REVIEW

“Machiavellian Studies” originated Machiavellianism a construct, and I consider myself indebted to the authors.

Strategic thinking and positive Machiavellianism are central for this website.
In good part, we help good men to operate more like good Machiavellians, and we teach Machiavellians how to acquire more of the “feel” of the more empathizing low Machs.

In a way, this website seeks to combine the best of both extremes of the Machiavellian scale.

For a modern update on the literature on Machiavellianism, also see “Machiavellianism: The Psychology of Manipulation“.

Studies in Machiavellianism: High Mach Traits (Christie)

"Studies in Machiavellianism" (Christie and Geis, 1970) is the first book to empirically address, test, and explain, the personality trait of "Machiavellianism".The authors first describe the iterations of tests that led to the MACH-IV, which is today the standard self-assessment tool of Machiavellianism; it then proceeds to review all the studies on Machiavellianism up until 1970, and it ends with an overview of the traits and characteristics of the Machiavellian personality.

Empowered Individualism: Why the Individual Must Come First

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Empowered individualism™ places identity, agency, and responsibility at the level of the individual, rather than the group.

While popular discourse frames people through collective identities—gender, race, nationality, ideology—psychology and power dynamics show that both individual empowerment and human progress emerge from individuals who prioritize self-directed goals and retain sovereignty over judgment and action.

This article outlines what empowered individualism is, how it differs from collectivist psychology, and why societies that treat the individual as the primary moral and decision-making unit outperform those that subordinate individuals to group identities.

TPM Framework: Empowered Individualism™
Empowered Individualism™ is a conceptual framework developed by Lucio Buffalmano for The Power Moves to describe an individual-first psychological orientation grounded in self-reliance, agency, and independent judgment. The framework integrates findings from psychology, evolutionary science, and power dynamics to explain why individual-centered identity and decision-making outperform collectivist models in modern societies.

Empowered individualists are "ubermensch" In Nietzche's philosophy, 'sigma males' in manosphere terminology (and 'alphas' when in groups), and eagles in TPM's parlance

Intro

> Empowered individualism is an orientation in which the individual is the primary unit of identity, agency, and responsibility, pursuing self-chosen goals while engaging with groups voluntarily rather than subordinating judgment or action to collective identities or social trends.

Empowered Individualism	Collectivist Psychology
Individual primacy and sovereignty	Group primacy
Independence and self-sufficiency	Dependence and interdependence
High agency, individual achievements first	High communion, harmony and group outcomes first
High perceived control & internal locus of control	Low perceived control & external locus of control; outcomes depend on group & leadership
Self-defined identity (personal values, choices, actions, and achievements)	Group-derived identity (group membership, role, and shared narratives)

Empowered Individualism	Collectivist Psychology
Self-generated self-esteem, based on competence and integrity	Group-based self-esteem, based on group acceptance, conformity, and group-achievements

Empowered individualism puts the individual before and above collective constructs such as groups, races, genders, nations, and ideologies.
In psychological terms, it's a personality trait related to high self-reliance.

There are three undercurrents to an individual-first approach:

1. Identify yourself as a distinct individual (salience of the self): considers yourself, and demand to be considered, as an individual rather than a member of a collective like nationality, gender, race, etc.
2. Focus on yourself (self-focus): prioritize yourself, your rights, your goals and, when appropriate, your self-interest
3. Look at others as individuals (others' self-salience): think and treat others as individuals first, rather than members of groups

Levels of individualism range on a spectrum between the poles of collectivism and individualism.

Collectivism: Psychology & Costs

Collectivism has weaker self-boundaries and psychologically aligns and merges closer with the groups of reference.

While there may be more empowering forms of collectivism, in its weaker form collectivists use the group to prop-up a weak sense of self.
The canonical psychological mechanisms of collectivism are:

- Ego fusion: the merging of self and group identity (Swann et al., 2012)
- Basking in reflected glory: associating with a successful other for social and mental gains (Cialdini et al., 1976)
- Collective narcissism: an inflated belief in the greatness of one's in-group, combined with resentment that others fail to recognize it. Leads to defensiveness and anger when the group is criticized (de Zavala, 2018)

External locus of control (Rotter, 1966) and low sense of perceived control (Skinner, 1996) are the psychological consequences of collectivism.

This article lists tactical-level examples of collectivist psychology to show how the same mechanism plays out in different areas of life.

Benefits of Individualism

Empowered Individualists enjoy better mental health and power, including higher self-esteem, sense of well-being, sense of control, and general positive affect.

Being less needy and dependent also neutralizes known hooks for emotional manipulation, while individual accountability shields you against collective shame, guilt, and disempowering (ie.: 'humans are earth's cancer', 'men are oppressors', 'women/minorities have been oppressed', etc.).

Belief in their personal power also leads to more action, with higher odds of success.

8 Principles of Empowered Individualism

1. It's Me, First, Before & Above Any Group

The core of empowered individualism is self-primacy, defining oneself based on self-originated values, actions, and achievements.

Individualists may love the various groups they're part of, but their group belonging is not their primary identification.
Within groups, the individualist remains an individual first, constantly monitors the group dynamics, and always maintains the freedom to exit it.

1.2. I Choose What's Best For Me, Without Falling Prey to Social Pressure & Expectation

Empowered individualists live by the motto of 'I do me', choosing to pursue what they want and like.

It's perfectly fine to follow a rich society's beaten path, but the empowered individualist only chooses that path IF it fits him, not out of pressure or fear.
Given that the odds that a beaten path is a perfect fit and the chances of trade-off are higher, many individualists end up with a more unique lifestyle.

A man is 100% free if he chooses to follow society's common path. But an empowered individualist only does so if that's what he wants for himself.

⍰ Failure of The Law: Group Leaders Representing You

Collectivist psychology considers the group leader as a representative for themselves.
Example:

The empowered individualist believes that only he can represent himself.

2. I'm A Human, And No Other Human Is Above Me

You're as worthy as a human being as anyone else.

Someone else may be more competent or more predisposed towards certain activities. But that has a little to do with overall competence, and nothing to do with worthiness as a human being.

2.2. Mindset: If Someone Can, So Can I

Whatever great things someone else achieved, you can also do the same.
Steve Jobs echoed this same belief when he said this:

> Life can be much broader once you discover one simple fact: Everything around you that you call life was made up by people that were no smarter than you. And you can change it, you can influence it… Once you learn that, you'll never be the same again.
> Steve Jobs

Of course, record-breaking feats may require a lifetime of effort, and genetics and luck matter. But you could have done the same with the same conditions.
And at the higher level, you can have the same positive impact in your field of choice.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's Mindset: the real test of a good life is not what you were born with, but what you do with it.

⍰ Failure of The Law: “Can you imagine flying a plane”?

A former boss had this trying question:

Would you rather fly a plane by yourself with 3 days to learn, or full of people with one week to learn?

His attitude framed both options as terrible, as if flying a plane were an impossible feat.
Me, I felt that flying a plane must be relatively easy. And if those pilots can, so can I.

And, I didn’t land a plane (yet), but flying is easier than driving a stick shift car:

2.3. Homo sum, nihil humani a me alienum puto: You’re part of all human greatness

This Latin motto stuck with me since I first read it as a kid, and it means:

> I’m a human, and nothing concerning humans can be alien to me

It means that as a human, you are automatically part of all human magnificence, everything that the species has done and will ever do.
While that may also mean you’re also part of the worst of humanity, this is where empowered individualism takes over: YOU decide what to embody.

3. Only My Individual Achievements & Contributions Earn Self-Respect & Honor

Any pride for group-level achievement is secondary and contingent on your contributions.

And while you may be proud of groups you joined with your effort, you cannot be proud of groups you didn’t choose or earn (ie, being hetero/gay, white/black).

⍰ Failure of The Law: Appropriating The Group’s Achievement as Your Own

Over-nationalists waste their time promoting and defending their countries, while others promote or defend their gender. Worse yet, many attack other groups to feel better about themselves.

Example:

He rejoiced that a man beat a woman because he projected his identity onto the collective of men. Besides the poor sportsmanship, it shows possible signs of vulnerable narcissism and hypersensitivity to threats (ie, being 'beaten' by a woman).

Ego projections undermine self-development
Paradoxically, the better the group performs, the more the collectivist loses any reason for individual self-development, in a vicious circle of ever-decreasing under-achievement

3.3. Honorable Spin: Make Groups Proud With Your Contribution, Not The Other Way Around

Anything the group has done and you haven't contributed to becomes your stretch goal to measure up to.

While weak collectivists bask in reflected glory, empowered agentic men focus on providing glory to the group. Ultimately though, empowered individualists have a lower sense of obligation towards specific groups, and more of a drive for contribution in general, seeking to advance humanity and civilization.

⍰⍰♂ Failure of The Law: The "Family Shame"

While an acquaintance of mine proudly shared that his father's team was awarded a Nobel prize, another one felt ashamed for his humble family.

To an empowered individualist, a successful father says nothing unless you replicate that success. And humble beginnings only boost your achievements for having overcome the gap.

4. The Less I Control It, The Less It Represents Me

The more you influence the group, the more it can represent you. And the other way around. Ultimately, individualists put the self first because that's where they control the most.

⍰Failure of The Law: Sports Fans

Some supporters and ultras feel and expect 'their team' to represent them and 'do them honor', while having no control over the team's performance.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio's note: I speak from experience.
I used to get hyped up for "my team" or "my guy" winning, and distraught when they'd lose. I'm glad I largely outgrew that.

4.2. I Put My Interests Before Random People's

Only invest in people with whom you have significant interests, or a two-way street relationship.

⍰Failure of The Law: Fandom

Many celebrated DiCaprio's Oscar win as if they had won one.

It's unlikely to advance in life if you focus on other people's achievements, rather than your own

5. I Put Myself & My Time Above Any Object

Inanimate objects are only valuable as long as they add concrete value.
Yourself—and your time—are always immensely more valuable.

⍰ Failure of The Law: Wasting Time to Own Status Symbols

> When you feel defined by a brand, it's the brand that owns you

Queueing for ‘luxury’ or ‘popular’ signals that impressing others is more important than living your life

The need to own any object lowers you below the object.
So never:

- ✕ Collect things
- ✕ Overpay for memorabilia or art
- ✕ Queue up for a popular restaurant or shop

Remember: you are bigger than any thing.

6. I Put Myself Above Man-Made Institutions

People build institutions, and since nobody is above you, no institution is above you, either.

The judgment criteria of people taking decisions in those institutions isn’t inherently more valuable than yours, so you shall not chase their approval to join their ranks.

People chasing big-name universities or employers are giving power away to both those institutions.

6.2. Respect For Religious Institutions, But Not Subordination

Empowered individualists tend to have a more direct, power-positive relationship with God.

Moby Dick's symbolism can be seen as the (individual) empowerment against the disempowering Middle-Age representation of an over-controlling God.

6.3. Respect For Familial Institutions, But Not Subordination

Some cultures pressure children to serve their parents and household. Empowered individualists reject the psychological coercion and subordination.

7. It's Me & My Decision-Making Above Any Values or Laws

Empowered individuals trust themselves to make the right call depending on the situation.

Written values or 'laws' disempower you because they become rigid external impositions, dictating your behavior from outside the situation.
But in a complex and fluid world, values must originate from your situational self. Calibration is what makes you effective, and self-trust is what makes you confident.

Set a higher-level, honorable north star, like 'being a value-adding man', and trust yourself to adapt contextually.

No written values = higher integrity
Men who fall short of their values lose integrity because they'll make excuses for themselves.
By contrast, non-rule-bound Machiavellians experience little dissonance (Christie and Geis, 1970). You can get the same benefit, while also being honorable.

7.2. I Value My Judging Criteria Before External and Social Criteria

The more empowered, honorable, and experienced you become, the more you want to trust your judgment.
This also protects you against undue influence from authority and 'judge figures'.

7.3. Whenever Possible, I Judge Others As Individuals

It's mostly inexperienced men who judge others based on nationality or ethnicity. When it comes to people, the more experience you gain, the more you look at individuals.

?♂Lucio's Take: Judge characters, beware those who seek respect through titles

Lucio: If rank and character don't match, the judgment of the man always takes precedence.

And introducing oneself through titles is often a red flag of entitlement, and possible smokescreen over substance.

8. My Outcomes Depend On Me. I Can Succeed independently of My Group, Country, or Social Trends

The empowered individualist thinks 'my life, my responsibility', and rather than focusing on trends and groups, he focuses on how to achieve his goals.

Failure of The Law: Going Down With The (Social) Ship

Michael Franzese says in an interview:

> Michael: I have a pessimistic view of where America is heading. I fear for my kids how America is going to look like
> Tyrus: Unfortunately I agree with you. It's already over. China won.

Both men turn pessimistic because they focus on group-level trends.

Even intelligent and self-development-focused guys can fall for this mindset.
For example, Charisma on Command founders say:

> Charlie: (talking about China's future troubles) We're gonna be OK in America, it's just not their century

Besides external and low sense of control, this leads to a scarcity mindset.
As Robert Sapolsky says, "It's problematic when non–zero sum games are viewed as zero-sum", because you can turn win-win into lose-lose.

If the same approach was applied to individuals, you'd think this was weak, or unnecessarily mean (ie.: imagine if Charlie said Charisma on Command does well if The Power Moves doesn't).
But extrapolate the same exact mentality to groups, and many miss how disempowering it can be.

Individualism vs. Collectivism In Human Progress

Groups are not bad per se.
Collective effort multiplies output beyond anything any individual could achieve. Cooperation built and keeps building our civilization.

Even mild forms of group competitions provide extra motivation to innovate and move humanity forward.

However, getting the positives without the negatives is a question of balance and individual empowerment.

Quoting from the Routledge handbook on persuasion:

> identification (with groups), by enabling us to communicate, organize, and decrease division, can be a worthwhile goal. However, we must be moderate in promoting it, because too much identification can be "too much of a good thing" (Seiter, 1998).

And Colquhoun in The Cambridge Handbook of Evolutionary Perspectives explains why it quickly becomes 'too much':

> altruism within the group (…) simultaneously promote selfishness between groups.
> Bowles (2009) looked at archaeological data (…) and concluded that between-group competition led to a large increase in mortality rates.
> (it) really raises the question: Altruism toward whom?
> From this perspective, suicide bombers may be thought of as altruists to the cause of their group by other group members, but to non-group members they are anything but.

1. Effective Cooperation In Larger Societies Requires Individualism

Psychologist Joseph Henrich explains that Western individualist societies cooperate better because they're more pro-social, trusting, and cooperative with strangers.

Cooperation with strangers is a necessary prerequisite for cooperation among larger groups.
Contrary to what many may think, these more collaborative modern societies are based on individualism.
Individualists adopt an 'impersonal prosociality' that rises above tribalism, values strangers, and cooperates on a large scale.

By contrast, strong small-group identification fosters within-tribe bonds at the detriment of larger cooperation.

Hence, it seems that cooperation is most effective with empowered individualists.
On the other hand, it's very possible that tribalistic collectivism is a threat to human advancement.

2. Groups of Collectivists Amplify Conflict & Exact Heavy Cost On Humanity

Large-scale group animosity and conflict, including large-scale atrocities, all emerge from individuals suspending personal power and judgment in favor of collective identity.

One of the most powerful and universal human tendencies is to identify with a group of people, and to square off against rival groups (Baumeister, 1997).

In-group/out-group dynamics and social dominance theory are the psychological mechanisms that underpin these 'hostile tribal tendencies' (Tajfel & Turner, 1979; Sidanius & Pratto, 1999).

Groups also tend to amplify individual-level conflict.
The discontinuity effect suggests that groups are more competitive, antagonistic, and exploitive towards each other than individuals are towards other individuals (Wildschut et al., 2003).
Even individuals tend to be more antagonistic towards groups (Hoyle, 1989).

The Modern Costs of Intergroup Hostility

It's true that we've come a long way from tribes but, in many ways, modern nations first and geopolitical blocks more recently still mimic these dynamics.

Inter-group hostility still absorbs an inordinate amount of effort, money, and lives. The opportunity loss of focusing on individual well-being is immense.
This is how much budget goes into the war apparatus:

Imagine what humanity could do if we could decrease antagonistic in-group vs out-group dynamics, and channel it into research and human progress

Healthy 'Group Pride' May Not Be The Solution

The argument of 'loving one's group while having nothing against others' may sound compelling, but may be simplistic.

For example, Baumeister says that 'racial pride and feelings of superiority seem to go with violence toward others'.

Decreasing animosity towards one group may also only displace antagonism towards some other group.
For example a survey of American sentiment shows that as disapproval of interracial marriages decreased, the disapproval of cross-political marriages increased:

Chart by Kevin Drum

Empowered individualism may be the only solution.

Groups Unleash The Worst From People & Enable Idealistic Evil

Crowds allow people to lose their sense of personal responsibility and externalize their darkest drives, while feeling immune to any repercussions (see 'dendividuation' Zimbardo, 1969 and 'diffusion of responsibility', Darley & Latane, 1968).

Studies show that the larger the group, the larger the de-individuation and the consequent out-of-control violence (Mullen, 1986).

The largest genocides in human history are also based on group dynamics that promote extremist leaders, and then support their ideals with little pushback, a phenomenon Baumeister calls 'idealistic evil'.

It's telling that only one man refused. A good representation of empowered individualism

Whether these leaders are putting on a persona or truly embodying their ideals their is a moot point.
What's safe to say though is that groups facilitate 'moral disengagement' (Bandura, 1999).

The neat solution, once again, seems to be empowered individualism.
Prentice-Dunn and Rogers (1982) found that to decrease deindividuation you must increase a person's private self-awareness.
Such as: move the focus from groups, to individuals.

⍰ Empowered Individualism: Hugh Thompson Against Evil Ingroup

Hugh Thompson intervened to stop the massacre of Vietnamese civilians, the outgroup, at the hands of the US army, his ingroup.

He paid a heavy price.
While the officers responsible for the massacre were acquitted or pardoned, Thomson was ostracized. One senator wanted him court-martialed, and he received death threats and dead and mutilated animals on his porch.

Hugh Thomson turned against his own ingroup to uphold universal values of human dignity. Thomson is a true war hero, high-quality man, and a peak example of empowered and honorable individualism.

How Collectivism Disempowers Modern Men

Collectivist psychology is neither 'all bad', nor an evolutionary mistake.

We can hypothesize that it evolved for small, kin-based groups where individuals' survival and reproductive fitness were tightly intertwined with the group. In this context, collectivist psychology was adaptive.

But the context has changed.
There are virtually no small-tribe societies left. Large and more impersonal societies won.
Modern empowered individuals can roam the world, and individual success is delinked from any given group.

In this new reality, collective psychology underperforms because it loses its upsides while maintaining its downsides.
Empowered individualism is the winning move.

1. Leaders' Demand For Loyalty Undermines Individual & Social Interests

Many bosses expect loyalty.

Robert Jackall's found that most managers believe that it is fundamentally wrong to go against the boss.

And psychologist Baumeister says that whistle-blowers are rare and often condemned, even when there were good ethical and moral reasons to speak up.

These dynamics are designed to advantage the boss and, at most, the group. But can undermine the individual's interest and society at large.

At that point, you gotta ask yourself: what are you staying in the group for?

This quote resonates with many empowered individualists

2. Suppression & Distortion of Truth

Individual self-deception has limits (Kunda, Z. 1990), but groups are more effective at maintaining false narratives.

Sometimes the truth stays hidden even when most individuals know better, a phenomenon known as "spiral of silence".
It takes empowered men to bring the truth back into ideological groups.
Quoting from the Routledge Handbook:

> organizations and groups need members who will occasionally "rock the boat,""blow whistles," and "play devil's advocate" (Locke et al., 2001 ; Redding, 1985) (..) although such dissenters can be seen as troublemakers, they can also (…) promote innovation, creativity, and better decisions (Jetten & Hornsey, 2014)

The 'boat rockers' are empowered individualists with the courage to speak up.

3. A Toxic Crutch For Lost Individuals

Extremist groups provide a stronger sense of belonging and meaning that can be appealing to struggling men.

For example, Picciolini shares he was recruited in a neo-nazi movement as a struggling and directionless teenager.

The group also encouraged him to quit smoking, but only replaced drugs, with toxic belonging and ideology.

4. Social Status Preoccupation Enslaves You

Status hierarchies form fast and automatically, and it's almost impossible to be indifferent to one's status.
While status-seeking is not an issue and often good, it can force men to play a game they may have nothing to gain from playing.

Instead, empowered individualists prioritize power over status.
Say status researchers Cheng and Tracy:

> since status relies on others, concerns about maintaining one's status will orient status-holders outward (…) monitoring where they stand (…)
> As such, high-status parties (…) strive to fulfill others' expectations (Blader and Chen 2012; Ridgeway 1978, 1982) (…)
> status stands in stark contrast to the effects of power, which liberates people from social and normative pressures (Galinsky et al. 2008; Guinote 2007; Keltner et al. 2003).

The empowered individualist is that liberated man.

- Pursue power, not status

5. Groups Offer Leaders Easy Manipulation Hooks

Men may have an inherent drive to form groups, scan for threats, and defend the group (McDonald et al., 2012).

That's a potentially good thing.
But in modernity it can deliver a sucker's trade where the only winners are politicians, top-military brass, and arms' producers.

In the movie "Born on the Fourth of July" the military recruiter leverages appealing ideals to persuade idealistic men.

In these cases, some 'positive calculativeness' helps.
Albeit Mohammad Ali had his own issues with racial tribalism, he answered with positively cynic individualism to the draft:

Charismatic Leaders Co-Opt "Loyalty" For Own Power

Fascist and populist leaders also leverage in-group dynamics to gain power.
Psychology researcher Laslam noted that the "great man leadership" benefits the leader first and foremost, and we only need to look at history to see real-life examples.

Even in modern times we can see some of these dynamics. Says for example Trump in this speech to Boy Scouts:

> Trump: as the scout laws say, a scout is trustworthy and loyal. We could use some loyalty today
> Boy scouts: USA! USA! USA!

Empowered individualism immunizes men from these disempowering calls to blindly offer loyalty to the leader of the collective.

Individualism & Other Schools of Thought

Concepts overlapping or feeding into individualism include:

Enlightenment & Humanism

Says Pinker in "Enlightenment Now":

> Humanism, which privileges the well-being of individual men over the glory of the tribe, race, nation, or religion. It is individuals, not groups, who are sentient

Pinker describes humanism in opposition to green movements that subordinate men to the environment, or to animalists that see humans as "invaders".

Libertarianism

Libertarians put individuals' freedom first, sometimes in opposition to the state.
Good central governance is helpful to overcome tragedy of the commons, externalities, and cartels, but libertarians offer insightful takes on political power dynamics.

Capitalism

Capitalism encourages individualistic pursuit of success, turning individuals' selfish ambition to success into win-win.
Individualists tend to support capitalism while rejecting the forced collectivism of communism.

Meritocracy

Meritocracy goes hand-in-hand with the 'weak prosociality' of individualists, while tribal psychology supports kin and in-group instead of competence.

Even smart collectivists undermine psychology—see for example Madeleine Albright's famous quote of 'there is a special place in hell for women who don't help other women'.

As well as:

- Rationalism
- Conservatism, more focused on individual freedom and agency
- Pragmatism, with positive cynicism and power-intelligent value-accounting

Individualism is Not...

1. Antisociality, or rejection of pro-social contributions

We're a social species, sharing a common earth. Pro-social behavior to preserve shared resources is good and honorable behavior

2. Rejection of cooperation

There is power in cooperation.
Empowered individualism is about choosing, and being selective, of the people and groups to cooperate with.

3. Bashing or rejecting one's background

Empowered individualists are glad or at peace with their ethnicity, nationality, gender, or culture.
Shame or rejection of one's roots is not individualism; it's disempowering.

4. Refusing any "sense of belonging"

Empowered individualists can join any group and even be proud to be in them.
Research calls this 'in-group satisfaction', a healthier form of belonging:

> In-group satisfaction with collective narcissism partialled out can be interpreted as a confident, positive evaluation of the in-group, independent of external recognition and resilient to threats and criticism.

Contrary to projecting one's ego into the group, it's also higher self-esteem, more self-reliant, and more tolerant (win-win).

5. Rejection of love, friendship, or bonding

Relationships are important.
Individualists' self-sufficiency makes for stronger relationships based on choice, rather than neediness.

6. Suspending judgment groups and collectives

Individualism judges groups to the full extent allowed by the information available.

Individualists look at individuals first because, in humans, individual variance is often greater than the average differences between collectives.
But there can be more homogeneous and low-variance groups, cases where group-belonging offers important insights, and situations where only group-level information is available.

Policies can be based on group-level assessments
Policies that apply group-level insights to improve outcomes can be perfectly valid (ie.: curbing immigration from specific regions).

7. Bashing pro-social sacrifice: respect to them

Empowered individualists may choose to risk their lives for a cause. They just don't like being coerced or manipulated into it.

As Steven Pinker wrote:

> it is genuinely admirable for one individual to sacrifice his or her interests for those of many individuals. It's quite another thing when a person is forced to make the supreme sacrifice for the benefit of a charismatic leader, a square of cloth, or colors on a map. Nor is it sweet and right to clasp death in order to prevent a province from seceding, expand a sphere of influence, or carry out an irredentist crusade.

We agree. We encourage men to aspire for more than just serving themselves.
But to do so smartly, avoiding manipulation and serving good causes.

How to Be An Empowered Individualist

So, finally:

1. Destroy Your Heroes (Iconoclasm)

> Fawners pedestalize; winners humanize

You cannot be empowered as long as you think someone else is "above you".
You build the empowered you on the ashes of 'positive iconoclasm'.

If helpful, find faults in the people you love the most. Not to disrespect the, but to humanize them.
Then, move to a more mature stance of positive admiration or respect, but without worship.

⍰ Example: They're Great, But You May Be Better

Many men believed Tyson's hype and thought he was invincible. Holyfield instead looked at Tyson and thought "If he can do it, so can I". And he beat Tyson.

Similarly, when MBA players referred to Michael Jordan as "Black Jesus", the one kid who brought the fight to thought he was 'just Mike'.
Listen to him:

> Average players: We call him black Jesus
> Kobe: Black Jesus? WTF? I'm gonna call him Mike, and when I face him, we're gonna go at it (as equals)

All underdogs must be empowered individualists if they even want to hope to one day be champions.

2. Adopt ‘Healthy Narcissism’

Once you have no more human gods above you, it’s time to build yourself up.

Many psychologists agree that an optimum balance of narcissism is healthy (see for example Luyten, 2014; Campbell, 2020)

Read more:

- Narcissism as a power strategy
- Healthy narcissism

3. Adopt Positive Cynicism

Look at the material exchange and what’s in it for you.
Positive cynicism protects against groups’ and leaders’ manipulation.

From the movie example we saw before, seen from a cynical point of view.

- Enlightened Cynicism
- Enlightened Cooperator

4. Strive For More Self-Sufficiency

Being alone and content is the ultimate power move in life.
It even makes you incorruptible.

5. Experience The World, Different People & Groups

The more you move and experience, the less dependent and tied you are to a specific group.

You’ll also realize that beside superficial cultural differences, most people are similar and want the same things.
This realization dismantles in-group/out-group dynamics.

Also helpful:

- Positive relativism & nihilism: empires rise and fall, borders shift endlessly, and every conqueror is gone and forgotten. Use your life for better goals than fighting little tribes’ wars.

In this video I share how I acquired hits mindset:

- Explorer mode: becoming a global player ↗ (opens on YouTube)

6. Dispassionately Assess Leaders

Look at character and moral fiber, and never serve dishonorable leaders.

♂ Lucio’s tip: avoid influencer-complainers, ‘social analysts’, conspiracy theorists
Some manosphere groups (and feminist equivalent) congregate around social analyses that are pessimistic and disempowering. These complainers are collective-focused: useless for a smart individualist. Focus on yourself.

7. Focus On Yourself, Your Goals, Your Area of Maximum Impact

Focus solely on what you can control and what’s relevant to your life.
Cut social media, news, and anything that doesn’t affect you in real-life and that you cannot affect.

The more you do this, the more your area of influence grows, together with your power and your achievements.

Anything that's too far removed for you to affect or feel in real life is a waste of effort

Winner's Mindsets: 10 Commandments of Enlightened "Me First"

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

This is the manifesto of enlightened individualism.

The mindsets and attitudes of enlightened individualism are crucial aspects for personal development and self-empowerment.

These mindsets are central to being a high-value man/woman, an effective power-aware operator, and a man with high odds of achieving goals, freedom, and success.
The enlightened individualist is also the eagle we talk about on TPM, and the blue ocean fish who transcends the small ponds.

Definition

> Enlightened individualism is a borderless and timeless mindset and approach to life that focuses on the self, on individual goals and objective, and on the agency and power of individual humans

Enlightened individualism puts the individual before and above collectivist constructs such as groups, races, genders, nations, entities, and ideologies.
And especially so when the collectivist, supra-individual constructs turn disempowering, which, as we shall see, often do.

In psychological terms, we might define "enlightened individualism" as a personality trait because its mindsets and beliefs lead to predictable -and empowering- thought patterns, behaviors, life choices, and life paths.

There are three undercurrents to an individual-first approach:

1. Focus on yourself (self-focus): put yourself, your unalienable individual rights and, when appropriate, your self-interest, before groups and (collectivist) ideals. It includes zeroing in on your goals and objectives
2. Identify yourself as a distinct individual (salience of the self): considers yourself, and demand to be considered, as an individual first and foremost rather than a "member of a group/nationality/ethnicity/etc. etc."
3. Treat others as individuals (individual salience): approach and deal with others as individuals first, with their own unique character, traits, and preferences

10 Commandments

So, how does an enlightened individualist think?

This chapter shows you how.

1. I Am Worthy of Life, Love, All Human Rights & The Pursuit of Happiness & Success

This is the very basic.

And, it starts with self-love, self-acceptance, and self-respect.
It's the most foundational building block of personal power.

It's incredible how much self-flagellation and dangerous disempowering messages you'll avoid with just this simple basic.
And it's incredible how far this simple step alone can take you, including in standing up for your basic rights and adopting assertive communication.
For example:

- Self-love is the basic defense against guilt-tripping: only when you love and accept yourself you're truly protected against our society;s mentally disempowering guilt trips.
  Some of them are:
  - White men guilt-tripping: because, supposedly, you had some "advantage" you should be ashamed of
  - Men guilt-tripping: because, supposedly, men abused men during all of human history (?(
  - Meat-eater guilt-tripping: because you're bad for eating animals
- Self-love is the basis of assertiveness: only people who believe that they are worthy of basic consideration will field basic demands for basic respect
- Self-respect is the basis for social power and life success: only people with a basic sense of self-respect will take action to avoid being disempowered, manipulated, or disrespected.

Only people who respect and love themselves can succeed and advance in the world.

Power University's fundamental belief of "I am worthy of fair treatment and respectful communication" is based on basic self-love and self-respect.

2. It's Me, First, Before & Above Any Group

Enlightened individualists see themselves as individuals first and foremost.

They might love the various groups they're part of, but their group belonging but do not define them.
instead, the enlightened individualist self-defines himself based on his individual beliefs, values, and actions.

A cascade of empowering attitudes, beliefs and mindsets ensue from this core mindset, including:

1. Individual responsibility: I am responsible for what happens in my life
2. Individual accountability: I answer for myself, and never for others
3. Individual independence: whatever my race/country/gender does, it says nothing of me as an individual
4. Personal power: whatever my background or group belonging, I can transcend it
5. Personal agency: provided that I am a generally value-adding individual, I maintain independence from external pressures and coercion, free to pursue my will, interests, and values

Of course, external power dynamics and constraints can sometimes decrease personal agency.
And sometimes, it might be a strategic good choice to subserve or follow -for a while, at least-.
However, that takes nothing away from the mindset and approach. Even when the individual can't actualize his individual free will and power, the mindset still maintains the right to personal agency.

Failure of The Law: Slave Belonging

> Slave belonging is the subordination of the self to a group

The opposite of the enlightened approach, the subordination of the self to a group, is a form of "self-slavery". Slaves don't own themselves, and someone who puts the group before himself doesn't fully own himself either.

As we shall see, the enslavement of the self is not just bad for the individual, but can be instrumental for evil against other individuals as well ("idealistic evil", spiral of silences, etc. etc.).

2.2. I Put My Interests Before Groups

There is a danger of mis-reading this law.

To some, it might sound selfish and asshole-like.

To me, the opposite is true, because any pro-social act must be borne out of the ability and power to be selfish ("good asshole").

If not, you are just being prey of social coercion, social pressure, or leadership manipulation.
Or being a sheep.

Once you're capable of selfishness, comfortable with it, and not afraid of following through, then you can choose to serve whatever other bigger cause you choose to serve.
That's the crucial difference: the enlightened individualist chooses if, when, and what cause, group, or ideal to serve, rather than having someone else foist them upon him, or manipulate him into believing that he owes the group any sacrifice.

3. I Put My Interests Before Random People (no fandom)

This law might seem obvious on the surface.

Yet, most people don't even realize they're putting themselves last. In good part, it's because they confuse what "random people" really mean.

Random people are anyone with whom you don't have a significant, two-way street relationship based on emotional affection, or based on value-exchange.

When you follow this rule, you zero in on your lire and goals and your life, and you are infinitely more likely to achieve your goals, add value to the people around you, and enjoy a good life.
And the opposite is true, of course.

Let's see:

Failure of The Law: Celebrating Di Caprio's Oscar

I don't watch or follow who won what prize.
But I did find out when Di Caprio won an Oscar.

How?

Because "fans" went crazy when Di Capio "finally" had won an oscar. We can guess they also got personally disappointed and disturbed when he didn't win.
These fans are unlikely to succeed in life because they focus on other people's life, rather than their own.

A case of misplaced investment and emotional atachment?

No Fandom: Your focus Is On Yourself

This approach protects you against fandom and time-waste, and helps you stay focused on your goals, your life, your achievements, and your enjoyment.

Your life and your accomplishments are full-time jobs.
And it doesn't leave much free time to watch other people live their life.

At least, that's the mindset of the enlightened individualist.

Focus on the self includes:

- No watching sports: do sport yourself instead
  - Reading about "transfers" and "rumors": the fan equivalent of gossiping
- No gossiping: wasting time on other people's lives rather than yours
- No pedestalizing: including pics with celebs, which almost automatically puts you in the "less than" position

4. I Put Myself Above Any Man-Made Product

Enlightened individualists put the self before any product, object, or fetish.

Failing this law is the equivalent of “pedestalizing objects”.

When you “must” have a certain product or brand, you position yourself below that brand, and you send a disempowering message to the only brand that should matter: you.

The enlightened individualist looks beyond products’ hype, and goes to the source.
And he sees two man-made sources of fetishism:

1. the marketing/manipulation concocted by other men
2. the social dynamics leading to the over-evaluation of objects

And since the enlightened individualist believes that neither markets nor society are any better than he is, he doesn’t fall for it.
And especially so when the exchange is more about hype, than quality -think of athlete-endorsed sneakers that are made out of plastic-.

Note:

It doesn’t mean that the enlightened individualist doesn’t care about appearance or status, or that he’s “against brands”.
He probably loves some brands, and he uses some of them because he knows they have real social significance.
But he puts himself first, and sees products as (interchangeable) tools to achieve goals or increase his well-being.
They’re means to an end, and not ends in themselves.

And of course, he’d never stand in a queue, waiting to buy:

Failure of The Law: Wasting Own Time to Own Status Symbols

Queueing to buy “luxury” is the equivalent of saying “Impressing others and enriching smart marketers takes priority over my time and living my life”

4.2. I’m Above Objects = No Fetishism, No Memorabilia Collections

Craving possession beyond practical use is a form of fetishism.

Fetishism is defined on Wikipedia as “an object believed to have supernatural powers, or a human-made object that has power over others”.
Obviously, enlightened individuals aren’t too keen on giving things that much power.

Collecting things, memorabilia, or even art can be considered a form of fetishism.

When overdone, it gives way too much power and attention to things. Things that are usually inconsequential to your goals, life, or to simply living a good life.
So the enlightened individualist isn't big into collecting things.

Note:

This is not to say you can't enjoy things, products, or art.
As a matter of fact, you should enjoy them.
It simply means that you don't make owning and collecting things your life priority. Your priority is on yourself, and you're bigger than any object.

5. I Put Myself Above Man-Made Institutions

This same attitude applies to institutions.

Ivy League universities, big-name employers, Nobel prizes, Oscars… Much of their power comes from misplaced trust in what has become a brand, and taken life on its own.

The enlightened individualist looks beyond the facade though, and behind the facade of any institution, company, government, university, or award, there are other humans.
And, as humans, they are no better than he is.
As per group dynamics, the people behind the institutions are not above pettiness, personal biases, politics, and politically-driven choices.

People chasing the big-name university or employer are giving power away to both those institutions and to society's approval -just ask yourself: would they care to join Harvard if there were no other people living on earth (or if their Asian tiger parents wouldn't be so proud of them?) Probably not-.

So the enlightened individualist thinks: if they're not above bias and politics, and no better than I am… How can they properly assess me?
They can't.
And why should their judgment carry any major weight?
It doesn't.

This is not to say of course that awards, Harvard, or Goldman Sachs on your CV mean nothing: their effects are very real. And they do say something.
But the enlightened individualist adds a caveat: many other times, they say little. And they probably say nothing about what I truly value.

The enlightened individualists who put their own judging criteria first are not personally defined by the presence or absence of a big-name institution or award.
Because, remember:

> When you feel defined by a brand, you are owned by a brand

Failure of the Law: Housebroken In Golden Jail

I respect a guy with a big-name university, award, or employer.

But from my point of view, it's also the sign that he "plays it within the system". A system he hasn't shaped.
He's not a trailblazer, and he's not on a personal path to finding his own unique voice.
There is a reason why Nassim Taleb calls employees "housebroken dogs"

Still, if he's cool with the socially laid-out path, great!
But many are just following the mainstream path because of what others deem as "good".

Such as, he's following a path based on other people's criteria.

There are advantages to following what society deems as the "good" path: you do get recognition, you get a good job and a generally stable and "safe" life.
But the ubermensch usually aspires for more than "stable and safe".
And the disadvantages of "stable and safe" are huge. They include some loss of individualism, and some limitations on your personal freedom of action and expression.

After all, anyone who's been hired at big-name Google has to put up with Google's social determinism, and virtue signaling:

Supporting "women-led business" makes enlightened individualists shudder
Read more here, and keep on reading for one example of the "Nobel prize trap".

5.3. Do You Come Before Law & Commandments, Too? Yes, But Be Strategic About It

The legal and religious systems are also man-made systems.

So the enlightened individual feels that if law or commandments forbid or coerce a behavior to which he feels entitled to, then it's fair for him to break the law.
And especially so if the behavior doesn't really hurt anyone.

Funny enough for those who haven't yet grasped the concept, the enlightened individualist is still free to consider himself a law-abiding or religious person.
By putting his values, logic, and critical thinking first, he maintains the freedom to reject some specific, low-level rules, while still accepting the general validity of a legal system or of religious faith.

Of course, breaking the law can have some negative repercussions, so the enlightened individualist might strategically obey, or he might choose to operate in less risky but higher freedom legal grey areas.

If the enlightened individual is a believer, he might respect the church as an institution and respect some good pastors, but he ultimately puts his relationship to God above the church, which is a man-made institution.

Sharing Power With Creators

There are different ways of looking at God and religion:

1. Fear and crow as powerless creatures in front of an omnipotent God

2. Act in the name of God, based on either scriptures, or human-led churches
3. Feel empowered for having been created and/or for reuniting with a God (or feel empowered for God has no man above others)

Religious enlightened individualists see God more like love, than fear. So they're not in group one.

And they don't entertain the type of Gods who meddle in human affairs, playing with them like little muppets.

They believe instead that God empowered them to decide and act as they please, in freedom.
And see no contradiction or conflict between God and their own personal power. For example, Jordan Peterson says that Judeo-Christianity is based on individualism.
Jordan Peterson is a perfect example of a fierce individualist and deeply religious man,

Moby Dick's symbolism can be seen as the (individual) empowerment of man against nature, fate, or even vis-a-vis a God that no more dictates everything of men's life.

If they are creationists, they ascribe to the notion that even though God might have created humans, it also empowered them to choose.

Human Creators: Parents

Frictions between individual empowerment and creators can also exist between worldly creators: your parents.

Some cultures -and parents- oblige their children to do everything the parent says, to provide for them in old age, or even to finance them as soon as they hit working age (I've met several women who worked for their parents).

Don't let the blood ties fool you!

These cultures and parents' mindsets that "I have done you, and now you must serve me" is nothing short of an owner-serf dynamic.

Enlightened individualists might still respect and love parents with an owner attitude. They might even want to provide for them. But they sure as hell reject the obligation, as well as the servitude and subordination.

After conception, they're now their own individuals, with their inalienable power to chose and do as they please.
"I hope you can accept that", they tell their parents, with the tone you reserve for your best "take it or leave it" offers.

6. I'm A Human, And No Other Human Is Above Me

This law is deep.

And it has many ramifications for personal and mental empowerment.

Being "above" doesn't mean of course that nobody is better at something, more suited to do something, or more skilled at something.
Of course someone is more knowledgeable or skilled at something than you are -and thanks God-.

This law means that, as a whole, nobody is worth more as a human being and that you're as worthy as a human being as anyone else.

6.2. Homo sum, nihil humani a me alienum puto

This is a Latin sentence that stuck with me for its power ever since I was a kid.

Roughly translated, it means something like:

> I'm a human, and nothing concerning humans can be alien to me

You being a human, you are part of the human collective.
It's very equalitarian, but in a very empowering way.
It means that as a human, you are automatically part of all human magnificence, everything that the species has done and will ever do.

One might say that you're also part of the crappiest things humanity has done.
And in a way, it's true. You're all of it, and not bound by negativity and positivity. But you choose what to distance from, what to resonate with, what to embody, and what to do less of, and more of.
So why would you choose to vibe and perpetuate the negative?

Don't be like Eckardt Tolle.
He's a wonderful spiritual teacher, but he's disempowering the readers of his book "A New Earth" when he tells them they are bad because of the millions of people that other humans just like you have killed -"original sin", anyone?-.
That's human-shaming.
F*ck that.
It's pure nonsense.
Choose to be the inheritor of the great humans who stood for human rights, love, and dignity instead.

As an enlightened individualist, you can -and, we might say, are responsible– for choosing the positive impact (thanks to Stef for this correction).

Whatever another human can, you can

Being a human just like any other great human, also means that:

"whatever great things any man does, you can do as well".

Of course, maybe not always the exact same thing. That would be stupid to even expect. People who achieve great things specialize at something they either have a strong genetic predisposition for, or grown lifetime expertise at (often both).

But you can have the exact same positive impact in your field of choice, which is what really matters.

Instead, disempowered people look at other great human beings and think they are so special and so different than they are.

See this concept in Steve Job's famous quote:

> Life can be much broader once you discover one simple fact: Everything around you that you call life was made up by people that were no smarter than you. And you can change it, you can influence it… Once you learn that, you'll never be the same again.
> Steve Jobs

Steve Jobs was an individualist.
He believed in his personal power, and with that mindset, he actualized it.

Failure of The Law: "can you imagine flying a plane"?

> Un-enlightened guy: can you imagine flying a plane, how crazy that would be?
> Enlightened guy: yeah, I can, I think it's totally doable, and would actually be fun

I remember a former boss with a trying question:

would you rather fly a plane by yourself with 3 days to learn, or full of people with one week to learn?

But more than the question, it was how he asked, that was telling.
He asked it as if whatever you chose, you were f*cked. He spoke as if flying a plane was this crazy impossible thing and pilots were pulling off miracles day in, day out.

6.3. Mindset: If Someone Can, So Can I

Me, I felt that flying a plane was relatively easy.

If it wasn't, then planes would be crashing left and right. Since they don't, it means that it's a safe process that anyone can do.
And my point of view was: if those guys who walk out of the cockpit can, then chances are that I can do it too.

And indeed, I didn't land a plane (yet), but flying is easier than driving a stick shift car:

Walking on the moon in 1969, launching a billion-dollar company, pioneering a new social sciences field like power dynamics, or simply having a wonderful life… These are also all things that the enlightened individualist believes are within his reach.

6.4. The Empowered Sense of Limitlessness

This mindset can be extended indefinitely, into any human endeavor.

Of course someone can do something you can't, but your mindset is that if you'd work hard on it, you can at least more or less significantly reduce the gap.
Or you could have done that at your prime, maybe. Or at least reached your personal best while trying.
Or you could have done the same if you were born with the same physical or mental traits.

It seems like a lot of "if" in there, but this is less about achieving specific goals, and more about humanizing and normalizing the human experience.
If someone could do X, then X is within human reach. And you could do X, and maybe X+Y, in some other universe.

6.5. The Antifragile Sense of Limitlessness

Ultimately though, the enlightened ubermensch is not overly concerned about specific achievements.

That guy deadlifted 500kg?
Cool.
This other guy lapped Monza in 1:21.046?
What a lap!
That guy planked for 8h, ran 200km straight, or whatever?

Wow!
But the ubermensch admires the drive and dedication more than the actual goal.

Specific achievements are only the lower-level fruits of higher-level mindsets and drives.

This means that, for the ubermensch, the real test of a good or successful life is not what you were born with, but what you do with it.
That mindset allows you to admire great success from others, while also feeling part with it.

Failure of The Law: The "Slave Mindset" of Worth

Slave mindset based on worth:

> To believe that an entity or individual is more valuable than you are because of a higher rank or title they possess, or because of some external markers of success

Who is most likely to become, or to remain, a slave?
It's the individual who believes that someone else, or the "owner", is inherently more valuable, of course.

The slave mindset has both a personal value point of view, and an emotional point of view.

From a personal value point of view, some people feel "less of" if their title is "less of" or if they are "less of" based on some external marker of success -say, “amount of money one posses”, or “size of muscles”-.

And from an emotional point of view, some people project their identities onto those who are above them.
So feel “represented” by their group-leader, president, prime minister, or CEO. They feel great and proud when they think “their” leader is good, and feel bad and personally diminished when they feel their president is poor.

Failure of The Law: The “Slave Mindset” of Representativeness

Salve mindset based on representativeness:

> To believe that an entity or individual represents you simply because you’re part of that entity, or because someone else is at the top of that entity

That is a very disempowering attitude because you are giving (emotional) power and control to an external individual.
Call it a “slave identity”.

Example of slave frame, where the accuser probably had a slave identity, and rejection of slave frame
What’s the enlightened individualistic approach here?

Of course, the enlightened individual believes that nobody is inherently more valuable than he is based on rank.
And, as a consequence, nobody represents him simply because they’re above him in some very relative hierarchy.
Only he can represent himself.

The boss, president, or CEO, might be good or bad, but he is simply a man, and he has no special power to represent or speak for him.

As a rule of thumb, the farther away someone is, the less the enlightened individualist feels represented by him.

Why?

Because of the “proximity rule”.

More on that later.

7. I Only Attach & Invest Into What I Can Control

The enlightened individualist only invests and emotionally attaches onto:

1. What he can control and/or
2. What gives value back

Failure of The Law: Sports Fans

Fandom to any sports team means to “attach and invest without returns and control”.

You give your emotional attachment to some external entity, and you get nothing back. Actually, you get something: personal dependence on that external entity.

I speak from experience.
I used to get so distraught when “my team” or “my sports guy” would lose.
That’s disempowering because it invests -and partially “fuses” as we shall see- your ego onto groups and entities that are outside you, that you have no control over, and that, importantly, do nothing for you whether they win or lose.
From a value exchange point of view, it’s a sucker’s trade. And from a mental and personal power point of view, it’s very disempowering.

Women, who tend to be more pragmatic, also tend to take points off from men who are too into sports. And especially so if it comes at the cost of personal focus and success.
I like this example from “Beautiful Girls”:

> Him: So, what part of Chicago are you from > Her: You know Chicago?
> Him: Yeah, I know like Soldier’s Field
> Her: It’s a football field (nervous laughter saying “you’re a total douche”)

Investment-worthy criteria

On average, the enlightened individual level of investment depends on:

1. Closeness: How close you are to the group
2. Personal power: How influential you are in the group
3. Returns: How influential the group is to your well being and/or goals

The first two relate to control and power, while the latter relates to “value-exchange accounting”.

With the sports team example, if fandom is based on city, it can add some value by facilitating social relationships -albeit few high-quality people are big fans-.
On the other hand, you still have little influence on the team, and the team itself does little for you.

Focus on what you control & get: no pedestalizing

One of the consequences of failing to follow this rule includes men pedestalizing women.

The pedestalizer has little control over the pedestalized person, and is getting back far less than what he gives.
For that reason, the enlightened individualist tends to be immune from pedestalizing.

8. I Choose Myself Before Any Values

The enlightened individualist doesn’t follow any carved-in-stone set of rules, laws, or values.

Often, that includes self-written rules and values.

That can sound strange, I guess.
After all, self-help gurus tell us to write down our values and live by them, right?

The issue with that is that life and reality are complex and fluid.

So, eventually, you will almost invariably find yourself in a position to either compromise your effectiveness to adhere to a set of rules, or compromise your self-esteem and self-image while you break your own rules.

And that's when the mental shenanigans to salvage your self-image begin (AKA "self-manipulation, "rationalization" and "cognitive dissonance").

Plus, as we will see, values lend themselves all too well to all sorts of manipulation, distortions, and arm twisting.

What's the alternative?

Again, we go back to you.

You, and ideally you as a generally value-adding individual are the foundation, and not any "rules", "laws", or written values.
How you express yourself as a goal-striving individual and/or a "force for good" varies depending on people you interact with, situations, and goals.
You become fluid, just like the world is.

Again, you can be a supremely moral individual without adhering to any set of values.
An identity of a "value-adding" individual is all that's necessary.

Machiavellian Benefits: Higher Congruence

Machiavellian individuals don't self-manipulate and experience little dissonance (Christie and Geis, 1970).

Why?
Because they don't bind themselves with externally-imposed ethical and moral rules.

With this mindset, you can have the same mental resilience of high Machs even while being a generally value-adding individual.

9. My Judging Criteria Come Before External Criteria

Enlightened individualists choose their judging criteria and prioritize them.

That stands in opposition to most people, who inherit their judging criteria from society, or from some influential other.
And that can easily place them in the child role of judge power dynamics.

Attention:

This law doesn't say "external criteria don't matter".
That would be the good old -and often weak and hollow- "I don't care what others think". And that is more often a defensive reaction to the emotional pain of negative judgment than true self-empowerment.
External criteria do matter to personal success and life's satisfaction because we can't succeed in society without also looking at society's criteria.

The difference is that if the external criteria don't serve to pursue your goals, then, contrary to most others, the enlightened individualist is able to ignore them.
And because he puts his own criteria first, the enlightened individualist is able to keep high self-esteem in spite of negative external judgments.

For an example, read this forum entry:

- Don't Sweat The Small Stuff

9.2. I Judge Others With My Criteria, As Individuals

Many people assign values to individuals based on external criteria.

Those external criteria include group of belonging, ranks, and titles.

“Ranks” and titles include:

- CEO
- Prime minister
- General
- “Head of… “
- Professor Emeritus

Ranks are invested of power by the group of people within society, group, or organization, that respects and recognize those ranks.

Once a group of people starts assigning power and authority based on rank, the “ranks” tend to take life on their own.
And people start respecting, admiring, and looking at the rank, rather than the individual.

Ranks and titles can often become a game of power within society.
In Germany, for example, people love to preface their names with all the ranks they can get:

Il venerdì 22 febbraio 2019, 10:48:49 CET,

Sehr geehrter Herr Buffalmano,

ich, V r, bin Miteigentümerin der WE 3 Parkplatz/Garage. Es wird mich in erster Linie interessieren- was de befindet.

Für eine kurzfristige Mitteilung auch telefonisch (bitte Handy) bin ic

Mit freundlichen Grüßen

Dipl.-Ing. Architektin
V r

And that’s when I got to know that my neighbor, writing from her personal email, was a “dip.”, “ing.”, and “female architect”. Good to know.
Maybe I should have replied with “entrepreneur, founder, CEO” in my own signature? ⍰

Something similar happens when someone belongs to a certain group that, for some reason or another, has become synonymous with exclusivity or high value.
The group then becomes a form of personal title and people look at the title first, instead of the individual first.
That includes being a Harvard alumnus, a mensa member, or, these days, it might even mean being a member of the SEAL special ops.

Note:
The enlightened individualist does not necessarily reject the rank, and does not necessarily discount belonging to any elite group.

That would be childish rebellion.

As a matter of fact, he often respects the people who achieved a certain position in life.

But, crucially, the enlightened individualist does not consider anyone superior to him simply because they have a certain title. The enlightened individualist thinks he is capable of achieving any title as well. So, to decide how much respect to award to someone the enlightened individualist looks at the individual behind the title, and is not swayed by the man-made construct of titles.
And he's also not swayed by the allure of "group exclusivity", which is often based on single traits or specific and limited abilities, and not "general worthiness".

10. I Expect Little From The World, & Demand Lots From Myself

The enlightened individualist thinks "my life, my responsibility".

And he sees himself as the main agent responsible for doing or achieving whatever he wants to achieve.

Diverging Life Paths: Poors VS Rich

This is an often-overlooked mindset aspect of financial success.

And you can trace it back to how people look at success:

- Is success and personal well-being mostly socially-driven, or mostly self-driven?

the more someone expects society, the government, or institutions to be the conduit of personal success and well-being, the more they expect and complain, and the poorer they are.
In my opinion, this is why southern Italy and socialist-infused regions are poorer: the culture is to hold the government responsible for the economical well-being of people. It's about demanding help from the state, expecting it… And complain when it's not forthcoming.

The opposite approach, to demand from oneself, leads to more active, driven, successful, and self-empowered citizens.
That's why countries with a capitalist and "self-made man ethos" tend to be richer.

By focusing on himself and his own personal power and agency, the enlightened individualist belongs to the second group, of course.

Self-Focus Over Group-Focus

This concept overlaps with the locus of control, but it's more about self-focus, or group focus.

The proof that the two concepts are different is that even successful and driven men with an internal locus of control can fall for the group focus.

Seen an example here:

Failure of The Law: Going Down With The (Social) Ship

Listen to Michael Franzese, a successful, driven, and smart businessman:

> Michael: I have a pessimistic view of where America is heading. I fear for my kids how America is going to look like, I really do
> Tyrus: Unfortunately I agree with you. It's already over. China won.

Michael and Tyrus' pessimism and fears all stem from an exaggerated group-focus. They give too much power to larger group entities, and too little credit to individuals.

Why should you be so afraid about what “America” does?
And particularly, what it does “against China?”.

Whichever loosely connected economic group you might be part of has little bearing on what you do as an individual.
As long as commerce among individuals remains a staple of human life as it’s always been… You can thrive anywhere.
Even if things get really bad in whichever place you’re at, humans are mobile and can move somewhere else. Or they can stay, and be the catalyst for the turnaround, why not.
The point is: options abound for the enlightened individualist because he believes in himself and puts the onus of success on himself.

Once you internalize the mindset that you can succeed independently of your country or group, you’re more optimistic, more empowered, and far more likely to succeed.

Read more later on “social complainers” and “social philosophers”.

10.2. Expect Little From Politicians, Demand Much From Yourself

Enlightened individualists are too busy on themselves to get deep into politics.

It’s not because they don’t think politics is important, or because they don’t think politicians can make a difference -of course they might-.
But the enlightened individualist cannot invest too much time discussing politics because he feels that the biggest difference he can make is by working on his life, and his projects.

Wasting too much time on politicians’ agenda subordinates you to politicians.
It indirectly says that you don’t believe you can make a difference, and that the little you can do, is by discussing other people telling you how they are going to make a difference.

So as much as he doesn’t worry the country/government can ruin him, the enlightened individualist also doesn’t expect any politician to revolutionize his life.
You should know why now: because he feels that he is the only one who is responsible for making changes in his life.
Of course, this excludes all enlightened individualists who work in politics or who made political influence their goal.

And, again, this is more about mindsets and higher-level beliefs than actual capabilities.
An enlightened individualist might surely find himself in a position where changing his life is, temporarily or not, beyond his (current) capability.
But he still believes in the principle.

Also on the topic, see:

- Political manipulation

How Enlightened Individualism Empowers You

We saw some of the advantages already.

But for clarity, let’s list them here:

1. Superior Approach For Personal Success

You are far more likely to succeed at anything you do when you focus on yourself first and take responsibility for your results as an individual.

2. Higher Life Effectiveness

Enlightened individualism cuts out major sources of time waste from your life, and redirects them where they make the biggest impact: on yourself, your plans, and your goals.

Focus: what makes a difference for you, and where you can make a difference on

The efficiency-minded individualist also narrows his focus to what makes a difference only, and to what he can make a difference on.

When he's on a goal-oriented journey, he does little philosophy, theology, news, and opinions (unless he's an opinionist paid to distract others, that is). Nothing comes out of those except warm air.
Instead, he focuses strictly on what yields the most practical outcomes. He also generally sticks to his area of growing expertise. That's, after all, where he can make a difference, where he wields the most power, and where he profits the most.

That approach makes him highly efficient, and efficiency is power.

3. Superior Approach For Life Satisfaction

When you link your ego, pride, self-esteem and happiness to some external sources, you make yourself dependent on those external sources.

When you focus on yourself first, you take back control of how you (decide to) feel.
That means that your self-esteem is self-generated, and this is a necessary step for developing an antifragile ego.

4. Higher Social Effectiveness (Through Better Individuals' Assessments)

There are two ways of accurately assessing people (Cronbach, 1955):

- Via a solid grasp of general human psychology
- By focusing on the individual, and how he differs from the rest

One is not always and necessarily better than the other.

For example, Christie and Gleis showed that Machiavellians assess people more accurately by assigning to the individual the unflattering tendencies of the human species -from general to individual-.
However, low Machiavellians better adapt their assessment to individuals -importantly, they were less overall accurate because they underestimated people's general Machiavellianism-.

Balancing Naive Optimism & Predatory Cynicism

In a way, both groups fell short.

The high Machs make out people to be too untrustworthy, and might miss out on some win-win opportunities and relationships -call it the "cynic trap"-.
The low Machs make out people to be too trustworthy, and might be exploited for it -call it the "naive trap"-.

The enlightened individualist strikes the perfect balance.
By looking at the individual first he avoids the problem of over-generalizing from population to individual.
And with power intelligence and general, population-level psychological awareness, he combines the best of both worlds for the highest levels of accuracy.

In short, the enlightened individualist has the potential to be far more accurate at assessing people.
And that's an important aspect of social and life success.

5. Higher Social Power

When you believe in your core that you're as valuable as anyone else -or more-, you grow more socially resilient. Add to that the belief that your criteria come before external criteria, and you become impervious to negative judgment (judge power dynamics).

6. Transcend Family & Background

Individualists believe individuals to be "bigger" than any circumstance or background.

Included in the background are:

- Family of origin
- Location of origin / childhood
- Socio-economic conditions
- History of abuse
- University attended

Failure of Collectivism: The "Family" Trap

I remember once sitting with a group of people that, me excluded, you could define as "winners".

As the alcohol started flowing, one lady not so humbly bragged about her father's team being awarded the nobel prize.
She was proud, while also feeling the pressure to achieve something similar.

The guy to her side got pensive, and then finally started gushing.

And I couldn't believe my ears.
I was shocked this otherwise smart and self-development-focused guy was feeling inadequate because of his humble family of origin.
Not only I felt that was extremely disempowering, but it was also very offensive to his parents who raised him, cared for him, and provided for him.

How would an enlightened individualist react to that "look at my impressive background" story?
He would have drawn the following conclusions:

1. Chances are that the lady's dad is probably a very good scientist, but the award doesn't say much about him as a man
2. It says little about her skills as a scientist
3. It says nothing about me

Indeed, if anything, an enlightened individualist feels that a humble background says even better things about high achievers.

7. Thrive When Groups Fail

As social animals we have this tendency:

1. We feel empowered when our group does well
2. We feel powerless when our group falters

Today, as society has grown beyond our ability to personally assess it, we mostly use media news to assess how "our group" is doing -and the media tends to be negatively biased-.
Feelings, beliefs, and actions follow from how we feel our group is doing.

See again “law #10”.

8. Transcending Genders: The Power of Fluidity

Genders are one of the most significant groups individuals belong to.

There are several ways in which: the gender constructs can potentially interfere with individual’s empowerment

- Manipulation: as in “a real man would do this”, hence you must do this if you want to be a real man
- Pressure to conform: social forces apply pressure on individuals to conform to whatever culture designates as “masculine” or “feminine”.
- Self-pressure: based on what society, parents, or themselves feel it means to be “masculine” or “feminine”, many individuals pressure themselves into behaviors and roles that make them unhappy -and no more effective-

Now, don’t get me wrong: since what people think does matter, it’s usually a good idea not to stray too far from what society deems as either masculine or feminine.
See for example Clinton’s failure, partially due to her lack of femininity.

And for dating success, it’s all also a good idea to possess -or to be able to display- certain typically feminine or masculine traits.

However, beyond that level of effectiveness, for most adjusted folks, gender constructs can quickly become a constrictive cage.
Plenty of pundits today leverage that internal pressure to conform to school others on “how to be a man”. It’s an effective sell, since most men feel that pressure to “prove” their masculinity.

The enlightened individualist takes a different approach.

He pays limited attention to the various “men are from mars” types of books.
Albeit he’s fully aware that genders do are different, he is also aware that, on many crucial traits, the variance is huge.
And he is aware that high-quality men and high-quality women are more similar to each other than they are to low-quality individuals of the same gender.

The enlightened individualist also pays little attention to the pundits teaching others “how to be a man” or, popular these days, “how an independent woman should be”.
Of course, the enlightened individualist sees no reason why he should listen to anyone else teaching him how he should be.
And, his ego not invested in either masculinity or femininity, he has nothing to prove to anyone, and is free to do his thing.
The enlightened individualist moves fluidly and chooses behavior based on what’s effective, rather than what’s “typically masculine” or “typically feminine”.
And, ultimately, that makes him far more effective in life.

I know for example that several women have in good part enjoyed my company thanks to an overall high confidence and high power behavior while still being able to emphatically bond and connect like few other men can.

9. You Become A Hardened Target (Manipulation-Resistant)

Putting yourself first immunizes you against 90% of manipulation attempts.

Manipulation is defined as “advancing the interests of the manipulator, while coming at a cost for the manipulator’s target(s)”.
But when you look at the world from a value-exchange point of view and what’s in it for you, most manipulation attempts suddenly become crystal clear.

As a matter of fact, some manipulations start to sound ludicrous:

- Swearing allegiance to the flag? = I gain nothing, the political leadership does
- "You don't need a man" = dubious gains for me, but she gains with less competition
- "I've done this just for you" = I gain nothing with that info, but he gains social credit

About that last one, enlightened individualism also protects you against white-knighting and providing for value-taking women.
Also read "female domestication":

> Female Domestication: How Women Control Men & Relationships

And also see "manipulative negotiations".

9.2. Hardened Target Against Con Artists

Says psychologist Maria Konnikova of Bernie Madoff Ponzi scheme:

> It was an affinity scheme, it was insidery. We have to take care of each > other; he's one of us."
> Madoff is far from alone.
> Con artists often use communities (…) The authority we grant someone comes often as more of an afterthought than anything else, by virtue of their belonging to the exact right group
> Konnikova, 2016

An individualist would have been more likely to look at Madoff twice as suspiciously when he tried to leverage his "Jewishness".

10. Everyone Gains: The Social Benefits

Albeit "individualism" sounds selfish, enlightened individualism is far more pro-social than collectivism is.

Some of the social benefits include:

- Meritocracy

Meritocracy is based on individual skills and ability, which is what enlightened individualism focuses on.
Everyone gains with meritocracy because society becomes more effective.

- Fewer victims

A society with more enlightened individuals is a society with fewer people to exploit and take advantage of.
And as Stef reminds us, fewer people with a victim mentality.

- More social cohesion / less racism

Xenophobia comes natural to our species, says Jared Diamond.
And you are NOT going to cure that with political correctness.
Enlightened individualism instead does the trick.
Much of racism is based on inferring and extrapolating group properties onto the individual.

The enlightened individualist does not deny that at group level there might be differences -read on-, but by putting the individual first, the enlightened individualist tends to be less prone to racism.

- Progress and innovation

Progress and innovation are based on cooperation but founded on individual's drive and skills.

Collectivism represses and perpetuates things as they are. Enlightened individualists changed and advance the world.

- Less virtue-signaling

Virtue-signaling might not exact the highest cost on society, but it does cost something nonetheless.

In a world of enlightened individualists, a good chunk of virtue signaling cease to exist.

For example, it's ludicrous for enlightened individualists to "support women-led businesses", because they'd rather look at the individual merit of each business.
Read more here.

And an enlightened individualist wouldn't go to a "minority" and say "I support you" because he believes the individual always has the power to be the exception.
Read more here.

Dangers of Group Dynamics

Enlightened individualism contrasts with having one's ego "fused", or overly-invested, with groups and external entities and constructs.

First, a due clarification:

Some might confuse here "collectivism", and "cooperation".
The two are very different.
Cooperation is how individuals achieve win-win, make the pie larger, and make everyone better off. Cooperation is even more effective when it's empowered individualists who cooperate.
Collectivism instead is putting the group above the individual, and has nothing to do with cooperation. If anything, it has to do with coercion.

Groups per se are not bad nor good.
Most social groups are GREAT and we need them.
But there are some value-taking groups, dynamics, and group leaders that can sometimes turn toxic and coercive against individuals.

As enlightened individuals, let's learn what are the risks and red flags to watch out for:

1. Group Coercion Limits Your Freedom

Coercion, in its different forms, is quite common in groups.

Coercion includes:

- Tribes dynamics and rites of passage seek to pre-plan your life path

Some authors of male self-help have a rosy view of tribes -see Junger, Tomassi, Donovan-.

And with the rosy and romanticized view of tribe belonging often comes the glorification and romanticization of the "rites of passage" to turn boys into men.

Albeit tribes and rites of passage are not per se any bad and do have some good aspects, little attention is given to how tribe dynamics and rites of passage often turn coercive and repressive.
And, when not outright repressive, almost always freedom-limiting.

Besides the fact that some rites of passage are an excuse to haze and harass younger men, enlightened individualists reject the externally mandated criteria of "how to become a man", when to become a man", or "what it means to be a man" (also, on some authors' misplaced assumption of "alphaness" of the rite of passages, in the Sambia tribe, male on male fellation is part of the right of passage, swallowing mandatory).

The enlightened individualist, of course, decides that for himself.

Furthermore, the enlightened individualist has outgrown the tribalist ethos.

A rite of passage to make you feel like a man?
Going back to the tribe so you can feel homely?
Appealing, somehow, but that's not the answer.

No thanks, the enlightened individualist steps forward into the future and makes the new world his oyster.
A new world that, in our case, offers a million more possibilities for personal empowerment, success, and life enjoyment.

- Pressure to toe the line

Many groups oppose members who think and act differently.

Those members decrease group uniformity and, potentially, cohesion.
That is especially bad for the leader, since he loses power over the group.

That's why many groups pressure individuals to "toe the line".

- Pressure to keep you in the group

Baumeister says that groups, and most of all idealistic groups, tend to place a heavy stigma on people who leave the group.

People who leave the group represent a big threat: they show there is another and different way. Maybe a better one. So they must be scorned and cut off.

That's why most groups discourage other possible solutions and worldviews while talking up the group's only "right way".

- Pressure to subordinate personal interests for the group (or, often, its leaders)

There is often an inherent conflict of interest between what's good for the group, and what's good for the individual.

So the group seeks to pressure, coerce, or manipulate the individual into giving up more of his individual pie in favor of the group's pie.
You can see that more in detail workplace environments:

> 21 Conflicts of Interest (Your Boss Doesn't Want You to Know)

Governments can also coerce their citizens.
In some ways, paying taxes is a form of group coercion, albeit we can argue that there are benefits to the individual as well.

However, some other forms of government coercion can include extremely high risks for the individual, with little to no upsides.
Military draft during most wars is an example.

Says Steven Pinker:

> Of course it is genuinely admirable for one individual to sacrifice his or her interests for those of many > individuals. It's quite another thing when a person is forced to make the supreme sacrifice for the benefit of a charismatic leader, a square of cloth, or colors on a map. Nor is it sweet and right to clasp death in order to prevent a province from seceding, expand a sphere of influence, or carry out an irredentist crusade.

Well said, Mr. Pinker.
An enlightened individualist couldn't agree more.

- Collectivist values and ideals to curtail individual freedom

To subordinate the individual's interest to the group, the group upholds what are potentially manipulative value.

These values and social norms are put in place to limit individuals' freedom in favor of the group.

Some of these values include:

- Women who sleep around are slutty
- "Real men" commit / provide
- "Real men" defend their group / country
- "Good women" put their children before themselves

Notice that those values and social norms can come at a cost for the individual, but they most often benefit society.
Attention: those values are not always and necessarily bad. But it's good to be aware of them, and it's good to be aware of the potential limitations they place on you.
The enlightened individualist certainly is very aware of those dynamics, and decides for himself when and how to embrace those values.

Watch Out For Public Profession & Private Defection

Also, be aware of the manipulative game of "professing in public, defecting in private".

The game is simple: people publicly espouse and encourage high values for others to follow, while privately they break those values.

Many politicians for example profess values such as patriotism, marriage, or sobriety. But it's all to be seen whether they're always faithful, sober, or put the country's interest before their own.

2. The Group's Demand For Loyalty Trump Values (& Your Interests)

Most groups' bosses demand loyalty, we know that.

But, funny enough, even most group members internalize that they are due loyalty.
Robert Jackall's landmark study of corporate ethics for example found that most managers believe that it is fundamentally wrong to go against your boss.

Baumeister says that whistle-blowers are rare and often condemned, even when there were good ethical and moral reasons to speak up.
And most women know that filing a sexual harassment complaint is still a political landmine and a potential career-ender. Even some pro-feminist career advisers recommend against it.

Finally, from a purely Machiavellian and self-interested point of view, the demands of loyalty to the group, company, or boss, can turn very costly to the individual.
At that point, you gotta ask yourself: what am I staying in this group for?

That's a quote an individualist would utter

3. Truth Dies at The Group's Hand Stack

We all self-deceive.

Yet, depending as well on the individual, there are some more or less strong barriers to self-deception (Kunda, Z. 1990).
Groups, however, are very effective at self-deception because they can support each other's (false) beliefs.

Individuals in groups pressure one another to "remain true" to the group values and to align to "what everyone else says".
Funny enough, "what everyone else says" is often what people think the group approves and values, with the result being a mildly schizophrenic environment built on compliance, lies, and deception (in exchange for acceptance).

This dynamic overlaps with the "spiral of silence", a socially repressive dynamic that does not exist in individuals. The theory explains that individuals might disagree or harbor doubts about what the group is doing, but they keep quiet in fear of losing status and acceptance.

In sum, as long as the group doesn't strongly encourage dissension and individual differences, the ultimate price of group belonging for un-enlightened individuals are truth, personal integrity, and personal freedom.

4. Group's Echo Chambers Make You Miserable

Some groups coalesce around a specific issue, topic, or goal.

These groups filter the news for their members, letting in only a small portion of the world's events -a portion that usually confirms a certain worldview-.
This leads to an echo chamber.
In echo chambers, the issue(s) the group cares about are almost always blown out of proportion, and often distorted. As a consequence, members see the world as far worse than it actually is.

That way, even issues that might have been (somewhat) true to begin with, end up being distorted and over-weighted to a point where they become untrue.

So, for example, it might be true that:

- White men commit most of the mass shootings and serial killing
- Black men on average commit more crimes in some countries
- Powerful people steal more than powerless ones
- Men do more wars (but build more)
- Women would start fewer wars (but don't advance civilization nearly as much)

All those above points might be true.
But first, tell you little about individuals within those groups. And second, they tell you nothing about what really matters to your personal success as an individual.

But when you're in an echo chamber that is racist, misogynist, communist, or misandrist, the above points all get blown out of proportion.
Result?
You get angry, spiteful, and over-worried about issues that don't even matter to your life.

Being part of a "black lives matter" echo chamber its black members might really believe that traffic stops are one of the highest dangers in their lives.
The issue with that is not just that you get angrier and worried for nothing, but also that your overly-negative mindsets turn into reality (self-fulfilling prophecy).

For a case study on this tendency, see:

- Red Pill dynamics & distortions

5. Leaders Can Have A Vested Interest in Manipulating Members

In many cases, the interests between leaders and followers diverge.

For example, leaders gain when individuals grow dependent on the group.

This is also true outside of groups when crooked leaders (feign to) represent higher collective ideals.
A real-life example is Don King.
Don King talked up his support of the "black community", self-framed as pro-group, and leveraged those higher ideals to prey on both Mohammad Ali and Tyson.

Now, again, it's not necessarily wrong to support the black community -and it can be a laudable and value-adding effort-.
But be careful that it doesn't turn into "us against them", and always ask yourself "who is asking, and how is he gaining/losing?".

Says Maria Konnikova of con artists and cult leaders:

> Con artists, at their best and worst, give us meaning. We fall for them because it would make our lives better if the reality they proposed were indeed true. They give us a sense of purpose, of value, of direction.
> Konnikova, 2006

The best way to avoid those leaders who do not have our best interests in mind?
Find your own answers, find your own meaning.

Also read:

- How business leaders manipulate employee

7. Groups Enable Idealistic Evil

Idealistic evil is evil committed by extremists in the belief they are doing something right.

Whether these "leaders" are consciously manipulating others -and themselves- or really believe in their philosophies is a moot point.

What is not a moot point is that in groups with an "us vs them' dynamic people tend to look to the members with the firmest sense of hatred for support and guidance.

Idealistic evil, says Baumeister, is inherently group-dependent.
Says Baumeister:

> One reason for the importance of groups in idealistic evil is the power of the group to support its high, broad ideals. Abstract conceptions of how things ought to be gain social reality from the mere fact of being shared by a group.
> Baumeister, 1997

Without group context, those ideals would seem crazy to an individual.
And without a group around him, a hate-mongering "charismatic leader" would call for prompt lock-up of a public enemy.
But put that nutjob and his ideals at the helm a group of un-enlightened individuals, and they become real, true, and anger and violence-worthy.

8. Groups Provide A Drug-Like Crutch to Failing Individuals

Many failing or lost individuals need to go through self-development.

The danger is that the people who need help or guidance the most are also the most likely to be manipulated and taken astray by poor leaders and groups.

As we said before, bad leaders seek personal power and followers' obedience by selling meaning, and hope.
And who's more likely to buy that?
The hopeless, of course.

Example:

> Lost kid: (smoking a joint)
> Nazi recruiter: This is what the jews and the communists want you to do to keep you docile
> Lost kid: (joins nazi group instead of working on himself to improve his life)

The above is how recruitment to most extremist, insular, and anger-fueled echo chambers looks like.

The group is sexy to lost and failing individuals because it provides a crutch.
The group provides a sense of belonging, a sense of direction, some meaning, and a false sense of self-development.

When groups become a crutch, men use them to feel good about themselves in a dynamic that is similar to drug addiction.

Collectivist Failure Example: Winning Through The Group (Rather Than The Self)

When the group or higher entity becomes a crutch, the "accomplishments" of the group are co-opted by the individual.

The group accomplishments serve to make up for a lack of personal accomplishments, so that the individual can generate good feelings -and maybe some self-esteem-, via the group.

In the red pill article we used this example:

This commenter was glad that a man beat a woman because he projected his identity onto the collective of "manhood".
In social exchange parlance, he is "credit leeching", seizing credits he doesn't have.
In psychological terms, it's a form of ego projection, or "identity leeching" through ego-fusion.
He fused his ego with the male-gender group, and hitch-hiked (leeching) on that male win against a woman to feel good about himself.
Little does it matter that on a good day he wouldn't beat a single female runner.

Instead, the enlightened individual sees no value or honor in what your group does.
When a man brags that "men built society", he is actually right. But the most relevant question is always: what have you done, as an individual?

When you acquire your good feelings through the group, you stay stuck with a fragile ego.
And second, you squander resources you could use on yourself, for true self-development.

8.2. Group Success Removes Personal Agency: No Drive to Personal Improvement

Paradoxically, the better the group/drug performs, the more the individual loses himself.

He gets his emotional fix, he starts becoming more and more ego-involved with the group (ego-fusion), and it becomes a slippery slope.

9. The "US VS Them Trap" Comes Natural to Groups

Says Baumeister:

> One of the most powerful and universal human tendencies is to identify with a group of people, and to square off against rival groups.
> Baumeister, 1997

Indeed, the discontinuity effect sanctions that groups are more competitive, antagonist, and exploitive towards each other than individuals are towards other individuals, a finding that has been confirmed over and over (Wildschut et al., 2003).
Even individuals tend to be more antagonistic towards groups (Hoyle, 1989).

Moreover, there is the good/bad dynamic, whereby people think that their group is good. And if we are good, then that other group must be evil.

It's interesting in this sense that some think we've come a long way since people used to look at "other" races so negatively.
But that's a false step forward. Because until group-belonging is ditched in favor of individual enlightenment there will always be a group to be suspicious of.
Case in point, a survey shows how the old disapproval of interracial marriages has been replaced (or compounded) by the newly minted political divide:

Chart by Kevin Drum
In a country where political parties both largely agree on a large set of foundational values, you can find high-quality individuals who vote Republicans and there are high-quality individuals who vote Democrats.
It's about the individual, not the party. But group dynamics fog people's minds to this obvious fact.

In the words of the great individualist Jordan Peterson, here explaining why he rejects "gender politics":

> Jordan Peterson: it's the presumption that the fundamental hallmark of human identity is the group. That's wrong. Not only wrong, it's retrogressive, it's tribalistic, it's dangerous, it's an incitement to violence, it's resentful, and it's malevolent.
> We got it right in the West. The sovereignty of the individual.

Collectivist Failure Example: Parochial "US VS Them" & Chinese Threat

I like the guys from Charisma on Command.

They're generally smart, logical, and value-adding social and world analysts.
Yet, when groups are overly salient, even they fall for the "us VS them" mentality.
As an example:

> Charlie: (talking about China's future troubles) We're gonna be OK in America, it's just not their century

Can you see how twisted that logic is?
You're gonna be OK in America because China will fail?
That is parochial, small-minded, and even the symptom of a major scarcity mindset, whereby to have a good life, someone else has to have it bad.

As Robert Sapolsky says, "It's problematic when non–zero sum games are viewed as zero-sum", because you can turn win-win into lose-lose.

If the same approach was applied to individuals, you'd think the guy was either nuts, weak, or unnecessarily mean. Just imagine the following:

> Charlie: (talking about Lucio as an individual competitor) Lucio is doing poorly, good for me and Ben

But since it's about groups, it's normal.
As a matter of fact, many folks who'd be considered "wise" talk this way -see Ray Dalio and Martin Seligman-.

Of course, the fact that this approach is common and accepted means nothing to the enlightened individualist, who still considers it toxic, and disempowering.

9.2. The Higher The Group Pride, The Higher the Hatred

Of course, one might say "I'm proud of being part of X, but that doesn't mean I am against those other groups".

Except, it rarely works that way.

Says psychologist Baumeister:

> Racial pride and feelings of superiority seem to go with violence toward others, and this is apparently true of both blacks and whites. Perhaps it is merely one of the sadder, uglier signs that basic human nature is the same in whites and blacks.
> Baumeister, 1997

The solution?
Enlightened individualism.
If you gotta be proud, then "being proud of being you" is actually better than "proud for being part of X group".

Enlightened War Hero: Hugh Thompson Ends the My Lay Massacre

Let's finally get to a positive example.

Hugh Thompson and his crew reached My Lay while the US army's massacre against civilians was underway.
With the horrors of the war the ingroups and outgroups of "Vietnamese" and "Americans" couldn't be more strongly divided.

Add the personal risks of going against "your own group", and we can quickly see how it would have taken a real enlightened hero to soar higher, and take action.

That's what Thomson did.

As per Wikipedia's article, "Thompson landed, and told his crew that if the soldiers shot at the villagers while he was trying to get them out of the bunker, then they were to open fire on the soldiers".

Thomson radioed about the massacre several times, but nothing was done to put an end to it.
As Thomson pushed for an investigation, all officers responsible for the massacre were either acquitted or pardoned.
Thomson was condemned and ostracized by many in the United States military and government, including several senators. One senator attempted to have him court-martialed.

A good chunk of the American civilian population wasn't any better. Thomson received death threats over the phone, and dead and mutilated animals on his porch (!!).
And that should tell you a lot about the possible dangers and toxicity of group dynamics.

Hugh Thomson, a truly enlightened war hero
Hugh Thomson turned against his own ingroup to uphold the universal values of human dignity. In return, he faced expected backlash from the angry mob of slaves. Thomson is one of the few true "war heroes", as well as a hero of enlightened individualism.

10. Groups Shield Pussies & Take Out The Worst From Individuals

The "diffusion of responsibility" (Darley & Latane, 1968) facilitates aggression and general poor behavior from groups.

In simple terms, individuals acting within groups feel less responsible for their actions and "freer" to engage in aggression, or violence.
In that sense, groups provide the cover that allows individuals to unleash their worst.

To mimic a quote in the "Start Here" page, we might say that:

> Groups is where weak individuals go to unleash the dark side that they don't have the courage to share as individuals

11. Groups Foster Social Climbing

Social climbing is an almost inescapable group dynamic.

People have an inborn tendency to want power and status.
And since few people are power intelligent to acquire status in the most effective way, they end up acting like crabs in a bucket, trying to climb up by using others as social pegs.
We wrote plenty on social climbing here:

- Social climbing

- Social climbing from leaders
- Alpha male posturing

11.2. When Status Spurs Violence

The need for status within groups can also give rise to violence that wouldn't exist without the group.
Says Baumeister:

> Concern over the opinions of others is often a driving factor in violent, aggressive, or other evil behavior. Audiences lend social reality to events. If no one else knows, you can pretend it never happened (Toch, 1993). Self-esteem can bounce back, but people are very concerned with what other people think of them.
> Baumeister, 1997

12. Groups Generate False Values (That Likely Harm You As An Individual)

Group values that are sometimes meaningless and sometimes harmful include:

- Patriotism

Most government apparatuses encourage at least some patriotism.

But some countries need more patriotism than others.

Countries with bigger armies or with more frequent wars for example need more money and cannon fodder, so they push harder on the patriotic manipulation.

To this end, some countries use what I call the "empire ethos".
The empire ethos gives good feelings -the pride of being part of the empire-, for more practical goods, like tax receipts, political support, or military service.

In brief, how do you justify this:

Well, it starts early.

With this:

Embed from Getty Images
Note:

There are practical individual advantages to being part of an empire, a military superpower or, generally, a strong country/group.
But it's a tiny percentage of the citizenship that disproportionately enjoy those advantages -leaders, military top brass, and defense contractors-.
The costs instead are borne by all taxpayers. The citizens pay their slice, but get the crumbles of the pie. And "patriotic feelings" are supposed to make up for that imbalance.

One might say that good feelings also matter.
True. But as we've seen, it's disempowering to project your ego and to tie your self-esteem to a flag or country.
So you're most likely better off distancing yourself from the jingoism.

- Proselytizing / convincing others

Some groups, often religions, make "convincing others" a value to uphold.

Some religions even say, or at least have been interpreted as saying, that the task of every religious person is to convert others, or to kill them.

I'm sure you can see what makes that a bad value.
But even in its milder forms, such as associating only with people within your group, is going to disempower you and put you at a competitive disadvantage.

- Belonging pride (example: "gay pride")

Pride for what you haven't chosen is a BS value.

It distracts you from true self-development, and from seeking pride in what should really matter: what you've chosen, done, or become.

Gay pride has thrived so far because it's a huge PC no-no to call it for what it is: nonsense.

The enlightened individualist sees no value, no honor, and nothing inherently good -or bad- about being gay -or hetero-: those weren't traits you worked on. You can't claim any "pride" on them.

- Group cronyism

You've probably heard this one:

> There is a special place in hell for women who don't help other women
> Madeleine Albright

That's a quote from Madeleine Albright, during an official ceremony.
Not only it hasn't been met with the disgust it deserves, but it's been embraced by influential feminists and it's become a slogan.

Spare a moment of silence for the men applauding in the background

> Albright: You have to help Hillary Clinton, she will always be there for you, and you have to just remember "there is a special place in hell for women who don't help other women

The value of supporting group members independently of their merits is obviously anti-meritocratic.
And, the enlightened individualist would add, also tribalist, and backward.

Often, it's also:

- Manipulative, as it's an indirect way of asking for support (see video above)
- Disempowering, by fostering a victim mentality ("we're so disadvantaged, we need each other's support")
- Offensive, as the female enlightened individualist wants to advance on her merit, and resents free handouts "because she's a woman".

13. When You Ego-Fuse, You Lose

Ego fusion is the ultimate state of group dependence.

With ego fusion, the individual's ego overlaps with the group.

Ego-fusion differs in intensity, but every time you emotionally invest in a group, you're also at least partially ego-fusing.
At low levels of ego fusion, it's not the end of the world. At high levels, you're giving up yourself.

Good Groups, Bad Groups

What groups are "good for you" is relative, and up to you to decide.

However, some general criteria include groups that:

1. You have chosen: rather than foisted upon you by chance or others' decision
2. Add concrete value: the value-exchange point of view
3. Lets you develop as an independent individual: including as an independent thinker

Bad Groups

Of course, this is also relative, and there are grey areas as well.
But, as we say often here, the grey area is not infinitely elastic.

In general, the enlightened individualist does not self-identify or ego-invest with:

- Most groups you entered "by default": there is no merit in being part of a group that was assigned to you either randomly, or by someone else
  - "Race": comes laden with racial tensions that you truly don't need
  - Gender: it's not antifragile, and recently laden with anger and poor self-help
  - Sexual orientation: see "gay pride"
  - Background: blue blood, poor or rich, conservative or liberal family… It doesn't matter. It's what you do, not what those before you did, or were
- Groups & leaders demanding loyalty: demanding "loyalty" without giving something back is immoral. Treat it as such, and vote with your feet
- Appealing to higher ideals: too many ideals means the leader is setting up an exchange that requires you to give up both pragmatism, and critical thinking. It's time for you to turn up the cynicism
- Ideology-based groups: frame themselves about truth and self-development, but they're often the opposite. As a rule of thumb, if they have a set of rules or belief you need to abide to, it's a red flag.

mikepmiller, CC 2.0

Groups that encourage groupthink, sell a doctrine, and make you dependent rather than independent tend to be poor groups.

Jordan Peterson has a wonderful few minutes on identity-politics groups in Joe Rogan #1070.
And he ends with an appeal to individualism as well:

And, to keep it simply:

- All groups that take more than they give
- All groups that limit your personal power and freedom

When Evolution Turns Maladaptive

Evolution wired us into giving up the self for external, larger entities that includes groups, and abstract ideals.

Men, even more so than women, are both wired, and more socially pressured, into self-sacrifice for external entities.
Those drives are not bad per se, and can lead to value-adding and win-win service to the greater good, to a group, or even to a family/woman.

However, they all also offer hooks for manipulation, and they all can turn self-defeating, certainly for the individual, and potentially even for society.

Just two examples:

Governments Co-Opt Men's Drive to Defend The Tribe

Men have an inherent drive to form groups and scan for threats (McDonald et al., 2012).

You could say that's a potentially good thing.
Especially useful during our evolution.
But apply it to modernity, and it's been misused more times than we can count.

For example, patriotism leveraged by governments and the military offer men a sucker's trade.
And it's particularly during times of war that the sucker trade sucks.

See this example from "Born on the Fourth of July":

The marine leverages several "higher ideals" that are appealing to men:

- Warrior in group's defense ("when our country called us")
- Loyalty ("we have always come")
- Being a "real man" -a very effective "hook" to influence or manipulate men-
- Belonging
- Belonging to an exclusive group
- Winning ("we never lost a war")

Some men who didn't learn how to develop emotional attachment in life can also find war, famines, disasters and other extreme situations appealing.
Take this kid's attitude described by Deborah Tannen:

> A man who was sent to Vietnam because of an error gave this as the reason he did not try to set the record straight and go home: "I found out I belonged in Vietnam," he said. "The bonding of men at war was the strongest thing I'd felt in my life."

That sense of excitement, glory, and of brotherhood at the prospect of war is a relatively common phenomenon for some men (Brown, 1991).
And I say that as a man who for a long time -and still- has strongly felt that "pull".

But the enlightened individual takes a moment and asks himself: "wait a second. Who am I fighting here? Who and what am I fighting for? And for what and for whom am I risking my own life?"

Albeit Mohammad Ali had his own issues with tribalism and calling white people "his enemy", he did have an enlightened individualist approach to the war:

Charismatic Leaders Co-Opt "Loyalty" For Own Power

Most men also have an intrinsic drive to follow charismatic men.

Call that mix of charismatic man and appeal to higher ideals the "great man" approach to leadership.

We could make the case that it's a good thing that many men want to follow a charismatic leader.
The world needs team members, after all.

But of course, that drive to follow charismatic men can also make us obedient pawns in the hands of a self-interested, narcissistic leader.

The "great man" approach to leadership has some proven dark underbelly indeed.
Christie and Geis found out that highly Machiavellian men are more likely to become leaders within groups, and Laslam noted that the "great man leadership" benefits the leader first and foremost.

We only need to look at history to see it in effect.
Almost all fascist leaders went for the "great man" leadership.

We could go back in history to the usual Hitlers and Mussolinis, but there are also plenty of modern examples.

Please approach this example apolitically -this website has no left-wing sympathies- and focus on the power dynamics instead:

> Trump: as the scout laws say, a scout is trustworthy and loyal. We could use some loyalty today (loyalty to whom?)
> Boy scouts: (as shown in the fulllength video) USA! USA! USA!

By now you might have realized this: the enlightened individualistic approach immunizes you to the "great man" allure.
Why should he be compelled to follow and support him no matter what, when the enlightened individualist sees the "great man" on top as no better than he is. And that allows him to see his requests for loyalty and patriotism as manipulative ruses to further his own agenda.

Solution: Enlightened Individualism

The solution is not to ditch all higher ideals, reject all leaders, or turn ourselves into 100% selfish operators.

Enlightened individualism is about taking the best of both worlds: collaboration, worthy ideals, and individual pursuits of personal success.
It allows us to make the most out of groups and collaboration, to develop human relationships and win-win exchanges. And it also protects our downside risks against manipulators, abusers, and value-takers.

We'll learn how to become an enlightened individualist soon.
First, let's review some similar and overlapping philosophies.

Individualism & Other Schools of Thoughts

Some constructs that overlap or feed into enlightened individualism include:

Enlightenment & Humanism

Humanism is foundational to enlightened individualism.

Says Pinker in "Enlightenment Now":

> Humanism, which privileges the well-being of individual men, women, and children over the glory of the tribe, race, nation, or religion. It is individuals, not groups, who are sentient—who feel pleasure and pain, fulfillment and anguish.

Pinker goes on to describe humanism as opposed to green movements that want to subordinate men to the environment, or to animalist movements that frame humans as the aggressors and "invaders".

Enlightened individualists agree.

Rationalism

The enlightened individualist develops analytical processes that go under the umbrellas of logic, reason, and the scientific method.
They are all barriers against the pitfalls of group oppression, faith, dogmas, loyalty, authority, charisma, or mysticism.

Libertarianism

The enlightened individualist sympathizes with libertarianism and its thirst for individual freedom.

Libertarians are among the few to recognize the true government power dynamics, with their potentially coercive, value-taking, and manipulative over-reaches -some of which we've discussed here as part of group dynamics-.
So albeit the enlightened individualist might or might not agree with the liberal anarchist choice -I personally don't- he generally supports power checks and balances, and prefers a generally permissive, freedom-abundant legal system.

Read more in the review of Rothbard's work here and here.

Personal responsibility (from conservatism)

Right-wing movements focus on individual agency and responsibility.

Without denying the role of culture and background, the individualist agrees that, ultimately, we must always go back to the individual.

But while some right-wing focus on culpability, the enlightened individual sees it as empowerment.
The individual focus is because they see in themselves -and in others- the power to decide, change, and affect their world.

Apoliticism

As Stef points out, the enlightened individualist can, and often has, political ideas and opinions.

But he rarely subordinates to a specific party.
Keep in mind that political parties are not above the group dynamics we described thus far, and often morph into ideologies and echo chambers.

If the enlightened individualist joins a political party as an activist, he maintains his critical thinking and intellectual independence from the various politburos.

Utilitarianism

Similar to utilitarianism, enlightened individuals look at "value-exchange accounting" and what maximizes individual well-being.

The difference is in the boundaries they set.
By putting individuals and their basic rights first, individualists couldn't care less if the total pleasure of the group comes at an unacceptably high cost to the self.

Pragmatism: Where's The Value?

The enlightened individualist has a pragmatic approach to mediates between the world, and his personal goals and interests.

He feels that asking "what's in it for me" is a fair way of approaching exchanges. And when the answer to "what's in it for me" is "not much", he feels not that he is being cynical or unfair, but that the request is manipulative and unfair.

And for the sake of clarity, this doesn't mean that the enlightened individualist only takes action when he will materially gain. Nothing could be further from the truth.
But it does mean that he approaches the world with that question, and that protects him from manipulation and abuse.
The enlightened individualist decides when to give without taking, he's not manipulated into it.

Meritocracy

By placing individual merits above all else, meritocracy well-aligns with enlightened individualism.

Enlightened individualists who are more economically aware also tend to believe that the best way to maximize value for everyone is through meritocracy that rewards capable, skilled, and value-adding individuals.

Meritocracy stands in contrast to the various calls of supporting this or that group.

Some exceptions can always apply.
"Supporting locals", for example, is often good for the individual because of the proximity rule. And it's a fair choice to pay a premium price for a locally-made product -personally, I love to "support locals" when it comes to quality food or skilled handcraft-.
However, many "calls for group-based support" are often either virtue-signaling, or covert attempts to distort the market in favor of those who add less value.

Some affirmative legislation or government intervention to "protect" this or that group are also sometimes market distortions that come at everyone's cost.

Ultimately, exceptions to meritocracy for the enlightened individualist are based on individual and personal like/dislikes, or quality of service, and not on group affiliation.

Capitalism

Individualists recognize that capitalism harnesses the power of collaboration, while encouraging individualistic pursuits of success.

The "magic" of capitalism is that, through voluntary exchange, people benefit others by benefiting themselves. Such as, capitalism allows for win-win while leveraging human's darker drives and motives (note: regulations and legal system also help to keep those selfish drives within win-win exchanges, or to remove the most predatory players).

Enlightened individualists reject communism -unless it's voluntary communism in a community of free-choosing individuals-.
By putting the collective first and by giving all the power to a small circle of technocrats, communism is in natural antithesis to enlightened individualism (plus: what goes against human nature doesn't work well).

Individualists are also suspicious of high levels of socialism and redistributions, as they can suffocate individual pursuits, and turn into politicians' power tools for acquiring and keeping power -money for votes-.

Individualism is Not...

To avoid confusion:

1. It's not unrestrained or selfish individualism

As a social species our well-being, in large part, depends on others.

The enlightened individual knows that, respects that, and supports civic values and collaboration among unrelated individuals.

Enlightened individualists might even decide to put their own life at risk.
It's just very unlikely that it's going to be for someone else's war, oil, glory, or bankrupt ideals.
Instead, valuing their own life and time, they carefully choose what's worth their support.

2. It's not "acceptance of selfishness"

Social success is based on value exchange, not unrestrained selfishness.

Enlightened individualists are shrewd social operators, and they tend to look out for, and avoid, overly selfish individuals.

3. It's not bashing, ignoring, or feeling ashamed for one's background

Bashing, swearing off, or being ashamed of one's background is fake individualism.

It's the equivalent of rebelling against the judge authority: it seems empowered, but it stems from dependency.

Enlightened individualists are not defined by their background, so they feel no need to bash it, or to take distance.

I like Madonna's example here.
We both come from "Abruzzo", a rural region with no limelight.
Madonna refused to visit or acknowledge her background in fear and shame of what it said about her.
Me, I'm glad I grew up in the green.
But overall, it just doesn't define me, so I feel no need to either distance myself, or boast about it.

4. It's not about refusing any "sense of belonging"

Some enlightened individualists were idealists to begin with.
And they neither support nor are very comfortable with endless cynicism.

They're also happy to be part of groups and to feel a sense of belonging.
They just do so more critically, and while maintaining their individuality.

5. It's not about endless pragmatism, rationality, and rejection of all feelings and romance

There is no contradiction between high romance and high individualism.

As a matter of fact, there might be a positive correlation.
Romance and relationships are highly relevant to the self.

We can extend "romance" to include all dionysiac expressions of irrationality, as well as all types of emotion-based relationships.
The enlightened individualists enjoy the greatness of humans beyond themselves. So they value other humans, and human connections.

6. It's not about avoiding higher ideals

Not all ideals per se are necessarily wrong or bad.

It's about which ideals, and how are they used.

Indeed, ideals such as individual freedoms, self-development, and self-expression underpin enlightened individualism.

6.2. You can use higher ideals to influence others

Remember:

> What's potentially harmful, is is also potentially highly effective

The enlightened individualist can strategically leverage intrinsic motivation and idealism to achieve certain goals. As a matter of fact, we might argue that one of the tasks of good leadership is to create a "sense of us", which is a non-pragmatic, a higher ideal.

As we've mentioned, it's not that all ideals are bad, and leveraging a feeling of in-group bonding can be a good thing for the leader, as well as for the group members.

Similarly, remember that you can leverage group-related bonding to facilitate the achievement of your personal goals, including your social and relationship goals.
Many people are more comfortable with those whom they feel as "in-group", so it's actually a very smart strategy to frame you two as similar -or "in the same group"-.

7. It's not about "suspending judgment"

"Not judging others", "we're all the same", or "never apply general tendencies to decision making" are meaningless values.

Inborn differences, obviously, are real.
And some of these inborn differences are relevant to and within different groups.

But the enlightened individualist considers a crucial variable that seems to escape most people these days, and that is "variance".
Such as, how individuals differ from other individuals within their groups.

As a rule of thumb, the higher the variance, the less you can assume population-level traits to individuals.

In some groups though, the variance around some relevant traits is low.
Or, at least, you can find some important commonalities within the group.

In those cases, it's safer to pass group-level judgments onto individuals. And to start from certain assumptions of what an individual might be like can make sense, and make you more effective in life.

Also, in cases when we're not dealing with individuals, but only with groups, it can make sense to group bigger, high-variance groups together.
Gender is a good example: there is huge variance within genders.
Yet, because of the biological differences, it can be a rational and valid approach to discuss gender-level differences or tendencies. And especially so when related to biological differences.

In short: the enlightened individualist puts the individual first once they meet one, but that doesn't mean they ignore the group of belonging. And especially not when the group of belonging can provide valid information about someone.

7.2. It's not about ignoring groups and group-level traits (immigration policy)

Some political pundits might warp enlightened individualism for political agendas.

For example, they might say that it's a moral duty to allow free immigration, and that we cannot forbid individuals from entering a country because group-level stereotypes do not determine individual behavior.

That is partially true.

But unluckily, that is exactly a case where looking at the group might tell you little about the individuals, but still make sense from a policy perspective when applied to large numbers.
Remember: the enlightened individual is a realist, and he recognizes groups can differ, and culture has an impact. Some cultures and religions make it more unlikely for individuals to integrate, and it can be fair to curb immigration for group-level concerns.

8. It's not about "going at it alone"

People and relationships empower.
And they're also one of the most important factors in what psychologist Martin Seligman calls a "good life"
The enlightened individualist cares and takes care of his social relationships.

9. It's not about bashing those who self-sacrifice

Some examples here negatively framed individuals who sacrificed personal interests for ideals.

But the enlightened individual actually likes idealists and sometimes even admires them.
Their beef is more with the people who manipulate them.

In many ways, this article is written for those souls striving for more than just themselves: so that they don't get duped into fighting and investing for what's not worth fighting for.
In a way, this whole website is for them.

How to Be An Empowered Individualist

So, finally:

1. Iconoclasm: Destroy Your Own Heroes

You cannot be empowered as long as you think someone else is "above you".

So, in the beginning, iconoclasm is the name of the game.

Take your heroes, the biggest names in self-help, in your industry, in your favorite sport… And start looking for reasons why they're bad people.

That's not the end game, of course.
Next, you want to look at them as just people. Later, you may still think of them as great people, people who accomplished hugely and that you respect and admire.
But never worship.

1.2. Internalize Any Great Is "Just Another Person" -and you may even do better-

In the boxing world, Mike Tyson had a reputation for "animalistic ferocity".

The videos on YouTube about Tyson's super-human and unbeatable skills are endless.

People LOVE looking at exrtemely talented men and think how they're different from anyone else. And Tyson WAS different than most men, and a supremely, skilled and naturally talented boxer.
But he was a human, and certainly not unbetable.
Unluckily, most people who think in terms of "super-human" also think in terms of "unbeatable".
And until you think of anyone as "super human", they will stay unbetable *(for you!).

There comes the next extraordinary man instead who thinks of them as just another human being and guess what…
Those are the only men with a champion's mindset.
And they may as well become the new champions.

When Holyfield looked at Tyson fighting he didn't think "he's an unbeatable animal".
He thought "if he can do it, so can I".
Guess what happened? Holyfield beat Tyson.

Similarly:

When everyone in the MBA referred to Michael Jordan as "Black Jesus" there was one kid who didn't think he was "Jesus".
And guess who was the only one who brought the game to Michael Jordan? Exactly that one kid who didn't think Jordan was unreachable in any way.

Listen to him, it's quite enlightening:

> Average players: We call him black Jesus
> Kobe: Black Jesus? WTF? I'm gonna call him Mike, and when I face him, we're gonna go at it (as equals)

This is the only possible mindset to reach the top.
And the short's title is a good mantra, too: losers pedestalize, winners humanize.

2. Start From Narcissism

OK, so now you have no more Gods above you.

Who are you going to place on that pedestal, then?

Easy:

YOU will be on your own pedestal.

Psychologist Craik Malkin says that a touch of narcissism, from 4 to 6 on a 1 to 10 scale, is good.

He says that:

> The vast majority of healthy people do feel a little special, even if only privately. They are more optimistic, happier and more consistently confident than people on the lower end of the scale.

For our purposes, you can go higher on that scale as long as you'll be able to move past it, and add the crucial mindsets we talk about here.

The required development is similar to the "divine child" in the popular self-development book "King, Warrior, Magician, Lover".
The divine child harbors full confidence in his infinite individual rights and potential.

Go back to that Steve Jobs' quote: the world is made by people that are no smarter than you.
Albeit that by itself might not classify as narcissism, it signals some strong belief in one's own power and abilities.
It's like going back to that divine child with infinite possibilities of changing the world.

Note: you might already be past this stage, and high self-esteem folks might not need it.

3. Move to "Enlightened Narcissism"

To become a king, the divine child must first avoid the pitfalls of high narcissism.

Moore and Gilette say that the divine child must be careful not to become a "high-chair tyrant". And he avoids the pitfall by learning that the people and the world do not exist to serve and glorify him.
In TPM's parlance, we'd say that he must:

- Move past entitlement mentality
- Learn the social exchange rule, and that to get, he must focus on giving
- Develop an antifragile ego
- Become a man worthy of being a leader
- … Plus all the mindsets and strategies we talk about here

Also, check out "reflecting on mortality".

Albert Bernstein, Ph.D. and clinical psychologist, makes a similar point.
He says that narcissists go places… As long as they grow and as long as they learn social skills, politics, persuasion and, as well, the value of hard work.
I quote him:

> The narcissist who drops being special and instead works his ass off to become special, those are the narcissists who succeed.
> Bernstein, 2000

Becoming a successful narcissist means retaining the high self-esteem, and individualism… While otherwise moving past narcissism.

Let's call that new stage "enlightened narcissism".

"Enlightened narcissism" is less about feeling (special), and more about doing (things that actually do make you special).

4. Start From Cynicism

Same as above.

Starting from cynicism will cure many of the sheep's pitfalls, as well as protect you from manipulation and the most harmful pulls of idealism.

Same movie as the manipulative marine earlier.
This time, see how a cynic avoids the pitfall:

> Idealist: this is our chance to do something, to be part of history. Communism is moving in everywhere
> Cynic: oh yeah sure Ronnie, where, I don't see them. I'm gonna take care of number one

However, the "cynic cure" comes with its own side effects.
As much as Tom Cruise was a naive man, I wouldn't consider his friend a "great guy" and neither would I want him as a friend.

To avoid the overly cynic, selfish, and nihilist pitfalls, you'll move to:

5. Move to “Enlightened Cynicism”

In this stage:

You’re still aware of manipulation, power dynamics, and people’s darker motives.
And you have a healthy, skeptical approach that wonders about second motives and people’s veracity.

However, you’re also aware of the magnificence of human beings, as well as how great it is to build good relationships with them.
You know that relationships carry some dangers -and you take protective measures-, but that they are also some of the things that make life worth living.
You know that collaboration is risky, but also that it’s human collaboration that truly changes the world.

> Life Strategy: The Enlightened Collaborator

6. Accept Your Selfish Drives: They’re Potentially Good

Selfishness in the right doses is good and healthy.

Collaboration developed because it proved good for the individuals who collaborated for win-win (Ridley, 1996).
Hence, collaboration and selflessness are born and rooted in self-interest.

Some argue there is no altruism without self-interest. But the main point for us is that it’s possible, and very common, to be value-givers while being self-interested.
As a matter of fact, giving value while pursuing self-interest is one of the main goals of high-quality individuals.

Selfishness-shaming is also a corrupt -or even manipulative– value.
Don’t fall for it: selfishness can often -and often is- channeled into win-win far more easily than selflessness is.

Also read Peter’s great take on it:

- Aristotele’s enligthend self-interest

7. Learn to Be Comfortable Alone

In male dating advice, there is a concept called “neediness”.

Neediness relates to “needing” a woman and/or to being emotionally rewarded and validated by a woman.

It’s a good concept, and the exact same applies to groups.

The best way to enter groups and collaborate with others is doing so from a place of no-neediness, and high value.
And to find your high-value you, you might have to learn to walk alone first.

Quoting this website:

> You will never find your unique voice if all you do is singing someone else’s tune

Social Nihilistc Starting Point: You're Alone

Similar to narcissism and cynicism, it might be helpful to start from a mild form of nihilism.

In this case, to accept that you're ultimately on your own, that people are self-interested, and that your own family would leave you within the right circumstances.

8. Experience & Join the Most Disparate Groups

Enter different groups, pick-up some interests, socialize with random people, and approach them with an open mind and a learner's mindset.

Once you've been part of different groups you will realize that all have:

1. Some good things
2. Some limitations and none of them can -or should- be your "be all, end all"
3. Deep similarities: humans are similar no matter what group they belong to, including deep similarities between genders, "races", nationalities, etc. (also see: moving beyond intercultural communication)

Once you experience, realize, and internalize the above 3 truths, both jingoistic pride and out-group debasement will start sounding petty and narrow-minded.
That's when you start becoming a member of the human race, a humanist, and a higher-flying eagle.

8.2. Work On An Open Mind

A part of me hates the "open mind" mantra as it's often associated not to a true open mind, but to left-wing, socialist ideals.

Yet, it might be true that conservatives tend to be more close-minded when it comes to groups and belonging.

BUT, "open mind" is apolitical.
And it is an important aspect of enlightened individualism.

When you're open-minded you're more open to considering the limitations of your group, as well as seeing the merits, the beauty, and the advantages of any other group -including the one that "your" group is often pitched against-.

Open-mindedness also shows in abundance mentality.
Since they feel they can move or join any group as they please, enlightened individualists see other groups' success as more opportunities for them.
Small-minded individuals instead, invested in a specific group and with a more fixed worldview, feel that other people's success threatens them.

Albeit "open mind" might largely be genetic, much can be done to increase it, for example:

8.3. Gain Perspective: Put Things in Larger Contexts

Many higher ideals derive much of their power from the "infinity trap".

But when we realize how meaningless "infinity" is, and that life is about constant motion, many of our emotional investments lose power.
Going to war for a border dispute, or keeping the "empire" united loses meaning when you realize borders are constantly shifting.

History as a discipline offers many of these lessons.
When you travel, do some tours to learn the history of the place you're visiting.
You will soon realize that humans have been moving and roaming around from the beginning of time. Hence, all geography-based groups, “race” and “lineage” will start making little sense.

And that’s one big step towards open-mindedness.

It can also help to put yourself in perspective, which is also helpful to escape the narcissist trap.
See:

- How reflecting on your mortality empowers you

8.4. Don’t Allow Others to “Group You”

Many seek to put you into a collectivist box.

Say, for example, “the Italian guy”, or “the black guy”, or “the conservative guy”.
And when you allow them to put you in a collectivist box, they will pass group-level traits, generalizations, and stereotypes onto you.

It’s not that these people are mean, it’s just that they don’t know any better.
And it’s easier for them to “label” you, rather than learn about you as an individual, or deal with the unknown that you represent.

The enlightened individualist is not cool with that, and takes steps to avoid it.

Both practically and mentally.
See an example against a subtle, social-level covert power move against colored folks:

> Black Folks: Reclaim Your Power Against White Virtue-Signaling

This is one of the, if not the only effective ways to avoid racial conflicts.

9. Assess Characters: Leaders & Members

Assessing characters well is foundational to a happy and successful life.

And it’s also foundational to decide:

1. Which groups deserve your membership and support
2. What leaders deserve you as a follower

You want to look both at the leader(s), and the group members.

Some good questions to assess leaders:

- How is he as a person?
- What is he trying to achieve, and where do our interests diverge?
- What does he ask, and what does he give?

If he promotes ideologies or worldviews, ask what his biases might be.
If he tells you, how you ought to behave, ask yourself “does he walk the talk”? And “does he have skin in the game”?

For example, when politicians send men to war, none go to war themselves, and almost none have children in active engagement.
That’s no skin in the game, which is a major red flag of a sucker’s trade.
You can also apply the same principles for marketers and sellers: did they walk the talk, or did they achieve success selling others how to be successful (paradox of practice, see example)?

And if he asks for extreme sacrifices, some Machiavellianism and enlightened cynicism can help you properly assess whether that extreme sacrifice is even needed.

See “extreme leadership” and “military manipulation”:

> Great Leadership Is Great Manipulation: Jocko Willlink Case Study

Analyzing Leaders & Mission Is Both A Right & Duty

Properly assessing authority can be a moral obligation for the enlightened individualist.

Quoting from the “Start Here” page:

> The worst cases of “following orders” without questioning authority slaughtered millions. The best cases, only killed their souls.

If you’re going to land your support to someone or to a certain mission, it’s your duty to make sure that the leader and mission are value-adding.
Are they good for you? Are they good for the world?

Also, look at the people around you.
Is it a group of smart self-starters, independent thinkers, and high-value folks going places?
Or is it a bunch of mindless sheep?
You might also apply the same analysis of “group members” to whole societies, and see if the beaten path fits your mold.

Great pic, but don’t misread it: there is nothing inherently wrong with following society’s most common path. But if it’s not to the individualist’s liking, he steps aside.

9.2. Quit Groups With Poor Leaders

If the leader is a poor leader, leave the group.

Or take the group over.

If you quit, maybe take some of the good guys with you, it's a win-win, plus a win for society.
If you're not in the position to leave or take over, you gotta play Machiavellian. Don't show any sign of rebellion, but mentally disengage, and pursue your interests.

In some cases, active resistance might be called for.

One of the best representations of enlightened individualism

Bucking and fighting groups or leaders can be costly to you, so you must think it over, and you might want to include the ethics and morals of not taking action.

Note:

Assessing authority is different than "rebelling" -often a child-like reaction to a judge role– or "undermining the leader" -often a bad political strategy-.
Assessing authority means that you are also open to accepting value-adding authority, leadership, or mentorship.
And if you reject it, you better proceed smartly and strategically.

10. Quit All Groups That Limit Your Personal Power

In general, quit all value-taking groups, and disavow all leaders that don't directly contribute to your well-being.

I'd like to focus on one case study because of how common it is:

10.2. Quit "Social Complainers" (Feminized Society & Patriarchal Society)

Enlightened individualists don't pay much attention to social trends and "cultural zeitgeist".

And least of all, they waste their time fighting against it.

Why not?
Because:

1. His time is valuable
2. It's high investment, little returns (chances of making a difference are slim)
3. He'd have to join movements that often act as echo chambers, with plenty of bitter members (scratch with the turkeys)

4. Cultural trends don't really change people's psychology all that much
5. Cultural trends don't really impact you all that much.

Remember, the enlightened individualist sees himself bigger than groups, culture, or socially mandated values.
The enlightened individualist believes that, even if society was really stacked against him, he can still be the exception.
And that is wholly up to him.
So rather than changing society, difficult and with little returns, he works on himself.

The Modern Social Complainers

Social complainers vary with time.

Today, many of them in the West happen to be lined around gender camps.

Male-only "self-help" complains of "femininized society" -or "gynocentric society", to sound more erudite-.

Social complainers love to paint a dire future you can't escape from. If you wanna give up all your personal power… Follow them.
Feminist movements are the same of course, and complain about the "patriarchy".

Those echo chambers might (both) be (somewhat) right.
After all, the TPM community saw elements of a "feminized society" and this website showed that many men gain when women are marginalized -see workplace gender conflict and gender conflict-.
But that's not the point.

The issue with those approaches is that they over-focus on society.
And social complainers ignore individual power, as well as the inter-individual relationships that have little to do with "society".

Of course society does have some repercussions on the individual -and on you-. Yet, how much society affects you largely depends on your individual mindsets, attitude, and skills.

Yes, society might espouse this or that value you disagree with.
So what?
You're not "society".

And in your relationships, you can form your own enclave of like-minded people.

After all, in the middle of the most repressive patriarchies, women managed to have men bend over backward for them.
And in the middle of the most matriarchal societies, plenty of men thrived and acquired power.
So quit the social complainer groups, and focus on being a thriving individual.

And as a general mindset: focus less on the rules, and more on being the exception to those rules.

Some more categories of individuals who are too focused on the social dimension to the detriment of the empowered self include:

The Social Complotists

Social complotists (mis)interpret all major events as manipulated by some mysterious power that hides behind the scenes, almost always to the detriment of the masses.

The disempowering frame is that the complotist, and you, are almost always part of that credulous, powerless mass.

Personally, I think that not all complotist theories are the same. Some are more credible than others but, as a rule of thumb, most complotists you meet in your everyday life are not very logical, informed, or power-aware to add real value.

More important than what I think though is how the enlightened individual generally approaches complots. And whether or not the enlightened pays attention or believes in complot theories he is not bothered or disempowered by them.
Why not?
Because the enlightened individualist believes that he can always carve out his niche of power and he can always find a way to achieve his goals.
And even if he can't, his focus is not on the stories, or even realities of the complot, but in what he can do as an individual.

The Social Philosophers

These guys love to discuss larger social trends.

In our current era, they like to discuss about the rise of China, the "death of the West", or the cyclical trends of how civilizations rise and fall -and somehow, it always seems like we're on a downward trajectory-.

These discussions often are based on little or no evidence (low in science) and little or no observation (2/3 of the knowledge pillars are missing).
Depending on who you're talking to, they can also be opinions of rather misinformed and historically ignorant folks, making their theories and "predictions" utterly meaningless.
And as Steven Pinker said: "The one prediction coming out of futurology that is undoubtedly correct is that in the future, today's futurologists, will look silly".

In any case, the enlightened individualist is not too stoked, afraid, or engrossed by social philosophies and predictions.
Again, he believes he can succeed and meet his own goals independently of what society does. And to ensure that he succeeds, he knows better than getting lost and disempowered by the predictions of gloom and doom.

11. Focus on Self-Development

Enlightened individualism is a journey of self-development.

The focus is on the self.
Once you develop the self, then you can join any group you want, and you'll be able to contribute some real value.

And you'll find out that you most often end up leading those groups.

With plenty of bias, TPM believes that this website's approach is particularly helpful.

12. Cut Out (Mass) Media Consumption

In simple terms, the agenda setting theory says that:

> Media chooses for you what's relevant and important to pay attention to.

I find the theory to be an accurate description of how things work.
To quip a popular trope of the early 2020s, it doesn't even matter whether news are "fake" or not. All* kinds of media decide for you what you should be paying attention to, and what you should not be paying attention to.
And guess what's not high on the list of priorities? You! The media is about taking time away from yourself, to distribute to all kinds of random things.

All kinds of random things that, icing on the cake, are irrelevantly low proximity to you (see later).

And of course, enlightened individualists are not cool with that.
By putting themselves first, enlightened individualists naturally avoid wasting too much time on random news.
And when it comes to deciding what's important, enlightened individualists decide for themselves what they should pay attention to, and what's worth spending time and (emotional) resources on.

Refuse Having an Opinion

From a Machiavellian power perspective, there is no unbiased information.

Everyone has an agenda, and the spin they put on events reflects their agenda.

Discussing events is rarely in the service of exchanging opinions or, God forbid, reaching the truth. Discussions are a battleground for control.

What do they want to control?

Well, one, the narrative of "what things mean" (frame).
And then, of course, you.
Every pundit and everyone with an opinion wants to recruit you. They want you to agree with them, follow their doctrine, follow them or, worse, follow (or hate) whoever it is they like (or hate).

And what's in it for you?

At best, nothing.
But more commonly, you at least pay an opportunity cost price.
With that time, you could have worked on yourself, met your GF/BF, look for a GF/BF, or… Anything else that actually adds value to your life.

So it would seem like an easy win to refuse having an opinion on anything, but, alas…

It's hard for many to not have an opinion.
So they get suckered into news that have no relevance to them, wasting time developing opinions of things that they aren't going to influence anyway.

The solution?
If you can't avoid being shoved information your way, at least avoid having an opinion.

Unplug From the "Endless Outrage Machine"

Outrage is the name of the news game these days.

Outrage is a power game, it's a way of saying "look at me, I matter".
But it's useless.
Here are some enlightened examples of outrage reframing:

- Police shoots a man who happened to be black? Tragic, but I don't know the whole story
- How bad is it the UK left the EU, who they think they are? I'm not sure it's "bad", and I don't have time to develop an informed opinion
- How much does the government suck to force us to wear masks? Indeed I hate coercion, but I'd rather talk about where we can move next

In short: things happen. And they always will. Refuse getting dragged into debates as if they were all-important to your life, because they often aren't.
Instead, suspend opinion on everything that is of no immediate relevance to you, and focus on yourself.

Pull, Don't Push

The simple solution?

Switch all "push" media and mass media off, and limit your intake of media to "pull".
"Pull" means that you decide where, when, and if you look up for information.
For example, good "pull" means that you sometimes go online to a few selected magazines that you trust for rational and balanced reporting, see if there is anything you're interested in, and then go back to your real life.

Since media focuses on threats and continuously seeks sensationalism, mass media consumers also tend to be neurotics, with an external locus of control, who live in fear.
They are "low-power", "high-emotional involvement", the worst quadrant:

	LOW POWER	HIGH POWER
HIGH INVEST	Neurotic Emotionally over invested on things he cannot control. • Media consumer • Passive, seeks reassurance • Follower GOAL: Increase power to affect change, or stop focusing low proximity issues. Read "Enlightened Individualism".	Visionary Takes action and affects change in the world based on his emotions, feelings, and ideals. • (Social) media personality • Activist, seeks to change • Charismatic leader GOAL: Make sure the rational and logical analyses are in lockstep with emotional and idealistic drives.
LOW INVEST	Apathetic Low power to affect people and circumstances, but doesn't care to. • Gamer • Stoner • "Chill" about everything Goal: A life of (mild) hedonism is fine. Not everyone must pursue greater goals.	Strategic Goal-driven and focused, but without emotions and/or ideals. • Marketer • Machiavellian (potentially) • Effective leader Goal: Some passion makes for a fuller life. Strategic passion and ideals also motivate others: most people aren't "cold".

Example: Pushing War News

Push and pull apply beyond mass media.

There is plenty of "push" in the digital world and in modern smartphones.

I'm updating this article as my newly bought Pixel started pushing news on me.
The latest one was on the Israeli and Palestinian war.

My answer to the "Israeli war" push notification?

"F*ck that!", while I immediately deactivate the annoying service.

And not because I'm indifferent to people's suffering, but because… What am I gonna do about it from my room?
This situation is low proximity to me (see later).

To me, it feels both useless and wrong to consume media about wars if I'm not gonna do anything about it.
It's almost immoral.
As enlightened individualists, we must focus on what we can do something about.

As a matter of fact, passively consuming media is a selfish act of time waste.
The most ethical thing you can do in life is to focus on what you can have a positive impact on.

And the more Palestinians and Israelis read an article like this, the less they'll be to want to fight that war.

Your Enlightned Agenda Setting

You don't need anyone to set your agenda of what's important.
Here's a sample outline of "enlightened agenda setting" for you:

1. Yourself (self-development, health, what makes you happy, etc. etc.)
2. Your goals
3. Your relationships with real people in your life

This is connected to “I put my interests before that of random people & things”.
At the core, consuming media means that random events and people are more important than you are.

This dynamic is painfully evident with celebs news and updates, where you are taking time away from your life, to give it to some random people you don’t even know.
Enlightened individualists don’t spend time updating themselves on what the latest celeb is up to. Instead, enlightened individualists use mass media and social time to work on their life, and to develop real relationships with real people they actually know.

13. Move to “Enlightened Belonging”

Here’s the great part:

Enlightened individualism is not about swearing off “belonging”, groups, ideals, or emotional investment in others.

Once you learn to be part of groups without investing your ego in them, you are free to enjoy the sense of belonging -and even pride-.

You might call this switching “going from ego-fusion to an enlightened belonging”.

In simpler terms, we might call it “cool belonging” -as opposed to “hot”-.
Rather than being “proud of being part of X, which defines me”, you are “happy of being part of X, while maintaining my individuality and rationality”.

Enlightened belonging also avoids the “us Vs them’ trap.
It’s a “pride” that says “I’m part of this group, and I’m proud of it because we’re great and I love these people, and what we stand for. Maybe you guys from that other group can also be cool. I hope so”.

See more here.

13.2. ... Dribbling All of Enlightenment Impostors

Some leaders or public figures co-opt enlightened ideals.

They take what sounds like enlightened ideals, and put them into the service of parochialism:

> Jocko Willink: Look, when I served in the military, I served alongside every race, every color, every creed, with men and women from the most diverse imaginable socio-economic background from all over the country, and we in the military set those differences aside…

To begin with, the diversity is bogus as, for one, they’re all from the USA.

And most important, that “soar higher” message is a fake call to enlightenment.

It’s about enticing you outside certain groups, only to join another individual-repressive, individual-castrating group.
Just keep on listening a few more seconds to that video, and see what’s in store for you.

14. Ruthlessly Focus on Maximum Impact Area

Let’s quickly introduce a few related concepts now:

14.2. Apply the “Gravitational Law”

Gravitational law:

> The importance and relevance of an event or individual to you is inversely proportional to its value and > distance

In simpler words: the closer and more valuable someone or something is to you, the more relevant it is.
The farther removed and valueless it is, the less relevant it is.

There are two related concepts in the gravitational law: the distance (proximity law), and the potential value to you (related to value accounting).

Both are important, but proximity is often more important, and where people stumble most often (see mass media, fandom, sports fan, etc.).
Read here how to apply the proximity law to your social strategy.

Let's take a previous example now, the "slave mindset" as related to ranks and hierarchies, and let's filter it through "gravitational law" to see how the enlightened individualist adapts.

Your immediate boss is high proximity.
So if your immediate boss is a bad human being, that does have an impact on you and you do have an impact on him.
Furthermore, staying under a bad boss does say something about you, since high-quality folks who demand a lot from the people around them wouldn't stay long under poor bosses.
So, in this case, the enlightened individualist expands effort to change the situation, or remove himself from the situation.
And once he finds a good boss, it's not a case of identity projection anymore if he feels good about his boss because he has personal agency and he made it happen.

But if your elected prime minister is poor, carry on because unless you're in politics, he's low proximity, you had little agency on his election, and what he says or does say nothing about you.
Alternatively, if you want to affect political change, then you must change your life focus, and go into politics.

14.3. For Personal Effectiveness Focus on "High Mutual Pull"

Relevant to the gravitational law are the concepts of personal agency and personal affect:

- Personal agency: this is your personal "gravitational pull", your power to change the situation for the better. Higher proximity usually means higher personal power to change things
- Personal affect: this is the gravitational's pull effect from others, the power of the situation to change you, including emotionally, and to positively "move" you. Higher proximity usually means higher personal affect

Your personal interests and passions are also part of your personal affects, since you're more sensitive there.
For maximum effect the enlightened individualist zeroes in on the overlap between what he's affected by, and what he can affect:

Please note that albeit what's closer is easier to affect, this is not to say you must necessarily ignore all events and people that are not physically close to you.
Quite the opposite, actually. It means that if an event is important to you, but you're not close enough to affect change, then you must rise up to the challenge.
Either get closer, or find a way to increase your personal power to affect change.

By only investing in what matters to you, and what you have control on, you increase personal power, returns, and efficiency.
The focus on gravitational together with the quest for the continuous betterment of life is how the greatest individuals of all time advanced our civilization.

14.4. For Life Success, Focus on "Maximum Impact Area"

Finally, to maximize the chances of life success, you can add a third element when deciding what to focus on:

What others also care about.

As per social exchange, when you can give others what they want, you can also ask for equal value back.

This third element adds the second "win" to the first, more selfish "win", to realize" win-win".

In simple terms, we can consider noise and distraction that we need to ruthlessly cut out, everything that falls outside of these three spheres:

1. What you can change
2. What you want to change
3. What people want to have changed

What is inside, is what changes the world for the better.

The Hero's Journey

As we've seen, enlightened individualism is a journey.

Some of the paradigm shifts might require leaving comfortable and familiar small ponds and going through challenging life experiences.

There are also some mentally taxing dichotomies to negotiate -cynic pragmatism VS idealism- and some challenging personality paths to complete -from "me, me, me narcissism" to validation-independent antifragile ego-.

After all, enlightened individualism offers not easy answers and a list of rules, but a mindset and personality to grow into.
And that's always a more challenging task.

Ulysses ties himself to a mast to resist the sirens' callings and stay on his hero's journey

In a way, enlightened individualism is a hero journey of self-development.
The various psychological crutches are there to tempt you into an easier path.
But if you want to make it to hero level, you must remain steadfast in your focus on self-empowerment.

The path might also be a case of what we sometimes refer to as a "peak without a mountain", a journey rather than a destination.
Luckily, the journey is often its own reward.
And no matter how far you reach, every single step is a step forward.

Joining the Eagles

This website uses the allegory of "flying with the eagles", VS "scratching with the turkeys".

And we invite readers to soar with the eagles.

The englightned individualist is an eagle.

The eagle-individualist, self-reliant and demanding more of himself, steps outside of the fray, and looks at everything from a higher vantage position.

In Nietzche's philosophy, the enlightened individualist is the true "ubermensch", moving fluidly, free, fierce, and unrestrained through space and time.

And in relation to the "big fish – small pond trap", the enlightened individualist is the fish who escapes the small ponds, and feels at home in the blue ocean.
The free fish in the blue ocean is the aquatic equivalent of the eagle in the sky.

And now, congratulations, you've done until here.

The next step is on you.
Are you ready to soar?

Machiavellianism: The Psychology of Manipulation

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Machiavellianism" (2017) is a book on Machiavellianism and the psychology of manipulation.
The author defines the book as "the first comprehensive psychological book on Machiavellianism since Christie and Geis, and he might be right. "Machiavellianism" is the best overview of empirical findings on Machiavellianism available as of today (2021).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Tamás Bereczkei graduated as a Biologist, and became a Doctor of Science in Psychology. He leads the Evolutionary Psychological Research group at the University of Pécs. Besides Machiavellianism, his main research areas include social intelligence, altruism and cooperation, and mate choice.

Machiavellian: A Description

The author describes a Machiavellian as "one who uses others as a means of achieving one's own goals".

He provides a longer -and more negatively-framed- description in the preface:

> Such individuals disrespect moral principles, deceive their fellow beings, and take advantage of others' frailty and gullibility. They take advantage of others by using them to achieve their own goals while their victims are not in the least aware of being used. They have a penetrating, rational and sober mind undisturbed by emotions. At times we cannot help being enchanted by their talent even though we know they misuse it.

Personally, I think that, one way or another, almost everyone "uses others" to achieve something.
So the real question is if the final outcome is win-win, or win-lose.

Plus, as Stef reminds us, some more considerations based on past outcomes and totalitarianism can enter into the calculation.

The takes a slightly judgmental stance on Machiavellianism. It's understandable in a way, but I don't fully agree with it.

The 5 Machiavellian Traits

Low Machs may show one or some of the following traits from time to time.

Machiavellians instead embody all five characteristics simultaneously and that, says the author, pose a danger to others (Slaughter 2011).

1. Manipulation

The author says that Machiavellians are first and foremost manipulators.
But they are also careful, so they are not always obviously manipulative and callous. They are tactically manipulative and selfish, and they draw from a vaster toolset of manipulative techniques.

High Machs also lie more, and feel less guilty and remorseful (Murphy 2012).
However, again, high Machs are not necessarily constant liars. They're ore opportunistic liars, or call it "expedient lying".
Still, that doesn't necessarily mean they hold sincerity as a value.
Says the author:

> Machiavellians aim to appear sincere whereas non-Machiavellians hold sincerity important in its own right.

2. Amorality

Machiavellians pursue self-interest, and since they are not bound by morality -"they can easily separate themselves from moral precepts"-, that pursuit can sometimes lead to unethical behavior.

In social exchanges, they feel they are not bound by reciprocity or "fairness".

In a classic sociological experiment on trust and theft, high Machs were more likely to cause loss to their partners in the trust condition, and stole from those who had previously shown trust towards them.
By contrast, low Machs did not steal in the trust condition, and resigned substantial material gain rather than violate fairness and responsibility norms.

In a sample of 1343 subjects, Jonason and colleagues found a negative relationship between Mach scores and the importance assigned to values such as Harm, Fairness, Ingroup, and Authority.
Machs' results were similar to those obtained for psychopathy but different from narcissism (that showed no significant relationship with any of the moral values mentioned).

However, Machiavellians don't always act immorally.
Machiavellians' amorality is opportunistic.
For example, not when the risks are too high compared to the potential benefits, and not when there is nothing to be gained.

- Shit-testing for weakness

Says the author:

> They quite often provoke others, continuously testing where the red lines are in their relationships (Gunnthorsdottir et al. 2002). When they feel weakness or lenience in others, they launch an attack with no > hesitation.

3. Cynicism

Machiavellians are suspicious of others, and attribute negative traits to people, including hypocrisy, malevolence, and lying.

Since they have a dog-eat-dog worldview, Machiavellians cheat out prevention, because they think others would cheat anyway (McIllwain 2003).

Machiavellians, who usually are open and frank about their nature, see others -and especially low Machs- as weak for being insincere and hypocrites.
And that makes it fair to take advantage of that weakness.

In Machiavellians' eyes, low Machs are not in control of their life and at the mercy of the events and people around them.
So when Machiavellians manipulate or take advantage of them, they are just being one of the many external forces that people naturally yield to.

My Note: Machs are right on something
When it comes to hypocrisy as in the discrepancy between stated moral values and behavior, sometimes they are partially right.

4. Emotional coldness

Machiavellians are "emotionally distanced" with a cognitive orientation.
They think more rationally and consider all available options and possibilities in a cold-minded manner (Pilch, 2008).

Machiavellians are very goal-oriented, and they analyze information and craft strategies to achieve that goal.
Their goals also tend to be themselves, including personal advancement, gains, and victory.

This attitude can provide Machiavellians with a big advantage in life.
Says the author:

> Their lack of doubt as well as concentration on personal goals provide them with immense advantages over others in gaining material goods and favorable positions. In contrast, low Machs are much more concerned with their network of personal relationships and with moral norms that often make them vulnerable.

And that's why I advise readers here to acquire a similar attitude in "enlightened individualism".

5. Lack of empathy

The author says that it is "very likely" that Machiavellians cannot empathize with others and put themselves in other people's shoes.

Says Tamas:

> A strong negative relationship was found between Machiavellianism and empathy scores irrespective of the specific test used to measure this ability

Given the lack of empathy, says the author, it is not surprising that "Machiavellians exhibit low levels both of helpfulness and selflessness" (Paal & Bereczkei 2007; Bereczkei & Czibor 2014).

Motives & Consequences

Expanding on the above 5 basic traits:

1. Reward-driven behavior

Machiavellians strive to win and to gain the largest profit possible.

Usually, they go for pragmatic rewards such as money, prestige or position. The author doesn't add, but probably that also includes mates.

And they tend to avoid situations where there is no obvious "what's in it for me".
Christie and Geis had noted indeed early on that Machiavellians don't put much effort into experiments that have no concrete reward.

Machiavellians show a preference for immediate rewards. In one experiment the drive to bigger payoffs led them to lose more money than Low machs.
However, the experiment had somewhat hidden risks for the higher-risk options and, importantly, Machiavellians do not go for direct and immediate rewards at any price.

And, as the author says, "Machiavellians are in many cases able to achieve success in the long term as well, (…) and they often win in situations resembling everyday life".

This is an important difference with psychopaths, which instead are more likely to lose out in the long run to their short-term, reward driven focus.

2. Different brain activity

Machiavellians show different brain activity when placed in fMRI machines.

For example, when cooperation is expected but they can gain by cheating.
Or the opposite, in which they show increased ACC activity when their short-term interests (cheating) and long-term interests (long term win-win) conflict.

3. Pragmatism: Extrinsic rewards preferred

First, the difference:

- Extrinsic = external tangible goals/rewards, or avoiding harms and damages
- Intrinsic: internal drives such as pleasure of activity, striving for development, belonging, or serving a larger cause

Research shows that Machiavellians are mostly motivated by external factors (Fehr et al. 1992; Jones & Paulhus 2009) and to obtain external gains such as money, power, and influence.

John McHoskey found out that "Machiavellianism was positively correlated with material success whereas negatively with all intrinsic motivational factors (communion, family ties, self-love)".

4. Individual Before Collective

Machiavellians pursue individual versus community interests.

A 2014 study aptly titled "valuing myself over others" found that Machiavellianism is positively correlated with an individualistic value orientation (emphasizing autonomy, independence, and competition) and negatively correlated with collectivistic values (loyalty to the community).

Sometimes though you need some of that individual-before collective attitude to see through the manipulative propaganda:

5. Strategic Fluidity

Machiavellians are very strategic.

And they adapt to the situation.

Says the author:

> Machiavellians are not characterized by rigid thought patterns; they do not act according to some pre-existing schema, to which they would adhere at any price. Research findings reported in the past few years have clearly shown that the uniqueness of the Machiavellian character lies in tactical skills and flexible decision-making.

And:

> A cornerstone of Machiavellian strategic decision-making is the continuous weighing-up of the situational conditions.

Even during a mock business negotiation, Machiavellians used more persuasion tactics, and adapted more flexibly to the changing situation.

Machs also adapt to the situation when it comes to deceiving.
And they cheat and deceive others when the benefits of manipulation exceed the costs.
Generally, that happens when:

1. You can avoid detection
2. You won't be punished for cheating
3. You conform to community norms (or don't break them since there were no clear expectations or conditions)

Machiavellians are also able to collaborate and think long term, which means they can also succeed in environments and endeavors that require "staying power".

Machiavellians' adaptability might be one of the main reasons why many studies contradict each other, or generally fail to find strong and one-dimensional correlational patterns:

> Perhaps this behavioral complexity is what produced controversial results in some studies.

Machiavellians also adapt their strategies to the situation far more than low machs do.
For example:

> They earn large profits in social dilemma games but once the experimenter enables players to punish free-riders, they restrain their profiteering and increase the sums offered to partners to avoid punishment (Spitzer et al. 2007). In most cases, they are unwilling to help others but when they are aware of being observed by members of the community, they are at once ready to support even unknown individuals so that they maintain their prestige (or its illusion) in the group (Bereczkei, Birkas, & Kerekes 2010).

6. More Traits: Personality, Temperament, & Character

- Lower agreeableness
- Lower conscientiousness
- Higher neuroticism: but they don't let it show
- More individualistic, and a weaker sense of group orientation
- Low need for social approval

- Sensation seeking: but cannot be considered typical risk takers
- Borderline personality disorder: overlaps mostly with “identity diffusion”, as Machs are social chameleons and “fear of fusion”

Machiavellian Communication

- Persuasive lies

Machiavellians lie very persuasively, and efficiently conceal their true intentions.
In two studies Machiavellians (Exelinne, Geis & Moon 1981) found Machiavellians to be more credible than non-Machiavellians.

- Impression management

Machs do strive to make good impression.

And, in good part, they succeed.
A study found that even by simply looking at pictures, people rated high Machs in more favorable terms.
High Machs were mostly described as “smart”, “brave”, “ambitious”, “appealing”, “dominant” and “talented”. Low Machs were primarily described as “irresolute”, “sentimental”, “unintelligent”, “credulous” and “indecisive”.
And people rate high Machs higher on social attractiveness than they rate low Machs (Wilson, Near, & Miller 1996).

- Machiavellian phenotype?

Researchers gave subjects the description of an “individual manipulative for personal gains”, and the subjects picked the face which was generated from the average face of many high Mach subjects (Holtzman, 2011).

1. low Mach female; 2. high Mach female; 3. low Mach male; 4. high Mach male (Holtzman 2011)

- Telling behavioral features

My note:
This section in the book included two studies that supposedly showed how high Machs were disliked in real-life.
But I have found those studies to be misquoted, so I skip them (see the "cons" section).

Machs Can Be Very Cooperative...

… When it's good for them as well.

In an experiment of Public Goods Game each player could decide whether to keep a sum of money in their private account, or to share it in a public account.
The money in the public account would be double at the end of the game and shared among all.

The researchers expected that the presence of altruists would lead Machs to decrease their public contributions to take advantage of them.
Instead, when Machs also increased their contributions when playing with altruists.
The author speculates that Machs calculate that if they contributed small amounts to the group account, altruists might change their minds and reduce their public contributions, leading to a lose-lose turn of events for Machiavellians.

Machiavellians Have More Sex

They start earlier, and have more sexual partners.

Jonason et al. in a paper called "The dark triad: Facilitating a short-term mating strategy in men", says that Machiavellians are much more likely to change partners frequently, to prefer short-term relationships.
They show low levels of closeness, intimacy and commitment towards their partners (Ali & Chamorro-Premuzic 2010).

They are also more likely to approach dating with a more malevolent bent, and use more value-taking strategies, including making their partners drunk, or intimidate and humiliate them partner when they believe doing so will help them "score".

However, later on the author also says that Machiavellians do not confine themselves to short-term, and are as likely to enter long-term relationships.

Machs At Work: Kings of Unstructured Environments

Machs performance at work might seem like a mixed bag at first:

- Some studies show Machs doing worse

A meta-analysis with more than 43,000 subjects in 245 independent samples found that Machiavellians had a lower average income and more frequently engaged in "deviant" behavior at the workplace.

The author says it's not surprising because, in the long run, Machs cannot hide their true selves. And once the reality of who they truly are emerges, people aren't too fond of Machs.

- Some studies suggest Machs doing better

However, other studies suggest that Machs reach higher income, occupational statuses, and positions.
And that might be either because of their drive to win, or because people attribute personal qualities to Machs.

In the author's own study, top leaders had the highest scores of Machiavellianism, and there was a link between the age of the company and Mach scores at the top.
In general, the younger the company, the more Machiavellians did well.
A German study also reached the same conclusion: no advantage for Machs in tightly structured organizations. But in more loosely organized companies without clear top-management instructions, Machs were earning twice as much.

- Machs do better in unstructured environments

It seems then that Machs do better in unstructured environments, probably because those environments provide them with more opportunities for their strategies, political machinations, and manipulations.
It's a similar trend to what's been seen in the laboratory as well: whenever there was more room for maneuvers within the environment, Machs tended to do even better.

Machiavellians Are Not Evil

The author very directly asks:

Are Machiavellians evil?

And he replies:

> That would be an exaggeration. Usually they do not harm others for the sake of causing harm, and they do not find pleasure in others' suffering as opposed to psychopaths.

I don't fully agree that psychopaths all necessarily enjoy other people's suffering, but I do agree with the general point he makes.

Keep in mind that Machiavellians only act immorally when there is something to be gained (the means justify the end).
They're not hell-bent on evil.
So when there is nothing to be gained, Machiavellians might as well act morally (the end does not justify the means).

Machiavellians Seek Good Social Reputation

Machiavellians aren't very concerned with social norms, and they resist community expectations.

But they do care about people's opinions and seek to make a good impression and win others' benevolence.

In a real-life study, Machiavellians who were asked to do charity work publicly, three times as many Machiavellians agreed as compared to the private request, suggesting an effort of "pretended altruism" (my note: however, it didn't say how many more low Machs also agreed in the public condition, albeit it's implied it was less).
And the public act did have an effect: people rated the volunteer as more reliable and friendly.

Machiavellians also seem to be good at managing in-person impressions -especially when it's first impressions-:

People Like Machiavellians

An experiment for example showed that while Machiavellians are unwilling to help people in trouble when group members are not around, they are more likely to give charitable donations when they know that others will know about it.

And Machiavellians do often succeed at making a good impression.
People often judge Machiavellians to be intelligent even though research shows they're no more intelligent than others (Wilson et al. 1996). And people do consider them as being charismatic and effective leaders (Deluga 2001).

Machiavellians Might Make for Good Leaders

Bereczkei says that as leaders, Machiavellians' personal interests can overlap with collective interests.

Therefore, since it's in their interest to further their own group, they can put their Machiavellianism to good uses for the community.

That being said, while I consider it a good point, I must remain skeptical.
For more on political power dynamics see "The Logic of Political Survival".

Emotional Intelligence & "Manipulative Intelligence"

The gist is:

Machs perform poorly on emotional intelligence tests.
They might be poorer at understanding their own emotions and detecting people's emotions when nothing is at stake.
But when they have something to gain, Machs perform well -or better-, and are very effective manipulators.

When it comes to mind reading, it is possible that Machiavellians are in general average or poor mind readers. But, again, they show above-average cognitive abilities in situations offering the opportunity to manipulate others.

Emotional Coldness

- Emotional detachment

Machiavellians perform better in emotionally loaded situations such as, for example, a debate involving personal feelings and values (Geis, Weinheimer, & Berger 1970; Sullivan & Allen 1999).

Machs seem able to cast emotions aside and they devote full attention to the cognitive appraisal of the situation, focusing only on the achievement of strategic objectives.

- Impulse control and communication of emotions

Machiavellians have difficulty both in communicating their own emotions and understanding those of others.

In common with alexithymia, Machs also present "externally-oriented thinking (Al Ain et al. 2013; Jonason & Krause 2013). This means Machiavellians are rarely concerned with their internal life, do not analyze their own thoughts and feelings, and don't often rely on their imagination.

As such, Machs tend to score low on emotional intelligence tests.
But that's not the whole story (read on).

- Anxiety

The findings are mixed.
Some studies found no significant relationship between Machiavellianism and self-report measures of anxiety (e.g. STAI; Ali, Amorin, & Chamorro-Premuzic 2009). Other studies revealed a positive relationship between the two variables (Fehr et al. 1992; Al Ain et al. 2013).

Machs Fail "Normal" EI Tests

Writes the author:

> This interpretation could be generalized: high Machs find it more difficult than average to understand other's emotions, recognize the feelings or intentions reflected in the posture and facial expressions of others, and also to display difficulty in expressing and regulating their own emotions (Austin et al. 2007; Wai & Tiliopoulos 2012; Szijjarto & Bereczkei 2015; Pilch 2008; Vonk et al. 2015).

That means that Machiavellians have, or at least score, low in emotional intelligence.

Machiavellianism is also negatively related to the more broad construct of social intelligence that includes sensitivity to, and understanding and control of, social relationships.

The Problem With Most Emotional Intelligence Scales

Some authors point out issues with what emotional intelligence measures (O'Conner & Athota 2013).

The issue is that EI measures focus almost exclusively on positive emotions.
They concern traits such as "kind", "friendly" and "benevolent". Hence, it is not surprising that low Machs score high, and high Machs score low.
And once the agreeableness effect was eliminated the negative relationship between Machiavellianism and emotional intelligence disappeared.

Hot VS Cold Empathy

"Hot" empathy is what the conventional notion of empathy, referring to the ability to experience an individual's emotional state and potentially motivate the observer to help.

"Cold" empathy refers to understanding and recognizing someone else's mental state and feelings, but without enabling one to share others' emotions.
While cold empathy does not make people willing to help, it can enable people to use the information in various ways, including for taking advantage of others.

A highly empathetic person shares emotions as well -"hot" empathy-.
But the two are only weakly related, with Machs showing a low level of empathic concern but likely having a good "cold" empathy underpinning their theories of mind (read on).

Also see:

- The Wisdom of Psychopaths

Mind Reading & Theory of Mind

> Theroy of mind refers to one's ability to attribute to others mental states and contents such as desires, beliefs, intentions and emotions that may be different from one's own mental states.

Research shows that Machs either have average or below-average ability to understand other people's mental states (Paal & Bereczkei 2007; Lyons, Caldwell, & Schultz 2010; Ali et al. 2009).

The big question then is:

How can Machs successfully manipulate others with a below-average ability to recognize others' goals and emotional states?
The question hasn't been fully answered yet, but we have some partial answers at least.

One possible answer is similar to the emotional intelligence conundrum we saw above: the tests and studies used are not effective to measure Machs' abilities.
A recent experiment proposed subjects two stories: one with a conventional narrative and conventional "states".
Another one was posed in terms of manipulating and achieving goals (Szabo, Jones, & Bereczkei under publication, but probably this one here).
Results indicated that Machiavellianism was associated with increased mentalization performance in the context of manipulation.
The author says that "it seems that Machiavellians in fact recognize very accurately when others (characters in the stories in the study) manipulate or are being manipulated".
Later on, the author says that from his point of view, Machs are remarkably smart observers of human nature.

A different answer by some authors is to differentiate between the types of theories of mind: idiographic and nomothetic.
Idiographic seeks individual differences and peculiarities, while nomothetic categorizes the individual into a general "type" based on previous experience.

Manipulative Intelligence

When Machs tested with the "emotional manipulation scale", which might be considered a "dark EI", they substantially more frequently reported their willingness to deceive, confuse or influence others according to their own goals.

Says the author:

> This means that Machiavellians may be able to understand others' emotions and control their own feelings at a high level but that essentially they employ these abilities to serve their self-interest.

And that is consistent with several other studies which have also demonstrated that Machiavellians are in fact better than others in certain dimensions (Austin et al. 2007; Grieve 2011; Nagler et al. 2014).
For example, Machs exhibit above-average emotional intelligence when they have the opportunity to deceive others either verbally or nonverbally.
By contrast, when where there is no chance to exploit others and gain, they remain blind to the feelings of others as disturbing factors for which they find no use.

MERT Testing: Machs Still Perform Poorly

Some tests sought to provide a more real-life feel with videos, pictures, and audio (Multimodal Emotion Recognition Test, or MERT).

Machs also scored lower.
However, such tests fail to overcome the essential problem that subjects are not actively involved in the situation.

Let's dig deeper.

Rea-World Testing Shows Great EI/Social Performance

One study combined the cheat card game with real money to examine how people express, conceal and recognize emotions in a realistic situation (Orosz & Bereczkei 2015).

High Machs were more likely to detect their partners' lying. And had more correct detections compared to the total number of cheat calls.
Finally, they also concealed their emotions more effectively, as measured by the number of cheat calls from their partners.

My Note:
This study seems to have been performed by a student of the author, and I couldn't find it online.

Machiavellian Intelligence

Nicholas Humphrey (1976) first described the "social intelligence hypothesis", which suggests that humans' high-level intelligence adapted to the social environment rather than to challenges posed by the natural environment.

A central domain of the social intelligence theory comprises manipulative-deceptive strategies.
Richard Dawkins and John Krebs (1978) first explained that much communication in the animal world is not to provide honest information as it was previously thought, but it's to deceive others.

The next step towards Machiavellian intelligence was in the form of "selection pressure" and "arms' race" (Robert Dunbar, 1992, 1998, 2002) between manipulative strategies, and people's need to spot the manipulation and counter-deceive.

These theoretical considerations have been supported by studies on primates.
For example:

- The frequency of deceptive behavior is closely related to the relative volume of the neocortex: species with a larger neocortex more frequently engage in manipulative activities (Byrne 1995)
- The larger the neocortex volume, the weaker the relationship between male rank and reproductive success (Pawlowski, Dunbar, & Lowen 1998)
- Humans are really good at deception and even detecting deception (Balint-Kovacs, Hernadi, & Bereczkei 2013; Verplaetse et al. 2007) suggesting that much evolution has taken place

So researchers developed the "Machiavellian intelligence hypothesis" in the mid-1980s (Byrne & Whiten 1988).

Machiavellian intelligence is based on the idea that skillful manipulation confers significant evolutionary advantages.
Successful deception and exploitation of rivals exerted selection pressure on the development of an increasingly more complex social intelligence.

The author concludes that "researchers have agreed that manipulative and deceptive strategies have made an essential contribution to the emergence of humans' uniquely large brain and intelligence."

Machiavellians might then simply be those individuals who, more than others, inherited the Machiavellian genes and mind.
Among the advantages of the Machiavellian Intelligence in humans:

- Persistent task orientation, related to their working memory capacity
- Efficiently assess possible ways and costs of gaining rewards
- Inhibiting spontaneous emotions
- Selecting potential targets
- Flexbility & adaptability of behavior and strategies

This website includes "Machiavellian intelligence" into the overlapping but larger construct of "power intelligence".

> Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

So if there are advantages, why isn't everyone a high Mach?
Because Machiavellianism has a ceiling in evolutionary terms. From a group/individual point of view, defection can't go too far or cooperation and trust would break down. And two, because there must be non-Machiavellians for the strategy to work to yield results (frequency-dependent selection).
Finally, the individual's Machiavellian deception also has to be contained to avoid being ostracized or punished by the group.

Machs Are Good at Inferring

The author then outlines his own theory of how Machiavellians approach strategies and decision-making.

He reviews brain scans and how Machs' brain activity differs, and introduces his research on working memory.
Machiavellians have high working memory capacity, which allows making inferences and judgments about people (Bereczkei & Birkas 2014).
Machs are efficient at memorizing and recalling information, and in computational operations. That is, on the basis of their previous experience they infer others' personality type and emotional life.

It's Mostly Socialization (Surprisingly)

Heritability of Machiavellianism seems to be low (0.31).

That is in contrast to psychopathy (0.69) and narcissism (0.59).

Of course genetic factors do play a role, but Machiavelliniasm seems to be more a product of environmental effects.

One study found an important correlation between Machiavellianism and quality of parental care.
Specifically:

> low-quality maternal care is one of the most important factors contributing to the development of a Machiavellian personality

Machiavellians' childhood is characterized by insecure attachments, low levels of parental care, and poor communication.

Also read more in:

- Attachment styles
- Avoidant attachment
- Anxious attachment

The life-history theory postulates that experiences acquired in crucial areas during the sensitive period of early life may have a large effect on the individual's subsequent course of life.
Those "crucial areas" include models for sexuality, dating, and relationships, accessibility of resources, quality of attachment to the parents, and predictability of the social environment during childhood.

Dark Triad VS Machiavellianism

The main commonalities in the dark triad are callousness, which essentially means a lack of concern for, and empathy towards others.
And manipulation, closely related to lying, derogating, remorseless self-seeking.

Common features among Machs, narcissists and psychopaths also include:

- Low levels of emotional empathy (Wai & Tiliopoulos 2012): the ability to attune themselves to others
- Low levels of self-control in some behaviors (Furnham, Richards, & Paulhus 2013)
- Preference for short-term partner relationships
- High sensation seeking with orientation towards novel and unusual stimuli (Crysel, Crosier, & Webster 2013)
- Low agreeableness
- Predominantly include men

> Beyond these common features, however, all three members of the Dark Triad possess specific traits that are built on the basic structure.
> Machiavellians are primarily characterized by strategic planning, psychopaths by extreme antisociality, and narcissists by an egocentric outlook on life.

Differences

- Big 5 model: except for agreeableness, there is no consistency
- Lying: Psychopaths, similarly to Machiavellians, are incurable liars whereas narcissists are not

- Short-term / long-term relationships: Machiavellians don't avoid long-term relationships as strongly as the other two members of the Dark Triad do (Jonason, Luevano, & Adams 2012).
- Fairness and altruism: psychopaths lag far behind the other two groups
- Realism VS self-greatness: psychopaths and narcissists claim their own greatness and superiority, while Machiavellians are characterized by a certain kind of realism
- Coping strategies for problems: narcissists used coping strategies to alter stressful situations, with deliberate efforts to change the effect of stressors. Machs and psychos neglect of social support, do not seek informational, emotional or tangible support from others for solving their personal problems (Birkás, Gács, & Csathó 2016)
- Materialism: A Polish study investigated the tendency to place material possession very high in an individual's hierarchy of values. Higher narcissism and Machiavellianism were strongly connected with materialistic orientation but psychopathy did not
- Drug & Alcohol: High psychopathy showed strong addictive tendencies regarding either drug use, smoking or alcohol consumption. Alcohol consumption was positively correlated with narcissism. There is little or no relation between Machiavellianism and alcohol consumption, drug use, or smoking (Jonason, Koenig, & Tost 2010).

The author says that "Machiavellianism shows specific or typical features such as a rational mode of thinking, flexible decision-making, and cost/benefit calculation concerning behavioral output".

Several authors suggested that narcissism does not belong to the cluster of malevolent personality traits (Egan, Chan, & Shorter 2014; Kowalski, Vernon, & Schermer 2017) and proposed instead a "dark dyad" with psychopathy and Machiavellianism.

Machs VS Psychopaths

The closest relationship in the dark triad is between Machs and psychopaths.
Both have a poor sense of responsibility and low moral commitment.
Narcissism might be the "odd one out" because studies found that it's loosely related to the other two components (Rauthmann & Kolar 2013; Vernon et al. 2008).

Psychopaths are more:

- Impulsive: with especial regard to the dysfunctional impulsivity that includes inattention and risk-seeking. Machs might seem impulsive as they sometimes "strike first", but there is no significant relationship between Mach and impulsivity
- Reward-driven (including short term): psychos strive after profits at any price even if it entails punishment Machs love rewards, but they look for the best strategy to get them, rather than plunging in head-first
- Antisocial personality: there is overlap as Machs disregard ethical norms, deceive others, and are cynical and cold-blooded. Machs also score higher than low Machs (McHoskey 2001).
  - Norm violation: Machs are most likely to break "grey area" norms, norms that are less likely to cause troubles, or break norms when they're less likely to be caught
  - Violence: Machs self-reported (slightly) fewer acts of violence than psychopaths (Pailing, Boon, & Egan 2014). The author speculates Machs only consider violence when all else fails
  - Brutality and cruelty: psychos often assault others and are ready to take immediate revenge for any harm they suffer (Furnham, Richards, & Paulhus 2013; Pailing, Boon, & Egan 2014). Although Machiavellians also commit antisocial acts, they remain far behind psychopaths in brutality and cruelty, which probably originate in a lack of control of aggressive impulses
- Short-term focused (including at the detriment of self and/or of future self)
- Coping & emotions: Machiavellians can ruminate or become emotional in response to stress; psychopaths show no sign of making emotional control in stressful situations (Birkás, Gács, & Csathó 2016)

- Anxiety: psychopaths feel no anxiety. Machiavellians do, but can control their emotions and conceal their anxiety from others

A gambling experiment involving the calculation of risks showed that psychopaths kept playing and losing, while Machs were more strategic and successful.

The author is surprised by the overlap between Machs and psychopaths. He says that Machiavellianism could be considered as the "basic level" of psychopathy, to which psychopaths develop further characteristics such as antisocial, violent and cruelty that enjoys harming others.

My Note:
I feel the misunderstanding might partially stem from the author considering psychopaths as sadists.

Machiavellianism Downsides

Both Machiavellians & Their Bosses Are Dissatisfied at Work

Says Tamas:

> However, irrespective of their working activities, employers are dissatisfied with the attitude and behavior of Machiavellians. Maybe more importantly, neither are Machiavellians satisfied with the job and role they fulfill in everyday life (Ali & Chamorro-Premuzic 2010).

Higher Dissatisfaction in Sex Life

The higher partner count that comes from seeking diversity doesn't seem to be accompanied by personal satisfaction.
Says the author:

Probably not surprisingly, however, it is also Machiavellians who are dissatisfied with their sex life, always seeking for something different, something new.

Fatalism, External Locus of Control, & Alienation

Says the author:

> High Machs are firmly convinced that external circumstances have a stronger infl uence on their life than internal drives. This probably lies at the core of their strong feeling of alienation in their personal relationships as far as they believe that they live in isolation and their life is essentially meaningless

It might seem contradictory that Machiavellians are more fatalistic and have a higher external locus of control than low Machs.
The author explains it with Machiavellians' cynicism and distrust of others. Such as, Machiavellians see a dog-eat-dog world where you're basically forced to defend yourself and strike first.

Past-Negative Perspectives

Birkas & Csatho analyzed the time perspectives of dark-triad individuals.
People differ in their time-perspective along the variables of:

- Present
  - Present hedonistic strives for immediate satisfaction, takes risks, seeks exciting stimuli, and ignores future consequences
  - Present fatalistic believes in the fatefulness and predestination of life events

- Past
  - Past positive takes a rather sentimental and nostalgic perspective on past events
  - Past negative focuses on previous failures and misfortune
- Future-oriented set goals and make plans that they strive to realize by persistent efforts (note: the original model of time perspective has only one future orientation, while Carelli et al (2011) argued it can be split into positive and negative as well)

Machiavellians have a present-fatalistic attitude (remember the Machs' external locus of control) and, same as psychopaths, a past-negative perspective.

Past-negatives tend to recall bad rather than good memories from the past.
The author says that is probably related to their negative childhood experiences and that "their time perspective is influenced by their shadows and ghosts of the past".

People Can "Find Out" & Dislike the Machiavellian Attitude

Says the author:

> Machiavellians often have to pay the price of manipulation, often becoming isolated, especially in a close-knit community such as a company of friends, a workplace community or a sports club.
> In the long term, they may lose the social capital previously acquired through a charming demeanor

Personally, I'm skeptical on what that "often" means, but it's certainly possible.

Competitive Disadvantage

Finally, there might be a competitive disadvantage in environments where low Machiavellianism provides an advantage.

Says the author:

> Low Machs outdo Machiavellians in most social situations that require coordinated actions. Cooperation usually requires some form of empathy, mutual attunement and understanding, which Machiavellians generally lack. Moreover, low Machs may also gain advantages in environments where social norms are observed and noncompliance is sanctioned.

Ultimately, the author says that probably the most effective positioning in the Mach scale is around the middle: manipulative enough to acquire sufficient resources, but not so much as to risk losing them.

I'm not sure I agree, since the author himself repeated over and over that Machs don't necessarily sacrifice short-term for long term.
So higher levels of Machiavellianism don't necessarily mean being more impulsive and more "psychopathic behavior".
I might agree in terms of "loss of human connection" in cases of extremely high Mach scores, but not necessarily in terms of "life efficiency".

MORE WISDOM

- Much of Machs' success is about picking the right market

Machiavellians gain the most in certain specific environments and situations.
A study for example found out that an environment where everyone is in heavy competition for resources reduced the scope of Machiavellians' outsized payoffs.

The paper, titled “Abusing Good Intentions: Machiavellians Strive for Exploiting Cooperators” gives you hints already for which environments are ripe for Machiavellians: environments with lots of suckers.

- Defectors Are Bad for All

Says the author on the effect of defectors in a Public Goods Game (redacted for brevity):

> The presence of defectors (selfish players who contributed 20% or less of their funds to the group’s account) influenced the behavior of both low and high Machs to substantially reduce their contributions.
> Defectors pose a danger to all players since they make money from the others’ public contributions. Defection in most cases elicits counteraction and provides justification for other players, even for altruists, to shift away from their initial cooperative attitude to a selfish strategy. This is especially true when there is no external punishment to restrain defection. In such a case, there is no other option than to withdraw cooperation.

- Don’t give without making sure you’re getting

As the author cautions, some Machiavellians take without feeling the obligation of giving back.
I actually don’t think that’s the case with most Machiavellians, who are smarter than that. But it’s because such people exist that on this website we caution against strategies of “giving” without making sure you’re getting back.

- Low Machs sometimes cheat more than high Machs (emotions VS rationality)

In an experiment low Machs cheated more than high Machs during personal competition. The authors say that the high Machs deemed the situation at too high risk of being found out, while the low Machs got too emotionally involved.

- Machiavellians are motivated by rational self-interest: they accept small sums of money in Ultimatum Games

People usually don’t play rationally and refuse sums they consider unfairly low (Gintis et al. 2003; Heinrich et al. 2005).
High Machs instead are more rational, and were more likely to accept the small offers that low Machs refused because “unfair” (Meyer 1992).

- More likely to use negative humor

Martin and Lefcourt developed the “Human Response Questionnaire” to categorize the different types of humor. Machiavellianism (and psychopathy) were only correlated with negative humor (Veselka et al. 2010).

- Machiavellis target those who are easy to take advantage of Machiavellis pick people who are easier to manipulate. That includes those who are willing to cooperate and who have concern for others.

Says the author:

> They gained significantly higher profits when their partners were willing to cooperate than in the case where the partners engaged in rivalry.
> Machiavellian behavior may reflect the following algorithm: “Pick the dupe and then adjust your decisions to their behavior”.

- Agreeable people are more likely to be manipulated

People who are low extraversion, high neuroticism, and high agreeableness are highly vulnerable to social manipulation (Chung & Charles 2016).

“Implying trustfulness, forgiveness and temperate manner, these traits on the Big Five scale may make people especially good target of exploitation.”

QUOTES

Both instructive and very entertaining to see how low and high Machs differently described the same situation:

> Examples of typical accounts of the shipwreck situation:
> 1 Low Mach male author: We are all together in this plight. We realize that we must all cooperate, and John, Peter and I decide to equally distribute the limited supplies.
> 2 Low Mach female author: Mary, Jane and I seem to be getting along pretty well . . . It’s funny how we immediately began to trust each other.
> 3 High Mach male author: I didn’t particularly care for John and Peter, and I suspected that there were going to be problems real soon. . . . They are two and I am one. . . . I hope that I can get rid of the human threat soon.
> 4 High Mach female author: Mary and Jane are cold bitches who constantly complain . . . when I got really hungry I wondered how I could cook them with the limited cooking equipment we had.

⍰⍰♂ Lucio’s Analysis

I’m super grateful to Tamás Bereczkei and the wonderful job he’s done.

He informed me like few others, and I will be quoting him and his work on his website many times over.

Also, keep in mind I’m always more critical of great work.

There is personal dislike against Machiavellianism

On this website, we aim at being value-adding individuals who generally do good. However, this website also believes that there are plenty of situations in life when being Machiavellian is good.

As a matter of fact, this website makes the case that being able to operate as a Machiavellian is an important life skill.

The author instead seems to take a stronger and more moral stance against Machiavellianism, for example saying that they “pose danger to others”.
They might, but it’s also true that overly naive folks pose a danger to themselves and those who count on them.

- Sometimes frames Machs unnecessarily poorly

When Machs contributed more to public accounts the author says it was “yet another example of pretended altruism, for unselfish behavior served to increase private gains in this case as well”.

I don’t see it that way at all: Mach’s behavior still resulted in win-win.

The author says that the ultimate proof of the selfish behavior is that Machiavellians earned larger sums at the end of the five rounds than did others.
Well, you can’t blame one for winning at the game, can you?

Psychopaths sadists?

The author says that psychopaths enjoy harming others.

That’s true sometimes, as described for example in MacKenzie account of his relationship with a psychopath, or as shared in Thomas’ autobiography.

However, I also find it a generalization and I don't remember having ever read that "enjoying other people's harm" was a key feature of psychopathy.

Some jump to conclusions on Machs' long-term relationships

The author discusses a study in which subjects were asked to read a story and "project themselves into it".
Based on the results, the author added that "Findings clearly led to the conclusion that Machiavellianism has a serious price, namely, deprivation of social relationships in the long term".
I disagree that a study based on reading a story and projecting into it can warrant making clear real-life inferences.

The author also says that the "fear of fusion" aspect of Machs leads to loneliness and the loss of social support.
That also felt like a jump to conclusion, and in my opinion, it's very possible Machs don't feel lonely at all.

- Contradictory conclusions on income

The author first introduces a meta-analysis lower average income for Machs and then comments that "it's not surprising because Machs cannot hide their true selves".

Then, he introduces other studies suggesting the opposite, and he gives reasons why Machs could earn more -their drive to achieve, and their charisma/leadership-.

So… Which one is which?
And if there is no clear-cut conclusions, as it seems like, then we shouldn't say "that's not surprising".

Temperament and Character Inventory had poor constructs

The TCI measured "cooperativeness" as "acceptance of others, empathy, conscientiousness. High scorers are helpful, merciful, tolerant, empathetic, while low scorers are socially uninvolved, self-seeking, and unconscientious.

To me, that doesn't properly measure cooperativeness. From a Mach point of view, it might as well measure the "likelihood of being conned".

A couple of times a study seemed misquoted

Of the dark triad, the author writes that "They also overlap in their negative relationship with cognitive empathy (Wai & Tiliopoulos 2012; Jonason & Krause 2013)".

I had to check that because as far as I know from other sources, psychopaths and Machs are OK with cognitive empathy.
The author himself later in the book says as much.

And indeed, Wai & Tiliopoulos's study says that "All dark triad personalities were associated with deficits in affective empathy, but showed little evidence of impairment in cognitive empathy".

In another case, the author mentions two studies by Rauthmann & Kolar 2013. He says that the two experiments involved groups of people interacting in real-time. The result was that people tended to dislike the high Machs in the first one. In the second experiment, people only conceived a short-term relationship with high Machs but not a long-term one.
However, when I checked the references there was only one study, and it involved the assessment of a fictitious character, not a real-life one.

A few other times I couldn't find a study.
But I must say, these were the exceptions.

Machs Defining Traits

The authors say that the construct validity of Machiavellianism rests on pragmatic manipulation.
Three themes emerge from Machiavellianism:

1. Belief in manipulative tactics
2. Cynical·worldview
3. Pragmatic morality

Machs Are About Pragmatic Rewards & Winning

> Compared to low Machs, high Machs gave high priority to money, power, and competition (Stewart & Stewart, 2006) and relatively low priority to community building, self-love, and family concerns (McHoskey, 1999). Machs admitted to a focus on unmitigated achievement and winning at any cost (Ryckman, Thornton, & Butler, 1994).

High Machs Have No Superior Mental Abilities

> In sum, the assumption that Machs have superior mental abilities-whether it be IQ, EQ, or mind reading-is not supported by the data.

Note:
They do seem to have "superior" skills when it comes to taking the lead, charming, and lying.
And, likely, in manipulating, albeit that might be a consequence of their propensity and willingness, rather than actual superior skills.

People Have Good Impressions of Machs, But There Are Mixed Results

> The developmental literature suggests that young Machiavellians may be well adjusted and even well-liked (Hawley, 2003; Newcomb, Bukowski, & Pattee, 1993).
> Even as adults, they are sometimes preferred as leaders (Coie, Dodge, & Kupersmidt, 1990) and debate partners (Wilson, Near, & Miller, 1998).
> Notwithstanding those exceptions, Machiavellian behaviors among adults generally draw strong disapproval (Falbo, 1977). One moderating variable may be the social role for which the Machiavellian is being rated. Wilson and colleagues (1998) showed that high Machs were seen as less desirable for most forms of social interaction (e.g., confidant, good friend, business partner) but may be more desirable as debate partners.

Note:
Those "most social interactions" are actually very specific situations that include high empathy and caring.

And when it comes to presidents:

> Ratings of archival data indicated that presidents seen as more Machiavellian were also seen as having higher levels of drive and poise (Simonton, 1986). A follow-up to that research indicated that presidents who were viewed as more Machiavellian were also seen as more desirable leaders, with high ratings on charisma and effectiveness (Deluga, 2001).

Machs Don't Have External Locus of Control

Early literature, including Christie and Geis, concluded that, counterintuitively, Machs seemed to have an external locus of control.

That's not the case, say the authors:

> More recent studies have reported the same pattern (Gable & Dangello, 1994; O'Connor & Morrison, 2001; Yong, 1994). Along with Paulhus (1983), we consider that conclusion to be misleading. None of these studies partitioned perceived control into its three spheres of engagement-personal, interpersonal, and sociopolitical. Paulhus showed that these three aspects of perceived control have quite different relations with Machiavellianism. Machs' apparent external locus of control derives entirely from the sociopolitical factor: Machs are simply endorsing their cynical view of others' competence (see also McHoskey et aI., 1999). That is, they perceive other people as weak and as having little control over their situations. In contrast, Machiavellians score quite high on measures of interpersonal control. In this sphere, Machs believe that they can manipulate others to get what they want.

Machs Are Not Authoritarian

> One might expect a positive association between Machiavellianism and authoritarianism because a condescending attitude toward outgroups is central to both constructs. The 1992 review, however, concluded that overall associations are weak.
> In sum, the worldview of Machs is one of pragmatic tough-mindedness.

Higher Performance in Unstructured Organizations

> Machs appear to have an advantage in unstructured organizations (Gable, Hollon, & Dangello, 1992; Shultz, 1993). They thrive when they have more decision power, fewer rules, and less managerial supervision. In highly structured organizations, high Machs actually perform worse than low Machs (O'Connor & Morrison, 2001; Shultz, 1993; Sparks, 1994).

That is consistent with the original findings on Machiavellianism and their attitudes and preferences:

> In general, the research on career success is consistent with the original notion of latitude for improvisation. As Christie and Geis (1970) determined in laboratory research, Machs remain cool, exploit interpersonal relationships, bend the rules, and improvise. When this flexibility is constrained, Machs are likely to incur problems.

How successful or not successful Machs are also depends on what job we're assessing, and from what point of view:

> Machs seem to thrive in business situations with a high latitude for improvisation (Shultz, 1993), but they perform worse in other situations, such as when latitude for improvisation is impeded (Sparks, 1994). Even after successful manipulations, Machs may suffer a decrement in reputation that reduces future opportunities (Wilson et aI., 1996). The source of evaluation may influence whether Machs are judged as successful or not. When evaluated by a supervisor, Machs seem to evoke negative evaluations, but they concomitantly report and record higher levels of sales in certain jobs (Ricks & Fraedrich, 1999).

Machs Are More Unsatisfied About Their Jobs

> The 1992 review concluded that Machs are generally less satisfied with their jobs. More recent research has supported this finding in retail executives (Gable & Topol, 1988), marketers (Sparks, 1994), and bank managers (Corzine, Buntzman, & Busch, 1999). Machs are more likely to feel unappreciated, to believe that they have plateaued in their careers (Corzine et aI., 1999), and to leave their positions (Becker & O'Hair, 2007). Machs also report more negative feelings from coworkers (Vecchio, 2000, 2005).

Do People Want Machs?

People might want Machiavellians as leaders when results are needed:

> Group members may prefer high Machs for roles that help the group deal with enemies and opponents (Wilson et aI., 1998).
> A classic example is the preference for a Machiavellian as president of the United States (Deluga, 2001; Simonton, 1986). On the other hand, Machs are less favored as friends, confidants, and business partners (Wilson et aI., 1998).

But not as friends:

> Length of interaction also plays a role. As noted· by Fehr and colleagues (1992), high Machs are more liked in short-term encounters (such as when participants are viewing a videotape) (Ickes, Reidhead, & Patterson, 1986). However, when individuals simulate the experience of engaging with a high Mach (such, as by reading a first-person story), they judge Machs more negatively (Wilson et aI., 1998).

Morality of Machiavellians: Pragmatism

The original researchers on Machiavellianism considered immorality among the three key elements of Machiavellianism.

The 1992 review concluded that Machs behave in a less ethical manner-but only in specific circumstances-.

My Note:
This is acutally something that emerged from early researches as well. Nobody behaves always immorally, and especially not strategic players like Machiavellis.

The authors say that the moral perspective of Machs may be seen as either immorality or simple pragmatism (Leary, Knight, & Barnes,·1986).
And they introduce a different perspective: holding different values:

> A radical reinterpretation may be mandated by research indicating that low and high Machs hold qualitatively different kinds of ethical beliefs. High Machs place relatively more emphasis on competence values (i.e., valuing competence and ability to succeed), whereas low Machs report relatively more emphasis on moral values (Musser & Orke, 1992; Trapnell & Paulhus, in press). Such results can be seen as a reframing of Machiavellian morality in terms of its priorities.
> This reframing is consistent with Haidt's (2001) notion that people differ little in their overall moral reactions but rank the priority of moral facets (e.g., justice, integrity) rather differently.

Revenge

> Nathanson and colleagues reported a series of studies of anonymous revenge anecdotes (Nathanson & Paulhus, 2006). Although it predicts revenge reports, the Mach IV overlaps considerably with measures of subclinical psychopathy (McHoskey, Worzel, & Szyarto, '1998; Paulhus & Williams, 2002). Indeed, the association of Mach with revenge was entirely accounted for by the overlap of Machiavellianism with subclinical psychopathy (Nathanson & Paulhus, 2006).

And:

> hostile Machs are more likely to justify committing sabotage against a company they are upset with (Giacalone > & Knouse, 1990).

However, more than themselves seeking revenge, Machs are very attuned to the opportunity of others being able to exact revenge, or to punish their Machiavellian ways:

> In bargaining games, Meyer (1992) found that high Machs are more likely to betray another participant in a one-shot opportunistic manner. More recent research has suggested that Machs are especially likely to betray others when there is no chance for the other person to get retribution (Gunnthorsdottir, McCabe, & Smith, 2002).

Interpersonal Circumplex: Machs Are Individualists

> Interpersonal Circumplex The interpersonal circumplex is framed in terms of two independent axes-agency and communion (Wiggins, 1991). Agency refers to the motivation to succeed and individuate oneself; communion refers to the motivation to merge with others and support the group. Several studies have established that Machiavellianism lies in quadrant 2 of the circumplex, indicating that high Machs are high on agency and low on communion (Gurtman, 1991, 1992; Wiggins & Bro'ughton, 1991).

Machiavellians being practical and driven to win, it makes sense they tend to be more self-centered.

Machiavellians are also out to achieve without consideration for others, though:

> Work by Locke and colleagues yielded a composite variable called self-construal that indexes a relative preference for communion over agency. As expected, self-construal falls diagonally opposite Machiavellianism in circumplex space (Locke & Christensen, 2007), confirming a key suspicion regarding Machs: They are not simply out to achieve but rather are out to achieve at the expense of (or at least without regard for) others.

Machiavellian Intelligence: Evolutionary Advantages

The authors begin by saying that humans are both prosocial, and selfish:

> Although it includes arguments for the advantages of prosocial traits (such as altruism, compassion, and cooperation), the hallmark of evolutionary theory is the notion of the "selfish gene" (Dawkins, 1989). Contrary to many observers' intuition, it is not paradoxical to include both prosocial and antisocial tendencies within the behavioral repertoire of our species (Krueger, Hicks, & McGue, 2001).

But that selfishness, or at least cunning, can provide an advantage:

> The natural selection of selfishness would naturally foster Machiavellian personalities. In ancestral times, those who exploited opportunities to cheat, steal, and manipulate others to achieve their goals would have outreproduced those who did not. this adaptive advantage has been referred to in the literature as Machiavellian intelligence (Byrne & Whiten, 1988): The term is often used interchangeably with terms such as social intelligence, everyday politics, social astuteness, political intelligence, practical intelligence, emotional intelligence, and interpersonal intelligence, all of which allude to cognitive abilities involving skill at adapting to social complexities.

The Power Moves includes "Machiavellian Intelligence" as part of the more general "Power Intelligence".

So, if there are advantages, why is not everyone Machiavellian?

The Evolutionary Ceiling to Machiavellianism

> Mealey (1995) agreed that antisocial traits such as Machiavellianism and psychopathy may reflect an adaptive reproductive strategy but argued further that antisocial traits are frequency-dependent. In other words, not everyone in an ecology can be cooperative because the advantage of being a high Mach is too great.
> However, there are two reasons why not everyone in an ecology can be a high Mach
> The first is that low Machs would have the advantage of building strong social relationships and cooperative alliances, and the second is that high Machs would simply be cheating each other and little would be gained. Thus there are at least two good reasons that preclude the full spread of Machiavellianism.
> One is that Machs have a serious disadvantage in forming cooperative alliances that depend on trust.
> The second reason is that Machiavellian tendencies will show marginal returns: At some point, high Machs would be trying (unsuccessfully) to cheat each other, and no advantage ensues (Mealey, 1995).

Self-Interested Cooperation

The authors say there advantages to both cooperation, and exploitation:

> In the words of Wilson and colleagues (1996), “advantages of cooperation are usually long term, whereas the advantages of exploitation are usually only short term” (p. 287).

When Machiavellians cooperate, it’s not “true” cooperation, but self-interest:

> Instead, we agree with Hawley (2006) that the behavioral repertoire of Machiavellians is “bistrategic,” that is, it includes both cooperation and coercion. However, we place special emphasis on the fact that neither long-term nor short-term cooperative tactics in Machiavellians reflect true cooperation; instead, such behaviors are in the service of malevolence.

My Note:

Personally, I find this difference spurious.
Cooperation is born out of self-interest. Cooperation could have hardly evolved if it wasn’t good for the individual. There is no such a thing as a being that cooperation for “true cooperation” and one who cooperates because he seeks win-win. “True” cooperation as implied by the authors sounds a lot like win-lose. That’s not cooperation, that’s being exploited.

Sexual Behavior

> High Machiavellians tend to be more promiscuous than low Machs (Linton & Wiener, 2001; McHoskey, 2001b; Schmitt, 2004; Paulhus & Williams, 2002).
> Recently, more detailed analyses have partitioned promiscuous behaviors and attitudes (Webster & Bryan, 2007). Jones and Paulhus (2008) found that Machiavellianism correlated only with the attitude component. The lack of correlation with promiscuous behavior suggests that high Machs are no less discerning than low Machs in their actual sexual activities. Such findings are another indication that Machiavellians are not solely short term in orientation.

A short-term predisposition can be seen as a sexual strategy.
By evolutionary standards then we should see more men deploying that strategy since men gain more from short-term sex.

And we might see an avoidant attachment style that also supports short-term behavior:

> The research on Machiavellianism supports the gender difference in short-term reproductive strategies (Figueredo et aI., 2005). Most samples show higher Mach scores in men than in women (Christie & Geis, 1970) and in young than in older adults (e.g., Rawwas & Singhapakdi, 1998). These trends suggest that Machiavellianism promotes sexual activity. Individuals who seek multiple short-term sexual opportunities (e.g., those unrestricted in sociosexuality) would benefit from manipulative tendencies and a lack of empathy.

However, the authors don't believe that sexual strategies predict more manipulation from men:

> These arguments rest on the assumption that manipulation is more effective for the gender that prefers promiscuity than the one that prefers investment and commitment. We dispute that assumption and suggest that female Machiavellianism manifests itself in a manner consistent with the female reproductive agenda.

Personality Tradeoff

> Machiavellianism harbors both adaptive and maladaptive qualities. Key to understanding this tradeoff is the distinction between agentic and communal notions of adaptiveness. Adaptiveness for agentic goals concerns the promotion of personal achievement, whereas adaptiveness for communal goals concerns the benefits to one's group

Problems With Machiavellian Construct

The authors say that they confirm the construct validity of Machiavellianism as measured by the Christie and Geis (1970).

However, they find "disconcerting" the overlap with impulsivity (Marusic et aI., 1995), and that the appropriate label for that personality type is subclinical psychopathy (Paulhus & Williams, 2002)
They say that Psychopaths and Machiavellians share similar antisocial tendencies (Mealey, 1995), but the original theory-from Machiavelli (1513) to Christie and Geis (1970)-specified that Machs are cool and strategic rather than hostile and impulsive.

In my opinion, though the authors are mistaken.
The hostility and impulsivity of Machiavellians is very much a grey area, and later literature reviews showed that high Machs adapt to the situation and social environment.
As a matter of fact, Tamás Bereczkei says that impulsivity and short-term gratification is one of the main differences between psychopaths and Machiavellians.

The authors also say that Machs should pay attention to reputation, which indeed is the case.

Finally, the authors present an interesting new take on the Mach-IV test, but the Mach-VI they proposed hasn't had much success since.

MORE WISDOM

- No particular aggression in Machs: there is no evidence for overt aggression in behavioral studies of Machiavellian adults.

SUMMARY

This summary of "The Art of Worldly Wisdom" focuses on the best of the best.

For the readers' sake and to deliver more value, I took the liberty to:

1. I grouped similar maxims under bigger umbrellas
2. I mixed the best available translations for each maxim
3. When available translations were poor, I've made my own

4. I streamlined some maxim's explanations, and cut out cryptic references to old myths/texts
5. I amended some titles to improve the title/content match

I believe that with these "power moves" touches, you can now learn even more from an already wonderful book.

1. Develop Into A High-Quality Man

The following maxims can be seen as general self-development and character development.

I put it first because these can be seen as the foundations of life and personal success.

11. Cultivate Those Who Can Teach You

Let friendly relations be a school of erudition, and conversation, refined teaching. Make your friends your teachers and blend the usefulness of learning with the pleasure of conversation. Enjoy the company of people of understanding. What you say will be rewarded with applause; what you hear, with learning. What draws us to others, ordinarily, is our own interest, and here that interest is ennobled.

32. Know When to Put Something Aside

One of life's great lessons lies in knowing how to refuse, and it is even more important to refuse yourself, both to business and to others. There are certain inessential activities—months of precious time—and it is worse to busy yourself with the trivial than to do nothing.
You shouldn't abuse your friends, or ask them for more than they give on their own initiative. All excess is a vice, especially in your dealings with others. With this judicious moderation you will stay in the good graces of others and keep their esteem; and propriety, which is precious, will not be worn away.

50. Never Lose Self-Respect

Let your own right feeling be the true standard of your rectitude, and owe more to the strictness of your own self-judgment than to all external sanctions.
Avoid what is indecorous, not because others will judge you harshly, but because you fear your own prudence.

Note:
This talks about having higher standards for yourself than the standards that others place on you.
Also see "enlightened individualism" for placing your own standards above those of others -or society-.

106. Earn respect for who you're becoming

Original title: "Don't flaunt your good fortune"

It is more offensive to take excessive pride in your high office than in yourself. Don't play the "great man"—it is odious—and don't be proud of being envied. The more strenuously you seek esteem from others, the less of it you will have. It depends on respect. You can't simply grab it, you have to deserve it and wait for it. Important occupations call for a certain gravity and decorum. Keep only what the occupation requires, what you need to fulfill your obligations. Don't squeeze it dry; help it along. Those who want to look like hard workers give the impression that they aren't up to their jobs. If you want to succeed, do so using your gifts, not your outer trappings. Even a king ought to be venerated more because of his person than because of his pomp and circumstance.

Note:
"seeking esteem" also means that one is giving way too much judge power to others. An enlightened individualist instead puts his own criteria before other people's judging criteria.

107. Don't believe your own hype

Original title: "Show no self-satisfaction"

You must neither be discontented with yourself—and that were poorspirited—nor self-satisfied—and that is folly. Self-satisfaction arises mostly from ignorance: it would be a happy ignorance not without its advantages if it did not injure our credit. Because a man cannot achieve the superlative perfections of others, he contents himself with any mediocre talent of his own. Distrust is wise, and even useful, either to evade mishaps or to afford consolation when they come, for a misfortune cannot surprise a man who has already feared it. Even Homer nods at times, and Alexander fell from his lofty state and out of his illusions. Things depend on many circumstances: what constitutes triumph in one set may cause a defeat in another. In the midst of all incorrigible folly remains the same with empty self-satisfaction, blossoming, flowering, and running all to seed.

Note:
This maxim reminds us not to believe our own hype, and puts things in perspective, including personal success. In "Ultimate Power" we make the case that indeed your focus and pride should not be on the final result, but on your process.

For a good real-life example on believing one's own hype, see:

121. Don't make mountains out of molehills

Original title: "Do not make a Business of what is no Business"

Don't make much ado about nothing. Some take nothing into account, and others want to account for everything. They are always talking importance, always taking things too seriously, turning them into debate and mystery. Few bothersome things are important enough to bother with. It is folly to take to heart what you should turn your back on. Many things that were something are nothing if left alone, and others that were nothing turn into much because we pay attention to them. In the beginning it is easy to put an end to problems, but not later. Sometimes the cure causes the disease. Not the least of life's rules is to leave well enough alone.

165. Wage a clean war

The wise person can be driven to war, but not to a dishonorable one. Act like the person you are, not the way they make you act. To behave magnanimously towards your rivals is praiseworthy. You should fight not only to win power but also to show that you are a superior fighter. To conquer without nobility is not victory but surrender. The good man does not use forbidden weapons, like the ones he acquires when he breaks up with a friend. Even when friendship ends in hatred, don't take advantage of the trust that was once placed in you. Everything that smacks of treachery is poison to your reputation. Noble people shouldn't have even an atom of baseness. Nobility scorns villainy. You should be able to boast that if gallantry, generosity, and faith were lost in the world, they could be found again in your own breast.

Note:
Read this thread:

- The gentleman warrior approach

228. Avoid value-taking, covert-aggressive humor

Original title: "Don't be a scandal-monger"

Don't be known for impugning the fame of others. Don't be witty at someone else's expense: it is more odious than difficult. All will take revenge and speak ill of you, and since you are one and others are many, you'll be easily defeated. Take no content in the ills of others, and don't comment on them. A gossip is always detested. He may mingle with great people, but they will value him as a source of amusement, not of prudence. And he who speaks ill hears worse.

274. Be charming / attractive

It is a wise sort of bewitchment. Let charm and courtesy capture the goodwill of others, and also their services. It isn't enough to have merit if you don't please others—this is what makes people praise you, and acclaim is the most useful instrument we have for ruling others. You are fortunate if others find you charming, but this must be helped by artifice, which works best when natural gifts are present. Charm leads to benevolence and, eventually, universal favor.

Note:
This is a mix of appearances and social strategies. But since one can be charming and a high-quality, value-adding folk, then we can consider it an honest, value-adding self-development strategy.

280. Be trustworthy, fly with the eagles

Original title: "be trustworthy"

Take notice of the bad behavior of others, it should be a warning and not an example. Bad behavior is not an example to imitate it but to defend yourself from. Your own integrity can be ruined by the ruinous behavior of others. But the honorable man does not forget who he is because of what others are.

Note:
One of the truly most powerful maxims of them all.
It takes a great man to maintain integrity in the midst of competition and Machiavellianism.

2. Machiavallian Strategies

The following maxims can be considered "Machiavellians" in the sense that they are potentially effective, while being amoral and potentially manipulative and value-taking.

5. Make people depend on you

He who is truly shrewd would rather have people need him than thank him. Vulgar gratitude is worth less than polite hope, for hope remembers and gratitude forgets. You will get more from dependence than from courtesy. He who has already drunk turns his back on the well, and the orange already squeezed turns from gold into mud. When there is no longer dependence, good manners disappear, and so does esteem. The most important lesson experience teaches is to maintain dependence, and entertain it without satisfying it. This can hold even a king. But don't carry it too far, leading others astray by your silence or making their ills incurable for your own good.

84. Use your enemies

Grasp things not by the blade, which will harm you, but by the handle, which will defend you. The same applies to enemies. A wise man gets more use from his enemies than a fool from his friends. Many owe their greatness to their enemies. Flattery is fiercer than hatred, for hatred corrects the faults flattery had disguised. The prudent man makes a mirror out of the evil eye of others, and it is more truthful than that of affection, and helps him reduce his defects or emend them.

Note:
This maxim seems to suggest using your enemy in the sense of the feedback they can provide. When they attack you, you know what to correct. And if you can't correct it and it hurts you, you know that you must work on an antifragile ego.

149. Know how to use scapegoats

Original title: “let someone take the hit”

To have a shield against ill-will is a great piece of skill in a ruler. It is not the resort of incapacity, as ill-wishers imagine, but is due to the higher policy of having someone to receive the censure of the disaffected and the punishment of universal detestation. Everything cannot turn out well, nor can everyone be satisfied: it is well therefore, even at the cost of our pride, to have such a scapegoat, such a target for unlucky undertakings.

187. When something pleases others, do it yourself. When it is odious, have someone else do it.

You will win favor, and shift ill will onto others. Great and noble people find it more pleasant to do good than to receive it. You can rarely trouble another without feeling troubled, either by pity or by remorse. In matters of reward or retribution let good be administered immediately, and bad, mediately, through another. You should give others something they can pummel with the hatred and gossip of their discontent. The anger of the rabble is like rabies. Without realizing what has harmed it, it snaps at the muzzle. And though the muzzle isn’t to blame, it takes the immediate punishment.

189. Utilize other people’s privations

When privation leads to desire, it gives us the surest way to manipulate others.
Some people climb the steps of others’ desires to reach their own ends. They take advantage of the tight spots others are in, and use difficulty to whet their appetite. They find the sting of want more useful than the complacency of possession, and as things grow more difficult, desire grows more vehement. A subtle way of getting what you want: maintain dependency.

Note:
This is the “WIIFT” of social exchanges.

213. Contradict & feign doubt to pry out secrets

Original title: “know how to contradict”

It is a great way to provoke others: they commit themselves and you commit nothing. The true thumbscrew, it brings the passions into play. You can use contradiction to pry loose the passions of others. Showing disbelief makes people spill their secrets; it is the key to tightly closed breasts. A sly depreciation of another’s mysterious word scents out the profoundest secrets; some sweet bait brings them into the mouth till they fall from the tongue and are caught in the net of astute deceit. By reserving your attention the other becomes less attentive, and lets his thoughts appear while otherwise his heart was inscrutable. A feigned doubt is the best skeleton key your curiosity can have: it will find out all it wants. Also in learning it is a subtle plan of the pupil to contradict the master, who thereupon takes pains to explain the truth more thoroughly and with more force, so that a moderate contradiction produces complete instruction

3. Smoke & Mirror Strategies

These maxims are about “embellishing” things, and focusing on what things look, rather than focusing -or solely focusing- on what things are.

3. Keep matters in suspense

Admiration at their novelty heightens the value of your achievements, It is both useless and insipid to play with the cards on the table. Mix a little mystery with everything, and the very mystery arouses veneration. And when you explain, be not too explicit, just as you do not expose your inmost thoughts in ordinary intercourse.

Cautious silence is the holy of holies of worldly wisdom. A resolution declared is never highly thought of; it only leaves room for criticism. And if it happens to fail, you are doubly unfortunate.

94. Keep the extent of your Abilities unknown

The prudent person—if he wants to be revered by others—should never allow them to judge the extent of his knowledge and courage.
llow yourself to be known, but not comprehended. No one will discern the limits of your talent, and thus no one will be disappointed. You can win more admiration by keeping other people guessing the extent of your talent, or even doubting it, than you can by displaying it, however great.

99. Take care of appearances

Things pass for what they seem, not for what they are. Few see inside; many take to the outside. It is not enough to be right, if right seems false and malicious.

126. It's foolish not to do foolish things, but not concealing them

Original title: "The fool isn't someone who does something foolish, but the one who doesn't know how to conceal it"

Hide your affects, but even more, your defects. All people err, but with this difference: the wise dissimulate their errors, and fools speak of those they are about to commit. Reputation is more a matter of stealth than of deeds. If you can't be chaste, be chary. The slips of the great are closely observed, like eclipses of the sun and moon. You shouldn't confide your defects to friends, or even to yourself, were that possible. Another rule for living is applicable here: know how to forget.

130. Do, but also be seen doing

Things do not pass for what they are, but for what they seem. To excel and to know how to show it is to excel twice. What is invisible might as well not exist. Reason itself is not venerated when it does not wear a reasonable face. Those easily duped outnumber the prudent. Deceit reigns, and things are judged from without, and are seldom what they seem. A fine exterior is the best recommendation of inner perfection.

146. Don't be fooled by appearances

Original title: Look deep inside.

Things are seldom what they seem, and ignorance, which sees no deeper than the bark, often turns to disillusion when it penetrates into things. In all things, deceit arrives first, dragging fools behind it in endless vulgarity. Truth is always late, always last to arrive, limping along with Time. Prudent people save one of their ears for truth, thanking their common mother, Nature, for giving them two. Deceit is superficial, and superficial people are quick to run into her. Discernment lives hidden away in retirement, so as to be more esteemed by the wise and the discreet.

253. Keep things strategically complex

Original title: Don't express your ideas too clearly

Most people think little of what they understand, and venerate what they do not. To be valued, things must be difficult: if they can't understand you, people will think more highly of you. To win respect, make yourself seem wiser and more prudent than is required by the person you are dealing with. But do so with moderation. Intelligent people value brains, but most people demand a certain elevation. Keep them guessing at your meaning, and don't give them a chance to criticize you. Many praise without being able to say why. They venerate anything hidden or mysterious, and people praise it because they hear it praised.

282. Use absence to win respect or esteem

Presence diminishes fame, absence enlarges it. The absent person who was thought a lion turns into a mouse—ridiculous offspring of the mountain—when present. Gifts lose their sheen when they are handled: one sees the outer bark and not the spiritual pith. Imagination travels faster than sight. Deceit comes in through the ears, but usually leaves through the eyes. The person who retires into himself, into the center of his reputation, preserves his good name. Even the Phoenix used absence to preserve its dignity and to turn desire into esteem.

4. Be Bad to Be Good

The following maxims are reminiscent of Machiavelli's "a good man is ruined among the great number who are not good".
And they can be grouped into this website's core value that: "to be good, you need to be bad".

54. Know how to show your Teeth

Like love, courage is no joking matter. If it yields once, it will have to yield again, and again. The same difficulty will have to be conquered later on, and it would have been better to get it over with. The mind is bolder than the body. So with the sword: let it be sheathed in prudence, ready for the occasion. It is your defense. A weak spirit does more harm than a weak body. Many people with eminent qualities lacked this brio, appeared to be dead, and were buried in their lassitude. Provident nature resourcefully joined the sweetness of honey with the sting of the bee. You have both nerves and bones in your body: don't let your spirit be all softness.

243. Don't be all dove

Let the guile of the serpent alternate with the innocence of the dove. No one is easier to fool than a good man; the person who never lies believes others easily, and the one who never deceives trusts others. Being fooled isn't always a sign of foolishness; sometimes it shows goodness. Two kinds of people are good at foreseeing danger: those who have learned at their own expense and the clever people who learn a great deal at the expense of others. Don't be so good that you give others the chance to be bad. Be part serpent and part dove; not a monster, but a prodigy.

266. Don't be bad by being too good

You will be, if you never get angry. Those who feel nothing are not really people. They don't always act that way out of insensitivity but often out of stupidity. To feel strongly, when circumstances call for it, makes you a person. Even birds poke fun at scarecrows. To alternate the bitter with the sweet shows good taste: sweetness alone is for children and fools. It is a great evil to be so insensible that you lose yourself by being good.

5. Timing Strategies

These maxims are about "timing", including negotiating short-term interests with long-term ones to maximize lifetime success.

59. Finish Off Well

The important point is not the vulgar applause on entrance—that comes to nearly all—but the general feeling at exit.

81. Renew Your Brilliance

Excellence grows old and so does fame. So be reborn (…) dare to renew your brilliance, dawning many times, like the sun, only changing your surroundings.

110. Don't wait to be a setting sun.

It is a maxim of prudent people to abandon things before being abandoned by them. You should make even your end into a triumph. At times the sun itself retires behind a cloud so that no one will see it fall, and it leaves us wondering whether it has set or not. Avoid sunsets so as not to burst with misfortune. Don't wait for people to turn their shoulders on you: they will bury you alive to your regret, dead to renown. The prudent know when to retire a racehorse, and do not wait for him to collapse in the middle of the race, to the laughter of all. Let Beauty shatter the mirror cleverly, at the right time, and not too late when she cannot bear the truth.

113. In Prosperity prepare for Adversity

In the summer it is wise to provide for winter, and it is easier to do so. Favors are less expensive, and friendships abound. It is good to save up for a rainy day: adversity is expensive and all is lacking. Retain a store of friendly and obliged persons; the day may come when their price will go up. Low minds never have friends; in luck, they will not recognize them, and in misfortune, they will not be recognized by them.

Note:
Some people grow conceited in success. Instead, that's when you should be making more friends and allies.

120. Adapt to what works today

Original title: Live practically

Even knowledge has to be in the fashion, and where knowledge is uncommon, feign ignorance. Ways of thinking change, and so does taste. Don't think like an ancient; taste like a modern. Count heads. That is what matters in all things. When you must, follow the common taste, and make your way toward eminence. The wise adapt himself to the present, even when the past seems more attractive, both in the clothes of the soul and in those of the body. This rule for living holds for everything but goodness, for one must always practice virtue. Many things have come to seem old-fashioned: speaking truth, keeping your word.

153. Don't step into the huge gap left by someone else

If you do, be sure you have more than enough talent. Merely to equal your predecessor, you must be worth twice as much. To fill a great vacancy is hard, because the past always seems better. It isn't enough to equal your predecessor; the person who goes first has an advantage. You need extra talent to expel him from his superior reputation.

This is the "don't step into a great man's shoes" in "The 48 Laws of Power".

154. Be slow to either believe, or love

But don't cast doubt openly on the truthfulness of others. When you treat someone like a liar, or insist he has been deceived, you add insult to injury. And not believing others implies that you yourself are deceitful.

Note:
This is a mix of timing and social strategies.
Take note of the social strategy aspect, which is equally important.

217. Prepare for love & hate to switch

Original title: “Neither love nor hate forever”

Treat your friends as though they could become your worst enemies. Since this happens in reality, let it happen in foresight. We shouldn’t give arms to the turncoats of friendship; they will wage the worst sort of war with them. On the contrary, when it comes to enemies, leave the door open to reconciliation. The door of gallantry is the surest one. The pleasure of revenge often turns into torment, and the satisfaction of having harmed someone often turns to pain.

231. Never show half-finished things to others

Let them be enjoyed in their perfection. All beginnings are formless, and what lingers is the image of that deformity. The memory of having seen something imperfect spoils our enjoyment when it is finished.

6. Reputation Management

These maxims are about “reputation” and its importance.

32. Have the Reputation of being Gracious

Especially if you govern them. It helps sovereigns to win the good graces of all. Ruling others has one advantage: you can do more good than anyone else. Friends are those who do friendly things. Some people are intent on not pleasing, not because it is burdensome, but simply out of nastiness. In everything they oppose the divine communicability.

97. Obtain and preserve a Reputation

It is expensive to obtain a reputation, for it only attaches to distinguished abilities, which are as rare. Once obtained, it is easily preserved. It confers many an obligation, but it does more. When it is owing to elevated powers or lofty spheres of action, it rises to a kind of veneration and yields a sort of majesty. Reputations based on substance are the ones that have always endured.

185. Don’t risk your reputation on one roll of the dice

If it comes out badly, the harm will be irreparable. You can easily err once, especially the first time. You aren’t always at your best, and not every day is yours. So let there be a second attempt to make up for the first … and if the first one goes right, it will redeem the second one. There must always be room for improvement and for appeal. Things depend on all sorts of circumstance, and luck grants us success only rarely.

7. Social Strategies

This set of maxims reminds us that “friends and allies are power”, a central tenet of this website.
Also see “strategies of power“.

58. Adapt to those around you

There is no need to show your ability before everyone. Employ no more force than is necessary. Let there be no unnecessary expenditure either of knowledge or of power. The skilful falconer only flies enough birds to serve for the chase. If there is too much display today there will be nothing to show tomorrow. Always have some novelty wherewith to dazzle. To show something fresh each day keeps expectations alive and conceals the limits of his talent.

Alternate translation:
Don’t show the same intelligence with everyone, and don’t put more effort into things than they require.

Note:
It's a mix of different strategies. It starts with social strategies, including "adapting your power" to those around and to the situation and the "law of least social effort". And it ends with a "smoke and mirror" strategy on keeping some novelty.
The social-chameleon aspect is the most important here.

70. Know how to say no

You can't grant everything to everybody.
Saying "no" is as important as granting things, especially among those in command. What matters is the way you do it. Some people's "no" is prized more highly than the "yes" of others: a gilded "no" pleases more than a curt "yes." Many people always have "no" on their lips, and they sour everything. "No" is what occurs to them first. They may give in later, but they aren't well thought of because they started out by being so unpleasant. Refusal shouldn't come in one fell swoop. Let people nibble on their disappointment little by little. Never refuse something completely: others would no longer depend on you. There should always be some last remnants of hope to sweeten the bitterness of refusal. Let politeness compensate and fine words make up for the lack of deeds. Yes and No are soon said, but give much to think over.

For more on learning to say no, see:

> 5 Techniques to Say No (Polite, But Effective)

105. Don't be a bore

The man of one business or of one topic is apt to be heavy. Brevity is pleasant and flattering, and it gets more done. It gains in courtesy what it loses in curtness. Good things, if brief: twice good. Badness, if short, isn't so bad. Everyone knows that a tall person is rarely an intelligent one, but it's better to be tall in stature than long in conversation. The discreet person should avoid tiring others, especially the great, who are very busy. It would be worse to irritate one of them than the rest of the world. Well said is quickly said.

Note:
The author very acutely notes that great people, because busy, are even more annoyed by boring and time-wasting folks.
That much is true, and it's something we also turned into a political/career strategy in "how to deal with your boss".

Note II:
Many people could improve so much in their relationships and social effectiveness by limiting the "me, me, me" approach to conversations.
To fix social mistakes, also read:

- Social burdens
- Basics of group conversation

108. To achieve greatness, associate with great people

The company you keep can work wonders. Customs and tastes and even intelligence are transmitted without our being aware of it. Let the quick person join the hesitant one, and so on, through every sort of temperament. That way you will achieve moderation without straining after it. It takes much skill to know how to adapt yourself. The alternation of opposites makes the universe beautiful and sustains it, and causes even greater harmony in human customs than in nature. Govern yourself by this advice when you select your friends and servants. The communication of extremes will produce a discreet and golden mean.

109. Don't tear people down, pull people up

Original title: "Don't berate others"

There are people with savage tempers who make everything a crime, not out of passion but because of their very character. They condemn everyone, some for what they've done, others for what they will do. This shows a spirit worse than cruel, which is truly vile. They criticize others so exaggeratedly that they make motes into beams in order to poke out eyes. They are taskmasters who can turn a paradise into a prison. When swayed by passion, they take everything to extremes. A noble nature, on the contrary, always knows how to find an excuse for failings, if not in the intention, at least from oversight.

Note:
one of the most foundational maxims of high-quality people.

111. Have friends

They are a second being. To a friend, all friends are good and wise. When you are with them, all turns out well. You are worth as much as others want you to be and say you are, and the way to their mouths lies through their hearts. Nothing bewitches like service to others, and the best way to win friends is to act like one. The most and best we have depends on others. You must live either with friends or with enemies. Win one each day, if not as a confidant, at least as a follower. Choose well and some will remain whom you can trust.

112. Be kind to win the goodwill of others

Original title: "win the goodwill of others"

Reputation is purchased with affection. Some trust so much in their own worth that they make light of diligence. But the prudent person knows very well that merit can take a shortcut if helped by favor. Benevolence makes everything easier and compensates for whatever is lacking: courage, integrity, wisdom, and even discretion. It never sees ugliness, for it doesn't want to. It is usually born from similarity of temperament, race, family, country, or occupation. In the spiritual realm, benevolence bestows talent, favor, reputation, and merit. Once one wins it—and this is difficult—it is easily kept. You can make an effort to win it, but you must also know how to use it.

114. Diminish the scope for competition, use collaborative frames

Original title: "Never compete"

When you vie with your opponents, your reputation suffers. Your competitor will immediately try to find your faults and discredit you. Few wage war fairly. Rivalry discovers the defects that courtesy overlooks. Many people had a good reputation until they acquired rivals. The heat of opposition revives dead infamies and digs up the stench of the past. Competition begins by belittling and finding faults, and rivals take advantage of everything they can and all they ought not to. Often they gain nothing by offending others, only the vile satisfaction of revenge. Revenge blows the dust of oblivion from people's faults. Men of good-will are always at peace; men of good repute and dignity are men of good-will.

Note:
This reminds us of using collaborative frames in competition, or the "gentleman's warrior approach" we talk about here (see later).

116. Always deal with honorable people

Favor them and win their favor. Their very recitude ensures they will treat you well even when they oppose you, for they act like who they are, and it is better to fight with good-minded people than to conquer the bad. There is no way to get along with villainy, for it feels no obligation to behave rightly. This is why there is no true friendship among villains, and their fine words cannot be trusted; for they do not spring from honor. Avoid the person who has no honor, for if he esteems not honor, he esteems not virtue. And honor is the throne of integrity.

Note:
This maxim reminds us that not all friends, allies, and partners are the same. High value and high quality people are worth more.

117. Don't talk about yourself

You must either praise yourself, which is vanity, or criticize yourself, which is meekness. You show a lack of good judgment and become a nuisance to others. If this is important among friends, it is even more so in high positions, where one often speaks in public and where any appearance of vanity passes for foolishness. Nor is it prudent to talk about people who are present. You risk running aground on flattery or vituperation.

119. Avoid the bitter & hateful

Original title: Avoid being disliked

There are many who hate of their own accord without knowing the why or the how. Their ill-will outruns our readiness to please. Their ill-nature is more prone to do others harm than their cupidity is eager to gain advantage for themselves. Some manage to be on bad terms with all, because they always either produce or experience vexation of spirit. Once hate has taken root it is, like bad repute, difficult to eradicate. Wise men are feared, the malevolent are abhorred, the arrogant are regarded with disdain, buffoons with contempt, eccentrics with neglect. Therefore pay respect that you may be respected, and know that to be esteemed you must show esteem

152. Screen for those who pull you up

Original title: "Don't keep company with those who will make you seem less gifted"

Either because they are superior or inferior. The more perfect someone is, the more highly he is esteemed. The other person will always play the leading role, and you a secondary one, and if you win any respect at all, it will come in scraps and remnants. When the moon is alone it competes with the stars, but once the sun comes out it either doesn't appear or it disappears. Don't go near the person who can eclipse you, only the one who will make you look better. Don't have a pain in your side, or honor others to the detriment of your own reputation. To grow, associate with the eminent; once grown, with those who are average.

156. Select your friends carefully

They should be examined by discretion, tested by fortune, certified not only in willpower but also in understanding. Though success in life depends on selecting your friends, people pay it little attention. In some cases, mere meddling leads to friendship and in most, mere chance. You are judged by the friends you have, and the wise never get along with fools. To take pleasure in someone's company doesn't make him a close friend. Sometimes we value his sense of humor without fully confiding in his talent. Some friendships are legitimate, others adulterous: the latter are for pleasure, the former are fertile and engender success. The insight of a friend is more valuable than the good wishes of many others. So let choice rule and not chance. Wise friends chase away sorrows, and foolish ones gather them. And don't wish your friends wealth if you want to keep them.

In the next maxim, he says: "it is a great art to penetrate temperaments and distinguish the character of others. Human nature ought to be studied as closely as any book".

183. Concede something to maintain rapport, friends, & good social standing

Original title: “Don’t hold on your views too firmly”

Every fool is fully convinced, and every one fully persuaded is a fool, and the more erroneous their judgment is, the more they hold on to it. Even when you are right, it is good to make concessions: people will recognize you were right but admire your courtesy. More is lost through holding on than can be won by defeating others. One defends not truth but rudeness. There are heads of iron, difficult to convince, hopelessly obstinate. When whim meets stubbornness, they bond forever into foolishness. Be firm in will, not in judgment. There are exceptional cases, of course, when one shouldn’t give in twice: once in judgment and once in execution.

Note:
We have seen some examples of these dynamics in the forums.
Those who were seen as overly harsh in defending their views or positions developed a poor social reputation that eventually cost them social goodwill and support.
Of course, exceptions always apply, and on some crucial topics and issues you can’t make concessions. But in many other cases, this is a fundamental maxim to heed.

257. Stop short of breaking off or your reputation will be shattered. Anyone makes a good enemy, but not everyone can be a good friend. Few can do good, and almost everyone bad. Say things too abruptly and you will stir up the wrath of hypocrites, who were waiting for their chance. Friends whom you have offended make the bitterest enemies: to their own pet fault they add all of yours. When others observe us splitting up with someone, they speak as they feel and feel as they desire. They criticize our behavior either at the beginning of the friendship (for lack of providence) or at the end (for having waited so long). If you can’t help but part company, do it gently and excusably, with a slackening of favor rather than a violent outburst. This is where the maxim about a fine withdrawal* comes in handy.

* #38

258. Team up, find brother(s) in arms

Original title: “Look for someone to help bear your misfortunes”

You will never be alone, not even in risky situations, and you won’t have to bear all the hatred of others. Some people want to take charge of everything and all they do is take all the criticism. So have someone that can pardon you or help you bear hardship. Neither fortune nor the mobs are as quick to attack two people. Physicians, having mistaken the cure, are not mistaken to consult someone else who can help them carry the coffin. They share the weight and the sorrow, for misfortune borne alone is doubly intolerable.

259. Foresee the attack, turn the attacker into a friend

Original title: Foresee affronts and turn them into favors

It is wiser to avoid them than to avenge them. It is a great skill to turn a potential rival into a confidant. Those who would have attacked your reputation become its protectors. It is valuable to know how to place others in your debt and transform insult into gratitude. To turn sorrows into pleasures is to know how to live. Make malevolence itself your confidant.

Note:
This is a mix of social strategy, and social exchange strategy.
If you can make a favor to someone who was about to attack, chances are you can turn the attack into a favor indeed, and turn an enemy/frenemy, into a friend/ally.

291. Know how to test others

Let attentiveness and good judgment penetrate gravity and reserve. It takes great powers of judgment to measure someone else's. It is more important to know the qualities and temperaments of people than those of stones and herbs. This is one of the subtlest things in life. Metals are identified by their sounds, and people by their speech. Words demonstrate integrity, and deeds even more so. Here is where one needs extraordinary care, profound observation, and critical power.

For testing in dating and seduction, also see:

- Shit tests power dynamics

8. Defense Strategies

These can be labeled as "defense strategies", or as maxims ot become a "hardened target" agasint manipulation and value-taking strategies.

145. Hide your wounded finger

Or you will bump it on everything. Never complain about it. Malice always zeroes in on what hurts or weakens us. Look discouraged and you will only encourage others to make fun of you. Evil intent is always looking for ways to get a rise out of you. It uses insinuation to discover where you hurt, and knows a thousand stratagems to probe your wounds. If you are wise, you will ignore malicious hints, and conceal your troubles, either personal or inherited, for even Fortune sometimes likes to hit you where it hurts. It always goes straight for raw flesh. Be careful not to reveal what mortifies and what vivifies you, lest the former last and the latter end.

172. Never compete with someone who has nothing to lose

The struggle will be unequal. One of the contestants enters the fray unencumbered, for he has already lost everything, even his shame. He has cast off everything, has nothing further to lose, and throws himself headlong into all sorts of insolence. Never risk your precious reputation on such a person. It took many years to win it, and it can be lost in a moment, on something far from momentous. One breath of scandal freezes much honorable sweat. The righteous person knows how much is at stake. He knows what can damage his reputation, and, because he commits himself prudently, he proceeds slowly, so that prudence has ample time to retreat. Not even if he triumphs will he win back what he lost by exposing himself to the risk of losing.

193. Beware of someone who pretends to put your interest before his own.

The best defense against guile is attentiveness. When people are subtle, be even more so. Some are good at making their business into yours, and if you don't decipher their intentions, you'll find yourself pulling their chestnuts out of the fire.

245. Be wary of flattery without real feedback

Original title: "Sometimes you should reason with uncommon sense" / "Original and out-of-the-way Views"

It betokens a superior talent. Don't think highly of the person who never opposes you. It doesn't show that he loves you, it shows he loves himself. Don't be fooled by flattery: don't reward it, condemn it. Consider it an honor to be criticized, especially by those who speak ill of good people. You should be pained when your things please everyone; it is a sign that they are not good, for perfection belongs to only a few.

9. Social Exchange Strategies

I group here a set of maxims that all fall under what we have identified on this website as a larger cluster of "social exchange dynamics".

I also highly recommend you take a look at "social exchange theory".
Even better, see the lesson in "Power University" which is much deeper.

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

They include:

171. Do not waste favor & connection for small things

The great as friends are for great occasions. One should not make use of great confidence for little things: for that is to waste a favour. The sheet anchor should be reserved for the last extremity. If you use up the great for little ends what remains afterwards? Nothing is more valuable than a protector, and nothing costs more nowadays than a favour. It can make or unmake a whole world. It can even give sense and take it away. As Nature and Fame are favourable to the wise, so Luck is generally envious of them. It is therefore more important to keep the favour of the mighty than goods and chattels.

191. Don't take payment in politeness

It is a cheat. Some people, in order to cast a spell, have no need of magic potions. By doffing their hats the right way, they bewitch fools—the vain, that is. They sell honor, and pay their debts with a gust of fine words. He who promises everything promises nothing; promises are a trap for fools. True courtesy is a duty, false courtesy a deceit, and excessive courtesy isn't dignity but dependence. Those who practice it bow not to the person but to his wealth and to his flattery; not to good qualities, but to hoped-for favors.

Note:
The author is talking about social exchange manipulation, where one repays a pragmatic favor with good feelings.

234. Only entrust your honor to someone if you have his as leverage

Original title: Never trust your Honour to another, unless you have his in Pledge.

The penalty for speaking too much and the advantages of silence should be the same for both of you. Where honor is involved, all must share the same interests, and one's own reputation should make one look out for that of others. It's better not to confide in others, but if you do, arrange matters skillfully so that your confidant will show not only prudence but caution. Share the risk, so that both of you are obeying a common interest and your confidant will not turn into a witness against you.

Note:
Very good maxim to generalize as well. When you give someone you don't know too well a lot of leverage over you, it's good if you also have some leverage over him.
It's a mix of social strategy and social exchange. The power dynamics of leverage probably deserves its own category.

236. Make an Obligation beforehand of what would have to be a Reward afterward

This is a stroke of subtle policy; to grant favors before they are deserved is proof of being obliging. Favours thus granted beforehand have two great advantages: the promptness of the gift obliges the recipient more strongly; and the same gift which would afterward be merely a reward is beforehand an obligation. This is a subtle transformation: you begin by paying a debt and end up passing it on to your creditor. But this is only suitable for men who have the feeling of obligation, since with men of lower stamp the honorarium paid beforehand acts rather as a bit than as a spur

Note:
The trick is here to give a favor before we receive what we were going to receive. This maxim shows how well the author understood the dynamics of social exchanges, including the emotional-based accountancy of exchanges (ie.: “guilt”, “obligations to honor debts”, etc.).

244. Disguise a feeling of obligation

Original title: “create a feeling of obligation”

Some people disguise their own profit as the profit of others: they make it appear they are granting a favor when they are really receiving one. Some are so shrewd that they bestow honor by asking a favor; and they honor others with their own gain. They arrange things so that others seem to be paying them their due when they give them something. Extraordinarily clever, they scramble the order of doing favors and cast doubt upon who is favoring whom. They buy the best things with simple praise. By showing they like something, they bestow honor and flattery. They stake a claim on the courtesy of others, making a debt out of something they themselves should have felt grateful for. They use the verb oblige in the active voice rather than in the passive, and are better at politics than at grammar. This is a great subtlety, but it is even more subtle to catch someone doing it, undo the exchange, return someone’s honor, and recover the advantage.

252. Strike a healthy balance between selfishness & service

Original title: “Live neither entirely for yourself nor entirely for others”

It is a vulgar sort of tyranny. If you want to belong entirely to yourself, you’ll want everything for yourself. Such people don’t know how to yield, even in the smallest things, or give up even a tiny bit of their own comfort. They never win other people’s favor; they trust in their fortune, and acquire a false sense of security. It is good to belong to others at times so that others can belong to you. If you hold public office, you must be a public slave. On the other hand, some people belong entirely to others, for foolishness always deals in excess, and this is a very unhappy sort of excess. They have not a day, not an hour to call their own, so completely do they give themselves to others. This is true even in matters of knowledge. Some people know everything for others and nothing for themselves. If you are prudent, you will understand that people seek you not for your own sake but for their own. What interests them is what you can do for them.

Note:
I like how this maxim applied to leadership. One of the hallmarks of good leadership is about putting oneself in the service of the followers.

255. Break up your good deeds in small repeated doses

Original title: “Do Good a little at a time, but often”

A little bit at a time, but often. Don’t bestow more favor on someone than he can return. He who gives much doesn’t give; he sells. Don’t exhaust the gratitude of others. When grateful people are unable to respond, they break off the correspondence. To lose them, you have only to place them too greatly in your debt. When they don’t want to pay, they draw away, and turn into enemies. The idol doesn’t want to see the sculptor who carved him, and the benefited does not wish to see his benefactor always before his eyes. So learn this subtle lesson about giving: if the gift is to be appreciated, it should be much desired but cost little.

Note:
The last part is about “Machiavellian giving” to maximize exchanges: give what costs little to you, but that means a lot to the receiver

265. Get those who depend on you into tough situations

A risky situation, at the right moment, has made many people into true persons: it is when you are drowning that you learn to swim. In this way many discovered what they were worth and how much they knew, and all this would otherwise have remained buried in timidity. Difficult situations give us the chance to win renown, and when a noble person finds his honor at risk, he can do more than a thousand others.

Note:
I group it into the social exchange dynamics because this maxim can also be used in a more manipulative, darker fashion.
If someone can get someone in a tough spot, and then rescue them, then your social credits with them go through the roof.
A possible way of doing it is to help them imagine the worst of a situation before you propose your solutions. Then you become a precious "problem solver" for them.

285. Avoid "drag you down" embraces

Original title: "Never die on anotehr's ill-luck"

Know who is in trouble and expect him to call on you for help and mutual consolation. Misery loves company, and the miserable reach out their arms to those on whom they once turned their backs. Be careful when you try to save someone who is drowning. You can't help him without putting yourself in danger.

286. Don't go completely into debt with anyone and everyone

You will become a common slave. Some were born luckier than others; they can do good while others receive it. Freedom is more precious than the gift that makes us lose it. Lay less stress on making many dependent on you than on keeping yourself independent of any. The sole advantage of power is that you can do more good. Above all do not regard responsibility as a favour, for generally it is another's plan to make one dependent on him, and it is someone's cleverness that puts you in a position of debt/responsibility.

Note:
A good maxim to understand that, sometimes, a favor becomes an obligation, and that some favors can rob us of our freedom.
The scene from "The Godfather" is a good example of this dynamic:

> Godfather: Some day, and that day may never come, I'll call on you to do a service for us

10. Bonus Maxims

Some more lessons learned:

7. Don't outshine your boss

Original title: Avoid victories over your superiors

All victories breed hate, and that over your superior is foolish or fatal. Superiority is always odious, especially to superiors and sovereigns. The common sort of advantages can be cautiously hidden, as beauty is hidden with a touch of artful neglect. Most people do not mind being surpassed in good fortune, character, or temperament, but no one, especially not a sovereign, likes to be surpassed in intelligence. For this is the king of attributes, and any crime against it is lèse-majesté. Sovereigns want to be so in what is most important. Princes like to be helped, but not surpassed. When you counsel someone, you should appear to be reminding him of something he had forgotten, not of the light he was unable to see. It is the stars who teach us this subtlety. They are brilliant sons, but they never dare to outshine the sun.

26. Find out each Man's Thumbscrew

The art of moving people's wills involves more skill than determination. You must know how to get inside the other person. Each will has its own special object of delight; they vary according to taste. Everyone idolizes something. Some want to be well thought of, others idolize profit, and most people idolize pleasure. Skill consists in knowing these idols in order to bring them into play. It is like having the key to someone else's desires. Go for the "prime mover," which isn't always something lofty and important. Usually it is something low, for the unruly outnumber the well ruled. First size up someone's character and then touch on his weak point. Tempt him with his particular pleasure, and you'll checkmate his will.

31. Select the Lucky and avoid the Unlucky

Note:
This is not always true.
Sometimes helping up a high-quality individual who was just being unlucky can provide you with the highest possible "social ROI".
See:

- Modern 48 Laws of Power

And:

> The 48 Laws of Power is All Wrong: This Is Why

129. Avoid complaints, share what you want more of Original title: Never complain

Complaints will always discredit you. Better be a model of self-reliance, as opposed to an object of compassion. And to disclose one insult forms an excuse for another. Rather than compassion and consolation, they provoke passion and insolence, and complaints encourage those who hear our complaints to behave like those we complain about. Once divulged to others, the offenses done to us seem to make others pardonable. Some complain of past offenses and give rise to future ones. They want to be helped or consoled, but their listeners feel only satisfaction and even contempt. It is better policy to praise the favors others have done you, so as to win still more of them. When you tell how those absent have favored you, you are asking those present to do the same, and pay in the same coin. The prudent person should never publicize dishonor or slights, only the esteem others have shown him. Thus will he have friends and halve his enemies.

Note:
Also notice that complaints give away your thumbscrews.

203. Know the great men of your age

They are not many. There is one Phœnix in the whole world, one great general, one perfect orator, one true philosopher in a century, a really illustrious king in several. Mediocrities are as numerous as they are worth-less: eminent greatness is rare in every respect.

205. Learn to use scorn

One way to get things is to scorn them. When you look for them, they aren't there, and later, without your trying, they come running. Scorn is also the shrewdest way to take revenge. A wise maxim: Never defend yourself with the pen, for this leaves a trail and glorifies your rivals rather than punishing them for their insolence. Unworthy people cunningly oppose the great: they try to win fame indirectly, without really deserving it. Many people would be unknown if their excellent opponents had paid them no heed. There is no revenge like oblivion: burying others in the dust of their inanity. Impudent fools, they try to become immortal by setting fire to the wonders of the world and of the centuries. One way to quiet vulgar murmuring is to ignore it. To impugn it will harm you. To give it credit brings discredit on you. Be happy that people want to emulate you, though their breath can tarnish, if not blacken, the greatest perfection.

Note:
This is the "Disdain Things You Cannot Have" in "the 48 Laws of Power", but Baltasar goes deeper.

232. Have a touch of the practical / trader

Not everything should be speculation; you must also act. The wisest are easiest to deceive: they may know extraordinary things, but they know nothing of life's ordinary necessities. So let the wise have a touch of the practical, enough not to be deceived and mocked. Know how to get things done: it may not be the highest thing in life, but it is the most necessary. What good knowledge if it isn't practical? These days true knowledge lies in knowing how to live.

Note:
I'd say that you should have "more than a touch". Practical is what achieves goals and brings results.

241. Allow yourself to be joked about, but don't joke about others

The first is a sort of courtesy, but the second will get you into difficulties. The person who is ill-humored at a party is even more of a beast than he appears to be. Excellent jokes are pleasant, and to know how to take them is a sign of talent. If you show you are piqued, you'll make others pick at you again. There is a moment to stop joking and not provide occasion for more. The most serious problems have arisen from joking. There is nothing that requires more attention and skill. Before you begin, know how much someone else can take.

CONS

- Potentially confusing mix of morality and amorality

"The Art of Worldly Wisdom" is a somewhat strange mix of ethical virtuosity, and true amoral Machiavellianism.

I see no issue with mixing the two because they're not opposite: everything has its time.

But it does sounds strange when you turn contradictory approaches into "maxims" and "laws".
Maxims and "laws" are supposed to be general, with few exceptions.

And that's the main reason why I'm not the biggest fan of "laws" formats: it oversimplifies things to the point where it becomes misleading for those who are first learning.

- Better editing needed: some laws have one title, then talk about something totally different

Sometimes there is a disconnect between title of a "law", and its content.
At times, it was also a missed opportunity: the off-topic content, even when not (perfectly) aligned to the title, was great, and deserved its own title/maxim.

- Sometimes cryptic

An already great book, the "Art of Worldly Wisdom" would have been even better with simpler wording.

- The author talks about "national characters"

To assign characters to individuals from certain nationalities is a mistake that many non-enlightened individualists commit.
Countries have cultures, and those cultures most certainly do affect people. But cultures don't necessarily become characters in their citizens. And especially not for each of their citizens.

- The author says that tall people are stupid

Science wasn't as advanced then, but it still doesn't say very flattering things about someone to believe -or to be certain- that height has a strong correlation to intelligence.

- Some "rose-tinted glasses" and "back when it was better" attitude

The author sometimes falls for the typical narrative of "today things are bad, before they used to be better".
These narratives show all their limitations when you read old texts, because you realize how many people today say the exact same things, without realizing that human nature has changed little.

- Negative form of maxims

It's strange that an author of such acuity wrote so many maxims in the negative form -ie.: "don't do this"-, rather than in the positive one -ie.: "do more of this"-.
The positive form is simpler to understand, internalize, and memorize.

PROS

Simply:

- One of the best books on…

Social strategies, life strategies, and power dynamics.

- Deep insights on social exchange

While Robert Greene dialed up the cynicism, Baltasar has a keener eye and understanding of the dynamics of social exchanges.
Social exchanges entail not just manipulation, but also cooperation, and displays of altruism and virtue.

- A mix of Machiavellianism and high quality

Baltasar mixes effective Machiavellianism with what we could define as a high-quality, value-adding approach.
I think that's a great mix to strive towards.

What Baltasar Gracian Say of Robert Greene?

The similarity between “The Art of Worldy Wisdom” and “The 48 Laws of Power” is striking.

Including:

- Many laws are the same
- The “maxim” format is the same
- The “horacle style” of writing is the same

I think Greene, in many ways, improved on Baltasar’s work.
To begin with, he added examples, which are very helpful.
And he added some different and insightful “laws”, while avoiding Baltasar’s repetitions.
He also turned his 48 laws into more amorally-sounding, direct guidelines that sound like a “dark psychology guide for success”. And that was a key ingredient for his book’s success.

Robert Greene was also more successful because he was a better writer. And a better marketer.
But there are plenty of benefits for his readers too: he also made a simpler, more streamlined and “harder hitting” product, easier for mot people to read.
And that is a merit.

On the other hand, I’m not sure that Green has credited Baltasar Gracian’s work nearly enough.
If you look at the list of the 48 laws of power, the resemblance with “The Art of Wordly Wisdom” is so striking that… I’m not so sure where we stand between “inspiration” and “no-credit plagiarism”.

It’s possible though that it’s me who doesn’t remember Robert Greene quoting and crediting Baltasar. That’s possible because I didn’t know Baltasar before reading “The 48 Laws of Power”.
And I certainly haven’t seen or read all Greene’s public statements.
If I realize that I am mistaken, I will happily amend this section.
And I appreciate any reader’s heads up on the matter.

REVIEW

“The Art of Wordly Wisdom” is a masterpiece.

Before you jump into it, keep in mind that this review gave you a good chunk of the value already.
The original work requires some skills to get the most out of it. You need to dig out the gold nuggets sparsed here and there within 300 maxims, some of which are plainer and some of which have a cryptic sentence structure.

Still, this was a true gem.

I learned a lot, and I teased out much inspiration, material, and food for thought for this website’s work and mission to expand and codify power dynamics and life strategies.

ExceptionAL Dating: How to Succeed Despite Shortcomings

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

These questions are everywhere:

- I'm an Indian guy, can I date blonde white women?
- I'm a short guy, can I date tall(er) women?
- I'm an older woman, can I find a high-quality man?

They're all asking the same question:

> Can I succeed, despite being value-negative in this trait here?

Obviously, for the best answer, a personal consultation is needed.

Yet, every exception follows the same rule.
And we can also generalize a few common steps to succeed despite this or that limitation

This is what you will learn in this post: the intersexual dynamics of exceptions, and how anyone can be successful despite this or that limitation.

Before we even begin:

Nick Vujicic has no arms and no legs.

And he went far: in life, in dating, and in his personal happiness and joy.
There are more similar examples.

And there are plenty of people who have fallen in love with animals (zoophilia, includes sexually), things (objectofilia) and, I'm sure this will come soon if it hasn't happened yet, with chatbots.
So, technically, you can do pretty much anything.

That's good to know first, and to get out of the way.

However, on this website, we're not interested in just possibilities.
Here we're interested in maximizing our potential, and maximizing our odds.

And this is what we're going to do in this article.

Overview: The Two Different Camps

Let's begin with an overview.

There are two camps in both dating and general self-development:

- Rules-based approach
- Randomness-based approach

The first camp stresses the general rules and inborn preferences, and how they apply to everyone.

In dating, it stresses a set of personal traits, behavior, and approaches that either work or don't work.
It tends to be a more analytical, "mechanical" approach.
At the extreme, this camp suggest that either you have this, or do that, or you fail.

Let's call this the "objective approach".

The other approach is more about subjectivity, individual differences, cultural differences, personal preferences, changes of preference over time, feelings, and exceptions.
This other approach is also more about "possibilities".

Let's call this the "subjective approach".

The subjectivity approach tends to be more popular in mainstream media, which tends to favor feelings and randomness.
But even in academia, inborn preferences have been ignored in favor of culture and subjectivity for a long time now.

Luckily, the objectivity approach is growing now thanks to authors such as Jordan Peterson, Steven Pinker, and… This website :).
Larger movements that have grown in the last decades such as evolutionary psychology and even the red pill in male self-development have given more impetus to the objectivity approach.

Pros & Cons of Both Camps

There are advantages and risks associated with the extreme versions of both camps.

The risk of the objectivity approach is that some people may grow fatalistic. It becomes a case of "either I got this and that trait, or I'm screwed and nobody will ever like me".
Hopelessness and anger can ensue. A good chunk of the so-called incels tend to follow from the objectivity approach.

The extreme version of the subjectivity approach is equally harmful.
When you downplay human nature, and the more calculative, value-based nature of all human exchanges in favor of randomness, feelings, or "just having to meet the right one", then you're less likely to take action, and to do the things that are most likely to increase your personal value, and your odds of success.
We also call this approach "naive self-help" here:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

Finally, the question we deeply care about here is:

> Which one of these 2 camps is "right", and which one provides you with the mindsets and strategies to succeed.

The Truth In Both Camps

Well, they're both right.

There are objective dating rules that apply to a majority of people, no matter where you are.

But there are also plenty of exceptions to those rules, with an ample margin of personal subjectivity.

For example, the evidence-based Handbook of Relationships Initiations says:

> In summary, outcomes of recent research support the claim that an important part of attraction and relationship initiation is centered in the perceiver.

That basically says "it's subjective".

Which one matters most, the rule, or the subjectivity, depends on many factors.
One of those factors, is whether we're discussing "hard rules", or "weak rules".

Hard rules are genetically ingrained tastes and predispositions that we can indeed generalize to the vast majority of people.
Hard rules tend to be shaped by evolutionary forces, and arose as the best answers to what David Buss calls

"evolutionary problems" (Buss, 2019).
As examples of "hard rules", almost every man prefers a woman with some specific markers of femininity, while almost every woman prefers a man who displays confidence and self-assurance.
The preference for femininity and confidence are two examples of hard rules.

The Pyramid of Sexual Needs

There are several "hard rules", and they are one of the main factors for sexual marketplace dynamics, and for personal sexual market value.
Imagine these "hard rules" as the foundation of the "pyramid of sexual needs":

Lucio's pyramid of sexual preferences
Then on top, there can be culture, local customs, social expectations, religion, family pressures, influences from various friends and social circles and, of course, personal preferences -that still matter somewhat even with many hard rules-, and feelings.

Feelings is a bit of a special case that modulates and "softens" the more calculative side of sexual dynamics.
Just to be clear, feelings are not totally random.
Feelings are usually quicker and more likely to develop in the direction that reinforces either the personal or inborn preferences.
But there are exceptions here too.
And feelings can develop over time, even against inborn tendencies and/or personal preferences.

Each of those layers modulates how the evolutionary drives are expressed.
And each one of them can either reinforce, run against or, in exceptional cases, even negate the inborn tendencies.

Hard Rules: Strength & Distribution

The are two main varialbe to hard rules:

- Strength: how much it weighs, compared to all other traits, in determining an individual overall attractiveness (sexual market value)
  Example: how much does facial attractiveness weigh on a woman's overall attractiveness?
- Distribution: how widespread it is in the whole population, or "how many exceptions there are for this specific rule".

Example: how many men do not obey, or only weakly obey the "older woman is less attractive" rule?

Not all hard rules are equally strong, or equally distributed.

For example, it's a hard rule that men prefer healthy and long hair in a woman.
But it's not a rule that is as strong and as distributed as men preferring a facially attractive woman.
So from this example, albeit both traits are inborn and relatively strong, facial attractiveness in a woman is, on average, more important than her hair length or quality.

Keep in mind that the strength of each rule is subjective and far more subjective than its presence or absence. So you will be hard-pressed to find a man who does not care at all about female facial attractiveness. But some men care much less, or much more, than others.

Rule exceptions: Examples

We will review the rules of age for women, and height for men.

We could have picked any other physical or personality trait, as well as courtship method and dynamic, but we chose these two because one, they're both hard rules, and two, they're rather popular topics.

Older Women

When it comes to age, the rule is that men prefer women in reproductive age, peaking at the low 20ties.

A corollary of the rule is that high-value men who have the power to find and attract women usually go for younger women.

The rule always standing, there are several exceptions.

Including:

- Macron / Brigitte Macron

- Jeff Bezos
- Demi Moore / Ashton Kutcher

An interesting property of exceptions is that exceptions tend to underestimated.

Exceptions tend to be underestimated because people are uncomfortable being the exception, and they prefer adhering to social norms.
A corollary of that rule is that the more extreme the exception, the more people hide it and the more we underestimate it.

For example, guys are comfortable sharing their mild fetish for MILFs.
The deviation from both the social and "evolutionary norm" so people are comfortable sharing the MILF-passion.
But you don't hear much about the 20-something guy who bangs the 50-something.
And you almost never hear about the guy who's attracted to the 70+. The first time I heard it from a friend I was mildly shocked.

For the record, it was a cool guy with a 20-something girlfriend, and the 70+ woman was a common acquaintance.
The lady wouldn't have been attractive in her prime, in my opinion, and what he liked about her was her "warmth".
She was indeed a very warm woman.

Still, the fact that we underestimate exceptions is not equivalent to saying that exceptions are common.
Obviously, exceptions are not common.
Some might even say that the higher the deviation from the norm, the more uncommon the exception becomes -albeit, in the absence of data, I'm not personally convinced about this one-.

To you, it means that consciously being the exception can be a challenging task.

For more information on older women's successes, see "Seduction University" or this review of "Seductresses":

> Seductresses: 12 Traits for Enslaving Men

And now let's get into height for men.

Short Men

If you say “But he’s rich and famous”, well… That’s the point: finding ways to do well despite it all. And yet, here’s the kicker: they started dating BEFORE he became famous Height for men is one of the most universally sought-after traits.

And even there, exceptions exist.

After Butovskaya explains that the Tsimane didn’t pick taller men, she summarizes in the authoritative Cambridge Handbook on Sexual Behavior:

> We suggest that in societies where people are free to choose their partners, women’s height preferences might reflect a preference for taller men, whereas this preference might not be observed in other societies, including polygynous societies with significant wealth stratification or when spouses are predominantly selected by relatives

Those societies don’t include the West.
But exceptions apply even among individual women in the West.
Says one woman in Oga’s overview of sexuality and attraction:

> [In my fantasies] my hero is shorter than everyone else, darker, and therefore highly desirable, but as he is totally vulnerable and powerless he is sexually abused

Yes, you might say that being liked for being powerless and sexually abused is not a goal you want to pursue :).
And I’d totally agree with you.
Still, the end result is that this woman’s hero fantasy is both the shortest and powerless.
Of course, we’re talking rare exceptions here.

But the good news is that to be successful as a short man, you don’t need to find these rare exceptions.
You can be successful with “normal” women who like what most other women like.

And I can talk from first-hand experience here.

My first “serious” girlfriend was quite obviously taller than I am.
The first time we made out in a club, I had to tiptoe and reach up, and even then it wasn’t comfortable (I’m not comfortable posting full pictures without asking for her permission, so please see the ~~YouTube video for some picture previews~~ see our courses instead).
Update to the video: the video says that “the 3 women who pursued me most obviously were all taller”. As I started thinking of past experiences, I realized that of the top 6, 5 were taller. One included a day street situation in which a girl stared, turned around to look at me, and eventually stopped. It was so over the top I thought “Either she’s crazy, or she’s really into me”. She was a highly sexual go-go dancer. To quote Tony Robbins, I’m not saying this to “impress you”, but to “impress upon you” that exceptions can happen without you being famous, super attractive, or super wealthy.

Beyond just height, most neutral onlookers would have rated my ex-girlfriend as far higher sexual market value than I was.
And that is in large part because onlookers only see the “external layers” of sexual market value -and general individual’s level”, and miss the deeper ones.

See more here.

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

What leveled the field then were two important factors:

1. Advantageous sexual market place: college tends to favor men
2. The social circle dynamics: the social circle of college helps bring to the fore the less obvious and visible “outer currencies” (“opaque currencies” to the fore

The college environment is a confined sexual marketplaces that restricts the supply of men to a specific demographic.
So even though I was an idiot back then, 98% of other guys were equally idiots.

College also tends to make some traits more important and salient than others.
Social status, popularity, and “coolness” are far more important in college.
So as long as you have some status and can come across as a mildly cool guy, ideally with some budding leadership qualities, then college can be an easy marketplace.

The second factor was embedded in the dynamics of social circles.
If I had met her on cold approach, chances are that it wouldn’t have gone anywhere. Well, never say never, but the odds were more no than yes.
The social circle gives your personality the opportunity to shine through and to “grow” on women.
And that’s one of the reasons why social circles can be great venues for guys who are not the most attractive, but who are nonetheless high-value guys. And they’re also good for some minorities who might be considered “less appealing” in certain sexual marketplaces.

Of, course, the obvious caveats to make social circles work for you is that: one, you must acquire status/ower. And two, those social circles must have the women you find attractive. A social circle of gamers won’t help your dating life much but, I guess, you know that already :).

You Miss Exceptions Because You Don’t Pursue Them

It’s not like women throw themselves at me, of course.

But if I had to remember the top 3 women that chased me in the most obvious manner, all the 3 of them were taller women. Of the top 5, 4 were taller.
And yes, that included attractive taller women.

The reason why they made it more obvious is that they thought that I, being shorter, wasn't going to pursue them.
And so it was up to them to make the move.
And the funny thing is… They were right.

Most shorter guys self-reject themselves first, they'll never make a move, and they'll miss on plenty of women who might have been down for it. Guys have probably missed millions of chances because they self-rejected first.

Remember, for 3 women who made the first move, many more were equally interested, but didn't make the move.
And you'll never find out unless you take your chances.

In that sense, the subjectivity approach provides you with better mindsets.
When you believe that many taller women can find you (sexually) attractive, you will take more chances.
Which of course will lead to more rejections, but also to more success.

Alright, now let's connect the exceptions back to the rules.

Exceptions: Higher SMV Partner

Many people confuse what we call here "assortative mating" with "exception".

Assortative mating means that people seek the best they can get and, given that everyone else is doing the same, people pair up around their overall level of sexual market value.
However, on the outside, couples can still look very different, and a couple can be equally matched even while one partner is (far) more attractive than the other.

These couples where one partner is more attractive than another can be "false exceptions", since in truth the two often match each other in terms of overall value.
So in my previous example of me and my taller, more attractive ex, it's a moot point whether or not we truly were an exception.

However, it's also possible to have exceptions where couples get together at different overall levels of sexual market value and personal value.

When that happens, there are often several different factors that influence the partner who is higher sexual market value.
Let's call them "environmental factors".
And that also means that environmental factors can provide you with the opportunity to snag a higher-value partner.

Example of Environmental Factors: My Brother

My brother is a great example.

He has nothing special about him.
He's not particularly attractive, not driven, not well-learned, and I can't think of anything outstanding about him -except for his "poetic" spirit, more on it later-.
He's also a poor provider, and he wasn't even experienced when he first met his wife.

His wife is physically more attractive than he is, and personality-wise leaps and bounds ahead of him.
She even takes charge of the household and is a better provider (!), and does all the cooking, the cleaning, plus all the upkeeps (!).

If you put my brother and her wife side by side and asked people to rate them as any significant presence in your life, be it a sexual partner, a friend, or a business partner, almost everyone would rate her far higher than him.

My brother truly punched far above his weight.
You can even it in the children: they're far higher value -and even quality- than he is.

So… How did that relationship take place?

A series of environmental factors, including:

1. Artificially lower SMV for her: she came from a very old-school, male chauvinist household in which only men were allowed to study. So although she was even book-smarter than my bro, she wasn't allowed to even attend high school. That artificially kept her "lower" than my bro at least in the education department
2. Early bud effect: some young women are too inexperienced to date with a good grasp of value exchanges. They're not very good at assessing personal value and other people's value. And that can allow some men to "snag" them without them ever realizing they could have gotten better. Then feelings might develop, and those men can be safe with them longer-term (but that's not always the case)
3. Family orientation: by culture, family, and personal preferences, she wanted a traditional family. That made my brother's lack of certain traits somewhat less important, and traits such has "willingness to commit" rose in importance, and helped to make up for all the rest
4. Personal backgrounds: albeit as a person she is awesome, her family was lower status compared to my brother's family. That matters much more for women who look for long-term, as this was the case.
   So in that realm as well, she could at least look up to my brother. And that helped him quite a bit.

Finally, my brother also had some merits.
Specifically, he pursued her hard, which works particularly well for women who seek long-term commitment, as hard pursuit signals long-term commitment and willingness to invest.

Also, my brother has a "poetic vein", and he used that in his courtship. That works great with some women, and it worked well with her (there's 14 years of difference between me and my brother, and I remember sneaking into his room as a kid and read some snippets of their letters. Even then, they seemed overly long and saccharine to me. P.S.: not proud of the sneaking thing).

Finally, this is a case where feelings also "got in the way".
She eventually fell for him and, even today I believe, she still considers him the man of his life.

What's the lesson learned here, besides the fact that exceptions are possible, and circumstances can upset the general rule of "people matching their SMV level"?

Well, the practical lesson is that it's possible to find partners, in certain specific environments and circumstances, with which you can more reliably "punch above your weight".

The Rules in the Exception

Exceptions also follow their own "mathematical rules".

This chapter explains the math of exceptions.

First off, the evidence of exceptional dating:

The Science & Math of Exceptional Dating

Quoting from the Oxford Handbook of Evolutionary Psychology:

> more recently, researchers demonstrated that a compensatory decision-making strategy (where traits that are > high in value can ofset those that are low in value) using weighted-sum calculations outperformed the Euclidean distance model and noncompensatory models such as take-the-best, threshold, and aspiration (Brandner et al. , 2020)

Note:
Please note that the “math” is extremely simplified to support the logic, which is more important than the actual numbers. There is too much variance to find utility in hard numbers, and understanding the logic is what matters here.
Furthermore, the charts are scaled down to be visually more logical and compelling.

Overweight: 1 Strike, 1/50

Let’s imagine you’re breaking a hard rule.
Let’s say, you’re overweight.
1 in 2.000 women, for some rare exceptional quirk, finds it attractive; 1 in a 100 doesn’t care about it; and 1 in 50 doesn’t care too much about it.

So you are facing more challenging odds, but since it’s only one trait among many, there is plenty of room to make up for it.

Overweight & Awkward: 2 Strikes, 1/2.500

For simplicity, let's imagine that you don't make up for it.

And that on top of being overweight you're also socially awkward.
Now you need to find a girl who doesn't care so much about extra kilos, and who also doesn't care much about social awkwardness. Now it's 1 in 50, of 1 in 50. Total, it's 1 in 2.500 who's willing to welcome you without a negative pre-frame.

Overweight, Awkward & Destitute: 3 Strikes, 1/125.000

Now imagine you're, overweight, awkward, and chronically jobless.

Now you need to find a girl who doesn't care about extra kilos, awkwardness, and destitution.
Now it's 1 in 50, of 1 in 50, of 1 in 50. It's 1 in 125.000.

Now you're in "good luck" territory.

Good luck territory means that yes, a "chance" technical still exists, but it's unlikely to materialize even putting in the hard work.
So it's not technically wrong to tell the overweight, poor, and awkward guy that "there is someone for you out there". The problem is that, even if technically that might be true, it's still a fantasy.
It's a fantasy because you will most likely go a lifetime without meeting the girl who pays little attention to all your rule-breaking.
Plus, even if you do meet one, it's possible that you don't take your chance, or that she's not your type.
And even if you meet her and she's your type and you took your chances, it's possible that you are you're so little used to dating -and dating well- that it simply won't go anywhere despite the possibility, on paper, was there.

So you see where I'm going.

Exceptions without rebalancing qualities are like items on a logarithmic scale.
When you string a few exceptions in a row, it becomes an exponentially steep uphill climb.

That's the reality of exceptions.

Luckily, the same dynamics work in both directions.

Destitute But Driven: Back to Neutral Territory

Let's take again destitution: you're poor, but you're driven and working on a more or less promising vision of yours.

In that case, you can effectively cancel out the issue of joblessness.

By how much you cancel out the issue of destitution also depends on a few factors, including:

- Your seducer style
- The environment you're in, where some environments place a premium on wealth

- Her personality type, since some women care more about money and some less

And a few more variables.
But the main concept is that the "negative drag" of most hard rules' breaking can be addressed and fixed.

Overweight But Totally Awesome: Getting Back to Hunk Mode

The same logarithmic scale can work in your favor as an exception as well.

So if you break one rule, a couple of rules, or even several rules, but not too badly (see "intensity"), and you more than makeup for it with an excess of value in other important traits… Then the scale starts pushing you back up very quickly.

And you're golden.

Rule Breaking Concept: Intensity

Finally there is the "intensity" to keep in mind.

Intensity refers to how much positive or negative value you have in each treat.

This should be pretty straightforward.
For example, "poor" is very different if we're talking about "below average income" or "jobless and in tattered clothes".

Summing Up "Exceptional Dynamics"

1. One issue doesn't remove you from the sexual market
2. You can generally "offset" one issue or a few issues with relative ease
3. But you're quickly in a bad place if you break even a couple of attraction rules without offsetting (it's a logarithmic scale)

How to Be Exceptional

As usual, we like to make our articles pragmatic.

So, how do you become the:

- Indian guy who dates blonde white women
- Short guy who dates taller women
- Poor guy who dates high quality and even professional women
- Unattractive woman married to a doting man
- Older woman dating attractive men

Here is how:

1. Know you can: stamp the following in your mind: you ain't no f*cking group. If "short men", "Indian men", "older women", "poor men" etc., etc. struggle more… That says nothing about you.
   You're an individual, and as an individual, the general rule or the general group dynamics don't necessarily apply to you. Read "enlightened individualism" please.
2. Become exceptional: to become, literally, "exceptional", it helps -a lot- to be exceptional, in the sense of extraordinary, in some ways or the other. Being exceptional means that you're at the top of some groups or professions. That means success and skills, which naturally increase your SMV. Plus, you can get some fame and visibility, and fame is one of the best shortcuts to dating success
3. Learn what the men and women you like want: or, to use this article's wording, learn what the "hard rules" are, what traits the women and men you like want -this website is one of the best places for that-
4. Work on yourself to increase your value to the men and women you like: or, to use this article's wording, "obey as many rules as possible". There are two ways to go about it:
   1. Turn your limitations around: for example, short men who want to date taller women can make their lives easier by developing some good physique / muscles. That can go a long way to address the "physical disparity" between the two
   2. Add extra-value in other areas: for example, Berlusconi kept "enjoying the company" of countless young ladies because he had an excess of value in power, lifestyle / luxury parties, and of course wealth

5. Take chances: no matter what you've got and where you stand, dating never stops being a number's game
6. Learn game / power dynamics: I'm a big believer that social skills are one of the most important fundamentals of social, life, and dating success alike. Start with basic social skills first, make sure you have the basics covered. Too many people start with "game", but remain fundamental weirdos at heart and that holds them back big time
7. Learn and apply smart strategies: there is plenty of material on "game", but little on strategies. It's a pity because smart strategies can revolutionize your results. This website though also covers strategies.

The Confidence Game: How Conmen Manipulate You (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"The Confidence Game" (2016) is a book about con artists, snake oil salesmen, and manipulators.
Maria Konnikova, the author, seeks to go at the psychological roots that are common to each con game, combining both the con artists' efforts, and the victims' self-manipulation.

SUMMARY

About the Author:
Maria Konnikova graduated from Harvard University with a B.A. in psychology and creative writing while being mentored by Steven Pinker. She later received a Ph.D. in Psychology from Columbia University. Konnikova is a regular contributor writer at The New Yorker and has published two other books: "Mastermind: How to Think Like Sherlock Holmes" and "The Biggest Bluff".

10 Steps of A Con

The con can be structured as:

1. Put-up: finding the right victim
2. Play: creation of empathy and rapport. And of liking.
   It can start very small, with familiarity and "mere exposure", and enhanced with conversation, finding commonalities, and remembering people's names and conversation details.
   Some cons are based on false knowledge, like pretending to be someone's relative at a wedding.
3. Rope: logic and persuasion
4. Scheme: the tale
   One of the reasons cons work so well is because in good part we want to believe the tale, we want to believe things that are too good to be true
5. Convince: the evidence, the way it will work, and the showing of the profits

6. Breakdown: the self-convincing that goes on as we get more and more deeply into the con
   "The good confidence man has been working his way up to this very moment, the moment when "Too good to be true" turns into "Actually, this makes perfect sense": I am exceptional, and I deserve it. It's not too good to be true; it is exactly what I had coming to me."
7. Send: the victim willingly increases investment
8. Touch: the "hit" of the con
9. Blow-off: the con becomes clear
10. Fix: the con artist takes distance.
    But he might not need to do anything since the victim will either defend the con artist, selectively forget being conned, or fail to report the con artist to avoid embarrassment

Con Artists Can Be Very "Power Protecting"

On this website, we use the expression "power protecting" for strategies and techniques that prevent people from feeling attacked or pressuref, and clam up and dislike you as a consequence.

Con artists can also be very power protecting to make you feel good and in control.
Says Konnikova:

> There's nothing a con artist likes to do more than make us feel powerful and in control: we are the ones calling the shots, making the choices, doing the thinking. They are merely there to do our bidding.

That way, people lower their guard.

Also see:

> Power Protecting: How to Keep Win-Win With High-Value People

The Power Game

Con artists often seek to embody positions and ranks that grant them status and power.
Think of titles such as doctor, researcher, or group belonging such as aristocracy, political elite, or "the wealthy club".

The status and power from the position make people more likely to believe the con, and also less likely to question him.
Says Konnikova:

> You want the powerful to like you, not to think you petty for deigning to question their integrity, and so you keep any doubts to yourself

Con Artist Techniques

Some of the techniques:

- "Imagine that… "

"Picture this", "imagine that", "would you do with the money".
This type of exercise makes people more excited, more focused on the reward, more risk-taking… And less rational.

- Overload

One classic example is the magician Darren Brown, who managed to pay people with pieces of paper while he bombarded them with stimuli and with "embedded commands":

Psychologist Katherine Milkman found that when we are bombarded with stimuli, we are more likely to make decisions that fit with what we want to do rather than what we should do.

- Pressuring for a decision

Under pressure we are more likely to follow a strong authority that pushes us in a certain direction, rather than choosing what's best for us.

Who Are Con Artists? The Dark Triad

Part of the dark triad are:

- Psychopathy

On one level, the data seems to suggest a direct correlation between con artistry, and psychopathy.
When people acquire the neural impairment of psychopaths, they also start to behave more like con artists.
So psychopathy is a sort of "biological predisposition" that leads to many of the behavior we expect from con artists.

- Narcissism

A sense of superiority, that one deserves more, can lead to cutting corners or lying.

- Machiavellianism

High machs tend to be among the most successful manipulators in society.
The author here reviews some of the classic studies on Machiavellianism from Geis and Christie.

Says the author:

> Machiavellianism may, like psychopathy, predispose people toward con-like behaviors and make them better able to deliver on them

Psychologist Delroy Paulhus, who specializes in the dark triad traits, suggests that "Machiavellian" is a better descriptor of the con artist than "psychopath."

But Genes Aren't Everything

However, says the author, con artists aren't simply born, but they're also made.
And she says, very astutely:

> The exact same traits could easily be put to use in more or less devious ways. The choice is not predetermined. And the presence of Machiavellianism or psychopathy or narcissism no more marks someone as a grifter than the presence of charisma or nonchalance.

So part of the mix that pushes people towards con artistry are:

- Predisposition
- Opportunity
- Plausible rationale

And it's also:

A Slippery Slope Towards Full-Fledged Cons

The author uses one example to show how one generally well-behaving CFO ended up badly cooking the books after he started with a small fudging first.

Then, in the next quarter, the business didn't get better, and he got more and more mired in his own lie.

Says the author:

> There's no such thing as an innocent cutting of the ethical corner. Once you've decided to get on the sled, and have eased yourself over the edge of the hill, it's too late to break.

The author seems to suggest that the slippery slope can be "technical", as in the case above, but also emotional:

> It's like in the Mafia movies: the only one that matters is the first one you kill. After that, piece of cake.

We All Can Be Con Men

Ultimately, the author says that it's difficult to make up an exact profile of a con man because we all have the capacity to become one.

And we certainly have all lied and deceived, which, she says, is a hallmark of life in general.

Dark Triad Individuals Aren't Necessarily Con Artists

Many dark triad individuals simply operate "within the law", or at least not "too obviously outside it".

Says the author:

> If confidence men operate outside the law, it must be remembered that they are not much further outside than many of our pillars of society who go under names less sinister." Leadership and high-profile roles. Wall Street. Politics. Law. Test most any of them, and you'll find a percentage of psychopaths and dark-triadists that makes Hare's 1 percent > estimate look naïvely low

Marketers Are Con Men

Hunt and Lawrence (1984) administered the Machiavellian scale to 1.000 marketers and found that 10% scored in the highest possible and "far, far above the population average".

As Seth Godin said, "all marketers are liars".

Con Artists Thrive During Changes

> Cons thrive in times of transition and fast change, when new things are happening and old ways of looking at the world no longer suffice. Transition is the confidence game's great ally, because transition breeds uncertainty. There's nothing a con artist likes better than exploiting the sense of unease we feel when it appears that the world as we know it is about to change.

This Is When You're Most Likely to Fall for Cons

If you are:

- isolated or lonely

- going through a job loss, divorce, or downturn in personal finances
- concerned with being in dept (people in debt are generally more likely to fall for fraud)
- going through a serious injury
- going through major life changes

Victims tend to be generally more emotionally vulnerable when the con artist approaches.

This Is Who Is Most Likely to Fall for Cons

From personal traits, the only two reliable indicators of fraud susceptibility are:

- impulsivity
- appetite for risk

Please note though that impulsivity and appetite for risk aren't stable, and can change through time.
When we are struggling, we might be more willing to take risks to "get back even", for example.

But the author then also adds the following to the personality traits that make people more likely to fall for cons:

- a general tendency to believe
  - optimism:
  - religiosity: "It's a thin line between belief in one miracle and belief in another"

Such as, they believed things could get better, and that a "higher force" could help them.

Interestingly, in the category of "most easy to con", the author also includes:

- people who think of themselves as too smart to fall for cons

Says the author:

> The better protected you are and the less likely you think you'll be a victim, the more you're apt to lose if a con artist can find a way to earn your trust. It ends up that the more you know about something, the more likely you are to fall for a con in that specific area.

Furthermore there are:

- people in a state of fear
- people in a happy mood
- people feeling relief after anxiety ("the emotional drain of anxiety followed by the wave of emotional relief created a state of relative mindlessness)

For con artists, it means that a great setup is to create a sense of fear, followed by the possibility of a solution -the solution they offer-.

And finally:

- People who think of themselves as special

And this might be most people.
Most people think they're better than average.
And the more we care about a certain trait, the more biased we tend to be:

> In the things that truly matter to us, the core characteristics that we view as central to our identity, we exhibit the greatest bias of all

> Which is precisely why the tale works as well as it does. We are ready—eager, even—to believe we will personally benefit, no matter what

No matter what, and no matter the odds.

If you believe you're a 1%, then you're also more likely to believe that even though there is a 99% chance that what you're experiencing might be a con… You're more likely to be that 1% exception.

Con artists are all the happiest to appeal to our vanity and our tendency to think of ourselves as "better than average".

And this is another why an antifragile ego is so important.

Cons Go Unreported Because...

Because people would rather never admit they were conned.

It's a question of:

- self-narrative: we don't want to admit it to ourselves
- reputation: we don't want the world to know that we were gullible

Con Artists Take Advantage of Human Natural Cooperation

For the most part, humans have evolved as cooperative animals and we can kind of expect that most people are not going to attack us randomly.

Konnikova says that most people kinda care about others, and the con artist exploits that general cooperativeness.

Quoting psychologist Adriane Raine:

> Persistent immoral behavior can be thought of as an alternative evolutionary strategy that can be beneficial at low rates in society

Trusting Is Good for Selfish Individuals

This website makes the case that smart cooperation is one of the best facilitators of individual success.

And says the author:

> Higher so-called generalized trust, studies show, comes with better physical health and greater emotional happiness.
> Countries with higher levels of trust tend to grow faster economically and have sounder public institutions.
> People who are more trusting are more likely to start their own business and volunteer.
> And the smarter you are, the more you are likely to trust: a 2014 survey by two Oxford psychologists found a strong positive relationship between generalized trust, intelligence, health, and happiness.

How to Increase Cooperation

Elinor Nostrom found out that people left on their own, without chances of communicating, tend to resort to "safer" returns rather than higher returns but having to trust anonymous others.

- Make people meet face to face

But when Nostrom changed the rule and took a break where people could meet face to face, the players reached 80% of the maximum possible return by playing more often into the more socially-interconnected, higher risk, higher-collaboration market.
"All it had taken was that brief moment of social exchange".

- Punish the defectors

> one final tweak brought performance to a new high: the ability to request that "defectors," that is, those who opted for market one, be punished by the experimenter with a fine.

- Develop a good reputation

Win-win games can be developed more easily over the long-term.
But you can still increase the likelihood of win-win in one-off games if you develop a good reputation that precedes you.
With a good reputation, people are more likely to be collaborative.

Cults Hide Behind Partial Truths, And Partial Self-Help

> Nobody joins a cult, Sullivan repeated often and emphatically.

People join something that will give them meaning.
A group promoting peace and freedom throughout the world, or defending men's rights, or helping other women, or "defending this race against that other race's contamination".
But nobody joins a cult.

Con artists, at their best and worst, give us meaning. We fall for them because it would make our lives better if the reality they proposed were indeed true. They give us a sense of purpose, of value, of direction.

More Wisdom

- And the top cons are…

Between 2011 and 2012 the highest number of recorded cons were in fake weight-loss products, prize promotions, price clubs, unauthorized Internet billing, and work-at-home programs.

- The best cons go undetected

People simply write it off to "bad luck", and never realize the deception.

- People share negative news IF others know about them

People prefer to share good news with the world, and keep bad news with the closest friends and family.
But that changes if someone else witnessed the negative news.
In that case, students in the experiment were more likely to share the bad news. Probably, the students expected the witnesses to talk, and so they were eager to talk first to put their own spin on things, and control the narrative.

- Our willingness for things to work can make things work

This part made me change approach to a few of my reviews:

> Mesmerism is one of the earliest examples of the power of our beliefs to change reality: the placebo effect, or dissonance reduction at its finest, in full action. We want to believe something works, and so we will it to work. Our mind literally changes the reality of our body's health.

> Mesmer clearly possessed strong powers of suggestion, and people really did get better in his presence

So today I'm not so sure that dubious marketers like Joe Dispenza are 100% bad.

- To avoid fraud in your business, speak clearly from the top

Since the environment and culture are so important in fostering or discouraging manipulation and con artistry, business leaders who want to avoid scandals and graft must speak clearly and loudly that they expect everyone to behave morally and legally.

Says the author:

> The behavioral norms of a company, culture, or setting—how it is and isn't acceptable to act—must be communicated clearly and unequivocally. When they aren't, it becomes too easy for those on the cusp of fraud to take the next step.

- Culture also matters

Some cultures are also more accepting of behaviors that we might consider con-like.
In one study, foreign students were more likely to pay a kickback than American ones, no matter the incentives.
In some countries, like Russia, to people it might just feel like "how the world works".

- Pathological liars are poor con artists

A pathological liar's lies are often too big and elaborate to be taken seriously.

- Higher illusion of control makes us less effective

The illusion of control, or the belief that we are in control of random events, tends to make people less effective:

> an unwarranted illusion of control can have the opposite effect: worse, more out-of-control performance.
> One study followed 107 traders in four London banks and found that those with the highest illusion of control performed the worst, as measured by managers' ratings of performance and the total compensation they received.
> In another, people pursued worse investment diversification strategies the higher their perceptions of control.
> In a third, the more illusory control a group of financial analysts experienced, the more overconfident—and wrong—they were in their market predictions.

- People talk mostly about other people

> When researchers analyzed the topics (…) over 65 percent of every conversation was taken up with social topics—for the most part, discussing others' behavior and analyzing your own relative merits, or how others acted and what kind of a person you are

- Con artists and beggars target men on dates…

… Because those men are in a difficult situation in which they need to positive impress the date.
This is something I've noticed more than once, and I was never happier when I could get rid of them quickly, with no damage -or improved standing-.

QUOTES

On self-manipulation for personal success:

> The whole secret to our success is being able to con ourselves into believing that we're going to change the world—because statistically, we are unlikely to do it.
> Tom Peters

On self-serving biases:

> When it comes to you, I see clearly. When it comes to myself, I see what I want

On self-duping and people wanting to believe:

> Had it been up to Raines, he might have kept believing until the end. It would have been a simpler, happier reality. And that basic desire for a happier, simpler reality is at the center of the convincer's success.

On the psychological dynamics of self-duping, whereby the more time people spend in the con, the more they self-dupe:

> Fool me for a day, shame on you. Fool me for months, years, or decades, well, that's a different story. I'm not that gullible. I couldn't possibly be fooled for that long.

On the power of reputation to increase the chances of win-win:

> A reputation is a shortcut. It lets us know how someone will likely act and how we should respond to them even if we've never met or spent any time getting to know them

Criticism

Misunderstands evolutionary processes: not spotting lies is adaptive?

The author says that we are bad at spotting lies because "it makes us feel better".
And she also says that we self-manipulate for the same reason.

However, that's not how evolution works.
Evolution doesn't select much for the traits that make us feel good, but for the traits that make us more effective.

I can see there can be some benefits in making oneself happier as long as the costs remain small enough.
But not when the costs are high, as it's the case for what the author says next:

> We never learn to be expert people-readers because that expertise can backfire spectacularly. Why form accurate judgments when the inaccurate ones make our lives far more pleasant and easy?

Not reading people well might make our life more pleasant in some limited circumstances. But it certainly doesn't make them easier -or more effective-.

Over-hypes con artists' powers

For sure some con artists are great at what they do.

But I'm sure not all of them are.

In Konnikova's description though it seems like everyone is some sort of a dark-psychology genius that you can never see coming.

She says for example:

> they are, truly, artists—able to affect even the most discerning connoisseurs with their persuasive charm
> (…)
> Their technique, at its best, is so perfectly honed that almost no one is immune to it. So dangerous is the effect that there are actual statutes trying to guard against it

And of Demara, a specific con artist, she says:

> He was a mind reader second to none, so good at the put-up that he could manipulate almost anyone he chose to deal with.

Except that she's judging him on his successful cons, and she probably doesn't know of all the times he's failed. Plus, he was caught and spent six months in prison.

Downplays the role of personality, skills, and knowledge, in the "likelihood of being conned"

The author makes it sound like being deceived is independent of personality.

And goes on to describe how even the smartest and most power-aware individual is equally easy prey for the con artist.
As a matter of fact, she says that everyone will be deceived:

> At some point, everyone will be deceived. Everyone will fall victim to a confidence artist of one stripe or another. Everyone will fall for it. The real question is why

That approach might be more captivating and get better reviews for the book, but it's not very accurate. Personally, I'm pretty sure that different personalities have a (very) different likelihood of being deceived.

And some of her own examples seemed to prove the point: some of those victims were extremely gullible people, as also confirmed by the people closest to them.

Confusing on the "illusory superiority" bias

There are some imperfections and some of the usual "over-hype" in the section in which the author discusses the "illusority superiority" bias.

In one of them, the author says that "most people are average by definition".
But that's a generalization that's not always true.
Whether or not most people are average depends on the distribution. Most people might instead be either above average, or below average.

Plus, the author speaks as if nobody was actually above average and as if anyone who thought of himself as above-average truly was not.
Obviously, that's also not the case as some individuals do are indeed above average.

Sometimes sounds judgmental, not realizing her own cons?

Says the author of Dale Carnegie work:

> "Try honestly to see things from the other person's point of view," Dale Carnegie advised in his treatise on winning friends and influencing people, a sort of unwitting bible for cons in training.

That sounds a bit harsh and judgmental.
Especially if you consider how the book "The Confidence Game" used so many interesting stories for selling better. So wasn't that a con as well?

The point is… As long as we're not actively and badly hurting people with our social strategies, then we're good, we don't need to be so judgmental towards smart social strategies.

Sometimes gets lost in tangential topics: could have been briefer

Topics such as:

- "how good we are at spotting lies"
- microexpressions
- storytelling and how effective it is Felt somewhat unneeded, or too long.

In some parts, it felt like the book started becoming a book on random curiosities of general psychology. Topics such as human biases, nudging theory, Cialdini's principles of influence felt loosely connected to con artists.

Review

The Confidence Game is a solid analysis of the psychology and mechanisms of dark psychology, manipulation, and cons.

There might be a few minor imperfections as mentioned above, but I learned from it and also used Konnikova's work to expand on some core articles and pillars of this website.

12 Traits To Be An Effective Machiavellian

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Machiavellianism is one of the most misunderstood concepts in personality psychology and men's empowerment.

Some see it as synonymous with deceit, while others mistake it for pure evil.
But true Machiavellianism is neither—it's about strategic thinking, adaptability, and playing the long game to win.

At The Power Moves, we specialize in the psychology of power and influence. After reviewing the full body of research and integrating it with real-world experience, we provide a clear, practical, and continuously updated guide to understanding and applying Machiavellianism.

Let's dive in.

What's Machiavellianism

Definition:

> Machiavellianism is a personality trait peculiar to self-centered and amoral individuals who pursue personal advancement through a calculative, rational, and opportunistic approach to life

This definition is unique because it excludes manipulation and cheating.

Deception is at most a consequence of Machiavellians' predispositions, not a primary trait.

Indeed studies have shown that, when cheating doesn't pay, Machiavellians cheat less than non-Machiavellians.

Why Learning Machiavellianism

Says Tamás Bereczkei:

> Their self-assuredness and goal orientation provide them with immense advantages over others in gaining material goods and favorable positions. In contrast, low Machs are concerned with personal relationships and moral norms that often make them vulnerable.

And says Maria Konnikova:

> In one series of studies, when a high Mach was placed in a situation with a low Mach, he tended to emerge ahead in most any scenario.
> Konnikova, 2016

It makes sense.

Machiavellians tend to be charismatic, charming, and leaderlike.
Couple that with a strategic and opportunistic approach to life, and you get why Machiavellians win.

And "winning" is why you want to learn "how to be more Machiavellian".

Machiavellian Traits

These are the defining traits of Machiavellianism:

1. Self-centered

Machiavellians put their self-interests first.

A 2014 study aptly titled "Valuing myself over others" found that Machiavellians value individual pursuits over collectivist values such as "loyalty to the community".

"What's in It For Me" Keeps Machiavellians Goal-Focused

The Machiavellian is the ultimate "homo economicus".

He asks himself "What's in it for me"?
And if the answer is "not much", he sees no point in expending effort.

Non-Machiavellians are more likely to waste time and resources because they regard it as a moral obligation to do their duty.

2. Influential

People consider Machiavellians to be charismatic and effective leaders (Deluga 2001).

Machiavellians are skilled at managing appearances and first impressions.
And they come across as intelligent even though research shows they're no more intelligent than others.

More persuasive liars

Research shows Machiavellians are also better liars: more persuasive, and coming across as more innocent.
It's an innate 'skill' displayed already as children.

3. Dominant

Say Christie and Geis commenting on their studies:

> Machiavellians initiated and controlled the structure of bargaining interaction in the group. They were overwhelmingly the dominant, decisive, and sought-after member of the triad.

By controlling group dynamics, Machiavellians heavily influence the outcome.

The best thing?

People were happy to oblige.

Machs Are Good at Making Others Want to Follow Them

Machiavellians might use coercion, if they can.

But often, they don't need to because people look up to Machiavellians for directions.

To make people want to follow is the hallmark of prestige and true leadership.

Christie and Geis say it's not possible to say if Machiavellians are charismatic, or if non-Machiavellians are UNcharismatic and socially inept.
However, the net result is the same: Machiavellians get what they want because others happily oblige.

3. Strategic

Robert Hare famously said that psychopaths see the world as a chessboard.

But later research showed that the true chess grand masters of the dark triad are the Machiavellians.

4. Calculative

Machiavellians are good calculators.

They cheat and deceive, but only when the benefits exceed the costs.
And if the risk/reward ratio is poor, they'll act morally.

If their calculation suggests that "prosocial giving" is best for them, they will even be altruistic.

5. Amoral

Machiavellians do what's good for them independently of moral principles.

In social exchanges, Machiavellians don't feel bound by reciprocity or "fairness".
In a classic sociological experiment on trust and theft, high Machs stole from those who had previously trusted them.

By contrast, non-Machiavellians gave up substantial material gains to obey fairness and responsibility norms.

6. Opportunistic

Machiavellians are the princes of opportunism,

Even Machiavellians' expressions of (a)morality is opportunistic.

There is a difference between amorality and *im*morality.
Immorality means going against morals. Amorality means not having morals and doing what's expedient.

Says Bereckzei:

> In most cases, they are unwilling to help others.
> But they are ready to support unknown individuals when they are aware of being observed by members of the community. That way, they maintain their prestige (or its illusion) in the group (Bereczkei, Birkas, & Kerekes 2010).

Modern Machiavellian marketers aren't even bound by physical audiences. They'll set up the cameras themselves:

Says the "charitable man" in the video after handing out $1.000 dollars:

> Machiavellian marketer:
> some people say I shouldn't do stuff like this and put the video public (…) to show off <— Raises the most likely criticism to address it and control the narrative
> And there is some truth to that <— Strategic agree part of the agree-and-redict technique
> Although <— Bridge to set his frame
> I think there is so much negative media, I think it's OK to publish some positive stuff <— Justifies his PR move as "spreading positivity"

Nice power moves.

He gives both supporters and the naive masses a reason to believe his actions are well-meaning.

7. Cynic

> A man always has two reasons for doing anything: a good reason and the real reason.

Machiavellians are suspicious, and attribute negative traits and intentions to others.

But they're honest about their cynicism, and view non-Machiavellians as weak hypocrites.
In turn, that makes it fair in Machiavellians' view to take advantage of them.

There may be downsides to over-cynicism though.
Some scholars suggest Machs preemptively cheat believing it's only a matter of time before they'll get cheated on.
And that may turn win-win into win-lose.

8. Realist

Machiavellians concentrate on what is -and how to exploit it-.

Non-Machiavellians instead easily get lost in "how things ought to be", or "what's fair".

9. Pragmatic

Machiavellians aren't motivated by appeals to higher values.

To them, that's hot air BS for the gullible.

Instead, research shows that Machiavellians are motivated by extrinsic motivations such as money, power, and influence.

10. Rational

Machiavellians are generally more rational than non-Machiavellians.

It's because non-Machiavellians are more easily swayed by IRrational reasons.

11. Emotionally Cool

Christie and Geis call this the “Cool Syndrome”.

Machiavellians think more rationally and consider all available options and possibilities in a cold-minded manner (Pilch, 2008), less swayed by emotions (Deak, 2017).

“Muted” empathy, but effective strategists & manipulators

Here is a quick overview of the empirical findings:

Machiavellians score lower on some types of emotional and social intelligence tests.
But they performed well when agreeableness was eliminated and they had something to gain.
And when they could gain through manipulation, they were very effective manipulators.

The same goes for “mind-reading skills”.
Machiavellians may be average or poor mind readers. But they score above average when they can manipulate others.

“That’s why we critiqued the pop-psychology view of emotional intelligence (Goleman, 1995).
A more comprehensive construct, including strategic, self-interested, and manipulative aspects, is essential.

Emotionally Cold Leadership

A famous cinematic moment of Machiavellian cold-bloodedness and strategic thinking:

> Godfather: It’s not personal, Sonny. It’s strictly business

Michael Corleone gained everyone’s respect when he displayed cold detachment and superior strategic thinking.
That’s when he became The Godfather.

12. Fluid

Machiavellians aren’t just strategic, they are fluidly strategic.

Says Bereczkei:

> Machiavellians (…) do not follow pre-existing schema (…) The uniqueness of the Machiavellian character lies in (…) flexible decision-making (…) and continuous weighing-up of the situational conditions.

Fluidity has been shown in experimental settings:

> Machiavellians earn large profits in social dilemma games but once the experimenters enable free-riders punishment, they restrain their profiteering and increase their cooperativeness (Spitzer et al. 2007).

Even during a mock business negotiation, Machiavellians used more persuasion tactics, and adapted more flexibly to the changing situation.

Mach & Dark Triad

The dark triad includes Machiavellianism, psychopathy, and narcissism.
Albeit the grouping has been criticized, it can be a useful construct.

Narcissism

There are two types of narcissists:

- Vulnerable narcissists: thin-skinned, neurotic, potentially depressed, harbor secret grandiosity but outwardly shy
- Grandiose narcissists: high self-esteem, socially bold, entitled, arrogant, low observable anxiety

Psychopathy

The two types of psychopathy:

- Factor 1 psychopathy: (primary) selfish, remorseless, and exploitative. It doesn't necessarily include antisocial personality disorder and is sometimes associated with 'successful psychopathy'
- Factor 2 psychopathy: (secondary) impulsive, irresponsible, sensation-seeking. Can be chronically antisocial (APD), and likely to end up -or remain- in prison

Machiavellianism

Machiavellianism overlaps most with grandiose narcissism, and type 1, subclinical psychopathy.
Psychologist Minna Lyons reports that Machiavellianism may even be a manifestation of non-clinical psychopathy.

Summarize John & Paulhus:

> Narcissism predicts ego-promoting outcomes, psychopathy predicts reckless and antisocial behavior, and Machiavellianism predicts a strategic orientation

In brief: Machiavellianism is the most strategic and, potentially, effective of the dark triad.
Contrary to narcissists, Machiavellians disregard their egos for what's effective. And contrary to psychopaths, they can postpone rewards and play the "long game".

Advantages of Machiavellianism

By now the advantages of Machiavellianism should be obvious.

But for clarity:

1. Higher Odds of Life Success

Machiavellians are more likely to:

- Obtain leadership positions (Spurk, 2015)
- Have more sexual partners (Jonason et al., 2009)
- Achieve more material success (McHoskey, 1999)

2. More Self-Reliance

Machiavellians are more resistant to both group pressure and individual pressure.

Says Christie and Geis:

> Non-Machiavellians instead "are more likely to do or accept what another wants simply because he wants it".

Paradoxically, non-Machiavellians may be more likely to execute heinous orders to comply to authorities and social pressures.

3. Higher Internal Congruence, No Self-Manipulation

Machiavellians don't lie to themselves because they don't need to.

They're comfortable with their dark side, and that means they also experience little or no cognitive dissonance.

4. Most Likely to Become Leaders

As we've seen, Machiavellians lead newly-forming groups.

But some systems and environments also favor the election of a Machiavellian.

For example, people prefer Machiavellian leaders when they feel under threat (Wilson et aI., 1998).
And Americans may prefer more Machiavellian presidents (Deluga, 2001; Simonton, 1986).

... And potentially better leaders

Geis and Christie examined real-life leadership situations in their classes.

And they noticed that:

> Groups with their highest Mach member as leader did better (…) got whatever resources they possessed organized and applied more effectively than other groups.

5. Antifragile Ego (Almost) By Default

Machiavellians take things less personally (Grande, 2019).

For example, an experiment showed that after an interviewer disapproved of the research subjects, the non-Machiavellian girls changed their self-descriptions, but high-Mach girls did not.

This low ego investment makes for a natural predisposition towards an antifragile ego.

6. Growth Mindset (Almost) By Default

A growth mindset is much easier to achieve when you're not busy defending your ego.

Christie and Geis' experiments indirectly tell us that Machiavellians are potentially better learners:

> The non-Machiavellians are more likely to be upset or angry (…) Machiavellians are more likely to be curious (…)

Disadvantages of Machiavellianism

The downsides of Machiavellianism include:

1. Poorer Relationships

Refusing to hold his hand can signal a lack of bond and mutual support
Low empathy, power-craving and an overly calculative approach can make for poorer relationships.

Research suggests that people prefer non-Machiavellians for close relationships such as confidants, good friends, or business partners.
And employers are dissatisfied with high Machs (Bereczkei, 2017).

The inability to see beyond pure self-interest, and to bond and connect can be costly for life satisfaction as well, contributing to low life satisfaction and alienation.

That's one of the reasons we had some concerns with the popular literature on Machiavellianism such as "The 48 Laws of Power".

Avoided by Higher Quality People

While this is more speculative, it follows logic that the better one is at reading people, the more he avoids overly scheming and cynical individuals.

That means that Machiavellians may struggle to remain close to high-quality people.
I've observed this pattern in my life, and we've had some circumstantial examples on the forums.

2. Potentially Bad for Business Reputation

Manipulation and opportunism carry risks.

As David Sloan notes, even after successful manipulations, Machiavellians may suffer a reputation loss that erodes their social capital, and reduces future opportunities.

Although former Gambino family underboss Sammy Gravano wouldn't feature in research articles, success in a Machiavellian organization lends him some credibility.
And the wisdom he shares with his brother-in-law supports our hypothesis:

> 'You're right, they can't do nothing, but you know what will happen? Everybody will hear about it (…) This will be the best two hundred thousand I'll ever spend because people will say not only is Sammy qualified to do the job, but he'll stay with you, win or lose.' 'That's important to businesspeople, Eddie,' I said. 'That's why you were never successful in business. Because you scheme too f*cking much.'
> Underboss, 1999

Gravano refers to maintaning a reputation as a coopertor to elicit more win-win cooperation, an approach vaildate by game theory research (Axelrod, 1984).

Over-scheming may not even qualify as "core Machiavellianism": a smart Machiavellian would never cheat when repeat win-win is possible.
But it's a risk when conjoined with poor long-term thinking.

3. Low Performance in Structured Work Environment

Say Paulhus and Delroy:

> Machs remain cool, exploit interpersonal relationships, bend the rules, and improvise. When this flexibility is constrained, Machs are likely to incur problems.

But this is not necessarily a drawback, and more a question of job fit.

Where should Machiavellians go, then?

Well, Hunt and Lawrence (1984) found plenty of Machiavellians among marketers.
Not surprising, since much marketing is based on (mild) manipulation.

Also see:

- Tai Lopez marketing tactics

4. Life Dissatisfaction & Alienation

Machiavellians are more dissatisfied at work and with their role in everyday life (Ali et. al., 2010).

Despite their higher partner count, Machiavellians are also more dissatisfied with their sex life.

Even deeper, Machiavellians are alienated.
They feel alienated in their personal relationships. They believe they are isolated, and that their life is meaningless.

The gap in life satisfaction grows even larger when the "dark triad" is contrasted to the "light triad" composed of "Kantianism", "humanism", and "faith in humanity" (Kaufman et al., 2019).

We can speculate that Machiavellians are dissatisfied because of:

1. Focus on material pursuits ("hedonic treadmill")
2. Overly-cynic attitude

In short: when it comes to life satisfaction, it might pay to be good (TPM note: as long as "good" doesn't mean "naive").

Paranoia

Related to dissatisfaction and psychological health, and somewhat unsurprisingly, research also associated Machiavellianism with paranoia (McHoskey, 2001).

Now our question becomes:

> Is it possible to combine the advantages of Machiavellianism, while avoiding the downsides?

Read on.

The "Effective Machiavellian™"

> Effective Machiavellianism™ is the ultimate stage of strategically optimazing the Machiavellian trait. It distills the functional strengths—rationality, emotional coolness, adaptability, and strategic thinking—while removing maladaptive tendencies like excessive cynicism. It treats Machiavellianism as an amoral, neutral toolset capable of delivering high-level effectiveness, while reducing the costs to maximize life quality.

Effective Machiavellism is the goal; Strategic Machiavelliasm™ is the work.
There is no one-size-fits-all to 'maximize Machiavellianism' because it depends on the individual's starting point.
But, generally speaking, it must calibrate to the situation and strike an optimum balance between the "overly Low-Mach" (who is often naive and vulnerable) and the "overly High-Mach" (who is alienated and predatory).

Here are some good steps:

1. Add 'Mach Mode' Atop 'Honor' (Honorable Machiavellianism ⍰)

> Honorable Machiavellianism™ builds on Effective Machiavellianism by placing strategic honor™ and a preference for win–win as the baseline, while maintaining a Machiavellian scanner that assesses people and tracks give-and-take and risks to ensure positive returns (strategic calculativeness™).

When needed, the honorable Machiavellian can completely switch to a Machiavellian Mode of strategic action and ruthless detachment.

Adopt a:

- Honorable baseline behavior with a Mach mode for undeserving people and special situations
  OR:
- Machiavellian baseline with an honorable mode reserved for the best people and situations

We recommend the former.

Honor can also help combat alienation and dissatisfaction. And you can further boost life quality with a mission and finding meaning in life. See effective spirituality and positive psychology.

2. Calibrate & Switch 'Modes' (Ruthless/Loving)

Some situations call for ruthless, strategic coldness—your Machiavellian side.
Others deserve your best self—the 'light triad.'

So the "secret" is to take Machiavellian's own strategic fluidity, and adapt it to Machiavellianism itself.

Learn to switch modes depending on context, goal, and people. Some contexts call for your Machiavellian mode, while others call for your best self.

3. Develop the "Machiavellian Scanner" (& Keep It Always On)

The scanner picks up all relevant cues for:

- Leverage: Who has more, how can I increase mine?
  Risk: could he screw me over? What's the cost, and how do I mitigate it?
- Social power dynamics: Win-win, neutral, or disempowering?
  Risk: is he disempowering me? One-upping, social climbing, undermining… ?
- Value: Taker, giver, or matcher?
  Risk: are they making me worse off?

From Naive to Machiavelli: Can You?

The 1-million dollar question:

> Is it possible to become more Machiavellian?

Christie and Geis, the psychologists who defined Machiavellianism, asked the same question in their seminal work Studies in Machiavellianism.

Their take? "It's probably possible."

From experience, we'd say it's more than just probable. It's a learnable skill.

A Billion Wicked Thoughts (2011) analyzes human sexual desires through a unique big-data analysis of 400 million online Internet searches.
The authors don't stop at the searches though but provide an overarching theory of human sexuality drawing also from romance novels analyses, evolutionary psychology theories and research, and everyday observations of dating strategies.

Methods of Research

The authors collected 400 million Dogpile searches from July 2009 to July 2010.

Of the 400 million searches, about 55 million (roughly 13 percent) were searches for some kind of erotic content.

These sexual searches represent the desires of roughly 2 million people. Two-thirds are from the United States, some from India, Nigeria, Canada, and the United Kingdom.

The authors then categorized the searches.
For example, they categorized "hot Latino ass," "bootylicious babes," and "sexy guys with bubble butts" as examples of "butts interest".

For additional help in categorizing the searches and understanding who was behind the different search queries, the authors integrated their data with AOL.
AOL released search histories for 657,426 different people.

They also looked up Alexa and came up with a shortlist of “adult most popular websites” to measure the popularity of different genres.
Alexa publishes a list of the million most popular Web sites in the world. According to the authors’ analysis, 42,337 were adult websites.

Popularity by Categories

% of all Sexual Searches	Popularity Ranking	Category	Example Search
13.5	1	Youth	free non-nude teen videos
4.7	2	Gay	straight guys paid to have gay sex
4.3	3	MILFs	MILFs in bikinis
4.0	4	Breasts	huge tits
3.4	5	Cheating wives	cuckold porn
2.8	6	Vaginas	shaved pussies
2.4	7	Penises	giant cocks
.9	21	Butts	hot Latino ass
.1	79	Cheerleaders	free cheerleader porn

The top 7 categories are:

1. Youth
2. Gay
3. MILFs
4. Breasts
5. Cheating Wives
6. Vaginas
7. Penises

Many of the popular searches are actually “squicks”.
For example, transsexuals (#17) are more popular than celebrities (#23) or Asians (#29).

The Diversity is Misleading: 80/20 Rule

Say the authors:

> Just twenty different interests account for 80 percent of all searches. With less than two dozen interests, you can satisfy the desires of almost everyone who uses a search engine to find erotic content. Most people’s desires are clustered together into a relatively small set of common interests.

And:

> The thirty-five top interests account for 90 percent of all searches. This doesn’t even include cheerleaders (#79), massage (#51), or virgins (#61). When it comes to our kinks, we all have a lot more in common than you might think.

In brief, we might say that the commonalities of what's sexually exciting cover the 80%.
The remaining 20% are more uncommon kinks.

Male Erotic Cues

> The anatomy that men find attractive—breasts, hips, butts, feet, as well as feminine facial features—are all influenced by the same molecule: estrogen. Estrogen is sensitive to a woman's energy and health.

1. Age

% of All Sexual Searches on Dogpile	Adjective	Example Search
5.8	Teen	free non-nude teen videos
2.0	Young	young naked waitresses
1.4	Mom	my friend's hot mom
1.3	MILF	MILF next door
.5	Grannies	hot nude grannies
.3	Old	free porn of old women
.2	Older	busty older women
.1	Cougar	cougar seductions
.1	Mature	mature women in bikinis

> Terms describing age are the most frequent type of adjective in sexual searches, appearing in one out of every six sexual searches. When the male desire software evaluates a woman's visual appearance, one of the most prominent criteria is age—and not just youth, either.

Teens and twenty-something are the most popular, but there is a surprising quantity of searches for older women as well:

> There is a rather shocking number of searches for underage women, but you may be equally surprised to discover there is significant erotic interest in sixty-and seventy-year-olds.

- Grannies are popular: searches are 8% of total youth, which might seem little, but there is more searches for grannies than for spanking. There are 313 are granny sites in the list of most popular adult Alexa websites
- Many men find both young and adult women to be appealing: 1/4 people who search MILF also search teens
- Many men who search for teens also search for GILF: 1/4 GILF searcher also searched for teens

2. Breast

> Breasts, no matter what size, are the most popular body part in sexual searches in every country we looked at

Men in general prefer larger breasts albeit even here, there is a small subset that prefers small or even flat-chested.

3. Butts

> Butts are almost as popular as breasts in sexual searches, and there are almost as many porn sites dedicated to butts as breasts, hinting that men may also have an innate sensitivity to buttocks cues.

4. Feet

Smaller are better.

5. Penises

Surprised to see this one here.
Well, here's the shocker: men are more interested in penises than women are.
Say the authors:

> The fact of the matter is that men are more interested in penises than women are—and men are much more interested in large penises than women are.

And it's not just their penis that men are interested about:

> An eye-tracking study recorded what men and women looked at as they viewed different (nonerotic) images. They found that men consistently direct their gaze to the male crotch, though women rarely do so.

More Cues

The author only lists the above cues as the main ones, but then adds a few more:

- Body Shape / Weight

Super skinny girls appeal to women more than men.

In general though, men prefer skinnier than the current average weight in the West.

However, as per age, there is a subset of men who likes bigger women.

- Female orgasms

> Men are wired to pay attention to whether their partner is engaged and responsive during sex. If a woman seems apathetic or distant, that triggers suspicions. The private investigator starts asking questions. If I'm not turning her on, then who is?

The authors also say that men want to be "good" because of female gossip in short-term sex.

- Novelty cues
- Sexual dominance/submission

Both men and women can be aroused by either dominance, submission, or even degradation.

Women's Psychological Cues

Women want a hero.

> The romantic hero is constructed from female psychological cues, in the same way that young, busty porn stars are built from male visual cues.

1. Alpha Males at The Top of Hierarchies

> Women are attracted to the men near the top. The man at the very top is known as the alpha male.

However notice, again, that there have been exceptions or, at least, tentative ways of proposing a different "hero", including a "beta male" hero:

> They've experimented with softer, more deferent protagonists, often called betas. "What makes the beta hero so great: an unshakable core of pure and stalwart good, so constant and abiding it's damn near alpha in its strength," explain Wendell and Tan. The most famous beta hero in romance (and perhaps the first) was Freddy Standen, from Georgette Heyer's Cotillion.

Finally, the authors say that the new popular genre of "paranormal romance" is designed to stimulate women with an unnatural excess of female attractive cues in the same vein that mangas are designed to stimulate as many erotic cues for men.
Werewolves and vampires are supposedly the "ultimate alpha males".

2. Dominant

> Study after study has demonstrated the erotic appeal of male dominance. Women prefer the voices of dominant men, the scent of dominant men, the movement and gait of dominant men, and the facial features of dominant men.

Also read "how to use dominance in seduction".

> This Is How Dominance Gets You Sexual Succes

And how about "mega heroes":

> "Omega" heroes—comedians, art thieves, and nerdy geniuses—rarely show up in romances though, as with Beta heroes, they have their own devoted following. Alpha heroes who are dominant in the society of men and desired by the society of women are far more common, and far more appreciated by Miss Marple.

Hero's Jobs

All hero's professions are associated with status, confidence, and power.

> As Henry Kissinger famously said, "Power is the ultimate aphrodisiac." Power is a reflection of a man's rank in the dominance hierarchy, and women are attracted to the men near the top. The man at the very top is known as the alpha male.

Here are the 10 most common professions of the hero:

1. Doctor
2. Cowboy
3. Boss

4. Prince
5. Rancher
6. Knight
7. Surgeon
8. King
9. Bodyguard
10. Sheriff

> Conspicuously absent from the list of romance heroes are blue-collar workers (no janitors or welders), bureaucrats (no claims adjusters or associate marketing managers), and traditionally feminine professions (no hairdressers, secretaries, or kindergarten teachers).

3. Nice to Her

Kindness and understanding are attractive to women.

However, to "maximize" the hero effect, kindness is mixed with power:

> Women want their romance heroes to be like coconuts: hard and tough on the outside, but soft and sweet on the inside.

And there is a third twist for the ideal man: it's only HER who gets to see that super-sweet and devoted side of him:

> But the hero's sweet interior can't be available to just anyone. Only the heroine gets to crack him open. The hero is granted free reign to be a badass with everyone else, as long as he's tender and attentive with the heroine.

To make that possible, romances sometimes end up with male characters that seem fake for a male audience.
The same way that porn actresses feel fake to a female audience.

4. Wealthy

Being wealthy is not strictly necessary, but it helps a lot:

> Though a man can be an alpha without attaining financial success—a sheriff, for example, or a soldier—the possession of enormous amounts of cash is a sure way to seal one's social dominance.

As it's shown in romance novels, heroes are almost never poor, and often quite loaded:

> In the romance titles on Amazon, there are 415 millionaires, 286 billionaires, and 263 sheiks, including The Millionaire's Secretary, The Billionaire's Virgin Bride, and The Sheik's Secret Harem Girl.

If the hero is poor, a possible plot is for the tough man to "save the heroine from herself".
Note: in the romance example, the man wasn't that "poor", he was a police officer lieutenant. And the description of the man sounded a lot like a white knight of endless devotion, male-equivalent of "women who love too much".

And those dynamics haven't changed as women acquired more power and resources:

> If a heroine is rich, then the hero is even richer.

5. Competent

> The hero is always competent. Usually, he's the best at what he does

Interestingly enough, men don't care nearly as much about female competence.
Which is one of the reasons why successful women can often struggle at dating.

6. Driven

> Men who don't know what to do with their life, who are midlevel bureaucrats, or who sit around the house watching TV are never heroes.

7. Intelligent

Intelligence is a "special kind of competence" that, say the authors, is also essential in romance heroes.

And the opposite of intelligence is often a major strike against hero-hood:

> "Stupidity is never heroic," assert Wendell and Tan

8. Visually Appealing

> While visuals do matter—heroes are handsome, tall, strong, with beautiful gray eyes and a crooked grin

8.2 But Penises Matter Little

> Little attention is paid to the details of male genitalia.

In stark contrast to novels for men, of course.

9. Popular / Famous / Preselected

Also called "preselection" in pick-up and seduction literature:

> If a man is already taken by a woman, then by definition, he's the best man—or certainly a more desirable man. If the exact same man is not taken, then his value is questionable—he's certainly not as desirable as a man who has already received the stamp of approval from another woman's Detective Agency.

The authors say that preselection snowballs with fame and money and often, it's a "case of the rich man getting richer".
And it works the other way around as well, with the poor getting poorer

> Men who are awkward loners or social rejects have a major strike against them in the view of the Detective Agency, unless they offer compensating cues.

10. Emotionally Available (to Her)

Commitaphobes and avoidants do not need to apply.
Or at least, not if there has to be a happy ending:

> In romance, the happy ending (known as an HEA or Happily-Ever-After) is always a long-term monogamous > relationship, usually marriage. Orgasm is important in modern romances, but it's never the final scene. The moments in bed after the orgasm are just as important as the feelings experienced during the orgasm itself.

Physical whoring on the part of the man might also be OK -especially for some types of lovers-, as long as he's not an emotional whore.

More Psychological Cues

- irresistibility

Being desired is very arousing to women.

In romances the "irresistibility" cue is often used to ensnare and keep the man beside her through what the author refers to as "Magic Hoo Hoo".

The cue of irresistibility, says the author, explains young women's exhibitionism.
Albeit, frankly, this feels a lot like personal speculation and I'm not fully convinced.
Later he even says it might explain rape fantasies, for which I'm even less convinced.

- Adorability

Similar to "irresistibility", but more about love and affection.

> is about a woman's specialness as a human being. The hero must demonstrate that his love is steady, irrational, and everlasting.

Of course, as we've seen, men must find her adorable, and not all other women.

Female Visual Cues

Porn and erotic websites dedicated to women lack the "anatomical specificity" of men.
There is no anatomical category catering for women. There is no specific porn or website for specific sizes and shapes of penises, abs, muscles, etc.

The most common male body parts in romance novels were:

- cheekbones
- jaw
- brows
- shoulders
- forehead
- waist
- hips

And the most common adjectives:

- lean
- handsome
- blond
- tanned
- muscular
- masculine

- chiseled

Also women pay attention to:

- Height

Also height is important, with women preferring dating men who are taller than they are.
The main reason for preferring taller is “to feel secure”.

- Uniforms
- Butts

As always, exceptions almos always apply.
And there are women who also search and watch pornography (I once dated a woman who used YouPorn, while I never recurrently logged in to any porn websites).

- Dominance / submission

Both social and sexual dominance which are interrelated, say the authors.

Some women also have a kind for men who may be, appear, or act submissive.
Says one woman:

> [In my fantasies] my ‘hero’ is shorter than everyone else, darker, and therefore highly desirable, but as he is totally vulnerable and powerless he is sexually abused

Cultural Influences on Sexual Attraction

Breast, butts and feet dominate male interest everywhere.
Yet, some other sexual interests are cultural:

> The interest in the absolute territory is almost exclusive to Japanese men. In India, the belly is a common male obsession. In Victorian times, ankles were considered highly erotic. Salvador Dalí claimed to be aroused by a woman’s earlobe. Thus, culture does seem to play some role in determining what part of a body the male brain targets.

What causes the cultural differences?
Say the authors:

> Men’s desire software is also designed to adapt to variable visual cues. (…) men appear to imprint upon the specific female body parts that are available in a young man’s environment. Men aren’t born with a “visual template” for the ideal breast. The male brain flexibly responds to a wide range of stimuli that contain a visual cue of “breastness”. Thus, early exposure to anatomical stimuli that match a man’s innate visual cues can result in a wide variety of anatomical preferences.

Cued (Imprint) VS Uncued (Kinks) Interests

To explain the difference between the innate and most sexual preferences and the cultural diversification and kinks, the authors differentiate betwen “cued” and “uncued interests”.

Personally, I found this differentiation unclear and somewhat lacking in its explanatory power.

They describe cued interests largely through animals’ imprinting and using non-human examples.
And then they quickly move to human in what felt like a major cognitive jump:

> A cued interest develops when the brain's natural responsiveness to a particular kind of cue causes the brain to sexually imprint upon a target that exhibits that cue.

The cued interest overlaps with "inborn preferences".

Uncued interests instead are the "stranger kinks" that develop usually later on in life, when a combination of circumstances and erotic arousal cues something in the person's mind:

> Cued interests don't always have a distinct moment when they form (…) though almost always forming during adolescence or their early twenties.

But we are more into the speculation territory with uncued interests:

> In our opinion, an uncued interest forms when an unexpected event interferes with the natural sexual imprinting process. Often, uncued interests involve the senses of touch or smell, like the doctor pressing the ultrasound paddle into Billy Chou's testicles. There may be another factor that strongly influences the formation of uncued interests in men: ejaculation.

Men / Women Differences

Skip "Men Are From Mars" and learn data-backed differences here:

Men prefer erotic images & videos, women prefer erotic stories & relationship novels

And men prefer graphic sex, women prefer relationships and romance.

Men are also more likely to develop sexual fetishes, while women are more likely to develop emotional fetishes.

Men are also more prone to being manipulated for their sexual prowess, while women are more commonly manipulated by a man faking love.

Mind & Body Arousal: Disconnected for Women, Together for Men

Chivers reviewed the literature on male and female arousal and concluded that:

> Men experienced a strong correlation between the arousal of mind and body. Women did not. In fact, the correlation between physical and psychological arousal in women was so low that it's safe to say a woman's vaginal lubrication is a poor predictor of what she is actually feeling. (…) In contrast, if a man is erect, you can make a very reasonable guess about what's going on in his mind.

Why is there such a distinction between physical and psychological in women?
Because a woman has to consider the long-term, and be careful of who she has sex with. It's not just about her arousal, or even about how attractive he might be in the moment.
She must also consider a slew of other variables.

Say the authors:

> From an evolutionary point of view, her children would have a harder time surviving than the children of a woman who limited the expression of her sexual urges to a strong and decent man willing to invest in a stable, long-term, child-rearing relationship.

And:

> All modern women are the fruit of feminine caution. The result of this whittling away of the impulsive branches of our ancestral maternal tree is a female brain equipped with the most sophisticated neural software on Earth. A system designed to uncover, scrutinize, and evaluate a dazzling range of informative clues.

Interestingly, men and women process visual cues equally fast, and the same areas linked to arousal fire up.
But in women, the unconscious reaction is intercepted before it gets converted into sex-seeking desire.

Women Have Higher Need to Assess Character

> A man's true character cannot be evaluated as swiftly or as easily as a woman's bust size.
> Since the inner life of a man is so elusive, the Detective Agency developed sophisticated instruments for appraising his personality.
> Is he honest? Sincere? Considerate? Loyal? Generous? Does he love his mama? She must also evaluate her own feelings. Do I feel appreciated and adored? Do I feel attractive? Am I nervous? Embarrassed? Guilty?

Then the author goes on to list how women are better equipped at remembering people-related details.
They also seem to be more socially skilled, with some skills that also seem to better predispose towards effective manipulation:

> Though women are more emotionally expressive than men, they also possess greater ability to control their facial and body expressions of emotions. Similarly, even though women ruminate more than men, some studies show that they are better at suppressing unwanted thoughts.

Women's Attraction (& Behavior) Is More Socially-Contextual & Socially-Dependent

> Social psychologist Roy Baumeister suggests that women's greater sensitivity to cultural influences is rooted in brain mechanisms. "Women's sexuality appears to be more plastic than men's, relying on social framing and cultural conditions when making decisions regarding relationships. Men's sexuality seems far more driven by simple physiological mechanisms."

And:

> Keenly attuned to cultural values and social rules, the Detective Agency asks: Which behaviors and relationships are celebrated—and which are frowned upon? What values should I endorse when it comes to sex and relationships? Women are sensitive to messages on magazines and television shows, even indirect messages, such as a model's body weight, the car a politician is driving, or a celebrity's views on mental health—subjects that elicit more online comments from women than men.

Ultimately, social-related cues are used to decide what behavior to adopt, and even what to find attractive:

> Who does society value more, doctors or software programmers? Can I get away with wearing a tattoo on my back or will people think it's a "tramp stamp"? Can I post photos on Facebook of me in my bathing suit or will guys think I look fat? Since women must always consider the long-term consequences of their sexual decisions, a woman's brain is designed to evaluate the particular cultural conditions in which she finds herself.

In brief, say the authors, "for a woman, context is everything".

Women Also Care More & Tend More to Their Social Circles

> A woman's social environment is also crucial. Does a woman have a network of family and friends who can help provide emotional support and assist with child care? Does this social network approve of her partner? Is a woman in a position in her career where she can take time out for a relationship and to possibly raise children? Are there any other decent men available?

Women Also Gather More Intel From Social Circles

> When it comes to desiring a man, women have a love/hate relationship with other women. Miss Marple simply cannot gather enough evidence about a potential partner by working on her own. She always benefits from making a few calls—or a few dozen—to the Detectives at other Agencies.

Women Play It Safer, Men Must Risk More

> Why is the female brain designed to play it safe? Because historically, the odds of a woman reproducing are very good.

And:

> For women, the optimal thing to do is go along with the crowd, be nice, play it safe. The odds are good that men will come along and offer sex and you'll be able to have babies. All that matters is choosing the best offer. We're descended from women who played it safe.

Women's Sexuality Is More Plastic

Men are more "either this or that", and get aroused by one cue or another.

Women instead have more cues to look at, and are more about "this and that".

This means that men are less flexible in their sexuality and get aroused more easily.
Women get aroused less easily, but are more plastic in their sexuality -including when it comes to which gender they prefer-.

Men Can Be Attractive in Many Different Ways

While female attractiveness is somewhat more constrained by male limited sexual cues, men's attractiveness has more "room for maneuver":

> Women need to experience enough simultaneous cues to cross an ever-varying threshold. Sometimes, just a few overwhelming cues can take a woman there. Other times, it takes a very large number of moderate cues. For a man, a single cue is often sufficient, and sometimes necessary. For women, no single cue is either necessary or sufficient.

The Encouraging Reality of The Sexual Market Place

For women:

> if you are a woman, then no matter what your attributes—big or skinny, A-cup or double-E, mother or grandmother—you are the sexual ideal and greatest erotic fantasy for an abundance of men.

And for men:

> no matter what your character—aggressive or pacifist, witty or stoic, rich or penniless, scarred or delicate—there are plenty of women who can fall in love with you, and if their love is reciprocated, feel an intense desire for you

More Wisdom

- The MILF appeal might rest on psychological cues:

> The terms "aggressive" and "seduction" appear on the vast majority of MILF sites

- Men might be designed to prefer long-term relationships?

> If male desire software was designed to prefer one-night stands, men should prefer sex with adult women over adolescents, since adolescents have relatively low fertility. (Most women don't attain regular ovulation until many years after menarche; over the past century, the age of first menstruation is happening earlier and the onset of regular ovulation is happening later.) Indeed, in most primate species, including chimpanzees, males do prefer fertility cues over youth cues.

However, humans are inherently more complex, and a dual, co-existing strategy seems to be the norm:

> Though men exhibit a general preference for youth and long-term relationships, the male brain is designed to flexibly pursue both long-term and short-term relationships—what psychologist David Buss calls mixed mating strategies. This might be one of the main reasons for the appeal of MILFs. As we saw in the previous chapter, most fans of MILFs emphasize older women's wishes to avoid romantic complications. MILF fans fantasize about getting seduced by a MILF for a one-night stand rather than wooing her as a girlfriend.

- Humans owe high-intelligent to females' (relative) chastity

> Men may owe their intelligence in part to women's relative chastity. The brain and the testicles both require large amounts of energy. In species where females are promiscuous, males tend to develop large testicles but smaller brains. The silver-tipped myotis bat has gargantuan testicles that make up 8.4 percent of his body mass, compared to 1 percent in men.

Interesting theory, albeit more speculative. But there might be something there.

- Women also have a dual-sexual strategy

Women want both attractive men and alphas, and men who are kind, giving, and willing to provide and commit.
Sometimes the two come together, but other times, they won't.
The preferences is somewhat more pronounced during what' called the "ovulatory shift".

- Women are more risk-averse when they're most likely to conceive

The authors say that "ovulating women seek out conventional sex with alpha males".

- Testosterone levels do not impact fertility and can lead to poor long-term health

It is correlated with dominance, though.
Albeit Sapolsky says that it's more collected with status-seeking behavior, and the behavior that ensues depends on what awards status.

- Men are more likely to be moralists and morality-enforcers than women

The authors speculate it might be to "make sure that men keep their libido towards reproductive-age women only". But that felt somewhat random to me and I'm unconvinced.

- Cuckold porn leverages the "need for paternity"

Cuckold porn is the second most popular heterosexual interest on English-language search engines.
The authors say that men have stronger libido and ejaculate more when they suspect cheating because they enter into (sperm) competition mode. And that can be arousing for some men.

- Many people (wrongly) feel that others "must be like us"

Men tend to believe that women like raunchy sex with random men as much as men do.
Women believe that men have been "socialized" to enjoy sex with random women.
And gay men believe that, deep down, all men want to have sex with other men.

In truth, at the end of the day, the reality is that we're just different.

QUOTES

On the plasticity of sexual market value for men:

> When I was a teenager, girls were just utterly out of my reach. They wouldn't even let me draw them." Crumb leans back in his chair and laughs. "Yeah. All that changed after I got famous."

On the limitation of research studies (WEIRD):

> Geneticists use fruit flies, endocrinologists use guinea pigs, molecular biologists use mice. For behavioral scientists, it's the college freshman. It's easy to understand why: they're cheap, in plentiful supply, easy to motivate through course requirements, and willing to endure even the most unusual experimental methods.

On the difficulties of collecting good scientific research on sexual preferences before the advent of the Internet:

> Nothing beats watching a subject in action. But scientists have an easier time gazing at intergalactic quasars than peeking into someone's bedroom. Quasars don't close the curtains out of modesty or suspicion.

On the wide variety of sexual preferences:

> "The Web brings people together," offered comedian Richard Jeni, "because no matter what kind of a twisted sexual mutant you happen to be, you've got millions of pals out there. Type in 'Find people that have sex with goats that are on fire' and the computer will say, 'Specify type of goat.' "

On the senior NSF (National Science Foundation) executive who helped young poor women:

> One senior executive spent 331 days viewing naked girls on his office computer, though he insisted his activities were a charitable contribution: "These young women are from poor countries and need to make money to help their parents."

On a 16-YO writing to his "serial killer crush" Richard Ramirez:

> he was nice, told me to get an education and that I'm sweet and should sort my life out and not end up in prison lol. I really liked him. I told him I wanted to chop his wifes feet off and he was cool about it. he's a nice guy :-).

On women seeking love, and men seeking (unsuccessfully) greatness:

> Perhaps nature designed women to be lovable, whereas men were designed to strive, mostly unsuccessfully, for greatness

On the tragedy of male sexuality (albeit this is a generalization and more applicable to the psychology of womanizer):

> In a very real sense, there is something tragic about male sexuality. It is never satisfied. Tomorrow is another day for the hunt—whether a single guy cruising for a one-night stand, or a married guy searching a tube site for something new. The novelty cue ensures that whatever is delicious today is bland tomorrow—and male desire is frequently a solitary affair.

On the ironic nonsense of paranormal novels:

> Though vampires turbocharge cues of masculinity, the erotical illusions are only complete when these invincible heroes are brought to their knees by the irresistibility of an ordinary woman and her ability to unlock his secret heart.

CRITICISM

The data analysis is fantastic, and the main pitfalls emerge when the authors either seek to connect the dots with non-data-driven sources or when venturing out on their own opinions and interpretations.

Sometimes overstates the case for differences

Obviously there are differences between men and women.

Yet, one can either overstate, or downplay those differences.

I feel that "A Billion Wicked Thoughts" sometimes overstates the case for differences.

For example, the authors first list the "most popular erotic websites for men", which are all video websites.
Then, it lists the "most popular erotic websites for women", which are all novel fiction websites.
Only much later it also says that YouPorn's CTO estimates that 1/3 of websites users are actually women.

So those initial tables were misleading, since it's not like all users of porn websites were only men.

As another example, in a passage that seemed to overstate how difficult it is for women to get aroused, they say:

> a sixty-second PornHub clip of a woman unbuttoning her shirt can compel a man to masturbate to ejaculation. But the single most popular artifact used by women to generate arousal takes the form of a 250-page book that requires hours to digest.

Apparently, the authors must not have experienced pulling off wet panties.
Or been in a relationship when the man loses interest, and the woman's sex drive and lust start outstripping his.

In a third example, the authors cite a popular 1989 experiment of random men and women approaching random men and women and asking for sex.
And they say that most men say yes, and most women say no.
That is true.
However, it should be put into context.
As Viram Swami notes, the differences drop if the asker is very attractive and seem to disappear if the asker is famous.
That is NOT to say that women are equally open to random sex: the differences are real and confirmed. However, there are situations and variables that decrease or even cancel the differences.

I'd have preferred if speculations were clearly labeled "speculation"

Much of the authors' own opinions seemed legit to me.

A few times, they seemed far more speculative.

What I wished is that they were more clear in stating "this is our speculation", and "this is the data".

For example, they say that granny erotica is big in UK and Nigeria because in those countries older women are in contact with young men.
They that in the UK older women in boarding schools "spanked or pinched" the students.
Personally, I'm not aware of a modern country where teachers are allowed to spank pupils.
And even if that was the case, I'd be wary in jumping to conclusions -albeit it might seem like a good possible cause-.

Conflates fame with serial-killing ("serial killer myth")

Albeit I don't doubt that some women are indeed attracted to murderers and serial killers, the authors fail to realize that:

1. All famous men receive female attention, and the only serial killers who receive significant attention are the famous ones
2. The type of women are after serial killers:
3. The quality of women: the general quality and level of attractiveness of the women who fall for serial killers should also be better investigated. And I suspected that you won't find many high-quality women

Also read:

- Are serial killers really attractive?

"Irresistibility cues" apply to men as well

The author implies that "irresistibility" is important to women, but not so much to men.

To back-up his claim, he says that a skin-whitening cream was marketed to women under the “irresistibility” cue, but was marketed to men with a “career-climbing” strategy:

> the identical product for men, Fair and Handsome, is sometimes marketed with the promise that it will help its male customers rise the corporate ladder.

The author forgets about “Axe”, the deodorant marketed to make men irresistible to women:

Also, “climbing the corporate ladder” is an indirect way of being attractive/irresistible.

So albeit I agree that “irresistible” might be (somewhat) more important to women, I don’t think it’s as unique to women as the authors imply.

PROS

- Great overview of attraction

Probably one of the best overviews of sexual attraction, intersexual dynamics available on the market (and good for sex power dynamics as well).

- Very well researched

A very unique text that mixes lots of wisdom from the most disparate resources.

From popular female dating advice such as “He’s Just Not That Into You“, to male dating advice with the pick-up community and “The Game” and the older classics such as Casanova’s “History of My Life“.

Passing by solid evolutionary psychology literature such as Buss and Miller.

Plus, of big data mining, to research, to anime forums, to erotic literature for women.
And not only the authors read a lot, but they were also able to put it all together into a coherent and logical narrative that makes sense.

Review

“A Billion Wicked Thoughts” is a treasure trove of data-based information on sexual preferences.

What I liked most is that it offers a data-based perspective based on search engine queries that you can’t get anywhere else.

As minor cons, the authors do add their own personal speculations without clearly labeling it “speculation”. And sometimes it might feel like they overstate the differences between the “male ready to fill any hole” and the “risk-averse female who rarely gets horny”.

However, as a whole, the narrative and theoretical framework they develop around data and available research is solid and on point, making it a wonderful book to understand human sexuality.
One great advantage over some other data-based books on dating and sexuality, is that Ogas develops around the data a solid narrative that helps the readers get the “big picture” of sexuality and attraction.

Finally, I quoted “A Billion Wicked Thoughts” to improve this website’s articles and products, and that’s the best compliment I can make to any resource.

Leadership

The leadership research followed five stages of "focus":

- Trait theories: focusing on the "traits" of (the best) leaders as opposed to followers

> Early leadership research focusing on those who were observed as emerging as leaders in unstructured/leaderless groups found that traits that typically emerged included: dominance, extraversion, sociability, ambition or achievement, and self-confidence (Mann, 1959; Stodgill, 1948). Subsequent research obtained similar findings (e.g. Gough, 1990; Kenny & Zaccaro, 1983; Lord et al., 1986; Rueb & Foti, 1990).

And:

> In their meta-analysis of trait studies, Lord et al. (1986) identified three traits which were significantly associated with followers' perceptions of leadership: "intelligence," "dominance," and "masculinity,"

Later on it the research literature also realize that the same traits that make a leader "good" and effective can also be used for destructive purposes:

> The same personality traits which make some leaders attractive, such as charisma, inspiration, vision, courage, and resilience, can become a destructive force (…) if they are exhibited in their extreme forms, and if there is a lack of concern for, or a lack of insight (Furnham, 2010; Hogan et al., 1994; Lipman-Blumen, 2004)

- Behavioral approach

Of the many models developed, most can be categorized within four styles:

1. concern for task— AKA “production-orientated”
2. concern for people— AKA “employee-centered”
3. directive leadership— AKA “authoritarian” or “autocratic”
4. participative—AKA “democratic.

In terms of effectiveness, there was no clear “winner” when exploring a range of variables including subordinate satisfaction and effectiveness measures such as productivity (House, 1971; Larson et al., 1974; Yukl, 2010).

- Situational and contingency approach

It includes a set of different variables ranging from subordinates’ competence, time constraints, informational availability to make decisions, etc.

The “leader-member exchange theory” (LMX) developed, which focuses on the relationship and social exchange between leaders and followers.

- “Charismatic–inspirational models”— AKA “heroic” leadership

> The models emphasized different aspects of “neo-charismatic” leadership (House & Aditya, 1997), including “charisma” (Conger, 1988, 1999; Conger & Kanungo, 1998; House, 1977), “vision” (Bennis & Nanus, 1985; Sashkin, 1988; Tichy & Devanna, 1986), “transformation” and “transaction” (Bass, 1985, 1998; Kouzes & Posner, 1997).

Bass’s model of transformational leadership (Bass, 1985, 1998) was the most widely adopted.
“Transformational” leaders motivate colleagues and followers to view their work from new perspectives, link their goals to the team’s and organization’s mission or vision, and look beyond their own interests towards those that will benefit the group (Bass, 1985).

It seems to work:

> There is evidence from studies using the MLQ that transformational leadership is significantly associated with subordinate satisfaction, motivation, commitment, and performance (e.g. Bass, 1998; Lowe et al., 1996; Skakon et al., 2010; Tims et al., 2011; Yukl, 1999).

However, Judge and Piccolo found the same positive results analyzing “transactional leadership”.
In my opinion, this is simply a case of situation. Some environments, some tasks, and some people, respond better to one or another.

An important criticism of these models is that they gloss over the reciprocal influence between follower and leader (shared leadership).

- Post-heroic models of leadership

In academic terms, there is a rejection of the “romance of leadership” (Bligh et al., 2011; Meindl et al., 1985), which includes the attribution of organization success or failure to the presence of a “savior” figure.

New notions of leadership include “ethical leadership”, “servant leadership”, “authentic leadership”, “distributed leadership” and models that view leadership as a dynamic and fluid social process.

For ethical leadership:

> Brown et al. (2005) define the concept of ethical leadership as "the demonstration of normatively appropriate conduct through personal actions and interpersonal relationships, and the promotion of such conduct to followers through two-way communication, reinforcement, and decision-making" (p. 120).

Kalshoven and Den Hartog analysis of 244 direct reports a positive relationship between ethical leader behavior and followers' perfection of leader's effectiveness.

Dark Side of Charismatic Leadership

Discussing the potential dark side of "charismatic leadership":

> House & Howell (1992) distinguish between two kinds of charismatic leadership: personalized (self-aggrandizing, exploitative, authoritarian) and socialized (altruistic, collectively oriented, egalitarian) (House & Aditya, 1997).

And:

> Yukl (1999) warns that some charismatic leaders use manipulative behaviors such as "exaggerating positive achievements and taking unwarranted credit for achievements," "covering up mistakes and failures," and "blaming others for mistakes" (p. 296).

And that manipulative behavior can be put to use to, well… Line their own pockets:

> In a cross-sectional study, Tosi et al. (2004) found no evidence of a relationship between the degree of perceived charisma of CEOs of Fortune 500 companies and their companies' performances, but interestingly, did find a significant positive relationship between their "charisma" rating and their remuneration package. They add a warning that boards of organizations "should be a bit more circumspect in advocating charisma as a criterion for the selection of CEOs" (p. 414).

I bet that if you gave the Mach-IV scale to these charismatic leaders, they'd all score as very high Machs.

Psychonadimics of Organizational Leadership

First off:

> At its heart, leadership is about human behavior—understanding it and enhancing it.

A purely rational or structural model of leadership is not sufficient to understand leadership -or to be a good leader-.

Leaders are socially intelligent and skilled:

> It is about the way people and organizations behave, about creating and strengthening relationships, handling conflict, building commitment, establishing a group identity, and adapting behavior to increase effectiveness (Bennis & Nanus, 1985; Burns, 1978; Kets de Vries, 2001c; Pfeffer, 1998; Stogdill & Bass, 1990).
> (…)
> they are cognizant of the sensitive nature of the leader–follower relationship; they pay careful attention to group processes. Such leaders know how to calm anxieties and arouse hopes and aspirations; they know how to transform personal needs into societal demands.

Also read:

- 13 steps to leadership (based on social psychology)

> How to Be A Leader: 13 Laws From Social-Psychology

This chapter then becomes very Freudian.
Some parts re very interesting, for example with followers that idealize leaders and look at them as a father figure. That made sense to me -also see the "judge role"-.
Some other parts left me dubious -Freud's approach wasn't very scientific-.

Narcissism and The Potential for Leadership

> The strength (and even inflexibility) of a narcissistic leader's worldview gives followers something to identify with and hold on to. Although it can be a key ingredient for success, narcissism can also become a toxic drug. Narcissism can be labeled as either constructive or reactive, with excess narcissism generally falling in the latter category and healthy narcissism generally falling in the former (Kets de Vries, 2004; Kets de Vries & Miller, 1985).

The authors say there is a "good" type of narcissistic leader. In leadership roles, constructive narcissists often seem larger than life, but they also have a capacity for introspection and empathy.

The "bad" type of narcissistic leaders fixate on power, status, prestige, and superiority.

Say the authors:

> They are especially responsive to admiration and are not prepared to share power. Unwilling to tolerate disagreement, and dealing poorly with criticism, such leaders rarely consult with others, and when they do, such consultation is little more than ritualistic. The result is that disposition and position work together to wreak havoc on reality-testing, and the boundaries that define normal work processes disappear.

Later on, the authors say that the bad narcissistic leader sees the world in black and white, people being either for or against them.
And the followers, "to minimize conflict and disagreement, sacrifice truth on the altar of intimacy, maintaining a connection with the leader even though he or she has lost touch with reality".

To me, it seems a description of Donald Trump's presidency.

Folowers of Narcissists

The followers of narcissistic leaders idealize their leader.
In the authors' opinion, they replicate a helpless child / protective adult relationship:

> They perceive their leader as omnipotent, and as a result, they readily give up their autonomy. This contributes to goal-directedness and cohesiveness, but impairs followers' critical judgment and leaves them unwilling to take initiative.

In psychoanalytic terms, this is the projective identification.

So the advantage of the narcissistic leader is that: the narcissistic leader will have a loyal and obedient followership, but the quality of that followership is lower than with a healthier leader.

The Key Issue of Trust

The Wiley-Blackwell Handbook discusses trust at length.

Trust appears to be a crucial aspect of good leadership:

> Research evidence confirms that trust in leadership is related to positive organizational outcomes (Dirks & Ferrin, 2002) and positive follower performances and attitudes, such as high job satisfaction and organizational commitment (Butler et al., 1999; Dirks & Ferrin, 2002). Followers who believe in their leaders' abilities, integrity, and benevolence are more willing to engage in risk-taking behaviors (Mayer et al., 1995).

Trust is most important when one party is at risk or vulnerable, and can be defined as "an expectation or belief that one can rely on another person's actions and words, and that that person has good intentions".

Trust also increases cooperation.
Ferrin et al.'s (2007) interpersonal study found that trust perceptions and cooperation both increase after each successive iteration.

Early research on trust developed two core foundations of trust:

- Competence or ability: knowledge, skills, interpersonal skills and "general wisdom"
- Character: later split into two components of:
  - Benevolence: want to do good for the followers
  - Integrity: adherence to sound moral and ethical principles

Avolio says that you establish trust by displaying your own capacities, values, hopes, and weaknesses, and allowing or even encouraging the followers to express themselves equally.

Other elements that improve trust:

- Transformational and consultative leadership (Gillespie & Mann, 2004)
- Servant leadership (Joseph & Winston 2005)
- Avoiding contingency-based rewards and punishments (Rubin et al., 2010)
- Developing job-related skills
- Developing integrity
- Developing social skills / power intelligence
- Environment that is just and low in politics (Poon, 2006)
- Monitor while supporting: monitoring can erode trust, but monitoring combined with fair assessment of performance, leader support, openness, and collaborative problem-solving, is highly related to trust in managers (Bijlsma & Van de Bunt, 2003)

For the full list, see "Business University".

Interestingly, Dirks & Ferrin meta-analysis found no relationship between trust and relationship length and only a weak relationship between trust in leaders and followers' propensity to trust.
This means that you can develop trust in most people, independently of how long you know them.

The authors say that the trust in the direct leader has an equal or greater effect on performance, altruism, intent to quit, and job satisfaction, than trust in organizational leadership. And trust in organizational leadership has a greater impact on organizational-level outcomes such as organizational commitment.
And Huang et al. (2009) note that lower-level and frontline employees tend to care more about their personal relationship with colleagues and their direct managers.

Trust Going Both Ways

There is much less research on leaders trusting their followers.

But Hakimi et al.'s (2010) show that leader-empowering behavior also depends on the trust they have in follower's performance and integrity.

And Brower et al. (2009) demonstrate that trusting one's followers is crucial to effective leadership.
Trusting leaders develop more productive employees, employees who offer and provide help beyond the requirements of their jobs, and who stay in the organization for longer periods of time.

Whitener and colleagues (1998) argue that to gain the subordinates trust a good step is to first be a trusting manager.

Finally, personality also does matter.
Bernereth & Walker's (2007) and Levin et al.'s (2006) seem to support the notion that that the most positive exchange relationships exist when both managers and employees are high in propensity to trust.

Win-Win Without Trust

The book rightesouly reminds us that a productive arrangement as well as win-win relationships can also exist without trust.
Alternative mechanisms include:

> Reputation, enforcement of contracts, compensation schemes, social capital networks, and regulation of behavior through professional societies (Cook et al., 2005).

Culture Matters

There is little empirical evidence on the effectiveness of leaders when measured along the alignment of organizational cultural fit.
But some interesting notes:

- Nationality / culture matters

> Subordinates working with leaders from their own country of origin are more efficient and satisfied than subordinates working under a supervisor from another country (Testa, 2002).

I wonder though if this is a case of someone not fitting the culture well, not speaking the local language well, or not bonding with the team well.
Indeed, I remember many years ago working for a company providing support in different languages. And one Brazilian said to me about our boss "a Swiss manager is not a good fit for Latin teams".
So it was more of a general culture, than a specific nationality.

And indeed:

- National culture alignment matters

> Leaders acting in alignment with the national culture will be more effective than those whose behaviors are out of alignment (Euwema et al., 2007; Yukl et al., 2003).

Evidence-Based Leadership

There are three ways in which leaders can encourage evidence-based management:

1. Advocating for evidence

2. Collecting and providing evidence
3. Providing the time and resources for the effective use of evidence

When it comes to power dynamics, there are some disadvantages for the leader in an evidence-based culture, including:

- Leaders must accept a greater degree of transparency in their decision-making
- Leaders might lose some “mystique”, looking as if they’re governed by data rather than intuition and innate abilities

When Leaders Are Bullies

Bullying or overly aggressive leaders is a relatively common phenomenon.

And it’s a phenomenon that deserves attention, since ongoing workplace bullying are serious healthy consequences, including PTSD.

Traits of Bullying Leaders

House & Howell (1992) say that the traits of bullying supervisors include excessive need for power, high levels of Machiavellianism, authoritarianism, external locus of control combined with low self-esteem.
Judge et al. (2009) also add narcissism, hubris, and social dominance.
Hershcovis et al. (2007) found out that anger highly correlated with aggression and Aquino & Thau (2009) found that emotional instability leads to aggression and bullying.

Thought Patterns of Bullies

In terms of thought patterns, a hostile attribution style, such as attributing failures to external stable and intentional causes, leads to aggression.

The worst cases appear to be when a leader attributes poor work performance to a willingness to undermine him as a leader.

Finally, bosses who think they themselves are being treated unfairly and are stressed out are more likely to act aggressively towards their own reports (Aryee et al., 2007; Hoobler & Brass, 2006, Tepper et al., 2006).
This is also called “misplaced aggression“.

How I Met Your Mother also had a clip about it:

Work Environment

Bowling & Beehr's (2006) metastudy shows that role conflict (ρ = .44) and role ambiguity (ρ = .30), together with work constraints (ρ = .54), are the strongest predictors of workplace harassment.

And as we might expect, misbehavior is more common where upper management is tolerant of it and where there is a lack of clear organizational norms and policies, including safe complaints procedures (see Pryor & Fitzgerald, 2003).

Van de Vliert & Einarsen (2008) and Van de Vliert et al. (2010) have also shown that countries with harsher climates and poorer income have more instances of abusive behavior.

Dealing With Workplace Bullying

However, the answer to workplace bullying is not endless dominance from the employees' part.

Aquino & Byron (2002) found support for the hypothesis that dominant behavior shows a curvilinear relationship with victimization from leader abuse.
Such as submissive employees are experienced as weak and exploitable and employees high on dominance break social norms and therefore are more easily exposed to retaliation and abuse.

The authors don't go into solutions, however mixing warmth with power and assertiveness usually work great in every situation.

Organizational Change

Resistance to disruptive transformational change is strongest in the middle-management and individual-contributor levels.

It makes sense, since these people are the ones who often know the least about the change, and who risk the most about change.
Employees can also be stressed by the change due to increased work, threats of job losses, changes in responsibilities/scope, and shifts in the balance of power (McHugh & Brennan, 1994).

This is how management can increase acceptance to change:

- Increase trust in the organization: that leadership behaviors and trust in leadership seem to be important determinants of OCB (Podsakoff et al., 2000)
- Demonstrate commitment: and doing so beyond words, such as attending meetings or ceremonies relevant to the change effort. This indicates that the change must be important (Pfeffer & Sutton, 2006; Podsakoff et al., 2000; Yukl, 2006)
- Provide clear guidance on what's going to happen: it helps avoid rumors and "fear of the unknown"
- Use "Schein's 3 steps": Building on Lewin's idea of unfreezing, Schein (1999a) identified 3 conditions to successful unfreezing: disconfirm the validity of the status quo, induce survival anxiety to motivate change, and create enough psychological safety that yes, you can make the change and survive and thrive

How to Foster Creativity

To develop and sustain creativity, an organization generally needs:

- Relatively open culture
- Empowered staff: push responsibilities down
- Responsive and flexible structure
- Integrated procedures
- Idea-development systems
- Good external partnerships

More Wisdom

- Emotional attachment can be good leadership

It has been well established that emotional attachment can be a key factor in successful leadership (Bass, 1985; Gardner & Avolio, 1998).

- Yes, top leadership does matter

There was a popular academic perspective that leadership did not really matter in achieving results.
That doesn't seem to be the case, though.
Day & Lord (1988) showed that when proper methodological concerns were addressed the impact of top-level leadership was considerable -as much as 45% of organizational performance-.

CONS

- An "exec summary" would have been useful

Since the book is very dense, I would have appreciated a section that summarized the research literature.
There was indeed an end-of-chapter session for an overview, but it rarely was an actual overview.

- Sometimes different authors repeat same intros

Since there are different authors for each chapter, sometimes the intros repeat the same information.

- A coherent, larger, dot-connecting theoretical infrustrcture would have been nice

Some chapters were great.

In some others, I felt that the authors weren't always "connecting the dots". So some chapters did not provide a larger framework with which to better understand the world.

REVIEW

The Wiley-Blackwell Handbooks are not for the laymen to read.

They have no stories, no examples, and be very dense to read.
After all, they are written by academics, for academics.
And for a guy like me, who seeks to combine data and research with first-hand experience, observation, and logic…
They are a Godsent.

They allow me to review whole swaths of the best research literature, in a time-effective fashion.

So I'm very grateful to the authors, and thumb up from me.
But if you're not an academic and are looking for actionable advice, then this website's products might provide you with better tools to succeed.

How to Influence and Stand Out in Business Meetings

Lucio Buffalmano · 13 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Meetings are great opportunities for your career.

The social strategist attends not just to get things done, but to advance his career.
He promotes himself, plays politics… And grows closer to his boss (or those in power)..

This post gives you the ground rules to influence and self-promote in business meetings.

If everyone's a sycophant, you need a different strategy to stand out
So let's start:

Contents

- 1. Get Buy-In Before the Meeting
  - Solution
  - Delivery techniques
- 2. Sit Right to The Boss
  - 2.2. Avoid Sitting Alone Across from the Boss
- 3. In Inter-Department Meetings, Side With Your Team
- 4. Adapt Like a Chameleon to Boss & Culture
- 5. Focus on The 'Alpha', Ignore The Rest
  - ⍰ Example:
- 5. Challenge External Vendors (& Job Candidates)
- 6. Speak Early, Speak Often, Speak Confidently
- 8. Self-Promote, But Offset It With Collaborative Frames

  - 2.2. Avoid Sitting Alone Across from the Boss
- 3. In Inter-Department Meetings, Side With Your Team
- 4. Adapt Like a Chameleon to Boss & Culture
- 5. Focus on The 'Alpha', Ignore The Rest
  - ⍰ Example:
- 5. Challenge External Vendors (& Job Candidates)
- 6. Speak Early, Speak Often, Speak Confidently
- 8. Self-Promote, But Offset It With Collaborative Frames

1. Get Buy-In Before the Meeting

This is a common mistake for less power-aware folks.

They see a meeting on their calendar to discuss a certain topic and think: "Great, that's my opportunity to introduce my great idea".

Big freaking mistake.

Persuasion is about power.
Most big-shot executives worth their salt have big egos and are very high on power.

If you persuade them on the spot, it sub-communicates that you have power over them. And if your solution is 'better', the sub-communication is that you are 'better' than them.
Of course they'll resist that.

And the resistance is larger when you're:

1. Junior
2. Newer
3. Proposing big changes
   - Changes impacting someone powerful
4. Challenging the status quo

Solution

Lay the groundwork before the meeting:

1. Talk to key stakeholders
2. Get their input early
3. Make them feel valued
4. Adjust your pitch with their feedback
5. Say you'd like to present the idea and if they're OK with it

If not possible:

- Provide an early heads-up
- Present with as much power protection as possible

Delivery techniques

The more hurdles you face, the more you should frame it as:

- A possible solution
  - Potentially, a test to run
- An improvement, not a revolution
- A possible solution that may need refinement
- Worth considering, rather than obvious improvement
- Inspired by something/someone else, rather than your sole genius

If attacked, don't take it personally.
Before addressing it, validate the attacker and the merit of his contribution.

⍰ If it goes well, propose to lead that project.

P.S.:
Men resist public influence more than women.
See this post:

- Women winning in business

> The Businesswoman Guide to Win in Male Organizations

2. Sit Right to The Boss

The boss's power will rub off on you, and physical closeness signals a good relationship.

2.2. Avoid Sitting Alone Across from the Boss

Especially if it's only you across:

3. In Inter-Department Meetings, Side With Your Team

In intra-team meetings, you can argue with your colleagues.

But in inter-team meetings arguing with your colleagues can be perceived as “friendly fire”. It frames you as a traitor.

Worst of all if the boss is present: he will take it as treason, and as a sign of disloyalty.

Why?
Because inter-team dynamics in the male culture have a tinge of “us/them”.
It’s pure in-group/outgroup and ‘us VS them’ tribal dynamic.

It’s a bad sign when turf squabbles trump good work.
But these dynamics go on a spectrum. And it’s rare to find a boss that welcomes better company output at the cost of his team’s reputation and loyalty.
Conversely, if you hear your boss complaining about other teams or talking about ‘those guys’ with a demeaning tone, adapt.
Don’t defend them, don’t be a politician saying that some mistakes are to be expected, and be too chummy with them in his presence -but be warm when he’s not there -.

Note: Don’t internalize the ‘belonging to the team’ mindset
Extreme tribalism is bad for humanity and bad for you. You give your individuality and self-interest. So play like you’re a loyal team member, but never become a tribalist.

4. Adapt Like a Chameleon to Boss & Culture

The simplest way to fix a political blunder is to prevent one.

While some cultures welcome disagreement and challenging questions, others expect obedience.

If unsure, ask your boss:

> Boss, is it OK to express different opinions from colleagues or management in a meeting? Should I discuss with you first?

You'll learn the culture, and flatter your boss with the question.

5. Focus on The 'Alpha', Ignore The Rest

If there is one main decision maker -'alpha'-, respect everyone, but focus on the alpha.

If others attack you, it's likely posturing.
Stay composed and respond only if it helps persuade the alpha.

⍰ Example:

As 'talent' graduates we presented our ideas to the senior management team.

It was textbook political mistake: juniors, delivering big change ideas, without pre-buy-in.

I proposed to let employees book work-from-home days without approval.

Andy the big boss joked that next, we could allow beers at work.
The whole room exploded in laughter.

And other senior managers piled up.

I strategically laughed with them.
Then, as the laugh died down, I addressed Andy first. I looked at everyone, but still I spent more time on Andy.
And I said (improved version for better learning):

> Me: I can see why you're worried about this <— Pacing and validating
> It is worrying to give away so much power <— Validating
> And I agree with you, some people will abuse of that power <— Extra alignment they weren't expecting
> And that's great <— Leading with a huge attention grabber
> That's why this proposal can be a good idea <— 'Can' is strategic
> When everyone's free to choose between abusing the system or use the freedom to do better work, we can quickly tell who are the good guys from the bad ones <— 'We' framing us on the same team
> This proposal isn't a blank check for everyone to do whatever they want. This is a reward to keep and attract the top performers we want. <— Ends with the positive of this proposal

Even if the original wasn't this polished, it still turned the power dynamics on their head.

Andy stopped being a d*ck and began pondering.
And so did everyone else.

The proposal was drastic, and it wasn't accepted.
But I gave it the best chance, and it was still a personal win.
Including with the HR coordinator when much later she mentioned that I could 'negotiate with a very difficult opponent‘.

5. Challenge External Vendors (& Job Candidates)

Prepare thoughtful questions to display your acumen and high standards for vendors and new hires.
Some tips:

- Display responsibility for your work
  - Ask how the new hire will support you or how the vendor’s software benefits your work
- Display your commitment to go the extra mile
  - Ask what they’re willing to do if achieving your goal requires extra effort
- Inquire about costs as if you were spending your own money

6. Speak Early, Speak Often, Speak Confidently

This is the rule of thumb when it comes to the order of speaking:

> Those who speak early and often are seen as more credible, greater risk takers, and possessing more leadership potential than those who speak later.

Those who speak last are seen as “also-run”, the ones that didn’t have enough value or courage to speak first.

What if you didn’t have anything to say, or you really didn’t dare to go first?
Well, here is a cool power move for you, then: summarize what everyone else has said before you add your own. Give credit, mention a few people and their ideas. And then add yours.

8. Self-Promote, But Offset It With Collaborative Frames

You want to self-promote, of course.

But you don’t want to look like you’re only out for “team you”.

Doing it well requires some social calibration and smoothness.

Imagine you’re in a team meeting.
There is a lot of discussions back and forth, but so far no decision has been taken and there seems to be no one leading.

You feel that you have found the perfect way forward.

How do you present it?
It’s usually best to present your idea as the culmination of everyone’s input, rather than your own stroke of genius (examples in Power University).

Meetings are great opportunities for your career.

The social strategist attends not just to get things done, but to advance his career.
He promotes himself, play politics… And grows closer to his boss (or those in power)..

This post gives you the ground rules for influencing and promoting at meetings.

If everyone's a sycophant, you need a different strategy to stand out
So let's start:

1. Get Buy-In Before the Meeting

This is a common mistake for less power-aware folks.

They see a meeting set on their calendar to discuss a certain topic and they think: "great, that's my opportunity to introduce my great idea".

Big freaking mistake.

Persuasion is about power.
Most big-shot executives worth their salt have big egos and are very high on power.

If you persuade them on the spot, it sub-communicates that you have power over them. And if your solution is 'better', the sub-communication is that you are 'better' than them.
Of course they'll resist that.

And the resistance is larger when you're:

1. Junior
2. Newer
3. Proposing big changes
    - Changes impacting someone powerful
4. Challenging the status quo

Solution

Lay the groundwork before the meeting:

1. Talk to key stakeholders

2. Get their input early
3. Make them feel valued
4. Adjust your pitch with their feedback
5. Say you'd like to present the idea and if they're OK with it

If not possible:

- Provide an early heads-up
- Present with as much power protection as possible

Delivery techniques

The more hurdles you face, the more you should frame it as:

- A possible solution
  - Potentially, a test to run
- An improvement, not a revolution
- A possible solution that may need refinement
- Worth considering, rather than obvious improvement
- Inspired by something/someone else, rather than your sole genius

If attacked, don't take it personally.
Before addressing it, validate the attacker and the merit of his contribution.

⍰ If it goes well, propose to lead that project.

P.S.:
Men resist public influence more than women.

2. Sit Right to The Boss

The boss's power will rub off on you, and physical closeness signals a good relationship.

2.2. Avoid Sitting Alone Across from the Boss

Especially if it's only you across:

About the Author

Nathaniel Branden was a Canadian–American psychotherapist and author known for his work in the psychology of self-esteem.
Branden was also a romantic partner and associate of Ayn Rand, a popular 1960s writer and philosopher. Branden also discusses Rand and their relationship in this same book.

Summary

What's Self-Esteem

Says the author:

> Self-esteem is the experience that we are appropriate to life and to the requirements of life.

More specifically:

1. Confidence in our ability to think and cope with the basic challenges of life (supporting oneself, effectively interact with others, coping with adversity,
2. The belief in our right to be happy and entitled to assert our needs and wants, and enjoy the fruits of our efforts

Then, around 1/3 of the book Branden adds yet another definition:

> Self-esteem is the disposition to experience oneself as competent to cope with the basic challenges of life and as worthy of happiness.

To have self-esteem means to feel confidently appropriate to life, while to not have self-esteem means to feel inappropriate to life.
To feel "wrong", and not about any specific issue, but wrong as a person.

The 2 Components of Self-Esteem

- Self-efficacy: basic confidence in the face of life's challenges. It's the experience of basic power or competence. To be "efficacious", is to be able to produce a desired result. But it's deeper than confidence on a specific set of skills or knowledge. It is the confidence in being able to acquire that set of skills or knowledge.
- Self-respect: a sense of being worthy. The conviction that our life and well-being are worth acting to support, protect, and nurture; that we are good and worthwhile and deserving of the respect of others

Advantages of Self-Esteem

Self-esteem makes you:

- Feel better
- More effective at life
- Happier
- Resistant to social pressure and "judges" . Says the author: "The lower our self-esteem, the more urgent the need to "prove ourselves"
- Self-fulfilling prophecies of personal empowerment and success: "self-esteem creates a set of implicit expectations about what is possible and appropriate to us. These expectations tend to generate the actions that turn them into realities. And the realities confirm and strengthen the original beliefs"

The author includes a whole host of traits that self-esteem supports.
But in short: self-esteem is good for you, and very important.

How Self-Esteem Looks Like

How does self-esteem reflect in people's behavior and thoughts?

Here are some concrete examples of high self-esteem behavior and attitudes:

- Ease in talking of accomplishments or short-comings with directness and honesty
- Giving and receiving compliments, expressions of affection, appreciation
- Openness to criticism and a comfort about acknowledging mistakes, because one's self-esteem is not tied to an image of "being perfect."
- Harmony between what one says and does and how one looks, sounds, and moves.
- Feelings of anxiety or insecurity, if they appear, are be less likely to intimidate or overwhelm
- Comfort with assertive behavior (not belligerent) in oneself and others
- General relaxation, ease and spontaneity, since one is not at war with oneself

On the other hand, chronic tension conveys some form of internal split, some form of self-avoidance or self-repudiation, or some aspect of the self-being disowned, repressed, or under tight control.

When you succeed with low self-esteem you lose joy

Yes, you can also succeed with low self-esteem.

BUT, you'd be missing out a lot both in terms of personal empowerment, and of life joy.

Says the author:

> (some people) may have the talent and energy to achieve greatly, in spite of feelings of inadequacy or unworthiness—like the highly productive workaholic who is driven to prove his worth to, say, a father who predicted he would always be a loser. But it does mean that we will be less effective and less creative than we have the power to be; and it means that we will be crippled in our ability to find joy in our achievements. Nothing we do will ever feel like "enough."

Lack of self-esteem fuels the hedonic treadmill of more material success, without satisfaction

Says the author:

> So it is always "one more" victory—one more promotion, one more sexual conquest, one more company, one more piece of jewelry, a larger house, a more expensive car, another award—yet the void within remains unfilled.

And, funny enough, giving up the pursuit of material possession and conquests is not the answer.
Not until you first acquire self-esteem as a middle step.
Says the author:

> In today's culture some frustrated people who hit this impasse announce that they have decided to pursue a "spiritual" path and renounce their egos. This enterprise is doomed to failure. An ego, in the mature and healthy sense, is precisely what they have failed to attain. They dream of giving away what they do not possess. No one can successfully bypass the need for self-esteem.

Pillar 1: Living consciously

It includes:

- Facing problems heads on
- Making amends when we know we have failed
- Reality-based feedback
- Knowing one's value and acting according to them

Betrayals of consciousness

- Not facing problems: hiding problems in the hope they'll disappear is a betrayal of our own mind, and self-esteem will suffer
- Not making amends:
- Ignoring reality: for example, says the author, the fake self-help mantra of "If I don't choose to see it or acknowledge it, it doesn't exist"

Learn to spot the "alien voices" within

Says the author:

> Why might it be worth our efforts to identify the different voices speaking within? To recognize alien influences with alien agendas (the voice of a parent or a religious authority, for example), to learn how to distinguish one's own true voice from all others, to operate one's life as an autonomous human being.

Pillar 2: Self-acceptance

To accept oneself, and to be a friend of oneself.

Stated in the negative, it's the refusal of being in an adversarial relationship with oneself.

It comes with different levels:

1. Being on your side: "prerational, premoral act of self-affirmation—a kind of natural egoism that is the birthright of every human being". It is is "selfishness," in the noblest meaning of that word.
2. Acceptance: to acceptance everything of who we are, and a refusal to see any part of ourselves as "alien" to us. It's not about liking everything about us, but accepting it.
3. Compassion: to be a friend of yourself. Even if you think something was unworthy of you, you can self-inquire without condemning, make amends, and resolve to do better. But as a friend, not as a judge.

Exercise 1

Stand in front of a full-length mirror and look at your face and body.

Notice if this is difficult or makes you uncomfortable. It is good to do this exercise naked.

Say to yourself: "Whatever my defects or imperfections, I accept myself unreservedly and completely."

Breath deeply, say it and repeat it for a minute or two, let the words sink in.

The author says that when clients do this exercise morning and evening, they start seeing the strong relationship between self-acceptance and self-esteem.

Exercise 2

Imagine a feeling, emotion, or a part of yourself that you dislike and find hard to accept.

It can be fear, envy, rage, humiliation etc.
Maybe think of the situation that evokes such feelings.

Breath into the feeling and accept it fully.
Don't wish it to go away, sit with it.

You can also tell yourself "I am now feeling such and such (whatever the feeling is) and I accept it fully."

And if you can't manage to feel it, without resisting it?
Then accept your resistance to accepting the resistance.

Pillar 3: Self-responsibility

To take responsibility for one's life, actions, and results.

The individual who accepts self-responsibility knows that nobody owes him the fulfillment of his goals and wishes.

At the same time, it means respecting other people's self-interest. So if you need someone to reach your goals, you undertake to provide them with what they want to help you (WIIFT).

Also read:

- The social exchange

Pillar 4: Self-assertiveness

Self-assertiveness means the willingness to stand up for yourself, to openly be and act according to who you are, and to treat yourself with respect in all human encounters.

It means knowing and honoring your wants, needs, and value, and appropriately express them in life.

In this paragraph, I also realized that Branden truly seems to understand social skills and to have high levels of emotional and social intelligence.
He says that what's appropriate for self-assertiveness is contextual, and depends on the situation, and the people.
For example, he says:

> Sometimes self-assertiveness is manifested (…) through a polite silence that signals nonagreement; sometimes by refusing to smile at a tasteless joke. In work situations, one cannot necessarily voice all one's thoughts, and it is not necessary to do so.

Also important:

- Mindsets first: to practice self-assertiveness you need the conviction that your ideas and wants are important
- It's not rebelliousness: don't confuse self-assertiveness with general rebelliousness
- You need courage sometimes: you build self-assertiveness by being self-assertive when it is not easy to do so
- It's a balancing act:

> When we learn how to be in an intimate relationship without abandoning our sense of self, when we learn how to be kind without being self-sacrificing, when we learn how to cooperate with others without betraying our standards and convictions, we are practicing self-assertiveness.

- Some individualism is needed

> (…) if one believes that it is more desirable to fit in than to stand out, one will not embrace the virtue of self-assertiveness.
> If one's primary source of safety and security is through affiliation with the tribe, the family, the group, the community, the company, the collective, then even self-esteem can be perceived as threatening and frightening—because it signifies individuation (self-realization, the unfolding of personal identity)

Individualism also underpins the capacity for true connection.
The author says that the mature individual developed equally on both tracks of individuation (autonomy) and relationship (the capacity for intimacy and human connectedness).

I couldn't agree more.
Also read:

- Enlightened Individualism

And on assertiveness read:

- How to be assertive

Pillar 5: Living purposefully

It means to have goals and act accordingly to reach them.

It means to use your power and expend effort for the attainment of goals that you have chosen and that are meaningful to you.

Keep Your Identity Separate From Your Goals

However, don't make the mistake of identifying the self with the work.

If self-esteem is tied primarily to accomplishments, success, income, or being a good provider, economic circumstances beyond your control can fling you into depression or acute demoralization.

Read more here:

- The antifragile ego

Pillar 6: Personal integrity

Integrity is the integration of ideals, convictions, standards, beliefs, and behavior.

We have integrity when behavior is congruent with our professed values and when ideals and practice match.

Before integrity we need to have principles of behavior, values, and moral convictions about what is appropriate and what is not, what is right, and what is wrong.

Whenever we behave in ways that contradict our judgment of what's right and wrong, we lose face in our own eyes. We lose respect with ourselves. And since self-esteem is about the respect and reputation we have with ourselves, when we act in ways that go against our morals our self-esteem suffers.

Says the author:

> A tragedy of many lives is that people greatly underestimate the self-esteem costs and consequences of hypocrisy and dishonesty. They imagine that at worst all that is involved is some discomfort. But it is the spirit itself that is contaminated.

Pillar 7: Keep practicing even when it's hard

Pillar 7 is all about practice.

And, especially, to practice when it's difficult.

Since self-esteem is the reputation you have with yourself, the more you can "prove" to yourself that you're worthy of high self-esteem, the higher your self-esteem will be.

Philosophy of Self-Esteem

In this part the author goes into beliefs and mindsets.

You can learn more with the following articles:

- Growth mindset (how to develop one)
- Antifragile ego
- Accept your loneliness

Integrating sub-personalities for deeper self-acceptances

We are not monolithic blocks with just one set of values and preferences.

Instead, we are often composed of different sets of sub-personalities, and to have a high self-esteem and to fully accept ourselves, we also have to accept our sub-personalities.

Among our sub-personalities:

- Kid self
- Teenage self
- Opposite gender self
- Mother self

We often keep parts of these personalities within us.
We still have a kid who likes something that we liked as children. And we still have fathers and mothers voices sometimes playing within us.

Accepting our masculine & feminine develops self-esteem

Branden says we all have both genders within us.

> The opposite-gender-self is the component of the psyche containing the feminine subpersonality of the male and the masculine subpersonality

And, crucially:

> There tends to be a fairly strong correlation between how we relate to the opposite gender in the world and how we relate to the opposite gender within.

MORE WISDOM

People With Low Self-Esteem Resent People With High Self-Esteem

The author says that low self-esteem people are often uncomfortable in the presence of higher self-esteem individuals, and can grow resentful.

They might even say that they have too much self-esteem.
But in truth, they're making a statement about themselves. The author says that insecure men often feel more insecure in the presence of self-confident women (see the latent anger of some men towards women in the red pill).

Extreme Ownership is Dangerous to Self-Esteem

Extreme ownership has become a popular mindset in self-development.

But the author believes that is dangerous to healthy self-esteem:

> I do not support the grandiose notion that "I am responsible for every aspect of my existence and everything that befalls me." Some things we have control over; others we do not.
> If I hold myself responsible for matters beyond my control, I put my self-esteem in jeopardy, since inevitably I will fail my expectations.

Eployees don't trust employers because of incongruency

> Studies disclose that many people in organizations do not trust those above them. Why? Lack of congruence. Beautiful mission statements unsupported by practice.

Proving you're enough is a battle you lose when you started it

> If my aim is to prove I am "enough," the project goes on to infinity—because the battle was already lost on the day I conceded the issue was debatable.

Some key articles on the topic:

- Judge power dynamics
- Frame control

Getting good with people is fundamental to self-esteem (and life)

Says the author:

> Sometimes people who feel fear in the human realm drop to a very low level of consciousness in their relationships and seek the safety and security of competence in the impersonal word of machines, mathematics, or abstract thought. No matter what heights they may attain professionally, their self-esteem remains flawed. We cannot with impunity run from so important an aspect of life.

Leaders need a strong ego

Says Branden:

> It is a fallacy to say that a great leader should be egoless. A leader needs an ego sufficiently healthy that it does not experience itself as on the line in every encounter—so that the leader is free to be task and results oriented, not self-aggrandizement or self-protection oriented.

If a leader has low self-esteem, says the author, he will most likely feel more comfortable with people who have even less self-esteem, and hire those people.

I love this passage.
On this website, we call it "the law of the lid" of leadership.
However, I must note again, the author seems to mix up ego and self-esteem.

Enlightenment & Consciousness Provide Self-Esteem, Material Pursuits Do Not

The author says that some people seek self-esteem with material possessions, sexual conquests, or belonging in the "right" clubs.

But these are hollow pursuits.

Instead, self-esteem runs deeper.
He says:

> positive self-esteem is best understood as a spiritual attainment, that is, as a victory in the evolution of consciousness.

Self-Esteem fluctuates, think of it in terms of average levels

It's normal to have fluctuations.

So it's more appropriate to think of self-esteem in terms of averaging out those fluctuations.

Have the courage to end poor relationships

Says the author:

> We often see this pattern in marriages. One partner sees before the other that the relationship is finished. But he or she does not want to be "the bad guy," the one to end things. So instead manipulation begins, to lead the other to make the first move. It is cruel, degrading, lacking in dignity, and hurtful to both people. It is self-demeaning and self-diminishing.

Parenting helps, but there is more

Good parenting contributes to high self-esteem, and poor parenting makes high self-esteem harder.

But it's only one element among many.

You Cannot Have Enough Self-Esteem

The author says that "no, you can't have too much self-esteem".

He says that some people believe so because they confuse self-esteem with boasting or bragging or arrogance.
But, he says, such traits reflect too little self-esteem, not too much.

Low self-esteem negatively impacts relationships

The author says that if one partner loses self-esteem while the other grows it, the losing partner may grow anxious and attempt to sabotage the growth process.

- How to maintain control in relationships

QUOTES

> When we doubt our minds, we tend to discount its products.

Antifragile self-esteem:

> In a world in which the total of human knowledge is doubling about every ten years, our security can rest only on our ability to learn.

Self-esteem is the reputation we have with ourselves:

> But deep in our psyche they are added up, and the sum is that experience we call "self-esteem." Self-esteem is the reputation we acquire with ourselves.

On fearing to admit mistakes and low self-esteem:

> To find it humiliating to admit an error is a certain sign of flawed self-esteem.

On "too nice people" making excuses for their lack of power with an excess of "goodness":

> As a sop to the pain he cannot entirely bury, he tells himself, "At least I'm not selfish. Selfishness is evil—isn't it?"

On individuals before community:

> Individuation raises the specter of isolation to those who have not achieved it and do not understand that far from being the enemy of community, it is its necessary precondition. A healthy society is a union of self-respecting individuals. It is not a coral bush.

On therapy over-focus on the negative aspects of human psychology and the corresponding need for more "positive psychology":

> Everyone who has any familiarity with psychology knows about the danger of disowning the murderer within. Far fewer people understand the tragedy of disowning the hero within.

On tribalism being anti self-esteem:

> The tribal premise is intrinsically anti-self-esteem.
> (…)
> Disempowers the individual qua individual. Its implicit message is: You don't count. By yourself, you are nothing. Only as part of us can you be something.

CRITICISM

This section reviews the scientific and logical aspects of "The Six Pillars of Self-Esteem".

Naive Self-Help Promoting “Doing Good”

Says the author:

> We cannot be indifferent to the moral meaning of our actions, although we may try to be or pretend to be.

And:

> everyone judges himself or herself by some standard (…) to the extent there is a split between ideals and practice, self-respect suffers.

That is true… For empaths.

But dark triads and Machiavellians don’t really feel much mental blowback if they disregard rules of ethics and moral conduct.

And albeit it’s good to be an empath, this website also says that being able to sever our morality from certain actions -or people- is helpful in life.

So it’s possible that instead of focusing on making all your actions in line, you might want to focus on being more fluid. Ethical and moral with the people and situations who deserve it, and being able to disregard the “rules” when the situation or the individual you’re dealing with calls for it.

Sometimes Felt More Pop-Psychology, Less Scientific

The author writes based on:

- His experience as a therapist
- His intuition / analysis
- His philosophy of life

Most of the times, and in most of the crucial concepts, his theory seems to add up and his advice is spot-on.
But some other times it felt that his framework was more based on personal opinions and worldviews, and less on experience or science.

Science seemed indeed to be largely missing.
When it was introduced, the author quoted some studies and work that turned out to be only partially correct pop-psychology -like the learning styles and Margaret Mead’s ethnographic work with the Samoans-.

Definition of self-esteem may be too large

Writes personality psychology researcher Keith Campbell:

> This massively popular work expanded the definition of self-esteem (…) yet it also captures many variables that today’s psychologists would place beyond self-esteem, such as mindfulness and self-efficacy.

Conflates ego with self-esteem

Writes the author:

> With a pretense at regret he will sometimes declare, “I can’t help it—I have a big ego.” The truth is, he has a small one, but his energies are invested in never knowing that.

But as psychologist Roy Baumeister explains, they’re not the same.

I've noticed that happening more than once across "The Six Pillars of Self-Esteem".

Self-esteem is what Branden likes, rather than what truly is

More than once I felt that what was good for self-esteem is what supported the author's philosophy and worldview, rather than what's been proven to be.

For example:

- Commitment to learning supports self-esteem?

How does a "commitment to learning" underpin self-esteem?

I'm all for learning, it's one of my life's main activities and this website also offers learning products.

But… I don't necessarily posit that it underpins self-esteem.

It can help in many cases, yes, since expanding knowledge and skills also mean expanding power and the expanded capacity to control the world around us.
But I'm not convinced that correlation is all that strong. Unless one has developed a growth mindset, learning can also sneakily presuppose that one does not know enough.

- Is putting the individual before the community a necessary aspect of self-esteem?

Again, I agree with the idea and philosophy.

I'm the biggest proponent around for individuals before groups. Also from a power dynamics and self-empowerment perspective.
But is it really foundational to self-esteem?
I haven't seen any evidence that convinced me of it.

- Purposeful living only counts if you pursue "good" goals?

The author says that the type of work and goals you pursue don't matter… As long as they're not "intrinsically antilife".

Again, I agree with him from an ethical standpoint.

But who says that a terrorist can't have high self-esteem if he believes that's God's work?
And who says that a man pursuing ethnic cleansing in the belief that it's the best thing to do cannot have high self-esteem?

- Self-esteem must be grounded in reality? Must… ?

The author stresses the relationship between realism and self-esteem.

Man of high self-esteem look at reality, he says.
Being grounded in reality may help to achieve reality-based goals.

But grandiose narcissists have high self-esteem without being grounded in reality.

And some of the most high confidence and self-esteem men believed God is on their side.

- The author's political preferences become ingredients and advice for healthy self-esteem

In the last part of the book, it becomes clear Branden holds strong political views.

He supports capitalism and more individualistic societies, and dislikes communism, heavy taxation, and collectivist societies.
Describing scenes of looting, he says that they are the consequences of professors who taught, I quote, that "no one is responsible for anything he or she does (except the greedy capitalists who own the stores and deserve whatever trouble they get)."

That felt like a political statement, not a scientific one.

You can then understand why Branden spent so much time defending himself against the accusations of being culturally and politically biased.

He also doesn't seem to agree -and maybe even understand- Buddhism.
He says:

> Understood correctly, there is nothing intrinsically "Western" about a strong goal orientation. When Buddha set out in search of enlightenment, was he not moved by a passionate purpose?

Actually, I'm not sure Buddhism is moved by a passionate purpose.

For the record, I'm also all for capitalism. But I don't necessarily agree with the author that Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia stifled self-esteem.

- Moral integrity (& hypocrisy)

The author makes morals and integrity central to self-esteem.

I'm not only unconvinced but actually disagree with it.
It's people with the strongest pre-set morals who engage the most in mental machinations to justify their own non-moral behavior (cognitive dissonance).

It's also noteworthy that the author saw nothing wrong in badmouthing his former partner.

I wonder if that shouldn't count as "not right" and decrease his self-esteem?
I guess it didn't:

Vindictive & nasty towards his ex: where are the moral values & integrity?

Read below in the "cons".

And please note, this isn't so much about his action and whether or not they were correct.

It's also about the pillars of self-esteem and what contributes -and what doesn't- to self-esteem.

If behaving correctly is so important, and if the author seems to suggest he has come such a long way in curating his self-esteem, shouldn't we see moral behavior from him?

So when I read the passages of him badmouthing his ex, that undermines much of his vaunted need and importance of "values" for self-esteem.

As a matter of fact, for me it's a red flag when someone pushes a tad too hard on the importance of value and living life according to certain values.

It's a red flag of potential manipulation and self-manipulation.

Says Brendan of her former partner:

> She did not require full agreement among acquaintances, but with anyone who wanted to be truly close, enormous enthusiasm was expected for every deed and utterance.
> for example, I found her self-congratulatory remarks excessive or her lack of empathy disquieting or her pontificating unworthy of her.

This passage serves absolutely nothing in explaining self-esteem.

So it must be put there as an attempt to defame his ex.

"Unworthy of her" is a nasty covert power move.
By implying that a woman like Ayn Rand should be held to a high standard, he seeks to sound less nasty and more giving, while delivering the same power punch -or, actually, even more powerful, since he seeks to self-frame as a balanced, giving individual-.
Read more here.

Accepting your dark side might do better things for your self-esteem

I lost much respect for the author with that passage quoted above.

It's possible that the author has not accepted his dark side.
He refuses to look and admit to his own anger and hatred of his ex, and his will to harm her.

I think that it's much better for your self-esteem if rather than pretending you're good and nice, you accept your own darker drive.
And that's also a much better way to eventually act and become more moral, by the way.

CONS

These are some "cons" that aren't necessarily about the concept of self-esteem:

Ayn Rand VS Nathaniel Branden: nastiness & airing dirty laundry

There are several passages in which Branden discusses his relationship with Ayn Rand.

Even when I was first reading the book, and completely oblivious to their relationship, I was astonished by those passages.
They seemed overly nasty towards Rand, and I knew something interesting from a power dynamics point of view was up.

I had to look further into it.

The story that emerges is not pretty.

It seems to me this was a toxic, emotionally (highly) addictive relationship with some personality disturbance in it.
And the two parties were too enmeshed in it, both emotionally, and financially.

I can understand his personal anger and frustration.
I read part of Ayn Rand letter. She seems to be the first to make a public and open attack. She comes across as spiteful and I can see a lot of power moves and nastiness in that letter.

Branden's own answer isn't much better though.
He also goes very low.
And comes across equally cheap and vindictive.

Rand seems volatile and dark-triad narcissistic.

However, the author should have soared higher after a certain point.
I think the author shouldn't have kept airing his grievances and using his future work as an opportunity to attack again. It reflects poorly on him, and on his own work.

This is a strong reminder that to avoid this nasty stuff you need social strategies more than self-esteem.

“Back then when it was better” fallacy

More than once the author seems to believe that the world is getting worse.

That today it’s worse, and back then it was better.
For example:

> The challenge for people today, and it is not an easy one, is to maintain high personal standards while feeling that one is living in a moral sewer.
> Grounds for such a feeling are to be found in the behavior of our public figures, the horror of world events, and in our so-called art and entertainment, so much of which celebrates depravity, cruelty, and mindless violence.
> All contribute to making the practice of personal integrity a lonely and heroic undertaking.

I don’t believe that for a second.
And not necessarily because the world is getting better and more virtuous as Pinker implies. But because people are pretty much the same across the centuries.

PROS

Among the many pros:

- One of the best overviews on self-esteem

And that should be your main reason to read it.
Plus, it also provides a good overview of general mental health and well-being.

Next, I personally deeply enjoyed:

- Win-win philosophy based on healthy self-interest
- Personal self-development based around the self before any group or affiliation
- Self-esteem based on personal growth and self-empowerment
- Foundational mindset of “deserving respecful behavior” are spot-on
- Useful exercises

Review

“The Six Pillars of Self-Esteem” is a foundational book for personal self-development.

Much of the advice and philosophy also expands, complements, or mentions some of this website’s philosophy and approach to self-empowerment.

As a matter of fact, I was surprised at the overlap.
I went through some passages while nodding and thinking “exactly right, as this article expands on”.

Intro

At the highest level, you assess people's actions for:

- Empowering: gives you power
- Disempowering: takes your power away

For example:

Empowering	Disempowering
Apologies	Accusations
Congratulating	Undermining
Respect	Disrespect

Power Traffic Light

The traffic light is a simple model to categorize social power dynamics.

0 to 10 gives you power. 0 to -10 disempowers you. Intensity makes the difference

Examples in an office scenario with "tasking":

- Empowering: a colleague says: "I'm gonna work on it right now and send you that document ASAP"
- Disempowering yellow: the boss says in front of the team "Send me that document ASAP please"
- Disempowering orange: a colleague says in front of the team "Send me that document ASAP please"
- Disempowering red: a report tells the boss in front of the team "Send me that document ASAP please"

We used the same example to show that:

Context Makes The Difference

Let's explain with the previous examples:

Empowering because the colleague who executes swiftly treats you like a superior

Sub-communication: "you're important, and higher power".

Disempowering yellow because the boss is supposed to give you tasks

Sub-communication: "you're below me, and I treat you as such"

Everyone knows there is an official hierarchy. But you can lose power if he's curt.

Disempowering orange because a colleague is not supposed to task you

Sub-communication: "I'm higher power, and/or my work is more important than yours"

⚠ Careful: a tasking colleague may want to become your boss.

Disempowering red: a report tasking you is turning the power tables on you

Sub-communication: "There are no hierarchies here and/or I don't respect you as a leader".

A report may have to task you.
But he should be very power-protecting then.

⍰ For example:

> Power-protecting report:
> Boss, do you think you can send me that document today? <—- leaves it up to you
> That way I can finish this task for the client <—- provides a rationale that's good for you

⚠You must demand power-protection from reports, or you lose respect as a leader.

Also see more in:

- Office politics

Elements of Context

Context includes:

- Your status VS his status. The lower status the aggressor is compared to you, the more disempowering it is
- Who is around, including:
  - Privacy, more people around = more disempowering
  - People's relevance: Close relationships/social circle matter much more than strangers
  - People's power awareness: low-value, naive people won't realize you're losing power. High-flyers do, and take note
- Your goals.
  For example: a brusque but genius mentor is less disempowering when everyone knows you're after learning
- Urgency: direct commands are appropriate during emergencies. Less so during routine work
- Personality. If someone is curt, you lose less power if that's "who they are"
- Universality: if someone is rude to everyone, you lose less power when they're rude with you (but still: push back whenever appropriate)

⍰ Case Study: Context & Leadership

- Putin re-empowers himself with a minister (see PU)
- Putin lets Berlusconi get away here

Why?
Out of context, Berlusconi's behavior is MORE disempowering.

But within context, it's not:

- Berlusconi is closer to an equal. Albeit Russia is the biggest power, they're both country leaders
- Berlusconi "plays at home": it was in Italy
- It's a joking frame
  - Berlusconi has a reputation for joking around, rather than outright attacking
- The two are on friendly terms, and people knew

It's still disempowering for a leader who wants to convey power and be taken seriously.
But not too disempowering -and it was a challenging situation anyway-.

Traffic Lights Strategies

Very high-level guidelines:

Green: Empower Back

For pure effectiveness, both opposites work:

1. Empower them back, your baseline approach[1]
2. [?] Take and act entitled (power-hogging). As if it were due to you

Two extreme examples to illustrate the point:

Re-Empowering Back

My father is popular on a photographers' forum.

At their meetup this man kneeled:

My father:

- Frames it as joking around by smiling
- Get closer
- Holds hands

It moved from a possible frame of "I'm so high status" to a hilarious one of "LOL, thanks, we're joking around, but we're friends".

Power Hogging

Takers take as much value, investment, and power, while giving back as little as possible.
It's high ROI for them if it works, but it only works with lower-value people and people lacking any awareness and self-respect.

A woman trying too hard to be high-value:

Act entitled, like you expect more, and it's never good enough

⍰⍰ Never give to these people ⍰⍰♂ (terrible human beings).

More "everyday examples" in Power University.

Seek to Re-Empower

It's our baseline approach because:

- High power and high-value people don't keep on giving to takers, so "hogging" only works with low-power, clueless folks
- Hogging sub-communicates poor character. Honorable men don't seek pedestalization and don't need ego-stroking

Read more in this crucial article:

- How to save face and power protect

> Power Protecting: How to Keep Win-Win With High-Value People

Yellow: ignore & take note, or be smooth

Good approaches:

1. Display your resolve, don't send any submissive signals

Ie.:
If you get a hand-crushing handshake power move, make it a point to stare them straight on.

See more:

- Submissive behavior

- Submissive words

2. Avoid thread-expanding on the power-taking

Ie.:
If they joke at your expense, do not add anything on top with self-deprecation.
And don't laugh at it (if everyone else laughs, stick to a tight-lipped smile).

3. Ignore and observe

When you're lost or not sure what's best for you, it's OK to let it go.

But always make a mental note! ⍰

⍰ When to address or let it go is advanced level.
⍰ read more here or join PU.

P.S.:
You can also re-empower yourself later.
Either address it later, or power move them.

⍰⍰ Techniques: Least Effort Re-Empowerment

Least effort resistance requires little from you.

Often, you just remove some warmth:

⍰⍰ You remove warmth because friendliness in response to disempowering behavior makes you submissive.
And confirms the frame that they're above you.

How to remove warmth:

- Ignore him, or avoid greeting him first
- Greet neutrally or in quick, perfunctory fashion
  - Neutral words such as "hey man"
  - Neutral tonality or dismissive tonality (see PU)
  - Only brief eye contact or looking away.
    ⍰ Sub-communication: "You're not worthy of my attention"
- Ignore him when he speaks: look away or at your phone is neutral.
  - Use "deadpan faces" to avoid being a "supporting spectator". If everyone laughs at his joke, use tight-lipped smiles while looking away.
    ⍰ Subcommunication: you smile at the joke, not the person
  - Don't comment or you support his topic and thread-expand on his conversational leadership. If anything, intervene to question or raise doubts
  - Start a side conversation with someone in the group (top move!)

If in the meanwhile you gain some status, many power moves will come to you to mend things.

⚠ Balance: in social gatherings tone down dominance if you remove all warmth
High dominance + low warmth add up. It can become too much for many social events.
You don't win when everyone else thinks you're an aggressive dick.
Don't let an as*hole ruin your reputation and fun.

See here schematically:

Keep power/warmth balanced to avoid being seen as an overly-dominant ahole

See here for more on micro-aggressions.

Orange: direct action

The previous techniques with higher intensity work.

Proactive re-empowering

Direct options include:

- Match dominance with dominance.
  Ie.: if they cup your hand while handshaking, place a hand on their forearm
  - Mirror what they've done. cup their hand back
- Call it out assertively (see PU)
- Go meta (see PU)

A good chunk of this website is dedicated to self-defense.
Some examples:

- When people make you wait
- When people mispronounce your name
- Overpowering handshakes
- Games men play / games women play and counter-strategies

Red: enforce boundaries, or strategize

Good options:

- Enforce your boundaries with direct talk. Ie.: "I don't appreciate this tone", or "This is rude (I'm not OK with this)"

- Give an out-out. Ie.: "Either you talk to me respectfully, or I have to end this"
  See: "dealing with break-up threats"
- Walk out
- Tell them to leave if you have the power to
- Ask for private conversation if it's a superior and you can't risk much. If it's a meeting, ask at the end of it. Everyone will know what's up
- Strategize. No power/skills to do much? Machiavellian plotting time! Plot for future interactions, to achieve your goals, to get revenge… Or to work on yourself

Skills For Mastering Social Power Dynamics

"Seeing" and tracking social power dynamics is crucial to a good life.

And it's the same as for value exchanges.
In the social exchange article, we recommend tracking value exchanges.

Such as, who gives to you, and who takes from you.

Power is the same.
Value, power and social dynamics all overlap.

And all help you recognize people's characters.

Some people empower you, others disempower you.

People who disempower you are likely takers, frenemies, and toxic people.
All that bad stuff you don't want in your life.

When you start seeing and tracking social power dynamics you acquire a superpower.
You're able to recognize, meet, and keep the highest quality men and women.
And avoid the lower quality ones.

Some of the skills you need:

Power Awareness

The ability to see power dynamics in real life, including when others empower us or disempower us

Technically, power awareness only refers to the "ability to see".
And doesn't include the skills to act on that awareness.

In practice, we use it as an umbrella term for all power-related competencies.
Ie.: awareness, skills, and the ability to read and assess people.

Also see:

- Power Intelligence

> Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

Power Skills

The ability to defend oneself, advance socially, and achieve goals

It includes:

- High-power behavior
- Gaining status and respect in groups, and attracting in dating
- Self-defense (checking power moves, enforcing boundaries, etc.)
- Power protecting
- Pulling power moves when appropriate

Power Accountancy

The attitude and skills to analyze and track power dynamics, and to select the best course of action to achieve goals.

It shows who gives power (empowers), and who takes it (disempowers).

Value and power exchanges overlap.
A red flag for a man who disempowers you also tells you he's more likely to take.

And a red flag for either of them tells you they're not great people to have close.

Sub-communication: "I'm higher power, and/or my work is more important than yours"

⚠ Careful: a tasking colleague may want to become your boss.

Disempowering red: a report tasking you is turning the power tables on you

Sub-communication: "There are no hierarchies here and/or I don't respect you as a leader".

A report may have to task you.
But he should be very power-protecting then.

⍰ For example:

> Power-protecting report:
> Boss, do you think you can send me that document today? <—- leaves it up to you
> That way I can finish this task for the client <—- provides a rationale that's good for you

⚠You must demand power-protection from reports, or you lose respect as a leader.

Elements of Context

Context includes:

- Your status VS his status. The lower status the aggressor is compared to you, the more disempowering it is
- Who is around, including:
  - Privacy, more people around = more disempowering
  - People's relevance: Close relationships/social circle matter much more than strangers
  - People's power awareness: low-value, naive people won't realize you're losing power. High-flyers do, and take note
- Your goals.
  For example: a brusque but genius mentor is less disempowering when everyone knows you're after learning
- Urgency: direct commands are appropriate during emergencies. Less so during routine work
- Personality. If someone is curt, you lose less power if that's "who they are"
- Universality: if someone is rude to everyone, you lose less power when they're rude with you (but still: push back whenever appropriate)

⍰ Case Study: Context & Leadership

- Putin re-empowers himself with a minister (see PU)
- Putin lets Berlusconi get away here

Why?
Out of context, Berlusconi's behavior is MORE disempowering.

But within context, it's not:

- Berlusconi is closer to an equal. Albeit Russia is the biggest power, they're both country leaders
- Berlusconi "plays at home": it was in Italy
- It's a joking frame
  - Berlusconi has a reputation for joking around, rather than outright attacking
- The two are on friendly terms, and people knew

It's still disempowering for a leader who wants to convey power and be taken seriously.
But not too disempowering -and it was a challenging situation anyway-.

Traffic Lights Strategies

Very high-level guidelines:

Green: Empower Back

For pure effectiveness, both opposites work:

1. Empower them back, your baseline approach[1]
2. [?] Take and act entitled (power-hogging). As if it were due to you

Two extreme examples to illustrate the point:

Re-Empowering Back

My father is popular on a photographers' forum.

At their meetup this man kneeled:

My father:

- Frames it as joking around by smiling
- Get closer
- Holds hands

It moved from a possible frame of "I'm so high status" to a hilarious one of "LOL, thanks, we're joking around, but we're friends".

Power Hogging

Takers take as much value, investment, and power, while giving back as little as possible.
It's high ROI for them if it works, but it only works with lower-value people and people lacking any awareness and self-respect.

A woman trying too hard to be high-value:

Act entitled, like you expect more, and it's never good enough

⍰⍰ Never give to these people ⍰⍰♂ (terrible human beings).

More "everyday examples" in Power University.

Seek to Re-Empower

It's our baseline approach because:

- High power and high-value people don't keep on giving to takers, so "hogging" only works with low-power, clueless folks
- Hogging sub-communicates poor character. Honorable men don't seek pedestalization and don't need ego-stroking

- How to save face and power protect

> Power Protecting: How to Keep Win-Win With High-Value People

Yellow: ignore & take note, or be smooth

Good approaches:

1. Display your resolve, don't send any submissive signals

Ie.:
If you get a hand-crushing handshake power move, make it a point to stare them straight on.

See more:

- Submissive behavior

- Submissive words

2. Avoid thread-expanding on the power-taking

Ie.:
If they joke at your expense, do not add anything on top with self-deprecation.
And don't laugh at it (if everyone else laughs, stick to a tight-lipped smile).

3. Ignore and observe

When you're lost or not sure what's best for you, it's OK to let it go.

But always make a mental note! ⍰

⍰ When to address or let it go is advanced level.
⍰ read more here or join PU.

P.S.:
You can also re-empower yourself later.
Either address it later, or power move them.

⍰⍰ Techniques: Least Effort Re-Empowerment

Least effort resistance requires little from you.

Often, you just remove some warmth:

⍰⍰ You remove warmth because friendliness in response to disempowering behavior makes you submissive.
And confirms the frame that they're above you.

How to remove warmth:

- Ignore him, or avoid greeting him first
- Greet neutrally or in quick, perfunctory fashion
  - Neutral words such as "hey man"
  - Neutral tonality or dismissive tonality (see PU)
  - Only brief eye contact or looking away.
    ⍰ Sub-communication: "You're not worthy of my attention"
- Ignore him when he speaks: look away or at your phone is neutral.
  - Use "deadpan faces" to avoid being a "supporting spectator". If everyone laughs at his joke, use tight-lipped smiles while looking away.
    ⍰ Subcommunication: you smile at the joke, not the person
  - Don't comment or you support his topic and thread-expand on his conversational leadership. If anything, intervene to question or raise doubts
  - Start a side conversation with someone in the group (top move!)

If in the meanwhile you gain some status, many power moves will come to you to mend things.

⚠ Balance: in social gatherings tone down dominance if you remove all warmth
High dominance + low warmth add up. It can become too much for many social events.
You don't win when everyone else thinks you're an aggressive dick.
Don't let an as*hole ruin your reputation and fun.

See here schematically:

Keep power/warmth balanced to avoid being seen as an overly-dominant ahole

See here for more on micro-aggressions.

Orange: direct action

The previous techniques with higher intensity work.

Proactive re-empowering

Direct options include:

- Match dominance with dominance.
  Ie.: if they cup your hand while handshaking, place a hand on their forearm
  - Mirror what they've done. cup their hand back
- Call it out assertively (see PU)
- Go meta (see PU)

A good chunk of this website is dedicated to self-defense.
Some examples:

- When people make you wait
- When people mispronounce your name
- Overpowering handshakes
- Games men play / games women play and counter-strategies

Red: enforce boundaries, or strategize

Good options:

- Enforce your boundaries with direct talk. Ie.: "I don't appreciate this tone", or "This is rude (I'm not OK with this)"

- Give an out-out. Ie.: "Either you talk to me respectfully, or I have to end this"
  See: "dealing with break-up threats"
- Walk out
- Tell them to leave if you have the power to
- Ask for private conversation if it's a superior and you can't risk much. If it's a meeting, ask at the end of it. Everyone will know what's up
- Strategize. No power/skills to do much? Machiavellian plotting time! Plot for future interactions, to achieve your goals, to get revenge… Or to work on yourself

Skills For Mastering Social Power Dynamics

"Seeing" and tracking social power dynamics is crucial to a good life.

And it's the same as for value exchanges.
In the social exchange article, we recommend tracking value exchanges.

Such as, who gives to you, and who takes from you.

Power is the same.
Value, power and social dynamics all overlap.

And all help you recognize people's characters.

Some people empower you, others disempower you.

People who disempower you are likely takers, frenemies, and toxic people.
All that bad stuff you don't want in your life.

When you start seeing and tracking social power dynamics you acquire a superpower.
You're able to recognize, meet, and keep the highest quality men and women.
And avoid the lower quality ones.

Some of the skills you need:

Power Awareness

The ability to see power dynamics in real life, including when others empower us or disempower us

Technically, power awareness only refers to the "ability to see".
And doesn't include the skills to act on that awareness.

In practice, we use it as an umbrella term for all power-related competencies.
Ie.: awareness, skills, and the ability to read and assess people.

Also see:

- Power Intelligence

> Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

Power Skills

The ability to defend oneself, advance socially, and achieve goals

It includes:

- High-power behavior
- Gaining status and respect in groups, and attracting in dating
- Self-defense (checking power moves, enforcing boundaries, etc.)
- Power protecting
- Pulling power moves when appropriate

Power Accountancy

The attitude and skills to analyze and track power dynamics, and to select the best course of action to achieve goals.

It shows who gives power (empowers), and who takes it (disempowers).

Value and power exchanges overlap.
A red flag for a man who disempowers you also tells you he's more likely to take.

And a red flag for either of them tells you they're not great people to have close.

The Power-Exchange Model of Leadership™

The Power Exchange Model of Leadership™ states that the more value a leader seeks to extract from followers, the more power he needs—whether to coerce, provide value in return (extrinsic or intrinsic), exert influence (leadership, charisma), or strategically manipulate the exchange.

In most systems of free-willing exchanges, leaders rely on value exchanges, personal influence, and some degree of manipulation.

This is because pure coercion is forbidden, costly, or ineffective. And persuasion tends to outperform blatant manipulation. Especially with higher performers (value-control tradeoff model below). That means that the leader's own value and competence are the crucial differentiators in leadership.

The leader's personal value and competence determine how much others will follow him

Value-control tradeoff model™

The value–control tradeoff model™ states that the higher value an individual is, the more demanding he is, making it more challenging for leaders to attract, influence, and retain. Leaders win by increasing their ability to exchange or extract performance from high-value, low-control individuals.

Lower value individuals are easier to lead: they tend to be less power aware, have fewer options, and are less demanding for both concrete returns and personal value. But they add less value, of course. This is why cult leaders don't rule the world: their followers tend to be lower-value.

Conversely, competent individuals add more value but are more costly and harder to attract. These individuals 'raise the bar' for leaders to step up their own value.

Coercion

Coercion forces compliance through power.

Pure coercion is limited to rare circumstances and is more related to removing people than forcing someone to do something.
However, as Tracy and Cheng noted, pure dominance often forms the 'bottom line of human social hierarchy'. So it's best to start from the foundations of the rawest form of power and walk your way up ('TPM's hierarchy of power'). Simply having this foundational power also ensures you will never have to use it.

Acquire The Ability to Coerce

Al Capone's famous quote reflects the combined power of both kindness and coercion:

> You can get much further with a kind word and a gun than you can with a kind word alone.

That's also been the US foreign policy with the slogan of 'speak softly and carry a big stick'.
Some early research supports this logic. Further studies suggest that coercive threats coupled with favorable offers improved crisis outcomes.

But for everyday leadership in free societies, minimize the use of coercion.

Use Cases of Coercion

Outside of despotic regimes, use coercion on a per-needed basis only.

- Final step for underperformance after feedback and guidance fail
- Underperformers who don't respond to motivation
- Shock and awe therapy when the team needs a wake-up call
- In combination with a reward to increase persuasive leverage. Similar to how The Godfather proposes 'to be a friend… Or else'

Limitations of Coercion

- Ineffective in free societies and democracies
- Less effective in the West, where individualists value freedom and rebel more
- You lose prestige & influence
- Brain drain as top performers seek better leaders

⍰♂Lucio's Take: Own your coercive power, but frame it as 'for rare cases since this great team doesn't need it.'

Lucio: Denying coercion is weak and suspicious (example in Power Universtiy).

Instead, own it and make it known.
But add that it's for unlikely disruptors to protect team cohesion and achieve the mission -and this team needs no coercion-.

That frame communicates power and the judicious use of force in service of the team, while also building the team up.

Personal Power (Charisma)

Personal power is a form of soft power that makes others personally attracted to the leader, and thus more likely to follow him, and work for him and his mission. This is to leadership what 'mate value' is to dating.
As a principle:

⚖ The higher value the leader becomes, the more value he can extract from increasingly higher value followers

In a way, the leader's personal power sets a 'lid' to how much he can get from his followers, a concept that John Maxwell called the 'law of the lid'.

TPM helps men become higher value men, start from this:

- Foundations of self-development

> 10 Self-Empowerment Foundations For Top-1% Men

Social Power

Social power relates to the personal qualities that influence others, ranging from dominance-inducing fear, to socially attractive prestige.

As with coercion, it's better to start first from the 'rawest form of power':

Learn to Act Dominantly

> A leader who can't act dominanly ceases being a leader the moment an asshole joins the team
> The Power Moves

It's simple power logic:

Any disrespect to you is a challenge and test to your leadership.
And any norm violation is a challenge to the well-functioning of the team.

Failing to enforce boundaries disempowers you and undermines trust within the team.
Let that happen a few times, and you have no power left to influence and lead. And without pro-social norms the team reverts from cooperation, to a group of selfish individuals.

This dovetails well with our principle that 'to be good, you need to be bad'.

Research also suggests that dominant traits lead to leadership roles. And that people prefer leaders who enforce norms.

⍰ As a leader you're due more respect: command it!

Basic social power dynamics dictate that a curt request from a report is more disempowering to the leader than to a peer:

Some options to handle a disempowering subordinate:

- Address it in the open
  Ie.: "Hey, talk to me more respectfully please" or "Show some consideration please"
- Call him for a private chat
  Ie.: "Let me talk to you privately one second please"
- Announce you 'need to talk'

Ie.: "You and I need to talk soon". If asks "for what", say "I'll tell you"

Mindset:

Weak leaders weaken the team. Enforcing boundaries is my responsibility for the team's benefit.

Example: Putin Defends Leadership Boundaries

> Putin: Why are the increases so steep? We have curbed monopolies in this area…
> Minister: As we have seen in practice <— Smart aleck approach, > there is no link between the regulations of prices, and what citizens pay <— Refuses responsibility and explains with 'teacher's frame'
> Putin: What on earth are you going on about? Why are you telling me stories, <— Attacks back, reminds him the boss is owed respect and obedience > the citizens aren't interested in this <— 'Does it for the team', great move
> If there isn't a link, then there should be a link <— Frame imposes, 'find a way'
> Are you crazy or what <— Lets his anger out with a last high-dominance move

⬆ ♟ Well called for dominance
The minister committed a major political faux-pas: disempowering a despot on public media.
Putin was forced be aggressive to defend himself and his image of a high-power, effective leader.

Legit self-defense VS over-reacting

When unsure, think: 'What would the most value-adding members think?'
Aligning your leadership with top performers helps retain, motivate, and attract them.

Use Cases of Dominance

- Team defense
- Self-defense
- Emergencies

Limitations of Over-Dominance

Use on an 'only as needed' basis because overdoing it is:

- Harms relationships with self-respecting higher performers, 'alpha types', future leaders, etc.
- Less effective in the West, where individualists value respect and rebel more
- You lose prestige & influence
- Enemies & frenemies increase as you create resentment

As Matthew points out, over-dominance and coercion are most damaging with value-adding and team members.

Rewards & Punishments (Extrinsic Motivation)

Rewards and punishments refer to 'sticks and carrots' management with the use of rewards to entice good performance, and punishments to discourage poor performance

Acquire The Ability To Reward & Punish

Even preferring transformational leadership, having more power tools is better.

Use Cases of Transactional Leadership

Evidence suggests that transformational leadership works, so limit 'sticks and carrots' for:

- Cynical men and Machiavellian men who focus on practical 'WIIFM'
- Simple jobs where extrinsic motivation doesn't crowd out intrinsic motivation
- Routine tasks
- Clear performance metrics available (manufacturing, sales, etc.)
- Low-paid jobs where people's main focus is on keeping the job and feeding their families

Limitations of Transactional Leadership

Psychologist Haslam explains that the more 'sticks & carrots' you use, the more you deplete your resources.

And when shifts focus to 'what's in it for them', you may have to spend more for policing them as well.

In the long run, that reduces your influence:

As Machiavelli observed, mercenaries make for bad followers.
You don't want mercenaries who'd leave for a few dollars more.

> How to Be A Leader: 13 Laws From Social-Psychology

Inspiration (Extrinsic Motivation)

Tapping into existing motivation is what people more closely associate with good leadership. And for good reasons: it works great, and it allows leaders to save on more costly extrinsic resources like money and goods.

Check this article for more:

- How to inspire as a leader: transformational leadership

Inspiration & Manipulation

However, while more power offers more opportunity for doing, it also allows for more exploitation.
And effective leadership manipulation may be the ultimate stage of power.

Manipulated followers serve the leader, at a personal loss, while also being grateful.

And the more extreme the environment, the group, or the risks, the bigger and riskier the manipulation.

Also see a case study:

- Business manipulation, including managers and founders manipulation
- Great leadership is great manipulation

> 12 Ways Companies Manipulate Employees

Conflicts of Interest

As per foundational manipulation dynamics principles, Areas of diverging interest see the highest potential for manipulation.
There are many conflicts of interest between leaders and followers, including:

- Leaders can gain power with disempowered individuals: because they have the 'freedom' to be more coercive, take all the credit, blame-shift mistakes, etc. etc.
- Leaders gain power with naive followers, while you gain with power-awareness: naive folks allow for more manipulation
- Leaders gain hiding the true benefits of leadership, so you revere them and never try to become a leader yourself
- Leaders gain when you're completely selfless, but you may gain being more selfish

Power Protection As Leaders

In general:

Give basic respect to all your team, and respect top performers the most

Show respect with:

- Less dominance
- ‘Pull’ instead of ‘push & coerce’
- Sharing information
- Valuing their input
- Respectful tasking

As for everything: balance and calibration.
Respect others, but focus on getting things done. Too much respect feels like weakness and undermines your status.

⍰ ⍰ Leadership Tactics: Control, Without Costs

Techniques to punish and control without coercion include:

- Ignore
- Lower your warmth
- Praise someone else for the behavior you wanted
- Disagree or criticize more directly than you normally do
- Indirect punishment
  - Refer to ‘recent events’ you condone in a public speech
  - Direct eye-contact in key moments of your talk
  - Public reminder of values right after poor behavior
- ⚠ ⍰ Recruiting the group for ‘social ganging up’ <— can come across as sneaky and weak

> Godfather: Good!
> Because a man who doesn’t spend time with his family can never be a real man (looks at Santino ⍰⍰) <—⍰ ⍰
> Santino, you’re failing my standards and better spend more time with your family

⬆ ♟ Statements are more powerful than ‘preaching’
A judge-like statement while expecting others to conform is more powerful

See Power University for an example.

Fawners to Leadership

Principle:

⚖ The more power you gain, the more distortions you create, and the blinder you can get.

Fawners distort reality

Subordinates will embellish the truth and hide the negatives.
And people looking for excuses and handouts exaggerate the negatives.

In either case, you get a distorted reality.

Solutions

1. Handpick your closest confidantes
2. Read characters, judge based on 'believability'
3. Rely on more objective measures
4. Make 'truth' a team value
   - Reward truth
5. Power protect sharing negative news
   Ie.: say: "I know it's challenging and it may take time" to encourage sharing realistic timelines

Fawners will turn when you need them most

Fawners feign friendliness until you have power.

But they'll disappear or turn when you're losing power.
This phenomenon creates a 'tipping point' of accelerating downfall.

Take Trump's comments on Zuckerberg after his first election loss:

> Trump: Zuckerberg used to come to the White House to kiss my ass (…) then you see what they do about me and about Republicans (…) but that's the way the world works

And guess what did Zuckerberg do?
He went back to the White House after Trump's return:

Zuckerberg had an impressive change of heart as Trump edged closer to winning his second term

Solution

1. Don't count on the allegiance of after-power friends
2. Consider fawning a red flag
   - Gushing compliments
   - Siding with you no matter what
   - Lack of feedback/push-back
   - Gifts
   - Over-subservience
3. Look at people's character. Idealists and mission-oriented people are safer. Personally ambitious men less so.
4. Generally discount compliments -they don't move you one bit forward anyway-

Our mission is to teach good men how to become good and powerful leaders. It's with that goal in mind that we built Power University

High Energy Person: The Personality Type, Meaning, & Why Energy Without Power Fails

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 October 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Many believe high-energy is the key to winning in dating and social life.

Talk fast. Laugh loud. Be everywhere.

But are high-energy people really more attractive, respected, or successful?

Sometimes—if done with power.

More often, it backfires.

In this article, we break down the "high-energy myth" and show when it works, when it fails, and how to calibrate energy for real-world results.

All eyes on me. And all girls and guys will want me (?)

- SUMMARY

Introduction

First off, let's define "high-energy".

To be "high-energy," you'll need a number of these:

- Talkative
- Loud
- Move around
- Crack jokes
- "Have fun"
- Make others have fun
- Open many conversational threads (breadth, rather than depth)
- Gesticulate
- Dance
- Draw attention to yourself

Alcohol, drugs or some arcane techniques to "get in state" are sometimes used to fuel the high energy,

In any event, as per the list above, high energy is more typical of extroverts. And to be high energy you most often need to expend a lot of effort.

The Popularity of High-Energy

"High energy" is a popular approach to self-help.

And not just social self-help, but also self-help in general.
"High-energy" is often equated with "happiness", "effectiveness", and "getting things done".

Many self-help coaches are extroverts and high-energy themselves, and they recommend the same approach to their customers and followers.
Tony Robbins for example:

Tony Robbins also demands the same high-energy "state" from his audience.

Dating coaches and PUAs have also long focused on high energy, doing lots of approaches, and being the life of the party.

The lingo for acting high-energy used to be "put yourself in state", where "state" meant "high energy". Several techniques were used to enter a high-energy state, ranging from pre-gaming with alcohol to talking to everyone before entering the club, to dancing like an idiot or shouting in the street.

RSD Tyler for example used to make his male students hold hands and jump in the club -not the most effective approach, as you can imagine-.

Even socially advanced guys like Ben and Charlie from Charisma on Command largely base their course Charisma University on being high energy.

So, given all this popularity… What's wrong with that?

If you do it well -and in the right circumstances-, it's great.
But that's a big IF.
Because very few people I've seen do high energy well and effectively.

High-Energy And Its Limitations

This website has sometimes discouraged or cautioned against the “high-energy” route to social self-improvement.

High energy is great.
You have fun, can help people have fun, draw people in, and potentially meet a lot of new people.

BUT, be it to achieve social power, social success, dating success, or status within groups, it’s very easy to do “high-energy” wrong.

Why?
Because, from a social power dynamics point of view, the high-energy approach is inherently high-effort.

So as per Social Investment Model, unless you’re getting extra returns for that effort, then you can easily become the low-power jester (and that achieves little results beyond the high of getting people’s reactions).

He can be the life of the party. And maybe he's a great guy. But without power, he won't get status, respect, mating opportunities, and high-value connections

The jester, also called the "entertainer" is the guy who expends lots of effort trying to make others laugh and feel good, but gets little returns.
He gets reactions, but little concrete returns.

At the lowest power level, which is the jesters who aren't even particularly funny, people consider them a noisy nuisance that's better avoided.
At the low-intermediate level, people might laugh with them (or at them), but nobody respects them.

Ineffectively Great Looking

High-energy is popular because it can feel and look great and successful… Even while it's ineffective to achieve pragmatic goals.

Take what many consider the pinnacle of the high-energy approach: to be the "life of the party".

That can easily end up being a rather empty pursuit if your goal was more practical -as it's often the case for those looking into self-help-.
Things like acquiring a mate (the silent guy can connect with her or sexualize with her 1:1 and leave with her), making friends (the silent guy can do a lot of 1:1 convo and make real friends), or getting status (the dominance hierarchies are rarely negotiated in high-energy party mode).

And if you do it really wrong, which is also possible, then the extra effort of the high-energy is like going 10x faster in the wrong direction.

HOWEVER…

There are ways of being high-energy and winning.

Let's explore:

Doing High-Energy Right: Add Power

Doing high energy well means reaping the rewards for the high effort you're expending.

That often means: you must add power and/or dominance to the energy.

Luckily, I got to experience two different examples of doing high-energy successfully.

They are:

- Ahole approach: Power-taking, social climbing, derisive high energy
- Eagle approach: Value-giving high energy

You may be surprised to find the ahole approach listed as "effective".
But as long as power-taking is not overly aggressive or directly crude, then both approaches can be successful to achieve life-relevant results such as status, mating opportunities, respect from others, etc.

There are few advantages that value-taking even holds over the eagle approach, but generally speaking, it's less effective.

Let's dig deeper with two real-life examples:

1. Ahole Approach: High-Energy + High-Dominance + Low-Warmth

The example I have is from E., my former classmate.

In high school, E. gave me the invaluable opportunity to experience life as both high status, and low(er) status.

Before high school I was high-status and well-liked in most groups I was part of, in and outside of school.
During the high school years outside of school, I was also mostly high status. Even those who were higher status than I was I'd say that few if any were much higher, even including older, more socially aggressive, or "cooler" guys.

BUT I was quite low-status in high school compared to E.
E. was on another level and seemed to have everything going on for him and "more" than I had.
It's not too bad not being at the top if you're still around the top. Actually, that's great.
But since for a large chunk of high school it was only two men in the class, there wasn't any "group". There was just him, in charge, and then there was me, below him.

E. was very high-energy, but he was no jester.
He was high dominance, and reaped full results for his efforts (dating included).

At the time of writing, we recently met again and it was an incredible opportunity to measure my progress:

He was a beast back then, and was even more of a beast today.

As soon as he arrived -late-, he didn't walk in.
He stopped a few meters away from the table and grabbed everyone's attention while staying silent, smiling, and heavily gesticulating as if to say "come on, can you believe this". And then dropped some jokes from afar.
He hadn't even walked into the group, and he was already leading.

Then he went around the table, hugged the organizer of the event, made some jokes about her, kissed her on the head (affectionate dominance) and added: "but you know I love you" (push-pull, similar to "self-amusing" style, but he did a lot more "pushing" on her during the night).

Later he sees some people he knows at the restaurant and even though he has no interest whatsoever in children, he picks up their baby:

Even the baby looks at him fondly :)

He talks to the woman's husband, who raptly listens to him… While He has his arm around his wife.

Wife who was all giggling and touching E., of course.

HOWEVER,

For all his success, E. often failed to grow closer, connect, or truly bond with people.

Even today, when he told me to meet again on some other day, I took no steps to make it happen. And was not looking forward to it.

He said "I'd be happy to" meet again. But actions speak louder than words, and if your actions push people down, then that "you'd be happy to" means jack squat.

That's because his dominance was often power and value-taking.
His jokes were derisive and pushed others down. Yes, people laughed, but subconsciously they also knew that they could be the next target. That naturally keeps people at arms' length -including the ones who aren't competing hard for status and/or are thick-skinned enough not to take the jokes too personally-.

He improved a lot in that department as well, but still largely relied on social climbing and deriding to hold court.
In a way, the social-climbing way is probably the easier shortcut.

On this website, we're not fans of value-taking and asshole approaches.
Especially since better and more effective alternatives exist.

Enter, the eagle approach to high energy:

2. Eagle Approach: High-Energy + High-Dominance + High Warmth

Now compare to Davide.

Davide is a truly unique blend of high-energy/high-dominance because he adds not just boatloads of friendliness and warmth (as you'll see, we might even call it "love" in this case), but also lots of empathy and vulnerability.

Davide was equally high-energy and (almost) equally dominant as my former classmate.
But instead of the default mode being value-taking, he had a value-giving default mode.

He was like that as a kid.
And when I saw him again the other night, he got even better.

I took some clips yesterday night because it's great stuff for power dynamics:

While being the life of the party, Davide also:

- Displays dominance with love and affection: look at how he enters the conversation at minute 1:04. He interrupts. But his foot forward is with love. He, a straight guy, takes and holds a straight guy's hand Oprah style. He does it seamlessly, while keeping the festive atmosphere. Even if my other friend might have wanted to keep his conversation going, how can you reject someone who comes at you with that much love?
- Pull the group up: the stories he talks about are stories of us being great (including the "reminisce stories" of us as kids, all directly or indirectly said "we're great")
- Pull individuals up: everything he says either privately or publicly is good and uplifting about people
- Displays joy both for life and for the people: he's always happy and cheerful. Notice how he looks at people in the eyes. Especially the very beginning, where he sees my friend for the first time. Straight, unwavering, high-power… But also "full of joy to see them" (actually, full of love). His nonverbals sub-communicates "I'm so happy to see you and be with you"
- Be vulnerable while still being the most dominant guy: notice how often he touches his heart. He said "my heart is racing" and "you guys made my heart swell up tonight". And he openly talked about his past issues with drugs
- Connect with individuals as he addressed many: he sometimes talked to someone, then switched to addressing the group, but still talking about the individual (something positive or uplifting)
- Connect 1:1 with more private conversation

The last one blew me away.
David had been complimentary and uplifting all night.
But before leaving he made it lower energy, and more personal. He got close to me, and with his unwavering eye contact said: “ah Lu, you believe me? I look at you straight. You know I love you right? Even though we don’t see each other for a lifetime, you’re the N.1. I am happy you’re doing great”.

Right after that, he went back to higher energy social again, bid farewell, and exited like a boss.

The loudest guy, was also the guy who touched me the deepest (and, I bet, who also touched deep many other people in his life).
So much so, that I call this blend of high-energy, dominance, and love the “Davide style”, in his honor.

Calibrating Energy Levels

If we’re talking about effectiveness and energy, then we need to talk about calibration.

There are always exceptions of course.
So sometimes amping up the state of a low-energy group can make you the undisputed leader. And taking someone from high energy to a more intimate -or seductive- one-on-one is what starts a deeper friendship -or seduction-.

However, as a general rule, calibrate your energy level to the environment and to the people you’re interacting with.
Generally speaking, you want to be higher energy in high-energy environments and groups -it would be harder getting people’s and groups’ attention while talking slow, quiet, and little at a club-. And you want to be chiller in lower energy environments and groups -you wouldn’t fit in as the odd one out-.

> Ted and Lilly: (hangover and low-energy)
> Robin: (odd one out being too high energy)

Calibrating for Your Goals

Also, energy levels should match your goals.

Need to meet lots of people?
You need higher energy.

Want to look high-power and worldly, like you've seen been everywhere and seen it all?
Lower your energy.

As a general rule though, the "high energy" approach can sometimes sub-communicate you're looking for something -approval, connections, or mates-. And the person who's looking for something is almost inherently lower power.
See this example from "How I Met Your Mother". It's a comedy of course, but it's a good reflection of real social dynamics: the higher energy folks are the ones who want/need a mate.
And that is one of the reasons why, unless it's done really well or for self-amusement, I'm not the biggest fan of high energy to achieve social and personal success.
Especially if you're not feeling like being high-energy.

Should You Learn "Effective High-Energy?"

Yes, it's useful.

There will be times when you need to carry the conversation, at least initially. And you need to talk more, or even to "steal" a laugh or smile to get your foot properly in.

And there are times when high-energy is the most effective mode to reach certain goals -or just to have fun-. Sometimes, low-energy people are hiding behind low-energy and they instead need to learn how to let go, and how to have some good old unrestrained fun.

That being said, never forget that high energy is useless -or even counterproductive- without power.
So I'd prioritize power above high energy. Power is the foundation.

High-Energy & Dating

Dating is even more ruthless towards high-energy.

The reason is that women like men who are higher power, and high energy takes a lot of effort.

So the sub-communication is that you need more energy and more effort to get her.

While it's OK to be high-energy, and you probably should be higher energy in a loud and high-energy environment such as a club, it's generally not a good idea to force yourself into high-energy states for dates.

Exceptions of course apply, for example, if you're a naturally high-energy person, if you're naturally fun-loving, or if you decide to have a fun date.
As you notice, the difference is in you wanting or feeling like something, rather than doing it for her.
The difference seeps through to the whole date.

Examples of "chill" and high-energy dates in Seduction University.

SUMMARY

High-energy socialization is a popular approach to (social) self-development.

High-energy socializing is not bad per se.
And can be both great fun and effective, if done well.

Yet, "high-energy" is not very effective per se. And to make it truly work high energy needs power.
Power without high-energy works. High-energy without power doesn't work.

So we define the myth of high energy as:

> The "high energy" myth presupposes that extreme extroversion, loud talking, and generally drawing attention > to oneself leads to better social results such as higher status, more respect, more and better mating opportunities, and better connections and friendships.

As we've seen, that's only true when you calibrate high-energy, and add power.

Global Intersexual Dynamics: Where Dating Is Easiest

Lucio Buffalmano · 21 October 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Countless localized sexual marketplaces offer drastically different dating conditions and experiences.

In lay terms, in some countries, it's easier to find a partner—or it's easier to 'date around'.

The author is an expert on social and power dynamics and having traveled and dated all over the world, has much personal experience on the topic.

So let's find out where dating gets easier (or harder):

Intro: SMV Is Relative

Individuals' sexual market value varies enormously.

Those who say that "successful daters are successful everywhere" aren't strictly wrong.
But they are truly missing the point and leading people astray. And it's possible for men who are unsuccessful under certain conditions to become very successful under others.

Geo-arbitrage is real.
Just as an example from personal experience: white men in Africa.

When I visited a few African countries dating was even easier than in some of the easiest South Asian countries. Some women found me on FB and complained when I didn't find time to meet them:

She spent time finding me on FB and complained I didn't find time for her
This was a pretty lady, too, and it was also a big city. Trust me, women don't stalk me in Europe.
Plenty more women in Africa kept texting and asking me when I would go back, far more often than in any other world region.

Of course some of them might have wanted me also as potential a ticket to Europe, but the passport is also part of the whole personal package. And it's one of the reasons why your sexual market value varies enormously.

This is just one example of how much a different localized sexual marketplace can impact your dating and sexual options.
With the sexual marketplace conditions of this example, even struggling men in Europe could get several dates -or just find a high-quality woman for long-term dating-.

Difficult Markets For Women

These are sexual markets where women are at a relative disadvantage:

1. Russia & EX USSR Countries

All the top 5 biggest alcohol-consuming countries are located in the ex USSR.

In Belarus, a whopping 11% of the population is physically dependent on alcohol, and most alcoholics are men.

That leaves lots of women chasing fewer eligible bachelors.

Have you ever wondered why Eastern and Russian women men have a stereotype for being more feminine and attentive to their looks?

Now you may know why.

An ex Russian girlfriend told me:

> In Russia a good man is a man who's not an alcoholic and who doesn't beat you.

Apparently, a woman who's not happy about her man often hears back: "he doesn't drink and he's not violent, what are you complaining about?"

Talking about a low bar…

2. Big Cities

Where have all the good men gone?
Young men go to the city because of higher wages.
Same for women.

Yet, Lena Edlund in a paper called Sex and the City shows that more women than men move to urban areas.

Why?

Because unskilled women also move to the city.
Why?
Well, likely, they go there looking for high earners.

That also means that well-off male city dwellers have more options than they would have otherwise.
And it means that women face stiffer competition from both high-quality career women, and non-career attractive women.

This is statistically significant because many men don't pursue women based on their income.
But women aren't exactly thrilled to pair up with men who are below their socio-economic level.

3. Colleges and College Degree Cohort

Sometimes really is lonely at the top.

If you are a smart and driven woman, taking care of herself, her education, and her career… That's wonderful.

On the flip side, chances are that you are in a difficult market.

In the last decades women, by and large, have been overtaking men. In 1994 more women received a bachelor's degree or higher.
And the disparity has only grown since then.

That is even worse for black college women, where the disparity is even larger.

And when it comes to colleges, the hookup culture might be part fun, and part tough bargaining conditions for women.

Birger, author of "Date-Onomics" says that the college hookup culture is driven by men who, empowered by the positive number ratio, have the power to set the sexual terms.

4. Religious Circles

God may help with the afterlife, but how much church helps with this world's dating is all to be seen.

In the West, women tend to be more devout than men, and men tend to leave organized religions more frequently than women.
That means that church groups often see more women than men.

5. South-East Asia

In general, data suggests that there more gay men than lesbian women.

However, in some places in the world, a significantly large percentage of the male population crosses into gay/transexual.
Sometimes to the point of being indistinguishable from women.
Not only these are men that disappear from the man's cohort, but they move into the women cohort chasing other men, giving men the fake feeling that there are even more women than there truly are.

This makes Southeast Asian dating markets very poor for women.
Look at this example:

This woman is chasing and bugging me. Albeit an extreme example, it does show that a combination of "sought after race" (white) and a good overall market for men can turn the normal sexual power dynamics on their head (ie.: women chasing men).

It isn't just about transexuals and gender split ratio, though.

Talk to local women and to foreigners who've lived long enough in countries like Thailand or the Philippines, and they will tell you that many local men don't meet their standards.

Standards for leadership attitude and ambition to improve their lot.
A portion that seems to be much larger than in the West doesn't seek employment and wants women to maintain them.

Talking about an unwarranted sense of entitlement…

6. Asian Countries for Black Women

White women, on paper, would do great in many Asian countries as they are a status symbol.

The only issue in poorer Asian countries is that they are not interested in the locals. Plus, many locals don't even dare approach them.

Things are better though iIn richer countries such as Korea, Japan, and possibly the bigger cities in China.
There, white women who like local men might fare even better than in their native countries.

However, Asian markets are much harder for black women.

Difficult Markets For Men

Please remember this:

We are talking about on average here.

To begin, these averages are often not huge handicaps, bure more like population-level tendencies.
And even when they are relatively strong tendencies, you can always buck the trend or be the exceptional exception.

On this website, we loath complaints or doom-and-gloom discussions based on cultural trends, social trends, or averages.
And that's because we believe in the power of the individual -a belief based on real-life evidence-.

You, my friend, are not an average.
And you're bigger than your background, color, nation, or whatever individual trait might be used to label you.

And you can also always be the exception.

With that warning, these are sexual markets where men are at a relative disadvantage:

1. Western Countries for Asians / Indians

This is a famous chart from OKCupid.

OkCupid's founder Chris Rudder has been very active in mining the data for dating insights. He also wrote Dataclysm, a very good book on data and dating.

OKCupid is mostly used in the West, so it provides a good overview of dating in the West, broken down by races:

2014

OkCupid QuickMatch Scores

		ASIAN women	BLACK women	LATINA women	WHITE women
men rating women	ASIAN men rating...	15%	-20%	2%	3%
	BLACK men rating...	2%	1%	2%	-6%
	LATINO men rating...	4%	-18%	10%	4%
	WHITE men rating...	9%	-17%	3%	6%

		ASIAN men	BLACK men	LATINO men	WHITE men women rating men	ASIAN women rating...	24%	-27%	-15%	18%

	LATINA women rating...	-14%	-16%	18%	12%
	WHITE women rating...	-12%	-8%	1%	19%

You're probably aware of this often-quoted study:

> Asian men need to earn $250k extra for the same dating opportunities of white men

That being said, things have improved lately for Asian men thanks to the cultural success of some Asian dramas, movies, and songs -it seems to be a golden period for Korea-.
A good subgroup of women have always liked the more feminine faces, and now instead of going for the young Di Caprio -and real-life clones-, they go for the clean faces of the Asian stars -and real-life clones-.

I haven't yet encountered a single white woman who ever said she only dates Asian men while I've met several Asian women who said -or bragged- they only date white men (you don't find them in Western countries as that would be taboo: a few Asian women might so in behavior there, but never in words).

BUT, I've encountered many white women who are cool dating Asians.

Rap music did something similar for black men in some European countries, albeit that probably lost some steam in recent years.
Whether that positive trend for Asian culture and Asian men will continue for some time or fizzle out with the pop bands and short-lived dramas is difficult to say.

Overall, still a slight disadvantage being Asian in white countries but again, this shouldn't concern individual cool guys.

Asian men in black countries

Probably worse than Asian men in white countries.

But except for centuries-old Chinese immigration in some parts of Asia I haven't seen much interest from Asian men living there.
Probably because of the economy, or maybe because most Asians aren't too into black women, dating-wise it might be better for all.

2. Richer Countries for Poorer Immigrants

No white woman will ever tell you that, but…

There is a (subconscious) stigma against immigrants from poorer countries.

A darker skin can make some women think of "financial migrant", sometimes associated with lower status.
With some nationalities and religions, there is also a link with controlling attitudes that more empowered Western women may dislike.

In general, we can say that immigrants from poorer countries to richer countries often face a stigma.
Female hypergamy doesn't like dating down, and men have to buck the social stigma and self-frame themselves as the high-quality exception.
And then hope that she is strong-minded enough not to care about the stigma and social repercussions.

I remember listening to stories of the Italian immigrants going towards the Americas.

Male migrants in Latin America almost all remarried. The ones going to North America didn't. My father didn't know why, but to me it seemed obvious: Italian in Latin America was "one of us" and exotic. In North America it was exotic, but "below us".
Maybe good for a fling if they were handsome, but not great long-term candidates.

3. Asian countries for black / dark-skinned

Black men have a reputation for high masculinity.

Up until there, it's good.
But with that also comes the reputational downside of exaggerated aggression or lawlessness.
That might not help with Asian women generally being more on the meeker side.

It might also be a case of not enough high-quality black men around and/or represented as cultural icons.
Of course there are some, but maybe not enough.

Or simply might be a case of general preferences going towards fellow Asians and whites.
In any case, it's very possible for black men to do well in Asia, but they need to adjust and overcome some initial stumbling blocks.

4. Latin America / Italy

Italian men tend to take care of themselves much more than the average.

I've met countless Italian men abroad who complain about dating in Italy, and much enjoyed the dating scene of wherever I've met them.

Together with Latin America, men tend to be more forward in their dating.
That increases competition and makes women feel like they have lots of options.

Notice that this is not necessarily true for foreigners.
Latin American women for example love gringos and Europeans.

5. China

Decades of one-child policy with a strong bias for male children led to a population with an oversupply of men.

Plus, strong social pressure that prioritizes "success", a pragmatic approach to dating, and a female population that might be less into casual dating means that Chinese men must date as providers.
And bring home the back.
Lots of it.

Why do you think Chinese men must own a flat to date well? And why can Chinese women inquire about what the men own?
Because women can have their pick, and have the sexual power to ask, demand, and screen.

Again, it might be different for skilled foreigners traveling to China, especially non-Asian ones who can leverage the "exotic effect" and date as lovers.

6. Technical Universities & STEM Fields

University should be a time of learning, fun, socializing and… Dating.

But who are you going to date if 90% of students are men?

Except for architecture which is already mostly women in many places, most technical universities are oversupplied with guys.

And it will most likely stay so because virtue-signaling efforts to have more women in STEM isn't going to make women more interested in STEM.

7. Tech Companies

If you want to date well, stay away from silicon valley, tech startups and developers-centric companies.

Being a developer also comes with some reputational stigma within the organization when it comes to dating. And that might not help your case dating within the organization.
Finally, as they say, you're the average of the 5 people you spend your time with. And looking at the average group of developers, you might not want to have anything to do with that average.

Go to HR instead.

About The Author

About The Author: Michael Franzese was a soldier and caporegime in the Colombo organized crime family — one of New York's most violent and feared mafia families — for 25 years of his life. Now, he uses his unique life experiences to help corporate executives, professional and student-athletes, at-risk youths, and church audiences.

Module #1: Mindset

Lesson #1: Decide to Negotiate

> Franzese: "So, there's a lot of different circumstances that you may go through. Sometimes they're going to be unpleasant, sometimes they're going to be to your advantage. And, it's very important that going in [to the negotiation], you have a certain mindset going in and saying [to yourself], 'This is what I'm going to accomplish.'
> Sometimes you have to compromise. Sometimes you got to out not win. And, sometimes you got to be willing to get off the table and just walk away."

More of an introductory lesson, Franzese says that we enter into a negotiation for different reasons. Sometimes we're called into a negotiation and, as a result, we're sort of forced into it.

Other times, we're the ones calling the negotiation so we can gain an advantage.

Lesson #2: Overcome Fear

> Franzese: "…I think the fear that people have comes from intimidation. Who am I sitting down with? You know, are they more of an imposing figure than me? Are they going to try to control the situation? You can never enter into a new negotiation with fear. You can't do that because you're giving yourself a big disadvantage at that point. So, walking in, you got to have the mindset that, you know what? We're on equal terms. I'm prepared. I know what it is that I want to come out with, and I'm going to just firmly hold my ground."

Note: While this may be true in some cases, oftentimes, the fears that one has in a negotiation are common fears that can be found in most general social interactions such as the fear of failure, fear of negative judgment, or fear of being assertive (see "common social fears").

Lesson #3: Leave Pride & Ego Out

Franzese has a saying, "Leave your pride and ego at the door."

> Franzese: "So pride and ego have no place in a negotiation now. You could carry yourself, well, you know, you don't want to let somebody abuse you in the negotiation. But pride and ego, they want to enter into it. And if they do, you're probably going to come out a loser."

Lesson #4: Use Frames Effectives

Here, Franzese is really referring to "frames."

He mentions that John Gotti had an "I win, you lose" negotiation style (a competitive frame). And, he had a more win-win negotiation style (a collaborative frame).

> Franzese: "You know, I walk in. I state my case. I always feel that having a successful negotiation is when both parties walked out feeling that they won in some way…I'm not really an aggressive guy when I sit down with somebody. I let people talk. That's kind of my style…You know, a negotiation style that I don't recommend that will not be successful to you is if you're combative. If I lose, you're going to lose. If I don't gain, you're [not] going to gain [either]."

So, Franzese mentions the combative and collaborative negotiation styles.

But, here, Franzese also introduces a third style: the accommodating style. It's the win-lose negotiation style where you settle for whatever the other side hands you.

Aim for a collaborative negotiation style.

Lesson #5: Conduct Yourself Well

Rules of conduct:

- Don't be disrespectful, loud, or boisterous. (Let the other person do that.)
- Be assertive yet respectful.
- Look the part — even dress the part going in. (Let your opponent respect you.)

Lesson #6: Learn How to Read the Room

When going into a room to make a pitch, look around the room and do your best to get a good understanding of what each person's role is.

Here, Franzese recommends practicing this by doing your best to read any room you go into.

> Franzese: "Every time you go anywhere, you go into a restaurant, try to read the person that you're dealing with. Read the waiter, the maitre d', or the hostess. Now, you know, it's a crowded place. You know, I want a good table. Can I slip this guy a $10 bill…or is he the guy who can do it? You kind of get a feel for it. How do you do it? I make a joke. Say something nice. 'Gee, I'd love to get a good table.'
> Whatever it is, it's something that you're going to develop innately if you are observant of it, if you are > cognizant of it, every time you walk into a room, you're going to an auto dealership, you're going to buy a car, you sit with the salesman, you start to read the salesman. Can I maneuver this guy a little bit? Can I really get some money off? Maybe he's not the right guy I should use, let me go to the next salesman. Every time you go into a room anywhere."

> Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

Lesson #7: Learn Nonverbal Skills

Franzese shares a fun story about the importance of how you present yourself.

> Franzese: "You know, I can tell you back in the day when I was a caporegime in the family and I lived out on Long Island, so many people would come to me and present deals to me all the time. Different propositions. So often that I had to resort to — I actually bought a club, it was a lounge, a restaurant. And every Monday night, if anybody wanted to make a proposition or, you know, try to sell me something or get me involved in a deal, they'd come and see me on that Monday night. We actually would maybe hold court, whatever you might call it. And immediately, when somebody walked into that back room and sat down, if they weren't dressed properly, if they didn't look the part, to me it was disrespectful.
> You know, you come in to talk to me about something that's important to you. I really don't need you. You want to make an impression on me. And you come in dressed like that? And then I'm sitting there, you know, I'm watching you and you look kind of bored. You sit back in the chair, you know, your arms are folded…No, right off the bat, I don't even want to hear what you have to say at that point. The way you present yourself is very important. Other people came in the room. I saw that they were important. They didn't have to be dressed in a suit and tie. But I saw that they knew that they were coming to meet somebody, you know, in order to get something that they wanted out of me."

And, on how to prepare yourself for developing those nonverbal skills:

> Franzese: "How do you prepare yourself for developing nonverbal skills? You know, to me, a lot of it is common sense.
> Really, if you're going in to secure an office job or an office position, you don't go in there with shorts and a T-shirt and flip flops, you know, and your hair all messed up. You don't do that. You know, you just dress according to the position that you want to achieve."

Note: Attire and fashion sense aren't really "nonverbal skills". They're more along the lines of external social currencies that can be valuable to others when they're developed well. Though, if you consider that how you dress does nonverbally communicate information about you, then we can say there is some technical leeway in calling attire a "nonverbal skill".

Nonverbal communication skills to develop:

- "You know, when you're sitting down with somebody, you make eye contact. Very, very important. I don't like when I'm speaking to somebody and they look down, they're not looking me in the eye. That's like, you don't have confidence in yourself, you know, and that's a very telling sign." — Michael Franzese
- "Don't be talking to somebody with your hand on your chin or your cheek like that, you know, keep yourself up, be dignified in your conversation and look important." — Michael Franzese

Module #2: Strategy Preparation

Lesson #1: Identify What You Want

Franzese says there are two elements to strategy preparation:

1. Identifying your optimum result.
2. Identifying your fallback position.

The optimum result is what you want when you walk into the room. It's what you're going to try to gain and achieve.

You're going to prepare for that, but you have to have a fallback position because you may not get everything you want. So, the fallback position is what you're going to settle for.

Franzese says you need to prepare for both because it's how effective negotiators go into negotiations with both barrels loaded.

> Franzese: "Know what your optimum want is and know what you're going to settle for. And if you can't get either, you got to be prepared to walk away and then maybe come back another time."

Lesson #2: Know Who You're Dealing With

This is also the title from one of the 48 Laws of Power.

Says Franzese:

> Franzese: "I can't say it enough. Knowing who you're going to be dealing with, knowing who's on the other side of the table, doing your research, finding out as much about the individual, about the company, whoever it is that you're dealing with, you've got to do your homework, know the guy that's sitting on the other side of the table. It's extremely important, there's information out there."

This is also where Franzese emphasizes that it's important to know the personality of the person you'll be dealing with. (And, plan how you're going to navigate their personality to reach a win-win deal.)

He mentions that there will be negotiations where you won't have enough time to fully prepare and gather the information that you need. In those cases, simply go in and present yourself as best you can.

But, any time you can prepare and know the personality of your counterpart or any information on the company you're dealing with, it will put you at an advantage.

Lesson #3: Gather Resources

As you're preparing for your negotiation, it's important to decide whether or not you need any resources or tools to further strengthen your position and persuade your counterpart.

Potential resources you can use:

- An expert: maybe your negotiation is in something that you're not too versed in, so you can bring in an expert to try to bolster your position.
- A lawyer: maybe there's some legal element of the deal that you're presenting and you want a lawyer to come in to express or explain the legality of it.
- An accountant: maybe you're not that great at expressing the economics of a deal.
- A visual aid: maybe a PowerPoint presentation, a visual presentation, videos, or webinars because they say a picture is worth a thousand words. (Maybe you could also use photographs or a pamphlet — anything that you can put in front of the other side that can help support your position.)

- A nice, detailed letter: a letter that really expresses everything. Sometimes you may not be the right person to really talk through a deal. So, if you're better at writing information down than verbally expressing it, you can leave a detailed letter with your counterpart. That way, after the meeting, they have something to look at again.

Franzese also mentions that there are cases where bringing resources or materials are a poor strategy depending on the personality of your counterpart.

> Franzese: "Donald Trump. You go into a meeting with a PowerPoint with Donald Trump. You probably got two minutes of his attention with that. He don't want to hear it. You know, there are some people you don't want to hear. They want you to be ready to present your case verbally. That's it. He's not going to look at resources, at letters, at photographs, at webinars, or anything like that."

Lesson #4: Be Ready For Tactical Retreats

> Franzese: "There are times you're in the room you're negotiating…And it's just not working out. It's just not going to happen at this point in time. Maybe it can happen…They just can't do it at that point in time. You can't get what you want. You can't get your optimum result, you can't get your fallback position.
> So what do you do? Do you want to just make an enemy? You just want to cut it off. No. What you do is you say to yourself, 'You know what? Maybe this is not the right time.' Timing is everything in life, and sometimes it's just not the right time. So what do you do? You say, tactical retreat. We'll come back another day. Let me rethink this. Let's see how the market changes. Let's see how things change that maybe gives me an advantage the next time around."

Module #3: Application

Lesson #1: Field Proposal, Keep IT KISS

First, a recap:

> Franzese: "OK, so now the big day is here, all the strategy, all the preparation, you're ready to go, this is it, you're ready to walk into the room. What's the first thing that you do? You read the room, right? Who's there? What's their role? You may not know it immediately, but you're conscious of it. And as you move along, you're going to try to identify that if you have to cater to one person or the other, you're ready to do that. You have your strategy. Your leverage. Everything that you've put into place. To this point, you're ready now to apply and execute. So what's the first thing that you do once you sit down?"

Getting into the negotiation itself, Franzese recommends you waste no time. Here, he teaches you to take a direct approach and field your request right away.

Franzese says that this direct, "let's get straight into it" approach will grab their attention because people's attention spans are short.

> Franzese: "They don't want to listen to you for two hours. They don't want you to build up to get to the point. You got to get to the point right away. So you've got three to five minutes, in my view, to really dazzle in, get their attention, really want them to be interested and hear what you have to say. So, first thing you do, you clearly lay out what you're there for. I want a salary raise. I have a brand new company. I want you to fund it. I want you to be my partner, whatever it is that you want in that room. You put it right out there.

> And then for the next two to three minutes, you tell them why they should be interested in you."

Note: Schmoozing over personal details before fielding your request has been shown to result in better deals (Morris, Nadler, Kurtzberg, & Thompson, 2002, p. 99). Personal information (for example, what's happening in your life) is particularly effective because it's a form of self-disclosure that builds rapport when done well (Worthy, Albert, & Gay, 1969). For more on this, see The Psychology of Negotiation.

Lesson #2: Anchor The Price

AKA: The "Neapolitan Exchange".

> Franzese: "Now we're going to get into something that I referred to as price anchoring or, really, in my terminology, it's called the Neapolitan exchange…My family is from Naples. I know a lot of Neapolitans. We're always bartering for something. We always ask for something high. Settle for something a little less. We always have a fallback position in just about every negotiation that you're going to be involved in."

And, this is how Franzese breaks down anchoring (which he calls the Neapolitan exchange):

> Franzese: "Let's say you're looking for a salary increase or a position where the salary range is from 90,000 a year to 50,000 a year.
> Well, you know, right off the bat, you're not going to go in and ask for 110,000. You're already out of the range, they're not going to pay attention to you.
> But let's say you feel you're worth 90,000 a year, so you're going to ask for that, but you may not get it for various reasons. You might be qualified, but maybe there's other people that have been there longer and they had to work their way up for that and they don't want you to start at that number.
> So what are you willing to take? You have your fallback position. Maybe it's not 50. Maybe it's 65. But you're ready, you're prepared for that.
> So your optimum at 90,000, they're not willing to give you that. In exchange for that, you're willing to take 65,000. That's the Neapolitan exchange.
> So you always got to be prepared for a Plan B, a fallback position Neapolitan exchange."

Note: Continuing from this example, rather than simply asking for a single anchor of $90,000, researchers found that you'll get the highest salary when you use a bolstering range. Compared to a single anchor, ranges seem less rigid. So, you'll be more likely to reach an agreement (and the agreement will also be higher). Therefore, a more effective request would be to make your optimum price and ask $90,000 to $100,000 (see "request a high precise range").

Lesson #3: Handle Objections

Here, Franzese recommends handling objections by frame stealing their objections to frame-block any of their attempts at disqualifying your offer as a fit (see the "accusations audit").

Option one is to be direct with your counterpart and say, "Listen, if I was sitting in your place, these are the objections that I would have to everything that I've presented so far." And, you can go through each potential objection they might have and answer them in advance, right upfront. You can tell them straight out.

Your other option is to be a bit more indirect about it. You can simply say you'd like to share some information with them about your company and in that information, answer what they might be thinking before they have a chance to ask those questions.

Then, when you're done, sit there, and say, "Do you have any questions?" Franzese says that, oftentimes, they'll look at you and say, "You've answered just about everything."

Note:
As Lucio mentions himself, the accusations audit is not always and necessarily the most effective approach (see "accusations audit strategies").

Real Life Applications

- Work on adopting a collaborative negotiation style

Franzese says that if your personality leads you to be more combative or overly-accomodating, it's worth working on developing a more collaborative, win-win attitude to be more successful in your negotiations.

CONS

- Misses opportunities to share more information

Franzese says he believes that everything in life is a negotiation. And, that his negotiation course can be applied to almost anything that requires an exchange of ideas between two or more people.

Yet, just because something can be negotiated doesn't mean it should be. (For example, it might not be the best use of your time to try and negotiate a couple of dollars off your groceries in a store where the prices are pretty much set already.)

So, in the very first lesson, titled "Deciding to Negotiate", rather than using it as an introductory lesson, that could've been a great place to give students a little more value by sharing insight into when a negotiation is worth investing time and effort into.

- Sometimes feels less like a course and more like an overview

And, that's due to the course not exploring the information it shares in greater detail. For example, Franzese says, "Mike Tyson, the baddest man on the planet, every time he walked down the aisle to get into the ring, he said, 'I was scared.' I was kind of shocked to hear that…But what did he do when he got into the ring? He transmitted that fear to his opponent, and that's how he was able to win."

Unfortunately, the course doesn't share how to transmit your fear to your opponent (or if that's even a good idea outside of sports).

Then, Franzese says, "So you may be somebody that's easily intimidated. That's OK. There's nothing shameful about that. But your mindset has to be, you know what, when I get in that room, I'm going to be in control."

In control of the situation or in control of yourself? A little more explanation could've shed some light.

- Gives the "what" but neglects the "how"

In the overcoming fear lesson, Franzese says you need the mindset that (1) you're on equal terms with your counterpart, (2) you're prepared, and (3) you know your desired outcome. And, (4) you're willing to assertively negotiate for that outcome — you're willing to hold your ground.

But, he doesn't share how to adopt this attitude or these mindsets.

It could've been valuable to see a few fair value social exchange beliefs or some beliefs of assertiveness to practice internalizing.

- A very, very short online course

No lesson in the "Mindset" module is longer than five minutes. And, each lesson in the following modules are less than ten minutes long.

Franzese says he designed the course this way on purpose because he wanted it to be consumed in 5-10 minute chunks per day.

But, it's resulted in a course that's only 52 minutes and 35 seconds long in total.

And, personally, I would've preferred to pay more money and get more value than pay the current price and be left with so little information.

- Less of a course and more of a collection of stories from his former life

And, that might leave you wondering how to apply what he teaches in your own, lower-stakes negotiations.

Plus, since most lessons are less than five minutes long, these are quick, short stories that don't go into detail on how he succeeded in his negotiations.

- Gives some misinformation

In the lesson on how to conduct yourself, Franzese says, "…People don't get out of hand when they see the person they're negotiating with is conducting himself in a right way."

That's not always the case. For example, in an everyday life negotiation situation, one could be negotiating with a rude, disrespectful customer who thinks they're "always right". The type of difficult personality that thinks they're entitled to what they're asking for and is frustrated you won't compromise your boundaries.

In any case like that, it's all the more apparent that you're only in charge of your own behavior and others are in charge of theirs. You cannot control whether or not the other side chooses to behave like an entitled turkey simply by "conducting yourself a right way".

PROS

- Fun, engaging mafia-life stories

The stories I hadn't already heard from his interviews and YouTube channel were very fun to listen to.

More than the excitement within the stories themselves, the location where he filmed these course videos is a more intimate setting than the studio he usually uses in his YouTube videos. So, it felt like Franzese told these stories with a more persuasive and attention-grabbing charisma (which was awesome to be a part of as a student).

Review

There were a few more cons I left out to avoid nitpicking.

This wasn't a bad course by any means. It's more that the overemphasis on sharing life stories rather than providing more practical strategies — coupled with the short course length — make it a poor investment of one's time and effort compared to some of the other resources on the TPM "Best Of" list.

With that said though, many of the other students left comments underneath each lesson and seem to be enjoying it. So, in all fairness, maybe this course simply wasn't a fit for me while the other students are getting tons of value from it.

As a final note, it seems like the Michael Franzese Team is still updating the course (after all, at the time of this review's writing, the course was only released five days ago). So, maybe they'll update and expand the content as they receive more feedback in the future.

Emotional Mastery is an online course by Charlie Houpert. The goal is to help you get rid of subconscious blocks, reconnect with emotions, develop self-love, and increase happiness.

Let's see how to do just that.

About The Author

Charlie Houpert

is most famous for his YouTube channel Charisma on Command, which he runs together with Ben Altman. The channel currently has 5 million subscribers and over 500 million views.

Charlie majored in philosophy and has spent several years studying emotional mastery. He also created Charisma University, an online course where he teaches people how to become more charismatic.

You can see a review for Charisma University here:

> Charisma University: Review & Summary

1. Install Joy

The first module is the most theoretical in the course.

It gives an overview of how a lack of emotional mastery can hold you back in life, as well as some mindsets to combat this. It also introduces the three different approaches that the course uses to dive into your emotions.

1. The cognitive approach. (With writing and thinking exercises).
2. The emotional approach. (With guided meditations).
3. The physical approach. (With ecstatic dancing and breathwork).

If you've already looked into the topics of self-love or emotional mastery the information is unlikely to be groundbreaking. However, Charlie does a great job of explaining it in a clear way.

Some of the topics in this module include:

- Events in the past can lead the subconscious mind to repress certain emotions. (This not only hinders you from feeling that particular emotion but also disrupts the flow of your other emotions).
- Setting and achieving external goals rarely leads to happiness. (Upon achieving your goal you tend to find that the goalpost has moved and you're still unhappy).
- By developing self-love you become more aware of what you really want to achieve. (You might find that the goals you are currently pursuing are not actually your own).

Along with the general mindsets and theories, every day comes with a specific exercise. The first module contains exercises from all of the three approaches listed earlier.

Personally I like the different approaches. They allow you to get vastly different experiences throughout the course. Also, if one of the approaches does not suit you it is likely that at least one of the others will. However, the different approaches also means that some exercises might not work for you at all; for me there were a couple of exercises in later modules where I felt nothing.

2. Remove Subconscious Limitations

This module is fairly hit-or-miss.

Unlike the previous one there is not a lot of theory nor is there much variety in terms of the exercises.
The whole module is comprised of guided meditations (+ optional breathwork) so if that has a deep effect on you it's a great module, but if it doesn't you probably won't enjoy it.

Of course, if you are not getting a lot out of this module you can try going back to it at a later time; this is something I've done with several exercises and it often led to very different experiences.

My Note: Distracting Audio
One thing that bothered me about this module was the quality of the audio-tracks for the guided meditations. While I thought the content was good the audios were oftentimes distracting, which is the last thing you want during a meditation.

An example is the deep breaths you take while Charlie counts to six. Sometimes he will start counting immediately, and other times he will tell you to take a deep breath only to continue talking for a while and then start counting. This makes it difficult to follow his breathing and can break your focus from the meditation.

However, something I like a lot, not just about the meditations but about the course as a whole, is that you get a feel for how to do the exercises on your own. This means that if you find the audio-track distracting you will be able to go back and do the meditations without it.

3. Embrace Your Authentic Purpose

This was probably my least favorite module of the course.

It focuses a lot on external aspects such as success and habits, and while these are great topics to dive into I don't think they are crucial to a course on emotional mastery.

That being said, there is still value in this module (and some people may even consider it their favorite), especially for highly ambitious people.

Some of the topics that this module covers include:

- Redefining what success means to you.
- Developing your intuition.
- Dealing with addiction.

The techniques in this module for achieving your goals and dealing with addiction can be valuable to some people. However, while they are good they are nothing special; setting stakes to hold yourself accountable, or replacing an addiction with a less damaging one are hardly groundbreaking techniques.

The main issue is not their effectiveness though, in fact I think many people would benefit from them, but rather their relevance to the course. While external results are important they are hardly what drives people to invest in courses on emotional mastery and self-love. If you are interested in external success there are countless other resources that dive deeper into these topics.

4. Upgrade Your Habits

This was by far my favorite part of the course!

Through a mixture of theory, cognitive exercises, and meditations the module teaches you to reconnect with the parts of yourself that you have neglected.

I personally gained a deeper understanding of myself, and my general happiness and sense of fulfillment improved greatly.

My favorite takeaways from this module include:

- Judgment of other people is often an indicator that there is a part of yourself that you haven't accepted.
- How to integrate your shadow through meditation.
- Learning to forgive your past mistakes by developing a deeper understanding of yourself.

5. Unlock Your Full Potential

The last module of the course is quite varied but the overall focus is on self-acceptance.

Two things I really liked about this module was:

1. It ties all the previous knowledge together and pushes you out of your comfort zone. (You get to decide how far to push yourself).
2. The idea that it is okay to be a hypocrite. (Many people reject parts of themselves because they value integrity over everything else. This is unhealthy and unnecessary).

Although this is the last module of the course there are also some bonuses including:

- A maintenance module to keep working on your emotional development.
- A course on how to grow a successful YouTube channel. (Based on the strategies that Charisma on Command uses).

CONS

Overall I liked the course a lot.

However there were a few downsides:

Different Approaches

This might come as a surprise as I wrote earlier that I liked the different approaches, and I do.

However, the different approaches (cognitive, emotional, and physical) are a double-edged sword. While it does allow for a wider range of people to find something that works for them, it also means that some people will find that certain exercises won't affect them as much, or at all. For example, I found that the cognitive exercises impacted me deeply whereas some of the meditations didn't make me feel anything.

If you find that a particular approach resonates with you, the fact that only part of the course is structured around that approach will be a downside. Now, that does not have to be the case for everyone, in fact I believe it is unlikely to only get affected by one of the approaches. However, the possibility does exist and that's why I'm listing this as a potential con.

Coach [redacted] January 20, 2022 Reply

Hi Mats,

Thank you for this feedback! Sometimes there are meditations which won't 'trigger' anything deep within us – at least at first. Others within EM have expressed similar frustrations with other meditations in the past. But there are solutions to explore 🙂

One thing that has worked for many people, is to circle back to the meditations when you're not experiencing the expected results. I recommend you come back to this meditation in the future as well!

Also, there are times when people go through EM while they are already in a certain 'state'. State meaning that they are stressed, active-minded, exhausted, and distracted. If you feel you fall into one of these categories, I suggest coming back to the meditation when you are feeling very peaceful, focused, and relaxed!

Does this help? Let me know!

This is what one of the coaches replied when I told him that one of the exercises didn't affect me. It is good advice but so far it hasn't worked for me.

Distracting Audio-Tracks for the Meditations

As mentioned earlier there are distracting aspects in the guided meditations. Some of the things that annoyed me were:

- Inconsistencies with the deep breaths. (As mentioned earlier).
- Gradual lowering of voice-volume. (You might start the meditation at the right volume but halfway through his voice has dropped to the point where you can't hear him properly).
- Going too slow/fast. (This is the problem with guided meditations, not just in this course. Since people are different some can get annoyed at how fast it goes while others want it to go slower).

How distracting you find this is subjective though and some people might find it impossible to focus while others don't even notice it.

PROS

There were a lot of things that I liked about the course, but the main ones are:

Different Approaches (Again)

Yes, it can seem ironic that I list this as both a con and a pro, but doing anything else would be disingenuous. I've already talked about this earlier in the review so I'll keep this section short.

Here are some of the benefits of using different approaches:

- Wider range of experiences throughout the course.
- Gives you more tools to work on emotional mastery on your own.
- Creates a deeper understanding of yourself.

Good Structure, Clear Explanations

Those who have watched Charisma on Command's YouTube videos will know that Charlie is a great storyteller with an engaging voice and a clear way of explaining things. This is actually a big deal since the course is entirely made up of videos. Charlie's way of explaining along with his charisma makes the course both fun and easy to go through.

The pacing and structure of the course is also good as it starts with a more theoretical overview and simpler exercises and then moves into deeper topics.

Watch this video for an example of Charlie's explanation style:

Teaches You to Continue the Process on Your Own

While I personally wouldn't have minded the course to be a bit longer than 24 days, this makes up for it. As you go through the course you not only learn how to do the exercises on your own, but you also develop a sense for what you need to do in order to feel better (also known as your intuition).

This is one of my favorite things about the course as it allows you to continue exploring your emotions, dive into different parts of yourself, and develop your self-love on your own after the course is done. This is important because emotional mastery is not something that you achieve once and then move on, instead it is a process that you need to keep up with regularly, and the course gives you the knowledge and tools to do that.

Emotional Mastery Review

Overall I liked the course a lot! It gives a great overview of one of the most fundamental aspects of self-development: your relationship with yourself.

Great for Beginners

If you struggle with self-love or feeling certain emotions this course is a great place to start the process of reconnecting with yourself. The course provides a theoretical overview and many exercises that will give you a solid foundation to continue the process on your own.

Even if you already have a strong foundation and the “basics” of emotional mastery this course can still offer new perspectives due to the different approaches. However, I would say that the course is more geared towards people who are fairly new to the field.

Benefits Carry Over into Other Areas of Life

When I joined the course I wanted to increase my happiness and develop self-acceptance without giving up my drive for self-development. While I saw great success in both these areas I didn’t realize that I would also see a lot of unexpected results in other areas of my life.

One such area was in my social life, which was unexpected but also makes a lot of sense. Humans are great at picking up emotions, so when you feel great other people pick up on it and will be drawn towards you. Likewise, if you respect and love yourself you will carry yourself in a way that makes others more likely to respect you. This is why I consider a good relationship with yourself to be the foundation for your charisma.

> Submissive Behavior: 9 Signals to Avoid

Is Emotional Mastery Worth It?

The answer to this question is subjective as it depends on where you currently are in life.

If you already have a good level of self-love and feel happy on a day to day basis this course might not be worth $600 USD. On the other hand, if you struggle with your emotions and generally feel unhappy the course might be worth more than that.

It also depends on your preferred method of learning. Some people might learn more from reading books than from following a video-based online course.

At the end of the day it's up to you if you're willing to spend $600 USD on the course or not. However, if you're still uncertain it can be good to note that the course offers a 60 day money back guarantee. That means that you can try the whole course (twice) and still get your money back if you find it wasn't for you.

Great Leadership Is Great Manipulation: The Dark Psychology of Extreme Leadership

Lucio Buffalmano · 15 February 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Leadership isn't just about vision or strategy.
At its core, leadership is the ability to move people — sometimes to the point where they'll sacrifice everything for the mission.

That doesn't happen by logic alone. Sometimes it happens through manipulation.

This article breaks down the potential dark psychology behind extreme leadership. We'll use Jocko Willink's "Extreme Ownership" philosophy as a case study to show how leaders inspire loyalty, obedience, and even self-sacrifice — and how you can spot when leadership crosses from influence into exploitation.

Intro

Lucio Buffalmano's quote "Great leadership is great manipulation" is used as an analytical lens to examine how leaders' mobilization of extreme commitment in extreme circumstances can become costly for individual followers. Since rational, self-interested individuals would not naturally choose value-negative outcomes, this type of leadership can at times be better understood as manipulative rather than merely persuasive.
The term 'great' refers to how such leaders are sometimes revered, even when their leadership has imposed high costs on some followers.

Leadership is getting things done with people and through people.

Getting someone to do anything at the risk of life is a pretty large demand from a leader.
So the next question becomes:

how do you get people invested to such an extreme?

Risking one's life goes against human nature

People have a natural preference for positive returns on their investment. They naturally avoid net losses in social exchanges. And any form of life tends to avoid any major risks to one's life.
So it cannot be done logically. If the persuasive message was an honest assessment of give-and-take and 'what's in it for you', nobody would sign up.

So, often, to make people want to risk their lives, you need manipulation.
And that's how we get into extreme leadership and manipulation.

Extreme Leadership vs. Great Leadership

There can be great leadership without manipulation, of course.

However, as per Power-Exchange Mode of Leadership™, extracting great value requires something great from the leader.
And especially so from high-competence and high-value individuals, like we can expect special ops soldiers to be ('Competence-control tradeoff model™').

However, many people confuse 'great' as in 'value-giving', and that is not the case.

Examples: Cults... And Special Ops?

Cults are a classic example of extreme leadership and total follower buy-in.
They clearly illustrate how leaders can mobilize intense loyalty, emotional fusion, and self-sacrifice.

However, using cults would confine the dynamic to an obviously 'negative' setting.
In reality, leadership that becomes value-taking for followers can occur in legitimate, respected, and high-performing organizations.
In fact, the power to move individuals to act for the team's interest even at personal cost is often a hallmark of highly effective teams.

For that reason, this article uses special operations as the team and Jocko Willink as the leader. In modern culture, both are widely regarded as models of teamwork and high-level leadership.

This is not a criticism of Jocko Willink, who is a high-quality man with much to teach
But he serves as a case study for the dynamics of certain types of extreme leadership that can turn value-taking for the followers.

Case Study: Special Ops & Jocko Willink

This is what Jocko Willink says of leadership and manipulation:

> Jocko Willink: manipulation is good for the leader only. Great leadership is good for you, the team, and the mission.

So, in simpler terms, which is also the expression we use on the power moves, Jocko Willink says that great leadership adds value to everyone, including the followers.

And it's true.
And it sounds realistic… On paper.

Unluckily, it's not always how it works in practice.

And to clearly show this point, I'm gonna read a passage from Jocko's book "The Dichotomy of Leadership":

When 'Extreme Good' Leadership Harms Followers

> The wounded SEAL now lay on a gurney in Charlie Med (…)
> The bullet, a mammoth armor-piercing 7.62 × 54 millimeter round with a steel core had entered his leg at the lower thigh, ripped apart flesh and bone inside his leg, and exited in his upper thigh, close to the groin.
> It was hard to say if he would keep his leg. From the looks of the wound, my guess was no, he would lose it.
> Jocko Willink, The Dichotomy of Leadership

At this point you can already ask yourself:

Was this good for this young man, the follower?

Maybe it was good for the mission and maybe it was good for the various leaders up the chain.
But was it good for this kid to lose his leg and maybe more?

Debatable at least.

Extreme Leadership Subordinates You to The Group

Again from the book:

> The wounded SEAL's grip on my hand tightened and he pulled me in, drawing me just inches from his face.
> (…)
> *He took a breath and then whispered, "Sir. Let me stay. Let me stay. Please. Don't make me go home. I'll do anything. I'll sweep up around the camp. I can heal here. Please, please, please just let me stay with the task unit."
> Jocko Willink, The Dichotomy of Leadership

These are verbatim words from the book.

So, seen from the point of view of this wounded kid, you're struggling to survive and your biggest fear is that they will send you back home?
Your last breath is for begging to stay?

How does this sound in terms of effects of manipulation, emotional neediness, and "being good for him"?

To me, this sounds like pathological attachment, total emotional neediness, high dependence… And at least from a practical point of view, not good for him.

These are the effects that psychologists and therapists see from their patients in manipulative, abusive, and toxic relationships.
Just as some examples, you could see "Women Who Love Psychopaths", "Women Who Love Too Much", or Braiker's great work on emotional manipulation in "Who's Pulling Your Strings".

Again from the same book:

> There you go. Not scared. Not angry. Not depressed that he might lose his leg.
> Only concerned that he might have to leave our task unit.
> Task Unit Bruiser. Our task unit. Our lives.
> OK, your task unit is your life.
> Jocko Willink, The Dichotomy of Leadership

TPM promotes the value of empowered individuals.
So we're not big fans of having this or that group becoming "your life".

However, we're not against that either.
As long as:

- You're aware of the dangers
- You can walk out of that group any time you want, emotionally and, ideally, physically
- You maintain at least some level of critical thinking
- You maintain at least some basic level of self-preservation

This requires holding a duality of approaches in your mind: you're aware that the group is "your life", while at the same time you respect and love yourself as an individual, with his own power and own self.

That also means that, on TPM, we see an issue when someone becomes part of the group to the point that they lose their sense of self.

When the group becomes your only reason to live for, then you're not an individual anymore.
You're a cog in a wheel you have no control over.

When You Fuse Identity With The Group, You Lose Your*self*

This is called identity fusion in psychology.

When you lose your sense of self there is no thinking for yourself anymore, of course, there is no critical thinking, and at the extreme there is no self-interest and self-preservation, which is terrible for you, not good for you.

This is like being a bee or an ant and protecting the queen.
Good for the queen, no doubt.
But not necessarily for the bee.

We talked about similar dynamics in "corporate lies and manipulation"
Well, in contrast to ants and bees, humans could theoretically think.
But if they're identity-fused, there is not much independent thinking anymore.
There is no questioning the mission, no questioning the leadership, and no questioning orders –"I was just following orders", does that remind you of anything?-

Great for the mission, because you'd die for it.
Great for the team, because you'd die for the team.
Great for the leaders too, because you'd die for them -and they have full control over you-.

BUT…

Is it also good for you?

Well, sometimes it might be.

But it's far from obvious.
The problem is that you'll have to trust your leader to have the best in mind for you.
And on TPM we prefer an approach that is more about "trusting BUT making sure", rather than blindly trusting.

Funny enough, being willing to die for the "mission" and the "group" without critical thinking is no different than the power dynamics in the jihadist organization the US military was purportedly fighting.

Extreme Leadership Subordinates You To The "Leader"

Again from the same book:

> Even if he kept his leg, the damage was so substantial that it didn't seem possible he would ever fully regain the extraordinary athleticism he had displayed.
>
> And yet this SEAL was only concerned that he would let me down, let the task unit down, let his platoon—his team—down.
> Jocko Willink, The Dichotomy of Leadership

Not letting Jocko Willink down.

Typical emotional dynamics of what we call "judge role" in power dynamics.

In simpler terms, it's control via emotional "hooks".
If the leader likes you and approves of you, you feel great.
If the leader dislikes you and disapproves of you, you feel terrible.
So you want to do anything that makes the leader like and approve of you.

That's a very strong control tool that a leader can have on you.

Watch out when you feel that way towards anyone because you're giving them a lot of power over you.

Goes on Jocko Willink:

> A great guy to be around: Faithful. Loyal. Funny.
> Jocko Willink, The Dichotomy of Leadership

Well, what if that was exactly his issue.
Loyal, to whom?
Faithful to whom?

What if he were also a bit more loyal to himself -and what's good for him-?

Extreme Leadership Can Subordinate You to Lies

Not always, but very often:

> Extreme leadership requires extreme representations of reality.

And that's basically a different way of saying "distortions of reality" and "lies".

People aren't much willing to engage in extreme activities and follow extremists when they see the world as shades of grey, exceptions, and as "distributed evil and goodness" among different societies and people.

Instead, they are much more willing to do extreme actions when they see the world as extremes.

Would this kid feel the same if:

- He knew that part of the motivation beyond the war was oil, power, and interest groups of certain lobbyists?
- He knew that many Iraqis would probably live worse after the war?
- He knew that for every war there is someone at home who is happy and couldn't care less if you die?

There, my friends, lies the other piece of extreme manipulation: blinkers.

In milder forms, we talked about these dynamics in:

- Red pill: analysis of an echo chamber

The Nature Extreme Leadership

A good question:

What type of leadership are we talking about here?

Learning what type of leadership it is, can also allow you to replicate it -and potentially, without the manipulative shade of it-.

In his book Extreme Ownership Jocko says that the principles of great leadership are extreme ownership, prioritize and execute, delegating, developing relationships, and a few more.

These are all great principles, of course.
But are those the principles that make the most extreme forms of leadership most effective?

Of course, they help.
Maybe 20%.

But the 80% was in the total, unquestioning buy-in from the followers, and the total following orders, no matter what.

It's easy to tell followers what to prioritize and execute when they're ready to die.
It's easy to implement cover and move when followers would take a bullet to cover you.
It's easy to give followers tasks and expect them to do their best when they so desperately want your approval.

We're not talking about leadership principle here, we're talking about leadership power dynamics.
Persuasion, when it's good for you.
And full-on manipulation when it's not.

Antidote to Manipulative Leadership

The best antidotes for manipulation:

- Empowered individualism
- Effective calculativeness

Total manipulation can only happen when there is a lack of mental self-empowerment.

Once you can see and understand the psychology of manipulation, of how these hooks work within you, then you can step back and better assess the situation.
Funny enough, stepping back is something Jocko often talks about.
And only then you're truly free and empowered to make decisions.

Any decision.

Because this article is NOT necessarily against fighting, wars, or joining extreme groups and missions.

As a matter of fact, there are times when fighting is necessary.
And there are times when putting your life on the line might even be a moral duty.

But as much as it can be a moral duty to fight, it's a moral duty to critically think it over.

To critically analyze that "mission" and that "leadership".
And not just the leader above you, but the whole chain.
Because if the guy above you is great but the organization is rotten, you're still doing the bidding of a morally bankrupt organization.

The 5 Principles of Dating Power Dynamics: Effective Dating

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In dating, most men focus on the surface: saying the right lines, showing off, or paying for expensive meals.

But the truth is, the key to success lies in the deeper dynamics that drive attraction. These principles separate men who struggle from those who naturally succeed.

In this post, we'll uncover the five foundational laws of dating power dynamics—principles most men overlook but that are essential for building attraction, respect, and deeper connections.

Dating Power Dynamics (TPM) is TPM's applied model for understanding and influencing attraction by managing power, warmth, timing, and investment in romantic interactions.
Part of TPM's Interpersonal Power Dynamics (see the TPM Power Dynamics Framework).

So let's dive in:

- SUMMARY

1. Power Up Attracts, Power Down Repels

Dating is largely a negotiation and women, just like any living creature, are programmed to pursue the best they can get.

That means that high-power men are attractive because they fulfill women's desire for securing the best possible mate.

Also see:

- Women's hypergamy
- High-power behavior
- High-power speaking

High-status men win because all women would like to be with them. Bottom men struggle because women would rather choose higher status men

And yet, there is an important caveat.
Especially important for more advanced folks:

1.2. ... But Power Is Best Combined With Warmth

Power isn't just dominance, how much you make, or social status.

Those are part of power.
But you're higher power compared to her also when she:

- Pursues you
- Compliments you
- Invests in you

These are all great things.
But the law of optimum balance also applies to dating, and you can have too much of a good thing.

In dating, the issues with too much power include:

- Too much dominance turns confrontational
  ⍰ She says 'FU' and moves on
- He seems too much for her and she thinks he's unattainable

- She writes him off

As we saw in foundations of effective dating, she over-chased compared to me:

> She: (3 texts + compliments + self-disclosure) <— Chases
> ✕ (no reply) <— Value-taking power. She feels spurned and like I'm unavailable

And guess what happend after?

She probably thought I was unavailable, uninterested, too much for her… Or she felt ashamed and un-feminine for chasing too much.
Whatever it was from that list, she blocked me -the most common response to similar scenarios-

Of course, these are 'rich men's problems'.

However, as you read more here and become a more effective and high status man, you'll start seeing that more and more.

Men struggle to understand these dynamics because men are different and don't lose attraction chasing.
From an evolutionary point of view, men gain with any new single 'notch' they add.
But women take far bigger risks with random notches and instead benefit with men who value them -and potentially commit-.

We dig deeper on this concept in these three articles here:

- Self-rejection, on why people and women write you off when you're too good
- Value and availability, on the importance of making your value available for people to like you and cooperate with you
- Power & warmth, our seminal article on being power high power and high warmth

So, how do you fix this issue?

Simple:

1. Invest back
2. Pull her up to your level
   - Uncover her qualities and appreciate her ("the judge")
   - Be interested in her
   - Potentially share a vulnerability -but don't overdo that!-
   - Connect emotionally with her
3. Escalate as a reward

Some struggle to understand these dynamics because men don't lose attraction when they chase women.

2. It's Relative Power Levels That Matter

Women want men better than they are, and that's relative to them.

To express this concept with a simple chart:

He's low power -and unattractive to her- not simply because he expends lot of effort, but because she doesn't
BUT…

If he was giving 10, and she was giving back 10, then it would be TOTALLY different.
The frame would be that of a couple desperately in love, going through a whirlwind romance where nobody else in the word exists.

Think of the Joker and Harley Quinn.

On the other hand, if she gives you nothing, even a few glances frame you as chasing.

Same dynamics apply to social power dynamics.
If she disrespects you, you must forcefully enforce your boundaries or you lose status and social power to her.
And that kills attraction.

This is also why super-direct approaches are 'ballsy', but often not the most effective.
Of course they can work, sometimes do, and sometimes are perfect for the target or situation.
However, in general, they signal too much interest, and give much power away.

3. You Must Be Power-Up To Move Things Forward

She'll only move forward with you if she sees you as above her and accepts your leadership.

In the social exchange article we talk about social leverage and influence.

And we have a concept called "social overdraft".

You're in over-draft when people perceive you negatively and they do not want to be around, follow you, or help you.
The same applies to dating: when you have no leverage with her, she will not follow you.

That positive or negative leverage starts even before you open your mouth.
Based on initial looks and style, you will have a certain sexual market value to her. That is at least partially subjective, of course, and malleable.
And you can increase your power -and your leverage on her- as you talk and engage with her.

That's how you go from an average guy, to dating attractive women.

and that's why we focus so much on coming across as high-status and high power here.
Because it fixes dating and relationships at their core.

4. Power Is Use It Or Lose It: Use It To Move Forward

As mentioned before:

If you don't use your power to move forward and you only 'collect it', she will quickly write you off.

And that's even truer for high-quality women.
In-demand women are only available for a short window of time. And you must strike when it's hot.

So just like you can't block the traffic at an intersection, think of her green lights as both an opportunity, and an obligation to move.

Exceptions always apply of course.
For example, fans of famous men who never met him will be available to him for a long time.
But… Trust that you're better off sticking with the rule :)

5. Power-Positive Escalation = Quick & Effective Seductions

She will happily comply when you escalate with enough leverage.

That's what we mean by 'power positive escalation'.
You're in the green with her, and can use that social capital to move things forward.

In chart terms:

⁉⁉ It's not the action itself that succeeds or fails. It's the power you have when taking that action that makes you succeed or fail
Quick definition:

- Golden balance: the sweet spot between too low power that a woman is not interested because "you're below her", and too high power that a woman is not interested because she thinks you're too good for her
- Straight line seduction: the quickest path from meeting to intimacy.

Straight line seduction requires dating high-power, and using power as fuel to move forward.

As mentioned already, effective dating is not to accrue as much power as possible, but to move things forward as soon as you have enough power to do so.

You can think of power as fuel.
You want to get as much fuel as possible, but not for hoarding fuel, which weighs you down and is a fire hazard, but to move forward as fast and as far as you can.
Power is fuel, it's to be used, not hoarded.

5.2. Golden Balance For Effective Dating

Jordan Belfort talks about "straight line persuasion".

And Todd Valentine says that he has the same approach in his dating.

So taking a leaf out of Jordan Belfort's book, a seduction based on the "golden balance" is a "straight line seduction" -or "as straight as you can manage"-:

You're at 0% when she sees you as "at her same level", and you're good when she sees you "better than her"
Below zero means you're below her.
Above zero means you're above her.

Once she sees you as "above her", you're good. Focus on moving forward rather than acquiring more power (examples in Seduction University).

⍰ Walk-through analysis in the golden balance

Let's analyze a cold approach.
Red is losing power, grey is neutral, and green is gaining power:

1. You walk up to say hi
   ⍰⍰ sub-communicates interest (chasing)
2. She is warm
   ⍰⍰ expresses interest
3. You exchange a few sentences
4. You tell her to move aside because you'd like to talk to her more
   ⍰⍰ escalates interest
5. She follows. You vibe and tease, and exchange basic information
   ⍰⍰ complies and accepts your leadership
6. You propose to meet her again
   ⍰⍰ escalates interest
7. She says "Maybe" and you exchange contacts,
   ⍰⍰ hides her interest
8. She stays talking to you
   ⍰⍰ verbally hides interest, but shows it behaviorally
9. You say you must go for a lunch meeting
   ⍰⍰ sub-communicates you're busier / higher-value
10. You send her a pic of your lunch 1h later

⍰⍰ first contact is in pursuit

11. She replies, you exchange a few texts
    ⍰⍰ her reply confirms her interest
12. You propose to grab some food/drinks together
    She says "OK"
13. …. Etc., etc. until you invite her home and escalate.

You might lose power by escalating, as it shows interest.
But you don't if it's timed well. And you gain power when she accepts your escalation.

6. Healthy Win-Win Relationships Are Value-Balanced

Let me say this first:

First, we're talking about a general balance of give and take, and that does not mean 'full equality' or 'equal power'.

Second, there are many ways to make this work that do not entail your typical 'loving relationship' as imagined in much Western media.
For example, a very wealthy top 1% man may finance a woman without seeing her much, and that would still be value-balanced if she appreciates the financing and it makes her life easier.

That being said, good relationships tend to be balanced in give-and-take where both partners are better off and 'winning'.
In loving relationships that include mutual support, mutual interest, mutual defense, and mutual caring.

Anything else is toxic and abusive.

We teach how to go all the way in Power University.

SUMMARY

These principles form the foundations of effective dating.

They precede strategies and techniques because good strategies and techniques are based on these foundational principles.

The principles are based on the link between power and attraction, and power and leadership.

Once you ensure that you are higher power than her and move forward when you have enough leverage to do so, your dating will take off.

Self-Rejection: Why People Hate You When You're Too Good

Lucio Buffalmano · 7 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Self-rejection is a psychological and social phenomenon consisting of rejecting someone as a way to defend one's own ego, self-esteem, or social status.

It's a common phenomenon with important ramifications that go into socialization, dating, as well personal development.

INTRO

> Self-rejection means to reject, criticize, ignore, or even hate someone first when we feel that they would reject us, ignore us, or generally be unavailable to us

Self-rejection is based on a psychological self-defense mechanism as well as on an innate drive to acquire and preserve social status within groups.

Let's review both of them:

Psychological Self-Defense

Getting rejected hurts.

And it can have real-world consequences when it dents our self-esteem, since low self-esteem people are less effective at life.

So whenever we (subconsciously) feel we might be rejected, self-rejection kicks in.
In order to protect ourselves and our self-esteem from the possibility of rejection and pain, we trick ourselves into believing that it's us who would not want to mingle, talk, work, or get together with someone else.

Aesop's fable of the fox and the grapes is a famous case of self-rejection.
The fox tries to reach the grapes to eat them, but cannot manage to do so.
Instead of insisting or admitting failure, he walks away in fake disdain, saying that the grapes are not good.

Power & Status Offense / Self-Defense

Rejection affects power and social status.

It's not just a psychological phenomenon, but also a social one that interconnects with group dynamics, interpersonal dynamics and, of course, social power dynamics.

Generally speaking, the one who rejects is higher power and/or gains power, and the one who gets rejected is lower power and/or loses power.

So an initial fear of rejection turns into self-rejection, which in turn turns into pre-emptive rejection to defend against ego hurt and power losses (power protecting).

It might sound complex, but it's quite simple and chances are that you've experienced it already, and maybe even did it yourself.
For example, you think that someone is out of your league, and instead of being excited when you get to talk to them, you pretend you don't care and act aloof.

Sometimes self-rejection can be turned into an aggressive, power-taking power move. For example, when we think someone disapproves of us, we may publicly disapprove of them first, or even make up stories of how they tried to get on our good side, but we spurned them. In that case, it's not always easy though to say where self-defense self-rejection starts, and when a pure, aggressive, manipulative power move begins.

Self-Rejection in Dating

Emotions run highest in dating, so it's where you will see most self-rejections.

It may not be a coincidence that the concept, originally called 'auto-rejection' originates from dating and pick-up, originally attributed to former dating coach Sebastian Drake.

We called it “self-rejection” to make it more intuitive and descriptive, and extended its application to all socialization rather than just dating.

Let’s learn more about self-rejection in dating:

Female Self-Rejection

Most men don’t understand women’s self-rejection.

Men are most used to thinking -and fearing- in terms of female rejection, rather than self-rejection, so most men don’t understand how easily they can lose women to self-rejection.

Paradoxically, the higher value he is and the more she likes him, the higher the odds that he will lose women to self-rejection -unless he’s a power-aware man, that is-.

That’s because most men are used to men chasing women. And they aren’t used to women chasing men.
So they don’t understand how challenging, including emotionally challenging and risky it can be for a woman to chase.
Most men don’t realize that since women don’t usually chase, any unit of interest/chasing from a woman is like 10x of the male equivalent.

That means that, oftentimes, by simply looking at you a woman is already chasing you.
She’s often not gonna give you more than that as a stranger, or more than opening a conversation in a social setting.
And if the man doesn’t realize it’s a sign of interest and doesn’t act on it, the woman will often self-reject and write him off.

When women self-reject

Women can self-reject for a variety of reasons, including:

- When he misses her indicators of interest: she thinks that she made it obvious, he doesn’t make a move, and she writes him off as either non-interested, or too socially challenged
- When he doesn’t move things forward: if a man beats around the bush too long, the woman loses interest in the man and she writes him off as a romantic partner
- When he stalls at key junctures of dating: for example, if he waits a whole week after a first night of intimacy, many women will write him off as not interest and/or unable to get a relationship with him. They’ll turn cold, potentially resentful towards him, and move on
- When he doesn’t give back: if the woman invests, chases or cares for him but he gives nothing back, many women will eventually turn cold and move on
- When she’s horny but he doesn’t make a move: this stumps some men because it’s not how men are wired. If a man would have sex with a girl today, he’d have sex with her tomorrow or the day after, all the same. But girl self-reject if he doesn’t move on the green light

As you can see from the above, self-rejections often happen as a misunderstanding or as men’s mistakes to read her signals of interest.
This is why it’s important to understand self-rejection in order to date well.

Why women self-reject

The reasons for self-rejection include:

- She thinks he’s too much for her, which can happen when he was actually interested in her, but failed to properly qualify her, reward her for her investment, and generally make her feel good
- She thinks he’s not interested, funny enoguh, sometimes the man was just playing dating games, waiting, or trying to be cool and aloof when all he had to do was to show more interest, be more genuine, or move things forward

- Following emotional pain to regain self-esteem: for example, if he waits for a week before calling her after a one-night stand, she may be hurt and turn sour toward him. After one week, she will then be emotionally closed off to him even though she might have liked him
- Following physical excitement that didn't lead to a sexual release: if she was ready and horny and he didn't make a move, she will go home -or find another guy- and blame the man for not giving her what she wanted
- To prevent emotional pain: for example, she thinks she may get a one-night stand with him, but not a relationship, so she rejects either
- Becuase he doesn't take action and she thinks he's not a resolute leader. This less about self-protection, but it's quite common, so read more:

When she feels like she has given him all the signs and green lights possible, but he does not act, women feel either spurned or disappointed.
And they will write him off as ineffective at dating, or as a poor leader. They'll think they wasted their time with you.
Of course, sometimes women think they've given him all the signs, but truly haven't. And that's why it's often a great idea to test for her compliance and readiness to move, so you never miss your opportunity to move forward.

Signs she's in self-rejection

Sometimes you may be able to tell, or even to sense that a woman is nearing self-rejection.
And, before she goes full 360 and goes for good, you may be able to turn things around.

Here are some of the signs:

- She goes from warm to cold: she's thinking that she's given you so much, but you haven't given her anything, and now she starts to pull back
- She complains about something, or criticizes you: an indirect way of saying "you're driving me away. Women often use indirect ways to hide their true reason
- She's aloof and cold: this might be a sign of pre-emptive self-rejection
- She's giving you too much for you to handle. If you can't give back or move forward, get ready for self-rejection (see example below)

With time I've learned that whenever a woman is giving me too much, risks are very high she will self-reject.
For that reason, I don't even think it's a good sign to be getting too much, too early.
An example:

She was giving me too much, I wasn't willing or able to follow up and give back that much, so I knew that this was a big candidate for self-rejection.

And what happened a few days later?
I forgot to reply to one of her many messages, and she blocked me:

She wrote first a few times and always more than I did.
When I skipped replying for 3 days she probably felt ashamed for having given me too much, back-rationalized I must not like her enough, and to protect her ego and self-esteem, she rejected me -in spite of the fact that I would have gone out with her-.

Male Self-Rejection

Male self-rejection is different than female self-rejection.

Men more rarely self-reject because women don't show interest or because things don't progress quickly enough.

Most male self-rejection concerns excuse not to make an approach.
For example:

- She's not really my type
- I'm out with my friends
- I'm not dressed well tonight
- She's too tall

Preventing Dating Self-Rejection

Since self-rejection is more of an issue for men, we'll focus on men.

Here's how:

1. Be more attuned to women's indicators of interest
2. Take action on women's indicators of interest
3. Take action and move things forward when you have enough power and leverage to do so
4. If she thinks you're very high value, rein in the teasing (ie.: don't overdo the "asshole")
5. Focus on bonding and connection and/or moving forward when she already thinks you're very high value
6. Pull her up to your level if she thinks you're very high-value
7. Invest back when a woman invests
8. Generally be a warm and welcoming force

Pre-Emptive Self-Rejection

Pre-emptive self-rejection is a sub-type of self-rejection that happens before there is even a single social interaction.

To explain it, imagine the bars below represent the "personal value" of three different people:

A is a 6, because she knows a couple of people there but no big-shot, is a bit overweight, employed but not in a high-position
B is a 10, because he's famous and most people know him, he's successful, rich, and happens to be good looking
C is an 8.5, because he's semi-popular, doing well financially, and good looking

And now imagine they're all out in a mixer event where people move around and meet new people for networking, business, or… Whatever else might arise.

In a world free of psychology and self-rejection, both Amber (A) and Christy (C) want to meet Black (B).
And Black could easily get friendship, romance, or at least a warm welcome by both Amber and Christy.

But in the real world, it's not as straightforward.
People also have a sense for what their personal value is, and they know that higher value people might not be thrilled to hobnob with them.

That's why Amber might want to approach Black, but she will not do so. Amber might be afraid that if she says hi, Black might spurn her.

Amber might be so deep in self-denial, that she doesn't even admit to herself that she'd like to get to know Black.
So if someone asks her about him, she may even say "he's not my type".

Pre-emptive self-rejection is based on little concrete signals, and mostly on a calculation of personal values.
When people think you're too good for them, they will act like you're too good for them.

Amber might start to run a whole narrative based on her imaginary rejection, assigning negative traits and behaviors to someone she hasn't even met.
When she notices herself looking towards Black but Black not looking at her, she subconsciously feels diminished and she tells herself "he's one of those rich assholes who takes advantage of people".
If Black approached her, she might even be cold and standoffish.

Pre-emptive self-rejection can become more common as you grow. It happens when people don't think you will accept them, and they self-reject themselves before you do so.
If you are high-value, this is relevant for you because you could end up making enemies just by being high-value.

Offensive Self-Rejection

Sometimes what's an actual self-rejection can look like a personal dislike.

Generally speaking, it's people with a fragile ego and fragile self-esteem who masquerade their self-rejection as a rejection and/or personal dislike.

Says psychologist Albert Ellis (1994):

> The best defense against rejection is a good offense: Get the others before they get you.
> Some attackers hide their insecurity by being subtler. They are quietly disapproving, superior, distant, judgmental, sarcastic, negative, and/or condescending toward people who may not approve of them. They hold everyone at arm's length, or further. Their goal is to keep others off balance in order to protect their own fragile egos. They are just as afraid of what other people think of them, but they hide behind a wall.

Other Types of Self-Rejections

1. After a (perceived) rejection: sometimes self-rejection happens after a perceived slight. For example, the woman sometimes interprets the man who waits one week to call her as a rejection, even when the man was interested and was playing the (wrong) "dating game"
2. After emotional hurt: rejections, even imaginary rejections, hurt. So if after an interaction, a date, or even after a relationship or friendship has ended, some people will self-reject
3. As a power move: rejecting someone sub-communicates "I'm better than you", so a self-rejection is sometimes masqueraded as a rejection and made public to acquire more social status
4. Social strategy to maintain status: for some people, rejection is a social strategy to preserve status. In many groups you will see people playing games of feigned disinterest to either acquire power, or to self-protect against losing power

Preventing Self-Rejection

There are three levels of preventing self-rejection:

1. In dating
2. Socially
3. With yourself

In Dating: Escalate & Give Back

This is particularly relevant for men, see above.

But to sum it up:

1. Escalate whenenever she's giving you the green light with investment and chasing
2. Give back whenenver she's investing, chasing, building you up, or showing interest. You can give back mirroring her, pulling her up, or qualifying her

Socially: Be Warmer, Pull People Up

People only self-reject when they feel you will reject them.

And that's far more likely to happen when you look like someone who rejects people, makes them feel bad about themselves, or make them lose social status.

So the solution is simple:

Don't look and act like an asshole :).

To put it in the positive, become a warmer person, and make people feel welcome and appreciated.
That way, people feel like your value is potentially available to them. Or, at least, that you will not disempower them with a public display of aloofness or rejection.

It's low-warmth individuals who drive people into self-rejection
For more on these dynamics, also see:

- Value and availability

And:

- Power & Warmth

With Yourself: Develop Antifragile Ego

Self-rejection has a lot to do with vulnerability.

When people are afraid of being vulnerable, they self-reject others so that they can put up a facade of fake strength and high-value.

Now, being vulnerable can easily be over-done and disempower you.
However, as for everything, balance.
And there is also much power in not being afraid of emotional pain. And especially not when the social and life costs of emotional pain are little or nil -and that is often the case-.

In those cases, self-rejection happens because of a fragile ego.
To overcome it:

- Develop an antifragile ego
- Develop a growth mindset

Dating Power Dynamics: 5 Domains to Master Seduction

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Unlock the secrets of high-value dating success by mastering the power dynamics that drive attraction.

Many men unknowingly sabotage their chances by over-chasing, over-investing, or misreading key signals. Yet, the most attractive men—the ones women truly desire—know how to balance power and connection.

In this article, you'll discover the five core principles of dating dynamics that high-value men follow to build attraction, maintain control, and move relationships forward.

This is our expertise and we have already helped thousands of men becoming respect-worthy, attractive men.

Dating Power Dynamics (TPM) is TPM's applied model for understanding and influencing attraction by managing power, warmth, timing, and investment in romantic interactions.
Part of TPM's Interpersonal Power Dynamics (see the TPM Power Dynamics Framework).

Power is the most potent aphrodisiac -and the quickest shortcut to success-

INTRO

The entries below are the main drivers of power and attraction.

Imagine each one of them on a continuum in which you either lose power, or gain power.

The left side of the continuums are low power.
And the right side are high power.

However, for effective dating the goal is not to accrue as much power as possible, but to have enough power to move things forward.

Key takeaways:

- Be power up
- Pull her up to your level, make her feel valued
- Use that power to move forward

Let's dive in:

1. Chasing VS (Being Chased)

Chasing is to pursue and value someone more than they value you.

Principle:

⚖ Chasing lowers power & attraction; being chased increases it, provided there's hope and reciprocation.

The sweet spot is a balance where she pursues you, you reward her, and move forward.

What makes you 'chase'

We include four overlapping principles under 'chasing':

- Pursuing
  Ie.:
  - Re-initiating contact
  - Inviting her out

- Investing, or the effort you show
  Ie.:
  - Carrying her bags
  - Mentoring
  - Longer texts

- Showing interest
  Ie.:
  - Compliments
  - Professing love
  - Proposing a relationship

- Screening VS Qualifying: You screen to find her qualities, and qualify when responding to her screens.

They all overlap and cluster around a general sense of 'chasing'. But for ease of understanding, we'll treat them separately.

Dating Strategy

- Avoid chasing far more than she does, because that's disempowering and unattractive (negative balance of power)
- Entice her to chase you slightly more than you do… (positive balance of power)
  - But strive for balance, reward her pursuit, and focus on escalation, or she will self-reject and move on

Since men must initiate, some* chasing is normal. But it's when chasing becomes too much or too imbalanced that dating becomes ineffective and she loses interest.

In large part, effective dating walks a fine line of pursuing, without over-chasing.
If you move things forward when she's investing, you're automatically balanced, and you're golden.

⍰ Over-Chased Without Matching = You Lose Her

Being chased generally means being in the power position.

So the more you get chased, the more power you have.
However… remember the basic laws of dating: dating power is use or lose.
So if you don't move forward or give back to increase the bond, you will eventually lose her.

This is an example of a woman chasing:

> She: (3 texts + compliments + self-disclosure) <— Chases
> ✕ (no reply) <— Value-taking power. She feels spurned and like I'm unavailable)
> ✓ Thank you. You also looked good ? <— Rewards her, encourages to invest more

Being chased is a 'rich man's problem'.
But as you become high-value and more women chase, you must ensure you make that value available.

This is why we say that "balanced dating is effective dating": being chased hard without giving anything feels like the apex of power, but it often ends up nowhere that involves sex or intimacy.

Case in point, guess what happened with the lady in the message above?
She kept writing and I forgot to reply for a couple of days. And… She self-rejected, and blocked me:

In our "straight line seduction chart", this interaction went like this:

I started low for approaching, re-gained power chatting, and went too high power when I under-invested
So as a general rule, if you're being chased you want to turn it a bit more into mutual chasing which sub-communicates attraction on both sides.
Withoug going overboard, maintain your power, but avoid her chasing and you giving nothing.
For example, if she says you're attractive, you say "We both are", or "Thanks, you also seem cool, let's find a time for some food or drinks".

If this isn't clear yet, see:

- ⍰ Self-rejection

- ⍰ Value and availability

2. Investing (VS Getting Investment)

The effort you expend to meet, stay in touch, or give value

And the same rule applies:

Dating Strategy

1. Avoid investing more than her, because that's disempowering and unattractive (negative balance of power)
2. Entice her to invest slightly more than you do… (positive balance of power)
    - … But strive for balance and escalate on her investment

Whenever you're getting investment, it's a green light to escalate.

There are many levels of escalations, so it's not only necessarily physical escalation.
But you want to move things forward to grow closer.

Women only invest in men they're interested in, so a woman investing is a big green light.
And remember: green lights are both an opportunity to move, and an obligation to move!

As per social exchange, you can even think of it in financial terms: high-value women who invest want to see a return on their investment. If you don't remunerate their investment they'll eventually take their assets to a better asset manager.

Let's see an example:

⍰ Matching Her Investment

When she invests, you can drop the games and focus on moving forward.
Indeed, moving forward is the best reward you can give her, and the most effective approach to dating.

So I ask something I can reward her on, I find a commonality to make it smooth, and I propose to meet. And, as expected, she agrees.

3. Showing Interest (VS Getting Interest)

Interest is romantic or sexual interest towards someone

Dating Strategy

1. Avoid showing more interest than her, because that's disempowering and loses attraction (negative balance of power)
2. Entice her to show more interest than you show, because that's empowering and attractive (positive balance of power)
   - … But balance and use her "indicators of interest" to escalate
3. Use conditional appreciation when she passes your screens or brags ⍰

Plus:

⍰Beginners show more romantic interest to avoid the 'friend zone'

4. Qualifying Yourself (VS Screening)

Generally speaking:

And when you screen you have power and control.
When you qualify you're proving yourself and chasing.

Dating Strategy

1. Avoid proving yourself to her, it's disempowering and loses attraction (negative balance of power)
2. Screen her and make her prove to you, because that's empowering and attractive (positive balance of power)
3. Reward her when she passes your screens

⍰⍰ From Qualifying to Screening

This is a perfect exchange to show the dynamics of screening and qualifying.
Starting from the very first message (in her profile she says she loves cats):

Let's analyze the dynamics:

1. Screens me
2. Qualifies ♟ with new thread <— Avoids saying 'no' that may kill the interaction, BUT
3. Semi-disqualifies after <— To maintain power & lead. ♟ I add 'apartment cats' to set up the freedom & animal welfare frame
4. Asks for more
5. High-value rationale
   - + Ethical rationale for 'moral leadership'
6. Screens her back

Remember the law of balance though.
It becomes a red flag when she over-invests this much:

And it turned out a reliable red flag.

So, generally speaking, when a woman screens you you want to qualify just enough not to break rapport, AND turn it around smoothly -see Seduction University for "smoothly"-.

Hoops: The Extreme Version of "Screening"

Hoops are extreme versions of screening.

And "jumping through hoops" is the extreme version of qualifying.

When you jump through hoops you lose massive amount of power -and attraction-.
One single jump through a hoop might be enough to turn you into a simp.

We have an example in one of the dating articles for women on what NOT to do:

"Impress me", LOL :).
I hadn't started TPM back then, but you don't even need TPM with such obvious (nasty) power moves.

P.S.:
For the record, my answer wasn't effective if I wanted to date her.
But after that power move, I wasn't into dating her anymore.

5. Power & Warmth (VS Power OR Warmth)

The men's dating literature calls this dichotomy "value – comfort".

Here at TPM we apply a similar, science-based concept to all socialization.
And we call it "power and warmth".

It works like this:

- Power = she sees you as "more than her" -smarter, stronger, more dominant, more emotionally grounded, etc. etc., and she is attracted -but might still not follow you!-
- Warmth = she trusts you, feels comfortable, feels similar, feels appreciated -she is also ready and willing to be seduced, alone, and intimate with you-

Too much warmth without any power at all and you're a doormat.
Women aren't exactly attracted to doormats.

Too much power without warmth though and she might resist her own attraction. High-power women can feel like being intimate is disempowering, like a personal loss.
More feminine women are "wary" about you, don't like you, or don't see a future with you.
And since many women are risk-averse, many will not go home with you -or will not come out to meet you-.

We share real-life examples of the perfect mix in Seduction University.

⍰ Losing Her For Lacking Warmth

> Her: I'm a little bit scared (to meet you)

In the end, fear got the best of her and she never came out to meet me.
There is only so much you can salvage by text.

⍰⍰ Ensure she feels safe, or you'll only date risk-takers -who are less likely to stay loyal.

Calibrating Power & Warmth

Higher Power	Warmer
You're a 'nice guy'	You're intimidating
Social circle	Cold approaches (especially at night / in isolated environments)
Party girl / experienced / risk taker / confident / career woman	Shy / inexperienced / risk averse / young / home-church type

Kind VS 'Bad Boy'

Virtually all evolutionary psychology research surveys show that women highly value kindness.

And then we have the common trope that women really want 'bad boys'.

How do we reconcile that?

The bad boy's rudeness is one way to demonstrate disinterest and power.

The game of rudeness is:

> I'm rude because I'm not interested in you, and because I'm powerful enough that I can allow myself to have you as an enemy

The reason why some men are attracted to the "asshole strategy" is because of the power it entails.

There are times and places for rude.
For example, with rude women.

However, generally speaking, the upside of this approach is limited.
As we've seen, many women write the 'disinterested bad boy' off pretty quick. And mercurial attraction based on disinsterest are very fast to dissolve.
So, in general, you can do better than rude & asshole.

The "asshole game" also easily ends up in the "disempowering red zone" of our straight-line seduction model.

Also related to power and attraction:

- Strategy beats power
- Why 'alpha male dating' is costing you

SUMMARY

This post showed you the basics of dating power dynamics.

Women love higher-power men who make them chase, invest, and follow their lead.

That's why we advice for a positive balance of power.

However, as we've seen, you don't want to overdo it because:

1. It's more effective to use power, then to hoard it: think of dating power as fuel. Unless you use it, it weighs you down -and it's a fire hazard-. Use it to race forward.
2. Pull her up to your high level: or she will think you're unavailable, and write you off. Men who push women down make for toxic relationships that high-quality women reject

The best mindset and approach is to:

1. Become a high-value man women want to invest in
2. Date high power
3. Use that power for win-win, and move the interaction forward

You know you're at the elite level when your way to repay her investment is to escalate towards intimacy.

Key Takeaways

- Different people fall over a continuum of give and take
- Givers and takers are on opposite sides of that continuum
- People prefer, like, and support givers, and dislike (and can undermine as frenemies) the takers
- Different types of givers are on opposite ends of personal success: either winners, or losers
- Winning givers are power-aware and can be more strategic, assertive, or high-power

This is the same we often said on this website and the same concepts over which we base several of our foundational strategies in Power University.

Notes

About the Author:
Adam Grant is an organizational psychologist, author, and professor at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania.
He also dabbled in the sociology of power dynamics with “Power Moves“, a book that he wrote while observing the power players at the Davos Economic Forum.

1. People differ in their inclinations to either give or take

Adam Grant says that “social scientists have discovered that people differ dramatically in their desired mix of taking and giving” (Miles et al., 1989).

In the psychological literature, they’re sometimes referred to as “reciprocity preferences”.
In common parlance, we can call it a predisposition towards taking or giving.

The reciprocity can be thought of as on a continuum:

Note: the colors don't reflect what's "better". Being a giver can be naive at times. The colors are seen from the point of view of "contributions" to an imaginary whole
In brief:

- Givers: prefer to give more than they get
- Matchers: preserve an equal balance of giving and taking -they're the majority-
- Takers: prefer like to get more than they give

Grant says that takers self-promote and make sure they get plenty of credit for their efforts. The "garden-variety takers" aren't cruel but more like cautious and self-protective.

TPM Note:
On TPM we believe self-promotion when you're not getting your due credit or making sure people know the value you bring doesn't make you a taker, but it's just smart and sensible behavior.
We call it "fair value marketing".

It's not just about behaviors and putting one's own interests first, but also about mindsets.
Takers believe that the world is a competitive, dog-eat-dog place.
And they tend to place a high premium on independence. If they depend too much on others, takers believe, they'll be vulnerable to being outdone. It's not difficult for takers to think of themselves as separate, because they tend to see themselves as superior to and separate from others.

TPM Note: individualism is not necessarily bad and collectivism is often poor
A certain degree of separateness is a good thing and does not have to harm collaboration.
Also see: enlightened individualism.

Matchers instead believe and operate on the principle of fairness: when they help others, they protect themselves by seeking reciprocity.
If you're a matcher, you believe in tit for tat, and in functional exchanges, you prefer your relationships to be an even exchange of favors.

While takers put themselves above other people's needs, givers are other-focused, paying more attention to what other people need from them.
Givers also reject the notion that interdependence is weak and appreciate interdependence. Givers are more likely to see interdependence as a source of strength, a way to harness the skills of multiple people for the greater good.

Social Exchange Calculations: How Givers and Takers Calculate Differently

Here on TPM we say that everyone runs a subconscious "accounting" of value exchanges.

As a matter of fact, we promote here a conscious approach towards value exchanges.

And indeed Adam Grant confirms the same… With a small exception.
"Give and Take" says that some givers might not think of the personal costs at all. However, many "selfless givers" do run some calculations.

It's just that givers run a calculation that differs in nature from takers and matchers.
Grant says that if you're a giver, you help whenever the benefits to others exceed the personal costs.

While if you're a taker, you help others strategically, when the benefits to you outweigh the personal costs.

Closer relationships are more giver-based

According to research by Yale psychologist Margaret Clark, most people act like givers in close relationships.

Here at TPM we say that's indeed possible and that those are the best relationships.
However, we place a healthy amount of emphasis on that "most", plus we look for specific situations when a value-taking attitude might crop up, and we learn how to address it and stamp it out -lest it grows like poison ivy-.

So, in good part, the reciprocity style of choice depends on the context and relationship.
Adam Grant makes the care that there is no point in keeping the giver style for close relationships only, and that people could probably do more and succeed more by extending that "giver approach".

2. Givers are at the bottom... And at the top

Says Grant:

> Research demonstrates that givers sink to the bottom of the success ladder

Givers are at a disadvantage because they make others better off but sacrifice their own success in the process.

It's important to note though that Grant focuses on the workplace, albeit we can probably say that the workplace is a good proxy of at least financial success.
The research is:

- Givers are poor engineers at work (Francis J. Flynn, 2017) The least productive and effective engineers are givers. In one study 161 professional engineers in California rated one another and the least successful engineers were those who gave more than they received. These givers had the worst objective scores for number of tasks, technical reports, drawings completed, errors made, deadlines missed, and money wasted.
  Going out of their way to help others prevented them from getting their own work done.
- Givers get poor grades in med School (Lievens et al. 2009), : In a study of 627 medical students in Belgium, the students with the lowest grades had very high scores on giver statements like "I love to help others" and "I anticipate the needs of others." The givers went out of their way to help their peers study, sharing what they already knew at the expense of filling gaps in their own knowledge, and it gave their peers a leg up at test time.
- Givers sell less (Grant & Barnes, "Predicting Sales Revenue", working paper, 2011) Givers brought in two and a half times less annual sales revenue. Givers were too concerned about what was best for their customer to sell aggressively enough

And there's even evidence that compared with takers, on average, givers earn 14 percent less money, have twice the risk of becoming victims of crimes, and are judged as 22 percent less powerful and dominant.

Grant says that the givers are also at the top, though:

> But when we look at the engineers with the highest productivity, the evidence shows that they're givers too. (…)
> The worst performers and the best performers are givers; takers and matchers are more likely to land in the middle.

- The California engineers with the best objective scores for quantity and quality of results are those who consistently give more to their colleagues than they get.

- The Belgian medical students with the lowest grades have unusually high giver scores, but so do the students with the highest grades. Over the course of medical school, being a giver accounts for 11 percent higher grades.
- The least productive salespeople had 25 percent higher giver scores than average performers—but so did the most productive salespeople. The top performers were givers, and they averaged 50 percent more annual revenue than the takers and matchers

Grant says that "across occupations, if you examine the link between reciprocity styles and success, the givers are more likely to become champs—not only chumps".

TPM Note: How about those other studies showing givers as victims and more submissive?
Albeit Grant might romance it a bit, these are remarkable studies that he brought to our attention and that show the power of collaboration.
But there are 3 studies missing on this "giver turnaround". How about those studies showing that givers are more likely to be victimized and are judged not as dominant?

3. Givers enjoy many life-advantages: success, social networks, happiness, & more

Among the advantages:

Winning givers create circles of winners

Grant says that givers, takers, and matchers all can—and do—achieve success.

But there's something distinctive that happens when givers succeed: it spreads and cascades.

When takers win, there's usually someone else who loses.
But when givers win, a virtuous circle starts that lifts the people around the successful givers.

Givers make friends and allies

Grant says that when givers win, people are rooting for them and supporting them, rather than gunning for them.

And this is a good quote for some of our basic success strategies here on TPM:

> As the venture capitalist Randy Komisar remarks, "It's easier to win if everybody wants you to win. If you don't make enemies out there, it's easier to succeed."

Giving also provides givers with people who offer help in exchange for the givers' past giving, honest willingness to help, for their great reputation, or for wanting to be in their networks.
Says Grant referring to one of his givers' examples who "magically" had doors opened for him:

> These karmic moments can often be traced to the fact that matchers are on a mission to make them happen. Just as matchers will sacrifice their own interests to punish takers who act selfishly toward others, they'll go out of their way to reward givers who act generously toward others.

Givers avoid making enemies and frenemies

Says Grant:

> One study found that highly talented people tend to make others jealous.
> But if talented people are givers, they no longer have a target on their backs. Instead, givers are appreciated for their contributions.

Givers' success grows over time as their reputation grows

Part of the givers' success is in the social capital they build, including social credits, trust, and goodwill.

And that means that when they keep interacting in the same environment and the same people, their success also grows.
This seems to be backed by the data. Says Grant:

> In fact, you'll see that in sales and medical school, the giver advantage grows over time

So giving can be seen as harvesting and reaping rewards, a long-term winning game.

Chip Conley, the entrepreneur who founded Joie de Vivre Hotels, says that "Being a giver is not good for a 100-yard dash, but it's valuable in a marathon."

Givers have an advantage in the digital age of open reputation?

I've heard this more than once:

As the world becomes more connected and information flows, givers have an even bigger advantage.

Conley believes today's connected world makes relationships and reputations more visible, and that allows givers to accelerate their pace of trust-building.
More informal background checks are also possible with mutual connections, and mutual connections are much more obvious with social networks.

Grant also says that as we organize more people into teams, givers have more opportunities to demonstrate their value.
And as we move away from factories and service jobs, the relationship-based services make giving all the more profitable.

TPM Note: True, but there's the other side of the coin
The internet also offers more anonymity and the ability to rip off many people at once, and then disappear.
A few of the guys who show up at TPM are looking for "dark psychology to seduce", to sell, or to persuade. And some of them bought courses purporting to sell "manipulation techniques" to bend other people's minds. That's value-taking marketing-manipulation that the Internet made far easier.

Plus, plenty of great takers' schemes isn't even recognized as taking from the flocks of naive sheep.
Take for example the various newly minted bitcoin coins, or the various NFTs.
The sheep drink from their gurus and many of said gurus suffer little or no consequences.

Givers have an easier time developing great networks

Givers develop better networks because they:

- Develop more social capital
- Develop better reputation
- People are happy to see givers succeed, even when they haven't "transacted with them"
- Develop strongers networks around them. A study shows that giving is contagious and, especially when it's distinctive and consistent, establishes a pattern that shifts other people's reciprocity styles within a group
- Have an easier time asking for favors because they are themselves are more likely to help without past exchanges

Givers are happier (and healthier?)

Supporting evidence includes:

- Research shows that if people start volunteering two hours a week, their happiness, satisfaction, and self-esteem go up a year later
- American adults who volunteered at least one hundred hours in 1998 were more likely to be alive in 2000

And if happiness isn't enough:

- Givers have a strong sense of life meaning (Baumeister et al., 2013)

There might be a cap on giving and happiness though:

- Australian adults who volunteered between one hundred and eight hundred hours per year were happier and more satisfied with their lives than those who volunteered fewer than one hundred or more than eight hundred hours annually

Grant doesn't say why, but it might be either because of burnout, or because those givers didn't have anything else in their lives.

The key to give a lot but avoiding burning out is to be an "otherish giver" -see later-, and also take care of oneself, as well as to grow comfortable in asking for help.

Givers perform better in complex negotiation (enlightned givers, at least)

First, a caveat:

Grant seems to be talking about more complex negotiation, where the pie isn't fixed and where communication and thought-through and strategic approaches can find more routes to win-win solutions.

And second, it's not all givers who do better in negotiation, it's what Grant calls "otherish givers", and what we'd call here "enlightened collaborators".

Now with those caveats, this is what Grant says, based on a meta-analysis of 28 different studies:

> The best negotiators weren't takers or selfless givers.
> The takers focused on claiming value: they saw negotiations as zero-sum, win-lose contests and didn't trust their opponents, so they bargained aggressively, overlooking opportunities to create value through developing an understanding of their counterparts' interests. The selfless givers made too many concessions, benefiting their counterparts at a personal cost. The most effective negotiators were otherish (ie.: the "enlightened givers"): they reported high concern for their own interests and high concern for their counterparts' interests.

This is because the enlightened givers looked for opportunities considering BOTH their own interests and the other party's interest and so they found more win-win and pie-expanding solutions that others missed.
Such as, these "strategic givers" created more value than they were then able to negotiate and split.

More advantages:

Some more advantages disseminated in "Give and Take":

- Earn a "pass" for being "different": groups generally prefer people who conform. But psychologist Edwin Hollander argued that givers "earn idiosyncrasy credits" -basically, what we call credits and debits-. Matchers then grant them a license to deviate from a group's norms or expectations
- Get more attention and support when proposing difficult ideas: research shows that when takers present "dangerous" ideas, others are skeptical. But when givers propose potentially threatening ideas, others listened and rewarded them for speaking up
- Giving leaders foster environments with more innovation: research by Harvard professor Amy Edmondson shows that "psychologically safe environments" foster more learning and innovation. Research shows that it's givers who often create such an environment

- Giving leaders believe and trust their team more, which leads to better performance and results: an exhaustive analysis of seventeen different studies with nearly three thousand employees in a wide range of work organizations shows that when managers were randomly assigned to see employees as bloomers, employees bloomed. And givers are more likely to treat people as if they had the potential to bloom
  Takers instead do the opposite: Research shows that takers harbor doubts about others' intentions, so they monitor vigilantly and treat others with suspicion and distrust. These low expectations trigger a vicious cycle and demotivates people
  Matchers instead "wait" for signs of potential and miss out on opportunities to develop people who don't show early sparks of talent
- Are more empathic, better put themselves in other people's shoes, and can better assess their WIIFT: most people who try to put themselves into other people's shows actually remain stuck within their own mindsets and preferences. Givers instead are better able to truly see other people's point of view from their perspectives
- Are more able to cut losses: Research shows that people stick with bad investments only in part because of "sunk costs" as it's often believed. Instead, the single most powerful factor is ego threat: if I don't keep investing, I'll look and feel like a fool. Due to their susceptibility to ego threat, takers are more vulnerable to escalation of commitment than givers (see for example, Moon, 2001)
- Have a natural "antifragile ego": in one research givers more easily accepted the criticism and followed the suggestion. This also makes sense if we consider that takers tend to have a bigger ego

4. If giving is so good, what stops it? Culture and fear, says Grant

TPM Note: probably not culture
Culture might have something to do with it, but I don't think it's a major factor or we should see cultures where everyone is a giver

Grant says that culture and fear of being screwed over stymie giving in ourselves and in our culture.

When it comes to culture, he says:

> We may love Shel Silverstein for our kids, but the popularity of books like Robert Greene's The 48 Laws of Power—not to mention the fascination of many business gurus with Sun Tzu's The Art of War—suggests that we don't see much room for giver values in our professional lives. As a result, even people who operate like givers at work are often afraid to admit it.

And when it comes to fear, he says:

> The fear of exploitation by takers is so pervasive, writes the Cornell economist Robert Frank, that "by encouraging us to expect the worst in others it brings out the worst in us: dreading the role of the chump, we are often loath to heed our nobler instincts."

This is also something we repeat often here on TPM.
In "Enlightened Cynicism" we say that it's actually good to assess others, think like a cynic, and protect ourselves in various forms. However, we also say that it's imperative that you don't let cynicism blind you to the possibility, benefits, and beauty of collaboration and win-wins.

5. Watch out for "fake givers"

Says Grant:

> To avoid getting shut out, many takers become good fakers, acting generously so that they can waltz into our networks disguised as givers or matchers.

Eventually though, chances are that you'll get to see the real face of takers.

Grant indirectly confirms something we say often here. Such as, you can only assess people's true character when they are power-up:

> Research shows that as people gain power, they feel large and in charge: less constrained and freer to express their natural tendencies. As takers gain power, they pay less attention to how they're perceived by those below and next to them; they feel entitled to pursue self-serving goals and claim as much value as they can.

TPM note: the same research shows that when givers gain power, they're socially responsible
The same research Grant quote says that when "communals" are power-primed, they responded in socially responsible ways.

However, that also comes at a cost:

6. There are costs to being a taker, including...

There are many costs associated with being a taker, including:

- The "true face" eventually shows" in close relationships and daily exchanges

Continuing from above, with takers who ignore those around and below them when they acquire power:

Over time, treating peers and subordinates poorly jeopardizes relationships and reputations. After all, most people are matchers and they value fairness, equality, and reciprocity.
And you know what happens when you burn bridges and then you may need those bridges again.

We also have our own (funny) data to back that up here.
Look what's one of the quickest-growing keywords people use to end up on TPM:

Antagonistic searches are very popular

- Bad reputation through gossip

And new research shows that when people get burned by takers in social networks, they punish them by sharing reputational information -"gossip"-.

- Lower status within groups

Stanford professor Frank Flynn asked a group of engineers to rate the status of ten other engineers. The takers had the lowest status because they burned bridges by constantly asking for favors but rarely reciprocating.
The givers had the highest status, outdoing the matchers and takers.

TPM Note: 10 people is too low to draw larger conclusions based on the date, but this just makes plain sense

7. But there are also risks to being a giver, including...

Adam Grant gives some space to the risks of being a giver, but not nearly enough in my opinion.

So here they are for you, simple and clear:

- Givers without self-care and self-interest do NOT succeed: succeessful giving must be accompanied by self-interest as well
- Naive givers can be ripped off by takers: in the last chapter Grand finally gives us some examples of givers who've been taken advantage by takers

Says Grant:

> In one study, researchers tracked whether Americans had been victims of crimes such as fraud, con games, and identity theft. The givers were twice as likely to be victimized as the takers, often as a direct result of trusting takers.
> (…)
> Successful givers need to know who's likely to manipulate them so that they can protect themselves

- A giver's attitude without the ability to ask can lead to burnout
- Giving that is not strategic and thought-through can also be ineffective

Also, this is important and probably needed more space in "Give and Take":

Keep in mind: successful giving is context-dependent and won't work in win-lose situations

Grant says that in purely zero-sum situations and win-lose interactions, giving rarely pays off.

BUT…

He also adds, correctly in our opinion, that most of life isn't zero-sum.
Grant says that, on balance, people who choose giving as their primary reciprocity style end up reaping rewards - albeit, we add on TPM, it can't be "naive giving"-.

8. When it comes to persuasion & influence, be like water

TPM Note:
albeit Grant seems to promote the giver/lower-power approach we disagree. Sometimes higher power is better. And nothing beats a tailored approach
The chapter felt like the author wanted to show us that "powerless communication" was "superior". In truth, it's not. It's circumstantial, and there are times when high power, assertive, or even dominant or aggressive communication are more effective.

Grant dedicates a whole chapter to influence and persuasion.

He starts with the research on status and influence comparing prestige and dominance.

Says the author (redacted for brevity):

> Takers are attracted to, and excel in, gaining dominance.
> (…) To establish dominance, takers specialize in powerful communication: they speak forcefully, raise their voices, express certainty to project confidence, promote their accomplishments, and sell with conviction and pride. They spread their arms in dominant poses, raise their eyebrows in challenge, command physical space, and get angry and issue threats when necessary.
> In the quest for influence, takers set the tone and control the conversation by sending powerful verbal and nonverbal signals. As a result, takers tend to be much more effective than givers in gaining dominance.

However, Grant says that dominance isn't always the most effective at persuading people.

Dominance is not as effective when the audience is skeptical.
And it's not as effective because dominance is zero-sum. If the taker is dominant, then the audience must lose power.
Grant makes a good point and on TPM we expanded on these dynamics quite a bit. The issue with dominance is that it's power-taking, and it works less well with high-power people because high-power people don't like and appreciate being disempowered.

Also see:

- Social power dynamics

https://thepowermoves.com/social-power-dynamics
Instead, prestige isn't zero zum.

In one study takers also persuaded by coming across as competent, including when they had little competence.

Givers Persuade With "Powerless Communication"

Givers tend to speak lower power, an approach Grant calls "powerless communication":

> Powerless communicators tend to speak less assertively, expressing plenty of doubt and relying heavily on advice from others. They talk in ways that signal vulnerability, revealing their weaknesses and making use of disclaimers, hedges, and hesitations.

And Adam Grant says there are situations in which powerless communication is more effective, including:

- When you work closely together: as based on Fragale's study
- With employees who are proactive and motivated: in which case you need less dominance and more power protecting and respect to get the most out of people (one study instead showed that dominance discouraged employees from contributing)
- When you lack authority: then more indirect and lower dominance approaches such as questions and advice-seeking are more effective

Of course, you also must be careful not to overdo the "powerless communication", as Grant himself says that you don't want to become a pushover or doormat.

9. The Caveat: Successful Givers Pursue BOTH Giving and Personal Interest

Finally, in the last chapter, we get to the truth.

I feel Adam Grant waited far too long to drop the most important caveat of givers' success:

Successful givers care BOTH about others AND their personal success.
They seek to give but ALSO give strategically.

In a series of studies Adam Grant consistently found out that self-interest and other-interest are completely independent motivations: you can have both of them at the same time.
Put it in a chart:

From "Give and Take" by Adam Grant, colored boxes have been added
Quoting the author (redacted for brevity):

> Takers score high in self-interest and low in other-interest: they aim to maximize their own success without much concern for other people. By contrast, givers always score high on other-interest, but they vary in self-interest.
> There are two types of givers, and they have dramatically different success rates.
> Selfless givers have high other-interest and low self-interest. They give their time and energy without regard > for their own needs, and they pay a price for it. Selfless giving is a form of pathological altruism.

> (Instead) Being otherish (ie.: the successful givers) means being willing to give more than you receive, but still keeping your own interests in sight, using them as a guide for choosing when, where, how, and to whom you give.

Basically, this is the "enlightened collaborator" of this website.
And it's the theory, approach, and strategy that we've been advising on TPM and Power University.

Successful givers must become "enlightened givers"

And enlightened means, at times, more calculative and positively cynical about humans' potential of being exploitative.

Says Grant:

> As the psychologist Brian Little puts it, even if a style like giving is our first nature, our ability to prosper depends on developing enough comfort with a matching approach that it becomes second nature.

Successful givers, says Grant, carefully scan their environments for potential takers, and they can move from unconditional giving, to a more calculative tit for tat.
Successful givers can also "draw from reserves to assertiveness" to demand what's fair, stand their ground, or push back against exploitative takers.

Basically:

Successful givers are power-awaken.

> Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

Adam Grant though says that you don't want to become a giver whose only goal is to get, as that would backfire long-term.
Instead, he suggests to give in a way that you find enjoyable, to recipients that you care about.

Selfless Givers Are Losers

The title is TPM and not Grant's words.

Selfless givers instead give randomly, sometimes sacrificing their own work and life, and that impacts their own performance and life.
Some selfless givers often give without an idea of how to have the most impact with their giving, so they also make little difference.
And they're at risk of burning out, especially when they see no feedback on the impact of their giving.

MORE WISDOM

- The best networks have strong ties, weak ties, and dormant ties

On weak and strong ties:

> Strong ties provide bonds, but weak ties serve as bridges: they provide more efficient access to new information. Our strong ties tend to travel in the same social circles and know about the same opportunities as we do. Weak ties are more likely to open up access to a different network, facilitating the discovery of original leads.

And on dormant ties:

> Dormant ties offer the access to novel information that weak ties afford, but without the discomfort.

- Matchers have smaller networks

> Matchers tend to build smaller networks than either givers, who seek actively to help a wider range of people, or takers, who often find themselves expanding their networks to compensate for bridges burned in previous transactions.

- Giving is contagious

One study found that giving spreads rapidly and widely across social networks.

> When the groups included one consistent giver, the other members contributed more. The presence of a single giver was enough to establish a norm of giving.

- Group dynamics influence the overall amount of giving: common ground, a shared identity, identification with the group, they all influence members' giving
- Unique* similarities are particularly effective in fostering shared identities: "the more rare a group, value, interest, skill, or experience is, the more likely it is to facilitate a bond". People are also happier in groups that provide a sense of both inclusion and uniqueness ("optimal distinctiveness", Brewer, 2007)
- Research suggests that givers have an instinctive advantage in sincerity screening
- Givers, especially agreeable givers, lose out in negotiation: Studies show that in zero-sum situations, givers frequently shy away from advocating for their own interests: they make more modest requests when negotiating salaries than matchers and takers, and end up accepting less favorable outcomes
- Public pledges backfire, because they offer the public credit, without the need for the accompanying behavior (Gollwitzer et al., 2009)
  - Private pledges might backfire too, because we can get to feel good, without the action (Sachdeva, 2009). Furthermore, pledges seek to change behavior by changing the identity first. But changing behavior first is more effective

Real-Life Applications

In this section we turn some of the wisdom into "practical applications":

Assess The Givers & Takers In Your Life

Too many people fail this simple test.

Harvard students correctly expect that friends pass more tokens than strangers.
But they do not expect more tokens from generous friends compared to selfish friends.

Such as, these supposedly smart guys did not know who are the givers and takers in their own social networks.

One common mistake is that we tend to stereotype agreeable people as givers, and disagreeable people as takers. But giving and taking are based on motives and values, and they're independent on whether our personalities trend towards agreeable or disagreeable.

How to Spot Givers & Takers

You generally want more givers or matchers around you, and you want to be more cautious with the takers.

To do that, you must learn to recognize givers and takres first.

Here are some tips:

Look for narcissistic signs

Grant says that ordinary people can identify takers just by looking at their Facebook profiles.

And, it seems, Adam Grant points to signs of narcissism to spot takers.
One study asked people to fill out a survey measuring whether they were takers. Then, the psychologists sent strangers to visit their Facebook pages. The strangers were able to detect the takers with astonishing accuracy.

The cues were:

- Information that was self-promoting, self-absorbed and self-important
- Boastful and arrogant quotes
- More Facebook friends (the author says "racking up superficial connections so they could advertise their accomplishments and stay in touch to get favors")
- Vainer, more flattering pictures of themselves

Look for narcissism in your superiors (ie.: how to spot a taker CEO)

How do you spot a CEO who's a taker?

Well, there is a popular study by Arijit Chatterjee and Donald Hambrick aptly called "It's All About Me: Narcissistic Chief Executive Officers and Their Effects on Company Strategy and Performance".

They analyzed 111 CEO and their companies' annual reports over more than a decade, looking for signs of ostentatious displays ("lekking").
They were looking for narcissists rather than takers, but Grant labels them as takers.
Here are the cues.

- They use more first-person singular pronouns

They found several clues of takers lekking at the top. One signal appeared in CEO interviews. Since takers tend to be self-absorbed, they're more likely to use first-person singular pronouns like I, me, mine, my, and myself—versus first-person plural pronouns like we, us, our, ours, and ourselves.

- They earn more

Another signal was compensation: the taker CEOs earned far more money than other senior executives in their companies.

- They use bigger pictures of themselves

When Chatterjee and Hambrick looked at the annual reports from the computer companies, they noticed dramatic differences in the prominence of the CEO's image. In some annual reports, the CEO wasn't pictured at all. In other reports, there was a full-page photo of the CEO alone. Guess which one is the taker? For the taker CEOs, it was all about me. A big photo is self-glorifying, sending a clear message: "I am the central figure in this company."

Leaders: hire givers & foster a giving culture

The reasons are two-fold:

1. Givers spread a giving attitude, which is great for the team
2. Givers work harder: Grant says there's a close connection between grit and giving. In his research, because of their dedication to others, givers work harder and longer than takers and matchers. Even when practice is no longer enjoyable, givers continue exerting effort
3. Givers are naturally team-oriented

Writes Grant:

> This is a defining feature of how givers collaborate: they take on the tasks that are in the group's best interest, not necessarily their own personal interests. This makes their groups better off: studies show that on average, from sales teams to paper mill crews to restaurants, the more giving group members do, the higher the quantity and quality of their groups' products and services.

And remove -or watch out- for the takers

Takers do what's best for them, even if it costs the team.

For example, they will waste resources throwing good money after bad if that helps them hide the responsibility for a mistake -even if they know it's wasteful-.

Says Grant:

> Because escalating his or her commitment allows the decision maker to keep the prospect of failure hidden, such behavior is personally "rational" from the perspective of a taker.

Spread a culture of giving

As social animals, individuals' behaviors are heavily influenced by the group.

When giving seems to be the norm, people give more, they get back more, they are happier, and giving becomes a feature of the group -potentially, even a reason to be proud of belonging to that giving group-.

A great way to foster giving is by rewarding it, and making it public. Making it public, in a way, makes giving rational even for selfish individuals.
This is really powerful stuff: while givers would givers anyway, it's matchers' and takers' behavior that changes. As shown in "reciprocity rings" even takers give in a giving group.

And the opposite is true: if taking becomes the norm, people shy away from giving and they focus more on taking, and "what's in it for them".

Says Grant:

> If many people personally believe in giving, but assume that others don't, the whole norm in a group or a company can shift away from giving.

More real-life applications

- To avoid thinking you've "done more", list what others have done: most people tend to over-estimate what they've done. Givers don't. To avoid falling for this mental trap, make a list of what others and/or your partner have contributed
- Don't outshine the taker: when takers are impressed by another person's capabilities or motivation, they're more likely to see this person as a threat, which means they're less willing to support and develop him or her.

Don't over-use the "reciprocity approach", it feels manipulative

The reciprocity norm has been made popular by Cialdini.

It means that when you give something, people feel indebted to give back, so you can give something just with the intention of getting something back later.

Grant says that reciprocity is powerful, but it comes with two heavy downsides:

1. You make people feel like you're manipulating them, they feel that you're not genuine, and that you're there only as part of Machiavellian strategic plots in which they're just a pawn
2. You grow smaller and lower quality networks when you only focus on immediate gains and transacting only when you can get something

QUOTES

On making friends, not enemies:

> As the venture capitalist Randy Komisar remarks, "It's easier to win if everybody wants you to win. If you > don't make enemies out there, it's easier to succeed."

On the importance of strategic giving:

> Success involves more than just capitalizing on the strengths of giving; it also requires avoiding the pitfalls.

On the "otherish" construct and concept:

> As Bill Gates argued at the World Economic Forum, "there are two great forces of human nature: self-interest, and caring for others," and people are most successful when they are driven by a "hybrid engine" of the two.

Criticism

Let me preface this section:

"Give and Take" is great.

It will probably become one of TPM's foundational books & resources.

And, as it's often the case, we analyze and delve especially hard and deep on the best books -the "OK" and poor ones don't justify that much investment-.

Is "Give and Take" biased? Success is collaboration and win-win, not just "giving"

Let me preface this first:

1. I haven't checked all the studies myself
2. Overall, I think that Adam Grant does a good job at presenting evidence to back up his claims (rather than just his preference)
3. Overall, I feel that his theory is good -except we should stress even more that it's not just givers who win, but selective givers who also get back-

That being said, I felt there is some embellishment to make the case for "giving = winning".
It feels like sometimes Grant even states it outright. He says:

> In this book, I want to persuade you that we underestimate the success of givers like David Hornik.

Maybe he meant "persuading you with the evidence" or "persuading you with the truth".
Still, he might have wanted to be more careful.
I don't want to be persuaded of anything, I want to know the truth and what works.

In another passage, he says:

> In this chapter, my aim is to challenge traditional assumptions about the importance of assertiveness and projecting confidence in gaining influence.

I think he's right: assertiveness and confidence to persuade may be overblown indeed.
Still, when you want to challenge something, an almost obvious consequence is that your approach will be biased towards your challenging proposition.

The “giving is winning” bias under-represents the importance of strategy, situation, and, sometimes, matching

Large portions of the book show examples and evidence for “giving = winning”.

Only in the last section we get to learn that the givers who win are strategic.

And Grant does present exceptions to giving=winning, and he does list some examples of successful takers. However, they are mentioned quickly and the main narrative seems to favor giving.

Instead, it’s important to remember that:

- There are win-lose situations in which giving doesn’t make you better off
- Takers can take advantage of you
- Which style is “superior” depends also on the people you deal, and the situation

Grant says so himself:

> As the psychologist Brian Little puts it, even if a style like giving is our first nature, our ability to prosper depends on developing enough comfort with a matching approach that it becomes second nature.

It’s a pity that Grant quotes Brian Little, but then fails to expand on the importance of being a matcher.

Some studies didn’t add up

In the study of engineers, this is what the paper says:

> (…) an employee’s level of productivity significantly increased as favor exchanges with other employees became more balanced (as other employees believed the focal employee gave as much as he or she received), although a minimal level of generosity appeared to be most strongly related to productivity.

The authors refer to increased productivity as exchanges increased, not just “giving”. The giving was being matched by other people’s giving.

And this is the curve for “The Interactive Effect of Perceived Imbalance in and Frequency of Favor Exchange on Productivity”:

From Flynn, 2003
The curve refers to favors exchanges, not just giving.

Some supporting evidence was correlation, rather than causation

Says Grant:

> In another study, American adults who volunteered at least one hundred hours in 1998 were more likely to be alive in 2000.

But that is no proof that volunteering is the ingredient that makes people live longer.

And again:

As expected, higher income led to higher giving. For every $1 in extra income, charitable giving went up by $0.14.* But something much more interesting happened. For every $1 in extra charitable giving, income was $3.75 higher. Giving actually seemed to make people richer.

This is just silly.
Maybe the givers expected to earn more in the future ant thus gave more freely.

Some more studies-related doubts

- Some studies have been selectively ignored

Grant references that givers have more meaning in life, but conveniently omits that the same study found that takers are happier -while he presents plenty of studies showing that givers are happier-.
I quote the study:

> Happiness was linked to being a taker rather than a giver, whereas meaningfulness went with being a giver rather than a taker.

- Sometimes present individual studies as unquestioned truths

Grant for example says "social scientists have discovered that", and then he links to one study.

- Some slight contradictions or over-generalizations

In one passage, the author says "extensive research reveals that people who give their time and knowledge regularly to help their colleagues end up earning more raises and promotions in a wide range of settings".
But then again, the rest of the book shows that givers are also at the bottom, so that just feels like an untrue over-generalization.

- Some bad and wrong pop-psychology, including the 10.000 hours

I was surprised to see this:

> As Malcolm Gladwell showed us in Outliers, research led by psychologist Anders Ericsson reveals that attaining expertise in a domain typically requires ten thousand hours of deliberate practice.

That's really misleading pop-psychology.
Also see:

> 13 Self-Help BS & Myths: Updated List (Plus, Fixes)

"Grit" was also in there, albeit as Jordan Peterson said, "grit" might simply be part of "conscientiousness".
Grant says that "givers strive to cultivate girt in the first place", which wasn't supported by much data and that seems quite random to me.

Quoting Gladwell again in “Blink” as well as Susan Cain and Daniel Pink also felt over-relying on pop psychology (P.S.: talking about “give and take”, Cain and Pink are in the list of people who endorsed the book).

- Some information contradicted each other

“Give and Take” presents some information that seems to contradict each other.
For example, one study on salary negotiations says that givers tend to lose out in negotiation. But then Grant says that otherish givers do better in negotiation.

The two aren’t necessarily contradictory actually because the first study was more of a case of win-lose and it was agreeable givers who lost the most.
And negotiations in general can make the overall pie bigger.
However, Grant should have explained that -lest a nitpicker, pain in the ass like me will wonder :)-.

Some supporting “evidence” is based on stories, anecdotes, and interviews

For example:

> When experts in history, political science, and psychology rated the presidents, they identified Lincoln as a clear giver.

On one hand, I understand Grant had to sell the book, so he needed some captivating stories.
But I wasn’t looking for stories, so this was a non-evidence for me and a waste of space.
“Experts” in history and political science is also meaningless: none of those people even knew Lincoln, let alone if they could provide a good assessment -and even if they did know him, many people can’t tell between givers and takers-. All they had to go about was snippets of biased storytelling and biographies.

There is no universal, scientific measure for “giver” or “taker”

I believe that the construct is very real and, indirectly plenty of studies as well “real life” shows it.

However, there doesn’t seem to be a universally accepted measure for giving and taking as there is, for example, for narcissism or Machiavellianism.
So different studies that Grant presents as evidence of how givers and takers behave are all actually measuring slightly different personalities.

Takers can also win big, and that must be made clear

This point is not stressed out nearly enough.

For example, while Adam Grant talks up Lincoln as a successful giver and none of us will ever know if he was a true giver, many of us did live through Donald Trump’s presidency.
And Trump, many of us would also agree, most certainly didn’t operate as a giver.

Adam Grant says that Michael Jordan is a taker, and Jordan won big.

David Hornik is one of Grant’s poster children’s of successful givers.
And well, here’s what Hornik says:

> Giving is especially risky when dealing with takers, and David Hornik believes that many of the world’s most successful venture capitalists operate like takers—they insist on disproportionately large shares of entrepreneurs’ start-ups and claim undue credit when their investments prove successful.

For the record, I’m not sure they operate like takes, actually.

It's more like "maximizers of profits". They're the ones who give the capital, and they're the ones who can field demands. So they demand as much as their money allows them to.
If the start-up succeeds, the founders succeed and there is plenty in it for them, there are plenty of new high-tech jobs and, hopefully, there is plenty in it for society as well.

Grant's own reference study on supposedly taker CEOs showed that they earned more than their non-taker CEOs.

Equates narcissism to value-taking. But... Are they (always) the same?

More than once Adam Grant uses signs of narcissism to spot takers.
And, at least in one case (the Enron accounting fraud), it felt indeed that those people did act like takers.

However, I wouldn't be so quick to jump to the conclusion that narcissist = taker.

Some narcissists may succeed and find their glory through entrepreneurship, and potentially develop companies that give value.
Some others may seek personal validation via huge charity donations, or by defeating some specific ailment or sickness. And that, too, would end up as being value-giving.

So, yes, the motives might be self-serving, but the end results might be value-giving nonetheless.

PROS

- Best overview of giving and taking
- Great mix of entertainment, instructive read, and scientific rigor
- Inspiring
- Not an "how-to" book, but it's easy to take away important real-life applications for life

REVIEW

"Give and Take" is a wonderful book.

I am grateful to Adam Grant for writing it, and "Give and Take" may become one of the "foundational resources" for this website -after all, some TPM's main strategies are already based on what Adam Grant calls "otherish giving", which we call here "enlightened collaboration-.

I have also taken copious notes of this Adam Grant's "Give and Take" to integrate its wisdom into this website's offering -and that's always the greatest compliment I an pay to any resource-.

So we can most certainly recommend "Give and Take".

The Seduction Path: 6 Escalation Milestones to Intimacy

Lucio Buffalmano · 21 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Escalation on a date starts much longer than the date.

Good escalation starts the first moment she lays eyes on you, and continues all throughout the date.
Attractive men make women want them to escalate on them, and that makes everything easier.

As we know here, successful dating is high-power dating.
Women want men who are "better" and "more" than they are.
Better in as many areas as possible. And on this website, we refer to that "more" as higher-power.

This post will teach you how to escalate well, based on our power dynamics model.

Intro

Power matters.

Always.

But there are key moments in dating where it makes the whole difference between failure or success.
Power matters most when:

1. You want to get intimate with a woman: many guys can chat with an attractive woman. What matters is who moves her along the seduction path and gets together with her
2. You need to move forward towards sex / intimacy: if you stay put at any plateu, you may not need much power. But if you want to lead her to the next level, you most certainly do

These crucial moments of "forward motions" are escalation milestones, and they're inherently bound with power and power dynamics.

There are common patterns of power at work, in socialization, and relationships. We've already seen many of those here.
And, even most important for seduction and dating effectiveness, there are recurring escalation milestones in seduction.

Escalation milestones are fundamental "checkpoints" and junctures along the straight line seduction path that you must go through in order to move forward.

Moments of truth & vulnerability

You can see escalation milestones as "moments of truth" because they tell you whether you two are going to sleep together, or not.

It doesn't matter whether she smiles, flirts, says that you are nice, or whatever. What matters is whether she follows you along the escalations milestones or not.

And you can also see them as "moments of vulnerability" because you often must make your interest clear in order to move forward.
And as it's the case for many instances of vulnerability, making your interest clear can decrease your power because:

1. You (sub)-communicate your interest to move forward when she hasn't necessarily made her interest clear
2. You move the interaction forward while she hasn't necessarily signaled she wants to take it forward

And this is also why it's generally a good idea to make sure -as well as to "thread expand"- on her interest and compliance, before you go through escalations milestones.

But let's not jump the gun now.

Let's learn more:

The Escalation Milestones

The escalation milestones are:

1. Approach / introduction / first contact
2. Instant date / date proposal / contact exchange
3. Date invite over phone or text
4. Invite home / leading to a sex location

5. Sexual escalation
6. Re-invite for a second or more dates

There is one common denominator in all those milestones:

The man communicates his interest, either directly or indirectly, and it's up to her to consent and follow, or reject.

And it's exactly that "man proposes, woman chooses" that makes them so inherently intertwined with power dynamics -with the man often risking to lose power-.

In the "Straight Line Seduction" model, this is how these power phases look like (here seen within a successful seduction):

Escalation milestones are crucial "make or break" phases to move the interaction forward
Let me warn you first:

Mindset: milestones = opportunities

Albeit the red bars are sometimes "make or break", don't look at them as a "risk".
Look at them as an opportunity.
An opportunity to improve your skills if you're learning and/or to get closer to someone if that's your goal.

Escalation milestones are like doors to open on the way to something meaningful (or "simply" to sex, if that's your goal).

As a matter of fact, when you go through escalation milestones effectively and with good power awareness, they're more like slingshots forward.
Because while you can lose some power with the ask, you regain power with the yes (or with the compliance / forward motion).
The "yes" and the forward motion re-establish, confirm and re-empower you as a high-value option for her.
And albeit the chart above stays conservative, it's very possible to go even higher power after an escalation milestone (but you don't necessarily need that to sleep with a woman).

Finally, escalation milestones are riskiest when you're treading the power threshold of 0%.
But they're often more of a formality when you're dating high-power and she sees you as a catch. In those cases, it's more about “not f*cking it up” than doing anything special.

How to Ace Escalation Milestones

This is how to breeze through escalation milestones:

1. Be generally high value

High-value men are like helium:

They naturally go up in power.
That’s the beauty of it: just by being yourself and spending time with her, you climb up and succeed.

So the small risk of asking or moving forward are non-issues since women are more than happy to oblige -sometimes even eagerly waiting for the ask and forward motion towards intimacy-.

> The 10 Traits of High-Value Men (W/ Examples)

2. Go through the milestone with enough power

This is a very common mistake among men:

They move forward at random.
Often, when she’s not yet attracted, before they saw any signs of attraction, or before she was contributing or investing anything.

Such as, most men chase and chase and give and give… And then ask her phone number, ask her out, or make a move.

Ie.: they make a move when they’re power-negative, at the worst possible time.
That doesn’t work because it’s chasing, not seducing:

When you move forward lower in power she sees you as lower value, and women rarely date -or sleep- with lower value men

Instead, you be more strategic about it:

Acquire enough power before the milestone.

The more power you have -ie.: the more value you have in her eyes-, the more the milestones are going to be formalities and non-events -or even opportunities to increase your power and/or improve the experience-.

Power before the milestone is also your insurance to win against the odds of life.
You can see it this way: the more power you have, the more you can afford to muck it up and lose some of that power.

Indeed, if you have enough power, you have more 'safety margin'. Even a bad move won't decrease her attaction -for example, you could simply say "do you want to come home with me" at the end of the date, not ideal, and you'll still get a yes-.

Funny example from Casino Royale:

> Bond: what about a drink at my place
> Her: your place? Is it close?
> (this is where Bond should have made it easier for her to say "yes". Instead:)
> Bond: very
> (lets the tension build instead of nudging her. Not nudging is a risk because women don't want to feel and look "easy")
> Her: one drink

Of course it's a movie and we must not read too much into scripted movies. But IF a scene is realistic, then it can be a great learning tool. And this scene is a good example of escalation milestones and power dynamics: Bond actually made some mistakes.
But he was so high-power that, eventually, she went along with it anyway.

That's the beauty of generally being high-value.
Be high-value in her eyes, and you can even recover from a bad escalation, from mishandling last-minute resistances, or from poor intimacy and pillow talk.

3. Test before the "move" (advanced game)

This is a bit more advanced, but you can often "test" before making the move.

Testing is what you do before you commit to something, to make sure that it will work. Imagine you want to cross an ice lake: you don't just start walking. You test the ice first.

It's most helpful when you're not 100% sure and when you haven't gotten much investment or indicators of interest yet.

How do you test?
There are a thousand ways.

For example, you can (semi-covertly) propose something more intimate saying something like this:

> You: You seem pretty cool… So far.
> I'm picky but was thinking of potentially spending some more quality time together (pause, see how she reacts) in a quieter place, one day (see how she's reacting)… Or maybe later (see how she's reacting). But I'm busy tomorrow, let's see

And see how she reacts. That's a test before inviting her home, for example.
If she does not deny or if she seems to agree, that's your signal that you're probably good to go to invite her home.

We'll have real-life examples of effective testing in Seduction University.

4. Maintain power during the ask (game)

This is the essence of game:

Giving as little power away as possible while also moving forward.

Generally speaking, the more power you maintain, the more those red bars become formalities -or even opportunities to further increase your power and her attraction-.

Plenty of real-life examples of smooth transitions in Seduction University.

5. Increase warmth when you're very high power

This is what most men fail to see:

They're so worried with being high power and attractive that they fail to realize they may already have more than enough power.

In those cases, the escalation milestones are a cinch for you… But they might not be for her.
If she likes you a lot, she can get very tense, fearful, and start having doubts if moving forward is the right thing -and she may self-reject out of fear or self-defense-.
And if she starts getting fearful or doubtful, it might be an issue for you too -and for the seduction-.

In those cases, you don't need more value and power, you need more warmth.

Also see:

- High power & high warmth

> Power Strategy 101: High-Power / High-Warmth

6. Regain power to turn around a "no"

"Yes" is always the best answer.

But "no" is not the end of it.
As a matter of fact, games of rejection and insisting are one of the most common dating games women play.

But even if she meant it, a "no" can be a "not right now", and it must not spell doom.

You can turn it around.

As long as you still have some power to leverage, you have plenty of opportunities to consolidate or rebuild power and/or goodwill after a rejection.
And the more power/comfort you rebuild after the ask, the quicker you can move forward again.

The PM Approach to Seduction

I haven't just learned politics and business manipulation working in corporate.

In my time as a project manager, I've learned this:

Great project managers maintain good and win-win relationships with the stakeholders while zeroing in on the milestones.

All the rest is chit-chat, reporting nobody cares about, pandering to bosses and high-fliers, and making people happy.
But where you really can't f*ck around if you want to succeed is milestones.
Plan for hiccups, reach them with enough spare time and resources, handle them well… And you'll fly through the delivery.

This is probably the most effective approach for effective dating as well: think of your interactions with women as build-ups towards the milestones.
The bantering, the teasing, the commonalities, the bonding, the indirect displays of value… They're all there to develop enough power and rapport to slingshot you through the next milestone.

And you don't need anything crazy, you only need just enough power to go through the next milestones.
As soon as you have enough power and warmth to move forward, you run through that milestone. Do that just 3-4 times, and you'll be lovers and intimate sooner than you thought was ever possible.

SUMMARY

Successful daters pass through a few, common, crucial junctures that repeat across seductions.

Many of these junctures, and sometimes all of them, have to be crossed to go from first meeting, to intimacy. Hence, we call them "escalation milestones".

To successfully lead women through those junctures you need to have enough value & attraction (power) as well as enough rapport & trust (warmth), that she is willing -and happy- to follow you.

Add enough power and warmth before you go through the milestones, sprinkle in a minimum of game to smoothen things out… And you're flying.

Intro

There are fixed crucial “seduction milestones” in dating to go from first meeting to lovers.

And the approach is the very first of these “seduction milestones”:

The approach is one of the most crucial milestones to successfully going from strangers to lovers
To pass each milestone, you need to have enough leverage to lead her to the next step.

That leverage, is power.
And the problem is that most men lose too much power during the approach to advance to any successive step.

As a matter of fact, if you’re not careful, the simple act of approaching often gives power away:

The simple act of approaching gives power away

That is because:

The person who makes the first move sub-communicates that he needs or wants something, while the one who gets approached is in the chooser -and power- position.

The approacher has “tipped his hand” with the approach already: he wants his target, and that sub-communicates interest.
The approached instead hasn’t shown any interest, and is judging the approacher.

Luckily, there are ways to change that.
And it all starts by understanding the general principles:

Approach Power Dynamics

As a general rule:

> The more interest you display in the approach, the more power you give away

On the other hand, the less interest you display, the more power you maintain.

And since power and attraction are tightly interlinked, maintaining power increases your effectiveness.

In chart terms:

The more power you maintain, the higher power you start
Let’s now review the age-old question of direct VS indirect:

Direct VS Indirect Openers

In the dating literature, there’s an endless debate over “direct VS indirect” openers.

This is the difference:

- Direct means to verbally state your sexual or romantic interest openly and quickly, and its proponents say that it’s ballsy, “masculine”, and time-saving
- Indirect means to start a conversation with a woman you find attractive, without explicitly stating your sexual or romantic interest, and its proponents say that it’s more versatile, has wider appeal, and it retains mystery and power.

Both have a point.

And, generally speaking, you want an opener that combines the best of both worlds:

1. Maintains as much power as possible, while it
2. Sets a man-to-woman sexual vibe

When you're more advanced, you can combine both because you won't need words to set a "man-to-woman" frame and spark attraction.

Beginners though might need to be a bit more direct to avoid remaining at a platonic level.

However, you still don't want to go too overboard because the more you spell your interest and intentions, the more power you give away:

The more you make your interest and intentions clear, the more power you give away

Direct Openers Power Dynamics

Direct openers sit on a conundrum:

With a solid delivery they can be honest and ballsy, and thus can give you lots of points.

However, they also show a lot of interest before she's done much to earn it and before she invested anything.
And that can self-frame you as lower value than her.

When Direct Works

Remember that what's high power is relative.

It's not how much interest you show, but how much you show *compared to her interest lev*els.
So:

- The smaller your interest compared to hers, the more power you have
- The bigger your interest compared to hers, the more power you lose

In theory, showing interest is only an issue when it's not returned.

As a matter of fact, if she's really into you and she returns your interest, then you're on a fast track to quick seduction.
In chart terms:

If you show interest and if she likes you and reciprocates, the direct approach puts you on fast-track seduction
The frame at that point is "we really like each other", a win-win frame that leads to fast romance.

And, if she likes you a lot, direct openers can also help prevent self-rejection -such as, when women think you are "too much for them" -which is why direct approaches usually work better for very high value men-.

The only issue is…

Works great for top 1%, but you don't make the rule with the exceptions...

This scenario is an exception for most men, and not the norm.

On average, going direct works best for very high sexual market value men.

Brad Pitt can open directly and women will drop their jaws and profess their love back (Brad Pitt is so high value that he runs little risk of giving power away: when he opens he's already coming from a high-value position).
Good for him.
"Nos otros", we have to work out way up.

Great!
That's part of the fun.

And part of the fun is being strategic about it.

Issue #1. You Don't Know Her Interest Yet

Yes, if she thinks the world of you, direct works great.

Problem is, when you first open you don't know her interest levels.

So, in the absence of clear data, it's best to "hedge your bets".

Issue #2. She Might Exploit Your Candor

Even if she's interested, you don't know if she'll be candid and honest back.

Instead, she might prefer to play games and hoard power, or feign disinterest to make you chase and self-frame as the relationship prize.

This is not an issue if you're looking for a relationship because you can just drop her. But it's an issue if you're looking to play the field.

Also see:

- Nasty game players
- How she became the prize

> 10 Nasty Games Women Play (Women, Stop These!)

Issue #3: Early Vulnerability Is Dangerosly Close to "Weakness"

Showing lots of interest is a vulnerable act.

We talked about vulnerability power dynamics here already.

And vulnerability works after you have shown your value.

But it doesn't work nearly as well when your value is still unknown.
And even worst, vulnerability as an unknown makes you a prime suspect for being low value.

Finally, "naive vulnerability" is just bad strategy.

In a "fight for life analogy", giving all your interest away is like emptying your magazine first, offering a flower, and hoping that your opponent will do the same.
Might work great, but… Is it the most effective way to negotiate win-win peace?
Probably not…

Issue #4: No Mystery, No Tension

When there's no mystery, there is no sexual tension.

Plus, in this "cards on the table" frame, she is firmly in the chooser position.

She asks herself the whole time:

> he wants me, we know that, but… Do I want him?

She will be in charge -and in power- as the chooser.
And women aren't attracted to men who are lower power than they are.

Finally, it's only when women aren't 100% sure you want them that they will chip in -invest, show interest, and potentially even chase you-.

When they know you want them, they'll wait for you to make all the work.
And that almost always decreases their attraction.

So it's best to let her wonder with some mystery.

Issue #5: The More Attractive She Is, The Better It Is to Maintain Power

Generally speaking:

The more attractive and in-demand she is, the higher-power men she wants.

And the less likely it is that she will take a shine to (yet another) random, "unproven" guy who happens to be into her.

So don't make this is an iron rule, but the tendency is that:

The more attractive she is, the more power you want to keep because the more attractive she is, the more unforgiving she is of those who start lower power:

The more power you give away, the tougher it is. And the hotter she is, the more this is true
Let's now review a few popular "direct openers" around:

Extreme Direct Openers

There are several "extreme" versions of openers in the pick-up literature.

Generally speaking, less extreme is more effective.

For the details, read on:

Direct Sexual

The most extreme direct sexual interest are:

1. Open with direct sexual interest
2. Maintain frame
3. Keep on building on the sexuality (for example, what you want to do to her)

When that works, it works great.

When it works

It works great if she is:

1. Super into you
2. Very into highly dominant and sexually aggressive men
3. Horny
4. Rrisk-taking

Why it's not ideal

If we define effective as "giving yourself maximum odds with the largest number of women", then it's the sexual direct opener is not the most effective.

There are several reasons for this:

1. Drives away many women, including women who could have been into you: sexual direct casts a smaller net because most women are risk-avoidant. Even many women who are turned by sexual boldness will subconsciously override their excitement with self-preservation. It's not a coincidence that many women only orgasm after they've known a man for some time: it's because they need some time and comfort to drop their defenses and "let go"
2. There's no upside for skilled and high-value men: if you're generally high-power and have the capability to be more direct and bolder together with the emotional intelligence to realize when you need to be bolder -a big ask, actually-, then you can up your dominance and leadership on a "per-needed basis" and still move fast and succeed with the women who'd respond well to super direct.
3. Lots of small personal risks add up: you can come across as threatening or harassing and get wild reactions and burn bridges

You can mitigate those downsides with sexual direct that is not crude and doesn't come across as threatening. That works a lot better.

Examples in Seduction University.

Direct Romantic

Many dating coaches recommend a direct expression of interest.

For example:

> Direct gushing interest: I think you are… Gorgeous

Or blander:

> Direct compliment opener: I thought you were cute and wanted to talk to you

When it works

It can work great if:

1. She invests and/or shows interest: for example, if she stopped to talk to you and looks at you raptly. Then it works because, at that point, you're power-up
2. You come across as high-value and/or "top boyfriend material", in which it can turn into whirlwind romance -this is how lovers' seducer types date, like Casanova–
3. She likes you, and especially if she noticed you before you approached

Why it's not ideal

Look at this chart:

The more power you give away, the more likely it is you'll start in a negative "value hole"
Think of it this way:

The more direct -and gushing- you are in your expression of interest, the more you "extend".
If she extends as well, you lunge together forward. If she reaches out to "break your fall", you might be still in the game -but because she decided to "give you a chance", not the best spot to be in-.

But if she was unsure -including if you're high value but she hasn't seen it yet-, then you may be out of the running before even starting.

No, "Making Her Day" Is Not Your Goal

Some dating coaches say that big compliments "make her day" -sometimes with nice descriptions of how big the smile grows on her face-.

However, "making her day" is not a goal for effective dating.

Your goal is not to make her day -or, at least, not with a big compliment right before she says "thanks" and leaves to have sex with someone else-.

Approach Body Language

Of course, approaching is not all about words.

Body language plays a crucial role.
This is a brief preview, the full lesson is in Seduction University:

Bad body language

Bad because:

1. He looks at her before she looks at him
2. She moves forward going her own way, he self-frames as having nothing better to do
3. He has his whole body towards her, she just looks at him

Overall, he sub-communicates lots of interest and he's in the chasing position.

If he insists, he might get her to stop and then regain some power.
But it's a big IF, and he's not making himself any favors starting lower power.

Bad because:

- He approaches from behind, already in a chasing position
- He is looking at her, she is not looking at him

A video example of very poor body language first-approach:

Good body language

And now some positive examples of high-power approaches:

It's good body language because:

- It looks very natural
- He goes one step ahead

A few things could be tweaked:

- Walk with her a few more steps or until you hook: he tried to stop her too soon. Should have walked with her, gotten some investment
- Open at a more convenient location: steps are mind taxing, it's better to open before steps and escalators, or after
- Stop at a more convenient location: right after the steps is a sub-optimal place to stop
- Make her look at you first: he avoids the startling "predator in pursuit", but would have been better to look ahead in the beginning

And now a scripted example from "Dr. No" to get an idea of "warmer" approaches:

> Bond: (walks ahead, doesn't look at her) Tomorrow afternoon, then (doesn't even specify it's a date invite, making her invest in the verbal meaning-making of setting up a date)

Bond walks without waiting, which forces her to catch up to him -big nonverbal investment-. It barely started and she's already shown strong interest while he hasn't shown any.
Then he reclines against the booth (locking in) and leaves her on the outside, which is the higher investment position.

For now, this is enough to get the gist.
More body language in Seduction University.

Problem: Beginners Need The Verbal Support of "Directness"

It's not as simple as to say "be less direct".

Because to have a man-to-woman vibe without verbally stating it requires some skills.
It's all about body language, tonality, undertones, and… Personal value and self-confidence.

Flirting can help, but even there, not all flirting works. If it's too obvious or surface-level then flirting is more like harmless banter -or even try-hard-.

So for beginners, it's OK to start out with direct interest.
As a matter of fact, for beginners, it's recommended to start out with more direct expressions of romantic interest and/or romantic intention.
It ensures you won't end up friend-zoned and, if done well, it can give you added points for boldness and honesty.

However, for the longer term, it's better to work on:

- "Man to woman" vibing (examples later)
- Qualifying and showing your interest later on, after she's also invested and when she earns it
- Increasing your investment in lockstep with hers

Solution: Go "As Indirect As Possible"

Maintain Power Using Vibe, Rather Than Words

Considering all we said:

There are too many downsides and too few upsides to direct openers.

HOWEVER, beginners need the verbal directness for a "man-to-woman" frame.

The solution?

The solution is to go "as indirect as possible".

To know how indirect you can go, you need to self-assess.
You can look at your past interaction, and if:

- You get friend-zoned a lot
- Women never get that you want to date them
- When you invite women home they either think it's weird, or think it's as friends
- When you make a move women never expect it

Then, there is not enough "man-to-woman" vibe, not enough attraction, and you're going too indirect.
You need to go more direct.

If on the other hand you're getting good results, women "know" what's up and some women are attracted to you…
Then go try out more indirect and "casual" openers.

In either case, you'll start doing better.

Technique: The "Bashful Direct"

The "bashful direct" effectively blurs the line between direct and indirect, combining the best of both worlds.

See Seduction University for the example.

Women's First Approach Tactics

We'll focus on interested women here.

And interested women will either:

1. Show interest the "genuine" non-game player attitude
2. Hide interest to conserve power and self-frame as "the prize"
3. Actively feign disinterest to entrench her power position. Feigning disinterest can be both a game and a test

What early PUAs used to call "bitch shields" is a subset of "feigning disinterest".
Bitch shields refer to women who are either attractive or hit on too many times and who put up a nasty facade to discourage and quickly shut down suitors.

However, it's not necessarily attractive or high-value women who put up bitch shields. Often, it's inveterate game players or jaded party girls instead.
So don't necessarily take it as a test or sign of quality, because it can often be a red flag instead.

See Seduction University for how to deal with bitch shields.

Indicators of Interest

It's certainly helpful knowing how to recognize indicators of interest.

Marisa Tomei in "Crazy Stupid Love" shows some dramatized examples:

> Her: I'm Kate (high-pitch, smiling and nodding, obviously happy of being approached)

You can read some of the typical "indicators of interest" here:

> Does She Like Me? 35 Signs of Attraction (W/ Pictures)

And there are many similar lists online -more or less accurate-.

However, don't over-sweat the presence (or absence) of indicators of interest because many women won't send nearly as many signals -and some won't send any at all-.

See "Seduction University" for concrete signs.

Gaze Power Dynamics & Coquette Games

We can consider eye contact the very first (pre-)step in an approach.

As a general rule:

The more you're seeing looking, the more interest you sub-communicate -and the more you're chasing-.
Conversely, the more you're looked at, the more power you gain.

A dramatized but good example of eye contact power dynamics (and games) from Sex and the City:

> Her: (lowers her gaze, then looks at him) I have no doubt (looks away and keeps on walking)
> (…)
> Him: maybe we could have dinner sometimes
> Her: (looks away)
> (…)
> Her: (looks at him for emphasis before delivering the keywords) call me (looks away first, moves away first)
> (…)
> Her: (self-talk after she turns to look at him and he sees it) damn, would have been so cool if I hadn't looked back

Albeit this a show, it was written largely by women and for women.
Indeed, notice the top two comments from real-life women, confirming it's part and parcel of most women's innate programming:

If you spot a woman playing these games, you have two options:

1. Play the same game back, so you avoid being framed as the one chasing her
2. Go assertive and bold and tell her to stop playing games, a slight risk, but if she likes you, it's actually low-ish risk and big returns.

If you go assertive -and potentially "meta", see PU- and she accepts your frame, backtracks and/or changes her behavior it's a huge boon for the seduction.
At that point, she's almost ready for intimacy.

How to Seduce Women Faster: The ‘Straight Line’ Method

Lucio Buffalmano · 18 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Straight-line seduction is the dating framework of “closers” and successful seducers.

The straight-line seduction approach to dating helps you to go from first meeting to intimate faster, more often, and more reliably.

So in this post, we will learn exactly how the straight line seduction model helps you seduce better, and more often.

Introduction

First, a definition:

> Straight line seduction is a dating framework to go from first meeting to intimate as quickly and as reliably as possible

Straight-line seduction is based on these two axioms:

- Speed of execution: the faster you reach your goal, the more effective you are. Conversely, the longer it takes, the more the chances something will go wrong

- Efficiency of execution: the simpler, more streamlined, and more replicable the plan to reach your goal, the more effective you are. Conversely, the more complex it is, the more difficult it is to replicate, and the more likely it is something will go awry

At parity of everything else, a simple straight line from A to B beats longer and convoluted detours
These two axioms apply to life in general and across many different endeavors.
And they're especially relevant in dating.

From Sales to Seduction: History

The roots of "Straight Line Seduction" are in sales.

Specifically, in the "straight line persuasion" model by Jordan Belfort:

The main concepts behind "straight line persuasion" are:

1. Replicable sales scripts based on effectiveness and speed: the whole point of the arrows as boundaries is to avoid time-wasting or harmful tangents and go from opening to close as quickly as possible
2. Constant forward motion with end goal in mind: from the start the salesman has the close in mind. However, and this is key, he never makes it seem like the close is all he cares about and he never "pushes".
   Indeed the next point is:
3. "Gentle leading" with rapport and prospect's buy-in, rather than a forceful high-pressure sales approach. This approach combines the benefits of high-power without the risks of raw dominance and confrontations (real-life example of how confrontation fails you, especially early on, here)
4. Close framed as a win for the prospect: the interaction and exchange are framed as a win for the prospect. The signature on the dotted line feels like a win for the prospect

Straight line seduction is very similar.

Sales & Seduction Parallels

And albeit I don't fully buy the story that great salesmen (necessarily) make for great seducers, there certainly is an important overlap between seduction skills and great salesmanship.

Both of them require great people skills, leadership, power-awareness, and an eye on the goal -and a touch of Machiavellianism sometimes, starting with the fact that you don't want to make it seem like the end goal is all you care about-.

The straight line persuasion approach to sales is like a salsa dance from first meeting to sales, with the (sales)man firmly but gently leading and the prospect happily following to the dotted line (or, in seduction, bed).

Jordan Belfort's approach to persuasion translates really well to seduction because, contrary to high-pressure sales, the focus on rapport and "win for her" turn prospects/women into willing repeat customers.
And her eager buy-in makes the crucial difference between simply "sleeping with someone" and "seducing".

And if Jordan Belfort made billions with it, then you can probably use it to bed a few women as well :).

Straight Line Seduction

We strategize properly at TPM.

So we didn't just take the original sales concept and mindlessly applied it to seduction.
But we deepened it, expanded it, and tailored it specifically for seduction.

This is how Straight Line Seduction looks like in chart:

The baseline "Straight Line Seduction Model"
Once you get the gist, it's rather straightforward.
But to truly get it, you also need to understand some crucial elements of social and power dynamics.

So let's quickly review them here:

1. Be higher power than her (X-Axis)

This is where it all starts.

It is THE most basic -and crucial- element.
And, as it happens, the one that most guys struggle with.

The importance of the power component between her and him VS salesman and prospect buyer is also a key difference between seduction and sales (and one of the main reason why I believe you can't compare the two).

Namely:

You can sell while being lower power than your prospect, but you can hardly seduce while being lower power than your date.

Such as, you can be a junior salesman and sell to a CEO if the CEO sees the benefit of your product -granted, it's easier selling to an owner as an owner, but upward sales are very possible and I know that from first-hand experience of successfully selling above my paygrade-.
But in seduction you are the product. And you can hardly seduce if the woman sees you as "less than she is" because if the man is "less than she is", then there are no benefits for her in that transaction -see: "hypergamy" for more-.

She feels it's a win for her when she feels you're more than her

So, to seduce effectively -or to seduce at all, really-, you must be "more than her".

"More" in what, to be precise?
Well, the more the better.
For a quick overview, see the "sexual market value" article -or for a more practical approach, get Seduction University-.

To keep it simple, we refer to "power" as the sum total of all traits that make her feel you are "more than her", a high(er)-value man, and a great catch.
The type of man that, if she were to sleep or get into a relationship with, would be a win for her.

Hypergamy dictates: high power seduces because she wants him while low power chases and gets rejected
The x-axis charts that crucial "power level".
Zero is the neutral level of "power parity", the point at which she sees you as an "equal".
The higher up from zero you go, the easier seduction becomes.
The lower you go, the more seduction becomes unlikely.

Up until here, most people get it.
What confuses many is the orange level above 100%.

So let's dig deeper into that:

1.2. Golden Balance: be higher power, without overpowering her

This is what stumps many men:

There is such thing as "too high power".

The "too high power" is the red portion above the 100% level.
And the portion between "parity" and 100% is the golden balance.
You are in the power golden balance when she feels you are more than her, but she can still get you.

Above 100% though she feels like she either cannot get you, or that your power is not used for win-win and, thus, it's not a win for her.

Many men fail to understand this concept because status among men works differently than seduction. There is no limit to how high a man can climb while still maintaining and accruing more status and respect.

But there are often limits to how high a man can go in a certain positive trait before it starts becoming a con, rather than a plus ("threshold effect").

"More than her" is great, "too much for her" is not the higher a man goes, the more other men keep awarding him with status points.

Power among men is unlimited:

But in 1:1 seductions women sometimes "drop out" of dating instead of chasing him if she does not feel that he either likes her, or that he's an uplifting force (broadcasting and fame are different).

Many women feel uncomfortable with men whom they feel are "too much for them" because, they think, such a man would not want them -potentially even hurt them-. So rather than staying and getting rejected, they self-reject (ie.: dismiss the possibility of a relationship with you and dismiss you as a romantic candidate).

Too high-power: the over-revving pitfall

Over-revving is a perfect analogy for this concept.

That's over-revving on a tachometer (note: not an odometer). Too high revs mean a comparative loss of speed

Those of you who have been into cars or bikes will understand right away.

For those who haven't, over-revving refers to delivering too much power for the current gear.

Over revving is ineffective.
As a matter of fact, over-revving makes you go slower because the best approach to move forward is to switch gears up, rather than delivering more power -and staying stuck- at the current gear.

When you over-rev you focus more on power and useless noise -ego gratificaction and reactions above results-, rather than speed and moving forward.
The solution is either to decelerate slightly to avoid straining the engine -and relationship- or, even better, to switch gear to pick up speed and move forward.
And that's what makes it the perfect analogy.
Similarly, overpowering in seduction means having too much power for the current stage of seduction, with too little forward motion.

Archetypes of over-revving

There are many ways that men can f*ck up seduction by going too high-power, including:

1. Value man pitfall: focuses on pumping his value and makes her feel he's "too much for her" (too much value and not enough availability)
2. Game player pitfall: pretends to be disinterested, invests nothing, and makes her feel like he doesn't like her (not enough qualifying, or too many PUA games)
3. Poor socialite pitfall: focuses on his value, but fails to connect, relate, or simply have a good time and makes her feel like there is no "spark" (not enough rapport and connection)
4. Alpha male posturer pitfall: focuses on dominance (asshole game with not enough warmth)
    1. Angers high-power women (turns interactions into confrontations)
    2. Makes more submissive women feel belittled (win-lose rather than win-win, seduction is no more a win for her)
    3. Makes women uncomfortable and potentially afraid

Many men harm themselves with one or more of these pitfalls.
And which one you're more likely to fall for depends on your approach, personality, and level of development.

Generally speaking, higher power issues are easier to fix than low-power issues.
Plus, although there are (almost) always exceptions to any rule, women make even more exceptions for high-value men.
So, generally speaking, higher power is better and easier to fix than lower power.

However, it's something to keep in mind because the more you work on yourself, the more you'll run into these issues.
And the less you're aware of them, the less you'll be able to fix them.

Luckily, there are simple ways to avoid all these issues, at once, without going crazy.
It's all about implementing the right mindsets and habits.

One great tip to avoid all these issues is this:

2. Focus on moving forward, rather than upward (Y-Axis)

Forward motion is what gets you to intimacy.

So once you have enough power and you see that she likes you, respects you, accepts your leadership… Then move forward to the next step on the road to intimacy.

Forward motion is not only good: forward motion is necessary.
The more you stay put, the more you risk losing her.

As a matter of fact, in seduction forward motion and power are not independent but interrelated.

If she thinks you like her and you don't move forward, you lose power because she thinks you're not enough of a leader -and of a man- to take charge.

And if she's not sure if you like her, she will think you're not interested, you become unavailable to her, and she will self-reject and write you off.

Finally, speed is inherently linked to effective dating and seduction.

As a rule:

> The shorter the distance you travel, the quicker and more reliably you reach the destination.

This is not an opinion, this is a law, and it's a constant of the world we live in.

Conversely, the longer the distance, the more time it takes and the more likely it is some issues will derail you.

Attention now though: "quick" is always dependent on "reaching the goal"
The two must necessarily go together. Going quick while losing women you like is not seducing, it's failure of seduction.
So although most men could probably move quicker, there certainly is such a thing as "too fast" -something that's been an issue of mine-.
So "fast" truly means "as fast as possible to reach intimacy, given the circumstances".

How To Straight-Line Seduce

A bare-bone straight-line approach :)
For a quick overview:

1. Be higher power than her
2. Lead with win-win in mind: use collaborative and win-win frames. Especially in the beginning, remember that early interactions are fragile and she won't always see you as higher power early on
3. Build her up to your level, qualify her, bond & connect, develop a "sense of us" or, better yet, a "possibility of us"
4. Use your power to move forward

And, of course, generally run good interactions and dates -something that applies across all socialization-.

Asshole Game: Why It's Better Than "Nice"

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Nobody likes the asshole, but…

He succeeds.
And also gets the girl.

Or, at least, that seems to be the consensus among many men.

But is it true?
Do women love assholes?

Let's find out.

Note:
Albeit we refer a lot to dating here, the same concepts apply to general socialization.

INTRO

There are three schools of thought when it comes to asshole's effectiveness:

1. Doesn't work because women prefer good guys (belief often promoted by too nice guys)
2. It works because women love assholes
3. It's better than too nice guys, but not as good as alpha male / high quality men

#3 is closer to the truth.
BUT… There are important exceptions.

So let's dig deeper.
And let's start defining "asshole".

Asshole Definition

Definition of an asshole:

> An asshole is an individual with the reputation and possibly the behavior for either taking advantage of others or disregarding others and/or offending their feelings

Reputation is crucial.
You only get labeled "asshole" when people feel like you or your actions are antisocial and/or offensive.

That's an important difference between "asshole" and "value taker".

You may not set out to offend or take value. And you may even add value or have people's best interests in mind, and still be called asshole if you disregard or offend someone.
Some assholes may even enjoy, take pride, or encourage a reputation for brutal honesty that disregards other people's feelings.

Instead, many Machiavellians and value-takers are more careful -even sneakier, in a way- and DO manage their reputation not to be thought of or labeled as "assholes".

Asshole = High-Power / Low-Warmth

An asshole is inherently low-warmth.

And, to be a successful asshole, he must be high power -or, to be precise, high dominance-.
Otherwise, an asshole with low power is just a bigger loser.

See the "asshole matrix":

A low-power asshole has nothing going on for him, so his anti-social traits just make him a bigger social pariah

Power Matters Most

The asshole who is high in power is (somewhat) successful.

That's because power matters more than warmth when it comes to personal success.

Power is an ENABLER and PRECONDITION to turn warmth into success.
Warmth by itself leads to limited results.

So the asshole who's high in power does get (some) results.

And that's why the "too nice guys" sometimes look up at the assholes and think "wow, he has power, he gets results… Assholes win".

Traits of An Asshole

"Assholes" are one or more of the following:

- Selfish
  - Self-promotional / braggart
  - Hedonistic
- Proud / conceited
  - Sense of superiority towards people and institutions
- Dominant
  - Confident
  - Power aware / Socially effective
- Antisocial
  - Rebel
  - Disdain towards people and institutions

- Insensitive
  - “Facts don’t care about feelings” attitude
- Provocative, sometimes for the fun of it
  - Brutally honest
  - Sadistic, as in “enjoying to see others struggle or lose”
- Offensive / irritating

Asshole Game

In dating the asshole has some of these traits:

Attitudes and mindsets:

- “I put myself first”
- I’m high power (and higher power than you)
- You want me (& I don’t want you)
- You need me (& I don’t need you)
- You mean little to me – and I show it

Behaviors:

- Little or no investment in her (especially if he’s not sleeping with her)
- Sarcastic, biting, or demeaning humor
- Very critical with lots of punishment and little rewards
  - Negging
  - One-upping
  - Push-pull with the “pushes” stronger than the “pulls”
- Nasty social climbing

Advantages of Assholes

Pride, even smugness, are correlated to high confidence. And it sub-communicates higher odds of past successes to be proud of. And successful men are attractive
These asshole traits are attractive:

- Power: assholes' focus on power and frame control makes them date high power, and women love that. Also, value-taking high-power often beats value-adding low-power
- High confidence is obviously attractive
- Pride has been shown to be attractive
- Uneediness sub-communicates value and options. Plus, people are hardwired to chase and value what's scarce
- Ability to assert oneself: almost a precondition to personal success and power
- Polarizing and attractive to some: being a polarizer in a world where only the top 20% wins big is good. Among the sub-types the asshole attracts:
  - Rebel types
  - Fearful rebels who wish they had the courage to buck societal pressure
  - Subset of younger women looking for transgression and that, often at the mercy of social pressure themselves, admire the guy who (seemingly) needs no social approval

Compared to nice guys:

- Putting oneself first beats putting oneself last: putting oneself first may not be attractive per se, but it's often better than men who put themselves last

And in more fringe cases:

- Emotional-hooking potential: a subset of women may fall harder for high dominance (Norwood, 2014) and some others even for men more on the abusive end (Brown, 2008)

Limitations Assholes

These are the limitations to the asshole game:

1. It's not as universally effective

The first relates to general effectiveness.

Such as:

The appeal of the asshole is quantitatively and qualitatively limited compared to the appeal of the high-quality, non-asshole man.

And since here we're going for what's most effective, that may already settle the argument.

2. It easily turns confrontational and derails seductions

Assholes' seductions are very mercurial.

Their game is all about showing superiority, disdain and, at the extreme, even actively provoking and angering the target.

Those are win-lose interactions, and when you're in win-lose interactions, your windows of opportunity get smaller.

Yes, she may be attracted, but since emotions are fleeting, once she cools off, she moves on for good.

An example:

Yes, assholes fail to get what they wanted plenty of times
I was a bit of an asshole with that girl.

She was horny, but her anger got bigger than her horniness and she left.

I successfully surfaced her horniness in texting, a good move.
But it's still a low-odds interaction.
Once you're in a major asshole frame, you can't invite her "nicely" or her attraction comes crumbling down. You must invite her with something like "come and I'll fuck you silly" or "come and I'll make you shut up shoving this big cock in your mouth".

That might work, but it's still not effective dating.

⚠ False rape allegation danger

You must be careful of the after-intimacy when dating like an asshole.
Angry women are more likely to make up rape allegations. It's rare, but it's not impossible.

3. The "not interested"game makes it hard to move things forward

The asshole never chases or professes his love.

If he does, the asshole mask slips and he comes across as a weak posturer.
And, with the mask, all the attraction he may have garnered disappears.

That's a major disadvantage at two different levels:

1. To seduce you need to lead and move things forward
2. To deepen relationships it's often best to give at least some signals of liking, affection, and love

I have a good example on a night out with an ex-girlfriend, a couple of her female friends, and a few more guys.

One was your most stereotypical asshole, and extreme at it, including actively provoking women.

He got very deep under a girl's skin with his provocations, but he couldn't do anything with it.
The woman, even if she was hiding attraction, was more focused in showing publicly her deep dislike for him.
And him, prisoner of his own "I'm above you and you're too stupid for me game", couldn't any take step that would move the seduction forward (ie.: talk to her, invite her to go get a drink for some 1:1 time, exchange contacts, invite her home, invite her for a date later etc.).
Result: he went home alone, and without anyone's contact.
He also pissed off my girlfriend. And then he used the "poke" function on her on the social media that was popular at the time. My girlfriend was happy she poked him… Just so that she could ignore him.

For a dramatic example of the second, I will never forget the woman who told me "I really like you" on our third date.
And that night I was (shamefully) clinging to having sex without waiting, without compromises, and of course without telling her the same back.
Little later she walked out, both physically and figuratively. Forever.

That was one of the lowest points of my romantic life, at many levels.
For choosing a losing strategy, for dishonest betrayal of my real self, because I also really liked her, and in terms of what it means to be a man / human being.

4. Fails to secure long-term devotion with emotional bond and connection

The asshole approach makes it difficult to open up, bond, and connect.

And that makes it both less good for both, and less powerful for him.
Especially so in long-term relationships.

Also see:

- How to maintain attraction in relationships

> 5 Ways to Maintain Power & Control in Relationships

5. Makes for poorer, lose-lose relationships

Not an issue if one doesn't want relationships.
But even FWBs are relationships, and assholes tend to have poorer relationships.

6. Assholes get heartbroken (and can do little about it)

Surprising, eh?

Well, many assholes aren't really 100% insensitive and emotionless.
Many are playing up their insensitivity.

And those who play the asshole get their hearts broken the most.

Assholes can't be honest about anything emotional-related as that would sub-communicate they're sensitive, emotionally invested, that they like her, and that they care -the ultimate taboo of assholes-.

A good example from "Reality Bites":

> Nice guy: (to her) let's go, you don't need this > Asshole: you don't know what she needs (the asshole mask first cracks, he wants to do something good for her, but just can't bring himself to)

> Nice guy: I think I know what she needs in a way that you never will > Asshole: (looks at them leaving, pained and lost)

The asshole in that scene is trapped by his own asshole game.

Being honest or offering any form of commitment would sub-communicate caring, and his mask of "power without feelings" would crumble.
He can't even compete with the "nice guy", because competing would also sub-communicate "I care".

All he can do is provoke her hoping she'll choose him and love him.
The asshole often watches the woman struggle to move away from him, incapable of doing anything except making her feel even worse.
And albeit that sometimes works, it's not very reliable.

The only hope is that the attraction -and the lack of high-power male alternatives- will be enough to keep her close, emotionally hooked, and sexually available.
In the "best" case for the asshole that turns out to be a rather toxic relationship.
In the best case for her, she breaks free and either ends it cold turkey, or moves to another option.

This is a movie scene, but it's quite realistic.

It's the same dynamics with the woman I described above.
She stood at the door and said "I need to protect myself". She was strong and high-quality to choose the short-term pain for her long-term benefit.
And that's another con for the asshole game:

7. Assholes struggle with the highest quality women

Relationships with assholes tend to be more confrontational, win-lose, and toxic.

And the highest quality women aren't exactly lining up for that.

The highest value women have more leverage and power, so they can choose an equally confident and high-power man, who is not an asshole.
And albeit exceptions always apply, that's what they prefer.

Also, as in the example above, higher quality and emotionally healthy women will take the short-term pain of ending a relationship with an asshole rather than the long-term toxicity of staying.

Research On Assholes' Game

It's difficult to run realistic research on this topic.

But the insights we can glean support this lesson's claim.

The literature is mixed and there are some studies where "nice guys" win:

- In Urbaniak and Killman's study, women picked a stereotypical "nice guy" over a stereotypical asshole both for themselves and for their friends (albeit a few picked a nice guy for other women and a bad boy for themselves)
- In a similar study women preferred men who exhibited altruism with keywords such as "I volunteer at a food bank" or "I enjoy helping people"

Here's how researchers explained the divergence:

Assholes Win Against Pushovers

Social psychologist Viren Swami concludes his overview of the available research by saying:

> If the “kind guy” is unconfident and looks like he lets everyone trample him, then the bad boy might be the preferred option.

So if we’re pitching pushovers against assholes, assholes win.

That makes sense.
The need for survival and surviving offspring beats the pleasure of being treated nicely by a lower-power man who can’t ensure the same.
In simpler words: in evolutionary terms surviving and thriving are a need, courtesy and white gloves are a nice to have.

Horgan reaches a similar, and even more enlightening conclusion:

> To make sense of the divergent literature on the subject we need to understand that women desire men who exceed a certain minimum of bad boy qualities. This would allow us to argue that bad boy qualities are a requirement that must be met, and that nice guy attributes are attractive only once an individual has proven himself sufficiently “bad.”

Yep, exactly what we embrace on TPM.

High Power, Value-Adding Men At The Top

Assholes do well compared to doormats.

But everything being equal, a high-power non-asshole man beats the asshole (on average).

There might still be a fraction of the female population that prefers the asshole. But since dating is a number’s game, you’re better off aiming for pro-social high-power (and better outside of dating, too).

This is what research points out to

Example: Asshole VS Higher Quality Man

I'll give you now two examples.

Similar situations, but one I handled with an asshole attitude, and the other one with more of a high-quality man approach.

The asshole turns the girl on but ruins relationships

Years ago I was an exchange student.

One night it was a bunch of us at one of our places, drinking and talking.

I was sprawled on top of a window's sill, trying to look cool.

One guy was monopolizing the conversation, and not in a good way.
I felt everyone was getting bored, and that I was losing power by letting someone else lead, and making it worse for all.
Someone had to take the lead to change things.

But I wasn't sure how to.
So I did the most asshole thing I could think of: finished my can of beer, crumpled it up, and emphatically threw it across the room.

The absurdity of the move plus the noise of the beer can bouncing across the floor took everyone by surprise.
And I played the ashole part, with an expression that sub-communicated "whatever, you're tiring the sh*t out of me".

He stopped.
Everyone stopped, for that matter. And he looked at me lost, not sure what to say.

And the girl I was kind of seeing back then couldn't stop laughing.

It “worked”… kind of.

The high-quality man turns the woman on as a leader

Flash forward to many years later.

I was sitting in a group of people and a guy next to me was talking the ears off of a girl, not letting her get a single word in.
Another “too nice guy” sat there as a wallflower.

I knew that the group was being hijacked and needed rescuing, and someone had to take the lead.
Plus, I knew and liked the woman, so I felt it was on me to “do something”.

I turned around and with high-intensity poise said “mate, can I give you some unrequested advice please”.
I let a pregnant pause pass, then added emphatically: “let her talk”.

Even this time, the woman cracked up laughing.

Then I went on to discuss some basics of conversation, and made sure to power protect him saying that I teach this stuff, and that I used to be far worse than he was.
I gave some advice, let everyone talk, and then also changed the topic and stayed a bit more in the conversation to rebuild some goodwill and social capital.

This also worked.

But…

The Difference

You see the huge difference?

The higher quality approach worked at least as well with the woman (probably better), 10x better socially, and 1000x better with the recipient of my power move.

Instead of making my relationship worse, I improved my relationships with everyone.

The difference?

While the former was just an antisocial asshole, the latter was a leader.

And while the asshole move could only work in specific settings and with a younger crowd, the high-quality approach can work anywhere.

Why Men Over-Estimate The Asshole Benefits

Many men overestimate the advantages of the asshole strategy.

This is because most men are unassertive. Some are doormats.
So they look at a higher power asshole and think “wow – that guy rocks”.
What they don't see is the level yet above that.

Part of the misunderstanding also stems from gender differences. And what men respect is different than what women prefer.

Research by David Buss shows that women more than men rated prosocial dominant acts as more socially desirable.

Examples of prosocial dominance in the research included:

- “taking charge of things at the committee meeting,”
- “taking a stand on an important issue without waiting to find out what others thought,”

- “soliciting funds for an important cause,”
- “being active in many community and campus activities.”

This is plain and simple leadership, and with plenty of pro-social cues.

Read more on leadership:

- How leadership gets you women

> How to Lead to Gets Girls

In contrast, men more than women tended to rate egoistic achievements as more desirable, including “managing to get one’s own way,” “flattering to get one’s own way,” “complaining about having to do a favor for someone,” and “blaming others when things went wrong.”

So while men valued individualistic or “ass-holish” pursuits more, women valued pro-social leadership.
This is a recurring pitfall for men: they seek more of what they think is “more dominant” or, as they’d put it today, “more alpha”. And albeit that’s better than a pushover, it’s not what’s most effective.

Summary: Be High-Power, High-Warmth

Asshole beats pushover, but high-power and prosocial (or at least, non-asshole), beats the asshole.

So, you don’t need to turn into an asshole to succeed AS LONG AS YOU’RE HIGH-POWER.

We go back to one of the fundamentals of this website: to be good, you need to be bad.

So if you use this lesson as an excuse to be meek or submissive, you got it totally wrong.
You should be able to be an asshole, but decide to be better.

This is an excerpt from Seduction University, where you will learn how to become better and more successful than assholes.

How to Be A Good Asshole (5 Easy Steps)

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

There is some overlap between assholes and "high-quality men".

And some of that overlap is what makes both more attractive than the too nice guys.

This framework distinguishes between low-power agreeableness, value-destructive aggression, and a calibrated, masculine, high-agency strategy that TPM calls the 'good asshole'.

We will learn how to be a good asshole, and attractive asshole sub-types you can model.

Definition:

> A good asshole is a TPM-defined social strategy in which a high-value, high-agency man prioritizes mission and self-respect. While he prefers to have a positive impact, he accepts some social costs as unavoidable consequences of putting himself and his priorities first.

Nice Guy	Bad Asshole	Good Asshole (TPM)
Low power	High power	High power
High warmth (out of submissivness)	Low warmth	Selective warmth (out of choice)
Over-invests in others	Focuses on taking	Focuses on 'what's in it for me'
High communion	Agentic disaffiliation	High agency
Conflict-avoidant	Conflictual	Accepts friction when necessary

Sometimes, an honorable and assertive man might be (mis)labeled an asshole.

At times, it's a misuse of the label "asshole", and the misusers include manipulators, jealous folks and frenemies, and those who just don't understand the mindsets of driven and high-quality men.

Some other times the high-quality men might just have a bad day, or have run out of patience. Can happen.

But sometimes, the overlap exists because it can be fair to act in ways that some people might (mis)label "asshole".

How to Be a Good Asshole

So let's review when to turn "good asshole":

1. Set your top priorities as "non-negotiable take it or leave it"

It's asshole-like -and just plain ineffective- to never compromise.

But it's too nice guy to always compromise.

Instead, a high-quality man is willing to compromise on something, happy to compromise on something else to make his partner happy… And then he has a few things he does not compromise on.

For those uncompromisables, he stands steadfast.
And if she cannot respect that, he either sends her packing for the day, or explains that it's either she accepts it, or he has to go ahead on his own.

The good asshole, with strong confidence in his own value, may have more 'uncompromisable' or drive a stronger bargain. But he will be open and direct about it.

It's also fair to have priorities that are higher than your date or spouse. Even if you place your spouse at the top of the list, there may still be times when something else is more urgent.

It's fair during those times to demand and expect she respects your higher priorities, that she willingly takes a step back, or even that she supports you through them.

2. Demand at least a balance of give & take

An asshole -or just a poor dater- may make it a point to always take more than he gives.

A nice guy white knight instead may give far more than he receives and either be cool with that, or try to give even more.

A good asshole is high value, so while he is not a taker, he tends to focus on what's in it for him.

Dating: It's fair to expect that she comes on the first date

Talking about locomotion here.

For example, if you approached, texted first, invited her out, and are going to pay… You're doing most of the work + picking up the tab.

So as long as you meet at a location that is also easy for her to reach, it's fair to expect her to come to you.
You lead and pay, she moves -fair enough deal-.

PRO Tip: justify your kindness

Kindness done the wrong way is risky. It can be misconstrued as:

- Being lower value, with your giving used to "make up the difference"
- Chasing
- Kissing up, as in "social climbing" and "wanting to get something"

And, generally, it can frame you as low-power "too nice guy".

To avoid that your kindness may come back to harm you, here's a tip for you: justify your kindness with a reason for that kindness.
The reason can be what's in it for you, you being the higher power host, or you doing what you always do and like doing.

For example:

> Her: ohh it's so nice of you to invite me out <—- this is a covert power move
> You: I'm inviting you because it's the only way to see if I like you

Note: I'd personally say "to see if we like each other", but since this is the article on how to learn how to be more an asshole…

Or:

> You: what type of food do you feel like
> Him: it's so nice of you to ask, and what would you like
> You: I'm asking you because you're my guest tonight. Let me know what you think and we can talk about it

3. Demand basic respect and decency

Decency and basic respect are in part subjective.

But they're not infinitely subjective, and some basics are more like iron rules.

Some of them might include:

- Always treat each other respectfully

  - No yelling
  - No aggression or threats
- Always treat those you care about respectfully
  - No disrespecting your family and friends
- Stable, level-headed, healthy behavior (99% of the time)
  - No addictions or substance abuse tolerated
  - No damaging property in fits of anger

But may include simpler expectations like:

- Punctuality
  - No constant lateness if you demanded punctuality as a sign of respect
- Following through on promises
  - No empty talk and reneging

You'll need to grow a feel for what you want, and what you can and cannot tolerate.
Once you know what you won't tolerate, same as above: you stand steadfast and it's either she drops it and vows to never again cross that line, or you'll have to take "important decisions".

Reverse of Basic Respect & Decency: Example

My friend had broken up with his girlfriend.

Then one morning, she showed up at his place still drunk after a night out partying.

She woke him up, he took her in, took good care of her, and took her back.

Sometime later, she hit him.
He felt terrible about it, had his doubts about her… But doubled down on his efforts to make it work.

The same girl complained about my friend meeting me too often, and started so much drama one evening, that he had to cancel our next day's appointment.

I love my friend, but he was being a pushover.

A good asshole instead would have done the following:

- She wakes him up early morning, he sends her packing
  - Alternatively, have sex with her, then tell her he has something to work on
- She hits him, he evens things out and ends it -not escalating is also an option, but it must be done with strong shaming and 'never dare again' frames
- She complains he meets his friend too often, he still meets his friend.

An honorable man's way of approaching it would be:

> The point is not whether I see him too often or not, the point is that I like meeting my friend and I expect my partner to be happy if I do things that make me happy and do not harm us

If she insists and just can't be happy if you have good friends, a good asshole may reply: "maybe I am seeing you too often".

4. Cut off those who make you worse off

The image is strong, so keep in mind the general rule: extreme solutions are for extremely poor behavior
There is one caveat to "giving and adding value":

The further you grow, the fewer people can truly add value to you.

That's a good thing. And it also means you must not always demand value to include people in your life -or to like them or love them-.
However, there should at least be a willingness to support you and add value OR gratitude for all you do.

No willingness to chip in and no gratitude are huge red flags of someone's character.

Remember that "adding VS taking value" are all-encompassing terms that include everything, from happiness to wealth, time, energy, and all in between.
It's something most people are naturally aware of.
And still, as obvious as that should be, too many guys, deep in the throngs of emotional attachment, forget to make that natural assessment and ask:

is this person making me better off, or worse off?

If they make you worse off, only a too nice guy would keep being "nice".
A "good asshole" would simply part ways, and that'd be best for all.

Read again the mini case-study above: was my friend's girlfriend making him better off?
Nope, and it showed.
A lot.
My friend was most often upset with her, and rarely happy.

But, at the time of writing, he's still too "nice" to end it.

5. Go for what you want

This is the essence of a good asshole.

Going for what you want is most difficult for nice guys when it means:

- Competing
- Displeasing someone

I'm afraid though that anything worthwhile in life entails competition, as well the displeasure of not always winning those competitions.
The good news, and this might help you shift your mindset, is that:

Competing and winning maximize value creation for everyone.

Drill that into your mind.

The only exceptions are the direct loser(s) of course.
But why should you focus on them?
The net result of competition is still net-positive.

When you refuse to compete because someone might be displeased, you're making the world worse off.
The lower the competition level, the fewer the options and quality for the buyers.
Worst of all is if you could have won. Because it means that whatever the winner does or gets -including women-, he's not gonna provide the best product -or partner-.
So, for you being "too nice", there's going to be one unworthy winner and two losers.

So go out there, and compete.

(Potentially) Her boyfriend is not your concern

This is a potentially grey area of competition:

What if there is already a contract in place -or an official relationship, which is also a form of contract-?

Well, different situations end up at different points on that grey continuum.

However, I think it's entirely possible to make a good argument that, in many circumstances, it's fair for you not to care about her relationship status.
You can read here for more.

After all, if she doesn't deem it worth preserving and respecting… Why should you?

Asshole Archetypes

Assholes don't just overlap (slightly) with high-quality men.

They also overlap with other archetypes of men who can be equally or even more attractive.

Let's review some of them:

1. Honorable With "Asshol-ish Moments"

This isn't even a "sub-type" of asshole.

But it's worth reminding that you can be a high-quality, value-adding man, and still have some "moments" that, if taken on their own, might be labeled "asshol-ish".

Also, some "asshole moments" during a date or an interaction can increase attraction.

"Asshole moments" can provide an attractive edge and stave off the risk you may pass for a low power "too nice guy".
These "moments" also provide emotional spikes, jolt her out of torpor, and pierce the unseductive veil of political correctness.

Of course the effectiveness of "asshole moments" is target-dependent.
Some women are too risk-averse and very *un*attracted to asshole, so with them keep "clean".
These women make for good girlfriends, and you will recognize them for being very feminine, often submissive or unassertive, and generally uncomfortable at anything reeking of "asshol-ish".

But some interactions may benefit from "asshole moments".

See Seduction University for examples.

Asshole Sprinkles in Online Dating

The "asshole sprinkling approach" can be useful in online dating.

And especially so if your online dating profile risks looking to "clean".

I recommend the asshole subtypes of "bad boy", "daredevil" or "rebel" that best match your personality.

If you like bikes, for example, something like this is good:

If you're more of a "straight edge" type, then you may opt for this version of that same "motorcycle theme":

A great mix of "socially proper", "classy high-power", with a touch of daredevil

2. Pro-Social Asshole

The "pro-social asshole" directs his aggression toward the "real" anti-social folk.

Example:

A time ago, walking with an ex-girlfriend, I saw junk-food wrapping in the street right in front of a trash bin.

I thought how stupid people could be, trashing their own cities.

So I walked to it, picked it up, and slammed it in the bin as I commented about the “fucking animals” who can’t even put their trash where it belongs.

My girlfriend, with an emphatic sigh, uttered these verbatim words: “oooh, now I love you even more”.

Circumstantial evidence is not great evidence, but it wasn’t a one-off.
More than once I noticed that anger or an attitude of superiority and/or social climbing on takers is attractive.

And, again, it jibes well with the research we’ve seen in the asshole dating analysis.

So if you dislike someone because of the harm he causes to society, let it rip.

Idealogues and Revolutionaries

Ideologues and revolutionaries can be bad but become “good” for fighting a bigger evil.

Ideologues are more intellectual while revolutionaries are more action-oriented.
As per basic power dynamics, they become more attractive with more power, status, and followers.

Che Guevara is one of the most attractive icons of “revolutionary”

Avoid: virtue-signaling, the weak form of pro-social idealogue

Virtue signaling is the risk-free, low-power, and manipulative way to gain some points of “pro-social ass-holishness”.

Virtue signalers seek power by finger-pointing and attacking the supposed -and often made-up- “bad people”.

However, virtue signalers aren’t very attractive because they’re often low power followers.
They can also look phony as they fail to recognize their own dark side, and many people -and women- can see through that fakeness.

3. Bad Boy

The bad boy is one of the best asshole subsets.

He keeps the positive traits of high power, social confidence, and alluring “slight anti-social edge”, but he isn’t necessarily rude, in your face, or irritating.
And he has more latitude for honesty, feelings, and win-win.

If you were to go for bad-boy type on that same “motorbike theme”:

The Rebel

Similar to the bad boy.

The allure of the rebel is in the strength to reject and buck society's rules of "proper conduct".

By not (completely) toeing the line, the rebel sub-communicates he reaches at least a minimum threshold of self-confidence.
And, if successful, that he can thrive while "living by his own rules", which is not something that everyone can say.

Any alternative lifestyle, including artists, are tamer but potentially even more universally attractive versions of rebels (especially if successful, of course).

PRO Tip: rule-breaking, something you may borrow

Rule-breaking can be very effective to seduce women.

See Seduction University for more.

5. Daredevil

Daredevils are high in fearlessness and are the epitome of unneediness, without the nastiness.

Because their thirst for thrills is so high that cannot be squelched by a run-of-the-mill relationship, they pursue their passion far more than they pursue women -or any individual woman-.

Avoid: Posturing Asshole

The posturing asshole is the guy who pretends to be an asshole as a Hail Mary to attention and reactions.

He's often just at his very first (mis)steps towards self-development, but he overdoes it and only becomes more isolated.

“Asshole Phase” For Growth?

You don’t wake up one day and start flying.

Before you soar, you may bounce off the ground a few times.

Similarly, if one starts off too submissive and passive, he may mistakenly overdo the asshole before settling into a calibrated, optimum balance.

I wouldn’t necessarily call that an “asshole phase”, but more of a “recalibration phase”.

Some authors advise pursuing an asshole phase just to learn assertiveness.
I’m not sure and not convinced it’s a necessary step.

But, in some cases, it may help.

Good Asshole Training

Some ideas to train the “good asshole” within you:

- Tell street solicitors to stop annoying people
- Tell street volunteers you hate whatever cause they’re supporting? WWF No thanks, you eat animals. Unicef? No thanks, you wear a condom for a reason, etc. etc.-
- Publicly share or say a “truth bomb”, something you believe but that is provocative or even offensive to some
- Enjoy and share dark humor, since many too-good men are out of touch with their dark side are ashamed of even enjoying dark humor
- Tell a friend or acquaintance to stop complaining and start moving his ass: which sometimes is exactly what they need to hear
- Tell a feminist that “all women need a man”: hold that frame for a minute or so, then say you were joking. BUT add that still a good chunk of feminists are angry and toxic and she should stay away from that
- Fire annoying customers and tell them why, ie.: their money isn’t worth the trouble they bring, that no money in the world is worth their poor attitude, or that you don’t like them.
  Example here (she thought, and some readers probably also did, I was an asshole)
- Leave public negative reviews after bad services, which actually… Is the most pro-social thing you can do

None of these are “bad asshole” but they start pushing that boundary that nice guys fear is too asshole-like.
And that’s a boundary that sometimes you should be able -and comfortable- crossing.

- Avoid the “be stupid challenge”

To increase social confidence some authors recommend exercises such as:

- “negotiate down the price of a coffee”
- “lay down on a busy street”
- “yell in public”

I’m not a fan of that approach.
Acting like an (annoying) retard is a long detour to social confidence.

If you wanna follow that principle, then get all eyes on you and stick out in a unique, less retard way. Say, wear a suit at the low-end club, or dress like a biker at the opera.

SUMMARY

Sometimes strong and fair boundaries, self-defense, or goal-orientation may be confused by some for asshole behavior.

However, the ability to assert yourself and, when needed, put yourself and your goals first are NOT asshole traits.
They only seem asshole-like to meeker, undriven, low-power, or collectivist virtue signalers who have not come to grips with their own dark side.

In truth, they are important qualities for any man going places -as well non-negotiable traits for any leader taking others to any worthwhile place-.

Sexual Power Dynamics: Who Has the Power in Sex and Dating?

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Sexual power

Understanding sexual power dynamics is essential for anyone who wants to date effectively.

We dig into evolutionary biology and psychology research and mix the author's extensive experience to examine how sexual power dynamics influence the relationships between men and women.

These foundations of sexual power dynamics will help you better navigate dating and relationships, defend yourself when needed, and achieve your goals.

INTRO

Sexual Power Dynamics refers to the patterns of negotiation leverage over sex and sex-related areas.
It reflects the ways men and women exercise agency over access to sex, the quality of sexual experiences, and the relational outcomes that stem from sexual interactions. These dynamics are shaped by biological factors (such as sexual desire and reproductive strategies), social factors (status, reputation, and scarcity), and individual skill (sexual competence, confidence, and interpersonal influence).

Baumeister's sexual economics theory conceptualizes heterosexual sexual relationships as a market, where:

- Women are "sellers" of sexual access, screening sexual partners more carefully
- Men are "buyers", competing for sexual access

We explain the "why" in the overview of the sexual marketplace.
But for our scope here, we start from this basic general premise as a given.

That means that, for most men, there is a gap between how much sex they want and how much they can get.

In simpler terms: most men want more sex than they can get.

This leads to the first major point of sexual power dynamics:

Women Have Sexual Power

Generally speaking:

Women are the gatekeepers of sex, and gatekeepers have power over anyone who "wants in".

In sex, women have one of the -sometimes the most- powerful tools of dating.

In social exchange terms, that power is negotiation leverage.
With that leverage, women can field any demand to men.

Obviously, it's only in prostitution that the demand becomes direct and explicit.
But even in indirect and covert terms, that exchange is one of the most important factors of dating power dynamics.

For example, in most "standard dating", in exchange for sex and/or continued sexual access, women often demand initial courtship, investment, support and, possibly, even commitment before sex even takes place.

Of course, outside of relationships, women can also get all kinds of other stuff with sex or the promise of sex.
It might not be an exaggeration to say that women can trade sex -or the hint of sex- to get anything else, while men trade anything else for sex.

It might sound crude to put it that way, but it's an important rule of social and sexual dynamics.

Women's sexual power is strongest:

- Before sex
- With men who have limited options
- With men who lust after her, or her particular type of woman

The Limits of Women's Sexual Power

However, there are some important limits to women's sexual power:

1. Women's sexual power decreases after sex happens the first time, sometimes precipitously. That means that the leverage is highest before sex happens
2. Women's sexual power matters less during relationships, because intimacy becomes part of the relationship, and a given. That means that female sexual power is higher during dating
3. Women's sexual leverage is smaller with men who can easily get sex, as per simple supply and demand

The Evolution of Sexual Pleasure

Some quick theory now to understand the foundations of sexual dynamics.

While the scholarly debate hasn't settled on female orgasm, Geoffrey Miller proposes an interesting theory.
He suggests that the duration and intensity of copulation in a species is a clue to the power of female choice.
Longer copulation, elusive female orgasms and continuous sexual receptivity allows women to 'test' the best men.

So:

- Vaginas discriminate, and helps to select males who are able and willing provide pleasurable foreplay, sustained copulation, and good intensity
- Penises don't discriminate: just like men in general, penises are 'easier to sexually please', and ejaculate more easily

The way masturbation works for the two genders is also very telling in this regard.
It took millions of years and much human ingenuity to achieve maximum female pleasure with (relatively) complex mechanical stimulation via vibrators.

And although men can also enjoy inflating dolls and virtual reality, their peak level of pleasure via masturbation is still largely the same. And it's simple to achieve: just a hand away.
Basically, the same since our cavemen's days:

Even in the tech age, a man just needs a hand -or a sock?- to reach the peak amount of sexual pleasure
That's a very important difference when it comes to sex power dynamics.
It means that:

Men Have Sexual Pleasure Power

Female pleasure matters more in sexual dynamics.

Evolutionary theories even suggest that men may have evolved to pursue female pleasure and orgasm.

And this leads us to a conundrum:

Sex empowers women but quality of sex empowers men more than women.

Put differently, sexual access is a tool of female power while sexual skills are a tool of male power.
That's the general principle.

Women's sexual pleasure is highly variable ranging from negative, to a lack of peak, to screaming and shaking consecutive pleasure peaks and equally pleasurable valleys
From a strategic point of view, it means that men gain more by improving their sexual skills than women do.
Not saying it's useless for women to be good in bed, but improving one's sexual skills has a much higher ROI for men, than for women.

Great Sex Is Negotiation Leverage

Let's focus on providing good sex now.

Providing great sex does afford power.

Whenever you can provide something that others want, that gives you power.

Do you remember when talking about the sexual market place we said that people with an over-abundance of value in one category can allow themselves to give less in another category?

The same concept applies to sex.
Men who provide her with great sex can have women go over to their places without investing much else in the relationship.

Women can also have men come over for sex, of course, and they do it all the time.
Not just going over for sex, but also bringing gifts.
But that's because men want more sex than they can get, and not necessarily because she is particularly skilled in the art of sexual fulfillment.

Most men with a mostly sexual relationship and nothing else on the plate instead need to offer more than just basic sex.
All else excluded, they need to offer great sex (if we include all else, then one could also offer fun time, healing time, drugs, etc. etc. but we're not discussing that now).

Great sex matters most with high sex drive women

Sexual pleasure affords men most power with:

1. High sex drive woman
2. Orgasmic / libertine woman
3. Several orgasms -in a row-
4. Several sessions of sex with orgasms

In those cases, his value is extremely higher in the "sex" department, and his power shoots up after sex.

In terms of "great sex" VS "OK sex" in our straight-line seduction model:

The perceived quality of first-time sex heavily influences the dating (power) dynamics

In some fringe cases, his power may even get into the red zone.
If the woman is not very confident she may think that she's either not good enough for him, or that he's a guy who is ONLY into sex.
Many of these women often self-reject and do not want to see him again -especially if they're looking for a relationship-.

We'll later have a lesson on how to convert one-time sex (including big bang sex) into regulars and relationships.

The Limits of Male Sexual Power

That being said, there are limitations to men's use of great sex as well.

To begin with:

1. Sex matters little in pre-sex dating (ie.: you can't start with great sex)

Sex comes later.

In terms of social exchange parlance, it's an inner-layer trait, so it's invisible upon first meeting someone (it's "opaque").

And in simple terms: sex skills are not what initially attracts women, it doesn't put your foot in the door.

So, at least in temporal terms, when it comes to partner's attraction, sex takes a backfoot to more visible layers such as status, health, beauty, etc.
This is one of the reasons why so far I've never taken any course on sexual skills. NOT because it's not useful -and NOT necessarily because I wouldn't need :)-.
But because, in terms of pure effectiveness, it's usually better to prioritize external layers and/or to focus on meeting new women.
Same reason why I don't care much about back hair, BTW, they come later, and are rarely deal-breakers.

It's only once the couple gets to sex, that sex also enters the computation of sexual market value.

Sexual Game

It's certainly possible to advertise great sex before sex, and use that to get to sex.

Men can do it both with direct talk, or with mannerism that exudes sexuality and sexpertise.
See Seduction University for examples.

But then we're not strictly talking about sex anymore.
That's more about self-promotion, as well as advertising comfort around sex.
And of course, it's also possible to fake that since a man may advertise sex as something great for her, and then give two f*cks about following through and make it all about himself instead.

2. Sex Loses Some Leverage Over The Long Term

In fresh relationships, sex takes the center stage.

In casual dating in more libertine dating, there isn't even much else aside from sex.

But as the relationship progresses, her needs and wants also change.

Women often start demanding more than just "meeting and having sex".
So the power of sex gets diluted with the other currencies she demands, such as support, loyalty, fathering, etc.

Take this one as an example:

This relationship crashed and burned in spite of that initial off-the-charts chemistry.

She wanted and was adamant on a relationship. I like her a lot but couldn't offer commitment.
And there was no great sex that could have saved it, without eventually committing (albeit it might have been used to prolong it and turn it into a semi-toxic entanglement).

Sex and attraction are also intertwined.
Great sex can be extremely effective in boosting attraction, and heightening her feelings of love and admiration.
But a relationship that turns sour also often negatively impacts sexual pleasure.

In short: it's unlikely a man can keep a woman who seeks a relationship just by providing great sex.
In the long run, more is required.

This is especially true for high-quality women who more easily get men and investment.
They have more dating power, and they more assertively demand what they believe should get.

The "Toy Boy Trap": When You're A 1-Trick Sex Pony

Remember the "lovers & providers" strategy?

The worst type of provider was a provider of a meager income, without much else.
And the worst type of lover is a provider of OK sex, without much else.

The same logic can be extended to great sex providers.
If all a man has got to give are orgasms, then she is the chooser and he is a provider (of sex).
Not a bad position to be in, in many ways.

But if he is clueless about power dynamics, then he becomes a toyboy.
Not much different from a billionaire having sex with a dumb bimbo.
As a matter of fact, bimbos and toyboys are the same roles, for the different genders.

Disempowered As Toy-Boy: Low Prower Provides

I'll give you an example:

I once had a woman who left a girlfriend of hers waiting in the car to show up at my place.

A blonde Russian with a furry coat, she showed up at my door with that coat… And nothing underneath.

Hot.

And as soon as we were done, she left without saying a word, but grinning a big smile.
That smile was not just because of sex, but also because she was high on her feeling of power.

And she wasn't wrong: she came, literally and figuratively, and left.
All on her will and time.

The more a man's value is limited to sex only, the easier it is to replace him with a pleasure-providing tool

Compare: High-Power Makes Others Worried to Provide

Now compare that with the sexual experience with another woman, K.

I went for anal sex with K, but had to stop because it was painful, and we kept doing normal vaginal sex.

Not an issue at all, I'm not into anal and couldn't have cared less.

Once we were done, as we lay in sweat, her resting on top of me, I was enjoying the silence.
Brief silence, though. K. soon raised her head and asked "are you OK?".
I nodded.
Little later she asked again "are you OK that we did not… ".

What was going on there?
K. was worried that I was disappointed that she could not provide the anal experience.

In which situations does the man have more power?

Of course, the latter.

From a power dynamic perspective, having your partner worry about making you happy with good sex is more powerful than you giving great sex.

These examples are at different extremes.
As a general rule, we can say that sex is another important piece of the sexual market value.
As a standalone, good sex is not enough to make one an overall high-value mate. But a lack of good sex can be a major drawback with mates who want and expect great sex.

Power and Sex

Power, dominance, and sex are interrelated.

For example:

- Women prefer higher-power men

- Men seek power to gain sexual access, suggest evolutionary theories
- Testosterone fuels sexual and dominance motives (Toatest, 2020), suggesting higher power men are more driven to seek sex and dominate in intimate settings

However, there is an important difference here.
Power empowers men far more than it empowers women in most sex-related areas.

Women often prefer men of higher status and dominance, which limits the options of lower status men, but increases the negotiation leverage of higher status men.
I'd also suspect that more powerful men, both socially and interpersonally, enjoy higher attraction from women.

On the other hand, for many men, it's the opposite: they prefer submissive women.
Meaning, power and success may be costly to women's dating and sexual power.

How to Invite a Girl Over: 5 Smooth Techniques for High-Value Men

Lucio Buffalmano · 11 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Inviting a woman to your place can feel like a delicate moment. Do it right, and the evening flows naturally toward connection and intimacy.

In this guide, you'll learn five proven ways to invite her over—smoothly, confidently, and without ever feeling pushy.

The direct home invite is not necessarily "wrong", but it's also not the most effective.

So let's dive in with the most effective approaches:

Contents

- 1. Invite Her After The Last Venue, Nonchalantly
  - Rationale
  - Example
- 2. Invite Her While You Walk Away ("Positive-Pressure Technique")
  - Example:
- 3. Seed During Date, Recall The Seed As A Ruse ("Seed The Pull Technique")
  - Example:
  - Should you seed the pull?
- 4. Drip-Feed The Invite During The Date ("Breadcrumbing Technique")
- 5. Invite Her As You "Happen To Walk" By Your Place ("Surprise Technique")
- 6. Avoid This: Never Explicitly Tell Her, But Walk Her To Your Place ("Shock-Surprise")
  - My personal experience with it
- Don't Over-Sweat The "How"

1. Invite Her After The Last Venue, Nonchalantly

My personal favorite together with #2.

In simple terms, you invite her home after you left the last venue -which is also the first venue if you're doing one-venue dates-.

Here's the process.

1. At your last venue say "shall we go" when you're ready to go and after a high: a "high" is any positive exchange you had.
   Say it with an intonation that is 30% question and 70% statement. Think of "a question that's not really a question and with one answer only: yes". Leave it at that, don't add any details. See Seduction University for the intonation.
2. Start walking: if your place is in the same direction as your destination, start walking
   1. If your place is in the opposite direction, invite on the way out of the venue or right outside the venue (whichever is most natural).
3. On a high say "hey, do you wanna come over just 5 minutes" at this stage, lighter topics are better than heavier ones, but go with anything that feels good. Then, on a high, say "hey, do you wanna come over 5 minutes".
   1. If she says "yes", you say "cool", and then keep on talking
   2. If she asks "where", you say something like "I'm staying really near, we can go for a quick drink"
   3. If she says she's not sure, up to you, but it's probably preferable to at least nudge again
   4. If she says "no", you may say "are you sure, I could show you X". If she says "no" again, you say "cool, OK". If she can stay longer, go to another venue as it's best to spend more time together after a no. If she says she must go, you say "cool" and walk her back
4. Walk towards your place and be ready to carry most of the conversation

Rationale

Many ways of inviting home can work well.

But I prefer after you've left the last venue because in that stage she's not sure what's going to happen, and she's looking for leadership.
And if you had a good time and/or if you displayed good traits, she wants to stay longer with you.
It's the perfect situation to invite her, lead and have her want to follow.

If you propose it in the first venue instead it becomes a more rational choice.
The vibe while you're sitting is more about mutual assessment, and many women don't want to be known as the girl who says yes on the first date.

Example

For real-life example see SEDUCTION UNIVERSITY

Seduction University here.

2. Invite Her While You Walk Away ("Positive-Pressure Technique")

To make this work you invite her:

1. After the last venue
2. While walking towards your place and her transport back home

3. While she's still not sure what you'll do next

This is especially effective when:

1. It's a great date
2. You have a good chemistry
3. It's still early

Why is it good in those cases?
Because all of them are leverage for you and (positive) pressure on her.

When you're close to the metro or to her car all those elements heap up pressure on her because it's either she goes home early and interrupts the good time or she comes to yours to keep enjoying you and the evening.

If you're having a good time and she likes and trusts you, the "positive pressure" method ensures she'll pick your place rather than go home
In a way, it's a Machiavellian ploy.
However, it's a victimless Mach ploy -or even a value-adding one-.

So it works like this:

1. Walk towards the metro stop without saying anything about next plans
   1. If she asks where you're going you remain non-committal, something like "lemme think of something"
2. You stop or slow down by the metro, the sub-communication being "you can either go home now, or join me"
3. Say "hey, do you wanna come over 5 minutes"

Alternate versions include not slowing down, keeping your pace, and delivering that line as you approach the metro.

Use momentum & "path of least resistance" with a "more to come" vibe

To execute it well the vibe MUST be that you'll probably spend more time together during that same evening.

Or, at least, it's still not sure what's going to happen.

That's crucial because if she's already made up her mind that she will go home, then your chances plummet.
If her mind is made up to back to hers, coming home with you feels like a big change. All sorts of questions will pop up and, women being risk-averse, chances she'll stick with the pre-planned and safer option.

People in general also tend to go for the path of least resistance, not for the change.
So if the vibe is that "the night is young, we're having a good time and we'll spend more time together", then the momentum when you pop the invite works in your favor.

So this approach won't work well if her car is parked far away, or if the metro is in the middle of nowhere.
If that's the case, then walking away from the city sub-communicates that "the night is ending".
It works great instead if her car or the metro are in the middle of the city and/or nightlife.
And it works even better if you went to some side street for your date and walking back feels like "going back to the city" (another reason why good logistics and living in the center is helpful).

Example:

For real-life example see SEDUCTION UNIVERSITY

Seduction University here.

3. Seed During Date, Recall The Seed As A Ruse ("Seed The Pull Technique")

"Seeding the pull" is a concept of the early pick-up artist movement.

When it comes to inviting a girl home, "seeding the pull" means:

> To open conversational threads about anything noteworthy, good, or interestg that can be had, seen, or enjoyed at your place and to use them later on as ruse to invite her home to enjoy that noteworthy thing

The seed also provides women with "plausible deniability".

Such as, it protects her from feeling slutty because, on paper, she's just coming for that interesting thing you mentioned.

So, in simple terms, this is seed:

1. Say during the date you got something interesting at your place
2. When the date is nearing the end, invite her to see that interesting thing

So if the man in the picture above seeded his wine cellar, he would recall that information when it's time to invite the girl home.
And he would say something like "hey, wanna come over and check the wine collection"?

Example:

An example of the second part of the seeding technique:

> Capote: wanna come back to my place and see the Ross Bleckner?

Capote Duncan most likely talked about his Ross Bleckner painting at home and, if it went particularly well, she said she love Bleckner's work.
Then, when the date is ending, instead of saying "do you want to come back to my place", he invites her to "see the Ross Bleckner".

The ruse provides her with plausible deniability and helps to "erase" the association between going to his place, having sex, and "being too easy".

Should you seed the pull?

Yes, it certainly won't hurt and it often helps.

I don't consider it a must and if you execute #1 and #2 well it won't hurt you to omit it.

Still, if you wanna be even more on the safer side, seed it.
Remember the rule though:

1. Make it natural
2. Seed something true -no puppy you don't have or skyline cityview at the first floor-
3. Keep it simple and short, don't overdo it
4. Ideally, tailor the seed to something she likes

PRO Tip: Tailor The Seed

The best ways to seed anything is to follow the golden rule of "what's in it for her" and tailor it.

So from the example from the initial picture, the man wouldn't necessarily volunteer that he has a cellar home, but he would try to find something about his place that appeals to her tastes.
And if the topic of wine comes up and she says she loves wine, THEN he'd jump on that occasion because it's tailored:

Tailoring the seed to her tastes is what makes the invite home work

4. Drip-Feed The Invite During The Date ("Breadcrumbing Technique")

The breadcrumbing technique consists of dropping various hints of pull during the date.

The hints can be in various forms, ranging from questions, to statements, to screens.
Whatever you use, the goal is to reach the final invite that it feels not like a big step, but like a foregone conclusion.

Todd uses and teaches this technique.
Here's an example:

> Todd: Are you innately a trusting or distrusting person
> Her: I would say trusting (…) I would hope so
> Todd: are you a trustworthy person
> Her: yes

Todd is screening and checking how open she is to going back with him.
And he very indirectly suggests a pull home with the "trusting" topic -a common thought for women when it comes to going back to a man's place-.

And he makes it more obvious right after:

> Todd: so at some point, not right now, maybe later this evening or in the future I felt as I wanted to open up like and like tell you about myself, you'd be a worthy recipient of such information and trustworthy..
> Her: lock it in

Dragging Out The Words

Besides spreading the invite over the date, you can also drag out the words by talking…. Slowly… As If… There Were…. Suspension Marks…

Why would you do that?

By dragging out the words and remaining vague you can read and analyze her reaction before you finish and commit to the invite.
The goal is to complete the invite only if you are sure you'll get a yes. If you spot reticence instead you haven't fully committed to the invite and you can still either drop it, change topic, or deny it was even an invite -you know, she was getting those "strange ideas" about things you weren't even thinking about it-.
Ultimately, the goal is to forestall the risk of a "no" and avoid losing power.

Notice how Todd speaks in the video:

> Todd: there is one place I'd take you but it's like…
> (long pause)
> I want to know you…
> (pause)
> better first… Kind of

Todd is hoping that she will jump in to fill the pauses and either sdk more about this place, or reveal her willingness to go.
Which happens a little later:

> Todd: that's the way, like… I was actually as surprised… I was surprised to find it's like…
> Her: where is it
> Todd: it's close, but… How do I know I can trust you. How do I know that you won't like… You know… Steal my kidneys and you know… Sell them on the black market on something

Now Todd hopes she will volunteer reasons why she's trustworthy enough to go with him -ie.: that she will qualify to him-.
A clever and high-power approach, if she qualifies.
Issue is… Many women have some basic power awareness and few will jump in. Only the ones who are either chasing hard, hyper-sold, or clueless will do it. And those, you can probably invite anyway without dragging it out.

The other issue is that you can sound gamey and tentative, and you don't generally want to come across gamey and tentative.

5. Invite Her As You "Happen To Walk" By Your Place ("Surprise Technique")

Geographically, with the "surprise technique" you deliver the invite rather in front of your place.

1. Keep your next steps vague
2. Walk by your place
3. Say something like "I live here"
4. Give a reason to go up

The reason to go up can be a previous seed, to "show something", or simply to "show her the place".
A high-dominance approach is to say that "you want to go up".

This technique is a step closer to the “trick approach” we discourage below, so it’s not my favorite.

However, it’s not a trick because you haven’t lied about the destination and haven’t misled her.
Plus, she knows where she’s going before walking in.
And finally, one of the few guys I can vouch for after having seen him in action uses this approach, and it works great for him.

So if you like it, feel free to go for this one or at least try it out.

6. Avoid This: Never Explicitly Tell Her, But Walk Her To Your Place (“Shock-Surprise”)

Let me say this first:

Yes, there are ways to never make the invite explicit and make it work.
For example, if you say “let’s go watch a movie”, you don’t necessarily need to add “to my place” as that can be implied.

However, the less explicit you are, the easier it is to be misunderstood and deliver a jolting, negative “shock surprise” (plus, the way some dating coaches teach it is a manipulative trick).
And if she misunderstood, even if she liked you, you risk losing a lot of points.

This is exactly the shock surprise you want to avoid:

That is exactly the type of “surprise” that you want to avoid
The other issue with the trick approach is that it’s either she comes in, or the odds of a second date drop to close to zero.

With the other methods, a “no” is not necessarily the end of it.

Whenever she says “no” you can either go to another venue, or cooly reply “OK great, I’ll walk you to the metro then”.
And you can still come across as a high-value, high-quality man.

With the “trick surprise” instead you’ll come across as a sneaky trickster, and that’s quite low value.

My personal experience with it

Albeit I never liked the “take her to your place without ever mentioning your place” approach, I do have experience with it.

I tried it a couple of times and I did it a few times more out of mistake (I wasn’t direct enough and she misunderstood).

A few times it semi-worked in the sense that she did come up.
But my intuition told me it would have worked the same -or better- if I had been clearer from the start.
But I clearly remember two instances where she went straight away to the balcony. When she beelines for the balcony it’s because you’re too low warmth, and she doesn’t trust being at home in a closed space with you.

And that makes sense: why should she trust someone who got her home with a sneaky trick?

I clearly remember two total failures as well.

Once she refused to come up because she thought we were going to another venue.
And my insistence was the final nail in the coffin.

I then gave it a couple more tries, and finally decided I was done with this approach. It was not only sleazy as f*ck, but also not very effective.
The craziest thing?
When I reported it on the forum to the (many) who supported the approach, they still insisted that defending the lie was the way to go.
They said that I had done it right almost until the end, and it failed because I was supposed to insist more saying that the “the bar” was right upstairs”.

Albeit I totally agree that it may work, it seems to clear to me that it doesn’t work equally well across the board, and with every type of personality.
And I had to wonder what wretched idiots those guys were bringing home.

As an aside, that was when I also started growing a bit wary of the various PUA communities.

Don’t Over-Sweat The “How”

Generally speaking, how you invite her home is important.

Everything is important, of course, and the inviting home is one of the crucial dating transitions.

Still, the date itself and how you come across generally matters more than the actual invite.
So focus more on how you act, talk, and lead during the date, than on executing a flawless invite home.

Purposefully, I tried an experiment with a date that I didn’t enjoy too much and wasn’t concerned about “ruining it”.
And what I did is that I invited her home in the worst way I could and see if it might still work.

Listen up for yourself:

SEDUCTION UNIVERSITY only

> Me: (outside the venue, point blank, no smoothing around the edges) do you want to come?
> Her: where?
> Me: to the hotel
> Her: where?
> Me: to the hotel

> Her: hmmmm but now… OK

That is not an invitation or excuse to be sloppy, of course.
But it's to put things in perspective: do your best, and do your best to make your invite home as smooth as possible as well.
But perfection is often not required.

Sexual Escalation: How to Smoothly Escalate to Sex

Lucio Buffalmano · 14 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Sexual escalations are one of the key transition phases of any seduction.

And it's one of the toughest ones to learn.

In this article, we are going to learn exactly how to sexually escalate with women and get to sex, with proven and tested strategies.

INTRO

This is the issue that stumps most guys:

You seldom get a total green light from a woman when you make your “first move”.
Many times instead, you get a lukewarm reaction, or even a rejection.

And how you handle those “less than total green lights” makes the difference between successful seductions, and failed ones.

Let’s dig deeper:

Sexual Escalations Power Dynamics

The power dynamics principle of sexual escalation is:

⚖ The more you get rejected, the more power and attraction you lose

This is a basic corollary of the Social Investment Model:

The more you pursue sex without getting sex, the more disempowered you are.
The more smoothly you get to sex, the high-power you are.

Avoiding the “low-power” quadrant

Rejections are particularly harmful when they’re strong, closely spaced, and poorly handled.

For example, men who try incessantly without moving forward expend lots of effort without results. And men who get emotionally affected “thread-expand” those rejections and spoil the mood.

In both cases, the frame of you (unsuccessfully) chasing and she refusing becomes stronger.
And the stronger that frame becomes, the more power and attraction you lose.

That also applies to “token resistance” from women who otherwise like you.

So, how do you properly escalate to sex?

This is how:

1. Start When She's Ready

So simple, yet so foundational.

Prevention beats cure.

When you start too early, you're almost bound to get (strong) rejections.
Starting too early can derail seductions even with women who liked you, but needed a bit more time.

Correct prevention hinges on:

1. Calibration by reading the signs of her "readiness"
2. Mindset of a seducer rather than a notch-collector

⍰ Mindset: Think Of Your Place As A Seduction Alcove

Some men equate their place with quick sex (I was one of them).

That mindset frames any resistance or delays, no matter how reasonable and genuine, as "games" and "unneeded waste of time".
Albeit this mindset can lead to fast intimacy, it also makes you less effective with women who simply need some more time and comfort.

Better than to view your place as "another step along the way of seduction", a "place to savor and deepen your intimacy" (in the larger sense of "growing closer").

Some practical steps:

1. Develop rapport during the date
2. At home, initially, focus on her comfort: many women are wary of entering a new space alone with you.
   To smoothen that transition and help her acclimatize:
   1. Show her your place: a quick tour makes the new place feel "known" and safer
   2. Spend some time in "intermediate locations": a rooftop, the pool, or simply the kitchen in your house
   3. Sit on the couch: If she's not ready for the bed, sit on the couch with a drink, a laptop for music, or a TV
3. Verbalize that she's safe: If you spot fear, verbalize it. Say "you're safe here, OK?" or "that's the door, we can go whenever we want".
4. Frame sex with you as her win: for example, the chance of growing closer, starting something serious, or the pleasure side of it ("sexual prizing")
5. Make her horny: rather than "getting sex", focus on making her want it

⍰ How To Gauge Her Readiness Before The Move

Here's what to look for:

- How quickly she undresses

Women can use clothes as barriers.

If she keeps her coat and shoes, she might not yet be fully comfortable.

Conversely, when I see a woman who's down to her sundress… I know that she's comfortable and probably good to go (I make my move then and rarely have any resistance).

- How comfortably she moves around your place

Women who walk around and touch things are often excited.
Make a move building on that excitement, and things often move fast.

- How much she talks (compared to her baseline behavior)

Talking communicates either comfort, or an effort to reduce internal tension.

Both are good signs.
Make your move.

- Her behavior when first sitting down

For example:

Does she place something on her, between you two (including empty space), or pulls her skirt down?
Those are attempts to have barriers between you two.

2. Start Small (Baby-Stepping Approach)

You can think of "big move" VS "baby steps" similar to "direct VS indirect approach".

Direct approach is ballsy and if it goes well, you're flying.
But indirect maintains your power in more situations.
And when you're not sure, it's better to maintain more power.

Same for escalation: if you're not sure, start with a "smaller move".
If it won't well, smaller move equals smaller rejection. So it won't hurt you as much. And you can more easily and smoothly minimize it and move on.

Finally, baby steps also allow you to test her buying temperature, rather than just observing.

⍰Example: Baby-Stepping With a Shisha

A guy I know has a shisha home.

He uses it both as a “seed” to invite girls home, and as a prop for baby-stepping.

He takes a drag himself, looks at her as he exhales, and says “smell the scent”.
Then he blows shisha smoke from mouth to mouth with his hand in between. Then removes the hand and goes for the mouth-to-mouth smoke, then makes out, and then takes it from there.

⍰ Tips For Baby-Stepping Escalation

Here’s how to use baby-stepping for both escalation and “gauging temperature”:

- Increase touching, see how she reacts

Start light, and see how she reacts.

If at home, wrap your arm around her, see how she reacts.

If she pulls away or is uncomfortable, bad sign.
If she appreciates, good sign.

Touching you back, or just touching you in general, is often a great signal

- Get up to do something, go back sitting closer, see how she reacts

Get up for something (glass of water, restroom, or getting something).

Then sit closer to her when you're back.
See how she reacts.
If she stays, make your move a little later.
If she pulls away, spend some more time.

- Use in-between places for the first move–gauging

In-between places are places between your date and your place.

They're great because women feel safer, and have lower in-built resistance.

For example, if you got an elevator, lean in and kiss her neck in the elevator.

As soon as you kiss the neck, pull away so she knows you're still "normal".

If she stands still, it's a good sign. If she caresses your or gets closer, you can start escalating as soon as you're home.

If she resists a little bit, make her more comfortable before you start escalating.

From my experience, a girl is more likely to well-receive your first move in an elevator, than at home.

- Baby-step escalation, but pull back first (teasing)

Move closer to her face, or run your hand on her thigh… But pull back first.

Do it a few times, then go all the way.

Tip: If You're Starting Out, Escalate Sooner Rather Than Later

If you're afraid of making the move, then learning is higher priority.

In that case, make your move early.

As a matter of fact, give yourself a timer: make your move within 10 minutes.

3. Move Forward Steadily But Safely (Tidal Wave Approach)

Tidal escalation means to forge ahead in baby steps, slow but steady.

Neither baby-stepping nor tidals are my favorite approaches.

But they're our #1 method for sexual escalation because they're effective.

When a woman is hot and ready, you can take her hand and move (almost) anywhere for intimacy.
The thing is: tidal escalation ALSO works with those women.
Just a little less fast and maybe less power. But you still get there.

Where this approach makes the difference is with women who are on the fence, potentially warming up to you, but need some more time.
You lose many of those women if you go too fast or too dominant.
But you can get together with a large number of them with the tidal wave.
And that includes a lot of shier, more girlfriend-material types of women.

The tidal wave is the perfect analogy to move forward, but without big jolts that can derail the seduction or spoil the mood.

Early pick-up artists talked about "2 steps forward, 1 step back".
It means that you make your move not to go all the way at once, but simply to advance.

In a perfect tidal escalation you want to pull back before she resists and rejects you.
Then, when you re-initiate, you go further than before, without ever prompting her to stop you.
Rejections are fine, but still… Getting intimate without ever being rejected is a good "ideal goal" to aim to (and might as well be the "ideal seduction").

?Principles of Tidal Escalation

You want to:

1. Strike when she's ready
2. Start with baby step: small move, rather than huge ones
3. Minimize rejections: how significant or insignificant rejections are, in good part, depends on you and how you react:
   1. Think and believe nothing major happened: and congruent action will follow
   2. Act like nothing happened: keep on doing whatever you were doing normally
   3. Talk a bit right after: it sub-communicates that you're unfazed
   4. Complete the move: this is more advanced and you must be careful with it. Ensure she wants you first, and details in our courses
4. Stop soon after a rejection: not always immediately after or it might seem like she's dictating the tempo. But soon after she stops you, stop. That way, rejections remain smaller and mostly inconsequential
5. Take breaks between rejections: to avoid the "lots of effort / no result" low-power quadrant
6. Rebuild power in-between your advances (and, often, rebuild comfort as well): you lose some power after she stops you, so take breaks to rebuild power and comfort
7. Keep effort balanced: remember the basics of dating power dynamics. To keep it balanced, make her contribute. Tell her to sit close, to go get a glass, to pick a song, etc.

> The 5 Basic Principles of Dating Power Dynamics

⍰ Example: Tidal Escalation Process (+ Calibration)

What I used to do in Berlin was to:

1. Enter the house, say something about it: what you like, why it's messy, why it's so clean… Simple stuff to get you talking
2. Shoes out in the entrance
3. Take her coat/offer a water
4. Show her the place
5. Go to the kitchen
6. Show the lights

   Gauge her reaction: a woman raptly listening is accepting his power
7. Introduce the "surprise" of the Bluetooth speaker in the lamp

   Gauge her reaction: lots of "wow" often hide sexual excitement rather than tech excitement
8. Play something with my phone

   Gauge her reaction: IF she gets close, then:
9. Take her hand and move her towards me

   Gauge her reaction: IF she embraces me or stays, then:
10. Take her hand and move to the bedroom
11. Kiss her neck again there: if accepts, start making out

    Gauge her reaction: if she accept but doesn't want to make out, grope each other and if she participates, move to the bed. If you're making out, make out a few seconds and then move to the bed.
    If she's still stand-offish, move to the couch.

This escalation process is effective because it self-calibrates to move at the right speed.
Resistances are smaller resistances to smaller steps, so they never frame me as over-chasing, never spoil the mood, and never derail seductions.

*You can swap "lights" and "speaker" for whatever you have, albeit I do recommend a phone-handled controller so that she can get close to you.

⍰ PRO Tip: Look & ask for participation

Better than reacting is participating.

When the woman participates, for example, hugs you back, that's a far stronger signal than just "not moving away".

As mentioned already, we advise that you even ask for her participation.
For example: tell her to switch on the lamps, take the glasses, open the bottle, or pick a song.

⍰ Example: Real-Life Tidal Escalation

First, a pictorial image:

In red are physical escalation or semi-physical escalation (such as telling her to sit closer and then putting an arm around her).

This was a “first date at home” arrangement.
And, generally speaking, first dates at home tend to be tidal waves (and it’s best to approach them as tidal waves).

Notice that it’s a full 1 hour 10 minutes before I make a move.
And it’s another hour before I make the “final move” of moving to the bed.
It was probably over-conservative and an earlier move would have been totally fine -or even better-.
But as long as it’s not so long that the mood and chemistry fizzle out, you’re good.

The full case study is in:

Case Study in Seduction University

As the escalation gets more intimate, the talking time is not only briefer, but also with a lower tonality.

⍰ Tips for Maximum Effectiveness

Further tips:

1. When things heat up, increase passion

The more things heat up, the more passionate you want to become.
When it’s “on” you can then go for full intimacy.

Signs that it’s “on”:

- She’s comfortable with her hands on you (possibly on your penis)
- She enjoys making out
- You’re groping her (possibly with intimate touches)

90% of the women at this point should be good to go.

For the most conservative, still the same: stop and chill for a bit.
Then re-initiate.

You then move to the bed when:

- She's kissing you passionately
- She enjoys intimate contact and/or moves with you when "dry humping"
- Her hands are on you and/or seek your dick

And the ultimate sign:

- She starts panting and moaning

2. Kiss The Neck, Not The Mouth

The kiss on the mouth feels like a "big move".

That increases the odds of rejection, and it's a big deal rejection -she does not want to kiss you-.
Bad for power dynamics, bad for attraction, and only leads to more resistance down the road.

So kiss her on the neck instead.
Feels like a "smaller" move, allows you to better gauge her reaction, and has higher chances of being accepted.

Also, if you're moving quickly and/or going for the lover strategy, you don't need to kiss at all.

3. Be More Sexual On The Date If You Only Have a Bed At Home

Generally speaking, we don't recommend kissing on the date.

But there are exceptions.

If your place only has a bed or ugly single chairs, it might be a good idea to escalate more before going back home.

That is because the jump from "date" to "sex location" is huge when she enters a new unfamiliar place and a bed is all there is.
Sitting at the bedside might work, but the odds that she will balk, refuse to enter, or want to leave ASAP are just higher.

So if you can't baby-step at home, start the sexual escalation before you go in.

⍰ Sexual Escalation Mindsets

Some solid sexual escalation mindsets:

- I like her, and as long as we're here, I will escalate. She can refuse or leave at any time
- I like her and will do my best to make us intimate (if it doesn't happen, I may not like it, but it's cool)
- My job is to make intimacy good for both. She has the right to refuse (and I may not like that, but will always respect it)
- Token resistances are part of the dance and sharpen the appetite

Sometimes you can even verbally state those mindsets.
They're very eagle-like, so they'll often give you points.

And once again:

It's A Mating Dance, You Both Play It

Remember this:

Playing coy is often part and parcel of the mating process.

Some women may put up token resistance during sexual escalation even when they're making the moves themselves.

Once a woman sat on top of me –she did that- and pushed her bra down –she did that- for me to kiss her breast.
All the while she kept saying "no, Lucio, no" (for women reading here: avoid doing that).
And then more last-minute resistance (LMR) when we moved the bed.

This is a classic example of 'Token Resistance' where a woman's physical desire is in conflict with social conditioning or 'Anti-Slut Defense.' While she verbally says 'no,' her actions are inviting the lead. Navigating this requires calibration to ensure you are following her physical green lights while being a 'calm harbor' for her verbal hesitation.

The goal is to avoid seduction-damaging rejections and endless last-minute resistances, but the goal is not to avoid rejections or LMR altogether, at all costs.

Best of all, is to enjoy them.
As Casanova said:

> A little resistance sharpens the appetite.
> When favor is granted with too much ease it loses a great deal of its charm.

The Four Agreements: OK Self-Help, Packaged For Naive Readership (Book Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 14 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Four Agreements (1997) is a spiritual book in which author Don Miguel Ruiz teaches to overcome societal indoctrination to reach true happiness and self-fulfillment.

TPM Strategic Takeaway: Some Good Mindsets, With Pop Psychology & Marketing For the Masses. While some principles are valid, the "Ancient Wisdom" marketing frame falls flat for critical thinkers and ambitious men. Generic 'agreements' won't cut it to achieve mental empowerment and goals without calibration, skills, and personal power.

Summary

About the Author:
Miguel Ruiz is a Mexican expert and author of Toltec and neo-shamanic texts.
Here are the four agreements in short:

1. Be impeccable with your word
2. Don't take anything personally
3. Don't make assumptions
4. Always do your best

Domestication Makes You Fearful & Judgmental

Ruiz says the outside world teaches us how to live.

And not necessarily in a good way.
We are told what's acceptable, what's not acceptable and… We are taught to judge.

The author says society teaches us all the rules through operant conditioning. You will get a punishment when you will be bad and flaunt the rules and you will get a reward when you obey.

And with both punishment and rewards, we learn to wear a mask to please others.

The author says our biggest fear is not death, it's being alive in the most powerful sense of the word: being and showing our real selves.

Ruiz says that to find the personal joy you have to break all those society-imposed, fear-based agreements that are currently tying you down.
And he proposes four agreements that will help you do just that.

TPM Note: The External World Matters to Achieve Goals
While what Ruiz says is partly true, the reason why people care about what others think is because of evolutionary forces: other people matter to us. Achieving acceptance first and status second matters to a man's mental health and success, and it largely depends on how we function with others. We embrace the idea of 'soaring higher' than mere acceptance here, but we propose to do it strategically. Strategically adapt to influence others when it matters, and 'do you' once you are powerful and self-sufficient.

1. Be Impeccable With Your Word

Ruiz says your word is the power coming directly from God.

Impeccable comes from Latin and means you don't use your words to speak ill of yourself or others.

It must go both ways: both outwardly and inwardly.
You must stop entertaining negative thoughts about yourself –Albert Ellis recommends you screen out negative thoughts-.
And you must equally stop spreading bad gossip about others.

Albeit he doesn't call it "karma", the author basically describes karma when he says that, in life, you get back what you put out.

TPM Note: Words are power tools, use them to achieve your goals
Machiavelli said it best: a good person is ruined among the many who are not good. Don't be naive. Be honorable, but speak with power and when necessary, a calibrated power move can be useful against manipulators.

2. Do Not Take Anything Personally

During our domestication we learn to take everything personally, says Ruiz.

Everything is about "me, me, me".
Instead, he proposes that we must learn to become less reactive and more detached.

Because what others say is not a reality, it's a projection of who they are, says Ruiz.
And if it hurts you, it's not them who hurt you, it's you who has a wound.

When you take it personally, you are admitting you believe in it.
Only when you take it personally it becomes true. When you take something personally you "take ownership" of that thought and at that point, it does become yours.

> Comments are a reflection of the commentator's reality, not yours

TPM Note: "Emotional Detachment vs. Strategic Response."
You don't let the comment hurt your feelings (internal), but you must handle the social challenge (external) to maintain your frame.

3. Do Not Make Assumptions

Ruiz says we make assumptions when we believe we know what others are thinking.

But we don't and we only project our own beliefs onto others.
Unluckily we have a tendency to make assumptions on the negative side though.
We often jump to negative conclusions because we are afraid of a negative judgment, so it's our way to "hit first" and shield our ego from the pain of rejection.

This often leads to useless arguments that needn't need to happen in the first place -as Crucial Conversations also acknowledges-. Stop assuming you know and ask instead.

And even when you're of different opinions, similar to Dale Carnegie, the author also recommends you avoid arguing to be right and respect other people's point of view instead.

TPM Note: Evolution designed us to make assumptions for survival. Valid assumptions beat naive openness. A

And as for everything, remember the law of optimum balance:

> The Law of Optimum Balance

4. Always Do Your Best

This is my very favorite agreement and it can be a very empowering mindset for ambitious men.

Ruiz says doing your best, regardless of quality, is the only thing you must ask of yourself.

You only ask of yourself to do your best given the conditions of the environment and of yourself.
That means that, in some conditions, your best might very poor. Or very poor even compared to your previous actions.
And that's great because you don't demand success or perfection.

Doing your best also delinks the action from the reward. It means that you come to enjoy the action without expecting any external prize.
And that's when you reach full outcome independence.
When you demand your best with full outcome independence, you will also avoid self-judgment, self-abuse, and regret.

The Fourth Agreement allows you to practice and make all the other agreements become a habit.

> Enjoy the path and the destination will take care of itself

5. Breaking Old Agreements

Ruiz says that to break old agreements holding us back we have a few options:

- Attack the fears one by one
- Stop feeding the fear by stopping to feel the emotion
- Symbolical death to kill the parasite within us
- Do it "even if"

The example for the latter is the parents who told a girl she was a bad singer. She would then tell herself: "fine. I will sing anyway".

The Angels of Death: Accept Mortality to Enjoy Life

The author says death teaches us how to live.

Imagine you had one week to live. Wouldn't you want to live life the way you wanted it? No more would you live to appease others, afraid of what they might think.

We agree with this, also read:

- Leveraging death to live better
- Leverage your dark side for motivation

CONS

The Four Agreements at times crosses into naive self-help.
I highly recommend you read this article:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

- "Don't Make Assumption" Means Little

While "do your best" can be powerful, "Don't Make Assumptions" is meaningless.
We all need assumptions to live, and assumptions are only wrong if taken to an extreme, and if they are wrong assumptions.

- Say What You Mean Or Avoid Speaking Against Others?

In "be impeccable with your word" the author recommends both being true to yourself and not saying anything mean.

But the two can be antithetical.

Sometimes being frank and honest -being yourself- can mean saying something bad about someone.

- Indoctrination is Overblown: nature and genes do matter

The author blames "society's indoctrination" on several crucial issues.
I disagree and I strongly doubt it's all because of culture as Ruiz implies (also read "The Blank Slate").

Is Don Miguel Ruiz Legit?

I'll be frank, as it's my usual style, and I will not mince words.

And no, I don't think Don Miguel Ruiz is a legit author because he shows no evidence, and because I have seen no unique insights.

I believe this "Toltec wisdom" angle is woo-woo marketing concocted to sell.

It leverages the human's tendency to associate "ancient wisdom" with "mystical" and "eternal truth".
Basically, so-called "non-religious" people seek their religious fix in "ancient wisdom" instead of using God's church.

That being said, the actual message, no matter whether it comes from the Aztecs or from the author, is not BS in itself.
As a matter of fact, some of the content is both solid and deep.

Review

The Four Agreements is an OK book with some good ideas and reminders, but ultimately fails to provide any systemic approach to either spiritual enlightenment or self-development.

The "ancient Toltec wisdom" packaging seems like marketing fluff, and at times it's challenging to look past.

All in all, The Four Agreements makes for a pleasant read and it's an OK book, but you may want to prioritize something else for your self-development.

Check the Top resources for ambitious men.

Should You Pay For The Date? 8 Rules For Handling The Bill

Lucio Buffalmano · 21 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Who pays for the date?

Should the man pay for the date?

… At least the first date?

Or should men and women split because it's the 21st century?

Frankly, dating etiquette and "who should pay" is not our priority here.

We're more concerned about what's effective.
What's more attractive, what increases the odds of intimacy, and what are the red signals of "poor check behavior".

So let's learn what's effective when it comes to paying for that date.

  - She “slides the bill towards him”: bad
  - She manipulates to make you pay: the worst
- Paying The High-Power Way
- Note: Don’t Let “Gold-Digger Paranoia” Cramp Your Game

The First Rule Of Tab

As a general rule:

> Do dates you’re comfortable with, and that you can comfortably afford

Do what you’re comfortable with, including financially, and you’re good.

And as long as you make the payment natural, it’s either a non-issue, or a plus.

Now, that being said, if you need more “rules to pay for dates”… Keep on reading.

How to Handle The Bill

Here are the “tab rules” for dating effectiveness:

1. Do Inexpensive Dates: stick to place you can comfortably afford

If $20 is nothing for you and you do $20 drinks, it will reflect on you handle that tab and you’ll look good
And if you want to take it one step further:

Pick date venues where the bill means nothing to you

For most guys, that’s coffee, bars, ice cream, or parks.

Restaurants are also OK.
And frankly, you should strive to be at a place where you can afford most restaurants.

But if you're not obviously wealthy I recommend generally avoiding luxury places.
Unless you often visit or truly enjoy luxury places, it will look like you're trying to impress her. And that's bad from a power dynamics point of view.

Plus, if you're not comfortable with the prices, it will register in your body language.
And that's highly unseductive.

Some exceptions apply if you're purposefully using wealth to get quicker sex, or to "punch above your weight" (see "archetypes of successful daters").

2. Do Simple Dates: with the focus on you two, not the venue

Same as for the general rule:

Do what you're comfortable with.

There is nothing inherently wrong with fancy places…

… As long as you like them, can afford them, and can handle the situation with skills and power.

The big issue is if you're unfamiliar with those environments, and then it becomes obvious that you're trying to impress.
The vibe becomes stilted and fake.
It becomes an invitation to fake and pretend, rather than open up and bond.

So if you're not used to fancy places, avoid the fanciness to impress.

Instead, do beer, coffee, drinks, or a meal in a place you're comfortable and familiar with.
Somewhere where you can get to know each other.
The better you have become at dating, talking, bonding, and generally displaying high-value, the more you'll gain with a simple "get to know each other" date.

A walk without buying anything is also an option, but usually better to sit down at least once.

BUT... Do Fancy & Expensive Dates If You Can Display High Status

The general advice of simplicity applies to most guys.

But if you worked yourself to a level of high power and social status, then do fancy and expensive whenever you can display high status in the environment.

As a matter of fact, there might not be easier seductions than taking her to a fancy and expensive place, and display status in that high-power environment.

High-status in fancy and expensive places, all paid like it's nothing, is the "easy" way of seducing

3. Pay if you invited her & picked the place

This is our standard date model:

1. Man invites
2. Man picks the place (and either picks the date, or agrees with her)
3. Woman comes to his place of choice
4. Man picks up the tab

She's already followed your lead by agreeing to your place.

And she's already investing by traveling to the location (you're not investing as much because you like and know the venue, and because it's near your place).

This is solid win-win dating: you lead, she invests, you invest, you both move forward together.

4. If you earn more, pay like it's no big deal

There is power in paying.

Best of all, make it like it's no big deal (see more below).

5. If she earns more than you & it's obvious, split

Pick up the bill and say "shall we split".

Do NOT let the bill sit there waiting for her to pick it up as some guides recommend.
It's not "socially powerful", it's relinquishing leadership.
And you always want to lead in dating.

> How to Lead to Gets Girls

5.2. If you're in dire straits, do free dates. Or say so before, and let her pay

If you can't afford a date, do free dates, or say so before.

It might take a lot of pelotas to say that you can't afford a restaurant beforehand, but if you do it well, you can gain points. You gain in courage, first of all, in honesty, and you can also frame yourself as an artist, an idealist, or as "working for future success".
Don't go into debt for dates.
First dates are for assessing each other, not for making debt.

It's your duty to take care of yourself and set your finances in order.

Absolutely avoid reaching the "bill time" and ask her to pay.
… If you want to date effectively, at least.
If you wanted to scrounge a meal, that might be the best way. But this is not a guide to avoiding starvation :).

Walk in the park: the perfect date when you're broke

6. If you're at the same income level: pay, split, or ask her to tip

If you invited her and picked the place, pay.

But if she insists, it's best to let her chip in (Frederik et al., 2015).
You can tell her you can split.
Or you can tell her that "she can take the next".

Also good: tell her to "leave a tip", which is a great test of character as well.
See:

- Tell her to leave a tip, assess her behavior

7. If she insists to pay, let her (and say you'll take the next)

Sometimes women will insist to pay for the date if:

- They feel you're so high value, so value-giving, or almost outside their reach
- They consider spending time with you the real reward
- You've already given or paid in previous interactions

In these cases, if they insist, don't make it a battle.
Remember, you never want to make paying a big issue because paying for the date shouldn't be a big issue, no matter who does it.

So let her pay the bill, say "thanks" nonchalantly, and take the next.

Then walk or keep talking about something else.

8. Let her pay if it's a 2nd date and you paid the 1st, then offer whatever comes next

The general rule of multiple dates is:

You want to be paying more or more often, but you want her to chip in.

Exceptions always apply of course, but it's a bad sign if she can afford to pay but doesn't ever offer to pay anything.
It's an even bigger red flag when you're around the same socio-economic class, because it means that she will expect you to pay for everything going forward, while she saves her own money (it's a taker, and potentially highly manipulative attitude).

Of course, exceptions always apply.
For example, if you're very wealthy and she's a student, just pay it all and you're still in an attractive, high-power frame.
Or if she's higher sexual market value than you are, then picking up the tabs might simply be the price to be with a higher value mate.
Whether you're willing to make up for that gap with your money, is your call. But it's fair to pay more in those cases.

Assess Her "Tab Behavior"

Dating is a way to assess people and character.

And the "tab behavior", or the behavior she displays when it comes to paying, is a great way of assessing her general character.
Plus, it's a fantastic tool to reliably peer into a future potential relationship.

She “distracts herself” at bill time: not good

We already said that it’s a bad sign when women never chip in during courtship.
But it’s also not a good sign when women play busy at bill time.

Humorous example from “How I Met Your Mother”:

> Waiter: (leaves the bill)
> Her: (sips the wine, looks away, pretends to be lost in thoughts)

It’s not the worst if she traveled to meet him.

But if the date was sputtering, then it’s also fair for the man to think he lost his time as well.
Plus, the turkey-level gaming behavior of pretending not to notice screams “small-time manipulator”.

She “slides the bill towards him”: bad

What’s even worse is women who take the bill… But slide it towards you.

They are assertive and high-power enough to take charge, but they use that self-confidence to make him pay.

That’s a strong sign that she will expect and demand that he takes care of all the finances (and her expenses).

She manipulates to make you pay: the worst

Generally speaking, any game that pushes you to pay is a nasty game, and red-level power move.

That should preclude her from any meaningful role in your life.

Some of them include:

> Her: I like real gentlemen

Where “gentleman” means paying for a woman.
That type of game is so cheap, that I’d even say never to enter a relationship with a woman saying that. You can’t turn a low-level game player into a high-quality woman.

Another cheap game after a first date:

> Her: next time we go somewhere good

She’s sub-communicating that your choice wasn’t good enough for her, so you need to step up the expenditures.
If there is a next time, you go where you say because you pay. Better yet, end it there.

An annoying game we saw already, coming from an online dating match:

She actually makes a good point.
Generally speaking, it's good form for the person who invites out to pick up the bill.

But HOW she goes about it is a confrontational, small-time manipulative, unpalatable no-no.

Paying The High-Power Way

The key question is:

How should you pay so that you come across high-power and attractive?

Check out Seduction University.

Note: Don't Let "Gold-Digger Paranoia" Cramp Your Game

Yes, gold-diggers eixst, but most women prefer a great man, to some free food
This is an issue for several guys.

Especially the ones who read red-pill advice and who are careful about investment levels.

Being careful is a good thing.
And being taken for a ride is a bad thing.

So you, absolutely, do NOT offer free food and drinks to women who have no interest in you (we don't exactly like leeches and value takers here).

BUT…

As for everything… Balance.
Don't let the rare outliers lead you astray.

There are far more shades of grey in the world than blacks and whites.

The women who come out for food and drinks only are a minority.
And especially so if you're working on yourself to become a higher value man (ie.: the cooler you are, the less you must worry about gold diggers);.
At the other extreme, few women will come out 100% dead-set to will sleep with you, or seduce you into a relationship.

Most will come out to the date to assess and see how things go.
And cheapos have never been great seducers.

So when you're over-afraid of gold-diggers, you're actually shooting yourself in the foot.
Big time.
You're letting a very few bad apples spoil your mood, get you on the defensive, and treat every single woman as if she was out to swindle you (of a few bucks, something that shouldn't even worry you at all).

See Seduction University for more details on how to shed that defensive mindset, plus how to handle those rarer but still possible "true bad apples".

- Leadership For Seduction

Intro

After you invite her home things are looking good.

But whether or not your sexual escalation turns into a memorable success depends not just on you, but also on the type of place you have.

So in this article we are going to learn how to set up your place as a proper "seductive environment" (a term borrowed from Greene's "Art of Seduction").

Let's start with a definition:

> Seductive environments are stimulating environments that titillate, strike, and overwhelm the senses and help facilitate trance states, including falling in love and "swooning".

Albeit it would be reductive to think of seductive environments as "sex locations", they most certainly also help facilitate intimacy.
Equally important, they also make that intimacy a unique and unforgettable peak experience.

Seductive Atmosphere Key

First off, a key mindset:

- YOU are part -and leading- the seductive experience

You cannot -and do not want– to rely on a seductive environment to do the job for you.

They are powerful tools of seduction, but you still want to be the one in charge, the one leading it.

Think of it more like a life experience, a "dream maker", a "Garden of Eden"—and you're one of the Gods walking the lucky ones through it.

1. Fantasy Land: a break & respite from the mundane world

The seductive environment is different.

It's "other" compared to the day-to-day world.
It HAS to be.

Being "other" and a "break" from "normal" life is the #1 trait -and the essence- of a seductive environment.

The everyday world is dull, asphyxiatingly moral, taxingly rational… And unseductive.
That unseductive outside world must be blocked out.

2. Dreamy: and a dream-maker

It's a place of magic where imagination can roam free, where new states and possibilities can be explored, and where cacoon-like childhood sensations re-experienced (letting go, is similar to going back to the womb).

3. Exclusive: for special people only

It's a gift, an experience you only offer to a few selected, deserving ones.

If you're only interested in sex or on the fence about her, you can still invite her home of course, but without the "full experience".

But it's a special place for you as well.
You can always enter into that mind space and enjoy it for yourself.

4. A Life Experience: intimacy is only one aspect, not the goal

This is a transcendental experience.

Intimacy is only one part.
It's not the main goal anymore.

Seductive Environment Themes

You can mix and match, of course.

And the larger your seductive environment, the more room you have for fitting in different styles.

However, it's best to have a main recurring theme permeating through it all.

Good main themes include:

- Luxurious opulence
- Extreme coziness: warm colors, plush couches, velvet soft carpets, furry surfaces, silky floor pillows, candles
- Futuristic: hint at different worlds, different spaces and times with different rules
- Retro: it's harder to pull off, make sure it's timeless retro. The essence is of a "different time", avoid any strong reference to specific decades or people or it will look too much like real life
- Artificial: to help re-create the "different and new world" feel
- Fusion: there is something in it for everyone

Robert Greene says that the best seductive locations are superficial-looking, "theatrical", full of glitter, colors, and lights.
I partially agree, but with a note of caution.
If you overdo "theatrical", it becomes "crazy". Women can't let go in the presence of "crazy" because crazy equals risky—physically and psychologically uncomfortable.

To swoon and fall in love, she must feel free to let go.
So you while you want that "otherish" feel, it must be inviting and comfortable enough for her to let go.

A touch of crazy is good. Too crazy is not

Matrioska Approach: Develop Micro-Spaces

Whatever you pick, I highly recommend “micro-environments” within the main one.

The multitude of stimuli from different corners is akin to (good) attacks from multiple fronts: overwhelms her senses and defenses.

Plus, they give you more opportunities to show, explain, walk around, and experience.

How to Develop A Seductive Environment

The main elements of a seductive environment are:

1. Views, Videos & Visuals

Windows only work if the views are truly breathtaking.

If the views are “good”, then it only reminds her of the real world.
In that case, better to forget the window and focus on the inside:

1.2. Flat screens & projectors

Home planetariums are great tools
Ceiling projectors and planetariums for reproducing stars, constellations and universe imagery are also great (read on).
Constellations with zodiac signs are also good (far more women than men believe in it).

Avoid cheap TVs: a small flat screen budget TV is whack and unseductive.

1.3. Movies with stunning visuals

You can leave a movie running on a TV or projector.

Avoid general, bland, run-of-the-mill entertainment and pick something artistic.
A movie that's based on sounds and dreamy cinematography.

For example, "The Girl With the Pearl Earring" is about an intense artist and his muse. It's arts and colors with a dreamy effect. I remember one evening watching it semi-stoned and after a couple of glasses of wine and it took me into a different state of dreamery and relaxation.

"Once Upon A Time In The West" is another great movie based on imagery, close-ups of strong men and strong but feminine women, and dreamy sounds.

1.4. Fantasy videos

Videos are better than movies because they have no beginning and end.

Perfect to get into a "time-suspension" state.

Good imagery is women playing flute or harp, lost in their art.
Recalling the sirens in Ulysses' journey, the guardian angels welcoming into the land of pleasure.

Other good videos to loop are Final Fantasy-like themes:

1.5. Universe imagery

Colorful videos and pictures of the universe are great.

The imagery of stars, quasars, black holes and galaxies transmits a feeling of time suspension and “forever-ness”. Different planets take people out of this world, opening up the mind to never-thought-of possibilities.

You can even explain some basics of astronomy to transmute that imagery into feelings.
That we’re really all “just made of stars” (Moby’s “We’re all just made of stars” would be a perfect sound companion).
That time is different and relative in the sky just above your heads. That we’re all watching a snapshot from the past when we look up.
“One day we might be able to travel there”, you may say. “But I like to think that one day we will all reunite and become one”.

1.6. Gaming console / VR

It’s OK to have a gaming console attached to a big screen.

BUT, it must be games about visuals, images, adventures, and dream-looking worlds.

Even better than games with a control pad, that feel geeky, is a VR or movement-activated controls (or both).

For example, flying virtual reality, or new worlds explorations.

2. Lights / Candles

Lights and candles are an integral part of your seductive environment.

The lights must complement your theme of choice but, but generally speaking, you want dim, soft, and mellow lighting.
The reason is simple: people feel more comfortable letting go in the dark.

2.2. LED lights

With so many options of led lights, this must be the golden era of seductive environments.

Look into and pick some strips, color-changing LEDs, color-changing bulbs, motion-activated lights, remote-activated lights, water-proof candle-like LEDs, etc.
Early examples from my room.

Warning: easy on changing colors.
Avoid jerky and fast blinking: they impact our “fight or flight” centers and make people feel nervous.
Go for smooth transitions, and limit them to small corners you want to draw attention to.

2.3. Spotlights

Use small and localized spotlights to highlight certain micro-environments.
For example, a spotlight on a painting. Or an open book in your book’s area. Or over your “delicacies corner”.

2.4. Backlights

For example, a led strip behind your spirits.

2.5. Lamps

A timeless classic of romance, have at least one.
You can make lamps your main light source and completely avoid any ceiling light.

2.6. Candles

You can’t go wrong with candles.

Have some, even if you won’t light them up.
And by the way, a chandelier makes for perfect decor.

2.7. Dimmer lights for intimacy

Go for dimmer lights in the space you’ll use for:

- Romance

- Romantic dinners
- Intimacy

The APA Handbook of Nonverbal Behavior states dimmer lighting can foster an atmosphere of intimacy, and loosen social inhibition.

3. Music

We have one article for seductive playlists.

For here suffice to say that music should be on a high-quality system.

No laptop.
Laptop music is for hookups.
PC speakers also won't cut it because a computer is a window to the "real world" (Internet, gossip, work…).

Get a package with a subwoofer, tweeters, and high-quality strategically placed satellites.
Avoid geeky. You can keep it simple with "price and looks" rule of thumb: pick a high-end system that looks great.
Some tips:

- Hide or semi-hide the speakers: tech is rarely seductive. You want your speaker to either disappear, or to integrate in your decor if they fit the style (ie.: wooden for "classic" themes or futuristic for futuristic themes)
- Pre-load a list with hours of music: nothing breaks the spell quicker than ads and music cutting off. Once you have a couple of hours it's OK to have the playlist restart
- Automated activation: remote controls are techy and not very seductive. Better to have an automated activation whenever you walk in. Or voice-activated
- Positive* music: May and Hamilton research demonstrated that positive affect–evoking rock music increased females' ratings of the physical attractiveness of males

P.S.:
And by the way, a piano, a harp, an old gramophone, or some musical instrument in your seductive environment are golden.

4. Drinks, Wine & Spirits

Wine and spirits are almost a must.

Even if you aren't going to consume, they speak of the possibility and allure of intoxication.

You want high-quality wines and classy spirits such as scotch and whiskey.
Vodka and rum for mixers are OK, but they have an aura of "cheap drunkness", so don't put them first.

Where

You can have them:

1. All together: a wooden minibar, or a corner or shelf combined with delicacies
2. Disseminated around the environment

Together it can turn into its own micro-environment, and you can talk about it.
You don't need to know much, even just telling the story of where the bottle comes from and why it's good is enough. Make sure you paint a nice story with good imagery.

If you go for the minibar, avoid plastic minifridges -that screams "real life" and "cheap motel"-. Plus, it feels like cheap consumerism.
You want your place to feel luxurious, but without hints of money. The feel is that of a Garden of Eden where everything's free and where you drink straight from the Gods' springs.

Not only the bottles must be good, but also look good.
Old used bottles with candles on top can also serve as ambiance props if you're going for more classy and old-school looks.

Weed / Drugs (Optional, Not-Recommended)

Not strictly necessary and we don't recommend it.

Some of the more conservative women might also be put off by it.

However, we can't deny that some substances offer a quick shortcut to trance states.
Still, don't let the shortcut fool you: put the environment first. The last thing you want is a drug-place to get high.
Highs on drugs must complement the experience, not become the way to trance. And for practical reasons: if it's drug-fueled, she will look back and say "the drug was such a trip".
But if the high is drug-free or a complement to the experience, it's all on you.

If you want to go for it avoid any drugs that over-excite, like cocaine or speed.
Go for substances that relax or expand consciousness.

Like the opium ending scene in "Once Upon A Time In America".
Plus, the opium pipe is also a great prop.

4.2. Teas & Special Drinks

It's a good idea to also have some non-alcoholic beverages among your bottles.

Especially if you don't drink yourself, or if you prefer women who don't drink.

For example, special teas, herbs, and cofees, together with a beautiful teapot and china.

5. Food / Delicacies

I initially wrote "food / snacks" as the title.

I hope you can see the mistake :).

Anything resembling typical "snacks" has no place in a seductive environment.

There is a powerful association between food -and the pleasure of food- and sex -and the pleasure of sex-.
And, by extension, the type of relationship you can offer.
That association is much stronger in women than in men.
So:

- Snack = cheap sex and throwaway, average relationship.
- Delicacy = seductive environment, intertwining of souls, “peak experience”

Albeit fresh food would be nice, long-lasting food has a better ROI and it’s easier to maintain.
As usual, you want high-quality with great-looking packaging.
Go for far-away delicacies, limited productions, and products you can tell a story about.

Example of a good packaging:

6. Books

Many women love books (including many who don’t read them).

Books are powerful for what they represent: knowledge, erudition, and… The power of driven men who advance civilization.

And albeit men know that it’s non-fictional work that advances civilization, your seductive environments need fictional work (or, at least, also fictional work).

Lots of women like “Lord of The Rings”, “Harry Potter” and “Sherlock Holmes”.
“Da Vinci Code” and “The Alchemist” set a tone of mystery and mysticism.
“The Adventures of Pinocchio” with the “Turquoise Hair Fairy” and “Peter Pan” with tinker bell can lull her into a safe regression to childhood.
And you can also add “Fifty Shades of Grey” or something similar for sexualization.

Books that add multiple layers of stimulation, such as drawings and touch are perfect.
Love this scene:

Photography books are also perfect as they mix art with erudition.

Photobooks with people, art, and places are great.
It's like having a small seductive environment within your seductive environment.
Women can flick through them and it takes their minds into far and different lands, opening up worlds of possibilities outside their smaller confines.

7. Scents

Good scents are a must.

On average, women have a better sense of smell and a better feel for what's "good" or "not good".

I personally don't have a great taste for mixing smells and if you also don't, then stick to a single scent or to similar ones.

Good options include:

7.2. Scented candles

An easy option, good even if you don't light them up.

7.3. Diffusers

There are many aromatic diffusers, and some even have LED lighting.

LED diffusers are great options because the view feels like a small volcano, making the environment feel "different than normal life".
As usual, avoid cheap ones that are too lightweight, and go for batteries if you can't properly hide the cables.

7.4. Scented sticks

Another good and timeless option. And women love them.

7.5. High-quality handmade soaps

Perfect for your bathroom(s).

8. Paintings

Generally speaking, naked white walls are unseductive.

So in are wallpapers and paintings.
But while it's not good to choose overly-bold wallpapers as you can't change them easily, paintings provide a higher variety of options.

Some paintings that work:

8.2. Allusive, slightly erotic

Without overdoing it!
It's seduction, not porn.
And it's seduction, not real life. So better avoiding real people.

Instead, go for fairytale characters, human-looking aliens, or human-looking robots.

This might already be too much.

Remember: the seduction is from the full environment, and from the states it induces.
Anything that is “too much” breaks the spell instead of enhancing it.

The last thing we want is a seductive environment that feels like a “sex location”.
It might be a sex location, of course. It will likely be, as a matter of fact. But as part of the full package, without ever forcing it.

Plus, many women will walk inside with some barriers and fears.
Erotic pictures stoke those fears.

So if you’re unsure, less is better.

8.3. Mermaids

Women have a thing for mermaids.
Women also have a thing for werewolves and vampires, but they are too edgy and scare some women off. So better stick for the “seductively safe options”.

8.4. Muses, goddesses, and sirens

Muses, goddesses, and sirens are perfect.
Many women are also aroused by other women, and muses and sirens are seductive and classy at the same time.

8.5. Impressionistic paintings

If your seductive space is on the “classy” side, impressionistic paintings are good.

No to expressionism though, it might be “too much” and make some people uncomfortable. People need to let go, and people aren’t comfortable letting go when the atmosphere is too aggressive (werewolves) or crazy (expressionism).

8.6. Classics in different settings (ie.: sunsets in different worlds)

Anything that is earth-related brings her back to reality.

Sunsets, beaches, mountains and various earth locations might be good in a book, but not as the main ingredient in your seductive environment.

They’re beautiful, but we’re going for a different type of beauty. We’re going for a “break” from this world to reach higher states.

A good solution is to change the setting of those romantic views to other planets. Then you get the best of both worlds. The romantic aspect, and the “other world” aspect:

9. Decor of Seduction

You want to have a room with a lot of stimuli.

So this is a case where “more” is often better than “less” and “empty”.

9.2. Statues

If you can afford it, statues are perfect.

Statuses with a mystical and dreamy feel.
Gods and Goddesses, emblems of birth and rebirth, and symbols of eternal power and energies.

9.3. Historical Lures

Historical lures from far away lands or gone by times.

For example, heroes, conquerors, and pharaohs.
Again, you want something far and alien because anything too human reminds people of politics -fuck that-.
So a Caesar or Marcus Aurelius on a horse may work because they represent not just humans, but figures of eternal leadership and power.

9.4. Fine Silks, Cashmeres, Furs

You can’t have “sensory overload” without touch.

I remember an ex-girlfriend of mine.
She was in love with her place, and one of the things she loved most was a pink, furry cloth that she put on top of her wardrobe.
And it did look and feel cozy and special indeed.
That was one of the many lures and decor she had. The room had carpets, furs, hanging pendants, and a small table in the middle of the room to sit around -on the floor, not on chairs-.

She was in love with her place because, without knowing it, she had turned it into a small-scale (self-)seductive environment.

You want something similar -albeit not necessarily pink :)-.

9.5. Pendants

You want something hanging around.

Necklaces, neckties, pendants, amulets, crystals on a string, small mirrors on a string, etc.
Anything that reminds of shamans or paganism is also good.

And of course, a beautiful chandelier is an evergreen.

9.6. Chinas & Crystals

Tea sets, crystals and chinas are perfect.

Either next to your minibar/drinks corner, or in a glassed cabinet.

10. Bathroom, Beauty, Jacuzzi

Your bathroom must be at least a smaller extension of your seductive environment.

Women see bathrooms more as intimate and self-care places than men.
A jacuzzi in your bathroom bridges the transcendental experience into a physical and intimate one. And a few candles around it are perfect.

Cliches have become cliches for a reason: because they worked
Also get waterproof LED candles to be put in the water.

- SUMMARY

1. Start With The Basics: Be A Cool Guy

The basics are your 80%.

Do these, and most women you date will fall in love with you:

1. Be high value
2. Be higher power than her
3. Date high power, mind the basic dating power dynamics
   1. Make sure you’re not chasing, giving too much while taking too little, etc. etc.
   2. Be slightly less available than her
4. Lead (resolutely, but in a collaborative, win-win way)
5. Get to know her well, bond and connect, stay curious about her and her life
6. Have your personal life priorities, passions, friends, and goals you’re pursuing
7. Be a good lover, find time for good and/or passionate sex with her, make her orgasm if possible
8. Maximize oxytocin, maximize skin-to-skin contact after sex, hug often
9. Do quality time together -quantity helps as well of course, but focus on quality over quantity-
10. To sustain love move the relationship forward, grow together, or take on new challenges and do new experiences together

That’s it.

If you’re in Power University, you already have all the tools to make women fall in love with you.
And you follow the straight line seduction and processes we set here you’re also dating well.

All you have to do is to eventually find one who likes you enough to start dating you.

Target selection

Obviously, women differ.

Both in terms of personality, and how they relate to you.
And it's easier to make some women fall in love than others.

These women are more likely to fall in love quicker and harder, and easier to remain devoted to you:

- Lower value women: people tend to fall harder for higher sexual market value partners, so everything will be easier if you "date down"
- Lower socio-economic class women: the qualitative lifestyle jump make falling in love easier
- Younger and/or inexperienced women: tend to be more idealistic and have lower defenses, plus everything is new and exciting for them and the power/leadership gap is larger

HOWEVER…

You can make most women fall in love.
And I've personally been with women who were more attractive women -not that difficult anyway :)- and, even when I was not much experienced, still fell in love hard.

What we do recommend though is to pick women who:

- Like you: women who appreciate and like you tend to be more loving, devoted, and even kinder
- Appreciate your qualities: same as above
- Have good interpersonal chemistry with you: getting along well makes for better quality time together, which is an important element of falling in love

2. Lead (Ie.: Be an "Eagle Leader")

Your leadership is crucial to make women fall in love.

Egalitarian dating wins you virtue-signaling points, but male leadership wins your women's hearts.

And the type of leadership that best makes girls fall in love is based on:

- Safety and trust (win-win leadership): love is based on letting go, abandoning herself to you. And she cannot let herself go unless she feels safe, consciously and subconsciously. An edgy man or an asshole can lead into the bedroom, but it's difficult for her to let go when she doesn't also feel safe. So warmth and comfort are also crucial.
- Control over the environment: once she feels safe with him, she must also feel safe with him from the world. This is one of the reasons why your place is the perfect final location for love. It's safe, you safely came back from the outside world, and everything is fully under your control.
- Intellectual / mental leadership: since falling in love is a psychological and mental product, she must feel he is also "mentally" leading and higher power.

Many of our processes and strategies are based on hitting these crucial notes.

3. Do Memorable Dates (Ie. "Total Dates")

We call them "total" because they contain all the ingredients that make women fall in love.

- Connection & bonding
- Personal disclosure
- Fun / silliness / playfulness
- Great food / wine
- Great intimacy
- Romance

"Total dates" are one of the best ways to make girl fall in love because they are simple, easy to replicate, and reliable.

All you have to do is:

1. Have a great dinner: ideally, go there hungry and make it a feast
   - At home, generally preferable
   - At a restaurant where physical proximity is possible. Some privacy is also ideal (ie.: Japanese places with your own room)
2. Have a little special reason or make it feel special: "feel" comes first and you don't really need a reason. But if you want to add a reason, can be a small celebration -celebration of life or of you two if there is nothing-, a topic you want her opinion on, or a "special food" you can talk about (in my case: pecorino, Parmigiano, olives, mozzarella, etc., etc.)
3. Romantic environment (candles, wine, etc.)
4. Background music
5. Have an (emotionally) safe, intimate, and romantic time
   - Personal disclosures
   - Deeper conversation
   - Intimacy between meals
6. Sprinkle joviality and good mood

Most of the times when women professed their love to me was either during "Total Dates", or when having a good time with a bottle of wine.

If you have developed a "seductive environment", then your total dates take place there, with the full experience on.

You can do bigger and longer "full dates" on weekends, in which case you can combine with the inebriation and/or full-day technique.
But shorter middle-of-the-week ones are also fantastic.
They punctuate their duller week with romance and love, and make you stand out even more.

Keep doing total dates during the relationship, turning them into an intimate ritual of pleasure for you two.

4. Penetrate Her Mind

Falling in love is, in good part, a function of “mental real estate”.

Such as: how often she thinks of you, plus in what terms she thinks of you.
To be “important” in her life, even negative feelings and thoughts will do. But since we’re aiming for love, devotion, and generally value-adding influence, you want positive thoughts and associations.

Once you’re setting up those positive associations, you want to “activate them” as often as possible because neuroscience suggests that the more often a neural pathway fires, the stronger that association becomes.

In simple terms, you want to develop a positive association between you and positive feelings in her mind, and fire up that association as often as possible (without chasing or being taken for granted).

So your goal is to:

- Make her think about you: strike a balance between texting & meeting enough to be top of mind, without overdoing it so that you get taken for granted. To maximize power of repetition and personal power let her come to you slightly more than you seek her out
- Make her think positively about you: generally being high-value and uplifting is enough
- Create more positive associations with you: experiences, great dates, inside jokes, plus all we teach here creates positive associations
- Extend & repeat* those associations over time: or what we call “thread expanding” in power dynamics. Keep on reading

One simple way of recalling and thread-expanding on positive associations is to create inside humor and stories, and to ping her with positive associations.
Ideally, it’s things you:

- Laughed about
- Inside stories, jokes, and fantasies you created
- Funny things you both self-disclosed about yourself

A simple and effective ping is a day-after picture after a “Total Date”.

You still want to be strategic with your pings and not be always available.
But a good reminder is: ping a woman who's not into you, and it's chasing. Ping a woman who's dating you and about to fall for you, and she'll swoon.

Example:

It was an obligatory ping. She brought lots of food and then took one sandwich back home and left one to me. And she said "we'll eat it tomorrow and think about each other". That's self-pinging, and you must jump at those opportunities
She's bored at work, and then gets a picture of you reminding her of the great time.

For more "dark psychology techniques", see Seduction University.

5. Romance Her (& Yourself)

There aren't many women in the world who don't enjoy -or dream- of romance.

Romance can work any time, including pre-intimacy.
But, generally speaking, it works better after you're already together, or when you're courting over a few dates (as opposed to one-date intimacy approaches).

There are a thousand ways to romance:

- Candlelit dinners:
- Flowers: a good friend of mine broke a few women's hearts without even trying. He's naturally incredibly thoughtful and kind. He'd bring flowers on first dates, make gifts, care about her, and even make gifts to her family. Then, he'd ask me why women got so attached to him, or "how can one have sex with no string attached". He didn't realize he was acting like a perfect boyfriend
- Gifts, especially personalized gifts for her that include art and poetry
- Romantic music:
- Slow dance
- "Stereotypical" romantic activities & moments, don't underestimate the power of the "romantic cliches": they have become cliches because they worked. So yes to boat rides, picnics, trips to Venice, gazing into each other's eyes, etc.

The best way to romance is to enjoy the romance yourself.
As we said a few time, you're both a conductor leading and an actor enjoying the play.

An example of romantic dance:

> Him: this music, this place, isn't it perfect. Will you dance with me (gives her his hand)
> Her: (faints)

Of course it's a TV show so they exaggerated the reaction. But moves like these do make girls fall in love with you.

6. Create “Us Bubbles”

I was once sitting on a bench with an ex of mine in our early dating stages.

We were in front of a little park, nothing special, with people walking by and one dog playing around.
We sat, looked at the world around us, and commented on it.
For example, I remember the dog was strangely slow. I pointed it out to her and we both focused on it. I made some fun of it, saying the dog in his mind was so fast and furious. We turned it into a little story, and both laughed.

After a while, she literally commented:

> Her: Oh my God, it feels like it’s only you and I in the world

That’s the “us bubble”.
And that’s when I knew for sure she was falling in love -or more like “plunging”-.
If I wanted to thread expand and cement that moment I could have taken her hand, said “it is only you and I, baby”, and then kissed her romantically.

Family Guy has a good skit on the “bubble” feeling:

A bit too “social climbing” in this video example and he’s not exactly leading, but it’s a good scene to understand some of the underlying dynamics.

To be more eagle-like and higher quality you want to avoid pushing people down so badly.
You can laugh at people, but it’s more “laughing for fun” around your crazy stories than “laughing at them” and pushing them down.

Good ways to re-create the us bubble:

See Seduction University

“Us bubbles” are also the perfect time to create “inside stories & jokes”:

7. Create “Inside Stories & Jokes”

Insider references make little sense to most people, but are meaningful or funny to you two.

It's anything that she can talk and laugh with you, but you only.

As a rule of thumb:

The more inside stories and jokes you have, the more special you -and you two- become.
And the more inside stories and jokes you have, the more mental real-estate you'll occupy.

This is part of what relationship researcher John Gottman refers to as "shared meaning".

Every time anything in her life reminds her of that inside story and joke, she's reminded of you.
And how you only would understand what she's feeling (how powerful is that!).

Some examples:

- Fun stories or fantasies you laugh about

With the whole world she discusses logically -and boringly-.
But with you, she can step into a new world.

- Politically incorrect inside stories

With the whole world, she's "proper", with you, she's "real" -how good is that!-.

- Personal disclosures (that you turned into an inside joke)

She doesn't disclose her personal things to anyone else.
Only with you.
Bonus points if it was something that bothered her and you managed to turn into a positive and/or something she can now laugh about.

See SU for more.

8. Get Inebriated Together

Many women, and men for that matter, seek to resist love.
So sometimes you need a catalyst that allows them to ‘let go’. Inebriation helps to let go both physically and psychologically.

This is also helpful when she started having feelings for you but was afraid to show them.
Inebriation frees her to experience them fully, amplify them… And often even communicate them to you.

Lucio’s Experience: The first woman who professed her love did so while we passed a bottle of wine to each other

Lucio:
We were in a bus bound to a new city, and had just gotten back after a quick bathroom run.

And as we laughed and talked, she blurted 'I love you'.

Younger and more inexperienced, I was almost taken aback by it. 'Am I supposed to say the same back, now?', I wondered.

There are many opportunities you gain with inebriation.

One of them is the "freedom to brag".
Generally, we don't recommend bragging or anything that feels "forced" when displaying your personal value.

BUT…

The beauty of getting inebriated is that when you're inebriated you get a pass on almost anything.
You can brag a little, you can open up about what have been difficult periods in your life without coming across as negative or with baggages (and then quickly transition to happy topics).
The stark contrast of vulnerable sharing, and then back to laughing and enjoying life makes it all the more memorable.

Other techniques to make her fall in love with you:

- Talk about your exes, how attractive or cool they were, and that increases your preselection and her attraction
- Dig deeper into her past without looking jealous, because you're just sharing stories
- Sing and act silly, stoke her "motherly instincts". What would be "childish" becomes "fun and lust for life", while still maintaining the overall frame of "high-power" and "effective in life".
- Revisit the story of your romance, how you met, what you truly thought of her, ask her what she truly thought of you, and grow closer without looking cheesy or defensive

You can also combine inebriation with the "full day together" experience -as a matter of fact, we recommend it-,

Some of my great love experiences -and some of the easiest to replicate- have been with wine.

Including:

- Smuggling wines into theaters as a student
- The opening story in Seduction University, chaperoning through the Eternal city and punctuated by dinner and wine
- Picnics and wine
- Romantic home-cooked dinners at home with wine ("Total Dates")

9. Lead Her Into A Whirlwind Romance

A whirlwind romance is a seduction that either:

1. Happens very fast, out of attraction and chemistry, not easy to replicate systematically. But long pauses and eye-gazing work. Sometimes, evening opening her and just looking at her for a few seconds can stoke chemistry and attraction
2. Takes place over several consecutive hours going through different places and emotions ("perfect days", see later)
3. Takes place over several dates closely spaced together
4. Move from first meeting to talking of love and starting couple life at breakneck speed, see Seduction University

9.2. Fast Dating

If you're going for several dates, having those dates closely spaced helps create a "whirlwind romance" feeling.

Some good fast dating:

1. A quick coffee or bite
2. A dinner date
3. Doing something fun
4. Cooking at home

The key to make her fall in love is the feel that you two will be together (or that you're destined to be).
When that happens, sex becomes secondary and she can be "yours" before sex even happens.
In between, you will send texts, pictures, check-in on each other, and care for each other.

This works best with women who are very interested in you and with more conservative women.

10. Lead The "Perfect Day" Together (full-day romance date)

There is something magical about spending a long time together while passing through several different places and situations.

The popular movie "Before Sunrise" that we use as an example of bonding and connecting is the story of man and woman spending a day and night together.

"Before Sunrise", one of the most romantic movies in recent history, leverages the "full day together" technique

And albeit it's a niche movie, more than one woman shared a snapshot from that movie in their Tinder profiles.
That's because, deep down, they dream of something similar happening to them.

The song "Perfect Day" also references the arch of a full day together (and you can add it to your playlist, by the way).

> Just a perfect day
> 1. Drink sangria in the park
> 2. And then later, when it gets dark / We go home
> Just a perfect day
> 2. Feed animals in the zoo
> 3. Then later a movie, too
> 4. And then home
> Oh, it's such a perfect day
> (…)

How to set up “perfect days”

With a picnic example:

See Seduction University

11. Have Sex (Ideally, Orgasmic & Multi-Orgasmic)

If sex helps bonding and orgasms help to bond, multi-orgasms bond the most.

Being her “best” can be the cherry on the pie of your awesome personality, and make you even more the best package she’s ever had.

This works mostly for orgasmic women and sexually liberated women. And less well for non-orgasmic women, low sex drive women, or more sexually repressed women.

11.2. Do Slow & Longer Sexual Sessions

Slow sex making is great for making her fall in love.

Best of all if you gaze into each other’s eyes.

12. Take Her Out In Luxury

The “luxury whirlwind” with a high-power man is a high-reliability shortcut to make women swoon. Add romance, and she’s putty in your hands.

And it isn’t even about materialism.

It’s about the display of power and the indirect display of life effectiveness.
Almost all women are wired to fall for that.

It doesn’t work nearly as well for women who are born into luxury or used to it, but it works with most other women.

Even women who are used to a comfortable lifestyle can fall in love when taken to “the next level”.
Said Italian men’s dream-woman Manuela Arcuri on her fling with the sheik:

> Our relationship lasted around one year, it was like living a fairytale. I was in love
> (…)
> On a background of dream travels, luxury hotels, and gifts of all kinds

This method doesn’t necessarily need “top of line luxury” though because “next level” is relative.

I remember when I was living in Prague in a very large room centrally located right beside the metro.
Great top location, BUT it was in a shared flat and with barely OK furnishing (including Ikea crap). Truly nothing “great”.
But to a student I took back and who was originally from a village, it seemed a lot. She asked how much I was paying, I glossed over and let her imagine as I smiled (remember: avoid talking of hard cash, it’s crude). She literally covered her mouth in excitement and a little later started escalating on me.

13. Persuade Her, Change Her Mind

Women tend to fall in love when they’re with a man who is:

1. Effective in life

2. Effective with people
3. Skilled at frame control, mostly used for win-win
4. Persuasive

Sure, being able to fix a leaking pipe is part of being "effective in life", and it's a great skill.
But what women truly evolved to lust after is men who can make other men work and do things for them, or for the collective. So one of the most important -if not the most important- ways of being effective in life, is being effective with and through others.

And that's leadership & persuasion, power competence, and high-level social skills.

You display those both by going through life events together and, even more, directly with her.

For example, while discussing something, if you can persuade her without turning it into a frame battle and "me VS you", just that by itself often make women fall in love.

Strategic Persuasion & Frame Control

See Seduction University

14. Uplift, Guide, Mentor

This is where seduction overlaps with general self-development.

Women fall in love when their partner is "so good" that he takes several important roles in their lives.

For example:

- Spiritual guide
- Career mentor
- Social strategist advisor to help them solve and improve relationships and workplace politics.

Or, you might have guessed it now, a father figure.

14.2. Use positive psychology for "uplifting leadership"

Many women (and men) are:

- Stuck into negative thought patterns
- Focused on the negatives

- Over-reactive to life events and others

That can seem like small stuff when you're past it, but it can make life miserable.

It's invaluable when you can step in and help them be happier and more optimistic with some basic "positive psychology" guidance.

You may become a "therapist figure", and it's important that anyone in this position uses this power wisely.
One example we shared in the relationship module of PU:

Repeat that a few times over, and she's deep in love.

15. Learn From The Best Mentors

For example…

One who is short, bold, and not very attractive.

And still had attractive women fall in love with him :).

He teaches it all in PU and SU.

Full Summary

About the Author:
Seth Godin is an American marketer, blogger, and author. He has written many books on marketing, productivity and creativity.

Issue 1: Too Many Products Advertised

Seth Godin says that there are so many products and advertisements these days that advertisement has lost much of its value.

You simply cannot get noticed in this deluge.

The author for example once asked people reading a newspaper in a lobby if they could name two advertisers with full-page ads in that newspaper.

Nobody could name two of them.

My Note: This is meaningless
Anecdotes don't mean much. But that anecdote means even less. To begin with, he asks for two advertisers, not just one. What if there were only one full-page ad in that newspaper?

And second, advertising also works at an unconscious level. Possibly, it works mostly at an unconscious level.

Issue 2: Advertisement is Ineffective

Seth Godin says that most general advertisement is ineffective.

Imagine you advertise X.

First, you need to find people who are interested in X among the multitude of people who aren't interested in X.

Even when you can reach people who are interested in X, only a fraction of those interested in X will be paying attention when your product shows.

Finally, only a fraction of that fraction will not be happy with what they already use and only a fraction of a fraction will be willing to take action on your advertisement.

My Note: Such a generalization, and plain not true.
Why then do advertisers spend billions in advertising?
This makes little sense. Advertising is an industry that kept on going for decades because it works. Plus, modern advertising is targeted advertising and works even better.
In short: some advertising doesn't work, but plenty of advertising works.

Going Back to Old Advertising Ways: Word of Mouth

Seth Godin says that before advertising all the buzz was through word of mouth.

Then advertising came along.

And in the beginning, it really worked well and there was a strong link between how much advertisement and sales.

But now we are in the era of advertisement saturation. And we should be going back to the word of mouth marketing.

With Facebook, Twitter, and social network it's even easier.

The Solution: Be Remarkable!

Today there are so many products that satisfy customers' needs is not enough.

And advertisement is ineffective.

What's the solution?

Be remarkable.

Taking Risk is The Only Option

Being safe means being boring and unremarkable.

And that's the safest way to sell little and go straight into oblivion.

The author mentions the car maker Buick, which always "kept it safe" with its design and, well… Never sold well.

Another "safe" strategy is to follow the market leader and copy them.
But that means you'll never be the leader.

Companies following that strategy will always fail in the long run because the market will invariably change and they won't be able to innovate.

Focus on Innovators

Seth Godin argues that you should not try to sell to the mass market and the average Joe.

But you should instead be remarkable and sell to a smaller group of innovators.

Those guys are the ones who are willing and excited to try new things. They will talk about your product and they will help you to make it grow.

Little by little, the early majority and later the majority and the laggard will catch on.

This is called the diffusion curve, and Godin takes this concept from the famous book Crossing the Chasm (without crediting it, as far as I can remember).

Target Ads and Measure

Seth Godin says that in this era where so few people pay attention it's paramount that you target your ads to the early innovators and to the people who care about your product.

That's the first step.

The second one is to measure and adjust your advertisement depending on the feedback you get.

Real-Life Applications

- Don't Be Afraid of Being Remarkable

One of the reasons many individuals and companies resist being remarkable is the fear of failure and ridicule. Don't!

Even if some might don't like you, you only need to be liked by a few to be successful. And you have an immense higher chance when you are remarkable.

CONS

- Too Long For Such A Simple Messages

Some of the ideas are good and noteworthy.
The main idea is also solid.
BUT you don't really need a whole book for it.

- Some Bits Don't Make Much Sense to Me

In his TED talk on Purple Cow Seth Godin shows a picture of multicolored packaging products that all try to be remarkable.

Then, he says that all products try to capture people's attention.

And what's his great plan for selling more?

Trying even harder to catch people's attention by being remarkable.

But, what a second… That's exactly what they were all trying to do!

It feels like telling to the soldier going to war that the secret to staying alive is to shoot the enemy first. Well, that's what they're all trying to do, isn't it?

- Generic Advice That Doesn't Always Apply to Everyone

There are plenty of niches where you can be unremarkable and complement a market leader product with an add-on product and make lots of money.

Investor and entrepreneur Jay Samith in Disrupt You talks about exactly that strategy. He says that today everyone's trying to be unique. And there are plenty of opportunities left for those who occupy the more boring area of the marketplace.

Samith has plenty of examples that he exploited himself to make lots of money while thriving with unremarkable products.

- Quite Unscientific

Purple Cow relies heavily on anecdotes, stories, and correlation -also read Fooled by Randomness on correlation bias-.

There are little numbers, data, and science.

Just Seth Godin's hot takes and opinions, turned into a book.

Review

Godin says he had the idea of the purple cow while watching a long field of cows in Europe.

However, there is a well-known brand in Europe that has a purple cow as a brand.

Should we believe Godin that he had his inspiration watching fields of mammals instead of following his sweet tooth in some shop?

I don't know.

But whichever the case, I like the book's concept.
However, frankly, albeit the main concept and idea are solid, I don't think you need to read this book in its entirety.
Purple Cow is a heavily padded book, stretching a couple of ideas to make it long enough to publish a book.

And I think you can get better to employ your time by getting the same message through a summary or a 10 minutes speech.

The 10X Rule: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 10 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In The 10X Rule Grant Cardone says that the key to success is to multiply your goals, actions, and consistency by an order of 10.

Bullet Summary

- 10X your goals
- 10X your actions
- 10X your consistency

10X Summary

Grant says success rests on three beliefs' pillars.

You must believe that:

1. Success is important
2. It's your duty to be successful
3. There's an abundance of success possibilities

And he adds that you need a mindset of Extreme Ownership, meaning that whatever happens in your life is your responsibility.

> Nothing happens to you. Everything happens because of you

The 10X Rule In One Sentence

The 10X Rule says that 1) you should set goals that are 10X greater than what you believe you can achieve and 2) you should take actions that are 10X greater than what you believe is necessary to achieve those goals.

The biggest mistake most people make is setting goals that are too small, and not taking enough action.
Taking massive action is the only way to fulfill your true potential.

Ethics of Success: Win-Win & Responsibility

Grant embraces the "enlightened cynic" view of life and success.

He says that the world is not a zero-sum game, and because you win, it doesn't mean someone else has to lose. You both can win.

Most of all I liked his take on success:

You should consider it unethical not to live up to your potential.

And now let's see what exactly you should 10X:

10X Your Thinking

Cardone says that humans tend to underestimate their capabilities.

And since not maximizing your potential is the ultimate sin, you need to counter-balance that natural "underestimation bias".

Hence, to avoid leaving any potential on the table, multiply your goal by 10 times. Huge goals will motivate you and force you to come up with creative thinking to achieve them.

Are you worried that huge goals will set you up to lose? That's not an issue. Grant says it feels much better to fall short of a lofty goal than to fall short on a mediocre one.

10X Your Effort

Achieving your goals probably takes 10x what you think it takes.

So start by multiplying your estimate by 10. If it will take less, great, you'll be pleasantly surprised.

10X Your Action

Most people live in a limbo between no action and average action.

To reach your full potential though, you need massive action.
Cardone says that massive action takes actually no more effort than average action.

That is because people who take average action busy themselves with excuses, busy work, and playtime.
Massive action zeros in on your goals (your "One Thing"), and doesn't stop until you get there.

10X Your Consistency

Action is great, but bursts of action may not be enough.

What really gets you to success is the consistency of that action over time.
It's a message similar to what books such as "The Slight edge" and "The Compound Effect" also espouse. Both books also state that it's only consistent effort that will add up over time to major success.

Consistency has also been explored by actual psychologists and researchers, and many agree that it's indeed a key contributor to success.
For example, Angela Duckworth coined the term "Grit" and, in what frankly seems a bit of a "psychology in search of fame" claim, says that it matters more than innate talent (also see "pop psychology myths").

10X Your "Fear Resilience"

Everyone who seeks success must contend with some fears.

Cardone says that fear doesn't act alone, and that the biggest ally fear has is… Time.
Such as, the more time you spend pondering over what could go wrong, the more fear increases.

Successful people use fear instead as an indicator for action.

Such as, whenever you feel fear, you want to take immediate action.
Cardone's message here is similar to Mel Robbins' "5 Seconds Rule", and what the early pick-up artists called the "3 seconds rule".

CONS

The Power Moves criticism of "The 10X Rule" includes:

Could Be Briefer: A Blog Post, Rather Than A Book

Cardone applies the "10X rule" across several domains of work, mindsets, and personal success.
Yet, albeit those concepts can be helpful to some beginners, they're also relatively simple and may be summarized in a blog post.

No How To Book

The book is useful to instill some work ethics and a "dream big mindset". However, it doesn't go into details of either how one can install that mindset, or how to actually do anything that would make one successful.

Hard Work Alone Not Enough: Working Smart Matters

Hard work is important.
All else being equal, the person who works hardest will achieve more success.
However, good strategic -or even Machiavellian– thinking are also important. Such as, work hard yes, dream big.. But also work smart.

Hard Work Can Burn You Out

For a period in the self-help space there was a trend of hyping up hard work.

Someone referred to it as “hustle culture” or “porn hustle”, with Gary Vaynerchuck being one of the most ardent supporters.

I think it’s an important caveat to make that success is often built in the long run. You cannot -and probably should not- sprint the whole time.

As Ray Dalio says, you can look at yourself like a machine.
Machines need good keep-up and care as well.

PROS

Some Interesting, Potentially Helpful Concept

The concept of going for bigger goals is the same as the “moonshot” of Peter Diamandis in Bold and the popular self-help book “The Magic of Thinking Big“.

And while many entrepreneurs and narcissists do not need that reminder, many people do need to hear that.
It’s also very useful to help you not leave any potential on the table, since you may fall short of your 10Xed goal, but you will most likely maximize your potential in the process.

Grant Cardone Review

Without mincing words:

We’re not the biggest fans of Grant Cardone here.

We see typical guru/followers dynamics, talking down on the audience with teacher/pupil frames, and a lot of marketing without equally good content.

The 10x conference also seems a case of lots of sizzle and little steak, and it seems to be structured like a typical upsell event where you get very little value, much hyping up of the next product, and lots of selling for that next product (and the cycle continues with that next product).

All in all, albeit you can certainly learn something from Grant Cardone, we believe there are better people to learn from -including, probably, learning the real estate business-.

10X Review

The 10X Rule has the typical Grant Cardone style: loud, and somewhat repetitive.

We gotta be honest and preface it by saying that we’re not the biggest fans of either Grant Cardone, or of this book. Cardone didn’t look too good after his spat with Jordan Belfort, the author of “Straight Line Persuasion“.

However, we’re not saying that one cannot learn from the guy -or like him-.
And if you like Cardone and his exuberant style, you will like the 10X book -whether liking is also equivalent with “good for you”, we’ll leave that up to you to decide-.

But if Cardone he’s too over the top for you, then you can take a look at our best books list, and our full free book summaries repository.

Overall the 10X Rule is easy to read and tackles some basic mindsets for success.
Most of all, we liked the concept that maximizing your potential is your ethical duty.

The One Thing: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Bullet Summary

- Focus on one important thing in your life (your one thing)
- Prioritize daily on what will have the biggest impact on your one thing
- Do one thing at a time

Full Summary

About the Author: Gary Keller is a successful American entrepreneur and author.
He is the founder of Keller Williams a real estate company that, at one point, was the largest real estate company in the world by agent count and second in closed sales volume, and units sold.
So, we may add, Gary Keller is speaking from experience when he talks about “focusing on your one thing”.

1. Start Out Thinking Big

Think big.

Gary Keller tells the story of how Arthur Guinness (producer of Guinness beer) and J. K. Rowling (author of Harry Potter books) embarked on their life quest with huge expectations.

Guinness leased the beer factory for 9.000 years and Rowling envisioned seven books before even starting to write the first.

Keller says they were successful in no small part because they started out with huge vision and goals (also read: The Magic of Thinking Big).

When You Think Small You Waste Your Potential

But what do most of us do instead?

We are intimidated by big thoughts and visions and we settle down for something "more realistic". But when we settle down for "something more realistic" we lower our future trajectory and we settle down for less than we could.

Success requires action, of course. But action requires thought. That's why we need to think big.

> Success requires action; but action requires thoughts: Think BIG!

2. Prioritize Your Tasks: Pareto Principle

Many of us have either done or gone through a task list at one point or another in our lives.

The One Thing makes a great point on common mistakes when starting said task lists: tackling the easiest first, the first on the lists or the most time-consuming.

That's a big mistake because not all tasks are the same.

Some won't do much of a difference if at all, while some others can provide you with a quantum leap towards your goals.

That's why we should all ruthlessly prioritize our tasks by the impact they will have on our goals.

Here's the question to achieve just that:

What's the ONE thing I can do, such that by doing it everything else will become easier or unnecessary?

And that's exactly the principle behind The One Thing:

3. The One Thing & The Focusing Question

That simple question right there will do two things for you:

1. Remind you of the one thing, your overarching goal you are after (long term)
2. Help you prioritize in the short term what you need to do

4. Habits: The Key to Success

Keller says that staying steadfast in the pursuit of your goal is not so much self-discipline as it is about habits.

Think of Michael Phelps, he says. He was diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Such as, that he wasn't able to focus on just one thing.

Instead, he focused on just one thing: swimming every day.

My Note:
ADHD is a rather common diagnosis these days and not nearly as a handicap as The One Thing makes it out to be. However, the point is still valid.

Keller righteously says that once the habit has been formed it won't take nearly as much discipline to maintain it. And after it becomes an established part of your life, you can go back to "cruise control" or, even better, focus on building another empowering habit (also read The Power of Habit).

I like this quote on the subject:

> Hard habits are difficult to build but make for an easy life. Easy habits don't require any effort but make for a hard life.
> –Brian Tracy

5. Focus on The One Thing (until it's done)

Multitasking is not something to be proud of: multitasking saps our efficiency.

We can do a few things at the same time, yes, but one of those activities should be very easy. Like walking (doesn't require focus) and talking complex issues on the phone (we can fully focus on the issues).

But talking about complex issues while writing on another complex issue does not work. We cannot multitask with two activities that require our full focus and attention… Unless we do both of them very sloppily.

Also, as Ferris says in The 4 Hour Workweek, we don't work like computers CPU work and switching from one activity to another take time to re-adjust and we waste valuable time.

"Wasting time" doesn't sound impressive enough to you?

Well, just think this: it's estimated that office workers, interrupted on average every 11 minutes, spend one-third of the day recovering from distractions!

Don't waste a third of your day: focus on one thing at a time.

My Note:
while Keller is spot-on on multitasking, don't let that discourage you from looking at all ways you can become more efficient. For example, when I am doing repetitive tasks on my laptop I do listen to audiobooks (for example: adding affiliate links on this page).
And when I'm doing easier tasks such I might listen to easier Youtube videos.

6. Pay Attention (And Conserve) Your Willpower

Your willpower is like a fuel tank. It will run out after you've run with it for a long time.

It's a phenomenon called ego depletion.

Keller says you must work with that in mind to be efficient: choose carefully what you need to pay attention to and do the most important things first.

My Note:
I prefer the analogy of willpower as a muscle as it can also grow over time. Also the notion that willpower is limited has been challenged and you can read more in my pop-psychology article.

7. Focusing on One Thing Means Saying No To Many Others

To focus on your one thing you must learn to say no to many more other projects and opportunities.

If you receive too many requests, think of ways to reduce them, or learn to say no without sounding mean about it. Bottom line is, you gotta say no to say yes to your one thing.

Also read:

- Say no while maintaining a good relationship
- How to be assertive

> Assertiveness: 6 Steps to Empowered Communication

8. Visualize The Process

These days everyone talks about the importance and usefulness of visualizing.

I liked though that Keller adds a further step to it: don't just visualize your goal, but visualize the steps that will get you there.

Students who visualized themselves studying VS students who just visualized getting top grades reported higher levels of satisfaction while studying.

9. Let Chaos Pile Up

Keller says that as you focus on one thing your life will keep happening in the meanwhile. He says that, at a certain point, you should come to accept chaos as an inevitable part of life.

My Note: this resonated with me a lot as I read it.

I always used to feel bad about my house not being perfectly clean. Well, now I know that it's a normal part of focusing on knowledge acquisition instead.

Real Life Applications

- Ruthless Prioritization

This is something that I'm really sold into.

I had a mindset where I often would keep my best moves for the future. That way I could lull myself in the idea that "the best is yet to come". BS. Life is short, always ask yourself what's the biggest bang for the buck you can do right now.

- Accept Some Chaos While You Purse Your One Thing

When you focus on one thing you know that you can expect other areas of your life to suffer. It's OK.

This was a very important concept for me and now I accept more openly that, well, my house won't be as perfectly clean as I like it to be.

CONS

Starting With Huge Vision?

The author picks a few examples to make the point you must start with huge vision. But that does not prove the effectiveness of the method (it's a typical case of inductive reasoning fallacy, also read Fooled by Randomness).

I can think of as many people who started with big dreams and got crushed by a much harsher reality than they expected.

As a matter of fact, I think that envisioning a huge goal come true before you even start can be dangerous because the first drawbacks can discourage you.

As Keller himself says, better to also focus on the hard work to get there. And as The One Thing itself quotes: the secret to getting ahead is getting started (even if you don't have your grand vision yet).

> The secret to getting ahead is getting started

PROS

It Makes Sense: To Succeed In A Highly Competitive World, You Must Focus On One Thing

The One Thing is somewhat of a happy crossover between Grit by Angela Duckworth (stay with one thing) and Start with WHY by Simon Sinek (find your one thing).

To which Keller adds ruthless prioritization.

Review

The One Thing is a great book.
Lots of wisdom and lots of sensible information to live a fulfilling and successful life.

It's a five-star book (but I give it four stars here because I am adamant about keeping my 5 stars to a very limited number of books).

The Go-Giver: Does Naive Giving Work for Success? (Review)

Lucio Buffalmano · 28 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Go-Giver instructs readers to take a different approach to personal success, switching focus from taking more to giving more. The authors' rationale is that, by social exchange theory, giving increases your social credit and others will eventually give back.

TPM Strategic Note: Giving is crucial but ONLY if strategic, and to worthy recipients
The Go-Giver promotes giving as the path to success—but without power awareness, character assessment and effective calculativeness, that strategy is likely to backfire.

Overview

- The more you give, the more you get <– TPM only if done strategically
- The more you care about others, the more you'll influence people
- Be open to receiving: it's the other side of the coin of giving

Notes

This is a quick overview of the laws:

1. Law of Value — Your worth is determined by how much more you give compared to what you receive
2. Law of Compensation — The number of people you serve determines your compensation
3. Law of Influence — Your influence is in direct proportion to how much you place others' interests first
4. Law of Authenticity — The most valuable gift you can offer is your true self
5. Law of Receptivity — Be open to receiving because receiving is complementary to giving

The Law of Value

It's not about making your customers pay more, but it's about giving them more.

It shouldn't be a strategy, but it should be a mindset. You must love giving.

The author says that the biggest fortunes of this world have been amassed by people who loved giving and were passionate about sharing their products and value.

And those same fortunes are squandered by people who focus on getting.

A key concept in this chapter is this: value comes first, and money is simply a consequence and a direct result of the value you provide.

TPM Note: Good business approach and mindset
Focusing on product quality is something that we always prioritize here at TPM as well. Product quality is the interpersonal equivalent of competence: it sets the foundation.

The Law of Compensation

How much you love giving is your potential. How many people you actually touch and serve, that's more directly related to your actual income.

It's all under your control: find more people to whom to give, and earn more as a consequence.

Serving

Burg & Mann say there are three different tiers to work:

- Survive: when you meet your basic needs
- Save: the first step towards abundance
- Serve: when you really make a contribution to the world

The Go-Giver is tailored towards making you a server.

The Law of Influence

When you make it about others, you start building an army of ambassadors working for you.

They might not directly buy from you, but they have your best interest in mind because you have theirs.

These people will always refer to you when they're looking for someone selling your services.

Contrary to The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People, the authors recommend you forget about win-win. Make your win 100% about the other person instead.

Burg & Mann say you need not worry about your interests because your interests will always be taken care of when you put others first.

My note: Don't forget about win-win
There are some people who will take and walk away, or try to cheat you. And you might be better off recognizing these takers before you give and give.

- Read: why you need to be bad to be good.

> To Be Good, You First Need to Be Bad: Here's Why

The Law of Authenticity

No matter what you sell, you are the most important part of your pitch.

The authors say that at most technical skills account for 10%, and the rest is people's skills and personality. And personality is even bigger than people's skills.

And what's the biggest factor of personality?

It's authenticity.

- Also read: Daring Greatly by Brene Brown
- Vulnerability is NOT power

The Law of Receptivity

Refusing to receive is as bad as focusing on getting only.

Because if you don't equally appreciate receiving, you are basically denying the gift of others.

Finally, the authors say that all the giving in the world will not bring you success unless you open yourself up to receiving back in equal measures.

Which makes a lot of sense :).

Full Circle: It's About Who You Are

I liked the last chapter of The Go-Giver as it focuses on how you measure success.

It's not about whether or not you get the account you wanted or make the sale.
It's about who you are.

TPM Analysis

I have a few red flags to raise here:

1. Naive Self-Help: Giving Without Any Considerations Doesn't Work

The mindset of giving is good.

But as for everything, it requires balance.

And, in this case, it also requires power intelligence and strategic thinking.

And I say it as a former salesperson who couldn't take it anymore of people talking about sales as "going to war" and "being in the trenches" (plus the CEO who referred to sales as "the art of bullshiting", so great to do sales for that guy…. NOT!).

We need some of that Go-Giver spirit for some people to understand that business is about providing value first.

But at the same time, don't be Pollyanna about it.

You will meet bad people on your path and you will meet ruthless people who will take, take take. And then come back to take more.

Read more here on naive self-help:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

2. Giving Isn't The Only Way to Success

As a website built on the realization that there are some dark people and you need to know how to play dirty with them, I need to state this point clearly.

The book seems to hint that the only way to be rich and successful is to give without caring for your own interests and that any other way won't take you far.

Not true.
As Adam Grant shows, the givers who win in life are strategic givers.
Also read "enlightened cooperation" here:

> The 'Smart Collaborator': Giving For Win-Win, Without Being Exploited

Furthermore, it promotes the naive and untrue myth that taking, narcissism, or Machiavellianism can't lead to success.
And as we know here, there's plenty of Machiavellianism at the top.

Aggression, cheating and scheming also are possible routes to achieving many trappings of success.
Giving and giving without any strategy isn't.
So, again, don't be Pollyanna.

Review

The Go-Giver is an interesting read that takes the good concept of giving to a dangerous extreme.

On the positive, it's a great reminder that your success depends on how well you serve others (see: the law of social exchange and WIIFM).

As Peter Diamandis, author of Bold said: if you want to become a billionaire, help a billion people.

At the same time, we don't advise on TPM to "give, give, give", because you will meet ahole who will "take, take, take" without giving anything back and smiling all their way to the bank behind your back.

Sometimes you need to put your foot down and demand what's fair, or else some people may never give it to you.
And, generally speaking, it's better to be more strategic about your giving in life because neither you nor the world will gain if all you do is waste and deplete resources and time with random giving.

Bullet Summary

- Think of what you want in life and prioritize based on who and what moves you towards your goals
- Lift weights, eat lots of vegetables
- Don't buy for status: shift your mindset from consumer to producer

Full Summary

About the Author:
Mike Cernovic is an American right-wing social media personality and some may say a 'conspiracy theorist'.
He initially labeled himself alt-right, but later dissociated from the movement.

Intro

Cernovic introduces to the readers what he calls "Gorilla Mindsets", which are empowering ways of thinking, behaving, and seeing the world.

I will structure this summary around those key aspects.

1. Develop a Growth Mindset

Cernovich begins Gorilla Mindset with an overview of Carol Dweck's research on growth and fixed mindset.

People with a growth mindset look for ways to grow while fixed mindset people believe their traits are fixed so they shy away from challenges.

Read more here:

- How to develop a growth mindset

> How To Develop a Growth Mindset: Here's How I Did It

2. Develop an Abundance Mindset

There are two types of mindsets around abundance.

Think of them as two polar opposites on a continuum:

- Scarcity mindset: people with a scarcity mindset believe that everything around them is limited, and that leads to a limiting life
- Abundance mindset: people with an abundance mindset instead focus on opportunities and they are more likely to take those opportunities

Says Cernovic:

> The world is either scarce beyond measure or abundant beyond measure

3. Change the Conversation You Have With Yourself

Self-talk, says Cernovic, is a key component of our lives.

Yet most of us talk to ourselves in a terrible fashion, making sweeping negative generalizations. Like "why am I so stupid" or "I'm such an idiot".

The author proposes four ways to improve self-talk:

1. Talk to yourself in the mirror
2. Record your self-talk without censoring, then play it a few days later and see how silly it sounds
3. Ask yourself questions instead of negative statements
4. Use affirmations and mantras (ie.: "I'm unstoppable", or "even if I don't win I grow stronger")

Ask yourself why you are making those affirmations to make them more powerful

TPM Note: Affirmations were popular in self-help in the 1990's, but are of limited effect, especially when people lack foundational self-esteem.

4. Choose How You Frame Life

Depending on how you see things, they can be positive or negative.

If you choose to view drawbacks as motivation to make you grow and push forward even harder, chances are you will indeed push forward, grow stronger, and reach your goals.

If you see it as the end of the world and the bane of your life, then chances are it will indeed be the end of your attempts.

Learn more about the basics of frames and frame control:

> Frame Control Power Dynamics: The Basics

5. Be Present to Be Mindful

The author says that being mindful means being present and being engaged -"checked in", he calls it-.

You don't need to meditate, he says -with which I didn't fully agree- you simply need to be present in the now, feel your own body and emotions.

When you walk, walk with a purpose and be conscious of your movement and your posture.

When you talk to someone, be fully present, don't check your phone and use self-talk if you need a reminder. You can tell yourself something like "there is no other place I would rather be".

6. How to Change Your State

The author uses NLP and this example:

1. Go into a room by yourself
2. Get mindful and answer the question “how do you feel right now”
3. Create a sphere of emotional space (use movement to get into a different state, feel invulnerable and imagine a force around you to protect you)
4. Reinforce the emotional state

TPM Note: State-changing was popular in self-help and pick-up artist circles in the 1990s and early 2000s. It’s not useless, but advanced state-shifts must happen in real time. Better yet, advanced operators cant act independetly of ‘state’

7. Think What You Want & Prioritize

The author advises the readers to reflect on what they really want and then focus on that.

Here are four questions to realize what you really want:

- What you want more of
- What you want less of
- Is the person or activity you’re engaging in bringing more of what you want?
- Is the person or activity you’re engaging in bringing less of what you want?

Zero in on what will move towards what you want and say no to things and friends who are sidetracking you.

And to learn to say no:

> 5 Techniques to Say No (Polite, But Effective)

8. Take Care of Your Body

The author stresses that the mind and body are connected and dedicates a whole section to body and training and proper nutrition.

In a nutshell:

- Sleep as much as you need
- Lift weights
- Do cardio as well, but lifting is priority
- Establish an empowering morning routine
- Do something physical every day
- Do use or end with cold water during showers
- Eat enough fibers
- Eat lots of vegetables
- People bash fruits, but not true: eat less of them than vegetables but fruits are OK
- If you can’t take enough vegetables per day, do vegetable smoothies
- Throw away all junk food (out of sight, out of mind)

Quote:

> No matter how you feel before the gym, you'll feel better afterward

9. Money Talks

Money is not bad or evil. People with money are also free to make a lot of good in the world.

Money is important and when you have money, you have more freedom. Plus the strength and power of not compromising on your values.

Basically the author suggests that it's poor people who wheel and scheme and lie because they have no other choice.

The author quotes The Millionaire Next Door and says that people who look rich often fuel their bragging out of debt and are not really rich.

The real rich don't buy stuff to show off, and he exhorts the readers to do the same. He invites us to stop buying brands to impress people and instead buy what makes sense and save for the future and for rainy days.

The author says he likes money and wants to make more, but also asks the readers:

Do you need more money, or do you think you need more money to escape your current unhappy situations?

Because chances are you don't really need to make more money to make yourself happier or improving your current situation.

10. Think More Like a Producer, Less Like a Consumer

What's the difference?

Here is its:

- Consumers are all about buying new things and new shiny toys
- Producers think of what they can develop and sell. They see what others are selling well, and think of the marketing and copy that went into it, and how they can also use it

11. How to Invest

Three ideas to invest:

- Invest in the stock market as an investor

Mike Cernovich says to be an investor and not a trader (they all lose in the long run)
He recommends investing in ETF every month because the market will eventually always go up.

TPM Note: the market does not necessarily 'always go up'. And even less so in the short time span of what's useful to people (a few decades top)

- Invest in yourself

Most of all, though, the author says the corporation you should always invest the biggest in is: the corporation of yourself.

- Minimize your taxes

Taxes are high, and cost you a huge chunk of your money. Seek to minimize them.

CONS

Cover Lots of Topics = Spreading Itself Thin

The author ranges from mindsets to how to train to posture to money management and investment.

It's not a bad idea per se, there is a space and a time for breadth, but the downside is that it necessarily ends up being shallow on many of those topics.

Imprecise At Times

Here is an example from a quote:

> (…) but keep in mind that if you eat fat and carbs together and there is no proteins in there that's gonna be a big problem for you (how?).
> Another tip is that if you're going to eat that kind stuff, or if you have a big dinner hour or a family dinner or something like that try to eat some fiber"

The recommendation may be good, but Cernovich should have probably fixed the language to make it more precise and accurate, lest people will think of him as less knowledgeable.

More Advanced Readers May Find it Basic

Gorilla Mindset is an entry-level book on self-development. More advanced readers might find it basic, at times, covering stuff they already know without adding much depth.

Sometimes, Advice is Not True

Of course, not a strike against the book or author. It's just natural when you try to cover all that much ground.

Sometimes it feels Gorilla Mindset took some of the most popular advice on a certain topic and used it, without a deeper analysis.

For example, the idea that “the market will always go up” simply makes no sense (also read: Fooled by Randomness).
Will the market go up if a nuclear world war started?

PROS

Good Book for Beginners of Self-Help

Gorilla Mindsets covers quite a lot of the basics in a very quick and compact format, which makes it a good book for beginners in self-development.

Quick, Compact & Dense With Plenty of Valid Stuff

No time waste, no fillers, good content. I like that. Need more of this.

Review

Gorilla Mindset is a good book on some foundational aspects of self-development.

There is nothing groundbreaking, but it provides a good overview of some important topics.
More advanced students may use it as a refresher, but otherwise find it a bit lacking in the details.

If you have been in any shape or form into self-development, much of the information will not be new. And it might not add much new information to what you already know.

Takeaways

1. Open your eyes to the possibility of a dream life: The lie of either "employment and saving" or "employment and debt consumption" (scripted) is holding you to a far better life (unscripted)
2. Become an entrepreneur: To live the unscripted life, free and happy, you need to become an entrepreneur, and to become a successful entrepreneur you need to…
3. Internalize positive mindsets and execute: including a meaning and purpose to succeed and stay on it, plus the stamina to work long hours, and the resilience to stay on it until successful
4. Provide a value-adding product to the world: Focus not on making money, but on providing value, and money will come (far more easily and reliably. Or, at least, far more honestly)

Notes

About the Author:
MJ DeMarco is a semi-retired entrepreneur, investor, author, and creator of the popular forum on entrepreneurship, "The Fastlane Forum".
He is also the author of "The Millionaire Fastlane", a book that we reviewed here on TPM, highly appreciated, and recommend.

About the Reviewer:
Lucio Buffalmano is a social scientist, founder of ThePowerMoves.com, and he has been living the Unscripted life pursuing his mission and passion. He also pursues the 'productrocacy' with a relentless focus on countinously improving Power University to help good men succeed.

The Pre-Planned Life Into The System Is A Sucker's Trade

> Your life was sold into a Machiavellian system where your lifetime role was already SCRIPTED for an uninspiring performance. You've been unwittingly cast to play a rigged carnival game masquerading as life, which few win and many lose…

Unscripted, says the author, unveils that sucker's trade of a scripted life, and helps you live the life of your dreams.

The Scripted Men

Scripted men are "M.O.D.E.L." citizens, such as:

M.O.D.E.L. CITIZENSHIP:

- (M)ediocre
- (O)bedient
- (D)dependent
- (E)ntertained
- (L)ifeless

Model citizens also become "seeders", such as, they promote the scripted, obedient, and lifeless life.

There are two types of people who fail to reach the unscripted life:

Sidewalkers (the hoppers)

Sidewalks live a modest life with little saving, and finance their consumption on debt.

From a mindset point of view, they focus on others, rather than on their on themselves, their goals, and their own empowerment.

I can't avoid but copying this because this description is a true masterpiece:

> Temporal prostitution is a way of life. Always needing to work and always loathing the obligation, Sidewalkers > routinely waste time in superfluous hyperrealistic proxies: sports, television dramas, Internet comment wars. You see, the Sidewalker doesn't play the game of life; he spectates. He comments. He opines. He heckles the million-dollar athlete from the cheap seats. Culturally plugged in, Sidewalkers can shoot the shit by the water cooler for hours, dispensing a wide variety of opinions: who the Dallas Cowboys should have drafted; how George R.R. Martin should have written Game of Thrones; and how dare Showtime cancel Dexter? Instead of being the best he can be, the Sidewalker aspires to be the best copy of someone else: an athlete, a famous person, a fictional character, or some other person not annexed by the SCRIPT.

BOOM, couldn't have put it any better.
For an antitodote, also read "making of the ubermesch":

> Empowered Individualism: Why the Individual Must Come First

Slow Laners (the ants)

If sidewalkers are lazy and/or are kept in the scripted life by their over-spending the slow laners do the opposite:

Slow laners consume little and save and invest in the hope of future freedom.

I quote DeMarco here:

> At the heart of the Slowlane is a reasonable idea: stop consuming.
> However, applied within the SCRIPTED OS, stop consuming means stop living. Specifically, start depriving yourself. Settle for less. Lower your expectations. Defer spending, defer experiencing—vacations, restaurants, movies—and defer life until retirement.
> While the Sidewalker is leashed and collared by consumption and debt, the Slowlaner is leashed and collared by deprivation and hope. (…)
> Sadly, changing paths does nothing but change your corporate master. Whereas a Sidewalker is broadly owned horizontally through a variety of corporations (banks, media, consumer products), the Slowlaner is vertically owned by just one corporate master. Your new corporate owner? Wall Street.
> You see, whenever you put your financial future into Wall Street's hands, you're essentially saying, "Hope and time is my plan for financial freedom."

Almost all the popular personal finance books, such as Tony Robbins' "MONEY Master The Game" sell -or trick you into- the slow lane.

DeMarco describes it with brilliant humor:

> Of course, these books don't overtly say, "Be cheap," but hide behind slippery phrases like "the simple life" or "frugal living." Some bloggers make a living on the entire concept, as if dumpster-diving for expired meat behind the Safeway is so brilliant. Regardless of the words beating you stupid, the concept is ridiculous and oxymoronic.
> Scarcity does not create abundance.

The problem with that approach is not just the wait, but it's also the hope component.
Hope you'll live long enough, hope the stockmarket keeps going up, hope you won't get sacked, etc. etc.

What "Unscripted" Looks Like

Early in the introduction MJ DeMarco outlines how the unscripted life feels like:

> Life. Liberty. And the pursuit of entrepreneurship. It's awaking in the morning and pinching yourself black-and-blue—that OMG, this is my life, and it's freaking awesome. You live in your dream house, but there's no mortgage. No alarm clock, no boss, no bills. No claims on the day's time other than what you choose. It's making more money before breakfast than you made for an entire week at your last job. It's a crazy expensive car parked in your garage, a victorious symbol that your dreams no longer sleep in fantasies, but are awake with reality.

The author says that life exists because he's been living it for nearly 20 years.
And so have many of the people who learned from him, and… It could be you as well.

Unscripted meaning being your own boss, living the good life the way you want to live it.

How Unscripted Feels Like

The author says he can't describe the dream unscripted life because that depends on you.

It also depends on you how much you need to make it happen.

But he can describe how it feels like with a list of "fuck you" that reject the scripted life, and push you towards unscripted life:

> Being charged an arm and leg for a mortgage? Fuck you. I'll pay cash.
> Need to work next weekend and miss the kid's playoff game? Fuck you. I quit.
> Stock market sinking and threatening retirement? Fuck you. The stock market doesn't fund my retirement.
> Can't go on vacation until someone gives permission? Fuck you. I leave tomorrow.
> Can't wear that cool outfit on casual Fridays? Fuck you. I'm wearing only underwear all day.
> Don't like your annual 2 percent pay raise? Fuck you. I'll make 200 percent more next year.
> As "fuck you" implies, UNSCRIPTED is about pure, unadulterated life and liberty. Life means owning your time and thoughts while curating your existence.

The unscripted life is based on freedom, personal power, and personal choice.
DeMarco says it's based on 5 freedoms:

1. Freedom from work
2. Freedom from scarcity and fiscal constraint the "freedom to walk into a Starbucks and order what you want", jokes the author while poking fun at the personal finance "gurus"
3. Freedom from hyperrealistic influence: "The very definition of UNSCRIPTED means not being influenced by SCRIPTED trivialities. Pop culture, celebrity worship, and pro athletes are "no contest" to the life I'm leading."
4. Freedom from hope and dependence: the slow lane hopes and depends on the stock market, the housing market, and the job market
5. Freedom from ordinary and routine: do, wear, buy, live, and pursue whatever you want

If You're "Interested" In Entrepreneurship, But Don't Go For It, You Don't Want It Badly Enough

Or, as DeMarco puts it:

"It doesn't hurt bad enough".

What can help you push over the edge are what the author call "Fuck This Events" (FTE).

However, there are major threats to reaching the "FTE event" that'll push you into entrepreneurship, and they are:

Threat #1: Mediocre comfort

> Give a man an OK job that pays just enough to provide mediocre comfort and I'll show you a man that will keep his job indefinitely.

The author says that the "just enough" is by design and part of the systemic-level and and business-level manipulation.
He says that Henry Ford only gave his workers Saturday free so that they could consume more, and he could profit more.
Says the author:

> The five-day, forty-hour workweek is a SCRIPTED tool for obedience, keeping you occupied, clothed, and fed, and it's just enough to keep weekends earmarked as a leisurely celebration officiated by consumption.

DeMarco says he witnesses countless people on his forum who have "fake FTE" moments.
They announce they're starting, they'r becoming entrepreneur, they're ready to take off… And then they disappear, back to their "just comfortable enough life".

Finally, making the jump to entrepreneruship will likely require some initial hard work and sacrifice.
And that's too much for the people who are "just barely comfortable enough" with their 2 days free per week.

Threat #2: Your guarded pride and ego

The author says that if you can't get a minimum-wage job, you can't be an entrepreneur.

Entreprenerus can go for long stretches of time without much money.

My Note: I only partially agree
Most entrepreneurs think it's cool to "hustle", and a poor entrepreneur is a very different feel from a poor minimum-wage worker.
There is an ego threat, but it's slightly different. It's the threat of those who have been well-off all their life, and can't take a lifestyle "cut".

Threat #3: Responsibility

This is for those who are too tied up and "held hostage" within the scripted system of debts and obligations, that they can't unscript.

Says the author in one of the many hilarious passages:

> For example, every so often during an interview, I'm asked if I have any advice for someone with four ex-wives, seventeen kids from six different women, nine credit cards, two new cars, and a bad job. Really? Not sure I have any advice, at least the type of advice you'd want to hear. How about keep your damn pants zipped? Quit buying shit with money you don't have? Make better choices? With such a robust personal resume, this person doesn't have a money problem—he has a decision-making problem. And until that changes, nothing will change, no matter what my advice is.

Threat #4: Fear

Of course, you may have seen this coming.

However, a “real FTE” sees no fear. In my opinion, a born entrepreneur sees no fear because he sees no alternatives.
Or, alternatively, the worst case alternative scenario of being poor and struggling all his life is better than being scripted.

Pursuing The Dream IS The Dream

The cynics say of guys like DeMarco that “he’s selling a dream”.
But, DeMarco says, those cynics don’t have proxy to anything but their own mediocrity.

But, even more important, it’s not necessarily succeeding that is the dream.
The dream is in the pursuit:

> What these fools can’t see is that pursuing the dream is the dream itself. It’s the process. The failures, trials, and tribulations. It’s the self-growth, the self-awareness, and the self-discovery that occur during a dream pursuit. To sell the dream is to awaken the dream—and once it’s alive, you become alive.

The Unscripted Entrepreneurial Framework (TUNEF)

The “escape” from scripted life is built around 5 ingredients:

1. Beliefs, including biases to overcome
2. Meaning and purpose, to keep you driven, hungry, and focused on the goal until you win
3. Value-delivering product (fastlane entrepreneurship)
4. Execution
5. Discipline and staying power

Note: the author uses different names, but I find it simpler to call them in most standardized format as above.

An infographic overview of the whole “Unscripted Framework”:

Thanks to ApeRunner from TheFastLane forum
You can't succeed buying the "how-to" for the latest fad.

Says DeMarco:

> "how-to" books are ineffective and largely a waste of time—the macro-processes mutate so fast that by the time they get into a book or an Internet marketer's latest scam program selling at $997, they're outdated and ineffective.

I largely agree with that… Unless you get in early.
I've personally met successful Amazon FBA -or doing something through Amazon anyway that everyone else tried to do- and they were making really good money in total freedom.

The types of failed entrepreneurs who lack one ingredient

1. Competent self-destructor (lacks belief), has no confidence to pitch with power and rally people behind his goal
2. Wanderer (lacks meaning), he doesn't have enough motivation and staying power
3. Pay the bill entrepreneur (lacks product) scale and acceleration never happens because the product has no real pull
4. Idea entrepreneur (lacks execution): the idea guys think that ideas make the difference, they guard and defend their genius idea, they talk and discuss too much, they seek someone to pay them for their idea… And then someone else makes millions when they execute on that idea
5. Gambling rockstar fallen from grace (lacks discipline) poor decision maker with reckless behavior and reckless spending. They sometimes seek unethical shortcuts because they're more interested in the lifestyle and the bling bling

Think of Money As Value Vouchers

> As a producer, start thinking of "money" as value-vouchers—a store of perceived value produced, communicated, and delivered to the world.
> If your goal is ten million dollars, the new goal is ten million value-vouchers. And acquiring those ten million value-vouchers requires facing money's true nature. Be valuable. Wanted. Demanded.

There are 2 ways to attract those vouchers, the "dishonorable" way, which is to trick and deliver perceived value, but little or no real value, or to actually deliver real value.

To HONORABLY attract value-vouchers, money bridges must be constructed with these four building blocks:

1. Value (product/service creation)
2. Perceived value communicated to another party (marketing and messaging)
3. A mutual agreement, an equilibrium with that party (closing)
4. Actual value delivered (execution)

Capitalism, says DeMarco, allows us the (selfish, I'd add) entrepreneur to get rich by helping other selfish buyers:

> And therein lies our polarizing principle that reverses the poverty scam: the fiduciary principle—a resolution that as UNSCRIPTED entrepreneurs we will serve selflessly to serve the selfish.

However, the entrepreneur must be somewhat less selfish, because he needs to understand what others want.

Find A Great Why

To succeed as an entrepreneur you'll need a great "why" to stay at it.

> Whatever your WHYs, they must be strong enough to incite action that borders on the obsessive. What "whys" will compel you to work on a Saturday night while your bros are partying?
> What "whys" will compel you to drive the 160,000-mile Honda when your wingman drives a new Camaro?
> And are these "whys" hot enough to steam water when things go cold?
> Fiery WHYs overpower expiring willpower and fizzling passion. Lukewarm WHYs translate into neither meaning nor purpose, but action-faking. Without solid WHYs, effort sinks in the first storm.

... But Don't Necessarily "Follow Your Passion: It's About Feedback Loops, Not Passion

"Follow your passion" has become a mantra.

But there's an important caveat:

Your passion must provide value.
Otherwise, nobody cares if you're doing what you're passionate about.
And the most popular "passion-based" businesses such as travel and food blogs are hyper-crowded.

In any case, that shouldn't be an issue.
The pleasure is not in "doing what you're passionate about".

The real love doesn't come from "doing" but from having your creative contribution validated, from your self-growth, and from worldly verified accomplishments.
If Steve Jobs had been a failure and didn't connect his feedback loop, he'd not be talking about following your passion.
Steve Jobs loved not the particular job he was doing, he loved the positive results of his work.

Same for sports fans: they're not too happy when their favorite team loses, are they?
They're all happy when it wins. Because of positive feedback loops.

Of course, if you can find a combination of what you're initially passionate or interested in plus a market niche, go for it.
Just don't "follow your passion" blindly and believe it will get you results.

Persist Through Failures Till You Find Success

Entrepreneurship is a number's game.

The author says it's like baseball, where the best hitters miss most of the times:

> They say (not sure who "they" are) that 90 percent of new businesses fail within the first five years. Whatever the percentage, it doesn't matter. You will contribute to the statistic at some point.
> The question is, will your updated resume be the death certificate of your entrepreneurial dreams? Or will you continue swinging?

Develop Pull Products (& Mindsets), And You Won't Ever Have To "Push"

We talked here about "push & pull" in terms of power and persuasion.

And the same is true for entrepreneurship:

- Push products are commodities or products with low added value. And they need a lot of advertising
- Pull products sell themselves through word-of-mouth marketing

The author even recommends being suspicious of too heavily advertised products:

> I am suspicious of any company that advertises heavily because it suggests a product that can't pull.
> For example, I avoid both Geico and Progressive Insurance (…) despite the advertising, I've never been recommended either.
> The same suspicions flow locally.
> Ever get one of those thick envelopes filled with coupons mailed to you? The one stuffed with advertisements from nearby home remodelers, pizza joints, and carpet cleaners? Again, the businesses that advertise every week are foisting the red flag of product mediocrity. I simply don't trust them, and I'd rather go online and post a query to the neighborhood Facebook group.

Once you have a product that pulls, you develop what MJ calls a "productrocacy":

> Whereas a meritocracy pulls power to the skilled, a productocracy pulls money to the value creators, businesses who grow organically through peer recommendations and repeat customers, compelled by a distinguished product/service not readily offered elsewhere.

Push entrepreneurs: the bad mindsets of manipulative marketing

Some "entrepreneurs" just don't have the pull mentality of delivering real value.

They focus instead on perceived value, and chase money rather than chasing "value vouchers".

Says MJ:

> "push entrepreneurs" reveal their push mentality by asking such questions as:
> I'd like to write an eBook; what topics make the most money?
> I'd like to start selling on Amazon; what's a good product?
> What companies drop-ship, so I can start my eCommerce empire?
> A productocracy is an afterthought. Products that put smiles on customers and solve problems, a non-sequitur.
> Instead, the product is a mere spoke in the wheel, inconsequential

A productocracy has five core Commandments called CENTS.
They are:

1. Control: own what you build. Your entire operations must be within your sphere of influence, or diversified from influence. It allows you to sleep well at night because no single individual can take down your whole operation and you can withstand shocks or black swans
2. Entry: the easier a market to enter, the smaller the opportunity. Conversely, the harder something is to solve, the greater the opportunity
3. Need: it's the most important of them all. If you own a controlled and high entry-barrier business that provides value, satisfied needs or wants, you will win growth, profits, and possibly, passive income for life.
4. Time:
    1. Physical independence, with your value being delivered independently of you doing it, selling it, or teaching it
    2. Time independence (detachment): while in the beginning you're on your business 24/7, independently you want to detach and be free and independent from your own creation

5. Scale: legacy value systems must be replicated through mass or magnitude while making a profitable impact. if you can impact just one person and your system is replicable, you already have a scalable business.

Don't Waste: Spend For What Grows The Bottom Line Only

I've personally many "entrepreneurs" make this mistake:

To spend money on logos, cool offices, branded shirts and mouse pads, PR… And take time and resources away from what actually grows revenues or improves product.

Says the author:

> Cash is king when it comes to propagation. Every dollar should go toward that effort. If it cannot grow the bottom line, it shouldn't be done. uxiliary expenditures, such as marble floors, custom-branded mousepads, and that cool neon light of your logo, can wait. Preservation of cash and its ultimate redirection into growth is the only thing that matters.

And if you can avoid funding, avoid it

> Why? Because funding typically shifts stakeholder priority from the customer to the investors. If you can finance growth while maintaining 100 percent control over your business, do it.

Commit: Be Business-M/onogamous (at least until successful)

Launching a business is a full-time endeavor, there's no time for anything else.

As much as you can hardly expect a great relationship if you're sharing with 6 other people, you can't expect a great business if you're being pulled left and right by other competing demands.
Says MJ:

> Whenever I hear a young entrepreneur say, "I have six businesses," it's both sad and amusing. This is code for, "I have six businesses that suck."

AFTER you've been successful you can juggle, have fun, invest, and explore.

BUT in business monogamy must precede polygamy.

Be "Imbalanced" And All-In In The Beginning

Work-life balance is for scripted folks.

Entrepreneurs must embrace periods in life where they go all-in, no distractions and nothing outside of work.

> Great results come from great imbalances. The incredible life I live today is not because of balance; it's because I meandered into the world of the obsessed.
> Periodic, huge life imbalances often precede success.

Yep, the same was true for me.
Today I may have a balanced life -albeit I still work every single day- or choose to have a more balanced period, or a slower period.
But in the beginning, it was work, work, work… And almost nothing else.

Says the author with his usual biting style:

> If I want to launch another multimillion-dollar company, I implicitly know balance will be forsaken. Decide what's more important to you: permanent balanced mediocrity or temporary unbalanced exceptionalism?

MORE WISDOM

Some more golden nuggets from "Unscripted":

Approach people with a giver mentality

As a general rule, the more successful one is, the harder it is to get in touch with him.

And the more you make it about yourself rather than about them, the less likely it is they will reply -or even like you, for that matter-.
Says the author:

> I, I, I, me, me, me. No one cares. Well, I do, but I don't.
> I get it—all of us are selfish. Unfortunately, your selfishness keeps you from success. If your opening email contains more than two Is and MEs, there's no chance. This simple concept of pushing aside selfishness and GIVING first, while TAKING later, is why networks don't expand, let alone why value-vouchers remain elusive.

Also read the "givers and takers" and "social exchange dynamics":

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

Compound interest won't make you rich...

… Or, at least, not as it's peddled.

Not by saving a few bucks and investing, then hoping and trusting.
Instead, compound interest only works to produce a sizable income if you can earn a big chunk of money upfront:

> You can activate compound interest's praised power only if you can earn and save millions fast, not when you use it to turn nickels into dimes as the compound-interest scam implores. Explode wealth by leveraging producerism through the UNSCRIPTED framework—then compound interest can pay you residually for the rest of your life.

Gurus like Tony Robbins who sell you the "compound interest" path to riches are manipulating you

On Tony Robbins:

> Tony seemingly morphed from an awesome motivational guy to just another Wall Street shill. Anyone with a scant of intelligence knows Mr. Robbins amassed a fortune selling books and high-priced seminars, not mutual funds. Could it be that the book is really a "trip wire"? A tool stumbling starry-eyed idolaters into a back-end sales funnel, which makes millions on management fees, referrals, seminars, or whatever else carries a big price tag? The duplicity cost Tony a fan

Money does buy happiness

> Let's talk about my favorite BS SCRIPTSpeak: "Money doesn't buy happiness."
> Whenever someone shoves this turd in your face, get ready for some real laughs. I've been broke and rich, and let me tell you, the comparison is like canned Spam to five-star steakhouse Kobe. No matter what study or academic research concludes, there's no truth to "money doesn't buy happiness" because the studies never account for how the money is used. Is it used to consume? Or is it used to maximize freedom within our free-range cage? (…)
> Money does buy happiness when you let it buy your freedom

Personal empowerment comes from being your own judge

Social media and modern society are built to make people feel inadequate.

And to make them spend money.

> In my ten-minute pass of the $12,000 dresses and $42,000 chandeliers, the messaging of this "lifestyle" magazine was clear: you are inadequate and your inadequacy can be solved by spending everything you earn on outclassing the other guy.
> It made me think.
> With comparative immunity, you're free from comparison propaganda. You know you are adequate. You know your self-esteem and self-worth are not defined by a $1,000 pair of shoes made in an Indonesian sweatshop.
> Let the fools fooled by the inadequacy messages succumb: debt, uncertain future, and work until death. Don't > waste life's precious time adorning your coffin with diamonds.

QUOTES

On people without experiencing teaching others how to do what they haven't done:

> Another financial article authored by a non-millionaire telling me how to become a millionaire.

And on "gurus" manipulating others by teaching how to get rich with some sucky system that they did NOT use to get rich:

> It's another financial guru dispensing another fiscal hypocrisy of "do what I say, not what I do." I chuckle. I shake my head. And then my humanity hits me with sadness—people buy the lies and pay for it with their lives.

On the compound interest myth:

> News flash! Compound interest is a scam. The stock market isn't going to make you rich. And neither will that ETF, that mutual fund, or that 401(k). That is, unless you plan on managing that ETF, that mutual fund, or that 401(k).
> (…)
> The compound-interest scam is this serendipitous orthodoxy that the stock market will someday make you, the common man, uncommonly rich.

On "gurus' books":

> A member of my forum once complained in a thread, "All guru books are a road to nowhere." Of course I interjected and responded, "I disagree." All guru books are a road into their sales funnel.

On the sucker's trade that are MLM and networking businesses:

> Some long-lost friend you haven't heard from since Chumbawamba wants you to go to some ambiguous meeting at some ambiguous hotel so you can hear from some ambiguous speaker. And then you're told how you can make millions selling some overpriced product if you just sell it to your friends and family, and they sell it to theirs, and so forth. If you ever get fooled into a meeting, take a look around. The room is full of guppies. The sharks? They own the company or are chilling in the founders' circle.

On "passive income" boys:

> I call them "drive-bys"—people who love this radical idea of "passive income" but don't care about value, contribution, or entrepreneurship. Time and time again, one phrase I hear echoed by drive-bys is "passive income."
> What's the best way to earn passive income?
> Can I make passive income publishing crappy 300-word books on Kindle?
> If I YouTube myself picking my nose while eating a cheeseburger, can I make passive income?

On the freeing power of money:

> Compound interest doesn't take the stage until we've earned and saved a large enough amount to make it > famously impactful. Every dollar saved NOW is a soldier fighting the fight of "fuck you" LATER, giving you the increasing probability that work remains optional and life is lived on your terms.

On Steve Jobs and imitators who fall for the "personality cult":

> I have tremendous respect for Steve Jobs's entrepreneurial accomplishments, and yet by many accounts, the guy was a first-class douchebag: parking his Mercedes in handicapped spots, humiliating employees, and throwing tantrums when he didn't get his way.
> Shall we presume any of these negative traits accounted for Jobs's iconic success? And if so, shall we now aspire for douchebaggery, considering it might be responsible for a legendary company like Apple? I hope not. We're all perfectly imperfect. Including our heroes. While doing X, Y, and Z might have worked for Jobs, it might not work for YOU. Every one of us needs to stop hero-worshiping mortal beings and be our own heroes. Stop trying to write your story with someone else's pen and, instead, start using your own.

On "passion" not paying the bills:

If your passion doesn't solve people's problems, passion doesn't pay bills.
Does a market even exist for what you love? Do other people need what you love, and if so, are you exceptional at it while communicating a unique value proposition? If you aren't, be prepared to prostitute your love in the name of paying bills.
Markets flooded with "do what you lovers" are extremely crowded and rip-your-hair-out competitive.

CONS

Less random railing might gain larger appeal (and authority)

Let's be clear:

This con is also the book's main draw.
It's DeMarco's opinions and attitudes that make Unscripted unique -and fun-.

Some of his descriptions are almost artworks of biting humor and scathing -but on-point- sociological analysis.

But it sometimes can feel a bit too much or even "populist".

For example:

- "The script" teaches that the road to "coolness" is buying goods. Feels a bit simplistic to me. I don't think consumption is all "society-driven" (and most certainly not the main reason Elliot Rogers went on a killing spree-. Consumption is driven partly by advertising, but partly also by human nature
- University snowflakes who "shit their pampers" when anything threatens their lexicon or diverging opinions. He's right and it's amusing to read, but almost every generation rebels against something, that's not unique or special and might have been left out
- "Washington", the politicians, and the government that "used to be for the people", while now it's "by the few, for the few". Few things feel populist like finger-pointing to the politicians as the roots of all evil. Plus, this feels like the "back then was better" fallacy

That, and a few more, can make the book come across as opinion-based as well as overly opinionated and argumentative.
In that sense, it reminded me a bit of another favorite author of mine: Nassim Nicholas Taleb. An opinionated genius who might have gained some more authority without the more populist digressions.

PROS

It should suffice to say that this is one of our favorite entrepreneurship books or resources.

But if we had to list one, it's probably the completeness mixed with quality that makes it stand out:

- Great mix of mindsets, self-empowerment, mindsets, and strategies

This isn't just a book on entrepreneurship; it's a great guide on empowered thinking through entrepreneurship.

REVIEW

Unscripted is one of the best entrepreneurship books available, mixing mindsets, hard truths, common pitfalls, as well as some valuable high-level strategies.

Unscripted is more about philosophy and mindsets and less about concrete "how-to steps", but it's a conscious choice we agree with. As the author clearly states and as we agree, there are no timeless "simple steps" to execute and succeed as an entrepreneur.

I consider it the best book on entrepreneurship because it so closely aligns with my own philosophy and with The Power Moves' relentless focus on quality.
Where I may differ from how many people approach this book is that for me it's not just a business strategy; it's the consequence of my life mission and passions. This is what I love doing, and this is what I dedicated my life to. I don't do it to retire early or make big money, I do it because I couldn't do anything else.

But there are more similarities than differences.

After "The Millionaire Fastlane" DeMarco confirms himself as one of our favorite authors when it comes to entrepreneurship and, in many ways, also closest to TPM.
For example, we both call out the manipulations and conflicts of interests, and we both tend to be quite opinionated and direct.

So we can highly recommend "Unscripted".

Exec Summary

1. Both men and women gain in cooperating for win-win, and there is much scope for cooperation and many overlapping, common interests. However:
2. There is also scope for defection and conflict because men and women maximize their reproductive strategies in different and non-always mutually satisfactory ways
3. Conflict is costly, so you can gain by minimizing it, by protecting yourself against win-lose and defections, and by increasing the scope for cooperation

4. Much of sexual conflict can be predicted and understood through evolutionary psychology, which provides the deepest and best overview to understand intersexual dynamics

FULL SUMMARY

About The Author:
David Buss is an evolutionary psychologist, researcher, and professor at the University of Texas. He is one of the most prominent voices in evolutionary psychology and has written several wonderful and seminal books, including "The Evolution of Desire", and the current textbook of evolutionary psychology, "Evolutionary Psychology (edition VI)".

David Buss himself replied to TPM's tweet to recommend this book (and quick spoiler: it was a top recommendation):

> Buss: (replying to our Tweet) For those interested <— Keeps it impersonal to avoid a direct reply to our criticism. A bit of a power move, but his new book is fantastic

Sexual Conflict Is About Individuals, Not Groups

Buss says that it's NOT about "men" or "women" as groups.

Instead, sexual conflict is about individual men and individual women interfering with each other.

My Note: I disagree because many similarly-behaving individuals are akin to a concerted group-level effort
Albeit I have the utmost respect for David Buss as one -if not the– most prominent voice and researcher of evolutionary psychology and intersexual dynamics alike, I disagree here. Buss is right in the sense that most men and women act selfishly based on what's good for them -albeit MANY exceptions apply even there, just see feminism and the red pill who seek to defend and advance male and female causes-.
However, even while it is mostly about individuals pursuing individluaistc goals, the higher-level dynamics and the EFFECTS of many same-sex individuals behaving similarly is similar to a concerted group-level effort.

Also read this post that Buss quoted in the above tweet:

- The "patriarchy" is real (in part)

Red Pill Authors & Feminists Bloggers Are Both Misleading

Says Buss about the feminist side of the coin:

> Popular explanations blame patriarchy, masculine hegemony, and toxic masculinity. Men, some scholars argue, maintain a vise grip on power and resources, put up glass-ceiling barriers, and exclude women from the old-boys' club.

And about the "male feminists" (citing Ging's, 2017):

> Manosphere bloggers, on the other hand, blame women who seek sex with "alpha chads" (high-status males) and exploit lower-status men who are "betas" for their investment

Buss says that they're both partially right, but also both lacking:

> There is some truth to each of these contrasting accounts, but also ways in which they lack explanatory depth. Masculinity does indeed have toxic elements. It is no secret that men have a virtual monopoly on sexual harassment, sexual assault, and crass sexual objectification of women. Patriarchal institutions such as laws that give husbands control over their spouses' sexuality, for example, are still on the books in some countries and have lingering pernicious effects in others.
> On the other hand, it is also true that women, as many in the manosphere claim, tend to be attracted to men who have power, status, influence, and resources.
> Some women spurn or ignore men lacking high-status attributes; some men feel invisible when it comes to women. Missing from these manosphere accounts, however, is that women's mate preferences are enormously complex and include qualities such as honesty, intelligence, dependability, moral character, sense of humor, and many more.

Part of what the manosphere misses, says Buss, is that female desire and attraction are very complex, and include qualities such as honesty, intelligence, dependability, moral character, sense of humor, and many more.
And both manosphere and feminists miss -and in my personal opinion, feminists far more-, are the underlying causes that, Buss implies, are rooted in evolutionary psychology.

Note: We wholeheartedly agree here, and this is the same that TPM has been saying for a while.

Why Sexual Conflict If Men & Women Need Each Other?

Buss asks this fundamental question early on:

Why sexual conflict even exists?

Wouldn't be simpler for the species, and for men and women alike, if conflict didn't exist at all?
Buss says that cooperation is indeed crucial:

> Men and women need each other. Cooperation is a cardinal feature of successful reproduction. We fall in love, mutually choose each other, consent to sex, and sometimes commit to a lover over the long run. If we produce children, each partner has an equal evolutionary stake in their welfare. Given the inherent adaptive benefits of cooperation, sexual conflict becomes a mystery that requires explanation

In Brief, the reason why conflict exists is because while men and women have plenty of similar goals, objectives, and interests, men and women also differ.
They differ in how they can maximize their reproductive strategies and, thus, their self-interest diverge.
And, as we say on TPM, conflicting interests are fertile ground for cheating, manipulation, and coercion.

Or, to put it with Buss' precise and more erudite words:

> Wherever there exist consistently discrepant sexual optima, sexual conflict adaptations will evolve in each sex to influence or manipulate the other to be closer to its own optimum.

It's a bit like having two hands on the steering wheel, both hands wanting to move forward, but each hand having a different ideal destination.

David Buss provides examples of the diverging interests for the "time to sex".
While many women (on average) want to delay sex, men want to have sex as early as possible.

Sexual Conflict Is Costly

As we often repeat on TPM:

Conflict is costly.
It benefits neither opponent to do battle, says Buss (albeit that's not necessarily and always true, since the winner can gain).

Conflict is costlier if you lose, of course.
However, from a larger point of view, it would be a mistake to think of the costs as only the imminent loss.
There are also the costs of prevention, the time and effort that went into prevention and attack/defense, the risks of losing, the risks of a stalemate or only a minor victory and, of course, the opportunity costs -ie.: the potentially more rewarding use you could have done with that time and effort-.

Finally, since effective aggressive strategies tend to evolve effective defensive strategies in an endless arms' race cycle, oftentimes there is no clear victory from conflict.

In short, says Buss, "there is no adaptive value of sexual conflict per se", and that "many conflicts and their outcomes are purely maladaptive byproducts for both sexes".
Buss says both men and women would gain if they could agree on a common middle ground that albeit may not be optimal for either of them, is good enough for both, and saves plenty of time, resources, and risks.

My Note: There's Already An Agreed Middle Ground For Cooperation
Buss focuses on conflict here.
However, it seems to me he may not highlight enough that there is already for many men and women an "happy middle ground"
That's what relationships are.
Relationships, voconflictws, faithfulness, mutual support… These are already agreements for cooperation.

Cultural Conflict

Conflict extends to learned behavior as well.

Buss includes more than you'd normally expect in "culture", including:

- Knowledge of how to take best pictures for dating profiles
- Deception in online dating
- Detection of deception
- Rape drugs

Some of these "cultural inventions" can entirely outmaneuver or undermine traditionally evolved adaptations.

My Note: was culture in the sense of public opinion missing?
It seems to me that much of the culture conflict is also fought at the level of public opinion, which in turns influences who people tend to side with, as well as the laws that get drafted, supported,d passed, and upheld.

Dark Triad Men More Likely to Inflict Costs (& Women to Manipulate)

Sexual conflict theory is not enough without looking individual's differing personalities.

And albeit some scholars maintain that "all men are potential sexual predators", Buss says that is not the case (I agree it's not "all", but depending on how you defined "predator", it'd be different if one said "majority" or "many").

And, in any case, it's proven that some men are more likely to inflict costs and turn abusive.
Says Buss:

> Research has hit upon an important discovery: serial harassers score high on the Dark Triad of personality traits—narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy.

When it comes to mate guarding, dark triad men are also more likely to manipulate, abuse, and inflict costs:

> Men high in Dark Triad traits are more likely to engage in high-level vigilance, snooping through their partner's mail and tracking their movements.
> They intentionally evoke jealousy in their partner by talking with other women, flirting with other women, and even going out on dates with other women.
> Despite their own flirtatious behavior, high-scoring Dark Triad men come down hard on their partner for flirting—yelling at her, threatening never to talk to her again, and even hitting her. They use emotional manipulation, such as pretending to be angry and making their partner feel guilty when she innocently interacts with other men. High-scoring Dark Triad men are also more likely to glare at other men who are talking to their mate and threaten them with physical violence.

Dark triad women are also more exploitative

And that is true for both genders.
Albeit there are more men scoring high in psychopathy, men and women are far closer when it comes to narcissism and Machiavellianism.

Women scoring high in Dark Triad traits are more likely to:

- Mate poach (and more likely to be successful at it)
- Lure men away from existing relationships for sexual encounter
- See and consider sex as a tool, including:
  - Sleep around to get ahead or acquire resources
  - Fake orgasm to keep resources flowing
  - "Spirit of conquest", as for some male players
- Lie and communicate a lower sexual partners count

Women who pursue a short-term dating strategy are more deceptive

Researchers gave a group of women an incentive to "win over" and be liked.

Then, they recorded 60 heterosexual women, and measured each woman for her short-term or long-term dating strategy, personality traits of openness to experience and extraversion, and rated their physical attractiveness.

Women who pursue a short-term mating strategy appeared to intentionally signal sexual exploitability.
Physically attractive women and those scoring high in openness to experience were especially good at signaling exploitability cues.
The authors concluded that women's cue displays reveal an active signaling strategy of mate attraction, especially strongly for women dispositionally inclined to pursue short-term mating.

Such as: as much as men evolved mechanisms to spot and potentially target exploitable women, women learned to send false signals of exploitability to arouse, excite, and potentially lead on and manipulate men.

In the arms' race there is no victim or victimized, each gender can be either of them.

Some women are attracted to exploitative men

Men high in Dark Triad traits are unusually attractive to (some) women (Louis Carter et al., 2014).

Buss says there are good reasons why dark triad men are more attractive, including:

1. Socially charming. They are smooth operators who talk a good game. It's an elixir, especially for women accustomed to shy, awkward guys who lack the boldness to approach them.
2. Self-confidence and status. key qualities that women desire in potential mates. They seek positions of leadership and social prominence
3. Dress well and stylishly, another status cue
4. Smooth and coordinated body language: Their posture is relaxed and composed. They do not fidget nervously. They make good eye contact (note: the resource for this entry was dubious, see the "cons")
5. High-power: more generally, they convey high sexual market value. They don't seem desperate. They don't trip over themselves trying to be too nice, qualities that can signal low status, passivity, and submissiveness ("beta men"). They act as if they're fascinating and deserve to be at the center of the action. They attract women's gazes and boldly take social risks, commanding the group's attention—a key status indicator.

However, this attraction often comes at a cost.

Desirability Differences Create Conflict

There are two ways desirability create potential for conflict:

1. Misperception issue: misperception of one's own desirability and bitterness over rejection: A man who is a 6 but thinks he's an 8 may get irritated when rejected by women who are legitimate 8. Men are more likely to fall for the over-estimation bias
2. Threshold issue: men desire more women than women desire men, leaving many men "dry": men view many women as "above threshold" in attractiveness, but women tend to prefer men in the top 20% (giving women the upper hand in the sexual marketplace and leaving many men with sexual desires they can not consummate)

As also shown in our popular infographic in the female hypergamy article:

> Stop Whining About Hypergamy (& Do This Instead)

Short-Terms VS Long-Term Conflict

There's an added twist to the above two that creates further scope for conflict.

Men are willing to lower their standards and "date down" for casual sexual encounters -say, a male 8 is willing to sleep with a female 6-.
But since both men and women seek to secure long-term partners at the top of their own value (Bruch and Newman, 2018), that female 6 who sleeps with a male 8 might mistake his interest for short-term sex into the chance -or even her desirability- for a long-term relationship.

In an enlightening real-life example, Buss says:

> One colleague captured the conflict that can ensue by expressing frustration after several years of unhappy dating: "Why am I being pestered by guys I don't care about, but the men I'm genuinely attracted to seem to show little interest in me?" I told her that she is an 8 chasing after 10s but being pursued by 6s. It dawned on her that pursuing men just outside of her mate-value range was the source of her misery.

Buss says that it took such an intelligent woman so long to realize because she was being led on by higher-value mates.

Sexual Over-Perception and Under-Perception

Among the biases that lead to potential conflicts:

- Men underestimate how annoying unwanted sexual advances are to women > men dramatically underestimate how upsetting unwanted sexual advances, such as leering and touching, are to women. At the same time, women overestimate how upset men would be if they were sexually harassed by women. Both genders err in sexual mind reading, but in opposite directions.

- Men overestimate how attracted women are to them

While a few men are accurate in their assessment, many are not.
Narcissistic men who prefer short-term mating are particularly prone to think they're more attractive to women than they actually are.

Attractive women, who in actuality are far more likely to reject many men, are even more likely to elicit male over-perception of interest.

On the other hand, women underestimate how sexually interested men are in them.

Affairs (As Source of Conflict)

Men have affairs because of direct genetic benefits.

But it wasn't sure what women would gain from affairs.
The "good gene hypothesis" and the "dual mating strategy" is a popular explanation for women's affairs.
In brief, that would mean that women seek good gene from high-value mates, and then seek support and resources from less valuable men who were naive, willing, or ignorant enough to provide for straying women and/or children who weren't theirs.
In the manosphere, this is referred to as "alpha fucks, beta bucks", also read here:

> The Science of "Alpha Fucks Beta Bucks" (Facts VS Myths)

However, Buss isn't convinced about the "good gene hypothesis".
And he says instead that the "made switching hypothesis" provides more explanatory power for women infidelity.

Buss lists as evidence that women as compared to men are:

- Far more likely to suffer from marital dissatisfaction, while men who initiate affairs are not necessarily more likely (Glass, 1985)
- Far more likely to fall in love and become involved with their affair partner
- More likely to cite "emotional involvement" as the reason of the affair
- Seek more contact with other partners when they're ovulating
- More interested in men who'd make for better partners, not just sexual flings
- Looking for friends with the same quality they'd want in a long-term mate
- Grow dissatisfied in the relationship when there are many available higher-value mates

Buss says that the evidence points to far different reasons for infidelity for men and women.
It's sexual variety for men, and mate switching for women.

The mate switching hypothesis

The mate switching hypothesis says that:

Women have affairs to extricate themselves from a poor mateship and trade up to a better partner.

Women become more exacting during ovulation, when they're also most attractive, which might suggest women evolved adaptation to monitor their own mate value, and adjust accordingly.
And indeed, women are most likely to escape mate-guarding attempts during ovulation, an effect most pronounced in women partnered with a low-value mate (albeit Buss says that the "scanning" stays on even in happy relationships).

There are three elements to assess a potential mate worth switching to:

1. Interest: does the potential mate show attention, attraction, and desire? Do these indicators signal long-term interest or a fleeting sexual desire? Most women will not leave their regular partner for a passing fancy, although some see it as an important signal that something is seriously wrong in their regular relationship
2. Mate value: only large increments in value over the value of the current partner are likely to be worth the costs of breaking up
3. Eligibility: is the alternative free of commitments such as an existing spouse or dependent children?

And how do women actually proceed with the "switching"?
With 3 strategies:

1. Cultivating backup mates
2. Implementing affairs
3. Enacting a breakup

Relationship Conflicts

To increase the odds of reducing relationship conflict evolutionary psychology predicts these can help:

1. Monogamy long-term committed mating with zero chance of infidelity, because straying creates strategic interference the evolutionary interests of men and women start to diverge
2. Long-term commitment, zero chance of abandonment or breakup, as any possibility of leaving the relationship decreases the alignment of interests since reproductively relevant resources get taken away and diverted to other adaptive problems or to reproductive rivals.
3. Mutually produced offspring. Children are vehicles carrying the valuable genetic cargo of both parents into the next generation
4. No stepchildren, which can create conflicting interests, and what is in the best evolutionary interests of one parent departs from that of the other
5. Full and dedicated attention to the current partner only, as continued contact with an ex can create resentment and jealousy, plus the fear of siphoning off time, energy, financial resources, and sometimes sexual resources. Even social networks can create issues, says Buss, with needy friends who bleed off time and emotional energy or hopeful backups who still carry a torch
6. Timely and concurrent death: as re-mating opens the door to diverting acquired and inherited resources toward the dead mate's reproductive competitors.

Resource Infidelity & Financial Conflict

Some sources of financial conflict include:

- Men may want to spend to enhance status (cars, expensive watches, etc.) One study found men who pursue a short-term strategy are more inclined to spend on luxury cars
- Women may want to spend to enhance their beauty (creams, breast augmentation, etc.)
- Both may want to keep some resources for themselves
- Both may want to hide some resources in case of breakup

Every comprehensive study reveals that financial conflicts in couples are prominent, and that people do hide assets from their spouses.
For example:

> One survey of a thousand individuals in New York City revealed that 40 percent of married women and 37 percent of married men had a secret bank account.12 A Harris survey found somewhat lower numbers, but > nonetheless 31 percent admitted lying to their spouse about some aspect of finances—58 percent of those who did hid cash, 30 percent hid a bill, 15 percent hid a bank account, 11 percent lied about earnings, and another 11 percent lied about debt.13 Another study found that 80 percent of respondents admitted to hiding money from their spouse.14 Regardless of the exact numbers, which vary from study to study, sample to sample, and method to method, financial infidelity is clearly not uncommon.

Dark Triad spend more on appearances

One study found out:

> Dark Triad traits were not correlated with unadorned attractiveness, meaning that those who score high on narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy are not intrinsically more attractive than those who score low on those factors. High-scoring Dark Triad individuals, however, are rated as significantly more attractive in the adorned condition; that is, they use more makeup, more expensive clothing, and more bling to elevate their attractiveness.

Double Standards As Conflict Sources

When we think of double standards we usually think of women being penalized.

That's the "feminist framing", and in truth, double standards know no gender, and probably the most pervasive ones are "self-serving double standards".
For example, 41% of the men in existing relationships said that oral contact with someone else's genitals count as sex, but 65% of them said that it would count as sex if their partner did it. Similar result for women, with about 36% indicating that their oral contact with someone else would count as sex, but 62% saying that it would count as sex if their partner did it.

Mate Value Discrepancies

Differences in desirability can create issues and conflicts in a relationship.

The more desirable partner may want to leave, or at least be more open to new options. And the lower value one has a bigger incentive to mate guard and limit the partner's freedom.

But also caring and investing are affected by (perceived) mate value discrepancies.
How much we care about our partner VS how much we care about ourselves is called "welfare trade-off ratios (WTRs)" in the literature.
And since caring and investing are not fixed, there is evidence that people evolved adaptation to recalibrate WTRs, which include intentionally evoking jealousy (women more likely to use jealousy believe their partner are less invested in them than they are in), forgiveness to move forward together, and anger to proceed the forgiveness (recalibration theory of anger), which includes yelling and denying sex.

That anger creates a conflict, but it can be helpful to improve or even save the relationship.
Says David Buss:

> It sends a signal that her boyfriend's WTR with respect to her is too low. Her anger signals that his WTR toward her fails to meet her expectations. He does not value her as much as she believes she is worth.
> If the boyfriend wants to retain the mateship, he will increase his WTR, curtail psychologically intimate interactions with other women, and channel his emotional energies toward her.

The underlying logic is that WTR are interdependent, and if you value me, I will value you. And if you cherish me, your value to me is higher (and I will give back with more cherishing of my own, leading to win-win).

Mate Guarding

“Vigilance” may be considered the pre-amble to mate gua5rding, and both genders are equally like to be vigilant.

There are important differences though in the actions men and women take, as well as the type of men and women who are more likely to mate guard.

Male Mate Guarding

Men more likely to mate guard are:

- Lower value than her, since they believe they “got lucky” and they won’t be able to replace her
- Incapable of bestowing benefits, either because they lack resources, or are unable to give, add value, or pull her up (albeit some men who inflict costs even if they have the resources)
- Men who find their partner highly attractive: they also gave their attractive wives more gifts and jewelry, enhanced their own physical appearance, and acted possessive through verbal signals (ie.: introduce his partner to everyone as “my wife” and drape his arm around her when other men are around)
- Men with young partners
- When he sees his wife as more attractive than she views him

Personality traits also matter.
As we’ve seen, dark triad men are more vigilant, manipulative, aggressive, and threatening (generally more likely to inflict costs).

Generally speaking, if she’s not interested in extra-pair sex or has no desire to leave the relationship, the man can relax his mate-retention efforts.

Female Mate Guarding

In contrast, his physical attractiveness, age, or attractiveness discrepancy does not increase women’s mate-guarding attempts.
Instead, women mate guard when:

- He’s higher income, and they spend more on physical appearances, and they act more submissive as a mate retention tactic

Female Resistance to Mate Guarding

Mate guarding limits female choice and ability to observe the market for mate assessment and possible mate switching.

So we’d expect women to have evolved strategies to evade mate guarding
Evolutionary psychologist Alita Cousin found 6 of them:

1. Covert tactics / lying / hiding, for example, to have other men call when the partner is not around, flirting with other men when the official partner is not around, or lying about going out with friends when she was actually going out with male friends or potential partners”
2. Covert high technology strategies, that includes passwords, erasing texts, and I will add, blocking the phone signal to avoid tracking (note: a girl I was sleeping with did that to avoid her partner’s tracking)
3. Avoiding public displays of affection (PDAs) with official partner, refusing to hold hands with the partner in public, not allowing him to kiss her in public, or not allowing him to put his arm around her in public. A woman who successfully eludes an overly possessive man prevents him from sending signals to others that his partner is already in a committed mateship. It also allows her freedom to beckon other men with a friendly smile or eye contact that lingers a split second longer

4. Suppress the man's aggression toward rival men, which can invite more suitors by lowering the perceived risks. Suppressing her partner's overly zealous mate guarding signals to others that she is not partnered with an insecure man low in mate value, which would in turn reflect on her own perceived mate value. Tamping down a man's belligerence toward other men has the added benefit of avoiding the public embarrassment a woman might experience as a result of his overly intense mate guarding.
5. Avoiding partner's contact to avoid snooping and checking up on them. For example, not picking up, replying late, or switching the phone off
6. Resisting control, involves expressing anger at the partner for being too controlling, fighting with to preserve independence and freedom of socializing, and threatening to break up with a partner who is too smothering

And the women more likely to evade his mate guarding attempts are women who:

- Perceive themselves as more attractive than their partners
- Are high in socio-sexual orientation (ie.: interested in casual sex)
- Invest little in their partner
- Have an avoidant attachment style

Intimate Partner Violence (IPV)

There are three general high-level theories to explain IPV:

- Pathology, including insecure attachment style, BPD
- Social learning: they learned it from fathers or friends
- Patriarchy: the most common at the time of writing, it states that IP is the consequence of gender inequality within patriarchal societies, with men internalizing that they should hold all the power, and men should submit to them. Solving IPVs then means addressing the abusive patriarchal beliefs in the short-run, and subverting the patriarchy in the long run

Buss says all of these theories have an element of truth, but they also all fall short, and don't do go deep enough to explain the common root causes.
IPV instead, says Buss, serves a function that sexual conflict explains more comprehensively than any other approach.

The sexual conflict approach starts by recognizing that both men and women are extraordinarily valuable reproductive resources to each other.
That means that both sexes devote tremendous effort to keeping -or controlling- their mates. And to influence our partner's "underlying psychological machinery", to use Buss' own terminology, there are only two high-level strategies: bestowing benefits, or inflicting costs.
We also call those two high-level strategies here as "adding value", or "pulling up" and "taking value" or "pushing down".

In an ideal world, everyone would (focus on) bestowing benefits. But not everyone can bestow benefits -or even trust themselves to be able to-.

P.S.: we only partially agree with the focus on male IPV, not women
Buss makes it clear that women can abuse and batter as well and that some cases are bidirectional.
And he acknowledges that culture and institutions in many countries are unfairly penalizing men when it comes to reporting female episodes of abuse.
However, he says that the disparity in severity of damage still sees women paying the higher costs. We mostly agree up until here, but strongly disagree when Buss includes "manipulation" in IPV since I don't believe that women manipulate any less than men.

Also see this website's popular article "how women manipulate men":

> Female Domestication: How Women Control Men & Relationships

Why (Some Types Of) Men Engage In Intimate Partner Violence

Men engage in controlling behavior and violence to, in Buss terminology, "solve certain evolutionary problems".

These are:

- Mate poachers: even when the violence is solely directed at a partner, it can send a signal indirectly to the mate poachers—"I'm the type of guy who resorts to violence—don't fuck with me or get anywhere near my woman."
- Infidelity: the detection or suspicion of infidelity is one of the key predictors of intimate partner violence. Female sexual infidelity dramatically increases the risks of battering
  - Protecting against investment in other men's children (fetus-murder hypothesis): some men get violent when their partners are pregnant and they suspect the child is not theirs. Several studies corroborate the "fetus-murder hypothesis", albeit they're still provisional, says Buss
- Risks connected to being lower value: men who are lower value than her are more likely to resort to abuse with the goal of lowering her self-esteem and scare into staying to avoid worse.
  This makes logical sense because:
  - Higher value women are more likely to be sexually unfaithful
  - Higher value women are more likely to trade up and leave him
  - Lower value men are less likely to have enough resources to pull a higher-value woman up, so he has to "push her down"

Finally, as we already mentioned before, dark triad men, and especially psychopaths, are far more likely to turn abusive.
Also read more on the types and psychology of abusive men:

> 7 Types of Abusive Men: a Psychological Analysis

Abuse works by hijacking a woman's psychology in several ways:

How Inflicting Costs (Or Abuse) Works to Keep A Mate

- Lowers her self-esteem: Abuse can change her perception of how she might fare on the mating market, feeling so wretched about herself that she views herself as unworthy of any other man. Sometimes a woman comes to believe that she is lucky to have her mate, even if he's abusive
- Lower mating value: a woman with low self-esteem and physical marks from physical abuse is generally lower sexual market value, making her concretely less appealing to other men, besides making her feel like she wouldn't be able -or deserving- of anyone else
- Shame: bruises, scars and an abusive husband makes many women feel ashamed, which can lead to self-isolation and further emotional costs
- Lower trust in her own judgment (gaslighting): victims start to distrust their own perceptions and judgments, increasingly relinquishing control over their perception of reality to the gaslighting perpetrator. If "successful", she must rely on her perpetrator for perceptions of reality
- Prioritizing the abuser well being (Altering her welfare trade-off ratio): afraid of triggering more episodes of violence and abuse, she may well prioritize his well-being and devote most of her time to him, at the detriment of herself

- Financial dependence: with financial abuse, the abuse can make her dependent on him to eat and have a roof over her head
- Fear, with threats of future harm (physical, financial, children, property, family, even pets, etc.)

Women's Defense Against Abuse

Tools of female defense include:

- Kinship, albeit that can go both ways because if he has more or more powerful kins nearby, then he may feel emboldened to resort to IPV.
  Figueredo argues that the balance of power between the two kin groups predicts whether IPV is or is not used to control women. Changing the balance of power is the key motive behind men's efforts to isolate their partner and women's efforts to stay connected with their family and friends
- Female friends and social ties, both in physical, emotional, and social terms, including to tarnish his reputation
- Male friends (bodyguard hypothesis)
- Physical aggression/defense

Stalking and Revenge

Stalking is 80/20.

Women are far more likely to be victims of stalking, and men are more likely to engage in stalking, as well as in more overt and aggressive forms of stalking.

The 2 strongest predictors of stalking turning violent are:

1. Threats of violence
2. High jealousy during the relationships
3. Alcohol and drug consumption

The men more likely to stalk are:

- Insecure attachment styles
- Lower value men, who feel that they cannot find an equally valuable partner
- Slightly higher incidence of psychological disorders
- Slightly more likely to be on the autistic scale (some stalkers show typical failures to read social dynamics, including not viewing themselves as stalkers, but as expressing genuine interest and the victims either being interested, or "testing them")

How Stalking Works

- Taking up the victim's time: consuming substantial portions of their victims' time – time that could be devoted to solving other problems
- Psychological cost, taking up resources that cannot be devoted to addressing other life problems, including potentially finding and meeting another partner
- Social isolation, with women particularly vulnerable to isolation
  - Driving away other romantic alternatives
- Fear, through threats, threated of revenge porn

Can Stalking Be Effective?

Buss acknowledges that it may sound hard to believe that stalking may be effective and, after all, it often fails to reach its goal.

However, he says that it may have still made sense even if it worked only a tiny amount of times:

> But if it sometimes succeeds, or more accurately if it has sometimes succeeded over the millions of instances in which it was attempted across evolutionary time, then selection could favor an adaptation to stalk former mates because it resulted in an on-average reproductive gain compared to other courses of action.

My Note: doesn't add up to me.
However, "only a tiny amount of time" doesn't seem to make evolutionary sense to me.
A tiny amount of times doesn't seem likely to me to leave a genetic mark.

However, Buss then adds some data:

> Our study of 2,431 stalking victims found that stalking does sometimes succeed, even if the victory is a temporary one. A full 30 percent of women victims agree to meet with their stalkers at their request; 13 percent agree to date them; and 6 percent agree to have sex with them. These numbers are quite conservative in that our study was biased toward including victims of unsuccessful stalkers, so the actual success rates are likely to be higher.

Buss says it can also be effective in mate-guarding partners:

> Stalking behaviors, in principle, can be effective mate-guarding tactics because they monopolize the time of a partner

And also that it can be effective in reuniting with a former partner:

> Rejected stalkers experience two key emotions—intense rage and a profound sense of humiliation. Rage, as we saw in previous chapters, often has the goal of recalibrating the target's welfare trade-off ratio, and sometimes it works. Victims of enraged stalkers, fearful of violence, accord them with power and sometimes accede to their wishes.

My Note: still partially disagree on effectiveness
The fact that something works "some of the times" doesn't mean it's effective because one should compare it to other alternatives.
And in the modern world of endless opportunities to meet potential mates, most stalkers may be better off meeting and approaching new women.
A tiny amount of times doesn't seem likely to me to leave a genetic mark to make sense from an evolutionary point of view.
Finally, it seems too deterministic to "find an explanation" for everything. Stalking may simply be the by-product of other mental processes, and/or simply maladaptive.

Sexual Coercion

Buss says that there is no compelling evidence that men have adapted specialized rape adaptations.

Instead, rape is a byproduct of other male adaptations, including desire for sexual variety, desire for low-investment consensual sex, sensitivity to sexual opportunities, and the general capacity of men to use physical aggression to achieve a wide variety of goals.

Buss also reviews and weighs against the “mate deprivation hypothesis” suggesting that men who turn rapist do so because of a lack of options.
Instead, he says, it’s more likely that it’s popular high-status macho men as well as men successful in dating who are most likely to rape -and not mate-deprived low-status men-.
Overall, he made a compelling case. So while previously I fully believed the mate deprivation hypothesis, I now embrace Buss’ take that it’s higher power and higher status men who are more likely to sexually coerce.
However, the “mate deprivation hypothesis” is not to be thrown out. As Buss himself says, rapes go up when there is fewer women than men, which suggests that deprivation is an element that does influences rape.

Mest more likely to rape

Albeit some have theorized that “all men can be rapists”, Buss reviews several studies to conclude that “most men are not potential rapists”.

However, a subset of men, are.
These men are:

- Hostile toward women: they feel wronged by women and that women cannot be trusted (see the red pill)
- Endorse the myth that women secretly want to be raped
- Impulsive
- Aggressive
- Low empathy
- Hypermasculine, including:
  - “hostile masculinity”, endorsing statements such as “a lot of women enjoy putting men down” and “in a dating relationship a woman is largely out to take advantage of men”, and generally see dating as a hostile endevor and a zero sum game
- Narcissistic

And this constellation is particularly dangerous when combined with:

- High sexual promiscuity
- Short-term mating strategy, which generally means a higher sex drive, and if combined with dark triad traits, it means that they will seek sex without consideration for the victims

In general, rapists have a high level of Dark Triad traits and tend to pursue a strategy of casual rather than committed mating.
Also contributing to rape are:

- A skewed gender ratio of more men than women
- Patriarchal culture and ideologies
- Lax laws
- Cultural insensitivity towards rape or women’s rights

On the other hand, men who score high in light triad traits such as empathy, honesty and humility, are least likely to be sexually coercive.

Women’s Defense

A first line of defense centers around the ability to spot and recognize which are most likely to be sexual predators.

At first, it may seem that women’s inborn psychology, mostly afraid of strangers, is not in line with the reality of rape statics, which are committed mostly by men they know -often even family members-.

Buss suggests that either it was different during our evolutionary past, and/or that women's fear are not miscalibrated but are effectively preventing many rapes from strangers.

Buss also says in another section that women tend to be wary of men who frequently, openly, and directly talk about sex, and that seems to be a good rule of thumb to avoid poor partners.

Other defenses against sexual coercion and rape include:

- Fear: womens' fear of rape often accurately track the risks of rape
- Male friends and "bodyguards"
- During an attack also:
  - Forceful resistance: effective if it's "all out", 55% of women who fought back escaped compared to 6.5% who did not resist at all
  - Running away / escaping: the second most effective
  - Alarm calling / screaming: effective, can be used in combination with either fighting back or running away
  - Appeasament / pleading / acquiescence: rarely useful
  - Tonic immobility to minimize harm during the act, if all else fails

Sexual Harassment

Researchers and legal scholars identify at least two partially distinct forms of sexual harassment:

1. Quid pro quo, the offer of benefits in exchange for sexual favors (note: personally, I don't see how this classifies as harassment, especially not when welcome)
2. Unwanted sexual attention, including lewd remarks, unwanted passes or seductive behavior, unwanted touching, and unwanted staring, leering, or ogling

The men who harass the most are:

- Inclination towards short-term mating, and remember that these men are more likely to over-invest women's sexual interest
- Dark triad men, albeit Buss defines it as "low on honesty-humility", and then basically goes on to describe dark triad traits

Why Is It Men Who Harass The Most?

There are several reasons, all of which follow from evolutionary psychology logic, including:

- Some men seek power to date better, and when they have power, they go for it more often

Says Buss:

> Men strive for status and power, in part, in order to get sex (Studd and Gattiker, 1991).
> As the wealthy Greek tycoon Aristotle Onassis observed, "If women didn't exist, all the money in the world would have no meaning

Buss adds no more, but it seems to imply that since men seek power to get women, then it's "expected" that once they get power, they will seek out women more often and, sometimes, that can end up as harassment when the woman doesn't return the interest.

- Link between power and sex

Buss says that male power and patriarchy and power are part of the explanation albeit, as usual, there is more.

John Bargh and colleagues found that some men experienced an unconscious association between the concepts of power and sex.
But this occurred only for men who scored high on a “likelihood to sexually harass” scale. These men linked concepts like “authority” and “boss” to concepts like “foreplay,” “bed,” and “date.”
That means that power and sex are linked, but not in all men, just in a subset of men who were already likely to harass in the first place, and not just when in a position of power.

- Overperception bias & confusing deferential attitude for sexual submissiveness

Some harassers sometimes misread women’s friendly and deferential attitude as interest.

- Men underestimate how annoying unwanted attention and harassment can be

In several studies, men perceived all of these workplace sexual advances as less disturbing than women did.

PRACTICAL APPLICATIONS

Choose a giving partner, avoid selfish ones

As Buss shows:

There’s lots of room for win-win and cooperation in dating and relationships, but also more than enough room for conflict.

What does it mean to you?
It means’ that TPM’s general approach to increase the scope for ooperation adn decrease the aone for conflict is going be crucial for good relationships.

To start with, a cooperative and giving partner will make everything easier.
Or, at least, pick a matcher who gives back and who can play win-win for a long-term.

How much they care about you VS them is defined as “welfare trade-off ratio” in the literature (WTF).

Says Buss:

> When making decisions that affect both individuals, WTR is a key determinant.
> It influences decisions small and large. Doing the dirty dishes versus leaving them for one's partner may be small in the grand scheme of things. Diverting financial resources to an affair partner rather than to one's primary partner is more consequential.
> Even small daily decisions, however, can accumulate over time to large effect.
> (Hence…)
> It is greatly beneficial to have a partner who does not have a selfishly skewed WTR. Selfishness is one of the hallmarks of narcissism. The narcissist's desires will always come first, a partner's a distant second.

MORE WISDOM

Some more gold that may not directly related to sexual conflict, but it's important to know:

A partner's mate value is also a function of how much they value you

> A partner's mate value is critically also a function of how much they value you. The technical term is welfare trade-off ratio (WTR), the ratio of how much value they place on your welfare relative to their own welfare.

This is why, BTW, courtship and investment can work as a male courtship method.
However, there is also room for manipulation and deception. Says Buss:

> Some mate selectors suffer a rude shock when an altruistic WTR during the courtship phase turns into a selfishly skewed WTR after the wedding vows. This might be one reason why divorce is most common in the first few years of marriage and then tapers off over time. A partner who initially shows high investment might curtail that investment after months or years

Friends make for dangerous mate poachers

Men better watch for her friends.

Buss says that research has shown that friends sometimes turn into mate poachers.
Friends are in close proximity, share similar interests, know of any possible couple conflicts -and may even actively or subtly drive a wedge-, and thus are perfectly positioned to implement a mate-poaching strategy.

P.S.:
You must be a high-value friend to make this work.
Also see: male roles in dating.

> Lover, Provider & Friend: The Truth of Men's Sexual Roles

There exist monogamous men looking for relationships, and "players" seeking novelty

Schmitt found individual and cultural variation.
Monogamously minded men wanted only one partner, both over the next month and over their entire lifetimes.
At the other end, some men desired hundreds of sex partners, with a few reporting a desire for more than a thousand.

As for as cultural and geo-local variations:

> In Middle Eastern countries such as Lebanon and Turkey, men wanted a tad more than 2.5 sex partners over the next month, whereas in Oceanian countries such as Australia and New Zealand, men wanted only 1.77 sex partners over the next month. The corresponding numbers for women were 0.88 and 0.82. The magnitude of the sex differences in desire for sexual variety was huge by social science standards, more than twice the effect size of most psychological phenomena.

Sexual exploiters choose the victims that look the most "exploitable"

> Like muggers, normal college men displayed strong consensus about which women they would choose as potential victims. Nonverbal cues of those they chose included walking slowly and having a short stride length. The women whom men chose for unwanted touching also tended to score high on the personality trait of neuroticism, low on extraversion, and high on shyness. Finally, the researchers found some correspondence between potential targets of sexual advances and the women's self-reported frequency of having been sexually approached in their lives. In other words, women who have suffered from inappropriate touching in their everyday lives seem to emit cues inadvertently that potential sexual harassers can detect.

Female sexual attractiveness and long-term mate attractiveness are very distinct, sometimes even negatively correlated

Painful for intelligent women and successful women:

> For example, if the woman was perceived to be intelligent, she rated high on long-term attractiveness but low on sexual attractiveness. Men found women perceived as cognitively disadvantaged to be easier to seduce, deceive, and pressure into having sex.

David Buss uses Tucker Carlson as an example:

> Tucker: She's so dumb. She's like, she's vulnerable. She's a wounded gazelle, separated from the herd

He then asks if she'd make a good housewife, to which the hosts reply without hesitation "good".

Other cues of "exploitability" include:

- Young age
- Immature
- Emotionally immature
- Drunk / high / intoxicated / sleepy
- Inexperienced (especially in dating)

This is why college freshwomen, says Buss, are far more likely to be victimized than any other college woman.

How to become an irreplaceable mate

1. Maintain your mate value and keep mate value discrepancies to a minimum my note: albeit if the goal is "being irreplaceable" one should pick a lower value mate.
   Also read "how to maintain attraction"
2. Pick a partner who cannot replace you because of a shallow pool of viable alternative mates in the local mating market, The key is not the discrepancy between you and your mate, but the discrepancy between you and alternative partners available to your mate. But it's difficult to do this with online dating, says Buss

3. Fulfill your partner's unique desires Buss lists a few ways to become "unique" to someone, including:
   1. Promote a social reputation that highlights your unique or exceptional attributes
   2. Find unique attributes that others value but aren't getting from others (and develop them)
   3. Cultivate specialized skills that increase irreplaceability
   4. Seek groups that value what you have to offer—groups in which your unique assets will be most appreciated
   5. Avoid groups in which your unique attributes are not valued or in which your attributes are provided by others already present
   6. Drive off rivals who offer benefits that overlap with those you can provide

Younger inexperienced women can fail to correctly assess their mate value

> Young women just entering the mating market sometimes fail to accurately perceive their mating desirability. Consequently, they are more vulnerable to romantic approaches by men of lower mate value—often older men who exploit the youth's inexperience and naïveté. With increased life experience and maturity, young women come to more accurately appraise their desirability on the mating market, motivating them to reject a partner when they perceive they can trade up.

Some men are genetically prone to be swayed by attractive women

Attentional adhesion is the degree to which different visual stimuli capture and maintain focus, and psychologist Jon Maner and colleagues found out that men exposed to the image of the attractive woman had difficulty detaching, their attention adhered to the attractive woman.
However, some men had higher attentional adhesion than others, and these were men with higher interest for casual sex.

Sexual harassment is less likely to be harassment if she's into casual sex, if he's attractive and interested in long-term

Two studies with 1,516 individuals showed that:

> Both men and women high in desire for casual sex viewed the sexual advances as less disturbing.
> And women evaluated sexual advances from a physically attractive man as significantly less disturbing than advances from a physically unattractive man. Workplace sexual advances from men low in desirability, apparently, are more upsetting.

And signals of genuine romantic interest such as compliments on hairstyle or mild flirtation are less disturbing than approaches that signal a quid pro quo or interest in short-term and casual sex (ie.: "sexual bribery, attaching job promotions to sex, and other cues that the person is interested only in casual sex").
Unsurprisingly, women are also far more comfortable with signals of genuine romantic interest as compared to more aggressive forms of advances such as touching or cornering.

High-status men have lower empathy

> Several studies suggest that having higher social status is linked with lower levels of empathy; the wealthy, it turns out, tend to be more indifferent to other people's misery

Short-term mating strategy is generally measured along 3 components:

- Behavior
- Attitudes
- Desires

People with a short-term mating strategy tend to have a high sex drive.
If they are low in dark-triad traits, they can be honest and court women with seduction and charm. If they're high in dark triad traits, they can resort to threats, deception, or force.

More bullet-wisdom

- Sexually aroused men are more likely to exploit:

sexually aroused men reported more willingness to engage in a variety of morally questionable sexual actions, from deception to date rape (albeit that doesn't necessarily mean they would act on their willingness)

- Single men, low-agreeableness men, and men with a preference for short-term sex are more likely to pursue a short-term exploitative mating strategy

More research confirms that the combination of Dark Triad personality traits and short-term mating strategy is hazardous to women because it increases the odds of sexual assault (Lalumiere et al., 2005)

However, note that short-term mating strategy is also correlated to deception for women.

- Many people keep "backup mates"

> When we surveyed roughly three hundred people about how they would feel if their primary backup mate had sex with someone else, on a scale from "happy" (+3) to "upset" (–3), men more than women said that they would be upset, but only by a small margin. But when we asked how upset they would be if their backup fell in love with someone else, women were roughly twice as upset as men, with the average upset being –2.5. Similarly, women were more upset than men—extremely upset—if their backup entered into a long-term relationship with someone else.

Back up mates serve the functions of:

1. Possible replacement mates should something catastrophic happen to a regular mate.
2. Temporary functions, providing psychological support or sexual fulfillment during the transition back into the mating market. Breakups inflict blows to self-esteem; backups can offer a boost.
3. Protection and provisions, shield against the hostile forces of nature. It is for these reasons that the loss of a primary backup is so upsetting. The mating safety net gets yanked out.

Backups make people less vulnerable, and Buss found that people without a backup mate were twice as likely to get depressed, compared with those with a solid backup.

- Distance romance burns brightest

> Lacking exposure to the ups and downs of daily life, they allow people to fill in gaps in knowledge with > positive illusions because people often overidealize a partner in the flush of a new romance. In the absence of direct information, they infer that the partner is honest, agreeable, loyal, and emotionally stable when they do not possess all the information needed for these inferences.

Buss ironizes:

> The lover who burns so brightly in a fancy hotel in a faraway glittering city must surely be the kindest, most intelligent, most thoughtful, most sexually erotic, most fascinating person on earth.

- Key predictors of intentionally evoking jealousy are mate value discrepancy and dark triad traits

When correctly used, jealousy can reduce perceived mate value discrepancies.

QUOTES

> Each of us is descended from innumerable generations of men who lied, cheated, charmed, bullied, or killed their way to sexual intercourse, and from innumerable generations of women who charmed, seduced, lied, or manipulated their way to extracting economic privileges in return for access to their bodies.

On sexual dynamics being at odds with individual psychology and contentment, and almost set-up for frustration:

> I told her that she is an 8 chasing after 10s but being pursued by 6s.

On the anguish of finding out the truth:

> Recognizing that humans have evolved a psychology dedicated to mate switching undoubtedly will be disturbing to many.
> It might be disconcerting to a man to realize that his wife is carrying a mate-insurance policy, harbors sexual fantasies about her co-worker, or has “just a friend” who is more his rival than he realizes.
> It might be depressing to know that you are more replaceable than you knew.
> It could be disturbing when it dawns on you that your partner’s unhappiness might not be transient and instead portends a hidden plan for exiting the relationship.
> But nothing in mating remains static. Evolution did not design humans for a half century of matrimonial bliss. Few of our ancestors lived past the age of forty. Those who stuck it out through thick and thin might win admiration for their loyalty. But modern humans have descended from successful ancestors who carried mate insurance; who devoted energy to scenario building, the cognitive simulations of fantasizing about possible mates and laying plans for exiting; and who acted on those scenarios when the hidden calculus pointed to the benefits of switching mates.

On the coldly calculative, sometimes cruel nature of evolutionary logic:

> Are these acts morally abhorrent? Absolutely. Few things seem more evil than directing abortion-inducing blows to a pregnant woman’s belly. Are such reprehensible deeds functional through an evolutionary lens? Possibly. Evolution by selection operates according to the ruthless currency of relative reproductive success. It is indifferent to the suffering of individuals. It is indifferent to our moral evaluations. Just as evolution has created male lions that kill the baby cubs sired by their rivals in order to bring a new female back into estrus, human males may have evolved a circumstance-contingent psychology that inclines them to brutalize incipient offspring sired by rival men.

On “dick pics” highlighting the different male and female psychology, as well as not working too well:

> Are men aware that women find more things sexually disgusting than they do? Judging from the number of men who send unsolicited pornographic images of their decontextualized genitals to women, the answer is a resounding “no.”

⍰⍰♂ Lucio’s Analysis

In some cases we’re still at hypothesis level, with few studies. Watch out for jumping to conclusions and over-explaining

Buss never said otherwise, but it’s worth reminding.

For example, it was one single study showing that men are more likely to hit women in the belly when they’re pregnant, and when they suspect the child is not his.
And albeit it seems to make sense, we can’t be sure the ultimate goal was the abortion of a rival child.

As far as we know, it may be psychopathic men who simply don’t want children around the house.
Or it may be a spillover of general violent tendencies and wanting to cause as much harm as possible.

Buss is a real scientist, but sometimes it still felt the women’s perspective was over-represented

Starting with the title, “When Men Behave Badly”, Buss takes the women’s point of view.

That might have been a simple rational choice to sell better in the current cultural climate -and indeed the book itself is rather balanced-.
But at times I think that some more space to men as targets of abuse or manipulation might have made “When Men Behave Badly” even more comprehensive.

Even the “solutions” at the end of the book, such as lower income inequality and greater gender equality only address “how to make things better for women”, but those policies have far-reaching consequences and, as most policies, while they improve things for some, they also make things less good for some others -in this case, when women are higher power, low-status men may struggle even more to secure a mate-.
That is not to say that Buss’ solutions are not good, they may be great, and they even make “When Men Behave Badly” more complete and thought-provoking. Yet, they don’t make more complete because it only looks at one side of the coin.

Buss says things are improving. In many ways, yes. But how about a note of the dangers of “going too far”?

The world is changing, and things are improving, suggests Buss at the end of “When Men Behave Badly”:

> The overall cultural trends are clear. Institutions that support male control over female bodies are eroding. The informal social customs that permitted men in positions of power to abuse with impunity are fading. Men who sexually harass women who are subordinate in the work hierarchy are getting fired. Men who rape are increasingly convicted and jailed.
> (…)
> Patriarchy is collapsing—its institutions, its social norms, and the expression of unseemly mating mechanisms that gave rise to male advantage.

Buss is partially right, albeit I wouldn’t take for granted that the trend will necessarily continue in the same direction -trend extrapolation is a human bias-.

What was missing though is that the trend isn't always positive or "fair".
In some instances, that trend has damaged some men.
For example, "When Men Behave Badly" might have been both more complete and more balanced if it had mentioned , say, predatory pregnancies to extort money from wealthy men, skewed divorce law that can engender some men's financial well-being and, in some cases, scant penalties for false rape allegations (keep in mind that Amber Heard could make up rape allegations with zero evidence in what appeared to almost everyone totally fabricated lies, and faced no consequences).

Should we even ask ourselves if women ought to "supersede" their own programming?

Towards the end Buss asks if women can supersede their own preference for wealthy and powerful men to reduce conflict between sexes.

He even says:

> These are open questions, but I know of one woman who consciously changed her mate preferences after suffering from two abusive relationships with high-status men who felt entitled to cheat on her.

I don't think that woman "superseded her programming" or "consciously changed her mate preferences", and more like she "consciously settled".
That might still be a smart choice -I think it may as well be a smart choice for many many women-, but it still is no evidence of "changing mate preferences" as much as it is one of "changing behavior".

Finally, I'm also not a huge fan of that line of questioning.
Things are the way they are, and aren't very likely to change simply because "it might be better IF we changed them" -and I'm pretty confident Buss would agree with that-.

Sometimes a bit too quick to conclude that certain behavior "can be effective"

"Can work" is one thing and "effective" is another.

Shooting in the dark "can work", but it's not effective if you have the option of switching the lights on.

As an example, read my note on stalking and its "effectiveness".
Or, discussing physical abuse, Buss says:

> Unfortunately, violent tactics sometimes work. Some battered women remain in violent relationships. Some return to their abusers even after they have sought help at a shelter. In a study of 100 women at a shelter for battered women, 27 returned to their partner after he promised that he would change and refrain from violence

To begin with, to say it worked, you should compare it with women who left a spouse and were not physically battered.

Second, that 27% returned AFTER he promised to stop, so you can't exactly say that "violence worked" because it's the promise of stopping violence that (probably) made the difference.

Once, an head-scratching resources

When I checked the resource for dark triad men having "smooth and coordinated body language", it was an article on graziadaily called "The scientific reason why we're so attracted to fuckboys".

And written by a journalist that seemed far closer to a pop magazine "opinion piece" type of article, rather than anyone familiar with research or well-sourced writing.

It was, however, a single instance, and I haven't read the article -and it's very possible that Buss had valid reasons to use that article-.

PROS

Listing all the pros would be an overly long endeavor on an already long review.

so, for brevity:

Simply one of the best books to understand intersexual dynamics, and sexual conflict.
And for the record, the only books that can rival it are the other books by David Buss himself.

REVIEW

David Buss is one of this website's favorite authors.

And "When Men Behave Badly" is yet another gem by Buss.

Furthermore, of the hundreds of books we review and summarize here, David Buss is THE most challenging.

Why?

Because they're so good and densely packed with wisdom.
No storytelling, no fluff, little opining, and personal conjectures… Just great science and refined logic.
It's hard to summarize because you can't really take anything out without missing out and without feeling bad -plus, of course, you can't really publish everything without sharing too much of work that is well worth and deserving paying for-.

In short: absolutely recommended.

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Robert Greene is a popular writer of books on power, psychology, life strategies, and power dynamics.
Greene is one of this website's favorite authors and distinguishes himself for the depth of his understanding of human nature -particularly the "darker side"-.
He is also the author of "The 48 Laws of Power", "The Art of Seduction", "Mastery", "The 50th Law of Power", and "The Laws of Human Nature".

All quotes are from Robert Greene, sometimes slightly edited or cut out for brevity, and the boldened parts are mine to emphasize the most crucial passages.

Introduction: First Off, "Get Real"

The introduction might as well be one of my favorite parts of "The Daily Laws".

And it's a stark reminder of the importance of learning power dynamics and strategies:

> Because we have increasingly gained control of our environment and the physical pressures have loosened dramatically, the dangers have become much more subtle—they come in the form of people (not leopards) and their tricky psychology, and the delicate political and social games we have to play.
> And because of these less obvious dangers, our greatest problem is that our minds tend to become less sensitive to the environment; we turn inward, absorbed in our dreams and fantasies. We become naive.
> To add to this dangerous brew, our culture tends to fill our heads with all kinds of false notions, making us believe things about what the world and human nature should be like, rather than what they are actually like.

And when it comes to companies' politics, Greene acutely notices:

We feel that everyone is equal, and that hierarchies are a thing of the past.

> With people, we operate under the belief that most of our friends and colleagues like us and want the best for us.
> We think that those with a pattern of bad behavior can be trusted if they say they've reformed, that people full of conviction and a sense of outrage must be telling the truth, and that those in power, including our bosses, are not insecure.
> We imagine that people who are extremely nice and accommodating are not potentially masking a dark and devious nature, that those who espouse progressive ideas have a corresponding virtuous character, and that people will be grateful for any favors we do for them.
> With ourselves, we think that it's important to be honest and to tell others what's exactly on our minds.

Greene also discloses how and when he first thought -and at the same time pitched- his main commercial success "The 48 Laws of Power":

> Suddenly, seemingly out of nowhere, an idea just gushed out of me. I told Joost that I was constantly reading books on history and the stories that I read of Julius Caesar and the Borgias and Louis XIV, these were the exact same stories that I had personally witnessed with my own eyes in all my different jobs, only less bloody. People want power and they want to disguise this wanting of power. And so, they play games. They covertly manipulate and intrigue, all the while presenting a nice even saintly front. I would expose these games.

1. January – Your Life's Task: Planting the Seeds for Mastery

Why reach mastery?

Here's why:

> Your skill level will reach a point where you will be able to claim your independence from within the group you work for and move out on your own.
> In a world in which there is so much we cannot control, this will bring you the ultimate form of power. You will determine your circumstances.
> As your own Master, you will no longer be subject to the whims of tyrannical bosses or scheming peers.

You must choose what you want to do.
And first, you have to learn that -to become who you are, you first have to learn who you are-.
Once you know who you are, you can then focus on "fulfilling your destiny".

If you've chosen something because of social pressure, or because of your parents, you must rebel.

Says Greene:

1. Respect your own opinions more and those of others less, particularly when it comes to your areas of expertise, to the field you have immersed yourself in.
2. Assert yourself, get into the habit in your daily life of asserting yourself more and compromising less
3. Care less what people think of you. You will feel a tremendous sense of liberation
4. Be OK with offending someone, realize that at times you must offend and even hurt people who block your path, who have ugly values, who unjustly criticize you. Use such moments of clear injustice to bring out your Shadow and show it proudly
5. Push back against stupid and hypocrisy Feel free to play the impudent, willful child who mocks the stupidity and hypocrisy of others
6. Find your own path, instead of following in other people's footsteps or "tradition", flout the conventions that others follow so scrupulously

Focus on growth and learning, more than on comfort.
Embrace and look for negative experiences.

If you can find a mentor, go for it. But since mentors give while you learn -and take-, always focus on "what's in it for them" to keep that relationship balanced and find a way to give back to them.

2. February – The Ideal Apprenticeship: Transforming Yourself

When you start off, you're a clean slate.

Anything is an opportunity to learn, including menial tasks, and anything you can observe from people, no matter how insignificant they can seem, can help you put together the pieces of the human puzzle.

Says Greene:

> Over time, you will begin to see and understand more of the reality that eluded you at first.
> For instance, a person whom you initially thought had great power ended up being someone with more bark than bite. Slowly, you begin to see behind the appearances. As you amass more information about the rules and power dynamics of your new environment, you can begin to analyze why they exist, and how they relate to larger trends in the field. You move from observation to analysis, honing your reasoning skills, but only after months of careful attention.

This is how we detail the learning process in Power University:

Greene exhorts the readers to focus on putting in the time and hard work, and not to focus on shortcuts. There is no bypassing the apprenticeship, he says, you must put in the work, and endure the setbacks.

Learn from your mentor, change his style, and venture on your own

> Rebellion has no meaning or power if it occurs without something solid and real to rebel against.
> The mentor, or father figure, gives you just such a standard from which you can deviate and establish your own identity.
> You internalize the important and relevant parts of their knowledge, and you apply the knife to what has no bearing on your life. It is the dynamic of changing generations, and sometimes the father figure has to be killed in order for the sons and daughters to have space to discover themselves.

3. March – The Master at Work: Activating Skills and Attaining Mastery

> Do not waste time on things you cannot change or influence. Just keep moving.

- Fulfill your destiny to add your own personal contribution to the world

Greene says that to simply consume what others create or to live a life of hedonistic pleasures is selfish.

Instead, you must focus on bringing your own unique talent and gift into the world.

> Mastery is not a question of genetics or luck, but of following your natural inclinations and the deep desire that stirs you from within. Everyone has such inclinations. This desire within you is not motivated by egotism or sheer ambition for power, both of which are emotions that get in the way of mastery. It is instead a deep expression of something natural, something that marked you at birth as unique. In following your inclinations and moving toward mastery, you make a great contribution to society, enriching it with discoveries and insights, and making the most of the diversity in nature and among human society.

- Stay hungry for more knowledge, keep on growing your skills

As you grow more skilled, a danger lurks:

That you start thinking of yourself as an expert, and that you stop learning, seeking new information, questioning old ideas, and trying new approaches.
Instead, uphold the value of active wonder, remind yourself how little you truly know, and of how mysterious the world remains.

- Create something new

> People are dying for the new, for what expresses the spirit of the time in an original way. By creating something new you will create your own audience and attain the ultimate position of power in culture.

4. April – The Perfect Courtier: Playing the Game of Power

> As the great Renaissance diplomat and courtier Niccolò Machiavelli wrote, "Any man who tries to be good all the time is bound to come to ruin among the great number who are not good."

Robert Greene says that the game of power is the only real "open secret" that the most astute know of, but that they speak of:

> When you enter the real world, you are suddenly blindsided by this whole realm that exists. It is like our dirty little secret. People will talk about their sex lives. But nobody talks about all the power games that are constantly going on in the world.

Keep it Cool, Don't Overreact, & Be Calibrated

> Angry people usually end up looking ridiculous, for their response seems out of proportion to what occasioned it. They have taken things too seriously, exaggerating the hurt or insult that has been done to them. They are so sensitive to slight that it becomes comical how much they take personally. More comical still is their belief that their outbursts signify power. The truth is the opposite: Petulance is not power, it is a sign of helplessness. People may temporarily be cowed by your tantrums, but in the end they lose respect for you. They also realize they can easily undermine a person with so little self-control.

Instead, focus on developing a great reputation, and once it's set, don't get angry or defensive. Take the high road instead.

Test People With Mixed Messages

> Say or do something that can be read in more than one way, that may be superficially polite but that could also indicate a slight coolness on your part or be seen

Recognize False Alliance From True Alliance

A false alliance is out of immediate emotional needs, while a rule alliance is because of win-win based on mutual self-interest.
In a true alliance, you don't fuse your identity with any group and you maintain your autonomy.

Recognize The Toxic Types

This is golden:

Power is a social game. To learn and master it, you must develop the ability to study and understand people.

We couldn't agree more here on The Power Moves.
As a matter of fact, being able to spot "good people" and toxic types is one of the main benefits of learning power dynamics.

And later adds Greene:

> To be a master player you must also be a master psychologist. You must recognize motivations and see through the cloud of dust with which people surround their actions. Some people, for instance, believe they can opt out of the game by behaving in ways that have nothing to do with power. You must beware of such people, for while they express such opinions outwardly, they are often among the most adept players at power. They are what I call "supposed nonplayers."

Greene says the second type is overly Machiavellian and trips himself up.
Instead, you want to strike a balance:

Become a "positively cynic" or "radical realist"

I can't help but quote this whole part, as it's just what this The Power Moves stands for:

> The desire for power is part of our nature. It is a part of how we evolved over millions of years. There is no point in denying our nature. It is who we are. And not only are we not going to deny it, but we are going to accept that this is the human being that we are, the product of evolution.
> With such acceptance, it is not that we love it and want to go out in the world and play all these nasty games. It is that we understand they exist. If, occasionally, we have to use the laws in playing offense or defense, we're okay with that, within reason. Most often it is the case that other people are practicing them on us, and it is better to understand what they're up to than to live in the dream world of our angelic nature.
> And so we understand the laws of power. We understand what people are up to, so they can't easily hurt us. We learn how to recognize in advance the truly toxic narcissists, aggressors, and passive aggressors, the nonplayers, before getting too emotionally enmeshed in their dramas.
> And armed with such an attitude and with such knowledge we are prepared to go to battle in the game of life. Instead of being blindsided by the manipulators, we have calmness, power, and the freedom that comes with awareness of the laws.

5. May – The Supposed Nonplayers of Power: Recognizing Toxic Types and Disguised Power Strategies

On outbursts of emotions and anger:

> If a person explodes with anger at you (and it seems out of proportion to what you did to them), you must remind yourself that it is not exclusively directed at you—do not be so vain. The cause is much larger, goes > way back in time, involves dozens of prior hurts, and is actually not worth the bother to understand. Instead of seeing it as a personal grudge, look at the emotional outburst as a disguised power move, an attempt to control or punish you cloaked in the form of hurt feelings and anger. This shift of perspective will let you play the game of power with more clarity and energy.

Be Watchful of "Nobel Gestures"

Some noble gestures are smokescreens for far darker motives.
Says Greene:

> People want to believe apparently noble gestures are genuine, for the belief is pleasant. They rarely notice how deceptive these gestures can be.

- Daily Law: Be most suspicious of those who seem unambitious.

Find the true motive, ask yourself: who's benefiting (Cui Bono)?

> To decipher events that seem hard to read, I sometimes rely on a strategy that comes from the Latin Cui bono? It was first used in this context by Cicero and it literally translates to, "For whose good, or benefit?" It means: when you are trying to figure out the motives behind some murky action, look to see whom it really benefits in the end, and then work backward. Self-interest rules the world.

6. June – The Divine Craft: Mastering the Arts of Indirection and Manipulation

Always make people feel smart(er), never stupid:

> Given how important the idea of intelligence is to most people's vanity, it is critical never inadvertently to insult or impugn a person's brain power.

To hide your real goal, Greene doesn't just advise not to talk about them, but to talk a lot about your fake goals.

Don't always approach others with "what's in it for them", some people want to feel "good" and not self-interested

Some people are greedy and cool with it.
Approach them by appealing to their greed.
But some others want to look and feel charitable and noble, so you must avoid making them feel greedy and self-interested, and make them feel charitable instead:

> Not everyone, then, can be approached through cynical self-interest. Some people will be put off by it, because they don't want to seem to be motivated by such things. They need opportunities to display their good heart. Do not be shy. Give them that opportunity.

Lead From The Front

Morale is contagious, and it's up to you to set it as the leader.

You don't want to be a dick, but you also must make sure people don't see you as "too nice" as that can dangerously overlap with "weak":

> in moments of danger and difficulty being seen as so nice will work against you: it says that you can be pushed > around, discouraged, and obstructed. If you have never been willing to fight back before, no threatening gesture you make will be credible.

> Understand: there is great value in letting people know that when necessary you can let go of your niceness and be downright difficult and nasty. A few clear, violent demonstrations will suffice.
> Once people see you as a fighter, they will approach you with a little fear in their hearts. And as Machiavelli said, it is more useful to be feared than to be loved.

Albeit Greene doesn't call it that way and he doesn't really define the concept, he exhorts leaders to use emotional leverage by becoming "the judge" that others want to please:

> A few timely criticisms here and there and they will only try harder to please you, to live up to your high standards. Instead of having to push and pull your army, you will find them chasing after you.

7. July – The Seductive Character: Penetrating Hearts and Minds

> The siren call of seduction is irresistible because power is irresistible, and nothing will bring you more power in the modern world than the ability to seduce.

For this month, Greene borrows heavily from his previous book "The Art of Seduction".

He says that you don't need to be handsome or beautiful because seduction is a game of psychology, not beauty. Learn more in Seduction University:

> Seduction University

Seducers are performers, says Robert Greene:

> All that is required is that you look at the world differently, through the eyes of a seducer. A seducer sees all of life as theater, everyone an actor. Most people feel they have constricted roles in life, which makes them unhappy. Seducers, on the other hand, can be anyone and can assume many roles.

Greene says that for women, having a frame of mind that you "need to be spoiled" can help in making men chase. Independence also helps, because an air of independence makes men want to possess you.

8. August – The Master Persuader: Softening People's Resistance

> We humans cannot avoid trying to influence others.
> (…) As social animals we cannot avoid constantly playing the game, whether we are conscious of this or not.

- Use "bold language", direct and high-confidence

> Your audience will be so caught up in your bold language that they won't have time to reflect on whether or not it is true. Never say, "I don't think the other side made a wise decision"; say, "We deserve better," or "They have made a mess of things." Affirmative language is active language, full of verbs, imperatives, and short sentences.

- Don't argue, convince others indirectly

When you argue, you're trying prove others wrong, and they will resist.
Instead, you want to convince people of your ideas indirectly, saving their face, and power-protecting them.

- Make them feel your point, rather than explaining it with words only

It's always better if you can make people feel what you want to explain, communicate, or persuade for.

- Let them win on minor points, so they're more open for your bigger points…

… But of course, they don't have to know that what you let them win for are the minor points.

- Appeal to their ideal and higher selves

This one was really good:

> Most people believe themselves to be inwardly greater than they outwardly appear to the world.
> They are full of unrealized ideals: they could be artists, thinkers, leaders, spiritual figures, but the world has crushed them, denied them the chance to let their abilities flourish. This is the key to their seduction—and to keeping them seduced over time. Appeal only to people's physical side, as many amateur seducers do, and they will resent you for playing upon their basest instincts.
> But appeal to their better selves, to a higher standard of beauty, and they will hardly notice that they have been seduced.

9. September – The Grand Strategist: Rising Out of Tactical Hell

> In war, strategy is the art of commanding the entire military operation. Tactics (…) is forming up the army for battle and dealing with the immediate needs of the battlefield.
> Most of us in life are tacticians, not strategists. We become so enmeshed in the conflicts we face that we can think only of how to get what we want in the battle we are currently facing. To think strategically is difficult and unnatural.
> To have the power that only strategy can bring, you must be able to elevate yourself above the battlefield, to focus on your long-term objectives, to craft an entire campaign, to get out of the reactive mode that so many battles in life lock you into.

Be jealous of your time, make the most of it

> Time is just as important as space in strategic thought, and knowing how to use time will make you a superior strategist, giving an added dimension to your attacks and defense. To do this you must stop thinking of time as an abstraction: in reality, beginning the minute you are born, time is all you have. It is your only true commodity. People can take away your possessions, but—short of murder—not even the most powerful aggressors can take time away from you unless you let them.

Pick your battles – don't get dragged into any

And do not get dragged in wars that you did not choose:

> To waste your time in battles not of your choosing is more than just a mistake, it is stupidity of the highest order.

Avoid answering to people who criticize

Critics are choosing the easy route.
If you answer critics, you're in the defensive position, and it's always easier to attack other people's work, than to defend.
The solution, rather than defending from their criticism, is to ask them what they would do or like to do.
Says Greene (redacted for brevity):

> It is always easier to argue from the negative side—criticizing other people's actions, dissecting their motives, etc. And that is why most people will opt for this.
> It takes effort and thought to establish a positive position. It takes less effort to work on what other people have done, and poke holes.
> It also makes you look tough and insightful, because people delight in hearing someone tear an idea apart.
> If they had to describe a positive vision or how they would accomplish it, it would open them up to attacks and criticisms.
> Facing these negative-mongers in a debate or argument is infuriating. They can come at you from all angles: hit you with sarcasm and snide comments, weave all kinds of abstractions that can make you look bad.
> If you lower yourself to their position, you end up like a boxer throwing punches into thin air. These opponents give you nothing to hit. Your task is to force them off this position by getting them to commit to some positive position. Now, you have a target. If they resist or refuse to do this, you can attack them for this resistance.

There are no laws, circumstances dictate everything

In his most famous book, Greene famously lays out a list of 48 laws.
We've never been big fans of lists on TPM, and I was glad to see that this time Greene speels it a bit more clearly that there are not laws that apply all the time, no matter what:

> Everything in life depends on the circumstances you're in. That's why the last law in The 48 Laws of Power is "Assume Formlessness." The idea is that being formless like water is the highest form of power and strategy. In that chapter, I contradict my entire book and I essentially say: There are no laws. You have to be in the moment. You have to understand the circumstances you're in. Learning to adapt to each new circumstance means seeing events through your own eyes, and often ignoring the advice that people constantly peddle your way. It means that ultimately you must throw out the laws that others preach, and the books they write to tell you what to do, and the sage advice of the elder.

10. October – The Emotional Self: Coming to Terms with Our Dark Side

> If I had to say what the primary law of human nature is, it is to deny that we have human nature, to deny that we are subject to these forces.
> We think, I'm not irrational, I'm not aggressive, I don't feel envy, I am not a narcissist. It's always the other side. It's the Republicans, it's the Spartans, it's the Ethiopians—they're the ones who are irrational and aggressive.
> Me? No.

We're all in pain (before we learn advanced people's skills)

I more than once thought the same:

> After much deep thinking about these experiences and my own experiences with people I knew, I came to the following conclusion:
> We humans have a dirty little secret. It's a secret that has nothing to do with sex lives or fantasies or anything as exciting as that. Rather, the secret is that all of us, to some degree, are in pain. It's a pain that we don't discuss or even understand.

Green says the source is other people (albeit I think the reason is larger, other people are indeed often a big part of it):

> The source of this pain is other people.

Specifically, from shallow relationships:

> What I mean is our often disappointing, superficial, unsatisfactory relationships with people. This comes in the form of relationships and connections that aren't very deep between us and those whom we consider our friends, leading to a lot of loneliness.

On top of shallow relationships, Greene says it's also bad relationships:

> It comes in the form of bad choices for associates and partners—leading to all this struggle and messy breakups. It comes from letting some toxic narcissist into our life—leading to all kinds of emotional trauma that can take years to get over, if we even ever do.

And from failure to be effective with people:

> And it also comes from our inability to persuade, to move people, to influence them, to get them interested in our ideas—generating feelings of frustration and anger.

As social animals we need good relationships:

> We are deeply social animals and having dysfunctional social relationships leads to all kinds of problems. It leads to depression. It leads to recurring obsessive thoughts, to the inability to focus on our work, to eating disorders, to even physical diseases such as heart disease. We only see the surface phenomenon—the loneliness or the depression or physical ailment. We don't see the underlying source. And sometimes we're not even aware that we suffer from loneliness.

I often had the same thoughts.

Rational people are aware of their irrationality

Greene says that calling someone "irrational" is a power move.
So to use it as an actual adjective or, even better, as a tool to improve our strategic thinking, we need first to know what "rational" means.
He says:

> We constantly feel emotions, and they continually infect our thinking, making us veer toward thoughts that please us and soothe our egos. It is impossible to not have our inclinations and feelings somehow involved in > what we think. Rational people are aware of this and through introspection and effort are able, to some extent, to subtract emotions from their thinking and counteract their effect.

> Irrational people have no such awareness. They rush into action without carefully considering the ramifications and consequences. In all cases, the degree of awareness represents the difference.

Rational people readily admit the limitations of their own rationality, while irrational people do not -and even get emotional, angry or defensive when challenged about the limitations of their own rationality-.

Be aware of groups' madness to maintain your own individual power and rationality

> Madness is something rare in individuals—but in groups, parties, peoples, and ages it is the rule.

The daily law says that you must maintain your individuality and protect it from group dynamics and "sense of belonging" if you want to maintain your ability to doubt, reflect, and consider other options (ie.: your rationality):

> If as individuals we had some plan that was clearly ridiculous, others would warn us and bring us back down to earth, but in a group the opposite happens—everyone seems to validate the scheme, no matter how delusional (such as invading Iraq and expecting to be greeted as liberators), and there are no outsiders to splash some cold water on us. Whenever you feel unusually certain and excited about a plan or idea, you must step back and gauge whether it is a viral group effect operating on you. If you can detach yourself for a moment from your excitement, you might notice how your thinking is used to rationalize your emotions, to confirm the certainty you want to feel.

The world goes through waves of irrationality

Throughout history, we witness continual cycles of rising and falling levels of the irrational.

11. November – The Rational Human: Realizing Your Higher Self

Robert Greene says that it's a myth that advancement has made humanity and society stably more rational.
In truth, irrationality is cyclical, and will always find an outlet.
In some periods, that irrationality may wane, but in some other periods, will also grow "stronger":

> Throughout history we witness continual cycles of rising and falling levels of the irrational. (…)
> The irrational simply changes its look and its fashions.
> We may no longer have literal witch hunts, but in the twentieth century, not so very long ago, we witnessed the show trials of Stalin, the McCarthy hearings in the U.S. Senate, and the mass persecutions during the Chinese Cultural Revolution. Various cults are continually being generated, including cults of personality and the fetishizing of celebrities. Technology now inspires religious fervor. People have a desperate need to believe in something and they will find it anywhere.
> As long as there are humans, the irrational will find its voices and means of spreading.

My Note: I only partially agree here: I think there is an uptrend and improvement.
Greene in fact may be overly optimistic thinking that period such as the Renaissance or Athens golden age were far more rational, when in truth it was only a handful of leaders and top 1 percenters who lead that charge -with the masses being as irrational, and probably more, than today's masses-.

On the other hand, I partially agree with him as well as humans haven't upgraded their brain circuitry all that much, and authors such as Steven Pinker are naively* optimistic.

There's hope: great humans and individuals show us the path

> Two factors should give us all hope.
> First and foremost he existence throughout history and cultures of people of high rationality, the types who have made progress possible. They serve as ideals for all of us to aim for.
> These include Pericles, the ruler Aśoka of ancient India, Marcus Aurelius of ancient Rome, Marguerite de Valois in medieval France, Leonardo da Vinci (…).
> All of these types share certain qualities—a realistic appraisal of themselves and their weaknesses; a devotion to truth and reality; a tolerant attitude toward people; and the ability to reach goals that they have set. The second factor is that almost all of us at some point in our lives have experienced moments of greater rationality.

Practice Mitfreude

> Schadenfreude, the experience of pleasure in the pain of other people, is distinctly related to envy, as several studies have demonstrated.
> When we envy someone, we are prone to feel excitement, even joy, if they experience a setback or suffer in some way. But it would be wise to practice instead the opposite, what the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche called Mitfreude—"joying with." This means that instead of merely congratulating people on their good fortune, something easy to do and easily forgotten, you must instead actively try to feel their joy, as a form of empathy. This can be somewhat unnatural, as our first tendency is to feel a pang of envy, but we can train ourselves to imagine how it must feel to others to experience their happiness or satisfaction.

Robert Greene says that you can use mitfreude to love and appreciate what other people accomplish not as something that they did as individuals, but as something that they did as part of the human species.
This is something I also recommend in the foundational "ubermensch" article here on TPM.

> Winner's Mindsets: 10 Commandments of Enlightened "Me First"

> In recognizing the greatness of someone, we are celebrating the highest potential of our species. We are experiencing Mitfreude with the best in human nature. We share the pride that comes from any great human achievement. Such admiration elevates us above the pettiness of our day-to-day life and will have a calming effect.

Learn to detach yourself emotionally from fools

> Your time and energy are limited, and you must learn how to preserve them.
> The world is full of fools—You encounter them everywhere: the indecisive boss, the rash colleague, the hysterical subordinate. When working alongside fools, do not fight them. Instead think of them the way you think of children, or pets, not important enough to affect your mental balance. The ability to stay cheerful in the face of fools is an important skill.

12. December – The Cosmic Sublime: Expanding the Mind to Its Furthest Reaches

Embrace your mortality

> If you're in denial of it, if you're repressing it—which most people are—it comes out in secret ways. It makes you anxious in your daily life because you're not dealing with the one most important thing. You don't realize it, but it's infecting you in your day-to-day decisions, how you interact with people. It is very simple: you need to confront this fear and find ways to transform it into vitality and power.

Also read:

- Embrace your mortality

> The Power of Accepting & Leveraging Death to Live Fully

Keep your time for yourself, don't give it away

> The time that you're alive is the only thing you truly possess, and you can give it away. You can give it away by working for other people—they own your time and you can be miserable. You can give it away by reaching for external pleasures and distractions—spending the time that you have as a slave to different passions and different obsessions. Or you can make the time that you're alive your own. You can actually come and possess it and take ownership of this time and make each moment count.

Stop the stupidity of wanting to live forever

I absolutely loved this part, albeit I'm ambivalent about it.
Greene says that wanting to live forever, an obsession of some silicon valley rich entrepreneurs, is utter stupidity:

> I'm often asked what I think of Silicon Valley's obsession now with either indefinitely prolonging death or ending death. I think it's the ultimate stupidity and I've been ranting against it for years. It's like you're running away from the only reality that exists. We can argue about what reality is. We have our own reality. Our reality is not what a bat or a fly sees. We don't have echolocation. Every creature has its own reality. But the one thing that we can say is that we're born and we die.

Greene says that such an idea is narcissistic, something I also agree with:

> And the idea that you want to escape death and prolong your life—how selfish and narcissistic is this?

However, I don't necessarily agree with why it's bad idea, such as that there wouldn't be enough space or resources for "everyone":

> What if everybody tries to extend their life for 50, 100 years? What will happen to the planet? We already have 8 billion people on this planet. People need to die or we won't have resources, we won't have air to breathe, water to drink. So in trying to prolong life, you're prioritizing yourself.

MORE WISDOM

Play pool to learn strategies & assess others

> Pool, it became clear to me, is all about angles. First, there are simple angles, as you must hit the cue ball to either side when you are not straight on. This is often not as easy as it seems. Then, there are the angles you take when you bank the targeted ball off the sides, an entirely new game in and of itself. This goes further with the double bank shot.

I had indeed noticed, and even written, that how people play at the pool when they're first starting tells you a lot about how Machiavellian they are -or if at all-.
However, "when first starting out" is the keyword, as people can improve just by playing, looking at others, or going through tutorials, and then at that point, it has less to do with true Machiavellian thinking, and more about general mastering a craft.

https://thepowermoves.com/forum/topic/billiard-tells-you-all-you-need-to-know-about-peoples-machiavellianism

Human nature has never been more potentially destructive than it is today > we have never been more in the thrall of human nature and its destructive potential than now. And by ignoring this fact, we are playing with fire. Look at how the permeability of our emotions has only been heightened through social media, where viral effects are continually sweeping through us and where the most manipulative leaders are able to exploit and control us. Look at the aggression that is now openly displayed in the virtual world, where it is so much easier to play out our shadow sides without repercussions.

Robert Greene also says that our tribal tendencies have also grown with the digital world:

> look at our tribal tendencies and how they have now found the perfect medium to operate in—we can find a > group to identify with, reinforce our tribal opinions in a virtual echo chamber, and demonize any outsiders, leading to mob intimidation.

As an example of tribalism, also read:

- Red pill tribalism

> You Can Do Better Than The Red Pill. Here's Why

Don't accept people's ideas because they supplied "evidence", but search it for yourself

> On the internet, it is easy to find studies that support both sides of an argument. In general, you should never accept the validity of people's ideas because they have supplied "evidence." Instead, examine the evidence yourself in the cold light of day, with as much skepticism as you can muster.

To learn more, read "how to lie with statistics" and our various articles on manipulation and con artists.

QUOTES

On trusting yourself more rather than trusting others too much:

> And you need to feel more confident in your own judgment. Understand: we tend to overestimate other people's abilities—after all, they're trying hard to make it look as if they knew what they were doing—and we tend to underestimate our own.
> (…)
> In other words, there are layers of angles, all more subtle and artistic as you go up the ladder and improve your game.

On not wasting time for battles you didn't choose:

> To waste your time in battles not of your choosing is more than just a mistake, it is stupidity of the highest order.

On Machiavellian leadership:

> Your hands are clean. Never overtly play the Machiavellian leader—that only works well on television.

CRITICISM

First, let's start with an analysis of Robert Greene as the author:

🤔Lucio's Take On Greene

Lucio: On the plus side, Robert Greene has fantastic intuition.
On the con side, he has more limited experience and his work almost completely lacks in empirical evidence.
Overall, he does make up for those limitations and still delivers some of the best work on topics of power, manipulation, and human nature

Still promoting the over-cynical life approach?

I was surprised and a bit disappointed to find this:

> Daily Law: Take credit from those below you. Give credit to those above.

I thought Greene had moved past that overly-cynical approach after he achieved commercial success with it.

Apparently not.

There are several more instances where I felt it was overly cynical -including advice on "practice luring people into traps".

A big issue with it is: it often isn't the most effective approach to attaining success. Especially not if you have eagles -or people who expect some foundational ethics and values- in your team because they'll abandon you very quickly. Same for those above you if they sniff your dirty games -and people often do catch the overly Machiavellian ones-.

Which is funny, because Greene himself says so little later in the book:

> The second type of person besides the deniers are those who love this Machiavellian part of our nature and revel in it. They are master manipulators, con artists, and outright aggressors. They have no problem handling this part of the game. In fact, they love it. This type of person, which usually you will find one or two in any office or group, can get pretty far, but eventually they are tripped up in life because they are too Machiavellian. They don't understand that there is a whole other side to the game, which requires empathy, cooperation, and seducing people into working with you. They are too tied to their egos to see the limits of the games they are playing and so they inevitably go too far and experience a fall from power. There is a wall they can never get past.

True.
Actually, it's more than good, it's golden wisdom.
And still, sometimes Greene seems to be promoting overly-Machiavellian approaches, rather than the more empathic and win-win that he says he prefers.

"The 10.000 hours myth": perpetration and promotion of a myth

With the amount of research Greene says he does, I was almost shocked that he fell for this.

Greene recycles that debunked pop-psychology myth, and also lends it credibility:

> Although it might seem that the time necessary to master the requisite skills and attain a level of expertise would depend on the field and your own talent level, those who have researched the subject repeatedly come up with the number of 10,000 hours. This seems to be the amount of quality practice time that is needed for someone to reach a high level of skill and it applies to composers, chess players, writers, and athletes, among others. This number has an almost magical or mystical resonance to it. It means that so much practice time—no matter the person or the field—leads to a qualitative change in the human brain.

There's nothing magical about 10.000 except the amount of publicity -and money- Malcom Gladwell managed to pocket while spreading misinformation.

This is what Anderson, the author of that initial research, actually says about the 10.000 hours ~~"rule"~~ myth:

Gladwell, Anders Ericsson explains, did not understand his study well.
In details:

1. There is nothing "magical" about 10k hours and there is no fixed time: some will need less to achieve the top of the field, some more

2. How much you need to train to reach the top does depend on the field, including its competitiveness levels
3. How* you train matters: time matters too, of course, but how you train is equally, if not more, important

The dvice on seduction can easily backfire (if you seek effective dating)

Greene's seduction advice is very atypical.

One of the "laws" is called "prove yourself", which will already raise some eyebrows for the more power-aware folks:

> Making your deed as dashing and chivalrous as possible will elevate the seduction to a new level, stir up deep emotions, and conceal any ulterior motives you may have. The sacrifices you are making must be visible; talking about them, or explaining what they have cost you, will seem like bragging. Lose sleep, fall ill, lose valuable time, put your career on the line, spend more money than you can afford.

This may work, in some limited cases.
But it's also low-power dating and almost inherently lower-value dating, and that's not very effective.

Margaret Mead is an example of "rationality"?

I don't know what Greene's sources were, but…

… The way I studied and learned about Margaret Mead would better fit the example of an ultra-biased ideologue who was shrewd, dominant and confident enough to fool enough people and sidetrack science and truth for long enough before more rational land level-headed individuals finally re-established truth.

PROS

The usual "pros" of much of Robert Greene's work:

- "Keep it real" self-help for the real world, as opposed to much "naive self-help"
- Genius insights on human nature, strategies, and advanced social skills, as much of Greene's work
- Deep insights from a bright mind, some of which will make you reflect and very possibly even reach a higher level of understanding, efficacy, and self-development
- Very much in-line with TPM, much of what Greene says well aligns and complements with this website's

REVIEW

The Daily Laws is a great book combining self-development with power-aware strategies.
Exactly what self-help was missing before Robert Greene and The Power Moves.

Greene lays out the book with the system that first made him popular: concept -> storytelling -> lesson learned.

The story is as engrossing as possible, and should contain a surprise, “wow” or unexpected moment that makes the book captivating and enthralling.
However, there are fewer stories this time and even more wisdom.

And, as Robert Greene has spoiled us to expect from him, there are enough (new) sparkles of genius to make the book more than just a mix of Greene’s previous work.

Overall, we can recommend “The Daily Laws“.

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Gavin de Becker is an American security specialist providing security services and consulting for governments, large corporations, and public figures.
He is the founder of the security firm Gavin de Becker and Associates.

1. Human predators seek power

Says Becker:

> Most human predators, however, seek power, not food. To destroy or damage something is to take its power.

2. You can predict attacks and spot predators

The central theme of the book is this:

- Every act of violence can be predicted, and that "there is no mystery of human behavior that cannot be solved inside your head or your heart"
- Your subconscious intuition allows you to accurately predict violence, and you can use it for self-defense

De Becker didn't convince of the first, but he made a good, albeit unproven case, or the latter.

3. Listen to your intuition more

Says Gaving de Becker:

> Trust that what causes alarm probably should, because when it comes to danger, intuition is always right in at least two important ways: 1. It is always in response to something. 2. It always has your best interest at heart.

The author says that by "always right" it doesn't mean that something bad will always happen, but it means that it requires your attention.
It means that you should not "explain it away" or force yourself into situations that you'd rather avoid, but that you you better listen, and make an effort to identify a possible threat or danger.

4. The signals of your intuition

Your intuition sends you signals of many different kinds, and of different "levels" that replace the level of danger. In order, they are:

1. Fear: always listen to fear
2. Apprehension
3. Suspicion
4. Hesitation

5. Doubt
6. Gut feelings
7. Hunches
8. Curiosity

Then the author adds a few more, but does not nor order them:

- Nagging feelings
- Persistent thoughts
- Physical sensations
- Wonder
- Anxiety

And then, he adds yet one more outside of the list, which is:

- Dark humor: this is a signal that can come either from, or from others. People sometimes use dark humor as a covert tool to avoid being attacked for what others might think is "silly", "too out there", "too fearful" or even paranoid.

The examples for dark humor are a guy who while others opened a mysterious packages, said "I'm going back to work before the bomb sets off" and another guy who hearing shots in the distance commented it was their former colleague coming back to get revenge.

5. PINS (Pre-Incident Indicators)

> Preincident indicators are those detectable factors that occur before the outcome being predicted.

- Forced Teaming: rapport building has a better reputation then it should have, says the author, since people almost always use it for self-serving reasons. Forced teaming is when someone implies they have something in common with you or speaking in "we" (i.e. "We don't need to talk outside… Let's go in.")
- Charm and Niceness: same as rapport, it has an undeservingly good reputation while, in truth, it's often not a personal trait, but a self-serving social strategy. It's about being polite and friendly in order to manipulate or disarm their mistrust
- Too many details: a lier will add excessive details in an effort to sound more credible
- Typecasting: a slight insult to get you to comply to what the aggressor by trying to proving the insult wrong. For example: "Oh, I bet you're too stuck-up to talk to a guy like me." The way for you to prove him wrong is to talk to him, which is exactly what he wanted.
  The defense is silence.
- Loan Sharking: unsolicited help to make you feel obliged to extend some reciprocal openness in return (Robert Cialdini calls it "reciprocity" and here on TPM we make loan sharking a part of the various types of manipulations of the social exchange).
  The defense is to remind yourself that you didn't ask for anything
- Unsolicited Promise: It's a promise to do (or not do) something when no such promise is asked for. It's almost always a negative sign as promises seek to convince you of an intention that is usually good for the aggressor. For example: an unsolicited, "I promise I'll leave you alone after this", or "I promise I won't hurt you".
  The defense is to never take someone's words at face value, especially if you've just met them. And ask yourself "why does he need to convince me"? And the reason is often because they need to convince you because you have a doubt -an important signal of self-defense-. So you tell yourself "You're right, I am hesitant about trusting you, and maybe with good reason. Thank you for pointing it out"

- Discounting the Word "No": refusing to accept rejection. Declining to hear "no" is a strong signal that someone is either seeking control or refusing to relinquish it.
  The defense, when with strangers, is to never relent on the issue of "no," because it sets the stage for more efforts to control. If you let someone talk you out of the word "no," you might as well wear a sign that reads, "You are in charge."

6. How to predict violence with JACA

De Becker's business uses these elements to predict the likelihood of violence:

- Justification: does the aggressor feel like his attack is "fair" and that he has good reasons to do it?
- Alternatives: does the attacker feel he has no other alternatives, or that you left him with no other alternatives to reach his goal, keep his dignity, or save face?
- Consequences: does the attacker feel the consequences are favorable to him? For example, an assassin who wants attention and has little to lose
- Ability: does the attacker feel he can carry out the attack (and potentially get away with it)?

Example: before entering war

JACA elements can be observed in governments just as with individuals.

When America is preparing to go to war:

- Justification: evil empire; mad dictator; international outlaw; protect our interests; "cannot just stand by and watch"
- Alternatives to violence shrink as we move from negotiations to demands, warnings to boycotts, and finally blockades to attacks
- Consequences of going to war move from intolerable to tolerable as public opinion comes into alignment with government opinion
- Ability rises as ships and troops are moved into proximity of an enemy

My note:
It may be just me, but I didn't find this model very useful in helping predict crime.

7. How to improve your intuition

Gavin de Becker never actually puts it so directly, but I collected several pieces of information scattered across the book to list them all in a more "how-to " section:

- Accept your intuitive signals: and avoid denying them
- Feed your intuition with as much accusation information as possible: the more information and the more you observe, the better your intuition can support you
- Avoid inaccurate information: "our intuition fails when it is loaded with inaccurate information. Since we are the editors of what gets in and what is invested with credibility, it is important to evaluate our sources of information"
- Pay "relaxed attention" (be alert, but not hyper-alert): we are more subconsciously aware and far more open to the full reality of every signal when we take in everything, rather than focusing on anything specific. So alertly looking around while thinking hat "someone could jump out from behind that car" replaces perception of what actually is happening everywhere with imaginings of what could happen in that specific corner, leading to a loss of awareness

Experts may need to avoid overriding their intuition with their knowledge

De Becker says that experts may sometimes drown out the voice of their intuition with logic:

> Many experts lose the creativity and imagination of the less informed. They are so intimately familiar with known patterns that they may fail to recognize or respect the importance of the new wrinkle. The process of applying expertise is, after all, the editing out of unimportant details in favor of those known to be relevant. Zen master, Shunryu Suzuki said, "The mind of the beginner is empty, free of the habits of the expert, ready to accept, to doubt, and open to all the possibilities." People enjoying so-called beginner's luck prove this all the time.

The example if of a man who entered a shop and left right away because of a "bad feeling".
Bad the police officer who entered right after walked in the middle of a robbery and was killed. De Becker says that the police officer may have been reassured by his logical brain telling him that most robberies happen at night.

I see the point of Gavin's argument, but I personally wasn't too convinced.
It's the opposite of what Malcolm Gladwell says in "Blink", such as that expertise informs intuition. Gladwell's arguments and examples seemed more convincing to me.

8. Traits and Predictors of Criminals

- Violence in childhood: the author says that Ressler's research confirmed that 100 percent of the investigated serial killers had been abused as children, either with violence, neglect, or humiliation.
- Recklessness and bravado
- Calm under fearful or scary circumstances: just like a surgeon is not moved by gory sights, a violent criminal tends to have a higher threshold for scary or shocking situations
- Need to be in control:

9. Don't over-sweat the threats: they're not good indicators of violence

Threats are hurled to cause anxiety.

And while that may seem bad news, there is a major silver lining to it: the threat means that, at least for now, and often forever, he favors words over action.

Gavin de Becker also says that the "threat per excellence", the death threat, is the least likely to be acted upon.
And especially so when they're targeting public figures (less dangerous than love sickness, plans to meet or devotional messages), and when they're anonymous (the person who signs with his name is seeking publicity, rather than avoiding detection).

Emotional threats are even less risky

Emotions are fleeting, so threats spoken from a heightened emotional state often lose their will with time.
Threats and promises alike, says the author, are easy to speak, harder to honor.

Don't confuse intimidation with threats

Intimidations are requests, that happen to be backed by a threat.

For example "I will burn this building down if I don't get to keep my job" is an intimidation, not a threat, because there's a condition to avoid the threat.

With intimidations, as per JACA model, the aggressor sees a possibility and an alternative to violence.
And he prefers that possibility, rather than having to resort to acting out the threat.

Rather than threats, they are high-stakes manipulation, trying to influence your behavior with an element of fear.

TIP: Late threats are more credible

Threats late in controversy are more serious "last moves" than those used early. That's because early threats represent an immediate emotional response as opposed to a decision to use violence.

Threats often signal weakness

Threats rarely come from a position of power.

Instead, they often come from a position of weakness, frustration, or even desperation at failing to influence events.

Says the author in one of his many genius insights:

> Both promises and threats are made to convince us of an intention, but threats actually convince us of an emotion: frustration. Threats betray the speaker by proving that he has failed to influence events in any other way. Most often they represent desperation, not intention. Neither threats nor promises

The true currency of the threatener is fear.
The threatener is often not so much hoping to change reality, he seeks either revenge or to save face nad keep some dignity for having lost and having proven so powerless.
His revenge serves to sub-communicate that he does have agency. And he tries to do so by instilling fear and getting some revenge for feeling frustrated and slighted.

It's you as the receiver who decides how powerful threats are

It's the response to a threat that determines whether it's a valuable instrument that reaches its goal, or mere words that do nothing.

Says Gavin de Becker:

> Thus, it is the listener and not the speaker who decides how powerful a threat will be. If the listener turns pale, starts shaking, and begs for forgiveness, he has turned the threat or intimidation into gold.
> Conversely, if he seems unaffected, it is tin

The author hence recommends to never seeming to take threats seriously or being scared and shaken

My Note: I don't fully agree
As the author himself says, strategies are contextual.
Sometimes, if you make the threatened feel like he "won" by showing some fear, he may feel like he saved face and re-empowered himself. That may end the interaction on more positive terms for him, and give him no reason to do anything else.
Conversely, if you seek to show yourself higher power and tough, he feels even more disempowered because his last-ditch attempt failed. Then he may have a reason to go even further, and see no other alternative to escalation.

To disempower threats for extortion, show they have no leverage and that you don't fear the threat

For example, if someone threatens to "tell your wife you cheated', their power is in your fear that someone might do that.

But if you don't fear that, or at least show that you do not fear that outcome, the threat loses much or of all of its power.
For example, the author suggests you say "wait a minute, let me put my wife on the line so you can tell them that".

At that point, the threat is neutralized.

Surfacing or carrying out the threat yourself might also be a good option.
It may be an opportunity to come clean, take a load off your shoulders… And you get to control the narrative.

10. Toxic personality profile: pursuer & "guy who won't let go"

People who don't let go:

- Project onto others commitment that were never done: for example, they take a "maybe" for "for sure"
- Make small, reasonable-sounding requests to keep interacting: you think it's "easy enough to do" and they will stop, but it only gives them a stepping stone to keep on harassing you

From other resources, we also know:

- Misread feedback and neutral communication for personal attacks, including mistaking your boundaries for personal insults

The pursued often think that straight talk or assertiveness will stop the pursuer. But it never really works with people who won't let go.
What they want is an exchange with you, and any exchange, including an angry reaction, will feed the chasing monster.
Getting angry and assertive often also make things worse -it makes an enemy-.
When that happens, a funny twist in the dynamics also happens: you also get emotionally invested in the interaction and neither of you wants to let go. You also become a sort of pursuer.

Says the author:

> The pursuer and the victim begin to actually have something in common: neither wants to let go. The pursuer is obsessed with getting a response and the victim becomes obsessed with making the harassment stop.

I'd also add, that the victim seeks revenge for being harassed, annoyed, and having to waste time on an idiot.
I'm well aware of this dynamic because, as a super minor public figure, I also experienced it -and I did not handle it as well as I could have, including failing to follow my strong intuition and plenty of red flag in order to get feedback from others who didn't see those red flags-.

Answering and escalating only makes an annoying situation worse.
Says the author:

> What the pursuer is really saying is "I will not allow you to ignore me." He'll push buttons until one provokes a reaction, and then as long as it works, he'll keep pushing it. Guilt is usually first, then harassment, then insult. Each works for a while, and then doesn't. When victims participate in this process, threats are not far behind.

Trying to think what these people think is not the best approach because they're not rational:

> Mike had predicted that Tommy would only stop if someone "made him stop," but in fact, the opposite was true. He would only stop if nobody tried to make him stop.

So the only solution for people who won't let go is to cut out contact.
Nothing else will fix it.

If You're Already At Threats Stage

First off, avoid escalating even further.

Remember that words have a big silver lining: it means that the pursuer or weirdo sees other options than attacking.

Confronting or attacking the pursuer instead often make things worse.
Says the author:

> I cannot recall how many times I have seen some private detective apply confrontational interventions and then feel these actions were justified by the fact that the pursuer's behavior ultimately got worse. Having guided the pursuer into a warlike stance, the detective will say, "Whew, it's a good thing we did all that stuff to him, because just look how serious a case this is. I told you something had to be done." Do they never wonder what might have happened if they had just left him alone?

The author says to avoid wars as they rarely end well. By definition someone will have to lose. And those who lost, sometimes seek revenge -remember some of these folks have no real life to go back to and keep them busy-.

Worse yet might be to deny the pursuer the ability to even write or contact you.
For example, by involving police and making it costly for him to contact you.
In that case, if he feels like he lost everything, including his dignity, he may have his life ruined -remember that he's a strange character who can't let go- and have no other option but to attack.

Watching and waiting is a far superior option.
You can always engage if a pursues never ever stops or escalates, but you can never undo an engagement or, worse, an "engage and enrage".

Says the author:

> There is an almost irresistible urge to do something dramatic in response to threats and harassment, but often, appearing to do nothing is the best plan. Of course, that isn't really doing nothing; it is a reasoned management plan and a communication to the pursuer every bit as clear as direct contact. This approach is a real test of patience and character for victims, but that is often the fastest way to end harassment.

The author says that "time will take care of most people who won't let go".

11. Toxic personality profile: the scriptwriter

De Becker says that the "scriptwriter" is the most common profile of problem employee.

The traits and red flags include:

- SAD: sullen, angry, or depressed
- Inflexible: resist change and doesn't want to entertain ideas different from his own
- Weapons: he likes, owns, or recently bought weapons. Or jokes or comments about weapons as instruments of power, revenge, or tools for settling issues
- Police encounters:
- Hopelessness and nihilism:
- Identification with known criminals: identifies with or even praises other perpetrators of workplace violence
- Coworkers' fear or apprehension: coworkers avoid him, fear him, or are worried about him

- TIME: he threatened, intimidaed, manipulated, or escalated against management or coworkers
- Paranoia: people are out to get him, unconnected events are part of a bigger strategy against him, and other conspire against him
- Crusades: undertakes or joins crusades missions (particularly significant if it's "one-man wars")
- Unreasonable Expectations including elevation, long-term retention, an apology, being named "the winner" in some dispute, etc.
- Grievances, with several different people and a history for filing complaints
- Stalking behavior: towards other employees or bosses

To which we add:

- Can't take feedback, not even if you try to put it mildly
- Thin skin, sees attack everywhere: he is not receptive to suggestions because he takes them as affronts or criticisms of his way of doing things (the author calls it "inflexibility", but it didn't seem descriptive to me)
- Sees malice in others: he invests others with the bad motives and character. Discussing a discrepancy on his paycheck, for example, he says or thinks, "You'd better not try to screw me over." It's as if he expects people to attack him, slight him, or harm him
- Warped reality where he's reasonable and nobody else is: in his script, he is a reasonable and good worker who must be constantly on guard against the ambushes of coworkers and supervisors
- Warped reality where others are out to get him: and the company and bosses do nothing to protect him
- Company and bosses don't appreciate his good contributions
- Never takes blame, it's always others' fault: the things that go wrong are never his fault, and even accidental, unintended events are the work of others who will try to blame him
- Builds scripts in his mind and reacts to those, rather than reality: he does not react to reality or to what you tell him, but to his own warped interpretations (the "scripts" he writes)

Says the author:

> The Scriptwriter is the type of person who asks you a question, answers it himself, then walks away angry at what you said. In this regard, he writes the script for his interaction with coworkers and management (…) he is reacting to his script

The author also says that this personality has successfully manipulated in the past, and when you fire him, he is shocked that this time it didn't work out, and may be angry.

If you're worried about a potential attack, also consider "media", such as if there have been other episodes of similar violence as episodes tend to come in clusters.

REAL-LIFE APPLICATIONS

Don’t deny the danger (but don’t exaggerate it either)

Some people deny the risks as a way of “feeling better”.

However, that’s dangerous says the author:

> For all the peace of mind deniers think they get by saying it isn’t so, the fall they take when victimized is far, far greater than that of those who accept the possibility. Denial is a save-now-pay-later scheme, a contract written entirely in small print

However, De Becker is biased towards wanting people to think about dangers and risk -he and his business gain when you do-.
In truth, it’s not written anywhere that deniars WILL take the fall. Furthermore, for every person in denial, there may be one who is obsessed with risk to the point of living a sub-par existence (and in my experience, as well as per evolutionary psychology logic, those may be more than the deniers).

That’s why we added in the title “don’t exaggerate it either”.

Don’t listen to “laws” and cookie-cutter approaches: everything’s contextual

One thing we strongly agree on.
Both the author and I agree that there is no real “list of laws” that apply all the time, no matter what.

Instead, the best course of action is contextual.

Says the author:

> Do not listen to the TV news checklist of what to do, or the magazine article’s checklist of what to do.
> I cannot offer a checklist of what to do for each type of hazard you could encounter, because cookie-cutter > approaches are dangerous.

> Some people say about rape, for example, do not resist, while others say always resist.
> Neither strategy is right for all situations, but one strategy is: Listen to your intuition.
> I don't know what might be best for you in some hazardous situation because I don't have all the information, but you will have all the information.

My Note: Disagree that "intuition is always right"
I'm not convinced though that your intuition is "always right", and I'm afraid it isn't.
To stay with the rape example, David Buss says that the strategy of pleading and begging not to be raped doesn't really work well -and it's very possible that more submissive women's intuition tells them exactly that: to plead and beg-.
Oh, by the way, David Buss writes that based on research and data, not opinions.

Be warm with extortionists, lest you give them a reason to proceed

The author says that many extortionists are amateurs who are uncomfortable to even asking for money.

So when they make covert threats, they hope you will jump in and offer money. The author instead says you want to use a technique we call "surfacing" here and ask "what they really mean".

What I liked even more is de Becker promoting this website's high-level strategies of "don't make more enemies than necessary" and "be high-power and warmth".
He says:

> Though sometimes very difficult, it is important to be polite to the extortionist, because he may be looking for justification to do the hurtful thing he threatens. With the amateur, sinking so low is difficult, and believe it or not, it's a very vulnerable time for him. Don't misread this as sympathy on my part—it's just wise not to kick this guy around emotionally because if he gets angry that empowers him.

Generally speaking, extortionists motivated by malice, which I interpreted to also include envy or jealousy, are more likely to carry out the threat, while those motivated by greed are less likely to do so.
Those motivated by malice are hard to negotiate with anyway and the author suggests to not even try.
And those who are very explicit are also more likely to carry out the threat than those who seem insecure and uncomfortable with the extortion.

Public figures killers seek the American dream of recognition

In the last part of the book, the author focuses on the stalkers and killers of known public figures.

These types of assassinations, says the author, are a narcissist seeking fame and recognition… In a very warped fashion.

He says:

> The assassin might be weird or unusual, but we cannot say we don't understand his motives, his goal. He wants what Americans want: recognition, and he wants what all people want: significance.

Jack Henry Abbott for example describes the "involuntary pride and exhilaration all convicts feel when they are chained up like dangerous animals. The world has focused on us for a moment. We are somebody capable of threatening the world."
This is why the author proposes to fix the issue by either never talking about these idiots, or by talking about them..
For the iditos they are.

Assassins of female public figures also add an element of “made-up romance” or romantic dreams, and they often never had any real relationships in life.

PILLS OF WISDOM

Rapport has an undeservingly good reputation since it’s almost always done for self-serving reasons

I must say that when I read this I immediately thought of Tony Robbins and all of his sales courses.
Often he focused on building rapport, and it always felt fake and manipulative.

To find out the identity of anonymous threatener, ask yourself who gains if you acted out on the threat

This is a tip Robert Greene also shares in a law he calls “cui bono”, such as, ask yourself “who gains”.

Many women don’t know end abusive relationships because they don’t even see ending the abusive relationship as an option and possibility.

Some others yet are completely under the spell and power of the abuser.

The author says the abuser holds power over their spouses because he delivers powerful feelings of overwhelming relief when an incident ends.
She becomes addicted to that feeling.
The abuser is the only person who can deliver moments of peace, by being his better self for a while. And the worse the bad times get, the better the good times are in contrast.

Women better not get a restraining order without knowing the strategic considerations

If you walk into a police office they’re likely going to propose a restraining order.

Restraining orders with violent men with a history of violent and abusive behavior and who are emotionally invested may only make matters worst. Many of these abusive personalities cannot accept rejection, especially not when they feel that their victim is now controlling them.
The restraining order only makes them feel even more motivated to get revenge for the slight.

Restraining orders are most effective on the reasonable person who has a limited emotional investment. In other words, they work best on the person least likely to be violent anyway.

If you give in too easily when men push, you will tend to attract abusers

Many abusers naturally end up with some who cannot say no.
If this is you, you have to learn to say no:

> "I have two drawers in my desk. One is for the things I must do something about, and the other is for the things time will take care of." Time will take care of most people who refuse to let go.

On weird letters not hurting anyone, but enemies and wars potentially hurting many:

> Johnny Carson and his staff knew that letters, no matter how frequent, can't hurt anyone, while starting a war can hurt everyone involved

On being clear about your rejections:

> Conditional rejections are not rejections—they are discussions.

On abusers and abused finding each other:

> An axiom of the stalking dynamic: MEN WHO CANNOT LET GO CHOOSE WOMEN WHO CANNOT SAY NO.

CRITICISM

The usual reminder here:

A lengthy "criticism" session doesn't mean a book is poor; it means it deserves a much deeper look.

1. There's no data to back up the central claim that intuition works best

The most damning issue with the whole book is that there is no data or evidence to back up the idea that intuition works great.
It's a few stories and circumstantial evidence.

The author seems to offer a rationale for the lack of data, but not only did I not find it credible, it further undermined my trust:

> Certainly there are hundreds of other variables that my office considers in predicting violence, and I could present them here with charts and graphs and templates and computer print-outs. I could use psychiatric terms that would require a psychiatrist to interpret, but my purpose here is to simplify

But we didn't need "psychiatric terms", which sounds like a persuasion power move.
We just needed evidence for big claims such as that "intuition is always right", or even that "listening to intuition beats going ahead with something in spite of the fear".

Instead, what we're left with is the author's opinion, circumstantial evidence… And many lingering doubts.

1.2. No Evidence of "Intuition Always Being Right" (And Not Very Logical, Either)

I tend to agree that intuition can work great…

But in many cases and for many people. Not all.

The author instead either implies or directly claims that intuition "is always right".

Not only is there no evidence, but to me, it seems patently false.
In my own life, I've personally had some intuition proved wrong, as well as met people having the wrong intuition about me, so that already is enough to prove that “intuition is not always right”.

Dogmatic Pontification, Rather Than Explanation

The author focuses on pontifying intuition, rather than explaining when it doesn’t work as great, or for whom it doesn’t work as great.

2. Misapplies basic scientific principles as well as logic

For example:

> We may consider our prediction that a presidential candidate might be shot to be more accurate than that a mayor might be shot, but it isn’t necessarily so. In fact, mayors have been shot more often and more lethally than presidential candidates.

“Mayors” is plural.
But there are countless more mayors than presidents.
To make such a claim, one should measure the shooting attempts at presidents, then at mayors… And divide the shooting attempts at mayors by all mayors.
Then and only then you can compare.

2.2. Confuses back-rationalization for foresight, correlation for evidence > but if I am quiet, if I wait a moment, here comes the information: “I felt uneasy when I first met that guy…” or “Now that I think of it, I was suspicious when he approached me,” or “I realize now I had seen that car earlier in the day.” Of course, if they realize it now, they knew it then.

Says Becker:

To begin with, it seems like Becker wanted to hear that they “knew it”.
Also, to me that sounds like conflating back-rationalization for foresight.

A little later in the book, he says:

> How many times have you said after following one course, knew I shouldn’t have done that?” That means you got the signal and then didn’t follow it.

In truth, many people feel uneasy a lot more often than it’s warranted. So it’s simply a number’s game that people who often feel uneasy will also be able to look back at those few times that something bad happened and think “I was right” (while in truth more than “I was right”, it was “I took all the shots, missed many, and a few hit the mark”).

2.3. Overweighs the importance of a dream while dismissing actual data

Says the author criticizing a sergeant for not taking a police officer’s dream of being shot too seriously:

> Remember that sergeant who accused Cantrell of overreacting?
> He had decided there was a low level of risk based on just two factors: that he had never drawn his gun during his career, and that none of the department’s officers had been shot in recent memory.

The sergeant was actually assessing risk based on some data -not the best data, since it’s based on his personal experience only, but it’s still some data that spans many years, across many people-.
The author instead says that a random dream should take precedence over several careers’ worth of data.

And attention: by this I'm not saying that the dream, or what informed that dream, should be useless.
There may be important concerns there that can help improve police officers' safety.
However, you can't discount the sergeant data either and you can't automatically place a dream above many people's decades of experience and data.

3. Some naive empiricism

The author says:

> We will tolerate familiar risks over strange ones. The hijacking of an American jet in Athens looms larger in our concern than the parent who kills a child, even though one happens rarely, and the other happens daily.

There are far more parents than American jets.
And for an adult hijacking or general terrorism might as well be -and probably is- a greater risk than their parents killing them -provided their parents are even still alive-.
As for my personal experience, terrorism struck near me, a few hours after I was physically present that that exact place. Even though terrorism might not be a major death hazard, every day I walk there I'm reminded of the events by the increased police and security and humongous, ugly iron pillars.

Also read more on naive empiricism:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

CONS

Some self-horn-touting

For example:

> When the U.S. Attorney General and the Director of the FBI (<- name-dropping to make it sound impressive) gave me an award for designing MOSAIC™, the assessment system now used for screening threats to justices of the U.S. Supreme Court (<- name-dropping to make it sound impressive x2), I am certain neither realized it was actually invented by a ten year-old boy, but it was (<- the frames suggests he's a one-of-a-kind genius). The way I broke down the individual elements of violence as a child became the way the most sophisticated artificial intuition systems predict violence today (<-I smell "exaggeration" on this one)

Some "covert-selling" of the "Gavin de Becker" agency

For example:

> Clients of Gavin de Becker & Associates are a wide-ranging group: federal government agencies (including the U.S. Marshals Service, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Central Intelligence Agency), prosecutors, battered women's shelters, giant corporations, universities, television stars, television stations, police departments, cities, states, movie studios, cultural figures, religious leaders, champion athletes, politicians, recording artists, movie stars, and college students. Clients include the world's most famous and the world's most anonymous. People from my office attend Presidential Inaugurations on one coast, the Oscars and the Emmys on the other

OK, OK, we got it that the author has a successful business.
Would have been better if he had let the readers find out, though.

Or, at least, just bragging once.

But it's several times across the book:

> We have toured Africa, Europe, Asia, the Middle East, South America, and the South Pacific learning about violence in those places.
> We have flown in Gulfstream jets and hot-air balloons, paddled down the Amazon, been driven in armored limousines, ridden on elephants and rickshaws, been smothered by hostile crowds, and smothered by adoring crowds.
> We have testified before Senate committees and toured secret government installations. We've had staff meetings while floating down a jungle river in the dead of night. We've ridden in presidential motorcades one week and in busses used to transport prisoners the next.
> We have advised…

… I guess you get the point.
I can't help but think: if he had put all that effort into actually collecting, analyzing, and disclosing data…

Contextually Good Techniques Pitched As "Always Good Approaches"

Examples include:

When pursued, turn around to look at him and let him know you know about him

The author says that if you believe you're being followed, you should always turn around to look squarely at the person following you.

This may be good sometimes, but not always.
When you know you may be followed, but they don't know you know, you have information advantage.
You can use that advantage strategically.

But when you turn around and make it obvious you know, you lose that advantage.
And you make your would-be assailant more careful going forward, and far less likely to fall for some trap you may have wanted to set.

When rejecting a man, always be assertive and direct

The author says that "if the culture taught and then allowed women to explicitly reject and to say no, or if more women took that power early in every relationship, stalking cases would decline dramatically".

The author is ignorant of evolutionary psychology logic, including that if an approach or behavior is common and widespread among so many, it's probably because it worked.
Indeed, evolutionary psychologist David Buss says letting men down easily is widespread among so many women because it serves to avoid angering idiotic men who could take strong rejections as personal affronts (Buss, 2021).

It's a bit surprising that the author, who in other occasions correctly understood the logic of not making unnecessary enemies and power protecting, fails to apply it here.

Also read:

More cons...

Some fear-mongering twisted into “helping you” (potentially manipulative tactic)

This is a persuasion (or social manipulation) tactic:

To present something that is good for you, as good for them.

Becker for example lists crime stats that to me felt not very neutral, but presented in a way that makes people even more worried than they should, and adds:

> I’ve presented these facts about the frequency of violence for a reason: to increase the likelihood that you will believe it is at least possible that you or someone you care for will be a victim at some

Oh, is that the reason? Thank you… But was also convenient for you, so now your job seems even more needed, people will listen to you even more (more power to you), and people are even more likely to seek your help (more money for you).

Please note: this is not necessarily a critique of the author. Many people use this format, and I do it too.
But it is to make you aware of these manipulative dynamic, so that you can assess people, risks, and situations more correctly.

“Bad Humans” / “Good nature” fallacy

Says the author:

> If we studied any other creature in nature and found the record of intra-species violence that human beings have, we would be repulsed by it. We’d view it as a great perversion of natural law

Yeah, sure, because other animals are so nice to each other… Not:

Plus of course the fact that humans excelled almost any other species in using cooperation to advance the quality of life of every other human and that has no parallel in nature.

Strawman technique to make a bigger case

To make his support of intuition seem more revolutionary and "needed", it seems to me the author adopts a strawman approach.
He says:

> In fact, Americans worship logic, even when it's wrong, and deny intuition, even when it's right.

Do they?
I haven't noticed any strong, systemic bias against intuition even when it right.
Plus, logic I don't see why logic should stand against intuition, since if one makes a good case for intuition, logic would support it.

Confuses inborn psychology for learned socialization

There are several passages that take the angle of "we are taught" and "our society inculcates", while in truth they were at least in good part inborn human tendencies.

It wouldn't be not a huge con and it's also very common for books written in the past decades of Blank Slate cultural myth.
However, when you don't understand normal human inborn tendencies, you go for solutions that do not really work, and the author often falls for cultural solutions to non-cultural problems.

PROS

- Deep wisdom on "people who won't let go": this was a new "toxic type" for me, a type that you don't experience very often and with which I had little experience.
- Understands and stresses the strategic importance of not making unnecessary enemies: including not aggravating situation are not ideal, but can still get worse. This is something that's simple and foundational, yet way too many communication "experts" and self-help gurus fail to grasp
- Top power-aware and strategic overview of spousal abuse and counter-measures
- Sparkles of genius insights, as for example the one on seeking rapport as having an undeservingly positive reputation while it's almost always self-serving

REVIEW

The Gift of Fear is a remarkable book with lots of helpful advice, but some important limitations that raise some questions about what's reliable advice, and what isn't.

Bel from the TPM's community recommended this book.
And I'm glad he did, I'm glad I did read it, and it's been in many ways an instructive book.

For the downsides, while it provides a potentially invaluable message that we wholeheartedly support, it offers little evidence to support it.
The failure of applying basic logic to various examples and claims also doesn't help to lend authority to the book's claims, while the various covert bragging doesn't help to lend credibility to the author.

The issue is not just that the evidence isn't there, but that the author does not own up to it, instead preferring to present -or actually believing- that all of his claims are well-proven.
An author who's interested in sounding more credible and selling his firm's services also has a covert interest in presenting his approach and method as far more solid, helpful, and needed than they might really be.

We wish it weren't so because "The Gift of Fear" may have even entered our "highly recommended" lists.

“The Gift of Fear” is a book that we recommend, but with caveats on lacking evidence, sometimes lacking logic, and for jumping to conclusions.

The Gervais Principle (2009-2013) is a series of 6 blog posts in which Venkatesh Rao develops a dark theory of business organizations centered around a sociopathic leadership on top that manipulates and exploits the two lower layers of middle management -the clueless simpletons-, and employees -the lowest paid losers-.

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Venkatesh Rao is a writer and consultant. He writes the Ribbonfarm blog, and is the author of Tempo, a book on decision-making. Rao holds a Ph.D. in Aerospace Engineering (2003) from the University of Michigan and at the time of writing resides in Los Angeles.

Intro: Organizational Psychology From a TV Show

The Gervais Principle lays out a theoretical framework of organizational socio-dynamics.

It says that organizations are inherently pathological, and divides employees into Machiavellian sociopaths at the top -the owners and shareholders-, high-conscientiousness and loyal company men in the middle -the "clueless overperformers"-, and those who try to slack off and get by with the least work at the bottom -the "losers"-.

Rao teases out his model by analyzing and drawing from the TV series "The Office", an American sitcom of 9 seasons, but implies that the model applies to most business organizations.

The Gervais Principle In Brief

In brief, the "Gervais Principle" is:

> Sociopaths promote over-performing losers into middle-management so they'll break their back for the company, groom under-performing high-power and Machiavellian losers into sociopaths to lead the organization, and leave the low-power, power-unaware average bare-minimum-effort losers at the bottom to do the menial work.

The Business Life Cycle

From Ribbonfarm
The business life cycle in the Gervais model works like this:

1. A sociopath has an idea or wants to start a business
2. Recruits losers to start: losers are more abundant and require less money
3. Hires clueless as middle management to run the company, or else the company would quickly implode
4. Clueless middle management grows if the business goes well
5. Sociopaths and losers start exiting when the company matures and hits diminishing returns: the sociopaths milk the business for cash as much as possible with mergers, acquisitions, stock buybacks, and layoffs. The losers start exiting because they focus on good feelings and enter and exit reactivaley, following economy trends, or based on feelings and finding fulfillment whenever they can

The 3 Profiles: Losers, Clueless, Sociopaths

The organizational structure in The Gervais Principle is rather simple:

1. Sociopaths

These are the guys at the top.
Says the author:

> The Sociopath (capitalized) layer comprises the Darwinian/Protestant Ethic will-to-power types who drive an organization to function despite itself. The Clueless layer is what Whyte called the "Organization Man,"

2. Clueless

The clueless make more money than the losers, but are often even blinder to reality.

That shouldn't be too surprising since the clueless are not given middle-level management roles because of their smarts, but because of their hard work and (misplaced) loyalty -which, the author, says is a consequence of their cluelessness-.

Clueless men are clueless to all power dynamics, including emotional ones.
With a few examples from The Office, the author says they're stuck in emotional dependency based on external approval, be it from their boss/mother figure (child level), token symbols of appreciation (pre-adolescent badges from teachers and coaches), and peers' approval (adolescent level, "sitting with the cool kids").

To better understand emotional power dynamics and dependence or independence from external validation, see:

- The judge power dynamics

> The Judge Role: A Tool For Emotional Control

3. Losers

The name "loser" is mostly economical, in the sense that they have struck a bad bargain, giving up capitalist risk-taking for steady but meager paychecks.

Many losers are feelings-driven and like to feel good about their lives.
Instead of power-driven like the top-dog sociopaths, they are happiness seekers.

Many losers are more power-aware than clueless middle-management, and that is why, if they cannot find personal fulfillment, they avoid working too much: they know that the system is rigged and the pay-offs don't justify the overwork.
Instead, he pays his bare minimum dues, gives little but also does not ask for much. And he finds meaning elsewhere, outside of work.

Losers also don't have much loyalty to the company, albeit they can be loyal to individuals.

3.2. Future sociopath losers

Many sociopaths were formers losers.

List other losers, the future sociopath recognizes that he's in a bad bargain.
Unlike the risk-averse loser though, he has no intention of just getting by and collecting the crumbles.

The author, and here we disagree, says that the future sociopath severely under-performs to free up energy into political maneuvering and upward exit.
He knows that high-levels of under-performance are not sustainable in the long-run, but he takes a calculated risk of "quick up, or quick out".

My Note: Bad As Systemic Theory, But Fantastic Explanation of How Some Actual Sociopaths Think & Act
Overall, the explanation of how losers make it into the high-leadership rank is not very generalizable.
However, in a few cases of actual sociopaths, it's exactly how it works.
I've personally witnessed this dynamic in action -and it's in Power University, together with how I handled it to win-.

Why hard-working clueless make good middle-management

This was one of my favorite insights, and something I had also noticed:

> So why is promoting over-performing Losers logical?
> The simple reason is that if you over-perform at the Loser level, it is clear that you are an idiot. You've already made a bad bargain, and now you're delivering more value than you need to, making your bargain even worse.

> Unless you very quickly demonstrate that you know your own value by successfully negotiating more money and/or power, you are marked out as an exploitable clueless Loser.

Clueless make for good watchdogs and kapos

The hard-working clueless are worth more in the middle to the top leaders.

And, albeit the author never says it, their (misplaced) loyalty and high conscientiousness also make them great watchdogs and enforcers on the owners' behalf.

Since they don't aim at the top, their top is already in the middle -plus, they're conveniently zero competition for those already at the top, who don't have to fear being replaced or leapfrogged-.

So the clueless have a strong interest in defending the status quo.
Since they look beneath rather than upward, they feel they're getting a great deal, and they (mistakenly) think the company supports them. They also feel better and better off than the losers, so they have an entrenched interest to defend the company for their own well-being.

Wanting to keep things as they are and fearful the loser might cost the company with their slacking off, they'll patrol the premises, watch over the low-level employees, protect company property, and parrot the company's line and values.
They make for good Kapos.

Becoming Sociopaths = Becoming Aware

Sociopaths are power aware.

But they weren't born power-aware.
They realize with time -today, some might call it "taking the red pill"-.

But they're smart and already Machiavellian-bent.
So they quickly understand the game. The corporate manipulations, the leader's manipulations, the conflicts of interest… They know that at the powerless bottom you get the feel-good slap on the back… And the crumbles left by those at the top.

And they don't want to play by those rules.

Some of what they discover is saddening and makes them cynical and nihilistic.
However, says the author, in that process of discovery there is the key to their power:

> They find that in the unsatisfying meanings they uncover, lie the keys to power over others. In seeking to penetrate mediated experiences of reality, they unexpectedly find themselves mediating those very realities for others.

Also read:

- Corporate manipulations

> 12 Ways Companies Manipulate Employees (W/ Examples)

Power-Awareness Makes The Difference

The whole Gervais Principle is based on power awareness.

And that's one of the things that makes it so good.
The author explains this concept via Plato's cave allegory:

> The image is derived from Plato's allegory of the cave, which I won't get into here. Suffice it to say that it divides people into those who get how the world really works (the Sociopaths and the self-aware slacker Losers) and those who don't (the over-performer Losers and the Clueless in the middle).

Personally, I wouldn't say it's just awareness though.
I think the level of one's self-confidence, drive, as well as cynicism, make a huge difference.
So the aware and driven may also work hard to reach higher.
And the aware but cynic may self-harm himself by slacking off while with just a bit more work and a better attitude, he may have been promoted much faster and much higher.

But the author he's also 100% right, power-awareness does make a huge difference.

Not just power dynamics, by the way, but including awareness of social and value exchanges, as well as manipulation dynamics.

The 4 Languages of The Gervais Principle

Source Ribbonfarm

- Powertalk: consequential, it changes the power dynamics and the relative status of individuals who engage in it

Power talk is the only language that changes things -"playing with real money"- while all the other forms of communication are for shooting the breeze, for self-soothing, or to make people feel better.

- Posturetalk: it's the talk of those who wish they were high-power sociopaths. Clueless use it in the more superficially macho (finance) industries, or industries with some actual danger -but that still doesn't make the posture-talker a power player-.

  For example, it's Joe Pesci in the movie "Goodfellas": he's a truly dangerous character, but he's not cut for being a real top-dog power player. Or it's the "alpha male posturing" who tries too hard to have others believe he's a top dog

- Babytalk: leaves power relations unchanged because its entire purpose is to help Losers put themselves and each other into safe pigeonholes that validate do-nothing life scripts
- Gametalk: it does not affect relations because its entire purpose is to make Losers feel OK about themselves and validate do-nothing life scripts.
  It's the only language that's been studied (see transaction analysis texts such as "Games People Play", "I'm OK You're OK", and "What Do You Say after You Say Hello").

Albeit Venkatesh Rao says that gametalk is the only language that's been studied, I think this website changed that.

Today The Power Moves also addressed all other languages, especially powertalk -this is why LOF, the person who recommended me this book, said that this website provides the practical applications of "The Gervais Principle"-.

Power Talk: How The Top 1% Talks

Power talk negotiates power.

It means that the power between two people who engage in power talk slightly shifts with each exchange.
One may lose if he yields ground, or one may gain.
But it doesn't mean one has always to lose. Sometimes both can gain slightly, and sometimes that happens at the expense of a loser.

Power talk is the only language that negotiates power, status, value, and money.
And if you cannot speak power talk and speak with someone who can, they'll take all your value for nothing.
Says the author:

> If you are Clueless or a Loser and accidentally acquire some leverage (like when Phyllis learns of the Angela-Dwight affair), but can't speak Powertalk, the old adage applies: a fool and his money are soon parted

Power Talk Is In The Open

Power talk happens in the open, also in front of losers and clueless.

This is contrary to what you may see in some movies where the sociopaths retreat to talk among themselves.
In truth, sociopaths don't need to retreat because losers and clueless wouldn't understand anyway.

The talk is coded because it happens mostly at the subtext level anyway.

As a matter of fact, sociopaths are far more guarded in private when talking to other sociopaths.
In private, they are in scheming mode, including self-defense. Says the author: "they must be wary of sociopaths with misaligned agendas, and protect themselves in basic ways before attempting things like cooperation. They never lower their masks".

Power Talk: Case Studies

Power talk is all about "playing the social game" at advanced level.

And that includes the sub-text and sub-communication that go beyond the exact words and literal meaning.

Clueless folks only understand the literal meaning.
The losers can partially understand, but not speak Powertalk.
The power-aware sociopaths instead communicate the most via the sub-text.

Here's an example from the show:

> Wallace: So what's up with Jan and Michael? (<—- fishing for information)
> Jim: "I wouldn't know…(pregnant pause)…where to begin." (slight laugh)
> Wallace: (laughs in return)

The literal communication is that it's a complex situation, but the real communication is in the sub-communication. Here is some of the sub-communication of this exchange in the author's analysis:

1. Power awareness by reading his true motives: "I understand you think something bizarre is going on. I am confirming your suspicion. It is a bizarre mess, and you should be concerned"
2. Power awareness via plausible deniability: "I know how to communicate useful information while maintaining plausible deniability". You cannot prove that Jim actually confirmed Wallace's suspicions and, better yet, you cannot prove that Jim says anything about Jan and Michael relationship
3. Power awareness by showcasing the "powertalk" skills: "This is the first significant conversation between us, and I am signaling to you that I am fluent in Powertalk"
4. Power awareness and personal power by maintaining power through information withholding: "I am aware of my situational leverage and the fact that you need me. I am not so over-awed that I am giving it all up for free"
5. Personal power by remaining high-power: "I am not so gratified at this sign of attention from you that I am going to say foolish things that could backfire on me"
   This is one of the main reasons why you want to learn to talk high-power: you almost automatically gain the respect of the high-power folks
6. Personal power & strategic approach to social exchanges by assessing him and asking something back: "You still have to earn my trust. But let's keep talking. What do you have that I could use?"
7. Power awareness via flexible non-committal: "I am being non-committal enough that you can pull back or steer this conversation to safer matters if you like. I know how to give others wiggle room, safe outs and exits"

A person who is low in power awareness (low cognitive power) and low-power in terms of behavior (low power behavior) would have been so gratified by the attention of the high-power sociopath, that he would have gotten nervous, spoken at length, and spilled all the beans (and more).
Wallace, the high-power sociopath, would have taken the all the information he wanted, and walked away without paying.
Such as, the low-power guy would have entered a win-lose exchange with the sociopath where he'd be the sucker of that sucker's trade.

Case Study: Loser Jan Fails Power Talk

This is an example from the original Gervais Principle:

> Jan: (lowball offer)

> Michael: Jan… After all we've been through…" (with a hurt, puppy-dog look in his eyes)

Michael feels betrayed. He has no idea that salary negotiation is a different game and he must play the (appropriate) part.
Plus, he's not enough emotionally in control to hold back.

Even more telling, a little later Jan even gives up playing the professional HR. Michale just can't play ball with the power talk: he's clueless. So she resorts to baby talk to handle him -and, in real life, would lose all attraction for him-.

How to Learn Power Talk

The big question now:

How do you learn it?

The author says you can't learn it from books, or online.
If you try to learn it from books, you merely expand your posturetalk vocabulary.

The author says that an example is Michael reading stuff on the Internet and then acting and looking even lower power and more ridiculous by applying it poorly:

This was a GREAT insight by the author.
Albeit the scene of course is exaggerated as in most movies, the concept is very realistic.
There have been a few people who first show up on this website after reading books like "The 48 Laws of Power" or some red pill "be more alpha male" books and then act like idiots trying to incorporate this or that rule or technique.
However, on this website, it's not that many (because I like to think we teach things properly here). But if you peruse subreddits dedicated to power and strategies, you'll find them by the boatloads.
Also see:

- Why the 48 laws of power is wrong

The author says that the same effect happens when socially-unskilled folks start using scripts from resources such as "assertive communication", "nonviolent communication" or "verbal judo".

They just come off as weird, make their speaking partner even more enraged, and lose out even bigger.
This is the example from the original "The Gervais Principle":

> Phyllis: (trying out Google tips) How does that make you feel
> Angela: (with icy sarcasm) I feel angry. Angry at you for doing something stupid, angry at me for believing you could do something not stupid

Albeit not in the original Gervais Principle, this example is even better.
Angela uses the perfect approach for the situation, but only OK words, terrible delivery, and even worse frame control after Phylli's scathing reply.

When normally passive, submissive, or clueless people start using high-power, assertive, or strategic communication, they haven't internalized it or understood it yet, so they come across as stilted and fake, and they irk and annoy others even more.

And when it comes to "list of power rules", the author also says:

> Just knowing whatever few rules exist is of no real use, it's merely a basic condition of participation.

You can learn sociopath behavior and power talk from the mafia

Says the author:

> Goodfellas is great fun of course, but not as easily translated to non-criminal workplaces. (…) Though distant from our worlds, criminal worlds have the one advantage that they do not need to maintain the fiction that the organization is not pathological, so they are revealing to study.

Indeed, this is also the reason why this website delved into mafia and mafia-like organizations for learning.

The quickest way to learn powertalk

So the quickest way to learn powertalk -and general high power behavior-, is Power University:

> Power University

MORE WISDOM

Power players use meta-communication, all others miss it

It's true that power players talk differently.

Reardon also calls it "the Secret Handshake" with which power players recognize each other.

But overall, it's an extremely tiny minority that seems to recognize this principle.
I'm glad that someone else also pointed it out because this part of what this website and Power University do: allow people to access that higher level of communication.

Effective men must learn to act like sociopaths

> Whether this makes them evil or good depends on the situation.
> (…)
> Good Sociopaths operate by what they personally choose as a higher morality, in reaction to what they see as the dangers, insanities and stupidities of mob morality.

We also agree with it.
In many ways, this is what this website and Power University do: make good sociopaths.

Sociopaths respect the law in appearance, but break it in spirit

Something we also noted in our Machiavellian thinking article:

> Effective Sociopaths stick with steadfast discipline to the letter of the law, internal and external, because the stupidest way to trip yourself up is in the realm of rules where the Clueless and Losers get to be judges and jury members.
> What they violate is its spirit, by taking advantage of its ambiguities.

CRITICISM

There's so much golden in "The Gervais Principle" that I wanted to change this section from "criticism" to "limitations".

However, to keep the standard across all our reviews, I kept the original name.

Great wisdom, but keep in mind it's a simplification (imperfect representation of reality)

The Gervais Principle is neat and simple.

Just 3 classes of people, and all are quite homogenous.

Since reality is obviously complex, variegated, and full of exceptions and shades of grey, that already tells you a lot about how truly explanatory a simple model can be.

An important in terms of explanatory power is this:

The Gervais Principle stops at the cynical level

The Gervais Principle is great, in part, because it addresses the darker side of social and organizational dynamics.

And that part, high in self-interest, manipulation, and predation, is what's most often (conveniently) left out and omitted from most other sources.
However, reality is not only manipulation and predation. Success is also, at least in part and at least sometimes, meritocracy, adding value, solving problems, and improving lives.

And while The Gervais Principles is an interesting take on the "dark side" of organizational dynamics, it stops there.
Anything that stops at the cynical and dark side is, at best, 50% of reality -and, in some of the best and healthiest organizations, less than 50%-.

Sometimes a bit simplistic

Of course, even just a mere 50% of reality is still extremely complex.

And since "The Gervais Principle" is a brief series of six average-length blog posts, sometimes even the "darker" side is a bit simplistic.

For example the general division of organizational layers into 3 simple categories is simplistic.
In that sense, it's not too different from Marx's original analysis: bright, in many ways, but utterly simplistic. Even in Marx's days, capitalists and proletariat weren't monolithic blocks. And, even more importantly, there weren't any "group-level" virtues and sins.

Some as much as capitalists weren't all greedy and exploitative, so leaders and founders aren't all high-power sociopaths -just for one, Elon Musk is bright and driven, but very different than the author's description of a sociopath.

Some of the dynamics of promotions and advancement are also simplistic, for example:

Not true that only the least competent go up

The author says:

> The least competent employees (but not all of them — only certain enlightened incompetents) will be promoted not to middle management, but fast-tracked through to senior management. To the Sociopath level.

That's pretty much blatantly not always true.
Some highly Machiavellian people can be competent at their job. Or, at least, they may not necessarily be the least competent ones, as the author generalizes.

For just an example that disproves The Gervais Principle, also see Jordan Peterson's example in Beyond Order of what can happen when you drop the cynicism, and instead focus on adding value.
A lowly server decided to take JP's message to heart and work as hard and well as he could. And he got 3 promotions in 6 months. Plus, he went from being a disgruntled cynic, to a happy man

CONS

Gets a bit too theoretical / Freudian / Assumptive at times

After the second installment/post there was still plenty of great wisdom.
But it becomes a bit more "depth psychology", with lots of interpretations, little data, and less practical applications.

Group dynamics theory from "The Gervais Principle IV" is less convincing

The fourth installment of "The Gervais Principle" also contains genius spark of insights.

I partially agree with the concept of "status illegibility" in the middle, and indeed it's one of the issues that leads to endless games among turkeys and social climbers.
But, overall, I wasn't fully convinced.

Edit:

- Bel shares hit thoughts on this part, and made me rethink the value of the original work

TV show sometimes retrofitted for the favorite narrative

At times I had the feeling the author has an (often good) insight in mind, and seeks a way to apply it to the show.

For example, he implies that in the show the totem pole of the clueless is "purposefully stacked in the wrong order". But I wondered if it was "purposefully inverted", or if it was more a case of "wanting to fit one's theory to the object of analysis" (usually "reality", but in this case, the show).

PROS

The first two installments are TPM-level genius insights.

REVIEW

The Gervais Principle is a great book offering a simplistic model of status hierarchies but with impressive insights on the power dynamics and psychology.

Compared to all other books we've read on these topics, I'd even say that the first two Gervais books on hierarchy and communication modes are genius.

If that may serve as a vote of convidence on either side, there is much overlap with this website. Including power dynamics, sub-communication, power awareness VS naivete (even referring to "power literacy"), and we both use financial terminology to describe social dynamics (zero-sum, win-lose, currency, etc.).

LOF from the forum first recommended this book, and I can confirm the quality.
The Gervais Principle also connected a few dots for me, improving this website's offering.

So we can highly recommend the Gervais Principle -and it even entered several of our "best resources list", including the popular "best manipulation books"-.

The downside is that the analysis is limited to the dark side, and that the sparkles of genius insight are not always perfectly connected.
Finally, although it never was the author's aim, the Gervais theory does not deliver practical insights on how to use the information for personal advancement -or even career advancement-.

Indeed, LOF told me something like:

> When I stumbled upon ThePowerMoves.com I realized this was like the practical version of Gervais Principle, turning that wisdom into how-to guides, strategies, and techniques.

I think that, in many ways, that was a good assessment.

The Gervais Principle Summary: Are Sociopaths in Charge?

Revolutionary take on career (and life) success based on power-awareness and dark-triad levels. Power-aware sociopaths sit at the top. The naive and conscientious mid-manager are workhorses who get the crumbles. (warning: avoid over-cynicism. Good people can win and skills also matter)

Ali Scarlett is an author, entrepreneur, and avid researcher of the science of networking.
And, for some time now, also one of the main contributors to this website, to Power University, and to power dynamics as a discipline.

Background Info

Currently, Ali summarizes research on business networking over at his website. Everything is clear and lighthearted.

He has also studied the likes of professional sociologists, applied psychology researchers, and other business networking experts when defining his methods.

Ali's education and experience have provided many opportunities for him to give back. To help himself and others achieve personal empowerment, Ali uses helpful information as the pathway to achieving more — by applying and sharing all of the wisdom he acquires as a lifelong student of personal and professional development.

How We Found Each Other

Ali was an early joiner of TPM on November 28, 2019

Since then on, he's been on a continuous, nothing short of impressive upswing.

In 2020, Ali kindly proposed what's considered by many to be an honor: to write the foreword of his very first book, The Clever Connector" -where he applies solid power dynamics and advanced social strategies to networking-.

This is what I wrote back then:

> When I first encountered Ali, he reminded me of a scene from The Dreamers.
> The Dreamers is a movie about movie buffs whose lives revolve around movies.
> The protagonist calls himself one of the "insatiables."
> These are the guys who can never have enough, the types of guys who sit as close as possible to the screen so they can receive the images first.
> Ali seemed to have that same spirit.
> But instead of movies, it was personal development, growth, and strategies for success.
> He was one of the insatiables, asking the most questions, reading the most books, and always working the hardest.

Two years later, I have the pleasure of writing about Ali again.

This time, it's to introduce Ali Scarlett as a collaborator, reviewer, and author for The Power Moves ("TPM"). Plus, co-author for our upcoming book "The Social Strategist".

How Ali Earned A Top Spot in TPM

Of course, one may say that I'm a bit biased.

But then again, people these days seem to misunderstand "biases".

Biases don't stand on vacuums and don't just pop up randomly.
It's not as if people wake up one day and "suddenly become partial to some", or "randomly start respecting someone".
No, it doesn't work that way. It's that people earn that respect, trust, or "like".

So, in this case, Ali earned that "bias".

One of the reasons why I enjoy working on TPM is because I don't have to work with anyone I don't like—and it's not like I'm easy to please: I'm damn picky.
So if we reached this point of working together, it means that I like Ali—or, put another way, it means that Ali earned my trust, respect, and "like".

How did Ali earn it?
A million ways, and maybe included that he got so good at social skills and advanced social strategies :).

But also by virtue of who he is (and has become).

It's not just that he is good at what he does, it's also that he's an awesome human being and a true class act.

That out of the way, let's focus now on the "skills" side and what made Ali such an important contributor to TPM.

An inspiration of what's possible: Ali Scarlett skyrocketing his growth

When Ali first joined TPM I was impressed by him.

I was impressed first of all by his thirst for knowledge and progress, as well as by his growth mindset and learner's attitude.

Some guys say they want to learn, but are truly difficult to give feedback to.

Ali is the opposite. He's any coach's dream: he makes you want to give him feedback.

When he first arrived you could see he was a smart guy.

When it comes to strictly social and power dynamics, his level was OK-ish, but you could spot some gaps (luckily, I can be totally honest because of where Ali is now, just keep on reading-). Some of the times I thought some basics had to be put in place—my fault for not explaining things properly in the early versions of Power University, of course-.

Unluckily, lacking the basics of social skills and emotional intelligence makes it really hard for people to progress.

Far more times than not, I've noticed that, for whatever reason, most people never manage to fix and integrate those basics. So they only make little progress, spotty progress, no progress at all…o Or even flame out, blame others, get angry, and get worse.

Well, thanks to Ali, today we now have the proof that it is possible.

Ali isn't just an exception.

He's a role model and an example of "what can be done".

Of course, Ali is a super smart guy.

But that's often not enough. Equally important were an antifragile ego, learner's mindset, hard work, and a giver attitude that just makes you want to see him succeed (and if you're thinking "I'm not that smart", please note that "smart" is only 1 in 5 traits).

Strong of those 5 traits, Ali went from true beginner to truly advanced in an incredible short time.

Ali's contributions

Today I read Ali's case studies and often learn something new.

Ali contributed to Power University, this website's leading course on advanced social skills and strategies, both in terms of upgrades and refinements, and in terms of brand new concepts and approaches.

This is what John, by all means NOT a beginner, and in many ways an advanced practitioner of power dynamics, says of Ali:

> I'm nowhere near your level yet but as you can see I'm starting to learn the ropes of power dynamics.
> This stuff goes far and deep, though. When I see the kind of analyses you and Ali pull out*, it's interesting to see that every word matters.*

When it comes to some applications of advanced social skills and persuasion, for example marketing or copywriting, Ali reached a level of competence and professionalism that I've never seen in anyone—including professionals I specifically hired to fix marketing and copywriting issues-.
The old sales page of Power University was in large part Ali's doing. The current one is all Ali's doing.
When I read his breakdowns and suggestions I find myself nodding and thinking "this is genius". And I simply end up copy-pasting whatever he says.

- Face and learn the harsh realities of life and dating
- Put yourself first, maintain frame, and become an alpha male, and then you will turn into what you were always meant to be, and you will also enjoy life and sexual success

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Richard Cooper is an entrepreneur, red pill self-development author, founder of the "Entrepreneurs in Cars" website and YouTube channel and, we probably can say, a "gearhead" passionate about cars.

> View this post on Instagram
> A post shared by The Power Moves (@the_power_moves)

> Lucio: I'm sorry to say that Richard Cooper shares some toxic and weak mindsets to dating and relationship

In that video, at least.
But if that's Cooper's opening video to his YouTube channel, well…

We live in a "female primary social order"

The author says that feminism changed the rules of the game.

And it never was about equality, it was about power.
It seems women are winning -or have won-.

This is what I disagree the most about the red pill.
To me, this is such a sad sack, loser, disempowering way to approach the world.
Fuck the "social order", you make the social order around you.

Women break rules for alphas and make them for betas

In large part, it's true because of simple social exchange dynamics -in this case, sexual marketplace dynamics-.

Avoid Single Mothers

They will put you last and use you as a provider for their already existing child.

Note: at parity of attractiveness non-mothers are better for most men. But you must look at your situation to decide what's best for you
Cooper stops at the general level. See "ceiling self-help".
I was dating a divorcee with a kid, she'd come to my place with food, we'd enjoy our time, and it was the perfect relationship for me. Also, Brad Pitt is not your archetype of beta male, but he married Angelina Jolie when she already had adopted children-.

Only pick women who have a burning desire for you

Whenever possible, it's something we agree with.
And we even made it one of our main approaches to have long-term power in relationships.

> 5 Ways to Maintain Power & Control in Relationships

My Note: Focus on achieving your goals, no matter what you use
Albeit I fully agree with the author… What if genuine desire isn't possible for someone? Not everyone is an attractive man, after all.
I think it's fair then to use whatever means possible, including money, psychology, and everything else we teach here.

Watch out for these red flags

1. Red flag #1 – Daddy issues, you recognize them for a poor relationship with tier father, or not having a father
2. Red flag #2 – Feminists, you recognize because they're the opposite of a feminine woman
3. Red flag #3 – The unhappy and unlucky, Richard Cooper quoting 'The 48 Laws of Power'
4. Red flag #4 – She competes with you, and the only reason why women do that is because they think they're higher value, and they think you're a lower value man
5. Red flag #5 – Keeps men from her past around, especially bad if she pines for a former alpha male in her past ("alpha widow")
6. Red flag #6 – Poor with money, because she will spend your money -and demand always more-
7. Red flag #7 – Violent women, the author says that early signs are "as small as a punch", while I'd even include "threatening to punch"
8. Red flag #8 – Extreme jealousy, women want men that other women want, but don't want to share. So some jealousy -"competition anxiety" is a good thing, but not when it's too much and when she's insecure about herself
9. Red Flag #9 – Partying, if she continues partying while you're in a relationship, tell her to stop and if she doesn't, only keep her as a plate, not as a girlfriend
10. Red Flag #10 – Many tattooes and piercings, especially if in visible areas
11. Red Flag #11 – High notch counts, as there is a direct correlation between a high sexual partner count, and lower-quality women. And the earlier she had sex, the higher her sexual partners count, the lower her ability to bond monogamously, over a long period of time, and in a healthy manner (albeit I wonder why the author positively frames monogamy here when he later says that humans are not monogamous?)
12. Red Flag #12 – Single mother, "do not be a cuck. Do not raise another man's child"
13. Red Flag #13 – Validation-seeking, the best girls have private accounts and do not showcase their bodies to get likes
14. Red Flag #14 – A past as a sugar baby, look up the term "seeking" in her email account
15. Red Flag #15 – Pathological lying, because untrustworthy women aren't girlfriend material
16. Red Flag #16 – She has "babies rabies", because women who are desperate to get married and/or reproduce are not interested in you, but only in what you must do for them
17. Red Flag #17 – Hissy fits, as they are the signs of social immaturity
18. Red Flag #18 – Not being in control of the birth, albeit I didn't really get how this is a red flag of the woman, and not of the man who relinquishes that control
19. Red Flag #19 – She's a drama queen, who turn molehills into mountains
20. Red Flag #20 – She had addictions, either to things, activities, or substances

Hire Slow, Fire Quick

Take your time to assess women, but let them go quickly if you turned out to be a poor judge of character.

> As noted by my good friend Dr. Shaun T. Smith in his book 'The Tactical Guide to Women', spend as much time as possible vetting and setting healthy boundaries with a woman before committing. It's from month 18-onwards when a woman's true personality comes through.

To Get Women, Get Looks, Status, And Game

The author in this chapter talks about meeting women online, albeit I don't think that "game" or even "status" are as nearly as important in online dating as they are in real life.

Manage your testosterone

Albeit the chapter title is called "manage your endocrine system", it ends up focusing almost exclusively on testosterone.

And the basic message is that if you're low in testosterone, or if you're past 30-35, to replace it (TRT).

Then it goes on to add some basic and popular recommendations on health and nutrition.
I personally wouldn't take any advice from a book that's not from a trusted authority though because science advances quickly on nutrition and books are quickly left behind.
And two, there's way too much bad information in this area, and you probably won't find a great source from most random red pill authors (no offense, they're just not nutritionists and a lot more likely to fall for nutritional fads).

Also read:

Manage the fucks you give

Your time is the most limited resource you have, stop wasting it on nonsense.

Most of all, stop worrying about nonsense.

Instead, focus on what moves you, your mission, or your family forward.

Always control birth control

> ALWAYS be in control of the birth. Without exception. Far, far, too many men have been already duped by women with "baby rabies". Do not let yourself become one of them.

We’re not monogamous

Cooper bases much of this chapter on the book Sex at Dawn.

Sex at Dawn is a good evolutionary psychology book for those who understand the limitations.
Rich may not be be one of those people.

That book is not a dispassionate analysis, but it’s Chris Ryan’s personal interpretation of some evolutionary evidence for polygamy.

Of course, just to be clear: humans aren’t 100% monogamous.
That should be obvious to anyone.
But the devil is in the details -or in the shades of grey-.

Jealousy and love are the proof that (semi-)monogamy is an important aspect of human lfe.
I get that it would be too much from a red-pill author to think that far though.

And it’s in this chapter that I felt the author generalizes the most, strays off the most from actual data and research, and seems to exaggerate women’s nature -while forgetting that it’s men who generally are more open to affairs.

Sarys Richard Cooper:

> You need to understand that marriage is no buffer from hypergamy. If a woman feels like she hasn’t done the best that she can do, and her Sexual Market Value (or SMV) has increased over her partner’s significantly, then the marriage is at risk. Women can, and often do, leave the perfectly good men that they took those vows with, so they can “Go and explore their options.”

Own a motorcycle

Motorcycles are the modern equivalent of (iron) horses.

And then you can also take some pics for your online dating profiles:

Albeit I’m biased and I’d personally agree with the author, I see little benefits in owning a bike for your self-development unless you enjoy it.

I find driving in general, and driving two-wheelers the most, to be a life's joy. If you're the same, go for it.

I didn't agree much with the author's blaming car drivers -"cagers"- for motorcyclist accidents though.
It's a commonly held view among bikers, and while there is some truth to it, I find it more empowering to look at things how they are, and to take responsibility for your own safety.
Plus, of course, there are plenty of idiotic and dangerous bikers around.

Learn physical self-defense

> Violence isn't always the answer. But it is a legitimate response in certain situations. Men have an obligation for the capacity to be violent and, if exercised, should be decisive and lethal.

We agree on the first part.
And as a freedom lower I'm not a huge supporter of any "obligation", but we agree that learning to throw some punches or taking at least a few classes of self-defense is indeed generally a good idea.

Indeed, one of the very first articles on this website was on overcoming social anxiety and gaining social confidence via martial arts.

Avoid black pills and MGTOW

> "Black Pill" MGTOW thinking is very nihilistic and unhealthy for your mental and emotional state. Men and women can certainly complement each other in life. Not all women are men-hating third-wave feminists. But, you do need to know how to "Find the diamonds in the rough."

Don't get married

The author is not against marriage, he says, but men should at the very least know the (high) risks.

My Note:
Generally it can make sense for high-value men.
But, again, it's a silly over-generalization.
See here for more nuanced and sophisticated advice:

> Lucio: high-value men give move with marriage, so they must be careful and…

QUOTES

- Men are made; women are born
- Women have always viewed men as success objects, whereas men have always viewed women as sex objects
- Hate never comes from above
- Women don't care about your struggles, they wait at the finish line and fuck the winners
- Tattoos all over a beautiful woman is like putting bumper stickers all over a Lamborghini. You don't do it as it shows a lack of taste

CONS

Good book, with some important cons:

"Harsh truths"? No, weak mindset

Red pill-inspired authors often refer to their mission as dispensing "harsh truths of life".

The Unplugged Alpha is no exception.
For example, writes the author towards the end:

> This book is just a no-bullshit introduction to the harsh realities that men around the world face today.

And little later, he frames it as a sort of one-up social climb on the reader:

> I'd suggest reading this book a few times over. Especially if my cold, hard, truth bombs make that Beta inside you feel deeply uncomfortable.

I think it's a negative and disempowering frame.
When you frame anything as "harsh" you indirectly sub-communicate that it's negative, and it can harm and/or sadden you.
That's disempowering.

Why how things are should have the power to harm you?

The way I see it, there are no "harsh" truths.
There are principles, with plenty of exceptions and, most important of all, they're not harsh at all. It's much more empowering to think of how things are in a neutral way, neither good, nor bad. Just how things are.

Exec Summary

- Pursue honest personal development to become a high-value man, develop skills, knowledge, as well as a strong ethical foundation.
  But also…
- Be strategic and Machiavellian in socialization, showcase your qualities without making it seem like you're showing off, attract and court attention without making it seem like you are, grow and maintain a great reputation, and get close to those who matter the most
- In dating, attract attention to you and your qualities while making it seem like you are just being yourself

In many ways, the "courtier" is an eagle who focuses both on personal qualities, and getting maximum returns on those qualities:

To me, this focus on both personal development and "real value", plus making the most out of it (including with Machiavellian thinking and strategies) was a genius insight.

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Baldassare Castiglione was an Italian Renaissance courtier, diplomat, soldier, and author.

Note that a good chunk of the book focuses on listing the "traits" that a great courtier should cultivate.
We will skip most of them because ranking traits by importance is subjective as well as contextual to the culture and what a specific social group value (see "status relativity" for more).
Instead, we will focus more on the social strategies and techniques that are most relevant, and more frequently relevant to us all.

1. Move With "Sprezzatura"

Sprezzatura might be the most famous concept in the whole book.

Castiglione defines it as:

> A certain nonchalance, so as to conceal all art and make whatever one does or says appear to be without effort and almost without any thought about it

Such as, the courtier hides his conscious effort to make action and potentially difficult tasks seem easy and effortless.

Sprezzatura is a form of reputational manipulation because you try to seem more skilled than you truly are. Plus, you seek to look "superior" to others who need to expend effort to do what you do effortlessly and nonchalantly.
Says Castiglione:

> This is because it makes the onlookers believe that a man who performs well with so much facility must > possess even greater skill than he does, and that if he took great pains and effort he would perform even better

Castiglione refers to “affectation” as the opposite of sprezzatura.
Such as, when you expand lots of effort on something and thus fail to come across as “naturally talented” or “smooth”.

Sprezzatura is higher power

Sprezzatura is also an important concept of power dynamics.

We published the overarching dynamics of effort and returns under the “social investment model“, and “sprezzatura” is part of the “law of least social effort”.
Sprezzatura makes you look more powerful and “superior” by achieving and getting more, with less (high returns on your effort).
The most powerful person always seems like he can get more, with less. And the least powerful always looks like he expends much effort, for scant or no returns.

Look at the matrix of power and social effort, for example:

We might as well say that the king is a master of sprezzatura.
And the loser is completely unaware of this concept.

2. Guard Your Reputation With Constant, Impeccable Behavior

The first true profession of a courtier must be that of arms.
And he must be enterprising, bold, and loyal to whomever he serves.

He must maintain that reputation by constantly upholding those values.
Because one single stain is enough to undo all of the previous good:

> Just as once a woman’s reputation for purity has been sullied it can never be restored, so once the reputation of a gentleman-at-arms has been stained through cowardice or some other reproachful behaviour, even if only > once, it always remains defiled in the eyes of the world and covered with ignominy.

3. The Courtier Is High-Dominance, & Self-Effacing (In Appearance)

Writes Castiglione:

> The man we are seeking should be fierce, rough and always to the fore, in the presence of the enemy; but anywhere else he should be kind, modest, reticent and anxious above all to avoid ostentation or the kind of outrageous self-glorification by which a man always arouses loathing and disgust among those who have to listen to him.'

4. Self-Praise Is A Skill: It Must Be Covert to Avoid Other People's Envy

> A man who praises himself in the right way, and does not cause envy or annoyance in doing so, is well within the bounds of discretion; and he deserves the praise of others as well as what he allows himself, because he is achieving something very difficult.'

And the way of doing it, says the author, is to say it as if you couldn't avoid saying it, and while seemingly avoiding self-praise.

Also read:

- The Art of Self-Promotion

> The Art of Self-Promotion: 9 Effective Techniques

5. When Someone Praises You, Deflect It While Thread-Expanding It

A golden nugget on how to handle praise.

When someone praises the courtier for his knowledge, the courtier should:

> (…) When he knows the praises he receives are deserved, not assent to them too openly nor let them pass without some protest.
> Rather he should tend to disclaim them modestly, always giving the impression that arms are, as indeed they should be, his chief profession, and that all his other fine accomplishments serve merely as adornments;

Basically, the smart courtier feigns that the only thing he can do is handle arms, and all the rest is just "something more he dabbled in".
Notice what that achieves:

- He thread-expands on the compliment. Such as, he "enlarges" the praise by staying on the topic, and thus giving it more space and more time to sink into people's minds
- Leverages sprezzatura by saying that he focused on something else. So people will think that he must be so smart to know so much when he dedicated so little time to it
- Appears self-effacing and modest by deflecting the compliment, but:
- Maintains rapport because he does deny the compliment -which would break rapport-

Take Credit, But Without Looking Like You Seek Credit > and if he should want to suggest something to his own credit, he will do it with dissimulation, as if purely by chance, and in passing, and with the discretion and caution

6. Good Judgment Is The Meta-Skill (Emotional Intelligence)

> the courtier should possess good judgement (…) If he does have it, then he needs no other instructions about how to practise what he knows at the right time and in the proper manner. To attempt to provide him with more precise rules would be too difficult and surely superfluous.

That much is true.
Today and in social skills we might also refer to that meta-skill as "emotional intelligence", or "social intelligence". The few people that failed to leverage this website or Power University to make strides in life share two traits: a lack of any basic emotional intelligence, and an inability to take, accept, and act on feedback.

And it's also the reason why we're not huge fans of "lists of (power) rules" on this website. Since everything is so contextual, focusing on acquiring the meta-skill is far better than learning a list of "rules".

7. Modesty Requires Success, And Kindness Requires Power

… Otherwise, you may just be submissive and low power, instead of kind.
And low self-esteem and low confidence, rather than modest.

Says Castiglione:

> Gentleness is most impressive in a man who is a capable and courageous warrior; and just as his boldness is magnified by his modesty, so his modesty is enhanced and more apparent on account of his boldness.

8. It's Fair To Take Maximum Advantage of Your Positive Contributions

An interesting mindset around "being strategic":

> the courtier (…) should arrange to (…) accomplish the bold and notable exploits (…) in view of all the noblest and most eminent men (…) and, above all, in the presence, or if possible under the very eyes, of the prince he is serving. For it is certainly right to exploit the things one does well.

It's a mix of both adding value, plus a Machiavellian bent of making the maximum out of it.
However, it's important to note that while an amoral Machiavellian would seek to take credit without adding any value, Castiglione says that the perfect courtier would combine the two: add as much value as possible, and take as much credit as possible from it.

And, from a mindset point of view, adds Castiglione:

> And I believe that just as it is wrong to seek false glory or what is not deserved, so also it is wrong to cheat oneself of due honour and not to seek that praise which is the only true reward of prowess.

Bingo!
We call this approach "fair value marketing" here on TPM (and Power University), and we fully agree.

9. Peacock To Attract Attention

On this website, we say that appearances matter.

And the perfect courtier knows that, and he takes care of his appearances to make a great (first) impression:

> He will ensure that the horse he has is beautifully caparisoned, that he himself is suitably attired, with appropriate mottoes and ingenious devices to attract the eyes of the onlookers in his direction as surely as the loadstone attracts iron.

The same approach, says Castiglione, is important to attract women's attention and desire -and he preceded by several centuries the "peacocking approach" of the pickup artists-.

10. Be A Social Chameleon: Adapt to Those You Speak To

The successful courtier adapts to the company he is with:

> he will speak one way with men and another way with women

11. Don't Compete With Those Below You

… Or, if you must, use sprezzatura or make sure to win.

Another important principle of power dynamics is encapsulated here:

If you compete and lose with someone who's higher power than you are, you lose little (or nothing).
But if you compete with someone lower down and lose, you lose a lot of status and reputation.

So, says Castiglione:

> if anyone is anxious to wrestle, to run or to jump with peasants, then he ought, in my opinion, to do it casually, out of noblesse oblige, so to say, and certainly not in competition with them; and he should be almost certain of winning, or else not take part at all, for it is too sad and shocking, and quite undignified, when a gentleman is seen to be beaten by a peasant, especially in a wrestling-match.

Castiglione clearly understands the power principle, as he clearly states little later:

> Hence I think it would be as well to abstain, at least when there are many onlookers, because the advantage in winning is very negligible and the disadvantages in being beaten very serious.

12. Accept Favors And Gifts As If It's Common For You To Receive Them

Yet another power golden nugget:

> I wish him, on the contrary, to enjoy favours, but not to value them so highly as to appear unable to exist without them. And when they are granted to him, he should not let himself appear unaccustomed or alien to the experience, or amazed that such things should happen; nor should he decline them in the way some do, who out of pure ignorance refuse to accept and thereby show the bystanders that they are convinced of their own unworthiness.

Yep, genius.
That's how strategically high power people behave: they may be surprised by a gift, favor, or compliment, but they always act instead as if it was expected, thus sub-communicating that they are used to gifts and compliments (which, in turn, sub-communicate they must be very high-value people).

13. Develop A Great Relationship With Your Boss

There is much gold in The Book of the Courtier when it comes to dealing with the boss -in his case, an actual king-.

Some of it:

- Only bring good news, avoid being the bearer of bad news, a "law" that Robert Greene also introduced in his 48 Laws of Power
- Treat him as a superior (power protect): "he will not behave in the way that so many do, who when they cross the path of a great prince, even if they have spoken to him only once before, go up to him with a certain smiling and friendly countenance, just as if they were going to embrace an equal or do a favour to someone of lower rank"
- Leave the king free to enjoy his private places, never go to his private quarters: "The courtier will never attempt to make his way into the chamber or private quarters of his master uninvited, even though he possesses considerable authority himself; for often, when princes are by themselves, they enjoy the liberty of saying and doing just what they please, and so they do not want to be seen or overheard by anyone in a position to criticize, and this is quite proper"
- When you're on 1:1 with the king in a friendly and informal setting, make the most out of it to grow closer as friends, and never get into "serious talk": "if a courtier who is accustomed to dealing with important matters should find himself privately with his lord, he should then become another person, defer serious things for another time and place, and engage in conversation which will be pleasing and agreeable to his master, in order not to disturb his peace and quiet"
- Never become the guy who always asks for favors: "Very rarely, or hardly ever, will he ask his master anything for himself, lest his prince, being reluctant to refuse, concedes it grudgingly, which is far worse"
- Decline favors while showing you value them highly: decline modestly while showing you value the favors highly, and yet in such a way to inspire the king to insist even more. For the more resistance that is shown in accepting favours, the more the prince will think highly of you; and the more you show thanks and appreciations, the bigger the favor seems, which is great for your reputation (since it sub-communicates you're tight with the king, if he makes big favors to you)
- Become his trusted confidante by telling the truth: "For princes lack most of all what they must have in the fullest measure, namely, someone to tell them the truth and remind them of what is right."

Many of these tips are also likely valid for you, and they help you to avoid many common social blunders.

> 10 Strategies to Win Over Your Boss (& Get Promoted)

14. Only Serve Good Masters: BOTH For Reputation & Moral Obligations

On the reputational front, says Castiglione:

> he (the courtier) has the right and the duty to quit a service which is sure to bring him disgrace among honourable men. For everyone assumes that those who serve good masters are good and those who serve bad masters are bad.'

And when it comes to ethical obligation, he says:

> if he were to order you to commit some treacherous deed not only are you not obliged to do it but you are obliged not to do it, both for your own sake and to avoid ministering to your master's shame.

This is something we also agree on, and even made it one of the principles of TPM's philosophy.

15. Female Courtiers Obey Different Rules (Modesty, Chastity)

Castiglione was a smart guy.
Long before evolutionary psychology and the endless genders talk of our time, he knew that men and women maximize their (social) returns with very different strategies:

> the lady should always be extremely cautious and always bear in mind that men can display their affection with far less risk than women.'

If Male Courtiers Should Be More Masculine, Female Ones More Feminine

> just as it is very fitting that a man should display a certain robust and sturdy manliness, so it is well for a woman to have a certain soft and delicate tenderness, with an air of feminine sweetness in her every movement

And the rest of the advice would make a feminist shudder in anger and (feigned) disgust:

> to shun affectation: to be naturally graceful; to be well mannered, clever and prudent; to be neither proud, envious or evil-tongued, nor vain, contentious or clumsy; to know how to gain and keep the favour of her mistress and of everyone else (…)
> the ability to take good care, if she is married, of her husband's belongings and house and children, and the virtues belonging to a good mother

Women must possess social grace and a reputation for chastity

However, she doesn't want to make a "show" out of being too chaste, else she appears like trying too hard to be a princess on the pea:

> Nor in her desire to be thought chaste and virtuous, should she appear withdrawn or run off if she dislikes the company she finds herself in or thinks the conversation improper. For it might easily be thought that she was pretending to be straitlaced simply to hide something she feared others could find out about her; and in any case, unsociable manners are always deplorable.

Instead, says Castiglione the right social strategy is to "listen to it with a slight blush of shame".
LOL, what a guy this Castiglione, teaching women (and men) how to properly play games :). But we must agree once again: he's damn right, this is truly an advanced social strategy.

Never revel and eagerly partake in the criticism of other women

Some women jump at the opportunity of speaking ill of their rivals.
Castiglione says it's a major social blunder:

> she should avoid an error into which I have seen many women fall, namely, eagerly talking and listening to someone speaking evil of others. For those women who when they hear of the immodest behaviour of other > women grow hot and bothered and pretend it is unbelievable and that to them an unchaste woman is simply a monster, in showing that they think this is such an enormous crime, suggest that they might be committing it themselves.

Yep, that is true, fantastic advice for eagle women.

If you want to dance, let others coax you into it

Probably because Castiglione knew that many men intuitively see a link between "abandonment in the music" and enjoyment/lust for sexual action, he recommends female courtiers to avoid rushing to the dances.

Instead, let others coax you into it:

> So when she is about to dance or make music of any kind, she should first have to be coaxed a little, and should begin with a certain shyness, suggesting the dignified modesty that brazen women cannot understand.

16. Female Courtiers Looking For Partners Better Treat All Suitors Well

A common mistake women make is to treat suitors poorly in an effort to sub-communicate chastity and higher value.
Instead, says Castiglione, that only sub-communicates poor character:

> they wish to be thought modest and chaste, not only by their lovers but also by everyone else, and so they make sure that their harsh and discourteous ways are well known to all, so that everyone may think that as they treat worthy men so badly they must treat those who are unworthy of love still worse. And then, convinced that this strategy has made their good name secure, they very often lie every night with the commonest of men, whom they hardly know;

We agree, it's generally a poor strategy because it attracts undiscerning men, and it repels higher quality men.
Also read:

- Traits of low-quality women

> 17 Early Signs She's a Low Value Woman

Don't chase men and don't sleep around as that sub-communicates lower value

> And it is certain that the beautiful are always more wooed and pursued in love than the ugly; therefore the beautiful always refuse, and so they are more chaste than those ugly women who, as they have no suitors, do the wooing themselves.'

I'm not sure beautiful women have fewer sexual partners, but from personal experience, I can say that it seems indeed to me that trashier women do the most obvious chasing and sexual bragging.

MORE WISDOM

- Get closer to higher-quality people, keep the lower-quality ones at arm's length > another thing which seems to me greatly to damage or enhance a man's reputation, and this is his choice of really intimate friends > endeavour to associate more with those who are highly esteemed and noble and recognized as virtuous than with the ignoble and those of little worth, so that he in turn may be loved and honoured by them.

- Be twice as careful not to offend the powerful ones

> The courtier should also guard against mocking those who are universally favoured and loved by all and who are powerful, because by doing so he can sometimes stir up dangerous enmities.

- Bonus: self-esteem boost for shorter: the courtier should be average or smaller than average

Castiglione says that when it comes to physical size the ideal size is neither too small nor too big.
However, if one is forced to choose, better on the smaller side:

> It is better to be on the small side than unduly large; for men who are so huge are often found to be rather thickheaded, and moreover, they are also unsuited for sport and recreation, which I think most important for the courtier.

QUOTES

On ruthless social strategies:

- The proverb says that when your enemy is in the water up to his waist, you should extend him your hand and pull him out of danger; but when he is up to his chin, then put your foot on his head and drown him quickly.

CONS

- The great wisdom is scattered and there's plenty of space-filling chapters and long detours
- Some characters are heavily misogynistic

Take this not as a real con given the time of the book, but more like a warning if you decide to read it.

PROS

- Incredibly power-aware, shares a ton of great wisdom

Castiglione was a very shrewd social operator, and very power intelligent.

You can see he understood social power dynamics as well as the foundational principles of dating power dynamics. For example, he says:

> when a lover shows he is afraid that his lady may leave him for someone else, his fear also betrays the fact that he knows he is inferior in merit and worth; and this attitude causes her to love the other man

Without knowing the terminology, he was correctly assessing how mate guarding impacts the perception of sexual market value, and how that in turn decreases attraction.
He also correctly points out nastier games women play, such as triangulation and fake disapproval of male suitors.

REVIEW

The Book of the Courtier is a long and difficult read, but chock full of advanced strategies and techniques for social success.

My version of The Book of the Courtier had a fascinating preface.

The translator said that while Machiavelli with The Prince "shocked the world for several hundred years" unabashedly talking about power, self-interest, and manipulation, Castiglione instead "cloaks shameless opportunism with a veil of seeking refinement".

I can see where he's coming from.

Castiglione's description of The Courtier is a strange mix of virtue and manipulation.
That made it somewhat "off" at times. Because while he talks about high virtues and morality, about the need for loyalty, much of the advice also reeks of manipulation.
Manipulating people's perceptions, kings' preferences, and targets of love.

However, that's not necessarily a con.
As a matter of fact, in large part, it's what this website also does: mixing social effectiveness and a strategic approach to life and socialization, with actual value creation and value giving.

So, yeah, thumbs up for The Book of the Courtier.
There is really much gold here.

However, in spite of a bountiful haul of precious wisdom, we don't necessarily recommend going through the full book.

The reason is that there are too many digressions and parentheses, plus much flowery language that ends up taking a lot of space -and a lot of your time-.
So albeit we loved The Book of the Courtier and we will reference it more than once on this website, I recommend sticking to this summary and review.

Exec Summary

- Calories are the #1 driver of both fat loss and nutritional health, and far more important than the type of food you eat (so don't over-stress organic, whole, low-sugar, whole, processed, etc. etc.)
  - You can have any food, as long as it's within your maintenance calories and macros. Demonizing and attaching ethical judgments to meals or food is a bad idea
- Adherence to a calories-restricting diet is the #1 driver of fat loss, so you should choose your diet mostly based on what you can stick to
- Your metabolism adapts, both to diets and over-caloric feeding. Unless you learn how it works, you're almost bound to make mistakes with diets -or even to make things worse-
- Nutrition is relatively simple but beware that the nutritional industry is packed with quacks, so watch out not to be lead astray by fake "gurus" and the latest fads

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Layne Norton is a scientist, entrepreneur, pro bodybuilder (natural) and powerlifter, and a coach and educator on nutrition and training.
He holds a BS in Biochemistry and a Ph.D. in Nutritional Sciences from the University of Illinois (both with honors).

It's All About Calories In, Calories Out

At the highest level, nutrition and weight are very simple.

A very simple equation governs weight gain or weight loss, be it from fat or lean body mass.
That equation is called "energy balance equation", and it's sometimes referred to as "Calories In, Calories Out".

Such as, if you ingest more calories than you spend, you gain weight.
If you spend more calories than you ingest, you lose weight.

The 4 Components of Calories Expenditure

The "calories out" side of the energy balance equation is also known as your "Total Daily Energy Expenditure" (TDEE).

It's a bit more complicated than the "calories in" part, and consists of 4 basic components:

1. Basal Metabolic Rate: this is the major component of your total calorie expenditure (TDEE), accounting for around 60% (unless you're a competitive trainer in some energy-intensive sport). Even if you stay completely put, you still consume energy through BMR just to stay alive, since it includes breathing, pumping blood, etc. Synonyms with just slightly different meanings and definitions include resting metabolic rate (RMR) and resting energy expenditure (REE)
2. Non Exercise Adaptive Thermogenesis (NEAT) and Non Exercise Physical Activity (NEPA) This is the most adaptive component of metabolism. It increases significantly during a caloric surplus and decreases significantly during a deficit (ie., a diet). However, by how much the body self-adjusts also depends largely on the individual.
   Most resources, including this book, refer to both as NEAT
   1. NEAT includes unconscious little movements throughout the day such as typing on the keyboard, talking, fidgeting, wiggling your toes, etc.
   2. NEPA includes conscious daily and voluntary movements such as walking, standing, and any non-exercise activity.
3. Thermic Effect of Food (TEF): the energy that it takes to extract energy from the food (digestion). Different foods have different TEF and, in general, higher fibers and proteins have a higher TEF (so eating 10 calories of protein in your body turns to just a little less than 10 calories of fat when measured outside your body)
4. Exercise activity (EA): the calories you consume while exercising, which most people tend to over-estimate

Do Exercise, But Know That It's Not So Important In Losing Weight & Fat

Remember that your metabolism:

1. Adapts
2. Defends a certain weight and fat ratio

That means that as your metabolism gets used to exercise, then the exercise simply becomes part of your metabolism's own calculations, and won't lead to any more fat loss outside of the very initial phase.
So it's not like many people think that you can simply take your exercise calories expenditure, which many people overestimate anyway, and account that as "fat loss".

Of course, this is not to say "don't exercise", because there are many more benefits linked to exercise.
It just means that you can't out-exercise a caloric surplus and that calories matter more.

Say the authors:

> We aren't saying don't exercise, because exercise has many other awesome health benefits besides weight loss. We also aren't saying that exercise won't help you lose weight. We're just saying that it's only going to give you an initial boost, and then it will become your new "maintenance" level.

Most of all, avoid exercising during the diet to quit it as soon as you end the diet: that sets you up for disaster. It's paradoxically better to never exercise at all than only doing so during the diet.

Instead, it's best to increase exercise as you transition out of your diet.
Exercise lowers the body fat set point that your body defends and prevent the increase in fat cell number that sometimes happens during rapid weight-regain.
So, even if you regain weight, it will likely be less if you exercise.

Your Metabolism Defends A Certain "Fat Level"

People's metabolisms tend to come with a pre-set level of "fat level" that they like to keep.

Say the authors:

> the Self Defense System Body Fat set point theory is a widely accepted theory of metabolism. It suggests that each individual person has a level of body fat where their body naturally sits, and the body defends that level in an attempt to maintain it. Everyone has a different set point, as well.

This means that not everyone will attain a low body fat and maintain it on a decent amount of calories. It just may not be in someone's genetic cards.
That doesn't mean you can't get better, healthier, and also have a better physique, but it means that you must be realistic -or that you must be ready for a draconian cut in food intake, and keep it that way-.

That's also not to say that diets are not useful.
They're extremely helpful, often even crucial for your health if you need one.

But it's very easy to do those diets wrong, and only increase your body set points (keep on reading).

Your Metabolism Fights Against The Diet (Metabolic Adaptation)

Here's what you need to understand:

Your body interprets a diet as an attack it needs to defend against. And the harder you diet, the stronger the attack, the stronger the self-defense.
Your body doesn't know the diet is good for you.
For your body a diet is dangerous because it's equivalent to scarcity and famine.

The self-defense system activates itself in 3 different ways to prevent diets from depleting your fat levels:

1. Defend during the diet – by reducing your energy expenditure and becoming more efficient at squeezing the most possible calories from the less food you're eating. This is why people hit plateus during diets
2. Restore right after the diet – Increase the rate of weight regain and fat storage as soon as you consume more food (energy)
3. Prevent future diet – Set in place mechanisms that prevent future diets from depleting your fat levels (for example, increasing the size and/or number of fat cells or increasing the hormones that make you feel hungry)

Efficient Metabolisms Easily Gain Weight

Most people think that those who gain fat easily have a less efficient metabolism compared to those who can eat a lot, without putting much weight.

Instead, it's the opposite.
People who gain fat easily have a very efficient metabolism, efficiently turning all ingested calories into energy, with very little waste.
People who can eat a lot and not gain weight instead tend to squander and waste a lot of that energy with inefficient processes.

Of course there are other factors at play, as people who don't gain weight often also move more. But if we look purely at metabolism, then those who get fat more easily are often more metabolically efficient.
And, if civilization were to collapse, they'd stand a better chance at surviving a famine :).

This is important to understand:

The Harder You Diet, The Harder It Becomes to Lose Weight

When you diet, your body actively fights against the diet because it wants to hold on to its reserves -the fat-.

Say the authors:

> every time you diet (eat in a caloric/energy deficit), you are activating the body's self-defense system. The more you attempt to diet, the stronger the signal to your body to strengthen this defense system.

Even exercise during dieting consumes fewer calories compared to non-dieting exercise.
Plus, your body automatically lowers your NEAT without you even realizing it. So while you decrease your "calories in", your body is also decreasing your "calories out".
Here's an infographic from Fat Loss Forever:

Plateauing of fat loss during a diet is common due to "metabolic adaptation": as your daily energy expenditure decreases, "calories in, calories out" balances and you stop losing weight because that original 'deficit' calories has now become 'maintenance' calories

Diets Make Your Metabolism More Efficient (at getting fat)

Because your metabolism adapts, and because it perceives diets as a famine to be protected against, diets prompt your metabolism to get better at extracting calories from food and better at storing fat.

So, in a way, diets make you become more like those people who get fat almost no matter how little they eat.

So during the diet, you make your body more efficient at turning less food into more fat.
And what happens when you end the diet?
Exactly, you're going to feed a metabolism that has become super efficient at squeezing all possible calories from food:

> research has also shown that when you increase food intake above maintenance after you've been dieting, your body more efficiently stores it as fat

And now the second big issue with diets:

The More Often You Diet, The Harder To Lose Weight In The Long Run (Yo-Yo Dieting Warning!)

Here's the other catch:

The more often you diet, the more your metabolism wants to fight and prevent the next diets.
And it does have the ability to get better at defending against diets:

> people who engage in this chronic weight cycling/"yo-yo" dieting for months, years, or even decades are further potentiating this self-defense system every time they do so.

One dangerous adaptation is that of increasing fat cell counts during a diet so that the body can store more fat as soon as food is available, so that it can fight back the next "famine".
Of course, there won't be any famine, so unless you're very careful after you end a diet, you only get fatter, quicker.

Say the authors:

> Essentially, what we're saying is that if you regain weight too fast in the early post diet period, you might actually increase your fat cell number.
> Increasing the total number of fat cells (hyperplasia) would make future weight loss efforts even more difficult and cause the body to defend a new, higher body fat set point.

However, don't worry, if you do things well, you're not doomed:

This is why good diets are progressive, and planned

Diets can be effective if you're careful and if you take time to adjust once you end it.

Say the authors:

> This is not going to happen to someone who regains all their body fat, but does so at a slowed pace. This situation likely only occurs in those who lose significant weight, then aggressively gain a significant amount back in a short period of time (likely a few weeks or less).

And:

> First, do not crash diet.
> The more slowly you lose the weight, the more lean body mass you will retain. Maximizing your retention of lean body mass will help attenuate the slowing of your metabolic rate, because you'll have more metabolically active tissue. It will also help prevent weight regain.

Indeed, the best diet is to diet while eating as much as you can.

This is because the more you can lose weight while still eating enough calories, the less your metabolism goes into self-defense mode.

If your metabolism is impared by yo-yo dieting you can still grow out of it with “reverse dieting”

Reverse dieting in short is:

> a strategy of dieting where calories are increased in a controlled manner over time to increase metabolic rate while minimizing body fat gain.

The idea is to get your body out of that self-defense mode where it seeks to retain as many calories and fat reserves as possible.
By giving it enough food, your body will stop self-defending, and then you can restart your dieting the proper way.

Most Diets Are A Scam

Now that you understand how metabolism works, you realize that any:

- Fast diets are poor diets
- No diet can ever be truly “ended” without you regaining weight
- You may have to make sacrifices, especially if your metabolism defends a high fat point, if you tend to be hungry, and if you like high-calorie food
- There are no magic food, pills or supplements

Which is exactly how markets market their diet: fast, temporary, and “easy”.

Say the authors:

> fad diet is only concerned with getting enough people to lose weight to put some nice before and after pictures on their cover.

Good Dieting Is Planned, Data-Based, & Sustained

So the key is planning, measuring, going at a controlled pace, adjusting, and sustaining the diet:

> Success is only success if you can sustain the weight loss. Therefore, any form of diet you can’t sustain ought to be banned from consideration as a long term solution.

And as a stark warning:

> if you cannot sustain the methods you used to lose weight, then the question is not “if” but “how rapidly” you’ll put back on the weight after you lose it.

In order of importance:

Since sustainability is crucial, it's also crucial that you pick a diet that you like enough that you can stick to.
Such as: some effort and willpower are required, but the best diets limit the need for willpower because they're the most suited to you, your preferences, and your lifestyle.
NO diet is superior to any other as long as it fits your calorie requirements: it's what you can stick to that matters.

Some more tips for dieting:

- Track your food intake if too tedious, track overall calories and proteins only
- Make it hard to have energy-dense food
- Plan to be flexible: such as, if you know you'll have a big dinner you want to enjoy, eat less during that day. If you know that it will be very carb-heavy, have mostly proteins and fibers during the day
- Eat similar food every day, which decreases appetite (but make sure there's enough variety of nutrients)

How to calculate your maintenance calories intake

Probably the best way is by tracking and measuring yourself.

You track weight and food intake, and when your weight more or less stabilizes, you know you're at maintenance calories.

Otherwise, if you want to calculate right now when you don't have any data, the authors' favorite is the Müller equation because it accounts for most of the variables that have the biggest impact on metabolic rate (LBM, FM, Sex, and Age).

It looks like this:

(13.587 × Lean Body Mass) + (9.613 × Fat Mass in %) + (198 × Sex) – (3.351 × Age) + 674 = BMR

Men put "1" in sex, women "0".
For fat body mass you can use many instruments. None is super accurate, so the most important thing is that you remain accurate with it over time, using always the same instrument, and always at the same time of the day (the authors recommend a caliper).

How to Structure Your Macronutrients Intake

Remember that overall calories matters most!

That being said, you generally want to fill your macronutrients with enough protein first, then have enough fiber, and then you can choose for the rest.

- Protein, min. 1.6 grams per kilogram of weight
  ideally with leucine. High protein meals lead to slightly -slightly!- more weight loss because of higher TEF and because for most people they tend to feel more satiating -most, not all!-. They also tend to spare muscle mass during a caloric deficit and promote more fat loss
- Carbohydrates/fats: choose the split you like most and what helps you stick to the diet.
  Once you equate for calories, eating either more carbs or fats doesn't make any difference in weight loss. So feel free to enjoy either as long as you eat just enough fats to keep your hormones in balance
  - Limit trans fats:
  - Don't overdo saturated fats: it isn't as bad as once thought, but still, don't overdo it if you want to be on the safe side of heart diseases. Best of all is to replace saturated fats with PUFAs
  - Sugar: you can have it as long as you remain within your caloric threshold. But keep in mind that sugar isn't very filling so you'll probably be hungrier
- Fiber: 10 to 15 grams of fiber per 1000 calorie intake per day
- Alcohol: limit it, it's nearly as energy-dense as fat at 7 kcal/gram, so consuming large amounts of it will be difficult to do while maintaining a caloric deficit. On the plus side, it has high TEF than carbs or fats.
  Generally speaking, if you're drinking enough to get drunk, then you're drinking enough to start having negative body composition side effects.

Remember: don't over-stress it, and there are no advantages in over-consuming anything.
Especially fiber, that above a certain point doesn't help your digestion any longer but backs you up.

Real-Life Applications

Do Exercise

> If you never intend to be a physique competitor, you don't need to spend an hour every day training. Even performing 30 minutes per day, three days per week of rigorous physical exercise can produce robust benefits compared to being sedentary

And if you can work it up to 1-2h, 4-5 days a week, you're at a whole other level.
It must not be gym, of course, it can be biking, jogging, dancing, etc.

Exercise is especially important when you transition from a caloric deficit, to maintenance calories (when you end the diet).
And you want to keep exercising to keep the weight off.

That exercise must be purposeful and intense.
If you want lower intensity, then you have to make it longer. Walking is fine, but if that's all you do, walk for 45 to 60 minutes every day.

Generally speaking, high energy in and high energy out ("high flux") with more food but more exercise appears to be better for weight maintenance compared to a low flux energy state.

Avoid binge and “cheat days”

Refeeds are OK, but generally avoid that your high-calorie days exceed your low-calorie days by more than double. Also, avoid the concept and mindsets around “cheat days” as it distorts food in terms of “good” and “bad”.

However, say the authors, that albeit there are no peer-reviewed studies, they observed from their coaching work that different people react very differently to refeeds.
Some people respond poorly, soak up and retain all the calories and grow ravenously hungry.
Some others instead feel satiated, and can even burst through plateaus after a high-calorie day or two.
So you must do your own self-analysis here.

Avoid Tom Bilyeu and all pop podcasters when it comes to nutrition: they invite the worst charlatans

Remember that marketers want to sell.
And the best way to sell is to come up with the newest fad, magical diet, or lists of foods to avoid.

Check out Layne himself:

Some common BS include:

- Detox meals / food
- Meal frequency “hacks”
- The superiority of any type of diet for the general population (carnivore, “keto”, vegan, etc. etc.)

QUOTES

On putting health before “physique”:

> A great physique isn’t going to make you happy. It might make you happier, but it’s not the key to happiness. I’m not sure what the key to happiness is, but I can tell you that it’s not having a six pack.

And:

> By the way, there’s no reason you can’t be a happy person and still have some body fat.

CONS

- The author may not do himself many favors with a combative and argumentative stance

Sure, he directs his anger towards various people and conmen who talk out of their assess, so it’s understandable.

Yet, it may not help him.

It’s an issue that I also partially have whenever I smell bullshit: we both go very gang-ho, super direct.
That attitude does not help him (or me) to land many guest appearances and to spread his message.

You can also see it in the messages, and with yours truly as well

It's not necessarily a con, though. And I frankly often enjoy that attitude. It tells you a low about how people reply to you.
For example, Mikhaila Peterson, Jordan Peterson's daughter, challenged Layne to a "race between their children" to "prove" which diet was best -which tells you a low about who's arguing on emotions-.
And Lewis Howes from "The School of Greatness" told him off when Layne proposed him to go on his show and dispel some of the bullshit (notice though Layne's approach, which is quite power taking towards Lewis, and almost invites a defensive reaction. He might have been invited instead if he had approached him in a more friendly manner).

- Some better editing would further help spread the wisdom

To me, this is a non-issue when the content is golden.
But to increase your reach, you may also want to look at how you present and share the wisdom -something I eventually had to also take care of here at TPM-.

PROS

It's the best book I've read on nutrition, so that should say it all, and no point in a long list of "pros" which would include "well-referenced", "logical", "scientific", "enlightening", etc. Etc.

But just to list one:

- Great introduction to flexible dieting

Not only Fat Loss Forever teaches how metabolism and diet work, but it also functions as an introduction to flexible dieting, which, in brief, would be:

> You can eat whatever you want. You just can't eat how much of it you want

REVIEW

Fat Loss Forever is simply the best book I've read on dieting and nutrition.

The second part of that sentence is most surprising, since the book is focused on dieting.

But, given how murky the information on general nutrition is, it's both a compliment to the book, and a stain on the world of nutrition advice in general.

As a matter of fact, I wasn't interested in fat loss and was hoping that Layne would make a book on general nutrition -Layne, are you reading here? Make one please! :)-.

But I ended up getting it anyway because, even with a focus on fat loss, it's still the best book on nutrition I've ever read.

So, yeah, we highly recommend Fast Loss Forever.
As a matter of fact, at the time of writing, it's the only book on nutrition we'd recommend, and Layne is one of the exceedingly few guys worth following and learning from.

FULL SUMMARY

About the Authors:
Matt Johnson is a neuroscientist, writer and speaker who specializes in what he refers to as "the area at the intersection of psychology and marketing". He holds a Ph.D. in Cognitive Psychology from Princeton University.
Prince Ghuman is a marketing consultant and professor of Neuromarketing at Hult International Business School.

Mental Models Mediate Our Reality

We don't experience reality directly, but through our self-constructed mental models:

> Our brains don't experience reality directly. Instead, they construct a model of it, which neuroscientists call a mental model. Our brains are constantly modeling.

Stronger senses take precedence in shaping our mental models

Rather than prioritizing "what's true" in the construction of mental models, our brain prioritizes our stronger senses over the others.

In humans, vision is our stronger sense, and taste the weakest.
Weaker senses can be more overridden, influenced, or manipulated because they always "lose out" against stronger senses.

Example: the McGurk effect, where the visual information from seeing a person speak changes the way we hear the sound (McGurk and MacDonald, 1976).

Beliefs can override all senses

Our beliefs change the way we perceive and feel about reality.

For example, Countless studies have shown that if people believe they're drinking expensive wine, they report experiencing it as being more enjoyable.
The change is physiological.
One study measured via fMRI that while neurons in the pleasure center actively fired when researchers told participants they were drinking an expensive wine, nothing happened when they were told it was a cheap wine -the wine, of course, was the same-.

This means that beliefs physically change our (subjective) reality.
And a positive belief about a certain product make people enjoy that product more.

Successful brands "hack" our mental models

We don't realize we're even running mental models because, to us, those mental models are reality.
Mental models are also easy to influence and change. And the successful brands affect -or create- mental models that are positive for the brand.

Brands Are Belief-Based Mental Models

A brand is a set of associations:

> when we talk about a brand, what we're really referring to is the cluster of memories of all our past experiences and previously acquired knowledge related to a particular company or product.

Whenever we come into contact with that brand in the future, either if we hear the name, hear the jingle, see the logo, or see it in a shop, then all those associations fire up in our brain.
If they're positive associations, we're far more likely to pick the brand -often even if it's at a premium price-.

By extension, branding is an exercise in association design.
Branding is all about creating those mental associations that automatically and subconsciously fire up when we come into contact with the brand.
Say the authors through the example of Coca-Cola:

> Coca-Cola spends billions on advertising and branding each year. Why? There is hardly a soul alive on the planet who has not heard of Coca-Cola. They do it because the advertising buys them much more than name recognition—it buys them psychological association, a large patch of real estate within the semantic network. (…)
> Coca-Cola spends billions on advertising and branding each year. Why? There is hardly a soul alive on the planet who has not heard of Coca-Cola. They do it because the advertising buys them much more than name recognition—it buys them psychological association, a large patch of real estate within the semantic network.

Research has shown that telling people they were drinking Coca-Cola activated more neurons in the brain compared to people who thought they were just drinking "a cola".

Just like expensive wine, people aren't just telling themselves that Coca-Cola tastes better, but because of association designs, Coca-Cola actually tastes better to them.
And that neural pathway is etched in your brain, and Coca-Cola activates it any time you interact with the brand.

Say the authors:

> The association has been physically etched—dare we say, branded—into your temporal lobes. Coca-Cola is literally renting real estate in your brain, but you are the one paying for it, every time you buy a Coke. Concerned? Don't worry, just "Have a Coke and a Smile."

This means that any brand that can build positive associations in your mind can deliver pleasure by firing up that association through mere brand exposure, and make you chase that pleasure -with your wallet-.

The same was true for Red Bull.
An experiment showed that the group who knew they were drinking Red Bull reported feeling more intoxicated and was more confident when it came to approaching women.

The law of least mental effort: why we default to "shortcuts"

Associations are often the preferred way to make decisions because while we tend to think of ourselves as rational, in reality our brains want to be as irrational as possible.

> If there's an easy way to arrive at a solution, the brain will take that route every time. This is such a stable characteristic that it's referred to as a "law": the law of least mental effort.

Many corporations also leverage the law of least effort to guide your behavior and to stop you from doing what may be in your best interest to do.
For example, they may bury their privacy settings behind a maze of different options and click-throughs, so that very few people prevent Facebook from using their data

To Create Memories & Associations, You Need to "Make An Impression"

A brand only works as long as it can etch a neural path in our brains.

Same for experiences: for an experience to influence behavior and future behavior, itneeds to etch a neural path in our brains.
In other words, to be effective, you need to remember it.
And to be remembered, you want to be "memorable", or to "make an impression".

A brand, a jingle, a slogan or a campaign that fails to make an impressions fails, because it's as if it never existed.

Say the authors:

> No impression means no memory.
> (…)
> For brands, the success of a campaign is defined by how strong an impression it leaves on the brain. As mentioned, if it does not leave an impression, it doesn't really matter; it can't affect your future behavior in any way.

Instead, a brand, jingle, or slogan that makes an impression succeeds because it implants an association that can be fired with mere brand exposure.

So, in a way, brands are in the business of creating impressions. From a neuroscientist perspective, in the business of encoding.

Since not all events are encoded, how do you go from event, to impression?

How To Form An Impression

Some characteristics of an event increase the odds the event will stay in our memory -or "encode" in our brain-.

The characteristics are:

1. Attention: if we don't pay attention, the event won't stick. Active participation increases attention, which is why product placements are much more successful in video games than in movies
    1. Zig-zag technique: one way to get attention while also latching onto an already existing association is to follow an existing association, and then break it. For example, the Nissan 350Z is a sports car that latched onto the "red-sportscar association" but went for a dark orange (note: in power dynamics we call this technique "pacing and leading")
2. Friction: friction relates to how difficult it is to decode a stimulus. Such as, the more we strain our attention during an experience, the stronger the memory that's encoded
3. Emotional arousal: whether good or bad, if something is important enough to arouse our emotions, our brain assumes it is important and therefore should be remembered
4. Music: musical memory is one of the longest-lasting, most durable forms of memory

Help Irrational Buyers Feel Rational

How can you sell an emotional product that is expensive?

It's an important question because, generally speaking, the bigger and more important the purchase, the more people engage their logical mind.

However, that doesn't necessarily mean that people will be more rational.
Instead, it may mean that people want to make the choice based on emotion, but also want to feel rational and logical as they ponder their decision.

They do it via what in the marketing world is referred to as "functional alibi" (in some other sources referred to as "rationalization").

So if you're selling something that is truly emotional and that logically makes little sense to buy, you want to add just a few features or mentions that helps the buyer provide himself a "logical alibi" for the purchase".

For example, if you're selling a car such as the Hummer, you may want to add some mentions to safety to make people feel that the purchase was for higher safety:

> Take the Hummer, for example: a $60,000, barely-street-legal tank that gets 4 gallons to the mile. It's brash, big, and expensive. But by including a small mention of its safety features in its advertisements, marketers provide something for the rationalizing mind to grasp. In reality, you want it because it's cool, but you tell yourself, I'm just buying it to be safe.

How To Sell Targeting The Right State (K Factor)

The "K factor" relates to people's "intertemporal choice".

To put it in simple words, it relates to how impulsive someone is:

> Everyone has a K factor. It is where you stand on a scale of impulsivity versus control.

High-K individuals tend to delay immediate gratification and tend to optimize for long-term interests.
Low-K individuals tend to give in to immediate impulses, often at the expense of longer-term interests and rewards.

In Kahneman's words, low-K prospects are in "system 1 mode", making an emotional-based decision, while high-K prospects are in "system 2 mode", making longer and more rational decisions.

The K factor is not fixed in time. The same individual at different times may be more or less impulsive, and the same individual can purchase a certain product in low-K, and another one in high-K.

Low-K selling tactics

Generally speaking, low-K consumers are a marketer's favorite target:

> Marketers benefit from catching consumers in moments of weakness, of low K, because it's easier to sell them products they might otherwise reject

The tactics include:

- Flash sales
- Free shipping and free returns
- Taxing your brain so that you start acting more low-k
  - Casinos with hidden exits
  - Malls & Ikeas with long walks between escalators

Low-k tactics work best for cheap or easy products.

High-K selling tactics

People tend to shift towards high-K behavior for more expensive or more complicated products, or longer purchasing processes.

When people are in high-K, a good business model is to provide them with easier access to more comparative information so that the consumers can shop in their favorite mode -logical and comparative-, and gets to feel rational and smart (while still simplifying and speeding up his job).
Meta searches and comparison websites prosper by pandering to high-K consumers.

And brands who want to sell to consumers who are in high-K mode are better off highlighting and providing positive information about their products.

Pleasure – Pain = Purchase

Does it sound too simple put it like that?

That's what I always thought, to be honest.

Yet, the authors of Blindsight seem to confirm and lend some credibility to that equation:

> In one fascinating fMRI investigation, Stanford neuroscientist Brian Knutson and colleagues found that a purchase could be predicted largely by the difference in activation between the brain's pleasure center (nucleus accumbens) and the pain center (insular cortex).

They measured as "pleasure" the presentation of the product and as "pain" the introduction of the price.
And albeit the equation wasn't working 100% of the times, if activity in the pleasure area was stronger than the activity in the pain area, a purchase was extremely likely. On the other hand, if pain outweighed pleasure, a purchase was not likely.

The authors say that, put more broadly, if the anticipated pleasure of a thing is greater than the pain of obtaining it, we act.

Increasing pleasure

Smart brands seek to optimize for the ways we are driven to maximize pleasure and minimize pain. But that's not easy, as there are many quirks to pain and pleasure, including:

1. Pleasure is fleeting: and this is why brands seek to maximize the "hedonic treadmill" to make you chase the latest rush of shopping pleasure
   "At the biological level of the brain, pleasure climbs and peaks at the moment just before our first experience of a thing. The first bite of a cheese-cake, the first drive in a new car, the first jog in a new pair of running shoes. The pleasure then rolls downhill with every additional bite, drive, or jog: the second gives less pleasure, the third even less, and so on".
   The release of the iPhone is all designed to maximize the pleasure of owning the "new and shiny" product and avoiding the pain of being stuck with "old model".
2. We enjoy randomness: Pleasure is best served on a plate of randomness, and this preference for randomness also has been measured with fMRI
   "Random pleasures can be deliberately baked into the consumer experience to great effect. Research has found that participants were three times more likely to buy a coffee mug when they were told that they were randomly selected to receive a special discount. Rapidly growing sandwich shop Pret a Manger empowers employees with a fund to comp random customers of their choosing, a plan their CEO affectionately calls "random acts of kindness." Zappos, a company with one of the highest customer service ratings in any industry, is known to catch its customers off guard with pleasurable surprises. They once went door to door through the entire town of Hanover, New Hampshire, surprising each customer at the door with gifts like warm gloves and scarves."
3. We're bad at predicting future pleasure: "we derive more pleasure from wanting something than from having it—because the brain engineers pleasure only in the chase—our desire for something in the present is always far greater than our actual enjoyment of it will be in the future. Humans don't calibrate for this, and it makes us terrible predictors of what will actually make us happy. Behavioral economists call the ability to predict how you will feel in the future affective forecasting, and we're horrible at it."
4. More choice does not equal more pleasure: it's not really the number of choices, per se, that affects your mood. Rather, it's the actual act of choosing. Especially for products that we want, as opposed to those we need, choice is tiring. How companies resolve this oxymoron is by turning the pain of choosing into the pleasure of abundance. Companies that can simplify the act of choosing are handsomely rewarded.

The authors say that while all marketing 101 courses focus on the “four Ps of marketing”, the “new Ps of pain, pleasure, and purchase” are of deeper importance:

> Our purchasing behavior is heavily driven by our relationship to pleasure and pain, and their relationship to each other—and as we’ve seen, those relationships are far from straightforward. Pleasure is elusive, best achieved via its own pursuit, driven by randomness, and difficult for us to predict. And while we make purchases based on what we think will bring us pleasure (despite often being wrong), even more, we make purchases based on the avoidance of pain. Whether by directly instilling fear, or framing a product in terms of loss, tactics that play on the human drive to avoid pain are oft-used tools in the marketer’s tool belt.

Numbing the pain of paying

People generally dislike parting with money.

So while one way to increase sale is to drop the price, brands generally prefer to reduce the pain of the payment process by tapping into human quirks in pain perception.
For example, the more abstract the payment experience is, the less it hurts. Enter credit card, chips at the casinos, digital payments with touch or face recognitions, etc.

Pain frame to drive sales

Generally speaking, pain hurts more than pleasure feels good.

So while anticipated pleasure is a strong motivator, the pain of losing something we already have can be an even more powerful source of motivation.

Pain frames are very popular in politics, also see;

- Political manipulation

> The Psychology of Political Manipulation

And brands and marketers surely aren’t going to renounce such as a powerful weapon:

> In the consumer world, brands operationalize the science of loss aversion via a tactic your authors call the pain frame: emphasizing the avoidance of loss, to persuade loss-averse individuals.

Imagine for example a gain frame VS a pain frame:

1. Power University provides increased status, attraction, and income
2. Power University prevents loss of status, attraction, and income

The authors say that, especially for those of us who are particularly loss averse, pain frames tend to be much more compelling.

The “fear of loss” is also evident with time-bound offers where it’s either you “act now”, or you lose the big sale.

Edit: Loss aversion needs update
Subsequent research showed that gain frames can work better, depending on context. See more in the Routledge Handbook of Persuasion

The New Addiction Industry: Monetizing Compulsive Behavior

Addiction is big business.

And there's a new digital wave of addictive products that no longer need a substance like nicotine or alcohol to get you addicted.
These new companies don't even want you to pay with money. The product is often free. Instead, the new addiction industry wants you to pay with your time and focus. Welcome to Addiction 2.0.

Pleasure and Dopamine

The current crop of addictive products went a "level higher".

They do not catch people's attention through simple behavioral reinforcement of positive stimuli:

> If simple reinforcement drove behavior, we'd find that the most pleasure-inducing apps would be the most popular and well subscribed, but in fact, the opposite is true. An aggregate report of 2017 data shows that a higher amount of time spent on an app is consistently associated with unhappiness: the apps we use most often are the ones we enjoy the least, and the ones we wish we spent less time on.

Instead, the new crop of addictive digital products seeks to maximize the quirks of both our pleasure and pain systems.
And with self-learning algorithms, they're particularly effective at it.

For example:

- Leveraging anger, envy, outrage, and fear: negative emotions tend to get more clicks and attention than positive ones. I wish the author had also gone deeper on this all-important bias of digital products
- Random news feed: With every new update, Facebook began to shape the News Feed into what it is today: a masterpiece of attention hacking. In 2009, the Facebook News Feed got an update that killed chronological order. Instead of Father Time, a new magical algorithm began deciding which posts you would see and when. The update was a major win for randomness, as it took away the last piece of control users had over posts: the order in which they were seen.
- Zeigarnik effect with "clickbait" articles: both titles and articles in some of the most popular publications are optimized for the Zeigarnik effect, consisting of a cliffhanger or curiosity-generating question or statement that make people want to find out the answer.
  What she looks like now will amaze you! Sound familiar? Never mind how inappropriate such an article might be, placed under an article on the Syrian Civil War. Outbrain and Taboola are the silent giants of this kind of sponsored content ad, which blatantly abuse the Zeigarnik effect: "Three Amsterdam Locals Walk into a J. Crew Shoot . . ." "Here's Why Guys Are Obsessed with This Underwear."
  BuzzFeed's articles are mini Zeigarnik cliffhangers that only clicking on the article can resolve.
- VR & AR: Our screens are addictive enough in two dimensions. Now virtual reality and augmented reality are beginning to supercharge "engagement" in 3D and beyond. Addiction 3.0 will use VR and AR to enable deeper and more compelling experiences. It is no surprise Facebook spent $2 billion to purchase Oculus Rift, a virtual reality video-game system, or that venture capital investments of nearly as much, $1.9 billion, were made in VR and AR start-ups in 2016 alone.

The solution?
Re-empower yourself, value your time more, and treat digital addiction as an addiction:

> Consumers have a choice: pay with money, or pay with attention. So far, we have defaulted to attention. Here's hoping we go back to good ol' dollars.

Why We Like What We Like

- Mere exposure: the more we see something, the more we like it (Bornstein, 1989), with the caveat that we must at least find it mildly enjoyable
  Limit: there's evidence that it's possible to have too much repetition, and there are sharp diminishing of returns after roughly fifteen exposures
- Fluency effect: we show a preference for things that come to mind easily over those that are difficult (similar and overlapping with mere exposure effect)
- Availability bias: the tendency to believe information that is easier to bring to mind as being more important (aka the availability heuristic)

Brands seek to leverage the above biases in a multitude of ways, from always trying to stay top of mind, catchy jingles, and names that are easy to remember.

Friction VS Likability

We previously said that friction, or the difficulty you need to exert in decoding a message boosts memorability -for example, a difficult-to-read font-.
Now with "fluency" we say that a font that is familiar and easy to read increases likeability (and truthiness).

The two might seem contradictory, but they're not.
Adding friction boosts memory, but it doesn't boost like-ability. So what's better depends on what you need to prioritize.

Mix Familiarity and Novelty

Beyond friction and fluency, a deeper contradiction exists, say the authors:

Such as, the brain likes the safety of familiarity, but also likes the "newness" of novelty.

How to reconcile these two apparent contradictions for a marketer?
The authors say that there are times when our brain wants what is familiar, and there are times when it wants what's new. But what our brain really loves is a perfect combination of both familiarity and novelty.

Leveraging the "power of myth" the authors say that George Luka's Star Wars is an example of that perfect mix: Star Wars film just enough novelty into an existing template of heroes and myth that the audience was already well familiar with.

The trick is to find the perfect balance of familiarity and novelty.

Empathize & Connect With your Prospects

Say the authors:

> brands are in the business of garnering connection. Branding is about building an informational, emotional, cultural, and personal connection among a company, its message, and its products.

Simon Sinek says that the most successful companies start with a central core of values and beliefs, and then develop products and communications around them.
They attract loyal followers not just because they like the products, but because they recognize themselves in those values and want to be part of that culture, and signal to the world they're part of it -as well as attract the wannabes who want to virtue-signal those values and beliefs-.

Mirror The Communication Style of Your Speaking Partner

> The more you can mirror the communication style of your conversation partner, the better the communication and the more persuasive your message.

For marketers, it means to adjust the message to the people you are selling, to become more like your prospects. Some companies successfully "hacked" into this effective communication style by having their own customers post pictures of themselves with their products, thus leveraging their own customers' social networks of similar prospects.

Brands Are Like People: People Will Attribute Personality To Your Brand

People "give life" to brand and logo, and invest them with human-like attributes and personalities.

Brands often seek to increase the "personalization' of their brand by creating fictional characters and hyping up real employees. Their goal is to give you a single figure as a focus for empathy and connection.

Endorsements also serve a similar goal, to "acquire" the personality of the endorser:

> Whether they do so consciously or not, consumers will attribute a personality to your brand in their quest for a shorthand, emotional understanding of your brand's values. The people who represent your brand are part of that perception. As consumers, we extend our preexisting perception of and empathy for an endorser to the brand itself.

Empathy does not scale: share stories with individuals, rather than groups

Our brains are programmed to feel more empathy for one person, the singular, than for multiple people, the plural. The same is true in marketing: across a very wide array of stories and situations, stories revolving around a single person generated far higher rates of emotion and empathy than those with families. Empathy is maximized when delivered via an individual, character-driven narrative.

The "Essence" of Branding: The Ultimate Level of Marketing

As we said, we tend to invest brands of people-like qualities and traits.

But sometimes, we go one step further, and we can invest physical objects with a "soul" -essence- that transcends the physical products -and skyrocket their price-.

For example, people tend to invest the best art pieces with essence.
Paintings that have become iconic acquire a valuation that is millions of times higher than the material they're made with -it's because they're emblems of an era and transmits emotions that transcend the material value-. Sometimes the artist may actually destroy the art on purpose, and it may be worth even more.
Or you may be a fan of a sports figure and their signature may be invaluable to you. It's because of the emotions that you associate with that personality, not because the signature may be extremely valuable per se.

But the authors also list an example of a simple copywriting experiment to show the power of "essence".
Frankly, I'm not sure this was the perfect example for that "essence", but I was quite shocked, and even struggled to fully believe, the results:

> Anthropologists Rob Walker and Joshua Glenn purchased a series of ordinary objects on eBay, like rubber duckies, a Pez dispenser, and a small garden gnome. The average price they paid for each was $1.25. They > then enlisted the support of professional writers to create a biography for each item. Last, they re-auctioned the items on eBay, using the biographies as the item descriptions. How much did the same objects, now dripping with essence, go for? The average price was well over $100. In total, the project generated $8,000 (which was distributed to the writers)

~~Sub~~Midliminal Marketing

Albeit subliminal has sometimes been overblown as some sort of "dark psychology" technique that can make you do anything, it does exist, and it can be scientifically measured and tested:

> In subliminal priming, some thing (scientists call this a stimulus) is introduced, without your conscious awareness, through one of your senses. Then, later, this thing—this stimulus—affects your behavior in some way (scientists call this a response). In other words, subliminal priming is when exposure to sensory stimuli influences you, potentially affecting your future behavior, all without your awareness.

However, testing the effectiveness of subliminal techniques in the consumer world has yielded mixed results. For example, flashing the word "LIPTON" gave people an increased preference for Lipton Iced Tea, but only if they were already thirsty. Otherwise, there was no effect.
It's still powerful and, say the authors, "creepy" and since people cannot consent to it, many jurisdictions have banned the use of subliminal advertising.

Midliminal priming isn't illegal, though…

Midliminal Priming

> For a prime to be midliminal, you must be able to see it, yet it must typically go unrecognized.

And it still works:

> Midliminal messaging works because of the brain's tendency to fall for priming, whether that priming is intentional or not.
> Priming works by impacting the mental models our brain creates. And whether or not a given prime ultimately impacts our behavior somewhere down the line, it still leaves an imprint in our brains.

For example, the Fedex logo:

The arrow in the FedEx logo primes you to associate the company with fast delivery
Or the Amazon logo:

The visual smile nudges a mirroring positive emotional reaction from you while emphasizing the message that Amazon carries everything from A to Z.
Midliminal “hides in plain sight”.

Product placement is also a form of midliminal priming.
The “advertising” is often in plain sight, but the effect happens on a subconscious level, and is more effective for it because you don’t discount the advertisement as “biased” as you do with most normal advertisements.

All senses can be used for midliminal priming, and the authors go on to list how for each one of them.

MORE WISDOM

- Stop recording live events

The act of recording makes you “less in the moment” and degrades your ability to retain the event in your memory.

- People unconsciously grow careless around what they own to give themselves an excuse to buy the new model

> Researchers found that you’re much more likely to be careless with your phone if there’s a newer, better > version of the product available or soon to come.

> Tthere was a curious spike in losses right before a new model was released. This was further supported by a survey of over six hundred self-reports of iPhone neglect and damage, which, again, showed a huge uptick right after a new model was announced. Even if we feign disappointment that we drop our phone, or leave it in a cab, we may unconsciously just be giving ourselves an excuse to get the latest model!

QUOTES

> Freud's greatest contribution to modern psychology, and his lasting legacy, is this: We never really know why we do the things we do.

CONS

- I was confused between "associations" and "mental models"

I think I generally get the difference, but more clarity would have helped.
I either missed the exact definitions, or I think that a more clear explanation, or a definition, could have helped.

- Low-K techniques and flash deals aren't always irrational

Flesh deals and buying on flash deals aren't always irrational or low-K.
It can actually be very smart to buy on a flash sale. One great technique is to put something in your cart and then only buy once you see it's on sale.

Or trying on an item that's free shipping and free return also isn't low-K irrational. It makes a lot of sense to be more willing to buy if you can send it back for free.

- High-K comparison wasn't successfully only because of more information, but because of creating trust

The insurance that provided comparison with other insurances wasn't just successful because it gave more information.
But it's because one, it probably offered competitive products compared to those competitors -or it wouldn't have shown them at all-.
And two, because being so open about the competitors also increases trust.

- Amazon example didn't add up to me

Amazon's example of appealing to both system one and system two with monthly and yearly subscription plans didn't convince me.
I don't necessarily believe that most low-K folks go for monthly and most high-K folks go for yearly.

- Video games are fun beyond the simple beginning

The pleasure of most video games doesn't disappear the moment that people start playing it.
In truth, many good video games get better after you start playing.

PROS

It's just the best overview I've read on how neuroscience is affecting marketing and consumers.

And I also appreciate:

- On-point science, addresses and well explains several pop-psychology myths that other books and authors either created, or fell for

From the "paradox of choice" to the "mirror neurons" the authors seem to be good and balanced scientists who crossed their Ts and dotted their Is.
And they also seem to have referenced several meta-analyses, rather than parroting debunked studies or jumping to conclusions based on low-power studies.

- A great mix of science, research descriptions, general principles, and real-life applications

A good mix of solid science, general marketing principles and best practices, and real-life applications from successful companies.

Maybe a bit more "how-tos" sub-chapters would have been perfect to make it all even more actionable.

- Systemic-level of analysis: they connect the dots, rather than hyping up dots

Many books simply list biases or "random facts of psychology", trying to "wow" the readers with fun-facts and random "fun experiments".
And I consider them semi-useless.

But Blindishgt's authors stand out as they really seem to have that good attitude of wanting to understand and explain beyond the micro "bias level" and go at a higher, systemic level to develop an actual theory and approach that you can use to both understand the world, and affect change in that world.

So they look at how different things fit together, and how seemingly opposing biases can be explained.

For example, they didn't just list "fluency" and "friction", but explained how these two seemingly opposing biases can co-exist. And they went on to explain how they can and should complement each other, with plenty of examples.

REVIEW

Blindsight is a fantastic book at the intersection of neuroscience, psychology, marketing, and persuasion.

What I liked is that compared to many other similar books it seeks to provide a systemic-level explanation and approach to that connects the various dots.

Plus, I also learned several new things, and it helped me to clear up a few things.

At the time of writing, I'm considering whether to add it to some of the "best books" lists on this website, especially the "best books on influence and persuasion" and potentially even the "best red pill book" because of its high-quality analysis on the addictiveness of social media.
And if I'll eventually make a "best marketing books" list, it will for sure feature very highly there.

And as a testament to how much I trusted the authors -as well as Ali Scarlett who first proposed and then molded it-, we also used their same template for our flagship course Power University.

Full Summary

About The Author:
Ali Scarlett is a bestselling author, entrepreneur, and avid researcher of the science of networking. He has studied the likes of professional sociologists, applied psychology researchers, and other business networking experts when defining his methods. He's also one of the main contributors to this website, Power University, and power dynamics as a discipline.

Introduction

Given that this is a book on mastering the art of networking, this book lays out the entire step-by-step process using the acronym MASTER:

1. Master the Power Dynamics
2. Adopt the Helpful Mindsets

3. Specialize the Basic Guidelines
4. Test the Networking Strategies
5. Enlist the Good Mentors
6. Realize the Present Opportunities

Ali recommends a growth mindset before continuing further and, with that, we're brought to Chapter 1.

Step #1: Master the Power Dynamics

#1: Your Social Success Hinges on the Stereotype Content Model (SCM)

> Scarlett: "So, when I was a nice guy, I had high warmth but low power. I had high warmth because I was always willing to give. But, by being willing to give everything to anyone, everyone felt like they had power over me and therefore saw me as low-power (cracking so many jokes for group acceptance didn't help their image of my worth, either)…When I became frustrated and turned into a bully, I was high-power. I was capable of harming anyone with no regrets about the consequences…But, my aggression made me low-warmth. I became the person nobody wants to cross, and intimidated people into distancing themselves from me because of it….if I could become high-power and high-warmth, I could be the person everyone wants to be around. I could fix my social life."

Albeit Ali's experiences with the SCM were extreme, this is generally true as a social life rule:

The more you can reach (and stay within) that high-power, high-warmth bracket, the more you'll be able to acquire important life assets such as status, resources, mates, or friends.

> Power Intelligence (PI): What Is it, How to Increase It

#2: Perceptions Are Reality

> Scarlett: "…perceptions are reality…In other words, even if I only developed the traits of a high-value man—even if I only looked and acted the part—I would still be perceived as one. This would be true even if I wasn't actually high-value yet (in the sense that I wasn't a billionaire, for instance). I would be what is referred to as a "high-quality man" in power dynamics."

This is the "Being VS Appearing" false dichotomy we often talk about here on this website.

In this case, the argument of whether or not it's better to be successful vs simply look successful deals with the visibility of the social currencies.

"Looking" successful refers to the external layers while "being" refers to the deeper layers.

Some people like to scoff at "appearing" and say that they value "being" far more.

However, both are valuable, as Ali also notes:

> Scarlett: "As an analogy, we could say that you are the product. You are selling yourself every time you network and look to build a relationship with someone new. The way you present yourself to the world is the marketing. The clothes you wear, the way you talk, walk, move, act, and carry yourself all determine whether or not people will want to buy—whether or not others will want to build a relationship with you. High-quality men market themselves as what is arguably the most valuable product in the networking world: high-value > (high-power) men. And, unfortunately, the high-value men who don't bother to work on their marketing at all and, as a result, look low-value (low-power) lose out on those opportunities. The very same opportunities that go straight to the high-quality men who were prepared because no one knows how good a product is until they actually experience using it. And, no one wants to buy a product that, because of bad marketing, looks like it could be a bad experience. So, naturally, they go for the people with the best marketing."

Being successful while looking unsuccessful does you little favors since people need to be willing to stick around long enough to learn how successful you are. And, people will rarely care to do that when you look objectively average (or less than).

#3: Defining Power

> Scarlett: "This is what I didn't understand at first. Even when I came to the realization that there were more forms of power than only money, I was still missing a large part of the point. The three forms of power in the world are not information, weaponry, and money, but information, weaponry, and resources. 'Resources' include money and connections."

Step #2: Adopt the Helpful Mindsets

#1. Better Networking Starts In the Mind

Here, Ali shares the "Foundations of the Mind" in the IMPROVE acronym:

1. Internalize the "I Can Change" Mindset
2. Master the Growth Mindset
3. Practice the Antifragile Ego
4. Obligate the Psychology of Finding Your Passion
5. Value the Art of Outcome Independence
6. Embrace the Science of Happiness and Optimism

#2. Decide on a WHY

Then, he dives into purpose, sharing the "Evolution of Your Why" framework:

1. Survival: taking action only to survive (pay for necessities of living). Some people never take their why to the next level, stopping here.

2. Status: taking action for the acquisition of status symbols and oftentimes social (and emotional) validation. It's not uncommon for people stop here in their WHY's evolution either.

3. Freedom: taking action to reach a point of financial freedom where one has such an abundance of money, all financial decisions are "minor things" and they never have to check their financial health to know they're still doing well. This is better than the previous two levels of WHY, but not quite as high as one's WHY can go.

4. Purpose: taking action to advance one's life mission. This is the highest level of one's WHY.

Step #3: Specialize the Basic Guidelines

#1. The Circle of Influence Rule

There are three elements to your circle of influence:

1. Your Support: family, friends, and the people you hold day-to-day interactions with.

2. Your Peers: the people you work with.

3. Your Mentor(s): the people who are farther ahead than you in your journey, who can pull you up to their level.

Scarlett recommends weeding out any members of each group who take more value from your life than they give and keeping (as well as adding) anyone who has proven themselves to be value-giving to your life and goals.

#2. The Immersion vs. Maintenance Rule

The idea is to keep a balance of the two:

> Scarlett: As an example, if you choose to immerse yourself fully in the work that generates an income for you, working two jobs, working sixty hours a week or whatever the case may be, it's best to keep your current network on maintenance. Follow up with them every now and then and stay in touch.
> Let's now say, for instance, that you choose to immerse yourself fully into networking. You're spending money on tools to help build your social media profiles, attending networking events, constantly sending cold emails and cold calling people you want to connect with, and so on. At that point, it would be best to put your other work on maintenance.
> You have to have both immersion and maintenance if you want any chance of being successful. The man who does not immerse himself in anything can end up a jack of all trades and a master of none. However, the man who immerses himself in two or more things overexerts himself and collapses mentally or physically before he can achieve any goal or accomplishment worth achieving.

#3. The WIIFT Rule

As we've shared here at The Power Moves, the three major byproducts of this law are that

1. To get what you want, you have to give others what they want

2. The most popular and powerful people are those with the most to give

3. Strong relationships have a balance of give and take (or at least, the people in them must feel they are balanced)

#4. The Fairness Principle

This section is only to further reinforce that taking as much as one can and leaving others with as little as possible is hardly a solid foundation for lasting success in life or in business (and that applies to relationship-building and networking as well).

However, Scarlett also notes that the law of social exchange is not to be confused with the "law of reciprocity." The law of reciprocity states that the more you give the more you will receive, but this is not always the case.

#5. The Integrity and Honesty Principle

Another note on the "Being vs Appearing" dichotomy (and the importance of raising one's value):

> Scarlett: "Faking it until you make it is sometimes dishonest if it's overdone. Becoming a high-quality individual is different from faking it until you make it. High-quality people have all of the traits that are the highest predictors of success and that pave the way to acquiring resources as well as status. Therefore, in many ways, they are high-value."

#6. The Service Principle

> Scarlett: "If you want to build connections with people you have to do just that: connect. One way to connect > with others is by giving value to them…Following the Service Principle means serving. The best way to do that is by giving value that makes others feel good."

As much as it's encouraged to give in today's self-help literature, Scarlett also shares that a "go-giver" attitude can be more than counter-productive, but also detrimental if one's isn't careful.

A note Scarlett shares from Dr. Tim Elmore:

"The starving baker spends so much time baking bread for others he forgets to eat and starves himself. It looks noble and is noble to keep giving, giving, giving. But just like I need to lead myself before I lead others, I need to feed myself before I feed others."

#7. The Growth Principle

The Growth Principle is about accepting learning opportunities, even if those opportunities require you to fail first before you can grow.

#8. The Patience Principle

An example Scarlett gives of this principle is holding yourself back from blowing up someone's email inbox with multiple back-to-back messages simply because they didn't respond within an hour.

Step #4: Test the Networking Strategies

> Scarlett: "Each networking situation may call for a different networking strategy. There is no one size fits all approach to connecting with anyone at any time. Luckily, there's a process you can use to formulate and craft your own networking strategy as the situation calls for it."

Scarlett calls this the "AIM approach":

1. Align Your Approach: choose your style of dominance (to come across high-power).

2. Identify Your Method: choose your style of networking (to reach and connect with your target contact—Scarlett shares a list of methods in this chapter).

3. Make Your Strategy: create a plan based on the styles you chose, information at your disposal, and contacts you already have access to.

Step #5: Enlist the Good Mentors

Expanding on the importance of mentors from the section on managing your "circle of influence", this chapter goes deeper into how to acquire mentors with this step-by-step approach for career-oriented folks:

- Step 1: Map Out Your Ideal Career Path
- Step 2: Seek Out the Right Mentor Who Has Mastered the Skill You Want to Develop
- Step 3: Get Connected to Your Mentor Candidates
- Step 4: Schedule a Meeting with Your Mentor Candidates
- Step 5: Ask Your Mentor Candidates the Right Questions
- Step 6: Turn Your Top Mentor Candidate Picks Into Mentors
- Step 7: Gratitude, Gratitude, Gratitude

Step #6: Realize the Present Opportunities

A couple of inspiring personal stories sharing wins and failures, as well as mindsets and virtues for moving forward.

Real-Life Applications

- Avoid saying "thank you for joining my network" because it frames you as doing all of the taking in the relationship: a better response would be "welcome to my network" (albeit, on LinkedIn, these days Ali simply says something like, "Great to connect").

CONS

- Missed opportunity for more value

The "Enlist the Good Mentors" chapter is great, and would've been even better if it contained a step-by-step process for business owners, entrepreneurs, and general businesspeople (rather than only career-oriented people seeking a job).

Especially, since it's typically those types of people who are most likely to have a need to connect with celebrities (such as in the prospect of securing celebrity promotion for their business).

However, Step 4 does cover a solid strategy that can also be used for acquiring mentors and Ali mentioned he aims to make this a new, official addition to this second edition of The Clever Connector before making it widely available on Amazon.

PROS

- Power-aware wisdom
- Unique mix of foundational self-development + foundational social strategies

Review

The Clever Connector is a unique gem in that it combines into one single book some of the best principles of self-development, power dynamics, and proven social strategies.

Ali Scarlett, an early joiner of The Power Moves, stands apart from most other authors because he can write from the vantage point of knowing the advanced social skills of power dynamics.
Albeit, it's often difficult to start with the more advanced material—especially when it was still so "raw" as when he first joined—Ali made the most out of it and then added his own flair to it.

It's that special skillset from its author that makes The Clever Connector stand apart from all the rest.

Exec Summary

- We need both order and change: social institutions and pre-existing processes served us well, but we also need to change them from time to time. Conservatives who tend to defend institutions and liberals who tend to attack them need to recognize the necessity of both, purge the extremists and psychopathic ideologues from their own ranks, and talk and agree with each other
- Learn to work with other people to develop solid, win-win interpersonal relationships, your mental well-being depends on it. See the "social exchange" to better understand Peterson's take on win-win and win-win value exchanges
- Address issues head-on, rather than pretending they don't exist, both in life, and in interpersonal relationships. Unaddressed issues sap your self-esteem and silent resentment poisons your mood
- Aim at something and work hard to achieve it because happiness, meaning, and fulfillment come from personal growth, from progressing on your goals, and from adding value to others and to society

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Jordan Peterson is a Canadian clinical psychologist and former professor of psychology at the University of Toronto.
He rose to fame when he objected to the Canadian's government imposition to address trans women as "she". Over time he moved more towards the political right and has become a militant of conservative and alt-right movements and, in part, for red-pill communities.
He is also the author of "Maps of Meaning" and "12 Rules for Life", for which this book is the sequel.

See here our take on Jordan Peterson's major personal change:

RULE 1 | Do not carelessly denigrate social institutions or creative achievement

The crux of this chapter is this:

The institutions in place have both a dark and bright side.
We must start recognizing that, and avoiding any extremism for or against institutions.
Institutions often add value or at least added value in the past, and they are necessary for social functioning as well as for individual psychological health.
However, they can turn tyrannical when those in power act selfishly, or stifling when they become unsuited for a changing world.

That means we do need to change our society and rules from time to time to adapt to new realities or to fix the rotten system.
But since systems that are in place are often in place because they worked and because they served us as well, we run the risk of undoing what's good, to make place for something that may work not as well -or even turn out to be disastrous-.
So we walk a tight line and, strike a balance between changing & reforming when it's needed, and keeping the system intact when it's working.

How do we do that?
With dialogue between the conservative, who tend to defend the status quo, and creative types (liberals), who tend to distrust authority, dislike rules, and seek change.
But both camps, the conservatives and liberals, must be open-minded to accept that both camps need each other, and both would ideally be able to recognize when the pendulum has swung too much in one direction.
Equally important, both need to make sure that they purge and do not give in to the toxic elements in their camps (and in themselves):

Why we need power-aware eagles on both sides

> The same is true of the knowledge of the shadow side of both.
> To manage complex affairs properly, it is necessary to be cold enough in vision to separate the power hungry and self-serving pseudoadvocate of the status quo from the genuine conservative; and the self-deceptive, irresponsible rebel without a cause from the truly creative. And to manage this means to separate those factors within the confines of one's own soul, as well as among other people.

These "eagles" are also aware of their own dark sides.
And the "reformative eagles" also aren't simple "rule breakers". Later in the book, Peterson says that those who break the rules ethically have mastered them first, understand the necessity of those rules, and break them in keeping with the spirit rather than the letter of the law.

Community and social ties are crucial to your well-being

We are social animals, and other people are crucial to our well-being:

> People exist among other people and not as purely individual minds.
> People remain mentally healthy not merely because of the integrity of their own minds, but because they are constantly being reminded how to think, act, and speak by those around them.

Jordan Peterson also assesses his clients along their social life, including:

- Do they have friends and a social life?
- A stable and satisfying intimate partnership?
- Close and functional familial relationships?

Humans organize in hierarchies (as all social animals do)

> Negotiation for position sorts organisms into the omnipresent hierarchies that govern access to vital resources such as shelter, nourishment, and mates. All creatures of reasonable complexity and even a minimally social nature have their particular place, and know it.

Peterson also suggests individuals within those hierarchies transact with each other based on "units of value":

> All social creatures also learn what is deemed valuable by other group members, and derive from that, as well as from the understanding of their own position, a sophisticated implicit and explicit understanding of value itself.

Humans are part of value-based exchanges

Those hierarchies serve to share and provide ordered access to what's valuable.

And everyone subconsciously knows about the hierarchies, and what's valuable.
They understand it "as if their survival and reproduction depend upon it" quips Peterson, because that's exactly all about survival and reproduction (de Waal & Suchak, 2010).

A good life means establishing win-win relationships

"Win-win" is how this website defines it, but it's exactly the same that Jordan Peterson refers to:

> The universal rules of fair play include the ability to regulate emotion and motivation while cooperating and competing in pursuit of the goal during the game (that is part and parcel of being able to play at all), as well as the ability and will to establish reciprocally beneficial interactions across time and situation
> (…) And life is not simply a game, but a series of games (…) The best player is therefore not the winner of any given game but, among many other things, he or she who is invited by the largest number of others to play the most extensive series of games.

Jordan Peterson here says that the successful player is the one that better goes along with others, and to whom others give more opportunity for win-win and value exchanges.
It's not a coincidence, says Peterson, that children before 3 years old, cannot make friends. It's because they don't know how to play the iterated game that sustains over time, which is exactly what friendship is.

To learn more about social and value exchanges, see:

- How the social exchange theory teaches you to socialize

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

Hierarchies are not purely based on dominance

As in the first book he famously used lobsters as an example of hierarchy and power, this time Jordan Peterson uses rats.

The bigger rat, he says, can beat the smaller ones the vast majority of times, but he cannot remain in the social structure if he abuses of that dominance.
The general rule, he says, is that albeit power and dominance are important, you can't base your personal success on the bullying of others:

> power is simply not a stable basis upon which to construct a hierarchy designed to optimally govern repeated interactions

This is also something we often repeated here at The Power Moves, and especially in the beginning, before we developed our own foundational strategies and philosophies.
Many guys came here looking for ways to "beat others", and we call that stage of self-development "dickhead-dom".
Dickhead-dom is a step forward compared to a passive, submissive, too nice guy. But it's far from optimal, and far from the best you can do.

As a matter of fact, Jordan Peterson says that alpha males among primates are more pro-social than lower-raking primates:

Alpha males among at least certain primate groups are far more prosocial than their lesser comrades. Power doesn't work for them, either.

Note: Jordan Peterson uses (confuses?) power for "dominance"
We agree in principle with Jordan Peterson and we're glad he's saying this because we've been reminding readers and students the same since we first started.
What he's referring to though is not to "power" in the larger sense of the word, but in "value-taking dominance".
To use instead the definitions of the originator of this concept, power through is value-adding power that is good for the individual, and does not bully or harass others. Power over instead is the value-taking dominance that is less likely to lead to individual success (Turner, 2005).
Or simply read here the simplified version:

- Power VS Dominance in leaders

To play well, then, you need to work on yourself and develop the right attitudes and (social) skills to well engage with others.
Ultimately, says Jordan Peterson, you should turn yourself into "the most desirable of players".
The most desirable of players gives value.

Note: we generally agree, but there are important exceptions
Albeit we agree in principle and we also agree this approach and mindset work for most people, most of the times -and especially in democracies and free societies-, there are also important exceptions.
It is possible to hold onto power with more dominance than value-giving, and it is possible to climb hierarchies without exactly being moral or fair.

For more on reaching and doing well at the top, see:

- Leadership 101

> Leadership 101: The Foundations of Good Leadership

Social Win-Win Requires Giving, But Also Power-Awareness

> Through friendship and collegial relationships we modify our selfish proclivities, learning not to always put ourselves first. Less obviously, but just as importantly, we may also learn to overcome our naive and too empathic proclivities (our tendency to sacrifice ourselves unsuitably and unjustly to predatory others) when our peers advise and encourage us to stand up for ourselves. In consequence, if we are fortunate, we begin to practice true reciprocity

Peterson here is telling us to become a giver who can establish win-win mutual giving to do well in life, but also reminds us that it's important not to be naive, because there are predatory takers who will not give back.

We call this attitude here "enlightened collaboration", and enlightened collaboration requires power awareness, including knowledge and know-how of the "dark side" of human nature as well as the ability to spot and recognize those takers:

- Enlightened win-win

https://thepowermoves.com/enlightened-collaborator

RULE 2 | Imagine who you could be, and then aim single-mindedly at that

In this chapter Peterson focuses on the importance of self-development.

Particularly, he focuses on personal self-development.
Other self-help authors may call the imaginary version of yourself your "best possible self", including ethics and morals, and then aiming at that.

Peterson also stresses the importance of facing the difficulties of life head-on for personal development (and draws from the Biblical story of Exodus).

From snakes to humans as "bigger evils"

Working on "who you could be" isn't just an adventure in the real world: it's an adventure in the "world within", of self-awareness, including, and may be especially, your dark side.

Ethics and morals are an important part of Peterson's journey of self-development, and they can't be complete until we learn and master the "devil within".
It took humans millennia to even reach that level of conceptualization, he says:

> At some point in our evolutionary and cultural history, we began to understand that human evil could rightly be considered the greatest of all snakes. So, the symbolic progression might be (1) snake as evil predator, then (2) external human enemy as snake/evil/predator, then (3) subjective, personal, or psychological darkness/vengefulness/deceit as snake/evil/predator. Each of these representations, which took untold centuries, perhaps millennia to conceptualize, constitute a tangible increase in the sophistication of the image of evil

RULE 3 | Do not hide unwanted things in the fog

This chapter exhorts people to:

1. Face and discuss interpersonal problems early on, rather than ignoring negative additions. Admit it to yourself, first, that there is an issue, even if that issue may make you look “bad”. And then address them with those who are involved

2. Find our what you truly want, instead of hiding it out of fear of not achieving it

Generally speaking, the closer your relationship and the more common the problem, the more important it is to address them.
If an issue happens daily, no matter how small it is, it adds up -in social power dynamics we call this concept “death by a thousand cuts”-. So you want to clarify it early on, lest you start disliking someone for a small pebble.

The solution?
Speak up:

> Your strategy, under such conditions? Show your disappointment whenever someone close to you makes you unhappy; allow yourself the luxury and pleasure of resentment when something does not go your way; ensure that the person who has transgressed against you is frozen out by your disapproval; force them to discover with as much difficulty as possible exactly what they have done to disappoint you;

RULE 4 | Notice that opportunity lurks where responsibility has been abdicated

This chapter in short says:

The failings and undone work of other people can be an opportunity fo you to pick up the slack, do it, learn more, and become more indispensable and more valuable.
And everyone wins, including you personally.

Says Peterson:

> If you want to become invaluable in a workplace—in any community—just do the useful things no one else is doing. Arrive earlier and leave later than your compatriots. Organize what you can see is dangerously disorganized. Work, when you are working, instead of looking like you are working. And finally, learn more about the business—or your competitors—than you already know. Doing so will make you invaluable—a veritable lynchpin.

It’s also a reminder of the importance of “reframing”, to not complain about other people’s failings, but to try to look at them -and turn them- into opportunities.
Peterson says whenever you think that the “world is not set right”, that’s your cue that you may have a destiny to fulfill: to make the world just a little better -or, “less wrong”-.
Anger and outrage are doorways to meaning and destiny. It’s up to you to turn them into positive missions, rather than keeping stuck at complaining mode (note: the author seems to have fallen himself for anger and outrage mode sometimes with his Twitter behavior).

Treat yourself and your partner well: today is an opportunity for a better tomorrow

Treat your partner well, because it’s also best for you:

> You can treat your husband or wife any old way right now, this moment, no matter how horrid and thoughtless that way might be, but you are going to wake up with him or her tomorrow, and next month, and a decade from now (and, if not that person, then someone else equally unfortunate). If you treat the person you are committed to in a manner that does not work when it is repeated across time, then you are playing a degenerating game, and you are both going to suffer terribly for it. This problem is not materially different from failing to make peace with your future self. The consequences are identical.

"Future self" refers to the almost infinite iterations of "future you".
While a selfish individual does what's best for him and him only right now, he fails to consider "future him".
Does who take into account "future him" instead are a step closer to taking into account those who are close to him as part of "future him" and "future us".

Yet another genius intuition and way of looking at cooperation that I hadn't thought of, and must thank Peterson for.

The author also says that we can't really escape from being bound with "future ourselves", because we subconsciously feel bad when we know we're not doing what we should be doing and what's best for us.
My note: I partially agree here and many people's present happiness, satisfaction, and well-being is tied to how they treat their future selves. But there are also some people who either don't care much about their future selves, or simply care more about "present themselves".

A great quote from this chapter:

> Your life becomes meaningful in precise proportion to the depths of the responsibility you are willing to shoulder. That is because you are now genuinely involved in making things better. You are minimizing the unnecessary suffering. You are encouraging those around you, by example and word. You are constraining the malevolence in your own heart and the hearts of others.

RULE 5 | Do not do what you hate

The rule makes sense… On paper.

And it says that you better not submit to what's "wrong" of you do, and that it's your moral duty to stand up to what's unjust.
This is also an important principle we added to our Start Here page.

Unluckily, in Beyond Order, this chapter becomes Jordan's Peterson tirade against the current culture of feminism, identity politics, political correctness, etc.

His example of fighting the culture of identity politics takes up 99% of "not doing what you hate".
Frankly, I don't like identity politics, but I'm also tired of those who can't stop complaining about it.
Doesn't JP realize that complaining about only thread-expands it?

Finally, the character he brings as an example of "fighter" goes from lay-off to lay-off, and albeit Jordan Peterson sub-communicates she's the hero who keeps fighting, one may even wonder if she's not that annoying character who always has to find an excuse to complain and pester people and superiors.

RULE 6 | Abandon ideology

Another genius chapter with which we couldn't agree more.

Rile 6 describes the danger of attributing the cause of complex individual and social problems to single variables such as sex, class, or power, and how dangerously persuasive these ideologies can become to the masses.

TPM's philosophy also includes individualism and a possible life stage of rebellion as a way to self-discovery as an important step to becoming ideology-resistant.
What we call "enlightened individualism" is both a fundamental step toward self-empowerment, and a necessity against what Robert Greene calls the "downward pull of the group".

A good general rule of thumb to spot ideologies is that a certain group tends to take all the blame, while in truth, says Peterson, "no group guilt should be assumed".
Says the author:

> Such division of the world into the devil without and the saint within justifies self-righteous hatred—necessitated by the morality of the ideological system itself. This is a terrible trap: Once the source of evil has been identified, it becomes the duty of the righteous to eradicate it. This is an invitation to both paranoia and persecution.

The answer?
Start with your own self-development, and looking at yourself first:

> It is much more psychologically appropriate (and much less dangerous socially) to assume that you are the enemy—that it is your weaknesses and insufficiencies that are damaging the world—than to assume saintlike goodness on the part of you and your party, and to pursue the enemy you will then be inclined to see everywhere.

Ideologues are power-seeking manipulators

Ideologues are fundamentalists, but potentially more dangerous than fundamentalists for their fake appeal to rationality:

> Ideologues are the intellectual equivalent of fundamentalists, unyielding and rigid. Their self-righteousness and moral claim to social engineering is every bit as deep and dangerous. It might even be worse: ideologues lay claim to rationality itself. So, they try to justify their claims as logical and thoughtful.

It works like this:

1. Come up with simplified abstractions to demonize and complain against

The ideologue selects a few abstractions that over-simplify extraordinarily diverse and complex phenomena. Some examples include “the environment,” “the patriarchy,” “the feminized society,” “the rich,” “the poor,” “the oppressed,” and “the oppressors.”

This approach, says Peterson, is attractive to incompetent and corrupt intellectuals who are smart, but lazy.
The first joiners also tend to be smart, and cynicism and arrogance also help.
And then all the rest are simply the following sheep.

2. Frame yourself as the “good hero” fighting the holy war, and your supporters as “good but oppressed”

The ideologue wants to keep the problem simple, which helps make an emotional appeal that hides his own darker motives and personality:

> Since the ideologue can place him or herself on the morally correct side of the equation without the genuine effort necessary to do so validly, it is much easier and more immediately gratifying to reduce the problem to something simple and accompany it with an evildoer, who can then be morally opposed.

While the idelogue places himself on the side of the “morally right”, he does the same for the of people he recruits, which are either victims, or innocent, or unjustly denied some rights.

3. Come up with a semi-logically sounding theory that explains everything (especially why the losers are losers because of that other mean group or system)

> Next, the faux theorist spins a post-hoc theory in which every phenomenon, no matter how complex, can be considered a secondary consequence of his new system.
> The a school of thought that emerge propagate the methods of this algorithmic reduction and tacitly or > explicitly demonize those who refuse to adopt the new beliefs and worldviews.

Please note that the theory mustn't always and necessarily be (all) wrong.
Sometimes, it can start from at least a few good observations or even start with some genius insights.
For example, Marx and Freud (read more on Freud's dark leadership here).

4. Come up with terminology for your theory to make it sound more credible, to make people feel like insiders, and to keep the critics at bay

> If an impenetrable vocabulary accompanies the theory, so much the better. It will then take potential critics some valuable time even to learn to decode the arguments.

5. Recruit losers who want a new ideology that explains why they're losers and offers them hope for change

> Their followers, desperate to join a potentially masterable new dominance hierarchy (the old one being cluttered by its current occupants), become enamored of that story. While doing so, being less bright than those they follow, they subtly shift "contributed to" or "affected" to "caused."

5. Frame your theory as "teaching", "knowledge" or "improvement"

> The new adherents will be taught that mastering such a game constitutes education, and will learn to criticize alternative theories, different methods, and increasingly, even the idea of fact itself.

6. Shift your ideology to match the followers' needs

> The originator(s), gratified by the emergence of followers, start to shift their story in that direction as well.

But even if the originator objects, says Peterson, the cult has already begun.

7. Welcome to the cult

> And there is a conspiratorial aspect that rapidly comes to pervade the school where such "education" occurs, and where such activity is increasingly all that is permitted: Do not criticize the theory—and do not get singled out.

RULE 8 | Work as hard as you possibly can on at least one thing and see what happens

Make a goal, choose something to aim at, and then work hard to obtain it.

5 Things to work hard at Jordan Peterson also makes a list of what's generally worth committing to, and working hard at:

1. Character
2. Love
3. Family
4. Friendship
5. Career

Peterson even says “perhaps in that order”.
The author even implies, or outright states, that committing to one single partner is a superior choice, and one may see that also as an example of Peterson’s conservative-leaning preferences.

RULE 8 | Try to make one room in your home as beautiful as possible

This rule is the follow-up, or more advanced version, of “clean your room” from his previous 12 Rules for Life book.

RULE 9 | If old memories still upset you, write them down carefully and completely

To fix the present, sometimes you want to analyze your past.

Often people don’t repress memories, but rather “push them away” by occupying their minds with something else.
And traumatized people don’t even understand what befell them.
But for both, the solutions is often in a deeper analysis, rather than in avoidance or “blissful ignorance”.

The example is an author’s former patient. The patient had an extremely naive view of people and the world as good actors, in a good place.
Eventually, he met a boyfriend who actively wanted to harm him. The experience might have seemed bad, but banal enough to overlook. Instead, it was exactly by analyzing it that he was able to diagnose his issue, and address it by finally becoming an adult who can accept the evil in the world.

Says Peterson of this patient’s personal growth and empowerment as he grappled and accepted human’s dark side, including his own:

> His face had hardened. He looked older and wiser. I had seen this happen frequently in my clinical practice when people incorporated the darker parts of themselves, instead of—let us say—compartmentalizing them. They no longer had the habitual look of deer caught in the headlights. They looked like people from whom decisions emanated, rather than people to whom things merely happened.

RULE 10 | Plan and work diligently to maintain the romance in your relationship

Romance and dating are skills, and you must work to develop them, and insert them into your relationship:

> Let us try thinking about it this way, instead: Neither of you have any skill at dating. One attempt is therefore going to be insufficient. Maybe you need fifteen dates—or forty—because you have lost the knack, need the practice, and must develop the habit and goodwill. Perhaps neither of you are very romantic to begin with; or if you were once, those days have long gone. This is a skill you must learn, not an unearned gift from Cupid.

Trust trumps cynicism and is a necessity for intimacy

> Trust in turn trumps cynicism, and true trust is not naivete. Trust between people who are not naive is a form of courage, because betrayal is always a possibility (…)
> To trust is to invite the best in your partner to manifest itself, with yourself and your freely given trust as the enticement.
> This is a risky business, but the alternative is the impossibility of true intimacy, and the sacrifice of what could have been two minds in dialogue working in tandem to address the difficult problems of life for a single mind striving in solitude.

Relationships based on dominance are poor and tenuous, best to set up win-wins

Peterson says that there are three fundamental states of social beings:

1. Tyranny (you do what I want)
2. Slavery (I do what you want)
3. Negotiation: it may seem more difficult in the short term, especially when you have enough power to be a tyrant. But it's the best for the long run, including for you

Peterson says something that we repeated here several times and we also agree with: tyranny may seem good for the tyrant, but is often not the best situation, not even for the tyrant himself.
Tyrants automatically make others slaves, and, in Peterson's words, "slaves take any and all chances whatsoever available to them to take revenge on their tyrants, who will, in consequence, find themselves cursed and damaged by their slaves."

The captain and co-captain relationship set-up

On the dating sections of this website we generally recommend going for a "captain and co-captain" relationship setup.

The man as the captain, who elevates her to a co-captain role, investing her with responsibility and respect to make her own decisions, chip in, and be part of the decision-making.
And with an open-minded enough captain to admit when he's mistaken and ready to go with the co-captain's preferences and decisions if they turn out to be better.

RULE 11 | Do not allow yourself to become resentful, deceitful, or arrogant

This chapter starts with the premise that you'd have plenty of reasons to be resentful, deceitful, and arrogant.

But you also plenty of reasons not to.

And it's your responsibility not to let the world and its challenges make you a worse person.
The antidote, says Peterson, is to have more faith and to focus on the positives, on self-development, and on contribution:

> The right attitude to the horror of existence—the alternative to resentment, deceit, and arrogance—is the assumption that there is enough of you, society, and the world to justify existence. That is faith in yourself, your fellow man, and the structure of existence itself: the belief that there is enough to you to contend with existence and transform your life into the best it could be.

RULE 12 | Be grateful in spite of your suffering

Jordan Peterson regards suffering as an inevitability -an inevitability exaggerated by malevolence-.

But, he says, he believes even believe even more deeply in the ability to transcend suffering, psychologically and practically.
And in people's ability to constrain malevolence, both in themselves, in others, and in the world.

Go through the darkness, to strengthen your light

At level of beliefs:

> It is easy to be optimistic and naive. It is easy for optimism to be undermined and demolished, however, if it is naive, and for cynicism to arise in its place. But the act of peering into the darkness as deeply as possible reveals a light that appears unquenchable, and that is a profound surprise, as well as a great relief.

But also at a more practical level in social and life effectiveness:

> It protects us, as well. If you fail to understand evil, then you have laid yourself bare to it. You are susceptible to its effects, or to its will. If you ever encounter someone who is malevolent, they have control over you in precise proportion to the extent that you are unwilling or unable to understand them. Thus, you look in dark places to protect yourself, in case the darkness ever appears, as well as to find the light. There is real utility in that.

Yep, we agree with that.
And it's one of the reasons why we believe that learning power dynamics is essential in life. And even more crucial to anyone who wants to succeed while also adding value.

MORE WISDOM

Drop the heavy-cynicism to fly higher

On this website we say that a certain dose of cynicism is helpful to avoid falling for the naive outlook on life.
However, too much cynicism is harmful.
Peterson shares a great example of how abandoning over-cynicism changed a man's life for the better:

> He had ceased criticizing what he was doing or himself for doing it, deciding instead to be grateful and seek out whatever opportunities presented themselves right there before him. He made up his mind to become more diligent and reliable and to see what would happen if he worked as hard at it as he could. He told me, with an uncontrived smile, that he had been promoted three times in six months.
> The young man had come to realize that every place he might find himself in had more potential than he might first see (particularly when his vision was impaired by the resentment and cynicism he felt from being near the bottom).
> (…)

> the young man who had something to say to me was thrilled with what had happened to him. His status concerns had been solidly and realistically addressed by his rapid career advance, and the additional money he was making did not hurt, either. He had accepted, and therefore transcended, his role as a beginner. He had ceased being casually cynical about the place he occupied in the world and the people who surrounded him, and accepted the structure and the position he was offered. He started to see possibility and opportunity, where before he was blinded, essentially, by his pride. He stopped denigrating the social institution he found himself part of and began to play his part properly. And that increment in humility paid off in spades.

https://thepowermoves.com/positive-cynicism

Ambition equals not power hungry: ambitious is good

> Ambition is often—and often purposefully—misidentified with the desire for power, and damned with faint praise, and denigrated, and punished. And ambition is sometimes exactly that wish for undue influence on others. But there is a crucial difference between sometimes and always. Authority is not mere power, and it is extremely unhelpful, even dangerous, to confuse the two.
> (…)
> Those who are power hungry—tyrannical and cruel, even psychopathic—desire control over others so that every selfish whim of hedonism can be immediately gratified;
> (…)
> When people wield authority, by contrast, they do so because of their competence—a competence that is spontaneously recognized and appreciated by others, and generally followed willingly, with a certain relief, and with the sense that justice is being served.
> (…)
> good people are ambitious (and diligent, honest, and focused along with it) instead because they are possessed by the desire to solve genuine, serious problems. That variant of ambition needs to be encouraged in every possible manner.

Peterson goes ahead to say that it's cruel and bad for everyone when people equate ambition and a drive to achieve with power hunger and selfishness.
And he also adds, as we agree, that power may accompany authority and "perhaps, must". We agree that yes, it must, or else it's much better for the leader and his goal, else he wouldn't much leverage if at all.

Trust against the possibility of betrayal requires courage, but it's necessary for win-win and human connections

Trust, says Persons, but of the "mature and tragic sort".
The naive person believes because he thinks everyone is trustworthy. The person who has "truly lived" knows better:

> Someone with experience knows that people are capable of deception and willing to deceive. That knowledge brings with it an arguably justified pessimism about human nature, personal and otherwise, but it also opens the door to another kind of faith in humanity: one based on courage, rather than naivete. I will trust you—I will extend my hand to you—despite the risk of betrayal, because it is possible, through trust, to bring out the best in you, and perhaps in me. So, I will accept substantial risk to open the door to cooperation and negotiation. And even if you do betray me, in a not-too unforgivable manner (assuming a certain degree, shall we say, of genuine apology and contrition on your part), I will continue to extend my hand. And part of the way I will do that is by telling you what I am feeling.

Strength in the face of adversity and death is a favor you make to the others

People tend to feel guilty on their deathbeds for the grief and trouble they will cause those left behind.

This is a burden I often felt myself: I had a strong drive to explore and take risks to learn adn grow in life.
But I was sometimes more worried about the pain I'd cause my family if something happened.

So I totally agree with Jordan Peterson when he says that "to collapse in the aftermath of a tragic loss is, therefore, more accurately a betrayal of the person who has died, instead of a tribute".

A strictly individualistic ethic is harmful to the individual as well

The idea here is that looking after yourself means looking up for countless forms of "future you", which is also a form of kindness and giving.

Says Peterson:

> That means that if you are treating yourself properly, you must consider your repetition across time. You are destined to play a game with yourself today that must not interfere with the game you play tomorrow, next month, next year, and so on. Thus, narrow selfishness is destined to be nonproductive. It is for this reason, among others, that a strictly individualist ethic is a contradiction in terms. There is in fact little difference between how you should treat yourself—once you realize that you are a community that extends across time—and how you should treat other people.
> In a marriage, for example, you face the same problem with your marital partner as you do with yourself: You are stuck with the consequences of an iterating game.

Genius concept.

Real-Life Applications

Power Protect Your Boss & Higher Status People

> t is said, with much truth, that genuine communication can take place only between peers. This is because it is very difficult to move information up a hierarchy. Those well positioned (and this is a great danger of moving up) have used their current competence—their cherished opinions, their present knowledge, their current skills—to stake a moral claim to their status. In consequence, they have little motivation to admit to error, to learn or change—and plenty of reason not to. If a subordinate exposes the ignorance of someone with greater status, he risks humiliating that person, questioning the validity of the latter's claim to influence and status, and revealing him as incompetent, outdated, or false. For this reason, it is very wise to approach your boss, for example, carefully and privately with a problem (and perhaps best to have a solution at hand—and not one proffered too incautiously).

This is an example of what we refer to here as "power protecting", and it's indeed a very good idea to power protect those above you, lest they come to resent, dislike you, and potentially enemies who want to get rid of you.

QUOTES

On conforming VS rebelling:

> the ability to conform unquestioningly trumps the inability to conform. However, the refusal to conform when the social surround has become pathological—incomplete, archaic, willfully blind, or corrupt—is something of even higher value, as is the capacity to offer creative, valid alternatives.

On shutting up when you haven't yet done the work to speak up:

> Now, there is nothing wrong, in principle, with the expression of concern for planet-wide issues. That is not the point. There is something wrong, however, with overestimating your knowledge of such things—or perhaps even considering them—when you are a mid-twenty-year-old with nothing positive going on in your life and you are having great difficulty even getting out of bed. Under those conditions, you need to get your priorities straight, and establishing the humility necessary to attend to and solve your own problems is a crucial part of doing just that.

On the importance, but also on the inherent risks of dating:

> Who dares wins —if he does not perish. And who wins also makes himself irresistibly desirable and attractive, not least because of the development of character that adventure inevitably produces

On the importance of aiming at something:

> If you aim at nothing, you become plagued by everything

On ideologies' "reductionism":

> This is because "sexuality" (like any multifaceted single term) can be defined as tightly or as loosely as necessary by those who use it for comprehensively explanatory purposes.
> No matter how defined, sex is a crucially important biological phenomenon—key to complex life itself—and its influence may therefore be genuinely detected or plausibly invented in any important field of endeavor and then exaggerated (while other factors of significant import are diminished in importance). In this manner, the single explanatory principle can be expanded indefinitely, in keeping with the demands placed upon it.
> Marx did the same thing when he described man in a fundamentally economic, class-based manner, and history as the eternal battleground of bourgeoisie and proletariat. Everything can be explained by running it through a Marxist algorithm.
> There is, of course—as in the case of Freud—some value in Marx's observations. (…) Regardless of its hypothetical virtues, however, the implementation of Marxism was a disaster everywhere it was attempted (…) Ideological reduction of that form is the hallmark of the most dangerous of pseudo-intellectuals.

CRITICISM

Sometimes it's naive self-help (yes, we said that)

This is an important criticism.

And it's not like Jordan Peterson goes full-on, naive.

And yet, at times, it's slightly more on the naive side.

For example, he implies that in "healthy organizations" people advance on merit and competence, and seems to imply that merit alone, or merit preponderantly, decides who advances.
To being with, we say here that these "ideal organizations" may as well be a minority. And two, even in ideal organizations, people's psychology doesn't cease to matter. People still prefer to promote those they like, those they are friends with -or at least those who aren't enemies with-, those who support them -or at least those who don't disempower and undermine them, which may also happen by mistake when a competent individual is clueless, and those who know how to play the political game.

As the Harvard Business Review says, politics are inherent to any human organization.

Another example: when Jordan Peterson promotes value-giving and win-win as the "almost only" viable strategies to succeed, he is not fully describing reality.
He suggests so, for example, when he says that dominance and power don't work and that rats -and some alpha male primates- also need to be "nice" and pro-social.

Again, we don't disagree: we embrace that strategy indeed -not only for moral reasons, but also because for most people and situations, it also works better.

But we must recognize there are different approaches that can also lead to the very top.

Jordan Peterson is more on the naive side because he does not give enough weight, space, and recognition to the value-taking strategies, which can also be successful to achieve certain goals.
Or, for that matter, he fails to recognize the more Machiavellian approach: to pretend to be a value-giver, but to instead play for selfish reasons only, and to manipulate others for personal gain, or to backstab and cheat as soon as the payoff is big enough.

As well, there is of course a grey area and a general value-giver can at times be a value taker and manipulate others.

Naive in the solutions, too.
Sometimes Peterson's solutions are naive in that they may reveal too much, or maybe assertive at the wrong times, and with the wrong people -in Power University we teach and show that not everyone deserves your honest assertiveness-.
Or too vulnerable. For example, he recommends approaching an intimate partner like this:

> I feel isolated and lonely and hurt, and cannot help but feel that you have not been as attentive to me over the last few months as I would have liked or that might have been best for us as a couple. But I am unsure if I am just imagining all this because I am upset or if I am genuinely seeing what is going on.

I'm afraid that a man talking like that to a woman would lose a lot of respect -and even attraction-.
It's not just about what's effective at surfacing issues, it's also about what's effective in general, and what serves your (and your partner) best interests over the long run.
And losing respect doesn't serve anyone's interest.

Peterson is on a cultural warpath, but I don't want to be dragged into it

Several chunks of the book feel a lot like conservative trading against current culture.

Frankly, I'm F* tired of "identity politics", "PC", feminism, etc., etc. But even more tired of those who can't stop complaining about it.

And yes, if we look at the arguments, JP is (largely, albeit not always 100%) right.
It's stupid to spend hours talking about how to call a flipchart in a way that is not derogatory to this or that group, and yet… If it's a waste of time to discuss that nonsense, isn't it also a waste of my time to complain, dissect, and tirade against how stupid that is?

I don't want to spend my time thread-expanding on stupidity.

And I recommend TPM readers to do the same.
Also read:

- Making of the ubermensch

https://thepowermoves.com/enlightened-individualism

Jordan Peterson is no voice of reason anymore: he's a biased conservative on a warpath, and it shows in Beyond Order

… Unluckily.

We like Jordan Peterson's work here, and there is an important philosophical overlap with TPM.

However, we preferred Jordan Peterson when he was a free-thinking man, and not associated with any ideology. Now, as much as he criticizes ideology, he has joined a rather conservative group as a militant.

It's a pity, because his rules are on point, but he sometimes doesn't realize how he's failing or warping his own rules with his new bias.
For example, in discussing ideologies, he brings feminism as an example and patriarchy as an example of a dangerous reduction of complexity that vilifies all men. True, he's right. But why not add that some men are doing the same with women? Now, with both camps, we'd have a level-headed rule. With just one side, it reeks of bias.

And he pretty much said so himself:

- Jordan Peterson has gone alt-right

A tendency for negativity

There seems to be a certain bent toward negativity and pessimism in Peterson's writing.

For example, Jordan Peterson sees the suffering in life as inevitable.

Maybe it's inevitable that someone will experience periods of suffering.
But why not underlying that, sometimes, it's about periods, rather than whole lives?

Also, the way he always exaggerated the adjectives around "suffering" and "pain' threads-expands and increases the pain, but he rarely does the same for, say, joy and pleasure.
Take this example in the coda:

> the COVID-19 pandemic have rendered everyone's life tragic in an unimaginable manner

Covid made everyone's life tragic in an unimaginable manner?
Frankly, this way of talking makes me angry because it uneededly makes people feel worse. Was Covid "tragic"? Uniginably so? For everyone?

Because I personally traveled more during covid that in any other time. Even while “stuck” in South Korea I have made some of my best memories, including a great love story, and meeting one of my best friends -to this day one of my best friends-.
And I’m certainly not alone. I’m sure thousands of people met the love of their life during lockdowns, or got married, or started a family. And also have friends of entrepreneurs whose businesses boomed during covid.

So, in short, Peterson’s negativity sometimes expands so much, that it becomes ridiculous and patently false. There is enough negativity in the world that we don’t need anyone to expand on it.

“Persuasion Frames” to sell the author’s narrative all throughout

If you’re aware of power dynamics, advanced persuasion techniques, and frame control, you can spot that the author is out to convince the readers, rather than simply lay out facts.

fTor example:

> The biblical story of Exodus is properly regarded as archetypal (or paradigmatic or foundational) by psychoanalytic and religious thinkers alike because it presents an example of psychological and social transformation that cannot be improved upon “Cannot be improved upon” is an extremely bold sentence.

How can anyone say something like that?
So to justify such a claim, the author covertly borrows a whole group’s high credibility -the “psychoanalytic thinkers”- to land authority to his assertion and gain the readers’ trust (we call it “power borrowing” here).
The “big words”, such as ” psychological and social transformation” also serve to increase his authority by self-framing as highly intelligent, well-learned, and scientific -the type of source you want to listen to-.
The “because” serves as a keyword of persuasiveness, and to smoothly package the whole sentence together to raise as little pushback as possible.

Over-reads into stories

I personally have the feeling that Peterson tends to over-read into stories, be they biblical, or commercial.

And Peterson being highly intelligent, he can easily “see” anything he wants to see into any story, and then spin a nice narrative that “kind of makes sense”. Or, at least, that sounds nice enough that people want to believe it.
But is the story itself that says what Peterson interprets it to say, or is it Peterson that invested the story with all that extra meaning? I sometimes had to wonder if it was the latter.

He even says that stories precede and, he seems to suggest, are superior science when it comes to “accuracy”:

> Thus, if we naturally construe the world as a story, then perhaps the world is most accurately, or at least most practically, construed as a story (and accurate and practical are not so easy to distinguish). You might argue, contrarily, that the scientific view of the world is more accurate, in some sense, and that the scientific view is not fundamentally a story. But, as far as I can tell, it is still nested inside a story: one that goes something like “careful and unbiased pursuit of the truth will make the world a better place for all people, reducing suffering, extending life, and producing wealth.”

Peterson is smart, so he foresaw the possible criticism of stories being unscientific, and made that note to include, address, and pre-emptively defuse the criticism.
However, he fails to make a good case, in my opinion. Science is science, and it’s not “nested” into any story. Or, if it is, that has no bearing whatsoever in science’s power to describe and predict reality as compared to a story.

Puts his morality above science, reality, or perfectly normal psychology

Jordan Peterson is a conservative.

And, among other things, he prefers people to stay married.

That's fine.

However, he sometimes lets his own preference taint his analyses.
For example, in an imaginary dialogue with a married man having an affair, he says:

> You are fifty. You have this twenty-four-year-old, and she is willing to break up your marriage. What is she thinking? Who must she be? What does she know?"
> "Well, I am really attracted to her."
> "Yes, but she has a personality disorder. Seriously, because what the hell is she doing with you, and why is she willing to break up this marriage?"
> "Well, she does not care if I stay married."
> "Oh, I see. So, she does not want to have an actual relationship with someone, with any degree of long-term permanency. Somehow that is going to work out well for you, is it?

I find it nasty that he slaps a woman who happens to be attracted to an older man with a label of "having a personality disorder".
It's an authority power move to slap someone with a final, unappealable label of "wrong", "not right", and "not worthy".

In that analysis, he also puts his morality, his ideals of "proper behavior" and his "respect for the institution of marriage", above what are in truth very normal drives and normal intersexual dynamics that are perfectly in line and predictable with simple evolutionary psychology (so you'd expect better by a psychologist).

Please note that this is NOT to say that an affair is "OK" or to be encouraged.
Quite the opposite: one may still dissuade her or him to consume, or to stick, with that affair. What is wrong though is to do so on the basis of personality disorder, or of categorical "right and wrong" that make people feel defective for having drives and desires that are perfectly normal.

CONS

- Some covert self-promotion:

If you check the forum for "Tony Robbins" you'll find why sometimes we call him the "king of self-promotion". Turns out, Peterson is not that far off sometimes, and certainly not foreign to covert self-promotion himself. At times, it can get grating.

- Stop with the rules now, please

I quote a public (negative) review of Beyond Order:

> Twelve MORE rules?
> Wasn't the whole point to create twelve basic rules for life?
> Any charlatan can make up rules "don't put your finger in a light socket," "don't spend more than you save," "if it's pink in the middle it's cooked to little" – but Peterson had invented Twelve Rules – not more, not less – it was a brilliant distillation, awe-inspiring in its simplicity.
> Now Peterson was adding twelve MORE rules.
> What was going on? What, if anything, would stop an endless proliferation of rules? Are there 12 more rules coming? 24 more? Only God knows! If Peterson can just make up more rules, willy-nilly, it might as well be > 10,000 rules.

Albeit I may put it differently, I also agree that “adding more” is an easy pitfall to fall for.
Good “general principles”, should be few and limited.

As well:

- Some rules make less sense than others

We don’t believe much in “rules” and “laws” on this website as most things are contextual.

However, that’s not to say that “rules” are useless, or that there are no generalizable principles.

Still some of these Peterson’s rules seem too specific to me to be generalized to abstract principles.

For example, Jordan Peterson says to write down what bothers you, which makes sense… Sometimes.
But some other times, people may have too big a tendency to dwell in the past, and they may find more benefits in letting go and moving on.

- A(another) case of “rules” as chapter titles and unconnected chapter content

For example, artists and artists’ role in society, is under “make your room as beautiful as possible”.
And parents’ mistake in over-protecting children, together with lengthy examples from both his clinical practices and the omnipresent stories, is under the rule “Do not allow yourself to become resentful, deceitful, or arrogant”.

- Christianity is not the basis of cooperation

How can such a smart guy believe that such a relatively recent, cultural impact, has shaped human’s tendency for cooperation?
It’s either bias, or self-manipulation.
Human ability for cooperation predates any religion.
Also see “The Origins of Virtue“.

- Sometimes feels a bit egocentric and too self-referential

Not necessarily egocentric in the sense of narcissistic, albeit at times I wished he cut his own references short, but in the sense of basing too much of theory on his own life experience.
And, any life often being limited to draw a large-enough amount of data -ie.: he only has 2 children and only observed 1 granddaughter, he can’t generalize too much-, it feels like Jordan Peterson sometimes relies on personal anecdotes.

- A professional narrator might have been better

He’s a great reader, with great intonation, but sometimes maybe just a little bit too high-pitched.

- Negotiations tips aren’t always the best possible angle

I’m nitpicking now and looking at this from a social strategist’s point of view.
But this approach to your boss is not optimal:

> And then, if you want to negotiate for a raise, or more autonomy—or more free time, for that matter—you can go to your boss and say, “Here are ten things that were crying out to be done, each of them vital, and I am now doing all of them. If you help me out a bit, I will continue. I might even improve. And everything, including your life, will improve along with me.” And then, if your boss has any sense—and sometimes bosses do—then your negotiation will be successful. That is how such things work.

The concept is correct, 100%, and we totally agree with the approach of finding leverage through value giving. However, that pitch is slightly confrontational and disempowering, and many bosses with an ego -and more than sometimes bosses do have an ego, just like everyone else-, will want to deny you just to re-assert their power and to avoid being one-upped.

See Power University for better approaches.

PROS

Again, so much genius

Jordan Peterson, in many ways, is a genius mind.
Some of the new concepts I learned, appreciated, or even incorporated into my models:

The concept that we need both rule defenders and rule breakers

It's simple, yet deep and enlightening.

The concept that both conservatives & liberals need to watch out and purge their camps from their respective toxic manifestations

The genius here is this:

As long as you're dealing with a sensible, high-integrity person, his original beliefs and political preferences don't matter.
You can talk to him and reach some kind of agreement.

The problem arises when ideologues and manipulators -and, I'd add, "non-sensible extremists"- co-opt a cause for self-serving interests.
It's up to all of us to purge the manipulators and dangerous personalities from our own ranks.

The necessity of knowing and understanding evil

This is is a foundational concept to this website since its first inception, so it wasn't new for us.
But we're glad someone like Jordan Peterson also shares it.
Plus, he added the layer of "evil within us", to include our own tendencies for aggression, hatred, envy, manipulation, and generally taking value.

REVIEW

Beyond Order is a self-development book with a conservative bent.

If you can look past the personal preferences -and biases- of the author, then there is much genius in it, and much gold for your own growth.

I personally enjoyed it, and learned a few new things as well.

Overview

- The Western approach is hands-on work, to look at the problem objectively, working on it, and practice improving your life
- The Eastern view is to find contentment no matter what you have, looking at the problem not even as a problem, but neutrally, as part of life, and to be content despite whatever you may experience, positive or negative
- Both approaches are valuable
- Combining both yields the best results

Notes

About the Author:
Bruce Tift is a practicing psychotherapist with many years of experience and a student and practitioner of Vajrayana Buddhism for several decades (including a student of Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, a controversial figure and popularizer of Buddhism in the West).

Freedom is Contentment

> Freedom is by its very nature hard to define. It seems to include the qualities of freshness and spontaneity, expansiveness, contentment and well-being, completeness, openheartedness, and open awareness. Freedom is also experienced as inherently satisfying and meaningful, not as a means or condition for some greater good.

In the West, we tend to think of freedom as an absence of limitations, but the absence of limitations can only go so far.

It's not like with freedom everything becomes perfect, but we feel that everything is workable, and we don't need anything else to be OK.

Most People's Goals Stand In The Way to Freedom

> By contrast, many of our more familiar goals—a good relationship, good health, money, political and social justice, and so on—are usually seen as conditions that will bring about a greater good. "If I just had better health, more money, etc., then I would be happy."

Goals, and even more the way of thinking that we "have to" reach certain objectives inherently negate freedom because tell ourselves that we need that something we to be joyful and content.

The author says that the root cause of almost any issue with his clients is that they all have a "basic sense of dissatisfaction" based on the idea that "something is missing".
This is the opposite of freedom, since with freedom we feel that "nothing is missing".

The Western View: There's An Objective Problem to Solve

The Western approach to well-being is in working towards the issue:

> The first view is basically that of Western psychotherapy. The Western tradition says there are actual difficulties in our lives that can and should be resolved.
> (…)
> from the Western view—which I will also refer to as the developmental view—we try, appropriately, to improve ourselves and our circumstances

Features of Western Approach:

- Becoming (vs being): the Western view is about changing and becoming, improving, and living to our full potential, while the Buddhist approach is about being, accepting, relaxing in the moment and being cool with it
- We have traumas to heal: we have wounds or traumas that need to be healed before our lives can be positive
- We need to bring the unconscious into the conscious: while the Buddhist view doesn't differentiate and accepts and is "cool" with being a mystery to ourselves, the work of the developmental approach is to bring that which is unconscious into consciousness
- We're independent existing selves
- Improvement-oriented

The Western Approach Limits Our Power To Govern Our Feelings

Albeit neither the author nor many zen practitioners may refer to it as "power", in the end, that's what it feels to me to be:

> in the West, we believe that a better quality of life comes from improving our sense of self and our life circumstances.
> (…)
> this means that our experience of freedom depends on a combination of external circumstances and how we feel—neither of which we have full control over.

The author says that while he started with a Western approach, it was not enough for him:

> my baseline—what I returned to, spontaneously, off and on, every moment—was feeling, to some extent, like a problematic person. I was always trying to improve, trying to wake up, trying to feel completely at peace. From that ground of dissatisfaction, moments of clarity, peace, and freedom would arise. But those moments were temporary
> (…)
> Since this shift, my baseline has been an experience of open awareness, freedom, and well-being.

Looking Into The Past To Fix The Present

The Western psychoanalytic approach postulates that the experiences we have as children, mostly in our families of origin, profoundly impacts the rest of our lives.

In response to difficult experiences, we create strategies or behavioral patterns to help us deal with what we experience as threats to our emotional or physical, survival.
And while appropriate for the age when we came up with those strategies, we often carry them over to adults, when they don't serve us anymore.

The problem is that since we formed them as responses to disturbing and even dangerous realities, they're usually associated with anxiety and mental discomfort.
We avoid feeling this anxiety by pushing these strategies out of our awareness, where they continue to operate for the rest of our lives.
That's also an issue, because by pushing part of us aside, we are not dealing with the truth of our lives and we perpetuate a sense that there's something about us that's not workable.
Western psychotherapy seeks to bring them into awareness as adults to challenge them and dissolve them.

The author says there's a potential problem in looking at the past to fix our present:

> we may start to think that an improved present is dependent on clearing up the past.
> Any memories about the past are speculative, incomplete, and partial.
> If we start to believe that the past is causing our present circumstances, then we've positioned ourselves as powerless victims.

Stages of Dissolving Our Internal Divisions

1. Awareness of the issue
2. Learning to tolerate the fears, our worst fears for which we developed defensive mechanisms.
    1. Trusting that it the fears won't kill us
3. Acceptance, and feeling less anxious and panicky when the core vulnerability comes up
    1. Approach it with kindness: "The choice is whether we're going to approach ourselves with fundamental aggression or with fundamental kindness. If it's the latter, we are able to say yes. "I'm going to say yes to this experience of feeling abandoned. I don't like it. It's one of my worst fears. I wish it were gone, but what can I say? If it's there, it's there. I'm going to say yes to it."

"You're not just saying yes to your fears, you're saying yes to your (full) self"

4. Kindness to our fears: "as we move with kindness toward what's difficult, the disturbance—which up until this point has felt bigger than us—starts to feel more manageable"
5. Wanting to feel the fear: we say, "I want to feel this feeling. I want to feel abandoned. I want to feel dependent. I want to feel my rage." We don't want to feel it because we like it; we're never going to like these feelings. But we want to feel these feelings because they're us. (…) We're starting to get some clarity that all of our experience is us. We are not actually divided against ourselves"
6. Committing to the truth of our full integrated self: We may find that we have still been operating on the subtle hope that if only we do this work—if only we are kind to our disturbance and so forth—our disturbance will go away. Now we invite the feeling that this pain or fear is a completely valid part of our life, of us, and we commit to living with it until we die.
7. Loving your worst fear: As we're able and willing to practice unconditional love toward our worst fears, we very quickly start to dissolve the fantasy of any division inside of ourselves. We can love all of us, rather than just the parts that feel "good."

The first stage could be understood as awareness or recognition.

The Buddhist View: There Is No "Problem"

> The second view is the Buddhist view, which says that how we relate to whatever we're experiencing is even more important than the experience itself.
> from the Buddhist, or fruitional, view, our work is not primarily to improve our experience; instead, it's to invite a shift in perspective so that we are willing and able to fully relate to any experience we might have, regardless of what it may be.

Once you reach a higher level of enlightenment, you can have immediate non-pleasurable experiences, within a higher context of contentment:

> It is possible to have a good state of mind while we simultaneously feel very disturbed. It's possible to feel grief or rage or anxiety and to have these difficult experiences arise within a type of well-being that is not dependent on positive thoughts or emotions.

Some key features of Buddhism:

1. Being (vs becoming) living in the moment, to not even think that we "need" to change ourselves
2. We're all connected: Buddhism asserts the view that we are not separate selves, and our work is to investigate this appearance, see through it, and experience the freedom that comes from having open awareness and compassion as our basic ground.
3. The mistake of thinking we're unconnected is frustrating: independent existence for the Buddhist view equals alienation. And our sense of being an independently existing self is the central source of unnecessary suffering and confusion.
4. We're only living in the present moment, our experiencing is only found in each present moment. Our current reality has a more powerful impact on our state of mind than what we are experiencing, important as that may be
5. Focus on the present moment helps us transcend the feeling of isolation: as we become able to consciously participate in increasingly deep, moment-by-moment experiencing, we may find less and less evidence of a continuing significant "self"

6. No self-improvement needed. We're always trying to have more experiences that we like and to get rid of experiences that we don't like. This Western approach is only going to give rise to an improved display of our experiencing. In classic Buddhist philosophy trying to improve is not bad per se, but can be a cause of unnecessary suffering if we reject and hate our current condition. So rather than trying to create an improved experience or an improved sense of self, the fruitional approach encourages us to relax into our human experience as it already is, taking everything as it is and "being cool with it"
7. There is no good or bad: "reframing" as per Western tradition is smart as most of us prefer positive feelings and experiences to negative ones. But Buddhism says that freedom arises from a profound disidentification with any content—good or bad
8. We're already free: we only need to peel the layers and find it within us

Let's use a movie analogy to understand the difference between the two different approaches:

> freedom may not actually come from improving the story that's playing on the screen. In fact, it might come from placing whatever that story is, in all of its complexity, in a larger environment of awareness. Perhaps we don't have to improve the story we tell about ourselves, about life, in order to experience freedom.

Example of accepting the problem: giving yourself permission to feel bad

Anna, the author's patient, feels dead.

Instead of looking at her past to find out "why", and instead of looking for solutions, he gives her permission to feel dead:

> Specifically, I ask her about her objections to feeling dead.
> (…)
> What exactly is her objection to participating in the truth of her experience? Like it or not, the reality is that she feels dead. So I invite her to try a variation of the worst fear technique that I mentioned in the last chapter. I suggest she try saying out loud, "I give myself permission to feel dead, off and on, for the rest of my life," and then see what feelings arise.

And, suggests the author, once you accept it, you may find out that it's not such a big problem after all:

> We're just investigating what, in fact, is most true in the present moment.
> Is it true that there is a problem with feeling dead?
> Or is it more true that the feeling of deadness is a disturbance that does not, upon investigation, prove to be problematic?

And the positive, immediate result for Anna:

> she says it feels like a relief to acknowledge what she's already experiencing. Her feeling of deadness was already true, and she had been fighting it. In fact, she hadn't realized until she stepped into an acceptance practice how much energy she'd spent trying to have something true be not true. In a way, it can appear paradoxical. The effect of this fruitional approach—of Ana's accepting her feelings of deadness without trying to change them—is that she feels lighter and more alive already!

How To Become Enlightened

The author says there are no steps to follow:

> My personal opinion is that waking up is not caused by anything. Not meditation, not prayer, not devotion. How can we cause something that's already present? But it does seem accurate that we can invite this experience, make it more likely that what's already true may arise into our awareness.

But you can increase the chances of getting there with meditation:

> As American Zen teacher Baker Roshi once said: "Enlightenment is an accident—but meditation makes us accident-prone."

However, I find that plenty of the examples and explanations can help people get there:

Start By Accepting Things As They Are, Without Judgment

You could say this first step is about "detaching from our emotions by being in the moment with an unjudgemental attitude".

The author calls it "immediacy" VS "preference":

> Consider the possibility that our emotions are sort of like the weather. The weather happens.
> You might say, "Oh, it's a beautiful day!" But that doesn't mean that the day has an inherent quality of beauty.

Emotions are the same:

> In the same way, our emotions are something we have to deal with, because they affect us, but perhaps they are not about us, either. Yet we're always projecting our preferences onto our experience and assuming our interpretations are a reliable measure of what's really going on.

And the more we start accepting things as simply being, without good or bad, the more we can transcend our selves as well:

> As we start to practice embodiment and kindness toward everything that arises—as we practice immediacy—we find less and less and less evidence that any of our experience is about us.

That acceptance is empowering and dissolves suffering

> That begins to help us with practicing an attitude of nonbias. We are willing to feel happy. We are willing to feel sad. We are willing to be healthy. We are willing to be dying, if that's what's happening.

And, says the author, that's the first step towards the experience of freedom.

Enjoying, Without Preserving: Don't Save, Don't Take Pictures

> Just as we gradually learn to appreciate the rainbow without trying to possess it or protect it from fading away, we might learn to appreciate this experience of self without needing to protect and improve it.

I personally find that the concept of enjoying things and experiences without having to record them is the first step.

Then you can start expanding that attitude to life in general, and to transcend suffering:

> The more we allow experience to be just as it is, the more we find that all experience tends to arise (from no one knows where—it's really sort of mysterious), remain for a period of time, and then dissolve.

> This cycle is always happening, and there is no need to control or manage it.

It's our refusal to experience difficult feelings that make them "bad" and gives them the appearance of threat and unworkability.
But when we accept for what they are, and liable to soon go just as they came, we can transcend our pain.

Do The "Unconditional Practices"

Which are:

- Unconditional immediacy going deeper and deeper, more and more precisely into an investigation of what is most true in this moment, the more immediate we can be, the fewer problems we find, the fewer references to a self we find. We don't find evidence of anything missing. We don't find evidence of our worth, either positive or negative, as a person. We find no evidence of anything being permanent. What we do find is an endless stream of fresh, unique moments, which we find to be inherently interesting and workable
- Unconditional embodiment: the more we can bring our attention to immediate, sensation-level experience, the more difficult it is to be captured by our interpretations. When we stay in our immediate embodied experience—noticing our sensations but not tying them to any past experiences—it's very difficult to link any stories together
- Unconditional kindness, feeling a sense of sweet love toward everything, including things we don't like > how can we tell if movement is happening or progress is being made? An early indication will be a lessening of complaint, struggle, self-doubt, defensiveness, and emotional reactivity. We are captured by our usual dramas less often, don't take them quite so seriously, and recover from them faster.

How to Tell If We're Progressing

And:

> A generalized sense of confidence may be noticed, with more frequent moments of clarity, embodied presence, and kindness to whatever may arise.

Plus, of course, a general sense of well-being and contentment becomes more and more frequent.

Both Approaches Are Great, & Best If Combined

The author says that neither approach can offer any guarantee, but they both do their part really well.

And they can be even more useful in conjunction.
As a matter of fact, Tift even says that they both need each other:

> they don't work without each other. If, on the one hand, we're always "becoming," without learning how to be, then we're always postponing our commitment to experiencing the present.
> So while at any moment there is being, over time, there is always becoming. You can't have one without the other. If we focus only on acceptance and immediacy, we may ignore historically conditioned patterns that are causing harm to ourselves and others.

On their own, when taken to an extreme, both also become unhealthy.
For example, the neurotic aspect of the Western individualistic approach leads to insensitivity, disconnection from others, potentially aggression, and isolation.

And the neurotic expression of interconnection may lead to lack of boundaries, conflict avoidance, unassertiveness, and a tendency to compromise integrity in exchange for approval, love, or security.

The Overlap Between Both

Both views have a common intention to relieve unnecessary suffering, and both agree that the experience of split or division is at the heart of that suffering. So there is an overlap between them.

> The developmental view is especially useful in articulating and working with patterns that exist over time, in recognizing how powerfully our conditioned history shapes the ways in which we relate to our immediate experience.
> The fruitional view is very helpful in training ourselves to participate consciously in each immediate moment, which is the only moment in which we will ever find ourselves, and to discover if what used to be true is what's true now.

How To Combine The Two Approaches

> When I work with clients, I often invite them to consider a two-step sequence. The first step is that of acceptance—becoming willing to accept the way things are. This represents the fruitional approach; we stay present with reality as it is. From that ground of acceptance, we can then ask how we might improve our situation or experience, which is the second step.

Accepting first also helps us "take the pressure off" our efforts to change, and also be cool in case of failure:

> But if we try to improve ourselves without first accepting our circumstances, the effort may feel very serious. It may feel like our lives—or, like Marcie, our emotional well-being—hang in the balance. If, on the other hand, we've already accepted things as they are, then any efforts at improvement can be understood as being about practical issues or perhaps even be experienced as play.

Also, with a combination of the two, we don't need to "solve" any problems to live well and free.
We can enjoy our lives, while also working on it.

Another way to combine the two is to first have a positive image of oneself with Western psychotherapy, and to then accept our full selves via Buddhism:

> this sense of being divided against oneself is probably an unavoidable developmental stage to be experienced and worked through (…)
> And as long as we try to make ourselves into an object to be either accepted or rejected, better to accept it. Better to have a positive self-as-object than a negative self-as-object. This is the arena of most of the work we do in psychotherapy.

Combining Individualism & Interconnectedness For Good Leadership

The author says that interconnection tends to be more of a "feminine energy" while individualism is more of a "male energy".

And we need both not only for a good mental and social life, but also for good leadership:

> To experience the sane expression of either the masculine or the feminine, we must learn how to lead with one energy, without losing experiential contact with the other.

This is sane masculine energy:

> Sane masculine energy arises when we can assert our separateness, have conflict, set boundaries, and know that we are alone in some fundamental way—all the while still keeping our heart open. We can feel connection and empathy with others, knowing that any conflict between us is most likely there because they're so important to us.
> (…)
> Healthy masculine energy can experience conflict without apology—working with the truth of interpersonal differences—precisely because we can feel our care for the other.

Masculine energy is also crucial to navigating long-term relationships:

> We know that, paradoxically, the purpose of this conflict is to help us keep our hearts open. A lack of healthy masculine energy is one way in which many couples get into difficulty. They're having conflict, while unconsciously trying to reassure themselves of their connection. The refusal to keep it simple and just have "clean conflict" actually arises from a lack of confidence in our connection and contributes to the "sticky conflict" characteristic of codependent dynamics.

And this is sane feminine energy:

> Sane feminine energy leads with connection, communication, support, and empathy—all the while maintaining boundaries and personal responsibility.
> We understand that no relationship will work well if we lose touch with our fundamental aloneness and compromise our integrity.

Masculine Energy & Independence For Personal Power

Says the author of his personal power and relationship:

> It wasn't until I was in my forties that I started to feel safe enough to realize how incredibly dependent I am as a person.
> One of the first clues had to do with my relationship with my wife. It dawned on me one day that if I were truly independent, she wouldn't bug me so much.
> I wouldn't be so disturbed by her tone of voice, her behavior, or how she related to me. I wouldn't feel so warm and relaxed when she was kind to me.
> She had an incredible impact on my feelings; apparently, I was so dependent that my state of mind was profoundly affected by her mood and behavior.

What he's describing here with his wife is all about emotional power dynamics, and his wife being "the judge" in the relationship, with the power to make him feel good or bad.

A process that in dating power dynamics some people also refer to as "betaization", or as the man losing power ot the woman.

The author says that it happened because he was too interconnected with her, and not separate enough.

Becoming "Effectively Selfish"

The author seems to touch upon a recurrent theme we have here in TPM:

To take the good out of what many may consider selfish or antisocial, and to leverage for a better win-win that serves the self, and others.
For example, we have here:

- Enlightened cynicism
- Enlightened individualism
- How to be good asshole

Tift here refers to "how to be selfish".
When you're not "selfish enough" you're too dependent on others and become co-dependent.
When you're too selfish instead you cannot even create win-win relationships.
He says that the solution lies in taking good care of ourselves so that we can then enter win-win relationships that we want, rather than need:

> We'd be taking such good care of ourselves that we wouldn't need our partners to be any different than they already are.
> We no longer need to wait for our partners to become who we want them to be in order for us to have a satisfying life. This is the foundation of effective selfishness.

QUOTES

On the transient nature of everything:

> we find there is, in fact, no resolution necessary (or even possible). Experiencing our worst fears doesn't kill us, and experiencing our greatest hope doesn't save us. Both are only transient energies. Each arises, dwells, and falls away.

CONS

- Reduces the "Western" approach to mental health to psychotherapy

I think there is much more than psychotherapy to mental health in the West.
Probably most psychotherapists today employ a mix of tools that also include more hands-on approaches such as cognitive behavioral therapy.

- Some clearer "how to" or simplifying some complex concepts may have helped

I know, I know, there's no easy "how to" sometimes and some complex and abstract topics are just that: complex. However, I think that it's still the authors' responsibility to make these complex and abstract concepts as easy and applicable as possible.

PROS

- Credibly shows that science does not stand against spirituality
- Bridges between the science and spiritual enlightenment, between the more science-based Western approach and the more spiritual Eastern one

REVIEW

Already Free is a great book for both mental health from a more clinical perspective, and for general mental self-development.

Its unique combination of psychotherapy and Eastern traditions of spiritual enlightenment helps bridge an imaginary "gap" that, in truth, may not exist since the two approaches are complimentary and not contradictory. Already Free helps readers get the best from both worlds.

Spinning VS Lying

The author says there are several different form of deceptions:

- Lying
- Spinning
- Concealment: withholding information that might undermine or weaken one's position

> Spinning is when a person telling a story emphasizes certain facts and links them together in ways that play to his advantage, while, at the same time, downplaying or ignoring inconvenient facts. Spinning is all about interpreting the known facts in a way that allows the spinner to tell a favorable story.

Funny enough, only "lying" has a bad reputation, and only lying gives you a bad reputation:

> Lying is usually considered deplorable behavior, whereas most people seem to believe that it is acceptable to spin and conceal, even though these behaviors are designed to deceive.

This may be the reason why, the author says, leaders prefer to spin and conceal rather than outright lie -and nobody wants to be called a liar, even if it's for a good cause-.

Nobody wants to be called a liar, even if it is for a good cause. This preference is reinforced by the fact that it is often difficult to lie without getting caught red-handed.

The 7 Types of Foreign Policy Lies

1. Interstate lies are aimed directly at other countries either for the purpose of gaining a strategic advantage over them or prevent-ing them from gaining an advantage at your expense
2. Fearmongering occurs when a leader lies to his own people about a foreign-policy threat that he believes they do not recognize or fully appreciate. The aim is to motivate the public to take the threat seriously and make the necessary sacrifices to counter it
3. Strategic cover-ups are lies designed to hide either failed policies or controversial policies from the public and sometimes from other states as well. Leaders do not tell these lies to protect incompetents who bungled their job or to conceal foolish policies—although that can be an unintended consequence
   1. Ignoble cover-ups are when leaders lie about their blunders or unsuccessful policies for self-serving reasons
4. Nationalist mythmaking is when leaders tell lies, mainly to their own people, about their country's past. In essence, they tell a story in which "we" are always right and "they" are always wrong.
   The purpose is to create a powerful sense of group identity among the broader population, because that is necessary for building and maintaining a viable nation-state, and for motivating people to fight wars for their homeland.
5. Liberal lies are designed to cover up the behavior of states when it contradicts the well-developed body of liberal norms that is widely accepted around the world and codified in international law
6. Social imperialism occurs when leaders tell lies about another country for the purpose of promoting either their own economic or political interests or those of a particular social class or interest group.

Why Leaders Lie focuses exclusively on lies oin the service of the national interest, hence leaving out social imperiasm and ignoble cover-ups.

What Increases The Odds of Interstate Lying

- Dangerous areas: countries located in dangerous areas where there is intense security competition
- Crises
- Rivalry

Nationalist Lies To Dupe The Gullibles

The author says that it's the elites who make up the national myths for two reasons:

1. Fuel group solidarity to prop up the state; to create a sense of nation-hood, which is essential for building and maintaining a viable nation-state
2. To get the most out of the citizens, including their life: to instill a sense that they are part of a noble enterprise, which they should not only be proud of, but for which they should willing to endure significant hardships, including fighting and dying if necessary

Or watch this video:

However, it would be a mistake to think that people are empty recipients of leaders' manipulation.
In truth, most people want to be duped and lied to:

> the common people invariably hunger for these myths; they want to be told stories about the past in which they are portrayed as the white hats and opposing nations as the black hats. In effect, nationalist mythmaking is driven from below as well as from above.

The Costs of Lying

Albeit the author calls the chapter "the downsides of international lying", many of them apply to lying in general:

- Creates a culture of dishonesty, therefore, it makes eminently good sense for leaders and their fellow citizens to work to minimize the amount of lying that takes place in their country
- Make for poorer democracies, since democracies operate best when they include a reasonably efficient marketplace of ideas, which can only work when citizens have reliable information and there are high levels of transparency and honesty
- Public alienation, to the point where it loses faith in democratic government and is willing to countenance some form of authoritarian rule
- Self-aggrandizing lies can help you in the short-term but harm you in the longer run: for example, Khrushchev's lies about the Soviet missile force in the late 1950s scared the United States into significantly escalate the arms race when Khrushchev was hoping to slow it down and spend more money on economic and social programs

MORE WISDOM

Avoid antagonizing other powers, it's a smart strategy

On this website, we talk about "making friends, not enemies" as a general high-level principle.

One of the corollaries is that you don't want to provoke others and make them bigger enemies than they already are. One way of doing it is to avoid antagonizing others, and alarming them, like France and Great Britain did with Russia after World War II:

> This logic was in evidence during the early days of the Cold War, when the countries of Western Europe created two mutual defense pacts: the Treaty of Dunkirk (1947) and the Treaty of Brussels (1948). Both agreements were said to be checks against a resurgent Germany, but in fact they were mainly designed to contain Soviet expansion in Europe. British and French leaders lied about the real purpose of these alliances because they did not want to antagonize the Soviet Union—which they saw as a serious threat—if they could avoid

Israel engaged in ethnic cleansing

> There was no way that the Zionists could create a Jewish state in Palestine without doing large-scale ethnic cleansing of the Arab population that had been living there for centuries. This point was widely recognized by the Zionist leadership well before Israel was created.
> The opportunity to expel the Palestinians came in early 1948 when fighting broke out between the Palestinians and the Zionists in the wake of the UN decision to partition Palestine into two states. The Zionists cleansed roughly 700,000 Palestinians from the land that became Israel, and adamantly refused to let them return to their homes once the fighting stopped.
> (…)
> Israel and its American friends went to great lengths after the events of 1948 to blame the expulsion of the Palestinians on the victims themselves.

Targeting civilians is not off-limits to avoid endless warfare

> Duke political scientist Alexander Downes shows in his seminal book Targeting Civilians in War that "desperation to win and to save lives on one's own side in costly, protracted wars of attrition causes belligerents to target enemy civilians." Indeed, he shows that "democracies are somewhat more likely than nondemocracies to target civilians."
> (…)
> Remember that the United States purposely killed about 900,000 Japanese civilians in the last five months of World War

Your enemy can't be too bad: when the elites defend tyrants

> British and American elites—including academics, journalists, and policymakers—went to considerable lengths 174/346 during World War II to portray Stalin in a favorable light, so that it would not appear that Britain and the United States were run by ruthless statesmen who would cooperate with one tyrannical mass murderer to defeat another.

QUOTES

On the truth of the famous trope "the winners write history":

> General Curtis LeMay, who was in charge of that murderous bombing campaign, once remarked, "If we'd lost > the war, we'd all have been prosecuted as war criminals."

CONS

Talks of survival as if the world was in anarchy, as if there were no major alliances, and as if each country was constantly plotting war

The author seems to speak as if each country was in fear and risk of losing its sovereignty left and right.
He says:

> The best way that states can maximize their prospects for survival is to gain power at their rivals' expense.

Survival?

That might be the case for Hong Kong, Taiwan, or some states bordering Russia.
But it's not the case for much of the rest of the world, and least of all the "most important" areas of the world.

The world I'm living in is not so much about surivival.

And it's not so much about invading either, as the author makes it out to be:

> Third, a country's leaders might downplay their hostile intentions toward another state to disguise an attack on it.

Is he talking about politics in the West?
Like for example, me as an Italian, the Italian prime minister visiting another country and downplaying Italy's forces to prepare an attack?

This seems completely out of touch with the reality of most Western countries.

Of course, that's not necessarily because people today are more "good", but because nuclear weapons, supranational unions, supranational military pacts and supranational agreements made the gains of invasions slimmer and the costs incredibly high.
Most nations, even bigger ones, wouldn't be able to invade a neighboring country without all other nearby countries either intervening militarily, or punishing with crippling social and economical sanctions.

So, for example, Austria is not at risk from Italy, Portugal is not at risk from Spain, and Belgium is not at risk from France.
Heck, even Canada is pretty safe from losing its sovereignty to the US, and that's in spite the US being the biggest military power in the world.

Talks about leaders cheating for the "good for the country", as if leaders weren't interested more in their own selfish gains

For example:

> In a dangerous world, leaders do what they must to insure their country's survival.

And:

> leaders usually believe that defeat would do serious damage to their national interest.

Yeah, he's partially right.

Some leaders most certainly care about their countries: even for selfish reasons a strong country, economy, military, or reputation is good for the leaders.
However, it's naive to think that all leaders have their countries' interests in mind first and foremost. Many leaders are more interested in their own political survival, rather than their countries.

For more, read DeMesquita's work:

- The Dictator's Handbook
- The Logic of Political Survival

> The Dictator's Handbook: Summary & Review

Sometimes Not So "Realpolitik" After All (Naive?)

There seems to be a pervasive sense that most of the lies in Why Leaders Lie are to advance the national interest.

Even when talking about fearmongering the author focuses on fearmongering for the good of the country:

> Fearmongering occurs when a state's leaders see a threat emerging but think that they cannot make the public see the wolf at the door without resorting to a deception campaign.
> (…)
> As distasteful as this behavior might be, leaders do it because they believe that it serves the public interest, not to exploit their fellow citizens for personal gain.

There are several more similar examples in the book.

In my opinion instead most fearmongering is to the benefit of the leader, to accrue more power, and to get elected when campaigning on law and order.

Also read more on politicians' manipulation:

> The Psychology of Political Manipulation

PROS

- The realpolitik approach

Albeit, as we say above, at times Why Leaders Lie almost feels naive and whitewashed towards leaders, it shares enough "realpolitik" wisdom on different topics.

- Tough truths shared openly

As in the birth of Israel preying on Palestinians.

REVIEW

Why Leaders Lie is a good book to understand the dynamics of lying and deception a bit better.

I personally only partially agree with the author's general stance that leaders lie because they think it is good for their country.
And I didn't find the wisdom earth-shattering, and maybe the analysis wasn't the deepest.
However, I did learn a few things and I really like the author.

- You can cure your people pleasing dysfunction, and you can start by understanding exactly that: that it's a dysfunctional pattern of behavior

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Harriet Braiker was a social and clinical psychologist and best-selling author.
She also wrote "Who's Pulling Your Strings", a great book on manipulation and manipulation dynamics.

1. What's The Disease to Please

> The Disease to Please is a compulsive—even addictive—behavior pattern. As a people-pleaser, you feel controlled by your need to please others and addicted to their approval.

However, it goes beyond simply not being able to say no:

> your need to please is not limited to just saying "yes" to the actual requests, invitations, or demands initiated by others. As a people-pleaser, your emotional tuning dials are jammed on the frequency of what you believe other people want or expect of you.

That means that whatever you think others may want or need, you feel compelled to provide -or, at least, not to deny it-.
And, in TPM parlance, it also makes you an easy picking -or victim- for "covert questions", covert requests, and guilt-tripping: people don't even need to ask you anything, just imply or hint at something they want, and you feel compelled to provide it.

Your Self-Esteem Is All Built Around Pleasing

> Your sense of identity, your self-esteem, and even your worthiness to be loved derive from doing things for others. In fact, it often seems like you are what you do.

For more on changing your identity, see:

- The antifragile ego

> The Ultimate Personal Power Tool: The Antifragile Ego

2. People Please Out of Mindsets, Habits, or Feelings

The author says that we can recognize 3 general causes for people-pleasing behavior:

1. Habits, or habitual behaviors driven by an excessive, even addictive, need for everyone's approval
2. Mindsets, believing that being nice will protect you from rejection and other hurtful treatment from others.
   It includes a "fixed thought that you must strive for everyone to like you. You measure your self-esteem and define your identity by how much you do for others and how higher up you put their needs above yours".
3. Feelings, when you have anxiety even at the thought of saying "no", or letting someone down, or having to face anger and a possible confrontation.
   At this level, the syndrome operates primarily as an avoidance tactic to protect you from your fears of anger, conflict, and confrontation

The author says that different people tend to skew more heavily towards one of the three, albeit most people pleasers are a mix of all of them.
That's not bad news though, because if you can only change one, the others will follow suit.
Says Braiker:

> You can stop the progression of the Disease to Please and you can change now. To do so, you need only begin with a small change in any one area—your behavior, thoughts, or feelings. As one change at a time inevitably builds on the next,

3. The Costs of People-Pleasing

1. Other people may manipulate and exploit you and your willingness to please them
2. You may be blind to power dynamics and manipulation: "your niceness may even blind you to the fact that others are exploiting you"

3. You avoid giving feedback and valid criticism out of fear that people may dislike you, get angry, or push you into a "difficult conversation"
4. You build up anger and resentment over time, and since you're not able to express yourself in a healthy and assertive fashion, you may resort to passive aggressiveness
5. Your relationships suffer because you can't have an authentic relationship unless you're able to share your true feelings and thoughts
6. Your needs will go unmet: you also have needs, just like everyone else. And if you never voice them, you will never get what you want, what you need, and what you deserve
7. You turn passive-aggressive: your anger seeks revenge, but the submissiveness permits you to deny your aggressive side to both your partner and yourself and to maintain your self-concept as nice. The problem is that passive-aggressive actions actually incite your partner to greater hostility
8. You failt at work, because you're unable to delegate and end up doing it all yourself. People who do all the small stuff do not advance in their career
9. You fail at life: you never even come close to expressing your potential
10. You'll get abused and manipulated (keep on reading)

Also too nice people attract takers in their life.
Just look at this female people pleaser comment:

> "After everything I've done for everyone else," one patient of mine says bitterly, "nobody is there for me. I've been so nice to everyone, and people just take me for granted."

4. The 6 False Beliefs of People Pleasers

1. Being nice is important
2. Life is fair, and nice people nice avoid painful experiences (such as rejection, isolation, abandonment, disapproval, and anger)
3. What people think of me is important
4. If you're hurt or rejected, you weren't nice enough
5. If I don't put others first, I'm being selfish and not nice
6. Whatever you do doesn't "stick" or "add up", every new day you must prove your niceness from scratch

The 10 Commandments of People Pleasers

1. Always do what others want, expect, or need from me.
2. Take care of everyone around me whether they ask for help or not.
3. Always listen to everyone's problems and try my best to solve
4. Always be nice and never hurt anyone's feelings.
5. Always put other people first, before me.
6. Never say "no" to anyone who needs or requests something of me.
7. Never disappoint anyone or let others down in any way.
8. Always be happy and upbeat and never show any negative feelings to others.
9. Always try to please other people and make them happy.
10. Never burden others with my own needs or problems

And then there's the "perfectionist people pleaser", a very common specimen of people pleaser, who adds an eleventh commandment:

11. Fulfill all of these expectations completely and perfectly

The 7 Deadly Shoulds

Other people should:

1. Appreciate and love me because of all the things I do for them
2. Always like and approve of me because of how hard I work to please them
3. Never reject or criticize me because I always try to live up to their desires and expectations.
4. Be kind and caring to me in return because of how well I treat them.
5. Never hurt me or treat me unfairly because I am so nice to them.
6. Never leave or abandon me because of how much I make them need me.
7. Never be angry with me because I would go to any length to avoid conflict, anger, or confrontation with them.

In this chapter Braiker quotes Albert Ellis on the gratuitous harm of the various "shoulds" and "must" we place on ourselves.

- How to Stubbornly Refuse to Make Yourself Miserable

In brief, the demands you make of yourself coupled with the emotional pain you inflict on yourself for failing -or even for the possibility of failing- creates a situation where you can't win, but only lose.
It's depressing and gives you anxiety for no valid reason.

In this TPM's concepts, you elect others to be your judge, and you become your own worst judge.
You fear their judgment, fear your own judgment, and become trapped in your impossible to meet standards of what it means to be "nice".

Says the author:

> When you hear the commanding should in your thoughts or self-talk, you are hearing the voice of your judging conscience.
> (…)
> That voice is the amalgamation of your parents, teachers, older siblings, coaches, or other authority figures that, at various points in your life, laid down rules that have stayed with you throughout your life.

5. Stuck In Toxic Relationships For Fear of Ending It > the people-pleaser may have very good reasons to want to quit a job—sometimes citing instances of mistreatment, harassment, or exploitation by the employer. Still, to avoid an angry, disapproving, or "hurt" response from the employer, the people-pleaser remains on the job unable to muster the courage to resign.

Similar dynamics apply to relationships and even friendships, says Braiker:

> In these cases, the alleged friend may have repeatedly hurt the people-pleaser. Yet the people-pleaser will not be the one to terminate the relationship

6. Case Study: A People Pleaser's Wake-Up Call

I think this story is a great wake-up call.

Sarah was a people pleaser who broke her back to do everything for her family, and more.
Now look what happened when it was Sarah who needed help:

> When she returned from the hospital, Sarah was shocked and profoundly hurt by her family's reaction. Instead of being kind and happy to reciprocate the years of Sarah's nurturance, they displayed irritation and resentment for the inconvenience caused by Sarah's illness. At first, Sarah felt guilty for being sick and a burden to her family. But soon she was overcome with feelings of anger and resentment.

So then she finally opened her eyes and started changing:

> "I realized that I was raising a bunch of lousy human beings. So I decided there and then that things were going to change. And they have, but very slowly. Periodically, I have to go on strike again to remind everyone to live up to his or her responsibilities." "The best part is that I really believe my family respects me and loves me more for making them into better people," she concluded.

It wasn't necessarily bad for Sarah to do so much for her family, and neither it is for you.
The failure is when your giving does not accrue any social credit because people fail to even acknowledge the value you're providing, and the cost you're incurring in providing that value.
It's possible to give and be valued. As a matter of fact, it's one of the best things you can do, but it's up to you to make sure people value your contributions.
So to avoid being taken advantage of while still giving you must make sure that people value and respect your contribution.

Here at TPM we call it "fair value marketing".
Also learn more about giving and taking in the social exchange:

> Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

Nobody Likes Over-Givers

Over-giving not only sets you up for being taken advantage of, but also doesn't provide you with any social benefits.

Indeed, many people don't like too nice guys and girls, and they don't like over-givers.
Says Braiker:

> One of the hardest lessons people-pleasers have to learn is that making yourself a martyr is no way to make friends. In fact, it is very difficult for most mortals to like the self-appointed, holier-than-thou "saint" who walks among them.

Giving too much also puts the good people in a tough spot (ie.: those who don't want to take advantage of you):

> you may inadvertently diminish the receiver by making him or her feel inadequate to reciprocate in kind. People-pleasers who give to the point of utter selflessness or self-effacing excess can create the unintended > effect of making others feel embarrassed, uncomfortable, and even disdainful.

In a way, giving too much is a form of social exchange manipulation.
You're trying to buy love and liking, but you're doing it out of selfishness, and that makes you come across as fake and manipulative.

7. Case Study: The Approval Seeker (Judge Power Dynamics)

Another great case study to understand what happens when you remain addicted to other people's approval:

> "Every man I've dated since has figured out how much I need approval. My son knows it too. I can see that I just hand over the strings to the other person in a relationship, and I behave like a good little puppet," she says of herself derisively. "What's really ridiculous is that I'm literally still trying to get my father's approval. It's just absurd. He's 83 years old and as critical and withholding as ever. I keep hoping he'll let me know that he really loves me before he dies.

Again, this is all about emotional power dynamics, and what we refer to here as "judge roles" who have power over you via emotional rewards and punishments.

The solution?
To only see yourself as the main dispenser of approval:

> The most important, effective, and lasting source of approval is the acceptance you give to yourself. Develop a clear sense of your own judgments and values and govern yourself accordingly.

8. Solution: Enlightened Self-Interest

Here are some solutions:

Find The Correct Definitions of What You're Doing

Some people pleasers are terribly afraid of being -or coming across- as selfish.

But the problem with them is that they have a black and white approach to the continuum between selfless and selfish.
And they do not see a difference between self-care and self-love, and selfishness.
Says the author:

> There is a big, important difference between exercising enlightened self-interest and being selfish.

So just by redefining the meaning and concepts of "giving", "caring" and "self-caring", you can take a bit step forward.

So here's the first big shocker to help people please change mindsets:

As a people pleaser you're not being "giving" or selfless, you're being self-destructive.

Realize You're Being Cruel To Yourself

And if "being nice" is important to you, here's another shocker:

Holding yourself to perfectionist standards and neglecting yourself is nothing short of self-imposed emotional cruelty.

If you struggle to internalize it, imagine a parent telling this to a child, or a spouse to their partner: You must always please me, you are to fulfill each and every request or order I issue, no matter what you are doing or how you feel. And, you must smile and pretend to be happy all the time".

Does that sound nice, caring, or even "normal"? That's how you act with yourself as a people pleaser.

Internalize: It's OK Not To Be Nice

You will take a huge step forward when you can internalize that "it's okay not to be nice".

Here at the TPM we actually generally like "being kind".
But we also say that you should NOT be nice with assholes and life's takers. Because that makes you a sucker.

You only need your acceptance

Some people pleasers have low self-esteem and feel bad about themselves.

So they project their own negative feelings about themselves onto others, and act nice "pre-emptively", to manipulate others into liking them or at least into not rejecting them.

The solution is to recognize that the person whose acceptance you most need is your own.
You must address the issue at its roots: before love, you need self-love.

New Definition and Goal: Enlightened Self-Interest

> There is a third alternative that will best serve everyone, and that is for you to operate in a state of enlightened self-interest. What this means is that you will take good care of yourself, even putting your needs first at times, while simultaneously considering the needs and welfare of others.

Become An Empowered Giver

> the more desirable alternative to being a people-pleaser is to be a person who makes a very intentional choice to care— a choice of when, how, and to whom you give your finite time and resources.

Learn to Sit With The Emotions You Fear With Exposure

If your people-pleasing attitudes are emotionally driven, then you need to learn to make peace with those emotions you're trying to avoid.

They include fear of anger, hostility, conflict, and confrontation.

How to do that?
Says Braiker:

> conquering the phobia comes through exposure to the fear itself in order to learn effective and appropriate responses

So it's exposure, plus techniques of competent anger management, conflict resolution skills, assertive communication, and general social skills and power dynamics skills.

Techniques For Stopping People-Pleasing

The last part of the book is all about techniques and scripts to take the first steps toward liberation.

They include:

- Gaining time with the initial request to think about whether you want to do it or not
- Communicating your preference
- Remaining steadfast against people's insistence, guilt-tripping, and cajoling

If you've gone through PU, you know all those techniques -plus more- and you've seen the examples.
So you already have the tools and it's more about putting them into practice.

So, in that sense, although Power University is more advanced, PU may also help with people-pleasing behavior:

> Power University

MORE WISDOM

"Too nice behavior" galvanizes the attacker(s)

The author says that being nice when in a conflict situation is equivalent to "unilateral psychological disarmament".

She's right.
And it gets even worse: nice in the face of abuse can increase the abuse:

> In effect, niceness gives the other person permission—and even encouragement—to mistreat you.
> (…)
> Paradoxically, if you are the target of verbal and emotional abuse, your niceness not only will fail to protect you, it will strengthen the person who is hurting you or treating you unkindly.

The more you like someone, the more it clouds your judgment

> People-pleasers often err on the side of attributing more noble motives and intentions to people with whom they are involved in a romantic relationship than is actually the case.

And something we repeat often here:

> To adequately protect yourself, you need to see people as they are and not how they appear through trick rose-colored lenses that magnify their assets and minimize or block out their flaws

Anger is a power move

Says Harriet Braiker:

> Anger, by definition, is an accusation made in response to a perceived error, mistake, or misbehavior. In order for anger to be activated, someone must be blamed for the perceived misdeed.

Basically, she's saying that when someone gets angry at us, the sub-communication is "you're to blame because you're guilty".

Accepting that anger without pushing back on the message it conveys is the equivalent of admitting guilt:

> And, in true people-pleasing form, you give the accuser permission to blame you—exactly what he or she needs.

She talks about “people pleaser”, but the same is true for anyone else.

Once you give them permission to blame you, it means you take 100% of the blame. You’re the guilty, wrong, or “defective” one, and they’re the 100% right, correct, or “good” ones:

> Assuming blame is not the same thing as accepting your share of responsibility for a problem
> The latter presumes that if a problem occurs between two people, the responsibility will be attributed jointly and fairly. It may not be equally shared, but both parties will acknowledge some degree of responsibility for the problem between them.
> Blame, on the other hand, is one-sided. The accuser disavows any responsibility and seeks instead to hold you not just responsible, but answerable and punishable for your actions that are clearly labeled as wrongdoing.

Great wisdom, and I partially agree.

However, I think it’s OK to let someone yell and “be angry” as long as you push back on either the sub-communication of guilt, or the content of the message.

For example, if they yell “look what the fuck you did”, it’s OK to calmly reply “it’s not what I did, it’s what happened, and we both are part of it”.

Such as, the key against angry accusation is to push back on at least one of the several layers of the blame-attack:

1. Address the tone first (the anger itself), what we advise men in relationships
2. Push back against the content: whatever it is they are saying
3. Push back against the sub-communication: such as that the blame is not all on you

“Total Honesty” Is A Power Move And A Form of Aggression

> There is a particular form of emotional mistreatment practiced by people who hide their anger and aggressive motives in the guise of “total honesty.” The claim, of course, is that total honesty is always “the best policy.”
> (…)
> Arguably, being totally honest without any tact, and at the expense of another’s feelings, might well be construed as more a flaw of character than an asset.
> (…)
> The speaker then compounds the pain by rhetorically asking, “What’s wrong with you? I’m just being completely honest,” implying that the response should have been appreciation or even gratitude.

Also learn more about covert power moves:

> 6 Covert Power Moves to Control Frames

Don’t Laugh With Those Who Tease You: It’s Disempowering

> When you laugh along with those who tease you, you not only devalue your own self-esteem you also reward the teasers for their hurtfulness or cruelty as well.

To Have Non-Destructive Conflict, Use Overarching Collaborative Frames

As usual, Harrier Braiker may not have put labels on certain techniques and approaches, but she's a very smart observer of social strategies that work:

> Couples that handle their arguments constructively affirm their basic relationship either explicitly or implicitly (i.e., by virtue of leaving basic values unquestioned). As a result, conflicts are contained within safe boundaries, and partners can feel secure in expressing dissatisfaction or even transitory anger.

We call this concept "collaborative framing" here on TPM.

Constructive VC Destructive Conflict: The Difference

After a lengthy and good analysis of conflict resolution, Braiker sums it as follows (redacted for brevity):

> Constructive conflicts are safe and productive.
> Produce new agreements based on deeper mutual understanding, and reach an endpoint in the form of resolution. The parties experience empowerment, pride, and renewed confidence in their ability to weather problems and develop effective solutions that eliminate or reduce future conflcits. It feels like the relationship grows.
> In contrast, destructive conflicts are repetitive, unsafe, hurtful, and counterproductive. They are left unfinished and unresolved, producing hurt feelings, resentments, and stewing anger. The parties, lacking effective solutions or agreements, will argue over the same or very similar issues in the very near future. They feel stuck in recurrent patterns of provocation, accusation, and blame. They feel alienated and the relationship suffers and shrinks.

QUOTES

What a genius opener, I want to use this for PU:

> The deal I propose is simply this: you provide the motivation, I will give you the tools and skills you need to reclaim control over your life.

On the reality of people pleasing:

> While people-pleasers may think they excel at making others happy, their real talent lies in making themselves feel miserable and inadequate.

On needing VS loving:

> In unhealthy relationships the feeling is, "I love you because I need you." In "healthy love" relationships the feeling is, "I need you because I love you." These are not mere subtleties of language, but critically different emotional postures

On people pleaser's "safe distance" also being an emotional moat preventing healthy connections:

> However, if you stay far enough away from people so they can't reach out and strike you, you are also too far for them to be able to reach out and embrace you.

On verbal and physical aggression being similar:

> The old and patently false children's chant, "Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me," needs revision. In reality, broken bones can heal relatively quickly; but words can and do leave deep wounds that sometimes never heal.

CONS

- The difference between mindsets, habits and feelings lacked clarity

Especially the "habits" one.

- Perpetrates the myth that "conflict-avoidant couples have poor relationships"

… And that good relationships have conflicts.

But this may actually be a myth, as Gottman's research suggests that couples that have zero conflict actually stick together.
Now "sticking together" may not be equivalent to "health", but it's still an important indicator.

- Jumps to conclusions

Talking about a husband "victim" of a people pleaser, the author says:

> Ron acted out his anger by withholding sexual interest and attention toward his wife and by cheating behind her back.

That may be possible, but we don't know for sure.
It's entirely possible Ron's main "motivation" is that he wanted to sleep around and would have cheated anyway.

- Clueless and poor advice to women when it comes to submissiveness/femininity/dating

The author has some feminist-leaning "advice" to women:

> Today many of these women, and even a significant number of younger women too, fear that the very traits that account for their success in the workplace—assertiveness, mental toughness, aggressiveness, competitiveness —become liabilities in their romantic relationships with men.

Those DO become liabilities in their dating.
Also see feminine women VS strong women.

> Submissive Women VS Strong Women: Who Wins at Dating?

- Too many and too long offshoots

Harrier Braiker is an outstanding psychologist and observer of human nature and social dynamics, so her off-topics are often opportunities to learn.
Still, if a book is about "Disease to Please", I think that it avoids lengthy off-topics about, say, conflict management.

- Presents the "sandwich technique" as a highly effective technique

… Something I disagree with.
Everyone's seen it, and whenever they hear a positive, they already know that a negative is coming, and it all feels contrived and manipulative. Exactly what you want to avoid.
To be precise, there are ways of doing it that are effective, so it's more about the delivery than the technique itself.
Still, the technique is now trite.

PROS

- Perfect combination of theory and practice

In The Disease to Please you'll find both: (almost) all the theory you need to understand the issue, plus (almost) all the tools you need to start fixing it.

- Best overview of emotional power dynamics and judge role

Many people pleasers seek emotional rewards from others.
They are emotional addicts, and they elect everyone else as their own judges.

We first came up with emotional power dynamics and the "judge role" early on TPM's history and, back then, we hadn't yet read much on the topic.
Reading Harriet Braiker was like reading about what we originally wrote on the topic of emotional power dynamics.
Braiker predates -and validates- that all-important concept of social and power dynamcis better than anyone else we're read so far.

- The quizzes to self-diagnose yourself

There are many quizzes that you self-assess yourself on the people-pleaser scale. And they're good.

- Deep overview and analysis of people pleasing

Including how it affects relationships and how it invites controlling men and abusive men.
If we wanted to nitpick, the author does not dwell on how people pleasing damages men in dating, but if you're reading on this website, you know that.

REVIEW

The Disease to Please is a wonderful book on the people-pleasing syndrome, offering both psychological depth and practical solutions.

It's perfect for all the nice guys and nice girls, for people stuck in passive and passive-aggressive communication, for those who are too submissive, for those who are fearful of others and for everyone who feels pressured into saying "yes" when they didn't want to say "yes".
Such as: for a lot of people who have room to become higher power and more assertive.

Harriet Braiker also happens to be one of this website's lesser-known favorite authors.
All of her work has been top-notch, and we learned a lot from it.

Get it on Amazon or check the best books collection.

 TPM's take for ambitious men: We highly recommend The Disease to Please, but we must add that it's only a first step for ambitious men.
To advance into the top-10% and gain serious respect, status, and attraction, you'll need more advanced resources that include dominant behavior, masculine body language, and more advanced mindsets. Once you're ready for that, you can check Power University.

The Disease to Please Summary: How to Cure People-Pleasing

The Disease to Please (2002) is a book for too nice guys and girls who say "Yes" when they really want to say "No." Harriet Braiker, the author, teaches people with the disease to please how to become more assertive, stand up for themselves, and respectfully say no when they want to say no.

Dropping In Podcast Review: Can Charlie Teach You Charisma?

Lucio Buffalmano · 20 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Dropping In Podcast is a YouTube channel and podcast by Charlie Hopert, and it replaced the former The Charlie And Ben Podcast when Charlie Houpert and Ben Altman split their business.
It also replaced Charisma on Command as Charlie with various breakdown and social dynamics commentaries.

About The Hosts
Charlie Houpert and Ben Altman are the founders of Charisma on Command, a YouTube channel that breaks down media personalities and celebrities looking for what makes them charismatic, appealing, or high power.
They also market a course on social skills called Charisma University and a course on emotional self-awareness and well-being called Emotional Mastery.

Update:
In November 2022 Charlie announced that him and Ben were going separate ways. He referred to a "co-dependent relationship that needed fixing".
Ben Altman took over the Charisma on Command channel while Charlie kept on working on the podcast.
This review focuses mostly on the work the two have done together, but it largely applies to the new podcast as well.

Why Watching It

In general, the main reasons we decided the show deserves a spot on TPM is because it can help viewers to:

1. To Learn Critical Thinking Skills

Learning critical thinking skills is the main reason I decided to review their podcast.

Critical thinking skills is a meta-skill in life.
And, so far, I have yet to find any good resource that focuses on developing, growing, and honing critical thinking.

So one of the best ways to learn it, is to engage with those who already have critical thinking skills, and see how they go about making sense of the world.

And The Charlie and Ben Podcast helps you acquire those skills by watching two smart and open-minded guys analyzing world news and events.

2. To Learn Logical Reasoning

The cousin of “critical thinking”, and the guys, Ben in particular, also display great logical reasoning.

You can see if most often as they look for both proving and disproving evidence for different theories or arguments.

3. For Role Models Of Success, With Ethical Standards

Both of them seem to be two ethical guys who have built a successful business while seeking to add real value, and avoiding the scammiest marketing ploys.

So they combined both ethics, with business and personal success.

That’s some eagle-stuff.

Ethics & Moral Self-Awareness

In between the "self-awareness" and ethics, the podcast is also great to spot our ethical blind spots as well.

What I like most is that Ben and Charlie always start any judgment towards others by looking at themselves first -and yes, sometimes they over-relativize as we'll see soon, but that's the right approach anyway and they mostly do it great-.

Just as an example:

> Charlie: this crypto-bullshit, the way that influencers are doing it is so morally (pauses to think of the right word) disturbing (…) there is not a single question of "is this a good thing to put this into the world".
> It's a bummer the lack of moral thought

I couldn't agree more.
And then, even better, he goes on to explain WHY it bothers him so much. And it's because he may have the power to do it with his audience, but chose not, and it annoys him that others are doing it without paying a price.

This is also one of the reasons why we say here that leaders must maintain some ethical standards and avoid free riders in their groups: otherwise, all the contributors will stop giving and caring, and the group loses its ability to pool resources and achieve goals.

4. For Self-Awareness / Emotional Mastery

Charlie and Ben are incredibly mature and self-aware -far more than I am in those areas-.

Their ability to self-analyze themselves from both a self-development and a psychological point of view is truly remarkable (and I learned a lot from that).

For example, says Charlie:

> Charlie: When I see at myself my relationship with authority has shifted as my understanding of my relationship with my dad has shifted.
> I was a MF pain in the ass arguer, stand-up posts, and when I was in my young 20's dude I was in at the rallies "fuck the man" you know, take this guy down
> Ben: (joking) "fuck my dad. I mean, the government"

Then Charlie goes on to explain that as he repaired his relationship with his dad, he started seeing value in more traditional or conservative values -didn't become conservative, but doesn't reject ideas off the cuff anymore simply out of personal rebelliousness-.

Very deep level of self-awareness, as well as emotional power dynamics.
What they're discussing is the rebelliousness of the people who are still under the yoke of a power figure -and their judgment of us-.
Some people rebel as a (misguided) effort to gain personal freedom.
What they're really rebelling against is often the mental power that the authority holds over them.

We call that authority figure "judge role" in interpersonal relationships.

CRITICISM

Albeit there is lots of good in the Charlie and Ben Podcast, there's also something we strongly disagree with.

In brief, Charlie and Ben, and even more Charlie, sometimes fall under what we label here "naive self-help". Specifically, it's "naive open-mindedness", "naive over-philosophizing", and naive (cultural) relativism.

If we were to use a single sentence to highlight the cons of the podcast, it would be this:

> An open mind is great, but not so open that your brain falls out.

Sometimes, the Charlie and Ben Podcast feels like the second part of that sentence.

Now let's go more into details about what we disagree with, and what doesn't align with TPM's views.

Just as a reminder: in spite of the entries below, we still like and recommend Charlie & Ben Podcast.

We highly recommend this article on naive self-help:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Popular But False Self-Help Myths

1. Over-Relativism Turns Into Naivete

OK, we get it:

Most people are too quick to pass judgment.
So generally leaving room for doubt is a good idea.

However, as for everything: balance.

If jumping to judgment with limited information is not optimal, it's not optimal to suspend judgment forever, either.
Because not everything is shades of grey, and not everything is a "maybe". Sometimes, something is clear -or clearly right or wrong-. And someone -or someone's action- is clearly wrong, right, guilty or innocent.
And even grey areas aren't perfectly grey. So someone's action may be "legal", but still "quite of an asshole thing to do".

To understand the general principle of the law of balance, bookmark this article for later if you haven't read it yet:

- The law of optimum balance

> The Law of Optimum Balance

The Cowardice of Suspending Judgment

Not the case of Charlie and Ben, but:

1. Philosophizing power move: Refusing to provide a clear opinion is sometimes a power move to make you sound intellectual and "superior"
2. Coward CYA policy: And it's also a coward and low-power move to hide yourself and avoid any scrutiny.

It's not by coincidence that in the Divine Comedy Dante places those who never took sides in the "inferno".

The uncommitted are neither in hell or heaven because nobody wants them. Their punishment is to chase a banner to atone a life of uncommitted cowardice

Never choosing a side can be a sneaky, manipulative tactic to appeal and play both sides. To never commit is also to refuse responsibility: you refuse to contribute and choose to stay in that safe limbo where you can never be proven wrong or called into question.

The Relativist Bane

To avoid providing a clear-cut opinion, Charlie and Ben, and especially Charlie, meander into a maze of endless relativism.

Sometimes relativism is exactly what you need to put things in perspective.
But eventually, you want to at least try and come back to more down-to-earth, pragmatic, concrete conclusions.

In many cases, I felt that relativism was pushed too far and was left at that, without even trying to reach a no-matter how-provisional conclusion.
And that includes many cases where a more concrete and pragmatic conclusion was either possible or, I felt, even easy.

Some examples:

1.2. Naive Relativism On Donald Trump: Can't You See The Red Flags of Dark Narcissism?

In this episode, Charlie and Ben discuss the Capitol Hill riots.

They say that if Trump believes the election was truly stolen, then democracy would be dead, and he is doing the right thing.

And if Trump doesn't truly believe the election was stolen, then… Then he's a dangerous crook, a potential tyrant?
Nope, they can't push that far, not even in the event that Trump made it all up just to keep power.
Instead, it's "looking for excuses to avoid a negative judgment". Charlie says that it could be cognitive dissonance in Trump's shoes and "it doesn't require a nefarious megalomaniac (to do what Trump did, it's implied)".

They then go on to say that "storming" is not necessarily bad or evil -which is fair-.

Yet in all this analysis never once did they address the fact that an endless string of Trump's behavior screams extreme narcissism, thin skin (typical of vulnerable narcissism), and an obvious drive to maintain and increase power at all costs, no matter what.

These two guys do personality breakdowns and even had a video on narcissism, but can't even bring themselves to air the possibility that Trump may be a narcissist, and high in dark triad traits?

Is it bias, contrarian spirit for living in California, fear of being "judgmental" or "conservative", or is it "relativistic fundamentalism"? I think it's the latter: they may reject religion and ideology, but they sometimes get lost in relativistic fervor.

In my eyes, that made it a very poor analysis.

And please note this has little to do with politics, and all to do with personality analysis and spotting red flags.
For example, I don't think Trump was a particularly bad president in terms of policies -he didn't start a war, which is not too bad to start with-.
But he was a poor example of a leader, and a danger to democracy. The guys heavily underestimated how close Trump was to overturning democracy.

For an analysis of Trump's last attempt to hold on to power, read here:

- Capito Hill riots and narcissistic manipulation
- Trump: a threat to democracy?

Not Calling An Asshole An Asshole Is A Disservice to The Audience (Andrew Tate)

It's not just about Trump.

Charlie often extends moral relativism in judging characters.

Murderers are not at fault because that's their brain make up.
Or because of the experiences they've had.

As fans of Free Will by Sam Harris, it makes sense they feel that way.
However, same as Harris, they fall into the same trap of conflating free-will with the different reasons why it can make sense to blame and deliver punishment, including: retribution, eradication through example, upholding value-giving VS value-taking as a value in society by punishing the latter, judgment of character and action along moral and ethical standards, and personal strategies and self-defense against potentially dangerous characters.

So yes, they're right about the reason.
But it's also right to say "that guy is an asshole" if one behaves like an asshole.

Sometimes the guys also seem to extend too much benefit of the doubt.
In this case, they are talking about an influencer who promotes online gambling.
Charlie says:

> Charlie: it doesn't seem that he's asked himself "is this good or not". He hasn't though about any of those considerations

That's almost more offensive to tell of that the guy that he's an asshole. Because it's the equivalent of saying that he's got the brain of a dog.
Who can promote online casinos without thinking that people are going to lose money?

In this other episode they spend half an hour, literally, talking about Andrew Tate, a dark triad self-appointed self-help guru.
Tate's business model -and narcissistic need- is to court attention at all costs, and he does it by being as provocative as possible (note: some in the TPM's community disagree, saying that, at least initially, Tate had good advice and helped them).

Charlie and Ben come up with all kinds of reasons for his behavior except the most obvious one.
And not even once did they even consider malevolence and a selfish intent to milk his audience as much as possible, without a care in the world for the customers.
In the next episode, Charlie discusses Tate's story of beating a bully and his dad congratulating him as if the story were true. It's funny they often say of media that you can't take the news as true (makes sense), but then assume that what Tate says -Tate being the type of character that I wouldn't trust a single word out of his mouth- is true.

This is a disservice to the audience because learning to judge characters is a fundamental life skills.
Especially so when it comes to manipulators, value-takers, and potential psychopaths.
With their over-relativistic attitude, they're inadvertently teaching their audience to over-trust.

1.3. Naive Relativism of Expertise: Tin Foil Hat David Icke Gets Same Credit As Scientific Community

Sometimes relativism means to Charlie that almost any opinion is worth the same.

This relativism bias is based on what we may call "naive logic", and it starts like this:

Everyone can be wrong, biased, or deceitful.
And it's easy to find evidence that any single person, at least sometimes, was wrong.

The mistake is then to over-expand that truth to mean that "since anyone can be wrong, biased, or deceitful, then everyone's ' opinion has an equal likelihood of being wrong, biased, or deceitful".

That's just stupid logic, and any 2-year-old would know when they'd rather trust their parents, than a stranger.

So of course the fact that if "10 doctors" say anything about their field of expertise, there is no guarantee of it being correct.
But it's still more likely they are correct, than any random 10 non-doctors.

However, the relativist zealots sometimes miss this very simple concept and can end up sounding ridiculous.
For example, check Charlie's comments in this episode on David Icke and the "Covid 5G conspiracy":

> Charlie: I watched the David Icke Brian at the beginning of this, and David comes and says "it's 5g and this is a big plan", and I go "look I don't know, we'll see"

So Charlie basically says that he doesn't know if 5g is responsible for Covid, which is "fair enough to say" -but it's not fair to give it too much credit, given what they already knew at the time, read on-.
What's not fair enough instead is to consider David Icke, a conspiracy theorist claiming that an inter-dimensional race of reptilian beings has hijacked the Earth- at the same level of the community of doctors and epidemiologists who see no connection between 5g and Covid.

Charlie himself goes on to offer perfect rebuttals of why that point of view made no sense in light of available data and logic, not even when it was first proposed (ie.: if the connection was true, we'd see more Covid cases in places with more 5g, which is not the case and, sometimes, opposite of what we see).

So… Why would you give that much weight to the opinion of a person with low authority and credibility, with a bad track record of BS, and an illogic explanation that makes no sense when checked against the available data?
Attention: that doesn't mean you should 100% throw out the opinion, that would be going too extreme in the opposite direction and a logical and scientific approach always leaves doors open.
But your brain should go:

1. Low authority guy

2. Low expertise guy
3. Poor track record
4. On the podcast of a guy with a track record of creating (fake) drama for views and money
5. Promoting a theory that not a single accredited scientist endorses
6. Promoting a theory that my own logic, based on current data, plainly contradicts

That already should tell you to de-prioritize and probably stop listening UNTIL he has amassed more evidence and/or someone corroborates that point of view with some evidence.

So the end result is NOT "I don't know, we shall see", but:

> Can't say 100% for sure, but very low chances, and it's much more likely that the YouTube host was chasing views. So don't waste time on this and move on".

Instead, nope, like a self-righteous philosopher adrift in a sea of relativism, Charlie proudly keeps all doors open to any possibility -the time you wasted on idiots be damned-.

1.4. Naive Relativism on Personality Disorder: "we're all sociopaths"

You gotta love this one.

At least, you gotta love this one if you're a malignant sociopath :).

It's indeed the abusers of this world who love that type of relativism the most.
As Marta Stout said: some people are just bad, and some others can't stop making excuses for them -I'd add, it's often the limousine liberal types who do it-.

Let's see what that excuse-making looks like.

Charlie says:

> We're starting from the presupposition that there are sociopaths and that is a useful definition.

Well, yes, there are, and I find it a perfectly useful definition.
And then:

> And in I think that in some contexts it is (..) what I come back to is that all of these diagnoses and all of morality is totally relative to your surroundings, such as that in 200 years we're all going to be diagnozable sociopaths, or whatever they call it, ASPDs, it will have evolved by then

I think this is nonsense relativism.

Of course there is some relativism and we're all insensitive to some of the world's pains, but there are clear traits and behavioral patterns of sociopathy, one of which is "lack of empathy".
And no matter how things evolve, a high-empathy guy is still different from someone else without empathy.
That difference remains no matter how you want to put things into perspective.

This is something Charlie repeats once again in this episode during Johnny Deep's court hearings, with the usual theme being that "we all have those traits and needs, some just a little bit more".
What's lost in that naive relativism is that, first of all, some have it a lot more, not a bit more (and some, not at all).
And two, that the spectrum is also a bell curve distribution where the differences grow HUGE at the extremes.
Going to an extreme in some traits or needs changes someone fundamentally. If we're talking about psychopathy, those extremes make one far more likely to be harmful and dangerous to others -someone should send Charlie the stats of the psychopathy rates in the general population, and in prisons and see how he'd spin that-.

The fact that it's a spectrum does not invalidate the usefulness of labels and does not invalidate the reality of what it's like to live with someone with a certain mental health issue.

1.5. Naive Relativism On Predatory Cults: Cults Are The Same As Any Other Organization

In this episode Charles Manson.

And, as you might guess by now, he relativizes Manson and his activities as well:

> Charlie: and he definitely has cult-like aspects of what he does but here's the problem. So you look at all these things sociologists have to find it I'll read you some of the the key indicators of a cult okay so you (…) I'm gonna describe every organization to you (implied, via the dinition of a cult)

Charlie seems to imply that didn't feel comfortable doing a video on Charles Manson because the overlap with any other group was too strong in his opinion.

What he's then trying to do is to relativize the definition of a cult so that he can say that it's meaningless and that any organization can be defined a cult (on another episode, he says cults are similar to American next top model with Tyra Banks).
He's got a point, actually, especially with religion and the army.
Yet, it's not the same thing at all. This is deceiving relativism. Deceiving relativism is based on the false assumption that anything which can be placed on the same scale is the same.

There is a huge difference between doing something at a moderate level, and doing something at an extreme level.
As Layne Norton says whenever he corrects nutrition quacks: the poison is in the dosage.
So albeit every organization persuades and "mind controls" and may turn exploitative, we use the word "cult" for extreme controlling behavior and for more extreme exploitation of the individuals/
And that is a BIG difference.

The fact that each one of them can be exploitative doesn't make it equal because the intensity is different.
Exploiting someone out of the pocket change that they willingly offer in the church is very different than robbing someone of their whole life saving -or leading them to commit suicide as it's happened for some cults-.

1.5.2. Naive Relativism on Civilizations: Romans Are The Same As Barbarians

Later in that same podcast Charlie says that barbarians are no different than Romans, and barbarian is "everyone that's not Roman".

The difference here is that barbarians don't develop civilization-defining institutions, technologies, and methodologies such as writing, schools, and science, Or, if they did, they developed them at far lower levels.
There's also a very practical difference: when civilizations such as the Roman Empire invade a neighboring region, it's still an invasion, but the annexed region can often be better off under the Romans. If barbarians invade, they're very rarely better off.

This is how smart people talk stupid sometimes: they take something that makes sense in moderation and they take it to an extreme.

1.5.3. Naive Relativism on Predatory Practices: Landmark Forum

Charlie shares a great story about his experience in, if I remember correctly, the Landmark Forum.

If it wasn't Landmark, it was something similar anyway.

The process Charlie describe was appalling to me.
The “gurus” had everyone stand, then close their eyes and chant something, and say that they “commit to self-development” and to joining the next upsell seminar (paid, of course).
Charlie also recalled that almost as soon as they started, the moderators reneged on one of the core initial agreements.

That reeks of cult to me.
But Ben said “no knock on them”.
And Charlie had no strong opinion and no strong words against that behavior, saying that he was grateful for what he learned and could still recommend the business for what he had learned there.
To me, that’s nonsense.
Deceptive methods are what deceptive, crappy people use within crappy and deceptive organizations.
People also learn everything that’s not expressly said from the supposed teachers and their character, and you can’t recommend people who are that shady.

2. Misguided Rebuttal of Science

It feels to me like Charlie and Ben sometimes devalue or under-value science and its contributions.

For example, while defending Charisma University from those who ask about “how science-backed it is”, Ben says:

> Ben: people say “do you have any studies to back that up”. Well, what I have is my experience, the experience of people I’ve coached, the experience of watching other people. And that seems to me to be far more valuable than if I rely on a study

I partially agree in the sense that personal experience and a skilled guy looking for patterns is better than “a study”.
But I disagree with the frame that seems to be “experience VS science”.

Science, or studies, are a huge opportunity for extra data points.
And, in some cases, it can open the floodgates of data points in ways that your personal experience can’t match.

You can’t for example have a lot of experience in having lifelong intimate relationships because you can have at most one.
But science can analyze 1.000 lifelong partners and tell you what makes them stick together.

And much of your experience is biased no matter how often you achieve something.
Ben has no experience dating as a non-attractive, short, poor guy, or overweight guy, for example.
And if he were to rely on his experience alone, he has no idea what’s it like to date as a non-attractive guy. He also has no idea how challenging, if it’s challenging at all, for a guy who is, say, overweight.
But getting access to a survey might show him that 10% of women say “I don’t care” when it comes to extra kilos, something he’d never know based on his experience.
Or, he may see in a meta-analysis that 99% of women say “absolutely not” to overweight guys, in which case he could amend his course to prioritize nutrition -something he couldn’t know based on his experience alone-.

Ultimately, it’s not a question of “one VS the other” or “one better than the other”, since it also depends a lot on context and on what we’re talking about.
It’s more a question of how to blend them together.

- Three pillars of knowledge

https://thepowermoves.com/three-pillars-of-learning
In this other video Charlie, with a holier-than-thou attitude that he unluckily resorts to a bit too often, equates the citation system to a popularity context:

> Charlie: What college teaches us about citations, well I understand the intent but it's deeply unscientific, because the way that everyone I think probably even your thesis advisors read your thesis is that they do not reference every single citation you make and then go to that book and then reference the citations (…) it's an appeal to authority over and over and over.
> (mimicking high-pitched female bragging voice) How do we know that it's true he's got a lot of citations.
> You know what I mean, (mimicking high-pitched female bragging voice) like a lot of people say that i'm right too, it's just a popularity contest masked as as truth

He's got some good points, but it's also a huge strawman.
I've never heard anyone saying that anything was good or true "because it had a lot of citations".

2.2. Misguide Rebuttal of Evolutionary Psychology's Contributions

Unluckily I missed the links on this one.

In any case, at least once and probably more than once Chalie and Ben criticize evolutionary psychology.
In one case, it was because the theories were more like storytelling without data.

But here's the misunderstanding, as Steven Pinker explains, the fact that several pop-psychology authors make up crappy stories and call them "evolutionary psychology" doesn't mean that evolutionary psychology is unfounded. it means that those authors are full of crap.

Evolutionary psychology is a fundamental discipline to understand human behavior and, as we shall see, Charlie and Ben largely missed that train (they probably grew up in the blank slate era and never challenged it or questioned it much).

For example, in one instance Charlie and Ben discuss attraction being subjective.
And IT IS subjective (as well as socially and culturally influenced), as we even say here.
But not nearly to the extent they seem to suggest, and there are plenty of traits and behaviors that are attractive across the board.
For example, no woman in no era preferred shorter men to taller men, poorer men to wealthier men, lower status to higher status men, or dumber men to smarter men.
Exceptions always apply, but we're talking about exceptions.

> ExceptionAL Dating: How to Succeed Despite Shortcomings

2.3. False Cognitive Fallacies: The Brain Works Better Than You Think

Kahneman's work largely opened the pandora box on cognitive biases.

In short, the "naive cognitive fallacy" looks like this:

Explain why something apparently makes no sense with naive logic, and then explain how IF we could just be more rational we'd be so much smarter and better off.

For example, a supposedly human fallacy is that of feeling good or bad depending on the relative level of our achievements and/or lifestyle compared to the people around us.
Ben in this episode says the life of an average person in the West today is better than the life of pharaohs and kings of ancient times. But we don't get to reap the benefits of that improvement because we compare ourselves to other people in the present era.

But the comparative fallacy is a fake fallacy.

It's NOT irrational to feel less than a king if you're middle class or poor because status and the benefit distributions based on status hierarchies ARE comparative -and are comparative in the present-.

Now it might be smarter to feel great about whatever we have, and that's true.
But that's not how the brain works, and it's not irrational or fallacious.

To be precise, Ben never said it's irrational.
But the implication is that the brain is failing while, in fact, at least in this case as in other "cognitive biases" fallacies, the brain is perfectly attuned to the realities of what provides us survival and reproductive benefits.

3. Blank Slate Approach

The "nature VS nature" is a long-standing, fundamental debate in the social sciences.

And, generally speaking, Ben and Charlie lean heavily into the "nurture" category.

They often talk about "being socialized" or "learning" to like certain things and behave in certain ways.

They're not always extreme, but they're… Quite extreme at times.
Frankly, sometimes I've been surprised how these two smart guys that I respect veered so far deep into the "nurture" camp.

For example, in this episode and talking about the nature of sexual attraction, Charlie says:

> Charlie: we have been taught to primarily want through the eyes of others because we have not been trained not to know how to fantasize and want on our own

What?

It's true that attraction has a strong social component -and especially so in women-.
But one, there are REASONS why -again, evolution is far from perfect, but less stupid than you'd think-.
Second, we haven't exactly been taught that. For reasons that are a bit too long to explain here, it makes perfect sense for an individual to like and want what others want.

3.2. Disney Taught Us Monogamy? Not Really

In another episode that I forgot to save, Charlie talks about the "ideal of monogamy" in the west.

And, if I recall correctly -IF- he ascribes Western monogamy, the concept of love, and his own ideal of romance to Disney movies.
Not true.
Falling in love is a chemical reaction that has little to do with Disney movies, and people tend to stick together in any culture -including remote and isolated tribes-.

And please note, this is NOT a defense of monogamy, love, or anything, it's simply to say that it's not Disney that invented and implanted into people's brains the ideals of "sticking together" and "faithfulness".

3.3. Breakup Pain "Learned Response"? Nope

Example:

Ben mentions that breakups can take a heavy toll on people, and Charlie says:

> Charlie: we talked about it before I think it's primarily hard because of the cultural narrative that we place on relationships which is essentially that you're complete now you've found your other half you know I mean > you're gonna be together forever and we're gonna sing

Talking about how he consciously resists that cultural narrative, he says:

> Charlie: and when I often catch myself expecting beyond that I try to go hold on this is a fantasy concocted by Disney movies and Ed Sheeran and and Bruno Mars and it is going to destroy you if you buy into it

It's an interesting point of view, and it may be partially true, in some ways, and culture probably does have an impact.
Yet, to talk about emotional attachment as if it were a cultural phenomenon, even if only primarily a cultural phenomenon, is misguided.
Emotional attachment is an inborn drive, it's cross-cultural, and even men and women who haven't seen Disney movies have it.

4. Misses Second Order Consequences

The guys do a great job at challenging many beliefs.

Yet, they do hold several beliefs, acritically, that seem to make sense on paper, but that do show some cracks when you examine them closer.

For example:

4.2. Drug Decriminalization: Are You Sure It'd Be Better?

In this episode Ben and Charlie seem to agree that legalizing drugs is a better approach.

Since they don't mention the type of drug, it seems they hold that view generally, and independently of the type of drug.

This is a common thesis quite popular in the liberal and left-leaning camps.

The assumptions are that:

1. Legalizing drugs will disempower the cartels and decrease violence
2. People will not consume more drugs
    1. We remove the "cool factor" of drug consumption which may lead to a decrease in consumption

Albeit I do agree, even strongly agree that decriminalizing is best, the truth is that I don't really know if things would generally be better.
And the reason why I don't know is that we never tested it out.
So neither do they know for sure, unless some countries first try to legalize ALL drugs, and compare the effects.

For example, making drugs easier and legal to access may tempt more socially restricted and reputation-aware folks who avoid drugs out of shame or out of "fear of being caught".
Until we test a system with legalized drug consumption, including stronger ones, we can't know for sure.

4.3. Higher Tax Don't Stifle Productivity?

This is another popular argument among liberal-leaning folks.

In this episode, Ben says that he's not convinced that higher tax rates stifle productivity and entrepreneurship.

So far, OK.

Then he says that guys like Bezos and Musk aren't going to stop working because of a higher tax rate. The reason, says Ben, is that it's because they're driven by "something else".

Partially true.
And Charlie that "they'll move somewhere and continue working" -already the argument is fallacious then: a government that raises taxes would push the entrepreneurs away, and higher taxes do stifle productivity then-.

Ben adds that if the tax rate goes up by 5% he won't work 5% less.
Maybe true.
But now he moved the goal posts and it's a very different proposition: he's arguing about a perfectly linear effect, not on whether there is an effect or not.
Of course there is no perfectly clear effect, but that doesn't mean there is no effect whatsoever.

The other issue with taking extremes such as Bezos and Musk is that many folks do work hard to gain early retirements, or because they're driven by more selfish motives of amassing resources and power. And those will, likely, end up working less when you make it more difficult for them to enjoy the fruits of their hard work.

4.4. Stock Market Always Go Up?

Charlie says that the common advice on investing in the stock market is misguided (a proposition that is not very thought through in itself), and Ben replies:

> Ben: I actually think you're totally fine if you work a 50k your job and you've been putting your money away into into a mix of cash a bond ETF and a S&P 500 and you're like oh no my savings are down tremendously right now (…) it's fine it'll bounce back in the next six years

This is trend extrapolation.
Ben is most likely right, but it's far from a given.
It should be obvious why it's a fallacy, so we won't even get there, but I like to quote Nassim Taleb on this:

> I'm sure that Carthage and Jerico had their own no less eloquent pundits saying "our enemies have to destroy us many times but we always came back more resilient than before"
> Nasim Taleb, The Black Swan

4.5. There's Only Upsides to Letting Businesses Fail (Free Market Fallacy)?

Talking about allowing businesses to go bankrupt VS propping them up with government loans:

> Ben: people think that if an airline company went bankrupt we wouldn't be able to fly (…) but if an airline company goes bankrupt they don't just get all their planes into a hangar and then throw TNT at them to create an explosion. They sell them for as much as they can get so all the flights would still be the same if we did have a government that said "hey just you guys know no bailouts are ever coming your way"

In brief, Ben says that if an airline goes bust, then a new airline will take its place, at no cost. And probably it'll be more efficient, and everyone's better off.

Albeit I agree with the principle, it's not true that there are no costs associated with bankruptcies.
Just to name a few:

- Time wasted on sales/purchases: weeks at least, and those planes won't be flying during that time providing no value and while leaving some of those who'd like to fly without a flight
- Time and money wasted on contract re-negotiation: time lost to re-negotiate contracts from the bankrupt entity, to the new one. That's weeks without a salary for the workers

And the small things add up as well:

- Airplanes to repaint
- Former miles and bonuses erased

There are even social and emotional costs for some people:

- Social capital loss with team shakeups (low chances of the same people working in the exact same time, so you lose some social capital that has to be rebuilt)
- Brand value loss (I remember many Berliners disappointed when Air Berlin went bust)

Plus, in extreme cases as in during financial meltdowns, letting companies go bust accelerates the meltdown.
Many economists today recognize that letting Lehman Brothers fail was the biggest mistake in the whole 2008 financial crisis.

This is not to say that the costs of bankruptcies are always and necessarily high.
And even less to say that they are too high to let companies fail. Indeed, Ben is right. Most of the time it's probably far better to let the company fail.
The small short-term costs will probably be made up over time.
But it's not true that there are no costs and no downsides with bankruptcies: there are plenty of costs.

5. Sometimes Disempowering

Let me preface this by saying that the "disempowering messages or moments" are extremely few.

Still, since we care about general empowerment here, we want to address this:

> Charlie: the difference between me and Lebron James is roughly the same as Lisa Leslie to Lebron James, right (…) I was born with a deficiency of testosterone that preclude me from ever competing against Lebron James

This is an argument Charlie repeats often when he tries to justify his approval of trans-athletes competing against biologically born females -something I and most other viewers disagree with, but let's skip that now-.
However, without a good preamble, that can come across as a very disempowering mindset.

It might seem like it's stating facts, but it's stating facts that are heavily skewed against him to make him look as bad as possible.

Charlie might have less testosterone than Lebron, I don't know that, but let's imagine it's true.
Does that mean he can't compete?
Well, he's still definitely shorter and probably less athletically predisposed at playing basketball.
But who says that basketball is the main yardstick for competition? Because the two may compete, say, at launching a business on social skills -and Charlie's likely kicks Lebron's ass there-.

Even if we narrow the competition to "physical competition", I see no reason why Charlie couldn't go head-to-heard on some other sports.
Had he picked, say, rope climbing, it's now Charlie's thinner frame that might give him a huge, inborn leg-up.
Or, if we also want to consider "racial background" in what gives people an advantage or disadvantage, had he picked cycling, he might have also prevailed -especially if uphill cycling, where lighter cyclists often have an advantage over larger ones-.

One could take Pantani and say “he can’t compete against Lebron”. Or take Lebron and say “he can’t compete against Pantani”. When you put it that way it’s obvious why it’s silly: it’s just two different sports. It’s the same for most anything else in life: you only need to change the sport/environment to get very different results.
Even if we talk in terms of “life utility”, if society were to collapse, being fast on a bike would be a lot more helpful than shooting hoops in a basket.
And if that collapse goes on for longer, being fast on a horse may become more important -something where Charlie could outdo most basketball players-.

Golden Nuggets

OK, that’s a lot of “criticism” :).

Now let’s review some golden nuggets besides the initial high-level ones we mentioned in the beginning:

The “What’s The Future Slavery” question

The guys are pescatarians because they say modern animal farming is brutal and unethical.

They say it’s the equivalent of slavery: today most people take it for granted that slavery is unethical and odious. But back in the days, it was normal.
Similarly, in the future, people will take it for granted that current animal farming and slaughterhouses are brutal and odious, but this concept hasn’t yet reached the masses.

If I recall correctly, Charlie reached that conclusion by asking himself exactly that:

What’s the present equivalent of slavery?

I found that question truly deep and challenging -in a good way-.

Healthy personal growth does not pursue the same ever-growing goal, but evolves either laterally, or by changing goals

Ben makes the point here that if you keep chasing growth in the same field, then you’re not after growth, but trying to fill a void.

They were talking about YouTubers chasing views and subscribers and never switching to another type of growth, like more free time, or personal enlightenment.

Albeit he doesn't expressly say it, I think Ben is especially referring to vanity metrics or to typical markers of "success" like money, turnover, company size, attractive partner, or the number of partners.

I had never thought about it, and it was eye-opening.

Empathy is necessary to become an eagle and end social climbing

Ben touches on a very important aspect at the intersection between power dynamics and personal self-development.

He says of a member of the "Young Turks", a group of left-wing folks who go very heavy on attacking others, especially those with different political orientations:

> Ben: Well i've experienced this. It's fun to be judgmental (…) and feel superior to people and you lose all of that with empathy.
> If you have empathy you won't shit-talk anybody (…), so you get none of those temporarily great feelings (…)
> She feels awesome shit-talking on those people and doesn't want to give that up in exchange for understanding them better. That's a very unappealing short-term trade and in the long run (it would be) much better for her

This is a genius insight.

While I had previously only analyzed these dynamics from a power point of view, I had under-estimated the personal development point of view, and completely missed the role that empathy might also play.

Pushing others down and social climbing feels good in the short run and may give the social climber some short-term power boost.
However, it's a "glass ceiling behavior" in the sense that it puts a glass ceiling on you, preventing you from flying higher and from achieving a higher level of success and self-fulfillment.

Ben here says that developing empathy and understanding for others can help solidify a more eagle-like personality, which indeed makes sense.

The "Informed Citizen" Lie (Enlightened Individualism)

When it comes to news -or avoiding the news- Charlie said it best:

> There is a myth of the informed citizen, which tells you that you have to react or overreact and discuss all the things you see in the news because it's screamed at you and you're told that's important (…)
> If you can't influence it, make it better, leave it alone (…)
> Instead, go help an old woman cross the street or go to a food bank, or donate, or give a hug, or call your loved ones. Do some good.

Yep.
I actually wished he'd repeat that more often.
People see what you do, more than hear what you say. So when they see them commenting the news, they may fall for that myth.
Instead, I'd recommend you take the method to analyze the news, more than discussing the news itself.

Referring again to slavery and the (positive) evolution of people's ethics:

On "God" power moves:

Ben on news that he found "good" and worth commenting on:

> Ben: I got one more thing, it's interesting, mostly because it just confirms something i already believed, which is everyone's favorite news

That was a great one, and a good way to end this long review :).

REVIEW

I really like the Charlie & Ben Podcast.

It's also the first podcast we review here after countless books and courses.

At the time of this writing, I've seen all available episodes.
I enjoy them whenever I'm eating on my own. Rather than just sitting there with the food, I use that time for YouTube or audiobooks.

For me, it's both a pleasure to hear two smart and partially like-minded guys discuss the current events that I largely ignore, and also a source of business intel since we are both in the same space -I learned a lot from whenever they shared the behind-the-scenes of Charisma on Command-.

But the main reason why we decided to review it is that:

1. Learn critical thinking skills, via their analyses, probing questions, and steel-manning opposing arguments
2. Charlie and Ben are good role models of standup folks. Ben particularly seems to be a good eagle-type of guy to emulate (Charlie may join the club as soon as he loses the Smart Alec and covert social climbing approach, including when he points at an argument's fallacy and then laughs)

Our main disagreement is that, sometimes, they go so far in their effort of trying to be open-minded and not rushing to conclusions that they end up sounding surprisingly naive for the two smart guys they are.

But, Overall, thumbs up for the Charlie & Ben podcast, and they get the TPM stamp of approval :).

- Pain is OK, part of life, and you can also learn to accept it

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Tara Brach is an American author and proponent of Buddhist meditation.
According to Wikipedia, she holds a bachelor's degree in psychology and political science from Clark University and received a doctorate in clinical psychology from the Fielding Graduate University which, frankly, raised some red flags of a diploma mill-type of institution.
Brach is also a meditation teacher and founder of the Insight Meditation Community of Washington, D.C.

Swap Feelings of Insufficiency With Self-Acceptance

> For so many of us, feelings of deficiency are right around the corner. It doesn't take much—just hearing of someone else's accomplishments, being criticized, getting into an argument, making a mistake at work—to > make us feel that we are not okay.

Some examples of how people fail to accept themselves and feel insufficient:

- Do I accept my body as it is?
- Do I blame myself when I get sick?
- Do I feel I am not attractive enough?
- Am I dissatisfied with how my hair looks?
- Am I embarrassed about how my face and body are aging?
- Do I judge myself for being too heavy? Underweight? Not physically fit?
- Do I accept my mind as it is?
- Do I judge myself for not being intelligent enough? Humorous? Interesting?
- Am I critical of myself for having obsessive thoughts? For having a repetitive, boring mind?
- Am I ashamed of myself for having bad thoughts—mean, judgmental or lusty thoughts?
- Do I consider myself a bad meditator because my mind is so busy?
- Do I accept my emotions and moods as they are?

Radical Acceptance = Mindfulness + Compassion

Radical acceptance is to transcend our emotional wounds, doubts, and feelings of insufficiency:

> Radical Acceptance is the willingness to experience ourselves and our life as it is. A moment of Radical Acceptance is a moment of genuine freedom.

"As it is", crucially, also means without judging ourselves.
So, for more clarity, that "willingness to experience ourselves" also means "willingness to accept ourselves".

Says the author:

> In holding ourselves with compassion, we become free to love this living world. This is the blessing of Radical Acceptance: As we free ourselves from the suffering of "something is wrong with me," we trust and express the fullness of who we are.

For radical acceptance, you want to accept everything that is you:

> The way out of our cage begins with accepting absolutely everything about ourselves and our lives, by embracing with wakefulness and care our moment-to-moment experience.
> By accepting absolutely everything, what I mean is that we are aware of what is happening within our body and mind in any given moment, without trying to control or judge or pull away.

Later in the book, the author includes acceptance of physical pain as well.
Many people turn pain into emotional as well. A backache may turn into how we don't exercise enough, being tired into how we eat too much, etc.

The Two Wings of Radical Acceptance

Radical acceptance has two pillars:

1. Seeing clearly (mindfulness), the quality of awareness that recognizes exactly what is happening in our moment-to-moment experience

2. Compassion: our capacity to relate in a tender and sympathetic way to what we perceive

The two are interdependent and need each other.
Together, they free us from the vicious cycle of reactions. As an example, this is what the author says:

> If we are rejected by someone we love, the trance of unworthiness may ensnare us in obsessive thinking, blaming the one who hurt us and at the same time believing that we were jilted because we are defective. We may feel caught in a relentless swing between explosive anger and wrenching grief and shame.

Mindfulness alone would allow us to sit with the pain of our heart, to clearly see the stories we are telling ourselves—that we are a victim, that we will always be alone and without love.
But we might compound our suffering with self-accusations and self-blaming. This is where the wing of compassion joins mindfulness for genuinely healing presence, says the author.
Rather than pushing away, judging our anger, or turning it against others or ourselves, compassion enables us to be softly and kindly present with our open wounds.

If that sounds a bit woo-woo… It is :).

Healthy Striving to Improvement Must Be Grounded Into Self-Acceptance

This is an important concept:

> When we strive to impress or outdo others, we strengthen the underlying belief that we are not good enough as we are. This doesn't mean that we can't compete in a healthy way (…) nut when our efforts are driven by the fear that we are flawed, we deepen the trance of unworthiness.

Same goes for confronting failures.
When we hide failures from ourselves, we often do so based on the fear that we are not enough, and we reinforce that fear and belief.
So any effort of self-development without the foundation of self-acceptance is also ineffective, because we are not free to give it our best shot, accept our mistakes, and learn from them.

Also see:

- How to develop a growth mindset
- The antifragile ego

> The Ultimate Personal Power Tool: The Antifragile Ego

Accept Yourself to Avoid Making Up Enemies (Including Making Yourself An Enemy)

> out of fear, we turn on ourselves and make ourselves the enemy, the source of the problem. We also project these feelings outward and make others the enemy. The greater the fear, the more intense our hostility. (…) Directing anger at an enemy temporarily reduces our feelings of fear and vulnerability.

Misconceptions Around Radical Acceptance

- It's not resignation, instead, the curious paradox is that when I accept myself just as I am, then I can change
- Does not mean defining ourselves by our limitations. While there may be some truth in our assessments of limitations, Radical Acceptance means we can accept it without giving our fear-based stories the power to shut down our lives. And to also accept the endless creativity and possibility that exist in living. By accepting the truth of change, accepting that we don't know how our life will unfold, we open ourselves to hope so that we can move forward with vitality and will

- It's not self-indulgence. It doesn't mean that because you discover and accept a lust or drive, you act on it. If we are addicted to nicotine, for example, Radical Acceptance doesn't mean that each time we feel like having a cigarette, we go ahead and light up
- Does not make us passive, instead, by accepting rather than denying or reacting to our suffering, we free ourselves to work without bitterness or self-pity
- It doesn't mean accepting a "self". This is a note for the Buddhist who prefer to see themselves as "part of a whole". So the author says that when we say, "I accept myself as I am," we are not accepting a story about a good or bad self. Rather, we are accepting the immediate mental and sensory experiences we interpret as self.

Master The "Art of The Pause"

Learning to pause is the first step in the practice of Radical Acceptance. A pause is a suspension of activity, a time of temporary disengagement when we are no longer moving toward any goal.

When do you pause?
Any time. Especially any time you feel you're too stressed, reactive, angry, or at the mercy of your (negative) emotions:

> The pause can occur in the midst of almost any activity and can last for an instant, for hours or for seasons of our life.
> We may take a pause from our ongoing responsibilities by sitting down to meditate (…) We may pause in a conversation, letting go of what we're about to say, in order to genuinely listen and be with the other person. (…) We may pause when we feel suddenly moved or delighted or saddened, allowing the feelings to play through our heart.

And, as we mentioned, pausing is even better when we're being overwhelmed:

> Often the moment when we most need to pause is exactly when it feels most intolerable to do so. Pausing in a fit of anger, or when overwhelmed by sorrow or filled with desire, may be the last thing we want to do.

Let Go And "Chill" More

> It is easy to feel that something bad will happen if we don't maintain our habitual vigilance by thinking, judging, planning. Yet this is the very habit that keeps us trapped in resisting life. Only when we realize we can't hold on to anything can we begin to relax our efforts to control our experience.

Work Out of Love, Rather Than Out of Fear

Talking about her own work, and the experience of doing it out of love for the work and for sharing it, VS the "need for approval":

> But sometimes that voice of insecurity and unworthiness arises, and I listen to it. Suddenly writing or preparing a presentation is linked to winning or losing love and respect and my entire experience of working shifts. The wanting self takes over. While I always intend to give a wholehearted effort, now that effort is wrapped in fear.

> I'm anxiously striving to be "good enough" and to reap the rewards. My love for what I do is clouded over when working becomes a strategy to prove my worth.

This is linked to what we call here "judge power dynamics".

> The Judge Role: A Tool For Emotional Control

Prevent Your Biases From Stopping Empathy & Connection

I truly appreciated this passage in which the author frankly talks about her own biases as a more left-learning person.

First, she says that "we all have our own complex and largely unconscious system of classifying others".
For her, it's the rich and "white", and she comes clean on it:

> When I read the newspaper or watch the news, I regularly run into my own anger and dislike toward public figures who are rich, Caucasian, usually male, powerful and conservative. As I hold tightly to my views of right and wrong, I type these senators, corporate executives and editors-in-chief as the "bad guys," as part of the problem. They become characters in an upsetting movie, not living, breathing humans.

Later on, she talks about working with one, and finding him a human being, just like everyone else.

Medications Have Their Place, But Don't Rush to Them

The author is not an extremist against medications.

She says that whenever fear is too overwhelming, or when our physical body can improve via medication, then that may be the most compassionate course of action.
However, you want to avoid the mentality of "needing a drug" every time something aches.
This is something that our Western culture pushes on us, to "need" a medication as a fix for every ache or pain, rather than, maybe, accepting it or going through it:

> Mistrusting our bodies, we try to control them in the same way that we try to manage the natural world. We use painkillers, assuming that whatever removes pain is the right thing to do. This includes all pain—the pains of childbirth and menstruating, the common cold and disease, aging and death. In our society's cultural trance, rather than a natural phenomenon, pain is regarded as the enemy. Pain is the messenger we try to kill, not something we allow and embrace.

Says the author about her experience of accepting the pain of childbirth (the midwife speaks first):

> "Nothing's wrong, honey . . . it's all completely natural, it's just painful."
> She had to say this several times before I could let it begin to sink in and, in the midst of the burning pain, the explosive pressure, the tearing and exhaustion, remember again to breathe deeply and relax. It was just pain, not wrong, and I could open up and accept it.

MORE WISDOM

We forgive also for ourselves

> We maintain the intention to forgive because we understand that not forgiving hardens and imprisons our heart. If we feel hatred toward anyone, we remain chained to the sufferings of the past and cannot find genuine peace. We forgive for the freedom of our own heart.

REAL-LIFE APPLICATIONS

When you hurt someone, listen and apologize sincerely

> The key elements are: taking responsibility for causing pain to another, listening deeply to understand the person's suffering, sincerely apologizing and renewing our resolve to act with compassion toward this person and all beings.

We agree.
Whenever I see some person avoiding apologies at all costs, I get an important red flag of someone who's too hang up on power, dominance, and fragile ego defensiveness to truly connect with others.

Give the critic a chance: sometimes, he's hurting

In one of her sessions, a guy called Tom was imposing on others and creating resentment in both the group, and the author.

Tom was more the guy who goes for solutions like TPM, telling men to be more confident if they wanted more respect from their wives.

That annoyed the author to no end.

But when Tom stayed longer to talk to her, she paused, and relating kindly to her own anger enabled her to open and pay attention to what Tom was feeling, and she asked herself "what do you (Tom) really need"?
She stopped seeing him as a nuisance, and even stopped seeing him as a "client", since she had used the "therapist/client" roles to distance herself from him.
She now instead saw two people sitting together, both vulnerable and suffering human beings.

She listened attentively, and also gave him feedback about his role in the group.

Long story short, she felt better about Tom, their relationships, and herself.
And Tom improved, and his behavior in the group also U-turned.
He opened up in the group, saying that he wanted to help but had failed at it just like he had failed with his son.
And, the author says, it turned out that the person she tagged as "most unwanted other" ended up playing a key role in opening up everyone in the group.

Note: Higher power beavior + radical acceptance
Please notice that this is not to say that his initial suggestion of "being more confident" was wrong. It was, indeed, correct.
But both approaches of self-awareness, vulnerable acceptance, AND higher power behavior are valid.

QUOTES

On the tragic ignorance of "Us-Them" parochialism (really touching):

> In the summer of 1991, I was flying across the country, talking with the woman sitting next to me.
> She told me her son was in the air force and had safely returned from Desert Storm, the war with Iraq.
> Then she leaned toward me with a smile and spoke softly: "You know, it went really well. Only a few of our boys died."
> My heart sank. Only a few of our boys.
> What about all the Iraqi boys and women and children? What about the millions who were yet to die from radioactive contaminants, or from starvation and disease during the economic embargo that followed the war?
> Our boys.

CONS

Naive & potentially dangerous self-help: watch out for the mistaken view of "no bad people exist"

Says the author:

> in sharp contrast to our cultural conditioning as heirs of Adam and Eve, the Buddhist perspective holds that there is no such thing as a sinful or evil person. When we harm ourselves or others, it is not because we are bad but because we are ignorant.

This is just wrong, unluckily.
People may not be evil, but many people can ACT evil, and that's pretty much the same to you.
Plus, it is pretty much a fact that some people are more likely to harm others.

And she goes on to say:

> To recognize this basic goodness in everyone takes courage. Trungpa calls this the task of the spiritual warrior, and says that the essence of human bravery is "refusing to give up on anyone or anything."

Yeah, that may be true in a way.
But it's also freaking stupid and potentially harmful in another.
It can take a lot of stupidity to trust someone who gives off red flags left and right because you're putting yourself -and possibly others- in the path of harm.

Please go through this article on naive self-help, especially the section on "seeing the goodness in people":

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

Naive self-help: sometimes simplistic, confuses self-doubt with legitimate innate drives to "appear better"

Sometimes self-help books like Radical Acceptance have an underlying assumption that "the way most people are is sub-optimal" or "wrong".
They may never say so, but that's the assumption.

However, that assumption is not correct.
It's simply that our brain isn't built to maximize good feelings, but to attain certain goals and benefits in life.

For example:

> The belief that we are deficient and unworthy makes it difficult to trust that we are truly loved (…) We fear that if they realize we are boring or stupid, selfish or insecure, they'll reject us. If we're not attractive enough, we may never be loved in an intimate, romantic way.

Yes, she's right, in part, and accepting her point of view can be helpful for some, in some circumstances.
But it's also wrong. If people think you're boring or stupid or selfish or insecure, they may reject you. And they may have a good reason to.
And it's also more likely to be loved if you can make yourself into a more attractive person.

This same there is spread across the book: the author never acknowledges that many of the drives and wants she's rejecting are ingrained into humans, and are as natural to being human as what she calls radical acceptance.
Actually, those drives, needs and wants are far more natural than radical acceptance.

Read more on naive self-help literature:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

Not Very "Radically Accepting" The Human Nature She Dislikes (Ie.: His Son Played "Violent Videogames")

While the author exhorts us to radically accept everything, it sometimes feels like the "radical acceptance" is more for what the author likes and endorses.

For example, says the author:

> My aversion to his testosterone-driven attraction to violent video games and movies had created a gulf between us.

I bet she'd have radically accepted his behavior, her feelings about him, and their relationship if he was instead playing guitar and writing songs about world peace and love :).
Instead, she wanted to change him, and changing someone is all about influence and power.

Tara Brach: How About Radically Accepting Our Will to Power?

Tara Brach wanted to influence his son's behavior.

Totally normal.

Yet, she glosses over that only to focus on the part where she tries to accept, rather than change.
But I bet that she if had found an easy way to make her son's behavior more to her liking, she'd have done it, and been far happier and fare more "accepting" of that new behavior.

It feels to me pretentious to pretend not to be interested in influence and power and talk at length about radical acceptance… While at the same time denying very human drives such as "shaping the world around us as we like", which is about power.

And attention, we're not saying here that radical acceptance is invalid: it is extremely valid. Even for those interested in power.
But BOTH are important, and neither one denies the other.

REVIEW

Radical Acceptance is a really good book on "spiritual growth" and self-acceptance.

Sometimes if you come from a more scientific background and inclination, including "acceptance of human nature" from a more scientifically informed point of view, you may see the author as more of a left-leaning, peace-and-love, hippy type of person.
But that is our own bias. And, as the author herself did and described in this same book, it's up to use to see beyond our own biases and find the human we have in front when in real life, and the wisdom they have when we're learning.

Here, we take a stance that both approaches of acceptance & vulnerability WITH power intelligence and higher power behavior as interdependent, not as opposed or as "one better than the other".

So whether you're a more spiritual person, or a more "logical/scientific" one, you can only gain and grow with "Radical Acceptance".

Takeaways

- Power is good for your health because it prevents anxiety and feelings of helplessness. Conversely, not having power is bad for your health because it creates more anxiety and feelings of helplessness
- Power is necessary to get things done even if, and maybe especially if, you want to do something good
- You can't escape power dynamics because hierarchies are intrinsic to human nature, and many want to move upward

Notes

About the Author:
Jeffrey Pfeffer is a Professor of Organizational Behavior at the Graduate School of Business, Stanford University. According to Wikipedia, he received his BS and MS degrees from Carnegie-Mellon University and his Ph.D. from Stanford University.

Power Is Healthy, Low-Power Is A Health Hazard (Literally)

Why should you want power?

It turns out, power is important also for the "I'm not interested in power" type of folks.
And it's for the same reason why you'd want to eat healthier, rather than unhealthy: having power is related to living a longer and healthier life.

A study of 7372 British civil servants showed that the lower the rank or civil service grade, the higher the age-adjusted mortality risk.
Of course other health markers also mattered, but smoking, cholesterol, blood pressure, obesity, and physical activity only accounted for a quarter of the variance.
What did matter, implies the author, was power and status—things that provided people greater control over their work environments.
Pfeffer says that job control and status accounted for more of the variation in mortality from heart disease than physiological factors such as obesity and blood pressure.

Albeit that's quite something if you think about it, the author makes a good point that it shouldn't be surprising, since a lack of control over one's environment produces feelings of helplessness and stress.

Summarizes the author:

> So being in a position with low power and status is indeed hazardous to your health, and conversely, having power and the control that comes with it prolongs life

Seek Power As If Your Life Depends On It

The link between power and health is what motivates the author to end with what's probably the most famous and memorable quote of Power: Why Some People Have It, and Others Don't:

> So seek power as if your life depends on it.
> Because it does.

Lucio's note: the original study refers to status rather than power
While status and power overlap and I tend to consider Pfeffer's interpretation fair, it's also an important distinction to note. See our main resource on status:

- Why social status matters, also for health (and how to get it)

> Social Status: What It Is, Why It Matters, How to Master It

You Can't Escape Power Dynamics: Hierarchies Are Inherent to Human Nature

The author says that there is evidence that it's impossible to create organizations "free of power dynamics".

The reason is biological: power hierarchies are ubiquitous in animal societies, and those animals, humans included, are hard-wired to want to move up.

Not only hierarchies are ubiquitous to any social animal, but:

1. People naturally create hierarchies from scratch: when people expected to interact on a task, particularly when task performance was important, they voluntarily constructed differences in hierarchy (Tiedens, 2007)
2. People naturally support hierarchies, even at their individual cost, Jost's research shows that people voluntarily contribute to their own disempowerment to maintain a stable hierarchical social order (Jost, 1994)
3. Status overlaps across hierarchies, and the status one achieves in one hierarchy tends to translate and spill over to others (several studies, including Berger, 1998)

Status Generalizes Over Different Environments

In the small pond syndrome, a staple article of this website, we made the case that some people fall prey to unhealthy "status obsession" within social circles.

The syndrome means that status and social circles become all-consuming for these people, and that leaves them like fishes out of the water when, eventually, the social circle dissolves or when they're forced to exit it.

Pfeffer later in the book confirms that's indeed the case for many but, it turns out, there is a silver lining.
The silver lining is that, says the author, status in one specific social circle often carries over to new ones.

Says the author:

> Status, however derived, tends to generalize across the environments in which we interact.
> One implication of this phenomenon for you is that the specific organization or domain in which you rise to power may matter less than the fact that you manage to achieve high-level status someplace.

The author mostly refers to workplaces though, and the examples are of very high level positions where your previous history is known far beyond your specific organization.
So, for example, if you were an exec at a major corporation, you will be an exec even at a new corporation and, often, even if you move to a different industry.

I still believe part of the concept applies outside of work, but mostly because of the confidence and the power skills that you acquire in climbing any hierarchy.
Since those skills are pretty much similar in any other hierarchy, once you have the skills, you can quickly enter and skyrocket upwards in any new group -especially newly forming ones-.

Rule of Power #1: Play, Or Lose By Default

I loved this story.

It's a real-life cautionary tale of how naive people eventually meet their downfall when they ignore power dynamics and personality's red flags:

> Not long after I joined the board, in the midst of an upgrading in management talent, the CEO hired a new chief financial officer, Chris.
> Chris was an ambitious, hardworking, articulate individual who had big plans for the company—and himself.
> Chris asked Bob to make him chief operating officer. Bob agreed. Chris asked to join the board of directors.
> Bob agreed. I could see what was coming next, so I cal ed Bob and said, "Chris is after your job."
> Bob's reply was that he was only interested in what was best for the company, would not stoop to playing politics, and thought that the board had seen his level of competence and integrity and would do the right thing.
> You can guess how this story ended—Bob's gone, Chris is the CEO.

Chris behaved like a driven asshole. There are many like him near the top.
But the guy who was on top, Bob, was too naive to stand up to him.
And what's even more telling is how people reacted:

> What was interesting was the conference call in which the board discussed the moves.
> Although there was much agreement that Chris's behavior had been inappropriate and harmful to the company, there was little support for Bob.
> If he was not going to put up a fight, no one was going to pick up the cudgel on his behalf.

It's Your Responsibility to Learn Power Dynamics

If you remain naive to power dynamics, you often lose out.
and you don't just lose out to any random folk, you often lose out to the dark triad folks who are far worse than you at your job -and far worse for everyone else-.

Says the author on the responsibility of learning power dynamics:

> Stop waiting for things to get better or for other people to acquire power and use it in a benevolent fashion to improve the situation. It's up to you to find—or create—a better place for yourself. And it's up to you to build your own path to power.

The Leadership Literature Is Misleading: Avoid It

The moment I reached this paragraph, I knew the book was going to be great.

Says the author:

> Most books by well-known executives and most lectures and courses about leadership should be stamped CAUTION: THIS MATERIAL CAN BE HAZARDOUS TO YOUR ORGANIZATIONAL SURVIVAL. That's because leaders touting their own careers as models to be emulated frequently gloss over the power plays they actually used to get to the top.

And on naive self-help, he adds:

> the teaching on leadership is filled with prescriptions about following an inner compass, being truthful, letting inner feelings show, being modest and self-effacing, not behaving in a bullying or abusive way—in short, prescriptions about how people wish the world and the powerful behaved.
> (…)
> Most CEOs are not the level 5 leaders described by Jim Col ins in Good to Great as helping to take companies up the performance curve—individuals who are "self-effacing, quiet, reserved, even shy," who get the best out of employees by not soaking up al the limelight and making al the decisions.

You should be particularly cautious of CEOs and leaders writing their own books because:

1. Leaders may believe their own lies: leaders such as former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani or former General

Electric CEO Jack Welch, writing books and articles about themselves, may believe they are being inspirational and even truthful

2. You only hear half the story, told by those in power, those who won. You don't get to hear much from those they beat to get there -and how they did it-
3. The "winner bias", with many associating success to "goodness" and choosing to see and remember the most positive stories and traits

And, we add:

- Outright lies to come across as "good"

The author glosses over though the most obvious reason why those leadership books may be misleading: that the people writing them may simply be lying.
Or using them as self-promotion material
Says the author himself:

> But leaders are great at self-presentation, at telling people what they think others want to hear, and in coming across as noble and good.

We can't agree more.

Political Savvy & Will to Power Advance Careers

Politically savvy and seeking power matter when it comes to career success.

Surprisingly though, it also matters when it comes to performance.

One study by the Harvard Business Review divided 50 managers based on their need for affiliation, achievement, and power. It was the managers primarily interested in power who most effective in achieving positions of influence inside companies, as well as in accomplishing their jobs.
My Note:
50 managers is a very small number to draw any strong conclusion.

Another study with 509 participants showed that managers who scored higher in political skills received higher performance evaluations and were rated as more effective leaders.

Performance Matters Less Than You Think

Performance coupled with political skills that gets you up the ranks.

Performance as in "delivering" and "adding value" matters of course.

But, by itself performance is not enough. It's "seldom sufficient", says the author and, in some cases, may also not be necessary.
Jeffrey Pfeffer indeed aptly titles the first chapter of Power "It Takes More Than Performance".

The author provides examples of performance being "awarded" with a pink slip, and poor performance not getting any negative consequences -or, sometimes, even big bonuses-.
If you're not yet at the top, your relationship with your boss matters more than your performance:

> The lesson from cases of people both keeping and losing their jobs is that as long as you keep your boss or bosses happy, performance really does not matter that much and, by contrast, if you upset them, performance won't save you.

In my job experience in large companies, that's largely true.
In smaller companies and startups, your output matters relatively more though, especially if you're in sales or revenue-generating roles.

Pfeffer summarizes his stance saying:

> Not only doesn't good performance guarantee you wil maintain a position of power, poor performance doesn't mean you wil necessarily lose your job.

And he then provides some data:

- Your manager's decision in your hiring significantly impacts your performance appraisals on a study analyzing the performance appraisal ratings of 354 clerical employees working in the public sector (Schoorman, 1988)
  My Note: this particularly study offers no evidence of personal choice being superior to job performance
  Albeit the author says that the manager's preferences in your hiring mattered more than performance, we cannot safely jump to that conclusion from this study -also see the "criticism" section-.
- Age and organizational tenure mattered more than job performance when it comes to salaries (Medoff, 1980)
- Performance ratings of "very good" were only 12 percent more likely to be promoted than colleagues rated "good" in a white-collar workers analysis (Dohmen's, 2004)
- Managers looked at job tenure, educational credentials, and overtime work, not just performance, when it comes to deciding internal mobility, a study of more than 200 employees from a variety of companies showed (Carmeli, 2007)
- Productivity was weakly tied to performance ratings, and educational credentials mattered more for promotions, even if they weren't the best employees as data analysis from the Department of Defense Civilian Personnel Data Files showed (Spyropoulos' master thesis, 2005)

Summarizing the research literature, Pfeffer concludes:

> Extensive research on promotions in organizations, with advancement measured either by changes in position, increases in salary, or both, also reveals the modest contribution of job performance in accounting for the variation in what happens to people.

Or, to put it more simply: "the data shows that performance doesn't matter that much".

The same is true for CEOs:

- CEOs who presided over three straight years of poor performance and led their firms into bankruptcy only faced a 50 percent chance of losing their jobs, and power mattered more than their performance on whether they kept their job (Gilson, 1989)

Concludes the author on the “performance VS politics” question:

> Performance does affect job tenure and its obverse, getting fired, but again the effects are smal

Politics may matter even more for executives:

- Executives turnover was more affected by CEO changes than by performance, shows a study of the top five executive positions in almost 450 companies (Fee, 2004)

Executives change the most during CEO changes, probably because the new CEOs appoint loyalists as executives.

To Advance, Get Noticed

Most leaders in your company don’t have complete visibility and knowledge about everyone in the organization.

So even if you do great work, they may never know about it.

So it’s important that you promote your contribution, promote yourself, and become known.

Avoid becoming the “foundation guy” (focus on “recall” instead)

The foundation guy is:

The guy who does the foundational work, but who, just like a building’s foundations, is completely out of sight.

People only realize how important he is when he leaves, but by then it’s too late to reap any benefits for your work -and for your leverage-.

in our “visibility matrix” the “foundation guy” does important, but invisible work:

Some people also become the foundational guy with the “heads down work approach”, or by focusing on their work only, without every getting any attention.
That’s a major political mistake, say the author.
Pfeffer exhorts readers to focus on getting attention instead, because good work isn’t enough. Just like in advertising the main performance indicator is “ad recall”, so you should focus on being known and remembered.

The 3 Obstacles On Your Path to Power

1. Thinking the world is a just place (belief): and that “people get what they deserve”, either in positive, or negative. But the “just world hypothesis” is wrong: the world is not a just place. You must be proactive in building your power base
    1. Contribution is always rewarded: the mistaken belief that good people and/or good work will be rewarded, and that if you take care of delivering value, then you’ll automatically reap the rewards. Delivering value is crucial to advance in life but, per se, may not be enough. Political skills and power awareness are equally important
    2. Bad behavior eventually catches up (karma): not necessarily. Sometimes bad people win. And sometimes people who added little or no value, or even who took value, may advance -and overtake you-
2. Naive leadership literature (misguided available resources): the leadership literature is naive self-help, based on the false assumption that the world is a just place, and ignoring the real-world power dynamics we learn here
3. Yourself & your psychological defenses (fragile ego): many people don’t even try, or give up way too soon. That’s often because they want to avoid the emotional pain of a loss

We fully agree and highly recommend this article on naive self-help:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

The 7 Personal Qualities That Bring Influence

1. Will
    1. Ambition
    2. Energy
    3. Focus, including an ability to prioritize and assign more focus and energy on the most critical activities
2. Skills
    1. Self-knowledge & reflective mindset, to understand where you need to work on and how to adjust
    2. Confidence, and the ability to project self-assurance
    3. Empathy, as in the ability to read others and empathize with their point of view
    4. Conflict tolerance, or you fail to be assertive and too easily fall for the aggressive power moves that put conflict-avoidant and more submissive folks on the retreat

Intelligence, says the author, is instead often overrated.
The failure of intelligence to explain much variance in "who gets ahead" lead to the idea of multiple types of intelligence. That's a rather controversial claim though, and the author mentions emotional intelligence, which also doesn't seem to be a great predictor of work success.

My Note: emotional intelligence only serves you if coupled with power awareness, drive, and Machiavellianism
At TPM, we analyzed that same issue and up with our own construct of the type of intelligence that matters most. And that's power intelligence, the type of intelligence that allows you to understand the power dynamics, the political landscape, your leverage, and to come up with the most appropriate Machiavellian strategies.

Confidence and self-assurance

Says the author:

> In making decisions about how much power and deference to accord others, people are natural y going to look to the other's behavior for cues. Because power is likely to cause people to behave in a more confident fashion, observers wil associate confident behavior with actual y having power. Coming across as confident and knowledgeable helps you build influence.

The author says you can learn it, something we agree wholeheartedly with (and it's also a good part of what we teach here at TPM).

Strategically Choose Your Field of Work & Starting Position

The author shows that there are trends in the background of those who reach the top.

And the general rule is that the higher position more frequently goes to those who rose through the ranks of the higher power departments.

However, those "in-vogue" departments may be higher competition, and since there are trends in which departments and functions are higher power, the smartest strategic choice is to look at what may be trending in the future, and then find a niche there with less competition.

He says:

> if you want to move up quickly, go to underexploited niches where you can develop leverage with less resistance and build a power base in activities that are going to be more important in the near future than they are today.

That's easier said than done, of course.
So here are some tips on how to spot the higher power departments:

What Confers Department Power

- Unit cohesion: speaking with one voice, being able to act together in a coordinated fashion.
  That's why the military evaluates leaders in part on the cohesion of their units (also see this case study of military leadership manipulation) and why coaches of team sports work so hard to build unity of action and purpose
  Example: at Ford's finance function, socialization rituals served the same function as training in the military for the company's young, up-and-coming executives building common bonds of communication and trust that come through shared experiences
- Critical resources: as per social exchange dynamics, those who provide the most value, also have more power. Critical resources in organizations include money, skills, or the ability to solve critical organizational problems Evolution: in the beginning of the 1900s entrepreneurs held the CEO positions, then manufacturing and production became the most common backgrounds for corporate leaders because solving production and engineering issues were the most critical tasks) Starting in the 1920s and into the 1930s, CEOs came from marketing and sales because selling, rather than producing, became a more important challenge. Finally, beginning in the 1960s CEOs came out of finance because of the capital markets growing importance and shareholder as the most important measure of organizational success (Fligstein, 1987)

Since resources are important for power, when it comes to choosing your role, choose positions that have greater direct resource control of more budget or staff.

How to Recognize The Higher Power Department

If you're not sure about which department is higher power and more influential, here are some good indicators:

1. Relative pay, both starting salaries and the pay of more senior positions
2. Physical location and facilities, being close to those in power both signals power and provides power through ease of access and, most likely, increased contacts
3. Positions in committees and senior management cadre. Such as who, besides the CEO, is the insider most likely to serve on a company's board of directors

Focus More On Power, Less On "Being Liked"

Don't discount being liked: it's better to be liked, than disliked.

However, not at the cost of being respected, and always choose power over being liked.

When Machiavelli said that if you have to choose between being liked or feared, be feared, he anticipated 500 years of social psychology research (Machiavelli, 1532).
In business, fear may not be the best strategy, but a reputation for toughness may help.

For example:

- Negative reviewers come across as more intelligent, competent, and expert than positive reviewers, even when independent experts judged the negative reviews to be of no higher quality (Amabile, 1983)
- Niceness frequently comes across as weakness or even a lack of intelligence, even though nice people come across as "warm" (Cuddy, 2009)

Says the author:

> if you have to choose between being seen as likable and fitting in on the one hand or appearing competent albeit abrasive on the other, choose competence.

But of course, the two aren't mutually exclusive, and "powerful" doesn't mean "unlikeable".
As a matter of fact, as the author says, likability may create power, but power also creates likability as well as attracting people. People want to be close to powerful and successful people, after all.

The author then goes into the stereotype content model, something that is also foundational to this website.
Our "power & warmth" high-level approach is also based on that:

> Power Strategy 101: High-Power / High-Warmth

Strategic Anger Displays

Some examples:

- Anger can make you seem dominant, strong, competent, and smart, although of course, also as less nice and warm (Tiedens, 2001)
- People expect high-status people to be more angry than sad or guilty when in negative situations (Tiedens, 2000)
- People expect low-status people to feel sad or guilty instead of angry in the same negative situations

Summarizes the author:

> If you express anger, not only do you receive more status and power and appear more competent but others are > reluctant to cross you

Being Nice As Power Move

Being nice to people is effective because people find it difficult to fight with those who are being polite and courteous.

Learn Networking Skills, Grow & Use Your Network

Independently of your job, the evidence shows that networking is important for people's careers.

Hence, says the author, everyone can benefit from improving their networking skills and developing better social networks.

Wolff and Moser define "networking" as:

> Behaviors that are aimed at building, maintaining, and using informal relationships that possess the (potential) benefit of facilitating work-related activities of individuals by voluntarily gaining access to resources and maximizing advantages.

Their study on more than 200 people in Germany divided networking behavior between internal/external and building/using, and successful networkers do all four of them:

1. Building internal contacts (e.g., "I use company events to make new contacts.") 2. Maintaining internal contacts (e.g., "I catch up with colleagues from other departments about what they are working on.")
2. Using internal contacts (e.g., "I use my contacts with colleagues in other departments in order to get confidential advice in business matters.") 4. Building external contacts (e.g., "I accept invitations to official functions or festivities out of professional interest.")
3. Maintaining external contacts (e.g., "I ask others to give my regards to business acquaintances outside of our company.")
4. Using external contacts (e.g., "I exchange professional tips and hints with acquaintances from other organizations.")

Develop Many Good Relationships: It's More Effective Than Few, Deep Relationships

What connections matter the most in networking?

Surprisingly, it's weak ties that bring the most benefits when it comes to work and career (Granovetter, 1973).
The reason is that strong, which are family, friends, and close associates with frequent interactions, often travel in the same circles and have similar knowledge and similar opportunities to offer.

Weak ties instead are more likely to link you to new people, organizations, information, and opportunities.

However, for weak ties to work, they must be able to link you, and willing to do so.
So it's important that you network with high-value people who can open doors for you, and that you have good enough relationships and make a good enough impression, that they will want to.

Hence, an optimal networking strategy, says the author, is to:

> know a lot of different people from different circles, have multiple organizational affiliations in a variety of different industries and sectors that are geographically dispersed, but not necessarily to know the people well or to develop close ties with them

Be At The Center Of Your Networks

Your influence and career trajectory depend a lot on your network position.

And, generally speaking, the more central you are, the better it is.
Says the author:

> If virtual y al information and communication flows through you, you wil have more power. One source of your power wil be your control over the flow of information, and another is that people attribute power to individuals who are central.

To assess your centrality, look at how many come to you first, and how much communication flows through you.

Become A “Relationship Broker” Bridging Different Networks & People

People tend to cluster with those who are similar to them.

This creates a great opportunity for “social chameleon” who can get along with many different people and groups:

University of Chicago business school professor Roland Burt calls this network approach “bridging the structural holes”.
Says the author:

> The fundamental idea is deceptively simple: by connecting units that are tightly linked internally but socially isolated from each other, the person doing the connecting can profit by being the intermediary who facilitates interactions between the two groups

The author says that the number of structural holes an individual bridges positively affects promotions, salary, and organizational level.
Also, the author warns that it’s a false myth and belief that being close to a networks’ linchpin gives you similar benefits: Burt found out that just being one step away from the connector’s role brought virtually no benefits.

Strategic Resource Allocation: How Much Should You Devote to Networking?

Yes, networking brings benefits, but it also requires time and effort and, hence, has a cost.

How much you should spend on networking also depends on your role, and your goals.
The author says:

> You should decide how much time to spend and your specific networking strategy based on the extent to which > your job requires building social relationships for you to be successful (…) and the type of knowledge most useful in your job.

There are two types of knowledge and they need different networking strategies (Hansen, 2001):

- Explicit and codified benefit from many weak ties, information that can be shared easily and readily with diagrams, formulas, or "recipes" is easier to transmit and requires less effort, hence you don't need major social capital to get people to help you
- Implicit and tacit need close ties, because knowledge of, say, a good clinician who understands not only the science but also when to do what, needs time and effort to share, so you need more social capital for people to want to teach you

In product development for innovation, where the type of information required is almost impossible to specify in advance, many weak ties were most useful because a large network allowed product development teams to explore broadly for helpful information.
Product development projects using existing competencies and information that could mostly be anticipated benefited instead with a smaller network to get the product out the door more quickly.

Speak & Act With Power

It's easier and more effective to both develop a network and make the most out of it, if people hold you in high regard.

Says the author:

> Both in the process of creating social ties and once you have created a network, your ability to create and leverage social ties depends in part on how others perceive you. And those perceptions depend in part on your ability to speak and act with power.

We have great resources here on TPM on that:

- High power talk to speak so that people listen
- Low power talk and submissive words you need to avoid
- High power behavior to act so that people follow you
- Low power behavior that you need to avoid to come across as unconfident and weak

> 10 Ways to Be More Dominant

The author also touches upon frames and frame control here, albeit never calling it that way and referring to it instead as "who sets the rules of the interaction".

How to Handle Opposition

Anything worthwhile you'll be trying to achieve, there will be competition and some opposition along the way.

But albeit the author previously extolled the virtues of power over warmth, now instead he warns against too much power and dominance:

- Use some tenderness: people meet force with force (psychological reactance, Jack Brehm) and while steamrolling may work with some, most people will seek to push back and react to your attempts to overpower them as they seek to maintain their power and autonomy. So, instead, treat your opponents well
- Power protect and leave people a graceful out: this is what Dale Carnegie first labeled "save people face" and what we call here "power protecting"

  - Give them a good deal to quit, and say nice things about them
- Win them over to your side: coopt them and make them a part of your team or organization by giving them a stake in the current system (we call this "aligning incentives" here)
- Outplace them: get them a better job somewhere else where they will not be underfoot, or give them a good deal to exit
- Focus on the data: that way, people cannot take things personally, or blame you for any decision that goes against them

From a mindset point of view:

- Don't take things personally, make important relationships work

Don't let your ego or personal preferences stand in the way of getting things done.
Sometimes you may not like someone, but if you need them to accomplish your goals, so what. Work with them anyway.

> Gary Loveman's advice: after you reach a certain level, there comes a point in your career where you simply have to make critical relationships work. Your feelings, or for that matter, others' feeling about you, don't matter. To be successful, you have to get over resentments, jealousies, anger, or anything else that might get in the way of building a relationship where you can get the resources necessary for you to get the job done.

Also read on growth mindset and the antifragile ego:

> The Ultimate Personal Power Tool: The Antifragile Ego

- Don't let the battles make you lose sight of your final goal:

> You need to continually ask yourself, "What would victory look like? If you had won the battle, what would you want that win to encompass?" People lose sight of what their highest priorities are and get diverted fighting other battles that then cause unnecessary problems

Sometimes, you can be disempowered in the short term, but still reach your final goal -and it's only at the end that you measure your success and power-.

Stay Upbeat During Turmoil: Nobody Wants to Help Losers

Remember that people want to associate with winners and want to avoid losers.

So it's important to behave and look like a strong winner, even if you feel like a loser at some points in your life:

> Situations are often ambiguous. Did you resign or were you fired? Was your previous job experience successful or not? One of the ways others are going to ascertain how things turned out is by how you present yourself. Are you upbeat? Do you project power and success or the reverse? This is why developing the ability to act in ways that you may not feel at the moment is such an important skill .
> You want to convey that everything is fine and under your control, even under dire circumstances

That is the best way to get over the difficult time, and attract some help and support.
Says the author, with an intuitive grasp of social exchanges:

> This advice does not mean that you should not tell people what happened and enlist their aid. It does mean you > need to show enough strength and resilience that your potential allies wil not believe their efforts to help you wil be wasted

Leaders: Make Your Goals Seem Compelling (& "Good")

We totally agree with the author here:

> Your path to power is going to be easier if you are aligned with a compelling, socially valuable objective.

It doesn't mean you have to lie, says the author, but that "to the extent you can associate your efforts with a social y desirable, compel ing value, you increase your likelihood of success".

Higher objectives must not be saving animals or forestalling global warming, and some may think, it can simply be a goal or a generally held value that is beside your own self-interest.
For example, scheming CEOs and executives do it often in the name of "shareholders value":

> Power struggles inside companies seldom seem to revolve around blatant self-interest. At the moment of crisis and decision, clever combatants customarily invoke "shareholders' interests." As in, "It would be in the shareholders' interests to have a new CEO," or a "new board member," or for that matter, new executives in other senior roles.

Of course, the two things must also not necessarily be mutually exclusive: you can do well for shareholders or for your "higher goal", while also doing well for yourself.
Says the author of Gary Loveman's work at Harrah:

> Loveman is sincere and he has certainly delivered for the shareholders (…)
> But this talk about shareholder sovereignty is also a framing that works to portray his power at the gaming company in a social y desirable and acceptable fashion

The Costs of Power

It's generally better to have power, than not to have it.

When Andreotti, a highly skilled politician that Robert Greene pegged as "the most Machiavellian Italian politician of modern times" was asked if "power wears you out", he replied that "yes, it wears out those who don't have it".

However, there are some costs to power.
The author lists:

1. Visibility and public scrutiny holding a position of power means that more than your job performance is being careful y watched
    1. Fear of taking risks: Under the pressure to "look good," people and companies are reluctant to take risks or innovate, opting to do what seems safe
2. Loss of autonomy: with more demands and obligations on your time
3. Time and effort: building and maintaining power requires time and effort. Time that you cannot spend on other things, such as hobbies or personal relationships and families.
   The costs are higher for women, says the author
4. Trust issues: the higher you rise, the greater the number of people who want something from you -including your job-. Consequently, holding a position of great power creates a problem: who do you trust?
    1. Distort reality & absence of critical thought, as more people around you turn into "ys-men" and shield you away from important truths and feebdack

5. Addictiveness of power: power can be addictive both psychologically and physically, with many people who experienced depression and physical symptoms when they stepped down a high-power position (no matter how much money they had)

Overconfidence & Falls From Grace

Yes, power can corrupt.

And the effects of power corruption can make you lose power.

It's not (necessarily) only a literal "corruption", it can be a moral, behavioral, and psychological corruption that can come back to bite you, and cause your downfall.
The changes include:

> power produces overconfidence and risk taking, insensitivity to others, stereotyping, and a tendency to see other people as a means to the power holder's gratification

Research has shown that giving power to people made them feel superior to those they were supervising and wanted to distance themselves from those less powerful -and that even though in this experimental study the supervisor was randomly determined and temporary-.

That is dangerous because if you let power corrupt you to the point that you start mistreating others, you make more enemies that will want to undermine you and disempower you.

Says the author:

> Overconfidence and insensitivity lead to losing power, as people become so full of themselves that they fail to attend to the needs of those whose enmity can cause them problems. Conversely, not letting power go to your head and acting as if you were al -powerful can help you maintain your position.

Also, you want to retain empathy and sensitivity because they help you both make and keep friends and allies, and remain alert to the politics and power dynamics around you.
Talking about the risks of being too direct and not power protecting enough, the author says:

> Having a position of formal authority or even being right is not going to win you the support of those whose mistakes you have called out. It is tough for those in power to see the world from others' perspectives—but if you are going to survive, you need to get over yourself and your formal position and retain your sensitivity to the political dynamics around you

A tip the author shares to "keep your head" is to expose yourself to social circles that know nothing about you and where you're not as high power.

To recap, the dangers of power are that you:

- Treat others poorly and make enemies: power corrupts your character and you feel superior and start seeing others as inferior and "deserving of poor behavior"
- Grow overconfident in your hold to power and lose sight of the possible machinations that others are setting up to dethrone you
  - Grow overconfident in others and trust the wrong people

MORE WISDOM

Make yourself unique in the team

A smaller-seeming power play, but that can make the difference.
Says Pfeffer in one of his mini-case studies:

> Success began with preparation. While most of her compatriots took the entrepreneurial classes offered in the business school, Anne took a class in the engineering school on starting new ventures. With that one move she altered the power dynamics and her bargaining leverage.
> In the business school class, there were about three MBAs for every engineer, while in the engineering school course, there was only about one MBA for every four engineers.

"Uniqueness" is valid at many levels.
Since the engineers could develop products but needed business-savvy folks for business plans, she put more negotiating power in her corner.
But Anne was also one of the few women there, and the only woman in the group she eventually chose.

You must tailor to your culture, environment, organization

Many authors and pundits like to dispense catch-all advice and prepare "lists of power laws".

But that doesn't work, says Pfeffer:

> Not all organizations have identical political cultures, and not al individuals are the same, either.
> Unfortunately, we live in a world in which much of the management advice proffered is presented as universally true. And unfortunately, many people are looking for simple, universal formulas for action that wil work equally wel in all circumstances.
> How you behave and what you should do needs to fit your particular circumstances—the organizational situation and also your own personal values and objectives.

Also, remember that we live in a world with little certitudes and 1:1 causal links.
Instead, we live in a world of probabilities.
So your task is to always choose the course of action with the highest probability of winning.

Asking Works: So Ask More

The author uses several examples to show that asking for mentorship and/or help, works.

At worst, he says, you get a no, which has little downsides anyway.

And he then points to a few studies showing that people find it uncomfortable to ask and underestimate the likelihood of others helping and wanting to help.

People also underestimate what's in it for the people granting the help.
For example, in many cases, people feel good being asked (it sub-communicates they can give, a high power position to be in), people feel good when they can help, and they will also gain if you turn out to be a grateful ally.

Encourage Others to Follow The Rule If You Got Power, But Find Alternatives If You Don't

People with power generally set the rules that benefit them.
If you play by the rules, you will hardly reach the top -especially not while those who set the rules are still there-.

> if you have all the power you want or need, by all means not only follow the rules but encourage everyone else to do so too. But if you are still traversing your path to power, take all this conventional wisdom and "rule-fol owing" stuff with a big grain of salt

Organizations Don't Care About You

Towards the end of the book Pfeffer deals with some ethical questions, including:

Isn't it bad for the organization if we play all these power games?

And, he says, you sholdn't ask yourself that, because organizations don't care about you anyway.
Also read:

Grow Comfortable With Power: Both Wielding It, And Accepting It

There are two common issues people have with power:

- Cannot accept that others may have power over them, which makes it difficult for them to fit in, grow, acquire status and power. And it makes it difficult for them to have good relationships with their bosses, which is crucial to doing well
- Struggle with having power over others, and wielding it, which makes it difficult for them to acquire leadership positions, holding onto them. And, if by sheer luck they become leaders, they often make for poor leaders

And finally, once you're ready to lead:

As A Leader / Founder, Keep Politics to A Minimum

Politics are normal, but that doesn't mean they're good.

Indeed, research shows that high levels of perceived politics lead to job dissatisfaction, low morale, less commitment, and higher intentions to quit.

It does seem though that it's possible to create an organization with lower levels of (perceived) politics, but unluckily, the author doesn't investigate whether it's possible to have lower level of politics.

Real-Life Tips

As Your Hiring Condition, Ask For A Periodical Dinner With The Department's Head

Man, what a genius move this was.
Goes straight to Power University.
Here's the example from Keith Ferrazzi, later turned social networking consultant and author of "Never Eat Alone" (told by Loconto himself, and redacted for brevity):

> Ferrazzi had offers from McKinsey and Deloitte.
> Ferrazzi insisted on seeing the "head guys," as he called them.
> Loconto met Keith at an Italian restaurant in New York City, and "after we had a few drinks at this restaurant, Keith said he would accept the offer on one condition—he and I would have dinner once a year at the same restaurant…. So I promised to have dinner with him once a year, and that's how we recruited him. That was one of his techniques. That way, he was guaranteed access to the top.

Pretty smart indeed.

Pretend to Take The Idiots Seriously: Fools Are Still Better On Your Side Than Against You

This part was really Machiavellian smart to survive in more political organizations where you need support and support to remain in power:

> in a visible position such as university president, everybody—students, faculty, alumni, citizens, staff—has an opinion about what you could be better, and many feel free to share their views with you and with the public. Many of these people don't know what they are talking about and take time (…). After a while, it is easy to lose patience and lash out at the sorry fools—except, as Maidique thoughtfully noted, some of these "sorry fools" can cost you your position.

Maidique was the second longest-serving research university president in the United States, and to successfully remain in his position, he learned the political skills needed for it -including keeping his composure with the sorry fools-.

> Peter Ueberroth

On the role of "deception" in leadership:

> part of it is self-discipline and part of it is deception. And the deception becomes reality. Deception in the sense that you pump yourself up and put a better face on things than you start off feeling. But after a while, if you act confident, you become more confident. So the deception becomes less of a deception
> Andy Grove

On self-deprecating humor only working if you already have a good and established reputation:

> Don't be so humble; you're not that great.
> Golda Meir

Commenting on John Gardner who told people that it was their right to opposite him, but that they will have to face the consequences:

> If using power in this way seems tough, it may be. But get over your inhibitions, because many of the people you wil meet on your path to power wil have less hesitation about rewarding their friends and punishing those who oppose them.

On the dog-eat-dog nature of power struggles:

> Therefore, for CEOs to survive in their jobs, they need to be able to discern who is undermining them and be tough enough to remove those people before they themselves lose the power struggle. What's true for CEOs is also true for other senior-level executives with ambitious subordinates.

On choosing a graceful exit over holding on until it's too late:

> It is both possible and desirable to, as my wife nicely puts it, "leave before the party's over" and to do so in a way that causes others to remember you fondly. You cannot always completely control how much power you maintain, but you can leave your position with dignity and thereby influence your legacy.

On companies being undemocratic and power in the hands of few despite devolution working better and "The Wisdom of Crowds" showing that decision-making by many is superior to decision-making by the few (something I'm not convinced, by the way):

> inside companies democracy is the exception. In spite of many studies showing the superior performance achieved through delegating decision-making authority, little devolution of power has occurred inside companies in the last 50 years

CONS

Some studies were low-powered

For example, David Schoorman study only had 9 managers under one of their conditions (the condition of "not chosen by the hiring manager").

Sometimes the author jumped to conclusions that the study didn't warrant

For example, the author downplays the role of performance.
But in Dohmen's study that the author cites, the paper's abstract clearly states that "performance ratings determine how fast a worker climbs the firm's career and wage ladder", which doesn't quite square off with the author's stance that performance matters little.

In Gilson's study of CEO, the authors conclude that "evidence is consistent with managers incurring significant personal costs when their firms become financially distressed".
Again, the opposite of what the author implies saying that CEO performance matters little.

And with David Schoorman's study, the author concludes:

What this research means is that job performance matters less for your evaluation than your supervisor's commitment to and relationship with you.

That's a big claim, so I checked the research.
And it's not exactly what the researchers claim.
They say instead:

> Its significance can be illustrated by the observation that the escalation biases accounted for more variance in performance appraisals than did the measure of clerical ability used to select employees into these jobs.
> The clerical ability test is a statistically (and legally) valid employment test in this organization

The authors of the research didn't measure job performance.
The only measure of performance was at the time of hiring, a very different measure.

Unluckily, this made me lose quite some trust in the author's conclusions.
A colossal blunder, in my opinion: Power is a fantastic book that tells it as it is, that has plenty of both evidence and logic to support it, and that most certainly didn't need to exaggerate or stretch the truth.

Cites Low-Credibility Malcolm Gladwell Among the Resources

When discussing rule-following and underdog success, the author says that:

In every war in the last 200 years conducted between unequal y matched opponents, the stronger party won about 72 percent of the time. However, when the underdogs understood their weakness and used a different strategy to minimize its effects, they won some 64 percent of the time, cutting the dominant party's likelihood of victory in half.

How exactly did we reach "half", I don't get it.
And even then, he's citing Malcolm Gladwell's analyses.
Nothing wrong with Gladwell, he's a great writer. But when it comes to science, he has little credibility for being part of that breed of pop psychologists that looks not for what's true, but what's most "shocking" to sell more -sometimes twisting studies to sound more shocking-.

Seems to Underestimate The Costs of Asking For Help

Says the author:

> Those contemplating making a request of another tend to focus on the costs others will incur complying with their request, and don't emphasize sufficiently the costs of saying no.

This is a major social misunderstanding in my opinion.
Generally speaking, you want to avoid cornering others in a position where they feel forced to say yes. They may say yes, and even help you, but they'll come to see you as a taker who took from them.

PROS

- Combines both theory and practice, and does both at a very good level

- Well researched and resourced, albeit as we say above we didn't like how some studies were spun or presented. But, overall, that didn't change the logic and, we believe, validity of most of the author's claims
- Both persuasive and encouraging in spurring people to learn power dynamics and seek more power with a "can-do" attitude

REVIEW

Power is a great book on power and power dynamics.

It mostly deals with power in business and organizations, and the strategies are in large part tailored to career advancement.
But because there are few great titles on power and power dynamics, and because Pfeffer is a competent author, Power is one of the best books on power, period.

We also took a few golden nuggets for Power University, which is the biggest compliment we can pay to any resource we review.

FULL SUMMARY

About the Author:
Anthony de Mello was a Christian priest and psychotherapist.
Going by what he writes in Awareness, de Mello has his own interpretation of the scripture. Getting to God to the de Mello seems to pass through personal enlightenment.

You Want Things, Not Happiness. Stop Seeking Things to Be Happy

Most people think they want happiness by chasing things.

But that's not true happiness, that's a distraction.
Or, better yet, it's a trap:

> I was saying that we don't want to be happy. We want other things. Or let's put it more accurately: We don't want to be unconditionally happy. I'm ready to be happy provided I have this and that and the other thing.

Most people thought aren't yet ready to make that jump.
De Mello says that most people cannot imagine being happy without those conditions.
But those conditions are chains to your happiness, and you must transcend them for that unconditional happiness.

There Is No "I": Stop Identifying

In good Eastern Buddhist tradition, de Mello embraces the separation between thinking mind and "I":

> Am I my thoughts, the thoughts that I am thinking? No.
> Thoughts come and go; I am not my thoughts. Am I my body? They tell us that millions of cells in our body are changed or are renewed every minute, so that by the end of seven years we don't have a single living cell in our body that was there seven years before. Cells come and go. Cells arise and die. But "I" seems to persist. So am I my body? Evidently not!
> "I" is something other and more than the body. You might say the body is part of "I," but it is a changing part. It keeps moving, it keeps changing. We have the same name for it but it constantly changes.
> How about my name? Is "I" my name? Evidently not, because I can change my name without changing the "I." How about my career? How about my beliefs? I say I am a Catholic, a Jew—is that an essential part of "I"? When I move from one religion to another, has the "I" changed?

Labels Are Not "I"

People love self-labeling and defining themselves through those labels.

However, you are not the labels you use for yourself.

> Labels are so important to us.
> "I am a Republican," we say. But are you really? You can't mean that when you switch parties you have a new "I." Isn't it the same old "I" with new political convictions? I remember hearing about a man who asks his friend, "Are you planning to vote Republican?" The friend says, "No, I'm planning to vote Democratic. My father was a Democrat, my grandfather was a Democrat, and my great-grandfather was a Democrat." The man says, "That is crazy logic. I mean, if your father was a horse thief, and your grandfather was a horse thief, and your great-grandfather was a horse thief, what would you be?" "Ah," the friend answered, "then I'd be a Republican." We spend so much of our lives reacting to labels, our own and others'. We identify the labels with the "I."

Why is this important?
Because suffering begins when you identify external things with "I", says de Mello:

> All suffering is caused by my identifying myself with something, whether that something is within me or outside of me.

And when you don't identify:

> When "I" does not identify with money, or name, or nationality, or persons, or friends, or any quality, the "I" is never threatened. It can be very active, but it isn't threatened.

Admitting you're wrong is possible when you don't identify:

> Someone once said, "The three most difficult things for a human being are not physical feats or intellectual achievements. They are, first, returning love for hate; second, including the excluded; third, admitting that you > are wrong." But these are the easiest things in the world if you haven't identified with the "me." You can say things like "I'm wrong! If you knew me better, you'd see how often I'm wrong. What would you expect from an ass?" But if I haven't identified with these aspects of "me," you can't hurt me.

You Can't Feel Bad When You Let Others Free

Central to de Mello's view of Awareness are the concept of love without possessiveness, and happiness without conditions and "needs".

That means that if you can love without needing, then you also never feel bad for not having, or for losing, anything or anyone:

> We never feel grief when we lose something that we have allowed to be free, that we have never attempted to possess.
> Grief is a sign that I made my happiness depend on this thing or person, at least to some extent. We're so accustomed to hear the opposite of this that what I say sounds inhuman, doesn't it?

When you can generate your own happiness you won't need others. You may want them, but not need them:

> But to depend on another psychologically—to depend on another emotionally—what does that imply? It means to depend on another human being for my happiness. Think about that. Because if you do, the next thing you will be doing, whether you're aware of it or not, is demanding that other people contribute to your happiness.

When you need others for your happiness, you become fearful:

> Then there will be a next step—fear of loss, fear of alienation, fear of rejection, mutual control. Perfect love casts out fear. Where there is love there are no demands, no expectations, no dependency. I do not demand that you make me happy; my happiness does not lie in you. If you were to leave me, I will not feel sorry for myself; I enjoy your company immensely, but I do not cling.

The author says that "an attachment destroys your capacity to love".

Ultimate Power is Not Needing Anything (Least of All, "Success")

This is how that enlightened (and empowered) stage looks like:

> You fear no one because you're perfectly content to be nobody.
> You don't give a damn about success or failure. They mean nothing. Honor, disgrace, they mean nothing!
> If you make a fool of yourself, that means nothing either. Isn't that a wonderful state to be in!

For the record, I believe there is a middle way.

I agree that many values and "success/failure" can be straight jackets on ourselves.

And at the same time, one can pursue goals with a certain level of detachment and with a self-generated level of self-generated happiness that is not overly dependent on external "treats".

The Freedom Within You Guarantees Your Eternal Freedom

> "One cannot make a slave of a free person, for a free person is free even in prison.
> If a person is trying to change external reality by being out of prison in order to be free, he is a prisoner indeed. Freedom lies not in external circumstances; freedom resides in the heart.

> When you have attained wisdom, who can enslave you?

Success Doesn't Matter to An Enlightened Individual

> A small-time businessman, fifty-five years old, is sipping beer at a bar > somewhere and he's saying, "Well, look at my classmates, they've really made it." The idiot! What does he mean, "They made it"? They've got their names in the newspaper. Do you call that making it? One is president of the corporation; the other has become the Chief Justice; somebody else has become this or that. Monkeys, all of them.
> Who determines what it means to be a success? This stupid society! The main preoccupation of society is to keep society sick! And the sooner you realize that, the better. Sick, every one of them. They are loony, they're crazy. You became president of the lunatic asylum and you're proud of it even though it means nothing. Being president of a corporation has nothing to do with being a success in life. Having a lot of money has nothing to do with being a success in life.

And:

> Having a good job or being famous or having a great reputation has absolutely nothing to do with happiness or success.
> Nothing! It is totally irrelevant.
> All he's really worried about is what his children will think about him, what the neighbors will think about him, what his wife will think about him. He should have become famous. Our society and culture drill that into our heads day and night. People who made it! Made what?! Made asses of themselves. Because they drained all their energy getting something that was worthless. They're frightened and confused, they are puppets like the rest. Look at them strutting across the stage.

Their mistake was to identify the "I" with things like success, a good career, people's perception of us.

So when are you a success, then?

> You're a success in life when you wake up! Then you don't have to apologize to anyone, you don't have to explain anything to anyone, you don't give a damn what anybody thinks about you or what anybody says about you. You have no worries; you're happy. That's what I call being a success.

And when that happens, no criticism affects you.
Or no compliment, for that matter.

This overlaps with our emotional power dynamics construct of the judge role, plus our "enlightened individualism" philosophy.
We agree, and we loved this part.

> Enlightened Self-Interest: Making of The Ubermensch

We Have the Wrong Notion of Love: Stop Being Possessive

It's not the love that we learn from our culture of poems and love songs.
That's infatuation or, as de Mello calls it, "possessiveness".
Instead, true love is deeper:

> It's been there all along, staring us in the face in the scriptures, though we never cared to see it because we were so drowned in what our culture calls love with its love songs and poems—that isn't love at all, that's the opposite of love.
> That's desire and control and possessiveness.
> That's manipulation, and fear, and anxiety—that's not love.

You Never Love Anyone: You Love The Illusion You Develop Yourself

> You are never in love with anyone. You're only in love with your prejudiced and hopeful idea of that person.

We Have the Wrong Notion of Happiness: Stop Chasing Thrills

Most people chase happiness as a transitory state.
But that transitory nature is exactly the problem: once you attain it, you set yourself up for "non-happiness" right afterward:

> But you can't have the wrong notion of happiness.
> Did you think happiness was excitement or thrills? That's what causes the depression.
> Didn't anyone tell you that? You're thrilled, all right, but you're just preparing the way for your next depression. You're thrilled but you pick up the anxiety behind that: How can I make it last? That's not happiness, that's addiction.

And against the consumerist culture:

> We were told that happiness is a smooth complexion, a holiday resort. It isn't these things, but we have subtle ways of making our happiness depend on other things, both within us and outside us.

The focus is always on what we don't have, says the author.

You don't need to acquire anything to be happy, says the author.
It's already within you.
Instead, you need to drop something -like greed and identifications of your I with labels, negative feelings, and external markers-.

Happiness Is Within You, Right Now

Luckily, you don't even need to chase happiness.
It's right there, inside you, and within you:

> but we have subtle ways of making our happiness depend on other things, both within us and outside us. We say, "I refuse to be happy until my neurosis goes." I have good news for you: You can be happy right now, with the neurosis, You want even better news?

5 Steps to Enlightenment

Of course, you may know this if this isn't your first "spiritual enlightenment" book:

There is no easy prescription to enlightnment.
But, teasing out from de Mello's teachings, we can say:

1. Admit you don't want to wake up

2. Gain awareness of your negative feelings (gloomy, self-hate, guilt, hurt, tension, etc.)
3. Understand that the feeling is in you, it's not in reality. So stop trying to change reality, change yourself instead
4. Never identify with that feeling. Never say "I am… "
5. Awareness: you only change through awareness and understanding

Says the author:

> Your behavior may change, but you don't. You only change through awareness and understanding. When you see a stone as a stone and a scrap of paper as a scrap of paper, you don't think that the stone is a precious diamond anymore and you don't think that that scrap of paper is a check for a billion dollars. When you see that, you change.

More Wisdom

More great wisdom from Awareness turned into more practical tips:

Detach and transcend the idiocy of nationalism

> There are no frontiers or boundaries. They were put there by the human mind; generally by stupid, avaricious politicians.
> My country was one country once upon a time; it's four now. If we don't watch out it might be six. Then we'll have six flags, six armies. That's why you'll never catch me saluting a flag. I abhor all national flags because they are idols. What are we saluting? I salute humanity, not a flag with an army around it.

If you let the inculturation get to you, you start seeing things that do not exist:

> Flags are in the heads of people. In any case, there are thousands of words in our vocabulary that do not > correspond to reality at all. But do they trigger emotions in us! So we begin to see things that are not there. We actually see Indian mountains when they don't exist, and we actually see Indian people who also don't exist. Your American conditioning exists.

Detach from and transcend the "need to belong"

On detaching from ego-projections and group belonging:

> But "me" got in there, so I'm feeling good. I'm feeling good about "my" culture and "my" nation. How stupid can you get? I mean that. I'm told my great Indian culture has produced all these mystics. I didn't produce them. I'm not responsible for them. Or they tell me, "That country of yours and its poverty—it's disgusting." I feel ashamed. But I didn't create it.

Detach and transcend other people's opinions

On detaching from what others think of you:

> The fact of the matter is that you're neither O.K. nor not O.K. You may fit the current mood or trend or fashion! Does that mean you've become O.K.? Does your O.K.-ness depend on that? Does it depend on what people think of you? Jesus Christ must have been pretty "not O.K." by those standards. You're not O.K. and you're not not O.K., you're you.

Detach and transcend your own past

On detaching from your past:

> Eternity is right now. How's that for good news? It is right now. People are so distressed when I tell them to forget their past. They are so proud of their past. Or they are so ashamed of their past. They're crazy! Just drop it! When you hear "Repent for your past," realize it's a great religious distraction from waking up. Wake up! That's what repent means. Not "weep for your sins." Wake up! Understand, stop all the crying. Understand! Wake up!

Enlightenment is not theoretical, it's the most practical thing

On enlightenment being the most practical thing:

> you have people thinking that big business is more practical, that politics is more practical, that science is more practical. What's the earthly use of putting a man on the moon when we cannot live on the earth?

If you feel down, observe your negative states, without identifying with them

Observe without identifying:

> The reason you suffer from your depression and your anxieties is that you identify with them. You say, "I'm depressed." But that is false. You are not depressed. If you want to be accurate, you might say, "I am experiencing a depression right now." But you can hardly say, "I am depressed." You are not your depression.

Same for anxiety.
If you can detach from your own anxiety, you can be happy in your own anxiety:

> And anxiety? There it comes and you're not troubled. How strange! You're anxious but you're not troubled.

> Isn't that a paradox?
> And you're willing to let this cloud come in, because the more you fight it, the more power you give it. You're willing to observe it as it passes by. You can be happy in your anxiety. Isn't that crazy? You can be happy in your depression.

CONS

Sometimes the author goes down hard on "monkeys" who follow social conventions.

Personally, I like those passages and the passion in them. But to some, it can feel offensive and social climbe-y.

Sometimes there is some of that rosy view of nature that "animals are good, let's learn from them".
For example, "look at birds in the air that do not toil".

And at other times the above idealization overlaps with the generalizations that this website is not very fond of -ie. "we can learn from the animal kingdom, an animal will never eat or drink anything that is not good for him". Not true-.

However, these are all small cons, and largely inconsequential.

Review

Awareness is a wonderful book, and we loved it.

Albeit Awareness is apparently so different from this website, there is instead much overlap.

How Awareness Overlaps With TPM

Similar concepts include:

Judge Power Dynamics
The author talks about how un-enlightened people are dependent on other people's approval, which is basically judged power dynamics.

Individualism Over Groups
He then talks about soaring higher groups and nationalities, which is the "enlightened individualism" article.
He says:

> A nice definition of an awakened person: a person who no longer marches to the drums of society, a person who dances to the tune of the music that springs up from within.

The author then takes it a step further and says to go behind the "I", while this website sees nothing wrong in pursuing self-expanding goals.

But there are more overlaps still with that detachment:

Antifragile Ego
The detachment from the "I" overlaps with the antifragile ego.
Not taking things personally, as the author says, that's antifragile ego.

Labels & Emotionless Assessment
The author refers to the inability to properly see and assess others if you need their approval and if you identify with labels. That's foundational to effective social strategizing as well.

Growing Past Fixed Mindset

The author talks about fear of failure. And that's also equivalent to fixed VS growth mindset.

Dropping Values
And the most shocking of them all: dropping the need for "ethical values".

The author says:

> You don't need conscience when you have consciousness; you don't need conscience when you have sensitivity. You're not violent, you're not fearful.

More than once we said on this website that values are often hooks and tools for manipulation.
And that dropping the need values as a form of "personal rules" or "personal guidance" can be a good thing for your personal freedom, personal power, and general well-being.

The author says that with "consciousness" you don't need a conscience.
This website refers more to fluidity under the umbrella of being a general value-adding individual.

But still, very similar.

So, overall, we obviously enjoyed and recommend Awareness by Anthony de Mello.

- Arm yourself with words: your social power is more important than the coercive power of “toughness”

Full Summary

About The Author: Jordan Peterson is a Canadian clinical psychologist and former professor of psychology at the University of Toronto.

He rose to fame when he objected to a new rule to address trans women as “she” and has become a thought leader of conservative and alt-right movements and, in part, for red-pill communities.

He is also the author of Maps of Meaning, 12 Rules for Life, and Beyond Order.

Episode #1: “What Makes a Man?”

#1: Start Working On Yourself

- Don’t be too disheartened by your lack of competence and authority—especially, if you’re young: because gaining power is difficult.
- Don’t ask yourself, “What should I do with my life,” because that’s a poor question that invites an answer too broad for any productive action (because one can—and, if they’re driven, often does—many things in their life): a better question is, “What do other people who appear to give their lives significance and meaning do?”

Then, Peterson outlines what most people with a life of significance and meaning want/have, the main example being an intimate partner.

And, he recommends you work on getting an intimate partner by working on yourself. Ask yourself, "What do I bring to the table?"

Note: this points to Peterson's Beyond Order Rule 1 that humans are part of value-based exchanges and a good life means establishing win-win relationships. And, at the same time, certain aspects of this section also point to his 12 Rules for Life Rule 6 to "Set Your House in Perfect Order Before You Criticize the World" (work on yourself and, as per Lucio's note, "seek improvement at all costs").

- There are advantages to being a young man: two of the biggest ones being youth and possibility (and, here, Peterson emphasizes youth as a form of wealth with the example that you wouldn't trade "young and poor" for "decrepit and rich").

#1.2: How to Start Working On Yourself

Ask yourself, "Am I good at anything?" If not, start practicing being good at one thing.

What matters most here isn't what you choose to start practicing, it's that you choose something because the sooner you get started, the sooner you start developing your skills and character.

Then:

- Develop a vision for yourself: what would it look like if you could have the life you wanted?

Note: many of the questions Peterson recommends you ask yourself to develop your vision point to questions you can find in the Self-Authoring Suite program and are similar to the question he asks his clients to better assess them (see Beyond Order Rule 1: "Community and social ties are crucial to your well-being").

- Develop (in addition to your vision) answers to questions that give you responsibility and character: for example, can you get a job or a career? Can you educate yourself? Can you regulate the draw of temptation (be it drugs, alcohol, or sex)? Do you do anything that remotely represents civic responsibility (e.g. being a member of a political party or going to church)?

Note: the responsibility aspect of this section points to Beyond Order's Rule 4 and the character aspect leans on 12 Rules For Life's Rule 7.

#2.: Embrace "productive generosity"

Peterson teaches that productivity requires aim, orientation, responsibility, discipline, and maturity (with the willingness to work and make sacrifices in the service of a higher goal being defined by Peterson as the hallmark of maturity).

The generosity aspect is, in a nutshell, about giving.

#2.3: Embrace "productive responsibility"

Be responsible to yourself and your future selves (the community of selves that you are across time). (See 12 Rules For Life's Rule 2.)

Then, be responsible (and productive) for as many people as you can manage.

Note: Peterson says here that this will orient you solidly in the world and give you a dragon to fight which is where the gold is. However, I wish he would've also clarified (in that same line) that a part of one's responsibility to themself is the rest and recovery required for continued productivity. By leaving that part out, Peterson makes it sound as if "more responsibility is always better", which I disagree with. (More improvement is always better. And, the attainment and management of more responsibility should be a part of your improvement, but it shouldn't be the whole of it—unless you invite the risk of negative consequences like burnout.)

#3: Arm Yourself

Peterson says you should arm yourself with words:

- Be precise in your language: see 12 Rules For Life's Rule 10
- Say what you mean
- Read: from and about great men and women
- Make yourself literate
- Get your tongue in order / under your own control: manage your anxiety, shyness, and embarrassment
- Remove filler words and pauses
- Remove "proving yourself to others" communication: stop trying to impress others
- Say (only) what you believe to be true

Note: pauses can be good and socially powerful depending on how you utilize them. Know the exceptions.

Also, keep in mind that many people are afraid to ask questions because of the status loss of admitting that there was something they didn't know.

But, Peterson says that if you ask enough stupid questions (because you're honest that you don't know something), you're not stupid anymore since after you get the answer, you now know better and don't have to ask that question again.

Peterson describes staying quiet when one doesn't know something as more than dishonest, but an act of "cowardice".

Note: it depends on the situation, sometimes it's best to keep your mouth shut if you're in strategic cases where, for the time being, being high status is more important than being a learner (and your status isn't directly tied to your knowledgeability).

Then, Peterson teaches that beauty, tradition, community, and responsibility are classic virtues that serve as more than qualities that develop your character, but tools that can be used to challenge and win against the "dragons" (challenges) that stand in your path.

Note: I (mostly) agree. Better than memorizing scripts (picking up external tools that only work contextually) is to develop a quality of character that can withstand the highs and lows of a life committed to meaning. However, I say "mostly" agree because, as with any tool, they (virtues) can backfire if used improperly, ineffectively, or unwell.

#4: Live like you have everything at stake

Peterson says that this attitude makes for an adventure with no regrets looking back (a life of dragons encountered and conquered, beasts faced and tamed).

Note: given how close this sounds to the popular mantra of, "Live every day like it's your last," I'd add the caveat here: "Live like you have everything at stake…while also being mindful of your future selves to take care of."

#5: Choose your dragons carefully

For example, don't foolhardily play in dangerous oncoming traffic and think because it's challenging you must be slaying a dragon.

A dragon worth slaying is a dragon you encounter on your way to a worthy goal.

You only want to fight the dragons that guard the gates of the treasure you want to attain (the treasure that you envision).

Here, Peterson also teaches that facing dragons does more than begin the process of removing them, it begins the process of your own development into the kind of person who is capable of attaining the treasure you seek.

We all have the capacity for great transformation.

Plus, women want a man who's competent (who can keep the "dragons" away from the infants, in an evolutionary psychology lens).

Episode #2: "Arm Yourself"

#1: "We're properly governed by the spirit of voluntary play"

Here, Peterson makes the argument that men are becoming more passive today:

- Boys don't do as well in school: they're less likely to enroll in a university, more likely to drop out, and less likely to graduate

Peterson says, "There's some indication that young men aren't even masturbating as much as they used to. That's how emasculated and demoralized they are."

He also says that the idea in society that power and masculinity are wrong leads to the demoralization of young men. Young men are taught that ambition is intrinsically corrupt.

Note: Peterson tells an emotional story of a friend of his that committed suicide because he believed all of that (that that power and masculinity are wrong and ambition is intrinsically corrupt).

This leads to men suppressing their shadow which leads to explosive violent crimes and gang crime.

#2: Follow the rules. But, don't follow stupid rules.

Peterson says that you know it's time to break a rule when it becomes pathological.

So, if you're going to stand up and break a rule (one which you ideally believe to be unfit to follow), before you do, follow this step-by-step process:

1. Think about it.
2. Acknowledge the consequences of both options (following the rule vs breaking it).
3. Ask yourself if you're willing to take and accept the consequences of standing up for what you believe.
4. Decide.

#3: It's OK to be tough, so long as you're also literate.

A few drops of the major points of this section:

- Everybody gets rejected 95% of the time, you only have to succeed once.
- Be willing to confront your mental and emotional dragons (such as self-consciousness, neuroticism, feelings of miserableness, and so on).

And, a process Peterson recommends you follow for increasing your toughness and literacy:

- Decide what sort of man you want to be: develop a vision of who you could be (you can do that by finding people you admire and uncovering what they're like, then practicing their behavior and communication)
- Develop the (necessary) skills: and make literacy (precise and eloquent communication) one of them

Also, on the point of being tougher, the capacity for aggression is also the capacity for competition. A man with aggression who also has it under control is a far more useful man than one who's only passive or uncontrollably aggressive.

Episode #3: “Be the Prince, You’ll Find the Princess”

#1: Dating, relationships, and children.

Peterson says not to ask, “How do I find the partner that’s right for me?”

Ask yourself instead, “How do I become the partner who’s right for someone else?” (Figure out what women want then start from that list.)

The idea is that if you concentrate on being the prince, you’ll (eventually) find the princess.

Note: I disagree here. Yes, if you concentrate on being or becoming a prince, you’ll attract the princess once you find her. Yet, there is that added step of finding her, which is a separate and different task that may require its own separate set of strategies (assuming that by “princess” we’re referring to a high-quality woman who’s LTR-material, which can be a rare find that requires some dating strategy, depending on your situation).

He also makes the case that enjoying too much short-term sex with too many different partners is ultimately unrewarding and psychopathic.

Says Peterson:

> Peterson: “Some boys—young men—are in the hypothetically fortunate position now, partly because of dating technology, that they can enjoy an endless buffet of willing young women. But, there’s something really psychopathic about that…and so you sleep with a different girl every two nights. Well, you don’t really sleep with a different girl. You sleep with the shallow representation of a different girl every two nights because you don’t know her [them]. And, you might think that doesn’t matter. It’s like, well, what are you practicing here? You’re practicing to use other people in the most intimate possible manner as nothing but an instrumental ends to your own short-term, hedonistic pleasure? That’s psychopathy. That’s what that is. Practice that a hundred times, guess what you are?”

From there, Peterson states that psychopaths live lives that don’t serve them very well in the end and, therefore, constant, quick, short-term sex with multiple different women is to be avoided.

A few more drops of the main points from this section:

- How fast should a relationship progress physically?: as a rule of thumb, don’t do anything with someone that you couldn’t talk to them about beforehand (if you can’t have that communicative intimacy, it may be too early for that level of physical intimacy).
- People in monogamous relationships have much better sex lives: if you disagree because “it’s the same person all the time”, Peterson says you might lack imagination both in your approach and your rituals (you can use your imagination and play if you have a willing partner, you shouldn’t restrict yourself from experiencing your sexual fantasies). Plus, sex is simply better with love than without.
- Being more vulnerable doesn’t mean being weaker: it means being more carefully honest.
- Vulnerability is the basis for genuine intimacy and a stable and expanding relationship.
- It’s very hard to grow up without having children: because you’re not mature until someone else clearly matters more than you do. As long as that other person is now something you would die or live for, you’re an adult (mature).

Note: I disagree with Peterson on this point. I agree with him that “sacrifice is the hallmark of maturity”. However, I also believe that the sacrifice can be for something that matters more than your immediate pleasure, gain, or gratification (such as a higher goal or mission). It doesn’t always necessarily need to be for a “someone” (such as kids).

- It’s better to grow up—it’s better to be an adult than a teen: because as a teen, much of you and your ability is still potential and much of your life lacks autonomy. That flips when you become an adult. (Peterson says, "If you're an adult and you're mature and you tell the truth, then the world is a horizon of adventure—in a manner that's just not accessible to a teenager.)

#2: What makes a good husband?

Honesty and the capacity to listen, says Peterson.

He then goes on to describe the maternal and fraternal spirits:

- Maternal Spirit: represents, "Fundamentally, you're welcome here and this is your home and you're loved for who you are."
- Fraternal Spirit: represents, "You're not everything you could be and we want to see you develop and leave."

Peterson says that the patriarchal spirit encourages and fosters independence and the matriarchal spirit shelters, protects, and forgives. And, that both are crucially necessary.

So, the only way to get the balance right between the two spirits is by talking. (It takes knowing the child and constant communication.)

And, on the topic of having kids, a husband can take care of the wife and the infant while the mother primarily takes care of the child fundamentally (which is the approach Peterson took and recommends himself).

Episode #4: "Be Great"

- Life is characterized by a fair bit of suffering. So, what will sustain your will to live (and, even further, protect you from the resentment and moral corruption that can be produced by suffering)?: for a task like that, meaning is more suitable than happiness.
- Meaning is found primarily through the voluntary adoption of responsibility: one can find meaning in the love they have for their romantic/life partner, the relationship they establish with their children, their friendships, and so on (it doesn't always need to be business or career-related/focused).
- Accept responsibility because it's the best option you have to justify yourself to yourself (which must be done): that acceptance of responsibility serves to atone for your sins, mistakes, and inadequacies and self-justification helps you survive in a life characterized by death and suffering.
- You can find deep significance in your life through the decision to voluntarily bear your suffering and trudge uphill nonetheless: and, there's something heroic about that, in the most fundamental sense.
- You have to say to yourself, "I will do good nonetheless…Everyone great makes that decision…": "…So, make that decision because maybe you're great."

Moving on, Peterson says that if, as a woman, you're asking yourself (in regards to trusting your husband), "Well, why should I trust a man, especially when I have vulnerable children?"

The answer is: because you're courageous and that's the best thing to teach your children (courageous trust).

And, manifesting that courageous trust gives you the highest chance of getting your husband to reciprocate that (positive) behavior.

More main ideas from this section:

- Paradise is a walled garden (the walls prevent the invitation of danger and serve as limits for the children): it's the man's job to put up the walls and make sure they're well-patrolled.
- In marriage, do not punish behavior you wish to see repeated.
- Praise positive behavior: and specify what exactly they did that you noticed they did well and want to see more of.

- As a husband, your primary job is to protect your wife from exhaustion.

Finally, when you lose intimacy with your wife as she's taking care of the child (particularly for the first nine months), you can get some of that attention from the baby (which is good for both of you and can even be taught to siblings of the child—they may lose some attention from their parents, but can gain some from the baby as well).

Negotiate with your wife so you both have time for each other during the initial period of infancy. And, make sure you negotiate that on an ongoing basis, going forward in your marriage.

Deprioritizing sexual intimacy with your partner is a very bad long-term strategy. You must consciously attend to the maintenance of romantic intimacy.

Here's what Peterson recommends:

- Schedule one 90-minute session per week: for discussing the domestic state and economy of the household and exchanging updates with one another.
- Schedule two to three more 90-minute sessions per week: for your romantic dates.

Lastly, Peterson's two rules of thumb:

1. Never sacrifice yourself to your children to the point where you resent them.
2. Don't let your children do anything that makes you dislike them.

Real-Life Applications

- Educate yourself more because education is the pathway to the sharpness of mind that enables you to arm yourself: we live in a sophisticated society today where the pen (social power) is almost always mightier than the sword (physical/coercive prowess).

Peterson uses the example that the alpha in the animal kingdom isn't always the one who's the biggest and/or the strongest.

Sometimes, such as in the case of chimpanzees (according to Peterson), it's the one with the most social power who rises to the top spot (due to having better social skills, more allies, and the least enemies).

Cons

- Sometimes the series felt like a stage for Peterson to share his personal biases

For example, he says, "If you work ten percent longer you make 40 percent more money…so there's part of the reason men make more money than women on average. It's because men work more hours…".

He goes into a controversial perspective (regarding why he believes we don't live in a male-dominated society) that could've been saved for one of his YouTube videos.

But, he still ties his message back into more of his valuable main points, going on to say, "Any sensible boss is gonna be looking for the person who goes the extra mile…" which ties into his Beyond Order Rule 4 on how to become invaluable in a workplace (which has some truths to it, so long as you remember to combine that hard work and self-tasking with solid power-awareness).

- Sometimes felt like he put his morality above the need for making persuasive arguments

Which, granted, if you're coming to him for advice, it's perfectly fair for him to simply state his advice and leave it up to you if you want to follow it or not.

Still, some moments felt like a power-over approach of "here's what I believe and you should listen because if you disagree, you're obviously wrong" rather than a more power-through approach of "here are my thoughts and here's why I recommend this over the alternative options".

One example of this is when he says, "Some people say, 'I don't go to church because their beliefs don't match mine.'" And, his response to people who hold this attitude is, "Who the hell cares about your beliefs?"

Keep in mind that he's talking to young men in this lecture series, most likely teenagers who haven't firmly settled on any beliefs yet and may benefit from a little more open-mindedness. So, he might be right in delivering a little "shock attitude" if he thinks it might wake them up.

And, he does later provide what he believes are the benefits of going to church (the intellectual and spiritual benefit, as well as the development of character through the attainment of more responsibility—such as if you notice that a church is failing or becoming corrupt, you can take it upon yourself to do something about it…and I agree with that, one less value-taking institution could almost always do the world some good.)

But, as someone who was hoping for the more scientific side of Jordan Peterson with the eloquent frame control to support his points and beliefs, I was disappointed to hear him share ideas that could be valuable, but then put in minimal effort highlighting what makes them valuable at times.

- Sometimes jumps around too much

For example, what starts off as a discussion regarding productive generosity and the giving tendencies of hyper-empathic types then jumps into heavy talk about the distinction between conscientiousness and agreeableness from a personality perspective (which feels like too big of a jump into a topic that sounded more like theory than practical information).

Then, Peterson jumps again, this time into the correlations of those two ideas with success in enterprises (which feels like something that should've been saved for another section on ambition and business accomplishment).

And then, from there, he diverts into a tangent about how these two cardinal personality traits seem to correlate to success in managers.

Moments like this made it feel like the interview style they went for was counterproductive for the viewers who paid for this series in order to learn (and, maybe a mini-course would've been better, or at least providing lesson notes so learners avoid getting lost in the surrounding genius of a mind like Jordan Peterson :).

- Sometimes seems to recommend naive self-help solutions

Most notably is when he ignores exceptions to the general rules.

One case is when he says, “You have to assume that there isn’t anything better that can happen than what happens if you tell the truth, no matter what happens.”

And, that ignores the exceptions (of which, there are exceptions to everything) such as utilitarian value-giving or Machiavellian value-giving (which may include white-lying, strategic lying, or strategic lying by omission, see here another example).

Peterson says, “The adventure that would occur if you dwelled in the truth would be so overwhelming that it would justify all the suffering.” And, maybe he’s right.

The question is: why create unnecessary suffering?

That’s the exception that Peterson seems to miss—the cases where lying can be value-giving (albeit those cases are rare and Peterson is totally right that honesty is far more often the best way to go).

Learn more on naive self-help:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

- No links to studies, papers, or research

Peterson sometimes references studies, numbers, and data, none of which the platform gives any links for.

So, it’s much more difficult for one to read the research for themself (especially when he says things like “evidence that I think is quite compelling” for a statistic that sounds debatable—I would’ve been curious to take a look for myself in those cases).

- Sometimes shared what felt like basic information rather than the usual Jordan Peterson gold

However, with the target audience being young men, that’s understandable (and, possibly even to be expected).

And yet, I was still hoping for more.

An example is when he says that a sensible, sophisticated woman doesn’t want a man who only has status or resources. She wants a man who’s competent enough to attain those things (which is a much better deal than a “useless man” who, for example, simply inherited his status and resources).

Well, that much we can say is probably easily comprehensible to the more advanced young men listening.

So, if you’re reading around TPM (and that’s the audience this review is being written for), then you’re probably looking for more than that (foundational) information.

But, unfortunately, Peterson ends his point right there and moves on to a new one (discussing hypergamy).

So, what about sharing some suggestions on how a man can raise his competence beyond the standard advice (such as getting a job that demands you improve your skills)?

Why not recommend the young men watching to go Google “assertiveness training programs” or “assertiveness training therapy” so they can refine the greatest tool in their toolbelt for conquering their dragons (their communication)?

Peterson shares a lot of great insights on what to do. But, until he goes deeper into the “how”, it often feels like surface-level advice (to me).

- Confusing (possibly inaccurate) information

Peterson says:

> Peterson: "Saying 'no' is an act of aggression…'No' means, 'Stop doing that or something you do not like will absolutely, 100 percent happen to you…and so, 'no' and [integrated] aggression, those are pretty much exactly the same thing."

I disagree because I believe it depends on how the "no" is delivered.

If it's delivered too passively, your counterpart may not even take it seriously (in which case, there isn't even the unstated threat of negative judgment from the passive party because the receiver doesn't interpret it as a "real no"—and they might just walk all over you as a result).

On the other hand, "no" can also be delivered from a place of total self-interest (even going so far as selfishness), in which case it would be characterized as an act of aggression given that the sub-communication is that the aggressor's wants, rights, and needs prevail over their counterpart's.

However, there is also a third option. A "no" can be delivered from a place of fairness, self-love, and self-respect, believing that both parties have wants, rights, and needs and using "no" to respectfully draw boundaries.

I think that Peterson knows this (and might've only said he believe's "no" is an act of aggression to keep his analogy going that "men should become monsters").

But, there's also a chance that his definition or association with the word "aggression" is different from most (in which case I wish he would've clarified it) or that we simply disagree here.

- Sometimes seemed to allow anger to interrupt his teachings

There were cases where his teachings seemed to turn into ranting, causing the lecture to lose some of its value as he neglected to put effort into making arguments that were fundamentally persuasive.

One example is when he says:

> Peterson: "Do you want someone to be a mother for your children, assuming you want children? And, if you don't want children, well, you probably will and if you don't you're either deluded or immature."

A pretty bold statement, in my opinion, that made me eager to hear his reasoning behind it.

However, his reasons why a young man should want (and eventually have) kids are:

- The planet is not overpopulated: so you can do it and we have the capacity on earth for it (which shares why one could do it, not necessarily why one should do it)
- He says, "Every one of your ancestors reproduced in an unending procession lasting three-and-a-half billion years. And, they're all wrong and you're right? It's like, I don't think so.": feels less like a well-thought-out reason and more like a "side-step as the judge" frame (judging the person [people] as possibly stubborn and/or closed-minded rather than addressing their arguments)
- He then says, "And, if you're not sensible enough to see why a stable, monogamous relationship with children is the right outcome, then you've been badly served by your culture. You're narcissistic, shallow, immature, underdeveloped, and diluted, at least in part by your own hedonism.": once again, feels more like a "side-step as the judge" frame than well-grounded reasoning.

Peterson then says to "deviate from monogamy at your own peril because there's a price to pay" (paraphrased).

I only wish he would have dived into that price at least briefly to better outline his philosophy for the viewers watching who are willing to learn.

Pros

- Lots of valuable, philosophical wisdom

As expected from a legend like Peterson :).

One moment where I struggled to keep up was when Peterson shared his recapitulation of the works of Jung, Nietzsche, and Freud in relation to integrating one's shadow for better living (recommended by Peterson as a method for reducing the risk of possible violent outbursts of aggression—which can happen when one wants to realize their fantasies that spawn from repressed negative emotions, such as feelings of resentment or revenge).

- Engaging (and motivational) explanations of evolutionary psychology

Peterson mostly shares ideas we've heard before from high-quality literature in evolutionary psychology (especially if you've taken a peek at TPM's "best of" list for it).

But, hearing it explained differently (and from the mind of a genius with the aim of making you a better man) causes the information to resonate and sink in deeper (at least for me).

Here's one example (and keep in mind that much of the added value is lost from the written format):

> Peterson: "…women often get a bad rap—especially, from people in the manosphere, so-called—for being hypergamous, which means mating across and up socioeconomic hierarchies. 'Cause [young] women have a preference for men who are about four years older than them, who are as well off or better off than they are. And, it's a female calibration mechanism to remediate the inequality placed on women in relationship to pregnancy and infant care. So, women take a vicious hit in terms of productivity when she becomes pregnant and has an infant, and so it's in her appropriate interest to find a man who can fill that gap. And, she's wired, so to speak, to look for someone approximately as competent as her or more competent, and why wouldn't she? What, she wants another child around? That's not helpful…and so you don't wanna be another child."

A nice little kick in the behind to those listening who need it as a wake-up call to "man up" and get going :).

- Shares concepts from social science utilizing his "dragons, monsters & men" analogy

And, that makes the learning process a bit more of a fun experience (albeit it sometimes makes the information less practical and more confusing at times).

For example, rather than simply explaining the stereotype content model (high-warmth, high-power matrix), he says that women want a "tamable monster". A man who's aggressive enough to keep the real monsters away, yet agreeable enough to be good with kids, good with her, and willing to share.

Peterson also goes even further, mentioning that in the book, A Billion Wicked Thoughts, the female pornographic fantasy is of this very type of man (a high-status man who's also dominant, the 50 Shades of Grey's male love interest being a prime example or, in the real world, an "alpha provider"/"providing lover") who the woman is able to lock down for herself ("tame").

- Many main ideas are highlighted for you

The editing team did their best to point out what they believe are some of the biggest takeaways from each episode and it helps with consumption as well as note-taking. (It in part also makes up for all of the jumping around.)

- Peterson commits to the series fully, emotions and all

It was a pleasure to watch Peterson at his most emotional and passionate moments in the series (and that made his points during those times all the more meaningful, persuasive, and engaging).

One particular moment where he began to tear up was when he said, "To say to an 18-year-old, 'You're OK the way you are,' that just deflates them. It just deflates them. You say, 'You could be a lot more than you are. You could be so much more than you are that the boundaries of that are unimaginable.' That's a way better message to someone who's in despair."

- Expands on wisdom from his books that align with the pillars of this website

Which is always a treat to hear (especially when he gets passionate or emotional in his message).

One example is when he says that "there is little difference between the capacity for destruction (aggression) and strength of character".

And, he continues on to say that if you don't develop that capacity:

> Peterson: "…you can't move forward…you can't put limits on [value-taking] Machiavellians, you can't oppose narcissists, you can't emerge unscathed from people who use empathy in a manipulative way."

Review

Based on the trailer released by Daily Wire+, I was expecting a seated lecture series. But, it turned out to be more of an interview series.

The difference is that, with this format, it's far more disorganized and may seem a little "too unscripted" sometimes for your personal taste.

But, it is good information if one can exercise the patience and diligence to filter through for the wisdom and absorb it.

Bullet Summary

- Let go of your ego as a separate identity
- Join the connectedness of the energy that underpins the whole universe
- When you connect to divine energy, you can get anything you want

Full Summary

These are the Seven Spiritual Laws of Success:

1. The Law of Pure Potentiality

We are part of the divine force that created the universe.

That gives us infinite potential.
To find it, practice non-judgment, meditate thirty minutes twice a day and connect with divine energy.

2. The Law of Giving

Give what you want to receive.
Deepak Chopra invites readers to give gifts and happily receive gifts in exchange. Keep that wealth circulating and there will be more wealth for everyone.

Give to Get – Don't Save!

Deepak Chopra says that to get you need to give.

And saving money is a great way of interrupting the flow of giving and taking. Much better instead is to spend that money, let the flow go out.

My Note: Potentially Dangerous Advice
This is another idea with which I don't fully agree.
The concept of letting go of the need to save, enjoy life and give is great.
And so is the idea of spending for education and advancement. That indeed might pay off big time.
But the idea that saving "stops the flow" and spending is the best way to get is nonsense.

3. The Law of Karma

We have a choice in every moment to plant a good seed or a bad seed. But whatever we choose, it's not without consequences.
The universe we will return in kind as we reap what we sow.

4. The Law of Least Effort

Grass doesn't try to grow and birds don't try to fly. They just fly.
Accept people for who they are, don't try to change them. And accept your current situation for what it is.

5. The Law of Intention and Desire

Decide what you want in life and who you want to be.
Then think positively about it and they will come to you.

6. The Law of Detachment

We must be passionate in our pursuits and yet detached from the outcome.
Similarly, do not force solutions but allow them to spontaneously emerge.

7. The Law of Dharma

To give is to get.

Help Others to Find Their Life's Purpose

To obey the law of Dharma Deepak Chopra basically paraphrases John Fitzerald Kennedy:

You should not ask the universe what it can do for you, but ask what you can do for the universe.

And a great way to give to the universe is by helping others.

There is some job, task, or calling out there that allows you to both leverage your talent and help others.

Once you find it, you'll be able to tap into the unlimited source of energy and joy that is the divine energy.

Follow Your Personal Calling

A big question in The Seven Spiritual Laws of Success is:

> If you had all the money and all the time in the world, what would you do?

Deepak Chopra says that we have a unique set of gifts and experiences that we can leverage to give something to the world.

And have a moral obligation to answer that question. Because once we answer it, then we can dedicate our lives to it and give the fruits of our talent and passion to the world.

How to Enjoy True Self & Ego Dissolution

If you have had the experience of deep peacefulness and connectedness you have already experienced your true self.

It can happen sometimes when you lay beneath the stars, or when you go for a walk in the woods.

That's the moment when you realize that you are not a separate entity from all that is around you, but that you are all part of the same interconnected energy.

That's the infinite source of energy that powers the whole universe. And when you realize that, you also realize that your Self is equally unlimited.

When you tap into the source of infinite energy that powers the universe, you can unlock the potential to fulfill your life's desires.

How to Dissolve Your Ego

But to connect with the divine energy, you must first let go of your ego as a separate entity.

You do it by meditating.
Focus your attention on your breathing and observe your thoughts without judgment.

Little by little you will become more peaceful until your ego dissolves and you reconnect with your true Self.

Embrace Your Current Situation

Deepak Chopra notices that we always have a drive to seek something better.

But we're never really content, and when we get what we wanted, new problems arise.

The solution, he says, is to embrace our current situation and be content with it. Whatever it is that you are "lacking", you are not really lacking anything if you stop focusing on it and focus on being content instead.

And every bad situation can teach us something if we approach it with a positive mindset.

Practice Defenselessness

Becoming defenseless means stopping trying to defend your idea, convincing others and trying to change people's minds.

In an ideal defenseless conversation, people would share their point of view without having any interest in "winning" or convincing the other.
Much more peaceful, and more enriching.

Detach From Your Desires to Make Them a Reality

The author says that when you think too much about something you want, you will rarely get it.

It's because you communicate a distrust of the universe and the universe doesn't have a chance to step in.
It's indeed when people stop to pursue something so eagerly that they often find it. It's because finally the universe has the chance to step in and provide it for you.

My Note: This is Unscientific at Best
I don't agree one bit with this.
A strong drive coupled with incessant and smart action is the best way to get what you want.

Think Positive to Get What You Want

Thinking positive will help you get what you want by spreading positive vibes into the universe.

The author indeed suggests that many don't get what they want because they think in negative terms.
If they want a new job they pollute their mind and the universe with thoughts of how much they dislike their current job.
But you must stop that. Catch yourself doing it and change your negative thoughts into positive ones immediately.

Real-Life Applications

Conquer Fear of Death With Ego-Lessness
When you feel connected to the universe you will not fear death anymore.

Give Before Asking
I can't stress this enough.
Asking without giving is the worst sin in social skills and wealth accumulation alike. That's entitlement mentality as its purest.
Think of how you can give more and better instead.

CONS

First and foremost:

Naive self-help

Anything based solely or mainly on the law of attraction without any attention to strategy, self-development, and practical life optimization is at high risk of being ineffective and naive self-help.

The laws of dharma and karma and the concept that the more you give the more you get are at high risk of turning you into a giving sucker when you make the mistake of taking them to an extreme and meet the many life's takers. I highly recommend the article on enlightened collaboration to set up win-wins that don't turn you into a sucker.

Read here to inoculate yourself against BS:

- Naive self-help

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

And a few more downsides include:

Unscientific, Untested, Unproven

Obviously, but if you picked up this book and like it, chances are that you're OK with that :),

It's Maxims, Not Laws. These "Laws" Don't Hold

The laws format reminded me of "The 48 Laws of Power", which has become popular in good part for using the word "laws" as a marketing ploy, while instead listing a few good principles which are not laws.

The proof that the laws are not true

I like the idea of Karma, but a little bit of historical knowledge and a modicum of observation spirit will easily dispel this law as nothing more than wishful thinking.

I'm not aware of any universal law that stopped Genghis Khan from building the biggest empire in the world founded on torture and rape.
And I haven't seen any Karma stopping cruel individuals from wreaking havoc on unsuspecting and naive victims one after the other.
No, there is no universal Karma.
The Karma is us, my friends.
It's up to each one of us to stand for good. Don't expect no f*cking Karma to do stop evil and do the job for us.

Unpalatable Mix of Spirituality & Materialism

The author says that when you connect with the universe's power, then you can get anything you want.

Be spiritual development, success or… Wealth.

I find this outlook on spirituality to be quite poor, egocentric and ethnocentric. Very similar to the good old law of attraction, The Secret style. Just tap into that source and here's your money.

PROS

Good on Meditation

The meditation part is good.
I particularly liked the idea of not being afraid of death once you let go of your ego as separated from the whole.

Review

The Seven Spiritual Laws of Success is a mix of the law of attraction, bland spirituality, and the power of positive thinking.

Personally, I wasn't very impressed and I'm not the biggest fan of this ilk of self-help.

However, Irina in the forum made a great point:

> Practicing defencelessness in times of social media is a gold principle, it remembers me of your most recent post, about the enlightened individualism, in which you emphasize the importance of not putting celebrities or brands, for example, above us, as individuals.
> Serena Irina

I think she's right.
Personally, I was very put off by the law of attraction, especially when used to "get rich" in what seemed to be a mix of fake enlightenment and spiritualism, and good old greed.
But, otherwise, there are some golden nuggets in The Seven Spiritual Laws of Success.

Tom Torero: What Happens When You Come Across As A Taker (Case Study)

Lucio Buffalmano · 6 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Ralis, in art Tom Torero, is a late pick-up artist and dating coach.

He was active in the pick-up and coaching community and wrote several books, including "Conversation King" that we reviewed here.

Tom Torero took his own life after he had been "canceled" and publicly shamed.

INTRO

First thing:

Sucks to hear of Tom Torero's tragedy.

I wish he had weathered the canceling storm, I wish he was still here, and I'd have gladly spoken to him if it could have helped.

So "it sucks", "sad to hear" and "rest in peace" come first.

That being said, this article contends that Tom Torero called the rage upon himself.

He was a poor social strategist.

And, in the spirit of sharing the full truth and nothing but the truth, Tom Torero came across as a value-taker, gave off narcissistic vibes, and sometimes "creep vibes".

Let's dig deeper.

Danya Hajjaji VS Tom Torero: the cancel culture attack

Danya Hajjaji wrote an article on Tom Torero.

I can't find it anymore, maybe it's been pulled, but I read it some time ago.
Edit: it's here, didn't find it as it was drawn out by lots of results after Tom's death.

It was a scathing article, and it picked the absolute worst of Tom Torero.
Obviously, Tom came out of it poorly.
I did get the impression it was biased, overly critical, and very SJW / cancel culture style.

As far as I can remember, Hajjaji said that she contacted Stripe/PayPal to let them know / complain / inquire on why they were serving such a (presumably bad) character.
And as far as I can remember, some of those payment providers took action against Tom, so he was probably cut off from funding.

Some people have been quick to link Tom Torero's suicide to the article.
And the link is certainly possible, if not likely.

However, it's also a case of jumping to conclusions.
I wouldn't necessarily say that "it was the article" -impossible for most to say it-.
It seems to me that Tom had already pulled his videos from YouTube and seemed he was already rejecting his previous lifestyle -not sure why-.

Surviving cancel culture attacks

We have several resources here on that:

- Surviving shaming attacks (PU)
- SJWs attack on Julien Blanc (free article)
- Self-defense frames (PU)

And on the forum as well:

- Navigating cancel culture: my main advice is to "wait it out" because it's a blizzard storm that will clear
- Cancel culture: some reflections on "why" it even exists

Mistake #1: Tom Torero attracts hate by self-framing as a predator

Power University has one dedicated lesson for takers.

One of the signs is:

Takers use takers' language.

Simple no?

Torero uses taker's language, and people don't like takers (and for good reasons).

Now let's see if we can learn anything from it and prevent more of the same.

It sucks to say this of someone who's not here anymore.

But while everyone now sings praises -could be very well deserved as far as I know-, we also gotta look at the full story.

And the full story is that Tom Torero spoke like a low-vale predator (yes, not even a high value one).

Maybe Tom was a good guy.

And people who met him say he was a nice fella.

Which makes his attitude even worse: why on earth would you want to frame your work in value-taking terms?

It sucks to say, but Tom gave the ammo to his attackers who wanted to frame him as a psychopathic predator.

Tom uses taker frames (use win-win frames instead)

The article goes down harder (later), but even just looking at the smaller yellow flags you start seeing a trend.

Says Tom of his trip to Minsk:

> Tom: "This is like Ocean's Eleven," he said with his cheeky grin. "We're robbing the casino in broad daylight."

Why was he "robbing" anything?

Why not "a great place to meet women"?
Or "a great place to seduce", "romance", or even more self-serving was fine, like "have the adventures (or sex) of your life".

I remember from the article Tom said of his upcoming trip as a ski instructor to Switzerland:

> Tom: Lock up your daughters

Why should anyone lock up their daughters?

Think about that frame.

It frames seduction, sex, a short (or long)-term relationship as something that is bad for the seduced.

Sure, it's a stock sentence and a "fun" one -I have sung and smiled and had a good time at those lyrics many times with AC/DC's song-.
But you still want to be careful with it -both in saying it out loud and, probably even more, in having that mindset and attitude-.

You may mean it in a fun and carefree way where you actually want to say "good times are coming", but it's too easy to take it the opposite way.

If I had a daughter, my answer to that would be “Why should I lock up my daughter, because you’re dragging your poor ugly ass over here?”.
And I wouldn’t think of that because Tom is bad, poor, or ugly, but because any self-respecting man would push back against someone who frames himself as coming over to take and make my daughter worse off.

And again:

> Tom: (commenting on a post-intimacy recording) She said ‘when you approached me, I was nervous. It was like a wolf in a forest”. And that is the best thing any girl could ever say to you.

Again, he self-frames with the imagery of the predator.

We talk about predator-prey dynamic in Seduction University.
And they can be very seductive and effective… In the right contexts.

Torero does not put it into context though.

Plus, is that the “BEST thing ANY girl could EVER say to you”?
It certainly does feel Tom Torero gets a kick from being a wolf.
The way he talks about it feels creepy and like a loser who tries too hard to be an alpha male.

None of these red flags, per se, are huge.
But put all of them together, and you don’t exactly get the best impression of this guy.

Plus, it’s not even good game.
Whenever it happens to me, I consider as “not-so-good game”:

> Her: even when you approach me, I was intimidated

Sure, this is better than coming across as a too nice guy, submissive, or passive.

But intimidating women is not great game because most women who feel intimidated or fearful do NOT reply (unless they're major risk takers or unless you manage to change dynamics during the interaction or in text/calls).
Most women who fear you upon approach will move away and disperse in the crowd whenever they can -and then, again, you look like a creep who's harassing people-.

Also red:

- Cold approach power dynamics
- How to meet girls

> Cold Approach Power Dynamics

Tom brags

To see the bragging, you need some power awareness.

However, once you develop that, you realize Tom has a constant stream of covert bragging, humble bragging, and even one-ups and social climbs on his own audience.

The constant feel you get is one of:

- Look at me, who I banged
- Look at this broad I banged (am I not good?)
- If you're not doing the same, you're a loser

And that bragging also frames the women he meets as nameless "targets", which leads us to the next point:

Tom uses widely off-putting de-humanizing approaches

Such as, when people talk about "targets", "HB", etc. etc.

Again, of course, let's not be stupid or phony here.
It's OK to play the number's game, and it's even the best approach when you're going after "top of the funnel" results.
And when you play the number game, or whenever you have zero interest in romantic relationships, then it's fair to talk about women in impersonal terms.

Also, fucking the "target" is part of the motivation and an important step -it's been for me for a while and in part it's still there and it's normal-.

But as for everything: balance.

If fucking the targets is all you can talk about, then it's fair for any reader to think of you as a psychopath and a taker.
And it's a fair assessment, too: de-humanization is a known step towards malicious and harmful behavior (see Baumeister and Zimbardo).

Mistake #2: Creepy Vibes

Some examples that, for many who came across Tom Torero, felt like "creep red flags":

Bragging of Underage Pick-Ups: Be Smarter of What You Share

Tom Torero had a thing for young girls.

And it's TOTALLY fair -and "normal"- to like whatever age you like.

However, don't be fucking stupid about it, you must know that bragging about your pick-ups of 16-17 years old is not going to sit well with a good chunk of readers.

And yes, it might be "legal" wherever you were, but again, the same: legality is different than morality and what's legal is different than what's well-received.
And yes, you may not "care" about morality and you'd be right that morality is subjective and shouldn't limit your freedom.
But it's a major concern when it comes to what you share publicly, how you share, and what you seem to be bragging about.

Women are even more likely to be turned off by it.

For example, Berlusconi was brought down in large part by underage sex.
His wife said something to this tune around her divorce decision: "until when it was other women, I closed an eye. When it came to underage girls, I drew the line".

Basic emotional intelligence tells you that.

And basic emotional intelligence tells you there's a big difference between "doing it" -often kind of ignored if you're high power and women like you-, "bragging about it", "bragging about it while you're framed as a taker" and "selling the tapes recorded without consent".

Morbid factor: Have a healthier approach to sex / recording

As far as I remember, Tom's products upsold the "after sex" talk.

I'm not sure if he also sold the actual sex recordings, probably not.
Edit: the article says that the sex tape recordings were part of the offer.

But he talked about it, and the way he talked about felt "off".
It frankly did feel like he had a sort of morbid approach to it.

Again, let's not be phony -no "saints" here-: albeit it's not necessarily my thing it's fair and normal to want to record sex.
I once had a one-night stand girl recording a doggie style we had. And besides mild joviality that it was a first-time thing for me, I thought little of it: some people are just into that -but that doesn't mean it's OK to sell it! Do you think it'd be cool if that girl sold my recording with her?-.

And it's also fair and normal to have a strong emotional reaction to sex -or to recordings of it-.
When recording for SU some of the sex recordings were SO powerfully arousing to listen to.

But again, don't be fucking stupid about it.
Don't talk it up, to begin with.
Why are you even mentioning it, as a dating coach?
You're a dating coach, you're not selling your sex tape, you're selling how to get there, the seduction.

Who gives a flying F about Tom's Torero sex recording?

And it's at least a moral grey area to sell it without the girl's consent -even it's only an audio-.

Again from my point of view of someone who also shares learning material on dating and seduction: I do not want to sell my audience the sex itself, I only mention if it's relevant to the seduction.

And I don't want my audience to be interested in that either. Porn sites sell tape recordings. Dating coaches do not.
And it would be weird voyeurism, on the audience's part, too: why should anyone care about my sex? Mind your own. Care about how to get there so you can do the same and have beautiful sessions / intimacy / relationships.
So I remove the sex.

A good mindset is: record it, enjoy it if you like… But don't fucking sit on it like it's this cool great thing you've done.
It's a recording, just a damn recording, and life happens while you waste time on past memorabilia. Life is now, live it, let go of tapes.
Sex is natural, no biggies about it, it's much healthier to see it that way.

Mistake #3: Asshole marketer

Torero's products also had red flags.

Upselling pillow talk: respect people's privacy & their intimate sharing

Torero upsold the "after sex talk".

I might be wrong here.
But as far as I've seen and remember from seeing Torero's work, there was no mention to:

- Protecting the woman's privacy
- Being "not cool" to share the most intimate conversation

Many dating coaches try to spin their recordings as "helping men" and "doing nothing wrong to women".
It's a convenient narrative, but it fails to take ownership and comes across as sneaky.

Because it is NOT cool to record without consent and share it.
Especially not when someone is opening up with private and intimate information -which is exactly most likely to happen after sex-.

Just be a man about it and fucking admit it: it's not cool.

It's a betrayal of trust.

To teach, sometimes we gotta do what we gotta do, but there are ways and attitudes to go about it.
And you can still do it while protecting people's privacy.

And YOUR attitude is also important.
From this SU's point of view, I almost literally beg the audience to help us keep the recording within a small circle.

Now, use some emotional intelligence and look at it from a woman's perspective:

When she goes through your work, she will put herself in the woman's shoes.
And what will she think when you're selling those tapes, that you took without her consent, with her voice and words in it, while sharing her most vulnerable self?

She will think you're a SOB.
And she wouldn't be wrong.

Narcissism: sell processes, not your persona

Sandra Brown says in "Women Who Love Psychopaths":

> The websites devoted to 'seduction techniques' are an example of varying levels of psychopathy and are now being taught online to others. Anyone wanting to do this to another person, by definition is high in > psychopathic traits.

I don't fully agree.
But she's not fully wrong, either.
Tom Torero doesn't strike me as a psychopath. But Tom Torero struck as a narcissist who wasn't Machiavellian enough to avoid coming across as a selfish, low-empathy narcissist.

To sell his "Stealth Seduction", Tom says:

> Watch me during that magic year

See the narcissistic frame?
Why me, as a potential buyer, should I want to watch you?
May be, if I deem you as good enough, I want to learn from you, so tell me you're going to teach me, not that I should watch you.

That is an approach that makes women -and many men- recoil because it's most likely to be a taker's approach.

Again, let's not be stupid or phony: narcissism helps seduction, some narcissism is actually good, and there's nothing inherently wrong with it.
I certainly wouldn't score low on a narcissistic scale.

But, again, don't be fucking stupid about it.
One, rein in your narcissism, it's childish after a certain point.
And two, don't fucking sell me your narcissistic needs.

Manipulative approaches: teach how to grow instead

Finally, Torero self-framed as a manipulator.

According to the article, he said:

> Tom: "Real dark triad guys and pimps that we'll talk about, they really use drama and basically getting the girl addicted. Addicted so she can't leave you. "We gotta talk about it, cause these are techniques that I used."

And on Machiavellianism:

> Tom: Machiavellianism is the definition of game. It means being manipulative, playing people, very, very calibrated to human psychology

So a guy like this posts "lock up your daughter" and you'd wonder why people may get a bad reaction to it?

These are quotes from the article, and we may have to wonder whether they're verbatim or extrapolated to make him look bad.

But still, if you think about the name of the product: "stealth seduction".

I'd have to wonder: why stealth?

Be a fucking man, take your shots, date high-power… And you don't need "stealth" anything.

Because… That other genuine approach is also far, far more effective.

RIP Tom Torero

This post is very critical of Tom.

The PUA community did what everyone does in these cases: take up arms for a “fellow” coach and gush beloved farewells.

Including people who broke off with Tom when he was alive while showing evidence of Tom’s taker behavior:

So that’s red flag #1. I had a look through his website and YouTube channel and failed to find any mention of Nick Krauser. It seemed like the entire LDM was invented by Tom and a couple of unnamed daygmers that are occasionally alluded to. When he did mention my name on our Beginners Daygame video he seemed to choke on it. Have you seen the end of Back To The Future where Marty McFly is gradually fading out of the family photo? That’s how I felt. Red flag #2.

He didn’t send me a copy of the finished book. Red flag #3.

So finally I’m in Prague in March and a fellow daygamer shows me his copy of Street Hustle. I flip to the introduction and don’t find any line of acknowledgement for all my work. I flip to the glossary and see every concept in game is attributed to either Tom or nobody, including a few which clearly aren’t his concepts. That discussion on Facebook was ignored. Not a single mention of me in the book. Not a single recognition of the ideas taken from me, the aphorisms I gave him for the book, or the editing work I did. Not once. Red flag #4.

So it’s for this reason that I am announcing I am no longer associated with Tom Torero. It’s not the only reason, but it’s

Snapshot of PUA Krauser’s blog

> PUA Krauser: (angry and disappointed for Tom’s behavior annonce they’re no longer “associated”. Krauser he provides evidence of Tom incorporating copious and valuable editing feedback, without giving any credit)

We have a different approach at TPM.

It sucks that he’s dead, but death doesn’t whitewash all else.

And whitewashing doesn’t provide much learning, either.

So we went for an analysis that at least provides a learning opportunity.

Those who canceled Tom saw something not cool in there, including probably also in the character, and they weren’t totally wrong.

This doesn’t justify the attacker’s actions: too strong, nasty, biased and, unluckily, too effective.

It’s also a final indictment of Tom as a human being.
We never met him and it truly sucks it went the way it did.

In a way, I write it with certain anger.
As if I was yelling at him because it could have been avoided.

It’s as if you were yelling at someone you like but hurt themself: “look at all these stupid mistakes, why the fuck couldn’t have been more careful -and straight and genuine-, and you’d still be around”.

RIP Tom.
And may the readers of this article learn to do and be better.

Full Summary

About The Author:
Rhonda Byrne is an Australian television producer turned new age author.
She has written a number of books, most of them based on the now famous (infamous?) law of attraction.

The Secret Revealed: Your Mind Is A Magnet

Our mind is a magnet, says Byrne.

It emits and receives frequencies from the Universe.

Because our minds are magnets, the more we think about something, the more of it we will attract.

It's exactly like watching TV that receives signals. And to change channel -and change your life- you need to change your thoughts.

As a matter of fact, says the author, your current life is a reflection of your past thoughts.

Sometimes we don't even realize we've been thinking negatively.

It can happen with deep-seated fears, for example.

That's the case with people who make a lot of money and they lose it.

Rhonda says it's because, deep down, they were afraid of losing money. And it eventually manifested in reality.

My Note: be skeptical about these unproven claims
Actually, they're quite proven… To NOT be reliable.

Use Positive Sentence Structures

The universe doesn't differentiate between a sentence structured in the negative form and an actual negative thought.

So for example "I don't want to flunk the test" becomes "I will flunk the test.

So watch out for how you structure your thoughts.

Stop Thinking Negatively

It takes more than just one thought to manifest it in reality.

But some people have patterns of thoughts, and often negative ones.

How do you know if you're thinking too negatively?

Byrne recommends you listen to your body.

Worrying and negative thinking brings tension and pain in your stomach or chest. That's actually a sign from the Universe to change your thinking ways.

Also read: how to stop worrying and start living.

The 3 Rules Of The Secret

The three rules of The Secret are extremely simple: you must ask, you must believe, and you then can receive.

So it's:

1. Ask
2. Believe
3. Receive

For some more tips on how to put that into actions, keep on reading:

How to Put "The Secret" Into Action

This is the structure to get what you want:

- Ask

Ask what you want, and state it clearly. Once is enough: asking too many times shows doubt.

- Believe

You must believe you will receive even before you actually receive it.

Then wait for the universe to serve it to you. Don't keep dwelling on what you want because worry and fear will only negatively affect your signal.

The stronger you believe, the quicker it will happen. It takes time to make a million USD because people (wrongly) believe it does take time.

- Act as if you already have it

Behave as if you're already in possession of what you asked.

Make plans around it, think about how you will use it, and interact with it. Build your life around and it will finally materialize.

- Receive

Now, well… Enjoy your "hard work" :).

Use Visualization

Visualizing how you want your life to be will increase the positive frequency of your transmitting mind.

Byrne recommends that at the end of the day you think about your day as you wanted it to be.

This way you attract success for the day after.

Visualization also helps you get your mind free of the worry on how you will achieve what you want and focuses instead on believing.

My Note: this can be dangerous wishful thinking
Especially if taken to the extreme of taking no actions whatsoever. And it's not much different if the only actions you take are to behave as if what you want will miraculously happen by itself.

The Secret to Health: Think Positively

Rhonda talks about the placebo effect, which is indeed a well-known, real, and researched phenomenon.

That's the proof of how the law of attraction also applied to health.

Diseases only stay in your body when you "trap" them with negative thoughts and conversations.

The secret, she says, is again to surround yourself with positive thoughts.

My Note: Fase "evidence"
This is not wholly wrong and a positive mind can indeed support a healthy bodily fight against the disease.
However, as Rhonda presents, it's snake oil salesmanship and, overall, false. Even potentially dangerous if people don't also seek more scientific treatment.
And if the placebo effect is proof that the law of attraction exists, what about all the limitations to its use and ower, and the (frequent) times it doesn't work?

Don't Fight What You Don't Want

The author suggests that instead of fighting against scenarios that we don't want, we should focus on what we want.

That's the most efficient strategy, because focusing on the problems only attracts more problems.

It could actually make sense somehow.

The Spiritual Side of "The Secret" Says You're Immortal

Byrne says that since we are made of energy, and energy cannot be destroyed, we are also somehow immortal.

We have always been and always will be.

Every answer, every idea one can conceive is out there in the Universe. You only need to reach it.

Real Life Applications

Think Positive

A conscious effort to think more positively throughout the day is certainly a good takeaway from The Secret book.

Drop Problems, Focus on Positive Change

The idea of focusing less on problems and more on what you want in life can actually be fantastic advise. Sometimes we make our problems bigger than what they are, or sometimes we can't easily change something. And maybe we don't have to.

Focus on what you want more in life and get to work on that instead.

CRITICISM

Overall, we cannot recommend this book.

The Secret is unscientific, unproven, and irrational.
It feels a lot like and a lot like a charlatan's way to make money off naive customers who want success, but not the hard work that success often requires.

If you enjoy The Secret, we highly recommend this long, but enlightening article on naive self-help:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

- Dangerous advice on not taking action

"The Secret" goes as far as to say that visualization is good because it focuses on the positive energy rather than on the how you will do it.

Albeit I believe you can -and should- set goals first without knowing (yet!) how you will reach them, completely disregarding the how and the actions is dangerous wishful thinking.

- Unscientific (but spun and falsely presented as scientific)

There are many great unscientific books out there.

Indeed, you don't need science to write an insightful text and you don't to say your theory is based on science if it's not.

That's one thing I didn't like about "The Secret".

It tries hard to sell as science what is not scientific.

- Inductive Reasoning Fallacy

The Secret is peppered with inductive reasoning fallacy.
Inductive reasoning fallacy says that because I saw something happen a few times, it must be a generalizable law.

Often, it is not (read Fooled by Randomness).

The Secret Review

"The Secret" is nothing new, and nothing more than the law of attraction.

It's been going around and around for decades now, and found its way into many popular self-help books.

For example, Think and Grow Rich espoused the law of attraction decades ago.

And popular self-help guru Tony Robbins also promotes it in some of his seminars and products.

However, other books and authors, including Tony Robbins and Napoleon hill have more wisdom than “The Secret”.
“The Secret” is only about the law of attraction and adds nothing more.
As a matter of fact, it’s potentially dangerous when it calls for not working hard, and for behaving as if you already own what you want.

That being said, if so many people liked it, maybe there are some good things in “The Secret”.
Eliminating negative thoughts and thinking positively makes you happier and more optimistic.
And that, in turn, makes it far more likely that you will take action. The problem is, again, that Rhonda says you should not take action.

Visualizing can also be helpful, albeit not as much as people think. And it can even be counterproductive (see pop psychology myths and self-help myths).

But, ultimately, thinking that you will attract what you think of without taking action is not just nonsense, but it’s actively harmful.

If you want to learn more about how to think positively, then I recommend positive psychology.

Probably starting from “Learned Optimism“, which is positive thinking, with science.

As of now, we cannot recommend this book.
And even if you decide to try this “law” and implement it, I recommend that you also be strategic and work hard, and never put all your eggs into the law of attraction basket(case).

Full Summary

About The Author:
Norman Vincent Peale was an American minister who helped popularize the concept of, you guessed it, "the power of positive thinking".
Together with Think and Grow Rich and How to Win Friends Friends and Influence People, The Power of Positive Thinking is one of the biggest selling books of the 20th century in the self-help genre.

Think Positive for Positive Outcomes

Thinking goes both ways, says Norman Vincent Peale.

As much as positive thinking will improve your life for the better, negative thinking works like a fulfilling prophecy that will make your own fears a reality.

On the other hand, when you think positive, you make your positive thoughts a reality.

For example the author's magazine was going through a very difficult time. How did they solve the issue? They all had a meeting visualizing more subscribers and guess what happened… ?

Yep.

Of course, that doesn't prove anything because correlation is not causation, but I'm a nitpicker :).

To be liked, like others

"The Power of Positive Thinking" applies to social relationships as well.

If you naturally like people and show an interest in them, they will likely like you as well.

And conversely, if you are self-centered and too much in love with yourself, people will find it hard to like you.

Remember: You're Not Alone. Many Are In Your Same Situation

Albeit at times we might feel like our issues are unique to us, the author says that millions of people either have the same issue, or have had the same issue.

And, here's the great news: there are countless of people who have overcome exactly what you're going through.

Pick Your Battles

Don't make all the problems your own.
We have limited time on this earth, so don't try to solve everything.

Break Free of Worries

Vincent Peale says that worrying is the source of both physical and psychological diseases.

And he was right.

But the good news is that you can get rid of worrying.

How to do it?

You simply have to believe that it's possible to get rid of it.

Then you can use a simple, yet powerful technique: get rid of your negative thoughts. The next step is to replace the negative thoughts with positive ones.

> How to Stop Worrying and Start Living: Summary & Review

Real-Life Applications

An interesting good takeaway for anyone who lives in the right area for this:

- Walk in The Woods

If you are feeling stressed out and tense, the author recommends walks in the woods to decompress.
And anything reconnecting you to nature and far away from the hustle and bustle can be effective.

Don't forget to bring some self-defense tool, just in case.

CONS

I highly recommend you read this article on naive self-help since it addresses many of the pitfalls common to books like The Power of Positive Thinking:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

- Bit Repetitive

The concepts of The Power of Positive Thinking can be transformative. But they are also quite simple and the book could have been shorter.

However, if you read my book reviews, you'll notice that's a gripe I often have: I think indeed that most books could be shorter.

- Mistakes Correlation for Causation

The author should have read Fooled by Randomness by Nassim Taleb to understand how humans see trends, patterns and correlations when, often, there are none.

Norman Vincent Peale confuses correlation with causation. Such as, he believes that because A and B happened one after the other, then A must have caused B.

But of course, we can't be sure of that in the slightest.

- Religious… And Heretical at The Same Time?

Some criticized Peale, and the book, for being religious.

Well, I can see where that criticism comes from.

But on the other hand, Vincent Peale was a minister.

So, well what else do you expect?
You read Mein Kampf from Hitler, and would you be surprised the book is racist?

That being said, religiosity doesn't necessarily have to be a con in my opinion.

As a matter of fact, religion can help provide faith, hope and a strong psychological foundation for many people.

But if you're looking for a more secular resource, and a resource that is more science-backed, then "The Power of Positive Thinking" might not be the book for you.

Episcopal theologian John M. Krumm instead criticized Peale for not putting God first.

PROS

- Uplifting

If you don't mind too much the lack of scientific backing and if you can manage to fully embrace the message, then "The Power of Positive Thinking" is a book with a strong uplifting spirit.

- Positive Thinking IS Important

Don't let all the critics and imperfection sway you: thinking positive IS important.

Review

The Power of Positive Thinking is a good book.

Albeit part of that new age / law of attraction genre that we're not too fond of, it is one was of the best of the pack.

It's interesting that "The Power of Positive Thinking" has criticized far more than similar books such as Think and Grow Rich or The Secret, both of which have received less criticism while embracing similar and equally unscientific theories.

It's probably because "The Power of Positive Thinking" finds its roots more in religion than woo-woo new age "science".
And while I didn't particularly enjoy all the Biblical references, I otherwise find it better than many similar new age books because the ability to think positively and find a positive frame for your life events is a fundamental life skill for a happy life.

At the same time though, we must remind our readers that it's also a potential trap for an effective life, which requires a more realistic and dispassionate outlook on life and events that is neither positive nor negative, but as realistic as possible.

Interesting tidbit of information: The Power of Positive Thinking is one of Tony Robbins's favorite book. In turn, Robbins is the author of one of our favorite self-help products: Personal Power II.

Does the power of positive thinking work?

Yes, in a sense, it does.
Thinking positively will make you generally happier and more optimistic.

To end this review: can we recommend it or not?
Since The Power of Positive Thinking doesn't really teach how to think positive and neither when and when not to think positive, it's not a favorite of this website.

Bullet Summary

- The issues that we face in our lives stem from a lack of self-love
- You have to approve of yourself exactly as you are
- You get what you focus on. Focus on positives

Full Summary

About the Author:
Louise Lynn Hay was an American motivational author and the founder of Hay House, a publisher of "new thought" and books that revolve around positive thinking, law of attraction, alternative medicine, "life force" and similar semi-spiritual topics -she also published Deepak Chopra's work-.
Hay authored several New Thought self-help books herself, the most popular being You Can Heal Your Life.

Accept Yourself Unconditionally

Accepting yourself unconditionally is one of the main tenets of You Can Heal Your Life.

Some practical tips on how to do just that:

1. Replace Should

Should is a very dangerous expression says Louise Hay.

It puts you in the position of being wrong and feeling guilty.
Such as, in a position of non-accepting ourselves.
That runs contrary to Louise's philosophy, which is that of never criticizing ourselves.

She recommends changing your "should" with "could".

As Tony Robbins said, “quit shoulding all over yourself” :).

2. Release The Past

Recriminating about the past is similar to how should affect us. It poisons us with no real advantages. Learn to let go of your past to enjoy a happier present.

3. Forgive

Forgiving both yourself and others is a great way to let go of much hatred and negative emotions trapped within us.

Your States Of Minds Produce Your Reality

The author says that diseases are a product of our states of mind.
And to invert the trend and heal ourselves, we need to love ourselves first.

You Get What You Focus On

Whatever you focus on, you will get.

The more you focus on something, the more of it you will get.
And sadly we mostly focus on negative thoughts.
Louise Hay exhorts the readers to focus on positive thoughts instead.

This is basically the “(not so) good old law of attraction”, which is in part BS.

Connect To The Cosmic Forces For A Feeling of Ultimate Security

You won’t get security with a job or a hefty bank account.

And not even with a spouse.

You Can Heal Your Life says we become secure when we learn to connect with the cosmic power that creates all things (God).
Once you can do that, you will never be alone and insecure again.

Real-Life Applications

Ration Out Your Shoulds
I don't think you should fully abandon your "should" and I believe you should can use pain (read how to leverage pain) as much as you can leverage pleasure.
But most people will definitely gain by using less "should" in their lives -me included-.

Treat Yourself Well
Learn to love and appreciate yourself can be a game changer for many of us.

CONS

I highly recommend you read this article on naive self-help since it addresses many of the pitfalls common to books like You Can Heal Yourself:

> Naive Self-Help: 10 Most Dangerous BS to Avoid

Potentially dangerous: also seek medical help when needed

If people decide to follow the "power of your healing mind" rather than seeking medical help, they may get that medical help too late -or not at all-.

That's potentially dangerous, and you or the people close to you who fall for this new age trap must be warned.

Illogic, Unscientific... And Plain Dumbass claims

This was one of the most damning lines against the whole book:

> Releasing resentment will dissolve even cancer

> Louise Hay

Ouch, what a dumbass claim :S.

Potential victim-blaming

Suggesting that all health issues are a consequence of feelings, thoughts and mental patterns is unhelpful. And I also find it potentially offensive.

New Agey – Woowoo

A bit similar to The Secret, I find You Can Heal Your Life to be too light on science and practical knowledge. And a bit too much based on belief and ethereal states of mind.
My biggest problem with that though is when New Age books tell us everything is a product of our thoughts.

Unscientific, unproven, untested

No, the stories you hear online or the (often fake) reviews on Amazon don't count.

While placebo and a positive mind are known to help with both mental and body ailments, the author's recommendations here are simply untested against any specific mental disorder or illness.

PROS

Some good wisdom
Learning to absorb knowledge effectively is often a matter of not throwing the baby with the bad water. And albeit there are a few points I disagree with, You Can Heal Your Life does have some powerful wisdom.

It seemingly helped lots of people
Many people testify the book changed their life. You can't argue with that and I am happy the book helped so many people.
On the other hand, I also believe that one can combine whatever's good with this book, with more solid and scientific knowledge, as well as a more strategically sound approach on how to maximize well-being.

Review

While not being the greatest fans of You Can Heal Your Life, we also recognize some of the good in it.

Books like You Can Heal Your Life loosely -or not so loosely- based on the law of attraction are some of the biggest best sellers in the self-help genre.

Personally I believe the law of attraction is 50% deep wisdom and 50% BS.
The 50% BS is that you won't materialize a thing in your life with just your thoughts. Work, grit and skill acquisition will get you there -and yes, a little bit of luck can help too-.

On the other hand, what you focus on does revolutionize your mental states and how you approach the world. Both in terms of happiness and, indirectly, also on concrete results. Focus on problems indeed and you'll be depressed and take little actions. Focus on opportunities and you'll get more power and actions.

Naive Self-Help: Why Self Help Is Failing You

Lucio Buffalmano · 15 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Struggling with self-help that promises big results but delivers little? You're not alone.

At The Power Moves we've reviewed thousands of books and coached thousands of ambitious men — and we see the same pattern: popular advice often rests on naive myths that stall progress or actively set you back.

Read on to learn how to spot those traps and choose strategies that actually work.

Naive Self-Help™ is a TPM concept developed by Lucio Buffalmano for The Power Moves. After reviewing thousands of self-help resources, Buffalmano identified a critical blind spot: mainstream advice consistently ignores power dynamics, human incentives, and the darker side of human nature. This concept serves as a warning to seek more accurate, effective, and power-aware strategies when popular self-help falls short of real-world results.

Naive self-help is unwilling or unable to look at and deal with the dark side of human nature

Intro: Why Self-Help Underdelivers

The high-level definition of Naive Self-Help™ is:

> Advice that distorts reality by omitting human incentives, trade-offs, or malicious actors, and sells solutions that are at best sub-optimal and at worst counterproductive to progress and goal achievement.

Self-help fails because its preferred aspirational tone ignores the darker side of human nature.

Naive self-help doesn't just waste time: it can lower your power, keep you stuck at the "nice but ineffective" level, and lower your guard against toxic people.
Recognizing its traps is the first step to becoming strategically effective.

We categorize naive self-help into these broad categories:

1. Pollyannish based on a model of neutral or good human nature/world
2. Simplistic, with black-and-white generalizations and 'laws' that don't account for calibration
3. Motivational-only, without the how

Pollyannish naivete is the original "naive self-help". But it would be reductive to limit naive self-help to gullibility. Instead, even cynical self-help can be equally distortive of reality.

Types of Naive Self-Help

Among the main naive self-help categories:

1. Utopian Reality

> Belief in good people and good world, without accounting for the dark side

Don Quixote, a knight-hero of his own utopian world
Including how authors wished things were, how they should be, or unrealistic could bes.

Some examples:

- Career advice for politics-free workplaces that may not even exist in the real world
- Social skills guides based on giving, without mentioning that many people are takers and don't reciprocate
- Relationship guides based on communion only: Brene Brown correctly says that "we are here to connect". But ambitious men are also wired to seek status and climb hierarchies, or to seek sexual variety

⍰ Example: Naive Leaders & Ego-Free Workplaces

In Simon Sinek's best-selling 'Leaders Eat Last' the ideal leader puts people first, before results and before himself.

Typical utopian thinking.
In reality, results matter, selflessness is not how you become a leader, and it's most likely not even effective leadership.

Many seek leadership in the first place to eat first and more

Kim Scott's Radical Candor is better, and we loved this book.
But it's still based on an ideal workplace where people have no egos. But… People do. And especially your bosses who, righteously, expect more deference from those below.

Naive Spinning: Accurata Data, Naive Interpretations

Naive spinning starts with accurate intuition or data, but adds a naive spin to make things 'nicer'.

For example, emotional intelligence are important to a good life.
However, Goleman, who popularized them, never mentions that emotional intelligence and empathy can be used - and often are used- for selfish ends, including to better manipulate others.
Building on the concept, Bradberry found that CEOs and execs had lower emotional intelligence than middle managers. But instead of second-guessing the emotional intelligence, he said that execs and CEOs "had to do better".

For more on this topic, see:

- Emotionally intelligent Machiavellis at the top

> The Emotional Intelligence Myth: Why Power and Machiavellianism Beat Empathy at the Top

Naive Goodness

It includes the beliefs in:

1. Just world hypothesis, the world tends to reward good behavior and honest and good people will eventually win
2. General goodness of people
3. Endless ability to change for the better, and willingness to do so

4. Karma as the invisible hand propping up the just world (examples: The Seven Spiritual Laws of Success, The Four Agreements, author Sadhguru. See this analysis on him)
5. Give and you will get: while it righteously emphasizes the importance of being a man of value and foundational social exchange dynamics, this only works when matched by power awareness

Unsurprisingly, these people make great targets for predators, thieves, and general value takers.
Much better for you instead if you take past behavior as red flags and strong indicators of future behavior.

⍰ Example: Radical Acceptance

Radical Acceptance is a good book for self-haters who need foundational self-love, but naive at times.
Says the author:

> in sharp contrast to our cultural conditioning <— ⍰⍰♂ Lucio's note: red flag of cultural determinism
> the Buddhist perspective holds that there is no such thing as a sinful or evil person (…)

It's simply not true. Psychological studies show that some people have no empathy and enjoy harming others (Lyons, 2019).
Remember, people differ, and sometimes an asshole is just an asshole.

Never give a snake another chance to harm you

The Naive "Good Man Path to Success"

The "good man path to success" postulates that good and honest men win.

This unsubstantited. There's no evidence that stronger morals beat, say, "average morals", or even "below average morals".
Circumstantial evidence instead shows that countless not-so-good men win. And sometimes win big.

Of course, good men can win.
We train these men here. But to win as honorable men requires advanced power awareness and skills.

2. Naive Open-Mindedness

> Taking tolerance, subjectivity, and relativism to an extreme that forces the suspension of good judgment and effective policies, potentially harming the individual or society

Some of its offshoots include:

- Diversity for diversity's sake, with inclusion as a goal
- Political correctness instead of truth

Open-mindedness obeys the "law of optimum balance" and it's beneficial at moderate levels, but maladaptive at extreme levels.

The law of optimum balance for the trait "open-mindedness"
Surprisingly, it's educated people who most often fall victim to naive open-mindedness.

Charlatans Welcome: The "Omnis Learning" Fallacy

Naive open-mindedness virtue-signals to 'learn from anybody' or 'anyone can teach you something'.

While it's valid, it's also vastly ineffective.
Learning 1h from an actual expert is high ROI; listening 1h to a clueless guy or a marketer is not.

When BS and conmen abound, “being open to everyone” means ingesting tons of BS. Discriminating in self-help makes sense
Also see:

- Marketer’s manipulations: Tai Lopez case study

3. Naive Motivation

> Motivation only, without hard skills and effective strategies to achieve goals

While ambitious and driven men don’t need motivation, motivation can be helpful to some.
We don’t have anything against motivation itself, but some forms of it can be harmful.

Some types of naive motivations include:

- Limitless self-help (“you can do anything”), a powerful mindset, but must be tempered by assessments of strengths, weaknesses, and probabilities
- Struggle porn can take the focus away from effectiveness
- Unlimited inner power (“all that you need is within you”). Books such as You Can Heal Your Life are potentially dangerous when they discourage external medication

From personal experience, motivation alone spins wheels.
Ambitious men who develop character and skills go far.

⍰ Motivational Falsehoods

Popular motivation is inspiring, but based on falsehoods, half-truths, or spins.
Example:

> Sinek: some are skinny and scrawny (…) shivering out of fear (…) but every single one of them when they’re > emotionally exhausted, physically exhausted, somehow can dig down deep inside themselves to find the energy to help the person next to them. Service. Giving. Having their back…

It's poetic imagery: the seemingly weakest guys win by helping.

But special ops teams can be quite dark.
For example, former SEAL Goggins shares that the most elite SEAL team didn't want him as a black guy.
And we know for certain from Dutton that at least some British special ops were psychopaths.

And selfless giving is NOT the #1 key to success and NOT the main differentiator between those who make it and those who don't.
Psychologist Angela Duckworth suggests instead that grit makes the difference, not team spirit or selfless giving.
And psychologist Adam Grant shows that the selfless givers tend to be big losers in life, not winners.

False Self-Esteem

Self-esteem is foundational, but gurus telling 'you're enough' may not be effective at increasing it.

In his positive psychology book Seligman states that incantations have no effect.
And if you don't have the skills, boosterism only leads to entitlement mentality, lack of results, and extra anguish.

A better approach is to combine self-esteem with skills, results, and antifragile mindsets.
Something like:

- Focus on actions, not feelings
- Focus on getting good, rather than being good (Fixed mindset)

⍰ Example: Marie Forleo Tells You That "You're Good Enough"

This is what I got when I signed up for Forleo's newsletter:

> Marie: You are good enough
> Me: (thinking) Thanks for the covert power move. Have I ever said I wasn't? :S

4. Unfounded Self-Help

> Scientifically unproven, illogical, or lacking real-world experience (the 3 pillars of knowledge).

This self-help is based on opinions, ideologies, or made-up theories.

Law of Attraction & "New Age" Spiritualism

The law of attraction is the most popular nonsense in the self-help industry.
Books like The Secret sold tens of millions of copies. And Think and Grow Rich is one of the most popular self-help books ever.

There is no end in sight, with new gurus like Joe Dispenza raking up millions of YouTube videos while regurgitating the same old formula.

While a strong belief in a supportive force can be empowering, this self-help may not only take time away from action, but can be actively harmful.
The Secret for example tells readers to live as if you "already possess what you desire", and not to work towards your goals.

5. Naive Empiricism

> Sounds empirical or logical, but deeper critical analysis shows failure of logic

Naive empiricism is tougher to spot. It requires some knowledge of logic, scientific principles, and statistics/data analysis.
Let's see some examples.

⍰Wrong Unit of Measure

Take this post from a dating coach:

> Many guys go out for 3 hours of day game sessions here, another 4 hours here, another 3 hours there, etc., before they get a lay. 15 hours of pickup per lay is not unreasonable, and that would put you at 600 hours.

Sounds analytical.
But it's the wrong unit of measure. In dense cities you could talk to several women you like in 1h, while in others you'd meet zero.
It's not hours of sessions that count, it's hours of interactions.

⍰ Data Out of Context: The Better Angels of Utopia

In "The Better Angels of Our Nature" Pinker 'proves' that humanity is getting more peaceful and safer because the number of wars decreased.

However, as Nassim Taleb corrects him, wars in the past were smaller and confined. So they were 'easier to start' and had little impact on most non-combatants.

⍰ Naive Counter-Intuitism (The "Debunking Trap")

Counter-intuitivism is how potentially smart people talk stupid, while trying to sound smarter.

Counterintuitive takes are sometimes power moves because they frame the speaker as smarter than most.
But they're also appealing because they make readers feel smarter than the majority.

And while some counterintuitive takes are valid, some others only sound valid.
For example, Steven Pinker suggests that terrorism is overblown and hasn't had a major impact on Western civilization.

Pinker seems data-driven by looking at the number of deaths.
But it fails to look at all terrorism-related costs, which are instead astronomical when you account added security tech, personnel, and millions of hours wasted for us all. These costs are ubiquitous and, on aggregate, unprecedented in human history.

Naive (Evolutionary) Psychology

Widespread, and pop evolutionary psychology is common in the manosphere and dating literature.

Naive results-based pragmatism

Most analyses of success stories are naive because the underlying assumption is that doing what the winner has done will yield the same results for everyone else.

Poor analyses follow from this assumption.
For example, one may achieve certain results despite certain behaviors -like Steve Jobs' short fuse-. And what someone did in a specific context, at a specific time, may not work for a different person, in a different period, in different contexts.

⍰ Example: The 'Secret' of Football Domination & Business Success

In The Talent Code Doyle travels to Brazil to learn the "secrets" of the country with the most World Cups.
But per inhabitant, Italy or Germany have more World Cups. Doyle's analysis then compounds with more naive empiricism.

Jim Collins describes how the best leaders are self-effacing and humble.
But it doesn't account for the type of business and context. And, of course, relevant for all aspiring leaders, that humble and self-effacing leaders are a tiny, tiny minority (Pfeffer, 2015).

Naive "Science-Backed"

You can take almost any single claim and have it "science-backed" with a small sample and enough tries.

So any advice based on individual studies is often of little usefulness and, sometimes, even counterproductive.

Naive Self-Disempowerment

Some examples:

- Humans = not that special, despite being the most dominant species out of billions of species
  ⍰ Example: misusing Kahneman's work as evidence of human irrationality. But Buss explains that many 'biases' are shortcuts that allowed us to thrive
- "Back when it was better" = today we suck, wearing rose-tinted glasses when "analyzing" the past.
  ⍰ Example: Tribe, an ode to tribal living, conveniently forgetting the downsides
- Rotten cherry-picking = we're all bad, over-generalizing negative traits or events to draw unfounded conclusions about humanity
  ⍰ Example: Tolle in The Power of Now suggests that 'there is something wrong with readers' as part of a murderous species that committed genocides
- Naive comparison = inferior humans: comparing humans with nitpicked animals to suggest that humans are weaker / inferior ⍰ Example: Alfred Adler says that humans suffer an inferiority complex for being "an inferior organism"

6. Biased Self-Help

> Advice and analyses that reflect the author's preferences, experiences, or self-interest more than objective evidence or balanced reasoning.

Among the causes of bias:

- Ignorance: don't even realize their own bias
- Crusade: believe their cause is just, and more important than truth
- Bitterness: anger and resentment fuel the bias

Just as an example, let's take nurture VS nature.
Both nature and culture influence people's characters and behaviors, but biased takes refuse to strike this sensible middle ground.

Women tend to downplay nature because it undermines their claim to equal agency and further female empowerment.
And men downplay the role of culture because the majority of men struggle to get and keep a woman if all women empower themselves.

⍰ Leftist Bias: Cultural Determinism

Cultural determinists deny or downplay the role of genes and inborn drives ("tabula rasa" approach).

For example, says Esther Perel in her book "Mating in Captivity":

> Gender differences and their ensuing taboos and prohibition have long been viewed as categorical imperatives, biologically rooted, and therefore immutable.
> Feminism showed that these undisputed truisms were in fact social constructions that reinforced a long-standing gender order that obviously favored men.

It sounds like a list of big words to sound erudite while pushing her own narrative.

But some male great authors like Jared Diamond and Viren Swami also engage in it.
In Attraction Explained, to downplay the genders' biological differences, Swami says that the reason why it's men who court women is because of the patriarchy, without mentioning biological and evolutionary reasons.

⍰ Conservative Bias: Innatism

Innatists downplay the importance of nurture, culture, subjectivity, and exceptions.

This approach is more common among men, including the red pill and the manosphere.
A red pill acronym states that 'All Women Are Like That' (AWOLT) and we've often noticed a tendency to over-generalize and gloss over nuances, contexts, and individual differences.

But we've also noticed the same from some high-authority researchers, including some whose work we deeply appreciate.

7. Simplistic Self-Help

> Simple analyses and advice that fails to understand the full dynamics at plays and over-generalizes, lacks nuance, fails to calibrate, and ultimate fails to deliver results for most

Very few resources are nuanced enough to allow everyone to succeed with them.

For example, the otherwise excellent 48 Laws of Power doesn't help most men succeed because it doesn't calibrate the principles, and fails to provide higher-level frameworks for success.
Similarly, Brene Brown's vulnerability would fail most men in most contexts.

Edutainment

Education and entertainment can go together.

But sometimes it's just 'fun facts' or curiosity that won't help you advance in life.

Malcolm Gladwell is a successful edutainer.
And Vanessa van Edwards isn't too bad either:

Textbook edutainment: this knoweldge won't help you achieve goals

Edutainer consumers also provide a biased sample for more naive empiricism.
Surveied on how useful the training was, they score based on how good they felt. That then becomes naive "proof" for effectiveness.

8. Excesses

> Taking potentially valid approaches to an extreme where they become low-ROI ineffective, or even harmful

Going extreme is appealing to humans, and can be seen in many self-development areas that we don't cover as extensively (e.g.: nutrition).

Excesses are also common with 'bio-hacking', spending time and resources on tech, tools, or habits that only marginally help, if at all. That's low ROI at best.

Too Good = Sucker

Naive self-help fails to see that there can be such a thing as too much goodness.
Especially in the absence of power awareness and strategies.

For example:

- Over-giving can turn you into a sucker
- Over-conscientiousness can keep you stuck doing what you hate
- Over-niceness turns you into a social peg for asshole

Some traits that are often seen as negative are necessary to counterbalance the "good" ones. Especially for ambitious men who seek success and goal achievement.
Often, they're also necessary even for pro-social and win-win relationships.

Also see:

- Be bad to be good

And for balance:

- Enlightened Machiavellianism
- Enlightened asshole
- Enlightened cynic

Too Bad = Lonely Outcast

Extreme cynicism is less common than naive self-help, but it can be equally misleading.

For example, The 48 Laws of Power is a great book that we generally recommend.
But by focusing only on the darker, manipulative, and power-hungry side of human nature, it's equally distorting.

If you stop at that level of analysis, you lose opportunities for win-win and quality relationships.
That's particularly misleading for beginners. For example, from the book's subreddit:

> Naive learner: I have tried to make people into enemies (…) only to have two people want to fight me

Effective self-help takes the best of both worlds:

80% of self-help is naive, 15% is cynical, 4% is bitter, and the top 1% combines the best of both worlds

Naive Self-Help Fields

All fields have some naive self-help, and some categories have more.
We've noticed a particularly high percentage of naivete in:

- Leadership resources, ranging from naively aspirational books, to BS autobiographies.
  See the best leadership resources.
- Dating for women, with a lot of "be strong" advice that doesn't really work that well.
  See the best dating resources for women

Dynamics of Naivete

Why do so many intelligent authors and readers fall for naive self-help?

Even the supposed elites of knowledge, researchers and scientists, fell for the comfortable lie trap.
Before Dawkins and Krebs (1978) first postulated that communication among animals was often deceptive, the consensus was that communication provided reliable information.

Here are some reasons why:

1. Utopias provide comfortable lies and both authors and learners collude in keeping the lie alive
2. Uotpias save face with convenient excuses: we can blame failure on a few bad apples and still get to think we're 'good man and leaders'
3. Naive authors are virtue-signaling: to sub-communicate that they are good. Even truer for successful authors, since painting a darker world would give away that they are playing a darker game of power.
   P.S.: beware the autobiographies. They're ad pieces
4. Some authors are just naive: by simple mathematical distribution, average authors outnumber the highly sophisticated ones.

5. Authors manipulate the competition for selfish purposes: it's easier to win when everyone else acts as if the world was good and nice.

Keep the competition naive, and win with ease. Ultimate manipulation

Moving Past Naive Self-Help

First off, don't turn overly cynical.
It's common to go from one extreme to the other:

1. Believe naive self-help
2. Follow unhelpful models
3. Fail and realize the hypocrisy of naive self-help
4. Turn bitter

The best way to avoid naive and unhelpful self-help, is through good self-development.

About The Authors:

Lucio Buffalmano holds a master's degree from La Sapienza, department of communication and sociological research, and is an American Psychology Association (APA) member.

His approach combines science, first-hand experience & critical analysis. You can learn it all in one fell swoop with Power University.

Ali Scarlett is a bestselling author, entrepreneur, and avid researcher of the science of networking. He has studied the likes of professional sociologists, applied psychology researchers, and other business networking experts when defining his methods. He's also one of the main contributors to this website, Power University, and power dynamics as a discipline.

Introduction

Here, Buffalmano and Scarlett underline that this book is not for people without a basic, foundational understanding of social skills.

Chapter #1: How to Gain Positive Influence and Leverage Over Anyone You Want

#1: What is the Social Exchange?

> Buffalmano and Scarlett: "The social exchange theory is a framework model that looks at social relationships as exchanges among individuals who seek to maximize their selfish interests…The social exchange theory starts from the proven premise that people prefer relationships that add value to their lives. These are the relationships that advance their interests, make them feel good, and generally make them better off."

#2: How the Social Exchange Helps You

It will help you to:

- Assess people's character.
- Recognize and choose givers and collaborators who make your life better.
- Recognize and cut out the "takers" who hamper your progress.
- Be a better friend or partner.
- Be a better leader.

#3: How to Leverage the Social Exchange

- Present yourself as a value-giver
- Build your social capital with those you want to influence

> How the Social Exchange Theory Can Get You the Network of Your Dreams (Part 1 of 2)

Chapter #2: The Number One Quality to Gain Respect and Fairness

#1: What Is Assertiveness?

> Scarlett and Buffalmano: "Assertiveness is defined in many different ways, but we believe in an assertiveness that supports emotional independence, personal empowerment, and a win-win relationship.

So, assertiveness defined within those three elements is:

'To state your needs, wants, feelings, and opinions clearly and directly, to respect yourself as well as others, and to influence the world around you, including other people, to reach certain goals.'

#2: Limiting Beliefs

- "Dark" feelings such as anger and a will to power are bad to feel and show.
- Assertiveness means getting your own way all the time.
- Being assertive means being selfish.

#3: Empowering Beliefs

- I am worthy of respectful behavior and communication, and so are others.

- I'm in charge of my behavior, and others are in charge of theirs.
- I decide for myself what I will and will not do.

#4: Assertive Communication

The first assertiveness framework taught is the "DESOE" framework (pronounced "dee·so").

1. D (Describe): Define the situation and what's going on.
2. E (Express): State how you feel in the situation.
3. S (Specify): Describe what you would like to happen.
4. O (Outcome): Describe what happens if they go along with your wishes and, potentially, what happens if they don't.
5. E (Enforce): Enforce your boundaries as needed.

As a shorter format for quick personal feedback, Scarlett condenses the DESOE assertive communication framework into only three parts. He coined it the "ESE" framework (pronounced "easy"):

1. Express: State how you feel in the situation.
2. Specify: Describe what you would like to happen.
3. Enforce: Enforce your boundaries as needed.

Chapter #3: How to Build a Social Circle of Cool Friends, Allies, and Mentors at Will

#1: Leverage the High Power/High Warmth Matrix

Also known as the stereotype content model.

People determine whether or not they want to be around you based on how powerful you are and how friendly you are:

[image]
To keep a great chapter short, the more you can balance being very powerful with being very friendly, the more people will want to be around you.

Read more about the High Power/High Warmth Matrix.

Chapter #4: How to Overcome the Power Games People Play that Cost You Success

#1: What Are Covert Power Moves?

Here, Buffalmano provides the higher-level definitions and Scarlett shares the "simplified" definitions for ease of comprehension:

Power Dynamics:

- High-Level Definition: "the science of power negotiation among people and groups, as well as the strategies that facilitate the acquisition of resources and the achievement of goals."
- Simplified Definition: "the process by which an individual gets (or can get) what they want in a given setting."

Power Move:

- High-Level Definition: "A power move is any action that affects the power dynamics of an interaction."
- Simplified Definition: "any action that affects the flow of power in a given setting."

Covert Power Move:

- High-Level Definition: "Any action or combination of words that on the surface seems neutral, apologetic, even value-adding, while actually increasing the power and/or status of the speaker, and potentially disempowering the victim."
- Simplified Definition: "a hidden power move."

#2: Chapter Highlights

- People may try to pull a value-taking power move on you to channel the power away from you toward them, leaving you lower-power and lower status (and, low-value, as a result).
- They may try to pull these power moves by judging you or by knocking you down a peg socially while hiding behind a cover such as it only being a "joke."

Read:

- "14 Power Moves to Dominate Anyone" and
- "6 Covert Power Moves to Control Frames"

> 6 Covert Power Moves to Control Frames

Chapter #5: How to Win More Negotiations with Advanced Frame Control Techniques

#1: What Is a Frame?

Definitions:

- Higher-Level: "a set of beliefs, values, perspectives, and personal predispositions with which people filter and interpret the world."
- Simplified: "the lens with which we view the world and situations within it."

#2: Chapter Highlights

- You can influence the lens people look through so they see you in a better light (so they see you as higher power).
- You can also influence people's lenses so they see giving you a "yes" as a win for them.
- Frame control techniques can be used for negotiating business deals, relationship situations, and any opportunity for persuading others.

Read "10 Frame Control Techniques to Out-Frame Anyone" and:

- Basics of frames and frame control

Chapter #6: Next Steps

This chapter shares techniques for managing job seeker power dynamics in interviews and handling trap questions as well as negotiating refunds.

The authors then share an inspirational story closer to the end.

Real-Life Applications

- Work to achieve more status, authority, and financial power while rooting out your submissive behaviors and adding more high-power behavior.

Most people struggle to reach the high-power side of the HP/HW matrix, whether that's by balancing their friendliness to avoid coming across as "too nice", raising their status in social groups, or even simply being more assertive.

Focus on increasing your power and you'll put yourself above the masses of other people (who are lacking in power dynamics) when it comes to getting that promotion, attracting that mate, and even building strong relationships with high-status elites.

Cons

- Only an introduction

This book only gives you a taste of the wisdom you'll find in Power University.

- Omits darker topics

The authors withhold covering some aspects of human nature that are often looked down upon, such as Machiavellianism, manipulation, and psychopathy.

Pros

- Covers the exceptions

For example, many communication skills authors endorse assertiveness as the best communication style for all situations.

However, there are cases when passiveness and aggression are better suited and this book ventures into those exceptional cases.

- End of chapter summaries

There are recaps at the end of each chapter to give you an overview of the biggest takeaways.

- End of chapter action steps

To take the theoretical, abstract information, and translate it into real-life applications.

Review

The Social Strategist is a unique resource in the self-development and social skills genre because it ties together the true basics of social success with the more advanced notions and skills.

That means, the book gives you a solid overview of the full "empowerment skyscraper", from the foundations to your next-level floors of power.

What also makes The Social Strategist stand out, and this is 50% a compliment to the book and 50% an indictment to the industry, is that many of both the foundational and advanced concepts are new or semi-new.

Of all the books on self-development, social skills, power and strategies that we've gone through, not a single one of them had more than a passing mention to, say, personal value and value exchanges; frames and frame control; social power dynamics of everyday life.

And these are all foundational topics for any real effort of self-development and personal empowerment.
Glad there is now a book that tackles those basics.

So, in brief, with our own readily admitted bias, we can highly recommend *The Social Strategist to most readers beginners or advanced alike.

The Law of Optimum Balance: Why Too Much (or Too Little) of Any Good Trait Fails

Lucio Buffalmano · 27 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The law of optimum balance™ states that the peak of effectiveness for many traits is to be found within the extremes, and that many traits that are beneficial at certain levels turn bad, ineffective, or harmful at extreme levels of total lack or oversupply.

Many positive traits that people aspire to and work towards follow the law of balance.
And so do also many traits generally associated with "bad morals" or negative outcomes.

The pervasiveness and ubiquitousness of optimum balances make the optimum balance a fundamental concept of self-development and life optimization.

In this article we will learn about the law of optimum balance.

- SUMMARY

INTRO

> The Law of Optimum Balance™ states that many traits, behaviours and strategies have an optimum interval where returns are maximized; too little or too much reduces — and sometimes reverses — benefit.

Optimum balance an ancient idea first mentioned by Aristostele and taken up by several others across time, including the inverted U concept applied to arousal and performance (Yerkes and Dodson, 1908) and the idea of 'too much of a good thing' applied to many positive psychological traits (Grant and Schwartz, 2011).

But it's also a concept constantly forgotten, superseded by a powerful human drive for 'more'. Strangely so, somehow, given that the optimum balance is so widespread that we may say that the law of balance is a law of nature.
Optimum balance dynamics are so intrinsic to life, that they even cap evolution's ability to improve or remove any given trait.

Say Workman and Reader:

> There are constraints to what natural selection can do. Among other factors this includes the fact that traits occur along a normal distribution curve, hence, those at either ends of the extreme will have too much or too little of a trait (e.g. anxiety)

It's important to note that the optimum balance varies depending on the individual, goal, and context (Furnham and Kanazawa, 2020).
Hence, calibration remains crucial.

Components of Optimum Balance

- Optimum interval: the range within which the returns are maximized.
  The optimum balance, more than a single point, is most often best thought of and conceptualized as a range. That range of maximum benefit is the optimum interval
- Useful interval: you can think of it as the range outside of the optimum balance, but still "good enough" for satisfactory outcomes or even to achieve challenging goals -especially if you make up for with optimum balances in other traits-
- Threshold level: the level at which a trait reaches its maximum returns, and then starts decreasing
- Self-defeating imbalances: the levels at both extremes of the continuum
  - Self-defeating extreme
  - Self-defeating lacks
- Diminishing returns point: many traits or possession reach a point where any additional unit of improvement takes lots of work, but yield little added benefit

And some properties:

- Low / high threshold: when the maximum returns happen at low / high level or intensity of a certain property or trait
- Tail:
  - Fat tail: when the property or trait maintains good returns at the extremes
  - Lean tail: when the property or trait becomes useless or nearly useless at the extremes
  - Negative tail: when the trait becomes harmful and negative above or beneath certain levels
- Optimum balance of trade-offs: the law of balance often applies because in complex environments high investment in one trait or skill comes at the expense of others (opportunity costs)

  - High trade-off environments, when there are many other valid pursuits one could switch to and where it generally makes sense to switch focus after a good level has been reached
  - Low trade offs environments, where continuous investment and "obsession" on a single trait, skill or pursuit may pay off more, or at least cost less

Why It's Important

The main contributions to understanding the law of balance are to:

- Remain within the optimal balance, rather than under or overshooting it
  - Stop once you reach it, an issue for many driven guys who tend to think "more is always better
- Plan your self-development it's often best to have an idea of what you need to reach, and how much work it will take
- Keep Pareto in mind: in conjunction with the "law of diminishing returns", the optimum balance also suggests that the main benefits of any trait increase only marginally once you enter the 'optimum interval'. Once you're close to the optimum balance, you already got most of its value, and you may be better off focusing to a different trait
- Stay motivated when you're starting out, people who aren't aware of the optimum balance may get discouraged or sidetracked when they look at the extremes, while instead the optimum balance may be far closer and possible than they think
- Strategize for your goals, based on what you actually need, rather than what would "look cool" to have or be
- Resist marketing manipulation, often based around extremes that are not nearly as effective at achieving goals as they are at grabbing your attention (and wallet)

Optimum Balance Traits & Examples

Grant and Schwartz observed and reviewed many psychological traits that the law of optimum balance.

And, we argue here, that includes many traits that are considered 'maladaptive', an argument often encountered in evolutionary theory.

Here, we pick some traits that are particularly relevant for our brand of self-development.

Let's start:

1. Dark Triad

On this website, we claim -and we may even say we show, with plenty of evidence and rel life examples- that (even if you want) "to be good, you need to be bad".

Hence, one should possess certain traits, skills, and know-how that many negatively associate with "being bad", "being selfish" or even "being antisocial".

Some of these traits are part of the cluster of personalities sometimes referred to as "dark triad":

1.2. Machiavellianism

Machiavellianism may be the most relevant dark triad personality for life success.

Some of the benefits include superior strategizing, maximizing returns, as well as effective self-defense against life's many fraudsters, cheats and charlatans-.

Machiavellianism is important but, as per law of balance, there is such a thing “not Machiavellian enough”, as well as “too Machiavellian”.

It seems pretty logical that too little Machiavellianism and cynicism lead to naivete and that naivete is not conducive to self-flourishing.
It may be less obvious that there can be such a thing as “too Machiavellian”, but research literature confirms that much.
High Machs tend to be more dissatisfied at work, in their relationships, and generally alienated.
They can gain a poor reputation when their scheming ways become obvious, and people tend to reject high-Machs for their closest relationships.

Hence, we get to the “optimum balance” of Machiavellianism:

1.3. Narcissism

Write Bachar in The Handbook of The Psychology of Narcissism:

> The idea that normal narcissism can be adaptive is quite new (…) researchers had been working from the “obvious” assumption narcissism would predict maladjustment (…) (but) normal narcissism is associated with good adjustment to college life (Lapsley & Aalsma, 2006), normal eating attitudes among college women (Brunton et al., 2005), and normal feelings of shame (Hibbard, 1994).
> (…) among nonclinical, mostly student populations have found that normal narcissism helps individuals assert interpersonal dominance (Brown and Zeigler-Hill, 2004) and fuels approach and achievement motives, such as competitive and mastery strivings, while lowering avoidance motivation (Foster & Trimm, 2008; Lukowitsky, Roberts, Lehner, Pincus, and Conroy, 2007; Wallace, Ready, & Weitenhagen, 2009)

Dr. Craig Malkin, one of the authors of “The Dangerous Case of Donald Trump“, would place the “healthy interval” between 4 and 6 on a 1 to 10 scale.

1.4. Psychopathy

The idea that some amount of psychopathy may be beneficial is not new.

As a matter of fact, sociologist John Ray described exactly that “optimum interval” we talk about here.
Ray suggested in 1981 that low and high levels of psychopathy are bad for, but that modest, controlled amounts make for better under stress performance and more rational decision making.

Research psychologist Kevin Dutton also supported that idea and further popularized it with self-help books such as “The Wisdom of Psychopaths” and “The Good Psychopath Guide“.

Finally, Brian Klaas in Corruptible says that “some of the most destructive elements of psychopathy can not only be blunted, but turned into advantages”.
And, just like psychopathy researchers Robert Hare in “Snakes in Suit“, claims that many successful psychopaths climb corporate ladders by avoiding the most violent expressions of their anger and channeling their ruthless and amoral nature to support their thirst for power and control.

2. Open-Mindedness

Generally, people think of “open-mindedness” as a positive thing.

More rarely do people stop and think at what it means at the extreme oversupply.

At the extreme lack, narrow-minded is not good because it inhibits learning and growing. Almost everyone agrees with that -including narrow-minded folks-.
But too open-minded isn’t good either though because it inhibits critical thinking, discernment, and even personal power. And that would be naive:

There is a steeper decline on the right side because naive over-open-mindedness is a risk hazard in life, while instead too close-minded is “only” a risk for personal growth.

Example: Mark Manson Is Wrong About Everything

Ali Scarlett had a great example for extreme open-mindedness.

Let me show it to you with a twist now.

What do you think of this chapter’s title, “Mark Manson is wrong about everything”?
It seems pretty harsh, right?

I agree: yes it is.
And we don’t think Manson is wrong about everything, he’s actually a great author and a smart guy.

And in his popular and otherwise good “The Subtle Art of Not Giving A Fuck“, Mark Manson has a chapter called “you’re wrong about everything”.

Well, are you, though?
Because as much we want to give some credit to Manson and the products of his mind, so you should give some credit to yourself and your beliefs.

Manson’s chapter title is an example of too much open-mindedness, stated in the most negative and self-harming format possible.
That statement may have some benefits as “shock value” to induce some good self-reflection, but it’s certainly not a good mindset to internalize.

Of course there is a time and place to self-assess our deeply held belief, but you probably don’t really want to think of yourself as “wrong about everything”.

Take that form of open-mindedness to an extreme, or adopt it a bit too often, and you destroy your self-esteem, and turn into a self-doubting, low-power, low-confidence individual.

No thank you, you’re not wrong about everything.
You’re wrong about a few things, and right about others. And you’re always ready to correct yourself and change your mind, which actually increases the odds that you’ll be more and more right about more and more things.

Now that’s a better mindset, and that’s a better example of empowering, optimum-balance open-mindedness.

3. Drive

Drive, ambition, and motivation are very popular traits that people want more of.

And much self-help literature and teachers seem to encourage to load on as much drive, ambition and motivation as possible.

Of course, since many of these traits follow the law of balance, it’s not always a good idea to aim for “as much as possible”.

Take drive, as an example:

And as an example of “extreme drive” self-help:

Example: “Can’t Hurt Me”... Cause I’m Hurting Myself Plenty

David Goggins has become a popular poster child of extreme drive and ambition.

And, in many ways, he’s a unique, impressive, and awesome man.
Even his book is awesome.
With plenty of entertaining and “extreme” stories, it’s a real page-turner.

Goggins is a great example of how far the human body can go, which is farther than most think. That’s empowering to know, because it means that you probably have a lot of extra in the tank when you first start feeling like you’re done.

Yet, it’s not healthy to make that extreme, the norm.
To make a comparison, engines have rev limiters to avoid staying too long at the extremes. And it’s for a good reason: extreme over-revving is bad for the engine. An engine going into over-revving is far more likely to break, and the more time you spend there, the more you shorten its life span.
Similarly, over-revving is also not that good for the human body.
Over-revving is for emergencies. It’s rare exceptions, not the norm.

Over-revving is bad for engines… And often bad for people, too

When you read Goggin's examples of what's supposed to be "maximum achievement", you have to wonder whether the guy is "driven" or… Haunted by some unresolved issues into self-harming, over-revving territory.

An important question to assess whether you're positively driven or negatively crazed is whether there is a goal to reach, or not.

For example, when Goggins over-revs to get into the SEAL team, that makes sense because there's an objective. But when he "pushes himself to keep on running" until he pees blood, runs on broken bones, defecates on himself, has to be hauled to the hospital but doesn't want because he "earned the pain", all with no real life-relevant goal to be achieved… Then you really gotta wonder. Is this type of self-help glorifying drive, or trying to pass self-loathing and stupidity for a good thing (also, you gotta wonder where is the virtue in pushing the costs of your extremes on others. Does "Can't Hurt Me" also applies to those who had to carry him to the hospital, bloodied and pooped?) ?

Also read:

- Growth mindset power dynamics: yes, you can be too extreme with a growth mindset as well

Example of Extreme Drive Covering Deep-Seated Issues: Liver King

A great example of "extreme drive" to mask deep-seated issues:

> Liver King: When I talk about the 85% of the population that suffers from self-esteem issues, that's me. This is why I work myself to death in the gym, this is why I do 12 to 15 blood-burning workouts a week. Just to feel like I'm OK

There you are: extreme training and thrashing his own body "just to feel like he's OK".

Maybe the optimum balance instead is more like: "healthy self-esteem and a healthy, hard workout, 5 times a week".

4. Power (Hierarchical)

Surprised to see this one here, eh?

Well, generally speaking, it's much better to have power than not.

And, as a general rule, it's rarely too bad being #1 and, more times than not, it's better to be #1 than anything else.

However, in some contexts and environments, the #1 spot can come with very high costs.
High-cost environments are demanding and stressful, risky, unstable, controversial, or under heavy scrutiny. The costs include premature aging, health concerns and shorter lifespan, loss of free time and, in more violent or primitive societies, personal harm or death.

In those high-stress and unstable environments the optimum balance for rank may not be the #1 spot of the leader, the despot, the alpha male, or the CEO, but at one or two levels below.
The lower levels enjoy fewer spoils and power than the top dog, but the possible decrease in responsibility, stress, personal risks and demands can sometimes more than makeup for the power loss:

5. Manliness & Strength: Dating Optimum Balance

The law of balance also applies to many traits relevant to dating, attraction, and seduction.

However, even here, many miss it.

Generally speaking, many female dating coaches encourage strength and independence in women (including the popular subreddit female dating strategies and the best-selling authors of Why Men Love Bithces and The Power of The Pussy).
And while that is a good idea for women who are extremely passive, submissive, and "dependent", it doesn't mean that swinging at the opposite end is a good idea for most women.
Most women instead maximize their sexual market value at rather low levels of strength and independence (low threshold point):

Also read "strong VS feminine women".

Many male dating coaches -and all red pill-inspired ones- instead encourage men to be "as masculine as possible". And while men maximize their dating returns far higher than women and much closer to the extreme right end of the continuum, there is also "too mannish" for a man.
Studies show indeed that many traits associated with "manliness" such as beard, voice depth, facial masculinity and muscles all have a threshold point.

Taking muscles as an example:

TPM's Optimum Balances

As simple as the optimum balance is, it took TPM some time to generalize it at a higher conceptual level.

And before this high-level, multi-traits article, we had many practical, single-traits articles on optimum balance that we sometimes referred to as "enlightened" stages.

Some of these articles:

- Positive cynicism, a balance between naivete and over-cynicism
- Smart cooperator, a balance between giving and taking, including giving to the right people
- Empowered individualism, which albeit the article stresses the individual empowerment part, it's also about striking a balance between the individual empowerment and drive, and the social animals we are
- Good asshole, striking an effective balance between personal boundaries and selfish goals, and honor and cooperaton
- Positive Machiavellianism: learning Machiavellian thinking, strategies, and techniques, and use selectively
- Straight line seduction, where we introduced the concept of "golden balance" for power and warmth

We also wrote about optimum balances in dating, including:

- Feminine VS Strong women, with the optimum balance in dating being more on the feminine and submissive side

And in the article on naive self-help we also introduced the "discriminating learner" concept.
The discriminating learner adopts the "learn from anyone mindset" with an optimum balance of open-mindedness to learn new wisdom, but with his critical judgment fully on to spot and add the proverbial pinch of salt to charlatans, manipulators, and clueless folks who aren't (yet) in a position to teach others.

Big Goals Require Clusters of Optimum Balances

Generally speaking, one-trick ponies don't go far outside of their one-trick shows.

And, generally speaking, larger goals in complex environments -like life is- generally require many traits or skills.

So, often, goal achievement is a question of a cluster of optimum balances.
And the important property of complex goals is that the harmonic summation of each individual skill or trait is great than the sum of its parts.
Often, far great.

That means that not only you don't need to go at the extreme of any skills, which would turn negative, but often, you don't even need to be around the upper end of the optimum balance.

Instead, you need to be "good", or "good enough" at a host of relevant skills, and then only be "great" at the most important ones.

Law of Runaway Effort For Diminishing Returns

Reaching the top 1% is often ineffective for the law of diminishing returns, and the opportunity loss.

For example, reaching the top 10% may require you to invest 1.000 hours.
But to reach the top 1% would require 100.000 hours, and the additional benefits of going from 90 to 99 aren't nearly as big as going from, say, your starting point of 35 to 90.

That's a lot of time and effort that brings little extra benefit.
And it's an opportunity loss because you could invest that time to become 2-3x better at something else that's equally important for your goals.

Example: Optimal Clusters For Dating

Take dating, for example.

Imagine a man who has the goal of finding a great woman to start a family.

That guy may spend 2.000 hours trying to pull women in night venues and approaching in the streets.
Those are relevant and helpful activities for his goal.
But instead of seeking to be top 1% at night clubs, he's better served also working on his personal success, on his status to get into the best places with the most attractive women, and on his personality and conversational skills to also do great on dates.

Generally speaking, the person who works in parallel and gets to 80% on a host of different traits and skills will most likely destroy the guy who seeks to become 1% at just one thing.

Optimum Balances Outside Self-Development

While we focus mostly here on socialization, self-development, and general success and goal achievement, the law of optimum balance applies in any realm of life.

Economics

Take, for example, inflation and the Gini coefficient in economics.

Both names sound negative.

But while many people have negative associations for “inflation” and “inequality index”, most economists agree that some inflation and some inequality are good.

Zero or negative inflation is not good for economic growth.
And zero or negative inequality means little incentive to work and do anything productive.

The theory of marginal utility is also textbook optimum balance.
It says that any additional unity of most goods adds less value than the unit before. Until it reaches a threshold level where having too many becomes a cost with taking too much space and wasting your time with their disposal.

Same for larger economic systems.
Most economists today recognize that the extremes of communism and “anarcho-capitalism” are both less effective in promoting economic prosperity than the optimum balance that is to be found within that continuum (ie.: some inequality & some redistribution, some individual freedom & some government intervention, etc.).

Training, Health & Fitness

Training for health and well-being stays away from taxing extremes.

And those are extreme are rather easy to reach when it comes to health, explains cardiologist James O’Keefee in a paper aptly called “Run for your life … at a comfortable speed and not too far” (Ted Talk here for you).

Look at this chart:

More than 20 miles a week and you’re already overdoing it and harming yourself. That’s very easy to reach for a runner.

Pretty crazy, eh?
Of course, there has been some criticism and debate around what constitutes the “upper limit”.
But that an upper limit exists is well established, and several studies and experts propose an “optimum level” that is quite easy to reach.

So stop listening to those gurus yelling to your face to run longer and faster until you drop, lest you’re a pansy.

For those who train not for health but for extreme results, the optimum balance gets pushed closer to the extreme end, but the law of balance still often applies.
Take bodybuilding, for example.
"Beating your muscles to a pulp" day in and day out is not only not healthy, but also not optimal for maximum muscular growth.
More recent studies to maximize bodybuilding physiques have dismantled the old concept of "pushing harder than the last time".
And the more science-driven bodybuilders have introduced more effective training routines that stop at 1-2 reps from total failure.

That "optimum balance" for those seeking extreme muscular gains is close to the extreme, challenging, and very taxing. But it still stops short of total extreme.

Nutrition

A good diet is balanced.

And albeit it's certainly good to heavily reduce processed or deep-fried food, nutrition is quite simple.

A diet balanced in the classes and types of food you enjoy and balanced in the quantity of food gives you 90% of all the benefits.

But that doesn't help to sell much.

Extremes sell better.

So nutrition is full of charlatans who promote OCD-type excesses.
It includes toxic approaches to food based on fearmongering and demonization of some foods, or whole classes of foods.

These extremes aren't just ineffective and a poor use of your time, but can turn toxic and pathological.
Bulimia has long been there, and it's the excessive concern for being excessively thin.
Orthorexia Nervosa instead is the new pathology on the block and it's the obsession with eating "healthy food".
Eating healthy is great, and we highly recommend it. But, once again, when you take it to the extreme, it turns toxic.

Why So Many People Fall For Imbalance

Many people will read this article nodding through it.

After all, it makes plain sense, no?
On the surface, the law of balance seems to state the obvious.

And yet, if you go through the self-help literature, the examples of "self-defeating imbalances" are everywhere.
In inspirational self-help, imbalances are the majority.

So why do so many people fall for imbalanced self-help?

Why do so many people struggle to see that things are contextual, that too much of a good thing is bad, and that just enough of a bad thing can be good?

I don't have all the answers as for the "why", but part of the answer includes:

1. Extremes Are "Cool & Sexy"

Extremes are fascinating.

It's why people watch crime channels, love self-destructing rockstars, and enjoy movie scenes that defy common sense and laws of physics alike.

Many world languages also display and foster the "appeal of the extreme".
In English, adjectives such as "extreme", "exaggerated" or "super-sized" are often used as positives and often associated with good things.
Even the locution "too much" is often associated with positive or semi-positive imageries of over-delivering.

On the other hand, many associate "average" with "boring and dull".
As an ex-girlfriend of mine said: "you don't want to be average". And while "optimum balance" has nothing to do with "average", to some, it is a lot closer to average, than the extreme is.

BTW, my reply to her was: yeah, you're right. Average is still better than below average, though, no?

The extremes also help sell and self-promote.

When it comes to this age of guru entrepreneurs, being helpful while also fairly pursuing self-interest isn't good (or real) enough.
"Impacting one billion people" is.

And when it comes to personal success, collaborating while assessing how trustworthy others and covering your ass just in case isn't catchy (or real) enough.
"Never trust anyone" is.

Risk: Confusing "Appealing" For "Effective"

I get the "appeal of the extreme".

While most of my life I take good care of myself, I had some bursts and stages of extremes -and of idealizing extremes-.
And they were great fun.
I still love the poetry of blazes of glory, living fast and dying young, and the supposed superiority of burning out against fading away.
But it doesn't mean I let my life descend into self-destructive fire.

Solution: Turn Optimum Balance Into A Sexy Extreme

Similarly, if you have a thing for extremes, you're not going to easily ditch it in favor of the optimum balance.
Instead, the solution is to turn the optimum balance into a sexy extreme.
Such as, you want ditch the appeal of wasteful extreme, and embrace the appeal of extreme *effectiveness.

2. Beginners Confuse "Most" for "Best"

Most people learning how to increase anything are often, logically, below the optimum balance.

And when you're too far below, it's hard to assess what's best, and what's too much.

Imagine then an ant looking at a lizard and a T-Rex.
They're both huge to the ant, but the more extreme T-Rex seems like a worthier recipient of admiration -no matter that the T-Rex is long dead and the lizard is still around-.

Risk: Chasing "Most" Rather Than "Best"

When beginners first start learning, the risk is to confuse "most" for "best".

If you seek effectiveness, it's not ideal to set your sights to "most" rather than "best" because that has high opportunity costs.

As you waste time chasing “most”, your time and effort will not be spent improving whatever else would give you a bigger bang for the buck -or, simply, time that you’ll never get to back to just enjoying life-.

3. Gurus’ Manipulation

Knowing that many people crave the extreme more than the effective, gurus and marketers:

1. Sell the extreme
2. Disguise themselves as extreme
3. Sell with a self-frame of having reached the ultimate level of skill and evolution

We already discussed the first.
And when it comes to self-disguide, you get a bunch of gurus who make you feel bad for selling you a lie. The lies extreme drive, dedication, adherence, or extreme results.
And whatever they sell, they sell it from a place of having reached the ultimate stage and fully mastered their craft to God-level.

Of course, the only truthful and most respectful stance towards the audience would be this:

> I may be farther ahead than most, but I’m still only trying my best, carving my way forward, and stumbling as I go.
> I haven’t reached any ultimate stage, and I’m only moving towards that ideal state.
> But since I’ve been at it for a while now, I may be able to teach you something.

But that wouldn’t sell much because that honesty doesn’t come across as high confidence, and as psychologist Maria Konnikova said, the conman man game is a game of extreme confidence.
So, they sell you what works best: extremes.

Gurus also frame as extremely important whatever it is they’re selling.
For example, following the latest fad diet?
You’ll soon find out it’s extremely important that you eat this food, and avoid that other poisonous one -again, thinking in extremes-.

Normal power dynamics then ensure that the extreme becomes the norm, rather than the exception.
This is because even more honest coaches are forced to lie in order to even have a chance at being heard.

And this may be one of the main reasons why I don't do coaching.
I don't want to present myself as if I were at any ultimate stage of development while being fully aware that I'm not.

Risk: Believing The Conmen (& Their Lies)

When you fall for the extreme con, you tend to pick as teachers and role models the biggest, flashiest, and loudest of the teacher because, you may think, that's the guy who's "best" at it.

And you tend to over-estimate the importance of whatever it is they're selling -at the expense of other equally or more important endeavors you may be pursuing-.

4. Gaining Approval & Self-Validation

Sometimes the "quest for the extreme" has a deeper emotional cause.

It's the will to gain someone's approval.
Someone who has judge powers over us, and it can be an external person, group, or even ourselves.

At least with validation though, there may be is a silver lining.
After all, men hungry for more, even when just seeking validation, advance civilization… As long as they can channel that extra-drive into something productive and value-adding.

That's a big IF though, because it's common to seek extreme results in fields or endeavors that add little real value to the world, or to the self.

Building a cathedral in the desert perfectly encapsulates the hollowness of over-achievement without a good strategy:

Risk: Cathedrals In The Desert

I remember years ago walking with a university colleague.

She wanted to purchase some supplements to help her keep up.
She needed them because of over-stress, she said.

I remember thinking that I wasn't stressed at all. University as exchange students was a joke.

So I prodded deeper.
Turned out, she was pursuing far more credits and doing far more work than she needed for her home university.
Prodding deeper yet, she admitted she was doing it to prove to herself that she could.
Such as, she was engaging in a sort of "dig the hole, fill the hole" type of work just to prove to herself she was "good enough".

I thought that was the dumbest thing possible.
There was zero added value in extra credits, zero. And it was costing her health, and time. Time that she could have used to enjoy life, or to actually learn something she chose, cared about, and added actual value to her life.

If you want to prove anything, you may as well decide to itch that scratch.
But don't do useless work to build cathedrals in the desert. Build something that adds value to you, and/or to the world.

4.2. (Male) Ego

Men are more likely to fall for the “extreme pursuit” out of ego validation.

It’s because “extreme” tends to be associated with strength, with pushing limits, and with the competition-busting dominance of “doing more than anyone else”.

It’s quite telling that in the fitness space Jeff Nippard, a guy who promotes a science-based approach of “not training to the absolute limits” had to battle with accusations of being a “pussy”.
In this (super hilarious) video from Greg Doucette, Greg pokes fun at Nippard by adding voice-over to a video of him and his girlfriend. Nippard’s girlfriend tells him “I love you bro Jeff, you don’t train like a p…. (cuts out to Nippard awakening to the nightmare with a “meow”).

And probably, we have an even better example.

Can you think of a biggest cliche for male ego as his penis?

Well, turns out, we may have just the perfect example to fit that cliche.

The man with the most extreme penis size in the world is proud of it.
So far, seems OK.
The only issue is that, at that size, he’s far outside the “optimum balance” for penis size -yes, there is such a thin gas optimum balance for penis sizes as well :)-.
At that extreme end, he can’t have children, he’s never had an orgasm, never had sex, and never even has any chances of having any. Hung at that extreme, he can barely walk well.
BUT… He’s proud of his extreme extremity.
Oh well, at least he sees the bright side of it :).

SUMMARY

The law of optimum balance is a natural law that applies to most human traits as well as to strategies and techniques for goal achievement.

Readers should not confuse the law of optimum balance as a defense for mediocrity or a “chill” approach to life because it’s everything but.

First of all, the law of optimum balance is a description of reality, rather than a philosophy of what's good.

Second, to use the law of optimum balance for goal achievement means prioritizing for maximum efficiency.

And, lastly, the optimum balance is, more often than not, a lot higher, harder, and more challenging than what most people are currently at, and what most people settle for.
In truth, for many people and for all purposes and intents, the "optimum interval" ends up looking like a rather extreme level to reach.

Why Peak Attraction Is Really In The “Seductive Balance”

Lucio Buffalmano · 29 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The law of optimum balance states that many traits that are beneficial at certain doses turn ineffective, harmful or unattractive at extreme levels of total lack or oversupply.

The law of balance also applies to many traits relevant in dating, attraction, and seduction.

In this article, we will learn how the law of balance can make you more effective at dating and at attracting partners.

Women: Strength Quickly Turns Dating Weakness

Female power has been a central theme in each feminist wave.

And it’s also been a major theme of female dating advice.

Generally speaking, to acquire power and succeed in life, acting and behaving higher power is almost necessary.
So for women who seek power and personal success, the “power-up” advice can make sense -albeit even there, it’s best to mix power with femininity-.

However, things are not nearly as straightforward in dating.

Many female “dating coaches” confuse career success or general personal self-development with dating success and so advise women to be strong and independent.
Just some examples, see Why Men Love Bitches, The Power of The Pussy or the popular “female dating strategies” subreddit.

As for most general, catch-all advice, the recommendation is not wholly, 100%, bad for all.
Stronger and more independent is a good idea for women who are extremely passive, submissive, and “dependent”.
At those extreme levels, there are costs both in dating, and in life in general.
In dating, many successful men don’t want to date total pushovers with no personal opinions. And in life, being wholly dependent, be it either physically, emotionally, or financially, is rarely a good idea.

It doesn’t mean though that swinging at the opposite end is a good idea for most women.

And, in these cases, the optimum balance may not even be in the middle, but more to the left, more towards femininity than towards independence, ambition, power, and dry assertiveness.

Most women indeed maximize their sexual market value at rather low levels of strength and independence:

Men's Power Has No Upper Limit

When it comes to power, power for men has no threshold point when it comes to attraction.

Such as, generally speaking, the more powerful a man is and the more attractive he is.
Some exceptions apply, as they always do. For example, some women may avoid him out of poor self-estem, or out of fear -which is why warmth is so important in dating-.

Plus, when it comes to 1:1 interactions, men can overdo power if they don't add enough warmth, and send her into self-rejection.
So even there, a balance is important for optimum dating (see "straight line seduction" for more).

Still, when in doubt, the answer for men is to go back to the general rule of "more power, is generally better".

Men: Masculinity Is Good, But Beware The Masculinity Myth

When we talk about "masculinity", the law of balance is back in business.

Many male dating coaches -and all red pill-inspired ones- often encourage men to be "as masculine as possible".
And, again, that's generally good advice.
Much better than women's advice, for that matter.
Contrary to most women, many men gain by being, acting, and thinking more like a typical masculine man. That is because, generally speaking, the optimum balance for masculinity is more on the right side of the continuum while most men are either in the middle, or before the middle of the curve.

However, that's not to say to be "as masculine as possible". Some traits related to "manliness and masculinity" do have threshold points.

The threshold for apparently positive traits is so frequent that researchers came up with an overarching theory to tie all those strikingly similar “optimum intervals”. In an apparent effort to make it as unintuitive as possible, they called it the “inverted-U hypothesis of masculine traits”.
The description of the hypothesis is textbook “law of balance”:

> Women will not prefer mates with extremely high and extremely low levels of masculinity (e.g., muscularity, facial masculinity, shoulder-to-hip ratio, and chest-to-waist ratio). (…) Men with moderate to high levels should be preferred most as mates

Whether the hypothesis is true and why that is the case, the same trend is seen across several traits.

Most men naturally miss it because they judge men as men, and think that women are the same.
And albeit men and women certainly aren’t different from different planets, they’re also different enough.

And one major difference is that women have a much lower threshold point than many for many traits associated to masculinity -or, in red pill parlance, with what makes a man “alpha”-.
Men make the mistake of thinking that what makes other men seem more dominant or masculine also translates 1:1 to attractiveness to women. And while that is true up to a certain point, it certainly is not a 1:1

Instead, what makes a man more dominant stops making him more attractive after a certain level.

Many masculinity-related traits have no upper bound when it comes to portraying dominance and getting respect by other men.
However, that’s not how it works for female attraction, which instead follows the law of balance. Female attraction does have threshold levels after which attraction starts decreasing.

For example:

- Beard: Light stubble beats full beards
- Body hair: Light body hair beats high hirsutism
- Voice depth: Deeper voices are more attractive, but only up a certain point
- V-shaped torso: It’s attractive, up to a certain point
- Muscles: Muscles are attractive, but only up to a certain built type

Speaking of muscles, since so many men pursue them, let’s take them as an example.
To a man, the more muscle mass another man has, the more dominant he appears. Men tend to respect, even fear, the “big muscle guy”.

Marketers learned that over time as well.
That’s how you get to “incredible hulk” aberration. Hulk is not to sell to women: for that Ryan Gosling and Brad Pitt are more than enough. Heck, even scrawny DiCaprio in Titanic was super attractive to many women. The incredible hulk isn’t that “incredibly attractive” to women, though. Hulk’s physique is to impress and sell to men.

Hulk is for men, not women

Let's take a study called "Why Is Muscularity Sexy?" as an example.

In one of the experiments the researchers drew figures of men going from thinnest, to "most jacked":

APPENDIX B

Images Representing Men Varying in Muscularity, Used in Studies 2-6

The resulting curve of attractiveness was an almost perfect "optimum balance curve":

The result would be much different if instead we had men answering "what physique conveys the most dominance and power", as most men would choose the most shredded one.

In terms of our optimum balance of attraction for muscles, we'd have something like this:

And the same is true for many other "masculinity-related" traits.
Same for women's traits, by the way, with the hourglass shape and eyelashes length also following an "inverted U distribution".

Generally speaking, many traits related to attraction have "fat tails".
That means, there are a lot of outliers who also like the more extreme versions.

So, for example, there are quite a few women who like the super muscular "caricature" and there are quite a few women who are into the scrawny men.
For example, the rocker and glam rocker types.

Sometimes, outliers at a population level are instead more the norm within subgroups.
For example, while older and more mature women prefer the more masculine types, many younger girls prefer the feminine types.

The Allure of The Feminine Man

The "stereotypical alpha male" may be the "safest bet" when it comes to attraction.

But it would be a huge mistake to think that's the only way to win at dating.
The fat tails of many attraction-related traits mean there are a lot of exceptions, and many outliers.

For example, many women, and especially many younger women, who also happen to be at the peak of their sexual market value, prefer more feminine-looking men than the stereotypical "alpha male".
It's not a coincidence that almost all boyband male stars are feminine-looking: it's because many younger women prefer that type.
And there are plenty of exceptions among more mature women who also find the more androgynous type attractive.

Balanced Dating

Good and effective dating is also balanced.

We already explained here that while dating high power is generally great for men, you don't want to go so high-power that she feels "not good enough for you", or too disempowered and demeaned.

And, the best balance, is by mixing power and warmth:

SUMMARY

Same as for general self-help, a substantial portion of popular dating advice promotes extremes.

For women, it's the feminist-inspired "be strong and independent" and for men, it's "be as masculine and powerful as possible".

Those extremes may sound effective or logical to some, especially for men, but they're neither logical, nor effective.

Both men and women who go for extremes often date sub-optimally.
But since the threshold levels are different, it's women who pay the highest price.

Generally speaking, the optimum balance for popular traits such as strength and independence for women is rather low, so most women acting strong and independent are harming their dating returns.
And the optimum balance for masculinity traits for men is high, but not "as high as possible", so a few men are harming themselves by over-acting as masculine and dominant as possible -and especially so when it looks like over-compensation-.

Pussy A Reclamation: Empowering or Ineffective Narcissism?

Lucio Buffalmano · 2 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Pussy: A Reclamation teaches women to live an empowered life by regaining control over their center of life, pleasure, and power: the pussy.

Says Regena Thomashauer -in art "mama gena"-, the author of "Pussy":

> The solution for the epidemic of powerlessness among women, which neither great success nor higher education is able to solve, is simple: reconnecting a woman to her pussy.

Bullet Summary

- Learn how to pleasure yourself (from orgasms to food to dancing)
- Embrace your negative emotions and grieve fully: it will help you bounce back
- Becoming a courtesan means being classy and sexual at the same time

Full Summary

Regena Thomashauer shares a lot of personal stories, but in this "Pussy summary" I will focus on the most

#1. The Goddess Is Inside of You

Regena explains her story of looking for holiness and enlightenment in temples and in the holy land (for her) of Israel.

But she found only dust and old buildings there. And, for a blonde and young blonde tourist, lots of sexual harassment as well.

Then, after a class teaching self-love, she found the courage to follow up with the exercises.
She felt weird, but she prepared for the evening as if the most important person in the world were to visit. She filled her bathtub, prepared her best food, lit up the candle… Then went in front of the mirror and admired herself.

And started touching herself for sensual pleasure.
She writes:

> All these years I had been looking for the Goddess. Suddenly I had stumbled upon her—in the last place I would ever think to look. She was here, inside of me.

#2. The Stages of Pussy Reclamation

Regena says there are 5 stages women go through to re-acquaint themselves with their pussies:

1. Disgust for their own pussies
2. She gets curious without being disgusted
3. She starts researching pussy, curious about the world that can open up to her
4. She becomes a pussy expert, the way she looks at herself changes and her confidence increases
5. Rapture, feeling and experiencing awe

#3. Cliteracy Rules

In “Pussy: A Revelation” the term “cliteracy” refers to someone who has been schooled in how a clitoris works.

Here are the rules of “cliteracy”:

1. Pussy loves praise
2. Pussy is sensitive: hates criticism and abuse
3. Who holds the pussy holds the power
4. She takes all the time she need (referring to orgasms)

#4. Endless Orgasms: Clitoral Stroking

Regena talks about orgasms and “stroking” to teach women how to pleasure themselves.

She says there is a lot of misunderstanding around orgasms (indeed). There are no vaginal orgasms, they are all clitoral.
But some women feel like an orgasm is vaginal because they can orgasm with penetration. But that only happens when the clitoris is close enough to the vaginal entrance.

The best orgasms though are reached via direct stimulation of the clitoris. The author explains that a woman can train to go after the first orgasm if she learns to overcome the over-sensitivity of her clitoris right after climax.

She writes:

> I learned how to relax my body while my clitoris was stroked, and as a result I could experience peak after peak after peak with no “going over.

#5. Becoming a Courtesan

Much of Regena’s work is inspired by the European courtesans, which were the high-class hookers of the old world.

Becoming a courtesan means not only owning one’s own pleasure, but also understanding male pleasure and.. Being classy.

The author grabs a few leaves out of “The Art of Seduction” as she describes Cleopatra and how she spellbound the Roman conquerors.

These are the traits of the perfect courtesan:

1. Dresses well
2. Uses pleasure as compass
3. Flirts as a spiritual practice
4. She never gives up on her desire

#6. Grieve Until The End

With her usual dig at the “patriarchy” with which I fully disagree, Regena Thomashauer says that to overcome pain and move on, you need to grieve fully.

As per her usual style, she has some rather extreme-looking recommendations, like for example wearing a garbage bag (literally), wiping ash on her face, dancing around with 1, 2 or 3 songs.
And then going back to normal

Also read:

- Leveraging pain for growth

Note:

But I have to fully disagree with the author's interpretation of "grieve". She writes:

> I learned that grief is sacred. It has an inherent intelligence and a time line that is perfect—whether it lasts a day or a year.

Just because it worked well for her it's spurious to think or suggest that it's the same for everyone.
This reminds me a bit of the "personal God fallacy" which is also present in another very popular female self-help book called "Girl Wash Your Face".

#7. Radiant Relationships

Radiant relationships is one of the chapters of "Pussy: A Reclamation" that I enjoyed the most and agreed the most with.

Here is how Regena defines "radiant relationship":

> A partnership that's created for the expressed purpose of taking one another higher.

Yep.
And just like that, you would eliminate 70% of games women play and 80% of games men play.

You'd totally erase combative relationships and we'd all enjoy better relationships.

Note:
Again in this chapter Regena shows a poor understanding of basic psychology (and biology) when she blames "conditioning" for her own jealousy.

#8. The Womanly Arts

And finally, in the end, Regena Thomashauer lists the womanly arts that she talked about during the whole "Pussy: A Reclamation":

1. Whetting Your Own Appetite (identify your desire and find out what you want)
2. Having Fun No Matter What (you decide your moods no matter the circumstances)
3. Sensual Pleasure (explore and learn the capacity of pleasure in our bodies)
4. Flirtation (create fun and turn-on state in everyone)
5. Owning Your Own Beauty (decide you are the hottest thing ever)
6. Partying with Your Inner Bitch (channeling your anger for creative endeavors)
7. Owning and Operating Men (navigating relationships with grace and humor while having it your way)
8. Inviting Abundance (attracting riches)

Note:

I didn't like the author's choice of words when she writes "owning and operating men".
Sure, most women unconsciously try to control men, but the way the author puts it, it again lets out an air of misanthropy here.

Pussy Book Quotes

On freeing women:

> I freed a thousand slaves. I could have freed a thousand more if they only knew they were slaves

On women as creators of everyone alive:

> There is no human alive today who was not created and held inside the living altar of a woman.

Criticism

I really enjoyed "Pussy: A Reclamation".
Yet, there is much I disagreed with.

Let's start:

Ridiculous Extremes

Pussy is an apotheosis of extremes.

And extremes are seldom good for you as they fail the basic law of balance:

> The Law of Optimum Balance

False Message of Strength Hides Her Anxious Attachment & Neediness

The author sells power and strength.

Yet, in her relationship with a wealthy man, she fell in love with a man who could provide her with security, affection, and financial stability.
There's nothing wrong with that, of course… Except for massive doses of hypocrisy when you're selling and self-framing as a bastion of strength and independence.

By Promoting "Sisterhoods" Pussy Is Sectarian and Divisive

I don't think that "Pussy A Reclamation" is toxic femininity, but it's not the healthiest type of femininity either.

Writes Regena:

> Picture this: a room filled with the crackling connected pulsing energy of hundreds of women, standing together in sisterhood

And she goes even further by stating that women "need" other women (otherwise, what?):

> We women need to reach inside and rescue ourselves, which is oh-so-possible with a community of sisterhood supporting us.

By promoting the idea that women need other women and "sisterhood" to support each other, it also promotes an idea of “in the group” (women) VS “out-group” (men).

Even the way she describes the vagina and the clitoris, she keeps repeating of the 8.000 nerve endings it contains… which men don’t have. Is it now a race to who’s got more nerve endings?
The way Regena talks about those sisterhoods sounds quite cult-like, too.

I personally think that cult-like groups of only men or only women are more harmful than helpful.
Only men groups and only-women groups are OK of course and even helpful. You can talk about things you wouldn’t talk with mixed-gender groups.

Yet when those groups unite to glorify “the cock” or “the pussy”, they start becoming toxic (and ridiculous).

Narcissistic To The Core

As I read “Pussy A Reclamation” I grew an idea of Mama Gena as a narcissistic woman.
Not too dissimilar from the charismatic men who lead a bunch of other men in online toxic masculinity communities.

For example, she writes:

> I wanted to be on television, teaching women about their magnificence. I wanted to be a spoken-word rock star and perform all over the world. I wanted to have celebrities and other movers and shakers as my friends. I wanted to build community and sisterhood.

People with this mindset don’t want to build communities and sisterhood. They want to lead communities and sisterhood (for their own personal gain).

And finally, the crowning of narcissism (italic and underlining are mine):

> I wanted romance and poetry and ecstatic sex and to live my own legend

And then she says:

> I noticed that all headmistresses of elite institutions had something in common: each had a large portrait of herself hanging in the parlor. I decided that having a portrait painted of myself was the essential next move

LOL, the personal portrait is like the icing on the narcissistic cake.
And if you still had any doubt left (paragraph edited by me for brevity):

> To honor the legacy, I try to outdo myself with extravagant entrances at my live events. (..) I rode into the program on a white horse. I might have a gang of hot men carry me in above their heads on a palanquin. Or perhaps I’ll reenact my favorite rock star

You know, just to keep it classy and understated :).

Fanatical, Cult-Like Approach to Self-Development

Regena’s “Pussy Reclamation” seemed at times like the female version of toxic masculinity.

There is so much “Pussy chest-thumping” that it’s almost unavoidable that “we’re so great because of our pussies” ends up being “we’re so better because of our pussies”.

Here is the male equivalent of “Pussy: A Reclamation”:

> Guy: Respect the cock

> Mama Gena: Respect the pussy

Does it sound a bit ridiculous?
It's the same for this book.
An approach centered around "I'm great because of my pussy" is, in my opinion, idiotic as much that guy who thinks he's better because of his cock.

Some Woo-Woo Content

Some of the "Pussy A Reclamation" content is all about broad generalizations of the "Men Are From Mars, Women Are From Venus" type.

For example, Regena says:

> The feminine force is primarily responsible for desire. The masculine force is primarily responsible for the production of that desire. The masculine is the rock; the feminine is the wave crashing against that rock.

This is similar to Deida's work in "The Way of The Superior Man" which is also all about generalizations of male's strength and female "emotionality".
And, in some ways, also similar to the "Tao Te Ching", which talks in broad generalization without actually saying much.

My point of view is that there is certainly a backdrop of truths in these generalizations, but that they do little to enhance our understanding and they do little to help the readers in.

Some Woo-Woo Made-Up Science

"Pussy A Reclamation' present massive doses of pseudo-science with some made up "facts" that make little sense to the more rational (and skeptical) readers.

For example:

> Pussy is where your intuition lives, where your deepest nonrational knowledge lives (..)
> She integrates information from diverse sources, including the hypothalamus, neocortex, conscious, unconscious, and peripheral nervous system.
> This is why, when our pussy is engaged, we make better choices. We can feel the right next step in any situation.

Woo-Woo Superstition

And of course, some mixing of pussy-woo-woo with some good old superstition:

> We tried dabbing pussy juice behind the ears when going to a job interview, with incredible results.
> A few dots of PJ perfume before a date? It was like crack cocaine to a guy. If we wanted to make ourselves positively bulletproof, we'd go panty-free and add some temporary tattoos, press-on jewels, and stickers to decorate our secret weapon: pussy. To our amazement, we discovered that adorning her activated her. Like Wonder Woman's golden cuffs.

Pussy juice behind the ears gives you incredible interview results?
LOL.

It's not over though. Keep on reading.

Woo-Woo Predicting Pussy Power

At this point, I don't if the author actually believes in this stuff or if it's more for inspirational sake:

> She talks to us. She will whisper, "I know you are running late, but don't take a cab—take the subway." We don't listen to her, and there we are, stuck in traffic, missing our meeting.
> Pussy is your own built-in psychic, your own inner guide, your divining rod.

Woo-Woo Religion

Turns out, pussy changes reality as you best please:

> She knew her husband would be in a dark mood if the Seahawks lost, so she lifted her skirt and flashed pussy energy at the TV screen. Miraculously, the game turned around in the last quarter

To which she even adds some powerful blasphemy for the more religious readers.
At this point I was actually laughing at the idiocy of "Pussy A Revelation":

> After the game, the quarterback was telling reporters that "God is so good." Only Fran knew the truth: that God is impotent until the Goddess shows up to turn him on. Yes, we are each that powerful.

Regena dethrones one God.. And puts another one up in the sky: GPS (the Great Pussy in the Sky).
Now you can change the course of reality with your pussy.

This is worse than Rhonda's "The Secret".

Regena actually has an altar where she prays to the GPS-God:

> I sit at my altar for a small gratitude ritual. I have a series of stones and small objects I have collected over the years. I light a candle and pick up each of the 30 stones, one at a time. As I replace each one, I whisper gratitude to the Great Pussy in the Sky for different aspects of my life

The whole sequence ends with a more down-to-earth "hello" than most churches through:

> Finally, I might pull out my hand mirror and greet my pussy with "Hello, Gorgeous!" just to let her know I honor and remember her.

Woo-Woo Abuse Towards Boyfriend

And finally, a special note must be made for this one:

> I decided to reach back in time and call upon the irrevocable power of pussy—and all my ancestresses from ancient Egypt to 20th-century Virginia—to ceremonially stake my claim. I walked around Tiitus's house and placed a drop of my pussy juice on every object in it, including his toothbrush. The rest of the weekend, I was not a guest. I was the lady of the manor.

To smear people's objects with one's own body secretion without them knowing is, in my opinion, abusive.

It doesn't matter if you think your pussy juices are the best thing on earth: you don't know if for other people is the same.
I also don't think there is anything wrong with boogers, but I'd go ballistic if I knew someone had placed boogers around my house.

There is also nothing wrong with dicks, but if someone brushed his penis on my toothbrush, that would also be abusive.

Unfounded Mysanthropic Depiction of Society As "Patriarchy"

From a social point of view, Regena Thomashauer has no idea what she's talking about.

Her views are polluted by the same type of sloganeering propaganda that pollutes feminists' (mistaken) opinions. Here are some examples:

> Women who no longer participated in the "mean girls" wounding so common in middle school, an artifact of Patriarchy

If someone thinks that women hurting other women is a consequence of "patriarchy", that person doesn't understand a thing about psychology, social psychology, and society in general.

This is some victim mentality in relation to the "oppressive patriarchy":

> We've been held hostage by a patriarchal culture that devalues turn-on and uses women's erotic brilliance in service to the masculine.

And she pushes an agenda of men "profiting" from women (italic and underlining are mine):

> What about the vast fortunes we have forked over to corporations owned and operated by men, in exchange for feminine hygiene products to handle our bleeding and our fragrance?
> (…)
> If only we could profit from our pussies to the degree that the PWC has!

And unluckily, Mama Gena ends with a defense of the indefensible view that women have the right to be very angry (for the record, I don't think it's healthy for anyone to go through life being very angry):

> We live in an age when women have every right to be very, very angry.

Most of all, Regena Thomashauer is ignorant about basic biology and basic evolutionary biology.
I wouldn't take anything she says about society, repression or psychology seriously.

Predatory Towards Ex & Dead Boyfriend

I think Regena Thomashauer had all the right to end her marriage after she had "outgrown it".

And if she wasn't happy, she did well.
But there are different ways to go about breakups and separation. And different ways of talking about our ex once they become our exes.

Yet the way she did it and the way she talked about her ex seemed a bit too disrespectful in my opinion considering how deeply and widely he supported her.

By the way, as someone who focuses on power dynamics, that tells me two things:

1. Her ex was too much of a nice guy
2. It's dangerous to help (ungrateful) people up because once they're up, they drop you

And finally, the way she describes the death of her dream boyfriend as her own re-birth and rapture as a woman…
That really just sounded terrible.

She probably didn't mean that way, but she should have made it clearer. Which, again, makes me think of a woman high in narcissism.

And she could have really learned a thing or two from Tiitus, her great love:

> So Tiitus had known. He had not wanted to drag me down with him. He was protecting me by pushing me away in the last few months. It was not that he didn't love me. It was that he did.

This is real leadership.
That's an example to aspire to.

Predatory Towards Her Girlfriend

Regena describes two girlfriends of hers:

1. one who attended her classes and joined the sisterhood
2. and one who followed a different path and sought enlightenment "through the heart" instead of "through the pussy".

Well, turns out the one who did great is the one who joined her class. And her girlfriend who didn't join her class, guess what… Now she has a shitty life (all described with much-unneeded details about her low self-esteem and abusive husband).

She says:

> So both of my dear friends got the call of the Goddess.
> The difference?
> Hannah picked up—while Grace let the call go through to voice mail.

It feels to me like a nasty (and vindictive) way of throwing her girlfriend under the bus just to promote her work.

Poor Self-Help

Finally, there are quite some references to the "law of attraction" and to a few other common but incorrect self-help myths (ie.: mantras).

PUSSY – PROS

As usual, since I am a highly critical reviewer, I focus more on the "cons" and "criticisms" than on the "pros" because you can get the "pros" anywhere else.

But that's not to say that "Pussy A Reclamation" is lacking in life-changing content or that it's not an outright great book to read.
Here are the Pussy pros:

- Potentially life-changing

I believe that the message of getting in touch with one's own sexuality is crucial for many women.
The importance of grieving fully and the message of choosing one's own emotions are also both very powerful

- Vulnerable

Vulnerability has become all the rage since "Daring Greatly" (also read "vulnerability is not power"), but Regena takes it another level.

We get to peek behind the "powerful woman" exteriors that sometimes she seems to want to portray.
And that's even more powerful. So much so that I had to wonder why was she trying to project a "strong woman" exterior when she had these human, touching stories of heartbreak and resurrection?

- Great storytelling

Regena Thomashauer writes well and some of the stories will keep you on the edge of your seat.

Review

Pussy: A Reclamation is a unique book with the intent of empowering women, but done with a boosterism approach that may provide short-term motivation but not deliver true, long-lasting and foundational empowerment.

The pleasure part though, may be a valid approach to life.
It's not what I'm pursuing with my life, but it could be a good message for some women, especially for women who may need to accept and reconnect with their sexuality.

Finally, I must warn readers that while this book promises the rediscovery of female power, Pussy is not feminine and proposes instead a brash, masculine approach to self-development.
I think that most women should not follow Regena Thomashauer if they want to be a high-quality woman.

Overall, I would give it 5 stars for the positive relationship content, the self-care, and the philosophy of pleasure.

But the narcissism bursting at the seams and the sea and pseudoscience knocks a couple of stars off.

Read it, but with your "BS radar fully on" (and for Chr*st sake, don't drop 'vaginal juices' on his toothbrush!)

Pussy A Reclamation Book Review: Power, or Narcissism?

I don’t think that “Pussy A Reclamation” is toxic femininity, but it’s not the healthiest type of femininity either.

The Power of Your Subconscious Mind: Summary & Review

Bullet Summary

- What your subconscious believes your conscious mind will do
- Your subconscious mind can make thoughts a reality
- You talk to your subconscious mind with visualization and thoughts during sleep and half-sleep time

Full Summary

About The Author:
Joseph Denis Murphy (1898 – 1981) was an Irish author and New Thought minister. He allegedly spent time in India learning about meditation and Hindu philosophy. Back in the West Murphy attained a PhD in psychology and, somewhat surprisingly for those who reach high academic degrees, joined the new thought movement where he was also ordained in Divine Science and Religious Science.

This summary of “The Power of Your Subconscious Mind” focuses on the practical aspects of the book while skipping everything we felt was “fluff”:

Your Subconscious Makes Things Real

Joseph Murphy says that our subconscious makes what it believes a reality.

He gives several examples ranging from people who act like ducks once hypnotized to priests curing the sick telling them God will heal them to people selling their houses through the power of visualization (but I prefer some actual knowledge on persuasion and influencing when it comes to selling a house).

Visualize To Get What You Want

Joseph Murphy says that visualizing things will bring them into your life.

He advises visualizing while in dreamlike states, for example before falling sleeping, right after waking up and during meditation.

Add Passion To Your Visualization

Passion gives you the tools to work hard at what you want, which will make the visualization much more powerful

My Note:
The author at least says that wishing by itself is not enough. He says that you need to work hard for what you want. I was relieved because similar books (such as The Secret) recommend you do not work on what you want (which is terrible advice of course).

Choose To Be Happy Because Happiness Is A Choice

The author says that being happy is a choice.

And not being happy, or being envious, stands in your way. Being angry towards people is a self-fulfilling prophecy as you will act badly towards them and they will act badly in return.

You should overcome being envious by wishing well to the people you're envious of. And then your subconscious will believe that you deserve the same.

Real-Life Applications

- Use Visualization

Visualizing is a powerful tool. Not so much to attract things in your life, but more to keep you focused on your goal and mentally upbeat. Also, you'll be readier when the opportunity strikes

- Do use break patterns

It's true that sometimes we build fears and dislike upon nothing. And we bring them in our life by acting on them. Do break the patterns instead.

For example, force yourself to focus on the positives of your boss and chances are that your relationship will improve for the better.

- Wish others well

Envy and resentment poison you first and foremost.
Train yourself to abandon envy and learn to become a person who truly wishes people well.

CONS

- The (not so) good old law of attraction

"The Power of Your Subconscious Mind" is considered one of the very first sources upon which the law of attraction is based.
And I'm not a big fan of the law of attraction.

- It's unscientific

Needless to say, as much of the new thought / new age literature, it's largely unscientific.

PROS

- Some good insights into how the unconscious can shape our lives

Surprisingly (for me), The Power of Your Subconscious Mind had some interesting case studies.

One of them was a workaholic who was making himself sick for too much work.
Then he discovered he always felt guilty for his brother's death and that overworking was a way of punishing himself.
Such cases can happen indeed.

- Some good stories

The story of the alcoholic afraid of failing to get sober was touching and helpful.
He visualized his daughter praising him for being sober -a very smart move- and was able to stop.

Review

The Power of Your Subconscious Mind is yet another new thought, law of attraction rehash type of book and, as such, it doesn't exactly enter into our best resources lists.

However, it's better than many other law of attraction spawns because at least it says that as you visualize, you also must work hard towards your goals.

When it comes to you, dear reader, whether you like it or not, is quite simple to say:

If you are the kind of person who uses the expression "woo-woo" with a slight disapproving tone to refer to unscientific, impractical, and probably not the most real-world effective wisdom, then you might not particularly enjoy Joseph Murphy's writing.

If on the other hand, you're into the law of attraction, you'll love it.

As per our general recommendations on TPM, albeit there were some passages that were good in this book, we feel that you may be better off with other self-development resources -and if you tend to fall for woo-woo, check out this article on naive self-help-.

The Millionaire Next Door: Summary & Review

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The Millionaire Next Door is a study on millionaires, teaching readers what are the habits and mindsets of actual millionaires.
From a TPM perspective, wealth is power because it buys independence, leverage, and freedom from control.

TPM Strategy Note: This book is about Power vs. Signaling
Many men use "conspicuous consumption", or over-spending to signal high status (especially in dating). While conspicuous consumption 'works', the reality is that it's a short-term power move for long-term loss. By over-leveraging yourself to look powerful, you surrender your long-term power, including "walk-away power" from employers.

Overview

- Self-made millionaires are frugal
- Millionaires invest instead of spending
- Millionaires value independence over status symbols

Full Summary

Stanley & Danko say there are 7 common elements among millionaires.
Millionaires:

1. Spend much less than what they earn
2. Focus time, energy and resources on accumulating wealth
3. Value financial independence more than status display
4. Didn't have parents who lavished gifts on them
5. Teach their children to be economically independent
6. Target good market niches

7. Choose an occupation conducive to wealth accumulation

1. Meet the Millionaire Next Door

Stanley & Danko define a millionaire as someone having a net worth of one million USD or higher.

The book, however, focuses mostly on people who have a net worth of between one and ten millions, which is a level of wealth attainable by most in a single generation.

I find their list of the most common millionaire types quite interesting.
The typical millionaire is:

- Older man with children
- Self-employed (2/3 of American millionaires)
- In a dull business line (from rice farmer to pest controllers to coin and stamp dealers)
- Has a non-employed wife (or teacher) who is a careful planner and budgeter
- Has a college degree or an advanced degree
- Cares -and spends- for his children's education
- Works between 45 and 55 hours a week
- Invests almost 20% of his income through own investment decisions
- 20% of wealth in stocks / mutual funds, 20%+ in pension plans and 21% in his business
- Would recommend account and law as ideal occupations

2. Frugal Frugal Frugal

Stanley & Danko say many people could be wealthy but are not because of their mindset around spending.

They are on the hedonic treadmill and believe that not displaying wealth is like not having any.
For these people, you are successful when you can show and consume, so they maximize their income around consumption.
And some of them even take up debt to fuel their consumption (this is the definition of the sidewalk people in DeMarco's The Millionaire Fastlane)

Millionaires don't have such a mentality. Millionaires are not interested in showing off. The authors say media and newspapers tell us the wrong story: millionaires don't buy the highest-priced items.
For every luxury "most expensive" item a millionaire buys, there are 8 non-millionaires who buy it.

Instead, the millionaires budget and control their expenses.

The typical millionaire in Stanley & Danko survey has an annual income of less than 7% of their total wealth.
When your wealth is so high compared to your income you maximize your tax as well because only 7% of your wealth is subject to taxes.

The authors say many of the millionaires they interviewed have a total taxable annual income of less than 80.000 USD!

3. Time, Energy, and Money

Stanley & Danko say wealthy people use time, energy, and resources to accumulate wealth.

They know how they spend and they plan their investments. It's because millionaires care about their wealth. Their wealth is important for them.

The authors suggest you do the same and record what you buy and how much you spend for each category of product and service you consume.

You can do it either by yourself or you can use the help of your accountant.

Once you know how much you're spending you should budget in a way that allows you to save at least 15% of your income.

4. You Aren't What You Drive

Stanley & Danko say 25% of millionaires didn't buy a car in the last four years, and only 23.5% of them own a new car.

Half of the millionaires don't spend more than 29,000 USD on cars… In their whole life!

The authors say that car-buying behavior show very well why some people accumulate wealth while others don't.

And while most millionaires spend little on cars, they are also more likely to hunt for bargains and negotiate the price that non-millionaires.
They are not loyal to a specific dealer indeed, but go with the one who can offer the best price.

My Note:
Based on The Paradox of Choice categories, if millionaires display this same behavior across most products they buy, they are maximizers. I must warn you though that maximizers are also more regretful and, on average unhappier than satisfiers.

5. Economic Outpatient Care

Chapter 5 explains that the biggest indicator of productivity among offspring is whether and how their parents support them.

The authors' findings confirm what most people knew intuitively when they say that there is a higher propensity to spend inherited money than self-generated money.

The biggest problem though is that freely given money changes people's behavior and character for the worse.

Many children who inherit an easy life from their families are often very well versed in spending money but ineffective at generating any.

The authors say it often starts with helping children buy a house.
The parents would think that's OK and the kids won't need any more help after that. But they're often wrong.

The "lucky" children who receive a lot from their parents, or ECO as the authors calls them, develop bad habits for a lifetime.
They:

- Consume more than they save and invest
- Don't distinguish between their wealth and their parents' wealth
- Are significantly more dependent on credit

Based on Stanley & Danko's research the best gift you can make to your children is the tuition.

The second is to create a supportive environment that rewards education, individual achievements and responsibility.

TPM Analysis: "Economic Outpatient Care" is a submission dynamic. When a parent subsidizes you as an adult child, they maintain power over you. For a man to reach full maturity and power, he must achieve Financial Autonomy. Handouts are 'Golden Handcuffs' that keep you in a submissive role within the family hierarchy.

6. Affirmative Action, Family Style

Stanley & Danko go even deeper on how parents' wealth influences children.

They say it's not necessarily bad to give to your children as long as they are disciplined and they can generate their own income.
It's very uneducative and damaging though when the children can only survive on their parents' handouts.

Here are a few rules on how wealthy parents can grow smart, independent kids:

1. Don't let them know you're wealthy (at least until they're professionally established)
2. Teach them discipline and frugality
3. Emphasize their achievements, not their material status symbols
4. Teach them values beyond money

7. Find Your Niche

The authors say that most people never produce high incomes -including self-employed and business owners-.

But professionals servicing high-income individuals instead often get wealthy themselves.

And in the next decades there will be a large number of wealthy individuals who will need specialists to serve them.
Some in-demand specializations the wealthy spend on are:

- Medical
- Asset experts such as appraisers, liquidators
- Investment professionals
- Legal services
- Educational products

8. Jobs: Millionaires versus Heirs

Most of the affluent are business owners and self-employed professionals.

Business owners and self-employed individuals are four times more likely to be wealthy than people working for others.
But that doesn't mean you should have your own business: most businesses fail.

And there's no magic industry because you can be a millionaire in any profession.
At the end of the day, the most reliable way to become a millionaire is to work on yourself. Because the character is more important than the business.

> The business owner character is more important than the line of business

More Wisdom

Security or Independence?

The authors say millionaires value independence.

But I wonder how they know that for sure. I would wonder instead if the millionaires they portray value security the most.

And if that's the case, I would wonder if spending more on life experiences would actually make them happier. Spending on experiences has been shown to be the best way money could possibly buy happiness, so it's an important question.

And at this point I would ask: is your goal becoming a millionaire or is it living a great life (or both)?

Independence: The Best Insight

The main concept of this book is revolutionary for many people who were never taught any better.
That concept is that high expenditure sells your freedom away. And often, it sells it very cheaply.

If the new car toy, big house and 5 stars hotel is nice, they are also keeping you chained to your job.
So the next question is: do you like your job?
Because if yes, great. If not, you are imprisoning yourself.

Definitely something to think about.

Real-Life Applications

Prioritize Financial Independence
The biggest, biggest, biggest takeaway I would like anybody I care for to take away from this book is this: prioritize your financial independence.

If consumption is costing your freedom, you are spending money to imprison yourself.
Get your freedom first, do what you like, and then use your money to buy whatever you want.

Don't Give Too Much To Children
Giving too much, too freely, is a terrible education for your children. You are teaching them to be dependent and… Poor.

CONS

No Case Studies
The authors talk about 80k income households becoming millionaires. But there are no case studies.
Those would have been interesting.
Where do they live, what are they giving up, how did they invest, what did they inherit from their parents?
Are they the type of people that live in poverty just to save? If so, that's not interesting to me.

Little Data
The survey and the survey's analysis may be solid, but the conclusions the authors present don't always seem to be based on solid data and/or very scientific.
I enjoy a well-written book, but a few more numbers wouldn't have hurt.

Average, Dull Lifestyle
Nassim Taleb makes fun of "The Millionaire Next Door" because wealth is supposed to be enjoyed, he says.
And indeed as other reviewers have pointed out, The Millionaire Next Door lifestyle makes for a life of lots of sacrifices and little fun. We suggest instead a more strategic path. Save for your power, but spend extra for what truly matters for you, and when money moves the needle to achieve your goals.
And remember: money in the bank is your dry powder power.

Now How-To Guide And You Won't Necessarily Become A Millionaire
Just because you read how some (some!) millionaire acts, it doesn't mean you'll necessarily become one.

Review

The Millionaire Next Door is a good book looking into the psychology and personality profile of some millionaires, but it's not necessarily a guide on how to gain wealth, or on how to think about gaining wealth.

Let's say that it provides an interesting analysis of millionaires from a sociological and ethnographic point of view.

Check the best books for top-10% men.

Why The “Growth Mindset” Costs You Power, Attraction, & Opportunities

Lucio Buffalmano · 1 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

After Carol Dweck’s “Mindset” the “growth mindset” has become a popular concept in self-development.

And for good reasons: it’s fundamental to personal growth and, together with the antifragile ego, to mental empowerment.

We generally support and encourage a growth mindset here.

HOWEVER…

You still need balance and calibration to maintain status and influence:

At a certain level and in certain situations you may really want to think and act not as a “learner”, but as an expert

And when public displays of a growth mindset clash with power principles, then a growth mindset is disempowering and harming you.

Generally speaking, the growth-seeking learner is low power and low value, while the self-assured and power-seeking teacher is high power and high value.

Growth Mindset Power Dynamics

Anyone seeking self-development should want to become an expert at something.

You're not expected to be an expert at everything, and neither should you act like one.

However, you do want to get good at something.

And, from a power dynamics point of view, to fully reap the rewards your expertise you must think, act, and publicly portray yourself as an expert and an authority.

As Machiavelli said, things are what they look like.
So no reputation, no authority, no influence, and no rewards.

Now the issue is that "learner" sometimes stands in contrast to "expert", and an eternal and constant learner attitude undermines your credibility as an expert.

Yes, it may be true that if you identify as a "learner", in the long run, you may gain more expertise.

But one, that's very long term.
And remember that in the long term we're all dead, so a focus on the short-term sometimes makes sense-.

Nobody treats and rewards the naive "learner" because… Why should they? Nobody values a 'learner'. People value experts

And two, don't be naive.
Unless you can reap the rewards of your expertise, your expertise won't even matter. Neither to you, nor the world.

When you adopt an extreme, "always-on" growth mindset and approach every person, situation and criticism as if you need to learn more, you lose out.
A reputation of a learner without enough reputation for an expert devalues you.

You lose authority, status, money, and networking opportunities. And you come across as lower value because 'learner' overlaps with "beginner".
And beginners are lower value than experts.

It's Not Just Cognitive Bias: Experts Have Less To Gain With Extreme Growth Mindset

Some posit that a fixed mindset is a self-harming defense mechanism.

As it's often the case, evolution is not (completely) stupid, and if many people defend their expertise, there is often a good reason.
One reason is, of course, public reputation and power.

And the other reason is that, for experts… It does make sense to have and display less of a growth mindset.

Just think about it: when you're new and fresh, everything is an opportunity for learning.
So, as a beginner, an extreme and "always on" growth mindset truly reflects your reality.

But that's not the case anymore for experts.
Experts can't always learn nearly as much because they already analyzed and learned from the most common situations.
And experts can't learn from just about any average Joe because they're far more advanced than the average Joe.

Most experts' learning happens pushing the limits of what's most readily accessible or "ordinary". It more rarely, and with fewer people.

So the higher you go, the more you want to be selective of the people and resources you can learn from.

And, relevant to us, experts rarely learn while going about their life or while being interviewed by non-experts, chatting on a podcast, or on most public appearances.
So, in those circumstances, an extreme growth mindset is counterproductive and disempowering.

Learners Are Victims of Teacher's Frames & Power Moves

An extreme growth mindset overlaps with naivete and can cost you.

It can cost in poorer learning, rather than better learning.
Similar to open-mindedness, an extreme growth mindset opens you up to all kinds of BS -and to all kinds of bullshitters-.

And, similar to vulnerability, it can cost you in your social and professional life as well.
For example, an extreme growth mindset would never push back against criticism because 'criticism = learning opportunity'.

But the criticism sometimes is wrong -and the better you become, the more likely it is to be wrong-.
And sometimes the criticism is a power move.

Growth Mindset Power Moves

As the growth mindset spreads, so does its use for Machiavellian, selfish, and value-taking purposes.

For example:

- Employer manipulation.
  The more they can pay with "learning", the less they will pay with actual money. Plus, they can ask you to do more than your job description because 'you're learning'. (Thanks to Bel for this)
- PR stunt, to look open-minded, "better" and more honest
- A cover for personal attacks, or to avoid owning up and apologizing-. With the "growth mindset" cover, people are never wrong or mean because it's you who need to develop a growth mindset. If you defend you get labeled a "fixed mindset" (see "covert power moves")
- Social exchange manipulation, as in "I'm giving you feedback and criticism that will help you improve, so you owe me".
  P.S.: avoid saying things such as "learn this and thank me later"
- A cover to social climb on you (teacher/pupil frame): so they self-frame as "teachers", and you become the "student" (of theirs).
- Trap to lower your defenses. Then you're complimenting them, maybe take a step back… And then they take your feedback apart to show why you're wrong
- An excuse to be mean, as in "we give each other raw feedback here because we all have a growth mindset, and if you can't take it, it's your fault for not having growth mindset"

Since "teaching others" or pushing a growth mindset on them can be a disempowering -and annoying- power move, we advise caution in doing so.
Unless they made it clear they accept you as an authority to learn from, refrain from self-framing yourself as a teacher to others.

Learners Are Lower Value Than Teachers

One simple fact proves that learners are lower power:

Teachers get salaries, learners get nothing -or must pay-.

That already tells you a low about who's higher value between the two.

Top teachers are experts, and if they're experts in any in-demand skill or field, they can get a lot of money, plus status, influence, admiration, and even attraction.
Learners and beginners get little of that.

Your Confidence Around "How Much You Know" Determines Your Authority...

… And your attitude around "what you need to learn" as well, of course.

Relevant to us and to your public attitude, experts are associated with high confidence, including high confidence in knowing what they know.
Plus, sometimes, also an air of "been there, done that".

Learners are associated with lower confidence, higher curiosity, and with more doubts and tentativeness in their knowledge and expertise.
And we know here that low confidence and tentativeness equal low power and low influence.

That's why, sometimes, simply acting like a learner frames you as a lower-value beginner.
That's fine if you are a beginner, because you grow quicker.
But it's a lot less OK if you're not a beginner.

When dealing with others, that means that when you take a learner's role to others teach you, you lose power to them.

That teacher isn't also just getting power, but he's getting power over you.
You disempower yourself, to empower that teacher -it's a lose-win, a sucker's trade-.

If you're competing with them -say, in the same company- you'll never get promoted.

Unluckily, people often know little about your level or expertise.
And they will judge you by your level of confidence and authority.
If you act like a learner, they will think you're a beginner. If that other person acts like a teacher, he becomes the teacher.

Result: they become the high-power expert, the one worth being listened to -and the one worth buying from-.
And you become the low-power, not-worth being listened-to guy (the true extent of your knowledge be damned).

All "Gurus", Marketers and Charlatans Succeed As "Experts"

Finally, consider this:

Many of the most successful "gurus", including many charlatans, self-frame themselves as experts.

Some of them may profess a growth mindset or say that they started as clueless.
For example, Tai Lopez rode the "growth mindset hype" and say he was a learner who started clueless.

But that's a power move to be more relatable.
And they still sell you as experts.
They wouldn't dream to learn from their audience while building their reputation.

Indeed, most of the gurus' success and charisma is because they portray an expert image, never because they self-frame as learners.

Experts Advance In Academia, Learners Do Grunt Work

Academia, the place that should all be about learning also follows the same rules.

Emily in our forum experienced the same during her PhD.

And if you look at some academics' facial expressions, read their books, or look at how they talk -or defend- their studies and theories with just a minimum of power awareness, you'll often realize that, especially at a certain level, it's more about power than "learning more".

Example 1: Tom Bilyeu Looks Clueless, Submissive & "Not Worth Being Listened To"

Tom is a good example because he embodied and promoted an extreme approach to growth mindset.

The “growth mindset guy” expression, supposedly

Tom is a great guy, but power dynamics still apply, no matter how “a great guy” you are.

And while I like him, there’s also a part of me who feels disappointed and that he called his own bullying.
And that’s one of the main enablers of bullying: the bullied inadvertently attracts the bullying.
There’s a dark force that almost calls for bullying to naive and submissive people.

Now, back to our example.

Sadhguru and Tom Bilyeu are both active in the self-development space.
So, no matter what the do-goody may say, in a way, they’re competitors.

Tom interviews Sadhguru, so it’s expected and understandable he asks more questions, listens more, and generally learns more than teaching.

However, again… Balance.

When Sadhguru contradicts Tom about his own mission, Tom should NOT take an extreme learner’s role.

Because if you get schooled about your own mission, and what you’ve supposedly spent a lot of time thinking about… Then you lose a lot of authority.
And you also lose credibility and respect.

Unluckily, Tom takes on that pupil’s role:

> Tom: (talks about his mission,)
> Sadhguru: nono, there is substantial medical and scientific evidence to show that… (…) there is no argument about that <— contradicts him on a foundational aspect of his mission
> Tom: (looks at him dumbouded) <— accepts the guest’s higher authority over his own mission

The early pick-up artists had a concept called “showing value in her world”.
Which meant learning about her, and then showing your value in what she does and cares about.
The concept was that if you can display higher value in her world, then she’ll be attracted to you.

In a way, it’s correct.
But unless you’re a girl who wants to be seduced, you shouldn’t let just about anyone display higher power and authority in your world -and field of expertise-.

Sadhguru entered Tom’s field of expertise and not only displays value and authority, but devalues and demeans

Tom.

That's bad for business, too.
It's what he is selling.
And who wants to buy from a guy whose business is built on a proven mistake?

Tom should still let Sadhguru disagree and speak his mind, of course.
But he can disagree and politely push back.

Result:
Tom has 3.1 million subscribers and despite trying his best to be a self-development, he is most popular for interviews of other people.
Guests who, guess what, are all "gurus" who speak with self-confidence and engage others to teach, never to learn:

The growth mindset learner who seeks popularity is less successful than the fixed mindset gurus he interviews
Sadhguru instead enjoys a full guru status and reputation. He has 10.6 million subscribers on his channel (sheep need a shepherd, you know).

Looks like a self-confident fixed mindset ain't too bad for business…
This example is telling because Tom Bilyeu's openly stated mission is to affect people at scale.
All his efforts go into being as popular as possible. He prides himself on going all-in, working non-stop.
And still… He can't match the "guru".

The same goes for Lewis Howes' "School of Greatness", BTW.

Tom's Growth Mindset Is A Disservice to His Audience

By uncritically thinking of anything and anyone as "someone to learn from", Tom is doing a disservice to himself, and to his audience.

He's giving away his mental real estate and giving a platform to the most dubious gurus the world has to offer, without ever challenging them.

Example 2: Demand Respectful Communication First, Learn Later (TPM Forum)

From this thread.

Lemme preface by saying that TPM's forum is a training ground for learning.
In that sense, there are no mistakes, and no reputation and status one should uphold (except maybe for me and some other long-standing members since our image reflects on our work, but that's a different topic).

Also, we're not entering into the merit of "who's right or wrong" here.

We only look at the response and whether the growth mindset was either appropriate and empowering, or not appropriate, and disempowering.

> User 1 (first message): Seriously dude you thought making power moves in this forum was a smart idea?

It's a strong message.

User 2 does not address the tone, and this is what comes next:

> User 1 (second message): If you want to be a paranoid guy who makes unprovoked power-moves assuming everyone wants to social climb then it's your choice.
> (…) I don't want to have anymore discussions on the threads you will start from here on after.
> (…) Good luck.

When you reply with a too friendly/vulnerable/learner message to a strong message, you often lose power.
And it looks sneaky and fake because it's just not human nature to focus on the learning when we've just been slapped.

If we focus on the feedback, then the feedback, was great.
And a growth mindset towards feedback is the best approach to get the most out of it.
However, see if you spot the issue in User 2 reply (I quote the relevant passages only):

> User 2: I might lack power awareness, that could be the case.
> (…) I want to understand your point of view (…) I admitted I might have been oversensitive on this one.
> (…) I also might still be a bit paranoid through my previous experiences which might still have left me on the defensive. And could unconsicously provoke it (as I'm trying to understand what is happening).
> (…) Thank you very much anyway as all of what you wrote is food for thoughts and I'm going to reflect on it.

There are elements of both vulnerability and growth mindset there.

If this exchange had happened in real life, or in any other forum where you care about your reputation, then some issues emerge.

The issues are:

1. Growth mindset without defending boundaries harms you socially
2. Growth mindset without defending boundaries may harm your self-esteem as the self-signaling is that it's OK to treat you curtly and publicly (plus, potentially jumping to conclusions concerning a callous personality)
3. Extreme growth mindset feels "weak": the "I may lack" is how a total growth mindset would approach it, and "I admitted" talk was extreme vulnerability.
   Both here lead to a power loss, especially when it's without first addressing the boundaries and without demanding a more respectful tone.
4. Extreme growth mindset feels sneaky and "off": as mentioned above, it's just not natural to focus on the learning right after the slap, so people just wonder "what's wrong with this person?"

Addendum about the exchange:
User 2 explained what happened.
He is a long term-member, smart, and also power-aware.
He knew what was going on, but did what he did because of other considerations.

Example 3: Greenspan Maintains Authority -And Income- For Handling Mistakes With A High-Power Teacher Frame

Learner's expression or "I know better than you" expression?
Alan Greenspan is (was?) considered one of the smartest men alive, one of the top economists in the world, and one of the best -if not the best- central bankers ever.

Now look at most of his facial expressions: does he look like a learner, or a teacher?

And did he take any responsibility for the financial meltdown, as any learner who "doesn't care about power" should?

Nope.

Not only he defended himself saying it was impossible to do anything about it -something that many disagree with-, but he doubled down to go on the attack and display his superiority with a teacher's frame:

> Greenspan: What went wrong? Why was virtually every economist and policymaker of note <— power move: not only everyone didn't see it, but those who did, aren't "of note" -and not nearly as good as him- so blind to the coming calamity?
> (…)
> I have come to see <— that's the "smart teacher" approach. He hasn't "learned", but he has "analyzed" the situation and concluded that…
> that an important part of the answers to those questions is a very old idea: 'animal spirits,' > (goes on to explain and enlighten others)
> (…)

And could he have done anything to prevent the crisis?

A learner with a self-help fueled "can-do attitude" would say "yes".
But it didn't even cross Greenspan's mind to say he could have done better.

No sensible policy, Greenspan maintains, could have prevented the housing bubble -something that many high-credibility experts disagree with-.

See?

There's no hint of "learning" -and of course no hint of sharing any of the blame for supporting deregulation, for keeping interest rates at a record low, and for failing to foresee any possible dangers-.

Instead, there's more explaining -and some verbal power moves to come across as smart and knowledgeable-.

Greenspan doesn't earn my respect.
And I don't like him.
I think of him as a smart alec as*hole.

So, yes, he could have done better -and maintained power while also earning the eagles' respect-.

But an "extreme growth mindset" would have been even more harmful.
He'd have lost all reputation, status, and power.

Greenspan's approach likely also helped him to maintain his high consulting fees.

Rules to Maximize Growth Mindset

General Rules:

- Adopt a growth mindset for yourself
- If feedback, attack, or criticism is disrespectful, address the tone first, and only later consider addressing the value and golden nugget in the feedback/criticism
- If the feedback is invalid say so, don't try to play the open-minded nice guy who wants to "learn from anything and anybody". That makes you look stupid, not "open".
- If the criticism is central to your domain of expertise, focus on defending and re-empower yourself first, and only later address the value in the content -or don't address it at all publicly, but learn privately-

Generally speaking, a growth mindset is also better among high-quality people since they know its benefits and they're more likely to appreciate it while also less likely to fall for the allure of the "self-assured guru" -high-quality people are less likely to be sheep looking for a shepherd-.

If you're still learning the ropes of power dynamics and aren't sure about what's OK and what's disempowering, err on the side of caution and avoid going overboard with public displays of a growth mindset.

Solution: Dual Approaches For Best of Both Worlds

The approaches we propose are:

- Expert AND learner
- Private learner mode always on, public approach more strategic

We've just seen some examples of self-defeating growth mindsets.

But you can still publicly embrace a growth mindset, even while publicly rejecting or disagreeing with certain criticism.

Indeed, whenever needed, we like and propose this approach:

Reject or ignore the criticism if it's an attack and if it's damaging, while also privately acknowledging and reflecting on that feedback.
Potentially, you can also ask for more honest feedback later on, or to people that you respect and trust.

That way, you get the best of both worlds: the improvements and mental resilience of a growth mindset, with the social power, status, and respect that come from a more assertive approach.

Example from a YouTube comment:

> Feedback: the voice over kills these clips bro

To accept that feedback may also imply that the content of our voice over is poor.

Why should we accept that, with our proven track record of cutting-edge analyses and adding ton of value to our customers?

BUT…

I still took this feedback seriously in private.
It's likely that I can improve the voiceover and chances are that I will improve -also in small part thanks to this feedback-.

Don't Take People's Word On Their Growth Mindset

This may sound cynical, but there's just little room to go around human nature.

So, taking human nature into account, we advise not to take any display and profession of growth mindset too literally.

On paper, a display of a growth mindset may seem an invite for straight and honest talk, and for open feedback and criticism.
"Wow", you may think, what a great person I've just met.

And yes, maybe you have met a great person.

And still, there is little room to go around ingrained and inborn laws of human nature.

So, more times than not, you pay for your criticism with a loss of goodwill and social capital.

People may still say they're grateful for the feedback, and they may even be… But chances are that you'll still be passed up for a more loyal squire when it comes to opportunities and promotions.

It's in human nature to prefer those who are encouraging and supportive rather than those who are critical.

And it's also human nature to secretly resent those who are critical and don't respect the pecking order.

So, generally speaking, leave radical candor for the radicals, and you be a realist instead and don't be too upfront feedbacking to your boss.

Evolution Ain't Stupid

Evolution isn't stupid.

If most people have a fixed mindset it probably means that the benefits of a growth mindset haven't been evolutionarily overwhelming.

And a fixed mindset probably did provide some benefits as well.

Namely, from a power perspective, fixed-mindset folks tend to pay more attention to their status and image as "good", "knowledgeable" and "expert".
That often makes for higher authority and social power, and there are many benefits to that.

Born "Good" + Fixed Mindset = Unbreakable Self-Esteem

And from a mental aspect, consider this:

In some traits training matters less and one may start at a high level from birth.

Call these 'talents'.
A fixed mindset coupled with pride for one's talent may afford you high and resilient self-esteem and confidence.

For example, yours truly grew up with a mother who ingrained in him that he was smart, and that's how he was born.

And that served me incredibly well in many aspects of life.
Including high self-confidence, and an incredibly high self-esteem.

SUMMARY

A growth mindset is generally good.

But as for everything: balance and context matter.
And your goals must always come first.

In many contexts, and especially so in public, you may want to quit that "I'm the learner" stance and think instead more about power, status, and authority.

Why ‘Alpha Male Dating’ Fails: Strategy Beats Dominance

Lucio Buffalmano · 5 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Let us say this first:

Dating as an alpha male in the sense of a high-status, high-power, and high social dominance man is good.

HOWEVER…

Many people get it wrong.
And, often, being too intransigent on “being alpha” or “as high power as possible”, will cost you.

This article explains the limitations of the “alpha male game” and why strategic beats dominant.

- SUMMARY

What's The "Alpha Male Game"

First off, it's important to separate the two:

Alpha male traits and game are two different things.

And, unless taken to an unattractive extreme, alpha male traits such as leadership, confidence, and social dominance are almost all attractive.

It's the approach to "game" as in the sense of "courtship and dating" that is not always the most universally effective -at least as some pundits in the red pill and dating advice community promote it-.

There is no definition for "alpha male game", but it often entails:

- Focus on yourself first and women will come: women are hypergamous and chase higher SMV men
  - Put "your mission" above women and dating
- Date high-power and dominant, generally great advice, but sometimes taken to self-defeating extremes including:
  - Don't approach (AMS says you don't approach because alpha males never chase)
  - Only date if you're her top option (see examples below why it's sub-optimal)
  - If she cancels, she's gone
  - If she's busy, cut contact
  - Never check you got her number right (coach Wayne says "alpha males never double-check her phone number" to display confidence)
  - Control the frame
- Put yourself first, asshole dating style
  - Men come first, women must submit and be feminine (slightly male-chauvinist approach)
- Be stoic
  - Don't show feelings, don't catch feelings
- Use "dread game", make her fear losing you, which can be effective, but rarely leads to strong win-win partnership and can also lead to toxic relationships and vicious cycles of "I hurt you, you hurt me, I… "
  - Keep her chasing your validation
- Respect yourself and your values first and foremost, a generally solid advice
  - Never accept direspect
- Invest as little as possible, especially before sex, also see "alpha fucks, beta bucks"
  - Do cheap dates so you don't become a provider
  - Always "next her" after X amount of days/dates
- Avoid committed relationships
  - Alphas sleep around and/or maintain a harem
  - Don't get married (sensible advice, often)

Generally speaking, for many guys, some of those entries are great advice.

Especially for guys who are too low power, be it too passive, too nice, or too submissive.

If you're one of those "too nice guys" and follow the "alpha male approach to dating" and you have some basic social skills and game, you probably will do OK.

However, this approach hits a ceiling at a certain point, and it's not the highest form of game, and neither the most effective.

The Limitations of “Alpha Male Game”: Strategic Beats “Iron Rules”

“Be Like Water”, says Greene in The 48 Laws of Power.

That’s his last rule.
And, Robert Greene being the smart strategist he is, knows that the “laws” were for marketing mostly.
So, with his last “law”, he puts a huge caveat on all previous “laws” and he basically says: everything is contextual and there are no “law”.
So, to get to the next level, you truly need to move beyond these “laws”, find your own way to win, and change strategy and approach as you go.

And the same applies to the alpha male game.

Most limitations become apparent when the model becomes too intransigent or black and white (as it’s often the case with its proponents).

Such as, when it:

- Fails to carve exceptions
- Fails to adapt to context and personalities
- Fails to adapt to life phases -for example, phases when you need to prioritize dating-
- Becomes a caricature of an alpha male, instead of a high-quality, great all-around “catch”
- Seeks power over results (the two overlap but are far from the same)

As I’ve seen from some gurus and pundits in the red pill, the above isn’t too uncommon.
Many guys take it too prescriptively, take it too far -failing the law of balance-, and misapply it.

For example, the “alpha male approach” doesn’t work if:

- Your goal is to sleep with as many women as possible. Albeit some men deep down seek the “alpha male game” to sleep with more women -and while some others deny so to themselves-, this approach isn’t effective for that because if your goal is to sleep around, then women are a priority of yours (and there is nothing inherently wrong with that)
- Your goal is to get into a relationship with a high-quality woman, same as above, in that case, dating is your priority
- Your goal is to get a specific woman, and albeit we may argue on whether that’s a good goal or not -and yes, often it’s not-, exceptions always apply. And if you seek a specific woman, that may require bending those rules (see examples below)
- Your goal is to get the best woman you can get, even if that means being (temporarily) low power with dating strategies that include, for example, using your money, pursuing her hard, or starting out as a friend while her main relationship is on the rocks (of course, this requires some skills and game, so you can’t just be a platonic friend, but it’s certainly possible to be the “cool friend” the girl falls in love with)

The point above is what some men don’t get: if you prioritize goal achievement, it doesn’t matter how you achieve that goal.
Of course, ideally, it would be better if she chased you, if she pined after you, if she paid for you, etc. etc. but “ideally” is not how you win in the real world.

Let’s now review some real-life case studies.
And if you want the video version, this is it:

Example 1: She Cancels, I Change Plans Just For Her... And Then Everything Changed

In this example:

1. She cancels on me
2. I agree with her new day right away (on a Saturday, no less)
3. I make other plans on Saturday because I don't think it'll happen anyway
4. I change my plans just to meet her

> Her: so sorry (cancels the date), can we don on Saturday?
> On Saturday:
> Her: I arrived, we will meet today at 6:30, right? (<—- takes half for granted that we're still on)
> Me: (forgot about it because I gave it low odds and made other plans, but canceled them to accommodate her)

You'll notice this isn't that bad because she's apologetic and investing.

And that's part of the issue with any "rule" and with the black-and-white thinking of some coaches: the effective way of dating looks at shades of grey and the nuances of communication and power dynamics.

Yes, I still lost some power and leverage with her canceling, but not too much. Nothing that a good date couldn't fix -and turn around-.
I was still in the game with solid chances.
And that's the whole point: I date to achieve my objectives, not to be "high power", and albeit there's most certainly a good overlap between the two, the two aren't always and exactly the same.

And there's more "non-alphaness" in this story:
I was very happy to meet her because I liked her, I was quite sad when she canceled, and I was elated when she reapparead.
This breaks so many rules of alpha male dating: prioritizing the girl, canceling plans to accommodate the girl, and high emotional investment.

But then, guess what…

The Tables Turn With One Single, Well-Executed Date

Guess what happened after?

I met her, ran the perfect date (as per Seduction University model), and got together with her.

She was one of those girls that can't touch alcohol and on our second date, with just two glasses, she was too drunk to be of any good company.
So I sent her home (if I ensure her safety and safe return, it's fair for me to not want to spend more time with someone).
But she forgot something and look what she writes:

> Her: don't worry, I'll go home

Think about the sub-communication of that.
The dynamic is her seeking prolonged interactions, me not wanting, and her worried to bother me.

The sub-communication is that I'm so much higher value, that her presence may be a nuisance to me.

Look at that how the power dynamics inverted.

Now I'm the prize.
Guess who's never going to cancel a date going forward because I'll be her top priority.

The general principle here is: just because you start dating lower power or more "beta" doesn't mean you stay low-power or beta.
And the same can be said of some transitions and phases during courtship, dating, and even relationships: phases of lower power during courtship mean little when you can correct the dynamics going forward.
As a matter of fact, the higher your value and better your game, the more you can break the "alpha rules" and win.

As a general rule, unless you're famous you will hardly be top-priority for an-indemand woman until you meet in person, date, and gain some leverage with in-person exposure.

This is only one example, but it's no major exception.
I have a ton of stories and real-life experiences similar to this one.
As a matter of fact, breaking another "alpha rule", for a good chunk of my dating life I prioritized women above almost anything else.

Example 2: Alpha-Behaving Man Stays "High Power" But Loses, Beta-Behaving Man Gets The Girl

Quick backstory:

1. I cold-approached her
2. Quick instant date before we proceed with our own plans
3. Good first "real" date in the first part
4. Brought her back, but no intimacy -a major strike, but it isn't my first rodeo and when I realized the chances of immediate intimacy were low but future intimacy possible, I followed SU's model for these cases and maximized whatever you can get without intimacy. She explains she's in a long-distance relationship, but not going well.
5. Went out again for a drink with a "BF/GF frame", she grabbed my arm, we kissed, I made it romantic, and she was all over me. Still not the best scenario that she then went home, but no early intimacy is less of an issue when women are considering branch-switching. Plus:
6. Day after she chases hard to spend more time together:

7. Day after we meet for a second date and I plan to use the groceries to bring her back again and get intimate
8. She doesn't follow me into my room and in the elevator she presses her own floor number
9. She reaches out again, but...

10. I don't reply and decide not to make myself available for the day:

I didn't want to be at her beck and call and, on paper, that followed the "alpha male dating" approach.
She didn't put out, and I stopped giving her my time.

Problem is, this was a very high-in-demand girl.
Plus, power-aware, and quite high-power (she knew the game, and she felt slighted for being ignored).
And, funny enough, alpha female she wants to be, she did the same mistake as her alpha male counterparts: she prioritized power over her (original) preference.

IF you wanted to get this woman, the alpha male approach fails more often than it works.
One of you has to compromise, at least a little bit.
But since this is an article for men, let's focus on the male side.
When you're meeting very high-in demand girls and you're not a celebrity, or when you meet a girl who may be a bit above your sexual market value, it's often best to take your chances, even if means a little loss of power, and then do your best to capitalize on them (as long as you're not too low power, and/or still have some chances, of course: as for everything, balance).

By this point, I still did have some chances.
After I bought her back but didn't get intimate I was more in "possible boyfriend" category rather than a lover, and in a competition against the current boyfriend for possible replacement (see here to understand the different dating roles).
That would have made early intimacy a bit more challenging, but she was still into me, still highly invested, still initiating contact herself, so… Doable.

However, because I chose power rather than staying in the game I went too high power, she self-rejected and that was the end of it (see "Straight Line Seduction" to understand the dynamics).

For me, at least…

Beta Male & "Plan B Guy" Swoops In

Now, enter the "plan B guy":

Alpha Male Strategies says "never be the plan B guy", and it's actually a good video.

And, again, that general principle can make sense (if you're clueless or if you're being a sucker).

But "never be the plan B guy" o*nly makes sense as long as you can be the plan A, got plenty of other equally good options, and/or don't care much about this specific woman*.

Otherwise, being the plan B guy is only a problem if you have an ego and if you prioritize defending that ego.
If you prioritize achieving your goal instead of feeling good about "being alpha", then it's all a matter of odds, and the "plan B guy" can have respectable odds of success.
Or, at least, enough odds to make sense and "stay in the game" as the plan B guy (or, more rarely, even plan C or D).

Chances aren't that bad that the plan A guy turns out not to be that great, on the way out, or not interested.
Plus, if you get some face time, you always have the chance of "growing" on the girl with confidence, skills, game, and personality.
So, again, the more skilled and confident that "plan B" guy is, the better his odds of becoming "plan A" guy.

The (Major) Limitations of "Only Accepting Plan A"

Also, consider:

- Severely limiting for less physically attractive guys because you'll rarely be the #1 option at first sight. Example: my first taller girlfriend plainly told me that, dating-wise, the first time she saw it was like I didn't exist to her. Fast forward a few months, I was picking up calls of a crying woman pleading to get back together (not saying this for some weak bragging, but to show you a real-life example of how dynamics can change)
- A skilled "plan B" guy can easily become "plan AAA". Similar as above and just like our example showed. Display your qualities in a social circle (as with my ex) or have a great date as a "plan B guy" (as the example above), get intimate, have great post-date conversation and bonding, meet again… And now you're top of the list, one of the best she's ever met, even
- To date high(er) quality girls you need to put ego aside, focus on efficiency, and sometimes make the most with "plan B" odds. It's just simple social as well as sexual exchange dynamics dating more attractive women, when they don't know how awesome you are. If you don't, you can maximize power, but not returns. Yes, you may sleep around if you're a high-value man, but you can only consistently be "plan A" when you're getting lower SMV women
- To always only be "plan A" means you're playing it easy and dating below your potential just to pamper your own ego: you're not challenging yourself, you're dating lower-value women, and you're truly missing out on the higher-value women.
  If I had only stuck to being "plan A" I wouldn't have dated half of the women I did. And missed out on some of the best ones

- You have your own plan A/B/C… you may have your own different women and goals you're juggling, each one with a different level of priority.
  It's just how life goes.

Our "Plan C" Guy... Got The Girl

As a matter of fact, let's go back to our example.

The guy in this example wasn't even a plan B.
I was more like a plan B -maybe for a few hours of infatuation even the top option, albeit of course that means little unless you capitalize on it-.
This other guy was more like a plan C, taken over when I ignored her.

But when plan B -me- went too high power and became unavailable, plan C guy had a shot -plus, it's possible she didn't mind making me jealous-.

Plan C guy wasn't exactly dating like an alpha male.
I saw him in the lobby looking worried and nervous, going from the check-in desk to security looking for an umbrella.
It was barely drizzling when I saw him outside walking super slow and holding the umbrella for missy branch switch. The two looked out of a scene from a 19th-century romantic movie, with him as the white knight.
Later in the evening as I sat with another date outside I saw the two again coming back, probably from dinner, and they sat outside and talked the whole time.

Overall, he looked like over-investing, and obviously didn't mind spending a lot of time with her.

You Only Need Enough Power & Value, Not "As Much As Possible"

But Plan C probably wasn't a total loser.

He had enough value, and was available (contrary to me).

That matters to women who are looking for a relationship -including switching to a new relationship-.

And guess what, in the end, I think he got more than his foot in the door.

How do I know?
Lucky me, they were both in my hotel (and I was in the lobby waiting for another date).

Now one may say this was all great, that I don't need that game-playing, fast-switching "hoe", and that I dated effectively.
And that'd be a great point.

I even (in good part) agree with that.

But when it comes to effectiveness, it truly really depends on your goals.
And when it comes to romance and seduction, then the rules change.

For example, if you seek:

- Challenge of getting the "hard to get woman" (even if it's only hard for you, at this point in your life)
- Challenge of turning around the "difficult situation"
- Learning experience
- A specific woman, for whatever reason…
- Seduction and romance

Then it often makes sense to trade off some power in exchange for meeting in person, "staying in the game", and doing your best to make good things happen.

Seducers Break The ("Alpha") Rules

Casanova, for example, chased women and lavished them with gifts.

And even in this case study, if I had kept seeing her, I would have probably gotten together with her -and deeply seduced her, too-.

That type of "fast dating" she was pursuing indeed often leads to swooning and deep romance. As a matter of fact, it would have been the perfect way of keeping up our romance from the day before fresh, alive… And growing.

That's the other issue of "alpha male dating": to sweep women off their feet and to truly seduce hearts and minds you often need to break the rules (Prioleau, 2014).

Chasing Is Low-ish Odds, But Higher Than Zero (& Sometimes, It Makes Sense)

Chasing and "heavy courtship" overlap.

However, if you can "chase smart", then your odds go up by a lot.

Let's see now a separate example, but very much related.

When I was green and inexperienced, a girl I was seeing moved out of the city.
And, as it's often the case for inexperienced guys with not so many options, it was only then I realized how much I needed and wanted her.

Problem is, she had started dating a new guy in the new city.
I fell apart, but resolved to do all I could to "get her back".
And… I chased like a b*tch.
Texting, sending songs, pictures, reminding her how well we got along… The whole spiel, and more.

If she had been dating a super cool guy, probably it wouldn't have worked.

But since the new guy wasn't so cool and my ex was the type of girl who very much prefers relationships, the "heavy courtship type" -the smarter version of "chasing guy"- isn't as damaging because it sub-communicates "relationship and high-investment" -yes, betas fuck too, sometimes-.

Of course this isn't the best position you can find yourself in, we all know that -albeit you can improve the odds if you chase smart, of course-.
And I may even discourage guys today from going for it.
HOWEVER, for me back in the day, with few options, facing huge hurdles in dating, and a still fresh ex I liked and wanted, it was the best possible course of action.

What should have I done, "maintain my dignity" and protect my ego but remain single and celibate, when I didn't want to stay single?
I'm so glad I didn't do that and it was all a great learning experience.

So… It made sense to chase.

Result: we got back together.
And, with time, I also re-acquired lots of power -till one day she even said "you're the leader in the relationship, albeit I didn't necessarily thought so-.

Example 3: Alpha Male Loses to Non-Alpha Player

Alpha Male Strategies discourages cold approaching because "alpha males don't cold approach".

AMS is actually a solid coach, but that "alpha male way of dating" does NOT maximize your odds of success.

So, for this example… Storytime!

I was at a social event.
Upstairs there was only me and another guy left.
He was one of the most stereotypical "alpha male types" I'd ever met. A former marine with combat experience in Iraq, he seemed to follow the "alpha male strategy" to a T.

He'd mostly wait for people to talk to him first or bring him into the conversation.
When he spoke, he spoke slowly and deeply. He'd flout social conventions and live by his own rules when he'd pour his own wine from his bag because the house wine was bad -on that one, he was right-.
And heaped a ton of social pressure on others when he'd stare without talking or blinking, and put pressure on them to speak first.

Well, that night there was me and he left.
I liked the guy and we got to talk quite a bit -we even exchanged some Facebook comments from time to time-.

There was also a group of three women downstairs though.
They were all by themselves.

So when I went to the bathroom downstairs I approached their table socially, talked a bit, teased them lightly, laughed with them… And then invited them upstairs.
They gladly followed me and joined me and the alpha type.

Notice already that the "alpha type" would have walked by and minded his own business -and yes, that may have been higher power, in a way, but it was also not very effective if one seeks dating opportunities-.

Once upstairs, the girl I was interested in sat next to me and we talked to each other.
The two of us got so engaged in our conversation that I almost felt it was weird -I had meant it to make it more "social", but us two just got so deep that we ignored everyone else-.
But what made it really weirder was that the alpha male type wasn't doing anything to converse with the other two.
So it was me and the girl next to me engaged in deep conversation, and these other three across the table who sat with long and endless silences.

By the time the girls left, I had agreed on a date with the girl next to me and we exchanged contacts -and we met some days later-.
The alpha type asked to exchange contact with another girl in the group right before they left -poor timing-.

Notice how different the dynamics: me and the girl next to me exchanged contacts within the frame that we liked each other and we will meet again -the contact was to arrange the logistics-. She had also invested a lot in the interaction and opened up about herself.

The alpha male type exchanged contact within the frame that the two of them had no affinity for each other.
Funny enough, ultimately, he chased.
He chased because the girl never invested, and he never qualified the girl.
Sure, she may be interested in him anyway if she found him attractive -or if she's into the silent and dominant types-. But that's not how you should think, because if he was attractive PLUS made it a nice experience, he'd be dating far more effectively.

And of course, he wouldn't have even had that slim chance if there wasn't someone -me- who made the approach first.

In brief, the high-power alpha type is best at gaining respect from men but it's not nearly as effective for your dating life.
In fresh and transitory group socialization, a mixture of higher-energy (without overdoing it!), higher investment, and higher warmth will do a lot better.

When Alpha Game Works

The alpha male game works best in:

- Stable and longer-term social groups
- Groups with lots of men and fewer men

That's because, in stable social groups, alpha males gain high status and become some of the highest prized men -plus, they become a "known entity", and don't even need to be warmer in the beginning-.

Women are then far more likely to take the initiative -even if the alpha male broods, talk little, or seems mostly interested in his own life or mission-.

It's also effective against other men within the same group since lower-status men tend to consider the most attractive women as "for the alphas" (men who focus on fighting and size to get girls get it wrong because they focus on intimidating men, rather than getting girls).

These environments include anything that resembles social-circle dynamics, including:

- High school
- Small colleges -NOT big ones!-
- Workplaces
- Periodically meeting clubs / gatherings (at least once a week)
- Gangs (but remember: there are few if any attractive women in violent groups)

For example, in high school, I carved a reputation as a rebel-type.
Not an alpha by any means, but still "cool enough" to earn some status, reputation, and a "cool factor vibe".
Even without approaching, I had enough status and attention to receive several bids and advances from women.

HOWEVER…

That actually ill-prepared me for life after high school.

When I moved to a big city and huge college, even though at first I was even more rebel, that didn't work anymore -not one bit-.

The alpha male game is much similar.
Nobody will chase you in a big, transient, and anonymous city just because you're "chasing your mission", spreading out when you sit, or thinking of yourself as an "alpha".

SUMMARY

Alpha males are most certainly attractive, and it's one of the most universally attractive seduction archetypes.

Most typical "alpha male traits" such as confidence, status, and even physical strengths are attractive. It's the alpha male game that isn't always the most effective
The alpha male approach to dating is 100x better than low-power, "too nice guys" and "beta males".

So if you still need to get your power, charisma, personality, and self-confidence in order, then, by all means, do work on that first -and this article may not be for you just yet-.

However, at a certain point, the alpha male approach hits a ceiling, and to do better, you need to bend it, refine it, and sometimes even ditch it.

In the end, the alpha male approach is good.
But the strategic, "maximize your odds" approach always beats any other system and "rule".
And the strategic approach has no rules and no labels to uphold.
It does what's best to achieve your goals, no matter whether it's "alpha", "beta", or anything in between.

Use This One-Liner When Someone Disrespects You

Lucio Buffalmano · 17 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

When someone disrespects you, many struggle to find the right words to respond, losing status, respect, and even attraction in the process.

Without a quick comeback to enforce boundaries, you risk being pushed down socially.

This article teaches you a simple, universal line to handle any disrespectful behavior and reclaim your power.

INTRO

The dictionary of power dynamics defines a power move as:

> A power move is anything that affects the power dynamics of an interaction.

Generally speaking, you want to limit your own power moves on others. Too many power moves to other people's detriment mean you're being a taker -and an asshole-. And while "being a good asshole" sometimes is necessary in life, as for everything: balance.

It's just a poor life approach because what happens when you disempower the people around you is that the high-value, power-aware and smart people leave -of course-, and you're left with only the clueless, low-value people. In brief, the great people leave, the idiots stay.

You must address disrespectful behavior

OK, you don't want to be the ass*hole, we got that.

However, you sure as hell also don't want to be the sucker who's the victim of as*holes and other people's disrespect.

Being the victim without re-empowering yourself means that you get pushed down lower and lower in society -and in life-.

And we don't want that.

So to avoid being relegated to the bottom of society, you need to defend yourself, set boundaries, and demand respect and fair behavior.

Problem: answering appropriately to disrespect is difficult

Now the problem is this:

Many people struggle to even see power dynamics and disrespectful behavior. Luckily, this website -and Power University– come to the rescue.

The second problem is that many folks, either too submissive, too "nice", too passive, or simply not socially skilled enough, struggle to respond to disrespect.

To counter-attack you need to know you're under attack, know how to counter-attack, and have the resolve to counter-attack

Responding appropriately can indeed be challenging -Power University also addressed that-. We had many articles on effective responses to specific forms of disrespect -or to classes of power moves-, including:

- Responding to micro-aggressions
- Responding to covert disrespect
- What to do when someone makes you wait
- What to do when your partner threatens to break up
- Responding to overpowering handshakes
- … A whole bunch of real-life case studies

That may seem like a lot to learn. Luckily though, it's more about understanding the underlying principles of self-defense, than learning to deal with every single situation.

Power University helps you learn and internalize those principles and foundations.

And the second approach is what we're discussing here. Such as: learn a single stock response that you can use with the vast majority of disrespectful behaviors.

Solution: an easy stock response

In Power University we shared the foundational, high-level strategies for frame control.

Step 2 was:

- Use an observational statement to gain time, collect yourself, and display level-headedness, and add matching body language (for example, corrugating eyebrows as if to say "what the fu*k was that").

The great news is:

This can be a fantastic self-defense stock answer in and on its own, even without anything else.

So let's learn now how you can use one single observational sentence for any disrespect you may face:

The Universal Meta-Comment

The simple format is:

1. "That's"
2. "A (weird / unfriendly / aggressive) thing to
3. "Do / say / ask"

That's it.

Then, optional, you may add or reinforce with:

4. "To a (friend / partner / customer / someone you've just met)": this part adds more "punch" and power to your answer because it thread expands and adds more details of why it's particularly weird / unfriendly / aggressive given the situation. It often leverages the power of vulnerability which you can also further expand. For example, if you say "it's an aggressive thing to say to a neighbor who's been nothing but friendly" you shame them by comparing your win-win behavior with their lose-win

- “As a (goodbye / first question / first meeting) same as above, but instead of adding a detail about you, it adds a detail about the context and setting.

5. “It’s as if”… Make a comparison to better explain why it was weird. This further thread expands and surfaces the nastiness, plus allows you to hit back through your example. For example, with “how much you make” you may say “it’s as if I asked you “how many men you slept with (what kind of a question is that, it’s very personal)”. Or to answer the covert racism you’d say “it’s as if I said the German guy is being a nazi as usual (that’s just inappropriate, besides being wrong and just nasty)”

You can slightly modify it to increase the power/dominance or the warmth, and to better tailor to the situation. For example, if you preface it with “I feel”, it’s lower power -less judge role- but also more difficult to deny since you’re sharing your feelings.

Note on using “weird”

“Weird” is a good all-season workhorse.

It works well with any covert disrespect or anything you’re not sure about since it basically means that whatever someone did or said was “off” -so good for any time you’re not sure- or “not straight” -good for any turkey-like power move-.

It’s a word we generally encourage you to avoid outside of self-defense because it’s a nasty judge power move and implies that one “does not belong”, that he’s not “good enough”, and not even “normal enough”. It’s not straight and eagle-like.

However, for self-defense, everything can be fair game.

How It Looks Like

Some examples of what it looks like:

Personal question you don’t want to reply to

> Him: how much do you make You: that’s a weird thing to ask

Random covertly aggressive request

> Him: (…) and don’t keep doing X as you usually do You: that’s an aggressive way of asking for something

Random covert racism / one-up

> Him: the Italian guy is late as usual You: that’s a racist thing to say “Racist” is a strong word that’s often used by virtue signalers and social just warrior for their BS covert-power move “support” and cancel-culture attacks.

So, generally speaking, you want to avoid it in order to be more eagle-like.

However, you can use it strategically to deliver a strong jolt and/or to push someone on the defensive. Otherwise, you can just say “that’s a big generalization to make”.

Covert aggression masked as humor

> Him: good to see our friend here, he only comes out when there is a free lunch You: that’s a nasty joke to > make to a friend

Covert request & complaint

Now we get into the real-life case study that sparked the birth of this technique.

I was at a neighbor's place, and we had a very pleasant evening.

Among many other topics, my neighbor told us of someone in the building doing housework late at night. Nobody knew for sure who it was, but my (very high-power) neighbor had the property management send out a high-power letter demanding to stop (or else), and the noises stopped right away.

Keep in mind that nobody ever said -or even implied- it might have been anyone present -least of all me-. Logically, I should not have even been a suspect since I live in a different building, and I had just come back from abroad.

But still, her comment as we bid farewell seemed to frame me as that "guilty" and "antisocial" neighbor who kept others awake:

> Her: (by the door while bidding farewell) and please stop doing house repair at 1 am

I wasn't even sure if it was a bad joke, a disrespectful power move, or an actual request from someone who didn't have the courage to speak clearly and assertively.

And I was at a loss for words.

Loss for words? Enter our universal solution.

In that case, our universal "meta catch-all" technique would have been perfect:

> Her: (by the door while bidding farewell) and please stop doing house repair at 1 am You: that's a weird thing to say as a goodbye

Why It Works

The universal comment:

- Keeps it brief and sweet, one single sentence, and very low-effort. It abides the foundational "law of least effort"
- Goes "meta", such as, it comments and expands on the disrespect itself rather than simply responding to it (albeit it falls short of explaining why it's disempowering and nasty and why you do not accept it, and hence it's only a first step of a "meta" technique. But it's often enough for everyone present to understand the nastiness by themselves, even if only unconsciously).
- Frame expands and draws attention to the nastiness (surfacing), it draws attention to the nastiness of their disrespectful behavior. A technique we call "surfacing" (the nastiness)
- Re-empowers you and draws your boundaries displaying power awareness and your expectations for fair and respectful behavior. In all its brevity, it sub-communicates "I got your disrespect, and don't appreciate"

Why It's Universal

This universal retort is NOT perfect.

It may even be far from perfect.

Surprised to hear that? Well, that's exactly why it's universal.

It's not specialized in anything. But it's "good enough" on all terrains:

SUVs are not the most performing for paved roads, not the grippiest for off-roads, and not the plushest for long-distance driving. But they're at least "good enough" in all of them

Its "non-perfection" is the natural price to pay for the universality. The perfect -or best- courses of action are always context-dependent, so there cannot be a universal retort that is perfect.

HOWEVER…

This stock answer reaches at least "good enough" level in a large array of situations.

That's what makes it universal.

It's a good balance of:

- Enough power for self-defense and maintaining status, reputation, and respect: it's good or very good for green and yellow-level disrespectful behaviors. However, if it was a red-level disrespect, this stock answer may be "underpowered". But one, you can tweak it with body language and tonality to increase its dominance. And two, it's still enough to send the message that you're not totally passive, that you can read power dynamics, and that you're not OK with being disempowered.
- Enough warmth to avoid going overboard and looking too aggressive or touchy: even if the original comment was not an actual disrespect and you misread the situation, this answer doesn't go overboard to the point that you may harm relationships or look too clueless or aggressive yourself

So it's an in-between sweet spot of power/warmth. Yes, it may not be perfect, and if you can be more accurate and effective, absolutely go for whatever else is more appropriate.

However, perfection is not required and something is always better than nothing.

So whenever you're at a loss for words, at worst, this solution is "good enough". And it may also be your perfect starting response before you reach a more advanced level -a level where you can better adapt to the context and to your goals-.

And speaking of beginners, this may be even an even easier first step for some:

Technique 2: Universal Deferral For Beginners

The issue for beginners is:

1. Lack of power awareness: if you start from low-ish power awareness, chances are you may not even spot all dangerous disrespectful behaviors.
2. Lack of personal power: you may not yet be assertive enough to quickly and resolutely enforce boundaries, so you may let all disrespect slip -and damage you- completely unchecked.

However, for #1 you may still have an initial "gut reaction". So a word, an action, or a question may just feel "off", or "weird".

And for #2, you may have enough willpower and resolve to say something, if it was just "easy enough".

The simplest step may be to simply note something was off, and you're not sure about it.

A deferring comment that sub-communicates "that was off, I registered it, and will think about it". It's a very low-intensity way of saying that "I noticed, and put you on notice".

Here's how to do it:

> You: That sounds off, I'm not sure how I feel about that

Honest and straight.

You can say that with an inquisitive look, or even while looking away.

Some other formats:

> You: That remark felt aggressive, I'll need to think about that

> You: I'm not yet sure what it was, but something about your joke feels not cool, I'll have to think about it

It's possible they will prod you to detail and share more about what was off. In which case, you had a few more precious seconds to think it over. If it's clear to you how to articulate it, say it. If you're still unsure, simply repeat it felt off, and you need more time to think what it was.

The great thing about this approach is that you give leave for yourself the option -and the power- to go back to the disrespectful person and raise the issue later on. Such as, you give yourself the option to enforce boundaries at any point in the future.

For example:

> You: I don't know man, it's not something I would say/do, and not something that a friend would say. I need to think about it more

You can even ask the disrespectful person what they think about it, for example:

> You: I don't know, it doesn't feel something like a friend or someone with your best interest in mind would say. Don't you think?

And with that, you'll gain even more intel on them. Will they deny, will they confirm and uncover their own attack? Or will they repent and apologize? This is all great intel to assess people.

The Gifts of Imperfection: Summary & Review

Full Summary

About The Author:
Brene Brown is a research professor at the University of Houston. She has been researching topics of shame, vulnerability, and emotional connections.
Brown has become very popular in the media and is also the author of "Daring Greatly".

Live Wholeheartedly

A central theme of The Gifts of Imperfection is that of “wholehearted living”.

What does that mean?
Well, wholehearted living means accepting yourself, your emotional needs, and your imperfections, while also accepting and satisfying your wants and needs.
And to stop demanding perfection and adherance to social standards that make you worse off.

Here are a few DOs and DON’Ts.

DOs:

- Feeling worthy (you have enough now)
- Resting and playing
- Be authentic
- Love
- Trust
- Gratitude
- Joy

DON’Ts

- Perfectionism
- Numbing
- Exhaustion
- Be cool
- Fitting in
- Judging
- Scarcity
- Self-sufficiency

Living A Life of Authenticity

Brene Brown says that most of us would love to live a life true to who we are.

What stands in the way is the pressure to conform.
But conforming means giving up who we really are, we feel inauthentic and too weak to live honestly.

The author says that authenticity is a choice, and on some days we’ll have more strength to be more authentic than others.

If you want to have more and more days in which you are authentic, you need courage and compassion.

Being authentic means writing your own story

Develop Courage & Compassion

Courage and compassion are the way to authenticity.

Courage to speak your mind and allow yourself to be vulnerable in front of others.

For example, if you really want something to happen, don’t pretend and say it’s really no big deal when it actually is a big deal for you.

Compassion means realizing that you are not alone, and that everyone struggles exactly the way you do.

By relating to the struggles of others, you also acknowledge your own, and it will become easier to open and find support.

Drop Perfectionism

Brene Brown says that perfectionism is a shield revolving around the fear of shame.

Perfectionists strive for perfection behind the assumption that if they can only be perfect, then they will avoid any shame and criticism.

Perfectionism is addictive and can lead to paralysis. People are so afraid of criticism that they keep working -or telling themselves they're working- behind the curtains, and never really showing up.

What's the solution?

Brene has two suggestions:

1. Be honest about your fear
2. Remind yourself you do it for yourself, not for others

My Note:
It's a generalization to say that perfectionism (always) revolves around shame.
Perfectionism can also happen when we are stuck in a child role and still trying to impress our parents to get the love we never had (also read "Will I Ever be Enough").
Or it can be the natural consequence of simple genetic makeup, and of hyperdrive personalities.

Develop Resilience

The author says that hope underpins resilience.

You can learn hope by practicing it.

To move closer to your goals, make smaller goals that you can reach along the way, and take it little by little.

As you develop positive habits, it will then become natural.

For more on resilience, also read:

- Grit by Angela Duckworth.

Develop Gratitude

Many think that gratitude is a feeling that follows a positive experience.

But Brene Brown says it's the opposite. Gratitude is something we practice and that will make our life happier.

Gratitude gives us the power to choose joy and feel joyful whenever we want.

I particularly like how Brene defines gratitude in the daily small joys of life.

Practicing gratitude means feeling glad for a walk back home on a sunny day, sharing a meal with your partner or tucking your child into bed.

Embrace Intuition

Brene Brown says that intuition and rationality are not mutually exclusive.

Intuition is nothing but our brain scanning for past reference points and coming up with a quick response. It's not a perfect response and leaves some room for doubt, but you should be comfortable embracing doubt.

Embracing intuition means taking action in the face of uncertainty

My note:
Intuition works best when you're an expert in a given field. If you have an intuition about the next winning lottery ticket, now that might be irrational.

Stop Comparing Yourself to Others

Comparing is natural, but that doesn't mean it's good.

It's often through comparison indeed that we conform to others, and in so doing, we lose all that makes us special.

Let go of comparison instead and embrace your individuality.

Find Play Time & Rest

Brene Brown says that western society ties self-worth to productivity.

And that's not healthy.

It's not healthy because in order to be productive we will sacrifice rest, play time and our general well-being.

But work and play time are not opposites!
The opposite of playtime, says Brene, is actually depression.

Playtime for Brene, is time spent without a strongly defined goal, and we are biologically programmed to have it.

If we forcefully remove it, we pay the price with our happiness and general well-being.

Identify Your Talents

Brene Brown says we all have unique talents and gifts and we should embrace it.

Our gifts will not always be easy to monetize, but the author encourages us to use them anyway.

It will make our lives so much more joyful and meaningful.

Laugh, Sing & Dance

The best way to connect with others is with laughing, singing and dancing.

And to do so, you have to learn to let yourself go.

And again, that requires vulnerability.

As a matter of fact, we have probably felt a bit self-conscious sometimes when we laughed a bit too hard (or when we were the first on the dance floor).

Don't be afraid and let yourself go: it's OK to be uncool.

Real-Life Applications

Some real-life tips from The Gifts of Imperfections include:

- Drop Being Cool

Brene Brown says there's much pressure in our social media society to look cool.
Here at TPM of course we don't necessarily agree because "being cool" also has life advantages, so it really depends on what your goals are.

- Don't Trade Authenticity for Safety

Fitting in and might feel safer.
But you pay a psychological price if you're forcing yourself to be someone else, and you may lose the opportunity to "find your own voice", as we say here on TPM.

It takes courage to find your own path, but it's often worth it.

CONS

I find a few common issues in Brene Brown's work.

Some of them are:

Misses The Root Causes: Ignores Evolutionary Psychology, Confuses "Socialization" With Inborn Human Drives

Brene seems to "blame" many ills to socialization.

And, often, to "Wester society".

However, kids don't want to be cool just because of socialization, or culture.

Kids want to be cool because cool kids are popular, successful with others, and in dating.

Also, productivity isn't so much a Western curse.

Productivity is how you succeed in life.
So any driven man or woman who wants to succeed is bound to seek productivity.

And the will to advance is inborn and inherent to human nature, it's not about "socialization".

Also read:

- The Blank Slate, which dismantles that old "Standard Social Science Model"

Short-Term Feel-Good Effect Rather Than Solution

Because Brene misreads the causes of her own selected ills, she also misses on the "cures" (provided, of course, that one should even necessarily "cure" those ills, which is not always the case).

That Brene wakes up one day and feels drained and finds her own personal success telling everyone else to "stop seeking productivity" isn't going to "cure" that.

So, to me, The Gifts of Imperfection offers more a short-lived feel-good effect, than a true solution.

Felt Unscientific, With Several Unsubstuntiated And Dubious Claims

Brene introduces herself as a researcher.

Yet, I haven't seen many references and several of her claims feel like personal opinions.

For example, who says that perfectionism is driven by shame, or that resilience is driven by hope?

Because I would have really liked to see the research that backs those claims.
In the absence of that, I personally don't think that's necessarily the case.
One can willpower himself into resilience even while he knows that the odds of success are not that high.

Audience of Non-Achievers? It's Possible To Both Be Grateful AND Pursue Big Goals

Brene's writing seems to condense to:

Chill a bit more, accept yourself more instead of pushing yourself, and prioritize social relationships and emotional needs over "results".

And to a lot of people, that can make sense.

On the other hand, Brene's advice seems to reject the "achiever" approach, and that's an issue because there is really no one-size-fits-all in life and what's best for you really all depends on what you want.
Brene's approach does not work for those who want to achieve big, and who prioritize their life mission.
Or for those who are a bit less "touchy-feely".

But there can be a happy middle ground, too.

I believe you can do both: being grateful and happy with what you have while still wanting to achieve a lot more.
And that was missing in Brene's work.

Review

The Gifts of Imperfection is a good book for a very specific audience.

Brene Brown writes books that appeal a lot to women, and less to driven men and goal-oriented folks.

It's not a coincidence, since Brene's work sometimes feels like looking down on personal achievement while prioritizing emotional needs, contentment, inner peace, and "happiness".

Nothing wrong with that, of course, albeit I prefer an approach that provides an overview and the pros and cons of any approach to life, rather than a one-size-fits-all prescription of "what's better for you".

When it comes to Brene's beloved "vulnerability", I highly recommend this article:

- Vulnerability is NOT power

> Vulnerability Is NOT Power: Don't Believe The Hype

Still a good book, though.
I would probably pick The Gifts of Imperfection over Daring Greatly, albeit the latter has a better overview and more psychological depth.

The Assertive Strategist's Guide to Saying "No" (Without Guilt or Losing Social Capital)

Lucio Buffalmano · 3 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Saying "no" feels simple—but for many men, it's the hardest word to say.
We worry about sounding rude, losing respect, or disappointing others.

The truth? You can say no politely, firmly, and even in ways that strengthen relationships.

In this article, I'll show you 5 proven techniques to say no respectfully—so you protect your time, set boundaries, and maintain high social value without guilt.

From most basic to more strategic:

  - Unexpected Requests: The Most Challenging
- Mindsets To Say "No"

- Summary

1. Say “No” As Default: For Strangers & Learning

Simple. Just not always easy

In an old classic Italian movie, a father teaches his son how to be a Machiavellian.

He says:

> You never say yes, remember that.
> A “yes” shackles you, and a “no” frees you

If you struggle with too much naivete or exaggerated “niceness”, this is actually a good Machiavellian belief to internalize.

It doesn’t mean it’s always true or you always say “no” of course, but it’s true in a surprising number of cases.
And the dynamic of “getting mired in someone else’s problems” VS “remaining free” are also often true -especially when you’re dealing with strangers, ungrateful takers who never give back, or people who are always in trouble-.

This approach tends to be most effective with:

1. Random askers you don’t even know because random people asking for stuff are rarely going to give you value.
   So 90% of the time saying “no” to strangers is the safest and best option.
2. Beginners working on their power/dominance: if you’re very uncomfortable with strong “no”, then it may be good to force yourself to deliver strong “nos” just to get used to it, and grow comfortable with it.

Of course, remember that as much as you can always say “no”, you can always change your mind.
So after you say “no”, you’re free to mull it over or observe from afar, and eventually go back and learn more.

1.2. Remain Noncommittal As Default

You say:

> You: I'm not sure how feel about that

And you say it while taking no action.

This is a subtle power move.
What this does is that it puts the onus on them to convince you and/or to provide more reasons why you should do anything.

Of course some of the "salesy" types will see your honest incertitude as an opportunity to insist, cajole, and "find a way in".
If they get pushy, we recommend that you default to "no" until you have more time to think it over -or until you end the interaction and never see them again-.

Here's what it looks like:

> You: I'm not sure how I feel about that. I need more time to think about it

Then let them conclude that it's a "no for now".

If they insist:

> You: Whenever I'm not sure, I don't want to perform any action or commit to anything. I need more time to think about it

Then stick to your guns and "hold frame", for example with the broken record technique.

This format is also good as a first baby step for those who need to work on their assertiveness.

1.3. "Not Now", "Let Me Think" & Future Deferral As Default

John correctly says you can take time to think by simply saying:

1. Let me think
2. I'm thinking (and think on the spot)
3. I'll think about it and I'll let you know

We called it "default deferral", and it's basically a "momentary no".

Often, it may turn out to be a "no for good", but you can sometimes still keep the door open and change your mind later.

Deferral doesn't necessarily mean you "need to think about it".
It can also mean that "you don't feel like doing it right now".

For example:

> You: Thanks, it's not something like I feel doing right now

Or:

> You: Thanks, right now I prefer not to

Or simplest of them all:

> You: Thanks, not now

2. “Thank You, I’m Good”: The Strategic Way of Refusing

On TPM we introduced the “high-power/high-warmth” approach to socialization.

And you can apply the same principle to say no to people, and reject any request.

For example:

> You: Thanks, all good

Or:

> You: Thank you, I’m good here

See?

It’s simple, but it’s a big change.

The implied frame is not that they were bothering, but that they were offering help.
So your rejection power-protects them and saves their face since they’re not framed as annoying takers, but as potential givers.
That increases warmth, better preserves social capital, and lowers the chances of making unnecessary enemies.

Or lower warmth and higher power:

> You: Nah, thanks

This technique is similar to the “thank you for not doing X” approach to requests.
An approach that is both power protecting, higher warmth, and more collaborative. Albeit I couldn’t find any study on the effectiveness of this format, odds are good that it’s also more effective by avoiding rule-breaking out of “power-reaffirming” rebelliousness:

Good power-protecting reframe from forbidding to uplifting

This approach to saying no to others “softens the blow of the rejection”, and makes it easier BOTH for the speaker, and the receiver.

Whenever appropriate, we recommend it as your default way of saying no to others.

3. Say Yes To Your Other Priorities (“Positive No”)

William Ury shared this great technique in The Power of a Positive No.

And, in simple terms, it works like this:

You say “yes” to something else, and (indirectly) reject their request to prioritize your “yes”.
With this approach, you may even not say “no” but instead just say that you’re too occupied with your priorities.

William Ury says that the process is about “uncovering your yeses” to empower your “nos”.

Generally speaking, it’s an effective approach.
So whenever you can eschew something with a “yes” to something else, go for it.

The only issue with Ury’s “uncover your yes” approach is that it feels like some deep soul-searching “yes” you need to uncover.
Something like life missions, dreams, or your true life priorities.

However, you won’t always be able to, say, deny a simple request with some big “yes”.
For example, you can’t deny a request to lend $10 because your life goal is to become an astronaut.

Enter the Machiavellian and perfunctory yeses:

⍰ Strategic Bent: Make Up Other Yeses

This technique can be an ethical grey area.

But if it preserves a relationship or saves people's face, it's fair.

How does it work?

You make up a valid-sounding reason, a made-up "yes", to justify your no.

For example, the Machiavellian father in our first example was annoyed that the school teachers were asking for charitable donations.
But instead of instructing his son to say "no", he tells him to say that their family is already donating to charity.
That's his "made-up yes" to maintain rapport and status with his "no".

If you do it well, it may even improve relationships and status.
It's like saying "thank you, I appreciate your idea and we're a lot similar actually because we're already doing the same as well".

Another good example is the "imaginary boyfriend":

> Guy: May I have your number?
> Girl: Yeah, if I were single, gladly. But I'm already seeing someone and I'm a faithful person <—- She effectively deflects his proposal and makes him value her more. A potentially ally in the making

Albeit the imaginary boyfriend is not uncommon, I'm surprised that not more women go for it.

The "Yes To Your Lone Time" Technique

To say "no", respect yourself and your preferences first. Then say them aloud

As we mentioned earlier, the original approach to "uncovering your yes" seems to look for something "deep".

However, sometimes there's really nothing deep to say "yes" to, but you may still want to say "no".

And if you try to sound deep, it feels stilted and fake.
Plus, you'd be lying.
We don't want that: it's generally best to be as straight as possible, and close as possible to the truth.

After all, it's still your right to say no, even if you're sitting or leaning against a wall doing a big nothing.

So some simpler ways of using this technique are to embrace your "doing nothing important" and saying "yes" to your:

- Chill time
- Lone time
- Monk mode time
- "Not wanting to be bothered" time

For example:

> Him: can you please take our picture?
> You: (shaking head) Sorry man, I'm really looking for some lone time

Or:

> Him: I feel like a beer but there's nobody, can you come out with me please?
> You: I do want to catch up with you, but I can't tonight. I'm really needing a break and rest with some lone time. But happy to do another time mate

Add this to your mindsets:

"It's my right to be out and out, and still not wanting to engage with any other person"

All these techniques are solid.

They work well for simple requests and people you may not know.
Random folks, sales reps, random hustlers, etc.

But with more complex requests and closer relationships, be more strategic.

For example, you may want to:

1. Avoid straight "nos" to prevent the loss of social capital -or looking antisocial at work
2. Assess requests and requestors
3. See if you can find a win-win solution
4. See if you can find lower-cost alternatives
5. Etc. Etc.

So our next techniques:

4. Ask More Questions: Make Them Invest & Gather Intel

The more questions, the more time to think it over

For example:

> Him: Hi there, we're working at your neighbor's place and cut off his power. Can I charge a tool here?
> You: Hi, who are you, an employee doing the work?
> Him: Yeah, I work for the remodeling company, Jim hired us to change his flat's layout
> You: What kind of tool is it? Like a phone?
> Him: It's a circular saw
> You: Hmm, sounds like a powerful machine. And for how long do you need to charge it?
> Him: Maybe 2hours
> (by now you start developing a better idea whether you can do it or not, plus, you get time to think)
> You: So you'd leave it here and then come back in 2 hours to pick up?
> Him: Yeah

Now you have enough information to decide whether it's something you can, or cannot do.
And if you decide for a "no", you can justify it:

> You: OK. Look man, don't wanna sound like a dick and I love my neighbor.
> If it was A quick thing, happy to help. But this morning I've got some meeting calls and don't want to be rang while I'm in the middle of one.
> But there's the other next door neighbor, his name is Max, go there and I can even text him before you get there
> <—- the "propose an alternative solution"

Then, to better preserve social capital with your neighbor, you can even contact him and explain why you had to say "no", what you did to help, and say you hope it's all good with his house repairs.

How much better is that than a "yes" that shackles you, or a "default no" that leaves everyone worse off?

The other advantage of asking questions is that it's also higher power.

No matter whether you say "yes" or "no", the sub-communication is that you're the type of guy who goes to the bottom of things. Your "yeses" mean something, they're not just low-power "too nice guy who can't say no" type of "yeses".
And your "nos" are justified -there are reasons behind them-.
Plus, you make people invest more as they explain to you, so you also don't lose power to random people who ask for stuff.

So I'd make this my go-to approach.

These are the steps:

1. Preframe yourself as busy and your help as exceptional, so that you have a good reason to refuse if you refuse, and you get proper credit if you help
2. Ask questions to decide whether you can help, or not
3. Communicate your decision
    1. Offer a "why no" if you say no
    2. Offer alternatives if possible
    3. Wish them well

5. Tell Them to Tell You More: Switching The Power Tables

Similar to the above, but lower investment, and higher power.

It's very good with strangers or in more business-like settings.

The trap many people fall into when they receive any request is that they put the onus of everything upon themselves -they need to decide, they need to be fast, and they're in a double bind whether they say "yes" or "no"-. Don't fall for that trap because the onus is always on the asker, and they need to put in more effort and convince you.

If anyone proposes you something, it means there is something in it for them already.
So now it's their task to explain what's in it for you.

Similar to what Kevin originally suggests:

> Colleague: Can you help me with the TBS report?
> You: I got something on my plate already <—- Strategic plasible deniability in case you want to say no. But if you say yes, your colleague properly values and appreciates your help > but tell me more about it

That nudges them to convince you. And it's easier for you to control the frame, let them down easily, or find alternative solutions.

Or:

> Police officer: can you please step outside the vehicle for questioning?
> You: I have some places to go actually. Is there a reason why I must comply?

Another honest and vulnerable, yet powerful option I like:

> You: Should this be a good thing for me?

That's good direct exchange talk and properly turns the power tables.
It frames the interaction as them approaching you, and them wanting something from you. And because of that, they also must provide your "what's in it for me".
And if they don't, they're being takers. Which makes it easier -and less costly- for you to say "no".

If you want to sound more inclusive, you can even add "is this a good thing for me or for the world".
However, careful with that because it opens the doors to potential manipulation.

Why Strategy Matters Saying "No"

Evolution isn't stupid.

And if so many people find it challenging to reject others, there probably is a reason why.

And the reason is that, contrary to what many online guides say, rejecting others can cost you.

That's why we learned to:

1. Empower yourself to reject others, because it's a must to at least be comfortable in rejecting others
2. Say "no" effectively, minimizing the costs on you and them
3. Strategically decide when to say "no" and when to say "yes"

Unexpected Requests: The Most Challenging

The most challenging requests are unexpected ones.

Unexpected requests range from:

- Colleague asks you on a date (see "how to say no to a date")
- A friend calls you asking to watch his dog while he's away
- Random folk knock at your door asking for charitable donations
- Random people in the street ask you for help

Let's now move to the mindsets.

Mindsets To Say "No"

The most important step is always mental empowerment and self-development.

And the fundamental mindsets to say no to people are:

1. "I can always say "no": internalize this as your fundamental birthright
2. "I can take as long as I need to decide": internalize it to ponder requests and opportunities, including what's in it for you, without giving in to pushy folks
3. "If they're offended, disappointed, or angry, it's their problem, not mine": internalize this to remove your sense of guilt for your "no".
   It's important self-protection against those who try to change your decision (manipulators, guilt-tripper, judge power moves, and aggressive people)

I also recommend you read:

- How to be a good ass*ole: good for too good men and people pleasers

Summary

1. Take pressure off yourself
   - You can say no or take time
   - Put that pressure on them

2. Pre-frame yourself as busy and scarce, and your help exceptional and valuable
3. Ask questions to gain intel and time
4. If you need time, say you're thinking and/or that you will need more time on your own
5. Justify your 'no' it's a close person to preserve rapport

FULL SUMMARY

About The Author: Josh Kaufman is the author of three bestselling books. His research focuses on business, entrepreneurship, skill acquisition, productivity, creativity, applied psychology, and practical wisdom.

Introduction

You don't need to go to business school to start a successful business or grow a career in business.

You only need common sense, knowledge of simple math, and an understanding of a small set of important business principles/concepts that provide most of the value.

#1. What makes a successful business?

Kaufman's definition is that every successful business (1) creates or provides something of value that (2) other people want or need (3) at a price they're willing to pay in a way that (4) satisfies the purchaser's needs and expectations and (5) provides the business sufficient revenue to make it worthwhile for the owners to continue operation.

#2. To learn business, learn business skills too (not just management and leadership skills)

Many business schools only teach management and leadership skills believing that that's the same as business skills.

They're not.

Without business skills, you can organize/manage and lead a group of people to poor outcomes.

Business is about the profitable creation and delivery of valuable offers to paying customers. Management and leadership are a means to that end.

So, to be effective in business, you must learn all three skills.

See the best leadership books here:

Chapter 1: Value Creation

#1. Use core human drives and status signals.

To make your value offering as appealing as possible, build it with the goal of connecting with as many of the five core human drives as possible and including status signals.

Examples of these core human drives in business:

1. The drive to acquire (the desire to obtain/collect physical objects and immaterial qualities like status, power, and influence): such as investment brokerages, and political consulting companies. (Companies that promise to make us wealthy, famous, or powerful connect to this drive.)
2. The drive to bond with others (the desire to feel valued and loved through relationships): such as restaurants, conferences, and dating services. (Companies that promise to make us attractive, well-liked, or highly regarded connect to this drive.)
3. The drive to learn (the desire to satisfy our curiosity): such as academic programs, book publishers, and training workshops. (Companies that promise to make us more knowledgeable or competent connect to this drive.)
4. The drive to defend (the desire to protect ourselves, loved ones, and property): such as home alarm system manufacturers, insurers, and martial arts training programs. (Companies that promise to keep us safe, eliminate a problem, or prevent bad things from happening connect to this drive.)
5. The drive to feel (the desire for new sensory stimuli, intense emotional experiences, pleasure, excitement, entertainment, and anticipation): such as movie theaters, arcades, concert promoters, and sports teams. (Companies that promise to give us pleasure, thrill us, or give us something to look forward to connect to this drive.)

Markets form to get these needs satisfied.

And, prospects consider how your product/service will affect their status before they buy, so include status signals as well.

#2. Evaluate the market before you build it.

> "Market research is the business equivalent of look before you leap." — Josh Kaufman

Here are the ten ways:

1. Urgency — how badly do people want or need this right now?
2. Market Size — How many people are actively purchasing things like this?
3. Pricing Potential — what is the highest average price a purchaser would be willing to spend for a solution?
4. Cost of Customer Acquisition — how easy is it to acquire a new customer? On average, how much will it cost to generate a sale, both in money and effort?
5. Cost of Value-Delivery — how much would it cost to create and deliver the value offered, both in money and effort?
6. Uniqueness of Offer — how unique is your offer versus competing offerings in the market, and how easy is it for potential competitors to copy you?
7. Speed to Market — how quickly can you create something to sell?
8. Up-Front Investment — how much will you have to invest before you're ready to sell?
9. Up-Sell Potential — are there related secondary offers that you could also present to purchasing customers?
10. Evergreen Potential — once the initial offer has been created, how much additional work will you have to put into it in order to continue selling?

If your idea checks off five or less of the ten points above, move on to a new idea.

If you get a 7.5 or more, you have a promising idea and can continue forward.

Anything between 5 and 7.5 can pay the bills, but likely won't become anything significant without a significant upfront investment of time, energy, and resources.

#3. Don't try to reinvent the wheel.

There are already 12 standard forms of value. Don't try to create a new one, create your value-offering based on one or more of the existing forms.

Here are the 12 forms:

1. Product – Create a single tangible item or entity, then sell and deliver it for more than what it cost to make.
2. Service – Provide help or assistance then charge a fee for the benefits rendered.
3. Shared Resource – Create a durable asset that can be used by many people, then charge for access.
4. Subscription – Offer a benefit on an ongoing basis, and charge a recurring fee.
5. Resale – Acquire an asset from a wholesaler, then sell that asset to a retail buyer at a higher price.
6. Lease – Acquire an asset, then allow another person to use that asset for a pre-defined amount of time in exchange for a fee.
7. Agency – Market and sell an asset or service you don't own on behalf of a third party, then collect a percentage of the transaction price as a fee.
8. Audience Aggregation – Get the attention of a group of people with certain characteristics, then sell access in the form of advertising to another business looking to reach that audience.
9. Loan – Lend a certain amount of money, then collect payments over a pre-defined period of time equal to the original loan plus a pre-defined interest rate.
10. Option – Offer the ability to take a pre-defined action for a fixed period of time in exchange for a fee.
11. Insurance – Take on the risk of some specific bad thing happening to the policyholder in exchange for a pre-defined series of payments, then pay out claims only when the bad thing actually happens.
12. Capital – Purchase an ownership stake in a business, then collect a corresponding portion of the profit as a one-time payout or ongoing dividend.

Once you know what form(s) of value you want to go for, you can start creating your "minimum viable offer" (MVO).

#4. Gather feedback and be ready to move on.

Get feedback and allow people the opportunity to purchase your value offering to see if they're only saying they'd buy it or if they'd actually do it.

Chapter 2: Marketing

It's almost impossible to make (or force) someone to want something they don't already desire because we only purchase what we already desire on some level.

So, to market your value offer effectively, discover what people already want and then present your offer in a way that intersects with that pre-existing desire.

> Kaufman: Your job isn't to convince people to want what you're offering. It's to help your prospects convince themselves that what you're offering will help them get what they (already) want.

#1. Levels of Awareness

To market effectively, you need attention.

Your approach to getting attention depends on how much your prospect already knows about their problem, potential solutions, and your offer (i.e. their "levels of awareness").

1. Unaware—the prospect is not aware of any need or desire for what you have to offer.
2. Problem awareness—the prospect knows they have a need or desire, but they aren't aware of any suitable solutions.
3. Solution awareness—the prospect knows that potential solutions exist, but they aren't aware of your specific offer.
4. Offer awareness—the prospect is aware of your offer, but they're not sure it's right for them.
5. Full awareness—the prospect is convinced your offer is a good solution to their need or desire, they just need to know the price and terms so they can decide whether or not to purchase.

Your objective with each prospect you market to is to move them to a higher level of awareness (where, at #5, they're most likely and ready to buy).

#2. Marketing Techniques and Strategies

Some include:

- Demonstrations: show prospects the value you offer so it's easier for them to believe in it (such as giving away free samples of your new secret sauce).
- Qualification: weed out the prospects who wouldn't be a good fit (such as raising your price so only the affluent can afford it).
- Visualization: encourage prospects to visualize how their lives would be if they accept it.
- Framing: emphasize the most critical details of your offering (such as how it will help them avoid losing something important).
- Hook: create and use a single phrase or sentence that describes an offer's primary benefit.
- Call To Action (CTA): tell the prospect exactly what to do, so they'll take the next step.
- Controversy: constructively take a position publicly that not everyone will agree with, approve of, or support to get attention.

Chapter 3: Sales

> "The best businesses in the world earn the trust of their prospects and help them understand why their offer is worth paying for…sales consists of helping the prospect understand what's important and convincing them you're capable of delivering on what you promise." — Kaufman

#1. How to Price Your Offer

The "Pricing Uncertainty Principle" states that all prices are arbitrary and malleable. You can charge whatever you want, so long as you can justify the price enough to get the sale.

There are four ways to justify your price:

- Replacement cost: supports a price by answering the question, "How much would it cost to replace?"
- Market comparison: supports a price by answering the question, "How much are other things like it selling for?"
- Discounted cash flow / net present value: supports a price by answering the question, "How much is it worth if it can bring in money over time?"
- Value comparison: supports a price by answering the question, "Who is this particularly valuable to (maybe a specific group would be willing to pay more)?"

#2. Sales Techniques and Strategies

The main ideas of effective sales is to build trust and common ground, and always sell based on the value your offer provides, not the cost.

With that said, there are a few techniques and strategies you can deploy to increase your chances of reaching the close:

- Value-Based Selling: the process of understanding and reinforcing the reasons why your offer is valuable to the purchaser. This is an approach typically characterized by listening, asking good questions, and then making good arguments based on the information acquired.
- Education-Based Selling: the process of making your prospects better and more informed customers. This is an approach characterized by investing time and energy in making your customers smarter which builds trust and increases their interest in your offer.
- Know their Next Best Alternative to your offer: you can structure your offer to make it more attractive than the competing option.
- Create and maintain exclusivity: create a unique offer or quality that competitors can't match.
- Trigger reciprocity: give value upfront so the receiver feels the need to reciprocate (such as by giving you the sale).
- Acknowledge your offer's potential risks or drawbacks: it increases trust and shows integrity.
- Limit how many options you give your prospect to buy from: too many options can overwhelm prospects and give them "decision fatigue".
- Give a money-back guarantee: which Kaufman calls "risk reversal".
- Convince past customers to buy from you again: which Kaufman calls "reactivation".

#3. Overcome Objections

There are five standard objections in every sales process:

1. It costs too much.
2. It won't work.

3. It won't work for me.
4. I can wait.
5. It's too difficult.

Structure your offer with those objections in mind to be prepared for them and always try to negotiate with the decision-maker.

Chapter 4: Value Delivery

Main ideas:

- Give customers an unexpected bonus in addition to the value they already expect: to surpass their expectations and ensure customer satisfaction
- Keep your offer predictable: by keeping it uniform (such as Coca-Cola keeping the same formula), consistent (such as Coca-Cola delivering that same formula every day for years), and reliable (being able to count on delivery of the value without error or delay).
- Focus on improving your value offer and delivery, not your competitors: because every improvement makes it harder for your competitors to keep up anyway.
- Spend time creating good systems and automation: that allow you to create, sell, and deliver more.

Chapter 5: Finance

#1. Only take as much as you need from customers (nothing more).

> Kaufman: "Value Capture is the process of retaining some percentage of the value provided in every Transaction.
> If you're able to offer another business something that will allow them to bring in $1 million of additional revenue and you charge $100,000, you're capturing 10% of the value created by the transaction."

So, how much value (money) should you take from customers when doing business with them?

Kaufman says to only capture enough value to make your investment of time and energy worthwhile and to cover your needs.

Do not try to squeeze out as much as you can with a nickel-and-dime, "get-every-penny" approach because that can have long-term consequences.

#2. The Four Ways to Increase Business Revenue.

1. Increase the number of customers.
2. Increase the average transaction size.
3. Increase the frequency of transactions per customer.
4. Raise your prices.

#3. More main ideas.

- If your business manages an inventory or extends credit to others, use an income statement with your cash flow statement: only using only a cash flow analysis can be misleading.
- Use cost-benefit analysis: to make better decisions (see if the potential benefits outweigh the potential costs).
- Seek markets where customers have a high lifetime value: to increase your chances of building and maintaining long-term relationships with profitable customers.
- Try to keep your overhead low: so it's easier to sustain your business operations.

- Don't lower the quality of your offer in the process of trying to cut costs: that's a mistake called "Incremental Degradation".
- Split the financial management responsibilities across multiple people and limit authorization in your company: to make theft and fraud more difficult for anyone one person to commit.

Chapter 6: The Human Mind

Some of the ideas:

- Practice self-care and meditation: get proper nutrients, exercise, and rest, and use meditation to increase your self-management skills.
- Personalize decisions for better decision-making: assess ideas by asking if you'd let someone you care about make the same choice. If not, consider avoiding it.
- Offer novelty in your offer: to keep people's attention (such as by breaking up your course into manageable modules and prefacing each module with a unique and interesting story).

Chapter 7: Working with Yourself

A couple of the ideas Kaufman shares:

- Focus on only one task at a time: and, if necessary, group similar tasks together (which Kaufman calls "batching") so it's easier on your brain.
- Don't become too attached to your vision: you'll have a hard time adjusting and adapting to the inevitable changes and unforeseen circumstances that come with life.

For more on productivity, also see Monk Mode.

Chapter 8: Working with Others

#1. The STATE Model

A communication framework to communicate without anger or defensiveness:

1. Share your facts. Facts are less controversial, so lead with them.
2. Tell your story. Explain your point of view, without judging or insulting.
3. Ask for others' paths. Listen to their side of the story.
4. Talk tentatively. Avoid judgments and ultimatums.
5. Encourage testing. Make suggestions and ask for input until you agree on a course of action.

For an assertive communication framework to draw boundaries with others, check out DESOE.

#2. The Golden Trifecta

Kaufman's communication approach to making others feel important and safe when talking to him:

1. Appreciation: express your gratitude for what others are doing for you, even if it's not perfect.
2. Courtesy: be polite.
3. Respect: honor the other person's status

Note: not a bad model. But, of course, I'd prefer if his "Golden Trifecta" was a "Golden Duo" of communicating with (1) warmth and (2) calibrated dominance because that would cover a broader range of applications—including the cases when you shouldn't show gratitude (see social scalpers) or be polite (such as in the face of a slap).

For more on this, see:

- Social Strategy 101: High-Power / High-Warmth
- Social Exchange Theory: 5 Laws of Social Success

#3. The Six Principles of Management.

1. Recruit the smallest group of people that can do the job quickly and effectively.
2. Communicate the end result clearly, who is responsible for what, and the current status of the task/project at hand.
3. Treat people with respect.
4. Create a productive environment and then let people do their work (avoid micromanaging).
5. Have an aggressive plan to complete the project, but don't have unrealistic expectations regarding certainty and prediction.
6. Measure what you're doing to see if it's working, and make the necessary adjustments and experimentations.

Also, when hiring, avoid making the mistake of judging candidates too harshly based on their interviewing skills. Judge them more on their past performance.

You don't want employees who are good "interviewees". You want employees who you know can get the job done.

#4. More ideas.

- Increase your power: by increasing your influence and reputation.
- Make others feel important: to make them value their relationship with you.
- Spend time with people you'd like to become more like: and leave groups that don't serve you.

And, more on the leaderlike behavior side:

- Set proper boundaries: and enforce them.
- When things go wrong, focus on potential solutions: it's far more productive than fixating on the issues.

Also, another good note, Kaufman says, "Incentives influence the way people act. Change the incentive, and you'll change the behavior."

And, he's right. (See the silver medal technique.)

Chapter 9: Understanding Systems

#1. Where to start when building your system.

Follow Gall's Law:

> Kaufman: "Gall's Law states that all complex systems that work evolved from simpler systems that worked. If you want to build a complex system that works, build a simpler system first, and then improve it over time."

#2. How to improve your system's performance.

Remove the constraints:

1. Identification: find the limiting factor.
2. Exploitation: make sure that the good resources related to the constraint aren't wasted.
3. Subordination: redesign the system to support the constraint.
4. Elevation: permanently increase the capacity of the constraint.
5. Re-evaluation: after making a change, reevaluate a system to verify where the constraint is truly located.

Chapter 10: Analyzing System

Measure your systems to better understand how to improve them.

#1. Use KPI's.

Here are some questions to identify your business's KPIs:

- Value-Creation: how quickly is the system creating value? What is the current level of inflows?
- Marketing: how many people are paying attention to your offer? How many prospects are giving you permission to provide more information?
- Sales: how many prospects are becoming paying customers? What is the average customer's Lifetime Value?
- Value-Delivery: how quickly can you serve each customer? What is your returns or complaints rate?
- Finance: what is your profit margin? How much purchasing power do you have? Are you financially sufficient?

#2. Track variances.

For example, track your customer-support requests, return requests, and warranty requests, and if the variation (fluctuation or trend of the numbers) is much higher than normal, take immediate action.

#3. Measure and analyze your data without emotion or bias.

If you let emotion or bias get in the way (such as by putting a greater emphasis on vanity metrics—metrics that make you look/feel good but might not accurately reflect the state of your business), there could be short or long-term consequences.

#4. Track useful ratios.

Here are some:

- Return on Assets: for every $1 you invest in equipment, how much revenue do you collect?
- Return on Capital: for every $1 you borrow or take on in investment, how much revenue do you collect?
- Return on Promotion: for every $1 you spend on advertising, how much revenue do you collect?
- Profit per Employee: for every person you employ, how much profit does your business generate?
- Closing Ratio: for every prospect you serve, how many purchase?
- Returns / Complaints Ratio: for every sale you make, how many choose to return or complain?

Chapter 11: Improving Systems

#1. Eliminate waste.

> Kaufman: "Non-critical inputs are significant opportunity costs. If you're spending most of your time in unproductive meetings, for example, you're wasting time that could be used to get important things done. The same goes for non-critical expenses. They represent money that you could be using to far greater effect. Find the inputs that produce the outputs you want, then make them the focus of most of your time and energy. Eliminate the rest."

#2. Make your business resilient.

Here are the key characteristics to look for when analyzing your business's resiliency:

- Low (preferably zero) outstanding debt.
- Low overhead / fixed costs / operating expenses.
- Substantial cash reserve for unexpected contingencies.

- Multiple independent products / industries / lines of business.
- Flexible workers / employees that can handle many responsibilities well.
- No single points of failure.
- Fail-Safes / backup systems for all core processes.

Real-Life Tips

- Offer genuine, free value to attract attention

It's effective for marketing your business because it gives prospective customers a chance to experience the value you provide and can gain a sale from someone who wouldn't have otherwise bought.

An example is the awesome free content here at TPM :).

- Ask for permission to follow up before/after providing free value

Interruption marketing used to be effective back in the early days when a commercial would interrupt your TV program and catch your attention.

But, things are different now.

These days, permission marketing is often more effective because it saves you time (only focusing on prospects you know are interested) and resources (not expending anything on those who are uninterested).

As an example, many online businesses use a "double opt-in" strategy to acquire email addresses. The prospect gives their email address to get free value, but before they can receive the value they gave their email address for, they must "confirm their subscription" (which gets their permission).

Cons

Ignore your WHY when creating your value offering?

Kaufman says that you should build your value offering with the goal of connecting it to as many of the five core human drives as possible and including status signals. That way, you can make your value offering as appealing as possible.

But, what if that approach leads you to create a value offering that doesn't align with your mission or vision?

As Simon Sinek says, "When you follow your WHY, what you do proves what you believe." (See Start with Why.)

But, Kaufman's advice suggests that you should follow the mantra, "When you follow what appeals to the market, what you (are able to successfully) do proves what others want."

I'm not yet fully convinced that that's the smartest way to go.

Note: I also couldn't help but notice that Simon Sinek's book, Start with WHY, didn't make Kaufman's list of recommended reads. So, maybe he doesn't fully agree with some of Sinek's teachings.

If no one seems to care about your offer, you might still have a viable business idea

Kaufman says that if no one seems to care about your offer, you don't have a viable business idea.

But, there are a few examples in The Lean Startup of businesses that had little to no sales, indicating that no one seemed to care about their idea.

And yet, after implementing the "Build, Measure, Learn loop", they were able to start getting sales, accelerating growth, and attracting more customers.

So, if the market doesn't seem to care, is it that you don't have a viable business idea or that you don't have an effective process for validated learning?

A few poor quotes

Kaufman says, "Marketing grabs attention, the quality of the product closes the sale."

Oftentimes, it's really the framing of the product that closes the sale (framing the product as solving the prospect's needs) and the quality of the product that sustains business growth (such as with repeat customers or virality). (That's an oversimplification, there's more to it than that, of course. But that's the general idea.)

If product quality was all it took to close a sale, then there would be far less scam artists and "value cheaters" in the world (those who promise great value and then run off with the money while delivering nothing—in those cases the quality of the product was absolute zero, yet the sale still closed).

Some ideas didn't convince me

Kaufman makes the case that you cannot manage your reputation because it's ultimately up to the people how they want to perceive you.

I'd agree that one cannot always control their reputation, but a reputation can be managed with effective influence, power dynamics, and social strategies.

If such weren't the case, PR firms and reputation management agencies probably wouldn't exist.

Note: this part seemed like a nitpick by Kaufman. For example, someone once told me that there's no such thing as time management because there are 24 hours in a day, in any given day, and you cannot change that. So, you can't technically "manage" time, only yourself. So, he practices self-management.

That makes sense and it's true, but it's also just the same thing (time management) said differently.

In Kaufman's case, he seems to be genuinely saying that reputation management truly cannot be done and is only an illusory idea which, I have to disagree with.

Good businesspeople and their respective businesses can get dragged through the mud for sharing information that's true, yet controversial. That doesn't mean that they should just lay back and allow others to continue dragging them because "it's not up to them what others want to think".

Ignores fair value social marketing + encourages naive collaboration

Kaufman says on reciprocity:

> Kaufman: "Being generous is one of the best things you can do to improve your results as a salesperson. If you give away value and help others as much as you can, they'll respect you."

Of course, as per social exchange dynamics, that may make sense IF you're dealing with honest and grateful people. The caveat being that if you keep giving more and more to a taker, they'll just take and take until you're depleted.

And, the chances that they'll respect you after that are slim. (See The Go-Giver and the naive self-help article.)

And for more on effective collaboration, see:

- Enlightened cooperation

> Life Strategy: The Enlightened Collaborator

Ignores preparing for the worst ("cover your ass") strategic thinking

Kaufman retells the same parable of the fisherman and the businessman that MJ DeMarco tells in his book, Unscripted.

However, these two authors ended their versions of the story in very different ways.

Kaufman ends the story with the businessman quitting his job, realizing that he could be just as happy with his current income as he would be after having built a giant, income-producing business.

The main point Kaufman makes here is that you only need to generate enough profit to cover your needs.

MJ DeMarco, however, ends the story with the fisherman being hit with a wave of unexpected fishing fees, costs, and expenses that cause him great misfortune for not having planned ahead by making a priority of generating more income.

Both stories have valid points and both books talk about how money is not the goal of life. (In Kaufman's book, the goal is happiness and satisfaction and, for DeMarco, an "unscripted lifestyle".)

However, only MJ DeMarco's writing shares the importance of preparing for the worst. And, that leaves Kaufman's telling of the story (and his corresponding advice) to come across as carrying some naivety with it.

Chapter on the human mind was very lacking

This book is already great in how it's condensed the top business principles into an overview of business and business development.

But, Chapter 6 felt like an attempt to fit an overview of psychology concepts and personal development into the book as well…all in one chapter.

And, for me, it very much fell short.

You could skip all of Chapter 6, save your time, and be just as well of listening to what Kaufman has to say on business.

If you're looking for a good book on applied psychology and the human mind, Methods of Persuasion gives a far better overview and introduction.

First half of chapter seven should've been removed

It couldn't measure up to the other resources out there. Once again, I feel that Kaufman should've focused on the business topics.

Short, surface-level productivity tips (that could've been found on most YouTube channels), standard "take care of your health" recommendations most already know, and a brief talk about forming habits.

You'd get far more value on all of those topics from Ultimate Power and a more in-depth analysis of behavior psychology applied to habits from Atomic Habits by James Clear.

Sometimes felt like certain ideas were shared in the wrong sections

For example, as much as the sunk costs fallacy makes sense in the finance section, it probably should have gone in the "human mind" section (right next to his writing on loss aversion) because it's more of a cognitive bias than a financial strategy.

Pros

Great example of the importance of simply going for it

Kaufman tells the story of how the PersonalMBA.com blog started out as simply a way to archive and share the best books he'd read on business as he pursued his path of self-directed education.

When Seth Godin (see Purple Cow) made a mention in an interview of how most people could gain as much value from an MBA by reading 30-40 solid books (and save years of their life in the process), Kaufman sent Godin an email thanking him for his perspective along with a link to his blog.

A mere few minutes later, Godin made a post to his audience recommending Kaufman's blog, and what was once a small side-project became a full business.

I liked this story because, among all of the business concepts, principles, and strategies, the most important 99% is in the action one takes (the execution and the "getting off one's ass").

So, while many allow fear to stop them from even starting, sometimes the action that changes one's life forever can be as simple as a quick email to someone you like and respect.

And, I love that.

Follow your passion...if it inspires you to give more value

In Unscripted, MJ DeMarco makes the case that you shouldn't follow your passion because passions alone don't give value to the marketplace (and the market only pays for value).

And, even if the market did, mixing your work with your passion will likely lead you to hate your passion by the time the work is done (because if you tie your passion to your work and then start to hate the work you're doing, you'll start to hate your passion as a side effect—at least, according to DeMarco.)

But, Kaufman makes the case that you should follow what interests you if it pulls you enough to keep you improving your offering every day (which is a part of the caveat to DeMarco's rule).

Calls out poor business practices and discourages them

For example, one quick snippet:

> Kaufman: “Respect your applicants. Your hiring process should not be a cover to obtain free consulting. If you prefer to use longer projects to evaluate a candidate, you can always hire them as a part-time consultant. Then, bring them on full-time if you’re pleased with their work.”

If you’ve read around the forum, you know that you must be careful of these types of interviewers and I was glad to hear Kaufman speak against it.

Review

A great overview of business and business terms.

Sometimes this book felt like it was more for readers interested in a business career than in starting a business themself. But, it covers the basics and foundations well enough that both types of readers could get value from it.

There are some areas that I disagree with based on other business wisdom (see the cons list above) and for those only interested in reading this for entrepreneurship, you can skip chapters six and seven (unless you’re brand new to psychology and self-development).

But, other than that, this book’s value far outweighs its cons overall.

And, for anyone who wants to know and understand the function of business (or simply be able to “talk business” with those who know key business jargon), this is your solid, comprehensive guide for the 20% of business principles and concepts that give you the 80% you need to know.

Full Summary

About The Author:
Tim Ferris is an American entrepreneur, investor, and popular "self-help celebrity".
He is also the author of "The 4 Hour Work Week" and "The 4 Hour Body".
We find that Ferris leans for an overly "hack-seeking approach" and tends to appeal to a more male-dominated audience who's also a bit "hack-seeking geeky". Overall an ok and smart guy though.

⍰♂Lucio's Take On Tim Ferriss

Lucio: Tim Ferris is a bit of an over-optimizer, sometimes a bit too Machiavellian, I don't follow him… But he's a

Avoid Busy Work: Focus on What Matters

If you feel too busy, you are probably not focusing well.

If you feel too busy and you are not progressing, you certainly are not focusing well.

Time Ferris says that being busy is a form of laziness, an excuse and a shield for not focusing difficult but critical actions that really matter.

Also, contrary to the Buridan's Ass, you should pick something instead of spreading yourself thin. This is also a concept emerging from Grit by Angela Duckworth.

Quote:

> Busy is a form of laziness; the refusal to focus on the few things that matter

Visualize Your Goals

Most of the Titans do visualize their goals.

Visualization for many of the titans sounded like having a clear WHY (read: Start With WHY).
Once you know where you're going, it becomes easier to prioritize and it becomes easier pushing through pains and obstacles.

My Note: visualization is not a silver bullet and can work against you
Because people are doing it, it doesn't mean it works independently of how you do it.
There are plenty of ways in which visualization can harm you instead of helping you.

Go For It – Start

If you dream of something, but haven't started yet, it's probably because you are living under self-inflicted mental shackles.

The message here is that all Titans -and all people you admire- were no better than you.

We strongly agree with that and highly recommend this foundational article fro self-empowerment:

- Making of the ubermensch

> Enlightened Self-Interest: Making of The Ubermensch

The only difference is that they started.

I like Ferris' approach to dealing with fear:

- Isolate and eliminate the 20% of activities causing 80% of negative emotions
- Ask yourself: what's the worst that could happen if you went for it? How could you fix things?

You will likely find out that you can rather easily go back to where you started. And that even the worst-case scenario is not that bad. And then ask yourself:

- What's the best-case scenario? Has anyone else pulled it off?

You will likely find out the upsides are much bigger than the downside. And that many who are not intrinsically any better than you have done it.

Also read How to Stop Worrying and Start Living and Linchpin by Seth Godin for more on fear.

Take Action

Success doesn't come from knowledge but from action.

Reading is great, but you should think about what tools and strategies you want to implement.

Then implement and act on them. Consistently, as Tony Robbins stresses.

Don't get hung up on the perfect idea, says Chuck Close, the best ideas often will come from the activity itself, and not through meticulous pre-planning.

Success is action-based, not knowledge-based

Creative Process Means Killing Your Ideas

Tim Ferris spends some time discussing the creative process of coming up with new ideas.

Many of the nuggets here revolve around the concept of simply coming up with more and more.

If you can't come up with many, it's probably because you are judging yourself on the quality of your idea (read: develop an antifragile ego) and you should set the bar lower instead.

The point is not coming up with great ideas, it's coming up with many ideas and killing off and destroying all the non-good ones, says Malcolm Gladwell, author of Blink. When you can find that idea that stands, then you know how to move forward.

That's the idea that Jay Samit calls "zombie idea" in his great book Disrupt You.

And I liked Stephen Dubner's contribution when he said you should remove your moral compass and preconceived ideas when evaluating ideas.

Before you get data and valid arguments, don't listen to what you already know (air pollution might have nothing to do with corporate greed).

Start Small, Then Take It From There

Tools of Titans rightly points out that we are often afraid to start something because it seems so complex and massive.

A great idea to start a new habit (read The Power of Habit) then can be of starting very small.

One single push-up before bed. One mindful breath to start a habit of meditation.

80% of Titans Meditate

Around 80% of the Titans in Tools of Titans have some meditation or mindfulness practice.

I was particularly intrigued by the usage of music on repeat to enter into a trance-like state of focus.

Develop Gratitude

Gratitude is a common refrain among many of the titans.

You can experience gratitude in many ways.

Some of the tools were:

- Think about a good relationship
- Ponder on how people helped you
- Relive what you've just learned yesterday
- An opportunity you will have today or in the near future
- Look around and think of all the things you have
- Jocko Willink, author of Extreme Ownership, reads about other's misfortunes

My note: don't read other people's misfortunes to feel better by comparison
I like all of the above except the last one which seems quite poor to me. It feeds off other people's misfortune and it implies you can't feel good even you're in a bad situation.

Learn From Failures

Tools of Titans shows how many of the successful people interviewed have an open mind towards failure.

They look at what they can learn from it and how they can use it.

Peter Thiel though, author of Zero to One, has a different opinion. He says failures are overrated. Businesses fail for more than one reason, so you rarely really learn anything when a business fails -and the costs of failure are bigger than the learning experience-.

Also read The Obstacle is The Way and Sometimes You Win, Sometimes You Learn.

Morning Routines

Many titans have a morning routine.

Tony Robbins has cold shower and meditation.

Reid Hoffman spends an hour on a topic he chose the night before, so he can tackle it when his mind is at its freshest.

Tools of Titans author Tim Ferris himself share his own morning rituals, which include doing his bed for a feeling of control and exercising.

Develop Empathy

Empathy is important both in interpersonal relationships and in building businesses -you have to understand people to serve them-.

When someone is angry or emotional at you, ask yourself what's wrong with them instead of getting emotional and defensive.
Also read How to Win Friends and Influence People.

This chapter deals a bit with communication (for which I recommend you Crucial Conversations and Difficult Conversations).

We generally agree here, but also think that empathy without power awareness is useless.

Focus on Personal Growth

Many ideas in the personal growth bits of Tools of Titans are not new. But a few were, and they opened new realms of thought for me. For example:

- Be very good in many disciplines

Being the N.1 is difficult.

But being very good so that you can reach the top 25% is not.

You can be top 25% in several disciplines and combine them to get your super power

- Ask the dumbest questions

Don't be afraid of asking the silly questions.

You'd be surprised how many people around you don't know the answer.

And silly, basic questions will often lead to higher forms of clarity and understanding -and sometimes groundbreaking new products-.

Also, my note, not being afraid of asking basic questions shows a huge strength of character.

Tim's 17 Questions

- What if I did the opposite for 48 hours?
- What do I spend a lot of money on? How might I scratch my own itch?

Tim was spending 500 a month on supplements, and he created his own line of supplements.

- What would I do if I had $10 million?

The author realized that his fantasies were much cheaper than he thought. Or that they were achievable with much less. He could be happy right there and then.

- If I could only work 2 hours per week on my business, what would I do?

This a question to help you prioritize ruthlessly.

- What's the least crowded channel?
- What if I couldn't pitch my product directly?

Tim says that people don't like being sold do, but they like stories.

- What if I could only subtract to fix problems?

We often seek to add things. But simplifying might save budget and time while streamlining your products and processes.

- What should you do to disappear for 4 to 8 weeks?

It will allow you to put in place systems and processes that let your business -or your life- go ahead without you. Then just do it, disappear. Also read The E-Myth Revisited.

- Am I hunting antelope or mice?

Details are important… Sometimes. Some other times they can lead to a lot of wasted time with no added value. Ask instead what action can you take that would lead all the rest easier or irrelevant?

- How can I waste money to improve the quality of my life?

Use money to earn time.
As De Marco says, money is the only resource you cannot buy back.

Health and Nutrition

This was the worst chapter.

And the most misleading of them all.

Just avoid it, it's chock-full of hype.

Tim Ferris talks up the back-then much hyped intermittent fasting and it shows that he doesn't really have any deep knowledge besides the various fitness trends that every superficial self-help hacker pushes around.

Check The 4 hour body for more on Ferri's take on nutrition, but here are the most important foods to avoid:

- White bread
- Pasta
- Potatoes
- Rice
- Deep fried food
- Cream-based sauces
- No calories in your drinks

Real Life Applications

Don't rush, but don't take too many pauses either

Slow and steady go fast.

Suffer a Little Regularly… And You Cease to Suffer

I liked this idea of growing stronger by suffering a little every day.

At the same time, watch out not to overdo it.

I personally use this principle a lot by rewarding myself very rarely. Possibly too rarely.

Deloading (ie.: take long breaks)

Do take some time off from time to time.

Unplug from work and social media. It's important that you take deloading seriously and don't let business and stress seep in.

Ultimately, deloading supercharges your business as you experience more life and think more freely.

CONS

- Mixed Bag of Random "Hacks"

Sure. Tool of Titans is supposed to be a mixed bag.

Tim Ferris says it himself in the preface: it's like a buffet.

But that doesn't mean it cannot also be a con.
Tools of Titans lacks structure and provides no overarching approach or guidance.

- Width Over Depth

Tools of Titans tackles interviewing tips, investment, morning routines, nutrition, fitness… And more.
But it doesn't go in-depth on any of them -worst yet, at times it felt it even lacked the expertise to properly address some of them-.

- Hacks Mentality Can Be A Trap

The “hack mentality” is a bit of a pet peeve of mine.

If the search for hacks takes precedence over the fundamentals, you lose.
And if you implement hacks without a bigger strategy for achieving what you want to achieve, you’re not really being as effective as you can.

Review

Tools of Titans is an OK book with a bunch of random and disparate self-help tips.

Some of them are good and some of them may not be as good for you.

It’s a bit lacking in structure and sometimes it feels that some of the topics it touches upon would deserve more depth or expertise.

Overall: good and makes for an interesting read, but not groundbreaking in any way and you may want to have other resources in your “high-priority list”.

Bullet Summary

Full Summary

About The Author:
George S. Clason was an American soldier, businessman, and author.
He wrote several personal finance parables that were distributed by banks and insurance companies. The most popular ones were collected together to form what's known today as "The Richest Man in Babylon", the work Clason is most famous work.

1. Spend Less Than You Earn

Clason recommends you save at least 10% of your income.

The richest people save much more, but starting with 10% is achievable for anyone and requires little adjustment in the quality of life.

It's not how much you make, it's how much you keep

2. Invest Your Money

Invest your savings so that it starts generating further income.

The book mentions the compound effect, also espoused by books such as Money Master the Game and Unshakable.

3. Cut Your Expenses

Most books focus on making more money, but "The Richest Man in Babylon" says that decreasing your expenses will be a quicker win for most people.

The message basically is: sure, think of how you can make more money. But get that low-hanging fruit right away and eliminate all unnecessary expenses.

4. Stick to What You Know

Do you when people lose the most money?

It's when they have discretionary money and feel like they can "risk a bit more"

As your money grows, you will be tempted to invest in the coolest new stuff and try out riskier investment vehicles.

Don't!

Stick to investing in what you know and what you can control well.

5. Cap Your Downsides (With Insurance)

Don't put your money in any position where it can be wiped out.

Gambling, for example, doesn't allow you to cap your downsize as you risk losing all the money you gamble.

To avoid endangering your capital, get insurance.

6. Buy, Don't Rent

If you are renting, you're flashing money down the drain.

Buy a house instead and transform it into an income-generating machine by renting it out.

If you're interested in buying cheap, also read:

- Unethical hack to buy a house cheap
- Unethical hacks to sell a house

8. Assure Future Income

What if your present income dries out?

You never know when you won't be able to work anymore, or when you won't want to work anymore.

That's why you need to set up systems that will ensure an income without you doing anything.

My Note:
I don't believe much in "systems ensuring an income" without you doing anything".
There is no such system that can "guarantee" an income.

9. Never Stop Learning

Never assume you know everything about your trade and your investments.

Keep an open mind and always keep learning. The more you know, the more money you can make.

Real-Life Applications

Think Twice Before Buying Something

Most purchases we make, we don't really need. I got so much stuff around me I barely used. Always ask yourself if you really need it before buying it.

CONS

I loved the parables format.

Yet there are a few cons common to most personal finance books:

- Similar ideas repeat over and over

The concepts are very similar among books on personal finance, including The Total Money Makeover, The Millionaire Next Door, I Will Teach You To Be Rich, and Rich Dad Poor Dad.

- Conservatively slow lane

Just like almost all other basic finance books, The Richest Man in Babylon espouses the compound interest.

This is valid, but it's based on the concept the market will always go up, which is far from a foregone conclusion (read Fooled by Randomness). And even in the best-case scenario, it will anyway take decades to make you rich -if ever-.

And it's more about real estate than entrepreneurship. Read the great The Millionaire Fastlane for a different approach and mindset.

- The old-school words and pronouns can get grating

I understand the book wants to use parables and give an “old wisdom feeling”, but it can be annoying reading too many times words such as “thy”, “thou” etc.

PROS

- Covers all the basics

While I write above that many similar concepts repeat across many similar books, it’s also true these concepts are basics personal finance tenets anyone should know about.

- Great mindsets

I liked how The Richest Man in Babylon shares not just tips and laws, but also key mindsets. Such as stop wishing for big lump sums of money and focus instead on work and on achieving an increasing cash flow.

Review

“The Richest Man in Babylon” is a good book for beginners on basic personal finance tenets and mindsets.

If you’re a beginner and haven’t encountered anything similar before, then grab yourself a copy.
If you know already all the basics of personal finance, focus on applying rather than reading more.

The Teacher-Pupil Frame: How Explaining Becomes a Power Move to Lower Your Status

Lucio Buffalmano · 26 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

In a competitive social environment, every interaction is a quiet negotiation of status and power. And one of the most common ways people dominate you subtly is by adopting the Teacher-Pupil Frame.

It's a familiar dynamic: A conversation turns into a lecture, and suddenly, the person explaining is elevated to a position of higher power, leaving you implicitly framed as lower-status, less knowledgeable, or even incompetent.

The critical insight—the one you won't find anywhere else—is that it's the act of explaining, not necessarily the actual knowledge, that sets this disempowering dynamic.

In this definitive guide, we expose the subtle power dynamics of the Teacher-Pupil Frame. You will learn the difference between fair mentorship and ego-feeding Guru Frames (and why those people want to keep you stuck). Most importantly, you will master the specific strategies and mindsets to reject these covert status climbs and reclaim your power in any social exchange.

Definition

> Teacher-pupil frames refer to intellectual power dynamics where the teacher self-frames as higher-power by virtue of his explaining and the pupil is framed as lower-power by virtue is lack of knowledge, expertise, or competence

In simpler words: he explains to you, so he slots himself as “above you” -smarter, more knowledgeable, more worldly, more effective, etc. etc-.
We may also refer to these as “teacher-learner”.

Power Dynamics Analaysis

Teachers are always higher value than learners.

Teachers are associated with expertise, knowledge, and value-transfer (a value transfer they have the power to bestow upon you).
Learners are associated with lack, low-value in most social exchanges, and the “need to learn” to “become better” -at least in their field of learning and, potentially more, as people as well as some learners may also not be “good enough”-.

That teachers are higher value should be simple logic, but if you need a concrete example, think of any teacher-pupil dynamic that include actual money exchanges.

Money is a proxy for value and power, and in all teacher-pupil exchanges, the pupil pays the teacher.

Money is of course only a part of the exchange, and when money is not there, the payment still happens in different currencies.
Teachers are higher status, sought-after, and get more promotions, dates, higher-value friends and allies.

Even mentally, the teacher tends to be higher confidence and higher self-esteem, while the pupil tends to be lower confidence and self-esteem -especially if he feels he needs to learn and will never become an expert-.

In brief: teachers get the most out of life and pupils get what’s left.

This is why, generally speaking, you want to be careful about who you allow being your teacher.

Power Dynamics of Teaching

First of all:

Notice that it’s the explaining that sets the power dynamics, and not necessarily the knowledge differential.

And that makes it a potentially harmful power move.

That means that simply by acting like a teacher one becomes your teacher, and you become their pupil.
The teacher may be a worthy explainer who knows what he’s talking about, but he may also be a clueless idiot, or a conman looking to swindle you by pretending to be full of wisdom (see the guru-marketers phenomenon).

For many guys, these potentially disempowering dynamics set in automatically.

In simpler words it means simply by accepting that someone is teaching you, you lose.
It’s a case of “do something, or pay the price”.

Guru-Disciple Frames

The extreme forms of teacher-pupil frames are with guru-disciples.

Gurus tend to:

- Speak as dispensers of ultimate truths
- Share "laws and rules" without exceptions
- Speak with charisma and full conviction
- Speak with a "God on mount Sinai" attitude
- Soapbox during group discussions, sometimes literally taking the higher spot or the stage
- Talk down on disciples

The worst for personal empowerment is when you help a guru set up those dynamics.

Because, remember: teachers and gurus need your help to accept the pupil and disciple role.

At the lower level, it starts with physical cues of "pedestalization".
For example:

Even more important with gurus and charlatans is the mental subjugation.

It's when you look up at the guru as if he's:

- Above you as a person
- A stage that you can never reach
- Higher value by virtue of his knowledge/status

Then you may as well have a new God, rather than a mentor or teacher.

These dynamics apply remotely.
Even if you're only watching a YouTube video, you end up mentally disempowered if you think of yourself as below and less valuable than the guru.

We highly recommend this article:

https://thepowermoves.com/enlightened-individualism

Similar to

- Psychologizing, or analyzing your personality, traits, and possible issues
- Therapist frames, or analyzing what and why you do or believe, what you're going through, or what you should be doing

Both psychologizing and therapist frames are strong power-position over you.
With the added risk that they can have gaslighting and crazymaking effects.

- Growth mindset: if you overdo the "growth mindset" in the wrong contexts you can end up in the pupil role and disempower yourself. Both mentally, and practically.
  You can lose status, dating opportunities, and be passed up for promotions by folks who display less drive/need for learning, and more expertise
- Social climbing, since the teacher/pupil frame power move frame is often an attempt at social climbing you
- Guru / disciple frames, which is the extreme form of teacher's frame

Also see:

- Judge power dynamics, since sometimes the pupil may seek the emotional validation of the teacher 9and the teacher will often gladly encourage that)
- Covert power moves, since the disempowerment of the teacher frame can be masked by the apparently nice gesture of "helping you with their teaching"
- Frames 101

When It's Fair / Unfair

As for everything:

Context and balance.

Some people miss the nasty power move the teacher frame can be because, many times, a teacher frame can be fair.

If someone is a teacher, if you're learning from them, and if they don't overplay their hand, then everything's good.

If you're actually learning a lot and if the teacher even takes steps to power protect you, the pupil is even gaining hugely, with little to no loss of status.

Teachers Disempowering With Their Attitude

Actual teachers can also be disempowering if they "overplay their hands".

For example:

- Social climb on his students or even customers
- Patronize / talk down on students rather than treating them as empowered men in the making
- Brag, posture, or puff his chest about "how much more advanced he is"
- Diminish or demand his students for their lack of knowledge, lack of fast progress, or supposed inferiority
