the State as counterfeiting its money or evasion of its income tax.
> Or compare the degree of zeal devoted to pursuing the man who assaults a policeman, with the attention that the State pays to the assault of an ordinary citizen. Yet, curiously, the State's openly assigned priority to its own defense against the public strikes few people as inconsistent with its presumed raison d'etre.

CRITICISM

I loved "Anatomy of the State" and Rothbard can open many men's eyes to the dynamics of power and control.

Yet, there are some important mistakes/misunderstanding the author commit and that one should take note of. Also see "For A New Liberty Criticism".

Rothbard conflates what's "virtuous" with what's "natural"

Says Rothbard:

> It should be clear that the peaceful use of reason and energy in production is the "natural" path for man: the means for his survival and prosperity on this earth. It should be equally clear that the coercive, exploitative means is contrary to natural law

And:

> The predator is acting contrary to his own true nature as a man

If you're a reader of ThePowerMoves.com, you probably already know, or feel, that there is something wrong with that.

One of this website's credo is that humans have an aggressive, coercive dark side. And that some individuals have it more than others.
That is the nature of humans.

Rothbard's mistake here can fall under the "naturalistic fallacy" as explained by evolutionary psychologists (for example, Kanazawa, 2007). Such as, that if something is natural, then it's good and moral.
In this case, Rothbard does the opposite: what is moral, is natural. But that is not the case. In purely analytical terms, stealing is as natural as producing.

The state is (necessarily) born out of conquest and exploitation

For Rothbard, the state exploits and is born out of exploitation.

He says:

> Since production must always precede predation, the free market is anterior to the State. The State has never been created by a "social contract"; it has always been born in conquest and exploitation.

As a good anarchist, Rothbard sees the state as an external imposition against human "nature". Hence, any "sanctioned" authority is unnatural, illegitimate, and coercive. And must be fought.

Albeit I don't necessarily disagree with the state being coercive, I see it differently.

Any group of humans naturally develop hierarchies and leadership, with the leadership being those at the top of those hierarchies.

That leadership has an outsized say in how the group governs itself, and that is not necessarily a bad thing, since the leadership tends (tends!) to go to the more driven, resourceful, and knowledgeable folks (and the more power-craving, too, of course).
As the group grows to the millions, and people don't all know each other anymore, that leadership naturally becomes far removed, grows in complexity, and must be formalized.
That's the government.

In that sense, the government is the natural outgrowth of human's tendency to elect a leadership of people for self-government and self-policing.

Rothbard Denies Any Benefit of a Government

Rothbard sees no potential advantage in the government.

I see at least some.

In many ways, a government frees much of my time.
If you listen to Rothbard you realize that, without a government, you will take a lot more responsibilities.
But time is limited, so as you take more responsibilities, you'd have to waste more time taking a lot of decisions that right now I don't have to take.

By delegating some of those tasks and decisions making to the government, you are freer.

Black & White Approach: Government is ONLY Against Us

This is an issue with most ideologies, and the anarcho-capitalist ideology is no different.

By refusing to compromise, or to see exceptions, ideologues can be more persuasive and "sexier".
But they are also less truthful, since reality is often more about shades of grey, and with lots of exceptions.

In this case, the government can sometimes be predatory and, in a way, there are some (some!) parallels with the mafia
But it can also add value, it's not nearly as coercive as the mafia, and it can also promote increased world well being by better cooperation -which, in my opinion, it does, and that without governments it wouldn't be necessarily acccomplished by the "forces of the free market"-.

The state only wastes money (and thus, robbing the state is OK)

Says Rothbard quoting Mencken:

> When a private citizen is robbed, a worthy man is deprived of the fruits of his industry and thrift; when the government is robbed, the worst that happens is that certain rogues and loafers have less money to play with than they had before.

This is a dangerous line of thinking.

The government does provide at least some useful services.
No matter how inefficient it might be, the government does take care of roads, policing, and, in many countries, healthcare.
Thus, robbing the government also, in part, removes financial support from the quantity and/or quality of those government-provided services.

The notion that "stealing from the government" is OK could easily be used as an excuse to mask far more self-serving goals in the guise of fake Robin-Hood pro-sociality, which is something that the mafia takes advantage of.

QUOTES

On the manipulation of nationalism:

> If "Ruritania" was being attacked by "Walldavia," the first task of the State and its intellectuals was to convince the people of Ruritania that the attack was really upon them and not simply upon the ruling caste.
> In this way, a war between rulers was converted into a war between peoples, with each people coming to the defense of its rulers in the erroneous belief that the rulers were defending them.
> This device of "nationalism" has only been successful, in Western civilization, in recent centuries; it was not too long ago that the mass of subjects regarded wars as irrelevant battles between various sets of nobles.

On the manipulation of war as citizens' self-defense.

> The fallacy of the idea becomes evident when conscription is wielded against those who refuse to "defend" themselves and are, therefore, forced into joining the State's military band: needless to add, no "defense" is permitted them against this act of "their own" State.

REVIEW

Wow, what a book.

Let me preface this:

I don't agree with everything.
I think the author misses out on some important benefits of the government, and he holds too rosy a view of anarchy.
But this is still mandatory reading for understanding the world.

Summary

About the Author: Murray Rothbard was an American economist of the Austrian School of economics.
He is one of the most important and authoritative voices of the libertarian movement, and the founder and leading theoretician of anarcho-capitalism. He is also the author of "Anatomy of the State".

The USA Revolution Was the Peak of Libertarianism

In the first part of the book, Rothbard reviews some of the history of libertarianism.

He says that the USA is where the libertarian movement is strongest, and it's in part because of its history, since the American Revolution.
The American revolution infused into American culture the libertarian philosophy that power is evil.
Says the author:

> The belief that power is evil, a necessity perhaps but an evil necessity; that it is infinitely corrupting; and that it must be controlled, limited, restricted in every way compatible with a minimum of civil order

Controlled how?
With:

- Written constitutions;
- Separation of powers;
- Bills of rights;
- Limitations on executives, on legislatures, and courts;
- Restrictions on the right to coerce and wage war

All these limitations, says Rothbard, express the distrust of power that lies at the ideological heart of the American Revolution.
A revolution that was against empire, militarism, executive power, taxation, monopolies, and regulations.
And that has remained in American culture.

Libertarian Creed: Non-Aggression Axiom

The Libertarian creed rests on one central axiom:

> No man or group of men may aggress against the person or property of anyone else

Based on that basic axiom, it derives:

3 Main Rights of Libertarians

The 3 main rights the libertarian movement rests on are:

1. Absolute right of every man to the ownership of his own body
2. Absolute right to own and therefore to control the material resources he has found and transformed
3. Absolute right to exchange or give away the ownership of such titles to whoever is willing to exchange or receive them.

Personal rights -step 1-, and property rights -step 2 and 3- are intertwined for the libertarian, and cannot be separated -as communism seeks to-.

What's "Crime" For Libertarians

And a crime for a libertarian is only a crime insofar it's a "violent invasion of someone or of his property".

This also means that everyone has the absolute right of being free from any form of aggression or limitation to his liberty as long as he is not aggressing someone else.
This means that the libertarian philosophy is profoundly liberal when it comes to "civil liberties".

The libertarian philosophy does not criminalize any "victimless crimes" that might be considered morally dubious, but which are not hurting anyone, including:

- Drug consumption
- Sexual deviation
- Prostitution
- Abortion

And, of course, the freedom to speak, publish, and assemble.

EDIT: It's "allowing", more than "supporting"
In a previous version, I had written the libertarian "supports". But there is a difference between making something illegal, and supporting it. The libertarian position is about "not forcing others not to do anything that would harm others.
In regards to abortion, it depends on whether the individual libertarian believes the embryo, fetus, baby inside the womb is or is not a "victim".
Thanks to Stef for the correction!

The Libertarian is an Individualist

Albeit Rothbard doesn't exactly state it, another crucial axiom to understand libertarianism is the "individualist creed".

The libertarian puts the individual above society.
As a matter of fact, the libertarian doesn't recognize "society" as an entity, but only sees individuals' interests within different groups (more on it later).

Left-Wing On Civil Liberties, Right-Wing Laissez-Fair Capitalist on Economics

There is no contradiction, and the libertarian seems himself as the only consistent ideology.
Consistent with what?

Consistent on behalf of the liberty of every individual.

Individual's liberty means being free to do whatever he pleases, as well as to engage in all business activities he pleases, and spend that money he earns however he pleases, without taxation (which would limit his freedom on how to spend his income).

Anything Violating Individuals' Freedom is Coercion

It doen't matter whether a policy or law is supported by the majority, or not.

If it invades people's freedom, then it's against the libertarian creed, and it's aggression and coercion against the individual.

Says Rothbard:

> Regardless of popular sanction, War is Mass Murder, Conscription is Slavery, and Taxation is Robbery. The libertarian, in short, is almost completely the child in the fable, pointing out insistently that the emperor has no clothes.

And about government as a coercive entity:

> If we analyze taxation, we find that, among all the persons and institutions in society, only the government acquires its revenues through coercive violence. Everyone else in society acquires income either through voluntary gift (lodge, charitable society, chess club) or through the sale of goods or services voluntarily purchased by consumers

Poignantly, Rothbard says that if anyone else but the government would seek to tax anyone else, that would be considered coercion and theft.
But since the government managed to manipulate most people into believing in its legitimacy, most people fail to see the reality.

The Government Even Forces You to Fill Your Own Tax Forms

Says Rothbard:

> To add insult to injury, the individual taxpayer, in filling out his tax form, is also forced by the government to work at no pay on the laborious and thankless task of reckoning how much he owes the government (…)
> The government for the cost and labor expended in making out his return.

My Note: Couldn't agree more… Since I was a kid
as a man who hates wasting time and/or to spend my time on tasks assigned to me by others, I hate filling any forms or papers because I see it as coercion.

Affirmative Actions Are Discriminatory

Says Rothbard:

> Affirmative action" decrees are an obvious way of compelling discrimination against males or other groups in employment, admissions, or wherever this implicit quota system is applied

I couldn't agree more.
I remember once there was a Linkedin post by Deutsche Bank saying they committed to an X number of promotions by the end of the year, can't remember the exact number, let's say it was 50.

I asked them:

> So if by the 29th of December you have 49 female promotions and then you have a better male candidate, are you going to pass him up just to meet your quota?

My message was soon deleted :).

Whatever the Government Offers, Private Enterprise Can Do Better

In economics policies, the right-libertarians believe that laissez-faire capitalism leads to better services, better allocation of resources, and general increased well being for everyone.

That means that whatever the government offers as a service or as a good, it offers it at lower quality and/or at a higher cost -often both- compared to what a private enterprise would do.

Utlitarianism VS Libertarianism

Utilitarians put the "collective" first, while the libertarians put the individual first.
And the utilitarian looks at the "final outcome' in terms of value produced, while the libertarian defends the individual no matter what the ultimate "final outcome" would be.

To make an example:

Imagine people start thinking that redheads women are agents of the devil.
Since there are few redheads, then killing them all would bring little pain to them compared to the pleasure and "snese of safety and relief" that the collective would feel once all redheads are eliminated.

From a utilitarian point of view, then killing all redheads makes sense.
But from a libertarian, it doesn't. It doesn't matter what "society" will feel or what the collective might gain, or what the "total value of psychic contentedness" ends up at.
The rights of the individual redheads are inalienable.

Conservatives VS Libertarians

Says Rockwell in the introduction:

> American conservatives may not adore the welfare state or excessive business regulation but they appreciate power exercised in the name of nationalism, warfarism, "pro-family" policies, and invasion of personal liberty and privacy

The other difference is that free-market capitalists usually are OK with a government, albeit small.
But to the libertarian this is utopian and impossible: any government, once in place, will naturally expand as it seeks to increase its power.

There Is No "Society" or "Country" As An Entity: Only Groups of Specific Individuals, With Specific Interests

Society is an abstraction that doesn't exist.

Says Rothbard:

> "Society" is sometimes treated as a superior or quasi-divine figure with overriding "rights" of its own; at other times as an existing evil which can be blamed for all the ills of the world.

This doesn't make sense to libertarian or individualist, because:

> The individualist holds that only individuals exist, think, feel, choose, and act; and that "society" is not a living entity but simply a label for a set of interacting individuals.

The term "society" is also sometimes used to hide the real interest of some individuals within that "society", and it serves to mask the real power dynamics at play:
Says Rothbard:

> Treating society as a thing that chooses and acts, then, serves to obscure the real forces at work

Which in turn, can be used as a manipulative tool.
Says Rothbard (I paraphrase fr brevity and ease of comprehension):

> To say that "society" should own land or any other property in common, then, must mean that a group of oligarchs—in practice, government bureaucrats—should own the property, and at the expense of expropriating the individual

The Fallacy of "Nations"

Similarly, there is no such thing as nations.

And the use of a nation's name to symbolize an action is actually hiding the interests of some, often just very few individuals, who are deciding to act a certain way for their own personal well-being.

I paraphrase Rothbard quoting Parker Moon:

> When we say "Italy sent troops to conquer Greece" we impute not only unit but personality to the country.
> The words we should more accurately describe the Greece expedition is this: "A few of these 40 million persons sent thirty thousand others to conquer Greece."
> This way of putting the fact immediately suggests a question, or rather a series of questions. Who were the "few"? Why did they send the thirty thousand to Grece? And why did these obey?
> Empire-building is done not by "nations," but by men.

The Government Cannot Be Controlled: It Must Go

The tendency for people in the government is to seek more and more power.

Even if you give a bit of power and limit it with constitutions, checks and balances, and divisions of power, eventually the government will, little by little, take more and more power.

Says Rothbard:

> the idea of binding down power with the chains of a written constitution has proved to be a noble experiment that failed. The idea of a strictly limited government has proved to be utopian; some other, more radical means must be found to prevent the growth of the aggressive State. The libertarian system would meet this problem by scrapping the entire notion of creating a government—

Involuntary Servitude: Conscription, Jury Duty, Detention

Servitude is forced labor at below free-market wages.
Hence, for the libertarian, the following are forms of enslavement:

- Military conscription: at the extreme, it includes being forced to kill and put one's life in jeopardy
- Tax declarations: you are forced to spend time to fill your own tax forms without compensation
- Compelling testimony: the witness has committed no crime and has been indicted of no crime
- Compelling court presence: even for criminals under trial, they shouldn't be forced to attend their own trials
- Compulsory commitment care:

My Note:
When I read this I realized I was a libertarian. Since I was a kid, and unsure whether or not conscription in Italy was going to be abolished, I always felt it was pure coercion.
People saying "it's good for kids' education" were idiots for me, since I felt they were the ones who lacked in education.

Schooling Is a Tool of Power & Indoctrination

Says Rothbard:

> One of the most common uses of compulsory public schooling has been to oppress and cripple national ethnic and linguistic minorities or colonized peoples—to force them to abandon their own language and culture on behalf of the language and culture of the ruling groups

And of course, the state uses schools as a tool of indoctrination into the state itself.
Quoting Paterson:

> Every politically controlled educational system will inculcate the doctrine of state supremacy sooner or later, whether as the divine right of kings, or the "will of the people" in "democracy." Once that doctrine has been accepted, it becomes an almost superhuman task to break the stranglehold of the political power over the life of the citizen.

This is especially strong in the US, where children go to school alongside American flags, some even swearing allegiance to the flag (gosh!).

More Wisdom

- Let people free to smoke

> Propagandize against cigarettes as much as you want, but leave the individual free to run his own life

- Let people free to purchase guns

The author goes on to explain that widespread guns are good against crime, but I'm not convinced on this topic.

- Let people free NOT to study

Forcing people to study, in Rothbard's opinion, is a paternalistic approach of those who value schooling, towards those who don't necessarily value it nearly as much.
Hr writes:

> Part of the reason for this tyranny over the nation's youth is misplaced altruism on the part of the educated middle class.
> The workers, or the "lower classes," they felt, should have the opportunity to enjoy the schooling the middle classes value so highly. And if the parents or the children of the masses should be so benighted as to balk at this glorious opportunity set before them, well, then, a little coercion must be applied—"for their own good," of course.

- Abolish the welfare system

Rothbard's approach is based on the idea that most people on welfare aren't even trying to improve their lots or move forward in life.
Hence, if they are deciding to live in poverty, they also shouldn't receive the government's benefits to live like the middle class, without working.

The system only gets worse when they provide checks based on the number of children, thus providing an incentive to have children exactly for those who can most ill-afford to have children.

- Central banks are a tool to fabricate wealth for a few, and push the costs on the many

Ever since fiat currency, such as currency that is not backed by gold, the government can print money.
The beneficiaries are those who get the money first, while everyone else pays the price with inflation.

Government's control of money supply is inherently inflationary, since the government has an incentive to print lots of it.

- Pollution is an act of aggression

Pollution is an act of aggression of a minority -the plant owners- against everyone else.

The case against pollution is about protecting one's own rights and property not on the outside, but on the inside -lungs and body-.

The moment the courts decided that people couldn't sue plant owners for pollution because "progress was good for society", the state also sanctioned that it was OK for polluters to keep polluting, which decreased the incentive to develop non-polluting technology.

- States cannot intervene militarily to support anyone and pretend to be "in the good"

Defending someone against aggression is valid at an individual level.
But it cannot be used at a national level.

Says Rothbard:

> But "aggression" only makes sense on the individual Smith-Jones level, as does the very term "police action." These terms make no sense whatever on an inter-State level. First, we have seen that governments entering a war thereby become aggressors themselves against innocent civilians; indeed, become mass murderers.

- Judges have too much power. Incarcerating before conviction, setting up bail, and, particularly, in cases of "contempt of court", in which he's the judge of his own case

An example of "being the judge of his own case":

Somehow, people find this video "great". But while the girl was being silly and slightly contemptuous, the judge had no call to double her bail just because she said "adios". That was an abuse of power to take his little personal revenge.

- Wiretapping is an invasion of privacy and property rights, and shouldn't be allowed

Not saying I necessarily agree with this one.
The exception for Rothband is in cases in which the investigated criminal has already committed a bigger crime than the wiretapping itself.

QUOTES

On the nonsense of the "majority" as legitimization (I couldn't agree more):

> Crime is crime, aggression against rights is aggression, no matter how many citizens agree to the oppression. There is nothing sacrosanct about the majority; the lynch mob, too, is the majority in its own domain.

On the nonsense idea of giving any entity the monopoly of force (paraphrased for brevity):

> Suppose that we are starting from scratch. Debate begins as to how protection (police and judicial services) will be provided. Someone says: "Let's all give all of our weapons to Joe Jones over there. And let Jones decide all disputes among us. In that way, the Joneses will be able to protect all of us from any aggression or fraud that anyone else may commit. With all the power and all the ability to make ultimate decisions on disputes in the hands of Jones, we will all be protected from one another. And then let us allow the Joneses to obtain their income from this great service by using their weapons, and by exacting as much revenue by coercion as they shall desire." Surely in that sort of situation, no one would treat this proposal with anything but ridicule. For it would be evident that there would be no way, in that case, for any of us to protect ourselves from the aggressions, or the depredations, of the Joneses themselves. It is only because we have become accustomed over thousands of years to the existence of the State that we now give precisely this kind of absurd answer to the problem of social protection and defense.

On the abolition of standing armies:

> A permanent army is a standing temptation to the State to enlarge its power, to push around other people as well as other countries, and to dominate the internal life of the nation.

On conservatives and liberals being the same, and libertarians the true philosophy of freedom:

> Sometimes it seems that the beau ideal of many conservatives, as well as of many liberals, is to put everyone into a cage and coerce him into doing what the conservatives or liberals believe to be the moral thing. They would of course be differently styled cages, but they would be cages just the same.

On liberals defending unemployed folks who remain on government benefits (genius):

> Gouldner's attitude is typical of liberals and leftists in the present day: that it is shameful to try to foist, even noncoercively, "bourgeois" or "middle-class values" on the gloriously spontaneous and "natural" lower-class culture. Fair enough, perhaps; but then don't expect—or call upon—those same hard-working bourgeoisie to be coerced into supporting and subsidizing those very parasitic values of idleness and irresponsibility which they abhor—and which are clearly dysfunctional for the survival of any society. If people wish to be "spontaneous," let them do so on their own time and with their own resources, and let them then take the consequences of this decision, and not use State coercion to force the hardworking and "unspontaneous" to bear those consequences instead. In short, abolish the welfare system.

On the government's manipulation of frames and names:

> Just as the State arrogates to itself a monopoly power over legalized kidnapping and calls it conscription; just as it has acquired a monopoly over legalized robbery and calls it taxation; so, too, it has acquired the monopoly power to counterfeit and calls it increasing the supply of dollars

On private enterprise being more efficient:

> while the long-held motto of private enterprise is that "the customer is always right," the implicit maxim of government operation is that the customer is always to be blamed.

On foreign intervention and aid as a tool for imperialism:

> The military dictator of "Bumblestan" is in danger; perhaps his subjects are tired of being exploited by him and his colleagues. The United States then becomes gravely concerned; articles by journalists friendly to the State > Department or the Pentagon spread the alarm about what might happen to the "stability" of Bumblestan and its surrounding area if the dictator should be toppled. For it so happens that he is a "pro-American" or "pro-western" dictator: that is, he is one of "ours" instead of "theirs." Millions or even billions of dollars' worth of military and economic aid are then rushed by the United States to prop up the Bumblestani field marshal.

On "language of power", the way the USA sometimes speak:

> Our turn to keep the peace of the world.
> Our turn to save civilization.
> Our turn to serve mankind.
> But this is the language of Empire.
> The Roman Empire never doubted that it was the defender of civilization.
> Its good intentions were peace, law and order. The Spanish Empire added salvation. The British Empire added the noble myth of the white man's burden. We have added freedom and democracy.
> Yet the more that may be added to it the more it is the same language still.
> A language of power.

CRITICISM

This is a wonderful book, but there are some important "buts" to be added.

For more, also see the "criticism of Anatomy of the State".

Unluckily, I see no evidence that anarcho-capitalism -or total laissez-faire- works better

The author speaks as if free-market capitalism without a state necessarily and obviously leads to a higher standard of living for all, as well as providing all the services that the government currently provides.

He even says there is evidence:

> We just know—by economic theory and by historical insight—that such a free market will do the job infinitely better than the compulsory monopoly of bureaucratic government.

I beg to disagree.

We do know, for example, that communism has failed almost everywhere it was attempted.
But I am not aware of any advanced economy that has embraced a stateless, anarchist form of free-capitalism.

Hence, for what concerns me, I cannot say for sure whether or not this system would work better since one of the 3 main pillars of knowledge is missing: we have no good first-hand experience of anarcho-capitalism working better.

Rothbard's analysis has some data and lots of analysis but lacks sorely in experience. It's a case of "fooled by theory" (plus, it would be fair to argue that the analysis maybe be biased at the source by the author's preference)
And for the little data I am aware of in terms of unfettered free-market capitalism, it's not all so positive.
For example, after financial regulations were cut by free-market enthusiast Alan Greenspan & co., we had the huge 2008 financial bubble.

That should serve as a warning against the idea that the individual, in total freedom, always does the right thing for himself (fallacy 1), and that doing the right thing for himself also translates to adding value to society (fallacy 2).

Idealization of private enterprise

See above.

Rothbard fails to see that also private enterprises can have distorted and conflicting interests that lead to poor services or goods.

Homo economicus fallacy: people can behave irrationally

See above.

The author seems to cling to the "homo economicus" model of early economics models.
That is, an individual who is fully rational, and always acts in his long-term economic interest.

And, implies the author, when people look after their self-interest in a free-market, they automatically do good things for the whole.

But to me, both assumptions are fallacious.

For example, the author says that if people were given ownership of the oceans and rivers, then the owners would naturally take care of nature and fish preservation. Prices would fall in the short term, and in the long run there will always be fish.

But the two don't necessarily follow from private ownership.

Many men have a short-term bias, and they might want to turn fish into cash as quickly as possible, without caring about how they get that fish -for example, using explosives-, or about the future of fishes in general.
Also, men don't live forever, so it actually makes rational sense for them to exploit a resource as much as possible, and to leave future generations on the hook.

Sometimes glosses over the fact that government officials are voted in, as well as voted out

Some of Rothbard's lines are both hilarious and insightful.

Yet, some can also be misleading.

When he conflates giving all the power and weapons to a random family to govern and rule all other people, that doesn't actually hold as a realistic comparison with the government.

A democratic government is not usually run by the same people for their whole lives.
Just look at Trump, and how he hated being booted out. That was because he had been voted out, and he was losing power.

Mixes libertarianism with laissez-faire capitalism

I love libertarianism.

And I think that equating it with the Austrian school of economics, as well as with total laissez-faire capitalism, is harmful to libertarianism itself.

Libertarianism should stand on its own, separate from economic policies, whether right-wing capitalism, or left-wing collectivism.

For example, I don't believe that during financial crises the government should just "do nothing'.
Many economists, for example, believe that letting Lehman Brothers collapse was a mistake because the fear that ensued paralyzed the markets, and then engulfed "main street" as well.
Crises are also psychological, and simply by providing reassurance and financial backstop, the government can do a lot to help restore confidence in the markets.

Plus, government stimulus during financial crises can also be helpful.

PROS

Books like "For a New Liberty" can be eye-opening to better understand manipulation, power dynamics, and conflicts of interest.

REVIEW

Wow, what a book.

I found out that, minus the economic policies, I am quite close to the libertarian philosophy.
At least when it comes to:

- Victimless "crimes"
- Individual rights above collective rights
- Small governments / small armies / low taxes
- No jingoism, no military intervention, humanity above factions

Overall, "For a New Liberty" was a great read.

SUMMARY

About the Author: Michael Franzese was a capo in the Colombo crime family. He was one of the mob's biggest earners since Al Capone, and the youngest individual on Fortune magazine's "Fifty Biggest Mafia Bosses." Franzese then accepted Jesus Christ, became a practicing Christian, and started working and helping others as a speaker, preacher, and guide.

1. You Can Do It Even Without Education

Says Franzese:

> Without ever earning a bachelor's degree, a master's degree, or a PhD, and in many cases without even graduating from high school, mobsters have managed to operate and dominate legitimate businesses having annual revenues in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

As a matter of fact, mobster might have a hedge on business graduates:

> Mob executives possess unique instincts, a "street sense" that isn't taught in the classrooms at Harvard or the Wharton School of Business. They're acquired through living a lifestyle where almost every day presents a challenge just to survive, where every friend is your potential enemy, where a board meeting just might prove to be your last encounter on earth.

The Machiavellianism and sense of strategizing that you can acquire in the underworld, and especially in organized crime, is indeed probably superior to what most normal businessmen can acquire in business -probably different if you're at the top of fast-moving industry, but that's the exception-.

2. Wise Up: There's No Magica Formula (AKA: Stop Being Duped By Snake Oil Salesmen)

Franzese says there's no magic formula.

People selling magic formulas are turning the marketing heat, and selling you a lie.
Instead, the formula is:

1. Make a plan
2. Work hard
3. Seek the shortest possible road to money

4. Assemble the right crew
5. Motivate that crew to do the best job
6. Get a “consigliere” (ie.: a mentor)

... But Keep a Balanced Life

But, also don’t let work become your only occupation in life. That’s a mistake Franzese has done, together with many more.
Work is only one part of life, and you should enjoy the rest as well, including family and friends.

Says Franzese:

> All the money in the world isn’t of any benefit if you don’t take time to enjoy it.

3. Cut to the Chase: Take the Money

You never “make” money -unless you’re the government or a counterfeiter-.
You take money.

The mobster mentality is that other people’s money belongs to them and they only need to find a way to take it.
Your business plan can use a similar attitude, minus the violence: what’s the quickest way to convince others to give me their money?

4. Keep It Cool: Don’t Run Around Like a Chicken Without A Head

Know what you do well, and do that.

Avoid running around under stress: that’s what those low in power do.

Mobsters always exude an air of power and calm confidence that radiates to the people around them, and that increases their power of influence and persuasion -and the fear factor-.

Also read:

- How to adopt the “executive aura”

> 17 Tips to Exude Exec-Level Confidence at Work

Hire others to do the rest.
Speaking of which:

5. Get An “A Team”

You’re only as good as the people you have around.

That works in two ways:

1. The work they can do for you
2. What your team says about you

Quoting Machiavelli:

> [T]he first opinion which one forms of a prince, and of his understanding, is by observing the men he has around him; and when they are capable and faithful he may always be considered wise, because he has known how to recognize the capable and to keep them faithful. But when they are otherwise one cannot form a good opinion of him, for the prime error which he made was in choosing them.

> The Prince

It might seem incongruous, after quoting Machiavelli, but what's the most important value you should seek for people in your crew?
The most important value you should seek is honesty.

To sum it up with Franzese's words:

> Surrounding yourself with capable people makes you money; it also makes you look smart. Do what you do best, and delegate the rest.

6. Get What You Want, & Make Them Believe They Won

In the mafia, especially at the top, some guys have huge egos.

Plus, there is the "status/pride" element.
Now the mafia might have a particularly high concentration of these men, but you can meet plenty of them in legitimate business as well.

How to deal with them?
Deal with them in a way where you get what you want, but you make them feel like they won.

Read here a good case study:

- Out-negotiating John Gotti

7. Beware of Machiavelli's Trap

Franzese says that the mafia is based on Machiavellian philosophy: the end justifies the means.

The Machiavellian philosophy certainly presents elements that are true and pragmatic, and that will help you achieve success.
But that's only the "bait in the trap".

Says Franzese:

> (The Machiavellian philosophy) creates an atmosphere of deceit, mistrust, and treachery— a place where fear masquerades as loyalty (…) Eventually, any group of people that adheres to such a philosophy will destroy itself from within.

On the Machiavellian famous question of "is it better being hated or loved", Franzese adds and important, and in my opinion very valid perspective:

> When their enemies discover that the strength of the organization is based on the fear of its members, all they need to do is become the ones who are more feared. The loyalty will vanish into thin air, and the poison-tipped spike in Machiavelli's trap of power and control will be revealed.

Basically, Franzese implies that love is harder to develop, but that it lasts longer, it's more resilient (not as easily "transferrable") and, ultimately, potentially more powerful.

My Note: GREAT wisdom on love VS fear, but there was at least some love in the mafia as well
I don't know if I can agree 100% here.
There is plenty of love and camaraderie in the mafia, even after you compute all the backstabbing that goes on. As a matter of fact, that's part of the attraction of the mafia, and part of the glue that keeps it together Treacher does not necessarily invalidate the camaraderie.

Franzese himself admits that he misses the camaraderie the most. And he even admitted that when there was a war going in, he felt like he wanted/had to back to help and support his old family.

8. Machiavelli VS Solomon: Choose Wisely (not like a wiseguy)

Franzese explains the two different life philosophies:

Solomon is about true personal values, doing what's right based on your values and ethics, while Machiavelli is completely devoid of values and ethics unless faking them will help you obtain what really matters: power, money, and end results.

However, don't just yet jump to the conclusion that the Machiavellian philosophy performs better.
Why not necessarily so?

1. The Machiavellian approach can eventually shine through, and make you lose
2. The Machiavellian approach is more effective in the short-term, and can also lead people to adopt approaches that are more about short-term, than long-term growth and power
3. The Machiavellian approach can make your personal life poorer, since your emotional bonds and friendships are inauthentic

Says Franzese:

> The manner in which you live your life—your character and integrity—will ultimately be reflected in the way you run your business, and this might very well matter to your potential consumers or clients. Furthermore, the philosophy you adopt to run your business will have as much an impact on the quality of your life as will your company's level of success or failure.

And he says from his personal experience:

> Integrity and ethics matter in life as well as in business. Trust me here. This is coming from a guy who had a very flawed concept of both. I suffered as a result, and so did my family.

A good video example on long-term VS short-term thinking from Franzese:

Can you do both, sometimes Machiavelli, sometimes Solomon?
I'd honestly say yes, but Franzese says no.
He says:

> If you are trying to have it both ways, you're just fooling yourself. You're being Machiavellian.

9. The Government Is Mafia (Is It?)

Franzese sees parallels between the mafia and the government:

> And as far as the mob is concerned, the government's activities are one big money-raking business.

- Record & collect: evidence is power

Says Frazese about a former and “not-so-honest” associate of his:

> I found out years later that Larry kept a file of all the illegal activity he believed I had engaged in over the eight years we worked together. Knowing I was a prize catch for the feds, I would be his “Get Out of Jail Free card” were he ever to run afoul of the law. And years later he used that file for just that purpose. Although I was acquitted (…) he still managed to cut a sweetheart deal for himself with the feds.

This is a strategy I recommend for people in business as well, and a great weapon to get rid of poor bosses.

- Choose a consigliere that is not too ambitious

Ambitious consiglieres might want to replace you, or give advice best on what’s good for them, their status, and their personal ascension\?

In my opinion, the best consiglieres are older, done their time, and now want to mentor you as father figures.

- Be ready to compromise

When you’re not holding all the cards, compromising is often the only possible solution.

- Listen more, talk less

> I cannot stress enough the importance of becoming a good listener in your dealings. It conditions you to gather information before acting or making a decision that will impact your business

QUOTES

On the “sit-down”:

> The sit-down is so ingrained in a made guy’s vocabulary, it caused one FBI agent listening in on a secretly installed bug to remark, “Do these guys ever decide anything standing up?”

On how many people would like to join the mafia ranks:

> You would not believe how many men would kill (no pun intended) to get their buttons and join the ranks. Fortunately, membership in the life is considered by its members to be a privilege.

But for those who can’t manage to join, it’s a good thing:

> For the wannabe mobster who just might not make the grade, it’s even a better thing. Recruiting a guy who isn’t qualified won’t get him fired. It will get him whacked. The mob doesn’t believe in severance packages.

On playing your strengths and learning your strengths from failures:

> Failure is a tough teacher, but it can teach us our strengths and weaknesses in ways no other teacher can.

Power is everything in Cosa Nostra:

> In La Cosa Nostra success is determined by the accumulation of wealth and the attainment of position. Its formula is simple: money + position = power. Power in that life is viewed as the ultimate achievement of success.

On the mobster entrenched mentality of some:

> My dad, although spending more than thirty years in prison, will tell you he is a successful mobster.

On mobsters criticizing the government and calling politician gangsters:

> "Fat Tony" Salerno, Carmine "the snake" Persico, Paul "Big Paul" Castellano, and even the Dapper Don himself, John Gotti, at one time or another would circle a card table, sipping black coffee with a shot of anisette, and roast our elected officials like there was no tomorrow. "Washington would be rolling over in his grave if he saw the way these bums operate today." "The thieves would all be in front of a firing squad." And—no joke, now—"They call us gangsters; they're the real gangsters."

CONS

- Some conservative talk

Franzese is certainly not a liberal :). Neither am I, but not sure the political talk was a good fit here.

REVIEW

An interesting book in between a business book and a "mob book", brief and to the point.

Presents pretty much all the same points that more popular books like "The Effective Executive" share, but in a far more interesting format.

Underboss: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Underboss" (1999) is the life history of mobster Sammy Gravano up until he turned government witness against his former boss John Gotti and (a good chunk of) his associates in 1991.
"Underboss" is written by Peter Mass, but since it's heavily based on Gravano's own account, it feels like an autobiography.

SUMMARY

About the Author:
Peter Maas was an American journalist and author. He wrote several books about important figures in the criminal words. Much of the book is based upon Sammy "The Bull" Gravano, a gangster in the Gambino family who participated in the hit on former boss Paul Castellano and reached the Underboss position under the newly elected boss John Gotti.

The Beginnings: Learning the Use of Violence & Power

Gravano didn't have an easy childhood.

At school, he used to often be in the middle of problems. Sometimes, self-created, and sometimes, because he'd always fight back any slight.
And he did receive quite sneering and bullying, partially because he was dyslexic and "easy to make fun of".

But he always fought back, and sometimes, he learned that it paid.
He says:

> If someone ridiculed him, he beat him up after school. That instantly ended the slights. "That's when I found out that violence paid," he says. "They stopped laughing."

Power > Violence: It Hit Gravano Hard When He Realized

Two union goons walked into Gravano's shop, and started threatening Sammy's father.

Saviano thought to himself "there is no way I'm gonna get these two bums harm my father". And he armed himself with a gun. But it wasn't needed.
It wasn't needed because Sammy's dad knew the local mafia boss: Zuvito.
Sammy was flabbergasted.
He thought:

> What good's he?
> He's a frail little old guy, half the size of my dad. A strong wind would knock him right off his feet. I don't > know Cosa Nostra. I don't know Zuvito's power. I'm a kid. I'm with a gang. My thing is to fight with my fists.

And, lo and behold, the two goons go back and apologize a million times, plus pledge their help in case Sammy's dad needed anything.
All because of Zuvito.
And that made Sammy all the more interested in understanding -and possibly acquiring- that type of power:

> "That really opened my appetite to know more about Zuvito, what the hell he was, what made him so feared. Boy, I thought, wasn't it something to be that physically unimposing and still have that kind of power and strength? I really didn't understand it then.

Sammy was obviously a guy who enjoyed power.

Pick Your Battles: Avoid Being In Constant War

Gravano was impulsive, in some ways.

And he did sometimes act impulsively, almost always because of honor, revenge, and keeping his status and rep as a honorable, tough guy.

But he wasn't impulsive all the times, and he was also smart.
Most of the times, he knew when to step back, and when to find alternative solutions to escalations.
For example:

> He was robbing us blind, the cocksucker. "Now Ralph Spero ain't a made guy. But it's an awkward situation. He's Shorty's brother and I'm with Shorty. I decide it was better to sell the joint, get the fuck out. (…) I tried to avoid confrontations (…) there's enough people to shoot in the head without looking for it all the time.

If People Don't Respect Their Partner, They're Not Going to Respect You

On keeping your partner's honor:

> "Once he told me that Carlo Gambino had spotted him in some restaurant with a girlfriend, whatever, and Carlo had called him over. In Italian, Carlo said, 'Where's your wife? What are you doing with this putana in a place like this where you're seen by people who know you and your wife? Don't you have any shame? Don't you have any pride? Don't you have any respect for your wife?' "Toddo didn't take offense. He thought Carlo was right and he was wrong. If you couldn't be loyal to your wife and your children, how could you be loyal to Our Thing.

Why would you avoid that?
Honor:

> He wasn't talking about somebody who just goes with a woman on the side. Every man, I think, does that at one point or another. But you don't flaunt it. Put some shade on it. Like your wife could walk into a beauty parlor and other women are going to be there laughing behind her back. You put her in this position. You're the one who belittled her. You want to sneak away somewhere, sneak away.

Machiavellian Strategy: Send a Double Agent

Old trick, but always valuable.

A double agent is someone who is on your side, but who pretends to be dissatisfied by you, and ready to turn on you, badmouth you, or generally happy to hear others complain about you.

Then, the double agent will report everything back to you.

Says Gravano:

> "To keep tabs on him when I'm not around, I have Mike DeBatt play up to him. He tells Fiala that he wants to continue to work for him as a bouncer, how I always underpaid him. And now I know Fiala doesn't have a clue who I actually am. He's saying to Mike behind my back, 'Fuck this Sammy. Fuck this punk. When I take over, I'm doing this, that.'

Fiala's mistakes:

1. Not checking who Gravano was
2. Running his mouth

Social Strategy: Don't Badmouth Your Frenemy (or he turns into an enemy)

Paul made a big mistake: he let word out that he didn't like John Gotti.

Now from a "frenemy", he pushes Gotti further and further into full enemy.

When Paul started talking, the word started spreading that he was going to demote John. And you know what demotion means in the mafia: it might as well be the prelude to getting whacked.
Says Gravano:

> Paul is already talking about when Neil dies, he's going to close down the Ravenite. He's going to break John down to a soldier, stick him somewhere in a crew, maybe under Joe Butch, and treat him like a fucking hard-on. Without even being dead, he's finished. "Then there is the possibility they would move on John and kill him.

What do you think that's going to do for John and his crew?
John was below Paul, but he had his own crew as well, he had people around him who liked and supported him.

When those rumors spread, for John Gotti it started being a matter of "kill or get killed". And that certainly pushed him hard to look for a way to attempt at Castellano's life.

Machiavellian Tip: Don't Go Overboard With Machiavellianism...

… And never flaunt it!

Says Gravano, talking about John Gotti:

> "'Listen to me,' he says. 'Keep them broke. Keep them hungry. Don't make them too fat.' "I can play Machiavellian like John—John was always quoting Machiavelli, I guess he did read him

I don't know if this is true, to be honest. It might be, or it might not. Still, it's not the type of advice you want to give to your underbosses, because that signals you're not a true collaborator.
It signals that you want obedience and that you are ready to deploy highly value-taking, coercive, and abusive ways to reach your power goals.

And that decreases your social capital, your persuasive power, and increases the odds of a betrayal.

Take the Loss: It's Good For Long-Term Business

Sammy was in construction, and one project was turning out to be a loser.

His business partner advised him to pull out and cut the losses.
Sammy replied:

> 'You're right, they can't do nothing, but you know what will happen with that? Everybody in the world will hear about it. For everybody in the world we do work with, it'll be Sammy does work and makes money, all well and good. If he loses money, he'll abandon you. How do you think that'll sit with people, Eddie? This will be the best two hundred thousand I'll ever spend because people will say not only is Sammy qualified to do the job, but he'll stay with you, win or lose.' "'That's important to businesspeople, Eddie,' I said. 'That's why you were never successful in business. Because you scheme too fucking much.'

"Because you scheme too F. much": let that be your warning.

Leadership Tip: Don't Isolate Yourself (or you get whacked)

Let me preface this:

In a way, Paul Castellano was a genius businessman.

The mafia has a great advantage in doing business: it can threaten, strong arm, intimidate and, if needed, resort to violence, exact revenge, or corrupt juries if it goes to court.
And Castellano was one of the best bosses in leveraging that "criminal edge" to expand the Gambino's empire into legitimate and semi-legitimate businesses.

However, a skilled businessman doesn't necessarily make for a great leader.
And especially not for a crime family.
That's where gambino failed: as a mafia boss.

Let's start with the first mistake: isolation.

Gravano says that Paul Castellano died, in good part, because he self-isolated from the family:

> Castellano's mansion on the hill perfectly symbolized a growing reclusiveness that over time would ultimately prove to be his undoing. By effectively abandoning his presence in the family's social clubs, he began to lose touch with the pulse of the streets (…) He saw himself as a man with far-flung business interests. This led to a widening division

Leadership Tip: Be Like Your Team (or you get whacked)

Paul Gravano was unlike the gangsters in his crew.
Says Gravano:

> He didn't understand gangsters. He didn't understand what the fuck it was to be broke, to have to go out and rob and do certain things. He didn't understand what a gangster was all about, obviously. I mean, he didn't really understand gangsters like John Gotti and Angie Ruggiero, or me or Frank DeCicco, anybody who is a real hoodlum or gangster in that sense of the word.

Still, in the beginning, Gravano thought highly of Castellano. He thought he was intelligent and wise, and knew how to move.
But Castellano made too many mistakes, and instead of being seen as smart and beyond being a gangster, he highlighted how he was the opposite.

For example:

> "Afterwards, Toddo told me Paul had said to him, 'What's with this Sammy, going out on a hit in his condition? I thought he would just assign his people to the contract.' 'What can I tell you?' Toddo said. 'He's got the balls of a fucking elephant.' Toddo said Paul kept shaking his head, like he couldn't get over it.

Paul doesn't understand that for Sammy doing the hit himself was a question of honor.
Guys like Sammy want to hit back, as soon as possible. By "not understanding", Castellano was also saying "I'm different than all these guys". And people don't want leaders who are too different from who they are.

Read more on leadership psychology:

> How to Be A Leader: 13 Laws From Social-Psychology

And read here a primer on leadership.

Leadership Tip: Don't Badmouth Your Team Members

Says Gravano:

> "When I broke my ankle with that biker, the first thing out of Paul's mouth was 'Sammy, what were you doing in there? You're a made guy. You don't belong in those clubs anymore. This is beneath you.' "I said, 'Paul, it's my club. I'm trying to put things together.

See what that idiot of Paul did there?
He indirectly told Gravano he was a failure for managing clubs. How's Gravano supposed to feel when his boss says that? He's going to dislike him, of course, because thas is offensive.

And he pushed down the people in his team both directly, and behind their back.
For example:

> Even with Frankie DeCicco, when there was a business partnership we wanted to go in, Paul says, 'Frankie? Frankie's a gambler. He's a street dog, Sammy.' This was Paul's mentality.

See?
Those guys are going to be in business with Frankie, and now they're going to feel like they're in business with a street dog. Even if they don't tell Frankie that, they still feel demeaned by their boss.
Plus, the boss loses status by behaving "un-leader like". Leaders don't crap on their own teams!

Leadership Tip: Earn the Respect of Your Team

Paul Castellano had an issue:

People didn't really recognize him as a gangster.
And if your crew is made up of a large chunk of gangasters, that can become an issue.

He could have worked around it, or done something about it. Instead, he compounded that issue.
Says Sammy:

> —all the guys in the family who regularly killed for Paul, the guys Paul sent out when he wanted somebody hit. "And Paul says, 'You know who the true tough guys are? The cops. "You could have heard a pin drop (…) "As we walked out, Roy DeMeo, said, 'Next time he's got a hit, he should send in the fucking cops!' "Paul was so out of it, saying a true tough guy is really a cop. That's not a gangster talking. You don't tell a gangster > something like that.

So not only was Paul not earning the respect of his gangaster crew, he expanded on the thread of:

- Not understanding gangsters
- Not respecting gangsters
- Being a poor gangster

If you are unlike your team, and if your team can't look up to you, that's already an issue.
But if the team starts to feel put down and embarrassed by what you say, then you are going to lose power as their boss.
And, eventually, your team might turn on you.

Ideally, great bosses are great at what their own team members do, or have been great at the past or -Castellano only had a couple of failed stick-ups-.
Failed that, at least, the leader should respect and recognizes the contribution of his team -Castellano seemed to scoff at the gangster way and preferred to be seen as an "industrial magnate"-. That created a major rift.

Leadership Tip: Don't Steal From Your Team

Might sound like an obvious tip, but it's not so obvious.

Once you have the power to steal, then stealing also becomes possible and might become more "normal".

Paul Castellano received $40.000 from Gravano twice, by mistake. And he never gave back to Sammy what was rightfully his.
This is how Sammy put it:

> "He said, 'This guy gets his hands on money, he never gives it back. He's never bringing up that forty again.' "I said, 'Are you nuts, Frankie? He's got a trillion dollars (…) You mean to tell me he's keeping my end?' "Frankie said, 'I tell you what. A steak dinner he never brings it up.' We shook hands. It's a bet. "Well, I bought Frankie the steak dinner. I couldn't believe it. That bum kept the forty thousand.

Do you think that increased trust and loyalty in Sammy, or decreased it?
Obviously, it decreased trust.

Furthermore, Paul was skimming for himself, and lining up his pockets. That meant "taking away from the family", and destroyed trust and any social capital Paul had with the family.

Leadership Tip: Defend Your Team

Yet another mistake from Paul Castellano was to not defend his team.

Says Gravano:

> It was as if Castellano, beset by the unrest brewing in his own family, was seeking allies in other families. "We had this captain up in Connecticut," (…) The Genovese people hated him because he was their competition. They come up with some concocted story about how he was a real pain in the ass. They want permission from Paul to hit him and he gives it and they do kill him. For being a thorn in their side and a pain in the ass? He was doing his job for our family. He was doing what he was supposed to do. And Paul gave him up, a captain in our family, in two seconds, against every Cosa Nostra rule.

How are other team members supposed to feel about that behavior? Like they are worthless pawns for his leader, and that they can be sold at the drop of a hat.

Instead, show that you're on the side of your team, and ready to support them.

Indeed, Gravano says later:

> "It was a big disgrace for the family. A real black eye. You give him up in five minutes to the Genovese family? Would you want your father giving you up like that? That was a bad, bad move Paul made. A real bad move. You want to know your boss is going to fight for you tooth and nail. But now you're not so sure anymore. Probably, he thought it was a good move business-wise or racketeering-wise, but gangsters don't think like that.

Leadership Tip: Keep Your Ego in Check

Leaders who do it for the team command more resources from that team.

Leaders who put "me" first tend to attract a few groupies, but they tend to lose social capital from more high-quality individuals who don't fall for that "great man" myth.
Says Gravano:

> "That's why all the old foxes in Cosa Nostra hated him. And a lot of the bosses. It wasn't the life. Just like when we said Paul Castellano was being selfish about money, this was equally selfish. Because it was for me, me, me. It wasn't for Cosa Nostra. Cosa Nostra was supposed to be family. Not me, me, me.

Leadership Tip: Admit Your Mistakes

Mistakes and corrections are crucial aspects of power dynamics.

Some mistakes can decrease your status and authority.
Yet, never admitting mistakes also decreases social capital. Says Gravano:

> "All John had to do was come to me once during that eleven months we were in there together and say, 'Sammy, I'm sorry. My big fucking mouth got you indicted, number one. Number two, let's try to get a severance for you, so you could fight your case. Fuck the public. Let's try to fight this so that one of us, all of us, a couple of us, get out of this fucking mess. "If he done that, I would have never cooperated with the government, not in a million years would I have cooperated.

We don't know if what Gravano says is true.
He might have cooperated anyway, who knows. But never admitting mistakes is dangerous for a leader, while taking ownership of mistakes can be a fantastic tool to increase trust and increase one's own social power and persuasion.

Political Savvy Tip: Watch Out For Your Boss' Tests

In the mafia, where scheming and plotting are embedded in the life, testing others can make the difference between life and death.

Here's how Paul tested Gravano:

> Paul threw down a newspaper in front of me. It was open to a page. 'Here, read this,' he said, walking all around. The story was about Roy DeMeo being found in the trunk of a car. "'What do you think of that?' he said. He don't know that I know that he gave the order. He's being devious. He wants to see my feelings. Like > maybe I would say, 'Hey, Roy was my best friend. I'm going to get even with whoever the fuck did this.' He's trying to gauge my reaction.

How did Gravano react?
He took the opportunity, of course.

First off, he didn't react too quickly, or that would have seeemed fake.
Instead, he read the newspaper first, and then:

> "So what I did as soon as I got done reading the article, I looked at him and said, 'Paul, if you're mad, I'm mad. If you ain't mad,' I said, putting the paper aside, 'I don't give a fuck.' "He looked at me and said, 'Oh, all right. You want something else with the coffee?' Those were his exact words and it was over and done with. I guess he was happy

Genius.

Life Strategy: Make Friends, Not Enemies (& Don't One-Up)

This is John Gotti, one-upping the people around and beneath him, making them feel bad, inferior… And resentful:

> Although, on the surface, Willie Boy played the obedient Tonto to Gotti's Lone Ranger, he seemed to take special pleasure in reporting what Gotti was up to. Gotti's idea of humor left plenty to be desired. And Johnson seethed with resentment as Gotti delivered derisive asides about "redskins" and "half-breeds" and often treated him as a second-class citizen.

This guy testified only against Gotti.

Divide & Conquer Social Strategy

An interesting power move by Paul Castellano:

> At this meeting, Paul mouths off that he should have had Sammy killed over the Fiala situation. This was classic Paul—divide and conquer. Paul saw and seized an opportunity to drive a wedge between us. The Fiala business was history. But Louie figured that it wasn't resolved in Paul's mind and panicked. He thought if Sammy's going to be killed, he'll be killed as well. He took Paul's word at face value. He don't know Paul well enough to know that Paul was just talking.

Basically, Paul made Louie think he might have ordered a hit on Sammy. And he thought that if he was too close to Sammy, he was in danger as well.
Result?
He saw a risk in being too close to Sammy, and he saw an opportunity in distancing himself.

Don't Believe The Hype

One of the reasons Gotti fell, and one of the reasons why he ultimately weakened his family and mafia in general, is that he fell victim to his own hype.

Says Gravano:

> I've seen a lot of smart people do stupid things because of an ego. John was no different. After a while you get power-struck. He started believing these newspaper and magazine articles, what they were saying about him on television. He went past having a big ego. You're talking now about an egomaniac. He don't want to hear the truth. He's not looking for it. He's looking for people to say what he wants to hear. Not only was the media having a love affair with him, he was having it with himself.

As a matter of fact, the more you become successful, the more you must be careful about ego and hype.

WISDOM

- Structure and collaboration = power

> In 1931, warring factions of the Italian underworld, primarily Sicilian and Neapolitan, came together to form Cosa Nostra. This union enabled it to completely dominate organized crime.

Also read: strategies of power.

- Be smart, and street-smart

Says Gravano:

> You can't be a thug forever if you want to get ahead. Somewhere along the line, you have to learn to be a racketeer as well. You can be both.

- Your family doesn't determine your path

Gravano had loving parents. And his father valued and rewarded honest working. He told Sammy several times. But Sammy seemed to have been "born" to be a gangster.

- Teachers can help save children

Gravano, an undiagnosed dyslexic, had been kicked out from school, branded as a "lost case" by most teachers, and was ready to give up on school.
But one teacher almost saved him, restored his faith in himself and helped him catch up.
Says Gravano:

> Because here's a guy who's put such an effort, an honest effort, into you, and you wanted to make him look good

But then he moved yet again, and it was back to the same usual thing of teachers giving up on him.

- Always listen to both sides

Gravano's mentor took him under his wings.
And right after he received one local man seeking help:

> I'll get back to you in a day or two.' "After the guy leaves, Toddo looks at me and says, 'Assume you were me, what would you do?' "I said, 'I'd get a couple of guys with some bats and send them over and break this other guy's legs. I'd break everything he's got.' "'Good,' Toddo says. 'You got balls. And you're young and you're stupid.'
> 'You know those things attached to the sides of your head? Those ears? Use them. Remember that in life.

> Listen with both ears. You listen to one story. You listen to the other one.

- Justice inner works have a lot to do with power dynamics

"Underboss" shows that who the prosecutors go after, and what they're ready to do for it, has a lot to do with "what's in it for me":

> "This D.A., this bum Eugene Gold, who would get caught molesting some kid, don't give a fuck about anybody except Mimi. He sees big headlines with Mimi. And this assistant D.A. comes to me and he says if I flip, if I testify against Mimi, I get a total walk. I'm out of the whole thing.

This isn't just Gravano talking, by the way.
The simple fact that Gravano, who committed 19 murders got away with 5 years and a cushy witness protection program says a lot about how justice works.

- If you're in criminal organizations, keep your mouth shout

> Like Toddo Aurello once said, 'You do a hit, it's over and done with. You talk about it and you're doing it again. And it could wind up on tape.'"

And it worked for Sammy:

> when the state's organized crime task force eventually did decide to bug the office, thousands of hours of recorded conversations produced nothing of evidentiary value.

- Machiavellian move: do good deeds if your name will be linked to it

Says Sammy:

> "Then John made another play. He said that Cosa Nostra had to replenish our ranks. He brought up the fact that the Genovese family had forty replacements to make and hadn't made any new members for a very, very long time. John figured if he could get Chin to agree to make these forty guys, he would leak it that he was behind them being made and they would ultimately look to John.

Chin being a smart guy, he said that "he appreciated John's thought, and that he would make new made men when he thought it was appropriate".

- To have a top organization, you need top people

One of the reasons the mafia was so successful in the underworld is that they enforced and maintained certain rules of conduct and certain expectations from their people.
Compare it to the Irish gangs, for example. Says Gravano:

> "They were just supposed to give this O'Connor a serious beating," Sammy said. "But a lot of the Westies were all fucked-up, drug addicts and drunks. And they end up shooting O'Connor in his legs and ass for whatever reason. So now when the D.A. eventually gets into this, it's a major thing."

QUOTES

On himself using racial slurs but not being racist:

> Now I use words all the time like nigger, spick, Polack, jewboy, Mick, even greaseball, which is people from Italy. That's just the way you talk on the street. I don't think I'm racist. But these rednecks, they are real hard core.

On the gender split of the hairdresser's school he (half-)attended to get government money:

> There's about six hundred girls in there, full-time and part-time. And only five guys, including me. Two of them are stone faggots. You can consider them women.

How a street cred helps collect money:

> When you're dealing at that level, you're lending to the bottom of the barrel (…) But even so, during those years, there's only two people I had to hit to collect. Physically hit, I mean. Only two people. I think that says something about the reputation I had.

On the intricacies, Machiavellianism, friendship, and betrayal all embedded in the mafia, at once:

> That was some irony there. Here was Joe Colucci joking and drinking it up with Tommy, who was coming on to his wife, the guy Joe wanted dead. Here was Frankie, who was in on both sides of the story. And here was me, on my first hit, the hunter and the hunted, all at once. Just another day in the life of organized crime.

On the mentality of Gravano, notice what he says at the end:

> Joe Colucci was dead. He looked like he was sleeping. He looked peaceful. You going to blow me away now? I thought.

On how he felt after his first hit:

> But then I felt a surge of power. I realized that I had taken a human life, that I had the power over life and death. I was a predator. I was an animal. I was Cosa Nostra.

Marry the good girl.
It's especially a good idea to keep you balanced.
Talking about her future wife she saw in a club:

> But I'm watching Debbie. She looks so out of her element in that place. I mean, I'm used to seeing a certain kind of woman in there and she is not that kind of woman. She seems so fresh, so innocent. More than anything, that's what caught my attention.
> I saw her in the kitchen. She had an apron on, she looked like a little housemother, cooking away, cooking and tasting the sauce and the sausage and the macaroni. She was so different from the sluts that I'm dealing with every other minute at the club.

On the friction between "honor" and "criminality":

> Toddo was an honest man within the life. It may be hard to understand that. He was a gangster and a crook, but to us he had honor.

And a good video:

> Her: Don't you see the irony of Sammy the Bull pleased that people have good manners?
> Him: That's because you're not a mobster and never was

What a genius retort.

Again, on honor:

> Gotti was a big-time player and a big-time loser. He always paid his debts, not out of some moral sense but because to do otherwise would bring about immediate dishonor in mob circles.

On Gravano being the happiest when he became a made man (and this was a man who was already a father by then):

> They're calling one guy at a time to go to the basement. I'm as high as a kite. I mean, this is the biggest day of my life, especially at that point. Finally, I'm told, 'Sammy, we want you to come down.' "I'm nervous as hell, but happy nervous.

Again on mafia, even including the betrayal, still also being about honor and brotherhood in the mind of (some) of its members (even while Gravano himself says that he realized late it was BS, it was no less real):

> "I bought this all one hundred thousand percent. I really felt that I belonged to a brotherhood that had honor and respect. All the things I looked for in life was in a good part of that oath.

On the unfair advantage of using threats and fear doing business:

> When the immensely wealthy owner of the Waldbaum chain that bore his name was asked by a presidential commission on organized crime how he could have knuckled under to the Mafia, he replied, "Don't forget I > have a wife and children."

On honor and "dying with honor":

> Like the man he was, the man I had come to understand him to be, the man I'd learned to respect over the past hours, he accepted this without comment. I felt terrible that a man with such balls had to be hit. But this was Cosa Nostra. (…) He died with dignity. He died Cosa Nostra.

A funny quote:

> Unhappy with what he considered to be sloppy management, Sammy decided to take over the whole operation and got rid of the four original owners. "I just bullied my way in. I said I was going to make them an offer they couldn't refuse. I didn't have to explain. I imagine they all saw The Godfather.

When a hit needs to be done, to make sure it's done, it's the killed life, or the killer's life:

> These two guys have got to go. 'Don't worry about the cops,' he says, 'because if you run and these guys ain't dead, we'll kill you.'"

On negotiation and the advantages of "paying in installments":

> The head of the Westies had come to Sammy and told him that he knew someone on the jury who was available for a price. "How much of a price?" Sammy asked. The answer was $120,000. Ever the negotiator, Sammy whittled it down to $60,000, payable in installments. You never knew, he figured. The guy could get sick or something.

On Gotti wanting to be "known" (funny):

> Piecyk found two cops and said that he had just been beaten and robbed. He led them back to the bar and pointed out Gotti and Colletta as his assailants. As Gotti was being handcuffed by one of the cops, he demanded, "Don't you know who I am?" To his evident displeasure, the cop replied, "No, and I don't care."

(but that Piecyk later recanted and withdrew his complaint once he realized who it was).

PROS

- True page turner: the most exciting, enthralling book I've read in a long time
- Deep lessons: if you can read between the lines -important "IF"!-, it contains some of the best lessons learned on strategies, leadership, and Machiavellianism

CONS

For as much as I loved this book, there also important cons:

- Self-serving in justifying his own "snitching"

Sammy turned informant, which is a big no-no in that life for anyone, and especially for someone at his level.

He justifies his choice by blaming it on Gotti and "the life" that was all fake, he says.

But this is what Michael Franzese, a former mobster who did not put anyone in prison, said about Sammy "turning":

Sammy also laid it on thick on John Gotti.

Gotti wasn't perfect, for sure, and as far as I know, Gravano might be partially right. Yet, some of the accusations he moves to Gotti feel so exaggerated that you'd just think they're fake.

Even some of the reasons he provides for disliking Gotti feel conveniently self-serving.
He says he started disliking Gotti because he cheered for Iraq in the Iraqui war, while Gravano instead didn't want "our kids", the American soldiers, to die.
Then Gravano was given a military jacket when it was raining outside and he happened to "remember" his days in the army, and now he felt so "American and patriotic".

What a convenient narrative though, eh?

- Some parts of the story don't add up

Some elements don't add up.

When Gravano told his wife and daughter he was going to collaborate, his daughter turned hysterical.
And his own wife decided and told him right there and then that she wouldn't go with him under witness protection.

Why not?

Gravano paints a picture of a loving wife.
But that's not how a loving wife behaves. She wouldn't leave the moment she gets to know that he was going to join the family again sooner rather than later.

- Paul Maas own opinions feel like empty and shallow moralizing

Says the author:

> The fictional Godfather was myth-making at its most compelling (…) Never mind that loyalty and honor played no part in the actual Cosa Nostra. Perceived reality was what mattered.

That's the author's own opinion.
But it's not true, and his own book disproves it. Even for Gravano, who later testified, honor was a big part of that life -just read the quote-.

Many of those guys' goals was to "be a man's man", to be honorable and respected.

Yes, you might say "honor" was, at least to some extent, a manipulative tool to increase cooperation from others while leaving down the door open for individual's defection.
But it was still part of that life, and of its allure.

REVIEW

"Underboss" is the book I devoured the quickest in the last year.

It's because I usually read "heavier" books, while this is more the type of book that you read for personal pleasure.
Yet, there are more lessons learned in "Underboss" than in most self-development books.

Especially, "Underboss" is a treasure trove for power dynamics, social strategies, and Machiavellianism.

8. Women Who Love Too Much

By Robin Norwood

Review

Frankly, only a minority of women fall in the "women who love too much" category.

Still, albeit the numbers may be low, the downsides of being one of them are very large, so it might make sense to give this wonderful book a read.

> Quote: The choice is yours. If you choose to begin the process of recovery, you will change from a woman > who loves someone else so much it hurts into a woman who loves herself enough to stop the pain.

7. Will I Ever Be Good Enough

By Karil Mcbride
Review

Same as above: few women are the daughters of narcissistic mothers.
But the reasons why this wonderful book makes the list of “best self-help books for women” are twofold:

1. Untreated lack of maternal love be disastrous
2. It makes a good guide on one of the most harmful mistake a mother can make

> Quote: Most damaging is that a narcissistic mother never approves of her daughter simply for being herself, which the daughter desperately needs in order to grow into a confident woman.

6. Who’s Pulling Your Strings

5. The Woman's Guide to How Men Think

By Shawn Smith
Review

We've seen a few books to avoid the value-taker.
Now a book to understand the male point of view in relationships.

Smith says he writes from the point of view "good men", such as manly men who invest, but also strive to better themselves and their lives outside of the relationship, and I think he does a good job at that.

This book can help you understand male psychology in a practical way that will help improve your relationship.

> Quote: Good men are dutiful men. They want to be effective in their lives, their careers, and their relationships.

4. Assertiveness For Women

By Julie Hanks
Review

Assertiveness is as important to men, as it is women -OK, it's even more important for men, but still very important for women as well-.

On the con side, unluckily the author of this book seems to buy into the current (unhelpful) culture that men and women should be the same, so we don't get a book that is about assertiveness and femininity at the same time.
On the plus side, it's still a great book.

2. Hardball For Women

By Pat Heim
Review

OK, we've seen plenty of books about dating and relationships.

And before anyone writes me saying "women aren't only interested in finding a good man" :), here is one of the best books for women who seek business success.

Let me preface by saying that "Hardball for Women" is best for women in business, but female entrepreneurs will still have much to learn.
If the previous book was about "understanding men in relationships", this is about "understanding men in business". And since most businesses are still dominated by men -and will likely be so in the future-, then this is an important read for women.

Also read:

- Career University: simply the best resource for women who seek career success
- How to Win at Work: the businesswoman's guide to winning at work
- How Men Keep Women Down: intersexual competition focused on the workplace

> Quote: Power is an uncomfortable subject for many. In fact, women tell us they don't want to deal with that "power stuff" because they aren't "power hungry." They act as if power is a social disease to be avoided at all costs.

1. The Myth of The Nice Girl

By Fran Hauser

Mandatory reading if you're going for "Hardball for Women" or similar titles like "Nice Girls Don't Get the Corner Office".

Why?
Because these books are teaching women to be more like men.

But that's not the solution.
Or, at least, it comes with some major downsides.
Much better is to seek personal success while also retaining femininity, which is a power tool of its own.

Fran Hauser calls the mindset of "having to be tough to succeed" a "myth".
She says instead that she's achieved plenty of success while still being kind and caring.

Also read:

- How to be feminine: the basic "start here" resource
- How to combine power and femininity: a preview from "Power University"

> Quote: Make them a part of the process. By making it clear that you are looking to collaborate instead of compete, you'll earn their trust and their respect.

Be Careful With:

Plenty of books are advertised as "by women, for women".

Still, that it's written by a woman and for women doesn't necessarily make it empowering for women.

Here are some titles to be careful with:

- Girl Wash Your Face: OK book with a lot of general self-help principles. But watch out for that re-hashed thing of "be confident".

- Daring Greatly: Great book, actually. But you need to be aware of the limitations of vulnerabilities. And an antifragile ego is a far better tool against shame.

Avoid These Traps:

- The Universe Has Your Back: you're better off making sure, rather than trusting. Trusting might you make feel better, but won't necessarily make you better off.
- The Secret: just skip it
- Unleash Your Inner Money Babe: the full title of this book should tell you everything: "Uplevel Your Money Mindset and Manifest $1,000 in 21 Days"
- Lucky Bitch / Get Rich Lucky Bitch: the only one who might get rich is the author. But you'll most likely stay poor with the law of attraction (plus: never buy a book that calls you, the buyer, a "bitch").

Permission to be frank here:

These books are the real reason why women earn less than men.

Yes, there might be some bias in the gender gap, and a good chunk of that gap is because of different evolutionary drives.
But a part of that is also because men are less likely to fall for the BS spouted by the above books.

Successful men don't waste their time wishing to wish things into reality.
They make plans grounded on reality, they seek reality-based feedback -however harsh that might be-, and they work to turn their wishes into reality.

They don't say "the universe has my back", they say "I'm gonna make a dent in the university".
Big freaking difference, no?

Luckily, if you're reading here, you're a smart gal, so you're less likely to fall for the above.
And with this list -and this website-, you have all the best tools available to you for a successful and happy life.

The Science of “Alpha Fucks Beta Bucks” (Facts VS Myths)

Lucio Buffalmano · 24 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Alpha fucks beta bucks is a red pill maxim describing foundational sexual marketplace dynamics.

In brief, it means that alpha males enjoy free, easy, and abundant sexual access to women, while beta males struggle despite their expensive courtship efforts.

That’s “alpha fucks, beta bucks” in a nutshell.

But… Is it true?

As for many red pill maxim, it’s partly true.
And it’s partly misleading when, as if it’s often the case, is interpreted with black-and-white generalizations.

So let’s clarify.

Intro & Science

We define "alpha fucks, beta bucks" dynamics as:

> A pattern of dominant and high value men gaining quick sexual access with little investment, while lower value men must wait and offer various types of resources.

Despite the simplification, the mantra is not completely wrong.
It's even described by Campbell (2020) in The Cambridge Handbook of Evolutionary Perspectives:

> Although the selective forces that led to widespread human pair-bonding are debated, Gavrilets (2012) found support for a plausible model that showed that, if females were willing to forego extra-pair matings and preferred males who provided resources, male provisioning would increase driven chiefly by low-ranking males who would otherwise fail to reproduce at all.

In simpler words, it says that lower value men provision/buck.
And although Campbell presents it as a theoretical model, logic and experience offer good support.

Alpha Short Term, Beta Long Term

Dating can be divided into two large sub-domains:

1. Short-term, often fast, uncommitted, no strings attached
2. Long-term, often slower courtship, committed, strings attached

While many men would love to engage in short-term, uncommitted sex, few can.

Research shows that women have different preferences for short-term and long-term.
Dominance sees the largest upregulation from long-term to short-term (Brown et al, 2022).

So men who can enjoy short-term casual sex tend to be attractive, interpersonally dominant leaders ('alphas').

Lower mate value men instead must play the long-term game, and commit and stick with a single woman.

Related Concept: Dual Mating Strategy & Ovulatory Shift

"Alpha fucks, beta bucks" is related to:

- Dual sexuality model: The theory that women evolved to pursue long-term partners for resources and stability, while seeking short-term mates with high genetic fitness—often covertly, and especially near ovulation (Gangestad & Tornehill, 2008)
- Ovulatory shift: The theory that women are most attracted to 'alpha types' during ovulation. Hormones largely govern the ovulatory shift
- Infidelity patterns: Women marry the 'beta types' providers, but seek to cheat with the 'alpha types', especially during ovulation

Behaviorally, it means: "lock in a lower-status "beta" to support you, while reproducing with a more attractive

"alpha".

While we believe there may be some uncomfortable truths in these theories, reality is more nuanced.
Empirically, the latest Oxford Handbook of Evolutionary Psychology states that the evidence for dual sexuality is mixed.
Evidence is even more mixed for the Ovulatory Shift Hypothesis'.

However, "alpha f*cks, beta bucks" doesn't require any other theory because the main premise is simpler: that 'alpha types' experience a much different mating life than 'beta types'.

So in this article, we'll stick instead to the more practical ramifications of "alpha f*cks, beta bucks".

Let's start with an overview:

A More Nuanced Reality

Reality is complex.

And while simple models are perfectly valid, simplistic models can inject too many distortions.

To begin with, alpha and beta are wrong.
A slight improvement would be to use the correct categories:

This is also an over-simplification, but it's a step forward
But for the sake of brevity and simplicity, let's imagine:

- Alpha male is high-value, attractive, dominant, and confident
- Beta male is low-value, unattractive, submissive, self-doubting

Corollary 1: Alphas fuck more (true)

The first corollary of the maxim is that alpha males have or can have more sex.

If the alpha male is more attractive, charismatic, confident, higher status, a leader etc. etc., then this is so obviously true.

At parity of everything else, alpha males have easier access to sex.

Exception: Variety VS frequency, when betas have more sex

General population-level rules always have individual-level exceptions, of course.

But even at the population level, there is one important exception.

I'll give you an example:

As a kid, I remember two older brothers bragging of sexual success.
Each of them claimed to have more sex and… They were both right.

How was that possible?

Well, the older one was far "cooler" and "alpha". But he was mostly single because he sought diversity of sexual partners.
The younger one had a stable girlfriend.
So while the alpha had to find a new sexual partner, the younger brother was getting laid consistently (close to 100% of the times he'd meet his girlfriend).

So the single alpha who seeks variety as a single man might end up with a far higher sexual partners count, but fewer overall sex-session count as compared to a less alpha guy who is in a relationship.

But this does not affect the general rule.
Alpha males have better odds of having sex with any new woman than a beta male.

Corollary 2: Alphas fuck with less investment (true)

"Alpha fucks beta bucks" implies that:

Higher mate value men gain sexual access with less investment compared to lower value men.

Let's explain:

In the sexual marketplace, just like any other social exchange, people seek to the get the best available for them.

Men and women assess each other's sexual market value along an array of different traits.
Many of these traits are immediately attractive (think of looks, confidence, dominance, status, etc.).
What happens is that the more attraction-based value you have, the less external value you need to be a 'great option'.

A more attractive man may instead have to add external value to make his offer attractive.

See here a chart:

Lower value men 'make up the difference' not just with 'bucks', but with anything besides his genes/penis.
This is standard 'compensatory investment principle' from the social investment model.

Personal and financial investments are quite different.

Personal investment signals include kindness, listening, asking questions, opening doors, texting often, etc. etc. They're promissory notes of future investment for long-term dating.

Financial investment instead says "If you mate with me, I can support you (and our possible future children)". Signals include paying for dates, driving a good car, picking an expensive restaurant, and maybe talking up their job.

In general, alpha males indeed need less external value to achieve the same result.

Note:
It doesn't mean alphas necessarily invest less, it means alphas can invest less to achieve the same -or better- results as non-alphas.

⍰♂Lucio's Take: Beware: the "zero money" di*khead trap

Lucio:
I was extreme into “not investing”, and it handicapped my dating.

If a girl said she hadn’t eaten yet, I’d insist I had, just to avoid food costs.

There was a period I wouldn’t invest even after intimacy.

I remember once a girl asked “if we could go get pizza” together.
“Pizza”? I thought. You don’t get free handouts from me, I’m just the sex guy.

Compare: I could have enjoyed a pizza with a pretty girl, and made it a better experience for both. Instead, I sent her packing like the worst cheapo dic*head.

Pretty shameful behavior in hindsight ⍰⍰♂.

Corollary 3: Alphas fuck quicker (true)

A third corollary is that alpha males can get to sex faster.

This is also generally true, and now we get into the realm of the lover and the provider as well.
If you need to refresh your mind, see:

- Lovers and providers
- Lover and provider strategies

> Lover VS Provider: How to Pick Your Best Strategy

Let’s clarify this first: alpha males aren’t always lovers, and betas aren’t always providers.

BUT alphas are more able to date as lovers, while betas must rely more on providing.

Lovers and providers work at inherently different speeds.

While the lover approach is attraction-based, the provider must prove himself over a period of time.
Providing is based on "sticking around" within a committed relationship. And to honestly signal future commitment, you need to do that over time.

So once we're into the provider approach to dating, the woman is almost obliged to let him wait to:

1. Ensure he commits and appreciates her
2. Maintain the image of being worthy of that investment

To understand #2, read Madonna/whore dichotomy or watch this video:

Quick detours:

Without mutual attraction, the longer courtship is the only way to get a sexual relationship.
So, strategically, there times and places for the courtship method.

Anyway, again, it's true that, on average, alpha males get to sex quicker, and especially so when they date as lovers.

Corollary 4: Alphas get better fucks (true)

Sex with lovers, based on attraction and without playing 'good girl games', tends to be more disinhibited and passionate.

Studies also show that women are more likely to orgasm when their partner is attractive and very masculine.

Plus, if alphas are more fit and betas are less fit, it naturally follows that sex, a physical activity, tends to be better for alphas.

As usual, there are exceptions, and caveats of course.
Some studies show that partners who induce the highest orgasm rates have traits of a good long-term partner, including greater care and effort.
And emotional intimacy in relationships improves sexual experiences. Especially with less promiscuous women.

Anyway, the general rule stands.

So, where does this maxim fall short then?

Let's see:

Correction 1: Bucks = power

One failure of the maxim is in the interpretation.

Beta bucks puts together the worst stereotype of the man who fails at dating, and the bucks, such as the personal investment and the financial resources.

So some guys wrongly equate the use or display of personal investment or resources to being a loser/beta, but that is not necessarily true.

Let's focus on resources first.

It may be true that in general, lower quality guys are more likely to "pay to play".
But smart men can also leverage resources to increase their dating success. And that's a winner's approach.

Resources by themselves are neither alpha nor beta: resources are an incredible source of power.
Both in life, and in dating.

♂Lucio's Take: money well used is power

Lucio:
Storytelling time.

Some time ago, I was out with a girl.

We snug on a couch when the waitress said, she couldn't get us drinks without food, and implied we had to leave.
I open the menu, point at one dish, and said "OK, bring us this, and two vodka martinis".

That was a high-power way of using resources.
Not to exchange food for intimacy, but to display power.

We barely touched the food, and we didn't even finish the drinks.

Back to mine, I could see she only waited for my move. And since I left the AC on, it ended up in a mess of hot sweat.
One of the best 2020 romps.

Similarly, I had quick sexual encounters replying that 'I pay nothing because it;s mine' hwen women asked about the rent.

Correction 2: Bucks = SMV boost for long-term dating

In general, resources are more valuable for committed and longer-term dating.

For example, take an attractive alpha male who is broke and jobless and a non-attractive beta male who is a billionaire.
The broke alpha might do better in the short term, while the beta billionaire might secure a better long term partner.

Case in point, Elon Musk:

Elon Musk, bullied and on the spectrum, may have been a “beta” in his younger years. Rich, famous, and powerful, he became an alpha

This approach is even more useful for less attractive men, who can leverage resources for secure a higher quality partner—a strategy even openly confirmed in the latest Cambridge Handbook on Sexual Psychology.

P.S.:
Throwing money around can also be a tactic for short term with ‘conspicuous consumption’ (Kenrick et al., 2011), but let’s avoid off-topic.

Correction 3: Bucks = Important for top 1% women

Some believe that displaying resources automatically equals “poor dating”.

But resources can be equally empowering for alphas because alpha dating power is strongest with lower quality women. But it’s more challenging when dating around the same value.
See this chart:

Read more about hypergamy here
Let's simplify again:

For a man who is an 'eight' it's easy to get 'five' fast and without investment -if he's good at least: some lower SMV women might reject themselves first, but let's keep it simple-.

But if that eight is interested in a nine, it won't be a piece of cake anymore.

One, because she's around his same level, and two, because he's competing with other attractive men.
Top women only date top men, so being "alpha" grants no special points anymore.
That is true for the short term and, even more, for relationships.

And that's where resources, status, or commitment can be helpful.

Example: Top 0.1% Dating

Let's make an example.

Take the top Hollywood star of her age—1990's Angelina Jolie.

Now imagine Angelina Jolie dates a hunky personal trainer.

The trainer might be a top option at the bar, but now he's in a different ballgame.
Brad Pitt or DiCaprio may also want Angelina.

Angelina might still take that personal trainer for a spin, but it's on her terms.
She's got the power (unless he studies TPM).
Angelina might even avoid being seen with him to keep a reputation of a classy, unreachable top 0.1% woman.

That personal trainer is outgunned by Brad Pitt, who is a higher value man in Angelina's eyes.

And now:

Imagine Angelina is dating DiCaprio, Gosling, and Pitt, but only Pitt is willing to commit.
Then she will probably pick Pitt, because commitment is valuable to most women.
Fisher in The Cambridge Handbook of Female Adaptations confirms that women even compete for male investment.

That's even true for top women.
It's basic dating dynamics, and research confirms that top women want it all, including bucks, because they can get it.

See the point?
Resources are helpful whenever you're shooting for higher-quality women.

And that's true independently of whether you're a beta, an alpha, or anything in between.

Let's revisit the above chart:

With external value, a 4 can land a 9, and it's a fair, win-win exchange
The same goes for personal investment, including caring and bonding—all positive traits that increase your overall value. Especially for long-term dating.

Also see:

- How to maintain power in relationships

Makes sense?

Example: using resources to change a woman's mind

"Changing her mind" is not something we'd recommend.

But it's a good example to understand intersexual dynamics:

> Him: She kept standing me up (…) so one night (…) I drive her to the airport where my Learjet 25 was (…) she had never been on a private jet (…) flew to NYC, we headed to the Italian restaurant, first time she saw a sight like that (…) it makes an impression

Franzese married her, and she turned out to be a devout and loyal wife.

Correction 4: Granularity, & shades of grey

The last issue with the mantra is the black-and-white generalizations.

Obviously, the world is not just alphas with no-strings-attached sex and betas who invest a lot and never get sex.

In truth, the world is far more shades of grey.

So let's add a few more categories for a better understanding of intersexual dynamics:

Beta Fucks

The beta who never, ever gets any sex is a minority.

It may seem otherwise to younger men because of too much internet and alpha male posturing.

But most "non-alphas" do get some girlfriends.

I can tell you that from personal experience.
When it came to either committing or losing her, I committed to keep a more attractive woman than I was:

Sure as fuck I didn't wanna go to hers for Christmas, but guess what old-me did? :)
Alphas who can sleep with anyone at any time are a tiny minority.
And so are men who never ever fuck.
In truth, the silent majority are various shades of betas who (eventually) fuck.

Alpha Bucks: Wealth For Harems

Top alpha bucks are wealthy men who leverage financial resources for fast and easy sex, without emotiona or time commitment.

They pay for women's lodging, life and expenses just to keep them around "on call" -sexual call-.

As an example, take Berlusconi.

Berlusconi put some of his women in various real estate around Milan.
I don't think he even visited them much. But he'd call them over for his "bunga bunga parties".

While that was a big investment for most men, it's still peanuts for a billionaire.

Paparazzi's picture of Berlusconi's villa

Financial VS Emotional Investment

Alpha bucks show us that:

Financial investment and personal investment are VERY different.

High-order financial investment allows men to avoid any personal investment, including commitment or emotional closeness.

But it's not my style.

Alpha Providers: Family, But No Diapers

While the alpha bucks seek sex and diversity without commitment, alpha providers commit.

They may also marry and have children. BUT… they do not get involved with chores and child-rearing.

Donald Trump is a great example.

Listen to him speak, he makes it very clear:

> Trump: I like kids, I mean, I won't do anything to take care of them
> (…)
> I might even never see the kid

Note how Melania was cool with that (But I advise you not to talk like that publicly).

Alpha Boyfriends: High-Quality Men In Relationships

These are alpha males who prefer relationships.

They invest, commit, and raise children.

Alpha dads are the backbone of civilization because they pursue their mission, while also raising healthy children.

Exceptions always apply, but women who land these men are lucky and happy women.

It's popular to slag Obama's relationship online.
But everyone has their taste, and he's a good example of an alpha husband.

'Alpha types' in relationship also experience a favorable ovulatory shift. Such as, they become more attractive during ovulation.
Write Virginia E. Mitchell and team in the Oxford Handbook of Infidelity:

> women with more sexually desirable partners report feeling closer to their partners and experiencing more relationship satisfaction around ovulation than women who have less sexually desirable partners (Larson et al., 2013)

Blue Pill Alphas

They are alpha males, but clueless of power dynamics, and manipulation dynamics.

Unluckily, success without power awareness is precarious.
And if they meet a more Machiavellian, manipulative woman, they're in trouble.

Exactly what happened to Mike Tyson:

> Interviewer: There was no prenuptial agreement
> Robin: We got married to be together for ever, not to plan for divorce
> (…)
> Robin: It's been hell, Mike Tyson is a manic depressive, he just is, it's a fact, it's been torture > (later divorces him for millions)

It's a stark reminder that being "alpha" is not enough and you must learn the basics of power dynamics.

I'd take "power-aware" over "alpha" any time of the day.

Leadership 101: The Foundations of Good Leadership

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Great leadership starts with mastering the fundamentals.

Whether you're managing a team or aiming to inspire others, understanding core principles like social exchange, social power dynamics, and high-value mindsets is essential.

This Leadership 101 guide breaks down these critical concepts and shows you how to apply them for real-world impact.

Let's start your Leadership 101 training:

Contents

- 1. The Leadership Exchange: Give & Take
  - When Leaders Are Takers: Over-Ambition & Self-Focus
- 2. Leadership Power Dynamics: Dominance VS Influence
- 3. Transactional vs. Transformational Leadership
  - Growing beyond transactional leadership
- 4. Leadership's Ceiling: The Law of The Lid
  - Poor leadership confirms the exchange & the law of the lid
- 5. Leadership Mindsets
  - 1. Great leadership begins with my self-development
  - 2. It's my responsibility to be as good as I can be
  - 3. It's my responsibility to make people better off
  - 4. I set the example of the top performance I demand
  - 5. It's my responsibility to lead for goal-achievement
  - 6. Once I'm a good leader, it's my duty to lead

- 7. Once I give, I can also get the leadership benefits

1. The Leadership Exchange: Give & Take

The social exchange model postulates that to get something, you must give something.

Research suggests the exchange model also applies to leadership ('service for prestige', Price & Vugt, 2013).

In that exchange, the leader enjoys highest status, influence, increased attraction from the opposite sex gender and, in organizations, higher pay.

However, to maintain legitimacy while enjoying the perks of leadership, the leader must also give to his followers.

Giving back is the only way to keep the exchange balanced.

If you don't give back, you lose the social capital necessary to lead effectively.
Unless propped up by coercive means, you lose influence. And in democratic or free systems, the top performers are more likely to leave.

There are many ways of giving, including:

- Achieve goals
- Teach
- Inspire
- Lift people up
- Maintain team harmony
- Defend your team when necessary
- …

Takeaway:
Ensure you give, and then you can also take.

When Leaders Are Takers: Over-Ambition & Self-Focus

Ambition is crucial to becoming a leader.

But, as for everything, balance.
Effective leadership calls for ambition to be tempered by skills, mission focus, and team advancement.

Imagine two leaders:

- Man A craves leadership: and doggedly pursues it
- Man B is not sure: he believes he'd do a good job, but he's got other projects and is not sure he can commit

Which one would you pick?

You can't be sure from this short description, of course.
But craving leadership is a potential red flag because the focus is on the role, rather than the work involved, or the mission.
It suggests people may seek leadership for selfish self-advancement only, or out of power concerns.

Not being sure is a potential green flag.
It suggests people weigh the pros and cons because they know leadership entails certain commitments and obligations.

⍰ Example:

> Tracy: And I volunteered for every committee. As long as I can lead it. <— Focuses not on the mission or whether she can add value, but on the role & power

That's the attitude of the benefits' hunter -in this case, resume's hunter-.

Those tend to make for poor leaders because they put their personal goals first, second, and third. And if the organization or people around them do badly… Too bad for them.

2. Leadership Power Dynamics: Dominance VS Influence

Psychology research tells us there are two paths to social power and leadership:

- Dominance, based on fear, coercion and followers' submission
- Prestige, based on on skills, character, and followers wanting to defer

Dominant leaders tend to take more because of the intrinsic nature of their 'model'.
It's not based on making others want to follow, but on forcing others to submit and defer.

However, that taking comes at a cost, including:

- No 'true' influence since people submit but don't change their minds
- Mutiny risks with coalitions of lower-status followers
- Possible escalations by challengers
- Constant policing for compliance or people will 'cheat' as soon as they can

Prestigious leaders instead are better placed to change people's minds because others want to be more like the leader.
And they hold their leader, and his opinions, in high regard.

We must say though that, in general, both approaches 'work' -or they wouldn't have evolved-.
And the admittedly limited current evidence suggests that both approaches confer 'evolutionary fitness' benefits.

However, in free and democratic societies prestigious leadership tends to be more effective.
It better attracts and retains talent, while dominance only keeps people who have no better options.

Furthermore, coercion and dominance, based on 'sticks' is more costly to maintain.

Takeaway:
Be a prestigious leader, use less coercion, and more influence.

3. Transactional vs. Transformational Leadership

The social exchange model includes both macro-categories:

- Transactional, with pragmatic exchanges, 'WIIFM' mindsets, 'social accounting', and extrinsic motivation
- Transformational, with ideals, purpose, 'pleasure in giving', and intrinsic motivation

Mediocre leaders lead based on transactions alone: contracts, obligations, pay rises for good jobs, or threat of getting fired.
This is sometimes referred to as 'sticks and carrots' management.

Instead, great leaders tap into the extra resources that people willingly offer when they are intrinsically motivated.
Transformational leaders get the 'extra mile' from people.

The difference between the two grows larger when accounting for the cost side of the leadership equation.

Carrots and sticks are costlier because leaders must spend to reward and punish.

The costs are a natural reflection of the psychology of transactional exchanges.
Since transactional leadership doesn't motivate people, they may 'cut corners'. Or even turn on the group and organization, and steal.
So leaders incur 'policing costs'. And policing, in turn, further undermines trust, cooperation, and social capital.

In chart terms:

Chart contrasting a dominant leader VS a prestigious leader
Based on Haslam's The New Psychology of Leadership: Identity, Influence and Power.

This is not to say, of course, that some environments or people may not work better under transactional approaches.
For example, intrinsic motivation might have little appeal for cynics or money-driven folks.
And there is some evidence highlighting that transactional leadership has both pros and cons.

But most people work better when leaders can add at least some elements of transformational leadership. Even most cynics do better with a touch of inspiration.

On the other hand, leaders utterly incapable of going beyond pure transactional leadership fail to make the most of their followers.
To quip leadership motivational speaker Simon Sinek, we may call these 'managers' rather than 'leaders'.

To quote psychologist and leadership expert Alexander Haslam:

> For this reason, as a host of commentators have remarked, evidence of leaders attempting overtly to manipulate followers by means of either reward or punishment is an indicator not of their leadership's success but of its failure.

Takeaway:
Inspire, don't just pay a salary.

Growing beyond transactional leadership

Some leaders never move beyond a transactional approach because of their mindsets.

Transactional leaders believe that humans are motivated primarily or only by self-interest.
Acting on their belief, they use mostly or only material rewards and punishments (Burns, 1978).

So the first step is to believe that people want inspiration and that inspiration is good for all.

Of course, this does not mean you forget about the material part.
That would be very manipulative leadership -or business-.

Instead, provide material benefits whenever applicable, while also inspiring beyond the pragmatic give & take.

In business, that means that you pay enough for a comfortable life. And then focus less on material benefits, and more on transformation.

We dig deeper elsewhere on how to become transformational.
But just to give you an idea:

- Be skilled at your job
- Be a high-quality man in general, since people value
- Be an honorable man, including good values
- Believe in the mission
- Frame your goals as win-win and value-added to society
- Make people feel proud for their contributions
  - Show how they contribute to the positive mission
- Lead by example
- Create an identity for the team setting the:
  - Values
  - Defining traits
  - Aspirations
- Frame the team as exceptional
- Make team members feel exceptional

4. Leadership's Ceiling: The Law of The Lid

John John Maxwell refers to this phenomenon as the 'law of lid':

Leaders set the ceiling for the followers they can attract and retain.

Maxwell says that 'the leader sets the ceiling for the organization's effectiveness'.
I'd argue that good leaders set the ceiling not just for effectiveness, but for:

- Belief in the mission
- Optimism
- Inspiration
- Character
- Work ethics

For example, if you have poor work ethic, it will be hard to attract and keep hard workers.
And if a leader shows poor character and focuses on rent-seeking, the more motivated and selfless team members will either leave, or adapt downward.

The 'law of the lid' is also a fantastic mindset to adopt.
It nudges leaders to take on the 'burden of leadership', placing the onus of performance on them.

So, if you want to lead great people, you know what you gotta be: be a great leader.

> To lead great people, become a great man.
> The Power Moves

Poor leadership confirms the exchange & the law of the lid

Some extreme examples of apparent value-taking leadership may be buffling to some.

How do you explain, for example, the election of fascist warmongers, or the adoration of cult leaders?

Why do these apparently obviously bad leaders gain so much power and influence?

First of all, we must realize that albeit toxic, extreme leaders are highly skilled at using group dynamics.
Second, they also 'give' psychologically.

Fascist leaders are the toxic extremes of charismatic leadership.
Natural experts in manipulation, they make the populace feel special and proud.
Average men get to feel great by projecting their ego onto the supposedly 'great empire' and 'great tribe'.

Cult leaders are 'naturals' at dark psychology.
Although they use manipulation tactics, they at least initially give a sense of refuge and guidance.

Thirdly, you must look at who they target and recruit.

The most independent minds rebel against oppressive regimes.

The people cult leaders attract aren't exactly the top representatives of human expression.

And finally, as the leaders-followers relationships become more imbalanced and win-lose, more people will start rebelling or quitting.
And you're only left with the most undiscerning ones.

Takeaway:
If you want top performers, quality people, and long-term influence, be an honorable man, offer real value, and make it win-win.

5. Leadership Mindsets

The mindsets underpinning great leadership are:

1. Great leadership begins with my self-development

Inspired by Viktor Frankl's quote:

> Leadership cannot be pursued, it must ensue

 To lead well, first focus on becoming a great person—others will naturally follow.

1.2. I must earn the right to lead

This mindset ensures that you seek a leadership position after you have enough to give.

2. It's my responsibility to be as good as I can be

This mindset empowers you to lead effectively, and attract and retain the best talent.

3. It's my responsibility to make people better off

Including caring for your people's well-being.

This mindset also strengthens your leadership as you become more prestigious.

3.2. Man shall not live by bread alone: I also give emotionally

Cynicism can handicap leaders because they don't believe men can be inspired by more than just practical exchanges.

Avoid that trap: make it your responsibility to uplift and inspire.

4. I set the example of the top performance I demand

'Lead from the front'.

5. It's my responsibility to lead for goal-achievement

Keep your eyes on the goal and make it a winning team.

6. Once I'm a good leader, it's my duty to lead

Once you are the best man to lead, then leading becomes a responsibility.

This mindset allows you to assertively go after what you want, while also ensuring healthy win-win.

7. Once I give, I can also get the leadership benefits

Once you do your part, you can get to enjoy the leadership benefits.

Five Families: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Five Families" (2016) is a book in which author Selwyn Raab chronicles the history of Cosa Nostra in the United States, together with the succession of bosses, prominent made men, intrigues, and the eternal fight between the mafia and the law.
The book ends being a great case study on Machiavellianism, power, and effective leadership.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Selwyn Raab is a journalist, author and former investigative reporter for The New York Times. He focuses on American Mafia and US criminal justice topics.

The Mafia Reached Immense Power In The U.S.

Writes Raab:

> Unquestionably, the gangs known as the Bonanno, Colombo, Gambino, Genovese, and Lucchese crime families evolved into the reigning giants of the underworld.

The mafia had so much power at certain points that it elected, or contributed to elect, highly-placed union officials, politicians, New York majors and, some mobsters said, the votes they controlled were enough to have swayed JFK's election.
If they weren't enough to elect Kennedy, the mafia seems to have had either a conspirator, or the main designer, of JFK's murder.

The organized structure and the "watching each other's back" was a major part of the mafia's power.
Says Raab:

> A soldier had the added security of knowing that other criminals who suspected or were aware of his connections feared injuring or insulting him; the lethal retaliatory power of the organization was well known in the underworld.

That power started early:

> By the late 1930s, however, through undercover work and arrests, his agents discovered a major shift in the nation's narcotics networks: all were virtually controlled by Italian-American gangs. "They seemed to have an extraordinary cohesion," Anslinger later said of the Mafia gangs.

And writing about the Gambinos and Gotti's initial reign over it:

> He began his reign overseeing the largest and probably the most powerful criminal organization in the nation's history

That cohesion and that avoidance of too many internal wars was one of the mafia's secrets to power.

Cosa Nostra Secrets to Success: Collaboration (Thanks to Lucky Luciano)

Lucky Luciano was a genius mastermind.

He turned a group of fighting gangs, into a group of collaborative enterprises who would soon come to dominate the underworld.

The secret was to drop war and over-competition, in favor of more collaboration, and more dialogue to resolve issues.

At an individual's level, being a "made" men, meant being "connected", and having people you could call upon, and that would support you.
And at an organizational level, it meant no resources wasted on internal wars, and more power to control the external environment.

The "commission" was one of the most notable elements to ensure peace and cooperation among families.
And proof that it worked was that, absent the commission, internal wars escalated. Says Raab:

> The argument between members of two families had festered because the Commission case trial was under way, and the customary sit-down formula for resolving Mob disputes was suspended.

- Strategies of power

Tip: As You Increase Collaboration, Decrease the Scope for War

Writes Raab:

> Corallo, like other Mob leaders, had good reasons to prevent hits on law-enforcement personnel. Murdering a cop, an investigator, or a prosecutor would unleash the fury of the law against the Mob and make normal business hazardous. Furthermore, the rule was aimed at maintaining strict discipline and preventing rash, unauthorized acts by hotheaded troops.

Cosa Nostra Secret to Success II: Structure & Succession Plans

Says Raab:

> The law-enforcement establishment may have rejoiced at the victories over Luciano and Capone, but they failed to understand a seismic change had occurred in the families of organized crime: the viability of Mafia families was not endangered by the imprisonment of a top man. Unlike the loosely organized Jewish and Irish ethnic gangs fashioned haphazardly by the likes of Dutch Schultz and Owney Madden, a cohesive borgata did not disintegrate at the sudden absence of its head man.

That's the power of organization and structure.
Says Raas:

> Despite the murder of Paul Castellano and the convictions of Tony Salerno, Ducks Corallo, and Carmine Persico, business continued to hum in every gang, and replacements filled the gaps left by the stricken leaders and their cohorts. This continued prosperity could be credited to Lucky Luciano's ingenious organizational plan for the Cosa Nostra, devised in 1931. Fifty-five years later, Luciano's legacy kept each family's table of organization intact and functioning. As the 1980s ended, there seemed no end to the plundering by the five families.

2.3. Cosa Nostra Secret to Success III: Organization First

Said one smart observer:

> "If one member can dispute a Commission order you can say good-bye to Cosa Nostra, because the Commission is the backbone of Cosa Nostra. It will be like the Irish mobs who fight among themselves and they [the Italians] will be having gang wars like they had years ago."

2.4. Mafia's (Sexual) Values: Keep Your Trysts Hidden for Respect of Your Wife

Says Raab:

> Mafiosi were expected to maintain a higher regard for "the sanctity of their women" than the rest of male society. "Their rigid code prohibited an affair with the wife or girlfriend of another mobster under penalty of death," Ragano noted. "And they were obligated to protect the wife or mistress of a fellow mobster if he was not around." Trafficante explained to Ragano that the Mafia had no objection to married soldiers having affairs, but there was a caveat. "Santo had a mistress but conducted the affair with discretion to spare his wife and daughters embarrassment," Ragano added. "That was expected of all Mafia members."

Something confirmed by Salvatore Gravano:

Those same values within relationships also make the mafia stronger: if you respect your partner, it's implied, then chances are that you also respect your partners in crime.

Why Cosa Nostra Didn't Like Narcotics

You know it from The Godfather:

The mafia didn't exactly love narcotics.

Yes, they often trafficked it, and some mobsters did it "on the low" and on a "I send you money, but you don't ask me" basis. But still, narcotics weren't the mafia's centerpieces.

Why not?

Becuase:

1. Drugs' harsh penalties posed a risk that more people could turn informers
2. Traffickers might get addicted, and become unreliable loose cannons
3. The public didn't like drugs (but were more OK with prostitution and gambling)

How RICO Was Born: Machiavellian Strategizing

To pass RICO:

> Before presenting his bill to the Senate, the canny McClellan allowed Celler to introduce amendments in the House's bill modifying controversial parts of the act unrelated to RICO. The disputes over other aspects of the legislation served as lightening rods, distracting Cellar's attention from substantially altering RICO in his proposed House bill. Celler anticipated that his non-RICO objections would force McClellan to call for a conference, which would give him the opportunity to block or substantially modify RICO to his satisfaction. But McClellan surprised him by accepting the amended House version. Since the approved Senate and House bills were identical, there was no need for the conference that Celler had counted on. He had been outwitted.

An interesting technique to use: draw attention to something tangential, or do something eye-catching about something tangential, and maybe what you really care about will go unnoticed.

Power Move: Demand Fairness From Your Boss

… And If You Survive, You Gain Status.

That's a risk, but in certain situations, it can be worth it. And it worked for young John Gotti.

This is what John Gotti did:

> At Lewisburg, Gotti confronted Carmine Galante (…) was in (…) effect the "warden" of the prison's Mafia wing. Although not a made man, Gotti had the nerve to complain to Galante that he was bribing guards to get steaks, delicacies, and booze only for himself and nine or ten Bonanno wiseguys. The upstart Gotti demanded that the don share the wealth with other imprisoned mobsters. Gotti's boldness and poise so impressed Galante that he expressed interest in enlisting him in his own family. Informers reported that Galante said, "I'd like to have him in my crew," and was disappointed to hear that John "belongs to Neil," a reference to Aniello Dellacroce.

Strategy For Power: Propose a Big Slice, Instead of War

A genius move from Paul Castellano:

> According to Mob folklore, "Big Paul" won over "Mr. Neil," with a practical proposal: "Anything you had with Carlo, you keep. Anything more you want, we talk." By compromising instead of selecting a new underboss committed to him, Castellano had divided Gambino's unified kingdom into two domains. But through appeasement he had avoided internecine combat, and with plenty of spoils for himself and for Dellacroce, there was little to worry about.

Castellano basically negotiated that by saying "yes, I'll become the boss, but I let you keep everything you have, and maybe more".
It's a great strategy because now your potential opponent will think "a bigger slice, or war"?
And chances are that he will go for the sure bigger slice.

5. The Power to Give, Gives Power

Says Raab:

> Other Mafia bosses became indebted to Costello for exerting his sway when their soldiers and associates needed a favor from a judge, a prosecutor, or a well-placed city official.

Obviously, as per law of social exchange, when you have the power to give, you have power to ask back.
So the power of the mafia wasn't just violence as someone might naively think. It was also the "power of connection", with those connections being other powerful men, including legit men.

Power Tip 1: Pick Low-Competition Markets

Says Bonanno:

> In cities that had only one family, godfathers enjoyed long careers and died of natural causes, Bonanno later wrote about that era. "In New York City, however, where strife was almost routine, fathers led precarious lives."

Machiavellian Tip 1: Distrust An Allied Snitch

Says Raab:

> (…) Costello was familiar with Genovese's Machiavellian intrigues and savage inclinations. "If you went to Vito," Joe Valachi noted, "and told him about some guy who was doing wrong, he would have this guy killed, and then he would have you killed for telling on this guy."

Be Aware of Boss' Tests

Bosses sometimes test the loyalty and availability of their underlings.

That can happen before taking you onboard, or when the boss is deciding who to promote.
Says Raab:

> (…) the wily mobster soon curbed his acolyte's independent streak while teaching him an elementary Mafia lesson. "Go get me an ice cream," Delasco ordered Accetturo (…). The embarrassed Accetturo knew he would be demeaned in front of his pals if he acted as an errand boy. But understanding that Delasco was testing his > obedience, he bought his boss the ice cream. “I knew that if I wanted to stay with Ham and learn from him, he had to have absolute control over me,” Accetturo explained. “He had to break me and I took the bit in my mouth.”

Life-Success Tip: Don’t Deride People. Not Even When You’re Higher Power

John Gotti created one informer against him by demeaning and ridiculing him:

> Gotti, however, contributed to Johnson’s concealed anger, referring to him as the “Redskin” or “the half-breed.” Arrested by the FBI for gambling and extortion, Johnson saw a way out by becoming an informer. Upset at being derisively treated by mafiosi partners and seeking FBI intervention in case he got jammed up again, Johnson signed on with the bureau.

Deriding people was a thing for Gotti.
He even mocked his daughter for his husband’s mental health issues.

Leader Tip: Don’t Give People Reason to Plot Against You

Of course, this is not always easy.

And still, many leaders sometimes seem to forget this basic rule and, high on their power, feel like they can get away with rude behavior.
Rude behavior is a sign of power, it says that you can be rude. But it also generally decreases your power, as people will start resenting you.

> Massino’s cold explanation to Vitale for the demotion was that rank-and-file capos and soldiers “detest you.” Virtually banished, Vitale was even prohibited from appearing at the Casa Blanca, where every capo was welcomed at Massino’s table in the restaurant. Indignant at being shelved and turned into an outcast, Vitale was powerless to resist. Seething, he complained that Massino had sharply cut his illegal revenues by driving a wedge between him and the rest of the family. “There was nothing I wouldn’t have done for the man,” Vitale whined to a capo who still talked to him. “He’s taken the captains away from me; they aren’t allowed to call me; they aren’t allowed to give me Christmas presents.”

The result?

When Vitale was pinched he had one further incentive to cooperate and testify: the opportunity to hit back at his rude boss.
And he did.

Says Raab:

> Massino’s biggest blunder was his mistreatment of Sal Vitale.
> Even so, the humiliated brother-in-law apparently was prepared at first to ride out their joint RICO storm. All evidence indicates that Vitale had no intention of betraying Massino until Sallet and McCaffrey warned him about the plot on his life. If Vitale had remained steadfast, Massino would have stood a strong chance of beating the original indictment and again frustrating the FBI’s best efforts to bring him to justice. A traditionalist, Massino broke a Cosa Nostra cardinal rule by blatantly “disrespecting” Vitale, his most dedicated supporter for thirty years. It was a fatal error. Vitale’s decision to become “a C.W.,” a cooperative witness, was the decisive factor in accelerating the domino syndrome of defections that cinched Massino’s conviction.

So it was his disrespectful behavior, plus the classic mafia blunder: letting fear grow so big, that people would escape to the government.

Leader Tip: Don't Be Too Harsh

Another mistake by John Gotti:

> Old friend Fat Ange Ruggiero received a dose of similar mean-spirited treatment. Infuriated by the damage caused by Ruggiero's careless talk, Gotti demoted him from capo to soldier at a time when Ruggiero, his 250-pound frame reduced to a weight of less than 150 pounds, lay fatally ill with cancer. Despite fervent requests from Ruggiero's friends and relatives, Gotti refused to visit or telephone his devoted follower in his final days.

Gotti was right to be angry. But the man was dying, and Gotti came across as too mean.

Leader Tip: Beware a Reputation for Machiavellianism

Again, Gotti:

> Reviewing management techniques with his new counselor, Gotti thought Gravano was overly generous in sharing the wealth with his closest lieutenants and helpmates. "Listen to me," advised Gotti, who before reaching the top had chafed at Paul Castellano's greed. "Keep them broke. Keep them hungry. Don't make them too fat."

How's Sammy Gravano going to feel about Gotti after that?
He's going to feel like:

1. Gotti is a greedy man
2. Gotti is a Machiavellian man who seeks power even if it means making his own team lose

So, if you're Machiavellian, you're probably better off not letting people know about it.

Leader Tip: Beware You Don't Get Overly-Domineering

John was bossy towards his lawyer as well:

> (…) his gregariousness irritated Gotti. Observing Krieger chatting during a break with Maloney, Gotti motioned imperiously for his lawyer to stop talking with the enemy. "I better end this or I'll wind up in the trunk of a car," said Krieger, winking at Maloney.

Leader Tip: Learn to Judge Characters

Says Raab:

> His inability to judge loyalty and talent were pitfalls for Gotti.

Specifically, the author refers to Gravano:

> his record for sacrificing others should have been a cautionary signal to Gotti. Previously, whenever Gravano became entangled in an internal dispute, his solution was to kill the rival and shift blame for the mishap onto someone else. Even among unprincipled mobsters, he had a reputation for unscrupulousness. If advancement required whacking his brother-in-law or a business partner, Sammy the Bull went along with it.

And his loyalty had never been tested:

> Gravano, unlike many skilled mafiosi, had never been imprisoned, Gotti had no idea of how he would react in the crucible of prison. He misjudged Gravano's dedication to him and the myth of Cosa Nostra loyalty.

I think the author might be onto something, albeit I think we can't forget that Gotti didn't help his case by being careless, never apologizing, being overly bossy, and letting his narcissism get out of control.

Leader Tip: Don't Reject Advice Off-Hand Out of Power & Ego

Chin Gigante was, in many ways, a mafia genius.

He faked being insane, he duped police for decades and, contrary to many of his colleagues, he never self-incriminated himself in any recorded conversation captured by countless hours of audio-surveillance.

The FBI couldn't pin anything on him, and other mafia dons respected.
Even John Gotti, who loved to make fun of others, never said anything bad about Chin:

> Bruce Mouw, the head of the Gambino Squad, sensed Gotti's concern about crossing swords with Chin. "We heard John trash everybody. He called the Colombos 'Cambodians.' Vic Amuso and Gaspipe were ridiculed as 'the Circus.' He even mocked his good friend Massino. But he never trashed Chin, never once. He always spoke of him with deep respect."

So, how did Gigante come to fall?

Because he made an exception for a guy he liked.
And he resisted pressure from others who told him that his protege' was dangerous, and potentially an informer.
Those pressures actually made Chin resist taking any action, because he didn't want to follow what others told him.
Says Raab:

> Paradoxically, the demands by the Gambino and Lucchese bigwigs for Savino's head might have protected him. Considering himself the supreme Mafia boss in the country, Gigante had no intention of heeding the advice of rivals, particularly the detested John Gotti, and Gaspipe Casso, a relative novice in high Mafia politics.

Leader Strategy: Be Undemanding To Increase Love & Loyalty

I think that being "undemanding" as a leader is a big risk.

It's a risk because you can come across as "not strong enough" for a leader, and like you can be duped.
And it's a risk because some people might forget there is a leader, and that the leader is you.

However, if it's a strong leader who is undemanding and does not ask for large shares of the spoils, then it can become a big positive.

See for example mafia boss Ducks Corallo taking this approach:

> When Ducks first took over in 1970, the New Jersey wing every year contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to the New York hierarchy. By the 1980s, the annual payments had been substantially trimmed; Accetturo was transferring a paltry $10,000 to $50,000 without drawing flak from New York. Wealthy as Croesus and getting on in years, Corallo became less gluttonous and lowered his demands from the New Jersey crew.

The result?
Accetturo loved Corallo:

> A consummate mafioso and a fervent believer in the sanctity of the Mafia's code of honor, Accetturo represented the Mafia ideal. Loyal, absolutely trustworthy (…)

This was a similar strategy for the highly successful Chin Gigante of the Genovese family:

> Gravano was impressed by a remark Chin made about surviving as a Cosa Nostra don. Mentioning that he had enough wealth from his own schemes, Gigante said he was not pressing his crews for huge cuts from their rackets. Sammy the Bull thought that was a smart strategy for ensuring loyalty in a family that had plenty to go around—more than $100 million a year.

Beware of Over-Greed

Now what happened when the leadership change?

When the new leadership took over, they demanded 50% or more of the profits from Accetturo.
And that pushed Accetturo into full-scale rebellion, and lead to the brink of a war first, and then to Accettuor testifying to the FBI, and taking much of his crew with him.

Leadership is a lot about balance.
Be careful of being too undemanding if you're not in a position to do so, and be careful of pushing and asking for too much.

Anyone's Tip: Don't Talk Behind People's Back!

Some people call Sammy Gravano a rat.

But they don't consider how much Gotti contributed to turning Sammy against him.
As a matter of fact, I believe when Sammy said that he'd never turned if Gotti had been a better boss (Maas, 1997).
For example:

> One tape was the long parley between Gotti and Locascio on December 12, 1989. It staggered Sammy the Bull. He heard Gotti heap scorn on him for prospering from construction-industry scams, and revile him for building his own rival Mob power bases. Even more ominous-sounding to Sammy's chances of acquittal were Gotti's remarks pinning the blame for a multitude of murders on him alone; supposedly the slayings were committed to resolve Sammy's financial disputes with Mafia business partners.

Life Strategy: Be Friendly With Your Enemy

Sometimes, you have a declared enemy.

And you both know it.

However, you still have two choices:

1. Some people choose the antagonizing and hating road
2. Some others choose a more "gentleman" approach, to fight while still respecting the enemy

Mafia boss Massino took the Bonanno family when it was in tatters, and brought it back as the most powerful of the five New York families.
Massino always kept a "gentleman warrior" approach.

The mindset of the gentleman warrior approach is:

Yes, we're enemies and we want to beat each other. And I'll do be darn best to beat you. But we can still be courteous while we compete.

It's a bit like the mindset of "tough on ideas, but kind on people, which in this case becomes "tough in the game/fight, but kind on the opponent outside of the game/fight".

Massino imposed the same mindset and approach to all of his family.

It can take some emotional maturity to apply this mindset, and most people get swept away by the competitive spirit.

Let's see some applications in real life:

The Attitude of Antagonizing

> Franzese: I became a major target of law enforcement (exactly what you want to avoid), I was indicted 5 times, beat every case (that's a huge red flag: your enemy is dogged). Rudy told me "Franzese, if I convict you on this, you're gonna get double what your father got, I'm gonna give you 100 years. I said "Rudy, bring it on, I beat you 4 times, let's go for round 5.
> (now wise Franzese speaking) Guys, that's the dumbest thing you could ever do. You don't antagonize them (the FBI), they don't need any more incentives to come after you.

Exactly right, that type of attitude gives them incentives to come after you harder, and to punish you harder if they can catch you.
Furthermore, if convicted, you also provide them a valid reason to treat you like a devilish enemy -very different from a "gentleman's enemy"-.

That's an attitude that some criminals and mobsters have against the police.
And it only makes their life -as well as the police's life- harder.

Flaunting how you're "beating" them will also make your enemy more dogged in your pursuit.
See John Gotti or Al Capone.
They both might have stayed free far longer, if they had avoided the spotlight and the attitude of "I beat them and I rub it in".

The Effects of Antagonizing

From that same video:

> Franzese: I've witnessed some things that were kind of unpleasant, every once in a while the agents would get out of hand (goes on to tell a story of an FBI agent who ruins his family dinner, ends up drawing a gun)

Before the rights of detainees were extended, beatings of detainees were also common -of lower-level mobsters mostly, as cops were also probably worried of assaulting higher-power mobsters-.

Life's Mindset: The Gentleman Warrior Attitude

Now compare with mobster Joseph Massino, who instead took a far more friendly with law enforcement:

> "Get used to my face, because you're going to see a lot of it for a long time", Pat Marshall, the agent who had been hunting Massino, forwarned when he was brought to FBI headquarters (Pat starts off with a competitive frame).
> Marshall recognizes that he was confronting an imperturbable foe. "He took my warning with a grain of salt and said calmly no problem, do what you got to do" (ignores the competitive frame, installs a gentleman's > frame to competition)

Massino called the FBI agents by name, and was always courteous.
In one instance, he even defended an FBI agent who was being encircled and then gave him back the electronic surveillance device Massino had uncovered.

The Gentleman Warrior Effects

Being courteous towards your enemy might not prevent you from losing.

In our case study here, the law will still take its course.

But it won't hurt for sure, and it might as easily soften your loss, and shorten your sentence.

Plus, it will likely make the process, and the possible conviction, far easier on you.
From the same book:

> Picked up at his Howard Beach home, Massino politely asked to be cuffed outside, not in the presence of his wife and teenaged daughters.
> "Because he was always the gentleman and cordial with us", Marshall granted him that favor.

Don't Be Duped: A Criminal Always A Criminal (?)

I don't necessarily think a criminal will always be a criminal.

But it's definitely something you should keep in mind.

After Sammy Gravano's testimony, the FBI seemed to think he was the best thing to walk on earth.
Says Raas:

> The hearing resembled a testimonial dinner, with officials competing to outdo each other in extolling, with honeyed adulation, Gravano's contributions
> (…)
> As recognition of Gravano's exceptional services, the FBI's Jim Fox presented him with a private award that he handed out exclusively to agents for valor—a specially designed wristwatch with an American flag on its face.

As well as the judge:

> Before pronouncing sentence, Glasser quoted the opinion of an FBI agent who characterized Gravano's decision to testify against Gotti as "the bravest thing I have ever seen." The judge seemingly agreed with the appraisal of Gravano's supporters that he had metamorphosed from an unprincipled mobster to a law-and-order advocate.

And little later, that same law-abiding man:

> Young, hero-worshiping members of his thirty-strong Ecstasy crew testified that Gravano liked being addressed as "Boss" and "Big Man." He tutored them on the best weapons and tactics to be used in hits, and in his raspy voice spoke of organizing a new kind of Mob in Arizona. "He couldn't sit in Arizona and be a pool salesman or run a construction company," Linda Lacewell, an assistant U.S. Attorney, said at a hearing. "He wanted the old days back; he wanted 'the life' back, the power back."

I believe the author was being overly mean here.
Everyone would enjoy being called “boss”, and he probably was the boss and best guy in the new crew.
Still, it shows how silly the authorities were in believing Gravano was a totally new and different man.

Mobster Tip: Watch Out for Non-Mobsters Fanboys

Yes, some people these days love to say that “all mobsters eventually turn”.

But that’s not really true.
Or, at least, it’s not nearly as bad for non-mobsters.
The first to turn against Massino indeed was a businessman, sort of an associate and a mafia groupie who didn’t grow up a gangster:

> brusque conversation with the two agents about the legal consequences of conspiring with gangsters persuaded Scozzari to abandon his romanticized concept of the Mafia, and to join the undercover campaign. He, too, secretly began taping meetings with Cantarella. “It wasn’t difficult to turn him,” Sallet said. “Money guys like to live well and have a lot to lose.”

The threat of a relatively small sentence was enough to turn him.
So watch out associating with guys who haven’t grown up “within the life”.

Drug dealers and drug users are also often weak links in the mafia, and one step that smart bosses are taking against it is to make sure that anyone using or selling drugs cannot ever be made.

Mobster Tip: Don’t Overkill

Gaspise inaugurated in the Bonannos a period of extreme internal violence.

Said Chiodo:

> “These guys [Amuso and Casso] have a pattern of calling people rats and they are marking guys rats and killing them,” Chiodo cautioned. “I got information that you and I are going to be killed and hurt.”

And:

> D’Arco fretted about his own fate. He knew that the mere whisper of disloyalty, without substantiation, would provoke Casso into whacking even the most faithful servant.

When people are too scared to operate, they might operate poorly, or seek an alliance to kill you and depose the threat.
And fear might not be enough to stop them:

> “Even though he was in a room with agents, he was so paranoid of Gaspipe that he was hiding in the bathroom when we came in,” O’Connell recalled. “He told us, ‘You have to understand how dangerous this guy is. He has sources, agents, he knows what’s going on.’”

Overkilling and too much fear is even more dangeorus when you’re not the supreme country leader.
If you’re the supreme country leader, then people have fewer ways to harm you. But within a functioning government, they can always run to the police and seek protection in a witness program.
Which is what happened:

> Vittorio “Little Vic” Amuso is appointed boss with underboss Anthony “Gaspipe” Casso as an equal, if not > stronger, commander. Their bloody purge of suspected internal enemies produces numerous defections and convictions.

Kill, Don't Wound – & Don't Wound or Kill Stand Up Guys-

A rule made famous by Robert Greene:

Crush your enemies totally.

If you don't, you only make one bigger enemy.

> Fat Pete Chiodo had spurned an offer from prosecutors for greater leniency if he testified (…). "I appreciate what you guys are trying to do but no thanks—goodbye and good luck," Chiodo told (…). Twelve bullet wounds finally convinced him that survival depended on his breaking his omertà vow and converted him into an informer.

Chiodo was a stand-up guy.
Trying to kill him was a mistake because he would have kept his mouth shut.
By wounding him, the bosses reached the worst possible outcome: make him angry and fearful enough to go into the witness protection program, and still alive to talk.

The Mafia Is Not Dead

Starting from the '80s and during 90s as well as '00s, the government scored huge wins against the mafia.

It seemed like the mafia was on the rope, and possibly on the verge of dying.

But, the author cautions, there are plenty of signs the mafia is still there, and still able to generate profits from old schemes, as well as smart new ones.

Blakey, the original creator of the RICO law that was a bane for most godfathers, says:

> We don't win the war against the Mob," he advises, "all we can do is contain or control it."

The mafia in Sicily also can provide some clues, and the author even says that eruptions in the Sicilian mafia reverberate in the US.
There was a period when Sicilian mafia went into an all-out war with the government, and it paid a heavy price.
Then, the mafia changed approach, avoided violent confrontations, and went "silent".

> Palermo's chief prosecutor, Pietro Grasso, adds, "The silence of the Mafia is a strategy, not an absence."

So if you don't hear about the mafia, it doesn't necessarily mean it's not there, or that it's not powerful.
As a mtter of fact, just like in the '30s through the '80s, it might be the sign that it's even stronger.

More Wisdom

- Don't show weakness, not even within collaborations

> "But never show any weakness to other families, or they'll take advantage of you," Massino lectured Vitale.

- Machiavellian thinking

In organizations where power is negotiated with life and death, you must be careful of what other people think.
Take this example:

> One of the first capos to disappear was the Bronx's Anthony "Buddy" Luongo, who was clipped shortly before Amuso and Casso were officially installed. Luongo's sin: Corallo was believed to have briefly considered naming him as his successor. He might, therefore, be envious of the Brooklyn upstarts who were taking over the borgata.

So a guy got killed because the bosses thought he might be jealous.
If Luongo had had more Machiavellian skills, he might have saved his life by proactively showing allegiance to the new bosses.

- Honesty can help maintain cooperation

Says Accetturo:

> The old-time guys who taught me would never think of cheating somebody in a deal or in a dice or card game. They played by the old rules because they wanted the games and deals to go on forever."

- Fighting the "good representative of us" frame

> More than one mafioso racketeer chastised Salerno for investigating fellow Italian-Americans.
> They complained, "Why does it have to be one of your own kind that hurts you?" Salerno would snap back, "I'm not your kind and you're not my kind. The only thing we have in common is that we sprang from an Italian heritage and culture—and you are the traitor to that heritage and culture which I am proud to be part of."

Good frame control by Salerno.

- Don't be your own judge, hire one

Most people who defended themselves did poorly.
This is how Carmine Persico fared:

> His intent may have been to show that Cantalupo despised him and was testifying to obtain revenge. "You was angry because you was beat up, and you was beat up because you didn't pay back the money," Persico lashed out at Cantalupo. His argumentative question was a costly gaffe. The beating was over a loan-sharking debt, further illuminating Persico and his underlings as ruthless gangsters.

- Make your organization an honor to join

When you can make your organization an honor to join, you can bet many people will line up to join, and more people will respect its system of values.
Joining the mafia was an honor for many.
For example:

> Anthony Accetturo, the boy from Newark who obtained the nickname "Tumac," for his caveman ferocity, and > who described his admission into Cosa Nostra by Ducks Corallo as “the greatest honor of my life.”

- Private enterprise isn’t always better

> The city naively believed private carters would do the job more efficiently and cheaper than the Sanitation Department. Within a decade, the Genovese and Gambino families were the ones cleaning up from the changeover.

Maybe something Rothbard and the other free-market extremists should take into account.

Some guys in the red pill like to say that women are (all) opportunists and have little loyalty.
Instead, Massino’s wife remained beside him even as he was being crushed in court. When did she turn on him? When Massino decided to cooperate.
This is a case of a woman having stronger morals nad values than the mafioso husband (albeit of course we can argue they were the wrong values):

> In relinquishing the criminally acquired nest egg, Mrs. Massino indicated that a marital rift had developed over her husband’s abandonment of omertà. The long-devoted wife informed reporters that she disapproved of Joe’s apostasy and was uncertain about visiting him in prison.

QUOTES

A funny quote on untimely FBI arrests:

> Fat Tony Salerno was the most chagrined at the timing. (…) FBI agents arrived simultaneously with the delivery of a huge takeout order from the neighborhood’s Andy’s Colonial Tavern. The agents refused Salerno’s request to allow him to partake of the meal

On Gotti’s degenerate gambling fooling an FBI agent tailing him:

> A few paces behind Gotti at the Meadowlands Harness Race Track in New Jersey, Morrill saw him plunk down $8,000 on a single race. Suspecting that the mobster had “an inside tip,” the agent placed a “more modest amount” on the same horse. The horse finished almost dead last. “You’re ruining me, John,” Morrill said to Gotti in the grandstand when the race was over. “What do you want from me?” Gotti countered. “You know I’m a degenerate gambler.”

On Sicilian “zips” more effective than American counterparts:

> although most American mobsters resented the Zips, the Sicilian made men, because of their patronizing attitude, the Americans felt they were more dedicated and ruthless than their Yankee counterparts. Accetturo acknowledged that the Sicilians had the right to feel superior. Under strict control of their bosses in Sicily, they were better disciplined, more tightly knit, and more secretive than American gangsters, he thought.

There is lots of talk about mafiosi being “all fake and all rats”.
Yet, it’s almost always a mistake to over-generalize to everyone, and some mafiosi did stand by the “code”:

> A concrete-hard thug, Lino had shown his mettle and defiance of the police when he was twenty-five. Picked up in 1962 for helping the flight of a stickup man who had shot and murdered two detectives in Brooklyn, he kept his mouth shut despite barbaric beatings over four days by the police. A leg and an arm were broken and repeated battering of his head gave him a permanent incessant blink. Finally, a broom handle was plunged into > his rectum (…) Not yet a mafioso, Lino unflinchingly adhered to the code of omertà.

CONS

- Some bias in the author

At times, it felt like the author wanted to find negatives about the mafia that might not have been there.

For example, he writes:

> A commonly recycled story (…) subtly praised the Mafia, citing its formidable presence for low street-crime rates in predominantly Italian-American sections. With predatory crime soaring, two Mafia strongholds, Manhattan's Little Italy and Brooklyn's Bensonhurst, were presented as safe havens to live in.
> Unreported and underemphasized were the factors behind these statistics.
> The gangsters relied on sympathetic neighborhood residents to alert them to the presence of probing law-enforcement agents and suspicious outsiders (…). These watchdogs helped turn their neighborhoods into xenophobic enclaves, sometimes resulting in violence against strangers, especially African-Americans and Hispanics.

I don't think the mafia was a major driver behind the racial issues that have been plaguing the US from time immemorial.
And as far as I know, it's true that mafia neighborhoods have lower levels of crime.

PROS

Probably the best researched, most thorough overview of the American mafia from the beginning until the early 2000s.
And if you know how to read between the lines, also a lot to learn on power and strategies.

REVIEW

One of the best overviews on the history of the American mafia.

Atomic Attraction: 10 Tips to Be a 20% Man (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 14 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Atomic Attraction" (2017) is a dating book for men in which author Christopher Canwell teaches readers the high-masculinity, "alpha male" approach to dating to develop and maintain attraction.

Summary

About the Author:
Christopher Canwell is a dating coach and runs a blog and a YouTube channel.

We had already talked about Atomic Attraction.

And finally, I got around to reading it -listening to it, to be precise-.
We'll do the review a bit differently this time, listing the best takeaways in form of bullet points:

- Women prefer partners taller than they are, not necessarily "tall": Women don't necessarily like "tall men", they just prefer taller than they are (Shepperd et al., 1989)
  - Shorter female date better: that same study shows that men preferred shorter women regardless of the male height

- Men who exercise social power with smoothness are preferred to aggressive men: assertiveness shouldn't be confused with aggression.
  Instead, "research into aggression and attraction found that women view men as more desirable when they're less aggressive and able to solve problems in a more sophisticated way".
  The author also says that "True attraction is built on confidence, and a confident man only uses aggression as a last resort"

I remember an ex-girlfriend from Russia, complaining to me how overly violent some local men were.
She said she liked me a lot because "I behaved like a real man", and I don't remember once I ever got aggressive with her.

- Smoking and drinking to excess is unattractive (Vinke, 2016)

True, and especially true if we're talking about excess, and long-term.

Occasional smoking and drinking instead were not very harmful to attraction, and especially not for the short term.
Indeed, the paper states that smoking and drinking might be short-term sexual strategies for men.

Says the paper:

> The experiment showed that women perceive men who smoke and drink as being more short-term oriented in their sexuality than nonusers. Moreover, both tobacco and (especially) alcohol use brought some > attractiveness benefits in short-term mating contexts.

So, as long as you don't become addicted, no problem with drinking and smoking.

- Risky behavior that is attractive brings in rewards

Risk for risk sake, including over-aggression, is unattractive. Risky behavior that is attractive includes starting a business or taking a loan, as they fall in the "calculated risks category.

- Keep your air short: it's more masculine. If you like long hair, let the beard grow
- Shaved heads are attractive: men with shaved heads were rated more attractive compared to men with thinning hair, and they were rated as more, assertive, masculine, and strong, compared to men with a full head of hair (Mannes, 2012). But please see the "con" section, I reached different conclusions from that study.
- Keep a stubble: "a study comprised of 351 women found that heavy stubble is the most attractive facial hair a man can grow"

I quote from the study (Dixson & Rantala, 2016):

> We found that intermediate levels of facial hair thickness and to a lesser degree light body hair were most attractive.

However, the beard must be "full" when it comes to coverage, in the sense of covering the whole face, rather than "patchy":

> We found that facial hair that was less uniformly distributed across the cheeks and jaw, which does not connect to the mustache, was less attractive than beards with greater linear coverage and connection between the cheeks, jaw, and mustache

And analyzing past studies:

> Where stimuli depicting graded or intermediate levels of facial hair (i.e., facial stubble) and body hair have been used, preferences for light and heavy stubble over full beards have been reported (B.J.Dixson& Brooks,2013; Neave&Shields,2008) and there is some evidence that light body hair is preferred over pronounced hirsutism (B. J. Dixson, Dixson, Morgan, et al., 2007)

- Chest hair is better if light

Quoting from the study above:

> Light body hair was judged as the most attractive distribution of body hair and was more attractive than very light, medium, and heavy body hair

The definition of light and medium are:

> Medium body hair also included well-developed pectoral hair surrounding the areolae and the infraclavicular region. However, chest hair was not connected to abdominal hair, which was also less developed or absent in some cases. Light body hair was more sparsely distributed in the mid-pectoral region, connecting to the sternum but not extending to infraclavicular or abdominal regions

- Slightly larger than average penis are best, but not too big: the author says women prefer men who have proportionally sized penises to body size

Another myth is that women love big penises.
In truth, this is another trait that where attractiveness starts decreasing when it's too much, so the most attractive are slightly bigger than average, but not huge.

- The more feminine the woman is, the more she prefers an older man (based on the author's point of view, not a study)
- Dress high status: the preference for high status extends to both one-night stands, and long-term

There were six categories of attractiveness: (1) coffee and conversation; (2) a date; (3) sex only; (4) serious involvement, marriage potential; (5) sexual and serious, marriage potential; and (6) marriage.

Quoting from the author:

> The results of the study found that women were more attracted to the (same) > man when his clothes were "high-status." (…) women were much more likely to consider the man in all six categories if his clothes were "high-status" as opposed to "low" or "normal" status

- Wear red or black

The study (Roberts et al., 2011) had very few people, and the "dresses" being judged were simple T-shirts.
Red and black had similar ratings:

- Dominance is important in seduction: both physical and social dominance are attractive, and more attractive than financial dominance. Financial dominance is also important, but it's more about the qualities that allow people to become financially dominant.
  Dominance increases attraction, but not likability (Sadalla et al., 1987)
- But when it comes to acquiring status and power prestige is superior to dominance (Snyder et al., 2008)

Importantly, this study used characteristics such as the use of force or the threat of force to describe dominance.
He leverages fear.

Prestige is defined as: "'the noncoerced, interindividual, within group, human status asymmetries" (p. 166), includes a recognition of certain abilities by peers that leads to freely conferred status. Individuals who are knowledgeable or skilled are conferred prestige-type status by deferent sycophants".

He makes people want to follow.

I quote the study with 71, 102, and 60 female participants who participated for the respective 3 studies:

> Study 1 showed that women preferred targets on whom peers conferred prestige based status because of specific knowledge or skills to targets who achieved dominance based status through strategies of force or the threat of force, given equivalent status outcomes.
> Study 2 further demonstrated that, when dominance and prestige are manipulated independently, women consistently prefer high prestige to low prestige.
> Women did not prefer targets who used dominance-based strategies to achieve status in a different context outside of a socially sanctioned athletic contest; indeed, they generally preferred low dominance to high dominance in the non-athletic contexts in Studies 2 and 3.

Let's not forget though that all these women were university students.
Still, since university students tend to make for higher quality women, I don't consider that a con.

- Pick up lines are not attractive (Morrison, 2006)
- Winning men are more attractive than happy ones (Tracy & Beall, 2011)

Rating poses that represented happiness (a smile), pride (arms up towards the sky), shame (head down) and neutral, female preferred men who had a "proud" pose.

However, I believe the research is confusing: the picture for "pride" doesn't really show pride, but it's a sign of victory.
Just see it for yourself:

Dashed line is women evaluating men

- Risky behavior is only attractive as long as it served an evolutionary purpose -"hunter-gatherer type of risks"- (Petraitis et al., 2014)

- Playful men are attractive men (Chick et al., 2012)

> The theory (…) is that playful men are seen as more grounded, stable, and resilient when facing life's challenges. Playful men are also perceived to be less aggressive and less likely to hurt a woman and her future offspring. Furthermore, these qualities are seen as a marker of social intelligence and indicate that a man can form faster social bonds with others thus increasing his ability to acquire more resources and protection from society

And:

> You should never confuse the qualities of dominance and assertiveness with aggression and anti-social behavior— two traits common to insecure men.

- Women are designed to seek mates who are superior to them (see "Female hypergamy" article)
- Don't expect women to love you like your mother loved you

See here a man committing this obvious mistake:

> Pat: Women's brains are hardwired to be with the kids, but I was here before the kids, your loyalty should be with me

- Women shit-test men, and most men are unaware of it
- Fear and anxiety increase sexual drive

Says the author:

> This desire for sexual intercourse arises, not from a state of safety and security, but from a state of fear and anxiety. Because the purpose of humanity is to reproduce, an imminent threat to life triggers extreme levels of sexual desire to ensure the survival of the species. It is, however, still easy to activate this fear/sex response in women by injecting uncertainty and anxiety into a dying relationship.

CRITICISM

The "ideal man" comes across like a try-too hard caricature of an alpha male

Sometimes it feels like what was presented as the ideal behavior was a caricature of an "alpha male".

For example, the author says that if the girl wants to break up with you, the alpha male walks away (immediately) with his head held high.
Fair enough, I don't disagree with it: there are many situations in which that's a great response.

But is that the only confident course of action?
How about digging deeper into what's going on, before committing to a definite course of action?

Immediate action is often overreaction. Especially when over-the-top. It's a form of (weak) ego-protection to walk away at the first sign things aren't going your way.
And the "head held high" seems to me like the man who's deeply hurt, but puts up a front. Strong on the outside, but not really much inner strength there.

In another example, the "strong alpha" responds to a woman's disrespect by knocking a wine glass on the table, spilling it on her, and blurting "that's for being a bitch" right before leaving.

I totally agree one should never allow disrespectful behavior to be unchecked. But that's, again, an overreaction. It's not a great frame control, and not a socially dexterous way of being assertive and drawing one's boundaries effectively.

In brief, it feels this book goes to unattractive extremes and fails the law of balance, for which I warmly invite you to read this article on the law of balance in dating:

> Why Balance Is Most Seductive

Generalizations that make for sub-optimal advice

The author provides hard and fast rules on what works.
For example, he says never to text a woman back the moment she doesn't reply.

Albeit that's not terrible advice, it also won't hurt to hit her back with a text sometimes later.
I can tell you I've been with plenty of women who didn't answer a text.

The "alpha male is most attractive lie"

The author repeats that strength and high masculinity only are attractive to women.

And he says that women don't like men with feminine features.

But that's blatantly not true.
The hordes of young women who were crazy about Di Caprio in Titanic, young Justin Bieber, or the new K-pop stars provide a clear clue to anyone who's willing to properly analyze the world for what works.

Or, as an Amazon reviewer says:

> First of all the author harps on masculinity and being like an alpha guy at all time
> If this worked the hottest guys to girls would be construction workers and Harley Davidson hells angels dudes.
> Incorrect. They will lose to a tik tok clean shaven feminine guy ALWAYS.

That reviewer swings in the opposite direction.
In reality, different types can all be attractive, as long as they're high-quality in their own way.

What's attractive also depends a lot on what type of female cohort we're talking about.

Again, I invite you to read the law of balance for attractiveness.

And of course, see:

- Alpha males: who they are, and how to be one

Some nuances are lacking

The author says that the "direct approach" is the best you can make, and while I love direct approaches, it's not always the best.

The author also says that bars and clubs are the worst places to meet women. But this is not a question of points of view: there are plenty of men who successfully meet and sleep with women from bars and clubs. So that's patently not true. Especially not true if someone is looking for one-night stands.

Case studies were a bit too black and white

The case studies were sometimes interesting, sometimes entertaining, and sometimes a bit too exaggerated to be realistic.

The studies sometimes were misinterpreted

The author says that men with shaved heads were more attractive.

But when I looked into the study, I saw that men with shaved heads were seen as (significantly) more dominant, and stronger, but not more attractive.
Men with shaved heads were more attractive compared to thinning hair, but not to a head full of hair.

That made me lose a lot of trust and confidence in the rest of the quoted studies, so I started to check all the ones I found interesting, and found several other inconsistencies, as well as conclusions that the author drew from the studies that, in my opinion, fell outside the scope of the studies.

Some studies didn't fit what the author stated

For example, the author says that "Research published in the Journal of Social Psychology found that out of 172 participants, it took men anywhere from a couple of days to a couple of weeks to fall in love; whereas women took no less than a couple of months to fall in love.

But when I looked into the reference, the study was about availability and attraction, and not about "how long it takes to fall in love", for which I found not reference.

This might be a mistake of using the wrong reference, but it doesn't inspire much trust.

Some studies concluded the opposite of what the author stated

The author says that:

"As research published in the European Journal of Personality points out, if a woman has to fight for a man's love and attention, she'll think more highly of him, value him more, and think about him more frequently".

And then goes on to advise on how to be less available.

Yet, that study says that:

> For dating and committed romantic relationships, the prospective mate who was medium in availability was preferred. In contrast, the highly available prospective mate was preferred for a casual sex relationship

Sometimes studies were not fully understood

The author says that one study proves that women prefer humorous men based on the fact that men who told a joke in an experiment were 3 times more likely to get a woman's phone number compared to men who were just listening.

But that experiment is poor at isolating variables.
The men telling the joke may have been, and probably were, also displaying confidence and social power.

Some low-quality "relationship control"

To change a woman's mind and to save an ending relationship, the author seems to suggest that "dread game", fear and anxiety are the answer.

The author seems to suggest that to maintain long-term attraction, that's what you must do.

What a low-quality response to a dying relationship; make it worse, just to keep it alive.

QUOTES

On the importance of opportunities for sexual access:

> Men who teach English in Europe, Asia, or South America have more opportunities to meet, date, and have sex with women than men who work in a bank in a big metropolitan city.
> Meeting and dating women is not a question of resources, money, or prestige—it's simply a matter of access.

The seducer projecting power:

> He takes up space and maintains an expression that challenges people to impress him. He rarely if ever smiles, and when he does, it's a rare and precious gift. The skilled seducer strolls through the world at his own pace and never hurries or worries about a thing. His movements are akin to those of a cat—loose, relaxed, and languid. The world is there to serve him, not the other way around. It is this projection of attitude that makes the alpha male so irresistible and attractive to women.

The balance of chasing that is courtship:

> strike a delicate balance between pursuing too much and showing just the right amount of desire. You must be proactive and bold without appearing desperate. By this stage, if everything goes well the woman will start to warm up to you. Once you sense a change in her behavior and notice that the woman is becoming more responsive, you must back off and allow her to chase to you.

PROS

The case studies make for an easy, entertaining read.

Review

Atomic Attraction is a good book on dating and attraction dynamics, it can provide some good points for beginners, and it can be useful for "too nice guy".

The general approach of "alpha male game" it espouses can be a much-needed medicine for those men who still need to work on their power, confidence, self-esteem, leadership, and dominance.

It's less suited for more advanced students, seducers, and social strategists alike, who will miss some of the nuances and who will not appreciate some of the generalizations.

Full Summary

About The Teacher: With four NYT bestsellers, Daniel Pink is an influential voice in the evolving landscape of sales and motivation. Now the author of To Sell Is Human teaches you science-backed principles for effective and ethical sales and persuasion. Learn tactics for achieving better outcomes in any interaction—at home or at work—and tools for framing your message, navigating cognitive biases, and pitching ideas, products, or yourself.

All quotes from this point forward are quoted from Daniel Pink’s words.*

Persuasion Concept: Information and Power

Sales is now seen as sleazy, predatory, and aggressive. And, it used to be that way because of a little thing called information asymmetry. You would walk into a car dealership and be approached by a car salesman who saw himself as a “problem-solver”. And, he assumes your problem is that you need a car. So, he tries to cram a car down your throat because he also believes he should “always be closing” (ABC). The worst part is that back then, you couldn’t say anything back. The salesman always knew more about the car than you did, so you were always at an information (power) disadvantage. It was much easier for him to get away with his overly pushy sales style and leave you with buyer’s regret along with a bad taste in your mouth.

Now, we live in an era Pink refers to as “information parity”. An era with the internet, Google, social media, and access to reviews of cars and car dealerships at the tap of a button. The playing field as far as information has been leveled to where the buyer can talk back to the seller and negotiate more for what they want or walk away to another dealership that’s willing to “play fair”.

So, with this change in eras, we need a change in sales style. Pink believes that the old ABC sales style will no longer work today and the research shows that he’s right. Pink has a new ABC sales style—”Attunement, Buoyancy, and Clarity”. You’ll learn more about this style as you progress through the review.

Persuasion Concept: Attunement

“Attunement is taking someone else’s perspective. Seeing the world through their eyes rather than through your own.”

So, attunement is the part of Pink’s ABC method where you find common ground with the person you want to persuade.

“Attunement is so important today because, in any kind of persuasive encounter, we have very little coercive power. We can’t force people to do things.”

I like that Pink noted this because it tells me that he thought about the other forms of persuasion, one of them being coercive power.

“So, the way that we are going to be able to move people is to find common ground to understand where they’re coming from, fashion a solution that works for you and works for them.”

Persuasion Concept: Perspective-Taking

“…You want to take the other person’s perspective. You want to see the world through their eyes. And, the reason for that is if you take their perspective, you’re more likely to see where they’re coming from, understand what they’re saying–in some ways honor their point of view.”

Persuasion Strategy: Decrease Your Power to Increase Your Effectiveness

“There is an inverse relationship between feelings of power and perspective-taking…The more powerful you feel in general, the worse your perspective-taking becomes.”

And, Pink has a great theory for why this is:

“People who are low in status—low in power—are excellent perspective-takers…Because they don’t have the resources. They’re not in charge. Survival depends on their being able to take the perspective of people who do have the resources. People who are high-status—high in power—in general, are terrible perspective-takers. They don’t see the world from other people’s points of view. Power has distorted the way that they view the world and view other people.”

And, of course, being incapable of taking the perspectives of others gets a lot of leaders in trouble as we can observe from past failed CEOs.

The solution?

1. Reduce your feelings of power (in order to)
2. Increase your ability to take someone else’s perspective

Note: One way to reduce your feelings of power is to put the other side on the same level as you (which might mean building them up to your own level of power in your mind).*

Persuasion Strategy: The Empty Chair Technique

"So, suppose you have a meeting at your company. You set out the chairs around the meeting table. Everybody sits in his or her chair. But, you leave one chair open. One chair is empty. And, that chair, is for the most important person in the room who's not in the room. And, that's the customer. So, certain tech companies do this. So, when they have a session and they're talking about strategy, when they're talking about their marketing efforts, when they're talking about adding a new product line…having that empty chair there to represent the customer is powerful. Do you want to talk about your marketing strategy with your customer there? Are you doing things in a noble fashion? What about that product line? What would that customer sitting in that empty chair say?"

Daniel Pink says he uses this same strategy when writing his books. He keeps a mini chair on his work desk to the right of his computer. When writing, he'll notice the chair and ask himself if he's taking shortcuts that might disadvantage the reader.

This seems like a great way to make sure you're operating as a salesman that's in the business of serving others and NOT only making sales.

Persuasion Strategy: Use Your Head As Much As Your Heart

Empathy is feeling someone else's situation. Sympathy is feeling bad for someone's situation.

"Empathy is feeling what their feeling…think of it as a fraternal twin to perspective-taking. They're very closely related, but they're not identical. Empathy is largely about the heart. Perspective-taking is largely about the head. Both are important. But, how you use them matters a lot."

Ideally, you want both. You want to use a mix of empathy—your heart—and perspective-taking—your head. But, if you begin to feel overwhelmed with information (cognitive overload), when in doubt, use your head as much or more than your heart.

"When we're in a persuasive encounter…the moment can be very intense. Time is moving quickly…you have a lot going on in your mind…it can give us cognitive overload…we all suffer from cognitive overload. And, so, if you're feeling overloaded and you have to get rid of one, in a commercial encounter, get rid of the feelings. Focus on the thoughts and focus on the interests.'

Persuasion Strategy: Use Emotions As A Signal

"It's very difficult to know precisely what someone is thinking. But, we can do a few things to make at least an educated guess. One of them is to use their emotional state as a signal."

In other words, disassociate yourself from all negative emotions (separate yourself from and rise above all negative behavior, feelings, or outbursts), and ask yourself, "What's really going on here?" (i.e. "What's really making this person angry, frustrated, etc.).

"And, so, use the emotions a signal…to say, 'What's really going on here? What are their interests? What are their thoughts?' What really matters in sales is the ability to hypothesize. Start running some scenarios [possible reasons they're feeling those negative emotions] in your head…and just develop a few hypotheses. And then, finally, test those hypotheses. And, a simple way to do that is to ask him."

Pink actually recommends asking them using Chris Voss's negotiation technique: labeling. The only difference is, Pink urges his students to also attach, "Is that right?" to the end of each label (hypothesis).

> Pink: "It sounds [to me] like you might be having some pressure from your vendors. Is that right?

I love this approach. It uses the tactical empathy of Voss while mixing it with the dominant straight forwardness that comes from framing it as a question.

Note: For the label to be more effective, leave out first-person pronouns such as "I" or "me".*

So, here's the breakdown of this strategy:

1. Use emotions
2. Hypothesize
3. Ask questions

Do this to get a little closer to understanding what they're thinking.

Persuasion Strategy: Serve Your Audience

"Ultimately, what we do as persuaders and sellers is we serve other people. We want to help move them to a better place."

"So, there are two key ways to turn your selling into serving–make it personal and make it purposeful."

Personal:

"Don't think about what you're doing as an abstraction. Put a human face on it. Think about how it's going to improve a single life."

Making it personal elevates your performance. The more you can put a face on your persuasive efforts, the more effective you'll be.

Pink, in a scientific study, noted that when radiologists were given X-rays to analyze that had a photo of the patient attached, their analyses were far more accurate than when lacking that personal touch.

Purposeful:

"When you're in your persuasive encounter, ask yourself, 'If the other person does what I want them to do, will they be better off?' Second, ask yourself, 'If the other person does what I want them to do, will the world be slightly better off?' If the answers to either of those questions is 'no', I really want you to rethink what you're doing. If the answers to each of those question is 'yes', you're doing it right."

Persuasion Concept: Discussion Map

The discussion map is a tool used to notice the hidden power dynamics of any meeting or situation because you may think you know who the powerful people in the room are, but first impressions can be deceiving. And, the last thing you want to do is expend social effort trying to persuade someone who's not the decision-maker.

Persuasion Strategy: Create A Discussion Map

"Many times, people who talk a lot are people who are struggling for influence but who don't really have influence…Many times you can disregard this person."

People who aren't talking often but are talked to often make for great points of leverage since they hold a lot of influence.

> Workbook: "Want to visualize how influence works in a group setting? Try making what Daniel calls a discussion map. Use a circle and a speaker's first initial to represent everyone in a discussion. Every time someone speaks, draw an arrow from them to whomever they're addressing. When the discussion wraps, take stock and analyze. Keep a few things in mind here. People who talk a lot (person A) are often the people who are struggling for influence. Also, when someone stays relatively quiet (person D), make sure to look at how often they're being addressed by others. If they don't say much but are getting a disproportionate amount of attention, it signals that they have leverage. Breaking down influence might seem high-stakes, but you don't > need to sit in with a Fortune 500 boardroom to get some insight. A discussion map works around the dining room table or even when you're out with friends. Give it a shot. It'll give you a better idea about the power dynamics within group settings."

So, here's the breakdown of this strategy:

1. Find the key influencers in the interaction (remember, the person who talks a lot isn't always the most important)
2. Concentrate your persuasion efforts on those key influencers

Note: The best part is you don't always need to make a map. Creating discussion maps train your eye to see who's falsely powerful and who's really powerful without the constant need for mapping out the discussion.*

Persuasion Strategy: Provide Clarity → Make Your Message Count

"Clarity is simply this ability o see a situation in a fresh light and help people surface problems they didn't realize that they had."

As I said earlier, we used to be in an era of information asymmetry where the seller always knew more than the buyer. Now that we're in an era of information parity, there's a lot of information out there for the buyer. So much information in fact, that our role as persuaders has shifted from being problem-solvers to problem-finders. And, it's now our responsibility to curate all of the information we have to the specific needs, interests, and problems of the buyer. The seller has all of the information they need now. But, we need to be the ones to make sense of that information for them.

> Workbook: "The salesmen of yore would have said, 'It looks like you're in the market for a vacuum.' Now, the smart salesperson says, 'Tell me about your house."

"…If your customer or prospect knows precisely what it's [their] problems is, they can often find the solution without you. They don't need you very much. Where they need you more is when they don't know what their problem is or they're wrong about [how to solve] their problem and, therefore, the premium has shifted from probelm-solving to problem-finding."

Note: Ideally, you want your problem-finding to give them an "aha" moment.*

Persuasion Strategy: The Five "Whys?" Technique

A technique Pink really likes is the five whys technique. He uses it for problem-finding and believes that by asking "why" five times, you'll get to the root of any problem. This way, you can also operate as more of a "strategy consultant" than a salesman.

So, for example, let's say Pink is a management consultant and a CEO (who is the prospect) is interested in enlisting Pink's services.

> Prospect: I'm not interested.
> Pink: Why?
> Prospect: I can't afford it.
> Pink: Why can't you afford it?
> Prospect: The reason I can't afford it is that we're actually cutting our budget right now.
> Pink: Cutting your budget? Why?
> Prospect: We're cutting our budget because, actually, we didn't get enough revenue from this one product line > of ours, and it's really hobbling our whole company. And, as a consequence, all across the company, we have to make some cuts.

> Pink: Why didn't that product line work?
> Prospect: Our product line didn't work, I think, because we–one of our most talented leaders left, and her replacement was a complete dud.
> Pink: All right, why was that?
> Prospect: Well, our hiring practices are not very effective.
> Pink: You know what? As it happens, I can help you improve your hiring practices…

Jim Miller, the former vice president of sales for Tony Robbins, believes in using this technique as well. And, Allan Nation, the man Tai Lopez promoted as one of his first mentors, taught this persuasion technique as well:

> Allan Nation: "To get to the root of any problem, you ask 'why' three times."

Persuasion Strategy: Become An Expert

If you're a salesman, the way to find their real (root) problem is by, one, asking questions and, two, becoming an expert.

By becoming an expert, you can become a curator of information. You can take all of the information that's out there and curate the information that's meaningful and reliable to your customer.

Persuasion Strategy: Find the 1%

"Focus on the one percent. Don't get lost in the weeds. There's a body of law, a body of knowledge. What's the one percent that makes the ninety-nine percent understandable?"

Persuasion Strategy: Less Is More

"When we're making our case, we're trying to convince somebody, we often wrestle with the idea of, 'How much information should I present? How many arguments should I offer? And, a general rule of thumb is that…taking things out is often more persuasive than leaving them in."

"When you get to the fourth item [reason they should buy], you actually lose your persuasiveness."

Note: It's not stated in the course for sure, but this could be due to The Pinocchio Effect. When you continuously try to convince someone to follow your advice, they begin to wonder why you're trying so hard. And, that leads them to feel like maybe following your advice isn't such a good idea.*

Persuasion Strategy: Don't Irritate, Agitate!

"Irritation is trying to get somebody to do something you want them to do."

"Agitation is trying to get someone to do something that they ought to do and ultimately will want to do."

"The most effective persuaders, they're not irritators, they're agitators…They help people understand the context that they're in and help them summon their own motivation for making a change, for doing things differently. For doing things in a different way."

Note: "Irritation is leading with your mouth and agitation is leading with your ears.*

Persuasion Strategy: Motivational Interviewing

What do we do about power distorting our perspective-taking?

Solution:

1. Ask two irrational questions.

So, let's say that Pink wants to persuade his son to clean his room.

> Pink: (irrational question one) "Hey son, on a scale of 1-10, how ready are you to clean your room?"
> Son: "A two."
> Pink: (irrational question two) "Why didn't you pick a lower number?"

This is intended to get them to explain the reasons they have for really wanting to do what you're trying to persuade them to do. In this case, the second irrational question would get Pink's son to start to list the reasons he actually does want to clean his room.

But, let's say that even when you give them a scale of 1-10, they decide to give you a zero.

> Pink: (irrational question one) "Hey son, on a scale of 1-10, how ready are you to clean your room?"
> Son: "A zero."
> Pink: (calibrated question) "Okay, got it. You're a zero. What can we do to make it a one?"

In this case, you're using the "Never Say No" negotiation technique by delivering what Chris Voss would call a calibrated question. It's intended to get them to collaborate with you on a way forward that works for everyone.

Persuasion Strategy: Bring Social Proof

Pink gives credit to Robert Cialdini for this one, the man he calls the "father of the persuasion sciences".

The general idea here is that as human beings, we're motivated by reward and punishment, pain and gain. And, we don't always know what the best decision to make is. So, we look to the environment and other people for social cues as to what the best course of action is. We tend to rationalize to ourselves—even if only subconsciously—that if a lot of people are taking a certain action, then that must mean that that particular decision results in the most gain and the least loss. So, we're more likely to make that decision and take that action.

That also means that if you bring social proof—proof that a good amount of other people have done what you want to persuade the other side to do—you can persuade others that the right decision is the one you want them to make, and the right course of action is the one you want them to take.

Persuasion Strategy: Build An Off-Ramp

"When we try to predict people's behavior and explain people's behavior, we almost always overweight the importance of their personality and underweight the importance of the context and the situation that they're in."

This is called The Fundamental Attribution Error. In other words, we tend to judge people's choices without first understanding their reasons.

The lesson here is that if you want somebody to do something for you, make the context and the situation one where it's easy for them to say "yes". Sometimes, you don't even need to convince them. You just need to make it easy for them to do something. And, you can do this by taking into consideration their interests.

What Pink refers to as "building an off-ramp" we refer to here at The Power Moves as "the WIIFT rule".

Persuasion Concept: Mimicry/Mimicking

Mimicry is the act of mirroring, matching, or copying someone else's behavior.

Persuasion Strategy: Three Steps to Strategic Mimicry

The three steps are:

1. You watch.
2. You wait.
3. You wane.

To expand on these steps:

1. Pay attention: How is somebody (the other person) sitting?
2. Wait: Pick one of the things they're doing, then mimic it. For example, if they lean back, count to ten, then lean back. Or, if they put or rest their hand on their chin, count to ten, and then put or rest your hand on your chin.
3. Wane: Let it slide a little bit (stop mimicking their behavior), then do it again.

Note: Human beings are natural mimickers, so you'll be able to do this naturally.*

This has a dual effect. One is you'll be able to understand where they're coming from better. The other is that for them, mimicry feels natural. They feel like they're being heard.

Note: According to Pink, when researchers were performing these studies, they also performed a manipulation check, where they asked the other person if they felt like they were being mimicked. In 95 out of 100 cases, those people said "no".*

Persuasion Strategy: Mimicking with Language

"One reason why things—like in technical sales—they go awry, is that the people doing the selling use their insider language, use their jargon. And, the people who they're selling to might not be as sophisticated and they use civilian's language rather than the, quote on quote, 'correct language'. So, as much as you possibly can, use other people's words. Use other people's phrases. It makes them feel heard. It also, again, puts you in a position where you can understand their perspective."

A study in Holland where half of the servers were instructed to repeat the customer's order back to them word-for-word and the other half was instructed not to, resulted in both the orders being right on both sides. But, the "repeaters" received 70% more tips.

Persuasion Concept: Persuasive Framing

"One aspect of contemporary society is that people are stimulus rich but context poor. They don't know what it all means. They don't know where to focus their gaze. And, one thing that always helps people see in any realm of life is a frame…because it focuses the issue on what you want to focus on. It avoids people concentrating on extraneous things. In some way, it sets the terms of the discussion."

Persuasion Concept: Cognitive Biases

"A cognitive bias is a way that our thinking doesn't go straight. Our thinking goes sideways. It's a glitch in the human mind. We all are subject to it. We have to watch for it because, in 99 times out of 100, it's going to lead us astray."

"They [cognitive biases] help you frame your message to other people, but they also offer a sense of caution for yourself not to fall prey to these biases."

Note: Here is a complete list of 25 of the cognitive biases, which was provided to me by Tai Lopez after taking two of his sales and persuasion course: "The Accelerator: Persuasion" and "Green Belt: Closing The Sale".*

Persuasion Strategy: Loss-Aversion (AKA: The "Deprival-Superreaction Tendency" Cognitive Bias)

This particular strategy has been referred to as "pain/gain framing" or "the pain/gain frame" by John B. Ullmen and "bending people's reality" by Chris Voss.

"We experience losses more severely than the equivalent gain. So, the prospect of losing ten dollars is far more daunting than the thrill of winning ten dollars, even though, economically, it's essentially the same. And, so, in certain circumstances, you want to actually put the loss frame around your message…in many cases, you want to tell people what they have to lose."

An example is in the insurance industry. Selling insurance policies is all about telling people what they have to lose.

Persuasion Strategy: The Opportunity Cost Frame (More Loss-Aversion)

This frame and its effectiveness lies within the loss-aversion cognitive bias above as well.

"Any time you do something, you forgo doing something else. That's an opportunity cost. Any time you spend one dollar on one thing, that's one dollar you're not spending on something else. That's an opportunity cost."

"Oftentimes, you will use the opportunity cost frame when someone is trying to convince you and you need to push back a little bit."

So, for example, imagine that you are an architect and Pink is your client. And, you're limited on time as far as how long you have to build a house for Pink. And, you're limited as far as the budget Pink's given you to spend on the development of this house.

> Pink: "You know, I was just thinking. We should do a…one of the overhangs…we should do an oculus. Create a big hole there so the sun can come in."
> You: (roll your eyes) "OK, well, that's interesting. Interesting idea, the oculus. Umm, we can do it. But, with our budget, (opportunity cost frame) tell me what you want to give up to get that."
> Pink: (starts backtracking) "Whoa, give something up?"
> You: "Also, it's like, I'm on a fixed…you know, I'm on a time to get this thing done. Umm, (opportunity cost frame) what don't you want me to do in order to get you your oculus?"

Persuasion Strategy: The Experience Frame (The "Reason – Respecting Tendency" Cognitive Bias)

"When social scientists have looked at what people remember and what they value, they tend to remember and value experiences more than goods and services. So, they derive satisfaction not from, say, the television itself that they just purchased. But, from the experience of sitting around with your family watching a musical or having a regular Sunday night movie night in front of that TV set. The experience is more enriching, the experience is more valuable [than the product alone]."

"So, take what you're selling, whether it's an idea, whether it is a product, and put it in terms of an experience."

For example, let's say you're selling a used car. You can talk about the specifics of it such as the engine, the mileage, the gas efficiency, and so on. But, you can also frame it in terms of the experience the prospective buyer would have.

> You: "You know what, I use this car. And, (the experience frame) I drove my kids to soccer practice in this car. It's a great thing for doing that. And, as you know, as a parent, one of the things that's one of the few opportunities that you have is to have conversations with your kids. And, (the experience frame) sometimes it's in the car. And, so, this is a great car for doing that."

"We tend to value a fairly universal set of experiences. What do we like? We like novelty. To some extent, we like challenge. To some extent, we like relaxation. We like being with people we care about. And, that common set of experiences are really what give us satisfaction as human beings."

The experience frame can make your product or idea more buyable and, in some cases, even more valuable in the eyes of the person you're looking to persuade.

The reason that I associated this frame with the "Reason – Respecting Tendency" cognitive bias is because it states, "You can increase compliance to a request, favor or command if you give a reason why." And, in this case, the reason why that you're providing is because of the experience they can have if they buy your product or buy into your idea.

Persuasion Strategy: The Less Is More Frame (The "Contrast – Misreaction Tendency" Cognitive Bias)

"…the truth is that offering people [more] choices can be persuasive up to a point…[having more than one] choice is valuable, but it has a ceiling on it."

"…and, there's a famous study that exemplifies this. These two researchers at Stanford set up shop in a grocery store. And, they were purportedly selling jam. So, in one instance, they offered free tasters of 24 different varieties of jam. In another instance, they offered just six varieties of jam…Which sold more? When they offered 24 varieties of jam, 3% of the customers bought the jam. When they offered fewer options, 30% bought it. Less is more."

"More isn't better, better is better…fewer options can be much more clarifying [and, clarity is persuasive]. And, your job, as a persuaded, is to narrow the set of options in a way that is useful and enlightening for the person you're trying to persuade."

The reason I associated this with the "Contrast – Misreaction Tendency" cognitive bias is that this frame is aimed at removing what many psychologists (namely Barry Schwartz) refer to as "the paradox of choice". Or, as it's more commonly referred to, "analysis paralysis". Using the less is more frame helps buyers take action by removing the number of choices they have to compare and contrast to, which reduces stagnation, increasing sales.

Persuasion Strategy: The Contrast Frame (The "Contrast – Misreaction Tendency" Cognitive Bias)

"…we understand things in relative terms, not in absolute terms. What does that mean? All right. Is this expensive? Compared to what? Am I tall? Compared to who? IS this a good place to visit? Compared to what [where]? The single most important question in sales and persuasion is not 'what's in it for me'? That's what we're taught in sales training classes. 'What's in it for me?' That's an important question. It's the second most important question. The most important question in sales and persuasion is, 'Compared to what'? The way you make something clear is by contrasting it with something else, not letting it sit on its own."

The example Pink used here is the story of the blind beggar, sitting by a sign that reads, "I am blind". And, a man named Rosser Reeves takes that beggar's cardboard sign and writes, "It is springtime and…I am blind". And, as the legend goes, coins start piling up for the blind beggar. So, in terms of the contrast principle, as Pink puts it, "We understand this person, he can't see. Compared to what? Compared to being someone like me on a beautiful spring day and seeing everything."

Persuasion Strategy: The Blemish Frame (AKA: "Strategic Honesty" or Pre-framing)

The blemish frame. Lucio refers to it as "strategic honesty" in his breakdown of Tai Lopez's manipulative persuasion techniques and, as Lucio points out, Tony Robbins calls it pre-framing in "Power to Influence".

"As persuaders, we often have–whether we're in an official sales encounter or whether we're just in our personal lives–what we offer often isn't perfect. It might have a few blemishes. So, a dilemma that we confront is, 'Do we reveal that blemish or do we conceal that blemish?"

As Pink points out, it's great to point out blemishes because if you only provide a long list of positives to persuade your prospect, they have nothing to compare those positives to. But, with the long list of positives followed by a small negative–a blemish–that small negative will trigger the contrast bias in their brain where they compare that one small negative detail to this long list of major positives. And, by that point, their decision on what to do will be obvious to them.

That being said, it has to be a small blemish. And, sequence matters. It's more effective when the negative follows after a long list of positives.

Note: Tony Robbins likely calls it "pre-framing" not as a way of pre-framing the product or idea, but the relationship as being a relationship built on trust and honesty, which builds rapport. Still, the benefits of this frame improve both their view of the relationship and their view of your product or idea.*

Persuasion Strategy: The Potential Frame

"Buyers tend to overvalue potential more than they should…".

As Pink notes, this is super important in a job interview.
Pink says, "In many cases, as we're interviewing for a job, we're persuaders trying to get someone to hire us, we spend a lot of time talking about all that we've accomplished. And, that can be important. I don't want to discount that. But, what I don't want you to do is spend all your time talking about that and none of your time talking about your potential. Because potential, weirdly enough, is often more persuasive than actual experience."

As you may have noticed, I haven't associated this frame with any cognitive bias. And, that's because Pink's reasoning behind why he believes this frame is effective is because, as he says, "…potential creates uncertainty. When we don't know what something is going to be like we start filling in the blanks. And, often, people will fill in the blanks and make decisions based on what they imagine to be very positive things. And, so, by emphasizing potential in those kinds of [positive] circumstances, you're creating uncertainty. The other person is filling in that uncertainty with something positive."

An example Pink provides is in cases where experienced, working individuals are asking their boss for a promotion:

"The problem that we sometimes have is that when people go further along in their careers, they always go back to their experience. Which, is important, but they don't talk enough about their potential. It's very important if you're looking for a promotion. You've been doing this one role for three or four years. You want to do something else. You want your boss to promote you. You can do a laundry list of everything you've accomplished in your current job, but that might make the boss say, 'Wow, you're really good at this job! I'd like to keep you in this job.' What you want to do is you want to talk about your potential because potential creates uncertainty that the boss will then fill in [with positivity]."

Persuasion Strategy: The Sunk Costs Frame (The "Sunk Costs Fallacy" Cognitive Bias)

"…People tend to overvalue costs that are already sunk [lost forever]. Don't do that. Those are sunk costs [already gone and in the past]. What you want to do is you want to look prospectively, not retrospectively. And, so, be wary of the sunk cost fallacy when you are a buyer. And, where appropriate, keep it in mind when you're a seller."

Here's Pink's example. You bought tickets to a concert. Two tickets that cost you $75 apiece. So, you paid $150 for these tickets and now you can't get a refund because you've already bought them. Two weeks later, it's the night of the concert, it's cold. It's rainy. The venue is far away. You're feeling burnt out from your day at the job. Should you go to that concert?

In an effort to avoid making your purchase a total waste, you might decide to go. But, that's the sunk cost fallacy. If you go to the concert or don't go to that concert, either way, you've already spent the $150. That money is already sunk. So, what you want to do is think about the future, think about what you should do next. And, maybe to preserve your health, it's best not to go to that concert.

The thing is, people tend to overvalue the costs that are already sunk. Once again, avoid that. Think and focus forward, those costs are already gone, they're all in the past now.

Persuasion Strategy: The Anchoring Frame (The "Anchoring" Cognitive Bias)

"Anchoring, in plain and simple terms, is that the first thing that people hear plants in their head and stays there and has a disproportionate impact on how they think and what they believe tan you would imagine…it's a quirk of the human mind, this anchoring bias. It's just that whatever we hear first shapes our views more than it should. It's almost like a defect. And, so, what you have to do is you have to be aware of the defect and act around it."

Note: Pink says, "Now, you can't come up with the anchor out of nowhere. It has to be based on something." And, none of us are immune to the anchoring bias, and the one who sets the anchor often sets the terms of the negotiation and conversation.*

Persuasion Strategy: Choose Your Frames Wisely (Wise Frame-Setting)

"Now, you don't need to use a frame for every single thing. You don't need to repeat frames over and over again."

Think of it as having a workshop and all of these frames are your tools. Whenever you're faced with a situation or persuasive encounter, ask yourself, "Do I need a frame for this circumstance?" And, if yes, use the frame (tool) you have in mind to help the person you want to persuade see things your way.

Persuasion Concept: Pro-Like Pitching

The best pitches do NOT go:

Pitch → Wait for an Applause → They Applaud → They Get Out Their Checkbooks

The best pitches actually go:

Pitch → Invite Their Input → They Provide Input/Feedback → Collaboration

"The purpose of a pitch is not to get a 'yes' right there. The purpose of a pitch is to start a conversation and build a collaboration."

Persuasion Strategy: The Question Pitch

"When the facts are very strongly on your side in making an argument, questions are more persuasive than statements. Questions have to elicit a response. They are inherently interactive. They inherently provoke."

When you ask someone a question that provokes the answer you want them to reach (which they reach because all of the facts are already strongly on your side), they'll come up with their own reasons for doing what you want because they're answer the question, even if you already know what the answer would be. In other words, when people reach your conclusion on their own, that's far more persuasive because, "When people have their own reasons for doing something, they're more likely to do it."

An example is in 1980 when Ronald Reagan was running against Jimmy Carter (who was already President of the US and looking to be re-elected for a second term). Ronald Reagan asked the famous question, "Are you better off now than you were four years ago?" And, when he said that, the people (voters) remembered that, at the time of being asked that question, there are American hostages being taken in Iran, there is an energy crisis, unemployment is high, inflation is high, and a whole other slew of problems are being battled that they weren't having four years ago before Jimmy Carter was in office. And, with those famous words—with that "question pitch"—Reagan was elected as the new President of the United States.

At the same time, question pitches are dangerous for your persuasiveness if the facts are NOT on your side.

An example of this is in 2012 when Mitt Romney was running against the then-President Barack Obama. Mitt Romney tried to use Ronald Reagan's same famous words to win the election, said it once, and never said it again. He asked them in 2012, "Are you better off now than you were four years ago?" And, when people answered that question for themselves, they remembered the Great Recession of 2008 when houses were being foreclosed on their very neighborhood block, people they knew and cared about were out of jobs, and that, yes, they are doing much better now (in 2012 under the leadership of President Obama) than they were four years back. And, as a result, Romney sunk his own ship and President Obama was re-elected for a second term.

"So, when the facts are on your side, pitch with a question."

"One way to fashion a question pitch is to think about the declarative statement that you would make and just turn it into an interrogative."

So, for example, let's say Pink is in the business of selling the world's best carbon monoxide detectors. And, he believes in these, he believes they're truly the best on the market.

> Pink: (declarative statement/what he really wants to say) "These are the best carbon monoxide detectors in the world and you need these to protect your family."

> Pink: (question pitch) "How much is it worth to you to protect your family?"

And, that question pitch might be more effective because the buyer/prospect might respond by saying they can't put a price tag on that. So, they rationalize to themself that paying a few dollars extra for a carbon monoxide detector is nothing in comparison to the value of keeping their family safe.

Persuasion Strategy: The Rhyming Pitch

"The truth is there's a central lesson in linguistics and in persuasion. There are certain things [such as rhyme] that increase processing fluency…Processing fluency is simply that your message goes down a little more easily. When the message goes down more easily, it's easier to absorb. And, it's more likely to be believed [and persuasive]."

As Pink notes, in the OJ Simpson trial, the signal moment of that trial was when they found a pair of gloves and had OJ try them on in front of the jury. And, Johnny Cochran said famously, "It doesn't fit. If it doesn't fit, you must acquit." And, in the end, OJ Simpson did end up getting acquitted.

Persuasion Strategy: The Pixar Pitch

"What some story editors there [at Pixar Studios] have revealed is every Pixar movie has the same basic narrative structure. And, it's os basic, one can reduce it to six sentences…".

1. "Once upon a time…"
2. "Every day…"
3. "One day…"

4. “Because of that…”
5. “Because of that…”
6. “Until finally…”

“I really want to encourage you to use the Pixar pitch in your own pitches. And, I think it’s especially effective for all of you entrepreneurs out there.”

Pink’s example here is a made-up mobile financial service business Pink creates:

1. “Once upon a time, there were tens of millions of Americans who didn’t have access to a bank.”
2. “Every day, they would have to go to check cashing services and worry about where to keep their cash.”
3. “One day, we came along with an app to provide financial service to people who lack access to a traditional bank.”
4. “Because of that, more people were able to use financial services, to get credit.”
5. “Because of that, they were able to support their families better, focus on their jobs…”
6. “Until, finally, the financial system was available to all of us. NOT just the elite, to everybody who was growing and contributing to the modern economy.”

Persuasion Concept: One-Word Equity

Lord Saatchi, the great British adman, says, “…it’s so tumultuous in the marketplace out there that what you want to do is you want to own one word. So, when people think of you, they think of that word. When people think of that word, they think of you.”

For example, when you think Google, chances are you think “search”. And, vice-versa.

Persuasion Strategy: The One-Word Pitch

“I like this idea of one-word equity as an actual pitch saying, ‘The way to understand us is to understand this one word.’ But, I really like it as an exercise to hone your message because if you can distill what you’re about, what you stand for, in a single word, you’re doing something right.”

Take a look at Pink’s example for this one. Pink says, “So, in 2008, when Barack Obama ran for president, it was a single word—one-word equity—’hope’. That’s what it was all about.” To expand on this example a bit might be his ad campaigns and slogan that revolved around that one-word equity, “Yes we can.” And, as Pink further notes, “When he ran for re-election if you look at all of his campaign literature, ‘forward’.

Persuasion Strategy: Write Email Subject Lines People Want to Open

Persuasive email subject lines consist of two main things:

1. Utility: “My subject line has to show that what I’m suggesting in this email is valuable to you, is useful to you.”
2. Curiosity: “Curiosity is, ‘I have to create a little bit of doubt and uncertainty so you’re intrigued enough to open it up.”

Note: You don’t want to be in the middle, between utility and curiosity.*

Ex:

Let’s say, for example, you’re sending an email to your boss.

Subject Line: “Follow-up”

VS

Subject Line: “Two more ideas for budget cuts”

The latter is more persuasive. Again:

Subject Line: “Some ideas”

VS

Subject Line: “A weird idea I just had that might work”

“So, what we want is that when people are receiving a high volume of email, go to utility. When they have a lower volume of email, go to curiosity…every email subject line you write should make the person say, ‘Whoa, I need to open that because it’s going to be useful to me,’ or, ‘Man, I need to find out what that is.” Pink says there should really be no in-between if you want your email subject line to truly be effective.

Persuasion Strategy: Use Granular Numbers (AKA: The Precise Bid Tactic)

“…when you use those granular kinds of numbers, it feels to the recipient like you’ve actually taken some time, you’re being precise, you’re being deliberate. So, when in doubt, rough numbers are less valuable than very granular numbers.”

For example, two hours is less persuasive than 120 minutes. This is also referred to by negotiation expert Barry Nalebuff as the “precise bid tactic“.

Persuasion Strategy: Bringing Your Pitch Into Focus

You need to be able to answer these three essential questions in order to bring your pitch into focus:

1. What do you want the other side to know?
2. What do you want the other side to feel?
3. What do you want the other side to do?

“If you have clear, crisp answers to those questions, your pitch is much more likely to be persuasive.”

Note: Experiment. Maybe there’s a way to put together the rhyming pitch and the question pitch. Have fun when you’re going through the process of figuring out what works for you.*

Persuasion Concept: Buoyancy (AKA: Mental Resiliency)

“Buoyancy measures your ability to float “in an ocean of rejection,” as Daniel calls it. As a seller/persuader, you’re going to hear “no” many more times than “yes.” Managing this means equipping yourself to deal with rejection—a.k.a. becoming more buoyant.”

Persuasion Strategy: The Keys to a Successful Pep Talk (The Keys to Persuasive Self-Talk)

The major key is: instead of engaging in declarative self-talk, engage in interrogative self-talk.

“Instead of affirming yourself and saying you can do this, turn it into a question and ask yourself, ‘Can you do this? And, if so, how?”

Pink says that the self-help gurus hate this because you’re questioning yourself (which, if we’re going by Pink, I suppose self-help gurus will tell you to never do). But, the science shows that it works because the question engages you in a frame of mind that’s more about strategy as the way forward (i.e. “How can I do this?”) instead of raw, base-less core confidence as the way forward (i.e. “OK, I know I can, I know I can, I know I can.”). It also leads your brain to come up with reasons why you actually can do this which builds your confidence in the situation.

"…while positive self-talk can be valuable, what's actually more effective, what, in a way, is more muscular, is the interrogative self-talk. Because it inspires you to answer the question. And, in answering the question, you prepare, you strategize, you rehearse. And, that improves your performance."

Persuasion Concept: The Explanatory Style

"Explanatory style is basically, 'How do you explain your failure or rejection?' And, a lot of us explain it in ways that are personally debilitating and often inaccurate."

Martin Seligman, one of the founders of positive psychology, builds mental resiliency (buoyancy) using what is now often referred to as Seligman's Three P's:

1. Personal – Ask yourself, "Is this personal?" Explain why it's NOT.
2. Pervasive – Ask yourself, "Does this always happen?" Explain why it does NOT.
3. Permanent – Ask yourself, "Is this going to ruin everything?" Explain why it will NOT. Then, also ask yourself, "Is this rejection permanent?" And, finally, explain why it is NOT.

Treat yourself the way that you would treat a friend. Pink notes, "There's another principle in [the] science of behavior called self-compassion. We tend to be relatively compassionate with other people. But, we're less compassionate with ourselves." So, show yourself the same compassion you would show a friend in need.

Persuasion Concept: Introvert, Extrovert, or Ambivert

The research shows that extroverts are more likely to go into sales jobs, get hired in sales jobs, and get promoted in sales jobs. But, introverts have a higher sales performance than extroverts.

Now, a great piece of research out of the University of Pennsylvania actually shows that both introverts and extroverts are easily outperformed by ambiverts.

"An ambivert is someone who is a little bit introverted and a little bit extroverted. They're not strongly one way or the other."

The research showed that ambiverts were the best persuaders because the introverts (at the extreme of their personality type) didn't like to assert themselves and were a little bit shy while the extroverts at their extreme (the highest level of extroversion) weren't good listeners. So, the ambiverts did the best because they are in the middle of both extremes, knowing when to push and when to hold back, when to speak up and when to listen.

Ask Pink notes, "The distribution of introversion and extroversion in the population shows that most of us have the native personality to be effective at sales, persuasion, and influence."

Persuasion Strategy: Develop Your Ambivert Skills (Move Toward the Center)

"…you can't fundamentally change your personality. Introversion, extroversion tends to [both] be reasonably stable over people's lives…It's part of who you are…[BUT] you can make small steps to the center. Not anything big or dramatic, not changing who your essence is, you shouldn't do that. But…you can move a little to the center. You have to get out of your comfort zone a little bit."

Here's how to get out of your comfort zone and move toward the center based on where you are:

Introverts: Spark more conversations with (random) strangers.

Extroverts: Be quiet. Stop talking so much. Listen more. Ask more questions (that invite the other side to do more of the talking).

Persuasion Strategy: Become a Better Listener

Remember:

1. Listening is NOT a form of waiting (for your turn to talk).
2. Do NOT be too quick to jump in (with what you want to say).

Persuade Yourself (Self-Motivation)

"Remember the tool about 'make it easy' [WIIFT]. If you want someone to do something, make it easy for them to do something…Build an off-ramp for yourself [make it easy for yourself]."

The Just Five More Technique (Self-Motivation)

"Say, 'I'm just going to do five more emails.' And, you know what happens? You end up sending 15 more."

Another example is if you're writing a book. When you feel like you don't have it in you to write anymore, you can tell yourself, "Just five more pages."

Set An Interim Goal (Self-Motivation)

"Sometimes it's extremely daunting to have a huge goal…So, what you want to do is set an interim goal…That's easier for me to see. It's easier for me to get to . That gives me the motivation to reach that interim goal. Then, I set another interim goal."

(Daunting) Huge Goal: I'm going to write a whole book.

VS

(Self-Motivating) Interim Goal: I'm going to write a chapter of my book within the next two weeks.

Make A Public Commitment (Self-Motivation)

Announce your goal to the world (perhaps via social media) so the world holds you accountable.

Take A Break (Self-Motivation)

"We know that the most effective breaks are outside rather than inside. They are moving rather than stationary. They're with other people rather than solo."

So, the idea here is to self-motivate yourself to get more done by taking a break to avoid burnout.

"So, if you're looking for some self-motivation, one of the cheapest, most cost-effective things you can possibly do is this. Go out for a five or ten-minute walk with someone you like, outside, talking about something other than work, leaving your phone behind."

Employ Deadlines Cautiously (Self-Motivation)

"Deadlines can be extremely effective if what you're doing is relatively straight-forward. You know pretty much what you need to do. You pretty much know how to do it. Having that deadline—being able to see that deadline in front of you—is going to allow you to finish the task."

"The one area where deadlines don't work so great is when people are doing what social psychologists call 'heuristic work'. That's just a fancy way of saying, 'Work that requires divergent thinking, work that requires greater creativity where you're not sure what problem you're solving, you're still trying to figure it out.' In those cases, deadlines actually inhibit performance."

Also, avoid overusing deadlines when you're in a leadership position. If you "impose" a deadline onto someone else that's too severe, it can actually kill their intrinsic motivation. Instead, get people committed to their action and then use deadlines as a goal, target, or helpful tool to encourage their progress.

When To Pitch (Using Timing to Persuade)

When to go first:

1. If you are NOT the default candidate, you want to go first.Pink's example is if you're running an advertising agency and one of your prospects—your potential clients—is considering getting rid of their existing ad agency. Their existing agency is their default choice. So, they're the default candidate. And, by going first, you look like a fresh, lively new choice in comparison to the choice that's been their existing default for so long.
2. When there are relatively few other candidates."[A] small number of candidates going first gives you the advantage of what's called the 'primacy effect'. People who go first are taken a little bit more seriously."
3. If a lot of your competitors (say, other business, job candidates, etc., etc.) are very strong"…if people see a number of strong candidates one after another when they get to the later ones, they are going to say, '…everybody can't be this good.' And, they'll start more aggressively looking for flaws."

When you do NOT want to go first and, instead, want to go toward the end:

1. If you ARE the default candidate.
2. If there are a lot of competitors."…when there are a huge number of competitors, the people who come toward the end are actually evaluated more highly."
3. If the criteria for selection are not super-clear."They are not sure what kind of firm they want to hire. They're not sure exactly what they're looking for in a candidate. Let the other people who go first figure it out for them. When they get to you, they say, 'Oh, this is exactly what we need."

When To Give Bad News (Using Timing to Persuade)

"…in general, you're better off starting with the bad news and going to the good news. That's what people want to hear."

For more, see John B. Ullmen's point on this.

Schedule Tough Requests After Breaks (Using Timing to Persuade)

"When people make decisions, particularly when they're confronted with a decision, they have in their back pocket a default decision. And, that default decision is almost always 'no'. So, you ask your boss for a raise, the default decision is 'no'…people are more likely to overcome the default early in the day and immediately after breaks. If you have a tough prospect and you know the default answer is 'no', you might have a marginally better chance if you approach that person early in the day or immediately after that person has taken a break."

Pink notes that this will only give you a tiny edge or advantage and that while he doesn't want to overstate or exaggerate the effectiveness of this particular strategy, small edges such as the one this one gives can still be meaningful in getting what you want.

Leverage Your Internal Rhythms For Productivity

Bullet Summary

- Beginning: "Pick a date or day of the week that makes symbolic sense to begin something big. Starting on a Monday (rather than, say, a Thursday) is more likely to help your project be a success. Also, do a premortem by generating a list of potential stumbling blocks and blind spots as part of your preparation. Once you identify those, formulate a plan for how to avoid them and jot down a few practical solutions in case they do arise."

- Middle: “These are tricky. Sometimes they drag us down; research shows that happiness tends to lag in midlife. But when used properly, they can also fire us up. In that spirit, try using project midpoints as a form of motivation. If you can think of yourself as slightly behind when reaching the midpoint of a project, it might encourage you to pick up the pace.”
- Ending: “They should energize you. People tend to push harder once the end is in sight. Who doesn’t love going out on top? Use the looming finish line of a project as an opportunity to make things happen.”

Internal Rhythms – Beginning

The Premortem Technique

“A post-mortem is when the body dies and you try to figure out what caused the death. A pre-mortem is when you look at the dead body while it’s still alive.”

For example, if you’re going to start a new sales campaign for your business, collect your team and think about it being one year from that campaign. Everything has gone wrong. you didn’t make enough sales, your existing customers are angry and leaving to join your competitors. Your team members are actually fighting with each other. Then, think about what went wrong. Make a list of everything that contributed to causing this disaster. And, use that list to avoid those mistakes.

“Figure out the problem before the problem occurs. And, do everything you can to avoid it.”

Internal Rhythms – Middle

1. Recognize that it’s a midpoint.
2. Use that midpoint as an alarm clock.
3. Imagine yourself a little bit behind.

An example is if you have a project that’s due in 30 days, don’t start working on that project until day 15. That way, the midpoint in your timetable becomes an alarm clock to get going because you can imagine yourself being a little bit behind.

Internal Rhythms – Ending

Endgame Persuasion (Using Timing to Persuade)

“Whatever happens at the end of an experience is often more memorable than many of the things that happened throughout that experience.”

Real-Life Applications

1. Set the Frame

Often, we’ll find ourselves in situations where we need to engage in frame control and frame negotiations. But, what about when we have the opportunity to go first and we need to actually set the frame?

In a lot of cases, using Daniel Pink’s nine frames that leverage the cognitive biases within our minds is a great way to start your frame negotiation off in a way that allows you to dictate the terms of the interaction. One of the only exceptions would be in cases where you’re dealing with people who are great conversationalists capable of reading, controlling, and negotiating frames, which, most people aren’t.

CONS

- Less Live Negotiations

Out of the entire course, there was only one video where you got to see Pink uses his teachings in action. Compared to the Voss Masterclass where there were six videos of Voss engaging in a live, unscripted negotiation, that's a huge step down.

PROS

- Beautiful, Informative Workbook

It seems that ever since Masterclass stepped up their branding, their workbooks are also more engaging and contain summaries of the Masterclass teacher's lessons that are much more accurate.

- Lessons Are Packed

You open one lesson and feel like you must take notes so you don't miss anything juicy. Lots of value in each lesson in terms of persuasion. And, Pink references popular social psychologists and bodies of research to back up his teachings that you are able to look into yourself if you decide.

Last Minute Resistance: 10 Proven Ways to Handle Them

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Last-Minute Resistance (LMR) refers to the hesitation or verbal and non-verbal pushback a woman may express when physical intimacy escalates toward sex. It can stem from a variety of factors, including internal comfort levels, social pressure, or the need for further trust-building before proceeding.

Handling last-minute resistance is NOT about 'overcoming a no'—it's about addressing the doubts that cause her to stall on a decision she has already made.

In this article, we will learn how to handle last-minute resistance in a safe, attractive, and high-value manner to successfully proceed towards a mutually satisfying experience.

TPM Ethics: LMR navigation only applies in the context of Active, Enthusiastic Consent
Any seduction requires full willingness and consent from her. If she does not want to be intimate with you, you immediately stop.
Trying to go against her will is not only unseductive, but it's also dishonorable, immoral, and illegal. Do not do it.

Why Do LMR Even Happen?

Why do LMR happen?

Test yourself, and pick what you think applies:

1. She is testing the man to assess his character and/or will

2. He hasn't timed his escalation well
3. She likes him, but is not fully sold on taking it to the next level
4. She is emotional or nervous
5. She is making him wait to seem more "serious" and Madonna-like
6. She needs some more time and comfort before sex

If you answered "it can be all", congratulations, you're a high mating intelligence man.

Albeit LMR and sexual rejections can be a form of shit-test, that's the least common scenario.
A woman who decides to be in a sex location with you has probably done most of her testing already -or, if she sees you as a really high-value man, she won't need even need any testing at all-.

But overall, focus less on the "why" and more on the "how" -how to avoid LMR, and how to deal with LMR-.

How to Handle LMR

Here's the power dynamics principle of LMR:

⚖ The more she stalls his advances, the lower value he becomes

The basic dynamics of last-minute resistance are that he's chasing for sex, while she's denying him.
Unless she displays equal or stronger signs of attraction, the frame is that he wants her, but she doesn't. And fruitlessly expands efforts while failing to reach his goal -the definition of powerlessness:

The Effort-Return Matrix from Social Investment Theory (Buffalmano, 2026). Men expanding much effort and not advancing signal they're lower power, which is unseductive

She, on the other hand, is the object of desire. Even if she agrees to sex later, she has been controlling the interaction, and its tempo.
And that gives her power.

At the extreme, men who aren't good at understanding and controlling this dynamic, become puppets on a string - her string-.

And what's the problem with that?

The problem is that women don't like men who are "less" than they are (see "hypergamy").
And especially not men who are less powerful than they are.

That's why the rule of thumb is "sooner is better".
Because the longer the last-minute resistance, the more challenging it is for him to maintain control and power -and her attraction-.

Pursuing Sex Without Losing Power

Luckily, there are ways around the LMR power conundrum.

And there are even ways to deal with LMR while gaining power and attraction.

How?

This is how:

1. Prevent LMRs

Prevention is the best cure:

1. Make her attracted
2. Make her comfortable
3. Display open-mindedness around sex

And, ideally, frame yourself as a lover.

See Sexual Escalation or, better yet, Seduction University for the details.

However, remember this:

A minimum of hesitation is often expected because first-time sex is a big deal for many women.

2. "Tidal Escalation": Slow But Steady (& Calibrate To Her Reactions)

It's not my favorite style, but it works great.

Especially if your game is more indirect and if you date lower dominance.

Last minute resistances can be an issue if:

1. you escalate way too early
2. you escalate way too slow
3. you escalate foo forcefully (unless she's willing and he's a top seducer, see dominance article)

So a good mindset is to be like a tidal wave: always forward, but never too fast.

Early pick-up artists also talked about "2 steps forward, 1 step back", which is a good rule of thumb.
That means that, generally speaking, you want to pull back before she resists and rejects you. But when you re-initiate, you want to go further than before.

Here are a few ways:

1. Increase touching, see how she reacts: Start with lighter touching, then leave your hand on her arm or back as you speak, and see how she reacts. If she pulls away or is uncomfortable, stop. If she appreciates, good sign. Hand-holding is a bigger step, and a bigger risk, but if things are going well, go for it. PRO Tip: go for interlacing fingers. It's more intimate, and a symbolic precursor to sexual union.

2. Take baby steps: The bigger the move, the bigger the effects of a rejection. With baby steps, possible rejections won't harm you nearly as much. A seducer I know has a shisha that he uses both as a lure to invite girls home, and as a prop to make his first move in baby steps. He starts by blowing shisha smoke from mouth to mouth with his hand first, then removes the hand and goes for the mouth-to-mouth smoke, then makes out, and then takes it from there.
3. Make the move in a safe environment: For example, if you use an elevator home, lean in and kiss her neck in the elevator. Her reaction also tells you a lot about where you stand, and helps you calibrate your next steps. If she stands still, it's a good sign. If she caresses you or gets closer, you can start escalating as soon as you're home, no LMR.

And reframe unsafe to safe.
For example:

> Her: If you keep doing that, I'll scream/leave
> You: Whoa, let's take a second why are you saying that. I'm not here to make you feel pressured. If you're not feeling it, we can just hang out. I'm only interested if we're both having a good time."

PRO Tip: Kiss The Neck, Not The Mouth

The kiss on the mouth feels like a "big move".

And that increases the chance of getting a first rejection, plus makes the rejection a big deal. Bad for power dynamics, and leads to more LMRs.

What to do, then?

Kiss her on the neck!
Feels like a "smaller" move, allows you to better gauge her reaction, and has higher chances of being accepted.

Also, if you're moving quick and/or going for the lover strategy, you don't need to kiss at all to get to sex.

⍰♂Lucio's Take: Kissing Not Needed

Lucio:
In my observation of high-intensity 'Lover Strategy' encounters, kissing is not a prerequisite for sex, nor a key 'escalation milestone'.

In approximately 80% of my last several dates, we did not kiss at all pre-intimacy.

3. Adopt A Win-Win Mindset

Some guys have this bad mindset:

> I need to beat her LMR.

And when you have that mindset, what happens?
You're in a competitive, "you VS her" mindset.

Competitive mindsets certainly spoil relationships, and often also spoil first-times to sex.

This is how collaborative approaches and mindsets look like:

- "Deep down, we both want this"
- "I like you and you like me, so we'll play the game now, and eventually get there"
- "We're in it together, and you also must do your part to make it pleasant and seduce me"

The last one is my favorite mindset approach to LMR.
It's a give-and-take approach, and very power-effective. It expects and assertively demands her to contribute, and if she doesn't, it's fair for you to end it.

3.2. Turn Competition into Cooperation

See "Seduction University".

4. Make It A Great Time, Of Which Sex Is Just One Part

Doesn't look like the type of interaction that will have lots of LMR, right?
You get little LMR when sex is only one part of a bigger, pleasant interaction of two people who like each other.

Here's an example of a pleasant, "more than just sex" interaction:

1. She doesn't want to move to the bed
2. Instead of pushing, you say "have you ever tried shisha"?
3. Pull the shisha out
4. Smoke together, kiss her neck, make out a bit
5. Pause a second, as if to savor the moment
6. Slowly get up again, and move her to the bed
7. On the bed, she doesn't want to remove her pants
8. You say "you know what's funny?"
9. Open a new topic (something personal, or with a sexual undertone)
10. Talk a bit
11. Slowly start dry humping
12. Then go to remove the pants

Notice that after each rejection he goes back to the relationship level again and the "good time".
That breaks the chasing/refusing pattern, so he's not disempowered, but empowered by the good vibes.

5. Steal Her Frame: Say "No Sex" First

Women say this often:

> Woman: we're not going to have sex

It's a tricky frame.
If you say you will have sex, it turns into "you want her, she rejects you".
And if you say "true", then you're following and buying into her frame.

Conundrum!

A good solution is to prevent it.

How?

Simple:

> You: we're just going for a minute to show you the wine collection, I need to wake up early tomorrow

It's a good move independently of LMR, just to take the pressure off on your invite home.
For example, I often add "yeah, it's just right here, for 5 minutes".

Or a bit cheesier:

> You: (as you invite her home) But don't make yourself any idea, we're just hanging out

Not personally my style, but can work if your style is more humorous and teasing.

If you forgot to do steal her thunder or if it's not your style, you can still turn it around if it crops up:

> Her: We're not having sex
> You: Who said anything about sex, we're just cuddling

6. Take The Shortest Path

A good chunk of LMR are about "removing clothes".

But… You don't need to be fully naked to start having sex.

At the time of the first draft, my last two pulls home was a girl I met at a Meetup event, and a beautiful girl, black hair and blue whom I talked to for no more than 10 minutes at a mall and mate later that night (note: I started this article a year before I published as I sometimes take notes on future articles).

The first girl was still wearing her dress and panties when we became intimate.
The second was still wearing her dress, denim jacket, panties, and shorts.
No kidding!

7. Make Her Want It: The 'Wet Boiling Point' of Readiness

The safest and most effective approach is, of course, to make her crave intimacy.

For example, in the example above, we could move fast because she was turned on.

Use your fingers to pleasure her. Be a giver, make her moan with pleasure. Once you reach that boiling point, she will want you 'in full'.

8. Keep It Light & Seductive, Avoid Anger & Frustration

> Some resistance whet the appetite
> Casanova, History of My Life

Many guys derail seduction but getting angry and frustrated.
Don't do it! That's not only unseductive, but can make women worried about their safety.

Frustration is also an indicator of low-value as it shows you're emotionally overreactive.

If you don't want to play the game anymore, it's fair, and you can state that honestly. For example "I like you, but I truly don't have time for all these games. If you like me too, now it's time".

Let's see how to avoid anger and frustration:

8.2. Game of Masculinity & Femininity

Masculinity projects confidence and advances. Femininity plays it coy.

You're both playing that game, and that's a good seducer's mindset.

8.3. Keep It Light & Fun

A favorite of mine.

This is so good that I almost didn't wanna share it:

> Me: (takes her hand, places it on his penis) do you think it's too big?

This works in a number of ways: (sort of) light-heartedness, push-pull, sexually exciting her… And to positively change the frame.
The question changes the frame from "should we have sex" to "can you take it".

You can turn it into recurring insider humor, asking later if she still thinks it's too big or if it was OK.

8.4. Be Empathetic

In some cases, a woman can have real issues, reservations, or hang-ups about sex.

Failing to listen, empathize, and address them spoils the relationship and derails the seduction.

A good empathetic response is to say something along the lines of:

> Her: Wait, this is too fast
> You: OK, all good, we will go as fast as we are comfortable with

Say "we are" because it reinforces the collaborative and "us" frame, and it doesn't sound like you're waiting for her.

8.5. Drop The "Must Mindset"

Who gets frustrated with LMRs?

It's the guy who feels like he "has to" sleep with her.
The notch-collectors who need the validation, and those who desperately need her in their life.

Abundance mentality is a better approach.
Plus these mindsets to dating in general:

- You only want a girlfriend if she's a great woman plus a great fit for you
- Dating for you is a way to assess women. LMRs are just another opportunity for assessing her

These mindsets are perfect for those who are dating with a long-term goal.

⚠ 9. Resolut Approach: Acting On Desire (Not Recommended)

One video is worth a thousand words:

This is ONLY for advanced men who can spot genuine attraction.
In reality, misreading signals can easily lead to crossing boundaries, so we strongly recommend to avoid it.

10. Mix Escalation With Softness

A bit more advanced, but super powerful.

You want to mix "hard pushes" with sweeter, mellow, romantic, and even silly and fun moments.
This is great because it mixes sexually dominant behavior -which is attractive but at high risk of spoiling the relationship-, with a romantic and carefree vibe that takes the edge off.

Careful With Common PUA Advice

Some advice to be wary of:

Getting undressed while she's dressed

IF timely, IF she likes how you look and IF she's a high sex-drive woman, it can be a good move.

Yet, getting naked while she's still fully dressed looks "weird", and sub-communicates you "don't get it" (=socially clueless).
And from a power dynamics perspective, it frames you as the one who craves sex while she doesn't.

Whipping your penis out

Great move, if it's timely.

But if you do it too early, it can easily backfire.
The untimely "whip out" followed by a "whisk back" looks like exhibitionist flashing. And exhibitionism is anti-seductive.

It's strategically much better to let her feel you from the pants, and only pull out when ready to go the distance.

⚠ Agreeing verbally, but keeping with the escalation

This is a red level risk in modern settings.
Plus, it's dishonorable and signals that you're not a man of your word, but a sneaky liar.

Freezing her out

This is an old PUA technique.

"The Game" and "Mystery Method" both included it, and it consists of stopping pursuing the woman when she deflects or stalls his advances.

This is an example:

> Her: you're so full of shit
> Him: (start moving away from her) you're right, I'm so full of shit (goes sit on the couch)

The idea behind the freeze-out is OK: you don't want to keep over-chasing and reward with attention a woman who is spurning you.

But the way the freeze-out was espoused, including "getting up and checking your email", was not optimal because:

1. It can break rapport and deplete a lot of social capital
2. It can start a vicious cycle of "who shows the least affection". If the woman is high in power and not very invested, she'd rather lose you, than lose her face
3. Can signal low value: high-value, driven men wouldn't dilly-dally with low-prio stuff when they could invite her out and take care of higher-prio stuff

Read more here.

"Micro-freeze outs" are better, for example removing your attention when she misbehaves -and that works beyond LMR-.

Surprisingly Great LMR Signs

Knowing how to read the social and power dynamics is crucial to handling LMR well.

Reading those signs allows you to calibrate your escalation in a way that's both effective, seductive, and safe.

Some of those signs:

- She starts acting silly: Many women who get nervous before sex can start acting "silly", or talk nonsense. Several women I've dated around the world started speaking their local language even though they knew I couldn't understand. Usually, that's a great sign: it's pure emotions now, she's not engaging her rational brain much, and she's relinquishing leadership to you -people who want to maintain control don't usually act silly-.
- She asks to visit the bathroom: She decided that it's going to happen, and wants to refresh herself. Some women will also ask you to take a shower before sex -I'll never forget the woman who brought along of intimate cleanser, and put some of it on "me"-.

- She asks if you want to have sex with her: This one often stumps Western men traveling in different cultures. But if she asks you to, don't over-deny your intentions. Say you like her, that you have good chemistry, and that intimacy is a natural next step
- She asks personal questions or 'why did you say hello to her': she wants to be reassured about your background, and that you truly liked her, and that you're not an inveterate player

The Nuances of Verbal Boundaries

While the "No Means No" standard is the essential baseline for consent, real-world social dynamics are often more complex. Sometimes, a verbal "no" or "stop" is a definitive boundary that must be respected immediately.

Other times, a woman may express "Token Resistance"—a psychological phenomenon where she feels a conflict between her desire and social pressures (like "Anti-Slut Defense"). In these cases, she isn't necessarily saying she wants to stop the interaction; she may be looking for more comfort, a slower pace, or for the man to take more responsibility for the escalation.

Distinguishing between a Hard Stop and Social Hesitation is a core component of Mating Intelligence. It requires high-level social calibration to ensure you are never pushing past a genuine boundary while still leading the interaction effectively.

Swoon: 20 Traits of The Greatest Seducers of All Time (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Swoon (2014) is a book on history's greatest seducers, their seduction strategies, and, in a way, an atypical, yet groundbreaking dating advice book for men.
Betsy Prioleau, the author, studied and analyzed history's great seducers, and teased out what makes these ladies' men so attractive and successful with women.

Notes

About the Author:
Betsy Prioleau holds a Ph.D. in literature from Duke University, was an associate professor at Manhattan College, and taught cultural history at New York University.
She is also the author of "Seductresses", the equivalent of this book, but for female seductresses.

Types of Seducers

First of all, check this article:

- Types of seducers

> 10 Types of Male Seducers: Pick Your Niche!

It's one of the best articles around on "seducers' archetypes".

Now back to the Prioleau, she first lists the "distortions" of seducers:

- Satanic seducer: cold and calculative, hates women, and only cares about adding sexual partners (notch-counter)

The author says that men who despise women, or who seek to destroy women, aren't real ladies' men.

At the extreme end of the satanic seducer, the most value-taking "player" is the pathological player, the sociopath.

For more read these two articles on psychopathy and sexual success, and psychopathy and sexual strategy.

> Psychopaths' Sexual Strategy: Marauders of Sex

- The PUA Player: the "pick-up artist" who reads online and then goes out to play

I love Prioleau's description:

> By Casanovan standards, the goal is modest: not to get loved (another league) but to get laid.

She has a point: many pick-up artists are bad at seducing hearts when compared to some of the "natural" lovers of women.
Betsy is more interested in the power in seduction, what makes women swoon and fall hopelessly in love -which is similar to Robert Greene's approach in "The Art of Seduction".

And she delivers a zinger to Neil Strauss, author of "The Game":

> Gamer convert Neil Strauss says he studied with pickup artists for two years to "become what every woman wants—not what she says she wants, but what she really wants." But he went to the wrong school. Real-world enchanters provide a different message as well as a different grade of woman from Strauss's sad assortment

- The therapy heartthrob: "Mr. Wonderful" of couples therapy

He is the flip side of the player.

Betsy mocks him:

> Instead of a tough hombre with Machiavellian schemes, this epitome of male sex appeal has been sensitized, civilized, and customized for a postfeminist generation.

He is communicative, empathic, and "housebroken".

And the author doesn't spare a shot to John Gottman:

> At Dr. John Gottman's "love laboratory" in Seattle, men learn to communicate, express feelings, listen, and validate. This love-coached ladies' man also learns to be a fair fighter.

- The Darwinian alpha male: the "Mr. Perfect" who has it all, handsome, rich, tall, fit

This one deserves its own paragraph, so keep on reading.

- The real woman-pleaser: coming on all stripes, but more often than not, high-quality men, who love with abandon

The author says that real ladies' men are not superheroes and sometimes not even great.
They also have their up and downs, hang-ups, and "unhinged moments". Some of them do are crazy artists or very emotional -Casanova planned suicide at a certain point-.

But real seducers aren't just poor artists.
A real world analysis also smashes that myth.

Says the author:

> As a group, they challenge the disease model of the seducer. Not infrequently, they belong to another category:

> the supernormal men of positive psychology. Most share some or all of the qualities of the actualized "healthy human specimen"—ego strength, vitality, resilience, authenticity, creativity, autonomy, nonconformity, personal growth, and the capacity to love.

What's different for "real seducers", is that they actually don't hide, and play little "feigning disinterest" games. Says the author of Aly Khan:

> He came on strong. Lovers said he singled them out of the crowd at parties and made a beeline for them (…)
> Khan was always "madly, deeply" in love—however briefly—and wore his heart on his sleeve

Plus, they invest a lot, with abandon, without sparing anything.

The Myth of The Darwinian Alpha Male (VS Real-World Seducers)

The author takes on the "Darwinian alpha male" early on.

And, overall, she is very skeptical of evolutionary psychology's portrait of the attractive man.
The author says that the "Darwinian" qualities vary among authors but, overall, almost all agree on these four:

1. money and status
2. stability and fidelity
3. kindness and compatibility
4. physical superiority

My Note: bit of an overstated case against evo psych
Personally, I haven't noticed many evolutionary psychologists putting fidelity or "compatibility" very high on their list of attractive qualities for men, and especially not for short-term mating. So this one felt a bit like a strawman argument. The author also mocks the "provider" image of some evolutionary psychologist, but the discipline now more and more recognize the two different temporal modes of dating: short VS long term, with some men able to do attract women even while not being "strong providers", as the author correctly says.

Prioleau mocks the stereotype of the ladies' man, who by Darwinian standards is "tall, buff, and handsome with biceps like Smithfield hams and bulging crotches", and says:

> The Real Alpha Male Science popularizers never tire of saying that "from a biological standpoint we're still prehistoric." If so, ladies' men hail from another prehistory. The kind of men who consistently enrapt women call the whole Darwinian alpha model into question.
> Gabriele D'Annunzio is typical (…) Proof against evolutionary progress, he was a sad physical specimen.

And she goes on:

> It takes more, much more than evolutionary psychology imagines, to enthrall women.

Well, in many ways, she is right.

But not in her criticism of evolutionary psychology, which sounds too much like a dismissal.
Both are right. All those Darwinian traits do are attractive and do help -a lot-, but the author also makes very true -and demonstrable- point by discussing successful ladies' men who ostensibly wouldn't score too high in Darwinian checklists.

The difference is that for those men with lots of attractive traits, attraction from women comes easily. Those who don't have those Darwinian attractive traits need to be great in some other realms, but can also be equally -or more- successful (as well as more stereotypically ladies' men when it comes to making women fall in love).

Real-World Ladies' Men

The real-world ladies' man defies stereotypes.

Says Prioleau:

> He transcends easy generalizations and defeats categories—the angel/devil, wuss/he-man polarities—and personifies complexity.

However, a few traits seem to repeat, including:

1. Charisma

A woman can just feel a ladies' man, says the author.

You don't need all of these traits, it's not a checklist, and a great lover can throw a few sparks of a few of them.

To make up ladies' men charisma:

1.1. Passion, passion for life, élan

> Real ladies' men pulse with ebullience.
> Nineteenth-century French Romantic poet Alfred de Musset won the hearts of half of the Parisian female population with his "delicious verve." (…) The actress Rachel doted on him (…) His greatest coup was his conquest of literary celebrity George Sand. Deploying an élan assault, he paraded his vitality before her like a "peacock before a demure, quiet little peahen."

1.2. Intensity

Says Prioleau:

> "Emotional intensity," exceptional personal force, is one of the hallmarks of charisma. It also defines erotic passion. Casanova credited his conquests to his sheer ardor: "I turned the heads of some hundreds of women," he wrote, "because I was neither tender nor gallant nor pathetic. I was passionate."

One of the men she interviewed as one of the supposed "ladies' men", says that he once saw a stunning blonde, U-turned, and knocked on office doors until he found her. and then said "let's get out of here". He loved that woman, he said, and he'd fly to LA just to have dinner with her.

1.3. Sex drive

Ladies' men crave to possess the object of their desires.

1.4. Love of women

Ladies' men love women, and generally enjoy their company.

I think this is a crucial trait to keep in mind since in some corner of the manosphere, including corners about pick-up and seduction, the "medicine" to become better men is to spend less time with women, and more time with "male-only spaces".

Says the author:

> Boys are raised to boycott the girls' club and bond with each other. The "bromance" tradition is ancient and deep-dyed, a devotion to male friends that can be "wonderful, passing the love of women." In the extreme, it tips over into misogyny.

She has a point, some of those authors who encourage "more male-only bonding" are indeed misogynists, see the red pill for example:

Instead, ladies' men:

> By contrast, ladies' men like women inside and out and seek their companionship.

Loving and appreciating women is not something that has anything to do with being masculine, strong, or leader-like.
For example:

> Casanova was never a man's man, although he excelled in daredevil masculine pursuits like spying and dueling.

1.5. Androgyny

> Counterintuitive as it seems, gender ambiguity is immensely seductive. In theory, the Darwinian he-man ought to get the valentines, but oddly enough, a man in touch with his inner femininity frequently has the romantic edge with women.

How come this is the case, while men who like more masculine women are far rarer?
Well, the author says that, based on studies (Chivers et al., 2004; Huberman and Chivers, 2015), it might be because women tend to naturally be more bisexual:

> Researcher Meredith Chivers has found that women differ from men in their sexual tastes. When she attached female subjects to a photoplethysmograph while they watched erotic movies, she discovered that they shared a marked predilection for bisexuality.

Women's sexual arousal indeed seems to be non-gender specific. To test the non-specificity of female sexuality, nonhuman sexual videos were shown, and women showed little arousal even nont non-human sex scenes (but very little compared to either human male sex scenes, and human female sex scenes, see Chivers and Bailey, 2005).

And the author goes further:

> Other studies show women consistently preferring computerized images of feminized male faces and choosing more androgynous men in audio interviews.

I wish she had quoted the study, but eventually found something similar (see below).

Continues the author:

> Whether subtle or pronounced, many great lovers have a distinct feminine streak.
> (…)
> Casanova, too, had an overt distaff side—an aesthetic sensibility, a sentimentality, and a penchant for cross-dressing. Byron's androgyny was so apparent that the sultan Mahmud refused to believe he wasn't "a woman dressed in man's clothes."

Even Gary Cooper, the icon of masculinity, was quite androgynous , says the author:

Gary Cooper, icon of tough masculinigy, was quite androgynous

1.6. Creativity

Here Prioleau quotes evolutionary psychologist Miller, who theorizes that humankind developed big brains because of (female) sexual selection.

The author says that "early womankind sought mental excellence, and creative intelligence in particular".

But there is more than just evolutionary psychology theory, and plenty of real-life examples prove the allure of creativity:

> A disproportionate number of ladykillers trade on the sexual charisma of creativity. History is chocked with poets, musicians, painters, dancers, actors, and "creatives" who prospered with women.

I agree with that.

1.7. Quicksilver, unconventional

The author restates that many women don't fall for the provider type. , but instead are swept away but the free-souled nonconformists.

It's not a necessity to be unconventional, and not all ladikillers are noncomforists, but it can add an edge of excitement.

1.8. Flawed manhood

> Pop psychologists and coaches who tout ironclad confidence as the key to sexual charisma may need a reality check. A hairline crack in a man's aplomb, a hint of vulnerability—either physical or psychological—can turn a woman inside out.

Interestingly enough, by "flawed" the author doesn't only mean just "emotionally", but also physically.

For example talking about Douglas Day:

> More than his beauty and brilliance, it was his walk. He had a mysterious gimp leg, and when he limped down Cabell Hall, women dissolved.

Preioleau goes beyond the usual "chink in the armor" popular in seduction circles, and expands on that "chink" quite a bit.

And among the real-life examples:

> Great lovers with a "divine defect" are surprisingly numerous. Aldous Huxley and Potemkin were nearly blind, and Charlemagne, Talleyrand, and Gary Cooper limped. Lord Byron, with his club foot and bruised sensibilities, devastated women, just as Jack London's and Richard Burton's tortured souls played havoc with female hearts.

On Cynthia Basinet commenting on Jack Nicholson, explaining why she could never leave Nicholson, said "I saw such a wonderful vulnerable person . . . I vowed never to hurt him."

But weaknesses must be compensated by other attractive qualities. The author, finally seemingly aware of the "exchange nature" of the sexual marketplace, also says that "The more extreme the flaws, the greater the need for compensatory attractions".
And later on, she talks about the weak/strong alloy, the mix, that is attractive.

In her words:

> Despite the propaganda, bulletproof self-esteem and a perfect package aren't the ticket. It's an "enigmatic tang" of injury, a pinch of flaw in the confidence brew that fells women every time.

2. Character

You don't need all of the following traits and, if you have none, don't despair: many of them, you can acquire.

2.1. Morality/Virtue

Virtue and morality doesn't mean "goody good".
The author says that unalloyed virtue has zero allure.

And so is the opposite end of the spectrum: albeit some women fancy the reprobate for a fling, the real attraction is in the middle

The ladies' men are fundamentally decent, but prone to bend the rules, and can be morally mixed.
They also know how to make goodness charming, says the author.

Quoting Horgan who reviews the literature on the nice guy / bad boy, she says that "women desire a combination of both—niceness commingled with deviltry, and served up seductively".

2.2. Courage

What I've noticed is that often the courage is exercised during the seduction.
Being courageous far from a woman, outside of seduction in, say, war, seems to mean little.

2.3. Spiritual Cultivation

Male spirituality is attractive to women, and it's been leveraged by so many exploiters throughout history that the author says that "the man of God is one of the dark seducer's favorite guises".

Religious deceit does not belong to the great seducers though, who are more straightforward and sincere about their passions.
When spiritual cultivation empowered seduction, the great seducers tended to be true believers.

Talking about pianist Franz Lizsts:

> To Countess Marie d'Agoult, who left her husband and children for him, he spoke only of the "destiny of mankind" and "promises of religion." Later, he captivated a Russian princess (who also abandoned her spouse for him) through spiritual communions in her crucifix-filled bedroom. She called him a "masterpiece of God."

2.4. Knowledge/Intelligence

Yes, intelligence is attractive.
But it's not IQ points or random knowledge that is attractive, it's how that intelligence is used.

> Women-charmers understand how to make intelligence seductive; they sparkle with mental energy, surprise, amuse, instruct, up the drama, and surf the whole realm of knowledge—high-, middle-, and lowbrow.

Also read "mating intellingece".

> Mating Intelligence: Effective Dating for Smart People

Sometimes having erudite conversations can also be seductive, as well as helping overcome lacks in some other areas.
For example:

> A number of unlikely ladies' men used their heads to enchant women.
> The diminutive eighteenth-century philosopher Voltaire (…) kept the tall, brilliant beauty Émilie du Châtelet interested for thirteen years. He challenged her to scientific competitions, staged plays and poetry readings, debated politics, and traded repartee with her over four-hour dinners.
> And then there's mathematician Bertrand Russell. Gaunt and small, with a "Mad Hatter's" features, bad breath, and a high, fluty voice, he disheveled women, accumulating four wives and many lovers. (One was my great aunt Barry Fox, who collared him in New York and gave him "several enjoyable evenings.")

2.5. Social IQ

> What it boils down to is savoir faire: a radar for other people's feelings, mastery of synchrony, and the practical skill to get the answer yes

For the best seducers, the social IQ helps them understand women and their hidden desires.

2.6. Pleasure

> The mantra of romance heroes is “relax, gorge your senses, let me show you a good time.”

Talking about Porfirio Rubirosa:

> He conquered Zsa Zsa Gabor through a different tack. For the stressed-out movie star, he delivered sabbaticals of Hungarian food, getaway weekends, and uninhibited all-night revels where Rubi drummed with the band and led musicians home for ham-and-egg feasts. “We were like two children,” recalled Gabor, “pleasure seeking, hedonistic.” “I am, and always will be,” he said, “a man of pleasure.”

2.7. Self-Realization

> Complete, multifaceted personhood is the peak of character development—and seductive allure.

3. Lassoing Love Through The Senses

This is Part II, looking at the seduction approaches and behaviors.

Cerebral charms later take over and ignite the deeper passions and love. But first come the senses.

- Appearance: Johnny Depp example who ornaments himself for maximum erotic impact
- The Body Beautiful: if it’s there, it helps
- Fashion and Grooming:

“Put pinstripes and a Rolex on a non-looker, and most female subjects will choose him over a male model in a fast-food uniform”, says the author referencing a popular study.

But it’s not necessarily about looking rich, says the author. A fashion sense instead should stand out, and flatter the individual’s taste and uniqueness.

3.4. Setting

Ladies’ men go for impact, a sensual skylift.

It might be plush and luxurious, but it doesn’t have to. The author says that “settings that seduce are the work of artists of ambiance—charmed sanctums designed to ravish women and raise the roof”.

3.5. Music

Music is the “most excstatic of the arts”.

Musicians and singers are some of the most sought-after men, and the author mentions Sianatra, who wasn’t an attractive man but who had hordes of women pining after him.

You don’t have to be a musician to use the seductive power of music, though.

3.6. Kinetic Voodoo: Body Language and Dance

On dance, Prioleau says that based on research by Buss and Meston, women sometimes want to have sex with a man simply based on how he dances.

Most men, however, are not good dancers and movers, as they are trained to hide emotions, instead of letting them flow.

And Prioleau takes another hilarious stab at some of the "alpha male" dating coaches:

> "Dancing with a woman," they instruct, is "not the ultimate goal"; "the dance floor is not the natural habitat of the alpha male." If "alpha" means king of the hill in the boys' game, they're right. But enswooning women is an adult art, designed for animated, poetic body-speakers and princes of the ballroom.

3.7. Sexpertise

Contrary to "The 4h Body" in which Tim Ferris shares how to get her to orgasm in the quickest way possible -15 minutes stopwatch at hand, he says-, lovers subscribe to the "slow sex movement", where "andante" pace has the edge.

You can learn much of it, the author says that Jack Nicholson was really bad until he learned and studied.
But one of the biggest secret is to be "all in". Says the author:

> To hit the high notes in bed, a man has to be "all in"—body, soul, and sensual intuition. And it helps if you adore each other. As the Kāma Sūtra admits, no instruction or advice "will be needed by those who are properly in love."

3.8. Gifts and Wallets

Gifts have their charm and, the author says, are "embedded in the feminine ideology of love".

But gifts should be thoughtful, romantic, personalized, and enchanting.
Says the author:

> Practicality is also a no-no in presents; hold the smoke alarms and robo-cleaners. Gifts must fulfill their primal, first function, when they were objects of magic and enchantment in the past.

And don't go thinking that money is necessarily the opposite of love.
Wallets can also help with seduction. Quoting Julia Kristeva, the author says that:

> Profligacy is the seducer's calling card; "he spends extravagantly."

And, says the author, "Casanova spent money on women like a drunken sailor".

From a more Darwinian point of view, Prioleau applies Amotz Zahavi's "handicap principle" to profligate spending as an honest signal of abundant resources.

3.9. The edible gift (food)

Eating is intrinsically sexual, says the author, and "when a ladykiller also cooks, it's culinary courtship on high flame".

I agree, and I'm surprised the author didn't mention smaller delicacies and snacks that are even more associated with sex and pleasure like sweet fruits (think red and ripe strawberries) and chocolate.

And I would also add wine and drinks to the list. Yours truly also carries a picture of a selection of wines for when the conversations turn towards good food and wines.

4. Lassoing Love Through the Mind

The mind is the body's most erogenous zone.
And (romantic) love is a takeover of the mind.

4.1. Pursuing with abandon (Royal flush)

This might be the most crucial and insightufl part of the book.

While dating coaches recommend men to invest little, feign disinterest, "make her chase", and never admit your love, many of the great lovers do the opposite.

Again, Proileau serves a big zinger to the dating gurus and dating industry:

> Seduction prophets like Mystery and his henchmen would jeer at Pollock. To nail "targets," real men feign "lack of interest," and let women chase them. A woman "will do almost anything for your approval," promise pickup gurus, if you're "cool" and keep her guessing. According to Maxim magazine, the "three treacherous syllables" are "I love you." Only clueless losers race up to prospects and bare their souls. If so, some losers are getting lucky; hell-bent, do-or-die lovers still captivate many women, both in reality and fantasy.

Indeed, some ladies men wear their hearts on their sleeves on their successful seductions, they admit their love early on, pursue with abandon, and invest on the women they love.

Here is one example:

> he recounts a story that sounds like a Hollywood set piece. At an art gallery, he chatted with a Norwegian model, forgot her name, then ran down six flights of stairs to meet her as she walked off the elevator. Taking her hand, he said, "Tell me who you are. I've got to be with you!" She followed him, and they were a couple for two years.

And here is what one man told a woman he liked the first time they met:

> For instance, he once met a Persian woman at an LA nightclub, and at the end of the evening, turned to her and whispered in Farsi, "Esh-ghe-mani"—You touch my soul.

And then on the first date:

> "I want us to be lovers; I want to make you sigh like no man has made you sigh before."

Does this really work?
"More than you might expect", says the author.
The reasons why it works are both power-related, psychological, and atavic. Says sexologist Meredith Chivers:

> Over half of female fantasies reveal a wish to be sexually irresistible and, in some cases, "ravished." What a woman craves is a passion so intense that it shatters constraints, fires desire, and allows her to be "all in the midbrain." An ardent advance is also a "woman's moment of power," giving her the high ground of erotic choice.

From an evolutionary point of view, it might work as a sign of committment.

But whatever the reason, neurologically women seem programmed to respond to it:

> Evolutionary psychologists see the male courtship offensive as a commitment ploy; persistence and passion telegraphed a "faithful nester" to our female forebears. Whatever the motive, argues neuropsychiatrist Louann Brizendine, the fervent male suitor isn't an outmoded stereotype; it's built into the "brain architecture of love."

This technique can also be used in conjunction with what I call the "baby seduction".
An example from Warren Beatty:

> Warren Beatty put his cards on the table from the start with Annette Bening, revealing his interest at the upshot and telling her later after a wrap party that he wanted her to have his child and marry him. She conceived that night.

Albeit I agree that "pursuing with abandon" and total honesty can work great, I think that sometimes the author took it too far (see the "cons").
And that, depending on the occasion and situation, different approaches might also be better suited.

4.2. Praise

First off, Prioleau takes another zinger at dating coaches and mainstream approaches to seduction:

> Hip dating instructors promote anti-flattery, "negs" that cut women down to size with zingers like "Your ex-boyfriend must have really hated that about you," or "Is that your real hair?" And the greeting-card industry has devolved into generic schmaltz or sarcastic digs. All of which leaves the game and the girls to ladies' men.

The author says that praise works with women even more than with men, and that women are more likely to be erotically stoked by ego boosts.

Hence, a man who can make a woman feel like the "photoshopped version of herself", can write his own ticket.

The example is Duff Cooper, who lacked status, rank, and even looks, but who seduced her with a worshipful courtship with "barrage of letters that called her the "the brightest color, the sweetest warmth, and the one dazzling light of [his life]."

Wikipedia also confirms that Cooper wasn't the best placed to marry Diana, an an extremely popular social figure hailed for her beauty and eccentricities. Diana's family were as they thought of Duff a promiscuous drinker and gambler, without title, position, or wealth.
Wikipedia says that Cooper even wrote her that "he hoped that everyone shed liked better than him will die very soon."

The author also says that Cooper used the same technique on Susan Mary Patten, almost 30 years his junior:

Note: Cooper wasn't a nobody though
Cooper might have indeed punched far above his weight, but he wasn't a nobody. He was a PM, later a cabinet minister, and later ambassador to France.

4.3. Soul Meld / Intimacy

Women often complain of inadequate intimacy with men, and emotional connection is a frequent motive for sex.

This time quoting a somewhat lower-expertise source, a Cosmopolitan columnist, the author says that "men who have the "gift of intimacy," can secure women with links of steel".

5. Locking In Love

This chapter starts with "conversation", wthout introduction, but I supsect that "locking in" refers to the beginning of the interaction, and stoking love and attraction right after first saying "hi".

5.1. Conversation

Women, on average, are better conversationalists than men, and are also more sensitive to good conversations.

Louann Brizendine, author of "The Female Brain", explains that women who connect and bond via conversation get a huge dopamine and oxytocin rush, the biggest neurological reward outside of an orgasm or a heroin hit.
And besides providing emotional rewards in the same vein as sex, conversations can also lead to sex: women are more erotically "lit" by good conversations, explains the author.

Good conversations as a positive sexual trait is also backed by evolutionary psychologists, including Darwin. In the words of the author, "men who were good talking partners had the romantic edge over the grunters and club-wielders".

Conversations also help soothe a woman's fear. The author says that "a woman's sexuality is skittish and complex and easily spooked". Getting to know a woman well and opening up with conversation is a great way of putting her at ease, which in turn allows her to start feeling sexual attraction.

Even "sweet nothing" speech can help bond, especially between lovers.
And "soothing speech is a strong elixir", taking us back to the maternal embrace, and "the moment of the enchanted voice."

5.2. Unspoken Eloquence: Gesture, Voice, Listening

Here the author goes into body language a bit.

The most interesting part was about body language during conversation a bit later in the book.
Speaking about "hand gesticulation":

> Expressive hands—a female favorite—were a D'Annunzian specialty as well. Actress Madame Simone found the poet's looks repellent, but she conceded that he spellbound her as soon as he spoke, "waving his beautiful white hands in the air."

When it comes to voices, women tend to prefer lower voices that are inflected, and musical -rather than monotone and flat-.

However, men shouldn't focus on what they say alone, of course.
Conversations are a two-way street, and Prioleau says that "there is almost no female desire like the desire to be heard" with women in relationships longing for "men's full attention, engagement, and empathy".

5.3. Laughter

Making women laugh is a potent tool of ladies' men.

But also the ability of laughing at oneslef says a lot of good things about a man.
I liked this example a lot:

> "Johnny H!" she says. "He was short and unattractive by traditional standards. My god, though, he was 'The Man.' He was funny with that ability to laugh at himself.

5.4. Teaching Women

The author calls this "mental intercourse", but it seems to be referring to ladies men teaching things to women.

One of the examples:

> The salonnière Madame Necker reportedly was "in love with him," (Diderot, En.) and Catherine the Great found him so delightful that she bought his library, paid him to manage it, and invited him to Russia on the condition that he talk to her each day.

5.5. The Poetry Potion

Poetry is linguistic seduction on steroids, says Prioleau.

The author mentions the movie "Before Sunrise" as an example of poetry (see the scene here).
But I alos liked this example her, of reciting poetry right before seduction:

6. Torching Up Love

Prioleau says that retaining love is more challenging than making someone fall in love.

While falling in love is quite "natural", retaining love is somewhat less natural, turning into "quiet companionate love" at best, and boredom at worst.

However successful exceptions do exist, and scientists have documented them with fMRI scans.
However, exactly how to do it, is still uncertain.

The author says that the great lovers never stop the courtship, sometimes intensify the coursthip, and are "perpetual suitors".

6.1. Fun/Festivity

Fun can help seduce women, by diffusing tensions and fears and displaying affinity.

But it can also help to keep love alive.
Psychologist Howard Markman found that the amount of fun in a relationship predicted its success.

The author says that Mark Anthony has been remembered wrong by history. In truth, he was a geat seducer and a lover of frolic, fun, and party. And that's what bonded him to Cleopatra.

6.2. Novelty, Curiosity

Love and relationsihps also needs rest and peace and safety… But not too much of it, or it gets dull.

6.3. Cut and Thrust

Albeit endless peace and harmony is the reservoir of the perfect, compassionate love relationships, it might not be the breeding ground of love and renewed passion.

Says Prioleau:

> Partnerships, although havens of trust and peace, need periodic shake-ups. Aggression, fear, and power struggles underlie passionate love, and skilled lovers take them head-on and transmute them.

So the great lovers don't hide adverse emotions, but "convert them to erotic excitement through a delicate play of combat and truce, pain and pleasure".

The author says that science backs it, as Meston and Buss say that " anxiety and jealousy can whet female desire. And women often relish a good fight since it releases adrenaline and other stimulants that helps them emotionally connect with men before sex".

However, too much bickering and fighting are also harmful.
So the goal is to maintain a healhty balance, and follow the hostility with reunion and repose.
Ladies' men don't overdo the nastiness anyway. Proileau says that they "transcend strife with love, go light on pain, and cycle back and forth between discord and concord".

6.4. Inexhaustible Selfhood

Prioleau says that women aren't content with resources, and won't fall in love with "Mr. Perfect" but unremarkable. Instead, they "seek inner assets—men who are multifaceted, convoluted, and on the stretch".

The author then discusses the importance of continuous personal growth, with which I agree.
The power of personal growth though is not just that it's attractive, but also that impacts an individual's personal quality, and his/her sexual market value.
Also see:

- How to maintain love and attraction

> How to Maintain Power & Control in Relationships

Modern Great Seducers

In the last chapter, the author looks at the current dating climate, and what today's women dream of.

To begin with, she says that many men today have been blindsided by women's empowerment, and that they recoiled in fear, male-chauvinism, and anger.

The same is true fr women, though, and she says that for every misogynist, there is a “man-basher”.

Among today’s changes:

- Women have higher expectations: solid and good men aren’t enough anymore, women want passion and excitement
- Unions of equals: some women seek “hedonic” unions with equals, and aren’t happy with beig staying at home housewives

The New Ladies’ Man

Generally, what worked before works today as well.
Prioleau puts it too beautifully not to quote her:

> “women’s needs haven’t changed one bit”; what enthralled a queen of ancient Sparta and an eighteenth-century salonnière still enthralls the banker, product manager, and college dean today

But a few possible tweaks for the modern day ladies’ man:

- Less high-mainteanance men:

if alcoholics, overwrought, and labile men had a certain panache with women with too much time on their hands, today’s business women might be less inclined of taking care of messy and needy men.

Maybe they’d react like Cristina in the movie:

> Her: both of you are completely crazy, I can’t live like this (and her attraction evaporates)

I think exceptions still apply and “Women Who Love Too Much” will always exist. But as a general tendency, Prioleau might be right.

- Less money and status: money and status, that never were the main ingredient of love and seduction, probably have even less draw today on more independent women, and in richer societies
- More looks: looks might fare comparatively better in today’s society as compared to the past
- More sexual virtuosity:
- More romantic zeal:

Laura Stepp small survey found that women “yearned for suitors like romance heroes who scoop up heroines and say, “There’s something about you I’m finding impossible to stay away from.”

And I quote:

> “Falling in love,” however, is foremost a “phenomenon of attention.” Every romance hero puts the heroine in his cross-hairs and singles out her “specialness” for adoration.

- More fun and novelty: to stand out in our culture of over-stimulation
- More androgyny: macho was never the most appealing, and it’s even less today, and in the foreseeable future
- More intelligence: “today’s smart, ambitious women want peers, and in polls intelligence is one of the most desired traits”

- Better conversationalists:

Ladies' Men Under Attack

Ladies' men are loved by many women, but not so much by society.

Other men are envious, those in power see them as dangerous to the social order, and some circles of men try to frame them as "effeminate".

Proileau says that "A neo–ladies' man will have to get beyond all this—the jealousy and indoctrination—and prepare for cultural headwinds".

Diggin Deeper on Studies

There were several interesting studies I took note of.
Some of them I will share them here:

- On femininized faces and facial masculinity preferences

Overall, the author is not wrong, but might overstate the ase for "attractiveness of femininized faces".

Quoting Marcinkowska et al., 2019 > in many cases women's preferences for facial masculinity are equivocal[21] or less masculine-looking men are judged as more attractive than more masculine-looking men

> Marcinkowska et al., 2019

However, it's not entirely true that "women consistently prefer femininzed male faces":

> Very low and very high levels of masculinity were rated as relatively unattractive.
> (Holzleitner & Perrett, 2017)

The above study also shows that it's not entirely true that more attractive women prefer more masculine men. More attractive women have less tolerance to lower levels of masculinity than less attractive women. Such as, they are more discriminatory, but the "curve" is shaped similarly, with just a small preference towards more masculine faces (still not preferring the most masculine face, though).

From what I've read, masculinity seems to be more attractive when income inequality was higher, but it's a mixture of different factors that moves the needle, with "personal preferences" between an important one.
Interestingly indeed, it turns out from Holzleitner's study that bisexuality levels have a major incidence.
Quoting the study:

> The more women were exclusively sexually attracted to men, the more attractive they found highly masculine face.

- Nice guys VS bad boys

The author cites Horgan's research review on the bad boy / nice guy dichotomy to say that "women desire a combination of both—niceness commingled with deviltry, and served up seductively".

To be more precise, Horgan hypothesizes that women prefer nice guys as long as they are above a certain level threshold of "badness".
I quote:

> Contrary to popular wisdom, then, the complex nature of female attraction can perhaps best be summarized as follows: nice guys may or may not finish last, but nice guys who also exceed a certain bad boy threshold are in fact very likely to finish first.
> Horgan, 2011

CONS

Wonderful book, and if you've been around here fo rsome time, you know that I usually take more time in reviewing the great books, so don't take a long list of "cons" as a negative.

That said:

- There is no differentiation betwen "women" and "attractive women"

There is a big difference between "women" in general, "high-quality women", and "women with a high sexual market value".

And what's attractive to one group is not always what's attractive to another, and that can make a big difference for men who prefer attractive women as (sexual) partners.

But Prioleau's analysis doesn't differentiate much, or enough, in my opinion, among them.
For example, talking about one of the women she interviewed, she says:

> What sort of erotic climate is Zoe stepping into?

Well, Zoe was 27 years old, she wasn't exactly "stepping into" anything, she was already fully into it.
So that suggested the author wasn't properly considering the impact of age.

Of course, this note does undermine her whole analysis.
As a matter of fact, it seems like most of the ladies men used as examples also attracted a fair share of high-quality and/or attractive women.
But it's still something worth mentioning and keeping in mind.

- Some examples might be exaggerated

The author says that Cooper Duff lacked status, rank, and even looks to marry her Lady Diana.
That is largely true. Yet, the two met at Oxford, which is a university for the elite.
And for his later conquests, Duff later became an MP, a minister, and then the ambassador to France.

- Taking it too far with "pursuing with abandon"?

There are a few examples in which "wearing one's heart on the sleeves" and "pursuing with abandon", in my opinion, cross a very dangerous threshold of personal self-debasement.

For example:

> Actress Catherine Nesbitt, another great beauty, was classic. Cooper dexterously enumerated her best performances, pronounced his passion for her, and begged to kiss her feet, which he had seen nude on the stage. She rolled down her stockings and obliged.

Cooper truly admired her, he "admired her poems, bravoed her guitar recitals, and translated her famous novella, Madame de".
And yet, asking to kiss a woman's feet is not something I'd recommend anyone.

And:

> Jackson Pollock' (…) stared at her with "such intensity" and "such hunger" that she felt impaled. At her apartment afterward, she remembered, he cinched the deal by sobbing, "I want you," "I need you," "I've been looking for someone [like you] my entire life."

Sobbing might even lead to "cinch the deal", but I think there usually are equally valid ways of sealing the deal without having to "sob".
Sobbing would probably take away way too much power from the man.

- Are women really "superior" at everything the author lists?

It seemed like on a huge number of listed traits, women were somehwat "more endowed than men".
At a certain point, I started takiing notes of them as it felt like it was becoming predictabily funny.
Here's the list of them:

- Their vision is keener than men's
- Women hear better than men and listen with their libidos
- Women have a keener, more refined sense of hearing—a subtler ear for higher tones and auditory nuances—
- Women have more sensitive skin than men and place touch at the forefront of their sexual fantasies.
- Although men have the same number of tongue receptors, women are finer tasters
- Women may be particularly susceptible to mind spells. Meredith Chivers, a leading figure in female sexual research, notes that women are more aroused by mental stimuli than men.
- Not only is a woman more verbal and communicative than a man, but she's also erotically "lit" by conversation.
- A woman's superior bullshit detector will find him out

This does not take anything away from the book or the overall message, but at a certain point it seemed like women were better than ment at everything.

- Some studies mentioned, but not referenced

The author mentions several studies, but finding those studies was sometimes challenging.
For example, this one made me very curious:

> Studies show women favor intelligence over beauty or wealth, even for one-night stands.

But there was no reference or citation, so I couldn't double-check.

- Do references to gods, myths, and romance heroes help us understand ladies' men?

Supporting her claims of what makes ladies' men attractive and magnetic, the author uses real-life examples, as well as mythology, folkore, and novels.

I don't necessarily think mythology is wrong, since what goes into myth is probably what's attractive in a certain culture, as well as then shaping that culture.
But obviously, it's not very scientific, so their contribution should be more "underweighted", in my opinion.

Romance literature and novels are probably better sources than myth, since we have women's more direct response -and can even approximately measure it by the number of sales and followers-.
And if women love the romance, it means that the character is probably attractive.
Instead, with myth and gods, it's often men who come up with them.

- Cometimes confuses culture's impact on nature

The reason why the author might spend so much time om myths and folklore is that there might be a misunderstanding of how human natural actually forms.

She says that "centuries of culturally imposed inferiority have contributed to the female yen for praise".

No, centuries of culture don't change human nature. When the culture changes, the old culture does not keep on having effects on future generations.
This is a very common misunderstanding among various authors and people.

PROS

- Surprisingly well-researched

Proileau is not the type of author who links studies and brags about her citation counts.

And yet… She did read and research more than most other dating coaches who do brag about their citation counts (see here how to brag without sounding like a showoff).

Prioleau has read both the pick-up literature, quoting Mystery, Neil Strauss, the traditional manosphere literature, quoting "King, Warrior, Magician, Lover", and the evolutionary psychology, quoting David Buss, Geoffrey Miller, and more.
The female brain neurology was also not lost on the author, who quoted Louann Brizendine more than once.
And when discussing body language, she had read Barbara and Allan Pease.

And Prioleau also correctly links research to effective real-life behavior, linking Amotz Zahavi's "handicap principle", to conspicuous consumption.

Big thumbs up, quite impressive.

- The referenced studies largely add up

I looked up some of the studies she mentions, and they reflect what she states in her work.
This is something I respect, and it's rarer than some people might think that an author does a good job in looking up the studies they themselves quote.

REVIEW

Swoon is different than all other dating books and manual and, similarly to "The Art of Seduction" by Robert Greene, it goes at the core of real seduction, as well as the power of seduction.

This quote says it all:

> It's no feat for a king to have mistresses; ambitious beauties will hurl themselves at any crowned head. But to have them love you is another thing.

It's also different than most science-based books, as it goes beyond a list of "attractive Darwinian traits", and better targets and satisfies that side of irrational love that sometimes escapes explanations.

Instead, it's a book that focuses on the more exceptional dating strategies, and on men who are exceptional exceptions.

Overall, I loved "Swoon".
I am going to use it and reference it a lot for "Seduction University". And on a website with such a high threshold for quality as ThePowerMoves.com that's the biggest compliment I could give to any author.

Mafia Prince: 10 Power Lessons From the Mafia

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Mafia Prince (2014) is "Crazy Phil" first-person account of how the mafia came to conquer -and then lose- its stranglehold on Philadelphia, passing through one of the most brutal eras in Mafia history: the reign of "Little Nicky" Scarfo.
The book presents many lessons learned on Machiavellianism, power, and effective leadership.

SUMMARY

About the Author:
Philip Leonetti is a former mobster and underboss of the Philadelphia crime family under his mentor, uncle and former boss, Nicodemo "Little Nicky" Scarfo. He turned government informant in 1989 and reformed his life.

1. There is Power in Unity And Collaboration

The mafia rose as one of the most successful organizations ever, coming to dominate the underworld almost everywhere it went.

Its secret?
Structure, unity, and collaboration among different factions:

> A move toward consolidation slowly began to take form as the bosses began to recognize that true power and strength could only be accomplished by establishing a nationwide crime syndicate.
> This American organized crime syndicate would come to be known as La Cosa Nostra, which in Italian means "this thing of ours."

2. Before You Double-Cross, Think You Might Be Triple-Crossed

Caponigro wanted to kill the boss Ange to become himself the boss.

So he speaks with New York, to see if he can get the OK from the commission.
He speaks with Tieri, and Tieri leads him to believe he can go ahead.

Caponigro goes ahead and kills Ange.
When he is called in New York, he believes it's to attend his crowning. Instead, he marched to his death:

> While the ambitious Caponigro double-crossed Bruno, the ruthless old-school Brooklyn-bred gangster Tieri triple-crossed Caponigro.
> Bobby Manna told me and my uncle what happened next: So Caponigro is called in and he sits down in a chair and faces Fat Tony, Tieri, Bobby Manna, and the Chin, who are seated across from him behind a table.
> So the Chin says, "We're here to find out who gave you permission to whack out your boss, Angelo Bruno. Can you tell us?" So Caponigro looks at Tieri, and Tieri looks back at him stone-faced. So Caponigro says, "Funzi (Tieri) told me I had the okay, that the Commission approved the hit." So the Chin says, "Frank, what's he talking about?" And Tieri looks at Caponigro and says, "I told you to straighten it out, not to kill him."
> Sensing he had been double-crossed, Caponigro began pleading for his life with the men, but was already being beaten by Genovese enforcers, who had suddenly appeared in the room.

That's when Caponigro realizes that he has killed his boss, without the OK from the commission.
A little later, he is being beaten and killed.

What happened is that Tieri, who was with the Genovese, lead Caponigro to believe he could kill Ange, that he had the OK from the commission.

In truth, the mafia commission hadn't approved the hit, and would have never approved it because Paul Castellano would have blocked that resolution.
Ange was close to the Gambino, so the commission would have never approved since Castellano would have defended ange, his ally.

Quoting again from "Mafia Prince":

> So when Caponigro is talking to Funzi Tieri about killing Ange, he thinks he's talking to the boss, because everyone thought that Tieri was the boss, but he wasn't. The Chin was.
> So Tieri strokes Caponigro along and all the while, Tieri, the Chin, and Bobby Manna are manipulating the whole thing. They want Ange dead so that my uncle gets the union, which benefits them. They also want Ange dead so that Philadelphia's Commission vote now goes with the Genovese and not the Gambinos, which benefits them, and on top of it, they want Caponigro dead so they can take his gambling and loan sharking operation, which is worth several million, which also benefits them.

If Caponigro had been more calculative he could have seen the power dynamics behind the scene, and he could have waited for a more official OK.
Plus, he had had a previous beef with Tieri, which could have given him another hint about a possible set up.

3. New Leaders' Tip: Asking More From Older -and Powerful- Players Is Risky

> When he became boss (…) Little Nicky made it known to Riccobene, a onetime underworld ally, that he expected a nonnegotiable set percentage of his monthly cash intake as (…) Scarfo's aggressive underworld street tax.
> Despite the killings of John Calabrese and Stevie Bouras, and the violent beating of Frank "Frankie Flowers" D'Alfonso—all of whom had balked at paying Scarfo's street tax—Riccobene, the seasoned old-school mob vet, scoffed at Scarfo's demand.
> Over the years, Riccobene had built up a strong power base (…) a loyal and well-stocked crew of thugs, > thieves, and fellow racketeers who answered to him and to him only. He, in essence, oversaw a family within a family. This fact made him believe he could challenge Scarfo in a street war. And that's exactly what he did.

The new boss took a risk in asking for a bigger share of the pie than Riccobene used to pay to the old boss. It was obviously going to be a risk that Riccobene saw it as an affront, and that he demanded the same treatment he had with the previous boss.
Since Riccobebe had power, it was a risk that he was going to use his power base to resist. And that's exactly what happened.

4. Leader's Tip: Put People First, Avoid Being Too "WIIFM"

… And avoid looking overly-calculative as well.

As a matter of fact, it's better if you're not overly calculative in general, as true characters tend to shine through eventually.

One of the reasons that Scarfo started losing allies, including his nephew, was that he started becoming more and more focused on "what's in it for me", without any thoughts on wha the was giving, both financially, and emotionally.

I quote:

> During this time, Bobby Lumio was in a real bad shape. He was on his deathbed. One of the last things he said was, "Tell my friend I will miss him." He was talking about my uncle. This was on his deathbed.
> So after Bobby dies, my uncle hears what he had said and my uncle said, "I don't give a fuck about him; nobody's gonna miss him." This was a guy who was with us, a made guy, who while he was dying was looking out for us by tipping us off about the thing with Joe Salerno and Frank Gerace. But now that Bobby was dead, he couldn't do anything for my uncle. That's how he thought. That's how evil of a guy he was.

This is a case of losing sight of what a leader is all about: taking care of the people around.

When leaders stop taking care of the people, eventually, the people start taking care of the leader.

5. Leader's Tip: Support Your Crew, Don't Compete With Them

Sometimes it's fair to worry about a plot.

However, as a general mindset, poor leaders fear their crews, while great leaders see their people's success as their own success.

Nicky Scarfo had a poor leader's mindset:

> If you made a big score and made him a lot of money, the second he was done counting the money he would say to me, "This guy thinks he's a big shot now; all the sudden he's J. D. Rockefeller," or "We gotta watch him so he doesn't get too big for his britches."
> The guy just hands you a bag with $200,000 in it and ten minutes later you're burying the guy. It didn't make sense, but that's how he was.
> If he ordered you to kill someone and you did it perfectly and you got the guy just like he asked, he'd say to me, "Now this guy thinks he's Al Capone because he killed a guy." As quickly as he would build somebody up, he'd already be bringing them down.

Nicky Scarfo was afraid of people plotting against him, which is fair in that life, but he was also afraid of people being successful, of outshining him.
He wanted to be and feel the only big rooster. The problem with that mindset is that when you're big rooster and everyone else sucks, your team sucks… And, by reflection, so do you as the leader.

6. Leverage Money to Acquire Power

> The Mexican Mafia was very big down there, and there were a lot of fights in that jail, a lot of stabbings. My uncle kept to himself while he was in there, but he had two Mexican guys who were with him the whole time he was there. He called them his pistoleros, and they served as his bodyguards. He'd have me send money to put on their books or do things for their families. These guys were dirt poor but they were loyal, and like my uncle, they were stone killers.

7. Newbies' Tip: Protect Your Boss' Power

Read this exceprt:

> I knew my uncle wanted to kill Pat since the day he made him. After he got made, Pat came up to my uncle and said, "You know, Nick, you should think about making Patty Specs a captain," and my uncle just stared at him, like he couldn't believe this guy who just got made was telling him how to run the family.
> When he walked away, my uncle said, "Do you believe the balls on this fuckin' guy?"

What was the issue there?
It's pure power dynamics: influence is about power, and for bosses with a very big ego, even suggesting things to them can come across as an insult.

That's why learning to communicate in power-protective way is crucial in organizations.

By the way, Pa, that guy with a suggestion, got killed for just giving a suggestion to the boss.
And that's one of the reasons why mafia resources are a great way to learn power dynamics: things are more extreme there, making power dynamics more obvious.

8. Protect Your Enemy To Hide Your Plots

Chin Gigante, the Genovese boss, disliked John Gotti.

So, why did he publicly defended John Gotti, saying that he had the OK from the commission to kill his former boss Paul Castellano?

This is why:

> My uncle and I had been told by Bobby Manna that John Gotti did in fact get the Commission's permission to kill Paul Castellano, but I didn't believe it and it never made any sense to me. I think Bobby told us that because the Chin never wanted to be connected to the killing of Frankie DeCicco and the attempted killing of John Gotti. By telling us that Gotti had gotten the okay, it took suspicion away from the Chin being involved in the bombing. They used the bomb to make it look like the siggys did it because they were close to Castellano. The use of explosive devices was against the rules of La Cosa Nostra. I remember thinking to myself: this fuckin' Chin ain't so crazy; he's the shrewdest of them all, and the most deadly.

By defending Gotti, Gigante staved off any suspicion against him. That way, he might have also made another attempt in the future without raising suspicions.

9. Don't Get Into Screaming Matches: It Telegraphs Your Intentions

Leonetti, talking about the moment he realized he was going to turn on his uncle:

> At that moment, sitting in that cell listening to him blame me for Mark, I don't know if I have ever felt such a combination of raw emotion and such rage, both at the same time. I'm not the kind of guy who's gonna get into a screaming match with anyone, let alone in front of 15 other guys, and let my opponent or adversary know what I was thinking. And at that very moment, he was no longer my uncle, he was no longer my boss. He was my adversary, my enemy.

10. Leaders Make The Difference on People's and Organizations' Future

Both Leonetti and Gravano turned theri back on La Cosa Nostra, in large part, because of bad leaders:

> Sammy was very loyal to La Cosa Nostra, like I was, but just like me, he lost faith in his boss. He told me that one of his biggest regrets was not killing John Gotti so that Frankie DeCicco could be the boss instead. "We fucked up on that one, Bo," is what he would say.

MORE WISDOM

- To get respect from people, you must have status in their own world and/or system of values

> It's sad to say, but my uncle looked down on his own father because he was a hardworking guy and not a gangster. He was never outwardly disrespectful to his father, but they weren't very close. My uncle's only ambition in life was to be a gangster, even from the time he was young.

I suspect that Nicky Scarfo didn't respect his father because his father wasn't as "tough", or as driven.

- For some mobsters, it's more about respect, status, and reputation, than money

> He wasn't making a lot of money, but to him at that time, the money wasn't important. He would always say, "The money will come, but this thing is about respect and honor, it's not about money." He was making a name for himself within the Bruno organization and that's what mattered the most to him—his reputation.

However, that does change for some mosbsters once they start making money.
That's something you might want to keep in mind, and watch out for: greedy bosses are more likely to be overthrown.

- There can be some honor and values among mobsters

> The Blade had a girlfriend whose stepfather was abusing her and she'd always cry to him about it. So one night when he was drunk, he sees the stepfather on the street and he shoots him, right in front of the cops. That was the Blade—he didn't give a fuck that the cops were right there. He'd shrug it off and say, "That fuckin' guy had it comin', I don't care who was watchin'."

- On the power of status and reputation to gain people's support and approval

> One prison official said, "The young black kids treat him like he's a god—it's 'Yes, Mr. Scarfo,' 'No, Mr. Scarfo.'"

- Keep a body hidden by involving different hit squads

> But what they did was they got a fourth group to dig up the body and move it somewhere else, so that way the guys who did the killing and the guys who moved the body and the group that buried the body the first time had no idea where the body was, in case someone flipped and ratted them out.

QUOTES

On Lionetti's grandmother:

> My grandmother was the typical old-school Italian matriarch. All of her grandchildren called her Mom-Mom. She went to church every morning, not just Sundays, and her cooking, my God, nobody cooked like her.

On paying to kill:

> My uncle used to say he was a "backstabbing cocksucker" but my uncle couldn't get the okay to kill him because, at the time, Alvin Feldman owed $60,000 to Pappy Ippolito, who was one of Ange's top guys. Ange told my uncle that once Pappy got his money back, my uncle could have him killed. I remember my uncle saying to me, "I wish I had the $60,000. I'd pay the Jew's debt to Pappy myself, that's how bad I want to whack this motherfucker."

On Nicky's priorities and his love for the mafia:

> To Little Nicky, the entire universe seemed to revolve around three things: the mob, murder, and family, specifically in that order.
> The killing of Vincent Falcone in the manner he foresaw, gave him the chance to combine all three of these at the same time in one giant orgy of death, lineage, and La Cosa Nostra.

On mobsters superstitions and being afraid of black cats:

> So me and the Blade leave Caesars and we are walking back to Georgia Avenue, which is a few blocks away. Now, as we are walking home, a black cat runs in front of us and the Blade goes nuts—he's very superstitious. He tells me, "First, Ange gets killed, and now this," meaning the cat. He says, "Come on, Philip, we gotta walk a different way to undo the bad luck from the cat." There was no arguing with him—he was dead serious. Here's this guy who is a stone-cold killer and he's spooked by this stupid black cat.

On Frankie DeCicco:

> Sammy told me that he was there when Frankie DeCicco got blown up, and that when he went to grab Frankie's body, there was nothing there. Sammy said his hand went through him. Sammy used to talk about Frankie DeCicco all the time. He said he was a man's man, a real gangster.

On the difference between being a gangster for life, and falling into the life:

> We caught up on old times and had some laughs and we always worked out together. We walked that track every day. But Sammy still wanted to be Sammy the Bull, and I didn't want to be Crazy Phil anymore—to be honest I never did. It's what my uncle wanted, not me.

Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

Lucio Buffalmano · 1 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Power intelligence is the ability to understand, assess, and influence power dynamics in social and competitive environments.

At The Power Moves we've spent years analyzing power dynamics across dating, work, leadership, and social hierarchies, drawing from psychology, evolutionary science, and real-world case studies.
From that work, we developed the TPM framework for power intelligence (PI). It's a term we use to describe the ability to understand and navigate power dynamics, and what we refer to as the power quotient (PQ) to describe an individual's level within this framework.

In this guide, you'll learn what power intelligence is, how it differs from emotional or social intelligence, why it matters more in competitive life domains, and how men can develop it to gain status, influence, and leverage.

Let's dive in.

TPM analytical framework: power intelligence
At The Power Moves, we use the term power intelligence to describe a dimension of cognitive and social ability that traditional frameworks like emotional or social intelligence don't fully capture.
We use this term to describe a specific intersection of power dynamics, psychology, and men's development.

What’s Power Intelligence

> Power intelligence (PI), or power quotient (PQ), is the individual’s capability to recognize and influence patterns of power dynamics in order to achieve goals and acquire life-relevant resources such as status, influence, and partners.

The definition includes both the “awareness” of power dynamics and the “competence” to influence power dynamics to achieve life-relevant goals.

The measure of power intelligence is Power Quotient (PQ).
So when we say that someone has a high “power quotient”, we refer to people who have a good grasp of power dynamics, and/or the skills and attitudes to influence power dynamics (the two overlap, of course).
And when we say someone has little or no power intelligence, we refer to people who have either little or no grasp of power dynamics, or little or no ability to influence power dynamics.

Components of Power Intelligence

There are two major sub-components of power intelligence: awareness, and competence:

- Power awareness: the ability to “see” and assess power dynamics in interpersonal relationships, social exchanges, and personalities.
  - Feel: the unconscious “feel” for power dynamics, overlapping with emotional intelligence and social skills
  - Analysis: the conscious side of awareness, including the more rational analysis of social and power dynamics. People can make up for and develop their subconscious “feel” with more analytical analysis
  - Systems thinking: the higher and strategic level. With a chess analogy, systemic PI is the ability to consider each move as part of the bigger game, including second-order effects. If the “feel” overlaps more with EQ, the “systemic” requires more IQ for complex processing
- Power competence: the ability to influence power dynamics to achieve goals. It can be broken down into:
  - Attitudes: the drive to acquire power, in constant balance with inhibitors of action such as fear, low self-esteem, avoidance-orientation, etc.
  - Skills: the ability to execute on one’s drive to achieve goals

There is an overlap, of course. It's unlikely to have much competence without good awareness, and it's unlikely to have competence without any awareness.

However, they're two different dimensions, and it's possible to be higher in one, than in another.
The social power intelligence quadrant plots both dimensions:

	Low Competence	High Competence
HIGH AWARE	Ineffective • Sensitive guy • Passive (sometimes aggressive) Behavior: Warm & [illegible] Relationships: Risky (good with good-hearted people, but can be taken advantage of) Leadership: Average/poor (fails to address bad apples and other jerks)	Effective • Charming & charismatic • Assertive Behavior: Warm & high power (generally, but otherwise reacts to the situation) Relationships: Great (covers both the power and human sides) Leadership: Great (hires well, and can navigate all team-related challenges) Example: Brad Pitt, George Clooney, Obama
LOW AWARE	Clueless • "Nice guy" or jerk (dual-frustration: both approaches are costly) • Passive Behavior: Passive, never leases a mare Relationships: Poor Leadership: N/A (never reaches a w/ leadership position)	Robotic / Weird • Loner / social climber • Passive or aggressive, sometimes loud, "off" (particularly in [illegible]) Behavior: Seeks power, tries too hard or awkwardly, fails to develop buy-in, friends, & true converts Relationships: Poor (lacks the intuition) Leadership: Average (can achieve goals, but struggles to create team spirit)

The interpersonal power-awareness quadrant (Lucio Buffalmano, 2021)
Let's take the two interesting intersections:

High Competence, Low Awareness: Robotic Operators & Bullies

People without the feel can still have an outsized drive for power, including a propensity for scheming.

They tend to come off 'weird' though, lacking smooth calibration and charm. And when they have power they may rely more on coercion than on buy-in.
This is especially costly in relationship quality and long-term relationships.

Interestingly, there are many intelligent and highly ambitious men in this category.
Ambition provides the fuel, and intelligence goes into analysis for strategizing. Men also tend to have less "feel" for social dynamics than women and men outnumber women in the autistic spectrum disorder by 2:1–3:1 (Halladay, 2015).
The original 'pick-up artist' movement also drew some men from this quadrant, attracted by the original idea that some specific formula or 'routines' could unlock dating success.

Mark Zuckerberg is an interesting case for this quadrant.

The “robot” memes might be semi-accurate depictions of a man with low EI
Without the “feel”, Zuckerberg probably struggled socially and came across as ‘not very genuine’ (though he improved a lot!).
But he had the general IQ, the attitude for power and (business) domination, and the analytical skills to manage the company’s growth while maintaining full control.

The digital revolution has been great news for men with lower EI as it decreased what used to be a “condicio sine qua non” for success and high-income: social effectiveness.

High Awareness, Low Competence: The Sensitive Guy

The flip side of the robotic man is the sensitive man.

From a power dynamics perspective, this individual “feels it” when he’s dominated, disempowered, or undermined. He feels he’s losing power.
But he lacks the attitude and sometimes the courage to do something about it.

Unluckily, without the attitudes and skills for power dynamics, the sensitive guy is likely to languish at the bottom of the social hierarchy (tip: consider Power University).

Why Power Intelligence is Essential, Not Optional

Power intelligence matters the most when it comes to personal success and achieving goals.

And it matters most in all major life competitions for acquiring scarce resources such as status, power, leadership positions, mates, and wealth.

Importantly, power intelligence is also crucial for self-defense and a peaceful, good life.
As Machiavelli aptly noted, 'a good man is ruined among the many who are not good'.

Power Intelligence VS Other Intelligences

Adapted from Geoffrey Miller, 2015. Note: this is for a quick idea, but not scientifically rigorous
There is a certain overlap among all intelligences.
It's rare to have very high power intelligence and very low IQ, and vice versa (although high IQ and low power awareness is more common).

And as we've seen the "feel" for power dynamics is related to emotional intelligence. How they relate also depends on whether we define EI as a smaller competence in supporting cognition (Mayer et al., 2008) or as its own higher-order domain (Goleman, 1995; Bar-On, 2006).

However, different from emotional or social intelligence, power awareness is:

More Goal & Power Oriented

While emotional and social intelligence may also support being liked and accepted, power intelligence focuses on status, leadership, and social power.

Emotional intelligence includes or even focuses communion, while power intelligence focuses on agency. Sometimes, at communion's expense.

Covers Competitive Environments

Competitive environments behave differently from more cooperative and established relationships or general socialization.

In open competitions with no rules and cooperation, power dynamics turn more into dominance and raw power. But in most modern socialization, competition is also embedded in cooperation, and hidden. Sometimes it's outright downplayed or denied.
Common realms of co-existing cooperation and competition include:

- Workplaces with shared goals at the group level and cooperation and competition at the individual level (see office politics)
- Dating, with various games and intra- and intersexual competition
- Families (ie.: siblings competition)

- Social groups (competing for status, and in newly forming groups when dominance hierarchies form)

"Dark" Side of Socialization

The darker side of socialization includes manipulation, coercion, dominance, and various forms of games and social climbing.

The 'darker' side of socialization is more obvious in competitions, and but it's often more hidden when competition co-exists with cooperation and social groups.

Awareness and competence of the darker side of socialization is fundamental to any species that compete for acquiring scarce resources.
As a matter of fact, emotional intelligence without power intelligence is what we call here the "naive self-development" approach.

The Components of Power Intelligence

The main sub-components of power intelligence are:

1. Social exchange accounting (givers vs takers)

Social exchange accounting refers to ability to see human relationships as part of a social exchange of give and take, track exchanges, and maximize them for ROI and goal achievement.

It includes basics such as:

1. People's personal value (social and mate value)
2. Who gives and who takes
3. Strategic considerations, like returns and what currencies others want, etc.

Those are the basics.

Then, based on that understanding, the next level of sophistication includes:

1. Marketing your forms values (displaying value)
2. Smart framing to showcase your added value
3. Strategies to initiate and maintain more win-win relationships
4. Spotting predatory players and dynamics

Social skills also require social accounting.
Talking too much, for example, robs others of the opportunity to share themselves, and it prevents bonding.
Similar principles apply to job markets and sexual marketplaces.

- Leadership 101: a primer on leadership as an exchange

2. Power-accounting (empowering vs disempowering)

Power accounting exchange accounting refers to the ability to see and track patterns of power and navigate interactions to avoid losing power, gaining power and status, and using it to achieve goals

It includes items and diagnostic questions such as:

- Who has power, who doesn't
- How is high status, who is not
- Who is giving power and who is taking it

Also see:

- Power dynamics: the primer article on power/leverage
- Interpersonal power dynamics, followed by 'laws of interpersonal power dynamics'

- Social status, what it is, and how to gain it

3. Strategic thinking (leverage & moves)

Strategic thinking refers to approaching social exchanges and life with an outcome-orientation, looking for leverage and approaches that maximize the odds of achieving goals

Strategic thinking applies to all areas of life, including social exchanges and power dynamics.
Below, we list a few sub-components of strategic thinking.

Also see:

- Machiavellianism, a personality trait characterized by selfish calculativeness

3.2. Investment & Returns

Strategizing around social exchange gives and takes to ensure one gets what they want

Including items and diagnostic questions such as:

- Is investing in this person or cause worth it?
- Should you give to this person or that person?
- Am I exposing or devaluing myself by giving too much?
- How can I increase the odds of getting a fair or good deal?

Power-unaware people spend time, money, and effort more randomly. Strategic-minded men seek the highest return.

Also see:

- Social Investment Model: the primer on social investment dynamics

3.3. Interest-Accounting: Alignments VS Conflicts

Strategizing around one's own interest and other people's interest to ensure maximum persuasion, leverage, cooperation, and leadership outcomes to achieve goals

Interest-accounting is crucial because aligned interests promote safer win-win, while misaligned interests create opportunities and incentives for defection.

Naive people don't account for diverging interests.
Power intelligent people instead know that most social exchanges are a mix of convergent and divergent interests, with some contexts and people safer than others.
And they think in terms of:

- If interests mostly align, where do they diverge?
  - Can I mitigate those risks?
  - Can I protect against those risks -and worst-case scenarios-?
- If they're misaligned, can we do something to align them?
- How are interests likely to change over time?
  - Can I increase alignment, mitigate risks, or cover possible defections?

These questions are crucial for any interpersonal relationship.

Interests aren't always in the open.
People also evolved to hide some interests, sometimes even to themselves. Plus, shrewd manipulators proactively mislead others about their true interests and intentions.

Also see:

- Effective cynicism, the primer on risk-aware thinking, without becoming paranoid
- Conflicts of interests at work

3.4. Leverage Accounting

Thinking and strategizing around who has power over others (leverage), and how to influence those dynamics to reduce other people's leverage and increase one's own

Particularly relevant for negotiations of all kinds and including diagnostic questions such as:

- Who gains the most if we go ahead and how much?
- Who stands to lose the most if we don't go ahead and much?
- Who can escalate and win?
  - If it's them, can I inflict some costs?
  - If I win, could it cost me in the future and how can I mitigate it?

Power-aware people ask these questions as second nature, often unconsciously, as a way of mapping the power dynamics.
And then strategize accordingly.

The advanced level in leverage thinking includes various bluffs and manipulations to decrease their leverage, hide your weakness, and expose theirs.
But it also includes expanding the scope for win-win with collaborative frames and discouraging defection.

3.4. Second-Order Consequences Accounting

Projecting into the future the likely countermoves for each of your move, and walking backward to ensure that your next move maximizes the odds of achieving your goal

Power-unaware folks focus on the here and now, while power intelligent several moves ahead, including:

- How will others react
  - How could I react to their reaction
- What other options will I have if it fails
- What different actions do to my status and reputation

Second-order thinkers tend to out-smart, out-play, and out-succeed first-order thinkers over the long run.

4. Applied psychology

Persuasion and influence, important elements of power, are grounded in psychology.

That knowledge doesn't have to be academic to be effective, and often it isn't.
Some people are born with a natural intuition for human psychology, while some others develop it with experience and analysis.

Some resources can expedite the learning process, and you can further cut the learning curve by focusing on practical and applied psychology, as on this website.

Also see:

- Transformational leadership: group psychology applied to leadership

5. Character assessment

People differ, and the variance is large.

That means that character assessment is crucial to both success and life quality, allowing you to advance in life and pick quality people as friends and partners.
Picking well is one of the foundational strategies of power.

6. Manipulation dynamics

Spotting, tackling, and even executing effective manipulation requires a high level of skills.
Contrary to showy power moves, effective manipulation is often subtle and invisible to the more naive players.

This is why knowing at least the basics of manipulation is crucial in life.
This website states that manipulation is pervasive and is not the exception, but the norm.
Character matters, though. Some manipulate (far) more than others, and in (far) more harmful forms.

The Academic Case For PI

Power intelligence is our integrative framework for understanding power-related abilities, rather than a formally recognized psychological construct.

Researchers and psychologists have long debated whether or not there are different types of intelligence.

Some of the contention centers around the term and construct of intelligence. But more would agree if we referred to “ability”, “aptitudes”, or “modalities”. And we can test and measure many different “specific abilities” for which people’s effectiveness and performance vary.
It may also be possible to group similar specific abilities into higher-level cognitive abilities (“broad abilities”).

The "Three Stratum Theory", adapted from Tracey Ramsey's work, released under CC BY-SA 4.0

A popular theory of intelligence is the Cattell–Horn–Carroll theory, with 16 "broad cognitive abilities" and more than 80 "narrow abilities" (Flanagan and Dixon, 2014).

Many of these abilities are part of cognitive processes that are easier to measure, like "auditory processing" and "processing speed" for broad abilities and "simple reaction time", and "semantic processing speed", for narrow abilities.

There is less consensus when it comes to combining or leveraging those abilities.

But it may be possible to measure them.

Broader Intelligence Measurements

There are many measures of emotional intelligence, and people display varying levels of competence.

There is also evidence for "emotional intelligence" to be a second-stratum factor of intelligence (MacCann et al., 2014), and it's been listed as a "tentative broad ability".

EI tests correlate with work-performance (Schlegel, & Mortillaro, 2019), and EI in groups is a better predictor of team-based performance than group's IQ (Woolley et al., 2010).

The APA Handbook of Nonverbal Behavior also refers to 'nonverbal sensitivity'.

People differ in nonverbal sensitivity, and with real-world consequences. For example, doctors scoring higher on the Profile of Nonverbal Sensitivity (PONS) had more satisfied patients (DiMatteo, Friedman, & Taranta, 1979).

So, in brief, people differ on sub-aspects of intelligence related to people skills.

Couldn't that apply to power-related aspects as well?

Power Intelligence & Attitudes Studies: Empirical Support

Many studies show that people differ in their propensity and ability to acquire different markers of power.

Just some examples:

- Narcissists focus on status rather than inclusion. Hierometer theory suggests that while self-esteem tracks both status and inclusion, narcissism evolved to focus on status pursuits. And it may work, since grandiose narcissists tend to acquire higher status and leadership positions (Mahadevan et al., 2016; Mahadevan and Jordan, 2021)

- Dark triad individuals have a higher drive for power, money (Lee et al., 2013), and dominance (Bradlee and Emmons, 1992). Christie and Geis's Mach-IV predicts (manipulative) behavior and a strategic approach to social relations focused on obtaining higher personal returns (Johnes and Paulhus, 2009)
- Narcissism and Machiavellianism positively predict salary and power, respectively (Spurk et al., 2015 and Wille et al., 2012 for narcissism)
- Machiavellian managers who spend more time networking than managing lead poorer teams, but get promoted more (Luthans, 1988). Luthans call them "successful" managers, but it's more about being strategic and good at politics
- Dark triad men have more sexual partners, and tend to seek more short-term sex (Jonason et al., 2008)
- Narcissists strategically mimic high-power people, ostensibly to be liked by them, and form alliances (Ashton-James & Levordashka, 2013)
- People high in social dominance prop their in-group in power while discriminating other groups, and especially men from other groups. People also differ in their social dominance orientation (Sidanius and Pratto, 1999)

These studies may lend support to the concept of power intelligence.

Measures of Power Propensities

Some of the power-related scales that empirically differentiate individuals for power-related predispositions include:

- Need for Power (nPow): Captures a desire to influence, lead, control, or impact others.
  - Status Motive / Need for Status: focuses on motivation to seek higher social rank, respect, visibility, and prestige.
- Personal Sense of Power (SOP / POW): Measures how powerful a person feels in their relationships and daily interactions
  - Leadership Self-Efficacy: Measures a person's belief in their ability to lead, influence, direct, and coordinate others
- Interpersonal Power Inventory (IPI): Measures how people use power in relationships across different bases of power (reward, coercion, legitimacy, expertise, etc.).
  - Dominance–Prestige Scale (Cheng & Tracy) Measures two core strategies of status: dominance (force, intimidation), and prestige (skills, respect)
- Communion / Agency Scales: Measure focus on agency (assertion, influence, leadership) versus communion (warmth, cooperation). Agency is directly tied to power.

Donald Trump: A Case Study

In support of the theory of multiple intelligences is the concept of 'savants' or prodigies in one area as compared to their other cognitive abilities (Gilman, 2001).

If you can find such a guy, then you're probably in the presence of a discrete, independent "type" of intelligence. This approach lends credibility to emotional intelligence separated from IQ if we find cases of high IQ, but lower emotional intelligence. Autistic people offer some examples. Or if you read Einstein's letter to his wife you'd realize he never understood how women and relationships work.

Simiarly, we can use the same approach for power intelligence.
Let's take Donald Trump. He isn't stupid. But when he implied in an official press conference that one could inject disinfectant into the lungs to cure Covid, he may have shown some cognitive limitations.

Hence, Trump's achievements may speak less about general high-IQ, and more about a predisposition towards power, including:

1. Hyper-sensitive feel for power dynamics, including minor slights or criticisms
2. High power ambitions, craving power, dominance, status, and victory
   - Action and approach-orientation towards his goals
3. Above-average power skills to climb status hierarchies and capture people's attention

Trump is well aware of his darker power-related side as well, and may even consider it his advantage.
In one interview he said:

> Interviewer: (…) He said I think Donald Trump is an artful liar, I think he's a greedy, vicious, and arrogant man
> Trump: Well, I don't know is that supposed to be a compliment or not, I'm not sure

Trump also excelled at frame control, including the "frame imposing' frame control technique.
Again, he is fully aware of it, and writes "The Art of the Deal":

> When a reporter asks me a tough question, I try to frame a positive answer, even if that means shifting the ground.
> For example, if someone asks me what negative effects the world's tallest building might have on the West Side, I turn the tables and talk about how New Yorkers deserve the world's tallest building, and what a boost it will give the city to have that honor again.
> Trump, 1987

That's some skills in frame control for PR and reputation.

(Media) manipulation was another Trump strength.
Always adept at getting free publicity, he intuitively understood how to play to people's psychology.
He says:

> I play to people's fantasies.
> People may not always think big themselves, but they can still get very excited by those who do. That's why a little hyperbole never hurts. People want to believe that something is the biggest and the greatest and the most spectacular.
> Trump, 1987

Trump also reveled in competitions. In 2006, he verbally brawled his way to his first nomination, and most of his political opponents were unprepared to meet him at his level of dominance and Machiavellianism.

All in all, Trump may be a good example of an individual with around average IQ, but above average PQ, and exceptional drive for power.

Grow Your Power Intelligence

Power intelligence is not abstract theory. It's a practical skill set that determines who rises, who stalls, and who gets outplayed in competitive environments.

SUMMARY

About the Author:

Christian Rudder graduated from Harvard in 1998 with a degree in math. He is the co-founder and former president of the dating site OkCupid, where he authored the OkTrends blog.

1. Women Are More Demanding & Rate Most Men As "Below Average"

It's fashionable these days to say that men's expectations are ruined by all the images of models, fake boobs, and photoshopped starlets.

In truth, it's women who are far more demanding when rating the opposite sex.

A chart should say it all:

Women are far pickier than men and assess most men as “below average”
Says Rudder:

> Only one guy in six is “above average” in an absolute sense. Sex appeal isn’t something commonly quantified like this, so let me put it in a more familiar context: translate this plot to IQ, and you have a world where the women think 58 percent of men are brain-damaged.

Damn some next-level female hypergamy there :).

And before you think that’s normal because only less good-looking men join OKCupid, that is probably not the case, since the author tested random samples of OKCupid users against random social network users.

2. Men Like Younger Women – Albeit Sometimes They Lie to Themselves

That dotted diagonal is the “age parity” line
The author says that a man’s sex appeal progresses and seems to reach the limit at around 40.

The author describes the progression in even better terms for a 20-years old guy who’s starting to date as an adult (redacted for brevity):

> If you track the whole lot over time, the main way he'll lose options from that set is when some of them just stop being single (…) his total "interested" pool actually gain women. As he gets older, and presumably richer and more successful, those qualities draw younger women in. His age doesnt hurt him. As he and the women in his pool mature, the ones who are still available will find him as desirable an option as they did when they were all twenty

But for women, age is a much bigger factor.
Women are at their best in their younger twenties, and never budge.
The author says that "women over the age of 35 might as well not exist".

And describing women's reality:

> If you could do the same thing for a typical woman at twenty, you'd get a different story. Over the years, she, too, would lose men from her pool to things like marriage, but she would also lose options to time itself—as the years passed, fewer and fewer of the remaining single men would find her attractive. Her dating pool is like a can with two holes— it drains on the double.

The author says that dating for older men and women gets more challenging because of their different preferences.
But it's most challenging for women:

> Women want men to age with them. And men always head toward youth. A 32 year-old set her age-preference filters at 28 -35. That thirty-five-year-old set his filters to 24 – 40, and yet rarely contact anyone over twenty-nine. Neither finds what they are looking for. You could say they're like two ships passing in the night (…) But in my mind, I see the women still on solid ground, ashore, just watching them disappear.

3. Quirks Attract: Be A Polarizer (It Might Be Even Better Than Being a "10")

This extremely interesting phenomenon in brief:

> A woman's overall sex appeal is enhanced when some men find her ugly.

How do you define the quirk and the "woman whom some other men find ugly"?
By variance.

How do you define the quirk and the "woman whom some other men find ugly"?
By variance.

In OkCupid people don't just say "yes or no", but can vote with a number from 1 to 5.
So if a woman is an average of a 3, it's very different if most men rated her around average, or if most men voted her 1 or 5.

Variance is so powerful that, the author says, "it has almost as much to do with the sexual attention a woman gets as her overall attractiveness".
Such as, the variance of attractiveness is almost as important as overall attractiveness.

Part of the reason is because variance means that some guys will like you a lot, and those "fanboys" will do most of the messaging and chasing.
But it's more than simply having more top votes, says the author, and there is something more about variance that attracts more attention. He speculates that it's because people can feel that not many others might like her, so they write even more frequently because they feel like they have a competitive advantage.

4. How Much People Enjoy the Date Is Independent on People's Looks

When two people meet for a date:

> the two people's looks had almost no effect on whether they had a good time. No matter which person was better-looking or by how much—even in cases where one blind-dater was a knockout and the other rather homely—the percent of people giving the dates a positive rating was constant. Attractiveness didn't matter.

This is not how users behave online.
Online people still care about looks. It's just that looks didn't seem to affect how much people rated their in-person experience.

The author sums it as such:

> In short, people appear to be heavily preselecting online for something that, once they sit down in person, doesn't seem important to them

Politics also mattered little in compatibility in spite people usually rank it very high.

What instead had a surprising predictive power were questions such as "do you like scary movies" and "have you traveled to another country alone".

5. Race Matters... Quite A Bit

This chart says it all:

Good to be an asian woman or white man
The author seems to be surprised that race matters:

> When I show here that black women and later, black men, get short shrift, and that adding whiteness to a user's identity makes him or her more attractive, I'm not describing some Ozark fever dream, I'm describing our world, mine and yours.

Frankly, this makes me wonder whether the author wasn't being fully forthcoming (to himself), or if he's been living beneath a rock.

People tend to prefer their own race, and women are slighly more "race loyal" than men, with a preference for white men when dating outside their race.

Culture also plays an important role in racial preferences.

In the UK, the site's black members get 98.9 percent of the messages white members do. In Japan, 97.8 percent. In Canada, 90 percent.
However, the author is not considering here that blacks in UK and in Japan might get a boost for being less common and, thus, the "exotic boost" might also play a role, and not necessarily a lack of racism or racial preferences.

6. Beauty Operates on Richter Scale

There is little difference between a 1 and a 2.
But at the higher end, the difference is bigger. A 9 is intense, but a 10 can rupture the world.

7. Beauty Matters... But Exponentially More For Men

Men and women also experience beauty very differently, with men generally more "smitten" by female beauty.

Women are the red curve, men are the black curve
Female beauty also works more in contexts outside of dating, with attractive women being sought after in the workplace as if they were on a dating platform.

8. Copy-Paste Is Not As Effective, But Overall Works

The copy-paste strategy underperforms by about 25%.
But measuring by replies received per unit effort, it's many times more efficient.

9. Big Data Beats W.E.I.R.D Academic Research

Rudder says that much of scientific research might be weaker than most people realize because it's based on small batches of students -that's why the replication crisis maybe?-.

Weird stands for white, educated, industrialized, rich, and democratic.

But I think Rudder took it a bit too far when he said that research is not generalizable because different places have different moral standards.
There is instead a surprising homogeneity of moral standards among people.

Big Data Will Soon Provide Longitudinal Data

Longitudinal data is data based on research that spans many years, and possibly over a lifetime.

Big (digital) data is increasing its reach as the "birthdate" of the Internet and social networks move farther and farther back.

MORE WISDOM

- Average gay men don't have more partners

It's at the extreme that the stereotype is true: promiscuous gay men have lots more partners than promiscuous heterosexual individuals.
The top 2% of gay men have 28% of the sex.

- Common friends on social networks are a great predictor of relationship longevity

In the very beginning, the best predictor is "how often the partners visit each other's profiles".
Later on it's the overlap of common friends.

- National lines might not matter much in culture and attitudes

The author says that around certain topics the biggest difference is whether people live in cities or in urban areas.

For example, we can see a strong divide between urban and rural population when answering the question "should burning the flag be illegal".

- Predicting power of big data and AI is only growing

Just from people's like alone a group of researchers could figure out:

- gay or straight 88%
- lesbian or straight 75%
- Caucasian or African American 95%
- a man or a woman 93%
- Democrat or Republican 85%
- a drug user 65%

Thought personally I didn't find that very surprising.
Give me a certain number of likes, and I could probably tell you the same with a relatively high degree of accuracy.

CRITICISM

- All numbers are averages of dating apps

Never forget that.
The book doesn't stress it enough.

People behave differently in real life, and you can always be the exception to any "general rule" or to any "averaged-out behavior".

- Some analysis needed more depth, and the author jumped to conclusions

The author seems to suggest "beauty doesn't matter" when it comes to dating.

He cites data based on the rating people assigned to a romantic date, and the fact that the rating was not strongly correlated to people's attractiveness rating.

BUT… The post-date rating doesn't say much about people who kept on dating, had sex, and/or entered into a relationship.

How people evaluated the date on OkCupid tells us little and might even be misleading.
There was not enough insight to make the huge leap the author took.

- Some overly simplistic "predictions"

The author says that a project that analyzes constitutions and government performance can help emerging countries choose better constitutions.

To me, that's really simplistic.
First of all, there are only 900 constitutions drafted since 1787. Second, the constitution might probably be such a small detail in determining a country's prospect that, well… That was quite simplistic.

- Sometimes feels "politically correct"

The author being surprised or half-shocked that race matters felt a bit disingenuous.

- Some fluff, opinions, and long unneeded lists

The author says that quirks make people more successful and then says it's also true for supermodels, like Cindy Crawford doing great when she stopped covering her mole, and Linda Evangelist had "severe hair".
But that felt like random -and not necessarily correct- observation at best, and poor correlation at worst.

The audio version also listed endless table entries, which I felt was unneeded.

- Slight (unneeded) bashing of normal science in favor of big data?

The author righteously promotes big data and why can lead to more accurate or new insights.

And he's totally right.

Yet, at times, it feels like there isn't enough credit given to academic research.
In my opinion, the author went too far.
And you can quickly confirm that by reading this review: much of the insights of "Dataclysm" only confirm what "standard" science already told us -men like women of reproductive age, some men deny that reality to themselves, women are pickier than men, etc. etc.-

PROS

- Great insights

Just one single "pro", but don't underestimate: there are some new insights here on dating dynamics that make "Dataclysm" a true gem.

REVIEW

Dataclysm has received some mixed reviews, but I disagree: it's a great book

Yes, there is some fluff here and there and some personal opinions that diverge from the actual data.
But there is plenty of insight, including some new insights you won't find in any other dating book.

Maybe it's not as good and comprehensive as the similar "A Billion Wicked Thoughts", but I learned a lot from both Rudder's book, and blog. I'm very glad Christian Rudder has shared all this data with us.
It certainly helped me to make the website and products better.

Seductresses: Tactics of History's Most Successeful Seductresses (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Seductresses" (2004) is a dating book for women which presents and analyzes notable and very different women who had nonetheless one thing in common: they had their way with men.
Prioleau, the author, says that many seductresses were successful in spite they lacked youth or beauty, and they all proved that it's a myth and a lie that women must be demure and feminine to win at life -including with men-.
In this book, Prioleau chronicles the seductresses' exploits while examining what is it that made them successful.

About the Author

Betsy Prioleau holds a Ph.D. in literature from Duke University, was an associate professor at Manhattan College, and taught cultural history at New York University.
She is also the author of "Swoon", the equivalent of "Seductresses", but for male seducers.

Seductress: A Definition

Prioleau defines "seductress" as:

> A powerful fascinator able to get and keep the men of her choice, men who are good for her. Rarely discarded or two-timed, she successfully combines erotic supremacy with personal and vocational achievement.

Later on, she says, "seductresses are in fact the liberated woman incarnate" and "futuristic women of female entitlement: independent operators, pleasure claimers, terroristas of traditional femininity, and big, classy divas".

That definition, says the author, removes some famous but fake seductresses such as the "eaten and colonized" Marilyn Monroe, Pamela Harriman, and "gofers to male genius" such as Alma Mahler.

My Note:

I'm not necessarily convinced Monroe should be left out.
As much as she seemed indeed lost and dependent, she also achieved much in her life and certainly populated many men's dreams.

The author seems to favor a definition of "seductress" that is "independent" along with the feminist style and preference, which sometimes means more "masculine" in its expression.
That's cool, seduction can also include those women. But it shouldn't exclude women who don't fit that mold.

Seduction is about men wanting more a woman.
Whether the woman also seeks, craves, or simply also wants an emotional and/or stable connection with those men does not cancel out the seductive charge she might possess.

From more on the specific case of Monroe also see:

- Three types of seductresses

12 Seductress "Weapons"

Prioleau divides the tools of seduction into "physical" and "psychological":

Physical Arts

The physical alone can't hold a man under eternal spell and the psychological side is also needed.
However, the two aren't pitched one against another, and the physical is also important.

- Dress / ornament

> Seductresses dressed for parade, with look-at-me excess and over-the-top opulence.

- Cosmetics / Hygiene

Except for a possible impact of pheromones, body odor didn't usually do too well in seduction.

> The goddess's votaries steeped themselves in costly spices, gums, and aromatic woods and burned incense to their deity.

- Setting

Seductresses arranged their spaces to awe, delight, and fascinate.

To take advantage of the connection between the pleasure of food and the pleasure of sex, some seductresses laid excellent tables and served the choicest, most aphrodisiacal cuisine.
My personal advice is to have fruits, which tend to last longer and have a stronger link to sex.
Also jars of refined butters are good and of course, good wines.

Some of them also had pets including gazelles, monkeys, squadrons of cats, and, in one case, a grizzly bear.

My Note: Watch out for pet smells!
If you have cats, watch out for the smell! Cat owners get used to it, but some houses with cats stink to the high heavens.
I did have a girl with a beautiful Persian cat though and the place always smelled good, so it's possible to do it.

Flowers are also great.

- Music / Dance / Body Language

> Women in the business of fascination learn how to hold the floor, to move with grace, style, rhythm, and slam dunk sensuality.

- Sexpertise

Many of the world's seductresses were "raunchy sexperts", says the author.
Also, it seems to me, they owned their sexuality rather than being scared or embarrassed by it.

Psychological Arts

Sex originates in the mind, says the author.

- Obstruction, Difficulty, Anxiety

> Anxiety is the "food of love"; pain, its spice.

- Maternal Nurture, Intimacy

At the same time that anxiety and pain stoke love, men also require "the primal gratifications of the great goddess". "Mother love underpins all desire", says the author.

However, there is a caveat: it cannot be too much, as men also fear engulfment and annihilation from, I suppose, an overbearing female figure.

So the seductresses played the mother role through a balancing act: intimacy, TLC, but also accompanied with non-maternal sizzle.

- Ego Enhancement

Everyone seeks an ego boost, and seductresses deliver it.

However, there is an important caveat here:

> The lover must be a winner, which explains why the praises of toadies and errand girls never work as their mothers promised. Only the applause of valued people carries any value.

This was a very smart observation by Prioleau, and something you need to keep in mind.
The same applies to judge power dynamics, and to leadership, by the way.

- Conversation, Comedy

It's a myth that men only love women who laugh at their jokes.
Men also love women who can liven the mood, and be great conversational (sparring) partners.

> Renaissance courtesans studied bel parlare (seductive speech) as assiduously as lute playing and bedcraft and reviled "dumb of mouth" whores.

- Festivity, Nonrepression

Men long for the release of social constraint, of being able to let go in ecstatic abandon.

> Seductresses were mistresses of misrule, carnival queens who cast off repressive shackles and declared a public holiday.

- Vitality, Plentitude, Androgyny

The "joie de vivre" is the goddess' "yes energy" that gives birth to life -and to heaven and earth-.

And how about androgyny?

Says the author:

> the primordial sex deity personified life energy and totality, including the union of both sexes, seductresses played up their ultravitality, inner plentitude, and androgyny. The lure of gender synthesis, with its "superabundance of erotic possibilities," exerts a potent fascination on the libido.

There are indeed some interesting quotes in the book of men who felt alive with the seductress.
For example, Alexandre Manceau says that "I have laughed more, cried more, lived more than in all the thirty-three preceding them. . . . What a joy!".

- Impact, Drama

Whatever her main tool for seduction was, the seductress "souped it up".

Says Prioleau:

> The grandes amoureuses were doyennes of dazzle, showboaters, and scene stealers.

Even love that lasts needs wake-up calls to stave off satiety and boredom.

My Note: More of the seductive qualities

In my opinion, what I've noticed across most of the successful seductresses and that the author did not include in her list:

- Excess
- Skills
- Talent
- Drive / ambition
- Narcissism / self-absorption / Dark Triad / power-hungry

Some of these women were more rather masculine in their attitudes.

You can see that both in a positive or negative way.

Some were driven, confident, and focused on their life, passion, or goals of personal achievements.

Many of them weren't "family women", but were extraordinary, in one way or another.
It's that something exceptional that made them transcend the canonical traits that women are evaluated on, including beauty, age, and "nurturing qualities".

Some of these women had sky-high self-esteem, with a strong belief in themselves and in their capability.
Sometimes, it was a belief that was objectively nonsense, which is a trait that some psychopaths share (Kiehl, 2014).
For example, describing Jane Digby:

> Throughout old age Jane lost none of her thrill fever and magisterial swerve. After watching a Bedouin sword dance, she said, "If I chose, I could surpass them all in fire and agility."

Some of these women were braggart and dominant.
Germaine de Staël said:

> "Monsieur I understand everything that deserves to be understood and what I do not understand is nothing."

That type of bravado is something that only cocksure, dominant men would say. And men who are probably a bit emotionally insecure of course, but that's also typical of men: women are far more comfortable with the vulnerability of "not knowing", which again tells me this woman was rather masculine in her attitude.
Germaine also bragged of her "body count", which again is a very male thing -and a rather cheap one at that, let alone for women-.
And Louise Lévêque de Vilmorin said that what drove her to write was sexual conquest.

Many of these women weren't just alpha females, but were specular equivalents of alpha men, and sometimes even very masculine in their lifestyle and general attitude. They craved success, fame, and recognition.

Louis Salome' might have been among the notable exceptions here, as her exceptional quality was to give exceptional attention to men (such as Nietzche).
These men weren't used to anyone listening, and caring about their work as deeply as Salome' did, and that made them hooked to Salome'.

And there is one last element:

- Move within upper society

Many top seductresses were "socialites", which basically means partying, hobnobbing, traveling, and dating the rich and famous.
You can't be a top seductress and getting the most out of life if you're seducing bums and nine to fivers.

And when they were prostitutes, they weren't prostitutes, but "courtesans", catering to the wealthy and powerful.

You don't need them all

You don't need every single item in the above list.

Says Prioleau:

> Lou Andreas-Salomé, for instance, hated music and cosmetics, Eva Perón lacked a sense of humor, and Martha Gellhorn and Grace Hartigan refused to mother men. Seduction is an art, not a science, requiring different mixes for different men and a fingertip feel for mood, timing, and hidden tastes.

6 Seductresses Archetypes: Busting All Conventions

Some seductresses were beautiful, but some bust all conventions and seduced as older women, adventurers, and with average or even below average looks.

Some of the traits they shared also go against the wisdom of what's attractive, including androgyny, and noncomformity.
And what made them special were supravitality and self-actualization.

The author divides "Seductresses" into 6 chapters with several examples of women that "busted" those myths. They are:

1. Nonbeauties: plenty of seductresses were plain, and yet seduced effectively. They knew that seduction and love is an illusionist game of imagination, and went big into all other physical appeals such as dance, gesture, music, voice, settings, and hot sex. A plain or unattractive body might even be an advantage as it shocks the senses while the seductress wins the heart
2. Seniors: "age didn't deter seductresses from reeling in the most desired men of their times". To their advantage, they have a fully developed character, confidence, an enriched mind, sexual freedom and experience, maternal mana, status, money, and a what-the-hell closing time joie de vivre. Senior seductresses have faced backlash both from men -who resent their post-reproductive freedom to fornicate like men-, and from women, who see them as a threat to their hegemony -and reproductive needs-

3. Intellectuals: “feminists as diverse as Simone de Beauvoir and Germaine Greer agree that you can’t get a man with a brain. Yet the real manslayers were smart cookies with big mouths”. They did not submerge themselves into a “Great Man”, but pursued their own agenda (note: I only partially agree with this one, some of those women also supported great men while doing their own things, and seldom I felt like they reached the same heights of the best men of their times). Relationships were more among equals, and they were always ready to move on
4. Artists (not muses): “rather than decorative, passive, compliant muses, they wrote their own books and lit their own creative fires”. “With typical reciprocity, they delivered as much inspiration as they received”. They were artists and lived in excesses, sometimes trampling many social values such as home, motherhood, honesty, and modesty.

And two “commanda types”:

1. Governmental leaders: The Machtweiber -(German for “vamp-politicas”- demolish the satanic boss lady stereotypes, winning men and governing with equal proficiency.
   There are three types:
   1. Absolute monarchs
   2. Divine ordainers who support male ruling
   3. Revolutionary activists
2. Adventurers: rakish adventures that most male fear, but that many other men fall for. These are the type of women most likely to desert their homes and neglect their children but, the author says, men fall hard for the women on the loose.

My Note: leaders and adventurers least successful of the group and based on the proposed examples, the leaders and adventurers seemed the relatively least successful of the group.
Possibly, it was also because they were also the least interested in seducing, and more focusing on living their own lives.

... Seductresses Follow the Same Erotic Strategies

Says the author:

> Just as strikingly, they followed similar erotic strategies. These, I discovered, mirrored the historic ars amatoria.

In truth, my opinion on what they did and which worked differ from the author.
This review will be a mix of the author’s point of view, and mine.

If old seductresses looked at today’s women, says the author, they would marvel at how many rights they have.
But they’d be disappointed at women’s courage today, and their approach to seduction. She says:

> Seduction demands spunk and “daimonic assertion.” “Venus favors the bold!” Next they’d urge us to boost our self-esteem and get high, mighty, and magnificent. And, of course, to discover our genitals (…) Finally they’d advise us to tune out the pretty-power propaganda and dial up the neglected psychological arts. They’d direct us to libraries instead of (or along with) gyms, to acting classes, to metacharm schools—whatever it takes to invade men’s heads again

Notable Seductresses: Examples

There are many historical examples in the book.

I will pick here some of the most significant, giving preference to the ones who:

- Have a picture
- Have a more reliable biography to cross-check the veracity of the claims

Isabella Stewart Gardner

> Yet this homely woman with a sad-sack, lusterless face had a serious “way with men.” Not only did she hook Boston’s prize catch, Jack Gardner, who idolized her throughout their long marriage, but she attracted a permanent Praetorian guard of strapping bluebloods and prominent artists.

Her secret weapon, says the author, was her vitality.

> The rich, stunning Jack Gardner had never met anyone as plain as Belle when his sister introduced them in Paris. But he underestimated her “glorious vitality.” Before he knew it, she’d bewitched him with her quick movements and bright conversation and made him roar with laughter. Defying his family, he dropped out of Harvard and married her on the sly

Indeed, she is not beautiful.
But Wikipedia confirms her husband was an art patron, likely wealthy, and one Boston’s most eligible bachelor. Her husband stayed with her until his death even when the doctor told her she couldn’t have children, and even while she was sick and depressed. So it wasn’t just vitality that bewitched Mr. Gardner. I suspect their common love for art helped.

Prioleau says that her husband remained smitten and supportive even amidst her “flirtatious romps”.
The author lists Francis Marion Crawford among her liasons, a handsome man 13 years younger than her whom she ensnared with intellect and mother love.

Wikipedia lists Crawford as one of her “friends”.

There is still a museum to her name to this day, build in the style of the Renaissance palaces in Venice, one of her favorite destinations.

Wallis Simpson, 1895-1986

Wallis Simpson in 1936 by Dr. Ghulam Nabi Kazi, on Flickr
Wallis picked the wrong first husband, and after her divorce she “man-shopped, seducing a succession of Washington diplomats, as well as living in China in a ménage à trois with Herman Rogers, who thought her “the great love of his life.”

She left her second husband to marry the future king of England, a relationship that caused many headaches to the royal family.
Wikipedia, referencing her husband’s biography, confirms the author’s claim:

> The King’s desire to marry a woman who had two living ex-husbands threatened to cause a constitutional crisis in the United Kingdom and the Dominions, and ultimately led to his abdication in December 1936 to marry “the woman I love”

And it seems true that prince Edwards had fallen head over heels for her.
Quoting again Wikipedia:

> By the end of 1934, Edward was irretrievably besotted with Wallis, finding her domineering manner and abrasive irreverence toward his position appealing; in the words of his official biographer, he became “slavishly dependent” on her.

Prioleau says that the prince was a lost soul in a prince body, and that he never felt free and alive in his life.
That’s what Wallis gave him: a taste of freedom, irreverence, and life.
She says:

> Her frank country bluntness dissolved pretense, her relaxed style dispelled inhibitions, and her risqué jokes and parodies of the royal family made him laugh out loud.
> Sexually he was reborn. Underendowed and prey to obscure dysfunctions and perversions, he'd never been fully satisfied until Wallis came along with her Fang-Chung Shu and Taoist Kegels.

Prioleau says that started very early, and shook the prince out of his torpor:

> The moment he met her, she cut through the ceremony and protocol and answered his polite inquiry about British heating with a sharp wisecrack: "Every American woman who comes to your country is always asked the same question. I'd hoped for something more original from the Prince of Wales."

That was delivered with a mix of motherly love, something that the prince probably also lacked, and that Prioleaus says was the main ingredient of his ongoing dependence on her:

> But her chief fascination for David was her maternal allure. Famished for parental affection, he basked in her motherly ministrations and affections. On his visits to her London flat she treated him like a favorite son: She plumped his cushions, concocted special highballs, and led him to the kitchen for home-cooked midnight treats. Later she micromanaged his health with the solicitude of a supernanny, bundling him up against the cold

A picture of the two together:

Apparently, the relationship came with the usual showering of gifts, jewels, and all-paid holidays.
Prioleau says the prince remained devoted and supportive even amidst her affairs.

Edith Piaf, 1915-1963

On stage, she sang of broken hearts and men hurting her.
But it was all a ruse.

Among Piaf's secret weapons was her mothering and support of men.
For example, with actor Eddie Constantine:

> During their two-year affair she gave Eddie a total makeover, from gold cuff links to voice training. “She made me believe I was somebody,” he later reflected, “so that I’d become somebody”; “she had a kind of genius for bringing out and strengthening a personality.”

Pauline Viardot, 1821-1910

Viardot’s voice was like a drug for Ivan Turgenev, a Russian nobleman who remained by her side in a lifelong affair.

Mae West, 1893-1980

Mae started relatively late in Hollywood:

> Mae was nearly forty before she began her Hollywood career as a sexpot, four years older than the age-phobic Marilyn Monroe when she killed herself.

Mae had a mother who did everything for her, and allowed to quit school in third grade to pursue a stage career.

Prioleau lists Mae West as one of her examples of “silver foxes”:

> On the verge of seventy she chose a chorus boy from her Vegas “muscleman act” and found “ultimately what every woman wants,” a senior erotic dream. Thirty-three, blue-eyed, and abulge in all the right places, Chester Ribonsky changed his name to Paul Novak to please her and believed God had put him “on this earth to take care of Miss West.”

Wikipedia, listing West’s biography and two newspapers, largely confirms that.
Except that West was 61, not “on the verge of 70”. when they met.

West herself credited her sexual and seductive appeal to status and money, and Prioleau says that “alpha sex appeal” works for women as well.

Lou Andreas-Salomé, 1861-1937

A great example that mind-control level of seduction and looks don’t necessarily go hand-in-hand.

Says Prioleau:

> She was a stout, fiftyish matron who wore no makeup and looked so much older than her age that she’d been mistaken for her lover’s mother.

Yet:

> was one of the leading femmes fatales of her time and all times. More than one man committed or threatened suicide on her account, and Freud's circle went into an electron spin the moment she set foot in his lecture hall.

Salome' was a "late sexual bloomer", and with some of her early relationships she demanded and maintained a "no sex policy".
That changed with time though, and she grew sexual and wrote about sex and sexual dynamics.

Prioleau says that on her last years, half bald and sallow with renal disease, "she enamored a young acolyte who nursed her and devoted his life to sorting her papers".
I couldn't find confirmation for that online, but the author lists a biography of Salome' in her sources, plus a couple of sources that indirectly mention Salome' via Sigmund Freud.

Her secret weapons seemed to be:

- Intelligence: more about sounding erudite than actually being effective in furthering knowledge -or any practical application of knowledge-. Her methodology was very much speculation and theory-based (for example, she said through intercourse men and women recovered their "inner bisexuality", and blamed the Madonna-whore dichotomy on men's envy of women sexual superiority)
- Intellectual curiosity: probably even more important than her actual IQ, which by itself does little
- Active, driven intellectual pursuits: curiosity is rare and highly appreciated by men. But this other side of the coin made Salome' unique. She wasn't just curious, but an active sparring partner as well. She was an active sounding board, providing feedback and criticism, and helping driven men improve their own work
  - Helping men do better work
- Judge role: both from an intellectual point of view, challenging men's ideas, and from a personal point of view, holding them to higher standards as men (including when they fell for her)
- Bonding and connecting: through her deep, active listening and, I suppose, with her deep conversation that showed how
  - Making men feel understood: a consequence of active listening, interest, and bonding

> From the moment he met her, Friedrich felt he'd found the one woman who "understood him as no one else."

I suppose that Salome's deep interest also made men feel cared for, and valued -an aspect of the judge's role as well-.

Also some dynamics that made her so sought after include:

- Favorable sexual market dynamics: she was one of the exceedingly rare and few women, and that pushed her relative SMV through the roof
- Triangulation: she never gave herself to one man, which led to different men pursuing her at the same time, vying for her attention

Cleopatra

Could you imagine a list of seductresses without Cleopatra?

Me neither.

Cleopatra was also a smart politician and strategist, and she started early in cut-throat political Machiavellianism. When she was only 10 her older sister Berenice dethroned their father, and Cleopatra fled with him to Rome where they lobbied, bribed, and groveled for three years until they could secure Roman funds and backing to re-take Egypt. And execute Berenice.

Years later, when she first met Marc Anthony, she “saturated the Near East” with her publicity.
I supposed that pre-framed her as a goddess, so that her staged entrance would have an even stronger effect.
Playing to Antony’s hedonism, she introduced him to world-ruler luxurious lifestyle. Every night, eight dinners were prepared for them, just to make sure the food was perfectly done.

Cleopatra was a master of self image.
Writes Prioleau:

> Her turnout was pure goddess abbondanza. An expert in cosmetics (she wrote a treatise on the subject), she made up her plain face with hieratic glamour and wore see-through Sidonian silks adorned with Red Sea pearl earrings and artfully chased gold brooches. Heady perfumes suffused the palace—a monument to sybaritic enjoyment with vaulted gold and ebony ceilings and soft, embroidered couches.

However, I’d like to stress, she wasn’t just smoke and mirrors and social exchange manipulation.
Marc Antony wasn’t stupid.
Cleopatra commanded an empire, and was also able to negotiate by providing some real value for what Antony cared about: winning wars. And Cleopatra assisted him with 200 ships to fight the Parthian empire.

Cleopatra also made Antony madly ambitious and, Prioleau’s says, feeding Antony with visions of a Roman-Egyptian dynasty.

La Belle Otero

Caroline Otero said to a friend:

> A man becomes yours not the moment you spread your legs, but the moment you twist his wrist.

Otero was a demonic dancer.
Says Prioleau:

> Her pulse ran high. After work she downed massive mounds of corn and chorizo, stripped to her chemise, and danced until dawn with “perspiration running down her thighs.”

And she had the saucy “mediterreanen” character set at very extra saucy:

> A fire-breathing sensationalist, she was a notorious troublemonger and short fuse. She sued everybody who miffed her, flung urine at an impudent waiter, slugged a tiresome woman in a hotel lobby,

Also it’s worth noticing here that the author lists an example of mate guarding as a sexually attractive behavior, and I believe that, if done right, she’s right:

> and stomped out of the opera when an escort looked at another woman. “When one has the honor of being with La Belle Otero,” she exploded, “no one else exists.”

More Notable Seductresses

Get the book to learn more about:

- Tullia d’Aragona, 1505-1556

> Beauties of the idolized variety—petite, bosomy Botticelli blondes—crowded her chosen métier, the sex trade. But she outstripped them all. Nearly every important figure of the cinquecento fell in love with her, poets lauded her, and the populace treated her like a celebrity.
> With shrewd perspicacity, she niche marketed herself as the "intellectual courtesan" and reached the top of the profession within four years.

- Diane de Poitiers, 1499-1566 – she wielded much power via her influence on the king. The younger and more attractive king's wife was jealous, but unable to unsettle her as long as the king lived
- Veronica Franco, 1546-1591 – smart networker, poet and writer, and defended and won her own case against the inquisition which accused her of witchcraft. She was the century's leading feminist, but in truth shunned other women all her life (a common thing among seductresses: they might be feminists, but don't really go along with other women)
- Elizabeth I, 1553-1603 – "Early on she learned the survival skills of a Machiavella: caution, circumspection, self-possession, deceit, patience, and the art of "answerless answers."
- Françoise de Maintenon, 1635-1719 – at 50YO she secretly married the "Sun King" by appealing to the king's religious ardor and to his idealization of pious, religious women. Prioleau says that "she lost her groove to a Madonna game". But she nevertheless pulled off one of the most stunning seductions by an older woman in Western history.
- Catherine Sedley, 1657-1717
- Minette Helvétius, 1719-1800 -one of the "silver foxes", owner of an influential salon in Paris
- Catherine the Great, 1729-1796 – Prioleau says she had lots of lovers, the last one a 23 YO man to her 61 YO".
  She was also adept at politics, seemingly with a feminine approach. An ego massager, she praised loud and scolded in a whisper. Courted consent with erotic ploys: ornate dress, flash on the dance floor, gourmet banquets, amateur theatricals, and liberal doses of laughter and relaxed banter. Rather than direct confrontation and domination, she believed in making "men believe that they want to do what I tell them to do."

- Thérèse Lachmann, 1819-1884

Also known as "La Paiva", This one sounded like a true Machiavellian sociopath:

> On her first night in London she landed Lord Stanley in the next box at Covent Garden. He led to bigger game—namely, a Portuguese marquis, Albino Paiva, who fell "madly in love with her" and married her. His wedding night, though, held a diabolic surprise. Spreading her hawk wings, Thérèse told him she'd attained the position she wanted whereas he'd acquired a prostitute. "You go back to Portugal," she commanded. "I shall stay here with your name and remain a whore."

Not verbatim with those words, but Wikipedia, using the "The Memoirs of Count Horace de Viel-Castel" as a source, confirms the story.

- Cora Pearl, 1835-1886 – she cured her appearances as well as she could, but meanwhile she also remained at heart the tomboy she was as a kid. "A coarse vulgarian with a "sewer of a mouth," she released men from their devil's bargain with the angel of the house. Men enjoyed the ecstasy of "barriers broken down," "organic relief," and "the ease of existence!".
  Cora Pearl ascribed to the belief of "men want to chase" more than they want to kill, and gave them plenty of obstacles to make that chase exciting.

- Violet Gordon Woodhouse, 1871-1948 – she got the type of husband that driven men sometimes get: supportive, and devoted. And he agreed to all her requests: free money spending, liberty to pursue her career, and.. No sex. Two men later joined their house, all three orbiting around Violet.
  Prioleau says she worked hard to keep them all, making time for each, giving them gifts, writing love letters, and even feigning illnesses and emergencies.

- Josephine Baker, 1906-1975 – dance was her seductive tool of choice. She saw herself as a creature of myth, but it eventually went over her head, she overdid it, and drowned in debt.

- Martha Gellhorn, 1908-1998 – her upbringing was perfect to mold a future seductress: the only daughter, received lavished praise and positive reinforcement, and within a household that valued freedom, knowledge, and nonconformity. And when her private women-only school tried to turn her into a proper “lady”, her parents transferred her. When she married Hemingway she refused to take his name and stay home, and eventually divorced him

- Eva Perón, 1919-1952 – she began as a prostitue, and her break arrived when she was finally cast in a soap opera that gave her entrance to the circles of power. Prioleau says that she first ensnared Juan sidling up to him and murmuring “Thank you for existing; I will never leave your side.”
  And she was indeed instrumental to his success.
  With the help of communication experts and imagistas, she re-created herself as an iconic glamour goddess. She said that “the poor liked to see her beautiful”.

- Gloria Steinem, 1934 – ,” she writes at the end of “Doing Sixty”: I pray for the courage To walk naked At any age, To wear red and purple, To be unladylike, Inappropriate, Scandalous and incorrect To the very end.

Do Men Still Have More Power Today?

The author thought believes that, when it comes to men and women as groups, men still have more power.

She says:

> Despite equal opportunity sex and babe feminism, guys still hold the whip hand: They have numbers on their side (48 percent women to 43 percent men nationwide); they age better and cling like crotch crabs to their historic prerogatives of the initiative, double standard, promiscuity, mate trade-ins, domination, and domestic copouts.

Goddesses of The Future: A Game Plan

- Physical arts: we live in an era of sensory overload, and since seduction is about “one in a million impact”, the modern seductress must find a way to stand out from the pack
  - Befriend inner savage
  - Learn the rules before breaking them: “letting it all hang out” is not a strategy, and neither is rejecting all knowledge. To find your own way, the seductress first trains seriously, and only then cop her own moves
  - Eat luxuriously, but in moderation: “season it up with surprise-me flare and dine again for seduction rather than satiety or displaced lust”
  - Dress your unique way: all advertisement sells uniqueness, but it’s a masquerade for cookie-cutting mass production. You must find your truly own way

- Psychological Arts: modern culture lies that “knowledge is power, and the lack of it is feminine” The seductress knows the opposite is true, and by Prioleau’s description, the seductress is especially power-aware
  - Learn “how to be festive”
  - Learn the “art of drama”: after festivity comes pain. Passion needs “vital tension and tourbillion to survive: difficulty, challenge, nips of pain, and a journey through the deity’s whorled and tortuous erotic maze.”
  - Learn how to soothe and (emotionally) massage: after the maze come advocacy, support, and encouragement. Seductresses “intuited their lovers’ needs and wounds and salved them with ego strokes and TLC. They had Ph.D.’s in people skills—another lost twenty-first-century art.”
  - Inner fulfillment: “Ultimately, the biggest draw on the market will be strong, self-complete supremas. With the spread of conformity and image-driven superficiality, the allure of an individuated woman in full possession of herself and her powers will prove irresistible.”

The Challenges Ahead

Men are one of the roadbloacks.

Why?

Because “seduction riles and dismantles patriarchal domination”, says Prioleau.

America has been particularly hard-hit, and bruised and battered by the gender revolution, men are clinging to “pseudo-Darwinian defenses of male sexual superiority, and a slew of defensive shenanigans”.

And of course, much flack is to be expected by other women as well.

Still, the modern seductress will soldier on, breeze past obstacles, and achieve whatever she wants.

MORE WISDOM

- Men gain with seductresses

Albeit the author sometimes seems to take a stance of “women conquering men”, which in turn sometimes seems to suggest a “VS” frame, rather than a more win-win approach, she also says that men do gain with seductresses.

Says Prioleau:

> Unless unrequited passion leads them off a tenth-floor ledge, they achieve their fondest dreams in the arms of a seductress, a goddess to venerate who keeps them interested and ignites their inner hero. She leads them to their best self and restores them to true masculinity

QUOTES

> Her most serious conquest, the ninety-year-old Enlightenment celebrity Bernard de Fontenelle saw her seminude at her toilette by accident and sighed, “Ah Madame, if only I were eighty years old.”

About Madame Helvetius:

> She died of a chest cold in 1800, her longtime companion and backyard “philosopher” Cabanis beside her. At her deathbed he sobbed, “My dear mother!” To which she replied, “Yes, I am. I always will be.” Cabanis, like others, instinctively invested her with mythic dimensions.

On Mae West and Marilyn Monroe:

> Mae was nearly forty before she began her Hollywood career as a sexpot, four years older than the age-phobic Marilyn Monroe when she killed herself.

About Germaine:

> In classic oedipal fashion, she competed with and detested her mother, courting her father.
> “Of all the men in the world,” she wrote in her adolescent diary, “it is he I would have wished for a lover.”

On Grace Hartigan:

> She made one of the faux escapes so common to seductresses. At seventeen she married the first boy who read poetry to her and fled with him to California.

About Rachel Felix:

> she was a passion artist and man lover with a craving for novelty, rapture, and independence. “I am free,” she insisted, “and mean to remain free. I will have renters, but not owners.”

On enjoying food without exceeding;

> Nor did they indulge to excess. Contrary to Messalina-at-the-orgy stereotypes, the grandes amoureuses ate and drank (if at all) in moderation. Cruise and resort advertisements promote a pigout version of romantic dining, Neronian portions and entire bottles of champagne, more designed for Pickwickian syndrome than a hot tussle on a hotel floor.

On perfume beating “body hodor”:

> In scent, though, we’ve finally got it right. After a brief infatuation with body odors, we’re back to goddess basics.

About “La Belle Otero” parents:

> a lovely Gypsy mother and Greek aristocratic father, who died in a duel defending his wife’s honor. Honor in fact was her mother’s least virtue.

Ehehe should serve as an important lesson for men not to provide and white-knight for the wrong girl :).

CRITICISM

Seductress is a bomb of a book.
It opened a new world for me and made me realize that “alpha female” seducing strategy can work.

Also, I criticize great books far more than average ones.

So keep that in mind as you read these cons.

1. Confuses myth with science, and myth with effective strategies

The historical success stories aren’t backed with data and science, but by links to some old mythological figures.

She says:

> Seductresses, I theorize, pack such an erotic wallop because they plug into this ancient archetype embedded in the inherited unconscious of the race.

To me as a critical thinker, that makes little sense.
There is no correlation, causation, or valid explanation that links a seduction strategy’s success, with the pagan folklore of some small, pre-historic tribe.

The author seemed to believe that old myth of some isolated and random tribe found a way to change all of human nature:

> Memory traces of this ancient female cult could well be scored deep in the male libido.

I guess she meant “sTored”.
And:

> Their superiority in love, their absolute sway over men, is hardwired into the human DNA.

How exactly does myth become “hardwired”.
Well, the author first quotes “historians” who “speculate” that the cult of goddesses lasted 25.000 years, much longer than “patriarchy”-backed male gods.

And, based on that long cult of goddesses -which is actually not long at all in evolutionary temrs-, it got “embedded” into the male psyche.

How does that work?
She says:

> Inconceivable as this may sound, it makes perfect sense to mythologists. Archetypes, they say, never vanish from a culture but work stealthily and subversively beneath the surface, especially on the libido.

Yeah, “mythologists”.
Mythologists maybe know squat about how evolution actually works.
And this is not how species -minds included- evolve.

Furthermore, even if, even if minds evolved that way, I’m pretty sure that there were as many different myths of either male or female goddesses as there were tripes.

2. Rejects solid evolutionary psychology principles without providing any valid criticism

Says the author talking about the “Madonna-whore complex“:

> (…) the Madonna-whore fiction. This old chestnut won’t go away. Biobehaviorist Richard Wright still warns darkly that the dichotomy between the domestic angel and the quick-trick Jezebel is “rooted firmly in the male mind”.

But you can’t simply say the Madonna-whore doesn’t exist and ignore all the bountiful evidence, including real-world observation of common male experience, that it does exist.
Maybe you can say that some men are exceptions to the general rule, and with that, I’d totally agree.
But as a general tendency, the Madonna-whore dichotomy is very real, and the author only loses in credibility when she flatly denies it without real arguments.

3. Sometimes passes rumors for facts

The author writes of La Paive that “when she died of a stroke at sixty-five, Guido was so devastated that he bottled her body and stashed it in his closet, where his second wife discovered it bobbing around in a vat of alcohol.”

However, Wikipedia marks that story as “according to legend”.

4. Sometimes exaggerates -lies / mistakes ?- about facts or ages

The author says that Mae West was “on the verge of 70” when she became involved with an athletic dancer on her show.
But Wikipedia says Mae was 61. Still quite something considering he was 30 years her junior, but… Why lying about age? It makes people distrust the author as a reliable source.

One source was also, in my opinion, misquoted.
The author says that evolutionary psychologist Geoffrey F. Miller” believes men have always preferred magnificas over mere lookers with low waist-to-hip ratios”.
I’ve read quite a bit from Miller, and the above quote sounded like twisting Miller’s theses. Miller merely said that minds matter, a lot, and that seduction is a way of parading a functioning mind.

But he never said or implied that waist-to-hip ratio doesn't matter, and he never made any rank of what matters most.

5. Sometimes exaggerates or romanticizes about some women's achievements

Take this one as an example:

> Although most of Émilie's work has been lost, she wrote the definitive book on Newton during this time and a three-volume study of Leibniz that earned her an international reputation as one of the leading minds of her time.

The way I see, you don't become a leading mind of anything if all you're writing is about other people's lives and discoveries.
Leading minds advance into new territory, and do not waste time on other people's biographies.

I felt the same way several times when the authors discussed these women's achievements in philosophy.
I did agree with her that many of these women were pursuing their own interests and agenda, but I disagree that they achieved the same heights as the best men of their era.

6. Unscientific approach, conjectures, or random opinion from science writers passed as proven facts

Write Prioleau:

> As recent studies demonstrate, our female ancestors showed no innate preference for home, stasis, and monogamy but were "promiscuous appetitive roving diplomats," avidly carousing and glutting their inordinate orgasmic demands.
> Through comparison shopping and plural partners, they gained tangible benefits: more and better sperm, social leverage, and increased resources. With time, dominant males usurped this female advantage.

I couldn't find any recent study that "demonstrate" that women were promiscuous and then somehow turned monogamous -or that they were more so than men-.
I did find though an article using the author's exact keywords published in a newspaper by a "science writer".

Unluckily, the above quote shows a lack of understanding of not just evolutionary psychology, but of basic power dynamics that are the natural consequence of innate biological differences.
Anisogamy and the different levels of parental investment for men and women aren't up to debate, and they tell us that women, on average, have far less to gain in carousing and sleeping around as compared to men.

In another passage talking about some old statuette, the author says that "none of them approached the Darwinian 0.7 hip to waste ratio".

But how does she know that those old relics represented human-wide standards of beauty? For as far as she knows, they might have been examples of unattractive women. Or simply the preference of a single man.
And she adds:

> Prehistoric humankind never set any value on the dumb beautiful female ideal. Zombie babes wouldn't have excited them either.

That's baseless speculation.

7. Feminist agenda of female “superiority” tarnish the author’s credibility

Besides the old folklore that the author expects to have changed human nature, it also feels like the author’s feminist agenda of female superiority might get in the way of the dispassionate analysis that I prefer.

For example, says the author:

> To patriarchal dismay, women’s sexual plumbing wasn’t designed for monogamy and single-family dwellings. Sexier by a mile, they outorgasm, outlast, and outpleasure men and, left to their own devices, gallivant like their nearest cousins the bonobos, stud shopping and sating their eternal-climax machine.

This feels like a nonsense feminist drivel.
Humans are not fully monogamists, we know that.
But the gender that has the highest parental investment gains more from monogamy -and, in humans, that is the female-.

8. Sometimes animosity towards certain men perspires

For example:

> So when we swallow looksist propaganda and sink all our resources into beautification, we’re accommodating nervous half men who want to divert us from sexual empowerment.

I understand that it can be unnerving that men -or women, for that matter- might generally prefer certain features over others. And that judging disempowers the receiver. But lashing out against the judge is not the most effective answer.

9. Empowered... Or Failure?

We might argue that some of these examples of female empowerment actually failed at life.

Cleopatra for example was presented as the genius mastermind that controlled much of the ancient world.
Yet, she committed suicide in her 30’s, leaving her children at the mercy of her enemies.

Also read:

- Don’t believe the historical hype

10. Empowered or... Mentally Unstable?

Of Germaine:

> A disciple of the roiling boil school of love maintenance, she subjected this handsome lady-killer to a perpetual crisis of death threats, panegyrics, recriminations, and fourth-act scenes.

And when her husband left:

> She bombarded him with tragic letters, while simultaneously cultivating two other suitors who’d “fallen madly in love with her.”

That doesn’t seem to me like the type of woman that a mentally healthy, driven and high-quality man would keep around for long.

11. Empowered or... Childish Narcissist?

Some of these women seemed entitled narcissists, and in a rather childish way.

Take Rachel Felix for example:

> Rachel, a flagrant self-adorer, emblazoned an R on every surface, and stenciled RACHEL on the wall of a gold and white salon surmounted by panels of the nine muses.

I think the author would consider "Mama Gena", author of "Pussy: A Reclamation" a contemporary seductress.
To me, she seemed a lunatic narcissist. I would never consider a woman like that for a role in my life. BUT, that being said, that's not to say some men wouldn't. And Regena also found a rich man who was willing to marry her and support her.

12. Empowered or... Creepy?

Check out this seduction:

> Her stepson, Bertrand de Jouvenel, was so awed by the author of Chéri (the story of an older woman's seduction of a young man) that he trembled uncontrollably at their first meeting. Now, on the beach in Brittany, he trembled again as Colette sidled over and placed a practiced hand on his wet back. Later she cornered him in a stairwell and deflowered him, beginning an affair that lasted five years (…) he was 16

I'm going to admit it first:

If the individual taking action was a man, I wouldn't think it was that creepy.
BUT it's a fallacy to expect men and women should be held at the same standard. And the above would be creepy for a man… And it's even creepier for a woman.

14. Empowered or... Abusive, with pussies of husbands?

One of the issues I see with some of these seductresses is with the men they end up.

Just to be sure, not all of them were low-value or poor-quality men.
But some seemed to be.
Some were power-clueless men, who accepted abusive behavior from their women.
For example:

> Once the lovers jumped from a carriage on the way back from the theater and let Ephraim ride home alone; another time they bolted for a two-week "honeymoon" in Paris and abandoned him in a Liverpool jail to serve out Frank's unpaid debt.

"Ephraim" was Frank Leslie's husband, and he endured that as she brought her lover in the house.
I'm not a big fan of alpha male / beta male categories, but that sounds a lot like hyper-submissive, beta-male-type behavior.
Or, at the very least, with a near-zero power quotient and extremely clueless about power dynamics.

- Blames (lack of) female orgasms on civilization

The author says that orgasm was never a problem before civilization, the proof being in women's "souped-up" sexual anatomy.
I think that's an oversimplification.

PROS

Groundbreaking approach to female seduction.

REVIEW

“Seductresses” is a little gem of seduction and power dynamics.

There many items under the “criticism” list.

And they’re there because I believe they’re valid points.
But if you know this website, you also konw that I usually have more criticism for the great books, than for the average ones.
And that’s becuase great books and resources are like a golden cave. However, sometimes you need to filter and break the rocks to get the full gold.

This book might be that gold cave.

Why?

Because “Seductresses” analyzes some of the most and systematically overlooked “exceptions” to successful female seduction.
Women who weren’t beautiful, young, or feminine, and still had men chase them and do their bidding.

I agree with the author that these high-powered female exceptions are sometimes reviled, scoffed at, and generally downplayed and overlooked because of the sexual power dynamics at play.

What are the power dynamics at play?

Well, often, both men and women have a manipulative interest in ignoring or downplaying the “alpha” female strategy of seduction.
Namely, women resent the high-powered competition they cannot match, and most men resent the inability to match and pair up with the alpha female. Plus, most men generally gain when women are generally meeker and unassuming.
Also, generally, as a culture, society, and even species, people generally gain when the woman is a good stay-at-home mother. Something that the seductresses often were not.

However, the “alpha seductress” strategy does indeed offer a valid alternative for some women who have the skills, talents, and attitudes to pursue it.

How well and with whom it works was not explored in the book.

Mating in Captivity: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 22 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Mating in Captivity (2017) deals with the interconnection between intimacy and sexual dynamics in couples.
Esther Perel, the author, states that eroticism within couples teeters -or suffers- between two opposites: the need for security, which nudges us towards committed relationships, and the need for adventure and excitement, which is the bedrock of eroticism.

Key Ideas

- For some people, there is a paradox between wanting intimacy and closeness, but losing sexual attraction when they lose their separateness
- Sexual excitement and enjoyment require a minimum amount of selfishness and "ruthlessness"
- For a great erotic life in the relationship, we must accept the dark side which includes aggression, power dynamics, and attraction for others

SUMMARY

About The Author:
Esther Perel is a couple therapist, author, and speaker.
I haven't found much about her academic background, and what type of therapy she focuses on.

The Two Opposite Needs: Intimacy/Eros Paradox

> Love rests on two pillars: surrender, and autonomy. Our need for togetherness exists alongside our need for separateness. One does not exist without the other.

Now the problem is that with too much distance, there is no connection. But too much merging (can) harm sexual tension and attraction.
"Eroticism requires separateness", she says, and "eroticism thrives in the space between us and the other".

Perel says that "modern romance" tells us that it's possible to have both security, and excitement.
But the author seems skeptical on the issue.

A similar paradox takes place in long-term relationship, where the opposing needs are commitment and freedom.

The author says that these are not "problems to solve", but paradoxes to manage.

The Intimacy/Eroticism Paradox Only Applies to Some Individuals

Well, to be clear, she says that "for some of us, love and desire are inseparable, but for many more, emotional intimacy inhibits erotic expression".

For the latter group of people, what makes a great intimacy inhibits sexual desire.

Stop looking at a relationship to satisfy all your needs

Many people today look at relationships to get all their social needs met.
But that's the wrong approach, and besides your relationship, you should probably also have colleagues, friends, and various social circles based on your passions.

Sexual Excitement Requires Abandon – and some selfishness –

The author talks about a man who feels that intimacy means worrying and caring about his partner.

But, says the author, "sexual excitement requires the capacity not to worry, and the pursuit of pleasure demands a degree of selfishness".
Almost an ability to be ruthless, says the author later on.
Some people are so absorbed with the well-being of their partner, that they can't allow themselves that minimum requirement of selfishness.

The female partner of this man compounded the issue by dropping all her activities and seeking more one-ness and union.
When the couple followed the author's suggestion to create some more separateness, the couple grew stronger.

This is another paradox, to merge, while in total self-absorption to be inside another, and inside ourselves at the same time.

The Aggression Ingredient of Sexual Eroticism

When we generally mute our "darker" side of our personality, we lose out on eroticism:

> When we confuse assertion with aggression, neutralize otherness, adjust our longings, and reason away our hostility we assemble a calmness that is reassuring, but not very exciting.

The author instead recommends containing, and integrating our aggression rather than eradicating it.

She says:

> Aggression, as a human emotion, cannot be purged from human interactions. Especially not among those who love each other.
> Aggression is the shadow side of love. It's also an intrinsc component of sexuality and it can never be entirely excised from sexual relationships.

The author then goes on to present a few case studies of men who suffered from "doormat syndrome", such as, who were too submissive out of fear of showing any negative emotions.

The Feminist Challenge: Sexual Arousal Might Need Some (Male) Aggression

Sexual dynamics are politically incorrect.

The author says that arousal feeds on aggression, power imbalances, and domination.

American men and women, shaped by the egalitarian ethos of the feminist movement often find themselves challenged by these contradictions.

That's a challenge for some feminists -and some men- who fear that playing with power imbalances within a sexual relationship of two consensual adults risks overthrowing the respect that is essential to human relationships.

The author says that feminism and egalitarianism were a step forward, but that they brought some unintended consequences:

> I do believe that the emphasis on egalitarian and respectful sex purged of any expression of power, aggression, and transgression is antithetic to erotic desire for men and women alike.

I agree with that.

The author goes on to describe the case study of a successful career woman who struggled with her erotic turn-on of submitting to a dominant man.

The Male Challenge: Accepting Sexual Cravings for Submission With Dominatrix

For men who enjoy being sexually submissive, it's probably even more challenging.

She says of one of his clients:

> Marcus is a classic type-A man (…) The word "power" is attached to many of his activities (…), and in his free time, he likes a good spanking.
> With a sexually powerful woman, he gets a rest from having to be in control.
> Marcus fears surrender as much as he craves it (…) his fantasy permits a bounded passivity, a safe but masked return to the mother's arms.

However, the author says that the freedom to be submissive is the ultimate power expression:

> To my thinking, being able to play with roles goes some way towards indicating that you're no longer controlled by them

From my end, I would advise men who enjoy this to:

1. Keep it under wrap (don't say it to other people)
2. Avoid becoming dependent on one single dominatrix (the law supply/demand and dependency applies to this realm as well: the more options you have, the less needy and dependent you are to a specific individual)

Accepting Natural Flow, Letting Go of Efficiency

Perel says that the Western world prides itself on efficiency and hard work.

But eroticism is inefficient, it squanders time and resources, and “work doesn’t work, trying is always trying too hard, eroticism is an imaginary act and you can’t measure it”.

> We glorify efficiency and fail to recognize that the erotic space is a radiant interlude in which luxuriate indifferent to the demands of productivity.

I agree with this, and that’s why I was critical of what I had labeled as the “geek” approach to female orgasm by Tim Ferris.

Vulnerability And Dependency Are Required for Good Intimate Sex

The author takes on the “hook-up culture” of some campuses.

She says that it might not really be “genuine liberism” and open-mindedness, and wonders if the “hit and run sex” is a defense against sexual discomfort -getting drunk to have sex-, and a fear of vulnerability and dependence.

This chapter a bit more opinion-based, the case study is an interview with a friend’s daughter.
It’s interesting, but I wonder if the author has ever come across attachment styles, because she seems to be describing avoidant behavior.

Sadomaso & Dominance Can Be Overcompensation

> Darrol’s wife complains: he cannot even decide on a restaurant, and he wants to tie me up? What’s that about.

The author says that her patient’s difficulties in asserting himself are remediated in his domination fantasies.

Acknowledge “The Third” to Strengthen Relationships

“The Third” is anyone who is attractive outside the relationship.

Couples who live pretending they are not attracted to anyone else are often lying to their partner, or even lying to themselves.

For those who live in a fantasy without “thirds”, the admission of a third, even in fantasy, can be shocking.
As in the Stanley Kubrick movie, that the author references:

However, albeit this is a good example of “the third”, I feel that Kubrick’s example is neither the most realistic, nor the most common.
Rarely the simple sight of someone can be as powerful as Kidman describes.

The author says that knowing, or joking, about “the third”, or about attraction to others, is a way of “accepting the third”, which in turn weakens its power.

Says the author:

> When we validate one another’s freedom within the relationship we are less inclined to search it elsewhere. In this way, inviting the third goes contain its volatility, not to mention its appeal.

This is something I’ve often done with former partners, talking or joking about whom they find attractive. However, in my experience and contrary to what the author seems to suggest, some women who want commitment will not appreciate that talk about “the third”.

Physically Inviting The Third

This example was really good.

To many men, allowing a spouse sexual freedom means “being a cuck”.
Yet, to some men who don’t care, or who have higher priorities, it might not matter much what she does.

Or, as in the author’s example, it can be a way to keep an attractive partner.
And albeit that might show neediness and weakness, it’s not necessarily so, and it can be win-win as the man keeps staying with someone he likes.

QUOTES

> When intimacy collapses into fusion it’s not a lack of closeness, but too much closeness that inhibits desire

When demands for intimacy turn into coercion:

> Demands for intimacy when taken too far can resemble coercion.
> I see couples that demand admittance to their partner’s interiority, as if they are entitled to unrestricted access to the private thoughts of their loved ones.
> Intimacy becomes intrusion, rather than closeness.
> Intimacy with an injunction, “you have to listen to me”, “take care of me”, “tell me you love me”.

A funny skit, but also a reminder that good listeners -and maybe therapists- shouldn’t jump to conclusions in feeding people what we think they want to say:

> It makes me feel like… Like a slut, I ask her? No, I don’t think there is anything wrong with being a slut, I’ve been a slut for a long time, it just makes me feel less desirable.

On men grossed out by birth:

> I know it’s supposed to be this magical moment, the miracle of life and all of that, but no one seems to want to acknowledge that watching his wife give birth can be gross

On gay strategies for pick-up (might explain why so many gay men brag about “turning” heterosexual men: they’re being conned themselves):

> These days I only play straight when it helps get me laid. Luckily for me, so many gay men get off in turning a straight man that I get laid all the time.

CRITICISM

The book has some great concepts.

Yet, there is one major issue that permeates large chunks of the book:

Yet another cultural determinist, tabula-rasa feminist who ignores science and logic

Sometimes I almost feel bad being so direct and strong in my criticism.

Yet, I don’t know how else to put it.

It’s either I cushion it out of politeness and just so that nobody might think I’m confrontational or… I say it how I feel.

By now I've seen so much feminist-based and tabula rasa-based nonsense written by self-styled "experts" that I'm starting to feel isolated in this small minority camp that upholds proper logic and reason.

Just one quote as an example:

> Gender differences and their ensuing taboos and prohibition have long been viewed as categorical imperatives, biologically rooted, and therefore immutable.
> Feminism showed that these undisputed truisms and characterizations were in fact social constructions that reinforced a long-standing gender order that obviously favored men.

"Feminism showed"… ?

How's that supposed to provide any evidence?

The author fails to even note that there indeed are some important, proven, and even obvious biologically-rooted differences between men and women.
Does it mean that they are insurmountable, or that one gender is "inferior", or that any single individual can never be the exception?
Of course not!
But there are biological differences between genders.

Another staple of feminist obtusity, the author also negates -or fails to understand- the evolutionary basis of the Madonna-whore dichotomy, ascribing it instead to "patriarchal society".

And yet another one is when the author conflates the value/request/caring for fidelity as a "mainstay of patriarchal society".
Just for the record, fidelity is about ensuring paternity, something any sexually-reproducing animal who invests in his offspring cares about.

This is a huge bias that calls into question much of the book's theories and conclusions.
I highly recommend the bias section of this article on naive self-help:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

Weak on Evidence

There are plenty of therapists who have written books.

Some of them, have been enlightening. And some therapists did seek a more evidence-based approach either within their practice -see Shirley Glass– or within the existing literature -see Shawn Smith-.

Now, I believe that science is only one of three pillars of knowledge.
Still, if you wanna make claims as an authority, it's an important pillar. The author's references sometimes seemed weak to me.
There are no studies quoted, but there are plenty of references to "psychoanalyst Steven Mitchell", "motivational speaker Anthony Robbins", "Italian historian Francesco Alberoni", "Proust", and a host of other psychoanalysts.

It doesn't seem to cross the author's mind that what people say or think doesn't carry the same validity of scientific evidence.
She says that "feminism" proved the biological fallacies wrong. And she lists the "collective work of philosophers and clinicians" -Focault was one of them- to overturn our understanding of sexual fantasies.

The Evidence is Biased, Scientific Method Be Damned

Sometimes it feels like the author doesn't grasp some basic concepts of the scientific method.

For example, she says:

Breakdown of desire appears to be an intentional consequence of the creation of intimacy. I can think of many couples whose opening line in my was "we really love each other, we have a good relationship, we don't have sex".

So the author extrapolates that the problem is very prevalent.
However, she cannot draw any conclusion on her sample, because she only gets the couples who have that intimacy/sex issue, but rarely does she get the couples with both intimacy and good sex life.
So she lacks the ratio between the sample/issue group, and the whole population. In simpler words, her sample is highly biased (self-selection bias) and you can't draw population-level conclusions from it.

Very Freudian / psychoanalytic

While that's not necessarily a "con", Freud and the psychoanalytic approach tend to be un-scientific, so when it goes too far, you get into the realm of heavy speculation.

The author sometimes presents those speculations as facts.
For example, she says that "all desires to dominate or submit have their psychological roots in the fact that we were all once little children with big parents".

And when she seeks to go to the root causes of some patients' issues, her main tool for analysis and solution is also very Freudian-style: looking for childhood patterns, issues, and traumas.
She ascribes all sexual international tensions of her case studies to childhood, and she says that "it takes some psychological sniffing to spot them", but it never dawns on her that "psychological sniffing" might not uncover existing childhood issues, but completely make them up.
All too often psychoanalysis becomes an exercise in storytelling, connecting dubious dots that might otherwise be unconnected.

Is This Old Wisdom In New (Misleading) Packaging?

A good chunk of self-development content is new authors repackaging old wisdom.

I think what the author is talking about might not be a self-standing "new" concept, but a consequence of the player-relationship continuum, plus the attachment style personalities.

Such as:

It's the more player-like personalities, more often men, who experience the loss of attraction and eroticism within committed relationships.

And, with attachment styles, it's the avoidant personality that loses attraction and grows restless when intimacy increases.

The author might not so much describe a general model that applies to the whole population, but a valid model that applies to certain specific categories, as a consequence of their larger personalities.
And that's why the author herself, in spite of her biased sample, says that her paradox only applies to some individuals.

CONS

- Audiobook narration voice with an accent

The author narrates her own book, and her accent and voice might or might not be your thing.

- Bragging

I had a slight feel of “hear me out how smart I am” while listening to this book.

From the beginning, the author says that “she speaks 8 languages, some she learned at home, some school, some during her travel, and one or two due to love” (and in her bio on her Amazon and website, the languages became nine, and she is “fluent” in them).

In her practice, “she is called to use her multicultural proficiency, as well as her skills as a polyglot”.

To me, it felt unneded, and a bit of a social climb and status power move towards the (largely American) readers. Also, I must question the veracity of that proficiency. I haven’t met a single person who picks up languages just by traveling -unless she was into the “ultralearning challenge“-.

To learn how to brag without coming across as a braggart, read:

> How To Brag Without Bragging: The Covert Brag Technique

- A very “active” therapist

Reading the dialogues she quotes, Perel seems like a very talkative therapist.

Sometimes she debates blow by blow with her clients, adding or even feeding information to reach certain conclusions -with one client who sometimes strongly rejected her conclusions-, and even imposing her frame.

For example, she tells to a male client after she asked her wife if she is “open to other men flirting with her”:

> I’m not suggesting tit for tat here, but your wife is a very attractive woman. And if you can’t see that, why can’t she hear it from someone else.

That sounded rather strong, I don’t know how I’d have taken that if I were in the client’s shoes.

In another case, she mocks a client:

> I hope the irony isn’t lost on you (…) oh yes, I forgot, there is a double standard

The client might have been demanding a double standard, but isn’t the author herself who says that love is not about rationality?
It sounds a lot like she’s pushing moral judgments on her clients.

- Some left-wing, libertine opinion presented as “best approaches”

The author says of a customer that “she never saw her mother naked from when she was three, and never saw her father naked”.

She goes on to explain that we are socialized to keep our pleasure life secret is “part of our socialization”.

But to begin with, I don’t see anything wrong with not seeing your parents naked -as much as I don’t see anything wrong in not seeing my friends naked, so I don’t see why I should see my parents naked-.
And keeping your “pleasure life” secret isn’t just socialization, but pretty much what all societies do.

PROS

Some really deep insights, including the ones listed above.
Relevant to this website:

- S&M can be overcompensation, or felt as overcompensation if the male partner is perceived as low power
- The “let your partner free to sleep around” can be a good arrangement if one has other priorities or doesn’t care much about the sexual aspect

REVIEW

Mating in Captivity is an interesting book with the author’s personal take and opinions on relationships that I felt was too heavy on general speculation and too weak on empirical evidence -and generally lacking any scientific basis-.

First off, lemme list my personal biases:

I had a negative feeling listening to this author, and I created an image of her that was not very flattering. And that has probably affected my review.

Keeping that in mind, here’s a quick review:

Esther Perel is a popular “relationship expert” who’s been doing the rounds in various podcasts, talks, and YouTube interviews.

The limitations of this book are that the author seems to believe that the two genders are biologically equal, and that much of the book is based on observations on a biased sample, opinions, and little science.
Furthermore, the author might be describing larger personality types such as avoidant and “player-type” personalities, rather than the whole population, but the book doesn’t link the two together.

On the plus side, “Mating in Captivity” has some great and deep insights, including the various paradoxes of intimacy and, very relevant to this website, the “overcompensating” component that can be part -or perceived part- of sadomasochism.
Some of that can be eye-opening for many readers.
And I also personally learned something from Perel and will be quoting and referencing her again across this website.

Studies in Machiavellianism (Christie, 1970): High Mach Personality & Research (In-Depth Book Summary)

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Studies in Machiavellianism" (Christie and Geis, 1970) is the first book to empirically address, test, and explain, the personality trait of "Machiavellianism".
The authors first describe the iterations of tests that led to the MACH-IV, which is today the standard self-assessment tool of Machiavellianism; it then proceeds to review all the studies on Machiavellianism up until 1970, and it ends with an overview of the traits and characteristics of the Machiavellian personality.

Key Takeaways

- High Machs are more socially effective: win more, take more leadership roles and benefits, persuade more, and are persuaded less. But also manipulate more
- High Machs are "cooler" and more detached: high Machs don't become emotionally involved with others, with sensitive issues, with saving face in embarrassing situations, and have little defensive investment in their own self-image or their own beliefs (so they show no dissonance)
- Low Machs are less effective as social strategists in live interactions: being more personal and open makes them less effective as strategists in the course of interactions
- Low Machs might be better judges of individuals: low Machs are more sensitive to others as individual persons
- The difference between the two is highest when subjects interact face to face with others, when there is latitude for improvisation and the subject must initiate responses, and in situations in which affective involvement with details irrelevant to winning distracts low Mach

About The Authors

Richard Christie was a social psychologist at Columbia University, where he was also chairman of the Department of Social Psychology.

Florence L. Geis was also a social psychologist and active researcher.

Richard and Florence, in the mid-1960s, asked themselves if people who think, agree, and act in accordance with Machiavelli's advice could be grouped into a new and discrete "Machiavellian personality".
To answer that question, they developed a personality measure assessing a person's level of Machiavellianism. After a few iterations, they eventually finalized the MACH-IV test, a twenty-statement personality inventory. Their successive studies showed that yes, Machiavellianism is a personality trait, that it can be measured, and that predicts behavior and attitudes.
The MACH-IV test is now the standard self-assessment tool of Machiavellianism.

High Machs Resist Pressure, Confess Less, and Lie Better

Study: Exline et al., VISUAL INTERACTION IN RELATION TO MACHIAVELLIANISM AND AN UNETHICAL ACT, 1966

Summary:

> During a two-person experimental task the experimenter was called out of the room and a confederate implicated subjects in cheating; on the task.
> The high Machs put up greater resistance to cheating than lows, who in turn were easier to sway.
> After the task the experimenter interviewed the subjects, ostensibly to evaluate their problem-solving methods, grew suspicious, accused subjects of cheating, and demanded an explanation.
> High-Mach subjects looked the interrogator in the eye while denying cheating more than lows (though all subjects looked at the interrogator less than during an innocuous predicating interview) and confessed less often than lows. Highs lied more plausibly (as rated by independent judges) to the interrogator after the accusation.

Notes:

- High-Mach subjects were rated as appearing generally less anxious than low-Mach subjects
- The high Machs were more prone to use the direct glance to suggest that they had nothing to conceal (note: direct glances are an indicator of honesty, so the high Machs seemed to be using it on purpose to deceive)
- low Machs spoke more, almost as if they talked themselves into confession

High Machs Control the Interactions & Are Sought-After Partners

Study: Geis, The Con Game, 1966

Summary:

> The bargaining tactics recorded as subjects played the Con Game were analyzed for their relevance to five hypotheses intended as first steps in explaining how Machiavellians differ from non-Machiavellians in interpersonal tactics.
> High Machs appeared to size up the situation and then test the limits of how much they could get away with, > but not to the point of becoming obvious to others in a position to retaliate.

> The evidence for this hypothesis is equivocal, since it consists of strings of directional but not-quite-significant differences showing that high Machs did slightly but not significantly more of nearly everything recorded.
> It was proposed that high Machs must have an acute and opportunistic sense of timing in social situations. This sense of timing is probably not based on sensitivity to the other person, or his needs or wishes. It is more likely to be based on a sense of what is the logical next step— that will work— at that point in the social process.
> High Machs appeared to initiate and control the structure of bargaining interaction in the group. They were overwhelmingly the dominant, decisive, and sought-after member of the triad. This is the best supported of the five hypotheses. The relevant data represent diverse behaviors, and many were relatively direct measures of structure initiation and control.
> High Machs thrive especially when ambiguity obscures the claim of low Machs to fair play arid justice. The tactics they used to achieve the increased success, however, seemed to be flexible, opportunistic adaptations of the same kind of tactics they used in nonambiguous games. It is as if the high Machs took advantage of the general confusion produced by ambiguity to be slightly more Machiavellian than might have been astute when others had fewer distracting concerns.
> High Machs appeared unresponsive to personal or ethical concerns of others. Rather, they appeared to depersonalize the social interaction and approach it instead from a cognitive-probabilistic orientation. In contrast, lows appeared to personalize the situation and respond primarily from an emotional-ethical orientation.

Notes:

- When bargaining conditions were made ambiguous, the average difference in success between high and low-Mach bargainers approximately doubled
- Empirically the high Mach tactics worked, while lows, using the same tactics almost as often (1.77 VS 1.14 times breaking coalitions) didn't
  - High Machs who broke coalitions averaged 18 points per game than they'd have gotten otherwise, lows lost 28 points
- Great man theory of leadership (Borgatta, Couch, & Bales, 1954) . A consistent finding is that the leader talks to the followers and they to him, more than they talk to each other. It's what happened in the con game: both the low and middle Machs in the triad directed more of their bargaining to the high and more rarely turned to each other, they were more likely to accept the high's offers, and they kept more coalitions with the high
- High Machs more attractive partners? It is the contrast in attractiveness as a partner that is relevant to the structure-controlling hypothesis. In fact, "attractiveness as a partner" may be simply an alternative description of the fact of controlling the structure in the group.
- High Machs maneuvered into the most advantageous position by the end of the game more often than either of the other two groups of subjects.
- Highs tended to make more of the better offers: this is crucial in my opinion, as it shows that Machiavellians value partnerships
- High Machs acted powerful even when not powerful, and thus gained power: In the ambiguous games, when power cards were hidden, all subjects were less dominated by their own power positions, or relied less on them. High Machs disregarded power position altogether. High Machs demanded and accepted exactly as much in low power position— 51 points— as they did in middle or high power. They were apparently quite ready to disregard the official or external grounds for demands, and rely instead upon their ability to influence and control the social process
- High Machs ignored power positions even to accept low-ball offers, if it was good for them: High Machs expressed little concern for fairness or justice. They tended to make and accept more 50—50 offers than lows, regardless of their own power position, or their partner's (…) This could be interpreted as an expedient solution to the problem of getting into a coalition that one's partner would be unlikely to break. It certainly disregarded the individual worth of partners in terms of power positions.

- Low Machs "let reality get in the way" and acted lower power when they were low power: coalition agreements by low Machs clearly reflected their power positions. "in the ambiguous games social support for demands based on power position was not available. Nevertheless, the low Machs appeared to be striving for justice."
  Note: many negotiations tend to be at least somewhat ambiguous.
- High Machs kept their word when given explicitly, but broke it when it was implied: the low Mach kept the coalition as faithfully as the partner he had bound with a promise. In all seven recorded cases of a high Mach requiring a promise of his partner not to break a coalition, the high himself subsequently broke it. It appeared that low Machs were assuming an unspoken rule of reciprocity

And this is what high machs said in the post interviews:

> "I learned to make any coalition, however extravagant, at the start of the game— that gave me insurance of not getting stuck on bad dice rolls. However, I held onto my high coefficients [power cards] in anticipation of going on my own at the finish.

And another one:

> "Use your opponent's greed."

High Machs Outbargain Lows Even Harder When It's With Real Money

Study: Christie and Florence, THE TEN DOLLAR GAME, 1970

Summary:

> Seven triads of subjects, selected by Mach score, played a three-man, bargaining-coalition game. The stake was $10, to be divided between any two of the three players in any way they chose.
> The high Machs won overwhelmingly.
> No high failed to be a member of the winning coalition.
> Lows lost.
> The highs were even more successful at outbargaining lows in this game, when the stake was a tangible and sizable reward, than they were in deciding on the division of the points in the previous study.
> It was proposed that the real stake made the situation more serious. This would not affect the behavior of high Machs, but it would put lows at a greater disadvantage in bargaining.
> The bargaining observations collected in this study were also consistent with the tactics descriptions of the bargaining data from the previous study. Although these observations are not independent tests of the hypotheses, they do indicate that these subjects were consistent over the intervening six months in using the same kinds of tactics.
> Again, high Machs appeared to control the structure of interaction in the triad, and thereby the structure of the final distribution of money. Again, in contrast to low Machs, highs played impersonally and opportunistically

Notes:

- The results of the three studies together support the formulation that the difference between high and low Machs in obtaining rewards via manipulation will increase as the seriousness of the situation increases.
- High-Machs again control the structure of relationships in their groups: . 6 of the 7 opening statements were made by the high Mach. 5 of these 6 were direct, dollar-split offers. The 6th was good-natured, but not joking "Ok, who wants to make the first offer." The low Mach responded by making the high an offer. In one of the seven triads the middle Mach beat the high to the verbal draw with "How does it start?" This could be interpreted as a request for structure. The high Machs in the game, on the other hand, clearly did not look to others for structure. They provided it, without hesitation, and apparently unselfconsciously

High-Machs Collaborate More When Collaboration is Rational

Study: Christie, Gergen, Marlowe "THE PENNY-DOLLAR CAPER", 1970

Summary:

> A two-person, nonzero sum game, similar to the Prisoner's Dilemma but differing in that there was no dominant strategy, was devised. It was pretested with another player programmed for 80, 50, and 20% cooperative strategies.
> The exploitive (red) strategy was slightly favored (57% of the choices) across all programs whether or not the player expected to meet the other player after the game. There was no main effect for Machiavellianism although Ss classified as high Mach did become significantly more exploitive over trials.
> The experiment proper used the 80% cooperative program under no-meet conditions. Ten games were played for points.
> The payoff was then changed to either pennies or dollars a point.
> Although the introduction of money had no overall effect upon cooperative or exploitive choices, it did significantly affect the choice behavior of high and low Machs. High Machs became significantly more cooperative. It is argued that in this particular experiment, cooperative behavior was more rational.

Notes;

- High-Machs were less exploitative when cooperation was the best strategy: It was primarily the high Machs playing for dollars who were responsible for the overall Mach difference. High Machs playing for pennies tended ($p < .10$) to be less exploitive than their low-Mach counterparts but high Mach dollar players were much less exploitive than low-Mach dollar players
- High-Machs are not always more exploitative, but more rational: The results certainly do not lend credence to the notion that high Machs are more exploitive, whatever the objective situation. They tend to support the second of the two alternatives suggested, i.e., high Machs are more rational game players.
- High-Machs seemed to be using punishment to enforce collaboration: in an environment in which cooperation yielded better results, high-Machs seemed to want to retaliate against the opponent's cheating to get him back to play win-win again. One high Mach said as much, " I used this (black strategy) to start out to provide money for both of us without 'quarrel' and at the end to make a minor 'killing.'
- In this game, Machs were more win-win: "Comparing the difference in earnings between low Machs and their others and high Machs and their others indicates that the high Mach's others won significantly more (hypothetically, to be sure) than the low Machs' others"
- High Machs can be quicker to answer to aggression with aggression: "The "spiking" or retaliatory behavior displayed after the other player's defections on trials 13 and 18 is consistent with results found in two other games. Lake (1967) used the Hornstein and Deutsch products game (1967) and found that high Machs responded to aggressive behavior with counteraggression to a greater extent than lows."

High Machs Fell Prey of Counter-Aggression: When Anger Prevents Win-Win

This is an interesting off-shoot from the same chapter, but from a different experiment (a doctoral thesis):

- High Machs counter-aggression can lead to vicious cycles of lose-lose:
  Wahlin (Wahlin, W. S. "Machiavellianism and winning or losing mathematical games". Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Columbia University, 1967) Programmed B to start with a red choice.
  If A made a black choice, the program answered black and remained on black until the subject made a red choice.
  The program answered a red with a red sequence from one to three trials.
  If Player A made a black choice on the last of the red sequence, the program remained black until A went red again, which would trigger off a new sequence of reds.
  This program leads Player A to believe his unseen partner was punishing A for daring to play Red. The program was willing to lower his own gain for to thwart the subject. B could also be viewed forcing A back to black so that to maximize gains.
  18 low-Machs did not fight the program and won a mean of 188.9 points in the 24 trials. The 20 high Machs fought back and lost a mean of 38.8 points.
  This difference is significant at better than the .01 level and the only experiment in which high Machs did not do as well as, if not significantly better than, low Machs.

However, we can't be sure that high-Machs wouldn't have been more careful with money, instead of points, which is definitely a possibility.

This shows that, sometimes, it takes superior emotional control to break vicious spirals and get back to win-win, even in environments where win-win can be best for both.
I find that this situation often replicates in relationships, when one needs to have the courage to stop the quarrel and avert a vicious circle.

High Machs Focus on Winning While Lows Let Emotions Get In The Way

Study: Geis, Weinheimer, Berger, "PLAYING LEGISLATURE: COOL HEADS AND HOT ISSUES", 1970

Summary:

> This study was designed to test the hypothesis that one of the reasons high Machs win in bargaining is that low Machs invest emotional energy in personal value implications which arise in the bargaining context, and that these involvements distract them from undivided concentration on winning.
> In contrast, high Machs were expected to be detached from potential involvements or to control them for the purpose of devoting full attention to a cognitive analysis of the situation and strategies for winning.
> A bargaining game designed around legislative log rolling was adapted to minimize intrinsic distractions.
> 54 subjects participated.
> The hypothesis was tested by using trivial issues of consequence to none of the subjects in one game, and important issues on which all subjects privately held strong opinions in another.
> No difference in winning between Mach groups was expected in the trivial-issues game while low Machs would lose bargaining efficiency when dealing with issues they cared about.
> The results supported the hypothesis. High and low Machs did not differ significantly in the neutral issues game, but high Machs won in the emotional issues game.
> Low Machs lost to the highs by the greatest margin on issues they most strongly endorsed, not those they privately opposed.
> The results of the study, together with those of previous studies, clearly support the notion that one of the > significant advantages of high Machs in competitive bargaining with lows is that the lows become distracted by potentially ego-involving elements in the bargaining context, while high Machs remain detached from such concerns and concentrate on winning.

Notes:

- High Machs are not more skilled: The fact that the high Machs did not win in the neutral issues game indicates that, in this sample at least, high Machs were not simply better game players than lows.
- But they're more effective at using their skills because lows got "emotionally distracted": "This finding strongly supports the involvement—distraction rationale. It was proposed that low Machs are influenced by emotional involvements while highs are not, or control them more effectively."
- More "serious" situations might advantage High Machs: "It has been proposed in previous chapters that high Machs have an increasing advantage over lows in competitive bargaining as the situation becomes more serious." (…) Clearly, as situations become more serious, their potential for evoking distracting arousal also increases.

Low Machs Underestimate People's Machiavellianism (Naive)

Study: Geis and Levy, "THE EYE OF THE BEHOLDER", 1970

The Legislature study (previous entry) tested the rational versus emotional distractibility.
This study uses the same subjects to more directly investigate personal versus impersonal orientations.

Summary:

> The results of this research suggest that Machiavellianism is related to accuracy in perceiving others.
> After playing a semicompetitive bargaining game in a seven-man group for 2 hr, subjects were instructed to select one member of the group whom they thought they could size up most accurately, and fill in the Mach IV scale as they thought their target person had previously.
> High-Mach subjects saw others as more Machiavellian than lows saw them, and it was the highs who were accurate.
> Their estimates of their target's Machiavellianism came closer to their specific target person's Mach V score than lows' did, and the average of their estimates for their targets matched the actual average of their targets' scores on both Mach IV and Mach V.
> Although low Machs consistently underestimated their target's Machiavellianism, they did accurately describe high-Mach targets as more Machiavellian than low-Mach targets.
> High-Mach subjects made no such discrimination.
> In spite of this possible perceptual accuracy of the low Machs, they were less accurate than highs on most of the derivative measures.
> High Machs were most consistently superior to lows in detecting similarities and differences between their targets and themselves. While low Machs did no better than chance in guessing whether their target was higher or lower than themselves in Machiavellianism, misjudged how much or little he differed from themselves in Mach score, and assumed similarity indiscriminately, the high Machs were more accurate in each of these details.
> This suggested that low Machs see how a particular other differs from others in general, but are too personally involved to see how he differs from themselves.
> In contrast, highs see how others differ from themselves both in general and in particular, but pay little > attention to how a particular other differs from others in general.

Notes:

- There are ways of being accurate: through the general population, or through the individual: as Cronbach noted (Cronbach, 1955), one can be accurate by describing people in general and missing the individual's details, or be accurate for particular target individuals and by perceiving how one person differs from another
- High Machs more generally accurate, low Machs focus more on individual differences: The low-Mach judges did discriminate significantly when guessing for higher or lower in Machiavellianism (98 and 86 on average). High-Mach judges, on the other hand did not discriminate between high and low Mach target persons (109 and 107 on average)
- However, low Machs were not very individually accurate either as they assumed too much similarity: "They tended to attribute similarity to their targets indiscriminately. Consequently, they underestimated others' Machiavellianism (…) Consequently, they were less accurate for high- than low-Mach targets, and less accurate on the more discriminating items in the scale.
- Low Machs might be too emotionally involved for accurate individual assessment: "it is proposed that the low Mach sees where another is in his own right, but is too personally involved to see how the other differs from himself". ". In contrast, the high disregards individual differences between others, but is uncannily accurate in locating others in relation to himself, both in general and in particular."
- Same results when focusing only on most discriminating items on Mach-IV questionnaire: "The results are also consistent with Taft's (1955) conclusion that cold, unsympathetic people are more accurate judges of others in general"
- High Machs were over-chosen as targets for assessment: the authors speculate why this might be the case, and it might be because of their leadership qualities

High Machs Resist Pressure & Experience Little Dissonance, Lows the Opposite

Study: Bogart, Geis, Levy, Zimbardo "NO DISSONANCE FOR MACHIAVELLIANS", 1970

The high-dissonance condition in this experiment was designed to provide inadequate justification for cheating at the partner's prodding. From a strategic point of view, cheating might not have been the most rational choice.

The low-dissonance condition was designed to provide good (and more rational) justification for cheating.

Summary:

> The results of this study suggest that there are predictable individual differences in response to dissonance situations.
> The dissonant situation used was engaging in risky behavior — cheating in an experiment — at a team partner's suggestion. Justification for compliance was manipulated by varying the attractiveness of the partner.
> High-Mach subjects were more likely to refuse than cheat when justification was minimal, but they rarely failed to comply when given justification. Further, among those who did comply, cognitive change from before to after compliance was counter to dissonance theory predictions.
> Low Mach subjects complied with their partner's suggestion as often as highs, but regardless of the justification available. After complying, they changed their cognitions to support their behavior, as predicted by dissonance theory.
> These results were interpreted as reflecting high Machs' emotional detachment from others and their wishes, > and from the implications of their own behavior as well.

> It was proposed that attitude change for high Machs may be predicted more accurately by incentive theory.
> In contrast, low Machs' greater susceptibility to emotional involvement with others makes it more difficult for them to refuse the dissonance induction, and their greater emotional investment in maintaining a consistent self-image leads them to restore consistency after complying, as predicted by dissonance theory.

Notes:

- Highs didn't cheat more *overall: "The lack of differential cheating between high and low Machs clearly supports Exline's finding (see entry above), and equally clearly fails to support our own prediction that highs would cheat less than lows"
- High Machs cheated less when there was no good reason for cheating: see table below Probably they assessed the risks of cheating as too high
- High Machs cheated more when they had a good reason to cheat: see table below. Furthermore, of the 3 who refused, 2 had become suspicious of the experiment

Number of Subjects Who Complied (Cheated) and Refused to Comply, by Mach and Dissonance Condition

	High Machs			Low Machs
	Cheated	Refused to cheat	Total	Cheated	Refused to cheat	Total
High dissonance (low justification)	5	13	18	6	8	14
Low dissonance (high justification)	11	3	14	7	7	14
Total	16	16	32	13	15	28
	$\chi^2 = 6.22$, $p < .02$.			$\chi^2 < 1.00$, n.s.

Studies in Machiavellianism, Academic Press, 1970,

- Low Machs experienced dissonance and changed their beliefs: Low Machs who refused to cheat in the high-dissonance condition, like those who did cheat, changed their beliefs to support their behavior
- High Machs experienced no dissonance and didn't change their beliefs: High Machs did not change their beliefs to support their behavior, and this was true for cheaters and noncheaters alike, and in the high- as well as the low-dissonance condition. High Machs resisted getting into our dissonant situation, and the few who were enticed showed no dissonance reduction in the form of changing their beliefs to support their behavior
- High Machs decide for themselves, low Machs go along with others: "The one distinction that seems to account for both the compliance data and the attitude change data is that high Machs decide for themselves what they will or will not do, and then act on their decision, while low Machs can be distracted by personal or emotional involvements which can lead them into agreeing to something they did not decide to do. This distinction can be derived from the detached, cognitive orientation of high Machs, compared to the personal, emotional orientation of lows"

- Low Machs' choices aren't their choices: "We propose that low Machs comply by their own choice only in the technical sense of the word. In fact, they comply because the other wants them to.
- High Machs might be dissonance-resistant because they're pragmatic and with lower morals: When high Machs comply, they might separate his compliance from endorsement of the activity involved because, as Epstein suggested, high scores on the Mach scale imply pragmatism: telling people what they want to hear, not giving real reasons, etc. Since such principles imply assertions contrary to belief, she argued that high Machs should be able to make counterattitudinal statements without changing their private belief more easily than lows.
- "Our interpretation says the same thing in a different way: high Machs are more detached from the implications of their behavior; they can separate the content of a behavior from the reasons for engaging in it.
- High Machs might have more of an antifragile ego: High Machs claim they're less in control of their universe, and that might make them more ready to admit either failure, or their own inconsistency.
- "High Machs appear to be less upset at finding; that they have been conned, have acted foolishly, or made a mistake. Thus, they do not have to try to justify their foolish behavior by changing their cognitions to support it."
- Low Machs are more influenced by face-to-face pressure: "Lows cheated as often as highs in the initial study but less often in the replication. In the initial study the pressure to cheat came in a face-to-face situation in which personal involvement would presumably be greater for lows, while in the replication it came via written message. Second, the private decision situation which gave the high Machs time to decide to cheat gave the lows time to decide not to cheat."
  "In the initial study the partner's series of increasingly strong urgings presented a series of opportunities to give in to the impulse to go along with him. If the low Mach once made the decision not to cheat in the replication, he was safe. There was no repetition of inducements."

New refined hypothesis after this experiment:

> high Machs will cheat more with an increase in incentive, and less with an increase in risk; low Machs will cheat more when the inducement is made more personal and offered repeatedly, and less if there are conflicting personal inducements.

Three Ways High Machs Cope With Dissonance

All three depend upon their detachment from others and from their own behavior:

1. They can more easily refuse a request
2. They can comply with a request and separate the choice to comply from endorsement of the activity involved
3. If they do get caught, they can acknowledge it and maintain their initial position anyway ("pragmatists and doing what's expedient is OK" as per Exline's interpretation and/or/+ "detached from own behavior" as per Christie and Geis interpretation)

Dissonance Studies Might Over-Represent Low Machs (and measure low machs)

IMPLICATIONS FOR DISSONANCE RESEARCH:

> One way for a subject to avoid dissonance is to refuse to comply with the induction. Usually at least a few subjects are lost in dissonance experiments for this reason. The data in Table XIII-2 suggest that high-Mach subjects are more likely to be lost in the high- than the low-dissonance condition.

Leon Festinger, the psychologist who first studied dissonance, also contributed to this book.

High Machs Are Influenced by Rational, Pragmatic Arguments

Study: same as above

High Machs can be influenced to change behavior (the 2 cheating experiments above, and Epstein's study).

"This suggested that attitude change for high Machs may be predicted better by the Janis and Gilmore (1965) model of attitude change, which is essentially an incentive theory model.
(…)
"The more reason, incentive, or reward high Machs are given for changing, the more they change. With smaller incentives or greater costs they change less or in the opposite direction."

This is not to say that low Machs cannot be influenced to learn and change their beliefs for rational reasons, but the difference "seems to be that it is peculiarly they who can be induced to change for irrational reasons as well".

Low Machs Get Lost In Social & Emotional Dynamics ("Encountering")

Study: Durkin, ENCOUNTERING: WHAT LOW MACHS DO, 1970

This study sought to replicate a situation in which the low-Machs tendency to get emotionally involved with the people and the social dynamics they deal with might provide them with an advantage.
I found it to be the most theoretically and abstruse chapter of this wonderful book, and less clear, while also achieving less concrete results.

A definition of encountering:

> Encountering is a process by which we change through direct contact with one another. Encountering happens when we open up to one another, that is, when we lay aside the layers of cognitive insulation that usually isolate us within separate (although roughly equivalent) frames of reference.

Summary:

> Twenty-three two-boy two-girl tetrads were assembled and run in the four boy—girl pairs in counterbalanced fashion on the ball and spiral. The average Mach scale score for the tetrad was calculated and the tetrads split at the median.
> The skill level on the task was calculated by taking the average number of quarter turns reached by the ball before it fell off the spiral over the 80 trials each tetrad played. The subjects-by-subjects index of encountering was calculated by taking the difference of differences between the pair scores within each tetrad.
> It was hypothesized in this study that low-Mach groups performing on the ball and spiral would be open and get carried away in divergent dynamics through a noncognitive interaction process called encountering asserted to operate under mutual feedback control.
> In contrast, high-Mach groups would retain reciprocal cognitive control on the task, thus remaining convergent on their expected individual levels of performance.
> Low-Mach tetrads showed more encounter interaction than the highs, but no more skill than the highs.
> The encountering effect was strongest in those tetrads which were both low and homogeneous in Mach scale score. Encountering estimates were found to be statistically independent of skill estimates in the data.
> Empirical evidence was reviewed, indicating that cognitive group tasks are mediated by cognitive behavior control while relational action tasks operate under noncognitive mutual feedback control.
> The encountering concept has also helped to clarify such terms as empathy, spontaneity, treating others personally, and getting "mach'd."
> The basic messages of this research are: (a) low Machs are encounter prone > and high Machs are encounter blind; (b) interaction between individuals in the group system sense is noncognitive; and (c) encountering can be empirically measured and theoretically understood as a divergent, noncognitive, mutual feedback process.

Notes:

- High Machs choose cognitive processes over encountering: In situations where either encountering or cognitive exchanging can be utilized to guide the interaction process, high Machs characteristically choose cognitive control by which they converge on achieving individual task goals
- High Machs treat others as cognitive objects: these data support the hypothesis that lows treat others as persons in particular while highs treat others generally as cognitive objects.
- Feedback control VS cognitive control: Low Machs treat others personally through the mediation of feedback control. High Machs treat others impersonally through the mediation of cognitive control.
- Moving towards others makes lows more susceptible to influence: (lows) "they actually experience going in different directions, depending on where they must move to meet their targets. The similarity is real, not assumed, because they actually go themselves to where their targets are rather than sending out their cognitions to do the job of knowing analytically."
- Low Machs' engagement in encountering can impede task orientation: while lows gravitate toward encounter control in which they get carried away in the process of interaction.
- Low Machs did "blend" more with their partner: in this sense (the interaction score of the tetrad) is a measure of how personally the members of the tetrad respond to each other. Accordingly, this interaction score was expected to be larger for low Machs than for highs. This prediction was confirmed.

Overview of Research: Mach Traits

First off, the main question:

When does Machiavellianism provide an advantage?

1. Machiavellianism Wins The Day Under 3 Circumstances

Three situational elements seem to make the difference when it comes to low VS high Machs:

1. Face-to-face interaction: "The high Mach's advantage is specifically in interpersonal situations— in getting others to recognize his claims over those of competing low Machs. Low Machs lose by opening themselves emotionally to others, by taking others' needs and concerns as their own. Highs win by being politic. Although they are aware of what the other wants, they do not take his needs personally, but rather use them impersonally, for example, to strike a bargain to their own advantage
2. Latitude for improvisation: when there are several options to choose from. It indicates that the structure of the social interaction is open ended, not specifically predefined in terms of content or timing
3. Arousing irrelevant affect: the social, interpersonal, and emotional elements that "get in the way" of low Machs' performance

> In 13 of 14 instances in which face-to-face contact, latitude for improvisation, and irrelevant affect were all judged present, the high Machs won more, were persuaded less, persuaded others more, or behaved as predicted significantly compared to low Machs.

And when the tree were not present, or only some were present, the high Machs didn't hold an advantage over low Machs anymore.

The three are conceptually different, but correlated.

"Face-to-face interaction tends to arouse affective involvement which may be irrelevant to the task outcome defined by the experimenter. Improvising a conversation or deciding what to do in an unstructured situation can have the same effect."

2. Cool Syndrome VS Soft Touch

The authors labeled the high Mach attitude "cool syndrome".

They say:

Not only do high Machs remain relatively unmoved by emotional involvement with others, they also appear equally unaffected by their own beliefs and even their own behavior.
When cognitive information is available, high Machs also tend to be unmoved by social pressure or the social consensus around them and focus more on the data.

Low Machs are soft touches. They are more likely to do or accept what another wants simply because he wants it. When it comes to encountering, "low Machs were called "soft touches" partly to reflect their susceptibility to social influence, discussed above, but also to convey the flavor of their style in dealing with others. The low Mach comes to direct contact with another by moving to where he is, and touches others softly in the sense that his contact with another does not violate the position or intentions of the other person."

These two different approaches mediate the difference of personal ethics and morals, as well as professed preferences relative to lying and cheating.
Say the authors:

> Low Machs, though opposed to dishonesty in principle, can be persuaded to cheat or lie given a strong, personal, and repeated inducement, especially in a face-to-face situation in which they have little time to reflect, but must act, either accepting the other's wishes or rejecting them; in these situations external "rational" justifications had little effect on their decisions. In contrast, high Machs, although not opposed to dishonesty in principle, will cheat less if the "rational" incentives are low or the costs (such as the probability of getting caught) are high.

3. High Machs Are Realistic (or Opportunistic)

Low Machs sometimes get lost in "how things ought to be", or "what's fair".

In contrast, again, high Machs concentrate on what is explicit, and how to exploit it.
They appear to aim at achieving the possible and adapt their tactics to the specific conditions of the situation at hand. This general orientation is usually called "opportunistic" by those who deplore it, and "realistic" by more admiring observers.

4. High Machs Are Concerned, But Just Not Emotionally Involved

This is an important note on the "cool syndrome":

> High Machs do not appear unconcerned. On the contrary, they often express more interest and concern than lows. The important difference is that the highs are not personally or emotionally involved in the concerns.

5. High Mach Can Be Fine-Tuned Manipulators

> was proposed (…) that high Machs are attuned to some psychological equivalent of the .05 probability level, that they know how to push the limits of the possible without breaking them. No evidence to date contradicts that proposition. High Machs adjust the amount of manipulation, and also change their strategy in more subtle > ways when the situation changes.

That the manipulation stops short of being overly obvious is crucial:

> One consequence of the high Machs' cool, cognitive, situation-specific strategy is that they never appear to be "obviously manipulating"— when being obvious would be a disadvantage. (In fact, lows are more apt to appear unreasonable.)
> A second consequence is that the highs generally end up with more than others of what everyone was vying for. The high Mach is the one who gets others to help him win in such a way that, in the process, they thank him for the opportunity.

6. High Machs Are Exploitative, Not (Necessarily) Vindictive

While Wrightsman and Cook (1965) found that high Machs scored higher on Siegel's (1956) scale of manifest hostility, the range of situations in which the authors observed them simply did not elicit evidence of it.

The authors' hunch is that they would be more likely to use hostility instrumentally, to achieve some desired goal.

Paradoxically, it's the low Machs who might be more punitive.
Say the authors:

> The highs' cognitive approach makes them exploitive but not punitive in contrast to the lows' greater interest injustice and reciprocity.

7. High Machs Might Be Better Leaders?

The authors also examined "real-life" situations in their classes.

They say that:

> Groups with their highest Mach member as leader did better on their projects than members did individually on course examinations, compared to the other groups' doing worse. Groups with high-Mach leaders somehow got whatever resources they possessed organized and applied to the group task more effectively than other groups.

8. High Machs Are Only Motivated When Something Concrete is At Stake

> High Machs appear to have greater ability to organize their own and others' resources to achieve task goals, but this ability is not elicited by demand or request, but only by situations that are intrinsically motivating.

Continue the authors:

> If there is no challenge for the high Machs, they tend to perform in a perfunctory manner without any great enthusiasm. Lows, on the other hand, regard it as a moral obligation to do their duty and presumably would make a serious effort to perform well.

9. High Machs Are Good at Making Others Want to Follow Them

Weighing in on failing to observe hostility from high Machs, the authors say:

> In general, they are adept at getting what they want from others without overt hostility

As we have noted in the studies above, people often go to the high Mach first and willingly.
Say the authors:

> High Machs take over the leadership in informal face-to-face groups. They initiate and control the structure of the group and thereby control the process and outcome.

The authors say it's not possible to say if high Machs are inherently more charismatic or because the lows are uncharismatic, socially inept, and naturally follow those who provide a structure and leadership.
However, the net result is the same: Machs get what they want without (open) hostility.

10. Top Schools Score Higher in Machiavellianism: Correlations With MACH-IV

Among the correlations:

- The elite medical schools had significantly higher-Mach students compared to non-elite schools ($p < .01$, two tailed).
- Urban dwellers score higher than people with a rural background (where people grew up made the difference rather than where they reside)
- Mach scores of children are not correlated to their parents
- There was no relationship between upward social mobility (the change from father's SES to respondent's SES) and Mach

Overall though, there is a striking lack of major relationships between Mach scores and many demographic variables.

Can You Learn to Be High-Mach?

The authors ask this question and say:

> Although we have no data, our hunch is that under certain circumstances a low Mach can learn to act like a high. Specifically, if the low can anticipate a precarious situation and can fix in his own mind, in advance and in privacy, those goals he is unwilling to relinquish, and prepare himself to assert and defend them under social pressure, he might be able to act as effectively on behalf of his own interests as a high Mach in the specific situation for which he has prepared for.

They stress again that this is pure speculation on their side.

More authors today have tried to sell books teaching people how to be more Machiavellian -or sociopathic-, including:

- The 48 Laws of Power
- The Good Psychopath Guide
- The Wisdom of Psychopaths

This same website might the best and most advanced resource for becoming more Machiavellian.

And now the opposite question:

Can A High Mach Become, Behave, or "Feel" Like a Low Mach?

The authors say the question is equally unanswerable.

> In spite of the considerable research attesting to the "cool" of the high Machs, we still have no evidence to > determine whether highs are insensitive to emotional involvements or whether they can simply disregard them at will in favor of more strategic considerations. The polygraph study (Oksenberg, 1964f) would seem to indicate that high and low Machs do not differ in the physiological responses represented by PGR records. On the other hand, the study of deception (Geis & Leventhal, 1966t) showed highs as unable to discriminate whether others were lying or not, while low Machs, observing the same performances, did discriminate, whether by "involvement," "empathy," "intuition," or some other means.

I believe it's possible to teach people who lack a "feel" to acquire that "feel", or at least to improve.
This is what this website also does.

Mach-IV Scale: Statistical & Academic Considerations

- Balancing Out Different Needs

The second chapter of the book is wholly dedicated to how the Mach scale was developed.

The authors say that they had to face a balancing act between keeping it short enough, eliminating response sets, and addressing social desirability, three elements that tend to decrease scale reliabilities.

However, they say, their goal wasn't about psychometric perfection, but to find out if the scales had any relevance to the respondent's behavior -which it did-.

- No correlations with other scales and constructs

Whenever a construct is developed, the first qiestion for researchers is:

Is this a legitimately new and discreet construct, or are we measuring something that already exists in the scientific literature?

For example, the concept of "Grit" by Angela Duckworth has been criticized as being "conscientiousness", and it took some time before "emotional intelligence" started being recognized as different than intellectual quotient (and the author believes that "power intelligence" eventually might be recognized as a discreet cognitive ability).

Christie and Florence found out that there was no correlation between IQ and Machiavellianism, little or insignificant correlation for political preferences, no correlation to race preferences.
Some question items correlated with some items in the F-scale by Adorno (authoritarian personality). The overlap is in items that indicate a general distrust of others.

- The experiments probably reflect reality

The authors spend some time discussing how and how much do the experiments reflect real-life scenarios and how and how much the Machiavellian traits observed in the experiments would replicate in real-life.

And they developed a model to predict behavior based on the Mach scale:

Studies in Machiavellianism, Academic Press, 1970,

MORE WISDOM

High Machs More In Touch With Dark Side

High Machs admit on written tests of being more hostile than low Machs but their behavior was not more hostile.

This might be because high Machs simply acknowledge their own dark side more than low Machs do.

Low Machs might be better at spotting lies

From an upublished manuscript:

> As predicted from the Eye of the Beholder (Chapter XII), low Machs were superior at discriminating truth from lies in others. The lows were accurate in 67% of all guesses, compared to 50% for highs ($t = 2.70$, $p < .005$).

The authors say that low did better because judges were given a moment to reflect, and the judgment measure itself did not require improvising.
Lows were not being emotionally impacted or distracted.

In the study, highs were not better deceivers, but they were more credible as truth tellers.

It's not about "communist" or "fascist", but about personality and maturity of the movement

Almond (1954) studied communists, and reached similar conclusions to the analysis of the elite in the Nazi Party in Germany, among Communists in both Russia and China, and the Kuomintang in China (Lerner, 1951; North, 1952; Schueller, 1951).

> When these movements were small, highly ideological, and revolutionary, their leadership was predominantly drawn from disaffected intelligentsia of middle-class background. As these movements became successful, the earlier leaders were gradually displaced by less ideologically oriented and more organizationally minded individuals, largely from lower-status backgrounds.

And that means that:

> it is a gross oversimplification to think of the Communist, Fascist, or for that matter, Democratic or Republican personality type. Almost every political or religious movement has its aggregate of impractical zealots and nonideological realists. The proportions of these in power positions apparently varies with the state of development of the movement.

Group dynamics are susceptible to manipulation and power dynamics

Say the authors:

> Frequently group members must agree or cooperate in order to realize any of the possible rewards. Such conflict of interest situations are usually resolved (and rewards allocated) by discussion, compromise, and conciliation— precisely the processes most likely susceptible to psychological pressure tactics.

High Machs Feel Low Machs Are Naive & Low Machs Think High Mach Are Deplorable

Say the authors:

> In general, both high and low Machs feel strongly about the positions they hold. It is not too great an oversimplification to say that high Machs feel that people who score low on the Mach tests are naive, not with it, and behave unrealistically in the real world. Low Machs, on the other hand, think agreement with Machiavelli reflects a deplorable lack of compassion and faith in others, and is immoral, if not inhuman.

Indeed, I find that one of the strongest signs of Machiavellianism is looking down at constructs such as empathy, or to defend the Machiavellian approach to life.

A New Generation Sees “The System” As a Con?

Write the authors:

> A generation is coming of age in America that doesn’t take the utterances of public figures straight, that doesn’t take social games straight. It suspects the whole range of modern experience. It sees giant con games everywhere. It sees “the system” itself as a con game (Brackman, 1967).

Well, looking at “no vax”, “Covid hoax” and all the complotists theories of today, it seems like that trend has continued :).

Low Machs Initiate Change, High Machs Take Advantage of It

The authors say that high Machs thrive in situations that are in flux but that, by their own very nature, they tend to take charge and impose order on chaos.

The authors then wonder how do low and high Machs differ in situations of chaos, change, and revolution.

This is speculation by the authors:

> Our suspicion is that revolutions are not initiated by high Machs but by a subset of low or middle Machs who are capable of great moral indignation at the failure of the existing system and who by virtue of their affective involvement with a potentially new order crystallize opposition to the existing one.
> Once the "revolution" has picked up enough steam to be a "movement," however, the situation changes.
> If the movement is loosely structured ("organizational chaos," as some observers have termed it), but nevertheless manages to disrupt the establishment to some extent, then high Machs might be attracted to either side to impose structure or take advantage of its absence to achieve other goals (e.g., positions of power or influence), regardless of the ideology being supported in the process.

Conservatives Are Cynic & Pro-System, Rebels Are Cynic & Against Systems, Machiavellians Are Cynic & Pro Themselves

Say the authors:

> Both a right-wing authoritarian, as measured by the F scale, and a nonideological high Mach are likely to agree that, "people are no damn good."
> (…) young members of the New Left also share this premise. Instead of moralistically blaming the person for not overcoming his inherent weakness as do high authoritarians or dispassionately taking advantage of others' failings, these young rebels blame society for corrupting others.
> Translating this into political terms, it would seem that high authoritarians are politically counterrevolutionaires, the New Left is revolutionary, and high Machs coolly play both ends against the middle.

It's Called "Machiavellianism" Because The Authors Are Low Machs Who Gave Due Credit

The title of this section is humorous, but not totally made up.

The authors were aware that "Machiavellianism" for a psychological construct was going to receive some flack and potentially bias people against it.

But they decided to stick to it nonetheless in spite of the pejorative connotations.

Calling it any other way, they say, would have been a Machiavellian tactic itself. Since most of the scale items as well as some of their research notions came from "The Prince" and "The Discourses", the only candid thing to do was to stick to the name "Machiavellianism".

QUOTES

Turns out, Machiavelli was a genius:

> His astuteness is emphasized by the fact that, in general, the items adopted directly from Machiavelli were more discriminating than those we had contrived.

On low Machs being lost among more Machiavellian players:

> They become so engrossed with the particular person or content they are dealing with that they get carried away and neglect to manipulate, implicitly assuming that fair play will prevail.

On low Machs being “weaker” in the facing of urging and pressure tactics:

> Cheating as a general principle is more counterattitudinal for low Machs than for highs. However, the lows can be induced to cheat if someone they are involved with really wants them to and keeps urging.

Commenting on manipulation without being too obvious:

> Perhaps high Machs have a built-in .05 level. Perhaps they push the limits, and their fellow man, just up to the point of becoming obvious, but not beyond. Perhaps a behavior frequency that would be significant by / test would also look significant to a fellow man. However, when manipulative intent is apparent to the victims, they may retaliate by refusing to be duped further, or by joining ranks against the would-be manipulator. Perhaps the successful manipulator is one who knows when to stop. He may test limits by pushing them, but know how not to break them.

In person, high Machs were more charming:

> High Machs can be charming immediately. Low Machs, telephoned to participate in an experiment or upon arriving at the laboratory, often appeared more reticent and less spontaneous than the highs.

On encountering opening lows up to being “mach’d”:

> Gradually the low discovers not only that he has been disadvantaged on the task, but also that the high is not reciprocating in the interaction as he has assumed. Once the situation has crystallized, there is little the low can do except grin and bear it or complain about the “unfairness” of the situation. The low gets “mach’d” by leaving himself open to an encounter which is unreciprocated.

On being mach’d as like hypnosis:

> A better analogy is that being “mach’d” is like being hypnotized. Under hypnotic control subjects feel aware of what is happening and free to do what they want. It is just that the suggestions of the hypnotist are so salient that it would be unthinkable to countermand them. The hypnotist defines “the way things are” and the subject goes along. Just so, high Machs orient cognitively to external task demands and proceed to initiate control over the interaction structure by defining the way things are. Lows, open to the personal presence of the highs and ready to follow along, fall into the highs’ structure and then emerge from the process forced to face up to the reality of the way things have become.

On the almost comical integrity-based insistence and frame control (in this case, “frame imposing” technique) of a low Mach:

> In another triad, the game ended with the high and low Mach dividing the money equally between them. After the session, as the subjects were leaving, the low Mach handed his winnings to the experimenter. The experimenter handed the money back, explaining that it was his to keep. The low protested that it was only an experiment, and that the money did not rightfully belong to him. The experimenter protested that it was not her money, that it came from a grant fund specifically allocated to provide the stake in the game. The low protested that he had agreed to participate in the experiment as a personal favor to the experimenter, and in the interests of advancing science, and he would not consider accepting pay for it. This bargaining contest with the experimenter was one of the few such encounters we’ve seen in which a low Mach clearly and forcefully won.

Non Machiavellians are naive at risk:

> Low Machs apparently assumed, incorrectly, that people in general are non-Machiavellian and can be trusted. This more idealistic image of their interpersonal environment would appear to be unrealistic.

Cognition-based behavior VS social and emotional-influenced behavior:

> High Machs act by what they know, low Machs by what they feel.

The authors say that some high Machs were leaders of radical groups, but the majority of high Machs despise inefficiency more than injustice (and I wonder if the radical ones were manipulating?):

> The vast majority of high Machs, however, appear to despise inefficiency more than deplore injustice.

CONS

- Some sentences might be a bit convoluted and the book might have been streamlined for ease and speed of reading.
- The author might have also ended up with a slightly rosier view of the Machiavellian personality.
  They say:

> Initially, our image of the high Mach was a negative one, associated with shadowy and unsavory manipulations. However, after watching subjects in laboratory experiments, we found ourselves having a perverse admiration for the high Machs' ability to outdo others in experimental situations. Their greater willingness to admit socially undesirable traits compared to low Machs hinted at a possibly greater insight into and honesty about themselves. We were probably also influenced by the fact that high Machs were easier to schedule for experiments, and were more likely to show up than low Machs.

But I can't hold it against them: they make a good point.
